ACCOUNT OF THE LIFE AND CHARACTER

OF

JAMES MACKNIGHT, D.D.

Dr. James Macknight was born on the 17th of September, 1721. His father Mr. William Macknight, minister at Irvine, was a native of Ireland, where his ancestors, descended from the family of McCaughters in the Highlands of Scotland, had resided for more than a century, and where some of his relations still remain. Mr. William Macknight early displayed very popular talents as a preacher; and having, it is said, accidentally officiated in the church of Irvine, some time after the death of the former incumbent, he gave so much satisfaction to the hearers that he was soon appointed to supply the vacant charge. In this situation he continued during life, universally esteemed for genuine piety, purity of morals, and integrity of character. He married Elizabeth Gemmell, daughter of Mr. Gemmell of Dalreith—a small property in the neighbourhood of Kilmarnock, which had been in possession of the same family for several centuries, and which Dr. Macknight afterwards inherited in right of his mother.

By this marriage Mr. William Macknight had two daughters and four sons; of whom the youngest, and only one now alive, is Thomas Macknight, Esq. of Ratho, a gentleman who in early life signalised himself during the American war, by the most eminent services as a loyalist, and who, since his return to his native country, has long been distinguished by his unusual activity in the prosecution of agricultural improvements on the most liberal and extensive scale.

Mr. James Macknight, the subject of this narrative, received the rudiments of education at the school of Irvine, and about the age of fourteen was sent to the University of Glasgow, where he studied with great approbation from his teachers, on account of his diligence and proficiency. The notes he then took from the Lectures on Logic and Moral Philosophy, before he was sixteen, still remain among his papers, and afford remarkable indications of the same acuteness and soundness of judgment which afterwards characterized his theological writings.

Having completed the usual course of academical discipline at Glasgow, Mr. Macknight went to Leyden, in order to prosecute the study of theology, to which he had shown an early attachment. While he staid in Holland, he had an opportunity of procuring many valuable books written by foreign divines, which afterwards assisted his own labours in explaining Scripture. After his return to Scotland, having received from the Presbytery of Irvine a license to preach the gospel, he was chosen to officiate at the Gorbals, near Glasgow; a situation which at that time could be held by a licentiate of the Church, before being ordained to the pastoral function. On this occasion, one of the candidates was Mr. Robert Henry, afterwards the well known historian of Great Britain. It is somewhat remarkable, that the same gentlemen who thus happened to be placed in competition with each other at the commencement of life, were at last, after an interval of many years, associated as colleagues in the charge of the Old Parish Church of Edinburgh, a connexion which subsisted till the death of Dr. Henry, in the most cordial habits of friendship and intimacy.

From the Gorbals Mr. Macknight went to Kilwinning, in consequence of an invitation from Mr. Ferguson, then minister of that place, and acted for some time as his assistant in the charge of the parish. Here he conducted himself with such propriety, that his character began to be established; and, on the death of Mr. Fisher at Maybole, he obtained the vacant living there, with the succeeding wish of the heritors and people. Of this charge, accordingly, he was ordained as minister on the 10th of May, 1753. At Maybole Mr. Macknight continued sixteen years, and discharged the duties of the pastoral office with such assiduity and kindness, that when he left it, he carried with him the affections and regret of all his flock.

It was at Maybole that, amidst his professional occupations in a populous charge, Dr. Macknight composed the first and second of his Works. Of the former, indeed, on the Harmony of the Gospels, it appears from his papers, that the plan had been conceived by him so early as the third or fourth year of his attendance at the university, and from that time he began to collect materials for the publication. The first edition of this work was published in 1756. Although the plan of it differed considerably from that of former Harmonists in supposing that the Evangelists have not neglected the order of time in the narration of events, the reception it met with from the most competent judges was so favourable, that the author was encouraged to undertake a second edition, with considerable improvements and additions. This edition appeared in 1759. In the same year was also published by Dr. Macknight another performance of great merit, entitled, The Truth of the Gospel History, which had been the fruit of the author's studies during the interval between the first and second editions of his Harmony. Its object is, to illustrate and confirm, both the argument and by appeal to the testimony of ancient authors, what are commonly arranged under the three great titles of the Internal, the Collateral, and the Direct Evidences of the Gospel History.

By these publications Dr. Macknight soon obtained a high reputation for theological learning. The University of Edinburgh conferred on him (among the first who obtained that distinction in Scotland) the degree of Doctor of Divinity; and he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1769. During the course of the same year he was translated to the parochial charge of Jedburgh, in which he remained about three years, and where he received from his people the most flattering tokens of respect and kindness. In 1772 he was elected one of the ministers of Edinburgh. His first charge was the Parish of Lady Yester, from which he was translated in 1778 to the Old Church, where he continued during the remainder of his life.

The lives of the learned commonly offer little else to our curiosity, than the simple record of their studies and writings. This observation, often made, is peculiarly applicable in the present instance. After he took up his residence in Edinburgh, there were few occurrences in the life of Dr. Macknight which could be made the subject of narration. Besides performing the ordinary duties of the pastoral function, a minister of Edinburgh, in virtue of his office, is much occupied with public meetings and public business, especially the management of the different charitable foundations which have long been the boast of the capital of Scotland. Among other objects of such official care is the Fund established by Act of Parliament for a Provision to the Widows and Children of Ministers in the Church of Scotland. As one of the Trustees appointed by the Act, Dr. MACKNIGHT, after many years, took a leading part in conducting the business of this charity; and when the growing prosperity of the Fund had paved the way for an increase of its capital, Dr. MACKNIGHT was nominated by the Trustees, along with the celebrated Dr. WEBSTER, (to whose benevolent exertions this valuable institution was much indebted for its establishment), as a Commissioner, to solicit a renewal of the Act of Parliament. This accordingly was obtained in 1779; fixing the capital at £100,000, and making other alterations for the benefit of the Fund. After the death of Dr. WEBSTER, Dr. MACKNIGHT was appointed joint Collector with Sir H. MORGAN, WILLS, Bart.; a colleague whose great talents for business suited him, as experience has since shown, for the important office which he still holds, with the highest credit to himself and advantage to the Fund.

The line of conduct which Dr. MACKNIGHT pursued with regard to the points of ecclesiastical policy that have long divided the members of the Church of Scotland, was different from what might have been presumed, in consequence of the first impressions on these topics which, it is probable, he had received from his father. But after mature deliberation, with that manliness and self-decision which marked his character, he adopted the principles that were to regulate his future conduct in the Church Courts; and, throughout life, he acted steadily on that system of ecclesiastical policy which, for many years past, has guided the decisions of the General Assembly. At the same time, he firmly resisted whatever appeared to him as any infringement on the constitutional law or practice of the Church; and accordingly, when some of his friends seemed to wish for the abolition of calls, as an unnecessary form in the settlement of ministers, he moved and carried a resolution of the Assembly, 1782 (relative to certain omissions on the subject, then under the discussion of the house), Declaring, That the modes act of a call in settling ministers, is agreeable to the inmemorial and constitutional practice of this Church; and that it ought to be continued, a resolution which was afterwards converted into a Declaratory Act, and printed as such in the proceedings of the Assembly for that year.

Of Dr. MACKNIGHT it may in general on this head be recorded, that no member of the Church to which he belonged ever, perhaps, entertained more just or profound views respecting the great fundamental principles of her constitution and laws, or concerning the nature and distinct powers of her several judicatures; and that in relation to the business which usually occupies the General Assembly, either in its judicature or in its legislative capacity, he always formed a clear, sound, and decisive judgment. On this account he was often consulted by the leading members of that Court, and, on several important occasions, his professional advice and assistance were of essential service to the magistrates of Edinburgh, with regard to the ecclesiastical arrangements of the city.

But what chiefly engaged his mind, and occupied his time, after he became a minister of Edinburgh, was the execution on his last remaining work on the Apostolic Epistles; which was published in 1795, in four volumes quarto. Respecting this work it is perhaps not unworthy of being told, that it was the result of the unremitting labour of almost thirty years; that notwithstanding his numerous professional avocations, the author, while observing all the laws of his calling and the time he was able to give away from the press, the whole manuscript had been written no less than five times with his own hand. At the time of publishing 'The New Translation of the Apostolical Epistles, with a Commentary and Notes,' Dr. MACKNIGHT was highly indebted to the patronage of the Duke of Grafton; and after the work made less than a general appearance, he received the most honourable testimonies of approbation from many of the Bishops and respectable dignitaries of the Church of England, as well as from the oldest divines of all descriptions.

After the publication of this work, Dr. MACKNIGHT considered himself as having accomplished the greatest object of his life; and wishing to enjoy, at the end of his days, some relief from the labour of study, he resisted the repeated solicitations of his friends, who earnestly urged him to undertake the illustration of the book of the Acts, on the same plan which he had so successfully followed in the explaining the other parts of the New Testament. An accidental and peculiarly embarrassed state of health, the unceasing exercises of his usual exercise, a sensible decline of his faculties, particularly a failure of his memory, was observed by his family. This fact is a striking instance of the analogy between the powers of the body and those of the mind, both of which suffer by inaction; and it furnishes a useful caution to those who have been long habituated to any regular exertion of mind, against the once despising entirely from its usual efforts; since the effect, in the course of nature, is not only to create languor, but to hasten the progress of debility and failure.

As yet, however, Dr. MACKNIGHT's bodily vigour seemed to be but little impaired. In early life he was afflicted with frequent headaches; but after he had reached the age of thirty, they seldom returned; and he afforded a singular instance of a sedentary life long continued, with hardly any of those complaints which it usually induces. This uninterrupted enjoyment of health he owed, under Providence, to a naturally robust make, and a constitution of body uncommonly sound and vigorous; along with regular habits of temperance and of taking exercise, which he did by walking nearly three hours every day.

Having finished the task he had prescribed to himself as an author, he mingled frequently in the society of his friends, from which, at intervals, he had always received much enjoyment; and long retained the same cheerful countenance, the temper for which he had obtained from severe study, he had been remarkable, when in the company of those whom he esteemed. Even after the symptoms of his decline became visible, his natural sagacity and strength of judgment, as well as his extensive and familiar knowledge of the Scriptures, were still to be discerned in his conversation and public appearances; and so habitual was his anxiety to discharge his duty, that he insisted on officiating for a considerable time after his friends had wished him to withdraw from public labour. It was not, indeed, without much entreaty, that he at last consented to accept the services of an assistant.

At this period of his life it was peculiarly fortunate for him, that in Dr. GRIEVE, who became his colleague after the death of Dr. HARRIET, he found a companion of the most amiable manners, and a friend of distinguished worth and respectability, from whom he experienced every office of attention and kindness. When he was at length no longer able to write, the judicious opinions, and extensive information of his very accomplished and learned colleague, frequently afforded him in conversation a source of interesting entertainment. These proofs of respect and attachment have laid his family under perpetual obligation; and gratitude forbids, that any account of him should be given to the world without an acknowledgment of the friendly solicitudes which cheered and supported his declining years.

The disease which terminated his life was the Peripneumonia Notha, occasioned by an incalculable exposure to the severity of the weather, about the end of December, 1799. This distemper, in its progress and issue, received the ablest and most assiduous treatment and medical skill. During his illness, his mind was composed, tranquil, and resigned; he never complained; and on the morning of the 13th of January, 1800, he expired without a struggle. As in the course of the preceding night he slept but little, the time was employed in hearing passages from the Psalms and Evangelists, which by his own desire were read to him by one of his family. Thus, having spent his life in illustrating Scripture, and exerted the last efforts of his attention in listening with delight to its precious words of peace to the righteous, he may be truly said to have slept in Jesus.

The character of a man whose life was devoted to a single object of incessant study, can hardly be expected to afford scope for much variety of delineation. Perhaps the circumstances which have been related, sufficiently indicate its prominent features; and we might leave the consideration of it with observing, that it was strongly marked by vigour, firmness, good sense, and unembellished integrity. His literary career was early formed. He perceived the defect of antiquity with critical skill; and of his acquaintance with the Greek language, especially the original of the New Testament, his observations on the force of the particles, in his commentary, are a sufficient proof. In the speculations, also of metaphysical, moral, and mathematical science, he was a considerable proficient. The fact is, his powers were such as might have been turned with advantage to any department of knowledge or learning.

As a clergyman, the sentiments and conduct of Dr. Macknight were equally characterized by consistence and propriety. In the discharge of every public and private duty of religion, with a constant reliance on divine aid, both regular and steady. He knew and felt what became the consecrated office which he held; and never departed on any occasion from the dignity or decorum of his professional character. Having given himself wholly to the meditation of divine things, he continued in them: In the work of his Master he was steadfast and faithful to the end. His piety was at once sincere, rational, and without ostentation. To be useful in the cause of truth and virtue, was his highest ambition: and with all the means of attaining this end, which the resources of a well-informed and liberal mind could supply, he united a zeal for the interests of Christianity, that terminated only with his life.

In that branch of the pastoral office which is called lecturing, his learning and ability were much admired, and never failed to please, as well as to instruct and edify, in a degree which has seldom been equalled. As a preacher, also, without pretensions to the graces of eloquence, he had a certain earnestness of manner, evidently proceeding from the heart, and from a sincere anxiety to be useful, which always commanded the attention, and excited the interest of the hearers. His discourse betrayed uncorrected indiscipline, gravity, sincerity; his sentiments were just, energetic, and impressive; and his constant object was to press on the minds of his people the truths necessary for the correction of vice, and the advancement of piety, knowledge, and goodness. With this view he may be said to have affected a greater than usual plainness of diction.

It is true, that to be perspicuous and intelligible to the most illiterate of his audience, ought to be always the chief object of a preacher. But this may be accomplished with a strict adherence to purity of language; and it must be confessed, that the difficulty is great of frequently employing familiar expressions, without descending from that propriety which is indispensable to the dignity of the pulpit. It may be added, that his inexhaustible variety of thought and expression in prayer, bespeaks a mind richly stored with religious ideas, and at once surprised and delighted those who regularly attended his ministry.

When engaged, the most in private controversy or the public debates of the church courts, he was always remarkable for speaking strictly to the point at issue. He was likewise distinguished by coolness, discretion, and command of temper; he listened with patience to the arguments of his opponents, and in delivering his opinions, he showed himself uniformly open, candid, and explicit. At the same time, his talent was rather that of business than of address; he appeared to be better fitted for deciding on the merits of a question in debate, than for soothing the passions or managing the humours of mankind—a qualification rarely possessed but by minds of a superior order. On every occasion he thought and acted with the energy of self-decision. And hence it is that all his writings evince the sentiments of a masculine independent spirit, uninfluenced by authority, and unfettered by prejudice.

Nor was his praise merely that of professional excellence. On various subjects his range of knowledge was ample and profound. Thus his taste for classical literature was early formed. He pursued the literature of antiquity with critical skill; and of his acquaintance with the Greek language, especially the original of the New Testament, his observations on the force of the particles, in his commentary, are a sufficient proof. In the speculations, also of metaphysical, moral, and mathematical science, he was a considerable proficient. The fact is, his powers were such as might have been turned with advantage to any department of knowledge or learning.

It may further be noticed, that in conducting the ordinary affairs of life he displayed uncommon prudence and sagacity. He was one of those who are generally attentive to small concerns, but on proper occasions showed himself liberal and high-minded. On this different instances occurred in the course of his transactions with his friends; and he was enabled to act on such a principle of generosity by his usual habits of economy and prudence. Dr. Macknight’s external appearance was sufficiently expressive of his character. His countenance was manly and commanding, and his gait remarkably erect and firm.

ADHERENTLY to the plan of this sketch, any critical account of Dr. Macknight’s works cannot with propriety be given here. It may only be observed, in general, that his reputation for sound criticism, extensive knowledge, and clear elucidation of the sacred writings, is rapidly increasing amongst Christians of every denomination; and it must be acknowledged to have been one of the most intelligent, judicious, and candid expositors of the Scriptures that ever appeared. Even during his own lifetime his diligence was rewarded by an ample portion of respectable fame. The “Harmony of the Gospel” has long been esteemed a work of standard excellence for the students of evangelical knowledge. His “Truth of the Gospel History” has hitherto attracted the notice of the public less than any of his other productions: but it well deserves to be more generally read, since, of what it proposes to establish, it contains the most satisfying views that can be suggested by learning, acuteness, and good sense, and is admitted by the best of judges to be a per-
CHARACTER OF DR. MACKNIGHT.

Performance as useful and instructive as any we have on that important subject.

"The Commentary on the Apostolical Epistles" is now held in peculiar estimation; and it may be doubted whether it will ever, in any former age of Christianity, so fully, clearly, and happily stated, as has been done by Dr. Macknight in the General Views and Illustrations which he has prefixed to the several Chapters of the Epistles. — In this able, judicious, and learned Work, the Author's method of explaining the Scriptures is everywhere employed with the greatest success. His object was to discover the meaning of the inspired writers in difficult passages, from a comprehensive view of all the circumstances to which they allude, without regard to interpretations of mere human authority. Hence, although on principle attached to the established standards of the Church of Scotland, he did not conceive it as any advantage to the system which he maintained, to urge in support of its peculiar doctrines every passage which seals without knowledge may have employed for that purpose. Nothing, in fact, tends more to injure the cause of truth and religion than an injudicious appeal to Scripture; or the attempt to establish opinions by the sanction of scriptural words or passages, without reference to what precedes or follows them, and thus invested with a meaning, more than probably, entirely different from what was intended by the sacred writers. Of this mistaken application Dr. Macknight has shewn various instances; remarking, that when a doctrine is sufficiently established by any passage in which it is expressly or undoubtedly declared, we only weaken it by any appeal to other passages, of which the application to that doctrine may be dubious, or at best equivocal. — Accordingly, it must be allowed, that in this method of elicit- ing the true meaning of Scripture, by a due respect to parallel passages, and the design of the whole context, the expositions and views which, with much sagacity of critical investigation, our Author has given of Paul's Epistles, are extremely natural, acute, and sensible.

The Life of the Apostle Paul, which concludes this work, is an excellent compendium of the apostolical History; and may be considered as the Author's view and illustration of the Acts of the Apostles — the only part of the New Testament writings (except the Revelation of St. John) which, in the labours of the commentator, were not directed. — In all his writings, his style, though unambitious of elegance or ornament, is perspicuous, and appropriate to the subject.

Dr. Macknight enjoyed the friendship and esteem of many eminent characters among his contemporaries of the same profession. In the number of these were Dr. Blair and Dr. Robertson, to whose attachment he owed much on different occasions. If the portrait which has been given in this account is a faithful resemblance, the name of him whom it represents may now be considered as not unworthy to be associated, in future times, with those of the men, in whose society, during his lifetime, he had often the happiness of passing his hours, and whose works will live as the glory of Scotch literature, while civilization and refinement exist.

Dr. Ewing and Dr. Finlay had been the companions of his early youth; and although in his opinions on some points of Church policy he differed from these venerable persons, so universally esteemed for piety and profound theological learning, their mutual regard continued unaltered through life.

From Lord Hailes he received many valuable hints relative to the early state of Christianity, of which he availed himself in his last Work.

The proofs of respect which he experienced from many of his younger brethren in the Church, were highly gratifying to Dr. Macknight. Among his friends of this description, there were two for whom he entertained a peculiar esteem; and each of them had an opportunity of paying a public tribute of regard to his memory, in the General Assembly. As was written by a venerable Father, who ranked among the most eminent Divines that the Church of Scotland has produced; who was often spoken of in the House with great ability, and who found knowledge of the subject on which he delivered his opinion; who was a master in our Israel, concerning all points of ecclesiastical law; and by whose theological labours, conducted during a long life with unremitting assiduity, and directed to the most valuable objects, all of us now daily profit. — To Dr. Finlayson, of whose firmness, sagacity, and accurate knowledge, he early appreciated the future value to the Church, Dr. Macknight was strongly attached by a certain congeniality of mind; and he often had great pleasure in discussing various subjects of his attention, with a friend so remarkable for acuteness, judgment, and strength of intellect. It accorded with the sentiments of Dr. Macknight, that Dr. Finlayson, officially reporting to the Assembly the death of Dr. Macknight, as joint Collector of the Fund already mentioned, said, that "his deep learning, sound judgment, and great respectability of character, had rendered him one of the brightest ornaments of our Church."

Soon after the time of his being ordained, Dr. Macknight married Elizabeth McCormick, eldest daughter of the worthy and respectable Samuel McCormick, Esq., General Examiner of the Excise in Scotland — a lady whose humane and charitable character endeared her to the people in every parish where her husband has officiated as pastor; and whose tender feelings of sympathy for distress, unwearied activity of benevolence, and constant anxiety to promote the happiness of all whom her kind offices can reach, are still known, and will long be remembered with approbation in the circle where Providence has blessed her with opportunities of doing good. By her Dr. Macknight had four sons: The eldest, a very promising young man, at the age of seven, another, reached the age of thirty-three, after having suffered much from a lingering distemper, which last proved fatal to him. The loss of this very amiable young man was the chief distress which Dr. Macknight experienced in the course of his long and useful life. — Of his family now remaining, one is engaged in a department of the Profession of the Law, and the other is a Clergyman of the Church of Scotland.

This plain and cordial narrative, which must now be brought to a close, is another proof of what has frequently been remarked, that the history of men whose lives have been spent in the acquisitions of learning, are generally barren of those incidents which excite an interest in the details of biography. — Continually occupied with the duties of his office, with his studies, and his writings, Dr. Macknight seldom mingled in what may be called the bustle of the world, and had no share in the political transactions of the day. For engaging in these, indeed, as already hinted, he was little adapted, either by the natural bent of his mind, or by his usual habits of life. But he has left behind him a reputation superior to that which is conferred by the pursuits of ambition, or the lustre of events creating only a temporary interest in the passions of men; and his name will probably be remembered with veneration, as long as the study of divine truth continues to be cultivated in the Christian world.
GENERAL PREFACE.

The New Translation of the Apostolical Epistles being the principal part of the Work now offered to the Public, it will no doubt be expected, that the Author should give the reasons which induced him to undertake a performance of this sort, after the many versions of the Scriptures already published. The principles also on which this translation is formed must be explained, that the reader may understand in what respects it will differ from other versions. — And as the commentary and notes, with the prefaces and essays, have greatly increased the size of the Work, some account must be given of what is done in them towards explaining the meaning of the sacred oracles.

SECT. L.—Of the Ancient Translations of the Scriptures; and of their influence on the Modern Versions.

With respect to the reasons which induced the author to attempt a new translation of the apostolical epistles, he acknowledges that the versions of the Scriptures used at present by the different nations of Europe have been faithfully made, according to the skill of the persons who made them; and that the common people who read any of these versions can be at no loss to know the fundamental articles of the Christian faith. Nevertheless, a new translation of these divinely inspired writings cannot be thought superfluous, unless it could be said with truth of some one of the versions extant, that it is everywhere accurate, intelligible, and unambiguous. But this, it is supposed, no good judge will take upon him to affirm.

The learned, in reading the ancient and modern versions of the Scriptures, must be sensible that there is a remarkable agreement among them, especially in the translations of the difficult passages. Now, though at first sight this may be thought a proof of their accuracy, the inference is by no means safe. That agreement may have proceeded, not from the justness of the translation, but from the subsequent translators treading in the steps of those who went before them. And that they actually did so is very evident.

During the first and following ages, the disciples of Christ being numerous in the countries where the Syriac was the vulgar language, a translation of the writings of the apostles and evangelists into that language became absolutely necessary, after the gift of tongues, and of the interpretation of tongues, had ceased in the church. Wherefore, a Syriac translation of the books of the New Testament was very early made, for the use of the Christians in the east who did not understand the Greek.

This, with the Syriac translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, is what the Maronites, who use that translation, call The pure and ancient Syriac Version, (similicem et antiquam. Mill's Prolegomena, No. 1397. Kuster's edition.) and the Maronites speak without proof, when they say a part of that version was made in the time of Solomon, and the rest by Thaddaeus, or some other of the apostles, in the time of Agbarus. It is certain, however, that the Syriac version of the New Testament is very ancient. For, from its wanting the second epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, and from several words and phrases not consisting in Walton and Mill with great probability infer, that it was made before the whole of the sacred writings were generally known; consequently, that it was made in the beginning of the second century. (See 2 Pet. Pref. Sect. I.)

This Syriac version, on account of its antiquity, and because it is in a language not materially different from that which our Lord and his apostles used was held in great esteem, in the early ages, by all the eastern churches. But it was not known among us till the sixteenth century, at which time it was brought into Europe from Ignatius, the patriarch of Antioch, by an eastern priest; and falling into the hands of Albert Widenmantel, he printed it at Vienna in the year 1655; since which it hath been well known to the learned in Europe, and well received by them all.

The reasons which occasioned a Syriac Translation of the Scriptures to be made in the east, are likewise in producing a Latin translation of the same writings, for the use of the Christians in the west. This is what has been called The old Italic Version, which as Mill conjectures, (No. 308,) was made in the time of Pope Pius I., that is, in the middle of the second century, not long after the first Syriac version was made. In the Italic version the New Testament was translated from the Greek, and the Old, not from the Hebrew, but from the Septuagint, which at that time was generally believed to have been made by inspiration, and was esteemed of equal authority with the Hebrew itself. But the edition of the Septuagint from which it was made being very incorrect, Jerome, about the year 383, at the desire of Pope Damasus, translated the Old Testament into Latin from the LXX. as set forth in Origen's Hexapla; and, at the same time, corrected the Italic translation of the New Testament by the Greek. (See Mill, No. 852, 853.) In his preface, however, Jerome informs us, (No. 1356,) that he corrected it only in those passages where he thought the meaning of the Greek text was misrepresented. The other passages, in which the deviations from the original were of less importance, he suffered to remain as he found them, that his might not appear to be very different from the former edition of the Italic version, which at that time was universally used. Afterwards, between the years 392 and 405, Jerome translated all the books of the Old Testament from the Hebrew. — His second version of the Italic translation of the New Testament, being disapproved by many of the bishops and learned men of that age, as lesser the credit of the old translation, a new edition of the Italic version was compiled, in which its translations of the Psalms, and of some other books of the Old Testament, were retained, (Simon, Hist. Crit. i. ii. c. 1,) and Jerome's second version of the Last was adopted, together with his corrected translation of the New Testament. The Italic version of the Bible, thus modelled and amended, is what hath long been known in the church by the name of The Vulgate. And though at the first that edition was rejected by many who adhered to the Italic translation in its primitive form, yet the prejudices of the public subduing by degrees, it came at length into such general esteem, that it was substituted in place of the Italic, which had been long publicly read in the western churches, and in all the churches of Afr. rica; (No. 548.) And thus the Vulgate became the only version of the Scriptures used in the Latin church, down to the times of the Reformation.

The italic translation of the New Testament having been made from copies of the original, nearly as ancient as the apostolical age, the readings of these copies exhibited in the Vulgate were considered as so authentic, that in the fifth and following centuries, some of the transcripts of the Greek Testament were corrected by the Vulgate. In this manner the famous Alexandrian MS. was corrected, if we may believe Weststein, (See Pref. to his Greek Testament,) as likewise, according to Mill, (No. 1457. 1478,.) were the Vatican and the St. Germain copies; and according to Knorr, some others. (See his Preface.) Nay, Mill himself thought the readings of the Vulgate so authentic, that he imagined certain passages of our present Greek Testament might, by these readings, be restored to what he calls their primitive integrity; (No. 1309. 133.) Be this as it may, if the Vulgate edition of the Italian version was in such esteem as to be used anciently in correcting the Greek copies, we may suppose that the people translated the New Testament into the Syriac the second time, and into the other eastern languages, would be much guided by the Vulgate, or by the versions which followed it. Hence, in the second Syriac, and other eastern versions, there is such a surprising agreement with the Vulgate, that Mill once thought their translations actually made from it; (No. 1401.) Afterwards, indeed, to give the greater authority to the readings of the Vulgate, he supposed the Greek copies, from which these oriental versions were made, were the same with the copy from which the Italian was taken; (No. 1250.) But it can hardly be thought that these translators met with copies of the original exactly similar to that from which the Italian was made. The greatness of the Saxon, which that version, and the Vulgate, was held in the early ages, makes it more probable that the oriental versions copied the Italian, or Vulgate, as the Italian itself seems to have been copied from, or corrected by, the first Syriac translation. What confirms this conjecture is, that the Saxon version of the four gospels was made from the Italian, before it was corrected. After that, when Peter Waldis, in the year 1160, got the Gospels and some other books of Scripture translated into the French language, and John Wickliff, in the year 1367, translated the New Testament into English, these translations were not made from the originals, but from the Vulgate. About that time, likewise, there were other vernacular translations of the Scriptures used in different countries, which were all made from the Vulgate. (See Simon, Hist. Crit. V. T. l. ii. c. 22.) Nor could they be otherwise made, very few in that age having any skill in the original languages. Nay, in times more enlightened, I mean about the beginning of the Reformation, when Luther translated the New Testament into the German language, and Tyndal into the English, though these excellent men are said to have made their translations from the Hebrew and Greek, it is more probable that they made them from the Latin, and corrected them by the Greek. This was the case with Tyndal; as shall be shown afterwards. These fathers of the Reformation, before their eyes were a little opened, having known no other word of God but the Latin Bible, it was natural for them to follow it in their translations, where the doctrine in dispute between them and all the Pagans did not interpose. The high esteem in which the Vulgate version was held at that time, was strongly displayed by the fathers of the council of Trent, many of them men eminent for their learning, when, in the fourth session, after enumerating the books of Scripture, they decreed as follows: "If any person does not esteem these books, with all their parts, as contained in the Vulgate edition, to be Scriptures and canonical, let him be excommunicated." To strengthen their decree, they added, "That in all public readings, disputations, preachings, and expositions, the Vulgate edition of the Scriptures is to be held as authentic." (Fra Paolo's History of the Council of Trent.) It is true, the first reformers neither acknowledged the authority of the council, nor carried their respect for the Vulgate translation so far as to place it on an equality with their own; yet it was natural for them to follow that highly esteemed ancient version, especially when they were at any loss for the meaning of the Greek text.

Beza, perhaps, may be thought an exception from this charge. He translated the New Testament into Latin, professedly to amend the Vulgate version. Yet any one can read the comparison, and after examining the case, will be forced to the conclusion that, notwithstanding he hath corrected a number of its faults, he hath often followed it in passages where it is erroneous. Many of the Greek particles he hath translated with more latitude than is done in the Vulgate. Yet, having followed its uniformity of the particles in other passages, he hath perverted, in his version, a number of it, as Dr. Thomas James, keeper of the Bodleian library, who compared the two editions, hath shown in a book which he entitled, The Papal War. See also his Concordances, the whole reaching itself ultimately into that of the Vulgate.

The difference between the Latin with the first Syriac is shown by Beza in many passages of his notes.
GENERAL PREFACE.

ing to explain it. This method is followed, not only in the Vulgate, but in the Coptic or Egyptian version, which is supposed to have been made in the fifth century (No. 1509).—Some words of the text the ancient translators have omitted, either because they were wanting in their copies, or because they did not know how to translate them. Other words they translated erroneously. Because, although there are many elliptical expressions, especially in the epistles, the ancient translators have seldom supplied the words necessary to complete the sense; by which neglect their versions are often dark, and sometimes erroneous. In other passages, they have added words and clauses without any necessity. Nay, some passages they have translated in such a manner as to convey no meaning at all, and sometimes extremely absurd. Above all, the unskilfulness of the ancient translators appears in their assigning the same meaning to the same particle,†† almost everywhere, notwithstanding the Greek particles have very different significations, especially as they are used by the sacred writers.

The qualifications of the ancient translators of the Scriptures, and the learnedness of their versions, being such as the author hath described, it is easy to see that there must be many faults in them. Yet they are not such as to authorize Mosheim's harsh censure of the Vulgate in particular; namely, that it "abounds with innumerable gross errors, and in many places exhibits a striking barbarity of style, and the most imperfect obscurity with respect to meaning." The Vulgate is a transcript. I say authors, because, according to Mill, it was made by different hands, and at different times. Yet, with all its faults, the Vulgate is a valuable work; as it hath preserved much of the beautiful simplicity of the original, and in many passages its translations are more just than those in some of the modern versions.

Upon the whole, since most of the ancient translators of the Scriptures, on account of the antiquity and reputation of the Latin, or Vulgate version, have followed it, not indeed in its manifest absurdities, but in many of its less apparent mistranslations, and since the subsequent translators have generally copied the Vulgate, or have been guided by it, we may now with some degree of confidence affirm, that the agreement observable in the ancient and modern versions of the New Testament, especially in the more difficult passages, is owing, not to the justness of the translation, but to the translators having, one after another, followed the old Italic version, as it was corrupted by the Scriptures in the last language. This being the case, it cannot be thought strange, that the errors and obscurities of the Vulgate have entered more or less into all the ancient versions of the New Testament, and that from them they have crept into many of the modern versions likewise.

Sect. II. — Of the modern Versions of the New Testament; and particularly of the English Translations of the greatest note.

As the author does not pretend to be acquainted with all the vernacular translations of the Scriptures, used at present by the different nations of Europe, he will not take upon him to say how far they have copied the Vulgate. But this he may affirm, that most of the vernacular versions of the Scriptures made by the Roman Catholics since the reformation are translations of the Vulgate. And with respect to the Protestants, though Luther and Olivetan gave out that they made their versions from the Hebrew, they must be understood with some limitation, if F. Simon's opinion be true, namely, that neither the one nor the other understood Hebrew so as to be able to translate from the Scriptures in that language. But, however, as it will, this is known, that all the vernacular versions now used by the Lutherans are translations of Luther's German Bible, and that most of those used by the Calvinists are translations either from Olivetan's version, as corrected by Calvin, or from Beza's Latin New Testament; consequently, neither the Lutheran nor the Calvinist can pretend as exact as they should be. But without insisting on this, the author supposes the utility of a new English translation of the apostolic epistles will be sufficiently evinced, if it can be shown that the first English translators made their versions from the Vulgate, and that the subsequent translators, by copying them, have retained a number of the errors of that ancient version.

Wickliff's New Testament. — If we except the Saxon translation of the four gospels, mentioned p. 3, the most ancient English version of the New Testament now remaining is that which was made by John Wickliff, a fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Such a change had taken place in the language since the Norman conquest, that the language of the Vulgate, the only vernacular version of the Scriptures then extant, was in Wickliff's time become unintelligible to the common people, who neither understood a number of the words, nor the spelling, nor even the letters in which it was written. This excellent person, therefore, with a view to expose the errors of popery, and to spread the knowledge of religion among his countrymen, employed himself in making a translation of the New Testament into the English language, as it was then spoken, and finished it about the year 1367. But because, by translating the Scriptures, Wickliff put it in the power of every one to read the word of Rome with the doctrines of Christ, his translation was universally condemned as heretical by the Romish clergy; and a bill was brought into the House of Lords, anno 1390, for suppressing it. But the Duke of Lancaster, a favourer of Wickliff, and uncle to King Richard II., opposing the bill, it was thrown out. After Wickliff's death, by a constitution of the convocation at Oxford, the reading of his translation was prohibited, and some, for using it, suffered death.

Wickliff did not make his translation of the New Testament from the Greek, which it is thought he did not understand, but from the Latin Bible then read in the churches, which he rendered verbatim, without regarding the idiom of the language. A translation of the New Testament made in that manner, from such an incorrect copy as the Latin Bible then was, could not miss to be both erroneous and obscure. Nevertheless, being anxiously sought after, and much read by persons of all ranks, it was of great use in opening the eyes of the nation to the errors of popery; and the rather, that the passages of the New Testament, translated by Wickliff, were a translation of Jerome's prologues, with some additions of his own, tending to expose the Romish superstitions. Afterwards, the faults of Wickliff's translation being discovered, some of his followers, as Lewis informs us, (p. 293) revised it; or rather made "another translation, not so strictly literal as his, and more according to the sense." By this revised translation, the MS. copies are supported, though some of them are still preserved in the public libraries. In the advocates' library at Edinburg, there is a beautiful MS. of Wickliff's translation, on velum. But whether it is of the first, or of the revised translation, the author does not know.

Tynald's Translation. — The next English translation of the New Testament which merits attention was made in the reign of Henry VIII. by William Tynald, a Welchman, educated in Magdalen-hall, Oxford, where he read lectures in divinity. But after a while, becoming sensible of the errors of popery, to show their opposition to the word of God, he formed the design of translating the New Testament into English, and of publishing it from the press; a measure at that time unprecedented in our language. Of this, Wickliff's translation were become in a great measure obsolete. While Tynald was executing his pious intention, he fell under the suspicion of heresy, and was obliged to flee to Antwerp, where, with the assistance of one John Frith, he finished his translation of the New Testament, and published it either at Antwerp or Hamburg in the year 1556. — When the copies of Tynald's translation were imported into England, and dispersed, the Romish clergy were exceedingly provoked. Some of them said it was impossible to translate the Scriptures into English; others, that it was not lawful for the people to have them in their mother tongues; others, that it would make them all heretics. They were displeased, likewise, because Tynald, like Wickliff, had introduced the scriptural language (see p. 8.), whose meaning they wished to hide from the people; because, having appropriated these words to themselves, as long as they were not understood, the clergy were at liberty to affix to them any sense they pleased, for aggrandizing their own order. Wherefore when they found that Tynald, in his translation, had put the word repentance, for price, for price, for charity, for penance, &c. they were enraged, that, by various constitutions, they condemned the wheels of his translation as heantical, forbids the people to read it; made strict search after the copies of it, and all that they found they burnt publicly. But the more Tyndale's translation was condemned, the more it was sought after and read; insomuch that the Dutch booksellers printed four editions of it before Tyndale thought fit to reprint it. Concerning these Dutch editions, it is to be observed, that as the editors did not understand the English language themselves, and had no person skilled in it to correct their presses, three of their editions are extremely erroneous.

While the foreign booksellers were making gain of Tyndale's labours, he was employed in translating the five books of Moses into English, with an intention to publish them likewise. In this part of his work he was assisted by Mylles Coverdale, a native of Yorkshire, and one of the Austin friars in Cambridge, who, being suspected of heresy, had fled to the continent. Having finished his translation, Tyndale printed it at Malburno (Marburg), in the land of Hesse, in the year 1530. To each of the books of Moses he prefixed a prologue, and on the margin placed notes, and added ten wooden cuts, representing the contents of the books.

About this time, likewise, he translated the prophecy of Jonah, and some other books of Scripture.

In the year 1534, the Dutch booksellers having resolved to print a fourth edition of Tyndale's New Testament, they hired one George Joyce (a Bedfordshire man, bred in Peterhouse, Cambridge), to correct the press. But, as appears in his prologue, "he not only corrected the errors of the press; but when he came to some dark sentences, having the Latin text by him, he made them plainer, and gave many words their native signification, which they had not before." This edition was printed at Antwerp in August 1534.

In November 1534 the papal dominion was abolished in England, and the king's supremacy established by act of parliament; so that it was now ceased for the propagation of religion, to the unspeakable advantage of the English nation.

This year, Tyndale published his New Testament a second time, because, in his former edition, as he acknowledges in the preface, "there were many faults, which the printer, not having been, had occasioned." The title of this edition is, "The New Testament, diligently corrected, and printed in the year of our Lord 1534, in November." And at the end, "Printed at Antwerp by Marten Empour." But the Dutch booksellers had made such haste, that, as was just now mentioned, their edition was published in August, three months before Tyndale's.

It hath been commonly said, that Tyndale made his translation of the New Testament from the Greek; but no such thing is said in the titles of any of the editions published by himself, or by Joyce. In the library of St. Paul's church, London, there is an edition with this title: "The New Testament, diligently corrected and compared with the Greek, by William Tyndale, and finished in the year of our Lord 1534, in the moneth of November." But this edition was not published by Tyndale; for in a later edition, mentioned by Lewis, which was printed in 1538, the title is, "The Newes Testament, yet once synce corrected by William Tyndale." This, with other circumstances to be mentioned afterwards, shows, that Tyndale's translation was made from the Vulgate Latin, as most of the vernacular translations of the New Testament, made in that age, undoubtedly were.

Before Tyndale finished the printing of his second edition, in 1534, he was imprisoned in the castle of Antwerp, where he remained till he was strangled and burnt as a heretic, in the year 1536. Hall tells us, that after the publication of the first edition of his New Testament, Tyndale prosecuted his design of translating the Old Testament with such diligence, that before he was put to death he had finished his translation, not only of the Pentateuch, and of Jonah, but of all the other books to Nehemiah. These translations, according to Johnson, he made not from the Hebrew, but from the Vulgate Latin; or, as the pious writers affirm, from Luther's German translation.

Tyndale's translation of the books of the Old Testament to Nehemiah, together with his translation of Jonah, and of the books of the New Testament, make what is called Tyndale's Bible.

COVERDALE'S BIBLE.—While Tyndale was in prison, the whole Bible, translated into English, was finished at the press, in the year 1535, with a dedication to Henry VIII., subscribed by Mylles Coverdale. In this dedication Coverdale speaks with great bitterness against the bishop of Rome, and his usurpations, and tells the king, that "he took upon him to set forth this special translation, not as a checker, reprobator, or despiser of other men's translations, but lowly and faithfully following his interpreters, and that under correction. Of these," he said, "he made use of five different ones, who had rendered the Scriptures, not only into Latin, but also into Dutch." Here it is to be observed, that Coverdale does not pretend that he made his translation from the originals; he only states, that he followed his interpreters. The title of this edition is, "The New Testament, diligently corrected, and published in the year 1536, in November." And by calling its "a special translation," he wished to have it considered as different from Tyndale's. Yet it is well known, that he adopted Tyndale's translations, both of the Old Testament and of the New, with some small alterations. Only he omitted Tyndale's prologues and notes, because they had given offense to the Papists. That Coverdale adopted Tyndale's translations, appears likewise from his saying in his preface, that "Tyndale's helpers and companions would finish what Tyndale had left unfinished, and publish it in a better manner than himself had now done;" referring to the books of the Old Testament, and of the Apocrypha, which Tyndale had not translated, but which Coverdale had now published. These, therefore, are not only translations in this Bible which are properly Coverdale's own; and, joined with Tyndale's translations, are what hath been commonly called Coverdale's Bible, or rather Tyndal and Coverdale's translation. Soon after the publication of this Bible, Cromwell, as vicar-general to the king in matters ecclesiastical, ordered a copy of it to be laid in the quire of each church, that every one who pleased might read it.

MATTHEW'S BIBLE.—In the year 1537, Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch, printers, published a second edition of Coverdale's Bible, with Tyndale's prologues and notes. Because this Bible was printed with German types, and was superintended by John Rogers, pastor of a church at Marbeck in the duchy of Wittenberg, Lewis thinks it was printed at Marbeck.—Rogers was educated at Cambridge, where, in 1525, he took the degree of bachelor of arts; then removing to Oxford, he was made a junior canon of Cardinal's college; after that, taking orders, he was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, where, meeting with Tyndal, he was by him made sensible of the errors of popery. From Antwerp he went to Marbeck, and became pastor of a congregation there.

Before this edition of Coverdale's Bible was finished, Tyndal was burst as an heretic. Wherefore Rogers fearing that the prefixing of Tyndal's name to it might occasion its being ill received by the common people, he published it under the signified name of Thomas Matthew, and dedicated it to Henry VIII. Bishop Bale says, Rogers translated the Bible from the beginning to the end, having recourse to the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, English, and German copies. But Lewis says this is evidently a mistake. For the Bible called Matthew's is not a new translation, but, as Wanley observes, to the end of Chronicles it is Tyndal's, and from that to the end of the Apocalypse, it is Coverdale's. He ought to have excepted Jonah, which is of Tyndal's translation, having his prologue prefixed in the beginning of the New Testament, and of the Psalms, and some of the Proverbs, as are the prologues and notes.

Farther, that the translation which goes under the name of Matthew's was not made from the originals, is evident from the title, which runs thus: "The Bible, which is the Holy Scripture, in which are contained the Old and New Testaments, true and purely translated into English: By Thomas Matthew." This, which is commonly called Matthew's Bible, was begun and finished under the patronage of archbishop Cranmer; for it was presented by Grafton to him, and to the lord Cromwell; and Cromwell, at the archbishop's request, presented it to the king, who permitted it to be bought and used by all persons without distinction.—Rogers returned to England in 1537, and is said to have been the first to translate the New Testament, and of the Psalms, and some of the Proverbs, as are the prologues and notes.

But when Mary came to the throne, he was apprehended and condemned under the name of Rogers, alias Matthew, for having published this translation of the Bible under the name of Matthew. He was the first martyr in that reign.

HOLYBUSH'S NEW TESTAMENT.—It seems the Papists sought to distinguish English translations of the Scriptures before mentioned, affirmed that they were contrary to the Latin Bible, which was then used in the churches, and which, as the Rhenish translators afterwards expressed it, was considered as truer than the original itself, by which they meant the copies of the Greek Testament then used. For in the year 1538, Coverdale, to shew the correctness of the New Testament, not different from the common Latin Bible, allowed one Johan Holybush to print, in a column opposite to the Vulgate Latin, the English translation of the New Testament, which Coverdale had formerly set forth in his Bible. This Holybush published while Coverdale was abroad, with the following title: "The New Testament, both in Latin and English, ece corresponding to the other, after the Vulgate text, commonly called St. Jerome's, faithfully translated by Johan Holybush, anno 1538."

GREAT BIBLE.—In the year 1539, Grafton and Whytchurch published a new edition of the English Bible, with the following title: "The Bible in English, that is to say, the content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Old and New Testament, truly translated after the verity of the Hebrew and Greek texts; by the dylygent studye of diverse excellent learned men, expert in the fowre tonges." This is the first time any English translation of the Bible was set forth as made after the verity of the originals. (See page 6, noting readings in which the divers excellent learned men were, by whose diligent study this translation was made, is not known. Johnson says it was corrected by Coverdale. And from the splendid manner in which it was printed, Lewis conjectures that it was intended to be used in the churches, and was patronized by Cranmer, who might appoint some learned men to assist Coverdale in correcting it. But however these excellent learned men were, it is certain that this is no new translation from the originals, but, as Lewis observes, a revised only of Matthew's, that is, Rogers' edition, with some small alterations. However, to make it appear different, Matthew's name was omitted, as were Tyndal's prologues and notes, because they had been blamed as unorthodox and unscriptural. The additions to the Hebrew and Greek originals in the Vulgate text are translated, and inserted in a smaller letter than the text, particularly the three verses in Psalm xiv. which were omitted by Coverdale and Matthew; likewise the famous text, I John, ch. v. 7. which Tyndal, in his New Testament, (published in 1534), had printed in small square letters, to shew that it was a common Greek copy. Next, where the editors found various readings in the text, they prefixed a cross to the word. In the third place, to supply, in some measure, the want of the notes, they placed on the margin, hands pointing to the texts which were supposed to condemn the errors of popery, that the reader might attend to them. This Bible was printing prior to the publication of the Roman missal. It was, in common, and in a large folio, with a fine emblematical frontispiece, said to be designed by Hans Heibden, and beautifully cut in wood, it was called The Great Bible. When the liturgy was first compiled, in the reign of Edward VI., the epistles, gospels, and psalms put into it, were all according to this translation; and so they continued till the restoration of Charles II., when the epistles, though in some places he used the honest and just liberty of a commentary, it was useful for the sake of a good copy; yet, because he was loth to swerve from the text (the Vulgate Latini), he so tempered his pen, that, if the reader wavered, he might not fall in the construction of the English. He set the text on the other side." In 1539 Coverdale set forth a second edition of this New Testament, with a dedication to the lord Cromwell, in which, speaking of his indecision to publish the text (in Latin) as well, he says: "Thus much as the New Testament which he had set forth in English before (namely, in his Bible), did so argue with the Latine, was barely well content that the Latine and it shoude be set together, namely, by Holybush, proved shalve, that the corrector shal folowe the true copye of the Latyn in any wyse, and kepe the true and right English of the same; and so doing, he was content to set his name to it; and so he did, trusting that, though he was out of the land, all shalbe well. But when he had perceived this copy, he found, that, as it was disagreeable to his former translation in English (Tyndal's translation, which he had copied in his Bible), so was not the true copye of the Latin text observed, neither the English so correspondent to the same as it ought to be; therefore he had endeavored, as far as the facts that were in the Latyne and English, &c. From these quotations it is evident, that the translation of the New Testament which Coverdale allowed Holybush to make, not only in Latin, was the one which he had published in his Bible; consequently it was Tyndal's translation. It is evident also, that the translation was made from the Vulgate, and so in literal a manner, that the reader might make plain construction of the Latin by the English. It is true, as Coverdale in some places represents it, but it was only as a grammarian; and in these corrections he was not so careful as to have obtained satisfactory adjustments from his text. Wherefore, Coverdale having assisted Tyndal in making his English text, he added one or more of the same method; that is, both of them translated the New Testament, as far as they could, from the Vulgate, as grammarians, making use of other translations for that purpose: so, for the Old Testament, the Septuagint, the German version, and Munster's Latin translation; and for the New Testament, Wiclif's and Itsinam's versions; and what others they could find.
and gospels were inserted from king James's Bible; but the psalms of the Great Bible were allowed to remain.

Cromwell's Bible.—In 1540 another edition of the English Bible was printed in folio, with this title: "The Bible in English; that is to say, the content of all the Holy scripture, both of the Old and New Testament, with a prologue thereunto made by the Reverend Father in God, Thomas Archbyshop of Canterbury." On account of this prologue, and because Cranmer amended the translation in this edition, in some places, with his own pen, it had been called Cranmer's Bible, though it is little different from the Great Bible. In this, as in the Great Bible, the verses of the psalms, proverbs, &c. which are not in the Hebrew, but which are translated from the Vulgate, are printed in smaller letters, and the order of the psalms is different from that of the Vulgate, being according to the Hebrew.

By Cranmer's influence with the king, a proclamation was issued in May 1540, ordering this Bible to be bought, and placed in the churches. But the popish party making great complaints of the English translations in general as heretical, an act of parliament passed in January 1542, prohibiting the reading of Tyndal and Coverdale's translation in any church or open assembly within the kingdom. However, the king being resolved to have an English translation of the New Testament, which should be true to the original, and approved by the bishops and clergy, in the king's name, to revise the translation of the New Testament. Accordingly, each bishop had his part assigned to him. But Stokely, bishop of London, refusing to execute his part, the design miscarried.

Of Tyndal and Coverdale's translation of the Bible, and what repairs Cranmer made, the complaints were made, even by the Protestants. B. Sandys wrote to Abp. Parker, that "the setters forth of this our common translation followed Munster too much." And of the New Testament in the Great Bible, Laurence, a noted Greek scholar in that age, observed, that there are words which it hath not aptly translated; words and pieces of sentences in the original which it hath omitted; words set in the original which it hath superfluously added; may, he changed this translation even with errors in doctrine. The encouragers also of the Geneva edition represented this Bible as ill translated, and falsely printed, and gave it the invidious name of a corrupted Bible.

Henry VIII., dying in January 1546, was succeeded by his son Edward VI., whose first parliament the above mentioned statute was reversed. The gospels and epistles were now, for the first time, appointed to be read in English in the public service.

In 1550 an edition of the New Testament was published with this title, "The New Testament diligently translated by Myles Coverdale, and conferred with the translation of William Tyndal." Coverdale's translation here mentioned seems to have been that which he published in the second edition of Holiehase's New Testament.

Geneva Bible.—Edward VI. dying in July 1553, was succeeded by Mary, who immediately restored the popish service and sacraments, and persecuted the sufferers of the reformation with such cruelty, that many of them fled into foreign countries; among whom was Coverdale, who, in Edward's reign, had returned to England, and had been made bishop of Exeter. He, with some others, fixed their residence at Geneva, where they employed themselves in making a translation of the Bible. They began with the New Testament, which they published in 1540, printed with a small but beautiful letter, in 1557. This is the first printed edition of the New Testament, in which the verses of the chapters are distinguished by numeral figures and breaks.

Stukeley, in his Annales of the Reformation, tells us, that the Geneva brethren, after publishing their New Testament, proceeded to revise the Old. But not having finished it when Elizabeth came to the throne, some of them stayed behind the rest to complete their design. And having finished the Old Testament, they published the whole Bible at Geneva in 4to, in the year 1560, printed by Rowland Hall. This is what is commonly called the Geneva Bible; concerning which F. Simon affirms, that it is only a translation of a French version, made at Geneva some time before. But he said this perhaps to disparage the work. In this translation cuts are inserted, representing the garden of Eden, Noah's ark, &c. They likewise added a variety of notes, with two tables; the one containing an interpretation of the names, and the other an account of the principal matters in the Scripture. There is also an appendix of religious duties, which they charge the English reformation with retaining the remains of popery, and exhort her to strike off certain ceremonies. But this epistle giving offence, it was omitted in the subsequent editions. —The Geneva Bible was so universally used in private families, that there were above thirty editions of it in folio, 4to, and 8vo., printed from the year 1560 to 1597. This edition of this being all zealous Calvinists, their translation and notes are calculated to support the doctrine and discipline of that party. For which reason it was better esteemed at its first appearance than it had been in later times.

The Bishops' Bible.—Queen Mary dying in November 1558, was succeeded by Elizabeth, who, treading in the steps of her brother Edward VI., suppressed the Romanish superstition in all her dominions, and filled the sees with Protestants. After this, Abp. Matthew Parker having represented to the queen that many churches either were without Bibles, or had incorrect copies, she resolved that a revision and correction of the former translation should be made, in order that the bishop thereupon appointed some of the most learned of the bishops and others to revise the Bible commonly used, and to compare it with the originals; and to each of them he assigned a particular book of Scripture, with directions not to vary from the former translation, except where it was not agreeable to the original, and to add marginal notes for explaining the difficult text; reserving to himself the oversight of the whole. A revision of the English Bible, on the same plan, had been proposed by Cranmer, (see above); but the design did not take effect. Parker was more successful in his attempt. The persons employed by him performed their tasks with such cheerfulness, that the whole was ready for the press some time before the year 1568; for in that year the Bible of the bishops' revision was printed in a very elegant manner, with a beautiful English letter, on a royal paper, in a large folio, by Richard Jugge, the queen's printer. In this edition, which contains the Apocrypha, the chapters are divided into verses, as in our Bibles; and the several additions from the Vulgate Latin, which in the Great Bible were printed in small characters except 1 John v. 7, which is printed in the same character with the rest of the text. To this edition Parker added some good notes, different from those of Tyndal.
and Coverdale, and two prefaces. In the one to the Old Testament he exhorted the people to study the Scriptures, which, after St. Jerome, he termed The Scriptures of the People. In the preface to the New Testament, he advised the reader not to be offended with the diversity of translation. After the preface to the Old Testament Cranmer's prologue is inserted, and before the psalms there is a prologue of St. Basil. On the margin, besides the notes, there are references, and the whole is embellished with cuts and maps. This Bible, on account of the pains which the bishops took in perfecting it, was called The Bishops' Bible, and was authorized to be read in the churches. Yet it was found fault with by some, on pretence that it was not as exact as it should be; because in the Old Testament it does not always follow the Hebrew, but in some places is on purpose accommodated to the LXX., and is disfigured with divers errors. But Lewis says, the Bishops' Bible "hath fared somewhat the worse through the intertemporal zeal of the sticklers for the Geneva translation." In 1563 the Bishops' Bible was reprinted in folio, in the same splendid manner as in 1568, under the same printer and title-page. The first English Bible read in the churches, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the original would permit.—The third was; the old ecclesiastical words to be kept; as the word church not to be translated congregation, &c.—The fifth; the division of the chapters to be altered, either not at all or as lines might. The sixth; no marginal notes to be affixed, but only for explaining the Hebrew and Greek words which could not be expressed in the text without some circumlocution.—The eighth; every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters; and having amended or translated them severally by himself, where he thought good, all were to meet together to examine into what was done, and to agree on what they thought should stand.—The ninth; when any one company had finished any book in the manner prescribed, to send it to the other companies to be considered by them.—The fourteenth; the translations of Tyndale, Coverdale, Matthew, Whitechurch, (the Great Bible), and Geneva, to be used where they agree better with the original than the Bishops' Bible. This, therefore, was not to be a new translation, but a correction only or amendment of the Bishops' Bible.—The translators entered on their work in spring 1607.

Selden, in his table-talk, says, "The king's translators took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given them in the proper orders, to the slaving of their consciences; (see p. 4.) To their translation the Rhemists added notes, from what they called catholic tradition, from the expositions of the fathers, and from the decrees of popes and councils, for the support of the Rhemish errors. This is what goes by the name of the Rhemish New Testament.—In the year 1589, Dr. Fulke, master of Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, reprinted this translation, together with that of the Bishops' Bible, in two columns; and in his notes confuted all in "arguments, glosses, annotations, manifest impieties, and slanders against the translations used in the church of England;" and dedicated the whole to Queen Elizabeth.

Doway Bible.—About twenty-seven years after the publication of the Rhemish New Testament, an English translation of the Old Testament, from the authentical Latin, came forth from the English college of Doway, in two vols. 4to; the first in the year 1609, the second in 1610, both printed at Doway by Laurence Keliam. But this translation is of the same complication with the Rhemish New Testament, having been made many years before in the college of Rome, by the very same persons who translated the New Testament; for it was only revised and published by their brethren of the college of Doway.

King James' Bible.—Queen Elizabeth dying in March 1603, was succeeded by James VI. King of Scotland, who, soon after his arrival at London, received a petition from the puritan ministers, desiring a reformation of certain ceremonies and abuses in the church. In consequence of this petition, the king appointed several bishops and deans, together with the principal petitioners, to meet him at Hampton-court, January, 15, 1603, to confer with him on these abuses. On the second day of the conference, the puritans proposed that a new translation of the Bible should be made; and no one opposing the proposition, the king, in the following year, 1604, appointed 54, or according to others, 47 persons, learned in the languages, for revising the common translation. These he divided into six companies, and to the several companies he allotted certain books of Scripture, to be translated or amended by each individual of the company separately. And that they might execute their work in the best manner, he prescribed to them certain rules with which they were to comply. The first of these rules was, that the English Bible read in the churches, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the original would permit.—The third was; the old ecclesiastical words to be kept; as the word church not to be translated congregation, &c.—The fifth; the division of the chapters to be altered, either not at all or as lines might. The sixth; no marginal notes to be affixed, but only for explaining the Hebrew and Greek words which could not be expressed in the text without some circumlocution.—The eighth; every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters; and having amended or translated them severally by himself, where he thought good, all were to meet together to examine into what was done, and to agree on what they thought should stand.—The ninth; when any one company had finished any book in the manner prescribed, to send it to the other companies to be considered by them.—The fourteenth; the translations of Tyndale, Coverdale, Matthew, Whitechurch, (the Great Bible), and Geneva, to be used where they agree better with the original than the Bishops' Bible. This, therefore, was not to be a new translation, but a correction only or amendment of the Bishops' Bible.—The translators entered on their work in spring 1607.

Selden, in his table-talk, says, "The king's translators took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given them in the proper orders, to the slaving of their consciences; (see p. 4.) To their translation the Rhemists added notes, from what they called catholic tradition, from the expositions of the fathers, and from the decrees of popes and councils, for the support of the Rhemish errors. This is what goes by the name of the Rhemish New Testament.—In the year 1589, Dr. Fulke, master of Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, reprinted this translation, together with that of the Bishops' Bible, in two columns; and in his notes confuted all in "arguments, glosses, annotations, manifest impieties, and slanders against the translations used in the church of England;" and dedicated the whole to Queen Elizabeth.

Doway Bible.—About twenty-seven years after the publication of the Rhemish New Testament, an English translation of the Old Testament, from the authentical Latin, came forth from the English college of Doway, in two vols. 4to; the first in the year 1609, the second in 1610, both printed at Doway by Laurence Keliam. favoured his notions of predestination, election, witchcraft, familiar spirits, &c. But these, it is probable, were their own opinions as well as the king’s.—6. That their translation is more correct in the phraseology, than in the language of the Vulgate, is owing to no restraint, but that the language of the Vulgate being the only language of the Vulgate, which they understood, and of the Vulgate being the only text which they adopted, was more correct in the phraseology than in the language of the Vulgate. —7. That notwithstanding all the pains taken in correcting this and the former editions of the English Bible, there still remain many passages mistranslated, either through negligence or want of knowledge; and that to other passages improper additions are made, which pervert the sense; as Matt. xx. 23, where, by adding the words it shall be given, it is insinuated, that some other person than the Son will distribute rewards at the day of judgment.

Such are the objections which have been made to the king’s translation by the protestants. They are mentioned here as historical facts. How far they are just lies with the reader to consider. The objections made by the protestants were the same with those which were made to the former translations; and particularly, that several texts are mistranslated, which is a matter of deep concern to the doctines and message of the church of Rome.

If the reader desires more full information concerning the English translations of the Bible, he may consult Anthony Johnson’s historical account, published at London in 1730; also John Lewis’s complete history of the several translations of the Bible in English, 2d edit. published at London in 1730. From which treatises, more of the facts relating to the English translations of the Bible mentioned in this section are taken.

Since the commencement of the present century, several English translations of the gospels and epistles have been published by private hands. But they are all different in the sense from the king’s translation; or, if they differ, it is occasioned by their giving the sense of a few passages, not in a different translation, but in paraphrases which do not truly express the meaning of the original. And even when the meaning is truly expressed, it cannot be said that the translation is improved by these paraphrases, at least in some instances, where the sense could have been represented with equal strength and perspicuity in the literal version.

From the foregoing account of the English translations of the Bible, it appears, that they are not different translations, but different editions of Tyndal and Coverdale’s translation. It appears likewise, that Tyndal and Coverdale’s translation, of which the rest are copies, was not made from the originals, but from the Vulgate Latin. For as they did not say in the title page that their translation was made from the originals, and as Coverdale, in particular, declared in his preface to Holyoke’s New Testament, that he swear ed as little as possible from his Latin text, it is reasonable to think that Tyndal and he made their translation from that text. Besides, it did not suit their purpose to translate from the originals. The Vulgate Latin text being the only word of God that was then known to the people, and even to many of the clergy, these translators knew, that the nearer their version approached to the Latin Bible, they would be the less offensive; a consideration which Coverdale acknowledges, in his prefaces, had great weight with him.

As Tyndal and Coverdale made their translation from the Vulgate, they would have voided adopting a number of its errors. Some that were palpable they corrected, especially when the sense of the passage suggested the correction. But in translating the more difficult texts which they did not understand, they implicitly followed the Vulgate, as Luther, Breeenius, and others had done before them. It is true, their translation was often corrected in the editions of the English Bible, which were published from time to time. But the corrections were made chiefly to the phraseology, and not to the language of the Vulgate, because it made it necessary, in every revision of the translation, to substitute modern words and phrases in place of those which were becoming obsolete. But few alterations were made in the sense, except in the passages which had a relation to the popish controversy, which, on that account, were considered with more care. Wherefore, each new edition being but little different from the preceding one, none of them were esteemed new translations, as is plain from the public acts prohibiting the use of the English Bibles. For, in these acts, they are all called Tyndal and Coverdale’s Translation.

To conclude—If Tyndal and Coverdale’s translation was made from the Vulgate Latin, and if the subsequent English translations were but different editions of their version, and if the corrections made from time to time in the different editions, respected the language more than the sense, is it to be thought strange, that many of the errors of that translation, especially those copied from the Vulgate, have been continued ever since, in all the editions of the English Bible? Even those which is called Tyndal’s version, in general, much better than the rest, being radically the same, is not a little faulty, as it was not thoroughly and impartially corrected by the revisers. It is, therefore, by no means such a just representation of the inspired originals as merits to be implicitly relied on for determining the controverted articles of the Christian faith, and for quieting the dissensions which have rent the church.

Sect. III.—Of the Principles on which the Translation now offered to the Public is formed.

The history of the ancient and modern versions of the Scriptures, given in the preceding sections, must have convinced every unprejudiced reader, that a translation of the sacred writings, more agreeable to the original, and more intelligible and unambiguous than any hitherto extant, is much wanted. In this persuasion, the author formed the design of translating the apostolical epistles, although he was sensible the attempt would be attended with great difficulties, and be liable to many objections. But objections were made to Jerome’s corrections of the Vulgate version of the New Testament, that it was much more enlightened, when the correction of the Bishops’ Bible was proposed, there were some who did not approve of the design, fearing bad consequences would follow the alteration of a book rendered sacred in the eyes of the people by long use. On both occasions, however, these objections were justly disregarded, for the sake of the advantages expected from a translation of the inspired writings more consonant to the original. Wherefore, that the reader may be enabled to conjecture, whether, in the following version of the apostolical epistles, the alterations that are made in the translation be of sufficient importance to justify the author in publishing it, he will now explain the principles on which it is formed, in such a manner as to give a general idea of the number and nature of these alterations. At the same time, to remove such prejudices as may remain in the minds of the serious against altering the common translation, he will mention a few of the many advantages which will be derived from a new translation of the Scriptures, skilfully and faithfully executed.

Sensible that the former translators have been misled by neglecting those who have appeared before them, he endeavors to correct the errors which that method leads to, hath made his translation from the original itself. And that it might be a true image of the original, he hath, in making it, observed the following rules:—1. He hath translated.
the Greek text as literally as the genius of the two languages would permit. And because the sense of particular passages sometimes depends on the order of the words in the original, this, with other, hath placed English words and clauses, where it could be done to advantage, in the order which the corresponding words and clauses hold in the original. By thus strictly adhering to the Greek text, what could be done consistently with perspicuity, the emphasis of the sacred phraseology is preserved, and the meaning of the inspired penman is better represented, than it can be in a free translation, (11 note.) To these advantages add, that, in this literal method, the difficult passages being exhibited in their genuine form, the unlearned have thereby an opportunity of exercising their own ingenuity in finding out their meaning; whereas, in a free translation, the words of the inspired writer being concealed, no subject of examination is presented to the unlearned. But the original, it was of one, not as words and clauses, but as words and phrases, which, literally translated, stand thus: γένοιτο γὰρ ᾧ ἀπέκρυπτες · τοῦτο τὸ ἔργον τοῦ κυρίου, γένοιτο γὰρ πάντως. But he who made them at the beginning made a man and a female. According to this translation, our Lord's reasoning is clear and conclusive. At the beginning created God only one male and one female of the living; species, to show, that adultery and polygamy are contrary to his intention in the creation, Matt. xx. 33. So the going away, made the sepulchre sure with the word under the stone.—Rom. iv. 2. Kατὰ παράδειγμα ἀνθρώπων τοῦ θεοῦ, αὐτὸς δὲ οὐκ ἔλεγεν τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐὰν κτίσεως τοῦ θεοῦ, but the construction will stand thus: τοῦτο τὸ ἔργον τοῦ κυρίου, γένοιτο γὰρ πάντως, as Conybeare and Howley. On the first day of every week, let each of you lay somewhat by itself, according as he may prosper, putting it into the treasury, that when I come there may be no collections.—Heb. xii. 8. So that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear. For the things that are seen are made up of things that are not made, capable of being seen, Rom. vii. 5. That the things which are not seen are things which are not made of things do appear! That is, were made of nothing. See more examples, p. 4.

1 Modern critics contend, that in a translation of the Scriptures the Hebrews should not be rendered literally, but that words and phrases, expressive of their meaning, should be substituted in their places. This, it must be acknowledged, is a proper method of translating such Hebrews as are not understood by the vulgar, if the learned are agreed as to their signification. For example, because it is probable that the expression βασιλεύς ὁ λόγος is not expressive of a king, but of Christ: 'The word is the light; and with the reins and the heart,' signifies, 'I am he who searcheth the inward thoughts and dispositions,' the passage may properly be so translated. But when the meaning of an Hebrew is disputed, and its literal sense is made the foundation of a controverted doctrine, such words should be translated in the original, if they can be literally translated in an intelligible and perspicuous manner. But it would be an attempt at rendering the Hebrew, by fair reasoning from the context, and from other passages relative to the same subject; because, in this method, its meaning will at length be successfully established.

2 As the Greek language admits an artificial order of the words of a sentence, or period, which the English language does not allow, in translating many passages of the apostolical epistles it is necessary to place the words in a different order, and give the construction, in which they stand in the original. This method the author hath followed in his translations where it was necessary, and thereby hath obtained a better sense of many passages than that given in our English version, where the translators have followed the order of the Greek words, or have construed them improperly.

2 Concerning the manner of printing the words that are supplied to complete the sentences, the reader is desired to take notice, that the words supplied by our translators are in this printed in Roman capitals, to show that they belong to the version in common use. But if the words supplied belong to the new translation, they are printed in italics. Further, it is to be observed, that in all the principal classical and other versions, the words different from the common English version are printed in Italics characters, that the reader may at once see in what particulars the two translations agree, and in what they differ.

3 Of the author's method of supplying the elliptical sentences in St. Paul's epistles, the following are a few examples, by which the reader may judge of the rest. Rom. ii. 27. By supplying the words though a Jew from the beginning of ver. 27. the translation will run thus: 'who being a Jew, though a Jew by the law, was made to Abraham and to his seed.' Rom. v. 18. By supplying the word righteousness from the end of the verse, the translation will run thus: 'I am not a sinner, but a sinner, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God who delivereth me, through our Lord Jesus Christ our Lord. James ii. 13. Judge not, until you have been condemned with Christ.' The word mercy will supply over judgment. This latter clause is evidently inapplicable, and should not be supplied. But the whole verse will supply over judgment, to him who showed mercy. In completing inapposite sentences, the same rule is equally applied to translate. See examples, Rom. v. 19. 2 Pet. iii. 4-6.
GENERAL PREFACE.

ing them in their ordinary Bible. Further, though he had often desired from the beaten road, the diversity of his translation will not be offensive, because, throughout the whole, he has endeavored to preserve that beautiful simplicity of style for which the Scriptures are so justly admired, together with those allusions to ancient manner and historical facts, implied in the phraseology by which the age and nation of the authors of these writings are expressed. In this way, and by preserving these meanings, the author had endeavored to make his translation as exact an image of the original as he could; not only because, in that method, it acquires the authority which a translation of writings divinely inspired ought to have, but because, by a faithful exhibition of the Scriptures in their original dress, there arises such a strong internal proof of their antiquity and authenticity, as far overbalances any inconveniences resulting from a few pleonasms, uncouth expressions, and grammatical anomalies, all common in ancient writings, and retained in this translation of the apostolical epistles, for the purpose of shewing the Scriptures in their unadorned simplicity. Yet many modern translators, disregarding that advantage which these passages in particular afford, have departed from the words and phrases of the original, in such a manner as to convert their translations of particular passages into paraphrases, which exhibit a meaning often different from that of the inspired writers; a fault, from which our translators of the Bible are not altogether free. It must be acknowledged, however, that there are some errors in this translation; but they have been written with a view that the words of the original may be literally translated; and therefore, to represent their true meaning, recourse must be had to the paraphrastic method. But these are the only passages, in books divinely inspired, which should be paraphrased in the translation.

Among the free translators of the Scripture, Sebastian Castalio, some time professor of the Greek language at Basel, is the most eminent. But whatever praise he may deserve for the general propriety and conciseness of his translation of the New Testament, and for the purity of his Latin, it is certain that, by aiming at a classical and polished style, he hath often lost sight of the original, and hath given what he imagined to be its meaning, in words not at all corresponding to the Greek text; so that his translation appears to be a new composition, not yet the original, consequently often erroneous. Wherefore, neither his nor Erasmus's, nor any other free translation of the Scriptures, can be relied on; because if a material word in the original is omitted in the translation, or if a word not in the original is added, without marking it as such, or if words not corresponding to the original are used, much more if a whole sentence, or even a part of a sentence is paraphrased, the meaning of the text very probably will be altered, if not entirely lost; consequently, the version, in these passages, can have no authority.

It is time now to inform the reader, that this translation of the apostolical epistles differs not a little from the former versions, because therein meanings are affixed to a number of Greek words and phrases diverse from those given to them in the same passages by other translators. Yet the translation of these passages is at all times literal on that account. Persons conversant in the language know, that many Greek words have more meanings than one, all of them equally literal, though not equally common; and that the skill of a translator is shown in his choosing from among these different literal significations, the one that best suits the scope of the passage where it is found. And if he chooses judiciously, his translation will be more truly literal than those in which the more ordinary significations of the Greek words have been adopted, if these significations do not accord so well with the writer's design. The truth of this remark will appear, especially in those passages of the new translation, where the Greek words and phrases have been variously used to them different from those given them in other versions, but which are acknowledged use elsewhere in Scripture. For, however much it hath been overlooked hitherto, it is certain that, in a version of St. Paul's epistles, the connexion and propriety of his reasonings will either appear, or be lost, according to the manner in which the particles, which connect the different parts of his discourse, are translated.

The author, therefore, to lay a firm foundation for his translation of the Scriptures, hath been at great pains, in Prolin. Eas. IV. to establish the uncommon significations which, in some passages, he hath affixed to the Greek words and phrases, by examples brought from both the Scriptures themselves, or from approved Greek writers. In the same essay he hath offered some grammatical remarks, by which the peculiarities of style observable in the writings of the Jews are illustrated. But what hath been one of the chief objects of his attention in that essay was, by examples taken from the Scriptures themselves, to explain the meaning and powers of the Greek particles, as used by the sacred writers. Some of these examples, at first sight, may perhaps appear incorrect, because the word, for the sake of which the example is produced, in that passage, be taken in its ordinary acceptation. Yet the other examples, in which it can have no meaning but that which the author hath given it, and which is acknowledged by by; Rom. ii. 12. ἁπατηταῖς; verum: Doctorum imperitiorum: A teacher of the unprofitable. This translation of the clause Erasmus gave, on the presence that no one teaches but. But he had forgotten that the Jews gave to the Gentiles that appellation, with the others mentioned by the apostle, to shew their contempt of them: and did not know, I suppose, that the apostle, by introducing these contumacious names in this passage, intended to paint the intolerable arrogance of the Jews in a lively manner. This example shows, that every translation of the Scriptures ought to be as literal as possible: because those who afterwards study them with care, may find proprieties in the original expressions, altogether overlooked by the free translator.

Of the influence which the right translation of the Greek particles hath to render the apostle's reasonings clear and convincing, I give an example. The reader is requested to mark the sense sometimes elsewhere. Now, if it is translated in the former sense, where it hath the latter, the scheme of the apostle's discourse will be reversed; because that will be a reference to the former sense. (Compare the common English version of Rom. iv. 3; 5. Heb. v. 12. 11. with the new translation of these passages.) In like manner, the other Greek particles having different significations, if in a translation of the epistles the same sense is not uniformly given to them, as it appears in the original, it will render the translation erroneous. Of this, Beza's, viii. 4. 'That the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled,' (iv.) in us. 'Who hath fulfilled (iv.) by us, who walk not according to the flesh.' Many other examples might be given but these may suffice.

...will be of great use in guarding the unlearned against errors, which have a tendency to perplex their minds, and make them careless of the duties of morality. (See Rom. vii. 12. to the end; and 2 Cor. iii. 5. new translation.)—4. A just translation of the Scriptures, by exhibiting the doctrines of the gospel in their genuine simplicity, will effectually show the futility of the cavils of infidels, which, for the most part, are founded on wrong and imperfect views of the sacred writings, by those who are unacquainted with the objects, which all who have the interests of Christianity at heart must wish to see attained; objects of far greater importance to the welfare of the world than those which engross the attention of a frivolous age.

The text of the Greek New Testament followed in this translation, is the one in common use; which, because it was settled according to the opinion of learned men in different countries, who compared a great number of MSS., and fixed on the readings which appeared to them best supported, the author hath not attempted to alter. Only because the oldest MSS. are written without any distinction of the words by intervening spaces, and of the sentences by commas and colons, and without the spurious and accidental pointings of the common edition in a few instances, in order to obtain a better and more perspicuous sense of the passages, than that which arises from the common pointing,—Farther, although by the care with which other MSS. and versions have been collated, since the text of the New Testament was settled, more various readings have been discovered; yet the editors of the Greek New Testament, which are more than 300 years later than Jerome's time, show, that they have not considered the sense of the passages by points not commonly used. It is evident, therefore, that the transcribers, who first attempted to correct and point the text of the New Testament, and that the transcriptions of the words by points were not commonly used. 1. Although the distinction of words in MSS. by spaces, and of sentences by points, was known in Cicero's time, it was not much used, except by the Roman lawyers in public instruments. (Cic. Ac. Or. 260.) For the pointings of the Greek, the editors of the New Testament, which are more than 300 years later than Jerome's time, show, that they have not considered the sense of the passages by points not commonly used. It is evident, therefore, that the transcribers, who first attempted to correct and point the text of the New Testament, and that the transcriptions of the words by points were not commonly used. On the revival of learning in Europe, some of the most eminent men of the age, employed themselves in collating all the manuscripts of the Greek New Testament which they could find, for the purpose of determining an accurate text of the whole of its contents. Among those who applied themselves to that important work, Cardinal Francis Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, and his three learned assistants, whom he had been of the precedent of the Bibles for that very purpose, were most eminent, and deserve to be first mentioned; because they set about the work early, though the fruit of their labors was not communicated to the public till a number of years after their edition was finished. The copy which they made their text was a MSS. sent to them from the Vatican library, by Pope Leo X., who, when in the city of Rome, during his pontificate, having amongst his manuscripts, several copies of the New Testament, the Revelation, which is wanting in the Vatican copy. This transcript they compared with a number of MSS., some of them furnished by themselves, and particularly a very ancient MSS. of the epistles, sent to Ximenes from Rhodes; and at the same time they marked the readings of all those MSS. which, in their copy, is printed; and the whole MS. which is printed, was written in the year 1514. But Ximenes did not dispose to publish it separately from the rest of the Bible.
Sect. III. GENERAL PREFACE.

stand on an equal, or perhaps on a better authority than those in the received text. But as they make no material alteration in the sense of the passages where they are found, to have adopted them would have been to change the received text for no purpose.—The rejected readings, which alter the sense of the passages, especially those treated by the king's MSS., and with the Complutensian Bible, he had admitted those readings only which were supported by the greatest number of the king's MSS., or those which seemed the best which agreed with the Complutensian Bible. —The MSS. which Stephen collated were 19 in number. Those he marked by red ink in the Vulgate version, and marked with large, with large letters, at Basel, in the year 1516. This was the first copy of the Vulgate which Stephen had collated, and it was apparent from the Mill tells us, that, exclusive of typographical errors, it contains about 500 wrong readings, and about 100 genuine ones.

In later years, Stephen continued to make use of this MS. recipe, and to add to it, and to use it in every page, as a key to the Vulgate, and as a forerunner of the Complutensian Bible. The text also is the same, except 67 readings of which Mill thinks four are dubious, and of the rest he supposes 50 to be probably correct, 20 from the Vulgate, partly from the Complutensian Bible, and partly from the Complutensian Bible.

In the year 1566, Stephen published his Greek Testament, printed in a large volume with great press. When he undertook this edition, he had 15 MS., which some time before he had copied with the Greek text twice, and the same now a third time. To the gospel he prefixed that account of the lives of the evangelists which Eusebius had inserted in his Latin translation, and to the Acts of the Apostles, some excerpts from Euthalos's prologues to the epistles, concerning St. Paul's preaching and martyrdom. He also inserted the contents of each epistle of the margin of the text. He also wrote the principal part of the preface and dedication prefixed to the MS., which Stephen had collated or examined. And on the margin he marked about 19 readings, taken from Aldus. These were assumed in this second edition of the text. The famous text, I John V. 17. concerning the testimony of the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, is inserted in it Greek Testament, in the Vulgate, or Jerome's translation, in the former copy which was a copy by the Britons, and that he inserted it that there might be no handle for calumniating and abusing the text.

In the year 1566, the Complutensian, or Ximenian Bible, was published in six volumes. Its model was the Vulgate and the Complutensian, and was printed by Michael Peake on the authority of the king. In the third and fourth sections of the manuscript, the more correct in the third is that of the Vulgate, or Jerome's translation, corrected by the best MSS. In the third column is the Hebrew text; and below are placed, in two columns, a Chaldaic translation, and a Latin version of that translation. —The New Testament is in one volume; the Greek text, according to the Septuagint, in one volume; the Vulgate, or Jerome's translation, in another.

The sixth and last volume contains a dictionary of the Hebrew and Greek words, and a table of the names of the books of the Old Testament, through the whole, of which it is needless to give an account.

After the publication of the Complutensian, or Ximenian Bible, in the year 1566, Stephen forthwith began a new edition of the Greek Testament; in forming which, he says, he made use of the Complutensian Bible. It had 16 more than the edition which Stephen had used before, but Mill affirms that this edition was the second is Eusene's own translation; and in the third is the Vulgate version. With respect to the Greek text of this edition, Eusene's edition is in various examples corrected by the Complutensian Bible. Accordingly, although the text is, in general, agreeable to that of his first edition, Eusene thought proper to depart from it in 108 instances; and of these, in 93 to substitute those of the Complutensian Bible.

In the year 1568, Simon Colinesius, a Parisian printer, published his Greek Testament, without any preface informing the reader in what manner he had formed his text. So that it is uncertain whether he followed the text of any of the former printed editions, or any particular MSS.; or whether he chose what he judged the best, and printed copies of that he found he had formed his text, and that it differs from all the former editions; and that most of them are authorized by no better manuscripts by which he had it more than from the Vulgate, or to make the text more clear, for the authority of one or two MSS. only, had sometimes departed from the common readings, notwithstanding which, had it not been supported than those he had adopted. Of this MS. gives many examples, and adds, that this New Testament abounds in various words which are not found in the Vulgate version unsupported, yet he found 150, which, in his opinion, exhibit the genuine Greek text. Eusene published his fifth and last Greek Testament; the text of which is the same with that of the former, except that he has adopted some readings of the king's MS., that had been supported by the Complutensian Bible, whose readings he found to agree wonderfully with the king's MS.; in short, that having col-which relate to controverted doctrines, the author hath mentioned in his notes; but without examining their authenticity, because of those matters the unlearned are no judges; and, with respect to the learned, they may consult Mill, Wetstein, and others, who have made large collections of the various readings, and may judge for themselves.

In the larger edition of this work, the author, following Origen's plan, hath set the common English version opposite to his new translation, that the reader may see in what particulars they differ. And having placed the Greek text in a column between the two translations, the learned, by comparing them with the original, can easily judge to which version the preference is due.

Sect. IV. — Of the Prefaces, the Illustrations prefixed to the Chapters, and the Notes.

It is well known that the epistles to particular churches were written, either to correct certain irregularities into which they have fallen, or to confute the errors of false teachers, who endeavoured to seduce them. It is equally well known, that the epistles to particular persons were written to direct them in the discharge of the offices assigned to them, and to support them under the evils to which they were exposed, while faithfully executing these offices. Wherefore the knowledge of the state of the churches, and of the persons to whom the epistles were addressed, and of the erroneous doctrines which prevailed in the first age, must be of great use in studying the epistles. To give the reader some ideas of these matters, the author has prefixed a preface to each epistle, in which, from the hints given in the epistle itself, and from particulars mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the writings of the fathers, he hath endeavoured to settle the date of the epistle, and to explain the state of the churches, and the character of the persons to whom it was sent, together with the errors which it was written to correct.

In the new translation, the common division of the text into chapters and verses is retained, because the Scriptures have long been quoted according to that division. But, to remedy the inconveniences which that division hath occasioned, by breaking the text, sometimes even in the middle of a sentence, the author hath prefixed to each chapter what he hath termed a View and Illustration. In these, the principal matters contained in the chapters are set forth at greater length than could be done in the commentary; the arguments used by the inspired writers for proving their positions are distinguished, their relation to these positions is pointed out, and the conclusion drawn from them is shown to be just. Also because St. Paul, in particular, hath omitted sometimes the major proposition of his argument, sometimes the minor, and often the conclusion; the View and Illustrations, hath endeavoured to complete these unfinished reasonings. He hath also marked the apostle's digressions, mentioned the purposes for which they are introduced, and apprized the reader when he returns to his main subject. Lastly, in these views, care hath been taken to show how the apostle's reasonings may be applied to the Church of God, and to useful practical and Christian revelations against the cavils of infidels.

Opposite to the new translation, the author hath placed an interpretation, in which the translated words of the text are inserted, for the most part, without any alteration; because, in general, they express the inspired writer's meaning with more energy than it is possible to do by any wordy or human invention. The author hath called this a commentary, rather than a paraphrase, because it is commonly made, not by expressing the meaning of the text in other words, but by supplying the things that are necessary for showing the scope and connexion of the reasoning, or by mentioning particulars which the apostles have omitted, because they were well known to the persons to whom they wrote, or in which, at this distance of time, being unknown to ordinary readers, must be suggested to them. These additions, being properly short notes intermixed with the text, for the purpose of explanation, are all printed in Roman characters, that the reader may distinguish them from the text, which is printed in Italics.

As a matter of the Scriptures, the author thought himself bound to give the true literal version of every passage, according to the best of his judgment, without regarding whether it favoured or opposed his own particular opinions, or any of the schemes of doctrine which have divided the Christian world. Yet, as an interpreter, he hath taken the liberty, in his commentary, to submit to his readers, though not always with the same assurance, what in his opinion is the meaning of the passage. There are, indeed, some texts which he hath not ventured to explain, because, though all agree in the translation of them, their meaning hath been much disputed. But in the notes he hath shown how the contending parties explain them for supporting their particular tenets; and hath fairly represented in his commentaries for which they justify their own interpretations, without concealing any thing that seemed to be of importance on either side. And if, on some occasions, he hath leaned towards the interpretation of a disputed text, given by one of the parties, the reader must not conclude that he holds the opinion which that interpretation is advanced to support; for he will find that he has laid down in his Commentaries the arguments by which he justifies these interpretations which favour the contrary doctrine. In both cases, his only motives for approving these interpretations was, that he judged them the true meaning of the passages. The balancing of these seemingly opposite passages against each other, and the application of them for the purpose of supporting a particular doctrine, or scheme of doctrine, not falling within the author's plan, he has left it, for the most part, to theologians, with this opinion or that commentator, he contends that the doctrine of revelation can be securely built in the Scriptures, understood in their plain grammatical meaning. And therefore, in all cases where opposite doctrines have been founded, not on one or two, but on a number of texts, according to their unconstrained meaning, the one class of texts ought not, by forced criticism, to be turned from their manifest sense, and then forced to agree with the scheme of doctrine built on the other class. For it will be found, that these seemingly inconsistent texts speak of persons and things of whose existence we are not able to judge. So that the things said concerning them in the Scriptures, which appear inconsistent, may all be true, though we are not able to reconcile them with each other. And as in natural religion, there are facts discovered to us, by reason and experience, from which seemingly contradictory conclusions may be drawn, both of which we must believe though we are not able to reconcile them, why not the seemingly inconsistent facts made known in the Scriptures be received as true, upon the testimony of God, though we cannot reconcile the apparent contradiction of reason? The rejection to the plain grammatical interpretation of the Scriptures, that it gives them the appearance of inconsistency. If that appearance is in the Scriptures themselves, why should it be concealed, either in the translation or in the interpretation? A translator or an interpreter of the sacred oracles will certainly show, not only greater knowledge of the sacred writers, but perhaps more to the truth, when he suffers their real aspect to remain, than if, for the purpose of establishing particular doctrines, or for reducing every thing in revelation to the measure of human conceptions, he attends only to one class of texts, and, by forced criticism, turns all the opposite texts from their plain grammatical meaning to artificial senses which they do not admit with much straining: a practice which has been too long followed in interpreting the Scriptures, not by one sect only, but by all the different sects of Christians in their turn.

It remains, that some account be now given of the matters contained in the notes. In the first place, then, when the author introduces the interpretations of former commentators, he gives the whole of the proofs by which they support their interpretations; hoping they may be of use, even to the learned, by bringing things to their remembrance which otherwise, perhaps, they might not have recollected. In the second place, as the Christian revelation is founded on the Jewish, and is the completion of it, the apostles, in explaining the Jewish doctrines of the gospel, are supposed to be charged with the scheme of doctrine built on the other class. For it will be found, that these seemingly inconsistent texts speak of persons and things of whose existence we are not able to judge. So that the things said concerning them in the Scriptures, which appear inconsistent, may all be true, though we are not able to reconcile them with each other. And as in natural religion, there are facts discovered to us, by reason and experience, from which seemingly contradictory conclusions may be drawn, both of which we must believe though we are not able to reconcile them, why not the seemingly inconsistent facts made known in the Scriptures be received as true, upon the testimony of God, though we cannot reconcile the apparent contradiction of reason? lar proof; because it was supposed, that, to the learned, both would clearly appear from the original itself; and to the unlearned from their giving a better sense of the passages than that found in the common versions and paraphrases. In the fifth place, instead of entering into theological controversies, the author, judging it more for the reader's profit, hath in the notes shown how the important sentiments contained in the word of God may be improved for forming men's tempers and manners. Lastly, In the notes, the author hath displayed the beauties of some of the finest passages, by remarks on the sentiments and language.

All the different parts of the author's plan, above described, being necessary, to the right explanation of the apostolical epistles, the due execution of them hath swelled this work to a great bulk. Yet no one who knows how many volumes have been written by critics and commentators, for elucidating a single Greek and Latin classic, can be offended with the size of this performance. For, however profitable the right interpretation of the writings of the celebrated authors of Greece and Rome may be, to those who take a delight in polite literature, it is a matter of small importance, in comparison with the right interpretation of the oracles of God, by which the faith and morals of mankind are to be regulated. However, that this publication might not be needlessly swelled, the author hath, to the best of his judgment, shunned every thing trifling. And these too, the remarks might not be repeated, he hath, as often as it was necessary, referred the reader to the places of the work where they are to be found. When the interpretations and remarks of other commentators are introduced, such only are mentioned as are accompanied with some degree of probability. And both in giving his own interpretations and the interpretations of others, the author has striven in his notes, in the same manner that he has endeavoured, in general, to exclude from his style, tautology, synonymous epithets, and circumlocution. And, that what he hath written may be understood at the first reading, he hath all along aimed at simplicity, perspicuity, and precision in his style.—Many Greek words, it is true, and phrases, are introduced, especially in the notes. But those being placed as parenthetical, to show the sense of the text, where they occur is complete without them, they can occasion no difficulty to any reader. They are inserted for the sake of persons skilled in the Greek, to whom the author appeals for the justness of his critical remarks. And although the unlearned cannot judge of such matters, he hopes it will be some proof, even to them, that his notes are well founded, if the alterations in the translation, and in the interpretation which they are designed to support, make the Scriptures more plain to them than they were before, and if they afford a clearer view of the sentiments and reasonings of the inspired writers.

Essay I.

Of the commission given by Christ to his Apostles; and of the power by which he fitted them for executing that commission; and of the nature and authority of their writings.

The Lord Jesus before his death spake in this manner to his apostles—John xvi. 12. 'I have yet many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now. 13. Howbeit, when the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth.' From this it is evident, that while on earth Jesus did not declare the whole doctrines of the gospel, but left them to be revealed by the Holy Ghost, to the persons who, after his departure, were to make them known to the world. In this method of revealing the gospel, there was both dignity and propriety. For the Son of God came from heaven, not to make the gospel revelation, but to be the subject of it by doing and suffering all that was necessary to procure the salvation of mankind.

But, although it was not our Lord's intention to make a complete revelation of the gospel in person, he occasionally delivered many of its doctrines and precepts in the hearing of his followers, that, when the persons commissioned by him to preach the gospel in its full extent executed their commission, the world, by observing the perfect conformity of their doctrine with his, might entertain no doubt of their authority and inspiration, in those farther discoveries which they made concerning the matters of which Christ himself had spoken nothing.

The Son of God, in prosecution of the purpose for which he took on him the human nature, came to John at Jordan, and was baptized. To this rite he submitted, not as it was the baptism of repentance, for he was perfectly free from sin, but as it prefigured his dying and rising again from the dead, and because he was, on that occasion, to be declared God's beloved son by a voice from Heaven, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, in the view of the multitudes who were assembled at John's baptism.

Having received these miraculous attestations, Jesus began his ministry; and from that time forth showed himself to Israel as their long-expected deliverer, and, in the hearing of the people, spake many discourse, in which he declared his baptism and his mission, and explained many of the doctrines and precepts of true religion. And while he thus employed himself, he confirmed his doctrine, and proved himself to be the Son of God, by working great miracles in all parts of Judea, and even in Jerusalem itself. But the chiefs of the Jews, envious his reputation with the people, laid hold on him, and condemning him for calling himself the Son of God, constrained Pontius Pilate, the governor of Judea, to put him to death. But while the Jews, with wicked hands, crucified Jesus, his death, by the sovereign appointment of God, became an atonement for the sin of the world. And, to wipe away the stain which the Jews endeavored to fix on Jesus as a deceiver, by putting him to death, God raised him from the dead on the third day, according to Christ's own prediction, and thereby declared him, in the most illustrious manner, his son. After his resurrection, Jesus showed himself alive to many witnesses; and, having remained on earth forty days, a sufficient time to prove the truth of his resurrection, he ascended into heaven, in the presence of his disciples, who were assembled thereunto, from heaven in like manner as they had seen him go away; namely, at the end of the world.

I. The illustrious display just now described, which Jesus made on earth of his glory as the Son of God, by his virtues, his miracles, his sufferings, his resurrection, and his ascension, was intended, not solely for the people before whom it was exhibited; but for all mankind. And, therefore, that the knowledge of it might not be confined to the Jews, but spread through the whole world, and continued in it to the end, Jesus, in the beginning of his ministry, chose twelve of his disciples, and ordained them to be with him, that they might hear all that he should speak, and see all that he should do for the salvation of mankind; and that, as eyewitnesses of these things, they might report them to the world, with every circumstance of credibility. These witnesses Jesus named apostles, or servos semini forth by him, and appointed them to bear that name always, that when they published his history, he would bear witness to their veracity and integrity. And those who believed, all might be sensible that they acted by commission and authority from him. And, to prevent any error that might arise in the execution of this office, from the failure of their memory, he made them the following promises:—John xiv. 16. 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever.' 17. Even the Spirit of truth; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. 26. The comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.' And, John xvi. 13. 'will guide you into all truth.' Besides bringing to your remembrance the things I have said to you, he will give you the knowledge of the whole gospel scheme. And, because many of the doctrines of the gospel were darkly revealed, and many of the particulars of Christ's life were in diverse manners foretold in the writings of Moses and the prophets, Jesus 'opened the understanding' of his apostles, that they might understand the Scriptures; Luke xxiv. 15.

Having in this manner educated and prepared the twelve, Jesus, before his ascension, declared to them the purpose for which he had called them to attend him during his ministry, and explained to them their duty as apostles. Acts i. 8. 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth.' Then gave them their commission in the following words: Mark xvi. 15. 'Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned.' And that the things which they should teach might gain entire credit, in addition to what he had promised formerly, (Luke xii. 15. 'Behold I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist,' he now told them, Luke xxiv. 29. 'Behold I send the promise of my Father upon you. But tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.' And added, Mark xvi. 17. 'These signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues. They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.' So, then, after his ascension, as he had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God.' Such was the commission which Christ gave to his apostles, and such the supernatural powers which he promised to bestow on them, to fit them for executing it with success.

But one of the apostles, Judas by name, having fallen from his office by treachery, the Lord then judged it necessary to supply his place; and for that purpose chose Matthias by lot. In this, however, they acted not by the direction of the Holy Ghost, for he was not yet given to them, but merely by the dictates of human prudence, which on that occasion seems to have carried them too far. No man, nor body of men whatever, could, by their designations, confer an office, whose authority bound the consciences of all men, and whose duties could not be performed without the gifts of inspiration and miracles. To ordain an apostle belonged to Christ alone, who, with the appointment, could also give the supernatural powers necessary to the function. Some time, therefore, after the election of Matthias, Jesus himself seems to have superseded it, by appointing another to be his apostle and witness in the place of Judas. In the choice of this new apostle, Jesus had a view to the conversion of the Gentiles; which, of all the services allotted to the apostles, was the most dangerous and difficult. For the person engaged in that work had to contend with the prejudices of the heathen priests, who had been taught by the spreading of the gospel, it was to be expected that they would oppose its preachers with an extreme rage. He had to contend, likewise, with the unbelieving Jews living in the heathen countries, who would not fail to inflame the idolatrous multitudes against any one who should preach salvation to the Gentiles, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses. The philosophers too were to be encountered, who, no doubt, after their manner, would endeavour to overthrow the gospel by argument; whilst the magistrates and priests laboured to destroy it, by persecuting its preachers and abettors. The difficulty and danger of preaching to the Gentiles being so great, the person who engaged in it certainly needed an uncommon strength of mind, a great degree of religious zeal, a courage superior to every danger, and a patience of labour and suffering not to be exhausted, together with much prudence, to enable him to avoid giving just offence to unbelievers. Besides these natural talents, education and literature were necessary in the person who attempted to convert the Gentiles, that he might acquit himself with propriety, when called before kings and magistrates and men of learning. All these talents and advantages Saul of Tarsus possessed in an eminent degree; and being a violent persecutor of the Christians, his testimony to the resurrection of Jesus would have the greater weight when he became a preacher of the gospel. Him, therefore, the Lord Jesus determined to make his apostle in the room of Judas; and for that purpose he appeared to him from heaven, as he journeyed to Damascus to persecute his disciples. And having convinced him of the truth of his resurrection, by thus appearing to him in person, he commanded him to preach his resurrection, together with the doctrines of the gospel, which were to be made known to him afterwards by revelation; saying to him, Acts xxvi. 16. 'I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17. Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee; 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness,' &c. Such was the commission which Jesus in person gave to Saul of Tarsus, who afterwards was called Paul; so that, although he had not attended Jesus during his ministry, he was, in respect both of his election to the office, and of his fitness for it, rightly numbered with the apostles.

II. The apostles being ordered to tarry in Jerusalem, till they were endued with power from on high, they obeyed their master's command; and on the tenth day after his ascension, which was the day of Pentecost, happening to be assembled in one place, with other disciples, to the number of about a hundred and twenty; Acts ii. 1. Suddenly, there came a sound from heaven, as of mighty rushing wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. 3. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them: 4. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance. The Spirit manifested his presence with the disciples, by enabling them to speak fluently a variety of foreign languages, of which, till then, they were utterly ignorant. By this, his first gift, the Holy Ghost prepared our Lord's witnesses to preach his sufferings and resurrection to all nations, agreeably to their commission, without being obliged to wait till they learnt to speak the languages of the nations to whom they were sent. By this gift, likewise, the disciples were enabled immediately to publish those farther revelations of the gospel doctrine which the Spirit was afterwards to make to them, according to Christ's promise.

Although, on the memorable occasion above mentioned, all the hundred and twenty disciples were filled with the Holy Ghost, and were enabled to speak in any of them whatsoever was abundantly necessary for the apostles, who had accompanied Jesus during his ministry on earth, and who were made his witnesses, for the purpose of testifying his sufferings and resurrection, and of preaching the gospel to all nations. These, by their commission and illumination, being authorized to direct the religious faith and practice of mankind, it was of great importance to the world to know, with certainty, who they were to whom that high honour belonged. To give us, therefore, full assurance in this matter, three of the writers of our Lord's history, by the direction of the Spirit, have not only recorded his election of the twelve to the apostolic office, but each hath given a separate catalogue of their names and designations.

It is to be remarked, however, that notwithstanding the highest measures of inspiration and miraculous powers were bestowed on the apostles, they did not all possess these gifts in an equal degree. This we learn from Peter, one of the number, who tells us, 2 Peter iii. 15, that Paul 'wrote his epistles according to the wisdom given to him.' This Paul likewise has insinuated by calling Peter, James, and John, pillars, Gal. ii. 9. and chief apostles, 3 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11. Add, that if all the apostles possessed the gifts of inspiration and miracles in an equal degree, it will be difficult to understand how it has happened that only six of the twelve have written the revelations which were made to them, and that, while the preaching and miracles of those who are called chief apostles are recorded by Luke in his history of the Acts, nothing is said of the preaching and miracles of the rest; which is the more remarkable, as the miracles and preaching of some of the other ministers of the gospel, as Stephen and Philip, are there particularly related. The apostles, it would seem, had different parts assigned to them by Christ, and were qualified, each for his own work, by such a measure of illumination and miraculous power as was requisite to it. May we not therefore suppose, that the work allotted to the apostles who have left us nothing in writing, was such as to require witness to that display which their master made of his own character as the Son of God, by his miracles and resurrection; and to publish to the world those revelations of the gospel doctrine which were made to them in common with the other apostles? So that, being favoured with no peculiar revelation which merited to be committed to writing, they discharged the apostolic office both honourably and usefully, when they employed themselves in testifying to the world Christ's resurrection, together with the things they had heard him speak, and seen him do, while they attended on him; especially if, as tradition informs us, they sealed their testimony concerning these matters with their blood.
fore said I, that he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto thee."

But here it must be remembered, to the honour of the apostle Paul, that being made an apostle for the purpose of converting the idolatrous Gentiles, he laboured in that department more abundantly than all the other apostles. After having the gospel revealed to him by Christ (Gal. i. 12.), and after receiving the power of working miracles, and of conferring miraculous gifts on them—what he should believe (3 Cor. xii. 12., 13.) he first preached in Damascus, then went to Jerusalem, where he was introduced to Peter and James. But the Jews in that city, who were enraged against him for deserting their party, endeavouring to kill him, the brethren sent him away to Cilicia, his native country. From that time forth, St. Paul spent the greatest part of his life among the Gentiles, visiting one country after another with such unremitting diligence, that, at the time he wrote his epistle to the Romans (ch. xv. 19.), "from Jerusalem, and round about as far as Illyricum, he had fully preached the gospel of Christ." But in the course of his labours, having met with great opposition, the Lord Jesus appeared to him in certain occasions to encourage him in his works, and in particular caught him up into the third heaven. So that, not only in respect of his election to the apostolic office, but in respect of the gifts and endowments bestowed on him to fit him for that office, and of the success of his labours in it, St. Paul was not inferior to the very chiefest apostles, as he himself affirms. I may add, that by the censure of the revelations that were given him, he excelled the other apostles as much as he exceeded them in genius and learning. He did not, it is true, attend our Lord during his ministry; yet he had so complete a knowledge of all his transactions given him by revelation, that in his epistles, most of which were written before the evangelists published their histories, he has alluded to many of the particulars which they have mentioned. Nay, in his discourse to the elders of Ephesus, he has preserved a remarkable saying of our Lord's, which none of the evangelists have recorded. Upon the whole, no reasonable person can entertain the least doubt of St. Paul's title to the apostleship. As little can there be a doubt concerning that high degree of illumination and miraculous power which was bestowed on him to render his ministry successful.

III. Because the author of the Christian religion left nothing in writing for the instruction of the world, the apostles and others, who were eyewitnesses of his virtues, his miracles, his sufferings, his resurrection and ascension, and who were present at the production of the Gospels, have preserved the most vivid account of the life of Christ, and the prophecies of his sufferings and ascension which were recorded by him. The Gospels, which are the only history of our Saviour recorded by the apostles, contain a full account of his whole life. In them, he has recorded, that while the greatest regard is due to them, especially to the Gospels, because they contain the words of Christ himself, we are not in them to look for a full account of the gospel scheme. Their professed design is to give, not a complete definition of our religion, but the history of its Founder, and of that illustrious display of his Deity, which he made of his glory as the Son of God and Saviour of the world, together with an account of the spreading of the gospel after our Lord's ascension. The gospel doctrine is to be found complete only in the Epistles, where it is exhibited with great accuracy by the apostles, to whom the Holy Ghost revealed it, as Christ had promised.

I have said that Paul excelled his brethren apostles, by reason of the abundance of the revelations that were given to him. By this, however, I do not mean that his discourses and writings are superior to theirs in point of authority. The other apostles, indeed, have not entered so deep into the Christian scheme as he hath done, yet, in what they have written, being guided by the Spirit which inspired them, their declarations and decisions, so far as they go, are of equal authority with his. Nevertheless, it must be remembered, that it is St. Paul chiefly, who in his epistles, as shall be shown immediately, hath explained the gospel economy in its full extent, hath shown its connexion with the former dispensations, hath defended it against the objections by which it was assailed, both in ancient and modern times, have endeavoured to overthrow it.
In confirmation of this account of the superior illumination of the apostle Paul, I now observe, that the greatness of the mercy of God, as extending to all mankind, was made known to him before it was discovered to the other apostles; namely, in the commission which he received at his conversion, to preach to the Gentiles the good news of salvation through faith, "that they might receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith," Acts xxvi. 18. So that he was the first of the apostles, who, by Christ's command, declared that faith, and not circumcision, was necessary to the salvation of the idolatrous Gentiles. And as St. Paul early communicated to his brethren apostles the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 2), it seems to have been by him that Christ first made known to the other apostles the extent of the divine mercy to mankind. For that the apostles, besides discovering to each other the revelations which they received, read each other's writings, is plain, from the character which Peter hath given of Paul's epistles, 2 Peter iii. 16, 17.

It is St. Paul who hath informed us that sin and death were permitted to enter into the world, and pass through to all men, by the disobedience of one man, because God determined, by the obedience of a greater man, to bestow resurrection from the dead on all men, and to give all an opportunity of obtaining righteousness and life under a more gracious covenant than the former, procured for them by the merit of that obedience.

It is St. Paul who, in his learned epistle to the Hebrews, hath largely explained and proved the priesthood and intercession of Christ, and hath shown that his death is considered by God as a sacrifice for sins; not in a metaphorical sense, and in accommodation to the prejudices of mankind, but on account of its real efficacy in procuring pardon for penitents; that Christ was constituted a priest by the oath of God: that all the priests and sacrifices that have been in the world, but especially the levitical priests and sacrifices, were emblems of the priesthood, sacrifice, and intercession of Christ; and that sacrifice was instituted originally to preserve the memory of the revelation which God made at the fall, concerning the salvation of mankind through the death of his Son, after he should become the seed of the woman.

It is this great apostle who hath most fully explained the doctrine of justification, and shown, that it consists in our being delivered from death, and in our obtaining eternal life, through the obedience of Christ: that so little is this justification experimentally wrought out through laws: that though faith is required as the condition thereof, justification is still the free gift of God through Jesus Christ; because no works which men can perform, not even the work of faith itself, hath any merit with God to procure pardon for those who have sinned: that this method of justification having been established at the fall, is the way in which mankind, from the beginning to the end of time, are justified: and that, as such, it is attested both by the law and by the prophets.

It is St. Paul who, by often discussing the justification of Abraham, hath shown the true nature of the faith which justifies sinners; that it consists in a strong desire to know, and in a sincere disposition to do, the will of God; that it leads the believer implicitly to obey the will of God when made known; and that even the heathens are capable of attaining this kind of faith, and of being saved through Christ. Also, it is this apostle who, by penetrating into the depth of the meaning of the covenant with Abraham, hath discovered the nature and greatness of those rewards which God taught mankind concerning himself, and who hath shown that the gospel, in its chief articles, was preached to Abraham and to the Jews; nay, preached to the antilikiists, in the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent. So that the gospel is not a revelation of a new method of justification, but a more full publication of the method of justification mercifully established by God for all mankind from the very beginning.

It is the apostle Paul chiefly who, by proving the principal doctrines of the gospel from the writings of Moses and the prophets, hath shown, that the same God who spake to the fathers by the prophets, did, in the last days of the Mosaic dispensation, speak to all mankind by his Son: that the various dispensations of religion, under which mankind have been placed, are all parts of one great scheme formed by God for saving penitent sinners; and, in particular, that there is an intimate connexion between the Jewish and the Christian revelations; that the former was a preparation for the latter: consequently, those writers show great ignorance of the divine dispensations, who, on account of the objections to which the law of Moses, as a rule of justification, is liable, and on account of the obscurity of the ancient prophecies, resort to the Jewish writers for the solution of the Christian mysteries. But all who make this attempt, do it in opposition to the testimony of Jesus himself, who commanded the Jews to search their own Scriptures, because "they are they which testify of him" (John v. 39.), who, in his conversation with the disciples on the road to Emmaus, "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, expounded unto them from all the Scriptures the things concerning himself" (Luke xxiv. 27.); and who told them, ver. 44. "That all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning him." The attempt is made in opposition also to the testimony of the apostle Peter, who, speaking to Cornelius of Christ, said, "To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." Acts x. 43. The Jewish and Christian revelations, therefore, are so closely connected, that if the former is removed as false, the latter must, of necessity, fall to the ground.

It is the apostle of the Gentiles who hath set the Sis- matic covenant, or law of Moses, in a proper light, by demonstrating that there was no method of justification peculiar to the Jews, but merely their national law, delivered to them by God, not as governor of the universe, but as king in Israel, who had separated them from the rest of mankind, and placed them in Canaan under his own immediate government, as a nation, for the purpose of preserving his covenant and worship amidst the heathen of the earth and of furnishing a specimen of what he had promised to his people. Accordingly, this apostle hath proved, that seeing the law of Moses contained a more perfect account of the duties of morality, and of the demerit of sin, than is to be found in any other national law, instead of justifying, it condemned the Jews by its curse; especially as it prescribed no sacrifice of any real efficacy to cleanse the conscience of sinners, nor promised them pardon in any method whatsoever; and that, by the rigor of its curses, the law of Moses laid the Jews under the necessity of seeking justification from the mercy of God through faith, according to the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, which was the gospel and religion of the Jews. Thus, by the light which St. Paul hath held up to us, the turgid rantings of the Mennonists against the law of Moses, and against the God of the Jews, the author of that law, on the supposition that it was a rule of justification, are seen to be without foundation; as are the objections likewise which modern deists have urged against the Mosaic revelation, on account of God's dealings with the Israelites.

So when the good and the bad are so concerned concerning the transcendent greatness of the Son of God, above angels and all created beings whatever; and when hath shown, that, as the reward of his humiliation and death in the human nature, he hath, in that nature, obtained the government of the world, for the good of his church, and will hold that government till he hath put down the usurped dominion which the apostate angels have so long endeavoured to maintain, in opposition to the righteous government of God; that, as the last exercise of his kingly power, Christ will raise the dead, and judge the world, and render to every one according to his deeds: and that, when all the enemies of God and goodness are thus utterly subdued, the Son will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be over all in all places.

It is this great apostle who hath made known to us many of the circumstances and consequences of the general judgment, not mentioned by the other apostles. For, besides repeating what Christ himself declared, that he will return a second time to this earth surrounded with the glory of his Father, and attended by a great host of angels; that he will call all the dead forth from their graves; and that, by his sentence as Judge, he will fix the day, and the hour of that judgment is beginning to shine. Men have acquired more just notions of the rights of conscience, and the disputes in which the understandings of Christians, for so many ages, have been hold bound by the decrees of councils and the establishment of creeds, are begun to be broken; so that the candid may now modestly propose the result of their inquiries into the word of God, without incurring either danger or blame. If, therefore, proper attention is paid to such publications as are designed for the illustration of the Scriptures, it is to be hoped that, in the progress of ages, the united efforts of many will dispel the obscurity which hath so long rendered some passages of Scripture hard to be understood; and the matters of fact above human comprehension really made known in the word of God, being separated from those which have been obtruded on it by ignorant or by worldly men, genuine Christianity will, at last, shine forth in its native splendour. And thus the objections raised against the gospel vanishing, it will at length be generally received, and acquire its proper influence on the minds and manners of mankind.

By attending to the various undoubted facts set forth in the foregoing essay, every Christian must be sensible of the divine authority of all the books of the New Testament; and, by forming a proper judgment of the purpose for which each of these books was written, he may easily learn the use he is to make of these divinely inspired writings.

ESSAY II.

Of the Use which the Churches were to make of the Apostle's Epistles; and of the Method in which these Writings were published and preserved.

Famously, books being of such value that none but the rich were able to purchase them, the common people were seldom taught to read in any country; and having no teachers given them by the public, they were generally grossly ignorant of moral and religious truths. The vulgars, however, of the Jewish nation, were better instructed. For Moses having ordered his people to observe the Sabbath day, the people at the end of every seven years, during the feast of tabernacles, in the year of release (Deut. xix. 10, 11.), the knowledge of the doctrines contained in his writings was, by that institution, universally diffused among the Jews. Besides, it gave rise to the reading of the law and the prophets in their synagogues. For, in whatever part of the world they assembled themselves every Sabbath for the worshipping of God, and for the reading of their sacred writings. Now, the Christian churches being destined for the same pur-the apostle, which they had received: probably the letter which he had lately sent to the Ephesians; for that epistle is inscribed, not only "To the saints which are at Ephesus," but also "To the faithful in Christ Jesus." This inscription, therefore, like that of the epistle to the Corinthians, implied that the Ephesian brethren were to send copies of their letter to the neighbouring churches, and, among the rest, to the church of the Laodiceans, with a particular order to them to send a copy of it to the Colossians.

In the same manner, also, we may suppose the epistle to the Galatians was circulated. For the inscription, "To the churches of Galatia" implies, that the church in Galatia which received this letter from the apostle's messenger, was to send a copy of it to the church that was nearest to them; which church was to circulate it in like manner; so that, being sent from one church to another it was no doubt communicated, in a short time, to all the churches of Galatia. In like manner, the apostle Peter's first epistle being inscribed "To the strangers of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia," the episcopate or church to which that letter was delivered by Silvanus (1 Pet. v. 12.), was to communicate it to the brethren nearest at hand, to be copied and dispersed till it was fully circulated among the faithful in the several countries mentioned in the inscription, unless that service was performed by Silvanus himself. For it cannot be supposed that Peter wrote copies of such a long letter to all the churches in the widely extended countries of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. The like method, no doubt, was used for circulating all the other Catholic epistles.

The epistles, by the inscription of their letters, having signified their desire that they should be read publicly, not only in the churches to which they were written, but in all the neighbouring churches; and St. Paul, in particular, having given express orders to that purpose in his epistles to the Thessalonians and Colossians, we have good reason to believe that their epistles were read publicly and frequently in the churches to which they were inscribed, along with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, that copies of them were sent to every church which had an immediate interest in them; and that, when the gospels were published, they, in like manner, were read daily in the churches; and that copies of them also were quickly multiplied. To this respect the gospels were certainly entitled, not only on account of their authors being apostles or evangelists, but also because they contained in them the greatest utility, both for the instruction and for the consolation of the brethren.

The epistles and gospels, being the authentic record in which the whole doctrines, precepts, and promises of the gospel are contained, we may believe that, although no injunction had been given by the apostles respecting the communication of their writings, the members of the churches to which their epistles and gospels were sent, moved by their own piety and good sense, would be anxious to communicate them; and would not grudge either the expense of transcribing them, or the trouble of sending them to all the churches with which they had any connexion. The persons likewise who were employed, whether in transcribing, or in carrying these excellent writings to the neighbouring churches, would take great delight in the work; thinking themselves both usefully and honourably employed. Nay, I am persuaded that each of the brethren as could afford the expense, and were capable of reading these divinely inspired writings, would get them transcribed for their own use: so that copies of them were speedily and dispersed in a very short time. This accounts for St. Paul's epistles, in particular, being so generally known, read, and acknowledged by all Christians, in the very first age; as we learn from Peter, who speaks of the epistles which his beloved brother Paul had written to the persons to whom he himself wrote his second epistle, chap. iii. 16. It seems, before Peter wrote that letter, that he had seen and read Paul's epistles to the Galatians, the Ephesians, and the Colossians. He speaks also of all Paul's other epistles; from which some learned men have inferred, that Paul by that time was dead, and that all his writings had come to Peter's hands. Nay, Peter insinuates that they were then universally read and acknowledged as inspired writings; for he tells us, 'the ignorant and unstable wrested them, as they did the other Scriptures also, to their own destruction.'

The writings of the apostles and evangelists being thus early and widely dispersed among the disciples of Christ, I think it cannot be doubted that the persons who obtained copies of them, regarding them as precious treasures of divine truth, preserved them with the utmost care. We are morally certain, therefore, that none of the inspired writings, either of the evangelists or of the apostles, have been lost; and in particular, that the suspicion which some have entertained of the loss of the First Epistle of Paul, is destitute of probability. His inspired writings were all sent to persons greatly interested in them, who, while they preserved their own copies with the utmost care, were, no doubt, very diligent in circulat- ing transcriptions from them among the other churches; so that if any were lost, high in reputable hands and much read, none of them, I think, could perish. What more this matter beyond doubt is, that while all the sacred books which now remain are often quoted by the most ancient Christian writers, whose works have come down to us, in none of them, nor in any other author whatever, is there so much as a single quotation from any apostolical writing, nor the least intimation of any apostolical writing ever existed, which we do not at present possess.

Further, as none of the apostolical writings have been lost, so no material alteration hath taken place in any of those which remain. For the autographs having, in all probability, been long preserved with care, by the rulers of the churches to which these writings were sent, if any material alteration, in particular copies, had ever been attempted, for the purpose of supporting heresy, the fraud must instantly have been detected by comparing the venerated copies with the autographs. And even after the autographs, by length of time, or by accident, were lost, those which they might have been, or which could easily be procured and compared in every country, was at all times sufficient for establishing the genuine text, and for correcting whatever alteration might be made, whether through accident or design. Nor is this all: the many disputes about articles of faith which took place in the Christian church, almost from the beginning, though productive of much mischief in other respects, secured the Scriptures from all vitiation. For the different sects of Christians, constantly appealing to the sacred oracles in support of their particular opinions, each would take care that their opponents quoted the Scriptures fairly, and transcribed them faithfully. And thus the different parties of Christians being checks on each other, every possibility of vitiating the Scriptures was absolutely precluded.

With respect to the various readings of the books of the New Testament, about which deists have made such a noise, and well disposed persons have expressed such fears as if the sacred text were thereby rendered uncertain, we may take upon ourselves to affirm, that the doubts of the former, and the fears of the latter, are without foundation. Before the invention of printing there was no method of multiplying the copies of books, but by trans-both in composition and style. The truth is, in forming his discourses, the apostle, for the most part, neglected the rules of the Grecian eloquence. He seldom begins with proposing his subject, or with declaring the method in which he is to handle it. And when he treats of more subjects than one in the same epistle, he does not inform us when he passes from one subject to another, nor always point out the purpose for which his arguments are introduced. Besides, he makes little use of those rhetorical transitions, connexions, and recapitulations, whereby the learned Greeks beautifully displayed the method and coherence of their discourses.

As the apostle did not follow the rules prescribed by the Greek rhetoricians, in disposing the master of his discourses, so he hath not observed their precepts in the choice of his words, the arrangement of his sentences, and the measure of his periods. That kind of speaking and writing which is more remarkable for an artificial structure of words, and a laboured smoothness of periods, than for truth of sentiment and justness of reasoning, was called by the apostle 'the wisdom of speech,' 1 Cor. i. 17; and 'the persuasive words of human wisdom,' 1 Cor. ii. 4; and was utterly disclaimed by him, 1 Cor. ii. 1. 'And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, nor of wisdom, declaring the testimony of God.'

But while the apostle, in the composition and style of his discourses, hath commonly avoided the showy embellishments, and even some of the solid ornaments of the Grecian eloquence, for reasons I shall afterwards mention, he hath made sufficient amends for these defects, by the excellence of his sentiments, the propriety of his method, the real connexion which subsists in his discourses, and the accuracy with which he has expressed himself on every subject.

The transcendent excellence of the apostle Paul's sentiments, it is presumed, no reader of true judgment will dispute. But the method and connexion of his writings, some, perhaps, may call in question; because, as I just now observed, he hath not adopted the method of composition used by the elegant Greeks. But, to remove this objection, and to illustrate, in the first place, the apostle's method, I observe, that, in his doctrinal epistles especially, he always treats of some important article of faith, which, though not formally proposed, is constantly in his view, and is handled according to a preconceived plan, in which his arguments, illustrations, and conclusions, are so interwoven and closely connected, that the intelligent reader will easily perceive, if, in studying any particular epistle, he keeps the subject of it in his eye throughout. For thus he will be sensible, that the things written are all connected with the subject in hand, either as proofs of what immediately goes before, or as illustrations of some proposition more remote; or as inferences from premises, sometimes expressed and sometimes implied; or as answers to objections which, in certain cases, are not stated, perhaps because the persons addressed had often heard them proposed. Nay, he will find that, on some occasions, the apostle adapts his reasoning to the thoughts which he knew would, at that instant, arise in the mind of his readers, and to the answers which he foresew they would make to his questions, though these answers are not expressed. In short, on a just view of Paul's epistles, it will be found that all his arguments are in point; that whatever incidental matter is introduced, contributes to the illustration of the principal subject; that his conclusions are well founded; and that the argument is connected.

Next with respect to the connexion of the reasoning in the apostle's epistles, I acknowledge, that the want of those forms of expression by which the learned Greeks displayed the coherence and dependence of their discourses, has given to his compositions a disjointed appearance. Nevertheless, there is a close connexion of the several parts of his epistles established by the sense of what he hath written. Now, where there is a real connexion in the sense, the words and phrases invented by rhetoricians for showing it, become, in some measure, unnecessary. There is also in the apostle's epistles an apparent connexion suggested by the introduction of a word or thought (see Rom. iv. 24, 25; Eph. i. 19, 20; 1 Thess. ii. 14), which seemingly leads to what follows; yet the real connexion lies more deep, in the relation of the things to each other, and to the principal subject. These relations, however, would be more obvious, if the Greek particles used by the apostle for coupling his sentences and periods, instead of having always, or for the most part, the same meanings uniformly given them as in our English Bibles, were diversified in the translation, according to the true force which each particle derives from the place which it holds in the discourse. Further, through the frequent use of that part of speech called the 'poros,' or 'because,' there is a seeming connexion in the apostle's discourses, which is apt to mislead one who is not acquainted with the idiom of the Greek language. For, as the participle hath often a casual significiation, by translating it literally, the subsequent clause appears to contain a reason for what immediately goes before, contrary, in many instances, to the apostle's sense. This is also the case in the examples, after the examples of other Greek writers, for any part of the verb. Besides, by translating the apostle's participles literally, his sentences and periods are tacked to one another in such a manner, that they have neither beginning nor ending. (Col. i. 10, 11, 12.) Wherefore, that the unlearned reader may not apprehend a connexion in the apostle's discourses different from what really subsists in them, and that the true coherence and dependence of the several parts may appear, his participles should be translated so as to represent the parts of the verb for which they are put. If this were done, the apostle's sentences and periods would stand forth in their just dimensions, and their relation to the different parts of his discourses, for what immediately precedes, or as illustrations of something more remote, or as new arguments in support of the principal proposition, would clearly appear; and, by this means, the general plan of his discourse would emerge from that obscurity in which it lies hid in the present translation.

But, in praising St. Paul for handling his subjects methodically, and for connecting his discourses on these subjects by the sense of what he hath written rather than by the words, lest I should be thought to ascribe to his compositions qualities which they do not possess, I mention his first epistle to the Thessalians as an example and proof of all that I have said. For, although the subject of that letter is not formally proposed, nor the method declared in which it is handled, nor the scope of the particular arguments pointed out, nor the objections mentioned to which answers are given, all these particulars are so plainly implied in the meaning of the things written, that an attentive reader can be at no loss to discern them. In the same epistle, though no formal display of the coherence of the sentences be made by introducing them with the artificial couplings used by the elegant Greek writers, it does not occasion any confusion, because the dependence of the several parts implied in the sense sufficiently supplies that want.

Yet, after all I have said in vindication of the apostle for having neglected in his epistles so much admired formality of the Grecian eloquence, I should not think I had done him justice on this head, if I did not call the reader's particular attention to the nature of his writings. None of them are treatises; they are all letters to particular...

ar churches or persons; some of them write in answer to letters which he had received. Now, how essential soever a declared method and order in the disposition of the arguments, and a visible connexion of the parts of the discourse, may be in a regular treatise, these, in the opinion of the best judges, are by no means necessary in oratory compositions. Rather, in that kind of writing, if there is order and connexion, to conceal it is esteem'd a perfection. Besides, letters differ from every other species of writing in this respect, that the persons to whom they are addressed being well acquainted with the particulars alluded to in them, the writer never thinks of entering into a minute detail of the characters, the circumstances, and the opinions of the persons concerning whom, or to whom, he writes. Yet the knowledge of these things is absolutely necessary to render letters intelligible to strangers. Hence, as Lord Shaftesbury, speaking of letter-writing, justly observes, Miscell. i. c. 3.

"They who read an epistle or satire of Horace, in some better than a mere scholastic relish, will comprehend, that the concealment of order and method in this manner, is at least as necessary in the worst beauty, in the best style. They will own, that unless a reader be in some measure apprized of the characters of an Augustus, a Mecenas, a Florus, and a Trebius, there will be little relish in those satires, addressed, in particular, to the courtiers, ministers, and great men of the times." If these observations are just, it is no blasphemy, but rather a beauty, in the apostle's letters, that his method is concealed from us. Neither ought they to be found fault with for their obscurity; seeing, in many instances, it is owing to our ignorance of the characters of the persons he mentions, and of the facts and circumstances to which he alludes. At the same time, his epistles are not more irregular, or more obscure, at least, in their manner, than many of the oracles of the poets and satires of Horace. So that the assistance of commentators is not more needed for interpreting the writings of the inspired apostle, than for understanding the compositions of the elegant Latin poet.

Having made these remarks on the method and connexion of the apostle Paul's epistles, it remains, in the second place, that I speak concerning his style. And here I observe, in general, that it is concise and unadorned; yet, if I judge rightly, its conciseness adds to its energy, and even to its beauty. For, instead of multiplying synonymous terms, unmeaning epithets, and jarring metaphors, whereby style becomes turgid and empty, the apostle scarcely ever admits any thing superfluous. His words, which is tender and pathetic, when his object is emphatical, and properly placed in the sentence, as by a master's hand; some of them are new, and others of them are admirably compounded; so that they add new taste to the sound and to the sense of the sentence. His thoughts commonly mark the principal quality or circumstance of the idea to which they are addressed; and his expressions, in some instances, are so delicately turned, as to suggest sentiments which are not directly marked by the words; whereby an opportunity is afford'd to the reader to exercise his own ingenuity, in discovering that more is meant than meets his ear. In short, there are, in the apostle's concise language, virtues which make amends for the want of the vivid colouring, the flowing copiousness, and the varied cadences of the Greek eloquence. Even those oriental forms of speech used by the apostle, which have been blamed by one or two of the fathers who were not skilled in the Hebrew, though accompanied with some obscurity at first view, when understood, add to the pleasure of the reader by their energy, and by the variety which they occasion in the style. The changing, too, of the person, and the sudden transition from the one number to the other, often found in Paul's writings, though violations of the rules of grammar loudly condemned by the lesser critics, are real beauties, as they render discourse more lively; on which account these irregularities have been admitted, even by the best authors. And, with respect to the few uncommon words and phrases, to which the appellations of barbarisms and solecisms have been given, the reader ought to know, that the best Greek authors have used the very same words and phrases, which, if they are not commented on as diversifications of the style, must, at least, be excused as inaccuracies, flowing from the vivacity of these justly admired writers, or from their attention to matters of greater moment. However, as Longinus hath long ago acknowledged, (c. 36.) one of the beautiful passages and sublime thoughts found in the works of these great masters, is sufficient to stone for all their faults.

But if the abest critics judge in this favourable manner of the celebrated writers of antiquity, on account of their many excellencies, surely the same indulgence cannot be denied to the apostle Paul, whose merit as a writer, in many respects, is not inferior to theirs. For I will venture to affirm, that in elegance, variety, and strength of expression, and even in sublimity and sublime ardor of his passages will be set in competition with the most admired of theirs, and will suffer nothing by the comparison. The truth is, where the apostle's subject leads him to it, he not only expresses himself with delicacy and energy, but often rises to the true sublime, through the grandeur of his sentiments, the strength of his language, and the harmoniousness of his periods, not industriously sought after, but naturally flowing from the fervour and wisdom of that divine spirit by which he was inspired.

In support of what I have advanced in praise of St. Paul as an author, I mention the following passages, as unquestionable examples of beautiful and sublime writing.
The greatest part of his epistle to the Ephesians, concerning which Grotius has said, that it expresses the grand matters of which it treats in words more sublime than are to be found in any human tongue!—His speech to the inhabitants of Lystra, Acts xiv., in which the justest sentiments concerning the Deity are expressed in such a beautiful simplicity of language, as must strike every reader of taste:—His oration to the Athenian magistrates and philosophers assembled in the Areopagus, wherein he describes the character and state of the true God, and the worship that is due to him, in the most elegant language, and with the most exquisiter address, Acts xvii.—His charge to the elders of Ephesus, (Acts xx.,) in which is tender and pathetic, more so, than in the different defences before the Roman governors, Felix and Festus, king Agrippa and Bernice, the tribunes and great ladies of Cesarea, who were all struck with admiration at the apostle's eloquence:—His description of the engagement between the flesh and the spirit, with the issue of that conflict, Rom. vii.—The whole of the eighth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, in which both the sentiments and the language, especially towards the close, are transcendentally sublime:—The fifteenth chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, where he treats of the resurrection of the dead, in a discourse of considerable length, adorned with the greatest variety of rhetorical figures, expressed in words aptly chosen, and beautifully placed; so that in no language there is to be found a passage of equal length, more lively, more harmonious, or more sublime:—The last four chapters of his second epistle to the Corinthians, which are full of the most delicate ironies on the false teacher who had set himself up at Corinth as the apostle's rival, and on the faction who prostituted on that impostor:—The whole of the first chapter of his epistle to the Hebrews, and the first six verses

Essay III.

Of the twelfth chapter of the same epistle; with many other passages which might be mentioned, in which we find an eloquence superior to any thing exhibited in profane authors.

There are other passages, likewise, in Paul's epistles, of a narrower compass, concerning which I hazard it as my opinion, that in none of the celebrated writers of Greece or of Rome, are there periods in which we find greater sublimity of thought, or more propriety, beauty, and even melody of language. This every reader of taste will acknowledge, who takes the pains to consult the following passages in the original.—Romans xi. 33. 'O the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!' &c. which dogmatology to the true God is superior, both in sentiment and language, to the most celebrated hymns of the greatest of the heathen poets in praise of their divinities.

—2 Cor. iv. 17, 16. 'For the present light thing of our affliction, which is but for a moment,' &c.—Ch. v. 14. 'For the love of Christ constraineth us,' &c.—vi. 4—11. 'In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God,' &c.—Philip. iii. 18. 'For many walk,' &c.—Ephes. i. 19. 'What is the exceeding greatness of his power,' &c.

In which last period there is such an accumulation of strong expression as is scarcely to be found in any other writer even. Where there is a description of God, which, in sublimity of sentiment and beauty of language, exceeds all the descriptions given of the Supreme Being by the most famed of the heathen philosophers or poets. Other periods also might be produced, in which, as in those just now mentioned, there are no unnatural rants, nor great swelling words of vanity; but a real abundance of matter, a copiousness of quotation, and an energy of diction, which directly strike the heart.

Upon the whole, I heartily agree with Bena in the account which he hath given of the apostle Paul as a writer, 3 Cor. x. 6, note, where he says, 'When I more narrowly consider the whole genius and character of Paul's style, I must confess that I have found no such sublimity of speaking in Plato himself, as often as the apostle is pleased to thunder out the mysteries of God; no exquisiteness of vehemence in Demosthenes equal to his, as often as he had a mind either to terrify men with a dread of the divine judgments, or to admonish them concerning their conduct, or to allure them to the contemplation of the divine benignity, or to excite them to the discharge of duty. No polemical eloquence, like that of Aristotle himself, nor in Galen, though most excellent artists, do I find a more exact method of teaching.'

But though with Bena I acknowledge that Paul was capable of all the different kinds of fine writing; of the simple, the pathetic, the ironical, the vehement, and the sublime; and that he hath given admirable specimens of these several kinds of eloquence in his sermons and epistles, I would not be understood to mean that he ought, upon the whole, to be considered either as an elegant or as an elegant writer. The method and connexion of his writings are too much concealed to entitle him to these appellations; and his style in general is neither copious nor smooth. It is rather harsh and difficult, through the vehemence of his genius, which led him frequently to use that dark form of expression called, by rhetoricians, elliptical; to leave some of his sentences, and even of his arguments, incomplete; and to mention the first words only of the passages which he hath quoted from the Old Testament, though his argument requires that the whole be set down. This obscurity in the Scriptures may likewise have been intended to make the exercise of honesty, impartiality, and care, necessary in studying the revelations of God. For though it hath been alleged, that the professed design of a revelation from God being to instruct all mankind in matters of religion, the terms in which it is conveyed ought to be perspicuous and level to the capacity of all;
yet if the improvement of their understanding be as essential to the happiness of rational creatures, destined to live eternally, as the improvement of their affections, the obscurity of revelation may be necessary to a certain degree. In the present life, indeed, man's happiness arises more from the pursuit of their affections than from the operations of their understanding. But it may not be so in the life to come. There the never-ending employment of the blessed may be to search after truth, and to unfold the ways and works of God, not in this system alone, but in other systems which shall be laid open to their view. If so, it must be an important part of our education for eternity to gain a permanent and strong relish of truth, and to acquire the talents necessary for investigating it; particularly the habit of attending to, and comparing things; of observing accurately their minutest agreements and differences; and of drawing the proper conclusions from such matters as fall under our observation. Hence, to afford scope for acquiring these talents, so necessary to the dignity and happiness of reasonable beings, the nice mechanism and admirable constancy of the material fabric of the universe is veiled from the eyes of man; and they are not allowed to behold it, but in consequence of accurate and laborious researches. For the same reason, the system of grace is set before us in the books of revelation, covered with a veil; that, in the exercise and striking passages into the deep meaning of the Scriptures, we may have an opportunity of exercising and strengthening the faculties of our minds, and of acquiring those habits of attention, recollection, and reasoning, which are absolutely necessary to the employments and enjoyments of the other world. Thus the obscurity of the Scriptures, instead of counteringact, evidently co-operates with the revelation, and demonstrates, that the books of nature and of grace have come from one and the same author, the Eternal God, the Father of the universe.

In the third place, the concise manner in which the apostle hath written his epistles may have been designed to render them short, that they might be transcribed and purchased at a small expense, and by that means become of more general use. What advantage this must have been to the disciples in the early ages may easily be conceived, when it is recollected, that anciently there were no books but such as were written with the pen. For, if books so written were of any bulk, being necessarily of great price, they could not be procured by the lower classes of people, or whose use St. Paul's epistles were principally designed.

In the fourth place, although the want of those nicely formed transitions, connexions, and recapitulations, by which the different parts of the elegant writings of the Greeks are united and formed into one whole or perfect body of discourse, hath given to the apostle's epistles such a miscellaneous appearance, that the reader is apt to consider them as desultory compositions, like those of Epictetus and Marcus Antoninus; and although, by this means, the most important passages of his writings have the form of aphorisms, it is, perhaps, no real disadvantage, because, on that very account, these passages may be the more easily committed to memory, even by persons who have not learned to read.

This leads me to remark, that the ease with which the most striking passages of the apostolical epistles may be committed to memory, through their apparent want of connexion, hath rendered them in all ages highly profitable to the common people, for whose use principally they were intended, and more especially to the primitive Christians who were so conversant with the gospel, that, on account of it, they parted with every thing most dear to them, we may believe they would spend much of their time in committing to memory the chief passages of the evangelical histories and apostolical epistles, in which the doctrines, precepts, and promises of the gospel are recorded. These were the charter on which all their hopes were founded, the lights by which they guided themselves in every situation, and the only source of their consolation under the sufferings brought on them by the profession of the gospel. We cannot be much mistaken, therefore, in supposing, that persons were chosen to be the penmen of the Scriptures, who, following the bent of their own genius, should write, in the concise and apparently unconnected manner above described, on purpose that the most useful passages of these divinely inspired compositions might be committed to memory with the greater ease. For thus the more intelligent brethren could not only make these passages the subjects of their own daily meditation, but also repeat them to others, whose memories were not so retentive, or who were not able to purchase copies of the Scriptures, or who perhaps could not have read them although possessed of them; but who, by hearing them often repeated, could commit them to memory, and derive great profit from them.

Even at this day the common people reap the same advantage from the concise and seemingly unconnected form in which the sacred oracles are written. For whether they read them, or hear them read, the nervous sentences and striking passages, which these divinely inspired writings abound, engrave themselves deeply in the people's minds, that they often occur to their thoughts, both as matter of consolation under the troubles of life, and as motives and rules of conduct in the various situations wherein they are placed.

The foregoing remarks on the apostle Paul's manner of writing, and the reasonings by which I have endeavoured to vindicate him for using the concise obferc style in his epistles, I have ventured to lay before the reader; because, if they are well founded, every person of taste and judgment will acknowledge that these epistles in their present form, are much better calculated for the instruction of the world, than if they had been attired in all the splendour of the Grecian eloquence, whose brightness might have dazzled the imagination of the vulgar for a little, but could neither have enlightened their understanding, nor have made any lasting impression on their heart. This I say, because it is well known to the critics, that the style in writing which is esteemed most elegant derives its chief excellence from the frequent use of metaphors and allusions, where the learned, are of no value in the eye of the illiterate, who cannot apply them to their proper counterparts. Whatever delight, therefore, such latent beauties may give to those who can unfold them, to the vulgar they are little better than a picture to a blind man; for which reason the apostle, with great propriety, hath, for the most part, neglected them.

I shall now conclude the present essay with the following observation concerning the Scriptures in general; namely, that as these writings were designed for all mankind, and were to be translated into every language, it may justly be doubted, whether, in such compositions, any great benefit could have been derived to the world from beauties which depend on a nice arrangement of words, on the rhythms and cadences of periods, and on the just application of the various figures of speech frequently introduced. Elegancies of that kind are generally lost in translations, being like those subtle essences which fly off when poured out of one vessel into another. And even though some of these delicate ornamentments may have been retained in what is called a free translation, yet, as that advantage must have been purchased often at the expense of the inspired writer's meaning, such a translation of the word of God never could have been appealed to as an infallible standard for determining controversies in religion, or for regulating men's practices; because it would have exhibited the translator's private opinion, rather than the mind of the Spirit of God. (See Gen.
Pref. page 11.) Whereas, to have the very words, as near to the original as, in which the revelations of God were originally delivered, set forth in literal translations, was the only method of extending the benefit of revelation, as an infallible rule of faith and practice, to men of all nations. The Spirit of God, therefore, wisely ordered, that the excellency of the Scriptures should consist, neither in their being written in the Attic purity of the Greek tongue, nor in their being highly ornamented with those flowers and graces of speech, whose principal virtue consists in pleasing the imagination and in tickling the ear, but in the truth and importance of the things written, and in a simplicity of style suited to the gravity of the subjects; or in such an energy of language as the grandeur of the thoughts naturally suggested. Excellencies of this sort easily pass from one language into another, while the meretricious ornaments of studied elegance, if in the least placed, as they must be when translated, wholly disap-ppear.

This being the case, I appeal to every reader of sound judgment, whether Lord Shaftesbury and the deists speak sense when they insinuate, that, because the Scriptures were not written in the Spirit of God, or not written throughout to surpass all human writings in beauty of composition, elegance of style, and harmoniousness of periods.
The sacred oracles were not designed, as works of genius, to attract the admiration of the learned, but to set before them a finished model of fine writing for their imitation; but to turn mankind from sin to God. For which purpose, a florid, or even a melodious style, were certainly of little value, in comparison of those mass solid excellences of sentiment and language, whereby the Scriptures have become the power of God unto salvation to all who believe them, and will continue to be so till the end of time. We may therefore in this, as in every other instance, affirm with our apostles, that "the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men," 1 Cor. i. 25.; and may with understanding ascribe to God, only wise, the glory that is due to him, on account of the admirable contrivance of his Word.

ESSAY IV.

On Translating the Greek Language used by the Writers of the New Testament.

In the translation of the apostolical epistles now offered to the public, important alterations are made in the meaning of many passages of Scripture, which are not supported in the notes. The author, therefore, has judged it necessary to submit to his readers a number of observations on the Greek language, and on some of its particles, as used in the inspired writings, whereby the alterations which he hath made in the translation of these writings, he hopes, will appear to be well-founded.

His remarks the author hath made in the following order:—I. On the Verbs. II. On the Voices, Modes, and Tenses of the Verb. III. On the Participles, Nouns, Pronouns, and Articles. IV. On the Particles, ranged in the order of the alphabet. The senses which he hath affixed to each particle he hath supported by passages both from the Scriptures and from the Greek classics, where they are used in these senses. And as often as in the new translation any uncommon sense is given to a Greek word, that word is inserted in the translation, that, by turning to the part of this essay where it is handled, the reader may judge whether the sense affixed to it is sufficiently warranted by its use in other passages. This method the author has adopted, to prevent the necessity of repeating the same proof on every new occasion where it might be wanted.

In examining the following remarks, the reader is desired to recollect, that the native language of the writers of the New Testament was the Hebrew, or Syro-Chaldaic.
For these authors, following the idiom of their mother tongue, naturally affixed to some of the Greek words and phrases which they have used, the sense of the corresponding Hebrew words and phrases. Hence the He-brewisms found in the New Testament, which the lesser critics have so loudly condemned, as was observed in the essay on St. Paul's style. Allowing, therefore, that the evangelists and apostles have introduced Hebrew forms of expression into their Greek writings, the following remarks ought not to be considered as ill-founded, on pretence that they are not applicable to the Greek language in its classical purity. Some critics, indeed, anxious to defend the reputation of the apostles as writers, have endeavoured to produce, from the best Greek authors, phrases similar to those in the inspired writings, which have been most blamed. But the attempt, I think, might have been spared. For although the Hebrewisms in the New Testament are fewer than some fastidious critics have supposed, the best judges have allowed that there are, in these books, words and phrases which can be called quotations from Hebræism; and not from Hebrewisms, as the following remarks will clearly evince.

N. B.—The examples from Scripture which are mark-ied with an asterisk (*), are taken from the common English version.

VERBS.

1. Active Verbs.—The Hebrews used active verbs to express the agent's design and attempt to do a thing, though the thing designed or attempted did not take place.
Exod. viii. 18. "And the magicians did so (attempted to do so) with their enchantments, to bring forth lice, but they could not." Deut. xxvii. 88. "Ye shall be sold (set to sale) and no man shall buy you." Ezek. xxiv.
13. "Because I have purged (attempted to purge) thee," namely, by instructions, reproofs, &c. "and thou wast not purged." Matt. xvii. 11. "Elias truly cometh first and restor eth all things;" that is, attempteth to restore all things. Gal. v. 4. "Whosoever of you are justified (that is, seek to be justified) by the law, ye are fallen grace." Phil. iii. 15. (Ora rancius). "As many as are saved, the grace of God is, seems to be) perfect." John i.
10. "We make him (we endeavour to make him) as Jesus also himself was." John ii. 26. "These things I have written concerning thee; that decei ve you;" that is, who endeavour to decei ve
you. See also chap. v. 10.

2. The Hebrews used active verbs to denote simply the effect of the action expressed. Isa. lxi. 1. Quaesitum sum ab ilia qui me non patefacti. In this passage genervation and gesture, according to the ordinary signification of these words, are evidently the same. And yet St. Paul, quoting the passage, rightly expresses it, Rom. v. 20.
"I was found of them that sought me not." John xvi.
5. "None of you asketh me, whither goest thou?" none of you knoweth whither I am going; for Peter had expressedly asked that question, chap. xiii. 36. 1 Cor.
viii. 19. "But thus sinning against the light, and cov-erving, and beating, that is, and hurting their weak consciences (for hurting is the effect of beating), ye sin against Christ." 1

3. Active Verbs, in some cases, were used by the Hebrews to express, not the doing of the thing said to be done, but simply the declaring that it is done, or that it shall be done. Thus, both in the Hebrew and in the Septuagint translation of Levit. xiii. 6. 8. 11. 12. 17.
20. &c., the priest is said to cleanse and to purify; but the meaning evidently is, that, after due examination, he is to declare the person_clean or polluted. Acts x. 15. 'What God hath cleansed, what God hath declared clean (εὐ πάσης mora), do not thou pollute,' that is, as our Lord saith, 'rightly to understand it, do not thou call unclean.' Isaiah vi. 10. 'Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy,' declare, or foretell, that the heart of this people is fat, &c. Accordingly, Matt. xiii. 16, where this passage is quoted, it is thus expressed: 'The heart of this people is waxed fat,' &c. Jerem. i. 9. 'I have put my word into thy mouth, 10. for the word of God passeth over the nations, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, and to build, and to plant.' I have appointed thee to declare, or prophesy, concerning the nations, that they shall be rooted out, &c. Ezek. xliii. 3. 'According to the vision which I saw when I came to destroy the city;' that is, to prophesy that it should be destroyed. Ezek. xiv. 2. 'Let the wise understand these things, and the sages perceive the teaching of them, that they judge the bloody city!' wilt thou declare that the bloody city shall be judged? This the prophet accordingly did in the subsequent part of the chapter, particularly ver. 14, 15, 16. Matt. xix. 58. 'Ye who have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory (when, after his resurrection, he shall sit in the right hand of God), ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, by inspiration, ye shall publish laws for the government of all the members of the visible church on earth, and, by authority derived from me, ye shall declare, that all shall be judged by these laws at the last day. 1 Cor. v. 2. 'Do ye not know that the saints judge the world?' Do ye not know that the inspired preachers of the gospel declare that the world is to be judged by God's own laws, by the laws by which it is to be judged! Ver. 3. 'Do ye not know that we judge angels?' That in the gospel which we preach, we declare the judgment and punishment of the evil angels! 4. Active Verbs were used by the Hebrews to express, not the doing, but the permission of the thing which the subject is said to do: Gen. xxxi. 7. Jacob says of Laban, 'God did not give him (did not permit him) to hurt me.' Exod. xvi. 22. 'Lord, therefore hast thou so evil entreated this people!' whereas hast thou permitted them to be so evil entreated! Psalm xvi. 10. 'Thou wilt not (give, that is) suffer thing Holy One to see corruption.' Psalm lxxxvi. 13. 'So I gave them up unto them and their own destruction,' &c. from their own strong forts; as is plain from God's adding, ver. 13. 'Or that my people had hearkened to me,' &c.; for that wish God could not have expressed, if, by any positive influence, he had given them, &c. Jerem. iv. 10. 'Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people!' (there had suffered this people to be greatly deceived.) 'The false prophets,' saying, ye shall have peace!' Ezek. xiv. 9. 'If the prophet be deceived when he saith spoken a thing, the Lord have deceived that prophet!' I have permitted him to deceive himself. Ezek. xix. 25. 'I gave them also statutes that were not good!' I permitted them to follow the wicked statutes of the neighbouring nations, mentioned Levith. xvii. 8. Matt. xix. 13. 'Lest hap no man (suffer us not) be led into temptation.' Le Clerc, Anc. Cr. vol. i. p. 357, has shown, that Homer, in the same sense, describes the evil actions of men to God. Matt. xix. 25. 'I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast hid (hast not revealed) these things.' &c. Matt. xiii. 11. 'To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom, but to them it is not given.' Y. Acts x. 10. 'Let not them that be not accustomed translatily to the scripture, judge them not to know them. Mark v. 12. 'Send us into the swine; suffer us to go, &c. Acts xiii. 29. 'When they (the Jewish rulers who crucified Jesus) had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the cross, and laid him in a sepulchre;' they permitted him to be taken down, and laid in a sepulchre; for it was Joseph and Nicodemos, two of Christ's disciples, who took him down and buried him. Rom. i. 24. 'God gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts! God permitted them to fall into uncleanness, through their own strong lusts. Rom. i. 18. 'Who was hereafter hardened?' He permitted to be hardened. Rom. xi. 7. 'The rest were blinded;!' were permitted to become blind. 8. 'According to what is written, God hath given them a spirit of slumber;' hath permitted them to fall asleep. 2 Thess. ii. 11. 'For this cause God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie.' God shall permit strong delusion to beset them, so that they shall believe a lie. Rev. i. 9. 'And to them was given power.' xiii. 5. 'And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies.' 5. Active Verbs are used to express, not the doing, but the giving an occasion of doing a thing: Gen. xxi. 30. 'If mischief befall him by the way, then shall ye bring down (ye shall be the occasion of bringing down) my gray hairs.' 1 Kings xiv. 16. 'Jeroboam made Israel to sin;' occasioned the people to sin, by setting up the calves. Acts i. 38. 'This man (Judas) purchased a field with the reward of iniquity;' that is, occasioned it to be purchased; as is plain from Matt. xxvii. 7. 6. Active Verbs sometimes denote the continuation of the action which they express. —1 John v. 18. 'These things I have written to you who believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may believe on the name (that is, continue to believe on the name) of the Son of God.' 7. NUPER AND INTRANSITIVE VERBS. —The writers of the New Testament use active and intransitive verbs to denote actions whose objects are things indifferent. Thus, the intransitive verb αὐσπιστεύω, which signifies to rise or spring up, is used transitively, Matt. iv. 45. (αὐσπιστεύω) 'He maketh his sun to rise.' So αὐσπιστευέται, I rise, John vi. 54. αὐσπιστεύεται, I will cause him to rise, 'I will raise him.' 1 Cor. ili. 6. 'But God (αὐσπιστεύω) hath made to grow.' 1 Cor. iv. 15. 'Mark ye not who maketh thee to differ?' Matt. v. 29. 'If thy right eye (αὐσπιστεύουσα) cause thee to offend;'' many transl. Matt. viii. 16. 'Whose (αὐσπιστεύω) shall cause one of these little ones to offend.' 1 Cor. viii. 13. 'If most (αὐσπιστεύουσα) maketh my brother to offend.' In like manner, αὐσπιστεύω, which signifies to know, is used, I think, transitively in the following passage: 'For any man love God, (αὐσπιστεύει) he is made to know (he is taught) by him;' as is plain from ver. 3. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. (αὐσπιστευόμενος) 'I shall be made to know, even as I am known.' Gal. iv. 9. 'But now knowing God, or rather (γνωστὸς εἰς ὑμᾶς) being made to know (being instructed) by God.' 2 Tim. ii. 19. 'The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord (αὐσπιστευόμενος ἡμῶν) maketh them known who are his.' Numb. xv. 8. 'To-morrow the Lord will show (Heb. γνωστός, i. e. make known) who are his.' Edom, which signifies to know, is likewise used transitively, 1 Cor. ii. 2. (v. ἐστιν) αὐσπιστεύει γνώσις τοῦ Κρίτου. 'For I determined to make known (to preach) nothing among you but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.' Mark xii. 32. 'But of that day and that hour (ὅτι σταυρωθή) no man knoweth,' (that is, maketh known), 'not even the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father;' neither man, nor angel, nor the Son, is allowed to make known when that day will happen, the Father having reserved that discovery to himself. Acts i. 7. In the same manner, ἐμπροσθότης also is used transitively in the New Testament, 1 Cor. i. 24. 'I give thanks to God, who at all times (ἐμπροσθότης) causeth us to triumph.' And ἐπιστευσε, 3 Cor. i. 6. 'God is able (ἐπιστευσε) to make every gra abound in you."—Eph. i. 8. 'According to the riches of his grace, which (επεφάνεσα) he hath made to overflow in us.' 1 Thess. iii. 12. 'And the Lord (της κατακλησεως) causes you to abound and overflow in love.'

Voices, Moods, Tenses, and Numbers of the Verb.

8. Voice.—Barta tells us, that the active is put for the passive, 1 Pet. ii. 6. 'Wherefore also (ερχομαι for ἐρχομένοι) it is contained in the Scripture.' Accordingly, the first Syriac translation hath Dictastin in Scripturam. But this change of the voice is singular. Eusebius observes, that some verbs in the middle voice have only a passive signification, and others an active, and others both significations. When verbs in the middle voice are used actively, they commonly express the agent's performing the action on himself. Heb. x. 38. 'The just by faith shall live, (και ἀπέδεικται αὐτοῖς) but if he withdraw himself.' Examples of verbs in the middle voice, which have a passive signification, are—Luke ii. 6. αὐτον ἐπισκέψομαι, 'to be examined by him.' 1 Cor. x. 3. 'And all (καὶ ἐκκλησίαι) were baptized into Moses.'

9. Moods.—As the Hebrew language hath no subjunctive mode, the indicative is often put for the subjunctive.—1 Cor. iv. 6. 'That none of you (οἱ καταλαμβάνετε γινομασθήτωσι) may be puffed up.' 1 Cor. xv. 12. 'If it be preached that Christ was raised,' etc. (και ἐπεφώνησεν) how can one suppose, you say?' vs. 30. 'But of that which is sown (οἱ καταλαμβάνετε γεμιζομαι) how can the dead be raised and with what body do they come?' vs. 60. 'Neither (καὶ διατετάρατος εἰς) corruption inherit incorruption.' Gal. iv. 17. (σὺ δὲ ἐγώ ἐρωτήσομαι γινεσθήτωσι) 'That ye may anxiously love them.'—On the other hand, the subjunctive mode hath often the sense of the indicative. Mark xii. 11. (καὶ ἀφιέρωμα γίνεσθε γινεσθήτωσι) which he was not made to stammer.' John xvi. 8. 'By this is my Father glorified (καὶ γίνεσθε γινεσθήτωσι) when ye bear much fruit.' 1 Cor. vi. 4. (καὶ διατετάρατος εἰς) 'When ye have secular seats of judgment.' 1 Cor. xv. 25. 'Until (ἐν) he hath put all enemies under his feet.' James iv. 13. 'Today or to-morrow (εἰς ἕως) for ἐρχομένοι we will go.' Ver. 16. 'If the Lord will (καὶ διατετάρατος εἰς) we shall live.'

The imperative is sometimes used for the indicative.—Thus, Psalm xxxii. 8. what is in the Hebrew Roll, or trust thou, &c. is translated by the LXX. 'He trusted in the Lord and it is so quoted Matt. xxvi. 43. The imperative is used for the future, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. 'Let him that considereth the round of the firmament.' The infinitive mode was used by the Hebrews for the word, in any of its moods and tenses.—Luke ii. 3. 'Neither (εἰς ἐκκλησίαι) have two coats.' Rom. xii. 15. (γίνεσθε) 'Rejoice with them that rejoice.' Phil. iii. 15. (συνελπίζεσθαι) 'Let us walk by the same rule.' 2 Cor. x. 9. 'Beast (εἰς ἐκκλησίαι) as if I would terrify you.' The infinitive, with the article prefixed, is used for the substantive noun. Heb. ii. 16. 'And who (ἐπεφώνησεν τοις) through all their life.' Heb. iii. 15. (τοις γίνεσθαι γινεσθήτωσι) 'By the saying, To-day,' &c. In this form the article is sometimes omitted. Heb. iv. 1. 'A promise being left (ἀκολουθεῖν το οὐ) of entering.' The Latins likewise said ætus amnis, for scientia tua.

10. Tenses.—As the Hebrew verb hath only two tenses, the preterite and future, these two, with the participles, supply the place of all the rest. Hence the Jews, in writing Greek, give to the preterite and future tenses of Greek verbs all the variety of signification which these tenses have in the Hebrew.

To begin with the preterite tenses, they denote in the Greek the action of state expressed by the verb.—Rom. v. 2. 'This great wherein (εἰς, e have stood) ye continue to stand.' 1 Cor. i. 10. 'In whom (ἐρχομαι) we have trusted, and continue to trust.' Heb. x. 11. 'And every high priest (συνελπίζεσθαι) doth make daily, etc. that is, continueth daily to stand. James i. 20. 'He beholdeth himself, and (καὶ διατετάρατος) goeth his way.' The preterite tenses, therefore, must, in some instances, be translated in the signification of the present. In this observation I am supported by many, who thus write on Rom. ix. 19. Μοναστικά μεν ένας νόμος ευδοκίας γεγονέναι (καὶ διατετάρατος) habent pretiositas significationem. We may therefore translate John xx. 17. thus: 'Hold me not, (εἰς ἕως) for I do not yet ascend.' I am to remain a while on earth. The preterite tenses, especially in the prophetic writings, are used for the future, to shew the absolute certainty of the things spoken of. Thus, Rom. viii. 30. The called are represented as already justified, and even glorified. Eph. ii. 6. Believers are said to be already raised from the dead. Heb. ii. 7. (ἐκκλησίαι, thou hast made) 'Thou wilt make him for little while less than angels.' For this was spoken long before the Son of God was made man. Heb. iii. 14. (καὶ διατετάρατος) shall have made) 'We shall be made perfect by Christ, if we hold,' &c. Wherefore, Heb. xii. 22. (καὶ διατετάρατος) may be translated, 'But ye shall come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.'

11. The aorist tenses sometimes denote the past action or state contained of the present time; and therefore they may be translated right away, without reference to the Greek. 'Thou art my beloved Son, (πώς έγίνεσθαι) in whom I am well pleased,' that is, have always been well pleased, am at present well pleased, and will continue to be well pleased. Mark xvi. 18. 'Was taken up into heaven,' (εἰς ἔρωμα καὶ διατετάρατος) and sat down (and continues to sit) at the right hand of God.' Matt. xxiii. 3. 'The Scribes and Pharisees, who sit in Moses' seat.'

The aorist is used sometimes for the preterperfect tense; that is, it denotes an action completed some time ago.—Matt. xiv. 3. 'Now Herod (ἐκκλησίαι) having laid hold on John (ἐκκλησίαι) bound him.' John xvii. 24. 'Now (εἰς ἕως) have sent him bound to Caiaphas.' John xli. 2. (καὶ διατετάρατος) who acquainted,' i. e. who had formerly acquainted. Blackwall, Soc. Cl. vol. ii. page 298, observes that the first and second aorists in the potential and subjunctive modes (which are futures too) are often, in sacred and common writers, equivalent to the future of the indicative. Thus εἰς ἔρωμα is used in the sense of εἰς ἔρωμα. Mark ii. 20. 'The days will come (καὶ διατετάρατος) when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them and they shall mourn, and they that look on the bridegroom shall gaze at him (καὶ διατετάρατος) 'But if I shall go, I will send him to you.'

12. The present tense is sometimes put for the preterite.—Acts ix. 56. 'They were all afraid of him, not believing (ἐκκλησίαι τοις) that he was a disciple.' Phil. ii. 20. 'Having the same conflict (καὶ διατετάρατος) which ye see which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.' Mark xv. 33. (καὶ διατετάρατος) he remained. 'He remained a priest in all his life.' Ver. 8. 'One testified of (καὶ διατετάρατος, that he lived) that he lived;' namely, a priest all his life.

The present tense is often put for the future, to shew that the thing spoken of shall as certainly happen, as if it were already present. Matt. iii. 10. 'Every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit (γίνεσθαι) is cut down.' Mark iv. 11. (καὶ διατετάρατος) is delivered shall be delivered into the hands of men.' 1 Cor. x. 5. (καὶ διατετάρατος) By which also (ἐκκλησίαι) ye are saved shall be saved.' Ver. 12. 'How say some among you (καὶ διατετάρατος) that there is no resurrection of the dead?' James v. 2. 'And (καὶ διατετάρατος) eateth shall eat his flesh.' 2 Pet. iii. 11. 'Seeing all things (καὶ διατετάρατος) are for the most part dissolved shall be dissolved.' Ver. 12. 'And the elements (καὶ διατετάρατος) shall be melted.'
The present tense is sometimes past for the imperfect.—Gal. ii. 16. ‘Seeing that (κεκατεχθέντο, they do not walk) they did not walk uprightly.’ On the other hand, the imperfect of the indicative is put for the present. John i. 15. (καθ' εὐρύτερον, this was) ‘This is he of whom I spake.’

13. The future of the indicative is often, in the writings of the Hebrews, used for the most probable imperative. See the dialogue.—1 Cor. v. 13. ‘Therefore (οὖν, ye shall put away) put away from among yourselves that wicked person.’ 1 Tim. vi. 8. (αὐθεντοῦχος, we will be content) ‘Let ye be content.’

The future of the indicative is sometimes used for the present and imperfect of the subjunctive.—Matt. xxi. 21. ‘All manner of sin and blasphemy (αὐθεντώρια, shall be forgiven) may be forgiven.’ Luke vi. 7. (δὲ ἀδίκητον, whether he will heal) ‘Whether he would heal on the Sabbath.’ The participles of the present, and of the imperfect tenses, are sometimes used for the preterite. John iii. 13. ‘No man hath ascended into heaven, but the Son of Man (ἰς αὐτόν, who is) who is in heaven.

And John and Paul, and, especially, the sacred writers, were to render their discourses more emphatical, or more general, sometimes change the number and person of the verb.—Gal. vi. 1. ‘Ye which are spiritual ought to restore such an one in the spirit of meekness (αὐθεντικὸν αὐθεντικόν, considering thyself).’ 1 Tim. ii. 15. ‘She shall be saved through child-bearing (κεκατεχθέντο, they do)’ If they live in faith, &c., by this change, they are directed to consider Eve as the representative of the whole sex. She and all her daughters shall be saved, if they live in faith, &c.

Participles, Nomina, Pronomina, Articles.

15. Participles.—The English participles generally have a casual signification; that is, they express a reason for something which goes before, or which follows in the discourse.—Thus, Rom. vi. 8. ‘We believe that we shall also live with him.’ 2. Knowing that Christ being raised (that is, because we know that Christ being raised) dieth no more. But as the Greek participles are often used, when no reason is expressed, in such cases, if they are translated by the corresponding English participles, the idea of a connection, which does not exist in the text, will be conveyed. Of this, see examples in the common version, Rom. vi. 5, 6; 2 Cor. x. 5, 6; Eph. v. 16; Col. i. 10. In such cases, it is better to translate the participles by the parts of the verb for which they are used. For example, if a son have been crucified for the sins of his father, we say, ‘The son was crucified for the sins of his father.’ If we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. 6. Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. But these verses ought to be translated unconnectedly in the following manner: 5. ‘For seeing we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (καθ' αὐτόν) certainly we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. 6. Ye know this also, that our old man is crucified together with him, &c. In like manner, 2 Cor. x. 4. is thus rendered: ‘For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strong holds. 5. Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. 6. And having in readiness to revenge, &c. But the following is a more just translation: ‘We overthrew reasonings, and every high thing raised up against the knowledge of Christ, and lead captive every thought to the obeisance of Christ. 6. And have in readiness to punish,’ &c. See also Ephes. v. 19, 20, 21.

16. The Greek participles have an adverbial sense, and therefore, to translate them properly, the word though, or although, must be joined to them. Thus, 1 Cor. ix. 19. ‘For (καθ’ αὐτόν) though I be free from all men.’ 2 Cor. viii. 9. ‘Παρέχομεν δὲ, ‘Though he was rich.’ 2 Cor. x. 3. ‘For (ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ τούτῳ) though we walk in the flesh.’ Gal. iv. 1. ‘The heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a bond-man, (ὁμοιότατος) though he be Lord of all.’ 1 Pet. i. 6. ‘On which account ye rejoice (ὑπενθυμίζομεν, although for a little while still ye are made sorry,’ Ver. 8. ἐν τῷ πόρῳ μιᾷ ἑρμηνείᾳ, ‘On whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing.’ 1 Thess. ii. 6. ἀλλάζουσιν εἰς συνείσαρσιν, ‘Though we might have been burdensome.’ In all these passages our translators have rightly supplied the word though, as included in the participle.

Supply the same word in the translation of the following passages, and it will throw great light on them.—Luke x. 32. ‘Likewise a Levite (ἡμών’ ἔστω τῆς ἀθανασίας, ὁ δὲ ἀποκαθιστήσω) being near the place, though he came and saw, passed by on the other side.’ Rom. i. 30. ‘Because (καθ' αὐτόν, though they knew God, and they did not glorify him,’ 1 Tim. iii. 14. ‘These things I write to thee, (ἐκείνως, though I hope to come to thee soon.’

The Greek participles, by means of the verb ἐμετρήσατο understood, are used for any part of the verb which are the participles.—Thus, Rom. v. 11. ἐμετρήσατο, ‘But we boast in God.’ Rom. xii. 18. ὑπεκούσατεν γὰρ τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, ‘Be of the same mind one towards another.’ Philip. iii. 4. Καὶ τὸ τρέχω, ‘Though I might also have confidence.’ 1 Tim. v. 13. ἐναρκύσατε τω ἐνδοκότι παντελῶς παντελῶς παρακολουθήσατε, ‘At the same time being also idle, they learn to wander about.’ This is the Vulgate translation. Col. i. 22. ἐπισκόπατον, ‘Ye are buried with him.’ 1 Pet. ii. 18. ὑπεκούσατεν ἀδελφοί (ὑπεκόουσατο, you were subject to your masters.’ 1 Pet. iii. 7. ‘In like manner, ye husbands (ὑπεκόουσατο) dwell with them.’ In other instances, the substantive verb is expressed: Eph. v. 5. τὸ τεκνίσατε, ὑπεκόουσατο, ‘For this ye know.’ See also Heb. ii. 13. Our translators, however, forgetting this use of the Greek participles, have, in many other instances, translated them literally, and established a connection in the discourse, which mars the sense, and renders the apostle’s language perfectly ungrammatical.

Participles are sometimes put for the correspondent substantivae nouns.—Herod. L. I. init. ὑπεκούσατο μετέχειν (for τῷ μετέχειν), ‘To the emperor Marcus Aurelius.’ But if we were to render this ‘to the emperor Marcus (ὑπεκόουσατο) he subject to your masters.’

For this we know.” See also Heb. ii. 13. Our translators, however, forgetting this use of the Greek participles, have, in many other instances, translated them literally, and established a connection in the discourse, which mars the sense, and renders the apostle’s language perfectly ungrammatical.

Participles are sometimes put for the correspondent substantivae nouns.—Herod. L. I. init. ὑπεκούσατο μετέχειν (for τῷ μετέχειν), ‘To the emperor Marcus Aurelius’ rule, which you have spoken to you the word.’ But, to two of these translations, it is objected, that the article is wanting. Nevertheless, in the following passage, the participle without the article is put for the substantive noun. Gal. iv. 24. ‘Ἄνεφος ἐπὶ αὐθεντοῦχον, ‘which things are an allegory.’

17. Substantivae Nouns.—The sacred writers sometimes use substantivae nouns for adjectives—Thus, circumcision and uncircumcision signify circumcised and uncircumcised persons; anathema, excommunication, is an excommuniucated person. 1 Cor. xiv. 13. ‘So also ye, seeing ye are earnestly desirous (ὑπεκούσατο, for ὑπεκούσατο) of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may abound for the building of the church.’ Ver. 23. There are a little while still ye are made sorry, &c. ‘The spiritus (for the spiritual gifts) of the prophets are subject. Gal. i. 14. ‘More exceedingly (ὅστατο, a zealot) zeal one.’ 1 John v. 6. ‘Because the spirit is (ἡ μέγα ἐπικούσα, the truth, that is) true.’
PRELIMINARY ESSAYS

EYAT IV.

18. Sometimes in Scripture, when one substantive γεύσεται another, the latter must be translated as an adjective.—Luke xxvii. 6. 'Hear what (μακράν) the unjust judge saith.' Rom. vi. 4. 'Walk in (σκοτεινὸς ἡμᾶς) a new life.' Rom. viii. 3: Πεπληρωμένης τοῦ κόσμου, 'The sinful passions.' Rom. viii. 8. In the likeness (μορφὴν κοσμίου, of the flesh of sin) of sinful flesh. 17. φίλως φίλως 'the body shell.' Body 22. 'The body of his flesh,' his shelly body. Col. i. 18. 'Puffed up by (παχύς παχύς) his shelly mind.' Col. iii. 9. 'Bond of perfectness.' Eph. vi. 15. 'Against the στρογγυλόν της ψυχής, spiritual things of wickedness' wicked spirits. Heb. ix. 15. 'Receive the promise of the eternal inheritance,' the promised eternal inheritance. 1 John i. 1. 'Have handled (κατὰ τὸν κόσμον, concerning the word of life) concerning the living word.' Accordingly it is added, ver. 3. 'And the life (namely, of the word) was manifested.'

Sometimes when one substantive γεύσεται another, the latter must be translated in opposition, as it is called, that is, in the way of any. Matt. xii. 17. 'The knowledge of the knowledge of good and evil; the tree of the knowledge of good, which is evil, that is, the tree of the knowledge of a pleasure which is evil.' 2 Cor. v. 1. 'When our earthly house (τὸ θάνατος, of the tent), which is a tent.' 2 Pet. ii. 1. 'Who shall bring in (ἀπειρών) heresies of destruction' heresies which occasion destruction. 19. When one substantive is joined to another by a conjunction, the one must be translated as governing the other.—Dan. iii. 7. All the people, the nations, and the languages; that is, 'people of all nations and languages.' Matt. iv. 16. 'The region and shadow of death.' 2 Cor. iii. 4. 'The hope and resurrection of the dead.' The hope of the resurrection of the dead. In other instances, the substantives so joined must be translated as adjectives. John xiv. 16. 'I am the way, the truth, and the life.' I am the true and living way. Col. ii. 8. 'Spying out (διὰ τοῦ καταστάσεως εἰς καταστάσεις, through philosophy and false devices) through a false and deceitful philosophy.' 2 Tim. iv. 1. 'Not brought (life and immortality) immortal life to light.' This idiom is found in the Latin language likewise: Pateris libanum et aurei, i.e. aureis pateris, golden cups.

20. ADJECTIVE Nouns.—The neuter adjective is sometimes put for its corresponding substantive.—Rom. ii. 4. 'Not knowing (ἐκ τοῦ γενοῦς, the good thing) the goodness of God.' See also 2 Cor. viii. 8. Philip. iv. 6. Heb. vi. 17. Sometimes the neuter adjective is put for the masculine and feminine jointly. John vii. 39. 'All that the Father giveth me.' 1 Cor. vi. 11. Καὶ τῶν, 'And such were some of you.' 1 Cor. xi. 13. 'As the woman is from the man, so also the man is by the woman; but (εἰσερχέται) all,' that is, both man and woman, of God.

21. Genders of nouns.—The masculine is sometimes put for the feminine, even by classical authors. Of this Blackwall hath produced examples. Sec. Cl. vol. i. p. 85. Wherefore, Acts xiii. 38. άνάπαυσα, though masculine, denotes the woman who washed the dead body of Dorcas. Participles and adjectives sometimes take the gender, not of the substantive noun that is expressed, but of one that is tantamount, and which is understood. Mark. ix. 20. Καὶ ἤλυτος ἐλπίζω τῇ προφητείᾳ: 'And the spirit seeing him, straightway bare him.' Here the word agreeing with ὑπὸ is not ἐλπίζω, but ἐλπίζω understood. See pronouns, No. 5.

22. NUMBERS of nouns.—A noun in the singular number is sometimes used for its plural.—1 Cor. vi. 51. 'On who shall be able to judge (πᾶν μὴν τοῦ ἄνθρωπον) between his brethren.' 2 Cor. xii. 28. 'Dangers in (the city) cities, dangers in (the wilderness) wildernesses.'

On the other hand, the sacred writers, to aggrandize the subjects of which they treat, use plural nouns, though the things which they denote are naturally singular.—Mark xvi. 19. 'Sate down (σε ἐδράς) at the right hands.' 1 Thess. v. 1. 'However concerning (τὸν χρόνον τὰς σκηνὰς, the times and seasons) the time and seasons,' namely, of Christ's appearing. See also 1 Tim. vi. 15. Tit. i. 3. Heb. xii. 23. 'But the heavenly holy places (ἀγίατον οὐρανών, with better sacrifices) with a better sacrifice.' For Christ offered only one sacrifice for sin. Heb. x. 26. 'He who deepened Moses' law died without (σαρκίσας, mercies) mercy.' Matt. xxvi. 7. 'And brought the ass and the colt, and set him (εἰς κολυμμάτος) upon it,' the colt. Le Clerc, Ars Crit. vol. i. p. 383. hath given examples from Homer of the same anomaly. If this change of the number is admitted in that famous text, 1 Cor. xv. 26. as some commentators propose, it will afford an easy interpretation of a passage ought to be conceivable otherwise very difficult: 'Else what shall they do who are baptized (όσον γενέσθαι) for the dead man? for Christ who was put to death by the Jewish rulers.

23. CASES of nouns.—Blackwall (Sec. Cl. vol. i. b. i. c. 2.) remarks, that grammarians think the genitive the only case that can be put absolutely; but the accusative often, and the dative sometimes, are absolute in the Greek.

For examples.—Mark xix. 28. EsS passionate. This observation, Blackwall says, will clear many passages from the charge of solecism, and account for several various readings occasioned by the ignorance of copyists.

The genitive absolute in the Greek, answering to the ablative absolute in the Latin, hath often a casell significati, and ought to be so understood.—Oal. iii. 25. Es δίκαιον δίκαιου, 'But faith (the gospel) being come, that is, because faith is come, we are no longer under the pedagogue.'

24. It is of importance to observe, that, in the Greek language, nouns in the genitive case sometimes express the object, and sometimes the agent; and therefore, in the translation of the Scriptures, these uses of the genitive should be rigorously observed. Of the genitive absolute, the object, the following are examples:—Matt. i. 22. 'The gospel (or good news, the διαστασία) concerning the kingdom.' Matt. x. 1. 'Power (πάντως τῆς διαστασίας) over unclean spirits,' namely, to cast them out. Acts iv. 9. 'If we this day be examined (ἐν γένεσθαις, the accusative and genitive) concerning the good deed of the impotent man; that is, concerning the good deed of the impotent man. Rom. xvi. 15. ἐπαινοῦμας, 'The preaching concerning Jesus.' 2 Cor. i. 6. 'For (ἐν σαρκίσοντας τῷ Χριστῷ) the sufferings for Christ.' Eph. iii. 1. 'Paul (ἐν ἐκπίπτεις τῷ Χριστῷ) the prisoner for Christ.' 1 Tim. iv. 1. ἀκολουθοῦμεν ἰδίους, 'Doctrines concerning demons.' Rev. ii. 13. And have not retained (κατὰ μνήμην) the faith concerning me:' or it may be translated as the genitive of the agent, the faith which we retain.'

25. Of the genitive of the agent, the following are examples.—Luke i. 16. Ἑκείνη, 'A horn which worketh salvation.' John vi. 23. 'This is the work of God,' the work which God enjoins. Rom. iii. 23. 'Faith of Jesus; the faith which Jesus requires.' 2 Cor. iv. 10. 'Always carrying about in the body (πεφυγμένον τῷ πεφυγμένον) the mortification of the Lord Jesus; the mortification which the Lord Jesus requires or practised.' Eph. iv. 18. Παραληπτόμεθα τῷ Θεῷ, 'Being taken away from the life which God commands.' Col. i. 24. 'And fill up the remnant of the afflictions of Christ, the remainder of the afflictions which Christ hath enjoineth thee.'
Preliminary Essays.

1 Tim. iii. 14. 'Hoping to come to thee (εὐπροσόμετο) shortly,' or soon. 2 Tim. i. 18. 'And in how many things he ministered to me in Ephesus, thou knowest (χειροσ., better) well.'

Sometimes the comparative is put for the superlative. 1 Cor. xiii. 8. Μεγίστον ὁ ἁγίος, 'But the (greatest) greatest of these is charity.' 1 Cor. xv. 9. 'We are of all men (μακρασεροί, more) most miserable.'

30. Idiomatical nouns are words used by the Hebrews in a sense peculiar to themselves. Of these the following are examples.

Abba, when applied to God, or to Christ, signifies 'dear and willing.' Rom. iv. 21. 'Fully persuaded, that what was promised, he was able and willing even to perform.' Rom. xi. 28. 'For God is (ἀσφαλές) able and willing to graft them in.' See also Rom. iv. 4; xvi. 24. Heb. ii. 15.

31. All is often used in a restricted sense for the greatest part. 1 Cor. viii. 1. 'We all have knowledge;' that is, the greatest part of us: for it is said, ver. 17. 'There is not in every man that knowle'dge.' 1 Cor. xi. 9. 'That ye remember me in all things;' that is, most things. For they had not obeyed the apostle's precepts concerning the Lord's supper. 1 Cor. xvi. 51. 'We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed;' that is, many of us shall be changed.

All sometimes means the greatest degree of the quality to which it is applied. 1 Cor. xiii. 2. 'All knowledge, all faith, signify the greatest knowledge and faith.' Col. i. 9. 'All wisdom and spiritual understanding.' 1 Tim. i. 18. 'Show all long-suffering.' James i. 2. 'Count it all joy.'

All signifies some of every kind. Matt. iv. 23. Acts x. 25. 'If I had not come and spoken to them, they had not had sin;' so much sin. 1 Cor. iii. 7. 'So neither the plante'r is anything, nor the grower, but God that groweth.' Their influence is nothing in comparison of God's. 1 Cor. i. 7. 'For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel;' Christ sent me to preach the gospel rather than to baptize. Col. iii. 2. 'Set your affections on things above, and not on things on the earth.'

32. Answer was applied by the Hebrews to any kind of speech. It may therefore be translated according to the nature of the speech to which it is applied. Matt. xvi. 26. 'At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father,' &c.: At that time Jesus prayed and said, &c. Mark xii. 36. 'At that time Jesus answered and said, while he taught in the temple, How say the scribes that Elias, &c.: Jesus asked and said. 2 Cor. i. 9. 'We had (ἐπιμέλεια, the answer) the sentence of death in ourselves.'

33. A blessing signifies a gift. 1 Sam. xxv. 37. 'This blessing (gift) which thine hand-maid hath brought.' Rom. xvi. 23. 'Come with the fulness of the blessing of the gospel.' 3 Cor. vi. 5. 'That you would go on unto you, and complete your beforehand your before-mentioned blessing;' that is, gift of God. 1 John iii. 16.

34. Bowels. By this word the Hebrews expressed the tenderest affection, and the greatest vehemence of desire; because tender affection, especially love mixed with pity, occasions a commotion and noise in the bowels. Hence the expression, Isa. lxii. 15. 'Sounding of the bowels.' 2 Cor. vii. 5. 'Τὰ χείλεσσ' χεριῶν, (his bowels). His inward affection.' Phil. ii. 1. 'If any bowels and mercies.' Philem. ver. 20. ἀμαρωτὸν τα ἐπιμελείας, 'Quiet my bowels.'

35. Bread signifies the whole provision of the table. 2 Sam. ix. 7. 'Thee shalt eat bread continually at my table.' Matt. vi. 3. 'Command that this stone be made bread.' Luke x. 46. 'He that is least among you all shall be great.' Mark xiv. 46. 'He goeth straightway to him, and saith, Master, Master;' that is, most excellent master.

36. Called. To be called often signifies to be simply. 1 John iii. 1. 'That we should be called the sons of God;' that we should be the sons of God. Sometimes called means held, acknowledged, accounted.

