13. Lk 11⁵². Shut up, etc.] i.e. prevent the nation from being converted. The Kingdom of Heaven is here the Church. 14. The omission of this v., which has been wrongly inserted from Mk 12⁴⁰ Lk 20⁴⁷, reduces the eight woes to seven: see on Mk. 15. To make one proselyte] The Ethiopic version has the interesting reading 'to baptise one proselyte.' As, however, there is no evidence that the Pharisees were particularly anxious to make proselytes to Judaism, it is perhaps more probable that our Lord alludes to their zeal in making proselytes from among the Jews to their own sect.

16-22. On dishonest casuistry. The lax moralists of that time invented ways of evading the obligation of truthfulness, by saying that certain forms of swearing were binding and others not. Thus an oath by the Temple or the altar might be broken without sin, but not an oath by the gold of the Temple, or by the gift on the altar. Such refinements were a direct encouragement to dishonesty and untruthfulness, and our Lord denounced them with terrible severity, declaring that a man's word or oath, in whatever words expressed, is absolutely binding. The lesson here taught is truthfulness and honesty in general, as well as the sanctity of oaths. Christ's teaching here is not inconsistent with 5⁴, where from a higher ideal standpoint He forbids oaths altogether. 16. It is nothing] i.e. it is not binding. The gold of the temple] J. Lightfoot is probably right in regarding this gold, together with the 'gift on the altar' (v. 18), as dedicated to God, i.e. as Corban. An oath in which the word Corban was mentioned was held to be specially binding: see on 15⁵, ⁶. A debtor] i.e. bound by his oath.

23. Lk 11⁴². J. Lightfoot remarks, 'The tithing of herbs is from the rabbins. This tithing was added by the scribes, and yet approved of by our Saviour, when He saith, 'Ye ought not to leave these undone.' The more scrupulous rabbis tithed not only the seeds but the leaves and stalks of these herbs.

Cummin] used in cooking as a condiment. The weightier matters] Alluding to but not adopting the rabbinical distinction between the 'heavy' and 'light' precepts of the Law. Among the 'heavy' precepts were the sabbath, circumcision, and the prohibition to profane the Divine Name. Hillel and Shammai differed somewhat in their classification of the 613 precepts which the Law was supposed to contain. Judgment] stands here, by a Hebraism, for 'righteousness.' Faith] honesty, truthfulness, trustworthiness. These ought ye] i.e. Ye ought to have observed judgment, mercy and faith, and also to have tithed mint, anise and cummin.

24. A proverb meaning that the scribes scrupulously avoid insignificant breaches of the Law, while continually breaking its great commandments. Strain at a gnat] RV 'strain out a gnat,' viz. out of the wine that you are about to drink. The 'gnat' here is probably a minute animal bred from the fermentation of wine, and regarded by the rabbis as unclean. The camel was also unclean (Lv 11⁴). 25. Lk 11⁴⁰. Ye make clean] see Mk 7⁴. But within they] i.e. the cups and dishes are full of food and drink which has been obtained by extortion and excess.

26. Cleanse first that] i.e. first earn your meat and drink by honest labour, not by extortion, then your cups and dishes will be clean in God's sight.

27. Whited sepulchres] Contact with sepulchres defiled, so that the Jews smeared them with limewash yearly on the 15th day of Adar lest travellers touching them unwares should be made unclean. In Lk 11⁴⁴ Jesus compares the Pharisees to unmarked, here to marked, sepulchres, because they defiled those who came into close contact with them.
. Alexander Jannaeus, the Macabean of the Jews (c. 104-78 B.C.), gave utterance very similar sentiment. On his deathbed he made his wife to take heed of painted , pretending to be Pharisees, whose works the works of Zimri, and yet they expect the reward of Phineas. 'Painted men' are an advice to mean 'men whose outward show not answer to their nature.'

31. Lk 11 47,48. 29. Tombs of the beths, etc.] It is natural to suppose that this is alluded to some actual building operations then going on, or recently completed. Jerusalem. Herod the Great appears to have built or adorned the tombs and cenotaphs of many Jewish worthies. Calvin well remarks, 'It is customary to build with hypocrites thus honour after their death good teachers and ministers of God, whom they cannot see while they are alive. It is a hypocrisy of which costs little to profess a warm regard for so who are now silent.' 31. Unto your-ces] or, 'against yourselves.' The v. is an actual commentary on the statement of the arisen (v. 30). 'If we had been in the days of our fathers, etc. Jesus retorts, 'You witness to yourselves by your words that you are the sons of those who killed the prophets. You witness against yourselves by your actions that you are also the sons spiritually, for you, as them, reject the words of the prophets o. are among you, viz. the Baptist and self.' 32. Fill ye up then] i.e. 'Carry out our wickedness to the full, as your fathers l. by putting Me to death. You desire to do and I shall not hinder you.' 33. See 37 34.

34-36. Lk 11 49-51. 34. I send unto you] in parallel in St. Luke (which see) has herefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send unto them prophets, etc. The prophets, etc., are the apostles, prophets, teachers, evangelists, and other ministers of the Apostolic church. Observe that here, as in 13 52, our Lord is quoted by the Jewish council as saying that the Jewish courts of Christian ministers under Jewish titles as 'rabbis' (i.e. rabbis) and scribes.

35. That upon you] 'The scribes and Pharisees are regarded as the representatives of the people, for whom, as their leaders, they are all responsible' (Meyer). The righteous blood] i.e. the penalty for shedding it.

Zacharias son of Barachias] Jesus probably did 'Zachariah,' as in St. Luke, without mentioning the father's name, but the evangelist or one of the earliest copyists, who thought it necessary to distinguish among the twenty-two Zachariahs of the OT, and understood the canonical prophet to be meant, added the words 'son of Barachis.' There can be no real doubt that the person meant is Zechariah, son of Jehoiada (see 2Ch 24 21), concerning whom there was a Jewish tradition, that his blood could not be removed by washing, but remained bubbling on the ground where it had been shed. In the Jewish arrangement of the books of the sacred Canon, Chronicles stands last, so that Jesus chose His examples from the first and last books of the Jewish Bible.

37-39. Pathetic lament over Jerusalem (Lk 19 34,35). St. Luke places these words in another, and much less suitable connexion. As they occur in St. Matthew they form a worthy close to our Lord's ministry in Jerusalem.

37. How often] 'It is fair to assume that Christ's exclamation over Jerusalem presupposes that the capital had repeatedly been the scene of His ministrations, which coincides with the visits on festival occasions recorded by John: cp. Ac 10 39 (Meyer). Under her wings] see 2 Esdras 1 30. 38. Your house] of either, (1) the city itself, (2) the Temple, or, (3) the Jewish dispensation. 39. Till ye shall say, Blessed is He, etc.] i.e. either, (1) till the Second Advent, when they will see Christ as judge, and will unwillingly say 'Blessed is He that cometh,' or, (2) till the conversion of Israel (see Ro 11), when true believers will see Christ by faith and willingly say, 'Blessed is He that cometh,' etc.

THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM AND THE END OF THE WORLD FORETOLD

1. Jesus went out] RV 'Jesus went out from the temple, and was going on his way, and his disciples,' etc.

The buildings] The magnificent buildings, a mass of marble and gold, were not yet finished (see Jn 2 20). The rabbis said, 'He who has not seen the temple of Herod, has never seen a beautiful building. The sanctuary was made of green and white marble... Herod intended to have the building covered with gold, but the rabbis dissuaded him, saying that it was sufficiently beautiful as it was, for it appeared like the waves of the sea.' Josephus says, 'The front of the temple was covered all over with plates of gold of great weight, and at the first rising of the sun reflected back a fiery splendour, etc... The temple appeared to strangers, when they were at a distance, like a mountain covered with snow, for those parts of it which were not gilt were exceedingly white. Of its stones some were 45 cubits in length, 5 in height, and 6 in breadth.' (A cubit = 18 in.)

2. One stone] Josephus, an eyewitness, says 'Cesar (i.e. Titus) now gave orders to demolish the whole city and temple, except the highest towers and the west wall. All the rest was so thoroughly laid even with the ground by those that dug it up to the foundation, that there was left nothing to make those who came thither believe that it had ever been inhabited.'
3-5. Great prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the end of the world (Mk 13:1-8, Lk 21:7). Many of the most serious difficulties of this great discourse disappear when it is realised that our Lord referred in it not to one event but to two, and that the first was typical of the second. This is especially clear in St. Matthew’s Gospel. The disciples ask Jesus (v. 3) for information on two subjects: (1) the date of the approaching destruction of the Temple, (2) the sign that will precede His second coming at the end of the world. That these two events were clearly distinguished in the mind of Christ Himself, and, therefore, in this discourse as He delivered it, admits of demonstration. Lk 21:24 especially, which speaks of ‘the times of the Gentiles,’ during which Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the heathen, and the Jews dispersed into all lands till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, places an indefinite interval between the fall of Jerusalem and the end of the world. Similarly in St. Matthew and St. Mark, Jesus declares that He is ignorant of, or is not allowed to reveal, the date of the end of the world (24:36, Mk 13:23), but expressly says that the fall of Jerusalem will take place within the lifetime of the Apostles (10:23). Again the statement that the end will not come till the gospel has been preached to all nations (24:14) postpones the end indefinitely: cp. also 22:11-14. The reasons why the two events are not equally distinguished in the discourse as we have it, are mainly four: (1) Our Lord’s words, as in other cases, are condensed. We have not a full report of the speech, but its most striking passages, which being isolated from their context, are naturally somewhat difficult to interpret. (2) At the time when the speech was committed to writing, the apostles believed that Christ’s second coming would occur in their lifetime, and that the fall of Jerusalem and the Last Judgment would be coincident: see on 1 Th 4:15. This belief would affect, if not the faithfulness of their report, at any rate the arrangement of it. It would cause the evangelists to group together, as if referring to the same event, sayings which really referred to events widely separated in time. (3) The discourse perhaps contains some sayings not spoken at this time, but inserted here because believed to refer to the same events. The hypothesis of extensive additions cannot indeed be admitted. Nevertheless, it is quite in the manner of the evangelists, and especially of St. Matthew, to group together in a single discourse utterances delivered at different times. (4) Our Lord for devotional reasons desired His disciples always to regard His coming as

Jews, and slew about 50,000 of them, especially at Caesarea, in one hour's time at 20,000 Jews were massacred. Famines] was the time of great scarcity. Josephus mentions a famine in Palestine about a.d. in which many died of starvation. settlements omitted by RV. Earthquakes, was an unexampled number at this rod devastating the provinces of Asia, Syria, Macedonia, Campania, etc. ephus mentions one in Palestine accomfaced by amazing concussions and bellows of the earth—a manifest indication that the destruction was coming upon men.'

1. 'Beginning of sorrows' RV 'of travail,' viz. The writers speak frequently of the so-called 'sorrows of the Messiah,' which are last nine months, and to be the birth-pangs the coming age. They would be a period internal corruption, and outward distress, famine, and war, of which Palestine was to the scene, and Israel the chief sufferers. of these sorrows would fall upon the Messiah Himself (Edersheim).

11. False prophets] see on v. 5. Josephus says 'a body of wicked men, who deceived and deluded the people under pretence of divine inspiration, who prevailed with the multitude to act like madmen, and went before them into the wilderness, pretending that God would show them the signs of victory': also 2 Pet. 1:1 Jn 2:1-3 4:1. 12. Cp. Heb 10:25 24. 13. Shall endure] i.e. shall resist the incitements of false prophets, stand firm in execution, and not suffer his love of Christ to grow cold. Unto the end] viz. of the tribulation; but it may mean unto the uttermost, unto death. Shall be saved] i.e. either actually by flight to Pella (v. 16), or more probably, saved spiritually.

14. Since the gospel had not been preached the whole world, or even to the whole oman world by 70 a.d., as indeed Christ himself indicated (10:28), many suppose that the end here is the last judgment. Those who understand it to refer to the fall of Jerusalem, point out that by that time the gospel had been preached not only in the East, but in Rome, and perhaps in Spain and Gaul (15:24, 28).

15-28. The flight of the Christians before the fall of Jerusalem.

15. The abomination of desolation] i.e. the abomination which makes the Temple desolate, by causing God to forsake it (Dan.9:27). Some definite event is meant, because it is the signal of instant flight (vv. 16-20). It is toappen before the fall of Jerusalem, and in the holy place, i.e. in that part of the Temple, where the priests could enter. The only event which answers this description is the capture of the Temple by the Zealots, or Assassins, 66 or 67 A.D., and the abominations which then ensued. The Zealots turned the Temple into a camp, defiled it with blood, made a creature of their own high priest, and finally caused the daily sacrifices to cease.

St. Luke's version, 'when ye see Jerusalem encompassed by armies,' is not an interpretation of 'the abomination of desolation,' but another sign outside Jerusalem, which took place at the same time as the desolation within. Jerusalem was encompassed with armies, (1) in 66 A.D. by the troops of Cestius Gallus; (2) in 68 A.D. by those of Vespasian; (3) in 70 A.D. by those of Titus. The first investment is St. Luke's signal for flight. Soon after this the Zealots seized the Temple and the city, guarded the gates, and prevented all escape. The prophecy in Daniel originally referred to the profanation of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, 169-168 B.C., but its application to the events of 66-70 A.D. is very suitable.

Other views of the nature of the 'abomination of desolation,' worthy of notice are that it is, (1) the Roman eagles, or standards; (2) a statue of Titus erected on the site of the Temple; (3) the appearance of Antichrist at the end of the world: cp. 2 Th.2:4.

Whoso readeth, let him understand] not 'let him that readeth the prophet Daniel understand,' for the reference to Daniel is absent from St. Mark (see RV), but 'let him that readeth this prophecy of Christ's understand.' The occurrence in both evangelists is a proof that the common authority used by St. Matthew and St. Mark was not oral tradition, but a written document.

16. Flee into the mountains] Eusebius says, 'But the members of the Church in Jerusalem, having been commanded before the war in accordance with a certain oracle given by revelation to the men of repute there, to depart from Jerusalem, and to inhabit a certain city of Perea called Pella, all the believers in Christ in Jerusalem went thither, and when now the saints had abandoned both the royal metropolis itself and the whole land of Judaea, the vengeance of God finally overthrew the lawless persecutors of Christ and His Apostles.'

17. Not come down] but escape by the outside staircase, or over the roofs of the houses: see on 9:2.

20. On the sabbath day (peculiar to St. Matthew the Jewish evangelist). Alford says, 'That they were not said as any sanction of observance of the Jewish sabbath is most certain; but merely as referring to positive impediments which might meet them on that day, the shutting of the gates of cities, etc., and their own scruples about travelling further.
than the ordinary sabbath day's journey (about a mile English); for the Jewish Christians adhered to the Law till the destruction of Jerusalem. (See Intro. § 6.)

21. See Dan 12.1. Josephus says, 'The multitude of those that perished exceeded all the destructions that either men or God ever brought upon the world.' 'The number of those that perished during the whole siege was 1,100,000.'

22. Those days] i.e. of the siege of Jerusalem, which occupied less than five months. No flesh] i.e. no inhabitants of the theatre of war, Palestine. Be saved] i.e. be left alive. The elect] i.e. the Christians.

23–26. Chrysostom and others, translating then 'afterwards' (which it may mean), refer these vv. to the Last Judgment, but it is better to suppose that the fall of Jerusalem is still spoken of. 24. False Christs, and false prophets] see on vv. 5, 11. Signs and wonders] J. Lightfoot illustrates from the Talmud the magical practices of the Jews. 'The senior who is chosen into the council, ought to be skilled in the arts of astrologers, jugglers, diviners, sorcerers, etc.' 'The chamber of Happarva (in the Temple) was built by a certain magician by art magic.' 'Rabbi Joshua outdoes a magician in magic and drowns him in the sea.' (Lk 17.22.) If they] i.e. they who are deluded by false Messiahs. Behold, he] viz. the Messiah. In the desert] Some of the false prophets did actually lead out their dupes to the desert. In the secret] (RV 'inner') chambers] a poetical expression for 'in hiding.'

27, 28. Whether these vv. describe Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem, or His second coming to judge the world, or both, is doubtful. The context suggests that the destruction of Jerusalem is meant, but it is just the context which is doubtful, for St. Mark omits both vv., and St. Luke gives them in quite a different connexion. As originally spoken, they probably referred to Christ's second coming.

27. (Lk 17.24.) The second advent of the Son of man will be confined to no one locality, but will be manifested instantaneously to the whole universe. But if the reference is to the destruction of Jerusalem, this v. describes the conspicuous and world-renowned nature of the event.

28. A parable or proverb (Lk 17.37). Just as, wherever a carcass may happen to be, eagles or vultures will invariably be found; so at Christ's second coming, wherever a man dead in trespasses and sins is found, there also will Christ be revealed as an avenging judge. Thus 'the carcasse' represents the wicked, and 'the eagles,' Christ and His avenging angels of judgment. Those who suppose the fall of Jerusalem to be meant, understand by 'the carcasse,' the Jews, and by 'the eagles,' the Roman armies.

29–42. Most commentators refer these vv. (in the main) to the Second Advent, though some think that the fall of Jerusalem is still meant.

29. Immediately] RV 'But immediately.' This discourse, in the form in which it has come down to us, seems to place the Second Advent immediately after the fall of Jerusalem.

30. The sign of the Son of man] As Christ does not explain this sign, it is useless to guess what it will be. In tradition it is the Cross. 'Then shall appear the Cross in the sky, shining more brightly than the sun, to convict the Jews' (Theophylact). This interpretation is already found in the 'Didache.'

31. Usually explained of the gathering of believers into heaven at the last day. Those who think that the fall of Jerusalem is meant, explain it of the gathering of the heathen into the Church from all quarters of the world after that event, or of the flight of the Christians from all quarters of Palestine to Pella.

34. This generation] i.e. Jerusalem will be destroyed within the lifetime of men now living. This literal meaning is not to be evaded, as, for example, by regarding 'this
ST. MATTHEW

Mk 13:32.

The general idea is that, through to

One shall be taken] viz. into glory, by angels. The other left] viz. for reprobaor punishment. But if the fall of salem is meant, the 'taking' means the ful flight from Judea and Jerusalem; being 'left' means failure to flee.

1-51. An exhortation to faithfulness and faithfulness addressed specially to the Apostles other chief ministers of the Church (Lk 46). It appropriately closes the discourse, whether it really belongs here may be bted. St. Luke introduces it in a quite rent connexion.

3. The goodman (RV 'master') of the Apostles, and their successors in posts of ority in the Church. The thief] i.e. on unt of the suddenness and unexpectedness

Broken up] RV 'broken through': see 6:19.

BE TEN VIRGINS. THE TALENTS. THE SHEEP AND THE GOATS

The whole of this c., which is entirely con-red with the Second Advent, and contains me of the most striking of all Christ's saygs, is peculiar to St. Matthew.

1-13. Parable of the Ten Virgins. Pro-Cians, who alone are addressed re, are warned of the absolute need of d oil, i.e. of sufficient depth and reality in the spiritual life, if they are to be admitted into Christ's kingdom hereafter.

Unless the life of the soul is continually ished by secret prayer, devout meditation upon God's Word, and reverent use of the Sacraments, there is extreme danger that lamp of piety will flicker out, that even the outward show of conformity to Christ's Law will cease to be, and that death or the Second Advent will find the soul not ready.

1. Then] i.e. in the period immediately before the Second Advent. The kingdom of heaven] i.e. the Church on earth. Unto ten virgins] The ten virgins are not simply umans, but good Christians; not all the ised, but those who make some attempt act up to their Christian profession.

The number ten represents the whole number of those who are apparently good Christians. It is chosen because among the Jews it was a complete number. Ten Jews constituted a congregation. Which took their lamps] RM 'torches,' i.e. their Christian profession. The 'lamps' are all that is outward in the life of professing Christians, as the oil is all that is inward.
To meet the bridegroom] All Christian life is a going out to meet the bridegroom, i.e. a preparation for the second coming of Christ.

In the parable the wedding is supposed to take place at night. The bridegroom, accompanied by his friends, goes in procession to the bride's house to fetch her home to his. On the return journey the virgins, the friends of the bride, are supposed to join the procession, and to enter with her into the bridegroom's house, where, in accordance with Jewish custom, the wedding feast was held. The customs of the Jews with regard to weddings differed little from those of the Greeks and Romans, or of modern Oriental nations, who invariably celebrate weddings at night. The marriage of Christ with His Church is represented in the parable as taking place in the world to come, the betrothal having taken place in this world.

2. And five of them were wise and five were foolish] The foolish virgins are not identical with the wicked, or the hypocrites. There is nothing insincere about them, they are only foolish and shallow. They have some oil, that is, some genuine religion, but not enough.
They are like those in the parable of the sower who have no depth of earth. They endure for a time, but cannot carry through what they have begun. Their stock of perseverance and patience is soon exhausted, and their lamps go out.

3. Took no oil with them] Oil is the symbol of the Holy Spirit, and of inward sanctification (Ac 10:38 1 Cor 2:10 1 Jn 2:20, 27).
Here it stands for all that is earnest and sincere in the Christian life: secret prayer, faith, humility, charity, and good works.
4. Oil in their vessels] The foolish virgins took some oil, but not enough. The wise virgins took an extra supply, in case the bridegroom delayed his coming.

5. Tarried] A hint (but it is no more) that Christ would not come as soon as the first Christians expected. [Slumbered and slept] If a definite meaning is to be given to this detail it represents the repose of faith, the serene confidence in God, which those who have found Christ, and have ordered their lives after His word, have a right to feel. The confidence of the foolish virgins, however, was misplaced.

6. At midnight] i.e. the time of the Second Advent and the resurrection of the dead.

8. Are gone out] RV 'are going out.'

9. Not so; lest] RV 'Peradventure there will not be enough.' Jerome says: 'This answer they make not from avarice, but from fear. For each individual soul will receive the reward for his own deeds, nor in the day of judgment can the virtues of one make amends for the vices of another.' To them that sell] Clearly the bridegroom, though on the point of coming, had not yet come. If this detail is to be pressed, 'they that sell' are the teachers and ministers of the Church (Origen).

10. And the door was shut] viz. the door of heaven.

12. I know you not] i.e. because in the true sense you have never known Me: cp. Jn 10:14. 14–30. Parable of the Talents (distinct from, though similar to, that of the Pounds, Lk 19:11–27, q.v.). The parable is intended for all Christians, warning even those of the meanest ability to use to the best advantage the talents with which God has entrusted them, if they would share in the future kingdom of Christ. It suitably follows and supplements the parable of the virgins; for whereas that represented Christ's servants as waiting for Him, this represents them as working for Him; and whereas that laid stress on their inward spiritual life, this lays stress on the outward activities in which the spiritual life shows itself. It differs from the parable of the pounds in being addressed to the disciples alone, in its simpler structure, and in its not inculcating the doctrine of diversities of rewards in the world to come. 'This parable shines clearest in the light of the circumstances. Jesus and His disciples are still on Olivet overlooking Jerusalem and the temple in all their glory. Jesus had foretold their destruction. What was the cause of that ruin? Because the nation had buried the talent God had entrusted to them, instead of using it for Him.'

14. A man] i.e. Jesus Christ. Travelling into a far country] viz. when He ascended into heaven. An ancient writer beautifully says: 'He calls His going to the Father a journey into a far country out of love to the saints whom He left on the earth, for He was more truly in a far country when He was on earth.' Theophylact says: 'He is said to go into a far country, because He is long-suffering, and does not immediately demand the fruit of men's works, but waits.' His own servants] lit. 'slaves.' In ancient times slaves practised trades and professions, kept shops, carried on businesses, paying the whole, or a certain percentage, of their profits to their masters.

15. Talents] see on 18:24. 'It seems better to explain the five (talents) more extensively of all the gifts of God, whether called those of nature, or of grace, of condition, or opportunities, or sacraments. One receives five talents and another two; one has a deeper insight into God's word, or has constitutionally a more kind or liberal disposition than another, or is trained up with more abundant means of grace, and with opportunities of turning the same to good account, or with a higher station in God's Church than another' (Isaac Williams).

According to his several ability] God gives men spiritual gifts according to their natural capacities; e.g. a man with a natural gift of eloquence becomes by God's grace a good preacher; a man of natural piety, a spiritual guide; a wealthy man, a philanthropist; a profound philosopher, a theologian; a man of high social position, a powerful influence by virtue of his example, etc.

16. Traded] Christians are said to trade with their talents, when they employ them to the profit of their own souls and the benefit of others. Other five talents] The talents made in trade are the good which Christians do to themselves and others by the due use of the talents with which God has entrusted them. The talents gained by the apostles were human souls converted by them. 18. Digged in the earth] The man who hides his talent, is he who neither employs his abilities for his own spiritual advantage, nor for that of others.

19. After a long time] Another hint that the Advent may be delayed. Reckoneth with them] viz. at the Judgment.

21. Well done] In this parable the servants having been equally faithful and diligent, receive, despite the difference of the talents entrusted to them, an equal reward. It is different in the parable of the pounds, where the servants, having shown different degrees of diligence, receive different rewards. The lesson of both parables is that not ability but faithful diligence is rewarded. Over many things] 'Here again, as in 24:47, we have a glimpse given us into the future that lies behind the veil. We see that the reward of faithful work lies, not in rest only, but in enlarged activity. The world to come is thus acted by a law of continuity with that in 1 we live; and those who have so used "talents" as to turn many to righteousness may find new spheres of action, beyond or dreams, in that world in which the ties otherhood that have been formed on earth, not extinguished, but, so we may reverbelieve, multiplied and strengthened 'nptre). The joy] viz. of eternal bless-(v. 34).

31. The one talent] Very instructive is fact that it is the recipient of the one who proves the defaulter here. Hence-and none may excuse his sloth on a plea this. So little is committed to my charge it cannot matter how I administer that.
It is so little I can do for God, what fies that little whether it be done or left one?' (Trench). I knew thee that thou in hard man] 'The churl accounted his churlish, esteeming him such a one as self. He did not believe in his lord's for-ing love, and in his gracious acceptance of work with all its shortcomings, which done for him out of a true heart, and with were desire to please him.' (Trench).

7. To the exchangers] RV 'bankers.' ‘We not regard these words as a perfectly idle ence, for they furnish an appropriate right. These timid natures who are not pted for independent labour on behalf of kingdom of God, are now advised at least associate themselves with persons of greater thg, under whose guidance they may apply x gifts to the service of the Church (' shansen). With usury] i.e. 'with interest.'

9. For unto every one] see 13 13. It is a of the natural as well as of the spiritual ld, that the disuse of a faculty finally leads ta complete loss, whereas the due use of it is to its development and increase.

10. Weeping] RV 'the weeping.' The alty is not merely exclusion, as in the case the foolish virgins, but punishment, in liion.

11-46. The last judgment described (peculiar St. Matthew). Christ here speaks of the gment of Christians alone, because that is the question which most concerned the costles and their future conquests. That the sons to be judged are described in v. 32 as all the nations,' is in no way inconsistent with
a. Jesus foresaw, and frequently prophesied,
His religion would become universal (8 11, 1), and therefore appropriately described Christians who at the Last Day will rise to judged, as all the nations of the earth.
common interpretation, however, is, that the gment of all mankind is meant. Against is is to be set not so much the title 'Lord,' ich even His enemies will then give to ist, as the statement that all the persons judged had regarded Christ as their Master during their lifetime, and had recognised the duty of serving Him.

32. All the nations] see above.

Sheep... goats (or, 'kids')] The sheep are the righteous; the goats, from their comparative worthlessness, the wicked.

33. His right hand... the left] These expressions have the same significance in most languages. In Plato's 'Republic' Er the Pamphylian is allowed to see the judgment after death executed by the judges of the underworld. The judges sit between two gaps, one leading to heaven, the other to hell.
'After passing sentence, the judges commanded the just to take the road to the right upwards through the heaven, and fastened in front of them symbol of the judgment which had been given; while the unjust were ordered to take the road downward to the left, and also borne behind them evidence of all their evil deeds.' Similarly the rabbis said, 'Those on the right hand are the just, who study the Law, which is at the right hand of God (Dt 33 1); those on the left are the wicked, who study riches (Prov 3 18).’ 'In those on the right hand righteousness, in those on the left hand guilt, preponderates.'

34. The king] i.e. Christ Himself, appearing in the glory of His kingdom: cp. Rev 19 16.

Inherit] i.e. receive by right of sonship.

35. For I was an hungry, and ye gave me meat] Faith in Christ being presumed (for the persons judged are professing Christians), the Judgment proceeds according to works, by which a living is distinguished from a dead faith (Jas 2 14-26). The absolute Lordship of Christ over the human race is expressed in a very simple yet most emphatic way when it is said that every good deed done to a fellow-creature is a good deed done to Christ, and that at the Last Day all men will be judged according to their attitude to Him.

The rabbis also have some great sayings on charity that deserve to be remembered.
‘Whoever exercises hospitality willingly, to him belongs Paradise.’ ‘To entertain a traveller is a greater thing than to receive a manifestation of the Divine Majesty.’ ‘Whoever gives a crust to a just person, is as if he had observed the five books of the Law.’
‘Whoever visits the sick, shall be free from the judgment of Gehenna.’ ‘Imitate the deeds of God. God clothes the naked (Gn 3 21); do thou also clothe the naked. God visits the sick (Gn 18 1), do thou also visit the sick. He consoles mourners (Gn 25 11), do thou also console mourners.’

42. Ye cursed] but not of My Father. Ye are the authors of your own ruin. Prepared] not for men, but for the devil and his angels.

46. Everlasting] RV ‘eternal,’ as also in v. 41. ‘Woe to all sinners, and especially to those who have no pity. It is the man who had no pity who is banished to the fire, for instead of love he put in his heart hatred. This is the sum of all vices, and its chief manifestation is inhumanity’ (Euthymius).

The view of the present writer, the eternity of future punishment, as of future reward, is a necessary deduction from the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and is expressly affirmed in this passage. The nature of it seems by no means so certain. Probably an essential part of it will be the loss of free-will, the abuse of this faculty being punished by its loss. Future punishment will in any case exhibit God’s mercy and benevolence, as well as His justice.

CHAPTER 26

THE BETRAYAL. THE LAST SUPPER. ARREST OF JESUS, AND TRIAL BEFORE THE HIGH PRIEST

1-5. A Council is held against Jesus (Mk 14:1 Lk 22:1: cp. Jn 13:1).

2. After two days] This fixes the date as Tuesday, if the Passover was on Thursday night; or Wednesday, if, as is more probable, it was on Friday night. Is betrayed] This clear prediction is pecuiliar to St. Matthew.

3. And the scribes] RV omits. The palace] RV ‘the court,’ i.e. the central quadrangle, the house being built round a square plot of ground, like a college. From the place of meeting it may be inferred, but not with certainty, that this was not a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin. Caiaphas] in full, Joseph Caiaphas, son-in-law to Annas, was appointed high priest by the Roman procurator Valerius Gratus (Pilate’s predecessor), and therefore before 26 A.D. He was deposed by Vitellius 37 A.D. 5. Not on the feast day] RV ‘Not during the feast.’ This strongly favours the view that the Jewish Passover that year took place on Friday night. If the Passover took place on Thursday night, as many maintain, Jesus was crucified on the feast day itself, which extended from the Passover evening till sunset the next day.

6-13. Jesus is anointed in the House of Simon the Leper (Mk 14:4 Jn 12:1: see further on Jn). This incident seems in St. Matthew and St. Mark to take place on Tuesday or Wednesday evening, but the true chronology is probably given by St. John, who places it six days before the Passover. It is inserted here probably from the light it throws upon the character of Judas (see St. John’s narrative), whose treachery immediately follows in the synoptists. For a similar, but quite distinct incident, see Lk 7:36.

Some authorities (but without good reason) distinguish between this anointing and that of Jn 12:1, making altogether three anointings.

6. Simon the leper] His leprosy must have been healed, or he could not have entertained guests. The incurable character of leprosy renders it a sure conjecture that he owed his healing to Jesus. It is probably no more than a coincidence, yet it is a very singular one, that in the very similar incident in Lk 7:36, the name of the host is also Simon. This Simon was probably a near relation of the family of Lazarus.

7. A woman] i.e. Mary, sister of Lazarus (Jn). A quite untrustworthy but widely-spread tradition identifies her with the ‘sinner’ of Lk 7:37, who is (also without any sufficient reason) often identified with Mary Magdalene.

Alabaster box . . . poured it on his head] see on Lk 7:37, 38. His head] St. John says ‘his feet.’ Anointing was customary both in Jewish and Gentile feasts. The Talmud says, ‘The school of Shammai saith, He holds sweet oil in his right hand and a cup of wine in his left. He says grace first over the oil, and then over the wine. He blesseth the sweet oil and anoints the head of him that serves.’ Here, however, it is one who sits at meat who is anointed.

14-16. Judas betrays Jesus (Mk 14:10 Lk 22:8). The exact date cannot be fixed. It may have been as early as Sunday night, or Monday. V. 16 implies a considerable interval between the betrayal and the arrest. The paltry sum for which Jesus was betrayed (the price of a slave, Ex 21:23) has raised the question whether avarice was really the main motive of Judas. There have even been attempts to place his conduct in a favourable light, as if his desire was to bring about a rising of the people at the time of the feast, and so to constrain ‘the dilatory Messiah to establish His kingdom by means of popular violence’ (Paulus), or by the exercise of His supernatural power. This is possible, but not probable. Judas was thoroughly alienated from Jesus. He found his Master’s ideals diverging more and more widely from his own. Instead of an earthly kingdom, in which Judas hoped to hold a lucrative position, Christ seemed to be aiming at an impracticable ideal, which might, perhaps, be very beautiful, but which certainly did not seem to be a practical way of making money. He had already embezzled money from the common purse, and he could not be ignorant that he was suspected and disliked by colleagues, and that his true character had been discerned by his Master. His former trust were now turned to hatred and mpt, and in a frenzy of disappointment he betrayed Jesus. Yet, when the deed was done, there came a revulsion of feeling, and he would fain have undone it.

They covenanted with him] RV ‘they had unto him,’ in accordance with ancient form (Gn 23:16), but money was probably at period always coin, not bullion.

- 30. The Last Supper (Mk 14:12 Lk 22:7 Jn 13:21). For the order of events see on Jn, intro. to c. 21. The question whether the Supper was the Jewish Passover or not, scussed in a note on Jn 18:28, where it is ed that Jesus, knowing that He would be tried on Friday, celebrated the Passover on sday evening, a day before the legal time. t the Jewish Passover did not take place Friday evening (after the crucifixion) is plainly from the Fourth Gospel (see socially Jn 18:28), and even in the Synoptic pels, which at first sight give an opposite reas, there are sufficiently clear indicat that this was the case. The chief are.

The purpose of the priests not to take execute Jesus during the festival, lest a ult should arise (265 RV). (2) It was try to custom to hold trials and execute ninals on the first and holiest day of the st, which was kept as a sabbath. (3) The st day would not be called simply ‘Prepara i.e. Friday. (4) The officers and the ciples would not have carried arms on the at day. (5) Joseph of Arimathea would have bought a linen cloth, or the women prepared spices on that day (Mk 15:46:23:26).

17. The first day of . unleavened bread] As, according to St. Mark and St. Luke, this was a day on which the Passover lambs were slaughtered, it must mean the day before the Passover (Jewish reckoning), i.e. from sunset Thursday to sunset on Friday. The last supper was held on Thursday evening, and the mbs were killed at 3 p.m. on Friday, but that could be on the same day, according to Jewish ideas.

In strict usage ‘the first day of unleavened bread’ meant the first day of the Passover rdal, which began with the paschal supper, but it is possible that the day before this, when the paschal lambs were sacrificed, and all leaven was expelled from the houses, was popularly known as the ‘first day of unleavened bread.’

The disciples came to Jesus] at or after sunk on Thursday, and within an hour or two be necessary preparations for the supper were complete. Where wilt thou that we prepare] For they might anywhere; since the houses at Jerusalem were not to be hired, but during the time of the feast, they were of common right (J. Lightfoot). The rabbis say, ‘It is a tradition that houses were not let for hire at Jerusalem, because they were not privately owned, nor were beds, but the householder received from his guests as a recompense, the skins of the animals sacrificed.’ To eat the Passover] The Last Supper is here called ‘the Passover,’ because in many respects it resembled it. It is not, however, certain that there was a lamb. Jesus Himself was the Lamb, and, as He intended to supersede the type by the reality, it was not absolutely necessary for the type to be present.

The paschal lamb was slain in the court of the Temple on the afternoon of the 14th Nisan, and was eaten the same evening after sunset, when the 15th Nisan had already begun: see Ex 12, etc.

18. The Master said] It is clear that the man was a disciple, so that here is another synoptic proof of a previous ministry of Jesus at Jerusalem. St. Mark and St. Luke here add additional details to the narrative, implying a miraculous gift of foresight on our Lord’s part. My time is at hand] The disciple would doubtless be surprised at the proposal of Jesus to keep the Passover a day before the legal time. The apostles were therefore instructed to give the reason: ‘My time is at hand,’ i.e. My death will happen before the legal time of the Passover arrives.

20. He sat down] RV ‘He was sitting at meat,’ or, rather, ‘reclining.’ For the attitude at table, see on Jn 13:22. The Law (Ex 12:11) required the Passover to be eaten standing, but this was no longer observed: The Talmud says, ‘It is the custom of slaves to eat standing, but now let them eat reclining, that it may be discerned that at the exodus they went out from slavery into freedom.

23. He that dippeth] RV ‘He that dipped’ (Ps 41:9). St. John describes this incident in much fuller detail.

24. It had been good] A popular expression. The rabbis said, ‘Whoever knows the Law and does it not, it were better for him never to have been born.’ ‘If a man does not attend to the honour of his Creator, it were better if he had not come into the world.' The justice of Judas’s punishment, seeing that the betrayal of Jesus was predestined, has been much discussed. The solution probably is that the betrayal by Judas was not predestined. It was morally certain that in a state of society like that in Palestine in our Lord’s time, a teacher like Jesus would be betrayed by some one, but that some one need not have been Judas. Judas was rightly punished because he freely took the evil business upon himself. For the probable reasons why Jesus chose Judas to be an Apostle, see on Jn 6:71.

25. Master] RV 'Rabbi.' Thou hast said] i.e. Yes: a rabbinical idiom never found in the OT.

After v. 25 the evangelist probably (though not certainly) intends it to be understood that Judas at once withdrew (see v. 47), thus agreeing with St. John, who also represents the traitor as leaving before the institution of the Holy Sacrament. In St. Luke Judas appears to be present and to receive the Sacrament, but that is probably because the third Gospel does not relate the events in order: see on Lk and on Jn 13:30.

26–30. Institution of the Lord's Supper (Mk 14:22 Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:22). It is not certain how far Jesus at the Last Supper followed the customary Passover ritual, but it is clear that He did so to some extent. The following gives the usual order of proceedings, omitting a few details:

1. The first cup was blessed and drunk. 2. The wine in it was mingled with water, and it was blessed. 3. It was crowned, i.e. the worshippers stood round it in a ring; 4. The householder veiled his head and sat down; 5. He drank it, holding it with both hands.

That the cup of the Christian sacrament was also mingled with water, was indicated by Jesus Himself, when He called it 'this fruit of the vine.' The Talmud says, 'The rabbis have a tradition. Over wine which hath not water mingled with it they do not say the blessing. "Blessed be He that created the fruit of the vine," but, "Blessed be He that created the fruit of the tree."' And it is added, 'The wise agree with Rabbi Eleazar, that one ought not to bless over the cup of blessing till water be mingled with it.'

28. My blood of the New Testament] RV 'my blood of the covenant.' This is a clear proof that Jesus regarded His death as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of the world, and, therefore, as altering the relation of the whole human race to God. As Moses had once made a covenant with God by the blood of victims sprinkled on the people (Ex 24:9), so now Jesus by His own blood made a new and better covenant.

Shed for many] i.e. probably 'for mankind,' stress being laid on their multitude.

29. I will not drink henceforth, etc.] (Mk 14:25 Lk 22:18). These mysterious and beautiful words are a well-known 'crux' of interpreters. It seems clear, however, that they are to be taken as referring to the whole rite of the Lord's Supper, and not simply to the 'fruit of the vine,' or cup. This is evident from Lk 22:18, 'I will not any more eat thereof' (viz. of the Christian Passover or Supper) until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.' Interpretations fall into two main classes, according as 'the kingdom of God' ('My Father's kingdom') is understood to refer to the period after the Resurrection, or to the period after the Judgment. According to the first interpretation, the sacred rite which Jesus now institutes, and which He will not again celebrate until He has triumphed death and sat down a conqueror on the e of His Father's kingdom, will, after sion, and especially after the descent Spirit, be to the disciples a new thing.
will be to the disciples a new thing. The shadow of disappointment and failure meetings. The sun of the world will have been stoned will have been conquered, the Spirit have been given, and Jesus will be present in the feast, not as now, in the body of His iliation, but in the power of His risen and cous life. According to the other interpretation, the Lord's Supper is regarded as a type prophecy of the eternal marriage supper of Lamb (Rev 19). These two views do not ade one another. The title 'this fruit of Chicago' which Jesus applies to the sacred cup after consecration, would seem to exclude medieval doctrine of Transubstantiation.

ST. MATTHEW 26. 30

(1) Although some earnest believers have seen in the Lord's Supper nothing but a bare commemoration of the Lord's death, yet the great majority of Christians in all ages have believed that, attached to devout and reverent participation in the rite, is a special covenanted blessing, which cannot (ordinarily at least) be obtained in any other way, and which is necessary for the nourishment and growth of the spiritual life. Such a view seems clearly to underlie the statement of St. Paul (1 Cor 10:16), that 'the cup of blessing which we bless' is to the faithful communicant 'the communion,' i.e. the partaking in common with others, 'of the blood of Christ,' and 'the bread which we break,' 'the communion of the body of Christ.'

(2) The covenanted blessing is generally conceived as a special realisation of the union between the believer and his Saviour, as suggested by our Lord's own allegory of the Vine and the Branches (Jn 15) spoken immediately after the institution, and by that of the Bread of Life (Jn 6), which was intended to prepare the way for it. It is specially true at the Table that 'Christ dwells in our hearts by faith,' 'we are one with Christ and Christ with us,' 'we dwell in him and he in us,' and He is in us the fountain of life, sanctification, and cleansing.

(3) The primary reference of the rite is to the death of Christ. The 'broken body' and 'shed blood' symbolise the atoning death upon the cross. It is implied that those who with faith and due thankfulness approach the Table, 'obtain remission of their sins, and all other benefits of his passion.'

(4) At the same time the reference is not exclusively to Christ's death. He does not say 'Do this in remembrance of my death,' but 'Do this in remembrance of me,' i.e. of all that I am to Christians;—of My incarnation, resurrection, and ascension, as well as of My death. To the early Christians the rite was very largely a memorial of the Resurrection, and as such was regularly celebrated on the first day of the week (Ac 20:7).

(5) Accordingly in the Supper it is with the ascended and glorified Lord that the Christian holds communion. While commemorating the tragedy of Calvary he communes with Him who 'is alive for evermore, and has the keys of hell and of death' (Rev 1:18). He joins in the heavenly worship of 'the Lamb as it had been slain,' who, in recompense for His humiliation, is now endowed with almighty power (Rev 5).

(6) There is some difference of view among believing Christians as to how the scriptural expressions, eating and drinking Christ's flesh and blood (Jn 6:58), or Christ's body and blood (1 Cor 10:16), are to be understood. Many think that Christ is present in the ordinance only according to His divine nature, and that He communicates to believers not His actual body and blood, but only the benefits which the offering of these upon the Cross procured for mankind. Others, however, interpreting our Lord's mysterious words in a more literal sense, are of opinion that Christ is present in the ordinance not only in His Deity, but also in His glorified humanity, and that in some spiritual and ineffable, but still most real manner, He imparts to believers not only His Godhead, but also His Manhood, making them partakers, not in figure only, but verily and indeed, of His sacred body and blood.

We are here in the presence of very deep mysteries, of which we should speak with awe and reverence, remembering how very limited our faculties are.

(7) The Supper is a memorial rite, 'this do in remembrance of me;' more literally, 'as my memorial' (Lk 22:19, 1 Cor 11:24). Some have regarded it as a memorial before man only, but the prevailing opinion among Christians is that it is a memorial also before God, a pleading before the Father of the merits of the precious death of His Son. The word used (anamnesis) is a rare one, and in biblical Greek means uniformly a memorial before God, both in the OT. (see e.g. Lv 24:7 LXX), and in the NT. (Heb 10:9). There is good reason, therefore, for thinking that this may be the meaning here.

Note. At this point must be inserted Jn 14-17.

31-35. Jesus predicts His Death, the scattering of the disciples, the fall of Peter, and His own Resurrection (Mk 14:27 Lk 22:31 Jn 13:38).

31. I will smite] freely adapted from Zech 13:7, a strictly Messianic passage. The quotation is intended to alleviate the scandal of the disciples' conduct, by showing that it was foretold. 32. Peter answered] 'He ought rather to have besought Christ, and begged for aid (against the coming temptation). But he sinned in three ways at once: (1) in contradicting the Prophet and the Christ, (2) in placing himself above the rest, (3) in trusting in himself alone, and not in the help of God. Wherefore also he was permitted to fall, that he might be humbled, and might learn not to trust too much in himself, and that others also might learn the same. Also he was allowed to fall that he might learn to love more. For he to whom more is forgiven, loves more' (Euthymius). 34. Before the cock crow] i.e. before the day begins to dawn. There is practically no difference of meaning between this and 'before the cock crow twice' (Mk), for when the cock once begins to crow in the morning, he does so at frequent intervals. The rabbis say, 'They do not keep cocks at Jerusalem on account of the holy things (which they might pollute); nor do the priests keep them throughout all the land of Israel.' But this law was clearly not enforced. 36-46. The Agony in the Garden (Mk 14:32 Lk 22:43). The peculiar intensity of Christ's agony at Gethsemane presents a difficult problem. It cannot have been due to fear of death, for He came to Jerusalem expressly to die, and never faltered in His resolve, nor is the foreseen flight of the disciples, the treachery of Judas, the denial of Peter, and the sin of the Jewish nation in rejecting and crucifying Him, sufficient to account for it. Perhaps the explanation is to be found in the mystery of the Atonement. He was to bear the sins of the whole world, and the thought of that awful burden oppressed Him. 'The Lord felt the bitterness of death, He tasted it as the wages of sin; and this alone is the bitterness of death—not His own, but so much the profounder and keener as the sin of the whole world' (Dale).

The best commentary on Gethsemane is Heb 5:7. Important additional details are found in St. Luke's Gospel (Western text).

36. Gethsemane] lit. 'oil-press.' On the W. slope of Olivet, near the foot. 'It is now' (says Sir C. W. Wilson) 'a small enclosure surrounded by a high wall. The ground is laid out in flower-beds, which are carefully tended by a Franciscan monk; but the most interesting objects are the venerable olive-trees, which are said to date from the time of Christ, and which may in truth be direct descendants of trees which grew in the same place at the time of the crucifixion.' The gardens of Jerusalem were outside the city, because it was forbidden to plant a garden within the walls.

37. Peter, etc.] In this hour of agony He clung to the companionship of His closest friends, to whom also, as spectators of the glory of the Transfiguration, His present humiliation would be less of a stumbling-block. And very heavy] RV 'and sore troubled.' 39. Let this cup] i.e. not merely His death, but all that was implied in bearing the sins of the world in His own body on the tree: cp. 20:32. The prayer, 'Let this cup pass,' was not sinful, because it was accompanied by the resolution to submit to the divine will, whatever it was. Not as I will] As Christ was God and man, there were in Him two wills, a human will and a divine will, and the former did not always conform itself to the latter without an inward struggle: cp. Jn 5:50 6:38.

40. Asleep] 'You promised to die with me, and could you not watch with me one hour?' (Euthymius). 41. Temptation] i.e. the temptation to forsake and deny Christ. 44. The time] not a ‘vain repetition,’ but a ition of intense earnestness. In great men do not frame many words, but say ame words many times. 45. Sleep on spoken with reproachful irony, ‘You lept through My agony. Sleep also ugh My betrayal and capture.’ 46. Let
- going] i.e. not to escape, but to meet etrayer.
56. Jesus is taken [Mk 14:42 Lk 22:47 Jn
: see further on Jn.
. From the chief priests] These are the ple guard of Levites, sent by the Sanhedrin.
john mentions that Roman soldiers were present. 48. Kiss] ‘It was not unusual master to kiss his disciple; but for a ple to kiss his master was more rare’ (J. tfoot).
. Hail, master] RV ‘Hail, Rabbi.’ ised] a different word; ‘Kissed and aced him effusively.’ Jesus received the
1. to soften the heart of Judas by His lenes, if that were possible; (2) in the is of St. Hilary, ‘to teach us to love our ies, and those whom we know to be against us.’
2. Friend, wherewith art thou come?] RV end, do that for which thou art come,’ ads, ‘Betrayest thou the Son of man with ? ’ Here follows in St. John a dialogue en Jesus and those who came to seize
; after which they all fell to the ground.
1. One of them] The synoptic tradition presses the name, probably to ensure the ity of Peter. St. John alone mentions it was Peter, with whose character the fully accords. His sword] see Lk 22:38.
3. servant] RV ‘the servant’ (‘slave’).
name was Malchus (Jn). St. Luke alone
ments that Christ healed him.
52. All they that take the sword, etc.] op.
13:10. This incident is a practical com-ary on the third Beatitude (54). It ourages resort to violence on the part ist’s followers, and recommends instead m endurance of injuries. Peace, not , is their mission. Another interpretahas been given, ‘All they that take the ord,’ i.e. rashly and on their own authority, all perish by the sword,’ i.e. are worthy to ish by the sword, i.e. the sword of the istrator. So that Christ here renews the cept given to Noah, ‘Whoso sheddieth man’s ood, by man shall his blood be shed’ (Gen 9:6).
55. I sat daily] This cannot merely refer the two, or at most three days’ ministry ring Holy Week, but indicates a more nded ministry at Jerusalem at an earlier
, as the Fourth Gospel relates.
57-58. Trial before Caiaphas (Mk 14:55 Lk 234). The synoptists omit the preliminary amination before Anns recorded by Jn, because it led to nothing. St. John omits the ial before Caiaphas, because it had already been recorded. From St. Matthew and St. ark it might be thought that the trial took place immediately after the arrest, but St.
uke, whose narrative is here independent, akes it clear that there was a considerable ternal, during which the rest of the members of the Sanhedrin were summoned. The chief enemies of Jesus had not gone to bed, and were already assembled. It was necessary to wait for the morning (Lk 22:60), because it was ulawful to try capital offences at night.
There was, however, very little attempt on the part of the Jewish authorities to preserve even the forms of a legal trial. The time of the trial would be about 4 A.M.

The following account of the judicial procedure of the Sanhedrin in capital cases is bridged from Schürer, who follows the Mishna. The members of the court sat in a emi-circle. A quorum of 23 was required.
In front of them stood the two clerks of the court, of whom the one on the right hand recorded the votes for acquittal, and the one on the left hand the votes for condemnation.
The ‘disciples of the wise’ (pupils of the scribes) occupied three additional rows in front. It was required to hear the reasons for acquittal first (a regulation violated in the case of Jesus) and afterwards the reasons for condemnation. The ‘disciples of the wise’ could speak, but only in favour of the prisoner.
Acquittal could be pronounced on the day of the trial, but condemnation not till the following day (this regulation also was violated, though some suppose that there were two meetings, one on Thursday night, the other on Friday morning to render the proceedings technically legal). Each member stood to give his vote, and voting began with the youngest member. For acquittal a simple majority sufficed; for condemnation a majority of two was necessary.

Was the assembly which condemned Jesus
a regular and formal meeting of the Sanhedrin?
Ederheim denies it, because ‘All Jewish order and law would have been grossly fringed in almost every particular, if this had been a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin.’
But the case of Stephen shows how little the Sanhedrin cared for order and law, when it was really angry. A stronger argument is drawn from the place of meeting, which was apparently the high priest’s palace, though none of the evangelists expressly say so, and Lk 22:60 possibly suggests the contrary.
This was certainly not the proper place for the Sanhedrin to meet, but we are not in a position to say that at this time such a meeting-place was impossible or even unlikely. The legal place of meeting was

'Hall of Hewn Stones') which was on the Temple mount, and probably within the Temple enclosure. But the Mishna says that forty years before the fall of Jerusalem the Sanhedrin removed to the 'booths,' or 'shops.' Whether these booths were in the Temple, or in Jerusalem, or on the Mt. of Olives, is uncertain, but if such an irregularity as meeting in the 'booths' was possible, so also was that of meeting in the high priest's house.

58. Unto the . . . palace] RV 'unto the court' (i.e. quadrangle) 'of the high priest'; see on v. 3. The servants] RV 'the officers.'

59. Sought false witness] That the judges sought witnesses at all, much less false witnesses, is enough to condemn them to perpetual infamy.

61. I am able to destroy] At the worst this was a boastful remark, and could not be made the basis of a capital charge. This incident strikingly confirms the accuracy of the discourses recorded in the Fourth Gospel, which alone records this saying of Christ (Jn 2:19).

The false witnesses distorted the saying. Christ did not say 'I am able to destroy,' but 'Destroy this temple,' i.e. 'If you destroy this temple.'

63. I adjure thee by the living God] Jesus consents to be put on His oath, thus declaring oaths before a magistrate to be lawful. The Christ, the Son of God] The high priest asks not merely whether He is the Messiah, but whether He is a divine Messiah. To claim to be the Messiah whom all good Israelites were expecting, was no crime, but to claim to be the Son of God, in the sense of God's equal, was blasphemy. Here the synoptists again strongly confirm the peculiar features of the Fourth Gospel, for how did the high priest know or suspect that Jesus claimed to be divine, unless Jesus had publicly said so at Jerusalem, as related in the Fourth Gospel? (Jn 5:17-47 8:56-59 10:43).

64. Thou hast said] Christ's exact words which St. Mark and St. Luke render by 'I am' (see 26:20). Nevertheless] better, 'moreover.' Hereafter (RV 'Henceforth') ye shall see, etc.] Jesus here makes two distinct statements: (1) That henceforth, i.e. from the Ascension onwards, His enemies will be held Him sitting on the right hand of God, and causing His Kingdom mightily to prevail over the earth, in spite of all their efforts to prevent it. (2) That they will also see Him one day coming to judgment seated on the clouds of heaven. The reference is to Dan 7:18, which was then interpreted of the Messiah.

65. Rent his clothes] The Jewish law was: 'They that judge a blasphemer first ask the witness, and bid him speak out plainly what he hath heard; and when he speaks it, the judges, standing on their feet, rend their garments and do not sew them up again.'

66. He is guilty (RV 'worthy') of death. To condemn Jesus at once, was contrary to the law, which was, 'Judgment in capital causes is passed the same day if it be for acquitting; but if it be for condemning, it is passed the day after.' The reason is, 'He delays his judgment, and lets it rest all night, that he may sift out the truth.' But Ederheim remarks, 'It seems, however, at least doubtful, whether in case of profanation of the divine name, judgment was not immediately executed.' The trial was further illegal, as being held on the eve of the Passover, for 'Let them not judge on the eve of the sabbath, or on the eve of a feast day.' After passing sentence of death the judges were bound to taste nothing the whole day. The punishment for blasphemy was stoning.

68. Prophesy] Christ was blindfolded at the time. The mockery was carried out by the 'officers' of the Sanhedrin.

The synoptists all agree that Jesus was condemned for blasphemy, i.e. for claiming more than human powers and attributes. This is inconsistent with the contention of those who maintain that Jesus merely professed to be a mere human teacher, or at most a prophet. The trial itself is enough to show that there is essential unity between the synoptists and the Fourth Gospel in their doctrine of Christ's person. The Christ of the synoptists at the last great crisis of His life makes the same tremendous claims as the Christ of St. John, and is put to death for making them.

69-75. Peter's Denials (Mk 14:65 Lk 22:44 Jn 18:15-18, 25-27). The accounts agree in all main features, but the details are difficult to harmonise exactly. All agree that Peter was three times charged with being a disciple, and three times denied it; also that a cock crew at the time of the third denial, reminding Peter of the words of Jesus. St. Luke and St. John represent Peter in a somewhat more favourable light than St. Matthew and St. Mark, for they say nothing of his cursing and swearing. St. Luke alone mentions the look of Jesus which went to the heart of Peter. St. John represents the denials as taking place in the court of Annas, the synoptists in that of Caiaphas, but perhaps both had apartments in the same building. In any case the account of St. John, who was an actual eyewitness, is to be preferred: see on Jn.

69. In the palace] RV 'in the court,' i.e. in the quadrangle.

75. Wept bitterly] 'Thou hast seen Peter's sin, see also his repentance. For to this very end were the sins and the repentances of the as written, that whenever we sin, we may ate their repentance. And Peter was ved to fall not only for the reasons men-ed before, but also that he might learn to e allowances for those that stumble, know-from his own experience what human knees is' (Euthymius).

CHAPTER 27

BEFORE PILATE. THE CRUCIFIXION

2. Jesus delivered to Pilate (Mk 15:1 Lk Jn 18:28: see on Jn).

When the morning] Since according to St.
orce, who follows an excellent and independauthority, the trial itself did not take until it was day' (Lk 22:60), this second thing must be placed some time later in orning, considerably after cock-crowing (14). The object of the meeting, which evidently largely attended, was simply to ider how to induce Pilate to carry out the tenence, and not as some think to pronounce tenence of death, and so technically to comply the law which forbade the death sence to be pronounced on the day of the

1. Pilate] the fifth Roman procurator of asa, was appointed in 26 A.D., and held ce for ten years. He was then summoned ome to answer certain charges made inst him, and was banished to Vienna in al, where he is said to have committed suicide.
ne governor resided generally at area, but came to Jerusalem at Passover to keep order. The Sanhedrin could not fully execute Jesus without the consent of ate (Jn 18:31), and Pilate was not likely to gard seriously the purely religious charge on which Jesus had been condemned.
, therefore, altered the charge to one of ason (v. 11).

3-10. End of Judas (see Ac 1:18). The digesences of the two accounts of the end of idas are well known. In St. Matthew he ngs himself; in Acts he is killed by a fall.
St. Matthew the priests buy a field with the ood-money to bury strangers in; in Acts as himself buys a field, presumably for his purposes. It is possible by various in-ciguous conjectures to harmonise the act, the truth of the matter probably is that the stell did not care to investigate at the me so hateful a subject as the fate of the itor, and that when the Gospels came to be itten the exact circumstances could no ger be ascertained.

3. When he saw that he was condemned his somewhat favour the view that Judas d not intend by betraying Jesus to cause His ath. But it is more probable that the meek anceour of the Sufferer at His arrest and ing His trial, brought about a revulsion of feeling in Judas, who now detested himself for what he had done. 'This is the way of the devil.

Before we sin, he suffers us not to see the evil of it, lest we should repent. But after the sin is done, he suffers us to see it, to cause us remorse, and to drive us to despair' (Euthymius). Repted himself] Yet his sorrow was not of a godly nature (2 Cor 7:9), for it led to despair, and further sin. 4. What is that?] His wicked companions in crime desert him when the crime is done. 5. In the temple
RV 'into the sanctuary,' i.e. into the holy place.
Judas in his recklessness and despair penetrated where no one but the priests had a right to enter, or, it may be, standing outside the holy place, flung the money violently through the door. 6. It is not lawful] An argument from Dt 23:18. The treasury] lit. 'the Corbanas,' so called because what was placed in it was 'Corban,' i.e. given to God: see Jn 8:20.

The potter's field] The potter probably used to obtain clay from it. 8. The field of blood (Heb. Aceldama] In Acts it receives its name from the death of Judas in it.

9. By Jeremy the prophet] This quotation, really from Zech 11:12,13 (q.v.), is ascribed Jeremiah, because Jeremiah stood first in the book of the Prophets, from which it was ; the order being Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the Twelve Minor Prophets. The passage is paraphrased rather than quoted.

This explanation is due to J. Lightfoot, who quotes 'a tradition of the rabbis.' 'This is the order of the prophets. The book of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings (former prophets), Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the Twelve (latter prophets).' Other explanations are, a lape of the evangelist's memory; the word Jeremiah due not to the evangelist but to the first transcriber, who was thinking of Jer 18:2; an oral or traditional utterance ascribed to Jeremiah; a quotation from a lost work of Jeremiah.

And they took] or, 'I took.' Whom they RV 'whom certain,' RM 'or, whom they ed on the part of the sons of Israel.'

10. And gave] RM 'and I gave.'

11-26. Trial before Pilate] (Mk 15: Lk 23:1-7 give practically the same account. St. Luke and St. John are independent of one another and of the others. All give a substantially harmonious account of the trial. Peculiar to St. Matthew was the dream of Pilate's wife, the washing of Pilate's hands, and the cry of the people, 'His blood be on us and on our children.' Peculiar to St. Luke are the exact formulation of the political charges (viz.
stirring up rebellion against Caesar refusing to pay tribute to Caesar, i.e. to be Christ or king), and the Herod.

The peculiarities of St. John are many (see on Jn.). The chief are the conversations between Pilate and Jesus, Pilate's merciful purpose in scourging Jesus, and the final cry which overcame Pilate's resistance, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend.'

Pilate does not appear at the trial in an altogether unfavourable light. He is not without a rude sense of justice. He shrinks from the guilt of innocent blood, and finally yields only to the fear of being accused at Rome of disloyalty if he exasperates too much the Jewish leaders. Pilate shows his truly Roman contempt for the Jews, his superstition, and, what often goes with superstition, his shallow scepticism. He was, however, genuinely impressed with Jesus, which shows that he was not without religious susceptibility.

11. Thou sayest] i.e. 'I am.' But Jesus explained to Pilate privately that His kingdom was not of this world (Jn). Here, as so often, the Fourth Gospel alone renders the narrative clearly intelligible. 15. At that feast] This is the only evidence of such a custom, which is, however, appropriate to the season of the Passover, which commemorates a deliverance.

17. Barabbas] Some ancient authorities have here the interesting reading 'Jesus Barabbas,' which may really have been the man's full name. The people may have preferred him to Christ because he had led a rebellion against Rome, whereas Christ had said, 'Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's.' The two thieves probably belonged to his company.

19. His wife] In tradition her name is given as Procla, or Claudia Procula, and she is said to have been inclined to Judaism, or even to have been a proselyte, and afterwards to have become a Christian. In the Greek Church she is canonised. From the time of Augustus the wives of provincial governors commonly accompanied their husbands.

20. The multitudes were not unfriendly, until the chief priests used their influence against Jesus.

24. Washed his hands] A piece of Jewish symbolism (see Dt 21:6) adopted by Pilate to make himself intelligible to the multitude.

I am innocent] It was customary for Gentile judges to protest 'before the sun' that they were innocent of the blood of the person about to be condemned.

25. His blood be on us] A cry of blind and vindictive rage. They care not who bears the blame, so that Jesus be put to death. There is tragic irony in this unconscious prophecy, which was fulfilled in two ways. (1) As a curse upon the unbelieving part of the nation, on whom the blood of Jesus was avenged at the destruction of Jerusalem. (2) As a blessing upon believers, on whom the blood of Jesus came for sanctification, and the remission of sins: cp. Jn 11:50.

26. Scourged] in accordance with the Roman custom before crucifixion. The culprit was stripped and tied in a bending posture to a pillar, or stretched on a frame, and the punishment was inflicted with a scourge made of leathern thongs, weighted with sharp pieces of bone or lead. Criminals sometimes died under it. According to St. John, Pilate scourged Jesus to move the Jews to pity.

27–30. Jesus is mocked by the Roman soldiers (Mk 15:16 Jn 19:1). 27. Common hall] RV 'palace': see on Jn 18:28. But the expression may mean 'barracks.' The whole band] RM 'cohort': about 600 men: see on Jn 18:5,12. 28. Stripped him] RM 'Some ancient authorities read, clothed Him.' The latter is probably right. He had been stripped previously for scourging. A scarlet (or purple) robe] an emblem of royalty. The reed was to represent a sceptre.

31–34. He is led to the Cross (Mk 15:30 Lk 23:26 Jn 19:16). The cross was regarded as the most horrible and most degrading form of punishment, fit only for slaves. 'It is an outrage for a Roman citizen to be bound: a crime for him to be scourged. It is almost parricide to have him put to death. What can I call having him crucified? No word can be found adequate to describe so monstrous a proceeding' (Cicero). Crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment. It originated among the Phoenicians, from whom it passed to the Greeks and Romans. Alexander the Great once crucified 2,000 Tyrians. After the death of Herod the Great, Varus crucified 2,000 rioters. The crucifixion of Jesus was unconsciously avenged by the Romans, who, after the fall of Jerusalem, crucified so many Jews that there was neither wood for the crosses nor room to set them up. The cross consisted of two parts, a strong stake or pole 8 or 9 ft. high, which was fixed in the ground, and a movable cross-piece (patibulum), which was carried by the criminal to the place of execution. Sometimes the patibulum was a single beam of wood, but more often it consisted of two parallel beams fastened together, between which the neck of the criminal was inserted. Before him went a herald bearing a tablet on which the offence was inscribed, or the criminal himself bore it suspended by a cord round his neck. At the place of execution the criminal was stripped and laid on his back, and his hands were nailed to the patibulum. The patibulum, with the criminal hanging from it, was then hoisted into position and fastened by nails or ropes to the upright pole. The victim's body was supported not only by the nails through the hands, but by a small piece ood projecting at right angles (sedile), on which he sat as on a saddle. Sometimes there also a support for the feet, to which the nails were driven. The protracted agony of fixation sometimes lasted for days, death caused by pain, hunger, and thirst, as was crucified on a cross with four arms (immisca), as is proved by a title being fixed over his head.

The Seven Words from the Cross

1. 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23:34).
2. 'Verily I say unto thee, To day shalt thou be with me in paradise' (Lk 23:34).
3. 'Woman, behold thy son! Behold thy mother!' (Jn 19:26, 27).
4. 'My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt 27:46; Ps 22:1).
5. 'I thirst' (Jn 19:28).
6. 'It is finished' (Jn 19:30).
7. 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23:46; Ps 31:5).

2. As they came out of the city, exultations being forbidden within the walls (1 K 21:15; Ac 7:58; Heb 13:12). Up to this point Jesus had carried His own cross (pati-um): see Jn 19:17. The tradition that Jesus fainting under the cross is probably (e.g., Mk 15:23). He had been greatly taxen by the scourging. Simon if Simon was coming from working in the fields (Mk, Lk), this is another indication that the Feast of the Passover had not yet begun. It was probably a Jew resident in Jerusalem, born at Cyrene in Libya (N. Africa) there were many Jews. The Cyrenians are a synagogue in Jerusalem (Ac 6:9). Simon afterwards became a Christian (Mk 15:21; cp. 16:13).

Compelled] see on 541. Here is to be included Christ's address to the daughters of Jerusalem (Lk 23:28), among whom, tradition says, was Berenice, or Veronica, a pious woman Jerusalem, who gave Him her kerchief, or pina, that He might wipe the drops of agony from His brow. The Lord accepted her offer, and, after using it, handed it back to her, arming the image of His face miraculously impressed upon it. This napkin, it is alleged, is now in St. Peter's at Rome, but possession is claimed also by Milan, and Jaen in Spain. The legend of Veronica is unhistorical, but interesting from its wide diffusion.

33. Golgotha (Aramaic), or Calvary (Latin), means 'a skull.' It received its name either from the place of execution, or from being an eminence shaped like a skull. It was certainly not a 'mountain,' as it has been popularly called since the 5th cent. although close by the garden in which Jesus was buried (Jn.), and there is no reason why the traditional site (which lies within the Church of the Holy Sepulchre) should not be the true one. The traditional site, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, has lately been proved to lie beyond the second wall, which was the outside wall at the date of the Crucifixion, and several rock tombs have been found about it. It was near a road. It may therefore have been the site (Dr. G. A. Smith). Similarly Sir C. Warren.

34. Vinegar (RV 'wine'). mingled with gall] Mk 'wine mingled with myrrh': see Ps 69:21. Pious women of Jerusalem were accustomed to offer to condemned criminals a draught of wine and myrrh just before their execution, to stupefy them. The editor of the Gk. Matthew, not understanding the custom, and thinking that the myrrh was added to make the cup bitter and distasteful to Jesus, has rendered it 'gall,' seeing in the incident a fulfillment of Ps 69:21. Tasted] Jesus tasted it, in acknowledgment of the kindness of the women who offered it, but would not drink it, because He would die for the sins of the world with all His faculties of mind unimpaired.

35. Crucified him] It is important to notice, as bearing upon the question of the reality of Christ's death and resurrection, that the feet were nailed as well as the hands. Even if Christ was not quite dead, the nailing of the feet would effectively prevent His leaving the tomb to appear to the apostles: see Lk 24:40. The time of the crucifixion was the third hour according to St. Mark, but after the sixth hour according to St. John: see on Jn 19:14.

Parted his garments] At this time the criminals' clothes were the perquisites of the executioners. That it might be fulfilled] This reference to Ps 22:18 is omitted by RV: see on Jn 19:28, 24.

37. The variations of the inscription on the cross are unimportant. St. John alone states that it was written in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew.

38. Thieves] RV 'robbers,' i.e., brigands, as distinguished from thieves: see on Lk. 39. Passed by] The reference to the passengers along the roads is another indication that this was a working day, not the Passover.

40. Thou that destroyest the temple (RV 'sanctuary')] They called upon Him to perform what He was actually about to do, for the temple was His body: see Jn 21:1.

43. He trusted in God] Ps 22:8. The action of the judges in jeering at the sufferings of the man they had condemned to death, is indecent and brutal. Their misuse of the words of Scripture is blasphemous.

45. From the sixth hour (noon) Jesus had now been about three hours on the cross (Mk 15:24).

Darkness over all the land (or, 'earth') The chief, if not the only, historical objection to this darkness, of Josephus.
But Josephus is silent, not only as to this, but as to almost every event connected with Christianity. Whether as a coincidence, or as a miracle, the fact of the darkness must be received, for the oldest tradition is unanimous on the point. The theory of an eclipse is impossible, as the moon was at the full. The apocryphal Gospel of Peter says, ‘And it was midday, and darkness covered all the land of Judea. And many went about with lamps thinking that it was night, and they fell. Then the sun shone out, and it was found to be the ninth hour.’

46. Eli, Eli, etc.] Ps 22. It is not certain whether Jesus spoke in Hebrew or Aramaic, for most MSS contain a mixture of both.

These words are a cry of the human nature of Jesus, which alone could suffer desertion, when He experienced the bitterness of death. They may serve to comfort Christian men and women when they experience the greatest of all trials, the temporary withdrawal of the consciousness of God’s presence. But a deeper meaning is also to be sought. Upon the cross Jesus was making atonement for the sins of the world, ‘bearing our sins in his own body on the tree,’ for upon Him was laid ‘the iniquity of us all.’ He was so closely identified with the race which He came to save, that He felt the burden of its sin, and cried as the Representative of Humanity, ‘My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?’

‘The Lord was forsaken, that we might not be forsaken; He was forsaken that we might be delivered from our sins and from eternal death; He was forsaken that He might show His love to us, and manifest to us His justice and His pity; that He might attract to Himself our love, in short that He might exhibit to us a pattern of patience. The way to heaven lies open, but it is steep and difficult. He willed to go before us with an example full of wonder, that the way might not alarm us, but that the stupendous example of a suffering God might incite us’ (St. Cyprian).

47. Calleth for Elias] RV ‘calleth Elijah.’ ‘No Jew could have mistaken Eli for the name of Elijah, nor yet misinterpreted a quotation of Ps 22:1 as a call for the prophet’ (Edersheim). ‘The Jews said this in mockery, having many stories of appearances of Elijah to rescue men from peril of death’ (Wetstein).

48. Vinegar] i.e. peora, the sour common wine drunk by the Roman soldiers. Whatever may have been the sentiments of the bystanders, the motive of the man who offered the vinegar was compassion. The Fourth Gospel alone gives the reason of the act. It was our Lord’s fifth word, ‘I thirst’ (Jn 19:28).

49. Here many ancient authorities insert an account of the spear-thrust mentioned in Jn 19:34. It is remarkable that the interpolation (if such it is) mentions the spear-thrust before the death of Jesus, and not after it, as in St. John.

51. The veil of the temple] Two veils, a cubit apart, hung before the Holy of Holies. They are said to have been 40 cubits (60 ft.) long, 20 wide, and of the thickness of the palm of the hand. Both were rent. Josephus, for obvious reasons, does not record this event.

The significance of the rending of the veil is variously understood. Some see in it a sign that the old covenant was at an end, the sacrifices abolished, and the divine presence withdrawn from the Temple, even the Holy of Holies being now made common ground, open to the feet of all. Others who regard the Holy of Holies as a type of heaven, and the rest of the Temple as a type of earth, see in the rending of the veil the removing of the barrier between heaven and earth, the reconciling of God and man through the death of Christ: cp. Heb 10:19, 20.

‘The earth did quake] Probably to be connected with the rending of the veil. ‘In the Gospel (according to the Hebrews) we read that the lintel of the Temple of infinite size was broken and divided. Josephus also relates that the angelic powers, who once presided over the Temple, then together cried out, Let us depart from these abodes’ (Jerome). The statement of Josephus, however, refers to a later period. Rocks rent] ‘It would not be right altogether to reject the testimony of travellers to the fact of extraordinary rents and fissures in the rocks near the spot’ (Alford). ‘To this day Golgotha is a proof of it, where the rocks were rent on account of Christ’ (St. Cyril of Jerusalem, 315–386 A.D.).

52. The graves were opened] i.e. by the shock of the earthquake. And many bodies of the saints, etc.] i.e. they rose, not immediately, but with Christ at His Resurrection.

This incident seems to be a pictorial setting forth of the truth that in the Resurrection of Christ is involved the resurrection of all His saints, so that on Easter Day all Christians may be said in a certain sense to have risen with Him.

54. The Son of God] RM ‘a son of God,’ i.e. a hero or demi-god, which is more suitable in the mouth of a heathen soldier. St. Luke, ‘Truly this man was righteous.’

55. Ministering] It was the custom of Jewish women to contribute to the support of famous rabbis: see on Lk 8:1-3.

56. Mary Magdalene] Most authorities women visited the tomb—Mary Magdalene, Mary mother of James, Salome (Mk), Joanna (Lk), and ‘the other women with them’ (Lk)—the fragmentary accounts of the evangelists are not very difficult to arrange in order. (1) Mary Magdalene and the other women visit the tomb immediately after the resurrection, and see one angel (Mt, Mk), or two (Lk). (2) She runs at once to Peter and John, who were probably alone at Peter’s house, and thus misses the appearance of Christ to the women recorded by St. Matthew. (3) The other women returning more leisurely are met by Christ Himself (Mt), and report what they have seen to the other apostles. (4) Mary returns to the tomb, and, after the departure of Peter and John, sees Jesus in the garden (Jn). Other arrangements of the events are also possible.

1. In the end of the sabbath] RV ‘late on the sabbath.’ Strictly speaking, the Jewish sabbath closed at sunset, but here St. Matthew, adopting the popular method of reckoning, regards the sabbath as lasting till dawn on Sunday morning. ‘Late on the sabbath’ is, therefore, between midnight and dawn on Sunday, as indeed is expressly stated. The other Mary] i.e. Mary, the mother of James. The women had come with ointment and spices (Mk, Lk) to anoint and embalm the body, either not knowing what Joseph and Nicodemus had done, or supposing that the work had been too hastily performed owing to the approach of the sabbath, which was also the feast day.

2-4. The descent of the angel, the earthquake, and the consternation of the watchers, which accompanied the resurrection, are peculiar to St. Matthew. He does not, however, state that the resurrection itself was visible, as do many of the later authorities.

5. The angel] Mk ‘a young man’; Lk ‘two men.’ In Mk and Lk the angel (or angels) appears inside the tomb. Such slight discrepancies harmonise well with the excited feelings which such a vision would be likely to produce. Minute and detailed agreement in independent narratives under such circumstances would be suspicious. Fear not ye] The words of the angel are nearly the same in St. Matthew and St. Mark, but considerably different in St. Luke, who follows an independent tradition. St. Luke, who records no Galilean appearances, naturally omits the reference to Galilee.

7. He goeth before you into Galilee] as, indeed, Jesus Himself had already promised (26:89).

9. Jesus met them] This appearance is peculiar to St. Matthew. All hail! A common Jewish salutation. ‘How do they salute an Israelite?’ ‘All hail.’

Held him by the feet] viz. to kiss them. This was not uncommon. ‘As Rabbi Janni and Rabbi Jonathan were sitting together, a certain man came and kissed the feet of Rabbi Jonathan. 'When Rabbi Akiba's wife came to him, she fell at his feet and kissed them.' Cp. 2 K 4:27. Worshipped him] now with more than merely human reverence. It is noticeable that Jesus never repelled any mark of reverence shown to Him, however profound.

10. Into Galilee] again emphasising the importance of this meeting.

The appearance to the women is not regarded by recent critics as belonging certainly to the oldest form of the tradition.

11-15. Bribery of the guards (peculiar to St. Matthew). The report of the soldiers may have had something to do with the conversion of so many priests described in Ac 6:7.

12. Chief priests] These were Sadducees, hostile to any idea of a resurrection. 12. Assembled] This was a packed, informal meeting of the Sanhedrin. 13. His disciples, etc.] A somewhat inconsistent statement, since if they were asleep, they could not know that the disciples had stolen the body. It is important, however, to notice that this fiction of the chief priests demonstrates that the tomb was empty, and that, therefore, the resurrection of Jesus was a bodily resurrection. 14. And secure you] The ordinary punishment for an offence of this kind was death (Ac 12:19), but Pilate would hardly trouble himself about what the soldiers had done while under the orders of the chief priests.

16-20. Appearance on a mountain in Galilee (peculiar to St. Matthew, but there can be little doubt that the original ending of St. Mark, which is unfortunately lost, recorded the same appearance: see Mk 16:7). It is highly probable (see on v. 16), but is incapable of strict proof, that this appearance is identical with that to five hundred brethren at once mentioned by St. Paul (1 Cor 15:8). At any rate, it is a meeting of great importance, being mentioned once by the angel and twice by our Lord (26:32 28:10). If there were five hundred living persons who could give a particular account of this incident, the rapid way in which the evangelist passes over it is in part accounted for.

16. The eleven disciples] This does not of necessity imply that no others were present, but only that the words of Jesus were mainly addressed to them. Where Jesus had appointed them] St. Matthew does not say when Jesus made this appointment, thus indicating that he does not profess to give a full account of the appearances after the resurrection. That the meeting was by appointment renders it probable that all the disciples who could possibly be brought together were present.

17. They worshipped him] Certainly with divine worship: see Jn 20:28. But some doubted] or, as the Gk. may perhaps be more correctly translated, 'but others doubted,' i.e. not the Eleven, but others who were present.

The doubt may have arisen from the change which had passed over our Lord's now glorified body (Mk 16:18 Lk 24:16 Jn 21:4), but more probably from the reason which Paley gives: 'Christ appeared first at a distance; the greater part of the company, the moment that they saw Him, worshipped, but some as yet, i.e. upon this first distant view of His person, doubted; whereupon Christ came up to them (v. 18) and spake to them, etc.' : the doubt, therefore, was a doubt only at first, for a moment, and upon His being seen at a distance, and was afterwards dispelled by His nearer approach, and by His entering into conversation with them.

18. And Jesus came] RV 'came to them,' viz. to resolve their doubt by giving them a close view of His person. It is worthy of notice that in all the appearances after the resurrection, our Lord allowed the disciples either to touch or to come into very close proximity to His risen body. His anxiety to remove all reasonable doubts as to the cardinal fact of His bodily resurrection, is especially evident in Lk 24:39 Jn 20:20 27.

All power (authority) is given] lit. 'was given,' viz. at My resurrection. 'There was given Me, says Jesus, as man, the power which I before possessed as God.' (Euthymius): cp. Eph 1:20-22, 'Human nature, which was before condemned, now sits in heaven personally united to the Divine Word, and is adored by angels. For in truth human nature which was before enslaved, now in Christ rules the Universe' (Theophylact).

The view, which dates the glorification of Christ, not from the Ascension, but from the Resurrection, is safely grounded on this passage. It is the view of St. Augustine, of most of the fathers, of Albertus Magnus, of the schoolmen, and of many modern authorities. Von Gerlach correctly says, 'The Resurrection of Jesus, and not His Ascension, was His entrance into the new eternal, divine, and heavenly life, as in it all power in heaven and upon earth was already given to Him.' Similarly Milligan, 'The glorification of Jesus began at His Resurrection, not at His Ascension,' and Westcott, 'After the Resurrection our Lord belongs already to another realm, so that the Ascension only ratifies and presents in a final form the lessons of the forty days in which it is included.'

The only really doubtful point is the locality of Christ's body during the forty days; whether it was in heaven at God's right hand (Theophylact, Milligan, Rothe, etc.), or on earth (Aquinas). In either case, the heavenly reign and glory of Christ had begun.

28. 20

\textbf{19. And teach (RV 'make disciples of') all nations, baptising them (or 'by baptising them') the clearest possible language Christ \textit{ex} \textit{sees His intention of founding a universal nation. It has sometimes been argued that the words cannot be authentic, because of subsequent unwillingness of the Church of Jerusalem, and even of Peter, to receive Gentiles converts. But the question in the Acts does not whether Gentile converts should be received, but whether they should first be circumcised. The argument against infant baptism drawn in this passage (that infants cannot be taught), and therefore should not be baptised, appears in the RV, which says that the stiles are 'to make disciples of all nations baptising them.' To Jewish hearers such words would naturally suggest infant baptism; because the idea of infant disciples or proselytes familiar to Judaism: see on 19 15-16.}

\textbf{In the name (RV 'into the name') of the Father, Son, etc] One of the leading dogmatics texts of the NT, being the nucleus around which the Catechism of the Church of Rome (50 A.D.), who has three Trinitarian statements, mentioning Father, Son, and Holy Spirit thrice in that order; it forms the basis of the earliest form of the Apostles' Creed (c. 100 A.D.); it is expressly quoted in the 'Didache' (c. 150 A.D.); and is definitely alluded to by Justin Martyr (150 A.D.). It may be doubted whether any other single text of the NT has such early and satisfactory attestation. Nor is it easy to say with such a definite Trinitarian formula before us as 2 Cor 13 14, that the baptismal formula must necessarily be later. Trinitarian doctrine and approximations to it are diffused through the whole NT. literature, and the prevalence of such a type of teaching is most naturally accounted for by supposing that it has behind it some such pregnant utterance of our Lord as the present, the meaning of which was gradually unfolded subsequently under the guidance of the Spirit. The argument from the baptismal 'into the name of Jesus' or of 'the Lord Jesus' in Acts is more plausible than strong. In no case is the actual formula given, and we cannot be sure that the author means more than that the baptisms in question were Christian baptisms. The 'Didache' (c. 100 A.D.), like Acts, speaks of Christian baptism as being into the name of the Lord Jesus, but when it comes to describe the rite in detail, prescribes the Trinitarian formula, and that only.}

\textbf{20. Teaching them] Next because it is not sufficient merely to be baptised, but it is necessary also to do good works after baptism, He said, 'Teaching them to observe all things whatever I commanded you,' not one or two only, but all my commandments. Let us tremble therefore, brethren, reflecting that if one thing be lacking in us, we are not perfect servants of Christ, for we are required to keep all.' Theophylact.

Lo, I am with you] This presence of Christ by His Spirit may be taken in the most comprehensive sense:—in His Church, to guide it into all the truth; in the assemblies of the faithful, to receive their worship, and to present their petitions to the Father; in the official acts of His ministers, as being the true High Priest and Pastor of His Church; and in the hearts of the faithful, as the source of their spiritual life and growth. The omnipresence of Christ implies His divinity.
ST. MARK

INTRODUCTION

1. Life of St. Mark. Mark, i.e. Marcus, a common Roman phenomenon, was the name by which the evangelist was usually known in Gentile and Christian circles. His original Jewish name was John (Ac 12:12). As St. Mark was the cousin of St. Barnabas, it is plausibly suggested that, like him, he was a Levite, settled in Cyprus (Col 4:10). An ancient tradition states that 'he ministered in the priesthood in Israel, being according to the flesh a Levite'; and that 'after his conversion, he amputated his finger that he might be rejected from the priesthood.' Certainly in early times he bore the title of Kolobodactylus, i.e. 'maimed in the finger,' but it is possible that the loss of his finger was due to accident or congenital malformation.

According to an unnamed ancient presbyter who lived in the apostolic age, St. Mark was not a follower of Jesus, but a convert of St. Peter. The presbyter's account is confirmed by certain indications in the NT. It is clear from the Acts that the mother of St. Mark, whose name was Mary, was living in Jerusalem not long after the crucifixion (12:12). She was a woman of some wealth, occupying her own house, and employing several servants or slaves. St. Peter probably lodged with her (12:12); at any rate, her house was used as a church, and formed an important Christian centre. St. Peter, being thus an inmate of the same house with St. Mark, was enabled to convert him, and afterwards spoke of him as 'Mark my son,' i.e. my convert (1 Pet 5:19); cp. 1 Cor 4:15.

At the time of the crucifixion St. Mark, though not a convert, was probably already an enquirer. In Mk 14:51 mention is made of a certain young man who was so much interested in the fate of Jesus, that when the arrest took place, he hastily rose at midnight and followed the procession. This picturesque but unimportant incident is recorded by no other evangelist, and since the name is suppressed, it is at least probable that the young man was St. Mark himself. If this is correct, it would appear that St. Mark, though not technically a 'hearer' of Jesus, was at least a witness of some of the events of Holy Week.

It is probable that St. Mark, as a convert of St. Peter, sympathised more with the Jewish party led by that Apostle than with the Gentile party of St. Paul. This probably gives the true explanation of the distressing incident related in Ac 13:18. Barnabas and Paul had brought Mark from Jerusalem to Antioch (Ac 12:25), and had chosen him to act as their 'minister' (i.e. ministerial assistant for such work as catechising and baptising converts, which was not ordinarily done by the Apostles in person, 1 Cor 1:14-17) on their first missionary journey (Ac 13:4). But after passing through Cyprus, Mark left them and returned to Jerusalem (Ac 13:13). The causes of this action were partly personal. St. Mark, it seems probable, resented the growing ascendancy of St. Paul over his cousin St. Barnabas, but most of all he disliked St. Paul's treatment of uncircumcised Gentiles as the equals of circumcised Jews. He therefore preferred to return to the thoroughly Hebrew Church of Jerusalem. The breach was not healed even by the Council of Jerusalem, which occurred some three or four years later. Soon after that event, when Barnabas proposed to Paul to take Mark on another missionary journey, St. Paul refused, and a warm dispute parted the two friends, St. Mark accompanying St. Barnabas to Cyprus (Ac 15:37). Ultimately, however, the breach between St. Mark and St. Paul was healed. St. Paul, writing from his prison in Rome (61 A.D.), speaks of him in affectionate terms as a companion and fellow-labourer (Philemon v. 24 Col 4:10). A few years later, writing shortly before his death (66 A.D.), he speaks of him as 'profitable to me for the ministry,' or, rather, 'profitable to me for ministering,' and bids Timothy bring him with him (2 Tim 4:11).

But it is as the companion of St. Peter that St. Mark is best known to ecclesiastical tradition. According to the apostolic presbyter before referred to, St. Mark became the 'interpreter' of St. Peter, probably after the release of St. Paul from his first imprisonment. St. Peter, in all probability, was not a very good Greek or Latin scholar. Preaching in Aramaic, he required the services of an interpreter to translate his sermons clause by clause into Greek or Latin, as the case might be, and also to conduct his correspondence. The relation of St. Mark to St. Peter as his 'interpreter' is confirmed by 1 Peter, written from Rome, where St. Peter says, 'The church that is at Babylon (i.e. Rome), elected together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus my son' (1 Pet 5:12).
After the martyrdom of St. Peter (circ. A.D.) little is known of the life of St. Mark. Addition makes him the founder and first bishop of the important Church of Alexandria. He is not spoken of as a martyr by any writer earlier than the 5th cent. He is commemorated by the Church on April 25th.

2. Authorship of St. Mark's Gospel. The exact authorship of the second Gospel by St. Mark has never been disputed in the Church. Even modern critical criticism is disposed to regard him as the author of at least the nucleus of the present Gospel. In ancient times it was sometimes alluded to as a 'memorial of Peter,' or 'Peter's Gospel,' indicating the common opinion that St. Mark did more than reproduce the substance of St. Peter's preaching. The most ancient witness is Papias, whose sayings are recorded by Irenaeus (177 A.D.), says, 'After the decease of Peter and Paul, Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, himself also delivered to us in writing the substance of Peter's preaching.' But a witness nearly as ancient, Clement of Alexandria, says, 'When Peter had preached the Word publicly in Rome, and by the Spirit had declared the gospel, his hearers, who were numerous, exhort Mark, as one who had followed him a long time, and remembered what was said, to write down his words.' Accordingly Mark composed the Gospel and circulated it among those who asked him to write it. When Peter heard of it he neither hindered nor encouraged the work.'

That the Gospel was published at Rome is attested by nearly all the ancient authorities, and is the general verdict of modern criticism. The only passage which seems to suggest a Palestinian origin is 134. In this v. the evangelist shows his special affection and solicitude for the Churches of Jerusalem by inserting a special warning to them to watch for the sign of the desecration of the Temple, and immediately upon its occurrence to flee to a place of safety. But it does not follow that the evangelist, at the time of writing, was actually in Palestine. In distant Rome his thoughts would often turn to his old home at Jerusalem and his relations and friends in the neighbourhood, and nothing is more natural than that he should insert such an affectionate warning as this verse contains.

For the history of the Gospel after publication, the probable loss of its original ending, and the authorship of the present appendix, see on 169-20.

St. Mark certainly wrote in Greek. The recent attempts to prove an Aramaic original have failed to carry conviction.

4. Contents and Character of the Gospel. The second Gospel is addressed to Gentile Christians, primarily those of Rome. This is shown by its careful explanations of Jewish customs, localities, etc., washings (73), Passover (1412), Preparation (1542); and especially of Aramaic words, 'Boanerges' (317), 'Taitha cumi' (541), 'Corban' (741), 'Ephphatha' (734), 'Bartimeus' (1046), 'Abba' (1485), 'Eloi,' etc. (1584): also by its numerous Latinisms, 'denarius' (637), 'census' (1214), 'centurio' (1550), 'quadrans' (1242), 'legio' (59), 'sextarius' (74), 'speculator' (67), 'satis facere' (1512). Significant also in this connexion is the fact that it contains no direct mention of the Law, and hardly a single quotation from the OT, except in reports of our Lord's speeches. The Gospel has little, if any, theological or party tendency. It contains few of our Lord's numerous discourses, probably because extensive collections of them already existed. Of the numerous parables it records only four: the Sower (4:3), the Seed growing secretly (4:26), the Mustard Seed (4:30), and the Wicked Husbandmen (12:1); of the great discourses only one, the prophecy of the fall of Jerusalem (13:5). Its aim is to present a graphic picture of the events of the ministry as St. Peter knew them, from the baptism to the resurrection. It deals almost entirely with the objective facts, especially the miracles of healing, which it describes with great fulness.

As compared with the parallel narratives of St. Matthew and St. Luke, St. Mark's narrative is characterised by a vividness, fulness, and wealth of detail, which seem due to the testimony of an actual eye-witness. He notices our Lord's looks and emotions, His compassion (1:41); His anger (3:5); His turning about in the throng (5:29); His sighing and looking up to heaven (7:24); His leading the blind man, spitting, and putting His hands on his eyes (8:23); His sitting down and calling the Twelve (9:5); His putting His hands on little children (10:16); His love of the young ruler (10:21). He mentions graphic details neglected by the other evangelists: the two thousand swine (5:12); the sitting down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties (6:40); the crucifixion at 'the third hour' (15:25); the sitting in the sea (4:1); the sleeping on a pillow (4:28); the sitting over against the treasury (12:41). His accounts of the healing of demoniacs are parcularly full. He evidently regarded these miracles as a special proof of Christ's Messiahian dignity.

5. Matter Peculiar to this Gospel.
The second Gospel contains only about 30 vv.
peculiar to itself. These include the parable of the seed growing secretly (4:26), the healing of the blind man at Bethsaida (8:22), and the story of the young man who fled from his pursuers (14:51).

(1) The Forerunner of Jesus (1:1-8).
(2) The baptism and temptation (1:19-19).
(3) The ministry in and near Capernaum
(1:44-54).
(4) The ministry on both sides of the Sea
(5) In the neighbourhood of Tyre and Sidon
(7:24-80).
(6) On the eastern side of the lake (7:31-8:21).
(7) At Bethsaida (8:22-26).
(9) The last journey to Jerusalem (9:30-10:22).

(11) The Resurrection (16).

7. Relation to the other Synoptic Gospels.
Since St. Mark contains hardly any matter not also contained in St. Matthew and St. Luke, he has until recent times been comparatively neglected. By the ancients he was regarded as an abbreviator of St. Matthew, and a few modern authorities have held the same view.
But at present the superior originality of St.
Mark is conceded on all hands, and it is generally admitted that the first and third evangelists derived from him all those incidents which they record in common with him.

Some critics have argued from the admitted 'priority' of St. Mark, that he alone is trustworthy, but this is a precarious inference. There is not the least evidence that the 'logia,' or collections of discourses used by St. Matthew and St. Luke are either less trustworthy or less ancient than the Second Gospel. For further information on this subject the reader is referred to art. 'The Synoptic Problem.'

8. St. Mark and the Miraculous Birth of Jesus. It is sometimes argued that, because St. Mark did not mention our Lord's birth of a virgin, he disbelieved it. But his silence is sufficiently explained by his design of record-only those facts about our Lord's life, of which St. Peter had personal experience. St.
Peter's knowledge of Jesus began at His baptism, so that St. Mark naturally began his narrative at this point. Some think that St.
Mark wrote before the miracle of our Lord's conception was generally known; others that he shows his knowledge of it in 6:2.

(The commentary on St. Mark in a work of this kind is necessarily a skeleton, because nearly the whole subject-matter has already been dealt with in the commentary on St.
Matthew. By referring, as directed, to the parallel passages in St. Matthew [and occasionally in St. Luke], the student will be able to supply whatever is deficient in the commentary on St. Mark.)

BAPTISM OF JESUS. BEGINNING OF THE MINISTRY

1-8. Appearance of John the Baptist (Mt 3:1 Lk 3:1). See on Mt and Lk. St. Mark's Gospel, being based on the reminiscences of Peter, begin with the public ministry of Jesus, or, rather, with His connexion with the Baptist, through which Peter and other apostles first became acquainted with Him. It, therefore, omits the birth narratives, although it is possible that St. Mark was acquainted with them (see on 6:3).

1. The beginning] It is clear that at first elementary preaching of the gospel by the apostles began with the baptism of Jesus by John, and that it was only subsequently, and not ini tuately, that the secret of our Lord's miraculous birth was disclosed. The tions for this prudential reserve during the gospel's lifetime are obvious. The Son of man was concealed. The quotation, however, not entirely taken from Isaiah, but partly from Malachi and partly from Isaiah 40.
The quotation from Malachi does not occur in the Synoptic tradition. Before thy face In the Heb. be not my face.' This was clearly a Christian appropriation of the passage, as seen on Mark 11.
13. Baptism of Jesus (Mark 1:9-12). See on Mark 1:10.
13. The temptation (Mark 1:12-13). See on Mark 1:11. St. Mark alone has the graphic touch
The Beast is with the wild beasts.'
14. 15. Arrest of John and beginning of the Galilean ministry (Mark 1:14-15). See on Mark 1:12-13.
16-20. Call of Simon, Andrew, James, and John (Mark 1:16-19, cp. Luke 5:1). See on Mark 1:16-18.
21-28. A demoniac healed in the synagogue of Capernaum (Luke 4:31). A striking point in this parable is the testimony of the demon to the believing Messiahship, which, however, He failed to accept. If the possession was real, the demon's confession of Christ as 'the Holy
One of God' was probably extorted by fear.
If the possession was not real, but imagined by the insane man, the confession was probably due to the man's instinctive sense that a person with supernatural powers was present, ready heal him.
22. Taught To teach with authority, as distinguished from mere exhortation, was only allowed to those who had received rabbinical ordination. Jesus was probably allowed to each, like John, as a prophet, not as a rabbi.
24. What have we, etc. The plural is generally understood to prove the actual existence of the indwelling evil spirit. At the same time, it is a well-known fact that if an insane person is the victim of a delusion, he adapts all his words and actions to accord with it. If the insane person believed that he was possessed by a devil, he would be likely to speak in the plural. The Holy One of God' see John 6.
25. It was not expedient that Christ or the apostles should receive what was generally supposed to be diabolical testimony (Mark 1:26 new doctrine ] RV 'A new teaching.' 28-34. Healing of Simon's wife's mother and others (Mark 8:14-15). See on Mark 6.
Observe St. Mark's graphic touch, and all the city was gathered together at the door.
on Mark 4:23.
35. Prayed To spend a night, or a great part of a night, in prayer, was our Lord's way of preparing for preaching (v. 38), for working miracles (v. 29), and for other important actions, such as the choice of the Twelve (Luke 6:12).
40-45. The leper cleansed (Luke 5:12). See
on Mark 1.
45. (Peculiar to Mark.) It explains the reason why Jesus so often enjoined secrecy on those who were healed. He was afraid that the popular enthusiasm would lead to political complications.

CHAPTER 2

The Sick of the Palsy

16. The scribes and Pharisees [RV 'the scribes of the Pharisees']: implying that some scribes were Sadducees, though this was rare.
18-22. The controversy on fasting (Mark 9:14
21. New cloth [RV 'undressed cloth.' Else the new piece' RV 'else that which should fill it up, taketh from it, the new from the old, and a worse rent is made.' 22. Old bottles [RV 'old wine-skins.' And the wine is spilled' RV 'and the wine perisheth and the skins: but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins.'
23-28. Plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath (Mark 1:12-15). See on Mark 1.
26. In the days of Abiathar the high priest RV 'when Abiathar was high priest.' A well-known difficulty, for Ahimelech seems to have been the high priest at this time. 'The whole expression, which occurs neither in Mark nor Luke, is omitted by a very important group of authorities, and may be an editorial note' (Swee).
If it be retained, it is not to be regarded as a mere blunder, but as a deliberate reference from the somewhat conflicting data of the OT. For whereas in 1 Samuel 21 Ahimelech appears as high priest, and is shortly afterwards slain by Saul for his friendship with David (1 Samuel 21:16), in 2 Samuel 18:16, 24-6 he appears long after his supposed death, officiating in the priesthood together with Zadok, and is represented as the son, not the father of Abiathar.
St. Mark's expression is, therefore, quite in harmony with one of the two conflicting OT accounts. Such confusions of proper names are not uncommon in the OT.

CHAPTER 3

Choice of the Twelve

1-6. The withered hand (Mark 1:29 Luke 6). See on Mark 1. 6. Herodians 1, see on Mark 12:16.
8. Idumea [The district S. of Judaea and the Dead Sea. Beyond Jordan This district, like Tyre and Sidon, was mainly Gentile, and it is possible that among those healed were some Gentiles.

13-19. Choice of the Twelve (Mt 10:2 Lk 6:12). See on Mt. 17. Boanerges The sons of Zebedee are so named from their vehement character, and perhaps also from their powerful eloquence (cp. 9:8 10:8 Lk 9:58-66). So Virgil speaks of ‘the twin Scipioae, those two thunder-bolts of war.’ The form Boanerges is corrupt and its derivation doubtful. Probably it stands for the Heb. B'ne regesh, ‘sons of tumult.’ Regesh means ‘thunder’ in Arabic, and it may have done so (though there is no clear evidence that it did) in Hebrew and Aramaic.

19-30. Christ is accused of dealings with Beelzebub (Mt 12:28). See on Mt. 19. An house perhaps Simon’s. 20. A graphic touch derived from the personal reminiscences of Peter. 21. His friends From v. 31 they appear to have been His mother and brethren. ‘There is both a logical and chronological relation between this attitude of our Lord’s family and this new phase of the opposition of the scribes. The logical relation is found in the language of the two. His family said “He is beside Himself;” the scribes said, “He is possessed by the devil himself.” It is not, however, implied at all that His family was in sympathy with the scribes, their apprehension being simply that His mind was unsettled, and that He needed to be put under restraint. This lack of human sympathy with Him led Jesus to point out the higher reality of spiritual relationship and association’ (Gould).

The Fourth Gospel agrees with the synoptists in representing the ‘brethren’ as unbelievers and altogether unsympathetic (Jn 7:5). Only their anxiety, not their unbelief, is to be attributed to the Virgin mother: see Jn 2:23.

31-35. His mother and His brethren (Mt 12:46 Lk 8:19). See on Mt, and on v. 21.

Parable of the Sower. Stilling the Tempest

1-9. Parable of the Sower (Mt 13:1 Lk 8:4). See on Mt.

10-20. The parable interpreted (Mt 13:10 Lk 8:9). See on Mt.

21-25. Further remarks upon teaching by parables (Lk 8:16-18). Omitted by Mt, who introduces these sayings in other connections, viz. Mt 5:15 7:2 10:26, which see.

21. A candle RV ‘the lamp.’ A bushel RV ‘the bushel.’ A bed RV ‘the bed.’ A candlestick RV ‘the stand.’ St. Matthew introduces this saying into the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:15). There it bids the disciples give to the world the light of a good example. Here it bids them enlighten the world by their teaching. 22. For there is nothing hid ‘Our Lord corrects a false impression which might have arisen from the mention of a mystery (v. 11). If the gospel was for a moment treated as a secret, it was so only because this temporary secrecy was essential to its successful proclamation after the Ascension. Those to whom the secret was now confided were charged with the responsibility of publishing it then’ (Swete). See further on Mt 10:26, where the saying recurs. 23. See on Mt 11:15.

24. Take heed what ye hear (AV, RV). The context, however, requires that this should be rendered ‘Understand (weigh well the meaning of) what ye hear,’ a quite possible rendering. With what measure ye mete i.e. ‘ye measure.’ ‘In that measure in which you measure your attention to My teaching, in the same measure will spiritual understanding be measured unto you’ (Euthymius). This proverb occurs in several connexions (Mt 7:2 Lk 6:46 q.v.). 25. To the diligent student of divine truth more of divine truth shall be revealed. The slothful student shall not only learn no more, but shall even forget what he already knows. In Mt 13:12 25:19, the context being different, these words have a different meaning.

26-29. The seed growing secretly (the only parable peculiar to Mk). Tatian in his Diatessaron places it immediately before the Tares. Such a position for it is suitable, but it is wrong to regard it, with Weiss, as only an imperfect and mutilated version of that parable.

The point of the parable is not so much the secret invisible energy of the seed, or divine Word, as that of the earth into which the seed falls, i.e. the moral and spiritual nature of man. The seed of Christianity will grow, because the soil into which it will fall is suitable to nourish it. The human soul is ‘naturally Christian’ (Tertullian), and Christianity is the ‘natural religion.’ Christianity can, therefore, propagate itself without human effort, and often does so.

26. A man i.e. the apostles and other preachers of the gospel. Cast seed i.e. preach the gospel by word or example. The ground i.e. the souls of men.

27. Sleep, and rise i.e. ministers of the gospel having preached the word are to pursue their ordinary employments without undue anxiety. Visible results may be slow, but the seed is sure to germinate, because the soul of man is specially fitted by God to receive it, and will by its own spiritual activity cause it at last to bear fruit. Christ does not, however, discourage due pastoral care. Though the earth brings forth of herself, this does not exclude due cultivation, and rain from heaven, and sunshine (Bengal).

28. First the blade, etc.] Therefore missionaries who have no results to show, are not to be discouraged. In India at present, few converts are made, but the seed is being sown, and the time of the harvest will come.

29. The harvest] is an earthly harvest. It is gathered in Christian lands, when a faithful pastor, after long waiting, gathers in a harvest of true penitents and genuine servants of Christ. It is gathered in heathen lands, when the hindrances to the gospel are at last removed, and the people ask for baptism. Many, however, regard 'the harvest' here as that at the end of the world.

30–32. The grain of mustard seed (Mt 13:31 Lk 13:18). See on Mt.

33. 34. Mt 13:34, 35. See on Mt 13:10–17.

35–41. Stilling the storm (Mt 8:18, 26–27 Lk 8:22). See on Mt. St. Mark's graphic details should be noticed — the other boats with Him,' v. 36, and 'the pillow (cushion) in the stern,' v. 38.

CHAPTER 5

THE GADARENE DEMONIAC. JAIRUS' DAUGHTER

1–20. The Gadarene (Gerasene) demoniac (Mt 8:28 Lk 8:26). See on Mt; Mk's account is much the fullest.

1. Gadarenes] RV ‘Gerasenes.’ 9. Mk and Lk (not Mt) state that the man called himself ‘Legion,’ because he believed himself to be possessed by numerous devils.

18–20. Our Lord thought the quiet of home life better for the man than the excitement of going about with Him. He told him to proclaim the miracle, because in this mainly Gentile district there was no danger of popular excitement. 20. Decapolis] see on Mt 4:22.

21–43. The woman with the issue, and Jairus' daughter (Mt 9:18 Lk 8:10). See on Mt.

30. Knowing that virtue (peculiar to Mk and Lk). 37. Mk and Lk (not Mt) mention that Peter, James and John witnessed this miracle. These three were also privileged to be present at the Transfiguration and the Agony in Gethsemane.

41. Talitha cumi] (peculiar to Mk). St. Mark heard from St. Peter's lips the exact Aramaic words spoken by Jesus.

CHAPTER 6

VISIT TO NAZARETH. MISSION OF THE TWELVE. EXECUTION OF THE BAPTIST. FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. WALKING ON THE SEA

1–6. Visit to Nazareth (Mt 13:44).

3. Is not this the carpenter?] Mt ‘Is not this the carpenter's son?’ Baur, Bleek, Renan, and Hilgenfeld regard St. Mark's version of this expression as a proof that he was acquainted with the Virgin Birth. ‘Mark tolerates not the paternity of Joseph even in the mouth of Nazarenos’ (Hilgenfeld). Most scholars dispute the inference.

It is not quite certain whether Jesus was a carpenter or a smith. The Greek word may mean either. According to an ancient tradition He made ploughs and yokes.

Celsius (160 A.D.) derides the mean and servile occupation of Jesus, but manual work was honoured among the Jews. ‘It is incumbent,’ said the rabbis, ‘on the father to circumcise his son, to redeem him, to teach him the Law, and to teach him some occupation.’ Rabbi Judah said, ‘Whosoever teacheth not his son to do some work, is as if he taught robbery.’ Rabbi Meir said, ‘Let a man always endeavour to teach his son an honest trade.’

5. He could there do] This expression, as presenting an apparent difficulty to faith, is more original than St. Matthew's ‘He did not there many mighty works.’ Of course the inability was moral. Jesus required faith in those who were to be healed, or in persons connected with them, and only in a very few cases waived this requirement (Jn 5:18).

He did many things] RV ‘he was much perplexed.’

Herod's conscience was uneasy.

21. High captains] RM ‘or, military tribunes, Gr. chilarches.’ Chief estates] RV ‘the chief men.’

22. The daughter of ... Herodias] Hort, relying upon only five MSS, alters this into ‘his daughter Herodias,’ a reading which is clearly the blunder of some scribe, since it violates, as Weiss says, ‘all history, all grammar, and the context.’ 27. An executioner] AVmg. ‘one of his guard.’ The word is Latin, corresponding either to speculator, ‘a watcher,’ a soldier of the bodyguard, or spiculator, ‘one armed with a javelin,’ and so an executioner.
The word often occurs in rabbinical Hebrew in the sense of an executioner.

30-44. Return of the apostles. Feeding the five thousand (Mt 14:13 Lk 9:10 Jn 6:1). See on Mt and Jn. The graphic touches in Mk should be noted: 'Come ye yourselves apart,' etc.; ‘no leisure so much as to eat’; ‘as sheep not having a shepherd’; ‘the green grass’; ‘like garden beds.’ These are reminiscences of the eyewitness Peter.

40. Ranks] i.e. groups, lit. ‘garden-beds.’

45-52. Walking on the sea (Mt 14:21 Jn 6:19). See on Mt and Jn.

53-56. Miracles in the land of Gennesaret (Mt 14:34). See on Mt.

CHAPTER 7
EATING WITH UNWASHED HANDS. THE SYRPHOGENIAN WOMAN. HEALING OF A DEAF MAN

1-23. Eating with unwashed hands (Mt 15:1). See on Mt.

3, 4. A note added by St. Mark for the benefit of his Gentile readers, who would not be familiar with Jewish customs. St. Matthew's Jewish readers needed no such explanation.

3. Wash their hands oft] lit. 'wash their hands with the fist.' The Jewish custom was to wash the hands up to the wrist, and that is probably the meaning here, although it is hard to extract it from the present (perhaps corrupt) Gk. text. Wetstein thinks that 'a fist' is the minimum quantity of water (⅓ of a hin, or pint), which was allowed for washing the hands.

4. Except they wash] lit. 'baptise themselves.' The Jews carefully distinguished 'washing' the hands, i.e. pouring water over them, from 'baptising' or dipping them. In v. 3 pouring water over them is meant; but here, after a visit to the market-place, in which all kinds of defilement would be met with, dipping them is regarded as necessary. Dipping the hands was performed before meals, washing at meal-times. Washing of cups, etc.] The details are too intricate to be given here. In some cases the articles were washed, in others only sprinkled. The 'cup' is the Lat. sextarius = 1 pint. And of tables] rather, 'of beds,' or, couches for reclining at dinner.

11. Corban] see on Mt 15:5.

19. Purging all meats] RV 'This he said, making all meats clean.' See on Mt 15:1-20.

24-30. The Syrophoenician woman (Mt 15:21). See on Mt.

37-37. The deaf man with an impediment in his speech (peculiar to Mk). This miracle is selected by Mk for its unusual character.

Usually our Lord healed instantaneously, here by stages: usually by a word, here by material means. The reason for the difference of treatment must be sought in the spiritual state of the sufferer. The miracle was done privately that the man, in the absence of the multitude, might be able to concentrate his attention. Jesus made use of the language of signs, because the man was deaf. He put his fingers in His ears, indicating that He would pierce through the obstruction. He touched His tongue, indicating that He would remove the impediment in his speech. Having thus produced faith in the man, He worked the miracle. Eversheim thinks that our Lord used this elaborate process because the man was a Gentile, and, therefore, was with more difficulty brought to believe and to understand.

33. Spit] RV 'spat': see Jn 9:6. He spat on his tongue, using a means of healing accepted in popular opinion of Jew and Gentile. The use of saliva for cures is universally recognised by the rabbis (Eversheim).

34. Sighed] moved by the afflictions of humanity. Ephphatha] Here, as often, St. Mark, following St. Peter, preserves the actual Aramaic expression of our Lord: cp. 5:41.

The ceremony of 'opening the ears,' i.e. touching them with saliva and saying 'Ephphatha, Be opened,' was introduced into the Baptismal service probably in the 4th cent.

CHAPTER 8
FEEDING THE FOUR THOUSAND. THE SIGN FROM HEAVEN. HEALING OF A BLIND MAN. CONFESSION OF PETER

1-10. Feeding the four thousand (Mt 15:32).

11-13. A sign from heaven sought (Mt 16:1).

14-21. A warning against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod (Mt 16:4).

22-26. A blind man healed at Bethsaida (peculiar to Mk, and selected, like the healing in 7:32, for its unusual features). The man was healed in stages, probably because his faith was imperfect. Jesus first strengthened his faith by partly healing him, and then, when his faith was adequate, completed the cure.

24. I see, etc.] RV 'I see men: for I behold them as trees walking.' Medical testimony agrees with the process here described. Cheselden says of a patient of his who, having been born blind, recovered his sight, 'When he first saw, he knew not the shape of anything, nor any one thing from another, however different in shape or magnitude.'

26. Neither go, etc.] RV 'Do not even enter into the village.'
CHAPTER 9

The Transfiguration. An Epileptic Healed. Prediction of His Death

8. The Transfiguration (Mt 17:1 Lk 9:28).

7-C. 9. Confession of Peter (Mt 16:18).

CHAPTER 9

4-29. An epileptic healed (Mt 17:14 Lk 9:37).

3. If thou canst believe] RV ‘If thou art! All things,’ etc. 29. By prayer and fasting] RV omits ‘and fasting,’ but the evidence for it is strong.

10-32. Prediction of the Passion (Mt 17:22 Lk 9:43).

13-37. The controversy as to which should be the greatest (Mt 18:1 Lk 9:49).

38-40. The man casting out devils in Christ’s name (Lk 9:49).

The apostles report that a vate who had not been called to apostolic office (‘he followeth not with us,’ and had received no definite commission from Christ to work miracles, as the apostles l (3:19), was nevertheless casting out devils in Christ’s name. Jealous for the privileges of their newly acquired office, they forbade him, but Christ says that they ought to have commended his help.

Cp. the history of Eldad and Medad (Nu 11:26), where Moses rebukes them for the same jealous attitude. The son is that the spiritual gifts of the laity get to be fully developed and utilised for the good of the Church, and that the clergy get to welcome and not be jealous of their help.

38. John] The name only in Mark. The temper of Boanerges here comes out.

39. That can lightly speak evil of me] RV ‘And be able quickly to speak evil of me.’ The object of the man’s ministry proved the unineness of his faith. If he had been an enemy of Jesus, he could not have worked the miracles: see Ac 19:18.

40. For he that is not against us is on our part] Much to be preferred to the more pointed version of Lk, which is so strongly attested here: ‘For he that is not against you is for you’ (Lk RV). The meaning is, ‘The man, though without your apostolic commission, was doing, and doing successfully, the very same benevolent work that you were doing. You ought, therefore, to have esteemed him a friend and a helper, not an enemy. A saluous and exclusive spirit is unworthy of the ministers of Christ.

41-50. On offences (Mt 18:6 Lk 17:1). See on Mt.

41. See on Mt 10:42. 44, 46. These vv. which are identical with v. 48 are omitted by the best modern authorities.

LITERALLY, the worm is the maggot bred in putrefying substances (Ex 16:20 Isa 14:11 Ac 12:29). Figuratively it stands for the moral corruption and degradation which follow upon a long course of wilful sin, and ultimately issue in eternal death. The lost soul, being at length hopelessly corrupt, and loathsome even to itself, has its own hell within it.

49. For every one shall be salted with fire] The conclusion of this v. (and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt) is omitted by the RV, but is too strongly attested to be safely rejected. The saying is a most difficult one, and there are about twenty different interpretations. The probable meaning is, Every believer shall be ‘salted,’ i.e. purified and prepared for eternity, by the ‘fire’ of discipline, i.e. by the struggles with the flesh (v. 43), and other afflicions and temptations of this life; and ‘every sacrifice,’ i.e. every person, who presents himself, his soul, and body, to be a reasonable, holy, and living sacrifice to God, shall be ‘salted,’ i.e. purified and prepared for eternity, by the salt of divine grace. The ‘salt’ here is the salt of the new covenant, i.e. the grace which is given to believers in Christ: see Lv 2:15.

50. Salt is good] Divine grace is good, but if the divine grace given to you as Christians dies, owing to your neglect to use it, how will you revive it? Preserve and make due use of the divine grace given to you, especially the grace of charity, and thus you will be at peace with one another.’ In Mt 5:13, by an easy transference, the apostles themselves are called ‘salt,’ as possessing divine grace. Among the ancients salt was an emblem of wisdom and of friendship. To the latter signification our Lord alludes when He says, ‘Have peace one with another.’

CHAPTER 10

The Question of Divorce. The Rich Young Man. Blind Bartimeus

1-12. The question of divorce (Mt 19:3). See on that passage, and on Mt 5:32. St. Mark represents our Lord as prohibiting divorce absolutely, without mentioning any exception.

17-22. The rich young man (Mt 19:16 Lk 18:8). See on Mt.

17. Good Master] Mk and Lk represent the young man as saying, ‘Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?’ and Jesus as replying, ‘Why callest thou me good?’ etc.; whereas Mt represents the young man as saying, ‘Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?’ and Jesus as replying, ‘Why askest thou me concerning that which is good?’
etc. (RV). The true version is clearly that of Mk and Lk. The author of Mt (or perhaps an early scribe, for there is considerable reason for thinking that the original text of Mt agreed with Mk and Lk) altered the text slightly, to prevent the reader from supposing that Christ denied that He was good.

18. Why callest, etc.] RV 'Why callest thou me good? None is good save one, even God.' Since Jesus declares Himself, and is repeatedly declared by others to be sinless (Jn 8:46 14:30 1Pet 2:22 1Jn 3:5, etc.), this cannot mean that He was not good, but that for some reason or other on the present occasion He refused the title. (1) According to some He refused it, because in the sense in which it was offered, it was unequal to His merits and His claims. The young man, they think, called Him good, in the sense in which he would have called any eminent Rabbi good, whereupon our Lord pointedly remarked that only God is good, meaning, 'If you call me good in the same sense in which God is good, I am willing to accept it, but if you call me good in a merely human sense I reject it as insufficient.' (2) The other view is that the human nature of Christ, although 'sinless' during the whole of His earthly life, was not 'good' in the absolute sense. He advanced in 'goodness.' Passing through the different stages of a truly human experience, He acquired by conscious effort the virtues proper to each. He learned obedience (Heb 5:8), and was perfected through sufferings (Heb 2:10). He was truly tempted as we are, yet without sin (Heb 4:15), and maintained His virtue by prayer and constant watchfulness (Heb 5:7 Mt 14:36). God, however, is 'good' absolutely. He can neither be tempted of evil nor advance in goodness. It is only as God, not as man, that Christ is 'good' in the absolute sense.

30. For their temporal losses they will have a hundredfold return in spiritual blessings, including holy fellowship with saints and angels. 'Houses' and 'lands' perhaps stand for rich spiritual possessions. If their literal meaning is to be pressed, our Lord indicates that, owing to the prevailing spirit of brotherly love, which issued in the apostolic communism, Christians would enjoy their houses and lands in common, as members of one family.

Persecutions] A startling word in the midst of a shower of blessings. Yet persecutions are often, to a Christian, the greatest blessing of all.

32-34. The passion predicted (Mt 20:17 Lk 18:31). See on Mt.

35-45. The ambition of James and John (Mt 20:20). See on Mt.

46-52. Blind Bartimæus (Mt 20:29 Lk 18:35). See on Mt. The name of the blind man (Bar- Timæus lit. 'son of Timeæus') is given only by Mk.

CHAPTER 11

Jesus rides into Jerusalem. The Fig Tree. Cleansing the Temple. Christ's Authority challenged

1-11. The entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21:1 Lk 19:29 Jn 12:13). See on Mt and Jn.

10. Blessed be the kingdom of our father David. These words, peculiar to Mk, show that the people expected Him to set up an earthly kingdom like David's, and that immediately.

12-14. Cursing of the fig tree (Mt 21:18). See on Mt.

16. Any vessel. This prohibition is peculiar to Mk. The people make a thoroughfare through the Temple, carrying with them baskets, household utensils, etc. 17. Of all nations. These words, though found in Isa 56:7, are recorded only by Mk. They show that our Lord distinctly contemplated the call of the Gentiles.

20-26. The withering of the fig tree. The power of faith (Mt 21:20). See on Mt.

25. This v. does not occur in the parallel passage in Mt, but there is something similar in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6:4).

26. This v. is omitted by many modern critics; but there is considerable evidence for its retention: cp. Mt 6:18 18:35.

27-33. Christ's authority to teach (Mt 21:22 Lk 20:1). See on Mt.

CHAPTER 12

Various incidents and discourses in the temple

1-12. The wicked husbandmen (Mt 21:20 Lk 20:9). See on Mt.

13-17. The tribute money (Mt 22:15 Lk 20:20). See on Mt.

18-27. The Sadducees and the Resurrection (Mt22:23 Lk 20:27). See on Mt. 26. In the bush.] RV 'in the place' (i.e. passage) 'concerning the bush.'

28-34. The great commandment (Mt 22:34). See on Mt.

38-40. Warning against the scribes (Lk 20:45). Mt inserts at this point a long and severe discourse against the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23:1).

38. Cp. Mt 23:3 (23:14). Long clothing] (lit. 'stoiles'). The word is used in LXX for priestly and royal robes, and in NT. for dress n on festive occasions. Not the use, the ostentatious use, of dignified costume condemned by Christ. Salutations see on 237. 39. Uppermost rooms, etc.] RV lief places at feasts.' If there were three couch, the chief guest lay in the middle. There were two on a couch, he lay on the right side. 40. Devour widows' houses] De- t women were accustomed to contribute to support of famous rabbis (1541 Lk 8: 8), and Lord probably here refers to the abuse of a generosity. But inasmuch as the scribes Pharisees were the rulers and judges of nation, He may refer to their corruption rapacity in the administration of justice, thereby they oppressed the poor.

1-44. The widows' mite (Lk 21: 1).

1. The treasury] According to the Talmud re were in the Court of the Women thirteen sta for offerings called 'Trumaph,' from each three times in the year, before the three of feasts, the money was transferred to the money called Korbanas. Each was marked the object to which the offerings it sved were to be devoted, e.g. temple ex- sises, sacrifices, oil, wine, incense, sacred sols, etc. Cp. Jn 8: 30. Money] lit. 'brass.'
it. 'houses.' 41. Leptons] a small copper coin, such as the as and minas, are meant (Mt 5: 24, 10: 29).

2. A (lit. 'one') poor widow] cp. Mt 21: 10: fig tree.'

2. Two [mites] lit. 'two lepta, which make quadrans.' The lepton was a Greek coin, smallest in circulation, equivalent to 1/10 of an eparus, or 1/4 of a farthing. The widow ered two, because the rabbis forbade a single ton to be placed in the almshes.

3. Hath cast more in] i.e. more in propor- tion to her means, and so has pleased God. 'A certain woman offered a handful wheat meal, and the high priest despised it, saying, How worthless this is to eat, how worthless to offer. But in a dream it was sealed to him. Despise her not, for it is the same as if she had offered her soul (or, life') the Talmud.' 'Liberality is estimated ac- cording to a man's substance' (Aristotle).

BEAT PROPHECY OF THE FALL OF JERUSA- LEM AND OF THE END OF THE WORLD

1-37. Christ's great prophecy (Mt 24: 1 Lk 9). See on Mt.

14. Spoken of by Daniel the prophet] RV rightly omits these words. Let him that adeth understand] Words of the evangelist, not of Jesus, intended to warn Palestinian aders to watch carefully for the fulfilment this sign, and immediately afterwards to be for their lives. They do not necessarily indicate, as some think, that the fulfilment as already imminent, and that therefore the date of the Gospel is as late as 66-70 A.D. See on Mt 24: 15.

32. Neither the Son] This is the true reading not only here, but in Mt 24: 40, where it has been altered in many MSS, probably as being a difficulty to faith. Rightly to understand it, we must remember that Jesus possessed two complete and perfect natures, the divine and the human. In His divine nature He knew all things whatsoever, but in His human nature He knew only such things as He willed to know. And since it was not expedient that we should know the day and the hour of the Last Judgment, He willed to be ignorant of it. This avowed ignorance implies no limitation of Christ's divine nature. Christ had no will but His Father's. When the Father willed to withhold from Him any of His designs, His will was to be ignorant. The Arians taught that the Son was ignorant even in His divine nature, but Athanasius replied, 'But lovers of Christ recognise that the Word did not say, "I know not," as being the Word, for He knew; but He thus indicated His humanity, showing that ignorance is part of human nature.'

CHAPTER 14

THE LAST SUPPER. ARREST AND TRIAL OF JESUS

1, 2. A council of the Priests against Jesus (Mt 26: 1 Lk 22: 1). See on Mt.

3-9. The anointing at Bethany (Mt 26: 6 Jn 12: 1). See on Mt and Jn.

10, 11. Judas betrays Jesus (Mt 26: 14 Lk 22: 3). See on Mt.

24. The new testament] RV 'the covenant.' RM 'Some ancient authorities insert new.'

27-32. Jesus foretells Peter's denial. See on Mt 26: 31, where the other references are given.

30. Before the cock crow twice] 'Twice' is omitted by important ancient authorities, and is open to some doubt. The other three evangelists speak of only one crowing of the cock.

51, 52. The young man who followed. The incident being peculiar to St. Mark, and a quite unimportant one, it is often supposed by modern commentators that the young man was the evangelist himself. Mark's mother certainly lived in Jerusalem (Ac 12: 15). Other conjectures are St. John, James the brother, or a resident in the house where the last supper had been eaten.

51. A linen cloth] probably a night-dress, but J. Lightfoot thinks that it was a taliuth (i.e. the large or synagogue taliuth: see on Mt 23:5), which the young man, for ascetic purposes, wore as his only garment.

58. I will destroy] Clearly the accusation was that Jesus had plotted to burn or otherwise destroy the Temple. Much less satisfactory is St. Matthew's version, 'I am able to destroy the Temple.' The words, 'that is made without hands,' and 'another made without hands,' are peculiar to Mk. Westcott and Hort give in their margin the remarkable reading, 'but in three days I will effect the resurrection of another (Temple) made without hands.' See on Mt 26:61 Jn 2:19.

68. And the cock crew] Omitted by important ancient authorities, and rejected as an interpolation by Westcott and Hort and RM. See on v. 30.

72. The second time] Omitted by important ancient authorities; bracketed by Swete: see on v. 30.

When he thought thereon] An expression of uncertain meaning, but the AV is probably right. Other interpretations:—'having covered his head' (Theophylact, Field), 'he began to weep'; 'he wept vehemently'; 'when he had set his eyes on Jesus, he wept'; 'when he had rushed outside, he wept.'

CHAPTER 15

THE TRIAL BEFORE PILATE. THE CRUCIFIXION

16-20. The mockery (Mt 27:27). See on Mt.

21. Alexander and Rufus] These names occur only in Mk. They were clearly Christians of eminence, well known in the Roman Church for which this Gospel was composed. Rufus is probably the Rufus of Ro 16:13, where he is called 'chosen in the Lord.' Who Alexander was, is unknown. It is unlikely that he is identical with any of the other Alexanders mentioned in NT. (Ac 19:31 Tim 1:20 2 Tim 4:14).

28. Nearly all modern editors omit this v. It is generally regarded as interpolated from Lk 22:37, which, however, is not parallel.

31. Himself he cannot save] R.M. 'Can he not save himself?' 40. The less] i.e. the little, generally identified with the son of Alpheus (Mt 10:8).

43. Waited for the kingdom of God] cp. Lk 20:28, 38. This, which is also St. Luke's expression, answers to St. Matthew's, 'who also himself was Jesus' disciple.' Joseph had discovered the King of the Kingdom for which he waited.

44. Whether, etc.] R.M. 'Whether he were already dead.'

47. Mary the mother of Joses] lit. 'Mary of Joses' (or 'of Joseph,' for that spelling is also strongly supported). Who was this Mary? She can hardly be the same as the 'Mary of James' in 16:1, for the evangelist (even if drawing from different sources) would hardly describe the same woman as 'of Joses' and 'of James' in two consecutive verses. Nor is it easy to identify her with Mary the mother of James and Joses (15:40). She is not called 'Mary the mother of James and Joses,' or even 'Mary or James and Joses,' but simply 'Mary of Joses' (or 'of Joseph'). Hence it is most natural to translate, 'Mary the daughter of Joses' (Joseph), and to regard her as the daughter (or just possibly the wife) of Joseph of Arimathea, or of some unknown Joses (Joseph).

THE RESURRECTION

1-8. The women at the tomb, and the angel (Mt 28:1 Lk 24:1 Jn 20:1). See on Mt and Jn.

1. Mary the mother of James] lit. 'Mary of James,' i.e. probably 'Mary daughter of James,' or just possibly 'Mary wife of James.' She is perhaps the same as Mary the mother of James and Joses, 15:40.

9-20. Conclusion of the Gospel. One uncial MS gives a second termination to the Gospel as follows: 'And they reported all the things that had been commanded them briefly (or immediately) to the companions of Peter. And after this Jesus Himself also sent forth by them from the east even unto the west the holy and incorruptible preaching of eternal salvation.'

Internal evidence points definitely to the conclusion that the last twelve vv. are not by St. Mark. For, (1) the true conclusion certainly contained a Galilean appearance (Mk 16:7, cp. 14:28), and this does not. (2) The style is that of a bare catalogue of facts, and quite unlike St. Mark's usual wealth of graphic detail. (3) The section contains numerous words and expressions never used by St. Mark. (4) Mk 16:9 makes an abrupt fresh start, and is not continuous with the preceding narrative. (5) Mary Magdalen is spoken of (16:9) as if she had not been mentioned before, although she has just been alluded to twice (15:47 16:1). (6) The section seems to represent not a primary tradition, such as Peter's, but quite a secondary one, and in particular to be depend-upon the conclusion of St. Matthew, and in Lk 24:18.

In the other hand, the section is no casual unauthorised addition to the Gospel. From the 2 nd cent. onwards, in nearly all manuscripts, versions, and other authorities, it forms an integral part of the Gospel, and it be shown to have existed, if not in the stolic, at least in the sub-apostolic age. A certain amount of evidence against it there is, though very little can be shown to be independent of Eusebius the Church historian, 330-340 A.D., but certainly not enough to justify its rejection, were it not that internal evidence clearly demonstrates that it cannot proceed from the hand of St. Mark.

The most probable account of the literary story of the section seems to be the following. The Gospel of St. Mark, being the most extensive and authoritative account of our Lord's life as distinguished from His discourses, attained at its first publication (55-70 A.D.) a considerable circulation, first in the West, and afterwards in the East. At that time it included with an account of the Galilean appearance, which is now only to be found in St. Matthew (Mt 28:16). The subsequent publication of the First and Third Gospels, which corporated practically its whole subject-matter, and were far more interesting as containing discourses, practically drove it out of circulation. When at the close of the apostolic age an attempt was made (probably in Rome) to collect the authentic memorials of the Apostles and their companions, a copy of the neglected Second Gospel was not easily found. The one that was actually discovered, had been used to multiply copies, had lost its first leaf, and so a fitting termination (the present appendix) was added by another hand. A recently discovered Armenian MS (1891) definitely ascribes the appendix to Arisont, i.e. probably Arison, an apostle of the Lord, mentioned by Papias (130 A.D.).

Some think that the Gospel originally concluded at 16 (for they were afraid), but this is unlikely. Such a conclusion would be unaccountably abrupt—more so in the Greek than in the English; and 16 14 28 prepare the way for and anticipate a Galilean appearance.

10. She went] cp. Lk 24:10 Jn 20:18. As they mourned and wept] cp. Lk 24:17. The author of the 'Gospel of Peter' (150 A.D., or earlier) must probably be added to the earliest witnesses to these twelve vv., for he writes, 'And upon all these things we fasted and sat mourning and weeping night and day until the sabbath. ...But we, the twelve disciples of the Lord, wept and were grieved.'
11. Believed not.

12, 13. Appearance to two disciples. They were walking to Emmaus; see Lk 24:18.

12. In another form] This is an explanation of the fact that Christ was not at first recognised. It differs somewhat from that of St. Luke, 'Their eyes were holden, that they should not know him' (Lk 24:18). 13. Neither believed they them] Another slight discrepancy with St. Luke, who says (Lk 24:34) that when the two disciples reached Jerusalem they were greeted with the words, 'The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon.'

14-18. Appearance to the eleven. This is variously identified with the appearance on the evening of the resurrection day (Lk 24:36 Jn 20:19), and with the final interview (Ac 1). But Swete is probably right in thinking that after an allusion to the first appearance to the Eleven on Easter Day, the writer passes on to give a summary of the words of Jesus spoken on various occasions during the forty days.

14. Upbraided them] According to certain ancient MSS mentioned by Jerome (340-420 A.D.), the apostles thus replied to our Lord's reproaches: 'This age is the very essence of iniquity and incredulity, and on account of unclean spirits permits not the true virtue of God to be apprehended. Do Thou, therefore, now at this time reveal Thy justice (or, righteousness).'</ref>

15. Go ye into all the world] This seems part of the same charge as that mentioned Mt 28:18. To every creature] RV 'to the whole creation.' A rabbinical expression for mankind in general.

16. Baptism is here declared necessary to salvation only for those who have heard the gospel message. It is not declared necessary for unevangelised heathen, or for those who have not attained the age of reason. Not the want of baptism, but contempt of it condemns a man. (For infant baptism, see on Mt 19:14.) Damned] i.e. condemned.

17. New tongues] Some MSS omit 'new': see on Ac 24. The gift of miracles was given in order to assist the diffusion of the gospel at the very first. When Christianity was firmly planted, the gift of miracles was withdrawn.

18. Serpents] cp. Lk 10:19 Ac 28:8. Drink any deadly thing] There is no example in the NT. But St. John and Barsabas (Ac 1:25) are said in early tradition to have drunk a cup of poison unharmed. Lay hands on the sick] doubtless at the same time anointing them with oil (6:13 Jas 5:14).

INTRODUCTION

1. Life of St. Luke. The word 'Luke' (Loukas) is a contraction of the Latin name Lucanus, often found in inscriptions.

St. Luke was a Gentile, or, as others think, a proselyte, of Antioch in Syria, where he followed the profession of a physician (Col. 4:14). His connexion with Antioch which tradition affirms, is confirmed by the Western reading of Ac 11:28, which implies that St. Luke was present when the prophet Agabus delivered his famous prophecy before the Church of Antioch. The same passage proves that he was not a convert of St. Paul, but one of the earliest members of the Church of Antioch, which apparently had from the beginning baptised Gentiles as well as Jews (see on Ac 11:30, where the true reading is 'Greeks').

He became a follower of St. Paul, and his companion in his missionary journeys. Many facts about his travels with St. Paul can be gathered from the Acts, because, though he does not name himself, he generally speaks of the Apostle's party as 'we' when he was present, and 'they' when he was absent. It thus appears that he joined the apostle at Troas on the Second Missionary journey (about 50 A.D.), and accompanied him to Philippi (Acts 16:10). Here St. Paul left him (17:1). After this for several years we cannot trace his movements, but he was probably engaged in missionary work in the district, for when St. Paul returned to Philippi some seven years later on his third missionary journey, St. Luke was still there (Acts 20:5). He then accompanied St. Paul on the rest of his travels until they reached Rome about 59 or 60 A.D.

During St. Paul's first imprisonment St. Luke was with him, though perhaps not continuously (Col. 4:14; Philemon v. 24). He was also a companion of St. Paul during his second imprisonment (about 67 A.D.), when the Apostle was expecting martyrdom (2 Tim. 4:11).

Nothing certain is known of St. Luke's subsequent life. A third-century authority says, 'Luke, by nation a Syrian of Antioch, a disciple of the apostles, and afterwards a follower of St. Paul, served his master blamelessly till his confession (martyrdom?). For having neither wife nor children he died in Bithynia at the age of 74, filled with the Holy Ghost.'

2. Authorship of the Gospel. The canonical authority and authenticity of St. Luke's Gospel have never been questioned until quite recent times, and the following considerations seem to set the question beyond doubt.

It is admitted on all hands that Luke and Acts are by the same author. The reference in Acts to the 'former treatise,' the description of which exactly suits the Gospel (Acts 1:1), the common dedication to Theophilus (Acts 1:1), the general similarity of style, and the definitely Pauline conception of Christianity, which both exhibit, are sufficient proofs of identity of authorship. That this author was St. Luke is proved at length in the Intro. to Acts (q.v.).

St. Luke's Gospel was used (and abused) by the heretic Marcion, 140 A.D.; copiously quoted by Justin Martyr, 150 A.D.; included by Tatian in his harmony of the four Gospels (Diatessaron), 160 A.D.; used without doubt of its authenticity by Irenaeus, 177 A.D.; Theophilus of Antioch, 180 A.D.; Tertullian, 200 A.D.; and included in the Muratorian Canon of Scripture, 200 A.D.

3. Date, etc. The date of composition cannot be certainly determined. It is later than Mark, of which it appears to make use, and earlier than Acts, to which it forms an introduction. If, as seems probable, Acts was written at Rome about 62 A.D., Luke may be assigned to the preceding year, i.e. to the early part of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome. Some suppose it to have been written earlier, about 57 A.D., at Caesarea, and others considerably later, about 74, or even as late as 80 A.D.

4. Sources. When St. Luke wrote, a large number of written accounts of our Lord's life and work already existed (11), and it is to be supposed that he made diligent use of them. But since during the two years and more of St. Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea (Acts 24:27) St. Luke was in Palestine, it is more than likely that he made good use of his opportunities of consulting the eyewitnesses themselves. Of written sources he almost certainly used St. Mark's Gospel. He is also said by some to have used St. Matthew's 'Logia,' i.e. a collection of our Lord's discourses written by St. Matthew, and now incorporated in the First Gospel. But the differences of wording and arrangement in the sayings of our Lord common to the First and Third Gospels render this supposition someit hazardous. For a full discussion of a difficult question, the reader is referred to article, 'The Synoptic Problem.' Critics rightly argue from the presence in Luke's Gospel of a long section (9:31-19:28), most entirely peculiar to himself, that St. Luke must have used some 'special source,' some circle of traditions unconnected with the mainly Galilean traditions which underlie Mt and Mk. The materials for this section are either collected in Judaea, or more probably in Perea, where most of the incidents located. The birth narratives must also be assigned to a special source, which has been sought, from the nature of the information, since St. Luke was in Palestine. Since St. Luke is well formed about Herod, it is possible that one of his informants was Joaana, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (8:3).

Relation to St. John. There are some closely parallelus between St. Luke's Gospel and St. John's. Both allude to the ministry in Judaea (1:46, 13:34). Both mention a visit of Peter to the sepulchre (24:12), the estates Martha and Mary (10:41), the appearance of Easter Eve (24:36). Both place the prediction of Peter's denial at the last supper (22:24), and the denial itself before the trial (22:24). St. John's Gospel is probably quite independent of St. Luke's.

Relation to St. Paul. Ancient tradition exaggerated the influence of St. Paul upon Luke's Gospel. St. Paul's expression, according to my gospel (Ro 16:22), was understood to mean 'according to St. Luke's Gospel.' Irenaeus says, 'Luke, the companion of Paul, sat down in a book the gospel preached by him (Paul),' whereas St. Luke himself says that he compiled his Gospel from the narratives of eyewitnesses. Yet the Pauline influence is real. Religious universalism is more marked feature of this than of the other synoptic Gospels, and so is the doctrine of salvation by faith. The account of the Lord's Supper (at least in the usual text) is nearer to St. Paul's than to the synoptic account.

Relation to Marcion. The heretic Marcion sued about 140 A.D., an edition of St. Luke which began with Christ's teaching at Capernaum, and omitted many important passages. Some modern critics, at the risk of discrediting the authority of the Third Gospel, have maintained that Marcion's version of it is the only genuine one. It is, however, now generally recognised that the existing version of St. Luke is the older, and that Marcion altered it to suit his peculiar doctrinal views.

5. Style. Although not written in pure Attic Greek, St. Luke's Gospel and Acts have greater pretensions to style than any other NT. documents. St. Jerome says, his style is more polished, and savours of secular eloquence.' This is specially true of his preface, which follows classical models. But St. Luke varies his style to suit his subject-matter. Sometimes, as in the chs. describing the Nativity, he is intensely Hebraic, imitating the LXX. Sometimes, especially when describing our Lord's actions and words, he falls into the common undorned style of the synoptic evangelists. But everywhere his style has its own distinctive marks, by which it can be readily recognised. He shows a considerable knowledge of the technical vocabulary of the Greek physicians, which harmonises with St. Paul's statement that he was a medical man (Col 4:14).

6. Aim and Character. The Gospel is intended primarily for the edification of a single individual, Theophilus, a man of high position living at Rome, and apparently a convert of St. Luke. Yet there can be no doubt that it was intended to reach a large circle of Gentile readers. St. Luke claims for his narrative fulness, accuracy, order, and exhaustive research. In pursuance of his plan of writing 'in order,' he attempts to fix the chronology, and to place the gospel history in its true connection with contemporary secular events. It is clear, that, like St. Paul, his sympathies were cosmopolitan, and that he was interested in the wider life and culture of the great empire. Of special dogmatic or party purpose the Gospel shows little trace. The writer is frankly a Paulinist, laying stress on the universal character of Christianity, but there is scarcely a trace of bias against the Twelve, or Jewish Christianity. This is especially clear in the Acts, where the exploits of Peter are as sympathetically recorded as those of Paul. St. Luke's universalism is shown by the pedigree from Adam (3:23), by the praise accorded to Samaritans (10:29), by the rebuke of Jewish intolerance against that people (9:22f. 17:11f.), and by the appointment of the 70 disciples whose mission was to carry the gospel to the Gentiles (c. 10). Universalism characterizes our Lord's first-recorded discourse (4:21-44), and is emphasised in the discourses after the Resurrection (24:47 Ac 4). Equally characteristic is the idea of free grace, not by the works of the Law, but by faith. St. Luke is full of the spirit of the Christian missionary, and delights in those words and acts of Jesus which offer salvation to the poor, the outcast, and the abandoned criminal. This sentiment is also found in Mt, who has the parable of the Lost Sheep, and the saying, 'the Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost'; but in St. Luke it is much more prominent. He alone records the touching parable of the Prodigal Son, and the conversion of the penitent thief.

Some critics detect in St. Luke an Ebionite, i.e. a socialist or communist tendency. He certainly shows a special sympathy with the poor (4:18 14:13 19:8 21:8), and records many warnings of our Lord against wealth (6:24, etc.). He even regards community of goods as preferable to private property (Ac 2:44, etc.), but it must be remembered that the apostolic communism was voluntary (Ac 5:4). Other examples of this tendency are the parables of Dives and Lazarus, of the Rich Fool, and of the Unjust Steward. Another possible example is the beatitude, 'Blessed are ye poor' (6:20), where St. Matthew has 'poor in spirit.'

In speaking of our Lord, St. Luke, like St. John, is careful to notice the effect of His words and works on those who witnessed them: 'He was glorified of all' (4:15); 'they were all astonished at the majesty of God' (9:43); 'and all the people, when they saw it, gave praise unto God' (18:43). He also records carefully our Lord's prayers, being alone in mentioning that our Lord prayed on six distinct and memorable occasions: (1) At His baptism, 3:21; (2) after cleansing the leper, 5:13; (3) before calling the Twelve apostles, 6:12; (4) at His Transfiguration, 9:29; (5) on the cross for His murderers, 23:34; (6) with His last breath, 23:46. St. Luke, like St. Matthew, is specially interested in our Lord's discourses. He preserves more often than St. Matthew, a record of the circumstances in which the words were actually spoken, whereas St. Matthew collects and arranges them according to subject-matter. Hence St. Luke seems to scatter what St. Matthew has collected.

7. Matter peculiar to St. Luke. A proof of St. Luke's diligence in collecting materials is that about half of his Gospel consists of matter peculiar to himself. He alone mentions the parables of the Two Debtors (7:41), of the Good Samaritan (10:39), of the Friend at Midnight (11:5), of the Rich Fool (12:16), of the Barren Fig Tree (13:6), of the Lost Coin (15:8), of the Prodigal Son (15:11), of the Unjust Steward (16:1), of Dives and Lazarus (16:19), of the Unjust Judge (18:1), of the Pharisee and Publican (18:9); also the following miracles: the miraculous draught of fishes (6:1), the raising of the widow's son (7:11), the cure of a woman with a spirit of infirmity (13:10), of a dropical man (14:1), of ten lepers (17:11), of Malchus's ear (22:51).

Besides these, much other important matter is peculiar to him, e.g. the first two chs., the questions put to John the Baptist by the people (3:10, 14), the topic of conversation at the Transfiguration (9:31), the conversion of Zaccheus (19:1), the weeping over Jerusalem (19:41), the promise to Simon that his faith should not fail (22:31), the bloody sweat (22:44), the trial before Herod (23:7), the words addressed to the women of Jerusalem (23:7), the incident of the penitent thief (23:40); the words on the Cross, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do,' and 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (23:44); the walk to Emmaus (24:13), and most of the details of the appearance on the evening of Easter Day (24:36). It should be observed that almost the whole of the long section (9:51-19:20) consists of matter peculiar to St. Luke. Some of the sayings in it are found also in Mt, but generally in a different connexion.

(1) The preface, 1:14.
(2) The infancy and boyhood, 1:15-2:52.
(6) The later ministry, mainly in Persia. 9:51-19:20. Many of the incidents recorded in this section really belong to other periods of the ministry. Marks of locality and date are vague and rare.
(7) The last visit to Jerusalem and the Passion, 19:20-23.
(8) The Resurrection (and Ascension?) c. 24.

9. The Text. Besides the two ordinary types of text, viz. that used by the Authorised Version and that used by the Revisers, there is another interesting type of text, generally called 'Western,' of very great antiquity. It is characterised by omissions, additions, and sometimes by changes. Some chief omissions are in 10:41 12:59 23:24 24:36, 40, 51. The chief addition is after 64. The most interesting change of text is in the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, which, in its 'Western' form, has no affinity with St. Paul's account of that event. Several of the 'Western' readings are discussed in the commentary, and as they are now regarded as of considerable importance, the student is recommended to make himself acquainted with them. In the Acts the 'Western' text is a still more important and interesting problem.

BIRTH OF JOHN. THE ANNUNCIATION

1-4. Preface. To write a preface to a history is not a Jewish, but a classical custom, and by following it St. Luke shows himself a true Gentile, trained in Greek culture and imitating classical models. Here he affects classical elegance and correctness of expression, but in the course of his Gospel he generally imitates the simpler synoptic style.

This Preface contains all that is really
ST. LUKE 1. 18

As distinguished from what is guessed out the sources of the Synoptic Gospels. Main statements are, (1) that already, when Luke was compiling his Gospel (56-58 A.D.), any earlier Gospels existed; (2) that these Gospels were based upon the evidence of the eyewitnesses; (3) that these eyewitnesses were apostles and official Christian teachers; that the eyewitnesses delivered their testimony in the form of a more or less definitely traditional, which may have been either oral or written; (5) that Christians were minutely instructed and catechised in the tenets of this tradition.

St. Luke claims for his Gospel, (1) diligence in collecting all available materials, (2) fulness, careful investigation especially of the latest period (our Lord's birth and infancy), orderly arrangement, (5) accuracy.

1. Surely believed RV 'fulfilled.' 2. Even i.e. these narratives were in exact accordance with the evidence of the eyewitnesses. Eyewitnesses i.e. mainly the Apostles themselves, perhaps also the seventy disciples.

3. In order may refer either to chronological order, or to orderly arrangement according to subjects.

Most excellent Theophilus Some think that Theophilus is not a real person, but an ideal name for a Christian reader ('beloved of God'). More probably Theophilus was a distinguished Roman citizen resident in Rome. The epithet most excellent was under the empire peculiarly appropriated to Romans of high rank, and became in the 2nd cent. a technical title indicating equestrian rank. This is probably a sense here. Both Felix and Festus, addressed by this title in Acts 23:26 24:8 26:22, were dignitaries (equites). Acts is also dedicated to Theophilus.

4. Instructed lit. 'catechised,' i.e. taught by means of question and answer. At a very early period, probably in the apostolic age, candidates for baptism ('catechumens') were required to go through a preliminary course of training in Christian doctrine and morality, of which catechising formed a prominent part. Theophilus was probably one of St. Luke's own converts, who had with other catechumens attended regular catechising on the life of our Lord.

5-25. Conception of John the Baptist. The use of Christianity was preceded by a long period of four hundred years, during which prophecy was silent, and the religious guidance of the nation passed to the rabbis and the scribes, who made void the Law of God by their traditions. The advent of Christ was heralded by a great revival of prophecy, and by the restoration of direct communications from God to man through supernatural agency, as in the cases of Zacharias, Joseph, Mary, Elisabeth, Simeon, Anna, the shepherds, the Magi, and, in particular, John the Baptist, who, though he left no written prophecies, and worked no miracle, was declared by our Lord to be the greatest of the prophets, yea, and more than a prophet.

5. The classical style of the preface now changes abruptly to one which is deeply tinged with Hebraisms. This Hebraic style continues to the end of c. 2. Some scholars explain it by supposing that St. Luke is here using a Hebrew document. Herod] see Mt 2:1.

The course of Abia (Abijah) David divided the priests into twenty-four 'courses' or groups, each of which in rotation was responsible for the Temple services for a week. Each course, therefore, officiated twice a year, at an interval of six months. The course of Abijah was the eighth. After the Captivity only four courses returned, but these were subdivided into twenty-four courses under the old names. The course of Abijah is said to have officiated in April and October: see 1 Ch 24:4 Neh 12:1.

6. Righteous] i.e. according to the OT standard. They were good, pious Jews, strict and careful observers of the Mosaic Law, but not, of course, sinless.

9. Lot] To avoid disputes the various functions were decided by lot. To burn incense] This was done daily, morning and evening (Ex 30:4-8). The daily sacrifice of the lamb was offered on the great altar of burnt offering outside the Temple proper, in front of the porch. The incense was offered inside the Temple on the golden altar of incense which stood before the veil of the Holy of Holies. The officiating priest was alone within the Temple while offering the incense, and the other priests and the people were outside worshipping in the various Temple courts. Only once in a lifetime could a man enjoy this privilege, and he was ever afterwards called 'rich.' It was the 'highest mediatorial act,' 'the most solemn part of the day's service, symbolising Israel's accepted prayers.'

11. An angel] It was said of the high priest Simon the Just (died 320 B.C.) that 'for those forty years wherein he had served as high priest, he had seen an angel clothed in white coming into the Holy Place on the Day of Atonement and going out again.' St. Luke gives special prominence to the ministry of angels, and the appearances which he records are particularly difficult to account for as subjective phenomena: see 1:36 2:9,18,21 12:8 15:10 16:22 22:23 24:4,28, and often in Acts.

12. Was troubled] cp. 29 Jg 6:22 13:22, etc.

13. My prayer] Probably not for offspring, but for the coming of the kingdom of God, and of the Messianic salvation, the only suitable prayer for so solemn an occasion. It was a maxim of the rabbis that 'a prayer in which there is no mention of the kingdom of God is no prayer at all.’ John lit. ‘Jehovah is gracious.’
1. 15 ST. LUKE 1. 28

15. John was a Nazirite, i.e. one of a class of men in Israel who consecrated themselves to God by abstaining from all intoxicants, by avoiding with scrupulous care all ceremonial defilement, and by wearing the hair long, Nu 6:1-21. Usually men made the Nazirite vow for a definite time, not less than thirty days, but John, like Samson, Samuel, and the Rechabites in the OT., was a Nazirite for life. There are some examples of the Nazirite vow even among Christians (Ac 18:15 21:25). James the Lord’s brother is said by Hesedippus to have been a life-long Nazirite.

John, the Nazirite and dweller in the wilderness (probably also a celibate), represents the austere and ascetic type of piety which few can imitate. Jesus, purposing in His life to offer an example to all mankind, came eating and drinking, and sharing the joys and sorrows and even the recreations of ordinary society. Both these types of piety, the ascetic and the social, have their place in the Kingdom of God.

Filled with the Holy Ghost] As Jesus was conceived without sin, so his forerunner was sanctified in the womb, though the reference is less to personal sanctification than to consecration to the prophetical office; see Jer 1:5 Gal 1:15. 17. Go before him] RV ‘go before his face,’ i.e. before the face of Jehovah. Elias] RV ‘Elijah’; see Mal 4:5 and on Mt 17:10. To turn the hearts, etc.] Malachi’s exact words are, ‘He shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers.’ ‘The fathers’ are the patriarchs and prophets of Israel, ‘the children’ are their degenerate descendants who have alienated the heart of ‘their fathers’ by their disobedience to their godly precepts. The preaching of John will turn the heart of the children to imitate their just (i.e. pious) ancestors, and thus the heart of their ancestors, now alienated, will be turned to them in love and approbation.

18. With the unbelief of Zacharias compare the son of Abraham, Gn 17:17, and of Sarah, Gn 18:12. To ask for a sign was not in itself wrong. Abraham, Gideon, and Hezekiah had done so without rebuke. But the appearance of the angel ought itself to have been a sufficient sign to Zacharias.

19. I am Gabriel, etc.] cp. Tob 12:15, ‘I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and go in before the glory of the Holy One.’ Two angels only are named in the canonical Scriptures, Gabriel (lit. ‘the mighty man of God’), Dan 8:16 9:21, and Michael (lit. ‘Who is like God?’), Dan 10:18,21 12:1 Jude v. 9 Rev 12:7. In the Apocrypha, Raphael and Uriel are also named.

The rabbis say that the Jews learnt the names of the angels in Babylon.

The apparent sanction given here to current Jewish angelology is a good instance of the accommodation to human ideas which is so common in both Testaments. God’s messenger reveals himself by the name of Gabriel, because that was the name by which he was commonly known among the Jews. The Jews themselves did not suppose that they knew the real names of the angels. According to the rabbis the names of the angels represented their mission, and were changed as their mission was changed.

21. Marvelled that he tarried] RV ‘Marvelled while he tarried.’ The people were afraid that the officiating priest might be struck dead for omitting some formality (Lv 16:12), hence the custom was for the priest to finish his ministry as quickly as possible. Once when Simon the Just delayed too long, the people became so anxious that they almost broke into the Holy Place. Afterwards they reproached him for his want of consideration for them.

22. Came out] His duty was now to pronounce the priestly benediction (Nu 6:24), but this he was unable to do. 23. The days] i.e. the week of the course of Abijah. 24. Hid herself five months] She desired to devote herself entirely to prayer and thanksgiving for so signal a mercy. The reproach of childlessness was deeply felt: see Gn 30:20 18:14, etc.

26-28. The Annunciation (see on Mt 1). Wonder and awe and adoring praise are the emotions with which Christians have ever regarded the unspeakable condescension of Him who, ‘when He took upon Him human nature to deliver it, did not abhor the Virgin’s womb.’ That Mary fully understood who her child was to be, cannot be supposed. The thought of such a condescension of the Author of nature as is implied in the words of the Creed ‘conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,’ is overwhelming even to us; to Mary it would have been so appalling that she could not possibly have performed the duties of a mother. Hence the angel was only permitted to reveal to her, that her son would be the Messiah, and the ‘Son of God’ in some specially exalted yet human sense. The whole narrative moves within the circle of Jewish OT. ideas, and this is a proof of its truth, for an invented story would certainly show marks of a Christian origin. The grace, modest reticence, and inimitable simplicity of the narrative, are in marked contrast to the vulgar details of the Apocryphal Gospels. The festival of the Annunciation (the day on which our Lord became man) is kept on March 25th.

28. Came in] Local tradition states that Gabriel appeared to her as she was drawing... water at the fountain of the Virgin outside Nazareth, where the Church of the Annunciation now stands. But, as the angel came in, to her, she must have been in the house, perhaps engaged in prayer, as painters are fond of representing her. Two well-known devotions have been founded on this incident: (1) the 'Ave Maria' ('Hail, Mary!'); (2) the 'Angelus.'

Highly favoured] or, rather, 'endued with grace' (RM), not, as the Vulgate has it, 'full of grace.' She is addressed not as the mother of grace, but as the daughter of it (Bengel). The angel recognised in Mary a holiness of an entirely special kind, which God had given her to fit her to be the mother of the Holy One. Sinless in the absolute sense she probably was not (see on Jn 24), yet we may reverently believe that no one approached the perfection of holiness and purity so nearly as she. Blessed art thou among women These words are omitted by many good authorities: see on v. 42. 32. His father David] This seems to imply the Davidic descent of Mary: cp. v. 27, which is ambiguous, and v. 69.

34. How shall this be, seeing I know not a man? The traditional view of this passage, which sees in it a proof of the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother, is perhaps correct. Unless Mary had resolved to remain a virgin after her marriage with Joseph, and had obtained her husband's consent to do so, she would not, as a betrothed woman, regard it as impossible that she should have a child: see on Mt 1: 25 12 50.

35. The Holy Ghost, etc. Mary would doubtless understand 'the Holy Ghost' impersonally, as the creative power of God, but St. Luke's readers would understand it personally, as frequently in the Acts. The Holy Ghost, (1) miraculously forms and halloweth our Lord's human body and soul at His conception; (2) descends upon Him with an abiding unction at His baptism, consecrating Him to the Messianic office and preparing Him for His ministry; (3) brings about the mystical union of the ascended Christ with His people.

Overshadow] like the Shekinah in the Temple, or the cloud of glory at the Transfiguration, which symbolised the divine presence. We have here a new, immediate and divine act of creation, and thus the transmission of sinfulness from the sinful race to him is excluded. That holy thing, etc. RV 'that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.' Mary would probably understand from this that her Child was to be sinless, but not that He would be divine, because the Son of God was an accepted title of the Messiah.

36. Unasked, the angel gives Mary a sign. He who has caused Elisabeth to conceive con-converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' In the Magnificat Mary appears as a prophetess, like Hannah, whom she closely imitates, but greatly excels in spiritual elevation: see 1 S 21. The genuineness of the Magnificat is manifest from its thoroughly Jewish character. It contains no trace of definitely Christian ideas. These may be read into it, and were intended by the Holy Spirit to be ultimately read into it, but they are not there in such a form as to be apprehended by those who are not already Christians. The Magnificat is conveniently divided into two parts: (1) vv. 46–49, (2) vv. 50–55. The first part is personal in character, expressing the exultant praise of the holy mother for the signal favour which God has shown her, and foretelling that all future generations will call her blessed. The second part sets forth the character of the Kingdom as a moral revolution, and a reversal of all existing standards of goodness and greatness.

46. In the Gospels (not in the Pauline Epistles) 'soul' and 'spirit' are synonymous.

47. In God my Saviour] In Mary's idea of 'salvation' was doubtless included deliverance from foreign power as well as spiritual deliverance. 'God my Saviour' is, of course, in accordance with OT. ideas, God the Father. Not till much later did she come to regard her Son in this aspect.

48. The low estate] cp. 1 S 11. Mary, though descended from David, was in humble circumstances.

All generations shall call me blessed] Prophetically spoken. She has become the pattern of womanhood and motherhood to the whole Christian world, and her song has been enshrined in the Liturgy of every Christian Church. Reverence for our Lord's mother, even in its abuses, has not been without its elevating effect on humanity. 'It is remarkable,' says a judicious writer, 'that one of whom we know nothing except her gentleness and her sorrow, should have exercised a magnetic power upon the world incomparably greater than was exercised by the most majestic female patriots of Paganism. Whatever may be thought of its theological propriety, there can be little doubt that the Catholic reverence for the Virgin has done much to elevate and purify the ideal of woman, and to soften the manners of men. It supplied in a great measure the redeeming and ennobling element in that strange amalgam of religious, licentious, and military feeling which was formed round women in the age of chivalry, and which no succeeding change of habit or belief has wholly destroyed' (Lecky).

52. Cp. Job 511.1210.18.27. The mighty] RV 'princes,' include Herod and his dynasty, but the main idea is that a kingdom based on humility and love has entered into the world, more powerful than all earthly kingdoms, and destined to revolutionise them. 53. Cp. Ps 107.9.34.10.18.25. In true OT. style spiritual and temporal blessings are conceived of as united in the Messianic age. The temporal needs of the poor and lowly are to be cared for and their wrongs redressed. All things needful both for their souls and bodies will be bountifully supplied. 54. Cp. Ps 98.3. 55. Cp. Mic 7.20. The national feeling is pronounced. The Gentiles are not mentioned, except indirectly in the allusion to the promise to Abraham. The true translation of vv. 54, 55 is (see RV) 'He hath helped Israel his servant, that he might remember mercy towards Abraham and his seed for ever, as he spake to our fathers.' 56. Joseph's discovery of Mary's condition (Mt 1.18) must have been subsequent to her return to Nazareth.

59. The eighth day] Circumcision took place on the eighth day, even though it was the sabbath: see Jn 7.22. At the circumcision of a child the circumciser said, 'Blessed be the Lord our God, who hath sanctified us by his precepts and hath given us the law of circumcision.' The father replied, 'Who hath sanctified us by his precepts and hath commanded us to enter the child into the covenant of Abraham our father.' 63. Writing table] i.e. a tablet covered with wax for writing upon.

68–79. The Benediction. 'This song, which was composed in the priest's mind during the time of his silence, broke solemnly from his lips the moment speech was restored to him, as the metal flows from the crucible in which it has been melted the moment that an outlet is made for it' (Godet). It consists of five strophes, each of three vv., but is most conveniently divided into two portions: (1) vv. 68–75, (2) vv. 76–79. In the first portion Zacharias praises God for having now fulfilled His promises to Israel by raising up the Messiah in David's house, to save Israel from foreign oppression, and to establish peace, true religion, and righteousness. In the second portion Zacharias directly addresses his son as the destined forerunner of the Messiah, and the preacher of repentance to Israel. The song closes with a beautiful description of the salvation which the Messiah will bring to His people.

This song, like the Magnificat, is purely Jewish in tone. It does not even mention the Gentiles, and it is only in the light of subsequent events that a Christian sense can be read into it.
1. Hath visited] The past tense may ex-s Zacharias' certainty that the Messiah will
2. but more probably it implies prophetic vledge that the conception of Jesus has
3. been taken place. Redeemed] To Zacharias
4. would mean political redemption from ign rule as well as spiritual redemption.
5. An horn of salvation] The power of the sianic King is likened to the strength of a
6. or wild-ox (Δ/AV 'unicorn'), which is re-
7. nted by his horns: cp. 182t 10 2822t Ps
8. , etc. David] The expression implies that
9. y was descended from David.
10. Since the world began] may be taken
11. ally, Adam being regarded as the first
12. shet. More probably it is used vaguely
13. 'in olden times.'

1. Enemies] i.e. Herod and the Romans,
14. when Christians sing this hymn, they mean 15. in and all the enemies of Christ. 72. To 16. orm the mercy promised to our fathers.'
17. RV implies that the patriarchs, though
18. still exist, and take an interest in the una-
19. ses of their posterity, a doctrine affirmed
20. y authority by Christ (Mt 22:29).

21. covenant] The 'covenant' and the 'oath'
22. are identical, though the irregular
23. mnatical construction conceals this: see
24. 222t-10-18. 76. Of the Lord] Zacharias under-
25. id it of Jehovah; Christians understand
26. f Christ. 77. This v. well describes the
27. racter of John's ministry, which joined the
28. ouncing of the Kingdom with the preach-
29. of repentance. Translate, 'To give unto
30. people knowledge of salvation—salvation
31. ch consists in the remission of sins.'

32. The dayspring] The Gk. word here
33. stole] is ambiguous. It may either mean
34. rising of a heavenly body, and hence the
35. eny body itself, so that the Messiah is
36. usually called 'the Sun' or 'Star of Israel,'
37. it may mean 'the Branch,' a title applied
38. the Messiah (Jer 23:3 33:15 Zech 3:8 6:12).

39. Peace] not successful war is Zacharias'
40. al for the Messianic period, and not only
41. thly peace, but 'peace with God.'

CHAPTER 2

BIRTH AND CHILDHOOD OF JESUS

1-5. The census of Quirinius. There are
6. historical difficulties in connexion with Luke's mention of the census of Quirinius:
7. There is no direct evidence, except St.
8. ke's statement, that Augustus (31 B.C.–14
9. ever held a census of the whole Roman
10. (2) Quirinius was not governor of
11. in the time of our Lord's birth (about 12. B.C.), but either Sentius Saturninus (9–6
13. ), or Quinctillius Varus (6–4 B.C.).
14. As to (1), the absence of direct confirmatory
15. idence ought not to be sufficient to discredit
16. a statement which is made as a result of care-
17. en enquiry, by a nearly contemporary author
18. who is honestly striving to be accurate (14:4),
19. and which is in itself credible, and in accord-
20. with Augustus's character and methods of 21. ministration. In 8 B.C. he carried
22. out a census of Roman citizens throughout
23. the empire, and it is quite possible that he
24. also planned a general census, which, how-
25. ever, owing to administrative difficulties, was
26. not completely executed in every part of
27. the empire. (2) Although Quirinius was not
28. governor of Syria in 7, 6 B.C., he may have
29. been there as 'legatus Caesaris' to conduct
30. the census, or more probably to carry on the
31. war with the troublesome tribe of the Homo-
32. adenses. It was not unusual, when a pro-33.ince was in a disturbed state, for the civil 34. and military administration to be placed in 35. different hands. It is probable, therefore,
36. that, when our Lord was born, Saturninus
37. or Varus was at the head of the civil, and
38. Quirinius of the military, administration of
39. Syria. Quirinius was civil governor of Syria
40. some twelve years later (6 A.D.), when he
41. carried out the well-known census of A.C.57,
42. mentioned also by Josephus ('Ant.' xviii. 1.1, 43. 2.1). It is known, however, from an inscrip-
44. tion discovered at Tivoli, in 1764, that he
45. held office in Syria at an earlier date, when he
46. subdued the Homenadenses, and for this ex-
47. ploit was honoured by two 'supplications' (or 48. solemn thanksgivings to the gods), and the
49. decorations of a triumphing general. We may
50. conjecture, therefore, that this was in 7, 6 B.C., 51. at the time when, according to St. Luke, the
52. earlier and less-known census took place.

1. Augustus] The first Roman emperor. His
2. actual reign dated from the battle of Actium 31
3. B.C. to his death in 14 A.D. Taxed] RV 'en-
4. rolled.' This enrolment was perhaps simply a
5. census or numbering of the inhabitants.
6. The second enrolment under Quirinius in 7 A.D.
7. was for purposes of taxation, and excited a
8. rebellion (A.C.7).

2. Cyrenius] RV 'Quirinius.'

3. Into his own city] It was a fixed prin-
4. ciple of Roman government to respect the
5. feelings and even the prejudices of subject
6. peoples, and Herod, being a foreigner whose
7. rule was barely tolerated by patriotic Jews,
8. had every reason not to give offence. He
9. enrolled his pagan subjects, therefore, in the 10. Roman manner, but allowed the Jews the 11. privilege of being enrolled in their place of
12. origin according to their family and tribe.

5. His espoused wife] RV 'who was be-
13. trothed to him.' Yet they were probably
14. married, because it was contrary to Jewish
15. custom for betrothed persons to live together,
16. and Joseph would wish to protect Mary by
17. making her his wife as soon as possible.
6, 7. The Nativity. See on Mt 21. There is an inward fitness that He, who for our sake emptied Himself of His glory, should be born in a stable and laid in a manger, but assuredly it would never have occurred to any one, Jew or Christian, to invent such a story, which accordingly may be accepted as authentic history. By the manner of His birth Jesus showed His sympathy with the hard lot of the poor, and His contempt for human splendour. He also gave a foretaste of His future manner of life, when He was despised and rejected of men, and had no place to lay His head.

7. Firstborn] A technical term among the Jews, signifying 'that which openeth the womb' (Ex 34:19ff.), and not implying the birth of other offspring. That St. Luke uses it in this technical sense is clear from 27, 28. No room] It is clear from Mt 2:11 that as soon as the enrolment was over, and the crowds attending it had dispersed, Joseph and Mary obtained a house in Bethlehem, intending to settle there permanently, since it was the most fitting place for the residence of the Messiah.

8–20. Announcement to the shepherds, who visit the Holy Family. As Jesus was born in a stable, so His birth was first announced to peasants, in token that the gospel was meant for the poor and ignorant, as well as for the rich and learned.

8. Shepherds] David himself had been a shepherd at Bethlehem (1 S 16:11). The flocks at Bethlehem were destined for the Temple sacrifices, and the shepherds who kept them occupied a higher social position than other shepherds, who were considered outcasts by the scribes because of their necessary isolation from religious ordinances. There was a Jewish tradition that the birth of the Messiah would be proclaimed from 'Migdal Eder,' 'the tower of the flock,' which lay near Bethlehem on the road to Jerusalem (Edersheim).

10. To all people] RV 'to all the people' (of Israel). There is here no express mention of the Gentiles. 11. A Saviour] The spiritual sense is certainly prominent here—'a Saviour from sin and death.' This title of Jesus is rare in the Gospels, being found only here and in Jn 4:42; several times in Titus and 2 Peter.

12. Shall be a sign] RV 'is the sign.' The unusual sight of an infant in a manger would be a sign that the angel had spoken the truth.

14. The 'Gloria in excelsis' ('Glory in the highest') is that of heaven praised God for His wondrous love to mankind shown in the Incarnation, was expanded into a morning hymn as early as the 2nd cent., and has been sung in the Communion service of the Western Church for many ages. Taking the old reading of the AV, the hymn, which consists of two lines, may be thus paraphrased:

(1) The angels are praising God in highest heaven for Christ's Nativity. (2) On earth men enjoy peace with God, and peace and goodwill with one another. But the reading of the RV ('men of good pleasure') is preferable, and the meaning is, (1) The angels are praising God in highest heaven for Christ's Nativity. (2) There is peace on earth (peace with God and peace with one another) among men to whom God shows His favour by this wondrous birth.

The hymn goes beyond the words of the angel, in declaring that God's favour in Christ is extended to all mankind.

19. Mary's was a quiet and reflective nature; cp. v. 51. These two vv. suggest that it was from her the information contained in these chapters was derived.

21. The Circumcision. Although our Lord was sinless, He was subjected to a rite which symbolised the putting off of the sinful lusts of the flesh. Although He was the Son of God, it behoved Him to be made a child of God through the covenant of Abraham. Now first His redeeming blood was shed, and the pain of the Circumcision was a foretaste of Calvary:

cp. Mt 3:10 Ro 2:3 Heb 2:17 Gal 4:4. Under the new covenant the sacrament of Holy Baptism (the circumcision made without hands, Col 2:11, has 'fulfilled,' and taken the place of circumcision.

22–38. The Purification and Presentation in the Temple. Women after childbirth were unclean, for a forty days, for a girl eighty days. They were then bound to present an offering for Purification, viz. a lamb for a burnt offering and a pigeon for a sin offering. Poor women might offer two pigeons, as the mother of Jesus did: see Lv 12. A firstborn son was presented to God and redeemed with five shekels of the sanctuary (10 or 12 shillings), Ex 13:2 Nu 8:16 18 12. Neither of these ceremonies necessitated personal attendance of the mother in the Temple. A woman could offer her sacrifices of purification by proxy, and a firstborn son could be presented, and his redemption price paid to a priest anywhere. Joseph and Mary went to the Temple because they were near, and because they loved the house of God.

22. Her purification] RV 'their purification,' i.e. either, (1) the Jews' purification, or (2) the purification of mother and child. Strictly speaking, however, only the mother (not the child) was ceremonially unclean.

25–35. Simeon and the Nunc Dimittis] Simeon belonged, like Zacharias and Anna, to the class of humble and devout Jews who 'looked for the redemption of Jerusalem,' and whose type of piety was very different from that of the scribes: see vv. 37, 38. To such persons the sacrificial system of the Old Covet and the spiritual teaching of the prophets, been a true preparation for Christ, and consequently God shed abroad among them the spirit of prophecy, and revealed to them truths which the doctors of the Law were blind.

25. The consolation of Israel] a common expression among the rabbis for the messianic hope. ‘So may I see the consolation was a small form of oath.’

26. The Lord’s Christ] same as the Christ of God] (9:29), i.e. the whom God has sent as the Messiah.

29-32. This beautiful hymn (usually called ‘Nunc Dimittis’), which has been used in the evening service of the Church since the 11th or 5th century, is in thorough harmony with the spirit of this Gospel. It expressly includes the Gentiles in Christ’s Kingdom, in accordance with the OT. prophecies.

29. The meaning is, ‘My master and owner, through whom God has sent the Messiah, I give freedom to the slave, according to the prophetic word that thou spakest’ (v. 26). Simeon utters his release from the toils and troubles of life as an emancipation from slavery, a stage to a state of freedom and rest. In ace means ‘in a state of peace with God.’

30. Thy salvation] is practically personal, saving the Messiah.

31. All people] RV ‘all peoples,’ i.e. all nations of the earth. A light, etc.] V-A light for revelation to the Gentiles, etc. the Messiah is the Light of the Gentiles, not by God to reveal His truth to the heathen world. He is also the glory of the chosen people, because all nations in glorifying the Messiah will glorify the nation from whom the Messiah springs. ‘In those days ten men’s all languages of the nations shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you’ (Zechariah 8).

33. Joseph and his mother] RV ‘his father and his mother.’ Since Joseph filled the place of a father to Jesus, he was naturally called his father: cp. v. 27, ‘the parents.’

34. Behold this child, etc.] This child will divide Israel into two opposite camps. Some will reject His claims. ‘To such He will be a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence’ (Isa 8:14), i.e. the occasion of their spiritual ruin. Others will accept His claims. Such He will raise through their faith to a higher spiritual life, which may be rightly called a resurrection (rising again) from death to life.

35. Yea, a sword] This prophecy was fulfilled when Mary saw her Son rejected, condemned, insulted, scourged, and crucified.

That the thoughts] i.e. that the true characters of men (as shown in their reception or rejection of Jesus) may be made manifest.

36-38. Anna the prophetess also recognizes Jesus as the Messiah, and speaks of Him as such among those who looked for the redemption of Jerusalem. Her manner of life is described in detail, because she is a type of the widows indeed of the Christian Church (1 Tim 5:16), who did not marry again, but devoted themselves to works of charity and piety.

36. Prophetess] The title shows that Anna was known as a prophetess before the incident. Other instances of prophetesses are Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, Huldah, and the daughters of Philip. Aser] RV ‘Asher.’ It is clear that members of other tribes than Judah and Levi returned from the Captivity.

37. If she was married at 12, which is possible in the East, she must have been 103 years old. Departed not] i.e. was unfailing in her attendance. All them that looked, etc.] see on vv. 25-35.

39. Return to Nazareth. St. Luke represents the Holy Family as returning to Nazareth immediately after the Purification, without any allusion to the visit of the Magi, or the flight into Egypt. This seems to indicate that he did not use St. Matthew’s Gospel.

40. Growth and spiritual development of Jesus. The information may have been gained from the mother herself, Waxing strong in spirit] RV omits ‘in spirit.’ Filled with wisdom] lit. ‘becoming full of wisdom’: cp. v. 52, ‘increased in wisdom.’ As Jesus was perfect God and perfect man so He possessed completely the attributes of both natures. As God He knew all things, but as man He waxed strong in spirit, becoming filled with wisdom, and ‘increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.’ As an infant He possessed the knowledge proper to an infant; as a boy, that proper to a boy; as a man, that proper to a man; as the anointed Messiah (322), that proper to one commissioned to establish the Kingdom of God on earth; and as the ascended and glorified Redeemer, that proper to one who, as man, and not simply as God, rules the entire universe (Mt 28:18). What this means we may not be able to say, but we may rest assured He still feels for men, and understands their needs. Although it was always possible for Him who was God as well as man, to draw, if the needs of His mission required it, upon the inexhaustible stores of His divine knowledge (cp. Jn 14), yet it was His usual custom to obtain His information through human channels and from human sources, and, even as a teacher, to use chiefly the ample stores of His supernaturally enlightened human knowledge. This ledge which was granted to the Incarnate Son for the purpose of communicating to man the Father's perfect and final revelation; but it was limited in accordance with its object, and did not embrace matters which it was inexpedient for man to know, and therefore for the Incarnate Son to reveal: see on Mk 13:32, and cp. Ac 17.

40-52. The boy Jesus in the Temple. We know nothing directly of the childhood of Jesus except this one incident, which is recorded entirely for the sake of the remarkable utterance in v. 49.

41. As women were not obliged to attend, Mary's regular keeping of the feasts is a mark of special piety: cp. v. 22.

42. Twelve years] Jesus accompanied His parents for the first time, because He was approaching his thirteenth year, in which He would become, by Jewish custom, "a son of the Law," i.e. subject to its obligations.

43. Tarried behind] Jesus was probably staying with friends, and thought that His parents would remain in Jerusalem for the whole Passover week. Instead of this they seem to have left after two days, as was often done.

46. After three days] They spent one day looking for Him in the carvan, one day in the return journey to Jerusalem, and found Him on the third day. Doctors] i.e. scribes or rabbis. Among the famous men who may possibly have been present were the aged Hillel and Shammay, Rabban Simeon, Gamaliel, Annas, Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, Johanan ben-Zacchai, Caiaphas. It is said (but it is not certain) that there was a synagogue within the Temple enclosure, where members of the Sanhedrin gave public instruction on sabbaths and festivals. Hearing them] not teaching them, as the Apocryphal Gospels say.

49. How is it] 'Not a reproof, but an expression of surprise. He is not surprised at their coming back for Him, but at their not knowing where to find Him.' About my Father's business] This translation is possible, but that of the R.V. 'in my Father's house,' is more probable. The words mean: 'There is only one place in Jerusalem where I, the Son of God, might be expected to be found, and that is in my Father's house.' The utterance shows that even at this early age Jesus was conscious that His true father was not Joseph (as His mother's words seemed to imply, v. 48), but God.

50. Understood not] The lapse of twelve years during which no miracle had occurred, had partly obliterated the impression made by St. Mary. 51. Was subject] The evangelist guards against the possible supposition that Christ's words in v. 49 were intended as a repudiation of His parents' authority over Him. 52. See on v. 40.

CHAPTER 3

JOHN'S MINISTRY. BAPTISM AND GENEALOGY OF JESUS

1-14. Preliminary Ministry of the Baptist

(Mt 3:1 Mk 1:1). See on Mt.

1. In the fifteenth year] If the years of Tiberius are reckoned from the death of Augustus, who died 14 A.D., the date is 28, 29 A.D. Most authorities, however, suppose that the years of Tiberius are here reckoned from 11 A.D., when he was made the colleague of Augustus in the empire, with equal authority over all the provinces and armies. This gives the date 25, 26 A.D. for the beginning of the ministry of John. Jesus, who appeared soon afterwards, was, therefore, probably baptised 26 A.D., and kept the first Passover of His ministry (Jn 2:18) 27 A.D. Allowing three Passovers to the ministry, the crucifixion took place in 29 A.D.

Pilate] see on Mt 27:2.

Herod being tetrarch] see art. 'Dynasty of the Herods.'

Philip] the tetrarch, is to be carefully distinguished from his brother Herod Philip, who was of private station. He was the son of Herod the Great by a woman of Jerusalem named Cleopatra. He ruled for 38 years without reproach, and was favourably distinguished from the other sons of Herod by his gentleness and want of ambition. Josephus says of him: 'He was moderate, and peaceful in his rule, and spent his whole life in his country. He went out with only a small retinue, always taking with him the throne on which he might sit and judge. Whenever he met, any one who had need of him, he made no delay, but set down the throne wherever he might be, and heard the case.' See, further, art. 'Dynasty of the Herods.'

Lysanias] The only Lysanias mentioned in profane history as ruling over Abilene was executed 36 B.C. by the triumvir Mark Antony, at the instigation of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. He governed not only Abilene, but also Ituraea and other extensive districts. The Lysanias of St. Luke is probably his grandson.

Abilene] the territory round Abila, a town of some importance, situated on the River Abana, in a gorge of Mt. Antilbanus, 18 Roman m. from Damascus on the way to Heliopolis or Baalbec. There are still to be seen ugliness and self-will and obstinacy, which

16-30. Visit to Nazareth. See Mt 13:58

Mk 6:1. It must remain doubtful whether this visit to Nazareth, which Lk places at the beginning of the Galilean ministry, is identical with that placed considerably later by Mt and Mk.

In any case, Lk here makes use of an important independent source. On synagogues see on Mt 4:58.

16. As his custom was] When living at Nazareth, Jesus had been accustomed to read the lessons as an ordinary member of the congregation. Even boys under age were allowed to do this. Stood up for to read] The Law and the Prophets, but not the Hagigrapha, were read standing. The rabbis said:

'They do not read the law otherwise than standing up. Nay, it is unlawful for him that readeth to lean upon anything.' A man may read out of the book of Esther either standing or sitting, but not so out of the Law. Jesus having stood to read, sat to expound. As He read in Hebrew, the Mergugeman, or Interpreter, translated into the vernacular Aramaic.

See on Mt 2:26.

17. There was delivered ... the book (or 'a roll')] The rolls were in the charge of the bazzan, or attendant (v. 20), who handed them to the reader, and received them back when read. Sometimes the prophets formed a single roll, sometimes (as here) they were divided into books.

18. From Isa 61:1,2, with one clause 'to set at liberty them that are bruised' inserted from

Isa 58:6, LXX. This passage, in which the prophet declares to the exiles in Babylon their approaching deliverance, is now read in Jewish synagogues on the Day of Atonement, and may so have been read even at that time. The reading was very short (two verses only), because a sermon was to follow. When there was no sermon, the reading was made considerably longer.

The Spirit of the Lord, etc.] In Isaiah this is a soliloquy of the Righteous Servant of Jehovah, whom our Lord identifies with Himself. The Jews generally regarded it as a soliloquy of the prophet himself. He hath anointed me] viz. at My baptism. He hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted] RV omits.

To preach deliverance] RV 'to proclaim release to the captives.' The original words have reference to the release of the Jewish captives from Babylon. Jesus applies them to the release of sinners from the guilt and bondage of sin, through His ministry. The blind] Spiritual blindness is here chiefly in view. To set at liberty them that are bruised]

From Isa 58:6. Our Lord purposely inserted these words in the passage read according to a common custom. The rabbis said, 'The reader of the prophet may skip from one text to another, but he may not skip from prophet to prophet, but in the twelve (minor) prophets it is lawful." 19. To preach the acceptable year of the Lord] In Isaiah this is the year of the return, but Jesus applies it to His earthly ministry. It is not to be inferred from this that Christ’s ministry lasted only a year.

21. This day is this scripture, etc.] With the emphatic self-assertion of this sermon, cp. the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7).

22. Bare him witness] i.e. declared that the report of His power as a preacher was not exaggerated. And they said] or, rather, ‘but they said,’ according to the Heb. idiom, which has only one word for ‘and’ and ‘but.’ Is not this... Joseph’s son?] and, therefore, not the Messiah, or a prophet, or any one great.

23. Physician, heal thyself] The defect or malady from which, in the opinion of the Nazarenes, Christ was suffering, was want of consideration among those who knew Him best, especially his fellow-townsmen. Let Him remove that defect by working such miracles as would convince them that He was a teacher sent from God, and He would then be more successful in ‘healing,’ i.e. converting, others. The Nazarenes were jealous because Jesus had worked miracles at Capernaum and other places before He worked any at Nazareth. The proverb occurs frequently in rabbinical writings, ‘Physician, heal thine own lameness.’ ‘In a bad state is the city whose physician has the gout, and whose steward has one eye.’

24. No prophet is accepted] RV ‘acceptable.’ The truth is a familiar one. We often think lightly of what is very familiar. The blessings at our doors are those we value least. Here and in Mt 15:37, Christ’s ‘own country’ is Nazareth, where He was brought up. In Jn 4:44 it is perhaps Judea, where He was born. There is a curious parallel in the life of ‘the heathen Christ,’ Apollonius of Tyana, who is represented as saying, ‘What wonder is it, if, when I am esteemed by the rest of mankind as like a god, and by some even as a god, my own country alone until now refuses to recognise me? ’ Plutarch says, ‘You will find that few of the most prudent and wisest of mankind have been appreciated in their own country.’ Another ancient writer says, ‘All the philosophers seem to have had a hard life in their own country.’

25-27. The vv. contain a refusal to work miracles in Nazareth. St. Matthew (13:58) gives the reason: ‘because of their unbelief.’

25. Elias] RV ‘Elijah.’ Our Lord gives two instances of prophets, who, being dishonoured in their own country, went and conferred great blessings upon foreigners. Three years and six months] So also in Jas 5:17. This does not agree with the OT., which says that the rain returned in the third year (1K 17:18), but it agrees with Jewish traditional usage, which frequently introduced the number three and a half, as being half of the mystical number seven. Ever since the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes, three years and a half (= 42 months = 1,260 days) had become the traditional duration of times of great calamity (Dan 7:25 12 Rev 11:3 12:6,14 13:6) (Plummer).

27. Elisha] RV ‘Elisha.’

28. They are angry with Jesus for venturing to compare Himself with the old prophets, and for rebuking them for their want of faith in Him.

29. That they might cast him down] perhaps as a preliminary to stoning Him as a blasphemer—The place of execution was twice a man’s height. One of the witnesses throws him down, etc. As the local synagogues with their ‘bench of three’ could not condemn to death, Plummer conjectures that this was what the Jews call ‘the rebel’s beating.’ This was administered by the people without trial and on the spot, when any one was caught in what seemed to be a flagrant violation of some law or tradition (Jn 8:59 10:38 Ac 21:31,32).

30. Went his way] A mysterious restraint upon the power of His enemies is implied as in Jn 18:6.

38-41. Healing of Simon’s wife’s mother and others (Mt 8:14 Mk 1:35). See on Mt.

44. The synagogues of Galilee] The best critics read, ‘the synagogues of Judea.’ This is the only express mention by the synoptists of the Judean ministry, but see on Mt 23:37.

CHAPTER 5

MIRACULOUS DRAUGHT OF FISHES.

THE PAISLED MAN

1-11. First miraculous draught of fishes (peculiar to Lk). Many critics identify this incident with that recorded in Mt 4:18 and Mk 1:16. But there are important considerations on the other side: (1) the persons are different (there four disciples, here Peter is addressed); (2) the words used, though similar in sense, are very different in form; (3) the disciples are not said to have ‘left all’ in Mt, but only to have left their father in the ship. Moreover, in Mt and Mk the disciples are fishing, here they are washing their nets before putting them away. Besides, if Mt and Mk really describe the same event, why do they omit the most striking incident of all, the miraculous draught of fishes? See on Mt 4:18.
he incident was probably a miracle, but it is possible to give a plausible natural explanation of it. Tristram says: 'The thickness of shallows of fish in the Lake of Gennesareth must be incredible to any one who has not seen them. They often cover an area of more than an acre, and when the fish move slowly forward in a mass, and are rising out of the water, they are packed so close together, it appears as if a heavy rain was beating on the surface of the water.' Fish so badly packed as this could not easily escape.

Master' implying that he was already a disciple. This particular word is peculiar to Luke.

Depart from me' Peter perceived that command was effectual beyond expectation, and that He was a divine and supernatural man, and, therefore, feeling himself orthodox, begged Him to depart' (Euthymius). natural for the sinful soul to shrink from presence of the all-holy God. The nearness of God had been brought home to St. Peter by the miracle which he had just witnessed: cp. Ex 20:13-19.

6. Catch men'] lit. 'catch them alive.' The stakes are to catch men for life, not for hire, by means of their preaching. In the case of Clement of Alexandria, 200 a.d., there beautiful hymn to Christ as the fisher:

Fisher of mortal men,\nEven of those that are being saved,\nEver the holy fish\nFrom the wild ocean\nOf the world's sea of sin\nBy thy sweet life thou art called away.'

2-16. The leper cleansed (Mt 8:1, Mk 1:40). See on Mt.

And prayed'] Peculiar to Lk, who more than any other evangelist mentions our Lord's prayers.

7-26. The Paralytic (Mt 9:1, Mk 2:1). See Mt.

(Peculiar to Lk.) Christ means that cannot expect the discipline of John and the Pharisees, who have tasted the old wine the Law, and found it good, to receive at once and without difficulty the new teaching. The old is better] So AV and R.M.; but R.V. 1:15-16. the old is good.'

CHAPTER 6

VOICE OF THE TWELVE. SERMON IN THE PLAIN

1-5. Plucking the ears of corn (Mt 12:1, Mk 9:3). See on Mt and Mk.

1. On the second sabbath after the first] Gk. ἐξ ἑτέρου κυρίου, lit. 'second-first.' There is considerable ground for omitting this obscure expression as interpolated, and reading simply, 'on a sabbath,' with the R.V. If, however, it is genuine, it probably means 'on the second sabbath after the waving of the sheaf on the second day of the Passover festival' (see Lv 23:10). It was the custom to number the sabbaths from Passover to Pentecost from this day. Of the numerous other interpretations the best are, 'the second chief sabbath of the year' (i.e. Pentecost), and 'the first sabbath of the second month of the year.' The R.'Jewish Encycl.' conjectures that the disciples were blamed for plucking the ears before the sheaf was waved, which was forbidden (Lv 23:15).

5. In one important MS, the Codex Bezae, this v. is placed after v. 10, and in its place is inserted this remarkable incident and saying of Jesus: 'On the same day He saw a man working on the sabbath, and said to him: "O man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou. But if thou knowest not, cursed art thou, and a transgressor of the law."' The utterance is perhaps authentic. In substance it certainly bears the mark of genius. I regard it as an interpolated fragment of a true tradition' (Meyer). 'We may believe that this traditional story is true' (Plummer). 'Its form and contents speak for its originality, and, I am disposed to believe, its authenticity' (Alford). On the contrary, Godet says, 'This can only be an invention or a perversion.'

6-11. The man with the withered hand (Mt 12:10, Mk 3:1). See on Mt.

12-19. Choice of the Twelve (Mt 10:2, Mk 3:13). See on Mt and Mk.

17. In the plain] R.V. 'on a level place.' This may have been a plateau, high up the mountains, but see on Mt 5:1.

20-49. Great sermon to the disciples and in part to the multitudes. It forms here the ordination address of the Twelve. In what sense it is identical with the Sermon on the Mount is explained on Mt 5:1. That it is for all practical purposes the same sermon, but abridged, is shown by the fact that it contains only five verses (vv. 24-26, 39, 40) which are not in St. Matthew's version, and that it follows St. Matthew's order.

Analysis: (1) Four beatitudes, on the poor, the hungry, weepers, and the hated (vv. 20-23).

(2) Four woes, on the rich, the full, laugthers, and the well spoken of (vv. 24-26).

(3) Exhortation to love, as shown in returning good for evil, not resisting evil, loving enemies, not judging rashly (vv. 27-38).

(4) Exhortation to stringent self-examination on the part of those who presume to guide others, lest they be found to be hypocrites (vv. 39-45).
(5) Exhortation to obedience. The strong foundation upon which obedient Christians build (vv. 46–49).

St. Luke’s sermon is much less striking than St. Matthew’s. It omits the whole question of the relation of the Gospel to the Law, and all those passages in which Christ claims to be the supreme Legislator, Judge, and Ruler of the human race; it has only four beatitudes instead of eight, and in general gives the impression of an abridged and imperfect report, in which some of the sayings, owing to extensive omissions, do not appear in their true context. Some, but not all, of St. Luke’s omissions can be accounted for by the fact that his Gospel was intended for Gentiles.

Some critics profess to find in St. Luke’s sermon an Ebionitic, or as we should now say, a socialistic or communist tendency. Probably wrongly, for by ‘the poor’ and ‘the hungry,’ St. Luke does not mean the literally such, any more than St. Matthew, who expressly speaks of ‘the poor in spirit,’ and of those who ‘hunger and thirst after righteousness.’ So also St. Luke’s rich, well-fed, and prosperous persons, are not simply the well-to-do, but those who have the vices of their station. Our Lord never approves poverty or condemns riches simply as such. See on Mt.

20–23. Four Beatitudes. See on Mt 5 3–12.

22. Separate you] viz. by communication. The usual sentence was for thirty days, during which the excommunicated might not come within four cubits of any one.

24–26. Four woes (peculiar to Lk). The ‘woes’ refer chiefly to future punishment in the world to come, but not exclusively, for in the siege of Jerusalem they received a literal fulfilment.

24. You that are rich] i.e. those who, possessing wealth, trust in it (Mk 10:24), or spend it in selfish luxury like Dives (Lk 16:19), and despise the poor (Jas 2:6), and oppress them (Jas 5:4). Ye have received your consolation] cp. Abraham’s words to Dives (16:25), ‘Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst (in full) thy good things.’

25. You that are full and careless of your poorer brethren’s needs, like the rich man ‘who fared sumptuously every day’ (16:19). Shall hunger] Spiritual destitution is meant, in this world and the next. That laugh] The godless, contemptuous laughter of the wicked (Ecclus 19:80) is meant. Innocent mirth is approved by Christ (Lk 15:22). Mourn and weep] viz. in the world to come.

26. A warning to all Christian ministers and teachers not to court popularity by speaking smooth words, and saying ‘Peace, when there is no peace.’ Plutarch relates of Phocion the Athenian, ‘Once while he was delivering a public speech and making a good impression, and saw that all his hearers were equally pleased with what he said, he turned to his friends and said, “Surely I must have forgotten myself, and said something wrong.”’

Similarly Diogenes Laertius relates of a certain philosopher, that when some one announced to him that all men were praising him, he replied, ‘Why, what evil have I done?’

27–38. Exhortations to love, forgiveness of injuries, and avoiding of rash judgments.

27–30. See on Mt 5:38–42.

31. See on Mt 7:12.

37, 38. See on Mt 7:1–2.

39. St. Matthew gives this saying in a much more suitable connexion (Mt 15:14), where it is applied to the Pharisees. Here it appears to mean that before judging others we must judge ourselves, otherwise we shall be blind leaders of the blind. The ditch] RV ‘a pit.’ Palestine is full of unfenced wells, quarries, etc.

40. Another saying which occurs in a more natural context in Mt 10:28, q.v.

41–45. Exhortation to stringent self-examination on the part of religious guides.

41, 42. See on Mt 7:5–6.

43–45. See on Mt 7:10–20, and Mt 12:35, 36.

46–49. Obedient hearing. See on Mt 7:21–27.

CHAPTER 7

RAISING OF THE WIDOW’S SON. THE WOMAN WHO WAS A SINNER

1–10. Healing of the centurion’s servant. See on Mt 8.

11. Nain] 25 m. SW. of Capernaum on the hill ‘little Hermon’ as it slopes down to the plain of Esdraelon: now a squad collection of mud-hovels. Much people] RV ‘a great multitude,’ Lazarus was also raised in the presence of a multitude of witnesses.

12. Carried out] Jewish tombs were always outside the walls, and burials were required to be performed within 24 hours. Only son] see Jrr 6:26 Zech 12:10 Am 8:10. 14. The bier] a mere pallet, not a coffin.

I say unto thee] Elijah and Elisha raised the dead with difficulty, and after strong wranglings with God in prayer (1 K 17:20, 21 2 K 4:38, 34), Christ without effort, by a single word of power: cp. Jn 11:43. 16. A great prophet] or, ‘even the prophet’ (Dt 18:15), for only the very greatest prophets had raised the dead.

18–23. A deputation from John the Baptist. See on Mt 11:2.

39. This man, if he were a prophet] One good MS reads ‘the prophet.’

40. Jesus answering] The Pharisee thought that Jesus did not know the woman’s history. Jesus shows the Pharisee that He can discern even the thoughts of his own heart. Simon] the same as Simeon, or Symeon. It is a mere coincidence that the other anointing took place at the house of a man of the same name. There are eleven Simons in the OT., nine in the NT., and twenty in Josephus. 41. Pence] i.e. denarior. According to weight a denarius was about 8d., but according to purchasing power 2s. or more. The two debts were, therefore, about £50 and £5.

44. No water] cp. Gn 18:4 Jg 19:15 18:25-41, and see on Jn 13:5. 46. Oil] which was cheap, as opposed to ointment, which was dear.

47. Thou canst see that she is a reformed character and that her many sins have been forgiven, because of the love she bears to Me, who have saved her from her sinful life. It should be carefully observed that the woman loved because she was forgiven, not forgiven because she loved.

To whom little is forgiven] i.e. ‘Thou, Simon, like this woman, hast also been My disciple, but it is plain from the little love thou showest Me that, unlike her, thou hast not been brought to repentance through My ministry.’

48. Thy sins are forgiven] Christ had forgiven her before, when she turned from her old life. He now for her greater comfort renews the absolution. For the bearing of Christ’s absolving power upon His divinity, see on Mt 9:14. 49. Sins also] RV ‘even sins.’

CHAPTER 8
PARABLE OF THE SOWER. THE DEMONIAC OF GADARA

1-3. Tours through Galilee. The ministering women (peculiar to Lk).

2. Mary called Magdalenae] see on Mt 27:56. Seven devils] Mk 16:9. The ‘seven’ indicates the greatness of her disease, not of her previous wickedness. There is no evidence that the persons possessed with devils in the NT. were specially wicked, or that Mary Magdalenae had ever been a woman of evil life.

3. Joanna] see 24:10. Our Lord did not, like the Pharisees, ‘devour widows’ houses.’ Those who contributed to His support were women of wealth and position. Chusa] probably the steward of Herod Antipas, who as such managed his house and estates. From Joanna St. Luke probably obtained much of his special information. Susanna] Of her nothing is known.

Ministered unto him] This illustrates our Lord’s precept (1 Cor 9:18) that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.

4-15. Parable of the Sower (Mt 13; Mk 4:1). See on Mt.
19–21. His mother and brethren (Mt 12:46 Mk 3:31). See on Mt.

22–25. Stilling the storm (Mt 8:23–25 Mk 4:35).
See on Mt, Mk.

26–39. The demoniac in the country of the Gadarenes (RV ‘Gerasenes’) (Mt 8:28 Mk 5:1).
See on Mt, Mk.

40–56. Jairus’ daughter. The woman with an issue (Mt 9:15 Mk 5:21). See on Mt.

CHAPTER 9
FEEDING THE FIVE THOUSAND. PETER’S
CONFESSION. THE TRANSFIGURATION

1–6. Mission of the Twelve (Mt 10:1,5–15 Mk 6:7–13). See on Mt.

7–9. Herod thinks that John is risen again
(Mt 14:1 Mk 6:14). See on Mt.

10–17. Feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14:18 Mk 6:30 Jn 6:1). See on Mt and Jn.

18–27. Confession of Peter (Mt 16:13 Mk 8:27).
See on Mt. St. Luke’s account is the most imperfect. Why he omits the locality (Caesarea Philippi), and Christ’s rebuke to Peter, which were certainly in his source, does not appear. He alone mentions that Christ was ‘praying alone’ (v. 18).

28–36. The Transfiguration (Mt 17:1 Mk 9:2).
See on Mt.

31. Lk alone mentions the subject of the conversation, Christ’s death.

37–43. The epileptic healed (Mt 17:14 Mk 9:14).
See on Mt and Mk.

43–45. He predicts His Passion (Mt 17:22 Mk 9:30). See on Mt. It is not clear why St.
Luke omits the prophecy of the resurrection, which certainly was in the source used by the synoptists. See Mt and Mk.

46–48. Who should be greatest (Mt 18:1 Mk
9:33). See on Mt.

49, 50. The man casting out devils in Christ’s name. See on Mk 9:35–41.

begins a long and important section consisting of ten chapters (9:51–19:28) peculiar to the third Gospel, and called generally the ‘Persean section.’ (For ‘Persean’ see on Mt 19:1.) From the narratives of Mt and Mk, who devote but a chapter to it (Mt 19 Mk 10), it would be supposed that the final journey of Jesus to Jerusalem occupied not more than a week or two, but in St. Luke it is so crowded with incidents, that several months must be assigned to it. It need not, however, be supposed that all the incidents and discourses which St. Luke places in this period really belong to it. Marks of time are infrequent and vague, and lead to the conclusion that many of the incidents came into the evangelist’s hands with no indications of date, and were, therefore, grouped together in this appendix to the Galilean ministry. All

Some think that St. Luke describes not one, but three journeys to Jerusalem: (1) 9:51 = Jn 7:1–10:39 (Feast of Tabernacles and of Dedication; (2) 13:22 = Jn 11 (raising of Lazarus);
(3) 17:11 = Jn 11:53 (journey from Ephraim to Jerusalem). But it is better to hold that St.
Luke describes only one journey, which partook largely of the nature of an extended missionary tour.

51–56. James and John desire to call down fire upon a Samaritan village (peculiar to Lk).
Though James and John did not gain their title ‘Boanerges’ (Mk 3:17) from this incident, yet it undoubtedly illustrates the character of the ‘Sons of Thunder’ on its weaker side.
Their desire for vengeance was a fault, but a generous one. They resented, not a personal slight, but an insult to the Master whom they had now come to regard as greater than Moses or Elijah or any OT. saint. They were right to be angry, but they were wrong in their anger to forget mercy, and to desire to destroy rather than to save sinners.

51. When the time was come (RV ‘when the days were well nigh come’) that he should be received up [lit. ‘for His Ascension,’ St. Luke thus indicating that His painful death would have a glorious issue. Set his face] see Isa 50:7.
St. Mark states that Jesus went before, and the disciples followed in amazement and appre-hsion (Mk 10:32).

52. Samaritans see on Jn 4:8,9,20. To make ready [viz. a lodging and a meal.

53. As though he would go to Jerusalem
The Samaritans expected a Messiah, but the fact that Jesus was going to Jerusalem to worship, rather than to their own holy mountain Gerizim, was a sufficient proof to them that Jesus was not he. The Jews often passed through Samaria, but they seldom availed themselves of Samaritan hospitality, though according to the rabbis ‘their land was clean, their waters were clean, their dwellings were clean, and their roads were clean.

54. Even as Elias (Elijah) did) 2K1:10, Omitted by RV. 55. Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of] (omitted by important ancient authorities, see RV), i.e. either,
(1) ye know not that the spirit of the new covenant is one of forbearance and forgiveness; or, (2) ye know not that the spirit which you exhibit comes from Satan not from God.

56. For the Son . . save them] These beautiful words are wanting in many ancient authorities, but are in any case an authentic utterance of Jesus, appropriately inserted here.

57–62. Jesus is joined by new disciples.
See on Mt 8:10–22.

61, 62. Peculiar to Lk.

61. Bid them farewell] Our Lord probably
CHAPTER 10
HE SEVENTY. THE GOOD SAMARITAN. MARTHA AND MARY

16. Choice and mission of the Seventy (peculiar to Lk). Another step in the organisation of the Church. The Seventy receive a coordinate commission, similar to that of the apostles, to preach and to cast out devils (9, 17). Two motives may be discerned in the sending forth of so numerous a body of missionaries. (1) The time before His Passion was now short, and Jesus wished the message of salvation to reach as many Israelites as possible. (2) He wished to train His followers to act alone after His departure. Probably the Twelve did not accompany the Seventy. Jesus kept them with Him for special personal training.

Number 70 is significant. It was the number of the Sanhedrin. As Jesus had already set up twelve new Patriarchs of the new Israel, so now He establishes a new sanhedrin. The Jews deduced this number from the seventy elders of Nu 11:16, 24. Or the number may symbolise the nations of the earth. The Jews held, agreeably to Gn 10, at the human race was made up of 70 peoples, 1 descended from Japheth, 30 from Ham, and 39 from Shem. If, as is not unlikely, the appointment of the Seventy took place about the Feast of Tabernacles, the ritual of the feast may have had something to do with the number, for then 70 bullocks were offered on behalf of the Gentile nations. The rabbis said, 'They offer seventy bullocks for the seventy nations, to make atonement for them, that the rain may fall upon the fields of all the world.'

The charge to the Seventy reads like anbridged report of St. Matthew's charge to the Twelve. It contains only one v., and that unimportant one (v. 8), which is not in St. Matthew. St. Luke, however, is not dependent upon St. Matthew, for he arranges the sayings in quite a different order. The close similarity of the two charges is best accounted for by supposing that Christ gave nearly the same directions to the Seventy as to the Twelve. It should be observed, however, that He does not confine their mission to the Israelites. In Perea the Gentiles were numerous.

1. Seventy Many ancient authorities read 'seventy-two' here and in v. 17. 6. The son of peace] RV 'a son of peace,' i.e. one inclined to peace. A Hebrew idiom. 8. Peculiar to Luke. The ministers of the gospel are not to be dainty or luxurious.

13-15. See on Mt 11:21-24, where the words occur in quite a different connexion.

17-20. Return of the Seventy (peculiar to Lk). 18. I beheld Satan] Our Lord poetically compares Satan's discomfiture at the successful mission of the Seventy to his original fall from heaven. The only other allusion to the fall of Satan in the Gospels, and perhaps in the Bible, is Jn 8:44. 19. Serpents and scorpions] Victory over spiritual foes is meant, rather than immunity from bodily injury, yet cp. Mk 16:18 Ac 28:5. The enemy is Satan (Mt 13:25). 20. Jesus bids the disciples rejoice not, as they are doing, because they have miraculous powers, but because their names are enrolled as citizens of heaven in the book of life (Isa 4:9 Dan 12:1 Ex 32:32 Rev 3:5, etc.).

21. In spirit] RV 'in the Holy Spirit.' One of St. Luke's characteristic references to the Holy Spirit. Christ's acts and emotions, as well as His words were inspired.

25-37. Parable of the Good Samaritan (peculiar to Lk). This lawyer is not to be identified with that of Mt 22:35 Mk 12:28.

29. Who is my neighbour?] The 'lawyer' intended to justify himself by showing that, even upon a liberal interpretation of the word 'neighbour,' he had done his duty. He expected Christ to say that a neighbour was a friend or at least an Israelite. The idea that a 'neighbour' might be a foreigner had never occurred to him. The rabbis said, 'He excepts all Gentiles when he saith His neighbour.' An Israelite killing a stranger-inhabitant doth not die for it by the Sanhedrin, because it is said, If any one lifts up himself against his neighbour. 'We are not to contrive the death of the Gentiles, but if they are in any danger of death we are not bound to deliver them, e.g. if any of them fall into the sea you need not take him out, for such a one is not thy neighbour.'

In answer Christ appealed to the man's conscience, not to his reason. If Christ had said 'a heathen is thy neighbour,' the man would have argued the point with learned subtlety. Instead of this Jesus told him a story in which a man treated a foreigner as a neighbour, and the lawyer was bound to confess that this was in accordance with the mind of God.

30-37. A sufficient motive for this parable is provided, if it be understood as simply inculcating the duty of benevolence to persons of all kinds with whom we are brought in contact, enemies as well as friends, foreigners as well as fellow-countrymen, because 'God has made of one (blood) all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Ac 17:26 10:28). The traditional allegorical interpretation, however, is too interesting to be entirely passed over. We give it in the words of Euthymius: 'The man is Adam and his offspring, the descent from Jerusalem to Jericho is the Fall. The thieves are the demons who beset our path, and strip us of the garments of virtue and the fear of God, and wound us spiritually by causing us to sin. Man was made half dead, in that he remained immortal in the soul, but mortal in the body. The Priest is the Law given by Moses, the Levite is the teaching of the prophets, and the good Samaritan is Christ Himself. The inn is the Church which receives every kind of man. The innkeeper is every ruler of the Church, i.e. every bishop and successor of the apostles. And the two pence are the Old and the New Testaments, which minister healing to the sick.'

30. Jericho] see on Mt 20:29. A city of the priests. The road to Jerusalem is still extremely dangerous, being infested by brigands. 33. Samaritan] see on Jn 4:54. 34. Oil and wine] used as remedies for wounds in the East. 35. Pence] see on Mt 18:28. 38-42. Jesus at the house of Martha and Mary (peculiar to Lk). It is a striking confirmation of the historic truth of the Fourth Gospel, that the characters of the two sisters—the busy, active, hospitable Martha, the quiet, contemplative, teachable Mary—are the same there as here.

38. Village] i.e. Bethany (Jn 11:1). St. Luke was probably ignorant of the name. Martha (lit. 'mistress') Sometimes supposed to be wife of Simon the Leper. She is a scriptural example of the virtue of hospitality. 39. Mary] Not identical with Mary Magdalene, or the 'sinner' (7:37).

At Jesus' (RV 'the Lord's') feet] Jesus was reclining on a couch for the meal, with His head towards the table and His feet stretched out behind him. Martha and Mary were both waiting at table, but whereas Martha occupied herself with offering dish after dish, and so was 'cumbered about much serving,' Mary spent most of her time sitting behind Jesus, and listening to what He was saying. When Martha complained that Mary allowed her to do all the work, Jesus said that He was quite contented with a single dish, and that both sisters would honour Him more by attending to what He said, than by giving Him an elaborate dinner.

42. But one thing is needful] 'There is no need of an elaborate meal. A few dishes or even one would suffice. Indeed, only one portion is really necessary, that which Mary has chosen, to listen to Me.' Our Lord gently hints to Martha that He would rather have a quiet talk with her on heavenly things, than receive all these hospitable attentions at her hands.

CHAPTER 11

THE LORD'S PRAYER. THE SIGN OF JONAH

1-4. The Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:9-10). See on Mt. If the Lord's Prayer was given only once, St. Luke is probably right as to the occasion. His version, however (as in the case of the Beatitudes), is manifestly inferior to St. Matthew's. Of the seven petitions he omits two—the third ('Thy will be done,' etc.), and the seventh ('but deliver us from the evil one': see the RV). In place of Mt's beautiful opening, 'Our Father in the heavens,' he has simply, 'Father,' and for the expressive metaphor 'debts' he substitutes 'sins.' He manifestly had not access to the original and authentic 'logia' of the apostle Matthew, of which the first evangelist makes such large and fruitful use.

2. Our Father which art in heaven] The true reading here is simply 'Father.' Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth] Modern editors omit this clause. 4. But deliver us from evil ('the evil one') Modern editors omit this clause also.

5-8. The friend at midnight (peculiar to Lk). The connexion with what goes before is suitable and natural. Having given the disciples a form of intercessory prayer, Jesus encourages them to persevere in its use, and also in the use of other prayers formed on its model, by a homely parable, the lesson of which is, If a churlish man can be forced by importunity to give against his will, how much more can persevering prayer bring down from the bountiful Father in heaven all good things.

8. Importunity] better, 'shamelessness.'

9-13. Prayer and the answer to prayer (Mt 7:11, Sermon on the Mount). See on Mt. 11, 12. In answer to prayer God gives neither what is useless (a stone) nor what is harmful (a serpent, or scorpion). The scorpion (10:19 Dt 8:16 Ezk 26 Rev 9:3, 5, 10) is a small poisonous crab-like animal, which, when at rest, is round like an egg. V. 12 is peculiar to Lk.

21, 22. Lk is here fuller and more picturesque than Mt and Mk. The imagery seems derived from Isa 49:14-26. 21. A strongman] RV 'the strong man fully armed,' i.e.
Satan. His palace (RV 'own court') is the world, so far as it is under his usurped dominion. His goods are the souls which he holds captive. His armour is his crafty devices for keeping them in captivity and separating them from all good influences. The stronger is Christ, who, by casting out devils and preaching the gospel, rescues souls from Satan's power. The spoils are the rescued souls, which Christ 'divides' by setting them to work at various employments in His own service. 23. In this contest between Christ and Satan no one can be neutral. Gathereth . . . scattereth] He who does not help Me to gather and marshal My army, is working for its defeat and rout.

27. 28. A woman calls our Lord's mother blessed (peculiar to Lk). Mk and Mt insert at this point the incident of our Lord's mother and brethren wishing to 'see Him' (Mt 12:46 Mk 3:31), which St. Luke has already recorded in a quite different connexion (8:19).

27. As he spake] What our Lord had just said about the danger of a relapse after a superficial repentance (v. 26) struck the woman as so true to life (probably through some unfortunate experience in her own family), that she was moved to express her appreciation of His teaching openly. Blessed, etc.] Edersehjm quotes a good rabbinical parallel: 'Blessed is the hour in which the Messiah was created; blessed the womb whence He issued; blessed the generation that sees Him; blessed the eye that is worthy to behold Him.' 28. Christ does not deny that His mother is blessed, but declares that to hear His words and obey them, and so to be brought into spiritual fellowship with God, is blessing infinitely greater.

29–32. The sign of Jonah (Mt 12:38–42). See on Mt.

33–36. Inward light and darkness. Christ is still rebuking those who refused to believe in Him without a special sign from heaven. In St. Matthew these vv. form part of the Sermon on the Mount.

33. A favourite saying of Christ's occurring in various connexions (Riv Mt 5:15 Mk 4:21). Here it means that Christ by His public preaching and miracles has made Himself so conspicuous and public a 'sign' to this generation, that they ought to ask for no other.

34–36. (Mt 6:22, 23, q.v.) If they will only regard His work and teaching without prejudice, then their own consciences will testify that He has a real mission from God.

37–54. Christ is entertained by a Pharisee. He denounces Pharisaic formalism and hypocrisy. For the relation of this discourse to Mt 23:1–36, see on Mt 23:1.

12. 10

fore') is better translated 'for,' 'because' (cp. 13:20 19:14 Ac:12:23).

10. See on Mt:12:31,32. 11, 12. See on Mt:10:17-20.

13-21. Parable of the rich fool (peculiar to Lk). The parable teaches that since death and judgment are inevitable, men ought to devote their attention to laying up treasure in heaven, not on earth.

13. Divide the inheritance] Such questions were decided by the 'bench of three' of the local synagogues. Christ, as usual, refuses to be drawn into any political or semi-political action. The unseasonable request of the man (he appears to have interrupted our Lord's discourse to make it), showed that his mind was too much set upon worldly things. 14. Who made me?] Cp. Ex:2:14. 15. For a man's life] The Gr. is difficult and the translation doubtful, but the sense seems to be that neither a man's physical nor his spiritual life is dependent upon great possessions. A healthy and happy human life can be lived in a state of comparative poverty, and spiritual life is rather hindered than aided by great possessions. Others understand it to mean that a man's life is not like a possession, but infinitely more valuable. Cp. below (v. 23), 'the life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment.'

16. Brought forth] The man's wealth was honestly and justly acquired. His fault was not injustice, but covetousness. 17. I have no room] 'Thou hast barns, the mouths of the poor which can hold much; barns which can never be pulled down or destroyed, for they are heavenly and divine, if indeed it be true that he who feeds the poor, feeds God' (Theophylact).

19. To my soul] The fool speaks as if earthly wealth could supply the needs of an immortal soul. 20. This night, etc.] lit. 'this night do they (i.e. the angels of vengeance) require thy soul of thee.' The righteous man willingly and joyfully comitts his soul to God; but from the wicked man it is exacted with stern terror. 21. Rich toward God] On laying up treasure in heaven, which is here meant, see on Mt:6:19-21.

There is an interesting rabbinical parallel to this parable: 'Once Rabbi Simeon went to a certain circumcision and there feasted. The father gave them old wine, seven years old, to drink, saying, 'With this wine will I grow old, rejoicing in my son.' They feasted together till midnight. At midnight Rabbi Simeon, trusting to his own virtue, went out to go into the city, and on the way met the angel of death, who, he perceived, was very sad. He asked therefore, 'Why art thou so sad?' He replied, 'I am sad for the speeches of those who say, I will do this or that ere long, though they know not how quickly they may be called away by death. The man who just boasted, 'With this wine I will grow old, rejoicing in my son,' behold his time draws near. Within thirty days he must be snatched away.' The rabbi said to him, 'Do thou let me know my time.' The angel answered, 'Over thee and such as thou art, we have no power; for God, being delighted with good works, prolongeth your lives.'

22-34. Against anxiety about wealth and worldly things. Almost the whole of this section occurs in St. Matthew's Sermon on the Mount. The present context, however, is very suitable, and is perhaps correct.

29. Neither be ye of doubtful mind or, 'neither be ye high-minded.'

32. Fear not, little flock] A beautiful and tender saying peculiar to Lk, intended to encourage the disciples who would be for so long in so hopeless a minority. The sense is, 'If God is willing to give you the kingdom, much more will He give you food and raiment, therefore you need not be afraid (v. 33) to sell that ye have and give alms.' See on Mt:19:21 6:20. Sell that ye have, etc.] Christ addresses not all the disciples, but those who, like the apostles, had received a call to leave all, and devote themselves to the work of the ministry.

Bags (RV 'purses') which wax not old] The purses which will keep your money safely are not your own, but those of the poor on whom you bestow your charity. Placed in those purses, your earthly treasure will become 'treasure in the heavens that faileth not.'

34. See on Mt:6:19.

35-48. Exhortation to vigilance. The greater part of it appears also (and most appropriately) in Mt:24. The apostles and other ministers of the word are chiefly addressed, though there is a lesson for all (v. 41 f.). The question of Peter (v. 41) is peculiar to Lk.

35, 36. A little parable peculiar to Luke, warning the apostles to be ready for Christ's second coming, which will be sudden. The apostles are compared to slaves left to watch the house (the Church) while the master (Christ) goes to a wedding feast (i.e. ascends into heaven). Their loins are girded because they have housework to do (presaging the gospel and ruling the Church), and they have lighted lamps, because their task is to enlighten a dark and sinful world by their shining example. Christ's return from the marriage feast is His Second Advent, or it may mean His judgment of each individual soul at death. The 'marriage feast' here is not the final joy of the blessed, as in the parable of the Ten Virgins, but Christ's session at the right hand of God between the Ascension and Second Advent.
The parable, though primarily intended for rulers of the Church, is applicable to all Christians, for all have received some kind of commission from Christ.

37, 38. See on Mt 24:46. These vv. conclude the parable. Those whom Christ shall watch at His Second Coming, He will unite to share in the final feast (the joy of seven); when He Himself will serve them, aplying them with all blessedness, and causing all tears from their eyes. The second and third watches are the second and third of the Roman four watches (Mt 14:22). They thus represent the dead of night, and by stroph the unexpectedness of the Second Vent. The Jews reckon only three night watches.

39, 40. See on Mt 24:43, 44. Another parable which, by a curious inversion, the Goodman master of the house means the apostles, and chief Christ. Christ is so called from theocracy and unexpectedness of His coming.

41. (Peculiar to Lk.) Christ does not aver Peter's question directly, but His answer shows that He is speaking mainly of the apostles and those in authority.

42-46. See on Mt 24:45-50.

47, 48. (Peculiar to Lk.) Christ here seems to assert (cp. 10:12, 14) that there will be degrees of future punishment.

48. He that knew not: The reference is to the future pastors of the Church. "He that knew not," will still be punished, for he said have known; but not punished so much the other, for the other was presumptuous, this one was slothful; and presumption a greater sin than sloth (Euthymius). They will ask the more: Christ through His angels will demand His own with usurpy, i.e. will demand that the talents entrusted to each are improved, and turned to good use. In the case of the Apostles He will demand what souls they have gained besides their own.

49-53. The strife that the gospel will produce.

49. A paradox. The Prince of Peace comes to bring strife and bloodshed, fire and sword, to the world, because only through war can peace be attained. Some, however, understand by fire, the fire of Christian love.

What will I, etc.: i.e. how much I wish that it were already kindled! (Theophylact). Other translations: 'What more have I to desire, if it be already kindled?' (Plummer). What do I desire? Would that it were already kindled!' (Origen).

50. See on Mt 20:22 = Mk 10:38. A baptism.

51-53. See on Mt 10:34-36.

54-59. Ignorance of the signs of the times.

54-56. See on Mt 16:1-3.

57. Peculiar to Lk. Of yourselves Why, even without signs, do you not judge rightly of Me and My doctrine by the natural light of reason and conscience?

58, 59. See on Mt 5:25, 26.

THE GALILEANS KILLED BY PILATE. THE UNFRUITFUL FIG TREE. LAMENT OVER JERUSALEM

1—9. Three exhortations to repentance, of which the former two are based on recent events, and the third is a parable. All are peculiar to Lk.

1. Whose blood Pilate? These men had evidently been killed in the courts of the Temple for some real or suspected sedition while they were slaying their victims, an act which was performed not by the priests, but by the soldiers, or their servants. Nothing is known of this particular act of atrocity, but Philo, a contemporary writer, speaks of Pilate's repeated massacres of persons uncondemned, and inable and most grievous ferocity. It was perhaps either the cause or the consequence of the enmity between Herod and Pilate mentioned 23:12.

2. Were sinners: see on Jn 9:3.

3. Shall all likewise perish? This was literally fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem, but probably Jesus means, 'as these have suffered literal death, so you shall all suffer spiritual death.'

4. Tower in Siloam fell: Another unknown incident. It is plausibly conjectured that this tower was part of the waterworks and aqueduct which Pilate built with the sacred money of the Temple treasury (Korbanot), to the great scandal of pious Jews. The persons killed were probably workmen, whose death was regarded as a judgment for their impurity. For 'Siloam' see on Jn 9:2.

The idea was very common among the Jews that great calamities are a proof of great sin. This was the view of Job's friends, who were convinced that his great misfortunes argued him a great sinner (Job 4:7, 8, 14, 20, 22). Our Lord on several occasions strongly opposed this view (see Jn 9:2). Sometimes, no doubt, suffering is a direct punishment for sin, but not always, perhaps not generally. In the case of the righteous it often arises from the sin of others, or is permitted as a trial of faith, or as a means of refining and purifying the character. A righteous man's sufferings may even be directly due to his righteousness, as in the case of our Lord, the apostles, Socrates, and numerous missionaries and reformers in all ages and countries.

6—9. The Barren Fig Tree. This parable illustrates the warning (vv. 3, 5). 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' A certain man (God) had a fig tree (the Jewish nation) in his vineyard (the world), and he came (at various crises of their history) seeking fruit (good works and pure religion) and found none. And he said to the vine-dresser (the Son of God), Behold these three years (under the Law, under the Prophets, and under the Scribes) I come seeking fruit. Cut it down. Why, besides being unfruitful, doth it also cumber the ground (prevent the conversion of the world)? And the vine-dresser (Christ) answered, Lord, let it alone this year also (for a further time of grace). Till I dig about it and dung it (i.e. preach the gospel, show signs and wonders, send down the Spirit, do all things for its conversion), and if it bear fruit thenceforth, well; but if not, thou shalt cut it down (i.e. shalt destroy the nation with its city and Temple): cp. Mt 21:19. The parable is also capable of a more general application to the individual soul.

10–17. The woman with a spirit of infirmity (peculiar to Lk). The story is told not so much for the sake of the miracle, as for the light it throws upon the question of sabbath observance. It is the only case of Christ's preaching in a synagogue recorded in the latter part of the ministry.

14. Said unto the people] The ruler durst not openly rebuke Jesus, but indirectly censured Him by censuring the people.
15. Loose his ox] The rabbis, while permitting attention to beasts on the sabbath, did so grudgingly: 'It is not only permitted to lead a beast to the water on the sabbath, but also to draw water for it, yet so that the beast draw near and drink, without the water being carried to it and set down by it.'
16. Satan hath bound] The Jews attributed such ills to Satan. It is not implied that the woman was of evil life.

23–30. Are they few that be saved? Jesus does not directly reply to the question, but warns His hearers of the difficulty of obtaining salvation, of the danger of delaying repentance, and of the probable rejection of many unbelieving descendants of Abraham, and of the salvation of many believing Gentiles. There are close parallels in St. Matthew.

23, 24. See on Mt 7:13,14. Gate] i.e. 'door.'
25. The master] i.e. our Lord. The 'shutting the door' takes place at Christ's second coming, or perhaps at the death of each individual. Lord, open] see on Mt 25:10-12, also Mt 7:23. 26. This v. specially applies to the Jews.
28, 29. See on Mt 8:11,12.
30. See on Mt 20:1-16.

31–35. Message to Herod Antipas, and lament over Jerusalem. This threat of Herod is peculiar to Lk. ill on the sabbath. Thus they allowed to themselves breaches of the sabbath day which they denied to Christ.

7–11. On places of honour at feasts (peculiar Lk, but a similar discourse occurs in the Western text of St. Matthew, 20:28, q.v.). It probable that the dropsical man was healed fore the dinner began, and that there then sued an unseemly struggle for places, which were occasion for the 'parable' following.

7. A parable] An elastic word. Here it means a piece of advice, inculcating humility.

Chose...the chief rooms] RV 'seats,' i.e. aces on the couches: see on Mk 12:30. A odd illustration of the pride of the rabbi's is a conduct of Rabbi Simeon ben Shetah, who then invited to dinner by king Janneus (104– br. c.), placed himself between the king and seen, saying, 'Exalt wisdom and she shall calm thee, and make thee to sit among princes.'

ut such conduct was not universally approved, and with the advice which our Lord gives may be the more spiritua:1 of other rabbis.
Rabbi Akiba said, Yield up thy place, and go down two or three seats, and sit down, until they say to thee, Go higher. Go not higher of thyself, lest they say to thee, Go down lower, for it is better that they should say to thee, Go higher, than to to lower. Thus the son of Hillel used to say, 'My humiliation is my exaltation, and my exaltation is my humiliation.'

12–14. On entertaining the poor (peculiar Lk, whose Gospel is full of sympathy with the poor). 12. Thy friends, etc.] A man is not the true sense hospitable, who entertains only those who can entertain again. Such interested hospitality is not wrong, but there is no merit in it, and it does not lay up treasure in heaven. 14. At the resurrection of the just] i.e. at the glorious resurrection to the eternal which the righteous only will enjoy, with which is contrasted 'the resurrection of condemnation' which awaits the unrighteous (Jn 5:28). 'The resurrection of the ust' here answers exactly to 'the resurrection from the dead,' viz. of righteous persons only Phil 3:11 RV), as distinguished from 'the resurrection of the dead,' which includes all mankind (Ac 17:31).

Our Lord's words give real sanction to the Jewish belief in two distinct resurrections, the first of the righteous the second of the unrighteous, traces of which some expositors find in 1 Cor 15:20 1 Th 4:16, and especially in Rev 20:4, 5.

15–24. The great supper (peculiar to Lk, although Mt 22:1–14 presents many points of similarity: see on that passage). Here the certain man' is God, the many bidden are the rulers of the Jews, the servant who in-ites them is Jesus Christ. When the rulers refuse the invitation to the feast (i.e.

to enter into Christ's Kingdom), the poor, the maimed, the blind, and the lame (i.e. the despised classes of the Jewish nation) are invited. They joyfully obey, and yet there is room, because the kingdom of Christ is meant to embrace all mankind (v. 22). Then Christ, through His Apostles, goes out into the highhways and hedges (i.e. into heathen lands), and compels the Gentiles to come in. 15. Eat bread in the kingdom of God] The mention of the 'resurrection of the just,' with which, according to Jewish ideas, the reign of the Messiah would begin, reminds this Jew of the great feast, which the Messiah would then hold: see on Mt 18:11. 18. The excuses show careless unconcern, not hardened wickedness.

Business occupations, family ties, and various distractions, are pleaded as excuses for not taking God's summons seriously. 23. Compel them to come in] Our Lord does not here (as has often been supposed) sanction religious persecution. He said 'Compel them,' not commanding force to be used, but indicating that in the case of Gentiles a more urgent and persistent kind of preaching must be used, seeing that they were under the power of demons, and sleeping in the deep darkness of error (Euthymius).

24. For I say] Here
Christ drops the parabolic form and speaks in His own person. 'For I (Christ) say unto you, that none of the Jewish rulers who have rejected My invitation shall taste of My supper, i.e. of the blessedness in store for the saints of God.'

25–35. That we must give up all to follow Christ, and count the cost before we do so.
The two parables of the Rash Builder (vv. 28– 30) and the Rash King (vv. 31–33) are peculiar to Lk. The multitude who follow Jesus
(v. 25) are inclined to believe that He is the Messiah, and expect great temporal benefits from their discipleship. Jesus warns them that, instead of this, they must expect persecution and even death (v. 27), and that those who cannot make a complete sacrifice of earthly affections (v. 26), and ambition (v. 33), had better turn back while there is yet time.

26, 27. See on Mt 10:37, 39. 26. Hate] 'This does not imply the feeling of hatred, but a readiness to act as if one hated. The nearest and dearest must be forsaken, and opposed, and offended, if need be, to follow Christ.'

28–33. None of the details of these two parables or similes are significant. The parables simply enforce the one idea that it is folly to undertake a serious business (here, becoming a disciple of Christ), without counting the cost.

33. Forsaketh not all] Only the Apostles (and the Seventy) were required to do this in act, but every disciple is required to do it in will, i.e. to subordinate all earthly interests and claims to Christ's, when the two are incompatible.

34, 35. Salt] i.e. 'discipleship.' In Mt 5:18
(q.v.) it means the pure and unselfish lives of Christians. The salt which has lost its savour is here the discipleship which refuses to make the sacrifices which Christ demands (vv. 26, 27, 35).

35. The land . . . the dunghill] These have no special meaning. The sense is that the discipleship which makes no sacrifices is valueless for any purpose.

CHAPTER 15

PARABLES OF THE LOST SHEEP, OF THE LOST COIN, OF THE PRODIGAL SON

1-7. Parable of the Lost Sheep. See on Mt 18:12-13. The first of a series of three parables for the encouragement of penitents. It shows the love of our Saviour for the outcast, the despised, and the criminal classes generally. It rebukes the Pharisees, who professed to be shepherds, for their neglect of that part of the flock that most needed their help, and lastly it indicates that the Pharisees are in many respects worse than the sinners they despise. The owner of the flock is our Lord Himself, the Good Shepherd (Jn 10:14); the flock is His Church, embracing men of all kinds; the ninety and nine are those who seem to be righteous, like the Pharisees; the one sheep that is lost and is found, is all truly penitent sinners. These are represented as one sheep not because they are few in number compared with the others, but to show Christ's love for each individual soul. The seeking and laying the lost sheep upon His shoulders, are Christ's work of love in pleading with the sinner, and finally after due repentance bringing him back to a state of grace. The friends and neighbours who rejoice with Him are the angels. 'On no image did the early Church dwell with more fondness than this, as witness the many gems, seals, fragments of glass, and other relics which have reached us, on which Christ is thus portrayed. It is frequent also in bas-reliefs, on sarcophagi, and paintings in the catacombs. Sometimes other sheep are at His feet, generally two, looking up with pleasure at Him and His burden. This representation always occupies the place of honour, the centre of the vault or tomb' (Trench). The rabbis have a story that Moses, while tending Jethro's flocks, went after a kid (or lamb) which had gone astray. As he thought that it must be weary, he gently raised it and carried it on his shoulders. God was pleased and said, 'Since thou hast shown pity in bringing back a man's beast, thou shalt be the shepherd of my flock Israel all thy life long:'

1. Publicans and sinners] see on Mt 5:46 911.

7. Which need no repentance] i.e. which think they need no repentance, but really need it more than the publicans and sinners whom they despise. The rabbis divided the just or righteous into two classes, (1) the 'perfectly just,' or 'men of works,' who had never in all their lives committed a single sin, and (2) the 'penitents,' who, having once been wicked, had repented. The Pharisees considered themselves to belong to the former class, as also, perhaps, did the young ruler who said 'All these have I kept from my youth' (Mk 10:20). How external the Pharisaic standard of righteousness was, may be gathered from the story of the 'holy man,' who 'never committed one trespass all the days of his life, except this one misfortune which befell him, that one day he put on his head-phyllactery before his arm-phyllactery.' For 'phyllactery,' see on Mt 25:5.

8-10. The Lost Coin (peculiar to Lk). The last parable sets forth the work of Christ in seeking and reclaiming the lost, this one sets forth that of the Church. The woman is the Church; the ten pieces of silver are the human souls in her keeping; the lost piece is a soul that has fallen from grace through her negligence. Eager to avenge for her neglect, and full of love for her erring member, she lights a candle, i.e. vigorously exercises the ministry of the Word, and by preaching the gospel and by loving pastoral intercourse brings back the lost soul to a state of grace. The sweeping of the house is the vehemence with which she sets about her task, thereby incurring the charge of 'turning the world upside down' (Ac 17:5). Having found the lost coin, she calls upon her friends and neighbours, i.e. not only her faithful but also the angels, to join in her joy. 8. Pieces] Gk. drachma, a coin equivalent in value to the Roman denarius (Mt 18:28). 9. Friends] lit. female friends and neighbours.

11-32. The Prodigal Son (peculiar to Lk). 'This parable, like the two preceding, is intended to show what joy there is in heaven at the conversion of sinners, and, therefore, how wrong the Pharisees were to murmur, because Christ consorted with sinners to convert them' (Cornelius a Lapide). The father is God; the elder son is just persons, or rather those who think themselves and are thought by others to be such, here, in particular, the Pharisees who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. The younger son is all penitent sinners, here, in particular, the publicans and sinners of vv. 1, 2. The portion of goods (v. 12) is the whole of a man's faculties and powers, which he ought to exercise and enjoy in his father's house, i.e. in dependence upon God and in His service, but which the prodigal son demands to have under his own control, to use according to his own.
and pleasure. The lack of love and apostude of heart shown in this demand is soon wed by apostasy of life, for not many days (v. 13), he gathers all together, i.e. deetately resolves to devote his whole fortune all his powers to the pursuit of pleasure, journeys into a far country, i.e. into the doing of sin where God is not, or rather where is forgotten, and wastes his substance in sou living, i.e. throws off even the semblance ity and respectability, and ruins not only bul, but his health and fortune in extra-tance and debauchery. Presently there as a mighty famine in the land, i.e. his ures pull, his friends prove false, his al indulgences fail to satisfy him. In his hese he goes and joins himself to a citizen that country, i.e. at first he seeks relief by aging deeper into sin, selling himself to in to kill regret. But he finds no relief.
ay is now his master, and shows his con-pt for him by using him as a drudge and ave. Finding now no pleasure or satisfac-in his sin, and the hunger of his soul aining still unappeased, he determines to rn to his father and to say 'Father, I have
ed. . Make me as one of thy hired servants,' place me lowest in thy kingdom. His sers see him a great way off, and goes to ht him, for God meets, nay, almost antici-ties, the first efforts of sinners to return. He on his neck and kisses him, the kiss ifying the reconciliation between God and rought about by Christ. The son makes ession of sin, but does not add 'Make as one of thy hired servants,' because he w sees that God wishes to restore him to his privileges. Then the father says to his ants (the ministers of his Church), Bring the former robe, and put it on him (i.e. tore him to his former privileges as a istan by the ministry of reconciliation), put a ring on his hand (a symbol of rank honour), and shoes on his feet (symbolising ritual freedom, for slaves went barefoot). bring the fatted calf and kill it (signifying joy there is in earth and heaven over a sentant sinner, perhaps also the spiritual ishment which the hungry soul will find in ordinances of religion which have been so neglected); for this my son was dead (in ) and is alive again (by repentance). And ay begin to be merry, i.e. to rejoice over ntent, and to treat him with as much honour he had never sinned. The conclusion of parable graphically traces the character of elder brother, who represents the Pharisees persons of their spirit. He is busied in field (v. 25), i.e. in a round of regular, but less, religious observances. He shows ger and jealousy, and that in spite of the fectionate entreaties of his father, who invites him to the festivities, and shows him equal honour and love (v. 28). He shows himself, like the Pharisees, quite unconscious of his own failings, and arrogantly boasts, 'I have never transgressed a commandment of thine' (v. 29): see on v. 7. He puts the worst construction on his brother's past sins, perhaps exaggerating them (v. 30), and shows himself incapable of forgiveness (v. 30).

The parable may be suitably applied to illustrate the relations of Jew and Gentile (the Jew being the elder, the Gentile the younger son), but this is not its primary meaning.

12. Give me the portion] according to Jewish law, one-half of what the eldest received (Dt2117). He may have had a right to demand his property before his father's death. We have here perhaps a survival of that condition of society in which testaments "took effect immediately on execution, were not secret, and were not revocable," and in which it was customary for a father, when his powers were failing, to abdicate and surrender his property to his sons: cp. Ecclus 3318-28.

15. To a citizen] i.e. Satan, or some companion more wicked than himself. 16. He would faint have filled] i.e. and did so. Husks] i.e. the pods of the corab-tree, eaten only by the very poorest people. And no man gave unto him] food of any kind.

19. Hired servants] i.e. imperfect Christians, who perform their duties to God in the spirit of hirelings rather than of sons.

22. The best robe] or, rather, 'the former robe,' i.e. the state of grace in which he was before his sin. In its Christian application the robe of baptismal innocence, because in baptism we 'put on Christ' as a garment (Gal327).

CHAPTER 16
THE UNJUST STEWARD. THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS

1-13. Parable of the Unjust Steward (pecular to Lk). The details of this somewhat difficult parable are probably not significant. It is intended to illustrate the proper use of wealth.
Christians should use it so well here on earth,
by expending it not selfishly on their own plea-ures, but unselfishly for the good of others, and for the advancement of God's kingdom, that instead of hindering them from reaching heaven, it will help them to enter there.
The prudence (foresight) of the steward is commended in this parable, not his dishonesty.

5-7. Tenants in the East pay their rent in kind, not in money. The landlord provides them with seed, and they return him at harvesttime a certain proportion of the yield.

6. An hundred measures] lit. 'baths,' the 'bath' being a Heb. liquid measure = 9 gallons.
began to preach, it was comparatively easy for the Pharisees to justify themselves before men, but now that the deeper morality of the Gospel is widely accepted, men are beginning to find out the deficiencies of the Pharisees.

17. See on Mt. 5 18. Here the sense is: The Pharisees, however, object to be tried by the standard of the Gospel, and demand to be tried by the standard of the Law. But even according to this (which is still in force in its spiritual sense), they are found to be deficient, for, while observing it in trivial matters, they break it in matters of weight, e.g. (v. 18), whereas the Law forbids divorce except for adultery, the Pharisees, or most of them, allow it for every cause: see on Mt. 5 32.

19-31. The rich man and Lazarus: peculiar to Lk, and full of that sympathy with the poor which characterises his Gospel. It does not, however, as Strauss maintains, assert that the mere possession of wealth is wrong, or that mere poverty justifies. On the contrary, the rich man is condemned, not because he was rich, but because he was callous, and Lazarus justified, not because he was poor, but because he was poor in spirit. The callowness of the rich man was due to his scepticism. He consumed his wealth in selfish luxury, sparing none of it for the poor, because he did not really believe in God or a future life. If he had so believed, he would have acted differently. The parable may perhaps be directed against the Pharisees, who were 'lovers of money' (v. 4); but inasmuch as their covetousness did not take the form of sumptuous living, it seems better to regard it as a warning addressed to Christians generally against luxury, worldliness, selfishness, and unbelief.

19. Rich man] conveniently called 'Dives' (Lat.). He represents all those who, in the joyousness of wealth forget God and the world to come, and neglect all acts of charity and love. Purple] i.e. a rich material dyed with the liquid obtained from the shellfish 'murex,' formed the rich man's upper garment, and fine linen his under garment, or shirt; both were exceedingly costly. 20. Lazarus = Eleazar, i.e. 'He who has God for his help.' His name expresses his character. From Lazarus is derived lazar = leper. Desiring] but not obtaining his desire. 21. The dogs] Since the dog was in the East an unclean animal, the licking was an aggravation of the poor man's misery.

22. By the angels] The rabbis said: 'None can enter Paradise but the just, whose souls are carried thither by angels.' When an Israelite departs to his eternal home, the angel in charge of the garden of Eden, who receives every circumcised son of Israel, introduces him into the garden of Eden.' "When the just depart from the world three com-as of angels go before them in peace. The s says, "Let him come in peace"; the second "Let them rest in their beds"; the third companions him. Abraham's bosom] A Jew, not of heaven, but of the intermediate state of bliss, in which the souls of the just t the resurrection. E.g. 'Ada bar Avah d-day in Abraham's bosom ' cp. Mac13.17.

ren we have thus suffered, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob will receive us.' Other equivalent es are 'Paradise,' 'the garden of Eden,' under the throne of glory.' 23. In hell] in Hades. Hades is here used in a wide e for the intermediate state of all souls, and unjust, between death and judgment. his sense both Dives and Lazarus were in des,' though the one was comforted and other tormented. This usage of the word site common. 'Hades, in which the souls s of just and unjust are detained' (Hip. c. 9.

In the lower world are both tor-t and refreshment. There a soul is either ishished or tenderly cherished, as a foretaste of the final judgment' (Tertullian). rich man was not in 'hell' (Gehenna), be- se no one is sent there until after the Last gment.] Spiritual torment or punish- must be meant, for Dives was now a embodied spirit. Seeth Abraham] The bis placed Paradise in sight of the place of ment, and were familiar with the idea of versations among the dead : see on v. 26. ere is a rabbinical story not unlike this able: 'There were two partners in crime this world, one of whom repented before death, but the other did not. After death one was carried away and placed in company of the just; the other in the spany of the wicked. The latter saw the mer, and said, "Woe is me, for there is spect of persons in this matter. He and I bed together and murdered together, and he stands in the congregation of the just, 1 I in the congregation of the wicked.'

ey answered him, "Thou fool, it was in power also to have repented, but thou at not." He said to them, "Let me go w, and become a penitent." But they said, thou most foolish of men, dost thou not ow that this world in which thou art is like sabbath, and the world from which thou mest, like the eve of the sabbath? If thou ridest nothing on the sabbath, eve, what it thou eat on the sabbath?" And he ashed his teeth and gnawed his own flesh.' In his bosom] The figure is not taken from clining at a banquet (Jn 13. 23), because the et banquet would not take place, according Jewish ideas, till the coming of the Messiah (Mt 8.11), but from children quietly resting their parents' lap or bosom.

24. Father Abraham] He spoke as a Jew thinking that Abraham had power over the fires of Hades, and would help his own descendants. The rabbis said, 'The fire of Gehenna has no power over the sinners of Israel, for Abraham descends and rescues them from it.' 25. Thy good things] i.e. thy wealth and pleasures. Dives was punished, not for his wealth, but for his abuse of it. Lazarus was justified, not for his poverty, but for his patience and humility. 26. Beside all this] better, 'in all these regions of the dead.' A great gulf fixed] Somewhat different from the representations of the rabbis, who said (see Ecc 714), 'God hath set the one against the other, i.e. Hell and Paradise. How far are they distant? A hand's breadth.' Rabbi Jochanan saith, A wall is between. But the rabbis say, They are so even with one another, that you may see out of one into the other': cp. Rev 14.10. 29. Moses and the prophets] These would give them sufficient light and guidance.

30, 31. Our Lord disbelieved the power of signs and wonders to produce repentance, and here declares that even the sign of His own Resurrection will leave many hard hearts unmoved.

The pains of Dives being those of Hades, not of Gehenna, many recent commentators regard his release from them as possible, and see in his new-born anxiety for the welfare of others (v. 27) an indication that his punishment is producing its intended purifying effect: see on Mt 12.32.

Additional Note

The chief interest of this parable to modern readers is the light that it throws, or seems to throw, upon the state of departed souls between death and judgment. As to its significance in this respect, expositors are not entirely at one. Some regard all its statements on the subject as teaching definite doctrines binding on Christians, others regard them as only the poetic framework of the parable, embodying conventional Jewish ideas, and therefore as having no significance for Christians. Both extremes are to be avoided. On the one hand, the parable is plainly intended to inculcate, as against the unbelief of worldly and sensual men, the doctrine of future rewards and punishments beginning immediately after death, and to be so far a serious doctrinal statement. On the other hand, the thoroughly Jewish cast of the phraseology warns us against taking its details too literally. The essence of the teaching is thus expressed by Luckcock: 'The souls of the departed in the intermediate state are possessed of consciousness, memory and sensibility to pain and pleasure; the life of all men, whether good or bad, is continued without interruption after the separation of soul and body; and retribution commences between death and judgment. These conclusions are in direct antagonism to the theory that the soul falls asleep when the body dies, and will not wake again till the resurrection of the dead.’

761

CHAPTER 17
Occasions of Offence. The Ten Lepers.

1. On causing others to sin. See on Mt 18.5-7.

2. One of these little ones] An affectionate designation of the disciples, especially such as were beginners and easily led astray. Perhaps the converted publicans and sinners of 15,12 are specially meant.

3. The duty of forgiveness. We are to forgive an unlimited number of times, yet we may rebuke in love: cp. Lv 19.17. See on Mt 18.15,21. Trespass against thee] RV ‘sin.’

5. Increase our faith] Others render, ‘Give us faith in addition,’ i.e. add it to the gifts already promised. Whether the ‘faith’ mentioned is faith in general, or the faith which enables to forgive a brother seven times, is not clear.

6. Sycamine] This word means sometimes the ‘mulberry tree,’ sometimes the ‘sycamore.’

7-10. That works do not justify. Our Lord having exhorted His disciples to good works, now proceeds to rebuke the vainglory which so often accompanies them, showing that as a master is under no obligation to a slave who performs his appointed tasks, so neither is God to us. But since God is gracious, He treats those who are slaves, as if they were free hired labourers, and recompenses their labours with a reward, and receives their service which is strictly due, as if it were meritorious, and gives a requital out of all proportion to the toil. Thus the goodness of God is stronger than His justice (Euthymius). 7. A servant] lit. ‘a slave.’

11-19. Ten lepers cleansed (peculiar to Lk). For leprosy see on Mt 8.14. The healing of a Samaritan, and the stress laid upon his greater gratitude, is in keeping with the character of this Gentle Gospel.

11. Through the midst of (or, rather, ‘between’) Samaria and Galilee] The caravans of Galilee took either the Samaritan route or the Pereran. Jesus follows neither, but travels along the boundary between Samaria and Galilee. He directed His steps from W. to E., towards the Jordan, which He must cross to enter Pererim (Gosey). ‘He seems to have crossed the Jordan at Scythopolis, where there was a bridge, and to have descended along the bank of Jordan in Pererim, until He crossed again near Jericho’ (Wetstein).

14. Unto the priests] The Jews probably went to Jerusalem, because of the necessary sacrifices; the Samaritan to Mt. Gerizim, unless we are to suppose that he became a Jewish proselyte. As they went] The healing was delayed to test their faith. Thy faith hath made thee whole (or, ‘saved thee’)] i.e. not only has it healed thy body, but also thy soul. It was otherwise with the other nine lepers. Their ingratitude imperilled their continuance in that state of salvation in which their faith had placed them.

20, 21. When and how the Kingdom of God appears (peculiar to Lk). The question of the Pharisees was probably a mocking one—‘When is this Kingdom of God of which thou sayest so much, and of which thou claimest to be King, visibly to appear?’

20. Cometh not with observation] i.e. cannot not be observed by the senses, is not manifested by outward signs or political changes. Is within you] i.e. within your hearts. But since Jesus would hardly say that the Kingdom of God is within the hearts of the Pharisees, the better translation is, ‘The Kingdom of God is among you,’ but ye do not perceive it.

22-37. On the coming of the Son of man. The Pharisees having now withdrawn, Jesus proceeds to speak more unreservedly to the disciples of the final and glorious coming of His Kingdom, which will be heralded by visible signs, which yet will be hard to interpret, so that in the end the Son of man will appear unexpectedly. St. Matthew inserts many of these sayings in the great discourse on the end of the world, and the fall of Jerusalem (Mt 24), where they are equally suitable to the context.

22. To see one of the days] i.e. ‘In your future tribulations and persecutions you will desire to see one of the days of bliss and glory, which will follow the Second Coming of the Son of man. You will desire a glimpse of heaven to comfort you in your calamities.’ Plummer ingeniously translates: ‘You will desire to see the first of the days of the Son of man,’ i.e. the day of the Second Advent. The ordinary interpretation, ‘You will look back with regret on the peaceful and happy days of My earthly ministry, and long to see even one of them again,’ does not suit the context.

And ye shall not see it] not because it will not come, but because it will not come in those days of your longing for it.

23. See on Mt 24.23. See here is the Son of man, etc. 24. See on Mt 24.27. In his day] Westcott and Hort (but not RV) omit these words. 25. Cp. Mk 8.31.

26-27. See on Mt 24.37-39. 26. Also in the days] i.e. in the days when the Son of man will return. We should have expected ‘in the day of the Son of man,’ as in v. 30.
3-30. Peculiar to Lk. See Gn 19.
1. In Mt 24:7, v.v., these words are advice he Christians of Jerusalem with regard to a hasty flight from the city just before its.... Here they refer to Christ's Second coming, and warn Christians, when that day is imminent, to be completely detached from worldly affairs and worldly interests. The reference is parabolic, and must be spiritually interpreted.

2. Remember Lot's wife] who was not taken from worldly things, but looked on with longing towards Sodom, and the 14th and luxury which she had left there.

3. In Mt 10:39-16:25, where the same words are used, the reference is to willingness to suffer for the Kingdom. Here the idea is more general: e e who sets too much value on his earthly shall lose his eternal life.'

4. 35. See on Mt 24:40-41. 36. Omitted by some authorities.
17. See on Mt 24:28 (first interpretation).

CHAPTER 18

1-8. The Unjust Judge. The Pharisee and the Publican. The Rich Ruler

There is a close connexion with what precedes. The mention of the Second Advent is to speak of the need of prayer and watchfulness in view of it. The main point of the parable is: (1) The duty of continual prayer; (2) the certain answer to prayer, if it be only persistent enough; (3) the certainty that in the end God will maintain the cause of His elect against their adversaries; (4) a warning against failure ofth in times of seeming abandonment by... The moral difficulty that in this parable God seems to be compared to an unjust judge, is met by saying that in reality God is much more compared as contrasted with Him. The argument is, If justice can be obtained in persistence even under such an unjust judge, how much more can it be obtained from the Author of all justice. It is true that God is said, like the unjust judge, to say justice. But His motive is entirely different. His delay is due to love of the saints, whose faith He designs to purify and strengthen by much waiting, and love of our adversaries, to whom He gives a space or repentance before the day of vengeance comes.

1. Perhaps this is our Lord's own comment on the parable. Always to pray] On the other hand, the rabbis taught that God must not be fatigued by too frequent prayer. Three or four times a day was enough. If a man comes to address you every hour, you say that he holds you cheap: the same is true of God, whom no man ought to fatigue by praying every hour. The words are to be taken literally, because even purely secular acts, when done to God's glory, are acts of devotion. The whole lives of the faithful should be, in Origen's words, 'one great connected prayer.' Faint i.e. become weary.

2. A judge] Probably a heathen judge, because, (1) The local Jewish tribunals consisted of three judges, and (2) Jewish judges (at least in NT. times) had no such evil reputation. They were required to have this sevenfold qualification, 'prudence, gentleness, piety, hatred of mammon, love of truth, that they be beloved, and of good report.' Yet see on Mk 12:40.

3. Avenge me] better, 'Give me justice against my adversary.' Her 'adversary' was probably a rich neighbour, who, taking advantage of the death of her husband, had stolen her land. The offence of violently appropriating the property of widows and orphans is often alluded to in the OT, and forbidden with threats of divine vengeance (Ex 22:22-24, etc.).

5. Weary me] lit. 'give me a black eye.'

7. Avenge his own elect] i.e. the members of His Church. Christ comforts His disciples who are discouraged by the persecutions which are even now threatening, by promising that God will visit their persecutors (the Jews and afterwards the heathen) with condign punishment. This was literally fulfilled in the calamities which overtook the Jews and the chief heathen persecutors of the Christians. Though he bear long with them] better, 'though he is slow to act for them,' i.e. though His coming seems to be delayed.

8. Speedily] cp. Rev 22:20.2 Pet 3:8-10. Christ's coming, though it may seem to be long delayed, will be as speedy as the scheme of God's providence, which takes account of the needs of the whole world, He will permit. It will not be delayed an instant longer than is necessary.

Nevertheless, etc.] The sense is, 'Nevertheless, in spite of the warning and encouragement I am giving you, the faith of many will have waxed cold at the time of My return.' Christ does not mean that the elect will have lost their faith altogether, but that on account of the trials and disappointments which will precede the Second Advent, and also on account of its unexpected delay, they will be discouraged.

Faith] or, rather, 'the faith,' i.e. the unshaken confidence in the certainty of My Second Coming, which I hope to find.

9-14. The Pharisee and the Publican at Prayer (peculiar to Lk). This parable is apparently addressed not to the Pharisees themselves, but to certain of the disciples of Jesus who were proud of their spiritual attainments, and lacking in the virtues of humility and penitence.
10. Into the temple] Probably into the second court, 'The Court of the Women,' at one of the stated hours of prayer. The Temple, like modern Christian churches, was used for private as well as public prayer.

Publican] see on Mt.5. 11. Stood] i.e. placed himself conspicuously in the attitude of prayer: see on Mt.6. God, I thank thee] The words of the Pharisee can hardly be called a prayer. He asks for nothing, and feels his need of nothing. The Pharisee did, indeed, acknowledge that his virtues were derived from God, but he took all the merit of them to himself, and boasted of them before God and man.

12. Twice in the week] viz. on Mondays and Thursdays: see on Mt.6. Of all that I possess] RV 'of all that I get.' The Pharisee prided himself on his works of supererogation, i.e. works done over and above what God required: see on 17-10. The Law commanded only one fast in the whole year (viz. Day of Atonement, Lv.16.29). The Pharisee fasted twice a week. The Law tithe only the fruits of the field and the increase of cattle. The Pharisee tithed mint and cummin (Mt.23.23), and indeed his whole income (cp. Tob.17,9).

13. Afar off] viz. from the Pharisee, whom, in his humility, he thought far more righteous than himself. Would not lift up] Since the rabbis forbade the eyes to be raised to heaven during prayer (see Mt.6), it is necessary to suppose that there was some special indication of humility in the publican's attitude. Be merciful, etc.] lit. 'be propitiated to me the sinner.' As the Pharisee had singled himself out as the one holy in the world, so the publican singles himself out as the chief of sinners, the man in whom all sins have met—a characteristic trait for who, when first truly convicted of sin, thinks any man's sins can equal his own (1 Tim.1)? (Trench).

14. Justified] A favourite word of St. Paul's, employed in St. Paul's sense, as is natural in the Pauline Gospel. 'Justify' in the NT. means always to regard as just, not to render just, or sanctify. Rather than the other] This probably means that the publican was justified, and that the Pharisee was not; not that the Pharisee was regarded as righteous, and the publican more than righteous.

18-30. The rich young ruler. The reward of those who forsake all (Mt.19.16 Mk.10.17). See on Mt.

31-34. The passion and resurrection predicted (Mt.20.17 Mk.10.39). See on Mt.

35-43. The blind man at Jericho (Mt.20.29 Mk.10.46). See on Mt.

ZACCHÆUS. THE POUNDS. CHRIST'S TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM. HE CLEANSES THE TEMPLE

1-10. Zacchæus (peculiar to Lk). The narrative shows that our Lord's familiar intercourse with publicans and sinners was justified by its results. Zacchæus became a convert, surrendered half of his great wealth to the poor, and made restitution for his past misdeeds.

2. The chief] RV 'a chief publican.' 'There must have been at Jericho one of the principal custom-houses, both on account of the exportation of the balm which grew in that oasis, and which was sold in all countries of the world, and on account of the considerable traffic which took place on this road, by which lay the route from Persia to Judea and Egypt. Zacchæus was at the head of this office' (Godet). It is unlikely that Zacchæus belonged to the highest class of publicani, who collected the taxes of whole provinces or kingdoms, though occasionally Jews filled such an office. Zacchæus has a Hebrew name, and is clearly a Jew: see on Mt.5.9-18.

3. To see, etc.] RV 'to see who Jesus was,' i.e. to distinguish Him in the dense crowd which surrounded Him. 4. A sycamore] not the English sycamore, but a tree which receives its name from the fact that its fruit is like a fig, and its leaves like those of the mulberry: cp. 17.6 and Am.7.14. Sycamores are not now very common in Palestine.

5. At thy house] Jericho was a priestly city, and according to the Talmud contained as many priests as Jerusalem. Specially significant, therefore, was Christ's resolution to lodge with a publican. 8. And Zacchæus stood] Probably after the feast, or on the next day. The effect of our Lord's conversation was the complete conversion of Zacchæus, which immediately showed itself in act. I give] viz. at this moment. Up to the time of his conversion Zacchæus had given little in charity. He now atones for his past neglect by surrendering one-half of his capital. If I have taken, etc.] RV 'wrongfully exacted ought.' He proposes to examine into his past transactions, and if he has wronged any one, to make restitution out of the half of his capital which he still retains. Fourfold] The Law only required this from a detected thief (Ex.22.1). 9. To this house] Because with Zacchæus his family and household servants were converted.

A son of Abraham] both in descent and character. This the Pharisees would have denied, for they ranked publicans with the heathen: see on Mt.5.10. Cp. Mt.18.11.

11-27. Parable of the Pounds (peculiar to but similar to the Parable of the Talents, v. 25 (q.v.). It differs from that parable, in the introduction of the rebellious cities, vv. 14, 27; (2) in its gradation of the rewards and punishments of the next world; in representing future bliss as a state of active community.

The nobleman (v. 12) is Christ Himself, going into a far country (heaven), to receive Himself a kingdom (almighty power over universe), and to return (at the Second Advent). He calls His ten servants (all the members of His Church), and entrusts them a pound each (i.e. all their bodily, mental, spiritual capacities). The citizens who hate Him are all the enemies of Christ. They called His citizens, because even the wicked by right His subjects, seeing that He has created and redeemed them. On His return, judge the world, He summons the ten servants (such Christians as appear to have been faithful to their trust), and enquires at use they have made of the capacities entrusted to them. Some we made great use, others little, others none at all; and are accordingly recompensed, some being placed over ten cities (a great reward), others over five cities (a less reward), others being entirely excluded from all the rewards the future kingdom. The taking of the pound from the man who did not use it, signifies that faculties which are not used, are really lost; and the giving of the pound to him who had ten already, signifies that those faculties which are rightly used are capable of definite increase. The ten cities and the five cities indicate the different kinds of employment assigned in heaven to persons of different spiritual capacity. They also, perhaps, indicate different states of blessedness assigned to the saved in accordance with their beha vior in the previous state of probation on earth. In the corresponding parable in Mt the teaching is different. There all the faithful servants show the same diligence, and receive the same reward. The slaying of the rebellious citizens (v. 27) represents the judgment of the wicked at the Last Day. This parable, like so many others, assigns to Jesus the position of King and Judge of the human race. It may, therefore, be fairly used to prove His Divinity.

11. Because they thought] The multitudes thought that Jesus was going to Jerusalem to set up the Messianic kingdom at once. Jesus therefore explained by a parable that the kingdom would not be established till His Second Coming, and that even then not all the children of Abraham, but only the spiritually fit, would be admitted into it. This was the chief lesson to the multitudes, who expected that all Israelites would share in the future glory. To the disciples the lesson was that even among the saved there would be differences, and that, therefore, those who wished a great reward in the future kingdom of heaven must labour with all diligence in their various vocations on earth. 13. Servants] lit. 'slaves.' Pounds] lit. 'mina.' The mina was the sixtieth part of a talent, i.e. 100 denarii, or £4.

14. We will not, etc.] This v. may have a special reference to Christ's rejection by the Jews after His Resurrection and Ascension. For the historical fact which perhaps suggested this incident in the parable, see art. 'Dynasty of the Herods' (Archelaus).

24, 25. This complete misapprehension of Christ's character shows that he had never really 'known' Christ with saving knowledge.

27. Although this v. describes the final punishment of those who reject Christ, it may also have reference to the temporal destruction of those Jews who rejected Christ at the fall of Jerusalem.

28-40. The triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21, Mk 11, Lk 19). See on Mt and Lk.

37. The descent] There was a magnificent view of Jerusalem and the Temple from this point, and at the sight of the capital of the new kingdom the multitudes broke into a shout of triumph.

38. Peace in heaven] i.e. There is peace for man (i.e. favour with God) in heaven. By sending the Messiah, God shows that He regards His people with favour. The expression is peculiar to Lk: cp. 21.

41-44. Christ weeps over Jerusalem (peculiar to Lk). 'The path mounts again; it climbs a rugged ascent; it reaches a ledge of smooth rock, and in an instant the whole city bursts into view. As now the dome of the Mosque El-Aksa rises like a ghost from the earth before the traveller stands on the ledge, so then must have risen the Temple-tower; as now the vast enclosure of the Muslim sanctuary, so then must have spread the Temple-courts; as now the grey town on its broken hills, so then the magnificent city, with its background—long since vanished away—of gardens and suburbs on the W. plateau behind. Immediately below was the valley of the Kidron, here seen in its greatest depth as it joins the Valley of Hinnom, and thus giving full effect to the great peculiarity of Jerusalem seen from its E. side—its situation as of a city rising out of a deep abyss. It is hardly possible to doubt that this rise and turn of the road, this rocky ledge, was the exact point where the multitude paused again, and "He, when He beheld the city, wept over it" (Stanley). Cp. Mt 23.

42. If thou hadst known] i.e. O that thou hadst known! This implies previous visits of Christ to Jerusalem. This thy day [i.e. the time of Christ's earthly ministry. 43. Enemies] i.e. the Romans. A trench] lit. 'a palisade.' The Romans actually raised a palisade round Jerusalem. The Jews burnt it, and the Romans replaced it by a wall.
44. Thy children] i.e. thy inhabitants. The time of thy visitation] i.e. the time of Christ's ministry.
48. Were very attentive] RV 'hung upon him, listening.'

CHAPTER 20
VARIOUS INCIDENTS OF THE LAST WEEK
1–8. The authority of Jesus challenged (Mt 21:23 Mk 11:27). See on Mt.
9–18. The wicked husbandmen (Mt 21:28 Mk 12:1). See on Mt.
36. Neither can they die] This is perhaps given as a reason why after the Resurrection there is no more marriage.
37. At the bush] RV 'in the place concerning the Bush' : cp. Ex 3.
41–44. Is the Christ David's son? (Mt 22:41 Mk 12:28). See on Mt.
45–47. Jesus denounces the scribes (Mt 23:1 Mk 12:38). See on Mt.
47. Devour widows' houses] see on Mk 12:40.

THE WIDOW'S MITE. PROPHECY OF THE FALL OF JERUSALEM AND THE SECOND ADVENT
1–4. The widow's mite(Mk 12:41). See on Mk.
5–36. Great prophecy of the Fall of Jerusalem and the Second Advent (Mt 24:1 Mk 13:1). See on Mt. St. Luke distinguishes these two events more clearly than the other evangelists (v. 24). He also describes Jerusalem as being 'surrounded by armies.' This greater definiteness is held by some to indicate that St. Luke wrote after the fall of Jerusalem, and added certain interpretative notes to our Lord's utterances. But there is no real reason why Christ should not have spoken exactly as St. Luke records. See on Mt.
9. Not by and by] i.e. not at once. 13. Testimony] It shall be an opportunity for you to bear witness to Me. 15. Mouth] i.e. eloquence.
18, 19. Peculiar to Lk. 19. By patient continuance in well-doing and in suffering ye shall possess (i.e. keep safe the inward life of) your souls. 24. The times of the Gentiles] i.e. the time of the rejection of Israel, and of Gentile predominance both in the affairs of the world and in the Kingdom of God. The times of the Gentiles will come to an end, when Israel is converted (Ro 11:25).
37, 38. Christ's daily teaching. He lodges at the Mount of Olives (Mt 21:17 Mk 11:19). See on Mt.

CHAPTER 22
TREASON OF JUDAS. THE LAST SUPPER.
THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN. ARREST OF JESUS. THE JEWISH TRIAL
1–6. Conspiracy of the chief priests. Treachery of Judas (Mt 26:1–5, 14–16 Mk 14:1, 2, 10, 11). See on Mt. St. Luke omits the anointing at Bethany, because he has already recorded a similar incident (7:87).
4. Captains] i.e. the Levitical guard or police of the Temple, not the Roman garrison of Jerusalem.
7–13. Preparations for the Last Supper (Mt 26:17 Mk 14:12). See on Mt.
14–23. Institution of the Lord's Supper. Denunciation of the Traitor (Mt 26:20–29 Mk 14:24 1 Cor 11:23). See on Mt. St. Luke's account most resembles that in 1 Cor 11:23, which is only natural, seeing that he was a disciple of St. Paul. The most striking peculiarity of his account is that he mentions two cups, one before and one after the blessing of the bread. The latter is without doubt the cup of the Holy Communion, or Eucharist, which, as has been shown on St. Matthew, corresponded to the ‘Cup of Blessing’ or ‘third cup’ of the Passover Supper. The earlier cup of St. Luke may therefore have been the ‘second cup’ of the Passover, which was drunk after the lamb was placed on the table (see on Mt). The mention of two cups by St. Luke was early felt to be a difficulty, and accordingly a few ancient MSS reduce the cups to one, some by omitting the former cup, others by omitting the latter. The latter omission, which has the support of only one Greek and five Latin MSS, has met with some support from recent critics. If it be accepted, St. Luke's first cup must be that of the Eucharist, and in that case he represents the Eucharistic cup as consecrated before the bread.
17. Took the cup] RV 'received a cup.' 18. I will not drink, etc.] If these words are in their true position they seem to show that Jesus did not Himself drink of the cup of the Eucharist. Mt and Mk, however, place them after the blessing of the Eucharistic cup, instead of before it. 19. In remembrance of me] lit. 'for My memorial.' This command for the continual repetition of the ordinance is mentioned only by St. Luke and St. Paul. The word translated 'remembrance' is a rare one, and in biblical Greek means always a memorial before God, e.g. Lv 24:7: ‘Thou shalt put pure frankincense upon each row of (shewbread), that it may be on the bread for a memorial, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord.’ So also in NT (Heb 10:8). Accordingly the rite is intended, not so much to remind men of the death of Christ, as to remind God of it, to plead before God the merits of Christ’s sacrifice, as the only ground for mercy and favour. 20. This cup is the new testament (RV ‘covenant’) in my blood The meaning, according to 1 Cor 10:16, seems to be: ‘This cup conveys to those who with true and lively faith partake of it, the benefits of the new covenant, which the shedding of my blood procures for mankind’ (i.e. remission of sins, eternal life, spiritual sustenance, etc.). Mt and Mk have, ‘This is my blood of the new covenant.’ There is no reason why our Lord should not have used both expressions in explaining to His disciples the spiritual effect of the rite. 21. This v. is a strong support of the view that Judas received the sacrament, but it is not conclusive: see on Mt, and Jn 13:8.

24–30. A contention which should be the greatest (peculiar to Lk). This contention is probably to be placed at the very beginning of the supper, before the feet-washing: see on Jn 13:1–20. Our Lord had previously rebuked a very similar contention provoked by the ambition of the sons of Zebedee: see Mt 20:20–28, where almost the same words are used. 28. Temptations] i.e. trials. 29. 30. See on Mt 19:27–30.

31–34. Peter’s fall foretold (common to all the evangelists). See on Mt 26:31–35. St. Luke agrees with St. John that Jesus made the prediction in the supper-room.

31, 32. These two vv. are peculiar to St. Luke. Satan hath desired] i.e. Satan hath procured that all of you should be surrendered to him to be severely tried, like Job. Sift] The violent motion of the sieve corresponds to the violent trial that the apostles were to experience when Christ was arrested.

32. For thee] Christ prayed specially for Peter, because he was the leader of the Apostles, and so much depended on him. His primacy was personal, not official, being derived from the special faculty of faith from which he derived his name, and which, after his fall, he conspicuously displayed.

35–38. Jesus directs His disciples to make provision for a time of persecution (peculiar to Lk). ‘The meaning of our Lord in this much controverted passage appears to be to forewarn the apostles of the outward dangers which will await them henceforward in their mission —unlike the time when He sent them forth without earthly appliances, they must now make use of common resources for sustenance, yea and even of the sword itself for defence’ (Alford).

36. He that hath a purse] Although under ordinary circumstances those who preach the gospel are to live of the gospel and not concern themselves with worldly affairs, yet under exceptional circumstances, e.g. amid hostile surroundings, or in a heathen land, or in a church extremely poor, ministers of the gospel may engage in trade, or in other ways provide for their maintenance, as St. Paul did (Ac 18:3).

Scrip] i.e. provision-basket. And he that hath no sword] The better translation is, ‘And he that hath no money and no scrip, let him sell his cloak and buy a sword.’ The meaning is that the danger will be so great, that self-defence will be of primary importance. The best course for a man who has no money, will be to sell his cloak to buy a sword to defend himself. Sword stands here for all lawful means of self-defence. When St. Paul pleaded before Nero, he doubtless employed counsel to defend him. This was ‘buying a sword’ in the sense which Jesus intended.

37. The things concerning me] i.e. the prophecies of My death. End] i.e. fulfilment.
38. Here are two swords] The disciples thought that Jesus advised them to buy swords to protect Him from arrest. They pointed out, therefore, that they had two already, with which they were prepared to defend Him. Seeing Himself misunderstood, Jesus abruptly closed the conversation with the words, It is enough, i.e. ‘Enough of this trifling!’ He had intended the disciples to ‘buy swords’ (i.e. take measures) for their own safety, not for His. He Himself was resolved to die, but He wished their lives to be preserved.

43, 44. These vv., which contain the exquisitely human features of the bloody sweat, and the appearance of the angel to strengthen Jesus, are peculiar to Lk. They exhibit our Lord as true man, subject to all the weaknesses and trials of humanity, and requiring the same comfort and support in His agony as other men. Although omitted by a few ancient authorities, these vv. obviously describe an authentic incident: cp. Mt 4:11.

44. Drops of blood] Great mental agony has been known to produce this phenomenon.

47–53. Arrest of Jesus (Mt 26:47 Mk 14:46 Jn 18:3). See on Mt and Jn.
52. Suffer ye thus far] i.e. Suffer My enemies to do even this, viz. arrest Me. Make no further resistance. Healed him] This healing is peculiar to Lk.

53. This is your hour] i.e. the hour in
CHAPTER 23

TRIAL BEFORE PILATE AND HEROD. THE CRUCIFIXION AND BURIAL

1-5. The trial before Pilate begins (Mt 27 1, 2, 11-14 Mk 15 1-5 Jn 18 28-38). See on Mt and Jn.

6-12. Trial before Herod (peculiar to Lk). By sending Jesus to Herod the clever Roman gained two ends at once. First, he got rid of the business which was imposed on him, and then he took the first step towards a reconciliation with Herod (v. 12). The cause of their quarrel had probably been some conflict of jurisdiction. In that case, was not the best means of soldering up the quarrel to concede to him a right of jurisdiction within the very city of Jerusalem? (Godet).

Was at Jerusalem] i.e. in order to keep the Passover.

13-25. Trial before Pilate resumed. Jesus is condemned (Mt 27 15-26 Mk 15 6-20 Jn 18 38-19 16). See on Mt and Jn.

26-32. The procession to the Cross (Mt 27 38 Mk 15 21, 22 Jn 19 17). See on Mt. The beautiful address to the women of Jerusalem is peculiar to Lk. These women are not the same as the Galilean sympathisers (8:1-9), but residents in Jerusalem. The warm feeling with which all classes of women regarded Jesus is especially marked in this ‘the Gospel of womanhood.’

28. Weep not for me] You are not wrong in weeping for Me, nevertheless something is about to befall, for which you will weep with far greater reason, the destruction of your city and the overthrow of your nation.

30. Cp. Isa 2 21 Rev 6 16. 31. If they do these things, etc.] i.e. ‘If the Romans so cruelly treat Me whom they know to be innocent, how much more severely will they treat your children whom they will regard as rebellious and guilty?’ Or, ‘If the inhabitants of Jerusalem are so guilty now in slaying Me, to what further stages of wickedness will they afterwards advance?’

33-49. Crucifixion and Death of Jesus (Mt 27 33-56 Mk 15 24-41 Jn 19 18-37). See on Mt and Jn. Peculiar to Lk are three of the Seven Words from the Cross, and the incident of the Converted Thief.

34. Father, forgive them, etc.] (peculiar to Lk) into practice His own teaching about loving enemies and forgiving them.

39. One of the malefactors] At first both malefactors reviled Jesus (Mt 27 48), then one of them, moved by the gentleness and majesty of the Sufferer, was ashamed, and rebuked his fellow. From shame he passed to penitence and faith.

42. Lord, remember me, etc.] RV ‘Jesus, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom.’ The thief here acknowledges Jesus to be the Messiah, a stupendous act of faith under the circumstances. He was rejected by the Jews who saw Him raising the dead. He was not rejected by the thief who saw Him hanging with him on the Cross (St. Augustine). The thief apparently expected Christ to rise again and establish His kingdom.

43. To-day, etc.] (peculiar to Lk). ‘The grace granted is more abundant than the prayer. For his prayer was that the Lord would be mindful of him when He should have come into His kingdom. But the Lord said unto him, “Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.”’ (St. Ambrose).

44. In the RV the darkness is said to be due to ‘the sun’s light failing.’

46. Father, etc.] (peculiar to Lk). This ‘word’ is a quotation from Ps 31 5. Spirit] i.e. Christ’s human spirit. ‘Spirit’ and ‘soul’ are identical in the Gospels. Christ is said to have both (Mt 26 38 27 50 Jn 12 27 13 21 19 30).

50-56. The burial (Mt 27 57-61 Mk 15 42-47 Jn 19 38-42). See on Mt, Mk and Jn.

THE RESURRECTION AND THE ASCENSION

1-11. Two angels appear to the women at the sepulchre (Mt 28 1-8 Mk 16 1-8; cp. Jn 20 1, 2). See on Mt and Jn.

12. Peter visits the sepulchre. See on Jn 20 3, 10. This v. is wanting in some ancient authorities.

13-35. The journey to Emmaus (Mk 16 12, 13). Though alluded to in Mk, this beautiful narrative is peculiar to Lk. The conjecture of Theophylact that one of the two disciples was St. Luke still supports, but is unlikely.

13. Emmaus] Josephus speaks of an Emmaus 6 furlongs from Jerusalem, the habitation of a colony of Titus’s soldiers. This may be the modern Kulonieh (lit. ‘colony’), 7 m. W. of Jerusalem.

16. Their eyes were holden] Mk gives a tly different explanation ('He appeared in another form'). St. Luke implies that our Lord prevented their recognition of Him by their absence. But apart from this a certain ge seems to have passed over His body at resurrection: cp. Jn 21:14. 17. As ye walk, we sad] RV 'And they stood still, looking but the Western text is nearly as AV. 18. Cleopas] a person otherwise unknown. obscurity of the persons concerned is a gage of the authenticity of the narrative. 19. And thou] RV 'Dost thou alone sojourn in Salem and not know the things,' etc. 20. Redeemed Israel] perhaps they were thinking of redemption from Roman rule (6). 21. Third day] Possibly they remembered st's prophecy (18:33). 22. Ought not Christ] e exactly, 'Ought not the Messiah' (in sequence of the prophecies) 'to have suf- fered these things and to have entered into glory?' This passage supports the view Jesus entered into glory not at the resurrection, but at the Resurrection. The Greek implies that the entering into glory was already past, and the phrase 'His glory' means that the glory was complete. Probably the Lord was in heaven during the Forty Days, ending to earth for occasional interviews. 23. He took bread] RV 'the bread.' Although milar to the institution of the Holy Supper, was probably not a celebration of it, but an resembling the blessing and breaking of the food at the feeding of the 5000, at which nibly the two disciples had been present. 24. He vanished] Our Lord's risen body was an organ of spirit, and could manifest if in whatever place, or under whatever sensible conditions He willed. After disapp- aring at Emmaus He seems to have trans- formed Himself instantly to Jerusalem, there to have appeared to Simon, v. 34: 'our Lord's mysterious appearance when oors were shut.' Jn 20:12. 25. The Lord is risen] Apparently incon- sistent with Mk 16:13, q.v. 26. To Simon] see or 15. 27-43. Appearance on Easter Evening (Jn 24:20: cp. Mk 16:14). See on Jn. At first sight re appears to be no break in the narrative the end of the Gospel, and the Ascension (v. 51) seems to take place on the very day of the resurrection. But since it is unlikely that so careful an historian as St. Luke would contradict himself on so important a point of chronology (see Ac 18), it seems safer to hold that the conclusion of St. Luke from v. 44 is a summary of the whole events of the 40 days, and not simply of those of Easter Day. It is, however, just possible that v. 51 does not describe the Ascension. In this case there is no difficulty in assigning the whole of the events of this chapter to Easter Day. 28. And my feet] Probably the feet also were pierced. Handle me] A proof of a corporeal resurrection. Our Lord's body was now spiritual, but it was manifested by Him on this occasion under sensible conditions to show that it was the same body which was cruci- fied. 29. Flesh and bones] are mentioned as representing the solid and tangible framework of the body. Blood is not mentioned, but this is no proof that our Lord's body did not possess it: see 1 Cor 10:16. 30. And of an honeycomb] Some ancient authorities omit these words. Our Lord ate, not as needing food, but to afford a sign. The Apostles laid great stress on His eating and drinking with them as proof of the reality of the resurrection, Ac 10:41: cp. Ac 14: RM. 31-49. Summary of instructions given during the Forty Days. 32. The law . . . the prophets . . . the psalms stand for the three divisions of the OT. Canon recognised by the Jews. The 'Prophets' include the historical books except Chronicles and Ruth. 'Psalms' stand for 'the Writings,' i.e. the third division of the Canon, of which it is the principal book. 33. Among all nations] RV 'unto all the nations'; a proof that Jesus contemplated a universal Church. 34. The promise] i.e. the Holy Spirit, Ac 1:4: cp. Jn 15:26. 35-53. The Ascension (Ac 1:9 Mk 16:19). See on Ac. 51. And carried up into heaven] A few ancient authorities omit these words. If they are omitted, it is possible to regard this event, not as the Ascension, but as a miraculous disappearance of Jesus at the end of the interview begun in v. 36. 52. And they wor- shipped him] A few ancient authorities omit these words.
ST. JOHN

INTRODUCTION

1. General characteristics. Few books have exercised so wide an influence as this. Not only has it a message for believers, for whose edification it was primarily intended, but it casts a mysterious spell even over readers whose religious standpoint is furthest removed from its own. There is nothing like it in literature except the three Epistles attributed to the same source. The attempt to analyse the effect produced by a unique work of genius like the present is never successful—the effect is the product of the author’s personality, and personality is unanalyzable—but, without attempting this, it may be possible to draw attention in a helpful way, at the outset, to two of its leading characteristics.

(a) The writer possesses the unusual gift of clothing the profoundest ideas in language of childlike simplicity. His ideas are far deeper than St. Paul’s, but are much more simply expressed. Take, for example, his descriptions of the nature of God: ‘God is [a] spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth’; ‘He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love’; or of the preexistence and divinity of the Word, ‘In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God’; or of His oneness with the eternal Father, ‘I and the Father are one’; ‘Before Abraham was, I AM’; or of the Incarnation, ‘And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth’; or of Christ as the Life, ‘I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die’; or of true faith, ‘Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.’ In these and many other passages the peculiar union of simplicity and profundity produces the effect of sublimity, a characteristic often noted by the ancients, who expressed it by the figure of a soaring eagle, which became the accepted symbol, even as early as the second century, of the Fourth Evangelist.

(b) The Gospel is not only a history, but an allegory. It is the work of a mystic, trained in the allegorical method of interpreting the Scriptures, and expecting his own work to be interpreted in a like manner. ‘John,’ says Clement of Alexandria (200 A.D.), ‘having observed that the bodily things (i.e. the bare historic facts) had been sufficiently set forth by the [earlier] Gospels, . . . produced a spiritual [i.e. an allegorical] Gospel’ (Euseb. ‘H. E.’ vi. 14). We must not, however, press the idea of allegory too far. We are not to suppose, with Origen, that some of the incidents in the Gospel are not history at all, but only allegory. But we may assume that the author’s choice of materials is dominated by an allegorical or didactic purpose. He sits down to write, not a biography, but an interpretation of the life of Christ, and since his method is that of allegory, we are justified in seeking a mystical meaning not only in every saying and in every incident, but even in minute details which at first sight seem trivial. This persistent symbolism gives to the Fourth Gospel much of its mysterious charm. It produces an effect on the mind not unlike that of one of Holman Hunt’s pictures. Even the uninitiated feel that far more is suggested than is expressed on the surface. Specially clear and striking examples of the author’s symbolism occur in 18 (the open heavens), 21-11 (the good wine of the gospel), 22 (the temple of Christ’s body), 35 (water and the Spirit), 314 (the uplifted serpent), 410 (the living water), 485 (the fields white for harvest), 681 (the true manna and the bread from heaven), 78 (the symbolism of the feast of tabernacles), 9-8 (the opening of the eyes of the man born blind, symbolising Christ as the Light of the world), 109, 11 (Christ as the Door of the sheep and the Good Shepherd), 1120 (the raising of Lazarus, symbolising Christ as the Resurrection and the Life), 1121 (the mystical meaning of the high priest’s utterance), 127 (the anointing, symbolising Christ’s death and burial), 1224 (the corn of wheat), 1315 (the symbolical feet-washing), 1380 (‘and it was night’), 146 (Christ ‘the Way’), 155 (the Vine and the branches), 1625 (Christ’s words are ‘in proverbs,’ i.e. allegorical), 1934, 35 (the symbolism of the blood and water: cp. 1 John 5:6,8), 1980 (‘a bone of him shall not be broken’), 205 (the symbolism of the grave clothes), 2017 (‘Touch me not,’ etc.), 215-14 (symbolism of the draught of fishes and of the meal), 2018 (the ‘girding’ of Peter).

2. Date and Authorship.

(1) External evidence. That the Gospel, by nsoever written, probably falls within the cent. A.D., appears from the following ations or references to it by early writers.
Ignatius, 110 A.D., reproduces 38 almost atim. "He knoweth whence he cometh whither he goeth." He speaks of the 'Supper as Christ's 'flesh' (not 'body') blood (cp. c. 6). He calls Christ the gos' ('Word') of God, the Door of the
, and the Living Water. He calls prince of this world.' All these are peculiar to St. John.
Polycarp, 110 A.D. (a personal disciple of St. John), quotes St. John's First Epistle, most closely connected with the Gospel, almost certainly by the same hand.
Simonides, the Gnostic, 120 A.D. 'And this hat is meant in the Gospels, "There was true light which lighteth every man coming the world."' (see 19).
That everything has its own proper seasons sufficiently proved by the words of the four, 'Mine hour is not yet come' (24).
Christides, the Apologist, circ. 130 A.D., uses characteristic expression, 'came down from
', in connexion with the Incarnation 3:18 6:32), and calls our Lord's sinless man nature 'flesh' (cp. c. 6).
Apias, 130 A.D., according to very ancient dence, named John as the author of this spel. He certainly used the First Epistle John, for which see above.
Valentinus, 140 A.D., quotes 108, 'All that come before me are thieves and robbers.'
The Gospel of Peter, 150 A.D., or earlier, as all four Gospels.
St. Justin Martyr, 150 A.D. 'As many as persuaded and believe that what we teach say is true, are brought by us where there water, and are regenerated in the same ner in which we were ourselves regener-
d. For in the name of God the Father Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Christ, and of the Holy Spirit, they receive the washing with water. For rist also said, "Except ye be born again, shall not enter into the kingdom of .' Now that it is impossible for those have been once born to enter into their others' wombs, is manifest to all' (cp. 3:4-6).
also often speaks of the Word becoming in language evidently suggested by the fourth Gospel.
Tatian, 160 A.D., compiled a harmony of four Gospels called Diatessaron.
Theophilus of Antioch, 180 A.D. 'And since the holy writings teach us, and all the rit-bearing men, one of whom, John, says,
In the beginning was the Word, and the 'Lord was with God,' showing that at first od was alone, and the Word in Him' (see 11).
St. Irenæus, 177 A.D., a disciple of Polycarpus, a disciple of John, speaks of this Gospel as St. John's again and again, and even argues that there can be only four Gospels, viz. those that we at present pos-sees are peculiar to St. John.
The Muratorian Fragment, 200 A.D. 'The author of the Fourth Gospel is John, one of the disciples.'
Clement of Alexandria, 200 A.D., Tertu-lian, 200 A.D., and Origen, 220 A.D., speak of the apostolic authorship as undoubted.
Eusebius, the Church historian, 330 A.D., classes it without hesitation among the 'undisputed' writings.
So far as is known, its authenticity was denied by no one, orthodox or unorthodox, in ancient times, except the obscure sect of the Alogi. Even these acknowledged its antiquity, for they ascribed it to St. John's leading opponent at Ephesus, Cerinthus.
(2) Internal evidence. It is a characteristic of writings which are forged, or issued without fraudulent intent under another name (pseudoepigraphical), to indicate the supposed author prominently and clearly (Eocl 1 Eadr 14-4 Tob 11 Wsd 7-9 Bar 11, so also Gospel of Peter, Apostolic Constitutions, etc.), and had this been the character of the Fourth Gospel, St. John's name would without question have been unmistakably prominent. As a matter of fact, the author has so carefully concealed his identity, that it requires considerable research and reflection to discover who he was. A careful reader, however, will discern, (1) that he was a Jew. His accurate acquaintance with Jewish laws, customs, and opinions, is enough to establish this (11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31). (2) That he was a Jew of Palestine.
This is shown by his knowledge of unimportant
Palestinian localities such as 'Cana of Galilee' (21,22), 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (123), Ephraim 'near the wilderness' (1154), 'Anon near to Salim' (235), Sychar (49). (3) That he lived before the destruction of Jerusalem.
This is clear from his accurate acquaintance with the topography of Jerusalem, and especially of the Temple. He knows, for example, the intermittent spring of Bethesda with its five porches near the sheep-gate, Solomon's porch, the distance from Jerusalem to Bethany, Kidron, the pool of Siloam, Gethsemane, the treasury, the pavement called Gabbatha, Golgotha 'nigh to the city where there was a garden.' He is well acquainted with the current views about the Messiah among the Samaritans and Jews of the period. He shows an exact knowledge of the ritual of the feasts—e.g. Passover, Dedication, Tabernacles, and of other religious customs, e.g. ablutions before meals, and purifications before the Passover. He is familiar with the relations between the Jews and the Samaritans, with rabbinical ideas about being 'born in sins,' with the impropriety of a rabbi addressing a woman in a public place, with Jewish reluctance to enter a Gentile house, or to let dead bodies remain unburied on the sabbath, and altogether invests his narrative with a verisimilitude which can hardly be accounted for except on the supposition that he was a contemporary. (4) That he was an apostle and an eyewitness. That he was an eyewitness is three times stated: 114 we beheld his glory'; 1936 and he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is true, and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe'; 2124 (appendix) 'this is the disciple which beareth witness of these things and wrote these things, and we know that his witness is true' (cp. also 1 Jn 1, written by the same author). In 2120,24 the writer is expressly identified with the disciple whom Jesus loved, the son of Zebedee (21), who was present at the Last Supper leaning on Jesus' breast (1323), stood by the cross (1926), received into his house the Blessed Virgin (1927), ran with Peter to the tomb (203), and was present at the sea of Tiberias (217). He was not James the son of Zebedee, for James was martyred 44 A.D. (Ac 127). Tradition, therefore, seems to be right in asserting that he was John. It is a confirmation of this view, that the writer shows a closer acquaintance with the inner life and sentiments of the apostolic circle than any other evangelist (see e.g. 211,22 427 666 92 118 1216 chs. 13-17 182 20196 c. 21).

3. Difficulties. We can only briefly allude to the chief objections which have been brought against the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel.

Objection 1. The Synoptic Gospels, which mention only one Passover, obviously limit the ministry to one year, while the Fourth Gospel which mentions three (213 64 121), and perhaps four (51), extends it to three or four. Reply. The Synoptists nowhere state or even hint (not even in Lk 1119, q.v.) that the ministry was confined to a single year.

Objection 2. The Synoptists confine the ministry to Galilee and Persea, but the Fourth Gospel locates a large portion of it in Judaea. Reply. The Synoptic Gospels (for whatever reason) are written from an exclusively Galilean point of view, but even they hint at a ministry in Judaea (Mt 2527 Lk 1334 444 R.V.).

Objection 3. The Synoptists date the last Passover on Thursday evening, but the Fourth Gospel on Friday evening. Reply. The discrepancy is perhaps only apparent, but if it is real, the account of the Fourth Evangelist is the more credible (see on Jn 1828).

Objection 4. The style of the Gospel differs in such a marked degree from the style of the Revelation, that the same writer cannot have written both. Reply. If this is so, the Johannine authorship of the Revelation, which is a much more disputable book than the Gospel, may require to be given up. We may suppose, however, that the Revelation was written in the reign of Nero, and the Gospel a quarter of a century later, in which case the difference of style can be sufficiently accounted for (see Intro. to Revelation).

Objection 5. Our Lord's discourses in the Fourth Gospel differ altogether in style and subject-matter from those in the Synoptics, and therefore cannot be authentic. Reply. The Fourth Gospel does not profess to represent the general tenor and style of Christ's teaching. It is a didactic work, intended mainly to produce and enhance faith in our Lord's Divine Sonship (2031). The author, therefore, purposely collects and records mainly those sayings of Christ which illustrate the Divinity of His Person.

4. Date and Place of Composition. According to all ancient authorities, this Gospel was written by St. John in his old age at Ephesus, i.e. about 90 A.D., or a little earlier.

5. The Writer's Purpose and Theological Position. (1) The main object of the Gospel is to produce faith in Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God (2081), and in general to promote those views of our Lord's person and work, which in the later Church were generally designated 'orthodox.' As against humanitarian (Ebonite) tendencies, whether within or without the Church, the author lays the utmost stress upon our Lord's true Deity (see especially 111,18 (WH) 5807 86 1030 175), and concludes his Gospel (for c. 21 is a later appendix) with St. Thomas's great confession, 'My Lord and my God' (2026). On the other hand, as against Docetism, which, while confessing our Lord's Deity, denied that He was truly man, great stress is laid on our Lord's true humanity. The Word became 'flesh' (11), and that flesh could be handled (2030,37). The Incarnate Saviour possessed a true human soul (1011,17 1227), and a human spirit (11833), and was subject to painful human experiences, e.g. He was weary (49), wept (1183), groaned and was troubled (1188). Further, as against Cerinthus, the Apostle's opponent at Ephesus, who taught that Jesus was a mere man upon whom the heavenly Son of God descended at His baptism, St. John emphasises the unity of Christ's person, and the unbroken stream of His consciousness reaching back beyond the Incarnation into eternity (1111, 313 628 58, 41, 42, 50, 51, 58 838 175).
(2) Among the leading religious ideas of this Gospel, most of which are peculiar to, or at least characteristic of, St. John, are ‘eternal life’ regarded as a present as well as a future possession; ‘judgment’ as a present act effecting a present separation between the friends and the enemies of God; ‘abiding in’ (in a spiritual sense) ‘flesh’ in the sense of human nature without the connotation of sinfulness; eating and drinking Christ’s ‘flesh and blood’; the eternal predestination of events by God (6.37, 39, 44.10, 12, 12.39 17.9, 12), which, however, is not identical with determinism or fatalism, because salvation is offered to all men (4.42, 12, 82); ‘living water,’ by which the grace of the Holy Spirit is typified (10.10); the ‘new birth,’ or ‘birth from above’ of water and the Spirit (3.3); ‘truth’ in the sense not only of veracity and correct belief, but also of that holiness which ought to follow from correct belief (8.44 16.18 17.17 18.17; cp., especially the phrase ‘to do the truth,’ 3.31 1 Jn 1.9); ‘the world’ in the sense of the wicked world, alienated from God, and under the dominion of Satan, ‘the prince of this world’ (7.39, 13, 14, 17, 27, 30 15.18 16.11 17.14; etc.); ‘light’ and ‘darkness’ in a moral and spiritual sense (5.30 8.12 11.10 12.35, 36; etc.); ‘witness’ and ‘witnessing’ to religious truth, affirmed of the Father (5.37 8.18), of the Son (3.11 4.4, 8.14, etc.), of the Holy Ghost (15.26), of Moses and the prophets (5.46, etc.), of the Baptist (17.1 19.9, etc.), of the Apostles (15.27), of the words and miracles of Jesus (5.56 10.26).

(3) Among the titles of Christ peculiar to this Gospel or to the Johannine literature are, ‘the Word,’ or ‘Logos’ 1.14 (elsewhere only in Jn. 11.1 Rev. 19.13); the ‘Saviour of the world’ (4.42 1 Jn 4.4); the ‘Light of the world,’ or ‘of men’ (4.3, 9, 5; the ‘Manna,’ or ‘Living Bread’ (6.40); the ‘Door’ (10); the ‘Good Shepherd’ (10.11); ‘the Way, the Truth, and the Life’ (14); ‘the Resurrection and the Life’ (11.20); ‘the True Vine’ (15); ‘the Holy One of God’ (6.69 RV). The idea of Christ as the Paschal Lamb (19.36, perhaps also 17.30) is shared with St. Paul (1 Cor. 5), but the application of the OT types of Jacob’s ladder (12) and of the brazen serpent (34) to Christ is peculiar to this Gospel. Peculiar also is the combination of Christ’s Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension into one complex conception of which the leading characteristic is ‘glory’ (13.31, 34, etc.). The Passion is never contemplated in its native horror in and by itself, but always as interpreted and glorified by the Resurrection and the Ascension.

The doctrine of the Holy Spirit receives far more development in this Gospel than in the Synoptics. His personality is clearly implied by the masculine pronoun (14.16), by the personal title ‘Advocate’ peculiar to St. John (14.16, 20 15.26 167), and by His functions (15.4, 15, 14).

6. Relation to the Synoptics. The author omits much of the matter in the Synoptics, and in a few cases seems to correct them or inferences drawn from them. He represents John the Baptist as giving more explicit testimony to the Messiahship of Jesus, and Jesus Himself as less reluctant to publish it. His attitude to miracles is also different. He records not a single example of the most frequent synoptic type of miracle, the casting out of devils, nor does he employ the synoptic term ‘mighty works.’ To him Christ’s miracles, of which he records the mystic number seven, are ‘signs,’ or ‘works.’ They are recorded, not so much for their miraculous character, as for the sake of the doctrine or spiritual principle which they illustrate.

7. Relation to the Revelation. The Revelation may perhaps be by a different author from this Gospel, but, in any case, it belongs to the same theological school. The following are the chief words and ideas common to the two books—Christ as the Logos and as the Lamb, the Deity of Christ, and the duty of worshipping Him with the same worship as is due to the Father; the prominence of Satan; the idea of ‘keeping the commandments,’ and the emphasis laid on ‘witness’ and ‘truth.’

(1) The prologue (1.1-18).

(2) Early manifestation of Jesus (1.9-4.44).

(a) Witness of the Baptist (1.9-34).

(b) Manifestation to individuals (1.41-2.11).

(c) Manifestation in public (2.1-4.44).

(3) The fuller revelation: growth of unbelief among the Jews (5.1-12.29).

(a) Life (5.6-7).

(b) Truth, light, love (7.1-10.43).

(c) Fuller revelation of life, truth, light, love: more hostile unbelief of the Jews (11.1-12.28).

(4) The fuller revelation: growth of faith among the disciples (13.1-17.20).

(a) Love in humiliation (13.1-34).

(b) Last words of love to the faithful (13.35-15.38).

THE DIVINITY AND INCARNATION OF THE WORD. WITNESS OF JOHN. THE FIRST DISCIPLES.

1-18. Preface, declaring (1) that the Word was God, (2) that He was made man, (3) that He revealed the Father.

This sublime preface is intended to commend 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' both to Jewish and Gentile minds. It describes our Lord's person and office by a term familiar to both, that of the Logos or Word of God. 'Logos' has two meanings in Greek: (1) reason or intelligence, as it exists inwardly in the mind, and (2) reason or intelligence, as it is expressed outwardly in speech. Both these meanings are to be understood when Christ is called 'the Word of God.' He is the inward Word of God, because He exists from all eternity 'in the bosom of the Father,' as much one with Him as reason is one with the reasoning mind. Nothing is so close to a man as his own thought. It is within him, and is in a very real sense himself. So nothing is so close to God as His own eternal Word. It is within Him, it is one with Him, and it is divine like Him (vv. 1, 2, 18). Christ is also God's outward Word. He expresses and explains and reveals to the world what God is. It was He who created the world (v. 3), making its order and beauty an outward expression of God's hidden nature. In spite of the Fall, He remained in the world, revealing to sinful man, through reason, through conscience, and through prophecy, the nature of the Father. He was the True Light that shineth in darkness, and lighteth every man that cometh into the world (v. 4 f.). In the fulness of time He revealed God still more perfectly, by becoming man, and living a perfect and sinless human life (v. 14 f.). So perfectly did Christ's wonderful light reveal the innermost character of God, that though 'no man hath seen God at any time' (1:18), those who have seen Christ may be said in a very real sense to have seen the Father also (14). The human life of Christ not only reveals what God is, it also helps man to become like God. The incarnate Christ is 'full of grace and truth' (1:14, 16, 17), and gives believers the power to put away their sinful nature, and to be born again as sons of God (112, 18).

(1) The Hebrew-speaking Jews were familiar with the idea that God reveals Himself to the world through His Memra, or Word, which they distinguished from Himself as His organ of revelation. The Targums of the OT. speak, not of Jehovah, but of the Memra of Jehovah, as being manifested to Abraham, Hagar, Isaac, Jacob, and to Moses at the bush. St. John's preface, therefore, proclaimed to the Hebrew, 'That Memra of Jehovah, which appeared to the patriarchs and prophets, was no other than Christ before His Incarnation.' (2) The educated Greek-speaking Jews (Hellenists) were familiar with the writings of the Jewish philosopher, Philo of Alexandria (circa 45 B.C.-45 A.D.). He believed that God does not act upon the world directly, but mediate through His Logos or Reason. To the Hellenist, therefore, St. John's Gospel said, 'That Logos, through which you say God acts upon the world and reveals himself in it, is no other than Christ.' (3) Educated heathens also believed in a divine Logos or Reason, diffused through the world, and disposing all things in a rational order. First Heraclitus, then Plato, and finally the Stoics developed this doctrine, until, in the apostolic age, it was the explanation of the universe commonly accepted by educated persons. To the heathen, therefore, St. John's preface said, 'That divine Logos, which inspired your philosophers, so far as they have spoken truly, and whose existence is admitted by all educated men, has finally manifested Himself in the life of Jesus of Nazareth. Read the account that follows of His wonderful life and sayings, and you will acknowledge that this is true.'

St. John's doctrine of the Logos differs from the Jewish and the heathen doctrine mainly in these two points: (1) That the Logos is personal, and (2) that He became flesh.

1. In the beginning] not as in Gn 1, in the beginning of creation, but in the beginning of eternity, i.e. from all eternity: cp. 8:17, 18. Was the Word] i.e. the Word existed. The Word] as a title of our Lord is only found in the Johannine writings (1:14, 11:1, 19:18). On its meaning, see above. Was with God] lit. 'was directed towards God,' the attitude of loving and intimate intercourse: cp. 'in the bosom of the Father' (v. 18). Was God] i.e. was divine, and is therefore to be worshipped with the same worship as is due to the Father. Jesus is again called God in express terms in v. 18 (R.M. 20:28, 1 Jn 5:20, Ro 9:5, Tit 2:11 (R.V.) Ac 20:38, Heb 1:12, 2 Pet 1:1 (R.V.). Made by Him] i.e. 'through Him, as the Father's agent. That Christ is the creator of the universe is stated Col 1:16, 17, 1 Cor 8:6, Heb 1:10, Rev 3:14, but not in any Gospel except this.

3. The Word is not only the Creator of the world, but is also its Life; i.e. He sustains it in existence, supplies life to all living organisms, and guides all the operations of nature. To rational beings like men, He is also their Light, or Instructor. He was this even before His Incarnation, instructing them through reason, through conscience, and through prophecy. (For another punctuation see R.V.)

5. This instruction by the Word was hindered... by the Fall, which involved the world in moral and spiritual darkness. And the darkness comprehended (RV 'apprehended') it not; i.e. the people whose minds were darkened by sin did not understand or obey the instructions of the Word. Prejudice prevented them. Another translation is 'and the darkness overcame it not.'

6-8. Parenthesis: The mission of Christ's forerunner, John the Baptist. Perhaps this section is directed against those followers of the Baptist who maintained that he was the Messiah. The evangelist makes it clear, (1) that the Baptist had a true mission from God, and (2) that he was not the Light. His mission was to bear witness to it, and to reflect it.

9. The preface resumed. The true Light, Christ our Lord, existed even before His Incarnation, and enlightened every man, whether Jew or Gentile, born into the world. This important text teaches us that the light of revelation shines among all races, and that there is some truth, however distorted by error, in all religions. The best translation is, 'Already the true Light existed, which lighteth every man as he cometh into the world.' For other translations see the RV. 10. He was in the world] viz. before His Incarnation. 11. He came, viz. at the Incarnation, unto his own (home), viz. the Holy Land; and his own, i.e. the Jews, received, i.e. believed, Him not.

12. Power] rather, 'the right,' or 'privilege.' Those who 'believed on His name,' i.e. accepted Him as the divine Son of God, and the Saviour of the world, received the privilege of becoming true sons of God. 13. This oneness conferred on men depended not on human descent from Abraham (blood), nor on the sexual relations of their parents (the will of the flesh), nor could it be had for willing or wishing it, i.e. human effort (the will of man). It was a free and supernatural gift from God, inward and spiritual, implanted by the Holy Ghost, and dependent for its maintenance on union with Christ: see on 3:5.

14. The Word was made (RV 'became') flesh] a plain statement of the wondrous fact of the Incarnation, the central mystery of our religion. God became man to atone for sin, and to make us partakers of the divine nature. 'Flesh' in St. John means human nature (body, soul, and spirit) without the added idea of sinfulness, which attaches to it in St. Paul (see especially 6:51f). Our text affirms, therefore, that the Redeemer is 'perfect God and perfect man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting; equal to the Father, as touching His Godhead, and inferior to the Father, as touching His manhood. Who although He be God and man, yet He is not two, but one Christ.' Dwelt among us] lit. 'dwelt in a tabernacle among us,' the tabernacle being His body (see 219, and cp. 2 Cor 5:1, 2 Pet 1:16, 18). The allusion is to the 'Shekinah,' which the rabbi identified with 'the Word of Jehovah.' As the 'Shekinah,' or visible glory of God, dwelt in the tabernacle of old, so, when Christ was born into the world, His divine nature dwelt in His body as in a temple. We beheld His glory] i.e. not merely the visible glory of the Transfiguration and the Ascension, but the moral and spiritual splendour of His unique life, which revealed the nature of the invisible Father. The evangelist here claims to have been an eyewitness, as in 19:35. The only begotten of (RV 'from') the Father] The glory of Christ's life was not a reflected glory, as would have been the case had He been a mere human saint or prophet, but it was the glory of God's only begotten Son, and therefore God's own glory, for Christ and His Father are one. 'Only begotten' as a title of Christ is peculiar to St. John (1:18 3:18 1 Jn 4:9). It indicates that no man or even angel is God's son in the sense in which Christ is. A 'son' in the full sense of the word is of the same nature as his father, and hence Christ, being God's Son, is divine. Full of grace and truth] 'grace is the divine favour and loving-kindness; truth,' as often in St. John, is not simply veracity, but holiness in general (cp. 1:17 3:21 8:45 1 Jn 1:9). Christ was full of grace and holiness, not that He might keep them to Himself, but that He might bestow them upon men.

15. Another parenthesis, introducing further testimony of the Baptist, which the evangelist indicates as of permanent importance ('beareth,' 'crieth,' RV, not bare, cried, AV). He that cometh after me] i.e. He who begins his work later than myself. Is become (RV) before me] viz. in honour. For he was before me] i.e. He existed before my birth, and even before His own birth, as the eternal Son of God. The Baptist learnt that Christ was God's Son by a special revelation, and by the voice of the Father at Christ's baptism: see vv. 32-34.

16-18. The preface concluded. The 'we' of v. 16 shows that these vv. are not words of the Baptist, but that they express the spiritual experience of Christ's disciples, in whose name the evangelist speaks. 16. Of his fulness] 'Fulness' (pleroma) was a word much used (and abused) by the Gnostics against whom St. John contended. Here it means, (1) the fulness of the divine attributes which dwelt in Christ (Eph 1:22 Col 1:19 2:9), and (2) the fulness of the human virtues which He displayed. Both these 'fulnesses' Christ imparts in some measure to true believers, as the evangelist testifies from personal experience. Grace for grace] i.e. grace succeeding grace, one act of love after another, ever increasing in proportion as we deserve it or require it. 17. Moses set before us mere commands, without changing our nature, or giving us the power to obey them. Jesus Christ came to change our nature. He offers us 'grace,' whereby we are born again as children of God, and become heirs of everlasting life; also 'truth,' i.e. Christian holiness, which becomes possible to those who abide in Christ: cp. Ro 5:21. By Moses... by Jesus] lit. 'through' Moses, 'through' Jesus.

18. God the Father never reveals Himself to men directly, but always by and through His only-begotten Son. This was the case even before the Incarnation. It was God the Son who manifested Himself to the patriarchs, gave the Law to Moses, inspired the prophets, and enlightened the sages of the Gentiles. But now by His Incarnation He has revealed God more perfectly. So completely does 'the Word made flesh' represent the invisible Father, that 'he that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14:9): cp. 5:37 6:4 Ex.33:20 Col 1:15 1 Tim 6:16 1 Jn 4:12,20. The only begotten Son] Many very ancient authorities read, 'the only begotten God,' a striking statement of our Lord's Deity. In the bosom] i.e. in eternal, intimate, loving union with the Father: cp. the expression 'in Abraham's bosom' (Lk 16:22), and Jn 13:23. This v. explains how it is that God is love, not only since the creation, when He created objects for His love, but from eternity: cp. 17:24.

19-42. Preliminary ministry of our Lord. All the events recorded by St. John from 1:19 to 4:42 (the testimony of the Baptist; the preliminary call of John, Andrew, Peter, Philip, and Nathanael; the marriage at Cana; the visit to Capernaum; the first cleansing of the Temple; the interview with Nicodemus; the interview with the Samaritan woman) may be regarded as a preliminary ministry, for they took place before the Baptist was cast into prison (see Mt 4:12). The ministry proper begins with the imprisonment of the Baptist, upon news of which Jesus withdrew into Galilee (Mt 4:12 Jn 4:43,44).

19-28. Public testimony of the Baptist to Jesus in reply to a deputation from the Sanhedrin. The independence and fulness of the account of the Baptist in this Gospel renders it highly probable that the evangelist had once been the Baptist's disciple. He knows, for example, the exact places where John baptised (1:28 3:23); the exact day and even hour when certain things were said (1:29,35,39); the contemporary disputes with the Jews about purifying (3:23); the relations, not always friendly, between the disciples of John and those of Christ (3:20); the exact time when John was cast into prison (3:24). His account of the Baptist's testimony agrees with that of the Synoptists, but he adds to it important particulars. He mentions, for instance, that John actually saw the dove descending upon Jesus, and was thus enabled to recognise Him (18:2), that he applied to Him the titles Lamb of God (1:29,36) and Son of God (1:14 3:35), the latter clearly in a superhuman sense, for he declares His preexistence (1:15,30), and says that to believe in Him is to have eternal life (3:36). For the historical difficulties, see on these passages and on Mt 11:2. The Synoptists record the Baptist's testimony before our Lord's baptism, and St. John his testimony afterwards, when the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus, and the voice of the Father, had convinced the Baptist that Jesus was truly the Son of God.

19. The Jews] In this Gospel 'the Jews' has the following special senses: (1) the inhabitants of Judea, (2) members of the Sanhedrin (the meaning here), and (3) the enemies of Jesus. Sent] One function of the Sanhedrin was to judge false prophets, hence they now desired to judge the claims of John.

Priests and Levites] the proper parties to enquire into a new religious movement. The priests performed the services of the Temple, offered the sacrifices, and burnt the incense. The Levites waited upon the priests in their ministry, and discharged subordinate duties.

20. Not the Christ] Some already believed that he was, Lk 3:15. 21. Elias] i.e. Elijah, whose personal return to prepare the way of the Messiah was expected by many (Mal 4:5 Mk 6:15; see especially on Mt 16:14 17:10). John denied that he was literally Elijah, though his coming fulfilled Malachi's prophecy (Mt 11:14 17:12 Lk 1:17). That prophet] RV 'the prophet,' viz. the prophet mentioned Dt 18:15, and regarded by the deputation not as the Messiah, but as one of his forerunners. John, however, regarded the prophet of Dt 18:15 as actually the Messiah (cp. Ac 3:22), and therefore denied that he was 'that prophet.' 23. The words in Isaai (Isa 40:3) refer to the preparation for the return from Babylon of the exiled Jews: the Baptist applies them to himself, as descriptive of his work: see on Mt 3:12.

24. And they] RV 'and they had been sent from the Pharisees.' 25. Why baptizest thou?] Baptism was ordinarily administered only to proselytes. The meaning of the challenge seems, therefore, to be, 'What right hast thou, who art neither the Messiah, nor his forerunner "that Prophet," to treat Israelites as if they were proselytes? ' It is implied that the Messiah, who came to inaugurate an entirely new covenant, might possibly be expected to baptise even Jews.

26. With water] John's baptism was outward, symbolising repentance and remission of sin: Christ's was inward, conveying the gift of the Spirit, and the power ead a new life. 28. Bethabara] lit. ‘house passing over,’ BV ‘Bethany,’ KM ‘Bethnah,’ or ‘Bethabarah’; probably the same as Beth-baharah of Jg 7:24. A ford on the dan, NE. of Bethshean, is still called Sarah, lit. ‘passing over.’

49. The Lamb of God] The reference is hasp not to the Paschal lamb, but to the Fering Servant of Isa 53, who is ‘brought as lamb to the slaughter,’ and whose death is for sin. Contrast this description of Messiah with the prevalent idea of a convert who would restore the kingdom to Israel. The Jews generally regarded the Messiah not as ‘the Lamb of God,’ but as ‘the son of the tribe of Judah.’ The sin of the world The idea of atonement for the sins of the world is found in Isa 53: the further idea that Messiah will atone for the sins of the world, follows naturally from the numerous references of the OT, prophets which speak of the participation of the Gentiles in the Messianic kingdom (Ps 87, etc.).

30. See v. 15. 31. I knew him not] But Mt 3:14 he seems to know Him, for he says, ‘I’m not baptizing one of thee.’ The sceptre of, however, is only apparent. John looking for the promised sign, Jesus presents Himself for Baptism. His majestic appearance strikes John with awe. Through ophtic insight (or perhaps as the result of personal interview before the Baptism) he remarks that He is the true Messiah (‘I have ed.’, etc.). The sign that follows makes the remark a certainty.

34. The Son of God] The chief difficulty as to the use of this term ‘the Baptist is removed by the statement at he first learnt that Jesus was the Son of God’ at the Baptism. In the OT, it was a title of the Davidic king, and of the Messiah (Lk 7:14, Ps 89:27, etc.), and did not necessarily imply (though see Ps 2, and cp. Ps 110) a supernatural dignity.

35–51. Preliminary call of five Apostles, Andrew, John, Peter, Philip, and Bartholomew (peculiar to Jn). This account, so far conflicting with the (later) call described in Mk 1:15 (cp. Lk 5:1), really removes a difficulty, for it shows how the Apostles came to obey the final call to follow Jesus so readily. After their preliminary call, described here, the apostles, loose themselves and their homes, but did not leave their homes and occupations. Afterwards when further intercourse had strengthened their hope that He was really the Messiah, they left all and followed Him.

35. Two] One was Andrew, the other (who characteristically suppresses his name) was John himself (see v. 40). The Baptist points at Jesus, thus suggesting that henceforth they should be His disciples.

39. The tenth hour] i.e. by Jewish reckoning, about 4 P.M. But some think that at Ephesus, where this Gospel was written, hours were numbered as with us, in which case the time would be 10 A.M. (see 4:6 10:14). 42. John] BV ‘John’; see Mt 16:14. Cephas] At the very first interview our Lord reads Peter’s character; see on Mt 16:18.

43. It would appear that Jesus Himself was acquainted with Philip. 45. Nathanael is probably an apostle, and is hence to be identified with Bartholomew, whose name also appears coupled with Philip’s in Mt 10:8. ‘Bartholomew’ means ‘son of Tolmai’: cp. Barjona, Barabbas, Bartimeus, Barjesus. The son of Joseph] This does not indicate the evangelist’s own belief, but what was generally believed at this time.

46. Nazareth] an obscure place not even mentioned in OT, which indicated Bethlehem as the birthplace of the Messiah (Mic 5:2). 47. No guile] ‘guile’ or deceitfulness was the special failing of Jacob (Israel), and of Israelites generally. Again our Lord discerns the heart of man.

48. I saw thee] implies supernatural knowledge. Perhaps Jesus alludes to some recent prayer or resolution which Nathanael made under the figtree.

49. The Son of God] A title of the Messiah even in the OT; see on v. 34. 51. See Gn 28:12. As Jacob saw in his dream a vision of angels ascending and descending the ladder, the disciples would see in Christ the link and connexion between heaven and earth. Through Christ the locked-up heavens were again to be opened, and communion between heaven and earth restored. The title ‘Son of man’ indicates Christ as completely partaking of human nature, and realising its original ideal: see especially the full note on Mt 8:20.

THE WEDDING AT CANA. THE TEMPLE CLEANSED

1–11. The marriage at Cana. This miracle is not recorded by the synoptists because it occurred before the beginning of the ministry proper. St. John records it, because, spiritually interpreted, it forms a suitable introduction to our Lord’s ministerial work. It teaches, (1) the superiority of the Gospel to the Law. Christ changes the water of Judaism into the good wine of the Gospel. This is not a fanciful interpretation, but an entirely natural one, if it be granted (as is abundantly shown in the Intro.) that the ancients were right in regarding this Gospel as a ‘spiritual’ or allegorical one. (2) Being a physical or creative miracle, it manifests Christ as the Lord of matter as well as of spirit. (3) It sanctifies marriage, and gives Christ’s approval to innocent mirth and gladness.
It reveals God’s goodness and overwhelming bounty. In recording it, St. John doubtless had in view the Gnostic false teachers, who regarded matter as evil, and practised a rigid asceticism, rejecting all bodily pleasures, and abstaining from flesh and wine, and even from marriage. Such teaching was very prevalent in Ephesus, where this Gospel was written (see 1 Tim 4:1-4), and tradition tells us that St. John vehemently opposed it.

1. The third day It was a three-days’ journey from Judea to Galilee. Cana(now Kana-el-Jelil, a village 9 m. NW. of Nazareth, called ‘of Galilee’ to distinguish it from Cana (Kanah) in Asher (Josh 19:25). 3. They have no wine] The deficiency happened towards the close of the festivities, which usually lasted seven or fourteen days (Jg 14:15 Tob 9:19). It was perhaps caused by the presence of so many (five or six) of the disciples of Jesus, and hence our Lord had a natural motive for working the miracle. 4. Woman] A very gentle rebuke, but still a rebuke. Now that His ministry has actually begun, not even His mother may presume to suggest or control His course of action: cp. Mt 12:46 Lk 11:27. ‘Woman,’ or, rather, ‘Lady,’ is in Greek a title of respect, used even in addressing queens.

Mine hour (i.e. for putting forth My miraculous power) is not yet come] Yet it came a few minutes later, when the Father, by an inward revelation, had manifested His will to Jesus. ‘Hour,’ in the sense of ‘appointed time,’ is common in this Gospel (7:30 8:20 12:28,27 13:1 17:1). 6. Purifying[ ] Washing the hands before dinner (Lk 11:8) is meant: cp. Mk 7:4, and see the full notes on Mt 15:1-20.

Pirkina] Gk. metretes, about 9 gallons.

9. Ruler] an honoured guest, who presided at the entertainment. 10. Well drunk] RV ‘drunk freely.’ The expression is proverbial, and need not be literally interpreted of the present company.

11. Beginning of miracles] lit. ‘signs.’ Clearly Christ wrought no miracles in His childhood, as the Apocryphal Gospels assert. St. John calls our Lord’s miracles ‘signs,’ because they indicate something beyond themselves. They are no mere marvels, but reveal God’s character, Christ’s divine nature, and the mysteries of the gospel dispensation. All the miracles in this Gospel are also parables: see Intro. Manifested] To ‘manifest’ is to display something which before was hidden; here, the glory of His Messiahship, faith in which, already begun among the disciples (1:41), was confirmed by this miracle.

12. Short visit to Capernaum. This unimportant event seems recorded for some personal reason. Perhaps it was the occasion of the first visit of Jesus to the evangelist’s own house. Brethren] These are variously regarded as sons of Joseph by a former wife, sons of Joseph and Mary, and as cousins of Jesus: see special note on Mt 12:46-50.

13-17. First Passover and First Cleansing of the Temple. For a full commentary, see on Mt 21:12. By a striking sign our Lord at the very outset of His ministry brought His claims before the whole nation. The rulers at once took up an attitude of hostility, although a few, like Nicodemus, were favourably impressed. The people, upon the whole, approved our Lord’s action. Many believed, but their faith, based on miracles, was superficial, and Jesus would not trust them. The disciples were confirmed in their faith by seeing Jesus fulfil O.T. prophecies. By this act Jesus claimed to be, not merely a prophet, but the Messiah, as is shown by the expression ‘My Father’s house,’ which asserts His right to the Messianic title ‘the Son of God.’ The Jews considered that the Temple court in which this sign took place (the Court of the Gentiles) was profane; but Jesus by cleansing it showed that it was holy, and vindicated for the Gentiles a rightful place in the true Temple of God.

17. The zeal] Cited from Ps 69:9. This Ps. is elsewhere quoted as Messianic, Jn 15:35 19:28 Ac 1:20 Ro 11:9,10 15:3, and is ascribed to David. The Psalmist complains that his zeal for God’s house and for true religion has brought upon him bitter persecution and unnumbered calamities. This was also the case with our Lord.

19. Destroy this temple (or, rather, ‘sanctuary ‘)] These words made a deep impression, and were quoted against Jesus, in a maliciously altered form, at His trial (Mt 26:61). The evangelist understood them (v. 21) to apply to the Resurrection, and this interpretation is confirmed by the fact that our Lord on other occasions also pointed to His Resurrection as a sign for His opponents (Mt 12:26,40, where consult the notes). Many critics, however, think that our Lord’s real meaning was, ‘When this old dispensation of the Ceremonial Law is destroyed, I will quickly raise up in its place a new and spiritual religion.’

20. Three temples have stood on Mt. Moriah: (1) Solomon’s Temple, (2) Zerubbabel’s Temple, (3) Herod’s Temple. This last, however, some regard not as a new Temple, but as Zerubbabel’s Temple repaired and enlarged. Herod the Great began to build it 20 B.C., and at this time, apparently, building operations had ceased. They were soon resumed, however, and the Temple was finally completed by Herod Agrippa, 64 A.D. Reckoning from 20 B.C. the date of our Lord’s cleansing of the Temple would be about 26 A.D., but strict accuracy is not attainable.

NEW BIRTH. JOHN’S TESTIMONY TO JESUS

15. Conversation with Nicodemus. The stry at Jerusalem, though disappointing, not fruitless. Christ’s miracles and teach-had made an impression, not only on Nicodemus, but as Nicodemus himself says

cp. 12:49), on other members of the sanhedrin. This interview took place by night, account of the timidity of Nicodemus (cp.

and probably in St. John’s house at Jer-lem, the evangelist himself being present.

3. Nicodemus had asked no question, but as knew what he wished to ask, viz. ‘If you art the Messiah, as some of us are inclined to believe, tell us how we must enter Kingdom of God, which Thou hast come to establish, and of which Thou hast said so much.’ Our Lord answers that a new birth, a new heart and a new nature, are necessary, ording to the testimony of the OT. pro-sts: ‘I will put my Law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts’ (see Jer31:31 37:38, etc.). As evidence of the ‘new birth,’ our Lord would require humility, humble trust God for salvation through Christ, not a glorious boasting in descent from Abraham, in the punctilious fulfillment of legal cere-

; also repentance, i.e. sincere abhorrence sin, and not merely of ceremonial defile-t; and, lastly, love, and that not only of s’s friends, but also of one’s enemies; not ly of the righteous, but of publicans and ers; not only of the Jew, but of the man and the Gentile—a love, moreover, ufesting itself not in word only, but in works such as feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and instructing the ignorant.

4. How can a man? Nicodemus is unwilling believe that he, an orthodox and pious Jew, d with a ruler and a Pharisee, must undergo n change, before he can enter Christ’s

. He therefore affects to misunderstand and Christ’s words: cp. 6:52.

5. Of water and of the Spirit] Our Lord insists that a new birth is necessary, and uishes that it must be an inward and spiritual

. It must not be only of water; i.e. the ception of the outward rite of baptism without proper appreciation of what membership of Christ’s Kingdom involves, but also of the Spirit, i.e. Nicodemus must approach Christ’s baptism with such sincerity of repentance and faith, and such earnest resolution to live up to the ideals of the new Kingdom, that in his case the outward rite will be accompanied by an effusion of the Spirit, that will make his baptism a real ‘new birth of water and of the Spirit.’

Baptism is again spoken of as a ‘new birth’ by St. Paul—according to his mercy he saved us by (RV ‘through’) the washing (RM ‘laver,’ i.e. bath) of regeneration (or ‘new birth’) and renewing of the Holy Ghost’ (Tit3:5). Christ’s baptism is often distinguished from John’s, as a baptism of the Spirit (Mt.3:11 Jn.1:33 Ac 1:5

9:4, etc.). It confers (on those who receive it rightly) spiritual graces which could not be fully given until Jesus had been glorified (7:39). We learn from 3:26 that already Jesus was admitting disciples into His Kingdom by the rite of baptism, and this explains the allusion to ‘water’ here.

JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN BAPTISM

(1) The phrase ‘new birth’ or ‘regeneration’ here applied by our Lord to Christian baptism was not a new one. The rabbis were accustomed to admit proselytes to Judaism by three rites, all of which they regarded as essential—

(a) baptism (always by complete immersion) in the presence of witnesses who answered to the Christian ‘sponsors’ or ‘godparents’;

(b) in the case of males, circumcision; (c)

sacrifice. The rabbis frequently spoke of this proselyte baptism as a ‘regeneration,’ i.e. a new birth from heathenism, in which the proselytes had been under the dominion of Satan, into the family of God, in which they enjoyed the privileges of the covenant of Abraham. Our Lord, therefore, might fairly expect Nicodemus, a rabbi and a sanhedrist, to understand Him when He spoke of His own baptism as a new birth from the ceremonies and shadows of the Law to the spiritual reality and power of the New Dispensation.

(2) The context of this v., in which much more is said about spirit than about water, warns us not to rely unduly upon the saving efficacy of baptism regarded as a merely external ordinance. Baptism is not a charm like the purifications of the heathen, nor a mere symbol of purity like those of the Jewish Law, but a sacrament, i.e. a moral means of grace, the full efficacy and effect of which depend upon the response in the soul of the baptised person to the covenanted grace proffered in the ordinance.

(3) No argument against infant baptism can be drawn from the words ‘Except a man,’ etc. The Greek is quite indefinite, ‘Except any one.' In the case of infants the conscious response of the soul to the proffered grace of the ordinance takes place when the age of reason is reached. On infant baptism, see on Mt.19:13-15.

(4) On this passage, together with Mt.28:19 (cp. Mk.16:18), is founded the prevailing opinion that baptism ('where it may be had') is indispensably necessary for admission into the Christian covenant.

6. The nature we inherit from our parents is corrupt; the new nature which comes with the new birth is holy and spiritual. 8. As none can trace the source or aim of the wind, yet all can hear and feel it, so is it with those who have experienced the new birth. There is something in the inner life not to be explained, but which reveals itself in its operations, and can be known only by experience.

10. 'You a teacher in Israel, and this, without which all religion is a dead thing, not known to you!' 11. We] Probably St. John and a few other disciples were present.

12. Earthly things] i.e. religious facts and experiences (e.g. repentance, faith, the new birth, etc.), which happen upon this earth, and which are, therefore, comparatively easy to apprehend. Heavenly things] i.e. the hidden and unfathomable counsels of God for human salvation, e.g. the Incarnation, and the Atone-ment (vv.13, 14, 15).

13. Ascended] This word is not to be taken quite literally. Our Lord only means that He had been in heaven before His Incarnation, and hence could speak of heavenly things (i.e. the Father’s most secret counsels) from personal experience. Which is in heaven] Some important authorities omit these words, which, if genuine, affirm that our Lord was at the same time on earth and in heaven, in a state of humiliation, and in a state of glory.

14. See Nu.21:4-9. As the children of Israel, bitten by the fiery serpents, were cured by looking at the brazen serpent, so sinners may receive remission of sins and eternal life by looking with faith at Jesus, who was 'lifted up,' first upon the cross, and afterwards into heaven: cp. 8:28, 12:32, 34.

15. RV] 'that whosoever believeth may in Him have eternal life.'

Eternal life] This expression, though found in the other Gospels (Mt.19:14, etc.) and in the Pauline Epistles (Ro.27, etc.), is specially characteristic of St. John. It is that state of blissful communion with God, which is enjoyed by the believer who is reconciled to God through faith in Christ. The NT. generally speaks of it as a future possession, but St. John often regards it as possessed already to some extent in this world. 'Eternal,' lit. 'æonian,' means not simply 'endless,' but 'belonging to the world to come,' and so 'supernatural,' 'spiritual,' 'heavenly.'

16-21. are probably words of Jesus, though some regard them as reflections of the evangelist. They state the broad saving truths of the gospel in direct opposition to the narrow Pharisaism in which Nicodemus had been reared. Whereas the Pharisees confined salvation to a single race, and believed that the Messiah would judge the Gentiles with extreme severity, our Lord declares that God has sent His Son to save the whole world, and not to judge or condemn any part of it. 'Whosoever will,' may believe and be saved.

17. Condemn] lit. 'judge' (RV), but the context shows that an unfavourable judgment is meant. 18. Is condemned] (lit. 'hath been judged') already] God’s judgment upon men’s actions is a present fact; He judges men here and now. The publication of His judgment, however, will not take place until the Last Day.

18. The name] i.e. (practically) the Person. 19. This is the condemnation] (RV] 'judgment') i.e. the condemnation is based upon this, that the Light is come into the world, etc. It is implied that men whose deeds are really good, are irresistibly attracted by Christ’s words and works, so that they become believers. 21. To 'do the truth,' means to live the Christian life, for Christian truth is more than a belief, it is a way of life. The phrase is peculiar to St. John: cp. 1 Jn.1:6.

22-36. Jesus leaves Jerusalem and baptises in the country districts of Judaea, where He probably spent most of the time from the Passover, 27 A.D., to the late harvest (December) of the same year: see on 4:35. His great success rouses the jealousy of John’s disciples (v. 26), but the Baptist, so far from regarding Christ’s disciples as too many, laments that they are too few (v. 32), and again testifies his belief in Christ’s Messiahship. 22. Baptised] Our Lord baptised only through the ministry of His disciples (4:5). The synoptists represent Christian baptism as not ordained till after the Resurrection (Mt.28:19, Mk.16:19); but here it is said to have been practised from the beginning of the ministry. The two accounts are not really inconsistent. What had been Christ’s practice during His ministry was raised to the dignity of a perpetual ordinance after the Resurrection. Some regard this preliminary baptism of Christ as a mere baptism of repentance like John’s, but it is apparently called a birth of water and the Spirit (5:5), and consequently must have been specifically Christian baptism, although doubtless the fulness of the Spirit could not be given till after the Ascension (7:38). That the Spirit could be given in some measure before the Ascension, 20:22 is evidence.

23. Ænon] lit. 'full of springs;' is generally located 8 m. S. of Scythopolis, near Salim (Salumias) and the Jordan. 24. This v. corrects the impression which the synopti narrative produces, that John was imprisoned immediately after our Lord’s baptism. As a matter of fact, the two ministries overlapped by several months, perhaps by a whole year.

25. The Jews] RV ‘a Jew.’ Perhaps the Jew was a disciple of Jesus, and the dispute was about the comparative cleansing power of John’s baptism and Christ’s. 27. ‘Do not wonder at the success of Jesus. No man can usurp what heaven has not granted him.’

29. By Jewish custom ‘the friend of the bridegroom’ arranged the marriage contract between the bridegroom and the bride, and presided at the wedding feast. This John did for Jesus, by preparing the Jewish people (the bride) to receive our Lord’s teaching.

31–36. Not, as some think, a reflection of the evangelist, but a continuation of the testimony of the Baptist. The Baptist places Christ (he that cometh from above) at an infinite elevation above himself (he that is of the earth) (v. 31). He declares that Christ came down from heaven, and so can testify to what He has seen there (v. 32). He alone can give the Spirit without measure (v. 34). He is God’s Son; to Him all power is committed; and through faith in Him eternal life is offered. To disobey Him is to incur God’s wrath (vv. 35, 36).

32. No man] a rhetorical overstatement. John deprecates the number of Christ’s followers, though great, is as nothing compared with what it ought to be. 33. That God is true (lit. ‘truthful’)! To believe the Messiah is to believe God, for the Messiah is God’s ambassador and interpreter (see the next v.).

34. For God (RV ‘he’) giveth] This may either mean ‘for Christ giveth not the Spirit by measure (to believers),’ or, ‘for God giveth not the Spirit by measure (to Christ).’

36. Believeth not] RV ‘obeyeth not.’

THE SAMARITAN WOMAN

1–42. Christ in Samaria. The ministry in Samaria is recorded because it is the author’s design to exhibit Christ as the Saviour, not only of Israel, but of the world (4:49).

The Samaritans were mainly an alien race, descended from the colonists planted in the land by the Assyrians (2 K 17:24, 25, 26, 29 Ezr 4:1, 6, 10). They boasted, however, of being Israelites, and with some degree of justification, for there was probably a considerable Jewish element in the population. Their worship, originally a compromise with heathenism, was now purely Jewish. They kept the sabbath, and the Jewish feasts, and observed circumcision and other traditional ordinances. Of the OT, they accepted only the Pentateuch, which they interpreted as commanding the erection of a Temple on Mt. Gerizim. That Christ should have preached in Samaria is somewhat surprising in view of such passages as Mt 15:24 and 10:5, but it must be remembered that He did not enter Samaria for this purpose, but simply to reach Galilee (v. 3).

1. The Pharisees had been hostile to John’s ministry; they were likely to be more so to the more successful ministry of Jesus. Our Lord, therefore, left Judea, the chief centre of Pharisaism, to avoid a rupture. 2. Our Lord did not baptise, because it was His work to baptise with the Holy Ghost (1:33), and He could not do this (fully at least) till after His Ascension (see on 3:22). 4. Must needs go through] Jesus had just heard that Herod Antipas had cast John into prison (Mt 4:12). To escape this fate, He avoided Perea, the seat of Herod’s power, and passed through Samaria. 5. Sychar] now ‘Askar, near Shechem. Jacob’s well still retains its name. The parcel of ground, etc.] This is a Samaritan tradition, not expressly authorised by the OT, but based on a comparison of Gn 33:19 with Gn 48:22. 6. Thus] i.e. wearded as He was. For Christ’s subjection to human infirmity, see also 11:55, 38 19:28.

The sixth hour] i.e. either noon or 6 P.M. The number of events which happened subsequently seems to require the earlier hour, but see on 1:59.

8. The later rabbis declared that to partake of Samaritan bread was like eating swine’s flesh, but in our Lord’s time Samaritan food was accounted clean. 9. The Jews have no dealings, etc.] Some ancient authorities omit this statement, which must be taken to refer only to intimate dealings. Our Lord had broken down the barrier by asking a favour. He wished to encourage her to ask a favour of Him, and so to give Him an opportunity of leading her to the truth. 10. The gift of God] i.e. all the blessings offered to us in Christ, especially the gift of eternal life (see vv. 13, 14). Living water] As Christ does not identify Himself with the ‘water,’ as He does with the ‘bread’ in c. 6, the ‘water’ must be ‘the grace and truth’ of which He is full (1:14), and which are communicated to believers through the Spirit (7:38). Both the thirst and the hunger of the soul (and these are felt even by such outcasts as the Samaritan woman) are satisfied by Christ. 11. The woman takes ‘living water’ literally, as meaning the running water of a spring or stream as distinguished from the stagnant water of a cistern or well (Gn 26:10 Lv 14:5, etc.). 12. In spite of their mainly heathen origin, the Samaritans claimed Israelitic descent. 14. Shall never thirst] Every spiritual desire and aspiration of the soul shall be completely satisfied, and for ever, for the life which I give is eternal.’ mocking words show that the woman was still unimpressed.

16. Finding her impervious to gentleness, our Lord uses stronger measures. He reveals Himself to her as a prophet, and with a prophet’s authority reveals and rebukes her sin: cp. 2 S12. 18. Although this woman had apparently been divorced by five husbands for unfaithfulness, and was now living in sin, our Lord did not deal with her harshly. For other examples of His considerate treatment of fallen women, see 8:1-11 and Lk 7:36-50.

20. The woman is ashamed, and seeks to change the conversation. Our Lord kindly permits it, knowing that the words He has spoken will bear fruit. She asks Him, since He is a prophet, to pronounce upon the main point in dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans. The Samaritans argued from Dt 27:4 that Gerizim was the one divinely appointed place of sacrifice, because there God had commanded an altar to be raised and the Law inscribed. The Samaritan text reads Gerizim in this passage instead of Ebal.

21-24. Speaking as a prophet, our Lord draws a sublime picture of the religion of the future. All that is transitory, national, local, and ceremonial about the religion of Jerusalem and Gerizim is to pass away, and God will accept for the future only the worship of the spirit and the heart. In the meantime, however, Jerusalem, not Gerizim, is the true centre of worship, there Jehovah has placed His name, there the Redeemer is to suffer, and there His religion is to be first established.

22. ‘We Jews understand the nature of the God we worship; you Samaritans do not. We have the Psalms and Prophets to teach us the meaning of spiritual religion: you reject all but the ceremonial Law of Moses. Moreover, you show your ignorance of God by setting up an unauthorised worship in a place which He has not chosen.’ Salvation is of the Jews] alluding to the promises to Abraham (Gn 12), and to David (2 S7:11-18, 16 Psa 88:3, 4 122:11), and to the historic fact that the gospel was to be preached to all nations beginning at Jerusalem (Lk 24:47).

23. In spirit] i.e. with true inward reverence, as distinguished from mere outward observance. In truth] i.e. with true holiness of life. ‘Truth,’ in St. John, is not only correct belief, but also practical piety: see on 3:21.

24. God is a Spirit] or, rather, ‘God is spirit.’ (RM). ‘Spirit’ is the name, in the NT., of the highest and most god-like faculties of the soul. Our Lord means, therefore, that God is the supreme understanding, knowledge, reason, will, love, holiness, etc., and hence must be worshipped with the corresponding faculties of the human soul, which is also ‘spirit,’ as made in His image.

25. Messias cometh] An excuse for delay. There is no need (says the woman) to trouble about a more spiritual worship until that distant day when the Messiah comes. 26. The Samaritan idea of the Messiah was religious, not political, and hence Jesus could here proclaim Himself as the Messiah without causing a political ferment: contrast His action among the Jews (6:10 10:24, etc.).

27. With the woman] RV ‘with a woman.’ In His high estimate of womanhood Jesus rose far above the ideas of His time, and taught lessons which are only now being learned (see on Mt 11:25-26). The contemporary rabbis refused to teach religion to women, and would not even speak to a woman in a public place.

34. My meat, etc.] Jesus meant that in the joy of seeking to save a sinful soul His fatigue and hunger had vanished, and He no longer needed the food which the disciples had brought. 35. Four months] Harvest began in April, so the date would be December, A.D. 27. The ministry in Jerusalem and Judea (2:18-4:3) must accordingly have lasted eight months. Lift up] At this moment Jesus sees the Samaritans coming through the cornfields. They are white already] The literal harvest is four months distant, but the spiritual harvest of the souls of these Samaritans is ripe, and will be reaped this very day.

36, 37. Christ had sowed alone in converting the Samaritan woman, but the Apostles would share in reaping the harvest of Samaritan converts (cp. Ac 8). And this was a type of the future conversion of the world. Christ would sow the seed, but the Apostles would reap the harvest. The wages are simply the unselshy joy of saving souls. 38. Other men] In spite of the plural this means Christ Himself. 42. The Saviour of the world] They accepted Him as the world’s Saviour, because they had experienced His saving power in their own case. It is an instance of the argument from Christian experience: see 1:29 3:16, 17 6:8 12:47 1 Jn 4:14.

43-54. Beginning of the ministry proper in Galilee, December, 27 A.D. Healing of the nobleman’s son.

44. Our Lord’s own country here is probably Judea, where He was born, and which the ancient prophecies indicated as His true home. Others suppose that it is Galilee, and that He deliberately went there to suffer honour and rejection. In Mt 13:27 our Lord applies the same proverb to Nazareth, where He was brought up.

46-54. This miracle cannot be the same as that recorded Mt 18:5 Lk 7:2; the differences are too great. We have here a king's officer, here a centurion; here a father and son, there a master and servant; here a Jew (see v. 48), here a Gentile; here a fever, there a palsy; here weak faith which is blamed (v. 48), there strong faith which is commended; here Jesus asked to come, there He is begged not to come; here He does not go, there apparently does; here the healing words are spoken.

Cana, there at Canaeruam.

46. Nobleman. The word means 'one of the king's officials.' The 'king' is Herod Antipas, who was strictly speaking, only a tetrarch, but as called king by courtesy.

48. Except ye see signs. Not too much must be made of this rebuke. Our Lord was saying his faith, as in the case of the Canaanite woman (Mt 7:57). It answered the test, and was rewarded by the healing of his son.

54. Translate, 'This again as a second sign showed Jesus, after He had come out of Judea to Galilee.' It thus clearly preceded all the Galilean miracles recorded by the synoptists.

The evangelist probably records this miracle to show that the effects of faith may extend beyond the person who exercises it; perhaps also to show that our Lord's power to heal could be exercised at a distance.

CHAPTER 5

BETHESDA. CHRIST AND THE SABBATH

1-47. A miracle at the Pool of Bethesda on the Sabbath Day, and a controversy arising therefrom. This miracle may be regarded as a parable illustrating the deadly effects of sin, and the power of the Saviour to deal with the most hopeless cases. This poor man in his youth had shattered his nervous system by a life of sensual indulgence (v. 14), and had lain for thirty-eight years a hopeless paralytic (v. 5). This being an extreme case, the usual order of Christ's miracles is reversed. Instead of being wrought as a reward of faith (see v. 13), the miracle is wrought to produce faith. The man was too much broken down in mind and body to believe, until some signal mercy had been vouchsafed to him. The mercy was vouchsafed, and repentance and faith followed (v. 14).

This visit to Jerusalem took place in March, A.D., consequently the Galilean ministry mentioned 44 lasted three or four months. Among its most notable incidents were the appointment of the Twelve and the Sermon on the Mount. Desiring to visit Jerusalem without interrupting the Galilean work, our Lord sent the apostles on a preaching tour through the country (Mt 6:7), and then went up to the capital, either alone, or more probably accompanied by St. John, who acted as His host. Having stayed there about a week, He rejoined the Twelve in Galilee, shortly before the Passover, 28 A.D. (Mt 6:8-9; cp. Jn 6:4).

1. A feast] i.e. the Feast of Purim, which occurs in March (Adar 14, 15), about a month before the Passover. Its origin is doubtful, though the Jews commemorated it in the triumph over Haman, who proposed to exterminate the Jews in the Persian empire on a particular day (13th Adar, 473 B.C.), chosen by lot (pur, Esth 3:7). The feast was mainly of a convivial and charitable character, but in the synagogues the book of Esther was read, and the congregation applauded the name of Mordecai, and cursed that of Haman. (An inferior but strongly supported reading here is 'the feast,' which would probably mean the Passover. Those who adopt it are compelled to add a whole year to Christ's ministry.)

2. Sheep market] RV 'sheep gate': cp. Neh 3:12-28. Bethesda] i.e. 'house of mercy,' or, possibly, 'house of the stream,' is perhaps the Virgin's pool, SE. of the Temple, the only natural spring in Jerusalem. It is an intermittent spring, and when the troubling of the waters occurs, the Jews still bathe in it for medicinal purposes. Variant spellings are 'Bethzatha' and 'Bethsaida.' 3, 4. The best authorities omit the words waiting for... whatsoever disease he had, which describe the troubling of the water by an angel. The troubling of the waters was a natural phenomenon, which popular superstition ascribed to supernatural agency. 8. Thy bed] i.e. mat. 10. The man's act was not unlawful, even from the OT standpoint. Jer 17:21 and Neh 13:10 only forbid the bearing of burdens on the sabbath in connexion with labour and trade. 15. And told the Jews] doubtless to win honour for Jesus as a prophet and worker of miracles.

17. RV 'My Father worketh even unto now, and I work.' (1) These words enunciate a new ideal of the sabbath. The 'rest' of God after the creation, which the sabbath typifies, is not mere inertia, but activity in doing good. So man's true sabbath rest is not inactivity, but leisure for work of a higher character, e.g. the worship of God, and works of mercy. (2) The words also imply our Lord's Deity, for (a) He claims that God is His Father in a unique sense ('My Father,' not 'our Father'), and (b) He coordinates His own work with God's.

19-29. An important doctrinal section. Our Lord, while affirming His filial subordination to the Father ('the Son can do nothing of Himself,' v. 19), and the derivation of His own Being from Him (v. 26); yet declares that He exercises the Father's whole power and authority (v. 20)—the power to quicken those dead in sins (v. 25), the power to raise men from literal death at the Last Day (v. 28), and the power to judge the world (v. 22). He accordingly demands 'that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father.'

20. Loveth the Son] Hence God is love (1 Jn 4:8) from eternity. Greater works] something greater than miracles, the giving of new life to those dead in sins (see vv. 21, 24, 25).

21. This v. speaks both of spiritual and literal death. 24. Heareth] and obeyeth.

25. The dead] i.e. the spiritually dead. They are raised from the death of trespasses and sins to a new life by the preaching of the gospel.

26. The Father is the fountain of life even within the Godhead. From Him the Son is begotten, and the Spirit proceeds.

27. Because he is the Son of man] rather, 'because He is man,' lit. 'a son of man.' As man He can sympathise with the nature which he shares: cp. Heb 4:14. 28. The literal resurrection at the last day is meant.

29. Damnation] i.e. condemnation, lit. 'judgment.'

30-36. Our Lord mentions four 'witnesses' through which men may be brought to believe in Him: (1) the witness of the Baptist, good, but insufficient; (2) the witness of the Father, which Christ's hearers are not willing to receive; (3) the witness of Moses and the prophets, which they also reject; and (4) the witness of Christ's own 'works,' the character of which is sufficient evidence that the Father has sent Him.

30. As I hear] viz. from the Father.

31. Christ's witness to Himself could not be received according to the principles of Jewish law: see 8:18, and cp. Nu 35:30 Dt 17:6.

32. Another] i.e. the Father, not the Baptist.

34. 'Attach little importance to John's testimony, for he, though a prophet, was but a man. Nevertheless, since you attach importance to it, I will use it, for I wish, in whatever way, to bring you to believe in Me, and so to be saved.' 35. 'John is only a lamp or lantern, shining feebly by borrowed light; I am the True Light which he feebly reflects.' Ye were willing] John's ministry was plainly past.

36. The works] include the miracles, but should not be confined to them. The gracious character, and redemptive purpose of Christ's acts, prove that they come from God.

37. The witness of the Father is given (1) in the OT. Scriptures, (2) in the response of all that is good in the heart of man to the teaching of Christ. The divine element in man, which the Father planted there, recognizes and welcomes the divine in Christ: cp. 3:17. 38. His word] is not here the Scripture, but the Divine Voice speaking through the conscience and spiritual nature of man.

43. If another] A false Messiah, adapting his views to your carnal ideas, you will receive.' Our Lord's words were literally fulfilled a century later, when the bulk of the nation accepted the claims of the impostor Bar-cochba. 46. He wrote of me] in type and figure as well as in direct prophecy.

THE BREAD OF LIFE

Returning from Jerusalem, our Lord met the Apostles somewhere on the W. of the lake (perhaps at Capernaum), and heard their report of their mission (Lk 9:10). He then spent about a fortnight preaching and healing the sick (6:2), and afterwards, seeking retirement, sailed with them to a desert place on the NE. coast belonging to a city called Bethsaida (Mk 6:50 Lk 9:10; cp. Jn 6:1). The multitudes followed on foot, and Jesus took compassion on them and fed them (6:4). The time was just before the Passover, 28 a.d. (64), and immediately after the death of the Baptist (Mt 14:12). For a full commentary on this miracle, which alone is recorded by all the evangelists (Mt 14:14 Mk 6:50 Lk 9:12), see on Mt 14:13.

1. Tiberias] a Gentile city on the lake, built by Herod Antipas during our Lord's lifetime, and named after the emperor Tiberius. 3. A mountain] R.V. 'the mountain.'

4. The passover] the second of the ministry. The nearness of the Passover accounted for the crowds seen approaching (v. 5). They were Galileans going up to Jerusalem to keep the Passover. Probably our Lord did not go up to Jerusalem for this feast, as there were plots against His life (71).

10. Make the men] R.V. 'the people.'

So the men] i.e. the males. 11. Given thanks] The other Gospels say, 'blessed.' The usual benediction was, 'Blessed art Thou, Jehovah our God, King of the world, who causeth bread to come forth from the earth.'

14, 15. This miracle marks a crisis in our Lord's ministry. His popularity was at its height. The people were convinced that He was the Messiah. They demanded that He should be crowned king of Israel, and should lead them against their enemies. By rejecting their overtures, and by showing , in His subsequent address at Capernaum, that His aims were of an entirely different chara...
to this is the Passover. Our Lord's bearers were about to go up to Jerusalem to eat the Passover (6:4). Some of them, perhaps, had heard the Baptist call Him 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world' (1:29, 36). Our Lord, accordingly, set before them His Person as the sacred reality of which the Passover lamb was a type. As the blood of the Paschal lamb had protected the Israelites of old from the sword of the destroying angel, so the death of the Lamb of God would give spiritual life to the whole world (v. 51). As in the Paschal meal the Israelites ate the flesh of a literal lamb, so in the feast which He came to prepare, they would spiritually eat the flesh and drink the blood of the True Lamb. By the 'flesh' of Christ is to be understood His human nature (see 11:4), and by His blood, His atoning blood, shed for the sins of the world. There is reference, therefore, both to the Incarnation, and to the Atonement. The eating and drinking of Christ's flesh and blood is spiritual (6:56), and can only take place through the medium of faith (vv. 35, 40, 47). It is not, however, identical with faith, but rather is the reward of faith. Those who have lively faith in Christ as the Son of God and the Redeemer of the world, are so incorporated with Him, that they dwell in Him and He in them (v. 56); He is in them a principle of spiritual life (v. 57), and of resurrection (v. 54); and He strengthens and refreshes their souls, so that they neither hunger nor thirst (vv. 35, 55), until they attain everlasting life (vv. 50, 51, 54, 58). This vital union between Christ and the believer is elsewhere illustrated by the parable of the True Vine (15:1-11), and by St. Paul's metaphor of the body and the members (1 Cor 12:12).

This discourse is regarded by nearly all commentators as intended to prepare the way for the institution of the Lord's Supper, by explaining the fundamental idea and principle of that holy rite, viz. the union of the believer with Christ's human nature through faith. The Supper was ordained (see on Mt 26:26-30) as the ordinary and covenant means of feeding upon Christ—of eating His flesh and drinking His blood,' i.e. of appropriating spiritually and by faith His glorified humanity and sharing in the benefits of His passion. This, the original apostolic doctrine, which guarded both the reality of the reception by the believing soul of Christ's true humanity, in this ordinance, and also the absolute need of a lively faith if this blessed result was to be achieved, was endangered in St. John's time by two opposite tendencies, that of Gnosticism, which, while confessing Christ's Godhead, denied His Incarnation and Atonement, and that of a false ecclesiasticism, which, while confessing both, imagined that union with the Incarnate Redeemer could be attained mechanically through the sacraments, without a living faith. As against the former the evangelist emphasizes the reality of Christ's 'flesh,' or human nature, and of His 'blood' or atoning sacrifice; and as against the latter the need of a living faith, as the only means through which Christ's flesh and blood can be savingly appropriated, and become the food of the soul. The 'flesh' of Christ, which is received by faith, is, of course, His glorified humanity, as it now is at the right hand of God, and as it is communicated to believers through the Spirit (vv. 62, 63). At the institution of the Supper, however, our Lord spoke not of His 'flesh,' but of His 'body,' and for this there was a reason. Both words denote Christ's human nature, but whereas to eat Christ's 'flesh' indicates only the union of the individual believer with His Saviour, to eat Christ's 'body' indicates also his union with other believers, a fundamental idea of the sacrament of love, which was intended to be the centre of Christian unity (1 Cor 10:16, 17).

27. 'Do not earnestly strive to obtain food and raiment and luxuries for your bodies, but spiritual food for your souls. I am indeed the Messiah, but the Messiah's work is not to give temporal prosperity as you imagine, but everlasting life.' Sealed] By this miracle God the Father has "sealed" (i.e. publicly proclaimed) Me, not as the giver of temporal prosperity, as you carnally suppose, but as the giver of immortality.' 28. The works of God] i.e. works well-pleasing to God. 29. For the plural 'works,' i.e. a multitude of supposed meritorious acts, Jesus substitutes one single work, faith in Himself. Faith in Jesus is called a 'work,' because it is a definite act of the will. It is the one work required, because it is the solemn dedication of the whole life to God, and virtually includes in itself all other works, and renders them acceptable.

30, 31. Jesus having practically (in v. 29) claimed to be the Messiah, the people now require Him to repeat Moses' miracle of the manna. This was regarded as the greatest of the OT. miracles, and it was expected that the Messiah would repeat it.

32. Moses' manna, though it came from heaven, was not heavenly bread, and could not sustain spiritual life. 33. He which cometh] RV 'that which cometh.' 35. What bread and water are to the body, that Christ is to the soul. Every aspiration after God and holiness He is able to satisfy. 36. The idea is contained in v. 26, but perhaps Christ is referring to some unrecorded words. 37. Those whom the Father 'gives' to Christ, are those who actually come. The Father desires the salvation of every man, and draws all men to Christ (3:16, 12:25), but some refuse to come (5:40). The Father foresees what men will come, and, as a result of His foreknowledge, 'gives' them to Christ.

39. Raise it up] Jesus shows that He has come to abolish not natural, but spiritual death. Believers will die, but their death will be followed by a glorious resurrection. Here, as usually in the NT., 'resurrection' means the resurrection of the righteous, not also of the wicked. 42. The Jews argue that since Jesus has a human parentage, He cannot have existed before His birth, and so have come down from heaven. [Joseph] see 145.

44. 'Your murmuring and unbelief are caused by your resistance to the "drawing" of the Father, who bids you believe on Me. You have hardened your heart, and closed your ears to His teaching, so that now you cannot believe.' 45. A free quotation from Isa 54:18: cp. also Joel 2:28. 46. Only our Lord is 'taught of God' in the fullest sense. 48. 'I am the reality typified by the manna.'

51. Which I will give] an allusion to our Lord's atoning death, as is made evident by the mention of His blood in v. 53. The world] Salvation is offered to all mankind. 53. Eating and drinking Christ's flesh and blood is not the same thing as faith, though faith is the means of it. It is an actual and vital union with Christ's human nature, whereby the believer dwells in Christ and Christ in him, and all the benefits of Christ's passion are communicated to him: see above. 55. Meat indeed lit. 'true meat...true drink,' i.e. true nourishment for the soul. 57. The life-imparting union between the Father and the Son, is a figure of the life-imparting union between Christ and the believer.

59. If Tell Hum is the ancient Capernaum, its synagogue has been excavated. We can still trace its dimensions, observe its fallen pillars, and discover over the lintel of its entrance the device of a pot of manna ornamented with vine-leaves and bunches of grapes.

62. 'After My Ascension, when I shall no longer possess a natural body, you will understand that My words about eating My flesh and drinking My blood, which now offend you, are to be spiritually interpreted.' 63. 'What imparts the power of everlasting life to those who feed upon My flesh, is not the flesh as such, but the Spirit which pervades it. The flesh without the Spirit profits nothing: the flesh with the Spirit profits much. In heaven I shall be a quickening Spirit, and My body will be spiritual. After the Ascension the Holy Spirit will make you partakers of My flesh, and you will receive it spiritually by faith.' The words that I speak (RV 'have spoken') 'These words of Mine about eating and drinking My flesh and blood, about My
2. Feast of tabernacles] or, 'feast of ingathering,' or, 'of harvest,' held in October, marked the completion of the harvest of fruit, oil, and wine. For eight days the people lived in booths, in memory of the wanderings in the wilderness. Numerous sacrifices were offered. Among the notable ceremonies were the procession to Siloam to fetch water, and its pouring out at the altar (cp. 787), the singing of the Hallel (Psa 113–118), the daily processions round the altar, and the lighting of the four great golden candelsticks in the Court of the Women (cp. 813).

3. Thy disciples] Only a few disciples followed Jesus in His Galilean tours. At the great Feast of Tabernacles they would be gathered together in great numbers. 5. The unbelief of the brethren was removed after the resurrection by the appearance to James (1Co 15v15–18). Being unbelievers, they were evidently not of the number of the Twelve. For an account of them see on Mt 12v20. 6. My time] as indicated by God's will. Your time] They, having no special commission from God, were bound by no such considerations as He. Moreover, they were in no danger: the world looked upon them as its own. 8. I go not up yet] Many ancient authorities omit 'yet,' but in any case it is to be understood.

14. Finding that He had a strong party on His side, Jesus came forth from His retirement and taught. 15. Letters] i.e. rabbinical learning. Having never learned] i.e. having never been the pupil of a recognised rabbi or scribe, as Paul was of Gamaliel. 16, 17. 'My teaching, like that of the prophets of old, is a direct inspiration from God, and not, like that of the scribes, a tradition of men. It appeals to the heart, not to the head. Not the learned, but those who apply themselves earnestly to do God's will, will perceive that it comes from God. 19. You are not keeping the Law. Moses commanded you not to shed innocent blood, and yet you seek to slay Me, an innocent man.' 20. His opponents hypocritically try to make Him think them innocent.

21f. I did one work (eight months ago when I healed the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda), and ye are still marvelling (because I did it on the sabbath day). 'Moses would not have marvelled. Moses recognised that works of piety and charity may be done on the sabbath day. In fact, he commanded circumcision to be performed on the sabbath day as on other days, and you obey his command. How, then, can you object to My miracle of healing? To heal a man is as much a work of piety and charity as to circumcise him.' 22. Not because] RV 'not that.'
very consistent. One view was that His birthplace and lineage would be notorious (cp. Mt 2); others held that His manifestation would be shrouded in mystery.

33. 34. A call to decision, and a reproach for rejecting their deliverer. 34. Hereafter, when misfortunes come upon you, you shall seek My help, and shall not find it. 35. The dispersed (RV 'the Dispersion') among the Gentiles (RV 'the Greeks') i.e. the Jews living in heathen lands. The Jews, not seriously but mockingly, attribute to our Lord the design which St. Paul afterwards carried out, of abandoning the Holy Land, and making the Jewish synagogues throughout the Empire centres for diffusing the gospel among proselytes and other Gentiles.

37. The last day] The feast proper closed on the seventh day, but the eighth day, which is probably here meant, was kept as a sabbath with a holy convocation to commemorate the entrance into Canaan (Lv 23:46). If any man thirst] Here, as to the woman of Samaria, Christ declares Himself the giver of 'the living water.' This declaration is connected with the ritual of the feast. On every day of the feast except the last, a golden pitcher of water was fetched (in literal fulfilment of Isa 12:3) from the pool of Siloam by a priest, and poured together with wine on the W. side of the altar at the time of the morning sacrifice, amid the singing of psalms and hymns. This water was held to symbolise the miraculous water which supplied the Israelites in the wilderness and also, the outpouring of the Spirit promised in the days of the Messiah. On the eighth day, when the water was not poured out, Jesus came forward declaring Himself the giver of the true water which that water typified, viz. the Holy Spirit.

38. The scripture] Our Lord combines the sense of several OT. passages, e.g. Isa 44:8 15 11 Ezk 47:1. Belly] here, by a Hebraism, for a man's inmost soul: cp. the use of beten ('belly') in Prov 18:6 20:27, 30, 22:18 26:22 Job 15:2, 32:15, 19. Christ compares Himself with the Temple. As the fountain of Siloam poured forth its waters from the Temple mountain, so a stream of heavenly life issues from the Redeemer, and from all who have become like Him. We have here a striking expression of the power of Christian influence.

39. The Holy Ghost was not yet given] Under Christianity, the Holy Spirit, though personally distinct from Christ, is still the Spirit of Jesus, i.e. the Spirit of the Saviour. He could not, however, become this until the saving work of Christ was complete, until Christ had died for our sins upon the cross, risen again for our justification, and ascended into heaven to plead the merits of His sacrifice with the eternal Father. Hence the Comforter could not be given as the Comforter, until Jesus had been glorified: cp. 16:7.

40. The Prophet] i.e. the prophet of Dt 18:15, regarded not as the Messiah, but as a forerunner of the Messiah. 42. Bethlehem] St. John was not ignorant of the birthplace of Jesus. He is here only reporting the words of others.

49. Cursed] RV 'accursed,' viz. because of their ignorance. The contempt of the Pharisees for those who have not received a rabbinical training is a touch true to life.

50. 51. Nicodemus has made some advance in boldness. He ventures, though timidly, to plead for justice for our Lord. He was certainly right on the point of law: see Ex 23:1 Dt 1:16 19:15. 52. The Pharisees were wrong not only in their law, but in their facts, for Jonah at least was a Galilean. In any case the saying would not apply to our Lord, who was a Judean. The narrative, interrupted by the interpolation 7:58–8:11, is resumed 8:12.

THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES CONTINUED.

CHRIST THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

7:58–8:11. The woman taken in adultery. All modern critics agree that this section is no original part of the Fourth Gospel. It is not in the author's style; it breaks the sequence of our Lord's discourses, and is omitted by most of the ancient authorities. Probably it is an authentic apostolic tradition inserted here to illustrate the principle of 8:15. Some MSS place it at the end of the Gospel. The incident probably took place in Holy Week, and is therefore appropriately inserted by some MSS after Lk 21:58.

3. In adultery] The woman was only betrothed, not married, otherwise her punishment would not have been stoning, but strangulation, for so the rabbis interpreted Lv 20:10 Dt 22:22. But inasmuch as among the Jews betrothal was almost equivalent to marriage (see on Mt 1:18), the sin of a betrothed woman was regarded as a species of adultery.

6. Punishment of death for this offence was obsolescent, and some think that they wished to make Jesus unpopular with the people by inducing Him to advocate its revival. More probably they wished to embroil Him with the Roman authorities, who would not allow a death-sentence to be executed without their permission. The displeasure of Jesus was largely due to the officiousness of the accusers. It was not their business to accuse and judge the woman, but that of the husband and the judges. They had neither a legal nor a moral right to interfere. Wrote] Christ was always reluctant to interfere in civil disputes: see Mt 22:21 Lk 12:13–15 Jn 18:36. Writing on the ound was a symbolical action well known in tiquity, signifying unwillingness to deal with e matter in hand.

7. Without sin] Christ read their hearts, d under His searching glance all felt them selves sinners, if not against the letter, yet ains the spirit of the seventh command- stant: cp. Mt. 5:20. They could not condemn r without condemning themselves. A stone he principal witnesses cast the first stone n. 177 (Ac 7:52). 9. In the midst] viz. of the sciples who alone were left. Augustine ys strikingly, 'the misera before the Miseri ndia.' 11. Neither do I condemn thee] i.e. judicial punishment, such as your accusers uand. Our Lord's gentle dealing with the oman was due to His desire not to break the raised reed. She had already suffered much, d (we may suppose) was bowed down under e burden of sin. He perceived that in her a warming to sin no more would suffice: 1. Lk 7:56-50.

812.10. The narrative of the Feast of abernacles (interrupted by the interpolated ction 7:52-8:11) is resumed. The scene is the emple (8:20), the time the last day of the ast (7:37).

12. The light of the world] The idea of the messiah as 'the Light' was familiar to the ews (see Lk 1:78, 79 2:29). And was especially appropriate at the Feast of Tabernacles, during hich (or perhaps on the first day only) the wo colossal golden candlesticks in the Court f the Women were lighted. Christ as 'the light of the world' dissipated the darkness of gnorance and sin. The light of life] i.e. My uidance which leads to life eternal. 13. See n. v. 17. 14. 'The law as to witnesses applies nly to human witnesses. It does not apply o Me, who am more than man, seeing that I now that I came down from heaven, and hall return thither.' 15. 'You judge only by utward appearance, and hence cannot discern he Divine in Me.' 17. Cp. Dt 17:6 19:15.

17, 18. If the testimony of two men is rue, how much more true is the testimony of wo witnesses who are divine! 18. See on 36, 37. 20. In the treasury] or, rather, 'by he treasury.' The 'treasury' consisted of hirteen brazen trumpet-shaped chests, in which were placed the Temple tribute and he people's voluntary offerings. They stood n the Court of the Women.

21-30. Another discourse of Jesus, delivered probably on the same day (some think a few days later). Jesus speaks of His return to the Father, which is misunderstood by the Jews and explained by Him. He also seeks to convince them of sin, and to show them their need of a Saviour.

21. I go my way (by death), and ye shall seek me (vainly in your misfortunes as your deliverer), and shall die in your sins (RV sin') (because you refuse to believe on Me as your Saviour): cp. 7:34. 22. Will he kill him- self?] and thereby enter Gehenna, the punish- ment awarded to suicide? (Jos. 'Wars,' iii. 8, 5). In that case we shall certainly not care to follow Him! The mockery is more bitter than in 7:56, q.v. 23. Their earthly hearts are without the higher wisdom and divine life of those who are born of God. 24. I am he'] viz. the Messiah, and the Saviour. He alone can say, 'Thy sins be forgiven thee.'

25. Even the same] viz. the Messiah. This rendering alone suits the context. Another translation is, 'Why do I even speak to you at all?' 26. 'I have much fault to find with you, but I refrain. I am not sent to judge you, but to teach you; and I teach you the absolute truth about God, which I learnt from Him before I came into the world.'

28. When ye have lifted up the Son of man (upon the cross), then shall ye know that I am he] (i.e. the Messiah), because My death will be fol- lowed by My Resurrection, which will be a token from God that My words are true.

31-59. V.31 begins another speech, delivered on the same day to those Jews who were inclined to regard Him as the Messiah. When these half-believers find that Jesus demands an entire change of heart, a breach with ortho- dox Judaism, and faith in Himself as the eternal Son of God, their feeling towards Him is changed to violent hatred.

31. Believed on him] RV 'believed him.' They had believed His statement (vv. 24-26) that He was the Messiah, but they had not believed 'on' Him with religious faith as the Light and Life of men. 31, 32. Christ's words exasperated these Pharisaic believers, because He implied (1) that they would have to amend their lives in order to abide in His word, whereas they considered their conduct perfect; (2) that they were ignorant of saving truth, whereas they regarded themselves in complete possession of it; (3) that they were not spiritually free, because superstitiously attached to the letter of the imperfect Mosaic Law. 33. They pretend to think that Jesus is alluding to their political bondage to the Romans. They indignantly deny the imputation of bondage. They declare themselves the superiors of their oppressors. 35. A slave, unlike a son, formed no part of the family. He could be sold or expelled at will. So these Jews, slaves of sin and of the letter of the Law, were no true members of the Messiah's kingdom, and would be expelled from it. The Son] RV 'the son.'

37. Their desire to kill Christ, the prom- ised seed of Abraham, proved that they were not children of Abraham, but of Satan. Hath no place] RV 'hath not free course.' They had received Christ's word for a moment, and then contemptuously rejected it. 41. Fornication] i.e. impure or superstitious worship, as often in the OT. The Jews claim to be the true spiritual, as well as the natural, descendants of Abraham. Inheriting his covenant and faith, they have 'one Father, even God.' 43. They misunderstood his expressions (speech), because the subject-matter of His discourse (word) was altogether above them. He was speaking of spiritual things which are spiritually discerned. 44. He was a murderer from the beginning] viz. of the human race, when he sought to destroy our first parents, and abode (RV 'stood') not in the truth, i.e. in that state of innocence in which he was created. This is the only certain allusion in the Gospels to the fall of Satan (Lk 10:18 is doubtful).

46. Christ argues from His sinlessness to His veracity. Since His enemies can find no fault with His life, they ought to believe His words. Christ's sinlessness is affirmed not only by Himself, but by His most intimate disciples: cp. 6:31 1 Pet 2:22 1 Jn 3:5. 48. To Jesus' declaration that His hearers are 'not of God,' i.e. not true Israelites, they retort that He Himself is 'a Samaritan,' i.e. a heretic.

Hast a devil] They cannot deny Christ's miracles or the power of Christ's words, so they ascribe them to diabolical agency: cp. Mt 12:24.

49. Christ's works cannot proceed from the devil, because they are designed to honour, not Satan, nor Himself, but God.

50. And (RV 'but') I seek not mine own glory: there is one (i.e. God) that seeketh it for Me, and judgeth those who withhold it from Me, and so dishonour Me.

51. By dishonouring Jesus the Jews have incurred the judgment of the Father (v. 50), i.e. the penalty of eternal death. But this judgment is not irrevocable. If even now they will obey Christ's word, they may escape eternal death. 52. The Jews understand our Lord to speak of natural death, and so to claim to be immortal; and the giver of immortality. Such a claim, implying superiority to all the prophets of the OT, seems to them the effect of frenzy or diabolical possession.

53, 54. 'The Son' (says Westcott) 'makes Himself to be nothing. He is and declares Himself to be that which the Father, so to speak, makes Him.' 56. '1 am greater than your Father Abraham, for Abraham looked forward with exultation to the manifestation of one greater than himself, one in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed.' He saw it] either in prophetic vision, or, as some think, from Paradise. 57. The Jews understand, or pretend to understand, our Lord to mean that He was alive in the time of Abraham! 58. Before Abraham, etc.] lit. Before Abraham was born, I AM.' Christ seems here to declare Himself to be the Jehovah, or I AM of the OT, the eternal, self-existent Creator: cp. Ex 3:14. 59. Going through the midst of them, and so passed by] RV omits these words.

THE MAN BORN BLIND

1-12. The healing of the man born blind.

This miracle occurred on the same day as the events of the last c., i.e. probably on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles. It is intended to illustrate the truth that Christ is 'the Light of the world' (8:12 9:5). Christ proves His power to open the eyes of the soul by opening the eyes of the body. The miracle, being wrought on the sabbath day, intensified the hostility of the rulers, which had already been violently inflamed by the discourses of c. 8: see 8:59.

2. The disciples thought that possibly the man had sinned, either in a previous state of existence (in accordance with the doctrine of the transmigration of souls), or more probably as an infant before birth. To the Jews who attributed intelligence to unborn children (Gn 25:22-29 Lk 1:14) this last was a natural idea.

3. As in Lk 13:1-5, Jesus rebukes the hasty inference, common among the Jews (see e.g. Job 47), that misfortunes are always the direct result of sin. As a matter of fact diseases often come as part of the present order of nature, and not as special judgments: cp. Lk 13:4. A great moral difficulty is involved in such a state of things, but Jesus does not discuss it.

4. Jesus saw that His death was impending, and that His time for doing works of mercy was short. 6. In two other miracles (Mk 7:33 and 8:23) Jesus heals by a gradual process, and uses visible means. In that case the application of saliva and clay to the man's eyes was an aid to faith (saliva being a recognised remedy for eye-diseases), and his being sent to bathe in the water was a test of faith as it was in the case of Naaman (2 K 5:14).

7. Si loam] The evangelist regards this pool of healing water as a type of Christ, who is 'sent' by the Father to heal the diseases of the soul. The OT. forms of the word are Shiloah, Isa 8:6, and Shelah, Neh 9:15. It is now called Birket Si'lah. It is fed by an underground conduit from the Virgin's Fountain. 8. Blind] RV 'a beggar.'

13-34. This whole section illustrates the incredible blindness of the Pharisees (vv. 40, 41), who can see nothing in this unique sign, except the technical breach of the sabbath, of which they suppose Jesus to have been guilty.

14. The conduct of Jesus was illegal in two ways: (1) It was forbidden to render medical on the sabbath, unless there was imminent danger of death; (2) there was a special prohibition against applying salves to the eyes on sabbath day. 17. He is a prophet! This, if accepted, would remove the difficulty of the Sabbath day, for it was generally supposed that prophets had authority over the Sabbath law. 22. Put out of the synagogue. Excommunicated. 24. Give God the praise. 'Give glory to God,' a Hebrew idiom for 'unfess your error.' Josh 7:18; 1 Sam 2:1; 1 Esdr 9:8. Born in sin. This gives the clue to 1. The Pharisees assume that the man had been born blind as a punishment for exceptional wickedness, which began even before birth. Cast him out! i.e. excommunicated him.

35. When the door of the synagogue was shut, the door of the Kingdom of Heaven was opened. The Son of God. Christ so seldom uses this title of Himself, that it has been corrected in many copies into the more usual Son of man. Whichever title was used, a man rightly understood Jesus to claim prehuman dignity, and accordingly worshipped Him (v. 38).

39. For judgment I am come. This does not contradict 3:17, for the 'judgment' meant here is not the judicial act of rewarding and punishing, which Christ will exercise at the last day, but the present separation of mankind into two opposing camps, which is the inevitable result of His manifestation in the flesh. That they which see not (but are conscious of their ignorance) might see and that they which see might be made blind: cp. Mt 13:11-17. 40. Are we blind also? Christ's Pharisaic disciples rightly perceive that His words are directed against them. If the Pharisees were implicitly ignorant, but confessed their ignorance and were willing to learn, they would not be guilty. What makes them so guilty is that, though ignorant, they esteem themselves wise, and refuse to learn the way of life. They are still seeking the righteousness of the Law, rather than the righteousness of God.

The Good Shepherd. The Feast of the Dedication

1-18. Allegories of the Fold and of the Good Shepherd. This concludes Christ's discourse to His Pharisaic disciples begun at 2:22. His words take the form of an allegory which is intended partly to rebuke the Pharisees, partly to comfort the blind man, and partly to instruct the Church as to the duties of Christian pastors. The blind man, unjustly expelled from the fold of Judaism by false shepherds (the Pharisees), finds refuge in the flock of the True Shepherd, i.e. in the Christian Church, the mild discipline of which is contrasted with the cruel severity of the synagogue. The allegory is based entirely on OT figures: see Ps 23 Ezek 34 Jer 23:14 Zech 11:16-17.

1. The thieves and robbers mentioned here are primarily the Pharisees who have unjustly excommunicated the blind man, and secondarily and prophetically false pastors in the Christian Church. Christ is the rightful owner of the flock, and those who would exercise the office of shepherd must 'enter by the door,' i.e. receive their authority from Him, and exercise it in His spirit. This the Pharisees have not done. 2. To understand the imagery, it must be remembered that Eastern folds are large open enclosures into which several flocks are driven at the approach of night. There is only one door, which a single shepherd guards, while the others go home to rest. In the morning the shepherds return, are recognised by the doorkeeper, call their flocks round them, and lead them forth to pasture. 3. By name. A beautiful picture of pastoral converse. The true pastor knows every member of his congregation individually.

4. Goeth before them. The false pastor, loving popularity, follows his flock. The true pastor leads them. He leads them, (1) by his teaching. He gives his people what they want, but what they ought to want; (2) by his good example, his holy life being an example to the flock (1 Pet 5:3).

7. I am the door of the sheep. I alone can endue pastors and teachers with spiritual authority over the flock of God.' In v. 9 Christ calls Himself 'the door' in a wider sense. 8. All who have taught Israel from the cessation of prophecy to My own coming have been false and unauthorised teachers. Our Lord is alluding, of course, not to the OT prophets, but to the scribes who had dominated the religious life of Israel for 400 years, but whose teaching had nevertheless been rejected by many spiritually-minded men, e.g. by the author of the book of Jonah, who earnestly protested against it, and by many of the later Psalmists, whose writingsbreathespirit the very opposite of that of the scribes and Pharisees. 9. I am the door. Through faith in Me both shepherds and sheep enter into the Kingdom of God, and find all their spiritual needs supplied. Pasture. i.e. the means of grace.

11. The good shepherd. The Gk. signifies the Perfect or Ideal Shepherd. This beautiful figure is often found in the OT. applied to Jehovah (Ps 23, 80 Is 40:11); only in Ezekiel does it become a title of the Messiah (Ezk 34:28 37:24). Giveth. (RV 'layeth down') his life for the sheep. Another distinct prophecy of His death. Eastern shepherds are always armed, and are sometimes killed in defending their.
12. Seesthewolfcoming...and fleeth. The wolf (Satan) may come in various ways, as an open persecution, as a popular heresy, as a tendency to lax morality. The hireling shepherd is the cowardly compromiser who gives way to, instead of resisting, the evil tendencies of his age. 14, 15. RV ‘I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father.’ 16. The Gentiles also are God’s children. The gospel is for them also, and Jew and Gentile shall form one Church under one shepherd (Christ).

One fold] RV ‘one flock.’

17. As usual in this Gospel, the death and resurrection of Christ are united in one idea.

18. Christ’s death is the result, neither of a compulsory decree of the Father, nor of the power of the Evil One, but of a voluntary impulse springing from Christ’s love for lost mankind.

As there is no statement that Jesus went up to Jerusalem, it is fair to infer that Jesus spent the two months between the Feast of Tabernacles and that of the Dedication in or near Jerusalem. Less probable is the view that these months were spent in Galilee, Samaria, and Persea, and that the mission of the Seventy, and many other incidents recorded in Lk 9:31–19:27, belong to this period.

22. The Feast of the Dedication (lit. ‘the Renewal’) was instituted by Judas Maccabaeus, 164 B.C., to commemorate the purification of the Temple, which had been profaned by the idolatrous king Antiochus Epiphanes. It was held on the 25th of Kislev (about the middle of December), and on account of the brilliant illuminations was also called ‘the Lights.’

23. Porch] i.e. portico, or, cloister. This portico was on the E. side of the Temple buildings, and, according to Josephus, was a portion of Solomon’s Temple, which had been left standing by Nebuchadnezzar.

25. I told you] viz. in those discourses in which I claimed to be the Son of God (5:17–47; 7:14–8:59), and the Good Shepherd (10:1–18). These were Messianic titles.

28. No power of the world or of Satan can pluck believers out of Christ’s hand; only their own unfaithfulness to grace received can do this.

29. The Father is superior to all hostile powers, and therefore believers can never be lost through the power of the enemy. There is another reading, ‘That which the Father hath given unto me is greater than all’ (so RM). This means that believers, through grace, are superior to all their enemies, and can never be lost except

31. Again] see 8:59.

34–36. If the fallen and sinful judges of Israel were rightly called ‘gods,’ much more may I, who am one with the Father and free from sin, claim the title of ‘the Son of God.’

34. Your law] i.e. the OT, which you acknowledge. ‘The Law’ not infrequently stands for the whole OT. (See 12:34, 15:25, 1 Cor 14:21.) The quotation here is from Ps 82.4. Gods] Judges, as God’s representatives, are several times called ‘gods’ in the OT. (Ex 21:6; 22:7, 8, 28; cp. also 18:28). The word of God came to the judges when He appointed them to their office. 35. Sanctified] consecrated to the office of Messiah and Redeemer of the world. 38. The Father is in me] A commentary upon v. 30. Human personality differs from divine personality. Human persons exclude one another. The Divine Persons mutually contain, pervade, and include one another. They are absolutely one in knowledge, sympathy, will, and act.

40–42. The Persian ministry. These vv. cover a period of about three months, which is generally spoken of as the Persian ministry (see Mt 19:1-1 Mk 10:1, and cp. Lk 3:31). Its chief incidents were the mission of the Seventy (Lk 10:1), the question of divorce (Mt 19:4), the blessing of little children (Mk 10:13), the question of the rich young ruler (Mk 10:17, and Christ’s message to Herod Antipas (Lk 13:31). The whole section, Lk 9:31–18:42, appears to belong to this period, but many of the incidents are not chronologically arranged.

40. The place was Bethany beyond Jordan.

41. The remark that John did no miracle shows that there was little inclination at this period to invest popular teachers with miraculous powers.

42. Although John was dead, his influence was still strong in this district, and the people were ready to believe that He to whom John had borne witness was the true Messiah.

CHAPTER 11

CHRIST THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE

1–44. The raising of Lazarus. The last and greatest of the seven ‘signs’ recorded in this Gospel is related with such photographic minuteness of detail, that it is clear that the evangelist was present. Three points about it are specially noteworthy: (1) that it was a physical miracle, which no ingenuity can reduce to a case of faith-healing; (2) that it was definitely worked to produce faith in Christ (v. 42); (3) that more than any other miracle it was performed under test conditions;—the
1. Lazarus] i.e. Eleazar, 'God is my help,' man of good social position, probably a son near relative of Simon the Leper (Mt 6); not to be identified with the beggar of the parable. Bethany] a village the Mount of Olives, a little less than 2 m. from Jerusalem, now called El 'Azereiyeh, 'the ace of Lazarus.' Mary...Martha] St. John posesses that they are known to his readers from St. Luke's narrative (Lk 10:38). The circumstances of the family, and the characters of the sisters in the two Gospels are quite in reement. 2. St. John assumes that the fact the anointing is already known in a general way from the synoptists (see Mt 26:6 Mk 14:3, d cp. Lk 7:38), but since their narratives are mewhouse and confusing, he intends to give later on (12:11) a more accurate account.

3. Lovers] The love which Christ bore to the whole human race did not prevent Him from forming special friendships. 4. Not unto ariath, i.e. not unto permanent death. But for the glory of God, etc.] Lazarus was allowed to see that God might be glorified by his resurrection. So the blind man was born blind that God might be glorified by his eyes being iratically opened (98).

6. Two days] Our Lord waited two days, lest the death of Lazarus might be an indisputable fact: cp. v. 39; (2) that there might be time for a competent number of prominent people to assemble: cp. v. 42. There is a strong want of tenderness to the sisters in allowing Lazarus to die, and then making them wait four days for the miracle; but other interests than those of a single family were involved. Moreover, the delay was the means of testing and strengthening the sisters' faith: cp. vv. 22, 27, 32, 9, 10. Our Lord's allegorical answer means, 'The allotted time of My ministry is not yet finished, therefore I shall be safe in Judea, and so will you. But when My allotted time has elapsed, then I shall be in danger of death, and you also.'

The light] i.e. the sun. 11. Sleepeth] because Lazarus was soon to be awakened as from sleep: cp. Mk 5:38. 15. A secondary object of the miracle was the strengthening of the disciples' faith.

16. Didymus] i.e. 'twin,' is the correct translation of the Aramaic 'Thomas.' Perhaps he was twin brother of Matthew with whom he is coupled (Mt 10:5 Mk 3:18 Lk 6:13). He bore figures as the pessimist of the apostolic circle; in c. 20 as the sceptic. Yet his love and devotion to our Lord are undoubted. Die] because of the danger in Judea.

17. The grave] RV the tomb.' In Palestine burial took place on the day of death. The possession of a private tomb by the family of Lazarus is an indication of wealth. The poor were buried in cemeteries (2 K 23:6).

19. Visits of condolence were paid with great ceremony for seven days after a death.

20. Sat still] RV 'still sat.' Sitting was the attitude of grief. 'After the body is carried out of the house, all chairs and couches are reversed, and the mourners sit on the ground on a low stool.'

22. Even now] marvellous faith under the circumstances. She believes that Jesus can raise Lazarus, but dare not express the hope that He will.

24. A belief in a future resurrection was at this period professed by all pious Jews, and was not peculiar to the Pharisees. The expression 'the Last Day' is peculiar to St. John.

25. I am the resurrection, and the life] These solemn words, which are used most appropriately in the Burial Service, not only refer to the raising of Lazarus to a natural life, but indicate that Christ is also the author of the resurrection to eternal life. He that believeth] The words apply primarily to Lazarus. Lazarus was a believer in Christ. Lazarus was dead. And because Lazarus was a believer, he was about to be raised from the dead. His resurrection was a token and pledge of the resurrection of all believers.

26. Shall never die] because death to Christians is not really death. Death did not break the living union between the soul of Lazarus and His Redeemer, nor will it break that of other believers. 'The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God; there shall no torment touch them.'

27. The Son of God] When used, as here, as a popular title of the Messiah, this expression implies a special nearness to God, but not necessarily actual divinity. Which should come] RV 'even that he cometh.' 'He that cometh' was a common title of the Messiah: cp. 6:14 Mt 11:8.