37. Children, Sons, joined with a quality, denote an high degree of that quality. Thus, children of light, of sobriety, of wrath, of sons of darkness, &c.—Children sometimes signify disciples; Thus, children of the prophets. Isaiah viii. 18. ' Behold I and the children,' &c. 38. Common. Because of many of the things in common. Sometimes we raw things of the law of Moses, unclean to the Jews, they used the word common to denote a thing unclean. Matt. xv. 11. Know ye of Sodom, (rendereth a man common,) 'pollutest a man.' Mark vii. 2. 'When they saw some of his disciples eat bread (samen, with common) with defiled, that is to say, with unwashed hands.' John vii. 50. 'There is no God but one; and (samen, common) unclean of itself.' Heb. x. 29. 'Counted the blood of the covenant, &c. (samen, a common) an unclean thing; the blood of an unclean or sinful person. 39. Doctrine, dodo, signifies not only the thing taught, but the action of teaching; a discourse in which things are taught. Mark iv. 2. 'Taught them many things by parables, and said unto them (samen akadov ephore) in his teaching or discourse.' The same expression is used. Mark xi. 18. xiii. 38. Acts ii. 43. 'They constantly attended on (samen akadov) the teaching of the apostles.' Titus i. 9. Know wv akadov, 'According as he hath been taught.' 1 Cor. xiv. 26. 'Each of you hath a psalm, (samen akadov) each a word of wisdom, each a doctrine.' 40. Eat. Drink. As the Hebrews represented knowledge and wisdom by meat and drink, they made use of the phrases eating and drinking, to denote the operation of the mind in receiving, understanding, and applying doctrine or instruction of any kind, so as to be strongly moved thereby. Jer. xv. 16. 'Thy words were found, and I did eat them.' Is. li. 1. 'Son of man, eat this roll, and go speak unto the house of Israel.' Consider, understand, and get this roll by heart, and then go and speak it to the house of Israel; as is evident from ver. 4. 'Speak with my words to them.' Prov. ix. 5. 'Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.' 6. Forsake the foolish and live, and go in the way of understanding.' John vi. 61. 'I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever.' Hence, bread signifies doctrine, also moral qualities, which are nourished by sound doctrine. 1 Cor. v. 8. 'The unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.' Further, to eat and drink any quality, signifies intimately to partake thereof. 1 Cor. xiv. 15. 'The grace of the Spirit.' 1 Pet. iv. 3. 'Eateth and drinketh punishment to himself.' 41. Elect, or chosen, often signifies the most excellent, the chief, the most precious, among other things of the same kind, because excellence is the reason why some things are chosen preferably to others. Thus, Exod. ii. 2. Pharaoh's chief captains are called 'his elect captains.' 2 Kings xix. 32. 'His (elect) choice first-trees.' Rom. xvi. 13. ' Rufus chosen in the Lord; that is, an excellent Christian.' 1 Tim. v. 21. 'Elected angels,' are the chief angels; in opposition both to those who are of an inferior order and to the fallen angels. 1 Pet. ii. 6. 'Behold I lay in Zion a chief cornerstone, (samen) elected, precious.' 2 John, ver. 1. 'Elected lady,' is excellent lady. Ver. 13. 'Elected sister,' is excellent sister. 42. Face is often used to signify anger. Psal. xxi. 9. xxix. 18. 'The face of the Lord is against them that do evil.' 43. Flesh, Spirit. Flesh denotes things weak; spirit things strong. Is. xxi. 3. 'The Egyptians are men, not God; the Egyptians are flesh, not spirit.' 1 Cor. i. 2. 'I could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as (cacein) to fleshly persons; persons of weak understanding in spiritual matters. 2 Cor. ii. 4. 'The weapons of our warfare are not fleshly (weak) but mighty through God.' Hence the law of Moses is called the flesh; because its rites sanctified to the purifying of the flesh only, and had no efficacy in purifying the spirit: that power was peculiar to the gospel, which therefore is called the spirit. Gal. iii. 3. 'Having begun in the spirit (the gospel), are ye now made perfect by the flesh?' by the law of Moses. Rom. vii. 6. 'For when we were in the flesh,' when we were under the law, of Moses, 'we used flesh and blood as a periphrasis for man, especially when they meant to insinuate the weakness of human nature. Gal. i. 18. 'I consulted not with flesh and blood;' I consulted not with any man. Flesh, especially in St. Paul's epistles, signifies the body with its appetites and vices, the unrestrained part of our nature. Gal. v. 16. 'Walk in the spirit,' (walking to the spiritual part of your nature), 'and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh,' (the lusts of the animal part of your nature); 'for the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh.' 44. Glory is expressed by a Hebrew word which signifies weight: Hence, 2 Cor. iv. 17. 'An exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' By this word the Hebrews denoted the perfections of God. Rom. i. 23. 'Changed the glory (the perfections, of the incorruptible God into an image.' Rom. vi. 4. 'Raised up from the dead by the glory (power) of the Father.' Ephes. iii. 16. 'According to the riches of his glory,' of his goodness. 45. To be known, signifies understood, to believe, to obey, to hearken, to grant, and to report; and therefore, in translating this word, due regard must be had to the scope of the passage where it is found. John ix. 27. 'I have told you already, (samen wv eaxeto) but ye have not believed; why desire ye (samen) to hear it again?' 1 Cor. xiv. 2. 'He that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaketh not to man, but to God; for no one (samen, heareth) understandeth him.' Gal. iv. 21. 'Ye who desire to be under the law, (samen wv eiv xen etaxato) why do ye not (hear) understand the law?' Acts ix. 7. 'The men which journeyed with him stood speechless, (samen, eaeta) hearing a voice, but seeing no man.' Acts xxii. 9. 'And they that were with me, saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but (eiv men, they heard not; for no one (samen, heareth) understandeth him.' This is an easy and proper reconciliation of these passages, which in the common method of translating the Greek word ejw, are directly contradictory to each other. 1 Cor. i. 1. 'Omen, eaxeto, It is commonly reported that the Spirit.' 46. Hearing, eaxeto, signifies not only the act of hearing, but the thing heard; a relation, a report, a name. Matt. xiv. 1. 'Herod the tetrarch heard (samen, eaxeto) of the fame of Jesus.' John xii. 38. 'Who hath believed (samen, eaxeto) our report?' 47. Heaven was used by the Hebrews to denote God, the possessor of heaven. Matt. xxii. 25. 'The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or from men?' Was it from God or from men? Luke xv. 18. 'I have sinned against heaven, and before thee;' I have sinned against God. 48. Holy, xaaro, primarily signifies that which is clear, or free from defilement. Deut. xxii. 14. 'Therefore shall thy camp be holy, that he see no unclean thing.' 49. Holy likewise signifies separated from a common to a sacred use. In this sense Aaron and his sons, the priests, are called holy; being separated from the rest of the Israelites, to minister in holy things. Also, because the Israelites were separated from the rest of mankind, and set apart for the worship of the true God, they were called holy. Deut. xxii. 2. 'Thou shalt be holy; for I the Lord thy God.' Therefore, when in the epistles the name of saint is given to a whole church, it is in the same sense in which it was given to the ancient Israelites as a nation. It does not denote holiness of life, but merely their separation from the heathens, to worship the true God, and to be his church and people, in place of the Jews; 1 Pet. ii. 9.
See Sanctify. In like manner, places and things are called holy, on account of the use to which they are destined.

Holy and holiness often denote moral purity. 1 Sam. vi. 20. 'Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?'
1 Pet. i. 15. 'As he who hath called you is holy, be ye also holy in all your conversation.'

Because the Hebrew word signifying to holy, signifies sometimes merciful, beautiful, beneficent, and is so translated in our Bibles, it may have the same meaning in some passages of the New Testament. See Titus i. 8. Heb. vii. 26.

49. Honour, in the speech of the Jews, signified maintenance. Matt. xv. 5. 'But ye say, Whosesoever shall say to his father, or his mother, whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me, is a gift to the temple.'

And shall not honour (shall not maintain) his father or his mother, shall be free.'
1 Cor. xiii. 38. 'Or one member be honoured, (nourished), all the members rejoice with it.'
1 Tim. v. 3. 'Honour widows who are really widows; that is, maintain them from the funds of the church; as is evident from the following ver. 4. Ver. 17. 'Let the elder understand who he understandeth what he saith that he saith, and who is of tender garments, a liberal maintenance.'
1 Pet. iii. 7. 'Giving honour to the wife as the weaker vessel; that is, nourishing the wife with tenderness, on account of the weakness of her body.

50. Living. The Hebrews used the word Zevig, as an epithet to denote the excellency of this thing to which it is applicable. Acts viii. 25. 'And then Zevig, and Living way.'
1 Pet. ii. 4, 5. 'Living stone.' Rev. xvi. 17. 'Living fountain; signify excellent waters, excellent oracles, &c.

51. 'Name is often put for a person, especially when the person spoken of is great, honourable, and illustrious. Ps. cv. 10. 'The name of the Lord is great;' Acts i. 15. 'The number of the names (persons) was about an hundred and twenty.' Acts iv. 10. 'Be it known unto you all—that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth—by him, doth this man stand here before you whole.'
Rev. iii. 4. 'Thou hast a few names (persons) in Sardis, who have not defiled their garments.' John xix. 6. 'I have manifested thy name (thy character and work) to the men which thou gavest.' This idiom seems to have taken rise from the circumstance of persons being known by their names.

52. Riches denotes the greatest abundance of any thing. Rom. ii. 4. 'Deepest thou the riches (the greatness) of his goodness?' Ephes. i. 7. 'According to the riches (greatness) of his glory.' Eph. i. 2. 'Who hath measured the unsearchable riches (greatness) of Christ.' Col. i. 27. 'What is the riches of the glory (what the greatness of the glory) of this mystery.'
Col. i. 2. 'All the riches of the full assurance of understanding;' the fullest assurance of knowledge.

53. To Sanctify, to make holy, to hallow, in the writings of the Hebrews, signify to cleanse a thing from these defilements which render it unfit for sacred uses. Thus, Moses is said, Exod. xix. 10. to sanctify the people, by making them 'wash their clothes,' etc. Hence, to sanctify, signifies to set a thing apart for a particular purpose; also, to fit a thing for a particular use. Jer. xii. 3. 'Prepare them for the day of slaughter;' is, in the Hebrew text. 'Sanctify them for the day of slaughter.' 1 Cor. vii. 14. 'For the unbelieving husband is sanctified to the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified to the husband.'

The husband and wife, though unbelievers, are fitted to perform their relative duties to each other, by their mutual affection. In the apostolical epistles, Christians are said to have been sanctified, because they were seperated from idolaters, and fitted to worship and obey the only true God; on which account the whole body of Christians are called saints. In like manner, those, who are fitted for heaven, are said, Heb. x. 14. to be sanctified by the one offering of Christ; they are fitted to be admitted into heaven, having received the pardon of their sins through that one offering. See Holy.

To sanctify or hallow God, is to venerate and pay respect to God, on account of the excellence of his character, and the greatness of his power and goodness. Isa. viii. 3. 'Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread.' Matt. vi. 9. 'Hallowed be thy name.'

54. Some, are, in Scripture, often denotes a great number, many. Rom. iii. 3. 'What if some have not believed!' What if the greatest part of the Jewish nation have not believed?' Rom. xi. 17. 'But if some (the greatest part) of the branches were broken off.'
1 Tim. iv. 1. 'That, in after times, some (a great number) shall apostatize from the faith.'
Heb. iii. 16. 'For some, when they heard, provoked;' The whole congregation did so, except Caleb and Joshua.

55. To speak, in the Hebrew phraseology, denotes any kind of speaking, whether in the way of affirmations, or command, or questions, or promise. Rom. iv. 5. 'Even David also (the great Meal) commanded to his son (Jesus Christ) to serve the Lord.' Jer. xviii. 7. 'At what instant I shall speak (command) concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down.' In the New Testament the words evil, and κακον, have the same significations. Matt. iv. 3. 'If thou be the Son of God, (are, speak) command that these stones be made bread.' Matt. ii. 5. 'Certainly he that went out from us have troubled you (are, speak) with precepts, subverting your souls. (are, speak) commanding you to be circumcised, to whom we gave no such commandment.'
Rom. xi. 1. Παντες εις τον θεόν εστε. 'We all, in the same manner, command thee to arise.'
Luk. vi. 46. 'Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not (are, speak) things that I command?' Acts vi. 24. 'Certain who went out from us have troubled you (are, speak) with precepts, subverting your souls. (are, speak) commanding you to be circumcised, to whom we gave no such commandment.'
Rom. xi. 1. Παντες εις τον θεόν εστε. 'We all, in the same manner, command thee to arise.'
Luk. vi. 46. 'Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not (are, speak) things that I command?' Acts vi. 24. 'Certain who went out from us have troubled you (are, speak) with precepts, subverting your souls. (are, speak) commanding you to be circumcised, to whom we gave no such commandment.'
Rom. xi. 1. 'For God (are, speak) who commanded the light to shine out of darkness.'
Rev. xiii. 14. 'Are, speaking, Commanding those who dwell on the earth, to make an image to the beast.'
Elnasar and Raphaeles have shown that the Greek writers use the word κακον in the same sense.

56. To speak, are, signifies to say, to signify with the signification with. Luk. i. 55. κακον εις εαυτον, (as he spake). He promised to our fathers.' See Heb. i. 1.

Rom. i. 9. 'Whom I serve with my spirit,' serve with the greatest zeal. Rom. viii. 15. 'Spirit of bondages, spirit of adoption;' Rom. xi. 8. 'Spirit of deep sleep,' signify the greatest degree of bondage; of fatal disposition; of stupidity.

58. Ëòk, as an epithet, denotes excellence. Luk Preliminary Essays.

Essay IV.

XVI. 11. 'The true riches,' the most excellent riches. John i. 9. 'The true light,' the most excellent light. John vi. 32. 'True bread,' the most excellent bread. Heb. viii. 2. 'The true tabernacle,' the most excellent tabernacle.

Truth signifies justice, righteousness. John iii. 21. 'He who doth (θεὶς οἰκουμενικός, true) is righteousness, cometh to the light.' 1 Cor. xiii. 7. 'Rejoice not in unrighteousness, but rejoice jointly (τυχεῖς οἰκουμενικοί, in truth, that is) in righteousness.'

Walk. One's walk denotes a continued course of action and enjoyment, either good or bad; the habitual manner in which one lives. Gen. v. 24. 'Enoch walked with God.' Rom. viii. 1. 'Who walk not after the flesh.' 2 Cor. v. 7. 'We walk by faith and not by sight.'

Word, λόγος, is a term of very extensive signification. It signifies not only reason, but speech, which is the effect of reason; reason brought forth. Hence the word often denotes the preaching of the gospel. Luke i. 2. 'Were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.' Acts vi. 2. 'It is not reason, that we should leave the word of God.' Acts xiv. 22. 'The preaching of the word of God.' Acts x. 44. 'The Holy Ghost fell on all them who heard the word,' the gospel preached at that time.

Word, λόγος, like the corresponding Hebrew noun, signifies a matter, or thing, or affair of any kind. Matt. v. 29. 'Whosoever shall put away his wife, (σαρταιταλαί, upon a word,) except for the cause of fornication.' Matt. x. 11. 'And I will give you (δι' αὐτοῦ, upon a word) one thing.' Acts x. 25. 'I ask therefore, (μετά τοῦ λόγου) for what intent (ποιμήν) ye sent for me.' Acts xix. 38. Λόγος χαίρετος, 'Have an accusation.' 1 Cor. xv. 2. 'If ye remember (οὖν αὑτόν, upon a word) in what manner,' 1 Cor. x. 38. 'For what is the sum of the law (οὖν αὐτόν, upon a word) but this one thing, that,' 1 Cor. xiv. 12. 'For as many soever speak, (οὖν αὐτόν, upon a word) let one or another speak.'

Word, λόγος, signifies likewise a command. Exod. xxviii. 8. He writes upon the tables of the law, (ἐπὶ τῶν λειτουργίων τῶν λαβόντων, the ten commandments.) John x. 28. 'If he called them gods to whom (λόγος) the command of God came.' 1 Tim. vi. 2. 'Consent not to wholesome (λόγος), words, commands, even (εὐαλλοῦς, to the words) to the commands of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

Word, λόγος, sometimes signifies a sentence of a discourse. Rom. xii. 9. 'And if there be any other commandment, it is summarized up (ἐν τῷ λόγῳ αὐτοῦ) in this sentence; namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' 1 Cor. xiv. 19. 'In the church I had rather speak (ἐν τῷ λόγῳ) five sentences with my meaning understood, than ten thousand (λογικά) sentences,' &c.

Word, λόγος, signifies a matter, or thing, of any kind. Luke ii. 19. 'Mary kept (λόγῳ τοῦ γενέσεως, all these things.'

Poxoues—The primitive substantive pronoun ἐστι, must be distinguished from the adjectival adjective ἐστι,  ὅ,  ὅς,  ὅψ,  ὅν,  ὃς, which. Matt. xiv. 17. 'Οὗτος ἐστιν, 'They say unto him.' Acts viii. 27. 'Who had come to Jerusalem to worship.' ὁτα Τιτις ὅς ὅρει ἔρημος, and he was seen many days.' Col. i. 15. 'Οὗτος ὁ Θεοῦ ἄγνωστος θεοῦ, mentioned ver. 13.) is the image of the invisible God.' Ver. 18. 'Οὗτος ὁ Θεοῦ is the beginning.' Heb. v. 6. 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek.' Ver. 7. ὁτα Τιτις ὁ Θεοῦ, 'He (Christ, mentioned ver. 5.) in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers,' &c.

The sacred writers, to give the greater emphasis to their discourse, sometimes join two relatives with an antecedent. 1 Pet. ii. 24. 'Οὗτος ἡγεμόνας ἐστιν αὐτῶν, 'Who himself bore our sins.' 1 Cor. ii. 9. 'Αὐτός, 'For τοιαύτα, 'These things eye hath not seen, &c. (καί) which God hath prepared,' &c. in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers,' &c.

The relatives, in many cases, refer not to the near, but to the remote, antecedent. Luke xv. 17. 'The power of the Lord was present to heal (ἐρχόμενος) them.' Not the pharisees, who are mentioned immediately before, but such sick people as were in the crowd. 2 Thess. ii. 8. 'Shall render ineffectual, by the brightness of his coming, (ἐν) of whom the coming is after the strong working of Satan.' Here is, of whom, refers not to the Lord, the immediate antecedent, but to the lawless one, mentioned in the first part of ver. 8.

The relative pronoun ὅς is sometimes used to denote an antecedent, not mentioned before, but which the writer is thinking of in his own mind. Thus, 2 Pet. ii. 11. ὅς, 'they are, not put for ὅς, dignities, mentioned ver. 10. but for the evil angels, of whom nothing is said. 1 John iii. 2. 'We knew that when he shall appear, we shall be like (πάντων) him; we shall be like Christ, of whom nothing is spoken before. Ver. 16. ὅμοιος, ὅς, stands for Christ, of whom there is no mention made in what goes before. Heb. ii. 7. 'Thou hast made him for a little while less than angels,' namely The Son; as is plain from ver. 8, 9. 1 Pet. iii. 14. 'He be not afraid of the terror of men.' Here the relative their hath no antecedent expressed.

The relative pronoun ὅς is sometimes used for ὅς ἐστι, ὅς ἐστιν, I myself; thou thyself; and ὅς ἐστιν, &c. Acts xiv. 8. 'By examining of whom (ἀντι καθ' ὅς) thou thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things.' Matt. xxiii. 37. Jerusalem, thou that stonest him which was sent to thee! ὅς δὲ ὅς ἐστιν, send to thyself.

When words of different genders are the antecedents, though the relative takes the gender of the masculine word, it comprehends the whole. Heb. i. 11. ἀδελφός, 'They (ἔχουσαι εἰς γὰς) shall perish.' Sometimes the relative is of a gender different from the antecedent, regarding the meaning of the antecedent rather than its form; as in the following examples, Gal. iv. 19. Col. ii. 15. 19. Of this solenism Beza has given an example from Euripides, in his note on Col. ii. 19.

The relative pronoun ὅς, ὅστις, ὅ, ὅς, called by Cleland the subjunctive article, is sometimes used for the demonstrative ὅς, ὅς, ὅς, ὅς, &c. Cleland, Grammar, 166. Of this usage in the relative pronoun we have examples in the New Testament. 1 Pet. iv. 5. 'Οὗτος ἐστιν, 'They shall give him an account to him,' &c. 1 Pet. ii. 8. 'Οὗτος, 'These stumble at the word.' Scepsas also observes, that the Greek writers use the relative in the same manner. ἦν γὰς ὅς δὲ, ὅς ἐστιν, and ὅς ἐστιν, signifies something over and above the relative. I am therefore of opinion, that, in the following passages the relative, though compounded with ὅς, is used for the demonstrative ὅς. Acts xxiii. 30. 'Ὅτε (the horsemen) going into Cesarea, and delivering the letter to the governor, presented Paul.' Acts xiv. 1. 'Ὅτε (These, namely, Ananias, the elders, and Tertullus, informed), &c. Rom. i. 25. 'Ὅτε (These men knowing the law of God, that they who do such things), &c. Rom. xvi. 4. 'Ὅτε (These persons for my life laid down their own necks.) These. i. 9. 'Ὅτε (These shall suffer.) See, however, No. 71.

The demonstrative pronoun ὅς, this, often denotes something that follows in the discourse. John vii. 52. ὅς, 'For this reason Moses, not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers.' Rom. iv. 16. ὅς, 'For this reason it is by faith, that it might be by grace.' 1 Cor. vii. 6. 'Τίτ σὺ ἐστι, &c. But this (that follows) I speak by way of advice.' 1 Cor. xi. 17. 'Τίτ σὺ, 'Now declaring this, (that follows) I praise you not, that ye come together,' &c. 1 Tim. i. 16. 'ὁτα τίτ σὺ, &c. 'For this reason Moses, not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers.' 2 Tim. i. 10. ὅς, 'For this cause, I patiently bear evil for the elect's sake, that they also may,' &c. 2 Tim. iii. i. ὅς, 'This know also, that in the last
The article is often put for the relative pronoun, in a, and must be translated, as, which. Mark xii. 26. "Beware of the scribes, (εἰς σημεία) which love to go in long clothing." Rom. ix. 6. "O σω, for εἰς σω, 'Who is over all, God blessed,' &c." Sometimes the article in this sense is understood and must be supplied. 1 Tim. iv. 2. "Through the hypocrisies of liars (εἰς σκότεινες, for εἰς σκότεινες) who are sects." 1 Pet. v. 24. "Who forbids to marry." 74. In many instances where the article is put for the relative pronoun, the substantive verb is understood, and must be supplied in the translation. 3 Cor. viii. 23. "Much more diligent upon the great trust (εἰς τούς) which he hath in you." 2 Cor. iv. 3. "That our boastings (εἰς τούς) which is concerning you." 75. Lowth, in his English grammar, page 32, observes, "That the connective parts of sentences, by which he seems relatives, propositions, and conjunctions, are the most important of all the parts of speech." He has very justly directed our attention: for it is by them chiefly that the train of thought, the course of reasoning, and the whole progress of the mind, in continued discourse of all kinds, is kept open; and on the right use of these, perspicuity, which is the first and greatest beauty of style, depends. This observation, which is perfectly just, shows, that in a translation of any discourse from one language into another, it is of the utmost importance that the meanings and powers of the connective parts thereof be properly expressed. In the Hebrew language, the connectives being few, are used with more latitude of signification than belongs to the connectives which properly correspond to them in other languages. Wherefore, in translating the books of the Old Testament, it is observed, that the authors of these books being Jews, naturally used the Greek particles and prepositions, not only in all the variety of their own significations, but in the variety also of the significations of the corresponding Hebrew particles and prepositions. And of these various significations, the one which best suits the passage in the text where the particle is found, ought to be expressed in the translation; otherwise, the inspired writer's train of thought will disappear, and the course of his reasoning be interrupted, perhaps inverted. Therefore, to lay a proper foundation for a right translation of the Scriptures, the following examples are produced, chiefly from the Scriptures themselves, to prove that the connectives must be expressed by the sacred writers in the Greek particles, by which they have connected the different parts of their discourse.

67. ἀλλὰ is sometimes used affirmatively, and must be translated yea, also, certainly. This sense of ἀλλὰ is acknowledged by Hoogeveen, who renders it by the Latin words some, tumus. Acts xix. 2. ἀλλὰ, "Indeed we have not so much as heard that the Holy Ghost is given." Rom. viii. 37. ἀλλὰ, 'Nay, in all these things.' 2 Cor. vii. 11. ἀλλὰ, Yes, what clearing of yourselves; (ἀλλὰ) yea, what indignation; (ἀλλὰ) yea, what zeal; (ἀλλὰ) yea, what revenge. In this passage, however, ἀλλὰ might better be translated also. Rom. vi. 5. 'For seeing we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (ἀλλὰ see) certainly we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection.'

68. ἀλλὰ is sometimes used by the Greeks as the first word of a discourse, and signifies, now, now indeed. Of this use of ἀλλὰ, Hoogeveen has produced examples from the best Greek writers.
Preliminary Essays.

10. And his grace which was bestowed on me, was not vain; (αξίλη) for I labored more abundantly than all of them. 2 Cor. vii. 14. 'I am not ashamed, (αξίλη) for as I spake all things,' &c. 1 Thess. iii. 2. άλλα καθιστησιν. 'For although we had before suffered.' Titus i. 15. 'But to the polluted and unfaithful nothing is pure, (αξίλη) because both their understanding,' &c. 2 Pet. i. 16. 'We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. (αξίλη) For we were eye-witnesses of his majesty.'

79. Aξίλη is used illatively, and must be translated, wherefore, therefore. Acts x. 18. 'Three men seek thee, (αξίλη) therefore arise, and get thee down.' Acts xxvi. 15. 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest, (αξίλη αριθμος) wherefore arise.' 2 Cor. viii. 19. άλλα. 'Therefore as ye abound in every thing.' Eph. v. 24. άλλα, 'Therefore as the church is subject.'

80. άλλα, Unless, except. Matt. xx. 23. 'Is not mine to give, (αξίλη εις) except to them,' &c. Mark ix. 6. 'They saw no one, (αξίλη) save Jesus only.' 2 Cor. ii. 16. 'If a certain person have grieved me, he hath not grieved me, (αξίλη εις) except by a part of you.' 2 Cor. vi. 12. 'We do not recommend ourselves to you, (αξίλη) but only give you an occasion.' 1 John ii. 27. 'Ye have no need that any one should teach you, (αξίλη αριθμος) except as the same anointeth teaching you concerning all things.'

81. άλλα, Yet, however. Rom. viii. 18. άλλα, 'Yet I say, they have not heard.' 1 Cor. iv. 4. 'I know nothing by myself, (αξίλη) yet am I not hereby justified.' 1 Cor. xii. 24. άλλα, 'However, God hath tempered the body.' 1 Cor. xiv. 20. άλλα, 'Howbeit in malice be ye children.'

82. άρη, joined with a verb, must sometimes be translated (ερχεται) certainly, without doubt. Matt. xi. 23. 'If the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, (ερχεται ας) it would certainly have remained,' &c. John iv. 10. 'If thou knewest—what it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, (ας εστιν σας πετειν) thou certainly wouldst have asked him,' &c.

83. άρη signifies of, or belonging to. Acts xvii. 12. 'But when the Jews (ας) of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul in Berea, they came thither also.'

84. άρη, For, by reason of, because. Matt. xviii. 7. 'Who hath not sinned against the kingdom of heaven.' Luke x. 3. 'Could not (ας ερχεται) for the press, because there was little of stature.' Luke xxii. 56. 'Men's hearts failing them (ας ερχεται) for fear,' by reason of fear.

85. άπα, After, in the sense of following an example. 2 Tim. i. 3. 'Whom, (ας εκκλαμενοι) after my forefathers, I serve.'

86. άπα, εις. 3 Cor. i. 14. 'Also ye have (ας εις) in part acknowledged us.'

87. άρη, properly is a particle of affirmation, and must be translated truly, certainly, indeed. Matt. xii. 38. 'Aς, Certainly the kingdom of God is come unto you.' Matt. xxiv. 46. ἀς εκείνοις, 'Who truly is a wise and faithful servant.' Luke xi. 46. άρη, 'Truly ye bear witness.' Acts viii. 29. ἀς εκείνοις. 'If, indeed, the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee.' Rom. x. 17. άρη τι πιστεύον, 'So then,' or certainly, 'faith cometh by hearing.'

88. άρη is often used interrogatively. Matt. xviii. 1. 'Saying, (τος ας) Who now is greatest in the kingdom.' Mark iv. 39. ἀς τις εκείνος, 'What manner of man is this?' Rom. vii. 25. άς εκείνοις, 'Do I myself then as a slave serve sin?'

89. άρη is also used illatively, and must be translated therefore, then. Matt. xix. 35. 'Saying, (τος ας) Who then can be saved?' &c. Act. 27. 7. ἀς, 'What therefore shall we have?' Heb. iv. 9. άς καταφυγόντως, 'There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.' Heb. xii. 8. άς, 'Then ye are better.' Rom. viii. 1. άς τις εκείνος, 'There is therefore now no condemnation.'

90. άρη is used by the Scribes and Writers of the New Testament in a great variety of senses. Most frequently it hath a causal signification, and must be translated for. Yet it does not in all cases introduce a reason for what immediately goes before, but for something more remote in the discourse.

91. άρη is used to introduce an additional reason; that is, a reason in proof of some proposition, for which a reason has already been given. In such cases the proper translation of άρη is besides, further, moreover. This use of ας occurs so frequently in Scripture that to produce examples would be superfluous. The reader, however, if he pleases, may examine Rom. i. 18. iv. 15. v. 6, 7.

92. άρη is sometimes used to introduce a reason for something spoken by the Scribes, but which being strongly impressed on his own mind, he supposes the reason offered will make it sufficiently known. Thus Pilate, speaking to the Jews, Mark xv. 14. 'Why should I crucify him?' άς καταφυγόντως, 'For what evil hath he done?' In like manner the town-clerk says to the Ephesians, Acts xix. 36. 'Ye men of Ephesus, I am as-

93. άρη is also used illatively, and must be translated wherefore, therefore. Rom. vii. 19. ἀς, 'Wherefore, as ye have presented your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity, to work iniquity, so now present your members to be servants to righteousness.' Rom. vi. 19. 'Therefore let us, having put off the old man which we did wear, (καταφυγόντως) for what man is there,' &c.

94. άρη is often a particle of affirmation, and must be translated indeed, certainly, truly. Luke xxvi. 68. άς καταφυγόντως, 'Neither indeed can they die any more.' John x. 30. 'The man answered and said to them, (καταφυγόντως) Herein truly is a wonderful thing, that ye know not him that could do these things.' Matt. xxvii. 46. άς καταφυγόντως, 'Not one of them believed his own heart.' Acts xxvi. 57. ἀς καταφυγόντως, 'What therefore let us bring them out!' 2 Cor. iv. 10. 'Does he command this wherewith for our sakes?' (τοις καταφυγόντως) For our sakes, no doubt, it was written.' 3 Cor. x. 8. ἀς καταφυγόντως, 'And although indeed I should boast somewhat more;' &c. Gal. i. 13. άς καταφυγόντως, 'Ye have heard certainly of my behaviour,' &c. 1 Thess. iv. 10. ἀς καταφυγόντως, 'And indeed ye do it,' &c. 1 Thess. xiv. 16. The LXX have inserted the particle άς καταφυγόντως, as the translation of a Hebrew word which signifies truly, indeed. See Trumm. Conedur.

95. άρη is put sometimes for έν, quod; and must be translated by the English particle that. 1 Cor. vii. 6. 'I speak this as a wise man, not as an inscription.' 7. (καταφυγόντως) that I wish all men were as I am,' 1 Cor. xiv. 51. 'Behold, I show you a mystery, (καταφυγόντως) that we shall not all sleep.' 2 Tim. ii. 11. 'True is the saying, (καταφυγόντως) that if we die with him, &c.'

96. άρη, as Phavorinus tells us, (καταφυγόντως) is put for έν; consequently it has all the different meanings of έν. Accordingly.

97. άρη is used as a copulative; so must be translated and. Acts viii. 39. 'And the census now him no more,' (καταφυγόντως) and he went on his way rejoicing.'
Preliminary Essays.

Rom. v. 19. Circumcised at Greeks, 'And as through the disbursement of one man.' Rom. xi. 3. Agape. 'Now by the grace that is given to me, I command.' Rom. xiv. 4. Give ye. 'Now, whatever things were before were written for our instruction, so, 2 Tim. ii. 11. Consider what I say, (Agape) and the Lord give you understanding.'

97.腊 is used as a term of conduct, and may be translated simply. Gal. iv. 20. Simeon. 'I could wish indeed to be present with you.' 1 John ii. 3. Kav. 'This is the true bread.' 1 Cor. xvi. 14. 'I eat, therefore, the unmarried.' or, 'I command, therefore, the unmarried.' 1 Cor. xvi. 14.腊. 'Therefore the eye cannot say to the hand.' 1 Cor. xvi. 14. 'I eat, therefore, the unmarried.' or, 'I command, therefore, the brethren.' Phil. i. 2. 'Thou therefore receive him.'

107.腊 is used as a particle of affirmation, and may be translated instead. Gal. iv. 20. Simeon. 'I could wish indeed to be present with you.' 1 John i. 3. Kav. 'This is the true bread.' 1 Cor. xvi. 13. 'And truly our fellowship.' 2 Pet. i. 3. 'Yes, I think it fit as long as I am,' &c. &c. 1 Cor. xvi. 3. 'Them will I send—to Jerusalem.' 4. (Agape) or 'If so it be that even I should go.'

109. ἐκ does not always mean 'out of,' but 'from,' 'from the.' 1 Cor. xii. 17. 'In thanks to God (ἐν χάρισι, for ἐν χάρισι ἐν χάρισι) that although ye were the slaves of sin, (ἐν χάρισι ἐν χάρισι) yet ye have obeyed from the heart,' &c.: For can any one imagine the apostle would think that God the Romans were the slaves of sin!—So also, 1 Pet. iv. 8. ἐκ θεώ ἐκ θεώς, is an elliptical expression for ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐκ θεώς, as is evident from the following clause, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ. So that the true literal translation of ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, is, 'That the elect of God, no more can be taken by men in the flesh, they might live by God in the spirit.'

110. Vetus, page 328, says, this particle, when it stands by itself, signifies 'οὐ καθαρίζομαι: Gal. ii. 3. ἀλλ' ἢ, 'However, not even Titus was with me,' &c. Ver. 5. 'To whom we gave place by subjection, (ὁδότως) not even for an hour.'

111. ἐκ properly is a particle of affirmation, but it is used likewise inclusively. 1 Cor. vi. 20. 'Ye are bought with a price; (ἐκ οὗ ἐκ οὗ) therefore glorify God with your body,' &c.

Δ. A.

112. ἐκ with an accusative, commonly, though not always, denotes the end for which a thing was done, and must be translated for an account of. Rom. iv. 25. 'And was raised again (ἐκ) for our justification.' 2 Cor. iv. 5. 'And ourselves your servants (ἐκ) on account of Jesus.' 3 Cor. viii. 8. 'I speak not this as an injunction, but (ἐκ) on account of the forwardness of others.' Heb. i. 14. 'Sent forth to minister (ἐκ) for those that shall be heirs.' 2 Tim. i. 11. 'On account of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour.' 1 Pet. i. 20. 'But manifested in these last times (ἐκ χρόνων) for you.'

113. ἐκ, with an accusative or genitive, signifies an efficient cause of any kind, and must be translated by, through. John vi. 57. 'And I live (ἐκ) by the Father.' 2 Cor. iii. 11. 'For if that which was abolished, was abolished (ἐκ) through glory.' 2 Tim. iii. 2. 'The things which thou hast heard from me (ἐκ) by many witnesses; that is, confirmed by many witnesses.' 114. ἐκ, According to, 1 Tim. iv. 14. 'The spiritual gift which is in thee, which was given thee (ἐκ) according to prophecy.'

116. ἐκ, With respect to. Rom. viii. 10. See the note on the passage.

117. ἐκ, both with a genitive and an accusative, signifies in. Mark xiv. 58. 'And (ἐκ) within (ἐκ) three days I will build another.' Acts v. 19. 'But the angel of the Lord ἐκ τοῦ ἔδρα τούτων(ἐκ) sent and opened the prison doors.' Rom. iii. 20. 'For the declaration of his righteousness, (ἐκ τοῦ ἐδρατοῦ) in passing by the sins.' Rom. xiv. 14. 'There is nothing unclean (ἐκ δυνάμεως) in itself.' 1 Cor. xiii. 13. 'We see (ἐκ δυνάμεως) in a mirror

Erw, Although. Luke i. 1. Erw, "Forasmuch as (although) many have taken hand to write," &c. 1 Cor. i. 32. Erw, "Although the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek wisdom;" 38. "Htoues ev epwevow, Yet we preach Christ crucified." For the particles Ap in this verse, shows that it contains something opposed to what is in the former verse; consequently, that erw must be translated although. 180. Erw, Therefore. Mark vi. 3. "For the pharisiers—except they wash their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders." 5. Erw, "Therefore the scribes and Pharisees take heed to wash not thy disciples," &c. To prove this sense of erw, Whitby, in his note on the passage, cites the following example from Xenophen, without mentioning the place: Erw ev erw, "Do ye not therefore think that God taketh care of men?" 181. Er, Through. 1 Cor. viii. 11. "And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish," &c. 182. Er, During. Acts xiii. 31. "Who was seen (w) during (w) the days of Gentiles." Acts xiv. 6. Luke xxi. 49. 'But tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, and (as) until ye be endowed with power from on high.'

Our Lord did not mean, that after the apostles were endowed with miraculous power, they were to leave Jerusalem; neither did they leave it immediately after that event: See Trench's Concord. in Voc.

195. 'It is commonly disjunctive particle. But it is sometimes used as a causative and signifies and, as Phavorumus observes. Rom. iii. 1. 'What then is the pre-eminence of the Jew? (e) and what the advantage of circumcision?' for these are different questions. Rom. iv. 13. 'The promise that he should be heir of the world, was not to Abraham, (e) and to his seed through law.'

2 Cor. i. 12. 'Then what ye read (e) and acknowledge.' Eph. v. 3. 'But fornication and all uncleanness, and covetousness.' What is (e), Luke xx. 2. is æ, Matt. xvi. 33. Wherefore I Cor. xi. 27. is rightly translated, 'Whosoever shall eat this bread (e) and drink this cup.'

1 Pet. i. 11. 'Concerning what people, (e) and what kind of time.'

196. 'It is sometimes used interrogatively. Matt. vii. 9. 'And why do some despise, (e) is there any man among you?' See Black. vol. ii. p. 183.

Unfortunately, the image does not provide a page from a document with the text visible. However, based on the visible portion of the text, it appears to be discussing the biblical texts Luke xxi. 49 and Romans iii. 1, focusing on the use of the word "and" and its various meanings and uses in different contexts within the New Testament. The text also touches upon the verse 1 Cor. xi. 27, discussing the correct translation and usage of "(e)".

Preliminary Essays.

KAI.

204. Kai is used by the writers of the New Testament in all the senses of the corresponding Hebrew conjunction; and, as Parkhurst observes, is used for most of the different kinds of conjunctions.

205. Kai, but. Matt. xi. 17. 'We have piped unto you, (æus) but ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, (æus) but ye have not lamented.' Rom. i. 13. 'Kai,' But have been hindered hitherto.' 1 Cor. xii. 8. 'Differences of administrations, (æus) but the same Lord.' 1 Thess. ii. 13. 'Wherefore we would come unto you, even I, but Satan hindered us.' Heb. xiv. 3. 'But if any man draw back.'

1 John i. 26. 'Kai,' But ye have,' etc.

206. Kai, or. Matt. xii. 37. 'By thy words thou shalt be justified, (æus) or by thy words thou shalt be condemned.' Luke xii. 38. 'And if he come in the second watch, (æus) or come in the third watch.' 2 Cor. xiii. 1. 'Two (æus) or three beseechers.'

207. Kai is used causally and must be translated for. Psalm cviii. 15. 'Give us help from trouble, (æus) for vain is the help of man.' Micah vii. 8. 'Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, (æus) for when I fall I shall rise again.' John xvi. 38. 'They shall never perish, (æus) for none shall pluck them out of my hand.' 1 Cor. xv. 45. 'Ours æus your.' For thus it is written, 1 Cor. xiv. 6. 'We are bold therefore at all times, (æus) because we know.' See also ver. 8. 1 John i. 3. 'Kai,' For the life was manifested.' 1 John iii. 4. 'Kai,' For sin is the transgression of the law.' On this Beza remarks that æus is put for Æ.æus.

208. Kai hath an affirmative sense, and must be translated therefore. Joshua xxii. 11. 'Kai ñετ' ἀμαρτάωσατε.' 'Take heed therefore.'

Psalm ii. 10. 'Kai ἐνευώντως,' 'Be wise now therefore.' Mark x. 35. 'Kai τιν,' 'Who then can be saved?' Luke ix. 33. 'Master, it is good for us to be here; (æus) therefore let us make three tabernacles.' Luke xii. 37. 'How much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith?' 29. 'Kai,' Therefore seek not what ye shall eat.' Acts xxvi. 26. 'The king knew of these things, (τοι ἐν μεν) before whom therefore I speak freely, being persuaded,' etc. 1 Cor. xv. 13. 'Kai ἄμαχοι,' 'Therefore put away that wicked person from among yourselves.' 2 Pet. i. 19. 'Kai ἀμαρτάως,' 'Therefore we have the prophetic word more sure.'

209. Kai, but, even so. Mark i. 49. 'For every one shall be salted for the sea, (æus) even as every sacrifice shall be salted with salt.' 1 Cor. iii. 5. 'Kai,' Even as the Lord gave to every man." 1 Thess. iii. 4. 'As also happened, (καὶ ἀκούει) as ye know.'

210. Kai, When. Mark xv. 25. 'Now it was the third hour, (καὶ ἦν τὸ μέσον) when they crucified him.'
Acts v. 7. 'And it was about the space of three hours after, (καὶ ἦν ἡ διαφορὰ) when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.' Rom. iii. 26. 'That he may be just, (καὶ) when justifying whom he is of the faith of fear.'

211. Kai, Though, although, yet, and yet. Luke xvii. 7. 'And shall not God avenge his own elect, (καὶ ἕξετέκλησεν) though he bear long with them.' John ix.
30. 'Herein truly is a marvelous thing, that ye know not whence he is, (καὶ) although he hath opened mine eyes.' John xvi. 22. 'Shall leave me alone, (καὶ) and yet
I am not alone, because the Father is with me.'
1 Cor. xii. 13. 'For as the body is one, (καὶ) although it hath many members.' Philip. i. 28. Kai, 'Yet what I shall chose I will not.' Heb. iii. 9. 'When your fathers tempted me, proved me, (καὶ) although they saw my works forty years.' Heb. iv. 6. 'Seeing therefore it was numbered among the fathers, (καὶ ἐγένετο) although, they were not inhabited by whom it was first preached except unto them.' Rev. ii. 1. 'I know thy works, that thou hast a name, that thou livest, (καὶ) although thou art dead.'

212. Kai, So, and so. Matt. vi. 10. 'They shall be done as in heaven, (καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς) so upon earth.' Mark iii.
26. Kai εἰς εὐαγγέλιον, And so if Satan rises up against him.' John xv. 18. 'Shall send me into the world, (καὶ) although, they are not of the world, (καὶ ἐγὼ) whom it was first preached except unto them.'
Rev. iii. 1. 'And to the angel of the church in Sardis, θεόν.) So we see they could not enter in, because of unbelieving.' James v. 18. 'And the heaven gave rain, (καὶ) and so the earth brought forth her fruit.'

213. Kai, And then. 2 Cor. viii. 5. 'First gave themselves to the Lord, (καὶ) and then to us.' 2 Tim.
i. 5. 'That dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, (καὶ γ’ μητέρα) and then in thy mother.'

214. Kai, when it follows a negative, signifies neither, nor. Rom. iv. 19. Kai, 'Neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb.' 1 John iii. 10. 'Is not of God, (καὶ) neither he that loveth not his brother.'

215. Kai, Notwithstanding, notwithstanding. 2 Cor.
viii. 8. 'The overwielding of their joy, (καὶ) notwithstanding their deep poverty.' See Rev. iii. i. No. 211.

216. When καὶ is repeated in one sentence, the first καὶ may be translated both. Rom. xi. 33. 'O the depth of the riches (καὶ) both of the wisdom (καὶ) and knowlledge of God.' See also Acts xxvi. 20. 'I see a man, (καὶ) not a man, that. Sussana, ver. 19. 'And it came to pass, when the maides were gone out, (καὶ οὐκ ἠμετέρωσαν) that the two elders rose up and ran to her.'

217. Kai is used as a particle of affirmation, and must be translated certainly, surely. Gen. xxiv. 29. 'And if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, (καὶ ξέφανε) certainly ye shall bring down my gray hairs,' &c. Rom. xvii. 2. Kai ἵνα. 'For indeed she hath been a helper of many.' 1 Cor. viii. 5. Kai ἵνα σωτήρ. 'For certainly, notwithstanding there be that are called gods.'
1 Thess. iv. 8. Το καὶ ἁμοιοντες, 'Who certainly hath given us his Holy Spirit.'

218. Kai often supplies the relative preterm so, who, which. Isa. v. 4. 'What shall I do to my vineyard, (καὶ αὐτὲς εἰσέβλεπα) which I have not done!'
Dan. vii. 4. 'I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, (καὶ) with which it was lifted up from the earth,' &c. This translation is in the margin of our Bibles; and Ortius in loc. says, 'Verte, per quos efferebatur supra temnia. Vinos enim Ochridas ut in Herennis copulata vis habet relativa.'

219. Kai. Luke xvi. 16. 'And joined himself to a citizen of that country, (καὶ) who shall recover.'

220. Kai, who sent him into his field.' John vii. 46. 'Then came the officers to the chief priests and pharisaees, (καὶ) who said to them why have ye not brought him!' John xi.
36. Kai νῦν εἰ εὗρον εἰς ἐν οἶκον εἰς ἀναστάσεις, 'And every living person who believeth in me, shall never die.' Acts vi.
6. 'Whom they set before the apostles, (καὶ εἰς προ-σερποντάριον) who, praying, laid their hands on them.' Acts xi. 19. 'And God gave him favour in the eyes of Phar-rach, king of Egypt, (καὶ οὗτος) who made him governor over Egypt.' Rom. viii. 34. 'Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that dieth, yea rather (καὶ σκότη) that is risen.' 2 Cor. xi. 13. 'And what I do, (καὶ) that I will do.' See Heb. vi. 5. 1 Pet. i. 23.
'By the word of God (καὶ) which liveth.' See Elener on Acts viii. 16. who hath shown that ζωή is used in this sense by the Greek classics.

230. Kai, Especially. Mark vi. 7. 'But go tell his τος) and a colt, and a foal.' Acts x. 36. 'And God set me at the house, (καὶ σε) behold, many publicans and sinners came.' Matt. xxviii. 9. 'And as they went to tell his disciples, (καὶ διήλ ) lo, Jesus met them.' Acts x. 17. 'Now, while Peter doubted in his own mind that what vision which he had seen, might mean, (καὶ διήλ) beheld, the men who were there.'

232. Kai is sometimes omitted, where the sense requires it to be supplied. See Eph. i. 18. ii. 3. 1 Tim. iv. 2.
By supplying καὶ, Mark v. 15. all appearance of taxtology is removed, and the passage is rendered beautifully emphatic: 'And they came to Jesus, and see him who was possessed with demons, sitting, and clothed, and in some manner of right manner, (τὸ καὶ σέ) even as a man, and they were afraid.' See Vignere on this particle.

234. Kai, Attiçei, for καὶ σε, at least. Mark vi. 56.
'That they might touch, (καὶ σέ) at least the border of his garment.' Acts v. 15. 'That (καὶ) at least the shadow of Peter passing by,' 2 Cor. xii. 16. 'Otherwise (καὶ) at least as a fool bear with me.'

Kata.

235. Kera, &c. Rom. iv. 4. 'Now to him who workoth, the reward is not reckoned (καὶ, σχένος) as a favour, but (καὶ σώζει) as a debt.' 1 Cor. vii. 6. 'This I speak (καὶ) as an advice, not (καὶ) as an injury.' 2 Cor. viii. 8. Καὶ κατά ἐμοί, ἐμοί, 'I speak not as an indignation.' 1 Pet.
i. 15. Αἰλά καὶ τοῦ δικαίου, 'But as he who called you is holy, so be ye holy.'

236. Kera, After the manner. 1 Cor. xv. 23. Kera, ἀνήκρινε, 'For the manner of men I have fought.'
Heb. ix. 9. Kai, 'And after that manner of which, both gifts and sacrifices are offered.'

237. Kera, after the example. Eph. iv. 24. 'The new man, which (σώμα) after God is created in righteousness.

228. Keri, On account of, in order to. John ii. 6. 'There were set there six water-pots of stone, (σάρκας) in order to the purification of the Jews.' 2 Cor. v. 16. 'We receive no man (σώμαν) on account of the flesh; and if we have esteemed Christ (σώμα) on account of the flesh,' that is, on account of his descent as a Jew. Eph. i. 5. 'Having predestinated us to the adoption of sons, (σώματος) on account of the good pleasure of his will.' 2 Tim. i. 1. 'Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, (σώματος) on account of the promise of eternal life, which is by Jesus Christ.' 2 Tim. i. 9. 'Called us with an holy calling, not (σώματος) on account of our works, but (σώματος) on account,' &c. Tit. i. 1. 'An apostle of Jesus Christ, (σώματος) in order to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledgment of the truth.'

229. Keri, By. Rom. ii. 7. 'To them who (σώματος) by patient continuance.' 1 Cor. xii. 8. 'The word of knowledge (σώματος) by the same spirit.' 2 Cor. xii. 17. 'That which I speak, I speak not (σώματος) by the Lord, but as it were in madness.' 1 Pet. iv. 8. 'For this cause the gospel preached also to them that are dead in trespasses and sins, that through them might be condemned (σώματος αὐτῶν) by men in the flesh, yet they might live (σώματος Θεοῦ) by God in the Spirit.' Ver. 14. 'Kata μὲν αὐτοῖς; By them indeed he is blasphemed (σώματος ἡμῖν) but by you he is praised.' ἐνδιδόμενον Θεός αὐτοῦ. 'The gospel by Matthew and Mark.'

230. Keri, With. 1 Cor. i. 1. 'Came not (σώματος) with excellence of speech.' Eph. vi. 6. 'Not (σώματος) with eyeservice.'

231. With respect to, concerning. 2 Cor. xi. 21. 'Keri συμβεβηκεν, I speak with respect to reproach.' Philip. iii. 5. 'Keri ἔλεγεν, With respect to reproach.' Ver. 18. Keri ἐπήρεα, 'With respect to,' Phil. iv. 11. 'Not (σώματος) with respect to want.' Col. ii. 14. 'Blossoming out the handwriting of ordinances (σώματος εἰς) concerning us, which was against us.'

232. Keri, In. Acts xii. 1. 'Now, when the apostles and brethren who were (σώματος) in Judea, heard that the Gentiles had also received the word.' Acts xiii. 1. 'Now, the church (σώματος) in Jerusalem who believed in the things concerning Jesus, (σώματος αὐτοῖς) the beginning laid the foundation.' Ver. 13. 'These all died (σώματος καί), in faith.'

233. Keri, At. 2 Tim. iv. 1. 'Who will judge the quick and the dead (σώματος) at his appearing.'

234. Keri, Before. Eph. v. 27. 'That he might offer to himself a glorious church, (σώματος υἱοῦ) without spot or wrinkle.' Gal. iii. 1. 'Or σώματος οἴκων,' Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been set forth.'

235. Keri increases the meaning of the word with which it is compounded. Acts xvii. 16. 'When he saw the city (σῶμα τοῦ) full of idola.'

236. Keri seems to be omitted in the following sentence:—Luke i. 78. 'To remember his holy covenant, (σώματος υἱοῦ) according to the oath which he swore to Abraham.'

MEN.

237. Me, properly, is an affirmative particle, and may be translated indeed, certainly, truly. It is commonly placed in the beginning of a sentence, and is followed with καί in a subsequent clause, to mark opposition or diversity, and particularly the distribution of things into parts. Heb. x. 33. Το τινά, 'Partly whilst ye were made a gazeeing-stock.'

238. Me, in the beginning of a sentence, when not followed by καί and composed of a simple conjunction, and may be translated now, and. Acts i. 1. 'Now a new era begins.' Acts xvi. 2. 'Now the former treatise.' Rom. i. 8. Πρῶτος μέν, 'And first I thank my God.' Rom. xii. 13. Σωματίζω μέν, 'And I myself.'

NAI.

239. Nai, is used not only in affirmations, but in expressing one's wishes; so may be translated, I beseech, I pray. Mark vii. 35. Nai ayyb, 'I beseech thee, Lord, for even the dogs eat of the crumbs.' If nai is taken in this sense affirmatively, it must be translated, 'True, Lord, but;' &c. Phil. iv. 20. Nai, ἐνδόν, καί τι σὺ εἴπας, 'I beseech thee, brother, let me have joy of thee.'

ΟΠΟΤ.

240. Οὐν, When, whereas. 2 Pet. ii. 11. Οὐν, 'Whereas angels greater in power.' 'This is used in this sense by Thucydides, Black, vol. i. p. 113.'

That the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed.

That, seen denotes sometimes the event simply, and must be translated so.

That. Job iil. 12. 'Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breasts (tvv) that I should suck?'

Psai. xi. 2. 'They make ready their arrow upon the string (tvv) that they may prively shoot.'

Luke iv. 11. 'I bring to you tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.' 11 (tvv) 'That unto you is born; &c.' 2 Thessai. iv. 14. 'Shewing himself (tvv) that he is God.'

254. Orv is used in all the variety of sense belonging to the corresponding Hebrew particle. Orv (is, and) That. Job iii. 12. 'Why did the knees prevented me, or why the breasts (tvv) that I should suck?' Psal. xi. 2. 'They make ready their arrow upon the string, (tvv) they that may prively shoot.' Luke i. 45. 'Happy is she that hath believed, (tvv) that there shall be a performance.' Luke ii. 10. 'I bring to you tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.' 11 (tvv) 'That unto you is born; &c.' 2 Thessai. iv. 14. 'Shewing himself (tvv) that he is God.'

255. Orv, because. Num. xxii. 22. 'And God's anger was kindled (tvv) because he went.' John ix. 17. 'What sayest thou of him, tvv because he opened thine eyes?'

1 Cor. ii. 14. 'Neither can he know them, tvv because he is not of the same spirit.' 1 Cor. xi. 11. 'If the foot shall say, (tvv) Because I am not the hand.' 2 Cor. xi. 7. Orv, 'Because I preached.' Rom. v. 8. 'God commendeth his love to us, (tvv) in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.'

256. Orv is sometimes put for eur, therefore, for which cause. Hosea ix. 15. 'All their wickedness is in Gilgal; because I have hated them.' This, which is the common translation, represents God's hatred as the cause of the wickedness of the Israelites in Gilgal, contrary to the true sense of the passage, which ought to be thus translated, 'All their wickedness is in Gilgal, (tvv) therefore I hated them there.' Luke vii. 47. 'Her sins which are many are forgiven, (tvv) therefore she hath loved me (see ver. 43.) much; but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth me little.' 2 Cor. vii. 8. Orv, 'Therefore, although I made you sorry by that letter, I do not repent.' Ver. 14. Orv, 'Therefore, if I have boasted any thing to him concerning you, I am not ashamed.' Eph. ii. 18. 'Orv Therefore through him we are in Christ.'

257. Orv, for. 1 Cor. ix. 16. Orv, 'For he who plows, ought to plow in hope.'

Stephen's Concord. Gal. iii. 11. Orv, 'Now that by law no man is justified, is plain, (tvv) for the justification of faith shall live.'

257. Orv, seeing. Luke xxiiil. 40. 'Doest thou not know God, (tvv) seeing thou art in the same condemnation.'

258. Orv is used interrogatively, (tvv) flag, whereas, Mark ix. 11. 'They asked him, saying, (tvv elpewv) Why say the scribes?' Ver. 28. Orv, 'Why could not we cast him out?'

259. Orv in the Septuagint, hath sometimes the signification of eur when. So Mintolet says: wherefore John ix. 8. should be thus translated: 'They who before had seen him, (tvv) when he was blind.'

260. Orv is sometimes used as a particle of affirmation. So Stephen in his Concord, tells us: Hac particular (tvv) non redundant, sed confirmanda vim habet dwindur. And in this the Greek grammarians and Benaz agree with Stephen; particularly Benaz, who, in the following passage, translates tvv, certe: 1 John iii. 20. Orv, 'surely.' Certainly God is greater than our heart,'

261. Orv, 'Then will I profess unto them, (tvv, 8e8ev, ome) surely I never knew you.' John xli. 12. 'There was much murmuring among the people concerning him: some indeed said, (tvv) certainly he is a good man.' Rom. iii. 8. Orv, 'certainly,' 'Certainly, let us with all good may come.' 1 Cor. xiv. 21. 'In the law it is written, (tvv) Surely men with other tongues and other lips I will speak.' 1 John iv. 20. 'If any one say, (tvv eurav) assuredly I love God, (tvv eurav) and hast heareth his brother.'

262. Orv is used to introduce a new sentiment or argument, and must be translated, besides, further. 1 John v. 7. 'Orv evv, 'Farther, there are three who bear witness.' 1 John v. 4. 'Orv, 'Besides, all that is begotten of God.'

263. Orv properly is an illustrative particle, but it is likewise used as a simple conjunction, being put for eur, and, now, then, but. Matt. x. 25. 'How much more will they call them of his household?' 26. (o 8v) 'But fear them not.' Matt. xii. 13. (o 8v) 'How much now is a man better, &c. Mark xii. 6. (o 8v) 'But having yet one son.' Luke xx. 26. (o 8v) 'Now there were seven brethren.' Luke xiiii. 26. 'Lacked ye any thing? and they said, Nothing.' 28. (o 8v) 'Then said they unto him, But now, he that hath a purse, &c.' John vii. 35. (o 8v) 'Now every one who hath heard.' John viii. 25. 'Then said Jesus,' John xiiii. 25. 'Now Simon Peter stood and warned himself, (o 8v) and they said to him.' Rom. xi. 36. (o 8v) 'And if the uncircumcised.' Rom. xii. 19. 'But thou wilt say, (o 8v) The word of God in me, 2 Cor. x. 18. preaching together into one place, is not to eat.' Heb. iv. 14. (o 8v) 'Now having a great high priest.' Heb. i. 1. (o 8v) 'Then verily the first covenant had,' &c. 1 Tim. ii. 1. (o 8v) 'Eph. ii. 14. Then I exhort.' In this sense Plato, in his Apol. Secratis, near 33.

264. Orv, for. John xvi. 24. A 8v, for. 'For Anna hath sent him bound to Calaphas the high priest.' Rom. vi. 4. (o 8v) 'And ver. 25. (o 8v) For we are buried with him.' This in the case sense 8v is used like 8v, to introduce a second, and sometimes a third reason, in support of the same proposition; in which case it must, like 8v, be translated, besides, moreover, further. Matt. vii. 12. (o 8v) 'And ver. 16. (o 8v) 'Farther, whatever things ye would that men should do,' &c. Accordingly in the parallel passage, Luke vi. 31. this precept is introduced with 8v, and, Matt. x. 25. (o 8v) 'Now the whole art of the art of the heirs should be translated, Nevertheless, fear them not.'

265. Orv, nevertheless. 1 Cor. vi. 31. 'Nevertheless, whether ye eat, drink,' 1 Cor. xiv. 10. 'There are perhaps so many kinds of languages in the world as ye utter, and none of them without meaning; 11. (o 8v) 'Yet if I do not know the meaning of the language.' Therefore Matt. x. 25. (o 8v) 'And, ver. 16. (o 8v) 'Farther, whatever things ye would that men should do,' &c. Accordingly in the parallel passage, Luke vi. 31. this precept is introduced with 8v, and, Matt. x. 25. (o 8v) 'Now the whole art of the art of the heirs should be translated, Nevertheless, fear them not.'

266. Orv, and before a Fowet, (o 8v).

ΠΑΛΑΙΝ.

267. Παλαίν, especially in the beginning of a sentence, signifies πορεύομαι. Moreover. Matt. xiii. 44. Παλαίν, 'Moreover over the kingdom of heaven is like,' &c. See ver. 45. 47. 2 Cor. xi. 18. Παλαίν, 'Moreover I say. Wherefore John iv. 5. may be thus translated, ὅτι τοῦτο ἡ ἐπαθεῖν τῆς ἁμαρτίας. 'Moreover this second miracle Jesus performed, having come again from Judea into Galilæa.' In this sense παλαίν is sometimes used by the LXX., as Mintert observes. See also Gal. v. 3.

268. Παλαίν, On the other hand. Matt. iv. 7. Παλαίν, 'On the other hand it is written.' John xviii. 40. ἦσαν δὲ τοῖς πόροι, 'But they all cried on the other hand, not this man but Barabbas.' For the multitude had not before, this cried to have Jesus crucified. 3 Cor. x. 7. 'Let him (παλαίν) on the other hand, reason this from himself.'

269. Παλαίν, In like manner. 1 Cor. xii. 21. 'Ἰδίω παλαίν, 'Nor in like manner the head to the feet.' Matt. xxv. 42. Ἰδίω παλαίν ὑμῖν καὶ ἵπποι, 'In like manner a second time.' Luke xiv. 25. Ἰδίω παλαίν ὑμῖν χρήσεις, 'In like manner a second time, ye shall eat.'

270. Παλαίν, A second time. Heb. v. 12. 'Ye have need of one to teach you (παλαίν) a second time.' Heb. vi. 1. 'Not laying (παλαίν) a second time, the foundation of repentance,' &c.

ΠΑΡΑ.

271. Παρά, To. Matt. xxv. 39. 'And Jesus departed thence, and came (παρακλήσθη) to the sea of Galilæa.' Col. iv. 16. 'When this epistle hath been read (παρακληθή) to you?' For it was to be read to them, when assembled together; and not by them.

272. Παρά, Besides, except, save. 1 Cor. iii. 11. 'Other foundation can no man lay, (παρά) except that which is laid.' 2 Cor. xiii. 14. 'Forty stripes, (παρά) save one.'

273. Παρά, Contrary to, against. Rom. i. 26. 'Changed the natural use into that which is (παρά σαρκα) against nature.' Rom. iv. 18. 'Who (παρά) against hope.' Gal. i. 8. 'Angel from heaven should preach to you, (παρά) contrary to what we have preached.'

274. Παρά, More than. Rom. i. 36. 'Who worshipped and served the creature, (παρά τόν ζωον) more than the Creator.'

A NEW LITERAL TRANSLATION

OF

ROMANS.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the time when the Christian Religion was introduced at Rome.

The Scriptures do not inform us at what time, or by whom, the gospel was first preached in Rome. But from the following circumstances it is probable that the church there was one of the first planted Gentile churches, and that it soon became very numerous.

When St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, A.D. 57, 'their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world,' Rom. i. 8. and many of them possessed spiritual gifts, Rom. xii. 6. 'and their obedience was known to all men,' Rom. xvi. 19. Further, the fame of the church at Rome had reached the apostle long before he wrote this letter. For he told them, 'he had a desire for many years to come to them,' Rom. xv. 23. The gospel therefore was introduced in Rome very early, perhaps by some of the disciples who were scattered abroad after Stephen's death, in the end of the reign of Tiberius. Or the founding of the Roman church may have happened even before that period; for among the persons who heard Peter preach on the day of Pentecost, and who were converted by him, strangers of Rome are mentioned, Acts ii. 10. 41. These Roman Jews, on their return home, no doubt preached Christ to their countrymen in the city, and probably converted some of them: so that the church, like most of the Gentile churches, began in the Jews. But it was soon enlarged by converts from among the religious sects of the Jewish sects. The first converts were favored by the hearing in of the idletons Gentiles, who gave themselves to Christ in such numbers, that, at the time St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, their conversion was much spoken of.

These facts merit attention; because the opposers of our religion represent the first Christians as below the notice of the heathen magistrates, on account of the pantheism of their numbers, and the obscurity with which they practised their religious rites. But if the faith of the Roman brethren was spoken of throughout the whole empire at the time this letter was written, the disciples of Christ in Rome must have been numerous, and must have professed their religion openly; for the turning of a few obscure individuals in the city from the worship of idols, and their worshipping the true God clandestinely, could not be the subject of discourse in the provinces. Further, that there were many Christians in Rome when St. Paul wrote this epistle, may be inferred from the tumults occasioned by the centurions which the Jews had with them about the law, and which gave rise to Claudius's decree, banishing the whole of them from Rome, Acts xviii. 2. See sect. 3, page 50, at the beginning. The salutations, likewise, in the end of this epistle, show how numerous the brethren in Rome were at that time, some of whom were of long standing in the faith, as Andronicus and Junias, who were converted before Paul himself; others of them were teachers, as Urbanus; others were deacons and deaconesses, as Mary, Tryphaena, Tryphosa, and Persis, all of whom were active in spreading the gospel; others were persons of station, such as the members of the family of Narcissus, if, as is commonly supposed, he was the emperor's favourite of that name. But although this should not be admitted, 'the saints in Caesar's household,' whose salutation, some years after this, the apostle sent to the Philippians, may have been persons of considerable note.

SECT. II.—Of the state of the Christian Church at the time St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans.

The gospel being offered to the world as a revelation from God, the Jews justly expected that it would agree in all things with the former revelations, of which they were the keepers. And therefore, when they perceived that many of the doctrines taught by the apostles were contrary to the received tenets, which the scribes pretended to derive from the writings of Moses and the prophets, the bulk of the nation rejected the gospel, and argued against it with the greatest vehemence of passion, in the persuasion that it was an impious heresy, inconsistent with the ancient revelations, and destructive of piety.

To remove this specious cavil, the apostles, besides preaching the doctrines of the gospel as matters revealed to themselves, were at pains to show that these doctrines were contained in the writings of Moses and the prophets, and that none of the tenets contrary to the gospel, which the Jewish doctors pretended to deduce from their own sacred writings, had any foundation there. Of these tenets, the most pernicious was their misinterpretation of the promise to Abraham, that 'in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed.' For the Jews considering the moral precepts of the law of Moses as a perfect rule of duty, and its sacrifices and purifications as real stolitions for sin, and believing that no man could be saved out of their church, affirmed that the blessing of the nations in Abraham's seed consisted in the conversion of the nations to Judaism by the Jews. Hence the Jewish believers, strongly impressed with these notions, taught the Gentiles, 'Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved;' Acts xv. 1. But this doctrine, though obstinately maintained, was a gross error. The law of Moses was no rule of justification. It was a political institution, established for governing the Jews as the subjects of God's temporal kingdom in Canaan. And therefore the apostles, elders, and brethren assembled in the council of Jerusalem, justly decreed, that the yoke of the law was not to be imposed on the Gentiles, as necessary to their salvation.

A decision, so deliberately and solemnly pronounced, by such an assembly, ought, among the disciples of Christ, to have silenced all disputation on the subject. Nevertheless, the converted Jews, having been accustomed to glory in their relation to God as his people, and in the privileges which they had so long enjoyed, were extremely offended, when, according to the new doctrine, they found the Gentiles under the gospel raised to an equality with them in all religious privileges. Therefore disregarding the decrees which were ordained of the apostles and elders, they exhorted the Gentiles everywhere to become Jews, if they wished to be saved. And this exhortation made the stronger impression on the Gentiles, that the Jewish worship by sacrifices, purifications, and holidays, was, in many respects, similar to their former worship. Besides, as the Jews were the only people who, before the introduction of the gospel, enjoyed the knowledge of the true God and a revelation of his will, and as the Christian preachers themselves appealed to that revelation in proof of their doctrine, the Gentiles naturally paid a great regard to the opinion of the Jews in matters of religion, and especially to their interpretations of the ancient oracles.
Hence some of the Gentile converts, especially in the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, who before their conversion were extremely ignorant in religious matters, heartening to the Judaizing teachers, received circumcision, and thereby bound themselves to obey the law of Moses, in the persuasion that it was the only way to secure the favour of the Deity.
According to this view of the matter, the controversy was not, as Locke supposes, whether the Gentiles, in their unconverted state, should be admitted into the church, and enjoy equal privileges with the Jews; and whether it was lawful for the Jews to hold religious communion with them, while they remained uncircumcised;
but plainly, whether there was any church but the Jewish, which could be maintained, when the J udaizers taught the Gentile brethren, except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses ye cannot be saved, they certainly meant that salvation could be obtained nowhere but in the Jewish church.
In this controversy the unbelieving Jews and all the Judaizing Christians ranged themselves on the one side, strongly and with united voices affirming that Judaism was the only religion in which men could be saved; that there was no gospel church different from the Jewish, or any revealed law of God but the law of Moses; and that the gospel was nothing but an explication of that law, of the same kind with the explications given of it by the prophets. On the other side, in this great contrary which was now before them and all that Christians informed brethren, who, knowing that the Jewish church was at an end, and that the law of Moses was abrogated, strenuously maintained that a new church of God was erected, in which all mankind might obtain salvation by faith without circumcision; and that the gospel was the only law of this new church. They therefore maintained the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses in all its parts, and boldly asserted, that the gospel alone was sufficient for the salvation of the Gentiles; consequently, that they were under no obligation to have recourse to the Levitical sacrifices and purifications, for procuring the pardon of their sins.
The controversy concerning the obligation of the law of Moses, viewed in the light wherein I have placed it, was a matter of no small importance, since on its determination depended, whether the law of Moses or the gospel of Christ should be the religion of the world. No wonder, therefore, that St. Paul introduced this controversy in so many of his epistles; and that he wrote three of them, in particular, for the express purpose of confut-ing an error so plausible and so perspicuous: I mean his epistles to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Hebrews. These learned epistles, in process of time, produced the desired effect. By the strength of the arguments set forth in them, and by representing the same things everywhere in his preaching and conversation, the apostles enlightened many of the Jewish converts; and these well instructed Jewish brethren in their several churches effectually opposed the errors of the Judaizers:
by which Judaism hath at length been banished from the Christian church, in which for a while it had taken root, through the misguided zeal of the Jewish converts; and the gospel now remains the only revealed religion authorized by God, and obligatory on men.

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion of writing the Epistle to the Romans.

This controversy concerning the law of Moses, described in the foregoing section, was agitated very early at Rome, where the Jews, being rich and factious, dispputed the matter with greater violence than in other churches. And the unbelieving part taking a share in the controversy, they occasioned such tumults, that the emperor Claudius, in the eleventh year of his reign, bansheened the contending parties from the city. So the Roman historian, Suetonius, informs us, who, confounding the Christians with the Jews, calls the whole body by the general name of Jews, and affirms that they were excited to these tumults by Christ (Christi impulerse, Olad. c. 25.), because he had heard, I suppose, that Christ was thereby subject of their vengeance.

Among the banished from Rome was Aquila, a Jew, born in Pontus, and his wife Priscilla, both of them Christians. These came to Corinth about the time St.
Paul first visited that city; and being of the same occupation with him, they received him into their house, employed him in their business, and gave him wages for his work, with which he maintained himself all the time he preached the gospel to the Corinthians. During his abode with them, Aquila and Priscilla, no doubt, gave the apostle a full account of the state of the church at Rome, before its dispersion; and, among other things, told him, that the unbelieving Romans, following the Greeks, affirmed the light of natural reason to have been from the beginning a sufficient guide to mankind in matters of religion: That, being great admirers of the Greeks, yhey considered their philosophy as the perfection of human reason, and extolled it as preferable to the gospel, which they scrupled not to pronounce mere foolishness:
That, on the other hand, the unbelieving Jews, no less prejudiced in favour of the law of Moses, affirmed, it was the only religion, and all the rest, which, he denounced the gospel as a detestable heresy, because it did not adopt the sacrifices, purifications, and other rites enjoined by Moses.—They farther told the apostle that many, even of the converted Jews, extolled the institutions of Moses as more effectual for the salvation of sin-ers than the gospel, and, in that persuasion, pressed the Gentiles to join the law with the gospel, that, by its sacrifices and purifications, the gospel might be rendered a complete form of religion: That the Gentile converts, who knew their freedom from the law of Moses, despised their Judaizing brethren as superstitious bigots, while the others regarded them as profane, for neglecting institutions which they esteemed sacred: That those who possessed spiritual gifts had occasioned great division in the church, each exulting his own gifts, and striving to exercise them in the public assemblies, without giving place to others: Lastly, That some, both of the Jewish and Gentile believers, reckoning it disgraceful to obey constitutions made by idolaters, had, in several instances, contemned the wholesome laws of the state, and were in danger of being punished as evil doers, to the great scandal of the Christian name.

As the apostle had not been in Rome when he wrote this epistle, some persons, well acquainted with the affai-s of the church there, must have made him acquainted with all the particulars above mentioned. For his letter to the Romans was evidently framed with a view to these things. If so, who more likely to give the information then Aquila and Priscilla, with whom the apostle lodged so long! And though the Roman brethren were then dispersed, consequently the apostle had no opportunity of writing to them as a church, yet the disorders which prevailed among them having made a deep impression on his spirit, we may suppose he resolved to embrace the first opportunity of remedying them. Accordingly, during his second visit to the Corinthians, having heard that the church was re-established at Rome, St. Paul wrote to the Romans this excellent and learned letter, which bears their name; wherein, at great length, he discoursed of the justification of sinners; answered the objections made to the gospel doctrine of justification; proved from Moses and the prophets the calling of the Gentiles, the regal over the Jews; and their future restoration; and gave the Roman brethren many precepts and exhortations, suited to their character and circumstances.

From the pains which the apostle took in this letter, to prove that no Gentile can be justified by the law of nature, nor Jew by the law of Moses, and from his explaining in it all the divine dispensations respecting religion, as it were from the very first days of the world, it is reasonable to think it was designed for the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles at Rome, as well as for the brethren; who therefore would show the copies which they took of it to their unbelieving acquaintance. And inasmuch as the apostle professed to derive his views of the matters contained in this letter from the former revelations, and from inspiration, it certainly merits the attention of every unbeliever to whom it was shown, whether he were a Jewish scribe, or a heathen philosopher, or a Roman magistrate, or one of the people; some of whom, I make no doubt, read it. And though, by reading it, they may not have been persuaded to embrace the gospel immediately, the candid and intelligent, by seriously weighing the things written in it, must have received some instruction in the principles and duties of natural religion, as could hardly fail to lead them to see the absurdity of the commonly received idolatry; which was one good step towards their conversion.—To conclude: As in this learned letter the principal objections by which Jews and Gentiles have all along impugned the gospel are introduced and answered, it is a writing which the adversaries of religion will never be able to counteract, or destroy it on rational principles, ought to peruse with attention and candour.

The commentators observe, that although the apostle, in the inscription of this letter, hath asserted his apostolical authority, to make the Romans sensible that the things written in it were dictated to him by the Spirit; yet, as he was personally unknown to the greatest part of them, he does not teach, exhort, and rebuke them with that authority which he uses in his letters to the churches of his own planting, but he writes to them in a mild and conciliatory manner, in order to gain their affections.

Sect. IV.—Of the Time and Place of writing the Epistle to the Romans.

The first time Paul visited Corinth, he found Aquila and Priscilla, lately come from Italy in consequence of Claudius's edict (Acts xviii. 2), which was published in the eleventh year of his reign, answering to a. d. 51. (See Pref. 1 Cor. sect. 1.) Probably the apostle arrived at Corinth in the summer of that year. And as he abode there more than eighteen months before he set out for Syria (Acts xviii. 18), he must have left Corinth in the spring of a. d. 53. In his voyage to Syria, the apostle touched at Ephesus, then sailed straight to Cæsarea.

From Cæsarea he went to Jerusalem, and after that to Antioch. And having spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, setting out the time of his disciples, Acts xvii. 21, 22, 23. Then passing through the upper coasts, he came to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1. His voyage from Corinth to Cæsarea, and his journey through the countries just now mentioned, may have been performed in a year and ten months. Wherefore, if he sailed from Cæsarea in February, 53, he may have come to Ephesus at the end of the year, or about the beginning of Ephesus about three years (Acts xx. 31.), before he went into Macedonia, his arrival in Macedonia (Acts xx. 1.) must have happened in the year 57. At this time the apostle went over all these parts, and gave them much exhortation before he went into Greece. (Acts xx. 5.) Probably this was the time he preached the gospel in the synagogues of Judea, Acts xxi. 19. For if the transactions would take up the summer of the year 57, we cannot suppose he came into Greece sooner than in the autumn of that year. The purpose of his journey into Greece was to receive the collections which the churches of Achaia had made for the saints in Judea, 2 Cor. ix. 5-8. Having therefore abode three months in Greece (Acts xx. 5.), he departed with the collections early in the year 58, together with the apostle's departure from Greece with the collections being thus fixed, there can be no doubt concerning the date of his epistle to the Romans; for he told them he was going to Jerusalem when he wrote it, Rom. xvi. 25, 26. But now I go to Jerusalem, ministering to the saints. Wherefore the epistle to the Romans was written at Corinth, as we shall see immediately, in the end of a. d. 58. He abode at Ephesus, Acts xix. 1., and the beginning of a. d. 58, full seven years after the Jews and Christians were banished from Rome by Claudius, and about three years after their return. For Claudius dying in the year 54, his edict terminated with his life; and not being renewed by his successor, the Jews and Christians came back to Rome in each such numbers, that, in the third year of the reign of Tiberius, when Paul wrote this letter, the Roman church had acquired its former celebrity.—To conclude: The circumstances by which the date of the epistle to the Romans is fixed, are so well ascertained, that learned men are nearly agreed in their opinion upon the point—some, with Pearson, dating it at Corinth, in the year 57; others, with Lardner, in the beginning of the same; and others, with Mill, in 58, without determining the time of the year.

The salutations from Gaius or Caius, the apostle's host, and from Erastus, the chamberlain of the city (Rom. xvi. 23.), are additional proofs that this epistle was written at Corinth. For that Gaius lived there, seems plain from 1 Cor. i. 14, as did Erastus likewise, 2 Tim. ii. 14. Besides, we find the church at Cenchreae, the eastern part of Corinth, having been the bearer of this letter, Corinth, by that circumstance also is so plainly pointed out as the place where it was written, that there was no occasion for the apostle to be more particular.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The unbelieving Jews having violently opposed the gospel, because it was preached to the uncircumcised Gentiles, and because Jesus, whom the Christians called the Christ, was not such an one as they expected, the apostle, in the inscription of this epistle, affirmed that the gospel was preached to the Gentiles, in fulfilment of God's promise made by the prophets in the Scriptures.
The Christ, was, as to his flesh, sprung of the seed of David, ver. 3.—But as to his divine nature, he was, with the greatest power of evidence, declared to be the Son of God, by his resurrection, ver. 6.—And because Paul was himself a jew, and ignorant of the apostles of Christ in Rome, he assured them that he was made an apostle by Christ himself, for the purpose of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, ver. 5.;—of which class men most of the inhabitants of Rome were, ver. 6.—He was therefore authorized to write this letter to the whole inhabitants of Rome. So many particulars crowded into the inscription, that it hath made it uncommonly long. But they are placed with great judgment in the very entrance, because they are the foundations on which the whole scheme of doctrine contained in the epistle is built.

Because it might seem strange that Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, had not hitherto visited Rome, the most noted Gentile city in the world, he assured the Romans he had often purposed to come to them, but had hitherto been hindered, ver. 13, 14.—However, he was still willing to preach the gospel in Rome, ver. 15.; being neither afraid nor ashamed to preach it in that great and learned city; because it reveals the powerful method which God hath devised for bestowing salvation on every one who believeth; on the Jews first, to whom it was to be first preached, ver. 16.—In the account of the gospel the apostle intimates that no Jew could be saved by the law of Moses, nor any Gentile by the law of nature. For, if the Jews could have been saved by the one law, and the Greeks by the other, the apostle, instead of being 'the power of God for salvation to every one who believeth,' would have been a needless discourse: the apostle ought to have been ashamed of it, as altogether superfluous.

To prove that the gospel is 'the power of God for salvation to every one who believeth,' the apostle first of all observes, that 'therein the righteousness of God by faith is revealed;'—in the gospel, the righteousness which God will accept and reward is revealed to be a righteousness not of works, but of faith. And this being the only righteousness of which sinners are capable, the gospel which discovers its acceptableness to God and the method in which it may be attained, is, without doubt, the power of God for salvation to all who believe, ver. 17.
Here an essential defect, both in the law of Moses and in the law of nature, is tactily intimated. Neither the one nor the other recognizes, in its institution, accepting and warranting any righteousness, but that of a perfect obeisance.—Secondly, To prove that the gospel alone is 'the power of God for salvation,' the apostle observes, that both in the law of nature and the law of Moses, 'the wrath of God is revealed from heaven;' &c. That is, these laws, instead of granting pardon to sinners, subject them to punishment, however penitent they may be;
consequently, these laws are not the power of God for salvation to any one: But the gospel, which promises pardon and eternal life, is the effectual means of saving sinners. In short, any hope of mercy sinners entertain must be derived from revelation alone, ver. 18. And in regard the apostle wrote this epistle to the Romans for the purpose of explaining and proving these important truths, the declaration of them is inserted in verses 16, 17, 18. may be considered as the proposition of the subjects to be handled in this epistle.

Accordingly, to show that no person, living under the law of nature, has any hope of salvation given him by that law, the apostle begins with proving, that, instead of pursuing the objects holiness, which he required by the law of nature in order to salvation, all are guilty before God, and doomed by that law to punishment. To illustrate this proposition, St. Paul took the Greeks for an example; because, having carried the pleasures of reason to the highest pitch, their philosophy might be considered as the perfection both of the light and of the law of nature; consequently, among them, if anywhere, all the knowledge of God, and of the method of salvation, discoverable by the light of nature, and the purity of manners which men can attain by their own powers, ought to have been found. Nevertheless, that people, so intelligent in other matters, were in religion foolish to the last degree, and in morals debased beyond belief. For, notwithstanding the knowledge of the being and perfec-tions of the one true God subsisted among them in the most early ages, ver. 19.—being understood by the works of creation, ver. 20.—their legislators, philosophers, and priests unrighteously holding the truth concerning God in obscurity, did not glorify him as God, by discovering him to the common people, and making him the object of their worship; but, through their own foolish res-solutions, fancying polytheism and idolatry more proper for the vulgar than the worship of the one true God, they themselves at length lost the knowledge of God to such a degree that their own heart was darkened, ver. 21.—
Thus the wise men among the Greeks became fools in matters of religion, and were guilty of the greatest injustice, both towards God and men, ver. 22.—For, by their public institutions, they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto birds, &c. Which they held up to the people as objects of worship.

And by their own example, as well as by the laws which they enacted, they led the people to worship these idols with the most impure and detestable rites, ver. 23.—For which crime God permitted those pretended wise men, who had so exceedingly dishonoured him, to be destroyed themselves with the works by which the apostle gives a particular description, ver. 24—26.; and observes, that those proud legislators and philosophers, who thought they had discovered the highest wisdom in their religious and political institutions, thus received in themselves the recompense of their error that was meet, ver. 27.—So that the abominable uncleanness, which was so avowedly practised by the Greeks, which was authorized by their public institutions, as well as by the example of their great men, was both the natural effect, and the just punishment, of that idolatry which, in every state, was established as the national religion.

Farther, because the Greekian legislators did not approve of the true knowledge of God as fit for the people, the most men were without instigation of will, and in all sense of right and wrong, in their behaviour towards one another, ver. 38.—most of them being filled with all manner of injustice, fornication, wickedness, &c. ver. 29—31. Nay, although by the law of God written on their hearts, they knew that those who commit such crimes are worthy of death, to such a degree did they carry their profligacy, that they not only committed these sins themselves, but encouraged the common people to commit them, by the pleasure with which they beheld the debaucheries in the temples, and their revellings on the festivals of their gods, ver. 32.

Such is the apostle Paul's account of the manners of the Greeks; from which it appears that their boasted philosophy, notwithstanding it enabled them to form excel-sing plans of civil government, whereby the people were inspired with the love of their country, and good laws for maintaining the peace of society, it proved utterly ineffectual for giving the legislators the knowledge of salvation, and for leading them to establish a right public religion: defects which entirely destroyed any influence which the true godly instruction they had, in aiding the people to maintain a proper moral conduct. In short, the vicious characters of the false gods, whom the legislators held up to the people as objects of their worship, and the impure rites with which they appointed them to be wonderful, converted the morals of the people to such a degree, that the Greeks became the most debauched of mankind, and thereby lost all claim to the favour of God. But if this was the case with the most intelligent, most civilized, and most accomplished heathen nations, under the tutelage of their boasted philosophy, it will easily be admitted, that the light of nature, among the barbarous nations, could have no greater efficacy in leading them to the worship of the true God, and in giving them the knowledge of the method of salvation. The most civilized heathen nations, therefore, equally with the most barbarous, having, under the guidance of the light of nature, lost the knowledge of God, and become utterly corrupted in their morals, it is evident, that none of them could have any hope of a future life from the light of nature, which condemns all to death without mercy, who do not give a sinless obedience to its precepts. Wherefore, both for the knowledge of the method of salvation, and for salvation itself, the Greeks were obliged to have recourse to the gospel, which teaches, that because all have sinned, and are incapable of perfect obedience;—these influences, indeed, the apostles did not draw in this part of his letter, because he intended to produce them (chap. iii. 20. 21. 22) as general conclusions concerning all mankind, after having proved the insufficiency of the law of Moses for justifying the Jews. Yet it was fit to mention them here, that the reader might have a complete view of the apostle's argument.
VIEW AND ILLUSTRATION.

In order to finish this illustration with the following remarks,

1. The picture which the apostle hath drawn of the manners of the Greeks, is by no means exaggerated. The intercourse which he had with the philosophers, and more especially with his own disciple, Dionysius the Areopagite, enabled him to form a just judgment of the learning and manners of those who for a long residence in Athens, Corinth, and other Greek cities, made him perfectly acquainted with their manners. But though his description is not exaggerated, we must remember that it does not extend to every individual. It is an image of the manners of the Greek nations in general, or rather of such of them as were in the higher ranks of life. I call the reader's attention to the second chapter, that the Gentiles, who have not the benefit of revelation, may attain that faith and holiness which is necessary to justification; in which case he assures us, that they shall be rewarded with glory and peace. Besides, it is well known, that in every Gentile nation there were always many who believed in the one true God, and who, in the persuasion that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them who diligently seek him, were anxious to know and do his will; and who, being instructed and strengthced by God, behaved in such a manner as to be acceptable to him.

2. My second remark is, That although the revelation of the wrath of God from heaven, against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, mentioned by the apostle, Rom. i. 18, certainly implies that no sinner can have any hope of salvation from the law of nature, it does not follow, that the piety heathens had no hope of salvation. The heathens in general believed their desires plausible, and, in that persuasion offered to them propitiatory sacrifices, and expected to be pardoned and blessed by them even in a future state. (See Gesselian, No. 27.) Nay, many of them believed, they were to reanimate their bodies. But these hopes they did not derive from the law or light of nature, but from the promise which God made to the first parents of mankind. For that promise being handed down by tradition to Noah and his sons, they communicated the knowledge thereof, together with the use of sacrifices, to all their descendants. So that the hope of pardon and immortality which the pius heathens entertained, was the very hope which the gospel hath more clearly brought to light; and was derived from the same source, namely, from divine revelation. Withal, being agreeable to the natural wishes of mankind, and the only remedy for their greatest fear, these circumstances contributed to preserve it in the world. Since, then, the hope of pardon and of a future state, which the heathens entertained, was derived, not from the light of nature, but from the promise and revelations, the ground on which this part of the chapter is perfectly just, and his conclusions stand firm; namely, that the light and law of nature held out no method in which a sinner can be saved, and that it is the gospel alone which hath brought the important secret to light, by explaining and enlarging the primitive revelations, and by teaching, in the clearest manner, that God will assemble and save all mankind, and, at the judgment, reward it as if it were a perfect righteousness, on account of the obedience of Jesus Christ.

3. My third remark is, That the description which the apostle hath given of the national manners of the Greeks, however disgraceful to human nature, being perfectly true, merits attention; because it is a complete confession of those who are in the judgment, that natural reason hath been sufficient to lead mankind to just actions in religion, and to a proper moral conduct. For after the weakness of human reason, in matters of religion and morality, hath been so clearly demonstrated by experience in the case of the Greeks, who, of all mankind, were the most distinguished for their intellectual endowments, the futile existence of the light of nature, set up by modern infidels, for the purpose of rendering revelation needless, should be rejected with the contempt due to so gross a falsehood. And all who are acquainted with the actual state of the world under the guidance of the light of nature, ought thankfully to embrace the instruction contained in the gospel, as the most effectual means of training ignorant sinful creatures to virtue; and should humbly submit to the method of salvation by Christ, therein revealed, as of divine appointment, and as the only method in which sinners can be saved.

PREMONITION TO THE READER.

Some perhaps may be of opinion, that to have done justice to the following translation of the Apotosthical Epistles, the author, as often as it differs from the common version, should have shewn the import and propriety of these differences, with the reasons on which they are founded, especially when they are of the minute kind; because negligent readers, fancying differences of that sort of little moment, and not attending to those which are of greater magnitude, are apt to conclude, that the translation now submitted to the public differ so little from the one in common use, that it might have been spared. But nothing can be worse founded than such a conclusion. Persons who are judges of language, know that the alteration of a single word in a sentence, and even a different pointing, will change its meaning entirely; as was shown by some examples, p. 11. Gen. Pref.

But to have illustrated in the same manner all the alterations and corrections which the author hath introduced into his translation, would have swelled the work to an enormous size. And therefore, to show in what particular this differs from the common version of the epistles, the author hath contained himself, as was observed p. 10, with printing what is different in italics characters, and hath left it for the most part to the reader's own sagacity, not only to judge of the propriety of his corrections, but to investigate the reasons by which they are supported.

Yet, to prevent cursory readers from regarding this translation of the epistles, merely because a number of the corrections which it offers are of the minute kind, the author will here compare one of its chapters only with the common English version of the same chapter, and will show, that even by the slightest alterations, when made agreeably to the original, such a change in the sense is sometimes produced, as throws great light on the sentiments and reasoning of the inspired writers. The chapter chosen for comparing the two translations, shall be the first of the epistle to the Romans; not because the alterations introduced into the new translation of that chapter, are either of greater magnitude, or more in number, or of higher importance than those in the other chapters of the epistle, (for in reality they are fewer, and of much less importance); but, because the reader will naturally fix his eye on that chapter first, from its presenting itself first to his view.

Rom. 1. 1. Who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh. This leads the reader to think of the formation of our Lord's body: Whereas the apostle's meaning is, that he was made of his flesh, he was descended from David, in order to be a male. In the new translation, these ideas are suggested by substituting the word born (which is one of the literal significations of γενναμ) in place of the word made, in this manner: Who was born of the seed of David, with respect to the flesh.

Ver. 4. Was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead. This implies that Jesus was declared to be the Son of God, by his raising others from the dead. But as Jesus himself often appealed to his own resurrection in proof of his being the Son of God, the phrase & αυτου γενναμ νεανις is undoubtedly an ellipse, in which two words are omitted. One of them is supplied by our translators, namely, the word from; the other word his resurrection in the new translation: Thus: Declared the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead. The meaning is, that Jesus was declared the Son of God by his own resurrection, and not by raising others from the dead.

Ver. 6. By whom we have received grace and apostleship, for obedience to the faith among all nations for his name. This rendering, besides being inelegant, is faulty in two particulars. For, first, Paul did not receive his apostleship by Christ—that is, from God by the intercession of Christ—but from Christ himself, as holding the right originally of making an apostle. Secondly, ὅταν γενναμ ἐνεργεῖν does not signify obedience to the faith, but the obedience of faith. In the new translation these faults are thus corrected: From whom we have received grace and apostleship, in order to the obedience of faith among all the Gentiles, on account of his name. The apostle received his office from Christ himself, that by preaching him everywhere as the Son of God and Saviour of the world, he might produce the obedience of faith among all the Gentiles, on account of his dignity and authority as the Son of God.

Ver. 9. Without ceasing making mention of you always in my prayers, is a tautology, which in the new translation is avoided, by joining the clause, always in my prayer, with the word requesting in the beginning of ver. 10 with which it stands connected in the Greek.

Ver. 12. Τοις δὲ ἐμ᾽—that is to say. According to this translation, ver. 13. is an explication of ver. 11. But every reader must be sensible, that the things contained in the two verses have entirely different meanings. Wherefore the word & αὕτη should not be translated that is to say, in our Bible, where is neglected as an expiante, and the words to say are supplied, but the verse should be supplied and translated in the following manner: And this is proposed, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith of you and me.

Ver. 15. So much as in me, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are in Rome also. The new translation of this verse is more perspicuous and emphatical: Therefore (namely, because I am a debtor, &c.) I am willing, according to my ability, to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome. For, to hinder the Romans from suspecting that the apostle had hitherto avoided coming to Rome, because he was afraid, that he might preach the gospel to such a learned and intelligent people, he told them, that notwithstanding their great learning, he was willing to preach the gospel even to them. And to show that this is his meaning, he added, ver. 16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, &c.

Ver. 17. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith, as it is written, The just shall live by faith. The righteousness of God is, as in our faith to faith, is an assemblage of words to which no distinct meaning can be affixed. But the original, rightly constructed, gives the following clear literal sense: The righteousness of God by faith is revealed in it, in order to faith. The apostle was not ashamed of the gospel, because it makes a righteousness of God, to be obtained by faith, is revealed in it, in order to faith to faith in them to whom it is preached. The latter clause, as it is written, The just shall live by faith, were better translated, The just by faith shall live. For although in the Hebrew it is, The just shall live by his faith, the copy of Habakkuk's prophecy, from which the LXX. took their translation, and the apostle his quotation, certainly wanted the pronoun his. Besides, the apostle in making this quotation was to prove that Habakkuk wrote concerning a righteousness by faith, either the most ancient and best copies of his prophecy wanted the pronoun, or the passage must be construed and translated thus: The just by his faith, the man who is just by his faith, shall live. And in the new translation, this quotation is no proof of the apostle's assertion that Habakkuk had written of a righteousness by faith.

Ver. 19. That which may be known of God is manifest in them. According to this translation, the apostle's meaning is, That the knowledge of God, attainable by the light of nature, was manifest in the minds of the Gentile philosophers. But to say, that knowledge is manifest in any one's mind, merely because it exists there, is very improper. Knowledge in the mind cannot be manifest, except it be shown either by words or by actions. That the heathen philosophers did not manifest the existence of the knowledge of God in their minds by their actions, is plain from their public institutions of religion, in which they showed the grossest ignorance of God. As little did they manifest in their discourses to the common people. They rather unrighteously concealed it from them, as the apostle affirms, ver. 18. By their writings only, they manifested their knowledge of God to the few who could read them. This, therefore, being the apostle's meaning to express, the words, instead of being translated as, in our Bible, ought to have been translated among, as in the new translation. That which may be known of God, is manifest among them, for God hath manifested it to them, VER. 20. For the imitable things of him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; so that they are without excuse. The phrase, from the creation of the world, is ambiguous; for it may signify either by the creation of the world, or since the creation of the world. The latter is the apostle’s meaning; because clearly seen by the creation of the world, is precisely the same in sense with the clause which follows it, namely, being understood by the things that are made; which thus becomes a tautology. But, both the ambiguity and the tautology will be removed if the preposition are is translated since, as it is Luke ii. 36. thus: His imitable things, even his eternal power and Godhead, (αινιας) since the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; so that they are imcomputable, etc.

VER. 21. Because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful. The apostle’s meaning is not, that at what time they knew God, they glorified him not, etc., but that although the legislators and philosophers knew the true God, they knew him not as God, by making him the object of the people’s worship, nor appointed any public thanksgivings to be offered to him, as the author of all the good things mankind enjoy. These ideas the common translation does not express distinctly; but, in the new version, they are suggested with sufficient plainness, by rendering the words αἰτιαν διάλειον literally, not glorifying him; and by giving the past tense, and its respective sense, thus: Because although they knew God, they did not glorify him as God, neither gave him thanks, but became foolish by their own reasonings: these reasonings by which they pretended to justify polytheism and idolatry, as the most proper religion for the vulgar.

VER. 22. Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do them, but are even well pleased with those who practiceth them. The heathen legislators, instead of punishing, were well pleased with their people when they practiseth the enormities mentioned in the preceding part of this chapter.

There are other variations in the new translation of this chapter, by which it is brought more close to the original than the version in common use: but it is needless to mention them, as the examples produced may suffice to show the great change in the sense. In another translation, when conformable to the original, make a great change in the meaning of the passages. It is of more importance to observe, that from the above examples, the reader may justly conclude that the minute alterations in the other chapters of the Romans have the same effect, as they likewise have in all the chapters of the other epistles where they are introduced; consequently, that they should not be passed over lightly, but considered with attention, that their importance may be understood. It is necessary also to observe, that notwithstanding so much has been said to show the value of these minute alterations, the reader must not therewith conclude, that all, or even the greatest part of the alterations in this translation, are of the minute kind. In every epistle there are many of much greater magnitude than those in the first chapter to the Romans. But there is no occasion to shew this by examples. They will strike the reader at first sight. Neither is it necessary here to point out, in what respects they alter the meaning of the passages where they are introduced. In the notes, the propriety of many of them is very briefly explained. It may be worth the readers to examine and to form their own conclusions, taking care to compare the versions of the Greek with the Greek, as they have been understood by the learned of their day, and to examine the version of the epistles, the commentary,

By this time the reader no doubt understands, that the alterations and corrections, concerning which so much hath been said in this Premonition, are those which, in the following translation, are made on the English version commonly used. But the principles on which these alterations are founded have been explained at great length in different parts of the General Preface, no further information concerning them is requisite, except to put the reader in mind, that they consist in the following particulars:—1. In substituting modern English words and phrases in place of such as are now become obsolete. —3. In correcting the language of the common version, where it is ungrammatical. —5. In rejecting ambiguous expressions, of which there are many in our English Bible. —4. In placing the words of the translation in the order in which the corresponding words hold in the original, as often as either the meaning or the perspicuity of any passage depends on that order. —5. In supplying the elliptical expressions properly; and, for the most part, either from what goes before, or from what follows in the text. —6. In including all such words and clauses as have been added by our translators unnecessarily. Of this kind there are a number in their version, which hurt the sense. —7. In accurately marking those words, which in the common translation are added to the text, without being marked as added; but which being retained in this, as necessary to complete the sense, it was fit to distinguish them from the original words, that the reader might judge of their propriety. —8. In rightly construing the Greek text, where it requires to be construed; and in translating the passages according to that right construction. —9. In translating the Greek words and phrases according to their true literal meaning, both where they have been mistranslated, and where they have been paraphrased; because, it is the business of the translator to agree better with the context, and to be more emphatical and beautiful than any free translation whatever. —10. In not varying the translation of the same words and phrases in the same sentence, unless they are evidently used in different senses; a rule which our translators have often transgressed, to the darkening of the meaning of many passages. —11. In altering the painting of some sentences, for the purpose of rendering their meaning more consonant to the context. —12. In translating the Greek particles properly, according to that variety of meaning in which they are used by the sacred writers. The corrections comprehended under this last class are so numerous, and, though minute, make such a change in the sense, that they have been considered not unworthy of mention in this Premonition. But, if the alterations comprehended under one class only, make such a change in the train of the apostle’s reasonings as to entitle this to the appellation of a New Translation, the numerous corrections comprehended under the other classes, must set it at a still greater distance from the common version, and fully justify the author in calling it a New Translation from the Original, of all the Apostolical Epistles.

It only remains to request the learned reader, to examine the translation of the epistles, the commentary, and the notes, all now submitted to the public, by the principles laid down in the General Preface, and to judge of the whole with that candour, which is due to an attempt sincerely meant to exhibit the divinely inspired writings in the genuine simplicity of their meaning, that, being rightly understood, they may not be applied, as they sometimes have been, for supporting opinions destructive of piety and morality.

COMMENTS.

CHAP. L—1. Paul a servant of Jesus Christ, and an apostle called expressly as the other apostles were, and separated by him to preach the good news FROM God,3 2 Which he promised before, by his prophets in the holy scriptures;1 3 Concerning the coming of his Son to save the world, who, as it was foretold, was born of a woman descended from David, the king of Israel, with respect to his flesh;2 4 But was declared FROM God, with great power of evidence, with respect to his holy spiritual nature, by his resurrection FROM the dead, after he had been crucified by the Jewish rulers for calling himself the Son of God, even Jesus Christ our Lord.9 5 But ye have received spiritual powers and apostleship, in order that through my preaching him as the Son of God, the obedience of faith may be given to him, among all the Gentiles, on account of his being the Son of God.6 6 Among the number of which Gentiles are also ye the called disciples of Jesus Christ.7 7 Being thus commissioned, I write this letter to all who are in Rome, more especially to those who are the beloved of God, on account of their faith, to the called seed of Abraham, to the saints by profession. May grace be multiplied to you, and peace FROM God our Father, and FROM the Lord Jesus Christ.8

Ver. 1.—1. Paul a servant.—The original word επίστολος, properly signifies a slave. Here it is a most amplified—being put into the hand of the chief ministers of kings were called επιστολος, slaves. In this sense, Morison assigns the title of slave to Paul in the following passage: Eph. 5. 22. This honourable name, therefore, denotes the high authority which Paul possessed in the kingdom of Christ, as one of his chief ministers.2 2 A called apostle.—The name apostle was given to different orders of men, Rom. xvi. 7. note 4. But, in his highest sense, it was appropriated to the apostles, whom Christ appointed to be with him, Mark iii. 14. and whom, after his resurrection, he sent forth to preach the gospel. See Prov. xvii. 17. 3 Separated to the gospel of God.—We are told, Acts xii. 2, that 'the Holy Ghost said, separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work whereunto I have called them.' But this being nothing but a separation of Paul from the teachers at Antioch, to go and preach to the Gentiles, the higher separation, mentioned Gal. i. 15, is here meant.4 4 Or, if, grace and apostleship are taken separately, apostleship may signify the office, and grace the supernatural endowments bestowed on Paul, upon his being raised from the dead.5 5 In the obedience of faith.—Either obedience FROM a principle of faith, or faith itself, called obedience simply, chap. xvi. 19. 6 On account of his name.—Rome here signifies the character of the Roman church, the object whence the influence of the gospel was spread, upon his receiving the true religion, to the advantage of persons of all sorts, throughout the world. This name is given to the city of Rome, in order to intimate that the Gospel was preached there, and that the conversion of persons was attended with the greatest advantage.7 7 Concerning his Son.—The gospel is good news FROM God, concerning the coming of his Son to save the world. Where-before the Son of God is the subject of the gospel, as well as his author.8 2. Who was born of the seed of David, with respect to the flesh;—εστιν, sometimes denotes the human body, 1 Cor. vii. 28. sometimes the human mind, Rom. vii. 19. 2 Cor. vii. 7. and sometimes the whole man, John ii. 25. Here, being opposed to the spirit of holiness, it signifies our Lord's body. For it cannot be thought that he derived his human soul from his mother, because that would imply the divinity of the soul of the parent. Besse, in his note on this place, observes that the word in theuentes denotes the formation of our Lord's body, says the Holy Ghost took of the substance of Mary's body, and formed it into a body for our Lord. He adds, that the ancients urged this text against Valentine, Marcion, and the rest: some of whom affirmed, that our Lord's body was only imaginary; others, that it was formed of celestial matter, and sent into the body of his mother from heaven. But although the apostles, in this place, speak only of our Lord's body, it does not follow, on the contrary, that he was raised. For there is no such passage in which he is called a man, and the man Jesus Christ, and our brother, and in which his suffrage are described, imply that he was raised FROM the dead. Rather think power denoted the strength of the evidence by which he was demonstrated to be the Son of God.9 3. By his resurrection FROM the dead.—Here we have supplied the pronoun he, because the scope of the reasoning requires it to be understood.2 2. With respect to.—Locke understands this of the miraculous power, in which he was raised FROM the dead. 'By which he was raised,' says he, 'is equivalent to 'by which it was made,' and 'by which,' in Scripture, never signifies, in the sense of bye been, but it is a figure of speech, denoting the immediate connection between the cause and the effect, or the means and the end.' Such is the meaning of this expression in the context.10 10. Forasmuch as ye are called to the ministration of the ministers of the Gentiles, ye are the temple of God, the Spirit dwelling in you.—These are the holy places of the Lord, which were distinguished from the idolatrous inhabitants of the city, and consecrated by the ordinances of the Pentateuch, comprehended in the general description, 'All who are in Rome.'11 11. In whom ye also walk, after the pattern of his steps who sit in the seat of Moses, even Paul a servant.—This is the form of adoration, I write this letter to all who are in Rome, more especially to those who are the beloved of God, on account of their faith, to the called seed of Abraham, to the saints by profession. May grace be multiplied to you, and peace FROM God our Father, and FROM the Lord Jesus Christ.
8. And first, I thank my God through Jesus Christ, an account of all of you who have embraced the gospel, that your faith in Jesus Christ is so consequently, that it is spoken of throughout the whole Roman empire.

9. In saying I am thankful for your conversion, I speak the truth; for I call God to witness, whom, with the utmost earnestness, I serve in the ministry of the gospel of his Son, that constantly I make affectionate mention of you.

10. Always in my prayers, requesting that by some means, now at length, I may have a prosperous journey to Jerusalem, (ch. xv. 25.) by the will of God, under whose direction I execute my ministry, and then to come to you.

11. For I greatly desire to see you, that I may impart to you some spiritual gift, in order that ye may be established against the heathens, who wish to bring you back to idolatry, and the Jews, who would subject you to the law.

12. And this is proposed that I may be comforted together with you, (as) through the mutual faith both of you and me.

13. Now, brethren, I would not have you ignorant, that oftentimes I purposed to come to you, (1 Thess. i. 5.) that I might have some fruit among you, even as among the other Gentiles.

14. I am a debtor, both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, both to the learned and to the ignorant.

15. Therefore, I am willing, according to my ability, to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome.

16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God for salvation, to every one who believes, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

17. For the righteousness of God, (Rom. i. 17.) by faith, is revealed in it, (Rom. xiv. 2.) in order that it is written, (Habak. ii. 4.) But the pretexts of the believing, as well as of the unbelieving Jews, who were displeased with him for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles. Why then, I ask, that he has not been planted by any apostle, but instructed them in some particulars concerning the charity and faith of Christ, which it was of great importance for them to know.

18. — I thank my God, through Jesus Christ, for all of you. — The meaning of his epistles. Paul generally subjected to the apostolic benediction, a solemn thanksgiving for the faith, charity, patience, and other virtues of the brethren to whom he wrote, as a solemn act of their happiness; and to lead them to improvement of the advantages which they enjoyed as Christians.

19. That your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world. — The faith of the Romans, which occasioned so much discourse, was their turning from idols. An event of this kind could not fail to be spoken of with wonder throughout the whole empire, as there were multitudes of strangers continually coming to Rome from the provinces, who on their return home would report what they had seen. For this the apostle thanked God, because the conversion of the Romans encouraged the inhabitants of other cities to forsake the error of their idolatry. Besides, Rome being the metropolis of the world, the conversion of so many of its inhabitants brought no small credit to the evidences of the gospel.

20. — The Roman brethren being mostly Jews, this solemn assurance concerning the mention which the apostle made of them in his prayers, was intended to convince them, that their conversion was as much the subject of his thanksgiving to God as the conversion of the Gentiles.

21. That many of the brethren at Rome were already possessed of spiritual gifts, is evident from Rom. xii., where directions are given concerning the employment of them. A number of the Roman brethren, having been converted in the east, may have received spiritual gifts from one or other of the apostles; and with respect to the rest, St. Paul proposed to send some of them with gifts on his coming to Rome.

22. And to both of you and me. — As often as the apostle communicated spiritual gifts to their disciples, it was a new proof to themselves of the divine presence with them, and an additional encouragement to their duty, and their trust in God in the eyes of others, both of which, no doubt, gave them great joy.

23. To the Greeks and to the barbarians. — Under the name of Greeks, the Romans were comprehended, because they were now become a learned and polished people. For the meaning of the same barbarians, see 1 Cor. i. 16. and 18.

24. — The original word, Εὐσεβία, was first used by the LXX., to designate the piety of the Jews, and was afterwards borrowed by the apostles in the description of the Gentiles in their translation of Is. lx. 6. lit. 1. where Messiah's preaching good tidings to the poor is foretold; (see Luke iv. 18.) the apostles justly appropriated it to the preaching of the gospel, as the best news mankind could hear. In regard that Paul, after acknowledging he was bound to preach the gospel both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, adds, that he is ready to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome, the idolatrous inhabitants of Rome certainly were included in the expression, you who are in Rome. This verse, therefore, as well as the following, is a proof that the epistle to the Romans was intended, not for the Roman brethren alone, but for unbelievers also, to whom copies of it might be shown.

25. — For I am not ashamed of the gospel. — Here the apostle imputes, with great propriety, that the gospel is not an instrument like the heathen mysteries, which the keepers concealed from all but the initiated; either because they were ashamed of the name of the apostles; or because they thought the only way to render them venerable, was to conceal them; whereas the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, being beneficial and useful, and God's intended means of saving men, should have been openly published. Perhaps, also, the apostle meant, that notwithstanding the idolatrous Greeks and Romans boasted of their genius and learning, he would boldly preach the gospel even to them, fully assured that it is 'the power of God unto salvation;' — a dispensation of religion in which God most effectually exerted his power, for saving every one who believeth.

26. To the Jew first. — This is said, because, according to Christ's commandment, the gospel was to be first preached to the Jews, as the keepers of the ancient revelations. See Rom. xv. 8. note l.

27. And also to the Gentile. — After Alexander's &c.'s establishment of their empire in Egypt, and Asia, the inhabitants of these countries were considered as Greeks, because they generally spoke the Greek language; and so a line of Grecian literature and theology was established, and it was, with the other idolatrous nations, they naturally called all the heathens Greeks. Hence, in their language, Jews and Greek comprehended one mankind.

28. For the righteousness of God by faith, is revealed in it, in order to faith. — This translation, which results from construing the words properly, affords a clear sense of a passage, which,

(3) the just by faith, shall live.

In the 19th century, however, the work of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men, who confine the truth (s. 165.) by unrighteousness.

19 Because that which may be known of God is manifest among them; for God hath manifested it to them.

20 For his invisible things, even his eternal power, and Godhead, since the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; so that they are 21 Because, though they knew God, they did not glorify him as God; in the common translation, is absolutely untranslatable. Besides, it is shown to be the right translation by other passages of Scripture, in the original, as, for instance, "to discover his

22 It is in this sense that the apostle, in the 18th verse, speaks of the" 'unspeakable gift' of God, in the 20th verse, he speaks of the" 'eternal power' of God, in the 21st verse, he speaks of the" 'eternal

23 And the apostle's explanation is confirmed by the writings of the philosophers. And in the 20th verse, he speaks of the" 'eternal power' of God, in the 21st verse, he speaks of the" 'eternal

24 And Godhead. The true God being eternal, is thereby distinguished from the fictitious gods of the heathens, who all had a beginning; the most ancient of them having come out of chaos, and their birth being sung by the heathen poets.

25 Being understood by the things that are made, this in the mundane system every thing is so formed, that to the pious among the vulgar, God himself appears to be the author of all the operations of nature. But they who have attained a partial knowledge of what is called natural philosophy, have, from the discovery of some second causes, been led to fancy, that the whole system may be accounted for without the intervention of a deity. This is what the apostle calls, in the 21st verse, 'becoming fools by their own reasonings.'

26 Nor is it necessary to add, that the philosophers, knowing, that second causes, properly speaking, are no causes, because they have no efficiency in themselves, but are set in motion by God. And the more natural philosophy always ends, where the natural sense of mankind begins.

27 Because they knew not God.
neither gave him thanks, but (μακροθυμοῦντες) they became foolish by their own reasonings, and their (ἀναπαραγωγὸν) imprudent heart was darkened. (See Jer. x. 14.)

23 Preferring to be (εὐαγγελίζοντας) wise men, (see 1 Cor. i. 20. note 1.) they became fools:

24 For they changed the glory of the incorruptible God, into the likeness of an image of corruptible man, and of birds, and of four-footed beasts, and of creeping things.

25 Therefore also God (εὐεργέτης) through the lusts of their own hearts, delivered them over to uncleanness, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves.

26 Who changed the truth concerning God, concerning God, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) into a lie, and worshipping and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

27 (As ever) For this God delivered them speak of him with reverence, and to worship him publicly, as the law and the prophets taught. This is the manner of the Gentiles, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) who delight in the knowledge of God, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) but become foolish by their own reasonings, and their (ἀναπαραγωγὸν) imprudent heart is darkened. (See Jer. x. 14.)

28 Therefore also God (εὐεργέτης) through the lusts of their own hearts, delivered them over to uncleanness, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves.

29 Who changed the truth concerning God, into a lie, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) by worshipping and serving devils, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) (see 1 Cor. i. 20. note 1.) they became fools:

30 For they changed the glory of the incorruptible God, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) into the likeness of an image of corruptible man, and of birds, and of four-footed beasts, and of creeping things.

31 Therefore also God (εὐεργέτης) through the lusts of their own hearts, delivered them over to uncleanness, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves.

32 Who changed the truth concerning God, concerning God, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) into a lie, and worshipping and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

33 (As ever) For this God delivered them speak of him with reverence, and to worship him publicly, as the law and the prophets taught. This is the manner of the Gentiles, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) who delight in the knowledge of God, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) but become foolish by their own reasonings, and their (ἀναπαραγωγὸν) imprudent heart is darkened. (See Jer. x. 14.)

34 Therefore also God (εὐεργέτης) through the lusts of their own hearts, delivered them over to uncleanness, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves.

35 Who changed the truth concerning God, concerning God, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) into a lie, and worshipping and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

36 I say, because they changed the truth concerning God, into a lie, we have never heard of any psalm or hymn composed by any heathen poet or philosopher in honour of the true God.

37 But became creators of the gods which are in the heavens, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) worshipping and serving them, these are the causes for which God pronounced them to be under the curse (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) of a curse.

38 For the truth concerning God is declared to us (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) in the gospel by him who sent the law to keep it, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) and for this cause the law is called a ministration of death, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) and not of life, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) because the commandment was given us through Moses, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) and not through the gospel.

39 For this is he who has the power to deliver thee from the power of darkness, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) and to bring thee into the kingdom of the Son of his love, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) whom he has predestinated before the world began, (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) to be his glory. (εὐεργέτης, εὐεργέτης) over to shameful passions: for even their female changed the natural use2 into what is counter to nature.

21 In like manner also, the males, leaving the natural use of the female, burned with their lust towards one another, males with males, having received what is shameful, that which is shameful and unbecoming,2 and receiving (ε) in themselves that recompense of their error, which was fit.

22 And as they did not approve2 of holding God with acknowledgment,2 God delivered them over to an ungodly mind, to work4 those things which are not suitable:

23 Being filled with all injustice, fornication, lict, God left them to be led by the most shameful lusts. For even their women changed the natural use of their bodies into that which is counter to nature, burning with lust towards one another.

21 In like manner also, the men, forsaking the natural use of the women, burned with their lust towards one another, men with men, having received that which is shameful, and unbecoming, and receiving (ε) in themselves that recompense of their error, which was fit.

22 And as they did not approve2 of holding God with acknowledgment,2 God delivered them over to an ungodly mind, to

23 Being filled with all injustice, fornication, witless,1 covetousness, malicious-ness;2 full of envy, murder, strife, cunning, bad disposition,1 whispers,1

24 Revilers, haters of God, disobedient,4 proud,4 punishment inflicted by God on the Greek legislators, philosophers and priests, for having established polytheism and idolatry as the public religion; but in this verse, and what follows, he represents the law of God as fitted to all mankind, and as righteous,1 wicedness, on account of the same crime. And the punishment was just, because it was the extreme propensity of the people to work wickedness, which led to the Jews’ rejection of the law.
The Jewish and idolatry was the only religion proper for them. So that because their rulers, they justly shared with them the punishment for the same crime.

25 For even their female changed the natural use.1—The women of Lesbos are said by ancient authors to have been, many of them, guilty of this vice. They were called Triboides. Martial inscribes the 90th epigram of his first book to a woman of that character, named Zena. See Senec. Epist. ii. 79.

Ver. 23.—1. Males with males working out that which is shameful.
2. That which is shameful and unbecoming, and receiving (ε) in themselves that recompense of their error, which was fit.

Ver. 25.—1. Males with males working out that which is shameful.
2. That which is shameful and unbecoming, and receiving (ε) in themselves that recompense of their error, which was fit.

The apostle is not speaking simply of the Greeks committing the uncleanness which he mentions, but of their legislatures authorizing these vices, and thus authorizing the execution of the sentence of punishment. With respect to fornication, the heathens themselves were the first to denounce the immorality of their deeds. At Corinth, for example, as Stabbos informs us, ib. vili. p. 386., there was a temple of Venus, where more than a thousand courteasees (the gift of pious persons of both sexes) prostituted themselves in honour of the goddess; and that thus the city was crowded, and became wealthy. In the court of the temple of Venus at Cadiz, there were tents placed under the trees for the same lewd purposes. Lucian.

26. Amores.1—And 2 Mac. vi. 4, we are told, "the temple was filled with riot and revelling by the Gentiles, who dallied with harlots, and had to do with women in the circuit of the holy place."
With respect to sodomy, it is not so commonly known that it was prevalent in ancient times. Among the worst vices, however, was the history which is given of Josiah’s endeavours to destroy idolatry, there is direct evidence of it. 2 Kings xxi. 7. And he brake down the high places of the house of the Lord, that he might not cause his people to sin.

That the Greek philosophers of the greatest reputation were influenced by the same spirit, the history of Erasistratus, is affirmed by ancient authors of good reputation. With the latter crime Terrbillian and Naslammn have charged Socrates himself, in passages of their writings. The same charge, thus written, hath brought against him, Diogenes, ib. lib. xlviii. Not to speak of Lucian, who, in many passages of his writings, hath directly accused him of that vice. I am not ignorant, however, that some learned moderns have endeavoured to clear Socrates from that accusation, by observing that neither Aristophanes, in his comedy of the Clouds, written on purpose to discredit Socrates, nor his accu-sators at his trial, have advanced any thing tending to impeach him on that head; and that it is not probable Socrates would have dis-sanctified his discourses from unnatural love, as we know he did, (Xepos. Memor. ib. c. 2, 5,) if he had been accused to himself. But it need not be presumed that Socrates was so calamitous and so persevering in their conversation, Xenophon certainly did not mean to dishonour his master, nor to expose him to opprobrious proof, as he writes, small estimation charity was in the eye both of the master and of his disciples. The above mentioned Athensian has charged Aristophanes; and Oronton, ib. 14, 15, a little scandalous flattery, in which accuracy he is joined by Theodor, as quoted by Eustis. Theodor likewise takes notice, that Lycurgus, the legislator of Sparta, mentioned the love of both sexes, favourable to the same. Senec.

27 Maliciousness.—Euph., is a disposition to injure others, from ill-will to them in general. In relation to the conversation of Euph., in presence of two of his disciples, advised the prostitute to supply persons to bring lovers to her, and taught her the most artistical method of exciting their passions, and bestowing her favours;
and this he professedly for the purpose of effectually retaning them in her service; and this advancement of money for that service, as it was called ἐξωλοκλέαται, without feeling, Eph. br. 19.

To work with the sword (ἦλθεν) here, as in many other passages, denotes the habit of doing a thing.

Ver. 29.—1. Being filled with wicklessness.1—Illegitima, is a disposition to injure others, by deceit. Hence the devil is called ἡ διασπο-ρα, the wicked one, by way of eminence.

2. Maliciousness.—Euph., is a disposition to injure others, from ill-will to them in general. In relation to the conversation of Euph., in presence of two of his disciples, advised the prostitute to supply persons to bring lovers to her, and taught her the most artistical method of exciting their passions, and bestowing her favours;
and this he professedly for the purpose of effectually retaning them in her service; and this advancement of money for that service, as it was called ἐξωλοκλέαται, without feeling, Eph. br. 19.

To work with the sword (ἦλθεν) here, as in many other passages, denotes the habit of doing a thing.

3. Bad disposition.—Æsopat. According to Aristotle, a disposition to injure others, by deceit. Hence the devil is called ἡ διασπο-ρα, the wicked one, by way of eminence.

4. Maliciousness.—Æsopat. is a disposition to injure others, from ill-will to them in general. In relation to the conversation of Euph., in presence of two of his disciples, advised the prostitute to supply persons to bring lovers to her, and taught her the most artistical method of exciting their passions, and bestowing her favours;
and this he professedly for the purpose of effectually retaning them in her service; and this advancement of money for that service, as it was called ἐξωλοκλέαται, without feeling, Eph. br. 19.

To work with the sword (ἦλθεν) here, as in many other passages, denotes the habit of doing a thing.

4. Whispers.—Sulp., are those who secretly speak evil of persons when they are present.

5. Insolent.—Æsopat. is distinguished from whispers, are persons who speak evil of others to their face, giving them notice of their intentions, but without publication of their slander.

2. Proud—\textit{ttestoteos}, are persons elated on account of their fortune, or station, or office. 7.

4. Boasters—\textit{Aogwvnoi}, are persons who assume to themselves the reputation of qualities which they do not possess. Ver. 31. 1. Ingratitude—\textit{avdverwv}, are persons who, not forming just judgments of things, act improperly. 2. Covenant breakers—\textit{Aemwsewv}, The Greeks expressed the making of covenants by the word \textit{exwhlwv}. 3. Without natural affection—In this the apostle seems to have had the Stoics in his eye, who recommended their apathy, or freedom from all affection and passion, as the highest pitch of virtue; and, so far as to convert love and hatred into mere legal relations, and to make the conscience of guilt, and the feeling of sin, mere technical terms.

Ver. 32.—1. Who though they know (\textit{didvwv}) the law of God—The original word, \textit{diavvno}, properly signifies righteous, or a righteous appointment. But because God’s law is founded in righteousness, and is the rule thereof to us, the word is often used in scripture to denote an ordinance, statute, or particular law, Numb. xxix. 21. and in the plural it signifies the precepts of God, Luke i. 6. Rom. ii. 18. Heb. ix. 1; even those which were purely ceremonial, Heb. ix. 10. Here \textit{diavvno} signifies the law of God written on men’s hearts, called by philosophers the law of nature, and by civilians, the law of nations. For the Greeks could know no other law of God, being destitute of revelation. 2. That they who practise such things are worthy of death—God hath written on the hearts of men, not only his law, but the sanction of his law. For the first punishment is inflicted by the conscience of guilt. Further, that the heathens knew that the persons guilty of the crimes mentioned by the apostle merited death, is evident from the laws which they enacted for punishing such persons with death. 3. Have pleasure in those things which they who practise them—In this strict sense, the apostle speaks of the heathens at the Greek legislatures, priests, and philosophers, who, by their institutions, example and presence, encouraged the people in the use of all the deities which have been here mentioned, especially in the celebration of the festivals of their gods.

CHAPTER II.

HAVING shown that the Gentiles could not entertain the least hope of salvation, according to the tenor of the law of nature, it was next to be considered, whether the law of Moses gave the Jews any better hope. This inquiry the apostle managed with great address. Well knowing, that on reading his description of the manners of the Greeks, the Jews would pronounce them worthy of damnation, Romans ii. 13. Wherefore, to show them the vanity of the heathen priests, and the more telling them, that they who passed such a judgment on the Gentiles, were inexcusable in hoping to be saved through the law of Moses; because, by condemning the Gentiles, they virtually condemned themselves, who, being guilty of the very same crimes, were thereby under the curse of Moses’ law, ver. 1. And, to enforce his argument, he first of all shows that they who accept of every species of damnation, passed in the course of the law, upon them who commit such things, is known by all to be according to truth, ver. 2. But although every Jew was condemned by the curse of the law of Moses, they all expected salvation, on account of their being Abraham’s children, Matt. iii. 8, 9. and of their enjoying the benefit of revelation, Rom. iii. 26. Whereupon, the apostle proposed the following question: Doest thou, who condemnest the Gentiles for their crimes, and yet committest the same thyself, think that thou shalt escape the righteous sentence of God, declared in the curse of the law of Moses, merely because thou art a son of Abraham, and a member of God’s visible church? ver. 3. By entertaining such a notion, thou judgest amiss of thy privileges, which are bestowed on thee, not to make sinning more safe to thee than to others, but to lead thee to repentance, ver. 4. These privileges, therefore, instead of making thy salvation sure, if abused by thy obdurate and impatient heart, will make thy punishment greater in the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, ver. 5.

Hating having mentioned the general judgment, the apostle, for the instruction of the Jews, and of all who, like them, expect salvation because they are favoured with revelation, discovered at large concerning future retributions. And first of all he shewed them, from the natural character of God, that rewards and punishments will be dispensed at the judgment to every man, not according to the outward privileges and advantages which he enjoyed in this life, nor according to the flattering opinion which he entertains of his own conduct, but, according to the truth, ver. 6. More particularly, to them who, by perseverance in well doing, earnestly seek glory, honour, and immortality, God will render eternal life, ver. 7. But them who obey unrighteousness, he will punish with indignation and wrath, ver. 8. Lost, however, the Jews might have imagined, from the apostle’s mentioning eternal life, ver. 7. that he spake only of the reward of the Gentiles, and not of God only, and that no others are to have eternal life, he repeated his account of the judgment in such terms as to make his readers sensible that he is speaking of men of all nations and religions: ‘Affliction and anguish shall come upon every soul of man who worketh evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Greek,’ ver. 9. But glory, honour, and peace shall be to every one who worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek,’ ver. 10. For as Jew and Greek is a division which comprehends all mankind, there can be no doubt of the apostle’s intention to declare, on the one hand, that every impenitent sinner, and among the rest the impenitent members of God’s visible church, shall assuredly be punished, and, on the other, that all who have wrought good, whether they be Jews, or heathens, or Christians, shall have glory, honour, and peace, that is, eternal life, rendered to them, ‘Because with God there is no respect of persons,’ ver. 11. His account of the judgment, the apostle introduced in this place with great propriety, not only for the reasons already mentioned, but lest the heathen philosophers and Jewish scribes, from his teaching that no man can be saved either by the law of nature or by the law of Moses, might have suspected it to be his opinion, that all are to such good works as Jews and heathens perform, who are out of the Christian church, will be of no use to them at the last. For by declaring that glory and peace shall come not only upon such Jews, but upon such Greeks, as have wrought good, he hath taught that salvation is not confined to them who have enjoyed revelation; that in all nations there are men who fear God, and work righteousness; and that, at the judgment, such shall have the benefit of the method of salvation, established at the fall and revealed in the gospel, extended to them, though it was not discovered to them during their lifetime on earth.

Moreover, because the Jews really held the uncharitable opinion, falsely imputed to the apostle, consigning to damnation all who had not the Mosaic revelation, the apostle assured them, that the revealed law of God is not the rule by which the heathens are to be judged: 'As many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law; without being judged by any revealed law. So that in punishing them, God will consider those hardships and the alleviations of their sins, which resulted from the imperfection of the dispensation under which they were placed, and will make proper allowances: Whereas all who have sinned under a revealed law, shall be judged by that law; the aggravations of their sins, resulting from the advantages they enjoyed, will be taken into account, and punished, ver. 15. And with respect to men's being saved, because they have enjoyed an external revelation, the apostle expressly declared, that 'not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified,' ver. 13.

He therefore concluded, that when the Gentiles, who have not a revealed law, do, by the guidance of natural reason, the things enjoined by the law, these men furnish a law to themselves, by which they must direct themselves, ver. 14. and show that there is a law of God written in their hearts, to which their reason and conscience bear witness, ver. 15.; which, if they obey sincerely, they shall obtain eternal life in the day when God will judge the hidden things of men, namely, their inward dispositions, by Jesus Christ, according to the gospel which Paul everywhere preached, ver. 16.

Here let it be observed, first, That, by making 'the doing of law,' ver. 13. as far as our imperfections will admit, necessary to justification, the apostle hath guarded his readers against misinterpreting the doctrine he was about to deliver, chap. iii. 28. 'They by faith man is justified by the law.' For if he had not explicitly declared, that the doing of law to a certain degree is necessary, even when men are justified freely through Christ, it might have been objected, that he made void their obligation to do good works altogether.—Farther, by declaring, at the conclusion of his account of the judgment, that in punishing the wicked, and rewarding the righteous, both among the Jews and Greeks, God will proceed 'according to his Gospel,' the apostle hath taught us two things of great importance. The first is, that in judging men God will not proceed according to the tenor, either of the law of nature or of the law of Moses, by inquiring after an obedience absolutely perfect; because, according to that method of judgment, no one could be acquitted. 'But he will judge their hidden things,' their inward frame of mind; 'according to the Gospel; that is, he will examine, whether in the present life men have been guided by a sincere desire to know and to do his will, in whatever manner it was manifested to them. And in whomsoever such a faith is found, he will count it for righteousness and reward it.' And possessed it were a Gentile, a Jew, or a Christian.

The second thing taught in this declaration is, that wicked men, of all nations, shall be punished according to the demerit of their sins, while the righteous shall be rewarded, not on account of the merit of their good works, but through the mere favour of God, who, for the sake of Christ, will accept their spirit of faith, as if it were a perfect righteousness. For these being the doctrines which Paul everywhere preached, they are his gospel, according to which men are to be judged.

In the next place, to show the unbelieving Jews the vanity of placing their hope of salvation on God's having chosen them, for his people, and on his having given them the law, the apostle inquired what efficacy the law of Moses, with their other privileges as the people of God, had had in leading the men of rank and learning among the Jews to a right practice. Now, that he might not seem to undervalue their privileges as Jews, he enumerated them particularly: 'Behold, thou art called a Jew and restest in the law,' ver. 20.—Then asked the doctors and scribes, how it came to pass that, notwithstanding they had the express image of knowledge and truth in the law, and had set themselves up as guides of the blind Gentiles, they had not so instructed themselves, as to refrain from breaking the law in the many flagrant transgressions which he mentioned, ver. 21.

At the same time, that he might not charge the Jews with those gross immorality without foundation, he quoted passages from their own scriptures, which declare, that the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles through the wickedness of the Jewish rulers and scribes, ver. 22. Not the hearers of the law, but the doers of it, shall be justified, the men of rank and learning among the Jews, being so wicked, had not the least ground to expect salvation through the law, but were under a necessity of seeking justification through faith: and the Gentiles were under no obligation to be guided, in the interpretation of the revelations of God, unless ver. 19.) by persons whom he mentioned, as to the precepts of revelation.

In the third place, because the Jews expected salvation on account of their being the children of Abraham and members of God's covenant, and gloried in their circumcision as the sign of that covenant, and of their descent from Abraham, the apostle told them, that their circumcision, though a proof of their descent from Abraham, and of their relation to God as his people, would not profit them if they were breakers of the law; but, in that case, they would be in no better a condition than the uncircumcised Gentiles, ver. 25.—Whereas, if the Gentiles are found to have performed the good actions enjoined by the law of God given to the Jews, their uncircumcision would not be a vice. Consequently, they will put the Jews to shame, by obtaining that justification which shall be denied to the Jews, ver. 27.—For he is not a Jew, or son of Abraham, and heir of the promises, who is so by descent and profession only, ver. 28; but he is a son of Abraham, and an heir of the promises, in their highest meaning, whatever his pedigree or profession of religion may be, who is Abraham's son in the temper of his mind: and true circumcision is that of the heart, which is made by cutting off evil affections, according to the spirit, and not according to the letter of the law of circumcision. And where that circumcision was found, though such a person might not receive praise from the Jews, as one of the people of God, he shall assuredly receive it from God at the judgment, who will own him as one of his people, by conferring upon him the blessings promised to Abraham, and to his seed, ver. 29.

Reader, behold and admire the benignity and impartiality of the divine government, as set forth in the gospel. And when the more perfect are not rewarded according to their works, without showing more favour to those who have enjoyed revelation, than to those who, in the exercise of his sovereignty, have been denied that favour. In other words, the enjoyment of revelation will not be imputed to any man for merit, nor the want of it be considered as a fault; but, in judging men, God most righteous will consider the advantages and disadvantages which result from the nature of the dispensation under which they lived, and will pass sentence upon them accordingly. And therefore, if, at the judgment, some who have not enjoyed revelation are found to have feared God, and wrought righteousness, notwithstanding the disadvantages they laboured under, he will not deny them those rewards, which persons in more happy circumstances have reason to expect from his mercy in Christ.

To this liberal doctrine it hath been objected,

1. That no works being good, but such as proceed from faith, none of the heathens will be found at the judgment to have wrought good, as they had no opportunity to believe the revelations of God: consequently, the apostle's doctrine, that glory, honour, and peace, shall be to every one who worketh good, is not to be understood of the heathens, but must be limited to such Jews and Greeks as have enjoyed the benefit of an external revelation.

But the answer is, Faith does not consist in the belief of particular doctrines, (See Rom. iii. 28. note 1,) but is in the belief of doctrines which men never had an opportunity of knowing; but in such an earnest desire to know and do the will of God, as leads them conscientiously to use such means as they have, for gaining the knowledge of his will, and for doing it when found. Of this kind was Abraham's faith. (See Rom. iv. 3. note 1.) And inasmuch as the influences of the Spirit of God are not confined to them who enjoy revelation, but are promised in the gracious covenant made with mankind at the fall to all who are sincere, a heathen by these influences may attain the faith just now described, and thereby may please God. For faith is more a work of the heart, than of the understanding. So our apostle says, Rom. x. 10. 'With the heart, we believe unto righteousness.'

So that although the persons to whom revelation is denied, may not have the same objects of belief with those who enjoy revelation, they may have 'the same spirit of faith,' as it is termed, 2 Cor. iv. 13. Of this Abraham, Rahab, the centurion, whose son Christ healed, the Ethiopian eunuch, are examples. In the one, the influences he exercised such faith as was acceptable to God. And therefore Peter did not scruple to say, Acts x. 38. 'Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but, in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him.' And 1 Pet. i. 17. 'The Father, without respect of persons, judgeth according to each man's work.'

That the pious heathens should have their faith counted to them for righteousness at the judgment, notwithstanding it may have been deficient in many particulars, and even erroneous, is not unreasonable; provided, in these instances of error, they have used their best endeavours to know the truth, and not been led by these errors into habitual sin. For, as Mr. Clarke observes, in his treatise of self-examination, chap. vii. "When one takes a view of false religions, they seem to make no less impression on the heart of those who are sincere in them, than the true religion does on the hearts of the faithful. In the one and in the other, we see the same good intention, the same zeal, the same readiness to do everything they believe will tend to the glory of God: they love God, according to the ideas they form of him; they worship him in their own way; and through fear of him, they endeavour to live irreproachably among men." Between them, indeed, there is this difference—the conceptions of the one are true, but the notions of the other are in many particulars false. And since the true religion pays to God a rational service, whereas the worship of the other is mixed with much superstition, however, as the pre-emience of the one above the other, in point of knowledge and worship, is owing not to the greater rectitude of their dispositions, but to the greater favour of God, who hath bestowed on them a more perfect discovery of his will, why should it be thought strange, that God, who is equally related to all his creatures, should, in judging them, consider the circumstances of each, and make the proper allowances, (as the apostle expressly affirms in this chap. ver. 18,) and bestow on them, for the sake of Christ, such a degree of happiness as their good disposition makes them capable of enjoying! In short, if the heathens are not to be saved by having their spirit of faith counted to them for righteousness, through Christ, notwithstanding they have lived in false religions, what shall we say concerning the salvation of the various sects of Christians, many of whom, in the articles of their faith, differ from one another, and from truth, almost as widely as they do from some who live and die in paganism?

2. It hath been objected to the salvation of the heathens, that they have not that explicit knowledge of Christ, nor faith in him, which is required in the gospel. But to this I reply—The gospel does not make it necessary to salvation, that men have an explicit knowledge of Christ, and a direct faith in him, if they never have had an opportunity of knowing and believing on him. On the contrary, by informing us, that all mankind live at present, and shall hereafter be raised from the dead through the influence of Christ, although the greatest part of them know nothing of him, nor of his obedience, the sacred oracles lead us to conclude, that at the general judgment many shall be saved through Christ who till then never heard of him. Besides, is it not as agreeable to justice and goodness to save the pious heathens through Christ, notwithstanding they never heard of him, as it was to condemn all mankind to death, for the sin of Adam, although the greatest part of them never heard of his disobedience? Withal, since at the judgment the ground of the salvation of mankind shall be declared in the hearing of the assembled universe, the discovery of Christ as Saviour will be made to the saved heathens, in time sufficient to lay a foundation and love for him, through all eternity. In fine, if the efficacy of Christ's obedience does not extend to the saving of the pious heathens, what interpretation can we put on Rom. v. 12–21. where the professed purpose of the apostle's reasoning is to show, that the effects of Christ's obedience are greater than the consequence of Adam's disobedience?

To the salvation of the heathens this objection, if justifying faith consists not so much in the number and extent of the doctrines believed, as in the disposition of the heart to believe, so that many who have lived and died in false religions may be saved, what purpose does it serve to give any of mankind the true form of faith and worship by revelation! This objection the apostle himself hath stated in the beginning of chap. iii., and hath answered it very solidly, by shewing, that in the true religion men have many more and better opportunities of cultivating good dispositions, and of being prepared for heaven by the discoveries which revelation makes of spiritual things, than can be had in any false religion; the errors of which, though they may not absolutely extinguish goodness of heart, are certainly great impediments to virtue, if not rather temptations to sin. In short, the true form of religion, instead of being of no use, is the greatest blessing men can enjoy; because, by affording better means of improvement, it enables them to acquire a greater measure of virtue, and a more distinguished reward.

This illustration will not be thought tedious by those who consider the importance of rightly understanding what the gospel teaches concerning the salvation of the heathens. For,

First, To know that this liberal doctrine makes part of the Christian revelation, must give the highest pleasure to every benevolent mind, on account of the glory which will redound to God, from the salvation of so many of the human race, through the coming of his Son into the world.

In the second place, This liberal doctrine puts an end to those specious cavils, whereby the enemies of revelation have endeavoured to discredit the gospel in the eyes of the intelligent. For it can no longer be pretended, that by making faith the means of salvation, the gospel hath consigned all the heathens to damnation. Neither can God be accused of partiality, in conferring the benefit of revelation upon so small a portion of the human race, in the false notion, that the actual knowledge of revelation is necessary to salvation. For although the number of those who have lived without revelation, hath hitherto been much greater than of those who have enjoyed that benefit, no unrighteousness can be imputed to God, since he hath not excluded those from salvation who have been denied revelation, but hath graciously determined, that all in every dispensation, who, by perseverance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, shall obtain eternal life, by having their spirit of faith counted to them for righteousness, through Jesus Christ. But however, all the heathens who have not been so, shall be condemned, not because they lived without revelation, but because they have lived in opposition to the law of God written on their heart. Wherefore, the strongest of all the objections with which revelation hath been attacked having no foundation, the gospel ought to be received by every one to whom it is offered, as a discovery from God of the only method in which sinners can be saved; namely, not by a 'righteousness of law,' which in our present state is unattainable, but by a 'righteousness of faith,' counted to us by the mere favour of God, on account of the obediency of Christ.

CHAP. II.—1 Since all who practise these crimes are worthy of death, thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art, who thus judgest, and yet expectest that thyself shalt be saved: for whilst thou judgest the Gentiles worthy of death, thou condemnest thyself; because thou who thus judgest, committest the very same things.

2 Besides, we know that the sentence of God contained in the curse of the law, which is here inexcusable to all that commit sin, is not only upon the Jews who commit such crimes, and condemns them to death. 3 This being the case, dost thou think, O Jewish man, who condemnest those heathens who commit such sins, and yet committest the same sins thyself, that thou shalt escape the sentence of God because thou art a son of Abraham, and a member of God's visible church?

4 Or dost thou misconstrue the greatness of his goodness, in supposeing that a revelation of his will, and an ascension of his people, and his being slow to anger with thee, by inferring from those things that God will not punish thee; not knowing that this goodness of God is designed to lead thee to repentance?

5 Whatever thou mayest think, in proportion to thy own obstinacy and impenitence of heart, thou layest up in store for thyself punishment, to be inflicted on thee in the day of punishment, when there shall be an open display of the righteous judgment of God made before the assembled universe;

6 Will that render to every man, not according to his external privileges, but according to the real nature of his works:

VER. 1. Wherefore thou art inexcusable.—Here the italic particle διά is used to introduce a conclusion, not from what goes before, but from something not expressed, the proof of which is to be immediately added: As if the apostle had said, For this reason, O Jew thou art with reason, in judging the Gentiles worthy of death, because by that judgment thou condemnest thyself. Accordingly, to show that he was thinking of the judgment which the Jews passed on the Gentiles for their crimes, he immediately adds: For whereas thou judgest the Gentiles worthy of death, thou condemnest thyself; because thou who judgest, committest the same things. Whiby, in his note on this verse, quotes passages from Josephus, by which it appears that the Jews in his time were guilty of most of the crimes imputed to the Greeks in the first chapter of the epistle. 2. VER. 1. Or dost thou misconstruc. —The original word εἰσαγγέλλεται, is compounded of εἰσαγγέλλεται, to think, and the preposition ἀντι, against, signifies literally to think against, and is fully illustrated in this place. 'Dost thou form a wrong opinion' of the goodness of God? 'Dost thou misconstrue it? See 1 Cor. xii. 22, where the Greek word has the same signification. God's goodness, of which the Jews formed a wrong opinion, consisted in his having made them his church and people, and in his having bestowed on them a revelation of his will. From these marks of the divine favour, they vainly inferred that God would punish no descendent of Abraham for his sins. But in this they formed a very wrong judgment of the goodness of God, which was not intended to make sinners safe, but was designed to lead them to repentance. 2. And forbearance. —Ἀφορμα, forbearance, is that disposition in God, by which he restrains himself from instantly punishing sinners. 3. ROMANS.

8. But to them who are contentions,1 and they not the truth,2 but only unrighteousness,3 anger and wrath4 shall be.

9. I say affliction and great distress shall come upon every soul of man who worketh evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Greek.

10. But glory, honour and peace, shall be to every one who worketh good, first to the Jew, and also to the Greek.

11. (On ἀλλὰ τίς ἐπιδιώκειν παραιτόμενον;) For there is no respect of persons with God.

12. As many (ἀλλὰ ἡμένας) therefore, as have sinned without law, shall also perish without being judged by law; and as many as have sinned (ὑπὸ ἑαυτῶν), under law, shall be judged by law.

13. For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

14. For we know that the law is good, if a man do the things wherein it saith.

15. But though the outward letter be made void, the inward spirit is everlastingly living in the heart of man. And the hearers of the law are not justified, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

16. But the law is not without virtue, for it shows the things which are good.

17. But when the law is without virtue, it is not a law any more, but a command.

18. For example, the law of Moses, ἐν τούτῳ ἑαυτῷ, is written in the law of the Jew, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, and the Gentile, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἕλληνω καὶ ἑαυτῷ, is the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ. And the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ, is the law of faith, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῇ πίστει. And the law of faith, ἐν τῇ πίστει, is the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ. And the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ, is the law of the Spirit, ἐν τῷ άναρχίᾳ τῆς συνεχείας.

19. For example, the law of Moses, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, is written in the law of the Jew, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, and the Gentile, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἕλληνω καὶ ἑαυτῷ, is the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ. And the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ, is the law of faith, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῇ πίστει. And the law of faith, ἐν τῇ πίστει, is the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ. And the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ, is the law of the Spirit, ἐν τῷ άναρχίᾳ τῆς συνεχείας.

20. But when the law is without virtue, it is not a law any more, but a command.

21. For example, the law of Moses, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, is written in the law of the Jew, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, and the Gentile, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἕλληνω καὶ ἑαυτῷ, is the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ. And the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ, is the law of faith, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῇ πίστει. And the law of faith, ἐν τῇ πίστει, is the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ. And the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ, is the law of the Spirit, ἐν τῷ άναρχίᾳ τῆς συνεχείας.

22. But when the law is without virtue, it is not a law any more, but a command.

23. For example, the law of Moses, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, is written in the law of the Jew, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἰουδαίῳ, and the Gentile, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Ἕλληνω καὶ ἑαυτῷ, is the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ. And the law of Christ, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῷ Χριστιανῷ, is the law of faith, ἐν τῷ λαῷ τῇ πίστει. And the law of faith, ἐν τῇ πίστει, is the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ. And the law of liberty, ἐν τῇ λυτρωτίᾳ, is the law of the Spirit, ἐν τῷ άναρχίᾳ τῆς συνεχείας.

14 (When therefore the Gentiles, who have not a law, do by nature (Eph. ii. 3, note 2), the things of the law, these persons though they have not a law, are a law to themselves;

15 Who show plainly the work of the law written on their hearts, their conscience bearing witness, and also their reasonings between one another, when they accuse or else excuse each other.

16 In the day, when God will judge the hidden things of men, by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel.

17 Beloved, (swnoµµæς) thou art named a Jew, and restest in the law, and boastest in the gospel; and justification are forensic terms, denoting the act of a Judge, who, after an impartial trial, declares a man guilty or innocent at his bar, either of having neglected some duty, or of having committed some crime. This forensic use of the word justify was the precept concerning the Ishmaelitish judges, Deut. xxi. 1. 'They shall judge thee by the law of the whole country.' This is the law, that justifies the wicked, and he that condemns the just, even they both are abominable to the Lord.'—The second thing suggestible to the apostle is the mention of the word justify for the first time in his account of the judgment, is, That as often as he discourses in this epistle of the justification of sinners, he path in his eye the inquiry which Christ will make into their conduct, and the evidence of acquittal which, as Judge, he will then pronounce on behalves of a lost world. As the punishment and the guilt of the rejected are so clearly explained to be justification, in the title to the reward. In this forensic sense our Lord himself used the word justify, Matt. xxii. 36. 'Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment: 27. For by thy words thou shalt be justified; and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.' Acts xii. 22. 'The forgiveness of sins is termed justification; and, Rom. viii. justification is represented as putting an end to accusation.' 30. Who shall bring an accusation against God? It is written, that judgment shall be for all men also that judge without the law shall be judged by the law;

Such being the use of the word justify in scripture, it is evident, that when the apostle speaks of being justified by deeds or works of righteousness, he means, and declares it to be a matter of fact, that the Judge, delivering an inquiry, that the judge, and his work was performed all that was required of him to get a pardon. But he is not only free from a charge of the promised rewards, and may complain of injustices if these are denounced him. On the other hand, when justification by faith is mentioned, in opposition to justification by deeds of law, the apostle means a gratuitous justification, founded, not on the accused person's innocence or righteousness, but proceeding merely from the mercy of his Judge, who is pleased, out of pure love, to accept of his faith in the place of righteousness, and to reward it as if it were righteousness: and all for the sake of Christ.

This distinction between meritorious and gratuitous justification deserves notice, not only on account of the light which it throws on the apostle's reasoning concerning justification, but because it conciliates his doctrine on that head with the doctrine of the apostle James. The justification which Paul declares to be unattainable by works of righteousness is a justification by the law, declaring that the judge, and his work was performed all that was required of him to get a pardon. babes, having the image of knowledge and of truth in the law.

21 Thou then who teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou who preachest, Do not steal—dost thou steal?

22 Thou (1 Tim. v. 5.) who commandest, Do not commit adultery—dost thou commit adultery? Thou who abhorrest idols, (1 Pet. iv. 19.) dost thou rob temples?

23 Thou who boastest in the law, by the breaking of the law dishonourest thou God?

24 For, as it was written, (Isa. lii. 5.) Ezek. xxxvi. 30.) The name of God is evil spoken of among the Gentiles through you.

25 (1Thess. iii. 9.) New circumcision indeed profieth, if thou practisest law, but if thou be a transgressor of law, thy circumcision hath become uncircumcision.

26 (Rom. vi. 22.) And if the uncircumcision keep (as Levanthic) the precepts of the law, will not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?

27 And will not the uncircumcision, which by nature fulfiilth the law, judge thee a transgressor of law, though a Jew, (from ver. 25.) by the literal circumcision? (see ver. 23.)

28 For he is not a Jew, who is one outwardly, neither is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh:

29 But he is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter of the law. (Psa. 67.) Of this man the praise is not from men, but from God.

Jewish Scriptures. The original word μορφή, according to Boa, signifies the sketch or outline of a thing—its form. But as the Jews are said to have this form in the law, it rather than Paul compare it with the idea of the law, as apostle James likewise does, chap. i. 26.

Ver. 25. Thou who preachest, Do not steal—dost thou steal? This and what follows is mentioned to show, that the knowledge which the scribes and doctors pretended to derive from the law, had no mean influence on the Greeks, as may be seen through their representation of the law, and their claim to be the teachers of the Gentiles, were very little to be regarded by the Gentiles.

Ver. 26. The Jews who defamed the Levites of their titles are said, Mal. iii. 8. 'to rob God.'

Ver. 28. Circumcision indeed profieth, if thou practisest law—meaning that the legalism, which was the system of doctrine and life, which the Jews were set up to represent, as the apostle James likewise does, chap. i. 26.

Ver. 29. Keep (as is rendered) the precepts of the law. For this translation, see Rom. i. 22 note. 1. The law, here and in the following verse cannot be the law of Moses, because the uncircumcised Gentiles could not keep the precepts of that law; they were utterly ignorant of them, and never could, by any exercise of reason, find out either that they were agreeable to God, or that he required them of the Gentiles. Most commentators are of opinion, that the moral precepts of the law can be known by the light of nature, and to men, and to no other. They are properly expressed by words which literally signify righteousness of the law; because they who keep them are accounted righteous in the sight of God; that is, are treated by God as righteous persons for the sake of Christ.

Ver. 27. The uncircumcision which by nature fulfiilth the law—The words by nature are added by the common translation, because he is speaking of persons without revelation, and not of the converted Gentiles; nor of those who are called Jews, but of those, who being uncircumcised, by abiding in the law, and their claim to be the teachers of the Gentiles, were very little to be regarded by the Gentiles.

Ver. 28. He will not be a Jew who is one outwardly, nor is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter of the law. And this form the praise is not from men, but from God.
CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Subjects handled in this Chapter.

The foregoing reasons being contrary to the prejudices of the Jews, one of that nation is here introduced, objecting, if our being the children of Abraham, members of the church of God, and heirs of the promises, will procure us no favour at the judgment, and if the want of these privileges will notpreclude the heathens from salvation, what is the pre-emminence of a Jew above a Gentile, and what is the advantage of our being made the visible church of God? ver. 1.—The apostle replied, that the Jews, as a nation, enjoyed great advantages by being the church of God: To them were committed the oracles of God, the law of Moses, and the writings of the prophets, in which the coming of the seed of Abraham, who was to bless all nations, is foretold, ver. 2. —But says the Jews, what good have we derived from these? we are at present not beseeching thee, or any one else, on whom you affirm to be the seed of Abraham? Will not our unbelief, as you have often told us, (See View prefixed to chap. xi.) occasion our rejection, and thereby destroy the faithfulness of God, who promised to Abraham to be a God to him, and to his seed in their generations? ver. 3.—This consequence the apostle denied: Notwithstanding all the advantages of the church of Abraham were rejected for unbelief, the faithfulness of God would not be destroyed thereby, but rather established, as the casting of Abraham's seed out of the covenant, for unbelief and disobedience, was tacitly threatened in the covenant itself, ver. 4. —But, replied the Jew, if our unrighteousness, in not believing on Jesus, establisheth the faithfulness of God, by occasioning our losing the privileges of the covenant, Is not God unrighteous in destroying us also as a nation, for the sin of not believing in Jesus? ver. 5. —By no means, answered the apostle; for if no sin could be righteously punished which is attended with good consequences, 'How shall God judge the world'?' How shall he render to every man according to his works?' ver. 6. —And the like he urged his objection in a stronger form, as follows:—If the truth of God, in executing his threatenings on us as a nation, hath abounded to his glory through our lies, why are we punished as sinners individually for what hath contributed so exceedingly to God's glory that it can scarcely be called a sin? To this objection the apostle adds, Why not say also, what we apostles are slanderously reported to practise, and even to order, 'Let us do evil, that good may come?' This pernicious doctrine the apostle reproved with abhorrence, by declaring, that the condemnation of those who hold it is most just, ver. 8. which is all he now thought fit to say on the subject; intending to confute both this objection and the slander more fully afterwards, chap. vii. viii.

Because the apostle had affirmed, ver. 2. that the pre-emminence of the Jews above the Gentiles consisted in the advantages which they derived from the oracles of God, for improving themselves in knowledge and virtue, the Jews ask, Do you acknowledge that we excel the Gentiles inworthiness and character, and that on account thereof we are entitled to be justified by the law? Not at all, says the apostle; for we have formerly, chap. i. and ii. proved Jews and Gentiles, that is, the scribes, Pharisees, and lawyers among the Jews, and the statesmen, philosophers, and common people of the Gentiles, to be all under sin, and obliged to seek justification by faith, ver. 9. —And with respect to the common people of the Jews, I will shew you, by passages from your own scriptures, that the generality of them have always been exceedingly corrupt, notwithstanding the advantages which they derived from the oracles of God, ver. 12-18. —Wherefore, Jews and Gentiles being sinners, every mouth of man, pretending to justification as due on account of works, is effectually stopped, both by the law of nature and by the law of Moses, and all the world stands condemned by both, as liable to punishment from God, ver. 19. —The apostle having thus, step by step, led his readers to the great conclusion which he meant to establish, he produces it as the result of all his reasonings hitherto: 'Wherefore, by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight; because through law is the knowledge of sin;' ver. 20. —that is, neither Jew nor Gentile can be justified meritoriously by works of law; for in the sight of God, without justice, and without the knowledge of sin, it is not possible that sinners can be justified; consequently, the universal want of justice and of the knowledge of sin is the foundation of their case; and the only operation to make sinners sensible, that they are liable to condemnation, without giving them the least hope of mercy; so that any expectation of eternal life which sinners can entertain, must be founded upon a method of justification different from that of law. This being the proper place for it, the apostle introduces his statement of the doctrine of justification by faith, as it is revealed in the gospel, as follows:—Because both the law of nature and the law of Moses hath made perfect obedience necessary to justification, and because no man is able to give such an obedience, a righteousness without law, that is a different righteousness from perfect obedience to any law whatever, is now discovered, in the gospel to be what God requires in order to salvation. And to reconcile the Jews to that kind of righteousness, the apostle told them, (deferring the proof of his assertion till afterwards, chap. iv. 1-8.) that 'it is testified by the law and the prophets,' ver. 21. —Even the righteousness which God hath appointed from the beginning, as the righteousness of sinners; a righteousness which is through the faith joining of Christ, ver. 23. —And he is to becounted to all, and rewarded upon all who believe; for with God there is no distinction of persons, in his method of justifying mankind, ver. 22. —Because all have sinned, and come short of the praise of God,' ver. 23.

Many of the Jews, however, continued utterly averse to the new dispensation: First, Because its doctrine of justification by faith rendered the Levitical sacrifices, which they believed to be real atonements, altogether useless; and, secondly, Because they fancied that no sacrifice for sin was appointed under the gospel. —This latter mistake the apostle corrected by informing them, that justification is a free gift from God, bestowed on sinners through the redemption that is by Christ Jesus, that is, through the repentance which he hath made for sin by the sacrifice of himself, ver. 24. —And that, on account of his having offered a sacrifice so meritorious, God hath set him forth as a mercy-seat, seated on which, consistently with his justice, he forbears to punish sinners immediately, and grants them space to believe and repent, that he may pardon both them who have believed and repented before the coming of Christ, ver. 25. and them who shall believe and repent after his coming, even to the end of the world, ver. 26. —Where then is boasting? the boasting of the Gentile philosophers, and of the Jewish scribes, who being puffed up with pride, the one on account of their intellectual attainments, and the other on account of their zeal in performing the rites of Moses, fancy themselves entitled to eternal life. To this que-from the legal method of justification by sacrifices, washings and meats, on which they insisted, the apostle observed, that Jews and Gentiles being all under the government of the same God, who is equally related to all as their Creator and Judge, ver. 28. there cannot be one way of justification appointed for the Jews, and another for the Gentiles; but all are to be justified in one method, namely by faith, ver. 28. To conclude, because the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles affirmed, that in teaching a gratuitous justification by faith, without works of law, the apostle made law useless, he told them, this doctrine does not make law useless, but rather establishes it as absolutely necessary, ver. 31. However, the proof of his assertion being a matter of great importance, the apostle deferred it till afterwards, that he might propose it at large, chap. vii.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—I. JEW. What then is the pre-eminence of the Jew? (s. 195) and what is the advantage of the circumcision? 1

II. APOL. Much in every respect; but chiefly, indeed because they were intrusted with the oracles of God. 2

3 JEW. (Ti. 3:2.) But what if (Rom. 54.) some have not believed? (2 Cor. 4:4.) Will not their unbelief destroy the faithfulness of God? 3

4 APOL. By no means; but let God be true, (1 Co. 1:9.) though every man be a liar; as it is written, (Psalm ii. 4.) That thou mayest be justified in thy oracles, 60. threatenings, and mayest overcome when thou judgest. 4

VER. 1.—What then is the pre-eminence of the Jew? and what, etc. 1. The pre-eminence of the Jew above the Gentile. 2. What is the advantage of circumcision, and of the other ritual services which are enjoined in the law? 3. To the first of these questions the apostle answers in this chapter, and to the second in chap. iv. beginning at ver. 11. See that verse, note 1.

VER. 2.—Much in every respect. The respects in which the Jews were superior to the Gentiles are enumerated, Rom. iv. 5, and explained in the note on that passage.

2 But chiefly, indeed, because they were intrusted with the oracles of God. The Greeks used the word ἀραῖοι, oracles, to denote the inspiration of the prophets, and hence derived the word ἀραίος, oracular, from those who consulted them; especially if they were delivered in personal or extraordinary counsel, such as the apostle refers to such responses as were uttered in verse. Here, oracle denotes the whole of the divine revelations, and among the rest the law of Moses, with the prophecies of the Old Testament. Acr. viil. 17, because God spake that law in person. All the revelations of God are manifest, from the beginning of the world to his own times, Moses, by the inspiration of God, composed to write; and what further revelations God was pleased to make to mankind, during the dispensation of the Jewish church, he made by the Jewish prophets, who recorded them in books; and the whole was intrusted to the Jews, to be kept for their own benefit, and for the benefit of the world. Now, this being the chief of all their advantages as Jews, it alone is mentioned by the apostle. In like manner, the Psalms both mentioned the word of God as the distinguishing privilege of the Israelites, Psalm cxiv. 19. He hath showed his word uprightly to Jacob, and his statutes and judgments unto Israel. 20. He hath not done according to our iniquities; for as many evils as they were derived from the oracles of God, the apostle had no occasion to explain here, because they were all introduced in the boasting of the Jew, described chap. ii. 17. 23.

VER. 3.—May we sin? Will not their unbelief destroy the faithfulness of God? The common translation of their unbelief destroys is misleading. It appears that the faithfulness of God will not be destroyed by the unbelief of the Jews, which no doubt is true; but it is not the question whether the unbelief of the Jews be destroyed by their unbelief. The same reasoning applies to ver. 8; whereas, if sin in these verses is translated, as I have done, we have no harmony with their unbelief destroyed. Because they have translated άνεξανάγκαις, without the negative particle, Matt. xii. 23. None I am not this the Son of God? John viii. 51. None ei. None ei. "Art thou he then he which should come in the name of this man? All are conditioned that he is none of his disciple." In ver. 8 of this chapter, without ei is used as a negative interrogation. So also in Cor. vi. 3. Μακραν παρατάσσω, "Why not then things pertaining to this life?"

 COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1. If our privileges will procure us no favour at the judgment, and if the want of these privileges will be no disadvantage to the Gentiles, What is the pre-eminence of the Jew above the Gentile? and what is the advantage of circumcision? 2. It is great in every respect; but chiefly, indeed, because the Jews were intrusted with the oracles of God, especially that concerning the blessing of the nations, as Abram's seed, Gen. xi. 17. 3 But what benefit have we received from the oracles of God, if the greatest part of us have not believed on him whom ye call the seed, and are to be cast off? Will not their unbelief destroy the faithfulness of God, who promised to be a God to Abraham's seed in their generations? 4. But it means: the faithfulness of God will not be destroyed by the rejection of the Jews. But let God be acknowledged true to his covenant, although every Jew be a liar, in affirming that Jesus is not the promised seed, and be rejected on that account: for, as it is written, in all cases God will be justified in his threatenings, and will appear just as often as he punishes.

In the covenant with Abraham, God, having promised (Gen. xviii. 8.) to give to him and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, and to be their God, the Jews affirmed, that if they were cast off from being his people, and driven out of Canaan for not believing on Jesus, the oracles of God, instead of being an advantage, would be a disadvantage to them, and the faithfulness of God, in performing his promises, would be destroyed. It seems the apostles, in their discourses to the Jews, had told them, that for crucifying Jesus they were to be punished in that manner. See Chap. ii. Illustration.

VER. 4.—1. But let God be true. 1. Let God be acknowledged true to his covenant, though every Jew disbelieves, and is cast off on that account. 2. To understand the rejection of the Jews, the natural seed of Abraham is, in the present dispensation, the church, and the whole nation of Israel is the church, as generally perceived, Acts vii. 15, because God spake that law in person. All the revelations of God are manifest, from the beginning of the world to his own times, Moses, by the inspiration of God, composed to write; and what further revelations God was pleased to make to mankind, during the dispensation of the Jewish church, he made by the Jewish prophets, who recorded them in books; and the whole was intrusted to the Jews, to be kept for their own benefit, and for the benefit of the world. Now, this being the chief of all their advantages as Jews, it alone is mentioned by the apostle. In like manner, the Psalms both mentioned the word of God as the distinguishing privilege of the Israelites, Psalm cxiv. 19. He hath showed his word uprightly to Jacob, and his statutes and judgments unto Israel. 20. He hath not done according to our iniquities; for as many evils as they were derived from the oracles of God, the apostle had no occasion to explain here, because they were all introduced in the boasting of the Jew, described chap. ii. 17. 23.

2. Though every man be a liar. The apostle calls the unbelieving Jews liars, not only because in scripture wicked men are called liars, Psalm cxvi. 11. but because they who refused to believe on Jesus, thereto affirmed that he was an impostor, which was the greatest falsehood.

3. That thou mayest be justified in thy threatenings, and mayest overcome when thou judgest. This is the proper translation of the original phrase, ή τε σφηκαίναι, and is agreeable to Psalm ii. 4. wherein the quotation is made. God's threatenings, in which David justified God, or acknowledged him to be just, are those which Nathan, by God's order, spake to him in reproop of his crimes of adultery and murder; 2 Sam. xii. 9. And they were uttered by the king, for on that whom the king condemned, the natural seed from Canaan, and scatter them among the heathens if they became unbelieving and disobedient, Lev. xxvi. 32. Deut. xxviii. 4. The rejection, therefore, and expulsion of the Jews from Canaan, for their unbelief, being a fulfilling of the threatenings of the covenant, established the faithfulness of God instead of destroying it.

2. Though every man be a liar. The apostle calls the unbelieving Jews liars, not only because in scripture wicked men are called liars, Psalm cxvi. 11. but because they who refused to believe on Jesus, thereto affirmed that he was an impostor, which was the greatest falsehood.

3. That thou mayest be justified in thy threatenings, and mayest overcome when thou judgest. This is the proper translation of the original phrase, ή τε σφηκαίναι, and is agreeable to Psalm ii. 4. wherein the quotation is made. God's threatenings, in which David justified God, or acknowledged him to be just, are those which Nathan, by God's order, spake to him in reproop of his crimes of adultery and murder; 2 Sam. xii. 9. And they were uttered by the king, for on that whom the king condemned, the natural seed from Canaan, and scatter them among the heathens if they became unbelieving and disobedient, Lev. xxvi. 32. Deut. xxviii. 4. The rejection, therefore, and expulsion of the Jews from Canaan, for their unbelief, being a fulfilling of the threatenings of the covenant, established the faithfulness of God instead of destroying it.

Buxtorf hath shown, in his Lex Semitica, p. 966. that the Hebrew word which our translators have rendered mayest be ciwî, Psalm ii. 4. is rightly translated by the LXX. and by the apostle,

5 But if our unrighteousness, in rejecting and crucifying Jesus, (even as: see 2 Cor. vi. 7. Gal. ii. 18.) establisheth the faithfulness of God, what shall we say? (Am, see note on ver. 3.) Is not God unrighteous who inflicteth wrath? (I speak this after the manner of man.)

6 APOSTLE. By no means: (Esa. 177.) otherwise how shall God judge the world? (ver. 5.)

7 JEW. (fig. 99.) For, if the truth of God hath abounded to his glory (Esa. 167.) through my lie, why still am I also judged as a sinner?

8 APOSTLE. And why not add, as we are slanderously reported to practise, and as some affirm we order; (Esa. 260.) Certainly let us do evil that good may come? (Esa. 65.) Of these the condemnation is just.

9 JEW. Well, then, do we excel the Gentiles? APOSTLE. Not at all: for we have been judged both Jews and Gentiles to be all under sin.

10 As it is written, (Psalm xiv. 2.) Surely there is none righteous, no, no one.

11 There is none that understandeth: there is none that seeketh after God.

12 They are all (31.) gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doth good; there is not so much as one.

13 Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit: the poison of asps is under their lips:

14 (Tit. 61.) Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.

15 Their feet are swift to shed blood.

16 Destruction and misery LURK in their enmity:

'Jew.'[1] mayest overcome; that sense of the word being familiar to the Syrians and the Rabbins. The victory here ascribed to God, is a victory over enemies who disbelieve his laws.

Ver. 9. Other how shall God judge the world? — The very idea of God's judging the world implies that it shall be done in righteousness. For if any person were to have injustice done upon a certain occasion, it would not be judged, but a capricious use of power, whereby the Judge would be dishonoured. On this idea the apostle draws, in the first place, from Abraham's emancipation, which, I suppose, the apostle had now in his eye (Gen. xvii. 25. 38.) Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

Ver. 10. Through the snares of the Jews, who here sustains the part of the objector, supposes, for argument's sake, that Jesus is the Christ, and that his own disbelieved, which after the apostle's example, he terms a lie, was wrong. Taylor supposes that lie in this passage signifies disobedience, because the word was used in that sense instead (ver. 8.)

Ver. 9. — Let us do evil that good may come. — This slanderous report seems to have been founded on a misinterpretation of the apostle's doctrine, by the Jews, who was accused of which the charge was guilty, rendered God's goodness, in sending Christ to die for them, the more illustrious. Rom. vi. 20. 23.

2. Of these the condemnation is just. — Here the apostle teaches expressly, that things in themselves evil are never to be done on the pretence of promoting what is good. Such a pretence, if allowed, would justify the greatest crimes.

Ver. 9. We have formerly proved both Jews and Gentiles to be under sin. — Erasmus translates the word (Esa. 167.) and (Esa. 99.)
17 But such practices as lead to the happiness of mankind, they neither have known nor desired to know.

18 They are wickedness they commit, because, as is said Psal. xxxvi. 1. There is no fear of God before their eyes; they fear not God’s displeasure.

19 Now these things are said, not of the heathens, but of the Jews; for we know that whatever things the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every Jew may be stopped, and that all the world may be liable to punishment before God; 20 Wherefore (§ 161.) by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight; because (Isa. nu) through law is the knowledge of sin. (See chap. vii. note 3.)

21 But now, a righteousness of God (Rom. iii. 22) without law (Rom. iii. 24) is discovered; being testified by the law and the prophets;

23 (Taq. 90.) Because all have sinned, and come short (Rom. iii. 23) of the praise of God;

24 Being justified (Rom. iii. 24) of free gift by his grace, through the redemption which is by Christ (Rom. iii. 28) as the means of the justification of sinners, without perfect obedience to law of any kind, is made known: And it is no new method of justification, being taught both by the law and the prophets;

25 Even the righteousness which God hath appointed to be through faith of Jesus Christ, (Rom. iii. 22) the faith which Jesus Christ hath enjoined, graciously countenanced unto all, and rewarded upon all who believe: for there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile in the method of justification;

26 Because all have sinned, and come short of praise from God: so that being all involved in guilt and misery, the same remedy must be applied to all:

27 Being justified by faith, not meritoriously, but of free gift, by a great exercise of God’s grace, through the redemption which is procured by Christ (Eph. ii. 8) as the means of the justification of sinners, without perfect obedience to law of any kind, is made known: And it is no new method of justification, being taught both by the law and the prophets;

28 Even the righteousness which God hath appointed to be through faith of Jesus Christ, (Rom. iii. 22) the faith which Jesus Christ hath enjoined, graciously countenanced unto all, and rewarded upon all who believe: for there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile in the method of justification;

32 Ver. 26. Justified of free gift, by his grace, through the redemption which is by the blood of Christ. The word grace is divided into two parts: the first is a kind of redemption of captives from death, which is procured by paying a price for his life. See 1 Tim. ii. 6. note 1. and Locke’s note on Eph. ii. 8. The redemption of Jesus Christ is called "the forgiveness of sins," Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14.

Christ died as a sacrifice for sin, and that God pardons am through the merit of that sacrifice. Hence Christ is called, in G. ii. 18, in Glorification, 1 John. ii. 2. note 2. By teaching this doctrine, the apostle removed the great objection of the Jews and heathens against the gospel of Christ; and that he was just because he was good, is not from the sin of Adam, but from the sin of Christ, who represents us and is pleaded for us, as the Lord Jesus Christ is put for all us, as in the LXX., or in the New Testament. But we have a word similar to it, Ecles. xxxii. 26. λέγεται προσφυγμόν, which is translated, "pass not by my stin."

But the apostle's meaning is sufficiently plain, namely, that God dispenses pardon to all who have faith in Christ's blood, as abed for the remission of sin; who trust to the merit of that sacrifice for the pardon of their sin; who approach God with reverence and confidence through the mediation of Christ; and who, discerning with admiration the virtue which Christ exercised in his sufferings, endeavour to imitate it.

equally related to him, he will in his treatment of them follow one rule—He will justify the Jews to whom he has given his oracles, by their faith in those oracles, and the Gentiles through the law of faith mentioned ver. 27.

31. Do we then make law useless through the faith? By no means, (Acts, 78.) for we establish law.

Ver. 29.—1. Seeing there is one God, he will justify, &c.—The apostle alludes to Zech. xii. 10, where the prophet foretold the progress of the gospel, under the image of 'being waters going out from Jerusalem,' then adds, ver. 2, 'And the Lord shall be king even ever after, throughout all the earth; as in Zion, before whom there is no name one.' To show, that under the gospel dispensation all nations shall be regarded by God as his people; that he shall be acknowledged and worshipped by all nations; and that in the affair of their justification and salvation he will observe one rule.

2. Through the faith.—This I think is an ellipsis for 'through the law of faith,' mentioned ver. 27, and signifies the method of salvation by faith established in the new covenant, called a law for the reasons given in note 4. on ver. 27. By this law of faith the Gentiles are to be justified. For though they have not the doctrines of revelation as the objects of their faith, they may believe the doctrines at all that are more careful in abiding the rites of the law, which case, their faith will be counted to them for righteousness, equally as the faith of those who enjoy revelation; (see chap. ii. 21.)

2. For we establish law.—It is not true of the law of Moses in general, that the apostle established it by his doctrine of justification through faith; but it is true, when spoken of 'the law which God has written on the heart of men.' Wherefore, in this passage, does not signify the law of Moses in general, but that more ancient and universal law just now described, the precepts of which are all written in the law of Moses, and established in all people, as clearly appears in the following verses.

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having shown the impossibility of man's being justified meritoriously by obedience to any law, moral or ceremonial, judged it necessary, for the sake of the Jews, to consider more particularly the merit and efficacy of ceremonial performances. For these having no foundation in the nature of things, the only motive from which they can be performed, must be ascribed to the divine command. Hence they have always been considered as acts of pious highly pleasing in the sight of God. This was the case more especially with the Jews, who, because the rites of Moses were of divine appointment, thought the observance of them so meritorious, that they had not the least doubt of obtaining justification and salvation by them: And therefore they were at all times more careful in observing the rites of the law, than in performing the moral righteousness which it enjoined.

To correct this, which is the error of the suppositions in all religions, the apostle examined the justification of Abraham, the father of believers; and saw, from Moses's account, that his circumcision, though performed when he was a very old age, had the same efficacy in his justification; he having obtained the promise of justification by means of his faith, long before he was circumcised. To this example the apostle appealed with great propriety, both because circumcision was the most difficult of all the rites enjoined in the law, and because Abraham, being the father of believers, his justification is the pattern of theirs. Wherefore, if circumcision contributed nothing towards Abraham's justification, the Jews could not hope to be justified thereby, nor by the other rites of the law; and were much to blame in pressing these rites on the Gentiles as necessary to their salvation, and in consigning all to damnation who were out of the pale of the Jewish church.

The apostle begins his reasonings on this subject with saying, the Jews, what it was that Abraham, the father of believers, obtained by those services pertaining to the flesh which they so highly valued! ver. 1. He did not obtain justification; for if Abraham were justified by the merit of any moral or ceremonial work, he might have boasted that his justification was no favour, but a debt due for what he had performed. Yet in this transaction with God, he had no such ground of boasting, ver. 2. As is plain from God's counting his faith to him for righteousness; which implies, that in rewarding him as a righteous person, God did not discharge a debt, but bestowed a favour, ver. 3.—For the person who works the reward receives the reward, not as a favour, but as a debt, ver. 4.—But to one who is not said to have wrought, but to have believed what was promised by God, whose prerogative it is to justify sinners, his faith is counted for righteousness by mere favour, ver. 5. Wherefore, from Moses's account of the justification of Abraham, it appears that he was justified freely, without meriting it by any kind of work whatever; consequently that the gospel method of justification is testified by the law itself, as the apostle affirmed chap. iii.

21. The same thing is testified by the prophets. For David nowhere represents man as blessed eternally, either in the heavens may be saved, though they never have enjoyed any external revelation, nor were members of God's visible church. But this doctrine, it seems, the Jews rejected on pretence that it was contrary to their scriptures. Wherefore, to show the falsehood of that pretence, the apostle, after describing the justification of Abraham, introduced the subject of the salvation of heathens anew, by saying, Counteth this blessedness of justification as the circumcision only, or on the uncircumcision also? and demonstrated, the possibility of the salvation of the heathen, though no members of God's visible church, by observing, that Abraham had his faith counted to him for righteousness, and received the promise of the inheritance, in uncircumcision; that is, whilst he was no member of any visible church, neither possessed any civil service whatever, ver. 10.—For it happened full thirteen years before he and his family were made the visible church of God by circumcision, that at the time he received the promise, and for many years after, he was precisely in the condition of all the pious Gentiles who have lived and died out of God's visible church. With this example before their eyes, how could the Jews in the apostle's days, or how can Christians now, imagine that the pious Gentiles will not have their faith counted to them for righteousness, since they are in them. Abraham was in whom that favour was promised to him!

But because the Jews might ask, If Abraham obtained the promise of justification before he was circumcised, why was that rite enjoined to him? The apostle told them, it was enjoined merely as a seal or confirmation, on God's part, of the promise to count him for righteousness that faith. Why then had Abraham had exercised in uncircumcision, and of his having made him the father or federal head of all believers who are out of God's visible church, to assure us, that their faith, like his, shall be counted to them for righteousness, and rewarded with the inheritance of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type, though they be no members of any visible church of God, ver. 11. — The proof of his being the father of all who believe in the visible church, to give them the same assurance concerning their faith, provided that, to their outward profession of faith, they join such an obedience to God as Abraham exercised while he was out of the visible church, ver. 13. — Thus, as in the second chapter, the apostle, by arguments taken from the light of nature, and the external observance of the Gentiles, by faith, so in this chapter he establishes the same doctrine by arguments taken from revelation. And by both he hath expressly condemned the bigotry of all who, like the Jews, confine salvation to their own church or mode of faith; and hath beautifully illustrated the righteousness and impartiality of God's moral government of the world.

Farther, to shew that the whole body of the ritual services enjoined by Moses, taken together, had no influence to procure salvation for the Jews, the apostle told them, 'that the promise to Abraham and to his seed, that they should be heirs of Canaan,' and of the heavenly country typified by Canaan, was not given them by a righteousness of law.' That is, by a perfect obedience to any law, whether moral or ceremonial, but by a righteousness of faith, ver. 13. — For if they who are righteous by a perfect obedience to law, are heirs either of the earthy or of the heavenly country, their faith is of no use in obtaining it; and the promise by which the inheritance is bestowed on them as a free gift, has no influence at all in the matter, either in its obtaining or its enjoyment, ver. 14. — Besides, in the nature of the thing, no one who has ever transgressed law can obtain the inheritance through law. For law, instead of rewarding, worketh wrath to every transgressor, and among the rest to the heirs, not excepting Abraham himself, who, by receiving the inheritance as a free gift, was shown to be, not a person perfectly righteous, but a transgressor of some law or other, namely, of the law written on his heart. For where no law is, there is no transgression, nor treatment of persons as transgressors, ver. 15. — To these things add, that the promise was bestowed on Abraham and his seed, not by a perfect obedience to any law, either natural or revealed, but by faith, demonstating that the inheritance promised might be a free gift, and be made sure to all believers: Not to those only who enjoy an external revelation, but to those also, who, like Abraham, believe out of God's visible church; for the inheritance was promised to them in the person of Abraham, who in uncircumcision was made the father or federal head of such believers, for the purpose of revealing the perfect righteousness by faith, ver. 16. — According to what God said to him, 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee,' ver. 17. — This great honour was done to Abraham, on account of the excellency of his faith, ver. 18-21. — For which reason it was counted to him for righteousness, and he received the promise of the inheritance, ver. 22. — Now God directed Moses to render this, not for Abraham's sake alone, but for us also: If we believe in the being and perfections of God, who raised Jesus from the dead, ver. 23, 24. — Who was delivered to death to make atonement for our offences, and was raised again for our justification, ver. 25.

Thus it appears, that the method of justifying sinners, by accepting their faith in place of that perfect obedience which law demands, rather than the perfect righteousness, is no new way of salvation. It was appointed at the fall for Adam and all his posterity, and was then obscurely revealed in the promise, that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent:— afterwards, it was more explicitly declared in the covenant with Abraham, wherein God promised to give to him and to his Seed by faith, the land of Canaan, for an everlasting inheritance, as the reward of their faith. Wherefore, when the Jews in general denied salvation to the believing Gentiles, unless they entered into their church by receiving circumcision, they showed great ignorance of the method of salvation which was established at the fall, and which was made known to themselves in the covenant with Abraham. And when they refused to be united with the believing Gentiles into one body or church, they rebelled against God, and for their disobedience were justly cut off:—while a few of their brethren, more obedient to God, continued his people; and the Gentiles who believed the gospel were incorporated with them, as joint members of the covenant of Abraham and the Jewish church, as they were formed that great community called 'the Israel of God,' and 'the church of the first-born,' which is to subsist through all eternity. Wherefore, in the article of man's justification, the Mosaic and Christian revelations perfectly agree.

By flesh, Bull understood those works which Abraham performed in his natural state, and by his own strength, before he obtained the promise of justification. But the first mentioned interpretation seems more agreeable to the apostle's design here. Nevertheless, in other passages, shin is put for manner, as in the flesh, stands in opposition with spirit, which constitutes the flesh, stands in opposition with spirit, I prefer the ordinary translation. Flesh in this passage being opposed to spirit signifies services pertaining to the flesh or body, on account of father of all believers. Abraham obtained when he stood in the presence of him whom he believed; even of God, who maketh alive the dead, and speaketh of things in the remotest futurity, which exist not, with as much certainty as if they existed.