31. For three days the mourners used to visit the grave, believing that the soul hovered round, faint to re-enter and reanimate its fleshly
33. He groaned] i.e. He sorrowed in sympathy with the mourners. But RM: 'He was moved with indignation,' i.e. at the havoc wrought by death in thus cutting off a young life. Our Lord regarded not only sin, but also disease and death, as part of that kingdom of Satan which He came to destroy. Their dominion over the human race filled Him with acute distress. In the spirit] i.e. in His human spirit. The Gospel assigns to Jesus, as perfect man, both 'soul' and 'spirit.' And was troubled] The RM more correctly renders 'and troubled Himself.' Christ was not subject to human emotions, as we are, against His will. Out of sympathy with mankind He condescended to feel them.

35. Jesus wept] An exquisitely human touch, showing that the evangelist, with all his insistence upon Christ's divinity, has a firm grasp of His true humanity. Contrast with the sympathetic tears of Jesus the Stoic ideal of indifference to human emotion. In Jesus the strength of a man was united to the tenderness of a woman. Men may learn from this that there is nothing unmanly in tears. Some think that Jesus wept because He was about to summon back a soul from the felicity of Paradise to the strife and sorrow of this mortal state. Could not this man] Probably a hostile criticism, imputing to Jesus lack of love or lack of power. A stone lay upon it] which implies that it was an underground vault, or, 'a stone lay against it' (RV), which implies that it was a cavern hewn in the side of a hill. The tomb now called that of Lazarus is a deep vault like a cellar, excavated in the limestone rock in the middle of the village, to which there is a descent by 26 steps. 39. Martha thinks that Jesus wishes to take a last look at His friend, and she seeks to dissuade Him, fearing that, putrefaction having already begun, the corpse will present a fearful spectacle. The apparent failure, for the moment, of her half-formed faith is true to life.

41. This prayer of Jesus is remarkable, for, (1) He thanks God beforehand for the miracle, as if it had already been performed; (2) contrary to His usual practice, He offers the miracle as a proof of His divine mission, and that to unbelievers. Hast heard me] RV 'heardest me,' viz. four days ago in Perea, when I prayed that Lazarus might be raised to life. I said it] viz. that Thou didst hear My prayer that Lazarus might be raised.

44. Came forth] doubtless with difficulty, his legs being bound together by grave-clothes. Hence the command 'Loose him.' It is possible, however, that the legs of Lazarus were swathed separately after the Egyptian manner.

45. The Gk., interpreted strictly, means that all the Jews who were present believed, and that some of them went, apparently in good faith, to the Pharisees, hoping to convince them. Perhaps they expected that such a miracle would receive favourable consideration from those who were the special champions of the doctrine of the Resurrection. They certainly reported the miracle as a fact: see v. 47.

47-53. A meeting of the Sanhedrin against Jesus. As in the synoptics, the chief priests, i.e. the Sadducees, take a more prominent part than the Pharisees in compassing the death of Jesus. Similarly in the Act it is mainly the Sadducees who are hostile to the infant Church. The hostility of the Sadducees was due not so much to dislike of the doctrine of the Resurrection, as to selfish and political motives: see v. 48.

47. What do we?] i.e. Why are we doing nothing?] The Romans shall come] They feared that Jesus would be proclaimed king by the people, and that the Romans would then, upon inflict summary judgment upon the nation. Our place and nation] i.e. our position in the State, and the very existence of the nation. Others understand 'our place' to be Jerusalem (cp. 2Mac iii. 80), or the Temple (cp. Ac 6.14 2Mac 5.10). 49. Caiphas] In full Joseph C., a Sadducee. See on Mt 26:5. That same year] i.e. high priest in that memorable year in which Jesus was crucified. The expression does not imply that the high-priesthood was an annual office. Ye know nothing] see 1814. Caiphas speaks somewhat contemptuously of the Pharisees—You Pharisees have no policy to offer. We Sadducees have a very definite one. Jesus must die, in our interests, and yours, and in the interests of the national existence.' 51, 52. Of old the high priest had declared the divine will by Urim and Thummim (Ex 28:30, etc.). The prophetic power, long withdrawn, is restored for a moment, just as the Levitical priesthood was about to be abolished by the one offering of Christ upon the cross. Die for (i.e. on behalf of) that nation] The high priest unwittingly proclaimed Jesus as the true paschal lamb, whose blood would alone for the sins of the world. By sacrificing Jesus he brought about a blessing of which he never dreamed (the remission of sins), and compassed for the nation the very evil which he sought to avert (the loss of national existence). 52. In (RV 'into') one] i.e. one Church. The children of God] i.e. the Gentiles. Scattered abroad] The unity of the human race has been destroyed by sin. The death of Christ, by abolishing sin, reestablishes its unity.

54-57. Retirement to Ephraim. Attitude of the multitudes at Jerusalem. Suppressed excitement.
To avoid the snares of His enemies, and secure a short season of undisturbed communion with His disciples, Jesus retires to braid, perhaps Ephraim or Ephron (2 Ch 19), or Ophrah (18:1317). 55. To purify them- selves] No man could eat the Passover while emonionally unclean (see 18:28 Nu 9:10 2Ch 17), hence the Passover pilgrims assembled Jerusalem some time beforehand to purify themselves by ablutions, shaving the head, and rificse. In some cases the process lasted a ek. 57. Jesus was still too popular to be taken publicly.

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY. CLOSE OF THE PUBLIC MINISTRY

1-11. Supper at Bethany (see on Mt 26:33 Mk 14:3, which record the same incident). The event in Lk 7:36 is different. The supper was at the house of Simon the per, a near relation, perhaps the father, of Lazarus and the sisters. St. John alone mentions the name of the woman who anointed Jesus, the quantity of the unguent (1 litre = oz.), and the author of the mean speech, Why was not this ointment sold for three indred pence, and given to the poor? He states that the supper was held six days or two days, as St. Mark) before the Passer. Mary probably anointed Jesus in gratitude for the restoration of her brother Lazarus life.

1. Six days] Since the Passover, according to this Gospel, took place on Friday, Jesus apparently arrived on Saturday (the sabbath), id the supper must have taken place the same evening. 5. Three hundred pence (see the) about 28. 6. The bag (or, box) The hosties had one purse, because they realised that those who have spiritual things in common, ought (ideally, at least) to have temporal things in common also. But though communism is the ultimate Christian ideal, and has always been regarded as such (see Ac 2:44), it does not, therefore, follow that it is practicable or good in the existing state of the world.

Bare] RV ' took away,' i.e. stolen.

7. Let her alone: against the day of my crounging hath she kept this] i.e. She has done quite right not to sell the ointment. She has kept it for to-day, making to-day as it were my burial day, by performing the prophetic act of anointing and embalming My body, but a better reading is, 'Suffer her to keep it against the day of My burying': i.e. She has only used a portion of the ointment in anointing My feet. Do not insist on her giving the same to the poor. Rather let her keep it for anointing My body for burial after the death which I perceive to be impending. 9. Much people] RV 'the common people.' They came] doubtless into the house to watch the banquet. In the East a feast is a public ceremony, and there is a continual succession of spectators. 11. Went away] i.e. apostatised.

12-19. The triumphal entry (see on Mt 21:11 Mk 11:1 Lk 19:28.) The purpose of our Lord's public entry was to testify to the nation and to mankind that He was actually the Messiah promised by the OT. prophets, and the person by whom the kingdom of God was to be established. St. John writes briefly, supplementing the synoptic account, a knowledge of which he assumes. The synoptists seem to regard the entry as a purely Galilean demonstration, and give no explanation of our Lord's favourable reception in Jerusalem. St. John represents the procession as consisting not only of Galileans (v. 12), but also of inhabitants of Jerusalem, who had seen Lazarus raised from the dead, and whose testimony to the truth of the miracle caused the extraordinary sensation in Jerusalem (vv. 17, 18).

12. The next day} This is now generally called Palm Sunday. Much people] evidently Galileans. 13. Palm trees} Among the Hebrews, as among the Greeks, palms were carried as symbols of victory and rejoicing (1 Mac 13:61 Rev 7:9). 16. Observe the author's intimate knowledge of the sentiments of the disciples.

20-22. Jesus and the Greeks. A dominant idea of this Gospel is universalism. Christ dies for all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, and is, therefore, the Saviour of the world (4:22 1Jn 141). Appropriately, therefore, the evangelist notices that the last public utterance of Jesus was on the Gentile question. St. John sees in the request of these Greeks for an interview (which we are to presume was granted) a foreshadowing of the calling of the Gentiles.

20. Greeks] i.e. Gentiles, probably from Galilee or Decapolis, where there was a large Gentile population. Their presence at the feast shows that they sympathised—as so many devout Gentiles did—with the monotheistic faith of Israel.

23-26. Last public discourse of Jesus. The voice from heaven. The time is probably Wednesday afternoon, the place the Temple: cp. Mt 21:22. Jesus resigns Himself to death, comforting Himself by contemplating its glorious issues.

23. The humble request of these Greeks for an interview brings vividly before Christ's mind His approaching death, through which alone salvation can be offered to the Gentiles. Should be glorified] viz. by death, which in the case of Jesus was not a humiliation, but a triumph over the powers of evil. 24. As a grain of corn must rot in the ground before it can bring forth fruit, so must the Son of man die and be buried before the harvest of the world can ripen and be reaped. The divine life, so long as Jesus remained on earth in the body of His humiliation, was confined to Himself. But when by His death and resurrection the earthly shell was cast off, the way was open for the diffusion of the divine life among all mankind. Our Lord’s mysterious words would probably be understood by the Greeks, who, if they had been initiated in the mysteries of Eleusis, had seen the immortality of the soul represented under the figure of a grain of wheat buried in the earth that it might germinate and spring up into new life.

25. Our Lord’s followers also, if their labours for the conversion of the world are to be fruitful, must, like Him, ‘love not their lives unto death.’ Only by self-denial, self-sacrifice, self-mortification, and, if need be, by a martyr’s death, can the faith be spread, and life given to a dying world. They are to expect no reward in this world, but in the world to come they shall have eternal life, and their heavenly Father will delight to honour them.

26. Where I am] i.e. where I am soon to be, viz. in heaven.

27. Deeply pathetic are these words, and deeply comforting to all who feel their load of sorrow too heavy for them to bear. Even Jesus could not face His hour of agony without a struggle. The horror of His approaching death filled Him with anguish. His soul was troubled. For a moment He almost prayed to be spared the bitter cup. Then His purpose victoriously reasserted itself. It was to die that He came into the world, and by dying willingly He will glorify His Father. The intensely human struggle described here exactly corresponds to the agony in the garden recorded by the synoptists (Mt 26:39), and is evidence that St. John, no less than they, realised our Lord’s true humanity, and its subjection to human conditions. Father, save me from this hour] or, perhaps better, ‘Shall I say, Father, save me from this hour?’ For this cause] i.e. to die.

28. Father, glorify thy name] viz. by accepting My willing sacrifice upon the Cross. A voice] The voices from heaven in the NT. are objective in the sense that all present hear them and are startled by them, but only those for whom they are intended understand their meaning. Thus at the Baptism the heavenly voice was understood by Christ and the Baptist, at the Transfiguration by Christ and the chosen three, here by Christ and the apostles, perhaps by Christ alone. Similarly at St. Paul’s conversion only St. Paul himself distinguished the words spoken from heaven, though all heard the voice. I have both glorified it] viz. by accepting the offering of Thy life’s work, crowned as it is by Thy willing submission to suffer death upon the cross, and will glorify it again by raising Thee from the dead, and placing Thee in glory at My right hand.

31. Now (i.e. within a few days) is the judgment (or, a judgment) of this world] i.e. of the persons in it. Christ’s death followed by His Resurrection is a ‘judgment,’ because it is a deliberate challenge to mankind to accept Him as the Divine Redeemer of the world henceforth men must take sides for and against Christ. To accept Him is to accept eternal life; to reject Him is to be self-condemned. Now shall the prince of this world (i.e. Satan) be cast out] i.e. deposed by the power of Christ’s Death and Resurrection from his usurped dominion over the human race. ‘The prince of the world’ (i.e. of the Gentile world) was a recognised rabbinical title of Satan.

32. And I, if I be lifted up (viz. upon the cross) ... draw all men unto me (RV ‘myself’)] St. John regards the crucifixion of Jesus as a symbol. His elevation upon the cross is an emblem of His being set up as the ensign (Isa 11:10) around which the nations are to rally. The attractive power of the cross lies largely in the fact that sorrow and suffering are universal, and that the sympathy for which all suffering souls crave is only to be found in the love of the Crucified. All men] The offer of salvation is made to all. 33. The people understand Christ’s allusion to His death, and find this difficult to reconcile with ‘the Law,’ i.e. the OT. (see 10:34), which teaches that the reign of the Messiah will be eternal (Ps 45:110; Isa 9:7; Dan 7:14). Can, therefore, Jesus be the Messiah? Has He even claimed to be He? He has only (v. 23) claimed to be the Son of man. Is this Son of man, whom He claims to be, the Messiah or not? They press for an answer.

35. Jesus gives no direct answer, though He implies that He is the Messiah by calling Himself the Light: see 8:12. Avoiding all controversy, He bids them believe on Him, while they have Him with them, and warns them of their danger if they do not.

36. Children (RV ‘sons’) of light] i.e. enlightened persons. The phrase occurs Lk 16:8 Eph 5:8 1 Th 5:5. Did hide himself] lit. ‘was hidden.’ This was Christ’s final retirement from His public ministry, and corresponds with Mt 24:1, where Christ leaves the Temple for the last time. He went, probably, to Bethany (Mt 21:17).

37-43. Cause of the unbelief of the Jews. At first they could believe, but refused. By and by they became incapable of it. In this too common experience St. John sees the judgment of God: cp. Ro 9–11.

38. Lord, who, etc.] quoted exactly from LXX of Isa 53:1. 40. He hath blinded, etc.] very free quotation from Isa 6:10. 41. These rings said Esaias (Isaiah)] Strictly speaking, and said them to Isaiah about Isaiah's own temporaries, but St. John sees in the pase a typical prophecy of the unbelief of the ws in the time of Christ. When he saw his ry] i.e. Christ's glory. The words were oken at Isaiah's call when he 'saw the rd' (whom the evangelist identifies with rist) 'upon a throne high and lifted up' a 6:5). 43. They loved to be honoured by or, more than to be honoured by God.
44-50. Judgment of Jesus upon their uie. He refuses to condemn them formally 7), because His First Coming was not to ge, but to save. Yet He asks us that in the st Day they will be self-condemned. His ords, which they rejected, will rise up against m in judgment. These vv. are neither a bic address, which Jesus came out of his riment to deliver, nor a private exhortation to the Greeks, but rather a collection of striking ings of Jesus on the subject of faith and unlief, appropriately inserted by the evangelist this place.

47. And believe not] RV 'and keep them ratify the verdict of their own consciences.

50. 'The gospel message which the Father is committed to Me conveys to those who cept and obey it eternal life.'

THE LAST SUPPER
1-17. The Supper and the Feet-washing:
his supper is identified by almost all modern thorities with the Last Supper, which took ace on Thursday night at Jerusalem (Mt 26:20 k 14:17 Lk 22:14). Writing to supplement the naptists, St. John omits practically all that ey have recorded, and this accounts for his ission of the institution of the Holy munion. The points peculiar to St. John are feet-washing, the incident of the sop, the ails about the beloved disciple, and the nderful discourses, of which the synoptists ve no hint.
1. Before the feast] St. John corrects the pression, which many have derived from the optic narratives, that the Last Supper was actual Jewish Passover. It was, in fact, a ristian Passover, held the day before the ewish feast (18:28), and probably not conerned in all respects to the Jewish ritual.
here is, for example, no mention of a mb, though it is possible that there may ave been one. Unto the end] or, 'to the itermost.'
2. Supper being ended] or, 'during supper' RV). But inasmuch as feet-washing took place at the beginning of a meal, much is to be said for the rendering, ‘supper having been erved.’ The devil] Judas had so often yielded to Satan’s evil suggestions that now he od no resistance. Heart stands here as often for the soul, or inner man.
4. Riseth] The disciples had been disputing (Lk 22:24) which of them should be accounted greatest, and, as we gather from Christ’s beuke (Lk 22:27), not one of them would serve at supper, for fear of being thought inferior to the others. Jesus, therefore, after waiting a little for one of them to offer, rose Himself.
Not content with writing at table, which might upon occasion be done by a person of good osition (12:8), He washed their feet, the function of a slave. Feet-washing took place before a quet, and was occasionally omitted, though its absence might be remarked (Lk 7:44).
St. John’s account supplements St. Luke’s by recording the symbolical act by which our Lord forced His words, ‘I am among you as he erveth’ (Lk 22:27).
8. If I wash thee not] Besides the literal, the evangelist sees in these words a symbolical meaning: ‘Unless I wash thee from thy sins, thou hast no part with Me.’ see v. 10. 10. He that is washed (i.e. has bathed his whole body) needeth not save to wash his feet] This is a parable of things spiritual. The complete bathing or immersion stands for the full completeness of the forgiving which Christ offers to His disciples in Holy Baptism, and which cannot be repeated: the washing of the feet symbolises the daily forgiveness of sins mitted after Baptism by repentance and prayer.
Not all] The apostles had repented of their pride and ambition, and had received forgiveness from our Lord (158), except Judas, who could not be forgiven, because he cherished his sin.
12. Set down] rather, ‘reclined at table’:
see v. 23. 14-17. Our Lord now draws from the incident the more obvious lessons of humiliation and willing service to others, as in St. Luke (Lk 22:24-30). 14. This precept was obeyed liter-amly by many ancient Churches on Maundy Thursday, and still is by the Roman and Eastern Churches.
18-30. Jesus indicates the Traitor.
18. I do not call you all happy (blessed), for I know that among you is a traitor. But My choice even of the traitor is in accordance with the prophecy of Scripture. The scripture]
The quotation is a free one from Ps 41:9. The speaker is David, but since David is a type of Christ, the words are treated as a typical prophecy of Christ’s betrayal. 19. That I am he] i.e. the Messiah; or, ‘that l AM’ (see 8:58).
20. Let the knowledge that there is a traitor among them should weaken their conidence in one another, and in their divine call to the apostolate, Jesus hastens to assure them that they will receive the fullest divine powers from Himself and His Father for the work of the ministry.

21-30. Cp. the parallel accounts in Mt 26:21
Mk 14:18 Lk 22:21. St. John's main point is that the designation of the traitor was private, not public. It was made in a whisper to St. John only, and even to him the name was not mentioned. St. John's account is altogether probable. Had Jesus denounced the traitor clearly and openly, Judas would never have left the room alone.

23. Leaning on (RV 'reclining in') Jesus' bosom] The guests lay on their left sides, on separate but adjacent couches, each supporting his head upon his left hand, with his left elbow resting upon a cushion. The first place of honour (behind Jesus) was probably occupied by St. Peter; the second place of honour (in front of Jesus) was occupied by St. John. St. John, therefore, could easily lean back on Jesus' bosom. 26. Answered] evidently in a whisper, so that St. Peter could not hear. A sop] RV 'the sop.' The sop handed to another was a pledge of good will, like our old custom of taking wine with a person. At the Passover, the sop consisted of three things wrapped together, the flesh of the paschal lamb, a piece of unleavened bread, and bitter herbs. 27. The sop was the last appeal of divine love to Judas. He rejected it, and straightway at that moment the devil obtained full possession of his soul.

30. Went immediately out] St. John represents Judas as departing before the institution of the Holy Communion (see v. 34). The synoptists (or, at least, St. Luke) seem to represent him as remaining and communicating. St. John's account is altogether more probable.

Night] The word has tragic emphasis. It was night literally, a time appropriate for deeds of darkness; also it was night spiritually in the soul of Judas, in which the light of God's Spirit had been for ever quenched.

13:17-26. The Last Discourses of Jesus to His disciples. We come now to what is perhaps the most precious part of the whole evangelical history, those wonderful discourses, delivered by our Lord in the upper room just after the institution of the Lord's Supper. St. John alone records them. Like a consecrated priest, the evangelist conducts us into the Holy of Holies, revealing the inmost thoughts, desires, and aspirations of our divine Redeemer.

31-35. The Lord's Supper (Holy Communion) and the New Commandment of Love. Relieved of the traitor's presence, our Lord institutes the rite of Holy Communion, which is to take the place of the Passover, and proceeds to explain its significance as a pledge and bond of love among the disciples (vv. 34, 35), and afterwards as a means of union and communion with Himself (15:14).

31. Now is the Son of man glorified] viz. by death. His death was already virtually accomplished, when the traitor went forth to arrange for His arrest. 32. God shall also glorify him] viz. by raising Him from the dead, and exalting Him to His right hand in heaven. In himself] i.e. in the Father's peculiar glory, which the Son of God resigned at His Incarnation: cp. 17:5 Phil 2:11.

33. Little children] This touching designation is almost, if not altogether, peculiar to St. John (1 Jn 2:1, 12, 20. 3:18 4:14 5:2). In extreme old age, when too feeble to preach, he used to be carried into Church, and simply to say to the people, 'Little children, love one another.'

Ye shall seek me] You will be left here on earth for a time; but, unlike the Jews, you will seek Me and will find Me, for if you love one another, I will answer your prayers, and reveal Myself to you. Ye cannot come] not at once, but hereafter, for 'I go to prepare a place for you' (14:2). 34. A new commandment] Love is the fulfilling of the Law. The old commandment to love one another (Lv 19:19), which our Lord regarded as the essential feature of the Law, is now reenacted in a higher sense, and grounded on a new motive, viz. the Love of Christ for all mankind, as shown in His Atoning Death. The feast which commemorates this death is to be the great bond of love and union among Christians.

36-38. Peter's denial foretold] Parallel with Lk 22:31-34, and similar in character to Mt 26:21
Mk 14:27, q.v.

36. Thou shalt follow] a prophecy not only of Peter's martyrdom, but, as the event showed, of the manner of his martyrdom (cruciﬁxion): see 21:18, 19.

THE COMFORTER

1-31. The mansions in heaven. The mission of the Comforter. This great discourse, which is not easily susceptible of formal subdivision, deals with five main subjects: (1) the heavenly mansions; (2) Christ as the Way to the Father; (3) the mutual indwelling of the Father in the Son, and of the Son in the Father; (4) the efficacy of prayer through Christ; (5) the mission of the Comforter.

Some scholars think that a displacement has occurred in the farewell discourses, and particularly that this c., which seems to conclude Christ's words to His disciples, originally stood between chs. 16 and 17.

1. 'Be not disquieted at My departure' (see 13:36). Have faith that I have the power to fulfil the promises that I now make to you.'

2. My Father's house] i.e. heaven. Many ious] RM ‘abiding-places.’ There are various degrees of glory in heaven, and various olymps, suitable to the desert and acity of each (Lk19:16-28, etc.). The word, which sometimes denotes a place of refreshment for travellers, is thought by Westcott to suggest that heaven is a state of conical progress, but this is unlikely. 3. I will see again] viz. at the end of the world.

- You know whether I go, viz. to My her in heaven; and you know how you may follow Me, viz. by believing in Me.’ the RV has simply, ‘And whither I go, know the way.’

; Thomas] For the character of Thomas 11:16 20. Thomas expected an immediate manifestation of the Messianic kingdom, and this prevented him from understanding Jesus. 6. 7. ‘The Kingdom which I come to reveal is not an earthly one; mansions of which I have spoken are in heaven, not on earth. To share in My Kingdom, is to share that state of exalted and salutary communion with the Father, which is not visible on earth. I depart to heaven, to enter a state of bliss; and you may enjoy it, too, if you will have faith in Me the one mediator between God and man (Way), the one teacher authorised to reveal the things of God (the Truth), and the author of spiritual as of natural life (the fe).’ No man] It is important to remember that pious heathen, who have never heard Christ, may and do find acceptance with Him, through Him, whom, if they had known, they would have accepted as their Redeemer. 7. Have seen him] not in His solute nature, which is invisible (1:18), but His character, which is revealed in My own; see 6:46, and v. 9 below.

8. Philip desired to see the eternal invisible Father as a distinct being beside the Son. He wished for a visible Theophany: cp. Ex. 10. See on 10:29. 11. Cp. 10:29 15:24.

12. Greater works] The Apostles’ work was more effective than that of Christ Himself, because they were inspired by the Spirit of the risen and Ascended Lord. Not till Christ had departed to the Father could the Spirit be fully given. 13. Not only is Christian prayer to be offered in the name of (i.e. involving the mediation of) the Son, but even urges to prayer are given through the Son, at the same honour may be accorded to the one as to the Father. Whosoever] cp. 15:16 5:18. The limitations to be understood are at the petitioner must ask in faith (Mt 21:22), in charity with his neighbours (Mt 6:4), and habitually keep God’s commandments (Jn 3:23). 14. Here, according to the reading of the B.V., Christ teaches the disciples to pray directly to Himself, as well as to the Father in His Name. Examples of prayer to Christ are Ac 7:59 9:14, 21 1 Cor 12.

16. Another Comforter] RM ‘Advocate,’ or, ‘Helper.’ Attractive, and suitable to the context, as the rendering ‘Comforter’ is, there can be little doubt that the true meaning of the Gk. Paracletos is ‘Advocate.’ The Holy Spirit is represented as Christ’s Representative on earth, carrying on His work, and inspiring and strengthening His disciples to fulfill their vocation. As Christ’s ‘Advocate’ He pleads Christ’s cause in the hearts of the disciples, and appeals also to the better conscience of ‘the world,’ convicting the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment (16:8). He inspires believers with the spirit of prayer, and, when they pray, ‘Himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered’ (Ro 8:26, 27). To His guidance the disciples are to resign themselves with implicit confidence, for He is the Spirit of Truth. He guides, not so much as an external authority, as an inward light shining in the heart—an interior monitor regulating the secret springs of character. In His coming, Christ also returns to earth, to dwell in the hearts of believers by faith; but yet He must not be altogether identified with Christ, for He is ‘another’ Comforter. The functions of the Comforter sufficiently attest His divinity.

17. Spirit of truth] He inspires what is good and true in conduct, and reveals what is good and true in doctrine. The world, etc.] The experience of the Spirit is inward and spiritual: this the world cannot grasp. Dwelleth with you] viz. externally, by His presence in the Church. And shall be in you] as an inward principle, sanctifying, inspiring, guiding, and filling you with peace and joy. 18. Comfortless] lit. ‘orphans.’ I will come to you] invisibly and spiritually in the coming of the Spirit. 19. But ye see me] i.e. shall see Me, literally during the forty days, spiritually after Pentecost, when you shall enjoy communion with Me so deep and satisfying, that it will be better than sight. Because I live] because I live’ for evermore, ‘and ye shall live’ (RM) spiritually in Me. 20. At that day (i.e. after Pentecost) ye shall know by spiritual experience that I am in my Father, and ye in me] So close is the spiritual union between Christ and believers, that He compares it with the mutual indwelling of the Father and the Son.

22. Judas] called Thaddæus or Lebbeus (Mt 10:8), is not the same as Judas the Lord’s brother. He thought that Jesus was about to establish an earthly kingdom, and therefore to manifest Himself to the world. 23. Jesus, by adding that the Father also will come to believers, shows more clearly that it is a spiritual manifestation of which He is speaking, and that only to those who love Jesus, can the manifestation be made. We will come] Where the Son is, there of necessity is the Father also, as well as the Spirit, for the Three are One, being different forms of the subsistence and manifestation of the same Divine Being. This passage illustrates the doctrine that the Persons of the Holy Trinity are inseparable, and contain one another. The technical word is perichoresis (Gk.), or circumincesso (circumincessio), Lat. See on 10:28.

26. In my name] i.e. as My full Representative, endowed with all My powers, and with a mission to promote My cause in the world.

He (masculine, to show the Spirit's personality) shall teach you all things] i.e. all saving truth, which it is necessary for you and your successors to know. Those who would confine the Christian religion to the words of Christ recorded in the Gospels, are here reproved.

Bring all things] The Spirit would awaken the words of Christ which lay like slumbering germs in the minds of the disciples, and cause them to germinate and bear fruit after many days. Of this process St. John's Gospel itself is the most striking example.

27. Peace] more exactly defined as 'My Peace,' is the peace of reconciliation with God through the Death of Christ. Not as the world giveth] This peace is not mere earthly joy and prosperity: it is a removal of all elements of discord from the soul. 28. And come again] i.e. in the coming of the Spirit.

For my Father is greater than I] 'Rejoice that I go to My Father, for it is good both for Me and for you. He will exalt Me to supreme authority over the universe, enable Me to dispense the Holy Spirit, and cause My work to prosper in your hands.' When Christ said 'My Father is greater than I,' He was probably thinking of the humiliation of His earthly life, and of His created human nature (equal to the Father as touching His Godhead, and inferior to the Father as touching His manhood); yet there is a sense in which even the eternal Son, as being begotten, is inferior to the Father.

30. Hereafter, etc.] rather, 'No longer will I speak much with you,' because time will not allow it. The prince] i.e. Satan, who, through the powers that be, works his will on Jesus: cp. 12:31. Hath nothing in me] i.e. hath no power over the Sinless One. 31. But I go forth to meet My death that the world may know, etc. Arise, let us go hence] On account of these words, some plausibly (but without sufficient authority), wish to place this c. after c. 16. The discourses which follow (chs. 15, 16, 17) were delivered either (1) standing at the table before departing, or (2) in the Temple, or (3) in some retired place in Jerusalem, or (4) on the way to the Mount of Olives. The last view seems to be the most plausible.

THE TRUE VINE. THE WITNESS OF THE COMFORTER AND OF THE APOSTLES

1-17. The allegory of the True Vine and its interpretation. The metaphor of 'the vine' was suggested by 'the fruit of the vine' which had just been consecrated in the Holy Supper (Mt 26:29), and the allegory was intended to illustrate the main idea underlying that holy rite, viz. union with Christ. It sets forth Christ as the sole source of spiritual life, and of Christian sanctity. As long as the spiritual union between Christ and the believer, which (ideally and normally, at any rate) begins with Baptism, is maintained by faith love and prayer, the believer's soul is nourished by constant supplies of grace, just as truly as the branches of a vine are nourished by the sap that flows into them from the stem. Nourished by the life of Christ, the believer's soul is cleansed, sanctified, and made fruitful in all good works. Neglect of prayer, the holy sacraments and the other means of grace is punished by interruption of this union, and, finally, by its complete severance, resulting in spiritual death, and inability to perform works acceptable to God.

1. The true vine] i.e. the ideally perfect vine. 'The vine was the symbol of Israel, not in their national but in the church capacity' (Edersheim); cp. Ps.80:8 Isa.5:1 Jer.2:21 Hos.10:1. It was also a symbol of the Messiah (Delitzsch). Accordingly Christ here affirms, (1) that He is the true Messiah; (2) that His Church is the true Israel of God, and His followers the true Israelites (cp. 1 Cor.10:18 Gal.6:16 1 Pet.2:9 Rev.7:3 9, etc.); but, above all, (3) that He is the one fountain of spiritual life, supplying all needful grace to believers. The figure of the vine and the branches corresponds to that of the body and the members, used first by Christ at the institution of the Holy Supper (Mt 26:29) and often afterwards by St. Paul, to express the mysterious, but real and vital union which subsists between Christ and individual believers, and between Christ and His Church (Ro 12:5 1 Cor.10:17 12:21 Eph.1:23 3:6 4:4 18:5 Col.1:18-24 2:19 3:15). As the vine sends sap into every branch, causing the grapes to grow and ripen, so Christ communicates spiritual life and grace to every soul that is effectively 'in Him,' causing it to bring forth 'the fruits of the Spirit' (Gal.5:22), to be 'fruitful in every good work' (Col.1:10), and—greatest gift of all—to be 'part-taker of the divine nature' (2 Pet.1:4). Union with Christ is normally begun in Baptism (1 Cor.12:13 Gal.3:27 Ro.6:3, etc.), and maintained by constant faith (Eph.3:17), obedience (Jn.14:23 Rev.3:20), love (1 Jn.4:12), Holy Communion...
2. Every branch] refers primarily to individual Christians; yet what is said applies also to Churches (Rev 2:1-3:22). Taketh away] yet not finally till the Last Judgment. Purgeth] RV 'cleanseth,' or, still better, 'pruneth.' The reference is (1) to the discipline of sorrow, disappointment, temptation, and trial, by which the saints are perfected (Heb 12:1-3); (2) to the cutting off of the superfluities, ambitions, luxuries, and worldly pleasures and lusts, which hinder the Christian life (Gal 5:1-6:14 Jas 1:21). 3. Through the word] The 'word' is the whole training of the Twelve, including the admonitions and severe rebukes with which He strove to correct their faults, and make them 'clean,' i.e. 'pruned,' and in a fruit bearing state. 4. 'See that ye abide in Me by diligently using the means of grace, and I will abide in you.'

6. As a branch] i.e. as a useless branch. Men (RV 'they') gather them] The angels gather the useless branches (i.e. persons who are not in Christ), and cast them into the fire (of future punishment in Hades or Gehenna), and they are burned (punished).

11, 12. The Saviour now resolves His commands into perfect self-forgetting love.

11. My joy] i.e. the joy which I have in loving the Father, and being loved by Him (v. 10). This joy Christ imparts to the disciples, thereby fulfilling (i.e. perfecting) their imperfect joy: cp. 16:24 17:18 1 Jn 1:4 2 Jn 12:12. See 13:14. 13. Lay down] see 10:11, and cp. 1 Jn 3:16. The Saviour regards the offering up of life, and that for friends, as the highest expression of love, and expects the disciples to prove themselves capable of similar self-sacrifice. 15. All things] This apparently contradicts 16:2 (cp. 14:28), but only apparently. Christ's teaching during His ministry was complete in the sense that it set forth all the principles of Christianity. Yet there was required the subsequent illumination of the Spirit, (1) to interpret the deeper meaning of those principles, and (2) to apply them practically to the needs of the Church. 16. Ordained] RV 'appointed.' Bring forth fruit] This mainly refers to the conversion of the world, which was the fruit of the spiritual labours of the Apostles. Should remain] Their work has lasted nearly 2,000 years, and the vitality of Christian missionary work is still unimpaired. Whatsoever] see on 14:13.

In my name] 'in accordance with My spirit and character. 17. I command you to abide in Me, that by so doing you may have the power to love one another.'

18-25. The world's hatred] cp. the similar predictions, Mt 10:16-38 24:9 Lk 21:12-16; cp. also 1 Pet 4:12,13.

26. The Witness of the Holy Spirit and of the Apostles to Christ. 26. The Comforter] see on 14:16. Whom I will send] According to 14:17,26, it is the Father who sends the Spirit; now it is Christ Himself, showing clearly that 'what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise' (5:19). Op. Lk 24:49 Ac 2:38, and see on 16:7. Which proceedeth from the Father] The Eastern Church uses this text to prove the eternal procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone, but the preposition used shows that not the eternal origin, but the temporal mission of the Comforter is meant. He (the masculine pronoun) emphasises the Spirit's personality: cp. 14:26 shall testify of me] by His whole working in the Church from Pentecost onward: see on 16:8.

THE RESURRECTION AND ASCENSION OF CHRIST WILL PROVE THE DISCIPLES' COMFORT IN TIME OF PERSECUTION

1-6. The Persecution of the Apostles predicted. This section repeats many of the ideas of the previous c. (see 15:18-24). The reason of the anticipated persecution is 'because they (the persecutors) have not known the Father nor Me' (v. 3); i.e. because they have mistaken the character of the service which the Father requires of them. They think that He requires strict observance of the Ceremonial Law; what He really requires is worship in spirit and in truth, according to My teaching.

1. Offended] i.e. that your faith should not be shaken (RV 'made to stumble'). 2. Out of the synagogues] i.e. excommunicate you: see 9:22,34 12:42, and cp. Mt 10:17. Doeth God service] more precisely, 'offereth sacrifice to God.' There was a Jewish saying, 'Every one that sheddeth the blood of the wicked, is as he that offereth a sacrifice.' 4. The time] RV 'their hour,' i.e. the hour of your enemies' apparent triumph. Ye may remember] The Apostles' persecutions would be easier to bear, if it was clearly understood that they were foreordained by God and foretold by Christ: cp. 13:19 14:29. I said not unto you at (RV 'from') the beginning] Some intimations of the coming persecutions had been given in the earlier charge to the Twelve (Mt 10:16), but only now does our Lord bring the matter prominently forward. Because I was with you] While Christ was with the Apostles, they were in no danger of persecution, and therefore there was no need to speak to them about it. But since persecution was to begin after His death, and His death was now impending, it was necessary for Him to begin to speak to them about it. 5. None of you asketh me] The Apostles were so much disturbed by the thought of Christ’s imminent death, and their own approaching persecutions, that they had no heart to enquire about the glorious abode to which Christ was going, and to which they also would one day go.

7-15. The work of the Comforter in the world and in the Church.

7. It was better for them that Christ’s personal presence should be withdrawn, in order that His spiritual presence might be nearer to them than ever, or, rather, might for the first time truly begin. This would be effected by the coming of the Holy Ghost, when He who was now ‘with’ them, would be ever ‘in’ them. If I go not away] The glorification of Christ’s humanity through the indwelling Spirit was not complete till the Resurrection and Ascension, hence not till after the Ascension could the Spirit of the glorified Christ be given. Comforter see on 14.10.

8. Reprove] RV ‘convict.’ The Gk. word, which also occurs 390 89 (AV) 846, means to prove a person in the wrong, hence to convict. The Holy Ghost will ‘convince’ or ‘convict,’ the world, by placing before it the claims of Christ with a force and clearness that cannot be evaded. The result will be twofold. Some will be ‘convicted by their own consciences’ (89), or ‘pricked to the heart’ (Ac 287), and so repent and believe (Ac 288). Others will be hardened in their sin and unbelief (Ro 11 8), and be ‘convicted’ of willful blindness in the sight of God and good men.

9-11. The Holy Ghost, through the apostolic preaching, and through the new power of holiness manifested in the lives of believers, will convince mankind, 1) of their sin and folly in rejecting Christ; 2) that Christ is a sincere and righteous teacher, and not, as they had thought, an impostor, as will be clearly demonstrated when the Father has raised Him from the dead and set Him at His right hand in heaven; 3) that the unspiritual system of religion which they have hitherto professed, and which has led them to reject Christ, is of the devil and not of God, that God Himself has condemned it, and that therefore they must condemn it too.

This passage is an extremely difficult one, and various other interpretations of it are given.

11. Judgment] i.e. condemnation. The prince] i.e. Satan: see 1281 14 80. The Resurrection is the proof that Satan and the world (i.e. the opponents of Jesus) are condemned by God.

12, 13. This promise of divine guidance to the Apostles as teachers, justifies us in accepting their writings as specially inspired. The promise, however, is not exclusively to them, for in all time (and not least in our own) the Holy Spirit is guiding the Church into all truth. 12. Into all truth] RV ‘all the truth.’ i.e. all that is necessary to the salvation of souls and to the well-being of the Church. It should be noticed that the Church’s apprehension of truth is regarded as progressive.

Things to come] Here the prediction of events is regarded as one of the functions of true prophecy.

14. 15. One of the leading Trinitarian passages in the NT. In it, (1) the three Persons are clearly distinguished; (2) their relative subordination is clearly taught, the Father giving His all to the Son, and the Son communicating His all to the Spirit; (3) their equality of nature is distinctly affirmed, for the Son receives from the Father ‘all things whatsoever the Father hath’ (see RV), i.e. His whole nature and attributes, and communicates them to the Spirit. 14. The Spirit would glorify Christ, by progressively revealing the full sense of what Christ had taught them.

16. Ye shall see me] (1) with bodily sight during the forty days; (2) with spiritual vision after Pentecost (see on 14 18, 19). 20. But the world shall rejoice] ‘My enemies will rejoice at My death, and the apparent failure of My designa.’ 22. I will see you again] The reference is both to the Resurrection and to the coming of the Spirit. 23. In that day] i.e. the time beginning at Pentecost. Ye shall ask me nothing] RM is preferable, ‘Ye shall ask me no question,’ i.e. about the true meaning of My words, for all will then be clear to you. He will give it you] RV adds ‘in my name,’ i.e. for My sake. 24. Hitherto . . . name] because prayer in the name of Christ presupposes His glorification.

25-33. Last Words. Temporary defeat in the present will be followed by final victory. 25. In proverbs] RM ‘in parables.’ Very many of our Lord’s discourses were dark and enigmatic to the Apostles, until the coming of the Holy Spirit furnished the key to their meaning. Mere words can only hint at, not fully express, the things of God. It requires the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit to bring home to the soul God’s message of salvation. The time] i.e. the dispensation of the Spirit beginning at Pentecost. 26. I say not . . . that I will pray the Father for you] ‘After Pentecost you will have direct access to the Father. You will ask directly for what you need in My name, and no longer will it be needful for you, as it is at present, first to The hour, viz. of glorification through death. Glorify thy Son] Christ asks the Father to glorify Him by accepting the sacrifice of His death, and by raising Him from the dead. When this is done, the Son will glorify the Father by converting the world. 2. Power] RV 'authority.' At the Incarnation the Father gave the Son authority to die for the sins of the whole world, and to proclaim the Father's gracious offer of salvation to all mankind. As many as thou hast given him] RV ‘whosoever thou hast given him.’ Those whom the Father ‘gives’ to Christ, are those who freely accept the offer of salvation which is freely made to all. 3. Eternal life consists in a knowledge of God, and of Jesus as the Messiah sent from God, i.e. as a preexistent, divine being. ‘Knowledge’ here is not intellectual knowledge, but knowledge based on the religious experience of the devout Christian soul. 4. Our Lord’s sinlessness and moral perfection are implied. 5. The memory of Jesus extends beyond His birth, and beyond the creation of the world, back to eternity, when He was ‘in the form of God,’ and ‘equal to God’ (Phil 2:6); cp. v. 24. With thine own self] i.e. at Thy side.

6. Thy name] i.e. Thy nature. The men] i.e. the Apostles. Kept thy word] an expression especially characteristic of St. John’s Gospel, 1st Ep., and Rev. (Jn 8:51 14:23 1 Jn 2:2, etc.).

9. I pray not for the world] rather, ‘I am not now praying for the world.’ Jesus prays for the world in vv. 20-26, especially in v. 21, and enjoins others to do so, Mt 5:44 etc. That Christ prays for the world is proved by the entire nature of His work, the object of which is the salvation of the world (Jn 4:42 etc.).

10. All mine, etc.] RV ‘all things that are mine are thine, and thine are mine.’ All the attributes which belong to the Son belong to the Father; and all the attributes which belong to the Father (omnipotence, etc.) belong to the Son. 11. Keep through thine own name] RV ‘keep them in thy name which thou hast given me,’ i.e. keep them in a state of grace defended by that almighty power, which, by Thy gift, I share with Thee. God’s ‘name’ here is practically His divine nature and omnipotence. One] How close must be that union and fellowship, which is compared with the unity of Persons in the Godhead itself!

12. The son of perdition] i.e. him who is destined to perdition, viz. Judas Iscariot. In 2 Th 2 the expression is used of Antichrist.
The phrase is a Hebraism: cp. Mt. 23:15, 'a son of Gehenna.' The scripture in accordance with 13:18, is Ps. 41:9.

13. My joy] i.e. the joy which I derive from loving communion with the Father, as in 15:11; see 1 Jn. 14. Thy word] i.e. Thy whole revelation of Thyself as disclosed in My life. Hated them] i.e. will hate them, the past tense expressing the certainty of the hatred, already so clearly foretold, 16:2.

15. I pray not, etc.] Because, if the Apostles were taken out of the world, they would not be able to convert it. From the evil] more correctly rendered by the RV, 'from the evil one.' St. John habitually conceives of evil as personal: see 1 Jn. 3:10, 12 5:18, 19.

17. Sanctify them (RV 'consecrate them') through thy truth (RV 'in the truth')] Consecrate them to their apostolic office, endowing them also with divine illumination and wisdom for their work: cp. Ex. 28:41. Our Lord also was 'consecrated' for His work when He entered the world: see 10:36. As Thou didst not send Me into the world without first consecrating Me (see 10:30), so now I consecrate My Apostles before sending them forth. 19. Now once more I consecrate Myself, not this time as a mere teacher, but as priest and victim in the approaching sacrifice. The blood of the new covenant, which My death will initiate and ratify, will consecrate My Apostles to their office and work. For 'sanctify' in the sense of offering a victim in sacrifice, see Ex 13:2 Dt. 15:10: cp. 28:8:11. Through the truth] RV 'in truth,' i.e. truly.

21. That they all may be one] A leading passage on the unity of the Church. The centre of unity is not on earth but in heaven. Christians are 'one,' because they are spiritually united to the Father and the Son, whose divine life and blessed union they share through the faith that gives eternal life (3:16, etc.), and through believing participation in the sacraments (3:5 6:6 1 Cor. 10:16, 17 12:13). In this, its deepest sense, the unity of the Church cannot be broken by outward divisions. But inward unity ought also to show itself in visible outward unity, 'that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me.' Hence every Christian is bound to pray and work for the reunion of Christendom. 22. The glory] i.e. according to the context, mainly the glory of unity and love. 23. That the world may know] The whole world will be converted when the Church of Christ presents the spectacle of perfect love and visible unity. Divisions hinder the work of Christ, unity advances it. 26. Thy name] i.e. Thy nature.

CHAPTER 18

Christ before Annas, Caiaphas, and Pilate
1-14. Christ's arrest and trial before Annas

(cop. Mt. 26:30 = Mk. 14:26 = Lk. 22:29). The narrative is now parallel with the synoptic account, with which, though obviously independent, it closely agrees. Our Lord's agony in the garden is omitted as well known, but it is alluded to (v. 11), and the evangelist elsewhere uses language quite as definite as that of the synoptists in speaking of His agony of mind at the prospect of death (12:27 13:21). In this Gospel, as in the others, the sufferer, though divine, is 'a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.'

1. The brook Cedron] RV 'Kidron,' a deep, precipitous ravine to the E. of Jerusalem, dividing it from the Mount of Olives, and now called the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Both Jews and Moslems hold that the Last Judgment will take place there (see Joel 3:12).

26. The knowledge that the servant was a kinsman of Malchus bears out the statement (v. 15) that 'the disciple' was known to the high priest.

27. Crew] This fixes the time as about 3 A.M.

28-32. Jesus is led to Pilate (Mt 27 Mt Lk 23). See especially on St. Matthew. The pathos of this tragic spectacle of the rulers of the chosen people leading their promised Messiah to a Gentile ruler to be put to death, and thereby forfeiting their place in the Kingdom of God and their national existence, is by no evangelist so touchingly portrayed as by St. John. Yet even this great sin did not frustrate the divine purpose, but rather was the means of effecting it (1149-53). While St. John's account of the civil trial is by far the fullest and the most informing, he omits several important incidents: the dream of Pilate's wife (Mt), the washing of Pilate's hands (Mt), the trial before Herod (Lk), and the prophetic cry of the people, 'His blood be on us and on our children' (Mt).

28. The hall of judgment] RV 'the palace,' lit. 'the praetorium,' here indicates the official residence of Pilate, which was either the castle of Antonia or a palace built by Herod on the W. hill of Jerusalem: see Mt 27. Pilate's judgment-seat was in the open air, but he more than once entered the building to confer with Jesus privately (Jn 18.28 19).

That they might not be defiled (RV) A Gentile house would not have been purged from the presence of leaven in prospect of the Passover, and therefore by entering it they would have defiled themselves. St. John, who had already eaten the Passover with Jesus, was apparently not so scrupulous: he entered, and hence was able to report the conversations between our Lord and Pilate (vv. 33-38 c. 19-11).

But... might eat the passover] It is obvious that St. John places the Jewish Passover, not on Thursday evening, as the synoptists seem to do, but on Friday evening, and regards the Last Supper on Thursday night as an anticipated Passover—a Passover eaten before the legal date, because Jesus knew that He was to suffer on the morrow. Some critics, however, following the priva facie meaning of the synoptists, date the Jewish Passover on Thursday day evening, and understand the expression here ('but might eat the Passover') to refer not to the Passover proper, but to the 'chagigah,' a sacrifice offered on the morning after the paschal meal: see on Mt 26.17.

30. According to Lk 23, they accused Him of sedition, of withholding tribute from Cæsar, and of assuming the royal title. The charge of blasphemy, on which the Sanhedrin condemned Him, would have no weight with Pilate. 31. It is not lawful, etc.] This apparently conflicts with Jn 8:52, Ac 5:38 7:57 21:27. It would seem, (1) that the Sanhedrin could sentence to death, (2) but could not execute the sentence without permission, and (3) that the governor sometimes permitted them to exceed their powers. The Talmud says that the power of life and death was lost 40 years before the destruction of Jerusalem.

32. Jesus had prophesied not only His death, but His crucifixion, and this could only be fulfilled by His being delivered to the Romans, for the Jewish penalty for blasphemy was stoning (8:50 10:31 Ac 7:59).

33–38. Within the Praetorium. Pilate and Christ. With the exception of Pilate's first question, all is peculiar to St. John. With Roman directness Pilate goes straight to the point: Has Jesus any political designs? His words, 'Am I a Jew?' show his contempt for the Jews, and his question, 'What is truth?' echoes the flippant (but perhaps only superficial) scepticism of polite circles in Rome.

37. Thou sayest that I am a king] RM 'Thou sayest it, because I am a king.' Probably the words are a surprised question: 'Dost thou, a heathen, say that I am a king!' Pilate was impressed with our Lord's personality, and was willing to confess that there was something kingly about Him. [To this end] The only kingdom which Christ claims for Himself is absolute empire over 'the Truth' (14:6, etc.). Every one, etc.] All who are earnestly doing their duty according to the light vouchsafed to them, are ready to receive Christ's Gospel, when it is presented to them. 38. What is truth?] Rome was infested with a horde of Greek sophists and juggling Oriental theosophists, who all claimed a monopoly of 'the truth,' and hence Pilate had learned to scoff at all mention of the search for it.

38–40. Outside the Praetorium. Barabbas is preferred to Jesus (see Mt 27:15–26 Mk 15:6–15 Lk 23:18–26). All is in essential agreement with the synoptists.

THE CRUCIFIXION. THE BURIAL

1–3. Inside the Praetorium. Scourging and mockery by the soldiers (Mt 27:26 Mk 15:15). It might be supposed from Mt and Mk that the scourging was only the ordinary preliminary to a Roman execution, but Lk 23:16 suggests that it was an act of mercy to Jesus intended to save His life. This the Fourth Gospel fully confirms, showing how Pilate tried to work upon the compassion of the multitude. The present narrative elucidates, without in any way contradicting, the synoptic account.

4–7. Outside the Praetorium. 'Behold the man!' 'Crucify Him.'

5. Behold the man!] Lat. Ecce homo. The words are gently and sympathetically spoken, and are intended to move compassion: 'This meek and suffering form cannot be the usurper of a throne.' 6. Take ye him] Pilate attempts to put the responsibility of shedding innocent blood upon the Jews. 7. We have a law] This confirms the evidence of the synoptists that Jesus was condemned by the Sanhedrin, not simply for claiming to be the Messiah, but for claiming to be divine, and so blaspheming God (Mt 26:64 Mk 14:62 Lk 22:69).

7–11. Inside the Praetorium. Jesus refuses to satisfy Pilate's curiosity as to His origin.

8. The more afraid viz. of allowing Jesus to be unjustly executed. In spite of superficial scepticism (19:38), Pilate was superstitious, and thought that Jesus might be some demigod or hero, some son of Jupiter, appearing in human form: cp. Ac 14:11. 9. Whence art thou?] Art thou a man or a demigod?

11. Caiphas was more guilty than Pilate. Pilate had lawful authority over Jesus, which, as ordained by God, was acquiesced in by Jesus Himself. Caiphas had no such authority, for Caiphas was only high priest, and Jesus was the Messiah. Again, Pilate was only Caiphas's tool; he knew not the issues at stake in the rejection and condemnation of Jesus, but Caiphas did know, or ought to have known.

From above] i.e. from God (cp. Ro 13:1), though some think that it means from the high priest Caiphas. He that delivered me] i.e. not Judas, but Caiphas.

12–16. Outside the Praetorium. Pilate yields to the clamour.

12. Thou art not Caesar's (i.e. Tiberius's) friend] The Jews now appeal to Pilate's selfish fears. They threaten to accuse him of disloyalty to the emperor, a charge which the cruel and suspicious Tiberius was only too willing to receive. St. John alone brings out the leading motive which induced Pilate to yield. 13. Sat down] or, possibly, 'caused Jesus to sit down.' The Pavement] In front of a Roman judgment seat there was usually, at this period, a mosaic or tesselated pavement. Hebrew] i.e. Aramaic. Gabbatha] 'Gabbath or Gabbatha means a rounded height' (Erdesheim).

14. St. John sees prophetic significance in Pilate's words, 'Behold your king;' and therefore times them precisely. Pilate, the representative of the Gentile world, sees in Jesus, whom Israel rejects, the true king of Israel. The Passover is mentioned, because, in the evangelist's view, Jesus is the true Paschal lamb.

The preparation] i.e. the day before the Passover, extending from sunset on Thursday to sunset on Friday. Those, however, who think that the Passover took place on Thursday, slate. 'And it was the Friday in Passover k,' a possible, but improbable rendering: 18. 26.

About the sixth hour] i.e. about noon. St. John says 'the third hour,' i.e. 9 A.M. (Mk 15:25). There is a discrepancy here of about 3 hours, ch cannot be satisfactorily accounted for. However, Eastern ideas of time are vague, and he actual time of crucifixion lay midway when 9 and 12, the discrepancy is not a very one, and may possibly be explained by complete absorption of the disciples in the matric incidents of our Lord's trial and cution, which rendered them unobservant the flight of time. The discrepancy is not satisfactorily explained, by supposing (as some) that St. John counts his hours from mid-night, for this would throw back the crucifixion i.e., still leaving a three-hours' disporancy.

16. Unto them] viz. to the chief priests, so that the crucifixion might appear their act, rather than Pilate's, who was hastily ashamed it.

17. Jesus is crucified (cp. Mt 27:31 Mk 15:25 228). St. John, who is in thorough agreement with the synoptists, omits the incident of Simon of Cyrene (Mt, Mk, Lk), and the "word on the cross (Lk), but adds the narrative interview between the chief priests and Pilate.

19. Title] According to Roman custom an inferior officer bore before the condemned a block of white wood upon which was engraved the crime for which he suffered. The chief priests regarded Pilate's title as intended to suit the Jews by insinuating that the fitting sufferer for such a nation was a condemned criminal. 20. Was night] a local detail, peculiar to this Gospel. Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. It was written in three languages, so at it could be read by every one, including neighbors. The evangelist records the fact symbolizing the universality of the gospel.

22. What I have written] A touch true to life. Pilate, though morally a coward, was mistake—by nature obstinate and stubborn; it one self-willed, and implacable' (Philo).

23. The Parting of the Garments (Mt 27:28 k 15:24 Lk 23:24). St. John alone sees in this incident a fulfillment of Scripture, and this counts for his minute description of it. The rod of a Jew consisted of, (1) the head-dress, (2) the shoes, (3) the outer garment, (4) the tunic, (5) the inner garment. There were our soldiers (cp. Ac 12:1), who each took one part. There remained the seamless inner garment. For this they cast lots, fulfilling Ps 22:18, Davidec psalm, from which the fourth 'Word' in the cross was taken. St. John quotes it from the LXX version. The garments of criminals were a perquisite of the executioners.

25. Jesus and His mother. This beautiful episode is peculiar to St. John. Its grace and naturalness, and withal its reticence, speak powerfully for its truth. It took place before the darkness, which St. John does not record.

25. His mother, etc.] According to the AV and RV, only three women are named, but most modern critics hold that four are intended. Translate, therefore, 'His mother, and His mother's sister' (i.e. Salome, the mother of the evangelist); and Mary the daughter of Cleophas, and Mary of Magdala: see further on Mt 27:56. The wife of Cleophas (RV 'Cleopas') A more probable rendering is, 'the daughter of Cleophas.' Nothing is known of this Cleophas, who (for reasons which cannot be fully given here, but which are accepted by most recent critics) is not to be identified with the Alpheus of Mt 10:3, or with the Cleopas of Lk 24:18. Cleopas is a contraction of Cleopatra. For the view, now generally abandoned, that 'Mary of Cleophas' was the mother of our Lord's 'brethren, see the detached note on Mt 12:46-50. 26. Woman, behold, etc.] Although bearing the sins of the whole world, Jesus was not forgetful of human ties, and solemnly commended his mother to the care of the beloved disciple, St. John. St. John was comparatively wealthy, and was, moreover, the Virgin's nephew, so that the arrangement was in every way suitable. She was not commended to our Lord's 'brethren,' probably because they were not her own children, and were not believers: see on Mt 12:46-50. It is clear that St. Joseph was by this time dead. Unto his own home] This implies that St. John had a separate establishment at Jerusalem. This would help to explain his acquaintance with Anna (18:13), and his special information about our Lord's ministry at Jerusalem. When our Lord visited Jerusalem, St. John was probably His host.

28. The death of Jesus (Mt 27:45-50). The sayings 'I thirst' and 'It is finished' are peculiar to St. John. The former explains, what the synoptics do not, why 'one of them ran and took a sponge, and filled it with vinegar,' etc. (Mt 27:48 Mk 15:39).

28. That the scripture, etc. i.e. Ps 69:21: cp. Ps 22:15. Although Jesus mainly based His Messianic claim on His fulfillment of the OT Scriptures in their widest and most general sense (Lk 24:27 Ac 10:43), yet He attached some importance (though less than the disciples did) to their literal and detailed fulfillment. I thirst] the fifth 'Word.' These words of human anguish, attesting Christ's true humanity, are significantly absent from the Docetic 'Gospel of Peter,' which says that on the cross He felt no pain. A vessel] The Roman soldiers often drank a sour wine, or vinegar, called posca. Ulpian says, 'Our soldiers are wont to drink wine and vinegar, one day wine, another day vinegar.' Hysopp] i.e. the reed mentioned by the synoptists. But Post (in HDB.) takes it to be a plant like peppermint, added to the wine to make it quench thirst better. 30. It is finished] (the sixth word). All My earthly work, including the world’s redemption, is finished. The three synoptists mention Christ’s loud cry, but only St. John mentions what He said. St. Luke alone adds the seventh word, which immediately followed. Gave up] The death was voluntary—1 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself’ (10:18).

31–37. The sign of the pierced side. A section peculiar to St. John, and claiming expressly to be the testimony of an eyewitness. The knowledge of Jewish and Roman custom displayed in it speaks for its historical truth.

31. The preparation] i.e. the day before the sabbath (Friday). The sabbath began at sunset on Friday: see on v. 14. That the bodies] An accurate account of the Jewish practice, as opposed to that of the Romans, who left corpses to rot on their crosses. The letter of the Law (Dt21:22) required the removal of the bodies in all cases before night; much more was it necessary in this case for the bodies to be removed, seeing that the morrow was a sabbath and a high festival. An high day] It was at once the sabbath and the first day of unleavened bread. That their legs] A specially Roman practice. The criminal’s legs were broken with heavy mallets to accelerate death.

34. Pierced his side] This was done to make sure of His death, and was a common practice at executions. The act was providentially ordered, that it might be made evident that the Resurrection was a resuscitation after a real death, not a mere recovery from a death-like stupor. Blood and water] No satisfactory medical explanation of this phenomenon has been given, though it has been suggested that the death of Christ was due to rupture of the heart consequent upon acute mental sufferings, and that thereupon the cavities of the heart became filled with a watery serum, which flowed out when Christ’s side was pierced. The evangelist himself seems to have regarded the strange phenomenon as a miracle; he certainly saw in it a deep mystical significance, for which see on 1 Jn 5:6. 35. The eyewitness claims to be the actual author of the Gospel, in spite of the third person: see 21 24. 36. A bone of him] In the evangelist’s view, Christ’s legs were not broken, that it might be thereby made evident that He was the true Paschal lamb. The Jews were specially forbidden to break the bones of the Paschal Lamb: see Ex12:46. 37. They shall look] St. John quotes directly from the Heb. of Zech12:10, which the LXX has mistranslated. We have here a point of contact with Rev17.

38–42. The burial (see Mt27:57 Mk15:42 Lk 23:40). All is in agreement with the synoptists, but there are three additional particulars: (1) That Nicodemus assisted Joseph of Arimathea; (2) that the tomb was in a garden close by; (3) that the body was embalmed after the Jewish manner with 100 lb. weight of spices. These details imply special knowledge.

39. Myrrh and aloes] The myrrh and the aloe wood were reduced to powder, and inserted between the bandages, which were wound fold upon fold round the body. The enormous quantity (about 75 lb. avoirdupois) of spices, though surprising, is credible as the offering of two wealthy men. According to Jewish and general Eastern custom, the neck and face of the corpse were doubtless left bare: see on v. 20. 42. The Jews’ preparation] see on v. 14.

THE RESURRECTION
1-10. The Resurrection. Visits of Mary Magdalene, and of Peter and John to the tomb of Jesus. (For the Resurrection appearances see on the synoptics, especially on St. Matthew; for the visit of Mary Magdalene see Mt28:1 Mk16:1 Lk24:1,10; for that of St. Peter see Lk24:12.) This section, peculiar to the Fourth Gospel, is marked by specially vivid features. The race to the tomb in which John, the younger man, outruns Peter; the impetuous nature of Peter, who enters first; the more reflective character of John, who reads the meaning of the sign of the gravedresses and believes first; the details of the scene inside the sepulchre; the state of mind of the disciples, who had not yet learnt to expect a resurrection;—all these, as if caught on the plate of a photographic camera, the memory of the aged Apostle faithfully retained. Here is either absolute truth, or artistic realism of a kind unexampled in ancient literature.

2. We know not] Observe the plural, which corroborates the synoptic representation that other women, besides Mary Magdalene, visited the tomb (Mt28:1 Mk16:1 Lk24:1). For the details see on Mt.

8. And he saw and believed] Why did John believe? Probably because the body of Jesus had miraculously passed through the thick folds of the gravedresses, leaving them unmoved and untouched, just as, on the evening of the same day, the risen Lord appeared in the midst of the disciples, when the doors were shut. It was clear from the position of the clothes, which had not been unwound, that no human hands had removed the Lord’s body, and further, since His body had passed unimpeded through solid matter; that it was now a spiritual and glorious body, not bound by the laws of terrestrial matter. Jesus had risen, therefore, not to an earthly but to a heavenly life.

11.18. The appearance to Mary Magdalene. This is different from that of Mt 28, but identical with that of Mk 16. 12. Two angels as in Lk. Mt and Mk mention only one. St. John notices their exact attitude and position. 15. Supposing him to be the gardener] Many did not recognize our Lord at first, because His appearance had undergone a certain change (Mt 28, Mk 16, Lk 24, Jn 21). 16. Rabboni] Eder- shem regards this as the Galilean form of ‘Rabbi.’

17. Touch me not, etc.] ‘I have not come to renew the old intimacy, but am on the point of returning home to My Father. When I am enthroned in heaven, you shall touch Me once more, not however with the physical touch of your hands, but with the spiritual touch of a living faith.’ I ascend] viz. after forty days. But many recent writers maintain that our Lord ascended immediately after the Resurrection, that He was in heaven during the forty days of earthly manifestation, and that the event called ‘the Ascension’ (Ac 1) was only His final farewell to the disciples, not His entry into glory. My Father, and your Father] Observe that Jesus never says ‘Our Father,’ or ‘Our God,’ as if He stood in the same relation to God as other men. The Lord's prayer is no exception, for it is a prayer of the disciples, not of Jesus Himself.

19.23. Jesus appears in the evening to the disciples: see Lk 24, Mk 16. According to St. Mark, Jesus appeared ‘to the eleven as they sat at meat.’ St. John is more precise, noting the absence of Thomas. St. Luke says that Jesus appeared ‘to the eleven and them that were with them.’ By this time our Lord had appeared, not only to Mary Magdalene and the women, but also to the two disciples walking to Emmaus, and to Peter.

19. The doors were shut] A clear indication that our Lord’s body had become a spiritual body, and was no longer subject to the ordinary laws of matter, or the conditions of space: cp. v. 26 Lk 24, Mk 16. Yet there is no suggestion of an unreal or phantom (Docetic) body, for He offers it to be handled (Lk 24, Jn 20); and even eaten before them (Lk 24, Ac 14 (RM 10)). It is to be presumed that Jesus closed the interview by mysteriously vanishing. Peace] The usual Jewish greeting, but how full of meaning now that the Cross had made peace between man and God!

22. Breathed on them] The word for ‘breath’ and ‘spirit’ is the same in Gk. By this action our Lord showed how closely the Holy Spirit is connected with His person, being in fact ‘the spirit of Jesus.’ The Church has never ventured to imitate this action, but has substituted in ordination the laying-on of hands.

Receive ye the Holy Ghost] i.e. for the purpose of consecration to the ministerial office. The Spirit was undoubtedly given at this time, and yet, we must suppose, not in its full power till Pentecost: see 70, 16. 23. Whosoever sins ye remit] This includes all the means by which, through the ministry of the Word, souls are reconciled to God; e.g. baptism, the preaching of repentance, and moral discipline, as well as absolution (see on Mt 18).

As others were present besides the Apostles (Lk 24), it has been suggested that the ministerial powers here mentioned were conferred not upon the Apostles only, but upon the whole Church. St. John, however, who alone mentions the communication of ministerial powers, mentions the Apostles only as receiving them. It is possible indeed that our Lord’s commission to baptize and teach, etc., was given to the corporate body of believers (see Mt 28), but it was clearly intended to be normally exercised through an authorized ministry.

Christians of different communions and schools of thought are not entirely at one as to the precise meaning of this verse, and their explanations of it differ very considerably, at least in detail. A full account of the numerous interpretations cannot be given here. It must suffice to indicate very briefly, for the information of the reader, the two main views which are taken of the nature of the power to ‘remit’ and ‘retain’ sins, which the risen Lord here communicates to His Apostles, and through them to His Church. (1) Many believers see in it nothing but the power to exercise ecclesiastical discipline. They regard sins as ‘retained,’ when a notorious offender is excommunicated, i.e. deprived for a time of the sacraments and other ministrations of the Church, and ‘remit,’ when, as a penitent, he is restored once more to full communion. On this view, the forgiveness which the Church is empowered to bestow, is only a human forgiveness,—the forgiveness of the injured and justly offended Christian brotherhood. (2) Other believers hold that something more is intended. Impressed with the mysterious solemnity of the words themselves, of their occasion, and of the symbolic act which accompanied them, remembering also that our Lord more than once promised that the discipline of the earthly Church, when rightly exercised, should be ratified in heaven (Mt 16, 18; cp. 1 Cor 5, 2 Cor 10), they believe the meaning to be that God Himself (normally and usually) ratifies in heaven the remitting and retaining of sins by the earthly Church, though He still, of course, retains in His own hands the power to remedy all injustice, and to grant pardon (where penitence is deep and real), even beyond the covenant channel.

When the important and far-reaching qualifications with which the second view is now generally held are duly considered, it will probably appear to many readers that the two views are not so much fundamentally opposed, as expressive of two different aspects of truth. At any rate there is at present a strong tendency among theologians representing the two points of view to come to a better understanding by frank mutual explanations.

25. The doubts of Thomas. Thomas in a sense represents the spirit of our age. He will be satisfied with nothing less than the evidence of the senses.

25. The print of the nails] It is clear that Thomas had witnessed the crucifixion.

26. After eight days] i.e. on the next Sunday, both Sundays being counted. Here we have the beginning of the observance of the Lord's Day, as the weekly memorial of the Resurrection. The other NT. references are Ac 20:7 1Cor 16:2 Rev 1.10. Within] viz. in the same upper room in Jerusalem; not, as some think, in Galilee. Thomas with them] His presence shows a willingness to be convinced. The doors being shut] see on v. 19. 27. Probably Thomas did not avail himself of our Lord's invitation. 28. My Lord and my God] The climax of the gospel. The unbelief of Thomas passes into faith in Christ's true Deity. Observe that Jesus accepts and approves the confession of Thomas. 29. It is better to be convinced by moral and spiritual evidence than by the evidence of the senses.

30. Conclusion of the Gospel.

30. Many other signs] probably refers to signs done after the Resurrection. Those done before the Resurrection were done in the presence of the people. 31. The author's purpose in writing is to produce faith in Jesus as the Messiah, and as the Son of God, i.e. as divine: see v. 28. Life] i.e. eternal life.

Through his name] i.e. through union with Him as the incarnate Son of God. His 'name' is His nature as the God-Man.

Here the Gospel originally closed.

SUPPLEMENTARY

1-25. Appendix. The Gospel is brought to a definite close, its contents are reviewed, and its purpose stated in 20:30,31. The present c. is therefore probably an appendix added at a later time, but (since all MSS. and versions contain it) before the Gospel had been extensively copied, or had passed into general circulation. There is good reason for supposing that it is by the same author as the Gospel. For (1) the style is identical. For example, there is a fondness for the same connecting particles, and for sentences beginning abruptly without any conjunction at all. The favourite Johannine words are used, such as 'manifest,' 'glorify,' 'witness,' 'love,' 'disciples' (in the sense of 'apostles'). Everywhere too is displayed that peculiar and inimitable simplicity which characterises the Johannine writings generally. (2) There are also important correspondences with the narrative of the Fourth Gospel. The Sea of Tiberias and Cana of Galilee are mentioned only in that Gospel and in this appendix. Didymus and Nathanael, as actual characters and under these names, appear only in St. John. Common to this Gospel and this appendix, and to them only, is the mention of 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' and of his leaning upon the Master's breast at supper, and the insistence upon the truth of his testimony: cp. 19:25. Characteristic also is the peculiar expression 'signifying by what manner of death he should glorify God': cp. 12:23 18:22. The only really doubtful vv. are the last two (vv. 24, 25), which may possibly have been added by the Ephesian elders, who first put the Gospel in circulation after the death of the Apostle, and who wished to testify to its genuineness and trustworthiness. The main object of the appendix is to correct a popular belief that the beloved disciple would not die before our Lord's Second Advent (v. 23).

1-14. Manifestation of the risen Lord to seven disciples at the Sea of Tiberias. The Fourth Gospel confirms the synoptic tradition that there were appearances in Galilee as well as in Judea. The date of this appearance cannot be fixed.

1. Shewed (RV 'manifested') himself see on 2:11. 2. Of Cana] A later writer would not have been likely to possess this additional information. The sons of Zebedee] i.e. James (called 'the Great'), and St. John the Evangelist. Two others] The 'Gospel of Peter' seems to identify them with Andrew and Levi (Matthew). 3. I go a fishing] The period of waiting had doubtless tried the Apostles severely, and it was more as a distraction, than as a means of livelihood that St. Peter returned to his nets. That night] At night it is easy to catch fish, because then they cannot see the nets. In daylight it is much more difficult. The successful draught (v. 6) was made in daylight, and is therefore probably to be regarded as miraculous. 4. Knew not] A certain change had passed over our Lord's body: see on 20:15. 5. Children] cp. 13:38. From our Lord, St. John learnt to call his... in converts by this affectionate title: see on 33. The exact word is in 1Jn 2:13,18, a similar one in 13:33, 1Jn 2:12,28, 37,18 4:15 21. 7. That disciple] As at the visit to the mb, so here, the beloved disciple is the first drawn the true inference. This undesigned incidence speaks for genuineness. 8. As it were two hundred cubits] i.e. 300 ft. 9. Coals] i.e. charcoal. Fish] or a fish. Bread] or a loaf.

How Jesus prepared this meal is a mystery, why He did so is plain. He wished, after the Resurrection, as well as before it, to set himself forth as the bread of life, or the iritical food of mankind, and He did so, as c. 6, by a symbolical act. There is probably a reference to the Holy Communion, as was perceived already in the 2nd nt. The recently discovered inscription at the tomb of Abercins, bishop of Hieropolis Phrygia in the reign of Marcus Aurelius 61-180, A.D.), contains the words, ‘Everywhere faith led the way, and set before men to feed the food from the fountain, mighty to, stainless, which a pure virgin grasped, and gave this to friends to eat always, having bread, and giving the mixed cup with bread. Here the fish is Christ, the fountain of the pure virgin the Church (see 2 Peter, 1. vol. 1. p. 480). 3. the catacombs at Rome also, in the emery of St. Lucina, is a fresco representing a fish (i.e. Christ) bearing upon its back a basket full of sacramental bread.

Yet was not the net broken] The earlier caught of fishes with the breaking net symbolised the Church on earth, imperfect in organisation and methods, and allowing any souls to escape from its meshes. This caught, in which the net is unbroken and very fish is brought safe to shore, symbolises the Church triumphant in heaven, freed at last from all earthly imperfections, and barring in its membership all genuine servants of God whose salvation is now forever assured.

14. The third time] i.e. the third appearance to any considerable number of Apostles collectively. The appearances, private or semi-rvate, to Mary Magdalene, the women, the two disciples, Peter, and James, are not beckoned. The appearances on the mountain a Galilee, and to the five hundred, had apparently not yet taken place.

This being a spiritual Gospel, the allegorical interpretation of this incident is to be firmly maintained. So interpreted, it constitutes a newed call by the risen Lord to the Apostles to become ‘fishers of men,’ and a renewed promise to be with them in their work. The tetralals also, the unbroken net, the fish and the bread, probably even the number of the fishes, are to be mystically interpreted, but the meaning of the last is uncertain: The other chief Johannine book, the Apocalypse, abounds in the mysticism of numbers.

15-17. Restoration of St. Peter to his apostolic office. By his threefold denial Peter had forfeited his position among the apostles. Hence, before restoring him, Jesus required from him a threefold confession of love. Quite baseless is the papal interpretation that St. Peter is here endowed with supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the other apostles. All that is done is to restore him to his old position.

15. Simon, born of Jonas] Bv ‘son of John’: see 1:42. Observe that in this, as in the other Gospels, our Lord does not call him Peter. Lk 22:34 is the only exception. Lovest thou me (agapás more than these?) i.e. more than these thy brethren love Me? Once (Mt 26:38 Jn 13:87) Peter had boasted of a love and constancy greater than that of others. Now he is more humble. In his reply he will not say that he loves Jesus ‘more than these.’ He will not even say that he loves Jesus at all in the full sense of Christian love (agapán, agapé). Twice Jesus asks him, ‘Lovest thou Me?’ (agapán). The third time He adopts Peter’s own word, philēin. Feed my lambs] lit. ‘give food to them,’ i.e. by the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. The ‘lambs’ here are probably neither Christian children nor recent converts, but, like the ‘sheep’ in vv. 16, 17, Christians in general, the name being one of affection: cp. 1 Pet 5:8-9. 16. Feed (Bv ‘tend’) my sheep] Here the Gk. word indicates authority, so that the meaning is, Exercise discipline and authority over the flock: so Ac 20:28 1 Pet 5:2 Rev 2:27 7:15, and often in OT. 17. Thou knowest] or, rather, ‘perceive’ (RM).

18-20. Prophecy of Peter’s Martyrdom.

18. Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands (upon the arms of the cross), and another (i.e. the executioner) shall gird thee (viz, with the loin-cloth, the only garment allowed to criminals at their execution) and carry thee whither thou wouldest not (viz. to execution). St. John here assumes the manner of St. Peter’s death to be known to his readers. According to the probably true tradition, St. Peter and St. Paul were martyred at Rome about 68 A.D., the former being crucified, the latter beheaded.

19. Follow me] i.e. by dying the death of crucifixion. ‘Follow’ here is metaphorical.

20-23. The misunderstood saying about the beloved disciple.

20. Following] viz. in a literal sense. Our Lord, during His conversation with Peter, had walked to a little distance from the others. Peter, happening to turn round, sees John fol-
ST. JOHN

21. What shall this man do? i.e. Shall he also die a glorious martyr's death? Seeing that our Lord rebukes the question, there was probably in it some latent jealousy, or, at least, presumption. 22. Tarry i.e. remain alive. Till I come The reference is not to the destruction of Jerusalem, but, to the Last Judgment: cp. 14:8. 23. Should not die? In spite of this appendix, the opinion still persisted. One story was that he was translated like Elijah, another that he still breathed in his grave, a fable which even St. Augustine was inclined to believe.

24, 25. Conclusion. V. 24 is full of St. John's own phrases and mannerisms, and, therefore, in spite of the plural 'we know,' is probably by the Apostle himself. Nor is there any absolutely cogent reason for rejecting v. 25, which is absent from only one ancient MS.

We know] The Apostle associates himself with the members of the Ephesian Church, who knew him well, and were convinced of his truthfulness. Some, however, think that the 'we' are the Ephesian elders, who published the Gospel, and thus declared it authentic. 25. The author apologises for the incompleteness and fragmentary character of his work.

ADDITIONAL NOTE.

According to the generally received tradition, which dates from at least the former half of the second century, the Apostle John, the son of Zebedee, after the martyrdom of St. Paul, 67 A.D., or more probably after the fall of Jerusalem, 70 A.D., migrated from Jerusalem to Ephesus, and there ruled the Churches of Asia Minor for more than a quarter of a century, and finally died a natural death in the reign of Trajan (about 100 A.D.), having first composed and published the Fourth Gospel, and the First Epistle of John, perhaps also the Second and Third Epistles and the Revelation. As the trustworthiness of this tradition has lately been challenged, it will be convenient to place before the reader a summary of the early evidence.

St. Justin Martyr (150 A.D.) attributes the Revelation to the Apostle John, and since that book is in the form of a pastoral letter to 'the seven churches which are in Asia' (14), Justin must have believed in the Asiatic sojourn of the Apostle.

St. Ireneus, who wrote in Gaul 177 A.D., but whose youth was spent in Asia, where he had been a hearer of St. Polycarp, a personal disciple of St. John, says:

'Thus all the elders testify, who were conversant in Asia with John the disciple of the Lord. And he remained among them up to the times of Trajan' (98-117 A.D).

'Afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord, who also had leaned upon His breast, himself published a Gospel during his residence at Ephesus in Asia.'

'While I was yet a boy, I saw thee (Florinus) in Lower Asia with Polycarp. I can even describe the place where the blessed Polycarp used to sit and discourse, and how he would speak of his familiar intercourse with John, and with the rest of those who had seen the Lord.'

Polycrates (who as bishop of Ephesus had special opportunities for knowing the truth) in a letter written to Victor, bishop of Rome, about 193 A.D., speaks of 'John who was both a witness and a teacher, who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord, and, being a priest, wore the sacerdotal plate. He fell asleep at Ephesus.'

Tertullian, 200 A.D., and Clement of Alexandria, 200 A.D., give similar evidence.

There are two main difficulties, which are held by some to throw a considerable doubt upon the truth of this tradition. (1) The ninth-century Chronicle of Georgius Hamartolos says, 'Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, declares in the second book of the Oracles of the Lord that John was put to death by the Jews.' Of course if Papias (130 A.D.) did say this, and if the execution of John took place in Palestine, the Ephesian ministry of the Apostle is excluded. But it is significant that the earlier ecclesiastical writers, most of whom, like Ireneaus and Eusebius, were diligent students of Papias, seem to know nothing of this supposed Palestinian martyrdom of John, and, on the contrary, represent him as surviving all the other Apostles, and dying a natural death in extreme old age at Ephesus. Probably Georgius has misinterpreted some obscure statement of Papias, whose style is always slovenly, and often ambiguous. (2) Among the personal disciples of Jesus, according to Papias, were two Johns, John the Apostle and John the Presbyter (or Elder). It is suggested by some that the John who settled at Ephesus and was the instructor of Polycarp, was not the Apostle, but the Presbyter. This view does not seem very probable. We are not told that the Presbyter had any connexion with Asia, and it hardly seems credible that Ireneaus, who was a hearer of Polycarp, can have so completely misunderstood his Master's references to John, as to suppose that he meant the Apostle when he really meant the Presbyter.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

INTRODUCTION

1. Plan and Purpose. (1) Acts represents the exact religious standpoint of St. Paul. Its theme, the expansion of Christianity from a Jewish sect into a world-wide religion, is in fact St. Paul's own ideal, in pursuit of which he broke every hindering tie, and strained every faculty of mind and body for upwards of thirty years. The keynote of the book is struck at once in 18, 'Ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.' These words, uttered by the risen Lord, fell at the time upon dull and inattentive ears. At first the Twelve realised only their mission to the house of Israel. It required a special revelation to procure the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, and a three-repeated vision to induce the reluctant Peter to baptise Cornelius. Even when these important steps had been taken, the Twelve showed such hesitation to undertake aggressive work among the Gentiles, that the Lord of the Church raised up a thirteenth apostle to champion Gentile rights, and to inaugurate a more liberal policy. This 'chosen vessel,' converted by a special miracle, and endowed with an authority independent of the Twelve, broke through the old prejudices which still hampered the original disciples, founded flourishing Gentile Churches, in which the Law was no longer observed, in the most important eastern provinces of the Empire, and, at the date when the book closes (about 61 A.D.), was proclaiming the gospel in the great western capital itself.

The book is thus a defence of Gentile Christianity and of its great originator and advocate, St. Paul, of whom the author was a companion and enthusiastic admirer. What Boswell was to Johnson, that this unnamed writer was to St. Paul. Just as Johnson owes the affectionate regard of posterity in no small measure to the labours of his faithful and admiring biographer Boswell, so St. Paul owes his place of esteem in the minds of subsequent generations as the ideal Christian hero and missionary very largely to the author of Acts. The Pauline Epistles may teach us more of the Apostle's inner life, but it is Acts which gives us those outward facts which make him live before us as an actual character on the scene of history.

(2) But the writer of Acts has still a further purpose. He recognises in a manner quite remarkable for so thoroughgoing a supporter of St. Paul, the immense value and importance of the work of St. Peter and the earlier Apostles. It is probable that when he wrote (about 61 A.D.), there still lingered in Gentile Churches some suspicion of the opinions and methods of the Twelve, and in the Judaic Churches of Palestine some dislike and distrust of the Apostle of the Gentiles. This the writer deliberately determined to remove. He therefore divided his book into two distinct sections, chs. 1–12, in which the chief hero is St. Peter, and chs. 13–28 in which the chief hero is St. Paul. He intended his Gentile readers by a perusal of chs. 1–12 to be brought to understand and to admire St. Peter, and his Jewish Christian readers by a perusal of the rest of the book to be brought to understand St. Paul. True to his purpose of acting as a peacemaker, he places both his heroes in the most attractive possible light, passes lightly over the past differences and misunderstandings (e.g. he omits the serious dispute between Peter and Paul at Antioch, Gal. 2:11, altogether), and dwells far more upon the points of agreement than upon the points of difference between two great Christian parties.

(3) There are reasons for thinking that the author intended his work to be also a kind of apology for Christianity addressed to the heathen world. Without going to the length of supposing, as some do, that it was intended to be produced and read at St. Paul's trial as a formal vindication of the Apostle and his religion against the misrepresentations of his accusers, we may still discern in almost every chapter a desire to influence favourably Gentile readers, especially those belonging to the cultured and official classes. The author is well equipped for his task. He writes as an educated man to educated men. He opens his book with a short preface and dedication in the approved classical manner. He writes in a style which, if not the purest Attic Greek, is still graceful, easy, refined, and forcible. It is not only superior to any other Greek in the NT., but it compares favourably with that of many of the best profane authors of the age, and is far superior to the Greek of the early patristic writers, such as St. Clement of Rome, the author of the so-called Second Epistle of Clement, the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, and even to that of such professional scholars as Aristides and St. Justin Martyr. An educated pagan, happening to peruse Acts, could not fail to recognise that some at least of the despised Galileans were persons of culture and refinement. Our author is in close sympathy with the best side of heathen life and religion, recognising that even the worshippers of the false gods of pagan Greece and Rome were feeling after the true God if haply they might find Him, and that He had not left Himself entirely without witness even in the gross darkness of degrading superstition (14:16 17:97; cp. Ro 1:20). His attempts to conciliate the official and power-holding classes, in whose hands was the actual administration of the Empire, by representing St. Paul as a peaceable and law-abiding subject, proud of his Roman citizenship, and, so far from cherishing disloyal designs against the Imperial Government, continually and successfully appealing to its aid against the hostile machinations of the turbulent Jews (18:14 19:35-16 21:32 22:29 23:29 24:26 25:16-20 26:37 27:14 27:4, 42 28:7, 10, 15, 20).

2. Value of the Book. To modern readers the chief value of Acts is that it is the only authentic record which we possess of the first thirty-five years of the history of the Christian Church. With the exception of a few meagre hints in St. Paul's Epistles, Acts is absolutely our only first-century authority for the momentous events which followed the Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord. Even from the purely secular point of view, the process by which an obscure Jewish sect expanded into a world-wide Church, is a subject full of interest; but for Christians, who believe that the process was part of God's gracious purpose for the salvation and regeneration of the world, the subject possesses an interest and attractiveness altogether unique.

3. Trustworthiness and Historical Character of the Narrative. Modern scholars apply tests of great stringency to ancient historical writings which profess to embody the evidence of eyewitnesses or contemporaries. Every statement made in such writings which can possibly be tested, is scrutinised and compared with the statements of other ancient writings of undoubted authority, also with the now very voluminous and valuable evidence of inscriptions, monuments, and coins. If the writer's statements which can be tested are found upon the whole to be accurate and reliable, credit is also given to his statements which cannot be tested, and his work is pronounced to be a valuable authority for the events therein recorded. If, however, his statements which can be tested are found to be frequently false or inaccurate, his work is pronounced unauthentic and unreliable.

These tests have been applied with great and increasing rigour during the last half-century to the remains of Christian antiquity, especially to those of a narrative character, like Acts. Tried by these tests, the various apocryphal Acts, e.g. the Acts of Andrew, the Acts of John, the Acts of Paul, the Acts of Peter, the Acts of Thomas, the Acts of Paul and Thecla, and the Preaching of Peter, have been demonstrated to be forgeries. But the canonical Acts of the Apostles has emerged from the ordeal with its reputation established. The book is full of geographical and political notices which admit of definite proof or disproof, and in practically every case (the statement about Thessalus, 5:65, is a possible exception) the author has proved to be right. Thus he knows that Cyprus was at this time governed by a proconsul (AV 'deputy'), whose name is correctly given as Sergius Paulus (see 13:7); that Philippa was a Roman colony, having magistrates called 'pretors' (AV magistrates'), attended by 'lictors' (AV 'sergeants') (16:20, 25); that the magistrates of Thessalonica were called 'politarchs' (AV 'rulers') (17:4); that the ruler of Malta was called 'primus' (AV 'chief man') (28:7); that there were officers of the province of Asia called 'Asiarchs' (AV 'the chief of Asia') (19:31), with whose functions he is also familiar; that at Athens questions of religion were under the supervision of the 'Areopagus' (17:19); that Derbe and Lystra, but not Iconium, were cities of Lycaonia (14:4); that Ephesus was 'neocores' (AV 'a worshipper,' RV 'temple-keeper') to the temple of Artemis, and that political power was exercised by the 'demos' ('people') meeting in the 'lawful assembly,' presided over by an influential officer called the 'secretary' (AV 'town clerk'); that the inhabitants of Ephesus were addicted to magic (19:18), etc. He thoroughly understands the Jewish Sanhedrin, its functions and its parties; the position of the chief priests, of the Temple guard, of the Roman garrison in the fortress Antonia, and of the Herodian princes at Jerusalem. He is, moreover, familiar with Roman law, the procedure of Roman tribunals, and the rights and privileges of Roman citizens, e.g. freedom from binding and scourging, and the right of appealing to the Emperor. He seems also to be correct (though further evidence is desirable) in his allusions to the Italic and Augustan 'cohorts' (AV 'bands') at Caesar (10:1 271), and to the imperial troops called 'frumentarii,' whose head-quarters were on the Cælian Hill at Rome. He is well acquainted with navigation, and his account of the voyage to Rome has been shown to be true in every detail by professional navigators who have sailed over the course with the express purpose of investigating its accuracy. We may add that the author's allusion to the popular belief at Lystra that Zeus and Hermes (Jupiter and Mercurius) were accustomed to visit the earth in human form, and his descriptions of the temple and priest of 'Zeus propolis' and of the attempted sacrifice to the Apostles, are thoroughly true to life, and have every appearance of historical truth (14:8).

The natural inference from these facts is that either the author himself was a contemporary and an eyewitness, or that his book is based upon and closely follows the evidence of contemporaries and eyewitnesses.

4. Authorship. (1) Internal evidence. The book is anonymous, but from internal evidence it is possible to gain much information about, and perhaps to identify, the author. Certain sections (16:10-17 20:4-19 21:1-18 27:1-28:16; also, in the D text, 11:28) are written in the first person plural, and are hence called 'the we-sections.' From them we learn that the author was a native of Antioch, and one of the earliest converts in that place (11:28 D text); also that he became a companion of St. Paul during the Second Missionary Journey. Joining the Apostle at Troas (16:10), he accompanied him to Philippa, where he was left behind, seemingly in pastoral charge of the newly-established Church (17:1). There he remained some years, probably engaged in evangelising the district, until St. Paul revisited Philippa on his Third Missionary Journey. He then accompanied the Apostle to Cæsarea, and Jerusalem (20:6 21:14), and finally to Rome (c. 27).

Who was this companion? He cannot have been Silas (Silvanus), who was present at the Council of Jerusalem (15:22), and would therefore have used the first person in describing it; nor Timothy, who is spoken of in the third person (17:14); nor Titus, who was a companion of the Apostle before the we-sections begin (Gal 2:9), and therefore, had he been the author, would have begun the we-sections earlier. There remains Luke, who, in harmony with the indications of Acts, appears as a companion of St. Paul only in the later Epistles (Col 4:14 Philemon v. 24 2 Tim 4:11), and who was certainly, as Acts indicates, with St. Paul at Rome (Col 4:14 Philemon v. 24).

In Col 4:14, Luke is called the 'beloved physician,' and this again suits the author of Acts, who has an unusual (probably a professional) knowledge of medicine, and shows considerable acquaintance with the technical terms of the Greek medical writers (for instances see 37:9 18:12 28:13 31:1 288, etc.). Internal evidence, therefore, points with certainty to a companion of St. Paul, and with considerable probability to St. Luke, as the author.

(2) External evidence. The internal evidence is decisively confirmed by the external. Thus (a) the author of Acts is certainly also the author of the Third Gospel. The common dedication to Theophilus, the reference to a 'former treatise' of a scope and character exactly answering to the Gospel, the absolute identity of style spirit and Pauline standpoint, and, we may add, the common exhibition of unusual medical knowledge, point decisively to common authorship, and since the Gospel is ascribed by very ancient tradition to St. Luke, Acts must also be his. (b) Acts was received by all ancient authorities as the unquestioned work of Luke, the companion of Paul. Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and the Muratorian fragment (cir. 200 A.D.) all ascribe it to Luke. A little earlier Ireneaus (177 A.D.) transcribes long passages from it into his work, 'Against Heresies.' There are also practically certain references to it in the works of Clement of Rome (95 A.D.), Polycarp (110 A.D.), and in the Epistle of the Churches of Gaul (177 A.D.). This strong combination of internal and external evidence raises the Luonian authorship to a practical certainty.

The suggestion of certain critics that only the 'we-sections' are the work of a companion of St. Paul, and that the rest of the book is by another and much later writer, cannot be taken very seriously. A uniform and easily recognisable style pervades the whole book, so that if any of it is by a companion of St. Paul, the whole is.

It is probably unnecessary to say much about the theory of F. C. Baur and the Tubingen school that Acts is an unauthentic romance of the middle of the second century. Recent research has tended so strongly to confirm the antiquity and credibility of Acts, that the theory in question has been generally abandoned even in the circle in which it originated.

5. Date. The most natural date to assign to Acts is towards the close of the first Roman imprisonment (cir. 61 A.D.). It is hard to believe that if St. Paul's trial had actually taken place when the book was written, the author would have failed to mention the result.

So early a date, however, involves some difficulties. It throws back the date of St. Luke's Gospel to 60, perhaps to 56 or 57, and St. Mark's (which St. Luke used) still further. To many critics these dates seem altogether too early. Holding as they do, that St. Luke's Gospel contains indications (see on Lk 21) that it was not composed till after the fall of Jerusalem, 70 A.D., they date the Gospel shortly after 70, and Acts towards the close of the decade 70-80. We may fairly leave the question open, with a preference for the former view.

6. The Text. The codex Bezae (D) and certain other authorities, generally called 'western,' exhibit a text so different from that either of the RV or the AV, that it may almost be said to constitute a different edition of the book. The chief 'western' variations are at 8:57
20:13 21:1, 6, where the notes should be consulted. The Bezan variations give additional particulars, which in nearly all cases seem to be authentic. We attribute them, therefore, if not to St. Luke himself, at any rate to some well-informed writer of the apostolic or sub-apostolic age.

7. Sources. For the early history of the Church of Jerusalem, there was available the testimony of St. Mark, who was certainly with St. Luke at Rome (Col 10:14); also the testimony of Philip, with whom St. Luke stayed ‘many days’ at Caesarea (21:10). During the long waiting at Caesarea, St. Luke doubtless visited Jerusalem, and obtained additional information from James, John, Peter, and others. His knowledge of St. Paul’s career was of course obtained from St. Paul himself, and from his own experiences as his companion.

8. Theology of Acts. The extremely primitive and simple character of the theology of Acts is a strong proof of the authenticity of the record. The great dogmatic Epistles of St. Paul had already appeared when Acts was written, but hardly the faintest trace of their characteristic expressions occurs in the author’s narrative.

(1) Christology. The Apostles insist that Jesus is the expected Messiah. His Messiah-ship is proved partly from prophecy and partly from the fact of the Resurrection. In general it is declared that ‘to Him give all the prophets witness;’ and again, ‘yea, and all the prophets from Samuel, and them that followed after as many as have spoken, they also told of these days.’ In particular Moses (Dt 18:15) is quoted as to our Lord’s prophetic office, and Joel (2:28) as to the outpouring of the Spirit in the age of the Messiah. But most of the quotations are from the Psalms. Ps 16:10 is quoted both by St. Peter and St. Paul as a proof of the Resurrection; and Ps 27 by St. Paul in the same sense (see Ac 13:38). Ps 132:11 is quoted to prove the Davidic descent of the Messiah, and Ps 110:1 to illustrate the Ascension. Ps 118:22 (‘the stone which the builders rejected’) is also applied to Jesus as in the Gospels. But the great proof of the Messiahship of Jesus is the crowning miracle of His Resurrection, which is appealed to on every occasion with the greatest confidence. In the house of Cornelius Peter claims to have eaten and drunk with Jesus after He rose from the dead (10:41). On the day of Pentecost Peter says, ‘This Jesus did God raise up, whereof we all are witnesses’ (2:33), and in general the history declares, ‘with great power gave the Apostles their witness to the Resurrection of the Lord Jesus’ (4:30).

But faith in our Lord’s Messiahship was intended by the Apostles to lead on (as it had in their own case) to faith in our Lord’s Divinity. The indications that Jesus was already regarded as a Divine Person are neither few nor insignificant. Such titles as ‘the prince of life,’ ‘Lord of all,’ ‘Judge of quick and dead,’ and ‘Saviour,’ are only really applicable to one who is divine. More significant still is the practice of prayer to Christ. The dying Stephen invoked not God, but Jesus, to forgive his murderers and to receive his spirit (7:59 R.V.). ‘The Christians even received their name from their practice of praying to Jesus (9:14 9:21 22:10). In that age, among a people trained to regard God as the only lawful object of religious devotion, and to guard His unique prerogatives with the utmost jealousy, prayer to Jesus clearly implied that He was within the Godhead. Another significant indication of what was believed about Jesus within the Church is contained in the confidential address of St. Paul to the elders of Ephesus (20:38). There, according to the best reading (see RV), St. Paul said to the elders, ‘Feed the Church of God, which He purchased with His own blood,’ thus expressly assigning the divine name to Jesus. It is somewhat remarkable that the title ‘the Son (huios) of God,’ so common in the Gospels and Epistles, never occurs in the early speeches in Acts. Its place is taken by another word, paies (3:15, 20 4:25, 27, 30), which the AV also translates ‘Son,’ but the RV ‘servant.’ Both translations are supported by good modern authorities. The Gospel title, ‘Son of God’ (huios), occurs only in the (probably genuine) confession of the eunuch (8:37), and in the preaching of St. Paul (9:20 13:38).

Characteristic of Acts is the stress laid upon the continued activity of the Ascended Lord, who is regarded as still carrying on from heaven the work which He began on earth.

(2) The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit. Much prominence is given to the activity of the Holy Spirit, who is regarded mainly as the Spirit of the Ascended Christ. Although He is a ‘gift’ of Christ to believers (2:38), His will and personality are strongly marked (5:29, 30 10:19 11:12 13:2 16:7 20:23 21:11 28:26), as also is His Divinity (5:34). The doctrines of the personality and divinity of the Spirit, however, are not as yet thrown into definite theological language.

(3) Universalism. The writer strongly sympathises with St. Paul’s view that the obligation of the Ceremonial Law had been abrogated by Christ, and that Gentiles ought to be to St. Paul's opponents, and never uses bitter language against them. The tone of his book is generous and conciliatory. He does full justice to St. Peter and St. James and the other apostles of the circumcision; see § 1.

(4) Petrine and Pauline Theology. It is a proof of the accuracy of the writer that the speeches of Peter and Paul reflect the characteristic ideas of the speakers; but yet so naturally and unobtrusively that it is obvious that the writer has not copied their Epistles. The speeches of St. Peter have many points of contact with 1 Peter (see on 2:14), and those of St. Paul have recognisable, though by no means close, coincidences with the Pauline Epistles.

PART 1

The Establishment and Progress of the Church at Jerusalem (Chs. 1–8)

CHAPTER 1

The Ascension. Election of Matthias
1–5. St. Luke's Introduction. He recapitulates the general contents of his Gospel, adding, however, this additional information, (1) that the appearances of the risen Lord were numerous, and (2) that forty days elapsed between not possible while He was still in the flesh (Jn 14:12). 2. Through the Holy Ghost] St. Luke represents all the actions of Christ’s ministry as performed by the power of the Holy Spirit, which He received at His Baptism to consecrate Him to His office of Messiah: see 10:38. Commandments] viz. to preach repentance and remission of sins to all nations beginning at Jerusalem, and to tarry in the city until they should be endowed with power from on high (Lk 24:47).

3. Many infallible proofs] RV omits ‘infallible,’ but the Gk. implies that they were reliable and convincing. The ‘many’ is important, for St. Luke records only four appearances, all in Judea: see art. ‘The Resurrection.’

Forty days] i.e. at intervals during forty days. The kingdom of God] Sometimes ‘the Kingdom of God’ denotes the inward and spiritual aspects of Christianity, sometimes Christianity as organised into a visible Kingdom or Church. Both meanings are here blended. The departing Lord doubtless wished to give the Apostles spiritual instructions to prepare them to receive the Holy Spirit, and also special directions for the future government of His Church: see intro. to Mt, § 6 (5), and prefatory remarks to Mt 5. 4. And, being assembled] rather, ‘and while sitting at meat with them’: see RM and cp. Mk 16:14. The fact of the risen Lord’s eating is attested also by Lk 24:42, where Jesus eats ‘before the disciples; and the sitting at table by Ac 10:41.

The promise of the Father] i.e. the promised gift of the Holy Ghost which was to be bestowed at Pentecost: see Lk 24:49.

5. Baptized with the Holy Ghost] There can be little doubt that the Apostles had already received baptism, not only from John, but also from Jesus Himself: see Jn 3:21, 25 4:1-2. But Christian Baptism was not yet, in the full sense, a Baptism ‘with the Holy Ghost and with fire,’ because, Jesus being not yet glorified, the Holy Ghost could not yet be fully given (Jn 7:39).

6–11. The Ascension. Belief in the Ascension of Jesus follows necessarily from belief in His Resurrection. If Jesus rose from the dead not with a natural, but with a spiritual body (and this is undoubtedly the doctrine of Holy Scripture), then it was impossible for Him to remain permanently on earth. The translation of His body to that sphere of existence to which it now properly belonged, was both natural and necessary. The Ascension is only described in detail in the present passage. The allusion to it in Lk 24:43, though probable, is not certain, and that in Mk 16:19 is not by the writer of the Second Gospel. The paucity of allusions to the Ascension in the NT. is probably due to the fact that it was not accompanied by any change in the condition of Jesus. It was on the first day of His Resurrection, not on the fortieth, that Jesus was glorified and invested with all authority in heaven and on earth (Mt 28:18); hence the event of Ac 1:9 was regarded by the Apostles as of secondary importance. In the Ascension, as in the Resurrection, Christ is the firstfruits of the human race, opening the Kingdom of heaven to all believers. He is also, as ascended, the high priest and intercessor of humanity, pleading on man’s behalf, before the eternal Father, His completed sacrifice (Heb 7, 8).

6. They therefore] These words imply that at the common meal which the risen Lord shared with His Apostles (v. 4), He made an appointment with them to meet Him on the day of His Ascension. The Galilean meeting described by St. Matthew (28:16), and mentioned by St. Mark, was also by appointment.

Restore . . . the kingdom] i.e. make the Jewish nation independent of Rome, and dominant, politically and religiously, over all the nations of the earth. This was the current Messianic expectation of the Jews, and the fact that the author represents the Apostles as still entertaining it, is a mark of the historical truth of his narrative. It needed the Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit to teach the Apostles that the Christ’s Kingdom is not of this world. The answer of Jesus implies that He will restore the Kingdom to Israel; not, however, to ‘Israel after the flesh,’ as the Apostles imagined, but to ‘the Israel of God,’ i.e. to Christian believers of every nation, by making Christianity the dominant religion throughout the world.

7. It is not for you] The Apostles were to be not so much prophets of the future, as witnesses of the past. Hath put in his own power] see on Mk 13:52. There is another possible translation of these words: ‘which the Father appointed by His own power.’ 8. Samaria, etc.] Jesus here revokes the temporary limitation of the mission of the Apostles to the Jews (Mt 10:5, 6). This passage is one of the many proofs that Jesus intended to found a universal religion.

9. A cloud received him] The visible and corporal Ascension does not necessarily imply that heaven is a place situated above the clouds. The object of the Ascension was not to indicate where or what heaven is, but to assure the Apostles by an unmistakable sign that Jesus had entered it. It is possible that heaven is not, strictly speaking, a place, but a condition. 10. Two men] certainly angels, as in Lk 24:

11. Why stand] It is fruitless to gase. Go rather and labour, that when He comes again in judgment He may approve your work. In Like manner] i.e. in glory, and in His human nature: cp. this Jesus above.

12.-14. The waiting Church.

12. Olivet] lit. 'the olive-orchard'; called usually The Mount of Olives. This, the scene of Christ's agony and betrayal, is now made the scene of His triumph. A sabbath day's journey] i.e. 2,000 cubits, or 6 furlongs.

13. An upper room] RV 'the upper chamber,' probably that in which the Last Supper had been eaten; not, as some have argued from Lk 24:48, a chamber in the Temple. It may have been in the house of Mary the mother of Mark: see 12:12. Peter, etc.] see on Mt 10:24. The brother of James] RV correctly, 'the son of James.'

14. With one accord] Unanimity and common action distinguish the Christian community in Acts. This characteristic expression (Gk. homothumadon) occurs again 2:46 4:24 5:12 7:57 8:2 12:20 15:25 18:13 18:30, and nowhere else in the NT, except in Ro 16:6. In prayer] add (from Lk 24:50) 'and praise.' The women] viz. those who had accompanied Jesus in Galilee, and ministered to Him of their substance. Among them probably were Mary of Magdala, Joanna, and Susanna (Lk 8:2, 3); Mary the mother of James and John, and Salome the wife of Zebedee (Mk 15:40); possibly Martha and Mary of Bethany; and almost certainly Mary the mother of Mark (12:21), who, perhaps, was hostess. Mary the mother of Jesus] The last mention of the Blessed Virgin in the sacred history. Of her subsequent life nothing certain is known. His brethren] see on Mt 12:28-50.

15-36. The election of Matthias. As the Church was about to be established on a durable and permanent basis, it was necessary that the twelve foundations on which it was to rest (Eph 2:20 Rev 21:14) should be made complete. Matthias, therefore, was chosen to fill the place of the traitor Judas; the twelfth Patriarch of the new Israel of God.

15. Peter] Peter, having been restored by Jesus to the office forfeited by his triple apostasy (Jn 21:17), resumes his old rank as leader of the Apostles. This leadership was probably personal, not official: see on Mt 16:18.

16. Must needs] RV 'It was needful that the scripture should be fulfilled.' Just as the scandal and stumbling-block of the death of Jesus was diminished by the discovery that it was foretold in the OT, and was part of the determinate counsel of God (Lk 24:44, 46 Ac 2:23 3:17, 18, etc.), so the scandal of the fall of an Apostle was relieved by the discovery that David had foretold it in the Psalms: cp. Jn 13:18 Mt 26:24. Peter quotes Ps 69:28 and 109:8. David really spoke of his own enemies, perhaps (in Ps 109) of Ahithophel, but Peter regards the words as a typical prophecy of the treachery of Judas. 17. Part] RV 'his portion' (lit. 'lot,' Gk. kleros). In Patriotic Greek the word designates the clergy.

18, 19. These vv. are, of course, a note by St. Luke, not a part of St. Peter's speech. For the historical difficulties see on Mt 27:8-10.

20. Bishopric] RV 'office' (Ps 69:28 109:8). 21, 22. St. Peter names two qualifications of an Apostle, (1) to have followed Jesus from the day of His Baptism by John to the day of His Ascension; (2) to have been a witness of His Resurrection. The former of St. Peter's requirements excludes St. Paul, who had some difficulty on this account in establishing his claim to be an Apostle. 23. The Apostles might doubtless have added Matthias to their number on their own authority, but instead of doing so they consulted the brethren, thus introducing a popular element into the polity of the Church: see on 6:5-6. Two] The disciples (probably because the Holy Spirit had not yet been received) did not venture to make a final choice, but left the decision to God. Joseph called Barsabas] RV 'Barsabas,' i.e. Joseph, son of Sabba, is probably brother of the Judas Barsabas mentioned in 15:28. His surname 'Justus' is Roman, and was assumed in accordance with a not uncommon practice of the Jews at this time: cp. 'Marcus' (12:12), 'Niger' (131), 'Paulus' (139). Acc. to Papias, this Joseph drank a draught of poison without receiving injury. Matthias] lit. 'gift of Jehovah.' This apostle is not again mentioned in the NT.

24. They prayed] This, the first recorded Christian prayer, is probably addressed to Jesus Himself. For, (1) prayer to Jesus was no exceptional thing, but a usual practice of the Apostolic Church (see 9:14); and (2) it was appropriate that He who had chosen eleven of the apostles should be invoked to choose the twelfth. 25. His own place] St. Peter speaks with merciful reserve, but probably means Hell ('Gehenna'). The same euphemism is found in rabbinical writings. 26. Gave forth their lots] RV 'gave lots for them'; RM 'gave lots unto them.' The two names were probably written on tablets, and shaken in a vessel until one of them dropped out. The use of the sacred lot (Urim) was common from the age of Moses to that of David, but afterwards it fell into disuse. This solitary example of its revival, occurring, as it did, before the descent of the Holy Spirit, is not to be regarded as a precedent.

THE DAY OF PENTECOST

1-13. Pentecost. On this day the risen Lord fulfilled His promise to send another Comforter (or Advocate) 'that He may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive; for it beholdeth Him not, neither knoweth Him; but ye know Him; for He abideth with you, and shall be in you' (Jn 14:17). Primarily, Pentecost is to be regarded as the Consecration of the Church for its work of evangelising the world. The fiery tongues which lighted upon the Apostles symbolised the gift of 'boldness with fervent zeal constantly to preach the gospel unto all nations; whereby we have been brought out of darkness and error unto the clear light and true knowledge of Thee, and of Thy Son Jesus Christ.' To assist in the work of evangelising the world, the gift of prophecy (i.e. of inspired preaching) was given, nor was this gift confined to the Apostles, for 'I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams.' The books of the NT. remain to testify that this gift of prophecy was a real one. We must also believe (although St. Luke does not allude to the fact) that on the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit was given as a principle of inward spiritual life. The Lord Jesus had definitely promised this at the Last Supper. He said that the Holy Spirit would come to dwell with them and within them for ever, and that He Himself would return with the coming of the Spirit to dwell in their hearts by faith. This Spirit was to be their Advocate with the Father, to teach them all things, to bring to their remembrance all things that Jesus had told them, and to guide them into all the truth. The Spirit was also to have a mission to those without. Through the earnest utterances of believers, He would 'convict the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment,' and a beginning of this process was seen, when the hearers of St. Peter's first sermon were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and the rest of the Apostles, Brethren, what shall we do?' At Pentecost a new spirit entered the world, and began to transform it. That spirit is still at work, and the most sceptical cannot deny its presence or its power. Men may attempt to account for it by natural causes, but it is there, and history teaches us that it comes to us from Jesus of Nazareth, who, as Dr. Lecky says, 'has not only been the highest pattern of virtue, but the highest incentive to its practice, and has exerted so deep an influence that it may be truly said that the simple record of three short years of active life has done more to regenerate and to soften mankind, than all the disquisitions of philosophers, and than all the exhortations of moralists.'

1. Pentecost] so called because it was the fiftieth day from the first day of the Passover. It was also called 'the Feast of Weeks,' because it occurred a week of weeks (i.e. seven weeks) after the Passover. It marked the completion of the corn harvest, and according to the later Jews it commemorated the giving of the Law on Sinai. The characteristic ritual of this feast was the offering and waving of two leavened loaves of wheaten flour, together with a sin offering, burnt offerings, and peace offerings (Lv 23:15-20). Appropriately, therefore, on this day the gospel harvest began; and the old Law of ordinances was superseded by the new Law of love.

2. A sound] The miraculous accompaniments of the outpouring of the Spirit were intended partly to strengthen the faith of the Apostles in the reality of the gift, and partly to arrest the attention of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

3. Cloven tongues] RV 'tongues parting asunder, like as of fire.' St. Luke means that the tongues or flames of fire appeared first in one mass over the assembled Church, and then divided, one flame or tongue resting upon the head of each disciple. The mighty wind symbolised the power and energy of the Spirit, and the tongues of fire the fervour with which the disciples were empowered to proclaim the gospel.

4. To speak with other tongues] We should not gather from the references to the gift of tongues in St. Paul (1Cor 12-14) and in the appendix to St. Mark (16:17), that the gift in question was the power of speaking foreign languages. Nor do foreign languages appear to have been spoken when Cornelius and his companions spoke with tongues and magnified God (Ac 10:46), nor when the twelve men at Ephesus, upon whom St. Paul had laid hands, 'spake with tongues and prophesied' (196). Many, therefore, are of opinion—especially since St. Peter compares the case of Cornelius and his companions with the event at Pentecost (11:15)—that in this passage also the speaking with tongues is not to be understood as a speaking in foreign languages, but as some kind of ecstatic utterance of praise, not fully under the control of the speaker. This view is plausible, but difficult to reconcile with the prind facie meaning of the present passage. In v. 6 it is said that the multitude were confounded, 'because that every man heard them speak in his own language.' Again in v. 7 the multitude ask, 'Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans? And how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?' (see also v. 11). The meaning surely must be that the disciples either spoke, or that they seemed to their hearers to speak, foreign languages. This being so, we are constrained to believe, either that St. Luke has misunderstood the nature of the event, or that this Pentecostal miracle was of a higher more extraordinary character than the 'speaking with tongues.' Among modern parallels the most suggestive is the case of Vincent Ferrer, who, when preaching in Italy, is said to have been understood by Irish, Flemish, French, and Italian hearers further on 1 Cor 12-14. We may see in event, which seemed to obliterate the iers of nationality and language, a reversal be separation and confusion of tongues 11).

Strangers of Rome] RV 'sojourners from me.' They probably possessed the Roman ship, like St. Paul. Jewish prisoners e brought to Rome by Pompey, but they regained their freedom, and settled, with civic rights, in a district beyond the Tiber. 19 A.D. they were banished, but, after the of Sejanus, were allowed to return.

4-41. St. Peter's sermon and its effects. Peter's sermon falls into four divisions: 1) vv. 14-21. Explanation of the phenomenon of speaking with tongues as a manifestation of the outpouring of the Spirit foretold the prophet Joel, JI 2: 28. (2) vv. 22-28. St. Peter shows that the outpouring of the Spirit connected with the life and work of Jesus Nazareth, whom, after His crucifixion by less men, God raised from the dead, accord-the ordinance is rightly received (22,16; cp. 10,16,47 13,18 Heb 10,22; also 1 Cor 6,11 5,25,26). The gift of the Holy Ghost] It is to be inferred from 8,15-17 19,6, cp. Heb 6,4, that the Holy Ghost was given by the laying on of the Apostles' hands.

42-47. The life and worship of the first converts. The converts were still earnest Jews, attending the services in the Temple daily (v. 46), but they already formed a Church within a Church: for (1) they continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine (v. 42), i.e. they no longer regarded the chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees as their accredited teachers, but rather the Apostles. Thus the breach with Judaism had already begun in principle. (2) They continued steadfastly in the breaking of bread, i.e. in celebrating the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion. At first the Lord's Supper was celebrated daily (v. 46), but afterwards every Lord's Day at least (20,17). (4) They continued steadfastly in the prayers, i.e. in the prayers offered at the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and at the other services of the Church (so the RV). The AV, however, translates 'in prayers,' which would include private prayers also.

42. In prayers] lit. 'in the prayers,' i.e. the public prayers of the Church. These would probably be partly liturgical, after the example of the Temple and the Synagogue (cp. the liturgical addition to the Lord's Prayer, Mt 6,10 AV), and partly extempore. Extempore prayer was allowed to be offered at the celebration of the Lord's Supper by the Christian prophets (see the 'Didache'), and was apparently still in use in the age of Justin Martyr (150 A.D.), but shortly after this the public prayers of the Church became exclusively liturgical.

44. Were together] probably they had common meals. Had all things common] This arrangement was not exactly what we call communism, for, (1) the sale of property was voluntary, the result of a spontaneous outflowing of Christian love (5,4); and (2) even when property had been sold, the money usually remained in the hands of the vendor, to be distributed to the poorer saints from time to time 'as every man had need' (v. 45). The cases of Barnabas and of Ananias and Sapphira, who not only sold property, but even laid the money at the Apostles' feet, were exceptional, and because exceptional are specially noted by the evangelist. '46. Breaking bread from house to house] RV 'breaking bread at home,' probably in the 'upper room' where the Sacrament had been instituted, and the Holy Ghost had descended. The reference is probably to the Lord's Supper, and not to an ordinary meal; but it must be remembered that at this period the Lord's Supper was usually celebrated at the close of a sacred meal, called the agape or love-feast: see below. 47. And the Lord] RV 'And the Lord added to them' (RM 'together') day by day those that were being saved,' i.e. conscious of sin and seeking salvation.

The Love-Feast

It is clear from v. 46, and 1 Cor 11,20,1, that Holy Communion was at first celebrated in connexion with a common meal called agape, i.e. 'love-feast,' or 'feast of charity' (Jude v. 13). Our Lord had instituted the Sacrament at the close of a sacred banquet, and the Apostolic Church at first naturally followed His example. The feast was an afternoon or evening meal, at which rich and poor met together in the church, the food and drink being provided mainly by the rich. Prayers and benedictions, similar to those of the Jews, were said over each dish or course, and 'the kiss of charity' (1 Pet 5,14) probably concluded the meal. Then hands were washed, and there followed prayer and sacred psalmody under the leadership of a prophet or other minister. 'The breaking of bread,' or Holy Communion, seems to have followed (not preceded) the agape (1 Cor 11,22,26), and the agape and the Holy Communion were regarded as forming one service, called 'the Lord's Supper' (1 Cor 11,20). The abuses to which this arrangement gave rise (see 1 Cor 11), led, somewhat late in the apostolic age, to the gradual separation of the two rites. Already in the time of Pliny (115 A.D.) the Holy Communion was celebrated in the morning, and the agape in the evening; and Justin Martyr (150 A.D.), in describing the Holy Communion, makes no allusion to the agape, which was by that time an entirely separate ordinance.

The Lame Man Healed

1-26. Healing of the lame man. Speech of Peter. St. Luke here singles out from the multitude of 'wonders and signs done by the Apostles' (2,48), the one which led to the first persecution.

1. The ninth hour] The hours of prayer were the third (2,15), when the morning sacrifice was offered; the sixth (noon); and the ninth, the time of the evening sacrifice.

'Its height was fifty cubits, and its doors were forty cubits, and it was adorned in a more costly manner, having much richer and thicker plates of silver and gold than the others' (Josephus). 6. CHAPTER 4

ARREST OF PETER AND JOHN

1-22. Arrest of Peter and John. Peter’s speech before the Sanhedrin. The proceedings of the Apostles displeased the authorities, (1) because they taught the people (v. 2) without having received the education and ordination of rabbis (cp. v. 13); (2) because they preached the Resurrection, a doctrine particularly distasteful to the Sadducees, the dominant party among the influential members of the priesthood; (3) because they feared that the people would become inflamed with enthusiasm, and that this would lead to collisions with the Romans. It is a mark of historic truth that the chief opposition to the Apostles is here assigned to the Sadducees, who denied the Resurrection. The Pharisees, who affirmed it, were comparatively friendly (5:44 23:6), and not a few of them became Christians (15:5).

1. As they spake] Clearly John also addressed the people. The captian of the emple] a priest next in dignity to the high rist, having under him a body of priests and levites, who maintained order in the Temple.

The Sadducees] Most of the chief priests belonged to this party. They denied the oral traditions of the elders, the existence of angels and spirits, predestination and fate, the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the

5. Their rulers] A full and important meeting of the Sanhedrin was summoned.
Rules] = chief priest; ‘scribes’ = rabbis or lawyers, professional teachers of the Law.
Most of the scribes were Pharisees. ‘Elders’ = such members of the Sanhedrin as were neither chief priests nor scribes. 6. Anna the high priest[; see on Jn 18. John] An unknown person. But D reads 'Jonathan.' This is probably correct, for Jonathan was son of Anna, and succeeded Caiaphas.

Alexander[; is unknown.

8. Filled with the Holy Ghost[; in fulfilment of the promise Lk 12. 11. This is the stone] In Ps 118 the stone is Israel, which the heathen builders of the world's great empires reject and despise, but which nevertheless is destined to play the chief part in the world's history. In the NT, the stone is interpreted as the Messiah, and the builders as the rulers of the Jews: see Mt 21; cp. also Eph 2; 1 Pet 2. 12. Neither is there salvation in any other] Though salvation is offered to men through Jesus, and Jesus alone, it does not follow that those who are ignorant of His name are lost. God can save, through Christ, those who have never heard the gospel, if they respond to the degree of grace and enlightenment vouchsafed to them. 13. Unlearned and ignorant men] This rendering gives a false impression. What is meant is that the Apostles had not received the training of rabbis, and were consequently unskilled in rabbinical traditions, and had no authority to teach. 'Ignorant' should be translated 'private persons,' or, 'laymen.'

23-31. Prayer of the Apostles on their release. 24. With one accord] The prayer was probably led by St. Peter, the others repeating the words after him. 25. Who by the mouth] RV 'who by the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of our father David, didst say,' etc.

Why did the heathen rage? etc.] verbatim from Ps 21 (LXX). This Ps. is directly Messianic, though it may have been suggested by the historical circumstances of some actual Davidic king, e.g. Solomon. The people] RV 'the peoples,' i.e. the Jews, regarded either as consisting of twelve tribes, or as dispersed in different nations. Vain things] vain, because, though the enemies of Jesus seemed to triumph at His Crucifixion, God raised Him from the dead, and placed Him at His right hand in heaven. 27. Child] or, 'servant': see on 31. Were gathered together] add 'in this city' (RV).

28. Thy counsel] There is a theological difficulty here. God is said to have ordained the iniquitous proceedings of the scribes and Pharisees who condemned Jesus. The explanation is that God is said to have ordained what he foresees and permits. God permitted the death of Jesus, intending by it to redeem the world, and to destroy the works of the devil: cp. 23. 31. 39. That with all boldness they may speak thy word] rather, 'that with all boldness we may speak thy word.'

30. By stretching] RV 'while thou stretchest forth thy hand to heal.'

31. The place was shaken, etc.] The physical phenomena of Pentecost (see 29) were partly reproduced. They spoke the word] They continued their public preaching to the people, and their private exhortations to the disciples, in spite of the opposition of the Jewish authorities.

32. Neither said any of them] This expression shows that the Church of Jerusalem recognised the principle of private property. A disciple's property really was his own, but he did not say that it was his own; he treated it as if it were common property. The Anabaptist principle that private property is unlawful, finds no real support in the Acts. The communism was voluntary. 33. With great power] The expression suggests that the preaching was supported by miracles.

36. Josus] RV 'Joseph.' Barnabas] lit. 'the Son of Prophecy.' We learn from 13 that he was a prophet; and he probably gained his name 'Barnabas' from some specially comforting or consoling prophecy which he delivered to the Church of Jerusalem, soon after his conversion. A Levite] By the Mosaic Law Levites were forbidden to hold land in Palestine, but the regulation had been long in abeyance. Cyprus] from the time of Alexander the Great many Jews had settled in this fertile island. It is likely that Barnabas had been educated at the neighbouring university of Tarsus, and had there made the acquaintance of St. Paul: cp. 9. 27.

THE APOSTLES AGAIN IMPRISONED

1-16. The sin of Ananias and Sapphira was not keeping back part of the price, which they had a perfect right to do (v. 4), but pretending that the money which they offered to the Apostles was the whole price of the possession sold, which was not the case. Their motive was vanity and ambition. They wished to have a greater reputation for liberality than they were entitled to.

1. Ananias] i.e. 'Jehovah hath been gracious.' Sapphira] If the word is Greek it means 'sapphire'; if Aramaic, 'beautiful.' 3. The death of Ananias and Sapphira is to be regarded as an act of God, not of Peter, like the binding of Elymas (139). Peter acts, not on his own authority, but under the direct inspiration of the Holy Ghost, who informs him of the secret sin, and authorises him to execute the divine vengeance. Similarly St. Paul is inspired to pronounce sentence against Elymas. 4. Was it not thine own?] Clear proof that the apoic communism was voluntary. Unto God] unias had lied unto men, but the sin against 1 was so insignificant, compared with the sin against God, that St. Peter rhetorically calls it sin at all. 6. Wound him up] others render, 'composed his limbs.'

The truth of the narrative of Ananias and Sapphira is guaranteed by its painful racter. No historian would have gone out of his way to invent it. The punishment of the seems severe, but it must be remembered our Lord's most severe denunciations are against hypocrisy. To brand religious hypocrisy for all time as infamous, seems to the object of this miracle. It is not easy to suppose that Ananias and Sapphira were eternally lost. After this terrible retribution, they may have been forgiven.

2. In Solomon's porch] see 311. Solomon's temple was practically abandoned to the ristians, who made it their place of daily ady, the Apostles teaching and working acles there. 13. Of the rest] i.e. of the ristians. 15. The shadow] With this could be compared the faith of the Corinthians in the efficacy of the cloths that had shed St. Paul's body (1912). Something superstitious probably mingled with this, but true faith predominated, and God aopted it. 17-42. Second imprisonment of Peter in Speech of Gamaliel.

17. The Sadducees] see on Mt 37 Ac 41. 10. Words of this life] i.e. the new life which the Death, Resurrection and cension of our Lord had made possible to man. 22. To bring this man's blood upon ] viz. by causing the people to rise up and the gne of Jesus by slaying us.

9-32. Peter's speech is practically an epitome of previous speeches; see 419 318, 238, 315 314. 32. Were cut] lit. 'were sawn inder.' Took counsel] RV 'were minded.'

34. Gamaliel] St. Paul's teacher (228), grand- of Hillel and son of Rabbi Simeon, as by far the most influential rabbi of a time. He was the first of the seven chers who received the title Rabban (higher than Rab or Rabbi). Gamaliel's ordinance on this occasion is to be examined, (1) by his hostility to the Sadae, whom he would not allow to win a decisive triumph over a sect which had much common with the Pharisees; (2) by the vourable impression which the Apostles' teaching and miracles had upon him. e was not a convert, but thought that some- ing was to be said for the new teaching, obsequent developments, particularly the teaching of Stephen, probably alienated him, as he did the other Pharisees. 36. Thedas] he mention of this name is the greatest historical difficulty in the Acts. Gamaliel's speech was delivered 36 A.D. or earlier, but the insurrection of Thedas, according to Josephus, did not take place till some 10 years later (about 46 A.D.): see 'Antiq.' xx. 5, 1. Perhaps St. Luke alludes to an early Thedas, of whom we know nothing.

37. Judas of Galilee] raised an important rebellion in the days of the taxing, or 'enrolment' by Quirinius (6, 7 A.D.).

40. Beaten them] Probably with 'forty stripes save one,' a penalty inflicted upon St. Paul five times (2 Cor 11 24). They were punished for disobedience: see 418.

42. In every house] RV 'at home,' i.e. in the private Christian assemblies, held in 'the upper room' or elsewhere.

CHAPTER 6

STEPHEN AND THE SEVEN

1-7. The Hebrew-speaking Jews, who were in a majority in the Church of Jerusalem, were inclined to despise and neglect the minority who spoke Greek. In particular, the Greek-speaking widows received less food than their Hebrew-speaking sisters. This led to complaints, and the impartiality of the Apostles was called in question. The Apostles, finding the distribution of charity too great a burden for them, summoned a meeting of the Church, and called upon the brethren to elect seven men to undertake this business. The office to which they were appointed was in later times called the deaconate (Phil 11 1 Tim 38, 15); but the name had not yet come into use, and St. Luke consequently avoids it.

1. Grecians] i.e. Hellenists, or Greek-speaking Jews. Hebrews] i.e. Hebrew-speaking Jews. Hebrew was spoken mainly in Jerusalem and Judea. Ministration] i.e. distribution of food (v. 2). 2. It is not reason] rather, 'It does not please us.' Serve tables] i.e. attend to the distribution of food. Others think that the tables of bankers are meant, and that the Apostles complain that they cannot keep the accounts, or manage the finances of so large a community. 3. Full of the Holy Ghost] All Church work requires to be performed in the power of the Spirit, and not least the management of charity and finance.

Wisdom] i.e. the practical discernment and tact so necessary in the distribution of charity.

5. The names are all Greek, which suggests that some at least of them were Greek-speaking Jews. That all were Hellenists is not probable. Greek names were quite common even among the Hebrews (cp. Nicodemus, Philip, and Andrew). One, Nicolas, was a proselyte, i.e. doubtless a full circumcised proselyte. Of two only, Stephen and Philip, have we any further account. The appointment of the Seven marks the first stage in the growth of liberal ideas within the Church.

The differences between the Hellenistic (Grecian) Jews and the Hebrews are noteworthy. The Hellenists used the Gk. OT. (Septuagint): were educated more or less in the Greek manner; studied (though to a limited extent) Greek literature and philosophy, and adopted a more liberal attitude towards the Gentile world than the Hebrews. The typical representative of Hellenism is Philo, who makes Moses and the prophets speak the language of philosophy. Josephus also (in spite of his knowledge of Hebrew) has pronounced Hellenistic tendencies.

The essential element in ordination is prayer, and the laying on of hands by the chief ministers of the Church. The laying on of hands in making appointments is ancient. Thus 'Joshua was full of the spirit of wisdom because Moses had laid his hands upon him' (Nu 27:28-28, Dt 34:9).

8–15. The preaching, miracles, and arrest of Stephen.

The reason why the preaching of Stephen gave so much greater offence than that of the Twelve probably was that he saw that the coming of Christ virtually abrogated the Ceremonial Law, and that its abandonment was only a question of time. He thus anticipated St. Paul, perhaps even went beyond him at least in theory (see on v. 14). But as his speech gives no clear indications of such views, not even in 7:48, some suppose that he attacked the authority, not of the Law of Moses itself, but only of those traditional additions to it which the scribes held to be of equal or greater authority. Stephen was probably a Hellenist, and his opponents in the synagogues (v. 9) were also Hellenists.

8. Of faith] RV 'of grace.'

9. There are said to have been no less than 480 synagogues in Jerusalem, and the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, at any rate, would have been sufficiently numerous to have synagogues of their own. Libertines] lit. 'freedmen.' These were descendants of those Jews who, having been carried by the Romans, particularly by Pompey, to Rome as prisoners of war, had afterwards been emancipated from slavery. Cyrenians] A fourth part of the inhabitants of Cyrene, the capital of Upper Libya, consisted of Jews. Alexandrians] At Alexandria (founded by Alexander the Great, 332 B.C.) two of the five parts into which the city was divided were inhabited by Jews, who were ruled over by a Jewish officer called an alabarch. At Alexandria the OT. had been translated into Greek. Here flourished a Jewish-Greek philosophy of which Philo is the chief exponent. Apollos was an Alexandrian (18:24). Tradition makes St. Mark the first bishop of Alexandria. Cilicia] To this synagogue St. Paul probably belonged. Asia] The Roman province, not the continent. It embraced Lydia, Mysia, Caria, part of Phrygia. Its three chief towns were Ephesus, Smyrna, and Pergamos.

11. Suborned men] The success of these tactics against Jesus encouraged them to repeat them. 13. This holy place] i.e. the Temple. 14. Destroy this place, etc.] What St. Stephen had probably said was that the Law would pass away as having been fulfilled in Christ, and that if the Jews persistently refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah, their city and Temple would be destroyed, as Jesus had prophesied (Mt 24, etc.). Although the charge was malicious and false, there was some truth in it. Stephen's teaching was clearly more advanced and liberal than that of the Twelve. 15. The face of an angel] This description is probably due to St. Paul, who was doubtless present: cp. 7:48.

DEFENCE AND MARTYRDOM OF STEPHEN

1–53. Speech of Stephen. There is every reason to believe that this speech was really delivered by St. Stephen, and not composed by St. Luke; for, (1) the speech does not (in any direct manner) answer the charges alleged (6:14), as a speech composed by the historian himself would have done; (2) there are several erroneous references to the OT. (not all due to the use of LXX), natural enough in a speech delivered impromptu, but not natural in a speech composed deliberately. St. Paul who heard the speech probably reported it to St. Luke.

The exact point of the speech, and how it is intended to be an answer to the charges (6:14), is disputed. It would appear, however, that the great length at which the history of the Jews is related, is intended to show that Stephen was not a blasphemer of God but as firma believer in the OT. as his accusers. He gives a particular account of Moses (vv. 20–44), and declares his firm belief in the divine authority of the Law delivered by him ('the lively oracles,' v. 38). He points out, however, that Moses himself predicted the coming of a prophet greater than himself, and that to hear this prophet (whom he identifies with Jesus, v. 52) is commanded by the Law itself. Stephen, therefore, who obeys this command of Moses to hear Jesus, is keeping the Law, while his adversaries, who disobey this command, are breaking the Law (v. 53). The prophets also predicted the coming of Jesus, and Stephen, who follows Jesus, obeys the prophets, while his adversaries are rebels against them, as their fathers were (vv. 51, 52). The speech contains no reply to the charge of predicting had been allowed to be finished, it is probable that it would have closed with a solemn warning that unless his adversaries accepted Jesus as the Messiah, in accordance with the teaching of Moses and the prophets, their city and Temple would be destroyed. The Apology of Stephen may be compared with the Apology of Socrates. Both were delivered, not with the object of gaining an acquittal, but of testifying openly to the truth, and of denouncing the blindness and injustice of the judges.

2. Men, etc.] RV 'Brethren and fathers'; i.e. Israelites, and Sanhedrists. In Mesopotamia] Genesis says nothing of an appearance in Mesopotamia, but such an appearance is implied, Josh 24:2,3 Neh 9:7 (cp. Gn 15:7), and affirmed by Philo. 3. See Gn 12:1, which is mistranslated by the AV, to harmonise with this passage. 4. Charran] i.e. Haran, or Carrhae, an ancient city of N Mesopotamia. Here Caussus, the Roman general, was disastrously defeated by the Parthians 53 B.C. See Gn 11:31 12:4, etc.

When his father was dead] According to Genesis (see Gn 11:26; 12:4), Terah lived 60 years after his son's migration into Canaan. Stephen's statement is not a mere blunder, but a divergent tradition, found also in Philo, and apparently intended to shield the patriarch from the charge of unfaithful conduct, in thus abandoning his aged father. 5. See Gn 12:13, etc.

6. See Gn 15:13,16,18. Four hundred years] so Gn 15:13; more precisely 430 years, Ex 12:40. But there was another tradition which made the 430 years of Ex 12:40 refer to the sojourn of the patriarchs in Egypt and Israel. This is found in some MSS of the LXX (Ex 12:46); in Josephus, and in Gal 3:17. 7. In this place] in Canaan, not Sinai, as is the case in Ex 3:14.

Envy] Stephen sees in Joseph a type of Jesus, and in the envy of his brethren, a type of the envy of the chief priests andscribes which caused the death of Jesus.

14. Three score and fifteen souls] Stephen follows LXX of Gn 46:27 Ex 1:5. The Hebrew makes the number seventy. 16. There are two errors in this v.: (1) Jacob was not buried at Shechem (Shechem), but at Hebron, in the cave of Machpehah (Gn 50:12). (2) It was not Abraham, but Jacob, who bought a sepulchre at Shechem, from the sons of Emmor (Hamor), Gn 33:19 Josh 24:32. Either St. Stephen is following a divergent tradition, or, as is more probable, the errors are due to a lapse of memory natural enough under the disturbing circumstances of the speech. The father of Shechem] The true rendering is the 'son' of Shechem, which would be another disarray with Gn 33:19. But the RV adopts another reading, 'in Shechem (Shechem).'

The history of Joseph and of his great services to his adopted country. 19. So that] rather, 'that they might cast out their babes,' etc.

20. Was exceeding fair] lit. 'fair unto God,' i.e. fair even in the eyes of God: cp. Gn 10:9, 'a mighty hunter before Jehovah.'

22. Learned] i.e. taught. Undoubtedly true, though not mentioned in the OT. 'The wisdom of the Egyptians' consisted of natural science, magic, astronomy, medicine, and mathematics, and was mainly in the hands of the priesthood. Mighty in words] not inconsistent with Ex 4:10, for Moses' eloquence was acquired subsequently. 23. Forty years old] His age is derived from tradition.

30. Forty years] Another tradition. The rabbis said, 'Moses lived in Pharaoh's palace 40 years, in Midian 40 years, and ministered to Israel 40 years.' An angel] in Ex 3:4 the angel of Jehovah, who is afterwards identified with Jehovah Himself. 34. I will send] rather, 'let me send.' 35. A ruler and a deliverer] lit. 'a ruler and redeemer.' Moses' redemption of the people from the bondage of Egypt was a type of Christ's greater redemption of them from the bondage of sin and Satan.

37. A prophet] The importance of Moses, according to Stephen, is that he is the type and forerunner of a greater than himself, whose coming he foretold: see Dt 18:15,16; and cp. Ac 3:22. Christ is the second and greater Moses, and, like him, a redeemer (v. 35), lawgiver (v. 38), and prophet (v. 37). Loyalty to Moses, therefore, necessarily implies loyalty to Christ.

38. In the church] i.e. in the congregation or assembly of all Israel at Mt. Sinai when the Law was given and the Covenant made and ratified. On this occasion Moses again typified Christ by acting as Mediator. He was with God (or God's angel) on Mt. Sinai holding converse with Him: he was also with the people below holding converse with them, and thus being intimately associated with both, made a covenant between them. With the angel] The idea that Moses did not receive the Law directly from God, but from an angel or angels, is contrary to the OT., but was current among the Jews at this period: see Jos. 'Ant.' 15:5,5, 'We have learnt the most holy part of our Law by angels.' The Fathers identify the angel who spoke to Moses with the Logos, or second person of the Holy Trinity. Lively oracles] An oracle is an inspired utterance, hence the term is suitably applied to the Scriptures. The oracles are lively, or living, because they have the power of God in them, and the promises which they contain are effectual.

39. Israel's rebellion against Moses is a type of their later rebellion against Jesus. Egypt] i.e. the Egyptian way of life, especially Egyptian idolatry (bull-worship). In EgyptApis was worshipped at Memphis, and Mnevis at Heliopolis under the form of a bull; see Ex 32:1.

42. The book of the prophets] The twelve minor prophets formed one roll or book. O ye house, etc.] freely quoted from LXX of Amos 5:25, 26. Stephen, following LXX, supposes that the worship of Moloch and of the stars took place in the wilderness. This is not expressly mentioned in the Pentateuch, but it is not improbable, for the worship of Moloch is forbidden Lv 18:21, etc. Have ye offered?] The answer is 'No.' In appearance sacrifices had been offered to God, but inasmuch as they were offered by worshippers polluted by idolatry, they were no true sacrifices.

43. Ye took up] viz. to carry in a religious procession, or, to carry from one halting-place to another. The tabernacle of Moloch] a profane imitation of the tabernacle of Jehovah. Moloch (Molech, or Milcom) was an idol of the Ammonites to whom children were offered. His image is said to have been hollow, heated from below, with the head of an ox, and outstretched arms in which children were laid, their cries of agony being stifled by the beating of drums. The Heb., however, should probably be translated not 'the tabernacle of Moloch' (LXX and AV), but 'Siccuth, your king' (another false god). The star of your godRemphan] i.e. his star-temple. The Heb. has Chiuau (not Remphan), i.e. the planet Saturn. Beyond Babylon Amos says, 'beyond Damascus.' Stephen has adapted the prophecy (according to the rabbinical fashion) to later events.

44. Stephen's reference to the movable tabernacle in the wilderness is probably intended to show that the worship of God is not necessarily confined to one place (Jerusalem), and that for adequate cause (e.g. the persistent rejection of Christ by the Jews) the privilege of Jerusalem may be taken away. The tabernacle of witness] Thus LXX translates the phrase, which really means 'the tent of meeting,' i.e. the tent where God met His worshippers. But the phrase is nevertheless an apt one, for the tent contained the ark, which was a witness of the covenant, and the two tables on which the fundamental law of the covenant (the Decalogue) was written.

The fashion] see Ex 25:40 26:8 26:5 26:8 59. The fashion of Solomon's Temple was a mistake, but they do indicate that God's worship is not necessarily tied to one place, and that the divine choice of Jerusalem as a place of worship is not irreversible. Solomon himself recognised this truth, 1 K 8:2. 49, 59. See Isa 66:1-2.

51-53. Stephen, not careful of life, and willing to be a martyr, now denounces his judges. 52. Have slain] referring especially to Isaiah and Jeremiah, who both, according to tradition, suffered martyrdom. The Just One] i.e. Jesus: see 34. 53. By the disposition of angels] RV 'as it was ordained by angels'; RM 'as the ordinance of angels.' The precise meaning is uncertain, but some kind of mediation of angels in the giving of the Law is probably meant: see Gal 3:19 Heb 2:2.

54. Were cut] lit. 'were sawn asunder'; see 58. 55. Standing] Jesus rises from the throne on which He is represented as eternally sitting (Mt 26:64 Mk 16:19, etc.) to succour the martyr in his extremity, and to welcome his soul into bliss. 56. The Son of man] Here only is this title applied to Jesus by any one except Himself. It indicates that Stephen saw Him in human form: see on Mt 18:30. 57. Stopped their ears] because they regarded his words as blasphemous.

58. Out of the city] see 1 K 21:18 Lv 24:14-16. And stoned him] 'After a man has been condemned to be stoned, they bring him good strong wine, and give him to drink, that he may not feel too great horror of a violent death. Then come the witnesses, and bind his hands and feet, and lead him to the place of stoning. Then the witnesses take a great stone, large enough to cause death, and lay it upon his heart all together, lest one should act before another, according to Dt 17:7. "The hand of the witnesses shall be first against him": then all the Israelites can overwhelm him with stones' (Talmud). The execution of Stephen was tumultuous and illegal, for, (1) there was no formal sentence pronounced by the court, (2) the Roman authorities were not consulted about the death sentence: see Jn 18:31.

Saul] A young Jew of Tarsus in Cilicia, born a Roman citizen, a tent-maker by trade, of well-to-do parents, trained at Jerusalem in the rabbinical school of Gamaliel the Pharisee, and accustomed to speak Hebrew (21:59, etc.). His other name, Paul, first occurs 13:9.

59. Calling upon God] RV 'calling upon the Lord' (i.e. Jesus). Receive my spirit] A direct prayer to Jesus, and, therefore, a proof that the doctrine of the divinity of Jesus was already established in the Church. It is not a prayer to a mere saintly intercessor ('Jesus, pray for me'), but a direct prayer offered in the firm belief that Jesus can really grant what is asked, viz. the salvation of the soul. Prayer to Jesus was universal in the Christian
The Christians, scattered by persecution, preach everywhere through Judea and Samaria. The places specially mentioned are Samaria, Azotus, Cesarea, Lydda, the Sharon valley, and Joppa.

CHAPTER 8

Philip in Samaria. Simon Magus

The graphic details of the ministry of Philip which follow, were doubtless obtained from Philip himself. St. Luke stayed at his house at Cesarea, and made the acquaintance of his four virgin daughters, prophetesses (218). During St. Paul’s three years’ imprisonment at Cesarea, St. Luke doubtless had much intercourse with Philip, with whose liberal views he was in sympathy. The historical character of the following narratives stands upon a firm basis. In later years Philip migrated with his daughters to Tralles, in Asia Minor, of which he became the first bishop. Philip the Deacon and Evangelist is confused by some early writers with Philip the Apostle, who in his later years migrated to Hierapolis, and who also had daughters.

5. Philip] The deacon and evangelist, not the Apostle (see vv. 1 and 14). The city of Samaria] doubtless the capital, called (like the district) Samaria, and also (since the time of Herod the Great) Sebaste, in honour of Augustus (Sebastos). 7. Unclean spirits] Whether the NT. demonsiacs were really possessed, or were insane persons whose delusion took the form of a belief that they were possessed, is an open question. In either case the miracles of healing performed on them are remarkable (see on Mt 4:24, 25).

9. Simon] Justin Martyr (150 A.D.), himself a Samaritan, says that Simon belonged to the Samaritan village of Gito. He is regarded as the father of heresy, and is the reputed author of a Gnostic work called ‘The Great Revelation,’ of which fragments remain. Bewitched] ‘astonished’ (also v. 11). 10. The great power of God] RV ‘that power of God which is called Great,’ i.e. the chief emanation from the Deity, and so entitled to divine worship. According to Justin, he went even further, claiming to be the first or supreme God.

13. Believed] i.e. believed in the genuineness of Philip’s miracles, but did not believe in God with a spiritual and saving faith. Simon as a sorcerer and conjurer was an excellent judge of alleged miracles.

Except the apostles] The apostles still wished to achieve the conversion of Jerusalem. Besides, as leaders of the flock, they disdained flight.

PART 2

JUDEA AND SAMARIA (chs. 8:4—11:18)

14. By sending Peter and John the apostles formally sanctioned the reception of the Samaritans into the Church. The Samaritans, though observing the Law, were almost entirely heathen in origin, so that the incident marks an important step towards admitting pure Gentiles.

15—17. This is the fullest account of the apostolic laying on of hands after baptism, which is more briefly described, 194, and alluded to, Heb 6:2. In later times the ordinance was administered by bishops, and was called Confirmation, the Seal, and the Chrism. The author of Hebrews speaks of it as one of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ (Heb 6:2).

18. Saw] It is probable that many upon whom the Apostles laid hands received miraculous gifts. That Simon, who made his living by working lying wonders, should have desired the power of working genuine ones, was natural enough.

20—40. Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch. The eunuch, though a believer in the God of Israel, was a Gentile. Luke the universalist delights to record his admission into that wider communion in which all races and all conditions stand on an equality. This is the first example of a Gentile baptism. That it did not lead to the same disputes as the baptism of Cornelius, is due to the fact that it was private.

26. Toward the south] or, about mid-day. Gaza] The town is called desert, or deserted, because it had been destroyed, 96 B.C.

27. Candace] The Ethiopian kingdom of Meroë lay to the S. of Egypt, and was governed by queens, whose dynastic title was ‘Candace.’

32. See Isa 53:8 (LXX). Isaiah is speaking of the suffering Servant of Jehovah, whom the Apostolic Church rightly identified with Jesus the Messiah. 33. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away] i.e. in the humiliation of His Passion, justice was denied Him by the Sanhedrin and by Pilate. And who shall declare his generation?] i.e. and what language is adequate to describe the wickedness of His contemporaries who unjustly crucified Him? For his life is taken from the earth] This refers not to the Ascension of Jesus (as some have thought), but to His violent death.

36. Baptized] ‘Preaching Jesus’ had clearly included instruction upon the nature and necessity of the Christian sacraments.
which the RV omits, is a very early and trustworthy marginal addition, which was ultimately incorporated into the text. The simplicity of the baptismal confession is a proof of its genuineness. 1 Pet 3:31 alludes to the baptismal profession of faith. 38. The eunuch was probably baptised by immersion, the usual practice of the early Church, though not held to be absolutely essential.

39. Caught away Philip: The Holy Spirit prompted Philip to depart abruptly for Azotus (Ashdod). Rejoicing [According to Eusebius, the eunuch, on his arrival home, evangelised his countrymen. In his conversion was fulfilled Ps 68:31, 'Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.' 40. Was found at Azotus] Azotus or Ashdod was one of the five Philistine cities, whose inhabitants were enemies of the Jews after the captivity (Neh 4:7). It was distant over 20 m. (northwards) from Gaza.

All the cities: These would include Jannia, Joppa and Lydda. Cesarea] see on 101.

SAUL BECOMES A CHRISTIAN
1–20. The Conversion of Saul: is to be regarded as a miraculous event. The way for it may have been prepared by Stephen’s speech, by the spectacle of the constancy of the Christian martyrs, and by Saul’s own consciousness of the imperfections of the Law (Ro 7:7–8:11). Yet there is no indication that he was anything but a violent enemy of Christianity until the moment of his conversion. His own language on this point is quite clear (1 Cor 15:6 Gal 1:16 1 Tim 1:15). St. Paul always maintained that the appearance of the risen Christ to him which brought about his conversion, was as objective and real as the appearances to the other Apostles. He regarded it as the turning-point of his life, and the beginning of his new vocation. He claimed to be an Apostle of equal rank and authority with the other Apostles (2 Cor 11:5 Gal 2:8, etc.), (1) because Christ had appeared to him as to the others (1 Cor 15:8–91), and (2) because Christ had appointed him an Apostle just as He had appointed the others (Ac 22:31, etc.). For confirmation of the truth of this he appealed to ‘the signs of an apostle’ (miracles, conversions, etc.) which accompanied his ministry (2 Cor 12:12).

Saul’s conversion at once gave Christianity a higher social status. He was an educated man, of good family, a rabbi, and (probably) a member of the Sanhedrin. It could no longer be objected to the teachers of the new faith that they were all ignorant and unlettered men.

The conversion of Saul is a turning-point in the history of Christianity. By conversion he became not merely a Christian, but an enlightened Christian. He perceived that the ceremonial Law was no longer binding, and his perception of this fact enabled him to preach Christianity as a universal religion. The Twelve already held this view in principle, but to Saul belongs the credit of acting upon it with energy, and of carrying it out to its logical results.

1. The high priest: The Romans allowed the Sanhedrin to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction (except in capital cases) over the whole Jewish community, even outside Palestine. 2. Synagogue: clearly the Christians had not yet separated from the Jewish synagogues. This way: ‘Way,’ thus used absolutely for Christianity, is peculiar to Acts: see 16:17 18:30, 26 19:9, 25 22:4 24:14, 22.

3. A light: according to 1 Cor 9:1, Paul saw, within the light, Jesus Himself, in His risen and glorified body.

5. It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks: These words, which the RV omits as an interpolation from 26:14, mean that the role of a persecutor is impossible to Paul. Paul is really in the position of a plough-ox. Jesus is his driver, and holds the goad. Paul can no more resist Jesus than the plough-ox can resist his driver. There is probably no allusion to stings of conscience, as some have supposed.

6. According to 26:14, Jesus also told Paul that his mission would be to preach to the Gentiles. 7. Stood speechless: According to 26:14, they fell to the earth. Hearing a voice: RV ‘hearing the voice,’ Yet in 22:9 Paul says, ‘they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.’ The latter account, being Paul’s own, is to be preferred. Those who wish to harmonise the two accounts translate here ‘hearing the sound’ (BM). But it is not necessary to harmonise. The variations in unimportant details only accentuate the general harmony.

8. Saw no man: RV ‘saw nothing.’

9. Saul fasted to show his penitence.

10. Ananias: probably the head of the Christian body at Damascus. Late tradition makes him one of the Seven, consecrated bishop of Damascus by Peter and Andrew, and a martyr. 15. A chosen vessel: i.e., a chosen instrument: cp. 13:2 Gal 1:16, etc. The Gentiles] cp. 22:21 26:17 Ro 1:5 11:18 Gal 2:7, 8. And the children of Israel: Though Paul’s mission was mainly to the Gentiles, it was his custom to preach the gospel first to the Jews: see 18:14, etc. 16. I will shew him: see 20:9 21:1 5 Cor 11:22, 13. And was baptized: It is added (22:16) that St. Paul received at his baptism the remission of his former sins.

The three accounts of St. Paul’s conversion (chs. 9, 22, 26) present some not very important variations. Thus, St. Paul alone fell to the earth (c. 9), but in c. 26 aft fell to the earth.
CHAPTER 10

PETER AND THE GENTILES

1-48. Conversion of Cornelius. The baptism of Cornelius was an event of far-reaching importance, and is, therefore, described by St. Luke in great detail. If it was not the first actual baptism of a Gentile (see 8:38), it was, at any rate, the first such baptism which was publicly acknowledged. The historical character of the incident has been called in question because St. Peter in Galatians is represented as opposing St. Paul on the Gentile question (Gal 2:11f). But, (1) Galatians represents Peter as in complete agreement with Paul on all essential points (Gal 2:6,12); and (2) the Jewish prejudices of Peter are fully recognised in the narrative in Acts. Indeed, it required a thrice-repeated vision to remove them (10:9f).

1. Cæsarea] built by Herod the Great on the site of an insignificant town called Strato's Tower, and renamed Cæsarea Augusta in honour of his patron Augustus. There was a theatre, an amphitheatre, a royal palace, and a temple containing images of Augustus and of Rome. The majority of the inhabitants were Greek, but Jews enjoyed equal rights. At this time Cæsarea was the capital of the Roman province, and the residence of the governor.

Cornelius, a centurion] A legion consisted of about 6,000 men, and was divided into ten cohorts, each commanded by a tribune (or chiliarium, see 21:31). A cohort was divided into six centuries, each commanded by a centurion. Centurions were men who had risen from the ranks, and were therefore, as a rule, men of capacity and good character; cp. Lk 7:5.

The Italian bond[man] rather, 'cohort.' In the smaller provinces legions were not stationed, and therefore St. Luke is doubtless right in saying that there was only a cohort of Roman soldiers at Cæsarea. The men were recruited in Italy, and were probably Roman citizens.

2. One that feared God] i.e. a believer in the one true God, but not a circumcised proselyte. The baptism of Cornelius would not have been an innovation if he had been circumcised: see 6v. Cornelius was diligent in the three recognised religious duties of prayer, fasting (v. 30), and almsgiving; he kept the Jewish hours of prayer (v. 8).

3. Ninth hour] i.e. 3 P.M. 4. A memorial] Acts of genuine piety cause God to remember us for good. Cornelius, by using the grace already vouchsafed him, was thought worthy to receive greater grace. 5. To Joppa] A distance of about 40 m.

THE ACTS

10. 10

Neh8:18 189 25, 26 (RV) 28:11. 10. Trance

Trance, ecstasy, or waking vision, is only one of the modes of divine revelation, and that by no means the most frequent or most important. For examples see Isa 6 Dan 7, 8, 9 21 2Cor 12 20. Visions play a somewhat important part in the history of Acts (9:10 16:9 18:10 22:17: cp. 27:28 21:17). 16. Thrice] the vision was repeated to confirm and establish the lesson taught by it (Gn 41:29).

The question of the distinction of meats was important, because, so long as it was observed, the Church (like the Jews) was cut off from all real social intercourse with Gentiles, who placed 'unclean' food on their tables. A special revelation was accordingly made to the chief of the Apostles announcing that the distinction of meats was abrogated, and that henceforth Jew and Gentile were to associate and eat together, on terms of equality (v. 28). Jesus had already laid down this principle (Mt 7:19 RV), but St. Peter had not understood it.

28. An unlawful thing] cp. Jn 4:9 18:38 Ac 11:3 Gal 2:13, 14. 30. Four days, etc.] RV 'Four days ago, until this hour, I was keeping the ninth hour of prayer in my house.' The reference to fasting, omitted by the RV, has considerable ancient attestation.

36–38. The construction is confused, reflecting St. Peter's deep emotion. Adopting the reading of the RV, we may freely translate thus: 'He sent the word unto the children of Israel, preaching peace (for all mankind) through Jesus Christ (He is Lord of all men). Ye know the things that were done throughout the whole of Judæa, beginning from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached, (even the deeds of) Jesus of Nazareth, how God anointed Him with the Holy Ghost and with power, who went about doing good,' etc.

43. All the prophets] cp. 3:24 26 22. 44. As a rule, the Holy Spirit was given after baptism, with the laying on of the Apostles' hands (3:8 17 19). In this particular case the Holy Spirit was given before baptism, as a miraculous assurance that the Gentiles were not to be excluded from the gift of the Holy Spirit, but were to be baptised. 46. Speak with tongues] see on 24. 47. Water] the water, viz. of Baptism. 48. In the name of the Lord] RV 'in the name of Jesus Christ': see on Mt 28:19.

THE FIRST GENTILE CHURCH

1–18. The baptism of Cornelius discussed and approved at Jerusalem. Those Christians who maintained the need of observing the Ceremonial Law did not attack the baptism itself because, although they disliked it, our Lord's command to baptise all nations was too definite to be questioned. They attacked, therefore, St. Peter's undoubted breach of Jewish law and custom: 'Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them' (v. 3). What they apparently desired was, that if Gentiles were baptised at all, they should be regarded as an inferior class, and not allowed to eat at the same table with their Jewish superiors: cp. Gal 2:12. Peter did not discuss the general principle, but defended himself on the ground that he had received a special revelation authorising, and indeed commanding, him to act as he did in this particular case.

2. They that were of the circumcision] This may either mean the whole Church of Jerusalem in contrast with Cornelius and his friends, or the Judaising party in that Church which, perhaps, already existed, as it certainly did some years later (15:1). 18. The Church of Jerusalem unanimously endorsed Peter's action, doubtless because the case was an exceptional one, and was not likely to become a precedent. When St. Paul made a practice of doing what St. Peter had only done as a rare exception, the controversy was revived (c. 15).

THE CHURCH IN ANTIOCH, 35–47 A.D. (Chs. 11:10–13:1)

19–26. Extension of the Church to Antioch. Admission of Gentile members. Antioch in N. Syria ranked next to Alexandria, as the third city in the Roman empire. It was beautifully situated on the Orontes, about 15 m. from the sea. Its port was Seleucia. The bulk of the population was Syrian by race, but the language and culture were Greek. There were also numerous Jews, who had gathered round their synagogue a remarkable number of proselytes. Antioch was the capital of the province of Syria, and the seat of the Roman governor, so that here Christianity came into contact for the first time with Greek and Roman civilisation. Antioch remained a great Christian centre: among its honoured names were Ignatius and Chrysostom: its school of theology and exegesis was famous, and its bishop was one of the four patriarchs. Here Christianity was first preached on any large scale to Gentiles (see on v. 20). It is probable, however, that most of them were, like Cornelius, in some way attached to the synagogue. St. Paul seems to have been the first to appeal to Gentiles pure and simple: see 14:27.

19. The narrative goes back to 8:1, to trace the chain of causation which led to the foundation of the first great Gentile Church. Christianity, it will be seen, spread along the great trade routes both by land and sea. Phœnicia] i.e. Phœnicia. 20. Men of Cyprus and Cyrene] these would be Hellenists (Greek-speaking Jews), and therefore presumably more liberal in their views than Hebrews. To these unnamed Cyprians and Cyrenians belongs the credit of first preaching systematically to Gentiles. Spake unto the Grecians] i.e. to the Greek-speaking Jews. So the A.V. But the context plainly requires 'spake unto the Greeks' (i.e. unto the Gentiles), and this reading is adopted by the R.V.

22. The Church of Jerusalem on hearing the news acted with commendable self-restraint. They did not hastily condemn the new departure, little as they liked it, but sent a trustworthy person, Barnabas, to examine into the circumstances upon the spot, and to report.

23. Barnabas, after carefully observing the results of the policy, approved it (was glad), and exhorted them all (i.e. both Jews and Gentiles) to persevere in their profession of faith, and to form one united Church. Barnabas thus anticipated Paul in sanctioning the principle of Gentile equality, which involved eating with Gentiles (Gal. 2:12), and it was because Paul was likely to be in sympathy with such a policy, that Barnabas summoned him to Antioch.

24. Christians] The giving of this name marked the recognition of the fact that the Way was something more than a new Jewish sect. The inclusion of numerous Gentiles within the Church, and that without their becoming Jews, and the preaching of Jesus as one whose authority was superior to that of Moses, gave complete justification to those who saw in Christianity a new religion. The form of the word is Latin, so that it may have originated in the Latin-speaking court of the Roman governor. At any rate, the name was not invented by the Jews, who did not admit that Jesus was the Christ (Messiah). In 64 A.D. Tacitus mentions that the name was in use among the common people at Rome. In the 2nd cent. a corrupted form, 'Christians,' lit. 'the good people,' was sometimes used.

27. The Church of Antioch succours the Church of Jerusalem in time of famine.

27. Friendly relations clearly prevailed between Jerusalem and Antioch, the former Church sending accredited prophets and teachers to Antioch to assist in the work of evangelisation. Prophets] The gift of prophecy specially distinguished the apostolic from the subapostolic and later ages. It was widely diffused, being exercised by private Christians, and even by women in the Church assemblies (1 Cor. 14:1). Generally it took the form of inspired exhortation or instruction, but was sometimes predictive. The official prophets, who were recognised as possessing the gift to the fullest extent (e.g. Agabus, Barnabas, Symeon called Niger, Lucius of Cyrene, Manaen, Judas, and Silas, see 13:15 21:10) ranked next to the Apostles, and were regarded with them as the foundation upon which the Church was built (Eph. 2:20). The chief product of Christian prophecy is the inspired NT.

Unto Antioch] The Bezan text here adds: 'And there was much gladness. And when we were gathered together, one of them named Agabus spake [and signified, etc.].' This reading, which seems trustworthy, confirms the tradition that St. Luke belonged to Antioch, and was one of the early converts there.

28. Agabus] see 21:10. Great dearth throughout all the world] There was a severe famine in the fourth year of Claudius, 45 A.D., which affected both Judea and Greece. To this St. Luke probably refers. Claudius] reigned from 41-54 A.D. The prophecy of Agabus was perhaps delivered in 44 A.D.

30. The elders] lit. 'presbyters.' These officers are here mentioned for the first time. All the Apostolic Churches were governed by presbyters (14:28), or, as they were sometimes called at first, bishops (20:38: cp. Phil. 11). The presbyters ranked next to the apostles and above the deacons. On them devolved (under the apostles) the government and pastoral care of the Church. They visited and anointed the sick, and entertained strangers (see Jas. 5:14). The more learned of them laboured in the word and teaching, and such were held worthy of double honour (1 Tim. 5:18). They did not exercise what is now called episcopal authority. This was reserved to the apostles and apostolic men. They were essentially local officers. There were several in one Church, and they formed one body or 'college' (the presbytery, 1 Tim. 1:4). Government by presbyters was adopted by the Church from the Synagogue. Jewish synagogues were governed by a body of presbyters at the head of whom was an officer called 'the ruler of the synagogue.' Many think that in Christian Churches also the leading presbyter had from the first a special position, similar to that of St. James at Jerusalem, and that towards the close of the apostolic age the title 'bishop,' at first applied to all presbyters indiscriminately, began to be restricted to him (see Intro. to Pastoral Epistles, notes on 1 Tim. 3:1 Tit. 1:7).

The usual view is that this visit of St. Paul to Jerusalem is nowhere else alluded to, being passed over in silence in the Epistle to the Galatians. But the writer's own view is that this visit is that mentioned Gal. 2:10. See on c. 15.
IMPRISONMENT OF PETER. DEATH OF HEROD

1-19. Persecution of the Church at Jerusalem by Herod. Martyrdom of James the son of Zebedee. Peter's imprisonment and miraculous release. The Church was persecuted (1) by the Sadducees and chief priests, 41.5; (2) afterwards by the Pharisees, 6:11; and now (3) by the king of the Jews. Not till later was persecution to come from the Romans.

1. About that time viz., when relief was sent to the Church of Jerusalem (11:29, 30). The death of Herod (v. 23) fixes the date as 44 A.D. "Herod the king," i.e. Herod Agrippa I, son of Aristobulus (Herod the Great's son) and Bernice; born 10 B.C. See art. "The Dynasty of the Herods."

2. James] i.e. James the Great, son of Zebedee. 4. Four quarternions] four parties of four soldiers each, relieving one another at intervals. Easter] i.e. the Passover. 5. Without ceasing] RV 'earnestly.' 7. The prison] RV 'the cell.' 10. The second ward] i.e. the second guard of soldiers. And they went out] D adds, 'and went down the seven steps' (probably an authentic detail).

12. Mary] This Mary, mother of Mark, and aunt of Barnabas, was a widow of considerable wealth, as her style of living testifies. Her house had a gateway into the courtyard (not a 'door,' as AV), which was kept by a porter. There was room within for the Church to worship (12:12). Many suppose that her house was the scene of the Last Supper, and of the descent of the Holy Ghost.

John . . . Mark] the evangelist: see Intro. to Mk.

13. 14. The gate] i.e. the gateway or vestibule. 15. His angel] They thought that Peter's guardian angel had assumed his voice and appearance: see on Mt. 18:10, 17. Unto James, and to the brethren] The meeting in Mary's house was clearly an unofficial one. Observe that Peter recognises James (i.e. the Lord's brother) as the head of the local Church of Jerusalem.

20-24. Death of Herod Agrippa I, 44 A.D. Josephus's account of Herod's death, which is quite independent, confirms St. Luke's (see 'Ant.' 19, 8).

20. Tyre and Sidon obtained their corn and provisions from Palestine. Hence when a dispute arose (perhaps over some commercial imposts) prices prevailed, and the cities were obliged to come to terms. They 'persuaded' Blastus (AV 'made him their friend'), probably by a bribe, and desired 'peace,' i.e. a cessation of the tariff war.

23. The angel] RV 'an angel.' This is, of course, the Christian interpretation of the incident. No angelic appearance is to be assumed. 24. So signal a judgment upon a persecutor was an indication of the righteousness of the Christian cause. It is a remarkable fact that most of the early persecutors perished miserably.

C. 12:25-13:3. Separation of Barnabas and Saul for missionary work, 47 A.D.

25. Returned from Jerusalem] the best reading is 'returned to Jerusalem,' i.e. to fetch Mark to Antioch.

CHAPTER 13

ST. PAUL AS A MISSIONARY

1. Prophets] see on 11:27. Simeon that was called Niger] Niger was a Roman cognomen. Lucius of Cyrene] doubtless one of those Cyrenians who first preached at Antioch (11:20). Manaen] the OT form - 'Menahem.' W'hich had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch] Two meanings are possible. Either, (1) Menahem's mother had been Herod's wet-nurse; or (2) Menahem had been brought up with Herod as his foster-brother. The tetrarch] (Herod Antipas) was the son of Herod the Great, by Malthace and (probably after his father's death) Galilee and Perea. In 39 A.D. he was banished to Gaul, where he died. 2. As they ministered to the Lord] i.e. celebrated divine worship. From the Gk. word used is derived our word 'liturgy.' And fasted] see on Mt. 6:16. The Holy Ghost said] an expression vividly suggesting the personality of the Holy Ghost, and His office as the Guide of the Church. Acts is so full of such expressions (10:19, 23; 10:28, 11:12, 13; 16:6), that it has even been called 'the Gospel of the Holy Ghost.' In this case the Holy Ghost probably spoke by one of the prophets. Separate me Barnabas and Saul] Some regard this incident as the ordination of Paul and Barnabas; others as their solemn setting apart for missionary work. Henceforth they are called 'apostles' by St. Luke (14:4, 14). 3. This was the apostolic custom to fast at ordinations: see 14:28.

THE CHURCH OF THE WORLD, 47-61 A.D. (CHS. 134-2831)

13-15. First Missionary Journey and Council of Jerusalem. During this journey St. Paul conclusively established his right to the title of Apostle, (1) by the success of his labours, 13:49, 14:1, 21; (2) by signs and wonders, 13:11, 14:8, 10; and (3) by the foundation and organism of churches, 14. It will be noticed that St. Paul takes the lead, and soon becomes a more prominent figure than Barnabas. Although upon a mission to the Gentiles, St. Paul always addresses the Jews first (13:4).

13. 4-13. Cyprus. This island was familiar ground to Barnabas (4:8). It contained a large Jewish population, to which the apostles mainly confined their attention (v. 5). The principal town was Salamis, but the seat of government was Paphos (see v. 6). Cyprus was at this time a senatorial province, and the governor is therefore correctly described as proconsul (v. 7). The principal exports of Cyprus were copper and timber. The deity chiefly worshipped was Aphrodite (Venus). Paphos, the centre of her worship, had an evil reputation for laxity of morals.

5. Their minister] Possibly for the administration of baptism, which St. Paul usually performed by deputy (1 Cor. 11:14-17). 6. A. . . sorcerer] lit. 'a magus.' Here in a bad sense: see on Mt 21: 7. Deputy] Gk. anthropados, i.e. 'proconsul,' the correct title of the governor of a senatorial province. Sergius Paulus] a member of the ancient patrician gens of the Sergii. An inscription has been discovered in Cyprus, which speaks of the proconsulship of this Paulus. 8. Elymas] The name is Arabic, meaning 'the wise,' an equivalent of the Gk. magus.

9. Paul] Saul, as a Roman citizen, had the well-known Roman name Paul. It is here introduced, because the apostle, for the first time, comes into intimate contact with the Roman world. The name Saul in Gk. has the ridiculous sense of 'waddling.' Observe that from this point Paul becomes a more prominent figure than Barnabas. Filled with the Holy Ghost] This miracle of wrath was justified by a special revelation.

13. John departing from them] Mark may have objected to the conversion of so many Gentiles. Others suggest personal resentment against St. Paul, whose reputation was now eclipsing that of St. Barnabas, Mark's cousin. Failure of courage or of perseverance is also possible.

The cities which the apostles now proceeded to evangelise (Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe) were situated in the southern part of the Roman province of Galatia, and it is now very generally supposed that the Epistle to the Galatians was addressed to the churches in these cities. If so, we can use that Epistle to illustrate this narrative. The other view that the Galatian Churches were situated in N. Galatia is less probable, because no missionary journey in N. Galatia is mentioned in Acts.

14. Perga.] An important city, the capital of Pamphylia. Antioch in Pisidia] rather, 'Pisidian Antioch.' This Antioch was really in Phrygia, but from its position was called 'Antiochia ad Pisidiam,' 'Antioch bordering on Pisidia.' It was the centre of military and civil administration for S. Galatia, and commanded the great high-road from Syria to Ephesus and the West. We gather from Gal 4:10 that St. Paul preached in Galatia on account of an illness which overtook him on his travels. Prof. Ramsay supposes that having caught malarial fever at the low-lying Perga, he determined to try the effect of the mountain air of Antioch. The Synagogue] The sabbath service of the synagogue consisted then as now of, (1) the recitation of the Shema (i.e. of Dt 6:4-9 11:18-21 Nu 15:37-41); (2) fixed prayers and benedictions; (3) a lesson from the Law; (4) a lesson from the Prophets, intended to illustrate the law; (5) a sermon or instruction. The ruler of the synagogue (at Antioch there appears to have been more than one) decided who was to read or preach.

16-41. St. Paul's sermon falls into three parts: (1) the historical introduction (vv. 16-25); (2) the preaching of salvation through the Incarnation, the Death and the Resurrection of Jesus, who is God's Son, to whom the prophets bore witness (vv. 26-37); (3) the practical application and appeal (vv. 38-41). The introduction reminds us of Stephen's apology, but whereas Stephen laid the main stress upon Moses, St. Paul lays it upon David. The description of our Lord's rejection by the rulers, and of His death and resurrection reminds us strongly of St. Peter's earlier speeches at Jerusalem, but St. Paul adds the further claim that Jesus is God's Son (v. 38). The Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, and not by the works of the Law, finds expression in v. 39: cp. Gal 2:16 3:24, etc., which show that this doctrine was actually preached to the Galatians.

18. Suffered he their manners] Both here and in Dt 8:1 the true reading probably is 'bare he them as a nursing father.'

19. By lot] RV 'for an inheritance.'

20. Judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years] This period for the judges (more precisely 443 years) is also adopted by Josephus, but is inconsistent with 1 K 6:1. Another reading, adopted by the RV, makes the period of 450 years extend from the death of Joshua to the reign of David. 22. See Ps 89:20 1 S 13:14. 24. His coming] i.e. His entry upon the Messianic office (to be dated from His Baptism). 26. To you] RV 'to us.'

33. In the second psalm] There is another reading 'in the first psalm,' which may be correct, as there is evidence that the first two psalms were sometimes counted as one. In the passage referred to (Ps 27) the Messiah is declared to be begotten as the Son of God on the day when Jehovah scatters His enemies before Him. So at the Resurrection, when the enemies of Jesus were confounded, He was ‘declared to be the Son of God with power,’ and made ‘the first begotten of the dead’ (Col 1:18 Rev 1:5).

34. I will give you the sure mercies of David] RV ‘I will give you the holy and sure blessings of David.’ See Isa 55:8. But how does this text prove the Resurrection of Jesus, and His unending life? Because unless Jesus had risen to unending life and power, the Messianic promises made to David could never have been fulfilled. 35. See Ps 16:10, and cp. St. Peter’s use of the passage, 2:21.

40. In the prophets] The particular prophecy quoted is Hab 1:5. Habakkuk had threatened the Jews with destruction by the Chaldeans (Babylonians). The passage, as applied by St. Paul, looks forward to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

42. RV ‘And as they went out, they besought’, etc. The request for another serum (according to the RV) was general and not confined to the Gentiles. 45. What irritated the Jews was not the substance of the gospel message, but the fact that it was proclaimed to the heathen as well as to themselves.

46. Lo, we turn to the Gentiles] This momentous decision to appeal to the Gentiles directly, and not through the instrumentality of the Synagogue, required courage in the face of current prejudice. See further 18:6 28:28.

47. See Isa 42:6 49:6 Lk 2:82. 48. As many as were ordained to eternal life believed] This expresses the Pauline and Apostolic doctrine of predestination, according to which God desires the salvation of all men (1 Tim 2:4 4:10, etc.), but inasmuch as He foresees that some (in the exercise of their free will) will actually repent and believe, while others will refuse to do so, He ordains the former to eternal life, and the latter to eternal death (Ro 8:28-30, etc.).

50. Devout and honourable women] i.e. proselytes to Judaism, and (probably) wives to the chief men of the city. Coasts] i.e. borders. 51. Shook off the dust] see Mt 10:14 Mk 6:11 Lk 9:5, and cp. 18:6. Iconium] a Phrygian city of considerable importance situated in a most beautiful and fertile plain 80 m. SE. of Antioch. It is now called Konia.

52. In spite of the (apparently) successful persecution, and the departure of the apostles, the new converts stood firm, and were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost: cp. 2:46 4:31.

1-7. Paul and Barnabas at Iconium. The gospel meets with great success among both Jews and Gentiles in this populous city, and miracles are wrought in confirmation of the faith.

2. The first persecution at Iconium, which probably took the form of arraigning the apostles before the magistrates, failed. Accordingly the second persecution (v. 5) took the form of a popular tumult. V. 2 reads thus in D: ‘But the rulers of the synagogue of the Jews raised a persecution against the righteous (i.e. the Christians), and exasperated the souls of the heathen against the brethren, but the Lord quickly gave peace.’

3. For the importance of miracles as a sign of apostleship, see 2 Cor 12:12 Ro 15:18. 4. The apostles] The name is here first given to Paul and Barnabas: see on 13:13. 6. Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycania] Lystra (like Antioch) was a Roman colony, founded by Augustus, 6 B.C. Its official language was Latin. It lay 18 m. SSW. of Iconium. Derbe lay about 30 m. SE. of Lystra. Lystra and Derbe are correctly described as Lycanian cities, in distinction from Antioch, which was Phrygian.

The curious second-century romance, ‘The Acts of Paul and Thecla,’ gives many additional particulars of St. Paul’s proceedings at Iconium, some of which, perhaps, are authentic. Thecla, who belonged to one of the chief families of Iconium, overheard from a window the preaching of the apostle. She was at that time engaged to a young man named Thamyris, but on hearing St. Paul’s words she became so enamoured of virginity that she broke off her engagement. For this interference with family life, and for impiety, St. Paul was scourged and expelled from the city, and Thecla was condemned to be burnt alive. A fall of rain extinguished the fire, and she escaped and followed Paul to Antioch. Here again she was persecuted, but was rescued by Tryphena, a lady of great influence. The presbyter who composed this romance (though it was probably founded on fact) was deposed from his office.

8-20. Lystra. Here was a typical heathen population, but little affected by Judaism, as there was no synagogue. The people were grossly superstitious, and easily led into any kind of extravagance. Though Latin was the official language, the common people spoke their own uncouth Lycanian dialect (v. 11), which was unintelligible to the apostles. While at Lystra the apostles probably lodged with the parents of Timothy: see on 16:1.

8. A cripple] Probably this man had learnt from the Jews the worship of the true God (D says that he was ‘in the fear of God’), and consequently he had received some preparation for the gospel message. The circumstances and effect of this miracle are like those of the miracle worked by Peter and John, 31.

11. In the speech of Lycaonia] This explains why the apostles did not protest against the proposals at the time. They appear to have gone home in entire ignorance of the construction which the people had placed upon the miracle. The gods are come down] The less educated or more credulous heathen at this time still believed that the gods were in the habit of visiting the earth in human form. It was in the neighbouring country of Phrygia that Jupiter and Mercury were said to have paid a visit to the virtuous peasants Baucis and Philemon, and to have been entertained by them. Even in Athens, in the age of Pisistratus, a visit of Athenes (Minerva) in human form was believed possible. 12. The majestic appearance of Barnabas caused him to be identified with the chief god (Zeus) corresponding to the Roman Jupiter. The insignificant stature of Paul (2 Cor 10:10), and his gift of eloquence, suggested his identification with Hermes (the Roman Mercury). Hermes was the god of eloquence, and the attendant, messenger, and spokesman of Zeus.

13. Which was before their city] i.e. whose temple was before the city. Unto the gates] or 'porches.' It is difficult to decide where the sacrifice took place, whether at the porch of the apostles' house, or at the gates of the city, or at the gates of the temple. Perhaps the first is favoured by the statement (v. 14) that they 'sprang out' among the people.

Vanities] i.e. vain gods. 17. Gave us rain] RV 'gave you rains.' There was great scarcity of water in Lycaonia, owing to a deficient rainfall. 19. Persuaded the people] The fickleness of the Lycaonians is reflected on by more than one Greek author, and perhaps St. Paul alludes to it in the Epistle to the Galatians (1:6 3:1 4:10, etc.). 20. There is no reason to suppose a miracle here: cp. 20:10.

Having at Lystra to deal with pure heathens, and not as usual with persons influenced by Judaism, St. Paul bases his teaching upon Natural Religion. The three main truths of Natural Religion according to him are, (1) God's Unity, (2) His creative power, and, (3) His benevolence. The main difficulty to which St. Paul addresses himself is, Why then has God permitted the nations to remain so long in ignorance? and the answer is that this ignorance is only for a time (v. 16); and that even in the time of ignorance God did not leave Himself entirely without witness (v. 17). The whole speech should be compared with that delivered at Athens, also to a purely heathen audience (17:22).

21-28. Visit to Derbe, and return journey to Antioch of Syria. Derbe, or Claudio-Derbe, where the work of the apostles seems to have been very successful, was a small Lycaonian town on the extreme boundary of the Roman province of Galatia. A convert of this city named Gaius is mentioned (20:4).

21. To Lystra] thus showing remarkable perseverance and courage. 22. Confirming] exhorting to steadfastness, so much needed by the fickle Galatians.

23. Elders] lit. 'presbyters.' We have a right to infer from this passage that wherever the apostles established a church, they established also a definite ministry. Presbyters only are mentioned, but it is to be presumed that there were also deacons to assist them. It is somewhat remarkable that St. Paul's Epistles (except the Pastoralas) contain no allusion to presbyters. Bishops, however, probably in the sense of presbyters, are mentioned (Phil 1): see on Ac 11:30.

27. furnishes the first example of a missionary meeting. It was a meeting of the whole Church, not of a few enthusiasts.

CHAPTER 15

THE QUESTION OF CIRCUMCISION

1-35. The Council of Jerusalem, 49 A.D.

The usual view is that Gal 2:1-10 describes the visit of St. Paul to Jerusalem on the occasion of this Council. Adopting this, the following was the course of events. The baptism of Gentiles by St. Paul on his First Missionary Journey, without requiring them to be circumcised or to keep the Law, was keenly criticised at Jerusalem by the Pharisaic party within the Church. Some of these malcontents even came to Antioch, teaching that 'except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved' (Ac 15:1). They falsely professed to have the support of Peter and James, and St. Paul indignantly refers to them as 'false brethren privily brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus' (Gal 2:4). They demanded that Paul and Barnabas should go up to Jerusalem, and submit the matter to the superior authority of the Twelve. At first St. Paul refused to go, regarding himself as possessing an independent and equal authority. But on receiving a special revelation (Gal 2:23) that the result would be favourable to his views, and would tend to the furtherance of the gospel, he consented to go, taking with him Barnabas, and Titus, one of his Gentile converts. Before the Council, private conferences were held between St. Paul and the heads of the Church of Jerusalem, with the object of reaching a settlement. As a step towards this, the circumcision of Titus was vehemently demanded by the Judaisers, and apparently recommended by the Twelve. As Titus was intended to be a fellow-worker of St. Paul, and would accordingly be brought into frequent close contact with Jews, much was to be said for this course. What happened is not quite clear. Most think that Titus was not circumcised; others that St. Paul, receiving an assurance that the main question, that of Gentile freedom, would be decided in his favour, gave way on the minor point, and circumcised Titus, not under compulsion, but as a spontaneous act of Christian charity (compare his conduct in the case of Timothy, 16:3). Before the Conference a complete settlement was reached. The Twelve acknowledged Paul's teaching as orthodox, recognised him as the Apostle of the Gentiles, conceded his demand that the Gentiles should be free from the observance of the Law, and gave him the right hand of fellowship. After this the result of the Council was a foregone conclusion.

Some scholars take an entirely different view of the historical situation. They think that the visit to Jerusalem described in Gal 2:1-10 is not that of Ac 15 at all, but that of Ac11:29-30. They regard the Epistle to the Galatians as written before the Council, during the heat of the circumcision controversy, and they place Peter's visit to Antioch (Gal 2:12) also before the Council. Much can be said in favour of this view, and the present writer is inclined to favour it.

1. Certain men] They falsely claimed to have been sent by James (see v. 24, Gal 2:12).
2. Barnabas] St. Luke passes over Peter's visit to Antioch, and Barnabas's temporary dissimulation (Gal 2:12). 3. The journey to Jerusalem partook somewhat of the character of a triumphant progress, or demonstration in favour of Paul and Barnabas. Outside Jerusalem the Pauline party was clearly in the ascendant. 4. Even at Jerusalem the officials of the church, and its members as a whole, were favourably disposed towards St. Paul. The Judaisers were in a minority. 5. Pharisees] The only express mention of converted Pharisees. What attracted the Pharisees in Christianity was (1) the fulfilment in Christ of the Messianic hope which the devout Pharisees cherished, and (2) the doctrine of the Resurrection.

7-11. The speech of St. Peter endorses the opinions of St. Paul in every particular. He speaks of the Law as a yoke 'which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear' (cp. Gal 5:1), where St. Paul bids the Galatians not to be entangled again with the yoke of bondage, and emphasises the Pauline doctrine of salvation by grace and faith, and not by the works of the law: cp. Ro 3:24 Gal 2:16 3:2, etc. There is nothing incredible in this. It is plain from Galatians that Peter and even James were in complete agreement in principle with St. Paul (Gal 2:1), and 1 Pet makes it evident that St. Peter was much attracted and influenced by St. Paul's theology.

13. James] James, the Lord's brother, presided at the Council, doubtless in the capacity of chief ruler of the local Church of Jerusalem. We should have expected Peter to preside.

14-21. St. James' speech proves him as decided an adherent of Gentile liberty as St. Peter. He approves St. Peter's conduct in baptising Cornelius, and quotes prophecies showing that the Messianic Church will embrace all nations. The Jews are to continue to keep the Law, but the Gentiles are only to be required to abstain from certain practices offensive to Jews.

14. Simeon] RV ' Symeon.' St. James uses the ancient Hebrew form of Peter's name, instead of the more usual 'Simon.' For his name] i.e. 'that his name might be glorified in them.'

16-18. St. James cites from memory, and not quite accurately, Am 9:11,12 (LXX), of which nevertheless he preserves the true sense. 16. After this I will return] Amos simply has 'In that day,' i.e. in the day of the Messiah. The tabernacle of David] i.e. the royal family descended from David. David's family is compared to a fallen tent, because, when Amos wrote, the southern kingdom was quite insignificant compared with the northern.

17, 18. Who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world] There is nothing in Amos corresponding to these words. RV reads, 'who maketh these things known from the beginning of the world.' BM reads, 'who doeth these things which were known from the beginning of the world.'

20. St. James mentions four prohibitions: (1) pollutions of idols, (2) fornication, (3) eating the flesh of strangled animals, (4) eating blood. The object of these prohibitions was to render social intercourse between Jews and Gentiles, and particularly common meals, less difficult. Pollutions of idols] No Christian would directly worship an idol, but Gentile Christians might easily incur pollution according to Jewish ideas, (1) by buying flesh in a heathen market, (2) by attending a feast in a heathen house. In both cases there would be a danger of eating flesh offered in sacrifice to idols. Fornication] Most interpret this of ordinary fornication, but seeing this was already forbidden to all Christians, there is much to be said for J. Lightfoot's view, that what sally meant is marriage within the degrees hidden in the book of Leviticus. Such marriages, common among the heathen, would most distasteful to the Jews, and would be regarded by them as fornication; cp. 1 Cor 5:1.

Things strangled] This refers to Lv 17:13, 14; 18:16, 17, according to which the blood was drained out of all animals before they were slain. This prohibition, however, is entirely set by D and other ancient authorities in the text, and in v. 29. From blood see Lv 3:17.

17:10 19:26 Dt 12:16, 23 15:23. D and other horizons add here this injunction: 'And they should not do to others what they did not have to done to themselves.'

Here St. James recognises that Jewish Christians are still to attend the synagogue services and keep the Law. 22. This v. is evidence that the whole Church, and not merely the clergy, were consulted in matters of public policy. Judas surnamed Barabas (Barabbas) probably the brother of the Joseph Barabas who was a candidate for the apostolate (1:23).

23. The apostles and elders and brethren] Recent editors read, 'the apostles, presbyters, brethren.' Apparently the apostles and presbyters describe themselves as brethren to give the letter a fraternal affectionate character. But the text is probably corrupt.

25. Being assembled with one accord] rather, having come to one accord. 28. Observe the aim to inspiration. 34. This v. is omitted by some modern editors. It is contained in D, which adds, 'and Judas was absent.'

35. In Antioch] Here should be placed, according to the usual view, Peter's visit to Antioch, mentioned Gal 2:11. At first Peter publicly with the Gentiles, but on the arrival of 'certain from James,' he separated himself, fearing them that were of the circumcision. The rest of the Jews, and even Barnabas, 'dispersed' with him. St. Paul then publicly rebuked him, and apparently St. Peter confessed himself in the wrong. According to the other view, which the present writer favours, Peter's visit to Antioch took place before the Council. It is easier to understand the refusal to eat with the Gentiles before the Council.

Having secured the formal recognition by the Twelve of Gentile Christianity, St. Paul was free to resume his missionary labours. He first revisited the Churches founded on the First Journey, and then carried the gospel to Europe, preaching at Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth. He then returned to the Syrian Antioch, and visited Jerusalem.

15:30–16:5. The Galatians and other Churches revisited.

15:36–41. St. Paul's 'grace against Barnabas was that the latter insisted on taking with him an unsuitable assistant simply because he was a Jew.' The Church of Antioch seems to have sympathised with St. Paul (see v. 40). St. Paul was subsequently reconciled with Barnabas (1 Cor 9:6) and also with Mark (2 Tim 4:11, Col 4:10).

41. Confirming the churches] see 16:5, and cp. 14:22.

St. Paul in Europe

1. Timotheus] was probably of Lystra, not Derbe. His mother Eunice was perhaps a widow, and she, together with his grandmother Lois, educated the lad in the religion of Israel, though he was not circumcised (see 2 Tim 4:18). The whole family had been converted at St. Paul's first visit. 3. See Preface to c. 15. 4, 5. Here we have evidence that the decrees of the Council were actually promulgated in the Galatian Churches, and that they were well received.

6–40. Journey into Europe, Philippi.

6. RV 'And they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia, having been forbidden of the Holy Ghost to speak the word in Asia.' At Lystra (v. 6) they received a divine intimation that they were not to carry out their purpose (probably their main purpose in this journey) of preaching in the Roman province of Asia. Accordingly they passed through that part of the ancient Phrygia which belonged to the Roman province of Galatia, and in which were situated Iconium and Antioch, which they doubtless revisited.

Those who, like Lightfoot, hold that the churches to which the Epistle to the Galatians is addressed, were situated in North Galatia, understand the region of Phrygia and Galatia here to mean the district in N. Galatia once inhabited by Phrygians, but at this time by Gauls. Here they suppose that St. Paul was delayed by illness (Gal 4:18), and seized the opportunity of preaching and founding numerous Celtic or Gallic churches which are nowhere mentioned in Acts.

7. RV 'And when they were come over against Mysia, they assayed to go into Bithynia, and the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not.' Leaving Antioch, St. Paul journeyed northward through the province of Asia till he came to the borders of Mysia (the north-western part of the province). He then attempted to strike westward into Bithynia, but was forbidden by ‘the Spirit of Jesus.’ This remarkable expression, which makes the Holy Spirit the Spirit not only of the Father, but also of the Son, is an evidence that the true divinity of Jesus was firmly held when St. Luke wrote.

8. And they passing by Mysia (i.e. passing through it without preaching) came down to Troas] Troas, the chief port of Mysia, was made a Roman colony by Augustus, and received many privileges, because of the supposed Trojan origin of the Roman people. Similar privileges were given to the neighbouring city of Ilion.

9. The man of Macedonia has sometimes been supposed to be St. Luke, or even the guardian angel of Macedonia (Dan 10:12). The man was recognised as Macedonian by his speech, or by his dress. The introduction of Christianity into that continent, where it was destined to win its chief triumphs, is fitly prepared for by a special revelation.

10. The we indicates that St. Luke was now a member of the party. Whether he joined it at Troas, or had accompanied it all along is not clear.

12. Philippi] RV ‘Philippi, which is a city of Macedonia, the first of the district, a Roman colony.’ At Philippi, founded by Philip, father of Alexander the Great, Octavius and Antony had defeated the republican leaders, Brutus and Cassius, and the city, in honour of the victory, had been made a Roman colony with Latin rights. It lay on the great Egnatian way which united Italy and Asia, and was of great commercial importance. The chief city] lit. ‘the first.’ Some think that the meaning is that this was the first city reached by the Apostle in Macedonia, or in Europe.

13. Where prayer was wont to be made] RV ‘where we supposed there was a place of prayer’ (Gk. proseuchē). Where the Jews were too few to build a synagogue, they were wont to assemble in open-air places of prayer (proseuchēs), by the seaside, or on a river’s bank, for convenience of purification.

14. Lydia] She came from Thyatira in Lydia, a district where there were many dyers. She was a proselyte to Judaism, and a woman of some wealth and position. As she is not mentioned in the Epistle to the Philippians, she was probably then dead, or had left the city. Renan has the strange fancy that she was St. Paul’s wife. 15. Her household] the expression includes servants and slaves as well as children. Other examples of the baptism of households are 16:23 18:1.

A spirit of divination] The girl belonged to the class of ‘clairvoyants’ or ‘mediums,’ and really believed herself to be possessed by a spirit. Her recognition of the divine mission of St. Paul indicates a considerable degree of spiritual discernment. The expulsion of the spirit need not have been a miracle. The girl recognised in St. Paul a minister of the supreme God, supreme, therefore, over the spirit which possessed her. Hence the command to the spirit to come forth was (in her belief) authoritative, and consequently effectual.

18. Being grieved] Although the testimony of the girl was true, St. Paul would not receive it, because it emanated, as he supposed, from an evil spirit. Similarly Jesus would not receive the testimony of demons to His Divine Sonship and Messiahship (Mk 1:25, etc.).

20. Magistrates] At Philippi there were two magistrates (duumviris) corresponding to the consuls at Rome. Provincial duumviris often claimed and received the title of pretor, which is the title by which St. Luke calls them here. Jews] Christianity was not yet clearly distinguished from Judaism. Judaism was a lawful religion for Jews, but not for Roman citizens. 22. Paul and Silas probably protested that they were Romans, but in the tumult their protest passed unheeded.

27. By Roman custom a gaoler who allowed a prisoner to escape suffered the same penalty as the prisoner. If the charge was a capital one he suffered death. The non-escape of the prisoners was due to terror and amazement. 30. What must I do to be saved?] The gaoler, to have asked such a question, must have been a hearer of Paul and Barnabas, and have been impressed by their teaching. The strange events of the night and the kindness shown him by Paul now bring matters to a crisis. 35. According to D, the motive of St. Paul’s release was alarm at the earthquake. The servants] Gk. ‘the lictors,’ officers who attended the magistrates, carrying axes and rods, symbols of the power to punish.

37. Being Romans] i.e. Roman citizens. In his speech against Verres Cicero says: ‘to fetter a Roman citizen is a crime, to scourge him a scandal, to slay him parricide.’ Roman citizenship could be acquired (1) by birth, if both parents were Romans; (2) by grant to certain cities or districts; (3) by grant to individuals for political or military services, e.g., long service in the army; (4) by purchase (22-28). As Tarsus did not come under (2), and Paul was born free, his father and mother must have been Roman citizens. The chief ivileges of citizenship at this time were, (1) right to appeal to the Emperor, (2) freedom from degrading punishments, such as onds, scourging, and crucifixion.

39. Desired them to depart] representing at in the excited state of the city it was impossible to protect them. 40. Comforted] shortened. And departed] Silas and Timothy accompanied St. Paul, but (since the 'we' is low dropped) St. Luke was probably left behind to take charge of the Philippian church (see 17). He seems to have made Philippi his headquarters for several years, joining St. Paul at Troas during the Third missionary Journey (203).

1-15. Thessalonica and Berea. 1. Amphipolis] 32 m. W. of Philippi. Apollonia] 30 m. W. of Amphipolis. Thessalonica] now Salonika, was the capital the province of Macedonia, and an important commercial centre. St. Paul's plan was first to evangelise the seats of government and trade centres, knowing that if Christianity is once established in these places it would read through the Empire. 3. Christ] R.V. he Christ, i.e. the Messiah. 4. Devout reeks] Not necessarily proselytes, but persons who had given up idolatry, attended the synagogue services, and worshipped the God of the Jews. 5. Lewd fellow] lit. 'certain evil men of the idlers in the market-place.' Jason] probably identical with the Jason of Ro 16:21, and therefore a Jew. is correct name was probably Jesus or Jason. 6. The rulers] The Gk. word used here (politea), a rare and peculiar one is from to be correct by an inscription on an ch, which also contains the names Sospiter, sius, and Secundus. 9. Taken security] The immediate departure of Paul and Silas renders probable that Jason gave security that St. Paul would leave the city, and that the Apostle sent this to undertaking, and was thus prevented from revisiting the Thessalonians:

1 Th 2:18. The Epistles to the Thessalonians, who are presented as mainly a Gentile Church (1 Th 2:14), imply a much longer residence at hessalonica than three weeks. V. 2, therefore, must be understood to mean that he worked for three weeks among the Jews, and afterwards turned to the Gentiles, among whom he laboured for three or four months.

10. Berea (Bereea] a Macedonian town of some importance, 50 m. SW. of Thessalonica. to this 'out of the way' place (Cicero) St. Paul retreated, probably for rest and quiet.

14. As it were to the sea] i.e. they pretended to go to the sea (to elude pursuit), and then turned off and went by land to Athens. Others translate simply 'to the sea,' and suppose that St. Paul embarked at Dion and went by sea to Athens. 15. Unto Athens] D adds: 'But he passed by (i.e. did not preach in) Thessaly, for he was prevented from preaching the word to them.'

It appears from 1 Th 3:1 that Timothy and Silas did actually join St. Paul at Athens according to his instructions, but the Apostle being filled with anxiety about the state of the Macedonian Churches which he had just founded, sent them back again to confirm them, and to bring him accurate tidings concerning them. Timothy was sent to Thessalonica, Silas (apparently) to Philippi, so that St. Paul was left alone in Athens. On returning from their mission, Timothy and Silas found that St. Paul had gone on to Corinth, and there they rejoined him (18:5).

16-34. Athens.

After leaving Berea, St. Paul entered the Roman province of Achaia, which was at this time a senatorial province, governed by a proconsul, and of which the capital was Corinth. He first visited Athens. Athens, though fallen from its former glory, was still the artistic and philosophic, and, in many ways, the religious, capital of the world. The city was full of temples and altars, and the people so devoted to religious ceremonies and mysteries that they merited the title (whether in a good or bad sense) of 'superstitious' (v. 22). Athens, on account of its illustrious history, was held in honour by the Romans. It was allowed to retain its ancient institutions, but the democracy had long lost all real power, and the affairs of the city were administered by the aristocratic court of the Areopagus (v. 19). Athens was famed for its university, the most renowned in the world, at which a large number of students from all parts of the empire were always in residence. As the original home of philosophy, Athens was the headquarters of all the chief philosophical schools. Among its sacred spots were the Academy of Plato, the Lyceum of Aristotle, the Porch of Zeno, and the Garden of Epicurus. The only two philosophies, however, which at this time exercised an important influence upon politics and social life, were Stoicism and Epicureanism, which, for this reason, are singled out by St. Luke for especial mention.

16. Wholly given to idolatry] Xenophon calls Athens 'one altar, one sacrifice and offering to the gods.' St. Paul, as a Jew, would have no sympathy with the artistic beauty of the Athenian statues and temples, but only horror at the superstition which they represented.

17. In the market daily] So Socrates used to sit every day and all day in the market-place of Athens, discussing philosophy with all comers. The market-place, or agora, of Athens afforded a glorious architectural spectacle. 'Here the eye fell on portico after portico, painted by the brush of famous artists, and adorned with the noblest statues. But St. Paul would not have admired these so much as the tower and water-clock of Andronicus, telling out to him the hours of his solitary waiting. This still stands to-day. The Agora was dominated on its S. side by the abrupt hill of Mars, and the still more impressive heights of the Acropolis. In the Stoa Poecile he met with the successors of Zeno, the Stoics with whom, as with the Epicureans, he, like a second Socrates, disputed daily' (F. C. Conybeare).

18. Epicureans and Stoics. At this time Stoicism was the philosophy of the majority of serious-minded people. Epicureanism that of the frivolous and irreligious. The Stoics, so called from the Porch (Stoa Poecile) at Athens, in which their founder, Zeno of Citium, lectured (about 278 B.C.), had many points of contact with Judaism, especially with Pharisaism. Josephus speaks of the tenets of the Stoics and of the Pharisees as being very similar. The spirit of both was somewhat narrow and austere. Both rejected compromise, believing that a man should suffer persecution and even death rather than depart in the least degree from the path of piety and virtue. Both were devoted to Law, the Pharisees to the Law of Moses, the Stoics to the Law of Nature, which they regarded as an actual code imposed on mankind by the Creator. The Stoics were strong fatalists, denying the freedom of the will; the Pharisees were strong predestinarians. Both believed in Providence, or the rational ordering of the world by an intelligent being, a doctrine denied by the Epicureans. The Pharisees were monotheists; the Stoics approximated to monotheism. They believed in a Divine Reason, or Logos, pervading all things and ordering all things, though (being Pantheists) they regarded it as the soul of the world, rather than as a distinct and transcendent personal Being. They also believed in a future life for man, though not in actual immortality. St. Paul, therefore, decidedly sympathised with the Stoics as against the Epicureans, whose doctrine that the end of life is pleasure, was, of course, highly distasteful to him. Epicureanism was reprobated both by Jews and by serious pagans. Josephus says: 'The Epicureans cast providence out of life, and deny that God takes care of human affairs, and hold that the universe is not directed with a view to the continuance of the whole by the blessed and incorruptible Being, but that it is carried along automatically and heedlessly.'

18. Babbler] lit. 'a picker up of seeds' (like a bird); hence a shallow talker who picks up scraps of information, and retails them at secondhand. And the resurrection] better, 'and Anastasis.' The Athenians, either in jest or in earnest, seem to have understood Anastasis (the Resurrection) to be a female deity, the wife of Jesus.

19. And they took him, etc.] Some translate, 'And they arrested him and brought him before the court of the Areopagus.' But there is no indication in St. Paul's speech that he was on his trial, or that any judgment was passed upon him (v. 32). We prefer, therefore, the rendering, 'And they took him by the hand, and brought him to the Hill of Ares' (Mars' Hill). The Hill of Ares, or Areopagus, is an eminence situated nearly due W. of the Acropolis. Here, from early times, the Court of the Areopagus met in the open air. The court was not sitting, so that the place was available for a quiet lecture and discussion.

22–32. Paul's speech. It is discreet and to the point. It deals not with the OT., with which his hearers were unacquainted, but with the truths of natural religion, many of which were understood (though only partially) by the Athenian philosophers (cp. the speech at Lystra, 14:14–5).

22. Too superstitious] rather, 'more religious' (than other men). Both senses are possible, but the tactful apostle would be more likely to begin his speech with a compliment than with a reproach.

23. Your devotions] RV 'the objects of your worship.'

TO THE UNKNOWN GOD] RV 'To an unknown God.' Several ancient writers mention such altars. Pausanias speaks of 'altars of unknown [lit. 'named'] and unknown gods and heroes.' Philostratus says, 'It is more prudent to speak well of all gods, especially at Athens, where altars are erected even to unknown gods.' At Athens during a plague Epimenides let loose at the Areopagus black and white sheep, and commanded the Athenians to sacrifice 'to the proper god,' wherever the sheep lay down. Often 'the proper god' could not be clearly ascertained, and so an altar was raised to an unknown god. The inscription (as St. Paul probably knew) had a purely pagan meaning: but the phrase was a fine one; it was capable of a higher sense, and in this higher sense St. Paul made it the text of his sermon.

24. Creation was altogether denied by the Epicureans, who regarded the atoms of matter as eternal; and only imperfectly recognised by the Stoics, who were pantheists, and did not regard the Divine Person which shaped the world as distinct from it. The doctrine of creation, as preached by St. Paul, was consequently a stranger one at Athens.

26. The Apostle rebukes the narrow pride

4. A quotation from the ‘Phenomena’ of Strato, a Cilician poet. Almost the same idea occurs in the ‘Hymn to Zeus’ of Cle-

7. The argument probably is: Since we the offspring of God, in that our souls are material and immortal, we ought to regard author of our souls as an immortal and spiritual object, and not like silver or gold or material object. The Stoics would have apathetised with this sentiment. Seneca says, you shall not form God of silver and gold, the likeness of Him cannot be moulded of material... God is near thee, He is with thee, He is within.

10. Times of this ignorance] cp. 14. 16. Ret-" i.e. turn from idolatry. Idolatry was donable in the times of ignorance, but now the True Light has appeared, it is a heinous

31. St. Paul was accustomed, in preach-" to the heathen, to lead up to the idea of a fragment to come (24 25). Hath given assurance] that He will be the Judge. The Resur-" tion of Jesus is the evidence that He will be the future Judge of the world. 34. Diox-" nus the Areopagite] i.e. a member of the court of Areopagus. As all members of the areopagus had passed through the office of archon, Dionysius must have been of high official position. Tradition makes him bishop of Athens, and a martyr. The work ‘On the heavenly hierarchy’ attributed to him is famous.

According to this passage Dionysius and Amasis were the first converts made in Achaia (reece), but, according to 1 Cor 16. 15, 17, a Corinthian named Stephanas, who must have an converted later. The explanation probably is that St. Paul regards Athens as a free independent city, not as part of the Roman province of Achaia.

CHAPTER 18

SECOND MISSIONARY JOURNEY (concluded)

11-18. St. Paul at Corinth. Corinth was the capital of the Roman province of Achaia. The city had been destroyed by fire in 46 B.C. by the Roman general Mummius, but had been refounded as a Roman colony in 46 B.C. by Julius Caesar. Situated on the Corinthian isthmus, it had two ports, Conchreae on the Ægean, and Lechæum on the Gulf of Lepanto. The traffic between Italy and Asia chiefly passed through Corinth, which rapidly became a populous and wealthy trading centre. The morals of the Corinthians, who were devoted to pleasure and the worship of Venus (Aphrodite), were such as to outrage even pagan sentiment. Allusions to the prevailing sensuality of the city, which was encouraged by its religion, are to be found in the Epistles to the Corinthians. Here Paul stayed a year and six months, but St. Luke (for whatever reason) gives us few particulars of his work. From Corinth St. Paul indited his two Epistles to the Thessalonians.

2. Aquila... Prisca] As Aquila and Prisca (Prisca) are not said to have been converted by Paul, they were probably already Christians. The edict of emperor Claudius (about 52 A.D.) which expelled the Jews from Rome, was caused by tumults which arose in the Jewish quarter, when the faith of Christ was preached there. This at least is the probable inference to be drawn from the words of Suetonius, ‘He expelled the Jews from Rome, because they were in a state of continual tumult at the instigation of one Creatus’ (Creatus is probably ‘Christus,’ or Christ). Aquila and Prisca were St. Paul’s hosts at Corinth. Departing from Corinth with St. Paul (v. 18), they remained at Ephesus, where they were instrumental in converting Apollos (v. 26). The church at Ephesus met in their house (1 Cor 16. 19). They then revisited Rome, perhaps to prepare for the Apostle’s visit, and there also their house was the Church’s meeting-place (Ro 16. 23). After St. Paul’s trial they returned to Ephesus (2 Tim 4. 19), which is our last notice of them. Pontus] with Bithynia formed a Roman province occupying the S. coast of the Euxine (Black Sea).

3. Tentmakers] All Jews, however wealthy, were taught a trade.

5. Silas and Timotheus] see 17. 15. They brought money with them, so that Paul no longer worked with his hands, but gave himself entirely to preaching (2 Cor 11. 9 Phil 4. 15).

Was pressed in the spirit] RV ‘was constrained by the word.’ i.e. devoted himself continually to preaching. 6. Blasphemed] They said ‘Jesus is anathema’ (1 Cor 12. 3).

8. Crispus] St. Paul baptised this important convert with his own hands, as also Gaius, and the household of Stephanas (1 Cor 1. 16). From 1 Cor 16. 15, 17 we learn that Stephanas was the first convert made in Achaia.

12. Gallo] the brother of Nero’s tutor Seneca, and uncle of the poet Lucan, was a well-educated, amiable, and accomplished man, who, having filled the office of consul, was sent out as proconsul of Achaia about 52 A.D.

17. The Greeks hated and despised the Jews, and seeing that their contempt was shared by Gallio, they ventured to insult the Jews in his presence by assaulting Sosthenes. Gallio cared, etc.] This may either mean that Gallio pretended not to see the assault on Sosthenes, or else that he cared nothing about the religious questions involved.

18. A vow] After delivery from danger or recovery from sickness, the Jews were accustomed to take upon themselves a modified form of the Nazirite vow (see Nu 6). As the special consecration of this state forbade intercourse with Gentiles, St. Paul deferred it till his work at Corinth was finished. The essential ceremony was the presentation of the hair grown during the period of separation at the altar at Jerusalem together with certain specified sacrifices; hence the head was shaved both at the beginning and at the end of the period of separation. See further 21. It is not necessary to suppose that St. Paul took this vow to conciliate the Jews or the Jewish Christians. He simply adopted the usual Jewish way of thanking God for a great deliverance.

Many additional particulars about the Corinthian ministry of St. Paul can be learnt from 1 and 2 Cor. See the commentary on those Epistles.

19–22. Visit to Jerusalem. Paul probably sailed in a ship specially chartered to convey Jews to Palestine to keep the Passover.

19. Ephesus] The prohibition to preach the word in Asia (16:8) had now apparently been removed. Aquila and Priscilla were left in Ephesus to prepare the way for the great missionary effort that he desired to make in this important centre.

21. This feast] i.e. Pentecost (or possibly Passover) 52 A.D. Clearly St. Paul had vowed to make his Nazirite offering at this feast. The RV omits the words referring to the feast altogether, but they are strongly attested.

22. And gone up] viz. to Jerusalem. We may suppose that St. Paul spent some time at Jerusalem, before going to Antioch.

24. Apollos] The name is a contraction of Apollonius. He is mentioned again 19:1 1 Cor 1:12 3:1. 6:16 12:13. He had been instructed and baptised by the disciples of the Baptist, and therefore regarded Jesus as the Messiah (Mc 17, etc.), perhaps even as 'the Son of God,' and 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1:29, 34). His knowledge was accurate as far as it went, and his faith was sincere. That he received Christian baptism (probably from Aquila) is a certain inference from v. 25 compared with 19:17.

Eloquent] RV 'learned.' Both meanings may be included. Probably Apollos was acquainted with the philosophy of the Alexandrian Jew Philo, and his speculations about the Divine Logos ('Reason' or 'Word').

26. The synagogue] We infer that Priscilla and Aquila, though Christians, still attended the synagogue. 27. Wrote . . . the disciples] Christians travelling received 'letters of commendation' to other Christian Churches, which secured them hospitality and admission to communion (cp. 2 Cor 31). Helped them much] RM 'helped much through grace which they had believed.' Apollos was so popular at Corinth, that his admirers soon formed a faction or party in the Church (1 Cor 1:12 34).

28. Convinced] RV 'confused.'

CHAPTER 19

Ephesus

1–41. Paul at Ephesus. Opposition of the manufacturers of idols. St. Paul, leaving Antioch in S. Galatia (see 18:22), approached Ephesus not by the usual level route leading through Colosee and Laodicea (see Col 21), but through the northern and more mountainous route leading down the Cayster valley (see 19:1, 'the upper coast,' RV 'the upper country'). He stayed at Ephesus over two years and three months, see vv. 8, 10, 22 (in 24:31 the Apostle calls it three years), and making the city his centre, evangelised the whole of the province of Asia. According to D he did not originally intend to preach in Ephesus, but the Holy Spirit constrained him (contrast 16:6). We hear little here of opposition from the Jews. The craftmen and the uneducated classes were hostile, but the magistrates of the city (v. 35) and of the province (v. 31) were not unfriendly.

1. Ephesus] the capital of the Roman province of Asia, and the most important seaport of Asia Minor, was especially renowned for its great temple of Diana (Artemis), which was one of the wonders of the world. St. Paul chose it for a prolonged stay because (like Corinth) it was on the main line of communication between E. and W., and also because it was a great centre of religious pilgrimage: cp. v. 27.

Certain disciples] They must have arrived since Apollos's departure, otherwise Apollos would have instructed them more perfectly.

2. Have ye received] RV 'did ye receive pieces of silver] 50,000 drachmae = £1,700, or, in actual purchasing power, much more.

21. Rome] There is evidence that Paul planned the evangelisation of the Western Empire many years before he actually undertook it: cp. Ro 1:10, 15, 22-24. 22. Timothy and Erastus (not the Erastus of Ro 16:23) were sent, partly to remind the Churches of Europe of the teaching and example of St. Paul, and partly to collect money for the poor saints at Jerusalem (24:17 1 Cor 16:1-10). Shortly after this 1 Corinthians was written.

23. St. Luke mentions no persecutions or trials until the close of the Ephesian ministry, yet we know that though 'a great door and effectual' was opened to the Apostle, yet there were 'many adversaries' (1 Cor 16:9); that he was in daily danger of death (15:20-31); that Priscus and Aquila to save his life 'laid down their own necks' (Ro 16:20); and that he 'fought with beasts,' i.e. savage enemies (1 Cor 15:32).

23. That way] i.e. Christianity (9, etc.).

24. Shrines] Many small terra-cotta and marble shrines of Artemis, containing a figure of the goddess, have been found near Ephesus. They were either dedicated in the Temple, or taken home by devout worshippers as memorials of their pilgrimage.

Diana] Really a native Asiatic deity, a personification of the reproductive and nutritive powers of nature. From certain quite superficial resemblances the Greeks identified her with their own Artemis, but her worship always remained Asian in type. The Temple had been burnt down 356 B.C., and rebuilt on a scale of sumptuous magnificence. 26. All Asia] The Temple had been built by contributions from the whole of Asia.

28. Were full of wrath] D adds, 'running into the street' cried out, etc. Great is Diana] D has, 'Great Diana of the Ephesians!' an invocation of the goddess. This reading may be correct. 29. The theatre] would hold over 24,000 people. 31. The chief of Asia] Gk. the 'Asiarchs.' They were officials, not of the city of Ephesus, but of the province of Asia, and were specially connected with the worship of the Roman emperor.

33. Since Alexander was a Jew, it seems probable that the Jews put him forward to explain to the angry mob that they had no sympathy whatever with St. Paul's proceedings. The Jews' contempt for idols was well known, and therefore there was imminent danger that they would be involved in a massacre directed against enemies of idolatry.

And they drew Alexander, etc.] or, 'and some of the multitude instructed Alexander.' The reading is doubtful and the sense obscure.

35. The town clerk] This important official drafted the decrees of the senate and people, and sealed them when they were passed. He presided at the lawful assemblies of the people.

A worshipper RV 'temple-keeper,' Gk. neokoros, lit. 'temple-sweeper.' A second-cent. inscription speaks of Ephesus as 'doubly temple-keeper of the Emperors, and temple-keeper of Artemis.' From Jupiter] or, 'from heaven.' The 'image' (the word is not expressed in the Gk.) was probably not an idol, but a meteoric stone, in which the goddess was supposed to dwell.

37. Blasphemers] It is clear that St. Paul had expressed his views with gentleness and moderation.

38. The law, etc.) rather, 'the courts are open,' or, 'court days are kept.'

Deputies] rather, 'proconsuls,' the correct title of the Roman governor in a senatorial province like Asia. There was, of course, only one proconsul in Asia. The plural is colloquial, 'there are such things as law courts and proconsuls.' Implead] RV 'accuse.'

1-6. Paul in Macedonia and Greece. St. Paul waited at Ephesus until the return of Timothy and Erastus, and left Ephesus shortly after Pentecost, 55 a.d. (1 Cor 16:8-12). We learn from Ro 15:10 that he spent some time in Macedonia, and extended his missionary labours (which were marked by signal miracles) as far as Illyricum. From Macedonia he wrote the second Corinthian Epistle, and (according to a widely held opinion) the Epistle to the Galatians. In Corinth he spent the three winter months of 55, 56 a.d., and there he wrote the Epistle to the Romans.

3. The plot was to kill Paul on board the Jewish pilgrim ship in which he had taken his passage.

4. 5. The men mentioned here were delegates bearing the contributions of St. Paul's Gentile churches to the afflicted mother church of Jerusalem. Gaius] to be distinguished from Gaius the Macedonian of 19:20, and the Gaius of 3:11. He was a neighbour, and, perhaps, a friend of Timothy, and had probably been converted, like Timothy, during St. Paul's first missionary journey. Tychicus] He was with St. Paul at Rome during his first imprisonment, and was the bearer of Ephesians (Eph 6:21, 22) and Colossians (Col 4:7-8). He is mentioned again 2 Tim 4:12 Tit 3:12. Trophimus] a Gentile convert of Ephesus, whom St. Paul was accused of introducing into the Temple at Jerusalem (21:28-29). He is mentioned again 2 Tim 4:12. These i.e. probably Tychicus and Trophimus only, not the whole party.

6. We] St. Paul found St. Luke at Philippi, where he had left him in charge of the Church (v. 18), and, after celebrating the Passover with the local Christians, took him with him to Tross.

7-12. Tross.

7. The first clear reference to the keeping of the Lord's Day, with which may be compared 1 Cor 16:8. The expression 'Lord's Day' first occurs Rev 1:10. The disciples] RV 'we,' indicating the presence of St. Luke. To break bread i.e. to celebrate the Lord's Supper. This was now clearly the stated Christian service on the Lord's Day. As the Jewish days began at sunset, probably the Christians assembled on Saturday evening, as we should call it: see further on 246.47.

10. His life is in him] It has been argued both here and at Mt 9:26 that the death was only apparent; but St. Luke, who was a medical man, and was present, says expressly that Eutychus was dead. We have here, therefore, probably a miracle of resurrection.

11. Broken bread] RV 'broken the bread,' vis. of the Eucharist. And eaten] probably of the agapè, which here apparently followed the Communion: see 246.47.

18-35. St. Paul's Speech to the Elders of Ephesus. He reminds them of his ministry among them (vv. 18-21). And now that the Spirit draws him to Jerusalem, to face the unknown future, he entrusts the Ephesian church to the charge of the elders to guard her against the heresies and enemies which he foresees (vv. 22-31). He concludes by recommending them in touching words to the protection of the Almighty (vv. 32-35).

Lying in wait] RV 'plots.' 25. Shall see my face no more] St. Paul is not here speaking as a prophet, but is merely giving utterance to an overpowering presentiment that the time of his death is near. As a matter of fact, his life was preserved many years, and he subsequently revisited Miletus (9 Tim 4:20), Ephesus (1 Tim 18:5 114), and other places in Asia.

28. We have here a very decided testimony that though Christian ministers may be elected by the people, their authority comes from God, whose ambassadors they are. Overseers] a literal translation of the Gk. word episcopus (Lat. episcopus, E. 'bishop'). At this time the title 'bishop' (i.e. overseer) was freely applied to the Christian presbyters ('elders') (Phil 1). By the beginning of the second cent. (perhaps already in the Pastoral Epistles) the term was generally restricted, as now, to the chief ruler of a church.

THE ACTS

for the small ships of the ancients. 4. Disciples] RV 'the disciples.'
7. Ptolemais] Originally called Acoo, its name was changed to Ptolemais by Ptolemy Philadelphus, when, after the death of Alexander the Great, it came into his possession. It is situated on the coast a few miles to the N. of the promontory of Carmel, and is now called Acre.
8. Philip] see 6 and c. 8. The Evangelist] Evangelists were itinerant officers, whose duty it was to break new ground, and establish new churches. They ranked below the prophets, and above the presbyters or pastors. Philip, originally a 'deacon,' has now, through the success of his missionary work, been advanced to a higher dignity. The NT. never uses 'evangelist' in the sense of a writer of a Gospel. 9. Prophecy] There were female prophets under the OT.: Miriam, Ex 15; Deborah, Jg 4; Nodziah, Neh 6; Huldah, 2 K 22; cp. Isa 8. See Joel 2, 28, Ac 2, 17.
10. Agabus] see 11, 28. For his symbolic action, cp. 1 K 22, 1; Isa 20, 2; Jer 13, 1; Ezek 4, 5. For the fulfilment, see v. 27. 15. Took up our carriages] rather, 'packed up our baggage.' 16. Brought with them one Mnason] A more probable translation is, 'brought us to Mnason,' etc. Mnason's house was probably half-way between Cesarea and Jerusalem. D (Latin) reads, 'and when they had come to a certain town, we lodged with Mnason, an old disciple of Cyprus, and leaving there we came to Jerusalem.'

ST. PAUL IN JERUSALEM (Chs 21, 17–28)

18. James] The Lord's 'brother,' the acknowledged head of the Church of Jerusalem: cp. 15, 19, etc. 19. Particularly] i.e. in minute detail. 20. The Lord (i.e. Jesus)] RV 'God.'
23, 24. The four men were Nazirites (see Nu 6), and St. Paul was advised to pay for their sacrifices, and to associate himself with their Nazirite vow during the week that it had still to run (see v. 27). By thus becoming a Nazirite, and defraying the sacrificial expenses of these poorer Nazirites (the latter a most meritorious work, according to contemporary opinion: see Jos. 'Ant.' 19, 16, 1, St. Paul would prove himself a good Jew as well as a good Christian.

The Jewish Christians were suspicious of St. Paul, not because he refused to circumcise his Gentile converts (this point had already been settled at the Council of Jerusalem), but because it was reported that he advised even Jews to neglect the observance of the Law (v. 21). The charge was false in point of fact, but it had this amount of truth in it, that St. Paul's principle that a man is saved by faith in Christ and not by the works of the Law, would naturally lead to the abandonment of the ceremonial Law even by Jews.

25. See c. 15.

26. Entered, etc.] We may freely translate this difficult passage thus: 'He entered into the Temple, informing the priests that within seven days (see v. 27) the days of their purification would be accomplished; and he purposed to remain with them in the Temple for a whole week, until the legal sacrifice had been offered for each one of them.'

27 f. The outer court of the Temple was called 'the Court of the Gentiles.' Within this was 'the Court of Israel,' separated from it by a high wall with doors (see v. 30). Inscriptions upon the barrier denounced the penalty of death upon all Gentile intruders. One of these has been preserved, and runs: 'No alien is to pass within the fence and enclosure round the Temple. Whosoever shall be taken shall be responsible to himself alone for the death which will ensue.' See also Jos. 'Ant.' 15. 11. 5.

30. They drew him and all his companions 'out of the Temple,' i.e. out of the Court of Israel, and closed the doors of this court, ostensibly to prevent any more Gentiles from entering.

31. Went about to] i.e. were seeking to. The chief captain of the band] rather, the tribune of the Roman cohort, which was stationed in the fortress Antonia, adjoining the Temple. 34. Castle] lit. 'encampment.' The fortress Antonia is meant. 36. Away with him] i.e. Slay him.

38. Art not thou] rather, 'Thou art not then the Egyptian,' etc. Four thousand men] rather, the four thousand men of the Sicarii. The Sicarii (i.e. assassins) were the extreme members of the zealot party. They carried out their 'national' policy by openly assassinating influential Jews supposed to be friendly to Rome. Josephus says, 'But an Egyptian false prophet did the Jews more mischief still. He got together 30,000 deluded men, whom he led round from the wilderness to the Mount of Olives, and intended to break into Jerusalem by force from that place. He said that at his command the walls of Jerusalem would fall down' ('War,' 2. 13. 5; 'Ant.' 20. 8. 6). Felix dispersed them, but the Egyptian escaped.

39. St. Paul was not without civic pride. Tarsus was the seat of a famous university, and had produced several of the most eminent Stoic philosophers. On its coins it proudly boasted itself 'Self-Governing Metropolis.' Citizenship of Tarsus was confined to a select few of the inhabitants, so that its possession was proof of respectability and social standing.

CHAPTER 22

ST. PAUL'S DEFENCE

St. Paul was accused of (1) hostility to the Jews, (2) contempt for the Jewish Law, and (3) the desecration of the Temple. He answers all these charges by showing, (1) that he was a Jew by birth, trained by Gamaliel, and so zealous for the Law, that he had been a persecutor of the Christian faith; (2) that his conversion to Christianity was the result of a direct divine revelation, made first at Damascus, and confirmed by a subsequent revelation to Ananias; (3) that even after his conversion he continued to honour the Temple, and to worship there, and saw a vision there; (4) that his preaching to the Gentiles was the result of a divine command, consequent upon the unbelief of the Jews.

1. Fathers] i.e. the Sanhedrists and rabbis.

4. This way] i.e. Christianity; see on 9.

5. The estate, etc.] i.e. the Sanhedrin.

9. And were afraid] RV omits these words. Heard not] i.e. did not distinguish the words, or understand the meaning of the voice; cp. Jn 12.

13. Looked up] or, 'received my sight again and looked.'

17. A trance] Some identify this trance with that mentioned 2 Cor 12; but this is (for chronological reasons) unlikely.

22-C. 23. Paul before the Sanhedrin.

23. Cast off] or, 'shook.' 24. Chief captain] i.e. tribune. The castle] i.e. the fortress of Antonia; see 21.

25. Bound him with thongs] The correct reading probably means, 'And when they had stretched him out ready for the scourging.' A Roman see 16.

27. Chief captain] i.e. tribune.

28. See on 16. It is evident that the chief captain had not bought the citizenship under Claudius (41-54 A.D.), who sold it for a merely nominal sum.

CHAPTER 23

ST. PAUL SENT TO CESAREA

1. St. Paul often asserts his good conscience before God and man: see 22 24.

2. Ananias] is not the same as Ananias (46). He was the son of Nebediaus, and held the high priesthood from 47-59 A.D. His rapacity and violence were notorious. To smite him] because, being a prisoner, he spoke without being asked: cp. Jn 18.

3. God shall smite thee] St. Paul's angry retort has often been contrasted with our Lord's mild words on a similar occasion (Jn 18).

But St. Paul's rebuke was well deserved. Thou whitewall] i.e. 'thou hypocrite.' The allusion is to the practice of limewashing dirty walls to conceal
THE ACTS

5. A contrarieto the law see Jn 7, and cp. Dt 19, etc.

As the high priest, when present, presided over the Sanhedrin, it is somewhat strange that St. Paul should not have known Ananias was. A possible explanation is that St. Paul was somewhat short-sighted.

2-35. St. Paul is sent to Cæsarea.

1. The men who plotted against St. Paul are probably Sicarii or Assassins (see on 21), on we know that the high priest Ananias not scruple to employ to remove his mites. 16. St. Paul's nephew was perhaps anbinical student at Jerusalem, as St. Paul's life was a Pharisee of the Pharisees. He declared, like the Pharisees, he looked for the coming of the Messiah (i.e. the Second Coming) of the Messiah (i.e. the Second Coming) of the Messiah (i.e. the Second Coming) of the Messiah (i.e. the Second Coming), and claimed in his life he was not cut short before the great day his life was attained.

2-30. Lysias presents his action in the most favourable light. He makes no mention of his illegal order to scourge the prisoner, and takes credit to himself for his zeal in securing a Roman citizen, whereas, as a matter of fact, he had no idea at the time that St. Paul was a Roman citizen. 27. An army RV 'a soldiers.' 31. Antipatris founded by the Great, now Rais el-Ain.

13. The governor i.e. Antonius Felix, curator of Judea, circ. 52-58 A.D. His opious repression of the Zealots called into being a new and still more pernicious class of husiasts, the Sicarii, or Assassins: see on 21. His folly and cruelty goaded the ion into disaffection and rebellion. 34. Of ica] Cilicia and Judea were at this time nor provinces, attached to the superior province of Syria. Hence Felix could have sent a proconsul for trial to the governor of Syria, if he had wished. 25. Herod's judgment hall the palace built by Herod the Great at Cæsarea, where Roman procurator resided. It was also a prison, and would contain a guard-room.

CHAPTER 24

ST. PAUL BEFORE FELIX

1. Tertullus] in spite of his Roman name, he has been a Greek or even a Jew (cp. 'our

24. Twenty. 27. Porcius Festus] succeeded Felix as procurator of Judea. He died after a short tenure of office, having governed, upon the whole, well. He is credited with having (for a time) suppressed the Sicarii or Assassins.
Paul in prison for the sake of Drusilla' (a very probable statement).

Remark. St. Paul spent two whole years in prison at Caesarea. How was the time occupied? Some critics suppose that he wrote the third group of his Epistles (Philippians, Colossians, Ephesians, Philemon). Much can be said for this view. E.g. in Phil 1:18 he says, 'my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the prelominium or (palace),' and we know from Ac 23:28 that he was confined in the prelominium (palace) of Herod. But upon the whole it seems more probable that all four were written at Rome (e.g. 'they of Caesar's household,' Phil 4:22, naturally, though not necessarily, suggests Rome). St. Luke was doubtless busy collecting materials for his Gospel and Acts, transcribing his own notes, etc. He probably obtained much information from Philip the Evangelist who resided at Caesarea: from James the Lord's 'brother,' and from Mary the Virgin, or from some intimate female friend of hers.

ST. PAUL BEFORE FESTUS

2. The high priest] RV 'the chief priests.'

3. Favour. They desired from the judge partiality, not justice; and probably offered him money. 5. Able] rather, 'influential.'

6. More than, etc.] RV 'not more than eight or ten days.'

9. Provincial governors were generally anxious to be on good terms with their subjects, because, when their term of office was over, the provincials had the right to complain of them to the Emperor. Before me] The proposal was that Paul should be tried by the Sanhedrin, and that Festus should be present to see fair play.

10. II. The appeal was forced upon him because, (1) trial by the Sanhedrin (even with Festus present as moderator) meant certain condemnation; and (2) there seemed no prospect of release without appeal. Festus was too just to pronounce his condemnation; but he was also too timid to incur the odium of pronouncing him innocent. 10. I stand] RV (correctly) 'I am (now) standing before Cesar's judgment-seat' (i.e. thy judgment-seat, O Festus); 'where I ought to be judged' (and not before a Jewish court, like the Sanhedrin).

12. The council] i.e. the governor's legal advisors.

13. King Agrippa and Bernice] Agrippa II (Marcus Julius Agrippa) was the son of Agrippa I and Cypros. See art. 'Dynasty of the Herods.' His sister Bernice, with whom at this time he was living on terms of criminal intimacy, was an attractive but dissolute woman. At thirteen she was married to her wife of Polemo, king of Cilicia, and mistress of Vespasian and Titus. To salute] RV 'and saluted.' On the arrival of the Roman governor, the inferior rulers naturally made haste to show him respect.

19. Superstition] RV 'religion.'

20. Doubted] RV 'was perplexed how to inquire concerning these things.'

21. Augustus] lit. 'the Augustus.' 'Augustus' originally a family name, had now become an official title of the Emperor.

23. Chief captains] i.e. tribunes.

26. As Agrippa was expert in all matters of the Jewish law, Festus hoped that he would help him to compose a letter to the Emperor, which would make it clear what the charges against Paul really were.

CHAPTER 26

DEFENCE BEFORE AGrippa

1-32. St. Paul before Agrippa. This speech, though in form a defence to the Jews, is really intended by St. Luke to be St. Paul's defence to the world—an apology for his whole life and work.

Analysis. Opening compliment to Agrippa (vv. 2, 3): the Apostle's orthodox Pharisaic education (vv. 4, 5): he is really called in question because he believes in the hope of all orthodox Jews, the coming of the Messiah, and the Resurrection (vv. 6–8): his persecution of the Church in the time of his ignorance (vv. 9–11): his conversion and divine commission to preach to the Gentiles (vv. 12–18): his subsequent conduct the result of a direct divine command (v. 19): his labours among Jews and Gentiles (v. 20): the hostility of the Jews (v. 21): the conclusion, emphasizing the fact that Christianity is nothing but orthodox Judaism properly understood. Moses and the prophets taught, (1) that the Messiah should come; (2) that He should judge; (3) that He should rise again from the dead, the first-fruits of them that sleep; (4) that in the Messiah's days the religion of Israel would be taught to the Gentiles. This is precisely what St. Paul preaches, and therefore he claims acquittal from Agrippa, and from all orthodox Jews (vv. 22, 23, 27).

5. See 22:3 23:5 Phil 3:5. 6. The promise] viz. of the Messiah, made to Abraham, Gn 22:18; also of the Resurrection, for it was believed by the Pharisees and orthodox Jews that all Jews would be raised to life to share in the Messianic kingdom. 7. Instantly] RV 'earnestly.' 9, 10. I once found the same difficulty in believing that God does actually raise the dead: and therefore I bitterly persecuted those who proclaimed the Resurrection of Jesus, just as you are now persecuting me.'
p. Contrary to the name] i.e. in order to suppress the confession and invocation of it. My voice] RV 'my vote.' The Gk. means 'the vote of a judge,' and establishes the fact that at the time of the death of Stephen, Paul, though so young a man, was a member of the Sanhedrin.

16-18. It appears from 9:29 that all the sections that Jesus gave to Paul at the moment of his conversion were: 'Arise, and into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.' The command to preach to the Gentiles was apparently given through a vision at Damascus (9:16), and more definitely in a subsequent vision at Jerusalem (9:23). It seems reasonable, therefore, to suppose that St. Paul summarises the contents of more than one revelation.

23. That Christ should suffer] RV 'how the Christ must suffer': Rm. 'if the Christ must suffer,' or, 'whether the Christ must suffer.' See Lk 24:46, 49 and Isa 53. The st.] see 1 Cor 15:3, 'the firstfruits of them that sleep'; Col 1:18, 'the firstborn from the dead'; Rev 1:5, 'the firstbegotten of the dead.' Light] see Lk 2:23, Isa 9:6, 12, 40:6, 60:13. The people] i.e. the Jewish nation, 'the people of old.'

24. The exclamation of Festus shows impatience and perhaps anger at the idea that a seduced peasant like Jesus (one, moreover, who had been crucified) could have anything to teach a Roman like himself. Much learning] lit. 'the numerous writings,' probably the writings of Moses and the prophets, quoted by St. Paul in his speech. Or the reference may be a general one to the Apostle's well-known studious habits. Observe the good upper and courtesy of St. Paul's retort. Most noble] see Lk 18, 'most excellent hephilus' (same word).

28. Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian] This translation is now given to he best rendering seems to be, 'Too easily art thou persuading thyself that thou canst take me a Christian!'

32. Agrippa, speaking as a Jew, pronounces Paul's views orthodox, or at least not heretical. There is nothing in them, he thinks, contrary to the O.T., though, of course he does not accept them as true.

CHAPTER 27
THE VOYAGE AND SHIPWRECK

This narrative is the most detailed account of an ancient voyage which we possess, and is our principal source of knowledge of the art of navigation as practised by the ancients. St. Luke describes the voyage at length, because it exhibits his hero in a very favourable light.

The details of the voyage are clearly authentic (see Intro.).

1. Julius] a person otherwise unknown. The narrative reveals him as courteous and humane, open to religious impressions, and able to appreciate a great character. Augustus' band] rather, 'the Augustan cohort.' This cohort has been generally regarded as one of the five cohorts, which, Josephus tells us, were stationed at Caesarea. Prof. Mommsen, however, thinks that it belonged to a body of troops called frumentarii (lit. ' victuallers'), whose headquarters were at Rome on the Corian hill. They not only superintended the provisioning of the imperial armies, but were continually going to and fro on the Emperor's business.

2. A ship of Adramyttium] i.e. a ship owned at Adramyttium, which was about to undertake its homeward voyage. Adramyttium was an important seaport of Mysia. We launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia] RV 'which was about to sail unto the places on the coast of Asia, we put to sea.' Aristarchus] see 19:20, 204. Sidon] an important seaport situated about 20 m. N. of its great commercial rival, Tyre. To refresh himself] rather, 'to receive attention.' Under Cyprus] RV 'under the lee of Cyprus'; i.e. to the E. of the island, as was usual with ships westward bound, to avoid the prevalent W. winds. Myra] see 21:1. This town was important as one of the great harbours in the corn trade between Egypt and Rome.

6. A ship of Alexandria] At this time Rome was almost entirely dependent upon foreign corn, obtained mainly from Egypt. This vessel was one of the great corn-ships (v. 38) employed to convey wheat from Alexandria to Puteoli or Ostia. The arrival of these corn-ships in Italy was a signal for great rejoicings.

7. Scarcely i.e. with difficulty. Cnidus] a seaport of Caria. Not suffering us] viz. to pursue a direct course to Italy S. of Cape Malea. Under Crete] i.e. under the lee of Crete (to the E. and S. of it). Salamine] the NE. promontory of Crete. Upon it stood a temple of Athena. Fair havens] where St. Paul waited for a considerable time (v. 9), still preserves its ancient name. It is a small bay situated about 6 m. E. of Cape Litino. It is secure only against N. and NW. winds, whereas the harbour of Phoenix (v. 12) is secure against all winds. Lasae] has been identified by its ruins. It is mentioned by no other ancient writer.

9. The fast] i.e. the Day of Atonement, falling about the autumnal equinox. Ancient mariners reckoned the dangerous season of navigation from September 14th to November 11th. From November 11th till March 5th all navigation was suspended. No revelation is to be assumed here. 12. Phenice] RV 'Phoenice,' i.e. either the modern Loutro, or the neighbouring town of Phineka. Toward the south west and north west] i.e. the bay or harbour formed a semicircle, of which one half looked SW. and the other half NW.

14. Translate. 'But after no long time there beat down from it' (i.e. from Crete) 'a tempestuous wind which is called Euraquilo.

Euroclydon] The best reading is 'Euraquilo,' i.e. an E.N.E. wind.

16. RV 'and running under the lee of a small island, called Cauda, we were able, with difficulty, to secure the boat.' C\(\text{la}d\)u or (RV) 'Cauda' (now Gavdo or Gozzo), is 23 m. S. of Phoenix.

To come by the boat] RV 'to secure the boat.' This was a small rowing-boat towed from the stern of the ship. The storm having come on suddenly, there had been no time to haul it aboard. This was now done, but with difficulty, for it was full of water.

17. Helps] i.e. means of protection against foundering. Undergirding] Broad girths were passed under the ship, and strained tight, to hold the timbers together. Modern seamen sometimes resort to the practice, which is called 'frapping.' Lest they should fall into the quicksanda] RV 'lest they should be cast upon the Syrtis.' The 'Greater Syrtis,' the Goodwin Sands of the Mediterranean (Farrar), lay to the SW. of Cauda.

Strake sail] better, 'reduced sail.' They probably lowered the mainsail more than half-way, but left the small 'artemon' or stormail extended.

18. Lightened the ship] by throwing part of the cargo overboard. 19. We...our] RV 'they...their.'

The tackling] i.e. spars, ropes, etc. But a better translation is 'the ship's furniture,' i.e. beds, tables, benches, cooking utensils, chests, boxes, etc.

23. The angel] rather, 'an angel.' For other visions of Paul see 18\(9\) 22\(8\) 23\(11\).

26. St. Paul here speaks as a prophet, and accurately predicts the future. 27. The fourteenth night] viz. from their departure from Fair Havens. In Adria] RV 'in the sea of Adria,' which lay between Malta, Italy, Greece and Crete. 28. They sounded] 'J. Smith shows how exactly the geographical details in the traditional St. Paul's Bay (on the NE. coast of Malta) correspond with the description here' (Knowling).

34. For your health] RV 'for your safety.' Unless they were strengthened by food they might be drowned in the attempt to get ashore.

35. All pious Jews gave thanks to God before taking food. 37. The number of persons on board is large, but not unusually so. The vessel on which Josephus was wrecked carried about 600 persons. 39. To thrust in the ship] rather, 'to run the ship aground.'

40. RV 'and casting off the anchors, they left them in the sea, at the same time loosing the bands of the rudders; and hoisting up the foresail to the wind, they made for the beach.'

Rudder bands] RV 'the rudders.' Ancient vessels had two rudders (in the form of a huge oar or paddle), one on each quarter. While drifting, the sailors had raised the blades of the rudders out of the water, to prevent them from being broken. Now that steering had to be done, they unlashd the rudders, and let them down into the water.

41. A place where two seas meet] This may either mean, (1) a strait (i.e., in this case, the narrow strait which separates Selimun Island from the mainland); or, (2) a tongue of land (or spit of sand) washed on both sides by the sea. 42. To kill the prisoners] cp. 12\(10\) 16\(7\).

CHAPTER 28

ST. PAUL A PRISONER AT ROME

1. They...they] RV 'we...we.' Melita] RM 'Methele.' Melita is certainly Malta, and not (as has been erroneously supposed) Meleusa off the Illyrian coast. Tradition correctly locates the shipwreck in St. Paul's Bay, about 8 m. NW. of Valetta. 2. The barbarous people] RV 'the barbarians.' The Gk. word does not imply that they were uncivilised, but only that they were neither Greeks nor Romans.

3. Cp. Mk 16\(18\). As St. Paul was arranging the faggot on the fire, the vipers, feeling the heat, glided out of the faggot and bit the Apostle's hand. There are now no vipers in Malta, but the clearing of the ancient forests, and the great density of the population, are sufficient to account for their disappearance.

4. Vengeance] rather, 'Justice' (personified as a goddess). A god] cp. the events at Lystra (14\(11\)), which also illustrate the popular levity of judgment.

7. The chief man] lit. 'the first man.' Inscriptions show that this title is technically correct. Malta was part of the province of Sicily, and Publius was a subordinate of the praetor of Sicily. Tradition places his house at Città-Vecchia. 8. Bloody flux] RV 'dysentery.' Observe in this v. the technical medical language.

9. Others] We have here the first-hand evidence of a competent medical witness to the reality of St. Paul's miraculous cures.

11. After three months] i.e. probably somewhat early in February, before the usual time of navigation. Castor and Pollux] (lit. 'the Dioscuri'), the twin sons of Jupiter, and tutelary deities of sailors. 12. Landing] RV 'touching.' Syracuse] 100 m. N. of Malta, the capital of Sicily, and a Roman colony.

near the dreaded rock of Scylla, and the whirlpool of Charybdis. Puteoli also called Dioexarchia, was (with Ostia) the great corn mart of Italy, where the Alexandrian cornships discharged their cargoes. It lay on the N. shore of the Bay of Naples, and contained a certain number of Jews. 15. Appii forum] RV 'the Market of Appius,' was 43 Roman m. S. of Rome on the great Appian Road, the main line of communication between Rome and the East. The Three Taverns] 10 Roman miles from the capital.

St. Paul in Rome (28:16-31)

16. The captain of the guard] either the captain of the praetorian guard (prefectus praetorio), or, more probably, the captain of the troops called frumentarii, whose camp was on the Caelian hill: see on 271. 'To dwell by himself] This exceptional treatment was due to the favourable report of Festus and the goodwill of the centurion.

17. Called the chief of the Jews together] or, 'called together the Jewish community first,' in accordance with his usual plan of preaching to the Jews before he preached to the Gentiles. 21. It is somewhat strange that the chief priests did not write. Perhaps they did, but the letter was delayed, or miscarried. 22. The Jews profess no first-hand knowledge of the Christians, hence it is evident that at Rome the Church and the Synagogue were already definitely separated. The expulsion of the Jews from Rome by Claudius is probably the cause of this. There being no Jewish community, the infant Church started as a mainly non-Jewish body.

25. See Isa 69. Our fathers] RV 'your fathers.' St. Paul renounces fellowship with the unbelieving Jews. 29. This v. is omitted by important ancient authorities, but much is to be said for its genuineness.

30. Two whole years] Such delays of justice were not unusual. In this case the delay was apparently caused, (1) by the loss of the official papers in the wreck, (2) by the non-appearance of the accusers, (3) by the difficulty of getting together the witnesses. During this imprisonment St. Paul wrote the Epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon. At his first trial he was acquitted, and released. A few years later he was again arrested, brought to trial at Rome, condemned, and executed.

On Rome and the Roman Church, see the Intro. to the Epistle to the Romans.
ROMANS

INTRODUCTION

1. Place in Scripture. This letter, though it is not the earliest nor the simplest of the noble group ascribed to St. Paul, and though equally with the rest it was prompted by special local needs, fits in first in the series. The book of Acts, with its prophecy in 23:11 concerning St. Paul, 'so must thou bear witness also at Rome,' ends with a vivid picture of him a prisoner in Rome. The first of the Epistles dramatically follows with its disclosure of his mind as in freedom he had looked forward to a purposeful visit to that city. It is the greatest of his writings in importance as in length, the most characteristic and comprehensive, the letter best suited to form an introduction to his teaching, and an epitome of his thought. It was fitting that the chief letter of the Apostle to the Gentiles should be a letter to the Church in the capital of the Gentile world, and that it should have precedence in the final order of his published writings.

2. Place in the Life and Writings of St. Paul. It is not possible to date the events in his life with absolute precision, but the narrative in Acts, together with information contained in his own writings, enables us to arrange their sequence. If we accept the chronology of C. H. Turner, which approximates to that of Ramsay very closely, and forms a mean between those of Harnack and Lightfoot, the conversion of St. Paul took place 36 A.D., six years after the crucifixion; the first missionary journey, 47 A.D.; the Council at Jerusalem, 49 A.D.; the second journey, 49–52 A.D.; the third journey, 52–56 A.D.; the arrest in Jerusalem, 56 A.D.; the imprisonment in Caesarea, 56–58 A.D.; the arrival in Rome, 59 A.D.; and the martyrdom there, 65 A.D.

Arranged in chronological order, the thirteen Epistles of St. Paul fall into four groups:

I. 1 and 2 Thessalonians, during the second journey, 51 A.D.
II. 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans, during the third journey, 52–56 A.D.
III. Philippians, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, during the Roman imprisonment, 59–61 A.D.
IV. 1 and 2 Timothy, and Titus, after his release.

In point of doctrine, as of time, there is a marked distinction between these four groups, due in part to differences in the spiritual attainments and requirements of the recipients; in part, also, to the unceasing activity of the writer's own reflections upon the meaning of the faith he proclaimed. In the first group the doctrinal statements are brief, simple, and practical; the second coming of Christ receiving special attention. In the second group the truth of God's salvation in Christ is presented as a whole, defined, through questioning and controversy and through opposition to Jewish legalism, as a universal scheme of grace, and its main principles are stated and applied. In the third group the ripened thoughts of the Apostle concerning the exaltation of Christ's person, and the true nature of the Church as His body, are gathered and set forth contemplatively. In the fourth group there is no continuous exposition of doctrine, but, instead, pastoral suggestions of practical details in Church life.

The Epistle to the Romans is thus at the very heart of the Apostle's teaching, the greatest literary product of his life's most strenuous period and of his highest powers. Repulsed by Jerusalem, towards which in pride of birth and education his face had formerly been set, he has turned to imperial Rome, whose people are in truth the world in miniature, the seed of Adam, if not of Abraham, not without law or conscience though beyond the pale of Jewish law, in their own way responsible to God and under condemnation. Behind and beyond the Christians in Rome he sees in thought the countless millions of the Gentile world unsaved. Equally with Israel they know and own a moral law, and recognise their inability to keep it. Towards them also, he would fain fulfil his apostleship.

3. Date and Place of Composition. Comparison of the Epistle with Acts points to Corinth as the place, and to 56 A.D. as the date, towards the close of the third great journey, when he was about to return to Jerusalem with the alms of the Greek Churches. After the three years spent in Ephesus he 'purposely in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there I must also see Rome' (Ac 19:21); and when he reached Jerusalem he was the bearer of Greek alms to the distressed Church in that city (Ac 24:17). In the letter itself he states that it has times been his purpose to preach in (1:13 15:23), but his sense of prior duty to the Gentiles who had not received the Gospel has hindered him, and restricted his efforts hitherto to a circuit from Jerusalem to Thessalonica (Ro 15:19-22). But now I go unto Achaia ministering unto the saints for the good pleasure of Macedonia and Greece to make a certain contribution for the poor among the saints that are at Jerusalem. When I have accomplished this, I go on by you unto Spain (15:25-28). It is the winter of the Roman consul. He is in Spain—in fact, in Corinth; for Gaius, his host, the house is the local church (16:23), had been visited by him there (1 Cor 1:14). Erastus, a friend of the church, was there (2 Tim 4:20), and Phoebe, the bearer of the letter, is a deaconess of the church that is in Cenchrea, the port of Corinth (16:1).

is a solemn moment in the Apostle's life, his spirit is moved as he looks back upon his journey to the Gentiles in Greece and Asia Minor, or opposition and controversy and misrepresentation (2 Cor, Gal) have been his portion, all as wonderful success. Jewish pride, prejudice, and legalism have pursued him and he despises them. His apostolates to the Gentiles, though it has put alms for the poor Church into his hands, has enlarged his ght and preaching beyond Jewish limits, brought suspicion on his fidelity to Hebrew culture and tradition. He has deepened his own citizenship and his grasp of human nature. The Western as well as the Eastern must receive Christ. There is already a church in Rome; he will strengthen it, and go westwards, even to Spain. In this role as a missionary, a universal outlook, a spirit of triumph over controversy and misrepresentation, an imperialistic instinct, and a sense of human nature, have led to inspire its intense passion and its own power.

Occasion and Purpose. Like the other letters by St. Paul it is a true letter, not an order or a treatise. It owes its massiveness comprehensiveness to the greatness and resuscitation of the situation which called it and of the subject with which it deals. Judaism and Rome are both in his thoughts, both of his life. His deliverance, himself a Pharisee of the Pharisees, a citizen of Rome, and a son of old and Rome. There, in Jewish synagogue and in Gentile church, the law will yield its forbidding sovereignty to the gospel of God's grace in Jesus Christ, as once it has done in his own experience upon the way to Damascus.

The letter finds its formal occasion in the approach of the long-expected opportunity to visit Rome. It is primarily a letter of self-introduction to an unvisited Church, to prepare its members for his coming. He has many friends among them. He has heard much of them, their faith, their obedience, their divisions, their difficulties, and their temptations (18:12-16); and it may be that they, like others, have received an evil report of his teaching. In any case, he does not mean to reside with them for long, but to make Rome his base for further evangelization in the West, his work being ended for the present in the East. They will strengthen him, as he hopes to establish them 'in the fulness of the blessing of Christ' (12:15 20).

But it has a larger purpose, reflected by its doctrinal outpouring. It is as though he foresaw in Rome the mingling of all the influences against which his own life-conflict, within and without, had had to be waged, for sooner or later all living things converged on Rome. With characteristic imagination he anticipates his arrival, the floodgates of his soul are flung open, and the pent-up thoughts which he would then have voiced refuse to be restrained. The letter is an earnest, a foretaste, of the promised 'spiritual gift to the end may be established' (11:1), of the gospel which he is ready to preach to you that are in Rome (11:13). The Roman Christians are themselves to administer one another (15:14); his object is but to put them again in remembrance (15:16) as a minister of Christ Jesus unto the Gentiles. Though he is a stranger and they are Gentiles, he has an apostolate to the Gentiles. His letter is more than a controversial contribution, or a personal apologia, or a treatise; it is an apostolic, and, therefore, authoritative utterance directed to meet their known and their presumptive needs. From the lips of an apostle not less than a Gospel was looked for, and such the Epistle came to be as it took shape.

5. Destination. As it stands, the letter plainly is addressed 'to all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints' (17, 15 15:23), 'called to be Jesus Christ's' (19). Are they Jews or Gentiles? The presumption is that if it is for all Christians, both are included (cp. 9:24, 'us whom he also called not from the Jews only, but also from the Gentiles'). Many passages refer to, or are applicable to, Gentiles only (e.g. 'among all the nations... among whom are ye also,' 15:4; 'fruit in you also, even as in the rest of the Gentiles,' 1:13; 'I speak to you that are Gentiles,' 11:13; 'I write unto you because of the grace given me that I should be a minister unto the Gentiles,' 15.15,16: the argument in chs. 9-11 is for Gentiles exclusively, and in it the Jews ('my kinsmen,' not 'your' or even 'our') are spoken of as an outside body, while many of the sins against which warning is given are such as Gentiles rather than Jews were addicted to (6.12,13,17,13-13). On the other hand, familiarity and sympathy with the Jewish standpoint is assumed both in writer and readers. In c. 2 under the general apostrophe addressed to all mankind ('thou art without excuse, O man, whosoever thou art,' 21), the Jew is naturally addressed in the second person ('if thou bearest the name of a Jew,' 21-27), but immediately thereafter the Jews are spoken of in the third person (2.28f. 3.1f.); the reference in 41 to 'Abraham our fo..."
absent. There is no indication of any apostolic origin. The foundation has been laid, Christ is there named (15:20), house-churches exist (16:5), but strictly speaking there is no united Church. Such apostolic basis as it was to have was first afforded by this letter. It is like a consecrating breath of the Apostle’s presence. Though Christianity had long preceded him in Rome, its people, Jew and Gentile, were not fused into a single Church until the genius of St. Paul, who read the hearts of both, by letter and by word supplied the sacred fire.

7. The Epistle as a whole.

(a) Authenticity and Integrity. That it is the work of St. Paul admits of no serious question. The evidence, internal and external, is overwhelming. It is the supreme self-revelation of the Apostle. That the Epistle as we have it is a coherent unity has been doubted on substantial though inconclusive grounds. The doxology which marks the close of the Epistle after 16:24 in most of the best manuscript authorities, is found elsewhere, after 14:23, or in both places, in others. Moreover, apart from this massive and impressive doxology, there are other passages, beneficent in form, between 14:23 and 16:24, which look like endings, e.g. 15:8 16:20 and 16:24; in one important manuscript Rome is not mentioned, and some of the persons named in c. 16 are known to have been connected with Ephesus, which has suggested Ephesus as the original destination of that chapter. It is not impossible that in shortened or lengthened form the Epistle to the Romans may at some time have circulated among several groups of readers, but the unity of the Epistle in its present form cannot be disproved or seriously shaken. In any case its teaching remains unimpaired.

(b) Style. Like St. Paul’s other letters, it was dictated to an amanuensis (16:22), a fact which helps to explain the irregularities of the language and the thought as it flowed on in a rushing broken torrent from the passionate soul of the Apostle. The tentmaker and the organiser of the Churches had scant leisure to polish his sentences and ponder his phrases. It may be that his hand was nimble with the needle than the pen. His style is a mirror of himself. Not the letter, but the spirit; not the seen and the superficial, but the unseen and the underlying; not the part, but the whole; not the nice details of argument, but the broad sweep of truth, is his concern. Doubtless these dictated letters preserve for us, even better than his reported speeches in the book of Acts, the form and manner of his preaching, as well as the vehemence of its intellectual, moral, and spiritual power.

(c) Use and Interpretation of the Old Testament. Familiarity with every portion of the Old Testament is assumed in the readers as well as exhibited by the writer. Its law, history, psalmody, and prophecy are all requisitioned in the argument in a manner strongly reminiscent of the rabbinical school, kindred snatches of Scripture being run together, allegory and type being traced in narratives, yet also with a masterly insight into the prophetic spirit of the book, and with a Christian’s sense of its completion and fulfilment in Jesus Christ (cp. 3:10-18 9:32-35 10:16-21; also cp. chs. 4, 10, and 11). By some three-score quotations the universal reign of sin and need of grace, the saving power of faith, the sovereignty of the divine will, the judgment of unbelieving Israel, and the summons to the Gentiles, are confirmed by way of preparation for the universal truth in Christ. In legal language, and by scriptural thought, the legal is transcended, and way is made for grace. The stricken conscience of the Hebrew under law is healed by the hope of Israel realised in Jesus Christ.

(d) Relation to Christ’s Teaching. As a teacher the Apostle, though wielding authority, differs vastly from the Master, who taught ‘not as the Scribes.’ The form and manner of the general teaching could scarcely differ more from His; but it is impossible to read chs. 12-14 without discerning the ethical identity of the ideals enjoined by both. It is the same Christian life and character that each would fain see realised. Nor can it be gainsaid that the Apostle at bottom shares his Master’s characteristic attitude to the burdens of the Pharisaic law, and extends the same invitation to weary and heavy-laden bearers of the yoke to come to Him for rest. Between the teaching of Jesus and that of Paul the two great facts of atoning death and triumphant resurrection have intervened, the facts which in succession cast Paul down and lifted him up, blinded him and gave him new sight, caused him to die and to live again. Of necessity Paul’s own relation to the Cross as a Pharisaic persecutor in the name of law, and his experience as a convert of its regenerating power, suffice his whole conception of Christ’s gospel. Though Jesus in the Gospels might assure men of God’s forgiveness apart from any reference to His death, Paul had no experience of any such unmediated forgiveness. The death and re-appearance of the Lord alone had sufficed to bring home to him at once the full enormity of his guilty enmity to good and the irresistible sufficiency of the will of God to pardon and to save through Christ. If in the recorded words of our Lord we would find anticipations of the Pauline gospel, it is not to the parable of the Prodigal Son alone, but also to the institution of the Sacramental Supper on the eve of the Saviour’s sacrifice that we must turn. Can it be seriously said that Paul’s conception of the bond between the Saviour and the saved is any other than the Saviour’s own? All that we can say is that, while it was the simple comprehensive truth of God as it was in Christ Jesus that he saw and proclaimed, while it was a borrowed, not an original gospel, that he preached, he saw the truth with his own eyes unfinchingly, and declared it in his own language. None of the apostolic band could view the truth in Christ from so detached a standpoint as he, with his birth in the dispersion, his education as a rabbi, his Roman citizenship, and his Greeko-Cilician home. It was a necessary consequence of this very detachment which enabled St. Paul to see the truth in Christ’s life and Person so independently, so universally, and in such clear perspective, that his manner of teaching, his vocabulary, and his mode of thought should seem to be at utter variance with his Master’s. But the more we study his teaching as a whole, and the more patiently we compare its burden and its spirit with that of Jesus, the more we realise the justice of that verdict of Christendom which has judged him to be the greatest and truest of Christians, and the justice of his own favourite self-description as a ‘bondservant of Jesus Christ.’

(e) The Contents. (For detailed outline see p. 864 below, and for running exposition see the commentary.)

As has been said, the Epistle is a true letter, personal in testimony and in exhortation throughout. Ch. 1:1-17 contains the address and preamble. Chs. 1:18-11:36 contain a foretaste of the ‘spiritual gift’ which it is the Apostle’s longing to impart to the Roman Christians (11:1), a reasoned vindication of ‘the gospel’ which he is ready to preach to them, of which he is not ashamed, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, and in which ‘is revealed a righteousness of God from faith unto faith.’ Though full of profound thought, the teaching in this section is not a treatise, it is personal instruction addressed again and again to ‘brethren,’ abounding in vivacious uses of ‘I,’ ‘you,’ ‘we,’ in true letter form. Chs. 12:1-15:18 contain practical exhortations suggested naturally by the Apostle’s presentation of the truth in Christ,—exhortations universally applicable to Christian people (chs. 12, 13), and exhortations specially addressed to the circle of his readers (chs. 14, 15). Chs. 15:14-16:37 contain a variety of personal details: the Apostle’s motive in writing (15:14-21), plans of travel, introduction of Phoebe, personal greetings, admonition against authors of error and dispease, conveyance of greetings from his friends, and solemn final doxology.

8. The Teaching of the Epistle.
The following is an outline of the thought embodied in the Epistle, particularly in chs. 1-11, which, while rather a vindication than an exposition of his gospel, contain the substance of his whole message. To constitute a comprehensive summary of his teaching as a whole, it must be supplemented by the reader in many important details from the other Pauline Epistles, for a mind like the Apostle’s was in continual movement, expanding, enriching, and maturing its convictions, and each of his letters has its own distinctive contributions to the sum of Christian truth. If we would complete our account of his teaching, e.g. on the Person of Christ and His relationship to the Christian, on the Church, the Ministry, the Sacraments, not to mention other themes, we must make use of the other Epistles. This outline, however, of the thought in the greatest of his writings may serve as a useful introduction to, and foreglimpse of, his teaching as a whole.

The Preamble (11:1-5). St. Paul writes not only as a servant of Jesus, the Christ, but also as a messenger of long-expected good news from God. The promised Son of David’s race according to the flesh has at last been born and lived His life; by resurrection from the dead He has been supernaturally shown to be the Son of God according to the Spirit. ‘The mystery kept in silence since times eternal is now manifested’ (15:22). This good news it is a sacred duty to tell both to Greeks and to the rest of the world. It is a gospel to be proud of; for every man, be he Jew or Greek, who accepts it in faith receives from God not a theory of salvation but a saving power. It reveals a new righteousness, not human but divine, issuing from living faith.

(4) The Need of the World.
Of such good news, and such faith-righteousness leading to salvation, mankind is universally in sore need. Gentile and Jew alike are deservedly under the wrath of God, who has revealed His anger against all unrighteousness and irreligion. All have sinned. All are without excuse. God has suffered all to become in some measure hardened and reprobate through sinful habit.

(a) Think, first, of the Gentile world. Though less favoured than Israel, the Gentiles have not been without revelation. They have been able to discern from the open face of nature the everlasting power and divinity of the invisible God. In their minds they have had knowledge of God, the self-manifesting. But everywhere they have lapsed. They have trampled on the truth, reasoned foolishly, and fallen into all manner of idolatry, worshipping and serving the creature rather than the Creator. Their wisdom, their philosophy, has ended in failure. They have been ungrateful, and have not glorified God. Before Him they are without excuse. Deservedly He has given them up to the indulgence of their impure lusts, to abuse their bodies, to dishonour sex, to cherish a reprobate mind. By act and by consent they have been guilty of every form of social, domestic, and personal sin against God and man. They have known the divine ordinance, that they who practice such things are worthy of death, but they have chosen to ignore God. They are self-condemned, for they are ready to judge one another, knowing well when they are wronged that sin is sin, and their just judgment upon others recoils upon themselves. How is it that men are blind to this, abusing God’s forbearance, which should prompt them to repentance, and aggravating their guilt? God will assuredly render to every man according to his works. To those who by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honour and eternal life He will grant the objects of their quest; to the foolish and disobedient, anguish under His indignation (1 18–218).

(b) Are the Jews in a better case? They are involved in the self-same judgment. Indeed, as first in privilege, they are first in condemnation. God has no partiality: His justice is even-handed. If the Gentile who has never enjoyed the privilege of Jewish law and revelation is condemned for his sins against his own more limited light, God cannot permit the privileged Jew to sin with impunity. The same justice that metes out stern punishment to the Gentile who is outside the pale of Jewish law and revelation because he sins against the unwritten law within the heart, demands an even sterner sentence upon the Jew who breaks his higher Law. There are Gentiles who do by nature the things of the Law, though they know not Moses and the Prophets: these become as it were their own law, in that they show the work of the Law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their reflections one with another accusing or else acquitting them—such men put many a Jew to shame.

It is indeed a great thing to belong to the Hebrew race, to be heir to the oracles of God, to the Law, the Promises, the sacred ordinances and rites of God’s chosen and adopted people, to have the blood of Abraham in one’s veins, to be of one flesh with the Christ who should come (2 17–3 4–5). But to be born a Jew, to be circumcised a Jew, to receive a Jewish name, is not enough. To God a man’s heart is more than his flesh and blood, his conduct than his ceremonial. He is not a true Jew who is one outwardly; neither is that true circumcision which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit not in the letter. ’They are not all Israel who are of Israel; neither because they are Abraham’s seed are they all children.

It is not the children of the flesh that are children of God.’ Hebrew history and Scripture are full of evidence that mere possession of the Law has never secured obedience to it; each of the commandments has been dishonoured daily; and instead of being the glory of God, Israel has too often been a reproach to Him among the nations. It is not more true that the Law is the pride of Israel as a nation among the nations, than that the Law is the condemnation of the individual Jew (2 17–3 8, also chs. 9–11).

Thus it appears that as the Greek or other Gentile is convicted by his unwritten law of conscience, so the Jew is convicted by his recorded law. All are under sin. There is none righteous, none whose works fulfill the demands of the divine Law under which he lives. Every mouth is stopped. Were law to have the final word, the doom of all were sealed (3 9–20).

(B) The Inadequacy of Law to save (c. 7).

The persistence of sin under the rule of Gentile conscience and Hebrew law is proof that law has been unable to save, though it is able to condemn: it can teach, threaten, and admonish, but it cannot inspire and empower. Indeed, in man’s fallen condition, law seems but to aggravate the evil it denounces. But for it we should not know sin—our lives were innocent as those of babes or beasts. Obedience, the essence of duty, presupposes a command or prohibition, the essence of law. The insistence of law is a standing provocation and temptation to disobedience. The very words ’thou shalt not’ suggest to man’s wayward sense of freedom ’why not?’ ’shall I not?’ Apart from law sin is dead, lifeless, or unborn: through law sin finds its opportunity and enters the heart of man on its fatal errand.

Is law sinful, then, because it thus opens the way for sin? No: the sin is not in law, but in us who respond so perversely to its just demands. The law is in itself a thing of righteousness; it is the voice of God, whether the whisper of conscience or the peal of Sinai; it is good throughout. It is in fact the great instrument for showing up sin in its true character, in its naked ugliness. Sin is seen at its worst as man’s enemy when it thus subverts the very law of God for its baleful uses. Law would faint guide us to life: ’obey and ye shall live’ is its burden: but sin seduces us into the way of death. By pointing out the way of life law must, however unwillingly, disclose to us implicitly other ways which lead to death. Sin, when we have thus become familiar with the way to death, casts its spell over our eyes and invests the fatal way with a seductive glamour. But sin is not in law, is not in God; it can only be in us.
There is in us a principle of evil, our carnal nature, a kind of lower law. The mind of the flesh is enmity against God and rebellion against His law: it is death (8:6,7). In our moral life we are aware of division and discord within us. After the inward man we delight in the law of God, we hate evil, we desire to obey and do good, yet we do not succeed. The good which we would, we do not; the evil which we would not, that we habitually do. It becomes as it were a law of our life to sin. We are sin-possessed. Another, a lower law in our members, in our flesh, wages war against the law of our mind, and enslaves us. In the agony of despair the soul of man cries out, 'O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from this living death, from this sin-dominated, death-bringing bodily existence?'

(C) A New Way of Salvation needed and foreshadowed.

History and experience thus combine to attest man's need of deliverance. Man as man must be liberate from sin, from condemnation, from the law of his lower self, even in a sense from the grim grasp of the Revealed Law of Israel's Covenant-God. In himself man has proved powerless to achieve salvation even when guided by explicit law and encouraged by special providences and uplifting promises. Can it be that he is now without hope and lost? Gentile wisdom and Jewish privilege stand self-condemned and humbled. Unless God intervenes salvation is for ever beyond reach, and the divine end of creation frustrated.

With true prophetic insight St. Paul discerns a divine purpose in this humiliation of mankind. Thus humbled, man is prepared to look above for deliverance, and to remain humble should God deign to save him. And man's utmost need is God's utmost opportunity ('where sin abounded, grace did abound more exceedingly,' 5:20). Conscience and law are seen not only to be inadequate for man's complete salvation, but also by reason of their incompleteness to deepen man's sense of need and to point forward to the coming in God's providence of a higher law and a fuller revelation. To say with the Jew that either the law must save or we are lost, is to fetter and cramp the goodness of God, to make the law greater than its Giver. There may have been, nay, there has been, waiting in the secret counsel of God a way of salvation destined, not to discredit or set aside law, but to transcend the old method of attempting to satisfy conscience and law and to achieve work-righteousness. Gentile and Jew were right, were bound, to seek salvation by honouring their conscience and their law, and cherishing their light, and they have not been without their reward; but they were wrong to shut their eyes and their hearts to the limitation and the partiality of the old-time method and the pitiful inadequacy of its results: their failures ought to have led them to turn with increased humility and hope to God, from whom alone so great a boon as their soul's salvation could come. Man's unbelief cannot annul God's faithfulness.

The new way is not without some foreshadowing in the Old Dispensation (cp. c. 4). The children of Abraham might have remembered that the justice of God was never mechanical: that His favours were not always bought or earned, but might be freely given, and often descended on unexpected quarters. Who could say that Israel's position as God's peculiar people had always, had ever, been deserved? (cp. chs. 9-11). The history of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, proves that God's dealings with him were based on other grounds than simple legal justice. God's recompense of good is far more than legally proportioned to man's desert. It was something more than virtuous acts that commended Abraham to God and gave value to his life: 'not through the law was the promise to Abraham or to his seed that he should be heir of the world.' The supreme merit of Abraham was his faith in God: it was his firm faith that enabled him alike to obey the call to leave home and kindred and to yield up his only son, and to believe that, in spite of his own old age and the barrenness of Sarah, God would give him a son and fulfil the promise that he would become the father of many nations. Abraham's true seed and heirs are those who cherish his faith in God: he will become the father of many nations when the Gentiles enter into that faith. It is circumcision of the heart, trustful self-surrender to God, that is the mark of the true child of Abraham, the true heir of that faith which was in Abraham's bosom before his flesh was circumcised, and of those promises which were out of all proportion to his actual deeds.

The prophets in their day looked beyond human actions and Hebrew merit for the salvation of Israel, and taught that God's eye is ever on the heart which moves the hand. The heart must be right, must be fixed on God, must look to Him for power to raise and wisdom to guide the hand that works. Did not the very hope and promise of Messiah, a Saviour from the right hand of God, imply that man was powerless to save himself? The Messianic hope was therefore the harbinger of a new righteousness not resting on works done by men, but instead resting on God's grace and enabling good works to be done—a righteousness of the heart, a conscience cleared not by human merit but by divine forgiveness and renewal.
This means that a new view must henceforth be taken of Israel's history, privilege and vocation, its sacraments and its Messiah, its righteous God who judges not as man judges, but looks upon the heart and reads its secrets. Pride of race, presumption upon God's favour, must for ever be laid aside. God's aim is not Israel's aggrandisement, but man's universal sanctification and attachment to Himself. The election of Israel is that all the nations may share the blessing. The coming of Messiah therefore could have no other purpose than the coming of God's universal and eternal kingdom of holiness, the highest good of the greatest number. Conscience, law, and Messiah have righteousness on earth as their common aim. Conscience and law are the world's schoolmasters to educate it up to Christ. His actual and attested coming is the fulfilment and therefore also the vindication of both (3:21), the achievement of righteousness by a new means which was beyond their reach. God is now fully disclosed in His true character, not as an arbitrary sovereign grasping at sovereignty for its own sake, nor as a stern judge administering a grim law over which He has no control, but as a Holy and Loving Father, jealously requiring righteousness in His children for their own sake, and putting forth every effort to realise their highest good. 'For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God...for the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now...For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will simply, but of God's who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (8:19-23). Of free grace His beneficent hand equips both men and nations with their several talents at the outset of their stewardship, while as yet of merit they can have none, and rewards them at the close of their day according to, yet far above, their works. Of free grace He bestows on some a larger stewardship than on others. Of free grace likewise He bestows His supreme gift of righteousness unto salvation which men can neither achieve nor earn, but which they must prepare themselves to receive through humble penitence for sin committed, and through heart-yearning and heart-trust, in a word, through faith in God who alone saves. 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past tracing out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and unto him are all things' (11:33-36).

(D) God's Salvation in Jesus His Christ (3:19-21, 5, 8).

What conscience and law could not do in that they were weak through the flesh, God has accomplished, sending His own Son in the likeness of our human, sin-ridden flesh. He has set men free from their bondage to fleshly lust, to sin, and to the law which can condemn to death but cannot save unto life, through the higher law or principle of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus. This deliverance is not simply revealed but mediated and effected through Jesus, for He purifies and renews the heart as well as opens the eyes.

Jesus is the Christ, the promised Saviour from sin. He is God's true, unique, 'own' Son, His representative on earth, doing His work, wielding His power, revealing His mind, sharing His Spirit, reconciling men to His Father as veritable sons. His coming was 'for sin.' His life and death were a condemnation of sin, as showing that human life could rise above it in the power of the Divine Spirit: they are also the destruction of sin, breaking its power over men, revealing its hatefulness and deadliness, and reconciling us to the Heavenly Father from whom it has estranged us. Jesus the Christ was a man (5:15), human as Adam: His work of grace will prove as far-reaching in its consequences for good as Adam's transgression has proved for evil. He is the second Adam (5:12-21), undoer of the mischief of the first. Through Adam's fall, his one trespass, sin and death entered the world and reigned over men, 'even over them that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression, and through the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners.' In like manner through Jesus' one life-comprehending act of obedience, His self-surrender in death the righteous for the unrighteous, His lifting-up, grace shall reign, the many shall be made righteous even though of themselves they shall not achieve the same obedience. Sin, condemnation, death formed our portion as Adam's heirs through the flesh: through Christ holiness, justification, and life are ours, a free portion given to us as partakers of His Spirit, joint-heirs of God with Him. According to the old régime a man must die to expiate his sin: 'he that hath died is justified from sin' (6:7). In Christ a higher than forensic justification is accomplished without the necessity of physical death. If a man becomes by the grace of God one with Christ, knit to Him in spirit, he passes spiritually through the Saviour's experience of death and resurrection. He dies to the old life, to sin, with Christ. In spirit he is crucified with the Lord. The carnal in him falls away, as flesh falls away from spirit in death: mortality and sin are laid aside as in a grave: and the spirit, the true self, God's child in him, rises with the risen Christ to the new life, dead only to sin, alive unto God in Christ Jesus.

The life and work of Jesus as the Christ of God is thus not only the instrument of deliverance and a final revelation to man of God and of man's own self, but also an all-embracing cosmic fact. It is far more than a type or object-lesson of the Christian's experience, for it is also a supreme instrument in its own reproduction. It thus gathers up within itself all individual spiritual experience of salvation. Through the Cross and the open sepulchre every soul must find its exodus from bondage to liberty. It is the appointed way. Every soul has a death to die and a resurrection to receive: a life to withdraw from the world and yield up to God, and to receive back with the seal of acceptance and renewal upon it. We not only know this now through Christ and see it in Him, but we experience it in and with Him. He dies and lives again in us, or we die and live again in Him. We are one with Him in the Spirit. And if with the apostle we know Christ crucified and raised from the dead, that is self-yielded unto death for our sins, and God-accepted for our assurance and our justification through the faith which rests on His resurrection regarded as a proof of God's acceptance of His death for others, we know Christ fully. His death and resurrection are a summary and consummation of His whole life. To know Him in them is to know Him completely, and not only Him but the love of God disclosed in Him, for it was love that prompted God to send Him to us: 'God commendeth his own love toward us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us'; and it is the same divine love that is 'shed abroad in our hearts through the Holy Spirit which was given unto us.' Through Christ it has come about that our knowledge of God as the righteous vindicator of stern law is all but merged to vanishing in our knowledge of His tender love, the self-same love unto death which Jesus cherished towards us on earth, and still cherishes at the right hand of God as our constant intercessor, a love from which 'neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us.'

Surveying this divine work of salvation, the Apostle clearly distinguishes certain activities on the part of God, whose succession need not be thought of as strictly temporal in the eternal will. The redeeming purpose of divine love involves the following sequence of grace. God foreknows His individual children; fore-orains them 'to be conformed to the image of His Son that he may be the firstborn among many brethren'; calls them to fulfil their destiny; justifies them, i.e., forgives their sin and imputes to them new righteousness when in faith they respond to His call; and glorifies them, i.e., through sanctification brings them to the consummation of their life-purpose and the realisation of their true selves (8.29, 30). In each stage of the process the 'image of his Son' is present; in each the eternal Christ participates; our election, our vocation, our justification, our adoption, our sanctification, and our glorification are inseparable from Him.

(2) The New Righteousness: Life in the Spirit (chs. 5, 6, 8, 12–15).

With singular fulness and insight St. Paul describes the substance and the secret of salvation as an experience of the human soul. The Epistle is a revelation of the spiritual riches of his own experience, as well as a masterly delineation of a universal ideal. His touch is never firmer, his grasp never stronger, than when he lays bare in swift heart-searching sentences the meaning, the joys, the hopes, and the responsibilities of the new life in Christ. Whatever view be taken of the fidelity of other elements in his teaching to the letter of the explicit words of his Master, no one can seriously allege that the Apostle's conception of the regenerate life, or, for that matter, his practical embodiment of it, differs in any material respect from that which is enshrined in the Sermon on the Mount and in the Gospels as a whole. The words may be different; the manner of the teacher may not be the same; but beyond question the selfsame spirit breathes through both, the same vision arises at the bidding of each.

(1) In relation to God the Christian lives a filial life. All that a son should be in thought, word, and deed, it is for him to be towards God. Perfect freedom of access to the Father, unbroken communion, childlike trust, unfailing hope, self-yielding love, are his. Intercourse with Him and service are his chief joy; growth in likeness to Him is his chief reward. Gratefully he acknowledges his utter dependence upon the Father for forgiveness and reconciliation and new righteousness, and for every good gift. To glorify Him is the sum of duty and the summit of ambition. The Christian is a son and therefore an heir of God, joint-heir with Christ the Elder Brother and the First-born of many sons. Bondage and fear towards God are done away: 'Abba, Father!' is his cry.

(2) In relation to Christ. No words can exaggerate the intimacy of the bond between the believer and Christ. He belongs to his Lord; in life and death his face is towards Him who died for him (148). From His love he is inseparable (8.25). He is in Christ Jesus; baptised into Him, into His death,—crucified, d, buried, and risen with Him. It is simply the man Jesus, good, obedient, e, and true till death, but Jesus the Eternal Christ of God—Christ in spite of crucifixion, Christ because raised from the dead, enthroned in the Father, and alive for evermore. The Lord is the Spirit’ (2 Cor 3:17), known no longer after the flesh, visible only to the eye of faith. It is not so much the deliberate imitation or following of Jesus as a man, for that may mean but self-reliance after all, as faith in Him the Son of God, that is first named, for it is by faith that we are enabled to follow,—faith must precede, even were we not to see. We are to ‘put on the Lord Jesus.’ Serving Him we please God, and are approved of men (15:18); receiving Him we have an earnest of the satisfaction of all our needs (13:14).

According to St. Paul, then, faith is the key that unites us to Christ in the unseen and eternal world, the principle that links our life with His so that we are one with Him, even as we are one with the Father in spiritual fellowship. Faith is our response to the advances of God’s redeeming love. St. Paul is not content with St. John to dwell on love to God as our response to His love; doubtless he takes that as a matter of course, for he was no stranger to the power of love, and on occasion he himself extols the praises of love more than faith, and he speaks of the love of God as shed abroad in our hearts. Probably he had been so accustomed to believe in Jesus as Christ upon the way to Damascus even before he was conscious of passionate love towards Him, and therefore lays stress upon the priority of faith. He loved Him because he saw in Him the suffering and triumphant Christ of God; it was not simply because he loved Him that he believed Him to be the Christ. Love followed faith and crowned it. He fastens upon faith, living trust in a living God, a personal reliance upon a Saviour Christ, as the root-principle of the Christian life, the instrument of Christian progress. Through this vital attachment, self is forgotten, the world recedes, the body is reduced to its true position, the higher life nourished and supported. Like love, faith lays hold of the whole man and transforms him: it is not blind or unintelligent; it trusts because it knows and has experienced; it holds the key to obedience; such is its power over the springs of moral action, that whatsoever is not of faith is sin’ (14:23).

Christianity is the life of faith.

(3) In relation to the Spirit. If the Christian life upon its human side is a life of faith, on the other side it is a life of the Spirit of God, a the Spirit of Christ, in the same Holy Spirit who of old spake in prophecy, in Scripture, and in conscience. The Spirit is the motive-power of the Christian life, quickening its perceptions and faculties, flooding the heart with the love of God, identifying Himself with the believer’s spirit, and witnessing with it that it is the true child of God the Father, helping us to pray, pleading with the Father, bringing Christ into the soul to mingle with it. ‘As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God’ (8:14). ‘If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His’ (8:9). The higher instincts of men belong to the Spirit, and are divine; the kingdom of God on earth ‘is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit’ (14:17). Christian virtues are fruits of the indwelling Spirit. The work of grace is its unresting activity.

(4) In relation to Society. In chs. 12–15 the Apostle pours out from the treasury of his experience and reflection, ethical precepts and exhortations which glance like jewels in their spiritual brilliancy. Every aspect of the Christian character, every phase of the life in Christ, is here reflected. In the power of the Spirit, in the righteousness which is through faith, the Christian is to be modest, humble, sincere, patient, cheerful, sympathetic, merciful, generous, hospitable (c. 12). Remembering the death of His Lord for all, he will not live for himself, but sacrifice himself for others, deny himself innocent pleasures and lawful rights rather than lead a weak brother into temptation, or set a stumbling-block in his path (c. 14). He will not succumb to evil, not try to overcome evil with evil. He will eschew anger and revenge, will bless his persecutors, and feed his enemy (c. 12). As a citizen he will loyally recognise the lawful and divinely appointed authority of the ruling powers which restrain evil-doers, and encourage well-doing; he will not withhold from them taxes, customs, fear, and honour (13:17). As a member of the Church, the one body in Christ, he will play his part diligently, in a fervent spirit serving the Lord; he will exercise his own spiritual gifts, and respect the varying gifts of others, whether prophecy, ministering, teaching, exhortation, ruling, or contributing to the temporal needs of the Church (12:6–7); he will by every means in his power help on his brethren, love them for Christ’s sake, and encourage them in the Christian life, bear their infirmities (15:1), be slow to judge them (14:10–12), live in peace and harmony with them, avoid causes of stumbling and division in doctrine and practice (16:17).

(5) In relation to Oneself. The Christian will honour himself and keep himself pure. Remembering that Christ died for him and for sin, he will present his body a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, in reasonable service (12:1). He will restrain his fleshly nature watchfully; keep the commandments; cultivate the spiritual side of his nature resolutely, even at the expense of the bodily; enter into the life of Christ, abhorring evil, cleaving to good. He will strive not to be fashioned according to this world, but to be transformed by the renewing of his mind into the image of God's Son, so proving God's good and perfect will (12:2). As one who shall stand before the judgment-seat of God (14:10), and who knows that the consummation of God's saving work draws nearer (13:11), and that the night preceding the great day is far spent, he will put slumber far from him, and cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light (13:11-14). Under difficulties he will be of good courage, assured that to those who love God all things work together for good (8:28). He is Christ's; he has the Spirit dwelling in him; he is the child of the Father in heaven. These things he cannot forget—his personal life is shaped by them, guided by the One Spirit.

Summary of the Epistle

The subject of the Epistle is the meaning and power of the gospel, i.e. God's message to man of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, for Jew and Gentile alike.

I. Chs. 1–8. The Divine Way of Acceptance with God.

1:17-17. After an introduction fitted to engage the attention and sympathy of the Roman Christians (1:1-15), St. Paul sets down the subject of the Epistle. It is the gospel which works a moral miracle among men by proclaiming a state of acceptance with God, offered to all as a free gift, on the sole condition of faith (1:16f).

1:18-3:20. St. Paul shows that all men need salvation. Both Gentile and Jew have sinned, though God has given each a law; and each will be judged by the law he has (1:18-2:20). In spite of his privileges, the Jew needs salvation as much as the Gentile, as his moral condition shows (3:1-20).

3:21-26. The need of sinful man has been met by the love of God. Christ has shed His blood as an offering to God for man's redemption. Thereby God's holy displeasure against sin has been manifested, and all who join in that offering by self-surrendering faith in Christ are received by God into a state of acceptance.

4:1-5:21. Reasons why men should welcome this way of salvation. (1) It is in harmony with God's dealings in the past. Acceptance with God has always been on account of faith (4:1-25). (2) It brings to men peace and joy and everlasting security (5:1-11). (3) By transferring us into relationship with Christ, it more than abolishes the evil effects of sin and death which we have derived from our former relationship with Adam (5:12-21).

6:1-8:39. The power of the gospel. It does not merely provide against the consequences of sin. By his faith in Christ a believer is changed. He becomes so vitally united with Christ in His death and life that the man he used to be is dead, and his heart is joined with Christ in communion with God (6:1-23).

Nothing else would do this. So evil is man's nature that even the holy law only emphasizes the fact of his slavery to sin (7:1-23). But the man who has faith in Christ is freed from slavery by a greater power than himself. The Spirit of Christ has entered into him, and the Spirit within overpowers the sin in his flesh, will deliver his body from the grave, and makes him God's son and heir of God's glory. Thus, in all his troubles, the Christian is secure in the divine love of Christ (8:30).

II. Chs. 9–11. God's Way of Acceptance vindicated. St. Paul feels that some might object—The Messiah, and the blessings of His kingdom, were promised by God to Israel. But Israel as a whole has rejected Jesus, and is outside His kingdom. Therefore, if Jesus be the Messiah, God has broken His word to Israel; which cannot be thought of.

He answers—God never bound Himself to Israel as a race. He has always claimed the right to select some descendants of Abraham to be His instruments, and to reject others (9:1-21). Yet He has been merciful to Israel, who have fallen by their wilfulness (9:22-10:21). However, Israel's fall is partial and temporary. the disobedience of both Gentiles and Jews was reckoned with in God's purpose, and He will bring the Jews, finally, into His kingdom (11:30).

III. Chs. 12–16. The Practical Life acceptable to God. In chs. 12 f. St. Paul points out the life of love and obedience which is the Christian's true sacrifice, and which would commend Christianity to the people of Rome and to the rulers of the empire.

In chs. 14 f. he enjoins love and tolerance between the Jewish and Gentile sections of the Roman Church (14:1-15:13). He hopes to visit Rome after a visit to Jerusalem undertaken in the furtherance of unity (15:14-22), for which he asks their prayers (15:30-32).

C. 16. In the midst of personal greetings occurs a warning (16:17-20) against hostile teachers, probably Jewish, whose appearance at Rome he expected.
CHAPTER 1

In his salutation the apostle emphasises his commission, and the greatness of the Person whose servant he is and who is the centre of his message (vv. 1–7). After expressing his desire to visit the Romans (vv. 8–15), he states the subject of his Epistle, viz. acceptance with God through faith in Jesus Christ (vv. 16, 17), and proceeds to develop it by showing that none have been able to merit acceptance with God. He begins by proving this of the Gentiles (vv. 18–32).

1–7. The Salutation.

Paraphrase. ‘(1) I, Paul, who write am a bondservant of Christ, set apart by God as an apostle to proclaim that message of good news (2) which was promised by His prophets. (3) The subject of the message is His Son, of David’s lineage by human descent, (4) but, as regards His spiritual being, shown to be Son of God by the divine power exercised in His Resurrection. (5) Since, through Christ, I was brought into God’s favour, and commissioned to be apostle to the Gentiles, (6) and that you at Rome, whom Christ has chosen, are Gentiles; (7) therefore I write to you, praying that God may grant you His blessings.’

Called] i.e. chosen by Christ. He emphasises this, because a party of Judaising Christians, who opposed the doctrine of salvation by faith, and held that circumcision was of perpetual obligation, denied his apostleship: cp. 1 Cor 9:14 Gal 1:1 see Intro. Gal. Apostle] see on 167. Separated] cp. Ac 13:2 Gal 1:15.

With power] i.e. by a display of divine power. The Resurrection was a miracle: cp. 2 Cor 13:14 Eph 1:19. According to] i.e. as regards. Spirit of holiness] Not the Holy Spirit, but Christ’s human spirit ‘in which the Divinity or Divine Personality resided’ (Sunday and Headlam). By the resurrection] As His words and works marked Him out as more than mere man (cp. Mt 16:16), so did the Resurrection. Notice the confidence and the emphasis with which the apostles proclaimed the Resurrection of Christ as being a certain fact, and as proving the truth of the gospel: see on 4:23 Ac 1:22 24:4, 17:18, 31, etc.

5. Grace] In Acts and Epistles this word usually means the unmerited favour of God, shown (1) in forgiveness and salvation, cp. 3:14 Eph 17: as opposed to debt, cp. 4:4, to works, cp. 11:6 Eph 2:5, and to law, cp. Gal 2:21; (2) in the call of the Gentiles, cp. Eph 3:11; (3) in special gifts of calling to and fitness for Christian work, cp. 12:6 15:15 1 Cor 3:10 Gal 2:9 Eph 4:7f. Here ‘grace’ means the Christian standing generally, to which is added in Paul’s case the distinctive gift of apostleship. For obedience to the faith] RV ‘unto obedience of faith,’ i.e. to win that obedience which is connected with faith: cp. 16:36. Nations] RV ‘the nations,’ i.e. Gentiles: cp. v. 13, Gal 1:16 27f. Name] RV ‘name’s sake,’ i.e. the Apostle works for the sake of Christ, and to promote His glory. The name of God is what God has revealed about Himself: cp. Ex 34:5 Mt 28:19.

8–15. The Apostle greatly desires to visit Rome.

Paraphrase. ‘(8) I thank God that your faith is so well known. (9) I constantly pray about you, (10) asking that God may permit me soon to visit you. (11) For I long to impart to you some spiritual benefit, (12) in fact that we may be mutually helped by each other’s faith. (13) I have often planned a visit, although I have been prevented, for (14) all Gentiles, of whatever race, lie within the sphere of my duty. (15) Therefore, so far as the decision rests with me, I am eager to preach the gospel to you.’

9. Serve] The Gk. word is used of the worship of God by people or priest. St. Paul’s work of preaching the gospel was a priestly service, in which he offered the Gentiles as a sacrifice to God: cp. 15:14. With] RV ‘in.’ 10. Have a prosperous journey] RV ‘be prospered.’ He knew his journey to Jerusalem would be dangerous, cp. 15:30, but did not foresee that he would visit Rome as a prisoner: cp. Ac 27:24. 11. Spiritual gift] The term is sometimes used of the special endowments which accompanied the reception of the Holy Spirit: cp. 1 Cor 12–14. The meaning here is that St. Paul hopes the Romans may increase in faith and love through his teaching and influence. Established] i.e. strengthened in faith and other virtues. 12. The Apostle will not assume superiority. 13. Let] RV ‘hindered,’ i.e. by more pressing calls: cp.
15. The Roman Christians were Greek-speaking for 250 years. To the Greek and Roman, all the rest of the world was barbarian. 15. In me] Emphasis on 'me'; God might will otherwise. St. Paul was going to Jerusalem, and felt that his life would be in danger; cp. 15:20, Ac 20:22.

16, 17. The main subject of the Epistle—Righteousness by Faith.

Paraphrase. '16 (I am not ashamed to preach the message of Christ even in great Rome, for it is the divine power whereby God brings salvation to all who have faith in Christ. (17) For in it is revealed that God accepts men as righteous solely on the condition of faith, as is shown in the OT.'

16. Ashamed] cp. 1 Cor 1:27. Salvation] i.e. deliverance from dangers or enemies. So it signified the deliverance which the Messiah would bring: cp. Lk 1:59-62. Here it is such as belongs to a spiritual kingdom; and is from 'sin,' cp. Mt 1:1, Lk 1:77; from 'wrath,' cp. 5:8; from 'the grave,' cp. 15:11; and to 'eternal life,' cp. Jn 3:16. As regards conversion and baptism, Christians 'were' or 'are saved,' cp. 8:24 (RV), Eph 2:5, 2 Tim 1:9; as recipients of God's favour and blessing, Christians are 'being saved,' cp. Ac 2:47 (RV), 1 Cor 1:18 (RV); as regards future glory, Christians 'will be saved,' cp. 13:11 Mt 10:22. Believers] i.e. who devotes and entrusts himself to Christ as his Lord and Saviour. The Jew first] to whom the Messiah was promised and from whom He came. Greek] i.e. any one not a Jew = Gentile.

17. The righteousness of God] RV 'a righteousness of God.' A state of righteousness, or acceptance with God, to which man could not attain by his own efforts, but which God bestows upon him of His free grace.

From faith to faith] RV 'by faith unto faith,' i.e. given, on condition of faith, to those who have faith: cp. 3:22. Just] RV 'righteous.' The quotation is from Hab 2:4, which referred to preservation from the calamities of the Chaldean invasion. The principle is that it is faith which gains God's approval.

18-32. The Apostle has briefly stated God's offer of righteousness in the Christian message. He now proceeds to show that all men have failed to attain acceptance with God by other means. First he speaks of the Gentiles. They lie under God's wrath on account of their unrighteousness (v. 18). They might have had a knowledge of God (vv. 19, 20), but have turned away to idolatry (vv. 21-23), and are sunk, in consequence, in moral corruption (vv. 24-32).

Paraphrase. '18 The need of such a method of salvation is evident when we consider that mankind has always suppressed the truth within and lived in wickedness. For them wrath, not righteousness, is revealed. (19) For instance, God has made Himself known to the Gentiles: (20) for His power and divinity are so clearly impressed upon the visible creation that they cannot plead ignorance. (21) They had a revelation of God, but instead of worshipping Him aright, they became so involved in useless speculations about His nature, that they lost the sense of truth and right. (22) Their conceit led to such idolatrous folly (23), that they regarded an image of man or beast as a fitting representation of the majesty of God. (24-27) Therefore God gave them over to the degradation which was the result of their apostasy. (28-31) Their rejection of the true idea of God was followed, as a penal consequence, by depravity and every kind of sin. (32) So great is their wickedness, that although they know the guilt of such sins, they not only commit them, but approve of them in others.'

18. Wrath] i.e. the steadfast indignation of God against sin. God 'would not love good, unless He hated evil, the two being inseparable' (Trench). Revealed] by the state to which sin had brought the Gentile world, and by God's revelation of a coming day of wrath: cp. 2:6. Hold] RV 'hold down,' i.e. suppress. Known] in them] i.e. nature teaches a knowledge of God, and man has the faculty of receiving the teaching. From] RV 'since.' By] RV 'through.' Godhead] RV 'divinity.'

19. Vain] i.e. foolish, empty. Impositions] RV 'reasonings,' i.e. about God.

23. Changed] i.e. exchanged. Glory] i.e. the manifested power and goodness of God. Into] RV 'for.' Man] as in Greece and Rome, where even immorality was ascribed to the gods. Birds, etc.] as in Egypt.

24. Gave them up] Those who forsake God; forsake Him who restrains evil and inspires good. Further, one sin leads to another, by natural consequence which is God's law: cp. Ps 81:12 Ac 4:32. So the idolatry of success, money, pleasure, and luxury, often leads to gambling, dishonesty, and vice.

25. Who] RV 'for that they.' Changed] RV 'exchanged.' Truth of God] i.e. the true idea of God. Into a lie] RV 'for a lie,' i.e. for an idol, a false conception of God. More] RV 'rather.'

26. Affections] RV 'passions.'

28. Convenient] RV 'fitting.'

29. Debate] RV 'strife.' Whisperers] i.e. secret slanderers.

30. Despitable] RV 'insolent.' Proud] RV 'haughty.'

32. Knowing] i.e. by conscience. Judgment] RV 'ordinance.' Have pleasure in] RV 'conceit with.' A sign of 'complete victory over conscience, and complete callousness to the moral ruin of others' (Moulton).
CHAPTER 2

THE FAILURE OF THE JEWS

In c. 1 St. Paul showed that the Gentiles were under God's judgment on account of sin. Now he is about to turn to the Jews. He asserts first, that God's judgment will fall impartially upon all sinners (vv. 1-11). Each man will be judged by the light which he has (vv. 12-16). The privileges and knowledge of the Jews only aggravated the guilt of their flagrant disobedience (vv. 17-24); and circumcision would not protect them, for God looks at the heart and life (vv. 25-29).

1-11. The Jew would agree in condemning the sins mentioned in c. 1, yet he himself was equally guilty, and must be judged, like the Gentiles, by his deeds, whether good or bad.

Note. There is no contradiction here to the doctrine of justification by faith. for (1) St. Paul is speaking of men apart from the gospel; (2) 'faith is present in a more or less rudimentary state in every upward effort or aspiration of man' (Hort, quoted by Gore); (3) good works are the fruit and evidence of faith.

Paraphrase. (1) Perhaps you condemn such sinners. In doing so, you condemn yourself, for you too are guilty. (2) We all know that God's judgment against evildoers is unerring and impartial. (3) Do you think you are different from others, and exempt from judgment? (4) or do you think God is too kind to punish you, not understanding that His kindness is meant to move you to repent? (5) Seeing that you do not repent, you are daily incurring a heavier judgment. (6) For God will judge every man by his deeds, (7-10) whether he be Jew or Gentile, giving eternal life to those who do good, while there will be wrath for all who persist in evil; (11) for God judges impartially.'

1. Inexcusable] RV 'without excuse', i.e. of a guilty conscience. 2. Judges] cp. Gal 2:11. The same thing of the same kind, if not so glaring. 3. Are sure] RV 'know', i.e. by reason and revelation. 5. After] i.e. in accordance with.

Indignation] RV shall be indignation.

12-16. All men are under a law of some kind, whether revealed law or the light of nature; and by the law that they have they will be judged.

Paraphrase. (12) I say God is impartial, for He will punish every man who sins against the light, whether, as with Gentiles, it be the light of conscience, or, as in the case of the Jews, the light of law. (13) It is not because a man has a law, but because he keeps it that he will be justified. (14) This applies to Gentiles as well as Jews. For Gentiles have an inner law of nature, as is shown by their good deeds, (15) which testify to a sense of right and wrong; their conscience shows the same thing; and so does the fact that they blame or praise one another's actions. (16) By this law they will be judged at the last.'

12. Without law] i.e. without a revealed law of right and wrong. In the law] RV 'under law'. By the law] RV 'by law'. The expression 'the law' means the Law of Moses; 'law,' without the article, means law in general, 'the will of God for man's conduct.' St. Paul regards the pre-Messianic period as essentially a period of law, both for Jew and for Gentiles (Sanday and Headlam). 13. The law] RV 'a law'. Justified] i.e. declared righteous at the Judgment. 14. Not the law] RV 'no law'. By nature] i.e. without a revelation.

15. Which] RV 'in that they.' The work of the law] i.e. the effect of the law in marking what is right from what is wrong.

Conscience] the faculty by which we reflect upon the character of our actions. It may be more or less enlightened, cp. 1 Cor 8:1-12; it may become corrupt through sin, cp. Tit 1:16, and give no light, cp. Mt 6:38. Therefore a man's appeal to conscience is not decisive, unless he has taken pains to inform it and keep it pure. 16. My gospel] i.e. the message I am commissioned to preach: cp. 16:25.

17-24. Here, first, the Jew is expressly addressed. He relied upon God's favour and his knowledge of God's will. Yet his wickedness was a matter of common knowledge. (St. Paul is speaking generally; there were bright exceptions.)

Paraphrase. (17) I turn to the Jew, proud of his religious superiority, (18) and of the knowledge of God's will and the high ideal of conduct which he derives from the Law of Moses, (19, 20) thinking that he is in the light and all other peoples in darkness. (21-23) How shameful, then, is the conduct which is so contrary to his profession, (24) and which brings such dishonour upon the name of God among the heathen!'

17. Jew] the national name. Restest in] RV 'restest upon', i.e. feeling secure of God's favour from the mere possession of the Law.

Of God] i.e. as peculiarly bound to the Jew.

18. Approvest, etc.] i.e. able to distinguish delicately between the more and the less good.
20. Form] i.e. perfect embodiment.

25-29. The Jew thought that because he was circumcised, i.e. a member of the covenant people, he was sure of God’s favour. But circumcision implied a surrendered life, which is the only thing acceptable to God.
Paraphrase. ‘(25) You trust in circumcircumcision, and it is good to be a Jew; but if you are not obedient to God’s Law, you are no better than an uncircumcised heathen, (26) while a heathen who, according to his lights, does what your law requires will be accepted by God although he is uncircumcised, (27) and will be in a superior position to you, seeing that you break the Law in spite of your advantages. (28) For the true people of God are those who are so, not by race or professon only, (29) but by obedience of heart and life. They may not be called Jews, but they are praised by God.’
25. Profess[ cp. 31 1. 91. Keep] i.e. as a habit, opposed to habitual transgression.
26. The uncircumcision] i.e. the uncircumcised man. Righteousness] RV ‘ordinances’;
cp. Ac.10:14. 27. Judge] cp. v. 1. By the conformity to the literal command, contrasted with the spiritual change which it represented.

CHAPTER 3
THE NEW WAY OF ACCEPTANCE WITH God
In chs. 1 and 2 St. Paul has shown that both Gentile and Jew have sinned willfully, and are under God’s condemnation. He now digresses to Jewish objections against the gospel, which he had, no doubt, heard urged in synagogues (vv. 1-8). Returning to the main subject, he clinches his indictment of the Jew out of the Scriptures, and concludes that all the world is ‘under the judgment of God’ (vv. 9-20).

Having thus shown that man is sinful and lost, he now proceeds to set forth the gospel.
God has provided a way by which acceptance, springing from God’s love, and secured by the redemptive work of Christ, is granted to all who have faith in Christ (vv. 21-28). Thus acceptance depends upon faith, not upon human merit (vv. 27, 28), and is open to all (vv. 29, 30). At the same time, faith leads to true obedience (v. 31).
Paraphrase. ‘(1) You may say: If those only are God’s people who are so inwardly and spiritually, what advantage is it to be Jew? (2) I reply: Much; to begin with God’s Word with its precious promises was entrusted to them. (3) And since that is so, will God break His word because some have shown their want of faith by rejecting Christ?
(4) Impossible! Whoever be false, God will be found true, His promises will be justified and His conduct vindicated. (5) You may say: If this be so, our sin in rejecting Christ has made God’s faithfulness to His promises clear, and it is unjust of Him (humanly speaking) to punish us. (6) I reply: Horrible!
On your grounds no sin would be punished.
(7) If you plead: This is an exceptional case.
My sin has glorified God by showing how He keeps His word: (8) why should I not be accepted by Him equally with the Christians who say, as I say, let us do evil that good may come? I can only reply: Such a principle is to be condemned, and to impute it to us is slanderous.

2. Much] cp. 9:14. Oracles] i.e. the utterances of God in the OT. 3. Did not believe] RV ‘were without faith.’ Unbelief] RV ‘want forbid] lit. ‘let it not be.’ Written] Ps.51:14.
Art judged] RV ‘comest into judgment.’
5. Taketh vengeance] RV ‘visitheth with wrath.’ As a man] RV ‘after the manner of men,’ i.e. speaking of the dealings of God as if they were the dealings of men: cp. Ga.13.
7. For] RV ‘but.’ 8. Evil] St. Paul said,
‘We are not justified because of what we do.’
His adversaries represented him as saying.
‘It does not matter what we do’: cp. v. 31.
6, 15. Whose, etc.] i.e. those who hold such a principle as ‘let us do evil,’ etc., will be condemned, and that justly. Damnation] RV ‘condemnation.’

9-20. Jewish Scriptures testify to Jewish sin.
Paraphrase. ‘(9) What follows then? We Jews have advantages over the Gentiles, but are we better than they? By no means. The charge I laid was against Jew as well as Gentile.
that both are under the power of sin. (10-18)
The Scriptures make the same charge, Psalmist and Prophet alike speak of universal corruption.
(19) Such passages exclude self-justification on the part of the Jews, and prove the guilt of mankind against God. (20) This must always be so: weak, sinful man can never attain to acceptance with God through obedience to law:
law, since it is never kept, cannot secure right-ousness, it can only convict of sin.’

9. Proved] RV ‘laid to the charge.’
10-18. From Ps.5:9 10:7 14:17. 36:1 140:1
Isa.55:17.

19. Them who are under the law] i.e.
the Jews. Become guilty before] RV ‘be brought under the judgment of.’
Therefore] RV 'because.' The deeds of the law] RM 'works of law,' i.e. done to merit salvation by fulfilling an appointed task: cp. 7:27. Gal 3:19, 21. Law is a factor in the moral life fitted to acquaint the intellect with the divine standard of conduct, but incapable of bringing the life of man into harmony with its precepts (Robertson, HDB.). No flesh] cp. Ps 143:3.

21-26. The way of acceptance declared in the Christian message is independent of law (v. 21), a free gift from God through faith in Christ (vv. 22-24), and made possible because Christ's death was propitiatory (vv. 25, 26).

Paraphrase. '21) We have seen that by obedience to law none can enter into acceptance with God because none have rendered it. Now a way of acceptance has been revealed which has nothing to do with law, to which both Law and Prophets bear witness. 22) God accepts all, without distinction, who have devoted their hearts to Jesus Christ. 23) I say all, and the want is universal. All alike have sinned, and feel far off from God. 24) But God's gracious favour is such, that He accepts them without question of merit, through the deliverance from sin and its penalty which Christ purchased, and which we receive by union with Him. 25) For on the Cross He offered up His life, to restore to the favour of God all who by faith appropriate that offering. In that awful spectacle God manifested His righteous displeasure against sin, forbidding us to attribute to indifference the forbearance by which He passed over, without adequate punishment, sins committed before Christ came. 26) In the death of Christ He so then displayed, I say, His judgment against sin, that now the perfect holiness of His character is vindicated, and He can also accept those who have faith in Jesus.'

21. Now] i.e. under the gospel. The righteousness, etc.] RV 'apart from the law a righteousness of God hath been manifested': cp. 1:17. A righteousness of God, i.e. a way of acceptance which God has provided. Manifested] i.e. in the Person and work of Christ: cp. 2 Tim 1:10. Witnessed] i.e. by types and promises. 22. Faith of] RV 'faith in': cp. Gal 2:16. This further defines the righteousness spoken of. The means by which it is received is faith in Christ, and it is given to all who have such faith. Faith is 'man's trustful acceptance of God's gift, rising to absolute self-surrender, culminating in personal union with Christ, working within...as a spirit of new life' (Farrar, 'St. Paul,' p. 473). Difference] RV 'distinction.'

23. Come short] The Gk. word, which means 'to feel one's need,' is that used in Lk 15:14 of the Prodigal. Glory of God] i.e. the divine perfection, which is manifested in Christ (cp. 2 Cor 4:6), and which shines upon man and transfigures him into the likeness of Christ, partially now, and completely hereafter: cp. 8:18 2 Cor 3:18 1 Jn 3:2.

24. Justified] i.e. declared or accounted righteous, as by a judge; accepted: refers to 'them that believe,' v. 22. God can justly declare a sinner righteous who has faith in Christ because his face is turned to the light; he is in sympathy with Christ, and desires to follow His example. Grace] see on 16. Redemption] 'Redemption' means, (1) deliverance from bondage by payment of ransom: cp. Lv 25:28; (2) deliverance in general, as of Israel from Egypt; cp. Ex 6:5. Christ redeemed us from sin and its penalties: cp. 8:24 Eph 1:17 Col 1:14. The ransom was His life, not considered as paid to any one, but as the price which it cost Him to procure our deliverance (cp. Mk 10:46 1 Tim 2:5) and to restore us to God: cp. 1 Cor 6:20 7:22. In Christ Jesus] see paraphrase. The form 'Christ Jesus' (not 'Jesus Christ') always refers to the glorified Christ.

25. Propitiation] i.e. that which makes it possible for God to be propitious, or favourable to man. In his blood] RV 'by his blood,' i.e. Christ became a propitiation by shedding His blood. Declare] RV 'shew,' for, otherwise, it might have been doubted. For the remission, etc.] RV 'because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime': cp. Ac 13:50. Passing over,' i.e. temporary suspension of punishment (Sanday and Headlam).

Forbearance] i.e. temporary suspension of anger.

37-31. Since salvation is by faith, it follows that no claim can be made on the ground of human merit (vv. 27, 28), that Jew and Gentile are on the same footing (vv. 29, 30), and that law becomes fulfilled at last (v. 31).

Paraphrase. '27) It is plain that the gospel way of salvation by faith leaves no room for reliance upon privilege or merits, (28) for man is accepted through reliance upon his Saviour, not upon himself. (29) It is also plain that Jew and Gentile are on the same footing before God, (30) for there is one God for all, and He accepts all men on the same condition, viz. faith. (31) Some say that by preaching salvation through faith alone we abolish law. On the contrary, we set the principle that God's will must be done on a firmer basis.'

27. Boasting] cp. 2:24. The law] RV 'a law,' i.e. system. 28. Therefore] RM 'for.' Without] RV 'apart from.' 30. Circumcision] i.e. Jews. Uncircumcision] i.e. Gentiles. By...through] The Judaistic Christians seem to have held that they were justified on account of ('by') circumcision and obedience to the Law, if they had faith ('through faith'); but that Gentiles were justified on account of ('by') faith, if, in addition, they were circumcised and obeyed the Law ('through law'). St. Paul rejoins that justification depends on faith alone; Jew and Gentile alike are justified both 'by' and 'through' faith: cp. v. 28, Gal 2:16. 31. The law] RM 'law.' God's will is brought out more fully in the gospel (cp. Mt 5:17f.), and the believer is enabled to fulfill it: cp. 6, 8:4 Gal 2:19f.

CHAPTER 4

ACCEPTANCE BY FAITH FOreshadowED IN THE OLD DISPENSATION

In 3:21, St. Paul set forth the great truth of acceptance by faith. A Jew might object that it was new, and therefore not true. In 3:31 St. Paul answered that in the Law and in faith there is the same moral and religious ideal, which is more completely developed and more perfectly fulfilled by faith. Now he turns to the past, to show that acceptance by faith is not a new idea. It was faith for which Abraham was accepted, not works (vv.
1–8), nor circumcision (vv. 9–12), nor on account of obedience to the Law (vv. 13–17).
The history shows the nature of the faith which God accepts (vv. 18–22), in our case as well as in Abraham's.

1–8. It was faith, not works, for which Abraham was accepted.

Paraphrase. '1. Take, e.g., the case of Abraham. His descendants should readily admit the force of his case, which shows that acceptance by faith is no new principle. (2)
If he had been accepted on account of his deeds, he would have had something to be proud of in man's sight. And we men do honour him, and rightly. Yet even then he could not claim merit before God. (3) For the Scripture says that it was on account of his faith that he was reckoned as righteous. (4)
Now reward for work would not be so spoken of.
There is no favour in paying wages that are due. (5) Such an expression as 'his faith is reckoned for righteousness' is only properly used of one who makes no claim for work done, but simply puts faith in God. (6–8)
Notice, too, how David pronounced a man happy, although he had sinned deeply, simply because God forgave him and reckoned him as righteous.'

1. What... then] refers to 3:27f. That] RM 'of.' As pertaining to the flesh] i.e. by natural descent. The question is put in the mouth of a Jew. Therefore it does not follow that the Roman Christians were chiefly Jews. Cp. also 1 Cor 10:1, 'our fathers,' though the Corinthian Christians were mostly Gentile.

Hath found] RM omits.

2. Abraham] St. James also refers to Gn 15:6, but concludes 'that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only,' Jas 2:21. St.
James wrote of mere intellectual belief: cp.

Jas 2:19. St. Paul meant by 'faith' a complete change of relation towards God, which would affect the believer's actions: cp. c. 6. Gn 15:6 was a common text for discussion among the Jews. Possibly St. James was thinking of per-

3, 5. Counted] RV 'reckoned.' 4. Work-eth] i.e. a workman in daily life. 5. Work-not] i.e. as ground of acceptance. Ungodly] not meant of Abraham; the extreme case is put: cp. 5:6. 6. Describeth, etc.] RV 'prononceoth blessing upon.' Imputeth] RV
'reckoneth.' Without] RV 'apart from.'

7. Blessed] i.e. happy; from Ps 32:12.

9–12. The blessing was not dependent upon circumcision, to which as signifying admission to covenant with God, the Jews attach such importance.

Paraphrase. '9. Again. The blessing was irrespective of circumcision. (10) For at the time that Abraham's faith was reckoned for righteousness, he was uncircumcised. (11)
His circumcision was but a token, by which God sealed that acceptance which was his as a believing man. Hence, all Gentiles who believe are his spiritual children, and have righteousness reckoned to them. (12) And those Jews are his children who are not merely circumcised, but believe as he believed.'

9. Cometh] RV 'Is this blessing then pronounced.' 10. Abraham's faith preceded circumcision by many years: cp. Gn 17:6, 17:9, 24. 11. Sign] cp. Gn 17:11, 'a token of the covenant.' Seal] ratifying his acceptance. Imputed] RV 'reckoned.'

13–17. The promise was independent of any system of law.

Paraphrase. '13. Again. The promise to Abraham of world-wide inheritance was not to take effect by obedience to law. (14) For if the inheritance be for those who keep a law, then faith has lost its value, and the promise has been nullified. (15) For the effect of law, which reveals the requirements of a righteous God, is to bring about, not blessing, but consciousness of sin and expectation of God's wrath; transgression cannot exist without some law to be broken. (16) Therefore acceptance was made to depend upon faith, that it might proceed from God's bounty not our merit, and that all Abraham's descendants might be certain of obtaining the promise.
And by his descendants I mean, not Jews only,
but all those who have the faith which he had.
(17) For in spite of his old age, he fully believed God who promised him seed, and God has made him the father of all who believe in Jesus Christ.'

13. Heir of the world] i.e. by the universality of the reign of Christ: cp. Gn 12:23 22:17f.
15. Cp. 3:30. For where] RV 'but where,' i.e. on the principle of free gift. Sure] because, (1) not depending on the fulfilment of a law which would certainly be broken, and (2) admitting Jew and Gentile by the same gate of faith. Of the law] i.e. believing Jews. Abraham] who was not under the Law. Us all] i.e. Christians, from 'many nations.' Father] cp. Gn 17:5. Before... God] i.e. God regards Abraham as father of all believers. Quickened] i.e. makes alive. When God promised Isaac, Abraham, and Sarah were as though dead: cp. v. 19. Calleth] i.e. summons. Which be not] i.e. the promised seed. 18-22. It was because Abraham's faith was so unwavering, that it was reckoned unto him for righteousness.

Paraphrase. (18) His confident faith, when it was against human probability that God's promise of a son should be realised, led to the fulfilment of the promise. (19) His faith did not fail at the apparent impossibility. (20) Fixing his eye on God's promise, he received fresh youth, acknowledging God's power and truth (21) with complete certainty. (22) And because his faith was unwavering, God accepted it as though it were righteousness.

18. Believed in hope] i.e. had confident faith. That he might] RV 'to the end that he might.' So] i.e. as the stars: cp. Gn 15:5.

19. Being not weak] RV 'without being weakened.' Considered not] RV 'considered,' i.e. he realised his weakness, but still believed. Dead] RV 'as good as dead.' 20. RV 'yea, looking unto the promise of God, he wavered not through unbelief, but waxed strong through faith.' 21. Persuaded] RV 'assured.' 22. Imputed] RV 'reckoned.'

23-25. Abraham's faith is the pattern of ours.

Paraphrase. (23) Thus the history of Abraham's justification teaches us the principle on which God proceeds. (24) As Abraham trusted in God to bring Isaac as it were from death to fulfil His promise, so, if we believe on Him who raised up Jesus to fulfil His purpose, our faith will be accepted. (25) For Christ, who died because we had offended, was raised to bring about our acceptance.

23-24. Imputed] RV 'reckoned.' 24. Us] RV 'our sake': cp. 15:4 1 Cor9:10. If we believe] RV 'who believe.' 25. Delivered] RV 'delivered up,' i.e. by the Father: cp. 8:8; equally by Himself: cp. Gal2:20 Eph5:4. Our justification] The Resurrection brings about our justification, because (1) it shows the divinity of Christ, and therefore the value of His death: cp. 1 Cor15:11; (2) through the Resurrection, faith in the Atonement became possible, for it showed that the Atonement was complete: cp. 3:16 5:10; (3) Christ risen becomes the source of new life to us by our union with Him: cp. 5:11.

CHAPTER 5

GOD'S SALVATION AND THE RESULTS OF ITS ACCEPTANCE

St. Paul completes his exposition of acceptance by faith by pointing to its blessed effects (vv. 1-11). In the following vv. he compares sin and acceptance, as to which he has shown that all men have sinned, while acceptance is open to all, and declares the cause of this universality. Sin is universal, because all men derive their being from Adam. But, over against Adam, Christ has entered into our race as its new head; and from Him, all who become His derive righteousness and life, which overpowers sin and death (vv. 12-21).

1-11. Acceptance brings about triumphant hope of glory, which is guaranteed by our assurance of the love of God.

Paraphrase. (1) Blessed effects follow upon acceptance, and we should realise them. Such are reconciliation to God, (2) and admission to His gracious favour, with triumphant expectation of future glory. (3) Beyond this, we should triumph even in tribulations, because their bracing effect upon the character (4) strengthens our expectation of glory, (5) and this expectation is confirmed by a sense of God's love implanted by the Holy Ghost. (6) We are right in trusting utterly to such love as God revealed by the death of Christ. (7) Its like has never been known among men, for we were not good, (8) but sinful, when Christ died for us. (9) In view of this, we may trust Him to save us to the end. (10) For if God sacrificed His Son for His enemies, He will surely save His friends. (11) Reconciled, therefore, to God, we triumph continually in His abiding love.

1. Therefore] cp. 4:4. Justified] i.e. accepted. We have] RV 'let us have.' 2. We have access] RV 'we have had our access,' as into a king's palace: cp. Gal5:4. Rejoice] RV 'let us rejoice.' Glory] i.e. the future and everlasting presence of God: see on 3:28.

3. We glory, etc.] RV 'let us also rejoice in our tribulations': cp. Ac14:22. Worketh] i.e. brings about. Patience] i.e. bearing up under great trials without losing heart.

4. Experience] RV 'probation,' i.e. a test: here the character of one who has come through the test of suffering strong and ready for all things. 5. Maketh not ashamed] RV 'putteth not to shame,' i.e. by proving mistaken. Love of God] i.e. to us. Is given] RV 'was given,' i.e. at a definite time: cp. Ac10:44 19:2. St. Paul takes it for granted that all Christians have had a definite gift of the Holy Spirit, which followed their acceptance of Christ (cp. Gal 3:2), one effect of which was to fill their hearts with a sense of God's love to them: cp. 8:15.

6. Without strength] RV 'weak,' i.e. morally.

In due time] i.e. when the need was greatest.

7. Righteous] i.e. just, contrasted with the more lovable 'good man.' 8. Commendeth] i.e. shows its excellence: cp. 3:5. 9. Wrath] RV 'the wrath of God': see on 1:18.

10. Enemies] i.e. opposing God's truth and will: cp. 8:7 Col 1:21. Reconciled] cp. 2Cor 5:18. Saved by his life] RM 'in his life,' i.e. saved from the power of sin now, and from death and God's wrath hereafter, through our union with the life of the risen Christ: cp. 6:14. 10. Joy] RV 'rejoice,' referring to vv. 27. In God] i.e. in His love and fatherhood. Now] i.e. under the gospel. Atonement] i.e. at-one-ment; RV 'reconciliation.'

12-14. Thus Christ is the head and representative of humanity, and we derive acceptance and life from Christ, as the OT shows that we derive sin and death from Adam.

Paraphrase: '12 Thus there are two heads, from whom the human race derives inheritance. From Adam all inherited a sinful tendency, which became active, so that all died. (13) When there is no law to be broken, there can be no guilt, yet even before the Law came, (14) death was universal, and those who had not broken any express command nevertheless died. Therefore sin and death are derived from Adam; and in this respect Christ, from whom, by union with Him, we derive righteousness and life, is Adam's counterpart.

12. Wherefore] refers to vv. 9-11. As... by sin] sentence broken off; would continue, 'so by one man righteousness and life entered.'

By one man] cp. 1 Cor 15:21ff. 46. Death] i.e. physical. Upon] RV 'unto.' For that] i.e. because. Have sinned] RV 'sinned.'

15-21. But our inheritance from Christ more than repays the ruin of the Fall.

Paraphrase: '15 But the inheritances from Adam and from Christ differ in degree and in kind. For if Adam's Fall was so powerful for harm, God's favour, shown through Christ, is much more powerful for good. (16) Again, sin is so terrible, that one sin led to man's condemnation. But God's favour is still mightier, for it offers pardon to all sins. (17) So mighty is it that, while we know that Adam's sin brought death, it is much more easy to conceive that those who welcome God's bounty will attain to life and glory through Christ. (18) To sum up; one sin brought condemnation to all, but, over against this, one verdict of acquittal has brought acceptance and life within the reach of all. (19) For the obedience of the second head of humanity reverses the effect of the disobedience of the first. (20) The Law has a subordinate place; it was meant to convert the unconscious sin of the world into definite transgression, that men might learn how far they are from doing God's will. But God's favour was so stupendously manifested as to overwhelm even this multiplied sin, (21) that the power of His gracious favour might prevail over that of sin, and bring man, through the work of Christ, to acceptance and to eternal life.'

15. Offence] RV 'trespass.' The Grk. word means a 'fall.' Free gift] i.e. of acceptance.

One] RV 'the one,' i.e. Adam. Many] RV 'the many,' i.e. mankind. Be dead] RV 'died,' i.e. became liable to death through sin. Grace] see on 15. By grace, etc.] RV 'by the grace of the one man.' Abounded] i.e. in power for good. 16. As it was by one] RV 'as through one.' To condemnation] i.e. leading to condemnation. Offences] RV 'trespassers.' Unto justification] i.e. leading to a sentence of acquittal.

17. By one] RV 'through the one.'

Abundance] refers to 'abounded,' v. 15.

Righteousness] i.e. acceptance. Reign] i.e. enjoy glory, and liberty from sin and death.

Life] i.e. heavenly life. 18. By the offence of one] RV 'through one trespass.' To condemnation] i.e. leading to condemnation.

Righteousness of one] better, 'one sentence of acquittal,' passed by God in consequence of Christ's obedience: cp. v. 19. Unto justification of life] i.e. leading to acceptance which results in life. 19. One] RV 'the one.'

Much more abound] overpowering the sin.

21. Sin, etc.] RV 'sin reigned in death,' i.e. sin had power which was death-bringing: cp. Isa 5:2. Unto... life] i.e. resulting in... life.

CHAPTERS 6-8

St. Paul has finished his exposition of Justification (3:18-5:21), and now passes to Sanction. In other words, having shown how the believer is delivered from the guilt of sin, he goes on to show how he is delivered from its power.

C. 6 shows the Christian abiding in living union with the risen Christ by the power of faith. C. 7 describes the failure of the most earnest life apart from Christ. C. 8 shows

CHAPTER 6

NEW RIGHTEOUSNESS IN UNION WITH CHRIST

Paul’s begins by repeating an objection must often have heard from Jewish adversaries (cp. 3:18), and suggested here by 5:13—namely, not this teaching of pardon by God’s favour practically encourage sin? The action is stated in two forms (vv. 1, 15).

Apostle not only answers his opponents as still more concerned to build up his exors in a holy life. He opposes to the action the fact of the believer’s union with Christ. Faith in Christ means devotion to Christ’s Person. The Christian is so vitally ed to Christ that he is dead with Christ and risen with Him to a new state in which sin has no place (vv. 1–14). The state then presents the same truth in a form easily grasped. In coming to Christ, Christian has experienced a change of ice; he is freed from Sin and bound to a Righteousness (vv. 15–25).

14. The Christian life should be like his risen life, i.e. it should be lived in the loving Presence. Sin belonged to the old e, to which the Christian died in baptism. (Araraphrase. (1) It is objected that by justification by Faith men are encouraged to continue in sin, since the greater sin, the greater the opportunity that is offered for the manifestation of God’s pardoning love to sinners. (2) But our baptism bestowed such a breaking-away from the old evil life as may be compared to death. Therefore, to say that a Christian may live in sin is a contradiction. (3) For our baptism has identified our hearts with Christ which amounted to a real on with Him, so that, while we look to His as the ground of our acceptance, we also unify ourselves with that alienation from sin of the world which crucified Him, of which His death was the final stage. (4) Therefore, our immersion beneath the waters of baptism signified death and burial with Him from the sinful life of the world. But it is not only His death that is ours. We ae up out of the water, as He rose from a dead, that we might begin to live in a condition animated by His risen life. (5) It is necessarily follows. For if we are united with Him in dying, we must be united with Him in new life, morally and spiritually now, that is physically hereafter. (6) Make no mistake: by His death, Christ finally sealed His a-long refusal of sin, and showed that His reasons must do the same. We, therefore, being like-minded with Him through our faith in Him, also repudiated sin at our baptism, slaying our old sinful selves. Therefore, we should realise that the rule of sin over our earthly natures is ended; (7) just as a master’s rule over a dead slave is ended. (8) If so, then life with Christ follows, (9) because we are one with Him, and He lives a life in which death cannot touch Him any more. (10) This is certain, for His death ended that earthly state in which He had contact with sin, and His life is now one of unbroken communion with God. (11) Do you, then, look upon yourselves also as dead in regard to sin, but alive to God’s presence and love and claims by your union with Christ. (12) Therefore, treat even your bodies as redeemed from sin, and do not yield to the lusts (13) which would use the parts and powers of your body to conquer you again for sin. Rather devote yourselves to God once for all, as if you had risen from the dead, and let all the powers of your bodies be weapons for the good fight in God’s service. (14) Do not fear failure. The power which sin has over those who are under law cannot exist in the life-giving atmosphere of the redeeming love of God in which you live.

2. Are dead] rather, ‘died,’ i.e. in baptism. Those addressed had been adult converts. Their baptism had been a definite act of attachment to Christ and of detachment from the sinful world. Although to crucify sinful and selfish desires is painful, it is done even joyfully by those who are inspired to the imitation of Christ by the perfect beauty and goodness of His sacrifice, for they have ‘that mind,’ in them ‘which was also in Christ Jesus.’ This, which is part of the inner meaning of baptism, is the spirit in which the true Christian will live his life.

7. Is freed from sin] As a dead slave has completely escaped from his master’s power, so one who has so believed in Christ as to be joined with Him in His death to the sin of the world, should remember that sin has no more, legitimately, to do with him. So far as its appeal to him is concerned, he should be dead. 8. Be dead] rather, 'died.' 10. In that he died, etc.] RV 'the death that he died . . . the life that he liveth.' Once] RM 'once for all.' 11. Through Jesus Christ our Lord] RV 'in Christ Jesus,' a phrase by which St. Paul often expresses our union with the glorified Christ. 12. Obey . . . lusts] RV 'obey the lusts.' 13. Yield] RV 'present.'

Instruments] RM 'weapons.' 14. Under the law] RV 'under law.' A code of precepts gives no power of fulfilment. It only (1) shows what is right, (2) reveals man's sinfulness, (3) stimulates him to opposition: cp. c. 7 1 Cor. 15: 56 Gal. 4: 6. 'To be "under the law,"' in St. Paul's language, means to avoid sin from fear of penalties attached to sin by the law. This principle of fear is not strong enough to keep men in the path of duty. Union with Christ can alone give man the mastery over sin' (Conybeare and Howson).

15-23. The Christian is to regard sin as a master from whom death has freed him. He is now the bondservant of righteousness.

Paraphrase. '15) Some assert that if they are no longer under law they may indulge in sin. (16) Impossible! You belong either to sin or to God; you cannot belong to both. (17) And although you were the servants of sin once, you have now taken the Christian teaching as your rule of life, (18) thus exchanging the service of Sin for the service of Righteousness. (19) The illustration is inadequate, for you are better than slaves, you are God's children. But I want you to see that you must now devote your bodies to righteousness and sanctification as unreservedly as once you devoted them to impurity and licence. (20) Formerly, you served sin only, (21) and the only reward you had to look for was eternal death. (22) Now you serve God only, a service leading to sanctification, with everlasting life in prospect. (23) Make no mistake. Those who serve sin receive the death they have deserved. But God gives to His servants what they could never earn, even everlasting life in union with Christ.'

Obedience] personified; the mark of the lives both of the Redeemer and of the redeemed: cp. Phil. 2: 8 Heb. 5: 8, 10: 4.

17. That form, etc.] RV 'that form of teaching whereunto ye were delivered,' i.e. simple instruction in Christian truth and morality: cp. Ac. 2: 42. 19. After the manner of men] i.e. I use an illustration drawn from human affairs, because you have not had that deep spiritual experience to which I might appeal differently: cp. 3: 4. Flesh] i.e. unspiritual human nature. Have yielded] RV 'presented.' Iniquity] lit. 'lawlessness.' Unto iniquity] i.e. iniquity leading to iniquity with the result of a lawless life. Yield] RV 'present.' Holiness] RV 'sanctification,' i.e. growth in holiness. 20. From] RV 'in regard of.' 22. Holiness] RV 'sanctification.'

Everlasting life] i.e. future bliss. 23. Gift] RV 'free gift.' Through] RV 'in': cp. v. 11, 1 Jn. 5: 11.

CHAPTER 7

THE INADEQUACY OF THE LAW TO SAVE

1-6. St. Paul had spoken of the Law in a way which would offend an earnest Jew: cp. 3: 20, 21, 4, 15, 50. In this c. (vv. 7-25) he shows that the Law is divine in its character and beneficent in its work, but unable to free a man from the power of sin. Indeed, though not the cause, it is the occasion of sin. But first, in vv. 1-6, the statement in 6: 14, that Christians are not under law, is enforced and explained. Law which governs one state of life is often not applicable to another. Of this the marriage law is an example. And the Christian, by the death of his old self, has passed into another state, one in which the Law no longer has force.

Paraphrase. '1) Does any one hesitate at my statement (6: 14) that we are not under law? Let me remind him that the power of any law over a man ends at his death. And we have died with Christ to the old state of sin in which law applies, and risen with Him to a new life. (2) Or the change in our condition may be compared to the remarriage of a woman after the death of her husband. By his death, the legal ties which bound her to him were annulled; (3) for now the Law has no power to condemn the woman, although it condemned a second union while the husband lived. (4) In like manner, the Law which applied to us when we were wedded to our old self, had no more to do with us when our old self was crucified with Christ. So we were free to wed the risen Christ, that through union with Him we might bring forth fruit for God or our Master. (5) The state in which our fleshly nature ruled was not of such a character that we should desire to return to it. For the sinful passions which the Law revealed, and by revealing stimulated, caused us to bring forth fruit for Death as our master. (6) But, as it is, the Law has ceased to affect us. This does not mean that we are free to sin, but that now we serve God from inward impulse, instead of because we are told to do so by a law.'

1. Know the law] lit. 'know law,' i.e. probably law in general: all know that law ceases to be concerned with people when they are dead. 2. Loosed] RV 'discharged': cp. v. 6. Law of her husband] i.e. the marriage law. 4. By the body of Christ] i.e. through your union with Christ crucified.
of sin] RV 'sinful passions.' 'Passions' = passive feelings, e.g. hunger; sinful, when they control the will. By the law] cp. vv. 7-25, 5:30, and on 6:14. 6. Delivered] RV 'discharged.' That being dead] RV 'having died to that,' i.e. to the Law. Spirit] RV 'the spirit.' In the new state, the spiritual part of the man has been emancipated, and has become the predominant part of him. He lives, as it were, in a spiritual world, and has become a spiritual person; and therefore desires to carry out God's will freely and fully. In the old state, his obedience was constrained, and therefore limited, by a written code.

7-13. Although, in order that we might truly serve God, it was necessary that we should be set free from the Law (vv. 1-6), yet the Law is not evil. On the contrary, it does God's work, for it detects the sinfulness hidden in the soul, and exposes it in its true nature.

Paraphrase. (7) Are we to infer (e.g. from v. 5) that the Law is evil? Not so: the Law brings sin to light. For example, the tenth commandment made me conscious of the sin of coveting. (8) Not only so, but my sin became active when there was a commandment to resist, so that I coveted all the more because coveting is forbidden. Without law, sin is dormant. (9) So it was with me; my conscience was untroubled until I realised the commandment, then sin sprang to life, and I knew myself to be dead before God. (10) How startling a consequence of a commandment which pointed the way to spiritual life! (11) But it was the fault of sin within, which persuaded me to love that which I knew the commandment forbade, not the fault of the commandment, (12) which is holy and righteous and beneficent. (13) Thus I realised the exceeding wickedness of the sin within me, for it not only brought me to death, but did so by preventing the beneficent commandment from having any other effect than that of sinning my resistance.

7. Lust] RV 'coveting.' St. Paul instances the most searching and comprehensive commandment of the second table. 8. Taking occasion] RV 'finding occasion.' By the commandment, etc.] RV 'wrought in me through the commandment all manner of coveting.' Without] RV 'apart from.' 9. I was alive] RV 'emphatic.' 10. Ordained] RV omits. 11. Deceived] RV 'beguiled': cp. Gn 3:18. 'All sin is committed under a deception, momentarily at least, to (1) the satisfaction to be found in it, (2) the excuse to be made for it, (3) the probability of its punishment' (Vaughan). 12. But sin] Understand 'became death unto me.' Working] RV 'by working.' 15. Allow] RV 'know.'

24. The body of this death] Sin and death go together. The body which is under the power of sin is also given over to death.

CHAPTER 8

THE NEW LIFE IN CHRIST IN RELATION TO GOD AND THE SPIRIT

It was shown in 5:12, that condemnation for the guilt of sin is done away by justification through faith in Christ. The question as to the power of sin then arose, answered by the doctrine of sanctification in chs. 6-8. In c. 6 it is asserted that the union of the Christian with Christ is a new condition, which involves death with Him to sin and resurrection to newness of life. In c. 7 it is made clear that there is no force in the Law to break the power of sin. Now, in c. 8, St. Paul brings forward the truth of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, which accompanies union with Christ, conquering sin and death in the Christian (vv. 1-11), and bearing witness that he is child and heir of God (vv. 12-17). Hence the Christian has such hope of glory that he can bear his sufferings (vv. 18-25), in which the Spirit helps him by intercession (vv. 26, 27), and which are bringing about God’s purpose of good (vv. 28-30). In the security of that purpose he triumphs (vv. 31-39).

1-11. The Christian is sanctified as well as justified. In Christ he receives the Spirit, who frees him from the power of sin and of death (vv. 1, 2). The object of the death of Christ was not only to win pardon for man, but also to produce right character and conduct (vv. 3, 4). This is essential, and is brought about by the indwelling of the Spirit (vv. 5-9). The change means life, of spirit now and of body hereafter (vv. 10, 11).

Paraphrase. ‘(1) The deliverance spoken of (cp. 7 23) for those who are united to Christ (2) is brought about by the power of the life-giving Spirit, whom they received by union with Christ, which freed them from the power of sin and death. (3) The Law could not overcome sin, because man’s fleshly nature could not respond to its demands. But God, by the incarnation and atonement of His Son, sealed the death-warrant of sin in the flesh, (4) with the object of producing in us that character and conduct which the Law requires, by enabling us to live by the rule of the renewed spiritual nature. (5) There are two states of life, the difference between which is wide. According as the fleshly or the spiritual nature is the ruling power, so are men engrossed either with fleshly or with spiritual things; (6) either they are in a state of separation from God, which ends in death both of soul and body, or they have joyful communion with God and a happy sense of reconciliation with Him. (7) Death must be the portion of the mind set on fleshly things, because such a mind is in a state of hostility to God, being rebellious against His Law. (8) They, therefore, who are in Christ, are not so. Not the fleshly, but the spiritual nature rules over you, if the Spirit of God dwells in you. And unless you have Him you are not Christ’s, for it is by the Spirit that Christ comes to you. (10) But if Christ does dwell in you, although your body must die because of the curse of sin, your spirit has already risen into new life because you are accepted in Christ. (11) And the Spirit within you is a pledge that God will cause your bodies also to participate in Christ’s Resurrection.’

1. Who walk, etc.] RV omits: probably borrowed from v. 4. 2. Law of sin, etc.] cp. 7 23, 24. 3. Likeness of, etc.] Christ took real flesh, i.e. human nature, cp. Jn 1 14, but without its sinfulness, cp. Heb 4 15. For sin] RV as an offering for sin. Condemned sin in the flesh] (1) Christ proved, by a sinless human life, that sin is not necessary to human nature; (2) Christ made expiation for sin on our behalf; (3) Christ made it possible for us to die with Him to sin and rise with Him to newness of life, by union in love with Him, and by the power of the Spirit. 4. Righteousness] RV ‘ordinance’. 5. Things of the flesh] i.e. things merely human: cp. Mt 16 23; merely earthly: cp. Mk 8 31; Phil 3 19; or absolutely sinful: cp. Gal 5 19. 6. To be carnally minded, spiritually minded] RV ‘the mind of the flesh... the mind of the spirit’. 7. Carnal mind] RV ‘mind of the flesh’. 8. In the flesh] cp. 7 5. Please God] cp. Mal 3 4. 9. Dwelt] cp. Jn 14 17. Spirit of Christ] The Spirit of God is the Spirit of Christ, because He comes from the Son as well as from the Father. Also His Presence is in effect the Presence of Christ: cp. v. 10 Jn 14 16, Gal 4 6. 12-17. Let us live in accordance with the high position which the Spirit testifies is ours, namely, that we are God’s sons and heirs with Christ of glory.

Paraphrase. ‘(12) Such a destiny involves the duty (13) of putting to death the impulsive of the fleshly nature, by submitting yourself to your renewed spiritual nature. If you do so, you will live eternally, (14) an amazing destiny, but yours as sons of God. For you are shown to be sons of God by your following the guidance of God’s Spirit, (15) and by the testimony of your own spirits, which, when you became Christians, no longer regarded God with the slavish fear the Law produced, but received such a consciousness of sonship that the prayer of our hearts is “our Father.” (16) And this consciousness is caused by the Holy Spirit Himself, who thus unites with our own spirits in bearing witness that we are children of God. (17) Well, then, if we are God’s children, we are heirs of His glory, and shall share it with Christ hereafter if we share in Christ’s sufferings now.’

8–25. The glory to come will far outweigh sufferings we must bear now. All creation moving on through the mystery of pain to redemption, our hope of which is so sure we can wait in patience.

Paraphrase. '18) I said we must suffer with Christ. Suffering belongs to this passing season, for it is not worth a thought in view of the eternal glory (19) in which the sons of God will be revealed. Even nature, animate and inanimate, eagerly expects that blessed time. (20) Although God subjected her to perfection and decay, to further His purpose, it was not to be forever. He gave her sure hope (21) of future deliverance from law of decay, and of sharing the freedom from evil which God's children will have in eternity. (22) She groans, indeed, but in the 'throes of a better order of things. (23)
Even we Christians, though we have the irrit of a foretaste of blessedness, groan under weakness and imperfections of our bodies;
thus we await the full dignity of our sonship,
when our bodies shall be delivered from death.

Re] RV 'creation,' i.e. the irrational creation:
Gn 3:17. St. Paul represents nature etically, as feeling that dissatisfaction with pain and failure which exists in man's ind. There was a general expectation among the Jews, based on such passages as Isa 65:17-18, at the Messianic times would usher in a novation of nature. This expectation is ken up in the NT.: cp. Ac 3:19. Col 2:20 here 'hope' means that which is hoped for.

For what, etc.] RV 'for who hopeth for that which he seeth?' 25. Patience] i.e. patient endurance.

26–30. While the Christian endures his sufferings in hope, the Spirit within is praying him, better than he can pray himself (vv.
26, 27). Meanwhile he knows that his sufferings are helping to bring about that great and good purpose, in fulfilment of which God has brought him into a state of salvation (vv.
28–30).

Paraphrase. '26) Thus we both groan and hope. We cannot pray perfectly for the removal of our sufferings, because we do not know what is best. But the Spirit prays within us in inexpressible longings, (27) which God understands, and which are (as our words might not be) in accordance with His will.
(28) And this we do know, that all things, even our sufferings, are helping to fulfil a plan by which God is bringing about good to them that love Him. We know this, because it was in pursuance of His purpose that He called them to become Christians; (29) and the whole course of their salvation is due to His purpose; by which in eternity He regarded them with favour, and appointed them to attain to the likeness of His Son, that He might be the eldest in a glorious family, (30) then called them to be His, accepted them as righteous, and brought them to glory.'

26. Infirmities] RV 'infirmity,' i.e. 'our ignorance in asking.' What . . . for] RV 'how we should pray': cp. Phil 1:21. Itself] RV 'himself'; spoken of as a Person and distinct from the Father.

28. Called] see on 16. According to his purpose] cp. 9:11.

St. Paul does not say that God's purpose is to save some and reject others, but 'that he might have mercy upon all' (11:22). In pursuance of this purpose first the Jews, and then Christians, specially Gentile Christians, called to hold and spread the divine knowledge. Among those who had been called were those to whom the Epistle was addressed. St. Paul encourages them in their trials by the thought that God would not forsake those who had been so called by Him, and that, as to His favour, they were safe. On the other hand, he does not say that they could not rebel against God or forsake Him. On the contrary, he warns them against such presumptuous thoughts (11:20).

30. Did predestinate] RV 'foreordained.'

Glorified That which to us is future, is already complete in God's mind: cp. Eph 2:4f.

31-39. Since the Christian is the object of the divine love and work spoken of in the last section, he need fear no evil.

Paraphrase. ' (31) We may, therefore, face the future triumphantly, for God is on our side, (32) and the love which sacrificed His own Son will withhold from us nothing. (33) God's chosen need fear no accuser. Since He has acquitted, (34) none can condemn them. Since Christ, in His death and life and glory, has proved His love for them, (35) neither suffering nor death can part us from that love. (36) Even though we be martyred, like the faithful few of old, (37) His love will make martyrdom a surpassing victory. (38, 39) In short, no power in the universe will be able to part us from the divine love Christ has for us.'

39. In Christ] Christ's love is a manifestation of God's love.

CHAPTERS 9-11

It was obvious that the Church of Christ was coming to be almost entirely a Gentile Church, and that the Jews as a whole were refusing to accept Jesus as their Messiah. The Jew argued from this fact that Christianity could not be true. For if the Christian Church were really the fulfillment of the promised Messianic kingdom, and if the Jews were shut out from it, then God's promises to the Jews in the OT. would have been broken, which could not be imagined.

In chs. 9-11, St. Paul grapples with this objection:

(1) He points out that in previous epochs God had narrowed His choice, making a fresh selection out of those already selected; and He may be acting so again (9:1-19).

(2) God is supreme. He may choose His instruments as He will, and we have no right to criticize (9:14-23).

(3) If the Jews have failed, it is because of their unbelief (c. 10).

(4) After all, there may be more faithful Jews than is supposed, as in the time of Elijah (11:1-10).

(5) Seeing the reception of the Gentiles, the Jews themselves may be stirred up to accept Christ. God has forgotten neither them nor His promises, and His gracious purpose will not fail (11:11-36).

It should be noted that these chs. mainly treat of the selection by God of nations and Churches to spiritual functions and responsibilities. They have nothing to do with the predestination of individuals to salvation or condemnation, and the argument closes with the statement that what God has done has been with the purpose of having mercy upon all (11:18). While these chs. assume that God chooses His instruments for reasons which we cannot fathom, and which are independent of human merit and of birth or nationality, at the same time there are conditions which must be fulfilled on man's part. Those who have been chosen or elected, are free to fall away; they have done so in the case of the Jewish nation —they may do so in the case of the Gentile Church. They can only retain their position by 'faith,' i.e. here, by submitting themselves to God's purpose (10:20).

CHAPTER 9

THE REJECTION OF ISRAEL NO DISPARAGEMENT OF THE GOSPEL

The Apostle sorrowed over the exclusion of Israel (vv. 1-5), but their exclusion does not involve any breach of God's promises, for He always made a selection, even among the members of the chosen family (vv. 6-13). This cannot be unjust, for God has stated it to be His method (vv. 14-18). We should have no right to cavil, even if God seemed to use us sternly (vv. 19-21). But He has sided with mercy (vv. 22-29), and Israel has fallen through want of faith (vv. 30-33).

1-5. It is with the deepest sorrow that St. Paul sees the Jews outside the kingdom, for he loves them as brethren and remembers their privileges.

Paraphrase. '(1) It is the solemn truth (2) that my heart aches (3) over my brethren of Israel, so that I could wish to give my soul for their salvation. (4) How terrible is the fall of those who had such privileges from God, (5) who are descended from the patriarchs, and from whom, on the human side, has come the Messiah, He who is almighty and divine!'

1. In Christ] see on 6:11 Col 3:9. In the Holy Ghost] i.e. under His influence. 3. I could wish] i.e. if it were lawful and possible.

5. Of whom, etc.] RV 'of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh.' God] cp. Jn 11:10 Col 2:9.

6-13. Jewish opponents argued that the privileges enumerated in the last section were guaranteed to them as a nation, unless God broke His word. St. Paul replies that God is not bound to the whole nation. There had been from the first a process of selection, by which some had been rejected. The same process of selection and rejection might be expected now.

Paraphrase. 'Yet it does not follow that God's promises have failed because some have rejected them. Heirship of the promise does not belong to mere natural descent from Jacob. (7) For consider the case of Abraham. Ishmael was his elder son, yet Isaac was selected to be the father of the chosen race; (8) which shows that a position of privilege with God is a matter not of accident of birth, but of special promise and choice; (9) in fact, Isaac was born on purpose to inherit the promise. (10) Take a plainer example. Esau and Jacob had the same parents and were twins; (11) yet in their case also God showed that He carries out His purpose by selecting whom He chooses, for before their birth (12) He destined Jacob's line for privilege, (13) as Malachi recognises.'

6. RV 'But it is not as though the word of God hath come to nought.' Israel] in the sense of inheritors of the promise. Of Israel] i.e. by physical descent from Jacob.

9. The word] RV 'a word.' At this time] i.e. at this season next year (Gn 18:10).

11. The purpose] i.e. the purpose of salvation which existed in God's mind before creation: cp. Ro 8:28 Eph 1:4. According to election] i.e. the method by which God carries out His purpose is the selection of individuals and nations to be its instruments. So the Jews were selected to preserve the knowledge of God in the world, and to prepare for the call of the Gentiles. The selection is not to assure salvation, but to the privilege of helping to carry out God's plan of salvation for the world. Not of works] a further thought. God's choice proceeds from unmerited bounty. 12. From Gn 25:25.

13. Loved . . . hated] cp. Mal 1:21, which refers to the nations of Israel and Edom, and expresses the historical fact that Israel had privileges which were denied to Edom. 'Hated' implies decided rejection, but not vindictiveness: cp. Lk 14:26 with Mt 10:37. There is no reference to eternal salvation or rejection.

14-18. It is objected that the freedom of choice, which St. Paul attributes to God, would be unjust. This cannot be, for in the OT. God claims the same freedom. And, if then, so also now.

Paraphrase. '(14) The objector argues that such apparently arbitrary selection would be unjust. Far from it. (15) The Jew admits that all God does is just; here, then, are two passages in which God claims this freedom of choice. First, He told Moses, leader of the chosen people, that not even he could lay claim as a right to the favour about to be shown. (16) Therefore, human desire and striving are not the cause of God's choice of any, but His sovereign will and mercy alone. (17) Secondly, the words addressed to Pharaoh show that God did not punish him because he was an Egyptian, but for special reasons. (18) So, then, God is seen to show mercy or to harden according to His own will.'

15. From Ex 33:19. 16. Runneth] i.e. as a racer strives. 17. From Ex 9:16. Raised thee up] i.e. as king. St. Paul quotes Scripture to show that it was simply due to God's choice that Pharaoh, not some one else, was to be a world-wide example of God's power in punishment. It was not because of Pharaoh's nationality. The Apostle confines himself, here, to one point. It is that a Jew must admit that what God is shown, in the OT., to have done, cannot be unjust. He is not speaking, here, of eternal life or death. And he says nothing of Pharaoh's deserts or conduct, because that is not his point here. Presently he will assert (1) that those whom God has rejected have been rejected by their own fault after long forbearance; and (2) that it is God's will to have mercy upon all men.

18. Hardeneth] cp. Ex 4:21. God is said to harden, because He has made man so that, by the constitution of his nature, hardening follows persistent disobedience.

19-29. It is now objected that if God's will is irresistible, He ought not to blame the Jews. The answer is that, first, it is presumptuous of man to criticise His Maker; and, secondly, that God has been longsuffering with the Jews, as well as merciful to the Gentiles.

Paraphrase. '(19) Another objection. If those who resist God's will, do so because He has hardened them, and so fulfil His purpose, how can they be guilty? (20) The answer is twofold. First, we are not competent to criticise our Maker. (21) It is His right to mould each nation of mankind for whatever purpose He chooses. (22) But secondly, as a matter of fact, God has not been arbitrary. Although He is determined to punish sin, yet when the Jews have proved unfit for high purposes, He has borne long with them; (23) not only for their sakes, but that by their means He might be able to show mercy upon those prepared from the beginning, (24) even upon us, called—such is His mercy—from Gentiles as well as Jews. (25, 26) His word confirms this again: 'the call of the Gentiles' was foretold by Hosea, (27-29) and the fact that only a remnant of Israel would enter the kingdom was prophesied by Isaiah.'

21. Power] RV 'a right': cp. Isa 64:6 Jer 18:4. Honour...dishonour] not referring to final salvation or condemnation, but to the inequalities of life. Nations as well as individuals are called to duties and positions of greater or less honour: cp. 2 Tim 2:20.
22. Longsuffering] cp. 2:4. Vessels] the metaphor of the potter continued. Of wrath, i.e. deserving wrath. Fitted] St. Paul does not say, 'God had made them fit for destruction' (contrast 'afore prepared,' v. 23). They had become 'fitted for destruction,' because, being intractable under the moulder's hand, they were of no use for His purpose.
23. Might make known] cp. 11:11f. Of mercy] i.e. experiencing mercy. Prepared] cp. 8:24, 25, 26. From Hos 10:21, passages used freely and typically; originally speaking of the restoration of the Ten Tribes, who had become like those who were not God's people. 27, 28, 29. From Isa 19 10:22.
24. A remnant] RV 'it is the remnant that shall be saved.' 28. RV 'for the Lord will execute his word' (i.e. sentence) 'upon the earth, finishing it and cutting it short,' i.e. making it conclusive and brief.
30-33. The Jews have been rejected because they sought acceptance with God in their own way by meritorious works. They had not that faith which would make them attentive to hear and do God's will, and so could not fulfil His purpose (see v. 22 paraphrase). Stereotyped in a conventional religion, they were unable, for want of living faith, to receive the Messiah.

Paraphrase. (30) We conclude that Gentiles, who were not seeking acceptance with God, won acceptance given to those who have faith, (31) while Israel, who was seeking to be accepted because of meritorious works, has failed. (32) The reason is that instead of living by faith in God, i.e. instead of waiting on God to learn what His will for them was, they fixed their attention on observances. Hence they refused the Messiah, fulfilling Isaiah's prophecy that the stone, the strength of those who should have faith in Him, would cause the fall of the unbeliever.

30. Followed...attained] as a runner in a race: cp. Phil 3:12. 31. The law] RV 'a law.'
32. By the works of the law] RV 'by works.' [For] RV omits. Stumbling stone] cp. 1 Cor 10:23. 33. A combination of two passages. In Isa 28:16 the prophet spoke of a foundation stone which God was laying, and which would give a sense of security to those who trusted His promise. In Isa 8:14 the prophet spoke of Jehovah as being a stumbling-block to the unbeliever. St. Paul combines the two passages to show that Christ, who is strength and support to those who trust in Him, has been a stumbling-block to the faultless Jews. The 'stone' of Ps 118:22 was interpreted by Christ of Himself, Mt 21:42, etc., and from this, probably, the 'stone' of other passages was interpreted of Him. 'The stone' may have been a Jewish title for the Messiah.

ISRAEL REJECTED THROUGH LACK OF FAITH
In c. 9 St. Paul, defending the gospel against objections founded upon the fact that it had been rejected by the Jews as a whole, showed that God had never bound Himself to the Israelitish race, but had always kept Himself free to choose His own instruments. In c. 10 he declares that Israel have caused their rejection by failure to recognise God's methods, and by obstinate rebellion in spite of the patience of His love.

1-15. The zeal of the Jews is useless, because they follow their own way instead of God's (vv. 1-4), although God's way of salvation is so easy (vv. 5-11), and open to all (vv. 12, 13), and made known to all (vv. 14, 15).

Paraphrase. (1) I pray for the salvation of my people, (2) for they still are zealous for God, though with such lack of insight (3) that they are blind to His free offer of salvation, and vainly seek to win acceptance by their merits, (4) whereas faith in Christ has taken the place of obedience to law as the motive and inspiration of life and the condition of acceptance with God. (5) The old system of works called for an obedience beyond human power to give. (6) But acceptance by faith in Christ makes no impracticable demand. Christ has brought Himself within our reach by His Incarnation which made Him man among men, (7) and by His Resurrection which restored Him to us for ever: (8) so that the faith the gospel asks for is a simple thing, (9) only to acknowledge publicly that Jesus is Lord and really to believe in His Resurrection. (10) that is required can be done by human acts and human lips, (11) even as Isaias mises complete security to every one who faith in the Christ. (12) The promise is all, for Christ's Lordship extends over all of men, and He has love enough for all worship Him (13) as Joel testifies; (14), and God has made His offer known by unmissioned preachers, so that the Jews heard the message, for it has been preached everywhere. (19) Nor can it be said that the nation which had received the Scriptures did not know that the Gentiles were to be included in God's favour. Even so far back as Moses they were warned that it would be so; (20) and Isaias uses the plainest language. (21) No

CHAPTER 11

ISRAEL'S REJECTION NOT FINAL. A WARNING TO THE GENTILES

In this c. St. Paul brings to an end his great exposition of God's dealings with the Jews.
He has shown in c. 9 that God is free to choose or reject individuals or nations as the instruments of His purpose; and, in c. 10, that the Jews have deserved their rejection. Now he declares that, in spite of all this, God has cast off His ancient people. He has seen fit, in His mercy, to preserve a portion of them faithful to His will, and the remainder are still loved by Him. Their having fallen away for a time has given an opportunity for the conversion of the Gentiles. When the Gentiles have been gathered into His kingdom, the Jews will be stirred up by their example and return to God.

1-12. God did not utterly reject the Jews as a nation (vv. 1, 2). Their failure is partial (vv. 2-10), and, as in former days, there is a faithful remnant; their failure is used by God good, and is temporary (vv. 11, 12).

Paraphrase. ' (1) Does it follow that God has finally rejected those He made His own people? I, who am proud to be one of them, cannot believe it. (2) And it is impossible, for from all eternity He marked them to be His instruments, and He is unchanging. They are no more rejected than they were in Elijah's day, (3) when, although Israel was rebellious, (4) God preserved a faithful remnant. (5) So now also there is such a remnant, selected out of the mass by God's undeserved favour, (6) not for any merit of their own. (7) Thus, a select portion of Israel, having minds open to God's will and believing in Christ, has obtained acceptance, which the rest, by seeking it in self-righteousness, have lost, incurring instead that hardening which follows self-will, (8) that heavy deafness and blindness toward God which Isaiah perceived, (9) that ruin caused by misuse of blessings (10) of which David spoke. (11) But although the majority have stumbled, even they have not fallen for ever. Their refusal of Christ has occasioned an earlier preaching to the Gentiles, and so has been the means of bringing salvation to them, and this, in turn, is meant to stir the Jews up to accept Christ, and thus regain their old privilege. (12) Thus they still are used by God, for their failure has been a means of blessing to the world, and much greater blessing will result from their complete conversion.'

11. Stumbled] cp. 9:3. Fall] i.e. so as not to rise again. Come unto the Gentiles] It was only when the Jews rejected the gospel that the Apostle turned to the Gentiles: cp. Ac 13:45 28:28. A Church nationally Jewish would probably have been a hindrance to the complete evangelisation of the Gentiles. 12. Diminishing] RV 'loss.' As a defeated army suffers loss in battle, so the majority of the Jews had fallen away into unbelief. St. Paul anticipates great blessing to the world when the 'fulness,' i.e. the entire nation, of the Jews believes.

13-24. St. Paul now addresses the Gentiles. They should hope for the restoration of Israel, because of the blessing it will bring the world, and because Israel still bears God's name (vv. 13-16). They should not despise Israel (vv. 17, 18), nor boast of preference (vv. 19, 20), for, if unfaithful, they too will fall (vv. 21, 22), whereas the Jews will be restored if they give up their unbelief (vv. 23, 24).

Paraphrase. (13) In this which I write, I am not disregarding my mission to you Gentiles. And you know my heart is in my work among you Gentiles. (14) If, then, I am always hoping that your conversion may stir up the Jews to yearn after their lost privileges, it is not only because I am a Jew, (15) but also because I am sure that as their rejection brought you to God, so their restoration will fill the nations of the earth with spiritual life. (16) And their restoration may certainly be expected, for the nation still retains the consecration it received in the patriarchs. (17) Again, although you have taken the place of some of them in God's kingdom, (18) do not think yourselves superior to them. Remember that you have been admitted into their kingdom, not they into yours. (19) If God rejected them for you, it was not because He preferred you. (20) Unbelief lost them their place, and faith alone preserves you. (21) The facts do not warrant self-satisfaction in you, but warn you against it. (22) Thus we see manifested both God's goodness and His severity. His goodness is upon you, but only so long as you are faithful. His severity is upon the Jews, (23) yet, if they give up their unbelief, He will receive them again. And their restoration is quite possible, (24) for they have more in common with the kingdom than you had as heathen.'

13. RV 'But I speak to you that are Gentiles, Inasmuch then as I am an apostle of Gentiles, I glorify my ministry.' As the Jews have been spoken of in the third person, we infer that the Roman Christians were chiefly Gentiles.

17. The Church of God, both before and after Christ, regarded by St. Paul as one and the same, is here likened to an olive tree: cp. Jer 11:19 Hos 14:6. Grafted in] The usual practice would be to graft the cultivated olive upon the wild stock. St. Paul reverses the process in his allegory, to enforce the lesson that the Jews were the original Church, and

The Consecrated Life. The Law of Love

The doctrinal part of the Epistle being finished, St. Paul now turns to practical exhortation. God’s mercy, shown in the gospel set forth in the previous chapters, calls for the sacrifice of ourselves to do His will (vv. 1-2), by the humble and devoted use of God’s spiritual gifts (vv. 3-8), and in love (vv. 9-21).

1-21. Paraphrase. ‘(1) God’s redeeming love should be answered by the true sacrifice and spiritual ritual service of a life of purity and self-denial and work for God. (2) Do not follow the fashions and customs of the worldly society around you, but let your ways of thinking be so changed by the Holy Spirit that you look for and recognise God’s will, and love to do it. (3) So, although the world does not value humility, as God’s Apostle I charge every one of you to be contented to do that work in the Church for which God has fitted him. (4, 5) The Christian Society is like a body; each individual has his particular function; while the welfare of the whole depends upon how he performs it. (6) Let us all learn, then, from our different gifts, what it is God’s will that we should do. If your gift is prophecy, speak what God Himself has taught you; (7, 8) and whatever your gift, use it to the best of your power. (9) As to other matters of conduct; let your love be sincere; have strong moral principles; (10) as one family in Christ be affectionate to one another; let each regard others as more fit for honours than himself; (11) be diligent, fervent, devoted to the Lord’s work, (12) joyfully expectant of future glory, brave in affliction, unflagging in prayer, (13) generous and hospitable. (14) Bless your persecutors; (15) be sympathising; (16) enter into one another’s... desires and aims; do not aim at high place or honour for yourself, but be content with the humble duties that come in your way. (17) Never retaliate. Avoid even the appearance of dishonourable conduct. (18) Live at peace with every one, so far as peace is in your own power. (19) If any man wrong you, leave it to God to punish him. (20) Do him good, and you will make him ashamed of his enmity. (21) Do not let the wickedness of others provoke evil passions in you, but conquer their wickedness by doing them good.

1. Living sacrifice] as opposed to the sacrifice of a slain beast: cp. 6.18. Reasonable] i.e., an act of the reason. 2. Conformed to] RV ‘fashioned according to.’ ‘Fashion’ implies external resemblance, ‘form,’ essential nature: cp. Phil 2.6. World] lit. ‘Ageon,’ or ‘age.’ The Jews called the Messianic age ‘the age to come,’ as contrasted with ‘this age’: cp. Mt 12.32 Lk 20.34 Eph 1.21. Coals of fire] i.e., melt him into shame, as a furnace melts metals.

The Christian’s Duty to the State and to His Neighbour

St. Paul now passes to the duties of Christians to the State. In 12.19 he had condemned revenge; but he asserts here that the State may rightly punish, as God’s agent in temporal affairs. He enforces obedience to government, i.e., to social order, not to any special form of government. He gives no directions as to what is to be done when there is a conflict of civil authority (vv. 1–7). Our behaviour to men in general is to be regulated by love (vv. 8–10). The nearness of Christ’s coming is a motive for holiness of life (vv. 11–14).

1–14. Paraphrase. ‘(1) Obey civil rulers, for they are divinely ordained, (2) and therefore God will punish disobedience. (3, 4) They do God’s work, rewarding the good and punishing the evil. (5) Therefore obey, not only for fear of punishment, but because it is right, (6) as is implied by our rule that Christians are to pay taxes. (7) To sum up, give all authorities their due. (8) Owe no debt but that of love, which you can never adequately discharge. (9) For love sums up and includes all the commandments, (10) and, by loving, you fulfill them. (11) Let the thought of Christ’s coming awaken you to these duties. (12, 13) Let us put off all evil ways, and conduct ourselves as those who belong to the kingdom of light. (14) Provide for your spiritual nature by clothing yourselves with the likeness and power of Christ, but pay no attention to the wrong desires of your fleshly nature.’

Thou shalt love] cp. Lv 19.18 Lk 10.27 Jas 2.10. Worketh no ill] cp. 1 Cor 13.4. No one who truly loves his fellow-man will injure him.

11. And that] RV ‘and this,’ i.e., and do this: cp. 1 Cor 6.4f. Time] RV ‘season.’ Salvation] i.e., complete salvation. Nearer] However long Christ tarries, death brings Him near to each. But the first Christians evidently expected His return in their own time. Sanday and Headlam point out that this belief proved beneficial, by quickening the zeal of the Church for its difficult task, and by preventing the apostles from laying down minute regulations for the future. Believed RV 'first believed.'

12. The day] i.e. of Christ's appearing.

14. Put ye on] Christ is put on in baptism, cp. 6:3 Gal 3:27; but the union must be realised.

The reading of these last vv. marked the turning-point in St. Augustine's life: see his 'Confessions,' bk. 8, c. 12.

CHAPTER 14

THE DUTY OF SYMPATHY AND TOLERATION

In c. 132 St. Paul urged his readers, by their expectation of Christ's coming, to avoid the licence and immorality of the heathen. Now he turns to the opposite extreme, and deals with the ascetic scrupulousness of certain Christians.

Under the Jewish Law there was a distinction between clean and unclean meats. This distinction, which perpetuated the separation between Jew and Gentile, Christ abolished (Mk 7:19 RV), as was afterwards revealed to Peter (Ac 10:28), and decided by the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15:28). The Council, however, directed the Gentile Christians in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia to abstain from meat which had been offered to idols, or which had not been killed in the Jewish manner, out of consideration for the feelings of the Jewish Christians and to preserve unity. Afterwards the question arose at Corinth how far the Gentile Christians could join with their heathen acquaintances in meals when the meat had been offered to idols. St. Paul decided that as the meat was God's gift it might be eaten, but that when it was avowedly connected with idolatrous worship, it should be abstained from, for the sake of the consciences of those who thought it wrong to eat such meat.

It would seem that at Rome a minority of the Christians scrupled to partake of meat or wine in any form. They were probably Jewish Christians, for such ascetic practices were held by certain religious Jews. St. Paul did not approve of their scruples. He called such Christians 'weak in faith,' i.e. without that strong and clear conviction of Christian liberty which he held to be in accordance with the truth. But such brethren were to be welcomed and allowed to follow their convictions; and if there were any danger of wounding their consciences, the 'strong' brethren were to abstain themselves for the sake of Christian love.

Although the Apostle so urged toleration, yet, when a vital principle was at stake, he allowed no compromise: cp. 1 Cor 5, 11:18 15:12.

Gal 1:8.

1-12. The 'strong' and the 'weak' are lovingly to tolerate one another, remembering that Christ is master of each, and that each will be judged by God. 13-23. It would be better that the strong should forego his right, if its exercise would injure his brother.

Paraphrase. '1 (1) Some Christians have not grasped the principle that acceptance by God depends upon faith alone, and are in consequence scrupulous about unessential observances. Admit them to Christian fellowship, and abstain from criticising their scruples. (2) For example, one man is confident that he may eat any kind of food, while another refrains from meat. (3) Let not him who eats meat despise the other as superstitious. And let not the other condemn him who eats as unspiritual and worldly, for God imposed no rule about food upon him. (4) It is not for you to say that what Christ allows His servants is dangerous for them: their Master will keep them safe. (5) Again, one man observes the Jewish distinctions of days, while another does not. Let each man be faithful to his own conscience, (6) and recognise that the aim of men of both opinions is to please Christ. (7, 8) For His will is our law, in this life and in the world of death, (9) as is right, seeing that He is Master in both states of existence. (10, 11) It does not befit those who must all stand before God's judgment seat, to pass judgment upon one another. (12) The account that each will have to give of himself is enough for each to think of. (13) Therefore, instead of judging one another, determine not to hinder your brother in his Christian life. (14) For while in itself no food is sinful, it is sinful to those whose consciences forbid it, (15) and therefore to insist upon your right might injure your brother, which would be a breach of love. If Christ gave up His life for your brother, can you not give up some particular food? (16) Do not bring reproach upon the truth you hold, (17) by making it seem that you regard a well-spread table as more important than spiritual graces and unity, (18) for it is the practice of such graces which makes the service of Christ approved by God and man. (19) Let it be our aim to bring about peace and the welfare of the Christian community. (20) It would be monstrous to destroy God's Church for the sake of food. To eat any particular food is not in itself wrong; but it becomes wrong if by doing so you harm your brother; (21) while it is a noble thing to give up your own right for his sake. (22) Cherish your own convictions, but do not seek to impose them upon every one else. You have the great blessing of an undoubting conscience, be satisfied with that.'
(23) and do not tempt another to eat, when the fact that he is not sure whether he is doing right condemns him; for it is always sinful for a man to do what his conscience does not approve.

1. The faith] RV 'faith.' To doubtful disputations] RM 'for decisions of doubts.'

2. Believeth that he may] RV 'hath faith to'; i.e. has such a grasp of the gospel of Christ that he recognises the indiscernibility of these matters. 3. Despise] cp. Mt 5:22. Hath received] i.e. into the Church. 4. God] RV 'the Lord,' i.e. Christ.

5. One day above another] The reference is, no doubt, to Jewish observances: cp. Gal 4:10 Col 2:16. The principle is that salvation does not depend upon the observance of special days and seasons. These are indifferent in themselves, although to set apart special days may be practically useful. St. Paul would probably have included in this the keeping of Sunday. But he would have said that Sunday is no different from other days, because all days should be holy, not because all days are common. The six days should approximate as far as possible to Sunday, not Sunday to the six days. Hence the inestimable value of Sunday to maintain the level of spiritual life, quite apart from the benefit of its rest. Persuaded] RV 'assured.' 6. And he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord doth he not regard it] RV omits. Eateth] i.e. eateth flesh. Thanks] cp. Mt 15:5 Ac 27:26 1 Cor 10:9 11:44 1 Tim 4:4.

9. RV 'For to this end Christ died, and lived again.' He who, to save them, had dwelt in both worlds, was their Master in both (Moule). 10. RV 'But thou, why dost thou judge thy brother? or thou, again, why dost thou, etc.' All] emphatic. Christ] RV 'God.' 'It is important to notice how easily St. Paul passes from 'Christ' to 'God.' (Sanday and Headlam.) 11. From Isa 45:23 Confess] i.e. God's sovereignty. 12. Himself] emphatic. 13. Stumblingblock] cp. Mt 18:26. 1 Cor 8:4. 14. By the Lord] RV 'in the Lord,' i.e. in communion with Christ. Unclean] lit. 'common': cp. Ac 10:14, 28. But] RV 'save that.' 'Mistaken conscience calls for correction by better light, but never for violation. To follow conscience is, by itself, no security that we are doing what is in itself right; but to violate conscience, which is our actual view of right and wrong, is always wrong' (Moule).

17. Kingdom of God] i.e. the Messianic kingdom, expected by the Jews as an earthly kingdom, but really the reign of Christ over man, whether in grace or glory: cp. 1 Cor 4:30.

Righteousness] i.e. here, right dealing in relation to others. Peace] i.e. with one another. Joy] i.e. of the united Christian brotherhood. In the Holy Ghost] i.e. through His indwelling. 18. In these things] RV 'herein'; i.e. in the exercise of such a life of Christian love. 19. Edify] i.e. build up the Christian society, which is called in the next v. 'the work of God.' 20. RV 'overthrow not for meat's sake.' Pure] RV 'clean': cp. 1 Cor 10:23. With offence] i.e. to others.

21. Nor any thing] RV 'nor to do anything'; cp. 1 Cor 12:18. Or is offended, or is made weak] RV omits.

22. Hast thou faith?] RV 'The faith which thou hast.' Have it to thyself] i.e. do not force it upon others; respect the scruples of the weak. Condemneth] RV 'judgeth.' Approveth] RV 'approveth.' 23. Damned] RV 'condemned.' Faith] here = strong conviction. 'The words do not apply to those who are not Christians, nor to the works of those who are Christians done before they became such, but to the conduct of believing Christians; and faith is used somewhat in the way we should speak of a "good conscience"; everything which is not done with a clear conscience is sin' (Sanday and Headlam).

CHAPTER 15

JEW AND GENTILE ALIKE THE OBJECT OF GOD'S LOVE. THE APOSTLE'S PLANS

1-13. The subject of c. 14 is continued. 'Strength' should be displayed in helping the 'weak' after Christ's example (vv. 1-4). Let both sections be united in God's praise, welcoming one another as Christ welcomed them (vv. 5-7). As the divergence of views originated in the difference between Jew and Gentile, let both remember that Christ became a Jew for the salvation of both (vv. 8-13).

Paraphrase. '1 (Since the weak are thus in danger, the strong should be patient with their scruples, and not indulge their own liberty. 2 Each should be tender to his neighbour's feelings, and seek to promote his good, (3) following the example of Christ, depicted in the OT., (4) which we should read to learn lessons of endurance and to receive encouragement which will help us confidently to look to future glory. (5) May God teach you these lessons, enabling you to bear with one another, and to be so united in aims and hopes and feelings, after the pattern of Christ, (6) that you may join as one body in the praise of God. (7) Therefore let both sections welcome one another, as Christ welcomed both. A Church so united in brotherhood will redound to the glory of God. (8) Let the Gentile especially remember that Christ became a Jew, to secure to the Jews the fulfillment of God's promises, (9) and to welcome the Gentiles through God's pure mercy, (10, 11, 12) that Jew and Gentile might unite in His praise, as Psalmist and Prophet foretold. (13) May God grant that your believing in Christ may'}
1. ROMANS 15. 28

1. "you with such joy and peace that you may for Christ in glory with the triumphant endurance of those who are possessed by the might of the Holy Spirit."

2. "Bear" cp. Gal 6:2. 2. To edification] words define the kind of good to be ght, i.e. the building-up of the Church, not any particular member. The individual is willing to sacrifice himself for the 1 of the whole body: cp. 14:19 1 Cor 10:24. tr. Gal 1:10, where 'pleasing' would not be edification. 3. From Ps 69:9: cp. 2 Cor 8:9 12:6. The Psalm describes the suffering of the hands of the wicked of the righteous. The words, therefore, are applicable to Christ above all. 4. Learning] i.e. instructing: cp. 2 Tim 3:16. 5. Consolation] RV comfort. Like minded] RV 'of the same mind.' Towards] RV 'with.' 6. RV 'that he one accord ye may with one mouth glorify God and Father,' etc. 7. Us] RV 'you.' 8. Now] RV 'for,' introducing proof of 7b. Was] RV 'hath been made.'

Minister of the circumcision] i.e. Christ lived under the Old Covenant and was marked under the circumcision: cp. Gal 4:4. 2 Cor 3:1.

Paraphrase. '14. Do not suppose I think you lacking either in goodness or in grasp of Christian principles. (15) But I have reminded you of these things somewhat boldly, because God appointed me (16) apostle of the Gentiles to bring them to Him. (17) I speak with authority, therefore, not because of myself, but because I am Christ's minister, (18) and because He has worked through me (19) miracles and spiritual power, so that I have preached the gospel widely; (20, 21) ways seeking the honour of preaching only here Christ has not yet been preached.'

14. Ye also] RV 'ye yourselves.'

Goodness] i.e. goodness of heart toward others. In some sort] better, 'in part' of the Epistle, e.g. 6:12. 11:17. 14.

Is given] RV 'was given:' cp. 1:5.

16. The minister] RV 'a minister.' The word, the original of the word 'liturgy,' is used in LXX of priests and Levites, and enotes one who ministers in sacred things.

Ministering] RM 'ministering in sacrifice.' He was called to offer the Gentiles as a sacrifice to God. He did this by preaching the gospel. Offering] cp. Isa 66:16. 17. Whereof I may glory] RV 'my glorying.' 18. The only thing he will boast of is the work Christ has done through him for the conversion of the Gentiles. Obedient] i.e. in faith: cp. 1:5 16:26.

19. Through mighty signs] RV 'in the power of signs,' i.e. the power which miracles have upon those who behold them: cp. 2 Cor 12:12. He speaks of his miracles as well known and indubitable. Round about] He had evangelised on either side of the route from Jerusalem to Illyricum. Illyricum] On the E. coast of the Adriatic, and NW. of Macedonia. It was approached, and may have been visited, in the journey mentioned Ac 20:1-2. Fully preached] i.e. in the chief centres, founding Churches which might carry on the work. 20. RV 'yes, making it my aim, so to preach,' etc. Lest I should build'] cp. 2 Cor 10:17. 21. From Isa 52:15.

22-33. He hopes, after a journey to Jerusalem, to visit Rome on his way to Spain (vv. 22-29). He desires their prayers (vv. 30-33).

Paraphrase. '22. My work has often prevented me from coming to you, (23) but now that my work here is finished, (24) I hope to visit you on my way to Spain. (25) Meanwhile I am starting for Jerusalem, (26) to convey to the Christian poor there a contribution from Macedonia and Achaia, (27) which is an acknowledgment of the debt the Gentiles owe to the Jews in spiritual things. (28) Afterwards I will travel by you into Spain, (29) and I feel sure that visit will be the occasion of much blessing. (30) Wrestled in prayer, (31) that I may be delivered from the Jews, and that the Jewish Christians may accept the peace offering which I bring, (32) that I may come joyfully to you and find repose. (33) May God bless you with His peace.'

26. Poor saints] RV 'poor among the saints.' There was much poverty among the Christians at Jerusalem, increased, perhaps, by the ill-will of the rich Sadducees. St. Paul had been intreated to 'remember the poor' (Gal 2:10). At the same time there was mistrust at Jerusalem of him and his work. Therefore he had instituted a collection among the Gentile Churches, which, he hoped, would draw together the Gentile and Jewish Christians: cp. Ac 24:17 1 Cor 16:14 2 Cor 8, 9. 27. Minister] same Gk. word as 'minister' in v. 16.

Carnal] i.e. belonging to this earthly life: no bad association here.

28. Sealed] i.e. marked it as their property; made it over to them. To them] i.e. the Jerusalem Christians. Fruit] i.e. the contribution would be evidence to the Jewish Christians of the real faith and love of the Gentiles.

Into Spain] St. Paul may have visited Spain after he was released from Rome, though there is no evidence of his having done so. Clement of Rome (about 96 A.D.) says he went 'to the extremity of the West.'

29. Though St. Paul did not come to Rome in the way he anticipated, his coming was brought about by God's Providence for 'the furtherance of the gospel.' cp. 1114. Phil 1:18.

CHAPTER 16
GREETINGS AND WARNINGS

1-16. Commendation and greetings.

Observe the number of women to whom the Apostle sends greeting. The fact is indicative of the change wrought in the position of women by the gospel, and of the honourable place taken by them in the Christian Church. Observe also the difference of nationality indicated by the names. St. Paul, a Hebrew, sends salutation to Greeks, Romans, and perhaps Asiatics, many of them probably slaves — marking the universality of the gospel: cp. Gal 3:28 Col 3:11.

1. Commend] i.e. introduce: cp. 1213 2 Cor 3:1. Apparently, Phoebe was the bearer of the Epistle. Servant] lit. 'deacon,' RM 'deaconess': translated 'deacon' in Phil 1, etc., but 'minister' in Eph 3:7 6:21, etc. Either Phoebe had been definitely appointed to minister to women (cp. 1 Tim 5:8f.), or she is called 'minister' because she voluntarily devoted herself to good works. Cenchrea] the eastern port of Corinth. 2. Succourer] or, 'patroness.' The Gk. word is used for an influential friend or protector.

3. Priscilla] RV 'Prisca.' For the history of Aquila and Priscilla cp. Ac 18, 1 Cor 16:19 2 Tim 4:19. 4. Laid down, etc.] Perhaps they risked their lives at Ephesus: cp. Ac 19. 5. In their house] i.e. meeting in their house. cp. Ac 12:12 1 Cor 16:19 Col 4:15 Philemon v. 2.

Firstfruits] i.e. an early convert. Achaia] RV 'Asia,' i.e. the Roman province of which Ephesus was the chief city.

7. Junia] RV 'Junias.' Kinsmen] i.e. Jews belonging to the same 'Tribe' of citizens of Tarsus as St. Paul. Of note among the apostles] i.e. distinguished apostles. 'Apostle' means 'one sent on a mission and representing the sender.' 'Apostles of Churches,' cp. 2 Cor 3:23 (RM) Phil 2:25 (RM), were men sent on special missions by particular Churches.

But, specially, 'apostles' means 'apostles of Christ,' cp. 1 Th 2:4, i.e. men sent to be Christ's witnesses everywhere. Such were the Twelve: Paul and Barnabas, cp. Ac 14:16; James, 1 Cor 15:7 Gal 1:19; and Andronicus and Junias. 'Apostles of Christ' must have seen the Lord, cp. Lk 24:48 Ac 1:8,22 1Cor 9:1; have shown spiritual power, cp. 1 Cor 9:2 2 Cor 12:12; and have received a call from God, cp. 1 Cor 12:26 Eph 4:11.

9. Urbenae] RV 'Urbanus.'

12. Persia] the name of a woman.

Mine] i.e. St. Paul felt for her the affection of a son.

17-20. Warning against false teachers, probably Judaistic, whose doctrines St. Paul has dealt with in the Epistle. They may not have appeared at Rome as yet: cp. Phil 1:16 (written from Rome).

17. Offences] RV 'occasions of stumbling.' Avoid] RV 'turn away from.' 18. Their own belly] i.e. they seek their own interests, and their religious ideas are low and materialistic: cp. Phil 3:17 Col 2:20.

19. For] i.e. 'But they ought not to deceive you, for,' etc. Simple] i.e. harmless: cp. Mt 10:16. 20. Bruise Satan] by defeating the false teaching: cp. 2 Cor 11:12f.

22. Wrote] RV 'write.' St. Paul's habit was to dictate his letters: cp. 1 Cor 16:21 Col 1:18 2 Th 3:17 Gal 6:11. 23. Gaius] cp. 1 Cor 1:14. Of the whole church] i.e. the meetings were held in his house. A brother] RV 'the brother,' i.e. the Christian. 24. RV omits: see Intro.

25-27. Concluding doxology, summing up the main points of the Epistle.

25. My gospel] i.e. his special teaching of acceptance by faith for Jew and Gentile. Of Jesus Christ] i.e. the object of his preaching was to bring about faith in Jesus the Messiah: cp. 10:87. According to the revelation, etc.) i.e. the preaching of Jesus Christ explains God's purpose, which had been hidden: cp. chs. 9-11, 1 Cor 2:6f.

Secret] RV 'in silence.' Since the world began] RV 'through times eternal.' 26. By the scriptures] cp. 114f. 521. For the] RV 'unto,' i.e. leading to the obedience which faith implies: cp. 15.

Subscription. The subscriptions to the Epistles are said to have been the work of Euthalius, a bishop of the 5th cent.
1 CORINTHIANS

INTRODUCTION

1. The Corinthian Church.

(a) 'Corinth was in many respects the most important city in Greece under the Roman Empire. Whereas Athens was the educational centre, the seat of the greatest university in the world at that time, and the city to which the memories of Greek freedom and older history clung most persistently, Corinth was the capital of the Roman province, the centre of government and commerce, of actual life and development in the country' (HDB).

It was situated on the narrow isthmus which connected Macedonia and Achaia, and possessed two great harbours, Lechaen looking towards the Adriatic Sea and Italy, and Cenchreae (Ac 18:18 Ro 16:1) looking towards the Egean and Asia. Though it lay a little inland it had all the advantages of a seaport, and, occupying as it did a central position on the lines of communication between Rome and the East, it was a great commercial clearing-house. Small ships were hauled across the isthmus by a prepared way to avoid the voyage round the Cape, and travellers from Italy to the East landed at Lechaen and re-embarked at Cenchreae. It was thus a place where traders and officials were constantly coming and going. Its population was composed of Greeks and Romans, Jews and Orientals. Merchants and sailors were its most frequent visitors, staying for short periods on their voyages, and bringing to it the civilisation and the customs of many lands.

Corinth in St. Paul's day was a Roman colony. Two centuries earlier the famous Greek city on the same site had been destroyed by the Roman armies; but after lying in ruins for a hundred years it had been refounded by Julius Caesar in 46 B.C., and had speedily regained more than its former greatness.

Besides its commercial importance Corinth was famous as the scene of the great Isthmian games, which every second year attracted a multitude of people to the city; and it was noted as the centre of the abominable worship of the goddess Aphrodite, in whose worship virgins sacrificed their chastity. The Corinthians were notorious even in the world of that time for their drunkenness and sensuality. They were also much given to faction and strife, being always anxious to discuss philosophical and moral problems, and to debate the qualifications and drawbacks of their public teachers.

It is a significant commentary on their way of life that a man of Corinth was usually introduced on the stage in a state of intoxication, and that 'to live like a Corinthian' had become a proverb to express a life of luxury and licence.

(b) The Founding of the Church. St. Paul's first visit to Corinth was made in the course of his second missionary journey, and lasted eighteen months (Ac 18). After his failure to make any deep impression at Athens, the Apostle passed on to Corinth; probably in the autumn of 50 A.D., but possibly a year or two later, as the dates are uncertain. On his arrival he met with Aquila and his wife Priscilla, Jews lately expelled from Rome on account of their race and religion. They were tentmakers, like himself, so he wrought with them and stayed in their house. At first, according to his custom (cp. Ac 13:5, 14 14:173), he preached in the synagogue, and endeavoured to persuade the Jews and the Greek proselytes that Jesus was the Christ. The arrival of Silas and Timothy reinforced him, and the work was not without effect, for several Jews believed, among them being Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, and Titius Justus, one of their proselytes. The majority, however, remained obdurate, and the Apostle had to withdraw from the synagogue. Eventually the wrath of the Jews culminated in an attempt to convict him before Gallio, the governor of the province, of teaching an illegal religion. The governor, however, dismissed the case, because the Apostle had not broken any Roman law, and the Greeks who were present gave a rough approval of his decision by beating Sosthenes, the new ruler of the synagogue, in sight of the judgment-seat. Thus protected by the law, St. Paul continued his work until the spring of 52 A.D., when he sailed for Ephesus and Jerusalem, to celebrate the Passover.

After his departure from Ephesus, Apollos, a learned Jew of Alexandria, who had embraced Christianity, arrived there, and made himself known to the Church. His knowledge of Christ was somewhat imperfect, but having been instructed more fully by Aquila and Priscilla, who had accompanied St. Paul to Ephesus, he became of great assistance in the work of the Lord. It was his desire to go to Corinth, and after a time the brethren in Ephesus commended him to the community across the sea (Ac 18:27, 2 Cor 3:1). In Corinth his preaching was very successful (Ac 18:27), and his arguments proved attractive to many of the Corinthians, who preferred a more philosophical style to the plain words of St. Paul.

(c) Composition of the Church. The Church at Corinth was composed to some extent of Jews (Ac 18:8, 1 Cor 7:18, 10:32, 2 Cor 11:22), but chiefly of Gentiles (Ac 18:7, 1 Cor 12:2). The members were of all classes. Gaius, 'the host of the whole Church,' and Erastus, 'the chamberlain of the city' (Ro 16:23)—the Epistle to the Romans was written from Corinth), were among the better class, as was, perhaps, also Stephanas, 'the first-fruits of Achaia' (16:15). But others were poor (1:26-28), and others were slaves (7:22). It is certain that here as elsewhere 'not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble' were called (1:26). The majority seem to have been of humble station (1:27, 28), and had to work hard for their living. Some of these Christian converts being of Jewish origin attached importance to Jewish rites (9:20), others prized themselves on their liberal views (8:9, 10, 23, 27); many had been redeemed from vicious habits (6:9-11), and had to keep strict watch over their lives (6:12, 13, 20).