18 (Or. 61.) He contrary to hope believed with hope (ας εν γνωσεν), that he should be the father of many nations, according to what was spoken, (Gen. xv. 6.) So shall thy seed be.

19 And not being weak in faith, he did not consider his own body now dead, but being about an hundred years old, (see 214.) neither the deadness of Sarah's womb. (Gen. xvi. 17. xvii. 17.)

20 (Ex. 144. 145.) Therefore against the promise of God he did not dispute through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God.

21 (Rom. 4. 8.) And was fully persuaded, that what was promised, he was able to perform; (Rom. xii. 2.) certainly to perform.

22 (See note 2.) Therefore also it was counted to him for righteousness. (See Rom. iv. 3. note 2.)

23 Now it was not written for his sake only, that it was so counted to him; But for our sakes also, to whom it will be counted, even to those who believe (ας ευς) on him who raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead,

24 Who was delivered to death (Rom. xii. 11.) for our offences (Rom. xiv. 26.) and was raised again (Rom. xiv. 26.) for our justification, and Noah, Abraham had been the stock from which the whole human race spring; for it implied, that he was the greatest of believers; and that the title which believers have to the blessings of the covenant, is founded on their being promised to them in the covenant, as his seed. This being the right interpretation of the promise, 'Surely a father of many nations I have constituted thee,' the apostle's reasonings therefrom, to prove the title of the pious God's seed, were thus: 1. In the presence of whom he believed, for he is the God of the covenant, considered by God as their father, and their title to these promises is founded on their relation to Abraham as his seed.

2. Even of God, who maketh alive the dead; For undertaking the greatness of Abraham's faith, and to shew with what propriety he is called God's seed, the apostle observes that the principles on which he believed the Lord, were entered views of the divine perfections: next, in ver. 15. he takes notice of the circumstances which rendered his faith difficult. Then in ver. 20. he affirms, that his faith was very strong, being free from all doubts. Abraham believed that God could make alive his dead body, so as to enable him to beget a son by Sarah, even in the ninetieth year of her age; and that notwithstanding he had no children by her in the days of their greatest youth and strength. He believed also, that God was able to bring the idleless Gentiles to know and worship the true God, in such numbers as to make Abraham the father of a very numerous spiritual seed: Nay, he believed, that although Isaac had been burnt on the altar, God would raise him to life again. Such exalted notions had this chief of the faithful of power and faithfulness of God, who maketh alive the dead. This the apostle mentions, to shew that Abraham knew and believed that God would strengthen his and Sarah's dead bodies for procreation, and could speak of Isaac and of Abraham's spiritual seed with as much certainty as if they had all been already existing.

And calleth things which exist not, as though they existed.—In this expression, perhaps, the apostle instructed, that Abraham revealed his faith to those alone who were informed of the event, and not to any who were ignorant of it. 'Let them be;' For the traditional knowledge of the creation of the world, or any future event, might be a condition of faith. Ver. 15.—1. And not being weak in faith—that is, being strong in faith; for the Hebrews, when they meant to assert a thing strong in faith, they said, 'Let them be.' Ver. 19.—2. He did not consider his own body now dead.—The children which Abraham had by Keturah, after Sarah's death, do not intrude here. But the apostle refers to the narrative, (Gen. xxv. 1.) that Isaac was born of a miracle, in accordance to the being of Isaac, might preserve his vigour for impossible time; he was born when Abraham was a hundred years old.

Ver. 20.—1. Therefore against the promise of God he did not dispute.
CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

To comfort the Roman brethren under the evils which the profession of the gospel brought upon them, the apostle, in the beginning of this chapter, enumerated the privileges which belong to believers in general. And from his account it appears, that the privileges of Abraham, the seed by faith, are far greater than the privileges which belonged to his seed by natural descent, and which are described Rom. ii. 17-20.

The first privilege of the spiritual seed is, That being justified by faith, they have peace with God through Jesus Christ, ver. 1. This, to the Gentiles, must have appeared an unanswerable blessing, in regard they had been taught by the Jews to consider themselves as children of wrath, and enemies of God, ver. 10.—Their second privilege is, By the command of Christ they are admitted through faith into the covenant made with Abraham, and into the Christian church.—Thirdly, They boast in the hope of beholding the glory of God in heaven; a privilege far superior to that of beholding the glory of God in the tabernacle, and in the temple on earth, of which the natural seed boasted; for it is the hope of living eternally with God in heaven, ver. 2.—Their fourth privilege is, They boast in afflictions, especially those which befal them for the name of Christ: because afflictions improve them, and they thus render their holy and eternal life sure, ver. 3, 4.—But many, even of the believers among the Jews, denying, with the Gentiles had any reason to hope for eternal life, while they did not obey Moses. Wherefore, to shew that they are heirs of that, and of all the blessings promised in the covenant to the seed of Abraham by faith, equally with the Jews, the apostle appealed to God's shedding down the Holy Ghost on the Jews, ver. 5. —And to Christ's dying for them in their ungodly state, ver. 6-8. —And told them, since they were already justified; that is, delivered from their heathenish ignorance and wickedness, and reconciled, that is, put into a state of salvation by the blood of Christ, they might well expect to be answered in due time, of wrath, by his life in the human nature; since in that nature he executes the offices of Lord and Judge of the world for their benefit, ver. 9, 10. —There is another privilege belonging to the spiritual seed, mentioned by the apostle, that is, That being reconciled, they can boast in the true God as their God, equally with the natural seed, whose relation to God was established by the law of Moses only. And this privilege he told them they had obtained, like all the rest, through Jesus Christ, by whom they had received the reconciliation.

Having mentioned the reconciliation of the Gentiles, the apostle took occasion, in this place, to discourse of the entrance of sin and death into the world, and of the remedy which God hath provided for these evils, and of the extent of that remedy; because it gave him an opportunity, not only of explaining what the reconciliation is which we have received through Christ, but also of displaying the justice of granting reconciliation to all mankind through him, notwithstanding the greatest part of them never heard any thing, either of the reconciliation, or of Christ who procured it.

And first, to shew the justice of granting reconciliation to the whole human race through Christ, notwithstanding many of them are ignorant of him, the apostle reasoned in this manner. As it pleased God, through the disobedience of one man, to subject all mankind to sin and death, notwithstanding the greatest part of them never heard of that man's disobedience; so, to render this determination consistent with justice, it pleased God, through the obedience of one man, to make all men capable of righteousness and life, notwithstanding the greatest part of them have no knowledge of the person to whom they are indebted for these great benefits, ver. 12. —This second member of the comparison, indeed, the apostle hath not expressed, because he supposed his readers could easily supply it, and because he was afterwards to produce this unfinished comparison in a complete form, by separating it into two parts, and adding to each part the clause of the omitted member which belongs to it. Wherefore, having enumerated the first member of the comparison, instead of adding the second, he proceeds to establish the first because on it the health of all mankind depends, for it is from this that the soul to have supplied in his own mind, depends. The proposition asserted in the first member is, that all men are subject to death for Adam's sin. This the apostle proves by the following argument.—No action is punished as a sin, where there is no knowledge of any law forbidding it, ver. 13. —Nevertheless, from Adam to Moses, death seized infants and idiots, who being incapable of the knowledge of law, were incapable of transgressing law. Wherefore, having no sin of their own, for which they could be punished with death, they must have suffered for Adam's transgression; which shews clearly, that death is inflicted on mankind, not for their own, but for Adam's sin, who on that account may, by contrast, be called the type of him who was to come and restore life to all mankind, ver. 14.

Further, it was a matter of great importance to prove, that all mankind are punished with death for the sin of the first man, because it shews that the punishment of our first parents' sin was not forgiven, but only deferred, that the human species might be continued. Accordingly by God's sentence pronounced after the fall, Gen. iii. 15-19. Adam and Eve were allowed to live and beget children. And as in the same sentence they were told, that the seed of the woman would bruise the serpent's head, it was an intimation, that on account of what the seed of the woman was to do, a new trial, under a better covenant than the former, was granted to them and their posterity, that they might have an opportunity of regaining that immortality which they had forfeited. These things the apostle supposes his readers to know; for he proceeds to compare the evils brought on mankind by Adam, with the advantages procured for them by Christ, that all may understand the gracious nature of the new covenant under which the human race is placed since the fall.

From what the apostle hath said of the effects of Christ’s obedience, compared with the consequences of Adam’s disobedience, it appears that the former are superior to the latter in three respects. The first is, Christ’s obedience hath more merit to obtain for all mankind a short life on earth, and after death a resurrection to a new life, in which such of them as are capable of it are to enjoy happiness for ever, than Adam’s disobedience had demerit to kill all mankind, ver. 16.

The second is, The sentence passed on mankind, was for one offence only, committed by their first parents, and it is said they all were subjected to death temporal; but the sentence which bestows the gracious gift of pardon, hath for its object the offence of Adam, and all the offences which the children of Adam may have committed during their own probation; and issueth in their being accounted righteous, and entitled to eternal life, ver. 16. The third is, In the life which they who are pardoned and accounted righteous shall regain through Christ, they shall enjoy much greater happiness than they lose by the death to which they are subjected through Adam’s offences, ver. 17.

Having thus contrasted the benefits procured for mankind by Christ, with the evils brought on them by Adam, the apostle sums up these particulars in two conclusions. The first is: As it was just, on account of one offence committed by Adam, to pass sentence of condemnation on all, by which all have been subjected to death, so it was just, in the one act of righteousness performed by Christ, (his dying on the cross,) to pass sentence on all, by which all obtain the justification of life; that is, a short life on earth, and, at the last day, a resurrection from the dead, ver. 18. The second conclusion is: As it was just, through the offence of one man, to constitute all men sinners; that is, through the common consent of all, whereby they are made liable to sin and to eternal death; so it was equally just, through the obedience of one man, to constitute all mankind righteous; that is, to put them in a condition of obtaining righteousness here, and eternal life hereafter, ver. 19. For in what manner could all mankind be constituted righteous, unless God granted them a new trial under a new covenant, in which not perfect obedience is required in order to righteousness and life, but the obedience of faith? From these two conclusions we learn what the condemnation is which was brought on all mankind by Adam, and what the reconciliation is which all mankind receive by Christ. By Adam, mankind were made mortal and liable to sin: By Christ, they are allowed a temporary life on earth, and have a trial appointed them under a gracious covenant, by which they may attain righteousness and eternal life through faith.

In the two conclusions just now mentioned, the unfinished comparison, with which the apostle introduced this admirable discourse, is completed in the manner expressed in the commentary, ver. 19. For in the first conclusion, ver. 18, the entrance and progress of death, through Adam’s sin, being described as in ver. 12., its remedy is declared, which is there wanting. And in the second conclusion, ver. 19, after mentioning the entrance and progress of sin as in ver. 12., its remedy, which is wanting there, is likewise described. This order the apostle adopts, in order to lead his hearers to see, that he had the entrance of sin prior to that of death, he mentioned the entrance of sin first, that he might have an opportunity of speaking concerning the rule by which Adam and his posterity, now reconciled, were to direct their actions, during the trial appointed them under the new covenant. For after telling us, that as all were constituted sinners by Adam’s disobedience, so all shall be constituted righteous through the obedience of Christ, he adds, ‘But law silently entered;’—that is, after the sentence was passed, Gen. iii. 15—19, whereby Adam was allowed to live and beget children, and with his penalty was placed under the new covenant, the law of God written on their hearts silently took place as the rule of their conduct under that covenant. And although the offence of actual transgression thereby abounded, grace hath superabounded, in the resurrection of all who die in infancy and infancy to a better life than that which they lose through Adam’s disobedience, and by bestowing the same blessing on such adults as fulfill the requisitions of the gracious new covenant under which they are placed, ver. 20.

And thus it hath come to pass, that as the sin of the first man hath exceedingly tyrannized over the whole species, by introducing actual transgression and death; so also the infinite goodness of God shall reign, by dispensing with denying sin and death throughout the species, which shall be counted to believers and rewarded with eternal life; and all through Jesus Christ our Lord, ver. 21. Thus, according to the doctrine of the apostle, all mankind are, and ever have been included in the new covenant. Consequently the advantage which they have received by Christ, is much greater than the loss they have sustained through Adam. And it is impossible to think it should be so; because the goodness of God more effectually disposes him to bestow blessings on mankind, on account of Christ’s obedience, than to inflict evils on them on account of Adam’s disobedience.

Before this subject is dismissed it may be proper to observe,—

1. That in this remarkable passage we have the true account of the entrance of sin and misery into the world, and of the method in which these evils have been remedied; subjects which none of the philosophers or wise men of antiquity were able by the light of reason toathom. Sin entered through the disobedience of our first parents, whereby they were made liable to immediate death; and if God had extended his threatenings, the species would have ended in them. But because, in due season, his Son was to appear on earth in the human nature, and to make atonement for the sin of men, God, in the prospect of that great act of obedience, suffered Adam and Eve to live and propagate their kind, and by2 committed them a new trial under a covenant better suited to their condition than the former, in order that if they behaved properly during their probation, he might raise them to a better life than that which they had forfeited. In this new covenant, the obligation of the law written on their heart was continued; only perfect obedience to that law was not required in order to life, but the obedience of faith. And although the punishment of their first sin took place so far, that the life granted to them and to their posterity was to be a gradual progress, through labour and misery, to certain death; yet being all comprehended in the gracious new covenant, they are all to be raised to life at the last day, that such of them as are found to have given the obedience of faith during their probation, may receive a more happy life than that which was forfeited by the disobedience of their first parents, and be continued in that happy life for ever. Thus, by the remedy which God hath applied for curing the evils introduced by the first man’s disobedience, the righteous will be raised to a greater degree of happiness than if these evils had not taken place.

tried after that evil took place; Christ’s obedience was appointed as the means of our deliverance, at the very time the resolution permitting the entrance of sin was formed. And therefore, to make mankind sensible of this, the apostle assures us, Eph. i. 4. that ‘we were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world.’ And 3 Tim. i. 9, that ‘we are saved and called according to God’s own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ, before the world was begotten.’ And, 1 Pet. i. 20, that ‘Christ was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifested in these last times for us.’ And as the plan of our redemption was formed along with the decree permitting our fall, so its operation was coeval with the introduction of that evil, and in some respects extends to all. Hence Christ is called, Rev. xiii. 5. the Lamb which was slain from the foundation of the world; and he is said, 2 Cor. v. 15. ‘to have died for all.’ See the note on that ver. And his death is termed, 1 John ii. 2. a propitiation for the whole world.

3. From other passages of scripture we learn, that sin and death were permitted to enter into the world, not as a necessary part of the repute of these beings, but that God intended to make mankind more happy than they would have been if these evils had not existed, but even to promote the good of the universe. Accordingly, in this scheme of redemption, there is a higher display of the perfections of God to all intelligent beings than could have been made had there been no sin and misery to be endured. So Saviour was it with our Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. iii. 16. ‘That now unto governments and powers in the heavenly regions, the multiform wisdom of God may be made known through the church.’ Further, the new display of the perfections of God made in the plan of redemption, by furnishing many powerful motives to virtue, with a hope of a better life to come, has been said to be a means of promoting virtue generally.

4. By the illustrious display of the scheme of redemption made in this admirable passage, and by showing that it hath for its object not a single nation, nor any small portion of the human race, but believers of all nations, the apostle has condemned the bigotry of the Jews, and of all who, like them, confine salvation to their own church, and exclude others from sharing in the mercy of God through Christ, merely because they are ignorant of him, not through their own fault, but through the good pleasure of God, who hath denied them that knowledge: for, because they do not hold the same objects of faith with them, although they possess the same spirit of faith, and live piously and virtuously, according to their knowledge. For his whole reasoning on this subject proceeds on the supposition, that, if it was convenient to justice that the deserts of Adam’s disobedience should extend to all mankind, notwithstanding the greatest part of them never knew any thing either of him or of his disobedience, it must be equally convenient to justice, that the merit of Christ’s obedience should extend to all mankind, who are capable of being benefited by it, although many of them had no opportunity of knowing anything concerning that mentionable obedience. Besides, as the plan of redemption will, no doubt, be fully made known to all; and these motives are so powerful to promote the good of the universe, in this scheme of redemption, there is a higher display of the perfections of God to all intelligent beings than could have been made had there been no sin and misery to be endured. So Saviour was it with our Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. iii. 16. ‘That now unto governments and powers in the heavenly regions, the multiform wisdom of God may be made known through the church.’ Further, the new display of the perfections of God made in the plan of redemption, by furnishing many powerful motives to virtue, with a hope of a better life to come, has been said to be a means of promoting virtue generally.

COMMENTS.

CHAP. V.—I Wherefore, being delivered from the power of sin by faith, and having laid aside our enmity to God, we the spiritual seed of Abraham, 2 through whom also we have been introduced by faith into this gracious covenant in which we stand, and boast, not in seeing the glory of God in any tabernacle or temple on earth, as the natural seed do, but in the hope of beholding the glory of God in heaven.

2 And this is not our only boasting, for while the Jews boast of the earthly felicity promised in the law, we even boast of afflictions knowing that affliction worketh patience in us;

4 And patience, approbation, and approbation, hope:

5 (Verse 67.) This hope will not make us ashamed, because the love of God is poured out into our hearts by the Holy Ghost who is given to us.

6 (Verse 91.) Besides, we being still weak, in due time Christ died (for) the ungodly.

7 (Verse 97.) Now scarcely for a just man will one die; (for) a good man one perhaps would even dare to die.

8 But his own love towards us God commended, (Rom. 5:8.) because, we being still sinners, Christ died (for) us. You are saved through your faith. (Verse 9, v. 16.) through his life.

9 And not only so, but we even boasting in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation, (John iii. 16.) the face of the council, rejecting that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name.

2. Knowing that affliction worketh patience. This effect affliction worketh patience. That is, affliction worketh patience, that he afflicting an effect of suffering patience, and by suffering considerations which naturally lead to the patients, patience.

3. And patience, exercise. — The original word ἀνίκασσε appears to mean properly signifies the trusting of the words. It signifies like wise appraisal, in consequence of truth, Phil. ii. 21. Hence the adjective, denotes not only who is tried, but one who is approved. In like manner, ἀνίκασσε, the verb, signifies both to try and to approve. Rom. xii. 2. 1 Cor. xvi. 3. In this passage, the word ἀνίκασσε may either be translated proof, namely, of God's assistance, and of our own steadfastness, or approval bestowed by God.

Ver. 6 - 1. Because the love of God is poured out into our hearts. - The original word ἀνίκασσε is commonly used, as Whitby remarks, when the sinner of the Holy Ghost is spoken of. Whereas, as the apostle, in this passage, had in the eye the gifts of the Spirit bestowed on the Gentiles as proofs of God's love to them. And therefore, the Spirit himself is called the "testimony of the inheritance," Ephes. v. 30. The Spirit, according to the Latin version, "be more witness with their spirit, that they are the children of God." Ver. 6 - 1. Besides, we being still weak. - The original word ἀνίκασσε signifies weakness of sickness; and is here used to shew the prevailing influence of sin, in weakening all the faculties of the soul. "Satiis has used the same metaphor, chap. i. 8. The whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint." (See above.)

1 Cor. xiii. 11. 1 Thess. v. 1. note 1.) Christ died. — When the season for the publication of the gospel and conversion of the world was come, Christ appeared in the flesh, and died for our sins, (2 Cor. v. 15.) and the time before appointed of the Father, ver. 2. Thredton's "the time before appointed of the Father." There are some who, according to the common reading, if not contradicted by all the ancient MSS., observe that "the time before appointed of the Father" and for a good man, mentioned in this verse, is evidently a dying in their room or stead. And therefore Christ's dying (for) a good man,

Ver. 8. *The love to God commended, (for) he hath enhanced his, he hath rendered it highly praiseworthy. In this sentiment the apostle is authorized by his Master, who mentioned it as a great instance of God's love to men, that he gave his Son to die for them. John iii. 16. 2 Cor. 5:17.

1. For, if being enemies, we were reconciled, (Rom. 5:10.) to God, through the death of his Son; much more, if being reconciled, we shall be saved from wrath. (Verse 9, v. 16.) from wrath through his life. (Verse 10.)

1. For if, being enemies, we were reconciled, to God, through the death of his Son; much more, if being reconciled, we shall be saved from wrath. Through his life, the blood of Christ, who is shed for us, through his life, he is now in heaven, and there we find the grace of God, and the blood of Christ, and the righteousness of God. John iii. 16. 2 Cor. 5:17.
12 (Acts 2:36, 8:22.) For this reason, As by one man sin entered into the world, and by sin death; and so death passed through all men; for all have sinned. [Romans 5:12]

13 For until the law, sin was counted in the world; but sin is not counted when there is no law. [Romans 5:13]

14 (Acts 3:18.) Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over those who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the type of him who was to come. [Romans 5:14]

15 (Acts 3:18.) However, not as the fall, so also in Jesus the gracious gift. For by the fall of the one man we(su) the many. [Romans 5:15]

2. Our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation.—The Greek noun καταλάβας, translated reconciliation, comes from the verb καταλαμβάνομαι, which, in the preceding verse, our translators have rendered reconcile. Wherefore, the noun derived from it should not have been translated by them, in this case, as καταλαμβάνομαι, but rather reconciliatus, as in all the passages where it occurs. Besides, it ought to be considered, that reconciliation, how voluntary and death, and death-reign, and condemnation, as well as the death of all. For the meaning of reconciliation, see ver. 10. note 1. In what follows, the apostle shows the reasonableness of putting all men in a state of reconciliation, and death-reign, and condemnation, as well as the death of Adam, as an argument of God's mercy. See also ver. 12—1. For this reason, as by one man sin entered, etc. I think this verse should not be separated from the 11th by a full point, as is done in the Authorized Version. Our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom we have received the reconciliation, for this reason, is given an instance of the present motive. For there is no law. By Law, Locke understands a revealed positive law, threatening death for every offence. But, on that supposition, no sin could be punished before the law of Moses was given; and all that happened to the antediluvians; and, if it were given, none but the 'sons of the Jews could be saved. Whereas the apostle affirms, chap. 1. 32. that Gentiles know, that they are under condemnation, and that their heart, are worthy of death. Therefore think the expression, whereas there the knowledge of the law; consequently they are not capable of sinning actually like Adam. Wherefore, since death reigns over them, equally as over others, it is evident, that having no sin of their own, they die through Adam's sin alone. Ver. 14. Who is the type of him who was to come.—namely, of Christ. For the meaning of the term 'type,' see also 1 Tim. 5:18, note 2. The likeness, on account of which, Adam is called the type of Christ, consisted, as Beza observes, in this, that as Adam communicated to the whole of mankind the sin and condemnation to which all men were made liable, so the second member of the comparison is suspended to ver. 19, and that the whole is a parenthesis. But any one who would explain Adam's dispensation with the comparison--begun ver. 12, is separated into two comparisons, as conclusions from his reasoning upon that comparison. Therefore, the view prefixed to this chapter. 2. Sin entered.—The sin which entered through the one man's disobedience, is not the first sin of Adam only, but that corruptions of nature also which took place in Adam through his first sin, and which he conveyed to all his posterity. See note 5. 3. Into the world.—That is among entered men. The same thing is said of death; it entered into this habitable world by sin. See note 1. 4. By the word spoken into the world.—The death which the apostle says entered into the world, and passed through it, laying hold on all men in all ages, is death temporal; because, in the broadest sense, which is not expressed, in opposition to which passed through all men, is resurrection from temporal death. But though the apostle speaks here only of temporal death, it does not follow, that temporal death is the only evil which is universally suffered by all men. The kind of death which the apostle meant by the word 'death,' was the new creature's man's disobedience, and the many were constituted sinners, were made liable to sin, and to eternal death, see chap. vi. note 2. at the end; even as by one Adam, because the many were constituted righteous, not made capable of righteousness, and eternal life. See ver. 11. note Reconciliation, and Rom. vi. note 11. Alive by God. Others consider, that the death of sinners, and the rise of the new creature, is the death of Adam's sin, not temporal death only, but eternal death also, and that the rest of the passages are to be taken according to the lexipalceid definition, whatever the death was which Adam brought on all, Christ hath removed it, or put it in our power to remove it, as the apostle will show in the remaining part of this discourse.
The one man Jesus Christ,—The apostle calls Jesus Christ a man, to show that, in comparing him with Adam, his actions in the human nature chiefl y are considered. See ver. 15.

Ver. 10.—Also, not the sentence through the one man, but the free gift. The translation which I have given of this passage agrees with the free gift which was bestowed upon all mankind, on the earth, and through the earth, the ground, and according to the apostle's manner of writing, and by following the order of the words in the original, makes the apostle's reasoning quite logical, and renders the common reading, i.e. θεαματος του ανθρωπου, 'through the one who sinned,' preferable to the reading in some MSS., i.e. θεαματος των ανθρωπων, 'through one offence.'

For the word sentence. The original word καταδικασμος signifies the sentence of a Judge, especially a sentence of condemnation. See ver. 7. The sentence, or judgment, or condemnation, as the case may be, is ascribed to God. And as his ordinary meaning gives the same sense, it is to be preferred, especially as, in the next verse, the apostle represents those who have received the gift of pardon, as having received the gift of righteousness; that is, the gift of having their faith counted for righteousness, and as thereby certain of obtaining eternal life. Wherefore, to argue with Bessus, that to entitle believers to eternal life, Christ's righteousness must be imputed to them, is to contradict the scripture, which constantly represents eternal life, not as a debt due to believers, which it would be if Christ's righteousness were transferred to them by imputation, but as a free gift from God. See ver. 17. 1. Besides if by the fall (see ver. 15. note 1) of the one man, The apostle, and some other MSS., instead of the common reading τον ανθρωπον, 'by the fall of the one man,' have θεαματων ανθρωπων, 'by the one offence,' which Bessus has adopted as the true reading. But the common reading agrees better with the scope of the apostle's argument. See ver. 18.

2. Much more they who receive (τυποτειμενοι) the overflowing of grace, and of the gift of righteousness. (By the gift of righteousness Bessus understood the gift of Christ's righteousness, made ours by imputation. See Rom. iv. 3. note 2. But as 'the overflowing of grace and of the gift of righteousness,' as by the grace of righteousness, we think the latter leads us to ver. 15, where 'resurrection from the dead' is termed 'the gift of grace,' and is said to have abounded in mankind, and to have led to the intercession of death, and to the latter leading us to ver. 16. Where the gracious gift of the pardon of many offences, is said to 'lead to the resurrection from the dead,' by which we shall 'reign in life,' etc. See ver. 5. note 2.) Locke translates τυποτειμενοι by the word superabundant, as in which he is followed by Taylor, who remarks on this verse, that if such a thing as 'reigning in life' could have been given by the offence, with its consequences, would have been of the same extent with the gift of righteousness; and so the apostle could not have spoken of any surpassing of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, beyond the offence. Whereas, if the effect of Adam's sin were to lead to the resurrection from the dead, it would be contrary to the expression which was passed on the whole human race. Gen. iii. 19. 'Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return,' that part of the free gift which was bestowed upon all mankind, being the life on earth, together with a resurrection from the dead at the last day; and the exuberance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, is the passion of man's own sin, lasting in righteousness and eternal life.

3. Shall reign in life. The apostle's meaning in this passage is, that they who receive the overflowing of grace and of the free gift by which they will have greater happiness in their new life, than they had miseries and sorrows in the state into which they were brought through Adam's disobedience, expressed 'by the reigning of death,' in this verse and in ver. 14.

Ver. 18.—1. Well then, as through one offence. The original words, δια ένας δειλινος, 'by the one weak.' This is a distinction, as in our version, between Adam's weak, womanly nature, and the unit of the human race. Ver. 19. A comparison of one fact with another, and ver. 18. a comparison of one man with another, as Taylor observes.

2. Even so, through one righteousness. The one act of righteousness of which the apostle speaks, is Christ's obedience to death, mentioned Phil. ii. 8. and called obedience simply in ver. 19. of this chapter.

3. All men, to justification of life. As atoning, condemnation, in the foregoing clause, denotes the sentence of God by which Adam and all his posterity were condemned to death, its opposite δικαιωματα (καταδικασμον), justification of life, must signify the sentence of God whereby Adam and his posterity were suffer ed to live a while on earth, and are to be raised from the dead at the last day. See ver. 9. note 1. The benefit of this sentence all partake of; and therefore it is said to have 'come upon all men.' This sentence, called 'the gracious gift,' ver. 16. whereby our first parents were redeemed from instant death, is implied in what God said to Eve, Gen. iii. 15. 'In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children,' and to Adam, ver. 19. 'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.' Ill. 2. 1. 4. and return unto the dust,' etc. And the need of the woman shall bruise thy head. See ver. 19. 1. As through the disobedience of one man, the many, (τέκνων, τεκνίων) were constituted sinners. Seeing the apostle, in the preceding verse, hath informed us, that through one offence, or rather through the gift of righteousness, as by one man, which he is speaking of, as constituted, we are to suppose, we are to understand their being subjected to sin, we are to understand their being subjected to death. As before we spoke before, but their being made liable to actual sin, and for their actual sins, to die, is the subject of the whole discourse concerning the sin of Adam, who having corrupted his nature, conveyed a corrupted nature, the source of actual transgression, to his posterity. And thus we have a proper 'comparison of one man with another,' to the world,' mentioned in the beginning of this discourse, ver. 12. 2. Do through the obedience of one man, the many [κάθεν καταδικασμι].

CHAPTER VI.

20. But when Adam was made to live, law secretly entered into the world as the rule of man's conduct, even the law written on his heart, so that the offence had abounded. However, where sin hath abounded, grace hath superabounded:

21. (The same) That as sin hath reigned (w. 185.) by death, so also grace might reign (w. 118.) through righteousness unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

But law privily entered (w. 187.) so that the offence hath abounded. However, where sin hath abounded, grace hath superabounded:

That as sin hath reigned (w. 185.) by death, so also grace might reign (w. 118.) through righteousness unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Chapter VI.

View and Illustration of the Reasons in this Chapter.

St. Paul's design in this and the two following chapters, was to confute the slanders reported mentioned chap. ili. 6., namely, that the apostles ordered their disciples to site and grace might have been disadorned. All Christians, in opposition to the unbelieving Jews and Greeks, that the doctrine of justification by faith without works of law, does not render law useless, but rather establishes it as highly useful, chap. iii. 31. His transition to these subjects is elegant. For, in the foregoing chapter, having made man kind from the very beginning privily, but not enter privily, but be introduced in a very pompous and public manner; not to mention, that where roman, law, is used to denote the law of Moses, it commonly has the article prefixed, which is wanting here. Further, can one with Locke imagine that no offence abounded in the world which could be punished with death, till the law of Moses was promulgated? and that grace did not superabound, till the offence against that law abounded? The apostle himself affirms, Rom. i. 30., that the heathen by the light of nature, knew not only the law of God, but that persons who sinned against that law were worthy of death. The offence therefore abounded long before the law of Moses entered. For these reasons I conclude, that the law which was so secretly entered from the very beginning privily, and not yet the law of Moses, which is the law of nature: And it's taking place the apostle very properly expressed by its entrance, because if Adam and Eve had been made to die immediately after they sinned, the law of man's nature would have ceased with the species. But they being requisite from the immediate death of Adam and Eve, the sentences recorded Gen. ii. 15, 16, 17. the law of their nature took place anew, or silently entered into the world.

2. However, they have the same synonym that hath superabounded. — This serves to demonstrate, that the apostle is not speaking of the law of Moses; for that law allowed no grace or mercy to sinners in all. Wherefore, when the law of Moses was, was it not that the consequence of a gracious covenant, wherein a fall pardon is granted through Christ to all who believe, and who repent of their sins. Ver. 21. That as sin hath reigned by death, so also grace might reign. — Here, as through the whole of chap. vi. the apostle personifies sin and death, which is personified sin and death, and describes it as an animal that have mankind under their dominion, and who exercises an uncontrolled power over their respective subjects. This figure he introduced after the dominion of that master, ver. 7. — That through the grace of Christ and splendour to his discourse. See the Illustration prefixed to chap. vi. paragraph 2. and chap. vi. 6. note 2.

CHAPTER VI. VIEW AND ILLUSTRATION OF THE REASONS IN THIS CHAPTER.

St. Paul's design in this and the two following chapters, was to confute the slanders reported mentioned chap. iii. 6., namely, that the apostles ordered their disciples to sit and grace might have been disadorned. See the Illustration prefixed to chap. vi. paragraph 2. and chap. vi. 6. note 2.
Chap. VI.

Therefore we are now, of right, his servants, ver. 9, 10.

Father, that the Romans might rightly understand this argument, the apostle concludes, from what he had told them, that at the fall they had been killed, both corporally and spiritually, by the sin of their first parents, but were made alive, both in body and spirit, by Christ, who on that account became their rightful lord, ver. 11. Wherefore, it was both their duty and their interest not to allow sin to rule them any longer, in the life which they had acquired through Christ, but to employ both the members of their body and the faculties of their mind in the service of God, as persons who have been made alive from the death brought on them by sin ought to do, ver. 12, 13.

Next, in answer to the calumnies, that the Christian teachers encouraged their disciples to sin, by telling them they were not under law, but under grace, the apostle affirmed that that doctrine has the direct contrary tendency. Sin shall not lord it over you, for this very reason, that ye are not under law, but under grace: and he had good reason to say so, because he had shewn, ver. 11, that under grace, that is, under the new covenant, men are made spiritually alive by God; consequently, they have sufficient, with the concern of gaining evil desires, and for working righteousness; and great encouragement to do so, by the promise of pardon which is made to them in that covenant. Whereas law, by rigorously requiring perfect obedience to all its precepts, and by refusing pardon to sinners, drives them to despair, and hardens them in their sins, ver. 14. These, said the apostle, are the things that we have been a witness against them constantly preaching. I believe that we ever said, Let us sin, because we are not under law, but under grace? ver. 15. In the mean time I must inform you, that the advantages ye enjoy under grace, though very great, are of such a kind as to leave you still at liberty to give yourselves up, as slaves, either to the body affections or to sinful desires, as ye choose; and that, to whomever of these masters ye yield yourselves slaves, ye give him the absolute direction of you, ver. 16.

But, I thank God, that ye Romans, though formerly the slaves of sin, have obeyed the form of doctrine into which ye were delivered as into a mould, ver. 17, and are become the servants of righteousness, ver. 18. To prevent the Romans from being surprised at the things he had written, he told them, that, on account of the weakness of their understanding in spiritual matters, he had reasoned from the laws and customs of men respecting slaves, to give them a just idea of the power of men's affections, to lead them either to vice or to virtue. And therefore, as formerly, through the power of their lusts, they had employed themselves wholly in wickedness, he exhorted them now, through the influence of holy affections, to employ themselves wholly in working righteousness, ver. 19, 20. Then contrasted the miserable condition and end of the slave of sin, with the happy state and reward of the servant of God: from which it appears, that even under the gracious new covenant, the wages of sin obstinately continued in is death, but the reward of holiness is everlasting life, ver. 21, 22, 23. See chap. viii. illust. ver. 13.

The metaphors in this chapter are extremely bold, yet being taken from matters well known, they were used with great advantage. For the influence of sinful passions, in constraining wicked men to commit evil actions, could not be better represented to those who were acquainted with the condition of slaves, and with the conduct of gaining evil desires, and for working righteousness; and with the regulations which their lives and services were regulated, than by the power which a tyrannical lord exercised over his slaves. Neither could any thing more affecting be devised, to show the miserable condition of a person habitually governed by his lusts, than to liken it to the state of a slave under a severe unprincipled master, who rigorously requires him to spend the whole of his time and strength in his work, who exacts from him things both painful and ignominious, and who, by the severity of the services which he imposes, miserably puts an end to the life of his slaves. On the other hand, the right which a lawful and humane lord has to the services of his slave, and the nature of the services in which he employs him, and the rewards which he bestows on him for his faithful services, convey a clear and affecting idea of the obligation which the gospel lays on men to employ themselves wholly in works of righteousness, and of the happy consequences of such a course of life.

New Translation.

Chap. VI. — What then do we say? Let us continue in sin, that grace may abound?

3 By no means: we have died by sin, how shall we still live (s, 165.) by it?

4 Are ye ignorant, that so many of us as have been baptized into Christ Jesus, have been baptized into his death?

5 (Osr. 282.) Besides, we have been buried together with him by baptism into his death,

Ver. 1. What then do we say? — Prefix here is not the future tense of the verb τολμάομαι, as our translators suppose, but the present of the verb τολμάομαι: to be bold, to dare. The apostle concludes, from what he had told them, that a reign of sin was upon them, when they were under the law; but having been enlightened through Christ, they were now under grace, ver. 11. And hence, it is only the fear of the Romans, that they were not sincerely the servants of grace, to which he now proceeds.

Ver. 2. We have died by sin. — This is the true translation of the clause. For we are all under sin in some sort, signified has died; and are sinners, not of the object of the cause, but of the cause, manner, and instrument, signifies by sins as the cause. See note 2. and ver. 11. note 1. The common translation, how shall we who are dead to sin live any longer? is absurd. For we have died to sin, not that we are dead in sin, but added to our profession, and the continuance of the work of grace in us.

Ver. 3. For if we have been united (συνσυνηκτωμεν) into Christ, that is, implanted into, and become a part of the body of Christ, by baptism. The apostle's meaning is: by baptism being united to Christ as our federal head, all that has happened to him may be considered as happening to us. See Rom. vi. 4. note 2.

Ver. 4. Have been baptized into his death. — In our baptism, have been represented emblazoned gloriously, as put to death with him. Hence, it is said, ver. 4. We have been buried together with him by baptism into his death: and ver. 5. Planted together in the likeness of his death, also of his resurrection: and ver. 6. Though we have died with Christ. See Rom. vii. 4. note 2. From all which it appears, that baptism, the rite of initiation into the Christian church, is an emblematical representation of our union with Christ, as members of his body, and of the malignity of sin in bringing death upon Christ, ver. 10 and upon all mankind, and of the efficacy of Christ's death in procuring for all the resurrection from the dead. See Rom. xiv. 11. note 1.

Ver. 5. Buried together with him by baptism. — Christ's baptism was not the baptism of repentance; for he never committed sin; but, as was expected, a profession of baptism. For he was supposed to be submitted to be baptized, that is, to be buried under the water by John, and to be raised out of it again, as an emblem of his future death and resurrection. In like manner, the baptism of the faithful is emblematical of their own death, burial, and resurrection. See Col. ii. 12. note 1. Perhaps also it is a commemoration of Christ's baptism.
that though we have been killed by sin, (ver. 6.), yet like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the power of the Father, to live for ever, (ver. 6.), even so we also, by the same power, shall enjoy a new and never-ending life in heaven with him.

6 For seeing Christ and we have been planted together in baptism, in the likeness of his death as occasioned by sin, certainly, by being raised out of the water of baptism, we are taught that we shall be also planted together in the likeness of his resurrection.

7 So then from Christ's death and resurrection, conclude ye yourselves to be dead verily by sin, but now made alive by God, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

8 We also shall walk in a new life.—The original phrase, σπουδασμός, much of our translators, and especially, in an Hebrew, has iv. 18, and must be translated, as I have done, after Bess. The true sense in both cases is a reformation or state of greater perfection.

2. We shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection.—Of the resurrection of believers, Christ's resurrection is both an example and a proof. Wherefore our baptism, called in the preceding clause, "a planting together in the likeness of his death," being both a memorial of Christ's death and resurrection, and a proof and example of our own, it teaches us, that we shall die indeed through the manifesting of sin, yet even die the death of the righteous; and that the efficacy of his power as Saviour, we shall at the last day be raised from the dead as he was, to live with him and with God eternally. Our baptism setting these things before us, the daily recollection of it ought to stir us up to every religious and virtuous action, that we may be meet for the society of God and Christ through all eternity.

3. We see this, that our old man was crucified with him.—Our crucifixion with Christ is in this verse termed the crucifixion of our old man, or animal nature, because the greatest part of our sinful inclinations have their seat in the body, and because such evil inclinations as are of more spiritual nature, are always somehow turned toward the body. This old man, or animal nature, is said to be crucified together with Christ, because its death is not only figurative or spiritual, but real and actual. See Eph. ii. 15, note 2, where the influence of the crucifixion of Christ, in killing men's sinful passions, is explained. Accordingly, our crucifixion with Christ is represented, in the next clause, as issuing in the body of sin's being rendered inactive in making us any longer servants of sin.

4. That the body of sin, &c.—The body belonging to sin, for this is the guilt of possessions. The apostle personifies sin, after the custom of the ancients, with all the attributes of a man. But this kind of personification is not necessary, being understood, speak of the virtues and vices of which they treat as though they were persons, and all this with all its appurtenances of lusts, passions, &c. called ver. 13, members. See note 1. In this and the following verses, the apostle discourses of the preceding natural death as emblematically set forth in baptism, as well as the natural death and resurrection, to which it returns ver. 6. Then in ver. 11, he draws a comparison of our bodies, as before, and as in the language of his subsequent exhortations.

5. For as we have been planted together in baptism, (ver. 6.), so are we also raised together with him, (ver. 5.)—Baptism unfolds the work of salvation; it connects the believer with Christ, imputing to him the righteousness of Christ, and sealing the soul to his service and kingdom. Our resurrection with him signifies the end of our suffering and the beginning of our blessedness. It is the final and complete deliverance from sin and its consequences, and the full enjoyment of heaven. Hence the apostle says, "ye shall be also conformed to the image of his likeness, (Rom. v. 11.) in the glory, the same as if it were now actually in us. This is the blessedness of our resurrection, and it is here illustrated by the oriental custom of being "raised up" by the master or lord, as a sign of his favor and protection. The same custom is referred to in the passage, "your body, (Gal. iii. 20.) ye have raised up with Christ from the dead, (Eph. ii. 6.) and have set it free from sin, (ver. 2.)—The apostle having in the preceding verse represented all believers as crucified with Christ, who is dead and risen again, and in him we are crucified with him, and raised up with him, we are to conclude, ye yourselves to be dead verily by sin, but now made alive by God, through Jesus Christ our Lord.
Wherefore, let not sin reign in your mortal body, so as to obey it by fulfilling the lusts of the body. 13 Neither present ye to sin your members as instruments of unrighteousness; but present yourselves to God as alive from the dead, and members members present to God as instruments of righteousness.

14 (Rom. 6:14) Besides, sin shall not lord it over you; 15 for ye are not under law, but under grace. 16 What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under law, but under grace? 17 By no means.

18 Do ye not know, that to whomsoever ye present yourselves slaves, in order to obedience, ye are his slaves (Rom. 6:18) whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

19 But thanks to God, that although (109.) ye were the slaves of sin, yet ye have obeyed the apostle followed his Master, who thus spake of the spiritual resurrection: John v. 25. 'The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live.' The spiritual resurrection is likewise spoken of, Eph. ii. 5. vi. 10. 'which hath quickened him from the dead, and hath set him at his own right hand in the heavens,' Gal. iii. 27. 'that ye are justified by faith, and not by works; lest any man should glory in men.' Upon the whole, it appears, that the death which sin hath brought upon mankind, is not that of the body alone, but of the soul also. 'Death that wrought death,' which it destines the resurrection of the body, comprehends the renovation of our nature by a change of our principles and practice, through the powerful assistance afforded to us under the new covenant. And on this change, the expressions so often used in scripture are founded—among others, Romans viii. 27. "For they that are according to the flesh minded, these are the enemies of God, and the work of them is, that they may perish; ver. 38. "For this same God who gave us the apostles, gave also unto Jesus Christ his wise apostles, for the chief person of his body and of the church: and hath committed to the churches the word of his apostles;" Gal. ii. 9. "For I marvel that so soon as I go into you I find so many of you as have no baptism at all; and that they have not circumcision, although they are called Jews;" Gal. v. 2. "For of these things I have warned you, and bear witness that even so do they who reject;" Gal. vi. 11. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen." 1 Cor. vii. 15. "For I have not called these things, the terms of immortality, and of death, and of the devil, shall be no more; for the devil hath been under the power of sin, and under the power of death, and under the power of hell;" 1 Cor. vii. 8. "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men;" Titus ii. 11. "For, if a man know not how to govern his own house, how shall he take care of God's church?" 1 Tim. iv. 14. from the heart the mould of doctrine into which ye were delivered: for ye were delivered from the slavery of righteousness.

19 (a) And being made free from sin, ye have become the slaves of righteousness.

20 I speak after the manner of men, (a2) an account of the iniquity of your flesh: (2:9, 23) Wherefore, as ye have presented your members (έκκοιτο κατὰ τοῦ πνεύματος) as instruments to unclean affections, and to unholy lusts, ye shall present your members as instruments to righteousness, to work holiness.

21 (Rom. 6:13) And what fruit had ye then of those things, of which ye are now ashamed? For the reward of those things is death.

22 But now being set free from sin, and having become servants of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the reward everlasting life.

23 For the wages of sin is death; but the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men.

yielded to the forming efficacy of that mould of doctrine, and were made new men, both in principle and practice.

Ver. 19. And being made free from sin, ye have become the slaves of righteousness. This is the word by which the act of giving a slave his liberty was signified, called by the Romans emancipation. Ver. 20. I speak after the manner of men. We cannot but admire the apostle's manner of speaking, and his wonderful moderation, in addressing his readers. Not only does he not consider it of importance to his message of the grace of God, to assume the air of an oracle, but he Grosly, he does not even use the corrupt form in the phrase of grace, but universal, common, and to all men, and that he shall render the same loathsome in the sight both of God and man.

21. For when ye were slaves of sin, ye were free men, (supply as) to righteousness.

Next, it is called iniquity; because it is injurious both to God and man. Wherefore, these two epithets exhibit a just description of the nature of sin.

Ver. 21. For the reward of these things is death. — The Greek word ἀνάφυσιν signifies both the end for which a thing is done, and the last issue or effect of it. The apostle's meaning is, that the wages of sin are death, to be inflicted on sinners, is the natural consequence, or issue and reward of their sin. The word is used in the first sense, Acts 1:19. For those who crucified Jesus, to express the issue or end of your sins. The word is used in the second sense, 2 Cor. 6:14. For what sort of people are ye, that have fellowship with sinners? the end or purpose for which ye believe. Ver. 22. — For the wages of sin is death. — The original word ἀνάφυσιν properly signifies the food and pay, which generals give to their soldiers for their service. By using this term, the apostle did the same as when we speak of the wages which the men owe who work under his banner. Further, as the sin here spoken of is that which men commit personally, and which they continue in, the death which is the wages of this kind of sin, must be death eternal. It is observable, that although in scripture the expression eternal life is often to be met with, we nowhere find eternal joined with death. Yet the punishment of the wicked is said to be eternal, Matt. 25:46.

2. Gracious gift of God is everlasting life. — The apostle does not mean the everlastingness of his grace or of the grace of God given to his servants, because they do not merit it by their services, as the slaves of sin merit death by theirs; but he calls it αἰώνιον ὀσπερ, a free gift; cf. An. as Everlasting life, in the present sense; Acts 1:8. — The apostle speaks of the everlasting life, as an occasion; because, being freely bestowed, it may be compared to the dominions which the Lord will make for the body and for the soul of his good-will, bestowed on his soldiers, as a mark of their favour.

CHAPTER VII.

The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having confuted the slanderous report mentioned chap. iii. 8. that he and his brethren taught their disciples to sin, that grace might abound, judged it necessary in this chapter to repel the objection which the Jewish scribes and heapish philosophers urged against this doctrine of justification without works of law, chap. iii. 81. that it made law useless. This objection the apostle now examined the more carefully, not only because it gave him an opportunity of explaining to the Jews the nature and obligation of the law of Moses, but also forewarned that, in after-time, the same objection would be urged by infidels against the doctrine of justification without works of law, to discredit the gospel. His discourse begins with observing, that the law of Moses, as the law of God's visible kingdom and church among the Jews, had dominion over man, that is, was obligatory, only while he lived, ver. 1. — This assertion he proved, by likening the law of Moses to the law of marriage, which binds the wife to the husband only while the husband liveth. But if he die, she is loosed, and may marry another, ver. 2, 3. — Wherefore, as the death of either party dissolves their marriage, the Jews, having been put to death by the curse of the law, in the person of Christ were now loosed from their marriage with God as their king, and from the law of Moses by which God's kingdom among them was governed, that they might be married to Christ by entering into the gospel church, and, in that new marriage, bring forth fruit unto God, ver. 4. — It is true this argument, at first sight, may perhaps appear inept. But if we consider it attentively, it will appear strong and in point. For, the subject matter of these passages is this; God represents his connexion with the Jews, as their king, under the idea of a marriage solemnized at Sinai, when he gave them his law, Ezek. xvi. 8; 86; Jer. ii. 2. iii. 14.: For by that similitude God intimated to the Jews, that as marriages are dissolved by the death of either of the parties, his connexion with their nation; as their king was to end at the time when they, with the rest of mankind, should be put to death in the person of Christ. The apostle therefore argued justly, from the Jews being put to death in the person of Christ, that their marriage, or connexion with God as their king, was dissolved, and that they were loosed from the law of Moses, as the law of God's temporal kingdom. Besides, it was fit that that kingdom and its law should end at the death of Christ. For the temporal kingdom having been erected among the Jews, for the sake of publishing, in the law of Moses, the curse of the law of works originally given to man in paradise, (see Gal. iii. 10. note 2. Rom. x. Illustr.), that they might be sensible of the grace of the gospel, it is evident, that when Christ removed the curse of the law of works by suffering it for all mankind, and opened the gospel dispensation, the kingdom of God among the Jews and the law of Moses were no longer of use, but were set aside, that the Jews might be at liberty to enter into the gospel church, and there bring forth fruit to God.

Next, to shew them the true nature of the law of Moses, and to convince them that it was not intended as a rule of justification, the apostle told the Jews, that when they were first placed under the law of Moses, as the law of God's temporal kingdom, their sinful passions wrought effectually in their members, to make them do such actions as, by the curse of that law, subjected them to death. For this, in effect, was to tell them that the law of Moses was a mere law of works, which required perfect obedience under it, and by that comparing themselves with that law, they were placed under a new law, in which not perfect obedience, but the obedience of faith, was required in order to life. And to shew this he told them, that as soon as Christ died, the Jews were not only loosed from the law of Moses, which by its curse annexed to every transgression, appears to have been the original law of works under which Adam fell, but, as persons delivered from the law of works, by their dying with Christ in the nature in which they were tied to that law, they were admitted into the Christian church that they might thenceforth serve God according to the new manner of the law under which mankind were placed at the fall, and not any longer according to the law of Moses.

But lest, from the apostle's telling the Jews, ver. 5, that their sinful passions under the law had put them to death, and from his affirming, ver. 6, that they were loosed from the law on that account, they might suspect that he thought the law of Moses a bad institution, he assured them that he entertained no such opinion. That law, though it could not justify the Jews, was of excellent use as a rule of duty. By its prohibitions, it made them sensible of their sins; and by its curses, it shewed them what their sins deserved. As an instance, he mentioned their not being able to know that the strong desire of things forbidden is sin, unless the law had said, "Thou shalt not covet," ver. 7. Wherefore, when he told them that their sinful passions under the law had wrought in their members, to put them to death, his meaning was, that their sinful passions, and not the law, had wrought in them strong desires of things forbidden, which, by the curse of the law, subjected them to death: for without law sin is dead; it hath no power to kill the sinner, ver. 8. Further, to shew the excellent nature of law, as it makes men sensible who are guilty of their sins, he observed, that while men are ignorant of law, they fancy themselves without sin, and entitled to life; but when, by the operation of law upon their conscience, they come to the true knowledge of their own characters, they are sensible that sin lives in them, and that they are dead by the curse, ver. 9. Thus it hath come to pass, that the law of works, which was originally intended to give life to mankind, hath occasioned their death, ver. 10. Because their sinful passions, which law cannot subdue, deceive them into the commission of evil actions, which, according to the tenor of the law of works, subjects them to death, ver. 11. From all which it appears, that instead of being a sinful thing, the law of works, as published in the law of Moses, is holy, even in its curse, and all its commandments are holy, just, and good, ver. 12.

To this, however, a Jew is introduced replying. The good law which you so highly praised, notwithstanding its goodness, hath been, by your own acknowledgment, the occasion of my death. This objection the apostle introduced, that he might have an opportunity of shewing more fully the excellent nature of law. For he affirmed a third time, that it is not the law, but sin, which kills mankind. Wherefore, by comparing themselves with the holy law, the unregenerated become sensible that they are spiritual, and sold under sin, ver. 14. The spirituality or holiness of the law every sinner must know by this, that when he does the things which the law forbids, he does not approve of them. On the other hand, the corruption of his own nature, and his inability to do good, he feels, first, and by habitually doing what the law forbids, notwithstanding he hath some faint hatred of these evil actions, ver. 15. Now, these feeble volitions, and ineffectual aversions, demonstrate that our reason and conscience assent to all the precepts of the law, as good, ver. 16. But reason and conscience being the higher part of our nature, and our real selves, the evil actions which we do in opposition to their dictates are not so much our work, the work of our higher part, as the work of the sinful passions which predominate in the animal or lower part of our nature, ver. 17. Thus by the law, men are made sensible that in their flesh, or animal nature, they are not the true governors of their own actions, being wholly governed by that part, though they have some inclination to what is good, they find it extremely difficult to practise it. This inability in the unregenerated to do the good which they incline, the apostle insisted on, not to drive them to despair, but to make them put a just value on the gospel, which, as he afterwards observes, is alone able to deliver them from the slavery of sin, and to raise the higher part of their nature to its proper superiority, ver. 18. Next he tells us, that the extreme difficulty of the thing is the true reason that the unregenerated do not do the good they incline, but the evil which they do not incline, ver. 19. And from this infers, that sin is not the work of the higher part of their nature, which is their real selves, but the work of their temporal part. This he has said before, ver. 17. but he repeats it here, not with any view to excuse the sinner, by laying the blame of his evil actions on the prevalence of his passions, but to shew that all the credit which sinful actions derive, whether from the general practice of the world, or from the station and abilities of the individuals, is of little consideration, that they are contrary to the reason and conscience of mankind.

To his account of the discovery which law makes of the state wherein men are by nature, the apostle subjoins a description of the struggle between reason and passion, which arises in the mind of the sinner when awakened by the operation of law on his conscience. Such a person finds, that when he is most strongly inclined by his better part from the law, that he is constrained by a rule or law, which is as much an obj.

in order that ye may be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit to God.

5 For, when we were in the flesh, the sinful passions ( Sacramento) which we had (78, 74, 117) under the law wrought effectually in our members, to bring forth fruit unto death.

6 But now (Sacerdotal) we are liberty, having died in that by which we were tied, (2 Cor. v. 16) so that we ought to serve in newness of the spirit, and not in oldness of the letter.

7 What then do we say, that the law is sin? By no means. Nay, I have not known sin in its extent and demerit, unless the law had said, Thou shalt not covet.

8 But I say that sin taking opportunity under the commandment, wrought effectually in me all sin.

9 For without law sin is dead; delivered from the law of nature, as a rule of justification. So the apostle tells us, Gal. iii. 20. Christ hath delivered us from the curse of the law, that the promise by grace might be effectual.

10 That ye might be married:—In this passage the union of Christ with his people is represented as a marriage. So likewise, Ephes. v. 22, 21 Rev. xxii. 9, 17. The apostle probably took that idea from the ancient phraseology concerning the Jews. See illustr. ver. 4. But from whatever source it was derived, it is a strong representation of the relationship which subsists, and will subsist, between Christ and believers in all eternity, and of the happiness which forever derive from his love to them, and from their entire subjection to him.

11 And to another:—The apostle speaks of Christ as the husband of the believing Jews, because he was now become their Lord and Head; and calls him another husband, because, while the theocracy subsisted, God was their husband, lev. ix. 8. 'Thy Maker is thy husband.'

12 Even to him who is raised from the dead. The crucifixion of their old man, or corrupt nature, and their obtaining a new nature by the death of Christ, was a fit preparation of the Jews for becoming spouses to Christ, now raised from the dead.

13 For the accursed might bring forth fruit unto God. The apostle says, 'That we should bring forth,' to show that he was in the same circumstances with the Jews. The transition from one person to another, i.e., a new man, is described in the apostle's question in Hosmer, Virgil, Xenophon, Plato, and all the best writers in antiquity. And it is admired as metaphorical and beautiful by readers of taste.

14 For to God. Holy actions brought forth by the Jews, in comparison with the righteousness and consciences of Gentiles, were called the fruit of God. The fruit of Christ's church, is called fruit to God, to signify, that although the Jews were loosed from their former marriage with God as their king, they were not loosed from their obedience to God; and that all the good actions which men perform under the gospel dispensation, are considered by God as belonging to him. Perhaps also in the expression, fruit to God, there is an intimation, that as law gives no assistance for conquering the corruptions of our nature, and allows no pardon to sinning, the same actions which men commit under law, whether the law of nature or of Moses, are so properly fruit to death. See ver. 6.

15 For when we were in the flesh. The apostle describes the state of the Jews under the law of Moses, by their being in the flesh, and being in the flesh and being in sin (see Gal. iii. note), to show 1. That their relation to God, as his people, was constituted merely by their descent from Abraham according to the flesh, and by their performing the services of the law of Moses, which all pertained to the flesh 2. That men's relation to God as law people, under the gospel, is not constituted either by their being in the flesh, or being in sin, or by all that pertains to being in this or that ceremony pertaining to the flesh, but by their possessing those dispositions of mind which rendered men like God. They are God's people, not by the flesh, but by the spirit. In other passages of scripture, by men's being in the flesh, is meant their being concerned by the laws of the flesh; and by their being in sin, their being guided by the spiritual principles of their nature, purified and strengthened by the spirit of God. Rom. viii. 1. note. 3. They are not only God's people, but God's sons. Gal. iv. 6. 2 Cor. vi. 17.

Ver. 6.—1. Having died in that by which we were tied. I have followed the Hebrew word, sacer, which Ovid describes, in his Fasti, lib. v. i. 107, 'To be tied' because the apostle is speaking of the Jews, who, by their fleshly descent from Abraham, were tied in accordance with the law of Moses, or, as it supposes all the people of God, being put to death with Christ, they were, through that death, strip- led of their fleshly relation to Abraham, by which they were bound to obey the law of Moses. If the common reading, sacer, is rejected, by such a modification of it, as will make it refer to the death of Christ, the interpretation will run thus: 'That being dead by which we were tied.'

2. In newness of the spirit, and not in oldness of the letter. See 2 Cor. iii. 6, note i. The happiness which was entirely dependent on the old covenant, i.e., the Jews, were no longer to worship God with rites and ceremonies pertaining to their flesh, but with services of their spirit, consisting in fear and reverence, and love. From this, however, we must not infer, that the Jews under the law did not serve God with his services; all the religious services in which they were employed are mentioned in the covenant with Abraham, and were practised by the pious Israelites. But to these the law of Moses added numberless services pertaining to the law, by which the converted Jews were freed from their death with Christ.

Ver. 7.—1. What then do we say, that the law, &c. The question in the end of this verse, being from the tenth commandment in the decalogue, shows that the law here spoken of is the law of Moses, and chiefly the tenth commandment; that is, they are just a transcript of the law of nature, every thing the apostle had said concerning it applicable to the law of nature also.

2. Law is holy. The apostle, by this clause, means the law as a rule, and not as a thing absolutely holy. It is not holy, as God sees it, it is holy, and the commandment holy and just and good.

3. By no means. The law of Moses had no part in that commandment. It is not the law of Moses which speaks of the holy, holy, holy, which the rulers of the Jews in the temple declare, but the holy one on high, Isa. vi. 3.

4. As the apostle is speaking of the law of Moses, this must not be understood universally. For it is not to be supposed, that the reference and application of the commandments of Moses was only to the priests, or to their families, or to the whole nation of Israel.

5. The contrary is affirmed by the apostle, Rom. x. 14. Nevertheless, the most enlightened among them bad but an imperfect knowledge of the nature and demerit of sin in general, and of the number and aggravations of their own sins in particular, compared with the knowledge of these things which they would have derived from revelation. The truth is, they flung many things innocent, which were real enormities, and many things trivial sins, which were very heinous, as if they knew not to have sinned.

6. For even strong desire I had not known to be sin, unless the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. The original word, xuat, means strong desire, whether good or bad. It is used in the best sense; as it is likewise 1 John ii. 16. Exod. xxxii. 32. The original word, xoat, means strong desire of a good kind also, Luke xxii. 25. Exod. xix. 14. There are strong desires, I have vehemently desired to eat this pasover; I Thess. xvi. 17. Endeavor to do more abundantly (xutjrt xuntw) with great desire, 2 Cor. x. 14. These are the strong desires. Nay, because it could not hold its place there for any length of time, unless it was indwelt. However, the knowledge that strong desire, not exerted in outward actions, is sin, is not very obvious; and therefore the apostle ascribes it to the information given us by the revealed law of Moses.
Accordingly, I was in my own imagination entitled to life, while without the knowledge of law formerly: but when the commandment, with its curse, came to my knowledge in their full extent, sin, which I fancied had no existence in me, lived again, and I died by the curse.

10 For this reason, the commandment which was intended for life, the same was found by me to end in death.

11 So that the commandment, which was intended for life, became death to me, that sin might have its dominion, that I might be made a slave of sin.

12 Wherefore, the law indeed restrains us from sin by the fear of punishment, is holy even in its curse, and the moral commandment is holy, and just, and good.

13 The law, then, which you praise so much, to me has become death.

14 For by the law I died to sin, that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in me.

15 Thus I have learned, that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin.

16 For what I shamefully work, that I do not want to do; for what I do, that I do not want to do.

17 But if I perform the things I do not want to do, I agree that the law is good, even toward me.

18 For what I would do, I do not, and for what I do not want to do, that I do.

19 But if I am doing the things I do not want to do, I agree that the law is good.

20 For I know that nothing good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh.

21 For who knows whether I shall be able to understand my own nature? For who can know his soul?

22 But I have the law, bound with my nature, which makes me a prisoner of the law.

23 The law is holy, and just, and good.

24 That law might become a transgressor of the law,

25 For the one to whom it was said, thy flesh shall not live by the law alone,

26 But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifest, being witnessed by the law and the prophets;

27 For the law was given through Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

28 No, but as it is written, the just shall live by faith.

29 For we know that the whole creation groans, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God.

30 For the creation was made subject to corruption through what was made subject to corruption; but not in order that it might be destroyed, 31 But the creation itself will be set free and will be liberated, and will bring about the liberation of us who are in bondage.

32 For we know that the whole creation will become joy, because of the coming of the sons of God.

33 And not only that, but we ourselves, we who have the firstfruits of the spirit, we also groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption of the sons of God.

34 For we are looking for the redemption of our body.

35 And in expectation of this we were saved.

36 For the creation itself will be set free, and we also will be set free, together with the creation itself, from the power of sin and death.

37 For the whole creation is groaning in pain and in suffering, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God.

38 And not only that, but we ourselves, we who have the firstfruits of the spirit, we also groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption of the sons of God.

39 For we know that the whole creation will become joy, because of the coming of the sons of God.
16 And if I do that which I delight not, (euzeugos) I consent to the law that is good.

(vers. 12.)

17 (Rom. 8, 10d.) Now, therefore, it is no more that which I worketh evil, but sin dwelling in me.

18 For I know that good dwelleth not in me, which is my flesh. (Rom. 7, 18.) Indeed, to incline lies near me; (vers. 21.) but to work out what is excellent I do not find near me.

19 (Rom. 8, 9.) Therefore, I do the good which I incline; but the evil which I do not incline, that I practice.

20 Now, if I do that which I do not incline, it is no more I who worketh evil, but sin dwelling in me.

21 Well then, I find, (ver. 71.) this law to me inclining to do what is excellent, that evil (bessa); I will not do evil, yet I do evil.

(See Rom. x. 8, note 2.)

23 For I am pleased with the law of God, according to the inward man; (vers. 7.) but I see a law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members.

24 O wretched man that I am, (ex juryois) how can I overcome!

25 Oh, I do not comprehend. See also 2 Cor. i. 2. e. 3. To elude the force of this argument, Augustine affirms, that the apostle does not speak of his outward actions, but of his concupiscence, by which he meant his inward desire in general; and that, for the reason mentioned in the next note, he expresses these notions by the pronom I. Be it so. On the contrary, if what I have said be true, I have demonstrated that the existence of concupiscence, the thoroughgoing wickedness in my mind, I do not approve. For I, my concupiscence, practises not in my mind that which I incline; but what I hate, that is I, my concupiscence doth. Now, not to insist on the iniquity of applying words which denote outward actions, to the motions of evil desire in the mind, I said, what sense is there in the apostle's telling me, that his concupiscence did not practice in his mind what he inclined? For, if what he inclined was good, he could not dwell in evil; and if he dwelled in evil, what he inclined was evil desire; consequently it was foolish in him either to expect it from concupiscence, or to complain of the want of it, as he does, very properly according to the existence of concupiscence, the superior part of his nature, at the instigation of passion and lust, the lower part of his nature, at the instigation of the unconverted. Further, by spiritualizing his eyes and conscience, the superior part of his nature, at the instigation of passion and lust, the lower part of his nature, at the instigation of the unconverted, and conscience make to evil actions, he hath overthrown the grand argument by which the wicked justify themselves in indulging their vices. Say they, since this text is not meant as a command, I have certainly meant that we should gratify them. True, says the apostle; but God hath also given you reason and conscience, which oppose the excesses of lust, and condemn its gratification. And as reason and conscience are the superior part of men's nature, a more certain indication of the law of God may be gathered from their operation than from the impulses of the other. Bem Observes, that in all probability the heresy of the Carpocrations took its rise from here. Ver. 17. notes the apostle's epitome to the Romans: For they affirmed that they were not guilty of the sins which the flesh committed, nor were they to be punished for them; and that they were no more, who, when they sin, think they sin.

26 Well, then, I find this law, acc. See Rom. ii. 12. note 1. By calling our sinful passions the law of God, he means, that they are a principle of action, as steady and constant in impelling us to evil, as the law of God is in directing us to what is good.

27 I am pleased with the law of God according to the inward man. — By appealing so often to that approbation, which the reason and conscience of men give to all the good actions enjoined by the law of God, and to that conscience which is found in the minds by the evil actions which it forbids, the apostle has clearly established the holiness and excellence of the law of God. And his argument will appear the stronger, when we consider, that those feelings are never wholly extinguished in men's minds, not only by the longest course of vice.

28 I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. — What the members of the body are, this conflict between conscience and passion is mentioned Gal. v. 17. For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary to one another, so that I am not in the will of God. This conflict was taken notice of by the heathen also, aludque cupido, mens alba sustulit. Vide mollerar probosques; detractor sequor.
who will deliver me from the body of this death!

25 I thank God, the Lord Jesus Christ, from ver. 34.

Who delivereth me through Jesus Christ our Lord.

(Age cot.) Do I myself, then, as a slave, serve with the mind the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin 12 by no means.

Ver. 26. From the body of this death. Some think the translation here may run, from this body of death; - joining with verse 27, as is done in the Vulgate version. But I think this an emphatic Hebriamen, signifying the body, that is the lusts of the body, which cause this death, the death threatened in the curse of the law.

Ver. 25. - I thank God, who delivereth me through Jesus Christ our Lord. - The Clement, and some other copies, with the Vulgate, read here, Εγκρον δια του θεου, the grace of God. But the common reading, being supported by almost all the ancient MSS. and by the Syriac version, is to be preferred; especially as it contains an ellipsis, which, if supplied according to the apostle's manner from the foregoing sentence, will give even a better sense than the Clement reading; - thus, 'Who will deliver me?' &c. 'I thank God, who delivers me through Jesus Christ.' See ch. vii. 26.

2. Do I myself, then, as a slave, serve with the mind the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin? - This is very important, and shows the difference between the law of the spirit of life (ver. 2) and the law of sin and death (ver. 1). The latter is the result of human transgression and assertion is an inference from what the apostle had said concerning the being delivered from the body of death through Jesus Christ. Being translated, 'Do I myself, then, as a slave, serve with the mind the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin?' This was in the minds of both parties, and the latter overthrows the former inference drawn, chap. vii. 8. and 11. from what is said in this passage. 'There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit.' For the law of the spirit of life has made us free from the law of sin and death, that the whole of the law is summed up in this, that the apostle, in the language of the passage, 'walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit.'

CHAPTER VIII.

In further answer to the objection mentioned chap. iii. 31. the apostle, in this chapter, with great feeling and energy, displays the many powerful motives which the doctrines of the gospel, explained in the preceding chapters, suggest, for engaging both the understanding and the affections of believers to a continued pursuit of holiness.

The first motive which he mentions is, That under the new covenant there is no condemnation to believers, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, ver. 1. This greatest of all considerations, the apostle begins with, after having pathetically described the terror of the awakened sinner, arising from his consciousness of guilt, because if mercy were not with God, he could neither be loved nor obeyed by men.

The second motive is, That under the new covenant, sufficient assistance is given to all, to free them from the law of sin and death, they cannot excuse their evil actions by pleading the strength of their sinful passions, ver. 2. This deliverance from the law of sin and death God hath accomplished, by sending his Son in the flesh to die in a sin-offering, to procure pardon for sinners, and to destroy the power of sin in their flesh by his word and spirit, that they may attain the righteousness which the law of faith, the new covenant, requires, ver. 4. And to shew the nature and extent of that righteousness, the apostle explains what it is to 'walk after the flesh,' and what to walk after the 'spirit,' ver. 5.

The third motive to holiness is, That, according to the new covenant, all who live a wicked, sensual life, shall die eternally; but every one who lives in a holy, spiritual manner, shall be rewarded with life eternal, ver. 6-8.

The fourth motive is, The spirit of God dwells with believers, whereby the lusts of their body are mortified, and their rational powers are habitually strengthened, ver. 10. And even the animal part of their nature, being subdued, is made subservient to righteousness, by the indwelling of the same Spirit, ver. 11. Such being the effects of the gracious promises promised in the gospel, no person under the new covenant is irresistibly forced, either by the corruptions of his nature, or by outward temptations, to live according to the flesh, ver. 13; and therefore God hath justly decreed, that all who live according to the flesh shall die eternally, ver. 12. - This declaration concerning future retributions under the new covenant, the apostle had made before, ver. 6; but he repeats it here, to show that, although the curse of the law, in so far as it allows no mercy to the penitent sinner, does not take place under the new covenant, men's obligations to holiness are not weakened; nor are the provisions of law are still continued under the gospel, but in a different form, and with a more happy efficacy. Further, to correct the error of the Jews, who suggested that no Gentile could obtain eternal life who did not obey the law of Moses, and yet comfort the believing Gentiles, whom the Jews thus excluded from the favour of God, the apostle declared, that, according to the tenor of the new covenant, all who are led by the Spirit of God to mortify the deeds of the body, are the sons of God, whether they be Jews or Gentiles. And to shew the excellent disposition of the sons of God, he observes, that notwithstanding under the new covenant the severest punishment is threatened against sinners, the sons of God do not obey him from that slavish fear of punishment which was bred in the minds of the Jews by the curse of the law, but from the filial dispositions of gratitude and love to the Father, ver. 15. - This excellent temper the apostle terms 'the witness of our spirit' that we are children of God; and observes, that the Spirit of God also confirms that witness, by his gifts and graces, bestowed discriminatorily upon the believing Gentiles as well as on the Jews, ver. 16.

Having thus shewn, that all who obey God sincerely, from a principle of faith, are his sons, the apostle, as the fifth motive to holiness furnished by the gospel, gives a particular account of the honours, privileges, and possessions of that people of God, ver. 17. They are 'heirs of God.' And to shew what an heir of God is, he adds, and 'joint heirs with Christ;' so that the whole felicity of that immortal life which Christ now enjoys in the human nature, really belongs to the other sons of God, whether they be Jews or Gentiles; and they shall be put in possession thereof; if, when called to it, they suffer, as Christ did, for righteousness' sake, ver. 17.5—This concerning suffering the apostle introduced, to teach the Romans, that their being the sons of God would not secure them against, but rather expose them to sufferings. And to prevent the Jews who considered prosperity as tokens of God's favour, from being scandalized at the gospel on account of the sufferings which accompanied it, and even to encourage them to suffer, he observed, that he gloriously resurrection by which the sons of God are to be distinguished, is a blessing so great, that the pious Gentiles supported the miseries of life by earnestly looking for it. ver. 19, 20.—Nor was their expectation without foundation, insomuch not as for their own sin, but for the sin of the first man, the human race was subjected to death by God, ver. 20.—in the firm resolution that he would deliver all mankind from the grave, through the obedience of Christ, ver. 31. By inasmuching that the expectations which the Gentiles entertained of a future life in the body, was derived from God's resolution to raise all mankind from the dead, the apostle, I suppose, meant God's resolution made known at the fall, that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent. For that promise, in its true meaning, being preserved among the Gentiles by tradition, was the foundation of the hope which many of them, in different parts of the world, were building on of the body, and of a future state. See Chap. I. View, remark 2. p. 53. Then, by a beautiful rhetorical figure, the apostle introduces the whole Gentile world as suffering extreme pain under the miseries of life, and earnestly wishing for deliverance, ver. 23.—Believers also groan within themselves, while they wait for the redemption of their body from the bondage of corruption, ver. 23.—But they wait patiently, and thereby shew the strength of their faith, ver. 24, 25.—And to this exercise of patience they are helped by the Spirit, who, by afflictions, produces in them such a disposition of mind, as is an effectual complaint to God, ver. 26.—And being wrought in them by the Spirit, it is justly termed 'the Spirit's complaining for the saints, ' ver. 27.

The sixth motive to holiness, furnished by the discoveries made in the gospel, is this: God having determined to save believers, they know that every thing, whether prosperous or adverse, shall work together for that end; so that their salvation is absolutely certain. The reason is, because the salvation of the sons of God, of Abraham, and the sons of God, (1 John iii. 1.) and heirs of immortality, according to his purpose, ver. 28.—And whom he foreknew to be his sons, them he also predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son Christ, both in their body and mind, ver. 29.—Moreover, whom he predestinated to be conformed to the image of Christ, them he also called or denominate the seed of Abraham, and gave them a right to all the blessings promised to the seed of Abraham and sons of God, ver. 29. Then, as concurrent with the view which he had taken of those grand subjects, and to shew that there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, he cries out, Who shall dare to bring any accusation against God's elect, since God hath declared that he will justify such by faith! ver. 33.—Who is he that shall condemn who is in Christ Jesus? who is he that shall condemn the Christians who walk not according to the commandments of

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VIII.—1 Mankind under the new covenant being delivered from the curse of the law, there is therefore now no condemnation to these Christians who walk not according to the inclinations of but according to the Spirit.

2 For the law of the Spirit of life by Christ Jesus, hath freed me from the law of sin and of death. (Rom. vii. 25.)

3 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, nor of the law, but according to the Spirit. (Rom. viii. 2.)

4 That the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit. (Rom. viii. 4.)

5 Now, they (are we) who live according to the Spirit, mind the things of the Spirit, and they who live according to the flesh, mind the things of the flesh. (Rom. viii. 5.)

Next, they walk not according to the flesh, (Rom. vii. 25.) but according to the Spirit.—To walk according to the flesh means to be wholly governed by those insatiable appetites which were their seat in the flesh. 3 Wherefore, they who live after the flesh cannot be the objects of God's favour, in any dispensation whatever.

9 Now ye live not in the flesh, but to the Spirit, because the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any one have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

10 And if Christ dwelleth in you, the body, verily, is dead (mort) with respect to sin, but the Spirit is life (pneuma) with respect to righteousness.

11 (As 106.) For, if the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you, he who raised up Jesus from the dead will make even (hymen) your mortal bodies alive through his Spirit who dwelleth in you.

12 Well then, brethren, we are not debtors to the flesh, to live according to the flesh.

13 If so be that ye live according to the flesh, ye shall die; but if through the Spirit ye put to death the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

14 For, because as many of you as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God.

15 For ye have not received the spirit of bondage (Gal. iv. 1-6), but ye have received the spirit of adoption, by which we cry Abba, Father.

16 Also, the Spirit itself beareth witness.

17 And if children, then heirs; heirs, children of God: if we jointly suffer, that also we may be jointly glorified.

18 However, I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which is about to be revealed to us. 1 Pet. i. 4.

19 For the earnest desire of the creature looketh for the revelation of the sons of God.

20 For the creature was subjected to vanity, not willing, but by him who has subjects, subjected.

that we are children, &c.—By this argument, the apostle proved that they are being, and being in the bosom of the Jews. All who believe are the sons of God, as is evident from possessing the spirit of God's children. Besides, in the first age, the sonship of the Gentiles was demonstrated by the spiritual gifts bestowed on them. The former of these satisfactions the apostle had described in the same spirit of adoption: the latter he speaks of in this verse, and calls it the Spirit, because the spiritual gifts come from the Spirit. And as those testimonies concur in the same things, as the apostle affirms, the same spirit of God in the first age, bare witness with the spirit of believers, that they were the children of God. Hence God is said to have called them by name, giving them the name and offices of the present time. See 2 Cor. ii. 6. b but especially Ephes. i. 13-14. Because the name of the apostle is thought to be used for καρδιά, Rom. ii. 15. c. d. Rev. xix. 18. e some translate the clause thus, 'The Spirit itself bears witness to our spirit.' But this translation makes no alteration in the sense; provided by the Spirit's witness we do not understand a particular revelation to individuals, but the common witness which the Spirit bears, by producing similar dispositions in the hearts of the faithful. See 1 Cor. xii. 3.

If we jointly suffer, that also we may be jointly glorified. f a Neytor's remark on this passage is very proper. Moreover, whom he predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son, them he also called, and whom he called, them he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

What shall we say then to these things? Since God is for us, who can be against us?

He certainly who spares not his proper Son, but delivered him up for us all, (3:23), how will he not with him also graciously give us all things?

Who will bring an accusation against the elect of God? It is God who justifieth them.

Chapter VIII.

2. Who can be against us? — Can Satan, or the world, or the unbelieving Jews, with any success, oppose our enjoying the inheritance of the children of God, with the other blessings promised to the seed of Abraham?

He who spares not his proper Son. — The word is spelled δόθην, he delivered, and not λιθήσθη, as it is likewise, John v. 39. But said also that God was (ἐπιλήφθη) his proper Son, to distinguish him from others, who are sons of God by creation, adoption; that is, by some temporal dignity conferred on them. No argument was ever addressed to creatures capable of being persuaded and obliged, to this. While it convinces the understanding, it raises every tender and devout feeling in the heart, and is a continual source of support and consolations.

Who will bring an accusation against the elect of God? — In this passage, the phrase elect of God hath a more restricted meaning than it has Rom. i. 6. 11. 1 Pet. i. 1. For it is applied to such of the Jews and Gentiles only, as God calls in the Spirit (Rom. i. 16). And yet God's elect according to the foreknowledge of God, is predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son, and to be heirs of glory. — It is reasonable to think, the apostle had the believing Jews in his eye here, as well as the believing Gentiles, because their unbelief bringeth accusation to them, that the wrath of God may be revealed from heaven upon them.

1. It is God who justifieth them. — In reference to the right hand of God, and his intercessions, the apostle speaks of a judicial acquittal from some crimes of which the justified person was accused, and from all the consequences which would have followed, if the crime had been proved. See Rom. ii. 13. note 2. — God is said to justify his elect, not because he will judge them, for that office belongs to Christ, nor because he authorizes Christ to justify them, — This clause and the following Augustine translated interjectionally: — Will God, who justifies, accuse them? Will Christ, who died for them, condemn them? But the common translation, at least of the first clause, is better, as it avoids the impropriety of representing God as an accuser at the tribunal of his Son. Besides, it is fully as emphatical as the other. God having declared his purpose of justifying his elect through faith, will any one after that presume to be his future glorifier, or to abhor his persons? — Ver. 34. — It is Christ who died, or rather who hath risen. — Christ who died to save God's elect, and who since his resurrection intercedeth on their behalf, he who dieeth for them, will neither condemn them himself when he sitteth in judgment upon them, nor suffer any other to condemn them.

Who also is at the right hand of God? — That is, who now governs the universe for his benefit. There is here an allusion to Ps. civ. 1. where the empire of the Christ after his resurrection is foretold.

What intercession for us? — Christ's intercession is not a pretense, but a truth. — And made intercession for all them that believe, saving believers, God accomplished in the same manner: They may be described as such as are predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son; those whom he thus predestinates, he calls his children; those whom he thus calls, he justifieth; and those whom he justifieth, he glorifieth. But notwithstanding all this, and the whole steps by which God accomplisheth his purpose are thus arranged and connected in the divine economy, human liberty remains and is manifestly not the thing that these. See illustration prefixed to chap. ix. 22. remark.

hot tears, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? 28 As it is written, Truly for thy sake we are put to death all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. 29 Nay in all these things we do more than overcome, (Rom. viii. 37.) through him who hath loved us. 30 For I am persuaded, that neither the fear of death, nor the allurements of life, nor all the different orders of evil angels, against whom we fight, (Ephes. vi. 12.) nor things present, nor things to come, 31 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is through Christ Jesus our Lord. which we bear to Christ. But separate us from our own love, is an unusual expression. 11. signify the persecuting rulers and potencies of the earth, who endeavoured to make the first Christians renounce their faith. But as evil angels, in specious promises, persuade principalities and powers, and as the apostle rises in his description, it is probable that he speaks of these malicious spirits, the invisible enemies of mankind; and that he calls them principalities and powers, by the usual term of the office or power possessed, for the persons possessing it. 12. Nor things present, nor things to come. 13. The apostle does not mention things past, because they have no influence on the mind, unless in so far as the like things are either hoped or feared. 14. Nor any other creature. 15. In this general clause, the apostle includes whatever else could be named, as having any influence to separate believers from the love of God, exercised towards us through Christ. CHAPTER IX.

The apostle having insinuated, chap. iii. 8. that God would cast off the Jews because they refused to believe on Jesus, a Jew was there introduced,replying, that their rejection would destroy the faithfulness of God. To this the apostle answers, that the faithfulness of God would be established, rather than destroyed, by the rejection of the Jews for their unbelief; because God had expressly declared, Gen. xviii. 19. that Abraham's children were to keep the way of the Lord, in order to their obtaining the promised blessings; and thereby insisted, that if they did not keep the way of the Lord, they would lose these blessings, of which their being made the visible church of God was one. See chap. iii. 4. note 1. This was the answer the apostle thought proper to make in that part of his letter. But the objection being specious, and much insisted on by the unbelieving Jews, he introduced it a second time in this place, that he might reply to it more fully. His answer the apostle introduced with a solemn assurance, that he felt the bitterest grief when he considered the incitement, and rejection of the Jewish nation, and the many miseries that were coming on them, ver. 1. 2. Inasmuch that he could have wished to be cut off from the visible church of Christ on earth, by excommunication, and even by death, if it could have prevented these evils, ver. 8. nor be loved the Jews in the covenant; and respecting them as ancient people of God, and thought highly of their privileges, which he enumerated on this occasion as just matter of glory to them, ver. 4, 5. 6. Having therefore such a love and respect for his brethren, they could not suspect, that, in speaking of their rejection, he was moved either by ill-will or envy.

Having thus endeavoured to gain the good opinion of the Jews, the apostle proceeded to give a full answer to the objection above mentioned. He told them, the promises in the covenant would not fall to the ground, though the whole natural seed of Abraham should be cast off. And, as he said, he, all who were of the Gentiles, according to the flesh, meaning the twelve tribes, these are not the whole Israel of God. There is a spiritual Israel, to whom likewise the promises belong, ver. 6. To shew this, he observed, that because persons are the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, it does not follow that they are the children of Abraham to whom the promises in their first and literal meaning were made. His children according to the flesh, who are heirs of the promises in their first meaning, were limited to Isaac, by the declaration, 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called,' ver. 7. That is Abraham's children according to the flesh are not all of them the children of God, and heirs of Canaan; but only those who were given to him by promise are counted to him for seed, ver. 8. Now the promise by which they were given to Abraham for seed was this, 'Lo, Sarah shall have a son,' ver. 9. The limitation of the natural seed to the children of promise, the apostle hath mentioned, without applying it to the spiritual seed, as his argument required. The reason was, his readers could easily make the application in the following manner. Since it was evident, that Abraham, those only of his natural progeny are counted to him for seed and made heirs of Canaan, who were given to him by promise, namely Isaac and his descendants by Jacob, and since by this limitation all his other children according to the flesh were excluded from being accounted the children of God, and heirs of the promises in their first and literal meaning, it follows by parity of reason that none of the children of Abraham, not even his descendants by Isaac, are the children of God, and heirs of the promises, in their secondary, spiritual, and highest meanings, but those who were given to Abraham by the promises, 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee.' These are believers of all nations and ages; as is plain from what the apostle told the Galatians, ch. iv. 28. 'We, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise.' And because believers are counted to Abraham for seed in respect of their faith, they are called 'his seed by faith,' Rom. iv. 16. For, by partaking of his dispositions, they are more really his children than those whose only relation to him is by natural descent. Thus it appears, that Abraham's natural descendants by Isaac are not the whole of his seed who are heirs of the promises. He hath a seed also by faith, who are far more numerous than his natural seed by Isaac. And they being the seed principally spoken of in the covenant, if the promises are fulfilled to them, the faithfulness of God will not be destroyed, though the whole of the natural seed shall be cast away for their unbelief.

These things the Jews might easily have understood. Nevertheless, privileges conferred on them by a covenant with their progenitor, and which were solemnly confirmed to them at Sinai, they persuaded themselves could not be taken from them, and given to the Gentiles, without destroying God's veracity. But to show them their error, their will to hell, they made Isaac their prophet, that as Isaac was chosen to be the root of the people of God, in preference to Abraham, by mere favour, so afterwards Jacob had that honour conferred on him, in preference to Esau, by a gratuitous election before Jacob and Esau were born. As therefore the Jews, Jacob's posterity, were the church of God by mere favour, God might, without any injustice, with the same licence, without violation of his covenant with Abraham, admit the Gentiles into his church at any time he pleased, ver. 10-13.

To enforce this argument, the apostle observed, that in preferring Jacob the younger brother, to Esau the elder, God neither acted unjustly towards Esau, nor violated his promise to Abraham, because he might bestow his favours on whichever of Abraham's sons he pleased, ver. 14. As appears from what he said to Moses, when he forgave the Israelites their sin respecting the golden calf; 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy,' &c.: for this implies that in pardoning national sins, as well as in conferring national favours, God acts according to his own good pleasure, ver. 15. So then, it did not depend on Jacob what he pleased, but on the will of God, in the giving of the promises, by giving him the blessing; nor on Esau, who ran to bring venison, that his father might eat and bless him; but on the good pleasure of God, who willed to confer that honour on Jacob, preferable to Esau, ver. 15.

He might, therefore, without any injustice, admit the believing Gentiles to share with the Jews in those privileges which he had gratuitously bestowed on the descendants of Jacob, in preference to those of Esau.

But the apostle, in his discourse to the Jews, had on different occasions carried this matter farther, and had declared to them, that they were to be deprived of their privileges, and driven out of Canaan, for their sin in crucifying Jesus of Nazareth. To this it seems they replied, that the unbelief, and even the rebellion of their fathers, had not been so punished; and inferred, that although the present generation, in crucifying Jesus, had really disobeyed God, it was not to be thought that he would now cast off and destroy his people on that account. In answer, the apostle told them, that in punishing nations God executes the same sovereignty as in conferring favours. Of the wicked they were from time immemorial, just punished, he chooseth such as it pleaseth him to make examples of, and he defers punishing them, until the measure of their iniquity be full, that their punishment may be the more conspicuous. This appears from God's words to Pharaoh: 'I have unfolded thee and thy people hitherto, that the measure of your iniquity as a nation, becoming full, I might shew my power and justice in punishing thee.' ver. 27. And he who upholding the Jews so long was no proof that he would not at length cast them away, and drive them out of Canaan, for their sin in crucifying the Christ. —But thou wilt reply, since God hath determined to destroy the Jewish nation for its wickedness, why hath he not done it ere now, and thereby put an end to his still finding fault with them on account of their repeated rebellions, to which his sparing them so long hath given occasion; for who hath resisted his will? ver. 19. —To this the apostle answers, Who art thou that presumest to find fault with God's government of the world! Shalt the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? ver. 20. —Hast not the potter power over the clay! &c. 31, 32. And he sent to rest my answer wholly on the sovereignty of God, what can be said against God's forbearing so long a time to destroy the Jewish nation, if it was done to shew, more fully, his displeasure against the greatest national abuse of religious privileges long continued in, and the more signaliy to punish the nation guilty of such an abuse, ver. 22. —Also, that he might show that he would take in their stead as his people all nations, whom he had determined from the beginning to form his church and people, and whom, by his dispensations towards the Jews, he had been preparing for that great honour, ver. 23, 24. —Which calling of the believing Jews and Gentiles, was long ago foretold by Hosea, ver. 25, 26. —Besides, the destruction of the greatest part of the Jewish nation for crucifying the Christ, is not more contrary to the covenant made with Abraham, with total subversion by the Assyrians and Babylonians for their repeated idolatries, ver. 27-29. —Thus it appears, that the believing Gentiles were called into the visible church of God, and received the great blessing of faith counted for righteousness, promised to Abraham's spiritual seed, agreeably to God's covenant with him, and to the predictions of the prophets, ver. 30. —But the unbelieving Jews, who sought to become righteous by obeying the law of Moses, have not attained righteousness, ver. 31. —because they sought it not by faith, according to the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, but by works of law, and stumbled at the promised seed, as at a stumbling stone, ver. 32. —agreeably to what Isaiah had foretold concerning them, ver. 33. —So that they are now justly cast off.

I shall finish this illustration with two remarks. The first is, that in discrediting the election of the Jews to be the people of God, and of their degradation from that high honour, the apostle has established such general principles, as afford a complete answer to all the objections which have been raised against revelation, on account of its want of universality. They affirm, that if the ancient revelations of which the Jews are said to have been the keepers, had been from God, the knowledge of them would not have been confined to an inconsiderable nation, pent up in a corner of the earth, but would have been universally spread. In like manner they assert, that if the Christian religion were not so long ago have been bestowed on all mankind. To these, and to every objection of the like nature, the apostle has taught us to reply, That God has an indispensible right to bestow his favours on whom he pleases. And therefore, without unrighteousness, he may withhold the benefit of revelation from whom he will, since he was under no obligation to promise it to any. But if his temporal favours, he bestows on some a more happy country and climate, or a better bodily constitution, or greater natural talents, or a better education, than on others. And if deists ask, Why God, in the distribution of his spiritual favours, hath preferred one nation or person before another, the apostle bids us answer, 'Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, to make out of the same lump one vessel to honour and another to dishonour?' The very same right which entitled God to make some of his creatures angels, and some of them men, entitled him to place men in the endlessly various situations in which we see them. Nor can those who seem to be most unkindly treated, complain of the want of revelation, or of any other advantage, which God hath thought fit to withhold from them, since at the last day none shall be condemned for the want of these things; and in judging men, due regard will be had to the circumstances of each; so that the sentences passed will all be according to truth, as the apostle hath taught in the second chapter. Wherefore since men may be saved, who have not enjoyed revelation, the giving or the withholding of that benefit is to be considered, not as an appointing of men either to salvation or damnation, but merely as a means of manifesting the circumstances of trial. To conclude, God hath been pleased, in many instances, to make the reasons of his conduct incomprehensible to us, on purpose to teach us humility. At the same time, from what we know, we may believe, that however unsearchable God's judgments are, and his ways past finding out, they are full of wisdom and goodness. We ought not, therefore, to consider the dispensations of the providence of God into adoration, and should join the apostle in crying out, 'O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God!' chap. xi. 33.

My second remark is, That although some passages in this chapter, which pious and learned men have understood of the election and reprobation of individuals, are, in the foregoing illustration, interpreted of the election of nations to be the people of God, and to enjoy the advantage of an external revelation, and of their losing these honourable distinctions, the reader must not, on that account, suppose the author rejects the doctrines of the decree and foreknowledge of God. These doctrines are taught in other passages of scripture: See Rom. viii. 29 note 1; not to mention, that being founded in the nature of God, and in his government of the world, they are suggested by the light of nature as well as by revelation, and have been subjects of discussion among philosophers in all ages. It is true, to reconcile the decree and foreknowledge of God with the liberty and accountableness of man, is beyond the power of human reason; and therefore persons of great probity and learning have ranged themselves, some on the side of the divine decrees, and some on the side of human liberty, in the imagination that the two are incompatible. In such an arduous question, however, the safest course perhaps is to hold both doctrines, and to leave it to the light of a future state to discover how the liberty of man can stand with the decree of God. Nor will this appear an improper course, when it is remembered, that many things which seem to be inconsistent, may be held for certain, which to human reason appear as inconsistent, and as inconceivable, as that God hath decreed all things which come to pass, and yet that men are free agents, and accountable for their actions. For example, we must hold the creation of matter, the eternity and infiniteness of space, the union of spirit with body, or, if the existence of spirit is denied, the capability of the body to sustain a spirit, to be matters too deep and high into adoration, and should join the apostle in crying out, 'O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God!'

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IX.—I speak the truth in Christ; I lie not, my conscience bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, 2 That I have great grief and uneasiness anguish1 in my heart. 3 For I myself could wish to be separated1 from Christ, (joy, 308.) instead of my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh; 4 Who are Israelites, (see ver. 6, note 2;) whose are the adoption, (see Rom. viii. 14, note;) the glory,1 and the covenants, (Gal. 3:29.)

Ver. 1. I speak the truth in Christ, &c.—This being an appeal to Christ and to the Holy Ghost, as knowing the apostle's heart, it is of the nature of an oath. Ver. 2. That I have great grief and uneasiness anguish in my heart.—The apostle, when he wrote this chapter, being exceedingly grieved at the account of the destruction which Christ had foretold at Jerusalem was to be carried into effect, coming on the Jewish nation, he stopped, after declaring his sorrow, without explaining the cause of it, as persons in perplexity are wont to do. But in this verse, he is led to be more explicit, and to declare that he trembled to be devoted to destruction instead of his brethren, he shows plainly enough that their ruin as a nation, foreseen by him, was the cause of his uneasiness anguish. Ver. 3. For I myself (κατὰ τὸ διάθητον) could wish to be separated from Christ, instead of my brethren.—The word κατὰ τὸ διάθητον, which I have translated separated, answers to the Hebrew word תָּבֹא, which signifies a thing separated by the sentence of men to be destroyed, as Achaz was, Josh. vii. 21. The word is elegantly used. The apostle is not here saying of death, because, had it been so, the Jewish nation was now καιρῷ τίνι, a thing cast away by God, as the nation of Israel was cast away in the days of the Judges, Judges vii. 18; nor of being cast off, if thereby he had been prevented the terrible destruction which was coming upon the Jews. Wherefore, 'separated from Christ' means out of it by death from the visible church, called, Christ, Rom. xvi. 7. 'Who were in Christ before me,' who were in the church of Christ before me.—The apostle's wish, thus understood, was not contrary to piety. Because if he had been cut off from the church of Christ, either by the hand of God or man, that evil might have been cheerfully borne by him, on account of the great good that was to follow from it. In this wish the apostle seems to have imitated Moses, who desired to be blasted out of God's book, rather than that the Israelites should be destroyed, Exod. xxxii. 32.—Waterland, Germ. vol. i. p. 77, 78 observes, that κατὰ τὸ διάθητον, 2 Tim. i. 3 signifies, 'after the example of my forefathers,' κατὰ τὸ διάθητον, 'after the example of Christ.' Others translate κατὰ τὸ διάθητον, 'separated from Christ,' that is, 'put to death by Christ.' For St. John, 1 Eph. iii. 16 says, 'Because I have laid down his life for us, therefore we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.' Ver. 4. And the glory.—The vision of the divine presence which rested above the ark was called 'the glory,' 1 Sam. vi. 21, and 'the glory of the Lord.' Hence the introduction of the ark into the temple is called 'the habitation of the King of glory,' 2 Chron. xiv. 14.—The apostle emmured the privileges of the Jews, not only to shew that he respected them on account of these privileges, but to make use of them as a sensible of the obligations of the Gentiles, which afforded them off. They were to be excluded from the better privileges of the visible church, of which the ceremonies of the Jewish church formed a part. For their relation to God he used the word ἰδαλίτης, prefurred the more honourable relation which believers, the true Israel, stand in with God,—Their adoption was the privilege of the people of God, not the fruit of their natural birth, but of their faith and union with Christ; their children, 2 Peter iii. 9.—The salvation of the Holy Ghost, and of their title to the inheritance of heaven.—The restoration of the glory, first in the tabernacle and then in the temple, was a figure of the restoration of God by the Spirit in the
ROMANS.

Chapter IX.

1. Distended by God himself, and the tabernacle worship, formed according to a pattern shewed to Moses, and the promises concerning the Christ.

2. There are the fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, persons eminent for piety, and high in favour with God; and from them the Christ descended according to his flesh, who is over all, God blessed for ever and ever, all the father.

3. Now it is not possible that (i.e., a Greek word) the promises of God (ver. 9) hath failed. For all who are of Israel, these are not Israel.

4. Neither, because persons are of the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, they are children to whom the promises belong; otherwise Ishmael would not have been excluded from the covenant, (Gen. xviii. 20. 31.) But God said, In Isaac shall thy seed be called.

5. That is, the children of Abram by natural descent, these are not all the children of God, and heirs of Canaan, of whom God spoke to Pharao. (Exod. iv. 23.) But only the children given to him by the promise, are counted to him for seed.

6. Now, the word of promise was this: I will return to thee according to the time of life, and Sarah thy wife shall have a son. Wherefore, Isaac is the only seed whom God acknowledged for his son and heir.

7. And not only was there that limitation of the seed to the promised son, but to prevent the Jews from thinking Ishmael was excluded from the character of God's people, when the promises were made to Abraham, and of their conceived twins by the one son of Abraham, even by Isaac our father.

8. And blessed be the God of Israel, which gave the Law to our fathers, whom the Church represents in the flesh, and the Church is the Son of God, and the Church is blessed in God, and the Church is the offspring of the flesh, and the Church is the seed of the covenant. Therefore, the Church, as the offspring of the flesh, is blessed in God, and the Church is the offspring of the covenant, being the offspring of the flesh, is the seed of the covenant.

9. These are not Israel. But the Church is not Israel. But the Church is not the seed of Israel. But the Church is not the offspring of Israel. But the Church is not the offspring of the flesh. But the Church is not the offspring of the covenant. Therefore, the Church is not Israel.
They (ver. 64.) "only being not being yet born, neither having done any good or evil," that the purpose of God might stand by an election, not on account of works, but of him who calleth, 11.  It was said to her, (Gen. xxiv. 38.) The elder shall serve the younger: 12.  As it is written, Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated.

14.  JER. What shall we say then? (µ) Is not injustice with God?—APOSTLE. By no means. 15.  For he saith to Moses, (Exod. xxxii. 19.) I will have mercy, with whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. 16.  So then, ye are not of him who will inherit, 1 nor of him who runneth, (Gen. xxvii. 3, 4,) but of God who showeth mercy. 17.  (Gen. 9.) Besides, the scripture saith to Pharaoh, (k) Even for this same purpose I have raised thee up, that I might shew in thee my son of Abraham to whom the promises were made, be called, by God himself, Abraham's 'only son,' Gen. xxii. 2. 18.  Ver. 11.—They vary not being yet born, neither having done any good or evil.—The apostle makes this observation, in order to prevent the Jews from attributing the honour of being the seed of the people of God, on account of his prosperity in despising that honour, Heb. xvi. 18.—The apostle's observation, that these children, having been nationalized with the apostles, were destroyed, as Whitby remarks, the doctrine of the pre-existence of souls. For if these children had pre-existed before they were born, they might have been destroyed for good or evil, for which the one was favourable to the other. 19.  But the purpose of God might stand by an election, not on account of works, but of him who calleth, Rom. ix. 11. 20.  For he saith to Moses, (Exod. xxxii. 19.) I will have mercy, with whom I will have mercy. Here, mercy is not an eternal pardon granted to individuals, but the receiving of a nation into favour, after being disowned. For as in electing the Israelites to be a nation of his own, so in pardoning them as a nation for worshipping the golden calf, God acted from his more good pleasure. But if God, from more good pleasure, elected them at the first, and afterwards continued them, he the better beloved, notwithstanding they deserved to have been cast off for their idolatry, with which, under the veil, the Israelites might be easily taken by the snares of the Gentiles. 21.  For as Isaac here signifies the nation of the Israelites, so Pharaoh signifies the nation of the Egyptians; and Pharaoh's sons, even his first-born, is the first-born of Pharaoh and of the Egyptians. In like manner, Exod. xiv. 1. 22.  I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence, and thou shalt be cut off from the earth; that is, thou and thy people shalt be cut off; for the pestilence was to fall on the people as well as on Pharaoh. Then follow the words quoted by the apostle, ver. 18. 'And in very deed for this same purpose I have raised thee up, to shew in thee the power of my power,' &c. Now, as no person can suppose that the power of God should be shewn in the death of Israel, but be shewn in the destruction of Pharaoh, so the Israelites are delivered from the hand of Pharaoh, but continue all the days of his life to be punished for all the circumstances of Egypt. Therefore, when the apostle says that the power of God was to be shewn in Pharaoh, he intimates that from that time the Egyptians were to continue vegetative. And in this discourse, God's power is shewn in the death of Pharaoh. But the power of Pharaoh's kingdom was not destroyed in a moment, but continued the Egyptians under the curse of the law, to the time of their deliverance. And this is shewn in Rom. x. 12, 13. Where Israel signifies the nation descended from Israel. 23.  Even for this same purpose I have raised thee up.—This being spoken to Pharaoh as king of Egypt, it is to be understood of the nation of Egypt, of which he governs was the chief nation of the world, according to the Hebrew, the words addressed to Pharaoh literally signify, 'stare to he—' I have made thee to stand,' &c. Accordingly they are translated by the LXX. Ezech. xxx. 1. 'It is written in the law of Moses, (Gen. xxi. 25.) that the power of Pharaoh was not destroyed in a moment, but continued the Egyptians under the curse of the law, to the time of their deliverance. And this is shewn in Rom. x. 12, 13. Where Israel signifies the nation descended from Israel.
Romans

Chapter IX

10 I have therefore, that thy power be published through all the earth.

19 Well, then, he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will be hardeneth.

19 (Osw. 293.) But thou wilt say to me, Why doth he still find fault? For who hath resisted his will?

21 Nay, but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed him, Why hast thou made me thus?

21 Hath not the potter (Græce) a just power over the clay, to make, of the same lump, one vessel to honour and another to dishonour?

22 (Ex 4, 100.) Yet, if God, willing to show his wrath and power, made his lump (Græce) hath carried with much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction:

not alter its meaning. For the LXX. have used the word μυριάσης in the sense of preserving, Isa. xiv. 12. Taylor understands of Pharaoh's being preserved the reigns of the kings, which is said to have been on him, Exod. xix. 11. 2. That I might shew in thee (Pharaoh, LXX. (Græce), ps. 10.) my power.

23 23. And in this the power of God is displayed, both his power and justice in the government of the world.

23. According to Warburton, God in this speech to Pharaoh declared, that Egypt was chosen by him as the scene of his wonders, and that the Israelites were sent thither for this very purpose, that through the celebrity of the Egyptian nation, the fame of the power of the true God, in destroying the people of that nation, and in delivering the Israelites, might be published far and wide, and draw the attention of all the nations who had any intercourse with the Egyptians. Accordingly, Rahab told the Israelitish spies, that the Canaanites had heard of the dryness of the waters of the Red Sea, Josh. ii. 9-11; 1 Sam. iv. 9. And considering the communication which the other nations of the world had received by various means, and being as well armed in legislation, sciences, and arts, it is reasonable to believe that any thing extraordinary which happened in that country, would soon be divulged through all the earth.

23. And whom he will be hardeneth. —If this is understood of individuals, it does not mean that God hardens them by any positive actions of his own power upon them, but that by his not executing sentences against their wickedness, he gives them time to harden themselves, by exercising patience and long-suffering towards them. See Exod. iv. 6. This was the way God hardened the Egyptians. Exod. vi. 7. And it was the purpose of God, to multiply and multiply his signs and wonders in the land of Egypt. For when God removed the plagues one after another, the Egyptians took occasion from that respect to harden their own hearts. So it is said, Exod. viii. 15. But when Pharaoh saw that there was a reprieve, he hardened his heart, and hardened not unto them, as the Lord had said.' See Exod. vii. 32. If the expression, "whom he will be hardeneth," is understood of individuals, it does not mean that God hardens them by any positive actions of his own power upon them, but that by his not executing sentences against their wickedness, he gives them time to harden themselves, by exercising patience and long-suffering towards them. See Exod. iv. 6. This was the way God hardened the Egyptians. Exod. vi. 7. And it was the purpose of God, to multiply and multiply his signs and wonders in the land of Egypt. For when God removed the plagues one after another, the Egyptians took occasion from that respect to harden their own hearts. So it is said, Exod. viii. 15. But when Pharaoh saw that there was a reprieve, he hardened his heart, and hardened not unto them, as the Lord had said. See Exod. vii. 32. If the expression, "whom he will be hardeneth," is understood of individuals, it does not mean that God hardens them by any positive actions of his own power upon them, but that by his not executing sentences against their wickedness, he gives them time to harden themselves, by exercising patience and long-suffering towards them. See Exod. iv. 6. This was the way God hardened the Egyptians. Exod. vi. 7. And it was the purpose of God, to multiply and multiply his signs and wonders in the land of Egypt. For when God removed the plagues one after another, the Egyptians took occasion from that respect to harden their own hearts. So it is said, Exod. viii. 15. But when Pharaoh saw that there was a reprieve, he hardened his heart, and hardened not unto them, as the Lord had said.

24. I mean not, in the sense of preserving, Isa. xiv. 12. Taylor understands of Pharaoh's being preserved the reigns of the kings, which is said to have been on him, Exod. xix. 11. 2. That I might shew in thee (Pharaoh, LXX. (Græce), ps. 10.) my power.

25 (Græce) hath carried with much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction:

which he denies to others, is strongly represented. What God is obliged to give to none, he may, without injustice, withhold from him who would receive it.
Chap. IX.

23 And that he might make known the riches of his glory (see Rom. i. 29, note 1.) on the vessels of mercy, which he had before prepared (or 2.) for glory:

24 Even so we, whom he hath called, not only (cf. 15.) among the Jews, but also among the Gentiles.

25 Even as he said by Hosea, (Is. 53.) I will call that my people, which was not my people, and her遗, whom I have not ransomed, shall be called the sons of the living God.

26 (Hosea x. 10.) Besides, Isaias cried (wh. = leuyaw) concerning Israel, Though the number of Israel be as the sand of the sea, only a remnant shall be saved, (Is. x. 23.)

27 For, finishing and cutting short (ner) the work in righteousness, (or) certainly the Lord will make it a speedy work upon the earth.

28 And as Isaias hath said before, (Is. lx. 1.) Unless the Lord of Hosts had left us a seed, we should have become as Sodom, and been made like to Gomorra.

29 As Isaias hath said before, (Is. lx. 1.) Unless the Lord of Hosts had left unto us a very small remnant of our nation, we should have become as Sodom, and been made like to Gomorra; we should have been utterly destroyed as a nation.

And what fault is there, if God hath long preserved these vessels of wrath for this other purpose; that he might make known the exceeding greatness of his goodness on the objects of his favour, whoso, by his dealings with the Jews, he had before prepared for the honour of becoming his people? Even as we whom he hath called, not only among the Jews, but also among the Gentiles, because we have believed the gospel.

This need not surprise the Jews: Bis agreeable to what God saith by Hosea, (Hos. i.) 'I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; on the ten tribes whom I cast off for their iniquity: and I will say unto them which were not my people, Thou art my people; thou art the Gentiles my people.

The calling of the ten tribes is forecast by Hosea still more plainly: And it shall come to pass, that in the countries where it was said to the idolatrous Gentiles, Ye are not my people, there they shall be called the sons of the living God, the heirs of immortality, by believing the gospel. (See Rom. ix. 6. note.)

Besides, the rejection of the Jews at this time is not more contrary to the promises, than the rejection of the ten tribes who were carried into captivity by the Medes, will be contrary to the promises concerning the conversion of the Gentiles, quoted in the following verse. Beza does not construe this verse as I have done. He makes vs. priest the antecedent of be, because the relative may agree in gender, either with the antecedent or the consequent. According to this manner of construction, the word is rendered, 'whom also he hath called,' namely, 'us, not only of the Jews,' &c.

23 Ver. 28. — Even as he saith by Hosea, I will call that my people which was not my people. In this passage it is foretold, that the decrease of the people of God, by the rejection and dispersion of the ten tribes, should be more than answered, by the calling of the Gentiles to be God's people, and by bestowing on the posterity of the ten tribes the mercy of the Gentiles. In Isaiah lx. 6. (6.) an habitation of righteousness is given. The believing Jews and Gentiles, seeing a solace attends to Moses and to the Israelites in every other creation, which is represented as calling things into being merely by saying. Let them be. 2. And her beloved, who was not beloved. — This is the apostle's interpretation of Hosea's words: I will save her to me in the earth, and I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy. The words of the apostle are different from those of the prophet, but their meaning is the same. In the beginning of the chapter, Hosea, having described the idolatry of the Jews under the figure of whoredom, and their chastisement, by hardening their way with thorns, he foretells their return to their first husband, who would speak comfortably to them, and betroth them a second time. Then adds, Ver. 23. I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy, by which the apostle very properly expresses by, 'I will call her beloved, who was not beloved.' I will purify, and sanctify her, and make her present by renewing the former place of my affection, and to her former state of usage, by introducing her into the gospel church. In quoting this passage from Hosea, the apostle begins with the conversion of the Gentiles, because it was to happen first; but the prophet speaks first of the conversion of the Jewish race.
CHAPTER X.

In what follows, the apostle lays open the causes of the unbelief of the Jews, and answers the two chief objections whereby they justified their opposition to the gospel. The first objection was, that by teaching the justification of the Jews by faith without the works of the law, the expiations of the law of Moses were rendered of no use in their justification. The second was, that by admitting the Gentiles into the church and covenant of God without circumcision, the covenant with Abraham was made void.

His answer to the first of these objections, the apostle began with telling the Jews his desire and prayer to God was that they might be saved, ver. 1.—Because he knew they had a great zeal in matters of religion, though it was not directed by knowledge, ver. 2.—Wherefore, being ignorant of the kind of righteousness which God requires from sinners, and mistaking the nature of the law of Moses, they sought to become righteous by observing its precepts; and where they failed, by having recourse to its expiations. So that, vainly endeavouring to establish a righteousness of their own, they had not submitted to the righteousness of God's appointment, now fully revealed in the gospel, ver. 3.—But in all this they contracated the true end of the law of Moses, which, though a political law, being given by God, and requiring a perfect obedience to all its precepts under the penalty of death, was in fact a reproduction of the original law of works; (see Gal. iii. 10. note 2.; Rom. vii. illust. ver. 5.; made, not for the purpose of justifying the Jews, but to shew them the impossibility of their being justified by law, that they might be obliged to go to Christ for that blessing, who was exhibited in the types of the law, ver. 4.—That the law, required the perfect observance to all its precepts, the apostle proved from Moses' description of the righteousness which it enjoined, and the reward which it promised. The former consisted in doing all the statutes and judgments of God, delivered in the law: The latter, in a long and happy life in Canaan. But an obedience of this kind is impossible, and its reward of no great advantage, ver. 5.—Whereas the righteousness enjoined by the gospel, and the reward which it promised is very different. It enjoins a righteousness of faith, which is easy to be attained; and promises eternal life, a reward nowhere promised in the law. For, saith the apostle, the gospel, which requires the righteousness of faith, to shew that that righteousness may easily be attained, thus breaks the knell to all mankind to whom it is now preached.—Do not object to the method of justification revealed in the gospel, that Christ the object of thy faith is removed far from thee, and there is no person to bring him down from heaven since his resurrection and ascension, that thou mayest see and believe on him, ver. 6.—Neither object to his being the promised seed, in whom all the families of the earth are to be blessed, that he was put to death, and there is no person to bring him up from the grave.
THAT thou mayest see him crowned with glory and honor by the miracle of his resurrection, ver. 7.—For the gospel tells thee, the object as well as the duty of faith is brought nigh thee; it is explained and proved to thee in the clearest manner, and is easy to be performed, as it hath its seat in the mouth and in the heart, being the doctrine concerning Christ, which we preach by inspiration, and confirm by miracles, ver. 8.—Namely, that if thou wilt confess with thy mouth before the world, that Jesus is Lord and Christ, and wilt believe in thine heart that God raised him from the dead, and thereby declare him to be both Lord and Christ, thou shalt be saved; a reward which the law does not promise to every one, ver. 9.—For with the heart we believe, so as to obtain righteousness; and with the mouth confession of our faith is made, so as to have assurance of our salvation, ver. 10.—The righteousness of faith, therefore, enjoined in the gospel, is, in its nature and in its reward, entirely different from the righteousness enjoined in the law.

To the second objection, that the admission of the Gentiles into the church and covenant of God without circumcision, is contrary to the covenant with Abraham, the apostle replies, that the prophets have taught that the salvation of the Gentiles by faith; particularly Isaiah, in these words, 'Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed,' ver. 11.—And to show that the expression whosoever does not mean whosoever of the Jews only, but whosoever of the Gentiles also, the apostle observed, that in bestowing salvation God makes no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, being willing that all men should be saved; ver. 12.—Besides, Joel hath expressly declared, ch. ii. 32, 'That whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved,' ver. 13.—But perhaps ye will reply, that Joel does not speak of the Gentiles, because it cannot be said that they believe on the true God, and worship him, since he was never preached to them by any messengers divinely commissioned, ver. 14.—Although such messengers ought to have been sent to them long ago, according to Isaiah, who insinuates that they would have been received with joy, namely, in that passage where he says, 'How beautiful are the feet of them,' &c. ver. 15.—But to this I answer, that in the passage last mentioned, Isaiah declares who should go and preach; and that it is ever to have happened, and not what would have happened, if the true God had been preached to the Gentiles. For he foresaw, that even the Jews, who were well acquainted with the true God, would not believe the report of the preachers of the gospel concerning the Christ, notwithstanding it ought to have been as acceptable to them as the preaching of the true God to the Gentiles.

New Translation.

CHAP. X.—1 Brethren, indeed my heart's desire and prayer which is to God for Israel is, that they may be saved.

2 For I hear them witness, that they have (Σαμωνία) a great zeal, but not according to knowledge.

3 (Acts 93.) Wherefore, being ignorant of the righteousness of God, (see ver. 10, note 1.), and seeking to establish their own righteousness, (Phil. iii. 9.), they have not submitted to the righteousness of God:

4 (Acts 96.) Although Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one who believeth.

VER. 1. That they may be saved.—Israel, or the whole body of the Jewish nation who were ignorant of the righteousness of God, being the subject of this wish, saved must mean 'their coming to the knowledge of the truth,' and with this Vulgate versions, 'et liberati, ut videant verum'; 1 Tim. ii. 4. 'Who will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth.' Also Rom. xi. 26. 'And so all Israel shall be saved.'

Further, if the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, mentioned ch. ix. 22, were the unbelieving Jews, and if that description implied that they were under God's curse of repro- bation, the apostle would have said that the salvation was not for them at all. Ver. 4. Christ is the end of the law for righteousness.—Estus and Blomer are of opinion, that by quæ respondent is meant the fulfilling of
For Moses (Lev. xix. 5) describes the righteousness which is by the Law, that the man who doth these things shall live in them.

6. But the righteousness by faith, the Law speaks not of. (Deut. xxx. 19-14.) Say not in thine heart, he shall ascend into heaven; that is, to bring down Christ.

7. Or who shall ascend into the deep? that is, to bring again Christ from among the dead.

8. But what does it say? (Rom. viii. 38.) The matter is nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart; that is, the matter of faith which we preach is nigh thee.

9. That if thou wilt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and wilt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

10. For with the heart (Rom. x. 9-10.) we believe unto righteousness, and with the mouth we confess unto salvation.

The law both because (Rom. vii. 11) it is imperfect, and because in giving an account of the righteousness of faith which was in Christ before Moses, means to denote the derivative word in that sense (Titus ii. 13). All things are accomplished. Righteousness is complete, perfect, and ready to be justified by faith. It is termed good, because (Rom. x. 10) Christ is the end of the law, because by his death he procured that justification for sinners through faith, which the law proposed to bring about through works. But in my opinion, the end of the law is neither of these, but the end or purpose for which the law was given, namely, to lead the Jews to Christ. Accordingly, the righteousness which was intended to proceed from the Jews was that righteousness which was to be given to Christ. The expectation of the righteousness of faith among the Jews was the expectation of that atonement for sin which Christ was to make. It was evident that they could not be justified by the law, but must come to Christ for righteousness, that is, to the gospel concerning Christ which was preached to Abraham in the covenant made with him. Gal. iii. 8. Hence the law is called, a pedagogue to bring the Jews to Christ.

Rom. viii. 6. The man who doth these things shall live in them. The latter part of this verse is a remarkable doctrine and precept, what Moses said concerning his commandment or law, Deut. xxxii. 11-14. Though in a sense somewhat different from that of the Hebrew word for commandment, the ancient words Socrates, the law, where the laws of Athens are introduced addressing Socrates in a long speech, to dissuade him from escaping out of prison, as his friend Critias proposed, who had bribed the officer for that purpose.

2. Who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring down Christ.
The Jews, it would seem, thought it not reasonable to believe on Jesus as the Christ, unless he was brought from heaven in a visible manner, to take possession of the kingdom. For they expected Messiah to appear in that manner, and called it the sign from heaven. Matt. xvi. 11.

3. For who shall descend into the deep (Rom. xiv. 5.) that is, to bring up Christ from among the dead? The Jews understood that Messiah would abide with them for ever, John xii. 34. Wherefore they say against the Gospel, the Messiah had been sent away.

4. But he that was of thine hope in the living Christ: Luke xxii. 21. We trusted it that he had been who should have redeemed Israel. It is true, the objection taken from Christ's death was fully removed by his resurrection. But the Jews pretending to not have sufficient proof of that miracle, insisted that Jesus should appear in person among them, to converse with them as a real person, and not metaphorically. And descending into the abyss to bring up Christ from the dead. The apostle means the receptacle for departed souls, called hell, because it is an invisible place; see 1 Cor. xv. 20 note; and the abyss or deep, because the Jews supposed it to be as far below the surface of the earth as the mountains are above the sea.

5. The truth of faith is this: To confess with thy mouth the name of Jesus, to believe in thine heart, is the matter of faith. Things obscure and difficult, were said by the Hebrews to be far off; but things easily understood, and easily attainted, were to be nigh, Rom. vii. 21. Of this latter character was the matter or duty of faith, as the apostle observes in the following clause.

6. In thy mouth and in thy heart; that is, the matter of faith which we preach to thee. The faith of Christ which he preached, was nigh them, was easy to be performed. The matter of faith became easy, and was fitted to them, when it was explained perfectly. Christ may be called the end of the law, because by his death he procured that justification for sinners through faith, which the law proposed to bring about through works. But in my opinion, the end of the law is neither of these, but the end or purpose for which the law was given, namely, to lead the Jews to Christ. Accordingly, the righteousness which was intended to proceed from the Jews was that righteousness which was to be given to Christ. The expectation of the righteousness of faith among the Jews was the expectation of that atonement for sin which Christ was to make. It was evident that they could not be justified by the law, but must come to Christ for righteousness, that is, to the gospel concerning Christ which was preached to Abraham in the covenant made with him. Gal. iii. 8. Hence the law is called, a pedagogue to bring the Jews to Christ.

7. For with the heart we believe, so as to attain righteousness, and with the mouth we confess our belief in Christ, so as to have in ourselves a strong assurance of salvation.
Chap. X.

11 For the Scripture saith, (Isa. xxviii. 16,) Whoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. See chap. ix. 38.

12 (Rom. 9. 44.) Indeed there is no distinction (ρῆες) either of Jew or Gentile; for the same Lord of all is rich towards all who call upon him. See chap. iii. 21.

13 For whoever will call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved. See chap. x. 13.

14 JEW. (Osw. 264.) But how shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear of him with whom they have not preached? See chap. iii. 19.

15 And how shall they preach unless they be sent? As it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them who bring good tidings of peace, of them who bring good tidings of good things! See Is. lv. 5.

16 APOSTLE. (Acts, 8. 81.) Nevertheless, all have not obeyed the good tidings; for Isaiah saith, Lord, who hath believed (ῥηθεῖς, 48.) our report!

17 JEW. (Acts, 8. 82.) So then (κατά) belief comes from hearing, and (κατόπιστα) this hearing by the word of God.' See chap. iv. 23.

18 BUT. (Acts, 8. 55.) But (κατά) if you, brethren, have heard the word of God, you have not believed. See Acts, xvi. 30.

19 JEW. (Acts, 8. 56.) I object, Israel Anath not known. APOSTLE. First, Moses saith, Beware lest ye be taught to jealously by that which is no nation; by a foreign nation I will smite you. See Ex. xvi. 24.

Who desired him; Matt. x. 22, 32; I John iv. 15. The confessing Christ being so necessary, and at the same time so difficult a duty, the apostle very properly connected the assurance of salvation with this truth; because he knew that the discipline of Christ could have of his own sincerity, and of his being willing to perform every other act of obedience required of him. There is a distinction between the profession and the conversation of the heart. To profess is to declare a thing of our own accord; but to confess is to declare a thing when asked concerning it. This distinction Cicero mentions in his oration Pro Oratore.

Ver. 13. For whosoever will call on the name of the Lord, saith the text, saith the apostle, I object, Israel Anath not known. The apostle's question is, if the Gentiles, who had never heard the word of God, cannot be pardoned, how much less the Jews who had heard it? And if they are ignorant of Christ, their ignorance is their own fault. See, for instance, Acts, xxiii. 18, 19.

Ver. 14. How beautiful are the feet of them who bring good tidings of peace, of them who bring good tidings of good things! See Is. lv. 5.

Ver. 15. How beautiful are the feet of them who bring good tidings of peace, of them who bring good tidings of good things! Peace is the fruit of the lips. Peace here signifies a speech or discourse of some length; as it does likewise, Matt. xxvii. 50. But in this latter text, εἰρήνη denotes the whole of the gospel. The speech uttered by the apostle was not confined to the works of creation, but was the speech of God, because it is a speech concerning the being and perfections of God, and because it is a speech concerning the gospel, which is the salvation of the Gentiles. See chap. iii. 19.

Ver. 16. The heavens declare the glory of the Lord, &c. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. See Ps. cxli. 5.

Ver. 17. But to the salvation of the Gentiles I object, that Israel, God's ancient church, is not known. If they be ignorant of Christ, it is their own fault, for first, Moses saith, I will make you to jealously by that which is no nation; by a foreign nation I will smite you, &c. See Ex. xvi. 24.
is evident from the apostle's answer contained in the next sentence.

7. I will provoke you to jealousy;—Jealousy, in this case, is that passion which is excited by another's sharing in those benevolences which we can alone and exclusively, and without any mixture, ascribe to ourselves. Thus, the Jews are said to 'provoke God to jealousy,' by giving to idols that honour which is due to him alone. In the text quoted by the apostle, God foretells that the Jews in their turn should be 'moved to jealousy,' by his taking from them the honours and privileges in which they gloried, and by his giving them to the Gentiles, whom they greatly despised. Accordingly, the Jews were exceedingly enraged when the apostles preached the gospel to the Gentiles.

8. By a foolish nation I will enrage you;—That the idolatrous Gentiles are meant in this prophecy, is plain from Jer. xix. 8, where Isaiah speaks of the idolatrous Gentiles.

Ver. 9. Beside, Isaiah is very bold;—He was not afraid of the resentment of the Jews, who, he knew, would be exceedingly provoked at what he was going to prophesy.

CHAPTER XI.

Our Lord having declared to the chief priests and elders of the Jews, that the kingdom of God was to be taken from the Jews, and given to the Gentiles, Matt. xxi. 43.; also having foretold to the same persons the burning of Jerusalem, Matt. xxiv. 7. and to his disciples the demolition of the temple, and the dispersion of the nation on account of their unbelief, Luke xxi. 44., we cannot think that the Christian preachers would conceivably deliver such truths to their unbelieving brethren. Stephen seems to have spoken of them, Acts v. 13. and St. Paul often. For the objection which he puts in the mouth of a Jew, Rom. iii. 3: 'Will not their unbelief destroy the faithfulness of God?' is founded on his having affirmed, that the nation was to be cast off, and driven out of Canaan. Farther, the same apostle, in chap. i. of this epistle, hath showed, and without injustice, God might take away from the Jews privileges which he hath conferred on them gratuitously; and even punish them, by expelling them from Canaan for their disobedience. Wherefore, that the foreknowledge of the evils which were coming on their brethren might not affect the Jewish Christians too much, the apostle is here careful of assuring them that the rejection of the nation was not to be total; because at no period had the disobedience of the Jews been total, ver. 1-10. Neither is it to be final, but for a limited time only, to make way for the entering of the Gentiles into the church, by whose reception the Jews at last will be provoked to emulate them, and will receive the gospel, ver. 11-16. On this occasion, the apostle exhorted the Gentiles, now become the visible church of God, not to speak with contempt of the Jews who were rejected, because if they themselves became disobedient to God, they should in like manner be cast off, ver. 17-24. Then, for the consolation of the Jewish converts, he assured them, that after the fulness of the Gentiles is come in, as the whole nation will be converted to the Christian faith, as was predicted by Isaiah, ver. 25-27.

The great events in the divine dispensations displayed in this chapter, namely, the rejection and dispersion of the Jewish nation, the abrogation of the law of Moses, the general conversion of the Gentiles, and the future conversion and restoration of the Jews, St. Paul was anxious to place in a proper light; because the Jews, being aware that no person could be saved out of their church, interpreted the prophecies concerning the calling of the Gentiles, of their conversion to Judaism. What impression his declarations concerning these events made on the unbelieving Jews of his own time, is not known. This only is certain, that in a few years after the epistle to the Romans was written, the apostle's prediction concerning the rejection of the Jews, and the destruction of their religious and political constitution, received a signal accomplishment. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, the temple was thrown down to the foundation, and each of the Jews as a nation, the war was sold into foreign countries for slaves. The Levitical worship, by this means, being rendered impracticable, and the union of the Jews as a nation being dissolved, God declared, in a visible manner, that he had cast off the Jews from being his people, and that he had put an end to the law of Moses, and to the Jewish peculiarities. Wherefore, after the pride of the Jews was thus humbled, and their persecuting the Christians was broken, any opposition which, in their dispersed state, they could make to the gospel, was of little avail; and any attempts of the Judaizing teachers to corrupt its doctrines, on the old pretence of the universal and perpetual obligation of the law of Moses, must have sooner or later been discovered, because when he told the Romans, chap. xvi. 20. 'That the God of peace would bruise Satan under their feet shortly.' Further, in regard to the apostle's predictions concerning the rejection of the Jews has long ago been accomplished, we have good reason to believe, that the other events foretold by him will be accomplished likewise in their season; namely, the general coming of the Gentiles into the Christian church, and the conversion of the Jews in a body to the Christian faith, and their restoration to the privileges of the people of God. Accordingly, from the beginning, there hath prevailed in the church a constant opinion, that the Jews are to be converted towards the end of the world, after the fulness of the Gentiles is come in. See note n. on that verse.

His discourse on these important subjects the apostle concluded with remarking, that Jews and Gentiles, in their turn, having been disobedient to God, he hath locked them all up as condemned criminals, that he might in one and the same manner have mercy on all, by making them his people, and bestowing on them, even men, just as the Gentiles, and as the heathens, with Abraham, ver. 30-35. And being deeply affected with the survey which he had taken of God's dealings with mankind, he cried out, as ravished with the grandeur of the view, "Of the riches both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" ver. 88, 89, 90.—Then ascribed to God the glory of having created the universe, and of preserving and governing it, so as to make all things issue in the accomplishment of those being that pursuant to his wisdom had planned from the beginning, for making his creatures happy, ver. 26.

In this sublime manner hath the apostle finished his discourse concerning the dispensations of religion which have taken place in the different ages of the world. And from his account it appears that these dispensations were adapted to the then circumstances of mankind; that they are parts of a grand design of God for delivering the human race from the evil consequences of sin, and for exalting them to the highest perfection of which their nature is capable; and that, both in its progress and its accomplishment, the scheme of man's salvation contributes to the establishment of God's moral government, and to the displaying of his perfections in all their lustre to the whole intelligent creation. This grand scheme, therefore, being highly worthy of God its author, the Epistle to the Romans, in which it is so beautifully displayed in its several parts, is certainly one of the most useful books of scripture, and merits to be read with attention, not by Christians only, but by unbelievers, if they wish to know the real doctrines of revelation, and what the inspired writers themselves have advanced, for shewing the propriety of the plan of our redemption, and for confuting the objections which have been raised, either against revelation in general, or any part thereof in particular.

Chap. XI.—1 I ask, then, Do you from these prophecies infer that God hath cast off his people for ever? By no means. For even I, in the ancients, part of God, a descendant of Abraham, and sprung of the tribe of Benjamin: Yet I am not cast off; I am still one of God's people, by believing in Christ.

2 God hath not cast off his people whom he foreknew. Know ye not what the scripture saith in Elijah, when he complaineth (see Rom. viii. 27. note) to God against Israel, and saith—

3 Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and have digged down thine altars, and I am left alone; and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God to him? I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to Baal, or Beal.

5 So then, even at this present time, there is a remnant according to an election by grace.

6 And if by grace, it is no more of work, (now) otherwise grace is no more grace: But if of work, it is no more grace, otherwise work is no more work.

Commentary.

Chap. XI.—1 I ask then, Do you from these prophecies infer that God hath cast off his people for ever? By no means. For even I, in the ancients, part of God, a descendant of Abraham, and sprung of the tribe of Benjamin: Yet I am not cast off; I am still one of God's people, by believing in Christ.

2 God hath not cast off his people whom he foreknew. Know ye not what the scripture saith in Elijah, when he complaineth (see Rom. viii. 27. note) to God against Israel, and saith—

3 Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and have digged down thine altars, and I am left alone; and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God to him? I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to Baal, or Beal.

5 So then, even at this present time, there is a remnant according to an election by grace.

Ver. 2. God hath not cast off his people whom he foreknew. The foreknowledge of which is not the knowledge of what he will, but of what he knows and foresees, concerning the number of his people to be heirs of eternal life: for, in that case, the supposition of his casting them out is impossible. But it is to be taken strictly in a temporal sense, to shew the sovereignty of God over his church; and how Jebov is to be his visible church and people on earth. The word knew hath this sense, Amos iii. 2. You only have I known, that is, acquaintance with, or chosen, before all the families of the earth. In Whitby's opinion, God's people whom he foreknew, were such of the Jewes as believed in Christ, called, ver. 7. the election. But as his people ver. 1. signifies the whole Jewish nation, the phrase in ver. 7. must be taken in the same general sense.

Ver. 5. And have digged down thine altars. By the law, the altars of God were to be made of earth, Exod. xxv. 24. And the Israhelites were to have one altar only, for offering sacrifices to their only Lord and King. Wherefore, when the tribes whose inheritance was on the east side of Jordan raised an altar for themselves, it was condemned, Exod. xxxviii. 19. In the LXX. the altar appointed for the whole congregation was always raised where the tabernacle was pitched. But at first no certain place was appointed for the tabernacle, we find altars in different parts of the country, 1 Sam. xvi. 17. 18. xlii. 9. After the revolt of the ten tribes, their princes did not think it proper that they should any longer go up to Jerusalem to offer sacrifices; they therefore raised altars in their own country, for the offering of sacrifices to God. Elija. They were common, in the purpose of offering sacrifices to God.

Ver. 6. And if by grace, it is no more of work. I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to Baal, or Beal. Or Elijah saith, of the seven thousand men whom God left in Israel, of whom a great part were Israelites, and a great part Gentiles, and of whom a great part were of the seed of Abraam, and a great part of the seed of Seth. And he saith, of his own nation, of the Jews, whom he foreknew, when he saith, Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and have digged down thine altars, and I am left alone; and they seek my life.

Ver. 9. At this present time there is a remnant, according to an election by grace. Or, as Beza translates the clause, a gratuitous election. In ver. 5. How Israhel was saved and preserved, when they were not numbered by grace, are the Jews who believed the gospel, and who in the first age were many thousands. This remnant is said to have been elected according to grace, because they were made the church and people of God along with the believing Gentiles, through the grace of Christ in us. For God, who will have mercy shall have mercy, and who will have faith shall have faith. This is what Paul saith, ver. 13. But if it be so, then is it not according to the will of God? But how can it be otherwise? For if we say, The thing is of the will of man, where is the divine decree? But election to the privileges of God's visible
ROMANS.

CH. IX.

7 What then? Is the thing Israel earnestly seeketh, that he hath not obtained, but the election hath obtained it, and the rest are blinded. 8 As it is written, (Isa. xxi. 10.), God hath given them a spirit of deep sleep, eyes not seeing, and ears not hearing, (Ezra iv. 4. Isa. vi. 9.), unto this present day. 9 And David saith, Let their table be as a snare and a trap, (Psalm lix. 23.), and a stumbling-block, and a recompense to them. 10 Let their eyes be darkened, ( Isa. xxvii. 4.), so as not to see, and bow down their backs continually. (Psalm lix. 23.).

11 I ask then, Have they stumbled that they fell? Ver. 11. 12 No; but through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles, to excite them to emulation.

12 Now, if (Rom. vii. 4.), the fall of them be riches of the world, and (Rom. vii. 4.), the church may be made more sure by right improvement of those privileges in his present distress, and this imputation of the Gentiles, this being the church, be a body of the Gentiles. For, as in the next clause the apostle says, the election have obtained it, that cannot be the thing Israel earnestly sought; for otherwise it had not been a merciful righteousness of works. As it was, it is the righteousness of faith which Israel sought; and, in the apostle's day, the generality of the Jews were not so. See what righteousness they did not know. For, in the days of the Gentiles, the thing which Israel sought in vain, which the elect obtained, was not of the Jews only, but of God, after that honour was taken from them for their unbelief.

8. But the election hast obtained it. — The election is the elected remnant, as the elect of God is the circumcised people. Further, Israel and the election being opposed to one another in this verse, the election must be the whole body of the believing Jews, just as Israel is the whole body of those who did not believe. See ver. 6. n. What the election obtained, see in the preceding note.

10. And the rest are blinded. — Rom. xi. 25. The Greek word ἀποθέωσις, may be translated are hardened; but it signifies to make the soil thick and hard, as the skin of the hand is made hard by continual working. Metaphorically, it denotes hardness of heart, and sometimes blindness of understanding. These, however, are distinguishing words, and should not be put together in the same sentence. The word ἀποθέωσις hastens their heart. The apostle means, that the unbelieving Jews, through the influence of their own heart, or in the darkness of their own heart, did not discern the force of the evidence by which God confirmed the mission of his Son, and so were excommunicated from his covenant and church.

12. And the rest are blinded. — Rom. xi. 25. The word ἀποθέωσις is used in the sense of fatale, to express dispensation, to denote something in a good, sometimes in a bad sense. Here the sense is evidently evil. It is evident, that the apostle in this construction is improper.

and if the stripping of the Jews of their privileges be the occasion of conferring these privileges on the Gentiles, how much more will their filling the church be followed with great advantages to the Gentiles?

10 Now the rejection of the Jews, and the happiness of the Gentiles in their restoration, I make known to you Gentiles; and in as much as in the apostle of the Gentiles, by proclaiming great excess from the Jewish scriptures, I do honour to my ministry.

11 If by any means I may excite to emulation those of my nation, and may save some of them.

12 Because, if the casting away of them be the recompensing of the world, what will the recompensing of thee, but life from the dead?

13 Now, if some of the branches were broken off, and thou wert a wild olive, art ingrafted (with me) instead of them, and are become a joint partaker of the root and fruitfulness of the wild olive;

14 Be not against the branches: for if restoring them to their ancient privileges. But as this could not till they entered into the Christian church, it is folly called grafting, which, when their branches become corrupted, and the Christian church complete; for grafting, properly, is the grafting of branches on another tree, and is called a.grafted, ver. 10, the patch with which a torn garment is mended, or made complete, is called a. And in this sense the church is called, Eph. 3. 23, the fullness of Him who filleth all with all; but without the church, which is his body, Christ would not be complete. That is, in this view and sense, the general conversion of the Gentiles is expressed by the same metaphor, which is the same as the preceding, as ver. 11, 12, see Note.

S. 3. note 1. The apostle's meaning is, that the general conversion of the Jews will afford to the Gentiles the complete evidence of the truth of the gospel, by shewing them that it is the finishing of a grand scheme which God had been carrying on for the salvation of mankind, by means of his dispensations towards the Jews.

Ver. 15. I may excite to emulation (see ver. 11, note 3.) my nation.—Here, by a most popular and affecting turn, the apostle represents himself as jealous in converting the Gentiles, from his great love to the Jews.

Ver. 15. Because if (as I say) the casting away of them be (as I said) the whole fruit of the earth; I mean the Gentiles, then we have the apostle speaks of God's church as a tree, he may perhaps allude here to the practice of gardeners, who cut off from vines and olive-trees these branches as barren or withered, and cast them away. The same word for branch, ver. 17, is used by Josephus, in describing the general's conversion of the Gentiles is expressed by the same metaphor, which is the same as the preceding, as ver. 11, 12, see Note.

In this passage, the unbelief and rejection of the Jews is justly represented as the means of the reception of the Gentiles. For all those who are thus rejected as obstinate and obdurate to the conversion of the Gentiles, it hath greatly contributed to that event. Besides the reason mentioned, ver. 11, note 2. it is to be con-cidered, that the rejection of the Jews was the punishment of their unbelief, and that both events were foretold by Moses and by Christ. Wherefore these events as the fulfilsment of prophecy, havestrengthened the evidences of the gospel, and thereby contributed to the conversion of the Gentiles. This, however, is not all. There are in the Gentiles, the oracles of God committed to them from the beginning; and these oracles have continued in their hands ever since. That is, as is mentioned, that the oracles in their government and government over them carry them with them wherever they go. Wherefore, in all countries, the Jews are living witnesses to the antiquity and genuineness of the whole of the prophecies by which the gospel is confirmed. And their testimony, which is always and everywhere at hand, cannot be called in question. Because, having shewn themselves to be vessels of a holy and woe to the nation, in their unbelief and unbelief; and that both events were foretold by Moses and by Christ. Wherefore these events as the fulfillment of prophecy, havestrengthened the evidences of the gospel, and thereby contributed to the conversion of the Gentiles. This, however, is not all. There are in the Gentiles, the oracles of God committed to them from the beginning; and these oracles have continued in their hands ever since. That is, as is mentioned, that the oracles in their government and government over them carry them with them wherever they go. Wherefore, in all countries, the Jews are living witnesses to the antiquity and genuineness of the whole of the prophecies by which the gospel is confirmed. And their testimony, which is always and everywhere at hand, cannot be called in question. Because, having shewn themselves to be vessels of a holy and woe to the nation, in their unbelief and unbelief; and that both events were foretold by Moses and by Christ. Wherefore these events as the fulfillment of prophecy, havestrengthened the evidences of the gospel, and thereby contributed to the conversion of the Gentiles. This, however, is not all. There are in the Gentiles, the oracles of God committed to them from the beginning; and these oracles have continued in their hands ever since. That is, as is mentioned, that the oracles in their government and government over them carry them with them wherever they go. Wherefore, in all countries, the Jews are living witnesses to the antiquity and genuineness of the whole of the prophecies by which the gospel is confirmed. And their testimony, which is always and everywhere at hand, cannot be called in question. Because, having shewn themselves to be vessels of a holy and woe to the nation, in their unbelief and thinking myself more excellent and more in favour with God than they: for if thou esteem not that thou art not the root, but the root is the tree.

19 Then will they say, however, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in.

20 APOSTLE. True; but unbelief they were broken off, and thou by faith (Rom. 10, 11) standest. Be not high-minded, but fear.

21 For if God spared not the natural branches, perhaps neither will he spare thee. (So the Syriac translates it also.)

22 Behold then the goodness and severity of God: towards them who fell, severity; but towards thee, goodness, if thou continuest in his goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.

23 And even they, (see) when they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able again to graft them in.

24 For if thou wert cut off from the olive by nature wild, and contrary to nature were grafted into the good olive, how much rather shall he, the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive!

25 For, brethren, that ye may not be wise in your own conceits, I would not have you ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part hath happened to Israel, till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.

26 And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, The deliverer shall come out of Zion, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

more so, to plunder, persecute, and kill them. They were the original church and people of God. They preserved the knowledge of God when all the world was sunk in idolatry. To them we owe the scriptures of the New Testament as well as of the Old: for the holy and honourable fellowship of the prophets and apostles were Jews. Of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ the Saviour of the world came. All the knowledge of religion which we enjoy is derived from the Jews. They have something of kindness and gratitude in due for such great obligations. They disbelieved the gospel indeed, and for that sin are broken off. But in their rejected state they bear witness to the truth. Ver. 15, note 1. For they preserve the institutions of the Old Testament with the utmost fidelity, and are not cast away. When they are so beloved of God for the sake of their fathers, and are to be grafted in again in some future period, and to make part of us. On which account, they are still the peculiar object of God's love and regard. They shall never be made an end of, while any Gentiles that have oppressed them shall be utterly destroyed. Should such a people as this be despised! Ought they not rather to be highly respected and kindly treated by Christians of all denominations, even while they continue in unbelief?

27 Thou bearest not the root. The root, in this passage, signifies Abraham, as constituted by God's covenant the father or federal head of all believers, for the purpose of receiving on their behalf the promises; consequently the branches signify his children, who profess to believe in God. The apostle's meaning is, that Abraham and his posterity derived no advantage from any covenant which God made with any of the Gentile nations: But the Gentiles have derived many benefits from the covenants which God made with the Jews and the Gentiles.

Ver. 18. The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. The objector no doubt used the Greek particle εἰς here, to denote the end for which the branches were broken off. But, observes the apostle, in the next verse, the Jews were broken off for their infidelity, and the reception of the Gentiles was only the consequence of their unbelief: hence it was necessary that they should be broken off. Ver. 20. True. This Greek word, placed by itself, is an adverb of approbation, signifying Abraham, as constituted by God's covenant the father or federal head of all believers, for the purpose of receiving on their behalf the promises; consequently the branches signify his children, who profess to believe in God. The apostle's meaning is, that Abraham and his posterity derived no advantage from any covenant which God made with any of the Gentile nations: But the Gentiles have derived many benefits from the covenants which God made with the Jews and the Gentiles.

Ver. 20. But our unbelief. But the unbelief of the Jews. Ver. 21. If God spared not the natural branches. The Jews are called the natural branches of the good olive-tree, because they sprang up out of the root: but, as soon as they were cut off from the root, they became not the root, by the descent from them, were naturally members of God's visible church, and of the institutional covenant on which it was formed. For the goodness of God on the Gentiles by no means signified a disposition to bestow benefits. Assurance, certainty, literally a cutting off. But cutting off, the effect, is put for, on account of. Ver. 23. For God is able again to graft them in. Here, as in other passages of scripture, Ezr. 14. 20. Agree, able, signifies willing, as well as able: because it was no purpose to mention God's ability to graft the Jews in, unless it had been accompanied with willingness. Locke says, 'This grafting in seems to import, that the Jews shall be a flourishing nation again, professing Christianity in the land of their fathers; for that is to be reinserted again in the promise made in Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This St. Paul might for good reason be withheld from speaking out. But in the prophets there are very frequent promises of it.'

Ver. 24. How much rather shall those who are the natural branches be grafted in their own olive? This reasoning is very just. But the apostle adds, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in: the branch then is that which, as it were, comes into the place of the broken branch, and occupies it. It appears more probable than did the conversion of the Gentiles, because that overthrows the Jewish nation, the latter end of which, the apostle observes, (Append. to Rom. 11.) if the known regions of the world are divided into thirty parts, the Christian part is only five, the heathen more than twenty-five. The apostle seems therefore to express himself in the strongest manner.

3. Come in. Here the Christian church is represented as a great temple, erected for all nations. On the ground of the Gentiles into this temple or church to worship, signifies their conversion to Christianity.

Ver. 25. I would have you ignorant of this mystery. The apostle calls the rejection of the Jews for a time, and their restoration after the conversion of the Gentiles is completed, a mystery; because it was a matter of the greatest importance to mankind, and because it had hitherto been kept a secret, like the doctrine of the Mysterious, which was discovered to none but to the initiated. See Eph. 1. 9. note. 2. That blindness (see ver. 9. note 3.) in part hath happened to Israel, till the fulness (see ver. 12. note.) of the Gentiles be come in (see ver. 11. note.) The general conversion of the Gentiles takes place. Before that event the coming of the Jews into the church would not be proper. See ver. 15. note 1. The general conversion of the Gentiles here implied, I apprehend, comprehends every Gentile observers, (Append. to Rom. 11.) if the known regions of the world are divided into thirty parts, the Christian part is only five, the heathen more than twenty-five. The apostle seems therefore to express himself in the strongest manner.

3. Come in. Here the Christian church is represented as a great temple, erected for all nations. On the ground of the Gentiles into this temple or church to worship, signifies their conversion to Christianity.
Chap. XL.

27 (Est. vi. 19.) For this is my covenant with them, when I shall take away their sins. (Isa. lix. 1.)

28 With respect to the gospel indeed, they are enemies (i.e., upon your account; but with respect to the election, they are beloved (Isa. lix. 1.) on account of the fathers.

29 For the free gifts and the calling of God (Rom. xi. 7.) are without repentance. (See Psal. c. 4.)

30 (Teg. 91.) Besides, as ye also, in times past, have disbelieved God, yet now have obtained mercy through their disobedience.

31 Even so these also have now obtained through your mercy, (Rom. ix. 19.) as through your mercy they also obtained, (Rom. ix. 33.) shall obtain mercy.

32 For God hath shut up together all (Rom. xi. 1.) all disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all.

33 O the depth (Rom. xi. 1.) of the riches (Rom. xi. 1.) and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments! and his ways past finding out!

34 For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?

The apostle Peter, mentioned Acts ii. 4. in v. 15. through omission, was not, in St. Paul's opinion, the conversion of the Jews foretold by the prophets.

This is written. The deliverer shall come out of Zion, and he shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; (i.e., the ungodliness of unbelief. The apostle adopted the LXX. translation of this passage, with the variation εἰς Ἰουδαῖος, because it expresses the sense of the original with sufficient exactness. The deliverer being the son of David, he is said by the apostle to come out of the city of David and the seat of his kingdom, rather than for the sake of Zion, the words used by the LXX. On the other hand, as he came to turn away the ungodliness of unbelief from the posterity of Jacob that he might be said, as in the Hebrew original, to come to Zion and to them that turn from transgression in Jacob; for Zion or Jerusalem was the name given them by the prophets, as a pledge of the deliverance of Jacob from the ungodliness of unbelief was not accomplished by instrument of his first coming, but himself known to them. On this subject, the apostle alludes to the future period, by the presence of the power of the Lord to heal them.

Ver. 27. Wherefore I say, that the ungodliness of the Gentiles is shortly to be followed by mercy to the Jews, as in the case of Israel. (See Isa. xxv. 3.)

Ver. 28. With respect to the election, they are beloved on account of the fathers. (Rom. xi. 1.) The very persons here said to be beloved in respect of the election, are in the preceding clause said to be enemies in respect of the gospel. Wherefore, this election cannot be of individuals to eternal life: but it is that national election, whereby the Jews were made the church and people of God. See chap. ix. 11. 29. In respect of that election, the Jews are still beloved of God. For although they be cast off for their unbelief, yet in consequence of the promises made to their fathers, they are in some future period to become the people of God, by believing the gospel. — The apostle remarks, that there is a twofold election of the Jews spoken of in this chapter: one, whereby they were made the people of God, through their natural descent from the fathers, and which Moses has described, Deut. vii. 6—8; the other, whereby such of them as believe, are also taken in, and become the people of God, under the gospel dispensation. This election is mentioned Rom. xi. 7.

Ver. 29. For the free gifts and the calling of God are without repentance, whereby they are bewailed on Abraham and his seed, and his calling or making them people, God will never repent of; but will restore to his natural seed the honour of being the first begotten of the Gentiles, that they may be the godliness of unbelief. (Rom. xii. 16, 61, 62.)

30. His judgments; (Rom. xi. 33.) (The Gentiles must have disbelieved God.) —The disbelieving of the Gentiles consisted in their losing the knowledge and worship of the true God, and in their worshipping偶像, and in their ways past finding out. (Rom. xiv. 13.) The Gentile idolatry has been worshipped in every age, by his works of creation and providence. Rom. i. 20. Yet now have obtained mercy. The great favour of being among the nations, and to receive the knowledge of God is to be sought for, not here, but in the future state.

31. Even so these also have obtained through your mercy: (Rom. viii. 33.) as through your mercy they also obtained, shall obtain mercy.

32. For God hath shut up together all disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all.

33. O the depth of the riches and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!

34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?

2. Through their disbelieving.—The apostle does not mean, that the Gentiles would not have been admitted into the covenant and church of God, by having the gospel preached to them, if the whole Jewish nation had not, by their unbelief, shut themselves out of the title of the Gentiles to all the blessings of the covenant with Abraham, established by the covenant himself. But his meaning is, that, considering the disposition of the Jews, their disbelieving and rejection, and the consequent demolition of their church in order to the election of the church of God on a more enlarged basis, it was necessary to the admission of the Gentiles into the covenant and church of God. See ver. 11. note.

3. —Even so these also have obtained through your mercy: (Rom. viii. 33.) as through your mercy they also obtained, shall obtain mercy.

3. Even so these also have obtained through your mercy, (Rom. ix. 19.) as through your receiving that great favour, the gospel being continued in the world, they also shall obtain the mercy of being at length admitted into God's covenant.

3. For God hath shut up together all under sentence of death for their disobedience, that, in admitting them into his covenant, and church, he might make them sensible how dearly he bestowed a free gift upon all.

3. In surveying the divine dispensations, instead of finding fault, we ought not to cry out, O the greatness of God's turn. In contriving and ordering these dispensations, and of the knowledge of God in foreseeing the effects which they would produce! How unsearchable are his determinations, and his ways past finding out!

3. For what man or angel hath comprehended all the reasons of God's determinations, so as to be able to judge of his ways? Or who hath given him advice, respecting either the planning or the managing of affairs of the universe?
ROMANS.

35 Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again?

36 For (ς) from him, and (ε) to him, are all things: To him be the glory for ever. Amen.

The apostle, in this part of the conclusion of his discourse, as Locke observes, had an especial regard to the Jews, whom, in an elegant and instructive manner, he rebuked for their presumption in finding fault with the divine dispensations; as if God had done them an injury, in admitting the Gentiles into his covenant and church.

Ver. 35. Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again?—The apostle very properly says, the Jews, in God was in their debt, for any obligation they had conferred on him; or if he was, let them say for what, and they should have an ample remuneration made to them.

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle having now finished the doctrinal part of his epistle, judged it fit, in this and in the following chapters, to give the Roman brethren a variety of precepts respecting their behaviour, both as members of the church and as subjects of the state. Some of these precepts are of universal and perpetual obligation, and others of them were suited to the circumstances of the brethren at the time they were written; such as the precepts concerning mean and holy days, which, though they may seem less necessary now that the disputes which gave rise to them no longer subsist, are nevertheless of great use still, as they may be applied for directing our conduct in other points of equal importance to society and to the church. See the 1st, chap. xiv. at the end.

The apostle begins with observing, that as the Jewish church was dissolved, and the sacrifices of beasts were no longer a part of the worship of God, it was highly proper that Jews and Gentiles should offer their bodies a sacrifice to God, not by slaying them, but by putting the lost thereof to death, ver. 1.—And that both should take care not to conform themselves to the heathen world, either in its principles or practices, ver. 2.—And because the brethren at Rome, and more particularly the stated ministers of religion there, who possessed spiritual gifts, had from vanity failed, or were in danger of falling into some errors, the apostle directs them to exercise of their gifts, he desired them not to think too highly of themselves on account of their endowments, whatever they might be, ver. 3.—but to remember, that they were all joint members of one body, ver. 4, 5.—and had spiritual gifts as well as natural talents bestowed on them, suitable to their office in that body, which they were to exercise for the good of the whole, ver. 6, 7, 8.—Next, the apostle inculcated on the Roman brethren, the practice of those moral virtues which were the glory of the Christian name; such as zeal in the service of Christ, patience in afflictions, love to mankind, even to enemies, forgiveness of injuries, and the overcoming of evil with good, ver. 9—21.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XII.—1 Wherefore, brethren, I beseech you by the tender mercies of God,1 that ye present your bodies2 a living sacrifice,3 holy, acceptable to God, which is your2 προσκυνήσεως reasonable worship.3

2 And be not fashioned like to this world,1 but be changed by the renewing of your understanding;2 that ye may approve what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.3

3 Also, by the grace which is given to me, I command every one who is among you, not to think more highly of himself3 than he ought

Ver. 1.—1. By the mercies of God.—The love which God hath expressed in our redemption by Christ, and in making us members of his church, is the most winning of all considerations to engage us to obey God; especially as his commands are calculated to make us capable of the blessings he proposes to bestow on us in the next life. We should therefore habitually recollect this powerful motive, and be ever careful of our actions and our characters, that they may be acceptable to God, and also prove that we have been the recipients of his grace and mercy.

2. That ye present your bodies.—προσκυνήσεως present is the word by which the bringing of an animal to the altar to be sacrificed was expressed. The apostle having described, Rom. 1. 24, the abominable use which the heathens made of their bodies, and having taught, Rom. 6. 13, 23, that the body, with its lusts, is the source and seat of sin, he exhorted the Romans very pointedly to present their bodies to God a sacrifice, by putting the lusts and appetites thereof to death.

3. A living sacrifice.—may signify an excellent sacrifice; sacrifices being made only of animals brought alive to the altar.

4. Which is your reasonable worship.—According to Reza, the presenting of our bodies to God a living sacrifice, is called a reasonable worship, because it is a natural way of worshipping God; whereas the sacrifices of birds and beasts were sacrifices (ἀνθρώπων ζώων) of irrational animals. But Locke says, this is called a reasonable worship, because it is opposed to the irrational worship of the heathens.

Ver. 2.—And be not fashioned like to this world.—See a particular account of the manners of the heathen world, Eph. iv. 17—19. The meaning is, Christians, in their character and manners, should not resemble those who spend their time in gratifying their bodily appetites, and who justify themselves in these practices by maintaining atheistical and other corrupt principles. The see here signifies the corrupt part of the world. See 1 John iii. note 1.

5. By the renewing of your understanding.—See Eph. iv. 25—26, where the new man is described as renewed in the spirit of his mind; that is, in all his affections and will, as well as in his understanding; so that all his actions are virtuous and good. Because the new creation, as Whitby observes, is begun with a change in our understanding, whereby we discern and approve the acceptable will of God, and the renewing of the understanding is put for the renovation of the whole man.

6. That good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.—The will of God respecting men's duty and the grounds of their acceptance, as exhibited in the gospel, is best set in opposition to the idolatrous rites of worship practised by the heathens, which in their own nature were extremely bad; and, on the other hand, to the adoration of all rational creatures, as enjoined by Christ, and the law of Moses, concerning which God himself declared, that he had no pleasure in them, Exo. 23. 14. The rites of Moses, therefore, in which the Jews were most of all proscribed, was not only no more acceptable to God, neither had they any influence to make men perfect in virtue. Whereas the duties recommended by the apostle are of great obligation, and separate the people of God from the wicked, in a more excellent manner than the Jews had been separated from idolaters by the rites of Moses.

Ver. 3.—Also by the grace which is given to me.—The grace of God, in this place, signifies the grace of apostleship, and the gift than he ought to have, but to think of both justly, so as always to behave wisely in his own station, without aspiring after offices in the church which he is not fit for; and to employ himself in the duties of his station and office, according as to each God has distributed his measure of spiritual gifts.

3. These gifts are necessarily different, both in their nature and dignity. (ver. 6.) For, as in one body we have many members, but all the members have not the same office.

4. So are the many disciples, of Christ, of God, or religious society, under the government of Christ; consequently we are all members of one another, receiving edification and comfort from each other.

5. Having then spiritual gifts, differing according to the offices assigned us in the church; if our gift be prophecy, let us prophesy according to the extent of our inspiration, without adding to or taking from the revelations made to us, or meddling with subjects not revealed to us:

6. Or if our gifts fit us for the stated ministry of the word, let us be diligent in preaching, not disheartened by dangers: or if one's gift is fit him for teaching the ignorant, let him be diligent in teaching such:

7. Or if they fit him for exhorting, let him employ himself in exhortation: his whose gift is teaching, let him teach; whose of giving in the spirit, let him give; whose of helping, let him help; whose of ruling, let him rule with care; (i.e. in wisdom) he who sheweth mercy, let him do it with cheerfulness.

8. Of inspiration, whereby St. Paul was qualified and authorized to direct the church in doctrine and worship, he was not personally known to the Romans, it was proper he should assert his character as an apostle, in support of the precepts he should give, as his authority as a preacher. 2

9. Not to think more highly of himself than he ought to think. (ver. 7.) From this, we learn, that irregularities in the exercise of the spiritual gifts are to be avoided, perhaps in the particular ministerial gift, 1 Cor. x. 16. These being箩' inaugural, or the Romish, or the apostle's, and so on, according to the form of the sentence, are not in the proper sense of the word, 3 Cor. iii. 2.

10. Exhorting the Romans to behave wisely, according to their measure of faith, the apostle tactily reproved such of them as, not considering the nature of their own gifts, supplied to offices in the church for which they were not qualified.

11. For, as in one body we have many, are one body under Christ. This comparison of the Christian church to the human body, is made more particular by a species of metaphor. And Col. i. 18. note 1.

12. This comparison of the Christian church to the human body, is made more particular by a species of metaphor. And Col. i. 18. note 1.

13. The first Christians reckoned it an essential part of their religion, to support their brethren when in any kind of distress. And by their zeal in doing good offices to one another, they described and adoration of the heathens; as we learn from the emperor Julian's letter to Ariobarzus, Epist. xii. —Discouraging, in this passage, does not mean those common offices of charity which are incumbent on all Christians, and which may be performed without the assistance of the church. But the word is used here of gifts of the spirit, which are appropriate by particular churches for relieving the necessities of the afflicted; an office which required great prudence, impartiality, and forbearance. And therefore the persons employed in it were spiritual men, whose gifts enabled them to distinguish discourses from heathens, and the really poor from those who were not, (see Acts vi. 1-12), and to form a proper judgment of their necessities. See ver. 8. on this verse.

14. Let him do it with simplicity. —Be yourselves. For we consider simplicity as opposed to similitude, discriminating, the making a difference among persons from favour or hatred, it will signify immitativeness. Thus, James xix. 17. "The sin of ignorance is (similitude) without partiality." Simplicity, similitude, may also be applied to moral liberality. For the word is used in this sense in Prov. xxviii. 3. —Or, this word being used to denote freedom from all mixture, it may signify purity.

15. He who prophesies. —O μνημεια, in this passage, answers to 1 και in 1 and 2 Cor. x. 17. "the elders who preside well," 1 Tim. iv. 7. The office itself is termed μνημεια, distinguished, 1 Cor. xii. 28: and the spiritual gift necessary to the present, was the 'discernment of spirits.' See 1 Cor. xiv. 10. note 3. —Because this is interjected between the clauses, the apostle means by the word, "the office in the church, is (similitude) without partiality." Simplicity, similitude, may also be applied to moral liberality. For the word is used in this sense in Prov. xxviii. 3. —Or, this word being used to denote freedom from all mixture, it may signify purity.

16. He who sheweth mercy. —O γεννημεια, Rom. xvi. 1. note 2. The primitive Christians took a particular care of the widows, and sick people, and strangers, and of such as were imprisoned for their religion, or spoiled of their goods. To these offices they were strongly moved by the apostle's direction, especially by their Master's declaration, that he himself suffers whatever is suffered by the members of his body; and that whoever is done, or neglected to be done, to one of the least of his brethren, 9 Let love be without hypocrisy: abhor evil: cleave to good.

10 In brotherly love, be kindly disposed towards each other. In honour (μεταωφορεῖτε) go before one another.
11 In care for each other be not slothful. In spirit be fervent when serving the Lord.
12 Rejoice in hope. Be patient in affection. Continue instant in prayer. (See Luke viii. 1.) 13 Communicate to the necessities of the saints. Fellow hospitality to strangers.
14 Bless them who persecute you: bless, and curse not. (See 1 Pet. iii. 9.)
15 (Χαίρετε) Rejoice! with them who rejoice, and weep with them who weep.
16 (Τοιούτους διώκετε) Be of the same disposition! towards one another. Do not care for high things; but rather, for lowly men. Be not wise in your own conceits.

17 Unto no one return evil for evil. (See 1 Pet. iii. 9.) Premeditate7 things coming in the sight of all men.

18 (Προτέρον) This relates to you, is, live in peace with all men, if possible.
19 Beloved, do not avenge yourselves, but give place to the wrath of God: For it is written, Vengeance belongs to me, I will repay, saith the Lord.

Ver. 11. Serving the Lord.—Mill, in his edition of the Greek Testament, has here ἀποκρίνεσθαι, serving the time; which sentiment also appears in Col. iii. 23, 1 Thess. iv. 3, and 1 Pet. ii. 19, and seems to belong to the whole context. It means, of course, the time of evil, whether of the body or soul. In 1 John iii. 18, the meaning is, Not slothful in taking care of each other, shewing proper fervency of spirit in the work, yet prudently saving your conduct to the time. But as this precept is not connected with what went before, I agree with Exundus in preferring the common reading, because serving the time! is not an expression used in scripture, being very different from redeeming the time, Eph. v. 16. Col. iv. 5. Whereas, serving Christ and the Lord, is an expression which often occurs, Rom. xv. 16. xv. 10. Col. iii. 26. Besides, it was a very proper argument to encourage the Romans to be diligent in the work of the Lord, because when the hour cometh, they feared not death. The time is that hour, in which they feared death. Or, serving the Lord may mean as in the new translation and commentary.

Ver. 15. Rejoice.—As the Lord and his house are called a haven, a haven of strangers, properly signifies. Blackwall thinks this word is found in the Old Testament, where it is used to signify to receive poor visitors, and distressed travelers, with a sense of hospitality, but that we should pursue, or follow after, those who have used us not well, and the neighboring persons, who were so used, is highly acceptable to Christ: 'I was a stranger and ye took me in.' See ver. 8. note 6.

Ver. 16. Bless and curse not.—The repetition of the word bless shows the importance of this precept. Paul's behaviour towards the high priest Ananias, Acts xii. 3, and towards Alexander the coppersmith, 2 Tim. iv. 14, may seem a breach of this command. But on these occasions he may have been directed by an impulse of the Holy Ghost, to denounced the judgment of God against such obstinate sinners.

Ver. 15. Rejoice.—Xαίρετε is put for the imperative, after the manner of the aorist; unless we choose to supply an auxiliary from the 1st aorist.

Ver. 16.—1. Be of the same disposition towards one another. —Τοιούτους διώκετε, the distribution; but the persons who attended the deserts, the sick, and the distressed, was called τοιούτους, the shepherds of mercy.

6. With cheerfulness.—The persons, whether male or female, were to be made to attend on the afflicted, under the spiritual head, took a very laborious office. It was therefore necessary, on their own account, to perform these offices with cheerfulness, as the appointed work of the church, and as necessary, to the comfort of those whom they encouraged; who would receive the greater consolation, when they found the persons who performed them taking pleasure in them.

Ver. 10. Be kindly disposed.—The force of the original word εὐφροσύνα is hardly reached in any translation. It is compounded of a word signifying that affection which animals by instinct bear to their young, and so teaches us, that Christian charity shall be warm and strong, like that which near relations bear to one another.

Ver. 9. Let your profession of love be real; abhor every evil action: adhere closely to a virtuous course of life.

Ver. 10. In love to one another as brethren in Christ, show that kindness of affection which near relations bear to one another. In every honourable action, go before, and leading on one another.

Ver. 11. In caring for each other, be not slothful. In spirit be fervent when serving the Lord.

Ver. 12. Rejoice in hope. Be patient in affection. And as the best consolation in trouble, continue earnest in prayer, although your prayers be not immediately answered.

Ver. 13. Communicate to the necessities of the saints. Fellow hospitality to strangers, especially those driven from their homes by persecution.

Ver. 15. Rejoice with them who are in prosperity, and grieve with them who are in adversity: these things are acceptable both to God and man.

Ver. 16. Be of the same hospitable, forgiving, sympathizing disposition towards one another, as towards strangers and persecutors. Do not take revenge. For he that taketh revenge, saith the Lord, is full of the spirit of murder.

Ver. 17. Unto no one return evil for evil. For it is written, Vengeance belongs to me, I will repay, saith the Lord.

Ver. 18. Be not avenge yourselves, but give place to the wrath of God, whose prerogative it is to punish. For it is written, Deut. xxxii. 36. Vengeance belongs to me, I will repay, saith the Lord. See also Lev. xix. 18.
ROMANS. 121

CHAP. XIII. 20 Therefore, if thy persecutor hunger, instead of revenging thyself by suffering him to perish, give him meat; and if he thirst, give him drink: for so doing, thou wilt heap coals of fire on his head.

21 Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

2. Give place to the wrath.—In the opinion of some commentators, the meaning of the apostle’s direction is, ‘Yield to the wrath of your enemies without opposing it.’

Ver. 20. For this doing, thou wilt heap coals of fire on his head.—The expression is a common one in the east, and signifies to heap coals of fire on the head of an enemy, in a good sense, 2 Sam. xiv. 7. ‘They shall quench my coal of fire which is left.’ They will deprive me of my lasting comfort. That the expression is used in a good sense by the apostle, seems probable from the following verse, where we are commanded to ‘overcome evil with good.’ The meaning is supposed to be taken from the melting of metals, by covering the ore with burning coals. Thus understood, the meaning will be, in so doing thou wilt mollify thine enemy, and bring him to a good temper. This, no doubt, is the best method of treating enemies. For it belongs to God to punish the injurious, but to the injured to overcome them, by returning good for evil. Why does the apostle say, Thou wilt heap coals of fire on his head? He brings up seven enemies against the wrath of God, who, by punishing them, will maintain thy cause; and observes, that the apostle’s question is answerable by his answer. If, on account of his punishment, vengeance is spoken of: and affirms, that in other passages of scripture, to heap coals of fire upon the head of sinners, always signifies to increase their punishment.

Ver. 21. Be not overcome of evil, &c.—Blackwall, after having praised the language in which this precept is delivered, adds, ‘This is a noble strain of Christian courage, prudence, and goodness, that nothing in Epictetus, Plutarch, or Aristotle can vie with. The moralists and heroes of paganism could not write and act to the height of this.’

CHAPTER XIII.

Because God had chosen the Jews for his subjects, and as their king he had dictated to them a system of laws, and had governed them anciently in person, and afterwards by princes of their own nomination, they regarded the laws of heathen governments, Matt. xxiii. 17. In short, the zealots of that nation laid it down as a principle, that they would obey God alone, as their king and governor, in opposition to Caesar, and all kings whatever who were not of their religion, and who did not govern them by the laws of their God. This turbulent disposition, some of the Jews who embraced the gospel did not immediately lay aside; and even of the believing Gentiles there were a few, who, on pretence that they had a sufficient rule of conduct in the spiritual gifts with which they were endued, affirmed that they were under no obligation to obey ordinances imposed by idolatry, nor to pay taxes for the support of idolatrous governments. In that persuasion, they also refused to the heathen magistrates that honour and obedience, to which, by their office, they were entitled from all who lived under their government. But these principles and practices occasioning the gospel to be evil spoken of, the apostle judged it necessary, in his letter to the Colossians, to censure their conduct toward the magistrates; and to testify to them, that the disciples of Christ were not exempted from obedience to the wholesome laws even of the heathen countries where they lived, nor from contributing to the support of the government by which they were protected, although it was administered by idolaters. Withal, having inscribed this letter to the unbelieving, as well as to the believing inhabitants of Rome, the brethren were thereby directed, for the vindication of their religion, to shew the copies which they took of it to such of the heathens as were willing to read it.

This admirable part of his letter the apostle began with exhorting every one to obey the government of the country where he lives, whether it be established by the express consent of the people, or by their acquiescence, or by long usage; founding his exhortation on the following principle—That God having formed mankind for living in society, and some government being absolutely necessary for maintaining order and peace among the associated, whatever form of government happens to be established in the country, he commands as his subjects to oblige themselves to his general government of the world, ver. 1.—Civil government, therefore, being authorized of God, he who resists the established exercise of it in any country, on pretence that the persons holding the reins of government have no just title to do so, or on pretence that they profess a false religion, and exercise their power in a corrupting manner, really resists the ordinance of God; and all who do so bring on themselves just condemnation, both from God and men, ver. 2, 3.—On the other hand, magistrates, being servants of God for good to the people, ought, agreeably to the end of their office, to exercise their power for the welfare of their subjects, by punishing none but evil doers, and by protecting and encouraging all who keep the wholesome laws of the state, whatever religion they may profess, ver. 4.—It was therefore necessary for the brethren to obey the heathen magistrates, in all things consistent with their duty to God; not only to avoid punishment, but from a principle of conscience, ver. 5.—And that the rulers might be honourably maintained, and the government effectually supported, the apostle ordered, tax, and custom, and tribute to be paid, as well as that fear or respect which is due to rulers on account of their office, ver. 6, 7.—In this, I suppose, the apostle had the Jews in his eye, who held it unlawful to pay tribute to Caesar; yet what he says being general, and applicable to all who enjoy the protection of government, it could give the Jews no just offence. Lastly, the principles of Christ’s kingdom are opposed to those of every other, and the enemies of Christ in every country have no man any thing, except to love one another, because love leads to the performance of every social duty, and prevents all manner of injuries and crimes, ver. 8-10.

It deserves both notice and praise, that in explaining to the inhabitants of Rome their duty as citizens, the apostle hath shown the finest address. For while he seemed only to plead the cause of the magistrate with the people, he tacitly conveyed the most wholesome instruction to the heathen rulers, who he knew were too proud to receive advice from teachers of his character and nation. For by telling rulers, that they are the servants of God for good to the people, he taught them the purpose of their office, and showed them, that their sole aim in executing it ought to be to promote the happiness of their people; and that as soon as they lose sight of this, their government degenerates into tyranny. Moreover, by establishing the office and power of magistrates on their proper foundation, and by teaching the people to obey their rulers from conscience, he made such of the heathen as held their religion, and would not suffer themselves to be subjected to the rule of their conscience, to be subjected to the rule of his text, without rebellion principles in their vocation; that it does not meddle with the political constitution of any state, on pretence of mending it; and that it enjoins subjects, in things not sinful, to obey their rulers, whatever the form of government is under which they act. Such a discourse concerning obedience to laws and magistrates, was addressed to the Roman brethren with peculiar propriety, because they had been banished from Rome with the Jews, by the emperor Claudius, for their tumultuous behaviour, and were but lately returned. The apostle, however, gave the same directions to other churches, Tit. iii. 1., as did St. Peter likewise, 1 Pet. ii. 13–17.; from which we may learn how turbulent the Jews were in all the heathen countries, and how anxious the Christian teachers were, to have their disciples free from blame in every respect.

In what follows, the apostle earnestly recommended to the Romans the duties of temperance and chastity, because in their heathen state they had been extremely deficient in these virtues. And that his exhortation might make the deeper impression, he compared their former ignorance, from which their lewdness and intemperance had proceeded, to the darkness of night; and opposed therein the knowledge which the gospel had imparted to them, likening it to the light of day springing up after a long dark night, and gradually advancing to meridian brightness. And the heathens lying in that ignorance were compared to persons in a deep sleep, because they were as incapable of performing the rational functions of men, as persons are who sleep in the intoxication of drunkenness, ver. 11–14.

The precepts in this and the preceding chapter do great honour to the gospel, and to its ministers. They show us, that instead of contracting men's affections, and limiting them to their own sect, the gospel enlarges their hearts, so as to embrace the whole world, excluding not their enemies: that it cherishes no rebellious principles in its vortaries, but enjoins obedience to superiors from a regard to conscience; and that it allures no proselytes, by the prospect of criminal sensual pleasures of any kind.

CHAP. XIII.—1. Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. 2. For there is no power but from God; and the powers that be are placed under God.

2. Wherefore, he who setteth himself in opposition to the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they who resist shall procure punishment to themselves.

3. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to evil. Woe unto them that be afraid of the power! Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same.

4. For the ruler is (Gaun dawc@) a servant of God for good to thee. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; because he doeth not bear the sword in vain: for he is (Gaun dawc@) a servant of God, a revenger to implicit wrath on him who worketh evil.

VER. 1.—1. Let every soul be subject. Every soul is a most general expression, comprehending all mankind. Jews and Gentiles, whether they believe the gospel or not, or whether they are in heathen countries, or possess the spiritual gifts and itinerant powers, or are destitute of all, ought to be subject to the civil powers, in things not sinful, to the government of the country where they live.

VER. 2.—2. For he that resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God. In other words, the higher powers, being distinguished from the (Gawd@), the rulers, ver. 3, must signify not the persons who possess the supreme authority, but the supreme authority itself, whereby the state is governed; whether that authority be vested in the people, or in the nobles, or in a single person, or be shared among these three orders; in short, the higher powers denotes that form of government which is established in any country, whatever it may be. This remark deserves attention, because the apostle's reasoning, while it holds good concerning the form of government established in a country, is not true concerning the persons who possess the supreme power, that there is no power but from God; and the powers that be are placed under God.

3. For there is no power but from God. This was written to correct the pride of the Jews, who raised themselves excruciatingly, because they had received a form of government from God. The government of every state has its source in the supernal, external, and original intelligence of God. In society, he has, by the frame of their nature, and by the reason of things, authorized government to be exercised in every country. At the same time, having appointed no particular form to any nation but to the Jews, nor named any particular person or family to exercise the power of government, he has left it to the people themselves to choose what form is most agreeable to themselves, and to commit the exercise of the supreme power to what persons they think fit. And therefore whatever form of government has been chosen, it is established in any country, both the divine sanction; and the persons who, by the choice, or even by the peaceable submission of the governed, have the right of government, are the lawful sovereigns of that country, and have all the rights and privileges which are dependent on a government.

4. And the powers that be are placed under God. We have the phrase (Gawd@) in two other passages in the New Testament, Acts vii. 54, 55., and 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14., power and authority, being distinguished from (Gawd@), the rulers, ver. 3, must signify not the persons who possess the supreme authority, but the supreme authority itself, whereby the state is governed; whether that authority be vested in the people, or in the nobles, or in a single person, or be shared among these three orders; in short, the higher powers denotes that form of government which is established in any country, whatever it may be. This remark deserves attention, because the apostle's reasoning, while it holds good concerning the form of government established in a country, is not true concerning the persons who possess the supreme power, that there is no power but from God; and the powers that be are placed under God.

5. For he that resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God. If the person who possesses the supreme power in any state, exercises it in destroying the fundamental laws, and to the ruin of the people, such a ruler is not from God, is not authorized by him, and ought to be resisted.

6. For there is no power but from God. This was written to correct the pride of the Jews, who raised themselves excruciatingly, because they had received a form of government from God. The government of every state has its source in the supernal, external, and original intelligence of God. In society, he has, by the frame of their nature, and by the reason of things, authorized government to be exercised in every country. At the same time, having appointed no particular form to any nation but to the Jews, nor named any particular person or family to exercise the power of government, he has left it to the people themselves to choose what form is most agreeable to themselves, and to commit the exercise of the supreme power to what persons they think fit. And therefore whatever form of government has been chosen, it is established in any country, both the divine sanction; and the persons who, by the choice, or even by the peaceable submission of the governed, have the right of government, are the lawful sovereigns of that country, and have all the rights and privileges which are dependent on a government.

7. And the powers that be are placed under God. We have the phrase (Gawd@) in two other passages in the New Testament, Acts vii. 54, 55., and 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14., power and authority, being distinguished from (Gawd@), the rulers, ver. 3, must signify not the persons who possess the supreme authority, but the supreme authority itself, whereby the state is governed; whether that authority be vested in the people, or in the nobles, or in a single person, or be shared among these three orders; in short, the higher powers denotes that form of government which is established in any country, whatever it may be. This remark deserves attention, because the apostle's reasoning, while it holds good concerning the form of government established in a country, is not true concerning the persons who possess the supreme power, that there is no power but from God; and the powers that be are placed under God.

8. For he that resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God. If the person who possesses the supreme power in any state, exercises it in destroying the fundamental laws, and to the ruin of the people, such a ruler is not from God, is not authorized by him, and ought to be resisted.

CHAP. XIII.—1. Let every man, whatever his office in the church or his spiritual gifts are, be subject to the established government. For there is no power of government but from God; and the governing powers in all countries are subordinate to, and useful for carrying on God's benevolent government of the world.

2. Wherefore, he who setteth himself in opposition to the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they who resist shall procure punishment to themselves.

3. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to evil. Wouldest thou then be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same.

4. For the ruler, according to the true design of his office, is a servant of God, appointed to make thee and the rest happy, by maintaining all in their just possessions. But if thou do evil, if thou art rebellious, impious, injurious, or addicted to any vice inconsistent with the peace of society, be afraid of the magistrate, because the power of punishing is not committed to him by God and the people in vain; for he is a servant of God, appointed to avenge the community by punishing evil doers.

ROMANS.

6 Wherefore it is necessary for you to be subject,1 not only on account of wrath, but also as a part of our peace, forasmuch as it is the ordinance of God, to obey them that are in authority:

7 For this reason, therefore, pay ye taxes1 also to them, because they are public ministers2 of God, attending continually to this very thing.

8 Render therefore to all their dues:1 to whom tax is due, tax:1 to whom custom, custom: to whom fear, fear: to whom honour, honour.

9 Owe no man any thing, unless to love one another. For he who loveth another hath fulfilled the law.

10 For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is summed up in this precept, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

11 Also this I command, Know the season,1 that it is already the hour for us to awake out of sleep. For now the salvation is nearer3 than when we believed.

12 For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the heathen say, who hath believed against God, hath fulfilled the law.

13 Ver. 10. Therefore love is the fulfilling of the law. Ver. 11. Precept is summed up in this precept, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Ver. 12. He that believes in Jesus Christ and is converted, he is saved by the grace of God, and hath fulfilled the law.

14 Ver. 13. The phrase love the world signifies ministers appointed by God in behalf of the people. See Rom. xvi. 10 note. The thing to which the magistrates attend, or ought to attend continually, is the good of the people; which they should promote by restraining evil-doers, distributing justice, and repelling the attacks of foreign enemies. Now these things they cannot do, unless taxes are paid to them.

15 Ver. 17. Render therefore to all their dues. In this precept the apostle follows his master, who ordered the Jews to render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, though Caesar was neither the Jewish nation, nor of their religion.