(d) The Rise of Parties in the Church. In order to understand the situation referred to in our Epistle, it is necessary to give a brief account of the factions which arose in the Church after the Apostle's departure (1:12).

Four parties are there named—called by the names of the leaders they had adopted—a party of Paul, a party of Apollo, a party of Cephas, and a party of Christ. The followers of Paul were those who had remained faithful to the teaching of the founder of the Church, and probably included the earliest converts who had felt the personal influence; but they made the mistake of opposing him to other teachers, and, perhaps, especially at first to Apollo, hence they received a special rebuke (1:13).

The party of Apollo evidently consisted of those who admired that eloquent speaker's ability in the use of argument and language. Apollo seems to have captivated a number of the converts by his skill in harmonising the teaching of the OT. with the current philosophy, and his ingenuity in using the allegorical method of interpretation in applying the Hebrew Scriptures to prove that Jesus was the Messiah. St. Paul may be contrasting the methods of Apollo with his own simpler style of teaching the Corinthians when he speaks of 'wisdom' and 'foolishness' in 1:17-21, 12:13. The nucleus of the party of Apollo would be composed of those whom he himself had converted; others would be attracted to it who were easily impressed by a flowing style and a philosophic presentation of the truth. The differences between the parties of Paul and Apollo arose half-unconsciously, hence their hostility would not be very pronounced.

The other two parties had a different origin. It would appear that, some time after St. Paul's departure, representatives of that party in the Church at Jerusalem which maintained that acceptance of Christianity involved acceptance of circumcision and other Jewish rites, also came to Corinth. These Judaeans, as they are called, were always hostile to the wider developments of Christianity. They found fault with St. Peter for his liberal views and his attitude to the Gentiles (Ac 11:13) at an early period of the Church's history. St. Paul, however, was the principal object of their aversion and ill-will. It is possible that they had never forgiven his persecution of the Christians in his unconverted days, and certainly from the date of his return to Antioch, after his first mission to Galatia, they opposed his admission of uncircumcised heathen to the fellowship of the Church (Ac 15:1 Gal 2:4). We find them sending emissaries in his track to alienate the Jewish converts from allegiance to him and bring the Gentile brethren into bondage to the Mosaic Law (Gal 1:7 2:12, 3:1 5:2, 6:12, Phil 3:2). Some of these Jewish Christians had brought letters of commendation (2 Cor 3:1) to Corinth, and had been received by the Church. They took occasion to exalt St. Peter (Cephas) as the chief of the Apostles, and tried to undermine the authority of St. Paul, insisting that he was not an Apostle, and that he lacked the qualification of having seen Jesus (9:1).

Thus was formed the party of Cephas, consisting, probably, of some of the Jews who had joined the Church, and, perhaps, of some of the proselytes, who, having first adopted the Jewish religion and rites, would be the more easily persuaded.

The party of Christ may have arisen as a protest against these three sections, whose members adopted the names of Apostles as party watchwords, or even as a separate and stricter Jewish party, maintaining the duty of all disciples of Christ to follow Him in His fulfilment of the rites of the Law (Lk 2:27, Jn 5:1, etc.). Its members seem to have become more extreme and fanatical as the strife went on, and to have maintained the strictest Judaistic principles; see further remarks in Intro. to 2 Cor, 1 (b). We find in the Second Epistle that some of its members withheld St. Paul's authority and denied his right to interfere in the discipline of the Church, and that it was with great difficulty that the Apostle asserted his position and regained his influence (2 Cor 10:7, 11:13-15, 21, 22, etc.).
2. The First Epistle.

(a) Circumstances of its Origin, and Date. Our First Epistle to the Corinthians is one, and that not the first, of a series of letters written by St. Paul to the Corinthian Church, in view of the party quarrels which rent it, and the difficulties of belief and conduct which perplexed its members. In the interval between St. Paul's departure from Corinth, after founding the Church, and the date of this letter, he had revisited the Churches of Galatia and Phrygia (Ac 18:23), and from there had come to Ephesus (Ac 19:1). At Ephesus he remained for more than two years (Ac 19:8-10), reaching the city perhaps in 53 or 54 A.D., and leaving it late in 56 or 57 A.D. During his residence there he seems to have received tidings from Corinth that some of the Christians had fallen back into immoral habits, and he wrote a letter to the Church, in which he directed the members to exercise discipline upon the offenders. To this letter (which is not now extant) he refers in 59, 'I wrote unto you in my epistle to have no company with fornicators' (R.V.). This letter was not well received by the Corinthians. Some of them, misunderstanding the counsel, declared that it was impossible to follow it without going out of the world (5:10), and others flatly denied his right to interfere at all (4:15, 18, 19). In reply they wrote a letter, frequently alluded to and even quoted from in the canonical First Epistle (5:10 71:8-10 10:25 11:2), in which they temporised in regard to the cases of immorality, asking for further information, and submitted a number of problems on which they requested his opinion. This letter was probably brought by three of their number, Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus (16:17).

Meanwhile, however, St. Paul had also heard of the factions in the Church. The news had been brought by servants of Chloe (1:11), a lady evidently well known to the Corinthians, though whether she was herself a Christian does not appear. The tidings caused the Apostle much pain and anxiety. He sent Timothy to Corinth by way of Macedonia (Ac 19:22 1 Cor 4:17) to 'bring them into remembrance of his ways in Christ.' About the same time he wrote the First Epistle and sent it—perhaps by the hands of Titus and the brother mentioned in 2 Cor 12:18—by the shorter sea route, that it might arrive before his young companion, whom he commends to their care (16:19). The letter contains first of all a reproof regarding their divisions and an exhortation to unity, and secondly detailed answers to the problems and questions submitted in the Epistle from the Church. It was probably written and despatched early in 56 or 56 A.D.

(h) 16:5-24. Personal messages and conclusion.

(c) Outline of the Epistle. After saluting the Church and giving thanks for their Christian graces (1:1-2) the Apostle deals with the evils of which he has heard. First of all (1:10-4:31) he points out the scandal and danger of party spirit in the Church, reminding them that Christ is the only Master, the Apostles being only preachers of Christ. He shows them that the preaching of the Cross is powerful to accomplish their salvation, and that it is the only true wisdom to those who have understanding. The Corinthians, however, are still carnal, and do not know the truth, as is shown by their partisanship. Let them realise that Christian teachers are fellow-workers with God, servants of Christ, and let them give up this strife and rancour. The Apostle then passes on (c. 5) to deal with the case of incestuous marriage, and bids the Church put out of its membership the man who has caused the scandal. Litigation before heathen judges is forbidden (6:1-4) because it is both foolish and morally wrong, exhibiting the spirit of their uncoverted past, rather than the new spirit of love and peace, and then the Apostle urges them again (6:10-20) to purity of life.

The rest of the Epistle seems to deal with problems of Church life suggested by questions in a letter from the Corinthians to St. Paul. The subject of marriage is dealt with first (c. 7), the Apostle commending the married state to all who prefer it, and forbidding divorce on grounds of difference in religion. Meats offered to idols formed a cause of scandal to many, and the Apostle (c. 8) points out that while a man might well enough eat such meat with a pure conscience, his action might give offence to another who regarded the eating of such food as sin, in which case it was far better to avoid it. This suggests a reference to his own example (c. 9) of self-denial. He has the right to look for material aid from the Church, but he refuses to exercise it, and practices the same self-denial in this respect as in respect of his bodily appetites. He then (c. 10) returns to the subject of idolatry, showing its dangers by reference to Jewish history, and urging his converts to keep from its degrading influence.

The next subject taken up (11:2-16) is the place of women in the worship of the Church, after which the Apostle deals with the observance of the Lord's Supper (11:17-34), reproving the abuses which disfigure their sacred feast, reminding them of the manner of its institution by the Lord Jesus, and exhorting them to reverence in its use. The use and abuse of such spiritual gifts as prophesying and speaking with tongues is dealt with in its turn (chs. 12-14), and the Apostle, while commending the moderate and careful use of all the gifts, bids them cultivate above all (c. 13) the most excellent gift of charity. Then follows his teaching as to the fact and the doctrine of the Resurrection, in which he shows how intimately belief in the Resurrection of Christ (and consequently of the dead, of whom He is the first-fruits) is bound up with their Christian faith and new obedience, and how all their Christian practices and actions and aspirations were inseparably connected with it. Turning next to the manner of the Resurrection, he points out that as it is with the seed sown and the wheat reap'd, so is it with the mortal body and the spiritual body. Through the grave man's body passes into a new and higher form, and then 'when this corruptible has put on incorruption, and this mortal has put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory.' The letter concludes (c. 16) with directions about a collection for the poor in Jerusalem, the Mother-Church, and with personal messages to various friends of the writer.

(d) Authenticity. This Epistle is accepted as St. Paul's by almost all schools of biblical criticism, including those often regarded as sceptical and extreme. The internal and the external evidences are both exceptionally good. The Epistle accords with the circumstances under which it is presumed to have been written, and presents a true picture of the nature and habits of the Corinthians. Its tone is real, its exhortations and counsels arise naturally out of the circumstances, and it reveals the Apostle in many characteristic moods. As regards the witness borne to this letter in early Church history, it is sufficient to say that Clement of Rome, writing to this same Church of Corinth about 97 A.D., quotes from it and bids them read it again for their guidance.

(e) The Master-thought of this Epistle and of the Second Epistle is the union of Christ and the Christian. 'I am crucified with Christ,' he says (Gal 2:20): 'nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.' Christ and the Apostle are so united in mind and spirit that the very life of Christ, so to speak, pulsates in Him. He has yielded Himself so completely to Christ's influence, and drunk so deeply of His spirit, that he acts, speaks, thinks, and suffers 'in Christ.' The sense of personal union with Christ sustains him in all his efforts, and he desires to realise Christ's presence abiding with him in increasing degree.

'Flow on my soul, thou Spirit, and renew me, Fill with Thyself, and let the rest be far' (Myers).

What he has thus experienced in his own life, he assumes that his converts have in some degree experienced also (5:12 8:12 2 Cor 1:11 5:17). He realises indeed that their union with Christ is but imperfect and dimly realised by themselves; he can treat them only as 'babes in Christ' (3:1). But though they do not comprehend this fact of their spiritual life, he is assured that Christ is indeed already dwelling in them (2 Cor 13:5); and he desires that they may receive more and more of the influence of Christ, until they live in complete and conscious union with Him. From this controlling thought of the union of Christ and the Christian the Apostle deduces the two dominant ideas—the necessity of union with one another, and the necessity of purity of life (see paraph. 2 Cor 4:18-19).

(f) Special Teaching of the Epistle. There are many points of Christian belief and practice which this Epistle sets in a unique light. (a) One most important feature is the independent witness it bears to the facts of Christ's life and death and resurrection. Especially does the Apostle dwell upon the Crucifixion and the Resurrection (2:5 57

he doctrines of Christianity are not set 22 here in a formal way, but are brought 24 and practice. Belief in God the Father,

30 them to follow (11:1), and the chief object 31 their love (16:22). Christ's death is the 35 rection of the dead (15:16); the ground of 36 hope of immortality (15:19); and the 37 dge of the forgiveness of sins (15:17).

The Epistle bears witness also to the ideal 38 ity of the Church of Christ (1:12 3:11 11:18), the fact of forgiveness bestowed by Christ, 39 to the great Christian doctrines of 40 resurrection of the body (15:19-44), and 41 the life everlasting (15:53-57). Closely 42 mitted with doctrine is duty; and the 43 ristian virtues of self-denial (6:18), unity
44 love (c. 13), and purity (3:16,17), are incul-45 in many passages, of which those indi-46 are mere specimens. What is insisted 47 throughout is that the whole purpose of 48 death of Christ was to produce the life of

The public worship described is sponta-50 and unrestrained. Each one prayed or 51 or exhorted as the Spirit moved him, melting in a sort of rapturous utterance 52 was unintelligible to the others (14:18-17).

1 can understand that while such worship
53 is often hearty and helpful and productive 54 of deep impressions (14:28), it was liable to 55 much abuse, and was in fact frequently spoilt by rivalry and disorder, and even by blasphemy (12:3 14:11,16, 25, 30). The Apostle lays down 56 strict rules for its proper conduct on the principle that all things should be done unto 57 edifying (14:26-40). There seems to have been 58 little or no organisation in the Corinthian 59 Church at that early stage. Had there been 60 responsible heads of the Church some of the 61 uses of disorder could not have been present.
Perhaps we may see an attempt on the Apostle's 62 part to get such recognised 'elders' or 'bishops' appointed (cp. Phil 1:1), in his advice to the 63 Corinthians to submit themselves to such as the house of Stephanas (16:15,16). The 64 principle of discipline was recognised in the Church, and the penalty for gross sin was 65 expulsion by a solemn service (5:4-11). But there seems to have been some difference of 66 opinion as to the authority by which the sentence was to be pronounced when the case arose: this caused delay, and the Apostle had 67 to assert his right to exercise discipline when the Church as a whole was lax.

It is mainly the dark side of the Church life which is disclosed in this Epistle; but there was also a bright side. There was life in the Church; its members possessed the gifts of the spirit; they were growing in grace and in the knowledge of God (1:49), and the Apostle could give thanks in spite of all drawbacks for the many aspirations and efforts and achievements which gave promise of better things to come (14:8).

CHAPTER 1
GREETING AND THANKSGIVING. PARTISANSHIP IN THE CHURCH

St. Paul, after greeting the Church and giving thanks for its spiritual gifts, rebukes the preference for various teachers which was prevalent among them; such a spirit lost sight of Christ crucified, the one subject of all Christian teachers.

1. Called to be an apostle] chosen by God,
This may be the ruler of the synagogue of Ac 18:17, converted since that time.

2. Sanctified in Christ Jesus] consecrated to God through faith in Christ, having Christ living in them and His influence moulding them. Called to be saints] lit. 'called saints'; because consecrated to Christ. They bore the name and should also show the nature of saints. The holiness of the Church is continually suggested in this Epistle. With all that in every place call] The greeting is extended to include all Christians in the neighbourhood. There was a branch of the Church at Cenchreae, the eastern port of Corinth

(2 Cor 1:10 Ro 16:11). Call upon the name] Prayer was offered to Christ by all Christians from the time of the Ascension, and this is one of the clearest proofs that He was regarded as truly divine (Acts 7:50 9:21). 3. Grace be unto you, and peace] St. Paul's invariable greeting to the Churches. Grace is the favour of God, and peace the result of the enjoyment of that favour.

4-9. Paraphrase. 'I praise God continually because through your spiritual union with Christ you have received the gifts of His grace. (5) I am especially thankful because your knowledge of the truth and your ability to give it expression have increased (6) with the increasing response of your spirits to the gospel of Christ. (7) You are thus on an equality with other Churches in respect of spiritual gifts; and you wait and watch for the coming of the Lord, (8) who will keep you faithful, so that none shall reproach you.'

4. I thank my God] St. Paul regarded the Corinthian Church, in spite of its sins and faults, as a true and living Church. 5. Are enriched] RV 'were enriched.' In all utterance, and in all knowledge] The fact that they abused these gifts (1 Cor 3:1, 2 14:23-28) did not lead the Apostle to undervalue them. 6. The testimony of Christ] The Apostle's witness to Christ's person and power and saving work was verified by its effects upon the Corinthians.

7. The coming of our Lord] cp. 4:6 7:29 15:21 1 Th 4:15 2 Pet 3:4, 14. 8. Confirm you] keep you steadfast. 9. The fellowship of his Son] i.e. union with Him. This is the keynote of the Epistle, and leads to the thought suggested in the next paragraph, that they who are united to Christ should be united to one another.

Division I. I 10-60. Problems suggested by the Report of Chloe's People

(a) I 10-421. Parties and Party Spirit in the Church

10-17. Paraphrase. 'Brethren, I implore you by the Holy Name of Jesus to abstain from strife and party spirit. I have heard of your disputes and of your use of the names of Apostles and even of Christ's Holy Name as party watchwords. (13-16) Can Christ be claimed as the property of a faction! And are you putting my name on a level with His Sacred Name? I am thankful that I baptised so very few of you that none can say I baptised in my own name. (17) Preaching was my work, not baptism—the preaching of salvation through the Cross of Christ.'

10. By the name of our Lord] The Apostle appeals to them by the Holy Name of Jesus, which itself should remind them of their oneness as His followers, since they had all been baptised into it. Speak the same thing] i.e. agree in calling Christ your only leader. Perfectly joined, etc.] lit. 'adjusted in the same mind and in the same view.' They should be reconciled, and try to be of the same spirit.

13. Chloë] We know nothing of her but her name. 'Those of her house' may have been sons or brothers or servants. Contentions] The 'divisions' of v. 10 had produced disputes probably at the meetings for worship.

12. This I say] The Corinthian Christians were divided into parties (see Intro.), each professing to follow the teaching and example of a favourite teacher. These parties had not yet separated into opposing sects, but their existence deprived the Church of the power of united action arising from united feeling.

13. Is Christ divided, etc.] see paraphrase. St. Paul reminds the Corinthians indirectly but emphatically of the crucifixion of Christ for them and of their baptism into His name. By the one they had been redeemed from sin; by the other they had been dedicated to Christ's service, and had entered into communion with Him. How then could they put others side by side with their crucified Lord?

15. Lest any should say] This does not mean that the Apostle refrained from baptising because he had this danger in view, but only that because of the fact that a party had been formed in his name, it was well that he had not baptised, and so laid himself open to misrepresentation. 16. Stephanas] was now with St. Paul (16:17). He had been the first Corinthian convert (16:12). 17. Not to baptise] The Apostle reserved himself as far as possible for the work of preaching, and left baptism for the most part to his companions. Not with wisdom of words] i.e. paying attention, not to the manner of presenting the truth, but to the substance of the truth itself.

18-25. The gospel of the crucified Christ is no foolishness to those who know its power. The wisdom of the world has been shown to be mere folly by the wisdom of God in Christ. Men in their wisdom wandered away from God, and it is by this so-called folly of preaching that those who believe, both Jews and Greeks, have been saved.

18. Foolishness] Christ's self-sacrificing death produces no response in some hearts: cp. 2 Cor 2:15, 16 4:4. Perish...are saved] RV 'are perishing...are being saved.' Salvation is here spoken of as present and progressive. The Apostle is thinking of the work of Christ in sanctifying those who believe. The power of God] Because the lives of those who receive it are transformed by the influence of Christ.
1 CORINTHIANS

20. Paraphrase. 'For God still works the same way as when overruling the course of events He confounded those who in their wisdom doubted His protection, and His alliance with Egypt against Assyria. He not confounded the wise, both Jew and keen-witted Greek, by revealing little their learning and eloquence were to save men from sin?'

'is written' Quoted from the LXX of Isa 29:14. 21. By wisdom The Greeks nothing of His character from nature revelation, and the Jews failed to recognise a taught in their history and in their Ro 1, 2. The foolishness of preaching is, of course, is writing sarcastically. you call it folly; but it is wiser than wisdom!

Paraphrase. 'And this is true, as we declare. The Jews will not believe a miracle is wrought before their eyes; Greeks will accept no truth that is not ed by philosophical speculation; (23) the subject of our preaching is salvation through the crucified Christ—who has by His set us free from the bondage and from power of sin—a doctrine which moves the to anger and the Greeks to mirth, (24) which is true wisdom to us, because we been delivered from sin and brought to by the transforming power of Christ.'

A stumblingblock The idea of a crucified youth was repugnant to the Jews. Foolishness

The Greeks made a jest of such a re.

An as illustration the railery of an in a later age may be cited. 24. Th they are called those whom the message has d responsive. Christ the power . . . and the om of God] He is the power of God because He enables the sinner to overcome his and the wisdom of God because He re the mind of God and the practicable way salvation. 25. The foolishness of God] a method of salvation by the Cross of st in point of fact saved men from their

And thus the so-called foolishness of was proved in practice to be wiser than wise methods of men.

i-31. Paraphrase. 'Look at the state of ers in your own Church. There are few ng you eminent in the eyes of the world. 29) But it is just what is weak and lowly of no account according to worldly stand that God has chosen to shame what is ng and lofty and worldly-wise; that no man boast or compare his work with God's. (30) you Corinthians are the evidences of the k of God in Christ who has saved you from sins; (31) and so the word of prophecy been fulfilled that if any one wishes to boast let him boast of what God has wrought for him.'

26. Ye see your calling] RV 'Behold your calling.' Calling] Not 'worldly station,' but God's invitation given through Christ. Not many wise, etc.] The Corinthian Church was composed chiefly of people who from the worldly standpoint were of little account. There were probably many freedmen and slaves in the Church, the former being chiefly engaged in trade. Prof. Ramsay says that the names Fortunatus, Achaicus (16:17), Gaius (11:4 Ro 16:23), Tertius (Ro 16:24), and Quartus (Ro 16:25), were those of freedmen, i.e. former slaves, who had been set free or redeemed. 'Gaius was probably a rich freedman to whom the honourable duty of entertaining the guests of the Church was assigned.' Noble] i.e. of noble birth.

28. Base] i.e. of low birth. Things which are not] i.e. mere nonentities: cp. Mt 11:5, 22.

Hath God chosen] Thrice emphatically repeated, to mark the fact that all is due to God.

29. That no flesh should glory] because God's call is not given on account of any earthly position or advantage.

30. Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, etc.] RM 'Who was made unto us wisdom from God, both righteousness and sanctification and redemption,' etc. There are only three co-ordinate terms in the sentence. Righteousness, sanctification and redemption are subordinate to wisdom and descriptive or explanatory of it. Christ is the true wisdom of God, the expression of His desire for our salvation and of His power in accomplishing it. That wisdom is shown in Christ as He first forgives our sins and accepts us as righteous, then goes on to make us pure and holy by His indwelling influence, and finally promises to give us ultimate victory over sin and death, and to raise us to life eternal. 31. He that glorifieth] There was nothing of which human wisdom could boast. Philosophy had helped a few intellectual minds, but had never touched the ordinary man. But the Cross made its appeal to the lowly as well as to the noble, and 'the foolishness of God' transformed human lives, delivering them from the bondage of sin and making them 'new creatures' in Christ. Therefore let them glory in God alone.

CHAPTER 2

THE NATURE OF ST. PAUL'S PREACHING

1-5. Paraphrase. 'When I visited you in Corinth I made no attempt to reconcile my message with your Greek philosophy. (2) but kept to the proclamation of the facts of Christ's life and death upon the Cross. (3) It was with much anxiety and self-distrust that I preached the gospel to you; (4) and the success I obtained was due not to my way of
1 CORINTHIANS

2. commending the truth, but solely to the spirit and power which animated me; (5) and so God's purpose was fulfilled, that your faith should be based not upon the eloquence of man, but upon the grace of God.

1. When I came] i.e. on his first visit some five years before (Ac 18:1-11). Not with excellency of speech or of wisdom] St. Paul did not try to win the Corinthians to the gospel either by the eloquence of his speech in presenting it, or by his adroitness in showing its connexion with some of the philosophical ideas which were popular at the time. Testimony] i.e. which God sent me to give about Christ. EV, following another reading, has 'mystery,' i.e. the hidden counsel and will of God revealed in Christ: cp. Ro 16:25, 26.

2. Save Jesus Christ, etc.] The Apostle relied for their conversion upon his witness to the great facts of Christ's life and death. The Crucifixion he dwelt upon all the more emphatically, that he knew it must be an unattractive doctrine to many. 3. In weakness] His first visit was paid at a time when he was either sick in body from his recurrent malady (2 Cor 12?), or sick at heart from his failure at Athens (Ac 17:22), and dreadfully he were again to fail among those argumentative Greeks. Fear and ... very trembling] The Apostle frequently uses this expression to indicate an overpowering anxiety for the performance of duty, culminating in a supreme effort: cp. 2 Cor 7:15, Eph 6:5, Phil 2:13.

4. The success of the Apostle's preaching was the result of his own possession of the divine Spirit, and the power that resided in his message to arrest and convince the hearers.

2. 6-16. Paraphrase. 'There is indeed a wisdom with which the facts of the gospel are in harmony and which we declare to those who are ripe to receive it. (7, 8) It is not the wisdom of this world, for that led its possessors to crucify the Lord; but the wisdom which God has long kept secret (9) as the Scriptures confirm. (10) This secret wisdom God has revealed to us by His Spirit; (11) for just as man's spirit alone knows his secret thoughts, so only the Spirit of God knows God's deep designs. (12) And that Spirit of God has revealed these designs to us, (13) and we preach them in words suited to convey their spiritual message. (14) Now to the man who has not been enlightened by the Spirit of God these truths make no appeal; (15) but he whose mind has been thus enlightened is able to estimate them rightly, and he himself in his turn cannot be understood by the unspiritual. (16) For no one can know the mind of the Lord so as to instruct Him; but we are in sympathy with the mind of Christ, and so can understand these spiritual truths which are revealed in Him.'

6. Wisdom] Christianity has a wisdom of its own. While it is centred in a Person, it is capable of being expressed in the terms of philosophy, and is in harmony with all that is best in human reasoning and speculation.

Perfect] St. Paul divides Christians into two classes, the beginners and the advanced. The former must be taught the simple truths of the gospel and grounded in its facts: the latter are able to receive teaching regarding God's plan in redemption and His purpose as it is revealed in Christ and illustrated in the history of the world. 'Perfect' means 'mature,' 'full-grown,' and is applied to Christians of ripe experience and character. It is often used in this sense in the Epistle to the Hebrews: cp. Eph 4:12, Col 1:28, Heb 2:10, 5:14, 6:9, 10:1, etc.

The princes of this world] 'The men of light and leading' (Dods). They showed utter ignorance of God's mind: cp. v. 8.

7. In a mystery] Mystery means something formerly hidden in the counsels of God, but now revealed. The 'mystery' here is the reasoned account of the redemption brought by Christ. Theology is necessary if we are to understand our religion. Unto our glory] cp. Mt 25:34.

8. The Lord of glory] The glory is His; and He came to bestow it upon us, to bring us to the perfection of our nature. 9. Eye hath not seen] A free quotation, perhaps from memory, of Isa 64:4; with the addition of 'neither have entered into the heart of man,' in order to emphasise the fact that man has had no share in the discovery. The things which God hath prepared] The spiritual blessings and comforts and enlightenment revealed in Christ.

10. Searcheth] i.e. explores, that: Ps 139:1, Ro 8:27. The deep things] lit. 'the depths of God' i.e. His counsels. 11. The spirit of man ... the Spirit of God] The two expressions are exactly parallel. The spirit of man is man's conscious self in thought: the Spirit of God is His conscious Self-thought.

12, 13. Render, 'Now when we accept the salvation of the gospel our minds are enlightened not by any worldly wisdom, but by the wisdom which God's Spirit best imparts upon the spiritually-minded and which enables us to understand and appreciate the blessings given us through Christ. (13) And the blessings we explain to you in terms suggested by no human philosophy, but by God's Spirit, interpreting spiritual truths in spirit language.'

12. The spirit of the world] i.e. the wise falsely so called, which brought men no blessing. The spirit which is of God] i.e. the spiritual insight, which God gives by bestowing upon us a portion of His own Spirit, sending forth into our minds His light and truth (Ps 48:3). The things that are freely give
The spiritual blessings brought by Christ, forgiveness, sanctification, redemption (1 30).

13. We speak] Our language no less than our truths are the result of the spiritual insight with which God has enlightened our minds. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual] The phrase should be translated either, (1) 'interpreting spiritual truths in spiritual language,' or, (2) as in RM, 'interpreting spiritual things to spiritual men.' The former connects it with the context of this v., the latter with v. 14. With the former also cp. v. 4.

14. The natural man] i.e. man as he is by nature before he has come under the influence of God's grace. He may have all the intellectual qualities necessary to comprehend the wisdom of man, but he cannot understand the wisdom of God without the spiritual qualities which come only from acceptance of the gospel, e.g. humility, purity of heart, and submission to the influence of Christ. 15. Is judged of no man] The unregenerate man cannot estimate the spiritual man's experiences and aspirations: he is only bewitched when he hears these things mentioned. 16. Who hath known] adapted from Isa 40:13. No man untouched by God's Spirit can know anything of His mind. His truth is only revealed to those in sympathy with the spirit and character of Christ.

THE FAULT OF PARTY SPIRIT

The immaturity of the Corinthian converts and their unfitness for anything but elementary instruction in the faith is proved by their mutual jealousies and their disagreements about their teachers.

1-9. Paraphrase. 'Ye yourselves, brethren, are an illustration of what I say. (2) I have treated you as beginners and given you elementary Christian teaching, for hitherto you have been unfit for any other. (3, 4) You are still but immature Christians, as the strife and division about your teachers show. (5-7) We apostles are but instruments in the hands of God to secure your salvation; we are powerless of ourselves. (8, 9) Both of us are alike in this respect, and all we are concerned with is the faithfulness of our work. For we co-operate to carry out God's purpose in tilling the field of your spiritual life, or, as we may put it, in contributing to the building of your Christian character.'

10. Another buildeth] Apollos and others carried on the work begun by St. Paul. How he buildeth] The Apostle indicates the great responsibilities of Christian ministers and teachers. 11, 12. Other foundation] Faith in Christ as Saviour and willing submission to His influence are the foundation on which Christian character must be built. If these are set aside, the character is not based on Christ, and all teaching which does not begin from the statement of these principles and retain them as its basis is not in any true sense Christian.

13. The day] i.e. the day of judgment or the day of the Lord. The imagery of fire testing the building is both natural and suggested by the OT. accounts of the manifestations of Jehovah. 15. Saved] because of his own Christian life. Yet so as by fire. As the builder may escape with his life while the flames destroy the building on which he is engaged, so the Christian teacher may be saved himself, though his teaching be proved worthless for edification. 'Sincerity does not verify doctrine, but it saves the man' (F.W. Robertson).

16, 17. Woe to the teacher who by pernicious teaching or example injures or destroys the spiritual life of members of the Church of Christ: God shall do even so to him. If any man defile] A worse case than v. 15. There the merely unprofitable teacher escapes; here the positively hurtful is punished. Holy] i.e. sacred, not to be injured with impunity. Which temple ye are] RV 'and such are ye,' i.e. holy.

18-23. Paraphrase. 'Do not deceive yourselves; but if there be any of you priding himself on his worldly wisdom let him quickly unlearn it, that he may learn the true wisdom. (19, 20) For as Holy Scripture teaches, worldly wisdom is but folly in God's sight. (21-23) Do not, therefore, use the names of your teachers as party watchwords, boasting about your devotion to this or that one. Learn what is good from them all, for they all alike belong to you. And not only do they belong to you, but all things belong to you; and you belong to Christ; and Christ Himself belongs to God.'

19. The wisdom of this world] The conceit and vanity of men are folly with God. The results of this folly in Christian teachers are indicated in vv. 15, 17. It is written] Job 5:18.

20. And again] Ps 94:11. 21. Glory in men] boast of their preference for this or that teacher, as they had been doing (116).

21. All things are yours] To him who is united to Christ all things belong, contributing to the growth of his Christian character and the increasing perfection of his spiritual life. He learns from all teachers; the world provides him with the means of growth in grace, for all his experiences in its possessions and work influence his spiritual life; life is full of divine meaning and purpose; death is revealed to him as the gate of life; he is delivered from any danger to his spirit arising from the perplexities of the present or the problems of the future (things to come). 23. Ye are Christ's] i.e. you belong to Christ, not to Paul or Apollos or Cephas. And Christ is God's] i.e. God is over all; even Christ belongs to Him. And as we are Christ's, we belong to God. Theodoret remarks, 'Christ belongs to God, not as God's creature, but as God's Son.' Perhaps the Apostle simply desires to assert that God is supreme over all: cp. 15:24 Jn 4:24.

CHRISTIAN TEACHERS ONLY THE INSTRUMENTS OF GOD

The folly and sin of quarrelling about different teachers who are but servants of Christ and responsible to Him.

1-5. Paraphrase. 'You have been engaged in strife about the merits and position of your teachers. Consider for a moment what they are. They have no authority of their own: they only bear Christ's messages. (2-4) Servants are responsible to their master; and so I am responsible not to you or to any man, but to Christ. (5) Have patience until Christ comes, when every man will be rewarded as he has deserved.'

Stewards] dispensing the truths entrusted to them, not giving of their own. Mysteries of God] the spiritual truths revealed by Christ, and by His Spirit in Christian experience (Jn 16:12, 13). 2. Required in stewards] cp. Mt 24:45-51 Lk 16:12, 13. 4. I know nothing by myself] RV 'against myself.' The idea is the same as in Ac 24:16. 5. Before the time] i.e. of Christ's return. St. Paul evidently expected the advent of Christ within the lifetime of himself and his converts, though the exact time was uncertain: cp. 15:51.

The hidden things of darkness] the things that are at present unknown. There is no suggestion of evil in the phrase. Along with the counsels of the hearts it denotes all the materials for forming a just judgment.

6-13. Paraphrase. 'In speaking of the folly of these divisions I have used only the names of Apollos and myself; but the same principles apply to your attitude to all your teachers. (7) Why do some of you pride yourselves on being better than others? None of you has anything that he did not receive. (8) You boast as if you had all possible wisdom. Would that it were so, that we might share it. (9) It looks as if we who are Apostles were the least worthy of all God's servants, a spectacle for men and angels. (10) You are wise and honourable; we are foolish and contemptible. (11-13) We suffer and toil, returning blessing for cursing; and are looked upon as outcasts to this day.'

6. Not to think of men above that which is written] RV 'not to go beyond the things which are written.' The expression is ambiguous to us: it may refer either to what St. Paul has already written or to the general teaching of the OT. Perhaps it was a familiar quotation. 'Do nothing beyond the injunctions of Holy Writ.' Be puffed up for one against another] lit. 'Be puffed up the one in favour of one (say, Paul) against the other (say, Apollos).'

7. Who maketh thee to differ]

er, 'who maketh thee (who art puffed up) prior? That thou didst not receive] i.e. a us (whom ye now despise), as is shown v. 8. Now ye are full] The Apostle returns to the use of sarcasm, the weapon has already wielded with effect. The verbal sentences are either interrogative or inflammatory, and should have marks of interjection or exclamation. He expresses with irony their own estimate of themselves having reached perfection, 'come into their kingdom,' so to speak, and needing to learn nothing more. Would to God you did reign! little they knew their true spiritual position. cp. Rev. 3:17. The Corinthians' fancied condition is contrasted with the Apostle's actual condition. Last, as it were appointed to death] 'last of all, as men doomed to death.' He means the Apostles to criminals condemned to death in the church. For the metaphor cp. cp. 15:56. A few years later Christians were often so put to death. Spectacle. Gl. Theat. 10. The sarcasm is continued. We fools] in preaching the foolishness of the world. Ye are wise] i.e. shrewd. 2. Working with our hands] St. Paul's constant practice; cp. Ac 18:3; 20:34; 1 Cor 1 Th. II 2; 2 Th. 3.

5:1-21. Paraphrase. 'I write not to shame you, but to admonish you; and I have the right to do so, for I am your spiritual father, 17. Follow my example, therefore; and end to the instructions of Timothy whom I sent to remind you of my teaching and practice. 18. Some of you have been pluming yourselves on your attainments, and posing as authorities, as if we were never to return to you; 20. Do not deceive yourselves. I shall behave with you to test not the words of the use authorities, but their power: for the kingdom of God is advanced not by empty words, but by spiritual power. 21. The spirit which I shall come depends upon you. If you continue in your evil courses I shall act with severity: if you repent I shall gentle and encouraging.' 15. Instructers] RV 'tutors': those who preceded St. Paul at Corinth. Begotten you through the gospel] St. Paul had been the sana of their conversion. He had given them the new life. 17. Timothy. See Intro. My ways which in Christ] i.e. my manner and conduct as a shaker in Christ's service. In every church constantly appeals to the practice of other churches as a check to the spirit of individualism and separation so prevalent at Corinth: 7:17; 11:16; 14:38, 39. 18. Puffed up] Some of the Corinthians converted conceived themselves wise] as to be able to despise St. Paul's authority. Their opposition developed later, and drew from St. Paul the 'severe' letter which we have in 2 Cor. 10:13. See Intro. 2 Cor. As though I would not come] RV 'as though I were not coming.' They seem to have thought that as he had remained so long in Ephesus he would not return to Corinth. 19. Shortly] cp. 16:5. For his plans and their ultimate fulfilment see Intro. 2 Cor. 20. Not in word, but in power] The extension of God's kingdom is promoted not by eloquence of speech but by spiritual influence proceeding from Christ's followers, and becoming a power in men's lives; cp. CHAPTER 5

(5:1-18. THE CASE OF IMMORALITY

The Apostle had written (4:1) of coming to exercise authority. Here was a case in which it was needed. A man had created a scandal by marrying his stepmother, and the Corinthians had done nothing. They had allowed him to retain his membership in the church. St. Paul instructs them to excommunicate the offender, and keep the church pure.

1-8. Paraphrase. 'A rumour has reached me that unchastity exists among you, and that one of your number has taken his stepmother as his wife, an act which the very heathen abhor. (2) How can you maintain your attitude of self-satisfaction in presence of this scandal? Why do you not rather humble yourselves and remove the sinner from your fellowship? (3) For I who am at a distance feel the disgrace as though I were among you, and have already decided what must be done, as if I were in your assembly. (4, 5) When you are gathered together, I being present with you in spirit, proceed to pass sentence of excommunication on this man, delivering him solemnly to Satan in the name of Jesus our Lord, that his soul may be saved even if his body perish. (6) How senseless is your self-conceit in presence of this impurity. Do ye not realise that you are all in danger of being degraded by it? (7) Put away this leaven of unholliness, then, and remain free from it. Remember how at the Passover all leaven was put away; and now that our Paschal Lamb Christ Jesus has been sacrificed, and our flesh of unleavened bread begun, (8) let us celebrate our Passover by putting away the leaven of vice and sin and using only the unleavened bread of purity and truth.'

1. It is reported commonly] RV 'It is actually reported.' His father's wife] The father may have been dead or separated from his wife: the stepson had then married her. The Corinthian Church was evidently unconscious that there was anything sinful in such a union. Had the man and woman been living in sin without marriage the Church could scarcely have made even a show of defending their conduct. The persons referred to in 2 Cor. 7:12
I have nothing to do, so far as judgment is concerned, with the world at large. We have to judge those in the Church; whereas the judgment of the world we leave to God. Therefore, excommunicate that wicked man.

9. In an epistle] This clearly refers to a previous letter no longer extant and prior to any of our Epistles to the Corinthians. See Intro. xi. But now I have written] RM 'As it is, I wrote.' The meaning is, 'What I wrote was,' etc. The Corinthians probably asked St. Paul in their letter in reply to his first one, what they were to do when they met non-Christians in business and society. Not to eat? They might be compelled to meet with such men and to have some business or social relations with them, but they were not to have any association with them but what was absolutely unavoidable. 12. Them...that are without] i.e. the heathen generally; all outside the Church.

Do not ye? They exercised discipline in some cases though they had not recognised its necessity in this one.

CHAPTER 6

(c) 6-11. CHRISTIANS AND LITIGATION

St. Paul reproves the Corinthians for referring their disputes about ordinary affairs to heathen judges. The subject was suggested by rumours he had heard; and the mention of 'judgment' in v. 13 of the previous chapter prompted its treatment at this stage.

1-6. Paraphrase. 'How is it that when you quarrel with one another you go before heathen judges and do not let some of the brethren decide your matter? (2) You spoke of the saints judging the world, why not allow them to settle these trifles? (3) You spoke of Christians as looking to sit in judgment on angels; why not then let them deal with the ordinary affairs of life? (4) And if you must have these things settled formally, make umpires of unimportant Church members rather than heathen. (5) I write thus to make you ashamed. Is there really no wise man among you who can be trusted to judge between his brethren, (6) and to prevent this unseemly practice of calling in unbelievers to settle your disputes?'

1. Dare any of you] Such action was antagonistic to the Christian spirit. The unjust] RV 'the unrighteous,' i.e. the heathen. The name is used in irony for 'unbelievers' (v. 6). 'Do you call the heathen unjust, and yet dare to go to them alone for justice?' Saints] i.e. Christians.

2. That the saints shall judge the world] This v. and the two following vv. are written sarcastically. They appeal to the 'knowledge' of the Corinthians, and it is probable that they were suggested by expressions in the letter sent by the Corinthians to St. Paul. They were puffed up with spiritual pride (5*), and in their conceit and vanity had spoken of their hope to judge both men (5 13 6* and angels (6*). If this be their expectation, says the Apostle, surely they are capable, even the meanest of them, of judging in matters of daily life. To take these expressions, about the saints judging the world and angels, seriously, is to miss the point of the Apostle’s argument. Besides, he has already said that the Christians (both he and they) had nothing to do with judging the world, which was God’s part (5 13, 18). (See Ramsay, ‘Hist. Com. on Corinthians,’ in ‘Expositor,’ VI. 4, p. 278.)

6. Before the unbelievers] The Corinthian converts referred their disputes about matters of daily life, such as ‘prices and ownership’ (Ramsay), to heathen judges or arbitrators. St. Paul urges them, if quarrel they must, to choose arbitrators from among the brethren.

7–11. Paraphrase. ‘But the fault lies deeper than this, for you should have no such disputes at all. Far better be wronged and defrauded (8) than wrong and defraud your brethren. (9, 10) After all, in the end the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. And who are the unrighteous but the unchaste, the greedy, the drunken, and the extortionate, none of whom have any part in that kingdom? (11) Such indeed were some of you Corinthians; but since your baptism you have professed that you are seeking to become pure and holy through the influence of Christ and the working of the Holy Spirit.’

7. There is utterly a fault] RV ‘Already it is altogether a defect in you.’ St. Paul here ceases to employ raillery, the weapon he has used so effectively in the previous vv., and remonstrates with them in the most serious fashion. The real fault was not in going to heathen judges to get their disputes arranged, but in having occasion to call in any one at all.

9. Shall not inherit the kingdom] i.e. have no share in its present privileges and future blessings. The kingdom of God is a spiritual kingdom (Jn 18:36); its blessings and privileges are spiritual; how then could such unspiritual men as those enumerated, whose conduct tended to harden the heart and dull the spiritual insight, have any part in it? cp. Ac 8:21.

11. Ye are washed] RM ‘ye washed yourselves,’ i.e. submitted to baptism as the sign of the washing away of your sin.
Sanctified] set apart, dedicated to God’s service. Justified] accepted as righteous.
In the name of the Lord] i.e. through spiritual union with Him and continual submission to His influence.

(d) 612–20. The Obligation of Purity
The Corinthians seemed to have claimed that they were free to satisfy all bodily desires now that the gospel had set them free from the association of eating with idolatry.

St. Paul points out, first, that there are qualifications of this freedom even in things that are morally indifferent, and then that fornication is not one of these things. The subject arises naturally out of what he has said in vv. 9, 10.

12–20. Paraphrase. ‘It is true as you suggest that “all things are lawful”; but this is not an absolute but a relative principle. You must not argue that the existence of appetites proves the lawfulness of their gratification: you must take care that what is lawful is also wise, and that appetite does not make you its slave. (13, 14) Both food and the organ which digests it are perishable. But the body has an eternal element, and unchastity harms that eternal element, designed as it is for the service of Christ and participation in the Resurrection. (15–17) You know that your bodies partake in the mystic union that exists between Christ and His people. How shameful it is, therefore, to violate this union by acts of immorality. Such acts cause a carnal union between those who participate in them, just as Scripture speaks of husband and wife being “one flesh”: whereas the Christian is united to Christ in a spiritual union. And the immoral union is destructive of the spiritual union. (18, 19) Therefore keep yourselves unspotted by this sin; for there is none that defiles the body like this and makes it unfit for the dwelling-place of the Holy Spirit. (20) Remember that you are not your own possession; you have been purchased by Christ who has given His life for you; therefore, see that you honour Him by consecrating your very bodies to His service.’

12. All things are lawful] cp. 10:23. St. Paul seems to have stated this as a principle in regard to the use of certain kinds of food (e.g. meats offered to idols, 10:25, 27), and the Corinthians had applied it generally to sensual indulgences. The Apostles, therefore, while still asserting the principle, point out two qualifications of it: (a) that what is lawful should also be beneficial, and (b) that no one should become a slave even to a lawful habit. We shall best understand the principle and its application if we think of it in relation to some such modern practice as, e.g., the use of wine.

13. Meats] An instance of things indifferent: cp. chs. 8–10, where this matter is treated at length. St. Paul grants liberty in respect of meats; but the liberty does not excuse violating another man’s conscience or becoming a slave to gluttony. Now the body is not, etc.] The Corinthians regarded the use of food and fornication as exactly on the same level, as both satisfying appetites.
they held that the existence of bodily appetites justified their gratification. St. Paul, on the contrary, draws a sharp line of distinction between these two things.

14. Will also raise up us] St. Paul's argument in the whole passage is based on his view of the Resurrection which he explained in ch. 15: see esp. vv. 35–53. Man's body is eternal; death and the grave do not destroy but purify and change it, as the earth removes the husk and glorifies the corn cast into it.

One flesh] The words spoken first of marriage are applied here to an unholy union. St. Paul does not place the two on the same plane, but only points out that in this one respect they are similar. 17. One spirit] i.e. he shares in the life of the Lord: cp. Jn 15:4, 5.

18. Without the body] i.e. outside it; do not affect its spiritual nature and destiny in the same way as this sin. Sinning against his own body] see on v. 14. 19. The temple] i.e. the shrine wherein He dwells: cp. 1 Pet 2:5. 20. Hath bought with a price] Christ has given Himself for you, and you are His; yea, God has given Christ for you, and you belong to God through Him.

Glorify God in your body] RV omits the rest. St. Paul is dwelling on the necessity of bodily purity, and appropriately concludes with this appeal.

DIVISION II. 7–164. PROBLEMS SUBMITTED IN THE LETTER FROM CORINTH

CHAPTER 7

(a) Answer to Questions about Marriage

The Corinthians had in their letter (7:1) asked St. Paul's opinion on several points connected with marriage. His language in reply is guarded; he speaks with some difidence; he constantly admits exceptions and lays down restrictions. This makes his meaning sometimes obscure; but the general drift is that celibacy, though a good thing in itself, is not suited to the needs of many, especially in circumstances like theirs; and marriage, though not obligatory, is not only sinless, but good in itself; and those married, even to heathen spouses, should not separate without necessity.

1–7. Celibacy is good, but marriage is usually advisable; only let it be real and complete.

Paraphrase. '1 (1) In answer to your questions—Celibacy is a good thing. (2) But because of the profligacy around you, it is well that each should marry. (3) But the marriage must be a real one, each giving the other conjugal rights. (5) Let there be separation only by mutual consent, for a given time, for purposes of devotion. (6) But I say all this as a concession to your circumstances, not as a command. (7) I should like all to be like myself. But all have not the same gifts from God.'

1. The things whereof ye wrote] Probably most of the rest of the Epistle is taken up with answers to these questions, and considerations arising out of them. It is not clear whether the letter from the Corinthians suggested that celibacy ought to be universal, or deprecated it as unnatural, or asked, as Ramsay thinks, whether it was 'incumbent on Christians to marry, as the Jews and Roman law maintained.' Good] i.e. celibacy is an excellent thing (the reasons for this are given, vv. 25, 26), but marriage is often the safer course. 2. To avoid fornication] which was very prevalent at Corinth. St. Paul treats of the higher aspect of marriage elsewhere (Eph 5:25–28). Every (RV 'each')... his own] Concubinage and polygamy are forbidden. 3. Due benevolence] RV 'her due'; i.e. primarily, cohabitation.

5. To fasting and prayer] RV 'unto prayer,' omitting 'fasting' on the authority of the best MSS. So Mk 9:42. For your incontinency] i.e. through your lack of self-control. 6. This] Perhaps v. 5; more probably, all he has said in recommendation of marriage from v. 2 onwards. 7. Even as I myself] i.e. able through self-control to lead a celibate life. His proper gift] He to whom God has given this ability, has received some other gift from Him. St. Paul must have been unmarried, or just possibly, a widower.

8–16. Consequent advice or commands. (a) 8, 9. To the unmarried and widows—to remain so, unless they have an overmastering desire. (b) 10, 11. To the married Christians. The Lord's command is against separation; if such take place, the separated party is to remain unmarried. (c) 12–14. In cases of mixed marriages St. Paul's opinion is that the two should continue to live together if the heathen partner is willing; for the fact that the one is a Christian brings the other also into the Christian sphere, as is the case with the children. 15, 16. But if the heathen partner wants to separate, he or she may do so, and the Christian is then set free. But domestic peace is what God desires; the heathen partner may possibly be converted.

8. Even as I] i.e. unmarried and without desire for marriage. 10. Not I, but the Lord] This exhortation is confirmed by the Lord's own authority (Mt 5:28 1949) which forbids divorce. This is one of the passages which show St. Paul's acquaintance with Christ's teaching, and the supreme authority he attached to it: cp. 1 Tim 6:3. 12. I, not the Lord] Christ had said nothing about mixed marriages; the Apostle is left to his own judgment: cp. v. 40. He does not encourage mixed marriages (2 Cor 6:14), but is thinking of cases where husband or wife has been converted since marriage. 14. Is sanctified] i.e. brought into the Christian sphere, under Christian influences. Now are they holy] i.e. regarded as Christian children: as are still more evidently the children of two Christian parents. This phrase 'enunciates the principles which leads to infant baptism, viz. that the child of Christian parents shall be counted as a Christian (J Lightfoot). 15. A brother or a sister] the Christian partner. Not under bondage] i.e. is not bound to continue with the other.

15, 16. God hath called us to (RV 'in') peace. save thy wife] v. 16 either (a) continues the thought of v. 15—God's aim for us is peace, which will here be best secured by separation; and the possibility of saving the heathen partner by remaining is, after all, uncertain—but more probably, (b) it continues the main thought of vv. 12-14, v. 15 being parenthetical, 'But God desires that the married should live in peace together, and this may result in the conversion of the heathen partner.'

17-24. The general principle; let each remain as he was when God called him (v. 17, 20, 24). This holds good, (a) of circumcision and uncircumcision. Let each keep as he is; the one important thing is to keep God's commandments. (b) Of slavery and freedom. A slave should not mind his position (though he may avail himself of an opportunity to become free). The Christian slave is Christ's freed man; the Christian freed man, Christ's bond-servant, owing service to Him, not to men.

17. But] RV 'only'; I only lay down the general rule. Hath distributed] i.e. his condition and circumstances of life. 18. Circumcised . uncircumcised] Used metaphorically, 'If any Jew has been converted, let him remain a Christian Jew; if a Gentile is converted, let him not seek to become a Jew, but remain a Christian Gentile.' 19. Circumcision is nothing] cp. Gal 5:6 16 Ro 2:25-29. 'Not nationality but obedience to God determines Christian character (Stevens). 20. Calling] not 'occupation in life,' but 'condition in which God's call found him.' St. Paul lays this down, not as a universal, but as a good general rule: cp. vv. 8, 15, 28.

21. But if thou mayest be made free, use it rather] an ambiguous sentence, like v. 16. 'It' may mean 'slavery' or 'freedom.' Either 'even if you have an opportunity of freedom, remain a slave'—this suits the immediate context—or, 'but if you have an opportunity of freedom, take it.' This would be a parenthetical piece of advice. This is favoured by St. Paul's thought elsewhere. He was proud of his citizenship; he prefers celibacy because it gives greater freedom to serve God. So does liberty compared with slavery. Slavery was an essential part of the social conditions of the time. The Apostle accepts it as such, but lays down a principle which underlines it, viz. that Christ makes no difference between bond and free. He insists, not on the rights of slaves, but on the duties of masters towards their Christian brethren (Eph 6:9 Col 3:21-4 1 Tim 6:1, 2, and especially Philo.). The spread of the Christian spirit swept away the worst evils of slavery, before abolishing slavery itself.

22. Freeman] RV 'freedman'; set free from sin (Jn 8:34-36 Ro 8:2 Gal 5:1), but still owing service to Him who freed him. Christ's servant] RV 'bondservant'; bought by Him whose service is perfect freedom.' 23. Bought with a price] cp. 6:39. Servants] (RV 'bond-servants') of men] i.e. slavishly yielding to their desires; slaves to custom or public opinion: cp. 2 Cor 11:30. 24. With God] i.e. in His presence, consciously doing His will.

25-38. Marriage of virgins. The Corinthians seem to have asked particularly whether fathers ought to give their daughters in marriage. St. Paul now comes to this point, first, however, going into the question of marriage generally, and giving reasons for preferring celibacy. He says he cannot appeal to any commandment of the Lord, so simply gives his own opinion, assured that he deserves their confidence. He repeats the general rule (cp. v. 17) that it is best for each to remain as he is, considering the early coming of the Lord and the distress preceding it: so that while there is no sin in marriage, yet celibacy is best, (a) because the married will meet with greater troubles; (b) because the shortness of the time before the Lord's coming bids all to sit loose to worldly things; (c) because the unmarried is freer from distraction, and able to serve the Lord more completely. However, he does not want to constrain them, but merely to advise for the best. If a man considers it right to give his daughter in marriage, let him do so; but he who, feeling no such necessity, resolves to keep her unmarried, does better.

25. Virgins] i.e. unmarried daughters. The Roman law endeavoured to make marriage universal; and the Jewish view was similar.

No commandment of the Lord] either laid down by Him while on earth (see on vv. 10-12), or imparted by special revelation. To be faithful] i.e. to give a trustworthy opinion, one deserving of confidence, as a steward of the mysteries of God (4:12). 26. The present distress] Perhaps persecution, which, however, is not elsewhere mentioned in this Epistle; more probably 'distress' Christ had said would precede His return (Lk 21:22), which was thought to be near (v. 29). So to be] RV 'to be as he is.' 27. Art thou loosed] i.e. unmarried. 28. Trouble in the flesh] i.e. in their earthly circumstances. Trouble would full not only on themselves, but on those dear to them. St. Paul wants to save them such suffering (RV 'and I would spare you').

29. The time is short: it remaineth, that, etc.] RV 'the time is shortened that henceforth,' etc.

The thought of the nearness of the Lord's coming, when earthly things would pass away, should keep them from being engrossed in present interests. 31. Abusing] RM 'using it to the full,' as if the sole source of enjoyment: cp. 1 Jn 2:15-17.

32. Without carefulness] RV 'free from cares.' 33, 34. The exact words and punctuation are doubtful (cp. RM); but this does not affect the general sense, viz. that the unmarried are less subject to worldly distractions and anxieties than the married. 35. Cast a snare (or, 'halter') upon you] i.e. not deprive you of liberty; force you into this course. Comely] RV 'seemly.' 36. Any man] i.e. parent or guardian. Uncomely] i.e. unfairly, in not seeing her married. His virgin daughter or ward. Let them] i.e. the maiden and her suitor. 37. Hath power over (RV 'as touching') his own will] i.e. is able to carry it out. The whole v. shows the need of careful deliberation in the matter; no hasty resolve. Throughout, according to the social and legal conditions of the time, no account is made of the maiden's own wishes. This is probably due also to the precise question St. Paul had to answer.

In applying this c. to the present day we have to remember, (1) the altered social conditions, (2) that St. Paul's advice is influenced by his regarding the Lord's coming as very near.

39, 40. Remarriage of widows. A widow may remarry after her husband's death, provided it be a Christian marriage; but St. Paul's opinion is, she will do better to remain a widow.

39. In the Lord] This forbids marriage from unchristian, worldly motives; and, practically, marriage with a heathen. 40. So abide] RV 'abide as she is': cp. 1 Tim 5:8-10, for widows on the Church roll. Have the Spirit of God] am guided by Him in what I say, not merely expressing my personal inclinations.

CHAPTERS 8:1-11

(b) Food offered to Idols

In these chs. St. Paul answers another question of the Corinthians—as to the lawfulness of eating food which had been offered in sacrifice to idols. This was a very urgent question. The whole worship of the heathen was sacrificial, and sacrifices were offered by them whenever a birthday or marriage was celebrated. Only part of the animal was consumed on the altar. Of the remainder, part became the priest's perquisite, and the rest was returned to the sacrificer, and he and his friends commonly feasted upon it, often in the precincts of the temple. Again, the bond of union between members of a Greek club, or guild, was a feast following a sacrifice. Much, too, of the meat in the market would have been offered in sacrifice, and sold by either priest or offerer. Thus a Christian might at a feast given by a heathen friend would probably have before him meat which had been offered in sacrifice; this might be the case even with meat bought in the market; and continued membership of these guilds meant joining in their sacrificial meals.

The Corinthians found this problem continually confronting them, and had asked St. Paul's advice. Their letter seems to have suggested that as an idol did not represent a real deity, food could not be polluted by being offered to it, and so might lawfully be eaten. St. Paul, however, admitting the truth of their view of idols, tells them that (1) knowledge must be tempered by love, care being taken to avoid injuring another's conscience; and (2) they must beware of idolatry.

In c. 8 he deals with the general principle, giving caution (1) above. In c. 9 he appeals to his own example, in forbearing, for the sake of others, to exercise rights he actually possessed, and in guarding against self-indulgence in his own life. In c. 10 he warns them against the danger of idolatry, reminding them of the sin and fate of the Israelites, and that the idol feasts mean fellowship with demons (idolatry being a suggestion of the powers of evil), which is inconsistent with the fellowship with and in Christ, bestowed in the Lord's Supper. Finally, he gives the practical advice, not to be needlessly scrupulous on oneself, but to respect the scruples of others.

At the Council of Jerusalem, Gentile converts were directed to abstain from things sacrificed to idols (Ac 15:29). St. Paul had himself published these decrees in Syria, etc., but does not mention them here, though he says nothing inconsistent with them. Possibly he saw the Corinthians would be more influenced by argument than by appeal to authority, seeing that they prided themselves on their wisdom (118) and their ability to discern spiritual truth (2:18-20 31).

CHAPTER 8

(b) Food offered to Idols: I. The Principle of Self-denial

Knowledge must be tempered by love. More enlightened Christians must respect the scruples of their weaker brethren in the matter of eating meat which had been offered to idols.

1-13. Paraphrase. 'Your next question relates to meat offered in sacrifice to idols, asking whether it is permissible for a Christian to partake of it. We all know, as you of course, that an idol represents no deity, for there is but one God. (5, 6) The who, doubtless, speak of many deities and igods, but we know that these have no existence: we believe in God the Fa-and the Creator and in Jesus Christ His (7) There are many Christians, however, so well instructed as we are, who still as they have been accustomed, of an representing an existing deity, and are asked at the idea of eating meat which has offered to it in sacrifice. (8, 9) Now it true that whether we eat it or not is, the abstract, a matter of indifference; it make us neither better nor worse in the of God. But, at the same time, you it take care to do nothing that will shock ther's feelings or wound his conscience.

If a man who thinks he cannot as a Chris-ate in an idol's temple, sees one of you so, he may be led to follow your example; although his conscience, which is not enlightened as yours, tells him he is doing right. (11) He is thus led to act against and le his conscience; and so the man for whom r bit died is brought to moral ruin by your confidence and bravado. (12) If you act this way, offending the consciences of less-reliant brethren and leading them into aptation, you sin directly against Christ.
Rather than thus do the weakest of our moral spiritual injury, I would eat no flesh long as I live, if to eat it is to harm another 1. We all have knowledge] This remark is obviously quoted from the letter of the Corarians. Vv. 2, 3 are St. Paul's comment on only know God by love... They who are Him are known of Him because they verse with Him, and this mutual ercourse enables them to know him per-nally' (Sadler): cp. Gal 4.9. 4. An idol is thing] i.e. has no spiritual reality behind it.
6. 'For us there is but one God the Father, Source of all things, for whose service we ist, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whose ency all things were created, and we Chris-nians created anew.' 7. With conscience of the idol unto this hour] RV 'being used until ow to the idol'; i.e. not having yet been able to shake off the idea that it represents some iritual power. Their conscience being weak defiled] i.e. they have a sense of moral dement, because their conscience is not properly enlightened. 8. But meat, etc.] It is not such matters that make us well-pleasing to God. 9. This liberty of yours] i.e. freedom to eat.
10. See thee... sit at meat in the idol's peace] This was what their boasted liberty had brought them to. Some of the Christians had actually partaken of a feast held in honour of some of the heathen deities. This was a more serious matter than merely eating (at home or at a friend's house) of meat which had been offered to an idol, and more fraught with danger to others. For it involved some sort of recognition of the heathen deity—at least, the weak brethren would naturally think so. Knowledge enlightenment, consciousness that idols do not represent a real deity.
11. Perish] The result of acting against conscience: cp. Ro 14:23. 'Whatsoever is not of faith' (i.e. done without thorough conviction that it is right) 'is sin.' 12. Sin against Christ] who identifies Himself with His brethren (Ac 94 Mt 25:40). 13. Probably this ab-staining from flesh would be practised by St.
Paul only where circumstances required it, as at Corinth.

CHAPTER 9

(b) FOOD OFFERED TO IDOLS

(ii) ST. PAUL'S OWN EXAMPLE

St. Paul has appealed to the 'enlightened' converts at Corinth to give up for the sake of others a practice which they might otherwise have had no hesitation in indulging. He now strengthened his appeal by pointing to his own example of self-denial. As an Apostle he had the right to maintenance from the Church, but had refrained from exercising it, lest he might be suspected of preaching for gain.

Since his opponents declared that he maintained himself by his own work simply because he knew he was no true Apostle, he begins by proving (vv. 1-3) his claim to the Apostleship, and so (vv. 4-6) to the rights enjoyed by other Apostles. He defends this right (vv. 7-14) by a number of arguments. Then he gives (vv.
15-22) his reasons for not exercising it. His whole conduct has been influenced by the aim of causing no hindrance to the gospel, but of commoding it to every man.

1-6. His claim to Apostleship, and consequint right to maintenance.

Paraphrase. '1 Am not I myself free from outward authority? For am I not an Apostle, having seen Jesus our Lord? (2, 3)
Why, your very existence as a Christian Church should be to you a sufficient proof of my Apostleship. (4-6) Now other Apostles, the Lord's brethren, and Peter himself, are supported as well as their wives, by the Churches they visit; have not Barnabas and myself this same right?}
1. Am I not free? (RV puts this question first) i.e. being an Apostle, I am free from man's authority, and could do many things I abstain from doing for your sakes: cp. v. 19.

Have I not seen Jesus? An Apostle's work was to be a witness of the Resurrection (Ac 2:22 282); therefore he must have seen the risen Lord. This St. Paul had done at his conversion (Ac 22:14 1 Cor 15:8,9). 2. Unto others in their opinion. The seal] That which authenticates, or proves true. The existence of the Corinthian Church was a proof of St. Paul's apostolic power. V. 3 probably refers to this, not to what follows, 'If you want a proof of my apostleship, look around you!' 4. Power] RV 'right.' To eat and to drink] as guests of the Church. 5. To lead about a sister, a wife] RV 'a wife that is a believer;' i.e. to claim support on his journeys for his wife as well as himself. It is implied that the Apostles were mostly married; Peter's wife's mother is mentioned Mt 8:14. No doubt their wives were of great service in getting access to the women of Eastern cities. Lead] as the companion of his travels. He asserts that he could reasonably claim not only support for a wife, but also payment of her travelling expenses as well as his own. The brethren of the Lord] cp. Mt 12:30 13:6. They seem here included among the Apostles; but the title of Apostle was not limited to the Twelve. 6. Barnabas was like St. Paul, an Apostle (Ac 14:14), and like him, but unlike the rest, he maintained himself by his own labour. They may have jointly adopted this course on their missionary journeys (Ac 13, 14). We see that Barnabas was known to the Corinthians, and still working as a missionary. For St. Paul's self-support see on 4:12.

7-14. Proof of this right. This right is proved (v. 7) from the analogy of soldiers, husbandmen, shepherds; (vv. 8-10) from the direction in the Law that the ox should not be muzzled (vv. 11, 12) on grounds of common fairness and gratitude; (vv. 13, 14) from the example of the Jewish priesthood.

7. Who goeth a warfare? The Apostles were spiritual soldiers, husbandmen, shepherds.

8. As a man] RV 'after the manner of men;' i.e. reasoning only from analogies of common life. 9. For it is written in the law] RV 'Is it not also written in the law?' Thou shalt not muzzle the ox] Dt 25:4. The ox threaded out the corn either by simply walking upon it, or by dragging a heavy sledge over it.

Doth God take care for oxen?] RV 'Is it for the oxen that God careth?' i.e. He did not make this law merely for their sake; He meant the principle to go much further, to be applied to men. This is an instance of St. Paul's use of the allegorical method of interpretation: cp. 2 Cor 3:18 Gal 4:22. 10. Altogether] or, 'really,' 'certainly.' He that thresheth in hope, etc.] RV 'He that thresheth to thresh in hope of partaking.' The same principle which applies to oxen holds good of human labourers, and of spiritual labourers. II. Carnal things] i.e. earthly material support; cp. Ro 15:27. 12. If others be partakers] This shows that there were some persons receiving support from the Corinthian Church: cp. 2 Cor 11:90.

Power] RV 'right.' Rather] RV 'yet more;' i.e. as the instruments of your conversion.

Paraphrase. '(15) But I am resolved to maintain my independence. (16-18) It is the one thing I can boast of. I cannot boast of my preaching the gospel, for I am compelled to preach the gospel; I have no choice in the matter; but this self-support is of my own free will, and I find its reward in increased opportunities and success. (19-23) To obtain such, I have also been in the habit of adapting myself to the position and circumstances of every class of men in turn.'

15. I have used none of these things] The Apostle was the more free to advocate the principle 'that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel,' because his own refusal of support kept him free from personal bias. These things i.e. these rights. Make my glorying void] deprive me (by supporting me) of my boast of preaching the gospel freely.

17. Willingly... against my will] RV 'of mine own will... not of mine own will.' He preached under the constraining influence of the love of Christ. Reward answers to 'glorying': cp. Ro 4:25. A voluntary action admits of 'glorying,' and calls for 'reward.' So it was with St. Paul's self-support; not with his gospel-preaching. Dispensation] RV 'stewardship.' 18. That I abuse not my power] RV 'so as not to use to the full my rights;' viz. of claiming maintenance from his people.

19. Free from all men] Under authority or obligation to no man. Servant unto all] Accommodating myself to their desires and prejudices as far as possible.

20. I became as a Jew] preaching first in their synagogues; appealing to their Scriptures, e.g. Ac 13:14, etc. As under the law] e.g. circumcising Timothy, who was half a Jew (Ac 16:1-8); helping the men who had taken the Nazirite vow (21:29-30); keeping the feast (20:16). RV inserta, 'not being myself under the law:' cp. Gal 2:19-19. 31. To them that are without law] i.e. Gentiles: cp. Ro 2:12-19. To them he became as without law; e.g., refusing to have Titus, a Gentile, circumcised (Gal 2:4); mixing freely with Gentiles; using arguments from natural religion and from Greek literature and philosophy, as at Lystra (Ac 14:16-17) and Athens (17:22-31). Being not without law to God] Liberty did not mean licence; though free from bondage to the Law of Moses, he yielded obedience to the moral law of God as revealed in Christ. 22. The weak] cp. Ro 14, 15. By all means] some in one way, some in another. 23. Partaker thereof with you] RV 'joint partaker thereof,' i.e. share with my converts in its blessings and salvation. This v. forms the transition to the next paragraph. St. Paul practised self-denial for his own sake also.

24-27. The importance of self-discipline. St. Paul illustrates the need of this self-denial which he has been inculcating from the Greek games or athletic sports, some of the most noted of which (the Isthmian) were held near Corinth every two years. The prize was a mere wreath (at Corinth, formed of parsley, afterwards of pine), but the winner was welcomed home to his native city with the honours of a victorious general; his statue was erected; his victory was celebrated by a leading poet; a front seat was assigned him at all festivals and spectacles; he was frequently relieved from taxation. St. Paul draws lessons for his converts from the earnestness and self-discipline needed in these contests: cp. Phil 3:13, 14, 2 Tim 2:4, 7; Heb 12:1.

24. Not all who start in a race, win; only the best. In the Christian race there is a crown for all who run their best, but only for such. 25. Striveth for the mastery] RV 'striveth in the games.' Temperate in all things] i.e. under strict 'training' as to food, drink, and exercise. An incorruptible] a crown of glory that fadeth not away (1 Pet 5:4).

26. Not as uncertainly] not hesitating, looking back. Not as one that beateth the air] but aiming my blows well. The metaphor changes from running to boxing.

27. Keep under, etc.] RV 'I buffet my body and bring it into bondage.' The body is the seat of temptation to self-indulgence. One great object of fasting and abstinence is to secure this control over our bodies, so that the flesh may be subdued to the spirit. The illness to which St. Paul was subject, his 'thorn in the flesh' (2 Cor 12), must have tempted him often to seek his own ease and comfort and to live a more self-indulgent and less laborious life; and this temptation he fought against unceasingly. (Preached to others] like the herald who proclaimed the conditions of the contest and its prizes, and summoned the competitors. A castaway] RV 'rejected'; disqualified. 'No amount of usefulness to others will save us if we ourselves live not the life of God' (Woodford).

CHAPTER 10

(b) Food offered to Idols

(iii) Historical Illustrations and Practical Advice

St. Paul has been speaking of the need of earnestness and self-discipline, and the danger of failure; he now holds out the fate of the Israelites as a warning against self-confidence. The Corinthians were tempted to the very same sins for which Israel suffered.

All of the Israelites received great blessings from God, types of the sacramental privileges Christians enjoy, yet most of them perished in the wilderness because of sin. They accepted the privilege of their high calling, but renounced its responsibility. Their fate should warn his converts against setting their heart on evil things, idolatry, impurity, presuming on God's patience, murmuring.

1. All our fathers] Though most of the Corinthians were Gentiles, yet the Israelites were their spiritual forefathers; the Christian Church is a continuation of the Jewish.

The cloud...the sea] see Ex 13:21, 22. 14. The cloud denoting the presence of God was over them, the water of the Red Sea on either side of them. Their passage through the sea was a break with their old life in Egypt; it definitely committed them to Moses' guidance, was in effect a profession of discipleship to him (Ex 14:31); they were thus baptized unto Moses. This typified our baptism, which is, (1) deliverance from the bondage of sin and entrance upon a new life; (2) discipleship to Christ and union with Him. So the spiritual meat (the 'manna,' Ex 16) and spiritual drink (water from the rock, Ex 17 Nu 20) by which their life was sustained, were types of the Body and Blood of Christ, by which our souls are nourished. Our Lord Himself made the manna a type of Himself, the Living Bread (Jn 6:31-50). Here only in the NT. are the two Sacraments mentioned side by side. This food and drink are called 'spiritual' because, (1) miraculous, (2) typical, (3) assuring the people of God's presence, strengthening their faith.

4. That (RV 'a') spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ] The several visible rocks from which water came were symbols of the one invisible Rock who accompanied them and bestowed these blessings. God is often called a Rock in the OT., e.g. Dt 32:12-18 Ps 18:2, 31. We see St. Paul's recognition of Christ's pre-existence: the divine power which sustained the Israelites was the power of Christ working on earth before His Incarnation: cp. also Jn 7:56, 58.

5. Many] RV 'most.' All shared those same blessings, yet most, all, in fact, except Caleb and Joshua, perished in the wilderness. So our sacramental privileges will not save us if we live a careless life. 6. Examples [to be avoided]: cp. Heb 3:14-4:7. They . . . lusted [after the flesh-pots of Egypt (Nu 11)]; the Corinthians were inclined to hanker after heathen pleasures. 7. The people sat down, etc.] in honour of the golden calf (Ex 32:6). The [play] reveling accompanying the idol-worship. 8. Some of them [complied] Nu 25. Fornication was a [temptation to the Corinthians (c. 6)]. It was closely associated with idolatry; at Corinth there were a great number of women attached to the temple of Aphrodite (Venus) and devoted to her shameful service. 9. Tempt [Christ] (RV ‘the Lord’; with A.V., see on v. 4) i.e. try His patience. Destroyed of serpents] Nu 21:6. 10. Murmur [as a might be losing their old heathen pleasures. Destroyed [of the destroyer] i.e. the destroying angel inflicting pestilence (Ex 12:23 28:24, 15; Nu 16:41-46).]

11. For examples] RV ‘by way of example.’ Written for our admonition] not merely as ancient history: cp. Ro 15:4. The [ends of the world] RV ‘of the ages.’ Christians are ‘the heirs of all the ages,’ living in the [final dispensation: cp. Heb 12:13. Such as is common to man] RV ‘such as man can bear.’ God is faithful] He will not fail you (19); so endure, assured that He will support and finally deliver (make a way to escape). 14–22. Partaking of the Holy Communion is morally incompatible with partaking of idolatrous feasts. By partaking of the Eucharist they showed themselves Christians having communion with Christ, and in Him with one another; by sharing in sacrificial feasts in honour of idols they made themselves pagans, recognizing the existence of false gods and forming a brotherhood with idol-worshippers. The two were morally incompatible, an offence against the Lord, who required their whole allegiance.

Paraphrase. ‘(14) Therefore avoid all connexion with idolatry. (5) Judge for yourselves, ye that are sensible men. (16) The cup that we bless, the Bread that we break, do they not mean fellowship with Christ through sharing in Christ’s Blood and Body? (17) And we are all made one body in fellowship together by partaking of the one Bread. (18) So among the Jews, eating of the sacrifice means communion with God through (or with) the altar. (19) Now though an idol is a mere nothing, (20) yet we cannot help regarding heathen sacrifices as offered to evil spirits, (21) and it is morally impossible to share both in the Table and Cup of the Lord, and in those of evil spirits; (22) we cannot afford to provoke the Lord to jealousy.’

14. Flee from idolatry] do not run into temptation by attending these sacrificial feasts. 15. As to wise men] such as the Corinthians prided themselves on being: cp. 3:18 4:6. 8:10. They could judge how incongruous it was, after having by the Eucharist been made partakers of Christ, to share in idol sacrifices, and so enter into fellowship with evil spirits. 16. Cup of blessing] the cup of wine upon which a blessing was pronounced. We bless] i.e. consecrate by thanksgiving and prayer. Communion of the blood of Christ] In c. 11 St. Paul presents the Eucharist under the aspect of a memorial of Christ’s death; here under that of communion with Him; hence our term ‘Holy Communion’ for this Sacrament. Partaking of the Cup bestows spiritual communion with Christ, helping those who have faith to receive more and more of His spirit and influence. So partaking of the Blood brings the same spiritual blessings. Both form one act of communion, the only difference being that while partaking of the Cup their thoughts are fixed on Christ’s Blood shed for many, and while partaking of the Bread, upon His broken Body. We break] following Christ’s own institution (Mt 26:26, 27). The Church is spoken of as doing what was actually done by its president (Ac 20:11). For we being many] better, RM ‘Seeing that there is one bread, we who are many are one body.’ It is a Sacrament of unity in Christ; partakers of the one Bread, broken and distributed to each, we all partake sacramentally of Christ’s Body, and are thus ‘members incorporate in His mystical Body, the blessed company of all faithful people.’

18. Israel after the flesh] the natural Israel. We Christians are the true Israel, who do God’s will (Gal 6:10). Partakers of (RV ‘have communion with’) the altar] i.e. with God, whose share was offered on it: see on 9:18. Or, ‘communion (with God) in (by the altar).’ ‘The altar on which the victim was given to Jehovah, and from which it was given back to the offerers, was a meeting-place of communion between God and His people’ (Evan’s). 19. That the idol is any thing] no contradiction of 8:4-7. They sacrifice to devils (lit. ‘demons’), and not to God] an echo of Dt 32:17. St. Paul means that while particular heathen gods have no real existence, yet idolatrous worship is the invention of evil spirits, who instigate the excesses connected with it. To join in idolatrous feasts is to come into contact and fellowship with these spirits.

21. Cannot] It is morally impossible; to indulge in the latter makes the former a mere mockery. 22. Provoke the Lord to jealousy] (from Dt 32:18, 21; cp. Ex 20:7) by dividing an allegiance. Are we stronger than he?] This was really what the conduct of those who frequented idol-feasts amounted to—a challenge to God. How abhor their conduct when thus analysed! 10. 23-11. 1. Practical directions. St. Paul has shown the moral danger of joining in what was avowedly a sacrificial, idolatrous feast. He now comes to cases where it was lawful to eat meat that had been offered in sacrifice to idols, provided the feelings of others were considered.

Paraphrase. "(23, 24) In dealing with the limits within which Christian liberty may be exercised, we have to consider not merely whether a thing is permissible, but whether it is helpful to others, as well as to ourselves. (25, 26) You may freely eat, without asking questions, any meat you buy in the market, for all that is in the world is from God, and therefore good. (27) And if you go to a feast at a friend’s house, eat, without questioning, whatever is placed before you; (28, 29) but if told that anything has been offered in sacrifice, abstain from it, so as not to wound the conscience of your informant. (29, 30) Remember it is entirely for his sake that you abstain; for in the abstract it is not well that another’s conscience should be scandalised by the liberty I exercise, or that what I receive as God’s good gift should cause me to be maligned. (31) So not only eat and drink, but do everything, to God’s glory; (32) and avoid giving offence to men, whether Jews, or heathen, or fellow-Christsians. (33) Remember that I always seek to deny myself for others with a view to their profit and salvation. (11. 1) Follow my example in this respect as I follow Christ’s."

23. All things (i.e. things indifferent) are lawful see on 6. 12, 13. Edify lit. ‘build up’ the Christian character. 24. Another’s wealth RV ‘his neighbour’s good.’ Wealth is old English for ‘welfare.’ 25. Shambles the meat market. Asking no question for conscience sake i.e. so as not to trouble your conscience, or, not stopping to consult conscience. St. Paul does not want to encourage unhealthy scruples. 26. The earth is the Lord’s, and the fullness thereof i.e. all its contents (Ps 24. 1) said to have been a Jewish grace before meat. RV omits these words at end of v. 28. 29. Of another RV ‘by another.’ Stevens paraphrases the v., ‘Such action would have its entire reason in the weakness of the scrupulous man, for, in itself considered, one’s liberty is not determined by some one else’s conscience, but by his own.’

30. If I by grace be a partaker RM, better, ‘If I partake with thankfulness’ : cp. 1 Tim 4. 8-5. Evil spoken of Heathens, or weak Christians, would think it grossly inconsistent to thank God for food offered to idols.

31. Do all to the glory of God] The principal the Apostle has been inculcating in respect of meats has a universal application.

C. 11. 1. Be ye followers of me] cp. 4. 16. For Christ’s example cp. Phil 2. 4, Ro 15. 2, ‘even Christ pleased not himself.’ This v. is closely joined to the preceding; 11. 2 begins a new section.

CHAPTER 11

DISORDERS IN WORSHIP

2-16. (c) The Veiling of Women in Church

2. Now I praise you] This v. introduces the two following sections. The Apostle begins by praising them, perhaps echoing words from their own letter, for keeping the rules and teaching he had given; but goes on to rebuke faults that have come to his knowledge. Keep the ordinances] RV ‘hold fast the traditions’: cp. 2 Th 2. 15. I delivered them to you] 11. 25, 15. Probably here rules for worship are specially meant.

3-16. Dress of women in public worship. In Greek, as well as in Eastern cities, it was customary for women, except those of bad character, to cover their heads in public. Some of the female Corinthian converts had discontinued this practice in Christian worship, thus practically claiming equality with men. Now St. Paul himself taught that ‘there can be no male and female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus’ (Gal 3. 28, written either shortly before or shortly after 1 Cor). By this he meant that salvation is offered to all alike, all are alike in spiritual position; but these women had taken such teaching to mean that all social subordination to men was also done away. But just as in the case of slavery (see on 7. 21), Christianity did not come to abolish existing social conditions. It has done much to improve the condition of women, but has done so gradually. And when all is said, there remains a natural subordination of women to men; and the conduct of these women in the prevailing circumstances of the age was likely to bring reproach on Christianity.

St. Paul first lays down the principle of subordination. He then speaks of the unseemliness of the practice in question, and of its converse, namely, men covering their heads; and shows how this matter comes under the above principle, while women are not degraded by this subordination. He next uses corroboratory arguments from nature, and finally appeals to the practice of all other Churches.
Paraphrase. '3 Every man is subordinate to Christ; woman, on the other hand, is subordinate to man, just as Christ is subordinate to God. '4 Now, on this principle, if necessary, if any man were to worship with covered head he would disgrace himself, because the covered head is the symbol of inferior position. '5 In the same way every woman who worships without her veil, thus violating the custom among women of good character, acts discreditably and brings shame upon herself. '6 Indeed, she might as well have her hair cut short; and she knows the shame attaching to that. '7 The man, therefore, as receiving his authority directly from God, ought to keep his head uncovered in worship; whereas the woman should veil her head as the sign that her authority is derived from man. '10 And this is the more necessary when we remember that the angels are witnesses of Christian worship. '11, '12 But, after all, in the Christian life man and woman are dependent upon each other, just as they are in natural life, and in all things they are dependent upon God. '13 Now, just say yourselves if it is seemly for a woman to worship unveiled. Why, even nature, by giving her long hair for a natural veil, asserts the contrary. '16 But if any one is still unconvinced, let me say, once for all, that this practice of the unveiling of women is unknown to us and to the Churches of God.'

3. The head of every man is Christ] as the Son of man, the second Adam; and so the head of all men: cp. Eph 4:12. The head of the woman] cp. Eph 5:22,23. Woman was socially subordinate to man, and this was to be recognised in her behaviour at public worship. The head of Christ is God] He is subordinate to the Father (a) in His humanity, His mediatorial work, (b) as deriving His nature from the Father: see on 3:20. 4. Propheuing] i.e. uttering a revelation of God's will. Dishonoureth his head] because he is wearing the mark of dependence. 5. Dishonoureth her head] through not wearing the symbol of dependence. As if she were shaved] i.e. it is as shameful as if her hair were cut off. 6. Be shorn] be like men in this also. A shame] it was the punishment of an adulteress. 7. Image and glory of God] displaying most fully the divine perfections (Gn 1:26). The woman is the glory of the man] The meaning is that while man's authority is derived directly from God, woman's authority is derived from man. She thus receives not immediate but reflected light, so to speak. 8, 9. Of the man . . . for the man] cp. Gn 2:18-23. 10. Power] RV 'a sign of authority,' i.e. that she is under authority.

Because of the angels] The angels were conceived to be present as witnesses of and sharers in Christian worship. The recollection of this should make the worshippers more reverential: cp. 'With angels and archangels we laud and magnify thy glorious name,' 11, 12. See outline. 14. Nature] i.e. the natural order of things, and man's sense of its fitness. For such guidance, cp. Ro 2:14.

15. The argument is that God, by providing woman with a natural veil, has taught that she ought to cover her head before Him.

16. Contentious] argumentative; not open to conviction. No such custom] i.e. that women should be unveiled. For similar appeal to the example of other Churches, see on 4:17 7:17 14:28-30: cp. with the whole passage vvs. 3-16, Eph 5:22-24 1 Tim 2:8-15.

17-34. (d) THE PROPER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER

Like other societies and guilds in Greek cities, the early Christians used to have a common meal, to which all contributed according to their power, the rich helping their poorer brethren. Being thus a token of brotherly love and Christian fellowship, it was called a 'Love Feast' (Gk. agape, see Jude v. 12 RV). In the earliest times the Eucharist was connected with it, as at the institution of the Lord's Supper, from which perhaps this feast was copied. But later on, perhaps in consequence of such disorders as those here mentioned, the two were separated, the Eucharist being held in the morning, the Love Feast in the evening; and the latter gradually died out. Here the two are clearly united, and it is not clear whether 'the Lord's Supper' means the whole feast or the memorial service preceding or following the 'Love Feast.'

This feast had been greatly abused by the selfishness and individualism so prevalent at Corinth. Each individual or small clique began at once to consume the food and wine brought by themselves without waiting for the whole community to assemble, and without letting the poorer brethren share with them. What ought to have been an evidence of brotherly love had become an exhibition of selfish greed; and under these circumstances it was impossible to have an orderly and reverent administration of Holy Communion. See also art. 'The Church in the Apostolic Age.'

St. Paul in this passage denounces this conduct (vvs. 17-19). He blames them for the divisions and abuses which desecrated their religious meetings, and shows (vvs. 20-22) how this spirit is fatal to the proper observance of the Lord's Supper. He reminds them of the institution and meaning of the Eucharist (vvs. 23-26), of the need of partaking in a right spirit, and the sin and penalty of doing otherwise (vvs. 27-32). He concludes (vvs. 33, 34) with practical recommendations, which he will supplement when he comes.
17-34. Paraphrase. 'I wrote of praising you for keeping my ordinances, but I cannot praise you with regard to your Church meetings, which, as now conducted, do you more harm than good. (18) First I hear of there being factions among you there, and I think there must be some truth in the report. (19) The existence of such parties serves, at all events, to make known true Christians. (20) But the result of this factious spirit is that in your meetings there is no proper observance of the Lord's Supper; (21) each cares only for himself; some get too little, some too much. (22) Cannot you satisfy your hunger at home? Do you dare to treat with contempt the Church of God and your poorer brethren? (23-25) Call to mind what I taught you, as myself received it from the Lord, about the most solemn institution of this Sacrament. (26) The observance of it is a constant proclamation of the Lord's death for man till His return; (27) to partake of it unworthily is to be guilty of insult to the Lord's Body and Blood offered for us. (28) Let every one, then, first examine his motives for coming. (29) Any one not realising the presence of the Lord's Body in this Sacrament brings a judgment on himself, (30) hence the prevalence of sickness and death among you. (31, 32) If we would but judge ourselves, we should not be so judged; but this judgment is the Lord's chastening, to save us from final condemnation with the world. (33) Therefore avoid this greedy selfishness, (34) and satisfy your appetite at home, that your meetings may not bring down a judgment upon you. Other matters I will settle when I come.'

17. The Apostle had praised them (v. 2) for keeping his instructions; and had gone on to instruct them further regarding the veiling of women, a subject he had probably not needed to mention before. He now tells them that his praise is qualified. In this] RV 'in giving you this charge.' Ye come together] for Church meetings. Not for the better] which ought to be the result of all religious meetings. 18. In the church] i.e. as always in the NT., not the building, but the assembly; RM 'in congregation.' Divisions] or, 'schisms,' lit. 'split.' They split up at their meeting into different sets.

19. There must be also heresies] cp. Mt 18:17. 'It must needs be that offences come,' i.e. owing to human weakness and sinfulness.

Heresies] RM 'factions,' cp. Ga 5:20. The word (lit. 'choice,' then 'chosen opinions,' or 'a party holding opinions of their own') is repeatedly used of the sects of the Jews. That they which are approved, etc.] i.e. these parties 'are a magnet attracting unsound and unsettled minds, and leaving genuine believers to stand out approved by their constancy' (Findlay).

20. This is not to eat] RV 'it is not possible to eat.' Their selfishness (v. 21) was fatal to the proper spirit of devotion and brotherly love; it became no more than an ordinary meal. The Lord's supper] This name occurs only here in the NT.; it is uncertain whether it refers here to the Eucharist alone, or to the whole supper, or Love Feast. 21. Every one taketh, etc.] corrected, v. 33. See introductory remarks on vv. 17-34. 22. Have ye not houses] cp. v. 34. Despise ye the church of God] i.e. by thinking only of yourselves, and not of the welfare of the whole household of God. Them that have not (RV 'nothing')] i.e. the poor, who have no food to bring. I praise you not] cp. v. 2. They had not kept this tradition he had delivered them.

23. I have received of the Lord] It is doubtful whether this must mean 'by direct revelation,' or whether it may be 'through instruction from others': cp. 15:6. Probably the facts were learnt from older Christians, but their full significance was directly revealed to him by the Lord. St. Paul contrasts here the solemn circumstances of the institution of the Sacrament with the disorderly scenes accompanying its frequent celebration at Corinth.

Which also I delivered unto you] Instruction about this Sacrament formed part of St. Paul's earliest teaching to his converts. The same night in which he was betrayed] The mention of this calls to mind all the circumstances of the Passion, which we see St. Paul and his readers must have fully known, and so gives force to His last command. The account here of the Institution of the Eucharist agrees closely with that given by St. Luke, who may have been familiar with the words St. Paul used when consecrating; and differs slightly from the accounts of St. Matthew and St. Mark. The one phrase found only here is, 'This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.' 24. Take, eat] RV omits. In the MSS which have this reading the copyists probably supplied it from St. Matthew's Gospel, for the sake of securing uniformity in the accounts of the institution.

Is broken for you] RV 'is for you.' St. Luke says, 'which is given for you.' This do in remembrance of me] So Lk, not Mt, Mk. This do] i.e. all that was done then—Take, bless, break, distribute, eat. In remembrance of me] or, 'as a memorial of Me' and of My atoning death (v. 26)—one great aspect of the Eucharist. 25. When he had supped] RV 'after supper.' The bread was taken and distributed by our Lord during the Passover feast: cp. Mt 26:20; the cup was given at the close of the feast, and may have been the ordinary cup of thanksgiving taken at the conclusion of the Passover feast, set apart by Christ to this special purpose henceforth. This cup is the new testament] (RV 'covenant') in my blood] So Lk, Mt, Mk, 'this is my blood of the covenant.' Christ's Blood establishes a new covenant between God and man, one of forgiveness and grace: cp. Heb 8:10-18; 9:16. The cup is a seal or assurance of our being included within this covenant. 26. Ye do show the Lord's death] The celebration is 'a living sermon.'

27. Eat . . . and drink] RV 'eat . . . or drink.' This suggests a possible interval between the two: see on v. 25. Unworthy] i.e. carelessly, irreverently, as if an ordinary meal, regardless of its sacred meaning. Guilty of the body and blood] i.e. he sins against them; by insulting the Sign, he insults the thing signified. 28. Let a man examine (RV 'prove') himself] i.e. see that he understands the sacrament, and is in a fit moral condition to receive it. Unworthy] RV omits here, and for not discerning reads, 'if he discern not the body,' i.e. if he does not realize that it is not mere bread, but the Lord's Body that is given under the symbol, and if while he partakes of the bread he does not also receive inwardly of Christ's spirit and increase in consciousness of union with Him. Damnation] RV 'judgment,' not final condemnation, but God's chastening punishment intended to bring to repentance, and so save from the final condemnation of the ungodly world (v. 32). So vv. 31, 34, where RV reads 'judgment' for 'condemnation.' 30. For this cause] Their irreverence had led God to punish them by disease and death (sleep, i.e. 'in death'). They had been visited with sickness, and St. Paul was enlightened by God to see in this the punishment of this irreverence. It is possible, however, that the words may be used in the spiritual sense, and may refer to the moral condition of the Corinthians. 31. Judge ourselves] realise our true condition. 33, 34. These vv. correct abuses described vv. 21, 22.

St. Paul regards the Eucharist as, (1) a means of communion with Christ (10:16, 17); (2) a sign of brotherhood by which all Christians are united together (10:17); (3) a memorial of Christ and of His death for man (11:24-26); and he records Christ's words which describe it as (4) the Seal of the New Covenant. From these chs. we get the phrases 'Holy Communion,' 'Lord's Table,' 'Lord's Supper.'

CHAPTERS 12-14

(c) Spiritual Gifts

In the early Church various powers, faculties, and graces were bestowed on individuals Christians by the Holy Spirit. Some of these were distinctly miraculous, such as prophecy, tongues, power to work miracles; others were less extraordinary gifts, such as teaching or wisdom; or special graces of Christian character, such as love. The Apostle does not distinguish between these classes; all alike come from the same Source, and are to be exercised for the good of all. The Corinthians were inclined to overvalue the more showy gifts, especially that of tongues. Those possessing this gift were tempted to use it for mere display; those not possessing it envied these others, and undervalued their own gifts.

St. Paul first (c. 12) shows that all these gifts come from the same Spirit, and all alike contribute to the well-being of the Church. But love (c. 13) surpasses them all; without it they are of no avail. Of these gifts, prophecy (i.e. inspired preaching, revelation of God's will) is better than tongues because it builds up the Church, and produces a better effect upon unbelievers (c. 14). But the exercise of both gifts must be so regulated that all things may be done, (a) 'to edifying'; (b) 'decently and in order.'

CHAPTER 12

(c) Spiritual Gifts

(i) Their Nature and Relations

1-3. The test of the Spirit's presence is the confession of Jesus as the Lord. It would seem that some members of the Church, carried away by their excitement when speaking in the congregation under the power of the Spirit, as they said, had called Jesus accused, as if they had been unbelievers. No such utterance, says the Apostle, can proceed from any one who speaks by the Spirit.

2. Gentiles] and so ignorant of all spiritual gifts, and requiring guidance now. 3. Wherefore] i.e. because these gifts differ from any experience you had when heathens. Calleth Jesus accused] RV 'saith, Jesus is anathema,' as unbelieving Jews would say. Jesus is the Lord] cp. Ro 10:9 (RV). This sincere confession is the essence of Christianity, and proves the presence of the Holy Spirit, the possession of a gift from Him. For a similar test cp. 1Jn 218. Prof. Stevens paraphrases thus: 'The very first thing to be understood is that the confession of Jesus Christ as Lord is the keynote of all inspired speech. The primary test of the Spirit's inspiration is: Do you acknowledge the Lordship of Christ?'

4-11. There are many gifts, but all are bestowed by one Spirit.

4, 5, 6. Spirit . . . Lord . . . God] The doctrine of the Holy Trinity is implied here. Administrations] RV 'ministrations'; ways in which the Lord is served. Operations] RV 'workings.' Which worketh all in all] i.e. who is the author and instigator of all these activities in all who possess them. 7. The gift by which the Spirit manifests His presence is given to each for the common good of all. 9. Faith] i.e. (probably) a great wonder-working. (13 Heb 11:38). 10. Prophecy] i.e. inspired utterance of God's mind; not only 'foretelling,' but 'forth-telling': see on 141. Discerning of spirits] power to recognise whether a man were a true or a false prophet. Tongues . . . interpretation] cp. intro. to c. 14. II. As he will] Notice the personality and the freedom of the Spirit.

12-31. The Church is like the human body. It consists of many members, with different functions, but all intended to promote the good of the whole. Thus there is no room for selfish display, envy of others' gifts, contempt of one's own: cp. Ro 12, 4, 5; Eph 4, 15, 16; and the Roman fables of the belly and the members.

12, 13. Steven paraphrases thus: 'The unity of those who possess the various gifts is analogous to the unity of the body; they are all one in Christ. Their baptism into Christ signifies their unity in Him, whatever their nationality or social condition.' 12. Are] i.e. constitute one body. So also is Christ] Christ is regarded here as the personality whose body is the Church. He is so closely connected with the Church that He is almost identified with it. He infuses His Spirit into it, and His Presence interpenetrates it. Every Christian is a member of Christ's body—head, hand, foot, eye, ear, or some other equally essential member.

13. Into one body] i.e. so as to become one body: cp. Eph 4. Have been all made to drink into (RV 'of') one Spirit] or, perhaps, 'been watered with one Spirit.' He has poured His gifts into us all. A warning against being envious of others' gifts, negligent of our own. Is it therefore not of the body?] RV 'it is not therefore not of the body'; it does not on this account cease to belong to it.

17. If the whole body] Just as the differences of powers and functions are a great advantage to the body, so the existence of different gifts benefits the Church. The position of each individual, his possession of this or that gift, has been ordered by God.

21. I have no need of thee] a rebuke to those who despised those not possessing their gifts. 23. Bestow more abundant honour] i.e. by clothing them. 24. No need] of clothing. Tempered . . . together] wrought all into harmony. Given more abundant honour] by implanting in men the instinct of v. 23.

25. No schism] contrast 10, 11, 18, where see note. 26. All the members suffer with it] What is true of the human body, through the nervous connexion of all its parts, should be true of the Church: cp. Ro 12.

27-31. Application. The various offices and functions in the Church, Christ's Body. These are by God's assignment; all do not possess the same gift. 27. Ye are the body of Christ] true of individual Churches, as here; set of the Church universal (Eph 1:22). Members in particular] i.e. each in his place; RV 'severally members thereof.' 28. First apostles, etc.] cp. similar list, Eph 4. 11. It is a list not so much of distinct offices as of functions and gifts, some of which may be combined in the same man. St. Paul was Apostle, prophet, teacher (Ac 13), worked miracles, and spoke with tongues (1 Cor 14).

Helps] including the original work of deacons, ministration to the poor and sick.

Governments] i.e. powers of organisation and administration, including much of the work of presbyters. Tongues are perhaps put last, because overvalued at Corinth.

30. Interpret] i.e. the tongues (v. 10).

31. Covet (RV 'desire') earnestly the best (RV 'greater') gifts] The lowest have their place, but it is right to aim at possessing the higher. And yet shew I unto you a more excellent way] RV 'a still more excellent way shew I unto you,' i.e. in which to possess and use them. To have them is good, but it is still more important to use them in a spirit of love.

CHAPTER 13

(c) Spiritual Gifts

(ii) The Most Excellent Gift of Charity

In this c. we enter into the purest atmosphere and breathe the most fragrant odours. Passing from the previous chs. with their tale of faction and scandal and shame to this passage with its description of Christian love is like passing from the enchanted ground of the 'Pilgrim's Progress' to the land of Beulah within sight of the Celestial Gate.

The Revised Version reads 'love' for charity throughout the c. The Gk. word is translated 'love' in most places of the NT., so is the corresponding verb always. The RV change (1) is desirable for consistency; (2) gives the Apostle's meaning better—love being much more than almsgiving or kindly judgment, which are now the usual meaning of 'charity'; (3) shows St. Paul and St. John are agreed in attaching the highest value to love, thus enforcing the 'great commandment of the Law' as declared by our Lord. The Gk. word translated 'charity' in AV does not exist in classical Greek. It is found first in the Septuagint. The corresponding verb means to desire the good of one whom you esteem; and the noun is appropriately applied to the spirit which seeks not its own but others' good, and sacrifices itself for others.
1-3. Great gifts (e.g. tongues, prophecy, knowledge, faith) and even good deeds are of no avail without love: cp. Mt 7:22. What a man is, is more important than what he has.

1. Tongues] the gift the Corinthians most valued. Have not charity] do not use the gift in a spirit of love. Sounding brass] i.e. merely so much noise. 2. All faith] see on 129. Remove mountains] Mt 17:20 21:21. St. Paul may have our Lord's words in mind; but it was a proverbial expression. 3. These actions would seem works of love, but may spring merely from ostentation or vainglory.

Give my body] A still greater instance of self-devotion. To be burned] Some MSS have, 'give my body that I may boast,' in self-approval.

4-7. The character and actions of Love. 4. Vaunteth not itself] does not make a display. Puffed up] i.e. conceited. 5. Seeketh not her own] i.e. her own advantage (10:33,38). Thinketh no evil] RV 'taketh not account of evil'; does not reckon up her grievances. 6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity] i.e. in hearing or telling of others' faults or follies. In (RV 'with') the truth] i.e. in the spread and victory of truth and right. 7. Bearareth] without breaking down. Believeth all things] is not suspicious; puts the best construction on things.

Endureth] without giving up.

8-13. Love is eternal. Other gifts, knowledge, prophecy, tongues serve but a temporary purpose. 'They are only means towards an end. Love remains the completion and perfection of our human being' (F. W. Robertson).

9. In part] partially, imperfectly. 11. When I was a child] an illustration of v. 10. Understood] RV felt.' 12. Through a glass] RV 'in a mirror,' seeing only a reflection, not the actual reality. Ancient mirrors were of metal (cp. Ex 33:8), often reflecting imperfectly.

Darkly] lit. 'in a riddle,' taught by hints and metaphors. Our knowledge of divine things is necessarily imperfect; much is not revealed, much only partially; we have to use earthly and human figures and language to express eternal truths. Know even as also I am known] 'Then shall I plainly know spiritual things with a knowledge like that of God' (Stevens); or, 'even as God knows me.'

15. Now abideth] Probably meaning not 'these three exist now, but finally love alone will remain'; but, 'the fact is that these three alone are eternal.' Faith (confidence in God) will continue in the next life: so will hope (expectation of future good); for that life will be one of progress not stagnation. The greatest of these is charity] RV 'love.' For love is the mainspring of faith and hope; and 'God is love.'
not simply foretell the future; he tells forth the will of God, and speaks for God as His mouthpiece.

Paraphrase. "(2-4) One who has the gift of tongues speaks only to God; he does not communicate to others the mysterious truths of which he is conscious; he cultivates only his own spiritual life. But a prophet builds up the spiritual life of the Church by his words of exhortation and encouragement. (5) I do not disparage tongues; I should like you all to possess that gift; but it is inferior to prophecy unless the speaker can interpret and so build up the Church. (6) I myself could do you no good by speaking in a tongue, unless I added interpretation and teaching. (7) The melody played upon a musical instrument cannot be recognised unless the notes are distinct; (8) the bugle-call must be clear if it is to bring men to battle. (9) Similarly, unless it is possible to understand what you say, of what value are your words? (10, 11) Every language in the world has a meaning; but the hearer must understand the speaker's language, if they are to communicate with one another. (12) Seek then for the spiritual gifts which are most useful in edifying the Church. (13) Let him who has the gift of tongues seek also the gift of interpretation, (14, 15) so that his understanding may have its part in his prayer and praise, as well as his spirit. (16, 17) How can the ordinary worshipper say "Amen" when you give thanks, if he does not understand what you say? Your thanksgiving may be earnest and heartfelt, but it is valueless for his comfort and encouragement. (18, 19) I am thankful that I am highly endowed with this gift; but I would rather in your gatherings for worship say five words that would be helpful to your spiritual life than ten thousand which no one could understand."

2. An unknown tongue] RV omits 'unknown': so throughout the c. In AV it is in italics, merely added as an explanation or interpretation. 4. Edifieth (RM 'buildeth up') himself] by conscious communion with God. 5. Except I shall speak to you] i.e. in addition to (or instead of) speaking with tongues. A rhapsoody of praise imparts little truth to others.

9. By the tongue] i.e. with your tongue, the instrument of speech. 10, 11. Kinds of voices] i.e. languages. Barbarian i.e. foreigner. 12. Excel] RV 'abound,' i.e. in these gifts. 13. Pray that he may interpret] i.e. pray for the ability to make known to others the meaning of the impッションed words in which he has poured out his spirit.

14. Is unfruitful] is of no use to myself or to any one else. 15. Bless . giving of thanks] Probably no special reference to the Eucharist. It is clear that public worship was largely at least extemporaneous. Every member who was moved to do so, contributed to the edification of the congregation, by palm, or prayer, or exhortation, or explanation: cp. v. 26.

19. In the church] i.e. at a Church assembly. St. Paul insists upon Church worship being really 'common prayer,' each worshipper joining intelligently in what is said.

20-25. Prophecy is better than 'tongues' for convincing unbelievers.

Paraphrase. "(20) Do not reason like children, but like grown men: it is only in regard to knowledge of evil that I wish you to be childlike. So do not overestimate the more pretentious gift. (21) The history of God's dealings with Israel suggests a lesson regarding the use of unintelligible speech. The warning of impending judgment was brought home to the people of Judah when they heard the strange accents of the Assyrians among them. (22) And what is suggested to us is that the utterances of those who have received this gift are a sign to attract the attention of unbelievers and warn them of the presence of the Spirit; whereas, on the other hand, prophecy makes its appeal rather to believers. (23) But if an unbeliever comes into your assembly and hears only words uttered in ecstasy without interpretation, will he not suspect you all of madness? (24, 25) Whereas if he comes in and finds you prophesying, he is likely to be impressed and converted."

21. In the law] i.e. the OT. (Isa2811,19). As God confounded the unbelieving Jews who rejected Isaiah's plain warnings as folly, by bringing upon them invaders (Assyrians) of unintelligible speech, so tongues are meant to impress unbelievers, as a sign of the existence of spiritual influences; but, as of old, many will be confirmed by them in their unbelief.

22. Tongues] were valuable to unbelievers as a sign of the Spirit's presence, but not for believers, who already were convinced of it, and who could appreciate prophecy. 23. All speak with tongues] Not necessarily all at once, but one after another, leaving space for nothing else. Unlearned] cp. v. 16; any one not understanding this gift.

24. He is convinced of all] 'His conscience is aroused and awed by this united testimony to truth' (Massie).

25. In you of a truth] 'among you indeed.'
26–33. Regulations for the exercise of the various gifts.

Paraphrase. ‘(26) Now, brethren, I hear that there is much disorder in your worship, each of you being eager to utter his psalm, or lesson, or rhapsody, or interpretation, or exhortation, and apt to interrupt the other. Let this disorder cease, and everything be done with a view to strengthening your faith and deepening your spiritual life. (27, 28) Let no more than two or three speak with tongues at any meeting, and let them speak in succession, what they say being interpreted. But if there be no one present to interpret, let them engage in silent prayer and worship. (29–31) So also with the prophets: let two or three speak in succession; and if some one be moved to speak at any time, let him who is addressing you make way. In this way, you will all get an opportunity of edifying and being edified by one another. (32, 33) The prophet who is truly inspired is to be recognised by his self-restraint; for God does not inspire men to bring disorder into the Church, but prompts them to do the things that make for peace.’

26. Every one of you] The right of taking the lead in public worship was practically unrestrained at Corinth; and the need of regulation is here made very manifest. Hath a psalm] i.e. to sing (cp. Eph 5:19); either from the O.T., or else impromptu; cp. the Magnificat, Benedictus, Nunc Dimittis. Doctrine, revelation] cp. v. 6, 12 28. 27. By two] i.e. two or, at most, three may speak in succession; if there is an interpreter. 28. Speak to himself, and to God] i.e. use this gift at home, not in public worship. 29. Let the other (RV ‘others’) judge] whether the speakers have a message from God: cp. 12 10. 30. Be revealed to another] The speaker is to conclude if he perceives another has received a sudden revelation. 31. Comforted] i.e. encouraged, exhorted. 32. The spirits of the prophet, etc.] So let none maintain he must speak, or cannot stop. 33. The author] RV ‘a God.’ Not confusion, but peace, is to His mind: cp. Ro 15:28. As in all churches of the saints] i.e. all Christian communities. This clause belongs to the whole preceding paragraph, ‘Such arrangements are in force elsewhere, and you also ought to adopt them’: cp. 11:16 417 note.

34–36. Women are not to speak in Church assemblies: cp. 11:5–16, 1 Tim 2:11–15. In 11:5 St. Paul seems to allow, provided the head be covered, what he forbids here. Either (a) on second thoughts he now forbids it altogether; or, (b) here he is thinking of public services; there, of more private gatherings: cp. Ac 18:26, where Priscilla is associated with Aquila in the teaching of Apollos. See also 16:15.

34. As also saith the law] Gn 3:16: cp. 1 Tim 2:11, 14. 35. If they will learn any thing] Perhaps some had expressed their own opinions under cover of seeking information. Their husbands] Most would be married; speaking would be still more unsuitable for the unmarried. 36. Came the word of God out from you?] RV ‘Was it from you that the word of God went forth? or came it unto you alone?’ i.e. you are neither the original nor the only Church; what are you that you diverge from the general practice and set up a standard of your own? The Apostle here falls back again on the weapon of sarcasm.

37–40. Conclusion of subject.

Paraphrase. ‘(37) To sum up, then, let those who claim to have these spiritual gifts attend to these regulations, for they express the will of the Lord. (38) But if any one refuse to learn, let him just abide in his ignorance. (39) Do not forbid the exercise of ecstatic utterance; but encourage prophecy. (40) See that above all you have all orderly and seemly worship.’

37. Spiritual] i.e. possessing spiritual gifts. Let him acknowledge] If their claim to have the Spirit is true, they will recognise the authority of these regulations. The commandments of the Lord] cp. 7:10; contrast 7:25, 40. 38. Let him be ignorant] RV ‘If any man knoweth not, he is not known,’ i.e. God does not recognise him. But perhaps the Apostle means, ‘If any man will not learn, then he must just abide in his ignorance, with all its inevitable loss’; cp. Rev 22:11. 39. Covet to prophesy] This is to be ‘earnestly desired’ (RV); tongues are merely allowed. 40. Decently] i.e. in a becoming and proper way.

The principles St. Paul keeps steadily in view are, (1) Public worship must be edifying to all; (2) it must be conducted in good order.

CHAPTER 15

(f) The Fact and the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead

Some Corinthians disbelieved in the resurrection of the dead—not, apparently, in Christ’s Resurrection, though St. Paul felt this would soon follow, but in their own future resurrection. This occasioned him to write this grand chapter, which has cheered the hearts of so many mourners, read, as the greater part of it is, at the burial of the dead. He first (vv. 1–11) repeats the historical evidence for Christ’s Resurrection, a truth taught by all Christian teachers to all their converts; then shows (vv. 12–19) that the denial of the resurrection of the dead leads logically to the denial of Christ’s Resurrection, thus overthrowing the whole Christian faith. He next (vv. 20-28) speaks of the consequences of Christ’s Resurrection; and (vv. 29-34) the influence of the hope of resurrection upon Christian life and practice.

He then throws light on the nature of the resurrection-body (vv. 35-44), by using the analogy of seed and plant, and reminding his readers of the differences now existing between various bodies. So the resurrection-body will spring from the earthly one, but be far more glorious, a spiritual body, not like Adam’s earthly body, but like Christ’s glorified one (vv. 45-49). The bodies of the living (vv. 50-52) will experience a similar change. This resurrection change is the final victory over sin and death (vv. 53-58). The Apostle’s teaching is to be distinguished from the doctrine of the immortality of the soul taught by the great heathen thinkers like Socrates and Plato. It includes that doctrine, but adds to it the doctrine of the redemption of the body (Ro 8:23); and bases the whole doctrine of the resurrection-life upon the fact that Christ is risen from the dead.

The doctrine of resurrection and future life was not clearly revealed in OT. times. Death was commonly regarded not as the end of all things, but as followed by a shadowy existence, not worth calling a life, cut off from all its joys and even from God Himself (Ps 66:8, Isa 38:18). So the rewards and punishments set before Israel in the Law were temporal ones (Dt 28). But God gradually led His people on to clearer light. (1) Their consciousness of communion with God was so strong that they felt death could not end it (Psa 73:24-26). (2) They felt a future life was required to vindicate God’s justice. Isaiah (26:19) speaks of a national resurrection (cp. Ezk 37); Daniel (12) of an individual one. The hope gradually grew stronger; in our Lord’s day the Pharisees held it to firmly, though the Sadducees denied it (2 Maccabees and the Psalms of Solomon, probably written by Pharisaeus about 45 B.C., show the prevalence of this hope). But our Lord’s Resurrection changed what was previously only partially revealed into a ‘sure and certain hope’: cp. 2 Tim 1:10. Not only did it (1) prove the truth of His claim to be the Son of God (Ro 4:4), and (2) assure men that His sacrifice had been accepted (Ro 4:25); it is (3) appealed to by St. Paul as a call to Christians, in virtue of their mystical union with Christ, to live no longer to sin, but to God (Ro 6:11, etc.); and (4) it is the pledge that we too shall rise again (here, and 2 Cor 4:14 Ro 8:11, etc.). And what we gather as to the nature of Christ’s resurrection-body (Lk 24:20) throws light upon the change in ours, which will be conformed to the body of His glory (Phil 3:21 RV). It was a real body, bearing the marks of His former ‘natural’ body (Jn 20:27); capable of receiving food (Lk 24:43), and of being recognised by those who had formerly known Him, though apparently only when He willed to be recognised: cp. Lk 24:15,16,31. Yet it could be transported mysteriously from place to place, passing even through the closed doors. St. Paul uses the analogy of plant and seed to explain the relation of the resurrection-body to the present one. We may infer that the glorified body will have some relation to the natural body, thus preserving personal identity; but will not be composed of the identical material particles of the body laid to rest; it will be free from its limitations and imperfections, a fit abode for the perfected spirit.

1-11. The historical evidence for Christ’s Resurrection. St. Paul reminds his converts of his original teaching at Corinth—how the Resurrection was one of the essentials of his gospel message. As at Athens (Ac 17:18) he preached ‘Jesus and the Resurrection,’ and their position as Christians rests upon their adherence to this truth. His great message to them was Christ’s atoning death, His burial, and His return from the grave. He mentions five separate appearances of Christ after His Resurrection, and finally mentions the Lord’s appearance to himself. He reminds them that, although unworthy to be called an Apostle on account of His former persecution of the Church, God’s grace has made him a true Apostle. And he concludes by pointing out that in the matter of proclaiming the Resurrection of Christ he and the other Apostles are at one.

2. Are saved] i.e. are in the way of salvation (see on 1:18), by faith in the crucified and risen Saviour. Keep in memory] RV ‘hold fast.’

Have believed] RV ‘believed,’ i.e. at your conversion and baptism in vain i.e. without consideration, and so without stability. I delivered . . . which I received] see on 11:22. Probably he ‘received’ the accounts of these appearances of the risen Lord on his visit to Jerusalem (Ac 9:27,28 Gal 1:18,19), when he saw Peter and James. First of all] As most important. For our sins] i.e. to atone for them.

According to the scriptures] Not by accident, but in fulfilment of God’s plan: cp. Isa 53 Lk 24:44-46. 4. Buried] This proves the reality of both Death and Resurrection. He was seen] RV ‘appeared to.’ Not a complete list. Mary Magdalene, e.g., and the two at Emmaus (Lk 24) are omitted. He mentions those personally known to himself, and whose authority would have weight at Corinth.

Cephas, then of the twelve] Lk 24:38-39. 6. Above five hundred brethren at once] probably on the mountain in Galilee (Mt 28:16,17). Some are fallen asleep] i.e. dead. Twenty-five years at least had elapsed. Sleep is used of death often in OT. (e.g. 1K 2:10), but Christ, by using it of those He was about to restore to life (Mt 9:24 Jn 11:11-18), and by His own Resurrection, which is the assurance of ours, has given new meaning to it, viz. not merely cessation of the work of life, but a sleep from which we shall awake to new life. 7. [James] The Lord's brother (Gal 1:19 Ac 15:14). This appearance is not mentioned in the Gospels.
15. 7 1 CORINTHIANS 15. 21

All the apostles] probably just before the Ascension, Ac 1:4.

The present passage is the oldest account of the appearances of the risen Lord, written years before any of our Gospels, and only about twenty-five years after the events, while hundreds of witnesses were still living. It is thus a most valuable piece of evidence as to the certainty of our Lord's Resurrection, which would remain firmly attested even if the authenticity of our Gospels were denied.

8. Of me also] on the road to Damascus, at his conversion (Ac 9). Born out of due time] Suddenly, without the gradual training of the rest; as inferior as an immature birth is to a mature one. 9. The least of the apostles] cp. 1 Tim 1:15-16. I am what I am] i.e. an Apostle. Not in vain] i.e. was justified by its results. His apostolic work, as well as his apostleship itself, was due to the grace of God. 11. Or they] i.e. the other Apostles; Christ's Resurrection was taught by all Christian preachers, accepted by all believers.

12-19. Denial of the resurrection of the dead logically involves the denial of Christ's Resurrection, which would overthrow the whole Christian Faith. The belief in the resurrection of the dead is bound up with the Resurrection of Christ. But His Resurrection shows that resurrection is not an impossibility, and as He is Son of man, 'the spiritual head of humanity,' His Resurrection does not stand by itself; it is man's resurrection also. The Corinthians accepted the truth of the Resurrection of Christ, and the Apostle asks them how they can logically deny the truth of the resurrection of the dead. He then proceeds to establish the truth of the resurrection of the dead by the method of indirect proof, showing the awful consequences which would result from its denial. The first of these impossible consequences is that Christ is not risen; another is that they are still unforgiven sinners, their faith being useless; a third is that the Apostles are proclaiming falsehoods; and a fourth is that their beloved dead are hopelessly lost to them. He concludes, therefore, that if their hope in Christ has reference only to the present life they are in a pitiable state, for they are cherishing a mere delusion, if there be no truth in the resurrection of the dead.

12. How say some among you, etc.] Their unbelief probably sprang from the philosophical idea that the matter was essentially evil, so that the soul would be better off when set free from the body; thus the doctrine of the Resurrection was to them a needless difficulty: cp. also 2 Tim 2:17. The Corinthians, however, accepted the Resurrection of Christ as a fact, and the Apostle argues that they cannot logically deny the fact of the resurrection of the dead, as Christ's Resurrection is a particular case of it. 13. Then is Christ not risen? For if a thing be altogether impossible, there cannot be even one instance of it. In this and the following vv. (see summary) the Apostle shows the logical consequences of disbelief in the resurrection, or, rather, the consequences that would follow were there no resurrection. These consequences, he concludes, are unthinkable or absurd, and, therefore, he argues that the promises which produce them are false.

14. Vain] i.e. there is nothing in it.

15. False witnesses] not merely empty talkers, but positive liars. No thoughtless sceptic now-a-days regards the Apostles as impostors. Their character, as well as their sufferings, forbids this; but he would say they were victims of a mistake—merely imagined they saw the risen Lord. But the idea of 'this never enters St. Paul's mind; it was to him perfectly impossible that they could have been mistaken.' Yet in your sins] not justified from them (Ro 2:29); unforgiven, unrenewed. 'Christ's Resurrection is the seal of our justification and the spring of our sanctification' (Findlay). If there be no resurrection, of what avail are forgiveness and salvation? 18. They also which are fallen asleep] The Apostle here argues from the natural affections of the human heart. It is impossible to believe that those who died in faith in Christ perished utterly. The inference is: 'But we are sure these things are not so; therefore Christ has risen; therefore the resurrection is possible.' He argues from Christian experience. 19. If in this life only we have hope in Christ] If our hope in Him does not reach beyond this life, we are most miserable (RV 'pitiable'), because the hope of future joy and blessing which inspires our toils and sufferings is a mere delusion.

20-28. The fact and the consequences of Christ's Resurrection. Christ is risen as the firstfruits of those who sleep. As death came on all through Adam, so resurrection-life will come to all through Him. But this will only be at His coming, which will be followed by His handing over the Mediatorial Kingdom to the Father, now that all things, even death itself, have been subjected to Him.

20. The firstfruits] The first sheaf accepted by God is a pledge of the coming harvest: cp. Lv 23:10,11. 21, 22. The Apostle, as in Bo 5, contrasts Adam, from whom by natural descent we all derive a corrupt nature, with Christ the second Adam, the Son of man, our spiritual head, by union with whom we receive spiritual life. All, all, all the first all means, of course, all mankind. The second may mean the same, in which case shall be made alive simply refers to resurrection, whether to life or to judgment (Jn 5:28, 29; cp. Dan 12:2 Ac 24:15). But perhaps more probably it means only, all those who are Christ’s (v. 23), shall enjoy the resurrection of life. Cp. v. 23, Christ the firstfruits: then they that are Christ’s.

23. In his own order] i.e. rank, or place. Christ comes first, the rest long after.

24. Then cometh the end] Christ’s Advent and the Resurrection conclude this dispensation. When he shall have delivered up the kingdom] The purpose of the Incarnation will have been accomplished; Christ will have recovered for His Father the dominion over all things. This is no ceasing of Christ’s rule, but the inauguration of God’s eternal kingdom (Findlay). All rule] i.e. every opposing power. 25. He must reign] according to prophecy (Ps 110:1). 26. The last enemy] The first enemy of Christ and of Christians is the devil, who was conquered by Christ on the Cross; the second is sin, which through the grace of Christ is conquered by Christians in this life; the third is death, which, as the last of all, will be conquered at the Resurrection] (quoted by Sadler). 27. For he (God) hath put all things under his (Christ’s) feet] cp. Ps 8:6 Heb 2:8 Phil 2:11. The Father has bestowed upon Him as Son of man dominion over the whole universe. When he saith, etc.] RM when he shall have said, All things are put in subjection (evidently excepting him that did subject all things unto him), when, I say, all things, etc.; i.e. when Christ announces His complete victory, which is no infringement of God’s sovereignty. 28. Then shall the Son also himself be subject] see on v. 24. The Son will continue to be subordinate to the Father, as now. This is involved in the very idea of Sonship: cp. 3:20 11:3. That God may be all in all] The universe, with all it comprises, will wholly answer to God’s will and reflect His mind.

29-34. The practical effects of the doctrine of the Resurrection. The Resurrection alone gives an adequate motive for (a) baptism for the dead; (b) running risk of death in Christian work; or indeed (c) abstaining from a life of self-indulgence.

29. Baptized for the dead] a very obscure allusion. There was somewhat later a practice, among certain sects of vicarious baptism; when a man died unbaptised, a friend would receive baptism in his stead. This may have already existed and be meant here. St. Paul mentions ‘baptism for the dead,’ without expressing his approval; but some think the practice sprang up later from a perversion of this passage. Two other views seem possible. (1) That of St. Chrysostom: ‘Before baptism we confess our faith in the resurrection of the dead, and are baptised in hope of this resurrection.’ (2) That of Godet, who regards the baptism as the baptism of suffering, the baptism with which those were baptised who have by martyrdom entered the Church invisible. But it can scarcely be denied that, as Dr. Dods says, the plain meaning of the words seems to point to a vicarious baptism, in which a living friend received baptism for a person who had died without baptism.

31. By your rejoicing] RV ‘by that glorying in you,’ i.e. as surely as I am proud of you: cp. 1 Th 2:19, 20. I die daily] am daily in danger of death, and my daily sufferings must end in it: cp. 2 Cor 11:32. 32. After the manner of men] i.e. from ordinary human motives, for applause or money; and with no hope of reward in the resurrection life. I have fought with beasts] probably a strong metaphor (cp. 4:9) for some plot of the Jews or attack of the mob. His Roman citizenship and influential friends (Ac 19:31) would have saved him from actually having to fight wild beasts in the theatre; and this, if it had really happened, would probably have been specially mentioned (2 Cor 11:24).

31, 32. If the dead rise not] RV takes this with the next sentence. Let us eat and drink] Isa 22:13. The natural though not the necessary consequence of disbelief in a future life is to care only for self-gratification.

33, 34. Do not associate with those who deny this vital truth. You are in great danger of being corrupted by them. Be aroused to a sense of your condition, and cease from sin. I trust that my words will shame you out of your folly.

33. Evil communications] RV ‘evil company,’ a quotation from a Greek poet, Menander, warning the Corinthians against the influence of heathen ideas about the future life. The line had probably in St. Paul’s day become a proverb, as it is still. 34. Some have not the knowledge of God] hence both unbelief in resurrection, and low moral tone. To your shame] i.e. to shame you; for you ought to surpass the heathen.

35-44. The nature of the Resurrection and the Resurrection body. St. Paul here uses several illustrations of (a) the possibility (b) the nature of the resurrection change. The seed sown in the ground decays, but gives birth to a new plant. So from the body laid in the grave a nobler one will arise. There are in the world many varieties of animal life, each suited to its surroundings, and, moreover, bodies of heavenly beings as well as earthly far more glorious than they. Moreover, sun, moon, and various stars have different degrees of brightness. So our resurrection body will be far more glorious, adapted to its surroundings. Our body sown in corruption, dishonour, weakness—a mere natural body—will be raised in incorruption, honour, power—a spiritual body: see intro. to this c. 36. Thou fool] RV 'thou foolish one.' The Apostle is somewhat impatient of objections to his doctrine of the Resurrection, which the analogies of nature readily refute. That which i.e. the seed which. Is not quickened, except it die] cp. Jn 12:24. In nature, death leads to higher life. 37. Not that body that shall be, but bare (RV 'a bare') grain] The actual seed sown does not reappear, but something higher, a complete plant, springs from it. 38. His own body] RV 'a body of its own,' i.e. a plant of the same kind as the seed.

39. There are many different forms of animal life; so there may be of human life. 40. Celestial bodies] probably this refers to angels, not to sun and moon, etc. But this leads him in the next v. to speak of degrees of glory. Bodies terrestrial] i.e. creatures of the earth. 41. One star differeth] The primary meaning is the literal one. Some stars are brighter than others. There are great differences between things of the same class; so also between the natural and the spiritual body.

44. A natural body] (cp. 2:14, 'the natural man') endowed with natural life and fitted for an earthly existence. The spiritual body will be filled with spiritual life and adapted for a spiritual existence. The word 'natural' is literally 'soulish,' and suggests the possession of an ordinary human personality; while the word 'spiritual' suggests a relation to the divine. Man possesses the spiritual life through his union with Christ, and the Apostle asserts that there is a spiritual body fitted for the requirements of this spiritual life, and that he will come into possession of it in the resurrection life.

45-49. Our bodies will be like Christ's, no longer like Adam's. Adam, made from the earth, became 'a living soul'; Christ, who is from heaven, is constituted a life-giving Spirit. We belong to both, and so share the nature of both; we have borne the image of the earthly man, we shall bear that of the heavenly Man.

45. Was made a living soul] (Gn 2:7). Life was given to him, while Christ is the Giver of life. The last Adam was made] RV 'became' (i.e. at His Resurrection). A quickening (RV 'life-giving') spirit bestowing resurrection as well as spiritual life: cp. Jn 5:21-29 11:25, 26. The last Adam] the new head of the human race: cp. vv. 21, 22, Ro 5. 47. Of the earth, earthly] hence subject to decay and death: cp. Gn 3:19, 'out of it' (the ground) 'wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.' From heaven] and so, spiritual and eternal. 49. Have borne the image] i.e. have been made like. Our present body is like Adam's, but it will be conformed to the body of Christ's glory (Phil 3:21).

50-53. The necessity of this change, in which the living will share. Our earthly perishable nature cannot take possession of God's imperishable kingdom. All men will not pass through death, but all alike will be instantaneously transformed. Our mortal nature must clothe itself with immortality.

50. Flesh and blood] i.e. human nature in its present material and perishable condition. Inherit] take possession of; have rightful entrance upon. The argument is, that such a spiritual body as he has been speaking of is absolutely necessary in the kingdom of God. 51. Not all sleep] for some will be living when Christ comes again. 52. At the last trump] cp. Mt 24:31; 1 Th 4:16—a signal which all will hear: cp. also Ex 19:18. We] i.e. those still living; the quick.

Shall be changed] The Apostle hoped Christ would return in his lifetime. 53. This mortal (body) must put on immortality] cp. 2 Cor 5:1-10.

54-58. The Resurrection is the final triumph over sin and death. When this glorious body has been received, then will be the end of death and the grave. Sin, too, shall have disappeared, and the Law will be no longer necessary. Over all God gives us the victory through Christ. Let us therefore praise Him, and seek to abound in His work, which is not in vain if done in Christ.

54. 55. Death is swallowed up, etc.] Isa 25:8. O death, where is thy sting, etc.] from Hos 13:14. 56. The sting of death is sin] which brought death into the world (Ro 5:12), and gives it its bitterness: cp. Heb 2:14, 15. And the strength of sin is the law] which reveals sin and, indeed, 'intensiﬁes its power,' without giving power to overcome it (Ro 7:7-8 8:2). But God giveth us the victory over sin now (Ro 8:1,2), and hereafter over death (Ro 8:11).

Through our Lord] because Christ has overcome sin, and through faith in Him we, inspired by His Spirit, overcome it also.

58. Unmovable] not shaken by false teaching. Not in vain] contrast vv. 16–19. In the Lord] Christ is regarded as the atmosphere, so to speak, in which their work is done. It is inspired by Him and done for His sake: cp. 91.

CHAPTER 16

THE COLLECTION. PERSONAL MESSAGES AND CONCLUSION

The Apostle in this c. instructs the Corinthians to make a collection for the poor Christians in Judea, intimates his intention of visiting them at an early date by way of Macedonia, and concludes with kind messages of brotherly love. In v. 8 he mentions his intention to stay in Ephesus till Pentecost. He probably stayed much longer, owing to the troubles that arose in Corinth; for in our Second Epistle (2 Cor. 9:4) he speaks of the collection which he here appoints to be made, being ready a year ago. Meanwhile he had probably made the Corinthians a short visit by sea from Ephesus, and returned disappointed. He finally visited them by way of Macedonia, according to his original intention, announced in this c. after their repentance. On the whole circumstances see Intro. to 2 Cor.

(p) 16:14. THE COLLECTION

The collection for the Church in Jerusalem was made at St. Paul's request by all the Churches he had founded in the Gentile world, as we learn from his letters and from the list of delegates sent by these Churches to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). The Church in Jerusalem included many poor (Acts 6:1), and the Gentile Churches were enabled to show alike their gratitude to and their sympathy with the Mother-Church by material aid from their more ample resources.

To the churches of Galatia] either by messenger, or by a letter not preserved; not in our Epistle to the Galatians. The Churches of Galatia were those he had established in Pisidian Antiok, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra: see Acts 13:14-14:28. 2. The first day of the week] viz. Sunday, already the day for Christian assemblies (Acts 20:7); a fit time for an act of Christian love. This v. is the great scriptural justification of the weekly offering.

That there be no gatherings (R.V. 'that no collections be made') when I come] i.e. that it may be all your own doing, not mine. 3. By your letters] of commendation to the Christians at Jerusalem: cp. 2 Cor. 3. Delegates would go from Corinth to avoid all suspicion of misappropriation of the money (2 Cor. 8:19-21).

(h) 16:1-24. PERSONAL MESSAGES AND CONCLUSION

5. I do pass through Macedonia] i.e. this is my present intention. His original plan had been to go direct to Corinth (2 Cor. 11:15, 16), but only for a passing visit. 6. Yes, and winter] R.V. 'or even winter.' He stayed three months in Greece (Acts 20:4), when at length he carried out his plan. Bring me on my journey] cp. Rom 15:24 Tit. 3:12. 8. Pentecost] one of the three great Jewish feasts, associated under Christianity with the descent of the Holy Spirit. 9. A great door and effectual is opened] cp. 2 Cor. 12:12 Col. 4:3 Rev. 3:8. 'I have good openings, and must make full use of them.' Many adversaries] Acts 19:19, also 19:22.

10. If Timothy (R.V. 'Timothy's') come] cp. 4:17. It is not quite certain whether or not he reached Corinth: see Intro. to 2 Cor. He was young (cp. 1 Tim. 4:12), and seems to have been timid. 11. With the brethren] the bearers of this letter. 12. Apollos] Perhaps the Corinthians had asked that he might visit them. His refusal may have arisen from fear of rekindling the party feeling at Corinth. 13, 14. These vv. sum up the practical teaching of the Epistle. They needed to avoid carelessness, fickleness, and moral feehenseness, and to cultivate a spirit of Christian love. 15. The house of Stephanas] baptised by the Apostle himself (1:16).

The firstfruits of Achaia] There were converts at Athens (Acts 17:34), therefore Achaia must be used in the narrower sense of Southern Greece; or else these were the firstfruits as a household. Addicted themselves to the ministry] R.V. 'have set themselves to minister.'

16. Submit yourselves unto such] 'esteeming them highly in love for their work's sake' (1 Thes. 5:18). 17. Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus] who had probably brought the letter from the Corinthians (7:1). That which was lacking on your part they have supplied] i.e. their visit has made up for your absence. 18. And yours] for you will be glad to hear of my gladness. 19. Asia] i.e. the Roman province, of which Ephesus was the capital—the western part of Asia Minor or Turkey in Asia: cp. Acts 19:10, 26 Rev. 1:11.

22. If any man love not the Lord] Without this love, religion is a delusion or mockery; where this love is the man cannot go far wrong. And love is shown by obedience (John 14:15). Anathema] a Gk. word, meaning 'accursed, 'cut off from God.' Maran-atha] This expression stands by itself and is not joined to anathema as in A.V. It is two Aramaic words, meaning either 'the Lord has come' (cp. 1 John 5:20), or 'our Lord cometh' (R.M.), or perhaps 'Lord, come': cp. Phil. 4:3 Rev. 22:20.

24. My love be with you all] though I have had to reprove severely, and though some prefer other leaders. In Christ Jesus] who inspires all Christian love.

For the subscription see Intro.: v. 8 shows that the Epistle was written from Ephesus.
2 CORINTHIANS

INTRODUCTION

The problems presented by the Second Epistle to the Corinthians are more numerous and complex than those of the First. In opening this Epistle we find ourselves at once in a different atmosphere from that of the previous one. St. Paul writes in a different tone. He alludes to matters of which there is no mention in the earlier letter. He indicates that a momentous crisis in the relations between himself and the Church has been safely passed. And in reconstructing the situation for ourselves we have nothing but hints and allusions and references to past events in the letter itself to guide us. The difficulties, however, largely disappear if we assume what is regarded by many scholars as proved, viz. that chs. 10–13 were a letter written some time after 1 Cor., and that chs. 1–9 were a third letter written when the Apostle learned the effect produced by chs. 10–13 in the Corinthian Church.

1. Events between the First and Second Epistles.

(a) The reception of the First Epistle at Corinth. As was mentioned in the Intro. to the First Epistle, when the Apostle heard of the irregularities in doctrine and morals that had arisen in the Church, he announced that Timothy would visit Corinth after he had performed the work entrusted to him in Macedonia, to bring them into remembrance of his ways in Christ (1 Cor. 4:7 16; 10). About the same time he sent the First Epistle by the shorter sea route to Corinth, perhaps by the hands of Titus and another of his companions (12:18), to whom was also given the duty of organising the collection (1 Cor. 15:2). The mission of Timothy was in the first instance to the Churches of Macedonia, and it is uncertain whether or not he ever reached Corinth. Meanwhile the work of organising the collection, whether by Titus or by others, went on space, and such favourable reports of the success of the movement reached St. Paul, that he afterwards quoted the Corinthians to the converts of Macedonia as an example of liberality (9:3). On the completion of these arrangements Titus probably returned to St. Paul at Ephesus and reported the progress made.

(b) The increasing influence of the 'Christ' party. Very soon after these events there seems to have taken place a considerable increase in the influence of the party of Christ, which is just mentioned in the First Epistle (1 Cor. 1:12). An attempt, which for a time threatened to prove successful, was made by them to impose upon the Corinthian Church the requirements of the Jewish law, and undermine the influence of St. Paul. We gather the information about this movement, not from any direct statements on the subject, but mainly from the Apostle's defence of his apostleship, and the points on which he dwells in refuting the charges brought against him. The leaders of this party—perhaps recently arrived from Jerusalem—claimed to speak for Christ in a way in which they said that St. Paul could not speak. They were Hebrews (11:22); they called themselves apostles and ministers of Christ (11:13, 28); they taught another gospel, inculcated another spirit, preached even another Jesus (11:4). St. Paul calls them false apostles (11:12), deceitful workers (ib.), ministers of Satan (11:13). It would seem that they set up Judaism as the entrance to Christianity. They may not have insisted upon the imposition of the rite of circumcision, but they probably demanded obedience to the ceremonial law, taking their stand upon the teaching and example of Jesus Himself (e.g. Mt. 15:2), and insisting upon the maintenance of the legal standard of righteousness. They thus naturally came into conflict with St. Paul, whose doctrine of justification by faith (cp. Ro. 4, 5) seemed to them to be destructive of the Law; and perhaps being incensed at the lax morals of some of the Corinthian converts, they traced the irregularities to his teaching, and denounced him as a false apostle. Not content with this, they attributed to him vilification and cowardice (10:10), pointed to his refusal of sustenance as a proof of his lack of authority (11:7), and declared that he was afraid to exercise the power he boasted of in his letters (13:3, 10). They charged him with cheating his converts (12:14, 12), said that he was puffed up with vanity (10:14), and even called him a fool (11:16, 21, 23).

In this way these Judaizing teachers sought to discredit the Apostle. They probably attracted those who had been of the party of Peter, and those who had been of the party of Christ at an earlier date, and united them in one strong body which influenced or overawed the whole Church. They called themselves Christ's men, preached Christ as the Messiah according to the flesh, and gloried in their connexion with those who had actually seen the Lord (107 1128 121).

That they met with great success is evident from the Second Epistle. They turned the Church as a whole against St. Paul. The Corinthians received them without suspicion, listened readily to their charges, and as the result renounced their allegiance to their spiritual father (72 115.4 132.10). They submitted even to be victimised by these intruders, and allowed them to do with impunity the very things they counted wrong in St. Paul. The members of the Church were so infatuated with their new teachers that they permitted themselves to be 'brought into bondage, devoured, robbed, struck in the face' (1129). The more the new apostles demanded, the better they were pleased with them. All that St. Paul had done for them was for the time forgotten, and their allegiance transferred to the new-comers, who denounced him as no minister of Christ at all.

(c) St. Paul's brief (unrecorded) visit to Corinth.

It was not long before the news of the revolt reached St. Paul. It may be that Timothy coming south to Corinth as the Apostle indicated in the First Epistle (1 Cor 47) found the Church already in revolt, and that on attempting to deliver a message from his master he was insulted and put to silence (712. Here 'his cause that suffered wrong' may refer to Timothy). Or it may be that the Apostle heard of the state of matters in some other way, as he had heard of their contentions before writing the First Epistle (1 Cor 111). In any case, he felt that he must take prompt and resolute action, and accordingly he paid a short visit to Corinth in order to restore his authority and win the Corinthians back to their allegiance.

This visit is not recorded in the book of Acts, nor is its occurrence related in so many words in St. Paul's letters; but it is frequently referred to in 2 Corinthians and implied in several of the Apostle's statements. In 21 he distinctly alludes to a visit which he had paid to the Church 'in sorrow.' In 1214 131 he announces that he is coming to them the third time. And as the only visit recorded in the Acts or in 1 Corinthians is the visit made when founding the Church, it is obvious that a second visit must have been paid in the interval before these passages were penned. In 131 indeed he distinctly mentions this second visit, and reminds them that he told them on that occasion that if he came again and found them unrepentant he would not spare them. This visit was probably paid as soon as he received the bad news, the journey being made by sea. The Apostle's appearance at Corinth, however, had not the expected effect. The influence of the Judaizers was still supreme: an attack of the illness to which he was subjected prostrated him, and it was interpreted by his enemies as a mark of divine disfavour, and used to discredit his apostleship (127-10). He had to retire to Ephesus baffled and disheartened, having perhaps been insulted and denounced to his face in presence of the Church by some violent member (712, if the reference is not to Timothy but to himself. But see note).

(d) The visit of Titus with the 'severe' letter.

On reaching Ephesus again St. Paul wrote a letter to the recalcitrant Church, in which he sought to bring the members to a sense of their position. This letter is referred to in 28.4 78. It was written 'in much affliction with many tears'; it was stern and severe in its tone; and it was designed to make them sorry and bring them to repentance. So strong were its terms, indeed, that St. Paul for a time regretted having written it. The greater portion of this 'severe' letter, in the view of an increasing number of scholars, is preserved in chs. 10-13. This theory solves many of the problems raised by 2 Corinthians, and best explains the facts as we know them. (For reasons see below, under 2.)

The 'severe' letter was dispatched from Ephesus by the hands of Titus, who seems to have been regarded by St. Paul as better able to deal with the situation than Timothy. On receiving it the Corinthians were stung by the reproaches of conscience, and repenting of their treatment of St. Paul, cast out of the Church by a majority the man who had given offence by his attack on the Apostle or his messenger (26), and acknowledged their founder once more (711). Titus seems to have sided materially in bringing about the happy change; and, having from the outset realised the responsibility of the charge committed to him, he was overjoyed at the issue of his visit (76.7).

(e) St. Paul's meeting with Titus.

Meanwhile St. Paul left Ephesus and crossed the sea to Philippi, sailing along the coast to Troas, and thence taking ship for Europe. Troas offered him a good field for mission work (212); but, when Titus did not appear as he expected, anxiety about the Corinthians drove him onwards to meet him. At last in Macedonia (perhaps at Philippi) he encountered his messenger (218 76.6), and was relieved and gladdened by the good news he brought. In his delight at the return of the Corinthians to their faithfulness, he proceeded to carry out his purpose of visiting them as announced in the First Epistle (1 Cor 165), and first of all sent Titus back to them with a letter expressive of his relief and joy—the Second Epistle, chs. 1–9.

This plan of visiting Corinth after passing through Macedonia was ultimately carried out according to his original intention; but at one period St. Paul had in mind another plan, which he afterwards disclosed to the Corinthians. This was to cross by the direct route from Ephesus to Corinth, and from thence to visit Macedonia, returning again to Corinth on the way to Jerusalem, thus giving the Corinthians a 'double benefit' (11:15, 16). Circumstances, however, caused him to revert to his original intention, and pay the visit to Macedonia before going south to Corinth.

(f) The 'thankful' letter.

Chs. 1–9 of the Second Epistle seem to constitute the letter written by the Apostle after receiving the good news. This letter was sent by Titus, who is repeatedly referred to in it (2:13 7:6, 13, 14 8:6, 16, 23), and with him were sent other two— the brother whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches' (8:18), and 'our brother whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things' (8:22).

Besides the conveyance of the letter they were entrusted with the reorganisation of the collection for the saints at Jerusalem, which had promised well when it was begun, but had probably fallen into abeyance while the trouble lasted (9:2-5). Following in their footsteps, St. Paul soon afterwards himself arrived at Corinth to complete the reconciliation.

2. The Authenticity, Unity, and Date of the Epistle.

(a) That the Second Epistle is a genuine work of St. Paul has seldom been seriously disputed. Allusions to passages in it are found early in the second century in the letters of Polycarp, and it is quoted by the early Christian writers, Irenaeus, Athenagoras, and Clement of Alexandria. The evidence from the Epistle itself is stronger. In particular, the personal allusions and references, the details of the Apostle's life and work, the intensely earnest character of its thanksgivings and appeals, confirm its own testimony to the authorship of St. Paul.

(b) The theory that portions of more than one letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians are to be detected in the Second Epistle is supported by the following amongst other arguments:

(1) The thoughtful reader of 2 Corinthians can hardly fail to notice the remarkable change in tone between chs. 1–9 and 10–13. In chs. 1–9 the breach between St. Paul and the Corinthians seems to be completely healed. The section abounds in expressions of love and goodwill, of thanksgiving and confidence: cp. 25:10 32:7 4:7, 9, 11 8:7 9:13, 14. In chs. 10–13, on the other hand, it is evident that the breach is not yet healed. He there meets charges brought against him (10:2, 10 11:6, 7, etc.), defends his apostleship by an appeal to his work and sufferings (11:21–33), declares himself to be in no way 'behind the very chiefest apostles' (12:11), and threatens to visit them in severity and not to spare (13:2).

The circumstances to which the writer has regard in chs. 1–9 are different from those to which he looks in chs. 10–13. No explanation is so satisfactory as that which dates chs. 10–13 before, and chs. 1–9 after, the causes of strife had been removed.

(2) There are passages in chs. 1–9 which seem to refer to passages in chs. 10–13, and are best explained in the light of them. Cp. 13:2, 'If I come again, I will not spare,' with 11:23, 'To spare you I forbore to come to Corinth'; and 13:10, 'I write these things while absent, that I may not when present deal sharply,' with 2:1, 'I wrote this very thing, lest, when I came, I should have sorrow': cp. also 10:2 with 8:22, 16:6 with 29, and 11:5, 18, 23 with 31:5, 12.

(3) In chs. 1–9 there are four references to a former letter apparently severe in tone.

(a) It was written 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart with many tears' (2:4); (b) after sending it away the Apostle repented of his action (7:5); (c) in it he had commended himself 'again' (3:1 5:12); (d) the Apostle was at the time of writing the former letter meditating a visit to deal sharply with them, which, however, in mercy he did not pay (12:8 21).

These points describe the letter chs. 10–13, and apply to no other letter of the Apostle now extant; e.g. (a) and (b) cannot refer to the First Epistle, and (c) does not apply either to the First Epistle or to any passage in 2 Cor before 31, where he speaks of commending himself 'again.'

(4) Chs. 1–9 were written from Macedonia (2:13 7:5 9:25); while 10:16 indicates that the geographical position of the writer of that passage—which speaks of his hope to preach the gospel in the regions beyond them—was on the E. of Corinth rather than on the N., for we know that St. Paul's plan was to visit Rome. This suggests that chs. 10–13 were written from Ephesus, and affords another hint of identification between chs. 10–13 and the 'severe' letter of 24:75. [A full discussion of the question is given in Dr. J. H. Kennedy's 'The Second and Third Epistles to the Corinthians,' from which the above sections are mainly drawn.]

(c) The dates of the two parts of the Second Epistle remains to be fixed. According to the evidence afforded by First and Second Corinthians themselves, the latter was written about eighteen months after the former. In 1 Cor 16 St. Paul gives directions about the collection for the poor in Jerusalem, mentioning such details about the method to be adopted in gathering it as lead us to the conclusion that a beginning was now only being made with it. As the offerings were to be made weekly, and as many of the converts were poor (1 Cor 13), it is obvious that some months would have to elapse before the contributions amounted to such a sum as the Church would like to send. In 92, however, the Apostle commends them for being ready with their contribution 'a year ago': cp. 810. It therefore follows that some months more than a year separate the First Epistle from these passages in the Second. If, therefore, the First Epistle was written in the spring of 55 or 56, it follows that chs.1–9 of the Second were written in the autumn of 56 or 57. Chs. 10–13 were written in any case only a month or six weeks before chs. 1–9. That about eighteen months thus separated the First and Second Epistles is confirmed by the recollection of the number of events which took place between them. We have to allow time for the transmission of the First Epistle, for the development of the rebellion against St. Paul's authority, for the news to reach the Apostle at Ephesus, for his visit to Corinth and return, for the dispatch of the 'severe' letter by Titus, and for St. Paul's journey to Philippi. Two lines of proof thus converge upon the same conclusion.

It may be briefly mentioned here that some scholars regard the passage 614–71 as an interpolation, and hold that it is really part of the first (lost) letter of St. Paul to Corinth. The contents of the passage certainly correspond with what the Apostle tells us was contained in that lost letter (1 Cor 59); and they break the natural connexion between 613 and 73. But the case for eliminating the vv. can hardly be said to be proved.

4. Outline of the Epistle.
Chs. 1–9. The Apostle sends his salutation to the Corinthian Church, and gives thanks for the comfort which comes through suffering and for the power of sympathy it confers (111–11). He then passes to the crisis through which the Church had passed, and gives some thoughts suggested by it. He asserts the sincerity of his intentions to pay the Corinthians another visit, although he has been obliged to change his plans; and he shows that such changes of his plans as he had made, were made with a view to their benefit (112–22). He had, indeed, written them a severe letter which caused them pain; but he could not regret it because it had brought them to repentance and secured the purity of the Church, and enabled him to forgive the now penitent offender (23–18). Next he enlarges upon the joy attending the successful preaching of the gospel (214–17). He sees in his converts his true letters of commendation—even, so to speak, letters of Christ Himself, bearing His signature and witnessing to His influence (314). He remembers, indeed, the great responsibility of his work, but finds comfort in recalling the unfailing supply of strength from God; and he contrasts the old ministry of the law with the new ministry of reconciliation through Christ (35–46). The glory of the gospel reminds him of the weakness of those to whom its message is entrusted. In themselves they are feeble; but their faith prevails over all difficulties as they look, not on the seen and temporal, but on the unseen and eternal (47–18). They know too that death overtakes the mortal body, but they know that God has provided them with an immortal body, and has given them the pledge of eternal life in the gift of His indwelling Spirit (51–6).
They are therefore always faithful to the trust committed to them, being constrained by the love of Christ to plead with men to be reconciled to God and to become new creatures in Christ (5:6-21). The Apostle goes on to point to his own conduct as the proof of his claims to be a minister of God, and beseeches the Corinthians to live unspotted from the world (6:1-7:1). He appeals to them by his affection for them to be reconciled to him, and rejoices anew in their repentance (7:4-16).

The Apostle then calls their attention to the collection for the poor in Jerusalem, telling them of the example set by the Churches of Macedonia (8:1-4), enunciating the principles of Christian liberality, and reminding them of the self-sacrifice of Christ (8:10-24), and finally exhorting them to generous and cheerful giving (9:1-15).

Chs. 10-13. St. Paul defends his ministry from the attacks of enemies, and vindicates his apostleship. A charge of vacillation and cowardice had been made against him, and he assures the Corinthians that if strong measures are really necessary to bring them to a right way of thinking, he will not shrink from taking them (10:1-18). He does not wish to boast of his position in reply to his enemies, but he points out that he had maintained his independence among them, and had never been a burden to them (11:1-10). Those who speak against him and boast of their zeal are no true apostles; in spite of their talk of righteousness they are as false as their master, Satan (11:11-15). But seeing that boasting is the fashion, he also will boast—he will boast of his labours, his sufferings, his anxieties, his visions and revelations, nay, his very thorn in the flesh, in all which he rejoices for Christ’s sake (11:16-12:10).

He goes on to apologise for this boasting, and for his refusal to receive gifts from them. But he is glad he has maintained his independence, because none can say that he made his converts a source of gain (12:12-21). He finally assures them of his approaching visit, warning them that if need be he will exercise his authority, but pleading rather for their repentance and submission (c. 13).

5. Teaching of the Epistle.

(a) Chs. 1-9. (1) The teaching of this Epistle is based, like the teaching of the First Epistle, on the great thought of the union of Christ and the believer. The sufferings of St. Paul which he endures for the gospel’s sake are the sufferings of Christ (1:9), and the consolation he receives ‘aboundeth by Christ’ (1:5).

Those whom he forgives, he forgives ‘in Christ’ (2:10); and the gospel he preaches, he preaches ‘in the sight of God in Christ’ (2:17). He bears about in his body the dying of the Lord Jesus; and he is delivered unto death for Jesus’ sake, that the life also of Jesus might be manifest in his own life (4:10, 11). This union with Christ, in which he lives himself, is the union he desires for others. ‘If any man be in Christ he is a new creature’ (5:17), and they themselves are established with him in Christ (1:12).

On the basis of this doctrine he urges them to forgiveness (2:10), encourages them to perseverance (4:19), beseeches them to be reconciled to God (5:20), and exhorts them to a life of purity and holiness (7:1).

(2) A considerable portion of the letter is occupied with the collection. This collection is mentioned first in 1 Cor 16. Its purpose was to provide assistance for the poor Christians in Jerusalem, of whom there had been many from the beginning (Ac 6:1, 5). St. Paul regarded the Church at Jerusalem as the Mother-Church, and sought to interest his converts in the head-quarters of their faith. The collection also enabled the members of the Churches in Galatia (1 Cor 16:1), Macedonia (2 Cor 8:1), and Achaia, to realise their unity as members of one Church, as well as to give evidence of their sympathy with their brethren. The offerings were to be laid aside week by week upon the Lord’s Day (1 Cor 16:2), and to be finished before the Apostle arrived. At the end of the time, under his own superintendence, they were to be dispatched to Jerusalem by men chosen by the Church (1 Cor 16:3).

In exhorting the Corinthians to liberality he quotes to them the example of the Macedonian Churches, which in this matter (8:2, 3), as well as in others (Phil 4:10-17), were distinguished for generosity; and reminds them of the example of Christ (8:9), who ‘though he was rich yet for your sakes became poor.’ He urges them to give cheerfully (9:7) and liberally (9:6), according to their means (8:13, 14); not holding back through indifference or greed (8:10, 11), nor feeling compelled to give in such a way as to make the offering a burden (8:13), but presenting their gifts out of a willing mind (8:12), and remembering that they may need some help themselves in their day of necessity, which would be gladly given (8:14). And he tells them that this offering has not only a material, but also a religious value; for it causes the recipients of it to give thanks to God, recognising in it a gift from Him (9:12), and it is a powerful witness to the Christian faith and obedience of those who so freely bestow it (9:13).

(b) Chs. 10-13. These chs. are wholly occupied with St. Paul’s reply to his enemies’ attack, and are chiefly interesting for the information they give us about the doings of the troublemakers of the Church, and about the life of the Apostle himself. The former subject has already been touched upon (see I (b)); the latter may now be noticed.
mentions several incidents in his career which are not recorded in the sketch of his missionary career given in the Acts of the Apostles. He speaks of five floggings at the hands of the Jews, none of which are mentioned elsewhere. Of the three beatings with rods only one is recorded (Ac 16:22). Of the shipwrecks we know nothing, as the events recorded in Ac 27 did not occur until a later date. It was evidently on the occasion of one of these that he spent a night and a day in the deep, probably on a raft or on a wreck. He tells us also of his escape from Damascus, which is also recorded in Acts (9:25), affording confirmation of the narrative there. These incidental hints suggest the intensely interesting career which full knowledge of the Apostle’s travels would have revealed, and show us in some slight degree the privations and dangers and afflictions summed up in that phrase ‘the sufferings of Christ’ (15).

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTORY SECTION

1-11. SALUTATION AND THANKSGIVING

After the usual epistolary introduction, St. Paul makes pointed reference to a severe trouble he has lately endured, and gives thanks to God for deliverance from it.

1. By the will of God] He asserts his divine call to office in presence of opposition: cp. 1 Cor 1:1 Gal 1, and contrast Phil 31 1 Th 11, in cases where his relations to the Church were happy. Saints] A common designation of the Christian converts. It reminded them of the life to which they were consecrated at baptism. Achasia] probably used in a loose popular sense for the country around Corinth: cp. 1 Cor 12.

2. Grace . . . peace] i.e. all good wishes for spiritual blessings.

3-7. Paraphrase. ‘We give thanks to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Fount of all blessing and comfort, (4) for the comfort and courage He gives us in our trials, whereby we are enabled to comfort and encourage others. (5) For as we are brought into union with Christ by our sufferings for His sake, so are we brought into union with you by the comfort we receive from Christ. (6) And all our experiences both of trial and of comfort are for your spiritual benefit. (7) And we are confident that as ye now suffer as we did, so you will receive the blessing we received.’

5. The sufferings of Christ] Because they are met in Christ’s service and borne in Christ’s spirit: cp. Phil 3:10. 6. And whether, etc.] RV ‘But whether we be afflicted, it is for your comfort and salvation; or whether we be comforted, it is for your comfort, which worketh in the patient endurance of the same sufferings which we also suffer.’ His sufferings caused them to repent (cp. 7:7), and his joy at their repentance gave them courage to persevere.

8-11. Paraphrase. ‘For it is right, my friends, that you should know that I had to undergo very severe suffering in Ephesus, and was even at death’s door. (9) This great danger taught me that my life is in the hand of God, (10) for He saved me from the danger, as He saves me continually, (11) even while you prayed for me, that you and many might give thanks for my preservation.’

8. Pressed, etc.] RV ‘weighed down exceedingly.’ Our trouble . . . life] The nature of this trouble is not exactly known. A serious illness in Ephesus, aggravated at a critical stage by the startling news of the defection at Corinth, seems best to explain the hints and allusions in this passage. 9. The sentence of death] RV ‘the answer of death.’ When he wondered whether the issue would be life or death, his own heart answered, ‘Death.’ That we should not trust] His recovery taught him a stronger faith in God. 10. So great a death] i.e. death with the consciousness that his work in Corinth had been a failure. Doth deliver] RV ‘will deliver’: i.e. in future dangers which he already foresees.

11. You also helping by prayer] St. Paul asks the prayers of the Corinthians, and tells them that they will thus help in his recovery. The Apostle always attached great importance to the prayers of others on his behalf (Ro 15:30 1 Th 5:22 2 Th 3:1), and made a practice himself of praying for others (1 Cor 1:4 Phil 1:4 1 Th 1:2). He knows, too, that, when praying for him, the Corinthians will be furthering the work he has at heart.

DIVISION I. 112-716. THOUGHTS SUGGESTED BY THE RECENT CRISIS

(a) 112-2. THE SINCERITY OF ST. PAUL’S INTENTION TO VISIT THE CHURCH

12-16. Paraphrase. ‘The Apostle bases his expectation of receiving their prayers on the purity and sincerity of his conduct, especially in respect of his treatment of them. (13) He asserts that he writes nothing to them but what is common property, namely, that they mutually understand and glory in one another. (14) Some of them have acknowledged this all along, and he trusts that they will increasingly understand and sympathise with one another until their relations be perfected at the coming of Christ. (15) With this purpose in view he had planned at one time to make two visits to Corinth, (16) one on his way to Macedonia, and the other on his return to Asia by the same route.’

suspected of writing to individual members of the Church that he was not so satisfied with their conduct and attitude as he professed to be in his public letters. Read or acknowledge] or, perhaps, 'acknowledge and even maintain,' i.e. that he was now perfectly satisfied with them, and they with him. 14. In part] Some had been faithful all the time.

The day of the Lord Jesus] the second coming (cp. I Cor.3:18 1 Th.2:19), which the Christians believed to be at hand.

15, 16. The Apostle after his second visit to Corinth (the visit in sorrow, 21) had intended to pay another visit to Europe from Ephesus, in the course of which he would come to Corinth twice. His plan had been to sail from Ephesus to Corinth, and from there to go N. to Macedonia, then to turn and retrace his steps back to Corinth, and sail thence to Palestine in charge of the collection in time for the Passover. The Corinthians would thus have received a second benefit, i.e. two visits.

17-21. Paraphrase. When you find me now weak, it is true, my dear friends, before you had a firm faith, you might think me changeable and unsure; but I assure you solemnly, I am not changeable from my purposes. (19) You know that the Christ I preach is true and faithful, (20) for the promises of God which He brought to the world are unchangeable and sure. (21) Well, then, it is God who has appointed us to proclaim these promises (22), and has marked us for his own by the gift of his Spirit. (23) As He is steadfast in purpose, so are we His messengers. (24) For I have no desire to lord it over you, but only to help your Christian life.'

17. Lightness] RV 'fickleness.' According to the flesh] deceitfully. Two charges had been brought against the Apostle: (1) that in changing his plans he showed himself fickle, and (2) that he had said one thing while he purposed another. 18, 19. His word was not deceitful, but was as trustworthy as his gospel.

18. Yeas and nays] i.e. the use of words with a double meaning. 19. He appeals to his solemn preaching of Christ as the pledge of his sincerity. Silvanus] Silas (Ac18:4). 20. In him are yeas and ... Amen] Christ is the affirmation (the yes) and the fulfillment (the Amen) of God's promises. Amen] For the general Amen see I Cor.14:16. By us] as the instruments.

21. Paraphrase. 'Well, then, it is God who is continually strengthening the spiritual bond which unites both us and you to Christ, and who has set us apart to declare His message.'

21. The fact that St. Paul (like the Corinthians) was consecrated to God was the guarantee that he would be faithful in all his dealings with them. Stablisheth us with you in Christ] The underlying thought is that of the union of Christ and the Christian; cp. Gal.2:20 Ro.6:4, and Intro. Anointed] sacramentally set apart to office. 22. Sealed] marked us for His own. Given the earnest of the Spirit] bestowed the gift of the Spirit as the pledge and sample of all spiritual blessings to come; cp. Ro.8:23 Eph.1:14.

23. Moreover ... Corinth] Another reason for the Apostle's change of plan was consideration for their feelings. Record] RV 'witness.' To spare you] i.e. from consure. This refers to 13:2, 'If I come again, I will not spare'; chs. 10-13 being the earlier severe letter (see Intro.). Came not as yet] RV 'forbare to come.' 24. Dominion] probably refers to an accusation made by the Judaisers that St. Paul was lording it over them. By faith ye stand] A difficult phrase; perhaps it means, 'You need no master over you, for you are grounded in the faith,' or, 'Your faith is a sufficient strength, security, and support.'

C. 2. 1, 2. Continuation of explanation regarding his proposed visit.

1. Again ... in heaviness] a clear reference to a visit to Corinth, which gave him much pain, subsequent to his writing the First Epistle (see Intro.).

CHAPTER 2

(b) 2:8-18. The Object and Results of the Severe Letter

The Apostle reminds them that to produce this godly sorrow was the object of the letter he wrote before. He then speaks of one man who has caused him pain, asking them to remit the punishment inflicted already and forgive him, and telling them that he had written also to ascertain the extent of their obedience, and that if they were willing to forgive now, so was he. He then relates his anxious desire to hear what had occurred on their receipt of his letter—a desire so great that he had to push southwards to meet Titus and get the news.

3. 4. Paraphrase. 'My reason for writing sternly rather than paying another painful visit was that I wished to have happiness and not sorrow when I came. (4) I wrote the severe rebukes and exhortations with suffering and tears, not that I wished wilfully to grieve you, but that I hoped you would realise the love I bear you.'

3. I wrote] i.e. the painful letter of which chs. 10-13 of the Second Epistle are probably a portion (see Intro.). In you all] He speaks thus generously now that he has found his confidence not misplaced.

5-9. Paraphrase. 'Now with regard to the person who has been the occasion of this grief, he has grieved not me only, but to some extent (not to be too harsh) the Church. (6) And the sentence pronounced by the majority is quite sufficient punishment for him. (7) Do not inflict any further punishment, but forgive and encourage him, lest he be driven to despair. (8) Show him that you are actuated by Christian love. (9) For the main purpose of my letter has been accomplished now that you have given proof of your readiness to obey me.'

5. Any] A definite person is meant, but now that punishment has brought him to repentance the Apostle merely hints at him. The same person is indicated in 7:12, where see note. 6. Punishment] probably excommunication : cp. 1 Cor 5:4,5 (a different case). Of many] i.e. by the majority. 7. Overmuch sorrow] The offender had now realised the heinousness of his offence, and the continuance of punishment would serve no good purpose, and might even do harm. 8. Confirm your love] by restoring him to the Church.

9. The Apostle valued the act of discipline as much for the proof it afforded of the Corinthians' loyalty as for its effect upon the offender.

10-13. Paraphrase. 'I forgive any one whom you forgive; for I have no personal feeling in the matter, and it is only for your sakes that I speak of forgiveness at all, and I forgive in the spirit of Christ. (11) I forgive this man lest he be tempted by Satan to deny the faith, for we know that the adversary seeks to prevail against us. (12) I was so anxious to hear what you had done while I was engaged in successful work for Christ in Troas, (13) that I could not remain there when Titus did not come, but pushed on to Macedonia to meet him.'

10. In the person of Christ] either (1) as in His sight, or (2) as in His place, or (3) as having Christ living in me : cp. 1 Cor 2:17. 11. Get an advantage] by the man being lost to Christ, or by the estrangement of the Apostle and the Corinthians; perhaps both.

12, 13. St. Paul had gone from Ephesus to Troas on the coast of Asia Minor a short time after dispatching the severe letter to Corinth by Titus. He had expected Titus to meet him there with the news of the condition of the Church and of the way in which his letter had been received ; but not finding him he became anxious and hastened on to Macedonia, where, probably at Philippi, he met Titus bringing good news. Troas] for other visits there see Ac 16:10 20:6-12. A door was opened] the preaching of the gospel found ready acceptance.

(c) 2:14-5:21. The Glory, the Joy, the Comfort, and the Inspiration of his Ministry

(c) i. 2:14-3:6. The Apostle's True Letter of Recommendation

The return of Titus with joyful news suggests thanksgiving to God, who has made the Apostle the means of spreading abroad the gospel message. St. Paul and his fellow-workers proclaim the gospel both to those who accept and to those who reject it. To the former it is a message of life; to the latter, of death. And no one can bear such a burden of responsibility unless he preaches with a pure purpose, and under a deep sense of accountability to God.

14. Causeth us to triumph] RV 'leadeth us in triumph.' The language is suggested by the triumphal procession of a Roman general. St. Paul thinks of himself as being a willing captive in Christ's train (cp. 10:9), and as spreading abroad the knowledge of Him like the pervading scent of the incense scattered as the procession moves onward. 16. The figure of the triumphal procession is continued. 'Some of the conquered enemies were put to death when the procession reached the Capitol; to them the smell of the incense was "an odour of death unto death"; to the rest, who were spared, "an odour of life unto life"' (Conybeare and Howson's 'Life of St. Paul'). For the thought suggested in these verses cp. Jn 11:11,12 9:23 1 Pet 2:7,8 Rev 22:11. Who is sufficient] the great responsibility of the preacher. The answer to the question is suggested in v. 17.

27. Many] RV 'the many'; i.e. those Judaizing preachers of whom they had experience. These men had stirred up strife in the Church at Corinth by denying St. Paul's authority, accusing him of personal interest in the collection, and (what he resented most) impugning his doctrine. They insisted on the observance of the Jewish Law, and as St. Paul preached the gospel to the Gentiles without reference to the Law, they carried on a mission against him in the cities he visited, seeking to gain his converts over to their own narrow views and Jewish prejudices. It was a critical period for the Church both in Corinth and in other places (cp. Gal 1:6-4 3:1-4). 'The true question was no less than this: whether the Catholic Church should be dwarfed into a Jewish sect; whether the religion of spirit and of truth should be supplanted by the worship of letter and of form' (Conybeare and Howson). Corrupt] Make the gospel a means of personal gain. The opponents of St. Paul seem to have made personal profit out of the Corinthians (11:20); and at the same time to have charged the Apostle with having a personal interest in the money he was raising for the poor at Jerusalem: cp. 8:20 12:17-18.

As of God] i.e. as God's true servants. In Christ] i.e. in union with Christ. St. Paul was so entirely submissive to Christ's influence and inspired by His spirit that he spoke of Christ living in him, and of himself as living in Christ: cp. 1:21 and ref.

CHAPTER 3

This c. is closely connected with what goes before, and carries on the vindication of the Apostle's conduct. 1-6. Paraphrase. 'In speaking thus highly of my motives I am not writing a letter to commend myself, nor do I need (like these opponents of mine) letters of recommendation either to you or from you. (2) You, my converts, are my best recommendation, for I think of you with gratitude as do all who know your faith and works. (3) You are, indeed, a very letter of Christ who has used me as His amanuensis, and bear the writing of the Spirit on your hearts. (4) It is such a result of my work as I see in you that assures me that God is using me as an instrument of Christ, (5) not that I trust in my personal ability, but that I look to God for help; (6) for it is He who has given me any ability I possess to proclaim the gospel of Christ.'

1. Again] probably refers to the passages in the severe letter (chs. 10-13) in which he defended himself and stated his claims to recognition: see especially 11:23-33 12:1-13 12:16-19.

As some] The Judaising leaders had probably brought letters from Palestine and charged St. Paul with having no such recommendations. Epistles of commendation] Such Epistles were commonly used in the early Church to introduce strangers; for example see Ro 16 and Philemon, and cp. Ac 15:23-27 18:27.

2. Our epistle] i.e. of commendation. Known and read] better, known and acknowledged: the Church was an unmistakable witness to the Apostle's labours. 3. Forasmuch as ye are] omitted in RV. Ministered by us] The Apostle regards himself as the scribe of Christ who wrote Christ's words on their hearts. Not with ink, etc.] In this v. the figure is slightly changed; the writing is now that of the Spirit of God on their own hearts. It is no mere matter of paper and ink, but the work of the finger of God; it is written not like the old Law upon tables of stone, but upon living, human hearts. 4. Such trust] i.e. such confidence in you as our letters of commendation. Through Christ to Godward] my confidence is not in myself, but through Christ in God: i.e. I look to Him for strength and grace through Christ. 5. To think any thing as of ourselves] RV 'To account any thing as from ourselves.'

6. Paraphrase. 'All my power in saving men comes from God, who has given me grace to proclaim a new covenant between Himself and His people—a covenant which is not a formal legal system, but an indwelling, spiritual power, for while the old covenant could only condemn the sinner to death owing to his inability to perform its demands, the new covenant inspires to faith and life.'

Sufficiency] i.e. ability. The new testament] not the book, but, as RV, 'a new covenant'—a new arrangement made by God for man's welfare to which he must submit himself. The letter killetth, etc.] The Law sets up an external standard, which, because we are unable to attain to it, puts us out of heart and makes us despair of success; the Gospel of Christ proclaiming pardon, and bringing us under Christ's influence, calls forth our faith and love, and inspires us ever upward and onward: cp. Ro 7, 8. The spirit is contrasted with the letter. It means the inward inspiring power of the Gospel.

(c) ii. 3'-4'. THE GLORY OF THE GOSPEL

The mention of the new covenant suggests a contrast between it and the old. The Gospel is more glorious than the Law, for it is not a lifeless Law but a life-giving Spirit. Therefore its apostles are eager to proclaim it to all. Those who cling to the Law are blind to the truth. But those who receive the Gospel are changed into the likeness of Christ.

7-11. Paraphrase. 'Now if the system which could only declare the sentence of death upon sin was glorious (and glorious it was, for at its giving the very face of Moses was transfigured), (8) the system which brings life and inspiration is more glorious still. (9) I repeat, if the Law was glorious, the Gospel is far more so. (10) For the glory of the Gospel puts the glory of the Law into shadow. (11) For if the transient be glorious, how much more glorious is the permanent!'

7. The ministration of death] i.e. the Law of Moses. Engraven] Ex 32:16 34:28. The face of Moses] The transfiguration of Moses' face (Ex 34:28) is given as an example of the glory attending the giving of the Law. To be done away] The fading of the glory typified the transitoriness of the Law, which was to give place to the Gospel. 8. Rather glorious] The Gospel was more glorious than the Law because it was a message of forgiveness and not of condemnation, and because it was not a mere legal system, but an inspiring summons.

9. Ministration of righteousness] better, 'of acquittal,' in contrast to 'of condemnation.' The gospel message is one of pardon and reconciliation. 10. That excelleth] The glory of the Law is completely eclipsed by that of the Gospel, which offers forgiveness instead of condemnation. 11. That which is done away, etc.] another aspect of the truth stated in v. 10.

12-18. Paraphrase. ‘Since our hopes of the future of the gospel are so great, we speak frankly and boldly. (13) We do not seek to conceal anything as Moses concealed his face with a veil lest the people should see the glory fading from it. (14) Those who looked upon the giving of the Law did not understand that it was a temporary measure to convince them of sin; and even now their successors do not realize that it has been superseded by Christ, (15) but think that it still remains in force. (16) When, however, they receive Christ into their hearts, they will know the truth. (17) For Christ is the life-giving Spirit who leads men to the truth and sets them free from bondage. (18) And all we who have received Him, gazing as into a mirror on the glorious Personality of the Lord, are transfigured into His likeness in spirit and character in ever-increasing degrees of perfection, through the influence of the Lord who is the Spirit.’

12f. The whole of this contrast between the glory of the new and the glory of the old dispensation seems aimed at the retrograde teaching of the Judaisers in Corinth. They sought to retain the rites and restrictions of the Law, and to conceal the full truth of the Gospel which does away with the old legal system.

13. In this and the next two vv. we have a good example of St. Paul’s habit of blending the allegorical with the historical interpretation of the OT: see also Gal 4:22-31. The reference here is to Ex 34:38. Could not] RV ‘should not.’ The end of that which is abolished] i.e. the glory fading from his face. 14. Blinded] RV ‘hardened.’ The same veil] Note the quick transition from history to allegory. The veil with which Moses covered his face to keep the Israelites from seeing the glory fading is typical of the spiritual veil which keeps Jews and Judaising Christians from seeing that the Law is transitory. Done away in Christ] i.e. when they will truly come under Christ’s influence and power they will see that He has made the Law unnecessary, because they will experience the new spirit He bestows.

15. When Moses is read] i.e. when the Law is read: cp. Ac 15:31. 16. It] i.e. their heart. The Law is incomprehensible without Christ.

17. The Lord is that Spirit] RV ‘The Lord is the Spirit.’ Christ is the life-giving Spirit. There is perhaps a reference to ‘the ministration of the Spirit’ in v. 8. The Spirit is Christ’s Spirit: cp. Ac 18:2 (RV) Ro 8:29 1 Pet 1:11. What is meant is that he who turns to Christ shall receive the illuminating and quickening Spirit. Liberty [freedom from the bondage of the Law is the primary meaning; but perhaps freedom from sin is included: cp. Jn 8:31,32.

18. He who keeps the memory and the example of Christ ever before his mind’s eye, and tries to follow Him in his life, will gradually come to show in his own character and life an increasing likeness to his Lord.

CHAPTER 4

1-6. The messengers of this gospel are not afraid to proclaim it, for they preach Christ, who has revealed the glory of God.

1. 2. Paraphrase. ‘Having this glorious gospel to preach, we proclaim it boldly. (2) We have nothing to do with methods and practices which cannot bear the light (like those of your false teachers), for we neither seek to undo another’s work by unscrupulous hints and disgraceful insinuations, nor try to gain the favour of the Jewish Christians by false teaching about the relation of Christ and the Gospel to the Law of Moses. On the contrary, we proclaim the simple truth, and make our appeal to the conscience as in the sight of God.’

1. As we have received mercy] in his conversion from the blindness of Judaism. 2. The hidden things of dishonesty] i.e. the disgraceful methods of gaining adherents used by the false teachers: see on 2:17.

3-6. Paraphrase. ‘If our gospel is not understood by any, it is only by those (4) whose minds are dulled by sin. (5) For the subject of our preaching is not ourselves, but Christ. (6) As God at first created light, so has He created spiritual light in our hearts, that we might reflect His light, even the knowledge of His love revealed in Christ.’

3. Are lost] RV ‘are perishing.’ If some will not let the light of the gospel shine into their hearts, it is their own fault. 4. The God of this world] cp. Jn 12:31 14:30. Worldly men make the devil their god by serving him, and thus serving him become even more worldly. Lost the light, etc.] For the thought, cp. Mt 13:18-19. Image of God] Christ is the expression of God’s character of love and holiness. 5. Not ourselves] as do the false teachers. For Jesus’ sake] Love to Jesus is his motive in seeking to serve the Corinthians.

6. For God . . . hath shined] RV ‘Seeing it is God that said, Light shall shine out of darkness, who shined in our hearts.’ The reference is to Gn 1:3. He who gave natural light gave also spiritual light.

(13) 4:7-5:10. The Sources of the Apostle’s Comfort in the Ministry, and the Hopes that give him Courage

7-18. This glorious gospel is entrusted indeed to frail and suffering messengers, but that is in order that the glory may be given not to man but to God. Life is a continual affection and danger, but it enables the Apostle to learn how to comfort and edify the Corinthian converts, and he gladly suffers that many may learn the salvation of God and glorify His holy name, while he is upheld by the hope of the resurrection life.

7. This treasure i.e. the work of the ministry. In earthen vessels i.e. in a weakly body. Herodotus tells us that Darius Hystaspis melted his gold into earthen pots, which could be broken when it was wanted. 8. We are troubled, etc.] Images are heaped one upon another in picturesque accumulation to express the fact that, in spite of many great trials (cf. 11:26 12:10), the Apostle has grace given him to persevere.

10-12. Paraphrase. 'In suffering for Christ's sake we are drawn into close communion with Him who suffered and died on our behalf; and thus sharing His experience and 'having this mind in us which was also in Him,' we are enabled to show forth in our life the power of Christ, whose indwelling influence gives us the victory over the temptations which these trials bring. (11) Indeed, it is for this very purpose that we are constantly brought into peril and affliction; (12) and the result is that, while we suffer and draw near even to death itself, your spiritual life is strengthened by the spectacle of our spiritual victory.'

10. Bearing about, etc.] He 'dies daily.' he 'stands in jeopardy every hour' (1 Cor 15:50, 51) for Christ's cause, and thus he has learnt 'the fellowship of his sufferings' (Phil 3:10 Col 1:24). In the body] cf. 1:6 Gal 6:17.

11. Explaining and emphasising v. 10.

13-15. Paraphrase. '(13) Our faith is like that of the Psalmist, who spoke out of the depths of his inward conviction, and we speak what we verily believe. (14) For we are confident that God who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead will raise us also and unite us with you in the blessings of the resurrection life. (15) And all my experiences are a source of blessing to you, because as the grace of God enables me to overcome my difficulties, many of you are inspired by my testimony to rise to higher levels of Christian life, and to give thanks to God for so many mercies.'

13. The reference is to Ps 116:10. 14. By Jesus] RV 'with Jesus.' 15. The AV is here inaccurate. RV 'For all things are for your sakes, that the grace being multiplied through the many, may cause the thanksgiving to abound unto the glory of God.'

16-18. St. Paul goes on to speak of the things that comfort him in the presence of his trials. These are the strengthening of his spirit, the thought that the temporal is transient, and the assurance of a future life.

16. Though our outward man perish, etc.] These afflictions may weaken the body, but through them the spirit is strengthened. Experience shows us the truth of this in many cases; e.g. bodily weakness often produces beauty of character, and grey hairs bring wisdom: cf. for the thought. Jn 15:5 Heb 12:11. 17. Our light affliction, etc.] The affliction is light, and vastly outweighed by the glory which it helps to secure; seen in its true perspective, too, it is but momentary, while the glory is eternal. 18. We look not] If we look at these afflictions they will loom so large in our view as to shut out the prospect beyond; therefore we look past them. The things which are seen the material, including these afflictions. The things...not seen] the spiritual, including the results of these afflictions in character and spiritual life.

CHAPTER 5

The subject of c. 4 is continued. St. Paul has been pointing out that amid bodily weakness and decay he is encouraged by the thought that the temporal is transient, while the spiritual is eternal. He now goes on to speak more particularly of the great prospect that sustains him—the replacement of the earthly material body by an eternal heavenly one. He hopes to survive till Christ's coming and receive the heavenly body without passing through the experience of death: but, if it should be ordered otherwise, he has no fear of being left by death in the disembodied condition so repugnant to the Hebrew mind, for the eternal, spiritual body will still be given him, in which he will be presented to the Lord.

1-5. Paraphrase. 'A further reason for my courage in presence of difficulty and affliction consists in my knowledge that if my body undergo the dissolution of death, I shall be endowed by God with an imperishable heavenly body. (2) My hope, however, and desire is that while still alive and in possession of this earthly body I may simply be transformed at the coming of the Lord, (3) since, if I receive it thus, I shall not be left a disembodied spirit in the state of death. (4) Our material body is a burden under which betimes we groan; but, however we may be called to part with it, we may confidently cherish the expectation of being endued with something better in its place, i.e. we may hope to be clothed with the heavenly, resurrection body, and not left naked spirits. (5) It is for this very purpose God has wrought in us: besides, He has given us His Spirit as the pledge and instalment of the resurrection life.'

1. For] introduces an additional reason for courage. Even if his earthly tent be taken down, if his body be broken up by death, God has prepared a heavenly mansion for him, a resurrection body which is eternal. Taber-nao] rather, 'tent.' Building] contrasted with the temporary tent to which the earthly body is compared. Of God] RV 'from God.'
2 CORINTHIANS 5. 2

2. In this] i.e. in this present body. Clothed upon] St. Paul's idea was that the heavenly body would be superimposed upon the earthly one, at the same time transforming it. Conybeare and Howson render thus: 'Desiring to cover my earthly raiment with the robes of my heavenly mansion': cp. 1 Cor 15.51-54.

3. If so be, etc.] This is a parenthesis explaining clothed upon in the previous verse. AV and RV are both rather obscure: better, 'Since, once this heavenly body is assumed, we shall be in no danger of being found disembodied by death.' Naked] i.e. disembodied spirits. The shrinking of the ancients, both Jews and Greeks, from the disembodied state as they conceived it, is well known from its expressions in their literature. See, for example, the dreaminess of the spirit-world portrayed in the eleventh book of the 'Odyssey.' Burdened] by the anxiety of uncertainty. Not unclothed] The Apostle's desire was to gain the resurrection life without dying. He looked on Christ's coming as comparatively near at hand: cp. 1 Cor 4.1 Th 4.12.

5. He that hath wrought us] St. Paul here argues for immortality and the resurrection life from the instinctive longings of the human heart. God has planted these longings there; He has confirmed them by the pledge of His Spirit in conscience, aspiration, and all spiritual blessings; and He will not in the end disappoint us: cp. 'Thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption' (Ps 16.10)—

'Thou wilt not leave us in the dust:
Thou madest man, he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And Thou hast made him: Thou art just.'

(Tennyson.)

6-8. Paraphrase. 'With this hope in our hearts we are always courageous. We know that while we live in this mortal body we are away from the Lord, and that when we put off this body we shall be in His presence; (7) for we live in anticipation, not yet having realised the vision of Christ. (8) We are courageous, I repeat; and are even ready to put off this mortal body and to be at home in the presence of the Lord.'

8. Absent from the body] St. Paul here grapples with the possibility of death before the second coming of Christ. To die was 'to be with Christ which is far better' (Phil 1.23). Even death could not separate him from the love of Christ. If he did not then gain the full resurrection life, he would still be in Christ's presence. Perhaps his idea is that suggested in Rev 6.9-11.

9. Present or absent] i.e. living or dead. Accepted] RV 'well-pleasing.' 10. Appear]

RV 'be made manifest'; our conduct and character being disclosed. Receive the things] i.e. the recompense of them: cp. Mt 16.27 Rev 22.12.

(iv) 5.11-10. The Love of Christ the Apostle's Inspiration

In the recollection of this judgment the Apostle preaches. His motive is wholly unselfish. It is the love of Christ which constrains him. For the love of Christ was shown in His dying for all men in order to transform them into a new life. If any man, therefore, be in Christ, he lives a new life through the mercy of God, who has reconciled us to Himself by sending His Son to be our Saviour, and has given to His Apostles the message of reconciliation.

11-15. Paraphrase. 'Seeing, then, that we realise the awe inspired by Christ our judge, we try to convince men of our faithfulness and unselfishness: to God, indeed, our sincerity is already manifest, and also, I trust, to you in your secret thoughts. (12) Do not think that this is mere self-commendation. Look upon it rather as suggesting the answer you may make to our enemies when they try to belittle our work and boast of their external advantages. (13) For if in our enthusiasm we are mad (as they say), it is for God's glory; or, if we are sensible, it is for your benefit. (14) For the love of Christ to men is our incentive; because we are convinced that in Christ's death for the sin of all we all received power to die to sin, (15) so that we should live a new and transformed life, thinking not of our own desires, but of His will who died for us and rose again.'

11. Terror] the reverence or fear inspired by the thought that Christ is judge (v. 10).

We persuade men] i.e. of our sincerity, with a view to winning them. In your consciences] The Corinthians as a Church believed in the Apostle. 12. Glory in appearance] The false teachers boasted of external advantages (perhaps of having seen the Lord), which were no evidence of character and spiritual life.

13. Beside ourselves] His enemies declared that he was mad; probably owing to his enthusiasm and vehemence in preaching: cp. Ac 26.24.

14. The love of Christ] i.e. the love Christ has shown towards us. Judge] i.e. have come to this conclusion. One died for all] i.e. as the head and representative of the race. 'In Christ's saving death the moral transformation of all, which I may call death to sin, was included, and his saving death had this meaning and purpose; namely, that they who are quickened into a holy life in Him should not live selfishly, but should give themselves up to His service who died and rose to save them' (Stevens).
16-19. Paraphrase. ‘Since, therefore, it is holiness alone that is of importance, we, unlike our opponents, pay no attention to men’s outward appearance and circumstances; even in the case of Christ, though I once regarded Him as merely a man and a Jew, yet I look at Him in this way no longer, but rather as my Saviour and Risen Lord. (17) Whoever then knows Christ in this higher way is indeed a new man. He looks on life from a higher point of view. His ideals and aspirations have been transformed: all things are new to him. (18) And this change is due to God, who removed the barrier sin had made between Himself and us, and gave to us His Apostles the message of His saving grace. (19) And that message is this, that in Christ’s life and work we see God casting down the barrier that divided us from Him, and proclaiming forgiveness and love to all mankind: and this is the message of reconciliation which He committed to us.’

16. After the flesh] i.e. have regard to what is outward rather than to what is inward, to circumstances and position rather than to character and personality. Known Christ after the flesh] St Paul once looked for a Messiah as a Jewish conqueror, and in the light of this expectation regarded Jesus as (at best) a prophet who had made claims which he was unable to substantiate, and whose career had terminated (perhaps deservedly) at Calvary; but now he looks on Jesus in the light of His atoning death and glorious resurrection, and sees in Him the Christ of God.

17. A new creature] or, as we would say, a new man. He looks on things from a different standpoint, tries them by a different standard, because he is united to Christ in such a way that he lives always under Christ’s indwelling, purifying, and transforming influence. Are become new] A new world opens to the new man. 18. All things] i.e. all these changes. The ministry of reconciliation] the whole message of the gospel conveyed by preaching, teaching, the sacraments, and the example of Christians, assuring men of God’s love and leading them to accept the will of God as revealed in Christ as their own. 19. God was in Christ, etc.] When we see Christ teaching, healing, forgiving, comforting, and dying for men, we are to see there the expression of God’s love and deep desire. In this atoning work Christ was ‘the express image of His Person.’ Reconciling the world unto himself] The desire for reconciliation came from God.

(d) 5:20-7:1. Appeal for Purity of Life

As an ambassador of Christ St. Paul entreats them to be reconciled to God. And not only does he make this entreaty in words; he appeals to them by his life and conduct in all the varied experiences through which he has to pass. He asks them for greater affection towards himself, and reminding them of God’s promises to the pure, bids them keep themselves ‘unspotted from the world.’

20. Be ye reconciled to God] It is not God who needs to be reconciled to man, but man who needs to be reconciled to God. Made him to be sin for us] Christ had to bear not the guilt, but the burden of sin. He bore its penalty not as a punishment, but as the innocent sufferer for the guilty; feeling all its shame and horror, but free from the sense of guilt and degradation. Hence St. Paul says not, ‘He hath made Him to be a sinner,’ but ‘He hath made Him to be sin.’ The spectacle of Christ thus bearing our penalty touches the heart and conscience, and makes us respond to the love whereby He hath loved us: cp. Ro8:4.

CHAPTER 6

1, 2. Paraphrase. ‘Now it is as cooperators with God in this work that we exhort you not to make the grace of God fruitless in your life by continuing in sin. (2) For God has told us in Scripture of a time of grace and of a day of salvation; and this is that blessed time of grace and that day of salvation.’

1. Workers together with him] For the idea cp. 1 Cor3:8. In vain] i.e. by an unholy life.

2. He (i.e. God) saith] The v. is a parenthesis. The reference is to Isa49:8, God’s words of comfort to His Suffering Servant. Behold, now, etc.] This is St. Paul’s comment on the quotation. Accepted time] RV ‘acceptable time.’

3-10. Paraphrase. ‘We avoid all conduct which might bring reproach upon our ministry; (4) and try, on the contrary, to commend ourselves by acting as true ministers of God. (5) This is our aim in all the trials and persecutions we endure, (6, 7) for we seek to exhibit all the Christian graces both in our life and in our teaching. (8) Whether we are held in honour or defamed our object is the same: (9) we are looked upon as deceivers, but we remain true; we are obscure, but known by our work; we are often at death’s door, but through God’s grace we live; (10) we are cast down, but are enabled to rejoice through Christ; in our poverty we enrich many with spiritual blessings; though having nothing of ourselves we have all through Christ.'

3. Giving no offence] The main sentence beginning in v. 1 is here resumed, these words being in apposition with 'we as workers together with him.' 4. Approving ourselves] RV 'commending ourselves,' i.e. by our conduct in the various circumstances detailed.

'In much patience, etc.] The Apostle’s desire to commend himself is shown (a) in endurance of hardship and trouble (v. 4); (b) in the persecutions and dangers incidental to a missionary life (v. 5); (c) in the purity and sincerity of his Christian life (vv. 6, 7); (d) by his conduct in presence of friends and enemies (v. 8); (e) by the manner in which he met the ordinary experiences of his life (vv. 9, 10). 5. Stripes] cp. Ac 16:22 2 Cor 11:23-35, 5. Imprisonments] Ac 16:22 2 Cor 11:23. Tumults] Ac 13:30 14:5, 19 18:12 19:23.

6. By] RV 'in.' The proposition 'in' is unchanged until the last clause of v. 7, 'by the armour,' etc.

The Holy Ghost] the translation, 'in a holy spirit,' is tempting, as it brings the clause into parallelism with the others. 7. By the word of truth] i.e. in the preaching of the gospel.

By the power of God] i.e. in his exercise of all the powers entrusted to him by God. The armour of righteousness, etc.] The right-hand weapon was the sword for attack, the left the shield for defence. The Apostle's methods were fair and open, whether in attacking idolatry and vice or in defending himself against traducers. 8. As deceivers] probably refers to the charges of his opponents.

10. Making many rich] i.e. with spiritual gifts. Possessing all things] i.e. all things of value for life and character in this world and a rich inheritance in the world to come: cp. 1 Cor 3:22, 23 2 Cor 4:18-51.

11-13. The Apostle assures them of his deep affection for them before he lays upon them the strict injunctions which might prove unwelcome. 12. Ye are not straitened, etc.] i.e. there is abundant room in my heart for you, but too little hitherto in yours for me.

14-16. Paraphrase. 1. Do not become entangled in alliances of any kind with unbelievers to your spiritual hurt. There is no relation possible between holiness and sin, between light and darkness, (15) between Christ and Satan, between the true and the untrue, (16) between the worship of God and the worship of idols: for we are indeed the very temple of the living God; and it is of us that He speaks in His Word, promising to dwell in us and to commune with us, making us His peculiar people, and calling us to purify ourselves and become worthy children of our heavenly Father.'

14. Unequally yoked together with unbelievers] The ever-present and ever-pressing temptation that was and might be led into immorality through the abominable rites of idol-worship: cp. 1 Cor 5:11 6:15 8:10, 11 10:14. Unequally] better, 'incongruously.'

Belial] Here used as a synonym for the devil. The meaning of this name is doubtful. There is no trace of the worship of any god under this name. It is used in the OT. in such expressions as 'sons of Belial,' 'men of Belial,' meaning 'wicked men': 1 18:25 17:25 28:21 1 K 21:10. 16. The temple of the living God] cp. 1 Cor 10:17. Ye] RV 'we,' according to the best Gk. MSS. God hath said] i.e. in the Scriptures: see on Lv 26:12. 17. Saith the Lord] The words quoted are from Isa 52:11, freely rendered (v. 17), with echoes of other OT. passages (v. 18) like 28:7 Isa 43:6 Hos 10:1.

C. 7. i. These promises] given in 6:18-14.

CHAPTER 7

(c) 7:2-16. The Apostle's Joy in the Corinthians' Repentance

St. Paul goes on to ask them to give him their affection, and renews his assurance of purity of deed and motive. He tells them of the suspense in which he had awaited their response to this severe letter, and his joy at the return of Titus with good news. He is now glad that he vexed them by that letter—though he was inclined to regret his action for a time—because of its happy results in their attitude and conduct; and he concludes by expressing anew his affection for them, and his joy that mutual confidence has been restored.