16 Ver. 21. This is money levied from the people for their persons, their houses, and their property. Custom is due to whom it is due, by the usual custom, and the taxes and custom are due to whom they are due. Custom, in the next verses, and custom signifies the money levied from the people.

17 Ver. 22. He who loveth another.1—Ver. 23, another, is more general. It is a phrase generally used by the apostle to express our debts to one another. He who loveth another presumes our very enemies, according to the sublime morality enjoined by Christ.

18 Ver. 25. It is summed up in this precept, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. The meaning of the precept is, that as the friendship and assistance of our neighbour are necessary to the innoculation of our person, so we are to abstain from injuring him as carefully as from injuring ourselves.
The night is far advanced, and the day is at hand. Let us therefore put off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. (See 1 John 1:6, note 3.)

Let us walk about decently as in the day, not in (κοσμος καὶ ποιεῖσθαι) revellings and drunkennesses, not (σκαραβαί καὶ ακμαίοι) in chambers and lasciviousnesses, not (χαμάς καὶ ζύγια) in strife and envy.

But put ye on! The Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the lusts of the flesh.

His exhortation more persuasive. For the same reason he says, in the next verse, 'Let us put off.'

Ver. 12.—1. The night is far advanced, and the day is at hand. Because knowledge and ignorance are to the mind what light and darkness are to the body, the scriptures often represent the former by the latter. Thus the heathens, who lived in utter ignorance of God and religion, are said to be in darkness; and their state is called night; and they themselves some of the night and darkness of ignorance. Whereas they who enjoyed the knowledge of God and religion are said to be in light and their state is called day, and they themselves some of the light of the day. 1 Thess. 5:4. Wherefore, the night, which is represented as the darkness, or almost at an end, is the night of heathenish ignorance; and the day, which is said to have been at hand, is the more clear shining of the light of truth, by the repeated preaching of the gospel in all those countries, and the darkness of ignorance and idolatry formerly reigned; the effect of which was, that the doctrines and precepts of the gospel were brought to the understanding of those who heard them, as they first believed.

2. Let us therefore put off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. The words ἀποθέλων καὶ ἀρραβώνων properly signify the putting off and on of clothes. Perhaps the apostle alludes to the dress of the crowns of leaves, in which the Hebrews dressed the crowns of leaves, and used to mark the heads and torches in their hands, with musical instruments of various kinds; upon which some of them played soft airs, while others accompanied them with their voices, and danced in the most lascivious manner. These indecencies they acted commonly before the houses in which their mistresses lived, then knocked at the door, and in the house in which they are, and at the end of the same, and opposed to εἰς ὁμορροφίαν, the garb and employment of the day, to these nocturnal dresses and revellings.

3. Not in chambers, but in the day time. For the same reason, the Romanos to which he adds, and make no provision for the lusts of the flesh. According to St. John, the Romans were to put on the armour of light, the Christian virtues, for their own sake, 'till the day break, and the darkness be past.' 1 Thess. 5:5. And hasty to wear with the morning, when he appears, to shun the ignorant Galatians.' 1 Cor. iv. 19. As this sentence is followed by the word ἀναπληροῦμαι, that is, to make up, it appears, that the apostle means, not to put on the armour of light, but to make up to it; to continue our gatherings in the house of the Lord, so as to increase the numbers of Christians, who, by the way, very frequently assemble together, and oppose to ἐν αὐτοῖς, the garb and employment of the day, to these nocturnal arrangements and revellings.

Chapter XIV.

Soxas of the Jewish converts at Rome, fancying that the meats forbidden by Moses were uncleann in themselves, ver. 14, and that the days which he ordered to be kept holy were still to be sanctified, looked on their Gentile brethren as profane persons, because they ate all kinds of meats without distinction, and regarded every day alike. On the other hand, the Gentiles despised the Jews as ignorant bigots, for making many distinctions in meats and days, and refused to admit them into their company. To remedy these disorders, the apostle, in this chapter, commanded the Gentile converts who were well instructed, to be in friendship with such of their Jewish brethren as were weak in the faith, and to converse familiarly with them; not, however, for the purpose of disputing with them, or to account for their belief. For let every one most kindly deal with his other, and love them, that they may be more strongly persuaded, ver. 1. He acknowledged that it was natural for the Jews and Gentiles to differ in opinion concerning meats, ver. 2. But the Gentile brother, who is at all kinds indifferently, was not to despise the Jew as a weak bigot, because he ate such meats only as were allowed by the law of Moses. On the other hand, the Jew was not to condemn the Gentile as a profane person, for eating meats forbidden by Moses; for God had received him into his church, notwithstanding he did not obey the law, ver. 3.

Having thus advised the Gentile and Jewish Christians to forbear despising and condemning each other for not following the same rule respecting meats, the apostle proceeded to give them further instructions for their conduct in that matter, seeing they were all Christ's servants, employed by him in his family or church, and were not accountable to one another for their actions, but to Christ alone, whose prerogative it is to acquit or condemn his own servants. Further, he assured them, that notwithstanding they condemned one another, their conduct would not affect Christ, who will acquit his sincere servants, although they may have erred in that matter, provided therein they have acted according to conscience, ver. 4. Next, with respect to the days which Moses ordered to be hallowed, the apostle likewise acknowledged that it was natural for the Jews and Gentiles to have different opinions. But whether they observed these days, or did not observe them, their duty was, to be fully persuaded in their own mind concerning the lawfulness of what they did, ver. 5. — And therefore, though they differed in their practice concerning meats and days, the apostle charitably hoped they all acted in these matters from a regard to the will of Christ, ver. 6. — This regard he told them it became them to maintain habitually, because none of them was his own Lord; none of them was at liberty, in religious matters, to act according to his own pleasure, ver. 7, 8. — For Christ both died and rose again, that he might acquire a right to rule the dead and the living, ver. 9. — Christ then being their only ruler, the apostle told them how they dared to intrude themselves into his place—the Jews by condemning the Gentiles, and the Gentiles by insolently despising the Jews! Instead of having a right to judge one another, they were all to stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, ver. 10. as Isaiah foretold, and to give an account to him, not of their neighbours' actions, but of their own, ver. 11, 12.

Christ, then, being the only Lord of the conscience of his servants, and the judge of their actions, the apostle commanded the Romans no longer to judge one another, but to judge this rather to be a fit measure, not to lay, either by their severe judgments or by their example, any temptation in one another's way which might occasion their falling into sin, ver. 13. — And to shew them what he himself thought of the conscience, he therefore said, that he had composed his meat to be unclean in itself, every kind is unclean to him who thinketh it unclean; because, while he entertains that opinion, he cannot eat it without sin, ver. 14. — And therefore, said the apostle, if thy weak brother is tempted, either by thy severe censures or by thy example, to eat meats which he thinks unclean, thou art not according to the love which thou shouldst bear to thy brother, if thou continuest to tempt him in that manner. I beseech thee, do not destroy him with thy meat for whom Christ died, ver. 15. — nor occasion the good liberty which belongs to the disciples of Christ to be evil spoken of by the Jews, ver. 16. — Besides, there is no reason for using thy liberty on every occasion; especially as the religion of Christ does not consist in the use of meats and drinks, but in a righteous and peaceable behaviour towards all men: neither are the pleasures which his religion promises the pleasures of sense, but those joys which result from the possession and exercise of the virtues which the Holy Ghost infuses into men's minds, ver. 17. — Further, the abolition of censures, of discord, of the jealousy of the Gentiles, of the observance of days and meats, are effects of the good dispositions he had been recommending; that, laying aside their disputes, they might cordially join in worshipping God publicly, and in praising him for his goodness to men, ver. 8, 9. — This admirable discourse the apostle concluded with an exhortation to the Jewish and Gentile brethren to 'receive one another;' that is, to live in peace and friendship with one another, even as Christ had received them all into his friendship and church, to the great glory of God the Father, ver. 7.

It is proper now to observe, that although the controversy concerning the holy days, and the distinction of meats, enjoined by the law of Moses, which led the apostle to give the Roman brethren the rules contained in the xvith, and in the beginning of the xvith chapter of this Epistle, hath no place in the present state of the church, these chapters must not be considered as useless. The general principles of morality explained in them are of unalterable obligation, and may be applied with great advantage for preventing us both from lording it over the conscience of our brethren, and from submitting to their tyranny. For they can be more useful to Christians in every age, than to be assur'd by an inspired apostle, That Christ is the only Lord of the conscience of his servants, and the judge of their hearts.—That he hath not delegated this great pre-
new TRANSLATION.

Chap. XIV.—1 Him who is weak in the faith receive ye, but not in order to the strife of disputations.

2 One indeed believeth he may eat every thing; but he who is weak in the faith (from ver. 1.) eateth herbs only.

3 Let not him who eateth despise him who eateth not, (aoros) condemn him who eateth; for God hath received him.

4 Who art thou that condemnest another’s household servant? by his own master he standeth or falleth: (ver. 10.) and he shall be made

Ver. 1.—1 Him who is weak in the faith.——The apostle means the Jewish Christian, who through weakness of understanding, or through prejudice, was ignorant of the doctrine of the gospel concerning the Gentiles and days; or whose persuasion of that doctrine was so weak, that it did not influence his conduct. To such persons, though in error, the apostle showed great tenderness, when he represented them only as ‘weak in the faith.’ In other passages, weakness signifies culpable error, 1 Cor. vii. 7. Some with consciousness of the idol, eat it as a thing offered to an idol, and their conscience being weak is declared.

2 Receive ye.—Admit him to your company and conversation, and so partake of the common worship of God, 1 Cor. x. 27. 28. among the Jews, as well as among the Gentiles.

3. But not in the strife of disputations:—μειμησθησαίτε. The verb μειμησθησαίτε, among other things, signifies, ἵκες to contend with words. Jude ver. 9. But Michael the archangel contended with the devil, about the body of Moses.——Acts ii. 2. And when they went up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with the Gentiles, disputed about the body of Moses.——Acts xvi. 2. When therefore you eat and drink, do it all to the glory of God, and be not ye an occasion of stumbling to the weak brethren.——Rom. xiv. 24. 25.——See Rom. v. 12.

Ver. 2.—1 Believeth he may eat every thing.——The apostle speaks not only of the Gentiles, but of such well instructed Jewish Christians as knew their liberty in this matter.——Bispeis eis ἄνθρωπον, Believeth to eat, is an Hebrewism, and signifies, belief that is lawful to eat: Gen. iii. 2. Of the fruit of the trees that are in the garden we eat, that is, it is lawful for us to eat. 2 But he who is weak in the faith eateth herbs only.——The explanation given of this clause in the commentary, is confirmed by Daniel’s practice, described Dan. i. 8—17; and by the behaviour of those priests whom Felix sent prisoners to Rome; of whom Josephus, De esse, says, that ‘ever amidst their calamities they were not forgetful of the right worship of God by which they fed on oils and nata, and that even in the heathens their idol worship, and further that evil communications made them eat any kind of animals.——See Col. ii. 23. note 5.

Ver. 3. For God hath received him.——God hath received both the one and the other in his church, as it is evident from his bestowing on both the spiritual gifts; and will receive both the one and the other in his everlasting kingdom, although they may have erred in their opinion about messia, and here in everything else, they have acted conscientiously. This is a powerful argument for the conciliating manner with which he, otherwise notwithstanding, we differ in opinion on religious subjects.

Ver. 4.—1 By his own master he standeth or falleth.—Locke in 5 One indeed (ὁ δὲ) thinketh a day more holy than another: but another thinketh every day alike. Let every one (ὁ δὲ) be convinced in his own mind.

6 (Ὁ δὲ, literally, He who careth for.) He who observeth the day, observeth it to the Lord; and he who doth not observe the day, to the Lord doth he not observe it; he who eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he who eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

7 For none of us liveth by himself; and none of us dieth by himself.

8 (Ἔχεις) But whether we live, we live by the Lord; and whether we die, we die by the Lord; whether we live therefore or die, we are the Lord's.

9 For to this end Christ both died and rose, and liveth again; that he might rule over both the dead and the living.

10 But thou, why dost thou condemne thy brother? and also thee, why dost thou despise thy brother? for we shall all be placed before the judgment-seat of Christ.

11 For it is written, (ISA. xiv. 23, 24, as I live, saith the Lord,) surely to me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess to God.

12 (Ἄρας) Well, then, every one of us shall give an account concerning himself to God.

13 Let us therefore no more judge one another; but judge ye this rather, not to lay an interpretation of this of one's standing in the church, or of his being exalted, or cast down, or cast up; but that he which ruleth not his own house well doth not belong to be a ruler of the church; and that he which dieth not sheweth not God, that he which liveth not sheweth not God.

14 But let him that ruleth well in his own house number to himself that he is accepted of God; and let him that liveth not sheweth not God; for he that ruleth not his own house and family, how shall he shew that he ruleth the church of God?

15 But I speak by revelation, not I, but the Lord who gave the commandment through me.

16 But I say, that the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.

17 For the肉身 shall be accquitted, for God hath power to acquit him at the judgment, and will do it, if he hath acted conscientiously.

18 For respect to days, the Jews respect, indeed, thinketh one day more holy than another; the new moons, for example, and sabbaths: but the Gentile Christian, better informed, thinketh every day alike holy, because the law of Moses is not the law of Christ's kingdom. Let every one direct himself according to his own conviction.

19 He who observeth the Jewish holy days, observeth them in obedience to Christ, who he thinks hath commanded them: He, who doth not observe these days in obedience to Christ, he doth not observe them, knowing that Christ hath abolished them. But to all kinds of meat indiscriminately, eateth them in obedience to Christ, who has permitted them to be eaten; for he giveth God thanks for them, in the persuasion that they are permitted; and he who eateth not every kind, in obedience to Christ he eateth them not, and sheweth his persuasion that they are not permitted, by giving God thanks for the food he is allowed to eat.

20 In thus declaring their subjection to Christ, both of them act properly; for none of us liveth by his own will, and none of us is allowed to die by his own will.

21 But whether we live, we live by the will of Christ: or whether we die, we die by the will of Christ. Whether we live therefore or die, we are Christ's subjects; and should not, in religious matters, be guided by our own will, but by the will of others, but by his.

22 To this implicit obedience from all he who hath the complete Christian life: for to this end Christ both died and rose, and liveth again in heaven, that he might rule and judge both the dead and the living.

23 But thou Jew, why dost thou condemn thy Gentile brother, because he neglegeth the distinction of meats and days? Or thou Gentile, why dost thou despise thy Jewish brother as a weak bigot, because he observeth these distinctions? In such matters we should not judge one another; for we shall all be placed before the judgment-seat of Christ, to be judged by him.

24 This was declared to the Jews long ago: 'for it is written, I have sworn by myself, saith the Lord, the word is gone out of my mouth, &c.' That unto me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear.'

25 Well, then, every one of us shall give an account concerning himself to God, whose indulgence to the sinner will make many ashamed of their harsh judgments.

26 Let us therefore no more judge one another, because our opinions and practices are different: but ye shall judge with mercy, as Christ hath judged with mercy.

27 For he who hath any right to judge the world is the Lord who giveth the commandment through us.

28 But he shall be made to stand.—[Εν ου.] Whaley, who translates this, 'He shall be established,' thinks the meaning is, That the Lord will establish him: or, the Lord will see to it that all the things he has said shall be verified, and that others in succession shall take to heart the things he has said, and fulfill meats and days, when he should see the temple destroyed, and the law of Moses set aside. But neither this, nor Locke's interpretation, accordeth with the scope and design of the chapter. The interpretation, as given in the commentary, I think, is the true meaning of the passage.

29 For seeking it appear not, but the neck is made in speaking of Christ's judging his own servants at the last day, the swending of which he speaks must be that mentioned Paul. I. 5. The nugressy shall not stand in the judgment; consequently the sest's meaning is, the servant of Christ, who acts conscientiously, shall be honourably acquitted at the judgment, even though he may have sinned through ignorance.

30 Ver. 5. Every day alike.—The Jewish holidays only being the subject of controversy, what the apostle hath written concerning them in this passage, cannot be extended to the Sabbath instituted at the creation, nor to the Christian Sabbath.

31 Ver. 6. For he giveth God thanks.—By giving God thanks before he eats, he shews himself a religious person, who, in the matter of meats, acts according to what he thinks is the will of God.—The sentiment italicised in this verse is excellent; as also it is in the following verses.

32 Likewise in verses 3 and 4. Every man ought to believe concerning his neighbour, that in all religious matters he acts according to conscience, especially if he professes to do so; and though his conscience be ill-informed, he should be left to its direction in these matters. The Greek commentators affirm, that the rules in this chapter relate to meats and fasting only, and not to doctrines of faith, and matters of great importance. But I see no reason for this distinction. The right of conscience, and of pretending to know the more sacred, the more important the affair is about which they are exercised. And therefore, in every thing of importance, as well as in lesser things, let them hold the rule of conscience, and not the opinion and conscience of another, are appointed by Christ to be a rule of his conduct.

33 Ver. 7. For none of us liveth by himself, and none of us dieth by himself.—[Εν ου.] To live or to die by one, is to live at one's pleasures; and to live or to die at one's pleasure, is to die of one's pleasure. Thus Sophocles' Ajax, ver. 603. Πάντα τοις τοιούτοις ἁναθέτεις: 'He died by his will of the gods.' For the scholiast explains, Πάντα τοις τοιούτοις, each man's own will.
14 I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: (\(\text{wv} \)) yet to him who accounteth any thing to be unclean, to that \(\text{manner} \) it is unclean.

33 Perhaps some of the more sensible Jews abstained from drinks prepared by the heathens, thinking them impure. Or the expression may be proverbial, signifying that the kingdom of God, that is, true religion, does not consist in the observation of any ceremony whatever. The apostle explains that the commandment more fully, 1 Cor. viii. 8. For meat commendeth us not to God: for neither if we eat, do we abound; neither if we eat not, are we defen-

CHAPTER XV.

N. B.—For an account of the first seven verses of this chapter, see the last part of the Illustration prefixed to Chap. xiv. p. 125.

The apostle, in the seventh verse of this chapter, having exhorted the Jewish and Gentile Christians at Rome to a cordial union, from the consideration that Christ had received honours in his church, naturally turns his thoughts to an objection which might be made to this doctrine; namely, that if Christ had meant to receive the Gentiles, he would have preached to them himself. To this the apostle replied, that Jesus Christ was born a Jew, and preached to the Jews only, because thereby, in the end, he most effectually accomplished God's promises to the forefathers, and the blessing of the nations. He is the root and foundation of all things. Farther, because the Jews were unwilling to be united with the Gentiles in one church, the apostle quoted various passages from their own prophets, foretelling that the Gentiles in future times would be Messiah's subjects, and join the Jews in worshipping the true God, ver. 9, 10, 11, 12. Wherefore, God having determined from the beginning to make the Gentiles his people, the Jewish believers were bound to acknowledge such of them as were converted for their brethren, and fellow-heirs of the promises of God, notwithstanding they did not obey the law of Moses. And having thus established the title of the Gentiles to all the privileges of the people of God, at the Gospel dispensation, the apostle prayed that God would fill them with all joy and peace, through the firm belief of their title to these great blessings, ver. 13.

Both the doctrinal and practical part of this epistle being now finished, the apostle makes a very handsome apology to the Romans, for writing so long a letter to persuade them to become members of his church. He had told them that having a good opinion of their virtue and knowledge, ver. 14.—he had, on that account, written to them with the more freedom, to bring things to their reconsideration. And that he had done this likewise, because he was both qualified and authorized to teach them, by virtue of the apostolical office which God had conferred on him, for the purpose of converting the Gentiles, ver. 15, 16.—Then, to prove his apostleship to the Romans, he told them that he had good reason to boast of his success in converting the Gentiles, and in presenting them to God as an acceptable offering, ver. 17.—But that in this his boasting he would speak, not of the things which Christ had wrought by others to make the Gentiles obedient, but of the success which he himself had had in converting them by his own preaching and miracles, ver. 16, 19.—Moreover, to give the Romans a just idea of his character and ministry, he informed them that he had always made it a rule, not to preach the gospel where it had been preached before, lest he might have appeared an inferior workman, who builds on a foundation laid by another; but that he had gone to the most ignorant and barbarous nations, that the prophecies concerning the conversion of the Gentiles might be fulfilled, ver. 20, 21.—And that his resolution of not preaching where the gospel had been preached before, was the reason of his not visiting Rome hitherto, ver. 22.—But now, having no more opportunity of that sort in the parts from Jerusalem to Illyricum, and having long had a desire to see the Romans, he would certainly come to them in his way to Spain, ver. 23, 24.—At present he was going to Jerusalem with the collections which he had made for the poor of the brethren in Judea, ver. 25, 26, 27.—But when that service was finished, he would come to Rome, ver. 28, 29.—In the mean time, he earnestly begged their prayers, that he might be delivered from the disobedient in Judea; and that the service he was performing to the Gentile brethren in Jerusalem should be speedily finished, ver. 30.—Lastly, because there had been great disensions among the Romans about the method of justification, and about the obligation of the law of Moses, he wished the God of peace to be with them all, ver. 33; thus adapting his apostolical benediction to their particular circumstances.

may hurt them as little as possible; and should not proceed ourselves only in what we do.

2. [101. 93.] Whereas, let every one of us please his neighbour in good will, for the sake of edification.

3. For even Christ pleased not himself, but as it is written, (Psalm 110: 9.) The reproaches of them which reproached thee, have fallen on me.

4. [104. 95.] But whatever things were before written, were written for our instruction, that through the patience and consolation of the scriptures, we might have hope.

5. Now may the God of patience and consolation grant you to have the same dispositions towards one another, according to Christ Jesus;

6. That unaniomously with one mouth ye may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7. For wherefore receive ye one another, even as Christ also hath received you, to the glory of God.

8. Now I affirm, that Jesus Christ became a minister of the circumcision, an account of the truth of God, in order that by converting the Jews, and sending them to preach to the Gentiles, he might accomplish the promises made to the fathers.

9. And that the Gentiles might praise God on account of mercy; as it is written, (Psalm 81: 40.) For this cause I will glorify thee among the Gentiles, and sing thy name.

Ver. 1. We then, who are able men, ought to bear the weaknesses of the unable. This is a literal translation of the passage, not different in sense from the common version; it marks more distinctly the apostle's allusion to the custom of travellers. Ver. 2. Now, when any of their company falls sick or lame, support him, till they bring him to some convenient resting place.

Ver. 3. For even Christ pleased not himself, but as it is written, (Psalm 110: 9.) The reproaches of them which reproached thee, have fallen on me. Ver. 4. But as it is written, (Romans 15: 4.) The reproaches of them which reproached thee, have fallen on me. That this psalm is here alluded to, we learn from the evangelist John, who affirms, (chap. xii. 39.) that they did not please one another, as the word of God unto the cross, was a fulfillment of the 2d verse of this psalm. In like manner, ver. 5. The soul of thine house hast eaten me up, was applied to Jesus by the disciples, (Luke 22: 19.) Paul therefore hath rightly interpreted the word of God, that a sufficient number of them receiving it, might preach it to the Gentiles, and by the preaching of the one thing, the whole thing of God's promises to the fathers, concerning the blessing of the nations in Abraham's seed, might be performed by the conversion of the Jews and Gentiles; and, in all his transactions, he was a true Israelite, and a faithful servant of God.

Ver. 6. And that the Gentiles might praise God on account of mercy; as it is written, (Psalm 81: 40.) For this cause I will glorify thee among the Gentiles, and sing thy name. Ver. 7. Wherefore receive ye one another, even as Christ also hath received you, to the glory of God. As to this, the exhortation had no relation to their holding church communion with one another, because there were no such assemblages among the Romans at this time. But the exhortation was to receive one another, in order that, by converting the Jews, and sending them to preach to the Gentiles, he might accomplish the promises made to the fathers.

Ver. 8. And that the Gentiles might praise God on account of mercy; as it is written, (Psalm 81: 40.) For this cause I will glorify thee among the Gentiles, and sing thy name.

Ver. 9. But whatever things were before written, were written for our instruction, that through the patience and consolation of the scriptures, we might have hope.

Ver. 10. Now may the God of patience and consolation grant you to have the same dispositions towards one another, according to Christ Jesus; that unaniomously with one mouth ye may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; for his love to man.
And again, "Moses saith, Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people." (Deut. xxxii. 43.)

11 And again, "O praise the Lord, all ye nations; praise him, all ye people." Praise the Lord, because ye enjoy the privileges of the gospel along with the Jews, whereby his 'merciful kindness is great towards us.'

12 And again, Isaiah saith, chap. xi. 10. 'In that day shall the root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; and to him the Gentiles shall seek for protection, government, and salvation.' And his root shall be called God's right hand.

13 Now may the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, in order that ye may abound (ver. 11.) in that hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost, through the power of the Holy Ghost conferring on you gifts, and filling you with good dispositions.

14 However, my brethren, though I have given both instruction and reproof, I have not a more opinion either of your knowledge or virtue. For even I myself am persuaded concerning you, that, in general, ye are full of goodness, being filled with all knowledge, able also to instruct one another.

15 But I have written the more boldly to you, brethren, partly as calling things to your remembrance, in which I am Qualified through the grace which is given me of God.

16 In order to my being a minister of Jesus Christ (w. 4.) among the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that there might be an offering of the Gentiles, most acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

17 I have therefore boasted through Christ Jesus, (sup. not.) WITH RESPECT TO things pertaining to God.

18 (Verse 96.) But I will not dare to speak anything of what Christ hath not wrought, but of what he hath wrought by me, in order to the obedience of the Gentiles in word and deed, mention that Moses hath prophesied of Christ under the name of David, chap. ii. 6.

Ver. 10. And again he saith, Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people;—the apostle's design, in this part of his letter, being so to make the Jewish and Gentile convert to a cordial union in the public worship of God, as it was of great importance to shew the Jews that this conversion was not only consistent with, but a part of the work which the apostle laboured to effect for that purpose in Deut. xxxii. 43. where our translators have supplied the word with, as the apostle likewise hath done. But though the sense be not the same, the word is not included, and no mention is there made in the Greek, from which the idea is derived. The apostle, instead of 'Praise his people, ye nations,' saith, 'Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people,' for the sake of making the Jews happy, unless they acknowledged and worshipped the same God with them.

Ver. 11. Praise the Lord.—The original word, εὐχαριστεῖν, signifies to praise by singing. Luke ii. 20.

Ver. 12. The root of Jesse shall be (בְּרֵׁשֵׁהוֹנָה בֶּרֶשֶׁת, see Ex. lv. 27.), and he who standeth up to rule the Gentiles shall be.—This clause in the Hebrew runs thus: "There shall be the root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people." But the apostle hath adopted the LXX. translation, because it represents the prophet's meaning with sufficient exactness. For as soldiers in marching and fighting, the standard of their prince, a standard may be put metaphorically for a prince or ruler. The meaning of the prophecy is, 'At the proper time the root of Jesse shall revive, and he who standeth up to rule the Gentiles shall spring from it.'—In allusion to this prophecy our Lord calls himself, Rev. v. 6. 'The root of David;' and in that description of the root and offspring of David, to which he is the life and strength of the family of David as well as its offspring; that family being raised and preserved for the sole purpose of giving birth to the Messiah.

2. In and him the Gentiles shall hope.—In Isaiah it is, 'And to it the Gentiles shall seek;' but the meaning of both expressions is the same. For in Scripture, to seek a person or thing, is looking with hoping in, or trusting to that person or thing. See Job 8. 3.14.

Ver. 14. Even I myself am persuaded concerning you, that yourselves also are full of goodness, &c. This apology for writing to a church which the apostle knew so well, is not only the more necessary, that in this letter he had opposed some of their strongest prejudices, and had rebuked them for certain irregularities in their conduct. But he was entitled to instruct and signify to them, by virtue of his apostolic office, ver. 15. The truth of which had been confirmed by miracles, ver. 16. 17. But the Gentiles had been confirmed by the miracles he had wrought among them, and by the gifts of the Spirit he had communicated to his converts in all the gentile countries, from Jerusalem round about as far as Illyricum, ver. 19.

Ver. 15. I have written the more boldly to you, brethren, partly as calling things to your remembrance, in which I am qualified through the grace which is given me of God. But this writing was not a sin-offering, but a free-will offering; for the apostle nowhere speaks of his offering sin-offerings.

3. Being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.—According to the law, the sacrifices were sanctified, or made acceptable to God, and were laid and laid on the altar by the priest. Matt. xxiii. 19. Mark ix. 49. But the Gentiles converted from idolatry to the worship of the true God, through the apostle's labours, were offered by him to God as a free-will offering; and were sanctified, or made acceptable to God, by the sacrifice of the Messiah, which was offered by the apostle on their behalf. By these gifts the Gentiles were strongly confirmed in the faith of the gospel, and cleansed from their former impurities. This is the privilege of the apostolic office, and a sanctification of the offering, which was far more excellent, effective, and acceptable, than the sanctification and offering of the sacrifices of beasts prescribed in the law.

Ver. 17. I have therefore boasted through Christ Jesus, with respect to things pertaining to God, the public minister of the Gentiles, speaking of his apostolic office. We have the phrase, εὐχαριστεῖν τῷ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ, 'things pertaining to God.' In the same sense, Heb. v. 1. The apostle had reason to boast of his labours in the gospel, both in giving them to the Gentiles, and thereby the truth of his priesthood was put beyond all doubt, and his zeal for the interest of his Master was highly gratified.

Ver. 18. Speak any thing but what is right, but of what he hath wrought by me.—The words 'but of what he hath wrought by me' are supplied by Psal. cx. 9, 10, and immediately necessary for the connexion of the sense. See Gen. Proc. p. 10. note. The apostle would not speak of
ROMANS.

19 By the power of signs and wonders, and by the power of the Spirit of God, so that from Jerusalem and round about as far as Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 And it became me thus earnestly to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, that I might not build on another's foundation.

21 But as it is written, (Isa. iii. 15.), They shall see to whom nothing hath been told concerning him, and they who have not heard, shall understand, and those who have heard, shall not understand.

22 For which reason also I have been oftentimes hindered from coming to you.

23 But now, having no more place in these parts, and having for many years a strong desire to come to you,

24 Wherefore, when I go towards Spain, I will come to you: for in my journey I hope to see you, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, when I shall first in some measure be filled with your company.

25 But now I go to Jerusalem, ministering as the buckler.

26 For Macedonia and Achaia have been pleased to make some contribution for the poor of the saints who are in Jerusalem.

27 They have been pleased, (v.s. 44.), zealously, and their deputies also are: for, if the Gentiles have partaken of their spiritual things, they ought (v.s. 318.) certainly to minister to them in carnal things.

28 Wherefore, having finished this affair, what Christ had not wrought by him, but by his disciples, for making the Gentiles obedient; though he might have claimed some praise also from their success. But he would speak only of what Christ had wrought by him personally, namely, that he had preached the gospel with the greatest success, from Jerusalem, and round about, to all the Gentile countries, as far as Illyricum. Many samples of whole clauses omitted, which must be supplied, as Rom. v. 1.

29 Ver. 19.—I. By the power of signs and wonders. It hath been thought that the supernatural works performed by our Lord and his apostles were performed by different names, to mark them by which they were performed. That such of them as were intended for the public to experience the truth of any doctrine asserted, or messages from heaven by the miracle worker, were called evphos, signs, Mark xvi. 20.—That such of them as were intended to astonish and terrify, and draw attention of the beholders, were called ravnos, wonders. Of this sort was the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira with death, and of Elymas with blindness.—In the gospel the miracles of Christ are commonly termed ἀγάθη ἔργα, mighty works, Mark vi. 3. 6. 14. to express the great power exerted in the performance of them.

30 And by the power of the Spirit of God. This being different from the power of signs and wonders, mentioned in the foregoing clause, most signify the gifts of the Spirit, called, Heb. ii. 4. 'Distributions of the Holy Ghost.' These were,—the word of wisdom, the word of knowledge, faith, prophecy, utterance, the discernment of spirits, the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues—all which are generally distinguished from miracles.

31 In so much that from Jerusalem, and round about as far as Illyricum, Illyricum was a country in Europe, lying between Paelonias and the Adriatic Sea. It is now called Illyria. In the History of the Acts there is no mention made of Paul's preaching the gospel in Illyricum. Nevertheless, as that country on the south bordered on Macedonia, where Paul often preached, he may, on some occasion or other, have gone from Macedonia into Illyricum. Yet in any composition is not necessary, as the apostle does not say he preached the gospel in Illyricum, but only 'as far as Illyricum.' This shows how much thought there was for the churches in the two provinces; that at the time the apostle wrote this letter, Illyricum was the boundary of his preaching westward; and that he propagated the gospel, not in a direct line from Jerusalem to Illyricum, but little by little, and wide on every hand, through the intercessions. That the gospel was at length preached in Illyricum, appears from Titus ii. 9. 10. 12. where Titus was to be sent to the churches which were there, and especially those which were in Illyricum.

32 I have fully preached the gospel, or fully declared it. So the word is used by calling the apostle's mission a full gospel. He did not destroy the law and the prophets, but (ἀξιοῖς) fully to declare, or explain them.—2 Tim. iv. 7. 'That by me the preaching of the gospel.
and having sealed to them this fruit, I will go from hence by you into Spain.

39 And I know that when I come to you, I shall come (w) with the fulness of the blessing (33.) of the gospel of Christ.

40 Now I beseech you, brethren, by the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me by prayers for me to God;

31 That I may be delivered from the disobedient in Judea; and that my service, which I am performing to the saints in Jerusalem, may be acceptable to you;

32 That in joy I may come to you through the will of God, and may with you be refreshed.

33 Now, may the God of peace (see the illustration) as with you all. Amen.

Verse 39. The apostle declared the true nature of both, and shewed the great excellency of the one above the other: Money procures conveniences only for the flesh; but the gospel improves the spirit, and this is for a blessed immortality.

Ver. 39. And having sealed to them this fruit.—La Clara thinks, seal here signifies to send; others think it signifies to write; because it was the custom to secure with seals such things as were sent to persons at a distance. The fruit of which the apostle speaks, may be either of his public ministrations, or of the good will of the Gentiles towards the Jews, or of the efficacy of the faith of the Gentiles to lead them to works of charity; or it may be all these jointly; because, when duly attended to, these things must have had a very powerful influence in reconciling the Jewish to the Gentile believers. The apostle's chief design in making the collections, was to produce this happy union of the Jews with the Gentiles. See 2 Cor. ix. 14. note. And therefore he earnestly desired that his service in that matter might be acceptable to the Jews.

Ver. 39. I shall come with the fulness of the blessing of the gospel.—See Rev. iv. 35. If the application in the commentary is not admitted, 'the blessing of the gospel' may be the gospel doctrine.

Ver. 40. I beseech you, brethren.—The parables mentioned in the commentary, 'the love of the Spirit' may signify that mutual love which the Spirit diffuses through the hearts of the faithful, and by which he binds them together, called, 'The fellowship of the Spirit.' Phil. ii. 1. 2.

Ver. 40. By the prayers for me to God.—The word translated strive together, comes from a word which signifies the greatest strength and agility, such as the combatants in the games were wont to use. The apostle had got notice of Paul's success in converting the Gentiles, to whom he preached salvation without requiring them to obey the law of Moses. And being thereby informed that he taught all the Jews which were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses; acc. Acts xxii. 21, they were exceedingly enraged against him. Of this the apostle being well apprized, was much afraid of them; and therefore, in the most earnest and importunate manner, he besought the continued prayers of the brethren at Rome, that he might be kept out of the hands of the disobedient to Christ. The apostle knew that his service in making the collections might be well received by the saints there.

Ver. 40. That in joy I may come to you.—As the apostle proposed to visit the Romans, after bringing the collections there, he earnestly wished that such service might be acceptable to the brethren there; because, if it was well received, it would produce that happy union of the Jews with the Gentiles, which he had so much at heart to accomplish, and make him come to Rome in great joy. But how much the apostle's design was defeated, and in what disadvantageous circumstances he came to Rome, the history of the Acts informs us. The unbelieving Jews in Palestine found him, and raised a tumult against him, and would have killed him outright, if the Roman soldiers had not rescued him out of their hands. The multis tantes having thus failed in their attempt, the chief priests and elders, who set them on, stood forth next, and accused Paul before the governor, Felix and Festus, who more than once tried him for his life. And although in these different trials his innocence clearly appeared, yet, in regard his accusers were the chief men of the nation, he feared their influence would have greater weight with his judges, than the consideration of his innocence. And therefore, when Festus delayed pronouncing sentence, and proposed a new hearing of the cause at Jerusalem, the apostle found himself under the necessity of appealing to the emperor; which, as a Roman citizen, he was entitled to do. The consequence of all this was, that instead of visiting the church at Rome in joy, as he proposed, on account of the reconciliation of the Jewish with the Gentile believers, he was sent thither bound with a chain, as a delictor.

CHAPTER XVI.

Peñas, a deaconess of the church at Cenchreae, having occasion to go to Rome about some important affairs, the apostle earnestly recommended her to the good offices of the Roman brethren, ver. 2. To this recommendation she subjoined salutations to a number of persons by name, members of the church at Rome, with whom it seems she was acquainted, ver. 3-18.

The names of the persons saluted shew them to have been Greeks, or of Greek extraction. We may therefore conjecture that they had settled themselves in Rome for the sake of commerce, or of exercising their particular trades. But being afterwards banished by the emperor Claudius, under the denomination of Jews, they had retired, some of them into Greece, others into the Lesser Asia, and others into Judea, where it is supposed they became known to the apostle Paul, in the course of his travels. There, ministering to the Gentile churches, he was called by the apostle his kinsmen, either because they were his relations, or because they were of the same nation with himself, and who, during their banishment from Rome, or perhaps before it, had been converted to Christianity. These, with many others, returned to Rome on the death of Claudius, and re-established the church there in its former lustre, as was formerly observed in the preface to this epistle, p. 51.

The apostles affirm, that at the time the apostle wrote this letter, St. Peter was in Rome, exercising the office of Bishop in the church there. But if Peter had been in Rome when this epistle was written, Paul probably would have known it; in which case, he would not have omitted him in the salutations, and have mentioned so many others of inferior note.—The apostle's saluting so many members of the church at Rome, and not mentioning the rest, who were not personally known to him. By saluting all his acquaintance in Rome, the apostle proposed to make himself known to the Roman brethren, through the accounts which he knew his acquaintance would give of his apostolical character and gifts, and of his success in converting the Gentile churches. The Roman brethren were thus called to be well informed concerning these matters, because the knowledge of them was necessary to give his letter its full effect with those who might read it.—From the characters which the apostle hath given of the persons he saluted, we learn that some of them were remarkable for their station and education, and all of them for their virtues. Wherefore, the accounts which they gave of the apostle's character and endowments, and success in preaching, must have had great weight in establishing his authority among the brethren at Rome, and in drawing their attention to the things written in this epistle.

Concerning the salutations in the apostolic epistles it is proper to remark, in general, that they were of great benefit to the persons saluted. For being sent to individuals, in letters addressed to the churches of which they were members, such public testimonies of the apostle's character and endowments were a great encouragement to the believers, but confirmed them in the faith, and encouraged them to bear with patience the evils attending the profession of the gospel. And to us, these salutations are an example of the love which we owe to the sincere disciples of Christ,

XVI.—1 I recommend to you Phoebe our sister, who is a deaconess.* of the church which is in Cenchreae. 7 That ye may receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, (65.) and assist her in whatsoever business she may have need of you: for indeed she hath been a helper of many,-and of myself also.

3 Salute Priscilla and Aquila, my fellow-labourers in Christ Jesus.

Ver. I.—1 I recommend to you Phoebe.—Bengelius thinks the Gentiles, after their conversion, retained their names, though taken from the heathen deities, because it put them in mind of their former gods.

2 Our sister.—The apostle calls Prisca his sister, because she was a Christian. The epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, which the disciples of Christ gave to one another in the first age, were founded on their being the children of God by faith, consequently the brethren were called brethren in the gospel, and thereby their names were written by public authority: according to Matt. xxv. 30. "Whenever shall the will of my Father, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.

3 Who is a deaconess of the church.—Cornelius Nepos, in the preface to his history, speaking of the manners of the Greeks, informs us, that it was not customary with them to have free access to the company of women of virtue, unless they were related to them. Their words are: περιοχες ουν ακριβως μοριους συν δεκαρε, quae apud illas turpia poterant. Quem enim Romanorum, puteus luxurae iunctus, salutem non excitat, nisi cum extra aequa parte sedem, quam vires telluris habet, habet. In devotionibus aberant, sicut in legatis, quos olim etiam with some of the state, the characters which were appointed to teach them. Accordingly we learn from the New Testament, and from the most ancient Christian writers, that the deaconesses of the church were not only women who were appointed to teach them. Accordingly we learn from the New Testament, and from the most ancient Christian writers, that the deaconesses of the church were not only women who were appointed to teach them, but were also women, remarkable for their knowledge, prudence, and piety, and of a fit age, were chosen to instruct the newly converted and the young of their own sex, and to clothe the sick, and comfort the afflicted, who could not attend the public ministrations. These female teachers are mentioned under the application of woe, 1 Tim. v. 11, where also, ver. 9, their character and election are described. Further, as the first Christians were remarkable for their love to each other, they appointed in every church men in whom they gave the appellation deaconesses, whose office was to make collections for the poor, and to apply these collections in relieving widows and orphans who were dependent on the church, and to comfort its members, who visited and comforted with the greatest tenderness. See Rom. xii. The deacons were, however, those women whom they named deaconesses, to perform the same offices to the distressed of their own sex, and whom they provided for them with money out of the church's funds. The character and office of these female deacons the apostle has described, 1 Tim. v. 9, and ver. 10, orders the widows, or female preachers, to be chosen from among them. The deaconesses is also described, 1 Cor. iii. 11. and in the Apostolic constitutions, lib. iii. c. 15. ἡ δεaconissa, πολλα φυλασσων, ἐν τοις ἅγιοις, ἀνήγαρ δεσκοτος τῆς εὐαγγελιστῆς, δια τὴν θλισσαίον τῆς ἡγεμονίας τῆς ζωῆς τους. Ignatius likewise, in his epistle Ad Adelphos, No. xii. 2. says, τῶν ἄγαντων ἐκκλησιῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἐν Χριστίνας. Phiny too, in his famous letter to the emperor Trajan, mentions them: "I have not been able to find them, that they were deaconesses. In concerning the Christians, he had put two maid servants to the torture, who were called among the Christians ἡ γεμόνων, that is, the deaconesses. But the apostle was so founded on their being the children of God by faith, consequently the brethren were called brethren in the gospel, and thereby their names were written by public authority: according to Matt. xxv. 30. "Whenever shall the will of my Father, which is the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.

4. These persons for my life laid down their own necks; to whom not I only gave thanks, but even all the churches of the Gentiles.

5. Likewise I SALUTE the church which is in their house.

6. Salute Epaphras my beloved, who was in the first place of Achaia in Christ.

7. Salute Mary, who laboured much with me, and was in Christ before me.

8. Salute Amplias, my beloved in the Lord.

10. Salute Apelles, the approved in Christ.

11. Salute Herodion my kinsman. Salute those of the family of Narcissus who are in the Lord.

13. Salute Rufus, the chosen in the Lord, and his wife who is the mother both of him and of me.

4. These excellent persons to save my life exposed themselves to death; to whom therefore, not I only am thankful, but even all the churches of the Gentiles, who consider themselves as indebted to them, for preserving the life of their apostle and spiritual father.

5. Likewise, with health to the members of the church which is in their house. Salute Epaphras, whom I dearly love because he is the first in the province of Achaia.

6. Salute Mary, whom I undervest so great fidelity in spreading the gospel along with us.

7. Salute Andronicus and Junias my kinsmen, and former prisoners, who are of note among the apostles, and were in Christ before me.

8. Salute Amplias, whom I dearly love on account of his sincere attachment to Christ.

9. Salute Urbanus, who assisted me in preaching Christ; and Stachys, whom I sincerely love on account of the goodness of his disposition

10. Salute Apelles, who, by sustaining many persecutions, hath himself confirmed himself a Christian.

11. Salute in my name, Herodion my kinsman. Salute those members of the family of Narcissus who are converted to Christianity.

12. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, women who employ themselves in maintaining the cause of Christ at Rome. Salute Persis, the beloved of all who know her, and who hath laboured much in forwarding the cause of Christ.

13. Salute Rufus, who is a most excellent Christian; and do the same to her who is his mother, and because of her affection to me, my mother also.

18 For such teachers, whatever they may pretend, do not serve our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own lusts; and by plausible discourse cause the feebleness of some to be brought down, who by reason of their unrighteousness have no part with the truth. 19 Now your obedience is reported to all men. Therefore I rejoice on your account; however, I wish you to be wise, as we have written, with respect to good, and pure with respect to evil. 20 For the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

CHAP. XVI.

16 In my name salute Philemon and Julia, Nereus and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints who are with them.

17 Grace be with you, brethren, mark! those who make separations and occasions of falling contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them.

18 For they who are such do not serve our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words, and blessings, deceive the ignorant, as we have written.

19 Now your obedience is reported to all men. Therefore I rejoice on your account; however, I wish you to be wise, as we have written, with respect to good, and pure with respect to evil. 20 For the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.
31 Timothy, my fellow-labourer, 1 and Lucius, 2 and Jason, 3 and Sosipater, my brethren, salute you.

21 I Tertius, 4 who wrote this letter from the apostle's autograph, am permitted by him to salute you as the disciples of Christ.

22 Gaius, with whom I lodge, and who shows hospitality to all the members of the church here, wishes you health. So doest Erastus, the chamberlain of Corinth, and Quartus, one of your own church, who at present is with me.

23 Lovingly, affectionately, I give you my apostolic benediction a second time. (See ver. 30.) The favour of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

24 Now to him who is able to establish you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, kept secret in the times of the ages,

25 (But is now made manifest, and, by the commandment of the eternal God in the prophetic writings, is made known to all the Gentiles, in order to the obedience of faith);

26 To the wise alone, 1 through Jesus Christ, 2 I say, to him 3 the glory for ever. Amen.

21 Timothy, my assistant in the ministry, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my brethren, salute you.

22 I Tertius, who wrote this letter from the apostle's autograph, am permitted by him to salute you as the disciples of Christ.

23 Gaius, with whom I lodge, and who shows hospitality to all the members of the church here, wishes you health. So doest Erastus, the chamberlain of Corinth, and Quartus, one of your own church, who at present is with me.

24 Lovingly, affectionately, I give you my apostolic benediction a second time. (See ver. 30.) The favour of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

25 Now to him who is able to establish you in the belief, that by faith alone is the law to be void, shall be be nullified, according to my gospel and the preaching concerning Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which, though contained in the covenant with Abraham, was kept secret in the time of the Mosaic dispensation,

26 (But is now fully published to the world, by the preaching of the gospel; and, according to the commandment of the eternal and unchangeable God, contained in the prophetic writings of the Jews, is made known to all the Gentiles, in order to produce in them the obedience of faith).

27 To the wise alone, who possesses all perfection in and of himself, through the illumination of Jesus Christ, I say with understanding, to him be the glory of the salvation of the world ascribed for ever. And for the truth of all that I have written, I appeal to God, by saying Amen to the whole.
I. CORINTHIANS.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—Of the time of St. Paul’s arrival at Corinth.

We are told, Acts xvii. 15. that after Paul was driven, by the unbelieving Jews, from Thessalonica and Berea, he went to Athens, the most celebrated city in Greece, intending to make the gospel known to the learned there. But the contempt in which the Athenian philosophers held his doctrine and manner of preaching, convincing him that it would be no purpose to stay long among them, he left Athens soon, and went to Corinth, now become the metropolis of the province of Achaia, and of equal fame for the sciences and the arts with Athens itself.

On his arrival in Corinth, he found Aquila and his wife Priscilla, two Jewish Christians, who had lately come from Italy, because Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome, Acts xviii. 2. According to the best chronologers, Claudius’s edict against the Jews was published in the eleventh year of his reign, answering to a. p. 51. Claudius began his reign on the 24th of January. Wherefore, notwithstanding his edict against the Jews might come forth early in the eleventh year of his reign, yet, as the Jews would be allowed a reasonable time to settle their affairs, and take themselves away, we cannot suppose that Aquila and Priscilla arrived at Corinth sooner than the end of the spring in the year of Christ’s death, in the year 37, and carrying on their business of tent-making, when the apostle arrived, his arrival cannot be fixed sooner than the summer of that year. This epoch of St. Paul’s arrival at Corinth merits attention, because it will be of use in fixing the dates of other occurrences, which happened both before and after that event.

Having come to Corinth, the apostle immediately preached in the synagogue. But the greatest part of the Jews opposing themselves and blaspheming, he told them he would go to the Gentiles, Acts xviii. 6. Knowing, however, the temper and learning of the Gentiles in Corinth, and their extreme profanity of manners, he was in great fear when he first preached to them, 1 Cor. ii. 2. But the Lord Jesus appeared to him in a vision, and bade him not to be afraid, but speak boldly, because he had much people in that city,” Acts xviii. 9, 10. In obedience to Christ’s command, Paul preached almost two years in Corinth, (ver. 11. 18.), and gathered a very flourishing church, in which there were some Jews of note, ver. 8. but the greatest part were idolatrous Gentiles, 1 Cor. xi. 2. The members of this church being very numerous, were so much the object of the apostle’s attention, that he wrote to them two long and excellent letters, not only for establishing them in the belief of his apostleship, which a false teacher, who came among them after his departure, had presumed to call in question, but to correct certain irregularities into which many of them had fallen in his absence, and for other purposes which shall be mentioned in Sect. iv. of this Preface.

Sect. II.—Of the Character and Manners of the Corin-thians in their heathen State.

Before Corinth was destroyed by the Romans, it was famous for the magnificence of its buildings, the extent of its commerce, and the number, the learning, and the ingenuity of its philosophers. The sciences to such perfection, that it was called by Cicero, turrit Graecia lumen, the light of all Greece; and by Florus, Gracis decus, the ornament of Greece. The lustre, however, which Corinth derived from the number and genius of its inhabitants, was tarnished by their debauched manners. Strabo, lib. viii. p. 151. tells us, that in the temple of Venus at Corinth there were more than a thousand harlots, the slaves of the temple, who, in honour of the goddess, prostituted themselves to all comers for hire, and through these the city was crowded, and became wealthy.” From an institution of this kind, which, under the pretext of religion, furnished an opportunity to the debauched to gratify their lusts, it is easy to see that corruptions, in the manners must have flowed. Accordingly it is known, that lasciviousness was carried to such a pitch in Corinth, that, in the language of these times, the appellation of a Corinthian given to a woman, imported that she was a prostitute and sensuwer, to behave as a Corinthian, spoken of a man, was the same as, Erastes, to commit whoredom.

In the latter part of the province of Achaia, there was a great wealth. From that time forth, the arts which minister to the conveniences and luxuries of life, were carried on at Corinth in such great perfection as formerly: schools were opened, in which philosophy and rhetoric were publicly taught by able masters; and strangers from all quarters crowded to Corinth, to be instructed in the sciences and in the arts. So that Corinth, during this latter period, was filled with philosophers, rhetoricians, and artists of all kinds, and abounded in wealth. These advantages, however, were counterbalanced, as before, by the effects which wealth and luxury never fail to produce. In a word, an universal corruption of manners soon prevailed; so that Corinth, in its second state, became as it had been at any former period whatever. The apostle therefore had good reason, in this epistle, to exhort the Corinthian brethren to ‘see fornication’; and after giving them a catalogue of the unrighteous who shall not inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, be was well entitled to add, ‘and such were some of you.’ In short, the Corinthians had carried vice of every kind to such a pitch, that their city was more debauched than any of the other cities of Greece.

PREFACE TO I. CORINTHIANS.

Sect. III.—Of the Conversion of the Corinthians to the Christian Faith.

After the apostle left the synagogue, he frequented the house of one Justus, a religious proselyte whom he had coveted. Here the idolatrous inhabitants of the city, prompted by curiosity, came to him from time to time, in great numbers, to hear his discourses. And having themselves seen, or having been credibly informed by others, of the miracles which Paul wrought, and of the spiritual gifts which he conferred on them who believed, they were so impressed with his discourses and miracles, that many of them renounced their ancient superstition. So Luke tells us, Acts xviii. 8. ‘And many of the Corinthians, hearing, believed, and were baptized.' Of all the miracles wrought in confirmation of the gospel, that which seems to have affected the Greeks most, was the gift of tongues. For as they esteemed eloquence more than any other human attainment, that gift, by raising the common people to an equality with the learned, greatly recommended the gospel to persons in the middle and lower ranks of life. Hence numbers of the inhabitants of Corinth, of all descriptions, were early converted. But with persons in higher stations, the gospel was not so generally successful. By their attachment to some one or other of the schemes of philosophy which then prevailed, the men of rank and learning had rendered themselves incapable, or at least unwilling, to embrace the gospel. At that time, the philosophers were not as they are now, and each sect having nothing in view but to confute the tenets of the other sects, the discourses of philosophy among the Greeks had introduced an universal skepticism, which destroyed all rational belief. This pernicious effect appeared conspicuously in their statesmen, who, through their philosophical disputations, had lost all idea of truth and virtue, regarded nothing in their politics but utility. And therefore, in the persuasion that idolatry was the only proper religion for the vulgar, they would hear nothing that had the least tendency to make the people sensible of its absurdity. On persons of this description, the arguments in behalf of the gospel, advanced by the apostle, were not acceptable to them, because they had Athenian magistrates and philosophers, before whom Paul reasoned in the most forcible manner, against the reigning idolatry, without effect. The miracles which he wrought at Corinth, in confirmation of the gospel, ought to have drawn the attention of all ranks of men in that city. But the opinion which the philosophers and statesmen entertained of their own wisdom was so great, that they despised the gospel as mere foolishness, (1 Cor. i. 23.), rejected its evidences, and remained, most of them, in their original ignorance and wickedness.

Though, as above observed, the common people at Corinth, strongly impressed by the apostle’s miracles, readily embraced the gospel, it must be acknowledged, that they did not seem at the beginning, to have been much influenced thereby either in their temper or manners. In receiving the gospel, they had been moved by vanity, rather than by the love of truth. And therefore, when they found the doctrines of the gospel contrary in many things to their most approved maxims, they neither relished them, nor the apostle’s explications of them. And as to his moral exhortations, because they were not composed according to the rules of the Grecian rhetoric, nor delivered with those tones of voice which the Greeks admired in their orators, they were not attended to by many, and had scarce any influence in restraining them from their vicious pleasures. Knowing, therefore, the number of the Greeks, that they sought wisdom, that is, a conformity to their own ideas, Paul proposed to them a new scheme of doctrine that was proposed to them, and numenaced whatever was contrary to those principles, the apostle did not, during his first abode in Corinth, attempt to explain the gospel scheme to the Corinthians in its full extent; but, after the example of his divine Master, he taught them as they were able to bear:—1 Cor. iii. 1. ‘Now I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as to fleshly men, even as to babes in Christ.' 3. Milk I gave you, and not meat: For ye were not then able to receive it. Nay, neither yet now are ye able.' contemptible, 3 Cor. x. 10. He found fault with his birth and education, 2 Cor. x. 10. He even affirmed that he was no apostle, because he had not attended Christ during his ministry on earth, and boldly said that Paul had abstained from taking maintaining, because he was conscious he was no apostle. On the other hand, to raise himself in the eyes of the Corinthians, he praised his own birth and education, boasted of his knowledge and eloquence, and laid some stress on his bodily accomplishments; by all which he gained a number of adherents, and formed a party at Corinth against the apostle. And, because there were in that party some teachers endowed with spiritual gifts, the apostle considers them also as leaders. Hence, he speaks sometimes of one leader of the faction, and sometimes of divers, as it suited the purpose of his argument.

While these things were doing at Corinth, Paul returned from Jerusalem to Ephesus, according to his promise, Acts xviii. 31. During his second abode in that city, which was of long continuance, some of the family of Tarsus, who were members of the church at Corinth and who adhered to the apostle, happening to come to Ephesus, gave him an account of the disorderly practices which many of the Corinthian brethren were following, and of the faction which the false teacher had formed among them in opposition to him, 1 Cor. 1. 11. These evils requiring a speedy remedy, the apostle immediately sent Erastus to Corinth, Acts xx. 22. 1 Cor. iv. 17., in hopes that if they did not reclaim the faction, they might at least be able to confirm the sincere. For that purpose he ordered his messengers to inform the Corinthians, that he himself was coming to them directly from Ephesus, to increase the spiritual gifts of those who adhered to him, 2 Cor. i. 15, and to punish, by his miracles, the detractors of the apostles. Such was the apostle's resolution, when he sent Timothy and Erastus away. But before he had time to put this resolution into execution, three persons arrived at Ephesus, whom the sincere part of the church had dispatched from Corinth with a letter to the apostle, wherein they expressed their attachment to him, and desired his directions concerning various matters, which had been the subject of much dispute, not only with the adherents of the false teachers, but among the sincere themselves.

The coming of these messengers, together with the extraordinary success which the apostle had about that time in converting the Ephesians, occasioned an alteration in his resolution respecting his journey to Corinth. For the time being, the apostle did not differ himself from the calumnies of the party formed by the false teacher in opposition to him, and to lessen the credit of the leaders of that party, by showing the gross errors and miscarriages into which they had fallen; and to put an end to their schism, by uniting them to the sincere part of the church—that all of them, unanimously submitting to the authority of the apostle. Thus the apostle received his doctrines and precepts as of divine authority; not those only which he had formerly delivered, but those also which he now taught in his answers to the questions which the sincere part of the church had proposed to him.

At the conclusion of this account of the epistle, it may not be improper to observe, that because the unteachable-ness of the Greeks, and their aversion to the doctrines of the gospel, proceeded from the extreme attachment to their own false philosophy and rhetoric, the apostle in different passages of this epistle was at great pains to shew the vanity of both, together with their pernicious influence in matters of religion. His reasonings on these topics, no doubt, were particularly designed for confuting the pretensions of these determinate. The time was not then arrived to us. They are still of great use in beating down those high ideas of the powers of the human mind, which some modern pretenders to philosophy are so industrious in propagating, for the purpose of persuading us that divine revelation is unnecessary in matters of religion. They are of use likewise in shewing the falsehood of those philosophical principles, whereby deceits have endeavoured to disprove the facts recorded in the gospel history. Lastly, they prove that a studied artificial rhetoric is not necessary in communicating to the world the revelations of God.

SECT. V.—Of the Time and Place of Writing the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Or the place where this epistle was written, there never has been any doubt. The mention that is made, chap. xvi. 8. of the apostle's purpose of 'remaining in Ephesus till Pentecost,' and the salvation of the churches of Asia, ver. 19. show, that this letter was written, not at Philippi, as the spurious postscript indicates, but at Ephesus, during the apostle's second abode in that city, of which we have the account, Acts xix. 1-41.

It is not so generally agreed, at what particular time of the apostle's absode in Ephesus this letter was written. Mill, in his Prefaces, No. 9, says it was written after the riot of Demetrius, because the apostle's fighting with wild beasts at Ephesus is mentioned in it, chap. xv. 32, which he thinks happened during that riot. But Paul did not then go into the theatre, being restrained by the disciples, and by some of the Asiarchs who were his friends, Acts xix. 30, 31. His fighting with wild beasts, therefore, at Ephesus, must have happened in some previous tumult, of which there is no mention in the history of the Acts.—That the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written a little while before the riot of Demetrius and the craftsman, appears to me probable from two circumstances: The first is, the apostle told the Corinthians, chap. xvi. 8, 9, that he resolved to abide in Ephesus till Pentecost, on account of the great success with which he was then preaching the gospel. The second circumstance is, that Demetrius, in his speech to the craftsman, mentioned the much people whom Paul had turned from the worship of idols, as a recent event; and by showing that Paul's doctrine, concerning the gods who are made with the hands of men, effectually put an end to their occupation and wealth, he excited the craftsmen to make the riot to prevent any return to that employment. I conclude that the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written a little while before the riot. For if it had been written after the riot, the apostle could not have said, 'I will abide at Ephesus till Pentecost.'

On supposition that the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written a little while before the riot of Demetrius, the date may be fixed by the mention of the expenses for the beginning of the year 57, in the following manner: The apostle, as has been shewn, Sect. 1. came to Corinth, the first time, about the beginning of summer in the year 51. On that occasion he abode near two years, Acts xviii. 11. 12.; then set out by sea for Syria, with an intention to celebrate the ensuing feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem, ver. 21. This was the Pentecost which happened in the year 53. Having celebrated that feast, he went immediately to Antioch; and after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, ver. 23, 24. and passing through the upper coasts, he came to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1. In this journey, I suppose he spent a year and four months. The expenses for the first two years of the apostle's ministry, and the expenses for the second year of the apostle's ministry, will make the apostle's second arrival at Ephesus to have happened in the autumn of 54. At Ephesus he abode two years and three months; at the end of which the riot of Demetrius happened. These, added to the autumn of 54, bring us to the end of the year 56, or the beginning of the year 57, as the date of the riot, and of the apostle's First Epistle to the Corinthians. Accordingly Pearson places it in the year 57; and Mill more particularly in the beginning of that year; because it is said, chap. v. 7. 'For Christ our passover is sacrificed for us; 8. Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, &c.'

Further, the apostle, a while before the riot of Demetrius, speaking of his going to Jerusalem with the collections, said, Acts xix. 31. 'After I have been there I must also see Rome.' From this Lightfoot very well conjectures, that Claudius was then dead, and that the news of his death, which happened October 13, a. d. 54, had reached Ephesus; because, if he had been alive, and his edict in force, St. Paul would not have thought of going to Rome. I add, that before he took such a resolution, he must have known that Nero was well affected to the Jews, and that the Christians were re-established at Rome. But as some months must have passed before Nero discovered his sentiments respecting the Jews, and before the church was actually re-established in the city, the apostle could not well be informed of these things before the spring of the year 56, that is, about 15 months after Claudius's death.

Sect. VI.—Of the Messengers by whom the First Epistle to the Corinthians was sent, and of the Success of that Epistle.

At the time the apostle wrote this letter he was in great distress, 2 Cor. ii. 4., being afraid that the faction would pay no regard to it. And therefore, instead of sending it by the messengers who had come from Corinth, he sent it by Titus, 2 Cor. vii. 7, 8, 13. 15. that his presence and exhortations might give it the more effect. And as it contained directions concerning the collections for the saints, chap. xvi. the apostle desired Titus to urge the sincere among the Corinthians to begin that good work, 2 Cor. vii. 6. With Titus the apostle sent another brother, 1 Cor. xii. 18., probably an Ephesian, whose name is not mentioned, but who no doubt was a person of reputation, seeing he was appointed to assist Titus in healing the divisions which had rent the Corinthian church. And that they might have time to execute their commission, and return to the apostle at Ephesus, he resolved to remain there till the ensuing Pentecost. It seems he did not think it prudent to go himself to Corinth, till he knew the success of his letter, and how the Corinthians stood affected towards him, after they had read and considered it.

As this letter, of which Titus was the bearer, contained the apostle's answer to the one which the Corinthians had sent to him, we may believe the messengers by whom it was sent, namely, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, 1 Cor. xvi. 17. would go along with Titus and the brethren. Be this, however, as it may, Titus and his companions, on their return to Corinth, would still press on executing their commission which they desired. For, on delivering the apostle's letter, the Corinthians received them with fear and trembling, 2 Cor. vii. 15., expressed the deepest sorrow for their miscarriages, ver. 9-11., and paid a ready obedience to all the apostle's orders, ver. 15, 16. But the news of this happy change in their temper the apostle did not receive, till leaving Ephesus he came into Macedonia, where it seems he waited till Titus arrived, and brought him such an account of the greatest part of the church at Corinth, as gave him the highest joy, 2 Cor. vii. 4, 7, 13.

Because Sothenes joined the apostle in this letter, Beza thinks he was the apostle's amanuensis in writing it. And for the same reason he supposes the Second Epistle to the Corinthians to have been written by Timothy. But all this is mere conjecture, as is plain from Beza's note on Gal. vi. 11.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in the First Chapter of this Epistle.

The teacher who came to Corinth after the apostle's departure with a view to lessen his authority among the Corinthians, boldly affirmed that he was no apostle. Whereof, to shew the falsehood of that calumny, St. Paul, after asserting his own apostleship, and giving the Corinthians his apostolical benediction, mentioned a fact well known to them all, by which his title to the apostleship was established in the clearest manner. Having communicated to the Corinthians a variety of spiritual gifts immediately after their conversion, he thanked God.
for having enriched them with every spiritual gift, at the time his preaching concerning Christ was confirmed among them, ver. 4-7. — By making the spiritual gifts with which the Corinthians were enriched, immediately on their believing, a subject of thanksgiving to God, the apostle in a delicate manner put them in mind that they had received these gifts long before the false teacher came among them; consequently, that they had received none of their spiritual gifts from him, but were indebted to the apostle himself for the whole of them; also, that they were much to blame for attaching themselves to a teacher, who had given them no proof at all, either of his doctrine or of his mission. See the View prefixed to 2 Cor. xii. verses 12, 13.

St. Paul, by thus appealing to the spiritual gifts which he had imparted to the Corinthians, having established his authority as an apostle, exhorted them, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to live in union and peace, ver. 10. — For he had heard, that, after the example of the disciples of the Greek philosophers, each of them claimed peculiar respect, on account of the supposed eminence of the person who had taught him, and attached himself to that teacher, as if he, rather than Christ, had been the author of his faith, ver. 11, 12. —But to make them sensible that Christ was their only master, the apostle asked them a question, that is, each of Christ, or rather the Church, was divided into different sects, under different masters, like the Grecian schools of philosophy; and whether any of their teachers was crucified for them; and whether they had been baptized in the name of any of them, ver. 13.

Then thanked God, since they made such a bad use of the reputations of the persons who baptized them, that he had baptized by the power of them, ver. 14, 15. And to show that they derived no advantage from the dignity of the teachers who baptized them, he told them, that he and his brethren apostles, who, in respect of their inspiration, were the chief teachers in the church, were sent by Christ, not so much to baptize, as to preach the gospel, ver. 17.

The false teacher, by introducing the Grecian philosophy and rhetoric into his discourses, had endeavoured to render them acceptable to the Corinthians, and had preferred himself to St. Paul, who, he said, was unskilful in these matters. Lest, therefore, the Corinthians should think meane of his doctrine and manner of preaching, the apostle told them, that Christ had sent him to preach the wisdom of God, and that is, with philosophical arguments expressed in flowing harmonious language, such as the Greeks used in their schools; because in that method the gospel, becoming a subject of philosophical disputation, would have lost its efficacy as a revelation from God, ver. 17. — That though the preaching of salvation through the cross appeared more foolishness to the destroyed among the heathen philosophers and Jewish scribes, yet saved from heathenism and Judaism it was found by experience to be the powerful means of their salvation, ver. 18. — That God forsook him would remove both philosophy and Judaism on account of their inefficacy, ver. 19. — And make the Greek philosophers and Jewish scribes ashamed to shew themselves, because they had darkened and corrupted, rather than enlightened and reformed the world, ver. 20. — That having thus experimentally shewn the inefficacy of philosophy, he pleased God, by the preaching of doctrines which to the philosophers appeared foolishness, to save them who believed, ver. 21. — And therefore, notwithstanding the Jews required the sign from heaven, in confirmation of the doctrines proposed to them, and the Greeks excepted every doctrine to be conformable to their philosophical principles, the apostle preached salvation through Christ crucified, which he knew was to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness, ver. 22, 23. — But to them who were called, or persuaded to believe the gospel, both Jews and Greeks, that doctrine was the powerful and wise of God, ver. 25.

—Therefore, said he, it is evident that the foolish doctrines of God have more wisdom in them than the wisest doctrines of men; and the weak instruments used by God, for accomplishing his purposes, are more effectual than the greatest exertions of human genius, ver. 25. Having thus defended both the doctrines of the gospel, and the mission and method of St. Paul, properly proceeded to shew the Corinthians the folly of boasting in their teachers, on account of their learning, their eloquence, their high birth, or their power. Look, said he, at the persons who have called you to the belief of the gospel; not many philosophers, not many warriors, not many noblemen, but many humble persons, to put shame to the learned, ver. 27. — By their success in enlightening and reforming the world, ver. 28. — That no flesh might take any honour to himself, in the matter of converting and saving mankind, ver. 29.—The whole glory being due to God; ver. 30, 31. In this light, the mean birth and low station of the first preachers of the gospel, and the weakness of that which is, with the eloquence, instead of being objections to the gospel, are a strong proof of its divine original.

New Translation.

Chap. I.—1 Paul, a called apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, and Sosthenes my brother.

2 To the church of God which is at Corinth; to the sanctified (w. 172.) under Christ Jesus; to the called; to the saints, with all in every place who call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, both their and our Lord!

Ver. 1.—A called apostle. — Because the fiction pretended to entertain doubts of Paul's apostleship, chap. 14. 1. he began this letter with telling them, that he was not, like Matthias, an apostle made by Jesus to sue for the office of his own authority, but he was called to it by Christ himself, who for that purpose appeared to him from heaven, as he went to Damascus to persecute his disciples, and, in calling him to be an apostle, Christ acted by the appointment of God. So Ananias assured Paul, Acts xxii. 14, 15. Wherefore, in respect of the manner in which Paul was made an apostle, it was more honourable than all the other apostles. See 1 Thess. i. 1. note 2.

2. A called apostle. — The reason of this was the character of a ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, mentioned as active in persecuting Paul, Acts xvii. 6. We must suppose that he was afterwards converted, and became an eminent gentleman; in order to serve a considerable influence among the Corinthians, he joined in writing this letter, for the reasons mentioned; 1 Thess. Pref. Sect. 1.

Commentary.

Chap. I.—1 Paul, a miraculously called apostle of Jesus Christ, agreeable to the will of God, and Sosthenes my fellow-labourer in the gospel.

2 To the worshippers of the true God who are in Corinth; to the separated from the heathens, by their being under Jesus Christ; to the called people of God; to those who merit the appellation of saints, because they have renounced idolatry, and have devoted themselves to serve the true God; with all, in every place, who worship our Lord Jesus Christ, who is both their and our Lord who are Jews.

Ver. 2.—I. The church of God, &c. — This is a much more august title than any used in St. Paul's epistles. It consists of the name of Gaia, shortened to Gaia, and the name of the city, Athens. — See 2 Cor. x. 4; 1 Cor. xvi. 16. The name of the city in which the Corinthians lived, and includes them all.

2 In every place. — Though this epistle was written to correct the disorderly practices of the Corinthians, it contains many general instructions, which could not fail to be of use to all the brethren in the province of Achaia likewise, and even to Christians in every place; for which reason the inscription is added, and it includes them all.

3 Call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, the interpretation of this expression we have, Acts vii. 59. — And they stoned Stephen (whence the term) calling upon Christ, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive
L CORINTHIANS.

8 May gracious dispensations be to you, with peace, temporal and eternal, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom God dispenseth these blessings.

4 In my prayers I give thanks to my God always concerning you, on account of the grace of God which was given to you, (e, 187,) through Jesus Christ:

5 That ye were enriched (a) with every gift, (see ver. 7.), by him, even with all speech, and all knowledge,

6 (Koana, 202). When the testimony of Christ was confirmed (w, 172.) among you:

7 That ye come belied in no gift, (b) waiting for the revelation: See 1 Pet. i. 7. note 2.) of our Lord Jesus Christ.

8 (Oe, 61.) He also will confirm you until the end, without accusation, in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 Faithful is God, by whom ye have been called into the fellowship (1 John i. 3. note 2.) of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

10 Now, brethren, I beseech you by the name1 of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be not (c, eγγαζόμενοι, see chap. xi. 18, note 3.) divisions among you; but that ye be compactly joined (a) in the same mind, and by the same judgment.

11 For it hath been declared to me concerning you, my brethren, by (e, 78.) some of the family of Chloe,2 that there are contentions among you.

12 And I mention this, that each of you speaketh not as the Lord Christ, but as Paul, and of Apollos, and of Cephas, and of Christ himself.

13 Is Christ's church divided into parties under different leaders!

2 Ye be compactly joined (εν ταυτί, with the same mind)--; that is, by mutual good affection: for the same mind, in the sense of the same opinion, is not to be expected in any numerous society. We have the same direction, Rom. xv. 6. thus expressed, 'the same disposition towards one another.' See also 1 Pet. iii. 8.

3 By the same (υἱοθετός) judgment. This word denotes that practical judgment which preceded volition. The meaning is, that in our deliberations we should yield to each other from mutual affection, and not by a love of contention, desiring described true friendship as cemented by the same inclinations and principles. Ideas will differ, may differ, and be recovering.

4 On account of the grace of God. [that is, on account of that grace which is the grace of God; for the following verse shows that the gifts differ according to the grace that is given to us.] See also Eph. iv. 7, 8, 1 Pet. iv. 10. That grace hath this significance.

5. 6. And all knowledge. —See 1 Cor. xii. 9. note 2. What is here said concerning the enriching of the Corinthians with all knowledge, is to be understood chiefly of the spiritual men among the Jewish converts; for most of the Gentile converts at Corinth were foolish or weak persons, and 'bebes in Christ,' chap. iii. 1, 3.

6. When the testimony of Christ. —the testimony concerning Christ. So the phrase signifies, 2 Tim. i. 8. See 1 Tim. iv. 14.

7. So that ye come belied in no gift. —The apostle speaks here not of individuals, but of the church of Corinth; as being generally true of all spiritual men, who possessed all the different spiritual gifts which common believers could enjoy. Accordingly, he asked them, 2 Cor. xii. 11, 12. And in this verse it appears that no person spoke of it, as 1 Cor. xiii. 4. I give thanks to my God: 1 Thess. v. 18. Without accusation. —The apostle in this expresses only his charitable judgment, not of individuals, but of the body of the Corinthians; and he attached himself to the head, whose authority he assumed for every individual of a church, in which there were such great disorder, would be unaccountable at the day of judgment. See 1 Thess. iv. 13. note 2.

8. 9. He also will inform you. —Or, here, is not the relative one, the head of the church, the apostle, but Christ; for the following verse shows that a person spoken of it, as 1 Cor. xiii. 4. I give thanks to my God:

10. Without accusation. —The apostle in this expresses only his charitable judgment, not of individuals, but of the body of the Corinthians; and he attached himself to the head, whose authority he assumed for every individual of a church, in which there were such great disorder, would be unaccountable at the day of judgment. See 1 Thess. iv. 13. note 2.

11. By the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. —This may signify his authority over the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, or that he stood in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. In this, as an instance that the apostle scarcely makes use of a word or expression which hath not some relation to his main purpose.
I. CORINTHIANS.

I. Chap. I.

Was Paul crucified for you to make statement for your sins? Or were ye baptized into the name of Paul, as his disciples?

14 For Christ hath not sent me to baptize, but to preach the gospel.

15 And I baptized none of you, except Crispus and Gaius;

16 And let any one who says, that into mine own name I had baptized.

17 For Christ hath not sent me to baptize, but to preach the gospel, not with wisdom of speech, or understanding, which the cross of Christ might not be revealed in its efficacy.

18 For the preaching of the cross of Christ, to the Jew is foolishness, but to us Gentiles it is the power of God.

19 (1 Cor. 2:3.) Therefore, it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and the understanding of the learned.

20 Where is wisdom? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world before it came to be. Hath God made foolish the wisdom of this world?

21 (1 Cor. 2:3.) For when, in the wisdom of God, the world through wisdom knew not God, as it is written, 18 through foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe.

22 (1 Cor. 2:6.) And although the Jews demand a sign, and the Greeks seek wisdom, and salvation. Others, by Christ, understand the ministers of Christ. Are the faithful ministers of Christ divided? Do they not all preach the same doctrine? But according to you, Christ in this passage means Christ himself: 'Is he divided?' Did one Christ send Paul, and another Apostles?

23 (1 Cor. 2:2.) For I have determined to know nothing, but Christ, and him crucified.

24 (1 Cor. 2:2.) And although the Jews demand a sign, and the Greeks seek wisdom, and salvation. Others, by Christ, understand the ministers of Christ. Are the faithful ministers of Christ divided? Do they not all preach the same doctrine? But according to you, Christ in this passage means Christ himself: 'Is he divided?' Did one Christ send Paul, and another Apostles?

25 (1 Cor. 2:2.) For I have determined to know nothing, but Christ, and him crucified.

26 (1 Cor. 2:2.) And although the Jews demand a sign, and the Greeks seek wisdom, and salvation. Others, by Christ, understand the ministers of Christ. Are the faithful ministers of Christ divided? Do they not all preach the same doctrine? But according to you, Christ in this passage means Christ himself: 'Is he divided?' Did one Christ send Paul, and another Apostles?

27 (1 Cor. 2:2.) For I have determined to know nothing, but Christ, and him crucified.
L CORINTHIANS.

23 Yet we preach Christ crucified, to the Jews, indeed, a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness:

24 But to them who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.

25 (1 Co. 2.5.) Therefore, the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men. (For a similar ellipsis, see John v. 36.)

26 For ye see the calling of you, brethren, that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble CALL YOU:

27 But the foolish ones of the world! God hath chosen to CALL YOU, that he might put to shame the wise; and the weak ones of the world God hath chosen, that he might put to shame the strong:

28 And the ignoble ones of the world, and the despised ones, God hath chosen, and these who are not, that he might bring to nought those who are:

29 That no flesh might boast in his presence.

30 Of him, (Is. 106.) therefore, ye are in Christ Jesus, who is become to us (v. 11) wisdom from God; righteousness also, and sanctification, and redemption:

31 So that, as it is written, (Ver. 33.) He who beareth, let him bear, in the Lord:

 doctors, 'hearing them, and asking them questions.' Others suppose the apostle meant the academicians or skeptics, who were great disputers. Jerome, on Gal. iii. thought the apostle meant natural philosophers, whom the Jews called speculatores scientiarum.

Ver. 21. The world through wisdom.—Here the word semeion, signifies, the disguisements of the learned Greeks, to which the Ruth., and secondarily the wise of this world, did not put their faith, because they did not come to Christ, by which we are told, Mark vii. 11. the Pharisees sought from our Lord himself. For as Daniel had foretold the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, to receive the kingdom, in that day Jesus expected that the Christ would make his first appearance in the clouds, and, by some great exaction of power, wrest the empire of the world from the Romans. No wonder, then, that the preaching of the Christ crucified was to the Jews a stumbling-block.

Ver. 22. We preach Christ.—The Greek word εὐαγγέλιον, Christ, is the literal translation of the Hebrew word Messiah, and both signify some announced person. Now this name was being appropriated by the Jewish prophets to the Son of God, whose coming they foretold, the Christian preachers, by applying it to their Master, declared him to be the Son of God. Of this one of the names Christ has the following are examples: John i. 43. 'How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly.' John i. 27. 'I believe thou art the Christ the Son of God, which should come.'

Ver. 25. Call you.—These words I have supplied from the first clause of the verse. Our translators have supplied the words are called, which convey a sense not true nor suitable to the apostle's design. It is not true; for even in Judas, 'among the chief rulers many believed on him,' John xii. 42. particularly Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea. Other Jews likewise of rank and learning were called; such as the nobleman whose sick son Jesus cured. Mark vii. 52. But this is not the case, who, by being baptized after embracing the gospel, Acts x. 48. And in such numerous churches as those of Antioch, Thessalonica, Corinth and Rome, it hardly be doubted that there were many called Jews, who were of the Gentile nation, and who had embraced our faith, who were called Jews. Philip, v. 25. In short, the precepts in the epistles, to masters to treat their slaves with humanity, and to women concerning their not adorning themselves with gold and silver, and costly raiment, show that many wealthy persons had embraced the gospel.—On the other hand, though it were true, 'that not many wise men, nor mighty, nor called, it did not suit the apostle's argument to mention it here. For surely God's not calling many of the wise, etc. joined with his calling the foolish ones of the world to be wise, and the despised persons of the world to be rich, is a declaration of his disdaining all philosophy, and discourse is understood of the preachers of the gospel who were employed to convert the world, all is of God, and Pal. 6. 12. The things not learned, the mighty, and the noble ones of this world to preach the gospel, but illiterate and weak men, and men of low estate, as in Gal. i. 20. It is only in a particular instance, put to shame the legislators, statesmen, and philosophers among the heathen, and the learned scribes and doctors among the Jews, who never had any thing to purpose in that matter.

The first preachers of the gospel, as Dr. Newton observes, on Prophecy, vol. i. p. 227. were chiefly a poor flock of unlearned poor and educated, of no learning or eloquence, of no reputation or authority, despised as Jews by the rest of mankind, and by the Jews as the meanest and worst of themselves. What improper instruments were these to contend with the prejudices of the world, the superstition of the people, the interests of the priests, the vanity of the philosophers, the pride of the rulers, the malice of the Jews, the learning of the Greeks, and the power of Rome? But the weaker the instruments who converted the world, the greater was the display of the power of God by which they acted. See 2 Cor. iv. 7. notes. CHAPTER II.

Because the learned Greeks had objected to the gospel, the foolishness (as they were pleased to call it) of its doctrine, and the weakness of its preacher, the apostle made answer in the foregoing chapter, that by these foolish doctrines and weak preachers a reformation had been wrought in the minds and manners of multitudes, which the boasted philosophy of the Greeks, and the eloquence of their orators, had not been able to accomplish. But this being a matter of great importance, and the faction having upheld Paul in particular with his want of eloquence, he now proceeded in this chapter to tell the Corinthians, that Christ having sent him to preach, not with the wisdom of speech, (see chap. i. 17,) he acted agreeably to his commission, when 'he came to them, not with the excellency of speech, or of wisdom,' declaring the testimony of God, ver. 1.—By thus disclaiming the Grecian philosophy and rhetoric, and by calling the gospel the testimony of God, the apostle intimated, that the credibility of the gospel depended neither on its conformity to the philosophy of the Greeks, nor on the eloquence of its preachers, but on the attestation of God, who confirmed it by miracles. And therefore, however ridiculous it might appear in their eyes, he determined to make known nothing among the Corinthians, either in his private conversations, or in his public discourses, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified for the sins of men, ver. 2.—At the same time, knowing the opinion which the learned Greeks would form of that doctrine in particular, as well as that his discourses were neither composed nor pronounced according to the rules of the Grecian rhetoric, his first addresses to them were neither composed and with pleasing ease, nor with much trembling, ver. 3.—Yet they were accompanied with the powerful demonstration of the Spirit, who enabled him to prove the things which he preached by miracles, ver. 4.—that the faith of mankind might be founded, 'not in the wisdom of men,' that method of reasoning and speaking which human wisdom dictates as best calculated to persuade, 'but in the power of God,' ver. 5.

But lest the things which are said in the preceding chapter, concerning the foolishness of the doctrines of the gospel, and in this chapter, concerning its having no relation to any of the schemes of the Greek philosophy, might have led the Corinthians to think meanly of it; the apostle told them, that, in the gospel, he and his brethren made known a scheme of doctrine which they who were perfectly instructed knew to be real wisdom. Only 'it was not the wisdom of this world; it was none of the mysteries of the idol gods worshipped by the heathens, nor any of the religions established by the heathen rulers, who are all to be made nought, ver. 6.—What they preached was 'the wisdom of the true God; a scheme of religion contrived by the true God, and made known in a real mystery. The apostle called the gospel a mystery, not because it contains doctrines absolutely unintelligible, but because being of divine original, and containing the most important discoveries, it was better entitled to the honourable appellation, than any of those which were so named. This excellent scheme of doctrine, hitherto kept secret, God determined, before the Jewish dispensation began, to publish to the world by the apostles of his Son, to their great honour; so that they are mystagogues of a mystery more excellent than the Eleusinian, or any other heathen mystery, ver. 7.—Yet when it was published, none of the rulers of this world knew it to be the wisdom of God; for if they had known it to be so, they would not have crucified the Lord, or author, 'of all the glorious things' discovered in the mystery of God's wisdom, ver. 8.—This ignorance of the rulers, the apostle observed, was occasioned by the greatness of the things contained in the mystery of God's wisdom. They were such as human reason could neither discover, nor comprehend, agreeably to Isaiah's description of them, 'Eye hath not seen,' etc. ver. 9.—These things, however, God hath revealed to us apostles by his Spirit; for the Spirit of God, who inspires us, searcheth all things, even the deep counsels of God. So that we are well qualified to discover these counsels to the world, ver. 10, 11.—Further he told them, that the apostles had not received the inspiration of evil spirits, by which the heathen priestesses, and prophets, and mystagogues were guided, but the inspiration that cometh from God, that they might know and publish the glorious things, (see ver. 9,) which are freely bestowed by the true God on them who believe, ver. 12.—Which things, said he, we apostles effectually communicate to the world, not in language tawdry, nor human rhetoric, but in words dictated by the Spirit of God; explaining spiritual things in spiritual words, ver. 13.—Nevertheless, the animal man, the man who is guided by his animal passions and notions, does not receive the things revealed by the Spirit, because they appear to him foolishness; neither can he understand them, because they must be examined spiritually—that is, they must be examined by the light which divine revelation, and not reason, affords, ver. 14.—But the spiritual man, the man who is not guided by his animal passions, and who acknowledges the authority of revelation, and is assisted by the Spirit of God, is able to examine and receive the things revealed by the Spirit. Yet he himself is examined and judged by the animal man; because no animal man can understand the principles upon which the spiritual man's belief is founded, ver. 15.—For what animal man hath understood and approved the gracious purposes of the Lord Christ, respecting the salvation of the world? or what animal man is able to instruct the spiritual man? But, added he, we apostles have the gracious purposes of Christ made known to us by the Spirit, so that we are able both to know them and to communicate them to the world, ver. 16.

CHAP. II. - 1 (Kö, 204.) Now I, brethren, when I came to you, came not (see Ver. 5) with excellency of speech, 1 (x) and of wisdom, declaring to you the testimony 2 of God.

2 For I determined to make known 3 nothing among you, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

Ver. 1.-1. Excellency of speech.—The apostle means, that nice choice and arrangement of words, that artificial rounding and disposing of sentences, and those studied tones and gestures, in which, according to the Greeks, the perfection of eloquence consisted.

2. The testimony of God—that is, the things concerning Christ which God ordered the apostles to testify; or the things which God himself attended to, that might have a proper form to perform. See Rom. iv. 25. In either sense the expression implies, that the evidence of the doctrines of the gospel is not founded on 3 And I, in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling, was with you.

4 And my discourse and my preaching were not with persuasiveness of words of human wisdom, but with the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power.

5 That your faith might not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. (See 2 Cor. iv. 6. notes.)

6 (as) However, we speak wisdom among the perfect; but not the wisdom of this world; neither is it the power of this world, who are to be made nought.

7 (Acts. 7. 78.) For we speak the wisdom of God, which was hidden in a mystery, but which God determined, before the ages, should be spoken to us in glory.

8 And the wisdom none of the rulers of this world knew: for if they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.

9 (Acts. 7. 78.) For, as it is written, (Is. xlv. 4.), These things eye hath not seen, and ear hath not heard, and into the heart of man hath not entered, which God hath prepared for them who love him.

10 proofs drawn from human reason, but on the authority of God, who hath revealed them by his Spirit, and confirmed them by miracles.

11 I determined not to discover anything new in the preaching of the Gospel, in order to the profit of the believing, which God had prepared for them who love him.

12 The Corinthians' fears and timidity, although well founded, were not consistent with that which is delivered to us in the written word. The apostle, therefore, assures them of the wisdom of God, which was hidden from the ages, and which was not discoverable by human reason.

13 For the purpose of the writing, the apostle refers to the teaching of the prophets and the Old Testament, as the source of the wisdom of the Gentile world. The knowledge of the Old Testament was imperfect; but the New Testament, which was written by God, contained the true wisdom of the world.

14 And the wisdom of the Gentile world was not comparable to the wisdom of the New Testament. The Gentile world was characterized by human reason, whereas the New Testament was characterized by the power of God, which was revealed through the Spirit.

10 (iv) But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, even the depths of God.

11 For who knoweth the mind of a man, except the spirit of man which is in him? so also the deep things of God no one knoweth, except the Spirit of God.

12 Now, we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which cometh from God, that we might know the things which are gifted to us by God.

13 Which things also we speak, not in words taught by human wisdom, but in words taught by the Holy Spirit, explaining spiritual things in spiritual words.

14 He now, an animal man, receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually examined.

15 But the spiritual man examineth, indeed, all things, yet he is examined (see chap. iv. 14) by no one.

16 For what man hath known the mind of the Lord, that will instruct him?

17 But we have the mind of Christ.

I. CORINTHIANS.

10 But, although no faculty in man could discover these things, God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, even the deep counsels of God respecting the salvation of men.

11 This ye may know, by reflecting on yourselves; for who among men knoweth the depths, the concealed thoughts and designs of a man, but God, who knoweth the heart of man? so also, the deep concealed designs of God no one knoweth, except the Spirit of God, who is conscious of the whole.

12 Now, we have received, not the inspiration of that evil spirit which agitates the heathen priests and priestesses, but the inspiration which cometh from God, that we might know fully the blessings (ver. 9) which are gifted to us and to all who believe, not by any light, but by the Spirit of God.

13 Which blessings also we declare to the world, not in the flowery language prescribed by the Greek rhetoricians, but in the unadorned language suggested to us by the Holy Spirit; explaining spiritual things in words dictated by the Spirit, because they are best adapted to express them.

14 Now, an animal man, who judges of things by his senses and passions and natural reason, believeth not the matters revealed by the Spirit of God; for they appear foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually examined; examined by the light which revelation, and not reason, affords.

15 But the spiritual man is able to examine all things, yet he cannot be examined by any animal man; because such cannot judge of the principles on which a spiritual man's belief is founded.

16 He now, an animal man, hath known the mind of the Lord, his deep counsels, (ver. 10,) so that he can instruct the spiritual man?

But we apostles have the mind of Christ, and are able to instruct him.

Abraham.

The apostle gave the application of the Lord's glory to Jesus, for the important reason mentioned in the commentary, and because the glory in which he appeared during his incarnation, was 'the glory of the only begotten of the Father;' the glory of a man even greater than that of the Son.

Ver. 9. A αις· These things eye hath not seen, &c. As the relative αας is found twice in this sentence, I think the first stands for the subject to whom the apostle wrote, 2 Cor. xii. 67., and I have translated it Clem. Alex. Strom. 5, hath here ας ας ας.

But we preach, which I take to be an explanation rather than a var. reading. The meaning of the prophet's word, as applied by the apostle, is, that those blessings which God hath prepared for them who love him, and which in the gospel he hath discovered and promised to bestow on them, are so great, that nothing like them hath ever been beheld by men, or reported to them. Nay, the mind of man, by its own powers, is not able to form the most distant idea of them.

Ver. 10. The spirit (ας) searcheth, &c. As Clerc, thinking it improper to render the Spirit's searcheth, etc., the cause, is put for knowing, the effects of searching. And therefore he would have the clause translated, knoweth the clothes of the prophet, which sense the word searcheth seems to be used, Rev. ii. 25. I am (ας) who searcheth; that is, who fully knoweth the reason and cause, as much as an animal man knoweth the cause of a thing.

2. The depths of God. These are the various parts of that grand plan, which the wisdom of God hath formed for the salvation of man, which is hidden from each, and otherwise invisible, and by operation and effect upon the system of the universe, the dignity of the Son, and of the Spirit; and which plan hath been executed, and the mystery thereof in the salvation of believers; with many other particulars, which we shall not now mention, till the light of the other world break in upon us.

Ver. 12. The spirit of the world, &c. Is that diabolical inspiration by which the heathen priests and priestesses delivered oracles, and which is here called the spirit of the world, because by these false oracles the devil ruled the heathens, termed in scripture the world, and this world.

Ver. 13.1 Words taught by the Holy Spirit. From this we learn, that as often as the apostles declared the doctrines of the gospel, they did it in words not of their own; not in their own language; which indeed is the only way in which the doctrines of the gospel could be presented to their minds. For men are so accustomed to their own ideas, and to what they see in words. Wherefore, though the language in which the apostles delivered the doctrines of the gospel, was really suggested to them by the Spirit, it was properly their own style of language. This language, in which the doctrines of the gospel were revealed to the apostles, in which they delivered these doctrines to the churches, as what St. Paul calls 'the form of sound words,' which Timothy had heard from him, and was to hold fast, 2 Tim. i. 13. Every one therefore therefor the meaning of the inspired language of scripture, in its expositions of the articles of the Christian faith.

3. The things of the world. Not things that are false, but things that are of the world. The word things means, that he expressed the Christian privileges in the very words, and phrases by which the Spirit expressed the privileges of the Christian church. And this is the nature of the Old Testament.

But if the spirit suggested these words and phrases to the Jewish prophets, why might he not suggest to the apostles the words and phrases in which they communicated the gospel revelation to the world? especially as there are many discoveries in the gospel, which could not be expressed clearly, if at all, by the words by which the prophets expressed the privileges of the Jewish church. Besides, it is evident, that when the apostles inscribed into their writings the words and phrases of the Jewish prophets, they expressed them in other words and phrases, which no doubt were suggested to them by the Holy Spirit; but the apostles' own words and phrases.

2. Explaining spiritual things. The original word τους· is rightly translated interpreting or explaining; being used by the LXX. to denote the interpretation of dreams, Gen. viii. 22. xii. 13. 15. Dan. ii. 4. v. 7. 12.

3. In spiritual words. So I translate δια· But Dr. Pearsall translates the clause, explaining spiritual things to spiritual men. This sense I acknowledge the original will bear, only it does not agree so well with the sense of the verses, where words taught by the Holy Spirit are mentioned.

Ver. 14. Now an animal man. An animal man is one who makes the faculties of his animal nature, that is, his senses, his passions, and his natural reason darkened by prejudices, the measure of all truth and the source of all errors, and paying no regard to the discoveries of revelation. Of this character were the heathen philosophers, to whom the doctrines of the gospel were foolishness, (ver. 9.) Greeks and Jews, ver. 19. called φραζέων, 'animal men, not having the Spirit,' these all rejected the gospel, because they could not explain its mysteries by their own faculties; or by the understanding of the senses.

2. Because they are spiritually examined. Vulgis, examine·mentio·rum; that is, examined by the spirit, that is, not being men of the world, and the world thus being an object of contempt, neither can they know any thing which is spiritually discerned.

Ver. 15. The spiritual man. Being opposed to the animal man, is not an inspired person, as Wady thinks, but a person whose spiritual faculties, his reason and conscience, are not biased by his animal nature, but have their due ascendancy; and who entertains a just sense of the authority of revelation, in matters pertaining to God; and being sincerely desirous to know the truth, is assisted in his inquiries by the spirit. Such a spiritual man, and he only, is able to judge properly of the things revealed by the Spirit of God.

Ver. 16. For what man hath known, &c. Τις τον θεόν πολιτικήν οικονομίαν ας· &c. As is also the reading of the LXX. from the LXX. translation of Isa. xi. 13. which runs thus: Τις τον θεόν πολιτικήν οικονομίαν ας· But the sense is the same as that of the middle clause. I think it is an application of the prophet's words to a different subject, rather than a quotation. I therefore followed Locke, who supposed that the relative ας, him, refers to the remote antecedent, and denotes, not the Lord, but the spiritual man.

1. Novum. Vetus. New. And old, the mind of the Lord; that is, the plan of the salvation of mankind, which exists in the mind of the Lord; his deep designs concerning us. See 1 Cor. xiv. 11. note, for the meaning of the word mind, or design.

3. Χριστιανιστής, who will instruct him. That is, prove to him. This word means, that he will explain to him. But the things are false, inform him of things he is ignorant of, and shew him, that in believing the gospel he hath fallen into error. The word implies that such persons are not false men, but truly religious. No natural man, no infidel, hath been, or ever will be able to confute the gospel; or to shew a better method of instructing, persuading, and saving men, than that which God hath choosen, and made known by revelation.
CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters treated in this Chapter.

From what is said in this chapter it appears, that the false teacher had represented St. Paul either as ignorant or as unfaithful, because he had not fully instructed the Corinthians before his departure. The same teacher had also boasted concerning himself, that he had given them complete instruction. The confutation of these calumnies the apostle with great propriety introduced after having in the former chapter discoursed largely concerning the perfect knowledge of the gospel given to the apostles by the Spirit. Wherefore, having in that chapter observed, that animal men receive not the things of the Spirit of God, he began this chapter with telling the Corinthians, that though he was an apostle fully instructed, he could not, during his abode with them, speak to them as to spiritual, but as to fleshly or weak persons, even as to babes in Christianity, ver. 1.—This was a severe blow to the pride of the Greeks. Notwithstanding their boasted proficiency in the sciences, they were fleshly or weak men, and babes in religious matters. In this their admiration of their own philosophy, their confidence in human reason as the only judge of truth, and the prevalence of their animal passions, had rendered them incapable of understanding and relishing spiritual things. He had therefore given them milk, and not meat, because they were not able to bear meat; neither were they yet able to bear the word, ver. 2. The Corinthians, who were then still fleshly, was evident from the strifes and divisions which were among them, on account of the particular teachers to whom they had attached themselves, ver. 3. For one said, I am of Paul, and another, I of Apollos, ver. 4. From this we learn, that there were two principal factions in the church at Corinth, the one of which adhered to Paul, and the other to a person who is here called Apollos figuratively, to avoid giving offence, chap. iv. 6. but who, in all probability, was the false teacher; that this teacher boasted of Peter, by whom he was converted and baptized, as an apostle superior to Paul; that he and his followers, being the disciples of Peter, pretended to be immediately sent to the Corinthians by Peter, chap. iv. 18. and Paul; and that they claimed to themselves superior authority and respect on that account. But in thus subscribing to one apostle more honour than to another, and in attaching themselves more to one than to another, the Corinthians were much to blame. For none of their teachers were masters. They were all but servants employed to minister unto the things of God. The success in the work depended, not on themselves, but on the gifts which Christ had bestowed on each of them, and the blessing with which he accompanied their labours, ver. 5. Further, he told them, that, in converting the world, the ministers of Christ had different parts assigned them. He had planted, and Apollos had watered, but God made the increase, ver. 6. So that the whole depended on the operation and blessing of God, ver. 7. But though the ministers of Christ had different parts allotted to them, he assured them they were all one, in respect of the end for which they laboured; and that each shall be rewarded according to the sincerity and diligence with which he hath laboured, ver. 8. The apostles, therefore, and the other ministers of the word, were joint labourers employed by God; and the people were God’s field, which they were to cultivate, and God’s building, which they were to rear, ver. 9. The building of which the apostle speaks is the Christian church, called, ver. 16. and in other passages, ‘The temple of God,’ because the Christian church, consisting of all who profess to believe in Christ, was formed for preserving the knowledge and worship of God in the world, and to be an habitation of the Spirit of God, by the graces and virtues, which were to be exercised in it.

Having mentioned God’s building or temple, the apostle told the Corinthians, that, as a skilful architect, he had laid the foundation of that temple in a proper manner at Corinth; and that the false teacher had only builded thereon. But he desired every one to take heed to the materials with which he builded, that they be suitable to the foundation, ver. 10. Because other foundation of the temple of God neither apostle nor inferior teachers could lay, than that which he had laid; namely, that ‘Jesus is the Christ,’ ver. 11. If, therefore, any teacher built on that foundation sincerely converts, metaphorically represented by gold, silver, and valuable stones; and if he built hypocrical professors thereon, represented by weed, hay, stubble, he told them the fire of persecution, which was ready to fall on the temple or church of God, would discover the nature of every teacher’s work, ver. 12, 13. If any teacher’s converts remained steadfast in the day of persecution, through the pains he had taken in instructing them, he should be rewarded, ver. 14. But if any teacher’s converts should perish, but the teacher himself would be saved with difficulty; provided, in making such converts, he had preached the gospel sincerely, ver. 15. And that the Corinthians might understand what the building was of which he spake, he told them, they themselves, as a church, were the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelt in them, as a church, ver. 16. If therefore any teacher wilfully spoils the temple of God, by building wicked men into it, that is, if by knowingly misrepresenting the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, and by flattering wicked men in their sins, he allureth them to enter into the Christian church, as the false teacher at Corinth had done, him will God destroy, for he sought to be composed of holy persons, ver. 17. And although the teacher, who thus builds wicked men into the church, may think himself wise in so doing, he but deceiveth himself; and to become truly wise, it behoves him to follow the course which the world esteems foolish: He must preach the gospel sincerely, whatever inconveniences it may occasion to himself or to others, ver. 18. For the wisdom of the world is folly in the sight of God; according to what is written, ‘He catcheth the wise,’ &c. ver. 19, 20. The work of the false teacher, in building the temple of God at Corinth, being of the sort here described and condemned, this passage was a severe rebuke both to him and to his adherents. Wherefore, to lead them to apply it to themselves, the apostle exhibited them not to boast in any teacher, as if he belonged to them in particular. All the teachers, and all the blessings of the gospel, belong to believers in general; and believers belong all to Christ as his disciples; which is a real ground of boasting, because Christ belongs to God as his disciple or servant, ver. 31, 22, 23. Having therefore Christ for their common master, who was commissioned and instructed by God, and being all equally entitled to the benefit of the labours of the ministers of Christ, and to the privileges of the gospel, it was wrong to contend with one another, either about their teachers or their privileges.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—I am blamed for not instructing you completely before my departure, especially as I say I have the mind of Christ.
I. CORINTHIANS.

2. But, I brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as to weak men, even as to babes in Christ. (See Heb. v. 12, 13.)

3. MILK! I gave you, and not meat; for ye were not yet able to receive it, (1 Cor. 7:6) nay, neither yet now are ye able:

3 (1 Cor. 254.) Because ye are still milkily. For, whereas among you envy and strife, and divisions subsist, are ye not milkily, and walk after the manner of men? (1 Cor. 3:1)

4. Besides, while one saith, I, indeed, am of Paul, and another, I of Apollos, and every schismatist submit to his opinions on account of you; have ye not regarded that the person who instructed him, are ye not put up with vanity?

5. For who is Paul, and who is Apollos? Not your masters in religion, but servants of Christ by whose labours ye have believed, even as the Lord hath given spiritual gifts to each.

6. I have planted, Apollos hath watered, but God hath made to grow.

7. So that neither the planter is anything, nor the waterer, but God which maketh to grow.

8. (1 Cor. 100.) However, the planter and the waterer are one, and each shall receive his proper reward, according to his proper labour.

9. (1 Cor. 923.) Wherefore, we are joint labourers of God. Ye are God's field, ye are God's building.

10. According to the grace of God which is given to me, as a skilful architect, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every one take heed how he buildeth thereon.

11. For other foundation no one can lay, except what is laid, which is Jesus the Christ.

12. Now, if any one build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

13. Every one's work shall be made manifest: for the day will make it plain, because it is revealed by fire: (1 Cor. 3:12) and the fire will try every one's work, of what sort it is.

2. God's building:—The original word, ἔρωτας, denotes the act of building, and means 'to make to grow,' 'to cause to spring up,' as a man receives things from the Spirit of God, by means of an animal man an infidel, who makes his own reason and imagination the measure of truth. Here he calls the Corinthians after their conversion ἔρωτας, milkily men, which, as different from mature men, means persons of a weak capacity. For notwithstanding they believed the gospel to be a revelation from God, they were so much under the influence of their former principles and prejudices, that they were not yet capable of comprehending spiritual things properly; neither had they conceived their evil passions, as appeared from their strifes and divisions.

Ver. 1. As to fleshily men.—In the preceding chapter, ver. 14, the apostle had said, 'No man had seen God.' An animal man conceives the things of the Spirit of God, meaning by an animal man an infidel, who makes his own reason and imagination the measure of truth. Here he calls the Corinthians after their conversion ἔρωτας, milkily men, which, as different from mature men, means persons of a weak capacity. For notwithstanding they believed the gospel to be a revelation from God, they were so much under the influence of their former principles and prejudices, that they were not yet capable of comprehending spiritual things properly; neither had they conceived their evil passions, as appeared from their strifes and divisions.

Ver. 2. Milk I gave you.—In the original it is, 'Milk I gave to you.' But as every milkily sect, 'and not meat,' the genius of the English language does not admit of a literal translation, unless the latter clause is supplied in this manner, and not meant to eat. To support the apostle's phraseology, Sosa produces the εὐτύχεια τῶν ἀνθρώπων ὡς τροφή τῆς ἐκκλησίας of Homer. See also Luke 1:44, in the Greek, where Zacharias' tongue is said to have been opened as well as his mouth.

2. Ye were not able.—Ovē signifieth not then, John iii. 30. v. 30. v. 30.

3. Walk after the manner of men.—As the apostle, in the following verses, mentions their strifes on account of their teachers, their strifes and strifes spoken of in this verse, must be those which arose on account of their spiritual gifts.

Ver. 7. So that neither the planter is anything.—This is said, as all things are used to represent Christ and the church, which are Christ's building and their own, with others, but as to spiritual, but as to weak men, even as to babes in Christ. See 1 Pet. iv. 12.
I. CORINTHIANS.

14 If the work of any one remaineth, which he hath built upon the foundation, he shall receive a reward.

15 If the work of any one shall be burnt, he will suffer loss: himself, however, shall be saved, yet so as (κατ' ἐναντίαν) through a fire.

16 Know ye not, that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you (κατ' ἐναντίαν), among you? 172.

17 If any one destroyeth the temple of God, him God will destroy: for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are. (See Eph. ii. 19-22.)

18 Let no one destroy himself: if any one among you (κατ' ἐναντίαν) thinketh18 to be wise (τις ἐναντίαν εἶναι) in this age, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

19 For the wisdom of this (τις ἐναντίαν) world is foolishness with God; but it is written (Job v. 13.), He catcheth the wise in their own craftiness.

20 And again, (Psalm iv. 11.), The Lord knoweth the reasonings of the wise, that they are vain: 21 Wherefore, let no one boast in men; for all things are yours;

22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; where the persecution to which the first Christians were exposed is called ἐναντίαν, a turning among them, which was to them a trial. According to the common interpretation of this passage, the doctrine which one teaches, is called his work. But in that case I wish to know, how doctrines can be tried by the fire either of persecution or of the last judgment; or how they can be burnt by these fires. To introduce doctrines into this passage, quite destroys the apostle's intent. The Paul who taught the whole body of the Ephesians, had professed to believe in Christ, as formed into one house or temple for the worship of God; and that temple, as soon as to have the mark of perfection, spoils the temple of God. Of all believers, represented by good, holy, and storable, were any teacher built into the church, the fire of persecution would discover them, more or less, as part of the temple of the Lord in general, a particular mark of apostasy. The false teacher at Corinth had in this respect been very well furnished (τις ἐναντίαν), Cor. ii. 15. of the Jews and Gentiles; and by encouraging them in their sins, had allure into the church at Corinth a number of wicked men, particularly the person who was guilty of incest, and others who denied the resurrection of the dead, whereby he had corrupted the temple of God, ver. 17.

Some of the fathers, perceiving that the apostle in this passage speak not of doctrines but of persons, supposed that the fire which was to try every one's work, was the fire which is to happen at the day of judgment. And therefore, as the apostle speaks of persons whose work was to be burnt, but themselves saved, they fancied that all men, the righteous as well as the wicked, are to be burnt in the general conflagration; that the separation of the righteous from the wicked is to be made; that the wicked are to be consumed, and that this will happen to all men, some more, some less, according to their character. The passages of the fathers to this purpose were sought, and Col. ii. 25. But the Roman clergy, perceiving that this doctrine, properly managed, might be made an inexhaustible source of wealth to their order, have reapproved this fire of purgatory as lighted up from the very beginning of the world, and have kept it burning ever since, and have hummed to themselves the power of detaining souls in that fire, and of releasing them. The doctrine of purgatory, which has been alluded to in the previous verse, has drawn great sums of money from the ignorant and superstitious.

Ver. 15. Yet as (ἴσος ἐναντίαν) through a fire. — This, as Elmer observes, is a proverbial expression for one's escaping some evil with great difficult but being made subject to others. We went through fire and water that is, we were in the greatest danger. 12 Is. xxxii. 2. When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt pass it unscathed and the flame shall not be a blight out of the burning. 13 Judg. ii. 36. Slaughtering them out of before. See the note on that verse.

Ver. 17. If any one (ἵνα ἐναντίαν) destroy the temple of God. — Here the apostle describes the sin and punishment, not only of such teachers as from worldly motives allure bad men into the church, or continue them in it, by wilfully perverting the doctrine and precepts of the gospel, but also of those hypocrites, who for worldly ends, intrude themselves among the faithful, and put on a great show of godliness. Whereas, in ver. 15, he describes the sin of those teachers who introduce bad men into the church, by ignorantly misrepresenting the doctrines and precepts of the gospel; in this verse, if any one destroy the temple of God, being general, is no doubt applicable to any false teacher and hypocritical Christian who in any thing destroys, or hinders the practice of true religion. By the temple of God is meant the church of God, thinking that the apostle, in this passage, had the false teacher and the faction at Corinth more particularly in his eye, who had spoiled the temple of God by their specious and many other described.

Ver. 18. If any one among you (ἵνα ἐναντίαν) thinketh to be wise. — So τις ἐναντίαν is translated. Cor. ii. 15. of the Jews and Gentiles; and by encouraging them in their sins, had allure into the church at Corinth a number of wicked men, particularly the person who was guilty of incest, and others who denied the resurrection of the dead, whereby he had corrupted the temple of God, ver. 17.

Ver. 19. The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God; — Consequently will issue in punishment to those worldly wise teachers. That this is the apostle's meaning is evident from his adding, For it is written. He catcheth the wise in their own craftiness. 19 And further, the same passage is brought in Acts v. 36. 19 Ver. 20. That therefore no man among you thinketh to be wise. — Besides the general meaning of this verse, expressed in the commentary, I think the apostle intimated that the Corinthians were in their present life, and of their facility in the life to come. Thus far they may consider themselves as having an interest in all things, and may therefore not in parts of their lives and among the rest, death itself is theirs, so is it the appointed means of bringing them to the vision and enjoyment of God.
I. CORINTHIANS.

23 And ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

Ver. 22. And Christ is God's, as the foregoing expression, Ye are Christ's, means that the Corinthians belonged to Christ and to God, whilst the disciples, this expression, Christ is God's, I think means, that in making the gospel revelation, Christ is God's disciple or servant. So Christ himself says, John xii. 18. My doctrine is not mine, but he that sent me. I pet. 22. As my father hath taught me, I speak these things. xl. 49. I have not spoken of myself, but the Father who sent me, he gave me commandment what I should say, and what I should speak. Acts xiv. 10. The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself. This, I suppose, is the apostle's meaning likewise, when he tells us, 1 Cor. xii. 3. The head of Christ is God. Uniter understand the passage them. All things are appointed for your good, and ye are appointed for Christ's honour, and Christ for God's glory.

CHAPTER IV.

List from what was said in the preceding chapters concerning the inspiration of the apostles by the Spirit, the Corinthians might have imagined that Paul claimed to himself and to his brethren an authority not derived from Christ, he began this chapter with telling them, that they were to consider the apostles only as servants of Christ, and as stewards of the mysteries of Christ, ver. 1. And that the thing required of every steward is, that he be faithful in dispensing these mysteries, according as his disciples are able to receive them, ver. 2. Therefore, although the false teacher accused Paul of unfaithfulness, because he had taught the Corinthians the first principles only, and not the deep doctrines of the gospel, he told them, it was a very small matter in his eyes to be condemned as unfaithful by them, or by any man's judgment, seeing he did not condemn himself, ver. 3. For he was conscious to himself of no unfaithfulness; yet by this he was not justified—he meant in the eyes of the faction, who could not see his heart. At the same time he told them, that the only person who had a right to condemn him, if he proved unfaithful, was the Lord his Master, ver. 4. This being the case, he desired the faction not to condemn him, till the Lord should come to judgment, who will bring to light every thing most secret, and lay open the designs of the heart, of which they were no judges, ver. 5.

Next, to prevent the Corinthians from mistaking what he had said, concerning their boasting in himself and Apollos as the heads of the factions, (chap. i. 12. iii. 4.) he declared that he had applied these things to himself and Apollos figuratively only, for their sakes, that by disclaiming all pretensions to be the heads of parties, the Corinthians might learn in them, not to esteem any teacher above what he had written, chap. iii. 5.; namely, that Paul and Apollos were only servants of Christ, by whose ministry the Corinthians had believed; and that none of them, on account of any teacher, should be puffed up with envy and anger against another, ver. 6.

In what follows, the apostle, turning his discourse to the false teacher, says, without naming him, Who maketh thee to differ in gifts from others? Or what spiritual gift hast thou which thou didst not receive from some apostle? And if thou hast received all thy gifts from the apostles, why dost thou set thyself above them, as if thou hadst not received thy gifts from them, but were independent of them, and superior to them? ver. 7. Then, to shew the Corinthians the difference between the false teacher and the true apostles of Christ, he contrasted the ease and opulence in which that impostor and the other leaders of the faction were living at Corinth, and their imperious conduct towards the churches and the Fed and persecuted state of the apostles, ver. 8-13. And assured them, that he wrote not these things to alarm them for having increased his sufferings by their calumnious speeches, and disrespectful behaviour; but his design was affectionately to instruct them, that they might not be seduced by those characters and relation to them, who were so different from his, ver. 14. For he told them, though they had ten thousand instructors in the Christian doctrine, yet they had not many fathers. He was their only spiritual father, ver. 15. And therefore he besought them to imitate him, ver. 16, 17. To conclude, because the false teacher had boasted that Paul, being afraid to encounter such learned and eloquent opposers, durst not return to Corinth, he assured the Corinthians that he would come soon, and make trial, not of the speech of that insolent person, but of his supernatural powers, ver. 18, 19. For, said he, the gospel is not established by the boasting speeches of its preachers, but by the miraculous powers which they exercise for its confirmation; and when the faction asked them, whether they chose that he should come and exercise his supernatural power in punishing them or come in the spirit of peace, on account of their amendment, ver. 21.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IV. 1 (Ouvet, 286.) So then, let a man consider us as (inopera) servants only of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. 2 Now it is required in stewards, that (rie) every one be found faithful. 3 (Ax, 106.) Therefore, to me it is a very small matter, that I be condemned by you, or by human judgment, because I do not condemn myself.

VER. 1. Stewards of the mysteries of God.—The apostle gave to those doctrines, which in former ages had been kept secret, but which were now discovered to all through the preaching of the gospel, the appellation the mysteries of God, to recommend them to the Corinthians, as was formerly observed, chap. ii. 7. note 1. And he called himself the steward, or manager of these mysteries, to intimate that the deepest doctrines, as well as the first principles of the gospel, were intrusted to him to be DISPENSED OR MADE KNOWN; and that his relation to a steward, consisted not only in his discovering them exactly as he had received them from Christ, but in his discovering them as his hearers were able to receive them.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV. 1 So then, let men consider us apostles in no other light but as servants only of Christ, and stewards appointed by him to dispense the doctrines of the gospel, which are the mysteries of God. 2 Now it is required in the stewards of these mysteries, that every one of them be found by his master, Christ, faithful in dispensing them. 3 Therefore, to me it is a very small matter that I be condemned as unfaithful, by you, or by any man's judgment, for not having taught you more fully; because I do not condemn myself as unfaithful in that respect; neither will Christ my master condemn me.

VER. 2.—That I be condemned by you.—The word renovare properly signifies to examine, in order to pass a judicial sentence, either of acquittal or of condemnation, Luke xxii. 14. Acts iv. 9. The compound verb renovari, to examine, may signify to condense, in consequence of examination: it is used in all languages, to put the cause for the effect. This sense the word renovare evidently hath in the latter part of the verse: Gesi, renov, I do not condemn myself: for the apostle could not say, 'I do not examine, or judge myself.' It is the duty of every good chap. iv.

4 For I am conscious to myself of no fault in the discharge of my stewardship; but I am not hereby justified in your eyes. But he who con-demneth me is the Lord.

5 Wherefore, do not before the time pass any judgment, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and lay open the counsels of the hearts; and then praise shall be to every one from God.

6 Now these things, brethren, I have figuratively applied to myself and Apollo, for your sakes, that (a) by us ye may learn not to esteem teachers above what hath been written, nor that one of you may, on account of one, be puffed up against another.

7 (Tit. 3.) Besides, who maketh thee to differ? (d) for, 105.) what hast thou which thou didst not receive? and now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou boast as not receiving it?

8 Ye are filled, now ye are become rich; (f) ye have reigned; (g) without us; and I wish, indeed, ye had reigned properly, that we also might reign with you.

9 For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as persons appointed to death; that we are made a spectacle to the world, even to angels and to men.

10 We are fools (h) on account of Christ; but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong: ye are honored, but we are despised.

11 To the present hour, we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; man to examine, and judge himself; and it is what the apostle recom-manded to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xi. 31. 2 Cor. xii. 5.

2. A human judgment (k) on sinner; (l) literally, human day, day of man, in opposition to the great day of the Lord's return.

Ver. 4. For I am conscious to myself of no fault, &c. —The like form of expression: 1 Cor. iv. 4. &c. The Corinthians, like Latin Senators, are called palaearce culpa. —We have the Greek phrase complete, Job xxviii. 6, LXX. Os ypyv 6 6p04i 6n60 6504ti 55604ti 55044.

Ver. 6. Do not before the time pass any judgment. —Neither is church nor state order and peace be maintained, if rulers were not to pass judgment on offenders, and punish them. This, therefore, is one of those general expressions, of which there are a number in scripture, which must be limited by the subject to which they are applied. See another example, ver. 7. The Corinthians were not to pass any judgment on Paul's general behaviour as an apostle, till Christ his master came and judged him. In such, and is many cases of a like nature, to judge rightly, we ought to have the knowledge of men's hearts, as the apostle intimates in the latter part of the verse. Read open the counselor of the hearts. What the apostle hath written here concerning Christ, is agreeable to what Christ says of himself. Matt. xvi. 28. All the churches shall know that I am able to search the reins and the hearts. —God is called the searcher of all hearts. —Chrst. xxvii. 9.

6. I have figuratively applied to myself and Apollo; —I mean, by substituting our names, chap. i. 12. iii. 4. in place of the names of the teachers among you whom I meant to reprove.

2. To esteem any teacher. —Wolf on Philip, i. 7. observes, that the word ολον διηγείται the paying a peculiar regard or attention to a person.

3. Above what hath been written. —namely, chap. iii. 5. 8. 9. iv. 1.

1. This great apostle, by thus stripping himself of all honour, and is, the apostle to the Gentiles, Romans, 15. 20. 23. 24. I taught the heads of the faith to lay aside their boasting, and to behave with modesty, especially as all the teachers at Corinth did nothing but build upon the foundation which he had laid, and said nothing, no spiritual gift but what they had received, either from him or from God. —1 Cor. xiv. 12. 1 Cor. xii. 12. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. 1 Cor. xiv. 41. 1 Cor. xvi. 17. 18.

4. Be puffed up against another. —The word ενθάνται signifies the state of a person's mind who is filled with an high opinion of himself. —1 Cor. xii. 21. When it shews us, that the state of a person's mind is characterized by haughtiness and wrath against all who fall in paying him the respect which he thinks due to him. This latter operation of pride is the evil which the apostle condemns in the passage before us, as is plain from the turn of his expression: That no one of you may, on account of one, be puffed up against another.

Ver. 8. —Are become rich. —Whiby understands this of their being rich in spiritual gifts, as well as in worldly wealth.

Ver. 9. —Ye are wise in Christ; —Ye have reigned; —Ye are strong; —Ye are honored; —Ye have reigned during my absence; —Ye had reigned in a due subordination to Christ, that we also might rule the church at Corinth with you.

Ver. 10. —We are reckoned fools, for suffering on account of preaching Christ; —we are wise in your method of preaching Christ. —We are ridiculed as weak in body and mind; —but ye, no doubt, are strong in both. —Ye are much esteemed by your adherents; but we are despised by them.

11 But which of us is most worthy of esteem as preachers! —In preaching Christ, I, to the present hour, both suffer hunger and thirst, and am badly clothed, and smitten on the face, and have no certain dwelling-place.
L. CORINTHIANS.

12 And labour, working with our own hands: when reviled, we bless; when persecuted, we bear:
13 When defamed, we bless: we are be- nevolent even as Christ: the purgations of the world, (σωκράτησις) the faith of all things, until now.

14 I write not these things to shame you, for having increased my sufferings by the calamities ye have uttered against me, but, as my beloved children, I instruct you how much I exceed the teacher who hath your esteem.

15 For, though ye have ten thousand (see ἐπιθυμεῖν) Gal. iii. 24, note) teachers in Christ, yea ye have not many fathers: for, (ἐν, 183,) is Christ Jesus, through the gospel, I have be- gotten you.

16 Wherefore, I beseech you, be imitators of me, for this purpose I have sent to you Timothy, who is my beloved disciple, and a faithful minister of the Lord: he will put you in mind of my behaviour and doctrine as an apostle of Christ, as I teach everywhere, and in every church;

17 For this purpose I have, sometime sent to you Timothy, who is my beloved disciple, and a faithful minister of the Lord. He will put you in mind of my behaviour and doctrine as an apostle of Christ, as I teach everywhere, and in every church;

18 Now some are puffed up, as if I were not coming to you.

19 But I will come to you soon, if the Lord will, and shall know, not the speech of them who are puffed up, but the power.

20 For not by speech is the kingdom of God established, but by power.

21 What do ye incline? Shall I come to you with a rod? Or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?

received maintenance from them, he would not have suffered hun- ger and nakedness, in which the wretchedness of poverty consists, but would have been plentifully supplied with the ordinary necessi- ties of life. Had the apostle spent the whole of his time in working at his trade of tent-making, he could doubt have procured for himself a sufficiency of convenient food and raiment. But as he employed the most of his time in preaching, his gains were small; and even these he shared with his assistants, Acts xiv. 24. No wonder, therefore, that he was often in great want. For in a particular account of the apostle's sufferings, see 1 Cor. xi. 23-25.

22 And are buffeted.—καὶ ἀφίεσθαι signifies to strike one on the head with the hand. Here it is used metaphorically, to denote that the apostle was treated in the most ignominious manner by the heathens in Ephesus.

23 And have so certain dwelling-places.—The apostle, it seems, was continually changing his lodgings in Ephesus, to elude the searches of his enemies.

24 Working with our own hands:—nearly, for maintenance.

This he mentioned to the Corinthians, to put the false teacher to shame, who not only demanded maintenance from them, but lived in ease and luxury through their liberality to him.

Ver. 12.—And labour.—This word is often used by the apostle, to denote the labour of preaching the gospel, 1 Cor. xvi. 10. 1 Thess. v. 12.

13. Ver. 21. Shall I come to you with a rod?—The apostle terms the power of punishing obstinate offenders by miracle a rod, because it is not to be exercised for chastisement. Perhaps to show that the Hebrew word which signifies σωκράτησις, is generally supposed, that by taking this appellation the apostle compared himself to those devoted persons who were sacrificed for the purpose above mentioned. Wherefore, there is no occasion for the reading in Erasm. Schneiderius's edition of the New Testament, mentioned by Wetstein; namely, καὶ ἀφίεσθαι.

Ver. 14. I write not these things to shame you, &c.—In this apolo- gies for mentioning his sufferings, the apostle hath shown admirable prudence and the greatest degree of heart.

Ver. 17. I have sent you Timothy.—The sending of Timothy into Macedonia, is mentioned Acts xix. 22. But from this passage it is evident, he was in order to return, according to the instructions of the apostle, to Corinth.

18. Ver. 19. If the Lord will, and shall know.—The apostle used to say, when he was about to commence his mission, he was undecided whether he should go or not; and he could only say, if the Lord will. And he would not only desire the Lord to enlighten his mind, but also his heart, that he might be disposed to receive the word of the apostle. He was not so much concerned for his own salvation, as for the conversion of the Corinthians.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The messengers from Corinth, as well as the members of the family of Chloe, had informed the apostle that one of the brethren was cohabiting with his father's wife, in his father's lifetime. In this chapter, therefore, St. Paul reproved the whole Corinthian church, for tolerating a species of whoredom which was abhorred even by the
1. CORINTHIANS.

Chap. V.vers. 1. And this scandal was the greater, that they were punished with pride, on account of the knowledge and learning of the teacher by whose influence it was tolerated, ver. 2. But to make the Corinthians sensible, that their boastings of a teacher who had patronized such an enormity was criminal, as well as to correct the enormity itself, the apostle ordered them forthwith, in a public assembly of the church, to repent of the heathen, to deliver the offender to Satan, for the destruction of his flesh, that his spirit being reformed, he might be saved in the day of the Lord, ver. 3, 4, 5. Then showed them the necessity of cutting off the incestuous person, by comparing vice unpunished to leaven, on account of its contagious nature in corrupting a whole society, ver. 6.—And hence Christianity was written a little before the passer-over, when the Jews put away all leaven out of their houses as the symbol of corruption or wickedness, the apostle desired the Corinthians to cleanse out the old leaven of lewdness, by casting the incestuous person out of the church; for, said he, Christ our passover is sacrificed for us. Also be exhorted to keep the feast of the Lord's supper, which is a memorial, to show him the company of Christians he has sacrificed for us, and which it would never be possible to celebrate by them at the time of the passover, not with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth, ver. 7, 8.

Last, however, the Corinthians might have understood the apostle's command to excommunicate the incestuous person, and to cast him out of the old leaven, as an ordinance to keep company with the unconverted heathens, he told them that was not his meaning, since in that case they must have gone out of the world, ver. 9, 10. And to make his meaning plain, he now wrote more explicitly, that if any person who professed himself a Christian was a known fornicator, &c. they were to punish him by keeping no company with him. This distinction between the treatment of heathens and Christians shows the apostle showed them was reasonable, from the consideration, that church censures are not to be inflicted on persons who are without, but on them who are within the church, ver. 12.—And therefore, while they left it to God to judge and punish the wicked heathens, it was their duty to put away the incestuous person from among themselves, and to leave the woman with whom he was unjustly associating in the judgment of God, because she was a heathen, ver. 13.

The apostle's order to the Corinthians, to keep no company with wicked persons, though seemingly severe, was in the true spirit of the gospel. For the laws of Christ do not, like the laws of men, correct offenders by fines and imprisonments, and corporal punishments, or fine outward violence of any kind, but by earnest and affectionate representations, admonitions, and reproves, addressed to their reason and conscience, to make them sensible of their fault, and induce them voluntarily to amend. If this remedy proves ineffectual, their fellow-churchmen are to show their disapproval of their evil courses, by carefully avoiding their company. So Christ hath ordered, Matt. xviii. 16, 17. Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, every one of whom may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man, and a publican. Earnest representation, therefore, from the injured party, followed with grave admonition and reproof from the ministers of religion, when the injured party's representation is ineffectual, are the means which Christ hath appointed for reclaiming an offender; and with great propriety, because, being addressed to his reason and conscience, they are calculated to influence his will as a moral agent, and so to produce a lasting alteration in his conduct. But if these moral and religious means prove ineffectual, Christ hath ordered the society of which the offender is a member, to shun him, to regard him, as he may be ashamed, and that others may be protected from the contagion of his example. This last remedy will be used with the greatest effect, if the resolution of the society to have no intercourse with the offender, especially in religious matters, is openly declared by a sentence deliberately and solemnly pronounced in a public assembly, (as in the case of the incestuous Corinthian,) and is steadily carried into execution.

The wholesome discipline which Christ instituted in his church at the beginning, was rigorously and impartially exercised by the primitive Christians towards their offending brethren, and with the happiest success in preserving purity of manners among themselves. In modern times, however, this salutary discipline has been disregarded in the church; but it hath been taken up by garrison clubs, who exclude from their society all who refuse to pay their game debts, and shun their company on all occasions, as persons absolutely infamous. By this sort of excommunication, and by giving to game debts the appellation of debts of honour, the winners on the one hand, without the help of law, and even in contradiction to it, have rendered their unjust claims effectual, while the losers, on the other, are reduced to the necessity, either of paying, or of being shunned by their companions as infamous. I mention this as an example, to show what a powerful influence the approbation or disapprobation of those with whom mankind associate have upon their conduct; and from that consideration, to recommend the firmness with which the church should resist the attempts of the wicked, by testifying on every fit occasion their disapprobation of vice, and their contempt of its abettors, and more especially by shunning the company and conversation of the openly profane, however dignified their station in life, or however great their fortunes may be. See 1 Cor. v. 11. note 3.

New Translation.

Chap. V. vers. 1. It is generally reported, that there is whoredom among you; and such whoredom as not even among the heathens is named,? that one hath his father's wife. 1

Commentary.

Chap. V. vers. 1. It is generally reported, that there is whoredom tolerated among you; and such whoredom as not even among the idolatrous heathens is approved, either by law or custom, that one hath his father's wife. more especially in his father's lifetime.

1. That there is whoredom. The word σύνεργασία is used by the LXX. and by the writers of the New Testament, in the latitude which its corresponding word hath in the Hebrew language, namely, to denote all the different kinds of uncleanness committed, whether the morbid passion arises from abstinence or from licentiousness. Accordingly it is used in the plural number, chap. vii. 2. 'Nevertheless (κατὰ παντίν) on account of what? Here συνεργασία, whoredom, signifies incest joined with adultery, the woman's husband being still in life, as appears from 2 Cor. vii. 12. In the Old Testament sometimes signifies adultery; in the New Testament, sometimes signifies idolatry, because the name of the Israelites with God as their king, being represented by God himself as a marriage, their giving themselves up to idolatry signifies a contract of marriage with the Devil. 2. As not even among the heathens is named. The word συνεργασία signifies to be named with approbation, Rom. xv. 22. Ephes. J. 21. v. 3. See Gen. vi. 4, where σύνεργασία is applied, (LXX.) men who are named, is in our Bibles translated men of renown. 3. That one (οὗτος τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ), that is, the man's fellow, who has father's wife, signifies sometimes to see; thus, Deut. xviii. 20. LXX. θυμότητα νηστείαν, and σύνεργασία; 'Thou wilt take a wife, and another will use her.' 4. His father's wife. It seems the father's wife was committed, was not the guilty person's own mother, but his stepmother; a sort of incest which was condemned by the Greeks and Romans, as we learn from Cicero, Orat. pro Cluentio, sect. 4. and from Virgil, Eccl. x. line 390. 'Thalamos auaum incastrate nos.' Wherefore it is a sin that the Corinthians, in committing this crime, we may infer that the guilty person was of some note, regarding as a happy he was one of the teachers of the faction, who being greatly
2 And ye are puffed up, and have not rather bewailed (see 2 Cor. xii. 21.), so as he who hath done this work might be taken away from among you.

3 (Rev. 93.) Wherefore I verily, as absent in body, yet present in spirit, have already, as present, condemned him who hath so wrought out this work.

4 And my sentence is this: Ye being gathered together in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of my Spirit, shall, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, deliver such an one to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

6 Your boasting is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaventh the whole lump?

7 Cleanse out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, when ye are without leaven; for even our passover, Christ, is sacrificed for you.

8 Therefore, let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

9 For I know, that, after I have shown this book to the Jews, it shall be published abroad among the Gentiles, and they shall read it, and some shall corrupt it by shamefacedness and carnal mind.

10 And now I beseech you, brethren, bear with me in the word of this book, as I also have bear with your folly.

11 The time is at hand, for the consummation of all things is now come. The world is inlements, and the Creator is inferred, and the Son is glorified.

12 For I know, that after I have shown this book to the Jews, it shall be published abroad among the Gentiles, and some shall corrupt it by shamefacedness and carnal mind.

13 And now I beseech you, brethren, bear with me in the word of this book, as I also have bear with your folly.

Chap. VI.

9 (By thee.) I have written to you in (as, 71.) this epistle, not to associate with fornicators.

10 (Kiv, 808.) However, not universally with the fornicators of this world, and with the covetous, and with extortioners, and with idolaters, since then, indeed, ye must go out of the world.

11 But now I write to you, not to associate with him, if any one called, a brother is to be a fornicator, or a covetous person, or an idolater, or a reviler, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a person not even to eat.

12 (Tiv meg., supp. xepaet.) For what have I to do to judge them also who are without? do not ye judge those who are within?

13 But them who are without, God judgeth; (Kiv, 808.) Therefore, put away from among yourselves the wicked person.

whoredom, fraud, &c. called old iniquities, because the Corinthians in their heathen state had been much addicted to these practices.

3. Noting the leaven (metabolism) of malice and wickedness. — Malice is ill-will in the mind; but wickedness is ill-will expressed by actions, especially such as are accompanied with treachery. Hence the devil is styled εὐθελός, the wicked man. — As the apostle mentions sincerity and truth in the subsequent clause, it is probable, that by 'the leaven of malice and wickedness' he means all those bad dispositions and actions which lyeth near cover by putting on a show of piety.

4. Unleavened qualities of sincerity and truth. — The apostle gives the epithet of un secular to sincerity and truth. In allusion to the emblematical meaning of the unleavened bread which the Israelites were to eat during the feast of the passover; for thereby they were taught to celebrate that feast with pious and virtuous dispositions. — A φιλαθλής being an adjective, we may supply as its substantive either ἀθλός or ἀθλοῦν.

Ver. 10. With extortioners. — The word λαχκατίος signifies those who take away their neighbour's goods, either by force or by fraud, and who injure them by any kind of violence.

Ver. 11. If any one called a brother is to be a fornicator, &c. — The words ἄκολουθος τοῦ τηροῦντος ἀκολουθείαν, according to Oecumenus and others, may be translated, 'If any one be required a fornicator, &c.;' for ἄκολουθος signifies named or famous. See ver. 1. note 2.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations contained in this Chapter.

The Corinthians, since their conversion, had sinned each other, as formerly, in the heathen courts of judicature about worldly matters, often of small importance. This practice was the more blamable, as the Christians, who in the first age were not distinguished from the Jews, might as Jews, according to the laws of the empire, have held courts of judicature of their own for determining most of the controversies about worldly matters which arose among themselves. Wherefore, by declining the decisions of the brethren, and by bringing their causes into the heathen courts, they showed that they had a mean opinion of the knowledge and integrity of their brethren. Besides, the frequency of their suits led the heathens, before whom they were brought, to think the Christians not only litigious, but disposed to injure one another. These things of which the apostle was informed, bringing great dishonour on the Christian name, he rebuked the Corinthians severely, for daring to go to law with one another before the heathens, and not before the brethren.

1. Know ye not, said he, that the Christian inspired teachers, whom he called saints, judge the world? that is, declare the laws by which the world at present is ruled, and is to be judged at last. And if the world is judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? ver. 2. — Do ye not know, that we foretell the judgment and punishment of evil angels? Being thus supernaturally endowed, why may we not judge in things pertaining to this life? ver. 3. — When therefore ye have set up secular seats of judgment, as ye ought to do, place thereon as judges such of the spiritual men among you, as, on account of the inferiority of their gifts, are least esteemed in the church, ver. 4. — I speak it to your shame, that in your opinion there is not so much as one wise man among you, who is fit to judge between his brethren; but brother Peter is not to be esteemed even his equal in the church, and he is expected to be able to administer more justice from heathens than from Christians, ver. 5. — Now it is utterly wrong in you to have any lawsuits at all in the heathen courts. Ye had much better suffer yourselves to be injured and defrauded in small matters than go to law before unbelievers, since the seeking redress in that manner will be attended with more trouble and loss than if ye here the injury patiently, ver. 7. — Next, because the other parties, by suffering themselves to be sued in the heathen courts, had shown a disposition to defraud their brethren, the apostle denounced the judgment of God against all unrighteous persons...
I. CORINTHIANS.

CHAP. VI.

1. Dare any of you, having a matter against another, be judged by the unrighteous, and not by the saints?

2. Do ye not know, that the saints judge the world, and if the world be judged by you, are ye not worthily called the children of God?

Ver. 1.—Having a matter against another.

Ver. 2.—Do ye not know?

2. By the unrighteous.

3. The heathens are called unrighteous, in the same sense that Christians are called saints or holy.

4. Ver. 3. He is your adversary, not on account of the real sanctity of his manners, but because he is an adversary.

5. Thou art the adversary of God, because thou art an enemy to Christ, of whom the former were called unrighteous on account of their idolatry and unrighteousness; whereas they were the servants of their God, and were made to be judges of mankind with respect to their regard to justice, and to all the duties of morality.

Ver. 2.—Do ye not know?

6. By the saints.

7. This name, though common to all who believed in the true God, (see Ex. iv. 60,) is sometimes appropriated to the spiritual men in the Christian church, who were inspired with the knowledge of the gospel.

8. Judge the world.

9. Christ is the judge of the world, so far as he gives his judgments by the laws of the gospel, which they preach to the world.

Commentary.

—To the argument whereby the licentious justifie the unrestricted enjoyment of women, namely, that the body was made for fornication, the apostle answered, by faintly denying the position.

—Secondly, by fornication a man injures his own soul: for he becomes one person with his whores; he acquires the same vicious inclinations, and the same vicious manners with them; nay, he makes himself her slave.

—Whereas he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit.

—Here it may be proper to take notice, that the apostle hath not given a separate answer to the fourth argument, by which immediate sensual indulgences are oft-times defended; namely, the argument taken from the strong passions which were implanted in our nature towards sensual pleasures.

—But the connexion of that argument is implied in what he hath said concerning the injury done by fornication to the body.

—For, in the constitution of things, God hath connected diseases and death with immediate sensual gratifications; he hath in the clearest manner shown it to be his will that we should abstain from them.

—And therefore, although by implanting in us inclinations to sensual pleasures, he hath declared it to be his will that we should enjoy them, yet by conecting diseases and death with the immediate use of these pleasures, he hath no less clearly declared, that he wills us to enjoy them only in moderation.
1. CORINTHIANS.

The world is thus judged by you, ye are, who are so well enlightened, unworthy to fill the least seats of judicators?

2. Ye do not know that we declare the judgment of the evil angels, whereby we are strongly impressed with a sense of the justice of God. Why may we not then determine things pertaining to this life?

3. Well, when, then ye have seats of judicators for trying secular causes, make to sit on them those who are least esteemed in the church.

4. For shame to you, I say, So then there is not among you a wise man, not even one, who shall be able to decide between his brethren?

5. But another Christian contending with another, is judged, and that by heathens, to the great discredit of the Christian name.

6. Now, therefore, indeed, there is plainly a fault in you, that ye have low-suits with one another. Why do ye not rather bear the injury? Why do ye not rather bear the being defrauded, if the injury done you and the fraud are small?

7. But ye are so far from bearing injuries and frauds, that ye injure and defraud even your Christian brethren.

8. Ye do, who pretend to be wise men, not know, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor covetous persons, nor counterfeiters, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

9. And such were some of you: (see Pref. sect. ii.) but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, (1, 16.) by the blood of our Lord Jesus, and (b) by the Spirit of our God.

10. Nor thieves, nor covetous persons, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

11. And such persons were among you formerly: But ye are washed with the water of baptism, in token of your having vowed to lead a new life: and ye are consecrated to the service of God; and ye are delivered from the power of Lord Jesus, and by the influences of the Spirit of the God of us Christians given to you.

12. The kingdom of God. — The apostle calls the heavenly country the kingdom of God. In this term he included the whole of the dispensation of the apostles, found in the description of the general judgment our Lord had so named it: Matt. xxvi. 34. Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you.

13. But ye are washed, (d) — This being addressed to the Corinthian brethren in general, it is not to be imagined that the apostle, by their being washed, sanctified, and justified, meant to say that they were all holy persons, in the moral sense of the word, and that they were all to be justified at the day of judgment. Among the Corinthians there were many unholy persons, whom the apostle reproved sharply for their sins, 2 Cor. xii. 21, and whom he afterwards threatened to punish severely if they did not repent, 2 Cor. xii. 1. — The Corinthians having been washed with the water of baptism, in token of their having renounced idolatry with all its impurities, and in consequence of which they were under the obligation of a solemn vow carefully to study purity of heart and life.

14. But ye are sanctified. — By their profession of the gospel, the Corinthians were separated from idolaters, and consecrated to the service of God; a meaning of the word sanctified often to be found in scripture. See Rom. v. 5.

15. But ye are justified. — The word justified hath various significations in scripture. Besides the forensic sense, justified signifies the being delivered from the merits of some evil actions, and is so translated in our common English version; Rom. vi. 7. He that is dead is justified from sin. See also Rom. iv. 25. note 2.

16. By the Spirit of our God. — Because justification, in the forensic sense, is never said to be wrought by the Spirit, some commentators have thought that the apostle's meaning is, Ye Corinthians, by the gifts of the Spirit conferred on you, are justified in the eyes of all men for having renounced heathenism.

17. If the terms washed, sanctified, and justified, are understood in the moral sense, the Corinthians were washed, sanctified, and justified, because under the gospel they enjoyed all the means necessary to their being washed, sanctified, and
L. CORINTHIANS.

19 All meats (from ver. 18) are lawful for me; but all are not proper: all meats are lawful for me to eat; but I will not be enslaved by any meat.

19 Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: (c, 100.) However, God will destroy both and them.

20 Now, the body was not made for whoredom, (see chap. v. 1. note 1.) but for the Lord, (ver. 80.) and the Lord for the body.

21 (c, 189.) And God hath both raised the Lord, and will raise up by his own power.

22 Do ye not know (see ver. 2. note 1.) that your bodies are the members of Christ? If I then take the members of Christ, and make them members of an harlot? By no means.

23 What, do ye not know that he who is strongly attached to an harlot, is one body! for saith, the two shall be one flesh.

24 But he who is strongly attached to the Lord, is one spirit.

25 Flee whoredom. Every sin which a man committh is (sine) without the body; but he who committh whoredom, sineth (as) against his own body.

26 What, do ye not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit; (see Eph. ii. 22.) who is in you, whom ye have from God? (ver. 22.) Besides, ye are not your own;

27 For ye are bought with a price: glorify God, therefore, (c, 182.) with your body, and (s) with your spirit, which are God's.

28 Justified, though perhaps many of them had not made a proper use of these means. See Acts iv. 12. Or the passage may be restricted to those who were true believers, and really holy persons.

29 The word, literally; to be translated, 'he who committh whoredom, sineth (as) against his own body.'

30 The spirit being the seat of the understanding, the affections and the will, 'to be one spirit with another,' is to have the same views of things, the same inclinations, and the same volitions; conse-

He debilitates it, by introducing into it many painful and deadly diseases. Perhaps this clause ought to be translated, 'he who committh whoredom, sineth (as) against his own body.'

33. Your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit. The two things necessary to constitute a temple, as Whately observes, belong to the bodies of believers. They are consecrated to the use of the Deity and he resides in them. In the bodies of the primitive Chris-may be supposed to have incultated, to ingratiate himself with the Corinthian women. Some of the Grecian philosophers however affirmed, that if a man would live happily, he should not marry. Nay, of the Pythagoreans represented the matrimonial connexion as inconsistent with purity. The brethren at Corinth, therefore, on the one hand, being urged to marriage both by their own natural inclinations and by the doctrine of the Judaizers, and, on the other, being restrained from marriage by the doctrine of the philosophers, and by the inconveniences attending marriage, in the then persecuted state of the church, they judged it prudent to write to the apostle the letter mentioned ver. 1. in which they desired him to inform them, whether they might not without sin abstain from marriage altogether! and whether such as were already married might not dissolve their marriages, on account of the evils which in their persecuted state they were exposed to! The letter, in which the Corinthians proposed these and some other questions to the apostle, hath long ago been lost. But had it been preserved, it would have illustrated many passages of the epistles to the Corinthians which are now dark, because we are ignorant of the circumstances to which the apostle in these passages alludes.

To the question concerning the obligation which persons grown up and settled in the world were to enter into the married state, St. Paul answered, That although in the present distress it was better for them to have no matrimonial connections at all, yet, to avoid where- doms, every one who could not live chastely in a single state, he told them, was bound to marry; for which reason, he added, he told the Corinthians, as expressly established by the commandment of God, ver. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. But what he was farther to say in answer to his question, they told him, was not an injunction, like his declaration of the duties of marriage, but only an advice suited to their present condition, ver. 6. Namely, he wished that all of them could, like him, live continually unmarried, ver. 7. Then, more particularly addressing the widowers and widows among them, he assured them it would be good for them, if, in the then persecuted state of the church, they could live chastely unmarried, as he was doing, ver. 8. But at the same time he told them, if they found that too difficult, it was better for them to marry. In giving such advice in such a time as he was converted, ver. 20. In particular, slaves after their conversion were to continue under the power of their masters as before, unless they could lawfully obtain their freedom, ver. 21. And a freeman was not to make himself a slave, ver. 22. The reason was, because being bought by Christ with a price, if he became the slave of men, he might find it difficult to serve Christ, his superior master, ver. 23. And therefore the apostle a third time enjoined them to remain in the condition wherein they were called, ver. 24. This earnestness he showed, because if the brethren disobeyed the good laws of the countries where they lived; or, if such of them as were slaves ran away in their masters' stead after their conversion, the gospel would have been calumniated as encouraging licentiousness.

In the third place, the apostle considered the case of those young persons who never had married, perhaps because they were not well established in the world, or were still in their father's family. This class of persons of both sexes he called virgins, and declared that he had given no commandment of the Lord concerning them; by which he meant that Christ, during his ministry on earth, had given no commandment concerning them; but the apostle gave his judgment on their case, as one who had obtained mercy from the Lord to be faithful: 'That is, he gave his judgment as an apostle, who had received inspiration to enable him faithfully to declare Christ's will, ver. 25. Beginning therefore with the case of the male virgin, he declared it to be good, in the present distress, for such to remain unmarried, ver. 26. But if they married, they were not to seek to be released. And if their wives happened to die, he told them, they would find it prudent not to seek a second wife, ver. 27. At the same time he declared, that if such persons married again, they did not sin. The same he declared concerning the female virgin: only, both the one and the other would find second marriages, in that time of persecution, attended with great bodily trouble, ver. 28. By the way, to make the Corinthians less solicitous about present pleasures and pains, the apostle put them
Lastly, with respect to female virgins who were in their father's families, and under their father's power, the apostle point out the fathers of such virgins the considerations which were to determine them, whether they would give their daughters in marriage, or keep them single, ver. 36-39.

This long discourse the apostle concluded with declaring, that all women, whether old or young, are by their marriage-covenant bound to their husbands, as long as their husbands live. But, if their husbands die, they may marry a second time. Yet he gave it as his opinion, that they would be more happy, if they remained widows, considering the persecution which they were exposed. And in so saying, he told them he was sure he spoke by the Spirit of God, ver. 39-40.

CHAP. VII.—I Now, concerning the things of which ye wrote to me, it is good for a man not to touch a woman.

3 (2 Tim. 3, 106, 112). Nevertheless, on account of unceasing temptation, let every man have a wife of his own, and let every woman have her own husband.

3 Let the husband render to the wife (προσεργάζομαι) the due benevolence; and in like manner also, the wife is the husband.

4 The wife hath not the command of her own body, but the husband; and, in like manner also, the husband hath not the command of his own body, but the wife.

5 Deprive not one another, unless perhaps by consent for a time, that ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer; and again, come ye together to the same place; that Satan may not tempt you through your incontinency.

6 But this which follows: I speak as an advice, and not as an injunction.

7 I wish all men to be as myself; but we have no power to be so; let us, however, make our best efforts to be so. Ver. 1. To touch. Epictetus, sect. 33, uses this word to denote one who is impure, or the like.

2 On account of whoredoms, the trespass of the flesh is the word translated here. The word σεκακάμενος, being plural, is emphatical, and denotes all the different kinds of whoredoms mentioned chap. vi. 9. See chap. v. 1. note 1.

2 Let every woman have her own husband. Here the apostle speaks in the imperative mode, using the style in which he governors give their commands. But although he recommends a single life in certain circumstances, this and the injunction, ver. 5, given to all who cannot live chastely unmarried, is a direct prohibition of concubinage to the bulk of mankind. Further, as no person in early life can foresee what his future state of mind will be, or what temptations he will meet with, he cannot certainly know whether he will be in his power to live chastely unmarried. Wherefore, as that is the only case in which the apostle allows persons to live unmarried, very cowardly and virginal taken on in early life, must in both sexes be sinful.

Ver. 2. The due benevolence. That compliance with each other's desires respecting the matrimonial enjoyment, which is here enjoined to married persons, is called the due benevolence, because it is a duty resulting from the nature of the marriage covenant.

Ver. 4. The husband hath not the command of his own body, but the wife. Right of the wife to her husband's body, being here required, both as to the person of the body, is, however, the right of the husband to his wife's body would not exclude her from being married to another, during her husband's lifetime. Besides, the direction, ver. 2. Let every woman have her own husband, plainly leads to the same conclusion. The right of the woman to her husband's body is a perfect right, being founded on the ends of marriage, namely, the procreation of children, their proper education, and the continuance of the family. But these ends would be a great measure be frustrated, if the wife had not an exclusive right to her husband's person.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VII.—1 Now, concerning the things of which ye wrote to me, it is good for a man who can live chastely, not to have any matrimonial connexion.

2 Nevertheless, on account of avoiding whoredoms, let every man, who cannot live chastely in a single state, have a wife of his own, and let every woman have one who finds it difficult to live chastely in a single state, have her own husband.

3 And to prevent in the wife irregular desires after other men, let the husband comply with the desires of his wife respecting the matrimonial enjoyment; and in like manner also, let the wife comply with the desires of her husband.

4 That the husband hath not the command of his own body, so as to refuse her husband, or give her body to any other man; but the husband hath an exclusive right thereto: and in like manner also, the husband hath not the command of his own body, to refuse his wife, or give his body to any other woman; but his wife hath an exclusive right to his body.

5 Deprive not one another, unless perhaps by mutual consent for a time, that ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer, and again come together to the same place; that Satan may not tempt you through your incontinency.

6 But this which follows: I speak as an advice, and not as an injunction.

7 I wish all men to be as myself; but we have no power to be so; let us, however, make our best efforts to be so. Ver. 1. To touch. Epictetus, sect. 33, uses this word to denote one who is impure, or the like.

2 Let every woman have her own husband. Here the apostle speaks in the imperative mode, using the style in which he governors give their commands. But although he recommends a single life in certain circumstances, this and the injunction, ver. 5, given to all who cannot live chastely unmarried, is a direct prohibition of concubinage to the bulk of mankind. Further, as no person in early life can foresee what his future state of mind will be, or what temptations he will meet with, he cannot certainly know whether he will be in his power to live chastely unmarried. Wherefore, as that is the only case in which the apostle allows persons to live unmarried, very cowardly and virginal taken on in early life, must in both sexes be sinful.

Ver. 2. The due benevolence. That compliance with each other's desires respecting the matrimonial enjoyment, which is here enjoined to married persons, is called the due benevolence, because it is a duty resulting from the nature of the marriage covenant.

Ver. 4. The husband hath not the command of his own body, but the wife. Right of the wife to her husband's body, being here required, both as to the person of the body, is, however, the right of the husband to his wife's body would not exclude her from being married to another, during her husband's lifetime. Besides, the direction, ver. 2. Let every woman have her own husband, plainly leads to the same conclusion. The right of the woman to her husband's body is a perfect right, being founded on the ends of marriage, namely, the procreation of children, their proper education, and the continuance of the family. But these ends would be a great measure be frustrated, if the wife had not an exclusive right to her husband's person.

Ver. 5. That ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer. Because it is the duty of the clergy to pray for their people at all times. Jeros and the psychedelic absolution, ought to live in perpetual celibacy. But the inference is not, because the apostle is speaking, not of the ordinary duties of devotion, as is plain from his joining fasting with prayer, but of those acts of devotion to which the people are called by some special occurrence, whether of a public or of a private nature.

2 And again come ye together to the same place. So the original phrase, ἐν τῇ ἁπατῖᾳ, properly signifies. From this it appears, that in the first age, when married persons parted for a time to employ themselves in the duties of devotion, they lived in separate houses, or rather in different parts of their own house; and in the eastern countries the houses were so built, that the women had apartments allotted to themselves. See Rom. xvi. 1, note 3.

2 That Satan may not tempt you through your incontinency. Because the apostle means, that whilst a man is an affair of the greatest importance to society, it was absolutely necessary that its obligation and duties, as well as the other duties and claims of life, should be declared by inspiration in the scriptures. This passage, therefore, of the word of God, ought to be read with due reverence, and not neglected, in the way in which the apostles through the whole of his discourse the apostle has used the greatest chastity and delicacy of expression.

Ver. 6. But this which follows. Because the pronoun ἡστερ, this, often in scripture denotes what follows in the discourse, see 2 Cor. vi. 8. I have added in the translation, which follows, to show that by the word this, the apostle means, not what he had said, but what he is going to say.

1 I speak of many, not (ἐν πολλοῖς) as an advice. Bengelius says μετὰ τοῦ εἰσερχομένου an opinion rightly suited to the state or disposition of another; and in support of that sense of the word, quotes Aristot.
I. CORINTHIANS.

8 This then is my advice to the unmarried men, and to the widows. It is good for them, if they can remain even as I do.

9 Yet, if they cannot live continently, let them marry; it is better to marry than to burn. (See ver. 2, note 2.)

10 Now those who have married, (παρακολοθησας) I charge, yet not I, but the Lord; Let not a wife depart from her husband:

11 But if she even depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and a husband must not put away his wife. (Matt. xix. 9.)

12 But the rest (σαρκωθης, 65) I command, not the Lord, If any brother have an infidel wife, (εσναων, 218, 65) who herself is well pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And a woman who hath an infidel husband, (εσναων) who himself is well pleased to dwell with her, let her not put him away.

14 For the infidel husband is sanctified, (συνιασθης, 1638) to the wife, and the infidel wife to the infidel husband: otherwise, certainly, your children are unclean; whereas, indeed, they are holy.

Ver. 6.—Now those who have married I charge.—So Titus 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:22 should be translated. For it is the same phrase with "εσναων" in Asia Minor. (Theology of the New Testament, 3. 115.)

2 Ver. 11.—Yet not I, but the Lord.—The Lord Jesus, during his ministry on earth, delivered many precepts of his law in the hearing of his disciples, who were afterward to be summoned to reveal them to the Church, after his departure. Therefore, those who did not then deliver in person, but were commissioned by the Lord, to reveal them to the Church, after his departure, delivered them to the apostles, by the commandment which he revealed to the apostles by the Spirit, and which they made known under the inspiration of the Spirit. This distinction is not peculiar to Paul. It is instanced likewise by Peter and Jude: see 2 Pet. iii. 2; Jude v. 17, where the commandments of the apostles and the inspired men are mentioned, not as inferior to the authority of the commandments of the Lord, but as inferior to the authority of the commandments of the Lord, (for they were all as really his commandments as those which he delivered in person.)

Ver. 12.—The rest I command, not the Lord.—The commandments which the Lord delivered personally in his own lifetime, and what the Spirit inspired the apostles to deliver after his departure, have been so true, so evident, so generally known, that it was not of the number of those who accompanied our Lord during his ministry, all the particulars of his life and doctrine were made known and delivered to the apostles. Therefore, when the apostles, for the abolition of the stock which was the inspiration of the Spirit, it is evident, that in answering the questions proposed to him by the Corinthians, when he distinguished the commandments of the Lord from his own commandments, his intention was not, as many have imagined, to tell us in what things he was inspired, and in what not; but to shew us what commandments the Lord delivered personally in his own lifetime, and what the Spirit inspired the apostles to deliver after his departure. For if the Lord, as little true, as much so, as the apostles, it is evident, that in distinguishing the commandments of the Lord from what he calls his own commandments, was not to show us what things he spake by inspiration, and what not, I think evident from his adding certain circumstances, which prove that in delivering his own commandments he was really inspired. Thus, when he says, ver. 10, "If any brother have an infidel wife," the Lord does not give a commandment of the Lord, but I give my judgment as having obtained mercy of the Lord. For, indeed, he has obtained mercy of the Lord, to be faithful, he Certainly meant to tell us, that in giving his judgment concerning virgins he was inspired. And the same is the case also when he gave the advice, ver. 12, "If any brother have an infidel wife, let him not put her away a second time," by adding, ver. 14, "she is happier if she abides, according to my judgment; and I am certain that even I have the Spirit of God," he plainly asserted, that he was inspired in giving that judgment or determination. Lastly, when he called those among the Corinthians who had the gift of discerning spirits, to declare whether or not all the doctrines and precepts which he had delivered in this his first epistle to the Corinthians, were the commandments of the Lord, he declared himself, ver. 11, "I persuade them that God may, by his Spirit, assure that he had delivered these doctrines and precepts by the inspiration of the Spirit." 1 Cor. xiv. 26. If any one is really a prophet, or a spirit of holiness, and, as such, conscious of that spirit, he will write to you, that they are the commandments of the Lord.—Upon this whole, I appeal to the inspired men, whether any inspired man could have said these things, if the judgment which he delivered on the different subjects in this chapter had been mere human or uninspired dictation. (Theology of the New Testament, 3. 115.)

Ver. 11.—A husband must not put away his wife.—Because the obligations lying on husbands and wives are mutual and equal, the husband, after saying that the husband who was unclean or was reconciled to her husband, did not think it necessary to add in his command to the husband, "If he put her away, let him remain unmarried or be reconciled to her wife." Yet for the sake of plainness, I have supplied this in the commentary.

Ver. 12.—Let him not put her away.—Perhaps some of the more zealous Jewish converts, on the authority of Ezra's example, recorded Ex. xiv. 2, contended, that the Corinthians, who before their permission had been advised to adulterers, were bound to put away their spouses if they continued in idolatry. Wherefore, the sincere part of the church having consulted the apostle on that question, he ordered such marriages to be continued, if the parties were willing to abide together. But as difference in religion often proves an occasion of family quarrels, the apostle in the second epistle mentioned, in contrasting marriages after their conversion, by no means against it, the marriage of idolators.

Ver. 14.—Otherwise certainly your children were unclean.—Our translators seem here to have understood the terms sanctified, unclean, and holy, in a federal sense, which indicates their opinion. But, first, it is not true in a federal sense that the unbelieving party in a marriage is sanctified by the believing party; for exceedingly no one hath any right to the blessing of the covenant, by the faith of those to whom they are married. In the second place, according to this sense, there is no moral reason why the believing party in a marriage, should be constrained, and unbelieving parents, become unclean by the separation of their parents, and clean by their continuing together, as the apostle says, according to the sanction of the law, as well as by the option. But I think with Elmer, that the words in this verse have neither a federal nor a moral meaning, but that the apostle intended to illustrate the commandments from what he calls his own commandments, was not to show us what things he spake by inspiration, and what not, I (Theology of the New Testament, 3. 85), and by unclean, what was unfit for use, (Eas. iv. 83), and by unclean, what was unfit for use, (Eas. iv. 83).
I. CORINTHIANS.

15 But if the husband depart, let him depart: the brother or the sister be it not in bondage (§ 162), with such; but God hath called us (§ 163) to peace. (See ver. 12, 13.)

16 (1 Ti. 5:9.) For how knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? And how knowest thou, O husband, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

17 But as God hath distributed to every one, and as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk; and so in all the churches I ordain.

18 Hath any circumcised one been called? let him not be uncircumcised; but if he be a publican, let him not be circumcised.

19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing; but the keeping of the commandments of God.

20 Let every one remain in the same calling in which he was called.

21 What thou givest while a bond-man? Be not thou careful to be made free. Yet, if thou canst even be made free, rather use it.

22 For a bond-man who is called by the Lord, is the Lord's (ὡς ἔσῃ) free-man. In like manner also, a free-man who is called, is Christ's bond-man.

23 Ye were bought with a price; become not the slaves of men.

24 Brethren, in what state each one was called, in that let him remain (ὡς ἐστιν) with God.

25 Now, concerning virgins: I have not a

35, and therefore to be cast away. In that sense the apostle, speaking now of the rich in this world, saith, 'Let them lay up for themselves treasures in heaven.' For God of his grace hath promised the apostles the kingdom, 'if' they continued in faith and love. 'For the true religion, all the former obligations under which the convert lay were dissolved. The gospel, instead of weakening any moral or judicial obligations, strengthens them so as to increase the fear of God, and to prepare them to be brought to heaven. And in like manner also, a free-man who is called, being Christ's bond-man, hath himself thereby increased his obligation to God.'

24 Brethren, whether in a state of bondage or of freedom each one was called, in that let him remain, while he remains with God; that is, while he remains a Christian.

25 Now, concerning virgins of either sex, who are in their father's families, I have not a commendation of the Lord, but give my judgment (see ver. 10, note 2), as having obtained mercy? [2 Cor. 3:13], of the Lord to be faithful.

26 | I declare this, then, to be good on account of the present distress; namely, that it is good for a man who is a virgin, to continue so.

27 | Art thou bound to a wife? Seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? Seek not a second wife.

28 | And yet, if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned: nevertheless, affliction in the flesh such shall have; but I spare you.

29 | (a) Now, this I say, brethren, that the time being short, it remaineth, that both they who have wives, should be as not having wives;

30 | And they who weep, as not weeping; and they who rejoice, as not rejoiceing; and they who buy, as not possessing;

31 | And they who use this world, as not abusing it. For (ypano) the form of this world passeth by.

32 | (a, 104.) Besides, I wish you to be without anxious care. The unmarried man anxiously careth for the things of the Lord, by which he shall please the Lord.

33 | For he who, in the present distress, is married, anxiously careth for the things of the world, how he shall please his wife.

34 | The wife and the virgin are divided in the same manner. The unmarried woman anxiously careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit; but she who hath married, anxiously careth for the things of the world, how she shall please her husband.

35 | This, however, I say, for your own profit, not that I may throw a bond on you, but to set before them the considerations by which their inclinations were to be regulated in that matter; namely, the inconveniences attending a married state, as the uncertainty of childbearing; the rapid consumption of life and property; the occasion of frequent quarrels; and the like. But of these, I will speak more particularly in the next chapter.

36 | Ver. 30. | Seek not a second wife.—This advice the apostle gave, because it was better, in a time of persecution, for one to suffer alone, than to increase his afflictions by the sufferings of a wife and children.

37 | Ver. 30. | The time being short.—Doddridge thinks this clause might be translated, The time being contracted; because the word τὸν χρόνον properly denotes a tall furled up.

38 | Ver. 31. | As not abusing it.—The compound word ἀποκάταστασις, to abuse, is put sometimes for the simple word ἀπόκαταστασις, to use; so that, as Bishop Pearce observes on this verse, the clause might be translated as not using it. See Grotius on 1 Cor. ix. 7, 8, and 1 Tim. iv. 5, 6, in his Theorist.

39 | For the form of this world (τὰ αἰῶνα) passeth by;—namely, like a pageant. But Grotius interprets the allusion is to the shifting of scenes in a theatre. See 1 John ii. 17, where the word is used to express the transitory perishable nature of the things of the present life.
LEAD YOU TO WHAT IS HONORABLE, AND WELL BECOMING THE LORD, WITHOUT FORCIBLE DRAGGING.

36 But if any one think he acteth improperly toward his virgin, if she be above age and married, and is so minded, let him do what she inclineth; he doest not sin: let such marry.

37 But he who standeth in his heart, not having necessity, and hath power (and) doeth so of his own will, and hath determined this in his own heart to keep his virgin, doth well.

38 So then, even he who giveth her in marriage doth well; but he who giveth her not in marriage doeth not sin.

39 A wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she pleaseth; only in the Lord.

40 But she is happier if she so abideth, according to my judgment, (see ver. 10, note 2); and I am certain that even I have the Spirit of God.

\[\text{antithetikos, being derived from antitheton, means a thing different ways or forces, may be translated, without forcible dragging. The argument by which the apostle, in this and in the preceding verses, recommended celibacy to the Corinthians, have been urged by the papists in support of the rules of their church, which oblige the faithful to marry, and by which the Scriptures have been rightly and properly applied by them. Nevertheless, when it is considered that the apostle's advice was suited to Christians in the then persecuted state of the church, and were addressed only to such as could live chastely unmarried, it may fairly be presumed, that the papists have stretched his advice farther than the apostle intended, when they represent them as binding, in all ages and conditions, on those who wish to live piously. The reasons advanced by the apostle for persevering the single to the married state, are, that unmarried persons of both sexes have more leisure than the married, 'to care for the church of God, and for the things of Christ, and to render themselves holy in body and spirit.' These reasons, however, are not peculiar to the clergy, but are applicable to all. In the first place, the nature of Christianity, next to their believing on Christ, men's greatest duty was publicly to confess their faith in him, how great soever the evil that might be inflicted on them on this account. For by the confession of their faith, especially if they sealed that confession with the death of their bodies, they would be witnesses for Christ in the world. This was an object of such importance, that our Lord solemnly declared, 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, in a time of persecution, him will I confess also before my Father who is in heaven.' But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny, aec. I therefore suppose that the public confession of one's faith in Christ in a time of persecution, is what the apostle calls 'caring for the things of the Lord,' and 'pleasing the Lord;' and that the rendering of one's self body, both in body and spirit, was more particularly required for that end; as, without a great degree of holiness, no one could confess Christ before men in a time of persecution. Thus in the Gentile church, as difficult as it was necessary, the separation of both sexes might perform it with the greater ease, the apostle recommended to both a single state, if they could live therein consistent; because, being fastened to the world with fewer ties, they would leave it with the less regret, when called to die for the gospel.

\[\text{2. And so needs to be married.-This is the literal translation of the word \textit{eunuchios}, the word married being supplied, conformably to the scope of the passage. Accordingly, the Kyrillic version of this passage, as Tyconius hath translated it, is, 'Good presbyterianus ejus, et non tradiderit eam viro, conversiones earum sunt at justam causam?' Because her time hath passed, and he hath not given her a husband according to the law.'}

\[\text{Ver. 38.} \text{Doth better.}-Both what is more for the benefit of his daughter; because, if she agrees to it, by keeping her in her own family unmarried, she will be exposed to fewer temptations than if she were married, and in a better condition for acquiring that holiness in body and spirit, which will enable her to adhere to the gospel in a time of persecution.}

\[\text{Ver. 39.} \text{Bound by the law.}-This may be the law of the state, called the law of faith, and the law of liberty; or it may be the law of marriage, given to Adam and Eve in paradise. Either way understood, the apostle repeats what he had enjoined in the preceding part of the chapter, ver. 10, 12, 13, namely, that the Corinthian women were not to leave their husbands on account of the troubles which, in that time of persecution, attended the married state.

\[\text{2. Only in the Lord.}-That is, her second husband must be a Christian. This phrase signifies, 2 Cor. vii. 14. 'I know a man in Christ, I know a Christian man.' The point of this verse is, that the Gentiles expressly forbade the Corinthian women to marry infidels, 2 Cor. vi. 14.

\[\text{Ver. 40.} \text{And I am certain that even I have the Spirit of God.}-The word \textit{Foes}, in this, as in many other passages, does not express doubt, but certainty. Thus, 1 Cor. iv. 9, 10, 'I am certain God hath, &c., &c.'

\[\text{Ver. 41.}-1. \text{If therefore any one (\textit{eunuchos}) is a position that the word \textit{eunuchos} should actually fall short.}-Mark x. 22. 'O \textit{Eunuchos}, thou shalt exercise rule.' Luke viii. 18. 'What (\textit{eunuchos}) he is really hath.'-1 Cor. xii. 21. 'If any one (\textit{eunuchos}) receives to becontented.'

\[\text{Ver. 42.}-1. \text{If any one (\textit{eunuchos}) really is a prophet.'}-To show that the Greeks themselves used the word to denote certainty and reality, Dr. Usher, in De Spectris, says, \textit{ευνοούσιοι} έιλλησιον, και ειλλησιον αεικονισθαν συνειλησιοι σημειοι και ευανακριβες σημειοι. The ancients, not always to express what is doubtful, but likewise to express what is certain.}

\[\text{From these examples it is evident that the word \textit{eunuchos}, in this verse, does not imply that the apostle was in any doubt whether he was inspired in giving this judgment: It is only a soft way of expressing his certain knowledge of his own inspiration, and his confidence in the truth of the false teachers, who called his inspiration in question.}

CHAPTER VIII.

View and Illustration of the Matters in this Chapter.

When the heathens offered sacrifices of such animals as were fit for food, a part of the carcass was burnt on the altar, a part was given to the priest, and on the remainder the offerers feasted with their friends, either in the

I. The idol’s temple, or at home. Sometimes also a part was sent as a present to such as they wished to oblige; and if the sacrifice was large, a part of it was sold in the public market, which was lawful under the gospel, consequently that they might be eaten in common places, ver. 8. The apostle replied, that, in the use of their Christian liberty of eating all kinds of meats without distinction, they were bound to take care not to lead the weak into sin by their example, ver. 9. He told them they would certainly do, by eating the sacrifices of idols. For, said he, if a weak brother, who knew not that an idol was a thing that was offered to idols, and who knew that it is no god, sitting at the feast on the sacrifice in the idol’s temple, would not his ill-informed conscience be encouraged by thy example to eat of that meat as sacrificed to a real god? ver. 10. And thus, through an improper use of thy knowledge, shall thy weak brother commit idolatry and perish, for whom Christ died, ver. 11. Such a conduct the apostle termed, a ‘sinning against the brethren and against Christ,’ ver. 12. Then, in a high strain of Christian benevolence, he declared, that if his eating any kind of flesh occasioned his brother to sin, he would abstain from it all his life, ver. 13. By saying this, the apostle insinuated to the facetious, that whoever they might pretend to be real masters for judging the heathens in their idolatrous feasts were of a sensual kind. They loved good cheer and merriment. But for the salvation of their brethren, it was their duty willingly to have denied themselves all such gratifications.

New Translation.

CHAP. VIII. I. Now, concerning things sacrificed to idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but love buildeth up.

2 (Ecc. 10.6) If, therefore, any one is confident (see chap. vii. 40. note) of knowing anything, he hath known nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any one love God, the same is made to know by him. If, therefore, any one is confident of knowing anything, he hath known nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any one love God, the same is made to know by him in a right manner.

 Commentary.

CHAP. VIII. I. Now, concerning the arguments you mentioned for eating things sacrificed to idols, we know that most of us (see ver. 7.) have knowledge of the vanity of idols. Knowledge, however, often puffeth up the person who hath it, but love buildeth up others.

3 If, therefore, any one is confident of knowing anything, he hath known nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any one love God, the same is made to know by him in a right manner.
Concerning then, the eating of things sacrificed to idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is no other God but one.

(1) For certainly, though there be who are called gods, whether in heaven or upon earth, (even as there be gods many, and lords many,)

(2) And to us there is but one God, the Father, (ε) of whom all things are, and we (οὑχον) to him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, (δ) by whom all things are, and (δ) by him.

(3) However, this knowledge is not in all for some, until this hour, in the conscience of the idol as a God, eateth as a thing sacrificed to the idol as a God; and their conscience being weak, is defiled.

(4) But meat does not recommend us to God: for neither if we eat, do we abound; neither if we do not eat, are we deficient.

(5) Nevertheless, take heed, lest perhaps this right of yours become a stumbling-block to the weak.

(6) For if any one see thee who hast knowledge (ἀφροδίσσευμα) at table in an idol’s temple, will not the conscience of him who is weak (σώματος ἤνωτος), be built up, be encouraged to eat things sacrificed to idols?

(7) And (ἐν τῷ) through this thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, (see Rom. xiv. 15. note A.) for whom Christ died?

(8) But thus sinning against the brethren, and wounding their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ.

I. CORINTHIANS.

(9) In the transitive sense. See Ex. iv. 7. Accordingly Beza, in his note, translates it, Scire factum esse ab eo—is made to know by him.

(10) But others think the pronoun ἑαυτός, refers to God, the immediate ancestor, and translates the clause thus: He (God) is his own; namely, in a proper manner; and observe that ἑαυτός is used in many places in a self-expressive manner.

(11) Ver. 3. The eating of things sacrificed to idols.—The custom of feasting on the sacrifices in the temples was of high antiquity.

(12) The word ἐρήμησις, offal or sheep, and sent to Pharaoh, and to the princes that were with him, namely, to come and feast with him on the sacrifices. So also, Numb. xxv. 20. The daughters of Pharaoh brought off their lambs and sheep, and sent them to Pharaoh, and to the princes that were with him.

(13) And the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods. See below, ver. 19. That they ate these sacrifices sometimes in their own houses, is plain from 1 Cor. xxvii. 26, and that parts of them were sold in the public markets, appears from ver. 26. Of these customs, Plutarch likewise hath made mention, Ἡρωδίας, Act. iii. 10. line 117.

(14) Sacrificant! Dant tabernam mihi majorem, quam sibi! Abundant ad eandem: me ad an, ad prandum, ad common vocant.

(15) We know that an idol is nothing.—The Greek word τύχος, translated idol, signifies an image formed in the mind, and which exists nowhere else. Wherefore, to show that the gods of the heathens were mere creations of the human imagination, the Jews, who were the immortals, were long ago, by a proper name, called τύχαιοι, i.e. by word likewise, they signified the pictures and statues which the heathens called gods, or their temples as representations of gods; and by giving them the appellation of idols, they declared their persuasion, that the things of which they were the representations, had no existence. Nevertheless, as the apostles knew that some of the heathens worshipped their dead ancestors, legislators, kings, &c. of them the heavenly bodies, others certain kinds of brute animals, he cannot be understood to say that an idol is nothing, in the sense of its having no existence as a being, but of its having no existence as a god.

(16) Ver. 5. Called gods, whether in heaven or upon earth.—This is an allusion to the famed division of the heathen gods into celestial and terrestrial. The former, whom they called καινούργιοι, gods, supposed to reside generally in the heavens. The latter, whom they called κατασκευασμένοι, demones, see chap. x. 23 note, residing for the most part upon the earth or in the sea, and performing the office of mediators between the superior gods and men, directed terrestrial affairs. These were sometimes called, especially by St. Paul, devils, or demons, which is the literal translation of ὅμοιοι, they had also infernal gods, such as Pluto, Prosperpine, Rhadamanthus, &c. who ruled in the invisible world, judged the dead immediately on their death, and appointed them to their future happiness or to their punishment.

(17) And we to him. —Let him bow down to his gods. See LXX., Num. xxv. 3. God calleth them gods, and let him bow down to his gods.

(18) Ver. 7. Their conscience being weak is defiled. —The weakness of the conscience consists in the fear of being disapproved by men. And the defiling of their conscience consists in the fear of being disapproved by God. And the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the holy is understanding.

(19) Ver. 8. For neither if we eat, do we abound. —This is the argument by which the false teacher and his adherents justified their eating of the idol sacrifices. For they reasoned thus: Since the idol sacrifice consists of meat which the gospel allows us to eat, and the eating or the not eating of that meat, hath no influence to make us either better or worse men, it is a part of our Christian liberty to eat of the idol sacrifice, if we choose to do it. That this is the import of their argument, is evident from ver. 9, where the apostle replies, Nevertheless, take heed, lest perhaps this liberty or right of yours, become a stumbling-block to the weak.

(20) Ver. 9. This means, has this sense, chap. x. 4. —The apostle does not mean that they had a right to eat of the sacrifice of the idol in the idol’s temple, for the sinfulness of that practice he proves afterwards, chap. x. 13-23. But his meaning is, this right which ye claim.

(21) Ver. 10.—In the temple’s name. —ἐπί τῆς θεοῦς ἐπί τῷ ὀνόματι τῆς θεοῦς. Josephus, in his discourse against Appion, lib. 2. says, "The heathens offer hecious to their gods, (καὶ ἐν παλαιότεροις ἐν παλαιοτάτοις), and use their temples for their banquetting houses." This same expression is found in Judges xii. 27. Aq. note b. See ver. 4. note. 1.

13. Wherefore, if meat make my brother stumble, I will not eat flesh, that I make my brother stumble.

19. Wherefore, to occasion one's perishing being a great sin, I declare, if my meat make my brother fall into sin, I will never eat flesh, lest I make my brother fall into sin.

Ver. 13. I will not eat flesh.—To understand the propriety of the apostle's resolution, we must recollect, that in the heathen countries, with which Greece was most connected, all sacrifices were offered to their gods. And therefore, as the Jews were extremely scrupulous in every thing that had any relation to idolatry, it might be supposed that some occasions might be necessary for the Christians to abstain from every kind of flesh, to avoid giving offence to such converted Jews as still retained their ancient prejudices. This is what the apostle told the Corinthians he would do so long as he lived. They who imposed on their weak and scrupulous brethren things which they acknowledged to be indifferent, ought well to consider this passage, for it is one of the most solemn expositions of the word of God, touching the subject of which is written Rom. 14. 1. If the apostle would have eaten flesh, lest by so doing he might lead the weak to act contrary to their consciences, he would have answered as Christ, who, by heavy penalties, constrained others, contrary to their consciences, to comply with things which they themselves acknowledged to be indifferent.

Two false teachers having come to Corinth to enrich himself, we may suppose he was much disconcerted, when he found, that all the time the apostle had preached among the Corinthians he had taken nothing from them on account of his maintenance, nor on any other occasion. Wherefore, to remove the abstraction which Paul's disinterestedness had laid in the way of his copious designs, he boldly affirmed to the Corinthians, that Paul was no apostle, because he had not accompanied Christ during his ministry on earth, and that his demanding nothing from them for his maintenance, showed he was conscious to himself he was no apostle, and had no right to maintenance from the Corinthians. For if he knew himself to be an apostle, why did he not use the rights of an apostle? Why did he not lead about a sister, or a wife, to take care of him, as the other apostles did, and demand maintenance for her as well as for himself? This I suppose the false teacher had done. But be that as it may, he could not be doubted that the Corinthians, in their letter to the apostle, mentioned the particulars which his enemies objected to his character. Wherefore, after deciding some very difficult questions which the Corinthians had proposed to him, and particularly after affirming in the end of chap. vii. that he had decided these questions by the inspiration of the Spirit, and after showing himself a faithful and faithful apostle, in deciding in favor of his resolution on all occasions to be at pains to show his dependence on the will of God, by his resolution on all occasions to be at pains to show his dependence on the will of God, rather than, by using his liberty respecting them, to lead his fellow Christians into sin, he gave them great propriety introduced the proof of his apostleship, and answered all the objections and calumnies whereby his enemies endeavored to discredit him in the eyes of the Corinthians.

The proof of his apostleship St. Paul discussed in a few words, by asking the Corinthians, whether they did not know him to be an apostle? and a servant, who had a right to preach the gospel without reward, if he thought fit to do so? whether they did not know that he had seen the lord since his resurrection? and whether themselves were not his workmanship, as an apostle of Christ? ver. 1. —Whatever he might be to others, he was certainly an apostle to them; for their conversion from heathenism, followed with the spiritual gifts which he had conferred on them, was such an unquestionable proof of his apostleship, that they could entertain no doubt of it, ver. 2.