2-4. Paraphrase. 'Give us your affection; we have done no man any injury either in influence or in character or in pocket. (3) I am not returning to this subject to blame you again, for whether I live or die I have the deepest affection for you. (4) I speak freely to you as I boast of you freely to others; I am greatly comforted, and rejoice exceedingly amid all my sufferings.'

2. Receive us] RV 'Open your hearts to us.' We have wronged...corrupted...defrauded no man] St. Paul is referring to charges that had been brought against him. For hints as to these, cp. 11:4, 7, 8, 9 12:14, 15, 17.

4. Glorying of you] i.e. boasting about you: cp. 9:2, 3.

Paraphrase. '(5) For when I came to Macedonia looking for your answer to my letter, I was troubled both by conflicts with enemies and by forebodings about you. (6) But God, who comforts those who are in trouble, comforted me by the arrival of my friend Titus. (7) Not only was I cheered by his presence, but by the comfort he communicated to me, which he had derived from your sorrow for your faults and your affection for me; so that my anxiety was transformed into joy.'

5. 'When I came to Macedonia': see Intro.
6. God, that comforteth] cp. 14.4.Titus was the bearers of the letter to the Corinthians mentioned in v. 8: see Intro. 7. The consolation wherewith, etc.] Titus was comforted by their repentance, and this comfort he passed on to St. Paul when he gave him the good news.
8. Though I did repent] The Apostle for a time feared his previous letter had been too severe. The letter was probably that of which chs. 10–13 of the Second Epistle form the chief part: see Intro. 10. Godly sorrow, etc.] The contrast is between repentance and remorse, between sorrow for sin and sorrow for its consequences: cp. St. Peter and Judas.
Repentance to salvation] cp. 'Heart-sorrow and a clear life ensuing' (Shakespeare). The sorrow of the world] i.e. grief that regrets not the sin, but the fact of being found out.
Death] Moral and spiritual ruin.
11, 12. Paraphrase. 'Your own repentance is a case in point. Yours was a godly sorrow, as the results proclaim; for it made you earnest to amend your ways, anxious to clear yourselves, indignant that you had been misled, afraid of the results of your conduct, anxious to see me, zealous for truth and justice, resolute in purifying the Church. In every respect you showed that you had no share in the offender's guilt, and no desire to shield him. (12) And this was the very purpose of that severe letter, not to secure the punishment of the offender, or to satisfy the resentment of the injured, but to cause you to recognise before God the feelings of affection and devotion with which you really regarded me.'
12. For his cause that had done the wrong for his cause that suffered wrong] The reference, of course, was obvious to the readers without particulars; but we are ignorant of some of the facts. It would seem that on the occasion of his brief visit St. Paul had been attacked and denounced by some leader of the disaffection in the Church, or else that Timothy on the occasion of his visit had been the object of vituperation; and that in either case St. Paul had insisted upon the punishment of the offender. This had now been done. The doer of the wrong here is this leader of rebellion, and the sufferer either St. Paul or Timothy. This seems the most probable solution of the problem from the knowledge we possess. Our care for you] RV 'your earnest care for us.' The reading of RV is best attested by the MSS, and is more in harmony with the train of thought in v. 11. His letter was written to let them see the real feelings they had towards him, which were concealed for the moment by their irritation.
13–16. Paraphrase. 'Now that all has ended well, I am thankful; and my joy is increased because Titus also rejoices at your attitude. (14) For all that I said to him in your praise has been justified, and I am not ashamed of my boasting; (15) and the affection of Titus for you has increased since he visited you and saw your anxiety to do well. (16) I rejoice, therefore, that I have every confidence in you.'
14. Our boasting, etc. Titus had evidently been rather despondent about the result of his mission with the letter when he started; but St. Paul had encouraged him by confident forecasts of the Corinthians' repentance.
15. With fear and trembling] not dread of punishment, but anxiety to fulfil their obedience: cp. Phil 2.12.
Division II. 81–9. The Collection for the Poor in Jerusalem
Chapter 8
(a) 81–9. The Example of Macedonia
1–5. Paraphrase. 'I wish you to know how liberally and spontaneously the Churches of Macedonia have contributed to the relief of their fellow-disciples in Jerusalem, having first of all presented themselves to God's service.'
1. Do you to wit] RV 'make known to you.' The grace of God] the inspiration to give liberally. The churches of Macedonia] i.e. Philippi, Berea, and Thessalonica, with, perhaps, others unknown to us: cp. Ac 16.12–17.14 20. 2. Their deep poverty] The Christians of Macedonia were very poor, and so their liberality was all the more marked.
3. Beyond their power . . . of themselves] Their giving was bountiful and spontaneous.
4. The RV gives a better meaning: 'Be seeking us with much intent in regard of this grace and the fellowship in the ministering to the saints.' They desired the privileges (1) of being allowed to give, and (2) of making common cause in this ministry of kindness. 4. The ministering] On the collection see Intro. 5. First gave, etc.] the best of all giving. They surrendered themselves (not their money only) to God's will first, and then to the Apostle's guidance.
6–9. Paraphrase. 'The collection prospered so well here that we asked Titus to complete this work of charity which he organised on his former visit. (7) See, therefore, that you manifest this gift in the same degree as the others in which you abound. (8) I am not laying commands upon you; I am only telling... you what has been suggested by the liberality of others in order to give you the chance of proving your sincerity. (9) But let me remind you of the great love of Christ, who divested Himself of the riches of His glory and became poor for your sakes, that by His self-denial and humility you might inherit eternal salvation.'

6. [Titus] He organised the collection after the arrival of our First Epistle, which contained instructions about it: cp. 1 Cor16:2
2 Cor 12:18. 7. This grace also] Liberality is a Christian grace as much as these others.

(b) 8:10-24. THE PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIAN LIBERALITY

The Apostle counsels them to complete their good work, tells them that the purpose of the collection is mutual sympathy and aid, and commends to their care Titus and two brethren who go with him.

10-15. Paraphrase. 'In saying this I am not laying a command upon you, for you have already manifested the spirit and practised the duty of giving this twelvemonth past. (11) Complete the offering according to your means, (12) for the willing mind is shown by gifts in accordance with your ability, and not by foolish prodigality beyond it. (13) My purpose is not to make others a burden upon you, (14) but to get you to supply what they lack, and them to supply what you lack; (15) thus acting on the principle of equality illustrated in the bestowal of the manna in bygone days, that none should have too much, and none too little.'

10. Advice or, 'opinion,' i.e. as opposed to 'command.' A command was not needed in their case: cp. 1 Cor 7:5,36. A year ago] A year had elapsed since they had first responded to the Apostle's suggestion of the collection.
11. Perform] better, 'make perfect.'
12. According to that a man hath] the true principle of Christian giving. The best commentary on it is Lk21:4. 14. Their abundance, etc.] A time might come when the relative positions of the Christians in the two cities would be reversed. 15. The reference is to Ex16:18, but the meaning is somewhat different in the two cases. There the equality is the result of a miracle; here it is the result of mutual love and generosity.

16-24. Paraphrase. The zeal of Titus on your account causes us great thankfulness to God, (17) for he did not need my suggestion, but was eager to return to you. (18) With him we send our fellow-labourer, whose work in spreading the gospel is spoken of in all the Churches, (19) and who was chosen by those of Macedonia to accompany us in charge of this gift, to promote Christ's glory and to satisfy our own desire. (20) And his presence wards off all suspicion of our motives, and silences all criticism of the manner in which we distribute the funds collected; (21) for we desire to do what is honourable both in the sight of God and in the sight of men. (22) We also send with Titus and his fellow-disciple another brother whom we have learned to trust from much experience, and who is more zealous than ever since he has heard of your enthusiasm. (23) If any one asks about Titus, speak of him as my fellow-labourer among you; or if any one asks of the other brethren, they are sent by the Churches, and show forth in their lives the love of Christ. (24) Show, therefore, to them and through them to the Churches the proof of your love and the justification of my boast of you.'

18. The brother] His identity is uncertain, but we may look for him in the list given in Ac 20:4 of those who accompanied St. Paul to Jerusalem, excluding the delegates from Asia and including St. Luke, who joined them at Troas (Ac 20:5,6). Sopater has been suggested, as he is mentioned first in that list, though the representative of the smallest Church.
19. This grace] the collection. To the glory, etc.] The Apostle keeps in view that in aiding the poor he is furthering Christ's glory.

Declaration of your ready mind] RV 'to show our readiness.' The meaning is, 'in accordance with our strongly expressed desire.' The reason of the desire is indicated in v. 20.

20. That no man, etc.] Charges of this kind had already been made against St. Paul. He replied to them in 12:17,18, which was written previous to this: see Intro. This abundance, RV 'the matter of this bounty.'

21. Providing for honest things] RV 'For we take thought for things honourable.'

22. Our brother] perhaps St. Luke, if he is not 'the brother' of v. 18. I have] RV 'he hath.'

CHAPTER 9

(c) 9:1-15. EXHORTATIONS TO GENEROUS GIVING

There is no need to write to you about the purpose and necessity of the collection, for your zeal in the matter is well known, and has been used by me as a stimulus to the Macedonians. I send our friends to you only to make sure that our boast of you has not been vain. Remember that the blessing you receive will be in proportion to your giving, and that much spiritual benefit will come both to you and to them by this interchange of sympathy.

1. The ministering] St. Paul had already written on the collection in general (1 Cor 16:14), and had sent instructions by Titus on his first visit (12:18). The saints] the Christians in Jerusalem. 2. The forwardness of your mind. RV 'your readiness.' A year ago] see on 8.10. Provoked] RV 'stirred up.'
4. We (that we say not, ye) He bids them realise how much he would be ashamed before the Macedonian delegates if they were unprepared: at the same time he suggests in passing that he is sure their own shame would not be less than his.
5. Your bounty, whereof ye had notice before] RV 'your aforesaid bounty.'
Bounty, and not...covetousness] He desired their gift to be ready before he came, that it might be evident to the delegates that they had given it of their own free-will, and did not need to have it dragged out of them through shame in his presence. 7. As he purposeth in his heart, so let him give, etc.] i.e. do not let a man give what he grudges or because he feels that he must do as the others; let the open hand correspond to the willing spirit.
8-11. Paraphrase. 'And God has power to enrich you with all earthly blessings, that ye may have sufficient for yourselves and the means of helping those who need, (9) and so experience the fulfilment of the promise of God's Word. (10) Now God, who supplies seed to the sower and bread for food, will both provide for your wants and abundantly bless your charity and make it fruitful for good; (11) for your willingness to give freely of what you have freely received will cause those to whom we bear your bounty to give thanks to God for your thoughtful love.'
8. All grace] every earthly blessing that will give them opportunity of blessing others.
That ye...may abound] The purpose of God's gifts to them is that they may share them with others: cp. for the thought 14.
9. As it is written] Ps 112.9. His righteousness remaineth] In return for his generosity, God will give him continually the disposition to be generous; the charitable man has his reward in becoming more charitable—a true spiritual blessing.
12-15. Paraphrase. 'For this charity has a twofold benefit: it supplies the needs of the brethren in Jerusalem, and it makes them give thanks and praise to God. (13) They give glory to God because they see in this bounty the proof of your obedience to Christ, and they praise Him for your generous gift to them and to others, (14) while they express in prayer their fervent longing that all blessings may be yours. (15) God be praised for this great boon, whose blessedness no tongue can tell.'
12. The exercise of the gift of charity had both a material and a religious value.
13. While by the experiment of this ministration] RV 'Seeing that through the proving of you by this ministration.' The reception of the collection would be proof to the Church in Jerusalem of the true Christianity of those who called themselves Christians in Corinth: cp. 1 Jn 4.20. 15. His unspeakable gift] The establishment of these happy relations between the Churches, each giving thanks for the others and praying for their growth in all goodness, was a blessing from God beyond the power of words to express.

(B) CHAPTERS 10-13

St. Paul's Defence of his Ministry
As explained in the Introduction, this section is regarded as part of the intermediate letter, referred to in 28.4 and 76, in which the Apostle rebuked his converts, and sought to bring them to repentance. It is, therefore, to be taken as earlier in time than chs. 1-9, which were written as the result of the Corinthians' reception of the intermediate or 'severe' letter.
Here the Apostle answers the charges of weakness and cowardice that have been brought against him, defends his preaching and his independence, points to the proofs of his apostleship in suffering and service, and finally warns them against evil and exhorts them to live a pure and holy life.

CHAPTER 10

(a) 10.1-18. Answer to the Charge of Feebleness and Cowardice
The Apostle beseeches the Corinthians to act in such a way that he will not need to resort to extreme measures on the occasion of his forthcoming visit. He points out that his purpose is to make every man's thoughts subject to the power of Christ, and that he will punish any who are rebellious when the Church as a whole shall have returned to its obedience. He goes on to say that those who have been accusing him of cowardice will soon find themselves mistaken. He will make no boast that his record cannot justify, and he will boast chiefly of his success in converting the Corinthians themselves. This was a field of labour the Apostle had made peculiarly his own; and he hoped for the assistance of the Church in carrying the gospel further west. But let them not forget that the only glorying that was safe was that which came through seeking the approval of the Lord.
1. Now I Paul] If this is not the beginning of the 'severe' letter, it is evidently the beginning of a new subject. Possibly one leaf of the MS containing this letter was lost at an early date; and this loss led to the remaining portion being attached in course of time to the longer Epistle consisting of chs. 1-9. By the meekness and gentleness of Christ] cp. Phil 2.1. He invokes

Christ's meekness to indicate the spirit in which he wishes to deal with his opponents.

In presence am base, etc.] This was their story, by which they sought to prejudice him in the eyes of the Church.

2. According to the flesh] i.e. in a worldly spirit. His enemies declared that he was one who sought his own advantage and tried to gain popularity by whatever methods seemed best at the moment. When he was at a distance, he issued commands and declared his authority over the Church; but when he came they found him a poor creature who was overset by the firmness of the Church against him.

3-5. Paraphrase. 'We live in the flesh, and are subject to its weaknesses and temptations, like others; but we are not prompted by fleshly motives, such as dread of giving offence, or desire of popularity. (4) For we fight not in our own strength, but in the strength of God, and this reliance upon Him enables us to prevail against all opposition and prejudice, however strong or deep-rooted. (5) In this strength we shatter the false reasonings and assertions of our opponents, and bring back your rebellious thoughts into obedience to Christ, while after we secure your submission, we shall certainly punish any who may still resist His will.'

4. Carnal] RV 'of the flesh.' Through God] RV 'before God.' 5. Imaginations] the false reasonings of his enemies. Every high thing] All the pride and self-satisfaction and self-delusion which made the Corinthians rebel against him. Bringing into captivity] The Apostle describes the Corinthians in a metaphor as rebels in possession of a castle (v. 4) with battlements and high towers, (v. 5) which he must attack in order to capture the defenders. 6. Disobedience] There may be some contumacious to the bitter end.

7-10. Paraphrase. 'You are too much influenced by appearances. My opponents say that I do not act as an Apostle of Christ, do they? Be sure that I am just as devoted a servant of Christ as any who assert their superiority. (8) Even if I boasted of my authority which Christ has given me, I should still be justified. (9) I write this to show that I am not seeking to terrify you by empty threats, (10) for, according to my opponents, my presence among you and my appeals were alike ineffective.'

7. Do ye look, etc.] RV 'Ye look at the things that are before your face.' As he is Christ's, even so are we.] St. Paul claims that his relation to Christ is as close as that of any of his opponents: cp. 13:24. For the Christ party see Intro. 1 (6). Some think that the leaders of this party claimed to have known Christ during His earthly life. 10. His letters] They had at this date received at least two from St. Paul, (1) that mentioned in 1 Cor 5:9, and (2) our First Epistle. His bodily presence is weak] i.e. his action is feeble when he is present. His speech contemptible] RV 'of no account'; i.e. produced no effect. Possibly the Apostle pleaded with them rather than asserted his authority. He was an eloquent speaker (Ac 14:19). 11. Will be we] RV 'are we.' 12. We dare not] RV 'we are not bold': cp. v. 2. His confidence was not based on comparison with his opponents. Not wise] RV 'without understanding.' Such a method of self-commendation is useless and foolish.

13-18. Paraphrase. 'Others may boast without reason, but we will make no boast which cannot be justified by our work—a work which includes your conversion. (14) For in claiming you as our converts we are not making too great a boast. (15) And we are not taking credit for other men's labours as our opponents are for ours, but are rather hoping that as your faith increases so also will our influence, (16) that we may be aided to preach the gospel in districts beyond your city, and not seek, as some are doing, to claim credit for success where others have laboured before us. (17) The only safe rule about boasting of success is this: He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord. (18) For self-praise is no attestation of the work that is done; that attestation is only shown when God's blessing attends and prosper it.'

13. Without our measure] outside our province. He will only boast of work done by himself, and that included preaching the gospel in Corinth. The measure of the rule, etc.] RV 'The measure of the province which God apportioned to us as a measure, to reach even unto you.' St. Paul's province was heathendom, and that included Corinth.

14. We are come] He was the first to preach Christ in Corinth. 15. Not boasting, etc.] RV 'not glorying beyond our measure, that is, in other men's labours; but having hope that as your faith groweth, we shall be magnified in you according to our province unto further abundance.' Of other men's labours] The suggestion is that his opponents do so. We shall be enlarged] As their faith increased and their Christian life became more manifest, his name would become better known, his influence would increase, and his sphere of service would be much extended, according to his rule of making a Church the starting-point for further efforts.

16. The regions beyond you] These chs. were written in Ephesus; hence this would refer to Rome, and perhaps Spain. Rome was already in his mind (Ac 19:38), and soon after this date he wrote of going to Spain.

---

CHAPTER 11

(b) 11:1-15. DEFENCE OF HIS GOSPEL AND OF HIS INDEPENDENCE

St. Paul says that he also will now boast a little, for he is as much an Apostle as those whom they prefer. If he refuses monetary support from them, it is in order to prevent these false teachers charging him with making gain of the ministry.

Paraphrase. '1. Bear with me a little if I begin to boast foolishly? Yes; do bear with me. (2) My affection for you makes me apprehensive, even as I may say that God also is apprehensive regarding you; for I have as it were betrothed you to Christ, and cannot endure that you should be unfaithful to your truth. (3) I fear lest these false teachers corrupt your minds, even as Satan with his smooth tongue corrupted Eve.'

1. In my folly Spoken in irony. They bear with others; why not with him? Possibly they had spoken of his words when with them as folly. 2. Godly jealousy lit. 'the jealousy of God.' I have espoused you] cp. Eph. 5:22-27 2 Jn. 1, 13 Rev 19:7 21:2 22:17. 3. The simplicity that is in Christ] i.e. the pure gospel that salvation is by faith in Christ alone.

4-6. Paraphrase. 'And my fear is not without reason, for you are certainly very favourably inclined towards those who bring quite a different gospel from that which I preached. (5) But if you tolerate them, you can surely tolerate me, for I venture to think that I am quite as good in every way as these very eminent apostles of yours. (6) I may know little of the art of speaking (as they say), but at least I know something of divine truth, as is abundantly clear from my work among you.'

4. He that cometh] i.e. any new arrival claiming to be an Apostle. Preacheth another Jesus] These preachers, who were hostile to St. Paul, proclaimed Jesus as a Jewish teacher who demanded strict adherence to the Law, and declared that those who become His followers must observe the rites of Judaism. This was their other gospel, which showed another spirit than that of St. Paul—the spirit of prejudice and exclusiveness. Ye might well bear] rather, 'ye bear with him nobly.' The Apostle writes ironically. 5. The very chiefest apostles] RM 'those preëminent apostles'; i.e. of course not the members of the apostolic band like St. Peter and St. John, but the false teachers to whom he is constantly referring. 6. Rude in speech] Evidently a stock charge of his enemies; cp. 10:10.

7-9. Paraphrase. 'Is it a fault in your eyes that I took nothing from you while labouring for your spiritual benefit, but gave you the gospel gratuitously? (8) I took more than their due from others to promote my mission to you, (9) and anything I wanted when among you I received not from any of you, but from the brethren who came from Macedonia. Hitherto I have been independent of your gifts, and so I intend to remain.'

7. An offence] His very independence had been used against him. For his practice cp. 1 Th. 2:9 2 Th. 3:8. 8. Other churches] especially the Philippian Church (Phil. 4:15, 16).

10-15. Paraphrase. 'I assure you, by the truth of Christ within me, that I shall permit no one to interfere with the grounds of this boast in the district of Achaia. (11) And that, too, not because I despise you and condemn your gifts, (12) but because I am determined that my opponents shall have no occasion to charge me with selfishness, but that they may show themselves as disinterested as I am. (13) For they are really hypocrites and deceivers, pretending to be apostles of Christ. (14) Their master, Satan, is accustomed to masquerade as an angel to further his base designs. (15) We cannot wonder, therefore, if his servants pretend to be servants of God; but their punishment shall be suited to their actions.'

10. As the truth of Christ is in me] an adjuration calculated to impress them: cp. Ro. 9:1. This boasting] of preaching the gospel without cistem to them. 11. Because I love you not?] This was the reason his enemies gave for his independence of the Corinthians. God knoweth that I love you. 12. That wherein they glory, they may be found even as we] The 'false apostles,' or Judaizers, received support (v. 20) as due to their apostleship. Had St. Paul done so they would have charged him with greed; but he is determined not to give them the opportunity. And by refusing support he hopes to force them to refuse it also, and thus to cause their other charge—that he feared to take it because he doubted his apostleship—to recoil upon themselves.

13. False apostles] He now exposes them in plain terms. Transforming themselves] RM 'fashioning themselves,' and so in next v.

14. Satan himself... into an angel of light] tempting men by making evil seem good, 'making the worse appear the better reason.'
(c) 11.16–12.18. The Evidences of His Apostleship in Suffering and Service

The Apostle goes on to show that if he begins to boast, he has far more to boast of than the Judaizing teachers. In nationality he is their equal, in labours carried on and sufferings endured for the gospel he is far their superior; he has had visions and revelations of the Lord which they cannot claim. The only thing in which they might find fault with him was his refusal of support from them. But in that lay his safety in dealing with his enemies: no one could say that either he, or any one sent by him, had made any profit out of the Church.

Paraphrase. '16. Again I say, Do not think me a fool; or, if you do think me a fool, let me indulge, like your other apostles, in a fool's boasting. 17. I am not speaking now under the inspiration of Christ; I am only answering fools according to their folly. 18. Since many other teachers are boasting of their qualifications, I shall boast of mine. 19. For you who are so wise yourselves, have a great appreciation for fools. 20. You are very patient with people who delude and cheat you, and who insult and injure you.'

16. A fool. The repetition of this word so frequently suggests that he had been jeered at as a fool among the members of the Church. This whole passage (vv. 16–20) is full of irony.

21–29. Paraphrase. 'I confess to my shame I was far too weak, as they call it, to act in that way. But if there is to be boasting, I am a fool and can boast too. 22. Are they of the chosen race claiming Abraham as their ancestor? I am on an equal footing with them. 23. Do they boast of their missionary service? I am ready to compare my service with theirs, and the comparison will not be in their favour (though, of course, all such boasting is madness). I have been in far more trials and punishments and dangers than they. 24. How often have I been beaten, (25) scourged, stoned, in danger of my life by shipwreck! 26. How many risks have I run in the course of my wanderings! 27. How much suffering and privation have I endured! 28. And do not forget my daily burden of anxiety in the oversight of all the Churches; (29) for I enter into the feelings of my tempted and sinning brethren.'

21. As concerning reproach] RV 'by way of disapprobation.' 'I admit to my own shame that I was incapable of acting as such an one.' The words are, of course, ironical.

The seed of Abraham] in respect of promised blessings. There is probably a climax in the order. 23. I am more] i.e. in a higher degree, as I can easily prove. In death] in danger of death: cp. Ac 14.19. 24. Forty stripes save one] A Jewish punishment: cp. Dt 25.3. Only thirty-nine were given lest by a miscount the number were exceeded. None of the five cases is mentioned in Acts. 25. With rods] A Roman scourging, as at Philippi (Ac 16.22).

Stoned] at Lystra (Ac 14.19). Shipwreck] The only instance recorded in Acts was later than this. In the deep] floating on wreckage or on a raft. 28. Beside those things that are without] i.e. besides these exceptional troubles, there is the daily anxiety for the Churches. Or, as others suggest, 'besides all the rest which I do not mention.' 29. And I am not weak] The Apostle shares the sufferings of others by sympathy. Offended] RV 'made to stumble,' i.e. led into sin. Burn] i.e. with anger.

30–33. Paraphrase. 'If, however, I must boast in self-defence, I shall boast about my weakness and helplessness; for I shall thus make it plain what Christ has done by means of such a feeble servant. (31) And God is my witness that I speak the truth. (32) From the very outset I have endured ignominy; for in Damascus the governor sought my life, (33) and I had to make my escape through the window of a house built on the city wall, being lowered in a basket by night.

32. Damascus] This event in his career happened either immediately after his conversion, or after his return from his subsequent sojourn in Arabia: cp. Ac 19.9 and Gal 1.17. Aretas] This king (Aretas IV) ruled Arabia Petraea from 9 B.C. to 40 A.D. Damascus was taken by the Romans in 65 B.C., and was retained by them until about the time here mentioned, when it seems to have been restored to Aretas from motives of policy.

CHAPTER 12

His Privileges and Trials

The Apostle unwillingly resumes his boasting and tells of a revelation he received from God; but returns again to dwell on his weaknesses, and especially on his bodily infirmity, through which Christ's grace was manifested.

Paraphrase. '1 (1) It is not expedient for me to boast again; I have really been compelled to do it. I will now mention my experiences of divine visions and revelations. (2) Fourteen years ago I experienced such a divine ecstasy that I knew not whether I was still in the flesh or whether I had been translated to another sphere. (3) I repeat, I did not know in what state of being I was; (4) but I had a divine revelation which caused me unspeakable joy and taught me truths too deep for words to express.

1. It is not expedient, etc.] RV 'I must needs glory though it is not expedient'; i.e. in self-defence. 2. I knew (RV 'know') a man.] St. Paul is speaking of himself, of course, as v. 7 shows. In Christ] so much devoted to Christ and under His influence, that Christ completely dominated him and, as it were, lived in him. Whether in the body ... of the body.] The Apostle was in a trance or ecstatic state in which consciousness of the outer world was for the time suspended: sight, hearing, feeling were gone, and he was lost in contemplation of the divine. His reference to the experience is too vague for us to draw any conclusions from it; it must be remembered that he was not giving information about his revelations, but only mentioning the facts to prove that he was 'not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles.' The third heaven] the highest state of bliss. 3. And I knew] repetition of v. 2 for emphasis. 4. Into paradise] Paradise is used as a synonym for the third heaven of v. 2. The word is used in the NT. for the abode of the blessed after death: cp. Lk 23:43 Rev 27. Lawful] better, 'possible.'

5. 6. Paraphrase. 'I can boast of these experiences, for they were due to no labours or merits of my own; but I will not boast of anything I have done myself, though I may speak of my weaknesses through which God's grace toward me has been manifested. (6) For even if I wanted to boast of all the privileges I have received, I should be justified, for my words would be true; but I am unwilling that any one should be led to think of me more highly than my services warrant.'

5. Of such an one] He can boast of these experiences because they do not glorify him as an individual. Of myself] He will not boast, as he might, of what he has done.

7–10. Paraphrase. 'And lest I should be uplifted by spiritual pride as the result of these revelations, a painful bodily weakness—the very work of Satan—was inflicted upon me. (8) I prayed earnestly for the removal of this affliction; (9) but the Lord answered me saying, 'My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness.' And therefore I rejoice in my sufferings, because it is in enduring them that I realise most clearly that Christ is helping me. (10) I am glad when trials and persecutions for Christ's sake are my lot, for in my moments of greatest weakness I am strengthened with power from on high.'

8. The Lord] Christ, as v. 9 shows. Thrice] He probably made this 'thorn' the subject of earnest prayer on three special occasions: cp. Mt 26:44.

9. My grace, etc.] 'It is enough for thee that thou hast my grace; my power makes itself felt when there is no other support' (Stevens). For the thought, cp. Lk 22:48 Ps 20:6 138:3. The best answer to prayer is the consciousness of the support of the unseen Hand. Rest upon] RV 'cover.'

11, 12. Paraphrase. 'Well now, you have compelled me to boast like a fool. I should not have needed to do so, for you ought to have spoken in my defence; but I think I have shown that insignificant though I be, I am at least on an equality with these preeminent apostles of yours. (12) You certainly had all the proofs of my true apostleship in the work I did and the conduct I exhibited among you. (13) For wherein did I treat you differently from other Churches except in my refusal of support from you? Pray forgive me this great injury.'

11. I ought to have been commended] Instead of listening to his detractors they should have vigorously defended him. Though I be nothing] i.e. as my enemies say. 12. Signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds] miracles in various aspects. That St. Paul claimed to have wrought miracles is evident also from Ro 15:18,19 : cp. Gal 3:5. 13. Forgive me] The verse is ironical.

14–18. Paraphrase. 'I am now about to pay you a third visit, and, as on former occasions, I shall accept nothing for my support. It is not your possessions but your very selves that I want; for you are my spiritual children, and it is not customary for children to lay by for their parents, but rather for parents to lay by for their children. (15) And I am ready to give all I possess to win your souls. Are you going to continue indifferent to my love for you? (16) But some have been saying that while I took nothing from you directly, I was cunning enough to rob you indirectly. (17) Well, I appeal to yourselves. Did any of the brethren I sent take anything from you? (18) When Titus and his companion visited you, did they not live and act exactly as I had done?'

14. The third time] His former visits were,
(1) the visit recorded in Ac 18, when he founded the Church, and (2) the short visit 'in sorrow,' not mentioned in Acts, but referred to in 21: see Intro. 1 (c). I will not be burdensome] see on 11:7-12. Not yours, but you] cp. 8:4. The parents for the children] He wished to act towards them as a self-denying parent: cp. 1 Cor 4:14, 15. Though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved] RV 'If I love you more abundantly, am I loved the less?' 16. But be it so] He now meets another insinuation: this one is disposed of.

18. I desired] (RV 'exhorted') Titus] This visit of Titus must have been made at an earlier period than that referred to in 2:13 and that intimated in 8:6, 17 as about to be made. There were evidently three visits of Titus to Corinth: (1) that here mentioned and referred to in 8:2 ('as he had begun'), during which he seems to have organised the collection; (2) that referred to in 2:13 7:6, when he went to quell the rebellion, bearing this very letter' (chs. 10-13); (3) that referred to in 8:6, 17, when he conveyed the chs. 1-9. See Intro.

(d) 12:10-13:10. Warnings against Evil and Exhortations to Holiness

The Apostle reminds them that he is not pleading his cause before them, but writing for their edification.

Paraphrase. '19. Do you think that all I have been writing is a defence of my conduct to satisfy you? It is not you, but God, who will judge me. What I have written is for the purpose of helping you to strengthen character and raise the standard of Christian life. 20. I am afraid lest when I visit you I find you unrepentant and obstinate, and I have to use severity. I am afraid lest the dark passions and vices I reproved still disfigure the Church, (21) and lest I be distressed and humiliated by the impenitence and shamelessness of those who were given to sensual sins and still continue their evil habits.'

19. Again, think ye] RV 'Ye think all this time that we are excusing ourselves,' i.e. pleading our cause. In Christ] as inspired by Christ's Spirit through living in union with him. For your edifying] He seeks not their favourable verdict, but their growth in goodness. 21. When I come again] The 'again' should be joined with the next clause, 'God will again humble me.' He had been humbled at his last visit—the visit 'in heaviness' referred to in 21.

The Apostle announces a third visit, and exhorts them to repentance. He expresses his desire for their growth in grace.

Paraphrase. '1. This is the third visit I am about to pay you. On this occasion I shall proceed to punish these gross sinners after hearing all the evidence. 2. I repeat now what I said on my second visit, that those who persist in sin will find me stern in punishment. 3. And why am I thus severe? Because you demand proof that I possess Christ's authority, though that proof should be found in your own experience. 4. Christ indeed as a helpless man submitted to the death of the Cross, and in the power of God He still lives; and in the same way, in the Spirit of Christ, we have shown a forbearance which you mistook for weakness; but in the power of God we shall exhibit our strength when we come.'

1. The third time] see on 12:14. Two or three witnesses] Quoted from Dt 19:5. It seems to mean 'in accordance with the principles of justice I will act.' But some think the three witnesses mean the Apostle's three visits, and that he is interpreting the quotation allegorically, in accordance with his custom elsewhere: cp. 3:13-18 Gal 4:22-31. Thus Prof. Stevens paraphrases: 'I shall visit you a third time, and thus I shall have concerning you a threefold testimony, such as the Law requires to establish a cause.'

2. Which heretofore have sinned] i.e. old offenders still impenitent. All other] RV 'all the rest.' 3. Which to you-ward is not weak] Christ's power had already been made manifest among them: cp. 1 Cor 1:5-8.

5. Paraphrase. 'Do not be so anxious to test me. Test yourselves. Do you not know that Christ's Spirit is in you, guiding your life, unless you are false disciples? I hope, at any rate, that you will learn that I am no false Apostle.'

5. Examine yourselves] i.e. not me. Reprobates] counterfeit.

7-10. Paraphrase. 'We pray to God that you may lead a pure and holy life, not to do us credit, but because it is right, even though we be like false apostles. (8) For our authority is given us to advance what is right, and not to hinder it. (9) We rejoice when we have no need to reprove you, for then your Christian life is healthy; and this is what we most earnestly wish, that you become more and more perfect in all Christian graces. (10) It is, believe me, for this reason that I have written to you these earnest remonstrances, because I do not wish to visit you in anger and severity. I have no desire to use the authority that Christ has given me in degrading and punishing you; for its true purpose is to strengthen my hands in helping you to become increasingly pure and holy in spirit and character.'

7. As reprobates] i.e. as if we had no authority, because we shall not need to show it. 8. Against the truth] He has no pleasure in their evil-doing, although it gives him opportunity to exercise his authority.

9. When we are weak] i.e. when our authority is in abeyance: cp. v. 4. 10. To edification, and not to destruction] RV "for building up, and not for casting down."

e 1311-14. Conclusion and Benediction

The Apostle gives them his parting greeting, and bids them try to live a pure and holy life. He sends greetings from their Christian brethren, and invokes the blessing of God upon them.

14. The grace, etc.] the fulness of St. Paul's benedictions. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ] see 89. The love of God] Perhaps including both the sense of His love for us and the love which He inspires in us. The communion of the Holy Ghost] the sense of His presence and guidance. Be with you all] The prayer is for all, those who rebelled as well as those who continued faithful.

GALATIANS

INTRODUCTION

1. Authenticity. The Epistle to the Galatians is almost universally recognised as a genuine letter of St. Paul. The few recent attempts to discredit it have met with little favour, and still leave it practically unchallenged. It belongs in spirit, and probably in time, to the great doctrinal or argumentative group of Pauline letters, which includes 1 and 2 Corinthians and Romans. Internally it bears the stamp of the Apostle's personality, and fits in with the course of his life and thought. External evidence of its authenticity is to be found in Polycarp, Irenaeus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Justin Martyr. The first-named quotes 4:25 and 6:7, though without mentioning the source; the others definitely cite the Epistle as the work of St. Paul.

2. The persons addressed. This question has given rise to considerable controversy, and is even yet being discussed to some extent. (1) Some scholars, taking Galatia to be the pre-Roman kingdom of that name, in the NE. of Asia Minor, maintain that the Epistle was written to Churches founded by St. Paul during his Second Missionary Journey (Ac 16:6) in its chief cities, Ancyra, Tavium, and Pessinus. Something may be said for this theory, but it is open to many objections: for instance, there is no mention of any of these places in the account of St. Paul's travels in the Acts of the Apostles, and no record of the existence of Churches there until about a century and a half later. (2) It may be safer, therefore, to take the view of others, that Galatia is the Roman province of that name. In St. Paul's time it included, besides the former kingdom properly so-called, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Isauria, and parts of Lycaonia and Pontus. In the southern portion of that large province lay the cities of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra. These cities had been visited by St. Paul, and Christian communities found in them, during his First Missionary Journey (Ac 13:12-14:25); at the beginning of his Second Journey he had revisited them, and confirmed his converts in their faith. It is assumed, therefore, that the Epistle to the Galatians was addressed to them. Confirmation of this view is given in 2:5, where the Apostle says that he had contended against the false brethren "that the truth of the gospel might continue with you." The only part of Galatia in which we know him to have been before this time is that which contained the cities mentioned in Ac 13, 14; consequently the reference is believed to be to them.

The population of these cities was almost entirely heathen (49), and consisted partly of natives of the country, and partly of Greek and Roman colonists. The proportion of Jews was small (Ac 13:44-46 14:1). At Lystra, on the Apostle's first visit, Barnabas was taken for Jupiter, and Paul for Mercury (Ac 14:11-12). The heathen priests dominated the people, and bound them to the practices of a ceremonial law, as hard as that of the Jews. St. Paul refers to this in his Epistle (4:8), and bids them take care not to be entangled again with the yoke of bondage (5:1).

The history of the Galatian Churches is as follows. On his First Missionary Journey St. Paul, accompanied by Barnabas and John Mark (Ac 13:2,5), after visiting Cyprus, sailed to Perga in Pamphylia. At this point John left them, and during the rest of the tour they were alone. They did not preach in Pamphylia, as seems to have been their original intention (Ac 13:12), but, owing to an illness which be-fell St. Paul (4:18), left the coast and went up to the higher ground in the interior, visiting in succession and founding Churches in Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13:14), Iconium (Ac 13:51), Lystra (Ac 14:6), and Derbe (Ac 14:20). On their return journey they visited these cities in the reverse order, giving some organisation to the infant Churches, appointing elders over them to watch over their interests and guide them (Ac 14:28), and exhorting the disciples to faithfulness and constancy, especially in presence of suffering and danger (Ac 14:22). On his Second Journey St. Paul, accompanied this time by Silas, again visited these Churches. He had just come from the apostolic council at Jerusalem (Ac 15:6-29), which declared the Gentiles free from the obligations of the Jewish ceremonial Law. He conveyed the message of the council to the Galatian Churches, and infused new life and strength into their members (Ac 16:1-5). During this visit the Apostle saw reasons for anxiety about the future of these ardent but unstable Christians, and warned them carefully against their besetting dangers and the temptations which he foresaw would assail them (1:10 5:21).

A third visit to Galatia is mentioned in a word in Ac 19:22, at the beginning of his third great journey. The First Epistle of St. Peter is addressed to the elect in Galatia, as well as in other parts of Asia Minor.

3. Occasion of the Letter. Throughout the Church, the question was being keenly canvassed as to whether or not the observance of the Jewish Law was binding upon the Gentiles who became disciples of Christ. For the most part, of course, discussion was confined to the necessity of circumcision; for this rite was the outward sign of the adoption of Judaism, and the acceptance of it accordingly imposed the obligation of keeping the whole Law. The Churches of Galatia had early felt the stress of this controversy. There was trouble in them from the very beginning (Ac 13, 14). It became greatly accentuated, however, after either the second or third visit of St. Paul. Certain Jewish Christians, or Judaizers, as they are called, appeared amongst them, insisting upon the keeping of the Law, and especially upon circumcision, as necessary to salvation. These seem to have been men of importance, at least in the eyes of the Galatians (5:10), over whom they soon acquired considerable influence (3:1 57). They disparaged the teaching and work of St. Paul (1:12), and asserted his dependence upon other Apostles for his knowledge and authority (2:6,8,9). The Galatians yielded to their representations, and began to think of adopting circumcision (5:13), and observing Jewish fasts and feasts (4:9,10). To St. Paul this was a practical denial of the efficacy of faith in Christ, and the substitution of a doctrine of justification by the works of the Law for the great truth of justification by faith alone (2:16,21 3:4,5,6). Immediately upon the receipt of the news of the apostasy of the Galatians, the Apostle wrote his letter to them.

4. Characteristics. In the writing of his letters St. Paul usually employed an amanuensis (Ro 16:22), and wrote only the concluding salutation himself (1 Cor 16:21 Col 4:18 2 Ths 3:17). The Epistle to the Galatians he penned with his own hand (6:11 RV). It is written with feeling and vehemence. The Apostle's anger at the seducers, and his anxiety for the seduced, stand out in every sentence. It is the most biographical of his letters, for the charges brought against his apostleship lead him to justify his authority by an account of his career as a Christian, and of his relations with the other Apostles (1:18-21). Doctrinally, the Epistle is related most closely to Romans. In both, the great ideas of St. Paul's theology are prominent. The doctrine of justification by faith is the common cornerstone of their argument: cp. 2:16,21 3:2,5,11 with Ro 1:17 5:19 8:1,2 10:11,12. There is the same doctrine of adoption: cp. 4:6 with Ro 8:15. The strife of the flesh with the Spirit is referred to alike in 5:17 and Ro 7:14-22. The illustration of Abraham's faith is used both in c. 3 and Ro 4.

5. Time of Writing. Various dates are given by different scholars. If it was after St. Paul's second visit that the trouble arose in the Galatian Churches, he may have heard of it on his arrival at Antioch at the close of that journey (Ac 18:22), in which case the letter would be written from there, probably in 53 A.D. On the other hand, if it was not until after the third visit (Ac 18:29) that the defection took place, the Apostle probably heard of it during his residence in Ephesus (Ac 19:1,22), and wrote the letter from there, while Timothy was on the visit to Corinth which ended so disastrously, in 55 or 56. Either of these dates may be accepted. Some, however, place it as early as the close of St. Paul's first journey in 49,50, and others after 2 Corinthians, or even after Romans, in 57, 58; but neither of these dates is so probable.

6. Teaching. The great subject of the Epistle is the superiority of the Gospel to the Law. The Jewish teachers, who sought to pervert the Galatians, had themselves embraced Christianity without slackening their grasp of their old religion. To their mind, Jesus was the Messiah and Saviour of the Jewish race, not of the world in general; hence the Gentiles must become Jewish proselytes before they could receive the blessings of Christ. St. Paul’s teaching was developed in opposition to this doctrine. He shows that the Law (i.e. the Old Testament revelation with its rules and sanctions) failed to make men righteous (2:18, 3:11), because it did not supply a principle of life (3:2), but rather paralysed men’s hearts by its rigorous demands (3:10). At the same time it had its uses, and fulfilled a purpose. It educated and disciplined men for a better revelation (3:14); it made them realise their sin (3:10); it caused them to feel their bondage (4:5); and so prepared them to become sons of God (4:5, 6). The Gospel of Christ, on the other hand, brought men a new principle of life. That principle is faith. Through it, the righteousness is obtained which the Law could not give (2:18). It unites a man to Christ, whose righteousness is thereby imparted to him, for Christ lives in him, and he in Christ (2:20). He is justified by faith in Christ, as he could not be by the works of the Law; indeed, the effort to live by the Law only weakens his spiritual life by slackening his hold upon Christ (5:24). The Gospel supplies the spiritual principle, even the moral motive power, lacking in the Law. The impulse derived from the indwelling Christ leads men to love their fellows (5:6); to renounce the works of the flesh (5:16, 20, 24); to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit (4:22, 25).

Besides justification by faith, other great truths of Christianity are mentioned incidentally: the Incarnation in 4:4; the Crucifixion in 6:13, 14; the gift of the Holy Spirit, as the experience of the Galatians, in 3:2, 5, 5:25.

7. Summary. The Epistle falls naturally into three divisions. (1) An apologetic section (1:1–2:21), in which the Apostle defends the validity of his apostleship, by showing that his call was directly from Christ, and that he was absolutely independent of the other Apostles, both as to his teaching and commission. (2) A polemical section (3:1–5:12), in which he contrasts faith and works as means of salvation, and proves even from the Old Testament that faith is all-sufficient. (3) A hortatory section (5:13–6:18), in which he applies the truth he has been establishing to the different relations and duties of life.

The detailed sequence of thought is as follows:

1. 11–15. Salutation.
2. 16–20. St. Paul’s independence of other Apostles shown by the nature of his conversion.
4. 21–10. As well as by the action of the Judean Apostles at Jerusalem on his second visit.
5. 21–21. And by his reproof of the inconsistent attitude of St. Peter at Antioch.
6. 3:1–5. That the new principle of life in the Spirit comes through faith is proved by their own experience.
7. 3:6–10. And by the case of Abraham.
8. 3:11–14. The Law brings a curse, from which Christ redeems us.
10. 4:8–20. An appeal to the Galatians not to turn from liberty to bondage.
12. 5:1–12. A further appeal to them to keep their liberty.
13. 5:18–6:10. The application of the principle of liberty to common duties.
14. 6:11–18. A final appeal for the liberty of faith.

CHAPTER I

St. Paul Maintains the Validity of His Apostleship and the Truth of His Gospel

1–5. The Apostle sends greetings from himself and the brethren with him to the Churches of Galatia, reminding them at the same time that his apostolic authority was not of human, but of divine origin.

Paraphrase. ‘(1) I, Paul,—no self-elected, or humanly appointed missionary, but an Apostle divinely called by Christ and by God, who raised Him from the dead.—(2) send greetings to the Churches of Galatia, in which all the brethren who are with me join. (3) May all spiritual blessings be yours from God and from Christ, (4) who offered Himself a living sacrifice for our sins, in order to save us from the spiritual bondage of this world and its lusts. (5) May all praise and glory be ascribed to Him eternally. Amen.’

1. An apostle] The title is used in the technical sense, and is introduced by St. Paul to assert his equality with the Twelve which had been challenged. It is always used by him in letters to Churches where his authority was questioned or to which he was unknown in person (Ro 11:1 Cor 12:2 Cor 11:1 Ep 1:1 Col 11); whereas in the cases where the Churches were thoroughly devoted to him he drops it altogether (Phil 11:1 Th 11:2 Th 11). Not of men, as source, neither by (RV ‘through’) man, as medium. Sanday suggests the illuminative analogy of the Sovereign as the fount of honour, and the ministry as the channel through

1. 2 which the honour is conferred. But by (RV ‘through’) Jesus Christ, and God the Father.
Both his conversion (Ac 9:4-18) and his call to missionary work (Ac 13:1; cp. Ac 22:21) were directly from God and Jesus Christ.

Who raised him?] It is the risen Christ from whom St. Paul derives his authority.

2. All the brethren which are with me] Some think this refers to the Apostle’s travelling companions. Others hold that it includes the whole Church. If the letter was written from Antioch, it would thus convey the greeting of the Church which was the Mother-Church of the Galatian communities, as from it St. Paul proceeded to them. If it was written from Ephesus, it would inform them of the interest of that Church in their welfare.

Unto the churches] There is no commendation of them, as is usual in his letters (Ro 1:8; 1 Cor 1:4; Phil 1:3).

4. Who gave himself up to death for our sins] cp. 1 Cor 15:8; on account of them, to atone for them, and to rescue us from their power. That he might deliver (recover) us from the evil which characterises this present evil world (age), according, etc. connect with ‘gave himself.’ 5. (The) glory due to Him for His gracious action in salvation. Amen] = truly, may it be so.

6-10. A sharp rebuke for their speedy departure from the truth (of salvation by grace) under the influence of false teaching. There is but one true gospel; all rival teachings, whether proclaimed by man or angel, are false. Hence the Apostle’s boldness and confidence.

Paraphrase. ‘(6) I am surprised that you should so soon have deserted the truth which I taught you for a spurious gospel. (7) This perversion is due to false teachers. (8, 9) If we Apostles even—and, if an angel from heaven—should proclaim any teaching contrary to the doctrine of salvation by grace and faith, I pronounce a curse upon him. (10) I make this strong assertion—and I repeat it—in the knowledge that in my teaching I am not seeking man’s favour, but obeying God’s will in the service of Christ.’

6. So soon] after their conversion; or better, after the Apostle’s last visit. Him that called] that is, God. Another gospel] RV ‘a different gospel’; a (pretended) gospel of a different kind (from mine), that is, false. 7. Which is not another] i.e. in addition to the true one. Since, in the nature of the case, there can be but one. But there be] RV ‘Only there are’; these heralds of a different doctrine are Jewish Christians who believe that observance of the Mosaic Law is necessary to salvation, and are misleading you through misconceiving and misrepresenting the gospel. 8. Accursed] the strongest possible form of condemnation; cp. Ac 23:14; Ro 9:3; 1 Cor 12:16, 22. 9. We] the epistolary plural, as also in v. 8; on repetition it becomes the emphatic ‘I.’ Said before] in his personal teaching when with them. Now again] emphatic and solemn repetition.

11-17. The gospel which St. Paul preached not of human origin. Twofold proof of the fact: (1) the Apostle’s whole course of life until his conversion was intensely Jewish, and only by a divine revelation was he made a messenger of Christ; and (2) after his conversion he remained aloof from the men from whom he might have been supposed to receive his message.

Paraphrase. ‘(11, 12) I solemnly assure you that the doctrine which I have taught was not a human product or derived from any human source, but that it came to me by revelation from Christ Himself. (13, 14) In proof of this, consider how unlikely it is that I, an intense Jewish zealot and a fierce persecutor of the Church, should have been transformed into a preacher of Christ by any merely human means. (15, 16) But when God, who had chosen me from my birth and graciously called me, disclosed Christ to my heart and designated me as His messenger, I did not resort to human authorities in order to learn what my message was to be; (17) I did not visit the primitive Apostles to learn anything from them, but went away into the seclusion of Arabia, and thence returned, not to Jerusalem, but to Damascus.’

11. Certify] RV ‘make known’; urge and impress upon you. The gospel] the doctrine of salvation by grace through faith. Not after man] not human, but divine, in origin and character. 12. I neither received] any more than the original Twelve received it from man (but from Christ); but I received it through (RV) the revelation of Jesus Christ] His conversion was a disclosure to him of the Messiahship and Saviourhood of Christ.

15. Who separated] God determined upon him as an Apostle from the time of his birth: cp. Isa 49:1; Jer 1:5. And called] in his experience on the Damascus road. 16. To reveal, etc.] to disclose in my consciousness—to my soul—the real meaning and saving power of Christ. That I might, etc.] This revelation carried with it this result. St. Paul seems to have been absent from Jerusalem during the ministry of Christ, and to have had no direct knowledge of Him before the vision on the road to Damascus. 17. Neither went I, etc.] I did not visit the seat of apostolic influence, as might have been expected. Arabia] This is not mentioned in Acts, as St. Luke does not deal with St. Paul’s private life except in so far as is necessary to explain movements in prosecution of his work. The Apostle retired to the wilderness in the neighbourhood of Damascus (which was at that time subject to the king of Arabia) for thought and prayer. Perhaps it was there that he saw some of those visions and revelations of the Lord to which he refers in 2 Cor. 12. Damascus] see also Ac 9:25 2 Cor 11:22, 28, and notes.

18–24. It was a long time before St. Paul saw any of the original Apostles. When he did at length visit Jerusalem he saw only Peter and James. Then he departed to regions remote from Jerusalem. The Judean Christians did not even know him by sight.

Paraphrase. ‘(18, 19) After my conversion my course was such as to prove my independence of human teachers. It was three years before I visited Jerusalem; then I went to interview Peter, and my stay was a short one. Of the other Apostles I saw only James. (20) I solemnly assert the truth of these statements. (21) I next travelled through Syria and Cilicia to my native province. (22–24) Up to this time I was personally quite unknown to the Judean believers; they had merely heard that I, the fierce persecutor, had now become a preacher of the gospel, and they gave thanks to God for my conversion.’

18. After three years] a long time (though it probably does not mean, ‘at the end of three years,’ but rather, ‘in the third year’), during which he could not have received instruction from the original Apostles. To see RV ‘to visit Cephas’ (Peter)—to make his acquaintance and hear his story. Fifteen days] So short a sojourn could not have served for a course of instruction in the gospel. Ac 9:26–30 must be read in the light of the first-hand information given here by St. Paul.

19. James] here called an Apostle in the secondary sense; cp. 1 Cor 15:7. Barnabas (Ac 14:14) and Paul were also Apostles, though not of the Twelve. 20. To this solemn iteration he is moved, no doubt, by the thought of the aspersions of his enemies. 21. St. Luke says (Ac 9:30) that he went from Jerusalem to Cæsarea (Roman capital of Judea) and Tarsus—a more specific statement. By Syria and Cilicia is meant the Roman province of that name in which Tarsus was situated. 22. Unknown] though he had preached in and about Jerusalem (Ac 9:28), since his labours there had been among the Greek-speaking Jews.

The Churches . . . which were in Christ] not merely ‘the Christian Churches’ as opposed to the Jewish; but the Churches whose members were in a living relation to Christ who fulfilled the command, ‘Abide in me.’

23. They had heard only] that was all the knowledge they had of me. Preacheth the faith] proclaims the necessity of trust in Christ as the sole essential to salvation.

24. They glorified, etc.] They considered Saul’s conversion not as a great gain to the Church, but as a great victory of grace. In me] in my case.

CHAPTER 2

His Authority recognised by the Apostles at Jerusalem and maintained in his Conflict with St. Peter 1–10. It was not until upon the occasion of a subsequent visit to Jerusalem fourteen years later that St. Paul had laid his gospel before the chief authorities there, and they had approved of all that he had done and taught.

Paraphrase. ‘(1) It was fourteen years before I again visited Jerusalem, in company with Barnabas and Titus. (2) It was an impulse from the Spirit which led me to go and explain my teaching to the leaders there, that I might see whether they approved it. (3) That they did so was shown by the fact that they did not demand the circumcision of my companion, Titus, Gentile though he was. (4) Some, no doubt, desired it, but on account of the Jews, who were trying to bind the burdens of the Law upon us, (5) I utterly refused, because by allowing it I should have compromised the truth of the gospel. (6) But the most influential leaders of the Jerusalem Church—let their authority be what it may, that does not concern the truth or divine approval of my teaching—had no desire to correct or supplement my views, (7) but recognised that I had my sphere of labour among the Gentiles as truly as Peter had his among the Jews, (8) and that each was successful in his own sphere. (9) Not only so, but these leaders, James, Peter, and John, gave us the right hand of fellowship in token of their approval and sympathy, and bade us God-speed in our foreign mission, while they themselves sought to evangelise the Jews, (10) only asking us to send contributions for the poor at Jerusalem, which indeed we were eager to do.’

1. Fourteen years after] i.e. after his conversion (1:16), from which the various subsequent events are dated; cp. 1:16, 18, 21. Again] There is much difference of opinion as to which of St. Paul’s visits to Jerusalem, as recorded in the Acts, he here refers. Many scholars hold that this visit corresponds to that recorded in Ac 15 at the close of the First Missionary Journey. Others, especially Ramsay, identify this visit with that recorded in Ac 11:27–30 and 12:25.
urnabas was his companion on both occasions. Certainly that mentioned in Ac 11:27,30—his second visit—was caused by a revelation—that Agabus—but the third visit (Ac 15), the real occasion of which was about the Mosaic law, seems, from what follows, the one to which the Apostle alludes. Barnabas] cp. Gal 4:9, 10, 12, 15; Titus] was perhaps the most trusted of all St. Paul’s companions and lieutenants. When any specially delicate work ad to be done requiring experience and tact, it was chosen for the purpose: cp. 2 Cor 6:6, 17, 18, and notes there. It is remarkable that his name is never mentioned in Acts.

2. By revelation] in response to a prophetic inspiration. Them...of reputation] cp. v. 9. Last, etc.] that it might be evident that even in their view he was not labouring in vain.

3. But neither (RV ‘not even’) Titus...was compelled] This was a crucial instance of the application of the principle at stake. A demand was made by the rigid Judaists that Titus should be circumcised. The demand raised the whole question of the obligation of the Gentiles to observe the Jewish Law, and St. Paul peremptorily refused it. There is an apparent inconsistency between the Apostle’s rejection of the demand in this case and his consent to the circumcision of Timothy at Lystra (Ac 16:4) ‘because of the Jews which were in these parts.’ The inconsistency, however, is only apparent. In the case of Titus St. Paul was opposing the principle that observance of the Jewish Law (and circumcision as the sign of it) was necessary to salvation. This was the doctrine of the Jewish-Christian party, and St. Paul gave no place to them, ‘no, not for an hour.’ In the case of Timothy there was no such principle at stake. There were no Jewish Christians in question, only Jews, who evidently thought that Timothy, being of Jewish nationality on his mother’s side, should bear the outward sign of his nationality. As the matter had only a racial, not a religious, significance, St. Paul circumcised Timothy on grounds of expediency. We may compare his own personal attitude in similar matters (Ac 18:18 20:16 21:23) as showing that he continued to practise some of the Jewish customs, even in religious observances, though he did not regard them as necessary to salvation, or think of imposing them upon others. It is to be remembered also that while Timothy was half a Jew, Titus was a pure Gentile, and the question at issue involved the Christian liberty of the Gentiles.

4. Liberty] i.e. from the requirements of the Mosaic Law.

5. We maintained our position firmly in order to preserve for you (and for all like you) the distinctive truth of the gospel, viz. that faith in Christ is the one condition of salvation.

6. But of those, etc.] RV ‘But from those who were reputed to be somewhat’; those to whom was accorded the greatest influence. Maketh no matter] does not affect the merits of my claim. In conference added (RV ‘imparted’) nothing] did not propose any correction or addition to my teaching. The reference is not to two different doctrines, but to two different spheres of the Gospel’s operation. God gave to me success in my work, as He had given to Peter success in his.

10. Only they would] they made this one stipulation. The poor] cp. Ac 11:28, 30; 24:17 1 Cor 16:3. I also was forward] RV ‘zealous’; I was as eager to do this as they were to have me.

11–16. Not only was St. Paul’s independence of the Twelve established by the circumstances already mentioned, but on one memorable occasion he had felt obliged to rebuke Peter for inconsistent action (thereby asserting his own independent authority), and at the same time to remind him that it was by faith they themselves had been saved.

Paraphrase. ‘(11) On another occasion, at Antioch, I similarly maintained my independence of the Judean Apostles, for I testified against Peter’s unworthy action there to his face. (12) When he came at first among the brethren there he joined freely in the love-feasts with the Gentile converts; but on the arrival of some Jewish Christians from Jerusalem he dissociated himself from the Gentiles owing to a weak dread of criticism. (13) Other Jews, including even Barnabas, were led away by his example. (14) In view of this inconsistency, I publicly challenged Peter: If hitherto you have been content to associate freely with the Gentiles and conform to their way of life, why do you now keep aloof as if these brethren ought to adopt the Mosaic Law before you can admit them to your company? (15) You and I, Jews as we are, and not Gentile outcasts, (16) know from our own experience that it is by faith in Christ that men are saved, and not by works of Law.’

12. Peter] RV ‘Cephas.’ To Antioch] Those who hold that the previous passage (vv. 1–10) refers to St. Paul’s second visit to Jerusalem (Ac 11:20, 30), of course place this visit of Peter to Antioch after St. Paul’s return there, i.e. between Ac 12:25 and 13:1. Those who take 11–10 as referring to the Apostle’s third visit (Ac 15), for the most part date this occurrence after the council of Jerusalem, i.e. during the interval mentioned in Ac 15:24; though some hold that St. Paul in this passage is not mentioning a later instance of his independence, but merely another illustration of it which was earlier in time than that mentioned in vv. 1–10. Because he was to be blamed] RV ‘because he stood condemned,' i.e. by the very inconsistency of his acts. 12. He did not eat with the Gentiles] He would thus be defiled according to the Jewish Law. [Withdraw] i.e. refused any longer to sit with the Gentile Christians at the love-feasts, and perhaps also in their houses. Peter had evidently forgotten the lesson of his vision at Joppa (Ac 10:9-16), and if this action of his was done after the decision of the council at Jerusalem (Ac 15:14-21), his conduct is placed in a still more unfavourable light. 13. Barnabas also] RV 'even Barnabas,' whom the Galatians knew as fellow-missionary with St. Paul.

16. Even we] i.e. with all our Jewish privileges we are no better than the Gentiles we despise, but must equally with them seek salvation by faith in Christ.

17-21. St. Paul seems here quite imperceptibly to pass from his rebuke to Peter to the broader question of the obligation of the Law and to the impassioned statement of his own living faith.

Paraphrase. ' (17) But some one says that in spite of their trust in Christ some have fallen into sin (and therefore require the guidance of the Law). Is Christ then, or the Gospel, the cause of their sin? Whatever conclusion we may draw, that one is manifestly absurd. (18) But whoever goes back to the Law for guidance, after having left it and put his trust in Christ, is the real transgressor. (19) I was led by the Law to know my sin and put my trust in Christ, that I might live unto God; delivered by Him from sin, I was done with the Law—as much so as if I had been dead. (20) Through the power of Christ's Cross I died to my old life; and yet I live in a truer sense than before: rather I should say that it is no longer I who live, it is Christ who lives in me; and if I can speak of living at all, it is in so far as I live by faith in the Son of God, who is the source and support of my life, the indwelling power of a new righteousness. (21) I do not thus make the grace of God of no effect, as I would if I clung to the Law; for if we could be made righteous by the Law, Christ need not have died for our salvation.'

17. But if, etc.] This is a difficult passage. It seems to state an objection of the Judaizing party, that faith in Christ is insufficient to keep men from sin. Or possibly it deals with an argument put forth by the Galatians themselves, that their faith in Christ was insufficient to enable them to withstand their temptations, and that adoption of the Law would be a help. In any case St. Paul pushes the argument to its logical conclusion, and shows its absurdity. 'God forbid! lit. 'be it not so,' 'far be it'; St. Paul's usual formula for rebuking an argument: cp. 3:3 20 3:4, 6, 8, 9; 5:15, etc.

19. Dead] ethically; broke relations with the Law system as by a death. That I might live] I died to the old life and relations in order to live to the new.

20. St. Paul passes from the inability of the Law to the ability of Christ to save him.

Crucified with Christ] He identifies himself with Christ in His death. Christ's death means to him the cessation of the old life of sin as well as of legal justification: cp. 6:14 Ro 6:1-11. 2 Cor 5:14 Col 3:3. Nevertheless I live] RM 'and it is no longer I that live'; my real life is not this natural life, but the life of faith in union with Christ. By the faith of] RV 'in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God.' St. Paul here enunciates his doctrine of mystic union with Christ. He is so entirely under the influence of Christ that he regards his thoughts and words, and deeds as prompted by the Saviour. All that he is he owes to Christ who abides in Him. The spiritual relation between Christ and himself is so intimate that he can only describe it as Christ living in him: cp. Ro 6:1-11.

Justification is by Faith, not Works

1-14. The Apostle upbraids the Galatians with their speedy change from faith to legal observances, reminding them of the fact that their reception of the Spirit had not been through the works of the Law, but through faith, and appealing both to the testimony of their own consciences and to the teaching of sacred history in the parallel case of Abraham.

Paraphrase. ' (1) You thoughtless Galatians have surely been bewitched. I told you plainly of Christ dying for your sins, and you accepted this salvation for your own. Why have you turned away from the Saviour? (2) Was it by obeying the Jewish Law, or by trusting in Christ, that you received those gifts of the Spirit which were so manifest among you when you first believed? (3) What folly, then, to desert the life of the Spirit for that of outward observance! (4) Why endure persecutions for the Gospel if you so lightly esteem it? (5) Have not all your spiritual gifts and the miraculous powers which are manifest among you been due entirely to your faith? (6) You read in the Scriptures that Abraham was accounted righteous on account of his faith, and your experience is an illustration of the same principle. (7) You want to be sons of Abraham. I tell you that his true spiritual children are those who have a faith like his. (8) In the promise made to him, because of his faith, you hear the principle of the Gospel announced in advance. (9) It is, therefore, those who base their lives on faith who share the blessing assured to him. (10) The Law, on the other hand, has no power to bless, but only to curse; for it pronounces a curse upon all who do not obey it in every detail. (11) How impossible salvation is on this principle the Scriptures plainly declare. (12) The Law does not rest on faith. It only justifies those who fulfill its works. (13) But Christ has come to redeem us from the curse which the Law pronounces; and He has accomplished that by taking the curse upon Himself, as His crucifixion makes evident. (14) And the purpose of His saving death was to secure that the Gentiles might receive through their faith the blessing which Abraham received through his, and gain the gift of the Spirit.

1. Foolish] thoughtless, undiscerning, inconsistent. Bewitched] and so perverted you.

Before whose eyes] Paul had vividly (evidently, RV ‘openly’) portrayed the crucified Christ as Saviour. 2. This only] one question will reveal your error and inconsistency.

Received ye, etc.] Of course the latter was the case. 3. Spirit and flesh denote the characteristics of Gospel and Law respectively—the spheres to which they belong: cp. 6:12. The Galatians had begun by putting their trust in Christ, and living a new life under His abiding influence. To forget this beginning and to aim not at living according to the mind of Christ, but at fulfilling the demands of a law, was to forsake the spiritual for the merely human carnal. 4. Have ye suffered . . . in vain] It was all for naught, and might better not have been endured, unless the gospel is deserving of their consistent adherence. If it be yet in vain] There was still hope that they might be reached and convinced by the appeal now made to them.

5. He that, etc.] i.e. God. Miracles] cp. 1 Cor 12. Doeth he it, etc.] Of course, in the latter way, or on the latter condition. 6. As Abraham] a typical case, which the Judaizers could not gainsay: cp. Gn 15:6. St. Paul declares: Our Jewish sacred Scriptures teach salvation by faith. Abraham was blessed because he trusted in God absolutely, and did His will, before the Law even existed. So men are now to trust in Christ the Son of God, living according to His will and having His life in them, now that He has made the Law unnecessary. 7. Sonship to Abraham, therefore (in the spiritual sense), is determined by faith. 8. Preached before (RV ‘beforehand’) proclaimed long in advance the central principle of the Christian gospel. 9. The conclusion which follows from vv. 2, 5. 10. Why men cannot be saved by legal works of merit; they must be perfect and complete, or they never can be: cp. Dt 27:26 Ro 2:13 3:20 4:5 8:3 10:5. 11, 12. Further scriptural confirmation: cp. Hab 2:4. Even under the Law a man was counted righteous not because he fulfilled the demands of the Law, but because he trusted in God, of whose will the Law was the imperfect expression.

The curse] the condemnation pronounced by the Law upon sin. Being made] by submitting to the shame of being crucified: cp. Dt 21:23. The Law declared that any one who died a criminal’s death upon a cross was accursed. Christ died thus, and so was accursed. St. Paul associates this curse arising from ceremonial defilement with the curse which rests upon man for sins, and regards Christ as thus bearing the curse on man’s behalf. Christ’s death in some way availed to ransom men from the curse of the Law. God for Christ’s sake then bestowed the blessing of His Spirit on all who put their trust in His Son, and sought to live in union with Him. The Law was a mere outward command, seeking to gain man’s obedience by promises of reward and threats of punishment. Christ substituted loyalty to Himself for obedience to Law; and by thus introducing the personal element of love brought a powerful influence to bear upon His people, and inspired them with a new power to overcome the sin that beset them.

Paraphrase. ‘(15) To take a familiar illustration: even a man’s will, when ratified, no third party may annul or supplement. (16) Now God’s gracious promise to Abraham and his descendants is realised only in and through Christ, in whom all believers are one. (17) The Law system, which arose long after the promise was made to Abraham, cannot change or nullify that promise; (18) and as salvation (the promised inheritance) must be either by obedience to the Law or by grace, the case of Abraham proves that it is by grace. (19) If, then, the Law could not save, what purpose did it serve? It had a temporary and educational purpose. It was designed to excite in men’s hearts the consciousness of sin, which shows men their need of salvation, and so to point them to Christ; it was a system given not directly by God to the people, but indirectly through angels to Moses, who in his turn gave it to the nation. (20) Now when a mediator is employed, it means that there are two parties making a bargain; but in the case of Abraham there was but one party—God—making a promise out of His own free-will. (21) It is evident, then, that the Law cannot affect God’s promise. The Law is subordinate to the Gospel, but it serves the ends of the Gospel—otherwise it would have been sufficient of itself, and the Gospel need never Covenant] better as mg. 'testament,' or will. It is an 'inheritance' that is in question (v. 18). According to Ramsay, this word 'will' as understood in the Galatian cities meant 'a provision to maintain the family with its religious obligations. . . The appointment of an heir was the adoption of a son, and was final and irrevocable in the Galatian territory.' Thy seed, which is Christ] St. Paul here argues from the fact that the singular number is used—'seed,' not 'seeds'; but the verbal reasoning does not affect the argument. The word is collective. He regards Christ as including all who are united to Him by faith, who are the true seed of Abraham. The law . . . cannot dispense] the will of God is irrevocable (as is seen even in the case of the wills of men); the Law, therefore, cannot be contrary to it, but must be explained in some other way. Four hundred and thirty years] The giving of the Law is dated 430 years after Abraham's sojourn in Canaan. According to another passage (Ac79), the sojourn in Egypt alone was to be 400 years. But the length of the time which had elapsed is immaterial to the argument. The inheritance] the blessings promised to Abraham, here understood in the sense of the spiritual blessing of salvation through Christ. Of the law . . . of promise] two contrasted dispensations; salvation cannot be by both. Scripture is explicit in favour of the latter. It is better to depend upon a promise of God made unconditionally, and to read all subsequent happenings in the light of that promise, than to rest everything upon a contract made between God and man.

19. Inferior character of the Law shown (1) by its aim to make transgressions abound, cp. Ro3.4 15 5.20 77; and (2) by its mediation through the angels and Moses: cp. Dt.33 2 Ac7.53. Ordained by angels] an addition of the rabbis to Scripture. St. Paul is justified in bringing it into his argument, as he is dealing with those who accepted the addition.

20. There is no place for a mediator where there is but one party to a transaction. Now, in issuing His promise to Abraham, God stands forth independent and alone. The point is the contrast between the conditions of the giving of the Law and of the promise. The former depends upon the fulfilling of a contract—and that man failed to do; the other is no contract, but the free gift of God. It does not follow because the Law and the promise are of different rank that they are contrary.

21. It all need a gracious salvation. Both Law and Gospel contemplate the same ultimate end. The connexion of the argument is, that if the Law could give men spiritual life, and so enable them to fulfill its precepts, it would give them righteousness; but it pretended to do this; on the contrary, it shows the impotence of their nature by the contrast of their requirements with their performance (Conybeare and Howson): cp. Ro11.32.

23–29. The Law had a preparatory and disciplinary office, but it was now being fulfilled in the Gospel.

Paraphrase. 'Before Christ's coming it was the office of the Law to imprison men by its condemnation of sin until they should be set free by believing on Him. Thus the Law was like a stern disciplinarian who made us willing and eager to receive the grace of God in the Gospel. But now, in the freedom of faith and of sonship to God, we are exempt from the Law's bondage and discipline. Through faith we are united to Christ and become God's children, and this is symbolised by our baptism. In Him distinctions of nationality and social condition disappear; in Him all believers alike become heirs of the gracious promise made to Abraham, the man of faith.'

23. Faith] i.e. the gospel, whose principle is faith. Both Faith and Law are here personified. Kept] RV 'kept in ward,' imprisoned by the Law's verdict upon sin, awaiting the time of our deliverance through Christ.

24. Schoolmaster] cp. Ro7.7. Tutor, or trainer, who by his chastisement for our faults made us see our need of grace and pardon. St. Paul may have been thinking of the Jewish custom of fathers daily conducting their sons to school. The Law is the stern jailer or disciplinarian; Faith the liberator from bondage and chastisement. We] i.e. the Jews.

26. Ye . . . all] whether Jews or Gentiles, are no longer bondsmen (cp. Ro8.14), but sons: see v. 16. Vv. 17–25 are a kind of parenthesis.

27. Baptized into Christ] entered by baptism into the relation of fellowship with Christ. The argument is: Baptism means union with Christ, and union with Christ means the liberty of sonship to God. Such distinctions do not separate true believers. There is a unity in Christ which is deeper than differences of nationality, condition, or sex. The Greek is the Galatian. St. Paul shows his tact in using that name, as the more refined natives would probably like it. Abraham's seed] his spiritual descendants. Not lineal descent from Abraham, but spiritual kinship to him through a faith like his, determines.
whether we are heirs of the promise made to him.

CHAPTER 4
THE BONDAGE OF THE LAW. FREEDOM
IN CHRIST

1-7. Under the Law we were in bondage; under the Gospel we have received the freedom of sons.

Paraphrase. ‘(1) The heir—before he comes of age can no more enter upon his inheritance than a servant in the family can possess himself of it, (2) but must continue, until the set time, in a subordinate position, and under the authority and training of others. (3) So, when we were under the elementary Law system, we were in a position like that of the heir in his minority: (4) but when the appointed time arrived, God sent His Son, subject not only to human conditions, but also to the Jewish Law, (5) in order that He might set free all who were in bondage to the Law and put them in possession of full liberty and all the rights of the sons of God. (6) And God also gave us the Spirit of His Son, and imparted to us the sense of sonship, (7) so that we now know ourselves as no longer bondmen to the Law, but freemen, and heirs of the salvation which is our rightful, destined possession.’

1. The heir is, of course, a son, as v. 2 shows. A child i.e. under age; a minor.

Differeth nothing] as respects the control of his destined possessions, though, in prospect, lord of all. 2. Tutors] RV ‘guardians’; the regular term for the guardian of a minor.

Governors] RV ‘stewards,’ who have the management of his prospective property. Time (RV ‘term’) appointed the time of reaching his majority. Ramsay points out that under the Syrian law, which prevailed in S. Galatia, a child was subject to a ‘tutor’ until he was 14, after that he could make a will and dispose of his property; but the management of his estate was under a ‘governor’ or curator until he reached the age of 25. 3. Children] in a state of tutelage under the Law. Elements] RV ‘rudiments’ (cp. 49 Col29); elementary religious observances belonging to the outward, visible world.

4. Cp. 318, 24 Ro520, 21. Made] RV ‘born’; entering fully into our human lot. 5. Redeem] i.e. save us from bondage in sin under the Law, and introduce us into full sonship to God. Under the law] and therefore bound to obey it, and yet guilty of infringing it. Adoption] Redemption is followed by the admission of the sinner among the children of grace.

6. This emancipation being accomplished, a new sense of sonship fills the heart. Abba] an Aramaic word commonly used in prayer, meaning ‘Father.’ Christ’s love for us exhibited in His incarnation and all that it includes wins our love, and for His sake we overcome sin. 7. Thou art] application of the conclusion to the individual. An heir of God] RV ‘an heir through’ (the adopting act of) ‘God.’

8-11. In the past the Galatians had been idolators, in bondage to gods that were ‘no gods’ at all. Now they are going back again to a similar bondage.

Paraphrase. ‘(8) Before your conversion you Gentiles were victims of idol-worship; (9) but now, since the true God has revealed Himself to you in Christ, how can you desire to return again to a lower plane of religious knowledge and practice? (10) This you are doing in taking up the observance of Jewish feast-days and ceremonies. (11) This action causes me to fear lest my labours on your behalf should prove to have been in vain.’

8. Howbeit then] RV ‘At that time,’ when they were yet unconverted heathen. No gods] cp. 1 Cor861020; the so-called deities of the heathen. 9. Their lapse into Judaism is a return, not, indeed, into idolatry, but into an imperfect and rudimentary religion. In this point of view only does the Apostle class heathenism and Judaism together. The Law is weak, etc., as being powerless to justify and give the assurance of sonship. Known God, or rather are known of God] i.e. now that ye have come to know the nature and love of God, or rather that God has recognised you and bestowed upon you His gifts. 10. Days] Jewish feast—or fast-days. Months] new moons: cp. Col216. Times] RV ‘seasons,’ such as Passover, Pentecost, etc. Years] e.g. sabbatic years. These observances are ‘weak and beggarly elements’ (v. 9), because they are matters of dry routine, customs which the Gentiles would adopt without understanding their meaning or catching anything of the spirit which lay behind them. They were of no avail for salvation. 11. Afraid] anxiously solicitous lest they should repudiate their Christian profession.

12-20. The Apostle appeals to his readers to return to their former allegiance to the gospel.

Paraphrase. ‘(12) I plead with you to come to my point of view, even as I in renouncing slavery to the Law, have become as a Gentile to you Gentiles. (13) I hope for this result on the ground of your former kindness to me; you remember that it was in consequence of an illness that I was led to become your Christian teacher, (14) but you did not consider the care of me at that time burdensome, but received and treated me with the greatest honour and deference. (15) How great is the change in you since that time when you would have made any sacrifice for me! (16) Do you now regard me as hostile to you because I urge you to loyalty to Christ? (17) The Judaisers are courting your favour only that they may make you their partisans and supporters. (18) It is well to be the object of others' interest in a good cause—and that at all times and not merely, when I am with you. (19, 20) I assure you my desire that you should be moulded after Christ's pattern is intense; and I would fain visit you and adopt a less censorious tone in the hope of winning you back.

12. As I am] loyal to Christ: cp. 1 Cor 11:1. I am as ye are] cp. 1 Cor 9:19-22. RV puts a period after 'ye are,' and then reads 'Ye did me no wrong; but ye know that because of an infirmity,' etc. Ye have not injured me] i.e. I am not personally offended.

13. The first] lit. as RM 'the former time.' The Gk. word, accurately interpreted, indicates that St. Paul had paid the Galatians two visits before the date of this letter. This 'former' visit is of course that recorded in Ac 13:14-14:28. St. Paul probably intended preaching at Perga when he landed there; but being seized by illness was compelled to leave the low ground of Pamphylia and seek health and strength on the high plateau further inland. His journey brought him first to Pisidian Antioch, then to Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. On his return to Perga, on his way back to Antioch in Syria, he preached the gospel there, as he had not been able to do it on his outward way: cp. Ac 13:13,14 with 14:25.

14. My temptation which was in my flesh] RV 'That which was a temptation to you in my flesh.' The bodily infirmity which had attacked him had left such traces that they might have been excused for rejecting one whose bodily presence was weak': see 2 Cor 12:7 and note there. As an angel] with even exceptional reverence. This spirit had been exhibited towards him in Lystra, even by the heathen (Ac 14:13); and, indeed, in all the cities of Galatia by those who had received his message and became followers of Christ.

15. Blessedness] RV 'Gratulation,' your felicitation of yourselves in my teaching. Plucked...eyes] made any sacrifice for me, so great was your former kindness. 17. RV 'They zealously seek you in no good way; nay, they desire to shut you out that ye may seek them.' They] the Jewish extremists. Not well] i.e. in a party spirit. Exclude you] from the influence of other teachers, especially from my own. Affect (RV 'seek') them] cling zealously to them as partisan adherents. 18. RV 'But it is good to be zealously sought in a good matter at all times.' I am glad that you are the objects of others' zeal and interest, whether I am present or absent, provided your favour is courted in a good cause. 19. I travail in birth again] RV 'I am again in travail.' In his anxiety and distress he would reconvert them to Christ.

20. Desire] RV 'could wish,' i.e. if such a thing were possible. Change my voice] i.e. change my tone, speak more mildly.

21-31. This passage is an example of the rabbinical method of interpretation, which found a hidden sense, embodied and intended, in many parts of Scripture. Here a historical narrative is taken as revealing the truth that those who adhere to the Law are in bondage, and those living by faith in Christ, free.

Paraphrase. (21) You who are so zealous for the Law will surely take a lesson from the Law itself. (22) You know the story of Abraham's two children, Ishmael and Isaac, (23) the former the child of the bondwoman, Hagar, the latter of Sarah, born in accordance with a divine promise. (24) These two women represent, in the allegorical application, two covenants, the old and the new. Hagar represents the Law, whose symbol is Mt. Sinai, since her descendants, like the adherents of this old covenant, are born into a state of bondage. (25) Indeed, Hagar is a name of Mt. Sinai in Arabia, and corresponds to Jerusalem, the sacred seat of the Law system, which, again, is a symbol of bondage. (26) But the spiritual Jerusalem, answering to Sarah, is, like her, the mother of freemen. (27, 28) For our spiritual mother has fulfilled the promise of Scripture to the childless, by making us like Isaac, the heirs of God's gracious promise. (29) But just as then, so now, the unspiritual persecutes the spiritual. (30) And as then the Ishmaelites were rejected from the heirship of the promises, so now God will reject the slaves of the Law. (31) It is the Christian believers who are God's true freemen and heirs of His promises.'

21. The very Law in which the Judaisers trust is shown to be against their contentions. 22. One son, from the circumstances of his birth, typifies bondage; the other, freedom: cp. Gn 16, 21. It is written] This does not introduce a quotation here, but simply indicates the facts as recorded in the Scripture history.

23. One was born in a relation merely carnal, the other in fulfilment of a special promise of God: cp. Heb 11:11,12. 24. Are (RV 'contain') an allegory] i.e. are spoken allegorically. An allegory is a narrative where the literal sense 'half reveals and half conceals' a spiritual meaning. The best example of allegory in the English language is Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress.' Hagar and Sarah represent, respectively, the Law and the Gospel—bondage and freedom. Of the former, Sinai, as the place where the Law was given, is the symbol.

25. Hagar] Some MSS of the Epistle omit this word here, in which case we should render:
26

GALATIANS

inai is a mountain in Arabia' (so RM)—the id of Hagar's descendants. Sinai and Jerualem mean the same—law and bondage; ahagar typifies both. On St. Paul's use of egorical interpretation, cp. 1 Cor 9, 10 Gal 6 2 Cor 3, 18, 14. As Hagar corresponds to Mount Sinai, which is now represented by) the earthly Jerusalem, so Sarah corresponds the ideal Jerusalem which is in heaven, of which all true Christians are citizens. With the whole passage cp. Heb 12, 18, 24.
26. Jerusalem... above] the spiritual commmonwealth or city of God, of which believers re citizens. The mother of us all] RV 'our mother,' prefigured by Sarah. 27. This v. in a original context (Isa 54) had no reference to the Jerusalem above, only to the actual Jerusalem. It is quite in the rabbinical style or St. Paul to give it another, more spiritual application. 28. Conclusion and application.
We believers stand in a relation to God's promise and favour analogous to the descendants of Sarah, while the Judaisers take the place of the Ishmaelites.

29. Cp. Gn 21. This 'mocking' there menhioned hardly amounts to persecution. Perhaps the general hostility of Hagar's descendants to Israel is referred to: cp. Ps 83, 1 Ch 30, 19. History was now repeating itself in the persecution of the Christians of Galatia by 21, 10, 12. Hagar's spiritual descendants are the Jews and the Judaisers, who are the natural descendants of Sarah; while the heathen who have accepted Christ are the spiritual descendants of Sarah, and inherit the blessings promised to her children. For similar ideas in the teaching of Jesus cp. Jn 8, 12-45. 31. So then] RV 'Wherefore'; since this rejection does not apply to us; we belong to a higher lineage and order. And as we are thus spiritually free (51), let us take care to maintain our freedom.

CHAPTER 5

THE NATURE OF CHRISTIAN LIBERTY

1-12. The futility of seeking justification by attempting to comply with the demands of the Mosaic Law; the inconsistency of works and faith as methods of salvation.

Paraphrase. '1 (1) Since Christ has freed us from the necessity of obeying these legal demands and customs, let us consistently maintain and use our liberty. (2) To receive circumcision as necessary to salvation is to renounce allegiance to Christ, (3) since submission to this rite commits one to the observance of the whole legal system. (4) In taking such a step you would be repudiating the free grace of God: (5) for it is through the operation of the Holy Spirit, not through symbols in our flesh, and in consequence of our faith in Christ and not of works we perform, that we hope for justification before God. (6) Circumcision is wholly unimportant; the only condition of salvation is a faith which evinces its vital power in love. (7) You were making good progress in the Christian life; who has misled you into disloyalty to the gospel? (8) This teaching by which you have been led astray is not of God; (9) and though it has so far done only a little mischief, it will spread like leaven. (10) I have good hope, however, that you will now heed my exhortation; but the leader of this sedition will receive a heavy punishment.
(11) As for the accusation that I myself sometimes command circumcision, were that the case would the Jews still persecute me? If that were true I should no longer be giving them offence through my preaching of the crucified Christ as the author of salvation.
(12) But enough! I wish that these men who are perverting your faith by insisting upon circumcision would mutilate themselves completely.'

1. Connected closely with preceding section.

Bondage] to legal observances. Christ hath made us free] by fulfilling the Law, and so teaching us to obey it, not in the letter but in the spirit, which we shall do best by living by faith in Him, and having the same mind in us as was also in Him < cp. Mt 5, 17-48. 2. Be circumcised] RV 'Receive circumcision' as essential to salvation. Christ... profit... nothing] because you thereby reject Him as sole and sufficient Saviour. 3. Circumcision is the sign of the system of which it is a part, and its practice indicates that a complete observance of all the Law's requirements is obligatory. 4. Christ is become, etc.] RV 'Ye are severed from Christ, ye who would be justified,' etc. By resorting to the Law for salvation, as if Christ were not sufficient, you are no longer Christ's people. Fallen, etc.] fallen down from the higher plane of grace under the lower plane of Law. To us now the bondage of the Law has little meaning; but if we come into bondage to sin, we fall from grace as surely as did the Galatians. Christ has given us power to keep from the love of sin and to resist its power; He has liberated us from its bondage and given us the liberty of the Spirit; and it is ours to maintain that liberty, and not to return to the works of the flesh, which bring us to slavery.

5. The true mode of salvation, viz. by the agency of the Spirit, on condition of faith alone. 6. Availeth] for salvation. Faith which worketh] an active, energetic faith: cp. Jas 2, 14-20. 7. Run well] before the Judaisers misdied you. Who did hinder] a rhetorical question. 8. Cometh] RV 'came.' This dis-suasion from loyalty to Christ to which you have yielded does not emanate from God, but is contrary to His will.

9. A little leaven It would seem that only a few of the Galatian converts were affected by the false teaching; but their influence would soon prove far-reaching and pernicious: cp. 1 Cor 15:33. Leaven is always used in NT. as a symbol of influence. Our Lord uses it to illustrate the influence of the kingdom of God (Mk 8:15 and parallels). St. Paul uses it to describe the penetrating and poisonous power of evil influence: cp. 1 Cor 5:6,7,8.

10. The Apostle now adopts a more hopeful tone, and turns from reproof to encouragement. None otherwise minded than as I have taught you. 11. Then is the offence of the cross ceased? RV 'then has the stumbling-block of the cross been done away.' The Judaizers who had 'troubled' the Galatians had evidently brought against the Apostle the charge that he still preached circumcision himself, although he had dispensed with it in the case of the Galatians. The accusation may have been based on the fact mentioned in Ac 16:6, that on his second visit to Galatia he had circumcised Timothy at Lystra: see on Gal 2:23. He shows that this accusation is inconsistent with the other charge of abolishing the Law, for which they constantly attacked him. If he preached circumcision, why did they persecute him? 12. Were even cut off? RV 'would even cut themselves off,' RM 'would even mutilate themselves'; i.e. would even go beyond circumcision, like the priests of Cybele, whom the Galatians had formerly worshipped. A bitterly satirical wish. The Apostle was evidently carried away by his righteous wrath at the bitterness of the Judaizers.

13-15. Freedom from the requirements of the Law does not mean disobedience to its spirit, which is that of love to others.

Paraphrase. '13. Cling, then, to your freedom from legal rules and customs; but remember that freedom means not licence, but loving service. (14) For love is the essence of God's Law, (15) whereas mutual backbiting and hatred can only end in the destruction of one another's spiritual life.'

16-26. The spiritual and the carnal life contrasted.

Paraphrase. '16. In the life which is fostered by the Spirit you will find your true safety against the evils of which I am warning you. (17) For between the pure aspirations of the Spirit and the sinful impulses of the flesh there is a sharp, irrepressible conflict. (18) If you live under the influence of the Spirit of God, you have no need to seek the guidance of law. (19-20) Contrast the sins which spring from the carnal impulses (21-24) with the virtues which spring from the Spirit's guidance. The former exclude from God's kingdom; the Christian must abjure them; but the latter are not condemned by any law. (25) If, then, we possess the Spirit in our hearts, let our outward action be under His guidance, and (26) let us avoid factious boasting and all attempts to incite others to rivalry and jealousy.'

16. The Spirit] the sanctifying Spirit of God. Shall not fulfill] because the Spirit and the flesh are contrary principles. The flesh] a general name for the sinful impulses. 17. The carnal desires are opposed to the Spirit, and the impulses from the Spirit are contrary to these desires. 18. Not under the law] Those who live under the guidance of the Spirit of God are in no need of the Law. They do what is right not because the Law commands it, or because the Law penalizes wrong-doing, but because they live under the influence of Christ and have His Spirit in them; e.g. they refrain from injuring others not because the Law says 'Thou shalt not kill,' but because they love their neighbours in the Spirit of Christ. And so, for the ideal Christian who is perfectly changed into Christ's likeness, the Law might just as well not exist, for he has no need of it.

19-21. Works of the flesh include not merely carnal sins, such as the first three in the list, but evil passions like strife and jealousy and their social effects, such as factions and divisions.

CHAPTER 6

PRACTICAL EXHORTATIONS. THE APOSTLE'S GLORING

1-5. The nature and requirements of the law of love.

Paraphrase. '1) If sin overcome one of your number, try to correct the fault in a temper of gentleness, remembering that you yourselves may some time need a similar forgiveness. (2) Share each other's cares and sorrows, and so fulfill Christ's law of love. (3) Shun the self-deception which springs from pride; (4, 5) let each man test his actions on their own merits and not by comparison with other men, for each must bear his own load of responsibility.'

1. Overtaken as if pursued and caught. Fault] RV 'tresspass,' or transgression, such as the error into which the readers had been beguiled. Spiritual] as opposed to 'natural' or 'carnal': cp. 1 Cor 2:14 3:14.

Spirit] i.e. temper. Lest thou, etc.] in similar circumstances need a similar sympathy.

4. Prove] test, to see whether it is morally real and genuine. Work] life and conduct.

Rejoicing] a ground of satisfaction.

5. Burden] of accountability. The word is different from that used in v. 2.

6-10. The principle of the spiritual harvest.

Paraphrase. '6 (Share with your teachers. 7, 8) If you refuse to obey the law of love, the result will be a debased moral life; its observance conducts to a blessed existence. 9, 10) Our reward is sure if we discharge the obligations of love to all men, especially to our Christian brethren.'

6. Communicate] i.e. share, either in general sympathy and friendship, or, more specifically, in contributions to the support of the teacher. 7. None can escape the application of God's law of the spiritual harvest.

8. He who tills the field of the carnal life or that of the spiritual life reaps, in each case, his appropriate fruitage. Corruption] a harvest doomed to perish (Conybeare and Howson). Life everlasting] the harvest of which the Spirit gives us the pledge in this life, and of which we shall receive the fruition in the life to come. 9. An encouragement to persistent spiritual sowing and cultivation.

10. A conclusion from the certainty of reaping if we faint not. Of the household of faith] members of the Christian family whose bond of union is faith.

11-18. The true ground of glorying.

Paraphrase. '11 (Look at my own bold handwriting in which I have written this letter as the proof of my longing for your salvation. 12) To sum up: Those who are insisting on your circumcision are doing so in order to curry favour with the Jews, for (13) as Christians they do not themselves consistently observe the Law, but are making a show of zeal for it by inducing you to assume its burdens. 14) But the only true ground of glorying is the cross by which I have been put to death to the sinful world. 15) The question of circumcision is indifferent; new life in Christ is the one important thing. 16) God's favour is upon all such as test their lives by this principle, thereby proving themselves true Israelites. 17, 18) Let me bear no more accusations! The proof that I am Christ's Apostle is found in the scars which I have received in His service. May blessings from Him fill your heart!'

12. In the flesh] the sphere to which circumcision belongs. Lest they should suffer, etc.] RV 'that they may not,' etc.—a prudential motive underlies their zeal. It must be borne in mind that St. Paul is writing to a Church composed chiefly of Gentiles. They were Christians, having been converted by the Apostle, but they had been influenced by teachers who had strong Jewish sympathies and maintained that the Law was obligatory on all Christians.

14. St. Paul, on the contrary, will glory only in salvation through sacrifice and self-giving. By whom] RV 'through which,' etc. because he died to sin with Christ on His cross: cp. Ro 6:4,8 Col 2:20. 15. A new creature] RM 'a new creation.' Salvation is newness of life in Christ, and is in no way dependent upon the question of circumcision. 16. This rule] the test of acceptance with God mentioned in the previous v. Israel] the true spiritual Israel: cp. 3:9 Ro 4:13-16. 17. Let no man, etc.] Let these annoying insinuations concerning my apostleship cease. I bear in my body, etc.] RV 'I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus': cp. 2 Cor 11:23-28. evidences of the genuineness of his consecration to Christ.

18. The absence of commendation and the severe tone of the letter are noticeable; yet, quite exceptionally, he adds to the benediction an appellation of personal affection (brethren).
EPHESIANS

INTRODUCTION

Four questions have to be considered in an Introduction to this Epistle: Author, Recipients, Circumstances, and Contents. And it will be best to take the questions in that order. The answers respecting the recipients and the circumstances depend to a very great extent upon the answer respecting authorship.

1. The Author of the Epistle. If the authorship of this letter had not been disputed by competent scholars, it would not be necessary to spend much time upon this point. And the necessity for discussion depends much more upon the weight of the authority of the critics who question or deny the Pauline authorship than upon the weight of the arguments which they employ. Some consideration of their arguments is required; but the result of such consideration will be to confirm us in what was the unanimous belief of Christians for many centuries, that in this Epistle we have what perhaps may be called the richest and most glorious product of the active mind of St. Paul. The only other Epistle of which that might with reason be said is the Epistle to the Romans; and the fifteenth chapter of that great letter is left incomplete until the Epistle to the Ephesians is added to it. Here we have a full statement of the unity of mankind in Christ, as sons of Him who is their Father and His Father, and of God's purpose for the world through the Church. This completion is worthy of 'Paul the Master-builder.' And it would seem that the objections to the Pauline authorship are being felt to be less serious than they were supposed to be ten or twenty years ago. The Epistle has fewer opponents and more defenders of the first rank than used to be the case; and it is remarkable that Dr. Armitage Robinson in his admirable commentary does not think it necessary to discuss the question of authorship, because he considers that the Epistle has already, by Dr. Hort and others, been sufficiently shown to be the work of St. Paul. One reason for the decrease in important objectors to the Epistle lies very near the surface. It has been found more and more difficult to accept the other Epistles to which Ephesians is inextricably linked as writings of St. Paul and yet deny the Pauline authorship of Ephesians. Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and Ephesians form a closely connected group. To doubt that the Apostle wrote the exquisite and purely personal letter to Philemon is generally recognised as irrational scepticism; and most of the critics who doubt or deny the Apostolic authorship of some of the Pauline Epistles, admit Philippians also to be genuine. If Philippians and Philemon are accepted as St. Paul's, some violent hypotheses are needed in order to make it tenable that Colossians is not by him.* And if Philippians, Philemon, and Colossians are all allowed to be his, then the difficulty of excluding Ephesians becomes very great indeed.

The external evidence in favour of Ephesians is very strong. As Renan says, among the Pauline Epistles it 'is perhaps the one of which there are most early quotations as to the composition of the Apostle of the Gentiles.' Not only the witnesses between 170 and 220 (Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Muratorian Canon) treat it as unquestionably Pauline; but also those who wrote about a century earlier. Marcion (c. 130) included it in his collection of St. Paul's writings. It is quoted in the Second Epistle of Clement, which may be later than Marcion, and in the 'Shepherd of Hermas,' which may be earlier. It is quoted by Polycarp (c. 120) and almost certainly by Ignatius, who is a little earlier. Clement of Rome evidently knew the Epistle. and he takes us into the first century (95), within the lifetime of St. John. Above all, it seems to have been known to St. Peter and to St. John, for there are striking parallels between Ephesians and 1 Peter, and between Ephesians and the Revelation. This constitutes a very strong case.

It is the internal evidence which has been supposed to tell against the Epistle, and that mainly on two grounds: (1) the resemblance to Colossians; one Epistle is suspected of being copied from the other by some unknown writer; (2) the form of doctrine. (1) Not much can be made out of the first point. That two letters carried by the same messenger (Tychicus), to Churches in the same part of the world, should often have the same thoughts, and not seldom

* For instance, Holtzmann has suggested that some parts of Colossians are genuine; and he puts together what he supposes to have been the original letter. Some forger took this little letter and expanded it into our Epistle to the Ephesians. Then he was so pleased with the result, that he worked similar additions here and there into the original letter to the Colossians. This patchwork was thought so very superior that it passed at once as St. Paul's, and the genuine letter was lost.
the same language, is just what we might expect; the salutations, the structure, and the subjects of the two Epistles are very similar; and there are nearly 80 coincidences of expression in the 155 vv. Compare Huxley’s letters written about the same time to different correspondents. On the other hand, assume that only one of the two Epistles is genuine, and that the other is made up from it, and it is impossible to determine which is the original and which is the copy; for in one place Ephesians, and in another place Colossians appears clearly to be original. If both are original, there is no difficulty. (2) Nor is much serious difficulty to be found in the second point. We are told that the kind of Pauline teaching which we find in Ephesians is of a more developed character than the teaching of St.
Paul, and therefore belongs to a later age; it reveals a doctrinal standpoint which a disciple of the Apostle might reach, but not St. Paul himself. The doctrine of all Christians making one Church of which Christ is the Head, and of its being through the Spirit (2 22) that Christ abides and works in the Church, is thought to be beyond the earlier teaching of the Apostle. This attempt to put a limit to the amount of growth that would be possible for such a mind as that of St. Paul is arbitrary and uncritical. The advance, as compared with Romans, is not so extraordinary. The equality of Gentiles with Jews in the Church is maintained in both Epistles (Ro2 1-29 Eph1 11-16), and in both the universality of the previous corruption is made an argument for the universality of salvation (Ro3 8-21 Eph2 1-22). An advance is made in Ephesians, in that here for the first time all Christians are regarded as forming one Ecclesia, or Assembly of God, or Church, of which Christ is the Head (4 5, 4, 12, 13, 15). This development was very natural in one who was writing from Rome, the centre of the civilised world. It does not imply that there are a number of local Churches which all make up one universal Church: that idea might be evidence of a later age: but that, throughout the world, there are many Christian individuals, who are members of a Body, whose Head is Jesus Christ.

2. The Recipients of the Epistle. There is little doubt that Beza was right in supposing that this letter was addressed, not to the Ephesians alone, but to other Churches of Asia also; and that Archbishop Usher got still nearer to the truth in regarding it as an encyclical letter, which Tychoeus was to take first to Ephesus and then to other Churches, of which Laodicea was one. Our Epistle to the Ephesians is probably the Epistle from La-odicea,’ which the Colossians were to read, while their own Epistle was to be read at Laodicea (Col 4 18). Our two best MSS (N, B) and the well-informed corrector of another (67) omit ‘at Ephesus’ in Eph 13. Origen shows that his text did not contain ‘at Ephesus’; and St. Basil states that ‘at Ephesus’ was omitted both by predecessors of his and in the older MSS. Marcion cannot have had the words.
Evidently, from early in the second century, there were copies of the Epistle in which there was a blank after ‘to the saints which are,’
and the bearer of the letter would fill in the blank according to the place in which he was at the time. Probably each Church made a copy of the letter for its own use before it was sent on, and so large a Church as that of Ephesus would multiply copies, each of them with the words ‘at Ephesus’ filled in. This explanation of the omission of ‘at Ephesus’ in such very early authorities is strongly confirmed by the character of the Epistle itself. It has no local colour, no allusions to special difficulties or dangers, no mention of individuals other than the bearer of the letter. When we consider that St. Paul had lived for three years at Ephesus (Ac 20 21), that he must have been most intimate with the Christians there and their needs, and that not only in earlier letters (as Thessalonians and Corinthians), but also in letters written at the same time as Ephesians (as Colossians and Philemon), he exhibits the keenest interest in local requirements and persons, then the omission of all such things in this Epistle would be inexplicable, if it were addressed to the Ephesians only. If it is addressed to Ephesus and several other Churches, in some of which there were persons who were unknown to him, then the absence of local features is not only natural but necessary. In 1 15 3 2 4 21 he seems to be thinking of people who have not seen him, and perhaps do not know much about him.

wrote it when he was ‘the prisoner of Christ
Jesus’ (31), ‘the prisoner in the Lord’ (41).
Does this refer to the two years’ imprisonment at Cæsarea, the civil capital of Palestine, or to the two years’ imprisonment (which began soon afterwards) at Rome, the capital of the empire? Such evidence as we have decides for the latter. (1) At Cæsarea the Apostle was in rather close confinement, and strangers would not be likely to come in contact with him. At Rome he lived ‘in a hired lodging of his own and received all that went in unto him, preaching the gospel of God... with all boldness, none forbidding him’ (Ac 28 28, 29).
Here Onesimus could easily bear him and be won over to Christianity. Moreover, a runaway slave would be more likely to take refuge in Rome than at Cæsarea. And the imprisonment in which St. Paul converted Onesimus is the imprisonment in which he wrote our Epistle.
(2) The whole tone of the Epistle is imperial.
Christ is the Ruler of a world-wide empire, in which every Christian, Jew or Gentile, has equal rights and duties. Such a conception of the Christian commonwealth would arise much more readily in the metropolis of the world, and close to the palace of the Caesars, than in a provincial town like Cesarea. The providential purpose of the Roman empire suggests the providential purpose of the Christian Revelation. And thus he writes, not merely to one Christian, as Philemon, and to one particular Church, as Colossae, but also urbi et orbi, to the whole body of Christians; and one and the same messenger (probably in 63 A.D.) carries these three proofs of the versatality of the Apostle to the Churches of the East.

4. The Contents of the Epistle. After the usual Salutation (1:1-3), Thanksgiving (1:3-14), we have a corresponding Prayer (1:15-2:10), and a Contrast between the unconverted and the converted Gentiles (2:11-22). The Apostle’s special interest in the Conversion of the Gentiles (3:1-13) leads to a return to Prayer for them and a Doxology (3:14-21), and then to Exhortations respecting the Unity of the Catholic Church (4:1-9) and the Duties of its Members (4:7-6:9), who must be Spiritual Warriors arrayed in the armour of God (6:10-20). The Mission of Tychicus (6:21, 22) and the Benediction (6:23, 24) form the conclusion. Let us look at these subjects more closely.

While Colossians sets forth Christ’s glory as Head of the Church and of the Universe, Ephesians sets forth the glory of the Church itself, and draws practical conclusions from it. The main idea is the unity of Christians as forming one body with Christ as its unseen Head. All men, whether Jews or Gentiles, are one in the Church, which is the holy Temple of God (2:19-22) and the spotless Bride of Christ (5:25-28). The existing Church has many imperfections, but the full measure of perfection will at last be realised (4:13). And each Christian must labour for this, especially through purified family life (5:1-5:9); for the life of the family is a symbol of the life of the Church. Each individual member must have this ideal before him—the perfecting of the unity of the whole body; unless the unity is realised, perfection is impossible. This is what is meant by saying that in this Epistle ‘St. Paul has given to his teaching a new centre,’ viz. the existence of the Church. Round this the teaching in the Epistle revolves. This new centre is all the more appropriate, when we remember that the Epistle was not addressed to the Ephesians only, but was an open letter to be sent to several Churches in succession.

The Epistle opens with the grand idea of the unity of Creation, which was in God’s mind from the first (1:4, 9, 10). And this idea is emphasised by the wonderful fact, that the two divisions of the human race, the Jews and the Gentiles, who had hitherto been so bitterly opposed, are henceforth to be blended into one body, with one Head, and one God and Father of all (2:11-22). The gospel is not for any onefavoured race, but for all mankind. This mystery of the universality of the gospel and of salvation has been revealed to the Apostle (3:1-12), who prays that those who accept it may be able to understand it (3:14-19). The very thought of such a consummation causes the Apostle to burst out into fervent praise of God, whose glory in the Church and in Christ will continue to grow in successive generations through countless ages (3:20, 21).

To this magnificent idea of unity the Christian life must correspond, by the rightly proportioned and harmonious development of the members of the Christian community, in the body of which Christ is the Head (4:24). It was not always thus harmonious: the old heathen life (4:17-19) was very different from the new Christian life (4:20-24). Just consider these particular marks of change for the better; they are a revolution. There is truthfulness (4:25), control of temper (4:25-27), honest and generous labour (4:28), avoidance of bad language and bitterness (4:29-31), loving-kindness (5:1-2), horror of impurity in act or word (5:3-6). In short, Christians must be at home, not in darkness and deeds of shame, but in the light which is shed by the presence of Christ (5:7-14). This will produce a wise sobriety, in a spirit of thankfulness to God, and of good feeling towards one another (5:15-21).

Let us come down to the details of family life; for the family is the unit of society. Out of families, rather than out of individuals, the Church is built up. There is the duty of wives to husbands and of husband to wives, symbolising the relation between Christ and the Church, just as the family symbolises the Church (5:22-33). There is the duty of children to parents and of parents to children (6:1-4). And there is the duty of servants to masters and of masters to servants (6:5-9). In all these three elements of family life the idea of unity is found once more. Husband and wife, in a mysterious way, are ‘one flesh.’ The relationship of parent and child, with affectionate education on the one side and affectionate obedience on the other, is ‘in the Lord’; each is a member of Christ. Both servants and masters have one and the same Master in heaven. And in all three cases there is one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all.’

But the peacefulness of the family gives only one side of the Christian life; on another side it is a perpetual warfare against great and unseen powers. Against these spiritual hosts of wickedness the Christian must always be fully armed with weapons equal to the conflict; and there is a divine equipment of truth and righteousness, faith and salvation, the gospel and the word of God, always at his disposal (6:10-17). But he must not be absorbed in his own contest; he must remember to pray for all other Christians. Especially let him remember the prisoner that writes this letter, and pray, not that he may be set free, but that even in chains he may have courage to preach the gospel. Tychicus will tell you all about him; and may God give all of you His grace and love, together with faith to accept these gifts (6:16-24).

The earliest form of the title is 'To the Ephesians'; but even this is not original. Whoever first placed it at the head of the Epistle either made a good guess as to its destination or had 'at Ephesus' (1:1) in his copy. Marcion called it 'To the Laodiceans.'

CHAPTER 1

THANKSGIVING FOR BLESSINGS AND PRAYER FOR WISDOM

1, 2. The salutation. 1. In the Salutations to the Colossians and to Philemon, written at the same time, 'Timothy the brother' is coupled with St. Paul. He is omitted here because of the general character of the letter. At Ephesus was omitted for the same reason (see Intro.). The Apostle takes the whole responsibility of instructing Christians at large respecting 'the whole counsel of God' (Ac 20:27).

2. This is the usual salutation in the Pauline, as in the Petrine Epistles; 1 and 2 Timothy are exceptions.

3-14. This doxology or thanksgiving should be compared with that in 2 Cor 1:8-11. That is for a special deliverance; this is for God's general mercy in revealing His purpose to sum up all things in Christ. 'We Jews have long had this promise; but ye Gentiles also have been sealed with the Holy Spirit as an earnest of the inheritance.' The long sentence, with its accumulated richness of language, shows how difficult St. Paul finds it to express in words the majestic thoughts of which his mind is so full. 'I bless God, who has blessed us with the best of blessings, in virtue of our union with Christ. For this end He selected us from all eternity to live in His presence in holiness and love. All along He destined us to be His sons through the work of Jesus Christ. He did this simply out of His good-will, and to call forth our adoring gratitude. This was His grace to us in Him who is the Beloved, who redeemed us by His death, and freed us from our sins. What a wealth of grace is this! It conveys wisdom and understanding; for He has let us know His secret purpose, which directs and explains the course of ages, to bring all things, both in heaven and on earth, into harmony in Christ. In Christ, I say, in whom we have been chosen as God's portion; for all along He destined us, according to His all-wise will, that we Jews, who had fixed our hopes on Christ, should live to His glory. And with us Jews, you Gentiles also are now associated by faith in the gospel, and have received the Spirit as a pledge that you are His portion, and that His work of redemption is complete and redounds to His glory.'

3. With the God of our Lord Jesus Christ cp. 117 Heb 19 Jn 20:17 Rev 16 3 2, 12. With all spiritual blessings] RV 'with every spiritual blessing.' Something much higher than the material, temporal blessings promised in the OT. In heavenly places] RV 'in the heavenly places.' The phrase is found in four other places in Ephesians (1 20 23 10 12), and nowhere else. There is no substantive in the Gk., and we may render, 'among the heavenly things'; the unseen world, in which lie the spiritual forces which oppose us and which help us. Here are the true realities.

4. In history God selected the Jews first, and then the Gentiles; but the selection of both was made in eternity, independently of time, and through Christ. In love] man's love to God and his fellows, not God's love to man (3 17 4 2, 15, 16 5 2). 5. All are God's children by creation; but He adopted first the Jews (Ro 9:4), and then believers (Ro 8:15 Gal 4:5), into a special sonship. St. Paul is the only NT. writer who uses this metaphor of adoption, taken from Roman law. 6. To the praise of the glory] This phrase comes thrice, as a sort of refrain: cp. vv. 12, 14. God's amazing bounty is a glory to be ceaselessly praised.

7. Israel had been redeemed by Jehovah from bondage; Israelites and Gentiles are redeemed by Christ from sin. 8. Wisdom and prudence] These are the fruits of God's grace in us; insight into His counsels and consequent wise conduct: in all = in giving us all, etc. 9. Mystery] In the NT. this means a secret that has been revealed; a favourite word with St. Paul (3:4, etc. 5:2 6:19, etc.): cp. 2 Esdr 12:36.

10. 'For carrying out a dispensation which was carried out in the fulness of the seasons, so as to gather up in one all things in Christ.' When all the seasons had run out, the final revelation came: cp. 2 Esdr 4:87. Dispensation] = (1) office of steward, (2) household management, (3) any provision or arrangement.

12. Ye also 'ye Gentiles as well as we Jews.' Sealed with'] received the Holy Spirit as a pledge that your deliverance should be complete.' 14. An earnest = Scotch 'arles,' is more than a 'pledge'; it is an instalment handed over in advance, as a guarantee that the remainder will follow (2 Cor 1:22 5). It is part of the whole to be delivered. Redemption of the purchased possession] the emancipation of all that God has made His own.'

15. C. 2 10. The doxology shades off into prayer that his readers may have wisdom to understand the glory of their inheritance and the great power of God, a power manifested in raising and exalting Christ (vv. 20–23), and in raising and exalting us (2:1–10). How great it must be!

15. Heard] This looks as if there were some whom St. Paul had not seen, i.e. others besides Ephesians. 17. Cp. 2 Esdr 14:22–25.

21. The Apostle partly adopts and partly rejects Jewish phraseology about unseen powers. 'Call them what you please, Christ is above them all.' 22. An echo of Ps 8 6:8. If that could be said of man, how much more of Christ! 23. Cp. the Vine and the branches (Jn 15); Christ is the source of the life and completeness of the Church. But St. Paul seems to mean that Christ is, in a sense, incomplete without the Church. The very idea of Head implies a body. It is doubtful whether the Gk. can mean 'that filth of all in all.' Rather, 'who all in all is being fulfilled, made complete': cp. Col 1:19.

CHAPTER 2

Gentiles and Jews are now one in Christ

1–10. Further illustration of God's power. He raised both Gentiles and Jews from the death of sin and exalted them to Christ's side. 2. The prince of the power of the air: Jewish phraseology, as in 1:21. The air is regarded as full of evil powers, with Satan as their prince (Lk 1:26; Ac 26:18 Col 1:12). 3. Also we are Jews as dead in sins as you Gentiles, and were thus objects of God's wrath.' (5:6).

Had our conversation] RV 'lived.'

5. Quickened us...with Christ] 'made us, who were morally dead, to share the life of Christ.' 6, 8, 9. 'No merit of our own has saved us; it is all God's free gift.' 10. Created in Christ Jesus] He means the new creation, by which the whole human race, reunited in Christ, makes a fresh start (2:14 4:24 Gal 6:15). Mankind began as one race; it was split in two; it is now one again.

11–22. 'Ye Gentiles were formerly cut off from Israel and from God's promises. But now Christ's death has broken down the barrier between Gentile and Jew, and reconciled both as one body to God. There are now no strangers: all are fellow-citizens; all are parts of a spiritual temple, in which God, in His Spirit, dwells.'

11. In the flesh] repeated for emphasis;

it was in the flesh that the difference between Jew and Gentile was marked. Called] not contemptuous in either place; not 'so-called.' The distinction was real enough, but it has been done away. 12. Without God] 'Atheists; the only place where the word occurs in the Bible: the heathen were 'godless.' 13. But now] The blessed contrast is enlarged upon at four times the length (vv. 13–22) of the original sad condition (vv. 11, 12).

14. He is our peace] emphatic pronoun: 'it is He who is our peace.' The middle wall of partition is perhaps an allusion to the warning barrier which marked off the Court of the Gentiles from the higher level of the Court of the Women in the Temple. It was death for a Gentile to pass the barrier. 15. The Fall of man introduced discord between God and man, and between man and man. The Law revealed this discord. Christ in His humanity fulfilled the Law for man, and set an example of perfect obedience. His humanity united all mankind; His obedience united mankind to God. 16. A paradox: the Slain slays, and a bloody death, which commonly provokes enmity, slays it. 17. Exulting repetition of 'peace,' four times in four vv.: cp. Isa 57:19.

19. From the idea of 'Father' he easily passes to that of 'household,' and thence to that of 'a house.' 20. They are not merely members of the family; they are stones in the structure of the home, in which God Himself dwells: see on 3:4. 21. All the building] This is the right meaning: only one building is in the Apostle's mind, as the preceding vv. show. The RV's accuracy is here misleading: cp. 'all' in 1 Cor 14:22. 22. Through the Spirit] RV 'in the Spirit.' It is in the Spirit's dwelling in us that God dwells in us.

CHAPTER 3

Reasons for renewing the Prayer for Wisdom

1–13. A digression, which, however, could not be spared. As in 113, he begins to speak of himself, and this time he explains his unique interest in the conversion of the Gentiles. 'Many of his readers had not seen him, but they must have heard of the special work assigned to him by God, of making known to all the mystery of the ages, so that even angelic powers learn through the Church the many-sidedness of the Divine counsels.'

1. 'It was worth while becoming a prisoner in such a cause' (Philemon v. 9, 2 Tim 1:8).

2. Again the sentence is broken: cp. 1:13

4:4, 5. His being a prisoner on their behalf suggests a fresh train of thought. If he had been writing to Ephesians only, he could not have said 'if.' Ephesians had heard himself: cp. Col 1:20. 3. Afore in few words] in the first two chs. 5. 'The revelation is quite new; it has been hidden for many generations.' The Apostles and prophets are holy, as the readers are saints (1), as being set apart for God's service; they had accepted St. Paul's doctrine of salvation for the Gentiles. The prophets are the NT. prophets, as in 2:20 4:11 1 Cor 12:28-31. 6. This is the mystery that has been revealed.

9. 'That which for ages has been kept secret from the wisest and holiest is now brought to light for all to see.' 10. It is an amazing thought that, by means of the Church, God's varied wisdom in the scheme of redemption is made known to heavenly beings. 'Angels desire to look into' the manifold grace of God' (1 Pet 1:12 4:10). 11, 12. God's eternal purpose accomplished in Christ, through faith in whom we have courage to draw near to God. 12. A repetition of 2:18: cp. Ro 8:85, 86. 13. That ye might not faint'] It might mean 'that I may not faint.' But St. Paul is not afraid of losing heart; he rejoiced in tribulations (Ro 5:3), and took pleasure in weaknesses (2 Cor 12:10). He is afraid that the Gentiles may lose heart, when they see him persecuted for helping them: they ought rather to glory in this.

Now he returns to v. 1 after his magnificent digression, and at last gives in fulness the prayer for their enlightenment which he began 1:17. It is a very bold intercession.

14-21. Prayer and doxology. 'May they have great spiritual power, may Christ dwell in their hearts, may they know His incomprehensible love, and be filled up to the measure of God's fulness. To Him, who can give in abundance blessings which we cannot even imagine, be glory for ever.'

14. For this cause] because of their union with the Jews in Christ (2:19-22). The Jews stood to pray (Mt 6:5 Lk 18:11-18), prostration being exceptional; but Christians are said to kneel (Ac 7:60 9:40 20:6 219), perhaps after Lk 22:41.

15. 'All fatherhood, whether earthly or celestial, derives its name from the Fatherhood of God.' 16. The inner man] is the immaterial part of man's nature, the soul and spirit; 'the outward man' (2 Cor 4:19) being the flesh.

18. May be able] may have full strength to comprehend what is really incomprehensible.' The four dimensions represent the want of the love of Christ towards us. 19. An audacious paradox: 'that ye may be filled up to all the fulness of God,' i.e. to the perfection of the Divine attributes (Mt 5:48).

20. The doxology explains the audacity of the prayer. God can give superabundantly quite inconceivable boons. 21. In the Church by Christ Jesus] RV 'in the Church and in Christ Jesus,' in the Body and in the Head. The Church in this Epistle is always the Church universal, never a local Church. This Church completes the Christ (1:23), reveals God's wisdom to the angels (3:10), is, with Christ, the sphere in which God is glorified. It is indeed a glorious Church (5:27).

CHAPTER 4

UNITY OF THE NEW-LIFE. RULES FOR THE NEW LIFE

The Apostle passes, as usual, from doctrinal statements to practical exhortations; but doctrine is here and there introduced to support exhortation.

1-6. 'Live in humility, in loving forbearance, and in unity, for we have one Body, one Head, and one Heavenly Father.' 1. Prisoner] This looks back to 3:1. 'He can no longer superintend them: they must walk alone. He lost his liberty in their service: they will do what he asks.' 2. To a Greek, meekness was a second-rate virtue, and lowliness no virtue at all. The gospel gives both qualities their true position. The nearer man comes to God, the more he feels his own worthlessness, and the member of a vast Church knows his own insignificance. 4. 'One Body, animated by one Spirit, and cheered by one Hope.'

5. 'One Head, to which each member is united by one Faith and one Baptism.'

6. 'One God, the supreme Source and Sustainer.' In you all] RV 'in all.' Throughout the v. the 'all' is vague and may be neuter: we must leave it vague. Note the Trinitarian background: Spirit, Lord, Father.

7-16. 'But the various members have various gifts and functions.'

8. He saith] There is no pronoun in the Greek, and the nominative may be 'it,' 'the Scripture,' vix. Ps 68:18. The important parts of the quotation are 'He ascended' and 'gave gifts.' Led captivity captive] i.e. led many captives in His train. These He used as ministers. 9, 10. The meaning of this obscure passage seems to be this. 'Christ ascended, not to leave His Church an orphan (Jn 14:18), but in order to return to it with the rich gifts of His spiritual presence. The ascents without this subsequent descent would be incomprehensible.' The descent is placed after the ascent, and can hardly refer to either the burial or the descent into Hades. RV omits first.

11. He gave] 'He' is emphatic; 'He it is sative, not dative. St. Paul is speaking of the Church as a whole, and does not mention bishops, presbyters, or deacons, which were local ministers: cp. 1 Cor 12:28 Ro 12:6-8.

12. For...for...for There is a change of preposition, which should be marked in English—for...unto...unto; and there should be no comma after ‘saints.’ The saints are perfected with a view to their ministering, to their building up of the Church. 13. Come in the unity] RV ‘attain unto the unity.’ A more mature and perfect unity than the Church had at first (2:10), an ideal to work for, resulting in a mature and perfect humanity, endowed with the fulness which Christ, in union with the Church (1:23), has.

14. ‘In order to reach this united manhood, we must cease to be a number of unstable children, at the mercy of every scheming teacher.” 15. Speaking the truth in love] upholding truth without bitterness.

16. Language cannot express the full truth. Christ is the Head. He is also the whole organism. He is also the source of its unity, growth, and energy. Consistency of thought and language is lost in this divine physiology.

17–24. ‘How different are the believing Gentiles from the unbelieving! Believers must beware of retaining anything of the vanity, ignorance, or impurity of the old heathen life.’

17. Walk] He returns from the lofty panegyric of Christian unity to the lower but necessary topic of the Christian ‘walk.’ He began with ‘do’ (4:1); here it is nearly all ‘do not.’

18. Pagans, ‘being darkened in their understanding,’ must be alienated from Him in whom is no darkness (1 Jn 1:5). RV substitutes ‘hardening’ for blindness; perhaps wrongly.

19. Being past feeling] they ceased to notice the pricks of conscience, and became reckless. In Ro 1:21-24 we have the same sequence: vanity, darkness, uncleanness.

21. Heard him] He is not thinking of the possibility that some of them had heard Christ teach: they ‘heard Him’ in listening to the gospel; heard what He taught on earth.

In Jesus] St. Paul rarely uses this name by itself; when he does, he is thinking of the earthly life, death, and rising again. To Him Christ is the glorified Christ, ‘Jesus Christ,’ ‘Christ Jesus,’ ‘the Lord Jesus,’ or ‘the Lord Jesus Christ.’ 22. Put off] Like filthy, worn-out clothes, the old self had to be put away.

Conversation has the old meaning of ‘manner of life’ (Shakespeare, ‘2 Hen. IV,’ v. 5): cp. 1 Pet 3:2 2 Pet 2:27. 24. The new man which after God hath been created is that fresh form of humanity, after the first divine pattern, which redemption has produced. In

Chapter 5

The Old Darkness and New Light.

Rules for the Married

1, 2. In close connexion with what precedes. ‘It is the mark of beloved children to become imitators of a loving Father; practise the self-sacrifice of Christ, which shows how He loved us and the Father.’

3–14. Special exhortation against covetousness and impurity.

3. But] The five sins mentioned in 4:25–32 are to be put away; these two are not even to be mentioned: ‘saints’ are set apart from such subjects, being consecrated to God. 4. ‘Do not get near these topics for the sake of being amusing.’ ‘Thanksgiving’ is not an obvious contrast to ‘jesting,’ but in Gk. there is an alliteration; not thoughtlessness, but thanksgiving. Convenient] RV ‘befitting.’ 5. ‘Those who do these things can have no inheritance in Christ’s kingdom.’ 6. ‘Sophists tell you that these things are “natural,” “venial,” “pecadilloes.”’ It is just these sins which incur God’s wrath.’

7, 8. ‘Do not return to your old darkness (4:18): ye are now light to illuminate others.’

9. Fruit of the Spirit] This comes from Gal 5:22: ‘fruit of the light’ is right here (RV). 10. ‘Those who walk as children of light find out by experience what God’s will is: light is always a test.’ 11. Light has ‘fruit’ (v. 9), but darkness has only ‘fruitless works’: cp. Gal 5:19, 22. Rather reprove them] ‘rather even expose them,’ as light is sure to do. ‘Reprove them’ is hardly consistent with the context. In Jn 3:20 ‘reproved’ should be ‘exposed’: cp. 1 Cor 14:24. Things so shameful ought not to be passed over.

13. ‘But all things when they are exposed the light are made manifest; for whatsoever is made manifest is light." Light turns darkness into light: this had happened to his wifes (v. 8). 14. He saith] rather, 'it saith' 'it is said.' The quotation is probably from a Christian hymn, based on Isa 60:1: cp. Tim 3:16.

15-21. 'Be most careful then in conduct. Beware of folly; in particular of drunkenness. Refer spiritual exaltation and an orderly life, in your own place.' 15. Then or therefore marks the return to exhortation; and walk refers back to vv. 8. RV is everywhere better: 'Look therefore carefully how ye walk, not as unwise, but as wise.' 16. Redeeming] 'buying up for ourselves the opportunity.' 17. Wherefore o not show yourselves fools, but understand.'

18. Excess] RV 'riot' (as Tit 1:4; 1 Pet 4:4), 'riotous living' (Lk 15:18). With the spirit] RM 'in spirit'; 'not your bodies, but our souls should be full.' 19. The primitive church was emphatically a Church of enthusiasm and spiritual emotion (Ac 2:44-47; 8:16-25; Col 3:16, 21). But everything is to be done decently and in order; enthusiasm is not to lead to anarchy. St. Paul ceaselessly reaches 'submission' or 'subjection' to authority (Ro 13:1-7; 1 Cor 14:32, 34; 16:14; Tit 3:1).

22-33. First illustration of orderly subordination: the relation between wives and husbands.

22. As unto the Lord] with 'the fear of Christ' (v. 21) as their motive. 23. Once more (3:15) a mystical connexion between heavenly and earthly relationships is traced. The forethought of the head preserves the body: control implies obligation to protect.

24. Accepting protection implies submission. 25-33. The love of husbands to their wives corresponds to Christ's love to His Church, for which He sacrificed Himself, to hallow it, to present it to Himself, and to keep it holy. Christ and the Church are one in body; husband and wife are one in body; hence Christ's love for His Church is that of husband for bride. Of marriage it is wonderfully said that two become one. This is true of Christ and the Church. And as the Church responds to Christ's love with reverential fear, so let the wife have reverential fear of her husband.

By the word] RV 'with the word,' to be taken with 'the washing of water' and meaning the baptismal formula. 27. That He might Himself to Himself present the Church all-glorious': cp. 2 Cor 11:2, of St. Paul's presenting the Corinthian Church to Christ.

28. RV 'Even so ought husbands also to love their own wives as [being] their own bodies.' Not 'as much as,' or 'as if they were': their wives are their own bodies.

29. The change from 'body' to 'flesh' prepares for what is coming. 30. Christ cherishes the Church, because its members are His. The words 'of His flesh and of His bones' are an interpolation from Gn 2:23.

32. This is a great mystery] RV 'This mystery is great.' It has a deep, wide-reaching meaning; but I am employing it of Christ and the Church. 33. Reverence] RV 'fear.' He returns to the motive stated at the outset, 'the fear of Christ' (v. 21). Reverential fear, as that of the Church to her Lord, is meant. Subjection without reverence would be servile.

CHAPTER 6

RULES FOR THE FAMILY. THE CHRISTIAN'S ARMOUR

1. As before, those who have to obey and submit are taken first. Cp. in the Lord here with 'unto the Lord' (5:22) and 'unto Christ' (v. 5). Right] both nature and the express Law of God enjoin it. 2. With promise] the first which is accompanied with a promise: cp. 'with the word' (5:26). We might punctuate, 'the first commandment, with promise that it may be well,' etc. 3. On the other hand, disobedience to parents is very heinous (Ro 1:20; 2 Tim 3:5). 4. And] Parents also have their obligations: they must (1) not be unreasonable in their demands on their children; (2) give godly discipline.' He says 'fathers,' because mothers would be less likely to be too severe or to control the education.

Nurture] RV 'chastening' (Heb 12:5, 7, 8, 11): in 2 Tim 3:16, 'instruction.' Of the Lord means 'such as God would provide': cp. 'of God,' v. 11.

5. Servants] All servants then were slaves; and St. Paul says 'slaves': 'be obedient to might be 'obey,' as in v. 1: 'according to the flesh = earthly. With fear and trembling] very anxious to do well': it does not imply a harsh master (2 Cor 7:15; Phil 2:12). 6. Christianity gives no sanction to rebellion; it elevates and intensifies the duty of obedience. From the heart] These words may be taken with what follows; 'from the soul with good-will doing service.' 7. Obedience must be not only thorough, but hearty; temper is all-important. 8. 'Good conduct, whether of slave or lord, will be fully requited by Him who is Lord of both.' 9. Masters, like husbands and parents, have their obligations; they also must have good-temper and good-will, and be God-fearing.' St. Paul does not tell them to emancipate their slaves; but he tells them to love them as brethren (Philemon v. 16). This does not free the slave, but it frees slavery of its evils.

10-20. The final charge is, 'Be strong, and find your strength in the Lord. Be armed with God's armour; for we have to contend, not with earthly foes, but with spiritual powers of great wickedness. Watch and pray ceaselessly for the whole Church and for me, that I may be a courageous missionary, even in prison.'

10. My brethren] an insertion from Phil 3: cp. 2Cor 13: Phil 3: 2Th 3. Be strong] lit. 'be strengthened' (Ro 4:20). Whole armour] Nothing must be missing of the full provision which God makes for our safety.' St. Paul omits the spear or pike and the greaves of the Roman soldier, yet mentions being girded and shod, which most men are, but soldiers must be. The malignant powers, by which the wiles or stratagems of the devil are carried out, are specified. The passage is tinged by Jewish ideas about the unseen world. The rulers of the darkness of this world] This fairly represents the Gk., which means powers of darkness, that are rulers of this world, but not rulers of the universe: cp. 1: 3: Col 1: 15. In the heavenly places (RV)] In the spiritual world': but the Jews contemplated the possibility of evil in some of their seven heavens.

13. 'Against these superhuman powers nothing less than the whole armour of God will suffice; but with that the Christian warrior is safe.' 14. The Septuagint of Isa 11:5 and 59:17 is in the Apostle's mind: there it is Jehovah who wears the panoply. The preparation] readiness to preach the good-tidings of peace: cp. Isa 52:7. The Christian warrior fights to bring peace. Fire-tipt darts is a metaphor for fierce temptations coming from the outside. Faith in God is a sure protection against them. Take] 'Receive from God who supplies the panoply, and whose Spirit furnishes the sword, the helmet that is salvation.' He is thinking of Isa 11:4: cp. Heb 4:12. The thought of the sword furnished by the Spirit, 'who makes intercession for us' (Ro 8:26), naturally leads on to the thought of prayer: 'receive this sword, with all prayer and supplication praying in every season (1Th 5:17) in the Spirit.' Watching] as a trusty warrior should (Lk 21:36). For me] RV 'on my behalf,' there being a change of preposition in the Gk.: cp. Col 4:3. Boldly] This probably belongs to what follows, as RV 'that utterance may be given unto me in opening my mouth, to make known with boldness,' etc. 'Pray that all this may be granted to me.' Am an ambassador in bonds] RV 'in chains': mg. 'in a chain.' The singular may refer to the coupling-chain by which he could be attached to the soldier that guarded him. In any case, that an ambassador, whose person was inviolate, should be chained, was a paradox.

21, 22. The Mission of Tychicus: almost verbatim as Col 4:7,8. Tychicus is the bearer of both letters, and of that to Philemon: cp. Ac 20:4 2Tim 4:12 Tit 3:12. By long service he well earned the title of 'faithful minister.'

Note the omission of all personal salutations and similar details, of which we have eight vv. in the Epistle to the Colossians. This is a circular letter to several Churches, and hence no individuals are mentioned. Note also the change to the third person, 'to the brethren...all them that love our Lord.' In Colossians, as elsewhere, he says 'you.' In two other points this benediction differs from that in other letters. It is twofold, not single; Peace be to, Grace be with; and 'Peace' is placed before, not after 'Grace.' Contrast Ro 17 1Cor 18 2Cor 12 Gal 1:3 Col 1:2, etc. An imitator would have copied other Epistles.

24. Sincerity] It is doubtful whether the Gk. can mean this; better, 'incorruption' (1Cor 15:42, 50, 58, 54) or 'incorruptibility.' It is those who love with an imperishable love that are meant: there must be neither decrease nor decay. 'Those who were "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world" (14) retain their love for Him undiminished after the world itself has passed away.'

A worthy conclusion to this immortal Epistle.
PHILOIPIANS

INTRODUCTION

x. Writer and Readers. The community of the saints in Christ Jesus at Philippi had existed ten years or more when this letter was addressed to them, in 61 or 62 A.D. It was founded by the two servants of Christ Jesus whose names head the letter, along with St. Silas (Silvanus, 1 Th 1, etc.). St. Paul's colleague on the second of his great missionary journeys (49-53 A.D.: see Acts 16:21).

The graphic story of the coming of the gospel to Philippi in Acts 16:5 is from the pen of an eyewitness; from v. 10 to v. 16 the narrative runs in the first person plural, which reappears in Acts 15:43 at a point six years later, when St. Luke, presumably, rejoined the Apostle at Philippi.

Philippi (in form a Gk. plural)—earlier Crenides—borne the name of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, who gave the place importance. It guarded the eastern frontier of Macedonia, and commanded the pass leading from the interior plains to the Aegean Sea at Neapolis (Acts 16:11). This was the first station for a traveller from the E. along the Via Egnatia, the Roman highway across the Balkan peninsula; here St. Paul first halted in his invasion of Europe, and the Philippian Church was the earliest fruit of his labours in our continent. The town had given its name to the famous battle, fought in 42 B.C., in which Antony and Octavian crushed the Republicans of Rome under Brutus and Cassius. In commemoration of that victory Philippi was raised to the rank of a military colony, a body of discharged soldiers being settled there. The colonists were free citizens, enjoying exemption from poll-tax and tribute, and the right of holding the land in full ownership. Such communities were regarded as detached portions of the Roman State, and took no little pride in their connexion with the imperial city. The Philippian officials are designated, in Roman style, 'praetors' and 'lictors' in Acts 16 (AV 'magistrates' and 'serjeants'); they beat the prisoners with the Roman 'rods.' 'Being Romans,' the people of Philippi resent the introduction of 'unlawful' Jewish 'customs' (Acts 16:20, 21). Hence also the emphasis and effect with which the Apostle and his companion assert here their Roman citizenship.

Though but a fraction of the Church may have belonged to the privileged class holding the Italian franchise, the civil status of the colony affected all its inhabitants; the meanest Philippien was sensible of the dignity of his city. Twice in this letter St. Paul describes the Christian status as a 'citizenship' (1:27, 30; see RV. and mg.). The 'colonial' sentiment of Philippi doubtless heightened the interest with which the readers watched the course of their Apostle's trial and entered into his experiences at Rome.

Behind the offended civic pride of Philippi there lay the vulgar motive of 'gain' (Acts 16:19), which in the first instance awakened hostility to the Christian teaching in this place. Wherever the gospel won heathen converts, it injured the vested interests of paganism. In Philippi St. Paul silenced a soothsaying slave-girl, and her masters, seeing their unholy property spoilt, dragged the offenders before the rulers and roused the populace against them. The indignities which SS. Paul and Silas suffered under this attack (cp. 1 Th 2:2 with Acts 16), were the beginning of a persecution that has continued to the time of writing; in such experience the Church is identified with its Apostle: see Phil 1:15, 29, 30; 2:13, and Col. 2:12. From the first it has had to 'struggle for the faith of the gospel' (1:27).

Judaism counted for little in Philippi. Instead of a synagogue, there was only a 'proseuchē' ('praying-place')—probably a retired open-air resort—by the river-banks outside the town, where the missionaries found a company of women assembled on the sabbath (Acts 16:14). Out of this band the first Christian disciple, Lydia of Thyatira, was gained, and probably the women named in Acts 4:23 (see note). The circle, it may be presumed, was Jewish only in part. St. Paul gathered his converts and helpers largely from the constituency of intelligent and pious Gentiles (more often women than men) who frequented Jewish worship as 'proselytes' or 'fearers of God,' and had been grounded in the OT. Women took a leading part in the Philippian Church at the outset; Macedonia was distinguished in Greek society by the greater freedom and influence allowed to their sex.

Since the events of Acts 16 and 17, St. Paul had twice traversed Macedonia, and accordingly visited Philippi: first on his way from Ephesus, through Troas, to Corinth toward the end of the Third Missionary Tour in the spring of the year 56 (1 Cor 16:5); and again on leaving Corinth in the following spring, when he kept Easter there (Ac 20:4). From 2 Cor 1:11-13, 15 7-15 we gather that the Apostle was at the period of the former of these two visits in great trouble, suffering from prostrating bodily sickness and from anxiety about the Corinthian and (probably) the Galatian Churches, whose loyalty at that juncture hung in doubt: see Gal 1:19 3:1,4, 20 5-2; cp. 2 Cor 11:28. Arriving in such a plight in Macedonia, Philippi would be his harbour of refuge; there, we imagine, he passed the crisis of his illness, under St. Luke's skilful care (see par. 2 above). These intervening visits, though not recalled in the Epistle, help to account for the intimacy it reveals between writer and readers; they serve to justify the words of 15 implying a continuous intercourse, and give a fuller meaning to the language of 21, which speaks of mutual 'consolation' and 'compassions.'

Although Timothy figures along with 'Paul' in the Address—for the former is with the Apostle at the time of writing and is well known to the readers (2:22), and therefore shares in the Salutation—the letter proceeds from St. Paul alone, running in the first person singular throughout (otherwise than in 1 Th and 2 Cor 1-7); St. Timothy is referred to in the course of the letter (2:10-23), just like Epaphroditus, in the third person.

The writer is a prisoner awaiting trial, and at Rome; he is in sight of the end of his captivity there, which extended over two years (62 A.D.; see Ac 28:30, 31). His 'appeal to Cæsar' is at last to be decided (1:20 2:23, 24). The Apostle has been long enough in Rome, and free enough despite his 'bonds' (as Ac 20:14, 16, 20, 31 intimates), to make his influence widely felt in various directions (1:12-16 4:29).

If 'in the praetorium' (1:13; see note) means 'amongst the praetorian troops,' the impression made on the army is accounted for by the succession of guards put in charge of the prisoner at his lodging; if it means, as Sir W.M. Ramsay suggests, 'in the praetorian court,' then the judicial trial is proceeding, and the accused has been removed to prison-quarters.

2. Occasion of the Letter. Beyond others, the Philippians were grateful and devoted to the Apostle Paul (1 4:15). Lydia's insistent hospitality at the beginning (Ac 16:15) was typical of this Church's character; cp. 2 Cor 8:1-4. Twice it had sent aid to St. Paul in Thessalonica on his first departure, and subsequently when he left Macedonia for Achaia; now their care for him has 'blossomed anew.' Epaphroditus had been dispatched with a sum of money for his necessities, under instructions to stay and assist the Apostle in Rome (2:25, 30 4:10-18). The good man fell dangerously ill upon his errand, and after his recovery is longing for home; St. Paul sends him back therefore, and this letter with him. Epaphroditus brought tidings from the Philippians in conveying their gift; and further communications had taken place since his arrival, for the Philippians have heard of the illness of their deputy and he is informed of their grief over this (2:26). They seem to have written quite recently to St. Paul, expressing their anxiety about his trial, betraying also—to judge from the tone of his reply—some despondency under the protracted afflictions falling on themselves, and some concern about the manner in which their present had been received: see on 4:10. We must bear in mind that the extant Epistles are extracts from a larger correspondence; to read them properly, we need to hear the other side and to reproduce by imagination, between the lines, the messages and requests to which the writer is replying.

There was no error of doctrine, no grave faultiness of life to reprove in this Church—only a certain want of harmony amongst its leading members (4:2, 5); the removal of this defect will 'fill up' the Apostle's 'joy' (2:4, 5).

The prayer of 1:9, 10 and the exhortation of 4:8 (see notes) hint at a deficiency in moral enlightenment and appreciation, such as not unfrequently accompanies religious zeal and lively affections. The warning against Jewish intriguers in 3:11 was prompted by the writer's present experience and by the general peril from this cause, rather than by any Judaizing tendency on the part of the readers: see on 3:11.

3. Contents of the Letter. The Epistle to the Philippians was strictly a letter, the unconstrained outflow of St. Paul's heart. Hence its delightful desultoriness. It has no burning controversy, no absorbing doctrinal theme, no difficult moral problems to deal with. The recent communications from Philippi supply the starting-point, and are glanced at as occasion serves; but they scarcely control the composition. The Epistle does not admit therefore of formal analysis; its links of association are those of feeling and of memory, not of logic.

The opening phrase of c. 3 divides the writing into its two parts—principal (chs. 1, 2) and supplementary (chs. 3, 4). The latter section runs, beyond the writer's intention, to a length equaling that of the former: the repetition of the 'Finally' of 31 in 4:8 indicates that his thought has made an excursion.

The division of the first and main half of the letter falls at v. 26 of c. 1. After the prefatory thanksgiving and prayer (1:1-11), the Apostle begins by reassuring the Philippians about his own situation (vv. 12-26); with v. 27 he turns from himself to them, exhorting them to the behaviour that will cheer him, and ensure their victory in the common conflict. The above three divisions—1:1-11 1:12-26 1:27-2:8—are linked by the thought of 'the gospel,' which is the ground of union between writer and readers: see 15, 12, 27, 26 ('word of life'). Having told the Philippians what they wish to hear about him (11-28), and what he wishes to see in them (27-29), the Apostle further states what he intends to do for them, by sending Epaphroditus, and then Timothy, hoping himself to come ere long, so that their hearts and his may be mutually refreshed (21-30).

At 31 the Epistle seems to be concluding. Had the writer proceeded at once from this point to c. 4, 32-21 would never have been missed. This long passage is an unpremeditated outburst—by a few critics mistakenly regarded as an editorial interpolation from another letter, by others attributed to some provocation that interrupted the Apostle in the act of writing. Three distinct classes of errorists appear to be stigmatised in c. 3—the first and last being of a virulent type. Vv. 2, 3 denounce St. Paul’s old enemies, the zealots for Jewish Law; vv. 17-21 combat the Gentile tendency to sensual licence. The common reference to the writer’s personal example binds these denunciatory paragraphs together (see also 4): against legalist pretensions he sets forth his experience as a Jewish Christian believer (vv. 4-11); the sensualists are shamed by the purity and loftiness of the Christian life exhibited in himself and those like-minded (vv. 17-21). The bearing of the intervening paragraph (vv. 12-16) is more difficult to seize: the Judaica are, seemingly, forgotten, the Antinomians not yet in sight; the Apostle at this point is contrasting himself with pretenders to perfection, with Christians who deem themselves already at the goal, denying the future resurrection (v. 11), and renouncing the aspirations after the heavenly state that were so strongly cherished by St. Paul: see on vv. 3, 12, 15. Nothing could show more affectingly the Apostle’s deep communion with the readers and the ascendency of his character, than this frank unlocking of his heart to them and the use he makes for their benefit of his most sacred experiences. So the after-thought forms the most precious part of this Epistle.

The actual conclusion in c. 4 consists of a brief homily, partly personal, partly general in scope (vv. 4-9); followed by an acknowledgment of the Philippian bounty (vv. 10-20)—probably the chief subject in the writer’s mind when he intended finishing the letter at 31; and the final good wishes (vv. 21-23). The scheme of the Epistle on which this exposition is based is as follows:—

§ 1. Address and Salutation (11, 2).

I. ACT OF PRAISE AND PRAYER.

§ 2. Thanksgiving for Fellowship in the Gospel (3-8). § 3. Prayer for the perfecting of Love in Knowledge (9-11).
St. Paul's character, such as Galatians holds in the history of his doctrine. It exhibits an unsurpassed picture of selfless devotion, manly fortitude, and joyous Christian hope; well may the writer say, 'I can do all things in Him that enables me!'

While kindred in language and thought to the other Letters of the First Roman Captivity—Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon—Philippians stands somewhat apart from these three; the question of priority as between it and them is disputed. From the fact that it was written toward the close of the imprisonment when the Apostle had been for a considerable time in Rome (see last par. of I above), and from other indications, we judge that Philippians was the latest of the group. The opening prayer recalls those of Ephesians and Colossians, which also turn on the connexion of knowledge and love; vv. 12–16 of ch. 3 (see notes) are best understood as alluding to notions kindred to the Colossian error. The Christological passage of Phil 2:5–11 comes from a mind full of the grand conception of the glory of Christ that St. Paul has developed in Colossians. This paragraph, and the sentence concerning Justification by Faith in 3:19, go to show that the characteristic doctrines of St. Paul's Epistles were as far as possible from being abstract theorems or passing phases of thought due to controversial exigencies. The ideas they express present themselves in a spontaneous, unstudied fashion; for they belonged to the staple of the writer's thought, and were the outcome of his vital experience of salvation through Christ.

C. 3 reminds us rather of the Letters of the Second Group: vv. 14, 17, 18, 21 of 1 Cor; vv. 4–6 of 2 Cor; vv. 2, 16 of Gal; and, above all, vv. 9–11 of Ro. It is for this reason chiefly that some leading scholars place Philippians first in the Third Group of the Epistles, nearest to those just mentioned. The resemblance is explained by the consideration that when touching upon Judaic questions St. Paul's mind inevitably fell into the vein of Romans and Galatians.

The expressions of 1:23 and 2:16, 17, anticipating the writer's death, are in the vein of 2 Tim, the Apostle's farewell letter; while the simplicity and cordiality pervading Philippians recall the strain of his earliest, the First to the (Macedonian) Thessalonians. Thus Philippians combines traits of most of the other Epistles; it mirrors the whole Paul. At once it touches the summits of his loftiest doctrine, and sounds the depths of his mystic consciousness.

The writing and the man are inseparably one. By a consent in which the severest criticism shares, Philippians is ranged with the great quaternion of the Second Group (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians) as amongst the things most certainly genuine and Pauline. Erasmian's sentence is a sufficient verdict on opinions to the contrary: 'Nemo potest Paulinum pecus et fungere' (One cannot feign a heart like Paul's!).

5. St. Polycarp and St. Paul. Some fifty years later the Philippian Church received a letter, that it has preserved, from Polycarp, the martyr-bishop of Smyrna, in which this remarkable testimony is found (§ 3): 'Neither I nor any one like me can follow up the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul, who when he was amongst you, confronting the men of that day, taught with exactness and sureness the doctrine concerning truth: who also when absent wrote [a] letter[s] to you, by the close study of which you will be able to build yourselves up in the faith that was given you.' St. Polycarp seems to refer, in speaking of letters, to more than one Epistle of St. Paul as then extant and used at Philippi—though it is possible, grammatically, that the Gk. plural bore (like litterae in Latin) a singular sense. It is more than likely that the Apostle wrote repeatedly to the Philippians: and if so, several of his letters may well have survived into the 2nd cent., though but one of these found a place in the canonical collection. More important is it to observe the reverence paid to St. Paul by one whom tradition associates with the school of the Apostle John, and whose cast of mind was far from Pauline, and the sense diffused through the Church in the generation following St. Paul of the unique inspiration and authority that attached to his written word: cp. 2 Pet 3:1–16; also the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, chs. 5 and 47; of Ignatius to the Ephesians, 12.2, and to the Romans, 4.3. Polycarp's gracious Epistle to the Philippians reads like an echo of the NT.; Paul's Epistle to the Philippians breathes in every line the freshness and power of the original Christian inspiration.

[Note. The writer comments usually on the revised Text, which is accordingly printed in heavy type.]

CHAPTER 1

THE PRISONER APOSTLE IN ROME

§ 1. Address and Salutation (1:1). or

1, 2. The form of greeting in 1:1, 2 is that common to the Epistles of the third group.

1. To all the saints] holy persons—consecrated to God as all Christian believers are. This and similar emphatic expressions (in vv. 3, 4, 7, 8, 25, c. 42) show that the entire Church, despite differences between its members (2:3, 4), has the Apostle's confidence. Only in this Epistle are the Church officers singled out in the address; probably because they figured in

PHILIPPIANS

1. ACT OF PRAISE AND PRAYER (1:1-11)

§ 2. x1-6. The characteristically Pauline thanksgiving, vv. 3-6, runs into a chain of participial sentences loaded with adverbial clauses, the connexion of which is not always clear. V. 5 accounts for the joy attendant on St. Paul’s supplications for his readers as e to their unbroken fellowship with him; d v. 6 declares the assurance of complete success that animates his prayers. The rendering of this very thing, in v. 6, is difficult to stify; say rather, “being confident on this account—viz. because of your steadfast blowdown with me—that God will consummate in you what He has so signally begun.”

7. The assurance above expressed is supported by the reflexion that it is right to erish these thoughts—of thankfulness, joy, _et al.—about you all, since you hold on in the art... as being all of you fellow-partakers with me in grace: i.e. the Philippians are so entirely bound up with the Apostle in the cause of the gospel, that it would be wrong and an ill-omnip of their devotion to entertain any other thoughts of them. He is conscious of their communion both in his bonds, which they share by sympathy and by the presence of Epaphroditus, and in the defence and confirmation of his share in the cause of Christ and demonstrates its saving power; cp. Eph 6:19, 20. 8. A solemn attestation of the heart-union just declared. To turn over one in the heart of Christ Jesus to love him with the depth and tenderness of His affection: cp. Jn 1:14, and on 1:12, Bowsen] RV ‘tender mercies.’

§ 3. x7-11. The Prayer of vv. 9-11 recognizes the love exhibited in the fellowship of the readers with St. Paul (v. 5), desiring that it may be enriched by intelligence and moral tact. The Gk. term here used for knowledge, characteristic of the letters of this group, signifies ‘advanced, thorough knowledge;’ the word rendered discernment (RV)—here only in the identity. The same persons might be called ‘elders’ in respect of status, and ‘sheep’ in respect of duty. At this ear of development, there was no strict formality of title or function in the offices held in various Churches. Episkopos (bishop) is a name for persons charged with administrative or financial responsibility in Greek communities; and this title may have been adopted by the Hellenic Churches. ‘Deacon’ (akonos) represents the everyday word for servant, ‘attendant,’ as in Mt 20:26 Ro 13:4, etc. For further elucidation, see notes on these words in the Pastoral Epistles. 2. Grace] is God’s forgiving and redeeming love to men:

Ro 4:24-25, 17-21 Eph 1:6, 7 27, 8, etc.

II. ABOUT PAUL’S AFFAIRS (1:12-26)

§ 4. x12-18. The supreme interest of writer and readers alike (cp. vv. 5-7) lies in the progress of the gospel. The news from Rome about St. Paul troubled the Philippians on this account, and their alarm had been expressed in their recent letter: see Intro. He hastens to reassure them: the things that have befallen me have turned out rather to the progress of the gospel. 13. My bonds have become manifest in Christ] means that the writer, instead of being thrust out of sight, as the Philippians fear, is conspicuous at Rome as Christ’s messenger: cp. Eph 6:20. His prison-lodging has become a vantage-ground; see Ac 28:28, 31; his trial is favourably advertising the gospel. The whole Pretorian guard] (‘all the palace,’ wrongly, AV; RM ‘the whole Praetorium’) the corps of troops attached to the imperial head-quarters—had heard of it, presumably through the men told off in turn to guard the prisoner, who was chained by the wrist to his keeper night and day; all the rest signifies the Roman public, who freely visited the distinguished prisoner.

Vv. 14-18 describe the effect of this turn of events on the Roman Church. Some of its members may have been discouraged; but most of the brethren in the Lord... are more abundantly bold, etc. St. Paul’s cheerful confidence, at the same time the respect shown to him in his captivity and the likelihood of his acquittal, encouraged the majority; his trial, so far, went to clear Christianity of... anything criminal in the eyes of the State. Hence the Roman Christians, beyond expectation, have gained confidence by his bonds.

St. Paul’s presence stimulates Christian work at Rome in two opposite ways. 15. Some in their bolder testimony are actuated by envy and strife; some by good will—he rejoices in the activity of both parties! (v. 18). Both, it is clear, are proclaiming a true gospel, and the Apostle’s ill-wishers cannot have been preaching the ‘other (Judaising) gospel’ condemned in Gal 1. Personal dislike actuated the latter; they were jealous of St. Paul’s ascendency, and regarded him as an interloper—a disposition only too natural in a Church of which he was not the founder: cp. Ro 15:15-18. These rivals meanly think to add affliction to his bonds—supposing that he would be chagrined by their success! They proclaim Christ therefore not sincerely (not in a pure spirit), but in pretence (vv. 16, 18); and St. Paul, though glad that their work is making Christ’s name more widely known, censures its motives. The better sort preach of love and truth (with consistent motives), recognising in the prisoner-apostle the champion of the gospel. Observe the reversal in vv. 16, 17, according to RV, of the order of the two parties distinguished in v. 15.

§ 5. 18-20. With the last clause of v. 18 (before which it is better to place a full stop) St. Paul turns from the present to the future: Yes, and I will rejoice; for I know, etc. This (v. 19), like therein (v. 18), embraces the whole situation described in vv. 12-18, which while furthering the gospel (v. 12) will turn to St. Paul’s final salvation: cp. 1 Cor 9:22 2 Tim 4:18. In his humility, the Apostle regards this issue as depending on your supplication and ministry of the Spirit of Jesus Christ (cp. Gal 5:19), of whose influence his friends’ prayers bring him richer supplies: cp. 2 Th 3:11. 20. The above result accords with the writer’s eager expectation and hope, that in any event Christ will be magnified in his person as hitherto: he lives, and will die, for this alone. Whatever happens to my body, the essential interests are safe.

Vv. 21-26 weigh the alternatives of life or death (v. 20) depending on the verdict awaited at Caesar’s bar. 21. To live] as distinguished from to live in the flesh (v. 22), means ‘life essential’: cp. 1 Tim 6:10 Col 3:1 is the true commentary on v. 21*: ‘Your life is hid with Christ in God’—Christ, who is our life.

For to me, to live is Christ] i.e. life consists of and is rooted in Him: see Ro 8:5-30 1 Cor 2:20. Hence, to die is gain; for dying would bring the Apostle nearer to Christ: see v. 23 and 2 Cor 5:6-8. (How the expectation of being with Christ immediately after death agrees with the conception of an intermediate state, indicated in 1 Th 4:14,16 and 1 Cor 15:51,52, is not evident; our best notions of the other world are dim and confused: see 1 Cor 13:2.)

22. There is gain also on the opposite side: If to live in the flesh be my lot (R.M.; the Gk. is highly elliptical, as Paul’s language often becomes under excitement), this means for me fruit of work, i.e. continued labour and a richer reward. The writer knows not which he shall choose; advantages are balanced.

23, 24. His heart prompts the wish to go; his judgment, guided by his friends’ need, advises staying; that he will so abide in the flesh for their progress and joy in the faith, St. Paul is persuaded (vv. 25, 26). This outcome of the pending trial will bring exceeding joy, as well as spiritual benefit, to the Philippians. The peculiar Gk. word for depart (v. 25), also used in 2 Tim 4:6, means ‘loosing the tent-peg’: cp. the metaphor of 2 Cor 5:1. The glorying (AV ‘rejoicing’) anticipated in v. 26 is the exultation of the Philippians in the Apostle’s escape and the resulting gain to the Christian cause.

III. HOW PAUL’S COMRADES MAY SUPPORT HIM (17–218)

§ 6. 17-30. With v. 27 the Apostle turns upon his readers, as much as to say, ‘I have told you how it fares with me; what about yourselves? My happiness depends on you.’

The transitional Only implies a possible qualification—a cloud that might darken the bright prospect of vv. 25, 26: cp. 1 Th 3:5.

The manner of life (AV ‘conversation’) expected is defined by a Gk. term familiar to ‘colonials’ (see Intro.), which recurs in 3:21: hold your citizenship in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ: cp. Eph 2:10. The gospel supplies in itself the motives for a worthy life: the Apostle’s presence or absence should not affect his fellow-believers’ loyalty. Steadfastness is the chief quality desired in them, that ye stand fast—a characteristic of the citizen-soldier. In one spirit signifies unity of religious principles and purpose; with one soul (RV), unity of feeling and effort. The faith of the gospel does not mean Christian doctrine, the contents of faith, but faith as a conscious power in the soul, ‘striving like one man to maintain and carry into effect your faith in the gospel’: cp. Jude v. 3.

28. Steadfastness meant, especially for this Church, not to be daunted by persecution. They are Paul’s comrades in the conflict which he underwent at Philippi formerly, and now endures in Rome (v. 30). Let them understand that their courage is itself a token of their adversaries’ perfidiousness, a sign that God is with them (cp. vv. 19, 20, in this connexion); for indeed (v. 29) their sufferings are a bounty of divine grace (cp. Mt 5:12 1 Pet 4:11-19) shared with their Apostle (cp. v. 7; alas Col 1:24 Eph 3:1,19—a favour directly consequent on their believing in Christ. To suffer in His behalf, as representing Christ amid an evil world (cp. Jn 15:18-20), is indeed an honour.

CHAPTER 2

THE MUTUAL SERVICE OF PAUL AND THE PHILIPPIAN CHURCH

§ 7. 2:1-11. In view of what has just been said, therefore the Apostle entreats his readers, under all the obligations arising from past fellowship (v. 1), to make his joy complete by a thorough concord (v. 2). This will be attained through self-effacing regard for each other (vv. 3, 4), of which Christ is the ground and example (vv. 5-8).

1. St. Paul invokes four bonds of friendship: exhortation (i.e. encouragement) in Christ, given on his part; consolation of love, fellowship in the Spirit (cp. 1:19), tender mercies and compassions, mutually exhibited; if there be any such things—or if they count for anything as between us (the sentence is elliptical, and the text a little doubtful)—this entreaty will prevail.

2. That ye be of the same mind (v. 2) imports oneness of sentiment and aim, to be realised in having the same love—i.e. cherishing a uniform reciprocal affection—as men conjoined in soul (‘of one accord,’ RV; cp. 1:27; ‘with one soul’), minding the one thing (cp. Col 3:2 RV). In rendering the last clause of one mind, AV ignores the Gr. definite article: St. Paul’s ‘one thing needful’ (cp. Lk 10:42) is nothing else than ‘the gospel’ (see 15,8,27); concentration upon this is the guarantee of unity.

3. 4. Such oneness of soul means doing nothing in a factious or vainglorious way, each man in lowliness of mind counting the other better than himself, and keeping an eye not for his own interests but for those of his neighbour. In short, love and humility together overcome all divisive influences, and bring about the perfect socialism of the Spirit.

V. 5 goes on to say that this altruism is the proper Christian way of thinking: Have this mind in you, which is indeed (the mind) in Christ Jesus—i.e. the mind grounded in Him. The Pauline phrase ‘in Christ Jesus’ signifies the mystical union: not the Jesus Christ who ‘was’ (the verb of AV is wanting in the Gr.), but the Christ Jesus who ‘is,’ inspires this way of thinking.

Vv. 6-8 lead back from the present to the past, exhibiting the Christian altruistic mind as it wrought first in the Founder; St. Paul relates the experience of the Head to teach the members a lowly, self-renouncing love. For this purpose he must show how much Christ had to forgo and to what lengths His abnegation went. The difficult expressions of this profound passage are, especially, the synonymous connected phrases form (of God, of a bondman), on an equality (with God), likeness (of men), in fashion (as a man), which denote resemblance in different aspects or degrees. The first signifies essential form, the mode of existence proper to the person in question; the second, the footing on which he stands, or might stand; the third, his visible features; the fourth, the guise, or habit of life, in which he moves. The verbs of vv. 7, 8—emptied (RV), and humbled Himself—affirm respectively a negative self-deprivation or depotentiation, and a positive self-humiliation based upon the former; the latter act has its antithesis in the exalting of Christ by God spoken of in v. 9, and the former in the granting to Him of the name above every name. The rare verbal noun of v. 6, (counted it not) a prize (RV; AV ‘robbery’), meant first the act of grasping or ‘clutching,’ and then a thing to be clutched. We take the sense of the passage to be, that Christ, while divine in His proper nature, did not, when the call came to serve others, hold fast in self-assertion His God-like state, but divested Himself of this by assuming a servant’s form (adding to His divine a human being, which eclipsed the Godhead in Him) and leading an earthly life such as our own (vv. 6, 7). But He went lower still; having stooped from His Godhead to man’s condition, He traversed all the stages of obedience down to the humiliation of death (cp. 3:21), and of death in its uttermost shame (vv. 7, 8). Such was the devotion of the Son of God to men; and every man who is in Christ Jesus shares this mind.

The verb ‘emptied’ in v. 7 supplies the theological term kenosis for the deprivation of divine attributes or powers involved in the incarnation of our Lord. However far this diminution went—and we cannot pretend to define its limits—since it was a self-emptying, an act of our Lord’s sovereignty, it involved no forfeiture of intrinsic Deity.

At v. 8 the illustration properly ends; but St. Paul cannot leave his Master on the cross, nor have it supposed that self-abnegation is real loss: cp. Mt 10:59 Jn 12:24. By a divine recompense, Christ was lifted up from the death of the cross to the Messianic dominion, with glory added to His primal glory (vv. 9-11): Wherefore indeed God more highly exalted him, and granted to him the name that is above every name: cp. Eph 1:20-22. This ‘name’ is the completed title, THE LORD JESUS CHRIST, under which our Saviour will be adored throughout the universe. Things under the earth was a Gr. euphemism for the dead: cp. Ro 14:9 Eph 4:9.

Vv. 10, 11 appropriate for Jesus the language of Isa 45:22, which foretold the worship to be paid to Israel's God by all mankind. The glory of the Father will be realised in the universal acknowledgment of the Lordship of the Son whom He enthroned: cp. I Cor 15:24-28.

§ 8. 12-18. The connexion of the third exhortation, to thoroughness in the pursuit of salvation (vv. 12-18), with the two foregoing paragraphs may be brought out thus: And so, my beloved—since Christ's triumph, won by self-forgetting love, is sure (§ 7), and since you are my fellow-soldiers in His war (§ 6)—as you have always answered to my challenge, I expect that now in my absence—when you depend on yourselves—much more than in my presence, with fear and trembling you will prosecute the work of your salvation; for God is he that worketh in you both the willing and the working (contrast Ro 7:19), for his good-pleasure's sake (v. 13). God's working in the Philippians is alleged not to enforce the fear and trembling (which St. Paul assumes and approves in them), but as a strong encouragement: 'Whatever human aid is wanting, God is with you—in you!' cp. I Cor 15:28; also Eph 3:20 Col 1:29 Ac 20:22. That God is thus working in the readers in the interests of His good pleasure, implies that their life-work is taken into God's plan for the kingdom of His Son; see vv. 9-11, 12; also Lk 12:22 2 Th 1:11-12.

14. The consciousness of God's sovereign grace operating in the Philippian Christians will prevent their work being marred by murmurings and reasonings against their lot (cp. 1 Th 1:20; also 1 Pet 4:12-14); in this confidence they will bear themselves as God's children (vv. 15, 16) amid an evil world, where they are set to shine as luminaries, holding forth in its lustre the word of life: cp. 1 Th 1:8-10; also Mt 5:14-16 Jn 1:6-8. For salvation-seeking is not egoism; Christian excellence is that of a lamp, the more radiant as it is better trimmed.

15. The writer, too, will gain much by the advancing salvation and luminous witness of his converts: this will be for a glorying to myself against the day of Christ, as showing that I have not run in vain nor toiled in vain: cp. I Th 1:5 Gal 2:3.

17, 18. Supposing the worst fears of the Philippians realised by his condemnation to death, their faith will turn this into a glad offering on the Apostle's part to God. Even in this issue, he joys and rejoices with them, and calls on them to joy and rejoice with him! While he and they are true to Christ, nothing can take away their common joy: cp. Ro 8:31-39. St. Paul represents his death under the figure of a libation, or drink-offering (R.M.): his blood, shed for the salvation of the Gentiles (Ro 15:16 Col 1:24, etc.), would be poured out over the sacrifice and service rendered to God by the faith of his Churches—a shower that will feed the sacrificial flame.

IV. THE APPROACHING VISITS (2:19-30)

§ 9. 2:19-24. The Apostle hopes however in the Lord Jesus (under His sovereign direction) that events will take a different course; he will send Timothy forthwith to Philippi, so soon as the outlook is clear, pursuing himself to follow when free (vv. 23, 24): cp. 1 Cor 3:5, 35. The motive for sending is, that I too (as well as you) may be of good cheer through learning the news about you (as you through hearing about me); and the reasons for sending Timothy are, on the one hand, his genuine care for the Philippians and the absence of any one else like-minded (lit. 'equal-souled'), and on the other hand the knowledge the Philippians have of his character and intimacy with his master (v. 22). In the hard saying, they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ (R.V.), 'all' is limited by the context, and by the Gk. definite article, to St. Paul's available helpers. Some of his companions were busy elsewhere; others decline the errand through motives that he regards as selfish (vv. 20, 21).

§ 10. 2:25-30. Epaphroditus returns forthwith, carrying this letter (v. 25); see Intro. The Apostle heaps commendation upon him, apprehending seemingly that he might have a cool reception (see vv. 29, 30), since he is going home prematurely and without having rendered all the service expected. To St. Paul he has proved my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier, having shared the Apostle's toils and labours to the best of his power; on behalf of thePhilippians, your apostle (deputy-messenger) and minister (minister-in-sacred-things: this word is repeated in the service of v. 30) to my need. The Apostle sends him back thus early because of his homesickness, which was aggravated by news of the grief of his friends at his recent illness (v. 26)—an illness threatening death, which God had averted in mercy both to himself and to Paul; his immediate return, under these circumstances, is happier for all parties (vv. 27, 28): Epaphroditus, it seems, had fallen into sickness through some venture, beyond the common risks of travel, in which he had hazarded (the rare Gk. verb means 'gambling with') his life—'setting his life upon a cast'—to serve the Apostle on behalf of the Philippians in promoting the work of Christ (v. 30). How this came about, it is idle to conjecture.

CHAPTER 3
DANGERS AND HOPES OF THE PRESENT SITUATION

V. INTERJECTED WARNINGS (3:1-21)

§ 11. 3:1-5. Finally (lit. 'For the rest'), my brethren, brings the close of the letter in sight (see Intro.); the Apostle has only a few supplementary counsels to give—prefaced by the Rejoice in the Lord, which is the prevalent note of the Epistle (1 4, 18, 20 2 5, 17, 18)—and to make acknowledgment of the contribution sent through Epaphroditus. But the admonition of v. 2 strikes a chord of feeling in his breast which vibrates too strongly to be soon arrested. From v. 4 onwards, c. 5 is a diversion in the Epistle, but such as answers its underlying purpose, since it opens St. Paul’s heart to his readers and makes them more than ever ‘partakers of his grace’ (17).

The observation of v. 15 relates to vv. 2, 3; St. Paul is writing the same things about the seductions of Judaism that he has said or written before: this was a chronic danger to his Churches. Though Philippi contained few Jewish settlers, its situation (see Intro.) exposed this Church to the visits of Jewish emissaries. The dogs, the evil workers, the concision (mutilation) form one class of adversaries, who receive the last epitaph by way of scornful play upon the boasted name of ‘the circumcision.’ The Abrahamic covenant-seal has become null and void for rejecters of Christ, and no better than any other ‘cutting’ of the body; so the Apostle transfers its name to the Church, upon which the OT. inheritance devolves: see Ro 2:23-29 4:12 11:17 Gal 3:16 Eph 2:11-19 3:1 Col 2:11-13; also Mt 21:43. These same men are dogs, raging against and ready to devour the Apostle of the Gentiles (cp. Ps 22:16, 20); ill-workers, because of their mischievous and unscrupulous activity: cp. 2 Cor 11:12. As in 1 Th 2:14-16, unbelieving Jews are here intended, radically opposed to the gospel; not, as in Galatians and 2 Corinthians, Christian Jews who pervert it. Jewish hostility was violent beyond measure in Macedonia: see Ac 17.

3. By contrast with anti-Christian Jews, we are the circumcision, who worship by the Spirit of God (whose worship is inspired by the Holy Spirit), and glory in Christ Jesus (not in Moses, the Temple, etc.), and have no confidence in flesh (in any external privilege or performance). Here the Apostle strikes into the current of his own experience, which carries him away for the rest of the c. 4. Though I (one of the emphasised ‘we’ of v. 3) might have confidence indeed in the flesh—who had a better right to presume upon outward prerogative? Amongst the seven points of superiority enumerated in vv. 5, 6, four came to Saul by birth, three by acquisition. The eighth day was the proper date for the infant’s circumcision (Gn 17:9); Israel, the covenant-name of Jehovah’s people; Benjamin, the tribe eminent as supplying the first king of Israel, and subsequently remaining faithful to the throne of David; a Hebrew sprung from Hebrews, one whose family preserved the home-language: see Ac 21:40. The fact that he had been a persecutor of the Church, combined with his Pharisaic professions and legal blamelessness, raised Saul’s reputation to the highest pitch: cp. 2 Cor 11:22 Gal 1:15, 14 Ac 22:8.

§ 12. 3:7-11. The treasured gains of Saul of Tarsus, Paul the Apostle has counted losses because of the Christ, content to lose them if he might gain Christ (cp. Gal 6:14); there is no treasure that he would not hold cheap in this exchange—I count all things to be loss for the surpassing worth of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord (v. 8). And this is no untried vaunt: For whose sake I have suffered the loss of all things—home, ease, honour, everything that men count dear (cp. Ac 20:24)—and count them refuse! So contemptible had the world’s wealth become to him through knowledge; he wins infinite riches in exchange for dross!

The last clause of v. 8 is completed by v. 9, which unfolds St. Paul’s distinctive conception of the believer’s relation to his Saviour: that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own, that which comes of law, but that which comes through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God, resting upon faith. These words sum up the doctrine of salvation taught in Romans and Galatians: the Apostle has not ‘gained Christ’ as an outward possession, but so as to be planted in Him and recognised as one with Him; so that even his ‘righteousness’—the moral worth that gives value to his existence—is not claimed for his own, as though it had been won by law-keeping, for it accrues to him through faith in Christ, and thus has its fountain in God; it is built not, like the Pharisee’s righteousness, upon human efforts and strivings, but upon faith in God and Christ.

Vv. 10, 11 are parallel to v. 9, setting forth objectively, as that defined subjectively, the Apostle’s ‘gain’ in Christ. As v. 9 expanded the for whom of v. 8, so vv. 10, 11 take up and enlarge upon the foregoing phrase, the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; the entire sentence (vv. 8-11) is symmetrical:

I count all things to be loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I suffered the loss of all things, etc. That I may gain Christ, and be found in Him, etc., so that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, etc.

10, 11. Three points are specified in St. Paul’s ‘knowledge of Christ’: (a) The power of His resurrection, which came on Saul in the Damascus revelation. The resurrection of Jesus Christ which manifested Him as the Son of God, at the same time revealed in Him ‘the power of God’ working ‘unto salvation’: see Ro 14:10 4:24, 25 Eph 1:18, 20. The whole faith of the gospel turned upon Christ’s resurrection
The Gk. adjective perfect (i.e. 'full-grown,' 'mature': see 1 Cor 14:20 Eph 4:13) appearing in vv. 12 and 15, was used of initiates into the religious 'mysteries' of the time, at the final stage of qualification; the party in view claimed, under this designation, to have acquired an esoteric 'knowledge' of Christianity going deeper than simple 'faith': see Col 2:4, 6:1 Tim 6:20, 21. This Gnosticising tendency, so strongly evidenced by the Colossian heresy, was widespread and manifold in form; it greatly exercised the Apostle's mind at this time. 15. Let us, so many as be perfect (the true 'initiates,' in contrast with those alluded to in v. 12), be thus minded—as much as to say, 'Those really deep in Christian knowledge will think in this way' (vv. 10–14). The perfect recognise the distance of the goal; they are the last to count themselves perfect: cp. the treatment of Gk. conceit of wisdom in 1 Cor 2:6–16 8:1, 2 14:37, 38.

15th, 16th. Some members of this Church are otherwise minded—unable to follow what St. Paul has just said; knowing their loyalty, he can wait confidently for their enlightenment—God will reveal this also unto you (cp. 1 Cor 2:10–15)—provided that they faithfully practise the truth already grasped: whereunto we have attained, by that same rule let us walk (RV): cp. Gal 6:16 Jn 7:17. Omit 'let us mind,' etc. (AV).

§ 14. 3:17–21. Against the third class of opponents (see Intro.)—in some instances identical with the second, for spiritual conceit and moral depravity may be found together (see 1 Tim 6:3–5)—St. Paul adduces his example and that of others of like behaviour, as against the two former he cited his religious experience. 18, 19. Their character is notorious: the Apostle has spoken of them often, and weeps over them as he writes now. These are peculiarly the enemies of the cross of Christ—not Jews who 'stumble at the cross' (Gal 6:12 1 Cor 1:28), but professed Christians whose walk tends to its subversion; men whose end is perdition—like that of the adversaries of 1:38 (see 2 Cor 11:15 2 Pet 2:3)—for their god is the belly (they honour sensual appetite like a god: see Ro 13:13, 14 16:18 2 Tim 3:4), and their glory is in their shame (they pride themselves on sensuality: see Eph 4:19 Ro 1:23 2 Pet 2:18, 14): who mind earthly things (cp. Ro 8:5—7) —the delineation ends in amazement. These men are Antinomians, accepting Paul's gospel only to 'continue in sin that grace may abound,' and 'using liberty for an occasion to the flesh' (see Ro 6:12 Gal 5:12 Jude v. 4). They were the reproach and grief of the Apostle's ministry. One hardly supposes that the writer has such enemies amongst the Philippian (see 1:8): but libertine Christians were numerous, and might travel that way.

20, 21. Against the earthly is set the heavenly

976
PHILIPPIANS

§ 15. 4-19. With heightened feeling St. Paul resumes the vein of exhortation commenced in 3: Wherefore (in view of the grand hope of our calling) so stand fast in the Lord (see 1:27) — so,' i.e. in 'imitating' the Apostle and marking those of like walk (3:17); this appeal sums up the foregoing homily. For the endearing epithets accumulated here, cp. 1:3-8 2:16,17, also I Th 2:18, 20.

2. The entreaty to Euodia and Syntyche to be of one mind in the Lord, is a pointed application of 1:27 and 2:13; they have a serious difference of judgment in carrying out the will of Christ. These ladies bear good Greek names; one of them is, possibly, the same as the Lydia of Ac 16, the latter name in that case being an ethnic appellation ('the Lydian'). As at Thessalonica (Ac 174), women were conspicuous amongst the earliest converts in Philippi: see Intro.

3. The Gk. 'Synzygos' (yoke-fellow) is better read as a proper name, on which the Apostle plays, as upon 'Onesimus' (serviceable) in Philemon v. 11: Yea, I ask also thee, true Synzygos—worthy of thy name—help them (Euodia and Syntyche) to come to an understanding. Others suppose Epaphroditus to be addressed as 'yokefellow': cp. 2:25. The agreeing women had shared St. Paul's struggles (this Gk. verb is rendered striving together in 1:27) in the gospel,—a fact which makes him specially anxious for their reconciliation. With these former comrades St. Paul associates a certain Clement otherwise unknown (hardly the Clement of Rome, famous a generation later), and the rest of my fellow-workers, whose names are in the book of life (see Rev 5:4, etc., Lk 10:20 Heb 12:23)—and therefore need not be enumerated here.

§ 16. 4-7. Joy in the Lord, and the peace of God, are the sovereign factors in the Christian temper (vv. 4, 7); these manifest themselves in gentleness (RM; AV 'moderation') toward men, and serenity (In nothing be anxious, RV) in all events, maintained by continual prayer and thanksgiving. V. 4 repeats, with resolute emphasis, the command of 3:1; see note.

5. Gentleness (ascribed, under the same word, to Christ in 2 Cor 10:1) is the opposite of self-assertion and rivalry. Like 'patience' in Jas 5:
it is enforced by the nearer of the Lord's advent, the prospect of which quenches worldly passions: cp. 1 Cor 7:29-31 Lk 12:49-40. Though we may not think of the second coming of Christ as at hand in the sense in which the first Christians did, our appearance at His judgment-seat is no less certain, and the thought of it should affect us in the same way.

6. Anxiety is precluded by the direction, let your requests be made known unto God—since
'hceart for you' (1Pet 5:7; cp. Mt 6:26,34).

Prayer is devout address to God in general, suppllication the specific appeal for help, and request the particular petition made. In everything includes temporal with spiritual needs, covering all occasions of anxiety.

7. The peace of God is that which ensues on reconciliation through Christ and the bestow-ment of the Holy Spirit, who breathes the Father's love into the heart: see Ro 5:1,2,5-11
Eph 2:13-18. The consciousness of this fortifies the mind against trouble: it shall guard (or garrison) your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus. God's peace surpasses (AV 'passes':
the same word was rendered 'better than' in 23, and 'excellency' in 38) all reason (Gk. nous) in its fortifying power. Greek philosophy sought in Reason the prophylactic against care and fear; the true remedy is found in Christ.

§ 17. 4-5. The real Finally is now reached:
see on 3:1. The list of virtues here commended is unique in St. Paul's writings, resembling the catalogues of Greek moralists; its items belong to natural ethics. These things, St. Paul says, take account of (RM);
i.e. reckon and allow for (the verb of 3:18 1 Cor 4:135, etc.); he desiderates in the readers
a larger appreciation of goodness, a catholic moral taste—mark the reiterated whatsoever. This Church was intensely devoted, but intellectually narrow (see on 19)—a defect naturally aggravated by persecution. Hence the stress laid on 'gentleness' in v. 6, and on the amenities of life in v. 8. Things true and honourable (to be revered) constitute the integrities of personal character; things pure and just represent the moralities, and things amiable and winning the graces, of social life. The further expressions, if there be any virtue and if there be any praise (ought to be praised), bring in every conceivable form and instance of moral excellence.

Virtue—the ruling category of heathen ethics—figures only in this passage of St. Paul; the Apostle is seeking common ethical ground as between the Church and Gentile society. The Christian man must prize every fragment of human worth, claiming it for God.

9. So much for reflection and appreciation; for practice, the writer points once more, as in c. 3, to himself,—to his personal teaching (what things you both learned and received) and behaviour (heard and saw in me). The God of peace shall be with you is a virtual repetition of v. 7: men of large-hearted charity and steadfast loyalty dwell in God's peace amidst all storms.

VII. ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF THE CONTRIBUTION FROM PHILIPPI (4.10-20)

§ 18. 4.10-16. With the Benediction of v. 9 (cp. Ro 15.8) the letter might have ended; but St. Paul in sending back Epaphroditus (2.5-80) desires to make ample recognition of the gift conveyed by him, and has reserved this matter to the last. The remittance had surely been acknowledged earlier; communications had been exchanged since Epaphroditus' arrival in Rome: see Intro. It looks as though the Philippians had been grieved in some way over the reception of their contribution. Perhaps the Apostle's former acknowledgment through its brevity was open to misconstruction. With care and earnestness he now endeavours to set himself right with his friends:

'Greatly was I gladdened,' he writes, 'that now once again you have blossomed out in your thoughtfulness for me; indeed, you were thinking of me in this way before, but you lacked opportunity to show it.' The recent gift was the revival of the care for the Apostle's wants shown by the Philippians at an earlier time; no other Church had so markedly proved its gratitude in this kind (v. 15). The readers are aware of this fact (Moreover ye yourselves know, ye Philippians); they had probably referred to it, in their Church letter, with pardonable pride. In the beginning of the gospel means at the time of its coming to these regions (cp. 15); in the matter of giving and receiving (RV) might be rendered 'by way of credit and debit account' (cp. 1 Cor 9.11 Gal 6.6 Phil 4 vv. 18, 19)—a mercantile idiom. When I went out from Macedonia refers to contributions sent to the writer at Athens or Corinth (see 2 Cor 11.7-10); even before this, during the short time he stayed in Thessalonica, they had helped him once and again (v. 16).

In the intervening passage (vv. 11-14) St. Paul explains his attitude. He does not speak as though in want and dependant on such support; he has learned to be self-sufficient (content) under all conditions. I know, he continues, how to be abased (by poverty: see 1 Cor 4.4 2 Cor 11.27 Ac 20.34), and I know also how to be in affluence; in every variety of state and circumstance, I have become versed (lit. 'initiated') both in feasting and hungering, both in abundance and destitution. Thrice St. Paul speaks of his 'abundance' (vv. 12 and 18); and this bears out the conjecture of Sir W. M. Ramsay, suggested by the heavy cost entailed in the appeal to Caesar (Ac 25.11,12) and the unlikelihood of his taxing the Churches for this purpose, that he had by this time come into the inheritance of property and is no longer a poor man. If this was so, then St. Paul is thinking of the trials of both estates when he says, I am equal to everything, in him that enables me (v. 13): cp. 2 Cor 12.10 Eph 3.20 Col 1.29. He rejoices, therefore, in the gift of the Philippians for their sake rather than his own (v. 14): Howbeit ye did well, that ye had fellowship with my affliction (showed sympathy with my persecuted condition)—not, as in Thessalonica, with 'my need' (v. 16).

§ 19. 4.17-20. Hence the Apostle was not eager for the gift (as a boon to himself), but for the evidence it afforded of God's grace in the givers (cp. 1.11 2 Cor 9.6-11 Eph 5.9)—the fruit that increaseth to your account. But I have enough and to spare; I am filled full—in satisfaction of mind as of bodily wants (cp. 2.2 Cor 7.4)—now that I have received from Epaphroditus what you have sent,—a fragrant savour, an acceptable sacrifice, well-pleasing to God (cp. Rom 13.16): the religious, not the material value of the gift weighs with its receiver.

19. Since the offering is a sacrifice to God, He will recompense it (cp. Rom 10.10 Prov 19.17): my God will fill up every need of yours—as you have striven to meet His servant's need—according to his riches. Temporal and spiritual needs are together included in the promise; God's 'wealth' contains all kinds of treasure. In glory points to the heavenly consummation (cp. Ro 2.7 Eph 17.18), in Christ Jesus to the ground and channel of divine supplies.

20. The Doxology (cp. 2 Cor 9.15, in relation to its context) magnifies the bountiful Giver as our Father: see Mt 6.28,32.
§ 20. In conclusion, the Apostle bids a greeting to every saint in Christ Jesus—his good will knows no exception: see 1, 4, 7, 8. With his own he sends greetings from his companions, from the whole Roman Church, and particularly from those of Cæsar’s household (to think of Christians in Nero’s house!)—the latter singled out because their salutation would peculiarly touch the Philippians: see Intro. The circumstances of his captivity and trial brought the Apostle into contact with the palace and the imperial attendants; friends in that quarter were specially serviceable to him.

23. The Benediction (RV) is nearly identical with that of Galatians, Philemon, and 2 Timothy.

COLOSSIANS

INTRODUCTION

1. Colosse was a town of Phrygia in Asia Minor, situated upon the S. bank of the Lycus, a tributary of the Maeander. Laodicea (2, 4, 13, 15, 16 Rev 11 314) and Hierapolis (4, 1) were distant from it eleven and thirteen miles respectively. As these cities grew, Colosse seems to have declined; for, though Herodotus speaks of it as ‘a city of great size,’ and Xenophon as ‘a populous city, prosperous and great,’ about the beginning of the Christian era it is mentioned by Strabo as ‘a small town.’ In St. Paul’s time, Pliny classes it among the ‘most famous towns’ of the district; but he was probably thinking mostly of its past consequence. It is to the Christians in this town that the present Epistle is addressed; and some discussion has arisen as to St. Paul’s previous relations with them. He seems to have written an earlier letter to them (4, 10) to which Epaphras had brought a reply (1, 7); but whether he had himself actually visited Colosse at any time is a matter of doubt. He may have done so on his Third Missionary Journey, when he went over all the country of Asia and Phrygia in order (Ac 18, 23), or even during his three years’ stay at Ephesus, when ‘all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word’ (Ac 19, 10), but it is tolerably clear that he had never made a prolonged stay in Colosse, and was not directly the founder of its Church (4, 2, 9). Christianity was probably introduced into Colosse by one of his converts, and Epaphras (1, 7, 4, 12, 19) generally has the honour accorded to him.

2. Occasion of the Epistle. The present letter, which was taken by Tychicus, who was accompanied by Onesimus, Philemon’s runaway slave (4, 7, 9), was called forth by a serious danger that threatened the faith of the Colossian Church. The danger arose from a type of false teaching, essentially Jewish in character. It emphasised the importance of sacred seasons, the sabbath, the new moon, the feast day; it laid down certain restrictions as to meats and drinks, made much of circumcision and the Law, and gave an important place to the tradition of men. It insisted on severity to the body, and perhaps claimed to rest upon vision. By its worship of the angels it degraded Christ from His true position as the Head of the body. While the teachers thought too meanly of themselves to seek fellowship with God, and therefore worshipped the angels, they were puffed up with conceit towards men, professing to put a philosophical view of religion in place of the elementary teaching the Colossians had received (2, 12–22).

The modern reader will find the Epistle easier to understand if he gains some acquaintance with the doctrine of angels current in the Judaism of St. Paul’s time. This doctrine had received a great development in the centuries immediately preceding the birth of Christ. The world was imagined to be full of angels and demons, who presided over all the operations of nature and entered into the closest relations with the life of man. Every blade of grass had its angel, much more the mightier forces and elements of nature. Each nation had its angel, who guided its destiny and fought its battles. The common view that the angels are sinless was unknown, and even the best were not regarded as free from moral imperfections. Owing to the distance which later Jewish theology set between God and the world, it was natural that many should turn for help to the angels, who were ever close at hand and were the actual controllers of the ordinary course of nature and human affairs. It is probable that by the elements of the world (2, 8, 20 RV) St. Paul means the elemental spirits, and he considers the whole race of man, both Jewish and Gentile, to have been in subjection to these ‘elements,’ ‘which by nature were no gods’ (Gal 4, 9–10). This angelic rule found one expression in the life of Israel.
which is of great importance for our purpose. It was a tenet of Judaism, endorsed also in the New Testament (Ac 7:52; cp. Ac 7:56 Gal 3:19 Heb 2:2), that the Law had been given through the angels; accordingly subjection to it meant subjection to them.

A large section of Epaphras' converts at Colosse had given their adhesion to the false teaching, and no doubt the sounder portion had written for advice to Epaphras or even to St. Paul, and hence the Epistle before us.

St. Paul does not meet the Colossian heresy by an appeal to the Old Testament, which might have been set aside by allegorical interpretation. He meets it by an appeal to their own experience, and by a statement of the Person and work of Christ, the Son of God and all-sufficient Saviour, and he dwells on them as contradictory to and incompatible with the conceptions entertained by the false teachers. In the Son, who had condescended to become man, there resides, he says, the totality of the divine qualities and powers. Of Himself He is sufficient to form the link uniting God and man together. Where, then, is there room for angelic and other mediators intruding between the lowliness of man and the majesty of God? Christ suffices to bridge the chasm. And how insufficient are angelic beings for such an end! Christ, acting for His Father, has created the universe and is its Head—not any angel. The angels were indeed His creatures. Christ—not any angel—is also the Head of the Church. The Old Dispensation, indeed, had been 'ordained by angels' (Gal 3:19), and was under their supervision. But their Dispensation, with its ordinances and rules and observances, was done away with (Eph 2:15). Christ had taken the bond of the Old Dispensation (and of every other religion which founds itself on outward observances) and had nailed it to His Cross, superseding by His own operation the inferior work which had been entrusted to the agency of angels. How can it be right to descend to the adoration of angels from the worship of the Lord and Creator of angels, who had shown His superiority to their 'principalities and powers,' and had 'openly triumphed' over the Dispensation which they had been allowed to superintend, by the Dispensation inaugurated by the Cross (2:14, 15). Such an adoration is no sign of humility, but a superstition dishonouring to the gospel and arising from an inability to realise the true relation between God and man, as man is reconciled and adopted in Christ (2:18). As to the rules of outward observances in which Judaism delighted, and the injunctions of asceticism which perhaps followed from the misapprehension of the nature of matter, they are of no use as restraints to the flesh, and only lead to a self-conceit which applauds itself for its humility.

The overmastering idea of the greatness of Christ gives their form to some of the practical exhortations which succeed to the argument—'Christ sitteth upon the right hand of God'.'your life is hid with Christ in God': 'Christ our life': 'Christ is all in all': 'as is fit in the Lord': 'as to the Lord, and not unto men': 'the Lord Christ': 'the mystery of Christ': 'Epaphras, a servant of Christ' (3:1, 4, 11, 18, 20, 24, 45, 12).

3. Authorship. There need be no misgiving in accepting the Pauline authorship of the Epistle. The doubts formerly entertained by critics have largely disappeared, and the number continually increases of those who fully admit its genuineness. The time is probably not far distant when this will be regarded as settled by common consent. It used to be said that the false teaching alluded to by St. Paul was a form of that large class of beliefs grouped together under the name of Gnosticism, and therefore that it could not be earlier than the second century. The present writer is convinced that there is not a trace of specific Gnosticism in the Epistle, but even if there were we have good reason to believe that the Gnostic systems of the second century struck their roots into a much earlier time. He also believes that the Essene features found by many scholars in the false teaching are quite imaginary. There is absolutely nothing in that teaching which could not have been given in Colosse by 59 A.D. or even earlier. Nor is there anything in the writer's own exposition that contradicts Pauline authorship. His doctrine of Christ and the angels can be matched in nearly every point from St. Paul's generally accepted Epistles. The style, it is true, differs from that of Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans, but a letter written in the meditative seclusion of a prison is not likely to have the same rapidity of movement or passionate intensity as a letter like Galatians, dashed off at white heat by a missionary immersed in the most distracting activities and fighting with his back to the wall in defence of the gospel. The Epistle was written at the same time as Ephesians and Philemon, possibly during the Apostle's imprisonment at Cæsarea, but much more probably at Rome. It was in the earlier part of his imprisonment, and also, we may say with tolerable confidence, before the composition of Philippians. The precise date is uncertain; probably 59 A.D. is not far from the mark.

CHAPTER 1

THE SUPREMACY AND ALL-SUFFICIENCY OF CHRIST

1–8. Salutation to the Colossian Christians, and thanksgiving for the news of their spiritual state.
COLOSSIANS

1. 1

Paraphrase. '(1, 2) Paul and Timothy salute the saints and believers in Colossae. (3–5) We always thank God, when we pray for you, on account of your faith and the love you display in hope of the heavenly reward, of which you heard when the gospel was first proclaimed to you. (6–8) This gospel is the word of truth which approves itself by its universal diffusion and success, and has from the very first achieved a similar success among yourselves, taught you as it has been in its genuine reality by Epaphras, who has ministered to you in my place and has made known your love to me.'

2. Faithful] better, ‘believing.' And the Lord Jesus Christ] RV rightly omits.

3. Better. ‘We always give thanks to God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ when we pray for you.’ 5. For the hope] i.e. based on the hope. 6, 7. It is the gospel as Epaphras taught it them, not that urged on them by the false teachers, which is exercising this worldwide influence. The universal corrects the local. 7. RV ‘who is a faithful minister of Christ on our behalf’ is probably right. The Apostle of the Gentiles could not himself visit Colossae. Epaphras has done this part of his work for him. Epaphras is not to be identified with Epaphroditus (Phil 2:25–30; 4:18).

9–14. St. Paul’s prayer that the Colossians may be filled with wisdom, strength, and thanksgiving.