Next addressing the faction, he said, Mine answer to them who condemn me as no apostle is this: I have a right to be maintained at the charges of the persons to whom I preach, ver. 3. —I have a right also to lead about a wife, who is a believer, to take care of me, and I am entitled to demand maintenance for her likewise, even as the other apostles do, and the brethren of the Lord, and Peter, ver. 4.—Unless it is pretended, that of all the ministers of the gospel, I and Barnabas only have not that right, ver. 5.—His right to maintenance, he told them, was founded on the common sense and practice of mankind, who gave maintenance to soldiers, vine-dressers, and shepherds, in return for their labors, ver. 7.—It was founded also on the law of Moses, which forbade the Israelites to muzzle the ox while treading out the corn, ver. 8. —Wherefore, having shown in the minds of the Corinthians spiritual things that were, he shewed them the first knowledge of the gospel, it was no great return if he pertook of their carnal things, ver. 11. —especially as others (meaning the false teacher), who had but lately come among them, had been plentifully maintained by them. But though he had a complete right to maintenance, he had not used that right, but he endured every hardship, that the gospel might not be hindered, ver. 12. Further he told them his right was founded still more directly on another precept of the law, which appointed those who performed sacred offices to eat from the temple, ver. 13. —Nay, it was founded on the will of Christ, who had expressly authorized those to preach the gospel to live by the gospel, ver. 14. But the apostle being a free man, who was at liberty to do in that matter as he pleased, he had made use of none of these precepts and rights, neither did he mention them, on this occasion, to induce the Corinthians to give him maintenance; for he would rather die of want, than be deprived of glorying in having preached the gospel without receiving any support of his service, ver. 15. —The reason was, he had nothing to boast of in barely preaching the gospel, because his conviction of its truth, together with the command of Christ, laid him under such a necessity of preaching, that he would be absolutely miserable if he did not make known things which were of so great importance to the world, ver. 16. —Now, said he, if I do this with such willingness as to endure every hardship in the course of the work for the sake of doing it successfully, I shall obtain a distinguished reward. Whereas, if a stewardship of the gospel is forced on me against my will, and I discharge it as one constrained to undertake it, I shall have no distinguished reward, ver. 17. —What then, is the ground of the distinguished reward which I look for? Why this, that when preaching the gospel, I do it without burdening the persons to whom I preach, in order that I may make the gospel successful, by not abusing the power which the gospel gives me of demanding maintenance. For I, who aim at a distinguished reward, would abuse that power, if, by demanding maintenance, I hindered the success of my preaching, ver. 18. —For the same reason, though I be a free man with respect to all men, (see ver. 1.), I have made myself a slave to all men, by complying with their prejudices and humour, as far as I could do it innocently, that I might gain more disciples to Christ, ver. 19. —More particularly, to the Jews I became as a Jew; &c. ver. 20, 21, 22. —All this I do, for the sake of preaching the gospel successfully, that I may become a joint partaker of the rewards of the gospel with the most eminent apostles, ver. 23.
New Translation.

I. CORINTHIANS.

2. If to others I be not an apostle, yet to you at least I am, for the seal 1 of mine apostleship ye are in the Lord.

3. Mine answer to them who condemn me, is this, Have we not a right to eat and to drink?

4. Have we not a right to lead about a sister wife, 2 as the other apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? 3

5. Or have I only and Barnabas 4 not a right to forbear working?

6. Who serveth in the works of God at his own charges at any time? Who planteth a vineyard, and doeth not eat of the fruit of it? Or who feedeth sheep, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?

7. Do I speak these things according to man? (Rom. vi. 19. note 1) Only 5 or doth not the law, also, say these things?

8. For in the law of Moses it is written, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox treading out the corn.

9. Doth God take care of oxen only?

10. Or, (Gal. 5. 21.) doth he command this chiefly for our sakes? For our sakes he 6 certainly it was written: because he which

Ver. 2. The seal of mine apostleship ye are in the Lord. This the Corinthians must have understood to be the name given to the apostles in 2 Cor. xii. 12, that they had been converted by his working among them miracles, etc. (Vers. 3.) for this was certainly among his conversions. It was also spiritual gifts given on many of them, in such abundance, that as a church, they were inferior to no church whatever. 1 Cor. x. 30.

Ver. 3. To them who condemn me.—For this sense of the word, see chap. ii.  3 note 1. The apostle's enemies did not, as our translators express it, examine him about his not taking maintenance; as little did they pretend to examine him concerning his apostleship. But they urged his not taking maintenance, as a proof that he knew himself to be no apostle. This St. Paul termed a condemning him.

Ver. 4. Have we not a right to eat and to drink?—The right which all the ministers of the word had to be maintained by their disciples, the apostles expressed by a right 'to eat and to drink,' because they 'had nothing to sell.' Matt. x. 9. Provide not for gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses; 10. For the workman is worthy of his meat.' Is like manner to the seventh, Luke x. 7. 'In the same house sabbath, eating and drinking such things as they give, for the labourer is worthy of his hire.'—The word power, by which our translators have rendered apostles, does not express the apostle's meaning: Power is only an ability to do a thing; whereas, the apostle means a right to do what he is speaking of.

Ver. 5. If there be among you a sister wife, that is, a Christian wife; or the translation may be, a sister woman, a Christian woman, from 1 Sam. xix.  27, as quoted by Whiston. They carried their wives about, not as do sisters, to minister to those who were mistresses of families: that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without any addition, enter into the apartments of the women. Nevertheless, the manner in which this affair is spoken of, inclines one to think, that the sister wife, or servant, was not so much to minister to, as to instruct them in the female sex. In the eastern countries, for this was mentioned Rom. xvi. 1. note 2, when people went to travel, they were lodged with the acquaintances, or carried servants with them, who provided such things as were necessary to their accommodation in the public lodging-houses. In the Gentile countries, this was not so common, for they had no acquaintance or friends with whom they could lodge; and therefore some of them, as Paul, the Corinthians, and the other apostles, were compelled to carry about with them a wife to make provision for them, at the expense of those to whom they preached. This right, Paul told the Corinthians, he sold as much as was sufficient for the maintenance of other apostles; but, to render the gospel free of charge, he neither had used this right, ver. 12, nor ever would use it, ver. 16. Wherever he came, he maintained himself by his own labour.

Ver. 6. As the other apostle,—It seems all the apostles took maintenance from their disciples, except Paul.

3. And Cephas 7.—From this we learn, that Peter, here called by his original name, continued to live with his wife after he became an apostle; also, that Peter, as an apostle, possessed no rights which were not common to Paul, and to all the rest. These are I mention, because, traced to their obvious consequences, they utterly subvert the main pillars of popery.

Ver. 8. Or have I only and Barnabas?—From this it appears, that Barnabas, as well as Paul, preached the gospel without demanding maintenance from his disciples; and that, like Paul, he was hated for his doctrine by the Judaeans. See Pref, 2 Cor. sect. 2, at the end. The honourable mention which Paul made of Barnabas, in this passage of his epistle to the Corinthians, deserves notice, as it shows that these good men, notwithstanding their sharp contentions with John, and as much as he had warned the Corinthians, promised no resentment against each other on that account, but mutually esteemed each other, as is evident from some occasions after that the gospel together as before.

Ver. 9. Muzzle the ox treading out the corn.—The people of the east did not thresh their corn as we do; but they pressed out the grain by causing oxen to tread on the ears. This argument from the law of Moses may have been intended for the Jewish converts, as Paul, some time before, had joined the false teachers. The same may be said of the argument, ver. 13.
CRIT. IX.

I. CORINTHIANS.

171. I besought, urged, to plow in hope; and he who thresheth in hope, OUGHT to partake of his own hope.

11. If we have our own spiritual things in you, is it a great matter if we shall reap your carnal things?

12. If others partake of (Gal. 71.) this power over you, I OUGHT not we rather 1 (1 Cor. 8.) Nevertheless, we have not used this power; (1 Cor. 8.) but we bear all things, that we may not give any hindrances to the gospel of Christ.

13. Do ye not know, that they who perform sacred offices eat (1) from the temple? They who wait at the altar, do not they share with the altar?

14. So also the Lord hath appointed them who preach the gospel, to live (1) by the gospel.

15. But I have used none of these precepts: neither have I written these things that it should be so done (2) to me: for it were good for me rather to die, than that any one should make my boasting void. (See 2 Cor. xi. 7—10.)

16. For (1 Cor. 124.) when I preach the gospel, I have nothing to boast of; because necessity is laid upon me; yes, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel.

17. (1 Thess. 97.) Now, if I do this willingly, I have a reward; but if unwillingly I am instructed with the stewardship, I HAVE NO REWARD. (See Rom. xii. 6; note 3.)

18. What then to me is the reward! That when preaching, (1 Thess. 97.) I shall establish the gospel of Christ without charge, in order that I may not abuse my power in the gospel.

19. (1 Thess. 93.) Therefore, though I be a freeman (1 Cor. 124.) (1 Cor. 124.) with respect to all men, I have enshield myself to all, that I might gain the more.

20. (1 Cor. 124.) So to the Jews, I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to those under the law, I became as one under the law, that I might gain those under the law; impress the Israelites with a sense of the obligations of justice and humanity towards rational creatures, as the apostle here affirms.

Ver. 12—1. Power over you.]—ἐπιτηρεῖτε ὑμᾶς. We have the same expression of Mat. x. 1. John xvi. 2. The others who partook of this power over them were the teachers of the faction, who at the expense of the Corinthians lived in great luxury among them. (1 Cor. 124.) 3. & Cor. xi. 20.

2. Hindrance to the gospel.]—By preaching the gospel free of expense, the apostle rendered it more acceptable to the Gentiles, and drew them more readily to hear him. There was another reason also for his demanding no reward for preaching; namely, that in future ages mankind might be sensibly, that in preaching the gospel he was not animated by any worldly motive, but merely by a full persuasion of its truth. Foreseeing, therefore, that his disinterestedness would win in all ages a strong proof of the truth of the gospel, the apostle gloried in preaching it to all men without fee or reward. See ver. 15.

3. They who wait at the altar.—In the original it is τοὺς ἀκολουθούς συνδέοντας, who sit at the altar; a phrase which denotes continual and persevering service at the altar. In the first clause of the verse, the service of the Levites is supposed to be done alongside of; but in this clause, the service of the priests.

4. I have a reward.—I shall obtain that distinguished reward, which in the life to come will be bestowed on them who turn many to righteousness, and who in that work undergo great hardships. This was St. Paul's case, who in his journey underwent innumerable dangers, hardships, and bodily fatigues.

Ver. 15. What then to me is the reward?]—This is an elliptical expression, which the scope of the apostle's discourse directs us to supply, as I have done in the commentary.

Ver. 19—1. I have enshield myself to all.—ἐπιτηρεῖτε ὑμᾶς. There is a peculiar beauty in the original expression. Slaves were wont for their masters without hire, and were careful to comply with their humours, The apostle, while preaching the gospel, reduced himself to the condition of a slave, both by serving all men without hire, now, without requiring maintenance from them, and by complying with their prejudices, in all cases where he could do it without sin.

2. That I might gain the more.—ἐπεί. By using this word, the apostle insinuates, that his conversion came not in the sight of the gain or hire which he proposed to obtain by preaching the gospel.

Ver. 20. To the Jews I became as a Jew.]—In the preceding chapter, the apostle ordered the Corinthians to comply with the prejudices of their weak brethren in the affairs of meats sacrificed to idols, and declared his own resolution, that if his eating meat occasioned others to sin, he would not eat flesh while he lived. It is therefore probable, that his design being to persuade the Corinthians to observe the distinction of meats enjoined by Moses, while he lived with the Jews in the heathen countries. Also, it may refer to his accustoming Titus to be circumcised, a matter of great importance to the Jews. These compliances with the prejudices of the weak shoew only to gain their good-will. For when the Judaizing teach-21 To persons not subject to the law of Moses, I became as not subject to that law, by not enforcing it on them, (yet not being without the law of God written on my heart, but under the law enjoined by Christ,) that I might gain the Gentiles who are without the law, and averse to its rites.

22 To the weak, I became as weak, that I might gain the weak. To all I have become all things, that by all means I might save some.

23 (As 103.) Now, this I do for the sake of the gospel, and that I may become a joint partaker of its rewards.

Do ye not know that they who run in the race run indeed all, but one only receiveth the prize? So run that ye may lay hold on the prize.

25 (As 103.) Now, every one who contendeth, is temperate in all things: They, indeed, that they may receive a fad ing crown, but we one that does not fade.

I therefore so run, (As we above,) as out of view: So I box, as not beating the air.

27 But I bruise my body, and lead it captive; last perhaps (as we above) having proclaimed what pertained to the gospel of Christ, as we do in all things. If any one do not allow his own body to be under the power of the soul, he is not bringing it under its power, but being led captive by the devil.

28 But I strive with my body, and bring it into subjection: For I bear the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ.

29 For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.

30 But if I should abide yet in the flesh, this will I know, I know not. And I am persuaded, yea, and believe, that, like as I have been delivered out of the law of sin and death through the law, even so shall I be delivered through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

31 I desire therefore, that whether present or absent, I may work the will of him who loved me, even Christ.
CHAPTER X.

View and Illustration of the Matters handled in this Chapter.

The apostle's design in this chapter cannot be rightly understood, unless we suppose the Corinthians, in their letter, to have put three questions to him concerning meats sacrificed to idols. First, Whether they might innocently go with their heathen acquaintance into the idol's temple, and partake of the feasts on the sacrifices which were eaten there in honour of the idol? Secondly, Whether they might buy and eat meats sold in the markets, which had been sacrificed to idols? Thirdly, Whether, when invited to the houses of the heathen, they might eat of meats sacrificed to idols, which were set before them as a common meal? To the first of these questions the apostle answered, chap. vii. That their joining the heathen in their feasts on the sacrifices in the idol's temple, even on the supposition that it was a thing in itself innocent, would be a thing in itself weak brethren, in case it ought to be avoided; but whether such a practice were a thing innocent or sinful in itself, he did not on that occasion consider. In this chapter, therefore, he resumed the subject, that he might treat of it fully, and answer the other questions proposed to him by the Corinthians relative to that matter.

The false teacher, to free the brethren from their scruples respecting the feasts on the sacrifices in the idol's temple, had, I suppose, told them, that their knowledge and profession of the gospel rendered them so much the objects of the favour of God, that he would not be displeased with them, if, to gain the favour of the heathens, and to save themselves from persecution, they partook of those feasts. But the apostle shewed, that however their eating of these sacrifices might have to pollute them, assuredly their baptism, but especially their eating the Lord's supper, would have a greater influence to sanctify them. The conclusion of these fallacious arguments the apostle brought from what happened to the Israelites, the sacrifices brought from Egypt by them, which were free from the divine favour as the disciples of Christ could be. They were led out of Egypt under the cloud, and made to pass through the Red Sea in a miraculous manner, ver. 1.—By being in the cloud and in the sea; when they were all baptized into the belief that Moses was commissioned by God to deliver them, ver. 2.—They ate all the same spiritual meat, and drank the same spiritual drink, ver. 3, 4.—In short, they all enjoyed the favour of God, together with the external privileges belonging to his people, in as ample a manner as the professed disciples of Christ did. And, therefore, if external privileges, accompanied with the divine favour, could here secure those who possessed such advantages from displeasing God, the Israelites must always have continued the objects of his favour. Nevertheless they refused to go into Canaan, for which sin God was so exceedingly displeased with them, that he destroyed them all in the wilderness except Caleb and Joshua, ver. 5.—To bring these things home to the Corinthians, the apostle shewed, that he had told them, that the heathens brought destruction on persons so high in favour with God, as examples to mankind in every age, to prevent them from lusting after the pleasures of the table, as the Israelites lusted after the fleshpots of Egypt, ver. 6.—and from becoming idolaters, as many of them became, when, dancing round the altar which Aaron had raised, they worshipped the golden calf in the frantic manner in which the heathens worshipped their idols, ver. 7.—and from committing whoredom, as many of them did with the daughters of Moab, for which twenty-three thousand of them were slain in one day, ver. 8.—and from tempting Christ by distorting his care, as the Israelites tempted God by speaking against him and against Moses, for bringing them out of Egypt to destroy them, that for that great sin were destroyed of serpents, ver. 9.—and from murmuring at the restraints laid on them by the gospel, and at the sufferings to which they were exposed in their passage to heaven, as the Israelites murmured on account of the difficulties they had to encounter in taking possession of Canaan, and were destroyed, ver. 10.—All these things which had happened to them happened as examples, and are written for our instruction, that we may avoid courses which proved so destructive to them, ver. 11.—The whoredom of the Israelites with the daughters of Moab, was mentioned to the Corinthians on this occasion with singular propriety, because the Moabish women tempted the Israelites to commit fornication, by inviting them to partake of the sacrifices of their gods; the very thing which the apostle was exhorting the Corinthians to avoid.

As the foregoing facts, recorded in the scriptures, were set before the Corinthians, to shew them how dangerous it is for persons who are the objects of God's favour, and who enjoy great external privileges, to fancy that their sins are not displeasing to God, the apostle drew this conclusion from the whole: "Wherefore, let him who thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," ver. 13. And by taking notice that the Corinthians were exposed to none but common temptations, he insinuated that there was no reason for their being so anxious to gain the favour of the heathens; especially as God, who hath promised to assist his people, is faithful, and will not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able to bear; or with the temptation will make a passage for them out of it, ver. 13. In short, idleness having proved so ruinous to the ancient Israelites, the apostle earnestly exhorted the Corinthians to "flee from it," ver. 14.

But the false teacher, it seems, had told the Corinthians, that their partaking with the heathens in their feasts on the sacrifices in the idol temple, was no idolatry, and that an idol worship was nothing in the world, because to such it was only a common meal. In what follows, therefore, the apostle proved, that such an action was a real worshiping of the idol on whose sacrifice they feasted. And to draw the attention of the Corinthians to what he was going to say, he told them he would speak to them on the subject as to wise men, (an expression of which the Greeks were accustomed to use), and desired them to judge impartially of what he should say to them, ver. 15. Do not we, said he, who are the disciples of Christ, consider our joint drinking of the cup in the Lord's supper, as a symbol of our joint partaking of the benefits procured by the shedding of the blood of Christ? And our joint eating of the loaf in the Lord's supper, as a symbol of our joint partaking of the benefits belonging to the body or church of Christ? ver. 16. And because there is one loaf used in the Lord's supper, we, the many who partake of it, are hereby declared to be one body or society, under the government of one head, and to be animated by the same principles, and act in harmony with each other, ver. 17. The Jews, likewise, entertain the same sentiments with respect to those who join in their religious services. Do they not hold, that the persons who eat of the sacrifices offered to the God of Israel, are joint partakers of his altar; that is, join in the worship performed to him on the altar, and partake of the benefits procured by that worship? ver. 18.

By parity of reason, they who in the idol's temple eat of the sacrifices offered to the idol, are justly considered by the heathens as joining in the worship of their gods, and as declaring their desire jointly to share with them in the blessings which their gods are supposed to bestow. Nay, they consider them as holding communion with them, both in their principles and practices. This application of the argument, indeed, the apostle hath not made; but in the following verse he supposes his readers to have made it; for he adds, What then do I affirm, namely, when I say that your eating the sacrifices of idols is a joint participation in their worship? Do I affirm that an idol is a god? or that the sacrifices offered to idols are sacrifices to beings who are gods? ver. 19. By no means. But I affirm that the sacrifices which the heathens offer, they offer to demons; that is, to the souls of dead men, and to evil spirits, neither of which are gods; since they have no power in the government of the universe, as the heathens fancy. And I would not have you to be joint partakers with the worshippers of demons, either in their principles, their practices, or their expectations, ver. 20. Besides, the worship of the true God is incompatible with the worship of demons; for it consists in good dispositions and virtuous actions, while the worship of demons consists in vile affections, lewdness, and all manner of debauchery. Therefore, ye cannot consistently partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons, ver. 21. Some of you pretend, that ye eat the sacrifices of idols to shew your belief that an idol is nothing. But I reply, ye thereby provoke the Lord to jealousy; because, by the heathens, your eating of these sacrifices is considered as an honouring and worshipping of the idol. Now, before ye give the heathens reason to think that ye pay to their idols the honour which is due to Christ, ye should know that ye are stronger than Christ, to defend yourselves against his wrath, ver. 22.

With respect to the questions, whether the meats sacrificed to idols, which were sold in the markets, might be eaten by Christians; and whether they might eat of these meats in the houses of the heathens, when set before them as a common, not as a religious meal; the apostle observed, first, that although under the gospel all meats are lawful to every person, all meats are not expedient for every person. And even in cases where they are expedient, the eating of them is not a mark of other's, ver. 23. Secondly, that in the use of meats, one ought to study, not his own advantage only, but the advantage of his neighbour also, ver. 24. And having laid down these principles, he desired the Corinthians to eat whatever was sold in the shambles, without inquiring whether it had been sacrificed to idols or not; because they knew that idolatry is nothing in the world, but that the earth is the Lord's, and all that it contains, ver. 25, 26. And if a heathen invited them to his house, and they inclined to go, they were to eat whatever was set before them, taking no questions for conscience' sake; because by no reasonable construction could that action be considered as a worshipping of idols, even though the meat itself had been sacrificed to an idol, ver. 27. But if, on such an occasion, either a heathen, or a Jew, or a weak Christian, should say to them, this is most sacrificed to an idol, they were to abstain from it, on account of the weak conscience of him who showed it; because, by shewing it, he declared that he considered the eating of that meat as a partaking of the works of other's, ver. 28. If thou reply, Why should my liberty be governed by another's opinion? and seeing God hath allowed me to eat all kinds of meat, why should I be blamed for eating any particular meat, for which I give God thanks? ver. 29, 30. My answer is, For the very reason that by the free gift of God all his good creatures are bestowed on thee, thou art bound, in eating and drinking, as in all thy actions, to commit the glory of God, who has commanded thee, even if in indifferent actions, to consider what may be good for the edification of others, ver. 31. I therefore exhort you, in using your Christian liberty, to become no occasion of stumbling, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God, ver. 32. This is the rule I myself follow; not seeking mine own advantage only, but the advantage of others also, that they may be saved, ver. 33. And you should become imitators of me in this disinterestedness, even as also I am therein an imitator of Christ, chap. xi. 1. By telling the Corinthians that he followed this rule, and that, in following it, he imitated the disinterestedness of the Lord Christ, he affirms that the rule which every good Christian teacher was of a different kind. He regarded only his own gratification and profit, and had no regard to the advantage of others.

NEW TESTAMENT.

CHAP. X.—1 (a) Ye think yourselves so much in favour with God, that he will not be displeased though ye eat the sacrifices of idols. But I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and all were baptized into Moses (see chap. I. 12, note 3.) in the cloud and in the sea; and all did eat the same spiritual meat; (Exod. xvi. 12.)

2 And all did drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of the spiritual Rock which followed them; and that Rock was Christ. (Exod. xvi. 12.)

3 Nevertheless, with the greater part of them God was not well pleased; for they were cast down in the wilderness.

6 Now, these things have become examples to us, in order that we should not be lusters after evil things, even as they lusted.

7 Neither be ye idolaters, as some of them were; as it is written, (Exod. xxiii. 6.) The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to dance.

10 Let us commit ourselves to God, as some

Ver. 1.—Our fathers:—that is, our predecessors in the church of God. For the Corinthian church being chiefly composed of Gentiles, the Israelites could not be called their natural fathers. Or the word theos, which the Latin Vulgate renders Dei, means the God of the fathers. Ver. 2. All were under the cloud. —See 2 Pet. i. 17, note 2. The Israelites were defended from the Egyptians by the cloud, Exod. xiv. 20. "It was a cloud and darkness to them, but gave it light by night to these; so that the one came not near the other all the night." And see Exod. xiv. 19. "This cloud stood over them. Some are of opinion, that in these parts of the wilderness where the streams from the rock could not nourish the Israelites, they received rain for drink by showers from the cloud; and to this they apply Psal. lxxxvii. 9. 'Thou, O Lord, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby they then didst confirm thine abode with us." Ver. 3. In the cloud, and in the sea. —The Israelites, by being hid from the Egyptians under the cloud, and by passing through the sea, were made to declare their belief in the Lord and in the servant Moses. Exod. xiv. 21. The apostle very properly represents him as "baptized" into the cloud and in the sea.

Ver. 4. The same spiritual meat. —The manna was called the same spiritual meat because the spiritual blessings which it typified were the same in type and substance, whether in the days of Moses or in the days of John vi. 31. which the Corinthians ate, and by which they thought themselves secured against being日内 by eating the idol sacrifices. Ver. 4, note 3.—We have the word spiritual used in the same sense of typical. Rev. xvi. 8. "Which spiritually (that is typically) is called Manna, and was given our fathers in the wilderness, when they came out of Egypt; who had now a true table in heaven." Ver. 5. And that signification true doctrine in particular, appears from Psal. lxxxvii. 3. and that it signified true doctrine in particular, appears from Psal. lxxxvii. 3. where the manna is called sages food. Ver. 4. That the rock was of the spiritual rock. —Here the rock is put for the water that came out of the rock. Water was twice brought from a rock by miracles for the Israelites in the wilderness. Once in Rephidim in the wilderness of Sin, which was their eleventh station after they came out of Egypt, and before they came to Mount Sinai. The second time water was brought from a rock near Bezek, in the wilderness of Zin, which was their thirty-third station. This happened in the fortieth year of the Exodus, soon after Miriam's death. Num. xx. 1. It is highly possible that the rock at Bezek, which was called Meribah Kadesh, to distinguish it from Meribah of Rephidim. It is of the miracle performed in Rephidim which the apostle speaks, for he says, the greater part of them who drank of the rock, were cast down in the wilderness.

Ver. 6. But they that drank of the stone which flowed out of the rock. —The rock here, as in the former clause, is put for the water from the rock. This it seems came forth from it in such abundance as to form a brook, which is said, Deut. ii. 19. to have descended out of the Mount, that is, out of Horeb, Exod. xvii. 5, 6, for before that miracle there was no brook in these parts. That which was the rock was the Mount Sinai, and not the river. Psal. lxv. 16. c. 4. The truth is, 600,000 men, with their women and children, and their cattle, required a river to supply them with water; and neither John the Baptist was one of the rock followers, nor of the rock, but he was one of the brooks of Rephidim. For as Wall observes, Crit. Notes, vol. i. p. 106. from Horeb, which was a high mountain, there may have been a descent to the sea; and therefore it may be, that after some years of journeying in the wilderness of Sin, may have gone by those tracts of country in which the waters from Horeb could follow them, till in the 38th year of the Exodus they came to Kadesh; for the waters were not brought from Horeb, and did not spring up immediately out of the earth, but they flowed out of the rock, and then were brought to the people, as it is said, Num. xxii. 1. But the rock did not always supply the people with water; for it is said, by another place of the Bible, 1 Kings vi. 9. that water was brought from the brooks. That is, Now go in the circle sacred to the goddess, crowned with flowers, dancing in the pleasant grove. From this it appears, that the place of the brook was very irregular; for the mere act of dancing was one of the principal parts of the worship of their gods. And that the Israelites worshipped the golden calf by dancing, is evident from Exod. xxiii. 19. where it is said of Aaron, 1 Cor. x. 7. That he saw the calf and the dancing, and Moses's anger waxed hot. Ver. 7.—Neither be ye idolaters. —By so means join the heathens in their idolatry. If persons whose friendship ye wish to cultivate tempt you to commit idolatry, neither your superior knowledge nor the spiritual gifts which you possess will abate the danger of being insensibly drawn out of those strict moral boundaries by which we are always placing a striking proof in the ancient Israelites. Ver. 8. But let us commit ourselves to God. —In ancient times the people always sat at meat, Gen. xxxii. 33. It was in later times only, that, in compliance with the manners of the Greeks and Romans, they lay on couches at their meals. 3. And rose up (+[z<v] to dance.) —In this sense the Greeks used the word κοιμέομαι, Aristophan. Ran. lin. 443. "Koiméo Mount, the dance. [κοίμης,] [κοίμητος,]". And having a dance. That is, "Now go in the circle sacred to the goddess, crowned with flowers, dancing in the pleasant grove." From this it appears, that the place of the brook was very irregular; for the mere act of dancing was one of the principal parts of the worship of their gods. And that the Israelites worshipped the golden calf by dancing, is evident from Exod. xxiii. 19. where it is said of Aaron, 1 Cor. x. 7. That he saw the calf and the dancing, and Moses's anger waxed hot. Ver. 8.—Neither let us commit ourselves to God. —This exhortation... of them committed whoredom, and fell in one day twenty-three thousand. 9 Neither let us grievously tempt Christ, as even some of them tempted, (Num. xxii. 6,) and perished by serpents. 10 Neither murmur ye, as even some of them murmured, and perished by the destroyer. (Num. xiv. 25.) 11 Now all these things happened to them as (asmov) types, examples, and are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come. 12 Wherefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall. 13 No temptation hath taken you, but such as belong to man; and God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what ye are able; but will make with the temptation also a passage out, that ye may be able to bear. 14 Wherefore, my beloved, flee from idolatry. 15 I speak as to wise men; but if any otherwise thinketh, he shall know that as he saith, 16 The cup of blessing (asup, acw) for which we bless, is it not the joint participation of the blood of Christ? 17 The loaf which we break, is it not the joint participation of the body of Christ? 18 (1 Cor. 11. 24.) Because there is one loaf; we the many are one body; for we all partake of that one loaf. 19 Look at Israel after the flesh. Are not the apostles gave to the Corinthians, because in their heathen state they had practised whoredom as an act of worship acceptable to their deities. See Pref. to this Epistle, sect. 2. Nay, after their conversion, some of them had not altered their manners in that particular, 2 Cor. xii. 21. 20. And fell in one day twenty-three thousand. Twenty-four thousand are said, Num. xxvi. 9. to have died of the plague. But if the number were more than twenty-three thousand, and less than twenty-four thousand, it would exactly express 24,000. 1-14. Ver. 9.—1. Neither let us grievously tempt Christ.—That Christ after his resurrection was invested with the government of the world, is evident from his own words, Matt. xxviii. 18. and from Eph. i. 20. xii. Wherefore, when the Corinthians, to avoid persecution, removed from the profane in their idolatrous feasts, they showed a great distrust of the power and goodness of their Master's government, or, as some understand it, they termed a grievous tempting of Christ. 2. As even some of them murmured, and perished by the destroyer. Wherein the person tempted by the Israelites was Christ, because he is mentioned immediately before. But that supposition makes Christ the person who spake the law to the Israelites at Sinai, contrary, I think, to Heb. i. 16. where it is said, God who spake to the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son. For God who spake to the fathers by the prophets, being the person who hath spoken to us by his Son, he cannot be the Son. 3. I therefore think the person tempted by the Israelites was God the Father, and that the word God might be supplied as properly as the word Christ. Yet I have not ventured to insert it in the translation, lest it should be thought too bold an innovation; though I am sensible it is the true method of communicating the sense. 4. And perished by serpents.—In the history these are called fiery serpents. Gemar is of opinion that these serpents were of the dragon kind, which Lucian hath described in his treatise entitled Deipnosoph, where, speaking of the desert of Lybia, he says, 'Of all the serpents which inhabit these solitudes, the most cruel is the dragon, as large as the ship, and poisonous; and those who are afflicted with it are cut off as if they were in the fire.' For an account of the dragon, see Kolic's State of Lybia, vol. ii. p. 317. Ver. 15. Perished (swyy by the destroyer.—This destroyer was called by the Jews the angel of death, and Samuel. Heb. xii. 29. 'Elm who is the devil,' and Heb. xii. 25. 'O swyy, He who destroyed the firstborn.' Ver. 16. Now all these things happened to them as examples.—Twe. The apostle's meaning is, that punishment inflicted on ancient men by extraordinary anger, makes us thankful of the divine vengeance to their own generation, and to all succeeding ages which have any knowledge of their history.
CRAP. X.

they who eat of the sacrifice, (saying) joint partakers of the altar? 19 What then do I affirm? that an idol is any thing, or that an idol sacrifice is any thing?

20 No: But that what the heathens sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God. (22) Now, I would not have you to become joint partakers with demons.

1 Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons: ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons.

2 Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he!

23 All meats 1 are lawful to me, but all are not expedient, (see ch. vi. 12;) all are lawful to me, but all do not edify.

24 Let no one seek his own ADVANTAGE only, but each to the other, (even) as Christ did also, (and) have the same mind.

25 Whatever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no question (Rom. 11:12,) on account of conscience.

26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. (Psalm iv. 1.)

27 And if any of the unbelievers invite you, and ye incline to go, whatever is set before you, eat, asking no question on account of conscience.

28 But if any one say to you, This is a thing sacrificed to an idol; do not eat on account of him who showed it, and of conscience: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; (Isa. 51:11.)

29 (22) Now, I say conscience, not thine own, but that of the other.

(1 Cor. 8:9-12.) But why is my liberty judged by another's conscience?

30 (24) Besides, if by grace I be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks?

sacrifices according to the law. For there is an Israel after the Spirit, a spiritual Israel, consisting of believers of all the world. These are called (Rom. 2:28.)

2. Paraphrase of the altar?—This argument, drawn from the sentiments of the Jews, was used with peculiar propriety in reasoning with the Hebrew apostle, who was a Jew, and who, to ingratiate himself with the Corinthians, had encouraged them to eat of the idol sacrifices.

Ver. 22. 1. They sacrifice to demons.—The word συμμετοχιας devo- meex, is used in the LXX. to denote the ghosts of men deceased; and Josephus. Bell. bib. vi. 6. says, "demons are the spirits of wicked men." It is therefore probable, that the writers of the New Testament used the word demons in the same sense, especially as it is well known that the greatest part of the heathen gods were dead men.

The heathens worshipped two kinds of demons,—the one kind were the souls of kings and heroes defiled after death, but who could have no agency in human affairs; the other kind of demons were those evil spirits, who, under the names of Jupiter, Apollo, Trophonius, &c., moved the heathen priests and priestesses to deliver oracles, greatly promoted idolatry. See 1 Cor. xiv. 20, note 5.

3. And not to God. —The heathens in general had no idea of God; only of the gods of the Persians, round whom the internal, immutable, and infinitely perfect Being, the Creator and Governor of all things.

Ver. 21. 1. The cup of demons.—In the heathen sacrifices, the priests, being desirous to satisfy the god, and to prove their sincerity in that service, then carried it to the orators, and to those who came with them, that they also might taste it, as joining in the sacrifice, and receiving benefit from it. Thus Virgil, Aenid viii. 273:

Quae aequa, 0 Jovenses, tantaunur in munera laudum,

Caurum frondes comas, et poculis porgos dari,

Communesque voces decem, et data vina volentes.

L. CORINTHIANS.

crifices, considered by them as joint partakers in the worship performed on the altar? By parity of reason, they who eat of the idol sacrifice, partake in the worship of the idol.

19 What then do I affirm? That an idol is a real God, contrary to what I have always taught you? Or that an idol sacrifice is a sacrifice to a real divinity?

20 I affirm neither of these: but that what sacrifices the heathens offer, they offer to demons, and not to God. Now, I would not have you, by eating their sacrifices, to become joint partakers with the spirits of demons, either in their worship, their principles, their practices, or their hopes.

21 Besides, as the worship of God consists in holy affections and virtuous actions, but the worship of demons in debauchery, ye cannot consistently drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons: ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons.

23 Since the heathens consider our eating of the sacrifice as a worshipping of the idol, do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he, to defend ourselves against the effects of his wrath?

25 With respect to meat, I acknowledge that under the gospel all kinds of meats are lawful to every one, but all are not expedient: all are lawful, but the eating of all doth not edify others.

26 In the use of meats, as in every thing else, let no one seek his own advantage or pleasure only, but let each study the advantage and edification of his neighbours.

25 On these principles, I give you the following rules concerning meats: Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no question about its having been sacrificed to idols, on account of your knowledge that an idol is nothing.

29 For the earth is the Lord's, and every thing therein; and no one has any dominion over the earth and its fulness.

28 But if any one say to you, This is a thing sacrificed to an idol; do not eat on account of him who showed it, and of conscience: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

29 Now, when I say conscience, I do not mean thine own conscience; for thou knowest that the eating of such a dish is not a worshipping of the idol; but the conscience of another, who views it in that light.

Perhaps thou wilt reply, But why is my liberty ruled by another's conscience?

30 Besides, if by the free gift of God, to whom the earth belongs, I be allowed to partake of all kinds of food, why am I spoken of as an evil doer, for eating that meat for which I give thanks to God?

2. Of the table of demons,—that is, of the sacrifice offered to demons, which was eaten on a table in the demon's temple. See chap. vii. 10, note 1.

Ver. 26. Provoke the Lord to jealousy!—This is an allusion to Exod. xx. 6. where, after prohibiting the worshiping of images, God adds, 'I the Lord thy God am a jealous God.'

Ver. 22. All meats are lawful.—As the apostle is speaking of meats sacrificed to idols, the word meats, not things, must be supplied here.

Ver. 25. On account of conscience. —Besides what is expressed in the commentary, this may imply one's belief in the sovereign de- nunciation of God, and his disclaiming all dependence on idols.

Ver. 26. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.—For the meaning of αποθεόω, fulness, see Colos. ii. 9, note 1. By this argument the apostle taught the Corinthians, that their knowledge and faith as Christians should hinder them from asking any questions concerning their food, which might lead them to think that they acknowledged the power of their deities, either to give or to withhold any part of the fulness of the earth from the worship- pers of the true God.

Ver. 21. This is a thing sacrificed to an idol; do not eat.—The heathens often in their own houses made an ordinary feast of a part of the sacrifice, chap. vii. 4, note 1. To these entertainments, the apostle told the Corinthian brethren they might lawfully go, when they should be received in the true Christ. But on some occasions, when the true Christ was not received, by informing them that this or that dish consisted of things which had been sacrificed to an idol, signified that they considered their eating these things as sinful, they were to abstain from them for the reasons mentioned in the text.

2. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.—This clause is omitted in the Alex. Olimnion, and other MSS., and in the
L CORINTHIANS.

CHAP. XI.

1. In answer I say, For this very reason, that ye are allowed to partake of all kinds of food, whether ye eat, or drink, or whatever ye do, ye are bound to do all to the glory of God, by doing it agreeably to his will.

2. By your most, therefore, be ye no occasion of sin, neither to the unbelieving Jews by lessening their abhorrence of idols, nor to the unbelieving Greeks by confirming them in their idolatry, nor to the church of God by making the ignorant think you idolaters.

3. Even as I endeavour to please all men in all things innocent, not seeking my own advantage only, but that of the many also, that they may be saved.

CHAPTER XI.

From the things written in this chapter, and in chap. xiv. ver. 24, 25, 26, it appears that some of the Corinthian women, on pretence of being inspired, had prayed and prophesied in the Christian assemblies as teachers; and while performing these offices, had cast off their veils, after the manner of the heathen priestesses in their ecstatics. These disorderly practices, the false teacher, it seems, had encouraged, ver. 16. from a desire to ingratiate himself with the female part of the Corinthian church. But the apostle's adherents, sensible that it did not become the women to be teachers of the men, had restrained them. And this having occasioned disputes between the church and the faction, the church, in their letter, applied to the apostle for his decision. In answer, he first of all commended them for having held fast his tradition or ordination concerning the public worship of God, ver. 2. Next, he explained the foundation on which his ordinances relating to the public worship were built, namely, the subordination of all men to Christ, the subordination of woman to man, and the subordination of Christ to God. For by this subordination the behaviour, both of men and women, in the public assemblies, was to be regulated, ver. 3. Every man, says the apostle, who prayeth or prophesieth in public with his head veiled, dishonoureth Christ his head; who, having given man authority over woman, is dishonoured when the man renounceth that authority, by appearing veiled in the presence of the woman as her inferior, ver. 4. On the other hand, every woman who prayeth or prophesieth in public with an unveiled head, dishonoureth the man her head; because the wearing of a veil being an expression of inferiority, by appearing in public unveiled, she renouncest her subjection to the man her superior, and settest herself on an equality with him. Besides, for a woman to throw off her veil in public, was the same kind of indecency as to appear with her head shaven, ver. 5. Wherefore, says the apostle, if it be a shame for a woman to appear in public shorn or shaven, let her be veiled, ver. 6. Further, the different mental and bodily accomplishments of man and woman show, that in the public assemblies for worship men ought not to be veiled, nor woman unveiled, ver. 7. The subjection of woman to man appears even from the man's being first made, and from the woman's being made for the man, ver. 8. For which reason, the woman ought to have a veil on her head in the church, as a mark of her subjection. By adding, because of the angels, the apostle put woman in mind of the weakness of their mother, Eve, who was deceived by an evil angel, ver. 10. In the mean time, that women might not be too much humbled by what he had said, he observed, that in the method of salvation man is not regarded separately from woman, nor woman separately from man; but the same way of salvation is appointed for both sexes, and the same blessings are promised to both in the gospel, ver. 11. Besides, as the woman springs from the man, so the man is born into the world of the women; and both by the power of God, ver. 12. Next, to shew the impropriety of women's praying in public unveiled, and of men's praying veiled, the apostle appealed to the feelings of the Corinthians, ver. 13. and asked them, whether reason and experience did not teach them, that if a man suffers his hair to grow long for an ornament to him, as women's hair is to them, it is a disgrace to him? Because men being designed for the laborious occupations both of war and peace, long hair is extremely inconvenient, especially in warm climates, and therefore is used only by the effeminate, ver. 14. But women being formed to strengthen the tots of the body, their beauty; if they have long hair, it is a glory to them; their hair betokeneth them as a veil to heighten their charms, ver. 15. His discourse on this subject the apostle concluded with telling the faction, that if any teacher contentiously insisted that women might pray and prophesy in the church unveiled, he ought to know that the apostles allowed no such custom, neither was it practised in any of the churches of God, ver. 16.

The Corinthians had likewise been guilty of great irregularities in celebrating the Lord's supper. For the apostle told them, that though he praised them for observing his precepts in general, he did not praise them for this, that they came together in their religious meetings, not for the better, but for the worse; making these meetings the occasion of strengthening the discord that had taken place among them, ver. 16, 18. For when they came together in the church to eat the Lord's supper, they formed themselves into separate companies. Perhaps those who had been baptised by the same teacher, sat down by themselves at separate tables. Or, as violent contentions about different matters had arisen among the Corinthians, probably they were so dissatisfied with one another, that neither of the factions would allow any to John them, except their own adherents. To correct these unchristian practices the apostle told them, when coming together into one place it was not all that was necessary, the right eating of the Lord’s supper: they ought to have eaten it together in a body, as jointly bearing witness to the truth of Christ’s death and resurrection, and in testimony of their love to one another as his disciples, ver. 20. They had erred likewise in another respect: several heathen companies first took their own supper of victuals which they brought into the church ready prepared; and joined thereto the Lord’s supper, making it a part of a common meal or feast. And many of them sinned against the poor, who had no supper to bring, by excluding them from partaking with them, not only of the previous feast, but of the Lord’s supper itself; so that some were hungry on these occasions, while others were plentifully fed, ver. 21. What, said the apostle to them sharply, have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or, by making the church of God a place of feasting, do ye misuse it for a heathen temple, and put your poor brethren to shame who have no supper to eat? ver. 22. These feasts previous to the Lord’s supper, seem to have been instituted by some who thought the Christian church must have instituted his supper after he had eaten the passover, might think themselves warranted to sup together, before they ate the Lord’s supper. To the previous supper, or feasts, the Gentile converts had no objection, as it resembled the feast on the sacrifice in the idol’s temple, to which in their heathen state they had been accustomed. And viewing it in that light, we may, because he repeated their heathen acquaintance to partake both of the previous feast, and of the Lord’s supper itself, in return for the feasts on the sacrifices to which the heathens had invited them.

To remedy these great disorders in the celebration of the Lord’s supper in the church of Corinth, on which account they had corrupted that holy service, the apostle reproved the account which he had formerly given of them of its institution, according as he had received it of the Lord by revelation, ver. 23-28. From his account we learn, that the Lord’s supper is not a common meal, designed for the refreshment of the body, but a religious service, instituted to keep up the memory of Christ’s death till he return. Having given this view of the true nature of the institution, the apostle showed them the sin of performing it in an improper manner, ver. 27. directed them to prepare themselves for that service by self-examination, ver. 28. and declared the punishment to which they subjected themselves by performing it unworthily, ver. 29-32. Then concluding it is a fearful thing to know the Lord; he recommended the Lord’s supper together, ver. 33. and to eat at home if they were hungry. The rest of their irregularities respecting that matter, he promised to rectify when he came to Corinth, ver. 34.

chap. xi.—2 Now I praise you, brethren, (see chap. xx. 25.) because all things ye remember me, and hold fast the traditions (see 3 Thess. ii. 15, note 2.) as I delivered them to you.

3 But I would have you know, that of every man the head is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; (Gen. iii. 16. Eph. v. 23.) and the head of Christ is God. (See 1 Cor. iii. 21. note, and chap. xxv. 27, 28. notes.)

4 Every man who prayeth or prophesieth, (see chap. xiv. 3. note) having a veil upon his head, dishonoureth his head.

(2, 101.) And every woman who prayeth or prophesieth with an unveiled head, dishonoureth her head. (1 Cor. i. 9.) Besides, it is one and the same with being shaven.

ver. 2. Because (supply &amp;) in all things ye remember me.—We have the same form of expression, chap. x. 20.—Or the clause may be translated as hath done, Ouria múa meminiámis, scil. verba, Ye have remembered all my instructions.

ver. 4. Having a veil upon his head, dishonoureth his head: The man who prayeth or prophesieth in the presence of women, with a veil upon his head, by wearing that sign of inferiority on such occasions, dishonoureth his head Christ, who hath subjected women, not in particular but in general, hath authorised men to teach them. See chap. xiv. 24, 35.

ver. 8.—And every woman who prayeth or prophesieth. Becausethough they thought it lawful to use musical instruments, are said, 1 Chron. xxv. 2 to ‘prophesy with harps,’ and, because the priests of Beth, who prayered and sang hymns to that idol, in the contest with Elijah, are said, 1 Kings xvii. 29. to ‘have prophesied till the time of the evening sacrifice,’ many, in the woman’s praying and prophesying, understand their joints in the public prayers and praises as a part of the congregation. Yet it is reasonable to think, that this praying and prophesying of the women was not in the same kind with the singing and prophesying of the men who acted as teachers, mentioned ver. 4. we may suppose the Corinthian women affected to perform these offices in the public assemblies, as they were likewise permitted by their heathen masters to prophesie in this place hath not condemned that practice, it does not follow that it was lawful in any church. His design here was not to consider whether that practice was allowable, but to condemn the indecent manner in which it had been performed. For the apostle’s reasoning still holds, because the customs of the east were the reverse of ours.—The veil used by the eastern women was so large as to cover a great part of their body. This appears from Ruth’s veil, which held six measures of chap. xi.—2 Now, understanding by your letter that ye have restrained your women from praying and prophesying as teachers, I praise you, brethren, because in general ye remember me, and hold fast the traditions concerning the public worship, as I delivered them to you.

3 But, that ye may understand the reason of these traditions, I would have you know, that of every man the head, to whom in all religious matters he must be subject, is Christ; and that the head of the woman, to whom in all domestic affairs she must be subject, and from whom she must receive instruction, is the man: and that the head of Christ, to whom in saving the world he is subject, is God.

4 Every man who prayeth or prophesieth, having a veil, which is a sign of subjection, upon his head, dishonoureth Christ his head, who hath made him the head of the woman.

5 And every woman who prayeth or prophesieth with an unveiled head, dishonoureth the man’s head, by affecting an equality with him. Besides, for a woman to throw off the veil in an assembly of men, is one and the same with being shaven.

2. Because (supply &amp;) in all things ye remember me.—We have the same form of expression, chap. x. 20.—Or the clause may be translated as hath done, Ouria múa meminiámis, scil. verba, Ye have remembered all my instructions.

Having a veil upon his head, dishonoureth his head: The man who prayeth or prophesieth in the presence of women, with a veil upon his head, by wearing that sign of inferiority on such occasions, dishonoureth his head Christ, who hath subjected women, not in particular but in general, hath authorised men to teach them. See chap. xiv. 24, 35.

8.—And every woman who prayeth or prophesieth. Because though they thought it lawful to use musical instruments, are said, 1 Chron. xxv. 2 to ‘prophesy with harps,’ and, because the priests of Beth, who prayed and sang hymns to that idol, in the contest with Elijah, are said, 1 Kings xvii. 29. to ‘have prophesied till the time of the evening sacrifice,’ many, in the woman’s praying and prophesying, understand their joints in the public prayers and praises as a part of the congregation. Yet it is reasonable to think, that this praying and prophesying of the women was not in the same kind with the singing and prophesying of the men who acted as teachers, mentioned ver. 4. we may suppose the Corinthian women affected to perform these offices in the public assemblies, as they were likewise permitted by their heathen masters to prophesie in this place hath not condemned that practice, it does not follow that it was lawful in any church. His design here was not to consider whether that practice was allowable, but to condemn the indecent manner in which it had been performed. For the apostle’s reasoning still holds, because the customs of the east were the reverse of ours.—The veil used by the eastern women was so large as to cover a great part of their body. This appears from Ruth’s veil, which held six measures of
I. CORINTHIANS.

18 Wherefore, if a woman be not veiled, even let her be shorn, but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be veiled. 2. Now new, indeed, ought not to veil the head, being the image and glory of God: but woman is the glory of man. 3. Besides, man is not of woman, but woman is of man. 4. And man was not created for the woman, but woman for the man. 5. For this reason ought the woman to have a veil on her head, as the sign of the subjection of the first woman by evil angels.

6 But neither is man without woman, nor woman without man in the Lord. (See 2 Cor. iii. 17. note 1.)

7 Besides, as the woman is from the man, so also the man is from the woman. (1 Cor. xi. 11.)

8 Judge in yourselves, ye know it is decent that a woman pray to God unveiled? 9. Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man indeed have long hair, it is a disgrace to him? 10. But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her; for her hair is given her ( Cyrus) for a veil.

11 (T.M.) However, if any one (Eveschar.) notes to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

12 Now, when I declare this, I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse.

13 For first, indeed, I hear when ye come together, that a veil of this sort, called a plaid, was worn not only by maidens and virgins, but also by old women, and that the hair was shorn. 2. It is one and the same with being shaven. In the east, it was reckoned improper in women to appear unveiled before any of the male sex, except their nearest relations. Thus Rebecca veiled herself on seeing Isaac, Gen. xxxiv. 65. The immodesty of women appearsukes on a veil. In a assembly of men, the apostle likewise observes, in the epistle to the Hebrews, 2 Tim. ii. 7, that there was a veil, and that it was one and the same thing with being shaven; for, as he tells us, ver. 10, their hair was given them for a veil to improve their beauty. The eastern ladies, considering their hair as their principal ornament, were at great pains in dressing it. Hence, before Jezebel looked out at a window on Jehu, 2 Kings ix. 30, she painted her face and tided her hair. Hence, also, to deprive women of their hair was considered as a great disgrace, Micah i. 10. See the following note, and ver. 16. note.

Var. 9. But if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, 1. How disgraceful it was for the Oretian women to shaven? may be learned from Aristoph. Thesmoph. line 948. The ancient Germans punished women guilty of adultery by shaving their heads. So also the woman of nature of the rape. Women also punished adulteresses in the same manner. Elymer thinks that custom is mentioned, Numb. v. 18.—Shorn, as distinguished from shaven, meant to have the hair cut short. Ver. 7. Being the image of God, namely, in respect of the dominion with which he is clothed. For, in respect of mental dignity, the woman is also the image of God. Ver. 10. To have (τέματα) a veil on her head. 1. But though there is no example, either in sacred or profane writers, of the word τέματα used to denote a veil, yet all agree that it can have no other meaning in this passage. Benson, in his note on 1 Tim. ii. 26 and ed., gives this meaning, because the verb τέμασθε, which comes from the verb τέμνω, to have power, signifies a veil, the apothegm, in the dominion, power, to denote a veil, because the Hebrew women veiled themselves in presence of the men, in token of their being under their power. A like figurative sense of the word τέματα, and of τέματα, is called a cordon, because it was a token or sign of God's covenant with Abraham.

2. On account of the angels. 1. In scripture, the word angels sometimes signifies ministering spirits, 1 Cor. i. 20. Do ye not know that angels shall judge angels? Jude, ver. 6. The angels who kept not their first estate. 2. Ever having been seduced by evil angels to the forbidden tree, she believed her daughter was published, and, like Eve, being subjected to the rule of their husbands. The apostle therefore rejoiced not to see them, but to see them covered. The wearing of a veil was a token of subjectation, to be veiled in the public assemblies for worship, that remembering their first mother's separation by the beast, they might be veiled in the sordid, and behave with humility. See 1 Tim. ii. 12. 3. Others, by the angels, understand the bishops, who are styled 'angels of the churches,' Rev. i. 20. For they suppose the women were ordered to be veiled, when In the public assemblies they performed the office of teachers, to show their respect to the bishops. Others think good angels are meant here, who being ministering spirits might be present in the religious assemblies of the Christians. Of these interpretations, which is first mentioned, and which is espoused by Whitley, seems the most probable.

14. Doth not even reason and experience teach you, that if a man indeed have long hair, it is a disgrace to him, because it renders him in appearance like a woman? 15. But if a woman have long hair, it is an ornament to her which does not inconvenience her, being suitable to her domestic state; for her hair is given her for a veil, to heighten her charms by partly concealing them.

16 Now if the false teacher resolves to be contentious, and maintains that it is allowable for women to pray and teach publicly in the church unveiled, we in Judea have no such custom, neither any of the churches of God.

17 I praised you for holding fast my precepts; but now, when I declare this which follows, I praise you not—that ye assemble, not so as to make yourselves better by edifying each other, but worse, by fomenting strifes.

18 For first I hear, that when ye assemble in the church to Corinthians.

20 (Oum. 239.) But your coming together into one place, is not to eat the Lord's supper.

(See chap. v. 7. note 2.)

21 For in eating and drinking every one taketh, first his own supper, and one, verity, is hungry, and another is filled.

3. What have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or do ye think amiss of the church of God? When ye come together, every one taketh his own supper. (For we would not be ignorant of your knowledge, etc.)

22 (7. 28.) What shall I say to you? Shall I praise you (v. 167.) for this? I praise you not.

23 For I received from the Lord, what also I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, took bread, 24 And, having given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Corinthians: was their indelicate manner of eating the Lord's supper: the second was the wrong use which they made of their spiritual gifts, chap. xii. As the same offences were committed by their public assemblies, he told them very properly, that they came together, not for the better, but for the worse; see v. 25. The word expression must be translated here, because the faculty had not formed any separate church at Corinth, but that some occasional uncharitable aspersions were cast on some members of the church there; of which this was one bad effect, that they celebrated the Lord's supper in separate companies at separate tables, while the Roman church was united, as it were, in a common pottage. 3. And I partly believe it.—Exodus, Grotius, and Pearce, think the Greek phrase αὐτοκριτάς, may be translated, I believe it with respect to a part of you. And for this use of αὐτοκριτάς, they cite Romans xii. 16. Parkhurst says it is used in that sense by Trenchides, and that it is an Attic phrase. See chap. xii. 27. 9. note. Ver. 19.—1. For there must even be some here who believe not. Here the word must, not signify what ought to be, but what in the natural course of things was not, and which he says, with respect to a part of the church, that they ought to be there now, edified, cured, and other evil passions which prevail among men.

3. Heresies among you.—In this passage, heresies are represented as being the consequence of the same cause in the preceding verses. By the account given of them in other parts of the New Testament, it seems they were not obstinately maintained by the heretic, in opposition to his own conscience, for the purpose of authorizing bad practices, and of making gain: see Gal. v. 20. note 5.

5. That the approver.—One who approves is another who has an evil eye on that which is evil, and pleases not God; and so his name is approver. This is the same as the word approver, transliterated Adiakrinos, or Charitostes, which is translated in the English Bible, that every one took one after another his own supper; but that every one took his own supper before he sat at the Lord's supper. Perhaps the Lord instituted his Supper after he had eaten the passover, his disciples very early made it a rule to feast together before they ate the passover, etc. These facts are called, (Apostles, Charitostes, Lest foceia. They are mentioned Jude v.* and as also, by some of the ancient Christian writers. From Xenophon. Memnon. of Apollodorus, and others, they were told by Jesus himself, that they earned each other's provisions ready dressed, which they ate in company together. Probably the Corinthians followed the same custom, and this is the meaning of this verse. But as they excluded all who were not of their party, and even the poor of their congregation who had no supper to bring, it came to pass, when they ate the Lord's supper, one was hungry, and another was filled.

2. And another is filled.—So the Greek word μεταπεπληρωμένος signifies having eaten the whole world, to be satisfied with the whole world. To be satisfied with the whole world, to be satisfied with the whole world, as the LXX. Psal. xxxvi. 9. Jerem. xxxix. 14. and John ii. 15, which is rendered by our translators, when men have well dined and are filled. As the word, from its primary signification signifies to eat and drink (μεταπεπληρωμένος αὐτοκριτάς) after sacrificing; on which occasion the Greeks have still the same use of this word, as to satisfy the appetite, after the sacrifice which the Israelites used to eat after the manna, after that the manna had ceased. See Deut. xxxi. 6. The word, therefore, has the same signification in both cases. Ver. 22.—1. Do ye think amiss of the church of God?—Exeget. 2177; see Rom. ii. 6. note 4. That in the first age the brethren of a particular city or district met together in one house or room, or sometimes the worship of God, is evident from ver. 20. That house or room, whether it was used steadily, or only occasionally, for religious assemblies, is here called the church of God, and is distinguished from their own house. Accordingly, what is termed, ver. 18. a coming together in the church, is called, ver. 20. a coming together into one place. 2. Put to shame those who have not a supper.—Τοῖς μεταπεπληρωμένοις, may be translated without any addition. These who are poor. See ver. 21. 3. I received from the Lord, as I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, to the chief priests and elders of the Jews, took bread. And having given thanks to God for his goodness to men in their redemption, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is the representation of my body, which is broken for you; this do in remembrance of me: in remembrance of my giving my body to be broken to procure eternal life for you. 4. For I received from the Lord, what also I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, to the chief priests and elders of the Jews, took bread. And having given thanks to God for his goodness to men in their redemption, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is the representation of my body, which is broken for you; this do in remembrance of me: in remembrance of my giving my body to be broken to procure eternal life for you.
26 In like manner also the cup, after he had supped, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

27 (Ver. 23.) So then, whatsoever shall eat this bread, (and) drink this cup, ye openly publish the death of the Lord, (exye 2) until the time he come.

28 But let a man examine himself, (see 1 Cor. 11, 25.) and then of the bread let him eat, and of the cup let him drink.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh condemnation to himself, not making a difference of the body of the Lord:

30 For this cause many be weak and sickly, and some be not of death.

31 But let every man examine himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup: (for) every one that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh condemnation to himself.

32 For this cause many are weak and sickly, and some are not of death.

33 But when ye come together into one place, this do all of you, for a token of the Lord's death.

34 For as often as ye shall eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death until he come.

35 Therefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

36 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup: (for) he that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh condemnation to himself.

37 For this cause many are weak and sickly, and some are not of death.

38 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup: (for) he that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh condemnation to himself.

39 For this cause many are weak and sickly, and some are not of death.

40 And when ye shall assemble yourselves together, I will shew you a better way.

41 But in the mean time, whensoever ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, let it be according to the ordinance of the Lord.
I. CORINTHIANS.

20. For this cause, many among you are sick, and infa\textsuperscript{r}m, and a good number are dead.

31. (2 Cor. 5. 9.) But, if we would make a difference in ourselves, we should not be dis\textsuperscript{g}progressed.

32. But being judged of the Lord, we are corrected,\textsuperscript{1} that we may not with the world be condemned.

33. Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, eat ye cherub\textsuperscript{4} one another.

34. And if any one hunger, let him eat at home; that ye may not come together to punishment. And the rest I will set in order when I come.

English Bible printed in 1569, this clause, as R. Pearce informs us, is translated: 'He maketh no difference of the Lord's body, which I think is the true sense of the passage.'

Ver. 32. If we would make a difference in ourselves,\textsuperscript{1} in verse 29, he had mentioned their not making a difference between the body of the Lord and common food. Here he speaks of their making a difference in themselves, that is, in their minds. The term 'cherub' and 'comforter' are metaphorical terms: the former denoting the immediate presence of the Lord as a go\textsuperscript{a} of comfort to the church in time of distress; the latter, their rejection after the inquiry: consequently it signifies their being disapproved as un\textsuperscript{f} to enter the lists, if the language be interpreted literally. But if the inner meaning be adopted, the passage may be understood as follows: 'When ye come together to eat, let it be done - not for the purpose of entertaining yourselves in luxurious repasts, as ye were at variance, all of you cherub\textsuperscript{4} one another, so as to form one harmonious society, agreeably to the design of this important service.'

CHAPTER XII.

View and Illustration of the Subjects treated in this Chapter.

The two spiritual men at Corinth having had great dissen\textsupersions among themselves about the comparative excellency of their several gifts, and the honour which was due to each on account of his particular gift, the apostle's adherents, we may believe, in their letter, had requested his opinion and direction concerning these matters. In compliance therefore with their desire, and because it was of great importance that mankind in future ages should have a just idea of the supernatural gifts by which the Christian church was at first built, and afterwards upheld, the apostle, in this and in the following xvth chapter, treated largely of these gifts, and of the persons who possessed them.

His discourse on these subjects he introduced with telling the Corinthians, that he wished them not to be ignorant of the offices of the spiritual men, and of the excellency of their gifts, ver. 1.—And to make them sensible of the honour which the church derived from the gifts of the spiritual men, he put the brethren at Corinth in mind, that before they received the power and illumination of the spirit of truth, and the gift of discerning spirits, he put the brethren at Corinth in mind, that before their conversion they worship\textsupersion of idols, who, being themselves dumb, could not impart to their votaries instantaneously the faculty of speaking foreign languages, as Christ had done to many of his disciples, ver. 2.—Next, because there were in that age impostors who said they were inspired, and because the persons who possessed the gift of discerning spirits were not always at hand to examine them, the apostle gave the Corinthians a rule, by which they might judge with certainty of every one who pretended to be inspired. No teacher, said he, speaks by the Spirit of God, who calls Jesus accus\textsupersed, that is, who affirms that Jesus was justly punished with the accursed death of the cross. Probably some of the heathen priests and priestesses, in their pretended title of inspiration, had spoken in this manner concerning Jesus. On the other hand, every teacher speaks by the Spirit of God, who acknowledges Jesus to be Lord, and endeavours to persuade men to become his disciples, ver. 3.

Having thus directed the Corinthian brethren to judge of the inspiration of the teachers who came to them, by the nature and tendency of the doctrine which they taught, the apostle proceeded to that which he had chiefly in view, namely, to remove the dimensions which had taken place at Corinth among the spiritual men. For much of them as possessed inferior gifts, aspiring whose gifts were of a superior kind, and the latter behaving with insolence towards the former, the apostle, to allay their animosities, explained in this chapter the nature and difference of their spiritual gifts; discussed concerning their comparative excellency, and concerning the purposes for which they were bestowed, and the different offices allotted to the persons who possessed them; then gave directions concerning the manner and order in which these gifts were to be exercised.

And first he observed, that there were diversities of gifts, but one Spirit from whom they all proceeded, ver. 4.—That there were diversities of ministries or offices in which those who possessed the spiritual gifts were employed, but one Lord whom they all served, ver. 5.—And that there were differences of inworkings in the spiritual men, but it was the same God who wrought inwardly in them all, ver. 6.—Next, he enumerated the spiritual gifts in the order of their dignity; and from his account it appears, that these gifts were various in their nature, and were bestowed on the spiritual men in the greatest plenty, ver. 7—10. Now all these, said he, the one and the same Spirit of God worketh, distributing to each according to his own pleasure, without regarding either the merit or the dignity of the persons to whom he gives them, ver. 11.—But however different in their nature the spiritual gifts might be, he told them they were all so distributed as to render the church one body. For as the human body, though it consists of many members, is but one body, so also is the body of Christ, the Christian church, ver. 12.—All the individuals of which the church is composed, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, slaves or freemen, through their being baptised in one Spirit, are formed into one body or society, ver. 19.

Having thus compared the church to the human body, the apostle carried on the allegory by observing, that since the human body does not consist of one member, but of many, ver. 14.—If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am no part of the body, is it so for the apostle carried on the allegory by observing, that since the human body does not consist of one member, but of many, ver. 14.—If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am no part of the body, is it so for the body? ver. 15.—And if the ear shall say, because I am not the eye, &c. ver. 16.—If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? and if the whole body were hearing, where were the smelling? ver. 17.—His meaning is, that the inferior members should not decline their particular functions, because they are not the superior. But now, saith he, God hath assigned to every one of the members its own place and office in the body; because if all were one member, there would not be a body, ver. 18.—Whereas, by the union of many members, there is one body formed, to the existence of which the service of all the members is necessary, ver. 20.—So that no one for one can say to another, I have nothing of thee, ver. 21.—Nay, the members which seem to be more feeble, are more necessary to the preservation of the body, than even those that are more strong and active, ver. 22.—The same may be said of those members which we think feeble and less honourable, on which account, we are at the greatest pains to protect and adorn them, ver. 23.—Besides, our common members being things which have no part in protection and ornament. Besides, God hath knit the body together by means of these weak and uncomely members, on which he hath bestowed more abundant honour, through their greater efficacy in nourishing and preserving the body, ver. 24.—That there may be no mutiny in the body, but that all the members may answer to each other in their confidential intercourse, ver. 25.—So that when any member is diseased or disabled, the rest sufter with it. Or if any member is properly clothed, defended, and graced, the rest partake of its joy, ver. 26.

The application of this beautiful allegory the apostle made in a few words, by telling the Corinthians, that in their collective capacity they were the body of Christ; and that each of them was a particular member of that body, ver. 27.—Wherefore, from what he had said concerning the human body and its members, three things followed,

New Translation.

Chap. XII.—I Now, concerning the spiritual gifts; brethren, I would not ye should be ignorant.

2 Ye know that ye were heathens, led away to idols that are dumb, even as ye happened to be led.

3 Wherefore, I inform you, that no one speaking by the Spirit of God, (say, 55.) pronouncing Jesus accused; and that no one (general verse, 55.) can declare Jesus Lord, except by the Holy Ghost.

Ver. 1. Spiritual matters.—The word ἑνίοθεν, without any adjective, marks a great diversity. Spiritual gifts, chap. xiv. 1. and sometimes, spiritual men, chap. xiv. 37. In this and the two following chapters, the apostle speaks of both; and therefore the word may be translated spiritual matters, to comprehend both. Ver. 2. Idols that are dumb.—This observation the apostle made, to show the Corinthians that the former objects of their worship could not be conversant with the divine, by which he means, that God, priests and prophets of these false deities, were no oracles, in the sense of the false oracles of the pagans; and that the inspiration of evil spirits, who gave them these oracles to confirm mankind in their abominable idolatries.

Ver. 2.—No one speaking by the Spirit of God pronouncing Jesus accused.—As the apostle wrote this to teach the Corinthians how to distinguish the inspirations of God from those of evil spirits, he must be, No one speaking by the Spirit of God, pronouncing Jesus accused. It seems some who pretended to be inspired, have so pronounced Jesus an impostor, who had been unjustly punished with death. These suppose were the Jewish exorcists, to gather with the heathen priests and priestess, who in their enthusiastic sects reviled Jesus. If such persons were really inspired, that is, if they speak by any supernatural impulse, the Corinthians might know it proceeded from evil spirits, and not from the Spirit of truth, who would never move any one to speak in such manner of Jesus.

2 No one can declare Jesus Lord, except by the Holy Ghost.—Proves him to speak by the Holy Ghost: not, as by any one. And that one who speaks by a supernatural impulse can declare Jesus Lord, except by the Holy Ghost, means, a supernatural impulse, without reference to the inspiration of his own reason, being convinced by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead that he is the Son of God, may declare him Lord. But a person who only speaks, as a passive instrument, whatever is supernaturally suggested, he cannot declare Jesus Lord, except the suggestion comes from the Holy Ghost. For if an evil spirit moves him to speak, it certainly will not declare that Jesus is Lord; since no evil spirit would inspire any one to acknowledge the authority of Jesus as Lord, whose profession intention was to destroy the usurped dominion of evil spirits.
1. CORINTHIANS.

3. There are diversities of gifts, but they all proceed from the same Spirit; so that in respect of their origin, the spiritual gifts are all equally divine.

And there are diversities of ministries, for which the different gifts are bestowed; but the same Lord is served by these ministries: so that in respect of the benefit of the Lord whom they serve, the spiritual men are all equally honourable.

And there are diversities of inworksings on the minds of the spiritual men, but it is the same God (회상 1:5) who worketh inwardly in all. All in all.

7. And when it is given to each is (회상 1:5) the manifestation of the Spirit, (회상 1:5) for the advantage of all.

8. Now, to one, indeed, (회상 1:5) through the spirit (회상 1:5), the law of knowledge, (회상 1:5) faith, (회상 1:5) according to the same spirit; and to another the gift of healings, (회상 1:5) by the same spirit; and to another the gift of tongues, (회상 1:5) by the same spirit.

Ver. 4. There are diversities of gifts, (회상 1:5) of graces. Here the apostle distinguishes between the inward works of God, and the inward works of the Spirit. There are diversities of gifts, because they are bestowed upon the prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, teachers, and divers miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost.

We must not understand the difference in the same beings (의원 1:5) the original word 회상 1:5; literally signifies. See ver. 10. note 1. It is, that the spiritual men, according to the different gifts with which they were endued, had different degrees of power made upon their minds at the time they exercised these gifts. See the following.

2. It is the same God who worketh inwardly in all. Here the apostle distinguishes between the inward works of God, and the inward works of the Spirit. The inward workings of the Spirit he thus describes, ver. 4. "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit." And ver. 11. "Now all these spiritual gifts were the same that the Spirit wrought inwardly." The distinction seems to consist in this: That the Spirit wrought inwardly in the spiritual men all their gifts, but God wrought inwardly upon their minds, directing them in the exercise of their spiritual gifts.

To one indeed, through the Spirit, is given the word of wisdom. — I am of opinion with Whitby, the author of Mem. Sacra, and others, that the word of wisdom was the doctrine of the gospel, communicated by inspiration so completely that the spiritual person who possessed it, was enabled and authorised to declare the religion of Jesus Christ in its simplicity. To be in the highest place in the catalogue of the spiritual gifts, because it was the greatest of them, and was peculiar to the apostles, having been promised to them, and to them only, by the Son of God, is made the goodness and dignity of the grace of grace. See 22.1. 18. Accordingly, in the catalogue of the spiritual gifts, the men in the order of their dignity, ver. 28. the apostles stand in the highest place from whom the word of wisdom was given. — The doctrine of the gospel is called 'the wisdom of God,' 1 Cor. ii. 2. 6, Gal. i. 13. 6, 1 Thess. i. 8. 13, 2 Thess. i. 8. 13. The wisdom of God, in this discourse, is not the divinity, but the condescension or the grace of the Son of God, which is the condescension of the divine wisdom; and here, 'the word of wisdom,' because it was to be preached to the world. And Jesus, from whom the word of wisdom proceeded, is called 'the wisdom of God,' Luke xii. 49, and is said to be made to us wisdom from God, 1 Cor. i. 31, and to have all the treasures of wisdom hid in him, Col. ii. 3. Further, Paul, to whom the word of wisdom was given in an eminent degree, tells us, Col. i. 28, that 'he taught every man with all wisdom.' And by his brother apostle Peter, he is said to have written his epistles according to the wisdom given to him, 2 Pet. iii. 15. Besides, concerning himself, and his brethren apostles, 22. 18. 5, 1 Thess. iii. 6, 12, he speaks with such holiness and freedom of Christ, and the word of wisdom, that it is a testimonial of his high estate and dignity, and the power of Christ, and the word of wisdom.

And to another the word of knowledge. — The obscure discovery of the method of salvation which was made to our first parents at the fall, having been rendered more plain by posterior revelations in different ages, the whole was recorded in the writings of Moses and the prophets. The people needed not to be taught strange things, if we consider what Peter hath told us, 1 Pet. i. 11. namely, that the prophets themselves, to whom the ancient revelations were made, did not fully understand the mind of the ancient oracles by the force of their own natural faculties, their interpretation would not have had that authority to bind the consciences of men, which interpretations communicated to them by inspiration undoubtedly possessed.

11. Now, all these the one and the same Spirit worketh, distributing to each his proper gifts as he pleased.

12. And to another the working of miracles; and to another prophecy; and to another discerning of spirits; and to another divers kinds of tongues; and to another the interpretation of foreign tongues.

13. Now all these gifts and powers, the one and the same spirit of God worketh in the spiritual men, distributing to each his proper gifts, as he himself pleaseth, for the general advantage, (ver. 7.)

12 For as the body is one, (see Rm. 12:5) although it have many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. (See Rm. xii. 4, 5. Eph. iv. 12-16.)

13 (Kp. v. 21.) For, indeed, (w) in one Spirit we all have been baptized (see) into one body, whether Jews or Greeks; (see Rm. ii. 9, note 2,) whether slaves or freemen, (y) and all have been made to drink (see 1 Cor. 12:13), of one spirit. (z)

14 (Kp. v. 20, 21, 23.) Since, therefore, the body is not one member, but many, (see ver. 12.)

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it, (w) even so, for this, not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it, for this, not of the body?

17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole body were hearing, where were the smelling?

18 (w) But now, God hath placed the members, every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. (See Rm. xii. 6.)

19 (Kp. v. 18.) Besides, if all were one member, where were the body?

20 (w) Now if we be many members, yet one body: (see Rm. xi. 16.) But now, indeed, there are many members, but one body.

21 (Kp. v. 18.) Therefore, the eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you.

glaring, when the knowledge of them was most wanted. Whereas every church having inspired interpreters of foreign languages commonly present in their religious assemblies, to translate the Hebrew and Greek scriptures into the language of the country, the common people having in this opportunity of hearing from these men, the knowledge of all the language and comfort they are fitted to yield. Such were the superfruiter gifts with which the first preachers and missionaries were furnished. The same foreign languages, which served as a sort of alphabet to the barbarFs, were speedily established the gospel in the most populous and most civilized provinces of the Roman empire.

But these gifts were equally necessary for the upholding of the church. For the greatest part of the first believers having been orators of their trade, it was much more easy to edify and comfort the body of christ by their discourses in the tongue of each province, than by that of the mother tongue, but very imperfect notions of morality. Many of them being men of low birth, their minds were not much cultivated by education. Few of them were acquainted with the sacred books of the jews. And with respect to the writings of the apostles and evangelists, they were not published till a considerable time after numerous churches were planted in many countries of asia and europe. In these circumstances, the knowledge of the gospel, which the brethren derived from the few preachings of the inspired teachers which they had an opportunity to hear, could not at the beginning be either accurate or extensive. And therefore, to remedy that defect, the converts from idolatry were formed into churches, and by degrees joined into churches, and appointed to assemble together for their mutual instruction, and for the promotion of the interests of their common religion. Others of them had an insatiation which qualified them for speaking to the edification, exhortation, and comfort of the rest. Others were fitted to lead the devotions of the congregation, by an address which pleased them with prayers and hymns for public use. Others, by the gift of discerning spirits, were enabled to governo their meetings, to know how to direct themselves. Others, by the gift of interpreting foreign tongues, translated into the common languages such parts of the scriptures as they were pleased to give, at their public meeting; as also the epistles of the apostles and the gospels, after they were published. And these gifts were continued in the church till the knowledge of the gospel became so general among the disciples, that the church could uphold itself by the exertion of its own gift alone.

Ver. 13.-1. In one Spirit we all have been baptized:—This miraculous baptism John Baptist foretold, Matt. iii. 11. "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." 2. Whether slaves or freemen.—In the Christian church, all men, without distinction of nation or condition, are equally entitled to its privileges, and in the sight of God are equally honourable. Jews, therefore, and freemen, who possessed the gifts of the Spirit, were not more honourable than Gentiles and slaves, who were endowed with the same gifts. Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, was not ashamed to own his descent as a Jew, this was a just rebuke to him.

2. To drink of one Spirit.—Cebes, in his table, uses the same expression to denote the number of ministers of one church, and the precedence of the bishop over his priests. In supposing that the apostle in this expression alludes to the drinking of the cup of consecration, and to the Lord's supper, I have followed Theophylact, or rather the apostle himself, who, when he speaks of his own office, speaks of the cup of consecration. In the first clause of this verse the apostle affirms, that by the various gifts of the Spirit, the disciples of Christ, in the first age, were formed into one body. In the latter clause he observes, that all Christians, by drinking the cup in the Lord's supper, are formed into one spirit of faith, love, and holiness by which one body is united, which he expresses in an emphatical manner, by their being made 'to drink of one spirit.'

Ver. 14. Since therefore,—The common translation of Kp. v. 21, which makes this verse a reason for what goes before, is evidently erroneous. It is a repetition of principal verses ver. 12 and is introduced here as the foundation of the inference in the following verses, 15, 16.

Ver. 15. And if the ear shall say,—Bengelius thinks that in this allegory, the foot signifies the common people in the church; the head, the president; the eye, the teachers; and the ear, the learners.

Ver. 21. Nor again the head to the feet.—The apostle mentions the two principal members in this body; the head, and the feet. He gives us the essential functions of the head, and affirms that they need the service of the inferior members, to teach such as hold the most honourable offices in the church, not to despise those who are inferior. He implies that when the head is not the head, the body needs the direction of the eye, and the eye the assistance of the hands, so in the church they follow the active occupations of life need the direction of the chief of the body, the teachers need to be supported by the labour of the active members. Were we to interpret "the body" as the church, "the head" as Christ, so as by the head to understand Christ, it would be equally true of him in quality of head of the church, as it is of the head of the natural body, that he could not do without the hands and feet of the members. All the members of the church are necessary to
E. CORINTHIANS.

29 And (Acts 21) Noy, these members of the body which seem to be more feeble, are much more necessary.

29 And (Acts 21) those which we think are less honorable members of the body, around them we throw more abundant honor; (1 Cor. 12, 21, 22, and so our uncomely members) have more abundant comeliness.

30 And (2 Cor. 12, 11) therefore, God hath united all the members of the body, the hand, the foot, the members which are naturally weak, and without beauty, more abundant honor, through their greater efficacy in the nourishment and preservation of the body.

31 But ye have no such spirit in the body; but that the members (Rom. 12, 4) may have the very same anxious care one for another.

32 And (1 Cor. 11, 1) so, whether one member suffer, all the members jointly suffer; or one member be honored, all the members jointly rejoice.

33 Now ye are the body of Christ, and members (Rom. 12, 5) of the church, first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers; fourth, pastors and teachers, (Acts 20, 18) and so forth; (1 Cor. 6, 11) and (Acts 20, 18) gifts of healings, (1 Cor. 12, 28) helpers, (ver. 28) (Acts 6, 2) directors, 34 (Rom. 12, 3, 1 Peter 3, 15) kinds of foreign languages.

35 Ver 17 is complete and fit for supporting itself; not excepting such abusers as are unsound. For by censuring them and cutting them off the sincere powerfully instructed, corrected, and strengthened. Ver. 18. In those close members of the body which seem to be more feeble, are much more necessary. —So Didaci, Castalio, and B. Pusey, have very well and truly translated this verse, and truly, for the sense requires it to be so construed and translated. Ver. 19. Around them we throw more abundant honor. —This respect of the members of the church is treated of as peculiar to the apostles, as those who concealing the weak and uncomely members of our body, the apostle makes, to teach the highest members of the church to advance more and more the weak and imperfect members, the hand, the foot, and the utmost members of the body. And yet, the lowest and the weakest are to be considered the backbone of the church, and the care which they have of each other, and concerning the particular kindness of dispensations among its members, was applicable to all members of the church then present. Ver. 20. In that short sentence, the apostle intimates to the Corinthians, that what he had said concerning the order, the situation, and the office of the members, he had also especially recommended these things to the care of the elders, and the care which they have of each other, and concerning the particular kindness of dispensations among its members, was applicable to all members of the church then present. Ver. 21. The apostle, speaking of the things he had written, that there might be no envy among them, nor discontent, nor arrogant preferring of themselves before others, that in peace and love they might all promote each other’s happiness. Ver. 22. God hath placed. —This is said in allusion to what was observed, ver. 18, concerning the placing of the members in the human body.

32. Thirdly, teachers. —That the teachers were inspired persons, appears likewise from Rom. xii. 7 where teaching is mentioned as one of the spiritual gifts; and from 1 Cor. xiv. 6, where, in the same passage, the same term, διδαχὴ, is mentioned as a thing given to the spiritual men by inspiration. —From Eph. v. 11. It appears, that there were those three orders of teachers among the Christians; namely, the apostles, the prophets, and the teachers, properly so called. The teachers spoken of here are evangelists, whose proper gift was faith, ver. 9. Ver. 22. (Next, 1 Peter 4, 10, 11) in spiritual powers; just as in the subsequent clause, gifts of healing denotes the person who exercise these gifts. These are necessarily the office of mankind in society, by the different members of the body, as Menothon Agrippa did, in his allegory of the belly and the members of the body; and Phil had in his essay. —By comparing sickness in the church to sickness in the body, we are taught that it consists in an universal want of affection in some of the members of Christ’s body towards their fellow-members, whereby contentions and animosities are produced. Further, by shewing that the members of the body are so united by necessity to each other’s existence, the apostle hath taught us, that there should be no envy nor strife among the disciples of Christ; but that each, by the right exercise of every power, should assist his neighbour, and rejoice when his welfare is promoted.

Ver. 23. Now ye are the body of Christ. —This is the application of the foregoing allegory, which the apostle seems to have formed on our Lord’s words, Matt. xxv. 40. —If he had said to the Corinthians, By your baptism and profession of Christianity, ye are formed into one body, or that body in which, of all the parts, some are more useful, some are more comely, and some are more necessary; and that in this body, as in the human body, it is not possible for any to be without the necessity of one another, it is impossible for any to be without the necessity of one another, it is impossible for any to be necessary. And then, the apostle would have spoken of the necessity of the several parts to the whole, and of the comeliness of the several parts, and not of their necessity of each other. —And we should understand this sentence, in the same manner, as it is understood upon the Greek word, κοσμοί, which denotes comeliness, and not necessity.

Ver. 24. Where the body is, there is also the life. —The same phrase is used by Symmachus, in his paraphrase of Ps. lxxvii. 5. —I Pet. ii. 24. —The apostle, having condemned various forms of idolatry, which were very common among the Corinthians, shews that indeed the body of Christ is a temple, a temple built by God, and not by man; and he concludes, that wherever the body of Christ is, or is to be, there is also the life of Christ. —The word body here signifies the church, the body of Christ; and the word life signifies the life of Christ, whether spiritual or temporal. —And, in this sense, the apostle here shews, that wherever the church is, there is the life of Christ, either in its spiritual sense, or in its temporal. —And, consequently, he shews, that Christ is present with his church, in all places where she is. —The apostle shews, that wherever the church is, there is the life of Christ; and the church is spread over the whole world. —And believers, who are of the church, are scattered over the whole world. —And, as the body is spread over the whole world, so is the life of Christ. —And, as the body is spread over the whole world, so is the life of Christ. —And, as the body is spread over the whole world, so is the life of Christ. —And, as the body is spread over the whole world, so is the life of Christ. —And, as the body is spread over the whole world, so is the life of Christ.
L. CORINTHIANS.

29 Are all apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers? Are all languages? Are all powers? 30 Have all the gifts of healing? Do all speak in foreign languages? Do all interpret?

N. B.—For ver. 31, see the beginning of the next Chapter.

The Corinthians might be persuaded to lay aside their emulations and strifes, and be contented each with his own gifts and offices in the church, the apostle, after discoursing concerning the spiritual men and their gifts, told the brethren that no doubt they all earnestly desirous to possess the best gifts. Yet he would shew them a more excellent way of attaining eminence in the church; namely, by acquiring a greater measure of that love, which ought to subsist among the members of Christ's body, chap. xii. 31.—This verse therefore being an introduction to the apostle's beautiful discourse concerning love, contained in chap. xiii., it ought to have been placed, as I have done, at the beginning of that chapter.

The more excellent way of attaining eminence in the church being that of love, the apostle, by personifying this divine virtue, and by ascribing to it the qualities and actions of a person, hath set forth its beauties and excellencies in the brightest colours, that the Corinthians, by comparing themselves with his description, might be sensible of the deformity of their own temper, as it appeared in their divisions, emulations, and strifes.—His account of love he began with affirming, that it is a quality more excellent than the faculty of speaking all kinds of languages, of foreseeing future events, of understanding the mysteries contained in the ancient revelations, and of working miracles; in short, more excellent than all the endowments which men covet most. The reason is, none of those endowments are of any value, if love is wanting in the persons who possess them, to direct them in the use of them. It is a more excellent virtue than even the giving of all one's goods to feed the poor; nay, than the giving of one's body to be burned for his religion, if these things are done, not from love to God and man, but from vain-glory; for however beneficial these actions may be to mankind, they will be of no real advantage to the vain-glorious hypocrite himself, ver. 1, 2, 3.

Further, still more effectually to display the excellence of this noble grace, the apostle described its influence upon the temper and conduct of the persons who possesses it, ver. 4—7.—And by comparing it with the gifts of tongues, of prophecy, and of knowledge, and even with its sister graces, faith and hope, he hath shewn it to be more excellent than them all; chiefly because their existence and usefulness takes place in the present life only, whereas love will subsist in heaven, ver. 8—13.

In this eulogium it is observable, that all the properties of love mentioned by the apostle, belong more especially to the love of our neighbour; unless we suppose with some, that the three properties mentioned ver. 7. belong also to the love of God. However, although the whole were confined to the love of our neighbour, it would not follow, that the apostle hath excluded the love of God from his idea of love; on the contrary, all the exercises of love, which hath so beautifully described, presuppose the love of God as their true principle; for it is well known, that we cannot love man aright, unless we love God also, 1 John iv. 20.

Ver. 1.—— Though I could speak with the tongues of men and of angels.—Some think the apostle mentioned the tongues of angels, because in the patriarchal ages angels often spoke to men. But when they then spake the language of men, their tongues, thus understood, are the same with the tongues of men. And therefore by the tongues of angels the apostle meant the methods, whatever they are, by which angels communicate their thoughts to each other, and which would be but much more excellent language than any that is spoken by men.

Chapter XIII.

1. This chapter is usually called the "love chapter" and is known for its emphasis on love as a central Christian virtue.

2. "Love is patient, love is kind." This verse is often used to describe the qualities of true love.

3. "Love does not envy," indicating that love does not covet what others have.

4. "Love does not boast," showing that love is not驟夸.

5. "Love is not proud," which means that love is not arrogant.

6. "Love is not rude," showing that love is not disrespectful.

7. "Love is not self-seeking," indicating that love is not selfish.

8. "Love is not easily angered," showing that love is patient.

9. "Love keeps no record of wrongs," indicating that love is forgiving.

10. "Love rejoices with the truth," showing that love is happy with the truth.

11. "Love endures all things," indicating that love is enduring.

12. "Love never ends," showing that love is eternal.

And in confirmation of his interpretation he observes, that love is the "fruit of the spirit", and that it is "the bond of perfection", according to Philippians 2:1. This passage and the following one, "Bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ", are often cited as examples of the practical application of the love command. In the letter to the Romans (13:8), Paul further states that "He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love." This verse is often used to emphasize the importance of love in the Christian life. The love command is not only a call to personal behavior, but also a command to love others as Christ has loved them. This love is to be exhibited in all areas of life, including relationships, work, and social interactions. The love command is a reflection of the divine nature of God and is a source of strength and joy in the Christian life. The love command is a call to follow the example of Christ and to love others with a sacrificial and selfless love. L. CORINTHIANS.

10 But when the perfect gift of complete illumination is bestowed on all in heaven, then that which is partial, namely, the present gifts of knowledge and prophecy, shall be abolished, as useless.

11 The difference between our present and future conceptions of spiritual things may be illustrated by the knowledge of a child, compared to that of a man. When I was a child, my conceptions, and my reasonings, were erroneous. But when I become a man, I lay aside the conceptions, reasonings, and language of a child.

12 For now we see, as I see chap. iii. 15, note) through glass, obscurely, but the face of God we know (κατα το ομορφον) in part; but then (κατα τον ανθρωπον) I shall fully know, even as I am fully known.

13 And now abideth faith, hope, love, three of these; but the greatest of these is love. (See ver. 8.)

Ver. 13—1. We see through glasses—κατα το ομορφον. Dr. Pride thinks the word ομορφον signifies any of those transparent substances which we place in our windows; such thin plates of horn, transparent stones, and the like, through which we see the objects without obscurely. I have therefore translated this Greek word by the English word glass, as a general name for such substances.... But others are of opinion, that the word denotes a σκέτωμα μαρτύρ, like those of which Moses made the laver, Ezek. xvi. 18. And the same resemblance is seen things as it were by images reflected from a mirror. But this idea does not accord with seeing objects obscurely.

2. Obsecurly—κατα το ομορφον, literally in an enigma or riddle. An enigma or riddle being a discourse in which one thing is put for another, which is in some respects like it, we are said to see things as present in an enigma, because in the revelations of God, invisible things are represented by visible, and spiritual things by natural, and eternal things by such as are temporal. Two of Stephen's MSS. read here κατα τον ριζαλιν. —On this passage it is proper to observe, that the difference in which things present are involved, is in some respects necessary. For as in childhood our knowledge and conception of things are wisely made imperfect, that we may the more easily submit to the restrictions and disciplines which are proper to our childish state; so in the present life, which in relation to the whole of our existence may be called childhood, our knowledge of invisible things is appointed to be imperfect, that we may employ ourselves with pleasure in the occupations of the present life. But when the season of childhood is over, we attain more comprehensive views of things, and put away childish conceptions, restrictions, and disciplines. Just as the great and grand scenes of the heavenly world open upon us, we shall no more see spiritual things darkly as in a riddle, but we shall see them face to face, or clearly; and shall fully know, even as we ourselves are fully known of superior beings, or of our most familiar friends. In short, we shall leave off all those imperfect methods of acquiring knowledge, which we make use of on earth.

3. I shall fully know, even as I am fully known—κατα το ομορφον. —The clause, new abides, implies that the graces spoken of are not always to abide; at least the graces of faith and hope. For seeing 'faith is the persuasion of things hoped for,' Heb. xii. 1. and 'hope that is seen is no hope,' Rom. viii. 24, in heaven, where all the objects of our faith and hope are put in our hand, we may expect that it should be otherwise. —It is quite otherwise with love. The objects of love exist in the sense of perfect love, and will last for ever; so that love will burn in that world, with a delightful warmth and brightness, to all eternity.

CHAPTER XIV.

View and Illustration of the Matters in this Chapter.

Faith, the things written in this chapter it appears, that the brethren at Corinth had erred in their opinion of the comparative excellence of the spiritual gifts; and had been guilty of great irregularities in the exercise of these gifts. In particular, they preferred the gift of speaking foreign languages to all the rest, because it made them remarkable amongst the Gentiles. These men were great admirers of eloquence. Farther, possessing that gift in the manner of an habit which they could exercise at pleasure, they were exceedingly fond of shewing it in the public assemblies, by speaking often and long in foreign languages, without regarding whether their hearers understood them or not. And fancying themselves the most honourable of all the spiritual men, because their gift was habitual, they claimed the privilege of speaking in the public assemblies preferably to others; whereby some who were better qualified to edify the church, were often obliged to be silent. Nay, to such a pitch did they carry their passion for speaking foreign languages, that, on some occasions, a number of them who possessed that gift, spake in the church all at once; whereby great confusion was occasioned in their meetings.

The Corinthians, by this improper use of their ability to speak foreign languages, having brought a bad report upon the Christian assemblies, St. Paul, in this chapter, endeavoured to lessen their admiration of the gift of 'tongues.' By the introduction of new names to the list of other spiritual gifts; and that its value depended on its being used for the edification of others. Wherefore, as an introduction to his discourse on the subject, he began with exhorting them to make love the object of their constant pursuit, but spiritual gifts the object only of their earnest wish; and of the spiritual gifts, to desire the gift of prophecy, rather than the gift of speaking foreign languages, ver. 1. —Because he who, in the public assemblies, spake in an unknown language, spake to God only, and did no good to the church. For the gift of 'tongues' was the gift of the things which he spake might be, ver. 2. —Whereas he who prophesied, spake to men in a known language, things for their edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3. —In short, he who spake in an unknown language, edified none but himself; whereas, he who prophesied edified the church, ver. 4. —This being the case, though the apostle would have been glad that all the inspired men at Corinth had spoken foreign languages, he rather wished them to prophesy, ver. 5. —Next, he advanced various arguments, to shew the unprofitableness of speaking unknown languages in the church, ver. 6—11. —Then exhorted each of them as earnestly wished to possess spiritual gifts, to seek those which would make them abound to edification, ver. 12—15, and directed those persons who prayed in an unknown tongue, to pray in such a manner, that they might be interpreted; because if any one prayed in an unknown tongue, without having his prayer interpreted, his spirit prayed, but his meaning did not profit his hearers, ver. 14. —The duty, therefore, of every inspired person who prayed or spoke in the public assemblies was, to perform those offices in an intelligible manner, ver. 15. —otherwise, when he returned thanks to God, his hearers could not say, Amen; that is, could not join in his thanksgiving, not understanding what he said, ver. 16, 17. He then told them, that he could thank God in more foreign languages than all of them taken together, yet he would rather speak five sentences in a known language, for the edification of others, than ten thousand sentences in an unknown language, which could profit nobody but himself, ver. 16, 19.

Next, to shew the Corinthians the foolishness of a number of them speaking in the church unknown languages all at once, he told them it was acting like children. In bad dispositions, indeed, he wished them to be children, but in understanding to be men, ver. 20. Then he put them in mind of Isaiah's prophecy, in which it was foretold, that God would speak to the unbelieving Israelites in foreign languages; but that even so they would not believe, ver. 21. From which he inferred that foreign languages were intended for a sign, not to believers, but unbelievers, to convince them of the divine original of the gospel; whereas, prophecy was intended for the edification of believers, ver. 22. Further, when the whole church is met in one place, if all of you, said he, who have the gift of tongues, speak at once, and there come in an unlearned person or an unbeliever, will they not say ye are mad? ver. 23. Whereas, if all the inspired men prophesy, that is, speak in a known language, and in their public assemblies, there will be no danger, to the edification of the assembly, and there shall come in an unlearned person or an unbeliever, perhaps with a bad intention, such an one, understanding what is spoken by all, will probably be made sensible of the evil of his idolatry and wickedness; and being examined by all concerning his bad design, ver. 24. The secrets of his heart will be discovered, so that, falling prostrate, he will worship God, and carry away word that God is actually among the Christians, ver. 25.

In the remaining part of this chapter, the apostle gave the Corinthians particular directions concerning the manner in which they were to exercise their spiritual gifts, ver. 26-33. And prohibited women from speaking in the church on any pretence whatever; founding his prohibition on the will of God, and on the law of Moses, which commanded women to be subject to men, and even on the custom of nations, ver. 24, 35, 36. Then required the prophets, and other spiritual persons at Corinth, to understand that all the things he had written were the commands of the Lord, the words of the greatest apostles, willingly submitted his doctrines and writings to be tried by those who had the gift of discerning spirits; being absolutely certain of his own inspiration, ver. 37. He adds, if after the attestation borne to my precepts by the spiritual men, any teacher among you is ignorant that they are the precepts of the Lord, let him remain in his ignorance, ver. 38. And, as the conclusion of the whole, he exhorted the Corinthians to desire earnestly to prophesy: but at the same time not to forbid any person to speak in an unknown language, if there was an interpreter present to interpret what he said, ver. 39. And, in general, to do all things in their public assemblies decently and in order, ver. 40.

Before the illustration is taken, it may be proper to remark, first, That this and the two preceding chapters of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, more than any other parts of the sacred volume, are useful for demonstrating the reality, and for making us acquainted with the nature, of that most singular and astonishing proof of the divine original of the gospel, which was set before the world in the supernatural gifts wherewith multitudes of the first Christians were endowed. For from the account accidentally given of these gifts in the chapters mentioned, and of the persons who possessed them, and of the manner of their communication and operation, and of the uses for which they were intended, we understand, That they all proceeded from the Spirit of God, and were most astonishing in their operation: That in every church great numbers of persons possessed these gifts, having received them, either by an immediate interposition of the Holy Ghost, or by the imposition of the apostle's hands: That the spiritual men exercised these gifts openly before all the world, for the confirmation of the gospel; and in their public assemblies, for their own edification: Thus, holding in their hands the spiritual men, by these gifts, but especially by the gifts of miracles and tongues, converted numbers; and, That the heathens who came into the Christian assemblies, (as many of them did, 1 Cor. xiv. 24.), had thereby an opportunity to know, and to report to others, that God was really among them. Thus, notwithstanding the gospel in the first age met with great opposition everywhere, from the mouth of the priests, the craftsmen, the bigots, and even from the philosophers and rhetoricians, yet in all countries, by the influence of the spiritual gifts and of the miraculous powers which abounded among the Christians, it overcame all opposition, and through the blessing of God spread itself so effectually, that at length it put an end to the heathen religions, in the best peoples and most civilized provinces of the Roman empire.

My second remark is, that although the irregularities which the Corinthian brethren were guilty of in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, occasioned at first abundance of trouble to the apostle Paul, these irregularities are not to be reproved. By which he means, that it was not the gift of the Holy Ghost that had been the occasion of our receiving certain and full information, concerning the existence of the spiritual gifts, the primitive glory of our religion, and concerning the way in which they were exercised by the apostles, and other spiritual men, for the overturning of the heathen idolatry, the establishment of the gospel throughout the world, and the edification of the church itself. See the Illustration prefixed to 1 Thess. chap. i.

New Translation.

Comentary.

Chap. XIV.—1 Since it is a grace so excellent, pursue love by every method in your power; and only earnestly desire spiritual gifts, but especially that ye may prophesy.

2 For he who speaketh in a foreign language, speaketh not to men, but to God; for no one (even 44.) understandeth him: (i) nevertheless, by the Spirit he speaketh mysteries.

3 But he who prophesieth, speaketh to men

Ver. 1 Pursue love.—As Εἰρήνη denotes the action of hunters in the chase, the apostle's meaning is, be most earnest in your endeavours to promote this grace of love.

Ver. 2. He who speaketh in a foreign language.—The word ξυρείτα, tongue, so often used in this chapter, plainly means a foreign language. (see ver. 19.) In which sense it was used by the Greek writers, as Eustathius on Iliad A. quoted by Hammond on 1 Cor. xiv. 38. affirms.

3 He who prophesieth, speaketh to men for edification, &c. —Seeing the spiritual men who had the word of wisdom, and the word of knowledge, spake to others for edification, exhortation, and consolation, the exercise of their gifts was comprehended under known language, for increasing their faith, and stirring them up to their joy, and comforting them under their tribulations.

4 He therefore who speaketh in a foreign language, edifieth himself only; but he who prophesieth, edifieth the church.

5 I wish, indeed, that ye all spake in foreign languages; but rather that ye prophesied: for greater is he who prophesieth than he who speaketh in foreign languages, unless some one interpreteth, that the church may receive edification.

6 (Non d.) For now, brethren, if I should come to you speaking in foreign languages, what shall I profit you, unless I shall speak to you INTELLIGIBLY, either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophecy, (see ver. 3, note,) or by doctrine? 11

7 In like manner, things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, unless they give a difference to the notes, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? 14

8 (καν γε, 92.) And therefore, if the trumpet give an unknown sound, who will prepare himself for battle? 9 So also ye, unless with the tongue ye give intelligible speech, how shall it be known what is spoken? therefore ye will be speaking into the air.

10 There are, perhaps, as many kinds of language in the world as ye speak, and none of them is without signification.

11 (Οὐχ, 264.) Yet, if I do not know the meaning of the language, I shall be to him who speaketh a barbarian, and he who speaketh will be a barbarian to me.

12 (Οὐχ αὐτοι, 286.) Wherefore ye also, since ye are earnestly desirous of spiritual GIFTS, seek them, that ye may abound for the edification of the church.

13 (ἄρας) For which cause, let him (ἐγὼ, 55,) who prayeth in a foreign language, pray (ἐκκλίνομαι, loc. 197,) so as some one may interpret. 2 prophesying; which therefore was a general name for the speaking by inspiration in a known tongue, to the instruction of the church, whatever the nature of the inspiration might be. When the apostles, who were endowed with the word of wisdom, and the superior prophets, who were endowed with the word of knowledge, prophesied; they did it by inspiration, called, ver. 6, revelation and knowledge. But there were other kinds of inspiration, called in the same version prophecy and doctrine, which belonged to the inferior prophets. These were said to prophesy, when by inspiration they uttered ed prayers and psalms in which the church joined them; or delivered a discourse relating to some point of doctrine or practice. And all being done in a known language, the church was edified, comforted, and comforted. See chap. xiii. 10 note 2. 2

Ver. 4. Edifieth himself.—See chap. viii. 10, note 3.) From this it is plain, that the inspired person who uttered in an unknown language communicated nothing, unless he had understood it himself, otherwise he could not increase his own knowledge. For if he had not understood it himself, he might also confirm himself in the faith of the gospel, by his consciousness of certain knowledge, if he believed himself to have been inspired to utter such a thing. But in prophecy, the inspired person, who had a revelation given to him in an unknown tongue, is ordered not to interpret it, but to keep silence, unless there was no interpreter by. The expression, therefore, in this verse is elliptical, and must be understood so. See the note on ver. 8. 5

Ver. 6.—I shall speak. The word ἔνθισθη here, and ver. 3, signifies to speak intelligibly. 16

Bem. observes, that ἐνθισθη, signifying in like manner, is a poetical word. But the other sense, namely, yet, does not suit the apostle's meaning in this place. See Acts xxii. 29. 2. 2

2. Give a difference. Ἀναφερέσθαι. Among musicians, this word signifies the measured distance between sounds, according to certain proportions, from which the melody of tunes results.

3. To the notes.—Raphælius has shown that τὸν γραμμ. αὐτοῦ, as distinguished from τὸν γραμμ. a music note, a note in music. See 44th, 45th, 46th Dictionary.

4. Is piped or harped.—The ancients not only directed their motions in dancing by musical instruments, but they used them in battle, and even in funeral lamentations for expressing grief, Matt. i. 28. xvi.

Ver. 10. As many kinds of languages.—Beo. is of opinion, that ἐνθισθη here signifies articulate speech, language. And Raphælius has shown that ἐνθισθη signifies the words of the prophets; for they are said to be 'read every sabbath day,' namely, in the synagogues. Likewise, 2 Pet. ii. 18. The dumb beast speaking ἐνθισθη is man's language, forbidding, &c.

Ver. 11. A barbarian.—The Greeks, after the custom of the Egyptians, mentioned by Herodotus, b. called all those barbarians who did not speak their language. In process of time, however, the Romans having subdued the Greeks, delivered themselves by arms from that opprobrious appellation; and joined the Greeks in calling all barbarians who did not speak either the Greek or the Latin language. Afterwards, however, all men who spake a language which another did not understand. Thus the Bocybian philosopher Anacrateus said, that among the Athenians the Scythis were barbarians; and among the Scythians the Athenians were barbarians. In like manner, Ovid, Trist. v. 10. 2. Barbarus hic ego sum, quin non loquor uti. This is the sense which the apostle affixes to the word barbarian in the present passage.
14 For if I pray in a foreign language, my spirit prays, but my understanding does not.

15 What then is to be done? I will pray with the Spirit, (A) but I will also pray with my understanding; I will sing with the Spirit, but I will sing also with my understanding.

16 (Era) Else when thou shalt bless with the Spirit, he who filleth up the place of the private person, how shall he say the Amen to thy thanksgiving, since he knoweth not what thou art saying?

17 For thou, indeed, givest thanks well, but the other is not edified.

18 I give thanks to my God, speaking in foreign languages more than all of you:

19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five sentences with my meaning understood, that I may instruct others also, than ten thousand sentences in a foreign language.

20 Brethren, be not children in understanding; (Era) but in evil ye children, and in understanding be ye full grown men.

21 In the law it is written, (Era) Surely with other tongues, and with other lips, I will speak to this people; yet not even so will they hearken to me, saith the Lord.

22 So that foreign languages are for a sign, not to believers, but to unbelievers: but prophecy is for a sign, not to unbelievers, but to believers.

(Notes: (A) What is to be done? I will pray with the Spirit; (B) Else when thou shalt bless with the Spirit, he who filleth up the place of the private person; (C) In the church I had rather speak five sentences with my meaning understood, that I may instruct others also, than ten thousand sentences in a foreign language; (D) Brethren, be not children in understanding; (E) In the law it is written, Surely with other tongues, and with other lips, I will speak to this people; yet not even so will they hearken to me, saith the Lord; (F) So that foreign languages are for a sign, not to believers, but to unbelievers: but prophecy is for a sign, not to unbelievers, but to believers.)
II. CORINTHIANS.

25 If, then, the whole church be assembled in one place, and all speak in foreign languages, and there come in unlearned persons, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad? 12

26 But if all prophesy, (see ver. 3.) and there come in an unbeliever, or one unlearned in foreign languages, (see ver. 16, note 1.) he is reproved by all, (ἀναμείνω, ch. iv. 8. note 1.) he is examined by all.

27 And thus the secrets of his heart are made manifest; and, falling on his face, he will worship God, carrying away with him that God actually is among you.

28 What then is to be done, brethren? When ye are come together, each of you hath a psalm, hath a discourse, hath a foreign language, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all be done to edification. (See ch. xiv. 3. 5.)

29 (Em) And if any one speak in a foreign language, let it be by two, or at most three sentences, and (are ἐν προφητείᾳ) separately; and let one interpret.

30 But if there be no interpreter, let him be silent in the church: (A) Yet let him speak to himself, and to God.

31 Now, let two or three prophets speak, and let the others discern. (ἀναμείνω, see chap. xii. 10. note 2.)

32 But if another sitting by, any thing be revealed, let the first be silent.

33 For ye can all prophesy (αὐτός ὑμῖν) one by one, (ἰς, 197.) as all may learn, and all be comforted.

34 (Ku, 207.) For the spiritual gifts of the prophets are subject to the church of God. 35 (Exg. 91.) Besides, God is not the world to speak to them in foreign languages, that is, in the languages of the nations among whom they were dispersed. The psalms, therefore, is a prediction of the gift of speaking foreign languages to be bestowed on the first preachers of the gospel. From the psalm there is a prophecy of the apostles, Ver. 23—1. The whole church. By the whole church, the apostles did not mean the whole church of the first period, or the whole of the brethren who were used to meet together in one place for worship.

—Will they not say that ye are mad?—This is not contrary to what is said, ver. 22. that the speaking in foreign languages was a sign to convince unbelievers: for, the unbelievers to be convinced by that sign, were such strangers as understood the language in which they were addressed; whereas, the unbelievers and unlearned of the Corinthians who considered the speaking of foreign languages as an effect of madness, were those strangers who did not understand them.

—You can all prophesy. —Ver. 24. He is examined by all;—by all who have the gift of discerning spirits, and the right to put a downward tendency to the church that day, on which he was brought into their assembly, he will be affected in the manner described ver. 26.

—Each of you hath a psalm. —25. Grothius thinks this and the following clause should be read interrogatively: Hath each of you a psalm? hath a discourse? The inspired psalms of which the apostles spoke, were not metrical compositions, but compositions which were distinguished from prose, by the subtlety of the sentiments, and the strength, beauty, and spirituality of the expressions. Such was the inspired psalm which Mary our Lord's mother uttered, Luke 1:46, and the inspired thanksgiving and prayer which his disciples made at the supper, ver. 26., 27. And John from the council, recorded Acts iv. 26—30. And since it is said, ver. 24, that the whole company lifted up their voice (ἐεὐαγγέλιον) with one accord, it is evident that Peter, to whom that psalm was given, must have delivered it by two or three sentences at a time, as the Corinthians did in the like cases; (see 1. Es. iv. 39.) that all the company might join in it.

—A discourse; namely, for edification, exhortation, and consolation. For the words διαγγέλλω signify not only the thing taught, but the discourse in which it is taught. —See 1. Es. iv. 39.
I. CORINTHIANS.

Chap. XIV.

1. Cor. 14:34 Let your women be silent in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak: but they must be in subjection, as also the law (1 Cor. 14:35) commandeth. (Gen. iii. 16.)

2. And if they wish to learn any thing, let them ask their own husbands at home; for it is an indecent thing for women to speak in the church.

3. What! Went the word of God forth (esp. qum) from you women? or did it only come (as qum) to you? (Rom. 10:15)

4. If any one be really a prophet, or a spiritual person, let him acknowledge the things I write to you, that they are the commandments of the Lord.

5. And if any one be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

6. Subject to the will of the prophet; for which reason, they were not to think themselves under a necessity of speaking when a revelation was made to them, especially if it was made to them while another prophesies. (Rom. 12:3.)

7. But the law of Moses commandeth, that there should be a woman silent in the church, for it was not permitted unto them to speak, but they must be in the subjection, as also the law of Moses commandeth.

8. Do I not permit you so much as to ask a question in the church, even on pretence of receiving information? But if they wish to learn any thing, let them ask their own husbands at home; for it is an indecent thing for women, on any pretence, to speak in the church.

9. What! Went the word of God forth into the world from you women? Did Christ employ any of your sex as apostles? Or did the word only come to you by the ministry of the men? How then can you pretend to teach men?

10. If any one be really a prophet, or a discerner of spirits, I appeal to him, and require him to acknowledge the things I now write, and all the other things in this Epistle, that they are the commandments of the Lord Christ, given me by inspiration.

11. And if any one, after that, is ignorant that my precepts are the commandments of the Lord, let him be ignorant. His ignorance will prove a trial to him, and will try his own mouth and works.

12. B. Potter, after quoting this passage, Anctr. b. 2. c. 12. adid. "Few indeed have learnt to use this manner of speaking, and yelling, and making a strange terrible noise, sometimes guising their teeth, shivering and trembling, with a thousand acatic motions, in a manner different from the heathen diviners and absolutely mad, during the time of their inspirations." To this God alludes, Isai. xxxii. 15. "I am the Lord who frustrates the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad."—It is true, in these frantic fits of the heathen diviners there was often much imposture. Yet in some instances there seems to have been a real possession of the devil, as in the case of the damsel mentioned Acts xvi. 18. In these, as Gale says, the devil, imitating the ecstasies of the prophets of the heathen, (Jer. xxxiii. 15. 27. Hos. i. 3.) carried the maids beyond them. For, notwithstanding the prophets had their visions in an ecstasy, they related what they had seen in their ordinary frame. And if the Prophetess, in a frantic fit, be reported by Virgil to have done, (Enid vi. line 99—102.)

13. This is one of the passages where the inspired and the heathen prophets are compared. This clause seems to criticise, and amplify the rest. B. Pearce, joins with the following verse, by placing a full stop after the word peace; so as to make this sentence only the prophet's testimony to his own women. (Acts xvi. 18.) In other translations we have "silences in the churches," namely, of Achia. According to this method of pointing the sentence, 'the churches of the saints' are the churches of Judas, which were composed of the ancient people, called called saints. In these churches, the public worship and discipline was most perfect, because they had been planted and regulated by the apostles.

14. Let your women be silent in the churches.—Because the apostle in chap. xi. reproved women for praying and prophesying in the church without their veils, and did not blame them for the practice itself, but it was then argued, that he allowed them to pray and prophesy publicly, provided they did it with their heads veiled. But as the apostle's intention in chap. xi. was only to show the indecency of the manner in which the women prayed and prophesied in the church, and not necessarily to intimate that the practice was altogether forbidden, for the reason that it was permitted by Christ, no argument can be drawn in favour of that practice from his not prohibiting it. See chap. xi. note 1. It therefore remains to be considered, whether the apostle, in this chapter, absolutely forbids women to pray and prophesy in the church, or whether he forbids them only in the case of their not being inspired?

15. For determining the question, it may be of use to observe, that in this verse, as well as chap. xii. 12 or if they prophesied in a foreign language, to do it so as it might be interpreted by some one in the assembly who had the gift of interpretation, ver. 12; and after giving them directions concerning the orderly exercise of all their spiritual gifts, founded on this fact, that the spiritual gifts of the prophets were subject to the jurisdiction of the apostles, ver. 11, did not permit the women to prophesy in the church, for it hath not been permitted them to speak. (Ver. 12.) The prohibition in this connection implies, that the Corinthians were not to pray and prophesy in the church as tents or in pretence of being inspired and unable to restrain the motions of the Spirit. Next, the reason mentioned by the apostle shew, that the prohibition was absolute and general. Christ had not permitted women to speak in the church as teachers to the men; neither had he permitted them to prophesy in the church. The apostle, therefore, considered women's praying and prophesying in the church, as a recoumpling of their power as distinct from the apostle, who had exercised an unerring authority over the men. They were not so much as to ask a question in the church, on pretence of being inspired. If they did, it might least have given them a handle for entering into disputations with them. But if they wished to learn anything, they were to ask their husbands. (Ver. 34.) They were thus taught, first, not to make the church a place of discussion; and, secondly, not to teach men.
I. CORINTHIANS.

39. Wherefore, brethren, earnestly desire to prophecy; and hinder not to speak in foreign languages.

40. Let all things be done decently and in order.
affirm that there will be no resurrection of the dead; ver. 12. — For if there is to be no resurrection of the dead, Christ, who promised to return and raise the dead, is an impostor who hath deluded the world with false hopes, whom therefore God never would raise, ver. 13. — And if Christ hath not been raised, the preaching of all who call themselves eye-witnesses of his resurrection is false, and your faith in the gospel is false, ver. 14. — Besides, we apostles are found false witnesses concerning God, because we have witnessed, to the infinite dishounour of God, that he hath raised an impostor from the dead, whom assuredly he hath not raised, if the dead are not to be raised, ver. 15. — The argument taken from the resurrection of Christ, to prove that the dead will be raised, is of such importance, that the apostle affirmed a second time, if the dead are not to be raised, neither hath Christ been raised: He is an impostor whom God never would raise, ver. 16. — Besides, if Christ hath not been raised, your faith in him as your Saviour, though founded on miracles, is not only false but useless. It answers no purpose. The guilt of your sins remaineth, and ye are still in the mouth of death, ver. 17. Therefore, they who have died in the belief of Christ's resurrection, and they who have suffered death for that belief, are perished, if there is to be no resurrection of the dead, ver. 18. — Farther, to show you the absurdity of imputing to us apostles the crime of falsely testifying against God, that he hath raised an impostor from the dead whom he hath not raised, consider, that if there is to be no resurrection, consequently no future state, our only motive to commit the great crime imputed to us, must be some advantage which we reap from it in this life. Yet, instead of advantage, we have, by preaching Christ's resurrection, drawn on ourselves, from every quarter, the greatest present temporal evils; in so much, that if in this life we were not men not from Christ, we are of all men the most miserable, ver. 19. — This argument, joined with the consideration mentioned, ver. 18, namely, that if there is to be no resurrection, those who have died in the belief of Christ's resurrection, and the witnesses who have suffered death for attesting Christ's resurrection, are all utterly perished, demonstrates that the apostle, in the name of all the Gentiles, was themselves fully persuaded of the truth thereof. Wherefore, being perfectly qualified for judging, and having had the best opportunities to judge of the truth of Christ's resurrection, they could not possibly be deceived in that matter, and had no motive whatever to deceive the world.

It seems the philosophers affirmed, that the resurrection is a thing unworthy of God; for the apostle told the Corinthians, that God had confuted that assertion by raising Christ from the dead, as the first-fruit or pledge of his raising all the dead at the last day, ver. 20. — Next he observed, that since God, consistently with his justice and goodness, subjected all mankind to death for one man's sin, as experience showeth, he may, with equal justice and goodness, raise all men from the dead on account of the obedience of one man, as revelation teacheth. This I think is the meaning of ver. 21, 32. — Withal, to render the resurrection of the dead more certain to such of the Corinthians as understood and believed the other doctrines of the gospel, the apostle assured them, that Christ will reign till he hath destroyed all dominion opposite to God's; and in particular, till he hath by the resurrection of the dead destroyed the dominion of death, the greatest enemy of mankind. After which, Christ will deliver up the kingdom to God, ver. 24—27.; and then the Son himself shall be subjected to God, that God may be over all, in all places of the universe, ver. 28.

Next turning to discourse to those who denied the resurrection of the dead, he asked them, what they must do to make up their loss, who are beguiled, that is, plunged into the greatest afflictions, for believing the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not? and what possible reason can be assigned for their willingly suffering death on account of that belief, ver. 29. — Here it is instanced, that the testimony of the eye-witnesses concerning the resurrection of Christ had appeared so credible to many, and had wrought in them such a firm persuasion of their own resurrection, that, at the time the apostle wrote this letter, they were suffering the greatest evils, rather than renounce that faith and hope. Farther, he asked what reason the apostles could have for exposing themselves to the danger of death every hour, if they knew the resurrection of Christ and of the dead to be falsehoods; ver. 30. — And what advantage he in particular could propose to himself, in undergoing all the evils he suffered, if there is to be no resurrection of the dead? In that case, he told them, it had been better for him, and the other apostles, to have followed the maxim of the profane, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die,' ver. 31, 32. — Having by these strong reasonings established, first the impossibility of there being no resurrection of the dead, and secondly, the resurrection of all the dead, the apostle advised the Corinthians to abun conversing with 'any one who denied these essential articles of the Christian faith, ver. 33. — and commanded the faction to awake from their errors, ver. 34.

In what follows, the apostle answers two questions, with which the false teachers combated the doctrine of the resurrection. 'But some one will say, how can the dead be raised? Is it possible? and if it be possible, with what kind of body do they come out of the grave?' The philosophers argued, that the resurrection of the body is a thing impossible; and that, though it were possible, it is by no means desirable; because a body, such as the philosophers say, men not from Christ, are of all men the most miserable, ver. 19. — This argument, joined with the consideration mentioned, ver. 18, namely, that if there is to be no resurrection, those who have died in the belief of Christ's resurrection, and the witnesses who have suffered death for attesting Christ's resurrection, are all utterly perished, demonstrates that the apostle, in the name of all the Gentiles, was himself fully persuaded of the truth thereof. Wherefore, being perfectly qualified for judging, and having had the best opportunities to judge of the truth of Christ's resurrection, they could not possibly be deceived in that matter, and had no motive whatever to deceive the world.

Next to shew the philosophers their mistake in supposing the body of Christ was not mingled in its constitution by union with the body, the apostle compared the body of the righteous which died, (for it is of them only he discourses), with that which will be raised. Their buried body is corruptible; is dishonoured by death; is deformed and wasted by disease; and at best is weak in its operations; in short, it is an animal body, which like the body of beasts, depends for its growth and subsistence on meat and drink. But the body of the righteous, which shall be raised, will be incorruptible, and gloriously beautiful in its outward appearance, and powerful in its activity: in one word, it will be a spiritual body; a body which doth not subsist by meat and drink, but by its own internal vigour. Now, there being these differences between the body of the righteous that dieth and the body that riseth, the resurrection of the body, instead of being a disadvantage to the righteous, will contribute greatly to their perfection and happiness in the life to come, ver. 42—47. At this period of his discourse the apostle takes occasion to declare a great and important secret, concerning the resurrection of the wicked, hitherto not disclosed. He tells us, 'as the earthly or sinful man Adam was such also at the resurrection, the earthly or wicked men shall be; they shall rise with an earthly corruptible body, like that which Adam had after the fall, and such as Christ now is, such also at the resurrection shall the heavenly men, the righteous be, in respect to their body, ver. 48. And to prove that the righteous, who are destined to live in heaven, must bear the image of the heavenly man in their body as well as in their soul, he affirms, that a corruptible body, composed of flesh and blood, cannot inherit the kingdom of God, ver. 49, 50.-still he redounds another great mystery or secret, namely, that the righteous who are living on the earth as Christ's coming, instead of dying, shall all be changed in their body, from corruptible to incorruptible, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye; by which, and by the resurrection of the righteous from the dead, death shall be swallowed up for ever, with respect to them, ver. 51—54. and being warmed with the grandeur of his subject, he breaks forth into that noble song of victory: Where, O death, is thy sting? &c. ver. 56—57. The apostle gave to these discoveries the appellation of a mystery, not only because they were hitherto kept secret from mankind, but because they are discoveries infinitely more important, interesting, and important as the Aristotlean and modern philosophers are so fond of reviving; namely, that the body, by nature natural to matter, hath continued from all eternity the same as we see it, and that there exists nothing in the universe distinct from matter; so that the present course of things, consisting of the motions of the heavens, and of the successive generations and corruptions of animals and vegetables, can neither be interrupted nor destroyed by any thing extraneous, but must continue for ever. Nevertheless, if miracles have happened, this system of atheism cannot hold; because miracles, being an interruption of the course of nature, are proofs from experience, that there exists a power distinct from and superior to all the powers inherent in matter. And as this controlling power hath exerted itself with intelligence and freedom, it must possess both these attributes, and is what we mean by the term God.—Miracles therefore being proofs from experience of the existence of God, before the Aristotlean atheism can be established, that strong historical evidence by which the resurrection of Jesus, his miracles, and the miracles of his apostles are supported, must be destroyed. But, as were observed above, this cannot be done without destroying the faith of history, and overturning the only foundation of human belief.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XV.—I, now, make known to you, brethren, the gospel which I preached to you, which also ye received, and in which (namely, 10.) ye stand;

2 By which also ye are saved, (Rom. xi. 26. note 1.) if ye remember in what manner I preached to you; unless indeed ye have believed rashly.

3 For I delivered to you, among the first things, what also I received first, that Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures;

4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures;

Commentary.

CHAP. XV.—I. Some of you deny the resurrection of the dead, and thereby overturn the gospel from the foundation; as ye will perceive when I repeat to you, brethren, the gospel which I preached to you, which also ye believed, and in the faith of which many of you persevere.

2 By which gospel also ye have the knowledge and means of salvation bestowed on you, if ye remember in what a clear and convincing manner I preached to you the doctrines and evidences of the gospel; unless ye have believed those things rashly, without knowing for what reason.

3 For I delivered to you among the first things, as the chief articles of the gospel, what also I myself received first, that Christ died for our sins, according to the prophecies in the Jewish scriptures; Is. lili. 5, 6.

4 And that, as one known to be dead, he was buried in a new sepulchre wherein never any person was laid; and that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures.

Ver. 2. In what manner.—The appx. In translating this phrase I have followed the Vulgate which has here, quas radix. 2. Have believed (habes rashly.)—According to Le Clerc, this word denotes the disposition of those who do a thing by chance, and lightly, without knowing for what reason or else they do it. His true rendering therefore is, lamaris, rashly, incomodissime.

Vol. 6. Rises again the third day, according to the scriptures.]—

The scriptures which foretold the resurrection of the Christ on the third day, and to which St. Paul himself refers, are Acts ii. 32, expressly affirmed to be a prediction of that event. Also Jonah i. 17, which our Lord himself hath told us, is a typical prophecy of his 'consuming three days in the heart of the earth;' and of his subsequent resurrection, Matt. xxvii. 50, 60.—The apostle delivered to the Corinthians from the Lord himself, not only that he died for
And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve:

After that he was seen above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain unto this present time, but some are fallen asleep.

After that he was seen of James, then of all the apostles.

Last of all, as to one not of theTwelve, but as of an abbot, he was seen of me also, as of an abbot.

For I am the least of the apostles, who am not worthy, according to the excellency of the apostles.

But though I call myself an abbot, because I persecuted the church of God, I am an abbot of apostleship, inspiration, and miraculous powers, which were bestowed on me, was not fruitless; for as an abbot, I have laboured more abundantly and successfully than all the other apostles; yet this is not intended to be said, but to the aid of God which is with me continually.

Well then, although my call to apostleship was different from that of the other apostles, the same. For whether I or they preach, thus we preach, and thus ye believe.

Now if it be preached that Christ was raised from the dead, how can some among you say that there is no resurrection of the dead?

For if there be no resurrection of the dead, neither hath Christ been raised: (See ver. 16. note.)

And that he was seen of James, then of all the apostles, for which reason he is also called grace, Rom. i. 5; xii. 3. Gal. ii. 9. In this verse, grace is used in three different senses.

And his grace is not less abounding than all, etc. The apostle himself, and the qualifications necessary to the right discharge of the office, are called grace, Rom. i. 5; xii. 3. Gal. ii. 9. In this verse, grace is used in three different senses.

I have seen the assembly of the church of God, and because he was made an apostle without that previous course of instruction and preparation, which the other apostles enjoyed, who had attended him during his ministry on earth, so that, in the proper sense of the word, he was an apostle, one born before he was brought to maturity. That want, however, was abundantly supplied by the many revelations which his Master gave him after he made him an apostle.
V. 14. And if Christ hath not been raised, false certainty is our preaching concerning him, and false also is your faith in our preaching, notwithstanding we confirmed it by testifying on you the gift of the Holy Ghost.
V. 15. Besides, if Christ hath not been raised, we, who affirm that God raised him, and commissioned us to testify his resurrection, are found even false witnesses concern ing God, because we have witnessed against God, that he raised Christ, whom he raised not, if verily the dead are not raised.
V. 16. And, if the dead are not raised, neither hath Christ been raised.
V. 17. Further, if Christ hath not been raised, your faith (σπορά, 1 Tim. ii. 6.) is useless; ye are still in your sins.
V. 18. But if actually also they who are fallen asleep (σκοτειν, 157.) for Christ, are perished.
V. 19. If in this life only we have hopes (ος, 165.) by Christ, we are of all men (αμέν, 29.) the most miserable.
V. 20. (κατα διακονίαν.) But now Christ is raised from the dead, and is become (αναεύων) the first-fruits of them that have fallen asleep.
V. 21. For since (αν αύτος ημῶν,) through a man came death, through a man also cometh the resurrection of the dead.
V. 22. (οὖτος γαρ, 93.) Therefore, as (ος, 165.) by Adam all die, so also by Christ all shall be made alive.
V. 23. But every one in his proper band: the first-fruits, Christ; afterward they who are Christ’s at his coming.

John v. 25, 29. Wherefore, if there is to be no resurrection of the dead, Christ is a deceiver, whom no man in his right senses can suppose God to have raised, and to have declared his Son. And if Christ hath not been raised, the gospel being stripped of the evidence which it derives from the resurrection of its author, the whole of the preaching of the apostle, as is observed, ver. 14, is absolutely false. That the faith of the Corinthians in the divine origin of the gospel, and of all Christians from the beginning to the present hour, is likewise false. Such are the consequences of denying the resurrection.

Ver. 15—16. False witnesses concerning God.—So the phrase φαντάσματα τοῦ Θεοῦ must be translated, being the generic, not of possession, but of the person. See also v. 56. For God cannot have any false witnesses belonging to him.

Ver. 18. Who are fallen asleep (οἱ γυναῖκες γινομένοις γινόμενοι.)—On supposition that Christ was not raised, the bearing witness to his resurrection is very properly termed, a witness against God; because he is a witness against God, he has perjured himself to testify that he had confirmed the pretensions of an impostor with the highest possible evidence: which is a blasphemy against God highly injurious to his character; not to mention that it is a falsehood most pernicious to mankind.

Ver. 18. If the dead are not raised, neither hath Christ been raised.—This consequence the apostle had affirmed before, ver. 13. But being a matter of great importance, he repeats it in this verse, that he may make the stronger impression on the Corinthians. See ver. 13 note.

Ver. 17. Ye are still in your sins.—The great inducement to men to believe the gospel, is that it promises the pardon of sin upon repentance. Here the apostle assures us, that if Christ hath not been raised, he hath made no atonement for sins, Rom. v. 22; consequently we are still under the guilt of our sins; that is, we are liable to punishment, notwithstanding we have repented of our sins. This observation shows, that besides deliverance from the power of sin, which many of the Corinthians no doubt had experienced, an atonement for sin is necessary to the delivery of penitents from punishment.

Ver. 18. Who are fallen asleep (οἱ γυναῖκες γινομένοις γινόμενοι.)—For Christ.—If the ordinary signification of the preposition εἰς is retained, the meaning of the clause is, that they who had perished in the first resurrection, were brought into the possession of the Christian faith. Either of the translations shows, that in this discourse there was none but the resurrection of the just principally intended; and that what he hath written concerning the spiritual and incorruption of the body of the dead, is to be understood of the body of the saved. Also, ver. 18.

Ver. 19. If in this life only we have hope for Christ.—Here the apostle answers an objection, which, according to his manner, he does without, but supposes the reader to have made it in his own mind. The objection is this; The apostles know that Christ hath not risen, and that there will be no resurrection of the dead; but they preach those things for the sake of some present advantage. To this St. Paul replies, 'If in this life only we have hope by Christ, we are of all men the most miserable; because, by preaching his resurrection, we expose ourselves to every possible present evil, and if there is to be no resurrection of the dead, there is no future appearance in which we can have any our hope set against the Sadducees, who, believing the soul to be material, affirmed that it perishes with the body, and will have no existence after death, as the body is new and spiritual. And such an argument is equally conclusive, on supposition that the soul is immaterial, and that it will exist and enjoy after death, although the body is perished; for, if the apostles were false witnesses and impostors, they could look for no happiness from God after death.

Ver. 20.—1. And the first fruits of those that sleep.—The Israelites were commanded, Lev. xxii. 11. to bring on the sabbath before the sabbath with which the passover week began, 'a sheaf of the first-fruits of their harvest,' an offering before the Lord, which every one who, by accepting it, was made both an example and a pledge of the future harvest.—In allusion to that rite, Christ, who arose on the very day on which the first-fruits were offered, is called 'the first-fruits of them who have fallen asleep,' because he is the first whom was raised from the dead to die no more, and because his resurrection to die no more, is an example and an earnest of the resurrection of the righteous. As this epistle was written a little before the passover, chap. v. 8, that circumstance might suggest the allusion.

2. Of them who have fallen asleep.—By them who have fallen asleep, I understand the righteous in general, of whose resurrection I die no more, of whose resurrection I am the example and the proof. For, although the argument founded on Christ's resurrection, explained ver. 13, and that subjoined, ver. 21, 22, apply to all mankind, they do not mean to prove, that like Christ the wicked are to be raised to die no more. See ver. 22 note 3.—In proving the resurrection of the dead, the apostle with great propriety insists on Christ's resurrection; because, as Doddridge observes, on whatever principle the resurrection is denied, Christ's resurrection shows the fulness of the resurrection. The resurrection of the body of Christ was prefigured and seen it was accomplished in Christ; neither is it anything mean and worldly, seeing he hath descended to partake of it.

Ver. 22. As by Adam, so by Christ.—The best commentators on this passage say, 'Well then, as through one offence sentence came upon all men to condemnation, so through one righteous sentence came upon all men to justification of life.' And because Christ is the author of that new life which mankind obtain by his resurrection, his resurrection, ver. 22.

Ver. 33.—1. But every one in his proper band:—So το έν τοις αυτις signifies; For τοις αυτης denotes a band of soldiers, a cohort, a le.

See Scaliger’s Dissertation:—The verb ἔσωθεν is the word for order. According to this translation, it is here intimated, that the righteous
For he must reign, till he (God) hath put all the enemies under his feet. See Eph. i. 23. note.

The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed.

For he hath subjected all things under his feet. Now, when it saith, that all things are subjected, it saith that he, he is exalted which hath subjected all things to him.

(Acts 103.) Now, when all things (servum servum) are subjected to him, then (nun autem iacit) even the Son himself shall be subjected to him, and then (etiam) God may be over all things, in all places. Otherwise, what shall they do who are baptized (sicut dixi, supply the antecedent) for the resurrection of the dead, to be raised by themselves, and the wicked by themselves. In the last day. But the apostle infers, that the resurrection of the dead will be raised at Christ's coming; that is, they are to be first raised, consequently raised before the living are changed, and before the wicked are raised. See the next note. Having given this general account of the resurrection, the apostle declares, that 'the end shall be, when Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father,' (vers. 28.) completely established. Next; he shows that the resurrection of the dead is possible, ver. 36.-38.; then describes the resurrection of the body; it shall be given to it a spiritual body, and affirms that the wicked, whom he calls earthly men, are to be raised with earthly or corruptible bodies, like those which they des- troyed. For when the Son himself is exalted (vers. 27.) men are to have bodies like Christ's glorious body. At his coming. -See the apostle affirms, ver. 22; that all men shall be made alive by Christ, and in this verse, that every one shall be made alive in his own kind; also, seeing we are told, I Thess. iv. 16, that the righteous who are alive in the coming of Christ, and who are to be changed, (vers. 51 of this chap.) shall not anticipate them who are asleep, it is probable, as was observed in the preceding verse, that all men, when the Son himself is exalted, shall be raised. Their change, however, will happen before the resurrection of the wicked, who are to shew the shame and everlasting contempt. Will be raised, I think, last of all. Ver. 34. Deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father; (-deleat regnum terrae, etc.) shall deliver up the kingdom, called Matt. xxvii. 11. 'All power in heaven and in earth,' that is, power over angels as well as over men, administered by the Son for the good of his church. See ver. 29. The kingdom of Jesus Christ (supp. 'from his Father) was received by human nature, as the reward of his humiliation, and was solemnly installed in it after his resurrection, crucified and raised up, and invited by God to sit at his right hand till he should make his enemies his footstool. Farther, because it is said, Col. i. 17. 'He is before all things, and by him all things consist.' -and because we are told, Heb. i. 3, that the Son, while he spake the gospel, 'upheld all things by the word of his power,' it is believed, that, besides the mediatorial kingdom which the Son administered in the human nature, and which he will deliver up to the Father after the judgment, he possessed the government of the universe from the beginning in his character as Creator. In like manner, when Christ prayed to his Father, John viii. 6. 'Glory thou me with thyself ownself, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was created,' that is, the glory, which he enjoyed in the glory of the angelic hosts, which he enjoyed with the Father before our world was created; and that after the mediatorial kingdom is finished, the kingdom which he holds as Creator will remain with him as from the beginning. So that after the judgment, the righteous shall enter into it the everlasting kingdom of Jesus Christ, as 'they are represented to do, ver. 55. See the note there. But to this opinion, ver. 28. of this chapter is opposed, there are told, that when all the enemies are subjected, then shall even the Son himself be subjected to the Father, that all government may be administered by God himself, and all obedience and adoration directed immediately in him. See ver. 29. note. Ver. 28. The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed. —The common version of this passage, as Hallett observes, implies that there are some enemies which shall not be destroyed; which is wrong; for all enemies shall be destroyed, ver. 29. The same author thinks, that the same expression is used of death. But this is not true, if the destruction of death is to be accomplished by the resurrection. For the devil and his angels, and wicked mankind, are rejected and punished, and all the enemies of Chrysostom's opinion, death is called the last enemy, because he entered into the world after the devil and sin entered. I. CORINTHIANS.

24 When the resurrection is accomplished, and the judgment finished, and the righteous are introduced into the presence of God, then the end of the present state of things shall be, when Christ will deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, after God by him shall have destroyed all government, and all authority and power, opposite to his own.

25 According to his promise, (Psalm ex. 1.) Christ must reign till God hath put all the enemies under his feet; that is, till he hath utterly subdued them to Christ, that he may destroy them.

26 In particular, the last or greatest enemy of mankind, death, shall be destroyed by the resurrection. In what I have said concerning the duration of Christ's kingdom, and his delivering it up to the Father, is agreeable to Psal. vii. 8. More particularly, the apostle declares, that all things are subjected, manifest it is, that he is exalted who hath subjected all things to him; consequently, that God always was, and is, and will remain the supreme Governor.

27 Now, when all things are made subject to Christ, and there is no longer need of a propit to teach, nor of a priest to make atonement, nor of a king to rule under God, the Father will resume the government, and then (etiam) God may be over all things, in all places; and the immediate object of their worship and obedience. 28 I told you, ver. 23. that by Christ all shall be made alive; and verses 25, 26, that he must reign till death, the last enemy, is destroyed by the resurrection, otherwise, what shall they do to repair
I. CORINTHIANS.

30 And if the dead rise not at all and why are they baptized (κατέπωρευτοι), for the resurrection of the dead? (31) Why are we also in danger every hour? (32) If after the manner of men, I have fought with wild beasts at Ephesus, what is the advantage to me if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. (33) Be not deceived, evil communications corrupt good manners. (34) Awake, as is fit, and do not sin, for some of you are ignorant of God; (35) But some one will say, How can the dead be raised up? and with what kind of body do they come? (36) And I am foolish, (και εστι σοι) what thou sowest is not quickened unless it die.

Chapter XV.

1. As our Lord termed the sufferings he was to undergo at Jerusalem, "a baptism with which he was to be baptized," Luke xii. 50, and declared that James and John should be baptized with the baptism he would suffer, Matt. xxi. 27, that is, should undergo the sufferings with him, ending in death; in representing the sufferings which the first Christians endured under the idea of a baptism, the apostle adopted his Master's phraseology, and reasoned exactly as if he had asked the Corinthians, "What shall they do who are baptized for believing and being justified? Do they believe or doubt? Do they die or live?" Only understand the word baptized here in its ordinary meaning. For baptism being an emblematical representative of death and burial, and resurrection, not only of the Jew, but of all mankind, Rom. vi. 4. It was fitly made the rise of initiation into the Christian church; and the person who received it, thereby publicly professing his belief of the resurrection of Christ and of the dead, might with the greatest propriety be said to have been baptized for the dead, that is, for his belief of the resurrection of the dead. Erias in his Fertulata Sacra, p. 137, translates the clause, as we have seen, "a baptism in the name of the dead, that is, the church that, for him, baptizes the dead;" and the second interpretation. Some are of opinion, that εἰς τὸ δικαίωμα τῶν νεκρῶν is put here for εἰς τὸ δικαίωμα τῶν θανάτων, for the damnation of the dead, for the purpose of the resurrection. But it must be noted that the resurrection is the continuation of the life of the soul, and is not the resurrection of the dead as a body. Now, the Lord and the apostle, in the first place, declare that the resurrection of the dead will continue for ever. See Esai. iv. 4. But I doubt whether this change of the number can be admitted here. Many ancient manuscripts read εἰς τὸ πάντα τῶν θανάτων. But that if this sense does not improve the sense of the passage. Upon the whole, the first mentioned seems to be the most probable interpretation of this difficult eliptical passage.

2. Ver. 21. By the boasting concerning you which I have. The word used (κήρυξα) is the accusative of the object, "boasting concerning you," as is plain from the apostle's adding εἰς τὸν κήρυκα, "which I have concerning you." It is the custom anclently to swear by such things as were the objects of men's greatest affection. The apostle, therefore, on this solemn occasion, aware by what the apostle's word was continued, naming, the conversion of the Corinthians, of which God had made him the instrument. Ver. 22. - 1. (Εἰς τὸ κόσμον ἐξέστησα) I have fought with wild beasts. - Pyle would have translated, "If I had fought, what would it have profited me?" &c. That this was a real, not a metaphorical combat with beasts, may be collected from the prophecies concerning the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, said to one another, chap. xiii. 13. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die. The apostle, in the narrative of the apostles concerning the final judgment, speaks of the "beasts of the wicked" in time, chap. ii. 1-9, from which it appears that the number of their enemies cannot be estimated. Ver. 23. Evil communications corrupt good manners. It is commonly supposed, that this is taken from the θεαίας γλώσσας, the celebrated Athenian poet, because it is found among the fragments of his works, π. 245. 11 Κωνσταντίνος, and Thersander, that in quoting, the apostle hath sanctified the poet's sentiment; by which it seems to intimation, that he had made it a part of inspired scripture. But I am not satisfied that any such expression, which need not be quoted to any particular author, having been commonly used. The Greek word παρακείμενος signifies not only discourses, but every kind of familiar intercourse. And therefore, as Alberti observes, the phrase παρακείμενος might be translated bad company. The persons whose company the apostle deprecates, are those with whom he supposed the Corinthians had been conversing, who reasoned against the immortality of the soul and a future state. Ver. 34. - 1. Awake, as is fit. -Beware of hypocrisy, lightly riding upon the Mount of Olives, or the walls of Jerusalem. The apostle has already taught that hypocrisy is a species of lying, or a lie of the mouth. The figure is striking. It represents the corrupt part of the Corinthians as intoxicated with false doctrine and sensual indulgences. For which reason the apostle called on them to awake, as was fit, out of the deep sleep occasioned by that intoxication, and to recover the use of their reason.

2. Some of you are ignorant of God. - Such of the Corinthians as denied the resurrection and a future state, showed great ignorance, both of God's character as universal Governor of the world, and of his perfections, especially his power and goodness set forth in the works of creation.

Ver. 35. How can the dead be raised up? and with what kind of body do they come? - Here, as in ver. 15, the present indicative is used for the purpose of the question, how the dead can be raised up? See Esai. iv. 9. According to this translation, the apostle mentions two questions which were put by the philosophers concerning Divinity, "Whether the dead raise not?" The first, How is it possible that the dead can be raised up? The second, If it be a thing possible, with what kind of body do they then rise? - But this division seems not to be in the text, but has been retained in the translation, there will be one question here twice proposed. For the question, whether what kind of body? is in meaning precisely the same with How are the dead raised up? and makes a tautology which ought not to be imputed to so logical and concise a writer as St. Paul. Besides, in what follows, these are answered as different questions. For in answer to the first question, How can the dead be raised up? the apostle begins with proving the possibility of the resurrection, by appealing to the power of God displayed in raising grain from seed which is sown in the ground, and in giving to each of the kinds, when it is grown up, proper body proper to it: also in making bodies corporal and having terrestrial, each having its own properties by which it is distinguished from all other bodies, and the particular properties of the power of God, the apostle infers, that the resurrection of the dead is possible, ver. 36-45. His answer to the second question. With what kind of body do they come? the apostle gives from the initial ver. 35, beginning with the body of the righteous, (ver. 42 note 3) whose properties he contrasts with the properties of the body which is lied in the grave. The question is intended to be, Are we to come out of the grave with an earthly or fleshly body, like that out of which we were called from the dust, and into which we died? Next, with respect to the righteous who are found alive in the earth at the coming of Christ, he declares that their body will be changed, in a moment, from corruption to incorruption; their cause flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,ver. 50-56. - 35. Thou fool. - The apostle gave the false teacher at Corinth an application of this word, and why they should reason that our Lord himself called the Pharisees fools, namely, on account of their impenitent and impenitent state.

2. What thou sowest is not quickened unless it die. - To illustrate the possibility of the resurrection, the apostle appeals to a thing which men every day behold, and which is little less wonderful than
I. CORINTHIANS.

37 And (supp. serv.) as to what thou sowest, thou sowest not the body which shall be, but bare grain, perhaps of wheat, or of some of the other kinds:

38 But God giveth it a body, as it hath pleased him, and to each of the seeds (as also seems) its proper body.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh indeed of men, and another flesh of beasts, and another of fishes, and another of fowls; 40 And there are bodies terrestrial, and bodies celestial: but the one is of one kind, the other of another kind.

41 The glory of the sun is one, and the glory of the moon another, and the glory of the stars another: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 As he receiveth the conclusion, the conclusion is: Wherefore, even the resurrection of the dead is possible.

43 It is sown in corruption, it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power:

the resurrection itself—the reproduction of grain from seed sown, which does not grow unless it be sowed in the ground. But, after its body is destroyed, something springs out of it, which by a geological process, the effect of the power of God, and is the production of the same kind of grain, not bare as it was sown, but richly adorned with stalk, ear, and grain.

Ver. 37—1. Thou sowest not the body which shall be. By affirming that the grain produced from the seed sown is not the very body which was sown, I think it is implied that the body raised is not numerically the same body as the body deposited at death, but something of the same kind formed by the energy of God. Having such an example of the divine power before our eyes, we cannot think the reproduction of the body impossible, though its parts be utterly disarranged. Further, although the very numerical body is not raised, yet the body is truly raised, because what is raised being united to the soul, there will arise in the man thus completely restored, a consciousness of his identity, by which he will be sensible of the justice of the retribution which is made to him for his deeds. Besides, this new body will more than supply the place of the old, by serving every purpose for the happiness of the man in his new state. See ver. 44 note. According to this view of the resurrection, the objection taken from the scattered remains of the body that dies, has no place; because it does not seem necessary that the body to be raised should be composed of them. For if it were, we should lose all the advantage of the resurrection, for the resurrection is to be raised: what it teaches is, that the dead shall be raised.

40 And there are bodies terrestrial, and bodies celestial: but the one is of one kind, the other of another kind.

Ver. 39. All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh indeed of men, and another flesh of beasts, and another of fishes, and another of fowls. 40 And there are bodies terrestrial, and bodies celestial: but different, indeed, is the glory of the celestial, and different that of the terrestrial.

41 The glory of the sun is one, and the glory of the moon another, and the glory of the stars another: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

Ver. 39. 1. Thou sowest not the body which shall be. By affirming that the grain produced from the seed sown is not the very body which was sown, I think it is implied that the body raised is not numerically the same body as the body deposited at death, but something of the same kind formed by the energy of God. Having such an example of the divine power before our eyes, we cannot think the reproduction of the body impossible, though its parts be utterly disarranged. Further, although the very numerical body is not raised, yet the body is truly raised, because what is raised being united to the soul, there will arise in the man thus completely restored, a consciousness of his identity, by which he will be sensible of the justice of the retribution which is made to him for his deeds. Besides, this new body will more than supply the place of the old, by serving every purpose for the happiness of the man in his new state. See ver. 44 note. According to this view of the resurrection, the objection taken from the scattered remains of the body that dies, has no place; because it does not seem necessary that the body to be raised should be composed of them. For if it were, we should lose all the advantage of the resurrection, for the resurrection is to be raised: what it teaches is, that the dead shall be raised.

40 And there are bodies terrestrial, and bodies celestial: but the one is of one kind, the other of another kind.

Ver. 39. All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh indeed of men, and another flesh of beasts, and another of fishes, and another of fowls. 40 And there are bodies terrestrial, and bodies celestial: but different, indeed, is the glory of the celestial, and different that of the terrestrial.

41 The glory of the sun is one, and the glory of the moon another, and the glory of the stars another: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

Ver. 41. As he receiveth the conclusion, the conclusion is: Wherefore, even the resurrection of the dead is possible. And with respect to the kind of body with which the dead come out of the grave, the body is laid in the grave corruption; it is raised incorruptible, not subject either to mutilation or death.

42 It is laid in the grave dishonoured by death, the punishment of sin; it is raised glorious in beauty: It is buried in weakness through mortality, diseases, and old age; it is raised in power, with all its members completed, alive, and vigorous, fitting itself to the present body, and perfectly adapted to the faculties of their minds, and to the new world in which they are to live.

43 It is sown in corruption, it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: the resurrection itself—the reproduction of grain from seed sown, which does not grow unless it be sowed in the ground. But, after its body is destroyed, something springs out of it, which by a geological process, the effect of the power of God, and is the production of the same kind of grain, not bare as it was sown, but richly adorned with stalk, ear, and grain.
I. CORINTHIANS.

44. It is sown (μαραθούντων) on an animal body. It is raised (αναστάσις) a spiritual body. There is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body.

45. For thus it is written, (Gen. ii. 7.) The first man Adam was made (αὐτὸν ἔφη) a living soul; the last Adam (αὐτὸν ἔφη) a vievγέννησις (vivifying spirit).

46. However, that was not first which is spirit.

Ver. 45—1. It is sown in dishonour. —The body laid in the grave is dead, is said to be sown in dishonour, because death is the punishment of sin. Hence our body laid in the grave is called, Phil. iii. 20, our mortal body.

2. It is raised in glory. —This is an allusion to Dan. xii. 2. "That they may shine as the brightness of the firmament, and be as the only star for ever." And to our Lord's words, Matt. xxii. 30, "Then shall the righteous shine as the sun." For these are descriptions of the glory of the resurrection. "That body of our mortal nature" was the subject of his discourse. For the resurrection is not the same as the transfiguration, because the body of his transfiguration and glory did receive his three disciples an idea at his transfiguration, when he changed his body in such a manner that "his face did shine as the sun." But the body of Christ, speaking of the resurrection, does say he received the body he had in his former life, in order that it may become as like of form with his glorious body.

3. The alteration to be performed in the resurrection of the body, is a change from a body of a different nature. —This is a body of a like of similar character, but of a different and superior nature, from the body it was before. For this whole of this verse, and the following verse, is indeed great and wonderful; but it is far from being impossible.

For, to illustrate great things, we have an argument drawn from a body of a different nature, taken from a subject of the like of a similar character, but of a different and superior nature, in the resurrection of the body, which, in its first state, is ugly, weak, and easily crushed, but which, in the resurrection of the body, will possess strength and glory, and fearsome power. But, as we shall see, in the resurrection of the body, the body will be raised, it will be like the same with the body that was buried. So the ancient Christian fathers believed, as we learn from Ruffus, who, to show that he held the catholic faith concerning the resurrection of the body, wrote to Pope Anastasius in the end of the fourth century as follows: "The body of our mortal nature, when our body is raised, will be raised in a spiritual form; it will be as the body of Christ, which is the same body of the risen body, which is the same body of the body of the son of man, which is the same body of the son of God. But this body will not be the same body, whether it is raised in the grave, or of any other place, or of any other person, in the same field, or of different persons, or of the same persons, or more or less. For every one knows that our present body is justly reckoned the same body in all the persons who have been made men. But the body that was buried in the grave is to have such members and organs of sensation as their new state requires, and if these members are to be of similar form and use as the others, then it must be the same body. But although the ancient skeps of the resurrection of the flesh in which we now live, they did not mean the resurrection of the body that they now speak of, which the Church of Christ laid in the grave. They knew that the flesh of the raised body of the saints was to be incorruptible, consequently that it would be like the body of Christ in the resurrection, the body of the son of God, the body of the risen Lord, the body of the son of man. But if the body were the same body, no one could be willing to go to heaven, because of the pollution of the body. But if it be not the same body, this is the word of the ancient Christian fathers on that subject may be admitted, as agreeable to the philosophy of scripture. To conclude, the scriptural language, especially the language of the apostle in describing resurrection, after the resurrection, it represents them as having of their bodies, and filling the glory of their glorified bodies. But this is according to the word of the ancient Christian fathers on that subject. But if it be not the same body, the resurrection of the body, in the sense just now explained, being of another person, who has not the same members, organs, or nature of the members of the ancient Christians, remains in their state, of which present we can form no conception. For if the raised body is to be endowed with new powers, as the resurrection of the members, and, notwithstanding the addition, the raised body may, according to the description of the apostle, be like the body of Christ in the resurrection, the body of the risen Lord, the body of the son of man, be begotten, be considered as the same.

47. The resurrection of the body, in the sense just now explained, being of another person, who has not the same members, organs, or nature of the members of the ancient Christians, remains in their state, of which present we can form no conception. For if the raised body is to be endowed with new powers, as the resurrection of the members, and, notwithstanding the addition, the raised body may, according to the description of the apostle, be like the body of Christ in the resurrection, the body of the risen Lord, the body of the son of man, be begotten, be considered as the same.

48. The last Adam. —Christ is called Adam, because he was the first Adam. And in the passage of scripture quoted by the apostle, these words, "as he was a living soul, so are all men," are applied to Christ, not as the Father hath life in himself, as he hath given to the Son to have life in himself;—"As the apostle speaks of the Father of Christ. But as he has received his glory from the Father, so also Christ is the last Adam, because there shall be no resurrection and head of the human race after him.

2. A vivifying spirit, not in the passage of scripture quoted by the apostle. These words are his own invention. If he himself were raised, he could claim the title of the Father; for he is called the Father, as the Father hath life in himself, as he hath given to the Son to have life in himself. As the apostle speaks of the Father of Christ. But as he has received his glory from the Father, so also Christ is the last Adam, because there shall be no resurrection and head of the human race after him.

Bosanquet, "The Tense of the Present in the New Testament," pp. 107-108. Contends, that this passage is quite a foreign idea from Christ; and that it can have no other meaning than the resurrection of a living soul. But that he mistakes the matter, I think we will appear from this, that this passage is quite a foreign idea from Christ; and that it can have no other meaning than the resurrection of a living soul. But that he mistakes the matter, I think we will appear from this. That the resurrection of the body is represented by our Lord himself, as that will render the happiness of the saints complete in the world to come, Luke xiv. 14, xx. 35, 36, John v. 25, 29.
I CORINTHIANS.

Chap. XV.

SPIRITUAL BODY

A spiritual body is allotted to the righteous, that body was not first given them which is spiritual; but that which is animal, and fitted for the purposes of their present state; and then that body which is spiritual, and fitted for their state in heaven.

47 The first man (the man) from the earth was (206@ dusty) earthy; the second man, the Lord (206h) from heaven, is heavenly.

(From the following ver.)

48 As the earthy, even so also the earthy shall be; and as the heavenly, even so also the heavenly shall be.

49 (120, 207.) For, as we have borne the image of the earthy man, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly man. (See Phil. iii. 51.)

50 (206, 101.) And this (the creature) I affirm, brethren, (206m) because flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither (206s, 206h) can corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, (206m, 55.) I tell you a mystery; we shall not (206, 207) indeed all die, but we shall all be changed.

52 In a moment, a twinkling of an eye, (206, 173.) at the last trumpet, for it shall sound (206s, 2013.) and then the dead shall be raised incorruptible; and we shall be changed.

Ver. 46. Then that which is spiritual. — Here we are taught, that the progress of the divine government is to lead his creatures from a lower to a higher state of perfection. They, therefore, who contend that the apostle was speaking of the body only, and as at the conclusion of his administration, are wiser than God. Ver. 47. The second man, the Lord from heaven, is heavenly. — This translation is supported by the Vulgate version; "secundus homo de celo, celestia." The second man from heaven is heavenly; and by the Borne in MS. Gr. and Latin, and by one of Valerius" MS., mentioned by Sp. Pears; all which have here it supp. Nevertheless I have marked the words is heavenly, as not in the Greek, because, although I think it was so written by the apostle, I would not alter the present text, either on conjecture or on slight authority. In the Vulgate the word Lord is wanting, having, as Terrill tells us, been added by Marcellus. Yet I am of opinion it is the true reading.

Ver. 48. As the earthy, even so. — The apostle divides mankind into two parts, the earthy, or sensual man, who is like the earthy man; and the heavenly, who is like the heavenly man. And then he adds, even so also the earthy man; and as the heavenly man, such also the earthy man, such also the heavenly man. The Vulgate has, "anima hominis terrena, et anima hominis coelestis." This is another division of man, the sensual man and the spiritual man. They are not the same; for that which is sensual cannot be spiritual; nor can that which is earthly be heavenly. And then he adds, as the likeness to the earthy, and as the likeness to the heavenly man, which is to take place after the resurrection. And therefore, in the translation, I have supplied the substantive verb in the future tense: Such also the earthy shall be. And in support of my translation and opinion, I observe, that throughout the whole of this discovery concerning the resurrection, the body is only which is spoken of. This is especially the case, if we refer, (47:01,) where we are told, that it is sown an animal body, but raised a spiritual body. For there is no other reason why there should be an animal body among the earthy, and a spiritual body among the heavenly, than that there is an animal and a spiritual body allotted to the righteous in the different stages of their existence; that they derive their animal body from Adam, but their spiritual body from Christ; that their spiritual body is not first given them, but their animal, and then that which is spiritual; that the first man, Adam, but the second, the Lord, and the earthy, his body was earthy, but the second man being the Lord from heaven, his body is heavenly. Wherefore, when the apostle speaks of the earthy man, as the earthy, the earthy man, and the earthy, he means, as is evident from the context, as earthly, or of flesh and blood, as is evident from this verse, that they derive their animal body from Adam, but their spiritual body from Christ; that their spiritual body is not first given them, but their animal, and then that which is spiritual. But the first man, Adam, but the second, the Lord, and the earthy, his body was earthy, but the second man being the Lord from heaven, his body is heavenly. Wherefore, when the apostle speaks of the earthy man, as the earthy, the earthy man, and the earthy, he means, as is evident from the context, as earthly, or of flesh and blood; and the earthy, as of earthy, as of earthly, or of earthy; and as earthly, such as are earthly, and such as are heavenly, such as are heaven-
2. CORINTHIANS.

58 For, to make us capable of inheriting the kingdom of God, this corruptible body must become incorruptible, not liable to disease; and this mortal body must become immortal, not liable to death.

59 Now, when this corruptible body shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal body shall have put on immortality, then shall happen the thing which is written, Death is swallowed up for ever. (See ver. 28.)

55 Where, O death! is thy sting? Where, O grave! is thy victory?

56 For the sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law.

57 Now thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

58 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye (διακόμα) stable, unmoved, abounding in the work of the Lord at all times, knowing that your labour in the Lord is not (ανάρχονται) vain.

Ver. 53. For this corruptible body must (σφαίρας ἀκάλλυτος) put on incorruption. — That is, the body, is rightly supplied here, see ver. 62. Note. The word ἀκάλλυτος literally signifies, to go into a place, and metaphorically, to put on, or go into clothes. But the metaphorical meaning must not be insisted on here as implying, that our corruptible body shall have one that is incorruptible put over it for an outward covering. These ideas are incorrectly connected. Therefore the meaning is, That this corruptible body must be changed into one that is incorruptible, as mentioned ver. 51. — The righteous who are alive at the coming of Christ, instead of being lifted up and raised again immortal, shall, by the power of Christ, have their corruptible mortal bodies changed in a moment into incorruptible immortal bodies, and by that means be fitted for inheriting the kingdom of God equally with those who are raised from the dead incorruptible.

Ver. 54. Death is swallowed up for ever. — The phrase σφαίρας ἀκάλλυτος puts the body of the sinner in a condition to be destroyed, and the word unchangeable is frequently used by the LXX., in that sense, as Whetby hath proved. This circumstance likewise shows, that in his discourse concerning the resurrection, the apostle had the righteous chiefly in view. For it cannot be said of the wicked, who are to suffer the second death, that death is swallowed up in any sense with respect to them, or that God hath given them the victory over it, ver. 27. by the resurrection. R. Pears in his note on this verse observes, that the LXX. translation of Isa. xxv. 8. here quoted, runs thus: Λέγεται ἡ ἡμέρα τῆς ἀποκάλυψες ὑπερασπισμον, 'Death having prevailed, hath swallowed up: but that in the Theodotion's version the word abides unchanged. See the note on ver. 55.

Ver. 56. Where, O death! is thy sting? Where, O grave! is thy victory? — The word αἰματιτις, translated the grave, literally signifies the invisible world, or the place where departed spirits, both good and bad, remain till the resurrection: Job xi. 21. Ps. cxxiii. 8; Isa. xiv. 9 and especially Psal. xvi. 10. Thou wilt not leave my soul (ἐν ἀδικία) in hell. 1 The place where the spirits of the righteous abide, the Jews called Paradise; the place where the wicked are shut up, they called Tartarus, after the Greeks. There the rich man was said to have gone when he died. There also many of the later angels are said to be continually imprisoned, 2 Pet. ii. 4. In this noble passage the apostle personifies death and the grave, and introduces this figure of speech, after the manner of the Greeks, singing a song of victory over both. In this sublime song, death is represented as a terrible monster, having a deadly sting, wherewith it had destroyed the bodies of the whole human race, and the world, and already had imprisoned their spirits. But the sting being torn from death, and the gates of the invisible world set open by Christ, the bodies of the righteous shall rise from the dead, no more liable to be imprisoned by death, and their spirits being brought out of paradise, the place of their abode, shall resuscitate their bodies: and the first use of their newly recovered vitality will be to sing this song, in which they exult over death and hades, as enemies utterly destroyed; and praise God who hath given them the victory over these deadly foes through Jesus Christ. Milton hath made good use of the apostle's personification of death, Book ii. 1. 66. 'The other form,' &c.

Ver. 57. Who giveth us the victory. — The victory over death and the grave the saints shall obtain, by their resurrection to an endless life in the body; and the victory over sin, and over the curse of the law, will be given them by their acquittal at the judgment. For their trial being then ended, there shall from that time forth, in the kingdom of God, be neither sin, nor law, with the penalty of death annexed to it.

Ver. 58. Unmoved. — The Greek word ἀνυπόκτως literally signifies unmoved, unmoved, unmoved; in both the sense of a quality not competent to men in the present life. See Rom. ii. 8. note.

CHAPTER XVI.

Before the apostle concluded his letter to the Corinthians, he gave them directions for making the collection for the saints in Judea. During his eighteen months' abode at Corinth, he had exhorted the brethren to undertake that good work, (as indeed he did the brethren in all the Gentile churches,) with a view to establish a cordial union between the converted Jews and Gentiles everywhere. See 2 Cor. ix. 14. note. And so desirous were the Corinthians of the proposed union, that, on the first mention of the collection, they agreed to make it. But the divisions in the church at Corinth, it seems, had hindered the thing; and therefore, in this letter requested them to set about it immediately, and directed them how to do it, ver. 1-4.

At the time St. Paul wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians, he had altered his resolution respecting his voyage to Corinth, of which he had formerly given them notice by Timothy and Erastus, as mentioned 2 Cor. i. 15, 16. For he now informed them, that instead of sailing direct from Ephesus to Corinth, as he had at first proposed, his intention was, not to come to them immediately, but to take Macedonia in his way, ver. 5.—After staying at Ephesus till Pentecost, on account of the extraordinary success with which he was preaching the gospel to the inhabitants of the province of Asia, who resorted to him in great numbers, (see Acts xix. 21, &c.) in the mean time, to compensate the loss which the Corinthians sustained by his delaying to visit them, he wrote to them this letter, in which he gave them the instructions which he would have delivered to them if he had come to them; and promised, when he came, to abide a considerable time, and perhaps to winter with them, ver. 5, &c. — And because he had sent Timothy to Corinth; the apostle desired the Corinthians to give him a good reception, if he came to them, ver. 10, 11. — With respect to Apollos, whom, it seems, the Corinthians wished to see, he told them, he had entertained him to go to them with the brethren, but that, having no inclination to go to Corinth at that time, he had deferred his visit till he should find a convenient season. Perhaps the insolent behaviour of the faction, while Apollos was among them, had so disgusted him that he did not choose to expose himself a second time to their and to show his sincerity in the cause he was going to pronounce on hypocritical professors of religion, he be in the same handwriting added, 'If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-tha': a denunciation of punishment, which Locke supposed was intended against the false teacher, ver. 23. Lastly, to comfort the sincere part of the church, he gave them in particular his apostolical benediction, together with his own love, that they might be the more confirmed in their attachment to him, ver. 28, 29.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XVI.—Now, concerning the collection which is for the poor of the brethren who are in Judea, as I ordered the churches of Galatia to do in that matter, so also do ye.

2 On the first day of every week, let each of you lay somewhat by itself; according as he may have prospered, putting into it the treasury, that when I come there may be then no collections.

And, when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by letters, them I will send to carry your (παρασκευής) grace gift to Jerusalem.

4 (Acts 10, 8.) Or, if it be proper that even I should go, they shall go with me.

5 (Acts 10, 3.) Now I will come to you, when I have passed through Macedonia: (For I do pass through Macedonia.)

And perhaps I shall abide, and even winter with you, that ye may send me forward, whithersoever I may go.

7 For I will not now see you in passing, but I hope to remain with you some time, if the Lord permit.

8 However, I shall remain (w. 173.) at Ephesus until Pentecost.

9 For a great and effectual door is opened to me; (Acts 9, 11.) yet there are many opponents.

Ver. 1. As I ordered the churches of Galatia. The apostle, I suppose, approving of them, he exhorted them to minister liberally to the poor of the saints throughout Asia Minor, and the region of Galatia, establishing the churches, as mentioned Acts xvi. 5. And the collections made by them, he says, if he may have received, when he was at Ephesus, where he now was, he went through all the churches of Galatia, and brought them the fruits of their charity.

Ver. 2.—1. On the first day of every week. Στὴν πρότερον την Κυριακήν. The Hebrews used the numeral for the ordinal numbers, Gen. 1. 5. 'The firstborn among the number of nations,' as that is the first day of the week. Also they used the word σάββατον to denote the week, Luke xvii. 23. 'That I may spend this week.' Wherefore τῇ πρώτῃ της Κυριακῆς is the first day of the week. See Mark xvi, 2. And as αὐτῶν ἐνησίσας signifies every city; and εν οἷς ἐνησίσας, every month; and Acts xiv. 20. οὕτως τῇ πρώτῃ τῆς Κυριακῆς is the first day of every week.

2 Let each of you lay somewhat by itself. (Acts 4, 32.) Thus they distributed the alms collected at Jerusalem among the poor and destitute of that city. In this passage, I mistake not, it is not the neuter of the indefinite pronoun τίς, as some suppose, but two words, which must be thus construed and supplied: τίς... διὰ τούτου. A similar inverted order of the pronoun we have Rom. 12. 7. 1 Cor. xv. 30. The apostle's meaning is, that every first day of the week each of the Corinthians was to separate, from the gains of the preceding week, such a sum as he could spare, and put it into the treasury; that the bishop or the deacon should make collections when he came. By this method the Corinthians, without inconvenience, might bestow a greater gift, than if they had given it all at once. The common translation of τίς... διὰ τούτου is translated 'Whomever ye shall authorize by letters.' In the genuine text, τίς... διὰ τούτου is translated 'If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-tha.' See Col. iv. 4. Or, it be proper that even I should go, they. (Acts 10, 3.) Here the apostle intimated his inclination to have the collections committed to his care. However, not the churches, and even the saints in Judea, might be certain that no part of the money which he received was withheld, but that the whole was delivered with the utmost fidelity; whereas the apostle's instructions should be obeyed by them to attend them, that they might witness the delivery of their collections in Jerusalem. Some of these messenger were mentioned 2 Cor. xiii. 14. 12.

Ver. 7. If the Lord permit. This manner of speaking concerning the future, the apostles often used, when speaking to each other, and the first Christians practised, because it expressed how deeply they were affected with a sense that all events are directed by God.

Ver. 8. For a great and effectual door is opened to me. The door of a house being the passage into it, the opening of a door, in the eastern phrase, signified the affording a person an opportunity of doing a thing. This phrase is used in other passages of scripture. See Col. iv. 3. note; Hosea ii. 15. The apostle's long sojourn at Ephesus was owing to his great success of the gospel, such an arrangement had occasion to resort to that metropolis. But about the time this letter was written, his success was greater than
I. CORINTHIANS.

10 Now, if Timothy be come, take care that he be among you without fear; for he worketh, even as I do, the work of the Lord. 11 Wherefore, let no one despise him; but send him forward in peace, that he may come to me: for I expect him with the brethren. 12 And with relation to our brother Apollo, I entreated him earnestly to visit you with the brethren: (as) but his inclination was not at all to go now; but he will go, when he shall find a convenient season. 13 Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit yourselves like men: be strong.

14 Let all your matters be done with love. 15 Ye know the family of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruit of Achaia, and that they have devoted themselves to the ministry to the saints. I entreat you, (v. 10.) therefore, brethren, 16 That ye submit yourselves to such, and to every joint worker and labourer. 17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achalucus: for they have supplied your deficiency. 18 (v. 9.) And have refreshed my spirit and your's: wherefore, acknowledge ye such persons. 19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church which is in their house. (See Rom. xvi. 5. note 1.)

20 All the brethren salute you. Salute one another with an holy kiss. (See Rom. xvi. 16. note 1.)

common. For many who used curious arts, the arts of magic and divination, were converted, and burned their books containing the secrets of these arts, Acta xii. 17—20. This so enraged the idola- ters, that they went to the synagogues, that they might burn the great nummiu described Acta xiii. 23—41.

Ver. 12. (that be among you without fear.)—At this time, Timothy being young, and not yet attached to the apostle, there was some reason to fear that the faction would treat him ill; more especially if he reproved them for their disorderly practices. The apostle therefore recommended it to the sincere part of the church, to defend him from any injury which the faction might attempt to do him, either in his character or his person.

Ver. 11. Expect him with the brethren;—namely, Eratus, who was sent with Timothy to Corinith, Acta xii. 22 and Titus, who carried this letter, and another on whose name is not mentioned, (see 2 Cor. xii. 17, 18;) perhaps also, some of the Corinthian brethren, whom the apostle had desired Titus to bring him to Ephesus, having need of their assistance there.

Ver. 12—14. His inclination was not at all to go now.—The Latin commissionaries were of opinion, that he was disappointed with the behaviour of the faction, had left them as incorrigible, and had returned to Ephesus, from whence he had been recommended to the brethren of Achaia, Acta xviii. 22. xix. 1. But the messengers from Corinth arriving with a letter to the apostle full of respect, he answered it by Titus, and requested Apollus to accompany him, in the hope that he might be useful in assisting Titus to settle the disturbances in that church. But Apollus refused to go, knowing the condition of the church.

2. But he will go when he shall find a convenient season.—Jerome makes Apollus actually go to Corinth, after the disturbances had ceased. But whether in this Jerome followed his own opinion, or some ancient tradition, is uncertain.

Ver. 22. He shall be the herald of the everlasting Gospel;—In the Greek it is, Let him be. But the imperative is here put for the future. See Jas. iv. 1. Anathema, Maran-aeth, were the words with which the apostle began their greatest communications, whereas they not only excluded sinners from their society; but delivered them to the di- vine Cheren or Anathema; that is, to eternal damnation. This form they used, because Enoch's prophecy concerning the coming of God to judge and punish the wicked began with these words, as we learn from Jude, who quotes the first sentence of that prophecy, ver. 14.
The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

24 My love be with you all who love Christ Jesus. And in testimony of my sincerity in this, and in all the things I have written, I lay my hand on you. Amen.

Wherefore, since the apostle denounced this curse against the man, who, while he professed subjection to Christ, was secretly alienated from him in his heart, it is as if he had said, 'I wish such a person's wickedness cannot be discovered and punished by the church, yet the Lord at his coming will find it out, and punish him with eternal perdition. This terrible curse the apostle wrote in his epistle to the Corinthians, because many of the faction, but especially their leader, had shown great alienation of mind from Christ. And he wrote it with his own hand, to show how serious he was in the denunciation. Maturus says, from this example, and from the Anathemas pronounced Gal. i. 6. 9. across the practice of the ancient general councils, of adding to their decisions, or definitions of doctrines, Anathemas against them who denied these doctrines. See Buxtorf's L Kiq, vol. ii. p. 257. 1802.

Var. 24. My love be with you all.] — Le Clerc suspects that MOY is a mistake of the transcriber for G0Y, the abbreviation of GOD.

And B. Pearce supposes he is right in that conjecture, because in the conclusion of the second epistle it is, § IV. @EY, that the love of God's church, without the authority of ancient M1, is never to be admitted. Besides, there is a great propriety and beauty in this manner of ending an epistle, in God's church, and it is the usual way in the writings of the apostles. By assuring them of his love, he convinced them that all the severe things he had written proceeded from his anxiety for their eternal welfare, and thereby removed the prejudices which his reproofs might otherwise have raised in their minds.—Le Clerc's conjecture, mentioned above, that the transcribers of the New Testament have in this passage, by mistake, written MOY for G0Y, is one of the many instances which might be produced, of suspicious emendations of the sacred text, proposed by bold critics, which, instead of improving, really mar the sense and beauty of the passages into which they would have them introduced.

II. CORINTHIANS.

PREFACE.

Sect. I. — Of St. Paul's Design in writing his Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

Waxw: the apostle sent his first letter to the church at Corinth, he resolved to remain in Ephesus till the following Pentecost, (1 Cor. xvi. 8, 9,) that Titus, who carried his letter, might have time to return, and bring him an account of the manner in which it was received by the Corinthians. But the riot of Demetrius happening soon after it was sent away, the apostle found it necessary to avoid the fury of the rioters and of the idolatrous rabble, who were all greatly enraged against him, for having turned so many of the inhabitants of Asia from the established idolatry. Wherefore, leaving Ephesus, he went to Troas, a noted seaport town to the north of Ephesus, where travellers, coming from Europe into Asia, commonly landed. Here he proposed to employ himself in preaching the gospel of Christ, (2 Cor. ii. 12,) till Titus should arrive from Corinth. But Titus not coming at the time appointed, St. Paul began to fear that the Corinthians had used him ill, and had disregarded the letter which he delivered to them. These fears so distressed the apostle, that notwithstanding his preaching at Troas was attended with uncommon success, he left that city and went forward to Macedonia, expecting to find Titus. But in this expectation he was disappointed. Titus was not in Macedonia when the apostle arrived. He therefore resolved to wait in that country, till Titus should come and inform him how the Corinthians stood affected towards their spiritual father. It seems he judged it prudent to visit them till he knew their state.—In Macedonia St. Paul had many conflicts with the idolaters, (2 Cor. x. 13; 1 Cor. x. 33,) who were greatly enraged against him, as all the other idolaters were, for opposing both the objects and the rites of their worship. These fightings, joined with his fears for Titus, and his uncertainty concerning the disposition of the Corinthians, exceedingly distressed the apostle at this time. But his uneasiness was at length happily removed by the arrival of Titus, and by the agreeable account which he gave him of the obedience of the greatest part of the Corinthians, in communicating the incessant person; at which solemn action Titus may have been present. Much encouraged therefore by the good news, the apostle wrote to the Corinthian church this second letter, to confirm the sincere part in their attachment to him, and to separate the rest from the false teacher who had led them so far astray.

To understand this epistle rightly, the reader must recollect, that as Titus spent some time in Corinth after delivering the apostle's first letter, he had an opportunity to make himself acquainted, not only with the state of the sincere part of the church, but with the temper and behaviour of the faction. Wherefore, when he gave the apostle an account of the good disposition of the church, he no doubt at the same time informed him concerning the faction, that some of them still continued in their opposition to him, and in their attachment to the false teacher; and that that impostor was going on in his evil practices. Further, Titus, by communicating the fact, having learned the arguments and objections by which their leaders endeavoured to lessen the apostle's authority, together with the scoffing speeches which they used to bring him into contempt, we may believe that he rehearsed all these matters to him. Being thus made acquainted with the state of the Corinthian church, St. Paul judged it fit to write to them this second letter. And that it might have the greater weight, he sent it to them by Titus, the bearer of his former epistle, 2 Cor. vii. 17, 18. — In this second letter, the apostle artfully introduced the arguments, objections, and scoffing speeches, by which the faction were endeavouring to bring him into contempt; and not only confuted them by the most solid reasoning, but even turned them against the false teacher himself, and against the faction, in such a manner as to render them ridiculous. In short, by the many delicate and pointed ironies with which this epistle abounds, the apostle covered his adversaries with shame, and shewed the Corinthians that he excelled in a talent which the Greeks greatly admired. — But while St. Paul thus pointedly derided the faction, he shewed them with the most just commendations on the sincere part of the church, for their persevering in the doctrine he had taught them, and for their ready obedience to his orders concerning the incestuous person. And, to encourage them, he told them, that having boasted of them to Titus, he was glad to find his boasting well founded in every particular, that the Corinthians church being composed of persons on such opposite characters, the apostle, in writing to them, was under the necessity of suitting his discourse to them, according to their different characters. And therefore, if we apply to the whole church of Corinth, the things in the two epistles which apparently were directed to the whole church, but which were intended only for a part of it, we shall think these epistles full of inconsistency, if not of contradiction. But if we understand these things according as the apostle really meant them, every appearance of contradiction will be removed.

For he himself had directed us to distinguish the sincere part of the Corinthians from the faction, 2 Cor. i. 14. 'Ye have acknowledged us in part,' that is, a part of you have acknowledged 'that we are your boasting.'—Chap. ii. 5. 'Now if a certain person hath grieved me, he hath not grieved me except by a part of you, that I may not lay the blame all on you all.' It is therefore evident that the epistles in the two epistles of the Corinthians which appear inconsistent, are not really so; they belong to different persons. For example, the many commendations bestowed on the Corinthians in these epistles, belong only to the sincere part of them. Whereas, the sharp reproofs, the pointed ironies, and the severe threatenings of punishment found in the same epistles, are to be understood as addressed to the faction, and more especially to the teacher who headed the faction. And thus by discriminating the members of the Corinthian church according to their true characters, and by applying to each the passages which belonged to them, every appearance of contradiction vanishes.

Sect. II.—Of the Matters contained in the Epistles to the Corinthians; and of their Usefulness to the Church in every Age.

St. Paul's intention, in his Epistles to the Corinthians, being to break the faction which the false teacher had formed in their church in opposition to him, and to confute the calumnies which that teacher and his adherents were industriously propagating for discrediting him as an apostle, many of the things contained in these epistles were necessarily personal to him and to the faction. Nevertheless, we are not on that account to think lightly of these writings, as fancying them of little use now to the church of Christ. The things in them which are most personal and particular, occasioned the apostle to write instructions and precepts, which are of the greatest use to the church in every age. For example, in answering the calumnies by which the faction endeavoured to discredit him as an apostle, he was led to mention facts which demonstrate the fact that if he had been homosexual, he might have been smitten by Christ to direct the faith and practice of all the members of the church;—Such as his having wrought miracles for converting the Corinthians, and his having imparted to them spiritual gifts after they believed; his having preached the gospel to them without receiving any reward from them—not even the small reward of maintenance while he preached to them; his having endured immeasurable hardships in the long journeys which he undertook for the sake of spreading the gospel, and heavy persecutions in every country from enemies and opposers; 1 Cor. iv. 11, 12; 2 Cor. iv. 8, 9; 23, his rapture into the third heaven; with a variety of other facts and circumstances respecting himself, which we should not have known, had it not been for the calumnies of the Corinthian faction, and of the Judaizing teachers, who infested the church at Corinth, and other churches, (see Pref. to Galat. Sect. 3.), but which, now that they are known, give us the fullest assurance of his apostleship, and add the greatest weight to his writings. Next, in reproving the faction for their motives, the apostle with explained the general principles of religion and morality, in such a manner, that they may be applied for regulating our conduct in cases of the greatest importance; and hath delivered rules and advice which, if followed, will have the happiest influence on our temper. For instance, when he rebuked the faction for joining the heathens in their idolatrous feasts in the temples of their gods, he hath shewed us the obligation Christians are under, in all their actions, not to regard their own interest and pleasure only, but to consult the good of their brethren also; and that they are at no time by their example, even in things indifferent, to lead their weak and scrupulous brethren into sin.—In like manner, when he reproved the Corinthians for eating the Lord's supper in an improper manner, he gave such an account of that holy institution, as shows, not only its true nature and design, but the views also, and the dispositions, with which it ought to be performed.—Finally, in the appendix by which he sought to excite the Corinthians to make the collection for the saints in Judea, who, at the time these epistles were written, were in great distress, and the rules by which he wished them to direct themselves in making these collections, are of great and perpetual use for animating the disciples of Christ to perform works of charity with liberality and cheerfulness.

To the things above mentioned we may add, that the epistles to the Corinthians, though suited to their peculiar circumstances, may be read by the disciples of Christ in every age with the greatest profit, because they contain matters of importance not to be found anywhere else in scripture. Such as the long account given in the first epistle of the apostle, of men, and of the nature, operations, and uses of their gifts, and of the way in which they exercised their gifts for the confirmation of the gospel, and the building of the church; whereby the rapid progress of the gospel in the first and following ages, and the growth of the Christian church to its present greatness, is shown to be, not the effect of natural causes, but the work of the Spirit of God.—The proof of the resurrection of Christ from the dead, the great foundation of the faith and hope of Christians, is nowhere formally set forth in scripture, but in the xivth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, where many of the witnesses who saw Christ after his resurrection are appealed to by name, and the times and places of his appearing to them are particularly mentioned; and their veracity is established by the grievous sufferings, sometimes ending in death, which they sustained for witnessing the resurrection of Christ.—In the same chapter, by the most logical reasoning, the resurrection of all the dead at the last day, is shown to be necessarily connected with Christ's resurrection; so that the former will be the basis of the latter.

There likewise the apostle hath given a circumstantial account of the resurrection of the righteous, and hath described the nature and properties of the body with which they are to rise; from which it appears, that by the reunion of their spirits with their glorious bodies, their happiness will be rendered complete and everlasting. These great discoveries made in the first epistle to the Corinthians, impressed the minds of the disciples of Christ so strongly in the early ages, that they resolutely suffered the bitterest deaths with a rapturous joy, rather than renounce their Master, and their hope of a glorious immortality.—And, to name no more instances, by the comparison which the apostle hath instituted, in the iiith chapter of the second epistle to the Corinthians, between the inspiration of the apostles the ministers of the gospel, and the inspiration of Moses the minister of the law, he hath shewn, that the inspiration of the apostles was far more perfect than the inspiration of Moses; so that, by this discovery, the apostle hath admirably displayed the excellence of the gospel revelation, and raised its authority to the highest pitch.

Before this section is concluded, it may be proper to observe, that from the epistles to the Corinthians, and from Paul's other epistles, we learn that he was the great object of the hatred of all the false teachers in the first age, but especially of the Judaizers. Nor is it any woe-
II. CORINTHIANS.

CHAP. I.

dow that they were enraged against him; and persecuted him with the bitterest calumnies: For it was this apostle chiefly who opposed them, in their unrighteous attempt of wresting the yokes of the law of Moses about the neck of the Gentiles. He it was likewise who resisted the instruction of the dogmas of the heathen philosophy into the church, by teachers who, having nothing in view but worldly considerations, endeavoured to convert the Greeks at the expense of corrupting the religion of Christ. In fine, he it was, who openly and severely rebuked the false teachers and their disciples for the licentiousness of their manners.—Yet he was not the only object of these men’s malice. Barnabas also had a share of their hatred, (1 Cor. ix. 4,) probably because he had been active in procuring and publishing the decrees of the council of Jerusalem, whereby the Gentile converts were freed from obeying the institutions of Moses.

Sect. III.—Of the Place and Time of Writing the Second Epistle to the Corinthians; and of the Person by whom it was sent.

Or the place where the apostle wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians, there is little doubt. In the epistle itself, ii. 12, he tells us, that from Ephesus, where he was when he wrote his first epistle, he went to Troas, and then into Macedonia, to meet Titus, whose return he expected about that time; that while he abode in Macedonia, Titus arrived and brought him the good news of the submission of the Corinthians; and that, on hearing these tidings, he wrote his second letter to them, to encourage them to go on with the collection for the saints in Judea, that the whole might be finished before he came to Corinth, 2 Cor. xi. 3, 4, 5. The apostle therefore was in Macedonia in his way to Corinth to receive their collections when he wrote his second epistle to the church in that city.

The facts just now mentioned, which show that the apostle’s second epistle to the Corinthians was written in Macedonia, in his way from Ephesus to Corinth, after the riot of Demetrius, show likewise that it was written but a few months after the first epistle. For, whether the first was written immediately before or immediately after the riot, there could be but a short interval between the two epistles; namely, the time of the apostle’s abode in Ephesus after writing the first letter, and at Troas after leaving Ephesus, and the weeks which he spent in Macedonia before the arrival of Titus; all which, when joined, could not make those a space of a year at most. Since therefore the second epistle to the Corinthians was written so soon after the first, its date may be fixed to the summer of the year 57. For, as we have shown in the preface, Sect. 5, the first epistle was written in the end of the year 56, or in the beginning of the year 57.

It was observed in Sect. 1. of this Preface, that St. Paul’s second epistle to the Corinthians was sent by Titus, who carried his former letter. This excellent person is often mentioned by the apostle, and was in such esteem with him, that he left him in Crete to regulate the affairs of the churches there. He seems to have been originally an idolatrous Gentile, whom Paul converted in his first apostolical journey, and brought with him to Antioch when he returned from that journey. For he took him up to Jerusalem when he went thither from Antioch to consult the apostles and elders and brethren there, concerning the circumcision of the converted Gentiles. Not long after this Paul undertook his second apostolical journey, for the purpose of confirming the churches he had formerly planted. On that occasion, Titus accompanied him in his progress till they came to Corinth; for he assisted him in preaching the gospel to the Corinthians. So the apostle himself informed St. Paul, 2 Cor. viii. 22. If any inquiry concerning Titus, he is my partner and fellow-labourer in the gospel toward you. Wheresore, when the apostle wrote this, having been in Corinth only once, if Titus was his partner and fellow-labourer in the gospel toward the Corinthians, it must have been at Paul’s first coming to Corinth when he converted the Corinthians. These particulars shall be more fully explained in the Preface to Titus. But it was necessary to mention them here, because they show the propriety of the apostle’s sending Titus, rather than any of his other assistants, with his first letter to the Corinthians, some of whom had forsaken the apostle, and had attached themselves to a false teacher. Titus being a person in whom Paul had some influence with the Corinthians to persuade them to return to their duty. Besides, a number of them having been either converted or confirmed by him, he had an interest in the welfare and reputation of their church. Wheresore, when he joined the apostle in Macedonia, although he had but just come from Corinth, he not only accepted of Paul’s invitation to return with him to that city, but being desirous that the Corinthians should finish their collection for the saints, he, of his own accord, offered to go back immediately, to persuade them to do so without delay, that their collection might be ready when the apostle came. By Titus, therefore, St. Paul sent his second epistle to the Corinthians, who, we may believe, on receiving it, set about the collection in earnest, and finished it by the time the apostle arrived.

CHAPTER I.

After giving the Corinthians his apostolical benediction, St. Paul began this chapter with returning thanks to God, who had comforted him in every affliction, that he might be able to comfort others with the consolation wherewith he himself had been comforted, ver. 3—7. By this thanksgiving the apostle insinuated, that one of the purposes of his writing the present letter, was to comfort the members of the Corinthian church, and to remove them from the sorrow occasioned to them by the rebukes in his former letter.—Next, to shew the care which God took of him as a faithful apostle of his Son, he gave the Corinthians an account of a great affliction which had befallen him in Asia, that is, in Ephesus and its neighbourhood, and of a great deliverance from an imminent danger of death, which he had at that time; namely, when he fought with wild beasts in Ephesus, as mentioned in his former epistle, chap. xv. 22, and had the sentence of death in himself, to teach him that he should not trust in himself, but in God, ver. 8, 9.

When the apostle sent Timothy and Erastus from Ephesus into Macedonia, as mentioned Acts xix. 22, it is probable that he ordered them to go forward to Corinth, 1 Cor. xvi. 10, provided the accounts which they received in Macedonia gave them reason to think their presence in Corinth would be acceptable, and so ordered them likewise to inform the Corinthians, that he was coming straightway from Ephesus to Corinth, to remedy the disorders which some of the family of Chloe told him had taken place among them. But after Timothy and Erastus departed, having more than ordinary success in converting the idolatrous Gentiles in the province of Asia, he put off for him; namely, when therefore the apostle determined to remain in Ephesus and its neighbourhood till the following Pentecost; after which he purposed to go through Macedonia, in his way to Corinth. This alteration of his intention the apostle notified to the Corinthians in his first epistle, chap. xvi. 5-8. But the faction having taken occasion therefrom to speak of him as a false, fickle, worldly-minded man, who in all his actions was guided by interested views, he judged it necessary, in this second letter, to vindicate himself from that censure, by assuring the Corinthians that he always behaved with the greatest simplicity and sincerity, ver. 12. — And by declaring that what he was about to write on that subject was true; namely, that when he sent them word by Timothy and Erastus of his intention to set out for Corinth immediately by sea, he really meant to do so, ver. 16. But hitherto he had delayed his journey to Corinth, expressly for the purpose of giving the faulty among them time to repent, ver. 23. — And that in so doing he had acted suitably to his character; because miraculous powers were bestowed on the apostles, not to enable them to lord it over the persons and goods of the disciples by means of such arts as were peculiar to their faith, but to be the helpers of their joy, persuading them, both by arguments and chastisements, to live agreeably to their Christian profession, ver. 24.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I. — 1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy? my brother, to the church of God which is in Corinth, together with all the saints who are in all Achaia; 2 Grace be to you, and peace (see Rom. i. 7. note 4.) from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. 3 (Eσωγονια, 1 Cor. xvi. note 1.) Praised be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of tender mercies, and the God of all consolation. 4 Who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them who are in any affliction, by the consolation wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

5 For as the sufferings for Christ abound in us, so also our consolation shall abound through Christ. 6 (Est 4, 106.) Whether, therefore, we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is wrought in you by enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer; or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation. 7 And our hope (1 Pet. 307.) concerning you is firm, knowing that ye are partakers of the sufferings, so also shall ye be of the consolation.

8 (Tag.) Wherefore, we would not have ye ignorant, brethren, concerning our affliction which happened to us in Asia, that we were exceedingly pressed above our strength, in so much that we despaired even of life.

Commentary.

CHAP. I. — 1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, agreeably to the will of God, and Timothy, (see 1 Thess. i. 1. note 1.) my fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ, to the church of God which is in Corinth, and to all who profess to believe in Christ, who are in all the province of Achaia; 2 Grace be to you, with peace temporal and eternal, from God our common Father, the Author of every blessing, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the Father dispenseth his favours. 3 Praised be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, (Eph. l. 3.; 1 Pet. l. 3.) the Author of tender mercies to sinners, and the God who bestoweth all consolation on the faithful disciples of his Son; 4 Who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them who are in any affliction, by the consolation wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. What that consolation was, see in the note on ver. 5. 5 For as the sufferings for Christ and his gospel abound in us, so also our consolation under them aboundeth through the promises of Christ performed to us. 6 Whether, therefore, we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is accomplished by the influence of our example, animating you patiently to endure the same sufferings which we also patiently suffer; or whether we be comforted by God’s delivering us from sufferings, or by his supporting us under them, it is designed for our consolation and salvation, in encouraging you to hope for the like support and deliverance. 7 And our hope concerning your consolation and salvation is firm, knowing that ye are partakers of our sufferings, so also shall ye be of the consolation which we derive from the discoveries and promises of the gospel, and from the assistance of Christ.

8 Wherefore, I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning the great affliction which befell me in Asia, namely, when I was constrained to fight with wild beasts at Ephesus, that I was exceedingly pressed down; that affliction being greater than I thought myself able to bear, in so much that I despaired even of life on that occasion.

Ver. 1. — 1 And Timothy, 1 — From this it is evident, that Timothy was with the apostle when the 8-cond to the Corinthians was written. — Timothy was a zealous preacher of the gospel, the apostle’s constant companion (see 1 Thess. iv. sect. 1.), and one of the most able and integrity the Corinthians had received recent proofs during his late visit to them, 1 Cor. xvi. 10. His testimony, for instance, to the things written in this epistle, might have had weight, even with the faction, to convince them, that when the apostle sent them word by him and Erastus, that he intended to go directly from Ephesus to Corinth, (see illustration,) he was perfectly sincere, as he declares, ver. 13— 16.; and that when he altered his resolution, and delayed his embarkation, it was on motives of prudence. By allowing Timothy to join in his letter, the apostle did him the greatest honour, and highly advanced his credit with all the churches of Achaia. See 1 Thess. Pref. sect. 3.

2 Who are in all Achaia Corinth being the metropolis of the province, in which Corinth, the capital of Achaea, is no doubt, had frequent intercourse with those in Corinth, and by that means had an opportunity of hearing this letter read in the churches of Achaea. In this letter, there is nothing to be objected to, for it was written to them likewise, that they might be enabled to take copies of it, in order to read it in their public meetings for their own edification. See Essay ii. page 22.

Ver. 4. — 4 To comfort them who are in any affliction. — According to the nature of the apostle, the apostle is the same for which he has afflictions he was qualified to comfort the Corinthians, under the distress of mind which they felt from a just sense of their errors and miscarriages. But the afflictions of which the apostle speaks, were chiefly outward afflictions; being of the same with those by which both by himself he was himself afflicted, as is plain from ver. 5. 7.

Ver. 5. — 5 Our consolation aboundeth through Christ. — The consolation of which the apostle speaks, was derived from the presence of Christ with him; from a sense of the love of Christ shed abroad in his heart; from the joy which the success of the gospel gave him; from the assured hope of the reward which he was prepared for him; from the knowledge of the influence of his sufferings to encourage others; and from the enlarged views which he had of the government of God, in all things that are made to work for good to them who love God; so that he was entirely reconciled to his sufferings.
II. CORINTHIANS.

9 However, I was suff ered to pass sentence of death on myself, to teach me that in dangers I should not trust in myself, but in God, who preserveth the living from death, and even raiseth the dead to life;

10 Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will also continue with us unto the end of our course.

11 Ye also working together secretly for us by prayer, so as the gift which cometh to us through many persons, may by many persons be thankfully acknowledged for us.

12 For our boasting is this, the testimony of our conscience, that with the greatest simplicity and sincerity, not with carnal wisdom, but with the grace of God, we have behaved in the world, and more especially among you.

13 For we write no other things to you than what ye read, (I sau, 186,) and also acknowledge this, so that even to the end ye will acknowledge;

14 (KoSt nuc, 308. 518.) Seeing, indeed, ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your boasting, even as ye also will be ours, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

15 And in this persuasion I purpose to come to you first, that ye might have a second gift;

16 And (I sau, 121.) from you to pass through into Macedonia, and from Macedonia to come again to you, and (go) by you to be sent forward into Judaea.

17 Wherefore, having purposed this, did I, foresight, use levisy so when I altered my resolution? Or the resolutions which I form, do I form them from carnal motives, so as with me what I say I am to do, should be done, and what I say I am not to do, should not be done, according as it suits some worldly view, without any regard to my own declarations?

3. Not with carnal wisdom. —What that was, the apostle tells us afterwards. Yet it is a thing necessary, if he contrasts his own behaviour with that of the false teacher. 4. But with the grace of God. —His behaviour was suitable to the glorious dispensation of the grace of God. It is suitable to the conditions of those who receive the grace of God. It is suitable to the persons to whom he preaches. It is suitable to the persons to whom he writes. It is suitable in every respect to the conditions of the persons to whom he hath been sent. 5. The apostle is purged from his former errors. He had no such respect of his own life as to endanger his own salvation. He had no such regard for his own life as to endanger the salvation of others. He had no such regard for his own life as to endanger the salvation of God. He had no such regard for his own life as to endanger the salvation of the church. He had no such regard for his own life as to endanger the salvation of the world. He had no such regard for his own life as to endanger the salvation of the universe.
II. CORINTHIANS. 215

II. CORINTHIANS.

18 But as certainly as God is faithful, our promise which was sent to you by Timothy and Erastus was not yea and nay, but (x) through him was yea.

19 For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached (w) to you by us, x, you by me, and Silvanus, and Timothy, was not yea and nay, but (x) through him was yea.

20 (Oxios, 97.) And whatever promises of God were preached (from ver. 19.) by us, (w, 187.) through him yea, and through him amen, to the glory of God.

21 Now he who establishes us with you in Christ, and who hath anointed us, is God;

22 Who hath also sealed us, and given us the earnest (y) of the Spirit in our hearts.

23 Now, I call on God as a witness (z) against my soul; That, sparing you, I have not yet as yet come to Corinth.

24 Not (gtt, 254.) because we laid it over you through the faith, but we are joint workers of your joy; for by the faith ye stand.

1. And given us the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts;—Servants being hired by giving them earnest-money, the apostle, in allusion to that custom, says, 'God hath given us the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts;' he hath hired us to work for the apostles of his Son, by giving us the Spirit, or spiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xiv. 32. These gifts are called in the Spirit, because with which the apostles were hired, because they were to them a sure proof of their great dispensations which God will bestow on them in the life to come, as the wages of their faithful service.

2. For the same reason, all believers are represented as having the earnest of the Spirit given them, 2 Cor. v. 5. Eph. i. 14. note 1.

3. I call on God as a witness against my soul;—This is a solemn imprecation of the vengeance of God upon himself, if he departed from the truth in what he was about to write. With this in view the apostle begins his apology for altering his resolution respecting his journey to Corinth. And as he continues it in the next chapter, to ver. 6, either that chapter ought to have begun here, or this chapter should have ended there.

Ver. 21. Who hath anointed us,—Priests and prophets, as well as kings, were consecrated to their several offices by the ceremony of anointing, which was celebrated with much solemnity in ancient times, and attended with many ceremonies.

The gifts of the Spirit are called an unction, 1 John ii. 27.

Ver. 22.—Anciently seals were used for marking goods, as the property of the person who had put his seal on them, that they might be distinguished from the goods of others. Thus, all believers are said to be sealed with the Spirit which was promised, Eph. i. 13, 13. 30, because they were thereby marked as Christ's property. Thus, likewise, the servants of God are said to be sealed in their faithfulness, for the same purpose, Rev. vii. 3. ix. 4. The apostles, therefore, being sealed of God, they were thereby declared to be his servants, and the apostles of his Son, and consequently, he is said to have either of fraud or falsehood. See another use of seals, Rom. iv. 11. note 1.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Subjects in this Chapter.

The apostle's apology for delaying his visit to the Corinthians, which was begun in the preceding chapters, is continued in this. Earnestly desirous of their repentance, he delayed to come, having determined with himself not to come among them with sorrow, by punishing the guilty, if he could by any means avoid it, ver. 1, 2. And therefore, instead of coming to punish them, he had written to them, that he might have joy from their repentance, ver. 3. And, in excuse for the severity of his first letter, he told them that he wrote it in the deepest affliction; not to make them sorry, but to shew the greatness of his love to them, ver. 4.

On receiving the apostle's letter, the sincere part of the Corinthian church, which was much more numerous than the faction, immediately excommunicated the incestuous person, in the manner they had been directed. And he appears to have been so affected by his punishment, that in a little time he dismissed his father's wife, and became a sincere penitent. Of these things the apostle had been informed by Titus, who I suppose was present at his excommunication. The apostle therefore, in this letter, told the Corinthians, that the punishment they had inflicted on their faulty brother having induced him to repent of his crime, they were now to forgive him, by taking him again into the church; and even to confirm their love to him, by behaving towards him in a kind and friendly manner, lest Satan should drive him to despair, ver. 5-15. Further, to make the Corinthians sensible how much he loved them, the apostle described the distress he was in at Troas, when he did not find Titus there, from whom he expected an account of their affairs. (See Preface, sect. 1, page 210.) For although he had the prospect of much success at Troas, he was so uneasy in his mind that he could not remain there, but went forward to Macedonia, in expectation of meeting Titus. In Macedonia his distress was somewhat alleviated, by the success with which his preaching he was attended. For in Macedonia God caused him to ride in triumph with Christ, having enabled him to overcome all opposition, ver. 3, 14.—The idea of riding in triumph with Christ, naturally led the apostle to describe the effects of his preaching, both upon believers and unbelievers, by images taken from the triumphal processions of the Greeks and Romans, ver. 15, 16.—This beautiful passage he concluded with a solemn affirmation, that he did not, like some others, corrupt the word of God with foreign mixtures; but always preached it sincerely and disinterestedly, as in the sight of God, ver. 17.—By thus speaking, he plainly enough intimated, first, that the false teacher, on whom the Corinthians desired, had corrupted the word of God from worldly motives; and, secondly, that his own success was owing, in a great measure, to the faithfulness with which he preached the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, however contrary they might be to the prejudices and passions of mankind; owning it to be impossible to prevail with his adversaries, which being evident to all with whom he conversed, no one could suspect, that in preaching the gospel he proposed to acquire either riches, or fame, or worldly power, among his disciples.

New Translation.

CHAP. II.—1 (Acts 104.) Besides, I determined当我自己, not to come again1 to you to sorrow. 2 For if I should make you sorry, (Acts 218.) verily who is it that could make me glad, unless the same who is made sorry by me? 3 (Acts) Wherefore I wrote to you this very thing, that coming, I might not have sorrow from them by whom I ought to rejoice, being firmly persuaded concerning you all, that my joy is the joy of you all. 4 For to you of much affliction and distress of heart, I wrote to you (Acts, 118) with many tears; not that ye might be made sorry, but that ye might know the love which I have most abundantly (29.) towards you. 5 Now, if a certain person1 hath grieved me, he hath not grieved me, except by a part of you,2 that I may not lay a load upon you all. 6 Sufficient for such an one as this punishment, which was inflicted by the greater number. 7 (Acts) So that, on the other hand, ye count more willingly to forgive and comfort this penitent sinner, lest such a one be swallowed up by excessive grief. 8 (Acts) Wherefore, I beseech you publicly to confirm to him your love. 9 Ver. 4. And distress of heart, 2 The word σφοδρός, distress, denotes the pain which a person feels who is pressed on every side, without any possibility of disengaging himself. Luke xxvii. 25. 2 Ver. 5. If a certain person, etc. The apostle with great delicacy avoided mentioning the name of the inconstant person, and even his crime, lest it might have afflicated him too much. 2 He hath not grieved me, except by a part of you. In this and the following verses, the apostle gave a remarkable proof of that love which in ver. 4, he had expressed towards the Corinthians. For, first, he made a distinction between the guilty and the innocent; next, he bore up the inconstant person, who it appears had repented of his crimes, ver. 6. In the third place, he ordered the church likewise to forgive him, and confirm their love to him, that he might not be again a hinderer. 2 Ver. 7. You ought more willingly to forgive, that is, you ought to forgive more willingly than you do. 2 Ver. 8. Let such a one. The apostle's delicacy, in not mentioning the name of the inconstant person, was remarked in the note on ver. 2.
II. CORINTHIANS.

9 Besides, I wrote to excommunicate that person for this end also, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye would be obedient in all things.

10 (w) Now, to whom ye forgive any thing, I also forgive it; and even I, if I have now forgiven any thing, to whom I forgive it, for your sakes I FORGAVE IT, in the person of Christ:

11 That we may not be overreached by Satan; for we are not ignorant of his (wveyne) devices.

12 Moreover, when I came to Troas (wve) in order to preach the gospel of Christ, and a door was opened to me by the Lord, 13 I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: (wvela, 29.) therefore, bidding them farewell, I went away into Macedonia.

14 And thanks be to God, who at all times causeth us to triumph with Christ, and who, by us, diffuseth the smell of the knowledge of him in every place.

15 For we are through God a fragrant smell of Christ, among the saved, and among the destroyed.

16 To these indeed we are the smell of death, ENDING IN death; but to the others, the smell of life, ENDING IN life: and for these things who is fit?

17 (Tagg. 98.) However, we are not like many who adulterate the word of God; but (w, 211.) though a lion would come to devour, 18 Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost its taste, how shall it be made salt again? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out and to be trampled under foot of men.

This discourse is continued throughout the whole discourse concerning him.
Ver. 8. I beseech you publicly to confirm. — The original word, συγκαταθηκείν, does not signify to conform simply, but to conform or appoint with authority: consequently the apostle's meaning was, that the reception of this offender into the church was to be accomplished with the consent and authority of the church universal, as the church, so far as it is assembled for the purpose. St. Paul's conduct in this affair is worthy of the imitation of all persons of the church. They who can detect this, must do nothing to grieve their people, unless love require it for their good. And when they are obliged to have recourse to the wholesome discipline which Christ hath instituted in his church, that discipline may be administered, as the word of God directs, with the greatest care to maintain the communion of the faithful, remembering that Satan is ever watchful to turn the hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows of Christians into an occasion of their ruin.

Ver. 11. — That we may not be overreached by Satan. — The word ἀσπάζονται properly signifies, προς τοὺς πολλούς, 'to possess more than one is entitled to.' But because persons of this description are commonly fraudulent and unjust, and sometimes violent in their conduct, the word signifies act fraudulently, unjustly, violently, chap. vii. 7, 17. And αἰτηματωδῶς, the substantia, signifies asking exceeding, chap. i. 6. See Eph. v. 23, note 2.

2. We are not ignorant of his devices. — Here, the apostle seems to give a caution against the principles which the Novatians afterward maintained. For the meaning of this passage, see the note on preserving the purity of the church, would not receive into their communion those who had apostatised in times of persecution, however penitent they might be afterwards; a rule which anciently occasioned much confusion, and even bloodshed, in the church.

12. Taking leave of them. — ἀπερωμαι, literally giving them up on account of their being dead. But because persons who are about to leave their friends for some time, give their commands to them, the phrase is used of persons leaving the church. For the meaning of the word, see the note on the preceding verse.

13. Causeth us to triumph with Christ. — The original phrase ἀγαλλιάζεσθαι, signifies, who carries along, in triumph with Christ. For the meaning of the word in triumph, see the note on Eccles. iv. 7. This is an allusion to the custom of victorious generals, when in their triumphal processions, carried some of their relations with them in their chariot.

14. Diffuseth the smell of the knowledge of him in every place. — In triumphal processions, pictures of the victorious general were strung with flowers, Ovid. Met. iv. 23, line 25. The people also were in use to throw flowers into the triumphal car, as it passed along. This, as the other customs observed in triumphal processions, was derived from the Greeks, in that manner honoured the conquistors in the games, when they entered into their respective cities. Plutarch (Eum. p. 227.) tells us, that in triumphal processions the streets were θαλαντηθισμενον, full of flowers.

Ver. 16. — To these indeed is it the smell of death. — All who are acquainted with military discipline, know that the word of God, in the greatest note followed the triumphal chariot in chains, and that some of the soldiers were brought in the presence of the emperor. Then, immediately after the procession ended. Therefore, to such, the smell of the flowers, and of the incense with which the procession was attended, was σεβαιωτός, a smell attracting, ending in death: but to those captives who had their lives granted to them, this was σεβαλιωτός, a smell of life, a most pleasing, refreshing, fragrant smell. The apostle meant to refer to the Communion of the faithful, remembering that Satan is ever watchful to turn the hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows of Christians into an occasion of their ruin.

In conclusion to the method of a triumph, the apostle represents Christ as a victorious general, riding in a triumphal procession through the world, attended by his apostles, prophets, evangelists, and other ministers of the gospel, and followed by all the idolatrous nations as his captives. Among these the preachers of the gospel diffused the smell of the knowledge of Christ, which, to those who believed on him, was a vivifying smell, ending in life to them: but to the unbelievers, the smell of the knowledge of Christ was a smell of death ending in death, if they continued in unbelief.

And for these things he is fit. — This is the Vulgate version in 16. 13. Est et hic quae tam inimicae? — And for these things who is fit? namely, as we. The Ethopic version, and the Clementine and the German MSS. we have here in 16. 13, while it misses out be the true reading, because the apostle says, chap. iii. 5. Our fitness is from God; and because, in ver. 16. of this chapter, he mentions as the reason of his fitness, we are not like others, who adulterate the word of God. As we.
CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Reasoning in this Chapter.

Two things mentioned in the beginning of this chapter show that the false teacher had established himself at Corinth, neither by working miracles, nor by communication to the Corinthians spiritual gifts, but by producing letters of recommendation from some brethren in Judea, and by talking in a vaunting manner of his own talents. For, in allusion to these things, the apostle asked the Corinthians ironically, whether, in order to obtain credit with them as an apostle, it was necessary that he should a second time prove his apostleship? or, if he needed as some (the false teacher) letters of recommendation, either to them or from them? ver. 1. —And to heighten the irony, he told them, that they themselves were a copy of the letter of recommendation which he carried about with him, not from the brethren of any church, but from Christ himself; by which original letter was written on his own heart, and was known and read of all the converts, ver. 2. —A copy of this letter the apostle told the Corinthians he had ministered or furnished to them, written, not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not on tables of stone, but on the fleshly tables of their own heart, ver. 3. —A recommendation of this sort he told them was a just sentence, and was added to him by Christ in the presence of God, ver. 4. —Consequently, it was afforded to him by God's authority.

It seems the false teacher extolled the law of Moses above the gospel of Christ, and assumed to himself great authority on account of his knowledge of that law. Wherefrom, in the remaining part of this chapter, the apostle by many arguments showed that, instead of the law of the Corinthians, the law of Moses was much inferior to the gospel of Christ. The law was a dispensation of the letter; but the gospel was a dispensation of the spirit: The law killed every sinner, whether he was penitent or not, by its dreadful curse; but the gospel gives life to all penitent believers without exception, by its gracious promises, ver. 5, 6. —The gospel therefore is a covenant of life, but the law a covenant of death. Further, he observed, that if the ministration of the covenant of death engraven on stones, covered the face of Moses his minister with such an outward glory, that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly on him after he was taken down from the Mount, the ministration of the covenant of the Spirit which giveth life, occasioned a much greater glory to them who were employed in ministering it. For the gifts of the Spirit wherewith the apostles, the ministers of the covenant of the Spirit, were honoured, were a much greater glory than the external splendour which covered Moses' face, when he appeared with the tables of the law in his hand, ver. 7-11. —The reason is, the ministers of the Spirit had the glory of inspiration abiding with them always, so that they could use much greater clearness of speech in explaining the covenant of the gospel, than Moses was able to do in explaining the covenant of the law; as was emblematically represented, by Moses putting a veil upon his face while he spake to the people of Israel. For he delivered to them nothing but the obscure figurative institutions of the law, together with such words as God had spoken to him, but added nothing, from himself, for explaining the meaning of these institutions. Hence, the generality of the Israelites have remained ignorant of the true nature and end of the law till this day, ver. 12-15. But when the whole nation shall turn to the Lord, the darkness of the law shall be done away, ver. 16. The expressions in this part of the chapter being obscure, the apostle told the Corinthians, that the Lord, by which he meant the gospel of which the Lord Christ is the author, is the dispensation of the Spirit, of which he speaks; by making a comparison between the law and the gospel, and granting a speech of grace to his ministers, especially to the apostles, who, by beholding the glory of the Lord Jesus while he abode on earth, and by the repeated revelations which they received from him since his ascension, were changed into the very same image, by successions of glory, that is, of illumination, coming from the Lord of the spirit: So that, in respect of the light of the gospel which they diffused through the world, they became the images of Christ, ver. 17, 18.

New Translation.

CHAP. III. —1 (Acts xxv. 9.) Must we begin again (especially to recommend ourselves?) (E) Or need we, as some, letters of recommendation to you, or letters of recommendation from you?
2 Ye are our letter written on our hearts, known and read of all men.

Ver. 1.—Must we begin again to recommend ourselves? —By recommending himself, the apostle certainly did not mean his preaching himself; for in that way he could not possibly prove himself to be an apostle. But he meant, his proposing to the Corinthians the proofs of his apostleship. This he had done in his former letters, &c. —Perhaps the clause, &c. might be better translated, Must we begin again to establish ourselves? For this sense follows, which is a word of the same derivation with the, hath, Rom. iii. 6; Cor. vi. &c. —Gal. ii. 18. —From the apostle's asking the Corinthians, whether he was necessary for them, whether the church where he wished to come had need of him, he supposed that the apostleship of the church of Jerusalem would be challenged; and that if he showed any doubt of it, he might be accused of raising objections. So that he concludes that it would be necessary for him to come to them, to show that he was not a stranger or an intruder. And he proposed that he should write to them, as he speaks in the next verse, 2. Or need we, as some, letters of recommendation to you? —This is an high irony, both of the faction and of the false teacher. It is the same as if he had said, Since the things I advanced in my former letter are not thought by you sufficient to prove my apostleship, shall I for that purpose bring you letters, recommending me as an apostle, from the brethren in Judea, as some have done? This it seems was the method the false teacher had taken to establish himself. For he had heard that the apostles had given recommendation to some of the brethren in Judea; and the Corinthians had been so silly, as, on the credit of these letters, to receive him as a greater teacher than the apostle himself. Of this kind of recommendatory

Commentary.

CHAP. III. —1 Must I, who have already proved myself to you to be an apostle, begin again to recommend myself? or need I, for that purpose, as some, (the false teacher,) letters of recommendation to you, or letters of recommendation from you to others?
2 I need no letter of that sort: Ye are a copy of our letter of recommendation from Christ, which is written on our hearts, known and read of all men.
3 For ye are plainly declared Christ's letter ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not on tables of stone, but (¢) on fleshly tables of the heart.

4 Now a boasting of this kind we have through Christ (1 Cor 2:6, 9, 10), with God:

5 Not because we are fit (¢¢) of ourselves to reason any thing to ourselves: but our fitness is from God;

6 Who (2 Cor 3:18) indeed hath fitted us to be ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: (Rom 7:6, 22) Now the letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive.

7 (a) Besides, if the ministry of death, imprinted on stones with letters (Pro 5:12), was done with glory, so that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly on the face of Moses, because of the glory of his face, which was to be abolished;

8 How shall not the ministry of the Spirit (9:16) rather (2 Cor 3:16) be with glory?

9 (1 Cor 9:17) And, if the ministry of condemnation is glory, much more doth the ministry of righteousness abound in honour.

is supported by all the ancient MSS., ought not to be altered on so slight an authority; especially as it gives a very good sense to the passage, and agrees well with the context.

2 Known and read of all men. — If the letter of recommendation of Jesus Christ, consisting of the declaration of his resurrection, the power of conferring spiritual gifts with which he was endowed, and the glory which the apostles met with, was written by the Spirit, who was in them, and in whom the Spirit of the new covenant was resident, then it was written by the Spirit of the living God, as the Spirit of the new covenant is resident in the hearts of believers. The apostle explains this in the next verse.

3 Ye are plainly declared Christ's letter ministered by us, not of the letter, but of the Spirit. — Rather he be not minister of the ministry of the letter which he wrought among them, who had experienced a great change in their own temper, through the influence of the doctrines of the gospel which he put into their hearts. (Rom 12:21) which ministered the power of the Spirit. Of course, he ministered the power of the Spirit, which rested on them, to the same extent that they had ministered, or written this copy of Christ's recommendatory letter, not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tables of stone, but on fleshly tables of the heart. The Corinthians were thus called the apostles, not of the letter, but of the Spirit, which was resident in their hearts.

6 Now a boasting of this kind we have through Christ, with God:

5 Not because we are fit of ourselves to reason any thing to ourselves: but our fitness is from God;

6 Who indeed hath fitted us to be ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: Now the letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive.

7 (a) Besides, if the ministry of death, imprinted on stones with letters (Pro 5:12), was done with glory, so that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly on the face of Moses, because of the glory of his face, which was to be abolished;

8 How shall not the ministry of the Spirit rather (2 Cor 3:16) be with glory?

9 (1 Cor 9:17) And, if the ministry of condemnation is glory, much more doth the ministry of the covenant, which bringeth righteousness to believers, abound in honour and authority to its ministers.
10 And therefore the covenant of the letter which was glorified, was not glorified in this respect, by reason of the excelling glory.

11 (1 Cor. 2:10.) Besides, if that which is glorious, is glorified in glory, much more that which is glorious, remaineth (2) in glory.

12 Wherefore, having such a persuasion, we use much (un deserved) plainness of speech;

13 And not as Moses, who put a veil upon his face, that the children of Israel might not steadfastly look to the end of the thing to be abolished:

14 (2 Cor. 3:3.) Now, their minds were blinded: (4.) for, until this day, the same veil remaineth in the reading of the old covenant, it not being revealed that it is abolished (5) by Christ.

15 (1 Cor. 2:8.) Moreover, until this day, when Moses is read, the veil lieth upon their heart.

(See Rom. xi. 25.)

16 (5.) But, when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken from around it.

17 Now, the Lord is the Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom.

18 (Gal. 5:1.) For we all, with an unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

II. CORINTHIANS.

Chap. III.

10 And therefore the covenant of the letter which was glorified, was not much glorified in that respect, by reason of the far more excelling glory of the covenant of the Spirit, by which it is abolished.

11 Besides, if that covenant which is abolished, is abolished by the greater glory of the covenant of the Spirit, that covenant which remained in glory, superiour to any glory which the abolished covenant ever possessed.

12 Wherefore, having such a persuasion, that the apostles, the ministers of the gospel, are much superior to Moses in respect of their inspiration, we use much plainness of speech in our preaching.

13 And do not put a veil on our face when preaching the gospel, as Moses put a veil on his face, while delivering the law, that the children of Israel might not steadfastly look to the vanishing of the glory on his face, which was to be abolished.

14 Now, as was typified by the veil on Moses' face, the minds of the Israelites were permitted to remain blind: For, until this day, the same veil remaineth in the reading of the old covenant; it not being revealed to the Israelites that it is abrogated by Christ, in whom all its types and figures have been fulfilled.

15 Moreover, until this day, when the law of Moses is read in the synagogues, the veil lieth upon the heart also of the Jews; they are strongly blinded by their own prejudices and lusts.

16 But when it, the veiled heart, shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken from around it: When the Jews shall believe the gospel, their prejudices shall be removed, so that they shall discern the true meaning of the law.

17 Now, what we may understand what I mean by the Jews turning to the Lord, the Lord signifies the covenant of the Spirit of which we are the ministers, ver. 6. And where the Spirit, the inspiration of the Lord, is, as it is with us, there is freedom in speaking.

18 For we apostles, all with an unveiled face brightly reflecting as mirrors the glory of the Lord Christ, which shines on us, are, in CHAPTER IV.

Having in the preceding chapter described the excellency of the covenant of the Spirit, and the transcendent honour and authority which the ministers of that covenant possessed by virtue of their office, and the abiding inspiration of the Spirit with which they were endowed, the apostle told the Corinthians, that the consideration of these things animated him and his brethren to diligence in performing the duties of their ministry, ver. 1.—and also to faithfulness. For, using no craft or deceit in preaching, but plainly and fully manifesting the true doctrines and precepts of the gospel, they recommended themselves to every man's conscience, ver. 2.—And therefore, if their gospel was veiled to any to whom it was preached, it was veiled only to those who destroyed themselves by hearkening to their own prejudices and lusts, and who having rejected the gospel, the devil made use of them in blinds the minds of others by their sophistry, ver. 3, 4.—Further, notwithstanding the apostles possessed such authority and miraculous powers, they did not preach, themselves, but Christ, as Lord or author of the spiritual dispensation of the gospel; being sensible that they should abide the world, only with a light borrowed from him, ver. 5, 6.—Yet, however, the low birth and mean station of the apostles, with their want of literature, should be thought inconsistent with the high dignity they claimed for the dispensation of Christ. St. Paul told the Corinthians, that God chose men of their character and station to be apostles, and committed the treasure of the light of the knowledge of God to them, as to earth vessels, to shew, that the excellency of the power by which the world was converted from idolatry, and the preachers of the gospel were preserved amidst the evils which pressed them on every side, did not proceed from themselves, but from God, ver. 1.—So that the dignity of the ministry of the gospel, instead of being diminished, was greatly increased by the low birth of the apostles, and by the evils which they sustained while executing that ministry: since thereby they had an opportunity of displaying their faith, their fortitude, and their benevolence to mankind, ver. 2, 3.—To illustrate this sentiment, the apostle gave an affecting description of the sufferings to which he and the rest were exposed, and of the extraordinary support which they received while pressed with these evils, and of their surmounting them all through the assistance of God, ver. 8–14.

Next, to shew the Corinthians how much they, and the whole body of the faithful, were interested in the sufferings of the apostles, he assured them, that they endured all the evils he had mentioned, for the sake of the persons to whom they preached, that by convincing them of their sincerity, God might be glorified through their conversion, ver. 15.—And therefore they did not flag in their work, although their outward man was daily wasting through the labours and sufferings which they were enduring, ver. 16.—Besides they knew that their afflictions fully wrought out for them a most exceeding and eternal weight of glory, which shew the reason that, in discharging the duties of their ministry, they did not aim at obtaining the seen things of the present world, which are all temporal, but at obtaining the unseen things of the world to come, which are eternal, ver. 18.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IV.—1 Wherefore, having this ministry, as we have received mercy, (1 Cor. vii. 25. note 2.), we do not flag. 2 (Acts, 76.) Also, we have commanded away the hidden things of shame, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but, by the manifestation of the truth, recommending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Ver. 2. 1. We have commanded away.—This is the literal significan-tion of the word ἀφέναι, found in Rom. vi. 21. 32. Ἀπόφημα, ver. 6. signifies to command. See Rom. iv. 60. The expression is emphatical and picturesque. It represents the hidden things of shame as offering their service to the apostles, who rejected their offer with disdain, and commanded them to be gone. The common translation, recommending, represents the apostles as freely yielding themselves to every man's conscience as upright in the sight of God, which knows our heart.

COMMENTS.

CHAP. IV.—1 Wherefore, having this glorious ministry committed to us, as we have received supernatural powers to fit us for it, we do not flag through the difficulties lying in our way. 2 Also, being faithful in this ministry as well as diligent, we have commanded those base actions to be gone, which impostors hide, knowing them to be shameful; never behaving in a crafty manner, neither preaching the gospel deceitfully, but, by fully and faithfully declaring the truth, recommending ourselves to every man's conscience for the purpose of spreading the gospel. 2 The hidden things of shame. — αἰσθησίων, are those disgraceful sexual practices in which some commit themselves privately, and which they carefully hide, because, if they were discovered, it would destroy their credit and expose them to shame. —In the latter part of the 1st century the four false teachers, described chap. ii. 17, who adulterated the word of
H. CORINTHIANS.

8. If, therefore, even our gospel be veiled, it is veiled (σοι ὡς αἰκιόμενον, mid. voice) to them who destroy themselves.

4 (Er) By whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers, in order that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, might not shine in them.

5 (Telg, 97.) Now, we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus as Lord, and ourselves your servants (σεσ. 112.) on account of Jesus.

6 (Orr, 236.) For God, who commanded light to shine out of darkness, he hath shined (μεταπτομη, 156.) into our hearts, to give you the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

7 But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might be God's, and not (ἐπί ἡμῶν, 156.) belonging to us.

God, and who, after the manner of the Greek philosophers, made loud pretensions to honesty and purity, but secretly grazfed their lusts without any restraint.

Ver. 3. Our gospel is veiled, it is veiled, etc.—In chap. iii. 13, 14, the apostle had observed, that there were two veils by which the Israelites were blinded, or prevented from understanding the meaning of the law, and from perceiving that it was to be abolished by the gospel. This first was a veil which lay on the law itself. This veil was formed by the obscurity of the types and figures of the law, and was signified by the printing of the law, and the interpretations given in it concerning its abrogation by the gospel. Now, in allusion to these causes of the blindness of the Israelites, the apostle told the Corinthians, that the gospel had been so plainly preached, and so fully proved, that if its divine original and true meaning was veiled, it was veiled only to them who destroy themselves. It was not veiled by any veil lying on the gospel itself, but by a veil lying on the hearts of the heathen philosophers and Jewish scribes, who would destroy themselves by hearkening to their own lusts and lusts. In this and the foregoing verse the apostle hath asserted the perspicuity of the scriptures in all matters necessary to salvation. For the written gospel is the same with that in note 3. The apostles preached, as is plain from Philipp. iii. 1; 2 Pet. iii. 1, 2; 2 Cor. iii. 6, 14; 1 Thess. ii. 16; 1 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Tim. iii. 4, 8; etc. In its external form, and when reading the word of God, the most of the unconverted veil the word by their own blindness, and destroy themselves by hearkening to their own lusts and lusts. The apostle gave to the devil the title of God, not because he is really God, or possesses independence or any divine attribute, but merely because idolaters, called in scripture the world, worshipped and served him as if he were God. Our Lord also termed the devil the Prince of this world, John xii. 31. 32. 33. not because he has any title to rule the world, but because he hath usurped the dominion thereof. This verse, Bengelius calls, Grandis et horribilis disquisitiones, or grand and terrible dissertations of Saul, that some of the ancients, in opposition to the Manicheans, who perverted this passage for establishing their two principles, construed it in the following manner: Among whom God hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers, as much by himself as by them. The devil is here said to blind the minds of the unbelievers, no person understands the apostle to mean that the devil hath the power of blinding the minds of the unbelievers, but that he doth it by false teachings and arguments, and so blindeth them forcibly; for in that case who would remain unblinded! But he means that the devil blinds unbelievers in the way of natural, and not in a way of moral violence. We have false teachers and false teachings in the gospel with arguments, addressed, not to the understanding of men, but to the blindness of their hearts. The blindness of these kinsmen unbelievers are easily persuaded to shut their eyes against the light of the gospel, because it condemns their vicious practices. But the false teachers destroy them, not like the devil, unless the blindness of their hearts are a just punishment for their crimes. The ignorance therefore of unbelievers does not proceed so much from the obscurity of the gospel, as from their own lusts and lusts.

3. The light of the gospel of the glory of Christ.—That display of the perfections and counsels of God (ver. 6.) which is made in the gospel, the apostle calls light; and by observing that it proceeded from the face of Christ, he sets it in opposition to the darkness in which the unbelievers were left, and which shone in Moses' face, when he delivered the law to the Israelites.

4. Who is the image of God.—St. Paul in this passage calls Christ the image of God, who is the Father of lights, or Fountain of all the knowledge of the world, for the same reason that he calls the apostles the images of Christ. Christ faithfully delivered to the world all the doctrines which God gave to him, as the apostles faithfully declared all the revelations which Christ made to them. According to St. Paul, therefore, the world is illuminated by the apostles, not as men, but as ministers of Christ, and therefore as mediators, hath derived his light from God. And thus, all the spiritual light that is in the world, the apostle ultimately refers to the revelation of God, and the constitution of the church in the image of God in other respects likewise, see Col. 1. 16. note 1.

Ver. 5. Christ Jesus as Lord.—The order of the words in the original (Χριστοῦ ὑπὲρ Λόρδον) shows this to be the true translation of the clause.

Ver. 7.—We have this treasure in earthen vessels,—In the opinion of some, there is here an allusion to Gideon's soldiers, who carried lighted lamps in earthen pitchers, when they attacked the Midianites. But others, with more probability, suppose the allusion is to the ancient method of hiding treasures of money in earthen vessels, or pots. The apostles are called earthen vessels, for the reason to which we have just referred.

The excellency of the power.—The power by which the gospel is established or confirmed is its doctrine, precepts, and promises; all of them perfectly agreeable to the condition and necessities of mankind, and to the character of God. The power by which the gospel binds the hearts of heathens, appeared absolute foolishness. Secondly, in the great miracles by which the apostles proved their mission from God, and in the spiritual fruits of the gospel, angels, and the confessions of their faith in the gospel. Thirdly, in the blessing of God, which ever so accompanied the preaching of the gospel, in such a manner as to dispose mankind to receive it. But the greatness of this power can only be estimated by the greatness of the obstacles which it had to remove, and by the greatness of the effects which it then produced. No sooner was the gospel preached in any country, whether barbarous or civilized, than great numbers forsaketh idolatry, and devoted themselves to the worship of the true God. Moreover, instead of wallowing as formerly in sensuality, they sought to practice in all manner of wickedness, they became holy. But it is evident, that before such an entire change in the faith of any heathen could take place, the prejudices of education were to be overcome, and the power of tradition was to be set aside; the reproaches, calamities, and insted of persons most dear to the convert, were to be disregarded; the re-nat-ur-ation of mankind, patience, and all who were therefor were any how connected with the established religion, was to be borne; in short, the ties of blood and friendship were to be broken. The operations of ease and interest were to be silenced; nay, the love of life itself was to be cast out: all which were obstacles to the heathens changed their face; and this power, which was produced by the gospel in the temper and manners of these men, it is certain, that before this could be accomplished, their lusts and appetites to attack the gospel, were to be strengthened by inveterate habit, as was the case with most of the converts from heathenism. But by arguments, true natural power, which the first preachers of the gospel can be supposed to have possessed.

2. Might Christ not belong to us?—All the apostles, except Paul, being men of low birth, they had not the advantage of a learned education; all of them, before they became apostles, spent their lives in laborious occupations; none of them in their own
The power by which we are preserved is from God; for the power of God is on every side by our enemies, but not straitened so as to be unable to cause the combats by the blows we receive, but not in despair of obtaining the victory.

Pursued by our enemies in order to be destroyed, but not utterly forsaken of God; thrown down by them, but not killed.

At all times carrying about in the body the putting to death of the Lord Jesus, in the sufferer by the body the same persecution and affliction with him, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our body.

For always, we who live, are exposed to death for the sake of Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our mortal flesh.

So that death verily worketh strongly in us, he attacks us in various forms, but spiritual life worketh in you, by the afflictions we sustain, by the strengthening and confirming of our faith.

Yet, though we thus expose ourselves, it need not surprise you; because having the same strong faith which David shewed, according to what is written, I believed God's promise, therefore I have spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak;

Knowing that he who raised up the Lord Jesus, will raise us up also by Jesus, and will present us with you.

For all our sufferings are for your sakes, that the grace which hath abounded to many, may, through the thanksgiving of many, overflow to the glory of God.

Therefore we do not flag (συνεχείος), but even although our outward man is wasted, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

Besides, the momentary light thing of our affliction may be borne by us, as it effectually worketh out for us a most exceeding external weight of glory in the life to come:

To say, 90, 91. I. Besides, the momentary light thing of our affliction worketh out for us a most exceeding external weight of glory:

country had any office in the state, to clothe them with authority; and when they went among the Gentiles, having no war to defend them, they were liable every hour to be broken or destroyed by their enemies. Well, therefore, might Paul call himself and his brethren apostles asarches, eseile, into which the treasure of the gospel was put. Now, being such persons, can any impartial judge suppose them to have been the authors of the gospel? It was a scheme of reasons for above their ability to contrive. They must therefore have received it by inspiration from God, as the apostles themselves were. Yet, so far from being a small thing, it is a great thing, after truth can fancy, that a few strangers of the lowest rank in life, coming from a distant desolate nation, and who, besides, were naturals born into a language of the people they were to teach, and not only could prevail with any number of men, and far less with multitudes in the manifold splendor of an imperial court, or the majesty of the nation the world, considering what hath been said above concerning the number and greatness of the obstacles which were to be removed before any heathen embraced the gospel, no candid mind can learn. We are not contemplating to obtain the things which are seen, the glories of the present life; but the things which are not seen, the eternal.

18 We are not aiming at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.

Pleasure. If the ordinary meaning of the Greek word ἐνεργεῖν, the present, is retained, it will not alter the sense of the passage. For either way translated, it suggests a new reason for the apostle's not flagging. He uses the neuter adjective, τὸ ἔνεργεῖν, the thing of our affection, to show how much he disregarded the affections of the present life.

2. A most exceeding. —So I have translated the Greek phrase οὐκ ἔνεργεῖς ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, supposing it to be the highest Hebrew supposition, which was formed by doubling the word. See Esa. iv. 17.

3. Weight of glory. —The Hebrew word answering to glory, signifies both weight and glory. Here the apostle joins the two significations in one phrase. For the sake of the greater energy in his discourse, he often adopts the literal meaning of the Hebrew metaphor which he introduces, their figurative meaning also. Thus, Philip, ii. 14, "I count nothing amiss,

4. The things which are not seen are eternal. —This quality implies, not only that the joys of heaven will have no end, but even after a duration hath passed beyond all computation by numbers, or conception in thought; but also that these joys will suffer no interruption nor abatement whatever, in the course of a duration absolutely eternal.

CHAPTER V.

To shew what the things were which the apostles aimed at, and by the hope of which their inward man was daily exerted, St. Paul mentions, in this chapter, that eternal habituation in heaven which the righteous are to obtain after death; because there the whole objects of their desires will be, and they shall be enjoyed by them in the most perfect perfection, ver. 1. And knowing that their heavenly habituation will be infinitely preferable to their earthly dwelling, they earnestly desired to be introduced into it, ver. 2. And being a happiness which they were sure of obtaining, they were certain, that although they were deprived of their earthly habituation by their persecutors, they would not be found destitute of an habituation, it was certain for them, that the church, which they served, would not be left destitute of an habituation; therefore they desired that their persecutors, that they might be continued the longer with them, that they might be continued the longer with them, ver. 13. Both the case, they was moved by a strong sense of the love of Christ in dying for all, ver. 14, 15.

Therefore, as an apostle of Christ, he knew no distinction between Jew and Gentile; nor in preaching the gospel he made any distinction between them, but offered the same terms of salvation to all, ver. 16. —Declaring, that if any man believed in Christ, whether he were a Jew or a Gentile, he is a new creature, ver. 17. —Created by God, who hath reconciled him to himself through Jesus Christ, and that gives to the apostles the ministry of the reconciliation, ver. 18. —Which consists in publishing, that God is by Christ reconciling the world to himself by shunning persecutions, as the apostles did, ver. 19. —The apostle, therefore, in Christ's stead, earnestly besought men to be reconciled to God, ver. 20. —And to persuade them to be reconciled, he represented to them, that he who knew no sin God hath made a sin-offering for us, that we might become righteous in the sight of God through him, ver. 21. —Now, of all the arguments which the apostle adduces, the most weighty, the most important, is in preaching that judgment, was approved of God, and that he hoped also of the Corinthians, to whom he had made known that interesting event, ver. 11.

But what he had said, in commendation of his own faithfulness in the ministry of the gospel, might not be imputed to vanity, he told the Corinthians, that he had mentioned these things to afford them a solid ground of boasting in him as an apostle, and to enable them to answer those who boasted in the false teacher, on account of external and not on account of real qualities, ver. 12. —Further, because they were not enemies of God, but madmen, for preaching the gospel at the hazard of his life without repining any worldly advantage from it, he assured the Corinthians, that whether in so doing he acted, in the opinion of the faction, as a madman, it was for the glory of God, or whether he acted, in the opinion of the sincere part of the church, as one in his right mind, he assured them that he might be continued the longer with them, ver. 13. —And in either case, he was moved by a strong sense of the love of Christ in dying for all, ver. 14, 15.

 COMMENTARY.

Ver. 1. — 1. Our earthly house, which is a tent, —I agree with Be- thune being at the greatest pains in persuading men to believe the future judgment; and by the earnestness, in preaching that judgment, was approved of God, and that he hoped also of the Corinthians, to whom he had made known that interesting event, ver. 11.

Ver. 9. — 10. The apostle, therefore, knowing the terribleness of Christ's displeasure, was at the greatest pains in persuading men to believe the future judgment; and by the earnestness, in preaching that judgment, was approved of God, and that he hoped also of the Corinthians, to whom he had made known that interesting event, ver. 11.

Ver. 5. — 5. Who hath given us the earnest of the Spirit, means given us the earnest, which is the Spirit. —For the apostles had nothing given to them as tent, a temporary habitation, is destroyed, we shall have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens.
II. CORINTHIANS. 225

2 (1 Cor. xiv. 9.) But yet, in this present, (from ver. 1,) we groan, earnestly desiring to go permanently into our habitation which is (εἰς τὸν οίκον, 155.) heavenly.

3 (1 Thess. v. 8.) And surely, if we go in, we shall not be found destitute of these things.

4 For we know who are in the tent groan, being burdened; not because we desire to go out, but to go permanently in, (see ver. 8.) that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life.

5 Now he who hath effectually wrought us to this very desire is God himself, who also hath given us the earnest of the Spirit. (See 2 Cor. i. 22, note 2.)

6 We are bold, therefore, at all times, (see, 207.) because we know, that being at home in the body, we are from home with the Lord;

7 For we walk by faith, and not by sight.

8 We are bold (2 Cor. ii. 14.) also, (see) because we are well pleased rather to go from home out of the body, and to be at home with the Lord:

an earnest of the Spirit. The Spirit himself was the earnest spoken of—Our translators have rendered this passage in the following manner: For we know that our earthly house of this tabernacle we groan, being burdened by the weight that presseth upon us, not that we desire to be unclothed, but that we desire to be clothed in heaven: so that this mortal thing may be put off, and we shall not be found naked.

The reference is to our earthly tabernacle, which the apostle describes as a kind of earthly habitation, and in the next verse he says, 'we are from home with the Lord.'

9 For we know that the inhabited by the flesh is set in prison, (see 2 Cor. i. 7.) being burdened; not because we desire to go out of this state, as unwilling to bear our afflictions any longer, but to go permanently into our heavenly habitation, that sin, and misery, and weakness, and whatever in this world accompanies mortality, may be swallowed up in an eternal life of happiness.

10 And so on the ground that he hath effectually wrought us to entertain this very desire is God himself, who also hath given us the earnest of our obtaining an heavenly habitation, in the gifts of the Spirit which he hath bestowed on us.

11 Being desirous of entering into heaven, we are bold at all times in the exercise of our ministry; the rather, because we know, that while at home in the body on earth, we are from true home, separated from the Lord;

12 For we walk by the belief of the other world, and not by the sight of this.

13 We are bold also, and have no fear of death, because we are well pleased rather to go from our present home out of the body than remain on earth, that we may be at our real home in heaven with the Lord.

Christ.

Abraham and his sons, who were heirs with him of the promises of the country, looked for while they lived in tents; and of which city the builder and maker is God, Heb. xi. 10. To this city St. Paul and Barnabas were sent to preach to the Gentiles; the place where the name of GodJEusalem, The city of the living God; because as in the earthly Canaan, which was the type of the heavenly country, Jerusalem was the place where the tabernacle of God was; so in the same manner, the presence, and to which the tribes went up to pay their homage to God; so we may suppose, that in the heavenly country there will be a particular place, where the Deity will manifest his presence, and receive the worship of the church of the first-born. See Heb. xii. 22 notes 1, 2.

3. An house not made with hands.—By this expression, the Hebrews denoted the excellence of a thing; as by the contrary expression, 'made with hands,' they signified a thing mean and contemptible, Heb. xii. 11. 'The house not made with hands,' is one of those (μαραθόμενη) mansions, of which Christ tells us there are many in the Father's house of the universe, John xv. 2.

Ver. 2.—1. To go permanently in.—So I translate the word οἰκον. For in the middle voice, signifies, go in, enter. See Scap. Diction. and Millar. from οἰκον. For in the middle voice, signifies, go in to a house or place; 2 Cor. vi. 26. 3. But to go in is to be in the house, who go into houses. As the preposition in increases the signification of the word with which it is joined, so it may be supposed to increase the signification of the word go in, as to abide. In this sense it is used here, with great propriety, to shew that the apostle, speaking, not of the habitation of the righteous between death and the resurrection, but of their habitation after the resurrection, where they are to remain for ever. In a metaphysical sense, the Greek words above mentioned signify to clothe, and to be clothed. But they cannot have these meanings in this passage, because to speak of 'being clothed upon with an house,' is, I think, an absurdity. There is included a similar expression, 1 Cor. xv. 53. For this mortal must put off the putting on of. For this mortal is put off, and they are changed into incorruptible. But it does not imply that the mortal body is changed into another that is immortal; for the righteous is to be covered with, or anything united to one that is immortal: For in that case flesh and blood would inherit the kingdom of God; contrary to what is taught in the 2d chapter of the Corinthians, 2 Cor. iii. 16. The meaning therefore is, that our mortal body is to be changed into one that is immortal.

2. Which is heavenly.—So if οἰκον. It is translated, Luke xii. 1. οἰκον. which is, Your heavenly Father. The word signifies that which is most excellent; in which sense it may also be translated, Rev. xii. 2. to come down from God (εὗρος ἐξ οίκου) out of heaven.

Ver. 3. We shall not be found destitute.—So I translate the word αὐθεντεῖαι, because it never signifies to destitute of something which he ought to have had. Hence it was applied to one who wanted his upper garment, (John xix. 7,) his tunic, and even his undergarment, (John xix. 23,) as if he had nothing at all, αὐθεντεῖαι. However, as the Greek writers called the body a tent, according to the ordinary dress among the Greeks, and that being a principal part of the body, 'is destroyed, we have,' &c. But I prefer the literal translation of the word αὐθεντεῖαι, for a reason to be mentioned in the next.

2 We have a building from God.—This building is the city which

2 F
9. (In me) And for you we earnestly, whether being at home, or being from home, to be acceptable to him.

10. For we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ, that every one may receive things (Acts 11:17), in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad.

11. Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, we persuade men, and are made manifest to God; and I trust are made manifest even (Rom. 16:13) to your consciences.

12. (Acts 26:18.) However, we do not again recommend ourselves to you, (1 Cor. 5:6.) but even more so, the more so, that ye may have an answer to them who boast (1 Cor. 1:17) on account of appearances, nor of heart.

13. For whether we be besides ourselves, it is for God; or whether we be sober, it is for you.

14. For the love of Christ constraineth us, who judge this, That if one died for all, certainly all were dead;

15. And that ye died for all, that they who live should no longer live to themselves, but to him who died and rose again for them.

16. Wherefore, we, from this time forth, respect no man (Acts 23:18), on account of the flesh: And even if we have esteemed Christ on account of the flesh, yet now we esteem him no more on that account.

17. (Acts 3:30.) For, if any one be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things have passed away; behold all things have become new!

18. Give you occasion of boasting concerning us. From this it appears, that the faction had taken occasion, from the things which the apostle in his former letter had advanced in proof of his apostleship, to speak of him as a vain-glorying person. And this being reported to him, he told them what he had written, and was going to write, concerning his own faithfulness, and other things, as an essay, neither proceeding from vanity, nor was meant to recommend himself to them as an apostle, but was intended to enable his hearers to judge of his genuine state, if they esteemed them the more, referring him to the false teachers, in whom they boasted on account of a few external qualifications, while he possessed no real goodness of heart.

19. Who boast (Rom. 1:18) on account of appearance. The word τὸ πρὸς τὸ ἄτομον signifies the consciousness, with the form and air of the body, taken complexly. Here it denotes those superficial external qualities which are the admiration of the vulgar, and of which it seems the false teachers boasted: whilst he was deficient in these, being more than sufficient in the other virtues of the apostle, Rom. 1. 19, and in the notes on those verses, it was in the prospect of Christ's dying for mankind, that God allowed Adam and Eve, after the fall, to live and have children, and appointed them and their posterity a trial under a more gracious covenant than the first, in which, not a perfect obedience, but the obedience of faith was required, in order to their obtaining eternal life; in which also the assistance of the Spirit of God was promised, to enable them to perform the duties of the new covenant. And the consciences of men were to die at length, according to the penalty of the first covenant, that they are all judged of things without, and of things without and within, day, to receive reward or punishment, according to their behaviour during their trial under the new covenant. Thus far Adam and his posterity were judged, and in the end of the world, Christ in the benefit of the new covenant, to the end of the world. Again, Christ being exalted to the government of the universe, as foretold by Moses and the prophets, 1 Cor. 6:18. Am I not excellent, he said, above all mankind from his government are the fruits of his death. For as the apostle tells us, Rom. 11:11. To this end was Christ given over by God to death, that he might rule over both the dead and the living. It is evident, therefore, that good and bad men, equally, owe their present life on earth, and the gracious covenant under which they are placed, and their resurrection from the dead at the last day, to the death of Christ. In like manner, all those who live, in the pale of the Christian church owe the advantages of revelation, and of the ordinances of religion, and of the influences of the presence of God, to the death of Christ. The blessings, temporal and spiritual, Eph. 1. 3. See the explanation prefixed to Rom. 1. 18. Should no longer live to themselves, but to him. In this verse, the particle τον is added to the word χριστον, and a new grace is a covenant by which they may obtain eternal life, all are bound by every tie to live agreeably to the direction of mankind, who is the Source of all life, honesty, purity, holiness, all, and a blessing, a concern for the glory of God.

19. Through the obedience of the many, many, that is all, shall be constituted righteous; shall have the means of becoming righteous, as was the case with Abraham, Rom. 4. 17, and in the notes on those verses, it was in the prospect of Christ's dying for mankind, that God allowed Adam and Eve, after the fall, to live and have children, and appointed them alteration made in the minds and manners of men, by the faith of the gospel, was so great, that it might be called regeneration; and the person so regenerated might be considered as a new creature; and the rather, that at the resurrection the bodies of the regenerate shall be fashioned anew, like to the glorious body of Christ; consequently, they shall be made new in their whole man.

21 For him who knew no sin, he hath made a sin-offering for us, that we might become the righteousness of God through him.

2. All things have become new.—He hath acquired new views of things, and better dispositions, and follows a better course of life; by a divine change, whatever his station be, he has acquired a dignity far superior to that in which he formerly derived from birth, or fortune, or condition; he is truly estimable on account of the excellency of his own character, as well as of his faith and hope.

Ver. 18. Hath reconciled.—This word is used to signify the making of those who were at enmity, friends. See Rom. v. 11 note 1.

Ver. 20. In Christ's stead, therefore, we execute the office of ambassadors.—Christ was God's chief ambassador; and the apostles being commissioned by Christ, were his substancia. The same obedience, therefore, was due to them as masters of religion, as to Christ himself. But the false teacher not being appointed by Christ his substitute, had no claim to any such respect.

2. Seeing God beseeches by us.—Our translators supply the word you here, as if God besought the Corinthians by Paul. But that addition spoils the beauty of that passage. The Corinthians were already reconciled, and did not need to be besought. But St. Paul told them, that seeing God besought sinners by the apostles, he and his brethren 'prayed all men in Christ's stead,' saying to them, 'Be ye reconciled to God. For him who knew no sin,' &c. So that this is a short specimen of the apostle's exhortations to the unconverted in every country. Accordingly, Eusebius observes, 'Illud, Reconsciamentum Div. ministicum est.'

21. He hath made a sin-offering for us. —These are many passages in the Old Testament, where מ rotary nin, signifies a sin-offering. Hosea vi. 3. 'They (the priests) eat up the sin (that is, the sin-offering) of my people.' See Whaley's note on this verse.

In the New Testament, likewise, the word sin hath the same significance. Heb. xii. 18. xii. 11.

2. That we might become the righteousness of God through him.

—As substantives are sometimes put for their corresponding adjectives, Gal. iv. 17, 'the righteousness of God' may signify righteous persons in the sight of God; namely, by being made righteous, we stand entitled to us for righteousness through Christ. The unbelief in the phraseology here is elegant: Christ was made sin, that sinners might become the righteousness of God.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

The apostle having affirmed in the foregoing chapter, that the ministry of reconciliation was committed to the preachers of the gospel, he entreated his fellow-labourers in that ministry, the bishops and pastors at Corinth, to exert themselves with the utmost fidelity and diligence in their work; because, if they were either unfaithful or negligent, they would be guilty of receiving that honourable salary in vain, ver. 1. Then he put them in mind of God's promise of his faithful stewards; and by adding, 'now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation,' he intimates, that there are seasons in which God more especially blesseth the labours of his servants, which therefore ought not to be neglected by them. And, to carry the matter home to their conscience, he told them, that the season then present was such a day of salvation, ver. 2. —These earnest exhortations the apostle addressed to his fellow-labourers, that they might give no encouragement to any one to commit sin, either by their negligence, or by their teaching a lax morality, like the false apostles, because it would occasion the ministry of the gospel to be blamed, as encouraging licentiousness, ver. 3. He therefore besought them to establish themselves as faithful ministers of Christ, by their virtues, both passive and active; also by sound doctrine, and by a right behaviour both in private and in public, ver. 4-10.

Having thus exhorted his fellow-labourers, the apostle addressed the Corinthian brethren in general, telling them 'his mouth was opened to them, his heart was enlarged,' he spake plainly to them, from love. And, as a reward, he desired an equal return of affection from them, ver. 11, 12, 13. —Then proceeded to give an advice, which he knew would be disagreeable to some of them; namely, not to join themselves in marriage with idolaters and unbelievers, because the principles and manners of such persons being directly contrary to the principles and manners of Christ's disciples, the Corinthians could have no prospect of union and peace in such marriages, ver. 14, 15. —Or, although love and peace were maintained, their idolatrous spouses tempting them to join in the worship of idols, they might lose that holiness which rendered them the temple or dwelling of God, ver. 16. —As was plain from what God said to the Israelites, 'Come out from among them, &c. and ye shall be to me sons and daughters,' ver. 17, 18. —Then, to shew that these promises were made to the disciples of Christ as well as to the disciples of Moses, the apostle added, as the conclusion of his discourse on this subject, chap. vii. 1. 'Wherefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit,' &c. These words, therefore, being properly a part of this discourse, I have taken them from the beginning of chap. vii. and have joined them to the end of this chapter.

9 By goodness, (e) by holy spirit, by a holy spirit, by love unfeigned.

10 By the word of truth, (chap. ii. 17. iv.) by the power of God, (2 Cor.) through the right and left hand armoure of righteousness!

11 Through honour and dishonour, (2 Cor.) through bad fame and good fame, (2 Cor.) as deceivers, (2 Cor. ii. 21.) yet true;

12 As unknown, yet well known; as dying, yet behold we live; as chastised, yet not killed,

not the apostle, but his fellow-labourers in the ministry of the gospel at Corinth, I think evident from ver. 3. 4, where the persons addressd are requested to approve themselves as the ministers of God, by exercising all the power and active virtues belonging to their character. By exercising them, the apostle shewed the Corinthians, that it belonged to him to inspect the behaviour, not of the people alone, but of all the spiritual men, and to give them such exhortations and reproves as he saw fit. And the false teacher, as a professd fellow-labourer, being examined along with the rest, he in particular was judged by the power of the Spirit. Afterwards drawn of a faithful minister, the Corinthians were made sensible how finely the false teacher was, for the reason Tertullian gives us for the birth of the grace of God in this passage signifies, not only the office of the ministry, but the spiritual gifts bestowed on the ministers at Corinth, just then for their office. See 1 Cor. iii. 10. note. 1 Cor. iv. 19. 20. 2 Cor. xi. 23. 24. From these passages it will appear, that he prescribed to others nothing but what he prescribed to himself. Accurate, therefore, it is included himself in this exhortation, Let us establish ourselves.

Ver. 5. By tumults.—The first preachers of the gospel were often assaulted in tumultus raised by the Jews and Israelitish rabble, as S. Paul was assaulted in Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Ephesus, and Jerusalem.

Ver. 6. By purity. . . . By love unfeigned.—In the opinion of some, is the knowledge of the ancient oracles, called, in the enumeration of the apostles, wisdom and knowledge. 1 Cor. xiii. 1. 2. By long-suffering. As the apostle hath mentioned much patience, ver. 4. long-suffering must here signify the bearing and forbearing of all wrongs.

3. By a holy spirit.—By erathannyn 512. Translates this by the Holy Spirit, understanding thereby the spiritual gifts with which the apostles were endued. The Greek is rendered by the English, endued with divine power, the power of God, which, no doubt, signifies the power of divinity, and is a perfect description of the power placed among the good dispositions which the ministers of the gospel were to possess, I think it signifies a well-regulated spirit.

5. Through honour and dishonour, (2 Cor.) through bad fame and good fame,—as deceivers, (2 Cor. ii. 21.) yet true;

6. As unknown, yet well known; as dying, yet behold we live; as chastised, yet not killed.

10. As sorrowing, but always rejoicing; as poor, but making many rich with the knowledge of salvation; as having none of the vanities of life, yet possessing all things, in our title to heaven.

—This is said in allusion to the armours of the ancients. For soldiers carried bucklers in their left hands, and swords and javelins in their right. The former was their defensive, the latter their offensive arms. Wherefore, the right and left hand armours of righteousness, denote all the branches of righteousness, whereby, in those difficult times, the ministers of the gospel were as effectually enabled to defend themselves, and overcome their enemies, as soldiers were to defend their bodies and vanquish their foes, by the offensive and defensive armours which they wore:—or, the right and left hand armours of righteousness signify all the right methods by which a righteous cause is maintained.

10. Through a proper behaviour when we receive honour and dishonour;—through bearing bad fame without being defeated, and good fame without being elated; as reckoned deceivers, yet shewing ourselves true ministers of Christ;
11 Our mouth is opened 1 to you, O Corinthians; our heart is enlarged; 1 12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels. 1 (See 1 Esd. iv. 34.)
13 Now, the same recompense I request, (I speak as to my children,) Be ye also enlarged.
14 Become notdiscordantly yoked 1 with infidels; for what (συζυγεία) partisipatio 15 HAT flourishing light with darkness?
16 And what agreement have Christ with Belial? 1 or what (συζυγεία) portion a believer 17 Wherefore, come out from among them, and walk among them; and I will be their God, and 18 And I will be to you a Father, and ye shall be to me sons; 1 and daughters, with the Lord Almighty.

CHAP. VII.—1 Wherefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all pollution 1 of the flesh and spirit, 2 perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

Ver. 11.—1. Our mouth is opened. —So the original word οὐράνως may be translated, being the preterite of the middle voice. Among the easterns, to shut the mouth, signifies to be out of humour, troubled, ashamed, or grieved: Isa. li. 15. "The kings shall shut their mouths at him." But to have the mouth opened, is to be joyful or glad. I have interpreted the phrase in its common meaning, because the sentiment which, according to that meaning, it expresses, suits the apostle's discourse at this point.

2. Our heart is enlarged. —This phrase in scripture signifies to be made exceeding glad: Psal. iv. 1. "Then hast enlarged me that is lowly, and I am made exceeding glad in thine ordinances." But in the verse before us, it signifies to have a strong affection for one, as is plain from what follows, ver. 12. How are ye not straitened in us, but in your own heart? Ver. 13.

Ver. 12. Ye are not straitened in us, &c. —Flamer translates this, "Ye are not straitened in us, and ye are not straitened by your bowels." I also, by your bowels, by your affection, on account of your having offended me by your dimensions.

Ver. 13. Ye are not straitened, &c. —By the law, animals of different kinds were not to be joined together, iv. 29, in one yoke. Deut. xvii. 19. "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." But the phrase, ταυροκτόνων, discordantly yoked, is used here to express the marriage of a believer with an infidel, it is perhaps an allusion to Lev. xix. 19. Νῦν παραπλημερίας ταπεινωστάθηναι εὐθεῖα νυν παραπλημερίας ταπεινωστάθηναι. The apostle's precept, besides prohibiting marriages with infidels, forbids also believers to contract friendships, or to enter into any kind of scheme with infidels which requires much familiar intercourse, lest the believer should be tempted to join with the infidel in his wicked principles and practices.

Ver. 14. What (συζυγεία) portion. —The original word denotes the share which one receives with others, of a common subject.

Ver. 15. And what (συζυγεία) placing together, &c. —This is an allusion to the history of Dagon, the god of the Philis-

The Corinthians, and all the heathens, being excessively addicted to the vices here called ματαιοῦσας πολύ πολύ πολύ, pollution of the flesh, the apostle had good reason to commonly denounce them against these vices; as he hath done likewise 1 Cor. vi. 10. by pointing out their pernicious influence both on the body of the man. For the reason why the term is applicable to the lustful and uncleanliness and pollution, see Rom. vi. 19. note 2. injured, or corrupted, or deceived any of them, ver. 2.—
And because, in thus speaking, he obliquely insinuated that their new teacher had done these injuries to them, he assured them he did not derive their simplicity in sufferings themselves to be so used; for, as he said before, he had the most cordial and hearty love for Titus at the time he expected him, ver. 5.—and the pleasure which his arrival, with the good news of their submission and love, had given him, ver. 6. —And as they had taken his admonitions in good part, he told them he did not repent of having made them sorry for a little while by his former letter, ver. 8.—since their sorrow was of a godly sort, and had wrought in them true repentance, ver. 9, 10. —He told them likewise, that he wrote to them to excommunicate the incestuous person, to shew the care which he took of them in the sight of God, ver. 12. —For which reason, he informed them, that Titus, in his advice and most tender affection for them, which was increased by his remembering their obedience to the apostle, and their kindness to himself, ver. 15. —The apostle therefore rejoiced, that he now had confidence in them in every thing, ver. 16.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VII.-3 Receive us: (see chap. vi. 11, 12,) we have injured no one, for we have corrupted no one, we have deceived no one.

3 I speak not this to condemn you; for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts, to die together, and to live together.

4 Great is my freedom of speech to you, great is my boasting concerning you! I am filled with consolation; I exceedingly abound in joy in all our affliction.

5 For when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were distressed on every side: without were so many conflicts, within were fears.

6 Nevertheless, God, who comforteth them that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus;

7 And not by his coming only, (εὐαγγελία) but also by the consolation wherewith he was comforted (ἐκ οὗ), by you, having related to us your earnest desire, your lamentation, your zeal for me; so that I rejoiced the more.

8 (Οὖν, φησίν). Therefore, although I made you sorry by that letter, I do not repent, although I did repent: for I perceive that that letter, although but for an hour, made you sorry properly.

9 I now rejoice, not because ye were made sorry, but because ye were made sorry to a change of conduct; for ye were made sorry—

Ver. 2.—1 We have injured no one.—Perhaps some of the faction had represented the apostle as having injured the incestuous person, by the sentence of excommunication which he ordered the church to pass on him. That accusation St. Paul utterly disclaim ed; and at the same time, as Locke observes, instanced in an oblique manner that their false teacher had injured them, to the other evils to which they were exposed by him.

2 Deceived no one.—So I translate the word οφθαλφώθησαν, which literally signifies to possess more than one has a right to; and by an easy figure, to see deceit for that purpose. See chap. ii. 11, note 1. Besides, to translate the word as I have done, makes this different from injured no one.

Ver. 4.—1 Great is my boasting concerning you.—The apostle could not tell the Corinthians, after the time, which Titus brought him of their good dispositions and obedience. He meant, that as many as were in Macedonia, like many of the apostle's words, hath such a force and emphasis, that it cannot be fully expressed in the English language.

4 Ver. 6. Nevertheless, God, who comforteth them that are cast down;—literally, they who are humble: but θλπωσις is applied to the mind, as well as to the body.

Ver. 7. Euthyches thinks the word εὐαγγελία may be translated εὐαγγελία; namely, to see their spiritual father. There is a peculiar beauty in the repetition of οὖν.
made sorry in the matter God requires; your sorrow issuing in actual amendment of your fault, that ye might not be punished by me in any manner.

10 For the sorrow according to God wrought out a change of conduct unto salvation, not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world wrought out death.

11 Behold, (2 Cor. 7.) now this very thing, that ye were made sorry according to God, what carefulness it wrought in you, (2 Cor. 7.) grieved, that, ye sorrow, that is, earnest desire, ye sorrow, that is, punishment. By every thing ye have shown yourselves to be now pure in this matter.

13 (Ages. 87.) Indeed, although I wrote to you severely, it was not for his sake who did the wrong, nor for his sake who suffered the wrong, but rather for the sake of shewing to you our care, which is concerning you in the sight of God.

13 For this reason, we were comforted in your comfort; and exceedingly the more we joyed for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was set at ease by you all.

14 (2 Cor. 5.) Therefore, if I have boasted any thing to him concerning you, I am not ashamed: (2 Cor. 7.) for as we spoke all things concerning you in truth, so also our boasting which was before Titus, is found a truth.

15 And his tender affection is more abundant toward you, while he remembereth the obedience of you all, and how ye received him with fear and trembling.

16 I rejoice then, that I have confidence in you in every thing. The apostle expressed himself in this manner, to shew his affection towards the Corinthians: For, as he told them, chap. ii. 2 If I should make you sorry, who is it really, that maketh me glad, unless the same who is made sorry by me.

Ver. 10.—1. Worketh out (metaconeta) a change of conduct unto salvation (metageune) not to be repented of. The first word, metaconeta, properly denotes such change of one's opinion concerning some action which he hath done, not as a change of conduct to the better. But the latter word, metageune, signifies the putting to another use, which he hath done, though it is not so much as a change of conduct, but with an alteration of conduct. The two words, however, are used indiscriminately in the LXX, for a change of conduct, and for grief on account of what hath been done.

2. But the sorrow of the world wrought out death. The apostle means here to have had in his eyes those who, through excessive grief arising from worldly considerations, are driven to despair, and kill themselves; as did Ahabophel, Judges, and others. There is in this clause an elegant contrast between salvation, or eternal life, wrought out by reformation, and eternal death, produced by sinful actions not forsaken.

Ver. 11.—1. What carefulness it wrought in you. In describing the effects of the sorrow of the Corinthians, the apostle speaks of the emotions of their minds, without mentioning the objects of these emotions. This he did, as Locke observes, from modesty, and from respect to the Corinthians. Calvin and others suppose, that the seven particulars mentioned in this verse are the characters of true repentance; and that they are to be found in every real penitent. But I rather think he describes the repentance of the different sorts of persons in Corinth who had offended, according to the part they had acted in the affair in question.

2. Yes, displeasure. The word ayprakatav is properly denoted

CHAPTER VIII.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations in this Chapter.

The directions which the apostle in his former letter gave to the Corinthians, concerning the collection for the saints in Judea, had not, it seems, been fully complied with. At the persuasion of Titus, indeed, they had begun that collection; but they had not finished it when he left Corinth; owing, perhaps, to the opposition made by

8. Yes, fear.—By this, some commentators understand fear of the punishment which the apostle had threatened to inflict on the impenitent, 1 Cor. iv. 21. To this agrees what is mentioned, ver. 16.

1. Yes, punishment.—This sense the word nuntinthis hath, 1 Pet. ii. 16. The sincere part of the Corinthian church, strongly impressed with the apostle's letter, had, accordingly to his command, expressed to the Corinthians the insensitiveness of the person. This is the punishment which he here speaks of. And therefore the countenance which they had given to the collection, and the manner in which they had made them sorry, and of which he speaks with so much delicacy in this passage.

4. Have shown yourselves to be now pure in this matter.—Here Whity's remark is, 'That true repentance from sin clears us from the guilt of it, not only in the sight of God, but man; so that it is both uncharitable and unchristian to stigmatize or reproach any person for the sin we know or believe he has truly repented of.' Ver. 19. Nor for his sake who suffered the wrong.—From this it appears that the person who had suffered the injury from his son was still alive. The son, therefore, by concerting with his father's wife, to the guilt of incest added that of ingratitude to his father.

Ver. 16. I rejoice then, that I have confidence in you in every thing. It is an object of Osipheus, to bring out in full light this part of his letter, expressed his good opinion of the Corinthians, and mentioned his having praised them to Titus, to prepare them for his exhortations in the two following chapters, concerning the collection for the saints in Judea. His address, therefore, in this part of his letter is admirable; especially as, in commending the Corinthians, he expressed himself in a very handsome manner, and agreeably to the good opinion which he now entertained of them.
the faction, or to the disturbances which the faction had raised in that church. Wherefore, to stir up the sincere among the Corinthians to finish what they had so well begun, the apostle in this chapter set before them the example of the Macedonian churches, I suppose the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Benea, who, without regarding their great poverty, occasioned by persecution mentioned 1 Thess. ii. 14. had contributed beyond their ability, being much inclined to that good work by their own benevolent disposition, ver. 1, 2, 3.—and had entreated the apostle to receive their gift, and carry it to Jerusalem, ver. 4, 5.—His exhortation to the Corinthians on this occasion, Acts xiv. 19, would be the most regarded by them, that it immediately followed the many commendations given them for their love and obedience. See chap. vii. 16. note. Wherefore, in the persuasion that they would now be hearty in the affair, the apostle told them he had entreated Titus, that as he had begun, so he would finish that good work among them, ver. 6.—adding, that as they abounded in every other grace, and entertained great love to him their spiritual father, he hoped they would abound in that grace also, ver. 7.—This, however, he did not speak as an injunction, because works of charity must be voluntarily performed; but that they might emulate the forwardness of the Macedonians, and shew the sincerity of their love and gratitude to that father, ver. 8.—And that they might persuade them to part with some of their riches for relieving the saints, he told them, they were well acquainted with the greatness of the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich, ver. 9.—He then gave it as his opinion, that they ought to finish these collections speedily, seeing they had begun them the last year, ver. 10.—none of them postponing the matter any longer, on pretence of inability, ver. 11.—because God regards the willingness of the giver, more than the greatness of his gift, ver. 12.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VIII.—1 Now, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God which is given to the churches of Macedonia; 2 That, in a great trial of affliction, the overflowing of their joy, (sux. 215,) notwithstanding their deep poverty, hath overflowed in the riches of their liberality; 3 For according to their power, (I bear witness,) nay, beyond their power, they were willing of themselves; 4 With much earnestness requesting us that we would receive the gift and the fellowship of the ministry, which is to the saints. 5 And not as we feared; but first gave themselves to the Lord, (sux. 213,) and then to us by the will of God.

Ver. 1.—1 Make known to you the grace of God.—Because the word translated grace is in ver. 4. rendered by our translators a gift; and that meaning evidently, ver. 6, 7, 18; also, because the gift of God is an Hebraism for a very great gift, this verse may be translated, make known to you the exceeding great gift which is in the gift of God; 1 Thess. i. 11, 12; namely, to the churches in Judea. Yet I have retained the common translation, supposing the apostle to mean only the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and from the gifts of the Spirit, so wrought in their minds, that, notwithstanding their extreme poverty, it moved them to show great liberality in their gifts to the saints in Judea, from whom the gospel came to them. 3 Their liberality was not the effect of my entreaty; for according to their ability, (I bear them witness,) yes, beyond their ability, they were willing of themselves, without my soliciting them. 4 For, speedily finishing their collection, they earnestly requested me to receive the money, and perform their share of the ministry to the saints, by carrying their gift to Jerusalem, and delivering it in their name to the elders, to be distributed to the poor brethren in Judea. 5 And not did, as we feared, excuse themselves on account of their poverty; but first gave themselves to follow Christ in this matter, and then to us, as we shall see what was told us was the will of God.

CHAP. VIII.—1 Now, brethren, to shew the good opinion I have of you, I make known to you the gracious disposition which hath been given to the churches in the province of Macedonia, hoping ye will follow their example; 2 Thus, during a great trial by persecution, their exceeding joy arising from the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and from the gifts of the Spirit, so wrought in their minds, that, notwithstanding their extreme poverty, it moved them to show great liberality in their gifts to the saints in Judea, from whom the gospel came to them. 3 Their liberality was not the effect of my entreaty: for according to their ability, (I bear them witness,) yes, beyond their ability, they were willing of themselves, without my soliciting them. 4 For, speedily finishing their collection, they earnestly requested me to receive the money, and perform their share of the ministry to the saints, by carrying their gift to Jerusalem, and delivering it in their name to the elders, to be distributed to the poor brethren in Judea. 5 And not did, as we feared, excuse themselves on account of their poverty; but first gave themselves to follow Christ in this matter, and then to us, as we shall see what was told us was the will of God.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VIII.—1 Now, brethren, to shew the good opinion I have of you, I make known to you the gracious disposition which hath been given to the churches in the province of Macedonia, hoping ye will follow their example; 2 Thus, during a great trial by persecution, their exceeding joy arising from the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and from the gifts of the Spirit, so wrought in their minds, that, notwithstanding their extreme poverty, it moved them to show great liberality in their gifts to the saints in Judea, from whom the gospel came to them. 3 Their liberality was not the effect of my entreaty; for according to their ability, (I bear them witness,) yes, beyond their ability, they were willing of themselves, without my soliciting them. 4 For, speedily finishing their collection, they earnestly requested me to receive the money, and perform their share of the ministry to the saints, by carrying their gift to Jerusalem, and delivering it in their name to the elders, to be distributed to the poor brethren in Judea. 5 And not did, as we feared, excuse themselves on account of their poverty; but first gave themselves to follow Christ in this matter, and then to us, as we shall see what was told us was the will of God.
6 This moved us to entreat Titus, that as he had formerly begun, so he would also finish the same gift among you likewise.

7 (2 Cor. 8.1.) Now, as ye abound in every grace, in faith, and speech, and knowledge, and all diligence, and in your love to us, I wish that ye may abound in this grace also.

8 I speak not this as an injunction, but (2 Cor. 7.11.) on account of the diligence of others, and as proving the sincerity of your love.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, (Phil. 2.6, 7.) that ye through his poverty might be rich. 10 And herein I give my opinion (2 Cor. 8.9.) that this is profitable for you, who have formerly begun, not only to do, but also to be willing since the last year.

11 At present, therefore, finish the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so also let there be to finish from what ye have.

12 For if a willingness of mind be present, according to what any one hath, he is well accepted, not according to what he hath.

13 (2 Cor. 8.8.) However, I mean not that case should be to others, and distress to you:

14 But (2 Cor. 8.16.) on account of equality, that at the present time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that at another time their abundance also may be a supply for your want, (v., 9.) so as there may be equality.

15 As it is written, (Ex. xvi. 18.) He who gathered much had nothing over; and he who gathered little had no lack.

16 Now thanks be to God, who hath put the same earnest care concerning you into the heart of Titus.

17 For his exhortation, indeed, he accepted; but, being more diligent, of his own accord he is come unto you.

18 And with him we have sent the brother whose praise by the gospel is throughout all the churches, 19 fear, because the apostle cannot be supposed to say, that he hoped the Macedonians would not make the collections.

20 Ver. 2. The sincerity.—It may be a sincere thing. But the latter adjective is put here for the substantive.

21 Ver. 3. It is difficult to say, whether the Father created all things by him, and for him, and subjected all things to his dominion. Wherefore, if he pleased, his children live in the greatest splendour and opulence. Let it be executed by his ministers; or it may signify his original greatness; and poor, his humble condition on earth.

22 Ver. 7. He who had no will to be willing. The word being is mentioned as something greater than to do, it imports, that the Corinthians had shown a great willingness, and must finish the collection since the last year, after Titus delivered to them the apostle's first letter.

23 Ver. 8. In the last year.—As εἰσελθείς (Luke 1.70.) Acts iii. 19. The verb is translated since the world began, καθήκονται may be translated since the last year. Besides the circumstances of the affair require this translation, the apostle has frequently used the same expression in his communication to the Corinthians, was sent to them by Titus in the end of the last year, that is, five or six months only before this letter was written. In this verse the apostle tactfully blamed the Corinthians as having acted inconsistently, who, on receiving the apostle's letter, in the end of the former year, not only begun, but appeared to have great willingness to finish the collections, and afterwards grew cold and negligent in the affair.

24 Ver. 10. That is (2 Cor. 8.8.) the present time your abundance. 2 G
II. CORINTHIANS.

19. However, that is not my only reason for sending him. He was also chosen of the churches to be our fellow-traveller with this gift, which is ministered by us to the glory of the Lord himself, and of the declaration of your ready mind. 20. Taking care of this, that no one should blame us in this abundance which is ministered by us. 21. Premeditating things conspiciously, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. (See Rom. xii. 17. note.) 22. And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes found diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which ye have in you.

23. (Ker. 140.) If any inquire concerning Titus, as is my partner and fellow-labourer towards you; (ver.) or if our brethren as inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ.

24. Wherefore, the proof of your love, and of our boasting concerning you, show ye us, (as, 145.) before them, and (as) before the face of the churches.

Lake, whose gospel was well known throughout the churches of Macedonia and Achaia at the time Paul wrote the second epistle to the Corinthians, A. D. 57. See harmony of the Gospels, Freyling. Observ. p. 63. Ed. edit.—From Acts xvi. 10. 11. where Luke uses the phrase. Ver. It appears, that he was with Paul and Silas, when they passed over from Asia, the first time, into Europe; and that he went with Paul to Philippi, ver. 15. But from Acts xvi. 1. where Luke says this style, we learn that he remained at Philippi. But Paul and Silas went to Amphilochus and Apollos, and did not join them again until Paul came with the collection from Corinth to Philippi, in his way to Jerusalem, six years after his first departure from Philippi, Acts xix. 2. Here we may suppose Luke employed himself, during these six years, in composing and making copies of his gospel, which he may have sent to the churches in these parts. And if he was the brother whom Paul sent with Titus to Corinth, he may have remained there till Paul arrived; and when Paul, on account of the lying in wait of the Jews, determined to return through Macedonia, Luke may have gone before him to Philippi. It is plain from Acts xx. 6. that he joined Paul and the messengers of the churches in that city, and went with them to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Caesarea, he attended the apostle, and then accompanied him to Rome.

Ver. 19. Who was also chosen of the churches, &c. This is the second character of the person who was sent by the apostle with Titus to Corinth. He was chosen by the churches of Macedonia to accompany Paul in his return to Corinth, to witness his delivering the gift. This character likewise agrees very well with Luke. For having resided so long at Philippi, he was well known to the Macedonian churches, who, by taking him as their messenger to Jerusalem, showed their great respect for him. The style of the Apostle indeed shows, that Luke did not accompany Paul in his return to Macedonia from Corinth with the collections. But he may have left Corinth, and have gone to Philippi before the apostle, for reasons not now known to us.

Ver. 20. Taking care of this. The word προσφερήσας sometimes signifies the furnishing or altering of the sails of a ship, to change her course; or, as Luke may avoid rocks or other dangers lying in her way. Here it is used in the metaphorical sense, for taking care that no one should find fault with the apostle, as unwilling in the management of the collection.

Ver. 21. We have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes, &c. This brother is supposed to be some of the churches.

Apache, who, though he was unwilling to go to Corinth when Paul sent with him his first letter, 1 Cor. xvi. 12, yet hearing of the reception of the Corinthians, he was now willing to accompany Titus in his return. But there is no evidence that Apache was with the apostle at this time in Macedonia. This is a considerable difference from the case of whom, more than of any other of his assistants, the apostle could with truth say, that he had oftentimes found him diligent in many things for the gospel; for from the time of the council of Jerusalem, he had not had a personal interview with Paul, to visit the Gentile churches, he seems to have been his constant companion for several years. Nevertheless, it is not certain that Silas was with the apostle on this occasion, for his name is not mentioned among those who accompanied him to Jerusalem, Acts xix. 5.—Others think Timothy the brother spoke of, to whom likewise the character of diligent belonged. But they forget that Timothy joined the apostle in writing this second epistle, consequently cannot be supposed to have been with him to Corinthians. According to others, this brother was Sotheches, who having, as is supposed, been appointed by the apostle to go to Corinth after his conversion, was well known to the Corinthians, and a person of great authority among them. Lastly, some think the brother whose name is mentioned in this verse, was one of the numerous collection-bearers of which mention is made in this verse, who were two of the messengers of the Macedonian churches, whose names are mentioned Acts xvi. 4. But from 2 Cor. xii. 19, it appears, that they did not go before Paul, but accompany him to Corinth.

22. Upon the great confidence which he hath in you. Our translators supply here the words ισχυείς, connecting the clause with the first member of the sentence. I have sent them with our brother, upon the great confidence which I have, &c. But the words I have supplied are more proper.

Ver. 23. They are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ. The apostle’s example, in doing justice to the characters of his younger fellow-labourers, is highly worthy of the imitation of the more aged ministers of the gospel. They sought to introduce their younger brethren to the esteem and confidence of the people, by giving them the praise which is due to them. For, as the elders of the church of Ephesus, and the elders of the church at Smyrna, put their names to their epistles, so the younger brethren, by sending forward others, who, on account of their faithfulness and diligence in the ministry, will in time merit the illustrious appellation of being the glory of Christ.

CHAPTER IX.

The apostle in this chapter continued his discourse concerning the collection, not to persuade the Corinthians to undertake the work; that, as he observed, was not needful. Ver. 18. He knew their willingness, and had boasted to the Macedonians that Achaia was prepared since the end of the last year; for so the apostle believed at the time he boasted of them, ver. 2.—But now, being informed by Titus that a good deal still remained to be done, he had sent the brethren mentioned in the preceding chapter, to encourage them to go on, that his boasting concerning their being prepared might not be rendered false, but that at length the collection might be completed. For if the Macedonian brethren, who were coming with him to Corinth, should find their collection not finished, he, not to say the Corinthians, would be ashamed of his confident boasting concerning them, ver. 4.—He had judged it necessary, therefore, to entreat the brethren to go before him to Corinth, to persuade them to complete their collection, that what they should give might appear freely given, and not as forced from them by his presence, ver. 5. — In the mean time, to encourage them to give liberally, he put them in mind of the rule, according to which the rewards of the future life are to be bestowed: He that soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly, &c. ver. 6. — Then desired every one of them to consult his own heart, and to give what he thought proper, without grudging, ver. 7. — Because God loves a cheerful giver, and can supply men abundantly with this world's goods, both for their own maintenance, and to enable them to do works of charity, ver. 8, 9. — Further, he observed, that such a gift from so many Gentile churches, not only would supply the wants of the brethren in Judea, being a demonstration of the affection which the Gentiles bare to them, would occasion many thanksgivings, ver. 12. — The Jews glorifying God for the professed subscription of the Gentiles to the gospel, of which they would have so clear a proof, ver. 13. — Also praying for the Gentiles, whom they would love as their brethren on account of the grace of God bestowed on them, ver. 14. — Not only having the gladness of a man's charity, as a body or church, being in all respects a most happy event, the apostle returned thanks to God for his unspeakable gift Jesus Christ, through whom it had been accomplished, ver. 15.

I cannot finish this Illustration without observing, in praise of the apostle Paul, that there never was penned, by any one else, a work more full of instruction, more full of exhortation, more full of works of charity, than that which he addressed to the Corinthians in this and the preceding chapter: The example of the Christians in Macedonia, who, notwithstanding they were themselves in very straitened circumstances, had contributed liberally towards the relief of the saints in Judea: — The great love of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, though he was rich, yet for their sake became poor, that they through his poverty might be rich — God's acceptance of works of charity, not according to the greatness of what is bestowed, but according to the willingness with which it is bestowed: — The reward which God will confer on beneficent men in the life to come, in proportion to the number and greatness of the good actions which they have performed in this life: — His exceeding superfluity with a sufficiency of this world's goods for their own maintenance, and for enabling them to continue their good offices to the indigent: — His blessing their ordinary labour for that end: — The joy which is occasioned to the poor whose wants are relieved by the alms of the charitable partakers in the thanksgivings which other good men will offer to God when they see works of this sort done, but especially thanksgivings to God from the poor who are relieved in their straits by the charitable: — Their gratitude towards their benefactors, expressed in earnest prayers to God for their happiness; — and the cordial union which is produced between the rich and the poor by their intercourse of good offices: — All these considerations are displayed, in this excellent exhortation, with a tenderness and feeling, which nothing but a heart filled with goodness was capable of expressing.

With the above-mentioned affecting motives, which are suited to every ingenuous mind, the apostle intermixed a variety of other incitements to works of charity, adapted to the particular circumstances of the Corinthian brethren, which, therefore, must have made a strong impression on them: — Such as their former readiness to do good works: — Their being enriched with every spiritual gift; a kind of riches vastly superior to the riches which the apostle wished them to impart to their needy brethren: — Their love to him their spiritual father, whose reasonable service it was that they should serve as a holy temple or holy church, having been made so by his grace: — His past boasts of their good dispositions to the churches of Macedonia: — His anxiety that the messengers from these churches, who were coming to Corinth, might find them such as he had represented them: — And the shame with which the apostle himself, as well as the Corinthians, would be overwhelmed, if, when the Macedonian brethren were about to receive assistance by way of grace, they were found to have been negligent in making the collection for the poor in Judea. He therefore entreated them to prove the truth of their love to him, and of his boasting concerning them, before these worthy strangers, and before the churches whose messengers they were, by their finishing the collection with cheerfulness, that what they gave might appear to be a gift willingly bestowed, and not a thing exacted from them by his importance.

Upon the whole, if any minister of the gospel, who is himself animated by a benevolent disposition towards mankind, has occasion to excite his people to works of charity, let him study with due attention the eighth and ninth chapters of St. Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians; for nowhere Paul is he found so fully to mould his exhortation on, as that which is exhibited in these excellent chapters.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IX. — 1 But indeed, concerning the propriety of the ministry to the saints in Judea, it is superfluous for me to write to you. What I have now in view is, to persuade you to finish speedily what you have begun.

2 For I am so convinced of your willingness, that in the persuasion ye had actually made the collection, I boasted of you to the Macedonians, that the churches of Achaia were prepared since the last year. And my account of your zeal in this matter, hath stirred up very many to follow your example.

3 For ye have not finished your collection, I have sent the brethren (chap. viii. 18, 23.) to inform you of my coming, that our boasting which is on your behalf may not be rendered false in this particular, by your making unnecessary delays; but that, as I said, ye may be prepared when I come:

VER. 2. That Achaia was prepared since the last year. — So the apostle thought, when he boasted of the Corinthians to the Macedonians. For in his former letter, which was written in the end of the previous year, first of all, he thought that a certain man had given it in charge to Titus, who carried that letter, to encourage them in the work. Besides the Corinthians having expressed the greatest respect for the apostle in the letter which they sent to him, and the messengers who brought that letter having assured him of their disposition to obey him in every thing, he did not doubt of their having complied with his request. And therefore, when he went into Macedonia the following spring, after Pentecost, he said the Macedonian churches, that Achaia was prepared since the end of the last year, see 1 Thess. i. 7. note.

VER. 3. That our boasting which was concerning you. — When the apostle left Ephesus, he went into Macedonia, in the expectation of meeting Titus on his return from Corinth. In Macedonia he remained some months before Titus arrived; and during that time,
II. CORINTHIANS.

4 Last, perhaps, if the Macedonians come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we may not ye) should be put to shame (w) by this confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to entreat the brethren, that they would go before to you, and预备 your place, and which was an- announcement (xownik, 33.) gift, that the same might be thus ready as a gift, and not as a thing extorted. 1

6 Now this I say, He who soweth sparingly, sparingly also shall reap; and he who soweth bountifully, bountifully also shall reap.

7 Every one, according as he purposeth in his heart, ought to give, not with grief, nor by constraint; for God loveth a cheerful giver.

8 And God is able to make every blessing abound to you; that in every thing always having all sufficiency, ye may abound in every good work:

9 As it is written, (Psalm cxxii. 9.) He hath dispersed; 1 he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever.

10 Now, may he who supplieth seed to the sower, and bountifully multiply thy seed sown, and increase the produce of your righteousness.

11 That ye may be enriched 1 in every thing to all liberality, which worketh out through us thanksgiving to God.

12 For the ministry of this public service is not only full of the abundance of the sacrificial gifts of the saints, but also abundant in many thanksgivings to God:

13 They, through the proof of this ministry, glorifying God for your profession subjection (w) to the gospel of Christ, and for the liberality of your communication to them, and to all.

14 (Know every one) And in their prayer for you, ardently loving you, 1 on account of the exceeding grace of God bestowed (w) on you.

we may suppose, he exhorted the Macedonians churches to make the ministry of their public service a work of righteousness of the readiness of the Corinthians.

Ver. 4. By this confident boasting.—The word πρεσβυτερία is often used by the LXX. to denote confident expectations, or firm hope. Our translators, therefore, have rendered it properly here by confidence. Bessus's translation, in his Notes, refers glorification—this foundation of boasting. The Vulgate, substantia gloriae—matter of boasting. The literal translation is, 'in this confidence of boasting.' Ver. 5. Not as (πρεσβυτερία) a thing extorted.—Estius thinks the proper translation of this clause is, 'Not as of covetousness,' because, according to him, the apostle's meaning is that the gifts given by the Corinthians should be large, as proceeding from a liberal disposition, and not small, as proceeding from covetousness. But the meaning of the Greek word, in its present use, means supplying the preposition of—Theophylact interprets this by a Greek word signifying circumstanced, in which he is followed by Erasmus. But Stephen, in his Concordance, citing this verse translates it, exteritum aliquud—a thing extorted—which I take to be the proper translation. See chap. ii. 11, note 1.

Ver. 6. To make every blessing.—The word σωματικά, which I have translated blessing, our translators have rendered by the word δωρέα. I. 15 and chap. vi. 4. by the word gift. But used here to denote temporal gifts or blessings, is evident from the remaining part of the verse, and from the scope of the apostle's argument. The word εἴρημα is a generic term of the words every and all in this passage renders it beautifully emphatical.

5 Sufficiency.—The Greek word κατάλληλον properly signifies sufficiency in one's self.

Ver. 9.—1. As it is written, He hath dispersed.—This is an allusion to the word seed, sowing it plentifully, ver. 10. And the image beautifully represents both the good which will richly the liberal distribute their alms, and the many needy persons on whom they bestow them.

2. His righteousness.—The Hebrews used the word righteousness of God, and the place whereunto the Gentiles are called, chap. i. 26. 2255 considered the Gentiles as unclean, and hated them till they were circumcised, Gal. ii. 13. The apostle, knowing the enmity of the brethren in Jerusalem would refuse the present from the Gentile churches, which he was bringing them; and therefore he requested the prayers of the Roman brethren, that the service he was performing to Jerusalem might be well received, Rom. xvi. 31. In performing that service, the apostle showed great zeal, in the hope that the Jews, united between them and the Gentiles, would join in cordial friendship with their Gentile brethren, when they found all the Gentiles honouring them as the ancient people of God, and showing them such expressions of respect. Viewed in this light, the project of the collection is a noble instance of the apostle's comprehensive reach of thought and of his indefatigable activity in securing whatever good design his benevolence prompted him to form.

Ver. 13. Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift. — Because Christ is not mentioned in the context, there are some who, by the unspeakable gift for which the apostle thanked God, understand the gift of God's grace bestowed on the Macedonians and by that grace had been disposed to contribute liberally for the relief of the saints. But it may be doubted, whether the apostle would call that gift unspeakable. So grand an epithet may with more propriety be applied to Christ. Besides, the happy effects of a cordial friendship existing between the Jewish and Gentile churches, the unity of the whole body of Christ, the union of faith, worship, and church, being the object of the apostle's present thoughts, it was natural for him to break forth in a thanksgiving to God, for Christ the author of that happy society to which the believers which mankind enjoy. And as these blessings are so many and so great, that they cannot be fully declared in human language, Christ, the author of them all, may well be called' God's unspeakable gift.'

CHAPTER X.

Hitherto St. Paul's discourse was chiefly directed to those at Corinth who acknowledged his apostleship, and who had obeyed his orders, signified to them in his former letter. But in this, and the remaining chapters, he addressed the prayers of the Roman brethren, that the service he was performing to Jerusalem might be well received, Rom. xvi. 31. The different characters, therefore, of the two sorts of persons who composed the Corinthian church, as was formerly observed, (Pref. sect. 2.) must be carefully attended to; otherwise this part of the apostle will appear a direct contradiction to what goes before.

The false teacher, it seems, and the faction, ridiculing the apostle's threatenings in his former letter, had said, that he was all meekness and humility when present among them, but exceeding bold by letters when absent. This they represented as wise carnal policy. For, said they, being conscious of his own weakness, he does not choose, when present, to provoke us to make too narrow a search into his character, lest it should lead to disagreeable discoveries. The apostle, therefore, in answer to that sarcasm, began his address to the faction with telling them in irony, that the very same Paul himself, who in presence was humble among them, but bold when absent, was ashamed when before them, but bold when absent, had besought them; not, however, by his own meekness, which they ridiculed, but by the meekness and gentleness of Christ. And what he besought of them was, that he might not be obliged to be bold, in the manner he had resolved to be bold, against some, who, on account of his meekness when present with them, had calumniated him as a Harlot who was after the flesh, ver. 5. But though he was in the flesh, he assured them he did not war against idolaters and unbelievers with fleshly weapons, but with weapons far more powerful, bestowed on him by God, for the purpose of casting down all the bulwarks raised up by worldly policy for the defence of idolatry and infidelity. These mighty weapons were the miraculous powers and spiritual gifts which Christ had conferred on him as his apostle, ver. 4. 5. — He farther told them, that although he seldom used his miraculous power in punishing unbelievers, he had that power in readiness for punishing all disobedience in them who professed to be the disciples of Christ, and particularly for punishing such of the Corinthians as called his apostleship in question, and had cautioned them against estimating things according to their outward appearance; and told them, if the false teacher believed himself to be Christ's minister, he ought, from the proofs which St. Paul had given of his apostleship, to have concluded that even he was Christ's apostle, notwithstanding the meanness of his outward appearance, ver. 7. — For which reason, said he, if I should now boast somewhat more than I have hitherto done, of the power which Christ hath given me as an apostle, I am sure, when that power shall be tried, I shall not be put to shame by its failing me, ver. 8. — Then, in ridicule of the false teacher, who had said that he was bold towards them by letters when absent, he added, in the highest strain of irony, But I must forbear boasting of my power, that I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters, ver. 9, 10. — And because the false teacher was a great pretender to reasoning, the apostle desired him, by reasoning from the effects of his power, already shown in the punishment of the inconstant person, to conclude, that such as he was in speech by letters when absent, the same also he would be in deed when present, ver. 11.

Having thus threatened to punish the false teacher and his adherents, the apostle told them ironically, that, to be sure, he must not rank and compare himself with their learned teacher, who was so full of his own praise. It seems that impostor had boasted among the Corinthians, of his great natural talents and acquired accomplishments. But the apostle told them, his high opinion of himself proceeded from his measuring himself only with himself, and from his comparing himself with himself; by which method of measuring himself, but humble and low in his own estimation, he did not understand himself, ver. 12. — Next, because the false teacher boasted of the great things he had done at Corinth, the apostle told them, that for his part he would not boast of things done out of the bounds prescribed to him by God; but would only say, that, according to these bounds, he had come to Corinth in an orderly course of preaching the gospel to persons who had never heard it before, ver. 13, 14. — So that, when he boasted of things which he had done among the Corinthians, he did not boast of other men's labours, like the false teacher, who had intruded himself into a church planted by another; and therefore, agreeably to the rule prescribed by God, the apostle hoped, when their faith was increased, to be by them enlarged with respect to his bounds, ver. 15. — so as to preach the gospel in the regions beyond them, where no other person had ever preached, ver. 16. — Lastly, to shew the folly of the false teacher more fully, the apostle concluded this part of his discourse with observing, that the preacher of the gospel who boasted should be reminded of this, that he preaches in the manner the Lord allows, ver. 17. — Because, not he who commendeth himself is the approved teacher, but he whom the Lord commendeth, ver. 18.

From this passage we learn two things: First, That the apostles were specially appointed to preach the gospel in countries where it had not been preached before.
This work was assigned to them, not only because they enjoyed the highest degree of inspiration, and possessed the greatest miraculous powers for confirming the gospel, but because they alone had the power of conferring the spiritual gifts, whereby their converts were enabled in their absence to edify themselves and others, and even to convert unbelievers. Secondly, That, in preaching the gospel, the apostles were not to pass by, or neglect, any nation that lay in their way, where the gospel had not been preached before, but were to proceed in an orderly course, from one country to another, after having preached in each; that the light of the gospel might be imparted to all.—According to this rule, the false teacher, who had come from Judea to Corinth, not in the orderly course of preaching in countries where the gospel had not been preached before, but by a direct and speedy journey, perhaps in the expectation of becoming rich by preaching in such a populous and wealthy city as Corinth, shewed himself to be no minister of Christ; and having intruded himself into a church which had been planted by Paul, he had not the least reason to boast of his labours among the Corinthians.

New Translation.

CHAP. X.—1 Now I, the same Paul who, when present, foretell, am humble among you, but when absent am bold toward you, beseech you by the meekness and clemency of Christ.

2 (a) And I request, that when present I may not be bold, with that confidence whereby I conclude to be bold against some who conclude us to be real persons who walk according to the flesh. 1

3 For, though we walk in the flesh, we do not war according to the flesh. 1

4 For the weapons of our warfare are not fleshly, (43.) but exceeding powerful 2 for the overturning of strongholds. 3

5 We overthrow reasonings, and every high thing 3 raised up against the knowledge of God, and lead captives 4 every thought to the obedience of Christ. 4

6 And are prepared to punish all disobedience, when your obedience is completed. 2

7 Do ye look on things according to appearances? If any one is confident in himself? 3

Ver. 2. Some conclude us to be real persons, &c.—In this and the preceding verse, the apostle's enemies at Corinth, who derided him as falsely pretending to supernatural powers, were warred against, and the words, that they were not influenced by respect of persons, but set the Lord at the head of all, in order to the overturning of strongholds, were very fine irony, wherein their own taunting speeches were ridiculed; it must have stung them sensibly to find themselves thus treated. 1 See 1 Cor. x. 13. As for the reasonings, &c., some think the apostle's meaning is, That he did not use the vain reasonings and sophistications, in the Platonic art of the Greeks, as the false teacher seemed to have done. 1

Ver. 4.—1 But exceeding powerful.—Our translators have rendered exceedingly powerful. Acts vii. 22, as a superlative, exceedingly fair. Wherefore, the clause οὐδὲν τι καταδίκησα may here be translated very powerful. 1 See Rom. iv. 27. The powerful weapons of the apostle's speech, were the gifts of inspiration and miracles, the faculty of speaking all kinds of languages, and the ability of communicating miraculous powers and spiritual gifts to others. These mighty weapons the apostle opposes, in this verse, to the fleshly or weak weapons of speech, and speech, and military engines, and cunning stratagems, and false speeches, with which the enemies of this world carry on their wars. 1

2 For the overturning of strongholds. —The phrase θρόνους ἀνατρέπων, denotes the casting down of strongholds by means of military engines. Now, as the strongholds of which the apostle speaks, were demolished by preaching, there is here, perhaps, an allusion to the burning of the walls of Jericho, by the priests blowing their trumpets, and by the people's shouting. Josh. vi. 20. 1

Ver. 5.—1 But exceeding powerful.—Our translators have rendered exceedingly powerful. Acts vii. 22, as a superlative, exceedingly fair. Ver. 6.—1 But exceeding powerful.—Our translators have rendered exceedingly powerful. Acts vii. 22, as a superlative, exceedingly fair. Wherefore, the clause οὐδὲν τι καταδίκησα may here be translated very powerful. 1 See Rom. iv. 27. The powerful weapons of the apostle's speech, were the gifts of inspiration and miracles, the faculty of speaking all kinds of languages, and the ability of communicating miraculous powers and spiritual gifts to others. Ver. 7.—1 Do ye look on things according to appearances? —Do ye judge of things according to appearance? 1—De ye judge of the qualifications and authority of the ministers of the gospel, by their persons, their education, their fluency of speech, the beauty of their persons, and the politeness of their manners? 1

2 If any war amongst you, and you are not confident in yourself; the apostle intimates, that the false teacher's base assurance of his own superiority was not founded but his own imagination.
that he is Christ's, let him, on the other hand, (288) reason this from himself, that as he is Christ's, so also we are Christ's.

9 And therefore, if I should boast somewhat more abundantly of our power, which the Lord hath given us for your edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed.

10 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.
11 For his letters, saith he, are indeed weighty and strong, but his bodily presence weak, and his speech contemptible.

12 (1 Cor. 9, 19.) But we dare not rank (1 Cor. 9, 19.) and compare ourselves with some who commend themselves, who besides laying claim to that character, among themselves measuring themselves, and comparing themselves with themselves, do not understand themselves.

13 Further, we will not boast (1 Cor. 15, 148.) of things not measured, but have come even to you, according to the measure of the line in which the God of measure hath allotted to us.

14 For we do not stretch ourselves beyond our line, as not reaching to you; but we are come as far as to you also in the gospel of Christ.

15 We do not boast (see ver. 12.) of things not measured, that is, of other men's labours; but of our own labours.

3. That as he is Christ's. By this the apostle did not acknowledge the false teacher to be a faithful minister of Christ. He had taken on himself the work of the ministry, and was by profession a servant of Christ. This Paul acknowledged, without entering into the consideration of his faithfulness. At the same time, he did not pretend to great powers of reasoning, the apostle desired him to reason this for himself. That if he was a minister of Christ, merely by profession, he should not be the one who, besides laying claim to that character, should exercise miraculous powers among the Corinthians, with a view to advance himself. In the list of the Corinthians, he had ordained himself the apostle, that he might cut off the incestuous person, not for the purpose of destroying him, but for preserving him from the contagion of his evil example. And he desired him not to call himself an apostle, but to give the name of Letters to one letter. The word letters, therefore, will show, that they might understand this. The apostle had written only one letter to the Corinthians at the time he said this. His letter which was weighty, is his first epistle to the Corinthians.

8. For your edification, and not for your destruction. Here the apostle describes the nature and end of the letter. He had before said, (ver. 11.) that the apostle is speaking here of one teacher only. He had before weighty and strong letters referred to, he had spoken of those words sharply, and had threatened them in a very firm tone; particularly in chap. iv, 18—21. and the apostle had written to them about the same thing.

4. But his bodily presence weak. From this it would appear, that St. Paul was either a man of small stature, or that there was something in his address which was unsuited to him as an apostle. In the Philippians to Lucian, Tpeth, who said he was baptized by him, calls him the big, stock-bodied Galatian. And the apostle speaks of his own weakness, the Gal. iv, 13.

5. And his speech contemptible. 384—385, venerabiliter. Inferiorly considered. But this meaning is worth of being considered, contemptible, and the apostle himself speaks of his own weakness of the flesh, Gal. iv, 13.

12. (1 Cor. 9, 19.) But we dare not rank (1 Cor. 9, 19.) and compare ourselves with some who commend themselves, who besides laying claim to that character, among themselves measuring themselves, and comparing themselves with themselves, do not understand themselves.

13. Further, we will not boast (1 Cor. 15, 148.) of things not measured, but have come even to you, according to the measure of the line in which the God of measure hath allotted to us.

14. For we do not stretch ourselves beyond our line, as not reaching to you; but we are come as far as to you also in the gospel of Christ.

15. I say, I do not, like some others, take praise to myself on account of things not allotted to me, that is, of other men's labours; but take praise to myself on account of the grace of God in me, as a herald of Christ, as it were, in the gospel.

8. For your edification, and not for your destruction. Here the apostle describes the nature and end of the letter. He had before said, that the apostle is speaking here of one teacher only. He had before weighty and strong letters referred to, he had spoken of those words sharply, and had threatened them in a very firm tone; particularly in chap. iv, 18—21. and the apostle had written to them about the same thing.

4. But his bodily presence weak. From this it would appear, that St. Paul was either a man of small stature, or that there was something in his address which was unsuited to him as an apostle. In the Philippians to Lucian, Tpeth, who said he was baptized by him, calls him the big, stock-bodied Galatian. And the apostle speaks of his own weakness, the Gal. iv, 13.

5. And his speech contemptible. 384—385, venerabiliter. Inferiorly considered. But this meaning is worth of being considered, contemptible, and the apostle himself speaks of his own weakness of the flesh, Gal. iv, 13.

12. (1 Cor. 9, 19.) But we dare not rank (1 Cor. 9, 19.) and compare ourselves with some who commend themselves, who besides laying claim to that character, among themselves measuring themselves, and comparing themselves with themselves, do not understand themselves.

13. Further, we will not boast (1 Cor. 15, 148.) of things not measured, but have come even to you, according to the measure of the line in which the God of measure hath allotted to us.

14. For we do not stretch ourselves beyond our line, as not reaching to you; but we are come as far as to you also in the gospel of Christ.

15. I say, I do not, like some others, take praise to myself on account of things not allotted to me, that is, of other men's labours; but take praise to myself on account of the grace of God in me, as a herald of Christ, as it were, in the gospel.
but we have hope, when your faith is increased, to be by you enlarged with respect to our line into abundance;
16 To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you; and not in another man's line, to boast of things already prepared.
17 He then who beateth, let him boast in the Lord.
18 For he who commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

the edification and direction of it belongs only to him, and to the bishops and deacons ordained by him. Besides, this intruder, by pretending to more knowledge than Paul, and by assuming an air of superiority to his endeavoured to draw the Corinthians from following his doctrines and precepts. The false teacher, therefore, being every way culpable, the apostle humbled him, by setting him forth in his true colours, as a mean-spirited intruder, who decked himself with ornaments which belonged to another.
2. Enlarged with respect to our line (κατὰ παραφορὰν, see Phil. ii. 16, note) into abundance.]—The apostle hoped the Corinthians would soon be so well instructed, as to render it proper for him to leave them to the care of their stated teachers, and to preach the gospel in the countries beyond them, where the gospel had not been preached. He thus termed, his being enlarged with respect to his line into abundance.

Ver. 15.—The regions beyond you;—that is, the regions of Italy and Spain, whither we know the apostle intended to go. For in Laconia, Arcadia, and the other countries of Peloponnesus, which composed the Roman province of Achaea, he had already preached the gospel, as is plain from the inscription of both his letters to the Corinthians.
8. Boast of things already prepared.]—As in this passage the apostle contrasts his own behaviour with the behaviour of the false teacher, we may infer from the particulars mentioned, that that teacher took to himself great praise for having instructed the Corinthians more perfectly than he said Paul had done, and for having properly regulated the affairs of their church, which he pretended had been left in disorder by the apostle.

CHAPTER XI.

From the things written in this chapter it appears, that although the false teacher, on all occasions, took care to sound his own praise, he had represented Paul as guilty of the same thing, by pretending that he had nothing to boast of. The apostle, therefore, began with ironicaly requesting the Corinthians to bear with a little of his foolishness in praising himself, ver. 1. and for so doing he gave them this reason; He suspected their affections were estranged from him, through the callumness of his enemies. Such an estrangement he could not bear. Having by faith and holiness betrothed them to Christ, he was anxious to present them to him at the judgment, as a chaste virgin to her future husband, ver. 2. This he should not be able to do, if, believing the callumness of his enemies, they no longer considered him as an apostle. Also he was afraid, that as the serpent deceitfully Eve, so the false teacher, deceiving them, might corrupt them from the simplicity of the gospel, ver. 3. But their attachment to that teacher, he told them, was unreasonable, as he did not pretend to preach another Jesus, neither had they received from him a different spirit, nor a different gospel, ver. 4.

Having made this apology for what he was going to say in his own praise, he affirmed that he was in nothing inferior to the very greatest preachers, ver. 5. For although his enemies objected to him that he was unlearned in speech, he was not unlearned in the knowledge proper to a minister of the gospel; but, in the whole of his preaching and behaviour at Corinth, had shewed himself as able and faithful apostle of Christ, ver. 6. His enemies, indeed, upbraided him with not having supported the dignity of the apostolic office, as he ought to have done, by demanding maintenance from his disciples in Corinth. But he told them, he had committed no offence in that respect, when he humbled himself to work for his own maintenance among them, since he did it that they might be exalted, by having the gospel preached to them with the greater success, as a free gift, ver. 7. He took wages from other churches, the church at Philippi especially; but it was to do the Corinthians a service, by preaching the gospel to them free of expense, ver. 8. For on a particular occasion, when he was so much employed at Corinth that he had not time to work for his own maintenance, what he wanted the Philippian freely supplied; so that he had kept himself, and would keep himself from being burdensome to them, ver. 9. solemnly protesting, that no man should deprive him of that ground of boasting, in the regions of Achaea, ver. 10. This was so far from being the case, that he had formed, not from want of love to the Corinthians, ver. 11. but that he might cut off all opportunity from the false teacher and others, who desired an opportunity to speak evil of him, as one who preached the gospel for gain. Also that the false teacher, who in public pretended to imitate him in taking nothing for his preaching, (though in private he received gifts from individuals,) might be obliged to lay aside his hypocrisy, and, after the apostle's example, take nothing in private from any one, ver. 12. There was a peculiar propriety in the apostle's taking nothing from his disciples in Corinth, on account of his preaching; because, being an opulent city, it might have been said, that his motive for preaching so long there was to enrich himself. This indeed was the view of the false teacher, who, by receiving gifts in private, shewed himself to be a deceitful workman, although he assumed the appearance of a true apostle, by pretending to preach without taking any reward from the Corinthians. But his assuming that appearance was not to be wondered at, seeing Satan himself, on some occasions, puts on the appearance of an angel of light, ver. 13-16.

The apostle having such good reasons for condemning himself, he desired the faction, a second time, not to think him a fool for speaking in his own praise; or at least, as a fool to bear with him, that like the false teacher he might boast a little, ver. 16. For, said he ironically, to be sure that which I am going to speak, in this concern, is not bestowed on him, as he ought, but to the Lord, but as in foolishness, ver. 17.—In his former letter, the apostle had used this expression, chap. vii. 12. 'To the rest I speak, not the Lord.' This the false teacher misinterpreting, had maliciously turned into ridicule, by telling the Corinthians, that the praises which Paul bestowed on himself, he supposed the number of the things which the Lord did not speak. This sarcasm the apostle repeated in an ironical manner, to insinuate to the Corinthians, that the things which he spake in vindication of himself as an apostle, he spake by the commandment of Christ. Then added, seeing many, who are no apostles, press themselves for their supposed qualities, I, who am a real apostle of Christ, will likewise praise myself for my good qualities, ver. 19. Especially, as the apostle and his fellow-workers seek each other's good, glad to bear with faults, that they may have the pleasure of laughing at them, ver. 19. Now, said ye, are ye of such a bearing disposition, that if one enslave you, if one eat you up, if one take your goods, if one raise himself against you in wrath, if one even beat you on the face, ye bare it, ver. 30. This, it seems, was the insolent manner, in which the false teacher treated his adherents at Cerinthus, who bare it all with great silence. In his account, therefore, of the bearing disposition of the faction, the apostle gave the sincere part of the church a laughable picture of the wisdom of their wise brethren, in bearing. Further, he told them, that he was obliged to speak in his own praise, because he had been represented as a low born, weak, ill qualified teacher. But he affirmed, that on whatever account any one among them was bold in his own praise,

New Translation.

Chap. XI.-I wish ye could bear some little of my foolishness: ye were, even bear with me.

2 For I am jealous of you with a great jealousy; (8:9, 10, 11) because I have betrayed you one to another, to present you a chaste virgin to Christ.

3 But I am afraid, lest somehow, as the serpent beguiled Eve by her subtility, so your mind should be corrupted from the simplicity which is of God (8:12, 13) to Christ.

4 (Eis μου γόγνη) If, now indeed, he who is come, preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not received, another spirit which we have not embraced, another gospel which ye have not received from me, or a different gospel, which ye have not embraced, ye might well bear with him.

5 (8:9, 10) Yet I conclude I am in nothing behind the very greatest of the apostles. (8:11)

6 (8:10) And even if I am an unlearned and ignorant man in speech, yet I am not in knowledge; for God is manifest in me by the things which I speak in every occasion we have been made manifest by all things (8:12, 13) among you.

Commentary.

Chap. XI.-Though he is not an approved teacher who alone commands himself, I wish ye could bear some little of my foolishness in boasting. Ye were, even bear with me.

2 This indulgence I expect from you on your own account: For I am exceedingly jealous concerning you; because, having converted you, I have betrayed you by faith and holiness to one husband, and am solicitous to present you, in affection and conduct, as a chaste virgin to Christ.

3 I am afraid, lest somehow, as the serpent beguiled Eve by her subtility, in promising to make her wise, so your minds should be debauched from that obedience which is due to Christ by one, who, on presence of making you more perfect than I have done, would subject you to the law.

4 If now, indeed, the teacher who is come to you, preacheth another Master, whom I have not received; or if ye receive from him the spirit of a spirit which he has not delivered to me, ye shall have very much greater than those which I imparted to you, or a different and better doctrine of salvation, which ye have not embraced by my persuasion, ye might well have listened to such a teacher.

5 Yet I conclude I am in nothing inferior to the very greatest of the apostles: so that ye had no reason to apply to any other teacher.

6 And even if I be an unlearned person in speech, yet I am not so in the knowledge of the things I teach: for, in every occasion I have been made manifest by all things (by the doctrine I taught, and the gifts I bestowed) among you as a chief apostle.

Ver. 1. Could bear some little of my foolishness. The apostle terms his commanding himself foolishness, because his oppressors gave up the idea of his education. Nevertheless, it was become his character, both of prudence and duty; because the faction had been very industrious to prove he was an unlearned, a rustic, a beggarly Christian, in contrast to the Corinthians, by following the false teacher, might be debauched from that integrity of affection which they owed to Christ.

Ver. 2. I am jealous of you. The word ἰδική is used by the Greeks to signify, not a particular affection, but the strong and vehement feeling of love with which a person is affected by anything. It signifies to have a mind strongly affected by anything, in particular: and is of opinion, that in this passage it design the affronting, rather than the bruiting of the bride: and for that sense of the name, see Sir. 19:22, and Pruss. 17:22. Whitby saith, the other Greek commentators understand the apostle as of opinion that his having betrayed the Corinthians to Christ, by persuading them to believe the gospel; and quotes two passages from Herodotus, in which ἱδικῇ signifies to bruit. The bruiting of persons to Christ is published in the present life; but their marriage is to happen in the life to come; when they shall be brought home to their husband's house, to live with him for ever. The apostle, therefore, said, I am afraid, lest ye have betrayed the Corinthians to Christ, he was anxious to preserve them chaste, or true, to their first master, that the time of their marriage came they might not be rejected by him.

Ver. 3. I am afraid, lest somehow, as the serpent beguiled Eve by her subtility, he does it in all the excellence of himself, he beguiled the Corinthians, and also beguiled the Gentiles, with whom he said, we are no more under the law, but under grace. This sort of notion was desired, for a reason mentioned I Cor. 15. 17. See Ex. 6:4. Off. 12:11. Phil. 3:6. It seems the faction in Corinth had objected to 7 Have I committed an offence against the apostolical character, in humbling myself to work for my own maintenance, that ye might be exalted by believing in Christ the more readily, because I have preached the gospel of God to you as a free gift?

8 Other churches I spoiled, taking wages only to do you service.

9 (Kas) For being present with you, and in want, I distressed no one;

(see, 9:8) but was ready 2 to be breath coming from Macedonia; he was full supplied, and in every thing I have kept, and will keep myself, from being burdensome to you.

10 As the truth of Christ is in me,

(2nd Cor, 3:10, 11,) surely this same boasting shall not be stopped

(see, 14:18,) concerning me in the regions of Asia.

11 For what reason? Because I do not love you? God knoweth.

12 But what I do, (see, 219,) that I will do, that I may cut off opportunity from them who desire opportunity, that wherein they boast they may be found even as we.

13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workmen, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ.

14 And no wonder;

for Satan himself transformeth himself into an angel of light.

15 Therefore it is no great wonder if his ministers also transform themselves as ministers of righteousness: of those the end shall be according to their works.

16 (1st Cor, 3:3.) Moreover, I say, Let no man think me a fool: but if otherwise, (see, 234,) at least as a fool bear with me, that I also may boast a little.

2. But my want, the brethren, &c.—Though the apostle generally mainsted himself by his own labour, he was sometimes so occupied in public business and in the other functions of his ministry, that he had little time for working. On such occasions he was much pinched with want; as happened in Corinth at the time the Philippians sent relief. (Compare the apostle's answer to the same matter, in 2 Cor. 11:7-9.)

3. Fully supplied.—Πληρωματισμους. This word, as Bengelius observes, implies that the money sent by the Philippians, added to the present, was an answer to his own labour and to the contributions he had received from his own friends in Asia.

4. The second objection he answers in this chapter, ver. 11—18. by asserting, that his not demanding maintenance did not proceed from his not loving them, but that those teachers who boasted of their imitating him in not receiving maintenance, might be obliged to leave off taking presents from their disciples in private. Further, because his enemies pretended that he could not take-taking maintenance from the Corinthians, that he might the more easily fleece them by his assistants, he takes notice of that calumny also. (see, 11:16.)

6. Other churches I spoiled, taking wages from them.—He means the church at Philippi. For the brethren of Philip were strongly impressed with a sense of the advantages which mankind derived from the gospel, were so anxious to render the apostle's publishing in Corinth successful, that during his residence there they sent him money, to prevent his being burdensome to the Corinthians. His acceptance of these presents he calls a spoiling of the churches.

9:1—1 distressed no one. (see, 2nd Cor, 10:6.) According to Jerome, whence he is called Cerussus. Others think it is derived from ver. 10, which Elias says is the name of a fish called by the Latin sperdo, because it deserves those who touch it of the sense of fish. Others, according to the law of the land, the figure of speech is, 'I subdued or oppressed no one.' But Joseph.

11:1—1 distressed no one. (see, 2nd Cor, 10:6.) In his note on the New Testament, observes, that the primitive word is used by Theocritus in the sense of hating; and that Plato has used another derivative from that primitive in the same sense.

2. But my want, the brethren, &c.—Though the apostle generally mainsted himself by his own labour, he was sometimes so occupied in public business and in the other functions of his ministry, that he had little time for working. On such occasions he was much pinched with want; as happened in Corinth at the time the Philippians sent relief. (Compare the apostle's answer to the same matter, in 2 Cor. 11:7-9.)

3. Fully supplied.—Πληρωματισμους. This word, as Bengelius observes, implies that the money sent by the Philippians, added to the present, was an answer to his own labour and to the contributions he had received from his own friends in Asia.
L. CORINTHIANS.

17 What I speak with so much confidence in my own praise, ye in irony may I do not speak according to the Lord's direction, but as in foolishness. Yet the Lord directs me to violate my own character, and thus be my apostle.

18 And therefore, seeing many teachers boast according to the manner of men, I also will boast in the same manner.

19 For though ye reckon me a fool for praising myself, I know ye bear with fools gladly, for the purpose of laughing at them, being yourselves remarkably wise.

20 For ye bear in fools gladly, being yourselves wise.

21 I speak concerning the reproof, (2 Cor. 3:22,) namely, that we are weak. But in whatever one is weak, (in foolishness I speak), I also am bold.

22 Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I.

23 Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool,) I am above them: I am the apostle whom Jesus senteth, who was the apostle of the Gentiles, (Rom. 1.1.) in the things of faith and of truth.

24 Of the Jews five times I received forty stripes save one.

25 The end, as in Rom. vi. 21, signifies the final issue of a course of action, and is the limitation of the restriction which shall be made to the race of men. Ver. 16. At least as a fool (Gal. 1.20.) bear with me.—Eisees hath expounded this expression by examples, particularly the following one of the secular member, De Defect. Oracul. p. 412. who were with us, we have told that Demetrius, when about to make a speech which he was afraid would not be well received, introduced this: that is, that of Demetrius. Ver. 17. Do not speak according to the Lord, but as in foolishness. The apostle is intended, because the apostle in his former letter distinguished between the things which life itself parte, and the things which the life spoke, lascivious, that he meant to tell them he was not interested in the things spoken by himself. And therefore that impostor, in mockery of the praises which Paul bestowed on himself, said they were, supposed of the number of the things which the Lord did not speak by him. This witticism the apostle introduced here ironically, to show that whatever they had of his vindication of his character, and his labours, and powers, and behaviour, as an apostle, be sparks by inspiration from Christ, who promised to his apostles, that when called to defend himself, it should be given them in that hour what they were to speak.

Ver. 19. Ye bear with fools gladly, being yourselves wise.—This is the true spirit of rulers, as from v. 2. to v. 18. The faction, it seems, had said they would show their wisdom in bearing with this, and standing at the apostle as a fool, for ranging himself so highly. But they told him ironically, that, relying on their wisdom in bearing with him, he would boast after the manner of others. For every one, in propriety, they mentioned their objects of congregation, as in the assembly, and the journeys and voyages which he made for the sake of spreading the gospel. And from his account it appears, that none of the heroes of antiquity, however vehemently actuated by the love of fame or of military glory, or of power, either did or suffered as much in the pursuit of their objects, as the apostle Paul did and suffered for Christ and his gospel.

26 I am above them. See chap. 2. 7. St. Paul meant, that as a minister of Christ he far exceeded them in respect of his labours in preaching, and of the sufferings and dangers which he underwent. It was written, in the long journeys which he made, both by sea and land, for spreading the gospel. See 1 Cor. iv. 11—13, where more is said concerning this subject.

27. In labours more abundant.—By mentioning his labours as different from stripes, imprisonments, deaths, &c. the apostle would make us think of his own more honourable labours, and of his own exceeding labours. For by this expression he meant to intimate, that he did not mean to mention his labours by stripes, and imprisonments, and dangers, beside the imprisonments here referred to, are omitted by Luke for the sake of brevity, (ver. 24.) which made the apostle, before his persecution, had been very active in inflicting this punishment on the disciples of Christ, he could not bear...
23 Thrice I was beaten with rods; once I was stoned; thrice I was shipwrecked; I have spent a night and a day in the deep.

26 In journeys often; in dangers from rivers; in dangers from robbers; in dangers from my countrymen; in dangers from the heathens; in dangers in the city; in dangers in the wilderness; in dangers (w) at sea; in dangers among false brethren.

27 In labours and toil; in watchings often; in hunger and thirst; in fastings often; in cold and nakedness.

28 Besides these things there is that which is my daily care, the anxious care of all the churches.

29 Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is made to stumble, and I do not burn?

30 If I must boast, I will boast of the things which relate to my weakness.

31 The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for ever, knows that I do not lie:

32 In Damascus, the governor belonging to Aretas, the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, wishing to apprehend me;

33 But through a window in a basket I was let down (Acts 13.38.) by the wall, and escaped from his hands.

plain when he himself was treated in the same manner by the Sanhedrin for the law.

Vers. 23-25. Thrice I was beaten with rods. - This was a Roman punishment. In the history of the Acts no mention is made of the apostle's being punished with stripes; and only one instance of his being beaten with rods is related, Acts xvi. 22. Similarly I was shipwrecked. - Of these shipwrecks nothing is said, the vessel being the only subject of the story. The first shipwreck was written before the multitude were sent a prisoner to Rome, his shipwreck on the island of Malta was written after he had been a prisoner of the Romans for three years, and it is clear from the progress of his career that there was another shipwreck between his release and release of the three shipwrecks mentioned. The Greek word [script error] in ver. 25 is not mentioned in the history of the Acts as in Damascus; after that, in Jerusalem; then in Antioch, in Iconium, in Lystra, in Lycia, in Asia, and in Ephesus; all before this epistle was written.

Vers. 25-29. In dangers in the city. - This being opposed to 'dangers in the wilderness,' it means populous cities in general. Of these dangers frequent mention is made in the history of the Acts: as in Damascus; after that, in Jerusalem; then in Antioch, in Iconium, in Lystra, in Asia, and in Ephesus; all before this epistle was written.

Ver. 27. In labour and toil. - Much more is that suffering, labour: it signifies such hard labour as ill-giver.

Vers. 28. Besides these things is that which is my daily care, the anxious care of all the churches.

Vers. 29. Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is made to stumble, and I do not burn?

Vers. 30. If I must boast, I will boast of the things which relate to my weakness.

Vers. 31. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for ever, knows that I do not lie:

Vers. 32. In Damascus, the governor belonging to Aretas, the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, wishing to apprehend me;

Vers. 33. But through a window in a basket I was let down (Acts 13.38.) by the wall, and escaped from his hands.

freedom, tempered with respect, as we find he did to the magistrates and philosophers in Athens, to the father of the family of Chloes at Jerusalem, to the Roman governors Felix and Festus, to king Agrippa, say, to the emperor himself.

Vers. 32. I gave or administered for this Epistle being written before the event, it is not surprising that the governor of Damascus was still in power, and that the apostle did not act contrary to our Lord's words. John x. 12. as he had no fixed relationship to the brethren of Damascus as their pastor. See Acts xii. 25-29.

Chapter XII.

View and Illustration of the Facts related in this Chapter.

After enumerating in the former chapter his almost incredible labours and sufferings for the gospel, the apostle in this, directing his discourse to the faction, who had ridiculed him for praying himself, said to them ironically,
Well, it does not become me to boast of any thing I have done or suffered as a minister of Christ: Nevertheless I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord, ver. 1.

But I might not offend their affected delicacy, he did not say these words to himself, but he did not say them to his apostles, and gave them no hint of his own mind. He only told them, he knew a servant of Christ; who, fourteen years before the date of this letter, had been caught up as far as the third heaven, ver. 2.

Though whether in the body or out of the body, the apostle did not know, ver. 3. This servant of Christ, in paradise, heard things which could not be expressed in human language, ver. 4. Concerning such a person, he said, the apostle said he would boast; but concerning himself, he told them ironically, he would not boast except in his weaknesses, for which they ridiculed him, and of which he had boasted in the end of the preceding chapter, ver. 5.

And yet, being himself that servant of Christ who had been caught up, he told them, that if he inclined to boast concerning himself as the person who was so highly honoured, he should not be a fool, because he should have nothing of himself but what was strictly true. Nevertheless, he forbade, lest fowls of any should think more highly of him than his appearance, or than his manner of speaking, warranted. This he said in high ridicule of their gibes, that his bodily presence was weak, but that his spiritual presence was strong, and had a strong and powerful effect on the Lord thrice to remove it, ver. 8.

But that he told him, his grace was sufficient for making him successful as an apostle, and his power in converting the world was most illustriously displayed in the weakness of the instruments employed for that end. The apostle therefore boasted in his own weakness, that the power of Christ might be seen to dwell upon him, ver. 9. Nay, he even took pleasure in weaknesses, insulcs, &c. for Christ's sake, ver. 10.

But added, that if he appeared a fool in thus praising himself, his friends among the Corinthians had constrained him to it, because when his enemies called his apostleship in question, they ought to have spoken in his vindication, as they well knew he was in no respect inferior to the greatest of the apostles, ver. 11.

All the proofs of an apostle he had frequently shewed in their presence, by signs and wonders and powers, ver. 12. So that, as a church, they were inferior to others in nothing, except that spiritual food, and wherefore they had been the most easy to please, and the most easy to receive, and the most easy to receive the first fruits of their maintenance from them. But in irony of their finding fault with him on that account, he begged them to forgive him that injury, ver. 13. Yet, to shew that he had done them no injury in that matter, he now told them he was coming to them the third time, and still would not be burdensome to them; because he did not seek the children's souls, but their salvation; and because the children ought not to provide for the parents, but the parents for the children, ver. 14. And therefore with pleasure he would spend his time and waste his body for their souls' sake, so much did he love them; although the more he loved them, he found the less he was beloved by them, ver. 15. Well then, said he, ye must acknowledge that I did not burden you, by taking maintenance from you. Nevertheless the faction say, (because it is the practice of the false teacher to whom they are attached,) that by this shew of disinterestedness I craftily make you lay aside all suspicion of my loving money, that I might draw it the more effectually from you by my assistant when absent, ver. 16. But did I make the least use of you, by any of them, that I would part with part of Titus? ver. 17. I besought Titus to visit you lately. Did Titus, or the brother I sent with him, make any gain of you? Did they not walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps with me, ver. 18.

Farther, because he had said he would not boast except in his weaknesses, for which they had ridiculed him, he told them that, his bodily infirmity, instead of rendering him contemptible, was an honour to him; because it was set on him by God, to prevent him from being too much elated with the transcendency of the revelations which he had received, ver. 9. This he said, that he had been brought to a great matter of the Lord thrice to remove it, ver. 8.

Yet I am afraid that when I come I shall not find you such reformed persons as I wish you to be, and that I shall be found by you such as ye do not wish. My meaning is, that I shall find strifes, emulations, &c. among you, ver. 20.

So that when I come, I shall be so far humbled among you by my God, as to be obliged with grief to punish those among you who have formerly sinned, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness, which they have habitually committed, ver. 21.

Commentary.

Chap. XII.—I (Acts, 111.) It is not proper then for me to boast: (Acts, 98.) Yet I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. 3. Fourteen years ago I knew a man in Christ, whether in the body, I know not; or out of the body, I know not; God knoweth: such an one I knew caught up as far as to the third heaven. 4.

Ver. 1.—I will come to visions. Or, ἐκθέσαι, visions, were things presented to a person in a supernatural manner, so as to be the objects of his sight, while he was awake. Luke 1.11, and Mary, ver. 58, and Cornelius, Acts x. 3, had visions of angels. But the visions of which the apostle speaks in this passage, being of a spiritual nature, and his concern being the seeing the Lord Jesus on different occasions after his ascension, Acts ii. 27, xvii. 9. xxii. 13. xvi. 23, were visions of the person himself. He speaks of his own seeing the Lord Jesus on different occasions after his ascension, Acts ii. 27, xvii. 9. xxii. 13. xvi. 23.

Ver. 2.—Fourteen years ago. The apostle having never spoken of his rapture till now, although it happened fourteen years before this epistle was written, it might be sensible how little disposed he was to speak vangloriously of himself; and that they themselves had constrained him to mention his rapture on this occasion. See ver. 11. 2. I knew a man in Christ. This may mean a Christian man, or a man belonging to Christ, a servant of Christ. See 2 Cor. v. 17. That the apostle speaks of himself. Luke 1.11; and Mary, ver. 58, and Cornelius, Acts x. 3, had visions of angels. But the visions of which the apostle speaks in this passage, being of a spiritual nature, and his concern being the seeing the Lord Jesus on different occasions after his ascension, Acts ii. 27, xvii. 9. xxii. 13. xvi. 23, were visions of the person himself. He speaks of his own seeing the Lord Jesus on different occasions after his ascension, Acts ii. 27, xvii. 9. xxii. 13. xvi. 23. 3. Whether in the body, I know not; or out of the body, I know not. As the apostle declares, that he knew not whether the things which he saw and heard in the third heaven, and in paradise, were communicated to him by the intervention of his senses, or without them, it was full unreasonable to insist upon this being important to observe, that he supposed his spirit might be carried into the third heaven, and into paradise, without his body. For from making such a supposition, it is plain he believes from ver. 24. that he could exist out of his body; and that by the operation of God it could be made to happen. I shall see and know without the intervention of his body. Caught up. Philip was crucified by the Spirit caught away from the body of this man, Acts viii. 39. 40. Ezechiel also was lifted up by the Spirit between the earth and heaven, and brought to Jerusalem. But Philip was in visions of God, Ezek. vii. 3. The apostle could not tell in which of these ways he was caught up. As far as to the third heaven. In the language of the Jews, the first heaven is the region of the air, where the birds fly: who,

CHAP. XII.

3 Nay, I knew such a man, but whether it happened to him in the body or out of the body, I know not; God knoweth:

4 That he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not possible for a man to utter.

5 Concerning such an one I will not boast; but concerning myself I will not boast, except of my weaknesses. (See chap. x. 10.)

6 Ye are not complete in all knowledge. For instance, if I should boast in human weaknesses, I shall not be a fool; for I will speak the truth; but I forbear, lest any one should think concerning me above what he seeth me to be, or what he heareth from me.

7 For that I might not be exalted above measure, by the transcendency of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me, that I might not be exalted above measure.

8 Concerning this, thence I besought the Lord, that it might depart from me; therefore, are called 'the thorns of heaven.' The second heaven is that part of space in which the stars are;—This was called by the Jews the 'heaven of it.' For heaven of heavens cannot contain thee. The third heaven is the seat of God. 'For he planted it in the heart of the dead,' says the commentary, but because his success in preaching was shewn to be the effect of the divine power, the more clearly that he appeared so self-sufficient, so as to be, or seem to be, so far from what God, he was permitted the mean bodily appearance, which he seeth, and my contemptible speech which he heareth, warrant him to think of me. By this he is humbled, likewise, to see that the whole of a teacher's merit lies in the gracefulness of his person, in the nice arrangement of his words, and in the melodious tones with which he pronounces his discourse.

9 Jesus had said, 'His bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible.' In ridicule of that sarcasm, the apostle tells the Corinthians, that if he should say that he would be in the third heaven, and into paradise, he would boast of those very weaknesses for which he is reproved. 'For,' says he, 'I have been ascended after the manner of the human body, but not of the body of Christ.' He would manifestly, therefore, have been apt to depend on his being a great companion of God in the sanctuary, if his doctrine had not been the same, or if he had not been the eye of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. For that circumstance, in their opinion, shews the distance to be immense. For the opinions of mankind concerning the abode of the Deity, see Heb. i. 8. note. 2. And heard unspeakable words;—wonders, works, being used by the Hebrews to denote matters as well as words, probably both were meant by the apostle. And seeing the things which he saw and heard in paradise could not be expressed in human language, it is plain that the purpose for which he was caught up was not to receive any revelation of the gospel doctrine, because that could have served no purpose, if the apostle could not communicate what he heard; but it was to encourage him in the difficult and dangerous mission which he was about to undertake. For the expression 'caught up into paradise,' and showing him the glories of the invisible world, and making him a witness of the happiness which the righteous enjoy with Christ, even before their resurrection, his faith in the promises of the gospel must have been exceedingly strengthened, and his hope so raised, as to enable him to bear with acuteness that heavy load which was laid upon him, in the course of his ministry. Not to mention, that this confirmation of the apostle's faith is no small confirmation of ours also. Some, assigning, supposing the apostle to have said that he heard in paradise 'words not to be uttered,' have inferred, that the doctrines written in his epistles were designed only for the vulgar, and that he taught deeper truths to them than to others. But the word used by the apostle, sýmýphâ, does not signify things not to be uttered, but things unspeakable.

2. That it might depart from me.—The apostle was anxious to have this thorn removed, not then knowing that it would be so good. He reproved him for it, and desired him to be holy. But he knew that it would give additional lustre to the evidences of the apostleship of the gospel. This thorn is 'in the flesh,' and not in the body, and by many often, as Ralph Huth hath observed. And so it is explained by Clemens Alexandrinus. In a beautiful passage q

9 But he said to me, Sufficient for qualifying thee to be an apostle is my grace; the miraculous gifts with which I have endowed thee: Besides, my power in the conversion of the world is displayed in the weakness of the instruments whereby that work is accomplished. Most gladly, therefore, I will boast rather than be ashamed of my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may abide with me. (See John i. 14.)

10 Wherefore, instead of being dissatisfied, I will be pleased with bodily weaknesses, with insults, with necessities, with persecutions, with distresses, for Christ's sake; because when I am weak, then I am strong.

11 Have I become a fool by boasting? Ye have constrained me to do it; for if I had not been compelled by you, (see chap. iv. 7, note 3,) most gladly therefore, I will boast rather of my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may dwell upon me. (See John i. 14.)

12 Therefore, I am well pleased with weaknesses, with insults, with necessities, with persecutions, with distresses for Christ's sake; because when I am weak, then I am strong.

13 Truly the signs of an apostle were fully wrought (w. 172,) among you with all patience, by signs and wonders, and powers.

14 For what is the thing wherein ye were inferior to other churches, unless that I myself have not been burdensome to you? (See chap. xi. 8, 9.) Forgive me this injury.

15 Behold, a third time! I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you, (see chap. iv. 7, note 3,) because I seek not yours, but you; for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

16 Ye, most gladly will spend and be spent for the sake of your souls, even though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

17 Be it so then, I did not burden you; nevertheless, they say, being crafty, I caught you with guile.

18 With respect to any one of them I sent to you, Did I by him make gains of you? of you.

19 I besought Titus to go to you; and with him I sent a brother: Did Titus make any gain of you? Did we not walk in the same spirit? Did we not walk in the same steps? (Iam.) By sending Titus again, think ye that we apologize to you! In the Ver. 9.-1. But he said to me, sufficient, etc.—Probably Christ appeared to his apostle, and spake to him. At any rate, it was an expression of the Lord, which his subject led him to mention, though his modesty did not allow him to insist on it directly.

2. Most gladly therefore, I will boast rather of my weaknesses, rather than of the visions and revelations of the Lord.

3. That the power of Christ may dwell upon me.—The original word literally signifies pitch its tent over me,—cover me all over, and abide on me continually. See John i. 14.

Ver. 11.—The very greatest apostles.—He meant Peter, James, and John, whom he called pillars, Gal. ii. 9.

2. Though I be nothing.—This was an epitaph given by the Greeks to contemptible persons. Thus Aristophanes. Eukil. ii. 590. "Ah, miserable man! (εὐστήρης ἄνδρα) I am a contemptible person.

Ver. 12.—The signs of an apostle.—The signs whereby one was known to be an apostle, were his performing great and evident miracles openly in the view of the world; especially his healing diseases, his casting out devils, and his speaking foreign languages. But the greatest of all the signs was the conveying the spiritual gifts to them who believed; a power which none possessed but the apostles. But Paul had indeed been at Corinth; and, in particular, having communicated the spiritual gifts to many of the Corinthians, he, on account thereof, called them, in his former letter, "the seal of his apostleship." 1 Cor. x. 14.

With all patience.—By mentioning his patience, the apostle sought to the remembrance of the Corinthians the hardships to which he had endured while he executed the apostolical office among them, and supported himself by his own labour. Perhaps, likewise, he wished to show that he had obtained respect from the false teachers, for the luxury and ease in which they were living among the Corinthians.

3. By signs and wonders.—See Rom. xv. 19 note 1. The appeal which the apostle here, and 1 Cor. iv. 7, made to the whole church of the Corinthians, in which there was a great faction which called his apostleship in question, concerning the miracles which he had wrought in their presence, and the spiritual gifts which he had conferred on many of them, is a strong proof of the reality of these miracles and gifts. See 1 Thess. i. Illustration at the close.

Ver. 16. Behold, a third time I am ready to come to you. But with respect to any one of them I sent to you, I ask you, Did I by him receive anything, either in money or goods, from you? None of you can say I did.

17 I besought Titus to go to you with my former letter; and with him I sent a brother, Did Titus, or that brother, receive anything from you? Did we not show the same disinterestedness of disposition? Did we not all follow the same course, labouring with our hands for our own maintenance?

18 By sending Titus again, think ye that I apologize to you for not coming myself! In the presence of God I solemnly protest, that I speak by the direction of Christ when I say, that all these things, beloved, are done for your edification, that the guilty may have time to repent.

20 Yet I am afraid, lest perhaps, when I come, I shall not find you the reformed persons I wish you to be; and that I shall be found by you such as ye do not wish: I mean, lest perhaps strifes, environs, wraths, wranglings, back-bitings, whisperings, swellings, tumultus be among you.

21 And lest, when I come again, my God may humble me among you; and I shall be with many who have formerly sinned, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness, which they have committed.

II. CORINTHIANS

CHAP. XIII. - I am coming this third time to you: by the mouth of two witnesses, or three, every matter shall be established.

1. For I foretold, and I now foretell as present in Spirit the second time, and being absent in body, I now write to them who have before sinned, and to all the rest (2 Cor. 2:16). Certainly, when I come again, I will not spare you.

2. Since ye demand a proof of Christ's speaking by me, who (2 Cor. 1:18) towards you is not weak, but is strong (2 Cor. 1:17), among you.

3. For though indeed he was crucified (2 Cor. 2:16) through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God! (2 Cor. 2:16) and though we also are weak against him, we shall, nevertheless, live with him, by the power of God, (2 Cor. 2:16) among you.

4. Try yourselves, whether ye be in the faith! prove yourselves! know ye not yourselves (2 Cor. 2:17) that Jesus Christ is (2 Cor. 2:17) among you; unless perhaps ye be without proof.

Ver. 1. I am coming this third time to you. - In the Acts of the Apostles, as was observed chap. 22. 14, note, there is no mention made that Paul mentioned before this time that he would come. This second epistle was written. But that history by no means contains all the apostle's transactions. We may therefore suppose, that during the eighteen months which passed from his first coming to Corith, to the insurrection in the proconsulship of Gallio, the apostle left Corinth for a while, and travelled through Laconia, Arcadia, and the other countries of the province of Achaea, where he converted many. 2 Cor. 1. having preached the gospel to them gratis, 2 Cor. 2:17. But in the faith (2 Cor. 2:16) and could not (2 Cor. 2:17) among the Corinthians a second gift on his coming to them from Ephesus, argues that if he had gone to them, it would have been gratis, 2 Cor. 2:17, and especially after eighteen months abode in Corinth was considered by him as his first coming. But this conclusion does not follow; because the apostle may have conferred no gifts on the Corinthians after his return from the countries of Achaea.

Ver. 2. Will not spare you? - That is, there is separated from the following verse by a full stop, the sense of that verse will evidently be incomplete. But if the two verses are separated only by a comma, as I have done, the meaning will be, 'when I come again, I will not spare you, since ye demand a proof of Christ's speaking by me.' - This, with the other threatenings in the apostle's letters to the Corinthians, is a strong proof of the righteousness of the cause in which he was engaged. For if he had been carrying on an imposture with the aid of his disciples, he would have favored them in their voice, instead of threatening to punish them; as he must have known that such threatenings, while he himself was more culpable than they, could not procure the apostle of Christ's deciding in favor of them. It is supposed that in these threatenings the apostle had the false teacher particularly in his eye, though he uses the plural number. And Michael is not at this time the apostle's name, but is an epithet, the red on that impostor so severely, that he obliged him to leave the city; or, that, being terrified by the threatenings in this letter, he fled of his own accord before the apostle arrived.

Ver. 3. Is strong among you? - Whitby's note on this verse is as follows: 'The word is strong (2 Cor. 2:17), but is not in 2 Cor. 2:17. St. Paul to preach the gospel to them in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, so efficaciously as to convert them to the faith of Christ.' The apostle, indeed, speaks of his conversion to the faith of Christ. But this restoration the apostle stood on in this letter, together with the gospel, by which their 'testimony of Christ was confirmed,' 2 Cor. 1:15. By his power, conspicuous in sending St. Paul's delivery of the apostolic persons up to Satan, 1 Cor. 15:3. 15. : By the chastisements they suffered for communicating in the Spirit, 2 Cor. 1:15. 15. By his breath by the power of God. - Here 'the power of God' is declared to be, not only the cause of Christ's resurrection, but even the proof of his being now alive. In this letter view, the power of God signifies the power of God communicated to Christ by the Spirit, the power that was given to him to heal, 2 Cor. 1:15; to bestow spiritual gifts on believers, and to punish offenders, for the confirmation of the gospel.' - The above is a specimen of the natural reading of this verse.

Ver. 4. Try yourselves, whether ye be in the faith! - Romans thinks faith here signifies the faith of miracles, because that was a chief proof of Christ's speaking by him. And he had conferred on them that gift. But as the expression, 'in the faith,' is nowhere else used in that sense, I rather think, 'in the faith' signifies, 'in the faith of Christ,' and 'among you,' signifies, that the apostle desired the fiction to 'try themselves, whether they were in the faith,' he meant that they should try whether, by their sense of this gift they were besought along with Christ, and that this spiritual gift which every church of Christ enjoyed. For if they possessed any spiritual gift, they could be easily convinced of it, and if they had not, they could not. It is a clear proof here that Christ spoke by him. This interpretation, of the phrase 'in the faith,' is not materially different from that of Romans; but it agrees with the whole tenor of the apostle's present discourse. 2. Prove yourselves. - Because the fact that had required the apostle to show them a proof of Christ's speaking by him, he desired them to prove themselves, whether they had received any spiritual gifts from him; that being a proof which ought to have convinced them of their apostolical authority.

3. Know ye not yourselves? - This being spoken to the faction, who were, in such a state of wickedness, that it cannot be so much as supposed that Jesus Christ was in them, in the sense in which our translators understand the phrase, we must translate and interpret the passage as I have done. - Some are of opinion, that in this question, 'Know ye not yourselves,' the apostle alluded to the greatest of all the precepts of the Greek philosophy, Nasi to Tis (Know thyself), and that he ridiculed the sect for being ignorant of that precept, and that is, of the gifts which they possess, and of the efficacy of these gifts to prove the person from whom they had received them to be in the faith of Christ. But in this sense of the word, it is more pointed, if we recollect that the Corinthians valued themselves exceedingly on their knowledge of the Greek philosophian, and on their skill in reasoning. 4. That Jesus Christ is among you? - Whitby thinks the apostle added here to the speech of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness, who, after all the proofs which God had given of his presence among them, said, Exod. xvii. 7. 'Is the Lord among us or not?' 2 Cor. 2:17. Unless perhaps, in this sense, he added here the Vulgate version, which has here Nasi fortis. 5. Ye be (2 Cor. 2:17) without proof; - namely, of Christ's presence among you. So the word signifies, 2 Cor. 2:17, 2 Cor. 2:17, a proof of Christ's speaking by me. - The proof of Christ's presence in any church, was the existence of miraculous powers and spiritual gifts in that church. For these being sent down by Christ, Acts ii. 38. were tokens both of his presence and power. - In the meaning that supposing that the power of Christ might appear indirectly but sharply rebuked them for their vice, (chap. xii. 21.), because the Spirit of God is provoked to depart both from
II. CORINTHIANS.

6 But, though ye should be without proof of Christ's presence among you, having quenched the Spirit, I trust that ye shall know, that I am not without the proof of Christ's speaking by me.

7 Nevertheless, I pray to God that ye do nothing evil; not wishing that we may appear having proof; but that ye may do what is good, (4. 100.) though we should be (2. 319.) indeed without proof. 1

8 For we can do nothing against the truth, 1 but for your edification. 1

9 (1 Th. 5. 9.) Therefore we rejoice when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we pray for, even your restoration. 1

10 For this reason, being absent, I write these things, that when present I may not act sharply, according to the power which the Lord hath given me (2. 149. 2.) for edification, and not for destruction.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell: be ye restored! 1 comfort yourselves; mind the same thing 1; live in peace; and the God of love and peace will be with you.

GALATIANS.

ESAY V.—On the Covenant which God made with Abraham, the Father of the Israelites.

Our Lord, John v. 39. thus exhorted his Jewish hearers, 'Search the scriptures, (the writings of Moses and the prophets,) for in them ye think ye have eternal life;' and they are they which testify of me.' Also, at his first appearance to his disciples after his resurrection, he said to them, Luke xxiv. 44. 'These are the words which I spake to you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me.'
ESSAY V.

ON THE COVENANT WITH ABRAM.

And that they might know what things were written in those books concerning him, 45. 'He opened their understandings that they might understand the scriptures;' he gave them the knowledge of the meaning of those passages of the scriptures which relate to himself, that they might be able to confirm the gospel which they were to preach, by testimonies taken from the law and the prophets. Accordingly, the apostle Paul, who, like the other apostles, had the true meaning of the Jewish scriptures communicated to him by inspiration, hath on these writings founded these enlarged views of the doctrines of the gospel, and of the divine dispensations, which he hath delivered in his epistles; in so much that his explications of the Jewish scriptures, and the conclusions which he hath drawn from them, make a principal part of the gospel revelation.

The passages of the writings of Moses, which Paul hath explained in his epistles, and which deserve our special attention, are these in which God's transactions with Abraham the father of the Israelites are recorded: namely, Gen. xii. 1-3, 16, 16. xiii. 14-16. xv. 1-7. xvi. 1-2.

In the first of these passages we are informed, that God commanded Abraham to leave his country and kindred, and go into a land which he would shew him. And to encourage him to break his connexions with his idolatrous kindred and acquaintance, God said to him, Gen. xii. 2. 'I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing.' 3. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.' Having received this command, Abram ' obeyed and went out, not knowing whither he went,' Heb. xi. 8. He went out, notwithstanding he did not know whether the land into which he was going was a good or a bad land; or whether it was far off or near.

On leaving Haran, Abram it seems was directed to go to Canaan. For on his coming to the plain of Moreh in Canaan, Gen. xiii. 7. 'The Lord appeared to Abram and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land.' Some time after this, when Abram separated from Lot, Gen. xiii. 14. 'The Lord appeared unto Abram, Lift thine eyes now, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward; and eastward, and westward. 15. For the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. 16. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered.'

All this while Abram had no child; for which reason, eight years after he left Haran, when God said to him, Gen. xv. 1. ' Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield and exceeding great reward,' he replied, ' What wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless?' Being now above eighty years old, the performance of the promise, to make of him a great nation, appearing every day more and more improbable, he became uneasy at the delay. Wherefore, ver. 5. ' God brought him forth abroad,' early in the morning, ' and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them; and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be. 6. And he believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness. 7. And he said to him, I am the Lord who brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.' And ver. 18. ' In that same day,' to assure him of the performance of this promise, ' the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.'

In the next transaction, recorded Gen. xvii, the Lord explained to Abram the particulars comprehended in the covenant which he made with him, after counting his faith to him for righteousness. Ver. 1. ' When Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said to him, I am the Almighty God, walk before me and be thou perfect. 2. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. 3. And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying, 4. As for me, behold my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. 5. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham, for a father of many nations have I made thee. 6. And I will make thee exceedingly fruitful, and will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. 7. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee. 8. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God.'

Some time after this transaction, to shew us that the things promised to Abraham in the covenant depended on his continuing to believe God, and to command his children after him to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment, the Lord said concerning him, Gen. xviii. 19. ' I know him that he will command his children after him, and his household, to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment, that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.'

At length, when Abraham was an hundred years old, and Sarah was ninety, she brought forth her long expected son, whom Abraham named Isaac, (laughter), on account of the joy which his birth occasioned to his parents. —But lo! when this only son, to whom all the promises were expressly limited, was grown up, God put Abraham's faith to a trial still more severe than that which was occasioned by defining his birth so long: He commanded him to offer this only son as a burnt-offering, Gen. xxii. 2. This most difficult command, Abraham, without hesitation, set about obeying. He went with Isaac to the appointed mountaintop, raised an altar, put wood on it, bound Isaac, laid him on the altar, and stretched forth his hand, and took the Angel of the Lord to slay his son: and would have slain him, had not the angel of the Lord called to him, and said, ver. 12. ' Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing to him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me.' 15. And the Angel of the Lord called to Abraham out of heaven the second time, 16. And said, By my self have I sworn, said the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, 17. That in blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying, I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; 18. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.' Here it is to be remarked, that God confirmed all his former promises with an oath; and declared that he would perform these promises, because Abraham had done the difficult work of offering up his only son as a burnt-offering. Also he gave him a new promise, That the person in whom all the nations of the earth are to be blessed, should be one of his descendants; and declared, as before, that he made him this promise, because he had obeyed his voice.

From the foregoing account of God's transactions with Abraham, it appears that God's covenant with him contained six separate promises or stipulations on the part of God, namely,

I. That God would exceedingly bless Abraham.
II. That Abraham should be the father of many nations, and very fruitful.
III. That God would give to Abraham, and to his seed after him, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession.

IV. That he would be a God to Abraham, and to his seed after him in their generation.

V. That in Abraham himself, all the families of the earth should be blessed.

VI. That in Abraham's seed also, all the nations of the earth should be blessed.

These stipulations, the apostle Paul, in different places of his epistles, hath styled the promises; and hath entered deeply into their meaning.

To understand these promises, in the whole extent of their meaning, the reader should recollect, that in the early ages, before the art of writing was invented, the most approved method of communicating and preserving knowledge was by allegory; that is, by making sensible objects which were present, or not very distant in point of time, representations of things which are not the objects of sense, or which are future, but which have some analogy to the things meant, or are so near the object, that this method of instruction, the characters and actions of remarkable persons, and the ordinary events of their life, were on some occasions considered as prefigurations of more distant persons and events to which they had a resemblance. Of this kind, which may be called the natural allegory, we have the following examples in scripture.

1. The characters, actions, and events which constituted the natural allegory, though existing apparently in the ordinary course of things, were ordered of God, so as to be fit emblems of those future persons and events, the knowledge of which God intended to communicate to the world.

There is in scripture, likewise, what may be called the invested allegory, by which is meant a new and additional significance which God appointed to be performed with such and such circumstances, for the purpose of prefiguring future persons and events. Of this sort were all the Levitical sacrifices, particularly the paschal lamb, John xix. 36.—and all the rites of worship appointed by Moses, which, as Paul tells us, Heb. x. 1. were shadows of good things to come.

Of the same kind was the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, which our Lord tells us, John iii. 14, 15. was a type of his being himself lifted up on the cross.—Probably also the command to offer up Isaac as a burnt-offering, was intended as an allegorical representation of the sacrifice of Christ, Heb. xi. 19.—And to name no more instances, many of the extraordinary things done by the prophets, at the command of God, were types of things to come, from the expectation with which they were accompanied.

The allegorical method of communicating and preserving instruction, was attended with three advantages. 1. The emblem being an object of sense, made a strong impression on the imagination of the persons for whose instruction the allegory was intended, and might easily be remembered. 2. The verbal explanation which often accompanied the instituted allegory, having for its subject an object of sense, neither required many words, nor were these words of uncertain meaning. This kind of allegory, therefore, with its interpretation, could be handed down to posterity with a good degree of accuracy, without the aid of writing. 3. In scripture, some future events are foretold in such a manner as to show, that they are themselves prefigurations or predictions of future events more remote. In such cases, when the first events come to pass in the manner foretold, they are both a proof and a pledge that the more remote events, of which they are the signs, will take place in their season.

This account of the ancient scripture allegory I have given here, because from what our Lord and his apostles have said concerning the promises in the covenant with Abraham, it appears that that transaction, besides its first meaning, which terminated in the persons and events literally spoken of, had an allegorical, or second and higher meaning, which was to be accomplished in persons and events more remote. For example, Abraham's natural descendants by Isaac, though he was not yet born, were considered as prefigurations of the church; and the new covenant, which he exercised in uncircumcision, was a type of believers of all nations; and to show this, he was made their father.

Melchisedeck, in his character and offices of a king and priest, was made by God himself a type of Christ, Paul, cx. 4.—David also, in his office and kingdom, prefigured Christ; on which account, Christ is called David by the Jews. There was a greater difficulty in the allegorical sense to St. Paul, Gal. iv. 46. were allegorical representations of the two covenants, and of the persons placed under these covenants. The swallowing of Jonah by the whale, and his continuing in its belly three days and three nights, is declared by our Lord himself to be a prefiguration of his burial, and of his resurrection on the third day, Matt. xxv. 4. —The characters, actions, and events which constitute the natural allegory, though existing apparently in the ordinary course of things, were ordered of God, so as to be fit emblems of those future persons and events, the knowledge of which God intended to communicate to the world.

This promise, in its first and literal meaning, implied, 1. That God would bestow on Abraham great temporal prosperity, and protect him from evil during his sojournings as a stranger in Canaan, and in the neighboring countries into which he might have occasion to go. Hence, in allusion to this promise, God called himself Abraham's shield, Gen. xvi. 1. In fulfillment of this promise, according to its literal meaning, God blessed Abraham so exceedingly, that after living in Canaan a few years, the male slaves born in his house who were capable of going to war, were no fewer than 918, with whom he pursued Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and defeated them near Damascus. Further, in the account which Moses hath given of Abraham's sojournings in Canaan, and Egypt, and in the land of the Philistines, various dangers from which God shielded him are mentioned, which, being well known, it is needless to speak of them particularly.

The blessing of Abraham, in its literal meaning, comprehended, 1. The natural blessing which concerns Abraham's faith, concerning his numerous natural seed, to him for righteousness...
ness. Now the meaning of God's counting an action for righteousness, may be understood from the application of the phrase to Phinehas, after he executed judgment on Zimri and Cozbi. Psal. cxi. 30. 'Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment, and so the plague was stayed, and it was counted to him for righteousness to all generations;' that is, his executing judgment on these wicked persons was rewarded by God, as a righteous action, with a temporal reward which descended to his kinsmen posterity. That this is the meaning of the phrase, appears from Num. xxx. xxi. where, speaking of the same action, God saith to Moses, ver. 11. 'Phinehas the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the priest, hath turned my wrath away from the children of Israel, (while he was zealous for my sake among them), that I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy. 12. Wherefore say, Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace. 13. And he shall have it, and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood.' Now, as in the case of Phinehas, his slaying Zimri and Cozbi is said to have been counted to him for righteousness, because God rewarded him and his seed with the promise of the inheritance of Canaan, so in the case of Abraham, his believing in the Lord that his seed should be numerous as the stars of heaven, is said to have been counted to him for righteousness, because God promised him and his seed with the promise of the inheritance of Canaan, immediately after declaring that his faith was counted to him for righteousness. Gen. xv. 6. 'And he said to him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.' Then, as in the case of Phinehas, God confirmed this grant to Abraham's seed by a covenant: ver. 18. 'In that same day the Lord made a covenant with Abraham, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river of Eden, unto the westward.'

Such is the first or literal meaning of God's 'blessing Abraham exceedingly,' and of his 'counting his faith to him for righteousness.' But this promise, in both its parts, had also a second and higher meaning, of which the literal meaning was itself the sign, and which must now be explained. Second, he bestow on Abraham great temporal prosperity, and to protect him from evil during his sojourning in Canaan, was likewise a promise to bestow on him those spiritual blessings, and that protection from his spiritual enemies, which were necessary to his perseverance in faith and obedience during his sojourning on earth. This we learn from the apostle Paul, who calls the assistance of the Spirit to the great help, the new and better covenant. Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. 14. That the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promises of the Spirit through faith.'

Next, the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, Gen. xvi. 9, by bestowing on him the inheritance of Canaan, was, in its second and highest meaning, a promise to bestow on him the blessing of justification by faith. This appears from Gal. iii. 8. 'The scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel before to Abraham, saying, Surely in thee shall all the nations be blessed. 9. For the promise is verily that which God could swear by. 10. For there is no unrighteousness with God, for he cannot lie. 11. Then when the Pharisees had heard that the publicans and sinners came to be with him, they said unto his disciples, Why eateth he with sinners? 12. But Jesus said unto them, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.'

The scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the Gospel before to Abraham, saying, Surely in thee shall all the nations be blessed. 9. For the promise is verily that which God could swear by. 10. For there is no unrighteousness with God, for he cannot lie. 11. Then when the Pharisees had heard that the publicans and sinners came to be with him, they said unto his disciples, Why eateth he with sinners? 12. But Jesus said unto them, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

The sense of this promise to Abraham was, that in his posterity, the nations should be blessed. Wherefore, if the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, was nothing but God's rewarding him with the promise of bestowing on him and on his seed the inheritance of Canaan, that nation, which enjoyed that life in the country of Canaan, where he dwelt, the blessing of Abraham neither have come on the nations, nor can come on them, notwithstanding the apostle hath assured us that Christ died to procure that blessing for them.

It is evident, therefore, that when God promised to bless Abraham by counting his faith to him for righteousness, he in effect promised to justify him by faith. Now this implied, 1. That he would pardon Abraham's sins: 2. That he would reward him as a righteous person. 1. That the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, was a promise to justify him by faith, that is, to pardon his sins on account of his faith, is evident from Rom. vi. 6. 'In like manner, David describeth the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord counteth righteousness without works. 7. Saying, Blessed (like Abraham) are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. 8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not count sin.'

2. That the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, was likewise a promise to reward him as a righteous person, by bestowing on him the inheritance of an heavenly country as a free gift, is plain, I think, from the history. For we are told, that immediately after God promised to bless Abraham by counting his faith to him for righteousness, he promised to give him the land of Canaan in inheritance: by which, not the inheritance of the earthly country only was meant, but the inheritance of an heavenly country also; as shall be proved in Sect. 3. where that promise is explained. Besides, that under the emblem of the earthly country an heavenly country was promised to him, Abraham himself knew: for the apostle saith unto us, that he died in the firm persuasion of his being to receive a country of that sort, according to God's promise. Wherefore, the apostle hath authorized us to believe, Abraham knew that the counting of his faith to him for righteousness, implied not only the pardon of his sins, but his being rewarded, as a righteous person, with the inheritance of heaven.

But if Abraham knew the true import of God's counting his faith to him for righteousness, he would consider it either as a declaration from God that his sins were then pardoned, and that he was immediately to be rewarded with the possession of the heavenly country; or as a promise that he would be pardoned and rewarded at the general judgment.—If he considered it as a declaration that his sins were then pardoned, and that he was immediately to be put in possession of the heavenly country, he would expect to be freed from death, the punishment of sin, and to be soon translated in the body into some place fit to be the everlasting abode of righteous men, like his pious ancestor Enoch, with whose history he no doubt was acquainted. But if he considered the counting of his faith to him for righteousness, to be a promise that he was to be pardoned, and the possession of the heavenly country to be given him at the general judgment, he would expect to be raised from the dead with a body suited to the nature of the heavenly country into which he was to be introduced, and to live in that heavenly habitation in the body for ever. One or other of these Abraham had reason to expect; unless he thought God's counting his faith to him for righteousness, was nothing but a promise to give him the earthly country. However, as he did not find himself immediately translated from this earth in the body, and as but one righteous person had been so translated without dying, he would think it more probable, that in the counting of his faith to him for righteousness, the pardon of his sins, and the possession of the heavenly country, were only promised to him as blessings which he was to receive at the judgment. Wherefore, not doubting that he would die like other righteous men, Abraham, in consequence of his faith being counted to him for righteousness, would expect to be raised from the dead, and to enjoy that life in the country of Canaan, which he had in his first sojourning, the blessing of Abraham neither have come on the nations, nor can come on them, notwithstanding the apostle hath assured us that Christ died to procure that blessing for them.
ON THE COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

That Abraham should have been able to reason in the manner above described, concerning God's blessing him exceedingly, and concerning his counting his faith to him for righteousness, need not be thought strange, considering the great strength of his understanding, and the just ideas of the power, veracity, and other perfections of God, which he had attained. Besides, St. Paul assures us, that he reasoned with a similar strength of understanding and faith concerning his having a son by Sarah, notwithstanding the birth of that son was delayed till Abraham was an hundred years old, and Sarah ninety. Rom. iv. 19. 'And not being weak in faith, he did not consider his own body, now as dead, because of an hundred years old, neither the deadness of Sarah's womb.' 20. Therefore against the promise of God he did not dispute through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; 21. And was fully persuaded that what was promised, he was able certainly to perform. — Also Abraham reasoned in the like admirable manner, concerning the command to offer up his only son as a burnt-offering, that long-expected son to whom all the promises were limited. For recollecting that they were all to be fulfilled in Isaac, and having the most exalted ideas of the veracity and power of God, he concluded that although Isaac were burnt to ashes on the altar, God would raise him from the dead. Heb. xi. 17. 'By faith, Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac: he who had received the promises, even he that was to be the heir of the burnt offerings; 18. Concerning whom it was said, Surely in Isaac a seed shall be unto thee. 19. (Agreeably) Reas- oning that God was able to raise him even from the dead; from which he received him even for a parable.'

If Abraham could reason so justly concerning the birth of Isaac, and concerning the command to offer him up as a burnt-offering, we may believe that he could reason with an equal strength of understanding and faith, concerning God's blessing him, and counting his faith to him for righteousness; and indeed concerning all the other promises in the covenant.

Sect. II. — Of the Second Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise is recorded in the following passages: Gen. xii. 3. 'I will make of thee a great nation.'—xiii. 16. 'I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered.'—Gen. xv. 5. 'Look now toward heaven, and count the stars if thou canst number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be.'— xvii. 4. 'Thou shalt be a father of many nations.'—v. 5. 'Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations I have constituted thee. 6. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful: and I will make nations of thee; and kings shall come out of thee.'—xviii. 18. 'Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation.'—xxi. 17. 'In multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore.'

On this promise the first thing to be observed is, that in the account given of it, Gen. xvii. 5, 6, there is a remarkable diversity in the expression; First, Abraham was to be 'a father of many nations.' And to show in what manner he was to be a father of many nations, God said to him, 'Thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations I have made thee.' In the Hebrew it is נשתלטאתה, Dedi te—I have given thee. LXX., verum et, 'Powi te—I have placed or constituted thee.' Next, Abraham was to be 'exceeding fruitful;' and nations were to come of him, and kings were to be crowned after him. 'He was to be the father of many nations by the constitution or appointment of God; and he was to be so exceedingly fruitful by procreating children, that nations were to be made of him, and kings were to come out of him. In this diversity of expression, God intimated to Abraham that he was to have two kinds of seed; one by the constitution or appointment of God, in respect to which he was to be 'a father of many nations;' and another by natural descent, in respect to which he was to be 'exceeding fruitful' in children. This account of Abra- ham's seed merits attention, because the promises in the covenant being made, not to Abraham alone, but to his seed, in their first or literal meaning they belonged to his natural seed, but in their second or highest meaning, they were promises to his seed by faith.'

The distinction of Abraham's seed into two kinds is intimated by our Lord himself, John viii. 39. where he told the Jews who sought to kill him, that notwithstanding they were the natural offspring of Abraham, they were not his children, unless they did the works of Abra- ham. —The same distinction is taught still more plainly by the apostle Paul, who calls Abraham's natural pro- geny, 'his seed by the law,' the law of marriage; but his seed by the appointment of God, who gave believers of all nations to him for his seed, 'that which is by the faith of Abraham.' Rom. iv. 16. 'That the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is by the law, but to that also which is by the faith of Abra- ham, who is the father of us all.'—In like manner, the apostle Paul says concerning the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God, but the children of promise are counted for seed, hath insinuated that Abraham had two kinds of children or seed; and that the seed by the promise, 'a father of many nations I have constituted thee,' are the children of God to whom alone the promises in the covenant, in their second and highest meanings, belonged.