Paraphrase. ‘(9) Since we heard the glad report, as you pray for us so we pray without ceasing for you, that you may be filled with a knowledge of God’s will touching your conduct, a knowledge characterised by wisdom and insight. (10) Such knowledge is not indeed an end in itself. It must lead to a life well pleasing to Christ; you must bear fruit and increase in every good work by means of your knowledge of God. (11) This you can do only as God Himself strengthens you, and this He will do not simply according to your need, but in the measure of His own power. Thus you will be strengthened for the supreme test, the trial of steadfastness and forbearance, which you will meet with joy. (12–14) Give thanks also to the Father, who qualified you to share in the lot of the saints which is situated in the realm of light, by rescuing you from the dominion of darkness and translating you into the kingdom of that Son on whom His love rests, in whom we possess deliverance, the forgiveness of our sins.'

9. In all wisdom, etc.] RV ‘in all spiritual wisdom and understanding.’ 10. RM ‘by the knowledge.’ 12. Made us meet] better, ‘qualified you.’ Usually the saints in light is taken as a single phrase meaning ‘saints in heaven.’ But ‘in light’ should be connected with ‘the lot.’ It defines its situation. ‘The lot’ (AV inheritance) ‘of the saints’ is the blessedness awaiting them. 13. His dear Son] RV ‘the Son of his love.’ 14. Redemption] The view that the word means ransom is very dubious. ‘Deliverance’ is the best translation. Omit through his blood.

15–23. The supremacy of the Son in the universe and the Church.

Paraphrase. ‘(15) This Son of God’s love, in whom we have our deliverance, the pardon of our sins, is the exact image of God, so that while God is the invisible, He is manifested to us in His Son. (16) The Son also possesses the first-born’s dominion over every creature in virtue of the fact that the creation of all things depended on Him, whether in heaven or on earth, whether visible or invisible. Let it be specially observed that in the ‘all things’ thus created must be included the Angelic powers of the loftiest orders. All things I say have come into existence by His agency, and He is the goal for which they have been created. (17) He is before all things and the principle of their cohesion. (18) And this preeminence in the universe is matched by His preeminence in the Church. He is the Head of the body, inasmuch as He is the ruler who has passed to His dominion from the dead, in order that He who is from the first supreme in the universe may become supreme in the Church, and thus be supreme in every sphere. (19, 20) This position He attained because God was well pleased that all the fulness of His Grace should dwell in His Son, and thus reconcile through Him all things to Himself. It was through the blood shed on His Cross that peace was thus made. And the scope of this reconciliation was universal, it embraced not things in earth alone, but those in the heavens; (21) aye, and you Colossians, too, once estranged from God and hostile to Him though you were. (22, 23) Now you have been reconciled in the Son’s fleshly body through His death, to present yourselves blameless before God, if you stand unshaken in the Gospel.'

The aim of this great exposition of the nature and work of the Son is to accord to Him the supreme position alike in the world and the Church, and sweep away the false teaching which assigned to angelic mediators the position and functions of the Son. He and not they created, sustains, and rules the universe; they, even the loftiest, are merely His creatures. He, and not they, is the Redeemer, they are among the redeemed.

15. The image perfectly resembles and reveals the original. First born] The word expresses priority to and then supremacy over. Probably the latter only is meant here. Every creature] better than RV ‘all creation.'

16. By him] RV ‘in him.’ Thrones, etc.]
various ranks of higher angels. 17. Consist[ ] RM 'That is, hold together.' The Son is the centre of unity for the universe. 19. RV
'For it was the good pleasure of the Father that in him should all the fulness dwell.' A very difficult v., but probably this is more correct than RM, 'For the whole fulness of God was pleased to dwell in him.' The ful-ness is not as in 26, the fulness of Godhead, but the fulness of grace possessed by the Son in His incarnate state. 20. The Son's atoning death availed for the whole angelic world, as well as for the world of men, since the Son is Head of both.

20–22. Very difficult, but probably a full stop should be placed at the end of v. 21. We may translate, 'And through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his Cross, through him, whether the things on earth or the things in the heavens, you also who once were alienated and enemies in mind in evil works. But now ye have been reconciled in the body of his flesh,' etc. 22. Body of his flesh] as against the false teachers who thought non-incarnate angels could redeem.

24—C. 2. Paul's sufferings, labours, and anxieties for the Church.

Paraphrase. '24–26) I rejoice in the sufferings I endure for your sake, and fill up the measure of afflictions Christ has still to endure in my flesh on behalf of His body, the Church, which I serve in my office of stewardship enthused to me by God, to set forth the gospel in its universal scope, that secret hidden from eternity but now revealed to His saints. (27)
To them God has willed to make known how rich is the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles which is none other than the indwelling Christ, the pledge of your participation in the heavenly glory. (28, 29) This Christ we proclaim to all, that we may present each perfect in Him—an end to which I devote all the energy which He has made to work so mightily in me. (C. 2. 1–3) For let me assure you how intense is my inward struggle for you and the Laodiceans, personally unknown to me though you are, that you may be strengthened and knit together in love to attain all rich fulness of insight, a full knowledge of Christ the divine mystery, in whom exist all the treasures of wisdom and knowldge, not on the surface, but concealed where they must be discovered by earnest search.'

24. Christ suffers in His members in virtue of their union with Him, and the afflictions Paul undergoes in prison are filling up the measure of suffering Christ has still to endure in him.

25. Dispensation] RM 'stewardship.'

26. Mystery] truth not to be discovered by man's unaided power, and therefore known only through divine revelation. This mystery was concealed from the ages before the world and the generations of mankind, in other words from angels and from men.

C. 2. 1. Paul was personally unknown both to the Colossians and the Laodiceans.

2. Full assurance] RM 'fulness.' To the acknowledgement, etc.] RV, better, 'that they may know the mystery of God, even Christ.'
The wealth of full understanding consists in knowledge of the mystery of God, and this mystery of God is no other than Christ Himself, since in Him God's eternal purpose is realised and revealed. They need not go to other sources as the false teachers advise, all is contained in Christ.

CHAPTER 2

THE FALSE TEACHING AND ITS REPUTATION

4–15. Hold fast to Christ the All-sufficient Saviour.

Paraphrase. '4) I emphasise these truths about Christ lest you should be beguiled by plausible persuasions. (5) While I am physically absent from you, I am with you in spirit, rejoicing with you and beholding your order and the firm foundation of your faith in Christ.
(6, 7) Let your moral life in Christ Jesus be in harmony with the teaching through which you received Him as Lord; be firmly rooted and built up in Him, established in faith as you were taught, abounding in thankfulness.
(8) Let no one lead you away as his prey by any empty sham that he may recommend as 'philosophy' drawn from human tradition, with the elementals of the world and not Christ for its content. (9, 10) For it is in Christ, not in them, that all the fulness of Godhead dwells, and dwells as an organic whole; and it is in Him that you find every spiritual need completely met, in Him the Head of the angelic powers. (11) You need no physical circumcision, for in your conversion you received a spiritual circumcision, not the mere cutting away of a fragment of the body, but the removal of the whole carnal nature.
Really this went back to the death of Christ in which He underwent this spiritual circumcision; (12) and you have not only shared Christ's burial in baptism, but also His resurrection through faith in the working of God who raised Him from the dead. (13) You too, though spiritually dead by reason of your trespasses with your carnal nature unremoved by spiritual circumcision; you did God quicken along with Christ, forgiving us all our trespasses (I say 'us,' not 'you,' for I cannot be silent about God's forgiving love to me), because He had cancelled the bond which was against us by its ordinances.
The Law which was hostile to us. (14) And He has taken it out of the way, annulling it by nailing it to Christ's Cross that it might be put to death with Him. (16) He despised the angelic forces, and showed them frankly in their true position as givers of an abrogated Law, and rulers of elements to which Christians have died, triumphing over them on the Cross.'

8. Paul is not condemning philosophy properly so called, but the empty doctrines which the false teachers dignified by that name. Spoil] RV 'maketh spoil of you'; the word means to lead away as prey. The rudiments of the world] better, as mg., 'the elements of the world.' This cannot be the first principles of religion, which could not be well called 'weak and beggarly' (Gal 4:9), were not strictly common to Jews and heathen, nor an apt description of the false teaching which was something very different. Here they are contrasted with Christ; in Gal 4:8,9 they are identified with those who by nature are not gods; and in Gal 4:8 compared with 'guardians and stewards.' They must then be personal beings, not however the spirits of the stars, but the elemental spirits that animate the material world. The false 'philosophy' had these angels not Christ for its subject-matter. 9. The reference is to the exalted Christ. Bodily] usually explained to mean in bodily fashion. Probably we should render 'in the form of a body,' and explain it to mean as an organic whole. The fulness of the Godhead is not distributed among the angels, but exists in all its completeness in Christ. 11. The body of the sins of the flesh] RV 'the body of the flesh.' The carnal nature, the old self, is meant. The circumcision of Christ] probably an expression for the death of Christ, in which the Christian ideally died to sin. 12. RV 'Through faith in the working of God.' 13. The uncircumcision of your flesh] not physical, as if he meant, 'because you were uncircumcised Gentiles,' for the circumcised Jews also were, in Paul's judgment, spiritually dead. He means the spiritual uncircumcision, which consisted in the possession of a carnal nature. Forgiven you] RV 'forgiven us.' Paul cannot leave himself out. 14. Handwriting of ordinances, that was against us] RM 'the bond that was against us by its ordinances.' 15. Principalities and power] mean here precisely what they mean elsewhere in this Epistle. They are not evil spirits, but the angels who gave the Law that brought Christ to His death, and that rule over the material elements. God is the subject throughout the passage. 16-23. Hold fast the treasure of which the false teachers would rob you. Paraphrase. (16) Since then the Law no longer exists for you, and the angels have been deposed from their rule, let no one pass judgment on you in the matter of food or sacred seasons. (17) These things are a mere shadow; it is Christ who possesses the substance. (18) Let no one give judgment against you in the matter of gratuitous humility and angel worship, vainly speculating and inflated with fleshly pride. (19) Such a man has no firm grasp of Christ the Head, from whom the whole body of the Church draws and maintains its unity by the joints and ligaments and grows with such growth as God requires. (20) If your conversion meant that in union with Christ you died to the elemental spirits that ruled the old order, why do you act as if you still belonged to it and were subject to them, and permit yourselves to be dictated to in such terms as these, (21) 'You must not handle nor taste nor even touch?' (22) What folly, when every one of the things prohibited is so unimportant that we annihilate it in the very act of use! These prohibitions have their source not in divine, but in human precepts and teachings. (23) They confer, it is true, a reputation for wisdom in respect of gratuitous worship of the angels and humility and ascetic severity to the body, but confer no true honour, and tend to the indulgence of the flesh.' 16. The Jewish character of the false teaching comes very plainly into view here. 17. In Christ they have all in reality which they think they have in Judaism. This v. might almost serve as a text for the Epistle to the Hebrews, which sees in Christianity the religion of eternity realised in time in the person and work of Jesus, but casting its shadow before it into the world in the form of Judaism. 18. Text and translation are alike very uncertain. We should probably correct the text and render: 'Let no one give judgment against you in voluntary humility and worship of the angels, treading the void of air, groundlessly puffed up by the mind of his flesh.' Intruding into] If the text is right, 'investigating' would be a better rendering. Which he hath not seen] The negative should certainly be omitted with the best MSS. If the text is right, the meaning of the clause seems to be, 'investigating his visions,' but the text is probably incorrect, and we should read with a very slight alteration of the Gk., 'treading the void of air.' They leave the solid ground of fact and experience for the insubstantial bubbles of speculation. Fleshly mind] a sharp warning to men who fancied they were achieving the destruction of the flesh by worshipping angels and severity to the body; these practices had their origin in the flesh, which dominated their whole nature, mind and all. 19. Severance from the Head cuts off the supply of spiritual life. 20. Death with Christ is death to the old order of things, to the world and the Law and the angels who.
ruled them both. The false teachers would have them revert to a stage they have left below them. 21. Precepts of the false teachers.

23. Shew of wisdom] better, ‘reputation for wisdom.’ Will worship] a worship not required of them, the worship of angels. Neglecting of] RV ‘severity to.’ Not in any honour, etc.] This clause is extremely difficult, and no satisfactory explanation has been given. The RV rendering, ‘but are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh,’ is highly questionable. Hort, our chief textual critic, and Haupt, the best commentator on the Epistle, are agreed that the text is corrupt. Perhaps some words have been accidentally omitted.

CHAPTER 3
THE CHRISTIAN’S RISEN LIFE AND THE DUTIES IT ENTAILS

1-4. Resurrection with Christ and the heavenly life.

Paraphrase] ‘(1) Seeing then that at your conversion you shared not Christ’s death only, but His resurrection, go on to participate in His heavenly life, in that heaven where He is, and where He sits at God’s right hand. (2) Let your whole thought be set on heavenly, not on earthly things. (3) For you died with Christ, and your life in union with Him is a hidden life in God. (4) It is not always to remain hidden. For at Christ’s second coming it will be revealed; for Christ is our very life, so that His manifestation involves ours.’

2. Affection] RV ‘mind.’ 3. For ye are dead] RV ‘Ye died,’ i.e. at conversion.

Paraphrase. ‘(5, 6) Since you died and rose with Christ and your life is hidden with Him in God, realise these experiences already ideally yours in putting your sins to death, impurity and covetousness. (7) those heathen vices which draw down God’s wrath, which you also once practised. (8) Put away anger, malice, abusive speech, (9) lying, for the old self has been discarded, (10) and the new self has been put on, which is being renewed with a view to deeper knowledge in conformity to the Creator’s image. (11) Where there is such a new nature, all distinctions of race, social position, and religion are annulled, and Christ is all and in all the relations of life. (12-14) Be kind, forbearing, and forgiving as Christ forgave you, and let love, which binds all Christians in one, do its perfect work. (15) Let the peace of Christ control your life, do nothing to ruffle it, and be thankful. (16) Let the gospel dwell within you, wisely teach and warn each other in songs of praise, let all your life be lived in Christ’s name, and express through Him your thankfulness to God.’

18–C. 41. Reciprocal duties of wives and husbands, children and fathers, slaves and masters.

22. The case of slaves is treated more fully, since the case of Onesimus was engaging Paul’s attention. But he wished to keep the gospel clear of any attempt to revolutionise society. It was to be leaven, not dynamite. Egy-service] i.e. service most zealously performed when the slave is under observation. 25. The meaning is probably that the Christian slave must not suppose, because he is a Christian, that God will deal leniently with his misconduct.

CHAPTER 4
EXHORTATION AND GREETING

2-6. Exhortation to prayer and wisdom in dealing with heathen.

6. Grace, not divine grace, but graciousness. Their speech must be winning and wise, seasoned with salt.

7-18. Commendation of bearers of the letter, and salutations.

8. I have sent] i.e. I am (now) sending. He might know your estate] RV ‘that ye may know our estate.’ 10. Sister’s son] RV ‘cousin.’ They must have received these commands at an earlier time. 14. From this v., compared with v. 11, it is clear that Luke was a Gentile. 15. Probably we should substitute ‘Nymphas’ and ‘her house.’ 16. The epistle from Laodicea] perhaps our Epistle to the Ephesians.

18. Paul dictated the letter, as was his custom, and signed it with his chained hand. Remember] in your prayers.
1 AND 2 THESSALONIANS

INTRODUCTION

The Epistles of St. Paul fall naturally into four groups, each divided from the others by considerable interval of time. In the earliest of these groups, written during the Second Missionary Journey, the great central thought of the coming of Christ to judge the world. The second group (1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Romans), written during the Third Missionary Journey, has for its leading theme the reconciliation of man with God and with his fellowman by means of the Cross of Christ. The third group (Philippians, Colossians, Ephesians, Philemon), written during the first Roman captivity, dwells on the thought of Christ as the great King and Head of the Church. The fourth group (1 and 2 Timothy, Titus), written at the close of the Apostle's life, deals with practical questions of Church organisation. The two Epistles to the Thessalonians together form the first group. In hem we have the earliest of St. Paul's writings, and, with the probable exception of the Epistle of St. James, the earliest books of the New Testament.

1. The Persons Addressed. The Thessalonians inhabited the chief city of Macedonia. Macedonia was the first European country in which St. Paul preached, and he always regarded it with peculiar affection. In Ac 16, 17 we have St. Luke's wonderfully vivid narrative of the bringing of the Gospel to Macedonia. After some stay at Philippi the Apostle went through Amphipolis and Apollonia to Thessalonica, where he stayed for some six months (Ac17:3), preaching first to the Jews as usual, and afterwards winning many converts among Gentile proselytes and women as well as among the heathen. Jewish intrigue at length drove him away. This famous city of Thessalonica, originally called Therma, had been re-founded by Cassander about 315 B.C., and, owing to its natural advantages, had grown and flourished. After the Roman conquest the great military road, the Via Egnatia, connected it with Italy and the East, while its fine harbour made it a great commercial centre. It was made a Free City by Augustus, with the privilege of self-government (Ac17:6). At the present time, under the slightly altered name of Saloniki, it is the second city of the Turkish empire, with a population of 70,000. It contained (and still contains) a considerable number of Jews, and had a large native population. It was from this latter class that St. Paul's converts were chiefly drawn (cp. 1Th 1:8 214, and observe the absence of OT quotations), and it is plain that they had the characteristic virtues, as well as some of the characteristic defects, of their race, which was brave, independent, persevering, and liberty-loving. But the Thessalonian converts sometimes allowed their independence to degenerate into undue self-assertion and disregard of authority (1Th 5:14 2Th 3:6,7). Yet, on the whole, St. Paul was proud and fond of them. Notwithstanding terrible persecution, they had remained firm (1Th 1:6 28,14 2Th 1:7). Though poor they were generous (2Cor 8:1-5). Their influence was felt throughout Macedonia and Greece (1Th 1:9). Their faith, hope, and love filled the Apostle's heart with joy (1Th 1:12,8).

2. Time and Place of Writing. The First Epistle was written towards the close of the Second Missionary Journey (? 51 A.D.), some time about the middle of the eighteen months' stay at Corinth (Ac18). St. Paul had not long left Thessalonica (1Th 2:17), but had had time to visit Athens (1Th 3:1). Timothy had been to Macedonia and back (1Th 3:6), and Silas (Silvanus) who is never mentioned after the Second Missionary Journey, is now the Apostle's companion (1Th 1:1). There had been time for the influence of the Thessalonian Church to make itself felt (1Th 1:7,8). Some members of the Christian community had died (1Th 4:13). The Second Epistle must have been written towards the close of the same Corinthian stay, when St. Paul had received news that the teaching of his first letter had been misrepresented and misunderstood (2Th 2:2). Silvanus and Timothy were still with him (2Th 1). Persecution was still raging (2Th 1), and there was much excitement and increasing disorder on account of expectation of an immediate coming of Christ (2Th 2:4,5).

3. Reception in the Church. These Epistles are quoted or alluded to from very early times. Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian refer to them. They are included in Marcion's Canon (circ. 140 A.D.), and are found in the early list of the books of the NT, known as the Muratorian Canon (circ. 190 A.D.). The internal evidence is also strong. Passages like 1Th 1:5-9 212-14 4:15 5:27 2Th 3:1-9, and the style and language, the per-for the prayers of the Thessalonians, are characteristically Pauline. The only serious objections to the genuineness of the Epistles are connected with the section about the Man of Sin (2 Th. 2:1-12), which is said by some to be un-Pauline and founded on the Revelation of St. John. But when we remember the large place occupied by Apocalyptic questions in Jewish and early Christian thought, the evident interest which they had for the Thessalonians, and the great prophecy of His coming uttered by our Lord Himself, we shall have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that St. Paul would naturally deal with the subject quite independently of St. John or any other NT writer.

4. Value and Importance. These earliest of St. Paul's Epistles, short as they are, contain much of extreme interest to Bible students. They show us how St. Paul presented the gospel to heathen converts. They give us a vivid picture of Christian life in the first days before dissensions and false beliefs had vexed the peace of the Church, when teachers and taught loved each other, and faith and zeal were yet glowing. Incidentally they reveal to us much of the writer's mind and character (1 Th. 3:6-10, 11-13; 2 Th. 3:7-15). But, most important of all, they tell us what were the doctrines held and taught some twenty years after the Ascension. (a) Christ is frequently called 'the Lord,' 'our Lord.' He is addressed in prayer (1 Th. 3:11; 2 Th. 2:16, 17). He died (1 Th. 2:15), rose again (1 Th. 10), and shall come to judge the world (1 Th. 4:14-18). He is the Redeemer and Deliverer (1 Th. 5:9, 10). (b) The Holy Spirit is given to Christians (1 Th. 5:5, 6; 4:8, 5:19). (c) The Church is already organised. The Apostles have authority (1 Th. 5:17; 2 Th. 3:14). There is a regular ministry (1 Th. 5:12, 13). Baptism may be adduced to in 1 Th. 4:8. There were already meetings, probably for communion, where the 'holy kiss' was used (1 Th. 5:26, 27, Justin's 'Apology,' I. 65). The local Church was united in bonds of brotherhood with other Churches (1 Th. 13:1; 2 Th. 1:21, 4:10), and with the faithful departed (1 Th. 4:13, 17).

Thus, these Epistles, besides giving a picture of Church life in early days, testify to the main articles of the Creed.

5. Analysis. First Epistle. Two main divisions: (a) Personal, 1:1-3:13; (b) Hortatory, 4:1-5:28. 1:1-10, Salutation and thanksgiving for their conversion and progress. 2:1-12, Sketch of the Apostle's own work at Thessalonica: cp. Ac. 17:1-10. 2:13-16, A second thanksgiving, with special reference to their persecutions. 2:17-3:10, His anxiety about the Thessalonians, and the joy with which he had received the good news about them brought by Timothy. 3:11-18, A solemn prayer for them to Christ as God.
final act of the King was to sit upon the throne of His glory and judge His people.' (b) St. Paul's mistake, if mistake it be, does not in the least affect the value of his ethical teaching on the subject. For he points out to the Thessalonians the true way of preparing for the Final Advent which Christ meant His Church to expect. They were to make ready for it, not by feverish excitement and restlessness, but by the quiet, steady performance of everyday duty as in His sight, with the assurance that His followers, whether living or asleep in Him, were in His safe keeping.

CHAPTER 1
Salutation and Thanksgiving

1. Salutation. For Silvanus (Silas) see Ac15:22 16:30, 37, 38. Timothy was one of St. Paul's most constant companions (Ac16:1 Ro16:21 1 Cor14:17 2 Cor11:19 Phil1:1 219:24 2 Tim1:5 3:14). The church...which is in God, etc.] a phrase peculiar to this Epistle. The Church is in living union with God and Christ (Col2:19).

2-10. Fervent thanksgiving for their conversion and growth in grace.

4. Better, 'Knowing, brethren beloved of God, your election, how that,' etc. 'Elect,' i.e. to Christian and Church privileges (2 Tim. 2:10).

5. Assurance] R.Vmg. 'fulness.' They preached with deep conviction of the truth and power of the message entrusted to them.

7. In Macedonia] of which Thessalonica was the capital. And Achaia] of which Corinth, where the Apostle was, was capital.

Achaia, the Roman province (= Greece).

6. To speak anything] i.e. to recount their faith.

9. They themselves] i.e. the dwellers in all the places the Apostle and his companions had visited or heard from. The living and true God] better, 'a living and true God.' The Thessalonian converts had, as a rule, been heathens, though some were proselytes (i.e. Jews by religion), Ac17:4. 10. To wait] to look for the Second Coming. Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come] better, 'delivereth us from the wrath which is approaching.'

CHAPTER 2
The nature of St. Paul's Life and Work at Thessalonica

2. The persecution at the Roman garrison-town of Philippi made a deep impression on St. Paul the Roman citizen (Ac16:19-40 Phil 1:29). It was the indignity that hurt him.

Contention] better, 'conflict.' 3. It would seem that St. Paul was at first looked upon by some as an impostor, seeking his own ends. He declares that he came with a sincere desire for their salvation only. Deceit] better, 'error.' Uncleanliness] Impurity was often associated with heathen worship, and this was especially the case at Thessalonica and Corinth.

6-11. St. Paul says that he might have made a display of apostolic authority and have demanded pecuniary support: see 1 Cor. 9. But he was like a babe (better than 'gentle'), or like a mother who nurses her own children, or a father who guides and directs his son. At the same time he supported himself by tentmaking (Ac18:3 20:4).

13-16. A second thanksgiving for their faith and patience under persecution.

14. The (Gentile) Thessalonian Church had suffered much at the hands of their fellow-countrymen, just as the Jewish Church had suffered from the unbelieving Jews. Here was a bond of union and sympathy between the two. 15, 16. A characteristic outburst. The Jews had followed St. Paul with unceasing hostility in Europe as well as in Asia. They have driven him from Thessalonica and Berea, and were doing their utmost against him at Corinth. Their narrow exclusiveness (forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles) and hatred of other nations (contrary to all men) were a bitter trial to a patriot like St. Paul. To the uttermost] i.e. there was no longer any hope of their repentance or escape from their doom (Mt23:32). The end was close at hand.

17-C. 3:16. 'Till Timothy's good report of you reached us, we were anxious about you, but now we rejoice and bless God for the news he brings, that you have stood firm under persecution.' 18. St. Paul generally uses the 1st person plural in these Epistles, including Silvanus and Timothy with himself. Here, however, he speaks for himself. The hardship may have been an illness—probably malarial fever (2 Cor12:7), or Jewish hostility. To St. Paul Satan is a real person (Ro16:20 2Cor11:14 1Tim1:10).

19. The prospect of presenting his converts to Christ fills the Apostle with joy.

CHAPTER 3
THE APOSTLE'S ANXIETY ABOUT HIS CONVERTS
1. Forbear] better, 'endure the suspense.'
2. Our fellow-labourer] better, 'God's fellow-worker' or 'minister,' RV. Should be moved] better, 'led astray.' Afflictions] at the hands of Jews and Gentiles: see Ac 17:35.
3. Now when] better, 'so soon as.' Charity] RV 'love.' We live] it puts new life in us. If ye stand fast] better, 'if only ye stand fast.' The Gk. expresses some doubt and anxiety. I pray unceasingly and urgently to the end that I may see you again and correct your shortcomings.' The prayer was answered after some years (Ac 20:1,2).

11-13. A prayer to Christ as co-equal with the Father, with which the first section of the Epistle ends: cp. 2 Th 2:16. The verb is in the singular, emphasising the reference to Christ, who is also called 'the Lord' in v. 12. The key-note of these Epistles is again struck at the concluding words of the prayer, 'at the coming' (lit. 'presence') of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints' (cp. 2:19).

CHAPTER 4
EXHORTATION TO PURITY AND BROTHERLY LOVE. THE SECOND ADVENT
1. 'You are already walking in the right path. I want you to advance in it more and more.'
2. 3, 4. Translate, 'For this is a thing willed by God, even your sanctification, that ye shall abstain from fornication (cp. Ac 15:20), that each one of you should learn to win his body to a state of purity and honour.' Vessel] i.e. body. Some think the word means 'wife,' but this is not so likely.
3. Lust of concupiscence] RV 'passion of lust.' Go beyond and defraud] RV 'overreach (mg.), and wrong' (i.e. by his sin). Abyss should certainly be 'this.' Better, 'For God called us not for uncleanness, but to be in a state of purity.'
4. Who hath also given] better, 'who is ever giving' (present tense).

This passage (vv. 3-8) contains in brief a statement of the Christian doctrine of purity. Impurity is, (1) (from the point of view of the man himself) a dishonouring of the temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Cor 3:16): since He takes up His abode in it, and since Christ has become incarnate, and the body is to rise again, we must honour the body, not defile it: (2) (from the point of view of our brothers and sisters) a violation of the law of love—a fraud and a cheat. Sins of the flesh are very lightly regarded by the heathen world.

9. Brotherly love] better, 'love of the brethren'; i.e. the special love to be shown towards all the members of the Church.
10. In all Macedonia] These words imply that there were other Churches there besides those of which we read in the Acts. They also show that these Churches were not isolated. The idea of a Catholic Church is growing.
11. Study] better, 'strive earnestly.' Religious excitement, especially in view of the expected coming of Christ, was a danger to the Thessalonian Church (2 Th 3:12). It caused neglect of 'the duty of every day.' Work would give them, (1) respect in the eyes of their heathen neighbours (them that are without); (2) independence (Eph 4:28). Honestly] or, as we should now say, 'honourably.'
12. The Second Advent. The dead in Christ will rise before the living, and both alike will share in the life everlasting. But the time of the Advent is uncertain. Let us therefore watch and be sober.
13. Are asleep] better, 'are lying asleep.' The Thessalonians were anxious as to the part which those who had died in the Faith would take in the Second Advent, which was believed to be near at hand. Others] better, 'all the rest,' i.e. the heathen who, even if they believed in some sort of an existence after death, had no hope of immortality.
14. Which sleep in Jesus] better, 'that are fallen asleep through Jesus,' i.e. in communion with Him. Prevent] better, 'be before,' i.e. the dead, about whom you are anxious, will be at no disadvantage at the Advent, so far as its blessedness is concerned.
15. Cp. Mt 24:30,31. At the Resurrection of the Just the dead will rise before the living: see 1 Cor 15:51,52 regarding the spiritual body.

CHAPTER 5
THE NEED OF WATCHFULNESS. FINAL INJUNCTIONS
1. Times and seasons] St. Paul always lays stress on the uncertainty as to the time of the Advent (2 Th 2; cp. 2 Pet 3:4). When they shall say] i.e. when people are saying.
2. Thief] better, 'as thieves.' Thieves work in darkness. You are all children of light. Live up to your birthright. Let us not sleep] i.e. in carelessness and sin. Others] better, 'the others.'
3-10. Mason paraphrases, 'Let us arm ourselves with a brave hope of our salvation. for it will be against God's will if we perish. He means us to save ourselves by union with Him who put an end to death for us by dying, and made all who wait for His coming to live, whether they be in the world's sense dead or alive.'
9. To obtain salvation [Phil 2:15, 13] or, perhaps, 'for the adoption which consists in salvation': cp. 2 Th 2:14. 10. Whether we wake or sleep] i.e. whether we are alive or dead at the Advent.

11. Edify] better, 'build up.' As also ye do] St. Paul always praises and encourages where he can.

12–28. Exhortations to respect for their clergy, orderly living, prayer and other spiritual duties, and conclusion.

12. Know] better, 'value.' The probable reference is to the presbyters sometimes called (in allusion to their duties) 'overseers' (1 Tim 5:17). 14. Feebleminded] better, 'fainthearted.'

The weak] i.e. in faith, Ro 15:1. 15. Cp. Mt 5:39; 1 Pet 3:8, 9. 16. Evermore] better, 'always.' Joy is a necessary part of the Christian character (Ro 14:17; Phil 2:18; 3:4), and a Christian duty. 18. Cp. Eph 5:30. Prayer is put between joy and thanksgiving, 'it is only by constant prayer that we are enabled to feel true joy or gratitude.' God's will towards us is that we should be always joyful, prayerful, grateful, and (38) pure in life.

20. The Christian prophets were an order of men specially inspired to reveal the will of God to others ('mission preachers'), who might sometimes (Ac 11:27, 28; 21:10, 11) be charged to foretell the future: see 1 Cor 11:4, 5; 14:5; Eph 4:11; 5:1; 1 Tim 1:18; 4:14. 'Prophets' are also mentioned in the early Christian tract known as the 'Didache,' or 'Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.' The Thessalonians seem to have been disposed to check enthusiasm. 21. Prove] better, 'test.' You must test all these thoughts by spiritual standards, since there is an inspiration which is false (1 Jn 4:1). 22. All appearance] better, 'every form.' Good is one; evil is manifold.

23. May your spirit (by which man maintains communion with God) and soul (the feelings and emotions) and body (which is to rise again) be preserved entire and without blame, and be so found at the Advent. 24. Will do it] i.e. will preserve your spirit, soul, and body.

25, 26. The duty of intercessory prayer (? especially at the Eucharist, where the holy kiss was a part of the rites from very early times). 27. I charge] better, 'I adjure.' The reading was probably to be at the Eucharist (Justin Martyr, 'Apol.' 1. 65–67). St. Paul wishes his earliest letter to be read to all without any suppression or omissions, otherwise a wrong use might be made of his authority.

2 THESSALONIANS

CHAPTER 1

SALUTATIONS. THE SECOND ADVENT

1–4. Greeting and thanksgiving for their constant faith and love and patience under persecution: cp. 1 Th 1:8.

5–C. 2 Th 3. The Coming of Christ to judgment. Much is to happen before Christ comes.

5. A manifest token] The words refer to their sufferings and their patience. If God is righteous there must come a time when wrongs such as theirs shall be righted, and patience like theirs be rewarded. Thus the sufferings and patience of the Thessalonians become a proof that there is a judgment to come (Phil 1:9). 7. Rest] better, 'relief.' The true rest and relief comes to the faithful when Christ comes.

8. Taking vengeance] better, 'awarding retribution.' Them that know not God, and that obey not] better, (1) 'them that know not, and (2) them that obey not.' Possibly (1) Gentiles and (2) Jews.

9. The everlasting destruction (only here) consists in exclusion from God's presence.

11. Calling] cp. Phil 3:14, Heb 3:1. All the good pleasure of his goodness] better, 'all delight in well-doing.'

---

CHAPTER 2

THE GREAT Apostasy

2. Spirit] i.e. a pretended revelation uttered by a false prophet. Letter as from us] perhaps a forged letter (the probable meaning), cp. 3:17, or a misunderstanding of the First Epistle.

3–10. It will be convenient to treat this difficult passage as a whole. Literally translated, it runs thus: 'Let no man deceive you in any wise: for [the Final Presence of our Lord shall not be] except (or till) the falling away come first and the Man of Lawlessness be revealed, the son of perdition, he that opposeth and exalted himself against all that is called God or an object of worship, so that he sitteth in the Sanctuary of God, setting himself forth as God (Do ye not remember that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things?) And now ye know about that (power) which restraineth, to the end that he may be revealed to his own season. For the mystery of lawlessness is already working, only there is one that restraineth now till he be taken out of the way. And then shall the Lawless one be revealed, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of His mouth, and bring to naught by the Epiphany of His Presence—even him whose presence is according to the working of Satan, in all power and signs and wonders of falsehood, and in every deceit of unrighteousness for the ruin of those who are perishing because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved.

In the first place, we must remember that St. Paul is here speaking of something which is already at work, and the overthrow of which is to precede that Final Presence of the Lord which the Thessalonians thought to be immediately impending. Realising this, we shall at once reject all those interpretations which see in the Man of Sin (Lawlessness) some historical character (e.g. one of the Popes, or of Napoleon I) who lived after St. Paul's time. We must also remember that the Thessalonians had the key to the interpretation of the passage which we do not possess, since they had been orally instructed by St. Paul on the subject. But, though certainty is now impossible, we may be guided to a probable solution by studying the passage in connexion with the Revelation of St. John, and (especially) our Lord's great prophecy recorded in Mt 24 Mk 13 and Lk 21. When, further, we remember how bitterly St. Paul felt the opposition of his fellow-countrymen to Christ (1 Th 2 15, 16), and how true the Gospels are of denunciation of Jewish sins, we shall be led to the conclusion that 'the Apostasy' is the Jewish apostasy, and that the Man of Sin (Lawlessness) is either some false Christ (Mt 24 23), many of whom appeared among the Jews about this time, or (more probably) the spirit of Judaism personified. (A somewhat similar personification may be found in Rev 2, 3, where 'the angel' of each of the seven churches seems to denote, not any official, but the Church itself.) The Jews had been chosen of God to bear witness to Him, and they had betrayed their trust. Their worship was a lie (Mt 23 17-22). They were 'a synagogue of Satan' (Rev 2 19 3). They had made the Temple a den of robbers (Mt 21 15). Some of them could perform lying wonders (Mt 12 27 Mk 13 22 Ac 19 13). They were persecuting the Church of Christ and opposing the truth (Ac 13 46 14 19 17 5 15 18 19 12 22 25 23 11). And so their apostasy was to be revealed and punished by the utter (but not final, Ro 11 25-27) overthrow of Judaism, and the destruction of the Holy City and the Temple in 70 A.D. by the Romans. This great event would come before the final advent, which the Thessalonians were expecting immediately. The further question who, or what, is the Person or Power that restrains the Man of Lawlessness, is one of considerable difficulty. The usual answer is 'the authority of the Roman empire, or perhaps the reigning Roman Emperor Claudius' (41-54 A.D.). In the very earliest days of Christianity the Romans did protect the Christians from Jewish violence (Ac 18 14, 15 23 24 25 14-21). But soon, under the Emperor Nero, this attitude was exchanged for one of hostility, after the fire at Rome in 64 A.D. And it is hard to see how the words 'until he be taken out of the way' can apply to a Roman emperor or to the Roman empire in its dealings with Judaism. It is possible that by the Restrainer St. Paul means the Christian Church in Jerusalem—the Mother-Church of which the Thessalonians became imitators (1 Th 2 14). We know that St. James, the head of that Church, had great influence over his unbelieving fellow-countrymen, and may well have exercised a restraining power over them. Some Jews even appear to have seen in the siege of Jerusalem the punishment for his murder by the high priest Ananus. It is to be noted that the Jerusalem Church, obeying the Lord's command (Mt 24 14, 16), left the doomed city on the approach of the Roman army and fled to Pella. Thus she might be said to be 'taken out of the way' of the evil to come.

3. Falling away [Gk. 'apostasy.]
4. The reference is to the pretensions of a false Messiah.

7. Mystery] This word in NT. always denotes something once hidden, but now revealed, or soon to be revealed (1 Cor 4 1 Col 2 4 Eph 6 19). 8. Brightness, etc.] rather, 'manifestation of His presence.' 11. Strong delusion better, 'inner working of error.' Those who obstinately refuse the truth at last become incapable of receiving it. 12. Damned] RV 'judged.' 13. From the beginning] perhaps (with the oldest MS), 'as firstfruits.' 15. The traditions] i.e. the truths taught, whether orally or by writing.

CHAPTER 3

EXHORTATIONS, BESUDES, AND BENEDICTION

2. Unreasonable] almost 'outrageous.' Faith better, 'the Faith.' 3. Evil] RV 'the evil one.' 5. Patient waiting for] better, 'the patience of.' 6. Evidently disorder in the Church had increased since the First Epistle was written. Withdraw yourselves] or, 'shun.'

We have the right to be supported, but for the sake of example we waived it in your case (1 Cor 9 18). 11. Working not at all ... busy-bodies] i.e. neglecting their own work (in view of a supposed immediate Advent), but interfering with that of others. 16. By all means] better, 'in all places,' or, 'in all ways.' 17. St. Paul wrote the body of his letters through a secretary, but he added a few words in his own large handwriting, in order that his correspondents might know them to be genuine (1 Cor 15 21 2 Th 2 2 Col 4 18). So I write] better, 'this is my handwriting.'
THE PASTORAL EPISTLES

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

The two Epistles to Timothy and the Epistle to Titus constitute a group by themselves, and are usually called 'The Pastoral Epistles,' because they deal to a large extent with matters of Church organisation and government. That they were all written by one author is generally agreed, not only by those who accept the tradition that St. Paul was the writer, but also by those who reject it. It will be convenient, therefore, to discuss the points common to all three, before dealing with each in detail.

1. Authorship. The authorship of these Epistles is one of the questions of NT criticism upon which scholars are sharply divided. The objections urged against the Pauline authorship are of different kinds and varying degrees of weight, and may be briefly enumerated as follows: (a) Historical difficulties; (b) References to heresies; (c) Church organisation; (d) The description of St. Paul in the salutations; (e) Language and style.

(a) Historical Difficulties. It is impossible to find a place for these Epistles in the scheme of St. Paul's life, which is derived from the narrative in Acts and the references in the acknowledged Epistles. The journeys to which the Apostle makes reference are inconsistent with his movements as recorded in Acts. According to 1 Tim 1:8, Timothy had been left at Ephesus while Paul proceeded to Macedonia; but in Ac 19:22-20:1 Timothy was sent from Ephesus to Macedonia in advance of St. Paul. In 1 Tim 3:14 the Apostle intended to return to Timothy at Ephesus; but in Ac 20:4 Timothy was with him in Greece, and in 20:14, 17 St. Paul did not go to Ephesus, but sent for the Ephesian elders to meet him at Miletus. So in 2 Tim 4:20 the reference to Trophimus cannot relate to the journey recorded in Ac 20:17-21, for Trophimus accompanied the Apostle to Jerusalem (Ac 21:29). Again, the references in Tit 1:5, 6, where St. Paul speaks of leaving Titus in Crete and asks him to meet him at Nicopolis, cannot be connected with the only occasion on which the Apostle visited Crete according to Acts (27:9), viz. when he was a prisoner en route for Rome, where Acts leaves him still under arrest.

These difficulties, however, are obviated when the tradition is accepted that St. Paul after his first imprisonment (Ac 28:30 Phil 1:18) was set free in 62 or 63 A.D., and arrested again in 66 or 67. In the First Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (about 97 A.D.) the writer speaks of St. Paul having 'gone to the extreme limit of the west.' This expression in a letter written at Rome seems to point to Spain. St. Paul had once hoped to visit that country (Ro 15:32); and in the 'Muratorian Fragment,' a document of date about 200 A.D., it is indicated that he had done so: a tradition which is mentioned later by Eusebius in the 4th cent., and Chrysostom in the 5th cent. If the genuineness of the Pastoral Epistles is established on other grounds, they give powerful testimony to St. Paul's activity during the period after Acts.

(b) References to Heresies. Many critics see in these Epistles, and especially in 1 Tim (11:4-13 6:20), references to heresies which prevailed widely in the Church during the 2nd cent., and are classed under the name of Gnosticism. These heresies dealt with solutions of the problem of evil; they combined ideas from Jewish and heathen sources with Christian truth; they tended to represent Christ's earthly career and sufferings as only seeming, not real (Docetism); and they exalted knowledge (gnosis, whence the name) as a special privilege of the few, and superior to faith, the possession of the many.

The references to heresies in the Pastoral Epistles, however, are extremely vague and indefinite. There is no reference to Docetism, such as we find in 1 John (4:1-4), supposed to have been written at Ephesus before 100 A.D.; and the references to false doctrines in 1 Tim 4:14, 6:20 do not seem to require a 2nd-cent. date, or to conflict with the Pauline authorship any more than the references to heresies in Col 2:18, 23 require that Epistle to be denied to St. Paul, and assigned to the 2nd cent. In the early Church, composed, as almost every congregation was, of elements diverse in race, education, and religion, it is not surprising to find the germs of false doctrine from the beginning, showing themselves sometimes in tendencies towards Jewish legalism (1 Tim 17 Tit 1:14 3:9), as was the case among the Galatians at an earlier date; sometimes in philosophical speculations drawn from heathen sources (1 Tim 4:7 6:20), as was previously the case among the Colossians. The heresies indicated in the Pastoral Epistles seem largely Jewish in origin. They are speculations about the Law (1 Tim 1:7-10; cp. 2 Tim 3:14-17), about genealogies (1 Tim 1:14 Tit 3:9), about Jewish fables (Tit 1:14, and probably also 1 Tim 1:14 4:7); and while the ascetic practices (1 Tim 4:4) which some taught may have had some heathen elements, they are quite as likely to have been suggested by exaggerations of Jewish ceremonialism: see Ro 14:1 1 Cor 8:12 Col 2:16, and cp. 1 Tim 4:4 with Ac 10:11-12.

(c) Church Organisation. It has been objected to St. Paul’s authorship of these letters that the indications of Church organisation are such as point to a time later than that of St. Paul. Titus was appointed to ‘ordain elders in every city’ (1:5) in Crete; and both he and Timothy were instructed as to the qualifications of ‘the bishop’ (Tit 1:7-9 1 Tim 3:1-7). Timothy was also given instructions regarding the deacons (1 Tim 3:5-10). The organisation, however, does not seem when examined to be more developed than was necessary in the Churches almost from the beginning. Deacons had to be appointed at a very early date in the Church at Jerusalem—although the name was not then given them, the corresponding verb is used of their work—(Ac 6:4); and elders were appointed by St. Paul in every Church in Galatia on his first missionary journey (Ac 14:23); while at Ephesus, at the end of his third journey, they were evidently a recognised body (Ac 20:17) entrusted with the duties of overseeing and teaching the flock (20:28). Nor is the term ‘the bishop’ (1 Tim 3:2 Tit 1:7) necessarily an indication of a post-apostolic date. For (1) it is largely held that the terms ‘bishop’ (episcopos) and ‘elder’ (presbuteros) are used synonymously in these Epistles, as they undoubtedly were at an earlier period (Ac 20:28; cp. Phil 1:1); and (2) even if, as is also influentially maintained, ‘the bishop’ here means the principal minister of the Church, it would still be hazardous to pronounce the Epistles non-Pauline. Many good authorities trace back the beginnings of episcopacy to the apostolic age, and so it is by no means impossible that in an apostolic Epistle, written as late as 65-67 A.D., the term ‘bishop’ might occur in its later sense.

(d) Paul an Apostle. Another objection has been found in the fact that, in letters written to intimate friends and disciples, the writer should emphatically assert his apostleship. This is said, indicates that they were written by some one who was using the Apostle’s name at a later time, as the Apostle himself did not mention his apostleship in letters written to those with whom he was on friendly terms, whether churches or individuals (Phil 1: Philemon v. 1). But these Pastoral Epistles are not, properly speaking, private letters. They were probably intended to be read to the Churches: ‘the author is writing with his eye on the community’; and the fact that heresy and incipient faction were to be guarded against, sufficiently explains the assertion of apostolic dignity.

(c) Language and Style. The difference in language and style which exists between these Epistles and the undoubted letters of the Apostle is felt by many to be a serious objection to their genuineness. It is impossible here to enter into details; but there are a great many words and phrases found in these books, which are absent from the other writings of St. Paul, and there are over a hundred and seventy words used which are not elsewhere present in NT. A number of these words are, of course, necessitated by the fact that new subjects are here discussed; but there are many which cannot be thus explained. And on this ground alone many refer the Epistles to a later writer, who, according to some, has incorporated in them (especially in 2 Tim) fragments of genuine lost letters of St. Paul.

The argument from language, however, is by no means conclusive. The differences from the other Pauline Epistles in language and style may be the consequence of lapse of time. As the Apostle became older and travelled over new ground, meeting with new experiences, and making new converts, it would not be wonderful if he gained a wider command of language, and adopted a different mode of expression, according to the necessities of the case. As Farrar points out (‘St. Paul’: Excrucias 27), ‘St. Paul was the main creator of theological language.’ He had to find the correct and adequate expression for conceptions which as yet were extremely unfamiliar. Every year would add to the vocabulary, and the harvest of new expressions would always be most rich where truths already familiar were brought into collision with heresies altogether new.’

It has recently been ascertained by an examination in detail of about two hundred words which are not elsewhere found in the NT, that none of them had its origin later than St. Paul, that nearly half of them are found in the Septuagint, that over fifty are found in classical writers and writers who flourished not late than St. Paul, and that almost all the rest can be explained as necessitated by new subjects, or formed from Pauline or biblical words, or as otherwise consistent with the apostolic authorship. The argument from language would be valid and conclusive had it been shown that a number of words used in these Epistles did not come into use until after St. Paul’s day. The fact that none can be shown to be of later date, but that almost all can be proved to be contemporaneous with the Apostle, indicates that there is nothing in the language of the Pastors to conflict with their claims to be St. Paul’s. It may be added that even critical adverse to the Pauline authorship recognise in these letters the reflexions of thoughts and ideas characteristic of the Apostle. Many think they see incorporated in them reminiscences of the Apostle and private notes he had written to companions and friends (e.g. 2 Tim 1:15-18; 4:6-22; Tit 3:12,13), and describe them as Pauline, though not by the Apostle himself. Advocates of a 2nd-cent. date admit that a detailed comparison of the Pastors with the letters of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp, exhibits the former as “astonishingly superior”; and acknowledge that the writer was saturated with the contents of the genuine Epistles of St. Paul. Apart, therefore, from the historical and internal difficulties which have been dealt with, the Epistles suggest the apostolic authorship, and bear the marks of St. Paul’s personality; and as these difficulties seem all to be capable of explanation, we need have little hesitation in receiving them for what they profess to be.

2. The External Evidence for the Pastors is both early and good. They were probably made use of in the Epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp in the early quarter of the 2nd cent.; Irenæus (c. 180) quotes from 1 Tim as a genuine letter of St. Paul; and they seem to have been known to the writer of the letter from Vienne and Lyons about the same date. Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, the African contemporaries of Irenæus, also speak of them as St. Paul’s. Clement of Rome, who flourished in the end of the 1st and beginning of the 2nd cent., has many parallels to passages in the Pastors; and, though some scholars think that this arises from their origin in a similar atmosphere, and amid a common phraseology, it is quite as likely that the similarities are due to Clement’s acquaintance with the contents of these letters. Marcion, the Gnostic of the 2nd cent., omits these Epistles from his collection of authoritative Christian writings, and that, too, although he was “a Pauline enthusiast,” accepting only St. Luke’s Gospel, and the other ten Epistles of St. Paul. But Marcion was bound to reject these letters, if he was to save his doctrine, which they condemned by implication, root and branch; and no argument against their genuineness can be based upon the evidence of so interested and so prejudiced a witness. The external evidence therefore goes to support the view that St. Paul was the author.

3. Date. Accepting the Pauline authorship, we may conclude that these Epistles were written during the interval between the first and the second imprisonment of St. Paul at Rome. The Apostle arrived in Rome (Ac 28:16) probably early in the year 59. He was a prisoner there, dwelling in his own hired house (Ac 28:16,30) for two years. There the Acts of the Apostles leaves him. His appeal, however, seems to have been sustained and himself afterwards set at liberty. If he visited Spain, it must have been immediately after his release. Subsequently he revisited the scene of his earlier labours in Macedonia, and possibly in Ephesus (1 Tim 1). Timothy had been in Ephesus for some time, and the Apostle asked him to remain there for a longer period. To instruct him further regarding his action in the difficult situation he had to face, St. Paul wrote the First Epistle to him from Macedonia, perhaps in 65 or 66. About the same time, or very soon after, he wrote the Epistle to Titus. From it we learn that Titus was in Crete, where he had been left by the Apostle (1:4), who had visited the island probably on his way to Macedonia. St. Paul asked him to join him in the winter of the same year at Nicopolis. From Nicopolis St. Paul returned to Rome, whether under arrest or of his own will we cannot tell; but if he arrived a free man he was very soon a prisoner. From prison he wrote the Second Epistle to Timothy asking him to come to him (4:9). Where Timothy was at that time does not appear. He seems to have first Ephesus, otherwise he would have known of Trophimus having been invalided at Miletus, which was close by, and also of the visit of Tychicus (2 Tim 4:12,20). The Apostle felt that he was near his end (4:6,7); he had already appeared before his judges (4:19), but he evidently expected to be condemned. The Second Epistle to Timothy was thus written shortly before the Apostle’s martyrdom in 67 or 68.

4. Church Organisation. The state of Church organisation exhibited in these Epistles is exactly what might be expected to have existed in the later years of St. Paul’s life. When the Apostle in his first missionary operations had made a number of converts in any town or district sufficient to constitute a congregation, he appointed presbyters to minister and rule in it (Ac 14:23), perhaps also, as many maintain, a leading or presiding presbyter (episcopos) with special authority—all of them looking to the Apostle as their superior. When he, however, was no longer able himself to visit and control the various presbyters, and set in order the things that might be amiss, he selected one of his companions and assistants to act in his stead. This was the state of things in Ephesus (1 Tim 12) and Crete (Tit 1). St. Paul had appointed Timothy and Titus to be his delegates in these places, though their duty in that capacity may only have been temporary (2 Tim 4:9,21; Tit 3:12).
One of their duties was to appoint presbyters (elders) and (if presiding presbyters had been already introduced) bishops in these Churches (1 Tim 3:1-7; Tit 1:8-9), who were to bear rule over the brethren (1 Tim 5:17), and to teach and preach (1 Tim 5:17 Tit 1:9). The functions of these officers, however, are not minutely detailed: it is their character upon which the Apostle dwells. The qualities in which they are to be preeminent are moral qualities, and they are to be held in honour in proportion to their diligence in duty and faithfulness in teaching (1 Tim 5:17).

Besides them, there were to be deacons appointed, whose duties would be much the same as those of the deacons appointed in Jerusalem in the earliest days of the Church (Acts 6:1-5). They would have charge of the temporal affairs of the Church, but might, like Stephen, also have part in purely spiritual work. The Apostle in his case also dwells not upon their functions, but upon their character (1 Tim 3:9). Perhaps also deaconesses were appointed, charged with the care of the women in the Church and with the duty of commending the gospel to women outside its pale (1 Tim 3:11, where many translate 'their wives,' RV 'women,' as 'deaconesses': see note there).

5. Christian Doctrine. Much stress is laid by the Apostle upon the proclamation of the true faith. Exception has been taken to the genuineness of the Epistle on the ground of the Apostle’s insistence upon sound doctrine. But nothing could be more natural, as nothing was more necessary, than that emphasis should be laid upon doctrine, when heresy was rampant and that the importance of the truth should be asserted in presence of false teaching. In any case, the doctrines taught are doctrines which St. Paul was continually insisting upon: God’s desire that all men should be saved (cf. 1 Tim 2:4 with Rom 3:10-12); Christ’s manifestation as our Saviour, and His giving Himself as a ransom (1 Tim 2:5); His death and resurrection (2 Tim 2:5, 11; 4:8); our spiritual union with Him (2 Tim 2:11, 12, 3:11); salvation not of works, but of free grace (Tit 3:5), etc. So in characteristically Pauline fashion practical teaching is closely connected with doctrinal, and the moral aspect of faith in Christ is impressed upon the recipients of the letters. It is doubtless important to hold fast the form of sound words, but it is because the results of ‘sound doctrine’ are manifest in life and conduct (1 Tim 3:1; 10, 2 Tim 4:1 Tim 2:21, 2). A feature of the Epistles is the recurrence of the phrase ‘Faithful is the saying,’ used to introduce maxims of truth or duty. This expression occurs five times. viz. 1 Tim 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; 2 Tim 2:11, 13:3. It would seem to point to the fact that favourite sayings or watchwords were current among the Christians by this time—perhaps extracts from manuals of instruction, which had already begun to be prepared for the use of the presbyters in preparing converts for baptism—which were quoted by the Apostle.

1 TIMOTHY

INTRODUCTION

1. Authenticity. The First Epistle to Timothy is the first letter of the group called the Pastoral Epistles. Until the beginning of the 19th cent. no doubt was ever expressed as to the Epistle being written by St. Paul, except by the Gnostics; who, as is stated by Tertullian ('Adv. Marc.' v. 21), Clement of Alexandria ('Strom.' ii. 11), and Jerome ('Prol. ad Titum'), rejected all the Pastoral Epistles simply because the teaching contained in them was opposed to their peculiar doctrines. The external evidence, therefore, may be regarded as perfectly satisfactory, passages being quoted from it or alluded to by Clement of Rome, Hegesippus, Athenagoras, Theophilus, and the Pauline authorship directly declared by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, and accepted without demur till a hundred years ago, when T. E. C. Schmid for the first time (1804), followed by Schleiermacher (1807), Eichhorn (1812), De Witte (1826), Baur (1835), denied its genuineness, arguing entirely from internal evidence.

The internal evidence to which the opponents of the authenticity of the Epistles have appealed is the character of the heresies controverted in them, which, they say, were of a later date than St. Paul, and the use of a number of words and phrases not employed by St. Paul in his other Epistles. The answer to these objections is that the writers in question are mistaken in identifying the heresies denounced by St. Paul with the full-grown Gnostic system of the 2nd cent.; and that it is natural that

4. Contents and Purpose. The Epistle may be regarded as an Apostolic Charge. Its chief purpose is to instruct Timothy as to his attitude to the forms of heresy which were prevalent, and to direct him in his choice of presbyters. The immediate assailants of the faith were a sect, the growth of which we can trace through St. Paul's Epistles. When he wrote the Epistle to the Galatians, 55 A.D., his adversaries were Jews proper, who had embraced Christianity but desired to combine with the gospel the practices and tenets of Judaism. When he wrote to the Colossians, 60 A.D., the sect had imbibed a number of speculative opinions, known later as Gnostic, which were derogatory to Christ, and added them to their previous tenets. When we reach the date of the Pastoral Epistles, 67 A.D., the Jewish basis still remained, but the most prominent feature of the belief was a more developed form of the Colossian heresy, which departed from faith in Christ and attached importance to 'knowledge falsely so called.'

After the fall of Jerusalem, 70 A.D., the Jewish element grew weaker and weaker till it was either eliminated or merged in pure Gnosticism (from Gk. gnosis, 'knowledge'), which was a philosophy which attempted to explain the existence of evil by declaring evil to be a necessary quality of matter, denied the reality of Christ's sufferings, and too often found excuses for and was associated with a low state of morality.

St. Paul here instructs Timothy to be bold in his opposition to the false teachers, whose doctrine at this time was evidently destructive of both faith and morals.

A secondary object of the Epistle is to give Timothy instructions as to the organisation of the Church, and as to the kind of men whom he should ordain as presbyters and deacons.

Its contents are nine charges to Timothy, interspersed with exhortations to him.

CHAPTER 1

Timothy reminded of his Commission, and exhort to Earnestness

1, 2. Salutation. An apostle] St. Peter and St. John, with regard to whose position no question was raised, are content to call themselves presbyters (2 and 3 John, 1 Pet. 5), but St. Paul usually designates himself as an Apostle owing to the peculiarity of his call to the apostleship which led his adversaries to deny him the title; and for the same reason he claims that he holds his apostleship by the commandment of God the Father and Lord Jesus Christ. God our Saviour] The force that the Apostle assigned to the knowledge is shown in 25: 'God who willeth that all men should come to the knowledge of the truth.'
through Christ that we have the hope of future salvation. 2. My own son in the faith see 3 and Tit 1. St. Paul speaks of Onesimus in like terms as 'my son whom I have begotten in my bonds' (Philemon v. 10).

3-20. The first charge to Timothy. To remember and act upon the instructions already given him by St. Paul, which were to be firm in resisting the heterodox teachers in Ephesus, as the Apostle had been himself, and to promote love, purity, uprightness, and faith.

3. As I besought thee] The words 'so do' (i.e. remember and act upon my instructions), or 'so I do now,' RV, i.e. 'I repeat my charge to you,' must be supplied. When I went] RV 'when I was going.' It is probable that the charge was given to Timothy by St. Paul in Ephesus when he left that city himself. This journey he took in the interval between his first and second imprisonment. That they teach no other doctrine] RV 'not to teach a different doctrine'; better, 'not to teach heterodox doctrine.' 4. Fables and endless genealogies] not the Gnostic stories of emanations and aeons, but idle Jewish legends and genealogical claims, as is shown by Tit 1 39.

Minister questions, rather than godly edification] RV 'minister questions rather than a dispensation of God.' This would mean one of two things, either that the heterodox teaching led to futile speculation and not to the spread of the knowledge of the dispensation of the gospel, or that it made men idle disputatious instead of faithful dispensers of God's truth.

5-7. The end of the commandment] RV 'the end of the charge,' i.e. the aim of all true teaching as contrasted with 'fables and endless genealogies.' The gospel which Timothy had to preach consists of charity or 'love,' RV, springing from purity of heart, an enlightened conscience, and a sure faith. This was not the gospel preached by the heterodox teachers, whose doctrine consisted in quibbling subtleties, like those of the rabbis, and misrepresentations of the Law, the meaning of which they did not understand.

8-11. St. Paul guards himself against seeming to minimise the value of the Law. Properly understood, it was of the utmost use as a restraint of evil-doers. This he preached 'according to the gospel committed to his trust,' i.e. as a part of Christian teaching.

12-17. That the preaching of the gospel when committed to him, leads him to offer thanksgiving for the grace so bestowed, unworthy as he was. Into the ministry] RV service.' 13. I did it in instance of that excuse acts done fact, not of a moral principle. 14. Grace was abundant with faith and love] The act of God (grace) is accompanied and supplemented by man's loving acceptance of it in faith.

15. This is a faithful saying] For this formula, peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles (cp. 1 Tim 49 31 2 Tim 211 Tit 38), see General Intro. St. Paul's case is covered by the general principle that Christ came to save sinners.

16. First] St. Paul was in his own estimation first in sinfulness (v. 15), and first forgiven, as an example to other sinners to hope for pardon. 17. A doxology of thanks to God for what He had done for him: cp. Ro 1625. King] This title is applied to God only here and in 1 Tim 615 and Mt.535. Eternal] lit. 'of the ages,' but meaning 'eternal.' The original has 'king of the aeons.' Had the doctrine of the Gnostic aeons been in existence when the Epistle was written, this expression would not have been used without some contradiction of that theory or explanation of the words. This is an incidental proof of the early date of the Epistle.

18-20. He returns from the digression respecting himself to the subject of the charge previously given to Timothy, to resist heresy (v. 3), and to promote charity, purity, uprightness, and faith (v. 5).

18. I commit unto thee] The duty of maintaining the truth whereby to resist heresy is a trust committed to Timothy: see 1 Tim 620 2 Tim 114. According to the prophecies] This trust he would fulfil in pursuance of declarations made respecting him by the 'prophets' of the Church at the time of his ordination. The 'prophets' are very prominent in the Apostolic Age: see Ac 1311 Cor 12. By them] in accordance with the anticipation of the 'prophets.' 19. Which] the guidance of their conscience. Concerning faith, etc.] RV 'made shipwreck concerning the faith'; not their own belief, but the substance of the revealed truth.

20. There are two instances of excommunication in Scripture, (1) that of the Corinthian for immorality (1 Cor 5), (2) of Hymenaeus and Alexander for heresy. We learn from 2 Tim 219 that Philetus was one of Hymenaeus' associates, but whether Timothy followed St. Paul's example and excommunicated him, we do not know. It is probable that the Alexander here mentioned is the same as 'Alexander the coppersmith' of 2 Tim 414, who may have 'done' St. Paul 'much evil' at Rome during his trial, in consequence of the excommunication pronounced upon him by the Apostle at Ephesus. He may also have been the Alexander of Ac 1938. Delivered unto Satan] because relegated from the Church to the world, from the kingdom of God on earth to the empire of Satan (Ac 2616). 996
ONCERNING PRAYER, THANKSGIVING, AND THE PLACE OF WOMEN

1-8. The second charge to Timothy—to each those over whom he was set to use public prayer and intercession.

1. Therefore] in the sense of 'well then.'

First of all] His first exhortation as to Christian men is that they should pray. Supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings] The duty of the Christian Church in the matter of intercession is to offer prayers for others, and to give thanks for good things happening to others, and for events relating to others which may be a blessing to herself.

For all men] Christian charity and good-will excludes none. 2. For kings] Nero was at this time emperor. The Apostle's instruction, therefore, shows that the prayers of the Church are to be offered for bad rulers as well as good. For all that are in authority] that they may be so directed as to further the peace and prosperity of Christ's Church.

That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness] cp. the Prayer for the Church Militant, 'that under him we may be godly and quietly governed.' 3. This is good] that is, the public offering of intercessory prayers.

God our Saviour] see 11. 4. Will have, etc.] RV 'willeth that all men should.'

5-7. A summary statement of the gospel which St. Paul preached. It is introduced in connexion with the doctrine of God's will that all men should be saved. Surely that is His will, is the Apostle's argument, for He is the God of all (there is no other), and Christ, Himself Man, is the Mediator of all (there is no other), and He is the Redeemer of all, as was shown to be the case, when the due time came, by the means appointed by God, one of which means was St. Paul's own preaching and his apostleship of the Gentiles. 7. I speak the truth] St. Paul does not forget that his apostleship had been denied, and takes occasion to reaffirm it: see 1 Cor 9:1 2 Cor 12:12.

Teacher of the Gentiles] Gal 2:9. In faith and verity] The faith, which was also the truth, was the subject of his teaching to the Gentiles.

8. As to men (contrasted with women, about whom he is about to give a different charge), they are not to quarrel and dispute, but, wherever they are, they are to pray. Men] RV 'the men,' that is, the male members of the Church. Doubling] RV 'disputing.' Lifting up holy hands] the gesture of the early Christians, and perhaps the most natural gesture in very earnest prayer.

9-15. The third charge to Timothy, as to the comely behaviour of women, and their place in the Church.

9, 10. In like manner] rather, 'so also'; there is no likeness in the conduct enjoined on women to what has gone before. The first rule is, that their ornament is not to be braiding of hair or wearing of jewels or fine dresses, but good works and modesty and serenity of life. There is no prohibition of women wearing jewels and head-dresses and handsome gowns here, but they are not to regard them as their real ornaments in comparison with good life. 11, 12. The second rule is, that they are not to teach in the congregation, and are to be submissive. 13, 14. Two reasons which show, not cause, inferiority on the part of the woman. Man was created before woman, who was formed to be a helpmeet for him; and woman was the first transgressor, showing that her weakness more readily yielded to temptation. 15. In childbearing] i.e. by keeping faithfully and simply to her allotted sphere as wife and mother.

CONCERNING THE OFFICERS OF THE CHURCH

1-7. The fourth charge to Timothy, in respect to presbyters.

1. Desireth a good work] i.e. a noble occupation.

2. A bishop] RV 'the bishop,' RM 'overseer.' Some think (see General Intro.) that the terms 'bishop' and 'elder' are used interchangeably in these Epistles, as they seem to have been at an earlier date (Ac 20:28 Phil 1:1). Others, however, think that, at the close of the apostolic age, to which these Epistles belong, the term 'bishop' was coming into use in the sense of a chief ruler of the Church, or presiding elder, and that is the meaning here. In favour of the latter view it is urged that 'bishop' in these Epistles occurs only in the singular, and always with the definite article ('the bishop': see RV Tit 1:7), whereas 'elder' is found in the plural, and where it occurs in the singular has no article (1 Tim 5:17, 19 Tit 1:8). The question, however, requires to be handled with caution, owing to the limited and imperfect knowledge we have of the development of Church organisation in the first century.

The husband of one wife] lit. 'a man of one woman.' Four meanings have been attached to the words: (a) The presbyter is not to be a Christianised Jew, who, in accordance with the Law of Moses, had previously taken two wives. (b) He is not to take a second wife after the death of the first. (c) He is not to marry again while his divorced wife lives. (d) He is to be faithful to his wife, 'a man of one woman,' and 'keep himself only unto her so long as they both should live,' whether it were a first wife or a second wife. The last is probably the right exposition, as set forth by Theodore of Mopoeustias and Theodoret. In any case the presbyter or bishop is contemplated as a married man. Given to hospitality] This injunction was most necessary for the sake of travellers when inns in the modern sense did not exist: see 3 Jn v. 5.

4. Having his children in subjection] more exactly, 'having children (who are) in subjection.' 6. Novice [i.e. a recent convert. A bishop or a presbyter must have Christian experience. Lifted up] The young presbyter's danger is the pride which led to the condemnation of the devil, and is the snare laid for him by the devil.

8-13. Fifth charge to Timothy—as to deacons and deaconesses.

8. Greedy of filthy lucre] Part of the office of the deacon was to 'serve tables' and administer relief to the poor, so that he had opportunity for peculation and base gains.

9. The mystery of the faith] the Christian faith, which, having once been hidden, is now revealed: cp. v. 16.

11. Their wives] RV 'women': but instructions about women in general would not be thus parenthetically inserted. Both Lightfoot and Ellicott translate 'deaconesses.' Such an order, which, it is certain, came into existence at a very early date, was especially necessary in the East owing to the strict seclusion of the female sex, who were thus debarred from the ministrations of men. Deaconesses were admitted to their order by the laying on of the bishop's hands ('Apost. Const.' iii. 15, xviii. 19). They were not allowed to marry (Can. 15 of Chalcedon). Their duties were to minister generally to women, to assist at the baptism of women, to stand at the women's door of the church, to act as go-between between the clergy and women ('Apost. Const.' iii. 15, ii. 26, ii. 57, ii. 26). There were 40 deaconesses attached to the great Church of Constantinople in the time of St. Chrysostom. The order practically became extinct in the West, perhaps very gradually, after the tenth century, and lingered on rather longer in the East. But in the West it never completely died out in the Church of France, where to this day Benedictine abbesses receive the ordination of a deaconess. Both in England and Scotland it is now revived, and forms a most wholesome and scriptural channel through which organised women's work can be carried on.

12. Husbands of one wife] see on v. 2.

14-16. Importance of the above charges, for the purpose of instructing Timothy how to act as a minister of God's Church—an institution which God has established to hold up the truth as a pillar supports a roof, and to keep it unshaken as a firm foundation gives security to a building. Were it not for the support and steadiness given to truth by the society of faithful men which maintains it, it would ere now have vanished from the earth.

16. Without controversy] rather, 'as we confess'; and then the Apostle quotes some words of an early confession of the Christian faith: 'He who was incarnate; whose righteousness was made manifest; who was an object of open vision to angels; whom the Apostles preached to the world; whom the faithful believed in; who at the end of His ministry was taken up into heaven.' The reading is apparently not 'God was manifest (AV), but 'He who was manifest' (RV). Mystery] The hidden secret now revealed in Christ, which is the basis of holiness: cp. v. 9.

CHAPTER 4

VARIOUS DIRECTIONS AND EXHORTATIONS

1-10. A return to, and emphatic reiteration of, the first charge to Timothy (1:3-20) against heterodoxy and in favour of true godliness. This form of heterodoxy which he would have to oppose was an asceticism which taught that there was merit in abstaining from meats, and forbade conjugal intercourse as on a lower moral level than celibacy.

1. The Spirit speaks (RV 'saith')] possibly in some definite prophecy of OT, or of our Lord, or of the Apostles, but more probably in the general prophetic testimony of the Church, and particularly in the present and former words of St. Paul himself (cp. Ac 20:28). In the former times] RV 'in later times.' 2. Seared] RV 'branded.' Their consciences were not made incapable of feeling, but false principles were burnt into them.

3. From meats] cp. Col 2:16. 4. If we partake of food and accept other such blessings with gratitude to the Giver, which naturally shows itself in words of thanksgiving, that food and those blessings are thereby hallowed to us; so that it is not only a mistake, but a sin, to refuse them.

6. Minister] The word deacon is still used in its general sense (cp. Eph 37) as well as specifically (38). 7. Old wives' fables] such as those which are recorded in the apocryphal books of the 2nd cent., and became the mythology of the Middle Ages.

8. We are to train the body and exercise self-denial, which will help us to control our lower nature, and is often necessary to be practised that we may help others. It is 'profitable for a little' (RV)—that is, up to a certain point—as it is a help towards, and a part of, piety: but it does not lay up merit for us, and it does not procure for us the blessedness which is the promised result of piety in this and in the future life.

9. This v. is parenthetical.
There was a Christian saying, the Apostle reminds Timothy, to the same effect as what he had written in the last verse. 10. For this word refers us back to the promise of the future life in v. 8: 'For,' says the Apostle, 'it is in hope of the future salvation, offered by God to all and attained by believers, that we bear toil and suffering.'

11-16. Sixth charge to Timothy—personal to himself.

12. Thy youth.] Timothy was probably at this time between 35 and 40—an early age to be placed over other presbyters, all of whom were comparatively elderly men, as St. Paul's deputy. St. Paul was called a young man when his age was about the same (Ac 7:58).

13. Reading . . . exhortation . . . doctrine i.e., the public reading of Scripture in church and sermons hortative and doctrinal. 14. By prophecy] through the medium of prophecy: cp. Ac 13:1,2 for a parallel. This is a second reference to Timothy's ordination, and we see that in it the 'prophets' (presbyters), presbyters, and St. Paul took part (18 2Tim 1:9). It is probably owing to this precedent that the presbytery alone, or in association with the bishop, according to the form of Church polity in use, has to do with laying hands on a presbyter at his ordination. 15. Thou shalt . . . save] i.e., be the salvation of, or the means of, saving.

CHAPTER 5
REGARDING WIDOWS AND ACCUSATIONS AGAINST ELDERs

1. Rebuke] This shows the authority which Timothy exercised. An elder] i.e., an elderly man, not one officially so named.

3-16. The seventh charge to Timothy—as to widows.

3. Widows indeed] Each local Church kept a list of the widows belonging to the congregation, who were supported by the alms of the faithful if they were widows indeed, that is, if they had none to help them (vv. 4, 5). In return, they did what services they could to the brethren. 4. Nephews] RV 'grandchildren,' whose duty it was to take charge of their relations. Them] i.e., the children or nephews. 7. Blameless] RV 'without reproach,' that the Church widows may not be spoken ill of as women whom their relatives ought to support. 9, 10. The qualifications for being put on the widows' list, besides being destitute, are, (1) to be 60 years of age; (2) to have been faithful to her husband or husbands (a 'woman of one man'); (3) to be of good reputation; (4) to have brought up her children well; (5) to have shown hospitality to strangers (cp. 3 Jn v. 5); (6) to have washed the saints' feet (i.e., humbly ministered to her fellow-Christians); (7) helped any in distress; (8) to be fruitful of good works.

11-15. Reasons against admitting younger widows. After devoting themselves to the service of Christ in their first grief, they may afterwards marry and give up their work, in spite of the promise they made at the beginning, and if not that, they may become gossips and scandal-mongers. It is better that they should marry again, and occupy themselves with the cares of a household. From this we see that St. Paul was no enemy to second marriages, and he would not, therefore, have excluded elderly women from the widows' company because they had been twice married. This view confirms the meaning already given to 'wife of one man' (v. 9).

12. Having damnation] or, 'condemnation'; rather, 'incurring severe judgment.'

15. Some] i.e., some widows. The enthusiasm with which they had embraced Christianity and received St. Paul's gospel had already worn off. With some temperaments it takes but a short time for this to occur—a shorter time generally in women than in men. They had turned aside out of the right path, and were, therefore, going after Satan. 16. Any man or woman that believeth] RV 'any woman that believeth.' Not only children and grandchildren, but other relatives likewise, are to support aged widows, and so spare the Church's fund. The injunction must apply to men as well as women, though the RV reading stands on the better authority of MSS.

17-25. Resumption of charge to Timothy as to presbyters. (1) Presbyters distinguished by their seal, specially those distinguished in preaching and catechising, are to have higher honour and a larger stipend than the rest. (2) An accusation against presbyters is not to be entertained by their superior officer (apostolic deputy, possibly bishop) sitting by himself and listening to reports, but only before (AV), 'at the mouth of' (RV), two or three witnesses, who would confirm each other's statements (Dt 19:15), and also make the case to be publicly known to the Church. (3) Presbyters must not be appointed hastily, or those who admit them into the ministry will be answerable for their ill-doing.

17. Elders] In v. 1 this word had meant elderly men; here it means presbyters. This order of the ministry consisted at the time of elderly men, whence they had the name of elders or presbyters. 18. Thou shalt not muzzle the ox.] Dt 25:4 1 Cor 9. And, The labourer is worthy of his hire] read, 'And the,' etc. The words seem St. Paul's, not a quotation. 20. Them that sin] Their punishment is to be public, not kept secret for fear of scandal.

21. The solemnity of St. Paul's words emphasises the responsibility of imposing penalties on a presbyter. The elect angels not a particular class of angels, but the angels who are chosen by God as His ministers. 22. Lay hands] It was Timothy's office now, as it had been St. Paul's previously (2 Tim 1:6), and that of the presbytery or bishops (at least afterwards), to appoint presbyters by the laying on of hands. Some find here a reference to the absolution of offenders or heretics.

23. A continuation of the personal charge to Timothy. St. Paul seems to have been reminded to give the present injunction by the evident necessity of Timothy's taking care of his bodily health, if he is to carry out the work of his office satisfactorily. He, therefore, inserts it parenthetically. It teaches us that if the body needs the stimulant of wine, it is right to take it in moderation.

24, 25. Some men's sins] Return to the subject of laying on of hands. Some candidates for ordination have characters so evidently bad that their unfitness is plain before probation; in others it comes out later. And the same may be said of worthy candidates; some are plainly fit at first sight, others will be found fit on looking below the surface. So that Timothy must exercise his judicial functions on presbyters and candidates for orders very cautiously. 25. They that are otherwise] The character of those who differ from the class just mentioned by their goodness not being self-evident, will yet certainly come out in a short time.

CHAPTER 6
CONCERNING SERVANTS, THE RICH, AND CORRUPT TEACHERS

1, 2. The eighth charge to Timothy, as to bondservants or slaves. We have here an indication of the way in which Christianity abolished slavery—not by denouncing it, but by implanting the idea of Christian brotherhood, which was incompatible with it: see Intro. to Philemon. If a Christian wore the slave of an unbeliever, his submissiveness was to be such as to earn credit for his profession. If he had a Christian master, he was to be the more zealous in his service, inasmuch as his master, who derived benefit from it, was a believer like himself, and therefore an object of love.

2. Because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit] RV 'because they that partake of the benefit of their service are believing and beloved.'

3-10. Resumption of the charge against heterodox teachers. They had all the faults already mentioned, and in addition they made use of religion as a means of getting money, or, as they expressed it, of 'gain.' Reproving them, St. Paul points out in what sense religion is a 'gain,' namely, that it produces resignation and contentment of mind, which prevent the disquieting effects of covetousness, whereas the desire of 'gain,' in the sense of money-getting, leads to every kind of evil-doing.

3. Wholesome words] RV 'sound words.' Even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ] His teaching in the Gospels. 5. Supposing that gain is godliness] RV 'supposing that godliness is a way of gain.' 8. Raiment] RV 'covering.' Houses may be included as well as clothes. 9, 10. Similarly Seneca, 'Ep.' 87, 'While we wish to gain riches we fall into many evils.'

11-16. Resumption of personal charge to Timothy. Timothy's conduct was to be in absolute contrast with that of the heterodox teachers, who valued religion as a source of gain. He must be faithful, as he had promised when he made his confession of faith, and as Christ faithfully made His confession before Pontius Pilate. This faithfulness Timothy was especially to show in keeping safe the truth committed to him by St. Paul, which he was to do his part in maintaining uncorrupted till the Second Coming of Christ, which God would manifest at His own time.

12. Art...called] RV 'was called.' A good confession] RV 'the good confession,' made when he was admitted into the Church, or possibly when he was brought before a Roman magistrate to answer for his faith (Heb 13:22).
14. This commandment] i.e. the sum of the charges contained in the Epistle. Without spot, unreproveable] Timothy's faith is to be without spot, so that he should be without reproach. Until the appearing] These words do not necessarily indicate a belief in St. Paul's part that the Coming of the Lord would be in Timothy's lifetime. It might be, and then Timothy would have kept his deposit to the end if he were faithful; it might be later, and then he would have done his part in keeping it in his generation. The Return of the Lord is to take place in God's time, which 'He hath placed in His own power' (Ac 1:7).
15, 16. Probably an ascription of praise is use in the Apostolic Church.

17-19. The ninth charge to Timothy, arising out of vv. 6-10, respecting the rich. He is to instruct them not to trust in their riches and grow conceited, but to be ready to give to others, so laying up for themselves a treasure in heaven. The right use of wealth, as of all other of God's gifts, while it will not earn eternal life, will yet conduces to salvation, of it, good works not being the cause, but being nevertheless, in adults, a condition of salvation.

18. Ready...to communicate] i.e. to contribute generously of their substance.

19. Laying up in store] see Mt 6:19 Lk 16:9 Eternal life] RV 'life indeed,' following a reading which has slightly the better authority of the two.

20-22. Final and impassioned appeal to Timothy. The faith is a 'deposit' (RV) which St. Paul has committed to Timothy (2 Tim 1:18, 19), and which it is his office, as it is now the office of the Church, to keep safe and uncorrupted for the salvation of the world in spite of gnostic or agnostic speculations and theories. 'Who at this day,' says Vincentius Lérinensis, 'is Timothy but either generally the whole Church, or especially the whole body of prelates, who ought either themselves to have a sound knowledge of divine religion, or to infuse it into others?' What is meant by the depositum? Keep it, quoth he, for fear of thieves, for danger of enemies, lest when men be asleep they oversow cockle among that good seed of wheat which the Son of man hath sowed in His field. Keep, quoth he, the depositum. What is meant by this depositum? It is that which is committed to them, not that which is invented by thee; that which thou hast received, not that which thou hast devised; a thing not of wit, but of learning; not of private assumption, but of public tradition; a thing brought to thee, not brought forth of thee; wherein thou must not be an author, but a keeper; not a founder, but an observer; not a leader, but a follower. Keep the depositum, quoth he; preserve the talent of the Catholic Faith safe and undiminished; that which is committed to thee, let that remain with thee, and that deliver. Thou hast received gold, render thou gold; I will not have one thing for another. O Timothy, O Priest, O Teacher, O Doctor, if God's gift hath made thee meet and sufficient, for thy wit, exercise, and learning... let them that come after you rejoice at arriving at the understanding of that, by thy means, which antiquity, without that understanding, had in veneration. Yet for all this, in such sort deliver the same things which thou hast learnt, that albeit thou teachest after a new manner, yet thou never teach new things' (c. 22). No one has better grasped and expressed the underlying thought and purpose of St. Paul's appeal to Timothy than Vincentius.

2 TIMOTHY

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship. There can be no doubt that the author of 1 Timothy is the author of 2 Timothy. The evidence, external and internal, is almost the same for each, and the similarity of style and subject is unmistakable. If, therefore, St. Paul is the author of 1 Timothy, he is the author of 2 Timothy.

2. Reader. Undoubtedly the same as in the case of 1 Timothy.

3. Date and place of composition. It was written shortly before the Apostle's martyrdom from his prison in Rome, probably in the early part of 67 or 68 A.D.

4. Contents and purpose. The Apostle's primary object in the Epistle is to beg Timothy to come to him, as he was in prison and forlorn, most of his ordinary companions being gone elsewhere, and he needed the human comfort of a friend. The secondary purpose of the Epistle is to urge Timothy, once again, to maintain the faith entrusted to him for safe custody. It may be argued that the teaching of the two Epistles is compatible with a theory of legitimate development, but it certainly is not with any theory which would justify external additions to the once for all delivered faith, or subtractions from it, or any rearrangement of it which should throw the truths insisted upon by the Apostles into the background, and open the way for new dogmas.

A third object of the Epistle is to give further instructions as to Church organisation, similar in kind to those already given in the earlier letter. The position of Timothy and Titus was such as peculiarly to demand these apostolic instructions. They are the link between the Apostles and the local Church officers, and their appointment may be regarded as indicating a transition stage between government by Apostles and government by diocesan bishops. Episcopacy seems to have arisen in two ways: (1) From within the body of presbyters, by the appointment of a permanent president, to whom the title of 'bishop' or 'overseer,' originally shared by all the presbyters (Ac 20:28 Phil 1), was gradually restricted. Whether this development took place within the apostolic age, or a little later, is a disputed question. It was, at any rate, well advanced by the beginning of the second century. (2) By the gradual settlement in local Churches of apostles, prophets, evac-
John is said to have settled in Asia, St. Mark at Alexandria, Titus in Crete. The 'Didache,' which belongs to the first, or early part of the second century, contemplates the possibility of the settlement of a 'prophet' in a local Church, where he was honoured as a 'chief priest,' and received the first-fruits of all produce (ch. xiii). If this dual origin of the episcopate be admitted, it furnishes an explanation of the fact that there was some hesitation in the early Church as to whether bishops were an order completely distinct from presbyters. In those Churches in which the episcopate had its origin within the presbyterate, there would be a tendency to regard the bishop as of one order with the presbyters, and of comparatively limited authority; but in those Churches in which the episcopate had originated in the settlement of an apostle or apostolic man such as Timothy or Titus, there would be a tendency to regard the bishop as of a higher order than the presbyters, and to assign to him a distinctive position and authority.

EXPRESSIONS OF AFFECTION AND EXHORTATIONS TO FAITHFULNESS

1, 2. Salutation. According to the promise of life] St. Paul declares himself appointed an Apostle with the view of his spreading the knowledge of the life which had been promised and was now being enjoyed by Christians adopted in Christ.

3–5. The happy assurance of Timothy's faithfulness which St. Paul's recollections of past years supply him with. 3. I thank God] The construction is involved. What St. Paul thanks God for is Timothy's unfeigned faith which he remembers night and day, thinking of their last sad parting and hoping to see him again. 5. Eunice] is simply described in Ac 16:1 as 'a woman that was a Jewess.' She was Lois' daughter. Timothy's father was a Greek. 6–14. Exhortation to firmness in his glorious calling.

6. Stir up] as a fire that is beginning to die down. The gift of God] which he received at his ordination by the laying on of the hands of St. Paul and the presbyters of Ephesus (1 Tim 4:14).

7. Fear] indicating a certain timidity in Timothy, like the 'Be not ashamed' of v. 8. A sound mind] RV 'discipline.' It means self-discipline, self-control. 8. His prisoner] St. Paul was now undergoing his last imprisonment in Rome. He refers in like manner to his first imprisonment in Eph 3:1

Philemon v. 9. Partaker of the afflictions of the gospel] RV 'suffer hardship with the gospel'; better, 'suffer hardship with me for the gospel.'
2 TIMOTHY

1. Rightly dividing the word of truth
The original word means either cutting a straight path for it, or dealing in a straightforward way with it. 16. They] the heterodox teachers.
17, 18. Hymenaeus] 1 Tim 1:20. Of Philetus nothing more is known. Their heresy may have been an allegorical explanation of the Resurrection as the new life of the soul which had been imparted to it by faith in Christ. The belief that 'the resurrection is past already' may have been that Christ's Resurrection was the only one that was to be. A belief like this seems to have prevailed at Corinth: cp. 1 Cor 15:12, 16, 20. 19. The doctrine of the Resurrection is the sure foundation of God, which stands as a fundamental article of the Christian faith. When the time comes, the Lord will show that He knoweth them that are his, who will be those that during their life on earth have, as Christians, departed from iniquity. This seal] the inscription stamped upon the foundation stone of the faith.
20, 21. In the visible Church there would be some hearts of gold incapable of being seduced, but there would also be some of less precious material liable to be led away by the heterodox teachers; if the latter purged themselves from their false teachers by rejecting their doctrine and ministry, they too would become vessels unto honour.
22–25. Personal to Timothy.
22. Flee...youthful lusts] avoid a young man's desires after novelty in teaching. (There is apparently no reference to the desires of the flesh.) Avoid foolish questions or speculations which gender strife, and pursue a steadfast course of piety with sincere believers, not entering into controversial disputations, but correcting opponents with gentleness and meekness, not for the sake of victory, but for their good. Also] RV 'but.' 26. St. Paul's thought passes from Timothy's behaviour towards the heterodox to what may be the results of it to themselves namely, their recovery.

CHAPTER 3

WARNINGS AND EXHORTATIONS REGARDING THE LAST DAYS

1–9. In the days immediately preceding the Second Coming, the Lord had taught that iniquity would abound. St. Paul reminds Timothy of this truth as a warning to him, for when those days would come neither he nor any one on earth knew; they might be close at hand, and the existing wickedness might be the commencement of the final iniquity. The depravity then would be terrible, and already in its degree it existed, and must be resisted.

1. In the last days] 'But of that day and a St. Paul, not a St. John (1 Jn 2:18). 5. A form of godliness] an outside appearance of it. Denying the power thereof] the outward form of piety not having power to influence their lives for good. 6. Creep into houses] the constant habit of proselytisers to evil, who do not shrink from crooked and base means of accomplishing their purpose. Lead captive] having lost all freedom of will, like prisoners taken in war. 7. Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth] an exquisite description of that restlessness of mind, which leads to excessive curiosity upon religious subjects, but does not minister to genuine knowledge or faith.

8. These] the teachers who are leading men and women on to this depravity and weakness. Jannes and Jambres] the names of the Egyptian magicians in Ex 7:11-22, according to Jewish tradition. 9. They shall proceed no further] they shall not be able to continue to resist Timothy with success, any more than the magicians were capable of finally resisting Moses (Ex 8:18-9:11).

10-17. Exhortation. Timothy was well instructed in the OT, and in the gospel preached by St. Paul, and he must abide in the things that he had learnt and been assured of.' 10. Hast fully known] RV 'didst follow.' 11. Timothy was well acquainted with all that happened to St. Paul at Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, and Lystra in his First Missionary Journey, when he was himself converted to Christianity (Ac 13:30-16:1). 14. Of whom thou hast learned them] From Eunice and Lois. 15. The holy scriptures] RV 'the sacred writings,' i.e. the OT, which, when read in the light of the faith of Christ Jesus and with trust in Him, gave sufficient instruction for his salvation.

16. All scripture] RV 'every scripture.' The AV is right, because St. Paul is here contemplating the OT, not as a work made up of many writings, but as one book. So in Eph 3:15, 'the whole family in heaven' (AV) is right, not 'every family' (RV); Eph 2:21, 'all the building growth' (AV), not 'each several building' (RV); Ac 2:26, 'Let all the house of Israel know' (AV and RV); Ac 7:22, 'all the wisdom of the Egyptians' (AV and RV), because contemplated as one subject; Mt 23, 'all Jerusalem' (AV and RV). All scripture] In this passage the 'scripture' denoted is the OT, only, but when the expression is afterwards applied to the NT. (2 Pet 3:16), it implies that the same characteristics will be found in the NT: as are here enumerated in reference to the OT. Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable] RV 'scripture inspired of God is also profitable.' There is nothing whatever to show which of these renderings is consistent in its teaching, convicting, correcting, training. It is profitable both for faith and piety.

The assurance which St. Paul has of Timothy's piety leads up to his final appeal in the next chapter.

CHAPTER 4

St. Paul's last Messages and Counsels

1-8. The Apostle, knowing that his days are fast drawing to a close, exhorts Timothy to increased diligence and earnestness in his teaching, in view of the imminence of a time of error and excitement. He refers to his approaching martyrdom, expressing his readiness for whatever may await him, and his confidence in the reward of his faithfulness.

1. I charge thee] cp. 1 Tim 5:21. And the Lord Jesus Christ] RV 'and of Christ Jesus.' At his appearing, etc.] RV 'and by his appearing and his kingdom.' The Second Coming and the glorious kingdom of Christ are invoked to remind Timothy of the greatness of his responsibility. 2. In season, out of season] This has been well rendered, 'Take opportunity, or make it.' With all longsuffering and doctrine] i.e. ever patient and ready to teach.

3. False views of Christian truth would gain credence in the future as they had done in the past (cp. 2 Cor 11:4,12-15; Col 2:8,18); and it would be well that the converts should be prepared against the day of trial. After their own lusts] They would prefer teaching which agreed with their selfish desires to the pure truth of the gospel condemning their evil habits and awakening their consciences: cp. Jer 5:31.

5. The work of an evangelist] i.e. of preaching the gospel. Make full proof of thy ministry] i.e. neglect no aspect of the work. 6. For I, etc.] The 'I' is emphatic, in contrast to the 'Thou' of v. 5. St. Paul's day is almost over. Timothy must wage his warfare alone. Ready to be offered] lit. 'being poured out as a drink offering': a reference to the shedding of his own blood in his approaching martyr's death: cp. Phil 2:17, where the same word is used. 7. A good fight] rather, 'I have contested the good contest.' The reference is not to a battle, but to a contest in the games: cp. 1 Cor 9:25. Kept the faith] 'The faith' is here regarded as a precious treasure entrusted to him: cp. 1 Tim 1:11; 6:20; 2 Tim 1:13,14. 8. A crown] RV 'the crown,' the reward for righteousness. St. Paul here carries on the metaphor of the contest in the games, which he had dropped for the moment in the last clause of v. 7. At that day] i.e. the day of judgment.

9-15. St. Paul bids Timothy endeavour to come to him quickly, for some of his com-companions have left him and others have been sent on missions to the Churches. He asks him to bring some things of which he is in want, and warns him against an enemy who has done the Apostle much harm.

11. Luke] ‘the beloved physician,’ Col 4:14. Mark] was with the Apostle on his First Missionary Journey (Ac 12:25), but St. Paul lost confidence in him and refused to take him on the Second Journey (Ac 15:8-10). Mark, however, afterwards redeemed his reputation, and we find him with the Apostle in Rome when the Epistle to the Colossians was written (Col 4:10).

13. The cloak] Probably a long thick mantle which the approach of winter (v. 21) would render necessary to the Apostle in prison.

The books] It is impossible to conjecture what these were. The parchments] may have been some of the books of Scripture.

14. Alexander] may be the same as the Alexander mentioned (1 Tim 1:20) in conjunction with Hymenæus. He had evidently been an opponent of St. Paul’s teaching.

16–22. The Apostle mentions the circumstances of his first appearance before his judges, declares his abiding trust in the Lord, sends salutations to friends, and prays for a blessing on Timothy.

16. My first answer] It would seem that St. Paul’s case had been partly heard, but the evidence had been insufficient for condemnation, and the hearing had been adjourned.

21. The names in this v. are those of members of the Church in Rome. Linus] There was a Linus bishop of the Church of Rome a little later, and this is probably the same person.

22. The first blessing is for Timothy: the second for him and all who are with him (you being plural).

The subscription has no authority, though possibly quite correct.

TITUS
INTRODUCTION

1. Contents. The writer, professing to be Paul the Apostle and maintaining his right to be an Apostle, sends an affectionate greeting to his son in the faith, Titus (11-5). He reminds Titus that he left him in Crete to perfect the organisation of the Church in the island, by ordaining presbyters; and he now dwells on the moral qualifications and loyalty to the faith which these Church officers must have (1:6-9). He points out that the Cretans, a volatile folk, need sharp teaching to keep them accurate in speech and pure in life (1:10-16). The old should preserve a Christian dignity, not only for their own sake, but also as a sound example for the young, that they too may be good and true (2:1-5). Nor should Titus forget that his own example is paramount (2:7-8). Servants must find in obedience to their earthly masters a way to obey God (2:9,10). All need to be on their guard, for all alike are waiting for the quick return of Christ, the Redeemer (211-15). Titus must further remind the Cretan Christians that they have a duty also to the un-Christian world about them; they must be good citizens and good neighbours (3:1,2); for as, by no merit of ours, God raised us from a heathen to a Christian life, so we should try by an attractive goodness to win others (3:8). He urges Titus not to argue, but if a man is a ‘heretic,’ to give him two warnings, and then shun him (3:9-11). With a few personal words about his own plans, a final word of advice, and a reverent farewell; the letter closes.

2. Value of the Epistle. It will be seen that the chief value of the Epistle lies in its common-sense and spirituality, and is not dependent upon date or authorship. Even those critics who believe it pseudonymous explain that, in an age of different literary ethics from ours, a pupil honoured his master by writing in his name what he believed his master would write were he still alive. As the Epistle has, all through Christian history, been a store-house of good advice for Church officers, so it must continue to be, whatever the outcome of modern scholarship about it. We catch a glimpse of the development of the ministry, and of a growing insistence on orthodoxy, which seem to some recent scholars beyond what we see in former writings of St. Paul. This contention cannot be granted without serious qualification; for even those most willing to question the early crystallisation of Christian tradition are now more and more tending to admit that, before the last decades of the 1st cent., Christianity was definitely organised; and the movement towards an intellectual basis for faith was certainly well within St. Paul’s active career—even if ‘faith’ to him was ordinarily ‘a firm hold upon spiritual realities,’ it often stood squarely for ‘the Christian system,’ whether doctrinal or institutional (e.g. Ro15 Gal123 Phil127; cp. also Ac67 138 1422 165 2424). Moreover, even in this Epistle, soundness in doctrine means soundness in morality rather than soundness in creed (see on 21). However, though we grant the most radical view of this advance of organisation and doctrine, the questions arising from it are no longer of first importance; because those who look to primitive authority for ministry and creed are increasingly assured that the development as well as the inception of Christianity is a divine act, so that for them the divine authority of ministry and creed is not weakened if a document be proved of somewhat later date than it was formerly thought to be. For all readers, therefore, the interest of the Epistle is not so much historical or controversial, as practical and spiritual. Once admitted to canonical Scripture, it holds its place on its own merits.

3. Authorship and Date. Till recent times, with essential unanimity, this Epistle was ascribed to St. Paul. It is true that the heretic Marcion omitted it from his list of St. Paul’s Epistles, but his doctrinal reasons for this are so evident as to rob his omission of significance. In the last cent., when biblical criticism began, Titus was set down as a forgery of the 2nd cent. To-day critics are finding in it what they believe undoubted fragments of St. Paul, and are calling it ‘sub-Pauline,’ with a date between 90 and 120 A.D. The trend even among radical scholars is, therefore, toward the traditional view of authorship.

The authorship is wisely left more or less open. The discovery of a few pages of early Christian MS might turn the question one way or the other. A few points are becoming clear; the first of which is that if St. Paul is the author, he was released from his first Roman imprisonment, and, in the interval before his final imprisonment, visited some of his Churches. We may safely say that if the Epistle is his, he wrote it about 64 A.D. If authentic, this Epistle (with 1 and 2 Tim) practically proves that St. Paul was released after the imprisonment recorded in the Acts. There is much in known Roman procedure to commend such a theory; the argument from silence is the most formidable obstacle.

The difficulties attending the ascription of the Epistle to St. Paul are important in the aggregate rather than separately. A fairly good answer can be made to each objection. (1) Writing personally to an intimate friend, the author asserts his apostleship too strenuously; but St. Paul was old and worn, and one who, younger, wrote Galatians, would, even to an intimate, be apt to say what we find in the opening words of Titus: old men much in the public eye are always quite aware that private correspondence, not strictly confidential, is wont to reach many persons. (2) If the author was St. Paul, he put an emphasis upon organisation and orthodoxy quite unlike himself in his other Epistles. But St. Paul was older, new experiences drive to new moods, the exigencies of the Church created new needs, therefore there would be reason for conservatism. Men now, with sense of responsibility, tend to become conservative in age, however radical in youth. Besides, organisation and orthodoxy in this Epistle are stressed only for moral and spiritual ends; they seem to have little value in themselves. There is only slight advance upon St. Paul’s other Epistles here. (3) The facts of Church organisation implied in both Titus and 1 and 2 Timothy seem too far beyond the facts revealed in St. Paul’s earlier Epistles; but the most ardent believer in organisation can find in these Epistles only a still indefinite organisation, the functions of the officers are not clear, and the bishop seems at most only emerging from among the presbyters; certainly he is very far from the official described by Ignatius. Knowing the development that came later, we should expect the ministry in the year 64 to be much like this fluid picture in the Pastoral Epistles. (4) The most serious difficulty is the change in language and style from St. Paul’s former modes of expression. In 46 verses are 26 words not used in any other known Epistles of St. Paul. Favourite words and particles are quite absent, and other expressions and turns (common to Titus and 1 and 2 Timothy) take their place. Even the lapse of several years seems inadequate to explain the change of style; but the spirit of St. Paul, more subtle than language, is evident; so that the best explanation if we ascribe the Epistle to St. Paul, is to say that he left unusual liberty to his amanuensis. For a fuller discussion see ‘General Intro. to the Pastoral Epistles.’
CHAPTER 1
GREETING. DIRECTIONS FOR ORGANIZING THE CRETAN CHURCH

1-16. ‘Paul an Apostle, to Titus his own son in the faith. In appointing elders in the towns of Crete, see to their character, and be sure that they keep the faith. There are Judaizers in the island, and the Cretans are liars; so Church officers must be especially careful that their discourse may be sound.’

1. Paul, a servant of God] St. Paul does not elsewhere use this designation in his superscriptions; so an imitator would be unlikely to use it. According to the faith, etc.] i.e. to promote the true faith. Which is after godliness] i.e. which leads to godliness.

2. That cannot lie] A bad translation. The single Gk. word means ‘absolutely truthful.’ It is irreverent to say of the One Self-determined Being, ‘cannot’; ‘will not’ is sufficient and final. Here AV and RV both add an idea not in the original, borrowing, doubtless, from Heb 6: 18: cp. Ro 3:4 and 1 Cor 10. Before the world began] lit. (as RV) ‘Before times eternal.’ 3. RV ‘But in his own seasons manifested his word in the message’ (proclamation) ‘wherewith I was entrusted,’ etc. His word] ‘To the Hebrew, word or name stood for the being whose it was; so we might safely translate, himself.’ St. Augustine interpreted it definitely ‘Christ.’

4. Son after the common faith] i.e. his pupil in the faith which they shared together. Titus is not mentioned in Acts, but from St. Paul’s Epistles we gather the following details: he was a Greek (Gal 2:2); neither at his conversion nor (probably) later was he circumcised (ib.); he went on missionary journeys with and for St. Paul (Gal 2:1, 2 Cor 7:6, 10:16, 18: 8, 16-18). We know nothing more till we find him here.

5. Though in a personal letter, these words are so explicit that, should the Cretans resist Titus’ authority, he might read to them what the great master himself had said. We are wont to say, ‘If you have trouble, show this letter.’ St. Paul, perhaps, implied this here.

Left I thee in Crete] This cannot be identified with the only visit of St. Paul to Crete elsewhere recorded (Ac 27:7). The visit when he left Titus there was after the Roman imprisonment: see Intro. There were many Jews in Crete, and there were Cretans in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Ac 11), but we do not know how Christianity was planted in the island. Elders] Gk. ‘presbyters.’ Rectors, or pastors, we should say to-day. 6. The husband of one wife] not necessarily of any wife, but of not more than one. Probably not an objection to polygamy, which was rare, but to divorce and remarriage, which was common. It is hardly likely that remarriage, after the death of a first wife, was to be a disqualification for office: cp. 1 Tim 3:3.

Faithful children] i.e. brought up as Christians. 7. A bishop] This officer seems simply to be one of the ‘elders’ in v. 5: though the difference in name and number may suggest the beginning of a distinction between them. At any rate, the Church is here more highly organised than when St. Paul wrote, e.g. 1 Cor, but not nearly so much as when Ignatius wrote, e.g. to the Ephesians, circ. 115 A.D.: cp. 1 Tim 3:1. 8. Lover of good men] better (as RV), ‘lover of good,’ including both men and things. 9. As he hath been taught] RV (which is lit.) ‘according to the teaching’; i.e. the teaching which he has received, perhaps referring to a gradually forming statement of the essentials of the faith, such as culminated, in the 2nd cent., in the ‘Roman symbol,’ or early form of the Apostles’ Creed.

10. Here begins the arraignment of the false teachings which the elders will have to meet (vv. 10-16). They of the circumcision] i.e. Jewish converts who insisted that to be a Christian one must also submit to Jewish ordinances.

12. One of themselves] i.e. one of the Cretans. The reference is to Epimenides, a poet, circ. 600 B.C. St. Paul calls him a prophet because, (1) poets and prophets were apt to be classed together, and (2) his ‘witness’ was still true in St. Paul’s day. One reason why the Cretans were called liars was because they said that Zeus was buried in Crete. Slow bellies] i.e. gross and corruptible through self-indulgence. 14. Jewish fables] e.g. the sort of rules, for maintaining which our Lord condemned the Pharisees (Mt 15, 23, etc.). 15. Unto the pure all things are pure] St. Chrysostom said, ‘God made nothing impure.’ Used, not abused, all things are right; abused, the seemingly innocent thing is sin. St. Paul does not mean to limit this principle to ceremonial distinctions (about meats, etc.), with which the Judaizers would be apt to vex the Cretans. Their mind and conscience is defiled] cp. Mt 15:4b. 16. They profess] Not mere pretence, but blatant self-confidence.

CHAPTER 2
VARIOUS INSTRUCTIONS FOR CHRISTIAN LIFE AND DOCTRINE

1-15. ‘In giving sound doctrine, to offset false teaching, put the first emphasis on the need of character, because Christ is our reward, and very soon. And do thou, Titus, set a good example, and maintain thine own authority.’

1. Sound doctrine] cp. 29, ‘sound in faith.’ The context shows that this is soundness not in intellectual opinions, but in the inculcation of uprightness of life. In Christ’s day ‘faith’ was always regarded as spiritual; in the apostolic age, nearly always so; but in the
1. The substance and manner of the teaching to be given. farewell

1-15. ‘Remind the Cretans to be loyal citizens, good neighbours. As, through no merit of ours, God won us to Himself, so we must live good lives. Never argue with stubborn-hearted people. Warn a heretic twice; then drop him. Come to me at Nicopolis, when Artemas or Tychicus leaves me, and see that Zenas and Apollos get well started on their missionary journey. We all greet you all.’

1. To principalities and powers better (as RV), ‘to rulers, to authorities.’ We should be apt to say, ‘to the government.’ To obey magistrates The original meaning of the Gk. word is ‘to obey one’s superiors’; ‘to obey’ or ‘to be obedient’ (RV) is, therefore, a better translation. 3. We ourselves i.e. we Christians. Were sometimes Were (standing first in the Gk. sentence is emphatic) ‘at one time’ (RV ‘aforetime’).

4. Alford translates this v., ‘But when the goodness and love-toward-men (one Gk. word) ‘of our Saviour, God, was manifested.’

God our Saviour the Father. Appeared was manifested; i.e. in the coming, life, and death of Christ.

5. By the washing of regeneration For: washing: ‘laver’ (i.e. place where the washing took place) is better. Baptism is referred to here. Renewing of the Holy Ghost The baptism to be efficient must be both by water and by the Spirit. It is not a mere outward act.

6. Which he shed on us When? At Pentecost, or, generally, to each individual? Probably both meanings should be included.

7. Heirs according to the hope of eternal life better (as RM), ‘heirs, according to hope, of eternal life.’

8. Faithful saying i.e. a condensed reflection, an axiom in rhythmical form, a Christian proverb. Scholars disagree whether the ‘faithful saying’ here includes vv. 4–7 or only v. 7. The presence of ‘faithful sayings’ shows that a religious movement is no longer in its infancy: men have reflected about it for some time; cp. 1 Tim 1:15 3:1 4:8 2 Tim 2:11. Believed in God better (as RV), ‘believed God’; i.e. trusted His word.

9. Every Christian minister learns the futility of arguments to persuade the prejudiced. Living reasonable lives, teaching positively and reasonably, we convince men; not otherwise.

10. Heretick A heretic, to St. Paul, was never one who held erroneous opinions only, but one whose error sprang from moral crookedness, issuing at last in evil life. There seems always a sensual element in what St. Paul calls heresy; for he classes it with the sins of the flesh (Gal 5:20). The heresies of The Epistle of Paul to Philemon is a personal letter to a friend, called out by a situation probably not infrequent in antiquity. A letter of Pliny on a similar occasion (Ep.'ix. 21, see translation in Lightfoot, Comm. on Philemon, pp. 316 f.) has been preserved.

1. Recipients and Occasion. Philemon was a resident of Colossae in Phrygia (cp. Col 4:9 with Philemon v. 11). He owed his conversion to Paul (v. 19), having perhaps heard the gospel on some visit to Ephesus during the three years of Paul's stay there (Ac 19). A man of wealth, he had distinguished himself by deeds of charity (vv. 5-7), as well as by zeal in spreading the gospel (v. 1), and his house was the habitual meeting-place of a group of Colossian Christians (v. 2). He may be compared with Stephanas of Corinth (1 Cor 16:15-18). Apphia (v. 2), also a Christian, bearing a characteristic native Phrygian name, was doubtless Philemon's wife, and the subject of the letter concerned her too. Archippus may have been their son. He had a 'ministry' (perhaps as presbyter or evangelist) at Laodicea (Col 4:17). Onesimus (a name often borne by Greek slaves at this period) was a slave (doubtless a house-sla ve) of Philemon, who had run away, probably robbing his master at the same time. Reaching Rome (or, according to some, Cesarea), he had somehow found his master's friend Paul. Such a chance would not be surprising in a great and compactly populated city. In his desperate case, liable to arrest and the severest punishment, he may have voluntarily sought the Apostle's aid. At any rate he met with kindness, was brought to faith in Christ, and served Paul with grateful devotion. When Tychicus went to Asia Minor (Col 4:9), Paul took the occasion to send back Onesimus, now 'the faithful and beloved brother,' with general commendation to the Colossian Christians, and with this special letter of intercession to Philemon.

The letter was thus written in the same circumstances, and sent at the same time, as Colossians (cp. Col 4:9 with vv. 12, 17): see, however, Col 4:10, and on v. 23. The place of writing was probably Rome, where Paul was imprisoned. The escaped slave may well have tried to lose himself in the throngs of the capital, and would have been at least as well able to secure transportation thither as to Cesarea.

2. Attitude to Slavery. Paul in this letter is in accord with early Christianity generally in accepting slavery without criticism, and he assumes the property right of the slave-owner; but he recognises the slave as a brother in Christ, to whom is due not merely forgiveness but Christian friendship. Compare what he says of a sphere of life in which neither bondage nor freedom has any place (1 Cor 7:20-24 12:18 Gal 3:28 Col 3:11), and his directions to masters and slaves in Eph 6:5-9 and Col 3:22-4:1. Whether or not in 1 Cor 7:21 he meant to advise a slave to use lawful opportunities of securing his freedom, is a disputed question. The effect of Jesus Christ's principle of the essential worth of the human soul (Mt 6:25, 10:30 12:19 Lk 15) a principle which Paul recognised, is to be seen in the attitude of the modern Christian world toward slavery itself. On ancient slavery, which, especially under Roman law, gave the owner absolute authority over the person and life of the slave, and was full of cruelty, vice, and every horror, see Becker, 'Gallus'; Lecky, 'History of European Morals,' chs. ii. and iv.; Vincent, 'Commentary on Philemon,' pp. 162–168.

3. Genuineness. Philemon was included in Marcion's collection of Pauline Epistles, c. 150 A.D. Its perfect adaptation to the concrete situation everywhere consistently presupposed, its freshness and charm, and the rare delicacy and tact which it reveals are good grounds for holding it genuine; and when to these considerations is added its close resemblance in style and expression to the other Epistles of Paul, the evidence supporting its own claim (v. 1) to Pauline authorship is conclusive. On this view, the interest of this beautiful little Epistle is immensely increased, as affording a glimpse into the Apostle's private life, and exhibiting his great tenderness and delicacy of feeling.

The intimate connexion of Philemon with Colossians has led some scholars to deny its genuineness, but neither by the frigid allegories suggested (e.g. 'What man loses in this world he regains for ever in Christianity'), nor by the theory that it is an ethical tract on slavery, has it been possible satisfactorily to explain the origin of the Epistle. For an account of such views see art. 'Philemon, Epistle to,' in 'Encyclopaedia Biblica.'

4. Contents.

II. Vv. 4–7. Epistolary thanksgiving (for Philemon's faith and love) and prayer (that these may be crowned with understanding of the significance of God's gift to men).

III. Vv. 8–21. Request for kind treatment to Onesimus.

IV. V. 22. Paul hopes to be set free and to visit Colosse.

VI. V. 25. Farewell benediction.

1. A prisoner of Christ Jesus] Paul thus describes himself because his bonds (which are to be here understood literally) have been incurred in the service of Christ: cp. v. 9 (and v. 23) and Eph 3:1. The usual claim to be an Apostle is here unnecessary; so Phil 1, in that Epistle of Paul which stands next to Philemon in its tender intimacy.

5. Hearing] introduces the special reasons for thanksgiving, viz. Philemon's love and faith. Of thy love and faith] RM 'of thy love, and of the faith' is a better rendering. The faith is toward the Lord Jesus, the love toward all the saints. The order of clauses is inverted (as in Gal 4:16): cp. Gal 5:6. Eph 1:15. Col 1:1. 1 Th 1:2. 36. Faith... toward] the same as 'faith in.'

6. That] introduces mention of that for which Paul prays (v. 4), viz. recognition by Philemon of the greatness of God's gift to men. The communication (RV 'fellowship') of thy faith is perhaps best taken in the sense, 'the generous charity which has proceeded from thy faith.' So in Phil 1:9 love is to culminate in knowledge; and in the parallel to our v. in Col 1:9–11, references to conduct and to knowledge are interwoven: cp. Col 3:10. The word for fellowship (koinonia) is used of a charitable contribution: cp. Ro 15:26. 2 Cor 8:9–10. Heb 13:16. In 'the fellowship of thy faith' both the love and the faith of v. 5 are included. The love is emphasised again in v. 7. Another possible rendering is, 'thy participation (i.e. with us and all Christians) in our (Gk. 'the') faith': cp. v. 17. Effectual by the acknowledging (RV 'in the knowledge'), etc.] means, 'effectual in leading to the recognition on Philemon's part of all the blessings which Christians have.' 'In you' (or, better, RM 'in us') includes both 'already in your possession' and 'within your reach.' What Paul has in mind is made clear by the parallel, Eph 118:2; cp. Eph 3:18f., also Phil 1:12. Col 1:9. An understanding of how exalted is the privilege of salvation through Christ is the crown and culmination of faith, and involves a knowledge of the deeper mysteries of God. It is, moreover, essential to soundness of Christian life and to the Christian enthusiasm on which security against temptation depends. In (RV unto ') Christ] loosely added, without exact indication of relation to the preceding, in order so point out that as the object of faith is Christ, so only through a relation to Christ is love active or knowledge possible, or 'every good thing,' which is the object of knowledge, to be valued. 7. For] introduces another statement of Paul's reason for thanking God (v. 4).

Bowels ... arerefreshed] RV 'Hearts have been refreshed'; i.e. through the charitable acts prompted by Philemon's 'love.' The 'heart' (Gk. 'bowels') is the seat of grief and depondency and of joy and courage: cp. v. 20.

The Saints] means merely 'the Christians,' without regard to eminent attainments in character.

8. Wherefore] In view of this evidence of faith and love Paul adopts a tone of request, not of command. All (Gk. 'much') boldness in Christ] means, 'abundant readiness to adopt freedom of speech, by reason of my own and of thy relation to Christ and so of our relation to each other.' 9. For love's sake or, 'in the name of love.' Philemon's response is to be a matter of love, not of mere obedience. Paul chooses to put the matter on the highest possible plane. Paul the aged] Paul may have been over sixty years old at this time. At the time of his conversion, about thirty years earlier, he is called a 'young man' (Ac 7:58), a term applied to persons between the ages of twenty-four and forty. With this rendering these and the following words have a touch of pathos befitting the whole tone of the passage. If the rendering of RM 'an ambassador' is preferred (cp. Eph 6:20), the words would seem to imply an attitude of command. Also a prisoner of Christ Jesus] cp. v. 1. 10. My son] RV 'my child'; cp. 1 Cor 4:14, 15, 17 (Gal 4:19). Cp. Mishna, 'Sanhedrim,' fol. 19, 2, 'If one teaches the son of his neighbour the law, the Scripture reckons this the same as though he had begotten him.'

11. Unprofitable ... profitable] A play on the name Onesimus, which means 'helpful,' 'profitable.' To me] valuable to Paul, as to Philemon, because of both his personal service (v. 13) and his Christian friendship. 12. I have sent better, 'I send,' as the same tense is translated in v. 19, 21, 'I write.' 13. In thy stead (RV 'behalf') Since Onesimus was Philemon's slave, his service to Paul was a gift from Philemon. 'In thy behalf' does not mean 'in thy place.' In the bonds of the gospel] 'in this imprisonment incurred through preaching the gospel': cp. vv. 1, 9, 23.

14. Without thy mind] a common Greek expression for 'without thy consent.' As ... of necessity] Paul shrinks from saying outright that if he had kept Onesimus that would have been extracting from Philemon an obligation which he would have resented or grudged.

15. For] introduces a further consideration in favour of sending the slave back. He therefore departed] RV 'was therefore parted from thee'; in the providence of God: cp. (so Chrysostom) Gn 45:8. 'Therefore' refers to the divine purpose, 'that thou shouldest have him for ever.' For ever] an eternal possession, not by legal bond, but by Christian friendship.

16. Servant] 'slave.' In the flesh] in human relations: cp. Ro 1:8 Eph 6:5 Col 3:22. This seems to imply that in the past Onesimus had had kindly treatment and friendship. These old associations should now, in his repentance, make him even more dear to Philemon than he can be to Paul. This is said in order to make bitterness toward the former ungrateful runaway an impossibility. In the Lord] 'through your common relation to Christ.'

17. A partner] one who shares: cp. 2 Cor 8:23. This partnership is further described in 1 Cor 16, 'partnership in common relation to His Son Jesus Christ': 2 Cor 13:14, 'participation in the Holy Spirit': Phil 2:1 1 Jn 1:7, 8.

19. I Paul have written it with mine own hand] This formal language is meant to suggest the phraseology of a legally binding note. 'I Paul' corresponds to the usual method of an ancient signature: cp. 1 Cor 16:21 Col 4:18 2 Th3:17. The whole letter was probably an autograph: see on Gal 6:11. 20. Let me have joy of thee] a somewhat common Greek expression, especially with reference to children and friends. Here in the Lord marks the relation as a Christian one. So in Christ, v. 23. Refresh my bowels (RV 'heart') see on verse 7. 21. Do more than I say] RV 'even beyond what I say.' This need not imply the actual releasing of Onesimus from slavery.

HEBREWS

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship. The Epistle to the Hebrews is an anonymous work. It is ascribed to St. Paul in our English Bibles—even in the Revised Version unfortunately; but this is only in the title, which was not a part of the original autograph. All St. Paul's acknowledged Epistles have his name as part of the opening salutation according to the usual custom with ancient letters; but that is not the case with this Epistle, which begins without any salutation. Therefore, if we do not ascribe it to the Apostle that is not to charge the author with 'forgery,' nor in the milder modern phrase with 'pseudepigraphy.' There is no evidence that he ever intended to have St. Paul's name associated with it. The title in the oldest MSS is simply 'To the Hebrews.'

How, then, does the Epistle come to bear St. Paul's name in our English Bibles? The reason is that the fuller title is found in the later Gk. MSS, from some of which it passed into the Latin Bible, the Vulgate. We can easily understand how this came about. There was a tendency in the early Church to inscribe great names on anonymous works in order to further their currency. No greater name than that of the Apostle to the Gentiles could be found for this letter to the Hebrews, which might well be accounted worthy of no less a personage. And if it was to be brought within the circle of the chief inspired teachings of the apostolic age, this narrowed the possibilities of authorship to a comparatively small group. Then, like St. Paul, the writer is emancipated from the Jewish Law; he exalts Christ specifically as the 'Son of God,' St. Paul's most significant name for our Lord; he elaborates the thought of the Atonement by the death of Christ; he glorifies faith. On the other hand, his style and diction are quite unlike St. Paul's; instead of the Apostle's simple, direct, rugged speech, we have here rhetorical phraseology in rounded periods. Of more importance is the theological attitude of the writer, which is very different from that of St. Paul. The Apostle combats legalism, but in the interest of justification—a legal condition; our author is concerned with the Tabernacle ritual of the Old Testament, and his aim is to show the way of approach to God through purification, so that while St. Paul treats of the gospel in opposition to the Pharisees and their casuistry, the unknown author of Hebrews is interested in its relation to the priests and their sacrifices.

The authorship of this Epistle was much discussed in early ages; but Origen, the most learned of the early teachers, concluded his examination of the question with the words, 'Who wrote the Epistle God only knows.' About the same time another Church father, Tertullian, referred to it as 'the Epistle of Barnabas,' taking for granted that Barnabas was its author. It is a significant fact that this is the oldest positive and definite ascription of any name to it that has reached us; and there is much in the character and position of Barnabas to agree with it. Others have suggested Apollos, Clement of Rome, St. Luke. The latest proposal is the brilliant suggestion of Harnack that the author was Priscilla. If it were written by a woman it might have been thought in that unenlightened age not wise to give her name. Priscilla was the chief teacher of Apollos, an Alexandrian, and there is evidence of Alexandrian influence in the contents of the Epistle. But the question cannot be definitely determined.

2. Alexandrian Influences. This point is of great interest for our right understanding of the Epistle, as well as with regard to the problem of its authorship. There can be no question that the author was more or less imbued with the literary and theological methods pursued by Jewish scholars at Alexandria. Those methods included a highly allegorical treatment of the Old Testament, and it is quite Alexandrian for our author to regard the Levitical dispensation as a shadow of the spiritual realities that are to be found in the heavenly tabernacle and its ordinances. The very forms of introduction in which passages from the Old Testament are quoted are precisely those used by Philo, the famous Alexandrian Jewish philosopher, but quite unlike the forms employed by St. Paul or any other New Testament writer. Elsewhere we meet with such expressions as, 'it is written,' 'the Scripture says,' 'David says,' 'Moses says,' 'Isaiah says.' These expressions are never met with in Hebrews, where, as in Philo, no human authors are named—although in a single instance we have the periphrasis 'one hath somewhere testified' (29); but the utterances cited are attributed immediately to God or the Holy Spirit, in such terms as, 'He saith'
1. 'the Holy Ghost saith' (37). Further, there are certain phrases and images found in the Bible which Hebrews res with Alexandrian writers. Thus the form rendered 'at sundry times' (11), or, as in the Revised Version, 'in diversities,' is also in the book of Wisdom (7:29) in Alexandrian work. Then the peculiar expression 'effusion,' applied to God's glory Hebrews (13), is referred to Wisdom in the book of that name (Wisd 7:29), and it is quite a favourite word with Philo. Again, the word rendered 'substance' in the same v. of Hebrews is also found in Wisd 16:21, probably in the same sense, though here the reading, and therefore the rendering, is doubtful. Lastly, the rare expression for death rendered the issue of their life' in Hebrews (13) in be traced to Wisd 21. But we are not left to depend on such comparisons of words and phrases. The whole spirit and atmosphere of Hebrews is Alexandrian rather than Hellenistic.

3. Recipients and probable Date. Brushing aside less probable conjectures—as that the Alexandrianism of the Epistle implies that it was destined for Alexandria, a curious inversion of ideas—we have two contending theories of its destination—one pointing to a Palestinian church, the other claiming Rome as the residence of the recipient. We should expect an Epistle to Hebrews to go to the district where Hebrews (or, rather, Aramaic) speaking Jews lived, and the whole argument on the Levitical system would seem to indicate this region. Jerusalem could not be the place, because the readers were not the first gospel converts (26), and perhaps, too, because Jerusalem was a poor Church needing help from the more prosperous Churches, whereas the Church here addressed is praised for its bountifulness (10:34). Cesarea and Antioch have been suggested as possible places for the Epistle to have been directed to. But there is a strong inclination to locate the Church addressed at Rome, where there was a large Jewish community, and where Clement (95 A.D.) was familiar with it. Some think the sufferings referred to in 10:22-35 were those of Nero's persecution. Rome would be interested in a salutation from Italians (13:24). A more serious question is as to the nationality of the recipients. It has been denied that they were Jews, chiefly because their apostasy is described as departure from the living God—not merely from Christ. But the author might well think that to abandon the faith of Christ was for Christians to give up everything—God and all. On the other hand, the minute discussion of the tabernacle ritual points most probably to Jews. The date cannot be fixed with certainty. But since the writer, while arguing for the temporary character of the Levitical system, makes no reference to the destruction of Jerusalem—the vast cataclysm in which that system was swept away—it is to be inferred that an event which would so immensely have strengthened his position if he had appealed to it could not have happened before he was writing. Perhaps we may assign the Epistle to about 68 A.D., when Jewish zealots would be urging all men of Hebrew blood to make common cause with the defenders of the ancient faith against the Roman enemy.

4. Aim and Object. It must be clear to every careful reader that this Epistle was written with one definite end in view. There is a unity in its composition that we do not recognise in any other NT. book. The author makes straight for his goal from start to finish. Even the exhortations that are so characteristic of the work, while they break the thread of the argument, are not digressions from the main object, but rather direct means for attaining it. They are applications of each stage of the discussion to the one great aim that is kept steadily in view throughout. It is in these exhortations that we see most clearly what the aim is. The Christians addressed are evidently in danger of falling away from their faith and apostatising altogether. So desperate does their condition appear to the author, that he feels it necessary to expostulate in the gravest terms. It is no fascination of the world luring them away from their original consecration that occasions this danger. The Hebrews are discouraged to almost the extent of despair, because they do not see how the gospel can offer them anything like compensation for what they have lost in being cast out of the synagogue on account of their confession of the Nazarene. This is the condition that, the Epistle has to face. The method of meeting it is to boldly challenge the vaunted, venerable Judaism in its very citadel, the Levitical Law. The author institutes a comparison between Christianity and Judaism, or rather between Christ and the chief personages of Judaism—for with him 'Christianity is Christ'—in order to show that Christ is their superior in their very points of excellency, and that the gospel gives us the very things that the Law professed to give, but much more effectually. It has all that Judaism had; and it has this in a higher form, in a larger measure; nay, it alone really has this, for Judaism failed—Judaism could not do what it was relied upon to accomplish. The reason for this failure was that it had no substance. It was only the earthly shadow of those heavenly realities that Jesus Christ came to establish and bring within our reach. This position being proved all along the line, point

5. Theology. The author assumes the Jewish faith in God, but advances to the richer Christian ideas of the divine nature. The holiness of God is profoundly felt as the reason for a more effective cleansing before approaching Him than Judaism provided, and the gravity of apostasy is emphasized by the thought that we dare not trifle with God’s demands, since He is a ‘consuming fire’ (12:29). On the other hand, it is also taken for granted that to come near to God is the one thing to be supremely sought after in religion (4:18). The Epistle reaches a climax in showing how this may be done through Christ as it could not be done by means of the Levitical system (10:13-29). Then the Fatherhood of God is expounded with a fulness and emphasis that we meet with nowhere else except in the teachings of Jesus Christ (12:5-10). There is a very lofty conception of our Lord as specifically ‘the Son’ who as such is higher than all other beings, angels as well as men, and also expresses to us the character and the very being of God (1:3,8). Nevertheless the Incarnation was a reality, and our Epistle uses language of remarkable strength and clearness concerning the human experience of Christ (5:7,8). In His work He is chiefly regarded as the High Priest of the Heavenly Tabernacle (3:1). Hebrews is the only New Testament book that gives us a distinct conception of the priesthood of Christ. This is exercised after His Resurrection and Ascension. His sacrifice on the Cross is actually presented to God in heaven. To our author the whole present interest in Christ is in that later sphere of His heavenly life—in what He is now as our priest and intercessor, though that rests on what He was on earth in His obedience and sacrifice. The death of Christ is the one sacrifice for sin (9:12). This is not discussed under the figure of acquittal in a court of law, after the manner of St. Paul; it is treated with reference to the tabernacle worshipper who knows himself to be unfit to enter the presence of God owing to defilement (9:19). Christ’s sacrifice removes this defilement (10:22). The sacrifice consists in His offering Himself to God in death by ‘the Eternal Spirit’ (9:14), i.e. apparently, in virtue of His divine spiritual nature, which being eternal confers eternal efficacy. The essence of the sacrifice consists in the attitude of Christ’s will, namely in His delighting to obey God’s will, even to the extent of dying when the course of obedience involves that extremity. It is not too much to say that we have the clearest New Testament exposition of the very heart and essence of the Atonement in the statement of this truth (10:8-10). Lastly, His great act of obedience in death was offered as the deed, not of a man, but of the leader and high priest of men, whereby He enables us to participate with Himself in doing the will of God, in which will our sanctification stands. Still, this is only to be enjoyed on condition of trust and fidelity; and the counterpart to Christ’s sacrifice is His people’s faith, the triumphs of which are celebrated as a conclusion of the whole argument (c. 11). Thus the New Covenant predicted by Jeremiah is established by Christ.

6. Analysis of the Epistle.

11-14. The TWO METHODS OF REVELATION CONTRASTED

Judaism rested on the OT. as its authority; Christianity rests on the revelation in Christ. The earlier revelation was fragmentary, and limited by the limited human nature of the prophets through whom it came; the later revelation is a unity coming through that one Person in whom Sonship to God has been perfected, and who therefore most adequately represents the divine nature.

14-18. THE SUPREMACY OF CHRIST

The OT. itself testifies to His supremacy as God’s Son over its chief personages—first, the angels, through whom the Jews believed that creation had been effected and the law given (14-24); nevertheless Jesus, though thus really superior to the angels by nature, is temporarily in a lower state that He may learn sympathy with us, taking our nature upon Him in order to become our adequate High Priest (25-18). Jesus is also superior to Moses, the founder of the national religion, yet only a servant, while He is the Son (3:1-6); Christ has a rest to give which we are warned not to miss by unfaithfulness as Israel missed its rest by provoking God in the wilderness (37-47). This promised rest which Joshua, the Jesus of the OT., could not give remains for another to confer. We therefore must labour to enter into it, considering how penetrating is God’s word which promises the rest but also threatens punishment for unfaithfulness (4:8-18). Again turning to the high-priesthood of Christ, who is Jesus the Saviour indeed, the author prepares for his full discussion of it by a reference to the privilege it confers on us (4:14-16).

5-7. THE HIGH PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST

The introduction of the High Priest ends the historical survey which had been brought down from the creation, through Moses and then Joshua. At this point the argument resolves itself into a discussion of Christ’s priesthood in comparison with the Levitical priesthood, which is developed as the dominant theme of the Epistle. First we have Christ’s resemblance to Aaron briefly stated, so as to show that He is at least as true a priest. Christ fulfilled the two requisite conditions that were seen in the case of Aaron—human brotherhood, essential to the representative character of priesthood (5-12), and divine appointment, essential to its authority (5.4-5). A quotation from Ps 110 referred to as proof of God’s appointment of Christ to the priesthood introduces the name of Melchizedek (5.4). This starts a fruitful line of suggestions. In His humanity Jesus suffered grievously, but, by teaching Him obedience, that awful suffering perfected Him as a priest ‘after the order of Melchizedek,’ so that He became the author of eternal salvation to those who obey Him (6.7-10). Realising that his discussion is becoming difficult, the author breaks off to deprecate the dulness of his readers and their infantile backwardness. They can only take milk; they are not yet fit for strong men’s meat (6.11-14). But he feels that not to advance is to be in danger of going back, and therefore while encouraging diligent progress he points out the dreadful condition to which apostasy reduces men (6.1-12), over against which he sets the encouragement of God’s promise to Abraham, confirmed by oath (6.13-20). This brings us back to Melchizedek, who is now more minutely studied as he appears in the Genesis narrative. In his high titles and his uniqueness of kingly priesthood, independent of priestly descent as in the case of the Levitical priesthood, he is like Christ (7.1-8). He must be reckoned greater than the Levitical priests because he took tithe—the priests’ privilege under the Law—from no less a personage than their ancestor Abraham. The conclusion to which all this points is that since Melchizedek is so superior to the Levitical priests, Christ, who is of the order of Melchizedek, must also be superior in His high-priesthood (7.4-10).

7.11-8.13. The New Covenant

The argument now takes a further step forward. Since God promised a new priesthood (in Ps 100), this must supersede and abolish the old priesthood, which had failed through not effecting its purpose, which was to secure perfection; but that implies that the conditions of the old covenant, from which the Levitical priesthood derived its authority, are also nullified, and that conditions of a new covenant are introduced to take its place, with Jesus as its surety. This covenant and its priesthood will never in its turn be superseded by yet another; because the eternity of the priest, indicated by Ps 110, secured the eternity of the covenant, rich privileges on which the author enthusiastically enlarges (7.11-28).

It is under the new covenant that Jesus appears as a priest, for He could claim no priesthood under the old law. This covenant is superior to and supersedes that of the Levitical system, because it concerns priesthood in the heavenly tabernacle, which was the pattern for the merely earthly tabernacle that Moses saw on the Mount (8.1-7). It is confirmed by Jeremiah’s great prophecy (8.4-12).

9.1-10.9. The Sacrifice of Christ

We now approach the very heart of the Epistle and its most profound teachings. Under the first covenant there was a variety of Temple furniture and an elaborate ceremonial, with a continual series of sacrifices. This reached a climax in the annual visit of the high priest to the inner chamber of the tabernacle with sacrificial blood. The very ceremony of reconciliation signified God’s separation from the people. All these ceremonies were unable to make the worshipper ‘perfect,’ i.e., like a fully initiated person fit to participate in the mysteries (9.1-10). But now, what those mere animal sacrifices, so often repeated, could never effect, Jesus accomplished when He entered the heavenly tabernacle with His own blood, i.e., when He presented Himself in the presence of God after His crucifixion. A covenant is designated in the Bible by a Gk. word (diatheke) which in the classics means a ‘will.’ Now, a will only comes into effect through the death of the testator. Similarly, the new covenant is like Christ’s will; its validity is due to His death. This death being by voluntary surrender of His life, as a free act of His spirit, is of real value in the sight of God (9.11-22). It is enough for such a sacrifice to be offered once for all (9.23-28). Thus over against the failure of the old, proved by the necessity of repetition, is the success of the new. This is illustrated by a passage from Ps 40, which shows us that the essence of sacrifice is obedience to the will of God (10.1-18). On the ground of the cleansing thus accomplished by Christ follow exhortations (10.19-23), admonitions (10.24-25), and encouragements (10.26-31).

C. 11. The Achievements of Faith

These are illustrated from the annals of Israel, beginning with the patriarchs and coming down to the martyrs.

The recital is introduced by a description of faith as giving assurance for hope and proving the reality of the unseen, and so accounting for the success of the ancients of Israel (vv. 1, 2). It enables us to see the divine source of creation (v. 3). Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Sara, all succeeded through faith (vv. 4-12). The reason was their pilgrim attitude in seeking for
CHAPTERS 1-413

The Supremacy of Christ. The OT itself testifies to His supremacy as God's Son over its own chief personages: (a) first the angels, through whom the Jews believed that creation had been effected and the Law given (114.-218). He is also superior (b) to Moses, the founder of the national religion, yet only a servant, whereas He is a Son (314.-). He is superior (c) to Joshua. He has rest to give, which Christians are warned not to miss by unfaithfulness, as Israel missed the rest of Canaan, which was a type of the true rest of Christ's kingdom, and which they lost by provoking God in the wilderness. For there is no escape from God's judgments (37-413).

CHAPTER 1

The Final Revelation in the Son

1-4. Introduction. God of old revealed Himself to the fathers of the race, but the revelation was not complete or final. In our own day He has given a direct revelation in the person of His own Son, the Lord and Creator of the universe, the perfect expression of the divine nature, who after His temporary humiliation upon earth, now occupies the highest place in the heavenly courts.

1. At sundry times and in divers manners] RV 'by divers portions and in divers manners.' The first clause refers to the fragmentariness of the previous revelation at any one time; it was given bit by bit; the second to the various forms in which it was conveyed, such as commandment, prophecy, council, etc. By the prophets] RV 'in a general term including the whole; the OT.' 2. In these last days] RV 'At the end of these days.' The phrase that is here commonly indicates the Messianic age, is varied so as to imply that the gospel is here the transition to that age. By a Son; i.e. in One who is a Son; i.e. in One who is a Son] cp. 36 58 728. Heir of all things] The Lordship of Christ over the universe was determined 'before all worlds,' and though it is not yet fully realised (284), His session now at the right hand of God is the pledge of its ultimate realisation. Made the worlds] lit. 'the ages,' but not to be distinguished from 'all things': cp. Col116. The expression, however, implies the idea of a historical manifestation of the creative energy.

Express image of his person] RV 'very image of His substance.' The word rendered 'image' is the Gk. word 'character,' meaning an impression such as a seal leaves on wax, an exact reproduction of the original. The word 'substance' implies nothing material, but is nearly equivalent to 'nature' or 'essence.' Christ is the exact reproduction of the Divine Essence. He is the counterpart or facsimile of the Father. Being...upholding] Both participate seem most properly to refer to the pre-incarnate life of the Son. On the right hand] the place of dignity and authority: cp. 81 Mt28 18. The 'sitting' indicates the completion of the earthly course of the redemptive work. The solemnity of the introductory paragraph is heightened by the use of the phrase 'the Majesty on high.' 4. Being made] RV 'having become,' i.e. by His exaltation.

Better] a characteristic word of the whole Epistle, which is designed to show the superiority in all points of the new dispensation to the old. Cp. a 'better hope,' 719; 'better covenant,' 'better ministry,' 'better promises,' 86; 'better tabernacle,' 911; 'better sacrifices,' 923; 'better possession,' 1034; 'better country,' 1116; 'better resurrection,' 1135; 'better thing,' 1140; 'better things,' 1224.

5-14. Christ is superior to the angels. They are not addressed by God as 'sons,' but are expressly commanded to worship the Son. The angels are servants doing the will of God in the lower sphere of the material world, and... ministering to those who shall inherit salvation. And their power and dignity are not, as His, changeless and eternal.

5. Unto which of the angels] Angels are sometimes in the OT. called ‘sons of Elohim,’ e.g. in Job 18, i.e. belonging to the class ‘Elohim’; cp. ‘sons of the prophets,’ i.e. members of the prophetic class. ‘Elohim,’ at first a plural, meaning spiritual beings, was used as a singular to signify the one God. As used of the angels, the term does not imply sonship in the unique sense in which it is used of Christ. The first citation is from Ps.27, commonly interpreted as Messianic, and accepted as such by the writer and his readers. The second is from 28714 and Ps.89.26. God’s promise to the line of Davidic kings is here applied to Messiah, as Son of David.

6. RV ‘When he again bringeth in’; or, rather, ‘shall have brought in.’ The position of the adverb again indicates that it is to be connected with the verb, and is not a rhetorical particle introducing a new quotation. The reference is to a future event, evidently the Second Advent. 7. From Ps.104, according to LXX. The angels are not sons but servants, ‘doing His pleasure’ in the material world.

8. From Ps.45.6-7, here interpreted Messianically. The dominion of Christ, unlike that of the angels, is eternal. The Son is addressed as ‘God,’ but there is some difficulty in regard to the exact reading of the first clause in the original. Some propose to read, ‘Thy throne is God for ever and ever.’ But this is harsh, and in any case the writer means to assert the unity of the Son with God.

9. Anointed] i.e. set in royal dignity. Thy fellows] The angels are meant here. As ‘sons of Elohim’ (see on v. 5), they consort with the Son, though immeasurably inferior to Him.

10-12. From Ps.102.28. The Son is the Creator of the world (cp. v. 2), and is above all change and decay. The reference to the material world here is perhaps facilitated by the close connexion of the angels with material phenomena (see v. 7), and by the statement in v. 2 that the worlds were created by the Son.

13, 14. The climax of the argument in vv. 4-12, and the scriptural corroboration of the statement in v. 3 f. that Christ is Lord of all, and shares the dignity of the throne of God.

Ministering spirits] The angels do not rule; they only ‘stand and wait.’ They are the servants of God and of Christ, and that for the sake of all in OT. or NT. times who were to be heirs of salvation. The Son is the Author of the salvation to which Christians are destined; the angels are His agents and ministers.

CHAPTER 2

JESUS EXALTED IN HUMILIATION

1-4. The former dispensation, even though mediated by comparatively inferior beings such as the angels, was yet so sacred that all neglect of it was severely punished. This being so, a far more terrible fate must now be theirs who neglect the revelation brought by the Son of God Himself, delivered to us by eye-witnesses, and authenticated by miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost.

1. Let them slip] RV ‘drift away from them,’ as a ship from its moorings. This was what the readers were in danger of doing: see Intro. ‘Aim and Object.’ 2. Spoken by angels] RV ‘through angels.’ Angels were the mediators of the Law: see Dt.33.2 Ac.7.58 Gal.3.19. Was stedfast] RV ‘proved stedfast,’ i.e. was authoritative while it lasted. 4. Gifts] RM ‘distributions.’ The word implies variety of spiritual endowments: cp. 1 Cor.12.4-11 Ro.12.6 Eph.4.7.

5-18. It is no objection to the supremacy of Christ to say that by assuming human nature He became therefore lower than the angels. His humiliation was temporary, and undergone for purposes of redemption, His sufferings and death constituting Him an adequate High Priest through His oneness with humanity. And it is man (not angels) who is lord of the world to come. The lordship of humanity is not yet indeed realised, but the exaltation of Christ is the pledge of it.

5. RV ‘not unto angels did he subject.’ The position of the negative is emphatic. The world to come, whereof we speak] i.e. the new dispensation, which is the theme of our Epistle. In the world to come the rule of the angels is ended. 6. The quotation is from Ps.8.4-6. 7. A little lower] This is the meaning of the Heb., but the rendering ‘for a little lower’ (RM) seems to be required for the argument. Man’s inferiority to the angels is only temporary. 8. He left nothing] nothing will be left for angels to rule over.

9. Jesus . . . made a little lower than the angels] The words imply the doctrine of the Incarnation of One who was essentially and previously higher than the angels. For the suffering of death] RV ‘because of.’ The clause is to be connected with what follows. The exaltation seems to be regarded here as the consequence or reward of the humiliation. Cp. Phil.2.8-11, and especially v. 9, ‘wherefore God highly exalted him’: see on 12. Taste death] i.e. experience its full bitterness: see on 6.4.

10. It became him (sc. God)] i.e. it was in accordance with His gracious nature: cp. v. 9, ‘by the grace of God.’ Captain of their salvation] lit. ‘leader,’ i.e. not only originator, but the sharer of their lot, leading the way to glory. Make . . . perfect] a characteristic word of the Epistle. In the new dispensation everything is perfect. The word means, to bring to its destined or appropriate consummation. Here the thought is, that by sharing the sufferings of humanity Christ was enabled to effect a perfect salvation for the sons of God, and attain that supremacy which is rightfully His: op. 11. Of one] i.e. God. Christ and Christians, the Captain and the host whom He leads to glory, are all sons of the one Father—He by nature, they by grace. Hence He calls them brethren.

14. Destroy] RV ‘bring to nought,’ i.e. render powerless. Death and the devil still exist, but their power is broken. The power of death] Death being the direct consequence of sin (Ro 5:12, 6:23), the devil may be said to have the power of death in so far as he tempts men to sin, and so keeps sharp the sting of death (1 Cor 15:55). 16. RV ‘not of angels doth he take hold.’ The word does not mean (as in AV) to assume the nature of, but to put out a hand in order to support or help. ‘Christ took in hand to save not angels but you, my Hebrew brethren’ (Bruce). The seed of Abraham are the Hebrew race, the representative or priestly race, through which Jesus came to redeem mankind: op. Ro 9:5. The writer believes, at the same time, that Christ tasted death ‘for every man’ (v. 5).

17. In all things] i.e. in participation of flesh and blood and experience of death. That he might be] Gk. ‘might become.’ Christ became High Priest when He offered His sacrifice, which He did by His death on the Cross: cp. 9:24, 25. Merciful] cp. 5:4. Reconciliation] RV ‘propitiation’: cp. 5:8. To purge sins and to make propitiation for sins describe the same act from different points of view. In the former case what is in view is the removal of uncleanness; in the latter, of the alienation from God caused by sin.

18. RM ‘having been himself tempted in that wherein he hath suffered.’ This is the simplest rendering of a difficult passage. Christ’s temptations arose out of His sufferings (not conversely, as AV seems to suggest); hence He is able to succour the Hebrews who are tempted by their hardships: see 12:8f. As High Priest Christ, therefore, not only effects reconciliation between God and man, but brings men safe through all hardships to the inheritance appointed for them. Cp. for the same combination of propitiation and succour, Ps 79:9.

CHRIST IN THE HOUSEHOLD

Jesus Christ, (b) Christ is superior also to Moses; for He is Son over the house of God, whereas Moses was only a servant in it.

1. Wherefore] A question begins here, in which argument and exhortation are blended. The connexion with the preceding is not quite plain. It may lie in the fact that Christ has been described (2:19) as a Leader of salvation, conducting God’s children to glory, suggesting a similar function performed by Moses, the Leader of God’s people to the rest of Canaan. Christ is the Apostle and High Priest of the new profession, as Moses was of the old. But all those who set out under the leadership of Moses did not enter into the promised rest. Hence the warning against unbelief and falling away from the living God (v. 12: cp. 21:8). Holy brethren] They are consecrated to God, as Israel was: cp. Ex 19:6; and see on 21:1. The heavenly calling] RV ‘a heavenly calling,’ as distinguished from the calling of Israel to an earthly Canaan. Apostle and High Priest] Christ is both the messenger (cp. 12) or representative of God to man, and the representative of man before God.

2. In all his house] i.e. God’s house: see Nu 12:7. Christ and Moses both set an example of faithfulness, which the Hebrews will do well to copy; but Christ’s sphere is higher than that of Moses, for while Moses was a servant in the house, Christ, as Son of God, made the house: cp. 12:5. For a testimony] i.e. to bear testimony to the revelation afterwards made in the Law: cp. 11. If we hold fast] Transition to the warning in v. 7-11. The condition of remaining in the house of God is steadfast faith.

7. Wherefore] In AV the long quotation from Ps 95 is treated as a parenthesis, and ‘Wherefore’ is connected with ‘Take heed’ in v. 12. This is probably correct, but owing to the length of the parenthesis, the connexion becomes broken and a new sentence begins at v. 12. The Holy Ghost spake] cp. 10:15. 11:12, 2 Pet 1:21. 8. Proclamation and temptation are translations of the Heb. proper names, Massah and Meribah. For the instances of unbelief and apostasy connected with these places see Ex 17:1-7 Nu 20:1-12 Dt 5:1-4. 9. Proved me] RV ‘by proving me,’ i.e. by presumptuously putting to the proof. Saw my works] ‘my works of judgment following on their unbelief,’ or, more probably, ‘in spite of their experience of my works of deliverance and mercy.’

13. Deceitfulness of sin] The sin in view is unbelief culminating in apostasy, for which no doubt many specious reasons were forthcoming. 15. While it is said] This is best taken in connexion with the preceding v. to mean ‘in view of the saying,’ i.e., we have received this warning.’

16. RV rightly takes this v., like the two following, interrogatively. ‘For who, when they heard, did provoke? Nay, did not all they that came out of Egypt by Moses? And with whom was he displeased forty years?
Was it not with them that sinned . . .? And to whom ares he . . . but to them that were disobedient?" Israel's apostasy was universal in spite of the fact that they had heard the words and seen the works of the Lord, and had such a leader as Moses. The inference is the same as in 21:4.

CHAPTER 4
Jesus Christ, Giver of the Promised Rest, and High Priest to Bring Men to God
1–13. Israel through unbelief failed to enter into the promised rest. The rest, therefore, remains open and a promise of entrance is made to us. Let us not make the same mistake and fail to enter in because of unbelief. For by no possibility can the most secret unbelief escape the searching eye of the living God.

1. Being left] God's promise of rest cannot fail. Israel having failed to enter into it, the promise remains unfulfilled, and therefore it is open for us to enter in, if we keep the faith. Should seem] either a milder form of expression, or, as the words may be rendered, 'should be found to have come short,' when the time comes. The latter is the more forcible interpretation.

2. The gospel] RV 'Good tidings,' i.e. a promise of the rest of God. Not being mixed with faith] RV adopts AVmg. 'because they were not united by faith with that which was heard,' which is the rendering of a well-attested various reading. This makes a distinction between 'those who heard' (i.e. believed and obeyed), who must be Joshua and Caleb, and those who believed not. But in 3:16 it is assumed that all believed not. The rendering of AV gives good sense. Faith is the means whereby the word that is heard is vitally appropriated and realised in action. 3. The promise of rest applies to us who are Christians, seeing that those to whom the promise was made failed to attain to it. And their failure was not due to the fact that the rest was not prepared, because it existed since the day that God finished His work of creation. This is proved by the words 'and God rested' in one place, and the words 'my rest' in another. God's rest is therefore a fact, and it is clearly His purpose that some shall enter into it.

7. After so long a time] i.e. the time between Moses and David. In David's time the rest continued open, and therefore it is concluded that it is open still. 8. Jesus] RV, rightly, 'Joshua.' The Gk. for both names is the same. If the entry into Canaan under Joshua had been the fulness of the divine promise of rest, there would have been no mention centuries later in the Psalm of a rest still remaining; hence, 'there remaineth a rest for the people of God.' 9. A rest] RV 'a sabbath rest.' The rest that remaineth is also of a different character from the rest of Canaan. It is God's rest, a holy and eternal satisfaction. 10. His rest] i.e. God's rest. 12. Quick, and powerful] RV 'living, and active.' It does not die when uttered, but continues vital and operative, and, like a sharp sword, penetrates to the inmost recesses of the heart and life. A discerner] RV 'quick to discern,' lit. 'critical,' i.e. able to judge.

14–16. A summary of what has been said, forming a transition to the treatment of Christ's supremacy as High Priest, which takes up the main body of the Epistle.

14. Seeing then] The connexion is with 21731. Into the heavens] RV 'through the heavens.' In Jewish theology there were several heavens: cp. 2 Cor 12:2. Jesus has passed through all the outer courts into the Holy of Holies: cp. 9:24. He occupies the highest place in heaven (19).

15. However highly Christ is exalted He sympathises with us, having experienced the trials and temptations of humanity. This combination in Him of suffering and sinlessness is the ground of our confidence in Him: cp. 7:25. Yet without sin] i.e. His trials and temptations never resulted in sin. 16. Come boldly] RV 'draw near.' This privilege of access is one of many points of superiority in the new dispensation as compared with the old: cp. 10:19-22 12:18-24 Eph 2:18, 19.

CHAPTER 5
Human Brotherhood and Divine Appointment
The High Priesthood of Christ. The argument now resolves itself into a discussion of Christ's priesthood in comparison with the Levitical priesthood, which is developed as the dominant theme of the Epistle. Christ's qualifications as our High Priest are noted. First, we have His resemblance to Aaron briefly stated so as to show that He was at least as true a priest. Christ fulfilled the two requisite conditions that were seen in the case of Aaron, viz. human brotherhood, essential to the representative character of priesthood (vv. 1–3), and divine appointment, essential to its authority, as evidenced by Ps 110 (vv. 4–6). In His humanity, too, Jesus suffered grievously, but by teaching Him obedience that awful suffering perfected Him as a priest, so that He became the author of eternal salvation to those who obey Him (vv. 7–10).

1–3. First qualification—human brotherhood.
1. Gifts and sacrifices] The former are the vegetable, the latter the animal, sacrifices. Together they describe all kinds of offerings. 2. Have compassion] RV 'bear gently.' The word means to be moderate in the passions,
HEBREWS

5. 8. to have well-balanced emotions. Ignorant... out of the way] RV 'ignorant and erring.' For high-handed sins against the covenant no atonement was provided in the Law: see Lv 5:14. Nu 15:29, and see on 10:29. 3. See Lv 16:4,11. In this respect Christ might not seem to resemble the Levitical priest. Yet as He took our sin upon Him, there is a sense in which He offered sacrifice for Himself with us.

4-6. The second qualification—divine appointment. 6. This is developed in c. 7: see notes there.

7-10. The way in which Christ was perfected as a priest, the way of suffering and obedience.

7. Days of his flesh] The expression denotes, of course, His earthly life, but with the implied suggestion of humiliation and weakness.

Prayers and supplications] The reference is clearly to the Agony in Gethsemane. 'To save him from death' lit. 'out of death.' If Jesus prayed to be saved from death, it could not be said that His petition was granted. He prayed to be saved 'out of death,' and the answer to His prayer consisted in His victory over death—His resurrection. In that he feared] RV 'for his godly fear,' lit. 'from His fear.' The statement that Christ 'was heard from His fear' is taken by some as a pregnant construction equivalent to 'was heard and delivered from His fear of death.' But this sense of the word rendered 'fear' is unusual; it means reverence or piety; and if the interpretation of the prayer given above is accepted, Christ showed His godly fear in His submission, expressed in the words, 'Not My will, but Thine be done.' 8. Learned he obedience] The phrase does not imply any previous unwillingness to obey; but His obedience grew deeper and deeper, till it reached perfection on the Cross: cp. Lk 2:40 Phil 2:8. 9. Being made perfect] see on 2:10. Eternal salvation] as distinguished from the temporary deliverance from the results of sin effected by the Levitical Law: cp. 9:12.

11-14. The author recognizes the difficulty of his subject, and breaks off to deplore the inattentive and childish ignorance of his readers. But he feels that not to advance is to be in danger of going back, and therefore, while encouraging diligent progress, he points out the dreadful condition to which apostasy reduces men (6:1-12), and sets before them God's promise to Abraham, confirmed by oath, to persuade them to constancy (6:18-20).

12. For the time] i.e. considering the length of time they had been Christians: cp. 10:82.

Oracles of God] not, as commonly, the revelation contained in the OT, but the doctrines of the Christian faith. The 'first principles' are probably those enumerated in 6:12.

Strong meat] RV 'solid food': cp. 1Cor 3:1, 13. Unskillful in] RV 'without experience of.' It is uncertain what precisely is meant by the word of righteousness. It may mean correct or rational discourse in general, or Christian truth in particular, or, since the same Gr. word means 'word' and 'reason,' something like 'the reason of the hope that is in' Christians may be implied.

CHAPTER 6

Warning and Encouragement

1. Leaving... let us cease to speak of... and press on.] The words are either an exhortation to the readers to advance beyond the elementary stage of Christian doctrine, or a resolution on the part of the writer to omit the discussion of rudimentary truths and to proceed to more advanced subjects. The latter is probably correct, in which case the 'us' is that of authorship. But though he determines to omit the treatment of elementary doctrines, he mentions what they are under six headings arranged in three pairs. The first are 'repentance from dead works and faith toward God,' the first steps to be taken in the Christian life: cp. Mk 1:15, Ac 20:21, 17:30; see on 9:14.

Dead works] i.e. sinful works, the wages of which is death (Ro 6:23). 2. The second pair comprises the 'teaching of baptisms and of laying on of hands,' which constitute the next step in the Christian life. Baptism is for the remission of sins, and laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost: see Ac 2:43 Ac 8:16,17. The plural ('baptisms') is employed probably because instruction with regard to Christian baptism would necessitate a comparison with Jewish baptism and other ceremonial washings. The third pair is 'resurrection and eternal judgment, also fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, and dealt with in apostolic preaching: see Ac 4:2,33 10:42 17:21 24:25.

4-8. Any attempt to lay the foundations of Christian doctrine afresh for those who, after accepting them, have rejected them and are in a hopeless condition, is (to the author and his readers at any rate) in vain: see on 12:17.

4. Tasted] i.e. had full experience of: cp. 2:9. The heavenly gift, if it is not a general expression denoting the whole contents of the grace of God, will mean either the forgiveness of sin or the gift of the Holy Ghost. Of these two the former is the most probable, seeing the latter is expressly mentioned in the next clause. 5. Powers of the age to come] so RV. Either the miraculous gifts referred to in 24, or more probably the fortifying influences of God's sure promises concerning the future.

6. Crucify... afresh] They take the part of those unbelieving Jews who rejected Christ... and openly reviled Him: cp. 10:29. 7. The earth] rather, 'the land' or 'the field' that makes a good use of God's gift of rain is blessed by Him; but 'the field' that responds to His goodness with a crop of thorns and thistles is destroyed. The parable is a warning against the wilful misuse of those gifts of God referred to in vv. 4, 5: cp. Ro 2:4-6.

9. Beloved] only used here in this Epistle. The word expresses the writer's solicitude for his readers in view of even the remote possibility in their case of such an awful fate as has been described. Accompany salvation] are intimately connected with it, leading to it.

11. The same diligence] i.e. be as zealous in maintaining the fulness of their own hope as they have been in ministering to their brethren. 12. Inherit] i.e. enter into possession of what is promised. The verb is in the participial mood, and refers equally to the past and present. The writer is thinking of the class of persons who may be described as 'inheritors of the promises.' Patience] means patient waiting.

13-20. The example of Abraham is an encouragement in this respect. God's promise to him was confirmed by an oath, and the Christian hope is no less sure, because not only has God given promise of the heavenly inheritance, but Christ has entered within the veil as High Priest and Forerunner.

13. See Gn 22:16, 17. 15. He obtained the promise] i.e. had the promise made to him: cp. Gn 22:16f. What Abraham actually saw in his lifetime was only the beginning of the fulfilment: cp. 11:30, 40. 16. RV 'and in every dispute of theirs the oath is final for confirmation.' 17. Wherein] i.e. this being the case among men. Confirmed it by an oath] RV 'interposed' (RM 'mediated') 'with an oath.' The idea is that as there was no greater who could be called in as a third party or surety for the fulfilment of the promise, God made Himself the surety by means of the oath of Himself. 18. Two immutable things] viz. the promise, which, because it was God's promise, was immutable, and the oath, which, though not necessary in this case, was added for confirmation of men's faith. Consolation] RV 'encouragement.'

19. Sure and steadfast, and which entereth] RV inserts 'a hope' before these adjectival terms, thus confining the metaphor of the anchor to the one clause, 'as an anchor of the soul,' and taking the three expressions as descriptive not of the anchor, but of the hope. This simplifies matters in so far as it gets rid of the somewhat incongruous idea of an anchor entering within the veil. There may be, however, a mingling of fact and figure. The first two epithets are certainly suggested by the anchor, if they do not directly apply to it. The general idea is sufficiently clear. The Christian hope is infallible, because it is fixed on Christ, who, as High Priest and Forerunner, is now within the veil. The veil] The entry of the High Priest through the veil into the Holy of Holies was the climax of his ministry on the Day of Atonement: see Lv 16:2, 12f.

20. The discussion is brought round to the point where it was interrupted (5:10) by the warning against the danger of spiritual dulness and apostasy.

CHAPTER 7

PRIESTHOOD AFTER THE ORDER OF AARON AND OF MELCHIZEDEK

The theme of Christ's superiority to the Levitical priesthood is here resumed. In 5:10 it has been shown that Christ possesses all the characteristics of a true High Priest, and moreover that He is called of God 'an High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.' Now the priesthood of Melchizedek was perpetual, and in this respect he is a type of Christ. His greatness is shown by the fact that he received tithes from Abraham, and as Levi was descended from Abraham, it follows by implication that the Melchizedek priesthood is superior to the Levitical (7:1-10).

1-3. Melchisedec] a type of Christ in his high titles, independence of priestly descent, and especially in respect that his priesthood is eternal.

1. The main statement is, 'This Melchisedec...abided a priest continually.' Every feature in his history as recorded in Gn 14 is turned to account in the comparison instituted here between him and Christ. He is King of Salem, i.e. Jerusalem. But Salem means 'peace,' and Christ is Prince of Peace ( Isa 9:5). His name Melchizedek means 'King of Righteousness,' and righteousness is a characteristic of Christ's kingdom (Ps 62:12 Isa 9:32: see on 1:8, 9). Unlike the Levitical priest who must be able to trace his descent from Levi, Melchizedek is without genealogy, connected with no priestly family, and he has no successor. He is 'a priest for ever.'

3. Without father, without mother, without descent (RV 'genealogy!') The writer bases his argument on the silence of Scripture with regard to Melchizedek's origin. He appears suddenly in the narrative of Gn 14, and disappears in a similarly mysterious way. In respect that his priesthood does not rest on his pedigree, he stands in emphatic contrast with the Levitical priests. He is 'made like unto the Son of God,' i.e. is described in the narrative in such terms that they suggest the eternal Son who exists from eternity and lives for ever (1:2, 10-12).

4. Melchizedek was superior to Abraham, because he took tithes from Abraham (Gn 14:20).
and he also gave him his priestly benediction (Gn 14:19, 20).

5-7. He is much more superior to the Levitical priests who take tithes from their Israelite brethren, but who, in Abraham their progenitor, paid tithes to Melchizedek (vv. 9, 10).

8. He is superior to them, further, in respect that the Levitical priests are men who die. What Scripture witnesses to concerning Melchizedek is just his life. Its silence as to his family and death points to the endless life of the divine inheritor of his priesthood.

11-28. The argument now takes a further step forward. Since God promised a new priesthood (in Ps 110), this must supersede and abolish the old. But this substitution would not have been made were it not that the old priesthood had failed to accomplish its purpose, viz. to reconcile man to God. A new covenant is therefore introduced, with Jesus as the surety for its fulfilment. It is eternal because He is eternal; and it secures salvation to the utmost, because the Priest is One who ever liveth to intercede for those who draw near to God through Him.

11-19. The introduction of a new priesthood, and consequently of a new law, implies the imperfection of the old.

11. If therefore] RV 'Now if it': the beginning of a new argument. The priesthood is designed to reconcile men to God by removing the barrier between them, viz. sin. Not, ' after the order of Aaron' but after the order of Melchizedek, who was independent of Levitical descent, being anterior to it. 13. He of whom these things (i.e. Ps 110:4) are spoken is Jesus, who belonged to the tribe of Judah, in which the old Law recognizes no priests. 15. RV 'And what we say is yet more abundantly evident,' viz. the statement that a change of law is involved in a change of priesthood.

16. Under the old Law priesthood was a matter of physical descent—it was the law of a carnal commandment; but the priesthood of Jesus rests on the power of an indissoluble life (so RV). What constitutes Him priest is not an external commandment, but a power inherent in Him as the eternal Son, who, though as incarnate He died, nevertheless rose from the dead and liveth for ever (vv. 24, 25). His qualifications were personal, not official.

18, 19. Read, ' For there is a disannulling of a preliminary [or, provisional] commandment [viz. that constituting the Levitical priesthood] on account of its weakness and unprofitableness [i.e. its inability to effect atonement for men’s sins] (for the law made nothing perfect), and there is the subsequent introduction of a better hope through which we draw near to God.' The words ' for the law made nothing perfect ' are a parenthesis. The particular commandment in question was of a piece with the whole Law, which made nothing perfect, i.e. failed in every respect to attain its object, viz. to bring men near to God in reconciliation.

20. The fact that Jesus was made priest with an oath guarantees that the covenant He mediates is better than the former (in which there was no such oath), and also that it is eternal: cp. 6:16-18. 22. Surety] The word is not found elsewhere in the Greek canonical Scriptures. It means one who gives security for the fulfilment of an agreement between two parties, a guarantor or sponsor. The word usually employed is that rendered 'mediator' in 86.

23. The Levitical priesthood was a succession of different priests, because those filling the office were mortal men. Christ’s priesthood does not pass to any other; it is continuous and unchangeable; hence 'He is able to save to the uttermost.' Were not suffered] RV 'are hindered.' 24. Unchangeable] lit. 'that does not pass by succession from one to another.'

25. To the uttermost] Either of time, ' from one generation to another' ; or, more probably, of extent, 'perfectly.' Come unto God] RV 'draw near unto God through Him,' i.e. avail themselves of His mediating agency as High Priest. The object of all priesthood is to bring men to God in spiritual communion. What the Levitical priesthood was unable to effect (v. 18), Christ, the Melchizedek-High-Priest, has completely secured. Make intercession] not offering, which has been made once for all, but a continual representation on the ground of the completed offering.

26-28. A summary of the characteristics of Christ as High Priest, which make Him such an adequate High Priest as we need.

26. Became us] i.e. suited our condition. Holy] denotes His relation to God, consecrated. Harmless] denotes His personal character; the word usually means 'without guilt.' Undeceived] denotes His official qualification, having no ceremonial flaw or impediment: cp. Lv 21:31. Separate] RV 'separated,' not by sinlessness (as AV seems to suggest), but by being withdrawn from men and exalted to the right hand of the Majesty on high. The clause is to be taken along with the following: cp. 4:14. 27. First for his own sins] see Lv 16:6, 5, 11, 15, and see on 5:6. Once] i.e. once for all. He offered up himself'] see on 9:11-14, 20-28 10:11-14. 28. Since the law] RV 'after the law,' and disannulling it: cp. vv. 18, 19. The Son'] rather, 'a Son,' i.e. one who is a Son, perfected for evermore: see 2:5 5:6.

CHAPTER 8

THE HIGH PRIEST OF THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY AND THE FULFILLMENT OF JEREMIAH’S PROPHECY

Christ, as Melchizedek-High-Priest, has a in heaven which indeed was the pattern for the earthly tabernacle (vv. 1–5). Besides He is superior in proportion as the new covenant is better than the first (vv. 6–13).

1. The sum] RV ‘the chief point.’

2. A minister] i.e. an officiating high priest.

The sanctuary] corresponds to the innermost chamber of the tabernacle, which is a general name for the whole place of ministry. It is called the ‘true’ tabernacle, i.e. authentic or primary, that on earth being secondary, a copy of the heavenly (v. 5).

3. Gifts and sacrifices] see on 51. A high priest implies an offering, and this Christ has: see on 727 and references there.

4. The connexion is with v. 2. Christ’s ministry must be in the heavenly tabernacle, for there is already a priesthood on earth; the office on earth is preoccupied. ‘He would not be a priest at all’ (so RV), much less a high priest. It has been inferred from this v. that the Epistle was written while the Levitical priesthood was still in existence, i.e. before the destruction of Jerusalem: see Intro. § 3, ‘Recipients and Probable Date.’ Otherwise it must be supposed that the writer is speaking generally from the view-point of the OT.

5. Example] RV ‘copy,’ implying that there is an original in heaven. Observe that the heavenly is the real; the earthly is the copy and shadow. The reference is to Ex 2540: cp. Ac 7.44. 6. Now] is logical, not temporal, and means, ‘this being so.’ Better promises] see vv. 10–12.

8–12. The promise is taken from Jer 3181–84.

9. Regarded them not] i.e. rejected them after they had broken the covenant; or, let them alone: cp. Mt 2338 RM.

10–12. The second covenant is better than the first, because, (1) it is an internal principle instead of an external code; (2) it is universally realised; every member of the covenant is in direct and personal communion with God; (3) it secures real righteousness. This is the ground of the two preceding promises.

13. Even in the time of Jeremiah mention was made of a new covenant, showing that the first was destined to be superseded. Since then it has actually vanished away.

CHAPTER 9

THE NEW COVENANT AND THE SACRIFICE OF CHRIST

91–1059. The writer now proceeds to elaborate in greater detail the contrast between the old covenant and the new. The old covenant had its tabernacle with furniture and elaborate ceremonial and continual series of sacrifices, culminating in the annual visit of the high monies implied the impossibility of communion with God, and were unable to make the worshipper ‘perfect,’ i.e. fit to participate in the mysteries (9110). But now, what these mere animal sacrifices, the ineffectiveness of which was signified by the necessity of their repetition, failed to do, Jesus accomplished when He entered the heavenly tabernacle with His own blood, i.e. when He presented Himself in the presence of God after His crucifixion, having obtained eternal redemption. As Mediator of a new covenant He does this by His death. For a covenant, or will, only comes into effect through the death of the testator. Similarly, the new covenant becomes valid through the death of Christ, which, being a voluntary surrender of His life, as a free act of His Spirit, is of real value in the sight of God (9122). It is enough for such a sacrifice to be offered once for all (9223). Thus over against the failure of the old, proved by the necessity of repetition, is the success of the new. This is illustrated by a passage from Ps 40, which shows that the essence of sacrifice is obedience to the will of God (10119). On the ground of the cleansing thus accomplished by Christ follow exhortations (10122), admonitions (102431), and encouragements (104839).

1–10. The Tabernacle Ministry.

1. A worldly sanctuary] RV ‘its sanctuary, a sanctuary of this world,’ and therefore inferior to the ‘true’ tabernacle in the heavens (82), of which it was but a copy. 2. A tabernacle] This term is applied to each of the two chambers into which the whole tent was divided; the outer chamber being the Holy Place, the inner being the Holy of Holies: see Ex 26. Candlestick] or lampstand: see Ex 2540. The table] see Ex 252830. The shewbread] see Ex 2530 Lv 2414. 3. The second veil] so called because a veil hung also before the Holy Place. Elsewhere the second veil is called simply ‘the veil’: see 1030, and cp. Ex 263138. Holiest of all] i.e. according to a Hebrew idiom, the Most Holy Place.

4. Censer] The word may mean ‘altar of incense’ (Ex 301410). This, however, stood in the Holy Place, though the writer did not mention it among the furniture in v. 2. But as the Most Holy Place was never entered without incense (Lv 1619) it might be described as ‘having the altar of incense.’ Ark of the covenant] the chest containing the tables of the Law: Ex 251022. Pot . . . manna] see Ex 163234. On Aaron’s rod, see Nu 17140.

5. Cherubins] RV ‘cherubim,’ the Heb. plural of ‘cherub’: see Ex 251722 3769. The mercy-seat, or propitiatory, was the golden lid of the ark (Ex 2517, 21) on which the blood
7, 8. The point is, that entrance into the presence of God was restricted to the high priest alone, and that only once a year, and that it was altogether denied to the people and even to the ordinary priests. The argument of this whole section is that the Levitical system did not and could not provide real access to God. Holiest of all] RV 'the holy place,' meaning here, probably, the real presence of God, the heavenly sanctuary, as in v. 12. 9. Which (i.e. the Holy Place) was a figure for the time then present] meaning that it pointed the worshippers of that time forward to the dawning of a better time to come.

Figure] RV 'parable.' In which] RV 'According to which,' sc. parable. Him that did the service] RV 'the worshipper.'

11–14. The superiority of Christ's Ministry, which does cleanse the conscience, being discharged in a heavenly tabernacle (v. 11) and mediated through the sacrifice of Himself (vv. 12–14).

11. Not of this building] RV 'not of this creation,' i.e. of this material creation, but a heavenly sanctuary. 12. Once] i.e. once for all, unlike the high priest in the earthly tabernacle who entered once a year (v. 7). Repetition is unnecessary, seeing the redemption he obtained is an 'eternal redemption,' being effectual for ever. The word obtained implies the expenditure of effort.

13. Bulls and goats] refer to the sacrifices offered on the Day of Atonement (Lv 16), heifer to the ceremonial described in Nu 19.

Purifying of the flesh] i.e. the removal of ceremonial defilement, so as to permit the worshipper to take part again in the services of the tabernacle. It is admitted that a limited efficacy is possessed by the Levitical sacrifices, and therefore Christ's offering, being immeasurably nobler and being voluntary, has immeasurably greater efficacy.

14. Through the eternal Spirit] So AV and RV, suggesting that the Third Person of the Trinity is referred to. In the original the article is wanting, which emphasises the operation rather than the personal being of the Spirit. The spirit is Christ's own spirit, or the Holy Spirit in Christ, and the closest parallels to the expression used here are in 7:16 and 1 Pet 4:6 (see note there). The word 'spirit' is employed to contrast the nature and sphere of the operation of Christ's offering with those of the Levitical sacrifices. The latter operate in the region of the flesh (cp. v. 13), and are temporary in their effect (see on v. 13); the former belongs to the sphere of the spirit and will, effects an inner cleansing of the conscience, and is eternal. Offered himself] 'Himself' is emphatic, being one of works] see on 6:1. To cleanse from dead works is to cleanse from the defilement (and the consequences of it) caused by such works, and so enable the sinner to enter into the service of God.

15. By offering Himself Christ has become the Mediator of a new covenant, in order that those who have been called may receive the eternal inheritance that is promised, and the necessary condition of this was the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant by means of a death. Christ's sacrifice is here represented as having a retrospective efficacy, operating not merely on the past sins of the Hebrew Christians, but on the sins of the OT. saints who lived under the first covenant, and who could not inherit the promises because the first covenant could not remove their transgressions.

16. Testament] The Gk. word (diathēke) means either covenant or testament (i.e. will), and in this v. the writer passes from the former to the latter sense. For the operation of the terms of a testament the death of the testator is undoubtedly necessary. Is it also necessary in the case of a covenant? So the writer asserts in vv. 18–20, where he reverts to the former sense of diathēke as covenant. He says that any diathēke involves death, and cites the Mosaic covenant as an instance. This must be on the supposition that the covenanter is represented by the victim which died in the sacrifice which usually accompanied any serious covenant. The death of the victim represented the inability of the covenanter to retract. It was the solemn ratification of the terms of the covenant.

17. After men are dead] RV 'where there hath been a death.' The Gk. is lit. 'over dead.'

18. Whereupon] RV 'wherefore.' Neither the first] RV 'even the first... not,' imperfect and temporary though it was. 19, 20. See Ex 24:3–8. 20. Testament] RV 'covenant': see on v. 16. 21. This is not recorded in Exodus, but is mentioned by Josephus. It rested probably on some Jewish tradition.

23. Patterns] RV 'copies,' i.e. the earthly things which were made according to the pattern of the heavenly: see 8:5. In the view of the writer, the heavenly original needed purifying just as the earthly copies, only with better sacrifices. It is not necessary to supply a different predicate in the second clause, such as 'should be dedicated.' To enable men to draw near to God, however imperfectly, on earth, it was necessary that both they and the tabernacle be sprinkled with the blood of sacrifice; and the inference is that in order to enable men perfectly to hold communion with God above, both they and the heavenly places must in like manner be sprinkled with the blood of a better sacrifice, viz. that of Christ.

24. To appear] lit. 'to be manifested before the face of God,' i.e. to show Himself to God: cp. 7. The earthly 'copy' of this act is that of the high priest who once a year presented himself before God in the Holy of Holies on behalf of the people. In the OT. 'to appear before God' means to go into the Temple to worship Him: cp. Ex 23:17 Psa 42:8 84:7.

26. End of the world] The Second Coming is regarded as imminent: cp. 10:27. Appeared] lit. 'been manifested,' i.e. in the flesh to men: cp. v. 24, where the verb, though different, is from the same root.

27. In the case of men, death is a single event, the definite close of a stage in their career. So Christ's death is one final achievement. And as in the former case death is followed by judgment, so Christ's death is followed by His appearing for the salvation of His people. Moreover, as death and judgment are connected as cause and effect, so Christ's death and His people's salvation are similarly connected: cp. Ro 5:18. 28. Apart from sin] So RV. His First Coming was in connexion with sin; He came because of sin, and bearing sin to put it away (v. 26); but His Second Coming will be 'apart from sin,' since in dying He did put away sin, actually for Himself, for men by anticipation in faith.

Them that look for him] RV 'that wait for him.' The reappearing of the high priest from out the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement would be waited for with anxious expectancy by the people as the sign that all that was needful for their reconciliation with God had been done, and that the offering had been accepted by Him: cp. Lk 1.21, and see Ro 8:19, 28. 1 Cor 1:7. 1 Th 1.10. 2 Tim 4:8.

CHAPTER 10

Sacrifice complete in the fulfilment of God's Will. The Open Way to God

Recapitulation and close of the argument. The sacrifices of the Law were ineffective to cleanse the conscience, as shown by their continual repetition (vv. 1–4). In the mind of God they were temporary. But the offering of Christ is a sacrifice that accomplishes the will of God and consecrates us as the people of a new covenant (vv. 5–10). That it is efficacious and final is also proved by the session of Christ at God's right hand. Unlike the Levitical priests, who continually stand to offer sacrifices, Christ having made one perfect sacrifice is now set down, waiting the final triumph over all His foes (vv. 11–14). The finality of His sacrifice is also confirmed by the prophecy which foretells that under the new covenant God will remember the people's sins no more, implying that sin has been dealt with finally and for ever (vv. 15–18).

1. The shadow is unsubstantial, lacking all the qualities of the original except perhaps outlined form; the very image is an exact reproduction of the original. Continually] is perhaps best taken with the preceding verb, 'offered.' Conmers thereunto] see on 7:25.

2. Conscience of sin] i.e. consciousness of sin, sense of guilt: cp. 9:9. 3. The continual repetition of the sacrifices served only to remind the worshippers of the necessity of need of cleansing.

5. The quotation is from Ps 40:6–8, according to the LXX, which reads, 'a body thou hast prepared for me,' where the Hebrew has, 'mine ears thou hast opened,' meaning that God has opened the ears of His servant to hear and obey His will. The LXX may be due to an early corruption of the text, or it may be a free reproduction of the sense. As used here the words refer to the Incarnation, and are taken to indicate the superiority of Christ's sacrifice over the animal sacrifices of the Law in respect that His offering was voluntary and moral. It was a sacrifice of obedience (v. 7), the voluntary and glad (cp. 12:2) surrender of His own life to God. 9. He taketh away] i.e. Christ supersedes the legal and ineffectual mode of reconciliation by His own sacrifice, in accordance with God's will. 10. Sanctified] i.e. cleansed from the defilement of sin and enabled to draw near to God.

11–14. Further proof of the finality of Christ's sacrifice: see analysis at the beginning of this chapter. The ineffectiveness of the legal ordinances is brought out forcibly by the accumulation of the words, standeth daily... oftentimes... the same sacrifices. There is no cessation, no 'sitting down,' as in the case of Christ. 13, 14. His people are finally sanctified; His enemies are the only class remaining to be dealt with.

15–18. See analysis above.

19–25. Practical exhortation to hold fast the superior benefits and privileges of the new covenant.

19. Boldness to enter into the holiest] a privilege denied to the worshipper under the old covenant. 20. The way is new, i.e. lately opened up, and it is living, either because it is effective (cp. 4:12), or because Christ is living: cp. Jn 14:6, where Christ says that He is the Way, and the Truth, and the Life. Through the veil] During His earthly life His flesh stood between Him and the entrance into the heavenly sanctuary. By the rending of that veil, i.e. His death, He has entered in, opening the way for His people.

22. The First Exhortation. Draw near] i.e. in worship and service: see on 7:25.

Bodies washed] There may be here a reference to baptism, but the two clauses together denote the purification of the whole man, within and without: see Ex 19:10, 29:4, and cp. Eph 6:5,4. 23. The Second Exhortation, to hold fast the confession of our hope (so RV): cp. 3:14. 24. The Third Exhortation, to encourage each other to love and good works.

Provoke] The word is used in the good sense equivalent to stimulate.

25. Assembling of ourselves] i.e. the meeting of Christians which gives the opportunity to exercise the love and good works already recommended, and also to make the confession of the Christian faith and hope which is to be held fast. The day] is the Day of the Lord, the Day of His Second Coming: cp. on 5:10.

26-31. A warning against unbelief and apostasy, suggested by the thought that the Day of the Lord which is approaching will be a day of judgment to some, especially to those who, after having been enlightened, have fallen away: cp. the warning in 6:18. 26. Sin wilfully] The participial form of this condition expresses not a single act, but a deliberate and persistent state. The Levitical Law made no provision for the atonement of sins done with a high hand: see on 5:2. No more sacrifice] Christ’s sacrifice is final: see on vv. 13, 14.

32-39. An exhortation to exhibit the same steadfastness under the present trials as they had shown in a previous time of affliction: cp. the similar change from a tone of warning to one of hope of better things in 6:4.

32. Were illuminated] RV ‘enlightened,’ i.e. became Christians: cp. 6:4. Fight of affictions] see Intro. § 3, ‘Recipients and Probable Date.’ 33. Companions] i.e. voluntary partners and sympathisers with those who suffered: cp. 6:10. 34. RV ‘had compassion on them that were in bonds.’ This is the better attested reading, though the other has good support. In yourselves] It is possible to render, ‘Knowing that ye have your own selves for a better possession,’ a similar thought to that in Lk 9:25, 21:19 RV, and in v. 39.

35. Recompence of reward] cp. the other aspect of just recompense in 22.

37. A quotation from Hab 2:3, 4, with the addition of the introductory clause ‘yet a little while,’ reminiscent of Isa 26:20. In Habakkuk the idea is that steadfast adherence to God is needed by the righteous man in view of the perplexing anomalies visible at present in God’s method of providence. Here the idea is much the same; the Coming of the Lord being regarded as the chief ground why Christians should not draw back, and so fail to enter upon the promised inheritance. 38. The just] RV ‘my righteous one.’ The Speaker is God. 39. But we] The writer is unwilling to believe that his readers will abandon the faith: cp. 6:9. The saving] lit. ‘gaining,’ of ‘winning’: see on v. 34.

Heroes of Faith

The Achievements of Faith, illustrated from the annals of Israel, beginning with the patriarchs and coming down to the martyrs. The writer has already mentioned faith as a necessary condition of a righteous life, and he now proceeds to illustrate the fact that it was by faith that the fathers of the race were able to work righteousness and to endure their trials. Their heroic example ought to encourage the Hebrews to stand fast. The primary purpose, therefore, of this long passage is a practical one. But it has also a place in the main argument of the Epistle. It has been shown that the earthly and visible things are but the types, copies, or shadows of heavenly realities: see 8:5, 9:22, 23, 10:1. The underlying thought of the preceding chapters is that, contrary to the ordinary way of thinking, it is the heavenly that is the real. But how are heavenly and visible things to be realised with any assurance? It is by the operation of faith. Faith is that by which the invisible becomes real and the future becomes present.

Faith gives a reality to things hoped for, and puts to the test things for the present unseen. It is no new principle in the world, because it was faith that inspired the heroism and self-sacrifice of the saints who lived under the old dispensation. We, having better promises and a better covenant than they, ought not to fall behind in the exercise of the same faith by which they lived.

1. RV renders, ‘Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen.’ The word represented here by assurance is rendered ‘substance’ in 13 RV and ‘confidence’ in 3:14. What is meant is that faith is that which gives assurance or certainty of things still in the future. They exist apart from faith, but it is by faith that they are realised. Proving means testing resulting in conviction.

2. The elders] i.e. the faithful men under the old dispensation. Obtained a good report] RV ‘had witness borne to them,’ sc. by God in the Scriptures. 3. Faith enables us to perceive the invisible cause of the phenomenal world: cp. Ro 1:20. The writer begins with Gn 1 before proceeding to give examples of the realising faith of the fathers. 4. Abel. The writer says that the greater excellence of Abel’s sacrifice was due to his faith, but it what particular the faith was manifested he does not say. It may have been a full consciousness of the claim of God to the best.
11. 5

Yet speaketh] 'Yet,' i.e. still to us. The reference is to Gn 410, where Abel's blood is represented as crying from the ground after his death. By faith he overcame death.

5. 6. Enoch] The writer here follows the Greek Version of the OT. Enoch's faith is an inference from the statement in Genesis that he 'walked with God' (Gk. 'pleased God'), and his 'translation' was the reward of his faith. 7. Noah] His faith rested on a direct revelation of 'things not seen as yet,' viz. the destruction of the world and the means of salvation. Fear] is 'godly fear,' as in 57. He condemned the world] i.e. either because he warned the world of the impending doom (see 1 Pet 325 2 Pet 29); or because his example took away from them any ground of excuse: cp. Mt 1241. 8. Abraham] By faith he realised the promises, and made a great surrender in obedience to God's call. He was preemiinently a man of faith, the first whose faith is definitely mentioned in the OT. (Gn 156); he is the 'father of the faithful.' All his life he 'sojourned, dwelling in tents,' i.e. not actually receiving the promises, but waiting patiently for their fulfilment, and making therefore no attempt to settle permanently in Canaan. He looked for the invisible and heavenly 'city of God,' as the fulfilment of the ideal which was to him the real. 11. Sara] RV 'Even Sarah herself,' i.e. in spite of her earlier and natural incredulity: see Gn 1810-15. 12. Of one] i.e. Abraham.

13. The promises] i.e. the fulfilment of them. Persuaded of them, and embraced them] RV 'greeted them from afar.' They looked forward by faith and saw the promises and 'saluted them,' or hailed them, from afar, and lived here as in a foreign land, conscious that their true fatherland was not here, but in heaven. And God rewarded their faith by acknowledging them as His people, and providing a 'city' for them above.

17. Abraham's faith in offering Isaac: see Gn 22. This was the supreme trial of Abraham's faith. He was not allowed to slay Isaac, but he did actually offer him, i.e. surrender him to God, although he was the 'only-begotten,' the child of promise and the only link in the chain of the promise. But faith in God's promise made him superior to all seeming impossibilities in the way of realising the promises.

20-22. Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph were all alike in the fact that on their death-beds they looked by faith beyond death, and were confident of the future. 21. Top of his staff] The Heb. in Gn 4731 reads, 'the head of his bed.' The difference is due to the same consonants being read with different vowels, mitlah being 'bed,' and matlah being 'staff.'

23-28. The faith of Moses and his parents.

23. Proper] i.e. goodly or beautiful. The appearance of the child is said here to have quickened their faith in God that He had destined the child for some great purpose, and their faith was shown in their daring disregard of the king's commandment: see Ex 118-22.

24. Moses' faith was shown in his renunciation of all preferments at the court of Pharaoh, and in his espousing the cause of his afflicted brethren. The pleasures of sin were not vicious courses in themselves, but a life of worldly success, which would have been sin for him, conscious as he was of a call to a higher and harder life of duty.

26. The reproach of Christ] cp. 1318 Ro 158. The same reproach as Christ suffered in delivering His people: cp. 210. There may, however, here be the deeper thought not merely of similarity, but of identity of suffering. Christ, was from all eternity, may be conceived as actually the deliverer of Israel through the agency of Moses, and so as suffering Himself what Moses had to endure.

The recompence of the reward] see on v. 1, and cp. the next v. 28. The keeping of the Passover was an act of faith, because it was the appointed means of deliverance from death, and the performance of it implied faith in God's promise of safety.

31. Them that believed not] i.e. the people of Jericho who knew what Jehovah had done for Israel: see Josh 29, 10. 33. Obtained promises] cp. 615. 35. Raised to life again] RV 'by a resurrection.' This literal rendering of the original is necessary to bring out the contrast expressed in the words at the end of the v., 'a better resurrection,' i.e. one to a life which would not, as in the former case, be again interrupted by death. 39. A good report] see on v. 2.

40. There is here the answer to an implied objection, that the faith of these suffering heroes was all in vain, seeing they did not receive the fulfilment of the promises. But, the writer says, this is a wrong inference, the truth being that God has merely deferred their reward in order that they may enter along with us of a later age upon the realisation of the promised inheritance. They are waiting for us so that the whole number of the faithful may be perfected together. Cp. the petition in the Burial Service, 'beseeching Thee... shortly to accomplish the number of Thine elect, and to hasten Thy kingdom; that we, with all those that are departed in the true faith of Thy holy Name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss...'.

CHAPTER 12

THE CONTEST. ENDURANCE, HOLINESS, AND DIVINE COMMUNICATION PROPOSED TO THE SONS OF GOD

Inspired by the example of those victorious
Jesus the supreme example of patient endurance (vv. 1, 2). The present sufferings are the discipline of a loving Father, and are actually evidence of our being His children. Be brave, therefore, and help others to be the same (vv. 3-13). Beware of strife and impiety, taking warning from the case of Esau, who irretrievably forfeited his blessing (vv. 14-17). Our greater privileges entail greater responsibilities and call for greater watchfulness (vv. 18-29).

1. Witnesses] The Gk. word is martyr. The word means primarily 'one who bears witness' to something he has seen or experienced. Here the witnesses are those who have borne testimony to the victorious power of faith. But the word passes easily over to the further sense of 'spectators,' which is also implied in this whole passage. The writer conceives these heroes as surrounding in a cloud, or dense mass, the arena in which the present generation of God's people are running their race. Once they were themselves runners; now they are promoted to the rank of spectators. Their presence and example ought to be a stimulus to those running now.

Every weight] mg. 'all cumbrance.' The word may refer to anything that impedes free running, such as loose garments. But it is used in a special sense to denote the superfluous flesh which an athlete seeks to get rid of by strict training: cp. I Cor. 9:34-35.

Which doth so easily beset us] The meaning of this phrase, represented in the original by a single adjective, is doubtful, and the Revisers have not seen fit to change the translation in the text. But they give in the margin the two other possible renderings: (1) 'that doth closely cling to us,' i.e. like a clinging garment (cp. the common Oriental phrase, 'to gird up the loins,' i.e. to tuck the loose ends of the outer flowing robe under the girdle as a preparation for any exertion); or (2) 'that is admired of many,' lit. 'well-surrounded' by an admiring throng. The former, which is virtually identical with the accepted rendering of AV, is the easier, and is appropriate to the idea of a runner divesting himself of all impedimenta. It is to be observed that the sing spoken of is not a particular sin (as the common use of the phrase 'besetting sin' suggests), but sin in general, all sin, the definite article being the 'generic' article.

2. Looking unto] The Gk. word is used of an artist who looks at his model. Jesus is the Great Exemplar, on whom, rather than on the cloud of witnesses, the runners are to fix their eyes. Author and perfector] so RV: cp. 2:10, where the word 'author' is rendered 'captain' in AV. Our faith suggests a system of Christian way of faith, and He leads to the very end, exhibiting the perfection and triumph of faith.

For the joy] may mean 'instead of the joy,' i.e. renouncing it; but more likely 'in view of the joy,' i.e. the recompense of reward, as in 11:26: cp. 11:1.

3. Against himself] RV 'against themselves.' A more difficult, but well-attested reading. If correct, it will mean that sinners sin against themselves, either by wronging their own souls (see Prov. 8:36) or by contradicting their better selves. The struggle has not yet been severe. A mild reproach of faint-heartedness is implied: cp. Prov. 24:10 Jer. 12:5.

4. The struggle has not yet been severe. A mild reproach of faint-heartedness is implied: cp. Prov. 3:11, 12. RV 'It is for chastening ye endure,' i.e. your sufferings are designed as a discipline or means of education. God dealt with you as with sons.

5. All are partakers] The clause refers to v. 6.

11. Peaceable fruit of righteousness] i.e. the fruit which is righteousness. The result of discipline is called 'peaceable,' or 'peaceful,' in contrast to the 'painfulness' of the process spoken of in the previous part of the verse.

13. Straight paths] better, 'even' or 'smooth paths,' containing no stumbling-blocks that may injure the lame. The strong are to encourage the weak. Turned out of the way] RM 'put out of joint.' The reference to lameness and healing suggests that this is the right rendering. If they do not remove the stumbling-blocks from the paths, lameness may become dislocation. But by making the paths 'even,' the lameness may be healed.

15. Fail of] RV 'fall short of.' Root of bitterness] cp. Dt. 29:18. 16. Any fornicator] In the OT, apostasy from Jehovah is frequently described as adultery or fornication, being a breach of covenant; but here the word should perhaps be understood in the literal sense: cp. 13:4. Profane] The word is the antithesis of 'hallowed' or 'consecrated,' and means 'common,' 'unchristian,' 'secular.' Esau's defect was a want of appreciation of spiritual blessings. He despised his birthright (see Gn. 25:25), which implied not merely material advantage, but the spiritual heritage of the covenant promises. 17. Would have inherited] The RV removes the ambiguity of these words by rendering 'when he afterward desired to inherit.' He sought it] i.e. the blessing, not the repentance. When Esau is said to have 'found no place of repentance,' this does not mean that he found it impossible to repent—a thing contrary to all the doctrine of Scripture. In 6:46 the author does not say 'they cannot repent,' but 'we cannot make them repent.' What is meant is that when he afterward wished to inherit the blessing he

ADVICE, MEMORIES, PRAYERS, GREETINGS

The Epistle concludes with various exhortations in regard to the social life (vv. 1–3), private life (vv. 4–6), the religious life (vv. 7–17), in which connexion the readers are exhorted to follow steadfastly the example and doctrine of their former teachers (vv. 7–16), and to respect the authority of their present rulers (v. 17). The writer requests their prayers (vv. 18, 19); he prays himself on their behalf (vv. 20, 21); he sends greetings, and utters his benediction (vv. 22–25).