This distinction of his seed into two sorts, I doubt not Abraham himself understood. My reasons are as follow: 1. In the promise, 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee;' the expression, I have constituted thee, must have led Abraham to expect a seed of some kind or other, different from that which he was to have by natural descent. For he could not imagine God would promise it as a favour, that he would constitute him the father of his natural offspring. He was their father by having begotten them, and not by any positive appointment of God whatever.

2. Seeing the seed of which God constituted Abraham the father, was to be so numerous as to make many nations, he must be able to number them, and to have seed sufficient to be his descendants. His descendants, to whom the promises in their literal meaning belonged, were to be but one nation; as Abraham knew, from the limitation of the promises, first to Isaac, to the exclusion of Ishmael; and after that to Jacob, to the exclusion of Esau. Besides, that his descendants by Jacob were to be but one nation, Abraham must have known from the purposes for which they were chosen to be the people of God; and from their so narrow a country as Canaan promised to them as their habitation. For he could not but know, that Canaan, instead of containing many nations, was no more than sufficient to be the habitation of the one nation of his descendants by Jacob.

3. Although the many nations of whom Abraham was constituted the father are called his seed, that appellation could not lead him to conclude certainly, that these nations were to spring from him by natural descent. Anci- ently, not only a person's offspring, but those who resembled him in his dispositions and actions, were called his seed. Thus in the sentence pronounced at the fall, the wicked man is called 'the seed of the serpent;' and the devil is called by our Lord, the 'father of murderers and liars.' Therefore, as Abraham knew that the promises in the covenant, in their first or literal meaning, were limited to the one nation of his natural descendants by Jacob, it would readily occur to him, that the many nations of whom he was constituted the father, and who as his children were to inherit the promises in their second or highest meaning, were nations of persons who resembled him in his faith and obedience. And the rather when he considered, that those who partook of the qualities of his mind, were more really his children than those who were related to him only by fleshly descent. Besides, he may have known, that his seed by faith, being also the children of God, were better qualified than those who were his seed by natural descent, to receive the blessings promised in the covenant to his seed; especially the eternal inheritance of the heavenly country, which was promised to them under the image of the everlasting possession of Canaan.

The occasion on which the numerous seed was promised to Abraham, must have led him then, as they do us now, to think of a numerous seed, different from his natural progeny. Gen. xvii. 1. 'When Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said to him, I am the almighty God, walk before me and be thou perfect. 2. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly.' Gen. xxvii. 16. 'By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, For because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; 17. That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore.

The numerous seed being promised to Abraham as the reward of his walking before the Lord in a perfect manner, and of his having offered up Isaac as a burnt-offering, he could not think that a numerous natural progeny was the only seed promised to him. That kind of seed, however numerous, he must have known, is not the proper reward of a man's walking before the Lord in a perfect manner, for less is it the proper reward of such an eminent degree of faith and piety as he expressed in the offering up of Isaac. To be the founder of a great nation, or even of many nations, was a blessing which any wicked man might attain in the ordinary course of things, and which some of that character actually had attained. Wherefore, when God repeatedly promised to Abraham as a manifold increase, he could not fail to attract his attention, that he would multiply him exceedingly, and that his seed should be numerous as the stars of the heaven, this chief of believers, whose understanding was as extensive as his faith was strong, would not interpret God's promises of a numerous and natural seed only, but of a numerous spiritual seed also, who were to resemble him in his faith and obedience. The promise of the numerous seed thus understood, must, to a person of Abraham's piety, have appeared an high reward indeed. It was an assurance from God himself, that in the progress of the world there were to be multitudes in every age and country, who should know and worship the true God; that God would acknowledge all such as Abraham's seed; that in fulfillment of the promises made in the covenant to Abraham's seed, he would count their faith to them for righteousness; and that he would bestow on them the everlasting possession of the heavenly country promised to Abraham, and to his seed by faith.

Having thus showed that a numerous seed by faith was promised to Abraham, as well as a numerous natural progeny, and that Abraham himself knew both kinds of seed were promised to him, it remains to speak of the accomplishment of the promise, according to its two-fold meaning. And first, the promise that Abraham's natural seed should be as numerous as the dust of the earth, and as the sand which is on the sea-shore, though limited to the one nation of the Israelites who descended from Abraham by Jacob, hath been remarkably fulfilled even in that one nation; agreeably to Gen. xii. 3. 'I will make of thee a great nation.' For notwithstanding the oppression of Jacob's posterity in Egypt, they were multiplied so exceedingly, that when they came out, and were numbered, these together must have been at least four times the number of the males fit to go to war; consequently, the souls who came out of Egypt could not be fewer than three millions:—so exceedingly did God multiply Abraham's natural seed during the short time of their sojourning in Egypt.

The Israelites, after they were settled in Canaan, continued to multiply greatly; for when David numbered them, they were found in Israel and Judah, 'thirteen hundred thousand valiant men who drew the sword,' 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. Afterwards, indeed, their numbers were diminished by the inroads of the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and by the captivity, first of the ten tribes, and then of the two tribes; so that when they returned from Babylon they were but few. Yet that small remnant, in process of time, multiplied to such a degree in their own land, that when the Romans invaded them under Titus, their numbers were prodigious; as we learn from the accounts which Josephus hath given of those who perished by famine, by pestilence, by internal divisions, and by the sword of the Romans, during the course of their last war with that powerful people.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, and the total desolation of the Jews by the Romans, such of them as survived, being sold by their conquerors for slaves, were scattered through all the neighboring heathen countries, and from thence were dispersed, in process of time, over the face of the earth. In this last dispersion, the natural seed of Abraham have continued now near eighteen hundred years; and during that long period they have been miserably wasted, partly through their own turbulent disposition, and partly through the avarice and cruelty, both of the heathens and of the Christians among whom they dwell. Yet, during all the calamities which have befallen them, they never ceased to be a united, yet a distinct people, by their observance of the external mark, and by their observance of the institutions of Moses, but especially by their circumcision, declared by God himself to be the seal of his covenant with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 9; and by that external mark, and by their observance of the institutions of Moses, this people are everywhere known to be the posterity of Abraham. Moreover, they are at this day so numerous, that were they gathered out of all the lands where they are dispersed, and joined together, they would be a race perhaps as numerous as any at present found on the earth. Who does not see in all this the accomplishment of God's promise to Abraham, to multiply his natural seed 'as the dust of the earth, and as the sand which is on the sea-shore?' See Sect. 4. at the beginning.

In the second place, Abraham, by the promise, 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee,' being made the father of all in every age and nation who believe and obey the true God, his spiritual seed must be very numerous. It is true, we cannot number them, as Moses and David numbered the natural seed. But, however, we know, that in every nation there always have been, even in the darkest and most corrupt ages, many pious and virtuous men, who have feared God, and wrought righteousness, according to the light and the advantages which they enjoyed. See Sect. 4. 1st Art. p. 356. Also we know, that in the progress of the divine government, virtuous and good men, Abraham's seed by faith, shall be so multiplied, that they will at length exceed the wicked in numbers; and that being considered by God as Abraham's seed, they shall receive all the blessings which, in the covenant, were promised to Abraham's seed.

It remains to speak of the purpose for which God constituted Abraham the father of all believers, and of the advantages which they derive from that appointment. According to the apostle Paul, Abraham was constituted the father of all believers, from the beginning to the end of the world, for the purpose of receiving on their behalf, and in their name, the promises of those blessings which God, of his great goodness, intends to bestow on them: Rom. iv. 11. "He received the mark of circumcision, as a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had in uncircumcision," or as an evidence that the faith which he exercised in uncircumcision was counted to him for righteousness," in order to his being the father of all who believe in uncircumcision, that righteousness might be counted even to them: 12. And the father of the circumcision, that righteousness might be counted to those who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the faith of Abraham, who was the father of all them who believed, as he had it in uncircumcision." — In thus constituting Abraham the father of all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, for the purpose of receiving on their behalf the promises in the covenant, God accommodated himself to the ideas of mankind, who consider what is promised in a covenant as more binding than a simple declaration of one's intentions. Accordingly, by making Abraham the father of all believers of all nations in a covenant with Abraham as their father, God both published his gracious intentions, and gave to the heirs of promise a stronger assurance of his resolution to fulfill these promises to them, than if he had only declared his purpose to do so. With the same design, after Abraham had laid Isaac on the altar, God confirmed all his promises to him, and to his seed, with an oath; that, as St. Paul tells us, the heirs of promise might have strong consolation under the afflictions of life, through the complete assurance which the oath of God hath given them of an after-life of happiness in heaven: Heb. vi. 13. "When God made promise to Abraham, seeing he could swear by no one greater, he swore by himself, Saying, Surely God that speaketh to them that cannot lie, shall swear." And multiplying I will multiply thee. — 16. For men verily swear by the greater; and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all contradiction. — 17. For which cause, God, willing more abundantly to shew to the heirs of promise (believers of all nations) the immutability of his purpose, confirmed the promise with an oath. — 18. That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation, who have fled away to lay hold on the hope set before us in the promises in the covenant with Abraham. — Farther, Abraham was constituted the father of all believers, that his justification might be the pattern of the justification of the rest of mankind. But of this more in Es. vi. Sect. 2. Remark 3.

Gad having, by a covenant, conferred on Abraham the great honour of being the representative of believers, may we not conjecture, that he was commanded to sacrifice his son Isaac, for this among other reasons, that having an opportunity of shewing, by his ready obedience, what an high degree of faith and piety he possessed, the world might be convinced, that of all mankind he best deserved to be made the representative of believers of all nations, that in their name he might receive the promises of those blessings, which the infinite goodness of God disposeth him to bestow on all who are capable of enjoying them?

I have only to add, that by constituting Abraham the father of all princes and virtuous men, an honour was done to this chief of believers, greater than if, in the place of Adam, he had been made the father of the whole human race.

Sect. III. — Of the third promise in the covenant with Abraham.

The third promise is that which God made to Abraham immediately on his arrival in Canaan: Gen. xii. 7. The Lord appeared to Abraham, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land. — Gen. xv. 1. "Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." — 7. And he said to him, I am the Lord who brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it. — 18. Unto thy seed have I given this land, &c. Gen. xvii. 8. "I will give to thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession."

Concerning the first or literal meaning of this promise, there can be no doubt; as little can there be any doubt concerning its fulfilment to Abraham's natural seed, according to that meaning. After they had sojourned in Canaan and Egypt, possession of the promised country by great miracles, and maintained them in possession of it during many ages.

But, like all the other promises in the covenant, this had a second and higher meaning, which Abraham and his immediate descendants well understood; namely, that under the image of the possession of Canaan, the possession of a better country, even an heavenly, was promised to them; as the following arguments I think sufficiently prove.

1. Although, when God said to Abraham, Gen. xii. 1. 'Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee,' he might think of some country on earth only; yet when God afterwards said to him, Gen. xvii. 1. 'I am the Almighty God, walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will give to thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God; ' he would naturally conclude, that some better country, which will bless all the nations, was promised to him as the reward of his walking before God in a perfect manner. For the translation of his ancestor Enoch from this earth in the body, after walking with God, must have convinced him, that neither the possession of Canaan, nor of any country on earth in its present state, is the proper reward of a perfect virtue. Besides, the whole earth being cursed for Adam's transgression, the rest of it, as Abraham well knew, could be an everlasting habitation to him. In short, Abraham must have seen, that if the possession of Canaan, during the whole of his life, was all that God promised to him as the reward of his walking before him in a perfect manner, he would not be rewarded more than other men; many of whom, notwithstanding they were great sinners, he observed, were enjoying the felicity of earthly countries in the greatest perfection.

2. The possession of Canaan, promised in the covenant, being termed an everlasting possession; if nothing was meant thereby but the everlasting possession of the earthly country so called, Abraham, to whom it was promised, must have expected to live in that country for ever. The same expectation Isaac and Jacob, his immediate descendants, must have entertained, to whom, as well as to him, the everlasting possession of Canaan was promised. But if Abraham and all his posterity were to live in the earthly Canaan without dying, he would soon be sensible that it was a country too small for containing all his seed. — Again, if that circumstance led him to interpret the promise concerning the everlasting possession of Canaan, of its being possessed for a long series of years by the successive generations of his posterity; yet, when he considered that the possession of Canaan was promised to all his seed, to his seed by faith as well as to his natural seed, he would soon relinquish that interpretation; because it could not enter into his mind to think that believers of all nations, who were on the earth in any one age, could live with his natural seed in so narrow a country as Canaan. Or if such a thing had been possible, he must have known, that to be transported into Canaan would have been no advantage, but rather a loss, to many of them; since the countries in which they were living, were better in every respect than Canaan. These reasons, I think, must have convinced Abraham, that a better and greater country than Canaan was promised in the covenant to him and to his seed, even an heavenly country, which was capable of containing all his seed, and of which the earthly country promised to his natural seed was only the emblem and pledge.

2 K 37.
4. St. Paul expressly affirms, that Abraham and his immediate descendants knew, that in the promise to give to him and to them the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, a better country, even an heavenly country, was promised to them. For he tells us, these men, to show that they expected a city whose builder and ruler is God, never built any house or fixed habitation in Canaan, but always dwelt there in tents. Heb. xi. 9. ‘By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as belonging to others, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise. 10. For he expected a city having foundations, of which city the builder and ruler is God.’—Further, the same apostle informs us, that Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, though they never obtained the possession of Canaan, all died in the firm persuasion of obtaining it. Heb. xi. 13. ‘All these died in faith, though they did not receive the things promised. For seeing them afar off, and being persuaded of them, and embracing them, they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. 14. Now they that speak of these things plainly declare, that by faith Abraham, our father, so as earnestly seek (σεμείωσεν) a native country, not Chaldeans. 15. ‘For if they had remembered that from which they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. 16. But indeed they strongly desired a better country, even an heavenly.’—After these express testimonies, can any one suspect that Abraham and his immediate descendants and posterity, our Lord, in reasoning with the Sadducees, affirmed, that the promise to give to Abraham and to his immediate descendants the everlasting possession of Canaan, was virtually a promise to raise them from the dead. Luke x. 37. ‘Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for he is not a God of the dead, but of the living.’ When Moses, at the bush, called the Lord, the God of Abraham and of his immediate descendants, he brought to the remembrance of the Israelites the memorable words with which the promise, to give to their fathers personally the everlasting possession of the land of Canaan, was concluded, namely, ‘And I will be their God,’ Gen. xvi. 9. From these words our Lord reasoned against the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection of the dead, in the following manner:—Seeing the Lord, when he promised to give to Abraham and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, added, ‘And I will be their God,’ if Abraham and his immediate descendants died without receiving the promise, and are not to be raised from the dead with the promise, then could not with truth call themselves their God, so many years after they were dead. Or as the apostle intimates, Heb. xi. 16. he might have been ashamed to call himself their God.—Besides, in the preceding part of his discourse, our Lord termed the promised country That world, in contradiction to This world, and declared, that to enjoy that world, Abraham and his seed must be raised from the dead. Luke xx. 34. ‘The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage. But they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage. 35. Neither can they die any more, for they are equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.’ Wherefore, our Lord himself hath authorized us to believe, that in the promise to give to Abraham and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, a new world, and a resurrection from the dead in order to their enjoying that world, was promised to them; and the apostle Peter charged the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection, with ignorance of the scriptures. Matt. xxii. 39. ‘Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures.’

Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures.
to the opinion which the Jews entertained of it, calls it, Luke xiv. 14. ‘The resurrection of the just.’ In like manner, the fourth of the seven brethren mentioned above said to his persecutor, 2 Macc. vii. 14. ‘As for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life.’ So also Josephus, speaking of the opinion of the Flavians, says, Aniq. xviii. 2. ‘They believe that there are (Jer. xvi. 19) retributions under the earth to such as have attached themselves to virtue or vice in this life; and that the one are condemned to perpetual imprisonment, but that the other have an easy return to life.’—To this notion of the resurrection, the Jews were naturally led by the covenant with Abraham, in which the everlasting possession of Canaan, in its second and highest meaning, was promised to the spiritual seed only; that is, to believers of all nations, who in the covenant are counted to Abraham for seed.

That the Jews, from the earliest times, expected the resurrection of the dead, and derived their hope of that great event from the covenant with Abraham, is attested in the most express manner by the apostle Paul, who, scouring not to say to Festus and king Agrippa, in the hearing of the chiefs of the Jews, Acts xxvi. 6. ‘And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers. 7. Unto which promise our twelve tribes, when they were yet all in one, were gathered of old, hoped to come.’ But to what promises do the fathers allude, which did the twelve tribes hope to come, which they were not in possession of at the time the apostle said this, unless it was the promise in the covenant, that God would raise Abraham’s seed by faith from the dead, to possess the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the emblem? Accordingly, to show that that was the promise which the apostle had in his eye, he immediately added, ‘For which hope’s sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. 8. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?’—The same apostle openly affirmed in the hearing of Felix, and of the Jewish council, that the resurrection of the dead is a thing written in the law and the prophets, Acts xxiv. 14. ‘But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call hence, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets. 15. And have hope towards God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust.’ But the resurrection of the just is not mentioned in the law of Moses, except in the covenant with Abraham, where God promised to count Abraham’s faith for righteousness, and to give to him and to his seed the everlasting possession of Canaan.—And with respect to the prophets, the resurrection of the dead is not written by them any otherwise than as they have foretold the accomplishment of the promises in the covenant, according to their second and highest meanings, by speaking of them as the accomplishment of these promises according to their first or literal meaning. For example, Isaiah hath foretold the multiplication of Abraham’s spiritual seed by the great increase of his natural progeny; Chap. xlix. 16-26; ix. 1–3; ix. 1–5.—And the conversion of the natural seed to the faith of the gospel, and their salvation, by their restoration to the land of Canaan: Chap. li. 9–16.; lii. 9–12.—And their happiness in their converted state, by the building and adorning of its cities: Chap. lx. 4, 5, 6.—And the excellency of the heavenly country, and the happiness of the spiritual seed in that country, by the creation of the new heaven and the new earth: Chap. xli. 46.—And the restoration of the natural seed; in which new earth there is to be neither pain nor sorrow: Chap. lxv. 17–20.—And the worship of God in the heavenly country, by the restoration of the Messianic worship in its purity in the new earth: Chap. lxxi. 20–34.

Lastly, the prevalence of the hope of the resurrection of the dead among the Israelites in the earliest times, may be understood from this well-known fact, that the nations who sprang from Abraham by Hagar and Ketarah entertained the same hope, and communicated it to their neighbours; so that the resurrection of the dead, in one shape or another, was believed by the greatest part of the inhabitants of the east. Hence Job, who was an Aramean, expressed his hope of the resurrection in the strongest terms, chap. xix. 25. ‘I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. 26. And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. 27. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me.’

The particulars contained in this section merit attention, as they shew how much the Deists and others are mistaken, who think the immortality of the soul, and the retributions of a future state, were not made known to the Jews by Moses and the prophets.

Sect. IV.—Of the fourth Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise is recorded Gen. xvii. 7. ‘I will establish my covenant betwixt me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant.’ And I will be their God.’—This promise, though expressed in the most simple language, comprehends deep meanings. It consists of two articles.

1. The first article is contained in verse 7. ‘I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant.’ This establishment of God’s covenant with Abraham and his seed in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, in its first or literal meaning implied, that Abraham’s natural seed were to remain a distinct people in their successive generations, without ever being destroyed; because if they were to be destroyed, God’s covenant with them would not have been everlasting. To this interpretation we are led by Moses, who declared, that if God destroyed Abraham’s natural seed, it would be a breaking of his covenant with them: Lev. xxvi. 44. ‘And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I shew them to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them. ’ And it is added by Jeremiah, that he would utterly destroy the nations who had oppressed the natural seed of Abraham, but would never make a full end to his posterity: Jer. xlv. 28. ‘Fear not, O Jacob my servant, saith the Lord, for I am with thee: for I will make a full end of all the nations whither I have driven thee, but I will not make a full end of thee.’

In this promise, according to its first and literal meaning, an event is foretold of a very singular nature; namely, that Abraham’s natural seed are always to continue a distinct race, and are never to be lost by mixing with other nations. To this nothing similar hath ever happened. For where are the people who, being scattered over the face of the earth, have preserved themselves distinct from the rest of mankind, so that, after continuing in a state of dispersion for thousands of years, the individuals, in their successive generations, are known to be of that people! The Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans, have all in their turn conquered, and been conquered, but have not kept themselves distinct from their conquerors, although they were not carried captives from their own country, far less were they scattered over the face of the earth, as the Israelites have been. All these nations are now so mixed with their conquerors, that the individuals of them cannot be distinguished. To the reason and experience of mankind, the continuance of Abraham's natural seed distinct from all the rest of the world, foretold in his promise, must, before it happened, have appeared an event utterly improbable. Yet this improbable event hath actually taken place, through a long succession of ages. For from the time of their going down into Egypt to this day the Israelites, notwithstanding the many calamities which befell them, have still been preserved a distinct and numerous people, till the fulness of the Gentiles is come in, and their existence as a separate race is no longer needed to strengthen the evidences of the gospel. At that period, they also shall be converted to the faith of Christ, and, entering into the Christian church, they will, with the other disciples of Christ, assist in preserving the knowledge and worship of God among mankind to the end of the world. These things their own prophets have foretold, under the idea of their being restored to their own land and of their worshipping God there, according to the Mosaic ritual.

But God's promise to establish his covenant with Abraham's seed in their generations for an everlasting covenant, in its second and higher meaning, imported, that his spiritual as well as his natural seed should be continued in his kingdom, and be separately from the wicked for ever. Accordingly, notwithstanding Abraham's spiritual seed, the sincere worshippers of God, have from the beginning been persecuted, and often worn out, by the seed of the serpent, they have never been utterly destroyed. There have always been, in every nation, many good men who feared God and wrought righteousness, and who notwithstanding they were not distinguished from the wicked by any external mark, as Abraham's natural seed always have been, are nevertheless sufficiently distinguished from them by their faith and holiness, and will continue a distinct people to all eternity. To render God's covenant with them everlasting in the strictest sense, Matt. xiii. 49. 'At the end of the world the angels shall come forth, and separate the wicked from among the just.' And being separated, Christ will carry them with him into heaven, and form them into one great community, called, Heb. xii. 27. 'The general assembly and church of the first-born;' and, Rev. xii. 23. 'There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whosoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie, but they who are written in the Lamb's book of life.' In this community the spiritual seed of Abraham will remain to all eternity, separated from the wicked, and united to one another by the indissoluble bond of the warmest love and friendship for ever.

The second article of the fourth promise is contained in these words: 'I will be thy God.' This implies, 1. That Abraham's natural seed were in general to know and acknowledge the true God as their God.—Moreover, this promise being connected with their possession of Canaan, in the following manner, Gen. xvii. 8. 'I will give to thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession;' and I will be your God;' it signified, that the title of Abraham's seed to possess Canaan, depended on their continuing to worship and obey God.—How this promise, in its first or literal meaning, was accomplished, we learn from Moses, who insinuates that Abraham's posterity in Canaan, and in Egypt, acknowledged and worshipped the God of their fathers by those natural acts of piety which reason dictated, till they came to Sinai. "And the Lord spake unto Abram, saying, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to possess it. And he said, "I will establish my covenant upon thee, and upon thy seed after thee throughout their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to give thee seed, that the land whereinto thou goest may possess it. That Abraham's posterity, while they remained in Canaan, continued to worship the true God according to that ritual. On some occasions, indeed, they deviated into idolatry. But they were always soon reclaimed, by the punishments which God sent on them. Besides, at no time did the whole nation to a man follow after idols. In the times of the greatest corruption, there were many who abhorred idols. Thus it was in the reign of Ahaz, when Elisha thought himself the only worshipper of the true God remaining in Israel: For there were, even then, seven thousand men left, who had not bowed the knee to Baal, 1 Kings xvii. 19. Thus it was likewise during the Babylonish captivity, when Shadrach and his companions were cast into a burning furnace, for refusing to worship the image which Nebuchadnezzar set up. Moreover, by the punishments sent on the Israelites for departing from the law of Moses, they were at length so thoroughly cured of their propensity to idolatry, that after their return from Babylon, even to this day, their abhorrence of idols hath been extreme. They have long ago been driven out of Canaan by the Romans, and have continued in a state of Dispersion ever since. But these evils did not befal them because they had forsaken the law of Moses, being more zealous of it than then; but because they crucified the Christ and rejected the gospel. In short, notwithstanding they have continued long in this last dispersion, and have suffered innumerable evils for their rebellion, not only for their forsaking the gospel, but for the manner in which they have accommodated themselves to the Gentiles and Christians also, they have continued to know and worship the God of their fathers, by such rites of the law of Moses as they could perform out of Judea: so signal hath the promise in the covenant, that God would be the God of Abraham's natural seed in their generations, been accomplished.

This promise, in its second and higher meaning here, hath been fulfilled in Abraham's spiritual seed likewise. From the beginning, there have been in all nations many who have known the true God, and have worshipped him by pious affections, by prayer, and by a sincere desire to know and to do his will;—a worship more acceptable to God than any worship by bodily rites. Through this spiritual worship, believers of all nations, the Jews or Gentiles, are by the promise of God, that is by a free gift, entitled to the possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type. And as all who believe in Christ are Abraham's spiritual seed, and the true Israel of God, the promise, that he would be a God to Abraham's seed in their generations, hath been remarkable. The spiritual worship of the true God have been more effectually spread through the world, and preserved among mankind by the disciples of Christ, than by the disciples of Moses.

That the preservation of the knowledge and worship of God in the world by the spiritual seed was promised in the covenant, appears from Jer. xxxi. 93. 'This shall be the covenant which I will make with the house of Israel, after those days, saith the Lord: I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people.' And from Isa. lix. 20. 'And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them who turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. 21. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord, My spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.' According to the prophets, therefore, one of the particulars included in God's promise, that he would be a God to Abraham's seed in their generations, was that the true God, who gave first to the natural seed in the law, and after that to the spiritual seed in the gospel, would never be lost in the world. With admiration and gratitude we behold the
ON THE COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

This promise hath been fulfilled to the spiritual seed likewise; for, notwithstanding the sincere worshippers of God, from the very beginning, have been persecuted by the wicked, and, in these persecutions great numbers of them have been put to death, they have never been utterly destroyed. By the support which God on many occasions hath given to his suffering servants in times of persecution, many have been excited to imitate their virtues; and, by the ordinary care which he taketh of them at all times, the generation of the servants of God hath been, and will be preserved in the world to the end. Nay, we have reason to expect, that at length the effect of that most wise and powerful government which God exercises over the world, will be to diminish the wicked, and to multiply the virtuous till they exceed the wicked in number, as was before observed, p. 345. And with respect to the present happiness of good men, it hath ever been acknowledged that their virtues, in all ordinary cases, make them much more happy than the wicked can be by enjoying the pleasures of sin; and in extraordinary circumstances, if they are more afflicted than others, their felicity will be greater in their broken country, according to Christ's promise, Rev. iii. 11. 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my father on the throne.'

Before we conclude our account of the third and fourth promises in the covenant with Abraham, we will endeavour to shew, First, That Isaac and Essekiel have foretold the general conversion of Abra and their natural seed to the Christian faith, under the idea of their restoration to their own land; and their practising the Christian worship, under the idea of their worshipping God in Canaan according to the purity of the Mosaic ritual; and their happiness in their converted state, under the idea of their employments and enjoyments in the earthly country. Secondly, we shall show how the new heavens and the new earth, ch. xlv. 17. and Essekiel's temple, chap. xili. 1. and the land which he allotted to the twelve tribes, chap. xlvii. 13-23, and the city whose dimensions he hath described, chap. xlv. 6. are the same with the new heaven and new earth, and the heavenly Jerusalem, which John saw in his vision, related Rev. chapters xxi. xxii.; consequently, that the new heavens and the new earth, such as they shall be absolutely free from the apostle have spoken, are the heavenly country promised in the covenant with Abraham's spiritual seed.

1. First, then, that Isaac and Essekiel have foretold the general conversion of Abraham's natural seed to the Christian faith and worship, under the idea of their restoration to their own land, and of their worshipping God in Canaan according to the Mosaic ritual, and their happiness in their converted state, under the idea of their felicity in the earthly Canaan, must, I think, be acknowledged, when it is considered that these prophecies, literally understood, contain particulars which cannot be supposed to happen, if the Israelites, after being restored to their own land, are to live as formerly under the institutions of Moses; such as, that they shall be absolutely free from transgressions, and be all righteous. Ezek. xxxvii. 23. 'Neither shall they defile themselves,—with any of their transgressions. 24. They shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes and do them.' So also Isa. lx. 31. 'Thy people shall be all righteous.' Further, these prophecies, literally understood, foretell, that when the Israelites are placed in Canaan, God's servant David shall be their prince for ever,' Ezek. xxxvii. 25.; and that all the nations of the earth shall be subservient to them, Isa. lx. 12. 'The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee, shall perish: Yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted.' But if these prophecies foretell the conversion of the Jews, the particulars mentioned in them will happen. As, they preserved a holy, pure, and distinct people, till the whole purposes of their separation from the rest of mankind are accomplished. righteousness merely by performing ritual services, but by doing pious and virtuous actions: And in the Christian church, Christ, called David, because he was prefigured by David, will rule them for ever. Moreover, the nation that will not serve them in their converted state, namely, by building up their walls, as it is explained Isa. ix. 10. that is, by entering into the Christian church and strengthening it, 'shall be utterly waster.'

2. Secondly, That Isaiah's new heaven and new earth, and Ezekiel's country and city, are the same with the new heaven and new earth, and the heavenly Jerusalem which John saw in his visions, will appear from comparing their several descriptions of these matters. Isaiah's new heaven and new earth which God is to create, are to be so excellent that 'the former shall not be remembered,' Isa. lxv. 17. Wherefore they are to be created after the former heaven and earth are passed away. In this circumstance they agree with John's new heaven and new earth: for he sees those after the first heaven and the first earth were passed away, Rev. xxi. 1. Next, as in Isaiah's new Jerusalem, which God is to create a rejoicing place for his people, so in John's new Jerusalem, 'there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain,' Rev. xxii. 4. Farther, as Isaiah said to the Israelites, chap. lx. 19. 'The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light to thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory.' So of his new Jerusalem John says, Rev. xxii. 23. 'The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of the Lord did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.' And with respect to Ezekiel's waters, which issued out from under the threshold of the house, and became a great river, Ezek. xlv. 1-8, it is the same with John's river, which is the river of life among the Israelites, Numb. xx. 7. The waters of the throne of God, Rev. xxii. 1. For, as on the banks of Ezekiel's river a tree grew 'which brought forth new fruit according to his months, and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine,' Ezek. xlvii. 12; so on either side of John's river, 'was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and the leaves thereof were for the healing of the nations,' Rev. xxii. 2.

These descriptions agree so exactly in all points with each other, that it is reasonable to suppose the subject of the prophecies and of the vision is the same. Wherefore, as John saw the new heaven and the new earth, and the heavenly Jerusalem, and the pure river of water of life issuing from the throne of God, Ezekel's country and city, Ezek. xlvii. 17, growing on its banks, after the resurrection of the dead, and general judgment, and punishment of the wicked, (Rev. xxi. 11-15), I think it probable, that the prophecies in which all these particulars are mentioned, foretell the state of things after the resurrection, and general judgment; consequently, that Isaiah's new heaven and new earth, and Ezekiel's country and city, are the heavenly country promised to Abraham, and to his spiritual seed, in the covenant.

3. In the third place, St. Peter hath directed us to interpret Isaiah's prophecy and John's vision, of the heavenly country in which the righteous are to live after the resurrection and judgment. For, after describing the utter destruction of the present city and heaven and earth by fire, he adds, 2 Pet. iii. 13. 'Nevertheless we, according to his promise, expect new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.' These great events, he tells us, will happen when Christ returns from heaven to raise the dead and judge the world; and calls it the resurrection of all things, and affirms, that God hath spoken of it in all the books of his truth, and promised it. Is. ii. 19. 'Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.' And he shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached to you, 21. Whom the heavens must receive, till the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' But where hath God promised to create new heavens and a new earth, wherein righteousness is to dwell, except in the covenant with Abraham, in which he promised an heavenly country to Abraham's spiritual seed? And where do we find that God hath spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, unless it be in that covenant, and in the prophecies which foretell the fulfilment of the promises in that covenant?

Of the form and constitution of the heavenly country to be created for an everlasting habitation to Abraham's seed by faith, we know little, except. 1. That it will be a material habitation. For, as the righteous are to be raised with glorious, incorruptible, and immortal bodies, their everlasting habitation must be suited to the corporeal part of their being, and adapted to the greatest perfection of which it is capable. See 1 Cor. xv. 44. note. Hence the propriety of representing the heavenly country under the image of the earthly Canaan.—2. The new heavens and the new earth, being destined for an habitation to all the virtuous and the good, who have lived and who are to live in the world from first to last, they must be such as are capable of containing them, and with them such of the angelic natures as are to live with them in their new abode.—3. In scripture there are passages which lead us to believe that God will dwell with the righteous in the heavenly country, by some visible manifestation of his presence, unapproachably more resplendent than the glory by which he manifested his presence in Canaan; and in the ancient worship of Canaan, no addition to his happiness from the excellency of his own works, we may suppose that the new heavens and earth will be so much the more exclusively contrived, and so much the more glorious, that he himself is to be sensibly present with his people. Wherefore, if the present earth, even as it lieth under the curse, and is the habitation of sinners, affords its inhabitants such a variety of enjoyments, how full of pleasures must the future country be, which God's wisdom hath contrived, and his power created, for the entertainment of his favourite people. Isa. lxv. 18. 'Be you glad and rejoice for ever, in that which I create; for behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy.' And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and I will rejoice in her, says the Lord of hosts, 8. No. 558, where the future habitation of the righteous, and their happiness in that abode, are elegantly described.

Sect. V.—Of the fifth Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise we have Gen. xii. 2. 'I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing: 3. And in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.'—xviii. 18. 'Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him.'

Concerning this promise let it be observed, that although at the time it was spoken Abraham may have thought it a promise of great temporal felicity only, to him and to the families of the earth through him, in some manner which he did not understand; yet afterwards, when God counted his faith to him for righteousness, and constituted him the father of many nations, he might conjecture, that in the springs of that faith and of righteousness, was what God meant by blessing him, as was observed p. 253.; and that by constituting him the father of many nations, he was to make his name great; and that the blessing of all the families of the earth in him, consisted in their having their faith counted to them for righteousness, by virtue of the promise which God made to him as their father.

But whether Abraham understood this to be the meaning of the promise or not, what Paul wrote to the Galatians shows that it is its true meaning: Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations through Jesus Christ.' For what blessing belonging to Abraham can come on the nations through Christ’s buying them off from curse of the law, unless it be the blessing of justification mentioned ver. 8. that is, the blessing of having their faith counted to them for righteousness, called the blessing of Abraham, because it was first promised to him personally by a covenant; and because in that covenant God promised to him to bestow the same blessing on men of all nations, who imitated him in his faith and obedience, and who, on that account, are considered by God as his children. For, as was shown p. 258. Abraham was constituted the father of many nations, for the express purpose of receiving the promises in the covenant on their behalf, and in their names. Wherefore, seeing the counting of Abraham’s faith to him for righteousness, as was the case, it was necessary that he should become the father of the nations, that they too should be imitated in his faith and obedience, and that he should be the father of the nations in the same sense, in which he was to be the father of the families in the earth in him, implied that all who imitated him in his faith and obedience, were to have their sins in like manner pardoned, and to receive the reward due by God’s promise to righteous persons; and that they are to be thus blessed, in consequence of the promise made to Abraham as the father of all believers.

This blessing of faith counted to them for righteousness, will assuredly come on all the families of the earth. For, as was shewed in the Illust. of Romans ii. Ess. vi. sect. 3. if faith does not consist in the belief of things which one hath no opportunity of knowing, but in the belief of such things as are made known to him, whether by the light of nature or by revelation, and in a sincere disposition to know and do the will of God, men in every age and nation may exercise true faith, and may have their faith counted to them for righteousness, on account of what Christ hath done to procure that great blessing for them, whether they have lived in or out of God’s visible church. For it is on this account that the general judgment, when their trial being ended, their state will be settled by the sentence of their Judge. For, seeing the pardon of sin consisteth in a complete deliverance from death the punishment of sin, and seeing the rewarding one as a righteous person, impleth his actually receiving the reward due to a righteous person, it is evident that neither of these can take place till the judgment is ended. At that period of the divine government, the promise to bless all the families of the earth in Abraham, will be performed in the full extent of its meaning: Because then every one who is found to have feared God, and to have wrought righteousness, shall be accepted with him, whether they have lived in any visible church of God or not; for the Judge of all the earth is no respecter of persons, Acts x. 34.

The foregoing interpretation of God’s promise to bless all the families of the earth in Abraham, is confirmed by St. Paul, as was hinted above. For he hath declared, that the blessing of the nations in Abraham, consisted in God’s justifying them by faith. Gal. iii. 8. ‘Now the scripture saith, “And that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel (the good news) to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all the nations be blessed.” Wherefore they who are of faith, are blessed with believing Abraham.’ After this testimony of an inspired apostle, can there be any doubt concerning the meaning of God’s promise to ‘bless all the families of the earth in Abraham?’

Sect. VI.—Of the sixth Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

Thus promise was made to Abraham, after he had laid Isaac on the altar with an intention to offer him as a burnt-offering; and is recorded, Gen. xxii. 18. ‘In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.’

Because Isaiah had said to the Israelites, chap. i. 3. ‘The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising,’ the Jewish doctors affirmed, that the Gentiles were to be enlightened with the knowledge of the true God, and of his commandments, by the Jews converting them to Judaism. Also they affirmed, that this is the blessing of all the nations of the earth in Abraham’s seed, which was promised to him in the covenant. But these interpretations St. Paul hath confuted, Gal. iii. 16. by observing, that the words of the promise are not ‘in and in seeds,’ as speaking of many persons, but ‘in and in thy seed,’ as speaking of one person only. For from this circumstance he argued, that the blessing of all the nations of the earth in Abraham’s seed was to be accomplished by one person only. Gal. iii. 25. that shall be blessed.

This argument, at first sight, may perhaps appear inconclusive, especially as, in the other promises, the word seed is used collectively, to denote a multitude of persons. Yet when it is remembered, that at the fall God said to the serpent, ‘I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed—it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise it,’ there can be no doubt, that by the seed of the woman one person only was meant; and that the bruising the head of the serpent, signified that one person’s defeating the malicious scheme which the devil (who because he assumed the form of a serpent when he deceived Eve, is called that old serpent, the Devil and Satan, Rev. xii. 9.) had contrived for destroying the earth, and for the slaughter of serpents by men; for that was too trifling an event to be so solemnly foretold on so important an occasion. Besides, such an interpretation would imply, that Eve was deceived by a natural serpent, which is not to be supposed. Wherefore, the restorer of the human race having been foretold at the fall, under the appellation of the seed of the woman, Abraham would naturally think of him, and of the purpose for which he was to be born, when God said to him, ‘In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.’ And the apostle reasoned justly, when, from its being said to him, and in thy seed, he concluded, that the nations were to be blessed in one person, who is Christ. For if God had meant to tell Abraham that the nations were to be blessed in the Israelites, his natural seed, collectively, he would have said, and in thy seed or sons, to prevent him from interpreting the promise of the person foretold at the fall under the appellation of the seed of the woman, who was to bruise the head of the serpent.

This promise hath been signally fulfilled in Christ, as the apostle hath affirmed; for, 1. In the prospect of Christ coming into the world, born of a woman, and of his offering himself a sacrifice for sin, Adam and Eve were respite from death, and had a new trial appointed to them, under a more gracious covenant than the first; a covenant better adapted to their nature, now that it was wrought by sin. Their temporary respite from death God intended by saying to the woman, ‘In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children;’ and to the man, ‘In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground.’ And their having a new trial appointed, was instituted in the declaration, that the 'seed of the woman was to bruise the head of the serpent.' For if they were still to live under the first covenant, the sacrifice and its intercession for their destruction would have taken effect inevitably. It could only be frustrated by their having an opportunity, under a new covenant, of regaining the life which they had forfeited by their first disobedience. Further, that this gracious new covenant was procured for them by the death of the seed of the woman, was intimated by the bruising of his heel at the time he bruised the serpent's head. For although they might not, in that dark expression, discern the death of the seed of the woman as a sacrifice for their sin, God may have revealed it to them, together with its happy consequences. And the important discovery being made to them, in order that it might be perpetuated among their posterity, God may have appointed them to worship him by the sacrifice of beasts. It is true, Moses hath not said that God ordered our first parents to offer such sacrifices; yet he telling us, that God accepted the sacrifice of the firstlings of his flock which Abel offered to him, implies, that such a command was actually given by God; otherwise, the worshipping him by the sacrifice of beasts would have been a new thing; consequently it would not have been accepted by him.

Farther, as the bruising of the head of the serpent by the seed of the woman, and the serpent's bruising his heel, were of all the discoveries made to mankind in the first age the most important, may we not suppose, that they, to teach mankind the meaning of the serpent's bruising the heel of the seed of the woman, immediately, that it signified his death as an atonement for the sins of men, God commanded Abraham to offer up his only son as a burnt-offering?—That this was its meaning, Abraham might conjecture from the extraordinary nature of the command: Or if, by the strength of his own reason, he could not discover this, the angel who spake to him stood by, and laid the altar, may have made it known to him. For our Lord himself assures us, that Abraham saw his day with joy: John viii. 56. 'Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad.'

3. And in the view of Christ's coming and offering himself a sacrifice for sin, all Adam's posterity are included. This is what is said of the priest, Psal. cxlvii. 20. 'The Lord shall be exalted in his holiness.' For if Adam's posterity were included in the covenant under which he fell, so far as to be liable to death for his offence, it is reasonable to think, that they are likewise included in the new covenant which was made with him, and that thereby they have an opportunity given them of regaining that bodily life which Adam forfeited for them. Besides, if the law under which Adam's posterity now live, be the law of works, to what purpose hath God allowed them to come into existence? By obedience to that law none of them can obtain life, but for the smallest act of transgression must perish. This, then, is one of the great blessings which are procured for mankind by Abraham's seed. In the prospect of his dying as a sacrifice for sin, they have obtained a trial under a more gracious covenant than the first; and this favour is not confined to any one nation or race of men, but is extended to all the posterity of Adam, without excepting any of them. So that in respect of this happy effect of his coming into the world in the human nature, he may truly be said to have died for all. See 2 Cor. v. 15, note 1.

3. By dying as a sacrifice for sin, Abraham's seed, Christ, hath obtained for all the nations of the earth deliverance from death, the curse of the law which Adam brake: so the apostle assures us, Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us.' His meaning, however, is not that any of his posterity is necessarily thus blessed, but that they are all to be raised from the dead by Christ, in order to their receiving reward or punishment according to what they have done in this life, whether it hath been good or bad. They, who by giving the obedience of faith, have fulfilled the gracious requisitions of the new covenant under which they were mercifully placed, and who, when they failed in particular instances, have repented of these failures, shall be pardoned, and rewarded with eternal life: but they who have neither given this obedience, nor repented of their sinful courses, shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

4. As the reward of his dying for the sins of men, Abraham's seed, Christ, after his resurrection, was exalted to the government of the world. Wherefore, seeing he exercises that government with the greatest wisdom, and power, and goodness, for the benefit of mankind, all the nations of the earth have, by his government of the world, been greatly blessed in him. And, in particular, they have been blessed in him with the influences of the Spirit, to enable them to overcome the evil propensities of their nature, and to fulfill the requisitions of the law of faith, under which he hath placed them. In one word, all the nations of the earth being indebted to Abraham's seed, Christ, for every blessing of providence and of grace which they enjoy, or hope to enjoy, they have been greatly blessed in him.

5. Many nations of the earth have been blessed in Abraham's seed, Christ, with the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation, and of the rewards and punishments of a future state. For those, with the other doctrines of true religion, Christ's religion, he sent out only apostles and prophets by inspiration; and through the fidelity and diligence with which they published those things to the world, the knowledge of them was given to many nations in the first age, and hath been continued among them ever since, and even spread in the world, by the stated ministration of the church. Nevertheless, all the nations of the earth have not as yet heard the gospel; nor have all obeyed it to whom it hath been preached. But the prophets have foretold, and we believe, that in some future period the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God, by means of the gospel preached everywhere, and received everywhere. So that, as was said of the light of the world, 'And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed,' men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed.'

These are the blessings which were to come on all the nations of the earth, through Abraham's seed, Christ, because Abraham obeyed God's voice in offering up his only son Isaac, as a burnt-offering. By this, however, God did not mean that Abraham's obedience procured these blessings for the nations through Christ, but that, as the reward of his obedience in the affair of Isaac, God promised that the person through whom these blessings were to come on the nations, should be one of Abraham's seed. This interpretation is agreeable to the plain meaning of the words. 'And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.'

CONCLUSION.

Having explained God's promises to Abraham, both in their literal and allegorical meaning, and having showed in what manner they have been already fulfilled, or are yet to be fulfilled to the heirs thereof, it will be useful to look back, and take a view of the great discoveries which were made of God's gracious purposes respecting mankind, in that ancient oracle which God himself hath dignified with the appellation of his covenant with Abraham. First, then, in promising to bless Abraham exceedingly, it appeared that God had intended to bestow on him the great blessing of justification by faith, that is, his intention both to pardon his sins, and to reward him as a righteous person for his faith. In consequence of his pardon, Abraham is to be delivered from death, the punishment of sin, by being raised from the dead. And with respect to his reward, it will consist in the everlasting possession of that heavenly country, of which the earthly country promised to him and to his natural seed, was the emblem and pledge.—2. By constituting Abraham the father of many nations, God declared that he will consider all in every nation who imitate Abraham in his faith and obedience, as Abraham's seed, and perform to them the blessings promised in the covenant to Abraham's seed: consequently, believers of nations are, like Abraham, to be justified by faith: they are to be pardoned, and to obtain the everlasting inhertance of heaven, after being raised from the dead. Also in heaven they are to have God for the object of their worship, and the source of their happiness to all eternity.
And these blessings, which are all to come on them through Abraham's seed, Christ, are in the covenant declared to be the common privilege of believers of every age and nation, as Abraham's seed, whether they have lived in any visible church of God on earth or not.—3.
But, which is of the greatest importance in this matter, it is expressly declared, that the blessings promised in the covenant are not to come on any, but on those whose faith is accompanied with habitual obedience. This God declared concerning Abraham himself, Gen. xviii. 19. 'I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.'
Thus it appears, that the principal doctrines, precepts, and promises, which were made known to the world more plainly in the gospel, were discovered to the Israelites in the covenant which God made with their father Abraham; so that, properly speaking, it was the gospel of the Israelites, and the rule of their justifica-

Sect. I.—Of the Doctrine of Justification, as explained by the Apostle Paul.

Paul, in his epistles to the Romans and to the Galtians, hath treated largely of the justification of mankind.
What he has said on that subject is this: that salvation Romans, is comprehended in two propositions; the first of which we have Rom. iii. 20. 'By works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.' Now, since the apostle is speaking of a man's being justified in the sight of God, it is evident, that in this passage he considers men as standing at the tribunal of God, and claiming to be acquainted on account of works of law; that is, on account of their having done all the works which God's law requireth. Concerning men in these circumstances, the apostle declares, that 'by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight;' for this unanswerable reason, 'Because through law is the knowledge of sin.' The law of God, by requiring perfect obedience to all its precepts, under the penalty of death, maketh every man sensible that he is a sinner, and that, instead of being entitled to justification on account of works of law, he is liable to punishment on account of his sins. Wherefore, the knowldedge of sin committed being incompatible with a mer-torious justification, it is certain, as the apostle hath declared, that 'by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God.'

But God, as Judge, may justify sinners gratuitously; that is, he may from favour pardon their sins on repentance, and by that pardon free them from punishment.
Of this kind of justification St. Paul also speaks. For having affirmed and proved, that it is impossible for any sinner to be justified in the sight of God on account of works of law, because he neither hath performed nor can perform them, (see Rom. iii. 20. note 1.) he produceth his second proposition, in which the method established by God for the justification of sinners is declared, ver. 28. 'We conclude, that by faith man is justified, without works of law.'
This proposition consists of two parts; first, That man, in his present lapsed state, is justified by faith; secondly, That he is justified by faith without works of law. These important doctrines the apostle establishes in the following fourth chapter, by appealing to the justification of Abraham, as related by Moses. And because it is natural for men to seek to be justified meritoriously by their own works, the apostle begins with proving, that Abraham was not meritoriously justified by his own works. Rom. iv. 2.
'For (saith he) if Abraham were justified by works, he might boast, but not before God.'—Many contend, that justified by works, in this verse, means gratuitously justiied by works proceeding from faith. And on the authority of this single text, in which it is denied that Abraham was ESSAY VI.—Of Justification.

To understand what the apostles have written, and others have disputed, concerning justification, it will be proper to explain the meaning of the words justify, and justification, as used in common speech. To justify a person, as was shewed Rom. ii. 19. note 2., is a law phrase, denoting the action of a judge, who, when a per-JUSTIFIED BY WORKS, THEY affirne, that in the gratuitous justification of sinners, no regard whatever is had to good works proceeding from faith. But to overturn this false notion, I observe, that if the works mentioned by the apostle are works proceeding from faith, what he hath said of Abraham is not true; namely, that if he were justified by works he might boast. For the man who is justified gratuitously by works proceeding from faith, hath not the least title to boast. So Paul himself tells us, Rom. iii. 27. "Where then is boasting? It is excluded. By what law? Of works! No, but by the law of faith." The law which requires faith working by love in order to justification, effectually excludes all boasting; because works proceeding from faith being imperfect, do not entitle him who performs them to justification. If such a person is justified, it must be by free gift; consequently, he cannot boast of his justification as merited. Wherefore, the justification by works, which the apostle denieth to Abraham, being a justification of which he might have boasted, it cannot be a gratuitous justification by works proceeding from faith; for, I repeat it, of such a justification no man can boast; but it must be a meritorious justification by works, as mentioned Rom. iii. 28, 29. of which one may boast. The apostle having shewed by Abraham's justification, that believers are justified without works of law, proceeds to prove the other branch of his proposition; namely, that men are justified by faith. And this he doth, by appealing, as before, to Abraham's justification. Rom. iv. 2. "For what saith the scripture? And it was counted to him for righteousness." This passage of scripture we have Gen. xv. 6, where we are told, that God brought Abraham forth, and said, Look now towards heaven and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. And he said to him, So shall thy seed be. 6. And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness. On this the apostle reasons in the following manner, Rom. iv. 4. "Now to him who worketh, the reward is not counted as a favour, but as a debt; founding his argument on the phrase, "counted to him as a favour."—"For if Abraham had worked, that is, had obeyed the law of God perfectly, the reward would not have been counted to him, that is, bestowed on him as a favour. I say then, that he established his righteousness as a favour, not as a debt; as the word "reckoned" or "counted" must be understood. For, if he had worked, he would have been counted as a debtor. Now, God, as a gracious Judge, as a debt due to him for his unerring obedience. Next, to shew that Abraham and all believers are justified, not meritoriously by a perfect obedience to the law of God, but gratuitously by faith, the apostle adds, ver. 5. "But to him who doth not work, who doth not pretend to have given a perfect obedience to God's law, (that sense of working is evident from ver. 4.), but believeth on him who justifieth the ungodly," that is, who believeth God's promise to pardon penitent sinners, although they have not given perfect obedience to his law, his faith is counted to him for righteousness as a favour. The faith which such a sinner hath in the mercy of God, if it leads him to obey God sincerely, is, by mere favour, ceased, as he himself hath been justified by his Judge as righteous and justified by God's righteousness, before he became a believer and death and eternal life to every one who believeth on him, and sincerely obeys him. Psal. cxvi. 4. "There is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayst be feared." Such is the apostle Paul's doctrine concerning justification. In the following section we shall examine the doctrine of the apostle James on the same subject, and compare it with Paul's; that we may judge whether the two apostles contradict each other in this important article; as many have erroneously supposed.

SECTION II.—Of the Doctrine of Justification, as Explained by the Apostle James.

James hath treated of justification in the second chapter of his epistle; ver. 20. "Wouldst thou know, O false man, that faith without works is dead! 21. Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had lifted up Isaac his son upon the altar? 22. Thou seest that faith co-operated with his works, and by works his faith was perfected. 23. And so that scripture was confirmed, which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness: and he was called the friend of God. 24. Ye see, therefore, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. 25. And in like manner also, was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, having secretly received the messengers, and having sent them away by another road? 26. For as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without works is dead.

In this account of justification, James is thought to have contradicted Paul; and to reconcile them a variety of solutions have been proposed, most of which lead to very dangerous consequences. But, as shall be shewed immediately, the doctrine of the two apostles is the same: And the supposition, that they havecontradicted each other, is founded on a misapprehension of what they have written on the subject, as will appear from what follows. 1. Although James hath said, 'that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only;' he hath nowhere said, in contradiction to Paul, that by 'works of law' a man is justified. —2. In like manner, although Paul hath said, 'We conclude that by faith man is justified, and not by works of works of law;' he hath not said, in contradiction to James, 'that man is justified by faith only.' He hath denied, indeed, that Abraham was justified by works; but, as was shewed page 264, it is plain from the scope of his reasoning, that the works of which he speaks are not works proceeding from faith, but works of law; that is, a perfect performance of the works enjoined by law. These_Paul was excluded from the justification of Abraham, not because they would have justified him if he had performed them, but because it was not in his power to perform them. —3. The justification by works of which James speaks, is not a meritorious justification by works of law, but a free grace justification by works proceeding from faith, chap. ii. 22. 'Thou seest that faith co-operated with his works, and by works his faith was perfected.' This kind of works Paul is so far from excluding from his idea of justification, that he expressly declares them to be absolutely necessary to it. For, having observed that men are justified by faith, Gal. v. 5. 'We, through the Spirit, look for the hope of righteousness by faith;' to prevent us from imagining that he is speaking of faith disjoined from works, he immediately adds: 'ver. 6. 'For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love.' To the same purpose, Gal. vi. 15. 'In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.' Now, can any one be a new creature without forsoaking his sins, and leading a holy life? Paul's description of a new creature determines this question, 2 Cor. v. 17. 'If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature: Old things are passed away; behold all things are become new.' —Wherefore, as the two apostles do not speak of the same kind of justification, nor of the same kind of works, their doctrine, rightly understood, hath not even the appearance of contradiction. To make their doctrine really contradictory, Paul's free grace justification by faith, or good works proceeding from faith, contrary to the propriety of the expression, and to the scope of the apostle's argument, as was shewed page 264.

Further, that the two apostles have not contradicted each other in their doctrine concerning justification, may be seen in this circumstance, that both of them have founded their doctrines on the same foundation, the presumption is, that their doctrine is the same. For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness. In like manner, James ii. 21. 'Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he lifted up Isaac his son on the altar!' Now, as it is not to be supposed that the two apostles have builded a contradictory doctrine on the same foundation, the presumption is, that their doctrine is the same.

However, not to rest the matter on a presumption, the agreement of the two apostles in this great article of the Christian faith will appear, if the doctrine of each is more narrowly examined. James, by telling us that Abraham was justified by works when he had lifted up Isaac on the altar, evidently alludes to what God said to him, Gen. xxi. 16. 'By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, 17. That in blessing I will bless thee.' This promise to bless Abraham, which God so solemnly confirmed with an oath, James, with as much truth, hath termed God's justification Abraham, as Paul hath given that appellation to God's counting his faith to him for righteousness. For, in fact, God's promise to bless Abraham was the same with his promise to count his faith to him for righteousness, as is plain from Paul's calling the counting of faith for righteousness 'the blessing of Abraham,' Gal. iii. 14. See this proved more fully, chap. iv. 23, v. 6. So, Gal. xiii. 16. 'In blessing I will bless thee,' seeing he promised to bestow on him the blessing of righteousness counted to him; also, seeing God declared that he would so bless him, because he had not withheld his son, his only son, from him; it is evident, that if justification consisted in having righteousness counted to one, Abraham was justified from offering up Isaac, as by his believing in the Lord that his seed should be numerous as the stars of the heaven.

That Abraham was justified by the work of lifting up Isaac on the altar, Paul also hath acknowledged in his epistle to the Hebrews, chap. vi. 13. 'When God made promise to Abraham, seeing he could swear by no one greater, he sware by himself, saying, I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee.' This was the promise which God made to Abraham when he had offered up Isaac, is evident from the oath with which it was confirmed. For on no other occasion did God confirm any promise to Abraham with an oath. And that Paul understood this to be a promise to justify Abraham, is equally evident from the expression, 'confirmed in Almichty God with an oath,' to the end that the heire should have strong consolation from it: ver. 17. 'God, willing more abundantly to shew to the heirs of promise the immutability of his purpose, confirmed his promise (to bless Abraham) with an oath, that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation who have fled away to lay hold on the hope set before us. 16. Which we have as an anchor of the soul.' —But what consolation could the heirs derive from God's promise to bless and multiply Abraham, if the blessing promised to him was not the blessing of justification; and of his having a numerous seed by faith? And what hope was set before the heir to lay hold on as an anchor of the soul, unless it was the hope given to Abraham and to his seed in God's promise to bless and multiply him? Since, therefore, Paul knew that the blessing which God promised to Abraham after he had offered up Isaac, was the blessing of justification; also, since he knew that God expressly declared he would bestow that blessing on him, because he had not withheld his only son, he not only has he comprehended the heirs of promise strong consolation, Paul hath affirmed as expressly as James, that Abraham was justified by the work of offering up Isaac. Consequently, for any one to say, or even to think, that Abraham was not justified by that work is to confound as well as to contradict God himself, who swears to Abraham, 'Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is on the sea-shore.'

Further, although James hath said that Abraham was justified by the work of lifting up Isaac upon the altar, he hath not said, that his faith had no influence in his justification. On the contrary, he tells us expressly, that his faith co-operated with his works, namely, in procuring his justification; and thereby he hath intimated, that that work was rendered effectual by its proceeding from faith: At the same time adding, that by works Abraham's faith was perfected, he with equal plainness intimates, that Abraham's faith would have been imperfect, if he had refused to offer Isaac when God commanded him to do it. Therefore, according to James, to render works acceptable to God, they must proceed from faith; and to render faith perfect or complete, it must produce good works. In short, without this union, neither faith nor works will have any influence in justification. In this doctrine Paul agrees perfectly with James, as is evident from Gal. vi. 6. vi. 15. formerly quoted, p. 266; and from all those passages in his epistles where he declares, that 'the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God,' 1 Cor. vi. 9. and that 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord,' Heb. xi. 4.

Having thus shewed that the two apostles, rightly understood, agree perfectly in their doctrine concerning justification, it remains, for the further illustration of the subject, to offer the five following remarks.

1. Notwithstanding in the account Paul hath given of Abraham's justification, Rom. iv. 3. 4. believing is opposed to working, it does not follow that faith is not a work. Paul himself hath called faith a work, 1 Thess. i. 3. And Christ hath termed believing on whom God hath sent, the work which God prescribed to the Jews, John vi. 28. 29. This I think sheweth, that the working, to which believing is opposed by Paul, does not mean the performing of good works from a principle of faith, but the obedience of the faith, a principle of faith, the law of God enjoins. And the opposition which is stated between believing and working, implieth something more but that believing is not a perfect obedience to the law of God; and that it hath not the influence to procure a meritorious justification, which a perfect obedience would have, if it were possible for us to attain to it.

2. Many theologians, overlooking the doctrine of James concerning justification, and attending only to the subject, without considering the sense of what Paul hath written on the subject, and at the same time forgetting that faith is itself the greatest of all good works, have ascribed to faith some efficacy in justification which good works have not. This efficacy they represent, by calling faith the hand which layeth hold on the righteousness of Christ, so as to make it the righteousness of the believer, and to render him perfectly righteous in the sight of God. But a doctrine of this kind, which implies an impossibility, and from which many dangerous consequences have been deduced by the Antinomians, ought not to be received; more especially as it hath no foundation in scripture. For not only the inspired writers have said that God was able to raise Lazarus even from the dead, after he was burnt to ashes on the altar; and believing that he would actually raise him,—Further, though the possession of Canaan was promised to him personally, Acts vii. 5. God gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on; for the cave and field of Machpelah Abraham bought with his money from Ephron the Hittite. Yet, when he was dying, he died in the firm persuasion that God would raise him from the dead, to possess the country which he had promised to him. What an admirable example of faith and obedience doth the history of this great believer present to our view! An example which shows, that his faith and obedience did not consist in a single act exerted on a particular occasion, but extended to all God's declarations and commands without exception, from the time he left Chaldea to the end of his life. Wherefore, having on every occasion believed in the Lord, and obeyed his commands, he obtained the promise of justification, confirmed by the oath of God, after he had offered up his only son; and was made the father of all believers, to teach us what our dispositions and actions must be, if we expect to be justified as Abraham was; and to make us sensible, that we are not his children, and heirs of the promises made to him and to his seed, unless, as our Lord expresseth it, John viii. 39. 'We do the works of Abraham.'

4. It was mentioned in the preceding Essay, page 251. that God said concerning Abraham, Gen. xviii. 12. 'I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment, that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.' And it was observed, that this was a declaration, not only to Abraham himself, but to Abraham's children, that they were to receive the blessings promised in the covenant, and particularly the blessing of faith counted to them for righteousness, only on condition of their keeping the way of the Lord, and their doing justice and judgment. These things merit the reader's notice in this place; because Abraham's justification being the pattern of our justification, if he was not to have the things promised to him, unless he kept the way of the Lord, and did justice and judgment, we cannot expect pardon and salvation, unless we persevere in faith and holiness to the end of our lives, as Abraham did.

5. The defenders of justification by faith alone ought to consider, that the doctrines of religion, both natural and revealed, may be really believed without having any influence on temper and behavior. So said James, chap. ii. 18. 'One may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works; shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.' 19. Thou believest that there is one God; thou dost well: Even the devils believe this, and tremble. Wherefore, the belief of the doctrines of the gospel, however firm it may be, and however confirmed, for, contrary to what is supposed, of one's body to be burned, will have no influence in any man's justification, if it doth not produce good works. 1 Cor. xiii. 3. A faith of this kind is what James calls 'a dead faith.' Like the body without the spirit, it hath no vital operation. In short, it is not the faith which at the judgment will be counted to the believer for righteousness, but rather will aggravate his wickedness, and increase his punishment.

Sect. III.—Of the Justification of the Heathens.

To the doctrine of justification by faith it hath been objected, by the opposers of revelation, that it excludes all from the possibility of salvation who have not the benefit of revelation. This objection, if it were well founded, would, I acknowledge, bring discredit on the doctrine of justification by faith, and even on the gospel itself; because it would represent God as requiring from sinners a condition of salvation, which he himself hath put it out of their power to attain. But the matter is of no value, as it proceeds on a palpable mistake, namely, that the faith necessary to justification consists in the belief of doctrines knowable only by an external revelation. For whether we consider the scripture account of faith, or whether we examine the particular acts of faith by which individuals are said in scripture to have been justified, we shall find, that faith doth not consist so much in the belief of any revealed moral or religious truth, as in men's attaching themselves sincerely to God by a strong inclination to know and to do his will; and in making a right use of their reason in searching after the will of God, as manifested by the light of nature; or, if they are favoured with an external revelation, in implicitly directing their religious sentiments and conduct by that revelation, so far as they are capable of understanding it; and in relying with an entire confidence on all the promises of God. Properly speaking, therefore, faith lieth in the heart more than in the head. So the apostle Paul teacheth, Rom. x. 10. 'With the heart we believe unto righteousness; we believe so as to have righteousness counted to us.—The same apostle represents faith to consist in the strength of one's persuasion of the religious truths which he believes, and the influence which he derives from his temper and conduct, rather than in the number and extent of the truths which he believes. 2 Cor. iv. 13. 'We having the same spirit (Esa. iv. 66.) of faith, according to what is written, I believed, therefore I have spoken: We also believe, and therefore speak.—Heb. xi. 1. 'Now faith is the confidence (the confident expectation) of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen.'

From this account of faith it appears, that persons may have true faith whose religious knowledge is very limited. For to different persons the objects of faith must be more or fewer, according to their different capacities, and their different opportunities of gaining religious knowledge. In particular, that the faith of those who are denied the benefit of revelation, can have for its object only the truths concerning God discoverable by the light of nature. Yet they may please God by acting agreeably to their faith in these truths. So the apostle hath expressly declared, Heb. xi. 6. 'Without faith it is impossible to please God: For he who cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.'

The declaration, that they please God who diligently seek him, in consequence of their believing that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him, is conformable to truth. For, notwithstanding the faith of those to whom God hath not granted an external revelation, may not be as extensive as the faith of those who have had an opportunity to see and hear God, it is evident that their faith, of which God may be as strong, and their inclination to know and to do his will may be as sincere, and have as great an influence on their conduct, as the faith of those who are favoured with revelation. Nay, their sense of the imperfection of their own works, and their reliance on the mercy of God, may be as complete; consequently, on account of the sincerity of their faith and obedience they may be as acceptable to God as the others who enjoy revelation, and through the merits of Christ may be as readily saved; agreeably to St. Peter's declaration, Acts x. 34. 'Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons. 35. But in every nation, he who feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.'—Further, it is to be considered, that even among those who are favoured with a written revelation, there are great differences in respect of their natural capacities, their improvement by education, and their opportunities of attaining the knowledge of the meaning of that revelation; by all which, the extent of the knowledge and faith of individuals must be very different; so that the same extent of faith in the doctrines of revelation will not be required of all to whom a written revelation hath been given; but in judging individuals, a due regard will be had to the opportunities and advantages which each hath enjoyed. This I think our Lord hath insinuated, Luke xii. 47. 'That servant who knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes.' But he who knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: And to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more.'—Seeing, then, the same extent of faith is not required from all who enjoy the benefit of revelation, because all have not the same natural capacity, nor the same advantages for profiting by revelation, we may for the same reason believe, that from those who are denied the benefit of revelation, that extent of faith is not required which is expected from those who enjoy revelation. And therefore, at the judgment, the Judge will consider what improvement every one hath made of the opportunities and advantages which he enjoyed; and what influence his faith in the truths of the gospel made known to him hath had on his temper and actions.

That the faith necessary to justification consists in a sincere disposition to know and to do the will of God, so far as it is made known to men, and not in the belief of doctrines which they have no means of knowing, appears also from the particular exercises of faith recorded in the scriptures, by which individuals are declared to have been justified.—To begin with Noah: It is said of him, Heb. xi. 7. 'By faith, Noah, when he received a revelation concerning things not at all seen, being seized with religious fear, prepared an ark for the salvation of his family, by which he condemned the world, and became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith.' Noah's faith, in this instance, did not consist in his believing any doctrine of religion made known to him by God, but in his believing a future event which God revealed to him, namely, that the ungodly world was to be destroyed with a flood; and in his obeying God's command to prepare an ark for the salvation of himself and family. Wherefore, since by that faith he became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith, and his following showed in affirming, that the faith of which the apostle speaks in this chapter is not justifying faith.—The next example is Abraham, of whom it is said, Gen. xv. 6. 'Abraham believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness.' He believed the Lord's promise, that his seed should be as the stars of the heavens; and he was reckoned to be an heir of the promise which was made to Abraham for righteousness, the apostle insinuates that he was justified thereby, Rom. iv. 3. 2. But in this instance, as was observed concerning Noah, Abraham's faith had no doctrine of religion for its object, but a future event only, which God promised should take place; namely, that he was to have a son, from whom a progeny, numerous as the stars of the heavens, was to descend. This appears from Rom. iv. 18. 'He, contrary to hope, believed with hope, that he should be the father of many nations, according to what was spoken, (Gen. xv. 6.) So shall thy seed be. 19. And not being weak in faith, he did not consider his own body now dead, being about an hundred years old, neither the deadness of Sarah's womb. 20. Therefore it was counted to him for righteousness.' And on an after occasion, Heb. xi. 17. 'By faith Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac; he who had received the promises, offered him his only begotten. 18. Concerning whom it was said, Surely in Isaac a seed shall be unto thee: 19. Reasoning, that God was able to raise him even from the dead, from whence he received him even for a parable.' In this, as in the former instance, Abraham's faith had no moral or religious truth for its object, but a matter of fact afterwards to happen, the credibility of which depended on God's veracity and power; namely, that the numerous seed promised to him was to spring from Isaac. For Abraham, whose conceptions of the perfections of God were very exalted, reasoned with himself, that God was able to raise Isaac from the dead; and that, to fulfill his promise, he would actually raise him, after being burnt to ashes on the altar.—Rahab's faith likewise, on account of which, ver. 31. 'she was not destroyed with the unbelievers,' which James hath termed her justification, did not consist in her believing any particular revelation which was made to her concerning the God of Israel; but in attending to, and reasoning justly on what she had heard concerning his wonderful works, so as to believe him to be the only true God and governor of the universe. Josh. ii. 9. 'I know that the Lord hath given you this land: 10. For we have heard how the Lord God3 hath led up the wickedness of the people of Egypt, and how he armed them out of Egypt; and what you did unto the two kings of the Amorites that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. 11. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you; for the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath.' Wherefore, since Rahab's faith in the God of the Israelites, as the only true God, led her to receive and conceal the Israelitish messengers at the risk of her life, her faith was perfected by that work; and on account of that work proceeding from her faith, she was justified, as the apostle, James expressly affirms. Besides, it appears from the history that she persevered in the faith and worship of the true God. For after the taking of Jericho, she dwelt among the Israelites, and was highly esteemed by them on account of her personal virtues; in so much that Salmon, a great man in Israel, married her, whereby she became one of our Lord's ancestors, being the mother of Boaz, who was the father of Jesse, and grandfather of David.—The faith likewise of the other ancient Israelites are celebrated in this xith chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, did not consist in their believing any moral or religious doctrine which God had formerly revealed, but in their forming such just conceptions of the power and veracity of God, as led them firmly to expect the fulfillment of all the promises and prophecies which were made to Abraham, concerning his giving the everlasting possession of Canaan to his seed; so that, by their faith in these promises, they were encouraged valiantly to withstand and subdue their enemies.—Of this kind was the faith of Moses's parents, which moved them to disregard the king's commandment, and to hide their son three months; and the faith of Moses himself, which moved him to leave the court of Egypt, and to suffer persecution with the people of God, rather than to enjoy the temporary pleasures of sin: moved him also to institute the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, that the destroying angel might not touch the first-born of the Israelites.—Of the same kind was the faith of the Israelites, by which they entered into, and passed through the Red Sea; and of Joshua, by which he expected the walls of Jericho to fall down, after being encompassed seven days; and of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson and Jephtha; of David also and Samuel, and of the prophets; who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the power of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, out of weakness became mighty, became makers of war, driven out the nations: and their enemies were subdued, and they possessed the kingdom: and, through faith, they were all set down to the world without asingle exception, the apostle's discourse in this chapter proceeds on the supposition, that faith is a disposition in the heart, leaving
ON JUSTIFICATION.

ESSAY VI.

those who possess it to act suitably to their knowledge of the will of God respecting their conduct, whether his will was discovered to them by the light of nature or by revelation.

The foregoing examples of persons who were justified by their faith in the declarations and promises of God, notwithstanding these declarations and promises related merely to temporal matters, prove, I think, that they who believe in God, according to the manifestation which he hath made of himself by the light of nature, may be justified even by that kind of faith, provided it leads them habitually to comply with the will of God, so far as they know it. It is no just objection to this, neither doth it support Owen's affirmation, mentioned p. 269, that some of the persons whose faith and obedience are praised by the apostle, were not justified thereby; such as many of the Israelites, who by faith passed through the Red Sea, but afterwards, by reason of unbelief, refused to go into Canaan, and for that sin were destroyed in the wilderness; and those who by faith compassed the walls of Jericho seven days, in expectation of their falling down, who cannot all be supposed to have been justified by that one act of faith; and perhaps some others who are said through faith to have subdued kingdoms. For since the apostle saith, ver. 39. ' All these, though well testified of through faith,' but when they were tested, ver. 40. God had foreseen some better things for us, that they without us should not be made perfect;' he certainly means, that many of these persons were justified by their faith: and with respect to the rest, there can be no doubt, that in so far as their faith led them to obey God, in the instances mentioned by the apostle, they did what was pleasing to God. But even on this supposition too, it may be said, that they were not justified by their faith, because it was only temporary, it were wrong, on that account, to conclude concerning the rest, who are said to have obtained a good testimony through faith, and who are to be perfected, that is, rewarded together with us, that their faith did not avail to their justification; unless it could be proved, that, like the Israelites who passed through the Red Sea, they did not persevere in their faith and obedience. In particular, the conclusion would most certainly be false with respect to Noah, and Abraham, and Rahab. For of them it is testified, in so many words, that they were justified by their faith, notwithstanding we know its objects were such moral and religious truths only as were discovered by the light of nature, and which revelation added nothing to. God was pleased to make to them personally, concerning certain temporal matters in which they were greatly interested.

Thus, from the accounts which the inspired writings have given of the faith necessary to justification, and from the example of those who are said in the scriptures to have been justified by their faith, it is abundantly evident, that justifying faith in different persons must be different in respect of its objects, according to the opportunities and advantages bestowed on each. Nevertheless, the principle of faith being the same in every dispensation, it may, by the assistance of the Spirit of God, be attained under every dispensation, and may be productive of holiness in the believer, in proportion to the extent and strength of his belief. If this account of the matter be just, it removes the greatest objection which infidels have raised against the gospel. For, by establishing faith as the condition or means of justification, it hath excluded none, not even the heathens, from the possibility of salvation. This liberal doctrine the apostle Paul, if I mistake not his meaning, expressly taught. He saith, 2 Cor. xi. 11. whereas in another place he tells us, that Abraham received the mark of circumcision, as a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had in uncircumcision, in order to his being the father of all who believe in uncircumcision, that righteousness might be counted even to them.'

But while we contend, that persons may have the faith necessary to justification, who, through their want of revelation, are ignorant of Christ, and of the method of salvation, we are far from thinking that any person not be justified otherwise than they are justified, are justified of God's free gift, through the merit of Christ's obedience to death. And that many will be justified in that manner, we are warranted to believe: for, as the apostle Paul hath excellently reasoned, Rom. v. 12, since it was consistent with the justice and goodness of God to subject all to death for the disobedience of Adam, notwithstanding the great part who were mankind never heard either of Adam or of his disobedience, it is equally consistent with the justice and goodness of God to bestow pardon and eternal life at the judgment on believers of all nations, on account of the mentionious obedience of Christ, notwithstanding many of them never heard till then of the Person to whom they bore the great obligation, nor of a punishment inflicted by which it was procured for them. And the rather, that the discovery of the author of their salvation, and of the method by which he procured it, though not made to them till the judgment, will come in good time to lay a foundation for their gratitude and love to God and to Christ, throughout the endless ages of eternity.

But how, if we here stop, and to the perfection of God it may be, that the benefit of Christ's obedience should be extended, at the judgment, to persons who in their lifetime never had an opportunity to know and believe on him, provided they are found to have been animated by a real principle of faith and piety; the case of those to whom Christ hath been offered in the gospel, but who have not by faith received it, and who, having generally proceeded from evil dispositions, have no benefit from Christ's obedience. So he himself hath taught us, John iii. 19. 'This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. 20. For every one who doth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.'

Upon the whole I affirm, a second time, that by making faith the condition of men's justification, the gospel excludes none from salvation, but those who exclude themselves through pride of understanding and vicious dispositions.

SECT. IV.—Of the Propriety of making Faith the Condition of Men's Justification.

The propriety of making faith, and more especially the faith of the gospel, the condition or means of the justification of those to whom the gospel is offered, hath been called in question by the Deists, on this principle. —That a man's belief is not in his own power, but derives from the evidence with which the thing to be believed is accompanied; and on his ability to comprehend and judge of that evidence. But however true this principle, rightly understood, may be, it is no less true, on the one hand, that through indulged prejudices, and the prevalence of corrupt inclinations, and considerations of present interest, and even through insatiation, men may render themselves blind to the clearest evidence; and, on the other hand, that by attention, impartiality, and willingness to know the truth, men may render themselves capable of discerning, and of being impressed with the evidence by which any doctrine or matter of fact is properly supported. In this view, to require the belief of the gospel from those to whom it is offered, is, in fact, to require them to use their rational faculties in a fit manner, and to exercise care and impartiality in judging of an affair which is of the greatest importance to themselves, and to the world. Wherefore, seeing the proofs by which the gospel is shew ed to be of divine original, are sufficient to convince those who examine them impartially; for any one to reject the gospel as not of divine original, is certainly an evident proof that his heart is so corrupted that he is incapable of salvation; whereas, to receive it, is a proof that he possesses a rectitude of disposition which fits him for heaven. So our Lord hath declared, John iii. 26. "Every one that doeth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved." 21. But he who doeth truth, cometh to the light of divine truth, that his deeds may be made manifest that he are wrought in God." The belief of the gospel being thus a proof that men are capable of justification, and the rejection of it disqualifying them for receiving that blessing, to require faith in the gospel as the condition of the salvation of those to whom it is proposed, and to make the disbelief of it the cause of their condemnation, are both of them proper; consequently no fault can be found, either with our Lord's promise or with his threatening: Mark xvi. 16. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. 16. He who believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he who believeth not, shall be condemned." 22.

21. It is proper to be mentioned in this chapter for making faith the condition or means of men's justification, because it is the highest exercise of piety, and the only true principle from which, in every dispensation of religion, good works must proceed. This praise is due to faith, not because by piety and good works men merit justification, but because by these jointly they become capable of pardon and eternal life. Let men believe, therefore, in speaking of men's justification, to separate good works from faith, and to make the latter consist wholly in the belief of doctrines, without connecting it with good works, is to err from the truth; as is plain from the many passages of scripture in which good works are enjoined as necessary to salvation, and bad works are forbidden as bringing condemnation on those that do them. To begin with the highest authority—our Lord hath said, Matt. vii. 21. "Not every one who saith to me, Lord, Lord," (that is, who acknowledgeth me for his Master), "shall enter into the kingdom of heaven: but he who doth the will of my Father who is in heaven." 22. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have done many wonderful works? 23. And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: Depart from me, ye who work iniquity," Matt. xxv. 34.

22. "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. 25. For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat, &c. 41. Then shall he say also to them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. 45. For I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat," &c. See also Matt. xii. 41, 43, 45. "In like manner, the apostle Peter, Acts iii. 19. "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." 2 Pet. i. 5. "Add to your faith virtues, &c. 10. For doing these things ye shall never at any time fall. 11. And thus shall ye be richly ministered to you an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."—And especially Paul, the great defender of justification by faith without works of law, Rom. ii. 5. The righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works, &c. 12. Not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified." Rom. vii. 12. 13. "If ye live according to the flesh, ye shall die: but if, through the Spirit, ye put to death the deeds of the body, ye shall live," 1 Cor. vi. 9. "Do ye not know that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived, neither fornicators, nor adulterers, &c. 10. In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availed any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love." Tit. ii. 11. "The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath shone forth to all men. 12. Teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. 13. Expecting the blessed hope, namely, the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. 14. Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Heb. xii. 14. "Pursue peace with all men, and holiness, without which no one shall see the Lord."—So also James ii. 14. "Though a man may say he hath faith, and have not works, will faith save him?"—And John, I Epistle iii. 7. "Little children, let no one deceive you: He who doth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous." After these declarations from Christ and his apostles, can any one doubt that the faith which saves is necessarily connected with good works; and that it is made the condition or means of our justification for any other reason, but because it is the vital principle of true holiness, whereby men are rendered capable of eternal life? 3. By establishing faith as the condition of men's justification, the gospel teacheth us, that at the judgment God will principally regard the dispositions of men, without severely searching into their actions. For, in particular instances, these may have been imperfect, and even faulty, through the greater corruption of nature which some have to struggle against, or the greater temptations to which others have been exposed, or the peculiar disadvantages under which a third sort have laboured, while their general conduct hath been upright. Besides, in most cases, the bad actions of those who have a sincere desire to please God, having, through invincible ignorance, been performed under the notion, perhaps, of service done to God; or, if performed contrary to knowledge and conscience, having been speedily repented of by the believers—God will graciously forgive them for the sake of Christ, and will accept of their faith, or general disposition to please him, which led them to an habitual course of virtuous though not sinless conduct, as if it were a perfect righteousness; and will reward them from pure favour, on account of the meritorious obedience of Christ. 4. By making faith the condition of our justification, the gospel teacheth us, that the condition of our salvation may be, as to the matter of it, if it do not proceed from faith, that is, from an habitual regard to the will of God, and from a sincere desire to please him, in the hope of obtaining those rewards which the lights of nature and of revelation encourage pious men to expect from his goodness, (Heb. xi. 6.), it is neither a moral nor a religious action; it is the mere effect of natural disposition, or perhaps of something worse: for instance, a desire of the praise of men, or a regard to one's own present interest; and therefore it will avail nothing to one's acceptance with God. 5. Lastly, the gospel, which hath made faith working by love the condition on which God will justify men in the way of favor, is attended with this advantage, in that it establishes good works on the firmest foundation, and giveth them all the weight and importance in the Christian scheme which really belong to them, it bestows down men's pride, by making them sensible of the imperfection of their virtue: And thus, taking away from sinners all pretensions to merit, it constrains them humbly to receive the great tsunami of justification and salvation as free gifts from God through Jesus Christ, and lays a foundation for their gratitude to God, and love to Christ, throughout the endless ages of eternity.

Sect. V.—Of the Time when Believers are Justified.

Many of the inextricable opinions with which theologians have perplexed themselves, in pretending to reconcile the doctrine of the apostles Paul and James on the article of justification, originates from the notion that believers are justified in the present life. And I acknowledge, that what Moses hath written concerning the justification of Abraham, according to its obvious meaning in modern language, seems to imply, that he was justified at the time he believed in the Lord. I acknowledge also, that what Paul hath written concerning the justification of believers, seems in like manner to imply, that they are justified in the present life. Nevertheless, I hope to make it evident, that neither Moses or Paul meant to teach any such doctrine.

1. To shew this, my first argument shall be taken from the nature of justification. To be justified, in the scripture sense of the word, is to be acquitted, from the charge of having broken the law of God, either by omitting the duties which it enjoins, or by committing the sins which it forbids; consequently it means, to be freed by the sentence of God from the punishment which they incur who break his law. Accordingly, the Westminster Assembly, in their Shorter Catechism, have rightly defined justification: \"A free grace of God, by which he pardons all our sins, and accepts us righteous in his sight.\" But as the whole of a man’s life is a state of probation, the sentence of acquittal in which justification consists, must proceed upon an examination of all the deeds men have done in the body during the whole course of their trial. Therefore, if the sentence of acquittal is passed immediately on a man’s first faith, which is the opinion of Estins, Whitby, Locke, Tavlor, and others, on the one hand, and of the Antinomians, and of some Calvinists, on the other, we must either hold, with the first-mentioned learned men, that the acquittal respects only the sins committed by the believer prior to that first act of faith ; or with the last-mentioned persons, that it comprehends not only the believer’s past sins, but all the things also in which he may happen to commit afterwards, till his death.
The first of these opinions, namely, that justification consists in the pardon of the sins committed previous to believing, labours under this inconveniency, that by connecting the pardon of past sins with men’s first faith in the gospel, we are led to think, that some may be justified and pardoned with respect to all their past sins, all the same without any change of dispositions hath passed, nor will pass; as was the case with Simon Magus, and many others in the first age, who were baptized and made an outward profession of faith in the gospel. The same is the case likewise with many, in every age, who speculatively believe the gospel to be a revelation from God, and yet are not in heart converted, nor in the habit of all grace. I ask, will wicked persons, who die impenitent, not be punished for the sins they committed previous to their first faith in the gospel? To resolve the matter into the soveereign pleasure of God, will not account for his pardoning such persons; because if at any time God forgives the sins which men have committed while they continue in these sins, he acts contrary to his perfections, and to his character as the righteous Judge of the world. Besides,
If the future punishment of sin is to arise in part from the existence of evil dispositions in the mind of the sinner, those who live and die in their sins must be miserable, in proportion to the number and strength of the evil habits which they carry with them into the other world; these not being diminished in the least by their supposed first pardon. Wherefore, that sinners are pardoned in any period of their life without repentance, and that the sins which have been thus pardoned, will neither be punished in a future state, nor be the instrument of the sinner’s punish-blessings shall be bestowed on them at Christ's second coming, it is evident from experience, that no believer is justified in the present life. 3. A third argument, to show that believers are not justified in the present life, arises from those passages of scripture in which justification is represented as a thing future. Of these the principal are, Rom. ii. 5. 'Revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every one according to his works,' &c. Rom. viii. 34. 'We are saved in hope. Now hope seen, is it not hope: For what a man seeth how also can he hope for it? 35. But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait with patience for it.' Gal. v. 5. 'We, through the Spirit, look for the hope of righteousness by faith.' Wherefore, righteousness is not counted to us through faith in the present life; and our salvation is a thing future, being the object of our hope, and will not be accomplished till Christ's second coming.
ON JUSTIFICATION.

4. A fourth argument is, if believers on their first act of faith are justified, that is, judged in the present life, and acquitted from the guilt of all the sins they have till then committed, they must be judged twice; contrary to the doctrine of the apostles, in which the righteousness of the righteous as well as of the wicked, is spoken of; and that one judgment is foretold to happen at Christ's second coming.

From these arguments I think it evident, that notwithstanding Moses hath spoken of the justification of Abraham, and Paul hath spoken of the justification of believers in the present life; yet sometimes in the past time, these passages are to be interpreted, like many other passages of scripture, in which things future are represented as past, or present, to signify the absolute certainty of their happening. Thus Moses says, in his song, Exod. xv. 13. 'Thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation;' that is, thou wilt assuredly guide them.—In the prophetic writings this manner of expressing things future is common.—We find it used likewise by our Lord and his apostles, Matt. xxvi. 28. 'This is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many;' that is, which is to be shed.—Luke xx. 37. 'Now, that the dead are raised;' (that is, shall be raised), 'Moses shewed at the bush.'—John iii. 19. 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life;' as if he does not repent—Rom. viii. 30. 'Whom he called, them he also glorified;' and whom he justified, them he also glorified. But as believers are not glorified in the present life, so neither are they justified.—1 Cor. vi. 9. 'By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory,' &c. But how could persons be already saved, whose salvation depended on the condition of their keeping in memory the law which they had been taught?—2 Tim. i. 9. 'He hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling.' Here the expression hath saved us, signifies only God's resolution to save us; as is plain from its being put before his calling us to believe the gospel.—3 Pet. iii. 11. 'Seeing all these things are dissolved;' namely, the heavens and the earth. These the apostles represent as already resolved, to shew the certainty of their dissolution at the second coming of Christ. See Prelim. Essay, iv. 10.

Wherefore, since it is usual in scripture to speak of things future, sometimes as present and sometimes as passed, it does not follow from Moses saying, 'Abraham believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness;' that Abraham was then justified; nor from Paul's speaking of a righteousness already justified, that they are justified in the present life. These expressions are to be considered only as assurances, or promises, that Abraham, with all his seed by faith, shall, at the general judgment, have their faith counted to them for righteousness, and be rewarded as righteous persons.—This is clear in the case of Abraham. For, as the counting of what Philen had did to Zimri for righteousness, consisted in God's promising him the everlasting priesthood, so the counting of Abraham's faith for righteousness, consisted in God's promising him the inheritance of Canaan, and not in giving him the actual possession of that inheritance. Further, as Canaan was the emblem of heaven, the promise to give to Abraham and to his seed the inheritance of Canaan, was also a promise to give them the inheritance of heaven, provided they persevered in their faith and obedience; for on that circumstance the title of Abraham himself to the heavenly inheritance was suspended, Gen. xviii. 19. as was formerly observed, p. 251.

- From these things it is plain, that Moses' words, Gen. xv. 6. 'He believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness,' do not imply, according to their second meaning, that Abraham was then justified or pardoned, any more than they imply, according to their first meaning, that he then obtained the possession of Canaan. They were a declaration only, or promise, that Abraham should be pardoned, and put in possession of heaven in due time.

-This being the true meaning of Moses' words, the expressions in St. Paul's writings, which seem to import that believers are justified in the present life, being formed on Moses' words, must, like them, be understood as declarations or promises that believers shall certainly be justified at the judgment; agreeably to the usage of the inspired writers, who, to shew the certainty of the future events of which they speak, represent them as already come to pass.

If the foregoing account of justification, and of the time when that blessing is bestowed on believers, be agreeable to scripture, the supposition of a first and second justification, framed for the purpose of reconciling the doctrine of Paul and James concerning the justification of believers, is inadmissible, being contrary both to scripture and reason. Besides, it is needless, the doctrine of the two apostles being perfectly the same. Wherefore, the expositions which Estus, Whitby, Locke, Taylor, and other commentators have given of certain passages in the epistles to the Romans, in as far as they are built on the supposition of a twofold justification, ought to be rejected as not agreeable to the truth of the gospel.—The same judgment should be pronounced on all those explications of the doctrine of justification which have incited to the obligation of good works. For although the bearers of these explications attempt to remove that inconvenience by a variety of subtle distinctions, these being not easily understood by the common people, make little or no impression on their minds; while the consequences which flow from the doctrine they are intended to vindicate, being obvious and agreeable to men's imaginations, have the greatest influence to make them hope for salvation, notwithstanding they continue in their sins. But all hopes of this sort being expressly condemned in the gospel, every explication of the doctrine of justification which warrants such hopes, I repeat it, ought to be rejected, not only as unscriptural, but as dangerous in the highest degree.

CONCLUSION.

Thus have I endeavoured to shew, that the belief of the doctrines of revelation is not necessary to the justification of those who are destitute of revelation; and that neither the belief of any particular doctrine, such as, that Jesus is Christ the Son of God, nor of any determinate number of doctrines, such as those contained in creeds and confessions, is necessary to the justification of all who enjoy revelation; because all have not an equal opportunity of knowing, nor an equal capacity to comprehend these doctrines: But that justifying faith consists in one's believing such doctrines of religion as God hath given him an opportunity and a capacity of knowing; and in his being at pains to acquire such a knowledge of these doctrines, as his talents and opportunities enable him to acquire; whether he hath nothing but his own reason and conscience to direct him, or hath these faculties aided by an external revelation; —consists also in habitually recollecting these duties to a man! nor to exercise them, not to perform a simple act of obedience only, but to an habitual compliance with the will of God, as far as he knows it. This idea of justifying faith I have been at pains to explain and establish by the example of Abraham's justification, because it accords perfectly with all the things said of justifying faith in the scriptures, and is what men in every age and nation may acquire with those assiduities which God grants to the sincere; and because it is such a faith as qualifies men for heaven, and which, according to the tenor of the new covenant made after the fall with Adam and all his posterity, will be accounted to them for righteousness through the merits of Christ.—I have likewise showed, that the inspired writers have ascribed men's justification to good works, as expressly as to faith; not, however, as if either had any meritorious influence in procuring justification, but as conditions equally required by God, and equally necessary to render men capable of eternal life, and so inseparably connected, that it is impossible for the one to exist without the other. —Further, I have proved, that the common opinion concerning the justification of believers in the present life, from which so many dangerous consequences have been deduced, is founded in a misunderstanding of the scripture phraseology, and is not agreeable either to reason or experience: —not to reason; for how can a man be justified till his trial is finished, and there is an opportunity of judging of his whole conduct? nor to experience, for it is only in the period of the present life is freed from any of the temporary penal consequences of sin, and is put in possession of the reward which God hath promised to bestow on them whom he accepteth as righteous! The judgment and acquittal of believers will not happen till Christ returns to judge the world; and which period, believers of all ages and nations being raised from the dead, will, by Christ's sentence as Judge, be freed for ever from misery and death, and be put in possession of eternal life.
PREFace to the Galatians.

Sect. I.

To conclude, I have thus largely treated of justification by faith, not only because it hath been the subject of much controversy in modern times, but because wrong notions concerning that important article of Christianity have a tendency to weaken the obligations of morality: Whereas, right conceptions concerning it afford the strongest motives to an holy life, throw a great light on the revelations of God, and shew the method of salvation discovered in these revelations to be consonant to the best ideas men can form of the character of God, as the righteous Governor of the universe.

The Galatians were the descendants of those Gauls, who, finding their own country too strait for them, left it after the death of Alexander the Great, in quest of new settlements. These emigrants, on leaving their own country, proceeded eastward along the Danube, till they came to where the Save joins that river. Then dividing themselves into three bodies, under the conduct of different leaders, one of these bodies entered Pannonia, another marched into Thrace, and a third into Illyricum and Macedonia. The party which marched into Thrace passed over the Bosphorus into the Lesser Asia, and hiring themselves to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, assisted him to subdue his brother Ziptes, with whom he was at war; and in reward for that service they received from him a country in the middle of the Lesser Asia, from which they were afterwards called Gallegria, or Galatia.

The island situation of Galatia preventing its inhabitants from having much intercourse with more civilized nations, the Gauls settled in that country continued long a rude and illiterate people. Yet they wanted neither the inclination nor the capacity to receive instruction. For when Paul came among them, and preached to them, they were so ravished with the doctrines of the gospel, that they thought themselves the happiest of mortals; and were so strongly impressed with a sense of the obligation they lay under to the apostles, from hearing enlightening them with respect to religion, that they thought they could never repay it, Gal. iv. 15. In short, his preaching and miracles had such an effect on the Galatians, that great numbers of them renouncing heathenism and embracing the gospel, they formed many separate Christian churches, called in the inscription of the apostle's letter to the Galatians, churches of the Gentiles. How little intercourse the Galatians had with the neighbouring nations, may be known from this, that at the time St. Paul preached the gospel to them, and for many ages afterwards, they continued to speak the language of the country from whence they came. So Jerome, who lived more than 600 years after that people settled themselves in Asia, informs us. For he tells us, that in his time the language of the Galatians was the same with that which he had heard spoken when he was at Troas. See Rollin's Ant. Hist. B. xvi. Sect. 5.

Sect. I.—Of the Time when, and of the Person by whom, the Galatians were converted to the Christian Faith.

Luke, in his history of the Acts of the Apostles, hath not told us directly at what time, nor by whom, the Galatians were converted; but he hath mentioned Paul's journey into Phrygia and Galatia, for the purpose of confirming the Gentiles, chap. xvi. 5, 6. And from what he tells us Paul said to Barnabas, when he proposed that journey to him, we learn, that he and Barnabas had formerly preached the gospel in the cities of Phrygia and Galatia. Acts x. 38. 'Let us go again and visit our brethren, in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.'—Acts xvi. 4. 'And as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem. 5. And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily. 6. Now when they had gone throughout Phrygia, and the region of Galatia,' &c.—It is true, in the history which Luke hath given, Acts xiv. of the journey we are told about, which Paul and Barnabas made into the countries of the Lesser Asia, for the purpose of preaching to the Gentiles, it is not said expressly that they went into Phrygia and Galatia: But he hath mentioned particulars, from which it may be gathered, that in the course of that journey they preached in both of these countries. For example, having given an account of their being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, and mentioned the churches they preached in, they passed, Acts xiii. 4, 5, 6, 13, 14, 51. the historian, in the beginning of chap. xiv. relates what happened to them in Iconium, a city of Lycaonia; then adds, ver. 6. 'And when there was an assault made, both of the Gentiles and also of the Jews, with their rulers, to use them despicably, and to stone them, 6. They were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia, and unto the region that lieth round about. 7. And there they preached the gospel.—What the region was which lay round about the cities of Lycaonia, we learn from Fliny, L. v. c. 37. who speaks of a part of Lycaonia as bordering on Galatia, and says it contained fourteen cities, of which Iconium was the most famous. Farther, Strabo, in a passage quoted by Cellarius, Geog. vol. ii. p. 201. speaks of a part of Lycaonia which bordered on Phrygia. Wherefore, since Galatia and Phrygia lay contiguous to Lycaonia, they probably were in the region round about Lycaonia into which Paul and Barnabas went and preached after leaving Lycaonia, and where they taught many, before they returned to Lystra, as mentioned ver. 21.—These facts and circumstances joined make it more than probable, that when Paul said to Barnabas, 'Let us go and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord,' he meant, among the rest, the cities of Phrygia and Galatia.

However, if I judge rightly, even this was not the first time Paul preached in Galatia. For his first preaching in that country is thus distinguished by himself: Gal. iv. 13. 'Ye know indeed, that in weakness of the flesh I preached the gospel to you at first—' and they that were of the church, which was in my flesh ye did despise, neither did ye reject me.' Now, if this weakness of the flesh, which he calls the temptation in his flesh, was, as is generallly supposed, some visible bodily weakness occasioned by his rupture into the third heaven, his first preaching in Galatia probably happened soon after his rupture, and before he wrote his epistle to the Corinthians, as mentioned Acts xi. 26, 26. consequently before the church in that city separated him and Barnabas to go and preach to the Gentiles, as related Acts xiii. 1, 2, 3. This appears likewise from those passages in the epistle to the Galatians, in which Paul innsates that he was the person who had first called them to the knowledge and belief of the gospel, Gal. i. 6. 11. iii. 5. iv. 11. 12. 19. v. 8. For if Paul was the person who first called the Galatians, it must have happened before he and Barnabas went from Antioch, by the appointment of the Holy Ghost, to preach to the Gentiles. The reason is plain: If the Galatians were first called to the knowledge of the gospel, when Paul and Barnabas preached in those parts of Galatia, it is evident that they should have been consecrated with a word of command, not with truth have called himself their spiritual father, seeing Barnabas on that occasion was actually active with him in preaching to the Galatians, and no doubt converted some of them.

From all these facts and circumstances united, I think it reasonable to conclude, that Barnabas was sent to Tarus to avoid the rage of the Jews in Jerusalem, as mentioned Acts ix. 30. he went from Tarus, where he 'abode several years, into Phrygia and Galatia, soon after his rupture; which I suppose happened at Tarus, or somewhere in Cilicia: That in Phrygia he preached and gathered churches at Laodicea, Coloseo, and Hierapolis; and in Galatia, at Ancyra, Pessinus, Tavium, Germa, and in other cities, as related by himself in the inscription of his epistle. The churches of Galatia: That afterwards, when he and Barnabas fled from Lycaonia into the region of Phry-gia and Galatia which lay round about Lycaonia, they preached the gospel, and taught many in the cities of Phrygia and Galatia: That the brethren in these cities, being of the number of those to whom Paul and Barnabas, in the course of this journey, preached the gospel, they, among others, were the persons whom, after the council of Jerusalem, Paul proposed to Barnabas to visit as brethren, that they might see how they did: And that after Paul and Barnabas separated on account of their contention about John Mark, the churches in the cities of Phrygia and Galatia, mentioned above, were those whom Paul and Silas are said to have established in Phrygia and Galatia, by delivering to them copies of the decrees for to keep, which were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem,' Acts xvi. 4. 6.

Sect. II.—Of the Date of the Epistle to the Galatians.

The opinions of learned men concerning the date of St. Paul's epistle to the Galatians, are widely different. Theodoret thought it one of those epistles which the apostle wrote during his first confinement at Rome; in which he is followed by Lightfoot and others. But, seeing in the other epistles which the apostle wrote during his first confinement, he hath often mentioned his bonds, but hath not said a word concerning them in this, the opinion of Theodoret cannot be admitted.—Because there is nothing said in the epistle to the Galatians of Paul's having been in Galatia more than once, L'Enfant and Besseusore think it was written during his long abode at Corinthis, mentioned Acts xvin. 11. and between his first and second journey into Galatia. This opinion Lardner espouses, and assigns the year 55 as the date of this epistle.

'The author of Miscellaneous Sacra, who is followed by Manson, supposed it to be written during the first confinement of the apostle in the Capel, Witsis, and Wall say it was written at Ephehus, after Paul had been a second time in Galatia. See Acts xvin. 23. xix. 1. Fabricius thought it was written from Corinthis during the apostle's second abode there, and not long after he wrote his epistle to the Romans.—This likewise was the opinion of Grotius.—Mill places it after Paul was released from prison, and suppose it to have been written from Troas, while the apostle was on his way to Jerusalem with the collections; to which he fancyes the apostle refers, Gal. ii. 10. And that the brethren who joined him in writing to the Galatians, chap. i. 2. were those mentioned Acts xx. 4.—Beza, in his note on Gal.

i. 2. gives it as his opinion, that the brethren who joined Paul in his letter to the Galatians, were the eldership of the church at Antioch; and that it was written in that city, in the interval between Paul and Barnabas's return from Paul's first apostolical journey, and their going up to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders concerning the circumcision of the Gentiles.—Perrttulian, as Grotius informs us, to the Galatians, reckoned this one of Paul's first epistles.

My opinion is, that Paul's epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch after the council at Jerusalem, and before Paul and Silas undertook the journey in which they delivered to the Gentile churches the decrees of the council, as related Acts xvi. 4. To this date of the epistle I am led by the following circumstances:

1. The earnestness with which Paul established his apostleship in the first and second chapters of this epistle, and the things which he advanced for that purpose, show that the Judaisers, who urged the Galatians to receive circumcision, denied his apostleship; and in support of their denial alleged, that he was made an apostle only by the church at Antioch, and that he had received all his knowledge of the gospel from the apostles. This the Judaisers might allege with some plausibility, before Paul's apostleship was recognised at Jerusalem: But after Peter, James, and John, in the time of the council, gave him the right hands of fellowship, as an apostle of equal authority with themselves, and agreed that he should go among the Gentiles and they among the Jews, his apostleship could be called in question no longer in any church than while the brethren of that church were ignorant of what had happened at Jerusalem. We may therefore believe, that, immediately after the council, the apostle would write his epistle to the Galatians, in which he not only gave them an account of his having been acknowledged by the three chief apostles, but also by other particulars, by which his apostleship was raised.

beyond all doubt.—This is the first reason for supposing that the epistle to the Galatians was written soon after the council of Jerusalem.

3. The second reason is taken from the inscription of the epistle, in which it is said, that all the brethren who were with Paul joined him in writing it: For as the only view with which any of the brethren could join the apostle in writing to the Galatians, was to attest the facts which he advanced in the first and second chapters for proving his apostleship, the brethren who joined him in writing it must have been such as knew the truth of these facts. Wherefore, they could be neither the brethren of Corinth, nor of Ephesus, nor of Rome, nor of Tross, nor of any other Gentile city where this epistle hath been dated, except Antioch. As little could they be the brethren who accompanied the apostle in his travels among the Gentiles, as Hammond conjectures: For none of them, except Silas, had any knowledge of the facts advanced in this epistle, but what they received from the apostle himself; so that their testimony was, in reality, the apostle’s own testimony. The only brethren who could bear effectual testimony to these things, were those who lived in Judea and Jerusalem; and forasmuch as the brethren of Antioch, who, by their intercourse with those of Jerusalem, must have known what had happened to Paul there, as fully as they knew what happened to him in their own city, where he had resided often and long, I therefore have no doubt that the epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch, and that the brethren who joined Paul in the composition of this epistle, were the brethren of Antioch, who, by their intercourse with Jerusalem, were the men who had the most intimate and direct knowledge of all that happened to Paul in Jerusalem.

4. When the apostle wrote his epistle to the Galatians, he had heard of the defection of some of them from the true doctrine of the gospel. This defection he represents as having happened soon after they were converted, Gal. i. 7. 'I wonder that ye are so soon removed,' is the expression of his astonishment at the defection of the Galatians, who called him into the grace of Christ." But if the epistle to the Galatians was written either from Rome, during the apostle’s first confinement there; or from Corinth, during his eighteen month’s abode in that city; or from Ephesus, where he abode three years; or from Tross, in his way to Jerusalem with the collections—the defection of the Galatians must have happened a considerable time after their conversion, even on the supposition that they were first called when Paul and Barnabas went into their country from Lycaonia. Wherefore, if the apostle’s expression, ‘I wonder that ye are so soon removed,’ is proper, the epistle to the Galatians could not be written later than the interval between the council of Jerusalem and the departure of Barnabas and Paul, and so it may be said, that this epistle was written even before the apostle’s departure from Antioch, when he may have heard of the defection of the Galatians, by letters from some of the faithful among them, which he received before he went to the council. Or he may have been informed of it in Jerusalem, during the council, by some who had lately come from Galatia. And after he returned to Antioch, he may have written this epistle to the Galatians. This is the more likely, notwithstanding the reason that he returned to visit them soon, for the purpose of delivering the decrees of the council. For the danger they were in from the false teachers, and the number of those who already had gone over to Judaism, made it necessary that the apostle should write immediately, to reclaim those who had apostatized, and to prevent others from following their example.

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion of writing the Epistle to the Galatians.

Not long after the Galatians embraced the gospel, certain Jewish Christians, zealous for the law of Moses, came among them, and taught them, that unless they were circumcised and obeyed the law, they could not be saved, Gal. v. 2. And so successful were these Jewish zealots in propagating this error, that some of the Galatians actually submitted to be circumcised, Gal. v. 2-12.

The doctrine of the Judaizers concerning the necessity of circumcision to men's salvation, the apostle termed another gospel, or rather he declared it to be no gospel at all; because the Judaizers, utterly ignorant of the nature and efficacy of Christ's death, affirmed that the gospel had no sacrifice for sin; and that pardon and justification were only to be obtained through the Levitical stonements; for which reason they exhorted the Galatians to be circumcised, that they might be entitled to the benefit of these stonements. However, as they acknowledged Jesus to be a prophet sent of God, and considered his doctrines and precepts as an excellent institution of morality, they did not require the Galatians to renounce the gospel, but exhorted them to join the law with it, that by adopting the expiatory rites of the law, the gospel might be rendered a complete and effectual form of religion.

Some however of the Galatians, better instructed, opposed these errors as contrary to the doctrine of Paul, who elsewhere, as we have seen, warned the Jews. Wherefore, the Judaizers, to lessen his credit, represented to the Galatians, that he was none of those who had accompanied Jesus during his ministry on earth; and from that circumstance they inferred that he was no apostle, or at best an apostle of men; that he received his commission to preach the gospel from the brethren at Antioch, or from the apostles at Jerusalem; that any knowledge of the gospel which he possessed, had been communícated to him by those who gave him his commission; that very little regard was due to the doctrine of such a teacher; that the apostles who accompanied Christ in his lifetime, being well acquainted with the true nature of the gospel, had a better claim to be followed, especially John the Baptist; that his false teachers affirmed, themselves obeyed the law, and enjoined it to all, as necessary to salvation; and that if Paul taught differently from them, it must be presumed, either that he did not rightly understand their doctrine, or that he did not faithfully interpret it. They even went so far as to affirm, that Paul himself had now changed his doctrine, and preached the necessity of circumcision, chap. v. 11.

To these calamities the Galatians gave the more heed, that Paul's apostleship was not generally known in the church at that time. And as a few were already drawn away, and others were in danger of following, it is not improbable, that some of the faithful among them judged it necessary to set up the apostle's authority; and, as John the Baptist had not been able to establish his doctrine, a part of the Galatians, in a letter, which, as was formerly observed, he may have received at Antioch, before he went to the council of Jerusalem. Or the matter may have been discovered to him in Jerusalem, by some of the brethren who had lately come from Galatia. For soon after his return from the council to Antioch, he wrote, as I suppose, this letter, in which he rebuked the Galatians, who had heard the apostles at Antioch, and, as he understood, their spiritual father, he was entitled to use in correcting their errors. In this letter also, by appealing to the reception which he met with from the apostles in Jerusalem, and to a variety of other facts, but especially by relating how he withheld Peter publicly at Antioch, for separating himself from the converted Gentiles on account of the church of Galatia with that authority and sharpness which, as their spiritual father, he was entitled to use in correcting their errors. In this letter also, by appealing to the reception which he met with from the apostles in Jerusalem, and to a variety of other facts, but especially by relating how he withheld Peter publicly at Antioch, for separating himself from the converted Gentiles on account of the church of Galatia with that authority and sharpness which, as their spiritual father, he was entitled to use in correcting their errors. In this letter also, by appealing to the reception which he met with from the apostles in Jerusalem, and to a variety of other facts, but especially by relating how he withheld Peter publicly at Antioch, for separating himself from the converted Gentiles on account of the church of Galatia with that authority and sharpness which, as their spiritual father, he was entitled to use in correcting their errors.

Here it may be proper to observe, that although the subject treated of, in the epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians, be the doctrine of justification by faith, the two epistles differ materially in this respect, that the epistle to the Romans was written to prove the justification of men by faith without works of law, that is, without a perfect obedience to the law of God written on men's hearts; whereas, the epistle to the Galatians was designed to prove, that men are justified by faith without the works of the law of Moses. This appears from the following, among other passages: Gal. iii. 2. 'This only would I learn from you: By the works of the law received ye the Spirit? or by the obedience of faith?' that is, by performing the rites of the law of Moses, or by obeying the gospel, which requires faith in order to justification? 3. 'Are ye so senseless, that having begun in the Spirit, ye make yourselves perfect by the flesh?' 4. He then who supplied to you the Spirit, and wrought miracles among you, did he these on account of the works of the law, or on account of the obedience of faith?' Here, the opposition between the works of the law and the obedience of faith, and between the promise sheweth, that by the law, in this discourse, the apostle means the law of Moses. Or if any doubt remains on the subject, it will be removed by attending to the apostle's reasoning in the following part of the chapter: where, having proved that the justification of sinners by faith was established in the covenant with Abraham, he told the Judaizers, ver. 17. That thejustification which was given long after the promise, could not annul the promise, by introducing a method of justification different from that established by the promise. The following passages in like manner show, that in this epistle the law means the law of Moses. Gal. iv. 21. 'Tell me, ye who wish to be under the law, why do ye not understand the law?' Gal. v. 1. 'Stand fast therefore, in the freedom wherewith Christ hath freed us; and be not again held fast in the yoke of bondage.' 2. Behold, I Paul say to you, that ye be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing. 3. And I testify, moreover, to every circumcised person, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. 4. Ye are separated from Christ who are justified by the law: ye are fallen from grace.' In other words, the whole strain of the reasoning in the epistle to the Galatians sheweth plainly, that the apostle's design in writing it was to prove against the Jews, that none of them could be justified by the works of the law of Moses. That law required perfect obedience to all its precepts, moral and ceremonial, under the penalty of the curse, from which the stonements and punishment had not been delivered, even till the fulfillment of the promise. Wherein, as in his epistle to the Romans, the apostle treats of justification on a more enlarged plan: his design being to prove against both Jews and Gentiles, that neither the one nor the other can be justified meritoriously by performing works of law, that is, the works which the law of God, written on men's hearts, enjoins; but all must be justified gratuitously by faith, through the obedience of Christ. See Eas. vii. sect. 1. Wherefore, the two epistles taken together form a complete proof, that justification is not to be obtained meritoriously, either by works of morality, or by rites and ceremonies, though of divine appointment; but is a free gift, proceeding entirely from the mercy of God, to those who are qualified by faith to receive it. In writing on these subjects to the Galatians, it must be confessed the apostle shewed great anxiety and earnestness, and even a considerable degree of displeasure with his adversaries. But in so doing he is by no means blamable. For if he had not vindicated himself from the calamities propagated by his enemies, where would have been left the authority and efficacy of the gospel? and what use could they have been of to the world as a rule of faith! And with respect to circumcision, and obedience to the law of Moses, if the Jews had been allowed to establish these as necessary to salvation, Judaism, as was observed in the Preface to the Romans, page 50, would have been the religion of the world, to the utter subversion of Christianity. In a word, of all the questions respecting religion which were agitated in the first age, this, concerning the justification of sinners by faith without the works of the law of Moses, was the most interesting. By the establishment of that doctrine, a bulwark was raised against the re-entering of those superstitions which disfigured the preceding forms of religion. For if the sacrifices and ceremonies of the law of Moses, which were all of divine appointment, had no efficacy in procuring the pardon of sin, none of the rites of men's invention, on which the superstitious set such a value, can have any influence in procuring that blessing. Besides, on the right determination of this question the comfort of the Gentile converts in the first age, and their hope of salvation, hinged. No wonder then that Paul, to whom Christ had committed the dispensation and institution of the Gentiles, was zealous in teaching the doctrine of justification, without the works of the law of Moses; and in boldy reproving, and even threatening those who taught the contrary doctrine, agreeably to the injunction which he afterwards gave to Titus in a similar case, Tit. i. 13. 'rebuke them sharply, that they may be healthy.'

The erroneous doctrines of the Judaizing teachers, and the calumnies which they spread for the purpose of discrediting Paul as an apostle, no doubt occasioned great uneasiness of mind to him and to the faithful in that age; and did much hurt, at least for a while, among the Galatians. But, in the issue, these evils have proved of no avail to the Judaizers or their adherents. For by objecting to the apostle to produce the evidences of his apostleship, and to relate the history of his life, especially after his conversion, we have obtained the fullest assurance of his being a real apostle, called to the office by Jesus Christ himself, and acknowledged to be an apostle by them who were apostles before him; consequently we are assured, that our faith in the doctrines of the gospel, as taught by him, (and it is he who hath taught the peculiar doctrines of the gospel most fully), is not built on the credit of men, but on the authority of the Spirit of God, by whom Paul was inspired in the whole of the doctrine which he hath delivered to the world. See Pref. to 2 Corinthians, sect. 2, page 211.

Paul was being directed to the churches of Galatia, it was to be read publicly in them all. We may therefore suppose, that it was sent first to the brethren in Ancyra, the chief city of Galatia, with an order to them to communicate it to the other churches, in the same manner as the first epistle to the Thessalonians was appointed to be read to all the holy brethren in that city, and in the province of Macedonia. See Prelim. Ess. ii. page 32.

I have hinted above, that Titus was the bearer of the epistle to the Galatians. My reasons for that conjecture are, 1. That Titus, being a Greek, was greatly interested in the doctrine which this epistle was written to establish, and would willingly undertake the office of carrying it to the Galatians; more especially as he was mentioned in it by name. 2. Having been present in Jerusalem with Paul at the council, he could by word of mouth attest the things which happened in Jerusalem, to which the apostle appealed in proof of his own apostleship, and in proof of the doctrine which he uniformly taught. And that doctrine Titus no doubt confirmed, by relating to the Galatians, that Paul resisted the Judaizers with increased might when they himself circumcised. However, if the reader thinks Titus was not the bearer of this letter, he may suppose it was sent by the person who brought the apostle word of the defection of the Galatian brethren, which occasioned its being written.

Sect. IV.—Of Paul and Barnabas's Journey to Jerusalem, mentioned Gal. ii. 1. and of the Decree passed by the Council of Jerusalem respecting the converted Gentiles.

According to the general opinion, the occasion of the apostle's journey to Jerusalem, mentioned Gal. ii. 1. is related Acts xv. 1. as follows: 'And certain men, who came down from Judea, taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved.' 2. When, therefore, Paul and Barnabas had no small dissemination and diputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question.'—Some of the things which happened to these messengers in Jerusalem concerning this question were according to the history of Acts, chap. ii. 9—10.—But he said nothing of the decision which the apostles and elders gave concerning the matter referred to them by the brethren of Antioch. Our knowledge of that decision, and of the deliberation which preceded it, we owe to Luke, who tells us, their decision was directed to the brethren of the Gentiles who were in Antioch, and in Syria, and in Cilicia; and that it was expressed in the following terms: Acts xv. 28. 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things: 29. That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which, if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well.' This decision or decree hath given rise to two expressions, viz. 'brethren of the Gentiles,' to whom the apostles directed their decree, were the whole Gentile converts without distinction. But others contend, that they were the converts from that class of Gentiles who were called proselytes by the Jews. The determination of this point involves some important consequences, and merits to be examined with care.

And, first of all, the account which Moses hath given of the character and obligations of the different sorts of persons who lived with the Jews in the land of Canaan, must be considered. He hath mentioned them under the denominations of, The circumcised stranger; The sojourning stranger; And The alien or foreigner.—The circumcision was in every case, declared, Exod. xii. 48, 49, and elsewhere, that 'to the home born, and to the circumcised stranger, there is one law.'—Hence the circumcised strangers were called strangers within the covenant, and just strangers. The LXX. call them Παραπόνοι, Proselytes, by way of eminence; and of them our Lord spake when he said to the Pharisees, Matt. xxiii. 15. 'Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte.'—The sojourning stranger went by the name of The stranger within their gates. In the Greek language they were denominated Παρακόμοι, Sojourners. In the history of the Acts of the Apostles this sort of strangers are called Religious, or worshipping proselytes. To know who the brethren of the Gentiles were to whom the apostles and elders directed their decision, it will be of use to consider the duties and privileges of those Gentiles who were called sojourning strangers, and worshipping proselytes. Their duties are described by Moses as follows:—They were bound, 1. To observe all the moral and judicial precepts of the law, whereby injuries were restrained, and crimes were punished, and justified in desert to have obtained, Num. xxvi. 2—5. To worship no God but the God of Israel. For idolatry was forbidden to every inhabitant of Canaan, under the pains of death. Levit. xxvi. 1.; Deut. xxvii. 15. And because the partaking with the heathens in the feast on their sacrifice, went with them to their idolatry, the stranger within their gates, was to abstain from all such meats. In short, the absolute renunciation of idolatry was the condition on which any stranger or Gentile was permitted to dwell among the Israelites.—3. To abstain from blood, whether pure or mixed, under the pain of death, Levit. xvi. 15. For from every thing that had been strangled, with the intention to keep the blood in it, ver. 13. But all the other kinds of food which were prohibited to the Israelites they were permitted to eat; and therefore, it was unlawful for the Israelites to go into their houses, and to eat with them, Acts x. 28.—4. To abstain equally with the Israelites from all incestuous marriages and unnatural lusts, called in the Hebrew language Zanath, and in the Greek Tapes, Levit. xviii. 26. —5. To eat no leavened bread during the passover week, Exod. xii. 19. although such strangers were not allowed to eat the passover, ver. 48. unless they submitted to be circumcised, ver. 48.—6. To keep the Sabbath, Exod. xx. 10. because it was instituted to preserve the memory of the creation of the world in six days, and of God's rest on the seventh. They were also required to observe the fast of the 10th of the seventh month, Levit. xvi. 29. and the feast of weeks, Deut. xvi. 11—14.

With respect to the privileges of the sojourning strangers, or worshipping proselytes, we know, that by observing the above-mentioned precepts they were entitled to a variety of civil privileges: Such as,—1. A right to live in Canaan, Deut. xxi. 18, 19. and to take possession of the lands and to be exempted from oppression, Levit. xix. 33, 34. And the Israelites were to exercise humanity and compassion towards them, in all their dealings with them, Exod. xxi. 21. xxiil. 12.; Deut. x. 18.—3. They had an equal right with the Israelites to the cities of refuge, Numb. xxxiv. 15.—9. They had a right to join in such parts of the worship of the God of Israel as were in use among the patriarchs; and which were not peculiar to the Mosaic economy. For example, they might offer burnt-offerings, Levit. xvii. 8.; Numb. xv. 15, 16. In later times, even those heathens who did not live in Canaan were permitted to offer sacrifices to the God of Israel in the temple of Jerusalem; as is evident from Josephus, Antiquities, iii. 8. If they had for the purpose came up to the Jewish festivals, John xii. 21. Likewise the stranger, or worshipping proselyte, had a right to pray to God in the temple, and in the synagogues through the land: For the outer court of the temple was appropriated to their use. Accordingly, at the dedication of the temple, Solomon, in his prayer, mentioned the stranger coming from a far country to worship, 1 Kings viii. 41. See also Mark xii. 17. The proselytes also seem to have prayed in their own houses, at the hours of the morning and evening sacrifices, Acts x. 3. 4. at which times the Jews likewise prayed.—4. The worshipping proselyte had a right to hear the law read and explained at the great festivals, Deut. xxiil. 12.; consequently they were entitled to hear the scriptures read in the synagogues, and to hear those discourses on religion, and those exhortations to piety, which were given in the synagogues by the more knowing to the more ignorant. These rights the worshipping proselytes enjoyed, not in Judea only, but in all the countries where the Jews had synagogues.

Such being the duties and privileges of the worshipping proselyte, that is, those Gentiles who were entitled to join the Jews in certain parts of their worship, I am inclined to agree in opinion with those who think the decree of the apostles and elders had for its object those Gentiles who, having been formerly worshipping proselytes, had embraced the gospel, and not the converts from idolatry. My reasons for being of this opinion are these—The arguments used by Peter and James, in the council, make it probable that the converted proselytes, and not the converted idolaters, were the brethren of the Gentiles concerning whom the apostles and elders deliberated, and whom by their decree they bound to observe the four precepts mentioned in it; while they declared them free from all the other precepts of the law of Moses. For example, when Peter said in the council, Acts xv. 7. God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel and believe, he evidently spake of Cornelius and his company, none of whom were idolatrous Gentiles at that time, but devote men who feared God, Acts x. 2. In like manner, when James said in the council, Acts xv. 14. Simeon hath declared, how God at the first did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name, he plainly spake of Cornelius and his company.—Farther, James told them, that the calling of Cornelius and his friends by Peter, had happened in fulfilment of the words of the prophet Amos, chap. ix. 11, 12. which he thus expressed, Acts xv. 16. I will return, and will build again the services of the temple of God. Consequently, when Peter spake that the Gentiles and Israelites should seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom his name is called, saith the Lord, Wherefore, since the idolatrous Gentiles were not called by the name of God, the Gentiles in after-times, on whom God's name was to be called, and who were to seek after the Lord, were not idolatrous, but devout Gentiles, worshipers of the true God. Consequently, the sentence is, that we trouble not them who from among the Gentiles are turned to God, he spake not of the idolatrous, but of the devout Gentiles or proselytes, who were more perfectly turned to God by believing the gospel.

3. This appears still more clearly, from the reason which James assigned for enjoining the Gentiles who were turned to God to observe the four precepts mentioned in the decree: Acts xv. 21. For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day. Did Moses anywhere in his law enjoin all the Gentiles to abstain from the pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood! Moses delivered no such precept whatever to the Gentiles. Rom. ii. 19. Wherefore, that Moses was preached and read in the synagogues in every city, was no reason why the converted idolaters should have been enjoined to obey the four precepts mentioned by James. But if he spake of the converted proselytes, his reasoning is conclusive. It is as if he had said, though we free the converted proselytes from circumcision in the same manner that they were freed from it by Moses, we must write to them to abstain from the pollutions of idols, &c. because these precepts being enjoined by Moses to the proselytes, if they neglect them, and the reading of him in the synagogues every Sabbath, making the Jews sensible that these converts have forfeited their rights as proselytes, they will banish them out of Judea.

3. That the decree of the apostles and elders related to the converted proselytes, and not to the converted idolaters, will be acknowledged, if the conversion of the idolaters was not generally known in Jerusalem at the time the apostles and elders met to consider of the circumcisions of the Gentiles. That their conversion was then a secret, appears from what Paul told the Galatians, chap. ii. 2. namely, that when he came to Jerusalem he communicated that gospel which he preached to the Gentiles, to them who were of reputation, but privately, lest perhaps he had run, or should run in vain. Wherefore, though it be said, Acts xv. 5. that Paul and Barnabas declared the conversion of the Gentiles, as they passed through through Phœnicia and Samaria in their way to Jerusalem, the secrecy observed by Paul, when he communicated to the three chief apostles the purpose, may be argued from this circumstance:—That if it related to the whole body of the converted Gentiles, the four precepts enjoined by the decree are necessary to all Christians at this day, and to the end of the world, as a term of salvation; consequently, all who profess the gospel ought to abstain from eating blood, and things strangled, and meats offered to idols, notwithstanding St. Paul hath declared, 1 Tim. iv. 4. "That every creature of God is good, being received with thanksgiving, and nothing is to be cast away."

Rom. xiv. 17. "That no meat is unclean in itself."

1 Cor. vi. 12. "That all meats are lawful," to every believer. 1 Cor. xv. 17. "That the kingdom of God is not meat and drink."

1 Cor. viii. 8. That the eating, or not eating, of meats, doth not concern any one to God. 1 Cor. x. 25. That the Corinthians might eat "whatever was sold in the shambles," and, ver. 27. "whatever was set before them" in the "houses of the heathens," asked no question" about its having been offered to idols. Lastly, That in none of the places of Paul's epistles where he hath spoken of meats, is there the least intimation that the eating of meats, "whatever was sold in the shambles," or of blood, and of meats offered to idols, except in the idol's temple as an act of worship, is forbidden to Christians. From all which I conclude, that the prohibition in the decree relates to none of the brethren of the Gentiles, but the converted proselytes only.

Perhaps it will be said, that the four precepts were not enjoined in the decree as things necessary to salvation, but as necessary on account of the prejudices of the Jewish believers; and that the obligation of these precepts was only temporary. To this I answer, 1. That at the time the apostle Paul in his epistle declared all meats lawful, the prejudices of the Jewish believers were as strong as ever. 2. That neither in the history of the Acts, nor anything in the New Testament, have we heard of the observance of the Decalogue, or of the Decree. On the contrary, we are told, Acts xxi. 21. that when Paul came to Jerusalem with the collections, James and the elders told him, the Jewish believers who were zealous of the law had been informed, that he taught all the Jews who lived among the Gentiles to forsake Moses; and therefore advised him to quiet their minds, by observing a solemn public rise of the law, in order to convince them that he himself walked orderly, and kept the law. This advice Paul readily complied with; having never taught that the law of Moses, as the municipal law of Judea, was to be forsaken by the Jews, or by the proselytes. What he taught everywhere was, that the keeping of the law of Moses was not necessary to the salvation either of Jews, or Gentiles; and, that it was not even salvation by keeping the law, Christ would profit him nothing, Gal. v. 3.

To prevent this fourth argument from being misunderstood, it is proper to add, that by restricting the decree to the converted proselytes, and by teaching that it laid no obligation on any other denomination of believers, it is not meant to inane the expression 'conversion,' like the eating of the things strangled, or offered to idols, so as to import that all who became believers, and not only the converted idolaters. All Christians ever were, and still are bound to abstain from incestuous marriages, unnatural lusts, and every species of fornication. But their obligation to abstain from these vices, doth not arise from their having been forbidden to the Israelites and proselytes by Moses, but from their being expressly forbidden by Christ and his apostles. At the death of Christ, the law of Moses was abolished in all its parts, to all mankind, as a religious institution, Coloss. ii. 14. note 5. Wherefore, no one is obliged to perform any moral duty because it was enjoined by Moses, but because it is written on men's hearts, and is enjoined by Christ; who in his gospel hath renewed the moral precepts of the law of Moses with greater efficacy than they were enjoined to the Jews, having established them on better promises than were held forth in the law.

5. That the brethren of the Gentiles, who were bound by the decree, were the converted proselytes alone, may be argued from the reproof which Paul gave to Peter, for refusing to eat with the Gentiles in Antioch.

After the council, Peter followed Paul to Antioch, and did eat with the Gentiles, before certain Christians from James; but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself. For this Paul blamed him openly, as compelling the Gentiles to Judaize. I ask, did Paul mean that Peter compelled the Gentiles to observe the four precepts enjoined in the decree? If the decree was general, we cannot doubt that all the converted Gentiles in Antioch would have been bound to observe them, and did not need to be compelled to observe them. And if they were not observing them, Peter did right to compel them; and was not to be blamed for so doing. Or, by Peter's compelling the Gentiles to Judaize, did Paul mean, that he compelled them to receive circumcision, and give obedience to the whole law of Moses? Far from it: the law of Moses, taught by the preaching of the gospel, was the light of the church; and what Peter and James declared in the council, that the law was not to be put on the necks of the Gentiles. The truth is, the Judaizing to which Peter compelled the Gentiles, by separating himself from them after the council passed their decree, cannot be understood on the supposition that their decree related to the whole body of the Gentiles; but it may easily be explained, if it related to the converted proselytes only. For when the converts from idolatry began to multiply in Antioch, through the labours of Paul and Barnabas, it is natural to think, that after the council of Jerusalem had bound the converted proselytes to observe the four precepts as formerly, the zealous Jewish believers in Antioch would insist, that the converts from idolatry, who were taught by the preaching of the converted proselytes, and be obliged to observe these four precepts: that the brethren of Antioch consulted James on the question, who, it would seem, sent them word by their messengers, that the converted idolaters were bound by the decree equally with the proselytes: that the idolatrous Gentiles, rightly instructed by Paul, refused to observe these precepts; and that on their refusal, Peter, who happened to be then in Antioch, withdrew from them; although, before the messengers returned from James, he had gone into their houses, and eaten with them. This conduct Paul justly condemned, as a compelling the converts from idolatry to Judaize, that is, to obey the four precepts as necessary to salvation, contrary to the truth of the gospel. For the idolatrous Gentiles having no connexion with the commonwealth of Israel, were not under any obligation whatever to obey the law of Moses; and therefore, if any part of that law was bound on them by Peter, it must have been as a term of salvation, contrary to that freedom from the law of Moses whereof Christ had made the idolatrous Gentiles free.

These arguments, if I am not mistaken, prove that the brethren of the Gentiles, who were bound by the decree, were not converted idolaters, but converted proselytes. And I have been at the more pains to establish this fact, First, Because it shews us that the four precepts enjoined in the decree were, as they are called in the decree, necessary things to the converted proselytes only; not however as terms of salvation, but to entitle them to those political privileges which were granted to them by the law of Moses as inhabitants of Canaan; consequently, that these were not religious but political precepts, whose obligation was confined to the converted proselytes, and expired when that class of men ceased to exist. Second, Because this decree, contrary to the intention of those who framed it, affording a plausible pretence to the Judeizers for insisting that all the Gentile brethren were bound to observe the law of Moses, the right knowledge of the persons who were bound by that decree, would make the controversy concerning the obligation of the law of Moses, which rent all the Gentile churches in the first age, was determined by the apostle Paul according to the mind of his brother apostles, and according to truth, when he taught, that after the death of Christ, the obligation which lay on the Jews themselves to obey the law of Moses, arose merely from its being the municipal law of Judea.—Third, The right knowledge of the purpose for which the four precepts mentioned in the apostolical decree, were enjoined on the converted proselytes, will convince us, that Paul's practice, with respect to the law of Moses, was perfectly consistent with his doctrine concerning that law, and with the truth of the gospel, which made no alteration in any part of it. Judea was not, and is not all of them, the source of that Gentile Christianity which was sought to come in, and was called in the country wherein he had been called. Wherefore, when he exhortated the Jewish converts to continue subject to the law of Moses, it was only because it was the municipal law of Judea, which as good citizens they were bound to obey. For the same reason, he himself always obeyed the law whilst he resided in Judea. And even in the Gentile countries, wherever he came, he observed the distinction of meats and days appointed by Moses, that he might gain the Jews to Christ. And when he came to Jerusalem with the collections, because a report prevailed, Acts xxii. 31., that he taught all the Jews who were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying, That they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs, he, by the advice of James, assisted certain Nazarites to discharges their vow; and thereby shewed the falsehood of the report which was spread concerning him. The truth is, he nowhere taught any of the Jews to forsake the law of Moses, but always inculcated the obligation of that law as the law of their state. He only taught them, that no person could be justified by the law of Moses, and that whoever sought salvation by obedience to that law, separated himself from Christ, and was fallen from grace. Wherefore, when he himself obeyed the law, and advised others to do so, it was not as a term of salvation, but merely as a matter of political obligation.

In giving to the assembly of the apostles, and elders, and brethren of the church of Jerusalem, who met to deliberate concerning the circumcision of the converted Gentiles, the appellation of The Council of Jerusalem, I have followed the ancient ecclesiastical writers, who generally gave it that name. Nor is the appellation improper. For though it was inferior to those assemblies which in aftertimes were dignified with the title of Council in this respect, that it was composed of members from one church only, it far surpassed them all in the quality of its members, and in the authority of its decisions. It was composed of all the apostles who were then in Jerusalem, men endowed with the continued inspiration of the Spirit of God; and of the elders of the church of Jerusalem, most, if not all of them, who had been converted on the memorable day of Pentecost; and of the brethren of the greatest note in that church, chosen by the different bodies of the faithful in Jerusalem, who assembled in separate places for the worship of God. Hence these brethren are called, in the preamble to the decree, Acts xv. 32, 35. 'chosen men;' and ver. 32. 'chief men among the brethren.' In fact, the Council of Jerusalem, consisting of such men, was a more respectable assembly than any council which hath met since, or which will ever meet again. And its decisions are, without doubt, of greater authority than the decisions of those councils who have called themselves Oecumenical, because composed of members gathered from the greatest part of the Christian world; and Holy, on the solemn presences that their decisions were dictated by the Holy Ghost.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Facts asserted in this Chapter.

Because the false teachers had called Paul an apostle of men, and had said that he was made an apostle by the church at Antioch, or at best by the apostles in Jerusalem, he began his letter with affirming, that he was not an apostle of men, but an apostle appointed by Jesus Christ himself, and by God the Father, who raised Jesus from the dead, ver. 1.—By mentioning the resurrection of Jesus, St. Paul glanced at the miraculous manner in which he himself was made an apostle by Christ after his resurrection; and of which he hath given an account, Acts ix. 5-9. He alluded to it likewise, vers. 5, where he calls it 'God's revealing his Son to him.' So that St. Paul, both in respect of the time and of the manner of his being raised to the apostolic office, instead of being inferior, was superior to the other apostles: Christ came from heaven, by the appointment of his Father, to give his apostles to the church; and, by the same spirit, St. Paul next told the Galatians, that all the brethren who were with him, joined him in this letter; by which he intimated, that they attested the whole of the facts he was going to relate, ver. 2.—Then expressed his surprise, that the Galatians were so soon removed from his doctrine to another gospel, ver. 6.—which he told them was no gospel at all, ver. 7.—And because the false teachers affirmed, that, after conversing with the apostles in Jerusalem, Paul had become sensible of his error, and now enjoined circumcision, chap, v. 11. he twice anathematized every one who preached contrary to what they had heard him preach, though it were himself, or an angel from heaven, who did it, ver. 8, 9.—Then asked his opponents, whether, in so speaking, he endeavoured to please men or God 1 ver. 10.—It seems the Judeizers had represented him to the Galatians, as one who suited his doctrine to the inclinations of his hearers; a calumny which they hoped would be believed, as Paul's apostolical character was then widely known. Besides, the Judeizers were for the most part bad men, and capable of affixing any falsehood which they thought would promote their views.

Further, the apostle's enemies pretended, not only that he was an apostle sent forth by men, but that he was taught the gospel by Ananias, or by the brethren at Antioch, or by the same spirit in which he received it, ver. 11, 12. And in proof of that assertion, he appealed to his manner of life, both before and after his conversion, as a thing well known: That before his conversion he furiously persecuted the church, ver. 13.; and was acessively solemn of the traditions of his fathers, ver. 14. In that period, therefore, of his life, he had neither opportuni-eny or inclination to learn any thing from the Christians. And being so great a zealot for the law, if, af- terwards taught that no man could be justified by the law, anything but the strongest evidence had induced him to take up that opinion.—He told them farther, that when he pleased God to make him an apostle, he consulted with no person in Damascus; he sought a Jewish doctor concerning his commission as an apostle, nor any of the brethren concerning the things he was to preach, ver. 15, 16.—Neither did he go to Jerusalem to receive the gospel from the apostles who were before apostles before; but he went into Arabia, and again returned to Damascus; and there acting as an apostle, he preached the gospel, which he had received by revelation. Thus Dr. Ramsden, in his Jewish doctor concerning his commission, no of the brethren expressing his salutations, whom, as Paul informs us, Acts ix. 22, he converted the Jews who dwelled at Damascus, proving that Jesus is the very Christ, ver. 17. And did not go to Jerusalem till three years after his conversion: And then abode fifteen days with Peter, lest keeping any longer at a distance from the apostles, it might be suspected that he was acting in opposition to them. Accordingly, Paul went to seek out the other of the apostles except James the Lord's brother, ver. 19. Having related these facts, he solemnly appealed to God for the truth of them, because they effectually established his apostleship, and confuted the calumnies of his enemies. For it was true, that in his first visit to Jeru- salem after his conversion, he saw none of the apostles but Peter and James, although it had been known in their power and power to have made him an apostle. It is not probable that, without the knowledge and consent of the rest, they would confer that office on him, a new convert of whose sincerity they had not as yet sufficient proof, ver. 30. After spending fifteen days with Peter, which was too short a space of time for him to be instructed by Peter in the knowledge of the gospel, he went into the countries of Syria and Cilicia, whether he was sent by the brethren, because the Jews in those parts were principally Gentiles; or for having deserted their party, and gone over to the Christians, sought to kill him, ver. 31. And from Cilicia, where he abode several years, he went, I suppose, into Galatia. Thus it came to pass, that for a long time after Paul's conversion he was personally unknown to the churches in Judæa, who had heard nothing more concerning him, but he had been so restrained and encouraged him for preaching the facts concerning Christ which he had formerly endeavoured to disprove, ver. 22, 23.—This great change of behavior in so violent an enemy, occasioned the churches to glorify God on account of his conversion, ver. 34.

From these things it is evident, that when Paul went into Cilicia, and from Cilicia into Galatia, he had been none of the apostles but two; and that he had never been at any general meeting of the apostles, to receive from them either the office of an apostle, or the doctrine of the gospel. And therefore, if he converted the Galatians in some journey which he made into their country from Cilicia, the doctrine which he preached, and the miracles which he wrought, must have been bestowed on him, not by man, but by the same Christ, and by God the Father, as he himself hath affirmed.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul an apostle, not sent forth from any society of men, neither appointed by any particular man, but by Jesus Christ, and by God the Father, who raised him from the dead, and after his resurrection sent him from heaven to make an apostle; 2 And all the brethren who are with me, to the churches of Galatia. These brethren, by joining me in this letter, attest the truth of the matters I am going to relate. 3 We wish grace to you, and happiness from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the Father dispenseth his blessings to man. 4 Because he gave himself to death for our sins, that he might deliver us from the bad principles, and practices, and punishment of this present evil age, agreeably to the will of our God and Father, who determined to save us by the death of his son. 5 To whom, for that unspievable favour, be ascribed the glory and honour and praise, through all eternity. Amen.

2 I wonder that ye are so soon removed from him who called you (εἰς) into the grace of Christ,1 unto another gospel; 3 Which is not another! (εἰς μόνος) but some

Ver. 1.—1. An apostle not from men.—Perhaps in this Paul glanced at Matthias, who was an apostle sent from a general meeting at Jerusalem, as mentioned Acts x. 25. Or his meaning may be, that he was not sent forth as an apostle occasion Paul was neither the apostles except James the Lord's brother. Acts ix. 22. And he went as far as Damascus, where the Holy Ghost, indeed, ordered them to wait for the same occasion. See also Acts xxii. 18. So that he was sent forth, neither by the church at Jerusalem, nor by that at Antioch. The Holy Ghost, indeed, ordered them to wait for the same occasion. Acts xxii. 18. But it was 'to the work whereunto he had called them' for the same occasion. Acts x. 19, 20. For the Gentiles have been simply a recommending them to the grace of God by prayer. And, in fact, it is so termed, Acts xvi. 25. Ver. 2.—1. All the brethren who are with me.—The brethren here mentioned were the brethren of Antioch, especially those who were the apostle's fellow-labourers in the gospel. So the word brethren is used Philip. iv. 22, 23, where the brethren are distinguished from the rest of the church. Acts xxvi. 20. 2. To the churches of Galatia.—Here it is remarkable, that the church at Galatia is not, as the other churches to which Paul wrote, designated, the churches of God, or of Christ, perhaps to signify that they did not deserve these honourable apppellations, on account of their great defection from the truth of the gospel. Ver. 4.—1. Evil age.—έποχης, εἰσαγωγή. In scripture, the age or world is often put for the men of the world, and for their evil principles and practices. Thus Rom. xii. 2. 'Be not conformed (εἰσαγωγηθείς) to this age.' See also Eph. ii. 2. 'Locks is of opinion, that έποχή is an intransitive verb, and εἰσαγωγή signifies the introduction or word hath that meaning in some passages, and because Christ had delivered the Jews from that dispensation. But I do not see with what propriety the apostle could call the Mosaic dispensation evil. 2. According to the will of our God.—By observing that Christ died for our sins, according to the will of God, the apostle insinuates, that the efficacy of his death as a sacrifice for sin, depends on the will or good pleasure of God; accordingly it is resolved into the word of God. Acts xvi. 26, 27, He Paul on the bank of the river. He was the first to mention, to convince the Galatians that the pardon of sins was not to be obtained by the liberal statements, nor by any service prescribed in the law. See ver. 7. note 2. Ver. 5.—1. From whom you called you into the grace of Christ.—Whether in other passages God is said to call men into the grace of the gospel, I am of Chandler's opinion, that in this passage, Paul, and not God, is spoken of. For, as he wrote this chapter to the Churches of Galatia, he speaks himselv as in this verse calling the Galatians by the Christian faith was fully mentioned as one of the proofs of his apostleship, as it is implied that he was assisted in that work by God. Ver. 7.—1. Which is not another.—The Judaizing teachers, it there are, who, on pretence that their doctrine of justification by the law of Moses is authorized by God, trouble you with doubts concerning my doctrine, and wish to pervert the gospel of Christ.

8 But even if we, or an angel from heaven, should preach to you (Rom. 16: 17, 18), contrary to what we have preached to you, let him be anathema.

9 As we said before, so now, (Gal. 3: 7, 8) a second time I say, if any one preach to you a gospel, which ye have not received, (see Col. ii. 6, new) let him be anathema.

10 (Agra se. 97.) And now, do I make men my friends, or God? Or do I seek to please men? If indeed I still pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

11 Now I certify you, brethren, concerning the gospel which was preached by me, that it is not according to men.

12 For I neither received it from man, nor was I taught it, except by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

13 For I have heard, (2 Cor. 1: 12, 13) certainly, of my conduct formerly in Judaea; that I exceedingly persecuted the church of God, and laid it waste.

14 And made progress in Judaism above many, age with myself, in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers.

15 But when God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called as by his grace, was pleased would seem, affirmed, that their doctrines concerning the justification of men by the sacrifices and other services of the law of Moses, was another and better gospel than Paul's; understanding by this another gospel, not a gospel of circumcision, but the gospel of Paul, which the apostle assured the Galatians, that he never taught it, and that he never preached concerning the traditions of the elders, or the ceremonial law.

16 To reveal his Son (6, 7) to me, that I might preach him (8) to the Gentiles; immediately I did not consult flesh and blood;

2. But some there are—this is a very important passage—men who wish to pervert the gospel of Christ.

3. And made progress in Judaism above many; age with myself; in mine own nation; was more zealous than any of them in maintaining the traditions of my fathers; in which, as a Pharisee, I placed the whole of religion.

4. But when God, who destined me from my birth to be an apostle, and ordered my education with a view to that office, and who called me to it by his unmerited goodness, was pleased

5. To reveal his Son to me, that I might preach him to the Gentiles; immediately I did not consult flesh and blood; or any man in Damascus, as having doubts concerning what I had seen, or as needing information concerning the gospel which I was called to preach.

2. I should not be the servant of Christ—This is a cutting reproof to all those ministers, who either alter or conceal the doctrines of the gospel, for fear of displeasing their hearers, or to gain the favor of their masters.

Ver. 12. I neither received it from man.—If Paul did not receive the gospel from man—a perfect meaning of this word, and the doctrine of the other apostles, is a proof that he was taught & by revelation from Jesus Christ.

Ver. 16. And laid it waste.—The word τρομοκρατία, being derived from τρομόω, to terrify, signifies to waste and destroy, and is the meaning of the verb, as in the alloting of towns.

Ver. 18. And I gave progress in Judaism.—Kαί εἰς ματαιοτητίας means may be translated, because I made progress in Judaism. See also Ex. iv. 27. By Judaism the apostle does not mean the religion contained in the writings of Moses and the prophets, but, as is evident from the latter part of the verse, that religion which consisted in observing the traditions of the fathers, and the commandments of men.

of the traditions of my fathers.—These were what the evangelists and our Lord called, Mark vii. 9, 'the traditions of the elders, and their own traditions.' In this verse, he indicates the human inventions. It was the characteristic of a Pharisee to hold these traditions as of equal authority with the precepts of the law. Nay, in many cases they gave them the preference. Hence our Lord told them, Mark vii. 9. 'Fairly ye reject the commandments of God, and hold fast by your own traditions.' This verse, therefore, shows the knowledge of the traditions of his fathers, and his zeal for them as things absolutely necessary to salvation, to convince the Galatians, that his preaching justification without the works of the law could be attributed to nothing but the force of the truth communicated to him by revelation.

Ver. 18.—I did not consult.—The word συγχύω, as in Deut. observes, signifies to deposit a secret in the breast of a friend.

Ver. 18, &c. Having persuaded Jesus to befriend them. —See Ex. iv. 27. In the preceding verse, Paul says, that he had been constrained by the Holy Spirit to become a preacher of the gospel, and to help to save the Gentiles. At the same time, the apostles were commissioned to do the same thing. It is, therefore, no contradiction to say, that Paul, when he became an apostle, was to be helped by Jesus; as a minister was to be helped by his colleague. The expression is elliptical, and may be thus supplied, Having persuaded Jesus to befriend them. —See Ex. iv. 27, Note. —Rom. xiii. 1. Heb. vii. 17. —Gal. i. 12. John 17:22. Mark 1:1. —The verb εἰδοὺ may be translated, so that he had that signification Acts xx. 20. Philippians i. 21. —Having made Blasius the king's chamberlain their friend. —The expression is elliptical, and may be thus supplied, Having persuaded Blasius to befriend them. —See Ex. iv. 27. Note. —Rom. i. 8. Gal. iii. 1. Heb. vii. 17. —Gal. i. 20. —Luke 1:5. —The phrase in this verse may be translated, Do I obey man, or God?
Galatians. Chap. II.

17 Neither did I go up to Jerusalem to be instructed by them who were apostles before me; but I went away into Arabia, and again returned to Damascus.

18 Then, after three years, I went up to Jerusalem to Cornelius, and abode with him fifteen days.

19 But I saw no other of the apostles, except James the Lord's brother, and 20 Now, the things I write to you, behold, before God, (Gal. 1:18.) assuredly, I do not lie.

21 After that I went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia;

22 And I was personally unknown to the churches of Judea which are in Christ.

23 But only they heard, that he who formerly persecuted us, now preacheth the faith which formerly he destroyed.

24 And they glorified God on my account.

Ver. 17. I went away into Arabia. — Luke, in his history of the Acts, takes so notice of the apostle's journey to Arabia, that from the manner in which it is mentioned here, it would seem that the apostle regarded it as the most surprising and important event in his apostleship. He recovered his sight and strength, which had been impaired by the bright light which Christ was surrounded when he appeared to him, and by the terror into which he was cast by that miraculous appearance. Nevertheless, since we are told, Acts ix. 18, that after Saul recovered his sight and strength, he was certain days with the disciples at Damascus, during which he preached Christ in the synagogues, we must interpret the word immediately, ver. 18, in such a manner as to admit, that after his conversion he spent a few days in preaching at Damascus, and then retired into Arabia, and that what is said, Acts ix. 22, Saul increased the more in strength and courage, because he supposed that the things he had happened after his return to Damascus from Arabia. See Harmony, Felix, Observ. 2. As Christ promised to tell Saul what he should do, Acts xix. 10, we cannot doubt that it was by Christ's direction he went into Arabia, to receive further revelations, and to shun the displeasure of the chief priests, who, as soon as they heard of his embroiling the cause which he had persecuted, would endeavour to put him to death. Indeed, the Jews in general were so enraged against him for going into the Christians, that when he returned from Arabia to Damascus, such of them as lived in that city "took counsel to kill him," Acts ix. 23. See also Acts xix. 29.

Ver. 19. To be acquainted with Peter. — This being Paul's first visit to Jerusalem since his conversion, the brethren there shunned him, suspecting that he feigned himself a disciple, with a view to betray them. But Barnabas, who probably had learned the particulars of his conversion from Ananias, took him and brought him to the apostles, (Peter and James,) and declared to them that he had seen the Lord, etc. Acts ix. 27. It does not appear that on this occasion anything was said, either by Barnabas or Saul, concerning Christ making Saul an apostle at the time he converted him, and concerning his sending him to preach to the idolatrous Gentiles, as related by the apostle himself, Acts xxii. 17, 18. These things were not mentioned in Jerusalem till Paul went up to the council, fourteen years after his conversion, Gal. ii. 2, 7, 8, 9.

Ver. 19. James the Lord's brother. — The Hebrews called all near relations brethren. — This James was the son of Alphaeus by Mary the sister of our Lord's mother. See the Preface to the Epistles of James.

That Paul made so short a stay in Jerusalem at this time, was owing to Christ, who appeared to him in a trance in the temple, and commanded him to depart quickly from Jerusalem, Acts xiii. 22. The reason of his not having more time, was that he projected to depart, because the Hel- lenist Jews were determined to kill him.

Ver. 20. The things I write to you. — From what St. Paul had already written, it appears, that for a considerable time after his conversion, he preached the gospel and acted as an apostle, before he was known to any of the apostles or brethren in Judea. Wherefore it is evident, that all that time he neither was made an apostle by them, nor received any instruction from them.

Ver. 21. The regions of Syria and Cilicia. — All the brethren in Jerusalem who advised him to depart, kindly accompanied the apostle to Cesarea, which was a noted sea-port town, intending that Cornelius should give him back the sword which he had thrown, they knew, they brought him down to Cesarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus. But the apostle himself informs us, that he went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia. We may therefore suppose, that after embarking at Cesarea, contrary winds forced him into some of the ports of Syria; that, altering his plan, he went through the country of Syria preaching the gospel, and that from Syria he went into Cilicia by land.

Ver. 22. I was personally unknown to the churches of Judea. — In travelling from Damascus to Jerusalem, after his return from Arabia, the apostle, it seems, did not preach, nor make himself known to the churches of Judea, in any of the cities in which he was sojourning.

Ver. 23. Preacheth the faith. — In scripture, faith sometimes signifies the act of believing, and sometimes the thing believed. Here it signifies the things believed by the Christians: namely, the miracles of Jesus Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the ascension into heaven, his being the son of God, and the very Christ, Acts xiii. 22. All which facts Saul, while he acted in concert with the chief priests, endeavoured to destroy, that is, to disprove.

Ver. 24. Glorified God on my account. — The apostle mentions the thanksgiving of the churches of Judea, for his now preaching the faith which formerly he destroyed, because it implied that they believed him a sincere convert, and were persuaded that his conversion would be an addition to the proofs of the divinity original of the gospel.

Chapter II.

View and Illustration of the Facts related in this Chapter.

From the history which the apostle gave of himself to the Galatians in the preceding chapter, it appears, that from the time of his conversion to his coming with Barnabas from Tarsus to Antioch, he had the opportunity of conversing with the apostles in a body; consequently, in that period he was not made an apostle by them. In like manner, by relating in this chapter what happened when he went up from Antioch to Jerusalem, fourteen years after his conversion, in company with Barnabas and Titus, a convert Gentile, he proved to the Galatians, that he was an apostle, on that meeting with the apostles in a body, ver. 1. For, at that time, instead of receiving the gospel from the apostles, he communicated to them the gospel or doctrine which he preached among the idolatrous Gentiles; not because he acknowledged them in the apostleship, that was another matter; but lest it might have been suspected that his doctrine was disclaimed by the apostles, which would have marred his success among the Gentiles, ver. 2. And to show the apostles to whom he communicated his gospel approved of it, he told the Galatians, that not even Titus who was with him, though an ido- late before his conversion, was compelled by them to be circumcised, although it was insisted on by the false brethren, who endeavored to bring the Gentiles under bondage to the law, ver. 3, 4. — And that he and Titus did not yield in the least to these false brethren, by obeying any part of the law as a condition of salvation; that the Gospel might remain with the Gentiles, and all the Gentiles, ver. 5. — Next, to show that the apostles of the greatest note were by no means superior to him, Paul affirmed that from them he received nothing. For however much they had been honored by their Master formerly, these apostles added nothing either to his knowledge, or to his position: James, Cephas, and John, who were the chief apostles in point of reputation, gave him the right hands of fellowship; thereby acknowledging him to be an apostle of equal authority with themselves, and equally commissioned to proclaim the Gospel. Therefore, when they went to the Jews, ver. 9. — The only thing they desired of him was, to exhort the Gentiles to contribute for the relief of the poor, ver. 10.

Moreover to make the Galatians fully sensible of his authority as an apostle, and of his knowledge in the gospel, Paul told them, when Peter came to Antioch after the Gentiles he opposed him, because he was not requisite to be blamed, ver. 11. — For, before certain persons zealous of the law came to Antioch from James, Peter, who had been taught by a vision to call no person unclean, did not with his converts, ver. 8. — They, knowing these things, instead of finding fault either with his doctrine or with his practice, James, Cephas, and John, who were the chief apostles in point of reputation, gave him the right hands of fellowship; thereby acknowledging him to be an apostle of equal authority with themselves, and equally commissioned to proclaim the Gospel. Therefore, when they went to the Jews, ver. 9. — The only thing they desired of him was, to exhort the Gentiles to contribute for the relief of the poor, ver. 10.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II. — Then, within fourteen years from my conversion, I went up again to Jerusalem, with Barnabas, taking with me Titus also.

And I went up by revelation, and communicated to them the gospel.

Ver. 1. Then, within fourteen years. — As the clause, chap. i. 18. 'Then, after three years,' signifies three years after Paul's conversion, it is reasonable to think that the clause, 'within fourteen years,' in the present verse, is to be understood as meaning fourteen years after the conversion of Paul. The council of Jerusalem had been held, and the decision of the apostles concerning the question of the circumcision of the Gentiles, had been given before the coming of Paul, Gal. ii. 5. It was therefore natural that there should be a period of time between the time of Paul's conversion and his first visit to Jerusalem. The council of Jerusalem did not take place until after the conversion of Paul, Acts xv. 1. It was therefore natural that there should be a period of time between the time of Paul's conversion and his first visit to Jerusalem.

CHAP. II. — Then, within fourteen years from my conversion, I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, taking with me Titus also, one of the idolatrous Gentiles whom I had converted. (Ver. 3.)

2 And I went up by the direction of Christ; and after declaring in public the success of my ministry, I explained to the existence of the gospel depending on its decision, it was necessary to determine it in the most public and authentic manner. Now, of all the methods that could be devised for that purpose, to consult the elders of the churches was the most effectual. For if, after due deliberation on the question, they should decide that the Gentiles should be circumcised, their decision would have great weight with the whole body of the disciples. Besides, as the decision of that venerable assembly was to be founded on the wisdom of the Holy Ghost, and the other uncircumcised Gentiles who were with them, by falling on them while Peter was speaking to them, Acts x. 44, as he fell on the one hundred and twenty at the beginning, Acts ii. 47; the assembly of the apostles, and elders, and brethren, in so solemn a manner, to decide this question, would be of great benefit to the church in after ages; because the descent of the Holy Ghost on the first Gentile converts being mentioned as the ground of their decision, the truth of that great miracle would be known by the united testimony of such a multitude of credible witnesses, as would be beyond all doubt. This observation throws a beautiful light on the expression of the decree, Acts xvi. 25. 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us.' It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, who hath borne witness to the uncircumcised Gentiles, by shedding down his gifts upon them; and to us, who have rightly interpreted the import of that witness. In this view, the elders and brethren were mentioned with great propriety in the decree, Acts xv. 28. They, as well as the apostles, were certainly informed of the effusion of the Spirit on the uncircumcised Gentiles, and were well qualified to attest that extraordinary event. The advantages which would attend the decision of this question by the apostles, elders, and brethren, in so solemn a manner, The method was suggested by revelation to Paul. And he having communicated it to the church at Antioch, they sent him and Barnabas to Jerusalem, to lay the matter before the higher body of the disciples there. Wherefore, though Paul was sent by the church at Antioch, yet if they were directed by a revelation made to Paul to send him, he might justly say, 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us.'

Some are of opinion, that the journey to Jerusalem, of which the apostle speaks in the next verse, was not a journey of so long duration, as Paul was not a man to remain in any place long, unless he was compelled to do so by the necessity of the case. Therefore if Paul was sent by the church at Antioch, and not by revelation, some may say, 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us.' But there is no evidence that Paul and Barnabas travelled together any apostles the gospel which I preach to the Gentiles: But to avoid offense, I did it privately to them who were of greatest reputation, namely, Peter, James, and John, (ver. 4,) lest perhaps, being suspected of preaching differently from them, my future and past labours might become useless.

3. However, (wth. 110,) not even Titus, who was with me, (wth. 18,) though a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised.

4. (Acts 18, 10.) On account even of the secretly introduced false brethren, who came in to the church to spy, to find out the liberty which we have by Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage.

5. To whom we give place by subjection, (wth. 110, ) not even for an hour, that the truth of the gospel might remain with you.

6. (Acts 10, 6.) Besides, from them who were of reputation (see ver. 2, note 2.) I received nothing: whatever they were formerly, is no matter to me; God accepteth not the person of men. For to me, they were of reputation communicating nothing. (See Gal. 2, 6.)

7. But, on the contrary, perceiving that I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, even as Peter was with that of the circumcision;

8. (For he who wrought inwardly in Peter, (wth. 147,) in order to the apostleship of the circumcision, wrought inwardly also in me, in order to confound the Gentiles;)

9. And knowing the grace which was bestowed on me, James, and Cephas, and John, who were thought to be pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we more after they returned to Antioch from the council, but rather evidence to the contrary, Acts xx, 29; that opinion cannot be admitted.

10. But, on the contrary, perceiving that I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, even as Peter was with that of the circumcision; for he who wrought inwardly in Peter, (wth. 147,) in order to the apostleship of the circumcision, wrought inwardly also in me, in order to confound the Gentiles;

11. And knowing the grace which was bestowed on me, James, and Cephas, and John, who were thought to be pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we more after they returned to Antioch from the council, but rather evidence to the contrary, Acts xx, 29; that opinion cannot be admitted.

12. Besides, from them who were of reputation (see ver. 2, note 2.) I received nothing: whatever they were formerly, is no matter to me; God accepteth not the person of men. For to me, they were of reputation communicating nothing. (See Gal. 2, 6.)

13. But, on the contrary, perceiving that I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, even as Peter was with that of the circumcision;

14. (For he who wrought inwardly in Peter, (wth. 147,) in order to the apostleship of the circumcision, wrought inwardly also in me, in order to confound the Gentiles;)

And knowing the grace which was bestowed on me, James, and Cephas, and John, who were thought to be pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we more after they returned to Antioch from the council, but rather evidence to the contrary, Acts xx, 29; that opinion cannot be admitted.

18. And knowing the grace which was bestowed on me, James, and Cephas, and John, who were thought to be pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we more after they returned to Antioch from the council, but rather evidence to the contrary, Acts xx, 29; that opinion cannot be admitted.

19. Ver. 6. God accepteth not the persons of men. He does not shew favour to any man on account of his birth, office, riches, or any external circumstances. John xxxi, 19. The apostle's meaning is, that God did not prefer Peter, James, and John to him, because they were such persons before him; but bps he did employ him to make him an apostle.

20. Ver. 7. That I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision. It is, without doubt, which Peter and his companions were at Jerusalem, and all his company, that the gospel was to be preached to the uncircumcision. By saying that he was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, he means, that he was intrusted with the same gospel that Peter was intrusted with, with that of the circumcision, Paul put himself on a level with Peter. In like manner, his withholding Peter publicly for withdrawing himself from the circumcision, and not using the privileges of his apostleship, is a fact more inconsistent with the pretended superiority of Peter above the other apostles, vastly imagined by the Roman pontiffs, for the purpose of exalting themselves, as their successors, above all other Christian bishops.

23. Ver. 6. God accepteth not the persons of men. He does not shew favour to any man on account of his birth, office, riches, or any external circumstances. John xxxi, 19. The apostle's meaning is, that God did not prefer Peter, James, and John to him, because they were such persons before him; but he did employ him to make him an apostle.

slew not to the Gentiles, but to their circumcision.

10 Only, desiring that we would remember the poor; whom very thing I also made haste to do.

11 (Ca. 154.) Moreover, when Peter came to Antioch, I opposed him personally; because he was to be blamed.

12 For before certain persons came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they came, he withdrew, and separated himself, being afraid of them of the circumcision.

13 And the other Jews also dissembled with him, in so much, that even Barnabas was carried away with them by their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that they did not walk rightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not after the manner of the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to Jewize?

15 We who are Jews by nature, (see Eph. ii. 2. note 2.), and not sinners of the Gentiles, 16 Knowing that man is not justified by Babylon, and other parts of the east; and John into the Lesser Asia, where he was to be found, to take the records of James, in Rev. i. 9. But James was put to death at Jerusalem, in a popular tumult, before the city was destroyed.

17 The Jewish and Gentile church, in each case, was to be found, to take the records of James, in Rev. i. 9. But James was put to death at Jerusalem, in a popular tumult, before the city was destroyed.

18 The Jews in Judea expected special attention and assistance from their brethren in the provinces, and even from such Gentiles as became proselytizers to Judaism. 21 A man cannot be justified by Babylon, and other parts of the east; and John into the Lesser Asia, where he was to be found, to take the records of James, in Rev. i. 9. But James was put to death at Jerusalem, in a popular tumult, before the city was destroyed.

22 The Jews in Judea expected special attention and assistance from their brethren in the provinces, and even from such Gentiles as became proselytizers to Judaism. See Paul’s address in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch, to be found in the notes on Acts xiii. 15. In the meantime, the converts from Judaism, in the form of Jews, and even from such Gentiles as became proselytizers to Judaism.

23 And the other Jews also dissembled with him, in so much, that even Barnabas was carried away with them by their dissimulation.

24 But when I saw that they did not walk rightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not after the manner of the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to Jewize?

25 We who are Jews by nature, (see Eph. ii. 2. note 2.), and not sinners of the Gentiles, 26 Knowing that man is not justified by the apostolic office, and in token that Barnabas was sent forth by the Holy Ghost, to preach the gospel to the Gentiles; and agreed that we should travel among the Gentiles, while they preached to the Jews in Judea.

27 The only thing they desired was, that we would remember to make collections for the poor, among the Gentiles; which very thing I also made haste to do among the converted Gentiles in Antioch.

28 Moreover, to show to the Gentiles that I was their Apostle, I informed you, when that he came to Antioch after the council, I opposed him personally in the presence of the church, (ver. 14.), because in this very affair of the Gentiles he was blamable.

29 For before certain persons zealously of the law came from James, he used to eat with the converted Gentiles in Antioch. But when they arrived, he withdrew, and separated himself from them, as if it had been a thing to eat with them. But the true reason was, his being afraid of the converted Jews.

30 And the other Jews also hypocritically with him, abstaining from the tables of the Gentiles. So that even Barnabas, who with me had preached salvation to the Gentiles without the works of the law, (Acts xiii. 59.), was carried away with them by their hypocrisy.

31 But when I saw that such eminent teachers did not walk rightly according to the knowledge of the true doctrine of the gospel, I said to Peter in the hearing of all of them that the case of Barnabas and all the Judeans: if, in the house of Cornelius, thou, then art a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles in respect of meats, and not after the manner of the Jews, because thou knowest the truth respecting that matter, why now compellest thou the converted Gentiles to obey the law, by refusing to eat with them, in distinction of meats worn necessary to their salvation?

32 I added, we apostles, who are Jews by birth, and education, and not idolatrous Gentiles, who are ignorant of God, and of his will respecting the salvation of sinners.

33 Knowing by the law and the prophets, as well as by our own did not preserve them from all impudence and sin in conduct, as is the most advanced, whether in knowledge or virtue, warned by Peter’s rebuke, he had let them fall. The meekness and candour with which Peter behaved when rebuking Peter, as the breast of the good Samaritan, (see illustration, p. 355.), and is highly worthy of the imitation of the ministers of the gospel, and of all Christians.

34 Ver. 15.—Certain persons came from James.—The persons who came from James, I imagine, were messengers who had been sent by the church at Antioch, to know his opinions concerning the converts from among the idolatrous Gentiles. For so there were some of that sort now in Antioch, the brethren there might think it necessary to inquire into, as far as they could, into the dispositions of the Gentiles, and the conduct of the converts from heathenism, as well as the converted proselytes, ought to observe the four necessary things. For although he knew the truth in this matter equally with Peter, ver. 16. he may have thought it prudent to send these messengers to the converted idolatrous Gentiles, in order to be more effectually to disseminate the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the Gentiles, in spite of their great opposition.

35 Afraid of them of the circumcision.—The Jews reckoned it unlawful to eat with the proselytes of the law, Acts xxi. 31. some means permitted to it, by keeping unclean to Jewize. What a contrast, then, between his treatment of the converts from heathenism, as well as the converted proselytes, of the Jews, and in hearkening to the advice of Peter, ver. 16. he may have thought it prudent to send these messengers to the converted idolatrous Gentiles, in order to be more effectually to disseminate the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the Gentiles, in spite of their great opposition.
works of law, but only through the faith of Jesus Christ; even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we may be justified (μέθοι) by the faith of Christ, and not by works of law. For by works of law no flesh shall be justified.

17 (Rit.) But if, seeking to be justified (σωθεί) by Christ, even we ourselves are found sinners, will Christ be the minister of sin? By no means.

18 For if I build again those things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

19 (Tag. 91.) Besides, I through law have died by law, (in ζωρα, 197. 13.), so that I must live by God.

20 I am crucified together with Christ. Nevertheless I live: YET NO LONGER I, BUT CHRIST LIVETH IN ME! (Φ, 105.) for the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith which is of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I do not set aside the grace of God. For if righteousness is through law, then certainly Christ hath died (φανερώθη) in vain.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Reasoning in this Chapter.

... Paul, having by many arguments proved himself a real apostle, and showed that his knowledge of the gospel was given him by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ, proceeds in this and the following chapter, to treat of the doctrines in dispute between him and the false teachers. They affirmed, that no man could be justified but by the law of Moses, because the pardon of sin could be obtained only by the atonements which it prescribed; and therefore urged the Gentiles to become Jews, that they might have the benefit of those atonements. But to impress the Galatians the more strongly with a sense of the danger of that doctrine, the apostle charged them with want of understanding for listening to it; and spoke of their not obeying the truth, as the effect of some fascination, ver. 1. Then, by asking those who had gone over to Judaism, whether they had received the spiritual gifts by obeying the law, or by obeying the gospel, he showed them that obedience to the law was not necessary to men's acceptance with God, ver. 2. And taxed them with folly, because after having had their acceptance with God, in the gospel dispensation, sealed to them by the gifts of the Spirit, they proposed to make themselves more acceptable by performing the ceremonies of the law of Moses, which sanctified nothing but the flesh, ver. 3. Besides, by that course, they rendered all their former sufferings for resisting Judaism of no use, ver. 4. And to finish his rebuke, he asked them, whether he had communicated the spiritual gifts to them, to prove that men are saved through obedience to the law of Moses, or to prove that they are saved through obedience to the gospel? ver. 5.

In what follows, the apostle overturned the doctrine of the Judaisers more directly by observing, that even Abraham himself was justified, not by works like those of the law of Moses, but in the gospel method of faith counted for righteousness. And that they who like him believed in God, are Abraham's sons, and entitled to all the blessings of the covenant, ver. 6. That and God having determined to justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel, or good news of his determination, to Abraham, saying, 'In thee shall all the nations be blessed,' ver. 8. And therefore, in every age and nation, they who believe in God shall be blessed with Abraham, by having their faint counted to them, as his was to him, for righteousness. 9. Whereupon, according to the law of Moses itself, every one who seeketh justification meritoriously by the works of law, most certainly is condemned by its curse, ver. 10.

Further, to prove that by the law of Moses no man is justified in the sight of God, the apostle appealed to the Jewish prophets as testifying that doctrine, particularly Habakkuk, ver. 11.—Besides, the law does not require faith, but obedience to its precepts, as the condition of the life which it promises, ver. 12.—Wherefore every sinner being doomed to death by the curse of the law of Moses, no person can be justified by that law. But Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law of Moses, which is in fact the curse of the law of nature, consequently from law itself as a rule of justification, by dying for us, ver. 13.—That the blessing of Abraham, the blessing of justification by faith, which, in the covenant with Abraham, God promised to bestow on all nations through his seed, might come upon the Gentiles through Christ Jesus; and that they might receive the gifts of the Spirit, promised as the seal of their title to justification by faith through faithfulness.

But because Isaac, as was observed Ess. v. Sect. 5, had foretold, chap. ix. 3—5. that the Gentiles were to come to 'the light of the Jews,' and that they were to be 'converted to them,' the Jews (Ess. v. Sect. 6) contended, that the blessing of the nations in Abraham's seed was to be accomplished by the Gentiles embracing Judaism, and their receiving justification through the Levitical stonewalls. Wherefore, to overturn that false notion, the apostle reasoned in the following manner:—

Even a human covenant is not set aside or altered, after it is ratified, except by the contracting parties, ver. 15.—But the promises of the covenant, concerning the counting of the faith of the nations for righteousness, were made with justification by faith through Christ, in consequence of the promise made to Abraham as the federal head of believers, the law which was given four hundred and thirty years after cannot annul, so as to abolish the promise, by introducing a method of blessing or justifying the nations, different from that established by the promise, ver. 17.—Further, if the inheritance be obtained by works of law, it is no longer secured by promise; yet God bestowed it on Abraham and his seed, as a free gift, by promise, ver. 18.

Ye will perhaps reply: If neither the inheritance nor justification is obtained through the works of the law of Moses, why was that law added after the covenant was made with Abraham? It was added for the sake of restraining the Jews from transgression, and more especially from idolatry; and was to continue till Christ the seed should come, to whom it was promised, that the nations should be blessed with justification by faith through him. Moreover, the law being added to the covenant for this other purpose, namely, to make the Israelites sensible that they were sinners, and that God was displeased with them, it was delivered by angels into the hand of a mediator, ver. 19.—For a mediator is not employed between persons in good agreement with one another, ver. 20.—From these things it followed, (though the apostle hath not drawn the conclusion), that a law which was given to make the Israelites sensible they were sinners, and which by its curse condemned every sinner to death without remedy, could never be intended for their justification. Is the law of Moses then, which makes us sensible of our transgressions, and subjects us to its curse, inconsistent with the promises of justification by faith? By no means. That operation of law, on the contrary, sheweth the absolute necessity of the promise. For if any law could have been given, capable of delivering us from death temporal, spiritual, and eternal, it should have been given by the same God who could have imparted to us the knowledge of the glory of Christ, and the power of justification, ver. 21.—But the law of Moses contained in the scripture, instead of communicating righteousness and eternal life to any person, hath shut up all mankind together in prison, as sinners sentenced to death, that the promise of justification, now published in the gospel, may be performed to all believers, ver. 22.—So that in order to prevent the law from being refused, new promises were made, and the Gentiles were admitted, Jews and Gentiles were imprisoned as condemned criminals, and shut up together under the custody of law, so as to be obliged to have recourse to the method of justification by faith, which at the beginning was but imperfectly discovered, but which was afterwards to be fully revealed to all in the gospel, ver. 23.—So that the promise of justification by faith is so far more sure, that we might be justified by faith, ver. 24.—But the method of justification by faith being now universally made known in the gospel, Jews and Gentiles are no longer under the pedagogy of the laws of Moses and of nature, ver. 25.—Besides, ye Jews and Gentiles are all the sons of God and heirs of eternal life, through your faith in Jesus Christ: so that to your being the sons of God, it is not necessary to subject yourselves to the law of Moses, ver. 26.—For at your baptism ye professed to put on the temper of Christ, ver. 27.—And where this is really done, there is in the gospel no preference given to men, as formerly under the law, on account of their descent, their outward condition, or their sex; but all are equally honourable and blessed, both Jews and Gentiles, who possess the temper and virtues of Christ Jesus, ver. 28.—And with respect to you Gentiles, if ye are Christ's brethren by possessing his temper and virtues, certainly ye are Abraham's seed, and heirs of the heavenly country, according to God's promise, ver. 29.

CHAP. III.—1 O senseless! Galatians, who hath deceived you, not to obey the truth, to whom visibly Jesus Christ was set forth crucified (w) for you! 2 This only would I ask you who are gone over to Judaism, on account of performing the works of the law of Moses, received ye from

COMMENTS.

Ver. 1.—1. Senseless.—The word ἀσέληνος properly signifies persons void of understanding: also persons who, though they have understanding, do not form right judgments of things, through want of consideration.

2. Who hath deceived you?—The word διστηρίζεσθαι signifies to fascinate, or deprive one of the use of his faculties by looking on him. Hoce Virgin. 6 Nacional quia teneras, obsita multa facinacrona.—The word is used likewise for deceiving one with false appearances, after the deceit of jugglers; in which sense I understand it here.

3. Set forth crucified.—This word was used to denote things written on tables, and hung up to public view.

4. Crucified for you.—The common translation of this clause is not true. Christ was not crucified among the Galatians; but he was crucified to procure justification by faith for them. And this fact had been published to the Galatians in the plainest manner by the apostle.

Ver. 2.—1. Received ye the Spirit.—As Christ himself was declared to be the Son of God by the descent of the Spirit upon him at his baptism, so the spiritual gifts, called the Spirit, or the Holy Ghost, Acts 2: 46, because in the apostolic age of believers at their outset, demonstrated them to be the tokens of people's being heirs of the promises, Gal. iv. 6. Hence the Spirit, from whom these Galatians.

Chapter III.

...the fruit of the Spirit, whereby your acceptance with God was sealed. Or (cf.) an account of the obedience of faith?

3 Are ye so senseless, that having begotten in the Spirit, ye now make yourselves perfect (middle voice) by the flesh?

4 Have ye suffered so many things in vain? (συνήφιστας) surely indeed IT IS in vain. (See chap. v. 2.)

5 (οὐ) He, then, who supplied to you the Spirit, and wrought miracles among you, did he do this on account of the works of the law, or (cf.) on account of the obedience of faith? (ver. 2, note 2.)

6 (καί εἰς) Seeing Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.

7 Know ye (σασκ. εἰς) certainly, that they who are of faith, the same are (συνόμορφον) the sons of Abraham.

8 (οὐ μηδέποτε) For the scripture foresees that God would justify the nations (συνόμορφον) by faith, preceding the gospel before the Jews of Abraham's faith, for one people, Surely in thee shall all the nations be blessed.

9 (καὶ εἰς) Wherefore they who are of faith, (see ver. 7, note 1.), are blessed with the gifts proceeded, is called 'the Spirit of adoption.' Rom. viii. 15. Hebrews 11, chap. 10. He who believes, when they heard of the descent of the Holy Ghost on Cornelius and his company, immediately concluded that God had granted them eternal life, although uncreated, and therefore, in the Spirit, have no proof of being accepted of God under the gospel as their sons, were under no obligation whatever to obey the law, in order to their becoming the sons of Abraham, and heirs of God. See ver. 7.

2 Or on account of (τα διά της λέξης τῆς ὁμοθυμίας) the obedience of faith?—Here, and in ver. 5, the word ὁμοθυμία signifies obedience, as also in 1 Rom. xv. 22, LXX., ἐν ὁμοτυμία, Behold obedience is better than sacrifice. In like manner, the compounded word ἡμισθεία signifies disobedience, Rom. v. 19.

Ver. 3. Having begun in the Spirit, &c.—The gospel is termed the Spirit, because it was given by inspiration of the Spirit, and en- joyed by the new-believers, and all his commands are calculated to purify the spirits of men; and because it promises the assistance of the Spirit of God to enable us to perform it. On the other hand, the law is called the flesh, because of the carnal form of worship by sacrifices and purifications of meats, and its en- forceable precepts. Therefore, as the Spirit is the true form of worship, not cleansing the conscience of the worshipper, but only his body; and because the Israelites were put under the law by their earthly ancestors. See Rom. v. 4.

Ver. 5. He, then, who, &c.—Though the apostle uses the third person in this verse, he plainly speaks of himself; and inten- sues, not only that he was the person who converted them, and bestowed on them the spiritual gifts, but that the teachers who had persuaded them to embrace Judaism, had conferred no spiritual gift on them; consequently had given no evidence of the truth of their doctrine.

2 Supplied to you the Spirit; that is, the spiritual gifts. These, as distinguished from miracles, were faith or fortitude, prophecy, utterance or eloquence, discoursing of spirits, foreign languages, and their interpretation of foreign languages.

3 Did he then on account of the works of the law, &c.—that is, Did he then give this promise of the works of the law to those who believed you, as necessary to your salvation? or to recommend the obedi- ence of faith, as the means of your justification? As this interpre- tation renders the apostle's questions in this verse, it is his usual practice, and very likely the true interpretation; especially as it conveys not only a different meaning of the words, but one that is very important.

2. Abraham believed God, &c.—Here the apostle alludes to the transaction recorded by Moses, Gen. xv. where we are told, ver. 8, that God 'brought Abraham forth abroad, and said, Look unto heaven, and number the stars, if thou be able to number them.' And he said to him, So shall thy seed be. And he believed God; and he was counted to him for righteousness.

From this it is plain, that what Abraham believed was that his seed should be as numerous as the stars of the heavens; and that his belief of the promise was the first conception of the doctrine of divine power, and goodness, and veracity, God counted it to him for righteousness. This transaction the apostle mentioned here, as the foundation of his doctrine in ver. 7, namely, that they who imitate Abraham in his faith are his sons, and heirs with him of the blessings promised to him, and as this was the very substance of the important topics in the controversy, it is not strange that the apostle might have been led to press the matter. (Beng.)

5 By which the promise was confirmed, &c.—This is the very passage in which the apostle is said to have written the words of his own mouth, as being spoken with the gift of prophecy, and not to be found in the common Hebrew versions.
shall be blessed with believing Abraham, by having their faith confirmed to them for righteousness.

10. But as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse: for it is written, (Deut. xxvii. 26.), Accursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

11. Beside that, (as 104.) besides, that (as 114.) by law, no one is justified (verse 4) before God, is manifest: for the just (verse 8) by faith shall live.

12. Also, the law of Moses is not of faith. But he who doth these things, shall live by them. (Rom. x. 1-5.)

13. Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us: (for it is written, Exod. xxxiv. 24.) Accursed is every one who is hanged on a tree. (Deut. xxi. 23.)

14. As many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

15. And because of the law of Moses, as it is written, all who sin not under the law, shall be justified before God, are justified from the curse of the law, through the faith of Christ, which is the righteousness of God by faith.

16. But, as many as are of the works of the law, are in the想像 of death: for it is written, All Israel shall be justified, (verse 8) before God, by faith.

17. But as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

18. Beside that, as it is written, the law of Moses, as it is written, all who sin not under the law, shall be justified before God, are justified from the curse of the law, through the faith of Christ, which is the righteousness of God by faith.

19. For, as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

20. But as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

21. But as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

22. But as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

23. But as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.
14. That the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations through Christ Jesus; and that the Gentiles might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.

15. Brethren, I speak after the manner of men: No one receiveth reward as a rewarder of others, but every man shall receive the reward of his own doing, even according to his work; whether it be for good, or for evil. And to him that soweth concerning one person, in the body, Christ is.