1–3. Duties of social life, viz. brotherly love, hospitality, and sympathy with those who suffer for Christ's sake.

3. Yourselves also in the body] and liable therefore to the same sufferings: cp. 10:23-24.

4–6. Duties of the private life, viz. chastity and contentment.

4. Marriage is] RV 'Let marriage,' etc.: the words are an exhortation. 5. Conversation] i.e. manner of life. RV simply, 'be ye free from the love of money.'

7–12. Duty of steadfastly adhering to the doctrine of their departed teachers.

7. Which have the rule] RV 'that had the rule... which spake.' The words end of their conversation (see v. 8) indicate that they were no longer living. RV renders, 'issue of their life.' 8. AV suggests that the 'end of their conversation' was Jesus Christ, but He can hardly be called the 'issue of their life.' This v. is a distinct sentence, and is introduced as an argument for steadfast adherence to the faith of the former teachers. Christ is the same now as when their teachers first taught them, so that they have no reason to go after divers and strange teachings (v. 9).

9. Carried about] RV 'carried away.' The strange doctrines seem to have been connected with the ritual of 'meats,' or sacrificial meals (v. 10).

10–14. We Christians have certainly an altar, the Cross of Christ, but as on the Day of Atonement the blood of the sacrifice was carried into the Most Holy Place, while the flesh of the victim was not eaten but burned outside the camp, so those who wish to participate in the benefits of the Christian sacrifice must not remain within the camp of Judaism, but utterly renounce all its 'carnal ordinances,' even though that entail bearing reproach for Christ's sake. We may be rendered homeless here below, but we have an abiding city above (1110 12:22).

15, 16. Christ having offered Himself once for all as the great sacrifice of atonement, the only sacrifice Christians can now offer is that of thanksgiving (cp. Ps 116:17 1 Pet 2:5,11), the fruit of lips (cp. Hos 14:3) which make confession of his name, and also that of mercy with which God is well pleased (Hos 6:6).

The sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving had been the highest form of peace-offering under the Levitical Law (Lev 7:12 22:29; the words in the LXX which our author used are exactly quoted by him here), and the Psalmists had adopted the term to describe that truly spiritual worship which the atoning sacrifice of Christ does not supersede, but deepens and assures (Psa 107:22 116:17). His sacrifice of atonement shall never be repeated; but an offering to God is, in its highest form, sacrifice or sacred service, whether it be of words or charity (cp. Hos 14:2 6:6), or of the duties of ordinary life (Ro 12:1; cp. 1 Pet 2:5,11). Such sacrifice of thanksgiving is now to be offered continually, not as of old at merely ceremonial times or after separate acts of imperfect atonement; and through the one true High Priest, who has really opened the way for such worship to be brought to God, by the one real sacrifice of atonement which is effectual for ever.

17. Duty of obedience to present rulers.

Watch for (i.e. in behalf of) your souls like sleepless shepherds who feel their responsibility to God for the flock. Do it with joy] i.e. watch with joy, feeling their duty to be a delight not a burden, for in the latter case the flock would suffer. 18. Pray for us The plural denotes that the writer identifies himself with the rulers of the Church, on whom some suspicion has fallen, and he therefore in their name protests their integrity. 19. The singular number indicates that the writer stood in some special relationship to his readers from whom he is for the present separated for some reason not given. It seems not to have been imprisonment (see v. 23), and the separation is regarded as only temporary.

The apologetic tone indicates some doubt as to the manner of its reception (cp. v. 18), and also a consciousness that the subject has been treated more briefly than it deserves (‘in few words’).

23. Our brother Timothy] The reference does not point conclusively to St. Paul as the writer, but indicates that he was intimately connected with the Pauline circle. We have no other knowledge of Timothy’s imprisonment. If he come] Timothy is elsewhere at present.

24. The salutation shows that the Epistle was not addressed to the rulers, but primarily to the whole community. They of Italy] i.e. those from Italy, those belonging to Italy. The phrase is most naturally taken to indicate that the Epistle was written outside Italy at some place where Italian Christians had settled. If the Epistle was sent to Rome, these Italian Christians would naturally wish to join in the salutation. See Intro. § 3, ‘Recipients and Probable Date.’

JAMES

INTRODUCTION

1. The Author. In the New Testament we meet with four persons named James (Jacob): (1) the father, or, possibly, brother of Jude; (2) the son of Alpheus; (3) the brother of John; (4) the brother of the Lord and head of the Church at Jerusalem (Ac 1:14; 12:21; 15:18-21; 21:18-26; Gal 1:19; 2:12). Of these four, we know nothing but the names about (1) and (2); (3) was put to death by Herod Agrippa I in 44 A.D., some time before the earliest date usually assigned to our Epistle. We are, therefore, almost driven to the conclusion that the author is (4), James the Lord’s brother, whom we meet in the Acts as head of the Church at Jerusalem. And this conclusion, reasonable in itself, is confirmed by all the evidence at our disposal. Besides the positive statement of St. Jerome (‘Vir. Ill.’ 2) that ‘James called the brother of the Lord’ wrote it, we have the striking correspondence in the thoughts and language of the Epistle to what we know of the character of the head of the Jerusalem Church. In the first place, there is the tone of authority which we find in the Epistle, natural to one in the position of St. James. Then there are the frequent references to the Old Testament, and to books like the Wisdom of Solomon and the Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach (called in our version ‘Ecclesiasticus’), which to a devout Jew like St. James would be very familiar. [Observe the allusions to Genesis 1 (1:18), Abraham (2:21), Rahab (2:25), Deuteronomy 6:4 (cp. Jas 2:19), Job (5:11), Elijah (5:17), and compare Jas 1:1-3, 5-8, 12-17, 21-25 with Eclesi 1:20 21-15 7:10 12:11 14:28 15:11 Wisd 7:18, etc. See also Job 28:12 (Jas 3:18), Prov 3:4 (Jas 4:7-11), Prov 10:12 (Jas 5:20), Isa 40:7 (Jas 1:11).] Then, again, the language of the Epistle is similar to that found in the speech of St. James, and in his circular letter (Ac 15). We conclude, therefore, that the well-nigh unanimous opinion, which assigns the Epistle to the brother of the Lord, is the only reasonable one. For the relationship implied by ‘brother’ see on Mt 12:46.

Of the personality of this great man we can form a tolerably clear idea from the New Testament and early Church tradition. Refusing to accept Christ as Messiah during His earthly life, he was converted by a special appearance to him of the Risen Lord (1 Cor 15:7). We can well believe that in the Nazareth home he was carefully trained in all the precepts and practices of the Jewish faith, and to that faith he clung with deep devotion all through his life. We must picture him to ourselves, not as one of those false Jews whose observances were merely formal and external, but as one of those true and earnest Jews whose obedience to the Law was a joy and an inspiration—whose life was lived in the spirit of Ps 119. His sincere and spiritual Judaism would be a guide to lead him to Christ, the ‘fulfiller’ of the Law (Mt 5:17). The good Jew would make a good Christian. And in those early days it was possible to combine observance of the Law with obedience to the ‘Royal Law’ of Christ. To St. James Christianity presents itself primarily as a Law (1:25 2:12 4:11, 12). This idea is found elsewhere in the New Testament (Ro 8:2 Heb 8:13). The time had not yet come when (as in the crisis which called forth the Epistle to the Hebrews) it was necessary to choose between Judaism and Christianity. And so, even as ‘bishop’ of Jerusalem, St. James went on keeping the whole Law, although he was ready to grant the fullest liberty to those Gentile converts who had never been Jews by religion (Ac 15). He combined strong personal convictions with the widest sympathy with the views of others. Hence, although himself a strict Jew, he could act cordially with St. Paul, the champion of Gentile liberty. At the end of each of his three missionary journeys the Apostle of the Gentiles went up to Jerusalem to report progress to St. James (Ac 15, 18:22 21:18), and it was at his suggestion that St. Paul undertook the Nazirite vow in the Temple which led to the attack on him of the unbelieving Jews. At this point the narrative of the Acts leaves St. James; but from the Jewish historian Josephus, and the converted Jew Hegesippus, we get accounts of his death which, though they differ in details, agree in their main facts. From them we learn that he was held in great esteem by his fellow-countrymen, and even permitted to enter the Temple. A Sadducean high priest, Ananus, brought him before the Sanhedrin, and caused him to be put to death by stoning, spite of the remonstrances of all the better sort of Jews. James ‘the Just’ (as he was called by his fellow-countrymen) died praying, like St. Stephen, for his murderers, a few years before the final overthrow of Judaism by the Romans. In very truth he was taken away from the evil to come. Some have seen in St. James the Restrainer of 2Th 2, after whose removal the Jewish apostasy would stand revealed, and receive its due reward in the overthrow of the nation and the religion of the Jews.

2. The Readers. The Epistle is addressed 'to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad,' not exclusively to Christian Jews, nor even to the Jews of Jerusalem or Palestine only, but to all Jews scattered throughout the world. It is important to realise this at the outset, since it will help to explain what might otherwise be a difficulty—the absence from the Epistle of any distinctively Christian doctrine. Christianity is there indeed. St. James is 'the servant of the Lord Jesus Christ.' His faith is 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ.' But all through the Epistle his appeal is chiefly to that which was common to unconverted Jews and Christian Jews alike—the belief in one God, and reverence for the Old Testament Scriptures. No doubt there are special messages of consolation and encouragement to the devout remnant who had accepted Christ as their Saviour and Messiah; but he evidently hoped that his letter would be read by a wider circle, and that it would appeal to all earnest souls among his fellow-countrymen. The sins he denounces are those to which Jews were specially tempted—love of money, oppression of the poor, profession without practice, and the like. The tone and atmosphere of the Epistle are Jewish. Even the allusions to natural phenomena are drawn from those of Palestine.

3. Date. This Jewish tone, and the absence of any allusion to the controversies which afterwards distracted the Church, combined with the simplicity of thought and the absence of any discussion of exclusively Christian topics, points to an early date, somewhere between 45 A.D. and 49 A.D. If that conclusion be correct we shall see in the Epistle a 'golden bridge connecting the Old and New Testaments.' Some scholars, however, have assigned it to a later date in the life of St. James, i.e. about 60 A.D. or a little later, chiefly on the ground that in certain passages he appears to be correcting an exaggerated view of the teaching of St. Paul contained in Ro4 and Ga3. Certainly there does appear to be a resemblance between these chs. and Jas2, but it must be remembered, (1) that the questions discussed were common subjects of debate among the Jews, and might therefore be dealt with by the two writers quite independently of one another; and (2) that the resemblance may be explained on the theory that St. Paul was acquainted with our Epistle. Professor J. B. Mayer, indeed, considers that in passages like Ro53-5 728 St. Paul has borrowed from St. James. On the whole, therefore, the earlier date seems the more probable.

4. Reception in the Church. In the first ages of the Church our Epistle does not seem to have been widely known. St. Clement of Rome (about 95 A.D.) appears to have been acquainted with it, and Hermas (130-160 A.D.) has various allusions to it. The ancient Jewish-Christian tract known as the 'Didache' (? 100 A.D.) has two or three passages which may refer to it. But it was not included in the list of books of the New Testament known as the Muratorian Canon (? 180 A.D.), and Eusebius of Cæsarea (4th cent.) says that, although it was generally received, there were doubts about its genuineness. In the East it was (as we should expect) well known. It is found in the ancient Peshitta Syriac version as well as in the oldest Egyptian versions. St. Jerome had no doubts about it, and eventually it was universally accepted. Any hesitation there may have been about admitting it into the Canon of the New Testament is easily understood when we remember that it was a short letter addressed to Jews, and that there was in some quarters an idea, plausible but false, that there was antagonism between St. Paul and St. James. There is, therefore, no valid reason, either in the character of the Epistle or in its reception by the Church, for doubting the opinion of the vast majority of Christians that it is the genuine work of the brother of the Lord, and, probably, the earliest of the writings of the New Testament. Even those who assign to it a somewhat later date would agree with Dean Stanley in his remark that it is 'the earliest in spirit' if not in time.

5. Character and Contents. Allusion has already been made to the Jewish tone and undeveloped theology of the Epistle, as well as to the numerous references to the Old Testament and the Apocrypha which meet us at every turn. The question may therefore be asked, What is the special value to us Christians of to-day of this brief Judaic Epistle with its somewhat narrow range and limited outlook? If we approach the study of it from the right point of view, not regarding it as a treatise on Christian theology, but rather as a practical letter on Christian ethics treated from the standpoint of a devout Jew, we shall find it both interesting and deeply instructive. It occupies somewhat the same position in regard to the other Epistles as the teaching of St. John Baptist does in the gospel narrative: cp. Jas122-27 215,16 51-6 with Mt313 Lk311. It is a call to repentance, and wholeheartedness and reality in religion. But it goes further than this. Everywhere we find the teaching of Christ reproduced, often in almost the very words of the Master: cp., for instance, Mt54-87 619 75,16 1022 1299 184 with Jas512 54,5 218 312 112 31.2 1-10. Notice also the resemblance between the Magnificat (Lk150-55) and Jas46. No doubt the sins rebuked are those to which outwardly respectable Jews were very prone, but they are sins which in this age of the Church’s history also seem specially prevalent. The dangers of the possession of wealth, and the temptations which easily beset the rich man, the perils of half-heartedness and of the attempt to combine the service of God with the service of the world, the undue respect for mere rank and wealth, the anxiety to teach instead of to learn, sins of speech, and harsh and hasty judgments of others—all these things confront us to-day in other, but not less dangerous, forms than those which St. James attacked. So that we shall find that the Epistle is in many respects singularly modern in tone, and specially helpful to us in dealing with modern problems, which after all are only the old problems in a new guise.

6. Analysis. It is not easy to give an analysis of an Epistle which, at first sight, seems to be rather a collection of ethical precepts than a connected whole. But, if we look closer, we shall find one great leading thought underlying the whole and binding together its various sections. And that thought is the central doctrine of the Old Testament: ‘Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord’ (Dt 6:4). That was the creed of every devout Jew, and that is the text of St. James’s homily. If God is one—one in Himself as well as the one true God—then His children, made in His image (Gen 1:26), must strive to be like Him. In God there is no change (1:17). He is ‘the same yesterday and to-day and for ever’ (Heb 13:8). He is wholly good. He demands from His children complete sincerity and whole-hearted love and obedience; hence the heinousness of sins like want of faith (1:6), hearing without doing (1:22), inconsistency in religious observances (1:26; 2:1), partial obedience (2:10), using the tongue for cursing as well as blessing (3:2), the attempt to combine the service of God with the service of the world (4:8). With this clue in our hands we can proceed to an analysis of the Epistle.

(Probably the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews alludes here and elsewhere to St. James; cp. Heb 11:31 12:11 with Jas 3:18 2:25. Possibly Heb 11 starts with a definition of faith because of the difficulties raised by Jas 2:14-26. Heb 13:7 is supposed by many to contain an allusion to the death of St. James.)

C. 1. 1. Salutation. 2-8. Trials from without, a source of joy to the man of prayer and faith. 9-12. Poverty is an example of those trials which may become joys. The reward of patient endurance. 13-18. Trial from within (= temptation); not from God, but from a man’s own sinful inclinations. God, our Maker, the author of good and never of evil. 19-25. We must be ready to listen and to receive the Word. But we must not be mere listeners; we must be doers. 26, 27. Our religious service must be real and practical. We must carry our worship into life by showing love and sympathy to others.

C. 2. 1-7. An instance of that inconsistency of life which is unworthy of a child of God—undue respect for wealth and position. 8-13. As God is one, so is His Law one. You cannot break a part without violating the whole Law. 14-26. Another instance of inconsistency—‘faith’ without practice, which is really no faith at all.

C. 3. 1, 2. Warning against the excessive desire to become teachers of others. The teacher’s work is one of great responsibility. 3-12. All are liable to err, especially in speech. The tongue is a terrible power for mischief, and often leads to inconsistency. With the same tongue we bless God and curse men. 13-18. The true wisdom contrasted with the false.

C. 4. 1-4. Stern denunciation of those who pursue worldly pleasure. Such pursuit leads to crime and marks a man as the enemy of God. He is a jealous God. 5-10. God resists the proud and gives grace to the humble. Therefore surrender your wills to Him, and in His strength fight the devil. Repent of your sins and inconsistency of life, and then God will exalt you. 11, 12. Show humility by refraining from speaking evil of your brethren. By so speaking you sit in judgment upon and condemn the Law of God, and even the Lawgiver Himself. 13-17. Stern prophetic denunciation of those who form schemes of money-getting without any thought of God.

C. 5. 1-6. Denunciation of the tyranny and injustice of the rich. 7-11. Exhortation to the Christian Jews to be patient and uncomplaining. The Judge who will right all wrong is at hand. 12-20. Postscript. Warning against swearing. The right use of sorrow and joy. The sick man is to confess to the elders of the Church, who will intercede for him with God. The value of intercessory prayer, especially for the diseases of the soul. The man who saves a soul from death brings a blessing to himself as well as to others.

[The changes of tone from stern denunciation to tenderness in the last obs. are most likely due to the fact that St. James is sometimes addressing non-Christian Jews and sometimes his ‘beloved brethren’ in Christ. It is to be observed that the sections of greatest severity (4:1-4, 13-17 5:1-6) never employ the words ‘brethren,’ ‘my brethren,’ which are characteristic of the rest of the Epistle. In the little Christian communities of the East there would not be many rich men. Indeed, the Church of Jerusalem was notoriously poor (Ac 11:29 Ro 15:29 1 Cor 16:4). Probably many of the Jew-Christians were in the employment of... their rich fellow-countrymen, who would cheat them of their wages and oppress them (2:6 5:4).

CHAPTER 1

THE POWER OF FAITH UNDER TEMPTATION

1. Servant] better, 'slave.' The word does not suggest any degradation, but only absolute surrender to the Master. St. James's humility prevents the mention of the earthly relationship. Scattered abroad] RV 'of the Dispersion.' Jews were found (sometimes in great numbers) in all the cities of the Roman empire. They kept up their connexion with the mother-country by going up to the great Jewish feasts. Greeting] better, 'joy be with you.' This form of salutation is found elsewhere only in Ac 15:28.

2. Temptations] better, 'trials' (from without). Trials, rightly borne, bring joy. The Christian is hidden to pray 'lead us not into temptation' (= trial); but for him, trial, when it comes, may be made to yield 'peaceable fruit' (Heb 12:11). Out of bitter may come sweet.

3. Trying] RV 'proof,' or 'process of testing.' Perfect and entire] better, 'full grown' (Eph 4:13), and 'complete' (1 Th 5:23).

4. Wave] RV 'surge.' St. James is thinking of the sudden storms on the lake of Galilee. This is the first of the eleven metaphors drawn from the natural phenomena of Palestine which recall our Lord's earlier parables, and show St. James as a keen observer of nature. A double-minded man is unstable] better, 'he is a double-minded man, unstable,' etc. Double-minded is one of the key-words of the Epistle. It implies half-hearted allegiance—an attempt to combine the service of God with the service of self and the world (Mt 6:24).

5. Rejoice] better, 'exult.' Poverty is an instance of those trials which may become joys. The poor man is exult in his high estate as a Christian: the rich man is to glory in the loss of those riches which are so dangerous and so fleeting.

6. Burning heat] better, 'sirocco,' the hot wind of Palestine which parches vegetation. Ways] better, 'goings'; perhaps used of the journeys of rich merchants (4:13). When he is tried] RV 'when he hath been approved.' Crown] the wreath that crowns the victor (2 Tim 4:8 Rev 2:10).

13-15. Trials from within (= temptations). The Jews seem to have sometimes believed (from a mistaken interpretation of passages like 2 S 24) that God sent temptations, and that it was therefore impossible to resist them (Ro 9:19). This error was fatal alike to any true conception of God and to any realisation of human responsibility. It made the one God inconsistent with Himself. God is insusceptible to evil, and never tempts to sin, though He may permit temptation, in order that we may be made stronger by resisting it. Temptation comes from a man's own heart, with its evil desire, that draws him from the right path. Desire becomes the mother of sin. Sin grows up and has a child—death.

17. God is the source of good, and of good only. Every good gift and every perfect boon (not 'gift,' as AV) comes from Him, who is the creator of the sun, moon, and stars. But, while they change and vary, and, as they revolve, are sometimes in shadow, He is always the same. Shadow of turning] RV 'shadow that is cast by turning.' Begat] RV 'brought forth.' It seems at first sight natural to see in this v. a reference to the new birth of baptism, or to the regeneration of power of the gospel (1 Pet 1:25). But such ideas are foreign to the simplicity of St. James's theological thought. The word of truth is the divine word which brought about the creation of man in God's image (Gen 1:26). Firstfruits] see Nu 15:5 18 Dt 18:4-5 Ro 11:16.

19. Wherefore] RV 'ye know this.'

20. The bitter words and angry passions of men will never bring about that righteousness—that entire and loving obedience to His divine will—which God requires from His children.

Engrafted] RV 'implanted.' The Word is like a seed lying in the heart, which, under favourable conditions, would grow and bear fruit in life.

22-25. Hearing without doing is useless. A mere hearer is like a man who glances at his natural face in a mirror (1 Cor 13:12), and then goes away and at once forgets what he looks like. But the man who practises as well as hears stoops down and gazes into the perfect Law of Christ, obedience to which is perfect freedom. He remembers the ideal of Christian manhood he sees there, and strives to realise it in life. Thus he wins blessing. See on 2:11.

26. Religion] better, 'religious observance, the outward service of God.' In order that the service and worship of God may be acceptable, the man who offers it must (1) show practical love and sympathy, and (2) strive after personal holiness (Psa 40:6-8 51:16,17 Isa 1:10-30); otherwise he is inconsistent.

CHAPTER 2

WARNINGS AGAINST RESPECT OF PERSONS, BELIEF AND PRACTICE

1. Another instance of inconsistency. Jesus Christ the Lord of glory] better, 'Jesus Christ the glory,' or 'the glorious one.' One of the rare passages in which St. James breaks through his habitual reserve in speaking of the Master, and shows us something of his devotion to Christ. Such reserve was natural to a Jew. 2. In the Jewish-Christian Church the place for worship is still the synagogue (Heb 10:22). At first strangers would be admitted (1 Cor 14:18). 4. Partially better, ‘divided’ between Christian duty and worldly interests.

Judges of evil thoughts] better, ‘evil-thinking judges.’ By showing undue preference to the rich man you judge, and judge wrongly, as to the relative merits of the rich and the poor man (see 4:11). God, the Just Judge, gives greater honour to the pious poor man. He is an heir of the kingdom (19).

6. Josephus (‘Ant.’ 28:8) speaks of the cruelty of the rich Sadducees to the poor in Jerusalem; cp. also Isa 3:15 Am 4:1, and many other passages from the prophets of the OT, denouncing the cruelty and oppression of the rich. 7. Worthy name] RV ‘honourable name.’ For baptism into the name of Christ see Ac 2:38. For the expression cp. Ac 5:41 (RV) Phil 2:9. By which ye are called] better, ‘which was called over you,’ i.e. probably at baptism.

10. It might be said that, even if a man transgressed the Law of Christ in the matter of respect of persons, he was only breaking a small part of that Law. Not so. The Law, like the Lawgiver, is one. To break any commandment is to violate the whole Law of love, the unity of which is marred by any disobedience.

12. The law of liberty] better, ‘a law of liberty.’ There can be no true liberty without obedience. A Law of liberty is one which a man obeys freely, not because he must, but because it is a Law of love, which is gladly obeyed. To serve the Master, Christ, is ‘perfect freedom.’ To St. James even the OT Law—though imperfect—was something higher than a mere code. He saw in it the underlying principle of love. Thus he was led on to find in the Law of Christ the fulfilment of the old Law. 13. The meaning of the last phrase probably is, The unmerciful and unloving man is condemned without pity (Mt 18:21-35), but the merciful man is triumphantly acquitted. The man who loves is ‘justified’ by God.

14. A third instance of inconsistency—great profession of belief without practice. In order to understand this passage we must bear in mind that St. James is here using the word ‘faith’ in a sense opposite to that of 1:26, and different also from that in which St. Paul uses it. To St. Paul faith is always living and loving belief in Christ. To St. James (in this passage) faith is a kind of ‘vain assent,’ or at any rate a ‘barren orthodoxy, untouched by love.’ Similarly, to St. Paul ‘works’ are the works of the Law—the fulfilment of certain obligations quite apart from faith. To St. James ‘works’ are the necessary fruits of faith, without which faith in any true sense cannot exist. That the two writers are in substantial agreement is shown by passages like 2 Cor 9:8 Eph 2:10 2 Th 2:17 1 Tim 2:10 5:10 6:18 2 Tim 3:17 Tit 2:7, 14 38. (St. James’s ‘faith’ would be represented in St. Paul’s language by ‘knowledge,’ and his ‘works’ by ‘the fruits of the Spirit.’) The difference is ‘merely a difference in method of stating the truth.’ The two writers, ‘like trains on different pairs of rails, cannot collide, though they may seem to be in danger of doing so.’ The further question whether, if either was acquainted with the writings of the other, he would have used phrases liable to be misunderstood, is one not easy to answer with certainty; but at least we may say that it cannot be regarded as proved that either of the two had read the work of the other. It is, at any rate, unlikely that St. James had read St. Paul.

15-17. Faith without practical love of the brethren is dead. The reference may be to the famine of Ac 11:28-30. Being alone] RV ‘in itself.’ 18. If you have ‘faith’ without active piety to be its evidence, it is impossible for any one to be sure that you have faith at all. 19. Tremble] better, ‘shudder.’ Even the evil spirits have a kind of ‘faith,’ and their faith bears fruit of a sort. It causes them profound fear: Mk 1:24 Lk 8:48. No doubt St. James has in his mind these incidents recorded in the Gospels.

20-25. The appeal to Scripture. Abraham’s readiness to sacrifice his only son was the crowning act of a life of faith which began when he left home and country. By that faith he was ‘justified’ (i.e. acquitted at the bar of God’s judgment), and called God’s friend (Isa 41:9). So also, when Rahab received Joshua’s spies and saved their lives, her faith was practical (Josh 2:27 Heb 11:31 1 Clem 12). Rahab, though a Gentile and an outsider, was sure that the God of Israel was the one true God, and that His people would be victorious. And she had the courage of her convictions. She showed in a practical way that she was on the Lord’s side, and so was rewarded by becoming an ancestress of Christ Himself after the flesh (Mt 1:5).

26. Without better, ‘apart from.’

CHAPTER 3
THE CONTROL OF THE TONGUE

offend). There is no such thing as human infallibility. That which is most likely to cause us to err is the tongue (vv. 3–12). 4. Governor

5. Great power is exercised by small things like a horse's bridle and a rudder. So also the tongue, although small, is very powerful, and generally for evil rather than for good. How great a matter] better, 'how great a wood.' A tiny spark can set on fire a great forest.

6. The tongue is, a world of iniquity] better, 'the tongue maketh itself (or, becometh) like the wicked world.' The idea conveyed in this difficult passage seems to be that, while other members can sin only to a limited extent, the tongue can inspire and cause a whole cycle of wickedness—a whole world of evil. 'There is no divine law which the tongue cannot break' (R. W. Dale, 'Epistle of James,' 94). Course of nature] perhaps, 'the wheel of nature'—the whole circle or sphere of life.

Set on fire of hell (RV 'by hell') i.e. the source from which this evil activity of the tongue springs is hell, the Gehenna of Fire.

8. Unruly] better, 'restless,' 'unstable,' 'never still.'

9–12. 'The tongue is not only mischievous, but also gives rise to inconsistency. With it we bless the God of love (and thereby profess that we are striving to be like Him), and in the same breath curse our fellow-men, made in His image. Nature should teach us to avoid such inconsistency. The purposes of nature are clear and single. Fig trees bear figs, and vines grapes. Salt water does not yield fresh.' The last clause means that, just as a fountain of bitter water cannot yield any that is sweet, so the man who speaks bitter words against his fellow-men cannot truly praise or love God (1 Jn 4:20).

13. Here St. James returns from the digression of vv. 3–12 to the subject of vv. 1, 2. His readers desired to become teachers. But the first qualification for a teacher is wisdom. True wisdom defined, and contrasted with its counterfeit. Out of a good conversation] RV 'by his good life.' True wisdom is practical and gentle; false wisdom shows itself in strife and party spirit. If a contentious man boasts of his wisdom he is a liar. 15. Sensual] better, 'carnal,' 'belonging to the natural man' (1 Cor 2:14 15:44).

17. Easy to be intreated] better, 'teachable,' ready to welcome truth from whatever quarter it may come, not refusing the guidance of others. Without partiality] better, 'free from double-mindedness.'

18. Of them that make peace] better, 'by peacemakers.' The wise man is a peacemaker who sows good seed that in God's time will bear precious fruit.

To sum up. The heavenly wisdom is, (1) chaste, pure (in relation to its possessor); (2) peaceable (in its relation to others). (a) actively, 'reasonable,' (b) passively, 'easy to be persuaded'; (3) practical, 'full of pity and good works'; (4) certain of itself, 'without doubtfulness,' and therefore 'without hypocrisy.' Wisdom, in St. James's view, is moral rather than an intellectual quality.

CHAPTER 4

Denunciation of Greed and Love of Pleasure

1. Lusts] better, 'pleasures.' 2. 'You eagerly desire something which another has and you have not. This unregulated desire may lead to hate and even murder (cp. Ahab, 1 K 21), but even so your covetous desires go on; they grow by what they feed on. Still you have not got your desire. Then comes the wholesale murder of unjust war; and yet you are unsatisfied, because you try to get things for yourselves, instead of asking God for them.' The chief difficulty of this passage lies in the words 'ye kill.' It has been argued that the words as they stand are out of place, and that the early Christians of St. James's time could not have been guilty of murder. It has been suggested that the true reading is a word translated 'ye are ensnare.' But, (1) while a Christian in these first days might not have been guilty of actual murder, he might well have given way to those feelings of hate which lead to murder ('Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer,' 1 Jn 3:15); and, (2) the Epistle was not meant exclusively for Christian Jews. In the Jewish society of St. James's day murder was frequently the first means by which a man sought to gratify his desires (Mk 15:7 Ac 21:38 23:14). With a passionate people like the Jews there was always a danger of a sudden attack and murder.

4. Adulterers and adulteresses] RV 'adulteresses' (without 'adulterers and'), meaning, of course, those who have forsaken God. The thought is very common in the OT. (Isa 57:4 Jer 3:20 Ezk 16 Hose 2). It is also found in Mt 12:38. The metaphor of the Church as the bride of Christ occurs in Eph 5:28 and other passages of the NT.

5. The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy] better, 'God longeth eagerly for the spirit that He planted in us.' St. James is here alluding to several passages in the OT, rather than quoting accurately. The thought is found in Ex 20:4 34:14 Dt 4:24. 'God is a jealous God, but His jealous love is very different from that of man. It shows itself in the good gift of more grace. He longs that the spirit of man should be drawn more closely to Him, and become like Him.' The above is the best rendering of a disputed passage. Others translate, 'The (Holy) Spirit which He made to dwell in us years for us.' But there does not seem to be any specific reference to the work of the Holy Spirit in this passage.

7-12. Duty to God—humility, sincerity, repentance. Duty to man—to live in love, and refrain from slander and fault-finding.

8. Double minded] Notice the recurrence of the key-note struck in 1. 9. Heaviness] better, 'dejection.' 11. When a man speaks against his brother he is practically condemning the Law of Love, and thus arrogating to himself the office of a judge. In criticising that Law he is virtually criticising the divine Lawgiver.

13-C. 56. Stern denunciation of the presumption and tyranny of the rich. From the Old and NT. it may be gathered that, on the whole, wealth was misused by the Jews, and that therefore the 'monarch of unrighteousness' was an occasion of sin and a terrible temptation. St. James's teaching about wealth is put in a brief, uncompromising form, without limitations or exceptions. The possession of riches is regarded as a danger. But that a Christian might possess wealth, if only he recognised that he was a steward of it (Lk 16:1-12), is clear from passages like 1 Tim 6:17-19. Zachaeus (Lk 19:1-9) and Joseph of Arimathaea (Mt 27:57) were both rich, and both disciples. 13. Such a city] RV 'this city.' The presumption rebuked is that of the rich ('non-Christian') Jewish merchant who travelled for purposes of gain. 14. What is your life? It is even a vapour] RV 'Ye are a vapour.'

CHAPTER 5

REBUKE AND ENCOURAGEMENT

2. Are corrupted, etc.] prophetic tense, in which the future is spoken of as though it were already come to pass. 3. For the last days] RV 'in the last days.' The warning was fulfilled during the siege of Jerusalem, when many rich Jews were slain by Zealots (Jos. 'Wars,' 5. 10). 4. Lord of Sabaoth] an OT. phrase = 'Lord of Hosts.' It is not found elsewhere in the NT., except once in a quotation (Ro 9:29). 5. As in a day of slaughter] omit 'as,' and cp. Jer 12:5 25:84. 6. The just] RV 'righteous one,' may refer (as Ac 3:14 7:52) to our Lord, but is perhaps a general statement, although in that case the plural rather than the singular usually naturally be used.

7-11. A message of patience and hope to the persecuted Christians.

7. There will be a final Judgment, when justice will be done. Therefore be patient (better, 'long-suffering,' Ro 2:4). 8. The coming of the Lord] here clearly the reference is to the Lord Christ, to whom St. James applies the sacred Name given by the Jews to God the Father. To a Christian Jew the promise was fulfilled in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. Early and latter rain] Another illustration from Palestine (Dt 11:14 Jer 5:24 Joel 2:22 Zech 10:1). 9. Do not let your irritability and soreness at outside oppression vent itself in impatience and grumbling towards one another.

11. Patience] better, 'endurance.' This is the only NT. reference to Job, though the book is quoted 1 Cor 3:19. End of the Lord] In the end God turned Job's sorrow into joy, and showed that He is full of compassion and mercy.

12. See Mt 5:38-37. It was a common Jewish sin to confirm statements by an oath or curse (Mt 23:16 Mk 14:71). The question of judicial oaths is not touched either here or in the Gospels. Above all things] i.e. in your controversies and quarrels (referring back to v 9) 'avoid especially the use of an oath to strengthen your assertions in ordinary conversation.' The use of oaths when seriously taken as in the presence of God was allowed both by the Old and the NT. (Dt 6:13 Ps 63:11 Isa 65:16 Jer 4:2 Ro 10:9 2 Cor 1:22 11:8, etc). 13. The true means of sanctifying times of excitement, whether joyful or sorrowful. We must make the worship of God the outlet for our emotion.

14-16. In order to understand this passage, round which much controversy has raged, we must remember that it was, and is, a Jewish custom for a sick man to make his confession to some rabbi or rabbis. Elaborate rules to guide those who receive such clinical confessions are found in the Talmud. St. James is telling his readers that this custom was to be continued by Christian Jews, and that the confession of the sick man was to be made to the clergy ('presbyters') of the Church. They would then (1) pray over him for the pardon of his sins, and (2) anoint him with oil (the recognised remedy, Isa 1:6 Mk 6:18 Lk 10:38). By these means he would obtain forgiveness of his sins, and (if it were God's will) recover from his sickness. It is scarcely necessary to point out that the Roman Catholic doctrine of Extreme Unction receives no justification from this passage. In the Prayer-Book ('Office for the Visitation of the Sick') the lines laid down by St. James are closely followed. To a Jew sickness and sin were associated (Jn 9:7).

16. Confess your faults] RV 'Confess therefore your sins,' referring back to the previous vv. St. James is throughout talking about the confession of a sick man to the elders. He does not touch upon the wider question of the lawfulness of confession generally.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man] better, 'the supplication of a just man availleth much in its working.' Once more St. James draws his illustration from the OT. Elijah, though a great and holy man, was yet

1. Author. The author describes himself as 'Peter an apostle of Jesus Christ' throughout, and there is no reason to doubt the truth of his claim. The Christian writers who lived nearest to apostolic times knew the Epistle, and did not question its authorship, and, as soon as collections of apostolic books were formed, we find it included in them. Only in modern times have objections been raised, on the ground that such widespread and severe persecution as the letter implies was unknown during St. Peter's lifetime, and that the author is more indebted to St. Paul's Epistles than St. Peter was likely to be. These objections disappear when the Epistle itself and the relations of St. Peter to St. Paul are carefully studied.

2. Occasion and Contents. That both writer and readers were expecting a severe persecution is the first and strongest impression which the letter leaves on us. But this 'fiery trial' is only expected; it is not even certain that it will come at all (3:14-17). As yet there has been suffering from slander and isolation, but now something worse is certainly looked for. What had caused this expectation? In 64 A.D. there had been a great fire at Rome, which the Emperor Nero was suspected of having caused. He directly afterwards put to death a large number of Christians in order to quiet the people. Trustworthy tradition says that both St. Paul and St. Peter were slain in the persecution that thus began; it is, however, not improbable that St. Paul suffered some years before St. Peter. This news would soon spread to the Christians in all parts of the empire, who would naturally begin to fear for themselves. The Christians to whom this Epistle was written dwelt in districts of Asia Minor, all of which probably, and two of which certainly, were connected with St. Paul. It was carried by Silvanus, the friend of St. Paul. It is then reasonable to suppose that St. Peter wrote to these people soon after St. Paul's martyrdom, being himself at the time in Rome, surrounded by the sorrows and dangers of a terrible persecution, to encourage them to meet the trial steadfastly, if, as they feared, it should reach them. Silvanus would tell them all there was to tell about their master Paul. The letter from St. Peter would show that they were still cared for by an Apostle, to whom some of them probably owed their conversion on the first Whit Sunday; cp. 2 Cor. 1:1 and 1 Pet. 11. It contained too encouragement of a deeper kind. St. Peter begins by greeting them in the name of the Holy Trinity; reminds them that all events have their source in God's foreknowledge; that this trial is part of His eternal purpose, and that they are therefore sure of His protection; that, if the veil were lifted, as one day it will be, they would see the divine power and glory surrounding them; that Christ's work was done through suffering, and that suffering is the proper state of Christians, and the condition of their happiness and hope, for safety from the perils of this life is a little matter to those who are heirs of eternal safety; that the Holy Spirit, who in times past gave ancient Israel its Messianic hope, is with them still, making them the people of Christ, the manifested Messiah, binding together the whole brotherhood throughout the world for the fulfilment of God's single purpose, and enabling them to live as a consecrated people should. 'In quietness and confidence shall be your strength' is the sum of his encouragement. Those whom the heathen scorn as 'Christians' must live, and, if need be, suffer, as men would who are like Christ, being holy, gentle, courteous, loyal, giving no occasion for real offence. Even the imperial authority is to be respected; whatever Nero's conduct may be, his office is of divine appointment. But more than that: Christ's sufferings were sacrificial; through them He saved sinners, and through death the scope of His redeeming work was enlarged. So through their sufferings—to which they have been consecrated by the sprinkling of Christ's Blood—these Christians may be the means of bringing even their persecutors to salvation.

3. General Remarks on the Epistle. No one was better fitted than St. Peter to write such an Epistle. The Lord had named him Peter the Rock; and though his conduct in religious days may sometimes have seemed to belittle the name, yet his later life showed that Christ had judged his character aright, and had by His discipline 'established and strengthened' his steadfastness. He stood firm in Jerusalem before persecuting rulers, and knew how persecution should be met.

His speeches, as recorded in Acts, show that he was sustained in those days by the same kind of thoughts as he expresses in this Epistle—obedience is the great duty; the sufferings of Christ were appointed by God, and were not the chance triumph of His enemies; they involved humiliation, rejection, and the curse of the Tree; they led to the Resurrection which was due to the act of the Father, and is the source of Christian hope; now He sits supreme at the right hand of God, and has poured forth upon His people the Holy Spirit of whom He had received the promise from the Father: from thence He shall come at the time of the restoration of all things to judge the quick and dead. Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, of whom prophets spoke, and for whom Israel hoped. Forgiveness and repentance come from Him, and through faith in His name is safety and salvation. The Apostles are His witnesses, and so is the Holy Spirit in His people. All that has happened since He came is the outcome of past history, and there has been no break in the life of the people who are God's peculiar care: among them the believing Gentiles are also reckoned.

There has however been some progress in the Apostle's mind between the speeches and the Epistle. Christ's sufferings, once his stumbling-block, had become reasonable to him after the Resurrection; now he sees that they are the beginning of His glory and the great means of His salvation. Now he understands, as he scarcely did then, their sacrificial character, and therefore lays more stress than he did on the Christian privilege of suffering for others, and aiding to advance the salvation of the world. It is remarkable that Ac 2:31 is the closest parallel that can be found in NT. to 1 Pet 3:18b, but that, whereas in the speech Christ's continued life in the spirit is alone mentioned, in the Epistle the subject is the extension of His redeeming work to those who seemed to have perished beyond hope.

This development is natural in an Apostle who had for years been testing by experience the power of the gospel, but it is likely that St. Paul had been a special aid to him. From Gal 2:11-14 some have imagined that there was the same continued opposition between them as there was between St. Paul and the narrow Judaizing conservatives who 'came from James.' But the broad lesson of NT. is that the Apostles, in spite of differences of training and temperament, were agreed on all important points, and were strong enough to overcome the scruples and opposition of these Judaizers.

This Epistle seems to have been written to Churches which were mainly composed of Gentile Christians; but the old disputes about the Law have long ago been settled; there is no trace of them here; the Church is no longer divided; all Christians alike are simply the inheritors of ancient Israel. There is then nothing strange in finding, as we certainly do, that St. Peter has studied Epistles of St. Paul with care. With Romans and Ephesians in particular, it is plain that he is thoroughly familiar. To quote detached verses would hardly be convincing. Most of the parallels are pointed out in the notes, and it will be seen that the thoughts of whole passages are reproduced with just that kind of difference which would be expected if the resemblance were due to memory, not copying. St. Peter has borrowed nothing which he has not made his own. He does not follow St. Paul in his use of 'flesh' for man's lower, corrupt nature, or of 'soul' for that part of man's compound being which he shares with all the creation, but gives to these words the simple meaning which they bear in the Gospels. Nor does he speak of faith quite as St. Paul does; faith in this Epistle, as in Hebrews, is akin to hope; it is belief in that which shall at last be revealed. He twice uses the phrase 'in Christ,' but does not, like St. Paul, make it the very centre of his theology. The doctrine which it implies, and which was derived from our Lord Himself, is found indeed in St. Peter, but he lays on the whole more stress on following Christ as a leader than on the mystical union with Christ, which St. Paul realised vividly. In Ephesians the immediate coming of Christ seems to be no longer expected; a long course of development in the Church is looked for. But St. Peter, with the fearful signs of the changed time before him, writes, 'The end of all things is at hand.' He never applies the title of Church, so frequent in that Epistle, to the Christian community.

That the Epistle of St. James had been studied also by St. Peter seems certain, and if this was written at an early date in Palestine, he may have done so in his Palestinian days. Cp. 1 Pet. 17, 12, 24 4 5 5 with Jas. 18, 11, 20 4 5 20.

He presents us indeed in this Epistle with 'Thoughts, sometimes new and rare, but chiefly drawn

Out of the treasure-house of memories dear,' and the dearest of those memories are of his Lord. Christ's sufferings; the new life of hope which began with the Resurrection; the restoration of the fallen Apostle when Christ bade him 'Feed, tend, My sheep, My lambs'; the Saviour washing the disciples' feet with the towel knotted round Him; the Apostle's own confession that Jesus was the Christ, and the Lord's answer, 'Happy art thou, Simon'—these are some of the gospel memories which he unobtrusively introduces into his letter, and all through it we perceive his longing to see his beloved Lord again.

4. Two points remain for special notice.

(1) If St. Peter wrote from Rome why does he say 'She that is in Babylon salute you' (5:13 RV)? In Revelation Babylon means Rome. It is not unlikely that St. Peter should have applied the name, even at an earlier time, to the city which was already being stained with the blood of the saints. That title for Rome would correspond with the Jewish titles which he gives to the Gentile Christians. There is no trustworthy evidence that he ever went to the real Babylon. St. Mark, from whom greeting is sent, was summoned to Rome by St. Paul just before his martyrdom (2 Tim. 4:11). The order in which the districts are named can only be explained if the letter was sent by sea. The two Epistles of St. Paul which have particularly influenced its thought and language were connected with Rome; so was, probably, the Epistle to the Hebrews, which has much in common with 1 Pet. Everything points in the same direction—that by Babylon St. Peter means Rome, and probably Rome become fearful by Nero's persecution. See also on 5:12, 13.

(2) The Epistle is written in remarkably good Greek, and is more like the work of a careful student than of a Galilean fisherman. We feel, as we read it, the same surprise as the rulers did when they found that St. Peter and St. John were 'unlearned and ignorant men' (Ac. 4:12). But Greek was much used in Palestine, and even a fisherman of Galilee would know how to speak it tolerably. The rulers in their amazement 'took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus,' and the companionship of a great character does raise a man's style. So does familiarity with such books as the OT. Scriptures and the Epistles of St. Paul; nor does the greatness of his theme itself fail to affect the writer. If further explanation is needed, it may perhaps be found in 1 Pet. 5:12, where the meaning may quite well be, 'I have used Silvanus as my secretary; he has, I am sure, given my thoughts faithfully, though he has written them out in his own language.'

CHAPTER 1

GREETING IN THE NAME OF THE HOLY TRINITY. ENCOURAGEMENT TO HOPE IN FAITH AND OBEDIENCE

1, 2. To the strangers scattered throughout . . . elect] RV 'to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in,' etc. The RV order shows that the present circumstances of his readers, as well as their election and his own apostleship, are all according to the foreknowledge of God. Elect] i.e. chosen. Christians, like Israel of old, are God's chosen people. The 'Dispersion' was a term used to describe the Jews who had been scattered among the nations since the time of the captivity: cp. Isa. 11:12 Zeph. 3:10 Jn. 7:55 Jas. 1:1. Pontus, Galatia, etc.] These names include the whole of what we call Asia Minor, N. and W. of the Taurus range. The order is natural if we suppose St. Peter's messenger carried the letter from Rome to a port of Pontus, then made a circuit with it, and returned to the same port. St. Paul had preached in part of this country: cp. Ac. 16:6. There were men from Cappadocia. Pontus, and Asia at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Ac. 2:9). 2. The foreknowledge of God] cp. 1:19 RV. The whole course of events which are gradually revealed to man is known to God from everlasting: cp. Ro. 4:17 and 8:29 Heb. 11:40 (RM) Rev. 4:11 (RV). Through sanctification] RV 'in sanctification.' God's chosen people are surrounded by the influences of the Holy Spirit. By these they are brought to consecration and guided afterwards to more and more perfect obedience.

. . . Sprinkling of the blood] Sacrificial sprinkling is meant: cp. Heb. 9:13, 19, 21 10:22 12:24. The expression is peculiar to these two Epistles, and the reference in both is to the sacrifices at the giving of the Law at Sinai (Ex. 24:3-8), where sprinkling with the blood of slain victims was the means of purifying and consecrating the people for entering on the divine covenant, in which they were, on the one hand, accepted as Jehovah's people, on the other, obliged to obedience. So God's foreknowledge, working in the Spirit's sanctification . . . a people to be consecrated to . . . and obedience in the new covenant. But the sprinkling with this Blood is no mere symbol;
the blood is the life which has been made perfect by death (cp. Lv 17:11), and when the Christian is sprinkled with Christ’s Blood, he is made to share His life, and, at the same time, consecrated to an obedience which may have to be unto death. Grace and peace] An apostolic salutation, perhaps suggested by the priestly blessing in Nu 6:22-27. In the word ‘grace’ is gathered up ‘all that may be supposed to be expressed in the smile of a heavenly King looking down upon His people’ (Hort).

In this greeting we have, as it were, the ends of the threads which are presently interwoven to make the texture of the Epistle. ‘Elect who are sojourners’ sums up in an epigram the contrast between the outward uncertainty which was the occasion, and the inward assurance of peace and duty which is the teaching of the whole Epistle. Thus the doctrine of the Holy Trinity on which the greeting is based, becomes the text of the Apostle’s exhortations. From 1:3-2:10 the sanctification of the Spirit issuing in the Christian life of faith and obedience is the main theme. From 2:11-4:11 the sufferings of Christ are presented as the example and purification of those whose ordinary lot is to suffer. From 4:12-5:11 the special and fiercer trial which is about to begin is shown to be part of the foreknowledge and counsel of God.

1:3-2:10. The first division of the letter:
A (i), 1:3-8, the faith of Christians, (ii), 1:10-12, its connexion with the faith of ancient Israel;
B (i), 1:13-21, the life of obedience to which their faith devotes them is (ii), 1:22-25, a new life, (iii), 2:1-10, which is nevertheless the fulfillment of the ideal of the Jewish Church.

A (i). 1:3-8. ‘Blessed be God who has begotten us to a living hope through the Resurrection. Laying hold of this hope by faith, you know that you are being kept safe, though trials beset you. These trials but purify your faith, enriching it with joyful love for Jesus Christ, the earnest of the perfect salvation, which shall be revealed when He is revealed.’

3. Hath begotten] RV ‘begat’: the RV rendering brings the moment of begetting before us. The Resurrection must have been to all the Eleven, and to St Peter especially, such a change from despair to hope as could only be expressed as a beginning of new life: cp. Ro 6:4 Eph 2:5 Phil 3:10. 4. Inheritance] The land of promise (Heb 11:9) was the inheritance of Israel. During all their wanderings this was reserved for them, but they were taught in many ways that it was a type of a better

4. This inheritance is reserved for theelect in heaven. It cannot be corrupted, as the earth was in the days of Noah (Gn 6:11), or defiled as Canaan was by abominations (Lv 18:27 Dt 21:28 Jer 27), and the Temple by the heathen (Ps 79:1), nor do its flowers or fruits fade away (Isa 32:15 60:18, 61:11); cp. 2 Pet 3:13. 5. Kept] RV ‘guarded’: cp. Gal 3:28 Phil 4:7. Salvation] RV ‘a salvation.’ The Gk. means ‘safety’, ‘health,’ and is so used in Ac 27:8 Heb 11:17. It must have had to all early Christians some of the freshness of a metaphor (cp. The Order of the Visitation of the Sick: ‘in whom, and through whom, thou mayest receive health and salvation’), and here, as in Ac 4:12, St. Peter seems to pass from the simple to the deeper significance. In the last time] The Gk. might be rendered, ‘in a time of extremity,’ i.e. when things are at the worst: cp. Dan 12:1.

7. The trial of your faith] RV ‘The proof of your faith.’ St. Peter means it is worth while to purify even perishable gold, much more your faith (cp. Job 23:10 Ps 66:10 Prov 17: 3 Zech 13:9, and especially Isa 48:10 Ecclus 25:); but he expresses it a little inaccurately, as though the proof, not the thing proved, were precious: cp. Jas 1:2. It is St. Peter’s habit to speak somewhat scornfully of gold: cp. 1:18 2:2 Ac 3:19. 8. A generous touch. The Apostle who has seen admires the love and joy of believers who have not seen the Lord; cp. Jn 20:20. Full of glory] in which God dwells: cp. Ex 34:29-34 1Tim 6:15. Faith leads into the presence of God, and adds to joy something which is unspeakable and divine: cp. Phil 4:1. 9. The end of your faith] i.e. the final result of it, which they are already in process of receiving, though it is not yet fully theirs. The salvation of your souls] There is no word for ‘your’ in the Gk. St. Peter directs the thoughts of his readers beyond their own small circle: cp. 5:1 2Pet 1:7 (RV). Throughout this Epistle, except perhaps in the quotation 3:20, ‘soul’ means the true life, the very self: cp. 1:21 2:11,25 4:18 2Pet 28:14.

A (ii). 1:10-12. This salvation is no new thing. The prophets knew something of it, and sought to learn more. In them, as in kings and priests, and to some extent in the whole nation, there was the Messianic Spirit, and they understood that sufferings and glories were destined for the Messiah. The exact time when these should be fulfilled they could not tell, but so much at least was revealed to them—that they were serving God for generations yet to come. What the Spirit in them dimly showed, those who have preached to you by the same Spirit have plainly announced; what is still to follow, angels are looking forth from heaven to see.
10. Searched diligently] studying the sacred writings that already existed, observing the signs of the times, meditating on the spiritual significance of worship, and trying to discern God’s true will in the inward impulses by which they were themselves moved: cp. Jer 15:19. Thus they ‘tested things not seen’ (Heb 11:1 RM). 11. What, or what manner of time] the second expression corrects the first.

The prophets learnt not to expect too definite a message. The sufferings of Christ] RM ‘unto Christ,’ i.e. that should come unto Christ. 12. From heaven] as in v. 4, represented as a place. The visible heavens are a symbol of the spiritual heaven, which, without such a symbol, we can hardly think of at all; but our Lord’s words in Lk 17:21 warn us not to press human language too far: cp. 3:10,22. To look into] The Gk. word means ‘to look as out of a window.’ The angels from the heights of heaven, if we may thus carry on the symbolic language, have a wider view than ours, and watch the results of Christ’s redeeming work coming one after another into view.

B (i). 13-22. ‘Such faith and hope belong to your life of sanctification; but so does obedience. Sanctification indeed means a holy life. Christ’s redemption has allowed you to call the Judge of all men Father; but you may not therefore fear Him less; indeed, life becomes more awful when you think of the price and mystery of that redemption, which has been designed from eternity to direct your faith and hope to God Himself.’

To the end] or, as AV mg. and RV, ‘perfectly.’

14. Obedient children] RV ‘children of obedience,’ a Hebrew mode of expression (cp. Eph 2:2, 5:8), which implies that obedience was the ruling passion of their lives.

15. Conversation] RV ‘manner of life’: cp. v. 18 2:12 3:14, 3:16. Because it is written] It was a habit of St. Peter to clothe his words in this way. From the sacred writings he recognised no appeal: cp. 1:24, 2:10, 3:3, 5:10, 4:8, 17, 5:4 Ac 20:21, 21:20, 22:24, 10:48; cp. 2 Pet 3:1. The words quoted occur several times in Leviticus (11:44, 19:2, 20:28). The latter half of the quotation shows that the Law was intended to produce something much deeper than mere ceremonial holiness. The Christian must live as the Jew was meant to live, a consecrated life.

17. Call on the Father] RV ‘call on him as Father’: cp. Jer 3:19 and Mt 6:9, which is the fulfilment of the prophetic promise. been begotten again' : cp. v. 3. Not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible] cp. Jn 11:24. 1Jn 3:20. By the word] We need not discuss whether 'the word' means Christ, or the word of the gospel preached or written; or, again, the word that is heard in each man's conscience. All forms of God's speech are summed up in Christ, who is the Truth : cp. Heb 1. The word of God, which liveth] RM 'or, God who liveth' : cp. Dan 6:26. 24. For] Once more St. Peter clenches his argument by the authority of Scripture. The quotation is taken from Isa 40:6, where the section of the book of Isaiah begins, in which the new life of the forgiven and restored nation is proclaimed.

CHAPTER 2

NEW LIFE ACCORDING TO THE ANCIENT PROMISE, AND AFTER THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST

B (iii). 2:1-10. St. Peter considers that the Christian is the continuation of the Jewish Church. Christ's coming has been a time of reformation (Heb 9:10), but there has been no break with the past. After setting forth the doctrine of salvation (1-8), he went on to show that it was the fulfilment of the doctrine of the prophets (10-12). Now, after writing about the new life of Christians (13-22), and showing that it also had been promised in prophecy (21), he bids his readers in the half-playful language of metaphor (cp. Heb 5:12-14) to live simply, like new-born babes, nourished on simple, spiritual food, which the Lord Himself gives them, as has been signified in OT. (2:1-3). He then shows that the Lord named in his quotation has been manifested in Jesus Christ, who is the corner-stone, spoken of in the Psalm, of the spiritual Temple which is being built up of His people to take the place of the old Jewish Temple with its imperfect sacrifices (2:4-6). Obedience to the faith, not privilege of race, is the means by which this union with Christ in the new Temple is effected (2:7). Finally, he brings title after title of the chosen people from OT., and applies them to his readers, teaching them how their new position makes them God's royal priests and prophets to the world, and closes with a quotation from Hosea, the prophet of God's loving-kindness, which must touch their hearts, and commend all that he has said (2:9).

1. Malice] RV 'wickedness.' A general word, as, beginning a new life, they must turn from worldly vices and become as little children (Mt 18:3). With this and the following v. cp. Jas 1:21. 2. The sincere milk of the word] RV 'The spiritual milk which is without guile.' Grow thereby] RV adds 'unto salvation,' which was omitted in the MSS which the AV translators followed. 3. If...ye have tasted, etc.] from Ps 34:8 : cp. Heb 6:4.

The Lord in the Psalm is Jehovah. As in other places in NT., words spoken of Him are applied to Christ, through whom God is manifested to man (Heb 10). 4. The references in this v., as in v. 7, are to Ps 118:22 : cp. St. Peter's speech, Ac 4:11. In v. 6 a passage from Isa 28:16, on the same subject, is quoted from the Septuagint. Precious] RM 'honourable,' in contrast to 'disallowed.' 5. Lively stones] RV 'living stones,' as in v. 4. The whole process of salvation is a process of life: cp. Jn 14:10 6:53 11:25 14:6 Ro 12:1 Heb 10:20 and 1Pet 1:23 (RM). Are built up] i.e. are being built up. 6. Wherefore] RV 'because.' 7. Which be disobedient] RV 'disbelieve.' 8. The reference is to Isa 8:14. Whereunto also they were appointed] as the words of Isaiah show. God has indeed appointed the disobedient unto stumbling, but also His royal priesthood for their recovery. 9. A chosen generation] RV 'an elect race' : cp. Isa 43:20. A peculiar people] RV 'a people for God's own possession' : cp. Ex 19:5. Praises] RV 'excellences.' AVmg. 'virtues' : cp. Phil 4:8 2Pet 1:4,5. St. Peter repeats the teaching of the prophet (cp. Isa 43:21) that men are elect, not for their own sakes only, but to be God's priests and prophets to the world, so as to tell of Him to others, and to present, as spiritual sacrifices, in union with the sacrifice of Christ, not only themselves (Ro 12:1), their praise and aims (Heb 13:15), but also the heathen (Ro 15:16; cp. Phil 2:17), whom they win for God. Into his marvellous light] in which God dwells. It is unapproachable (1Tim 6:16), yet He, with whom all things are possible, has called us into it : cp. Isa 57:15, and see on 5:10. 10. From Hos 1:6 2:19; cp. Ro 9:25,26.

2:11-4:11. With the word 'beloved,' St. Peter begins each of the two following divisions of his letter. The keynote to this division is given in the references to Christ as suffering patiently, for the sake of others, to take away sin, and as having triumphed through suffering. He is the example and protector of these sojourners, whose life among an estranged population is one of constant suffering, under which they ought to be patient, gentle, and good, holding faster to one another in love, not, however, forgetting that they live and suffer on behalf of the heathen among whom they dwell.

The whole may be subdivided into four parts: A, 2:11-14, introductory; B, 2:18-3:12, their duty as subjects—as, in particular, servants, wives, husbands; and again, in general, as members of a Christian community; C, 3:18-4:6, encouragement for their dangers and sufferings, the purpose of which is explained; D, 4:7-11, exhortation to a sober, spiritual, and loving Christian life, to the glory of God.
A. 211f. Introduction, which sketches the thought of the whole section.
11. Strangers (RV 'sojourners') and pilgrims] from Gn 238 and Ps 3912; cp. Heb 1112. Fleshly lusts] the desires of the body, which, though innocent when under restraint, were always a source of temptation among the heathen. 12. Conversation honest] RV 'behaviour seemly'; cp. 113. In the day of visitation] (from Isa 109) when God shall no longer overlook the heathen ignorance: cp. Ac 1730. Then the good lives of the Christians, even though seen in memory only, may help them at last to glorify God.

B. 218-312. The duties of the Christians, as a body and in particular classes.
B (i). 218-17. 'You are all subjects of the government, and must live as such. The government, though it might seem to be a mere human institution, is really created by God, and you see God's will working through it, as through the rest of the creation. God's will is that you should do well, and be at last delivered from the misconstructions of your ignorant neighbours. The government, by its repression of evil and encouragement of well-doing, is acting towards both these ends. When you recognise that such submission is submission to God's will, then submission becomes part of that freedom to which you have been brought by redemption—a freedom which those only know who have become slaves of God. This freedom obliges you to have a wide and noble rule of courtesy. Honour all men: only so can you keep the private rule of your community to love the brotherhood. In the same way honour to the king must follow fear towards God, by whom kings rule: as indeed Holy Scripture teaches you.'

With this paragraph cp. Ro 131-7 Tit314.
13. Ordinance] RM 'Gr. creation': cp. 419.
The king] i.e. the Roman emperor.
14. Governors] i.e. of provinces. 16. The licence of the heathen, unlike the freedom of the Christian, could be used as a cloak, or pretext, for wickedness (see RV); they would do what they chose, considering it no one's business but their own.

B (ii). 218-25. Another ordinance of man, yet also of God's creation, is the family, which includes servants, wives, and husbands. Hitherto in this section St. Peter has rather hinted at than spoken plainly of suffering. Now he comes to a class who are sufferers indeed—the slaves of the household. He makes no more complaint against slavery than against the emperor, but his tender heart goes out to these ill-treated slaves, and he honours them above all their fellow-Christians by presenting to them, as their example in a special manner. Christ suffering innocently, patiently, trustfully, offering Himself in His sufferings as a sacrifice for the sins of us all. Thus these slaves, who are, like Christ, despised and rejected, have a glory and grace which is specially their own, and are a special care of Christ.
19. Thankworthy] RV 'acceptable'; RM 'Gr. grace.' The Gk. for 'grace' and 'thankfulness' is the same. As joy in suffering partakes of the divine glory (cp. 18), so thankfulness and cheerfulness reflects the gracious light of God's countenance: see on 12.
22-25. This picture of Christ is taken from the description of the suffering servant of Jehovah in Isa 53. 24. Bare our sins...on] RM 'carried up...to.' A sacrificial term is here used: cp. Heb 727 928 1315. The tree] i.e. the Cross: cp. Dt 2122 1 Ac 530 1059 1320 Gal 313. 25. Shepherd] suggested by Isa 534. cp. Isa 4011 and 1 Pet 52. Bishop] RM 'overseer': cp. Ac 120 (AV and RM). The overseer or bishop is an officer of the Church in the Pastoral Epistles: cp. Ac 2028 Phil 11. Here the reference may be to the officer of the household who is set over the servants (cp. Lk 1242-46); he may have no interest in them except as chattels, but they have an unseen overseer who cares for their very selves.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF CHRIST'S PEOPLE, THOUGH THEY SHOULD SUFFER LIKE CHRIST
B (iii). 314. Another divinely created ordinance of man is marriage. One of the purposes of Christianity was to teach chivalry towards women: this is part of the 'grace' which men can exercise. But to this must correspond the modesty and graciousness of women. The Israelites had already been taught that; and women, when they enter the Christian society, become daughters of Abraham, heirs both of the honour and of the womanliness of the women of the Jewish Church. A quiet and holy married life tends like all other parts of Christian life, to the salvation of the heathen.

With this and the next paragraph cp. Eph 522-38 Col 316.
1. Likewise] cp. v. 7, the whole household is to be one family; the subjection of servants to masters has a like excellence with the subjection of wives to husbands. Without the word] Perhaps the Spirit of Christ pours itself abroad more widely than our interpretations allow' (Erasmus).
In that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit] RV 'in the incorruptible apparel of a meek and quiet...
3. 5 1 PETER 3. 18

spirit. 5. Trusted] RV 'hoped.' Hope, the Messianic spirit, was characteristic of the OT. saints. 6. Lord] RV 'lord'; cp. Gn 18:12.

Ye are] RV 'ye now are'; RM 'ye are become.' They became Abraham’s daughters when they became Christians, but, if they are to continue such, perseverance is required, which the coming persecution will make difficult; cp. 2Pet 1:5f. Afraid with any amazement] RV 'put in fear by any terror'; cp. Prov 3:26.

B (iv). 7. Husbands, in like manner, must be chivalrous and chaste. Nature itself teaches all men that, but Christians have a deeper insight into the grace and dignity of life, and an eternal hope in their marriage.

7. The weaker vessel] cp. 2 Cor 4:7 1 Th 4:4. It would appear from 2 Esdr 4:11 and 7:811 RV, that the human body is meant by 'the vessel.' The grace of life] is the loveliness, partaking of the divine, which God adds to His servants’ life. That your prayers be not hindered] RV 'to the end that,' etc. Prayer is access to God, which is the aim of all Christian life. All faults in married life hinder it: cp. 1 Cor 7:5 Col 3:19.

B (v). 8-12. The general behaviour of the whole body of Christians is summed up in the love which makes them consider others more than themselves, hold fast together in their brotherhood, and be patient towards those without. By peace-making they inherit the blessing which was promised to them in the Psalm.

With this paragraph cp. Ro 12:14-21 and Jas 3.

8. Having compassion one of another] RV 'compassionate'; RM 'Gr. sympathetic'; cp. Heb 4:10 10:34. Tenderness towards even the feelings of others is implied.

10-12. Quoted from Ps 34, in v. 8 of which blessing is promised to the man that is trusted in God. The whole Psalm promises salvation in persecution, and describes just the situation in which St. Peter’s faith sees his readers placed—in danger, but with the angel of the Lord encamping round about them, and all things working out a blessing for them if they trust in Him.

11. Eschew] RV 'turn away from.' Eschew] RV 'pursue.' 12. Over . . . against] RV 'upon . . . upon.' God’s aspect is the same to each, it is man who turns ‘grace’ into ‘wrath’: cp. Ex 14:24.

C (i) 3:18-22, deals chiefly with faith, (ii) 4:1-6 with conduct. It brings out deeper and deeper doctrine as it proceeds about the purpose and meaning of suffering. ‘Who will harm you if you are zealous for the good? Even if you should suffer for the righteous cause you would be blessed. Take the ancient encouragement of Israel to yourselves. Enter into its fullest meaning by using the interpretation of the old words which Christ’s life has given, and sanctify Him in your hearts, though in visible form you cannot see Him, as the Lord of whom the Psalmist spoke. Be ready to give answer to any one that asks you about this hope which is in you, and which seems so strange to him; but answer meekly, and remember that though you need not fear him, you do fear God. Have therefore a good conscience. Your own hope will die away if you have not that, but with it you will find that the very slanders you suffer from will turn out to be the means of doing good to your enemies. Even as Christ did, for He suffered, the just for the unjust, that He might thus bring us who were among the unjust to God. His sufferings were the means of His doing so. Through suffering death in His flesh He entered into a wider life in His spirit, and went a journey that none could go in the flesh, and as a spirit preached to spirits. For us another way of salvation is appointed. The time when those spirits lived on earth prefigured the times of Christ. As then God prepared a place of safety from destruction, by directing Noah to build an ark into which eight persons were brought into safety through the dangerous waters of the flood, so now we have the fellowship of Christ into which we are brought by baptism, that is, through the resurrection of Christ which was the outcome of His painful death. Baptism, itself a painful step for the convert in a heathen land to take, is indeed our sharing in Christ’s death and resurrection; not so, however, if we look upon it as a mere form, but truly so, if we receive it with a good conscience, which, as we submit to the symbolic washing, appeals to God to accept it through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who has completed His redeeming work by ascending into heaven in the perfection of His human and divine nature, and sits supreme, as the Psalmist prophesied, at the right hand of God.’

14. If ye suffer] RV 'if ye should suffer.' The persecution has not yet begun: cp. v. 17.

15. Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts] RV 'sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord'; cp. Isa 8:12f.

17. If the will of God be so] RV 'if the will of God should so will’—a rugged but emphatic expression. 18. Once] i.e. once for all: cp. Heb 9:26, 28. That he might bring us to God] cp. Ro 5:2. Access to God was the end to which all the Levitical sacrifices were directed, but till Christ offered Himself this end was never attained; as the Epistle to the Hebrews teaches, Quickened] i.e. made to live. By the Spirit] RV 'in the spirit.' This fuller life came to Christ through, or in the sphere of, His human spirit: cp. 46 Lk 23:46.
THE SECURITY OF THE FAITHFUL IN THE APPROACHING JUDGMENT

C (ii). 4:1-6. This is your faith: live then in accordance with it. Arm yourselves against your troubles by resolving to be like Christ in suffering. Suffering gives rest from sin, and the results of what you have already endured should be a life henceforth in accordance with God’s will. You have lived the heathen life long enough in the past to have learnt its wretchedness. The heathen are surprised now at your estrangement from them, and speak evil of you and of God. But think not that it is as they say, and that no one cares how a man lives. They shall give account to Him who is judging promptly and certainly as each man makes his choice, whether he be living or dead. For even the dead have had their chance. That was why the gospel was preached even to the dead, that they might be able through judgment to enjoy life.’

3. Will] RV ‘desire,’ contrasted with the will of God. 4. Speaking evil of you] ‘Of you,’ as RV shows, is not in the Gk. These men spoke the same kind of blasphemy as the mockers in 2 Pet 3:3.

6. This v. refers back to 3:18. The dead are the same persons in each place. Judgment does not mean punishment, but separation, and man, by choosing His side, cooperates with God’s judgment. This choice and separation could not, St. Peter considers, be made until the gospel had been heard. Thus the judgment of these dead men did not take place till Christ preached in the spirit to them. Then they could choose their side, for or against Him. St. Peter, however, does not claim to penetrate the depths of the mystery of judgment, and leaves the subject with a statement containing, like that of St. Paul in Phil 1:22, two parts which we cannot reconcile, but which he assures us will be reconciled— they must be judged as all men must, in the flesh, i.e. by what they did in their earthly life, and yet they may live, as God lives, in the spirit, i.e. by the choice they make in their disembodied state.

D. 4:7-11. ‘But all these present judgments are about to be completed by that great judgment which is the end of the whole present order of things. Be then sober, diligent,
8. Have fervent charity] RV 'being fervent in your love,' lit. 'intense;' perseverance and vigour, not exciting, is implied.

Shall cover the multitude of sins] 'coveath a multitude of sins,' from Prov 10:12, which is also quoted Jas 5:19. St. Peter gives, following our Lord’s teaching (cp. Lk 7:47), a deeper meaning to the OT. words. If the Christians have love, they are not likely to have much sin among them: cp. Heb 6:14.

Let him speak as the oracles of God] RV ‘speaking as it were oracles of God,’ i.e. God’s solemn utterances, such as the prophets used to introduce by ‘thus saith the Lord.’ God’s oracles had always been entrusted to His people to minister to others: cp. Ac 7:38 Ro 3:2 Heb 5:12.

Amen] a Heb. word used by our Lord (and translated ‘verily’) when He wished to assert anything with special emphasis: cp. Mt 26:34 Lk 23:38. Such sayings might be called His ‘oracles.’

4:12–5:14. With this second ‘Beloved’ the last section of the Epistle begins. In it the Apostle encourages the readers to meet with courage and trust the severer persecution which is threatening them. As good discipline in their community will help them to do this, he gives precepts for rulers and ruled, and then brings their thoughts back to God the Father, in whose keeping their lives and the course of the whole world are secure. He adds a prayer to God for His support, and ends with greetings and a blessing.

The section falls into five parts: A, 4:12-19, the fiery trial; B, 5:1-6, discipline; C, 5:6-11, trust and hope in God; D, 5:12-14a, greetings; E, 5:14b, blessing.

4. 4:12-19. ‘Beloved, the trial that is coming is not a strange one for Christians to endure, for it will prove you as God’s gold must be proved, and will enable you to share Christ’s sufferings and glory—that glory which is surrounding you even now, though you cannot see it yet. Suffering and reproach for the name of Christ are blessings: like Israel of old you thus partake in the lot and in the spirit of God’s Anointed One. If they call you Christians in mockery, be worthy of that holy name, and give them no more real cause of offence. Judgment is about to begin, as it did at the fall of Jerusalem, from the house of God. You are that house, do not risk by disobedience the more fearful fate of those outside it. Those who suffer according to support: but, I insist, let it be in well-doing.’

CHAPTER 5

ENCOURAGEMENTS TO SHEPHERDS AND TO FLOCK. PROMISE OF GOD’S PROTECTION.

FAREWELLS

B. 5:1-6. ‘To behave well in this trial you must preserve discipline. Let old and young, rulers and ruled, do their duty in love and humility, as men who have an eternal hope and a supreme invisible Lord.’

A crown] RV ‘the crown,’ i.e. the wreath with which victors in such a contest as these elders expect to endure, may hope to be crowned: cp. 1 Cor 9:25 2 Tim 2:5 4:8 Rev 2:10.

5. Ye younger… the elder] in the early Christian communities their actual age was a reason for the respect which the clergy received (1 Tim 4:12, 1:5 Philemon v. 9). Be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility] RV ‘gird yourselves with humility, to serve one another.’ An unusual word is used here, which might be translated ‘knot round you.’ Does St. Peter remember the Lord washing His disciples’ feet with the towel knotted round Him (Jn 13:4)? God resisteth, etc.] from Prov 3:4, quoted also in Jas 4:6.

C. 5:6-11. ‘Humble yourselves, therefore, under the hand of God, whose might will be proved in the coming trial. Trust is part of humility. You have been taught to cast your burden of anxiety upon God (cp. Ps 55:22): cast it all. Watch well. The real adversary you have to guard against is the great accuser, who with restless activity (cp. Job 17:22) seeks to terrify you into your ruin. Resist him bravely in the trustful faith that your brothers throughout this world are joined with you in accomplishing the one divine purpose of all these sufferings. The trial, though sharp, is short, and through it God, whose gracious face is ever turned to you, and whose supremacy is eternal, shall bring you to perfection and security.

D. 5:12, 13. 'By Silvanus I have written this letter to you. I recommend him to you as one whom I account worthy to be called the faithful brother. The letter is a short one; for, indeed, my affectionate exhortation, and my testimony as an Elder and Apostle can all be put thus briefly. The true grace of God is manifested in the faithful conduct I have prescribed for you: stand fast therein. The people of God who are in this city like the captives in Babylon, yet in the purpose of God are one with you, send greeting, so does Mark, my spiritual son. Salute one another with the kiss which is the symbol of our Christian love.'

12. Silvanus] called Silas in Acts; the friend of St. Paul: see Ac 15, 16, 17 and 18, 2 Cor 1:10 1 Th 1:1 2 Th 1:1. Wherein ye stand] RV 'stand ye fast therein': cp. Gal 5:1. 13. The church that is at Babylon] RV 'She that is in Babylon'; RM 'That is, The church, or, The sister.' The community, not a person, is probably meant: cp. 2 Jn 1. The Gk. has simply 'the.' Marcus] RV 'Mark.' John Mark the evangelist is no doubt meant, who became, according to tradition, St. Peter's companion and interpreter. My son] cp. 1 Tim 1:2, 18 2 Tim 1:2 Gal 4:19.

E. 5:14. Final blessing in which St. Peter uses the old Hebrew prayer for peace. This was the blessing he had heard his Lord use: cp. Mt 10:12f. Mk 5:34 Lk 21:14, 29 Jn 20:19, 21, 22.

In Christ Jesus] RV 'Christ.' 'Christ Jesus,' so frequent in St. Paul's Epistles, is not used by St. Peter. For 'in Christ' see Intro. Amen] RV omits.

2 PETER AND JUDE

INTRODUCTION

1. Connexion of 2 Peter and Jude, and difference between them. These Epistles are closely connected. Both were written to meet a sudden danger to the faith which had arisen in some unnamed Churches. Both authors seem to have intended to write an ordinary pastoral letter. St. Jude says so (v. 3 RV), and in 2 Pet part of the intended letter is given (c. 3). Both, however, have been compelled by the sudden peril to send a special warning. It seems plain that one had read the letter of the other, or even that the first letter had opened the eyes of the second writer to the danger.

Yet the one Epistle is by no means a mere repetition of the other. St. Jude writes with a stern sense of honour, and the joy of a theologian in the deep mysteries of the creed. 'Contend for the faith once for all (RV) delivered' is his command, which, however, he softens with a touch of pity here and there for those who are falling. The enemies of the faith he scorches too much to allow them the name of teachers. The author of 2 Pet has a simpler mind, though by no means a less thorough faith in Christ as God. 'Hope on and do your duty more and more' is his message. The tone of almost diffident love and admiration with which he speaks of St. Paul (3:15, 16) gives us a glimpse into a very gentle heart.

2. Connexion between 2 Peter and 1 Peter. Which letter was written first? Most say St. Jude's. This is partly because there would otherwise be little original matter in his Epistle; but if the need were urgent he would not have delayed in order to be original. There are, however, some things in 2 Pet which tend to raise suspicion that it is not only founded upon Jude, but is a much later piece, written not by, but only in the name of, St. Peter. Thus the prophecy about the mockers in 2 Pet 3:2 looks as if it were designed as an imaginary explanation of the reference to such a prophecy in Jude vv. 17f. But the passage takes another colour in RV; it is itself a reference to a prophecy. Again, the references to events in the life of St. Peter in 2 Pet 1 (vv. 14, 16-18) are perhaps more obvious than natural; yet St. Peter might have written in this way. The style of 2 Pet differs from that of 1 Pet: but again, this may be accounted for by the difference in subject, or perhaps by a change of secretary. Resemblances in language between 2 Pet and 1 Pet must not be pressed too much in either direction, since an imitator might have designed them; or, if St. Peter did employ secretaries to shape his letters for him, mere resemblance in language would not be important. Resemblances of thought, which betray the mind of the author, would mean more, and there are such. No one can fail to notice that, while in Jude there are several thoughts and expressions which remind us of the deep and mysterious mind of St. Paul; in 2 Pet, as in 1 Pet, spite of many resemblances to St. Paul in words, there is a marked difference in the habit of thought. The reference to St. Paul at the end of 2 Pet is just what the author of 1 Pet would agree with.

3. Ancient Opinion about Authorship of 2 Peter and Jude. Objections to Apostolic Authorship, especially of 2 Peter. The genuineness of both Epistles has been questioned even in early times. But the wide acceptance of Jude at the beginning of the third century, justifies us in accepting with little hesitation the final verdict of the Church in its favour, especially as there is really nothing in it which might not have been written in the apostolic age. It is not quite the same with 2 Pet. Not only were doubts expressed in various places for a long time about it, but no certain traces of its existence can be found in Christian literature before the end of the second century. Yet this could be explained if the Epistle had but a small circulation in the earliest years, and in any case its peculiar subject and its shortness would prevent its being often quoted. If it could be proved that 2 Pet is copied in Jude, the whole aspect of the case would be changed, and the apostolic authorship would be supported by practically contemporary evidence. This cannot be proved, and a comparison of the two Epistles leaves a different impression on different minds. This, however, may be said. When one document is founded on another, the later one has generally been made smoother and clearer, and some rugged but forcible phrases have been lost in the process. It looks as if this might have happened in the composition of Jude: cp., for instance, 2 Pet 2:17 with Jude vv. 12f. Here Jude is certainly smoother and clearer, but the fine expression ‘mists driven by a storm’ (RV) is wanting. In 2 Pet the sentence ends awkwardly but forcibly with ‘for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved,’ where the antecedent to ‘whom’ is not ‘springs’ or ‘mists,’ but ‘these men.’ In Jude this fits easily and obviously into the sentence through the addition of ‘wandering stars.’

Even granting this, however, we should still have a difficulty about the date. The Jude who wrote the Epistle does not call himself an Apostle, but ‘brother of James.’ He was, therefore, the Jude who was one of the brothers of the Lord (Mt 13:55 Mk 6:3). He may have lived till about 80 A.D. But tradition says that St. Peter was put to death by Nero about the same time as St. Paul. Now if 2 Pet 3:1—

‘this is the second epistle that I write unto you—is really a reference to our First Epistle, and if 1 Pet was written during the Neronian persecution, it is strange, but not impossible, that a letter so different, and dealing with a danger almost incompatible with the danger of persecution which the First Epistle foretells, should have been written almost directly afterwards to the same readers. We do not know for certain that St. Peter did not live longer—even much longer, and we cannot be sure that the reference is not to quite another Epistle, written to different people, earlier in St. Peter’s life. Then 2 Pet would be earlier than 1 Pet, which, however, is not an easy supposition to those who notice affinities between 2 Pet and the Pastoral Epistles.

4. If copied from Jude, 2 Peter was probably written in the second century, yet in good faith. If it could be proved that 2 Pet was copied from Jude, it would be almost necessary to think that it is a work of the second century, written in the Apostle’s name. No fraud need have been designed. The book would be a kind of religious fiction, intended for the instruction of readers who would be interested, but not deceived, by the imaginary setting. It must be remembered that this was what many in the early Church did believe it to be. There are, however, many such works, not a few being in St. Peter’s name, and the difference in earnestness and spiritual power between the best of them and 2 Pet is remarkable. If 2 Pet is a fiction, it alone among such works carries with it the distinction of the apostolic age. The question cannot be decided on the limited evidence we have. The doubts of the early Church, and the probable silence of the first and second centuries, are not to be disregarded; on the other hand, the critical suspicions of our own age ought not by themselves to be allowed an exaggerated importance.
2 PETER

The Epistle falls into three divisions: c. 1, Introduction; c. 2, warning against the false teachers; c. 3, answer to the mockery of those who denied the Second Coming of Christ.

CHAPTER 1
GREETING. THANKSGIVING. EXHORTATION TO PROGRESS IN RIGHTEOUSNESS FROM ONE WHO REMEMBERS JESUS CHRIST

C. I may be subdivided into two parts: (a) vv. 1–11, greeting followed by a declaration of the glory and virtue of the Christian life, which is a life of continual growth and progress, and requires diligent effort in those who would lead it; (b) vv. 12–21, declaration of the Apostle’s care and authority to provide for his readers’ remembrance of these truths—he, who saw the glory of the Transfiguration, is certain of the present power and future return of Jesus Christ, and his testimony completes the testimony of prophecy.

1. Simon] RM ‘Symeon,’ the more distinctly Jewish form of the name: cp. Ac 15:14. God and our Saviour Jesus Christ] RV ‘our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.’ Both titles are given to Christ: cp. Ro 9:5, Heb 1:8, and Tit 2:13 (RV). 2. His divine power] i.e. Christ’s: cp. 1:18. Him that hath called us] i.e. the Father, as in 1 Pet 5:10. To glory and virtue] RM ‘through glory and virtue.’ The Christian advances towards the eternal kingdom through an earthly life which is touched with the divine glory and virtue. 4. Whereby] i.e. by glory and virtue. Might be] RV ‘may become’; such partaking is not yet completed.

5. And beside this, giving all diligence] RV ‘Yea, and for this very cause adding on your part all diligence.’ God has granted all things, and for that very reason we must be diligent: cp. v. 10 and Phil 2:12. Virtue must answer to glory, duty to grace. All this is just in the spirit of 1 Pet 1. Add to your faith virtue] RV ‘in your faith supply virtue’: cp. v. 11 (RV). The Christian life is not a mere adding of qualities together, but a growth. Virtue is in faith, as the flower is in the seed; the complete fruit is love: cp. 1 Tim 1:5. 6. Temperance] RM ‘self-control.’ 7. Brotherly kindness] RV ‘love of the brethren,’ i.e. the Christians: cp. 1 Pet 3:8. Charity] RV ‘love,’ which goes beyond the Christian circle to God and all that He has made.

9. Blind, and cannot see far off] As in 1 Pet 1:8, the first statement is less exact than the second. He who cares not to progress loses his spiritual vision; the cleansing he received in baptism, and the eternal kingdom into which he is entering, are out of his sight.

11. An entrance . . . ministered . . . abundantly] RV ‘the entrance . . . richly supplied’: cp. Col 1:13. Life is a progress into that eternal kingdom to which we already belong.

12. The present truth] RV ‘the truth which is with you.’ 13. Tabernacle] or ‘tent,’ i.e. the body (cp. 2 Cor 5)—a fit thought for those who are sojourners and pilgrims on earth: cp. 1 Pet 1:11. 14. Shortly must put off this my tabernacle] RV ‘the putting off of my tabernacle cometh swiftly.’ His death was to be violent, and therefore sudden: cp. Jn 21:18. There will be no time then for admonitions, therefore he will be diligent now, and will leave his words in writing, that they may help the readers after his decease. This word, like ‘tabernacle,’ reminds us of the Transfiguration (cp. Lk 9:31), of which the Apostle goes on to speak. The reference in v. 15 seems to be to more than this one letter. Tradition says that St. Mark gave St. Peter’s teaching in his Gospel, and this Gospel may be the promised means of remembrance.

16. Coming] i.e. Second Coming, in that glory of which a glimpse was given at the Transfiguration.

19. We have also a more sure word of prophecy] RV ‘And we have the word of prophecy made more sure,’ i.e. OT. prophecy, which is confirmed by this sight and sound: cp. 3:2. A light that shineth in a dark place] RM ‘a lamp shining in a squalid place.’ The word ‘squalid’ prepares the reader for the bad state of things described in the next c. Until the day dawn, etc.] cp. Song 2:16. 6. The Second Coming of Christ is meant.

20f. God gave prophecy of old, not to this or that man, but to the whole Jewish Church; so now it belongs to, and must be interpreted by, the whole Church, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, not by the private, contested opinions of individuals.

CHAPTER 2
WARNING AGAINST A THREATENED PLAGUE OF BRUTAL FALSE TEACHERS

As of old there were false as well as true prophets, so it will be now. This leads the Apostle to speak about the false teachers, who—if they have not already begun—he expects will trouble his readers. Prophets were important persons in the early Church: cp. Ac 11:27; 1 Cor 12:28f.; 14:29f.; Eph 2:20; 3:4–11. These teachers, who had doubtless been baptized, claimed, it would seem, to be propheta, and therefore to be outside ordinary rules and discipline: they put up a 'private interpretation' on such matters. Hence they fell into the sin of pride, and rebelled against official authority; and of lust and covetousness, despising the laws of morality. The Apostle shows, by the example of the angels that sinned, and of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, that sure punishment is ready for them, but that God will preserve the faithful from their seductions. He writes in strong but very spiritual language, and is in accord with the rest of the NT. in teaching that the destruction of the unrepentant sinner is continuance in sin: see vv. 12f. (RV), 19f.; and cp. Mk 3:29 (RV) Ro 1:28 2Th 2:11f. (RV) Heb 6:6.

This c. should be carefully compared with St. Jude's Epistle.

1. Damnable heresies] RV 'destructive heresies.' The word 'heresy' is passing here from its older meaning of a 'school' or 'sect' (RM) to the modern meaning of 'false doctrine': cp. Ac 24:14 1 Cor 11:19 Gal 5:20. Even denying the Lord] RV 'denying even the Master'; their evil lives were a denial of Christ's authority. 2. Pernicious ways] RV 'lascivious doings.' 3. Damnation] RV 'destruction': cp. v. 12, 37. With the rude but vigorous style of this and other vv. in the c. cp. 1Pet 3:17. St. Jude is more polished, but less strong.

4. The Apostle here follows Jewish tradition (cp. Rev 20:13), as it is given in the book of Enoch, from which St. Jude expressly quotes. 5. Noah the eighth person] RV 'Noah with seven others': cp. 1Pet 3:20. 6. Neither here nor elsewhere in Holy Scripture is it said that these cities were submerged. Zeph 2:9 is against such a belief. 7. Vexed with the filthy conversation] RV 'sore distressed by the lascivious life.' 9. Unto the day of judgment to be punished] RV 'under punishment unto the day of judgement.' God's punishment is remedial, and this v. gives just a gleam of hope for the false teachers.

11. Comparison with Jude v. 9 would suggest that the Apostle is here too referring to an apocryphal book, but if we did not know that Epistle we should more naturally think of Job 1 or Zech 3.

12. Natural brute beasts, made to be taken] RV 'creatures without reason, born mere animals to be taken.' Shall utterly perish in their own corruption, and shall receive the reward of unrighteousness] RV 'shall in their destroying surely be destroyed, suffering wrong as the hire of wrongdoing.'

13. Sporting themselves with their own deceivings] RV 'revelling in their love-feasts.' Such a love-feast or common meal of the Christians is described in 1Cor 11:28f. The abuses for which the Corinthians were rebuked led to the separation of the Holy Communion from such feasts. But though St. Jude has 'love-feasts' in the parallel passage, it is more than possible that 'deceivings'-of AV and RM is right here. The Gk. words only differ by two letters, and if St. Jude used this Epistle he might well correct a difficult to a seemingly easy expression.

14. Cursed children] RV 'children of cursing,' a Hebrew mode of expression: cp. 1Pet 1:14; it means that their whole character is worthy of execration. 15. Besor] RV 'Beor,' as in Nu 22:5. Balaam, as we learn from Rev 2:14, taught Balak to try and ruin the Israelites by tempting them to uncleanness, and Balak had already offered him rewards (Nu 22:7, 17). Thus he was like the false teachers in two respects. 16. Forbad] RV 'stayed.'

17. Wells without water, etc.] RV 'springs without water, and mists driven by a storm; for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved.' The false teachers are as disappointed as springs without water, or as mists which promise moisture but are scattered by the wind: cp. Wis 24 and Eph 4:14. The Day of the Lord will come to them, as Joel saw it (Joel 2:11), 'with clouds and thick darkness—a storm which will truly satisfy the thirsty land: see Intro.

18. Through much wantonness] RV 'by lasciviousness.' The repetition of this word points to the character of the false teachers. Repetition of this kind is frequent in 1Pet.

Those that were clean escaped] RV 'those who are just escaping'; i.e. those who have become Christians, but are not far advanced in the Christian life; 'new-born babes,' as they are called in 1Pet., who have still to 'grow unto salvation.' 19. Cp. Jn8:58 Ro 6:14.

CHAPTER 3

ANTIDOTE AGAINST DESPISING THE DAY OF THE LORD. EXHORTATION. DOXOLOGY

C. 3 may be subdivided into three parts: (a) vv. 1-7. This Second Epistle is a reminder of what prophets and apostles have said. Those who would understand it must first know that, though mockers will deny this, there will be an end of the present world by fire, as once it was overwhelmed by water. This will be a day of judgment and destruction for the ungodly. (b) vv. 8-13. As for the delay, which induces some to doubt this, time to God is not what it is to us, and His delay is due to His longsuffering will that men should be saved. When the day does come, it will be sudden, and since it is surely approaching, we ought to be preparing the way for it by holy living. (c) vv. 14-18. Be holy then, and consider that God's longsuffering is a means of attaining spiritual health. This is the teaching of St. Paul's letters, though some mischievously pervert their meaning. Do you keep free from error and grow in grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ, to whom be glory now and when that day of eternity shall come.' The mockers may be different persons, but are probably the same as the false teachers. Here, as in c. 2, the Apostle speaks of an evil which is expected in the future, but of which he already sees the signs: cp. Ac 20:30, I Tim 4:1-5, 2 Tim 3:1-9.

1. This second epistle... I now write] RV 'This is now... the second epistle that I write': see Intro. Your pure minds by way of remembrance] RV 'your sincere mind by putting you in remembrance.'

2. Us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour] RV 'of the Lord and Saviour through your apostles.' Prophets of old and Apostles now have alike uttered the commandment of Christ: cp. 1 Pet 1:11ff.

5. Willingly are ignorant of] RV 'wilfully forget.' That by the word of God, etc.] RM 'that there were heavens from of old, and an earth compacted out of water and through water, by the word of God' (cp. Gn 1:2); a thing is made both out of and through its material. What the mockers forgot was that God who made can also break up what He has made by His word. Note the emphatic position: cp. Heb 11:3.

6. Whereby] i.e. by means of the water and of the word: cp. v. 7, 'word' and 'fire.'

8. Be not ignorant] RV 'forget not': cp. v. 5. Another characteristic repetition.

That one day, etc.] from Ps 90:4. 9. Not willing] RV 'not wishing'; in spite of this different word we are reminded of 1 Tim 2:4.

10. As a thief in the night] cp. 1 Th 5:2. RV 'as a thief': cp. Mt 24:43. All through this passage the Apostle has in mind the prophecy of our Lord which is recorded in that c. The elements] the parts into which we might, roughly speaking, divide the world, e.g. earth, sea, sky. But the heavenly bodies (RM) may be meant. The works that are therein] i.e. the processes of nature. Hence the expression, 'shall be discovered' (RM), is quite appropriate: cp. 1 Pet 1:17.

11. Conversation] RV 'living.' 12. Hastening] RV 'earnestly desiring,' RM 'hastening.' It is written in the Talmud, 'If Jews exercised penitence for one day, Messiah would straightway come.' Wherein] RV 'by reason of which.' The Day of God is the cause. 'There will be a judgment,' not, 'the world will come to an end,' is the point of this c.

That ye may be found] the same word as that which is translated 'discovered' in v. 10 (RM). There may be a reference back to it: whatever the earth and the works therein may be found to be, take care that you are found in peace.

15. Hath written] RV 'wrote.' Such teaching is found in Romans and in the Pastoral Epistles (Ro 2:4; cp. Ac 17:30, 1 Tim 2:4), but the letters referred to in this v. may not be preserved in our collection of St. Paul's Epistles. As the author of this Epistle has noticed, patience and confidence in God's patient working out of His purpose is everywhere characteristic of St. Paul.

16. The other Scriptures] RV '... scriptures.' The Scriptures proper of the Apostolic Church were the books of the OT. But the letters of the Apostles were read publicly in the churches to whom they were addressed, and in others: see Col 4:10. Hence they would gradually come to be called 'scriptures' also. Here, as perhaps in 2 Tim 3:16, we discern the beginning of this habit.

18. Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of] RV 'grow in the grace and knowledge of.' Grace is the gift of, as knowledge is directed towards, Christ. 'Grow' sums up in one word the admonitions of 1 and 2 Pet. For ever] RM 'unto the day of eternity.' This is the goal of hope in both Epistles.
1 JOHN

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship. The question is bound up with that of the authorship of the other Johannine books, both as regards internal and external evidence: see especially Introductions to the Gospel and to the Second and Third Epistles.

(a) Internal Evidence. The witness of the book itself to its authorship is sufficiently strong. The writer speaks with authority, as an Apostle would. He claims to have first-hand knowledge of the facts which underlie the gospel message (1:3). The tone and teaching of the letter suit the circumstances to which Christian tradition assigns it; they are such as we should expect from the aged St. John, writing to his disciples a last message regarding the truths enshrined in his Gospel.

When the Epistle is compared with the Gospel of St. John, the conclusion that the two books are the work of one hand is well-nigh irresistible. The style, the language, the thought of the Epistle reflect the features of the corresponding elements of the Gospel. The resemblance and agreement between the two are so great and so consistent as to establish, to the satisfaction of most minds, an identity of authorship.

Of these resemblances, the most obvious are certain verbal correspondences of language, of which the following examples will repay comparison. (1) Characteristic words used in a peculiar sense: ‘life’ (1:1, 2, 3, 14; cp. Jn 14:6, 51); ‘light’ (1:5, 7, 8; cp. Jn 14:5, 7-9); ‘darkness’ (1:1, 6, 21; cp. Jn 8:12, 12, 29); ‘world’ (1:17; 4:1, 5; cp. Jn 10:12, 31, 14:17). (2) Characteristic expressions: ‘eternal life’ (1:1, 3, 15; cp. Jn 3:15, 16, 6:30, 17, 9); ‘a new commandment’ (2:8; cp. Jn 13:34); ‘only begotten Son’ (4:9; cp. Jn 1:18, 316); ‘know God’ (2:3, 4, 6; cp. Jn 17:3, 25); ‘abide in Christ’ (2:3, 34; cp. Jn 6:56, 15:4, 5). (3) Identical phrases: ‘that your joy may be full’ (1:4; cp. Jn 16:24); ‘walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth’ (2:11; cp. Jn 12:26); (are) ‘passed from death unto life’ (3:14; cp. Jn 5:24); ‘know him that is true’ (5:20 (RV); cp. Jn 17:3). Besides these and other like examples, a general similarity of style and thought gives evidence almost the strongest of its kind to show that if St. John wrote the Gospel which bears his name, he wrote the Epistle also.

(b) External Evidence. The witness afforded by the book itself to its authorship is amply supported by the testimony of ancient writers. The Epistle is evidently quoted (though without mention of the fact) by Polycarp (116 A.D.), who was, according to Irenæus, a disciple of St. John. It was used, Eusebius tells us, by Papias (120 A.D.), an associate of Polycarp, also said to have been a hearer of St. John. It is quoted and referred to as St. John’s Epistle by Irenæus (180 A.D.), Polycarp’s disciple, by Clement of Alexandria (190 A.D.), Tertullian (200 A.D.), Origen (230 A.D.), and others.

2. Date and Destination. These questions are involved in more uncertainty, though fairly satisfactory inferences regarding them may be drawn both from tradition and from the book itself.

(a) When was it written? St. John is said to have written his Gospel at Ephesus (Iren. ‘Adv. Haer.’ iii. 1, 1), probably between 80 and 90 A.D. As to the date of the Epistle we have no direct evidence. It is commonly believed, however, that the two writings are closely connected in time; the prevailing opinion perhaps being that the Epistle was written subsequently to the Gospel, whether as a supplement or as an independent composition.

The idea of an original connection with the Gospel has been supposed to find support from the place which the Epistle occupies in the Muratorian Fragment on the Canon (circ. 170), a witness for the authenticity of the Epistle not included in the authorities mentioned above. In this document, which contains (incomplete in its extant form, as the name implies) an annotated list of the books of the New Testament, the First Epistle of St. John is placed directly after the Gospel, and not with the two minor Epistles. This, it has been conjectured, was the position which it originally occupied as a supplement or postscript to the Gospel, and from which it was subsequently removed when the books of the New Testament were grouped in their present order. However this may be, as the Epistle contains no reference to persecutions, such as took place during the reigns of Domitian and Trajan, it can hardly have been issued much later than 90 A.D.

(b) For what Readers was it intended? In this there is involved a prior question as to the character of the composition itself. Is it an Epistle at all? Of all the New Testament Epistles, this and the Epistle to the Hebrews alone begin without any epistolary form of address. Moreover, this contains no salutations or messages to individuals, such as are found in Hebrews and in nearly all the other Epistles. Some, therefore, have regarded it as a treatise rather than a letter.

While, however, this book is not written in epistolary form, it contains the substance of an Epistle. Its epistolary character is also seen in the constant use of the second person (13 and onwards), the terms 'little children,' 'fathers,' 'young men,' 'beloved,' by which the readers are addressed, and the frequent use of the expression, 'I write unto you' (212-14 32, etc.). The opinion, therefore, is probably not far wrong which regards the work as a pastoral or circular letter, addressed to the Churches in the province of Asia with which St. John is definitely connected in ch. 1 of the Apocalypse, and having reference primarily to the peculiar circumstances of those Churches and the particular spiritual dangers to which they were exposed.

At the same time, the absence of local colour makes it possible that a wider circle is addressed. It is most natural, however, to infer a distinctly Gentile community, as well from the warning against idolatry with which the book concludes as from the absence of the Hebrew element so manifest throughout the Gospel, and of any quotations from or allusions to the Old Testament.

3. Contents. The theme of the Epistle is fellowship with God: its object, to bring its readers into that fellowship and to secure them against losing it.

This purpose finds expression at the opening of the Epistle, and again near its close. 'That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full' (13-4). 'These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God' (518). There is thus a distinct difference between the object of the Epistle and that of the Gospel (see Jn 2031), the object of the one being to promote faith in Christ, that of the other to confirm the faith and develop the religious life of those who already believe.

The writer's thought revolves about certain fundamental watchwords regarding the nature of God. The three great watchwords which occupy the pivotal places in the plan of the Epistle (see analysis below) are, 'God is light,' 'God is righteous,' 'God is love.' Corresponding to these are the Christian graces of faith, obedience, love, and the Christian duties of confessing Christ, keeping the commandments, and loving the brethren. Together with the positive inculcation of these truths and duties is combined a recognition of their opposites. Underlying all the thought of the Epistle is the conception of the irreconcilable antagonism which exists between Christ and the world; hence the statement of truth or duty is strengthened or expanded by a denial of or warning against its opposite. The active presence of error and evil among those addressed accounts for the polemical element in the Epistle, and the warnings against evil influences and wrong ways of thinking and living with which it abounds.

The particular heresy which the writer combats appears to have been an incipient form of one of the various systems which, as developed in the 2nd cent., are included under the general name of Gnosticism, in all of which there was involved a denial of the reality of the Incarnation: cp. 42-2 Jn 7. This subject is more fully treated in Intro. to Second and Third Epistles. The polemical element is, however, subordinate to the main object of the Epistle, which is to promote the spiritual life of believers by bringing them into a living union with Christ and confirming them therein.

The plan of the Epistle is difficult to follow, and has been differently understood, some failing to recognise any regular plan at all. In the following Synopsis, the minor sections are grouped about the three fundamental statements mentioned above.

11-4. Introduction. The fundamental scheme of the Epistle: God manifested in Jesus Christ, that man may have fellowship with the Father through the Son.

15-28. 1. God is Light, hence fellowship with Him means walking in the light and realising a sense of brotherhood and the forgiveness of sins (v. 7).

(i) This involves, (a) confession of sin (vv. 8-10), (b) keeping His commandments (28-4), (c) in particular, loving the brethren (vv. 7-11).

(ii) (a) Reasons for writing, as regards the spiritual condition of the readers (vv. 12-16).

(b) Things and persons to avoid. (1) The love of the world (vv. 15-17). (2) Fellowship with false teachers (vv. 18-26).

(c) The believer's security and hope (vv. 27, 28).

1054
(i) Sonship a motive to righteousness (3-9).
(ii) Sonship the root of brotherly love (vv. 10-18).
(iii) Sonship resulting in glorious privileges:
   (a) assurance (vv. 19-21), (b) answer to prayer (v. 22), (c) fellowship, realised through the gift of the Spirit (v. 24), (d) discernment of truth and error (4-6).

47-512. III. God is Love, hence fellowship with Him involves walking in love (vv. 7, 8).

(i) How God’s love to us was manifested (vv. 9, 10).
(ii) Our rightful response to it, brotherly love (vv. 11, 12).
(iii) The proofs of fellowship, (a) the indwelling Spirit (v. 13), (b) confessing Jesus (vv. 14, 15), (c) abiding in love (v. 16).
(iv) Perfect love casts out fear (vv. 17, 18).
(v) Brotherly love the test of love to God (vv. 19-21).
(vi) Love finds expression in obedience (5-14).
(vii) Obedience rests on faith in and fellowship with Christ (vv. 5-12).

5-21. Conclusion.

(i) Reason for writing restated in different form (v. 13).
(ii) The assurance which believers may have: (a) of the efficacy of prayer (vv. 14-17), (b) of the guardianship of God (v. 18), (c) of divine sonship (v. 19), (d) of the reality of the divine manifestation and the fellowship resulting from it (v. 20).
(iii) Final warning (v. 21).

CHAPTER 2

THE ADVOCACY OF CHRIST AND THE OBLIGATIONS OF BELIEVERS

1. My little children] The diminutive implies the fatherly care which the aged Apostle felt for his disciples. Advocate] The word thus translated is used by St. John alone of the NT. writers. Elsewhere (Jn 14:16, 25 15:26 16:7) it is rendered ‘Comforter.’ Literally it means one who is called to the side of another for counsel and help. The rendering ‘Advocate’ suits the passages in the Gospel (see RM in loco). The Son and the Holy Spirit both act as Advocate with the Father: cp. Ro 8:30, 37, 34. The Redeemer’s work calls for the mercy which ‘rejoiceth against judgment.’

2. Propitiation] the act or offering which makes an injured person favourable to the offender. Christ is the propitiation as well as the propitiator: the offering itself as well as the sacrificing priest who makes it. The whole world] cp. Jn 1:29 4:24 17:20-23. The work of Christ was wrought for all, not for a chosen few. There are none who may not share its benefits if they will. 5. The love of God] i.e. man's love to God: cp. 4:12. An ideal condition is here presented. Perfect obedience is evidence of perfect love.

7. An old commandment] cp. 2 Jn v. 5. Old, because they have known it from the beginning of their Christian life. Which ye had from the beginning] RV 'which ye heard.'

8. A new commandment] The commandment of love, old as it now is in one sense, is in another new, as it ever gains fresh light and meaning. The darkness, etc.] RV 'the darkness is passing away, and the true light already shineth.' 10. Occasion of stumbling] lit. 'stumbling-block,' that which may cause himself or others to fall, in this case probably (see next v.) himself. Without love no one can walk in the light of God's truth.

12-14. In these vv. the readers are addressed, twice over, as (1) 'little children,' (2) 'fathers,' (3) 'young men.' Probably the first of these is the term of endearment already used (v. 1), including the whole community. Next, the 'old and the young are respectively addressed as 'fathers,' 'young men.' 'Corresponding to the two series of personal addresses is a change in the tense of the verb from 'I write' to 'I wrote,' or 'I have written': see RV, noting change in v. 13. Perhaps 'I write' refers to the Epistle, 'I wrote' to the Gospel; or else the change is made for variety, the present being used from the writer's standpoint, the past from that of the readers, when the message would reach them.

15. Love not the world] The 'world' here is not the world of nature, nor the world of humanity which 'God so loved' (Jn 3:16). It means all in the present order of things which appeals to the soul as an object of desire apart from and in rivalry to God. 16. All that is thus antagonistic to God is summed up under three heads, the separate avenues through which the world-spirit reaches the soul. While the classification is hardly exhaustive, as a category covering all kinds of evil it is very comprehensive, and corresponds to the three elements which appear in the temptation of Eve (Gn 3:19) and in the temptation of our Lord (Lk 4:8-12).

18. The last time] RV 'the last hour.' The Apostles undoubtedly anticipated a coming of Christ in the near future as a vital possibility, and all generations are enjoined by our Lord's teaching to do the same. The dispensation which immediately precedes that great event, the time of which is known only to the Father (Mk 13:32), is rightly called, whatever its length may prove to be, the 'last hour.' Antichrist shall come] RV 'Antichrist cometh.' The hostile influence described as Antichrist is further defined in v. 22, 4:2 Jn v. 7, as the Spirit which denies the Incarnation, and is regarded as a sign of the last days: cp. 2 Th 2:3-10. The term 'Antichrist' suggests the idea of opposition and rivalry to Christ. St. John regards as embodiments of this spirit all the false teachers who had already (v. 19) gone out from the Church because they did not really possess the Spirit of Christ.

20. An anointing] RV 'an anointing': cp. 2 Cor 1:12. Oil is the sacred symbol of the Spirit's operations. The anointing here represents the gift of the Spirit, whereby believers are endowed with spiritual discernment (Jn 14:26 16:13). The Holy one] probably Christ.

23. 'The denial of the Son involves the loss of the Father, not only because the ideas of sonship and fatherhood are correlative, but because the Son alone can reveal the Father.'

28. When he shall appear] RV 'if he shall be manifested.' The 'if' implies no doubt as to the fact, but only uncertainty as to the time. Confidence] RV 'boldness,' lit. 'freedom or readiness of speech.' 29. Is born of him] lit. 'hath been begotten from him.' The presence of righteous action is the sure sign of the reality of the divine birth' (Westcott).

CHAPTER 3

The Righteousness of God and the Duties and Privileges of Sonship

1. The sons of God] RV 'children of God,' adding the words, 'and such we are.' The word translated 'children' here is characteristic of St. John, and implies community of nature, whereas the term 'sons' as used by St. Paul suggests the privileged condition of heirship. 2. Note changes in RV. 3. This hope] of being hereafter like God in Christ. In him] RV 'set on him.' Purifeth himself] 'He who looks forward to becoming like God hereafter must strive after His likeness now.' (Westcott).

6. Sinnett not] That the possibility of sinlessness in present experience is not taught here is clear from 18,9. St. John's thought moves in the region of the ideal. The divine life and the life of sin are in idea mutually exclusive. Sin in the Christian is either involuntary or in acknowledged contradiction to the ruling principle of his life. The commission of it is to that extent a failure perfectly to abide in Christ. 8. He that committeth sin] RV 'he that doeth sin.' The present tense implies that which is habitual, which results from a ruling principle. 9. RV 'Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him.' The same principles of interpretation apply here as in the foregoing vv. A perfect realisation of the filial relationship to God excludes sin. His seed remaineth in him] The germinal principle from which his new life has sprung.
12. [Cain] The typical example of hatred, inspired by the Evil One, and resulting in murder, the germ of which is hatred (v. 15).

16. [Hereby perceive we the love of God] RV 'hereby know we love,' i.e. what love is.
He...we The pronouns are emphatic.

17. This world's good] RV 'the world's goods,' lit. 'the world's life,' i.e. that which supports life.

19. [Hereby] i.e. by loving in deed and truth. 20. In RV v. 19 ends with a comma, then follows, 'whereinsoever our heart condemn us; because God,' etc. God is greater] He is a more perfect judge. Are these words meant to inspire awe or to afford consolation? Is God regarded as more exacting or more merciful than conscience? Opinion is much divided. The contrast in v. 21 suggests the former alternative, but the whole context rather favours the latter. 'We shall then still our heart in whatsoever it may condemn us, because we are in fellowship with God, and that fact assures us of His sovereign mercy' (Westcott). 22. See 516.

24. The spirit which he hath given us] RV 'the Spirit which he gave us,' i.e. when we became Christians. The indwelling Spirit, from whom springs the Christian's love to God and man, is his assurance of fellowship with God. The test of having the Spirit of God, and not the spirit of Antichrist, is treated in the six following verses.

CHAPTER 4

FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD IN LOVE

1. [Try the spirit] RV 'Prove the spirita,' The verb is used of testing metals. 2. 3. See on 2Jn v. 7. 3. Confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh] RV 'confesseth not Jesus.' 4. He that is in the world] the Devil: cp. 310 Jn844 1231. 5. They] the false prophets. 6. We] the Christian teachers.

8. God is love] the third fundamental maxim (see Intro.). Love is not merely an attribute of God, it is His very Being. Hence to be without love is to be without God: cp. v. 16. 9. See Jn316. 11. We ought also] RV 'we also ought.' 12. Hath seen God] RV 'hath beheld God.' His love] i.e. our love to Him. If we love one another we have proof both of His presence with us and of our love to Him.

17. Herein is our love made perfect] RV 'herein is love made perfect with us,' i.e. in the double communion spoken of in the preceding v. As he is, so are we] We, as we are in this world, are like Christ, who shares our human nature. The sense of likeness to Him gives us confidence. 18. No fear in love] not the rightful awe which pertains to reverence, but servile or guilty fear. 19. We love him] RV 'we love.' Possibly the verb should be rendered 'let us love.'

CHAPTER 5

THE LOVE, OBEDIENCE, AND ASSURANCE OF BELIEVERS

1. The reason for brotherly love. 2. This is the converse of 419-21. Love to God and love to the brethren being inseparable, each is the test of the other. 4. Whosoever] not 'whosoever.' 'It is not the man, but his birth from God, which conquers' (Plummer).

6. This is he that came by water and blood] According to the most generally accepted interpretation of this difficult passage, the reference is primarily to our Lord's baptism in Jordan and His death upon the Cross—the baptism of water and the baptism of blood, which together sum up His redemptive work and represent its cleansing and atoning power. There is, perhaps, some allusion also to the 'blood and water' to which St. John bore witness at the Cross (Jn1934), besides a symbolical reference to the two sacraments.

7, 8. All the words between that bear record in v. 7 and the spirit in v. 8 are omitted in RV. It is quite certain that these words did not belong to the original text. They are found in no Gk. MS earlier than the 14th cent., and are quoted by none of the Fathers before the middle of the 5th cent. The Fathers understood the passage in its original form to symbolise the Trinity, an interpretation which may have been inserted at first as a marginal note and afterwards found its way into the text.

14, 15. The prayer of faith prevails when it is in accordance with God's will. Thus offered it is surely heard, and, though it may not have any visible effect, receives its answer. He who trusts God's love knows that the answer he receives is the best.

16, 17. There is a sin unto death] RM 'There is sin unto death,' not any special sin which can be recognised as 'unto death.' Sin cannot be divided into 'mortal' and 'venial' on the authority of this passage. Sin may be of such a character as to lead to total separation from Christ, which is spiritual death. 'Sin unto death' is not any act of sin, however heinous, but a state or habit of sin wilfully chosen and persisted in: it is constant and consummated opposition to God' (Plummer).

18. He that is begotten of God keepeth himself] RV 'he that was begotten of God (i.e. Christ) keepeth him.' 21. Taken comprehensively, this warning is directed against all that takes the place of God in man's affections.

If, as seems likely, the Epistle is St. John's latest work, these are, in point of time, the last words of Holy Scripture.
1. Authorship. The majority of the Epistles of the New Testament are catholic, that is, they are addressed not to individuals but to Churches of this and that locality. There are references to letters of this kind which are now lost. Thus St. Paul says, ‘I wrote unto you in an epistle not to keep company with fornicators’ (1 Cor 5:9). And he directs the Colossian Church to exchange Epistles with the Church at Laodicea (Col 4:17): this being the only mention we have of a Laodicean Epistle. But there are several private letters in the New Testament, each bearing the vivid stamp of an occasion. And these must have constituted but a small part of the correspondence of the early Christian writers. St. Paul speaks of ‘epistles of commendation’ (2 Cor 3:1), personal letters of introduction, as passing frequently among the Churches. Undoubtedly, then, many private letters by the authors of the New Testament have been lost.

This adds special interest to the Second and Third Epistles of St. John; for here we have two letters of unquestionably early date, revealing each a section of the Christian community in the colours of life. They are almost universally allowed to be by the same hand; by the hand, most commentators add, of John the Apostle. The direct external evidence for their authenticity is not extensive. This may be perhaps on account of their brevity and their private character, which would render them not likely to be mentioned frequently by the Fathers. Yet there are several references to them in the first four centuries. It is said in the Muratorian Canon (170 A.D.) that John wrote at least two Epistles. Ireneus (180 A.D.) twice ascribes the Second Epistle to St. John. The Old Italic Version (180 A.D.) has both Epistles. Clement of Alexandria (190 A.D.) refers to the First Epistle as ‘the larger Epistle,’ implying that he knows another which is shorter; and again he speaks of a Second Epistle of John, addressed ‘to a Babylonian lady by name Eilec.’ Both Epistles, the Second and Third, are mentioned by Origen (230 A.D.), and by Dionysius of Alexandria (245 A.D.). Eusebius (325 A.D.) in speaking of them places them among the books whose right to a position in the Canon is disputed. The Second Epistle is referred to by Cyprian (248 A.D.) and both are acknowledged by the Council of Laodicea (363 A.D.), of Hippo (393 A.D.), and the Third Council of Carthage (397 A.D.).

The internal evidence is stronger. According to the contents, the author is a person of apostolic, or at least authoritative, position. There is no ground for doubting that such was the case, for there is no motive conceivable for forgery. Moreover, if the attempts had been made to pass off the work of an obscure author for that of a prominent one, a more definite and authority-giving title than that which heads both Epistles—‘the Presbyter’—would have been assigned the writer. Their style, form, and contents are so alike that their unity of authorship can hardly be questioned. In each case the opening address (cp. 2 Jn v. 1, 3 Jn v. 1), the writer’s joy in the conduct of his friends (cp. 2 Jn v. 4, 3 Jn v. 4), and the conclusion (cp. 2 Jn v. 12, 3 Jn vv. 13, 14), is the same. Similarity in the words, ideas, style, character, binds them also to the First Epistle. ‘Love’ and ‘truth’ glow as fundamental conceptions in all three.

Among instances of similar treatment of the same themes, are the following: cp. 2 Jn vv. 4, 6, 1 Jn 67, 2 Jn vv. 6, 11; cp. 2 Jn v. 5, 1 Jn 27; cp. 2 Jn v. 6, 1 Jn 53; cp. 2 Jn v. 7, 1 Jn 22; cp. 2 Jn v. 7, 1 Jn 413; cp. 2 Jn v. 9, 1 Jn 23; cp. 2 Jn v. 12, 1 Jn 14; cp. 3 Jn v. 11, 1 Jn 310. Of the thirteen verses of the Second Epistle eight are thus found in essentially the same form in the First. In all of them the centre of Christianity is the recognition of Jesus as the Christ and the authoritative revealer of God, and walking in love and truth as the soul’s mode of union with Him. The prominence given to Christ leads to warnings against ‘antichrist,’ an expression found in the New Testament in the First and Second Epistles of John only (1 Jn 218, 22 48 2 Jn v. 7). The First Epistle utters three clear and weighty warnings against the dangers of the time—the danger of denying the true Christ, of failing in love to the brethren, and of not observing Christ’s commandments. These same three warnings constitute the body of thought of the Second Epistle (2 Jn vv. 7, 9, 5, 6). The connexion between the First Epistle and the Second and Third is so close that the arguments for the Johannine authorship of the last two are in the main the same. as for the First, and may be found at length in commentaries on that Epistle. Whether this connexion involves unity of authorship with the Fourth Gospel and the Revelation, is a question too large to be entered upon here.

It has been held that the title which the author of the Second and Third Epistles gives himself—the Presbyter' or 'Elder'—excludes Johannine authorship. For this, it is maintained, is the official designation of the minister of a particular Church, and therefore cannot have been assumed by one having the apostolic position of St. John. This opinion is supported by a passage in Eusebius, in which Papias is quoted as mentioning a John the Presbyter. 'If I met with any one who had been a follower of the Presbyters, I made it a point to enquire what were the declarations of the Presbyters; what was said by Andrew or by Peter or by Philip or by Thomas or by James or by John or by Matthew or any of the Lord's disciples; and what Arianism and the Presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say.' Of this statement of Papias, Eusebius says: 'It is proper to observe that the name of John occurs twice. The one John he mentions with Peter and James and Matthew and the other Apostles. But in a separate part of his discourse he ranks the other John with the rest not included in the number of the Apostles, placing Arianism before him. He distinguishes him plainly by the name of Presbyter.' Eusebius therefore infers that there were two Johns—John the Apostle and John the Presbyter. Cp. Euseb. Hist. Eccl., VII, 25. But apart from the fact that it is somewhat uncertain whether Papias in this passage refers to a different person from John the Apostle, this is the only place in Christian history down to the time of Eusebius in which such a person as John the Presbyter is mentioned. Moreover, it is an assumption that 'the Presbyter' must necessarily be the technical and official title of the minister of a special Church; for in the very passage quoted, Papias calls seven of the Apostles Presbyters. It is more probable, therefore, that 'Presbyter,' at the beginning of the Second and Third Epistles of John, is not an official title, but a descriptive appellation, as it is translated in both AV and RV—'the Elder.' The term therefore claims for the author a position of dignity and authority in the Christian community; not necessarily implying apostleship, but not excluding it.

2. Occasion. We have said that the background of thought of the Second and Third Epistles is the same as that of the First, and that this contained three warnings against the dangers of the time. These dangers resulted from the great main problem which lay at the foundation of all Oriental religions—the relation of finite man to the infinite God. How could that chasm be crossed? how had it been crossed in the work of creation? how were spirit and matter related? how did evil enter the world, and what was evil? Almost all early thinkers were driven by these questions into some form of Dualism. There were, they must believe, two Powers in conflict. Since spirit was the higher, matter was evil; it was the work of the inferior god. The material, the natural, was therefore to be fought against; the spiritual man could have nothing to do with it. Indeed, so far as he was truly spiritual, he was already freed from and above it. Hebrew religion, in its moments of clearest insight, set itself against this Dualism. The creation, it declared, was not the work of an inferior deity or deities, but both worlds, those of spirit and matter, were called into being by one and the same infinite God. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' The Prophet of the Exile was so daring indeed in his proclamation of Monism, that he did not hesitate to declare Jehovah to be the author of evil itself. 'I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil. I, the Lord, do all these things' (Isa 45).

Of course this problem laid its heaviest grasp upon the early Christians in relation to the person and work of Jesus Christ. Starting from the same ground—the essentially evil nature of matter—two opposite schools of thought arose. The one—that of Cerinthus—held that Jesus, as the true son of Joseph and Mary, was, like His fellow-men, tainted with sin, though more righteous than others. The divine Logos, however, was at His baptism joined with Him; and these two continued together in the human body of Jesus, until at His death He cast off His flesh and became pure spirit. Dualism was thus seated in the very person of Christ. The other school, that of the Docetists, denied altogether the fleshly, i.e. evil, nature of Jesus, and maintained that He was human in appearance only, having no real human nature, but a wholly spiritual one. This too established a dualism in Christ, through the failure of the different elements in Him to constitute a unity. Round this problem, thus insoluble—to keep Jesus in touch with humanity, to assert His freedom from the taint of sin, and to proclaim at the same time the essential distinction between human and divine, and the inherent evil of the human—over and about this the currents of thought flowed for centuries hopelessly. Ideas, speculations, fancies, from sources Christian, Jewish, Oriental, classical, magical, all combined in the many and strange systems which came to be known as Gnosticism. Dualism stamped itself deep even upon Christianity, and it came to be taken for granted that there was a necessary opposition between faith and reason, grace and nature, supernatural and natural, the priest and the man, the Church and the world.

Such opinions could not remain speculative only. They involved a denial of that which to St. John was life's most precious possession—the conviction that Jesus was the authentic revelation of the infinite God; and this denial again gave birth to a disbelief in any ultimate standard, which resulted in antinomianism and immorality, and to a disregard of the corporate nature of religion, which then became gross selfishness. One who can see Jesus Christ, and yet not welcome in Him the ideal of God and man, can do so, in St. John's view, only by denying his own moral perceptions. And so the Apostle bursts out into the exclamation which is the central thought of all his Epistles, 'Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ!' (1 Jn 2:22).

3. Date. If we are correct in assigning these Epistles to St. John, they belong to the last quarter of the 1st cent. The Christian Church had not yet attained that definiteness of organisation which was the work of the 2nd cent. The Churches of different localities were connected by ties of friendship and spiritual communion rather than by the authoritative bonds of organised ecclesiasticism. Yet the tendency to centralisation had begun.

A unified system not only of belief, but of conduct, organisation, and discipline was growing up. Importance began to be laid on doctrinal unity. The authority of some prominent man, one of the Twelve (1 Cor 1:12 3 Jn v. 9), or of the other Apostles (1 Cor 7:17 Ro 16:7), would be recognised by a Church or group of Churches. He would often give letters of recommendation to the evangelists or missionaries, or to the brethren travelling on private business from one community to another. To receive and entertain these was a duty for every Church.

An interesting document of the next century, 'The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles' (circ. 120 A.D.), lays down rules for the prevention of the abuse of this hospitality. 'With regard to Apostles and prophets, do with them according to the ordinance of the gospel.' Let every Apostle who cometh to you be received as the Lord. He shall not overstay one day, though, if need be, the next; but if he remain three days, he is a false prophet. And let not the Apostle, on departing, take aught save bread till he come to a stopping-place; and if he ask money, he is a false prophet. And the prophet that speaketh in the spirit you shall not question nor judge, for every offence shall be forgiven, but this offence shall not be forgiven. Not every one that speaketh in the spirit is a prophet, unless he have the ways of the Lord. By their ways, then, shall the false prophet and the prophet be known. And no prophet who in the spirit appointeth a feast eateth thereof, unless he be a false prophet; and any prophet who teacheth the truth, if what he teacheth he do not, is a false prophet. And whoso saith in the spirit, Give me moneys or other things, you shall not hearken to him; but if for others in straits he say, Give, let no one judge him.' In the Second and Third Epistles we see these itinerant teachers and brethren on their way from Church to Church (2 Jn vv. 7, 9–12, 3 Jn vv. 5, 6, 8–13). We find there are many 'deceivers' among them; while there are in the Churches lordly officials inflated with power, refusing recognition to the Apostle's messengers, and, on the other hand, warm-hearted and influential laymen, who delight to serve the Christian community by entertaining its representatives. We see the little congregation in this place and a congregation of strangers distant in that place finding themselves at one through loyalty to a common Master. We see the knitting of those ties which are soon to become the great fellowship of the Christian Church. Short as these two Epistles are, they furnish a glimpse, clear and vivid, of the life of the Christian community near the close of the 1st cent., and of the means for securing that unity of belief and organisation which in the course of the next century was to develop the great Catholic Church.

4. Contents of the Epistles. In the Second Epistle the author sends his greeting to 'the elect lady' and her children, dwelling upon the ground of their mutual friendship—their fellowship in 'the truth.' He has met with some of her children (or some members of the Church addressed), and has been glad to find them living as they ought, in the way of God's commandment. This commandment is nothing new, but is as old as religion itself. It is simply love as the law of life. The writer gives some of his characteristic definitions. The commandment is to love, and love means to keep the commandments. Then comes a warning against false teachers. The test by which the true teacher may be known is his recognition of Jesus Christ as historic and authoritative, and his following of the teaching of Christ. 'Erroneous ideas' on this subject are not to be tolerated, and kindness shown to any one who does not meet this test is mistaken charity and participation in evil. There is much more which the author has in mind to say; but he will write no more at present, for he hopes to visit his readers soon, to the fulfillment of their mutual satisfaction. A closing salutation is sent to the recipient of the letter by the children of her elect sister.

The Third Epistle opens with the same form of greeting as the Second. In this case it is to a certain Gaius; who is dear to the writer.
2 AND 3 JOHN—2 JOHN

as a member of the Christian community—he is ‘in the truth’—and for his own large, generous character. If his body is as vigorous as his soul, the writer will rejoice. For messengers have recently come from the Church to which Gaius belongs, and reported that he is conducting himself as a worthy member of the fellowship of Christ—walking in the truth—and especially that he is most hospitable to all, friends and strangers, who are serving the Cause. Such praiseworthy conduct is in marked contrast with that of an official of the same Church, Diotrephes, who had recently refused to receive messengers with a letter from ‘the Elder,’ and had threatened excommunication to those who wished to welcome them. The members of the Church are warned not to imitate such evil conduct; which suggests, by contrast, that of a certain Demetrius, whom the writer warmly commends to them. This man has the threefold witness—of general approval, of membership in ‘the truth,’ and that of the Apostle himself. As in the preceding letter, further discourse is postponed to the personal meeting which he hopes will shortly take place. The Epistle closes with salutations from the Apostle and his friends to Gaius and his friends.

2 JOHN

The elect lady] Gk. eklektē kurid. The question who is meant by this designation has given rise to much discussion. The various opinions are as follows: (1) Some regard the second word of the phrase as a proper name, and translate, ‘To the lady Elected.’ This is not likely; because if it had been intended, the Greek would probably have been different; because we should then be obliged to translate Elected as a proper name in v. 13 also, in spite of the likelihood that two sisters would have the same name; and because St. Paul uses the word (Ro 16:12) plainly not as a name, but as a descriptive adjective. (2) The third word is a proper name—‘the elect Kyria.’ This opinion has in its favour the fact that Kyria was a common name among the Greeks, being the feminine of ‘Cyrus.’ The analogy of 3 Jn v. 1 is also in favour of an address by name. But this same analogy would lead us to expect a different order of words. Again, if Kyria were the lady addressed, and if she was known and loved by ‘all that have known the truth’ (v. 1), it would perhaps be strange that we have no other mention of so prominent a person. This, with other considerations, has led to the opinion (3) that not a person but the Church in general is meant. This seems inconsistent with the Apostle’s expectation (v. 12) of visiting her and seeing her face to face. Others hold (4) that it is not the Church universal, but some particular Church, to which the Apostle writes of his approaching visit. Others still find here no proper name and no metaphor, but translate (5), ‘To the elect lady’; while some who agree in the main with this position point out (6) that there is in the Greek no definite article, and therefore translate, ‘To an elect lady.’ The weight of evidence seems in favour of the last opinion in one of its forms, (5) or (6); though the case is best summed up in the words of Bp. Westcott: ‘No solution of the problem offered by eklektē kuriō is satisfactory.’

The truth in this and the following Epistle has come to have almost a technical meaning, implying not only the eternal principle, but also the organisation which embodies it—the Church. Cp. in Acts the use of ‘the Way’: Ac 9:2 19:9 22:4 24:22. 3. With you] The better text reads ‘with us.’ Cp. Westcott and Hort. 4. I found of thy children] This shows that the lady must have had at least three children. Some have seen in it a sad, gentle hint that there were others of her children who did not walk in the truth.

5–8. Note the distinctively Johannine characteristics here: (1) He is giving his hearers a new commandment: cp. Jn 13:34 15:12. (2) The commandment is to love one another: cp. Jn 13:35 1 Jn 3:22. (3) Love means walking according to the commandments of God: cp. Jn 14:15, 21 1 Jn 2:5. (4) The central fact of Christianity is the recognition of Jesus as the Christ: cp. 1 Jn 2:20 4:2. Note also a peculiarity of the Johannine (a) thought and (b) style: (a) the habit—logistical, un-Hebraic—of giving definitions, e.g. ‘love,’ ‘the commandment,’ ‘antichrist’; (b) the use of a demonstrative pronoun or adverb pointing forward to the definition coming in the next clause; e.g. This is love, that we walk after His commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in love. Cp. Jn 16:17 17:2 1 Jn 2:3 3:16.

6. In it] better to make ‘it’ refer not to the nearest noun, ‘commandment,’ but to ‘love.’ 7. Are entered into the world] rather, ‘are gone out into the world’: cp. RV; i.e. they were formerly members of the Church, but have apostatised: cp. 1 Jn 2:19. To confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is with St. John the central fact of Christian belief. Not to recognise in Jesus the authentic revelation of the infinite God and the highest ideal of humanity, can, in his opinion, imply only moral depravity.

9. Whosoever, not transgresseth, but has erroneous ideas. No claim of superior knowledge can be allowed which sets aside what Christ taught. Doctrine in the NT. is never synonymous with ‘dogma,’ but means ‘teaching.’

10. ‘This verse reminds us that the Gospel has its intolerance as well as tolerance’ (Bp. Alexander). Ordinatory customary is not forbidden, but to extend the right hand of fellowship would be to condone and further false doctrine and to share the guilt of disloyalty.

11. Biddeth him God speed. The three salutations are eminently characteristic of the general view of life and its aim entertained by the three races. The Roman, to whom health and strength seemed all in all, said Salve, ‘health.’ The Greek, whose existence aimed supremely at sweetness and light, said Chaíros, looking upon ‘joy’ as the highest aim. The Hebrew, who had a revelation, and knew the blessedness of reconciliation with God and conscience, said Shalom, ‘peace’ (Bp. Alexander).

13. The writer may have been staying at this second matron’s house. If the Epistle was written to an individual, the transmission of this trivial message from children to an aunt is an interesting note of the simplicity and courtesy of the writer of high station—Elder, Apostle, personal friend of Jesus, whoever he may have been.

3 JOHN

1. Gaius] A Gaius or Caius—the common Latin form of the name—is mentioned in four other places in the NT. (Ac 19:29, 20:4 Ro 16:23, 1 Cor 1:14). The trait of character indicated here is in line with the generous hospitalities referred to in the third of these passages. It is hardly likely, however, that one who was sufficiently prominent in the Church of Corinth to be a general host about the year 50, would be still exercising the same function some thirty years later. The identification therefore of the Gaius to whom the Third Epistle is addressed, with St. Paul’s host, or with any of the others mentioned, is more than doubtful. In the truth see on 2 Jn v. 1.

2. I wish] better, ‘I pray.’ This may imply that Gaius had been ill. 3. Thou] In the Gk., emphatic; in contrast with others, like Diotrephes, of whom this could not be said. 4. Greater] In the Gk., a double comparative, as in English ‘betterer’ would be. This may indicate that the author was not a classical Greek scholar, or the usage may be intentional, for emphasis, like the comparative formed on a superlative in Eph 3. 6. Cp. also, ‘How much more elder art thou than thy looks!’ (‘Merchant of Venice,’ IV, i).

5. Doest.. doest] The second verb is different in the Gk. from the first, and implies more of toilful labour. And to strangers] Much stronger in the best text—and that too to strangers. ‘The duty of entertaining Christians on their travels was of peculiar importance in early times, (1) from the length of time which travelling required, (2) from the poverty of the Christians, (3) from the kind of society they would meet at public inns’ (Sinclair). 6. Bring forward] i.e. with practical assistance—money, provisions, escort, etc.

7. Taking nothing of the Gentiles] The missionaries whom Gaius had entertained had not been willing to receive assistance from the non-Christians among whom they had been labouring. While they might properly receive from those who had long been Christians, it would be of great importance that there should be not the least suggestion of selling the truth.

9. I wrote, etc.] The Gk. makes the statement more exact by inserting an object of the verb—‘I wrote somewhat to the Church.’ Of this letter we have no further knowledge. Possibly a part of the offence of Diotrephes had been its suppression; so that this may be a hint to Gaius that the contents of this letter at least should be made known to the Church.

We know no more of Diotrephes. V. 10 may imply that he had the power of excommunication, and therefore was the official head of the Church to which Gaius belonged. It may, however, only imply that he had sufficient social influence to exclude the brethren from the Christian society of the place. His fondness for being preëminent had, at all events, brought him a certain local power.

12. Nothing further is known certainly of Demetrius. But as both he and the mob-leader of the same name (Ac 19:54) lived apparently in or near Ephesus, there is nothing impossible in the suggestion that the agitator had become a disciple, and that both references, therefore, are to the same person. He may have been the bearer of this Epistle. The thought of a threefold witness—in this case, general report, the truth, and the Apostle himself—is characteristic of St. John: cp. 1Jn 5:6-10.

13, 14. The conclusion is the same as that of the Second Epistle. Possibly the journey contemplated in both is the same.

Contents.

1. Vv. 1, 2. Greeting.
   (a) 3, 4. 'I was writing a pastoral letter to you when the news that certain ungodly men have crept in obliged me to address you with a special admonition.'
   (b) 5–7. 'I would remind you—though as Christians you already know all I can tell you—that the examples of Israel and of the angels prove that it is possible to fall away from grace, and that a punishment—of which the destruction of the cities of the plain is a visible demonstration—assuredly follows.'
   (c) 8–13. 'So it is with these men, who now show themselves so insolent, ignorant, and bestial. That which is most dreary, desolate, and disappointing in nature is a type of their hypocrisy, and, like wandering comets, they are destined for darkness at last, from which they shall never again come forth.'
   (d) 14–16. 'It is to them that Enoch’s prophecy of judgment applies—to these selfish schemers who abuse the gift of the speech.'

III. Vv. 17–23. 'Remember the mockers of whom the Apostle forewarned you. Here they are—these unspiritual men who make separations among the believers. Do you abide in the one faith, with prayer in the Holy Spirit, trust in the love of God, and hope of Christ’s mercy. And in that hope have mercy yourselves as far as may be on those who are falling victims to this plague which is among you.'

IV. Vv. 24, 25. 'May the only God our Saviour keep you firm, to whom be glory through Christ.'

Greeting which introduces a Pastoral Letter written to meet an Inroad of Blasphemous False Teaching. Exhortation. Doxology

1. To them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called] RV ‘to them that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ.’

   To them that are sanctified [RV ‘called’] One word in the Gk., which, like ‘saints’ in v. 3, is used as a name for Christians. This greeting, taken together with vv. 20 f., shows that our most holy faith, which was once for all delivered unto the saints, is based upon the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The Holy Spirit is not expressly named in the greeting, but His agency is implied. It is He who has kept and will keep the readers for Christ; He makes them live in the Father, who is the source of love, as Christ is of mercy, and as the Holy Spirit Himself is of peace. In (RV) God] In Him all men live and move and have their being (Ac 17:28), and in Him the life of Christians is hid with Christ (Col 3:3). God’s love embraces in Himself those whom He loves. The expression is difficult, but the thought is deep. Here, as in much else that he says, St. Jude shows a mind near akin to St. Paul’s. 2. As St. Paul in his two Epistles to Timothy, so St. Jude adds mercy to the ‘grace and peace’ of the ordinary apostolic salutation.

3. When I gave... it was needful] RV ‘while I was giving... I was constrained’; see Intro. Our (RV) common salvation is the result of Christ’s work, which is a fact that nothing can alter, on which all alike, Apostle and disciple, strong and weak, may base their life: the faith which was once for all (RV) delivered to the saints is the declaration of this fact, and must be defended, or it may be forgotten or denied. 4. From this v. to v. 19 this Epistle must be compared with 2 Pet. The only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ] RV ‘our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ.’ These men did not refuse to believe in God, though they rebelled against Him, and by their lasciviousness abused His grace. In Christ, as Master and Lord, they would not believe. Their unbelief, rebellion, and lasciviousness correspond to the unbelief of Israel, the rebellion of the angels, and the lasciviousness of the cities of the plain (vv. 5–7).

5. Though ye once knew this] RV ‘though ye know all things once for all,’ i.e. because they are Christians, and have learnt the whole Christian creed (cp. Heb 6:3); or perhaps (a deeper thought) because they have as Christians ‘the Spirit in their mind’ (cp. Eph 4:17, 22), and ‘need not that any man teach them’ (1 Jn 2:27).

A curious reading of some MSS is noticed in RM—‘Jesus’ for the Lord. It recalls Heb 4:8, as the rest of the v. does Heb 3:17-19.

6. First estate] RV ‘principality.’ 7. Vengeance] RV ‘punishment.’ The fire may be called eternal, because the destruction wrought by it remains. The Gk., however, would allow us to take example with of eternal fire—as an example of eternal fire, suffering punishment (RM).

8. Likewise] RV ‘Yet,’ i.e. in spite of such a warning. Also these filthy dreamers] RV nine also in their dreaming; i.e. their perverted faith and life is like a dream, sentimental and unpractical. 9. With this v. cp. 2 Pet 2.ii. St. Jude, however, does not say at all the same thing, and refers to a certain apocryphal Jewish book called ‘The Assumption of Moses’; cp. vv. 11, 14, and 2 Tim 3. Though he refers to such books, he does not necessarily imply that the stories he read in them are true. Even in sermons we sometimes hear references to stories or speeches in Shakespeare or Milton, which we listen to as illustrations, not as being true to fact.

10. As brute beasts] RV ‘like the creatures without reason.’ 11. Cain] The Jews spoke of Cain as the first ‘freethinker,’ and these unbelievers would be his followers in that respect. Holy Scripture, however, tells us that Cain destroyed his brother, and these men were doing the same. The mention of Balaam brings in a new fault—their treacherous, hypocritical greed. Core] RV ‘Korah’: cp. Nu 16. 12. Feasts of charity] RV ‘love feasts’: cp. 2 Pet 2.ii. Feeding themselves] RV ‘shepherds that feed themselves’: cp. Ezk 34. Trees whose fruit withereth] RV ‘autumn trees’; they are twice dead, for the dying year is a symbol of death, and being plucked up by the roots is a symbol of the second death, from which there is no return to life: cp. Rev 21. 13. Raging waves] RV ‘wild waves.’ Wandering stars] i.e. comets, whose return no man sees.

14. Enoch also . . . prophesied of these] RV ‘To these also Enoch . . . prophesied,’ i.e. to these as well as to the men to whom the prophecy is addressed in the apocryphal book of Enoch. Cometh] RV ‘came.’

22, 23. And of some, etc.] RV ‘and on some have mercy, who are in doubt; and some save, snatching them out of the fire; and on some have mercy with fear.’ but RM, ‘the Greek text in this passage (‘and . . . fire’) is somewhat uncertain.’ The garment spotted by the flesh] cp. Zech 3.ii and Lv 13.47-50. There is contagion in their error like that of a plague. In their efforts to save others they must beware of this.

The word for ‘be’ is not expressed in the Gk., but may rightly be supplied, though at first sight it does not seem to go well with ‘before all time’ (RV). ‘Is’ however, would be less forcible, for in this blessing St. Jude contends for the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints. Whatever ungodly men may think, he says, ‘Let God’s proper glory be rendered to Him.’
INTRODUCTION

1. The Title. The title of the book varies in the later MSS, though all ascribe it to John. One MS of the 11th cent. has 'the Revelation of Jesus Christ given to the theologian John.' The word 'divine' in AV and RV is used in the sense of 'theologian,' 'one who writes on God and the divine nature.' The title in the oldest MSS is 'the Revelation (Gk. Apocalypsis) of John.' The writer calls the book 'Apocalypse,' or 'Revelation,' only in 1. Elsewhere he speaks of it as 'prophecy' (cp. 1:1, 18, 19), and of himself as a 'prophet' (cp. 10:11, 22:9). Yet the form which the prophecy has taken is rightly described by the title 'Apocalypse.'

'Apocalypse' (i.e. 'uncovering,' 'unveiling') is a technical term used to denote a particular kind of writing which sprang up among the Jews mainly during the two centuries before Christ. It had its antecedents in such eschatological passages (i.e. passages foretelling the end of the present order of things) as Isa 24-27, Joel, and Zech 12-14. The thoughts and images of such passages as these were dwelt upon and developed in later times into apocalypses. The book of Daniel is an apocalypse. Other writings of an apocalyptic kind are, the 'Apocalypse of Baruch,' the Ethiopic 'Book of Enoch,' the Slavonic 'Book of Enoch,' the 'Ascension of Isaiah,' the 'Book of Jubilees,' the 'Assumption of Moses,' the 'Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs,' the 'Psalms of Solomon,' the 'Sibylines Oracles.'

Apocalypses were written at times when the righteous suffered oppression by a foreign power. The message of the apocalypse was that deliverance was coming, and that the righteous were to wait for it in patience. In this sense an apocalypse differed from prophecy, which, for the most part, warned unfaithful and wicked Israel of the coming of a 'Day of the Lord,' and called for repentance. Moreover, the apocalypse saw in the evil plight of the righteous a sign of the power of Satan in the world, which made it certain that God would soon intervene to overthrow the evil. Apocalypses were written when men were troubled because the promises of good made by the prophets seemed to be unfulfilled. Accordingly, the apocalyptic writer set out to justify the dealings of God. He 'sketched in outline the history of the world and of mankind, the origin of evil and its course, and the consummation of all things... The righteous as a nation should yet possess the earth, either in an eternal or in a temporary Messianic kingdom, and the destiny of the righteous individual should be finally determined according to his works. For though amid the world's disorders he might perish untimely, he would not fail to attain through the resurrection the recompense that was his due, in the Messianic kingdom, or in heaven itself' (R. H. Charles, HDB.).

Apocalypses were characterised by strange and mysterious figures, seen in visions and explained by angels. Sometimes these figures were new, and shaped to represent persons or events of the time. Sometimes they were borrowed or adapted from older apocalypses, or from the OT, or even from remote tradition. It is thought that some of these last traditional figures may have gradually developed out of creation myths.

Apocalypses were pseudonymous, i.e. they were given forth under the name of some great person of the past, such as Enoch or Moses. It has been suggested that this was caused by the general feeling of despair with which the times were viewed. Prophecy had ceased, and perhaps no living person could hope for a hearing. But the pseudonym may have had a better justification. The figures and traditions which were used may have been so connected with those old great names, that the apocalyptic writer looked upon his writings as proceeding rather from the heroic saint he reverenced than from himself (see HDB. arts. 'Apocalyptic Literature' and 'Revelation, Book of').

But although the book we call 'the Revelation of St. John' is one of a class, it does not follow that it has no deeper value for us than the others of its class. The fact that it has been taken into the Canon of Scripture, while they have been rejected, shows that it outshines them all. In this 'the Revelation' is like other books of the Bible. The histories, the Psalms, the Wisdom books of the OT, have been distinguished from others which are left outside the Canon. And Lk 11 shows that our Gospels were not the only memoirs of the life of Christ which existed in the earliest Christian age. Again, the title of the book is evidence that, as regards other apocalypses, it claims to stand above them all. Other apocalypses, as has been said above, professed to come from some great man of the past, as Enoch, and we know that only in a very loose sense could such a profession be justified. Our Apocalypse does not go back to some far distant and hardly more than nominal author. It is not even, as in the title, the Apocalypse of John, for that title is of uncertain date. The true title is given in 11. The book is ‘The Revelation of Jesus Christ.’ The book claims to have Jesus Christ as the author of the revelation it contains. The place St. John assigns to himself is that of a prophet who is able to receive from Christ a revelation and to communicate it to others. Christian believers may be unable to see how there can be any true connexion between Enoch and the book which bears his name. But they do not doubt the reality of the gift of prophecy, or the fact that Christ could and did reveal Himself to His Apostles.

2. Purpose. The Christians in the western part of Asia Minor, for whom, during the latter part of the 1st cent., the book was specially written, had evidently been undergoing great trials. The purity of their Churches was sullied by teaching which condoned immoral and heathen practices, and by growing worldliness: cp. 32, 17, 17. They had experienced persecution, both from the religious hatred of the Jews (cp. 29 39) and from the Roman government. Under the Roman government, religion had become largely identified with Imperialism. Temples had been dedicated, in various places, to Rome and the emperor, and the emperor had been called ‘Lord and God.’ To a Christian, worship such as this was blasphemy (cp. 13, 12, 14), and, rather than join in it, many had died: cp. 28 69 15 17 6 18 20. The book was written during a lull in the persecution, which would, however, be temporary: cp. 210 611 117, 7. Thus the times were dark and threatening for the Christian Church. Christians were not only shut out from all the splendid and glory of life, from the honours and ambitions, from the riches and festivities which they saw daily in surrounding heathen society, but which they must not taste. They were not even allowed to live their simple lives in their own way. All the power of the empire was being directed upon them in inflexible hostility, and if they would not yield it seemed as if they must be crushed. Christ had promised His perpetual Presence, but they felt no lifting of the weight of the Roman hand. Christ had promised to come again, and they yearned for His coming that He might deliver them, but it seemed as if they yearned in vain. And in this strain and stress came the seducing advice of ‘Jezebels’ (cp. 28), who bade them save their lives and win security by outward conformity to heathen requirements and heathen ways.

So, to brace them to endurance, came the message of the Revelation. The things which were seen, rich and mighty though they appeared, were temporal, about to pass away; but the things which were not seen were eternal and to abide for ever. God was on His throne, and the future of the world was in the hand of Christ. The persecuting empire was inspired and supported by Satan, but God was stronger than Satan. Satan had already been conquered, essentially, by the work of Christ, and his overthrow, and the overthrow of his instruments, would soon be seen openly on earth. Rome, the persecuting empire, the heathen worship and priesthood, and the wicked of the earth, were all to fall before the conquering Christ. Last of all would be the general judgment, and then the incomparable and eternal bliss of the New Jerusalem. In these ways Christ would come, and come quickly.

Therefore let Christians bear manfully their perils and pains. There was nothing strange in the demand that was made upon them. Christ Himself had endured before them. It was by death that He had won His victory, and their victory was to be won in the same manner. Therefore death for Christ was not defeat but overcoming, and great glory with Christ would be the reward of those who so overcame.

3. Interpretation. Our interpretation of Revelation depends upon what view we take as to the period of the Church's history to which the figures and scenes preparatory to the climax of the book refer. There have been three chief schools of interpretation. One school (called the 'Futurist') regards the book as dealing with the end of the world, and with events and persons which will immediately precede that end. The 'Historical' school sees in the book a summary of the Church's history from early days until the end. The 'Preterist' look back to the past, and interpret the book as having to do with the times in which it originated. A fourth method sees in the book symbolical representations of good and evil principles, common to every age, and to be understood spiritually. According to this last method, the New Jerusalem, e.g., would be explained as representing the blessedness, even in this earthly state, of true believers whose lives are hid with Christ in God.

The sketch of the purpose of the book will have shown that the 'Preterist' view is at the basis of the present Commentary. The probability of this view is supported by the analogy of other apocalypses. And it seems natural to suppose that the book would be meant to be intelligible by those to whom it was addressed, and would have arisen out of the circumstances of their state. Moreover, the language and the figures of the book are found to fit the condition of the early days of Christianity, and to yield, on this system, a consistent and unforced interpretation. The advocates of the other systems have differed widely among themselves, e.g. explaining the woman (c. 17) and the beast, now to mean the Roman Church and the Pope, now the Turks and Mohammed, now the French Revolution and Napoleon. But while this Commentary adapts the Preterist view, it is not denied that, the principles of God's government of the world being always the same, practical use may be made of visions and figures which refer to past circumstances by applying the principles which they reveal to the events with which we ourselves have to do.

The question remains whether those predictions which have to do with the millennium, i.e. the thousand years during which Christ would reign on earth (cp. 20:4), were meant to be understood literally or spiritually. The earliest interpretation was literal. Those who accepted the book expected a literal reign of Christ on earth. It was for this reason that many, not believing in a literal millennium, would not accept the book as canonical. It was only the spread of spiritual interpretation, by which the 'thousand years' denoted the present period of the Church, the view advocated by Jerome and Augustine, that enabled the Church as a whole to receive the book.

4. Unity. The structure of Revelation is not what might have been expected. We might have expected a prophecy which passed on in regular course, developing evenly from stage to stage until the end was reached. Instead of this we find progression indeed, but of a rough and uneven nature, and a number of dissimilar and abrupt visions and figures, often not so much flowing one out of another as piled one upon another. During the last twenty years some critics have attempted to account for these features by supposing, either that the book is composed of two or three earlier apocalypses, worked over and fitted together by a Christian editor, or else that the author drew upon various older materials, fragmentary in character, which he has used and incorporated.

The former of these theories seems to be improbable. The book certainly follows out a plan, even though it be roughly. And critics have not agreed in the results of their attempts to dissect the book and to display the joints and lines of union. But it seems more likely that the writer made some use of older materials. It is certain that he made large use of the OT., especially of Ezekiel and Daniel, e.g. cp. 11:18 46: 13:12 18:9. It is not, on the face of it, unlikely that some of the figures which cannot be traced to OT. sources may have been derived from lost or traditional materials, eg. chs. 11 ff. We can see, indeed, that Jewish, and even heathen, ideas and beliefs were so used by the writer, and were given a Christian meaning; cp. 21:19 9:14 13:8,18 16:17 17:16 20:24. However, if this theory be true, we should suppose that the writer's use of such materials would be parallel to his use of the OT. He never slavishly copied from the OT., but employed and adapted OT. language and figures as if they were so familiar to him that he naturally expressed himself by their means. Similarly he may have pondered upon existing apocalyptic materials until they had become part of the furniture of his mind. The striking parallels of Rev. with Mt.24 = Mk.13 = Lk.21, 17:50-57 12:38-49, seem to show the dependence of the author of Rev. upon the discourse of Christ on the Mount of Olives. E.g. cp. 11, 'which God gave unto Him,' with Mt.24:50; 'shortly come to pass,' with Mt.24:34; while chs. 2 ff. show that the situation foretold in Mt.24:5-14 is present. Cp. also 6:1-6 with Mt.24:14; 6:12-17 with Mt.24:29-31; 8:1 with Mt.24:31; 8:7-12 with Mt.24:30 Lk.21:30.

5. The Visions. Supposing that some part of the theories mentioned in the last section be true, how can it be said that St. John received the contents of the book in a vision? The answer is threefold. (1) It is not necessary to understand the book as claiming to have been wholly received, as it stands, in one vision at one time. The first vision was received in Patmos. Others may have followed at subsequent times. (2) It is not necessary to suppose that the very words of the book were taken down, as if from dictation, by the writer. The writer claims to be a prophet (cp. 10:11 22:9), and in the exercise of his gift he may have developed afterwards the facts which were revealed to him by vision. (3) The memory of previously acquired knowledge cannot but have a large share in the apprehension of truths divinely received. Such truths must be rendered into a language previously learned; and if they are rendered into figures previously assimilated, that is only another form of the same process. And the vision itself may, perhaps, be divinely adapted to the language and figures which are already contained in the mind of the recipient of the vision.

6. Authorship. The writer of the book calls himself 'John': cp. 11,4,9 22:8. No other description or definition is given. To the early Christian Church, 'John' would signify John the Apostle. Besides this, the writer was of account among the Churches of the Roman province of Asia, and was in exile in Patmos. Early Christian tradition asserts both these things of St. John. It would seem, therefore, that the book was written either by the Apostle, or by some one who wished it to be thought the work of the Apostle.

The external evidence for the apostolic authorship is very strong, coming from Fathers in all parts of the Church. The earliest witnesses are Justin Martyr (circa 140 A.D.), and probably Melito, bishop of Sardis (circa 170), and Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (circa 180). Ireneæus, bishop of Lyons (circa 180), who had known Polycarp the disciple of St. John, distinctly says that it was written by the Apostle. The apostolic authorship is also witnessed by the Muratorian Fragment (circa 200), Tertullian (circa 220), Hippolytus, bishop of Ostia (circa 240), Clement of Alexandria (circa 200), Origen (circa 283), and Victorinus, who wrote the earliest extant commentary on Rev., and who was martyred under Diocletian (303).

On the other hand, an Asiatic sect of the end of the 2nd cent., known as the Ἰτώγοι, rejected all the writings of St. John, and among them Rev. They did not appeal to any knowledge or tradition as to the authorship, but said that they found the book unprofitable, and that there was no Church at Thyatira. Their rejection of St. John's writings was probably caused by their doctrinal views. Caius, a presbyter of Rome (circa 200), ascribed the book to Cerinthus, a heretical teacher, who lived at Ephesus in the reign of Domitian, in whose system were combined elements derived from Judaism, Christianity, and Oriental speculation, and whose tenets seem to be opposed in the Gospel and Epistles of St. John. Both the Alogoi and Caius opposed the Montanists, who appealed to Rev. in support of their views.

Dionysius of Alexandria (circa 250) denied the apostolic authorship, but wholly on critical grounds, arguing from the language of the book, and from its unlikeliness to the Gospel and to the First Epistle. He thought it must have been written by another John, perhaps John Mark, and said that he had heard that there were two tombs at Ephesus, each called that of John. Eusebius of Cæsarea tells us that Papias spoke of a 'John the Presbyter,' distinguishing him from the Apostle, and he hazards a guess that possibly this Presbyter was the John of Revelation.

It will be seen that the evidence of tradition is altogether in favour of the apostolic authorship of the book. Those who rejected it did so on grounds of internal evidence, which we are as competent to judge as they were. The internal evidence, i.e. the matter and style of the book, does at first sight make it difficult to accept the apostolic authorship. The Greek of the other writings of St. John in the NT is smooth and free from barbarism, while that of Rev. is the reverse. But this may be accounted for by the character of the books. The Gospel and Epistles were probably written calmly and meditatively, repeating much that the Apostle had been in the habit, for years, of saying to his flock in Greek-speaking Ephesus. But St. John was a Jew, although a Greek dress had come to surround his thought. In Rev. he is borne along by the rapture of his visions, and the Jew that he was by nature and by upbringings might, not unnaturally, have burst through the Greek veneer. Besides this, it is plain that the writer's mind, at the time of writing, was filled with the Jewish Scriptures, and with Jewish apocalypses, and it may have seemed to him fitting that the style of the new Apocalypse he was producing should be in harmony with other apocalypses which both he and his first readers knew. The Hebraic style may have seemed to him to be almost as much a necessity for an apocalypse as the symbolic and figurative material. There would be nothing forced or unreal about this, for Hebrew was native to St. John, while Greek must have been to him always more or less artificial. This consideration will increase in force if, as is quite likely, eighteen or twenty years were spent by St. John in Greek-speaking Ephesus between the writing of Revelation and the writing of the Gospel and Epistles.

As to the language. It is true that characteristic words and thoughts of the Gospel do not appear in Rev. On the other hand, it is only in the Gospel and First Epistle of St. John and in Rev. that Christ is called 'the Word' (cp. Jn 1:1 Rev 19:18). The title 'Lamb,' so frequently applied to Christ in Rev., reminds us of Jn 1:29-35, though the form of the word is slightly different; the symbol of the Shepherd applied to Christ (cp. Rev 7:17, 10:1-8, 21:15), and the figure of living water, or water of life, are common to Gospel and Rev.; and there are other striking likenesses, such as the word translated 'true' (Rev 3:7, etc.), 'overcome,' 'keep,' 'witness,' 'testimony.'

On the whole, the difference between the style of the Gospel and Rev., though great, can be accounted for, and does not seem to outweigh the very strong and early testimony to the apostolic authorship of Revelation.

The doctrinal teaching of Rev. may be regarded as that of the Fourth Gospel at an earlier stage. Westcott pointed out that 'the main idea of both is the same. Both present a view of a supreme conflict between the powers of good and evil... In the Gospel the opposing forces are regarded under abstract forms, as light and darkness, love and hatred; in the Apocalypse under concrete and de finite forms; God, Christ, and the Church warring with the devil, the false prophet, and the beast.' In both books history and vision lead to the victory of Christ, and His Person and work are the ground of triumph. Both books lay stress on personal 'witness.' Both present the abiding of God with man as the issue of Christ's work (Jn 14:28 Rev 3:20 21:8).

But there are important contrasts. In Rev. Christ's coming is outward; while in the Gospel it is spiritual, and judgment is self-executing. In Rev. the 'future' is historical; in the Gospel it is present and eternal. In Rev. the conception of God follows the lines of the OT.; in the Gospel God is revealed as the Father, and specially in connexion with the work of redemption.

The portrayal of Christ in Rev. is in harmony with that in the Gospel. His humanity and His redemptive work are recognised (15:7 5:6 6:14 11:8 12:11 14:5 22:10), followed by His exaltation. Christ is wholly separated from creatures. He possesses wholly knowledge (2:5,6,18,19,20), and divine power (11:15 12:10 17:4 19:14). He receives divine honour (5:24 20:6), and is joined with God (3:13 5:18 6:14 7:10 14:22 22:1,8), so that with God He is spoken of as one (11:15 20:6 22:2); He shares also in part the divine titles (17:3 19:11). His pre-existent existence is recognised in passages (1:5 2:8 3:14 19:12) in which we have an earlier form of the truth unfolded in Jn 1:14: see Westcott, 'Intro. St John,' pp. lxxxiv f.

7. Date. The state of the Churches at the time of writing (chs. 24) was such that we should suppose that some considerable time had elapsed since their foundation. They were infected by heresy and by worldliness. The connexion of St. Paul with Ephesus seems to have been a thing of the past, and his martyrdom is, perhaps, referred to in 18:20. Persecution had been violent, Rome was 'drunk with the blood of the saints' (17:6); and fiercer persecution was expected (5:10 13:7 15:1). All this seems to point to a date after the persecution of Nero, 68 A.D., and before that of Domitian, 95 A.D. Professor Ramsey argues that the character of the persecution referred to in Rev., in which the Christians seem to have suffered, not under accusation of specific crimes, but 'for the Name' (cp. 21:8 6:12 17:6), demands that Rev. should be dated, not under Nero, but under Domitian. However, 'the testimony of Jesus' does not mean 'witness borne to Him,' but 'the revelation made by Him.' The use probably made of the popular expectation of the return of Nero from hell (13:8 17:8,11) would imply that some years had elapsed since Nero's death.

If 11:14 is to be literally understood, the book would have to be dated before the destruction of Jerusalem, 70 A.D. But the passage, probably, should have, in its present context, another interpretation: see notes.

C. 17:7-12 (see notes) seems clearly to indicate that the book was written in the reign of Vespasian (69-79). With this most of the considerations referred to above agree. We suppose, therefore, that the book was written about 77 A.D.

On the other hand, primitive tradition asserts that the book was written towards the end of the reign of Domitian, circ. 95 A.D. This tradition probably rests on the statement of Ireneus, circ. 180. Either Ireneus was mistaken, or else in c. 17 St. John was making use of an earlier apocalypse, perhaps that which was the original of part of c. 11.

8. Canonicity. More evidence exists for the early use of Rev. than for any other book of the NT. In the section on 'authorship' early authorities have been quoted. Besides these, Papias, a friend of Polycarp, the disciple of St. John, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia in the early part of the 2nd cent., probably used the book. Andreas, a bishop of the 9th cent., who wrote a commentary on Rev., states that Papias maintained 'the divine inspiration' of Rev., and Eusebius says that Papias expected an earthly reign of Christ for 1,000 years, 'not understanding correctly those matters which (the apostolic narrations) pronounced mystically in their representations' (Euseb. III. 39).

The Churches in Lyons and Vienne (177) regarded Rev. as Scripture. Apollonius (circ. 210), who was perhaps a bishop of Ephesus, is said by Eusebius to have made use of testimonies from Revelation.

But while the Western Church always accepted Rev., doubts about it sprang up in the Eastern Church. This attitude was probably influenced by opposition to the advocates of a literal millennium (or reign of Christ on earth for 1,000 years), and to the Montanists, all of whom were warm upholders of the book. Dionysius of Alexandria, who concluded on critical grounds that St. John was not the author of the book, has been referred to above; Eusebius was inclined to agree with Dionysius. 'The first Eastern commentary belongs to the 5th cent., the next to the 9th. Each begins with a defence against doubts as to the canonicity of the book.'

It was only gradually that it came to be received generally, and, owing to the difficulty of its interpretation, its reception in modern times has not been so qualified as that of the rest of the NT. Luther was at first strongly averse from the book, though, later, he printed it with Hebrews, James, and Jude in an appendix to his NT. Zwingle regarded it as non-biblical, and Calvin did not comment upon it.

INTRO.

REVELATION

9. Contents.

1-3. Introduction, describing the contents of the book as an apocalypse, given by God to Jesus Christ, and signified by Him to John through an angel.

1-4. Salutation, in which the distressed Church is pointed to God.

1-20. Account of the vision of the glorified Christ, who bade St. John write to the Seven Churches the things which he saw.

Chs. 2, 3. Letters to the Seven Churches.

2-7. The Church in Ephesus is praised for her steadfastness against false teachers and heathen persecutors, but called upon to repent of the coldness of her love. 8-11. The Church in Smyrna is about to suffer persecution. Let her endure it boldly, for it cannot hurt her true life. 12-17. The Church in Pergamum has been faithful in persecution. But she has been tolerant of immoral teachers, and of this she must repent. 18-20. The Church in Thyatira is increasing in faith and endurance, and in love to God and man. But a party in the Church have led unfaithful lives, and they will be punished unless they repent. Let the rest of the Church continue faithful.

3-6. The Church in Sardis is sternly rebuked for her lack of earnestness. Unless she repents she must endure Christ's judgment. The few in Sardis who have kept themselves unspeckled from the world shall enjoy the companionship of Christ in glory.

3-12. The Church in Philadelphia is small and weak. But it has been faithful in persecution, and she is promised many converts, especially from among the Jews. Christ will guard this Church from the time of trial that is coming.

3-22. The Church in Laodicea is lukewarm and self-satisfied. Let her see herself as she is, and humbly seek from Christ the supply of her needs. If she does so, He will richly bless her.

Chs. 4, 5. The Lord and Ruler of all.

4-11. Vision of the Almighty, enthroned in glory and mercy, receiving the worship of heaven.

5-11. The course of the future, predetermined by God in His secret counsel, is represented by a book, covered with writing and close-sealed, resting on the outstretched hand of the Almighty. It has been committed to Christ to make known and to carry out God's will for the future, and this because of His death.

6-8. The first four seals are opened. The victorious spread of the gospel is shown, and then the coming of war, famine, and pestilence.

9-11. The fifth seal. Judgment delayed, and the reason. The martyrs are not for-} he has been conquered. 12\(^{18-17}\). The persecution of the Gentile Church is the natural sequence of Satan’s failure against the Church in Palestine.

13\(^{1-10}\). The second great enemy of the Church is the Roman power, signified by a beast. The power and dominion of the beast come from Satan, yet men worship both. For a limited time the beast is allowed by God to triumph over the Church. 13\(^{11-18}\). The third enemy of the Church, the government of the Province of Asia, both civil and religious, is figured by a second beast, who causes all who will not join in idolatrous worship to be put to death.

C. 14. The enemies of the Church have been shown in the true evil character which underlay the glory and power of the empire. Now the Church is bid to contrast with the false glory of the empire the true glory of Christ and His people in heaven (vv. 1–5), to hearken to the good news of the approaching manifestation of God, and of the fall of wicked Rome (vv. 6–8), and to beware lest any fall of steadfastness, and fall away to the beast, for great will be the misery of such, while those who die in Christ are blessed (vv. 9–13). Christ will gather in His own (vv. 14–16), but the wicked will perish under the wrath of God (vv. 17–20).

Chs. 15, 16. The Bowls—Judgment poured out.

15\(^{1-5}\). The wrath of God is about to be manifested. During a pause before it is launched, is heard the triumphant praise of those who have come victorious from the beast.

15\(^{6-8}\). Then the seven angels file forth from the heavenly Temple and receive seven bowls, full of the wrath of God, which they are to pour out on the earth.

16\(^{1-4}\). The first four bowls. Convulsions of nature afflict the ungodly, preliminary to the overthrow of the enemies of Christ.

16\(^{5-11}\). The fifth bowl. The idolatrous people, instead of repenting at God’s judgments, become full of blasphemous rebellion.

16\(^{12-16}\). The sixth bowl. The evil influence of the dragon and of the two beasts stirs up the rulers of the world to gather to battle against Christ.

16\(^{17-21}\). The seventh bowl. The end of the preparatory judgments is reached. All earthly powers are shaken, as the wrath of God is manifested to overthrow the enemies of Christ, and, first among them, the city of Rome (Babylon).

Chs. 17, 18. The Overthrow of Rome.

17\(^{1}\). The city of Rome, pictured as a harlot, magnificently attired, enthroned upon the beast, and drunken with the blood of the martyrs, will be destroyed and burnt by the kings of the earth and by the beast.

18\(^{1-3}\). The Fall of Rome is announced.

18\(^{4-8}\). God’s people are warned to quit her.

18\(^{9-11}\). The dirge over Babylon of those who loved her. 18\(^{12}\). The exultation of those she has persecuted. 18\(^{21-24}\). Renewed prediction of her Fall.

Chs. 19, 20. The overthrow of the Empire and its Asian idolatry, and of Satan, and the last Judgment of the wicked.

19\(^{1-10}\). Heaven glorifies God because of the overthrow of wicked Rome (vv. 1–4), and because the marriage of the Lamb is come (vv. 5–10). 19\(^{11-16}\). But before the marriage Christ comes forth to triumph over His remaining enemies. 19\(^{17, 18}\). The completeness of Christ’s coming victory signified by a cry to the vultures to gather to the prey.

19\(^{19-21}\). All the power of the Roman empire is concentrated against Christ, and the Pagan empire and its religion are overthrown.

20\(^{1-8}\). The devil remains, but for a period of rest and happiness he will be prevented from inspiring a general attack upon Christianity. 20\(^{4-6}\). This time of earthly rest was not for the Christians of St. John’s day. Yet for them would be triumph and happiness with Christ after death, while the wicked were kept for the Last Judgment. 20\(^{7-10}\). Once more, in the future, Satan’s power will break forth in a final attack upon the Church. For the last time God will overthrow these enemies, and then the power of Satan will perish for ever. 20\(^{11-15}\). Then will come the last Judgment of the wicked, after which there will be no more death.

21\(^{1-22}\). The Eternal Bliss of Heaven.

21\(^{1-8}\). St. John sees, as if from a distance, the heavenly home of the Redeemed coming down upon the new earth, and hears a description of its blessedness. 21\(^{9-17}\). He is brought near, by one of the seven angels, to the ‘New Jerusalem,’ the Bride, so that he can view her in her security and beauty and holiness as the resting-place of God’s glory and the home of the Church.

22\(^{1-4}\). Finally he is shown the inner life of the heavenly Jerusalem.

22\(^{5-31}\). Closing Section.

22\(^{26-29}\). The angel affirms the truth of the visions. 22\(^{30-31}\). The prophecy now completed is to be used. The time is short. Blessed are they who shall share in the glories revealed.

22\(^{16, 17}\). Christ declares that the Revelation has been sent by Him for the use of the Church. The Spirit in the Church, hearing Christ’s voice, calls for His Advent.

22\(^{18, 19}\). St. John warns those who hear the book read in the services of the Church that it is not to be falsified. 22\(^{20}\). Christ repeats the promise of His coming, and St. John prays for it.

22\(^{21}\). Benedictory prayer.
The vision of the Son of Man

St. John addresses 'the seven churches which are in Asia,' telling them of a vision of Christ, who bade him write in a book what he saw and send it to them.

1-3. Introduction, describing the book as an 'apocalypse,' the Gk. word which signifies 'unveiling' or 'revelation.' This does not mean here the unveiling of Christ at His Coming, as in 1 Cor 17 2 Th 1 1 Pet 1 12 13 4 13, but the Revelation given by Christ. The book is, at the same time, a prophecy (cp. v. 3), because divinely communicated, and because of its exhortations which must be kept. It is, also, in the form of a letter: cp. 14 22 21.

Notice in this section the threefold arrangement of ideas, so common in the book.

1. Of] i.e. Christ is the real author.

2. Record] RV 'witness.' Word of God] i.e. the revelation which God gave to Jesus Christ (v. 1). Testimony of Jesus] i.e. the witness which Jesus bore, the word of God which Jesus communicated: cp. 6 12 17 19 10.

And of all] RV 'even of all.' 3. Readeth] i.e. aloud, before the congregation. Prophecy] The writer is a prophet, i.e. his utterances proceed from the illumination of the Holy Spirit: cp. 22 7 10 Ac 13 1 1 Cor 12 28 13 14 14 Eph 4 11. An Apostle could be a prophet: cp. Eph 3 32.

1 4-8. Salutation, which sounds the keynote of the book, by proclaiming to the distressed Church the eternal power of God, the omnipresent and penetrating energy of the Spirit, and the redeeming Lordship of Christ, who will return to overcome His enemies.

4. John] We know of no John, except the Apostle, who had authority to address seven Churches. Seven] the number which signifies completeness. These seven Churches stand also for the whole Church of Christ. Asia] i.e. the Roman province of that name, which was the western part of what is now called Asia Minor. It included Mysia, Lydia, Caria, part of Phrygia, and islands off the coast.

Which is, etc.] i.e. the Eternal: cp. Ex 3 14.

Seven Spirits] i.e. the Holy Spirit in His complete working: cp. 4 5 6. 5. Witness] cp. v. 2 3 14 Ps 89 37 Jn 18 37. First begotten] RV 'firstborn,' i.e. the first of the dead to enter life: cp. Col 1 18 Ps 89 37. Washed] RV 'loosed,' i.e. as the Redeemer of slaves. In his own] RV 'by his.' 6. Kings] RV 'to be a kingdom,' i.e. a society under His kingship: cp. Ex 19 6 1 Pet 2. Priests] to offer spiritual sacrifices: cp. Heb 13 16 1 Pet 2. Unto God, etc.] i.e. belonging to God and engaged in His service. RV 'unto his God and Father'; spoken of Christ in His humanity: cp. 3 12(BV) 12 7. Behold, etc.] from Dan 12 13. Cometh] i.e. at the Judgment: cp. Mt 24 26 29. Every eye, etc.] from Zech 12 10: cp. Jn 19 57. Kindred, etc.] RV 'the tribes of the earth': contrasted with the 'saints,' the people of Christ.

Wail because of] RV 'mourn over.' 8. Alpha and Omega] RV 'the Alpha and the Omega'; i.e. the Eternal One: cp. 21 18 Isa 44 6. In 22 13 the title is applied to Christ. Alpha and Omega are the first and last letters of the Gk. alphabet. Lord] RV 'Lord God.' The Almight] i.e. He who rules over all. The Gk. word is the LXX rendering of 'God of hosts,' i.e. God of the universe: cp. Am 4 13.

9-20. The vision John received of Christ in glory. Christ is described in language which is drawn from the OT, especially from Daniel, and which is to be understood figuratively of the majesty and power of Christ. He is revealed as present, though unseen by men, in the midst of the Churches. His triumph after suffering and His present care are to serve them to endure their tribulation victoriously.

9. Companion] RV 'partaker with you.' 10. Tribulation, etc.] RV 'the tribulation and kingdom and patience.' Patience] i.e. brave endurance. Of Jesus Christ] RV 'which are in Jesus.' Tribulation, kingdom, and patience are all found in union with Christ, and as such are to St. John the characteristic elements of the life of the Church. Patmos] a small, bare volcanic island in the Aegean Sea, about 15 m. from Ephesus. For the word of God, etc.] i.e. probably he had been banished in punishment for his Christian preaching. 'It was the common practice to send exiles to the most rocky and desolate islands.' 10. Spirit] RV 'Spirit.' John was in a prophetic trance: cp. Ac 10 10 9. 2 Cor 12. Lord's day] the earliest known use of the term for 'Sunday': cp. Ac 20 7 1 Cor 16 2.

As of a trumpet] Archbp. Benson pointed out ('The Apocalypse') that this voice is that of the herald angel who called St. John to his work. This has been obscured by the false reading in v. 11. The angel's trumpet-voice is recorded again in 4. The angel directs St. John by his voice from afar in the first part of Rev. (cp. 10 4 8 11 12), but after 17 accompanies him. 'As an angel of the Presence (cp. 8 2 15 5), he is called Christ's angel and God's angel (cp. 11 22), and his voice has been 'out of heaven.' 'This angel speaks in 19 21 5 6 7, is referred to in 21 21, and speaks again in 22 10.

Other voices to be noted are, the 'great voice' of the Almighty (11 12 16 17 21 5 5); the voice of Christ, 'as the voice of many waters' (vv. 15 17 f., 14 2 16 19 5 22 18 15 16 30);
the voice of the living creatures, as a voice of thunder (6:19); the voice of the elders, as the voice of harpers harping with their harps (5:14); and the voice of the saints before God's throne, as it were the voice of a great multitude (7:9, 19).

18. I am he that, etc.] RV 'and the Living one'; and I was dead': 'Living', i.e. eternally, both before and after the Incarnation: cp. Jn 11:4, and OT. phrase 'living God.' The persecuted need not fear death, for Christ had died. He is of death: RV 'death and of Hades.' 'Hades' = OT. 'Sheol,' the world of the dead, not the place of punishment: cp. Isa 14:9 (RM) 38:10 (RM) Mt 16:18. He has the 'keys' because the time and manner of the death of each person are under His control. To think of this would give heart to the persecuted.

19. Hast seen] RV 'sawest,' i.e. this vision. Which are] i.e. the state of the Churches. Be] RV 'come to pass.' 20. The mystery] i.e. concerning the mystery; 'mystery' = a hidden thing now revealed. Stars] i.e. lights in heaven.

Candlesticks] lights on earth. The Churches are represented by candlesticks (or 'lampstands'), because they are made to shed the light of truth and goodness derived from Christ, the light of the world, upon the world around them. The flame is supported by the oil of the Holy Spirit: cp. Ex 25:21 Zech 4:2 Mt 5:14.

Angels] Each letter is addressed to the 'angel,' and the 'angel' is praised or blamed for the state of the Church. Many have thought 'angel' here = 'bishop,' but such a meaning is unknown elsewhere. Its 'angel' is to each 'church' as the 'star' is to the 'lamp,' i.e. its heavenly counterpart. The angel, therefore, is a heavenly existence, corresponding to the Church on earth, but nearer to God. We need not suppose that each Church literally has such a being in connection with it. St. John was writing in symbols, and using symbols which he found ready made. Translated from symbolic language into prose, 'angel' here probably means 'that perfect ideal which the Church imperfectly fulfils.'

CHAPTER 2

The Epistles to the Seven Churches (2:1-3:22)

Since 'seven' is the perfect number, the 'seven churches' represent all the Churches of the province of Asia. At the same time, the special circumstances of each Church are faithfully pictured in each epistle. Ramsay points out that St. John alludes, as well, to the special circumstances of each city. He suggests that the Churches are mentioned in the order in which a messenger carrying letters would travel. The letters, however, were not to be sent separately to the Churches. The book was to be taken as a whole. St. John adopted the familiar form of an 'apocalypse' through which to deliver his message, and added to that the equally familiar form of 'letters.'

In every epistle Christ is described under an aspect, mostly drawn from 11:12, suited to the special needs of the Church addressed. Each Church is then assured that Christ knows it, whether for praise or blame, but always with love, and receives the exhortation suited to it, followed by a special promise with a special token.

The main purpose of the epistles is to give courage to the Church to pass victoriously through its trials. For this reason it is told of Christ's presence and help, and bid to look forward to the glory that Christ will soon give to those who overcome. The chief trials of the Church consist in persecution from heathen and Jews, and in corrupt teaching within. The false teaching is of the character denounced in 2Pet. and Jude. It seems to have desired that Christians should be permitted to take part in the clubs and organisations of the heathen society around them, and in their festivals, permeated though they were with idolatrous observances.

1-7. To the Church in Ephesus Christ speaks as He who is present with the Churches (v. 1). The Church is praised for its work for Christ, its endurance of suffering, and its faithfulness to the truth (vv. 2, 3), yet it is blamed, not because of its deeds, but because the love which used to animate them has cooled (v. 4). Even for this fault repentance is necessary; a Church without love must perish (v. 5). To those members of the Church who pass victoriously through their trials, eternal life with God is promised (v. 7).

1. Ephesus] the metropolis and great commercial centre of the province of Asia, famous for a temple to Diana. After St. Paul's work in Asia was ended, Timothy was stationed there for a time (cp. 1Tim 1:3), with general authority, till 2Tim 4:9. Soon afterwards it became the home of St. John. After Roman for a small town, its ruins remain.

2. Apostles] i.e. the \textit{earnest} or representatives of Christ, in that they were claimed by some to whom it is given (2 Cor 11:3, 18, 19).

RV \textit{didst find them} (2 Cor 11:3).

4. First] i.e. at the beginning of their Christian course.

5. First words] i.e. such as inspired by their master ... removed thy candlestick] If the soul of a Christian love dies down, the candlestick is put away as useless, i.e. the church which will come to an end.

6. Nicolaitanæ] mentioned again in the letter to Pergamum, in connexion with Balaam (vv. 14-15), and probably referred to in the letter to Thyatira (vv. 20-21). It has been supposed, from the mention of Balaam, that they were Antinomians, i.e. men who held that Christians were not bound by the moral law, and that sin was no sin for those who had faith (1 Cor 6:18-20; Gal 5:10). Jude v. 4. 11 f. It has also been suggested that they may have claimed the authority of the deacon Nicolas (1 Cor 1:12); but perhaps St. John used the term 'Nicolaian' as a Greek word representing the Hebrew 'Balaam'. Ramsay thinks that the 'Nicolaitans' were some who attempted to effect a compromise with the established usages of Greek-Roman society, permeated with luxury and tainted with idolatry though these were, and that they also wished to comply with the State's demand, and show their loyalty by burning incense before the emperor's statue. St. John saw, as St. Paul did in 1 Cor., that the Church must conquer the imperial idolatry, or be itself destroyed (Ramsay, \textit{Letters to the Seven Churches}, pp. 299 f.). By 115 A.D. Ignatius wrote to the Ephesians, 'in your midst no heresy has its dwelling.'

7. He that hath, etc.] cp. Christ's words, Mt 11:18, etc. The Spirit] John was under the influence of the Spirit: cp. 1:10. Overcometh] i.e. continuously. The Christian life is a continual fight against sin and tribulation, and this book's purpose is to give heart to overcome.

To eat of, etc.] i.e. he shall have eternal life: cp. 22:26 (29). Paradise] a Persian word for 'garden,' used in LXX for the garden of Eden. The later Jews employed the word to denote various ideas of heavenly blessedness: cp. Lk 23:42, 2 Cor 12:4. Here it is equivalent to the New Jerusalem of chs. 21:1.

8-11. To the Church in Smyrna. Christ speaks as the Eternal, who tasted death, and whose death ended in life (v. 8). There is no spiritual condition (v. 9). More persecution is to be expected, which may be borne without fear. After death for Christ, nothing but life will follow (vv. 10 f.).

8. Smyrna] about 50 m. N. of Ephesus, was a wealthy port and the most splendid city in the province of Asia. In 26 A.D. a temple was founded there in honour of Tiberius. Polycarp, its bishop, was martyred 155 A.D., when he had served Christ 86 years. Smyrna was the last stronghold of Christianity in Asia Minor, and even now is called by the Turks 'Insdel Smyrna' (H.D.B.). \textit{Is alive}] RV 'lived again.' 9. Works, and] RV omits. Rich] i.e. spiritually: cp. Mt 6:19 Jas 2:5. Blasphemy] RM 'calumniy,' i.e. which thou sufferest.

Say they are Jews] i.e. they are Jews in name only: cp. 39 Ro 2:29. The Apostle uses the name as an honourable one, equivalent to 'those who are not Gentiles, but are the people of God.' By their enmity to God's will and word, these men, Jews by race, had forfeited their position of privilege, and had become as bad as Gentiles. It is implied that it is the Christian Church in Smyrna which has succeeded to the privilege: cp. Ro 2:28. Jews joined in the martyrdom of Polycarp. Synagogue] i.e. congregation: cp. Nu 20:4 31:16. Of Satan] i.e. they called themselves God's, but were serving Satan. 10. Devil] Persecution is prompted by the devil: cp. 12:27 13:4 1 Pet 5:8. Prison] i.e. as a prelude to execution. Tried] cp. Jas 1:12 1 Pet 1:7 4:12. Ten days] not lit.; the persecution would be short and sharp. Faithful] Ramsay suggests that here, as in each letter, St. John refers to the local history of the city. Smyrna was honoured for its faithfulness to Rome, Cicero calling it 'the most faithful of our allies.' It was also proud of its 'Crown,' which was 'the garland of splendid buildings encircling the rounded hill Pegaso.' A crown] RV 'the crown,' i.e. eternal life will crown your victorious death. II. Second death] a Jewish phrase for the final condemnation of sinners: cp. 20:6, 14 21:8 Mt 10:28. 12-17. To the Church in Pergamum. Christ speaks as He who destroys the wicked (v. 12). The Church is prayed for faithfulness during a time when Christians might be called upon to deny Christ and worship the emperor. One of the Church, at least, had confessed Christ at the cost of his life (v. 13). Yet even this Church was corrupted by immoral teaching (vv. 14 f.), and must repent, for a corrupt Church will suffer Christ's judgment (v. 16). Those who live victoriously are promised heavenly food, and knowledge of Christ in their secret souls (v. 17).
m. N. of Smyrna. Under the Roman empire it was resorted to by invalids, who attended for healing at the temple of Eaeulapius. Until the 2nd cent. A.D. it was regarded as the capital of the province of Asia. Under Augustus a temple was built at Pergamum, probably 29 B.C., and dedicated to Rome and Augustus, and Pergamum became the centre of the imperial worship and 'Satan's throne.' It has continued to be a place of some consequence, preserving the ancient name Barga, down to the present day' (HDB.).

Sword] As the centre of the worship of the emperor, Pergamum must have been the seat of authority, and the sword was the symbol of the highest order of authority. The message is that in the city in which the Roman proconsul has the power of life and death, Christ has power and authority greater than his (Ramsay).

17. To eat] RV omits. Hidden manna] cp. Ex 16 33, Heb 9 4. Jewish tradition held that the ark and its contents, including the pot of manna, were hidden by Jeremiah, and that they would be restored when the Messiah came. This tradition is used here to symbolise the bread of life: cp. Jn 6 35ff.

White stone] Ramsay explains this as a 'tesera,' i.e. a little cube of stone, ivory, or other substance, with words or symbols engraved on one or more faces. Here the 'stone' is simply to bear the name, and the stress of the passage is on the name. It is a stone, imperishable, because that which is to last is put on imperishable material; and it is white, as the fortunate colour.

New name] A new name implied entrance on a new life: cp. the new name given in baptism. So by this 'new name' is meant that the victorious Christian will enter upon a new and higher stage of existence. But the name is also the secret name of God (cp. 314), and it was anciently supposed that the knowledge of the name of God gave power over spirits. So the Christian, triumphant over persecution, will enter into life, and have new knowledge of God and new power.

18-20. To the Church in Thyatira Christ speaks in His majesty as Son of God (v. 18). The Church is praised for its increase in love and faith and the service of others, and its patience under trials (v. 19). Yet it harbours corrupt teaching (v. 20), and those who follow such teaching without repentance must suffer under Christ's chastening hand. Every member of the Church must be judged by what he himself does (vv. 21f.). But he who wins the victory over the temptations of the enemies of Christ, will share in Christ's glorious reign in light (vv. 24f.).

18. Thyatira] a busy commercial city in the northern part of Lydia, between Pergamum and Sardis. Fine] RV 'burnished.'

20. Notwithstanding, etc.] RV 'But I have this against thee, that...'

Jezreel] probably so called because she led astray Christians, as the wife of Ahab had led astray Israel. She seems to have been a prophetess, who taught that it was possible to be a Christian while remaining in ordinary pagan society and belonging to the social clubs which were characteristic of pagan life. These were idolatrous and luxurious, celebrating in a corporate manner the pagan religion and joining in common banquets carried out with revelry. This 'Jezreel' sanctioned. The minority of the Church who were against this teaching, yet tolerated 'Jezreel' ('sufferer'); see on 26. (See HDB.) To teach, etc.] RV 'and she teacheth and seduceth.'

22. Bed] i.e. the couch of the feasts, now changed into a couch of tribulation. Adultery] i.e. unfaithfulness to God. 23. Death] RM 'pestilence.' Reins, etc.] i.e. the inner thoughts and desires: cp. Ps 77 Jer 17 10.

24. And unto the rest] RV 'to the rest.' Doctrine] RV 'teaching.' Depths] RV 'deep things.' Speak] RV 'say'; i.e. these misguided Christians called their philosophical arguments 'deep things of God' (cp. 1 Cor 2 19), but they were really 'deep things of Satan': cp. 29.

None other burden] probably a reference to the letter from Jerusalem: cp. Ac 15 38. The directions of that letter would guide them in the difficulties as to their relations with pagan society.

25. That which ye have] i.e. the faithfulness, etc.: cp. v. 19. Hold fast] because the Deliverer is near.

of the Messiah in which His people would share. At this time ‘Rome was the only Power on earth that exercised authority over the nations, and ruled them with a rod of iron, and smashed them like potbellies’ (Ramsay). But the Christian, victorious through death, will be stronger than Rome and conquer Rome. Received] cp. Jn 10:18. 28. Morning star] i.e. the glory of Christ, who brings in the perfect day: cp. 116,20,2216 Nu 24:17 2 Pet 1:19.

CHAPTER 3

THE EPISTLES TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES (concluded)

1–6. To the Church in Sardis Christ speaks as He who gives the spirit and looks for spiritual life. There is no praise for this Church. Its life is without spiritual reality (v. 1). Yet, even now, awakening is within its power. But if it continues to sleep, Christ will come in sudden judgment (vv. 2f.). A few individuals have remained faithful. To them, and to all such, Christ promises gladness and life, and that He will acknowledge them as His (vv. 3f.).

1. Sardis] about 35 m. S. of Thyatira. When there was a kingdom of Lydia, before 549 B.C., Sardis was its capital. It was still an important city at the time of the Apocalypse, but is now only a ruin. Spirits] cp. 14 Ro 8:4.

Name] i.e. its Christianity was nominal.

2. Not found thy works perfect] RV ‘found no works of thine fulfilled,’ i.e. up to the proper standard. 3. Received] i.e. the gospel: cp. 1 Th 2:13. Heard] RV ‘didst hear,’ i.e. the gospel appeals to the memory of their conversion: cp. Gal 3:1. As a thief] cp. 16 Mt 24:43. 4. Names] i.e. persons: cp. Ac 1:16. Have not defiled] RV ‘did not defile,’ i.e. at some crisis of persecution, when most yielded: cp. 7:14. Walk] i.e. spend their life. White] the colour of victory: cp. vv. 5, 18, 6:1 79.

7–13. To the Church in Philadelphia Christ speaks as He by whom alone comes entrance into the Church, the spiritual house of God (v. 7). The Church is praised for its faithfulness in persecution. Its own power is small, but Christ is with it, and He is giving it an opportunity for the conversion of some of those Jews who have aided the persecutors (vv. 8f.). The Church shall be brought safely out of the coming trial (v. 10). Christ will quickly come, therefore let the Church endure a little longer (v. 11). Those who ‘overcome’ shall have an honourable place in the heavenly sanctuary and a joyful knowledge of Christ (v. 12).

7. Philadelphia] 28 m. SE. from Sardis, a rather rich and powerful city. ‘It had the most glorious history of all the cities of Asia Minor in the long struggles against the Turks’ (Ramsay). It is still to a large extent Christian. Key of David] a reference to Isa 22:19. As authority over the royal house was conferred upon Eliakim, so Christ has authority in the Church, above all earthly ministers, and it is really He who admits or excludes, who gives the ‘open door’ of vv. 14f.: cp. Jn 10:9 14:6.

8. An open door] i.e. the Church shall win converts: cp. 1 Cor 16:2 2 Cor 2:12 Col 4:8, perhaps from the persecuting Jews (cp. v. 9), and perhaps also from the Phrygian land on the road to which Philadelphia lay. Hast not denied] RV ‘didst not deny,’ i.e. in a time of persecution. 9. I will make] RV ‘I give,’ Synagogue] see on 29. Evidently, here, Jews proud of their national privileges, and powerful in numbers and in wealth. No doubt they despised the Jewish Christians as traitors. Loved thee] cp. Isa 43:4.

10. The word, etc.] i.e. the message which sets forth ‘patience,’ i.e. steadfast endurance, as part of Christ’s life and of the life of His people. Temptation] RV ‘trial’: a general persecution is foretold, but the Philadelphia Church will be so kept that, though they may suffer in outward matters, their life in Christ will be unharmed: cp. Lk 21:18 (R.V.). 11. A pillar] i.e. he shall have a permanent place in the temple, i.e. the Church; here the glorified Church: cp. 1 K 7:31 Gal 2:2 Eph 2:4. 1 Pet 2:5 Temple] cp. 1 Cor 3:17. Named, etc.] i.e. he shall receive the full knowledge and blessing of belonging to God, to the kingdom of Glory and to Christ: cp. 2:17 19:13-16.

New name] Ramsay points out that about 17 A.D., Philadelphia had taken the name ‘Neokaisarein,’ that is, city of young