16. Now, to Abraham were the promises spoken, and to his seed. (See ver. 18.) He doeth not say, And to thy seed; but, And to thy seed, which is Christ; that is, Not many of us, but as concerning one person, and in thy seed, (which is Christ,) to the law of Moses. For as the Gentiles were once not subject to the law of Moses, so now will Christ deliver them that are uncircumcised through faith, and not through the letter of the law: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. And the law was added because of transgressions, and is unto the end of the world: but now is the fulness of the times come. Wherefore let us principally mind the new covenant. And that is, not the letter, but the spirit; for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. Now we are the children of God, if we hold fast the hope of life, and are not afraid of the testimony of God through Christ. For though the righteous suffereth while he liveth, and is cast down iniquity, yet shall he be bountiful in the land of the living. And though the just be a众所, he shall not be cast down: for the Lord upholdeth him. And though the just men suffer adversities, yet will not the Lord forsake the house of his servants, but will maintain their cause, because they maintain the cause of their God, and the cause of his servants.

17. For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For if those things which are spoken according to promise, were after the law, then Christ died for no purpose. For if the inheritance, or promise, was by the law, then it was no more by promise: but God gave it him by promise. Why then was the law, that it might be without effect? For if the inheritance be of the law, it was no more by promise; but God gave it him by promise. For what law can be a covenant of promise? For the law is not of faith, but of works; and this is not written concerning him, but the promise was made by grace unto him. And if it be not by grace, it is not of promise; but if it be of promise, it is not of works: lest grace should be grace for nothing. For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not before God. For what saith the law? That a man should live, who keepeth the works of the law. But what saith the scripture? That Christ was justified of the righteousness which is of faith, even the righteousness which is of God, according to the servant. For us is an end of the law, that the promise might be by grace unto the gentiles, who believe. And if the gentiles be not rejected, how shall the Israelites?  For if the inheritance be of the law, it was no more by promise, but by law. What then was the profit of the promise, but that all the gentiles might fear the Lord? And the glory of the Lord was among his people. And it came to pass, when all the gentiles had sought after wisdom, they were instructed by the word of the Lord through the apostles. And, Lo, we are waiting for the promise of the holy Spirit, which thou hast said to be promised unto thy holy children. And he hath said to us, Through Jesus Christ, who is the propitiation for our sins, and not by the will of men, but by the will of God, we have been made partakers of the promises of the Lord, who by his power enables us to fulfill the commands of life. And the profit of the promise, is that all the gentiles, through the word of the Lord, may become partakers of the holy promises. And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord. And the word of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord. And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord. And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord. And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord. And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord.

16. But this is only because of the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For what law can be a covenant of promise? For the law is not of faith, but of works; and this is not written concerning him, but the promise was made by grace unto him. And if it be not by grace, it is not of promise; but if it be of promise, it is not of works: lest grace should be grace for nothing. For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not before God. For what saith the law? That a man should live, who keepeth the works of the law. But what saith the scripture? And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord. And the grace of the Lord is given to our souls, that we may be made partakers of the promises of the Lord.
GALATIANS

17 (see 108.) Wherefore, this I affirm, that the covenant which was afar off by revelation, (as it was, 148,) concerning Christ, the law, which was made four hundred and thirty years after, cannot annul, (or, vs, 7,) so as to abolish the promise.

18 (v. 91.) Besides, if the inheritance was by law, it is no longer by promise. But God bestowed us freely on Abraham by promise.

19 JEW. Why then was the law added?—APOSTLE. It was added (ἐπεί) on account of transgressions, till the seed, (v. 16,) should come to whom it was promised; being ordained by angels, (a) in the hand of a mediator.

20 (see 108.) Now a mediator is not of one, but God is one.

3. So as to abolish the promise.7—Though the law was added, the promise, to be in the singular number, it comprehends all the promises; the promise to bless nations in Abraham is seed in God, by counting their faith to them for righteousness, mentioned in this verse, being put for the rest, for the promise of the inheritance, mentioned ver. 18.7

8. Besides, if the inheritance be by law.7—Some by the inheritance here understood, mean that in the Christian church, because they all belong to believers, as Abraham's seed by faith. But I rather think the inheritance of which the apostle speaks, is that which was promised, or the law which he termed, the law of the inheritance, and which was not given by angels, as the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type or image.

9. Ver. 18. It was added two seeds.7—In all, the two seeds in verse 4, that is, on account of the transgressions from transgressions, particularly idolatry, and the vices connected with it; the evil of this which the law discovered by its curse. Agreeably to this account of the law, idolatry, and all the abominations practiced by the Canaanites and the other heathen nations which surrounded the land of Israel, were considered as the severest penalties. Further, the law was added after the promise, to shew the Israelites not in the same manner as the other nations; now that the people were circumcised, they might be constrained to have recourse to the covenant with Abraham, in which justification was promised through faith, as it is now promised in the gospel.7

10. Because the nations who inhabited Canaan and the neighbouring countries, worshipped visible gods with feasts and many noisome rites, by which their senses were delighted, and their imaginations were strongly impressed.7—For Christ having come into the world by the Spirit, and by the power of the Godhead, that a work of the same pious kind was prescribed to the Israelites; that being directed to the true and invisible God, of whom they were to have knowledge, to have no image or representation of him, and thus be prevented from embracing the rites of heathenism, and especially these the gods of the heathen and the images of them, which were to be destroyed and abolished at the first coming of Christ; and thus the temptation to idolatry arising from the pomp of the heathen worship, was effectually removed out of the way of the Israelites.7

11. And, that, and therefore, the Israelites were circumcised.7—The sacrifices and rite of circumcision were not the true and direct opposite to them, especially when the heathen sacrifices consisted of clean and unclean by the Israelites, they were by that diversity prevented from having any intercourse with the heathens in their idolatrous worship.7—But though this may have been one use of the law, I do not know whether the apostle had it in view in this argument.

12. Till the seed should come to whom it was promised.7—It was not fit that the law of Moses, which condemned every sinner to death, should continue any longer than till the seed should come to whom it was promised, that is, till the whole of the nations of the earth were blessed, being their faith counted to them for righteousness.7

5. Being ordained by angels, (a) It is said in verse 16.7—Being ordained by angels, (a) This is affirmed likewise by Stephen. Acts viii. 35.7

6. In the hand of a mediator; the promise to bless nations in Abraham is seed in God, by counting their faith to them for righteousness, mentioned in this verse, being put for the rest, for the promise of the inheritance, mentioned ver. 18.7
GALATIANS.

21. Is the law then (νόμος) contrary to the promises of God—APOSTLE. By no means. For if there had been a law given, which was able (ἐξευετείαν) to make alive, certainly righteousness would have been (ἐστήκει) by law.

22. But the Scripture hath shut up all under sin, that the promise (εἴρηται) by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them who believe.

23. (αὐτοίς). Wherefore, before faith came, we were kept in durance under law, shut up together (ἐν τοῖς) unto the faith, which should afterwards be revealed.

24. (παρελθοῦσιν). See that the law hath been our pedagogue, to bring us (ἐν τῷ) to Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

25. But faith being come, we are no longer under the pedagogue.

26. (ἐμέ). For ye are all the sons of God, (πάντες) through the faith published (ἐκ Σωτήριος) by Jesus Christ.

27. (Luke 1:1). Besides, as many of you as was baptized into Christ, (see Rom. vi. 3. note 1.), have put on Christ.

28. In Christ Jesus there is neither Jew.

2. But God is one. The latter clause of the 19th, and the first clause of the 20th verses, make an antithesis, as the logia and sickle, in which the conclusion is wanting. But if it had been expressed, the syllogism would have stood thus:—The law was given in the hand of a mediator, ver. 19. Now a mediator is not employed between parties in friendship, ver. 20. Wherefore, he who gave the law to the Israelites by angels in the hand of a mediator, was not in friendship with them. The clause which follows, But God is one, is the minor proposition of another enthymeme, of which the major is the conclusion of the foregoing syllogism. This enthymeme has been fully expressed, would have proceeded as follows:—God was not in friendship with the Israelites; but God is in friendship with all who believe in him. They were a perverse and rebellious race. On this verse Bema comments, thus: „Eit autem inaudita quod non solus est Deus, sed etiam et Enthymema veterum, quod vocabulorum essentia.“ The truth is, the enthymeme suit the rapidity of the apostle's genius, he had so much in view the enthymeme, that he left out the apostle's observation concerning the giving of the law in the hand of a mediator, implied that God was not in friendship with the Israelites when he gave them the law, so his observation, But God is one, being an antithesis to the other, implies that God was in friendship with Abraham, when he gave him the promises in person, without a mediator. But I think the interpretation of that clause gives in the commentary, agrees much better with the history. For the first part of the law, called the ten commandments, God, or the angel who personated God, spoke to the Israelites himself, and more terrible, that they entered to hear it more:—Now, the terribleness of God's voice could proceed only from its impressing the Israelites with a sense of God's displeasure with them on account of their transgressions; and therefore, the putting of the law in a mediator's hand, on account of the terror excited in the people by the voice of God, was a strong proof of their sinfulness; Exod. iv. 18. All the people saw the lightning and the thunders, &c. 19. And they said to Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die. Ver. 20. In the time which was after this, which was abut three days, &c. &c. &c.—Hence St. Paul affirms, that the law of Moses was utterly incapable of making the people of Israel to believe in Christ, because they neither promised them the assistance of the Spirit of God to overcome the corruptions of their nature, nor the pardon of their sins on repentance, issuing in deliverance from death temporal and eternal. Justification therefore was not obtained by that law.

Ver. 21. Before faith came.—The gospel is called faith, ἡ νοησία, and the law of faith, Rom. iii. 31. because it requires faith, instead of perfect obedience, as the means of men's justification. The apostle stresses this point in Gal. iii. 21., where he says that the law was added because of transgressions, that the justification of the promise might be established: and till it came, Adam was kept in ward without hope, under the law he had broken. In like manner, the Gentiles under the law of nature, and the Jews under the law of Moses, were kept in ward as criminals, and had no hope of pardon but what the law of faith gave them, as made known obviously in the first promise, Gen. iii. 15. and afterwards in the covenant with Abraham. 2. Shut up together unto the faith. The law of Moses, instead of being contrary to the promises of God, or covenant with Abraham, effectually co-operates therewith. By the perfection and spirituality of its moral precepts, it makes us Jews sensible of our inability to obey perfectly; and by its curse denounced against every one who does not obey perfectly, it makes us feel, trembling and afflicted, the cooperation of the law with the grace of Abraham, &c. From the thirteenth chapter of Romans we learn, that the apostle had published, and published to all mankind in the gospel. This sense the translation hath likewise, ver. 26.
Galatians.

nor Greek; there is neither bond nor free-man, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.

39 And if ye be Christ's, certainly ye are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Gen. xlix. 8.

Ver. 28. — There is neither Jew nor Greek. — For here is put for Jew, as it is his name, and for Greek, as it is his people, which must be supplied, as I have done, from the end of the verse, in this manner: In Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek. 2 Cor. x. 12. In the gospel dispensation God says no regard to men on account of their descent, their station, or their sex; but all who truly believe in Christ have an equal right to the privileges of the gospel, and are equally in favour with God, and are equal in respect of the gospel. To the Jewish teachers in Galatia, who imagined that their being Abraham's children according to the flesh, would of itself secure their acceptance with God, this must have appeared a most humiliating doctrine: But to the Galatians it was of singular use, to prevent their being seduced by those teachers, who strongly affirmed, that the Gentiles could not share in the privileges of the people of God, without being circumcised.

2. Neither male nor female. — Under the law, males had greater privileges than females. For males alone bore in their bodies the signs of the covenant; they alone were capable of the priesthood, and of the kingdom; and heritages belonged to them, preferably to females in the same degree.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The apostle having established the joyful doctrine, that believers in every age and country of the world, are heirs of the promise made to Abraham and to his seed, goes on to establish the way of its practical application. The rejection of this doctrine, or the inability to apply it, shows how much the law had been in the way of disturbing the gospel. Hence he says, Ver. 29. And if ye be Christ's brethren by possessing his temper of mind, certainly ye are Abraham's seed, more really than those Jews who are related to him only by natural descent, and heirs of the heavenly country according to God's promise to Abraham.

Ver. 29. — 1. If ye be Christ's brethren, certainly ye are Abraham's seed. — This form may be, 'If ye are his brethren,' implying a likeness in character, certainly ye are Abraham's seed. For, in the first place, nowhere in scripture are brethren called Christ's seed, or even, but Christ's brethren. In the second place, this interpretation renders the apostle's conclusion just. In the former part of the chapter he had affirmed, that Christ is Abraham's seed in which the nations are to be blessed. Therefore, if believers are Christ's brethren by imitating him in his virtues, they also are Abraham's seed, by reason of their relation to Christ. See ver. 25. 2. The apostle's reasoning will be equally conclusive, supposing that his meaning is, 'If ye be Christ's people by possessing his virtues.' 3. And heirs according to the promise. — Christ's brethren, being Abraham's spiritual seed, are heirs of the heavenly country, according to the true meaning of God's promise in the covenant, to give to Abraham and to his seed the everlasting possession of the heavenly country, typified by the possession of the earthly Canaan, the heritage of Abraham's natural seed.

The hardships of that bondage, they might be the more sensible of the happiness which they were to derive from the liberty of the gospel, ver. 3.

More particularly, how they knew that they would naturally occur to his readers, but which, according to his manner, he did not formally state. The first is, — Since all believers from the beginning were heirs of the promises, as well as of the things promised, why were they not put in possession of the promises from the beginning, by sending Christ into the world, and introducing the gospel dispensation in the first age; that the promises, especially the promise of pardon and eternal life through faith, might have been published universally, and preserved for the benefit of the heirs in every age? The second question is, Why were mankind left for so many ages to the direction of the laws of nature and of Moses, neither of which gave them any hope of pardon and eternal life? — To the first of these questions the apostle replies, That in not giving the heirs the knowledge of the promises by introducing the gospel dispensation immediately after the fall, God treated them as a prudent father treats his son while under age. During his non-age, he does not allow him to possess the estate of which he is heir, because he has not discretion to use it aright, but he keeps him in the condition of a bondman. In the same manner, though believers from the beginning were heirs of the promises, God did not in the early ages put them in possession of them, by immediately setting up the gospel dispensation; because, in the first ages, the state of the world did not admit either of the universal publication of the gospel, or of its preservation, ver. 4. The second question is, Why keeping the heirs for so many ages under the tuition of the laws of nature and of Moses, the apostle answers, That as the heir of a great estate must be prepared by a proper education for enjoying it with dignity, and is, therefore, in his childhood, placed under tutors who protect and instruct him, and stewards who manage his estate and supply him with what he wants, till the time appointed in his father's will for taking possession of his inheritance, ver. 2. — So, to prepare believers for the actual inheritance of the promises under the gospel dispensation, God judgeth it proper to continue them for a long time under the bondage of the laws of nature and of Moses, that by experiencing the hardships of that bondage, they might be the more sensible of the happiness which they were to derive from the liberty of the gospel, ver. 3.
the heathens, under the tuition of the light of nature, were made sensible of the insufficiency of their own natural powers to discover any effectual method of obtaining pardon; and when the Jews, by the law of Moses, were showed that it was not possible for the sacrifices of beasts to take away sin; and when the political state of the world admitted the gospel to be preached to all nations, and preserved when preached—then was "the fulness of the time," or the proper season for God's sending forth his Son into the world born of a woman descended from Abraham, to make a complete discovery of the method of salvation by the gospel revelation, ver. 4.—And by offering himself a sacrifice for sin to redeem believers, the heirs of the promises, from the tuition both of the law of nature and of the law of Moses; and to place them under the gospel dispensation, that they may receive the adoption of sons; that is, all the privileges which belong to the sons or heirs of God.

Next, in regard the believing Gentiles, equally with the believing Jews, are the sons of God, and heirs of the promises, the apostle addressed both, saying, Wherefore, because ye are [God's] Spirit, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, the Holy Spirit, whose gifts are evidences of your sonship, and embolden you to address God by the endearing appellation of Father, ver. 6.—Thou then who possessest the gifts of the Spirit, whether thou be a Jew or a Gentile, art no longer a bondman under the tuition of the law either of nature or of Moses, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God, an heir of all the promises of God, through the atonement which Christ hath made for thee, ver. 7.—However, ye Gentiles ought to remember, that in your heathen state, being ignorant of the true God, ye worshipped with a slavish subjection things which are no gods, ver. 8.—But now, having acknowledged the true God as your Father, or, to express it better, being acknowledged by the true God as his sons, ye worship him acceptably with spiritual services. And being in this happy state, why do ye, by embracing Judaism, return to the same kind of bodily unprofitable worship, by sacrifices, washings, and holy days, which ye practised in heathenism? ver. 9.—I am told ye observe the days, and new moons, and seasons, and years enjoined in the law of Moses; which kind of worship, though different in respect of its object, is in its nature the same with the worship ye formerly paid to your idols, and has the same tendency to beget in you a superstitious, slavish disposition. These observances, I know, ye have been made to believe are necessary to your salvation. But I assure you, my children, that ye need not be afraid, ver. 10.—I am afraid I have laboured in vain among you, ver. 11.—Lest, however, this rebuke might have offended the Galatians, he assured them that it proceeded from love; and desired the continuance of their affection, which, when he first preached to them, had been very great, ver. 12–20.

The apostle next turn'd his discourses to the false teachers, and asked them and their disciples, who wished to be under the law of Moses as the rule of their justification, Why they did not understand the law? He meant the writings of Moses, which, when rightly interpreted, taught the freedom of Abraham's seed by faith, from the bondage of the law, ver. 21.—To prove this, the apostle, entering into the deep meaning of the things which Moses hath written concerning Abraham, observed that Abraham, as the father of the people of God, had two sons, the one by the bond-maid, Hagar, the other by the free-woman, Sarah, ver. 22.—But the one by the bond-maid was begotten by the natural strength of his parents; but the son who was born of the free-woman was begotten supernaturally, through the strength communicated to his parents by the promise, ver. 23.—These things, the apostle told the Galatians, are an allegory: For these mothers represent the two covenants, by which men are made the church and people of God. The one covenant is that of the law, given from Mount Sinai, whereby the descendents of Abraham, according to the flesh, were made the visible church and people of God; and which bringeth forth all its children in bondage to the law. This covenant is represented by Hagar, ver. 24.—Wherefore, her son Ishmael, whom she brought forth in bondage, was a type of the then present Jerusalem, or visible Jewish church, consisting of Abraham's natural descendents by Isaac; who are all in bondage to the law, and who, if they have no relation to Abraham but by natural descent, and to God but by being in his visible church, will be excluded from the inheritance of heaven; as Ishmael was from the earthly inheritance, on account of his being brought forth in bondage. Hagar and her son Ishmael are likewise types of those who, under the gospel dispensation, are members of God's visible church, merely by being born of parents who are members of that church, and who are in bondage to their lusts; and who likewise are excluded from the inheritance of heaven, ver. 25.—The other covenant is that of the gospel, which was published from Mount Zion, Isa. ii. 3. whereas, believers, Abraham's children by faith, are made citizens of the Jerusalem above; that is, members of God's invisible catholic church, whose perfect state will be in heaven. This covenant is fulfilled by the Ishmael of the flesh, who was constituted by God the mother of all believers. And her son Isaac, who was born in freedom, is an apt type of Abraham's children by faith, who being regenerated by God, are born in freedom from the bondage of the law, and from the slavery of sin; and are the catholic invisible church of God, and heirs of the heavenly inheritance, ver. 26.

The foregoing account of Abraham's wives and sons, and of the persons and things typified by them, the apostle told the Galatians was confirmed by Isaiah, who foretold the conversion of the Gentiles, under the idea of their becoming Sarah's children by faith, in these words: Rejoice, O barren woman, doc. ver. 37.

Having thus established his allegorical interpretation of the history of Abraham's wives and sons, he drew therefrom the following conclusion concerning believers of all nations: We, brethren, after the manner of Isaac, are the children begotten to Abraham by God's promise, A father of many nations I have constituted thee, and are the persons typified by Isaac, ver. 28.—But, says the apostle, as the children of Isaac, as the Gentiles, who were begotten according to the flesh, persecuted Isaac, who was begotten according to the spirit, by mocking him, and by insisting that he should be excluded from the inheritance because he was the younger son, so it hath happened now: the Jews, the natural descendents of Abraham, persecute as believers in Christ, who are Abraham's spiritual seed, and endeavours to exclude us from the inheritance, because they were made the church and people of God before us, ver. 29.—But what saith the scripture happened on that occasion? Why, that God ordered Abraham to cast out the bond-woman and her son; for the son of the bond-woman shall not inherit with the son of the free-woman; thereby declaring, that those who are the people of God only by natural descent and outward profession, shall not inherit heaven, ver. 30.—Thus, brethren, it appears from the law itself, that the births of Ishmael and Isaac were ordered in such a manner as to shew, that believers of all nations are the children of Abraham, not by the bond-woman, indeed, but by the free; consequently, that they are heirs of the promises, and of the heavenly country, although they are not in bondage to the law of Moses, ver. 31.
Galatians.

Commentary.

Galatians.

—1 Now if ye ask, why the gospel dispensation was not introduced immediately after the fall? and why the heirs, during so many ages, were left to the guidance of the laws of nature and of Moses? I answer, As long as the heir is a child, he differeth nothing from a bond-man, although he be lord of all:

2 (A A A A, 78.) For he is under tutors and stewards, until the time before appointed of his father.

3 So also we (i.e.) whilst we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world.

4 But when the fulness of the time was come, God (ἐγείρω) sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born (ἐγείρω ἐκ γυναικός) under the law, under law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

5 That he might buy off these (ἐγείρω ἐκ γυναικός) under law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

Ver. 1.—1. As long as the heir is a child,—Beating the apostle, in the close of the preceding chapter, declared that all who have put on the temper and dispositions of Christ, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, are Christ's brethren. In the language of John, and his account of the promise, it is evident that in this chapter, when he speaks concerning the heir, and describes the treatment which, by his father's appointment, the children of God will receive, his discourse cannot be restricted to the Jews, as if they were the only heirs, but must comprehend the Gentiles also, describing their condition under the dispensation of the law of nature, ver. 6. In like manner the persons in bondage to the elements of the world, ver. 4, and under the law, ver. 5, were all Christians, taken in the sense of all who, as well as the Jews; because Jews and Gentiles, equally, were under the dispensation of law. And having been bought off by Christ, chap. xiii. 13, they were both of them, after his death, placed under the gospel dispensation, which is the discipline of sons. See ver. 5, note 2.

2. Different nothing from a bond-man:—He is kept in as much subjection, and hath as little the disposal of his person and property, as if he were the meanest servant in the house. See ver. 1, note 2.

3. The time before appointed of his father:—Probably this was a time before appointed in his father's testament, at which time he was to be delivered from the bondage; consequentally, the father is supposed by the apostle to have been dead. This shews the propriety of placing the heir under tutors and stewards; which is the consequence of his death, both as to the heirs of the estate, and to the covenant of grace, the spiritual inheritance. See ver. 6, note 1.

4. The time of the fulness of the time was come:—It was necessary, before the gospel dispensation was introduced, to make trial whether human reason, sided by the law of Moses, could find out any efeectual means of sanctifying and saving sinners. God was pleased to put the world under the guidance of those instruments for many ages, resolving, after their inefficacy was shewed by a full trial, to put an end to those dispensations by introducing the gospel. But the time of the fulness of the world was to shew, that the 'childhood of the heirs,' and the period at which an end was put to the direction of these laws, he calls, ver. 2. 'the time before appointed of the Father.'—See here, the fulness of the God, and receive the blessings belonging to the people of God, by being introduced into the gospel church.

5. Born under law:—This shews that the Son of God, was one of Abraham's children; consequently, that he is the seed of Abraham, in which all the nations of the earth are to be blessed. Also, it is mentioned that he was born under the law, to shew that he was subjected, not only to the precepts, but to the curse of the law of Moses, that is to death. But having never done any thing to merit that curse, it is added in the second verse, that he was thus born under the law, 'that he might buy off those under law.'
I am afraid of you, lest perhaps I have laboured in vain among you. I am afraid of you, lest perhaps I have laboured in vain among you. For ye do not seem to understand and value the privileges of the gospel. I am your true friend, having reproved you from love, and not from resentment. For all the time I was with you, ye injured me in nothing. On the contrary, ye behaved towards me with the greatest respect and affection. Ye remember, certainly, that under a bodily infirmity, which might have rendered my labours ineffectual, I preached the gospel to you at first. Yet my bodily infirmity, which was a temptation to me, ye did not ridicule, neither did ye reject me with abhorrence as an impostor, but received me as an angel of God; nay, ye received me with as much respect as if I had been Christ Jesus himself.

8. And because ye believing Jews and Gentiles are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, by whose gifts, being assured that ye are God's sons, ye can address him in prayer with confidence, calling him, each in your own language, Abba, Father.

9. So that thou art no more a bond-man, but a son; (see Gal. iii. 20. note 1.) and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

10. Ye carefully observe days, and moeens, and seasons, and years.

11. I am afraid of you, lest perhaps I have laboured in vain among you.

12. Brethren, I pray you, as I am as ye are. Ye have injured me in nothing.

13. Ye know, indeed, that (Kol. xi. 17.) in weakness of the flesh I preached the gospel to you at first. Yet my bodily infirmity, which was a temptation to me, ye did not ridicule, neither did ye reject me with abhorrence as an impostor, but received me as an angel of God; nay, ye received me with as much respect as if I had been Christ Jesus himself.
15 What then was your happiness? I for bear you witness, that, if possible, plucking out your eyes, ye would have given them to me.

16 So that I become your enemy, when I speak truth to you!

17 They love you ardently, not honourably; for they wish to exclude us; that ye may love them ardently.

18 But it is honourable to be ardently in love with a good man at all times; and not merely when I am present with you.

19 My beloved children in Christ, for whom I again travel in birth, till Christ be formed in you, 20 (Ho 1, 10.) I could wish, indeed, to change and to change my speech; for I am exceedingly in doubt, (1 Thess. 1, 6.) concerning you.

21 Tell me, ye who wish to be under the law, (Gen. xlix. 45.) do ye not understand the law?

22 For it is written, that Abraham had two sons; one by the bond-maid, and one by the free-woman.

23 But be, verily, was of the bond-maid, was begotten (sarx) according to the flesh; but he who was of the free-woman, (Is.) through the promise. (Gen. xviii. 10.)

24 Which things are an allegory: for (Gen. xxiv.) these women are the two covenants: the one, verity, from Mount Sinai, bringing forth which the Galatians regarded the apostle at his first coming among them, and was more strongly pointed than by these expressions.

Ver. 15. What then was your happiness?—Locke says, the word παθήσατε, in this place, may be taken actively, or

Ver. 16. So that I become your enemy.—The apostle's address to the Galatians is in terms of former love and affection and gratitude to him as their spiritual father, and his contrasting it in this verse with their present temper of mind, is admirably

Ver. 17—1. They love you ardently.—For this translation of 2 Cor. iii. 2 Cor. iii. 2 note 1. Here, by imputing the change of the Galatians' disposition towards him to the artifices of the false teachers, the apostle in some measure extinguished their fault.

2. They wish to exclude us;—instead of μακρινος, which is the common reading, some MSS. and printed copies have μακροκεντρον, for which reason our translators have put in the margin. I suppose it to be the true reading, because it agrees better than the other with the sense of the apostle's discourse.

Ver. 18. It is honourable to be ardently in love, &c.—Chandler paraphrases these verses in the following diffuse manner: "As you once thought yourselves happy in my friendship, and loved me with the strongest affection, do you now, when you hear and present the gospel to me, so I am still worthy of the same share of your affections, though I am absent from you; for I still bear you the tenderest love, and press on you nothing but your contentment in that gospel at first I preached to you; and therefore it is neither honourable nor decent for you to renounce my friendship, or exclude me from your company for the sake of any other one whatsoever."

Ver. 18—1. My little children.—This is an expression of the affection of John i. 4. But as coming from Paul, it is likely instances that he had been the inventor of the following conversation.

2. By whom I again travel in birth.—According to Beza, ζυγω signifies the pains of gestation. But whether it signifies the pains of gestation or of child-bearing, it denotes the labour and sufferings which the apostle bears in converting the Galatians. The image is beautiful. He speaks to the Galatians in the character of a mother, who had once before suffered labour and pains equal to those of child-bearing, when he converted them. He now suffered these pangs a second time, while he endeavoured to bring them back to the true faith of the gospel. It is not possible by words to express the anxiety of desire and affection more strongly than the apostle hath done by this image.

Ver. 19. And to change my speech.—The phrase αλλα διαλεγμενος is taken from the Galatians in their former facts with which he had to do with them, as the subject of their discourse. Here it signifies the framing of the apostle's discourse suitably to the circumstances of the Galatians. By this he means that at first he acted as a preacher of the natural strength of his parents, and being born a slave, had no title to inherit his father's estate: But he who was of the free-woman, was begotten through the strength supernaturally communicated to his parents by the promise, "Lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son," and like his mother being free, was his father's heir.

20 Which things, concerning the sons and wives of Abraham, and the power by which these sons were begotten, and the state into which they were born, are an allegory. For these women, as the

Chapter IV

Children (μω, 141. 2) into bondage, which is Hagar.

25 (Το γονονος Αγαρ, For the name Hagar denotes Mount Sinai in Arabia.) And she answered, and said to the present Jerusalem, (verse 3 ) (θεος, 101) and is in bondage with her children.

26 (ος, 100.) But the Jerusalem above (εσω, verse 6.) is the free-woman, for she is the mother of us all. (Verse 24. note 1.)

27 For it is written, (Is. liv. 1.) Rejoice, O barren woman, who did not bring forth; break out and cry, thou that travailedst not in birth: for more are the children of the desolated, than of her who had the husband of the desolated.

28 We therefore, brethren, (sava, verse 22.) after the manner of Isaac, are children of promise. (Verse 23.)

Wherefore, since the apostle Paul tells us, that what Moses hath written concerning the wives of Abraham, the father of the people of God, is an allegorical representation of the two covenants, which were betrothed, and which the church and people of God; and that his sons by these wives represent the persons born under the two covenants, together with the treatment they are to receive from God, may be believed on account of the inspiration by which he wrote, especially as in verse 27. he hath appealed to the prophet Isaiah, as giving the same account of these matters in this very chapter, when he addresseth Sarah, he says, ver. 1. Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear: for more are the children of the desolate, than of her who had the husband of the desolate. For, it is not true that Sarah's children by Isaac, according to the flesh, were more numerous than Hagar's children by Ishmael, the prophet certainly doth not speak of her children by Isaac, but of the children that were given her by the promise, Gen. xvii. 16. She shall be the mother of nations. Now, seeing the prophet, as well as the apostle, ver. 28. considereth Sarah as the mother of all believers, may we not suppose she was made to conceive her son supernaturally, that she might be a type of the covenant under which believers are regenerated by the power of God; and that her son might be of all who by regeneration become the children of God, called: 'The Jerusalem above,' which is free both from the bondage and from the curse of the law.—In like manner, Abraham's son by Hagar and Sarah may have been begotten by the natural descent of his parents, and born in bondage, that he might be a proper representation of the church, namely by being his children according to the flesh; consequence, a type, or allegorical representation, of the Jerusalem which excludes the flesh, the written, or the written written, or the written written, which was in bondage to the law, and which gave its members no title to the heavenly inheritance: on account of the rejection of the relation in which they had to Abraham by natural descent.—In this view, Hagar herself is a representation of the covenant from Sinai, by which the Israelites were made the visible church of God, and put in bondage to the law, and were by its curse excluded from the inheritance of heaven, if they had no other relation to Abraham but that of natural descent.

In further confirmation of the allegorical meaning of the facts recorded by Moses, the apostle observes, verse 29. That as Ishmael, who was begotten according to the flesh, persecuted Isaac, who was begotten according to the spirit, so the Jews, the natural seed of Abraham, persecuted the believing Jews and Gentiles, his spiritual seed, as being in an evil condition, as being under the typical character and actions, Ishmael was a fit type of the unbelieving Jews, Abraham's natural seed. Lastly, from his interpretation of the apostle draws this conclusion, ver. 31. That all believers are the children, not of the bond-woman, but of the free. St. Peter likewise gives the same interpretation of Abraham and his sons; for he calls all believing holy women, whether Jews or Gentiles, the daughters of Sarah, if they, like her, behave well, 1 Pet. iii. 8. And Christ himself tells us, that those only are the children of Abraham, who do the works of Abraham, John viii. 37. 38. Bring forth children into bondage. The Jews are very properly called Hagar's children, born of her according to the flesh, from Sinai, because the worship enjoined in that covenant was exterminated out of it; and Judaism, being in bondage, was subject to all the plagues of Egypt, and to those which were of no avail in procurning them the favour of God, as moral governor of the world. For, notwithstanding the sacred care and trouble with which the pious Jews performed these things, their conception of sin and dread of punishment remained as great as before.

38 Hagar, the bondmaid, is a fit type of the covenant from Sinai, (for Hagar is one of the names of Mount Sinai in Arabia, from whence that covenant was given;) and she, with her son, representeth the Jewish church and Israel, which is in bondage to the law; and which covenant is fitly represented by Hagar, who brought forth her son Ishmael into bondage.

29 Hagar, the bondmaid, is a fit type of the covenant from Sinai, (for Hagar is one of the names of Mount Sinai in Arabia, from whence that covenant was given;) and she, with her son, representeth the Jewish church and Israel, which is in bondage to the law; and which covenant is fitly represented by Hagar, who brought forth her son Ishmael into bondage.

30 But the catholic church, consisting of believers of all nations, which is formed on the covenant published from Mount Zion, and which I call the Jerusalem above, because its most perfect state will be in heaven, is represented by the free-woman Sarah, who is the mother of us all who believe.

31 For the interpretation of the things respecting Abraham's wives and sons is not new; it is alluded to by Isaiah: 32 For (chap. liv. 1.) it is written, Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear, break forth into songs and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child: for more are the children of the desolate, than the children of the married wife, saith the Lord.

32 We therefore, brethren, who believe, even though we are not related to Abraham by natural descent, after the manner of Isaac, are children of Abraham and to Sarah by the promise, which made him the father, and her the mother of nations.

33 See chap. iv. note 3. Besides, the covenant from Sinai rendered all its members slaves, by the rigour of its precepts and the terror of its curses. But the covenant from Mount Zion, (Isa. ii. 3.) the gospel covenant, by abolishing the Jewish church with its ineffectual rites of worship, and by erecting the spiritual Christian church with its spiritual worship, set free men and sons, who obey God from love, and who can address him with confidence by the ennobling appellation of Father.

34 In the same way, the church of that whole of that mountaneous ridge in Arabia Petraea, of which Sinai was a part, was called the mountains of uncircumcision: it was called by Moses, the mountain of God, Exod. iii. 1. because on Sinai God gave the law to the Israelites. Also, in the preface to his edition of Miller's Greek Testament, agrees with Bentley in thinking, that the clause, τυχανος των διακοινωνων εις την ημιυιοντανην αποστολοι, is an explanation, which at first was written on the margin of some pages, and afterwards was taken into the text by later transcribers. Grotius says, Sinai is called Hagar or Agar synecdochically, because in that mountain there was a city which bare Hagar's name. By Fliny, it is called Agra; and by Diod. Agra; and its inhabitants were called Hagaranes. Papi. iul. iii. 8. The later Greek writers call it by the Hebrew name, and I think, from the meaning of the word hagar, which in the Hebrew language signifies rock; for so Sinai is sometimes called. Exod. iii. 8.

35 And she called her son's name, because she was barren, and had no child. Exod. iii. 2. But the Jerusalem above is the free-woman, because she speaks of God, and her son, Ishmael, contents himself with expressing it briefly thus: But the Jerusalem above is the free-woman, who is the mother of us all.—The Jerusalem above, the spiritual Jewish, or Catholic church, consisting of believers of all nations, with the covenant on which it is formed, is truly typified by Sarah. This is the distinction between Sarah and Sarah, the representative of the mother of all believers, on account of her bringing forth Isaac supernatural. Hence the expression: The children of Abraham and Sarah, Gal. viii. 18, 16. Where God said concerning her, she shall be a mother of nations.
CHAPTER V.

29 But even as then, he who was begotten (

29 But even as it happened then, that I sahm, he was begotten according to the flesh—begotten by the natural strength of his parents, and related to Abraham by natural descent only—persecuted Isaac, and the begotten according to the Spirit, and resembled his father Abraham in the dispositions of his mind, as also it hath happenned now, the Jews the natural seed persecute us the spiritual seed.

30 But, what saith the Scripture? (Gen.
30 But what saith the scriptures? (Gen.
xxi. 10.) Cast out the bond-maid and her son;
for the son of the bond-maid shall not inherit ions;" and by changing her name from Sarai into Sarah, confirmed that promise, as he confirmed his promise to Abraham, "that he should be the father of many nations," by changing his name. See verse 11, note 1.

Verse 28. Ver. 28. We therefore, brethren, after the manner of Isaac, are not the children of Isaac; but the children of the promise are begotten to Abraham by the divine power accompanying the promise. A father of many nations have we constituted these:
with Abraham, the son of Sarah, but the children of the promise are begotten to Abraham by the divine power accompanying the promise. And seeing God called the Israelites his sons, Rom.
iv. 25. on account of the supernatural begotten of Isaacs and Isaacs; and by Sarah, the father's heir, and therefore he ridiculed the false claim in honour of Isaac as the heir, together with Sarah's laying claim to the whole of the inheritance for herself. This action in Sarah and her family, with which the Jews, Abraham's natural posterity, would not have his spiritual seed, and the hope of salvation through him.
Typical also of the claim which the natural seed would set up, of being the only heirs of God, because they were the first people.

Verse 29. Ver. 29. The son of the bond-maid shall not inherit.
In this transaction God declared, that all who have no relation to him, nor subscribe to the inheritance of his seed, the means which arises from their being members of the visible church, shall be excluded from the family of God, and be for ever excluded from heaven. Perhaps also, in this transaction, God prefigured the rejection of the Jews, the natural seed, from being the church and people of God, for their persecuting the Christians, the spiritual seed of Abraham. These things, however, the apostle hath not pointed out to his readers, but left them to be investigated by their own sagacity.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The apostle, in the third chapter, having, from Abraham's justification by faith, proved,-1. That all who believe are the seed of Abraham, whom God in the cove-ant promised to justify by faith:—2. That the law of Moses, which was given long after the covenant was made, was intended by the oath of the covenant, neither annul nor alter the covenant, by introducing a method of justification different from that which was so solemnly established in the covenant:—3. That men are heirs of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type, not meritoriously by obedience to the law, but by the free gift of God:—4.
That the law was given to the Israelites, not to justify them, but to restrain them from transgressions, and by making them sensible of their sins, and of the demerit of their sins, to lead them to Christ for justification:— Further, having in the fourth chapter observed, that the method of justification by faith, established at the fall, was not universally published in the first ages, by immediately introducing the gospel dispensation, because the state of the world in the first ages did not admit thereof; and because it was proper that mankind should remain a while under the tuition of the light of nature, and of the law of Moses:—Also having declared, that the supernatural procreation of Isaac, and his birth in a state of freedom, was intended to typify the supernatural generation of Abraham's spiritual seed, and the principle and foundation of the law of Moses as a term of salvation,—the apostle, in this fifth chapter, as the application of the whole of his doctrine, exhibited the Galatians to stand firm in that freedom from the law of Moses as a term of salvation, wherewith Christ had freed them in the gospel dispensation: and by no means to be again held fast in bondage to any ritual form of worship, ver. 1.—Then, with the authority of an inspired apostle, he solemnly declared, that if they sought salvation by receiving circumcision, Christ would be of no manner of use to them as a Seviour, ver. 2.
The Judaizing teachers, who still adhered to the law of Moses, as necessary to salvation, being sensible, that the burdensomeness of the services required by Moses might deter the Gentiles from receiving circumcision, had, it seems, made the Galatians believe, that circumcision did not bind those who lived out of Judea to obey the more troublesome and expensive services of the law; such as the offering of sacrifices, the paying of tithes, the going up to Jerusalem three times in the year, &c.; but to obey those precepts only which were of easy performance—namely, the keeping of the sabbaths, the new moons, and the other holy days enjoined in the law; the abstaining from unclean meats, the avoiding of the company of the uncircumcised, &c. Wherefore, to undeceive the Ga-litians, the apostle solemnly testified to them, that every circumcised person, who sought to be justified by the law of Moses, bound himself to obey all its precepts without exception, and subjected himself to its curse if he failed in the least particular, ver. 3.—In short, they separated themselves from Christ, who sought to be mercifully redeemed from all their ungodliness, and their unrighteous loss, excluded themselves from the grace offered in the gospel, ver. 4.—as they might know from this, that all who adhere to Christ are warranted, by the gifts of the Spirit bestowed on them, to hope for justification through faith, without the works of the law of Moses, ver. 5.—
Besides, in the gospel dispensation, neither circumcision, nor the want of it, availed anything to men's acceptance with God, but faith strongly working by love to God and to man, ver. 6. Next, the apostle having observed, that at the first the Galatians made good proficiency in the doctrine of the gospel, he asked, who it was that now interrupted their progress, so as to make them forsake the truth? ver. 7-9. And, hoped, that when they considered what he had written, they would not think differently from him concerning the method of justification, ver. 10. And because his enemies had said, that since he conversed with the apostles at Jerusalem, he had altered his doctrine, and now taught the necessity of circumcision, he desired to know how it came to pass that the Jews still persecuted him? For, if he preached circumcision, the stumbling block of the cross of Christ was certainly removed out of their way, ver. 11. Then concluded with wishing them to cut off by excommunication the person who had subverted them, ver. 12.

The doctrinal part of the epistle being finished, the apostle, in what remains, advised the Galatians not to use their liberty to corrupt the law of Moses with respect to their flesh, as a pretence for gratifying their sensual appetites, to the offence of the weaker Jewish brethren, who still thought the meats forbidden by Moses unclean, ver. 13. Because, in so doing, they would break the great Christian law of love, ver. 14. The Jews, by speaking of the Gentiles as ignominy, and the Gentiles, by representing the Jews as ignorant bigots. For, said the apostle, by thus giving occasion to the flesh to exercise its lusts in biting and devouring one another, ye will bring destruction on one another, ver. 15. He therefore commanded them to obey the dictates of their spirit, and not to fulfill the lusts of their flesh. Withal, to make them the more watchful in that respect, he told them, that the inclinations of the spirit and of the flesh are oftentimes contrary one to the other; and that, through the prevalence of the inclinations of the flesh, men are frequently hindered from doing what their spirit, that is, their reason and conscience, inclines them to do. At the same time, to encourage them, he assured them, that if they followed the dictates of their reason enlightened by the Spirit, they would not fall under the curses of any law whatever, ver. 18. Then, to shew what sort of actions the lust of the flesh would lead them to perform, he enumerated the works of the flesh; and, to make them sensible of the dangerous nature of these works, heForst told now, before he had done before, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God, ver. 19-21. Also he enumerated the fruits of the Spirit; and in their commendation took notice, that their excellency is so evident, that in no nation was there ever any law made against them, ver. 22, 23. Further, as a powerful motive to renounce the works of the flesh, he assured them, that they cohabiting in the flesh with its passions and lusts, ver. 24. In short, since the Galatians lived under the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, he commanded them to walk according to its rules, ver. 25. And cautioned such as possessed the spiritual gifts, to avoid vain-glory in the exercises of them, that they might not provoke their brethren to anger and strife. And those who were under the spirit of the gifts, he exhorted not to envy those who were endowed with them, ver. 26.

NEW TRANSLATION.

Ver. 1. Be not again held fast.—The apostle, though writing to Gentiles, might say, Be not again held fast in the yoke of bondage, because the law of Moses, which he was cautioning them to avoid, was a yoke of the same kind with that under which they had groaned with Jennings. See Rom. iv. 3. note. By this precept, the apostle likewise condemns the superstitious bodily services enjoined in all the church of Rome, which are really of the same nature with those prohibited by the apostle, with this difference, that none of those are of divine appointment.

Ver. 2. If ye be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing.—This general expression must be limited, as in the commentary, because we cannot suppose that the circumcision of the Jews believers incapacitated them from being profited by Christ. Further, as the preservation of Abraham's posterity, a distinct people, was a part of mankind, answered many important purposes in the divine government, and especially, note 1. From chap. vi. sect. 5., their observation of the rite of circumcision, declared by God himself to be the seal of his covenant with Abraham, was necessary to mark them as his descendants, as long as it was determined that they should be continued a distinct people. This sheweth, that the apostle's declaration is to be considered as a prohibition of circumcision to Jews as a national rite, but as a rite necessary to salvation. And therefore, while the Jews practised this rite, according to its original intention, for the purpose of distinguishing themselves as Abraham's descendants, and not for obtaining salvation, they did what was right. But the Gentiles not being of Abraham's race, were under no political obligation to circumcise themselves; consequently, if they received that rite, it must have been because they thought it necessary to their salvation; for which reason, the apostle forbidden them, as not being morally necessary, ver. 5. See the Illustr. of this verse.

Ver. 3. He is a debtor to do the whole law.—See the Illustr. of this verse. From chap. vi. 13. It appears, that the Judaizing teachers, who so earnestly enjoined obedience to the law of Moses as necessary to salvation, did not observe itself. This sheweth, that their sole motive in urging the Galatians to be circumcised, was, as the apostle in the passage just now cited observes, that they might avoid persecution from their unbelieving brethren, and have the honour of making more people from among the Gentiles. For, 'Vaccini et a Christians.' "Beza, 'Evangelica separa Christians.' The apostle's meaning is, that whoever sought to be justified meritoriously by the law of Moses, and for that purpose received circumcision, dissolved his connexion with Christ, which had been established by his baptism, and renounced all relation to, and dependence on Christ as a Saviour. See the Illustr. of this verse.

Ver. 4. Ye are loosed from Christ.—So the word διαλογίζεσθαι is rendered by the Gr. through the Vulg. 'Vacati a Christo.' "Beza, 'Evangelica separa Christians.' The apostle's meaning is, that whoever sought to be justified meritoriously by the law of Moses, and for that purpose received circumcision, dissolved his connexion with Christ, which had been established by his baptism, and renounced all relation to, and dependence on Christ as a Saviour. See the Illustr. of this verse.

Ver. 5. Look for the hope of righteousness.—So the word δημιουργεῖται is translated, Phil. iii. 20. Either this clause is elliptical, or it is the sentiment expressed in the next clause, that the Galatians might not be made partakers of Christ's suffering, but that Christ might suffer for them. See the Illustr. of this verse.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V. 1. Because believers are the children of the free-woman, do ye Gentiles stand fast in the freedom from the law of Moses, wherewith Christ hath freed us in the gospel dispensation, and be not a second time held fast in the yoke of bondage, as if it were necessary to your salvation. 2. Behold, I Paul say to you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing. 3. (Mη θαλανίζεσθε και μη τινα θαλανίζεσθε, [3:7].) And I testify, moreover, to every circumcised person, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. 4. Ye are loosed from Christ, who are justified (Rom. iv. 1.) by the law; ye are fallen from grace. 5. (Τάς ἐπισκεύασμα γίνεται, [5:1].) But we, through the Spirit, look for the hope of righteousness by faith.
6 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith working by love. 7 Ye did run well; who put a stop to you, that ye should not obey the truth?

8 (CH) This persuasion cometh not from him who called you. 9 A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. 10 I am persuaded (ACT 143.) concerning you (E K)M., 165.) by the Lord, that ye will nothing differently FROM ME: But he who troubleth you shall bear punishment; whosoever he be.

11 (Ac) But I, brethren, if I new preach circumcision, why am I now persecuted? 12 Certainly the offence of the cross is abolished. 13 I wish they were even cut off who subvert you. 14 (Taq. 97.) Now ye, brethren, have been called into liberty, (VER 1.) yet only use not this liberty for an occasion to the flesh; but through love (Letters) assiduously serve one another.

15 For the whole law is fulfilled (Mt. 5. 17.) by one precept, even this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 16 But if ye bite and devour one another, have a care, lest ye be consumed by one another.

17 (Lp. w, 55.) I command then, Walk by the spirit, and ye will not fulfill the lust of the flesh.

Galatians

6 For in the gospel dispensation, neither circumcision availeth any thing towards our acceptance with God, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love to God and to man. 7 All we, ye made great progress in the doctrine and practice of the gospel: Who hath interfered with you in that good course, so as to make you now reject the truth?

8 This persuasion concerning the law, and the efficacy of its exposition, is not wrought in you by him who first called you. 9 A little leaven, that is, the errors of one teacher, are sufficient to corrupt a whole church.

10 Taker, to comfort you, I am persuaded concerning you by the Lord, that on reading what I have written, ye will not think differently from me concerning the doctrine of justification by faith: But the teacher who, by his falsehoods, hath given you so much trouble, shall, when I come, be punished for it, whosoever he be.

11 My enemies tell you, that I preach circumcision. But I, brethren, if I now preach circumcision, why am I now persecuted by the Jews? Having left off preaching through a creature Messiah, certainly the offence of the cross is removed, (1 Cor. 1. 23.) and they should no longer persecute me.

12 I wish they were even cut off by excommunication, who subvert your faith by their malicious calumnies and false doctrines.

13 Now ye, brethren, have been called by the gospel into freedom from the yoke of Moses, as the rule of your justification. Nevertheless, use not this liberty as a pretext for gratifying your passions, and exercising those passions, which have their seat in the flesh. But, agreeably to the law of Christ, assiduously serve one another in all things innocent.

14 They who stickle for the law ought to be zealous in the offices of love. For the whole law, as it respects our neighbour, is fulfilled by obeying one precept, even this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as sincerely as thou lovest thyself.

15 But if, from your seal for, or your seal against the law of Moses, ye wound and destroy one another's characters, have a care lest ye bring everlasting destruction on one another.

16 I command then, Walk according to the dictates of your spiritual part, and so you will not gratify the lust of your animal nature; particularly, ye will not gratify the sinful passions of envy, malice, anger, revenge.

and must be supplied thus, We look for the accomplishment of our hope of righteousness by faith; or, hope, the substantive noun, stands for the participle.—We through the Spirit look for the hoped righteousness by faith.

Ver. 8.—1. Nor uncircumcision.—The apostle mentioned uncircumcision, that he might show, from his speaking so much against circumcision, his own position in the dispensation, might have fancied there was something manifest in uncircumcision.

2. Which, acting by love.—The account which the apostle gives here of faith deserves attention. He does not say that it consists in the mere speculative belief of the truth of the gospel; but he designates the persuasion, taken up by many, that we are merely justified; or, that Christ hath died for us in particular. These things are nowhere in scripture represented as constituting justified persons, but by faith, which was in them, and by which they delude themselves. The faith which is counted for righteousness, according to St. Paul, is such a belief of the truth, as worketh in the heart of the believer by love, and maketh him a new creature, 2 Cor. vi. 15. The apostle called the attention of the Galatians to this operation of faith, because they were deficient in love to each other, chap. v. 16.

Ver. 7.—1. Ye did run well.—The exercises of faith and holiness enjoined in the gospel, are often in scripture compared to the ancient athletic exercises, especially to the race; because in that exercise the greatest exertions of activity and strength were necessary to obtain the prize, 2 Cor. x. 12, 13; Rom. vii. 2.

Who put a stop to you.—In this question, the apostle did not ask who the person was who had put a stop to them; but he expressed his surprise at their being stopped. In the original, the word signifies one going across the course, so as to Jason and Sosippus was running.

Ver. 8. Cometh not of him who called you.—So scripture should be translated, being the participant of the imperfect of the indicative. The apostle here described himself; for he was the person who converted the Galatians, as is plain from chap. i. 18. See Preface, sec. 1.

9. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.—This is a proverbial expression, in which the pernicious and infectious nature of a leaven is expressed by an example so set forth. Here by the leaven God gave the name of leaves to the doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees, Matt. xvi. 11, 12. The same name the apostle gave to the doctrine of the Jews. This is set forth. Here the whole lump is a figure of the Galatians.

10. Shall bear punishment.—See 2 Cor. x. 6. 8. 11. 10. I. Tim. i. 20. where in like manner the apostle threatens to punish false teachers.

12. Were even cut off.—Jortin thinks Gal. i. 14. is to be interpreted, may be translated, I wish they would cut themselves off; namely, by leaving your society. But as the apostle had hinted at the excommunication of the false teachers, ver. 9, by comparing them to leaves which was to be purged out, that it might not leaven the whole lump; and had threatened, ver. 10, that those who subverted them should bear their punishment, I incline to think, that in this passage he means those who, wishing to serve the Gentiles, were led off from their society. See 1 Cor. v. 2.

15. Who subvert.—The word ἀποδιοτίζω properly signifies, to drive one from his habitation. The phrase, Acts xvi. 8. is ἀποδιοτίζω, is translated, who have turned the world upside down.

17. Cleanse yourselves;—The word ἀποκάθιστε properly signifies, to drive one from his habitation. The phrase, Acts xvi. 8. is ἀποδιοτίζω, is translated, who have turned the world upside down.

18. Only use this liberty for an occasion to the flesh.—And, in what follows, the apostle proposes to remedy the dissensions which had arisen in the church of Galatia, as in other Gentile churches, where the Jewish converts insisted that the Gentiles should observe the distinction of meats and days prescribed by Moses, but the Gentiles strenuously maintained their Christian liberty. In carrying on these disputes, both parties, it seems, took such liberties with each other's characters, that the apostle termed it, ver. 15. 'a biting and devouring each other.'—In the expression, 'Use not your liberty an occasion to the flesh,' the apostle intimated, that the Gentiles Christians indulged their sensual appetites, by eating those meats which their Jewish brethren reckoned uncleanly, without regarding the offence which they gave them by transgressing; and that, on the other hand, the Jewish converts, enraged against the Gentiles, gave vent to their fleshly or angry passions, by speaking evil of their brethren. The word ἐρήμωσις, is where the apostle hath treated of these disputes at large.

14. For the whole law.—Here also signifies the whole parts of the law of Moses which enjoined men's duty to their neighbours; as is plain from the use of the word, Rom. xii. 10.
GALATIANS.

CHAP. V.

17 Ye have great need to subdue the lusts of the flesh: for the flesh strongly inclines men to act contrary to reason and conscience; and these principles are often contrary to one another, so that ye cannot do the things which your better part inclines you to do. See Rom. vii. 18.

18 But, to encourage you to subdue the flesh, know, that if ye habitually follow the dictates of your better part, ye are not under the curses of any law, so as to be punished.

19 Now, the works produced by the lusts of the flesh are manifest: which are:—ceremonial, fornication, and all kinds of uncleanness; such as incest, sodomy, bestiality, the indulging lascivious thoughts, and the reading of lascivious books:

20 The worshipping of idols, sorcery, or a pretended communication with invisible malignant powers; enmities long kept up; quarrels lasting in unreasonable law-suits; ambitious emotions; violent anger; bravery; causeless separations; the forming of sects in religion, for the sake of gain, in opposition to conscience;

21 Inward grieving at the happiness of others; the taking of men’s lives unjustly, and the maiming of their members; drinkings to intoxication; lewd frolicks, and running through the streets in the night-time; and such evil practices: concerning which I foretell you now, as I have often done formerly, that they who practise such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, good ness, faithfulness (so that we are translated in our Bibles, Tit. ii. 10.)

23 Meekness, temperance: against such things there is no law.

24 (a.) Besides, they who are Christ’s, have crucified the flesh, with its passions and lusts.

25 (b. 134.) Since we live in the spirit, let us also walk (2 Cor. vii. 176.) by the spirit.

Enlightened by the doctrines and precepts of the gospel revealed by the Spirit of God; and more especially, when the spirit is opposed to the flesh, as in the following verses. See Gal. v. 22. where “living in the spirit” signifies living in the gospel dispensation. Var. 17. 1. For the flesh.—In scripture the flesh frequently denotes the natural depravity of the animal part of our nature, which is so prevalent in all, that even the regenerated are troubled with the desire of the flesh. Var. 2. So that the things which ye incline, these ye cannot do. — The things which are inclinable, are the things which reason and conscience incline. The expression “ye cannot do,” does not mean ye cannot at any time do, but ye cannot at all times; for as the apostle says, ver. 29. they who are Christ’s have crucified the flesh with the passions and lusts; so that for the most part they do the things which their better part inclines. Besides, how absurd would it be for the apostle to command the Galatians to crucify their passions and lusts, until they fulfilled the lusts of the flesh, for this reason, that they could not at any time do the things which their reason and conscience inclined. Var. 19. Adultery.—This work of the flesh is mentioned first, as being the most prejudicial to society. It destroys conjugal happiness, ruins families, introduces a spurious breed, alienates the affection of their children, and causes them to neglect their education. Var. 17. 1. Idolatry.—Is lastly reckoned among the works of the flesh, because the worship paid to many of the heathen gods corresponded to the most impure fleshly gratifications.

2. Sorcery.—eca, sorcery, being placed immediately after idolatry, means those arts of incantation and charming, and all the pretended communications with invisible malignant powers, which the heathen priests promoted the reverence and worship of their idol gods, and enriched themselves. In this sense the word is used in Rev. xxi. 8. 22.

3. Strifes. —, as distinguished from , enmities, may usually suit law-suits as proceed from fleshly passions, rather than from the division of reason.

4. Separations.—The word seditions, by which our translators have rendered the Greek word διήθεσις, is of too limited a signification, denoting only a state of war: which has no signification those uncharitable and causeless separations, which break not only the civil but the religious ties whereby mankind are united; and which proceed from the prevalence of covetousness, pride, and other lusts of the flesh.

5. Gentleness.—Being ranked among the works of the flesh, must be opinions in the land of Israel, embraced by certain sects, and factually obtruded on others, in opposition to a man’s own conviction of his duty to the interests of worldly interest.

6. Christ’s brethren. — (iii. 17.) have, from love to him, and admiration of his character, crucified the body with the passions and lusts proper to it.

7. Since we live in the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, and enjoy the spiritual gifts, let us also walk by the spirit; that is, by the rules prescribed in this spiritual dispensation.
26 Let us not be vain-glorious, provoking one another, envying one another.

26 In particular, let us who enjoy the spiritual gifts, beware of being puffed up with pride, lest we provoke another to anger; and let us who want these gifts, abstain from envying those who possess them.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations in this Chapter.

The apostle, in what follows, recommended to the spiritual men who were teachers in the Galatian churches, to restore, by most exhortations and affectionate rebukes, those who were surprised into any fault, ver. 1. — And to sympathize with, and assist one another in every distress, whereby they would fulfill Christ's law of love, ver. 3. — And because men's neglecting others in their distresses, often proceeds from pride, or an high opinion of themselves, the apostle declared, that if any one, especially any teacher of religion, thinketh himself to be something, yet being nothing, in as much as he refuses to do works of love, he deceiveth himself, ver. 3. — Wherefore, that the Galatian teachers might form a just judgment of themselves, the apostle exhorted every one to try his own work; and if he found it good, he would have matter of boasting in what he himself is, and not in the inferiority of others, ver. 4. — This, he told them, was the only in the ground of boasting, because every one shall bear his own burden at the judgment, and be treated, not according to the opinion which he had of himself, or which others have of him, but according to what he really is, ver. 5.

Having thus instructed the teachers in their duty to the people, he showed the people their duty to their teachers; for a false teacher, one who was instructed in the word, to impart some share of all the temporal good things which he enjoyed, to the person who instructed him, ver. 6. — And lest any of them might neglect to provide a proper maintenance for the ministers of the word, on the pretences which an immoderate selfishness is ready to suggest, he assured them, that as certainly as men reap the kind of grain which they sow, ver. 7. — So certainly he who, neglecting good works, soweth into his flesh, by employing himself in procuring the gratification of his fleshly appetites, shall from such a course reap corruption: whereas he who soweth into his spirit the good seed of knowledge and virtue, shall from that course reap life everlasting, ver. 8. — And therefore he exhorted the Galatians, whilst they had opportunity, to do good to all, especially to them who were of the household of faith, ver. 9, 10. — Next, he desired them to consider what power he had taken in writing so large a letter to them with his own hand, to secure them against the sophistry of the false teachers, ver. 11. — And having recalled these impostors to his thoughts, he could not finish his letter without observing, that the earnestness with which they pressed circumcision, proceeded entirely from their desire to live in pleasure, and to avoid persecution for professing salvation through a crucified Messiah, ver. 12. — To prove this, he assured the Galatians, that these circumcised teachers did not themselves keep the law; but they wished them to be circumcised, that they might boast among the unbelieving Jews of their having proselyted them to Judaism, ver. 13. — But with respect to himself, he told them, that he had neither worldly views whatever, but that he wished to boast in any thing, but in the doctrine of salvation through the cross of Christ, by which the world was crucified to him, and he to the world, ver. 14. — Then declared a second time, (see chap. v. 6.), that under the gospel, neither circumcision availed any thing towards our acceptance with God, nor uncircumcision, but an entire change of principles, and of sentiments, and actions, ver. 15. — And wished peace and mercy to all who sought justification by that rule; namely, by becoming new creatures. For such were the Israel of God, the spiritual seed of Abraham, to whom the promises belonged, ver. 16. — And having in this epistle plainly declared, and fully established the doctrine of justification by faith, he forbade the false teachers to trouble him any more on account of that doctrine, as he bare on his body marks of his sufferings for the gospel, whereby his sincerity in the things which he preached was put beyond all doubt, ver. 17. — Then concluded with giving the Galatians his apostolical benediction, ver. 18.

New Translation.

CHAP. VI. 1 Also, brethren, if a man be surprised into any fault, ye, the spiritual men, restore such a person in the spirit of meekness; taking a view of thyself, lest even thou be tempted.

2 Bear ye one another's burdens; and so fulfill the law of Christ.

3 For if any one think himself to be something, being nothing, he deceiveth himself.

4 But let every one try his own work, and then he shall have boasting in himself alone, and not in another.

Commentary.

CHAP. VI. 1 Also, brethren, if any member of your churches, through the strength of temptation, or the frailty of his own nature, is surprised into any work of the flesh, ye who are teachers and rulers, restore such a person to his proper place in Christ's body, the church, by means of instructions and affectionate rebukes; and thou who readest, take a view of thine own frailty, lest even thou fall by temptation.

2 Instead of rebuking one another with harshness, sympathize with one another in every distress; and thus fulfill the law of Christ, which enjoins benevolence, even to those who fall into sin.

3 For if any one, thinking highly of himself, is immediately severe towards his brethren when they fall into sin, and does not assist the distressed, such a person, being nothing, deceiveth himself in thinking himself better than others.

4 But, the worth of a man being shown by his works, let every one try his own work, rather than the work of others, and if good, then he shall have boasting in himself alone, and not in another, as worse than him.

Ver. 1. If a man be surprised, […] not only to reprehend, but to beget a desire of amendment; for thus the apostle is speaking of those sins which men commit without previous deliberation; as is plain likewise from the reason subjoined. 2. Ye, the spiritual men, restore; […] the spiritual men, were those among the Galatians who were eminent for their knowledge and goodness. But I rather think they were persons who possessed the spiritual gifts; 1 Cor. xiv. 30, and to whom it belonged to instruct, admonish, and rebuke others. For the teachers and rulers were generally chosen from among the first converts, on whom the spiritual gifts were bestowed in the greatest plenty.

3. Taking a view of thyself, […] There is a great beauty in thus suddenly changing the discourse from the Galatian spiritual men to the reader himself. It roams his attention, and carries the exhortation home to him with peculiar force.

4. Let even then be tempted; […] this is, fall by temptation; the cause being here put for the effect. The consciousness of our own frailty should dispose us to be merciful towards others. 3. Bear ye one another's burdens; […] This is an allusion to the custom of travellers, who when too heavily laden with their luggage, relieve one another, by bearing the burdens of the weak or troubled, and in that manner show their good disposition towards each other.

4. Have boasting in himself alone; […] Locke thinks, 'the boasting in another,' here condemned, was the GALATIANS.

CHAPTER VI.

5 To bring your actions to the trial, is absolutely necessary; for every one, at the judgment, shall answer for his own actions only.

6 (Acts 10:5.) Now let him who is instructed in the word, communicate (w, 166.) of all good things to the instructor.

7 Do not deceive yourselves, God is not mocked: for whatever a man soweth, that also shall he reap.

8 (Cori. 2:25.) Therefore he who sowed (w) into his own flesh, shall (w) from the flesh reap corruption; But he who sowed into the spirit, shall from the spirit reap life everlasting.

9 (Acts 10:8.) Wherefore, let us not flog in well-doing; for in the proper season we shall reap, if we faint not.

10 Well then, while we have opportunity, let us work good to all, but especially to them who are of the household of faith.

11 Ye see how large a letter! I have written to you with my own hand.

12 As many as wish to appear fair by the flesh, these constrain you to be circumcised, only that they may not be persecuted for the cross of Christ.

13 For not even do the circumcised themselves keep the law, (see chap. v. illust. ver. 3.), but they wish you to be circumcised, that they may boast in your flesh.

14 But let it never happen to me to boast, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world is crucified to me, and I boasting of the false teachers in those they had persecuted to receive circumcision, ver. 15. But the context do not favour that interpretation.

Ver. 6. Communicate of all good things to the instructor.—If the teachers, who by the spiritual gifts were supernaturally qualified to instruct, were to be the sole maintainers of the doctrine, much harm might be occasioned through the abuse of the gifts, for a liberal maintenance, how much more a liberal maintenance, by those who, not possessing the spiritual gifts, are sent to serve as great deal of time and money. As for the sin of fornication, a sin of such a character, that it is even mentioned as an example of what is necessarily in the case of the seed sown on them; and by this similitude hath shown, that there is an unalterable connection between vice, confused in, here, and misery hereafter.

Ver. 10. Let us work good to all, but especially to them who are of the household of faith.—Every man’s first duty is to provide for those whom God hath more immediately committed to his care, namely, his wife and children, and nearest relations. And if besides taking care of them, he is able to assist others, he should, when there is a competition between the objects to be relieved, prefer those who have, or who are likely to have, in their prosperity relieved others, and whose characters are virtuous. These are the members of the household of faith, of whom the apostle speaks. . . .

Ver. 11. Ye see how large a letter!—The phrase αὐθαίρετος, γεγραμμένος is rightly translated 'how large a letter.' For the first word, αὐθαίρετος, properly signifies of what size; and the second word, γεγραμμένος, denotes an epistle, as well as the letters of the alphabet. See note 20.

Ver. 21. This translation is adopted by Bass, Le Clerc, Beausobre, Wolf, and others. But Wolf and Doctoris, who follow Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theophylact, translate γραμμένος, as a sort of letter; supposing it to be the equivalent for the inlegality of the writing. For from the apostle’s making use of an amanuensis in his other letters, they infer that he was not accustomed to write Greek. The inference, however, does not follow. Amant me, much less engaged in affairs of State, to employ others to write for him, notwithstanding they are able to write very well for themselves. I therefore prefer the translation in our English, which is perhaps the best answer to the Galatians, and to the writer of this large epistle with his own hand, to show how anxious he was to retain them in him, whenever it was in his power; and to instruct the readers of the truth of the doctrines contained in it; and that he uniformly preached the same doctrine everywhere.
concerning his own return from heaven to raise the dead, and judge the world, and to bestow on the righteous eternal life. Now, by the first resurrection, we understand his raising to glory and to eternity. The word to the righteous is given for the purpose of supporting them; and that when they are called to suffer for his cause, they shall receive extraordinary assistance and consolations from God; and that distinguished rewards shall be bestowed on them who suffer courageously for righteousness' sake. By all which it comes to pass, as the apostle affirms, that the world with its terrors hath no more power to excite in the mind of believers undue fears, than the dead carcasses of a crucified enemy.

And to the world,—The cross of Christ likewise consoles believers to the world. It inspires them with such principles, and leads them to such a course of life, as renders them in the eyes of the world both sufferers and victors. As such, they are dead carcasses. All believers, therefore, after the apostle's example, justly glory in the crucifixion of their Master, not only as it is the foundation of that assured hope of pardon with which they sustain, but as it is an effectual principle of their sanctification.

Ver. 8. A new creature.—The phrase 'new creature, new man,' Col. iii. 10, and 'the putting on of Christ,' Gal. iii. 27 (see Eph. iv. 20, note), are often used by the apostle to denote an entire change of principles, dispositions, and actions. See 2 Cor. v. 17, notes 1, 2. Ver. 16.—Peace be on them; or peace shall be on them.—In this manner of translating the clause, it is a prediction or promise of happiness, rather than of peace, as some have supposed. See Rom. i. 7, note 4.

18. Israel of God.—Not the believing Jews only, but the believing Gentiles are called Israel of God, because they are the spiritual seed of Abraham, and the only children of God to whom the promises in their secondary and highest meaning belong. But here, the Israel of God, being distinguished from the believing Gentiles are plainly the Jewish believers.

CONCLUSION.

As it was the general belief of the Jewish nation, that salvation could only be obtained by obedience to the law of Moses, it is natural to suppose, that many of the Jews who embraced the gospel would teach the Gentiles, that unless they were circumcised they could not be saved: And, on the other hand, that such of them as knew the truth of the gospel, would oppose that false doctrine with a zeal equal to the magnitude of its pernicious consequences. The truth is, this controversy actually took place very early in the church, and occasioned such keen dispute and dissension among the brethren, that it became necessary to apply to the apostles and elders in Jerusalem to have it determined. Accordingly, after deliberating on the matter with the chief brethren of the church of Jerusalem, they unanimously decreed, that circumcision was not necessary to the salvation of the Gentiles; and sent copies of their decree to the churches in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia, by the hands of Barnabas and Paul. But the latter, who knew the extreme attachment of the Jews to the law, foreseeing that notwithstanding the decision of the apostles and elders, some of the more zealous Jewish believers in every church would urge the Gentiles to receive the law as necessary to their salvation; and knowing, that by the prevalence of that doctrine the gospel would be overthrown, he judged it proper that the brethren of the Gentiles should be secured from being drawn into an error so pernicious. He therefore wrote immediately to the churches of Galatia, where, as he was informed, some had already gone over to Judaism, the letter in the Canon which bears their name, in which he proved by the strongest reasoning, that circumcision was not necessary to the salvation of either Jews or Gentiles, but faith working by love. The same doctrine he inculcated in most of his other epistles; and by his zeal for the truth of the gospel, and earnest endeavours to maintain it, he at length banished Judaism out of the Christian church. The epistle to the Galatians, therefore, in which this matter was debated and settled, being, as Chandler observes, perfectly suited to the state of the Christian church in its most early period, carried, in the very nature of the case, which it treats, a strong intertestant evidence of its antiquity and authenticity. For it is not to be supposed, that any person in the second or third age of Christianity would be at the trouble to write such an elaborate letter, for the purpose of determining a controversy, which it is well known had no existence in the church after the apostle's days.
EPHESIANS.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Introduction of the Christian Religion at Ephesus.

St. Paul’s first coming to Corinth happened in the year 51, as was formerly showed, Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 1. On that occasion he abode among the Corinthians somewhat more than eighteen months, Acts xviii. 11, 18, then departed by sea for Judea. In his voyage, touching at Ephesus, a city famed for its commerce and riches, and for its being the metropolis of the province of Asia, he preached in the synagogue there with some prospect of success. But hastening to go to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, he left Ephesus soon, Acts xviii. 19, 20, 21. His first visit, therefore, to the Ephesians, was in the year 53. From the history of the Acts it appears, that the Ephesians were a very dissolute people, and extremely addicted to magic; ‘walking’ as the apostle expresseth it, chap. ii. 2, ‘according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit which worketh in the children of disobedience.’—Their city, also, was the very thrones of idolatry; the worship of idols being performed in no part of the heathen world with greater splendour than at Ephesus, on account of the famous temple of Diana, which was built between the city and the harbour, at the expense of all Asia; and in which was an image of that goddess, said to have fallen down from Jupiter, Acts xix. 35. This image, as we may well suppose, was worshipped with the most pompous rites by a multitude of priests, and a vast concourse of votaries from every quarter, who, to gain the favour of Diana, came to Ephesus to offer sacrifice at her shrine.

Such being the state of religion and morals among the Ephesians, St. Paul, who was expressly commissioned by Christ to turn the Gentiles from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, resolved, at his departure from their city, to return soon, Acts xviii. 21. that he might have an opportunity of attacking idolatry in this its chief seat. Accordingly, having celebrated the festivity of the Jews, he turned not down to Iconium, and after he had spent some time there he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples, Acts xviii. 22, 23. And having passed through the upper coasts, he came to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1. On this occasion he preached boldly in the synagogue for the space of three months, discoursing concerning, and proving the things which related to the kingdom of God, ver. 8. But the Jews, who had heard him with pleasure at his former visit, now opposed him violently, when they perceived that he preached salvation without requiring obedience to the law of Moses. They spake also with the greatest virulence against the gospel itself; in so much, that the apostle found it needless, and even dangerous, to frequent the synagogue any longer. Wherefore, separating the disciples from the unbelieving Jews, he discoursed daily in the school of one Tyrannus, who either was himself a disciple, or allowed the apostle the use of his school for hire: ‘And this,’ we are told, Acts xix. 10. ‘continued for the space of two years; so that all that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks.’

After leaving the school of the philosopher Tyrannus, the apostle seems to have preached and worked miracles at Ephesus, in the places of most public resort; for his fame became so great, that ‘from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them,’ Acts xix. 12. About this time, also, the apostle’s name was greatly increased, by what happened to the seven sons of Sceva, one of the Jewish chief priests, who went about pretending to cast out devils. In short, Paul’s preaching and miracles were as blessed of God, that multitudes of the idolatrous inhabitants of Asia, strongly impressed by them, embraced the gospel; and among the rest, many who had practised the arts of magic and divination. These, to show how sincerely they repented of their former evil practices, brought out the books which contained the secrets of their arts, and burned them publicly, notwithstanding they were of very great value: So mighty grew the word of the Lord, and prevailed in Ephesus itself. This extraordinary success determined the apostle to stay in Asia for a season, and sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia. But after they were gone, one Demetrius, a silversmith, who made shrines for Diana, calling together the workmen of like occupation with himself, said to them, ‘Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth: Moreover, ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people; saying, that they be no gods which are made with hands: So that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought; but also, that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth.’ By this artful speech Demetrius enraged the Ephesians much a degree, that they made a great tumult, laid hold on Gaius and Aristarchus, Paul’s companions, and rushed with them into the theatre, intending, no doubt, to throw them to the wild beasts which were kept there. But the town-clerk, speaking to the multitude with great calmness and prudence, quashed them and dismissed the assembly; so that the Christian preachers are let go in safety.

It is said, Acts xx. 1. That ‘after the uproar was ceased, Paul departed for to go into Macedonia.’ But as in the sacred history many events are narrated as in immediate succession, which happened at a considerable distance of time from each other, the passage just now quoted may be supposed an instance of that kind. For, if I am not mistaken, I should not shut down to the year 53, when Ephesus and its neighbourhood after the riot. This appears from his speech to the elders of Ephesus at Miletus, Acts xx. 31. ‘Remember, that by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one,’ &c. These three years were completed in the following manner.—At his first coming to Ephesus, he abode only a few weeks, Acts xviii. 19—21. When he returned, he preached in the synagogue three months, then taught in the school of Tyrrannus two years. On leaving the school of Tyrrannus, he preached and wrought miracles more publicly; the effect of which was, that many believed, and came and confessed their evil deeds, Acts xix. 18. Many also who used curious arts, being converted, brought their books and burned them, ver. 19. After which the apostle sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia, but he himself staid in Asia till the riot of Demetrius. The things which happened after Paul left the school of Tyrrannus, to the riot of Demetrius, may have taken up five months; and these added to the two years and four months before mentioned, make his sojourn in Ephesus, from his first arrival to the riot, in whole, only two years and four months.

Wherefore, the remaining months of his three years’ abode at Ephesus must have passed after the riot; unless we are of opinion, that his transactions, from the time of his leaving the school of Tyrrannus to the riot, occupied eight months. However, as some of the Asiarchs were his friends, Acts xix. 31, there is nothing improbable in supposing, that he increased in society at Ephesus, or in the country adjacent, even after the riot; especially if he no
Section II: Preface to the Ephesians.

The apostle, during his long sojourn in Ephesus and its neighborhood, gathered a very numerous Christian church, which was as remarkable for the quality, as for the number of its members. According to Surray, Ephesus was the greatest trading town in Asia, on this side Mount Taurus. It was also the residence of the Roman Proconsul who governed the province of Asia, and the seat of the Courts of Justice; consequently, it was the place to which men of fortune, and learning, and genius resorted. Being thus inhabited, we cannot doubt, that among those whom Paul converted there were people of distinction. In particular, some of the converted, who had formerly been magicians, were men distinguished by their natural parts, and by their literature; as may be inferred from the value of their books, which they burned, amounting to fifty thousand pieces of silver, supposed to be equal to five thousand pounds of our money.

The Asiarchs, also, or priests of Diana, who had the care of the temple at Ephesus, by whose aid, and who are called Paul's friends, may have been converted, or in a disposition to be converted. Nay, the town-clerk, in his speech to the multitude, showed that he entertained a good opinion of the Christian teachers, and of their doctrine, Acts xix. 37. The church at Ephesus, therefore, merited all the pains the apostle bestowed in gathering in, and caring for such as he should secure, against the erroneous doctrines, and vicious practices, which the false teachers endeavored to introduce into it. See Pref. to 1 Tim. sect. 3.

From 2 Cor. ii. 13, 15, we learn, that on leaving Ephesus after the riot, the apostle did not go straightway into Macedonia, but abode a while at Troas, where also he had a great success in teaching. Nevertheless, having no rest in his spirit, because he did not find Titus, whom he expected to meet in his way from Corinth to Ephesus, he took leave of his disciples at Troas, and went forward to Macedonia. There Titus, at length, came to him, and made him happy by the account which he gave him of the good disposition of the Corinthians towards him, through the influence of his preaching. Paul, therefore, rejoiced, and collected the collections which the churches in that province had made for the poor of the saints in Judea; then went to Corinth, where he remedied the disorders which had taken place in that church; and having received their contributions, with those of the other churches of Asia, he proposed to sail from Cenchreae to Judea. But, understanding that the Jews lay in wait for him in Cenchreae, he altered his resolution, and returned through Macedonia.

From Macedonia he went by sea to Miletus, and sent for the elders of Ephesus to meet him there; and when they came, he delivered to them the pathetic exhortation recorded Acts xx. 17—35, then sailed away to Syria. But he no sooner appeared in the temple at Jerusalem, than the ungodly Jews who had come from Asia raised a great tumult against him, in which he must have been killed if he had not been rescued by the Romans; but which ended in his imprisonment, first in Jerusalem, after that in Caesarea, and last of all in Rome.

Section II: Showing that the Epistle, which, in our Canon, is inscribed to the Ephesians, was actually written to them, and was not originally inscribed to the Laodicceans.

Since the publication of Mill's edition of the Greek New Testament, many learned men have adopted his opinion that the epistle in our Canon inscribed to the Ephesians was not written to the Ephesians, but to the Laodicceans. This opinion Mill had endeavored to support by the following arguments:—1. The testimony of Justin the heretic, who, as Tertullian reports, "said the Epistle to the Ephesians was written to the Laodicceans, or called this the Epistle to the Laodicceans."—2. St. Basil, in his second book against Eunomius, insinuates, that the first verse of the epistle to the Ephesians ran originally in this manner: 'To the saints who are, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus,' without the words 'in Ephesus.'—3. Certain passages in the epistle itself, which, in Mill's opinion, are neither suitable to the character of the Ephesians, nor to the habits which subsisted between them and their spiritual father Paul.

But to these arguments Lardner, who maintains the common opinion, opposes, 1. The agreeing testimony of all the ancient MSS. and versions of this epistle now extant; particularly the Syriac, Vulgate, Peshito, and Arabic, all which, without exception, have the words 'in Ephesus,' in Ephesus, in the first verse. For, as he very well observes, "It is inconceivable how there should have been such a general agreement in this reading, if it was not the original inscription of the epistle."—2. The unanimous consent of all the ancient fathers, and Christian writers in the succeeding ages, that this epistle was written to the Ephesians, and never entertained the least doubt of it. This argument is well represented by Lardner, who, after the most accurate search into every thing pertaining to ecclesiastical antiquities, hath thus written, Can. vol. ii. page 394. "That this epistle was sent to the church at Ephesus, we are assured by the testimony of all the Christian writers of all past ages. This we can now say with confidence, having examined the principal Christian writers of the first ages, to the beginning of the twelfth century; in all which space of time, there appears not one who had any doubt about it." Of these testimonies, that of Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, in the end of the first century, is very remarkable. In a letter which he wrote to the Ephesians from Smyrna, his way to Rome, he says, chap. xii. "Ye are the companions in the mysteries of the gospel of Paul the sanctified, the martyr, deservedly most happy; at whose feet may I be found when I shall have attained unto God, who (πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐκεῖνον, ὑμᾶς ἐκείνου ὡς πρὸς Παύλον) Eph. ii. 31. is put for ἀγαθόν, throughout all his epistles, makes mention of you (ἐπαθὼν, ἐπαθὼν) in the Colossians, εὐφράτητος, in the Ephesians, ἐργατοῦς, in the Colossians, ἀθλητῆς, in the Hebrews, ὑπομονής, ἔκπληκτος, in the Hebrews, εὐθυμούς, ἐπαθὼν, ἀναπαύομενος of him, for the word (ὁ ἀνθρώπος, ὁ ἄνδρας, ὁ ἀνθρώπος), throughout all his epistles, makes mention of you;" so the Greek phrase signifies, Matt. xxvi. 13. Mark xiv. 9. Acts 4. 15. Ignatius means that Paul commended the Ephesians, and never blamed them throughout the whole of his epistle, as he did some others, in the letters which he wrote to them. This is exactly true of the present epistle to the Ephesians. Moreover, by calling them ἐπίσκοποι, companions of the grace, of the beginning of the gospel of Paul, he alluded to those passages in the present epistle to the Ephesians, where the gospel is represented as a mystery made known to the apostle, and by him to them. Ignatius having thus plainly described our epistle to the Ephesians, there can be no doubt of the genuineness of its inscription. For if that epistle was written in the 9th of Nero, and Ignatius's epistle in the 19th of Trajan, as Bishop Pearson supposes, the distance between the two epistles will be only forty-five years; consequently, Ignatius being of age at the time Paul is supposed to have written to the Ephesians, he could not be ignorant of the truth concerning it. But, without citing more testimonies, it is sufficient to observe with Lardner, in the general, "That Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian, writers of the second and third centuries, quote this epistle as written to the Ephesians, as freely and plainly as they do his epistles to the Romans, Galatians, Corinthians, or any other of the acknowledged epistles of Paul; and that it is quoted, in like manner, by all the writers of their own age, Latins, Greeks, and Syrians." Canon ii. page 406.

3. As to Marcion, on whose affirmation Mill lays so great a stress, Lardner observes, that his credit is very little in an affair of this kind. For Tertullian, who says Marcion called this 'the Epistle to the Laodiceans,' says also that Marcion rejected the epistles of Paul to Timothy and Titus. And though Grotius has remarked, that in speaking of the epistle to the Ephesians, Marcion had no temptation to falsify, the answer is, All the catholic writers of that age have called this 'the Epistle to the Ephesians,' and they had no temptation to falsify; for they had no interest to serve by it: And if Marcion ever said this epistle was written to the Laodiceans, meaning thereby that it was written, not to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans, he affirmed what was false; as we are expressly assured, by the unanimous testimony of men who had no interest to deceive us in this matter, and who could not be deceived themselves.—Further, though Tertullian hath said that Marcion called this 'the Epistle to the Laodiceans,' he hath not said that Marcion founded his opinion on the authority of any ancient MSS. he had ever seen. On the contrary, there is reason to believe, that the copy of this epistle which Marcion used, was inscribed, not to the Laodiceans, but to the Ephesians, as Lardner and himself have not said that Marcion founded his opinion on any ancient MSS. he had ever seen, so neither is it said, that any person who had opportunity to know the matter, told him that this epistle was written, not to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans. We have good reason, therefore, to believe, with Lardner, that if this was Marcion's opinion, he took it up without inquiry: being led to it, perhaps, as others since his time have been, by the reason that is made, Col. iv. 18, of an epistle from Laodicea.

4. With respect to St. Basil's insinuation, that the words in Ephes. were wanting in the original inscription of this letter, Lardner hath observed, that if any ancient MSS. wanted these words, they were so little regarded as not to be followed by any of those who transcribed the scriptures. For there are no MSS. now extant, in which that reading is preserved. And even though it had been preserved in some, they could have no authority; because the omission of the words, in Ephes., would make this a general epistle; contrary to chap. i. 15, which shows, that it was addressed to some particular church, of whose faith the apostle had heard good accounts, and whom he begged not to faint at his afflictions for them, chap. iii. 13. Contrary also to chap. vi. 22, 23, which shows, that the members of this particular church were well acquainted with the writer, and took such an interest in him as to be comforted by the knowledge of his affairs. Nor do we find in chap. iv. 15, 94, of the Apocalypse, where the benediction is given, first to the brethren of a particular church, and then to all who loved our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

5. To the passages in this epistle quoted to prove that it could not be written to the Ephesians, Lardner opposes a variety of other passages, which agree better to the Ephesians than to any other people; particularly those which show, that the apostle was well acquainted with the persons to whom he wrote. For example, chap. i. 3, where he says, 'By whom, (Christ), after ye believed, ye were sealed with the spirit of promise.'—Also in the end of chap. i. having spoken of Christ as filling all his members with his gifts and graces, he adds, chap. ii. 1. 'Even you who were dead in trespasses and sins.'—Chap. iv. 9. 'But ye have not so learned Christ. 31. Seeing ye have heard him, and have been taught concerning him, as the truth is in Jesus.' Now, could the apostle say these things, unless he had been well acquainted with the persons to whom he wrote? or rather, unless they had been instructed and endowed with the spiritual gifts by himself?—Chap. v. 9. 'The apostle had not so well acquainted the persons he wrote to, as he was writing, and if they had not been his own converts, would they have taken such interest in him, as to make it proper for him to send Tychicus to make known all things to them concerning himself? chap. vi. 21, 23. —To all the former, add chap. ii. 20, 21, 23, iii. 16, in which there are evident allusions to the temple of Diana; which shows still more plainly, that the epistle under consideration was written to the inhabitants of Ephesus.

6. The passages in this epistle which are quoted to prove that it could not be written to the Ephesians, may easily be interpreted consistently with the supposition that it was inscribed to the Ephesians; as shall be shown in the notes on the passages themselves, chap. i. 16, iii. 2—4.

7. The salutation sent to the brethren in Laodicea, Col. iv. 15, is a strong presumption, that the epistle in the canon, inscribed to the Ephesians, was not directed to the Laodiceans. For the epistle to the Colossians being written at the same time with the supposed epistle to the Laodiceans, and sent by the same messenger, Tychicus, Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7, 8, is it probable, that, in the epistle to the Colossians, the apostle would think it needful to salute the brethren in Laodicea, to whom he had written a particular letter, in which he had given them his apostolical benediction?

To conclude, the arguments on the one side and on the other of this question, being fairly weighed, every impartial person, I should think, must be sensible, that Mill's opinion stands on no solid foundation. And therefore I scruple not to affirm, with Dr. Lardner, that the epistle under consideration was not written to the Laodiceans, but to the Ephesians; as the inscription, which is undoubtedly genuine, expressly bears.—If any reader is of a different opinion, he may be indulged in it, because, as Chandler observes, 'It is not material to whom the epistle was inscribed, whether to the Ephesians or Laodiceans, since the authority of the epistle has been ascribed to persons to whom it was written, but on the person who indited it; who was St. Paul, as the letter itself testifies, and all genuine antiquity confirms.'

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion of Writing the Epistle to the Ephesians.

During the apostle's imprisonment at Rome, among others who were sent to inquire after his welfare, Ephphroditus came to him from the Philippian, and Ephesias from the Colossians. In return for the kindness of these churches, the apostle wrote to them the letters in the Canon of the New Testament, which bear their names.

Now, as was observed in the last paragraph, the apostle one of the concluding sections, seems he sent a similar letter to the Ephesians by Tychicus, the bearer of his epistle to the Colossians, and left it to him to give the Ephesians an account of his state, (Eph. vi. 21.); and seeing Ephphroditus, (Philip. iv. 18.), and Ephesias, (Col. i. 7, 8.); came from their respective churches, to give the apostle an account of their affairs, and to inquire how matters went with him, we may as suppose, that Tychicus also came on the same errand from Ephesus; especially as we have reason to think he was an Ephesian, from his being appointed by the churches of Asia, of which Ephesus was the metropolis, their messenger, along with Trophimus an Ephesian, (Acts xx. 29.), to accompany Paul to Jerusalem with the collections, Acts x. 4. Besides, it appears, that about the time the epistle to the Ephesians was written, some person had given the apostle an account of their affairs; for he tells them, chap. i. 15. 'That he had heard of their faith and love.' This person, I suppose, was Tychicus, who may have told him likewise of the insidious arts used by the Judaizing teachers, for persuading the Ephesians to join the law, with the gospel. But whoever the person was who gave the information, he at the same time assured the apostles, that their arts had not succeeded. The Ephesians maintained the faith of Christ in purity, and lived suitably to their Christian profession.

This good news filled the apostles with joy. Nevertheless, knowing how inscrutable the false teachers were in spreading their errors, he wrote to the Ephesians the letter which bears their name, not to correct them for any irregularity of conduct, as he did the Corinthians, nor for any deviation from the doctrine of the gospel, as he did the Galatians, but merely to prevent them from being impressed with the plausible arguments which the Judaizers used to persuade them to embrace the law of Moses. Of these arguments, indeed, the apostle has given us no particular account. But, from the things which he hath written, to establish the Ephesians in the faith and profession of the gospel, we may conjecture, that at Ephesus, as in all other places, the false teachers suited their arguments to the passions and prejudices of the persons they addressed. And therefore, because the Ephesians, before their conversion, had been captivated with a high admiration of the heathen mysteries, and the millenial ceremonies of the temple of Diana, and with the splendour of her worship, and took great honour to themselves as keepers of the temple of that idol, and boasted of the privileges which her priests and votaries enjoyed; the Judaizers talked to them in the most pompous manner of the law of Moses, and of its wonderful discoveries concerning the being and attributes of God, the origin of things, the judgment of God, the future glory of Messiah, &c. as far exceeding the discoveries made in the most celebrated of the heathen mysteries. They described likewise the magnificence of the temple at Jerusalem, and the splendour of the worship performed there, according to the ritual of God's own appointment: They praised the efficacy of the sacrifices made by the Jewish priests; and they pointed out the advantages which the Jews derived from the oracles of the true God, contained in their sacred books: Withal, they extolled the Jews as the most honourable people on earth, because they were the keepers of the only temple the true God had on earth, and worshipped him in that temple, and had among them an order of men, made priests by God himself, to offer sacrifices. Only, in giving it, he did not follow the didactic method, but filled his letter with rapturous thanksgivings to God for the great discoveries made to the Ephesians in the gospel. And having mentioned some of these discoveries, he called them, 'The mystery of God's will,' chap. i. 9. and 'The mystery,' by way of eminence, chap. ii. 2. and 'The mystery of Christ,' ver. 4. and 'The mystery of the gospel,' chap. iii. 9. and observed, that that mystery was made known to the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, Eph. iii. 9: not to be concealed, like the heathen mysteries, but to be published, that Jews and Gentiles receiving it, might be gathered together into one church, ver. 10. or fellowship, which he called a heavenly place, upon account of the discoveries of heavenly things that were made. Next, the apostle prayed that God would enlighten their understanding, that they might know the greatness and extent of the blessings promised to believers in the mystery of God's will, ver. 16, 19. Then sprang up the dignity of Christ, whom God hath made head over all things to the church, and of his power to fill all the members of his church with spiritual gifts, ver. 20-22. And among the rest, even the idolatrous Gentiles themselves, who, notwithstanding the discoveries made in the heathen mysteries, were living in deplorable ignorance and wickedness, chap. ii. 1-13.

Next, with respect to the law of Moses, and the pompous worship performed in the temple of Jerusalem, the apostle told the Ephesians, that they and the rest of the Gentiles, while idolaters, had indeed been excluded from that worship, and of course were strangers to the covenants of promises, and without hope. But the want of these privileges was not to be regretted by them under the gospel; because Christ, by his death, had abolished the whole ordinance of the law of Moses, as of no farther use. And by joining Jews and Gentiles into one new society, or church, the Gentiles were become joint partakers with the Jews in all spiritual privileges, chap. ii. 11-18.: And were no longer strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the believing Jews, Ver. 19: And were Shiloh with them on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, into a great temple for an habitation of God, chap. ii. 2.-By representing the Christian church under the idea of a temple, the apostle, if I mistake not, instanced among other things, that it was intended to be the repository of the mystery of God's will, as the heathen temples were the repositories of the mysteries of the gods to whom they were consecrated.

Further, the apostle assured the Ephesians, that the mystery of Christ had been made known to him and his brethren, apostles, more fully than in former ages to the Jewish prophets; namely, that the Gentiles should be joint heirs, and a joint body, and joint partakers with the Jews, of God's promises in Christ, through the gospel, chap. iii. 3-6. And therefore, they were to give no heed to the Judaizing teachers, who excluded the Gentiles from these privileges, merely because they were not circumcised.—And to the united body of Jews and Gentiles forming the church of Christ, the apostle added the appellation of 'the fellowship of the mystery,' chap. iii. 9.; the honours and privileges of which he describes, ver. 16-19: as he doth likewise the bonds by which the members of this fellowship are united; namely, 'one Lord or head, one faith, one baptism, and one object of worship,' chap. iv. 4-6.: Not omitting the supernatural gifts which were the marks of the members of this holy company, chap. iii. 11, 12.—Lastly, he expressly prohibited the Ephesians from joining in any of the heathen fellowships, on account of the works of darkness committed in them, chap. v. 11.

Upon the whole, I submit it to my readers, whether the apostle, by representing the gospel in this epistle, no less than five times, under the idea of a mystery, did not mean to lead the Ephesians to compare it with their own mysteries, for the purpose of making them sensible,—1. That, in authority and importance, the discoveries contained in the gospel infinitely exceeded the discoveries made in the most celebrated of the heathen mysteries, and were much more excellent for comfort, and directing mankind in their journey through life. —2. That Christ, the head of the Christian fellowship, was much more powerful than all the heads of the heathen fellowships joined together. —3. That the Christian church, in which the mystery of God's will was kept, was a far more excellent fabric than the temple of Diana at Ephesus. —4. That the honours and advantages which were the mark of the Christian church, were the merit of Christ, their head, far surpassed the honours and advantages which the initiated... prayed to derive from the gods, the heads of their fellowship.—5. That the bonds by which the members of the Christian church were united, were more excellent and more effectual for promoting concord and love, than those by which the members of the heathen fellowships were united.—6. That the miraculous gifts bestowed on the apostles, and other inspired teachers in the Christian church, rendered them, as teachers, more respectable than any of the heathen mystagogues, and their teaching more worthy of the attention of mankind than theirs.—And therefore, 7. That it was far more honourable and advantageous to be a member of the Christian church, than to be initiated in the most celebrated of the heathen mysteries; consequently, that the condition of the Ephesians, as members of the church of Christ, was far more happy than their former state; even although they had been partakers in the best of the heathen mysteries, the Eusebian not excepted.

The epistle to the Ephesians, viewed in the light wherein I have placed it, appears excellently calculated for repressing that vain admiration of the mysteries, which the Ionian and Trojan philosophers still entertain; and for enervating the specious arguments used by the Judaeizers for seducing them to observe the law of Moses. This epistle, therefore, must have been of great use for confirming the whole body of the Gentiles converting inhabiting the province of Asia, in the belief and profession of the gospel.

Before this section is concluded, it may be proper to observe, that the fourth, fifth, and six chapters of the epistle to the Ephesians are called, by Theodoret, The moral admonition; as containing a more complete system of precepts respecting the temper of mind which the disciples of Christ ought to possess, and respecting the duties which they owe to themselves and to each other, than is to be found in any other of St. Paul's epistles.

Sect. IV.—Of the Persons for whom the Epistle to the Ephesians was designed.

That the epistle to the Ephesians was designed for the use, not of the Ephesians alone, but of all the brethren in the province of Asia, and that the apostle was personally unknown, may be gathered from the inscription of the epistle, and from the benedictions with which it is concluded. The inscription runs thus: 'To the saints who are in Ephesus, and to the believers in Christ Jesus,' by which last expression, I understand persons different from the saints in Ephesus, namely, all the believers in the province of Asia. In like manner, in the conclusion of the epistle, we have, first a particular benediction, chap. iv. 33. 'Peace be to the brethren,' namely, in Ephesus; then a general one, ver. 34. 'Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity,' that is, with all the faithful in the province of Asia. For that there was a considerable intercourse between the churches of the provincial Asia and that at Ephesus, appears from the first epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Ephesus; where, instead of mentioning the church at Ephesus by itself, as saluting the Corinthians, the salutation is from the churches of Asia in general, comprehending Ephesus among the rest: 1 Cor. xvi. 19. 'The churches of Asia salute you.'—Paul indeed, commonly directed his letters to the churches in the great cities, because they were more numerous than the other churches. Yet that he designed them for all the brethren in the neighbourhood, appears from the inscriptions of his epistles to the Corinthians, as was observed, Prelim. Exam. ii. page 33. To these arguments, add the truthfulness and perfection of the divine administration delivered in this epistle to the Ephesians, as well as the catholic manner in which the other matters contained in it are handled, show clearly, that it was designed for others besides the brethren at Ephesus.

This remark, concerning the persons for whom the epistle to the Ephesians was designed, may be of considerable use in helping us to judge of some passages. For example, when we recollect that this epistle was directed 'to the faithful in Christ Jesus,' throughout the province of Asia, many of whom, it is to be supposed, had never seen Paul's face, we shall be sensible of the propriety of his saying to them, even according to the common translation, chap. iii. 2. 'If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God given to me.' For although the brethren at Ephesus, with whom the apostle abode three years, and many of the inhabitants of the province of Asia, who had heard him preach in Ephesus, Acts xix. 10. must have known that he was appointed by Christ the apostle of the Gentiles, some of the churches of Asia, or at least some of the members of those churches, who had never seen him, may have been ignorant of the miraculous manner in which he was converted, and commissioned; and of his having, continuing things, together with the revelations that were made to him of the mystery of God's will, in his epistle to the Ephesians, which was designed for their use likewise, may have been very necessary to many, to make them understand what his knowledge and authority as an apostle of Christ were. Accordingly, as if this part of the epistle had been written for a class of persons different from those to whom the foregoing part was addressed, he introduces it with his name: Eph. iii. 1. 'On account of this, I Paul am the prisoner of Jesus Christ, for you Gentiles,' &c. See, however, the new translation of the passage.—In like manner, by considering the epistle to the Ephesians as designed for all the brethren in the province of Asia, we see the reason why the apostle has handled his subjects in a general manner, without making any of those allusions to particular persons and affairs, which might have been expected in a letter to a church gathered by himself, and in which he had so long resided, and with the members of which he was so intimately acquainted. Such allusions would not easily have been understood by strangers, and therefore they were with great propriety avoided.

Sect. V.—Of the Time and Place of writing the Epistle to the Ephesians.

During the apostle Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea, though it lasted more than two years, he wrote no letters, either to the churches which he had planted, or to particular persons; at least we know of none which he wrote. But during his confinement at Rome, having more liberty, he wrote several epistles which still remain. For when the news of his confinement in that city reached the provinces, some of the churches which he had gathered sent certain of their most respected members all the way to Rome, as formerly mentioned, to visit and comfort him, Phil. iv. 18. Col. i. 7, 8. These messengers having given him a particular account of the state of the churches from whence they came, their information gave rise to the letters which the apostle wrote at that time; and which may be distinguished from his other letters, by the name given to them in the dedication of his imprisonment and bonds. Wherefore, the apostle's bonds being frequently introduced in his epistle to the Ephesians, chap. iii. 1. 13. iv. 1. vi. 19, there can be little doubt of its being written during his confinement at Rome: But whether in the first or in the second year of that confinement, learned men are not agreed; and supposing it to have been written at the same time with the epistle to the Colossians, have dated it in the end of the second year of the apostle's confinement, at which time we know the epistle to the Colossians was written. And that these two epistles were written about the same time, they prove by observing, that there is a great similarity of sentiment and expression in them; and that they were sent by the same messenger, namely, Tychicus, Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7. But in Lardner's opinion, these circumstances are not decisive; because Tychicus may have been sent twice from Rome into Asia by the apostle, with letters, during his two years' confinement; and because several reasons may have rendered it proper for him to write the same things to these churches, especially as a considerable space of time intervened between the writing of the letters in which they are contained. Rejecting, therefore, the late date of the epistle to the Ephesians, Lardner supposes it to have been written in the beginning of the first year of the apostle's imprisonment at Rome. And, in support of his opinion, he offers the following argument, Canon, chap. xii.

1. That Timothy, who joined the apostle in his letters to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, did not join him in his epistle to the Ephesians. True. But might not the same known doctrine, which had been before mentioned, leave Rome on some necessary business before the epistle to the Ephesians was begun? That this was the actual case, we have reason to believe; for the apostle, in his letter to the Philippians, promised to send Timothy to them soon, chap. ii. 19. And in his epistle to the Hebrews, which was written after his release, he indicates his intention of sending Timothy to him, Heb. xi. 28. Wherefore, having left Rome before the letter to the Ephesians was begun, his name could not be inserted in the inscription, notwithstanding it was finished in such time as to be sent to Ephesus by the messenger who carried the letters to the Colossians and to Philemon.

2. Lardner's second argument for the early date of the epistle to the Ephesians is, that in his letters to the Philippians and to Philemon, the apostle expresses his hope of being soon released; whereas, in his letter to the Ephesians, he does not give the most distant insinuation of any such expectation. But the apostle, in his epistle to the Colossians, makes as little mention of his release as in his epistle to the Ephesians. And yet all allow that this epistle was written while he was a prisoner in Philemon, in which the apostle expressed the strongest hope of that event. He did not think it necessary, it seems, to mention his enlargement in his letter to the Colossians, because he had ordered Tychicus to inform them of it: Col. vi. 17. "All things concerning me, Tychicus will make known to you." For the same reason he may have omitted mentioning his release to the Ephesians, as may be inferred from Eph. vi. 21. "Now, that ye also may know the things relating to me, and what I am doing, Tychicus will make known to you all things." The phraseology here deserves notice, 'That ye also may know' which I think implies, that at this time the apostle had ordered Tychicus to make known all things concerning him to some others, namely to the Colossians; consequently that the two epistles were written about the same time. And as Tychicus and Onesimus, to whom the apostle delivered his epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, were to take Ephesus in their way, he gave them his letter to the Ephesians likewise, and ordered them, when they delivered it, to enjoin the Ephesians to send a copy of it to the Laconians, with directions to them to send a transcript taken from their copy to the Colossians. Tychicus, therefore, and Onesimus, taking Ephesus in their way, delivered the apostle's letter to the church in that city, as they were directed, then proceeded with the letters to the Colossians and to Philemon, which when they delivered, their commission was at an end.

If the epistle to the Ephesians was written, as I suppose, soon after the epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, the mention which is made of the apostle's release in his letter to Philemon, will lead us to fix the writing of the three epistles to the end of the second year of the apostle's confinement at Rome, answering to A. D. 60 or 61.

Sect. VI.—Of the Style of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Tax critics have observed, that the style of the epistle to the Ephesians is exceedingly elevated, and that it corresponds to the state of the apostle's mind at the time of writing. Overjoyed with the account which their messenger brought him of their faith and holiness, chap. i. 15. and transported with the consideration of the unsearchable wisdom of God, displayed in the work of man's redemption, and of his astonishing love towards the Gentiles, in making them partakers through faith of all the benefits of Christ's death equally with the Jews, he soars high in his sentiments on these grand subjects, and gives his thoughts utterance in sublime and copious expressions. At the same time, he introduces various deep, and hitherto unsearchable mysteries, in allusion to the occult doctrines which the Greeks dignified with the name of the mysteries of this or that god, and on the knowledge of which the initiated in these mysteries highly valued themselves. In short, this epistle is written as it were in a trumpet. Hence Jerome, on chap. iii. says, "Nulam epistolam Pauli tanta habet melodia mysteriorum, in quibus sanctissimi divinae revelationis mysteria velut apokrypha omnes symphoniae sacrosancta gloriaret." This character is so just, that no real Christian can read the doctrinal part of the epistle to the Ephesians, without being impressed and roused by it as by the sound of a trumpet.

Sect. VII.—Of the Ecclesiastic and other heathen Mysteries, alluded to in this Epistle.

I. The apostle Paul, in this and in his other epistles, having often alluded to the heathen mysteries, and having condemned them all, on account of the shameful things practised in them, Eph. v. 11, 13. it is proper, both for understanding his allusions, and for shewing the propriety of his censure, to give, in this section, some account of these famed institutions.

Bishop Warburton, from whom I have taken the greatest part of this account, in his Divine Legation, b. ii. sect. 4. informs us, That each of the heathen gods, besides the worship paid to him in public, had a secret worship, to which none were admitted but those who were prepared by previous ceremonies. This secret worship was termed the mysteries of the god, which, however, were not performed in all places where he was publicly worshipped, but only where his chief residence was supposed to be. According to Herodotus, Diodorus, and Plutarch, who, in support of their opinion, appeal to the most ancient testimonies, these mysteries were first invented in Egypt, whence they spread themselves into most countries of Europe and Asia. In Egypt, they were celebrated to the honour of Isis and Osiris; in Asia, to Mythus; in Samothrace, to the mother of the gods; in Bocotia, to Bacchus; in Cyprus, to Venus; in Crete, to Jupiter; in Athens, to Ceres and Proserpine, thought to be the same with Isis and Osiris; and in other places to other gods, to an incredible number. The most noted of these mysteries, however, were the Orphic, the Bacchic, the Eleusinian, the Samothracian, the Cabiric, and the Mythraic. But the Eleusinian mysteries, celebrated by the Athenians at Eleusis, a town of Attica, in honour of Ceres and her daughter Proserpine, in process of time swallowed up all the rest. For, as Zosimus tells us, lib. iv. "These most holy rites were then so extensive, as to take in the whole race of mankind." Accordingly, ancient authors have spoken most of the Eleusinian mysteries. However, as they all proceeded from one fountain, and consisted of similar rites, and had the same end in view, at least till they were corrupted, what we are told of any of them, Warburton thinks, may be understood of them all.

The general object of the mysteries was, by means of certain shows and representations, accompanied with hymns, to impress the senses and imaginations of the initiated with the belief of the doctrines of religion, according to the views of which they the contrivers of the mysteries, or those who introduced them into any country, entertained. And, that the mystic shows might make the deeper impression on the initiated, they were always exhibited in the darkness of night.

The mysteries were divided into two classes, the lesser and the greater. The lesser mysteries were intended for the common people; the greater for those in higher stations, and of more improved understandings. Plutarch seems to speak of the mysteries of Memphis, (see 2 Pet. i. 16. note 2.), though others give that name to the second class. In both the mysteries, the doctrines of providence and future retributions were inculcated; but in the greater there were, besides, revealed to the initiated, certain doctrines called exegraphe, because they were never to be mentioned, except to such of the initiated as were capable of understanding them, and that under the most religious seal of secrecy.

In the celebration of the lesser mysteries, matters were so contrived, that the person to be initiated, at his entrance, was filled with an inexpressible horror. So Proclus, "In the most holy mysteries, before the scene of the mystic visions, there is a terror diffused into the minds of the initiated." So likewise Dyon Chrysost. in his account of the initiation into the lesser mysteries: "Just so it is, as when one leads a Greek or a Barbarian to be initiated, in a certain mystic dome excelling in beauty and magnificence, where he sees many mystic sights, and hears, in the same manner, a multitude of voices; where darkness and light alternately affect his senses, and a thousand other unnameable things present themselves before him." It seems the darkness was dispelled by the sudden flashing of light, immediately succeeded by a dismal darkness.

Warburton, who thinks Virgil's description of Æneas's descent into hell, an allegorical relation of his initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries, supposes that the mystic vision, which occasioned the horror in the mind of the initiated of which Proclus speaks, is described, Æneid, lib. vi. 573., where, in the very entrance of hell, all the real and imaginary evils of life, together with many frightful forms, are said to be stationed.

---Facetiae, strinctaque amicis venientem efferet.

---Further, because Virgil represents Æneas, after passing the river Styx, and entering the Lucanian camp, or purgatory, as distressed with the cries of the shades of initiates cut off in early life, Warburton supposes that they were introduced into the mystic show, that by an exhibition of their miserable state, parents might be deterred from the barbarous practice of exposing their children, which prevailed anciently among the Greeks. Among the uncommon things represented in the lesser mysteries, Warburton says, there were men and women properly habited, who, superstition: the gods both external and internal, passed in review before the initiated. And to each of them an hymn was sung, explaining their character, attributes, and actions. These hymns, Clemens Alexandrinus has termed, the theology of images or idols. Proclus likewise tells us, "In the celebration of the mysteries, it is said that the initiated meet many things of multiform shapes and species, which represent the first generation of the gods." In the lesser mysteries, there were representations of Purgatory and Tartarus; and shows exhibited to the initiated, of persons suffering punishments in Tartarus, suitable to the nature of their crimes. And to represent the state of the greatest criminals, men were introduced, who personated Theseus and Ixion, and Syphilus and Phlegyas. The suffering punishment, and those who passed in review, gave each an admonition to the initiated, to beware of the crime for which he in particular was suffering: And for this Warburton appeals to that passage of the Æneid, where, as Æneas was passing by the gate of Tartarus, (for he was not permitted to enter), the Sybil gave him an account of the punishments of the wicked in that accursed place, and also the sentence of Rhadamantus.---Æneid, lib. vi. 557.

Hinc exaudiri genius, et sura sonare
Verba: tum stridor ferri, tracsecus catena.
Consistit, Æneas, streptique externus haesit.
Quae ascensionem facies (eo virgo effuso)
Ungentur musa quos aspergat uraeus
Tuum visum sic oris lapis: Dux tacta Teucerum, Nulla spectat ascensionem, aderentur.
Sed me, cum lucis Hecate praefecti Avernae, Ipsi, sed portas decius, perque oceana vocem.

---Sarum ingens volvuntur altis, radique rostrum
---District pendunt: sedets, steterumque sedebit
---Inter Thescalo: Phlegyasque miserum omnes Admetus, et magus teuctar viscer corum
---Disce justissima monit, et non tenere Deo.

Vendidit hic certa portam, dominusque potestatem
Imposuit: astra legendos, maxima reliqui.

But whatever impression these representations might make on the minds of the initiated, Warburton saith it was rendered in a great measure ineffectual, by the shows of the gods and goddesses who passed in review before them; and by the hymns which were sung to each, descriptive of his origin, his character, and his actions. For the vicious actions of the gods, celebrated in these hymns, have not only filled each of the initiated with a reasonings on the subject, to consider the punishments inflicted on men for the very same crimes of which the gods themselves were guilty, as utterly unjust; consequently, to think the whole a fiction. So that the motives to virtue, arising from the representations of the punishment of the damned, were destroyed by the confirmation which the popular theology derived from the parts of the shows in the lesser mysteries. The truth is, if a person was disposed to gratify any irregular passion, it was easy for him to excuse himself by the example of the gods, as we find one actually doing in Terence: "Ego homunculo, hoc non facerem." To remedy this inconvenience, Warburton saith the greater mysteries were contrived, in which such of the initiated as were judged capable of the discovery, were made acquainted with the whole delusion of the commonly received theology. The mystagogue, hierophant, or priest, who might be of either sex indifferently, and whose office it was to conduct the initiated through the preparatory ceremonies, and to explain to him the shows, taught him the symbols of Jupiter, Mercury, Mars, and the rest, were only dead names, which while in life, were subject to the same passion with themselves: But having been benefactors to mankind, grateful posterity had deified them; and with their virtues had canonized their vices also. But this was the mystery discovered to the initiated the Supreme Creator of the universe, who pervades all things by his virtue, and governs all things by his providence, and who is one, having neither equal nor second to himself. From this time the initiated was called Eros, a belisher, to intimate that he saw things as they are, without disguises; whereas before, he was only known, from amore in amore, one who was to keep his mouth shut, because he did not understand the true nature of things. This doctrine of the unity of God, taught in the greatest mysteries, Warburton affirms, was the grand secret, έκείνος το άκη, of which there is so much said in ancient authors.

The discovery of the Supreme Being was made in the greatest mysteries, first of all by a mystery show or representation, which Paelius thus describes. The ἑκεῖνος is when he who is initiated beholds the divine lights. To the same purpose, Themætus—It being thoroughly purified, he now displays to the initiated a region all over illuminated, and shining with a divine splendour. The clouds and thick darkness are dispersed, and the mind acquires such light, as if to bestow on it, in a manner, a foreknowledge of discontinue obscurity. That which the priest thoroughly purified was η ενίκη, an image, which represented the Divine Being. When this was exhibited, the hierophant, habited like the Creator, sung a hymn in honour of the one God; of which, according to Warburton, there is a fragment preserved by Clem. Alex. In this hymn, the God declares a secret to the initiated. But let the doors be shut against the profane. But thou, Musæus, the offspring of fair Selene, attend carefully to my song; for I shall speak of important truths. Suffer not, therefore, the former prepossessions of your mind to deprive you of that happy life which the knowledge of these mysterious truths will procure you. But look on the Divine Nature; incessantly contemplate it, and govern well the mind and heart: Go on in the right way, and see the sole Governor of the world. He is one, and of himself alone; and to that one all things owe their being. He operates through all, was never seen by mortal eyes, but does himself see every thing.

But a person who had been hierophant at Athens, directed Zeno to the place in Elysium where his father's shade abode, Warburton thinks Anaximenes opened to him the doctrine of perfection in these sublime words,— Principio caelest, ac terras, campaque lignentes, l. 734.

Lucentisque globum Læme, Tithiasque atras, Rutilius in astra, totumque maxima terrarum
Mense agis molestas, et magno se corpore miscer.
Inde illuminaeque genus, visaque voluptas, Et quae memores fort nostra sub quere poenas, &c.

and that with this discovery of the unity, Zeno's initiation concluded. On this supposition it will follow, that before the unity of God was discovered to the initiated, the shows which represented the blessed in Elysium were exhibited to them. In the shows they saw legislators, and such as had brought mankind from a state of nature into a civilized state, enjoying happiness in the chief places of Elysium. Next to them the initiated beheld patriots, and those who had died for the good of their country. Virtuous and pious priests were represented as occupying the third place. And the lowest was assigned to the inventors of the mechanic and liberal arts.

The shows being ended, the initiated, as was observed above, were introduced to the sight of the έκείνος, or shining image, which represented the Creator; and the hymn in which the έκείνος are, or secrets, concerning his nature, attributes, and operations, were delivered, being sung, the assembly was dismissed with the two following barbarous words, ένεις ένειης, which, as Le Clerc thinks, are only a bad pronunciation of κείτε and ὁμφήτης, which he says signifies, in the Phœnician tongue, Watch, and abstain from evil.

If we may believe Voltaire, the initiated, at almost every celebration of their mysteries, confessed their sins. For in his Essay on Universal History, chap. xii. after telling us that Aquinas said of confession, 'It is not a downright sacrament, but a kind of sacrament,' he adds, 'Confession may be looked upon as the greatest check to secret crimes. The sages of antiquity have to some measure embraced this salutary practice. The Egyptians and the Greeks made confession of sins at their expiations, and almost at every celebration of their mysteries. Marcus Aurelius, assisting at the mysteries of Ceres Eleusina, confessed to the hierophants. But of the sins which the vulgar among the heathens confessed, those which the gods were supposed to commit, in whose honour the mysteries were celebrated, we may be sure made no part.

The nature of the greater mysteries being such as above described, the wisest of the ancients, Warburton says, spoke of them as very useful in forming men to virtue, and as the source of their best consolation. For which reason, as Zoeimus tells us, when the Emperor Valentinian resolved to suppress all nocturnal ceremonies, Praetextatus, who governed Greece as Proconsul, informed him, that such a law, by abolishing the mysteries, would cause the Greeks to lead έκείνος βίον, a lifeless life, a life absolutely void of comfort. Nor is it any wonder, says Warburton, that the ancients, especially since they considered the abolition of the mysteries as the greatest evil, since the life of man, without the support of the doctrine taught in the mysteries, was thought by them as no better than a living death: On which account Isocrates called the mysteries, 'the thing which human nature stood most in need of.'

But notwithstanding, according to Warburton, the greater mysteries were contrived to correct the errors of the popular religion, inculcated by the shows in the lesser mysteries, and to impress the initiated with just notions of God, of providence, and of a future state, he acknowledges, that the discovery came too late to counteract the pernicious influence of the shows in the lesser mysteries; and that the Orgy of Bacchus, the Mysteries of the mother of the gods, and of Venus, and Cupid, being celebrated in honour of deities who inspired and presided over the sensual passions, it was natural for the initiated to believe that they honoured these divinities when they committed the vicious actions of which they were the patrons. He likewise acknowledges, that the mysteries of these deities being performed during the darkness of night, or in dark places, and under the seal of the greatest secrecy, the initiated indulged themselves on such occasions in all the debaucheries with which the patron god was supposed to be delighted. The truth is, the enormities committed in the mysteries of these impure deities came at length to be so intolerable, that their rites were prescribed in different countries; as were the rites of Bacchus at Rome. See Livy, B. 39. No. 8. 18.

The English translator of Voltaire's Essay on Universal History, hath subjoined the following note to the passage quoted above from that essay:—These mysteries were so revolting by the ancients, and kept with such secrecy, that the disclosing of them was reckoned the most impious action that could be committed. This, however, did not hinder several writers, in the first ages of Christianity, from prying into the great secret, and bringing it to light. Tertullian says of it, Tota in aedificiis divinias, &c. similacrum membris viridibus revelatur.
Theodoret says it was, "Nature multisichtis imago." Induced by these and other testimonies, Warburton himself acknowledges, what he hath termed" that very flagitious piece of the mysteries, which among the ancients was called the carrying of the παντοκρατωρ and φάλακκες in procession. Concerning this obscene rite, Leland, who, as shall be shewed immediately, differs from Warburton in his account of the design of the mysteries, saith, (Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, vol. i. p. 196. note), that this obscene rite, instead of being introduced when the mysteries were at the worst, seems to have been one of those anciently used in the mysteries of Isis, from which the Eleusinian rites were derived. Warburton indeed saith, "it was introduced under the pretence of their being emblems of the mystical regeneration and new life into which the initiated had engaged themselves to enter." But Leland says, "it is no way probable that this was the original ground of introducing it, but a pretence invented for it after it was introduced; and observes, that Arnebius justly exposed the absurdity of couching holy mysteries under obscene representations, on pretence that they had a profound and sacred meaning."—Be this, however, as it may, the facts above mentioned, which are acknowledged by all, shew, with what truth the specious pretexts of the professed lovers of mysteries, Hippolytus, Eusebius, and others, seem to have been used in the Mysteries. Eph. v. 11. 'The unfruitful works of darkness;' works which produced no good, either to those who did them, or to society; and prohibited Christians from joining in them, because the things which were done in them, under the seal of secrecy, were such, that it was even base to mention them, verse 12.

Warburton tells us, that while all the other mysteries became exceedingly corrupt, through the folly or wickedness of those who presided at their celebration, and gave occasion to many abominable impurities, whereby the manners of the heathens were entirely vitiated, the Eleusinian mysteries long preserved their original purity. But at least they also, yielding to the fate of all human institutions, partook of the common depravity, and had a very pernicious influence on the morals of mankind. Wherefore, in proportion as the gospel gained ground in the world, the Eleusinian mysteries themselves fell into disrepute, and, together with all the other Pagan solemnities, were at length suppressed; Rollin thinks, by the Emperor Theodosius, Ancient History, v. p. 18.

II. It is for the sake of mention, that Bishop Warburton's account of the design of the mysteries hath been the subject of much controversy among the learned. His supposition, that Virgil's account of Æneas's descent into hell, in the sixth Æneid, is a description of the mysteries of Æneas's initiation into them, hath been contradicted by some, who are of opinion that the poet contrived that episode merely to embellish his poem with an account of a future state; and that, by the apperition of the ghosts, which were afterwards to return to life, and become the great men of his country, he might have an opportunity of celebrating their praises.—In like manner, Warburton's doctrine concerning the design of the mysteries, that they were instituted to expose the falsehood of the vulgar polytheism, and to teach the doctrines of the unity, of providence, and of a future state, hath been opposed at great length by Dr. Leland, in his Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, vol. i. chap. viii. ix. For, page 189. having mentioned, that the most learned and zealous advocates for Paganism, as Iamblichus, Porphyry, Plotinus, Proclo, and others, after Christianity made its appearance, cried up the mysteries as the most effectual means for purifying the soul, and raising it to communion with the gods, Leland saith, "I cannot think that the legislators, in instituting the mysteries, concerned themselves much about restoring the soul to its original purity, in the Pythagorean or Platonic sense. What they had in view, by Warburton's own acknowledgment, was, to promote the cause of virtue, as far as was necessary for the ends of civil society. As in every thing farther than this, they were not solicitous. The mysteries seem to have been originally designed to civilize the rude people, to form and polish their manners, and, by shows and representations which were fitted to strike the imagination, to bring them to a greater veneration for the laws and religion of their country, which, among the pagans, was always regarded as a necessary ingredient in a virtuous character."—Such is Leland's account of the mysteries, which he supports, page 190. by appealing to Diodorus, who saith, "That in the Sicilian feasts of Ceres, which lasted ten days, was represented the ancient manner of living before men had learned the use and culture of bread-corn." This representation was evidently designed to make men sensible of the value of a civilized life. The same thing may be gathered from more ancient writers, who tell us, "The principal subject of the Eleusinian mysteries was the life of Ceres, her wanderings after her daughter, and her legislation in Sicily and Africa, where she taught the inhabitants agriculture, and gave them laws, and thereby reclaimed them from their rude manners." This, Leland observes, is what Cicero gives in his speech to Esquines, in his Tusculanae, lib. ii. cap. 14. "Nam mihi cum multis divinissimis videntur Athenae peperisse, atque in vitam hominem attullisse, tum nihil melius itis mysteriis, quibus ex agresti immanique vitam, excultu ad humanitatem et mitigati sumus; neque eolum cum laetitia vivendi rationem accipient; sed etiam cum spe meliore mortuam." With respect to what Cicero says of the Mysteries, Leland enabled men "to die with a better hope," Leland thinks it relates to what was inculcated in the mysteries, that those who were initiated and purified, enjoyed after death greater felicity than others, and were honoured with the first places in the Elysian shades; whereas others were forced to wallow in perpetual dirt, stink, and nastiness, page 191. The like account of the mysteries Cicero gives at the end of his fifth book against Verres, cap. 73. "Teque Ceres et Libera, quorum sacra, sicut opiniones hominum et religiones ferunt, longum maximis atque occultissimum cerimonias continetur, a quibus initia vitae atque victoria, legum, morum, manum, veterinum, humanitatis exempla, hominibus ac civitatis data ac disputata esse destinavit: tum quibus sacra materia aliqua accepta et sacra, tantat religione et publice et privatim tutur." On this passage Adrian Turnebus remarks, "Initia vocantur ab initia vitae, inventa a Cerere legitimae et frugibus, in quorvm remor memoriam (mysteria) siebant, cum ante ferino ritu homines sibi vitam propagabant." Having thus explained and proved his own account of the mysteries, Leland proceeds to examine the proofs which Warburton hath produced in support of his doctrine, that the mysteries were instituted to disclose the error of polytheism, page 197. The first proof is that passage from St. Austin, concerning an Egyptian hierophant who informed Alexander the Great, that even the deities of an higher order had once been men. This is followed by two quotations from Cicero, who, according to Warburton, tells us, not only that the Eleusinian mysteries, but the Samothracian and lemnian, disclosed the error of polytheism. But Leland saith, "All that can be gathered from these two passages is, not that the error of the vulgar polytheism was taught in the mysteries, but only that the chief of the gods vulgarly adored, had been taken from the human race into heaven. But Cicero, who mentions this, neither gives it as his own opinion, nor represents it as the doctrine of the mysteries, that they were not to be regarded as gods on that account, nor worshipped. On the contrary, in one of these passages he plainly approves the deification of famous and excellent men; and the worship of such deities he expressly prescribes in his book of laws." Lib. ii. c. 8. p. 100. and c. ii. p. 115. Edit. Davis. Leland saith, p. 198. "Nor do I believe any one passage can be produced from all Pagan antiquity, to shew that the design of the mysteries was to undeceive the people as to the vulgar polytheism, and draw them off from the worship of the national gods." All the ancients who have spoken of the mysteries, have represented them as instituted for the purpose of bringing the people to a greater veneration for the laws and religion of their country. "Some of the heathen, indeed," p. 199. "were sensible, that if it was once allowed that their gods had been of human extraction, this might be turned to the disadvantage of the public religion. Hence it was, that the Roman pontiff, Scesvola, was for having it concealed from the people, that even Hercules, æsculapius, Castor and Pollox, were once mortal men, lest they should not regard and worship them as gods." And Plutarch, De Isid. et Osir. speaking of those who represented some of the gods as having been originally sprung from human stock, and speaking of the Phænicians and Sabæans as having been habitually induced to venerate the god Mars, who was of Menæan birth, he is said to have said that this appeared to him so reasonable that he himself was induced to believe that the gods commonly received had been once men, it is reasonable to suppose, that they took care the public religion should not suffer by it, by letting them know, that, notwithstanding this, they ought now to be regarded as gods, and to have that worship rendered to them which ancient tradition and the law required.

1st. With respect to the mysteries being instituted to teach the doctrines of providence, and of a future state, by that representation of rewards and punishments in the life to come which was made in the shows of the lesser mysteries, Leland observes, page 193. that the virtues rewarded and vices punished in the shows, being those which more immediately affected society, these represented the punishment and recompense, in the last day, of civil magistrates, to produce good effects for the benefit of the state. Nevertheless, saith he, "some eminent Pagans seem not to have entertained very advantageous thoughts of the mysteries, with regard to their moral tendency," particularly Socrates, who always declined being initiated. "It is true he is introduced in Plato's Phædus, as the author of the design of the mysteries," for he saith concerning those who instituted them, "that they were no mean persons; and that they taught, that whosoever went to hades without being expiated, would lie in the dirt, or filthiness; but that those who went thither purified and initiated, would dwell with the gods. The purification here referred to, seems to have been the ritual purification prescribed in the mysteries; concerning which, see Potter's Antiq. vol. i. p. 355. This purification, Socrates supposed, was intended to signify that the soul must be purified by virtue; but he does not say this was declared in the mysteries. To pass, however, from that circumstance, if Socrates speaks of the mysteries at all, considering the veneration in which they were held by the people, and the support which they received from the magistrates, he could not speak of them otherwise than he did. Nevertheless, as Leland observes, "his neglecting to be initiated is a much stronger proof that he had no good opinion of the mysteries, than any thing which can be produced to the contrary."

And proceeds, page 202, to examine the proofs produced by Warburton, to shew, that the doctrine of the unity, or of the one God, the Creator and Governor of the world, was taught in the mysteries. He does not, says he, take any pains to prove, or great secret, in all the mysteries throughout the Gentile world. The proofs of this are, first, two passages of Clemens Alexandrinus, and one of Chrysippus. But all that can be gathered from them, Leland saith, is, that the mysteries treated of the nature of the gods, and of the universe. In these passages, there is not one word to shew that the doctrine of the unity was taught in the mysteries. Nor is the passage produced from Strabo more express. It is true he saith, "The secret celebration of the mysteries preserves the majesty due to the divinity; and, at the same time, imitates its nature, which hides itself from our senses." But by the divinity, Leland thinks Strabo does not understand one supreme God, as distinguished from inferior deities, but the divinity whose honour the mysteries were celebrated. Accordingly, he immediately after mentions Apollo, Ceres, and Bacchus, as the deities sacred among the Greeks; to each of which, according to the prevailing theology, divinity was ascribed. The third testimony is from Galen, who, speaking of the nature of the soul, which would arise, not only to the physician, but to the philosopher, who labours to investigate the universal nature by considering the parts of the human body, says, "Those who initiate themselves here, have nothing like it in the Eleusinian or Samothracian mysteries." Now, though Leland allows that Galen, in this passage, intimates that the divine nature was trained in the mysteries, he observes, that he saith nothing from whence we can form a judgment, whether the mysteries were designed to instruct men in the unity, or what kind of doctrine they taught; only that it was not to be compared to that which might be learned from considering the human body. The fourth testimony is a passage from Eusebius, which, because some terms employed in the mysteries were used in it, is brought by Warburton to prove that the doctrine of the unity was taught in the mysteries. But this Leland thinks strange, as the contrary appears from the passage itself, where Eusebius expressly saith, "For the Hebrew people alone was reserved the honour of being initiated into the knowledge of the true God, the Creator of all things, and of being instructed in the precepts of true piety towards him."—Page 205. The fifth testimony is a passage from Josephus, than which, Warburton saith, nothing can be more explicit. But Leland is not of his opinion. In his discourse against Appian, Josephus shewed that the Jews enjoyed advantages for acquiring the knowledge and practice of religion, superior to other nations. Wherein he proves, as the Gentiles did not desire to be initiated in the mysteries, all the advantages pretended to be in these mysteries, through the whole course of their lives. Leland adds, "It is observable, that Josephus doth not enter on the consideration of the nature and design of these mysteries, nor of the doctrines taught in them, though he is very plain and express in his account of the principles of the Jews, particularly relating to the one true God, the sole cause of all existence."

But though Leland rejects the testimonies produced from ancient writers, as insufficient to prove that the doctrines of the unity, of providence, and of a future state, were taught in the mysteries, he acknowledges that the hymn of Orpheus, which Warburton has quoted from Clem. Alex., is much more to his purpose, if it could be depended on; because in it the doctrine of... the unity is piously asserted. This hymn, Warburton endeavours to show, was the very hymn which was sung to the initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries by the priest, depicted by Orestes, p. 207, it doth not appear from Clement, that that hymn made a part of the mysteries. " He takes notice, indeed, of a poem made by Orpheus on the mysteries, and which he supposes to have contained an account of the mysteries, and of the theology of idols. He also mentions the hymn in question, which he supposes to have been composed by Orpheus, and which contained a quite contrary doctrine. But he doth not mean, that this hymn was a part of that poem in which Orpheus gave an account of the mysteries. He rather seems to have considered it as a distinct poem, composed by Orpheus afterwards, in which he supposes him to have recanted the doctrines he had taught in the former. To show this, Leland appeals to Clement's account of the hymn, which is as follows: " The Thracian hierophant, and who was at the same time a poet, Orpheus the son of Cæster, after he had opened or explained the mysteries and the theology of idols, introduces the truth, and makes his recantation; singing, though late, a truly holy song." — Here," said Leland, " Clement seems to mean, unless it be an instance of the various ways of account which Orpheus had given of the mysteries, and makes them in effect a recantation of the whole theology of the mysteries, which he calls the theology of idols." But it is to be observed, that Clement represents him as late in making this recantation, and singing this holy song. Leland adds, " I do not well see upon what ground Clement could so say this, if he had been writing a part of the mysteries, and was sung by himself, at the very time of the celebration of the mysteries, and before the assembly was dismissed. For in that case the verses were sung in the proper season in which they ought to have been sung, according to the order of the mysteries." Leland further observes, that Warburton, to shew that the hymn referred to belonged to the mysteries, and made the most venerable part of them, translates the latter part of the passage from Clement thus: " The sacreds then began at a late hour, and thus he enters on the matter." But Leland affirms, that there is nothing in the original answering to these words in his translation, " The sacreds then truly begin." Further, he says, page 285, " This hypothesis of the Jews is absurd; as would have appeared, if the whole had been produced. It is only the first part of it which is cited by Warburton from Clement's adoration of the Gentiles. But it is given more largely by the same Clement in his Stromata; and at still greater length by Eusebius, who quotes it from Aristotle, a Jewish peripatetic philosopher, who produces it to shew that Orpheus and the Greeks took their doctrine of God, the Creator of the Universe, from the books of Moses."

As a direct confirmation of Bishop Warburton's doctrine concerning the mysteries, Leland, smith, chap. ix., page 323. If the design of the mysteries have been such as Warburton represents it, "it is inconceivable that the ancient Christians were ignorant of them, or that any claim against them, as Warburton acknowledges they did." Many of them had been converted from heathenism to Christianity, and some of them, no doubt, had been admitted both to the lesser and to the greater mysteries. And therefore being well acquainted with the nature and design of the mysteries, "if they knew, that in the mysteries was taught the necessity of a life of devotion to a holy and virtuous life, and that the secret doctrine taught in the greater mysteries, was intended to detect the error of polytheism, and to turn men from the worship of idols to the one true God, they must have had a good opinion of these mysteries as, so far at least, coinciding with the design of Christianity."

How then came they, in discourses addressed to the heathens themselves, "frequently to speak in terms the utmost abominable, as impure and abominable, and as rather tending to confirm the people in their idolatry than to draw them off from it? The making such odious representations of the mysteries, supposing they knew the design of them to be what Warburton represents it, (and if it had been so, some of them must have known it), would have been absolutely inconsistent with common honesty. Nor can I believe," said Leland, "that such excellent persons as many of the primitive Christians undoubtedly were, could have been capable of such a conduct."

Leland, page 325, mentions Clem. Alexandr. as one of the Christian writers who speaks of the representations in the mysteries as agreeable to the fables of the poets and mythologists concerning Jupiter, Ceres, Proserpine, Bacchus, and other deities; and calls "those who brought these mysteries from Egypt into Greece, The fathers of an execrable superstition, who sowed the seeds of wickedness and corruption in human life: and says, The mysteries were full of delusion and portentous representations. Clem. himself supposes upon the people, who knows includes his account of the mysteries, the following saying, "These are the mysteries of atheistical men. I may rightly call those atheists, who are destitute of the knowledge of him who is truly God, and most impudently worship a boy torn in pieces by the Titans, a woman lamenting, and the parts which modesty forbids to name."—Leland adds, the other heathen mysteries given by Clement, is transcribed and approved by Eusebius, who introduces it by observing, that Clement knew these mysteries by his own experience. Further, "the account which Arnobius gives of the Eleusinian mysteries celebrated at Athens, is perfectly agreeable to that of Clement."

To take off the force of the preceding argument, Leland observes, page 326, that Warburton endeavours to account for the ill opinion which the ancient Christian writers entertained of the mysteries, by observing, that they bore a secret grudge to the mysteries, because "the Christians, for their contempt of the national deities, were branded by the mystagogues as atheists, and in their solemn shows represented as in Tartarus. But Leland, he says, sought to justify the ancients, for the ancients, Christians, if the charge which they brought against the mysteries was false; because no ill treatment from the heathens could authorize them to give a false and calamitous representation of their mysteries. The last thing Warburton has advanced, to take off the force of the argument arising from the testimony which the Christian writers have borne to the impurity of the mysteries, and which Warburton "calls the strange part of the story, is, that after all they have said against the mysteries, they should so studiously and formally have transferred the terms, phrases, rites, ceremonies, and discipline of these odious mysteries into our holy religion." He adds, "Sure, then, it was some more than ordinary veneration that the people had for these mysteries, that could incline the fathers of the church to so fatal a council." To this Leland replies, page 327. "The veneration which the people had for the mysteries, affords not the least presumption, that the design of them was to overthrow the popular polytheism, but rather the contrary. Yet, because of the veneration which was so generally paid to the mysteries, the most solemn of the mysteries, the better to gain upon the heathens, and to shew that Christianity effected that in reality which the heathen mysteries vainly pretended to do."

As an illustration of the foregoing answer, Leland, p. 335, produces a passage from the latter end of the very discourse in which Clement shows that he had the worst opinion imaginable of the mysteries. He speaks of the Christian religion, in allusion to the mysteries of Bacchus, and invites the heathens to quit the one, in order to embrace the other. He all along employs the terms which were made use of in these mysteries. He talks of celebrating "the venerable orgies of the word." To the hymns which were sung at the mysteries, he opposes a hymn sung to the great King of the Universe. He speaks of a Christian's being initiated, and cries out, "O true holy mysteries! Being initiated, I am made holy." He says, "The Lord himself acts the part of an hierophant," or interpreter of the mysteries; and he concludes, "These are the Bacchanaalia of my mysteries: come then and be initiated."—But, saith Leland, can anyone on account of the supposed importance given to the mysteries, because he really took them to be holy and useful things? The contrary plainly appears from this very passage, as well as from what he had said before in the same discourse. But as they were accounted holy, and were considered as the most perfect means of purifying the soul, he takes occasion to show, that these venerable mysteries were the work of the Gentiles, and the mystic region, and in its sacred doctrines and rites, which the heathens falsely attributed to their mysteries. Yet, saith Leland, I agree with this learned writer in the judicious remark which he makes, that the affecting to transfer the terms, phrases, and ceremonies of the mysteries into our holy religion, had a bad effect. It contributed very early to vitiate that religion which Ammianus Marcellinus, a Pagan writer, saw and acknowledged was absoluta et simplicis, as it came out of the hands of its Author.

CHAPTER I.

Because the Ephesians, in their heathen state, had held the mysteries of their idol gods in the highest veneration, on account of the supposed importance given to the discoveries which were made in them to the initiated; and because they esteemed the initiated, on account of these discoveries, more honourable and happy than the rest of mankind—the apostle began this epistle with displaying the great dignity and happiness of the members of the Christian church, whether Jews or Gentiles; not by a formal comparison, or by way of justifying the Gentiles, but by thanksgivings to God for having bestowed these great honours and privileges on them. Thus, first of all, he thanked God for his having blessed the Gentiles with every spiritual blessing in the Christian church, equally with the Jews, although they did not obey the law of Moses, ver. 3.—And because the Judaizing teachers affirmed that this was contrary to God's purpose respecting the Jews, the apostle, in his thanksgiving, took notice, that God had bestowed these blessings on the Gentiles as well as on the Jews, agreeably to an election of them before the foundation of the world, that they might be holy through love to God, on account of his great goodness to them; and through love to man, from a regard to the commandment of God, ver. 4.—Next, he shews in order that men may gratefully value these churches or foundations in the eyes of the Ephesians, and of all the Gentiles who admired the heathen mysteries!—Farther, the apostle told them, that God's benevolent intention, in making known to him, and to his brethren apostles, the mystery of his will, was, that by their publishing it to the world, he might, in the gospel dispensation, gather together Jews and Gentiles into one body of Christ, ver. 10.—that by faith in him, and not by obedience to the law of Moses, the Jews themselves might inherit the blessings promised in the covenant to the spiritual seed of Abraham; to which blessings he had predestinated believers of all nations, agreeably to his purpose—who bringeth all things to pass, not according to the will of any man, or body of men, but according to his own sovereign pleasure, ver. 11.— and, in particular, that the believing Jews, even before he came, might occasion praise to God for his goodness and truth in the performance of his promises, by receiving the inheritance as a free gift through faith, and not as a debt through the law, ver. 19.—By which (namely, by the Christ) ye Gentiles also have inherited the promises made to the spiritual seed of Abraham, having believed the word of truth, even the good news of your salvation, which was preached to you: By whom, also, after ye believed, ye were sealed, as God's children and heirs, with the Holy Spirit; so that ye can have no doubt of your faith without obedience to the law of Moses, ver. 13.—Which Holy Spirit, therefore, to believers, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, is the earnest or assurance that the inheritance shall be bestowed on them; and is to continue in the church, until the actual redemption of the people whom Christ hath purchased with his blood, is accomplished by the general resurrection, ver. 14.—Thus it appears, that the honours and privileges belonging to believers as the children of God, and as members of the Christian church or fellowship, are infinitely greater and more valuable than those of which the initiated, or members of the heathen fellowships, boasted.

After displaying the great excellency of the gospel revelation, and the honours and privileges belonging to the members of the Christian church, and tacitly contrasting these with the heathen mysteries, and with the privileges of the initiated, the apostle told the Ephesians, that the good news which he had received of their faith and love, did him daily give thanks to God on account of their happy state, ver. 16, 17.—and pray to God to give them both natural wisdom and spiritual discernment in every way, that they might continue to acknowledge Christ as their Saviour, notwithstanding they should be persecuted for so doing, ver. 17.—also enlightened eyes of their understanding, that they might know the greatness of those privileges, which, by calling them into his fellowship, he did bring them to; and know likewise the glory of the inheritance which he had prepared for his children the saints, ver. 18.—and what the exceeding greatness of Ver. 1.—1. To the saints who are in Ephesus.—That this is the genuine inscription of the present epistle, see proved in opposition to Mill. Pref. sect. 2.

2. σωτήρας. — So the word σωτήρας is translated, Acts x. 46.
2 Cor. vi. 15. 1 Tim. iv. 10. 12. See Gal. iii. 9. note.
3. Every spiritual blessing. — Spiritual blessings are such as are necessary to the highest and happiness of our spirits, and of which the light of the gospel, the influences of the Spirit of God, both ordinary and extraordinary, the sanctification of our nature, the pardon of sin, and the everlasting possession of heaven.—Spiritual blessings are here opposed to the earthly blessings which were promised to the natural descendants of Abraham, the ancient church of God; and which consisted in the possession of Canaan, in victory over their enemies, fruitful seasons, &c. as described Deut. x. 12. See spiritual blessings. Abram's seed by faith were entitled by the promise, 'In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.'

In the heavenly places. — Here, and in chap. ii. 6. κατά τις ἐγκαταστάσεις, heavenly places, means the Christian church, called by Christ himself 'the kingdom of heaven,' because the Christian church was overthrown, as foretold, Dan. vii. 13, under the curse which God of heaven would set up, and which shall never be destroyed.' It is true, the proposition κατά τις ἐγκαταστάσεις, may be thought to denote the highest and best situation of the heavenly places. Yet this doth not hinder us to interpret them of the Christian church, in as much as such a kingdom of God as Christ cannot attain its perfect state, till it is translated to the regions above. — Bengel thinks heavenly places denote heaven properly so called, because heavenly places are truly heavenly, and the meaning is, every spiritual blessing necessary to fit men for heaven. According to this meaning the translation should be, 'every spiritual blessing.'

that we might be holy and unblamable in his sight, not by the observance of any rites, whether heathenish or Jewish, but through the exercise of love to God and man.

5. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath predestinated us to Gentiles to a happy immortality, (Rom. viii. 17,) not through initiation in the heathen mysteries, nor subjection to the law of Moses, but through obedience to Jesus Christ, agreeably to the benevolence of his own disposition towards men of all nations.

6. In order that praise may be to him for that glorious display of his goodness, (see ver. 7 note 2.), whereby he hath highly favoured us, (ver. 167.) on account of the Beloved;

7. In whom we have redemption through his blood, \\

8. Holy and unblamable in his sight;) that is, really holy and unblamable, though not perfectly so. As the election here described, is an election of man to be holy, all prophesies that Christ ought frequently to recollect this end of his election, that they may be careful to make it sure.

9. The dispensation of the fulness of times, (Eph. iii. 18.) is the dispensation of the church of God. The dispensation of the law of Moses, as well as the dispensation of the church of Christ, is the dispensation of Jew and Gentile, Revelation ii. 19. as well as of Jew and Gentile, Revelation ii. 19. and Gentile.

10. In the dispensation of the fullness of the times, (Eph. iii. 18.) the church of Christ, the church of Gentiles, is the dispensation of the fulness of times, and the dispensation of the church of God, the dispensation of the law of Moses.

11. By the dispensation of the fullness of the times, we understand the dispensation of the church of God, which is composed of both Jews and Gentiles, and is the dispensation of all nations, not of one nation only.

12. The dispensation of the fullness of the times, the dispensation of the church of God, is the dispensation of the law of Moses, and the dispensation of the church of Christ, is the dispensation of the Gospel.
gather together all things (ver. 17.) under Christ, both things in the heavens, and things upon the earth, even under him, 11 For this reason I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for the sake of you Gentiles, may God's favor and peace be with you!

12 That we should be to the praise of his glory (ver. 6.), who before hoped in the Christ.

13 (Eph. 1.) By whom ye also have inherited, (from ver. 11. onwards,) having believed, (ver. 5.) the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; (ver. 12.) by whom ye also believed, ye were sealed with the Spirit of promise, the Holy Spirit,

14 Who is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased people, to the praise of his glory. (Ver. 13.)

15 For this reason, I also, having heard of the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you, this some understand the last dispensation of religion, in which all the former dispensations terminated; and which was erected on the throne fixed for it by the prophesy was fully come. The word (ver. 20.) signified the office of the master of a family, or his steward, who was appointed for the management of the family. Also it signifies, a plan formed for the management of any sort of business. In this passage it signifies the plan which God had formed for accomplishing the salvation of believers, by gathering them together into one church, under Christ as their head or governor, chap. ii. 2.

2. To gather together (αὐτοὺς ἐκ τῆς ζωῆς) all things,—Here, as in other passages of scripture, (αὐτοὺς ἐκ τῆς ζωῆς, all men; see Eze. xiv. 21.) the word ζωῆς properly signifies, to recapitulate the principal matters contained in a discourse. Here it is understood metaphorically, to denote the gathering together of inhabitants of all nations into one church, of which Christ is the head.

2. Both things in the heavens, and things upon the earth, because the powers of heaven, Luke xxii. 36. wrote the Jewish writers; and the shaking of the heavens and of the earth, (ver. 21.) foretold by Hagai, (ver. 8.) was fulfilled by St. Paul, (ver. 28.) The abolition of the Jewish and heathen religions, I am inclined, by things in the heavens and things upon the earth, in this verse, to understand the Jews and the Gentiles, (versus) 12. the Gentiles, who are also converted, the gathering together of all things under Christ means, not only the forming of Jews and Gentiles into one catholic church, but the bringing of them both into the heavenly country, through the medium of Christ, as is proved from ver. 11-13. Whitby and Chandler, by things in heaven, both mean the church, chap. ii. 11. 12. and by things on earth, believers of all nations; who, with the angels, shall at length be joined in one great society or church, for the purpose of worshipping God through all eternity, agreeably to Heb. xii. 22. Bexa, by things in the heavens, understands the saints in heaven who died before Christ came into the world, and who are not to be made perfect till the resurrection.

Ver. 11. According to the counsel of his own will,—The apostle makes this observation, to convince the believing Jews that God will bestow on them, and on the believing Gentiles, the inheritance of heaven through faith, whereas their unbelieving brethren are pleased to be displaced therewith.

Ver. 12. The apostle is not, as some suppose, speaking of the Messiah in a historical character, or distinguishing mark of the Jews. They had the promises of the Messiah or Christ, and therefore hoped in him before the time of his actual appearance. Thus we find it was the common character of the devout Jews, that they waited for the consolation of Israel, Luke ii. 18., and that they looked for redemption, a remnant of the house of Jacob, that is, the house in the Messiah before the time of his appearance. This circumstance therefore proves, that the apostle is speaking of the Messiah or Christ: for the Gentiles had no hope in Christ before he actually came, Eph. ii. 12.

Ver. 13.—By whom ye also have inherited,—I have supplied the word οἱ ἐκ τῆς ζωῆς, from ver. 11. because that addition appears to me to be better with the apostle's design, than the addition which our translators have taken from their translation of ver. 12. 'have trusted.'

Ver. 14. The Spirit of promise from the promise of the Spirit. See 2 Cor. i. 20. note 1. In allusion to the covenants of the eastern countries, who marked the premises and parcels of lands, to distinguish them from the goods of others, Christ is said to have marked the Gentiles as the children of God, by bestowing on them the gifts of the Spirit. Hence, when Peter rehearsed to the brethren in Jerusalem, how the Holy Ghost fell to Cornelius and his company, as on the Jewish believers at the beginning, they replied, Acts x. 14. 'Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life.'—Others are of opinion, that the Scope of the tract, was the ordinary influences of the Spirit, wherein the believers were marked. But the ordinary influences of the Spirit are also included in this sealing, because thereby they acquire the image of God, and are prepared for eternal life. Accordingly, though the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, whereby the believers are sealed, and Gentiles in the first age were sealed as heirs of the promises, have long ago been withdrawn, the ordinary influences of the Spirit God will still bestow on believers. And if they prosecute the work, he is hereby marked or declared to be God's son; and that mark or seal is to him a stronger evidence of his title to the inheritance, than if he possessed the miraculous gifts; nay, than if an angel from heaven assured him of his title. How earnestly ought we then to be in our endeavours to obtain the seal of the Spirit. See Eph. iv. 30. where likewise we are said to be sealed with the Holy Spirit to the day of redemption.

Chandler tells us, that the sealings into the mysteries of Diana received from the priests a sacred seal or ring, with the figure of a bull and goat, as an ensign, and the name of Diana engraved on it, thus forming the seal, and to those who were admitted into the mysteries of the Spirit. See Eph. iv. 30. where likewise we are said to be sealed with the Holy Spirit to the day of redemption.
Lord Jesus which subsists among you Ephesians, and of the sincere love which ye bear to all the saints, whether they be Jews or Gentiles.

16. Do not cease, morning and evening, to give thanks to God for you, on account of your perseverance in the true faith of the gospel, and in love to all the saints; making mention of you by name, in my daily prayers, as sincere Christians;

17. Requesting, that the God who is worshiped by our Lord Jesus Christ, and who is the author of all the perfection and happiness that is in the universe, and more especially of that which we shall enjoy in the kingdom of heaven, (ver. 18.) would give to you great natural wisdom, and revealed knowledge, for the continued acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as your Saviour.

18. Also, I pray God to give to you Gentiles the eyes of your understanding enlightened by the discoveries of the gospel, in order that ye may know what blessings are the objects of the hope which ye justly entertain, in consequence of his calling you the seed of Abraham. (Rom. iv. 26.)

19. And that the exceeding greatness of his power (ver. 142.) with relation to us who believe, according to the working of the strength of his force, (see 2 Cor. iv. 17, note 3.)

20. Which he wrought (v. 2) in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

21. Far above all government, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come;

22. And subjected all things under his feet, (1 Cor. xv. 27.) and appointed him head of the church, as in chap. i. 18-20. But the habitation of God.

23. And the faith of the Ephesians, which the apostle had heard of was not their first faith, or conversion to Christianity, but their persevering in the true faith of the gospel concerning men's justification by faith, without the works of the law.

24. And of the love which is in all the saints.——By praising the Ephesian episcopacy, it is implied that they were free from the narrow bigoted spirit which prevailed in some other churches, where difference in opinion about the necessity of works, or the length of time of the probationary life, or the express word of God, that the Jewish and Gentile Christians in Ephesus sincerely forsook Judaism, and joined the Christian society, where the Gentiles were on good terms with Jews, and even were admitted to the Christian society, as Phil. ii. 15.

25. To give thanks to you.——By giving God thanks for the preservation and prosperity of the church. This was a common form of expression for a Christian's thankfulness for the prosperity of the church.

26. Of the omnipotence of God, and the love which is in the invisible world, as among men in the visible world.——Chandler observes, that ξπον, the first word, signifies empire of the largest extent; being used by Greek authors to denote the empire of Alexander, after he had conquered the east; Elyar, Ven. Hist. lib. 3. c. 29. and the empire of the Romans, Herod. lib. i. proem. and that ευνούασα, the last word in the verse, signifies the lowest degree of power, power of the smallest extent; so that, as the same word is used for the smallest, as well as the greatest (in the different degrees of government), it signifies the highest, the intermediate, and the lowest orders of beings in the universe having power, whether among angels or men.——And, according to this view of Christ's dominion, he is placed above every created nature, however excellent it may be. See Col. i. 16. note 5. and every name that is named.——Nouns is here, by an usual figure, put for the person who possesses the authority signified by that name.

27. The invisible world, in which the powers mentioned in the former part of the verse rule, is called 'the world of which God is the King,' because though it exists at present, it is come, to us, as in the time of the Gentiles.
over all things (ἐν αὐτῷ, ch. 20.) for the church. 23 Which is his body, and the fulness of him that filleth all his members with all.

3. And appointed him head over all things for the church. — As it is here declared that Christ is raised to universal dominion for the noble purpose of erecting and establishing the church, that is, for uniting the angels who are in heaven to the men who have lived, and are to live on earth, in one harmonious society, that the enemy of the world, who travaileth to cheaply to be happy in one another society to all eternity. It was necessary for accomplishing this grand purpose, the evil angels should be subjected to him; and even that the material fabric of the world, with every thing it contains, should be under his direction, that he may order all the events befalling men, in such a manner as to promote their virtue, and prepare them for heaven.

Ver. 25. — Which is his body. — The church is called the body of Christ, to signify that the members thereof are united to, andanimated by him; that they are under his direction, and the objects of his care; and that they are united to one another in love, after the manner in the converted Jews, he acknowledged, fed by the head, and united to one another by mutual sympathy and care. See chap. ii. 16. and chap. v. 22. note.

2. And the fulness of him, by calling the church ἡ πληροφορία, the fulness of Christ, the apostle intimates that he who is universal Lord would want a principal part of his subjects, if the church among them were not united and subjected to him as its head. — For the meaning of ἡ πληροφορία, fulness, see Rom. xi. 12. note. Col. ii. 9. note.

3. Who filleth all with all. — See Col. ii. 10. note 1. The gifts and graces which Christ bestows on his members, are called, chap. iii. 19. the fulness of God, because they all come from God. The persons who were most especially blessed in the apostolate of his church were his apostles, prophets, evangelists, &c. as mentioned chap. iv. 7—12. The apostle now explains his meaning, and the blessedness of him who filleth all in all. Chandler writes as follows: — "I doubt not but that in these expressions the apostle had respect to the famous statues of Diana, who was the great goddess of the Ephesians. Her image was that of a woman, and her body filled with the breasts of a woman, to denote, as St. Jerome on the place tells us, "that she was the nurse, supporter, and life of all living creatures:" or as Macrobius informs us. Natural. lib. i. cap. 20. "she represented the earth, or nature, by whose nourishment the whole universe is supported." Now this gives a beautiful turn to the apostle's expression. The church of Christ is that body, that πληροφορία, the fulness of Christ, here spoken of, whichumbles of divine graces. For as St. John, who also lived long at Ephesus, tells us, in the very same manner of expression, "and from his fulness we all have received grace for grace."

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines in this Chapter.

The apostle begins this chapter with observing, that even the Ephesians, though lying under the sentence of death on account of their trespasses and sins, Christ had filled with his gifts and graces, ver. 1. — Then describing the character and behaviour of the Ephesians in their heathen state, to make them sensible, that notwithstanding the advantages which they pretended to have derived from the heathen mysteries, all the Gentiles, not excepting the initiated themselves, were deeply sunk in the grossest ignorance and wickedness, ver. 2. — Then speaking of the great love which he bore to the Jewish nation, God had made them, and the Gentiles, alive together by Christ, ver. 4, 5. — and had set them down together in the heavenly places of the Christian church, wherein salvation is promised as a free gift to all, through faith, and had sealed that promise to them by the gifts of the Spirit, ver. 6. — That future generations, knowing the exceeding greatness of God's grace, may be encouraged to expect pardon upon their repentance, ver. 7. — Then told the Ephesians, that the admission, not of the Gentiles only, but even of the Jews, into the Christian church, and their promise of salvation through faith sealed to them, were owing entirely to the unmerited benevolence of God, and not to their own good works, so that no one could boast of having merited salvation, ver. 8. — Thus at the same time he told them expressly, that these great favours were bestowed on them to fit them for good works, ver. 10.

The apostle having thus described the character and state of both Jews and Gentiles before their conversion, he desired the Gentiles to remember, that, in their heathen state, and after they were not even the initiated in the mysteries, had any knowledge of Christ the Saviour, or hope of the pardon of sin, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants, and without hope of pardon, nay, without the knowledge of the true God, ver. 11, 12. But now, by the pure favour of God, being seated in Christ's church, they enjoyed all those spiritual knowledge, and hopes, and privileges with which God's ancient people; for, though not circumcised, God had brought them nigh to himself, and to the Jews, by the blood of Christ, ver. 13. — who is the author of peace both to Jews and Gentiles, and hath made of both one church or fellowship, in which the true God is to be worshipped; having thrown down the Jewish peculiarity, which was the partition wall that had hitherto separated the Jews from the Gentiles, ver. 14. — and, by his death in the flesh, hath taken away the cause of the enmity which subsisted between them, even the Levitical ordinances, that he might create the two into one new man, body, or well agreeing society, under himself as head or governor, thus making peace between them, ver. 15. — also that he might reconcile both in one body or visible church to God, having, through his cross, slain the cause of their enmity to God, even the wicked affections and passions of both, ver. 16. — and this peace with God, Christ preached by his apostles to the Gentiles, and to the Jews, ver. 17. — And therefore, through him, both have access in the Christian church to worship the Father of the universe, with hope of acceptance and pardon; a privilege much greater than any which the initiated in the heathen mysteries could claim, ver. 18. — Withal, that such as the scribes, or priests of Diana, as were now become members of the fellowship of the mystery of God's will by faith, and all in the province of Asia who formerly were employed about the temple of that idol, might have no occasion to doubt of their having been members of the church, the apostle assured them, that they were no longer strangers to the covenants, and foreigners, as they had been, in the commonwealth of the true God, (see ver. 12.) but by the knowledge and belief of the mystery of God's will, they were become joint citizens in that commonwealth with the saints, and "members belonging to the house, or family, of God, to whom the church is built up, of which Christ is the head, which is constructed for the use, not of the inhabitants of Asia alone, but of believers of all nations, the true saints of God, ver. 19. — For they were built upon the foun-to have fallen down from Jupiter, nor even, like the ancient temple at Jerusalem, by any outward visible symbol of the presence of the true God; but by his real presence through invisible presence, filling every part of the fabric with the gifts and graces of his Spirit, ver. 22. See chap. i. 23, ii. 1.

By this grand figure the apostle hath taught us, that, under the gospel dispensation, the presence of God is not any longer manifested in a material temple, as under the Mosaic dispensation; neither is his worship limited to a certain particular place. But the invisible temple is Christ himself, and he is in all his saints. But any society of believers met for worshiping God in spirit and in truth, is a real temple of God, because in that society prayers and praises are publicly offered to God. Nay, every individual believer is a temple, because God is always inwardly worshipped and praised by him. And with respect to the Ephesians in particular, since they were members of this invisible temple of God, the Christian church, their honour as the keepers of this temple, and as worshippers therein, was far greater than their honour as priests and worshippers of Diana: Nay, greater than it would have been, had they become priests and worshippers in the temple at Jerusalem.

CHAP. II.—1 Even you Ephesians Christ hath filled with his gifts and graces, and thereby hath made you alive, who, notwithstanding your knowledge of the mysteries, were dead in trespasses and sins:

2 In which trespasses and sins, before your conversion, ye lived after the course of the heathen world, according to the will of the devil, the leader of those powerful spirits now in rebellion against God, who have their residence in the air, and the author of that false dispensation which now inwardly worketh in them who disobey God by their idolatry and opposition to the gospel.

3 With whom also we all had our conversation formerly, in the lusts of our flesh, doing the inclinations of the flesh and of the imaginations, and were by nature children of wrath, even as others.

Ver. 1.—1. Even you he hath filled. I agree with Chandler in opinion, that this verse is strictly connected with the last clause of the last verse of the preceding chapter; and that the words necessary for a strict connection are to be supplied from the following fifth verse, as our translators have done;

Even ye have been filled, namely, with his spiritual gifts and influences, and with all the various blessings which flow from them. The cause, manner, or instrument, as the grammarians speak. See Rom. vi. 10, 11. notes. This clause Locke paraphrases in the following words, 'Ye were, in particular, influenced by the power of the Holy Ghost, which was poured upon you in the day of your conversion; and ye were thereby sanctified as for God. Their consecration, however, is not of such nature as to hinder them from going to and fro on the earth. And therefore, being irrevocable enemies of God and his ways, they naturally continued the vices in opposing God, and in ruining men by their temptations, 1 Pet. v. 14. And that they might be preserved from such contiguity with those whom they presumed to understand themselves under the direction of one chief, here called their Prince, but in other passages, Satan and the Devil. Perhaps also he is called their Prince, because he instigated them to rebel against God, and was their leader in that rebellion. See 1 John v. 19. note 2.

3. And of the spirit which now inwardly worketh in the children of disobedience. See 2 Cor. iv. 4. note. The word children is translated of the spirit, of the spirit, being governed by the preceding word, of, in the prince, is fully translated, and of the spirit; that is, of the prince or author of the spirit which reigns in the children of disobedience, the author of that idolatry and wickedness which prevails among the heathens. For the word spirit in scripture, often denotes one's disposition and actions. The heathens are justly called 'children of disobedience,' because their life was one continued course of disobedience, both to God and to the Heavens. It is an expression, understood by the unbelieving Jews, called children of disobedience in scripture, and of the children disobedient. And of the spirit which reigns in the children of disobedience, the author of that idolatry and wickedness which prevails among the heathens. And far more in those who have the gospel; for though they have the word of the gospel, which should cause them to understand and to comprehend the things of the Lord, yet they do not understand, nor will they understand, as the apostle says, 2 Cor. vi. 14. They are under a spiritual blindness, and the word of the gospel is like a glass, which they will not or cannot see. See also Ephes. ii. 14. They are as if they had been blind, and had not seen the word of God, but, like Cain, have not heard of the world. See also the same place, where it is said of them, that they have not heard of the voice of the Lord, and have not seen the glory of the Lord. But I prefer the sense given in the commentary.

Ver. 3.—1. With whom also we all had our conversation. Or in some may be translated after the flesh, (Ezek. iv. 17,) that is, after whose example. Here the apostle speaks in name of the generality of the converted Jews, whose former character and state he affirmeth to have been the same as that of the Gentiles, and the character and state of the children of disobedience; for in it, with it, and after its fashion. Plainly referring the word of the gospel, the grace and bottom of all future conversion, to the children of disobedience formerly, doth not imply that all the converted Jews lived among the heathens, and were the children of disobedience. For in every age, and in every generation, the children of disobedience are to be found, and have been found, even among the converted Jews, as in every other age and generation. But the apostle here speaks of the conversion of the converted Jews, in order to make the Ephesians sensible that the law of Moses was not such an effectual institution as the Judæans represented it; secondly, to 20 Being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner-stone; law of the commandments by precepts, namely, the precepts of the gospel. See Eusebius's note on Col. 2. 14. But as 15:39 comes from a word meaning 'to one', and if these be united to one another because of their fascination, it properly denotes an injunction founded in the fulness of grace, wherein the person who enjoins it is first; accordingly, it is used to note Augustine's decree concerning the taxing. Luke 11. 2. In like manner, users, obeying the arbitrary injunctions of the Pythagorean philosophers, are said to be users of the commandments. The ordinances of Moses, being founded in the pleasure of God, are fully called ordinances. 15:39, etc. But this name cannot be applied with propriety to the precepts of the gospel, which are all founded in the nature and reason of things. In the Syrian version, the preposition = is added in the middle of verse 19, and gives another meaning, i.e., he established the law of the commandments, together with the ordinances which it enjoined.

4. Concerning ordinances—The ordinances of the law, being designed to keep the Jews separated from the rest of mankind, that they might preserve the oracles of God concerning Christ; designed also to prevent the fallings away of the Gentiles when they were not under the commandments. In the dispensation through Christ's death—they were wisely appointed to continue only so long as the thing that was signified was in the law of Moses, being founded in the pleasure of God, and were fully called ordinances. 15:39, etc. But this name cannot be applied with propriety to the precepts of the gospel, which are all founded in the nature and reason of things. In the Syrian version, the preposition = is added in the middle of verse 19, and gives another meaning, i.e., he established the law of the commandments, together with the ordinances which it enjoined. Hence the apostle told the Corinthians, 1 Cor. vi. 13. 'Hath any circumcised one been called, let him not be uncircumcised.' See Preface to the Galatians, sect. 4. No. 6. pertinent paragraph.

16. Reconcile both in one body. The Latin also used the word corpus, body, to denote a number of men united together by a common interest, and governed by the same laws. Cicero de Oificia, lib. 1. "Totum corpus Reipublica, The whole body of the Commonwealth is the Emperor." 2. To God, having slain the enmity by it. The reconciliation described in this verse, being the reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles unto God, the enmity which is said to have been slain by the cross of Christ, is that which subsisted between God and them, through the corruption of the nature. But the creation of the two into one new man, mentioned ver. 15. being the uniting of Jews and Gentiles into one visible church, the enmity spoken of in that verse as abolished, and being placed in the body of one new man, which the one or the other on account of the rites of worship peculiar to each. Hence the propriety of the expression used in the context. In the one case it is, 'having abolished the enmity,' the law of Moses, the cause of the enmity: and in the other, 'having slain the enmity,' namely, men's lusts, passions, and corruptions, the cause of the enmity. It is in the passages of scripture, likewise, these great effects are ascribed to the cross of Christ; and, particularly, our sinful passions are with much propriety ascribed to the cross of Christ, Rom. vi. 6. Gal. 5:1. For of all the arguments that can be offered to persuade sinners to return to the covenant administered by the old law, those obtained by the church of God are the most efficacious and powerful. It is the greatest expression of the love of God to sinners; as a propitiation for sin, it gives pardon believers the sure hope of pardon; and as connected with Christ's resurrection, it is in a certain proof and pledge of our resurrection to a never-ending life, and of our being raised from the dead to perpetual life, to prepare for his people. See Gal. vi. 14. note 1. 2. Therefore, through him as our high-priest, we Jews and Gentiles have introduction, both of us, by one Spirit to the Father of the universe, to worship with the hope of being accepted. 3. Where, then, ye are (waxt; 193,) not new strangers and sojourners, but joint citizens with the saints, same sani belonging to the house of God: but ye are joint citizens in the city of God with the Jews, and belonging to the temple of God, as constituent parts thereof; 3. The apostle, therefore, to learn the estimation of that famous temple, and to warn them from the worship of the lifeless image of an idol, with great propriety showed them, that the Christian church is a temple much more magnificent and beautiful, being built, not upon the foundation of wooden piles driven deep in the earth, like the temple of Diana, see chap. iii. 17. note, but upon the more sure foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the bottom corner-stone: That this great temple is built, not of stones and other dead materials, but of living men, whose minds are yoked together, not to any idol, but to the living and true God, who fills every part of it with his presence, ch. iii. 16 and is worshipped in it, not by impure rites, like those performed in the temple of Diana, but by holy affections and virtuous actions, produced in the worshippers by the operation of the Spirit.

EPHESIANS.

CHAP. III.

For the sake of this doctrine, that the Gentiles are predestinated to the salvation of sons, (chap. i. 6), and are made one church with the Jews, I Paul am now a prisoner belonging to Christ Jesus, on account of you Gentiles.

1 Ye cannot doubt of my being imprisoned for you Gentiles, seeing ye have heard of the grace of God, which was given me on your account, to preach the gospel to you, without requiring you to obey the law of Moses:

2 For revelation God made known to me the great secret concerning the Gentiles, (see ver. 6.), as I wrote before in few words.

3 By which, when ye read, ye may perceive my knowledge (w, 166.) of the mystery of Christ,

4 Which in other generations was not made known to the sons of men, as it is now revealed to his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit;

5 That the Gentiles should be joint heirs, (and (οὐσίως) a joint body, and joint partakers of his promise (w, 168.) concerning Christ, (ἐξ) through the gospel:

6 Of which I was made a minister, according to

Ver. 1. On account of you Gentiles.—The apostle mentions his imprisonment for preaching the privileges of the Gentiles, to convince the Ephesians that he firmly believed what he preached concerning the Gentiles. From the account which Luke hath given, Acts xxii. 25, of Paul’s imprisonment, it appears to have been occasioned by his doctrine concerning the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses.

Ver. 2.—1. Seeing ye have heard of the dispensation. If the particle εἰς γίνεται, in this passage, is translated supplied, seeing, as I have done, it must be translated, as chap. iv. 31. and Romans viii. 17. In the apostolic office, which was bestowed on Paul, and the order he gave in the Galatians, who were his converts, and well acquainted with his history, Gal. i. 13. For ye have heard of me more part.

2. Of the dispensation of the grace of God.—For the meaning of the word grace, see chap. i. 10. note 1. Because in scripture grace sometimes signifies rests, chap. xxii. 10. But grace, in the sense of chap. ix. 15. (or. 17., 18.) seems rather of opinion that ‘the dispensation of the grace of God,’ in this place means the apostolic office, which was bestowed on Paul, for the purpose of converting the Gentiles. But, as in the subsequent verses he explains himself by saying, that by revelation God made known to him the mystery. I rather think, ‘the dispensation of the grace of God’ which was given him on account of the Gentiles, denotes the knowledge of the gracious plan which God was pleased to contrive for the salvation of the Gentiles.

Ver. 3.—1. By revelation he made known to me the mystery.—That the Gentiles were made joint heirs with the Jews of the inheritance promised to Abraham and to his seed, and one body or church with the Jews, and partakers of his promise concerning Christ by faith, Gal. iii. 27. Ch. i. 14. He was instructed, he himself mentioned chap. i. 9. note 2. From what St. Paul says here, and in other passages concerning the revelation which was made to him of this mystery, Locke in his preface to the Ephesians infers, that although the other apostles knew the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses, all of them, except Paul, were ignorant that the Jews were freed from it, and that the law itself was abrogated. But in this certainly Locke was mistaken. For Paul himself expressly affirms, chap. ii. 6. that the mystery of which he speaks was ‘revealed in holy scriptures, the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit.’ Besides, what is said Acts xvii. 30. is an argument for the purpose of the revelation, does not state that James thought the observance of the law necessary to the Jews as a condition of their salvation; but he thought it necessary to their enjoying the privileges of Jewish citizenship; in which opinion Paul agreed with him. And, therefore, to show that he never taught the Jews to form the law of Moses as the municipal law of Judea, he concludes with this assertion. So that what he said respecting the Gentiles, he did not necessarily imply that they should be subject to the law of Moses, or that they were to be subject to it as a condition of their salvation, he would not have conveyed, as may be known from his behaviour in the case of Titus, whose circumcision he would not consent to, because, as he told the Galatians, chap. ii. 5. it would have been a renouncing of the truth of the gospel, most injurious to the Gentiles. 2. As I wrote before in few words;—Προφητεύομαι εἰς τὸ ἤλθεν ἡ γραμματεία, for the greatest part of the preceding chapters is taken up in explaining that mystery; but his meaning is, that he had written before, namely, chap. i. 8-10. In few words concerning the discovery of the mystery of Christ. His knowledge thereof was well-founded and complete. This passage may have been designed more especially for some in the provinces of Asia, who were not perfectly conversant with the writing, concerning his having received the knowledge of the mystery of Christ, and his being the apostle, his knowledge thereof was well-founded and complete. For during his long sojourn at Ephesus, all who dwelt in Asia, by coming to Ephesus, ‘heard the word of God, both Jews and Greeks, every one that was wise hearted.’ Acts xviii. 4. All that he had said may have been in a great measure ignorant of Paul’s history, the reading of what he had written there, concerning his vocation and inspiration as an apostle, must have been of great use to such, in making them understand his authority and knowledge in the gospel. The commendation which the apostle gives here of the discoveries made in this epistle, Ephes. vii. 1. thoughts was intended to make the Ephesians sensible, that it was a book of divine knowledge, incomparably more valuable than any of the curious books which they had burnt after their conversion.

2. Knowledge of the mystery of Christ.—Paul’s knowledge of the mystery of Christ is more particular, for the reasons of which he speaks, which he says were ‘revealed in holy scriptures, the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit.’ And as many of the Gentiles may have been in a great measure ignorant of Paul’s history, the reading of what he had written there, concerning his vocation and inspiration as an apostle, must have been of great use to such, in making them understand his authority and knowledge in the gospel. The commendation which the apostle gives here of the discoveries made in this epistle, Ephes. vii. 1. thoughts was intended to make the Ephesians sensible, that it was a book of divine knowledge, incomparably more valuable than any of the curious books which they had burnt after their conversion.

Ver. 5. Which in other generations was not made known, ets.—That the Gentiles were to be blessed in Abraham and his seed, was made known anciently in the covenants of blessing, and by the manner they were to be blessed in Abraham’s seed, was not made known, either by Moses or by the prophets. The generality of Jews supposed that the nations were to be blessed in Abraham’s seed, by their subjection to the law of Moses; an idea they were led to entertain by the passages of scripture on that subject. This notion does not disturb the Gentile believers in the church of God, as foretell, under the images of the coming of the light of the Jews, and of their being ‘converted to them,’ Isa. ii. 8. and of their joining the Israelites in worshipping God, according to the rites of Moses. But none of the Jews imagined that the Gentiles were to be made partakers of the unsearchable riches of the grace of Christ, which James advised him to despair of, as it was now revealed to him and to the other holy apostles and prophets of Christ.
appeal to me for that purpose; and holding rank as an apostle, according to the gifts of inspiration and miracles which were bestowed on me, and having been in my ministry, according to the inworn of God's power strengthening and directing me in the use of these gifts, for converting the Gentiles.

8 Unto me, I say, who, because I was a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious, (1 Tim. i. 13.) was less worthy of such an honour than the meekerest believer, was this grace of inspiration and miracles given, to enable me to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ.

9 And to make all men see what the nature and advantage of the fellowship is of the mystery (see ver. 6.) which was hid from the ages by God, who created all things by Jesus Christ;

10 That now to the governments and to the powers in the heavenly regions, the manifold wisdom of God may be made known through the church, 11 According to the disposition of the ages (see Eph. ii. 11. note), and introduction with confidence through the faith of him.

12 Wherefore, (avexa) I request that ye faint not at my afflictions (kag) for you, which Christ.

Ver. 8.—1. Who am less than the least.—Mai EXKLHPTIKH. This is a comparative formed from the superlative aKLHPTIKH, the force of which is difficult to express in the English language. Paul speaks of himself in this humble manner, compared with the other apostles and ministers of the word, called the foundation, Eph. iv. 11., not that he was not a believer, or that he was not a spirit of Christ, a persecutor of his disciples, and exceedingly injurious in some sense, as he tells us, 1 Tim. i. 13.

2. To preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ.—Those unsearchable perfections, Col. i. 23, whereby Christ is qualified to be the head over all, and to bestow on all who believe his greatest spiritual blessings, which are the only true riches, because they render the possessors perfectly happy. See ver. 10. 12. —Here, as Chandler observes, St. Paul tacitly contrasts himself as an apostle with the priests of Diana. They, as all the inhabitants of Ephesus, were without knowledge of the mystery of Christ, that is, the mystery of Christ, the Dianist mystery, was a mystery, a minister of the gospel. They had the custody of the treasures belonging to the goddess, which were deposited in their temple. Paul, on the contrary, had the deposit of the temple, was employed in preaching the gospel, the unsearchable riches of Christ, were instructed to be acquainted with Diana's temple. The priests of Diana were held in high esteem, because they had the knowledge of the mysteries of goddess Intu, into whose hands, and with whom they took upon themselves, the power of dispensations to conceal them from all but the initiated; whereas to Paul was communicated the knowledge of 'the mystery of God's will; the knowledge of the great blessings which God will bestow on mankind through Christ, called with great propriety the unsearchable riches of Christ. And that knowledge was imparted to him as a mystagogus, not to be concealed, but to be published; that all men, as is observed ver. 9, may become sensible of the advantages of the fellowship of the mystery of God and of Christ, and be induced to enter into a fellowship wherein such great blessings may be obtained.

Ver. 9.—1. And to make all men see.—Sokoloumas, literally, to shine the light to all, so as to make them see. 2. What the fellowship is of the mystery.—Tc x Xpcx. This word, translated by St. Chrysostom, commonwealth, conspiracy, society, section, was used by the Greeks to denote their religious societies or fellowship. See chap. v. 11. note. —Many ancient MSS. and versions read in this place, xarnocx, the dispensations. It seems the transmitters of this epistle, not observing that the apostle was contrasting the discoveries made in the gospel with the discoveries in the heathen mysteries, and the Christian church with the heathen, were at a loss to know what he meant by 'the fellowship of the mystery.'

3. Hid from the ages.—So the original phrase, se x xpaatav se x xpaatav, ought to be translated, as is plain from Col. i. 25, where generations are understood to pass from generation to generation, (see note on xpaatav from ages and generations.) See ver. 5. note.

4. Created all things, by Jesus Christ;—Here the context less us, the dispensation; and next, Col. i. 18. of God's power in the dispensation of all the dispensations of religion by Christ. Chandler, however, is of opinion, that the creation of the heavens and the earths, with the dispensations in their places, in the general expression all things, and that they add a dignity to the sentiment, as it represents our Saviour as the author of the system of things, and by the power of God his Father. The parallel passage, Col. i. 16. confirms this opinion.

Ver. 10.—1. To the governments and to the powers in the heavenly regions.—These, according to Locke and others, were the Jewish civil magistrates, priests, and scribes, and Pharisees, who, being members of the Jewish church, might be said to be in heavenly places, with as much propriety as the members of the Christian church are said to be in the heavenly places, Col. i. 10. An interpretation not well founded, we need only observe, that it does not accord with what follows in the context; the wisdom of God was not made known to the Jewish rulers by the Christian church, which they believed to be no church of God, and undeserving to be destroyed. God therefore, I have doubt of the governments and powers to whom the manifold wisdom of God was made known by the Christian church, by the direction of the orders of angels in heaven, whose knowledge of God's dispensations must be as gradual as these dispensations themselves; consequently their possession of the information must have been greatly increased by the constitution of the Christian church.

2. Manifold wisdom of God.—The apostle calls the wisdom of God τὴν μορφήν τοῦ θεοῦ, the image of God, or the property of God, according to which it displays itself. Estius translates this μετωπία, very absurd. The St. Jerome and Chrysostom translate παρουσία, presence.

3. May be made known through the church.—Though the angels, who, as the apostle Peter observes, 1 Pet. i. 12 desire to look upon these things in the figures which it displays itself, Estius translates this μυστηρίων, very absurd. The St. Jerome and Chrysostom translate παρουσία, presence.

Ver. 11. According to the disposition of the ages.—The words in the original, ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ, will not bear the translation of them in the English Bible. For, as Chandler observes, the Greek word ἐν properly denotes the manner or order in which a person places anything, either in his intention or in his execution. In the latter sense it is used, Heb. ii. 2, to denote the placing of the sheep-shears in due order in the sheath. —In the verse under consideration, it signifies both intention and execution. —And, age, is a word of various signification. Here, in the plural, it denotes the dispensations of religion, under which the world has been, and is; and in the singular, namely, the Patriarchal, in which a Saviour was promised; the Mosaic, in which he was typified; and the Christian, in which he was manifested in the flesh, and preached to the world as come. All these ages or dispensations, the apostle states, God planned and revealed: the dispensation of the Gentiles, Christ Jesus, the mystery of God, the mystery of Christ, for mankind for his reception. —Rom. xvi. 25. Th. 1. 2. (see the note on that verse), συνέσεως signifies the ages of the law, or Mosaic dispensation, and παρουσία, signifies the age of the Christ, the dispensation of the New Testament, the dispensation living under that dispensation.

Ver. 12. Ex x xpaatav x xpaatav, is impossible, without some such rendering as that the knowledge, or knowledge lived under that dispensation.
14 That ye may be made to fainth, I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 15 From whom the whole family in heaven, and upon earth, is named, 16 Praying, that according to the riches of his glory, he would grant you to be mightily strengthened through his Spirit, (as, 141.) in the inward man:
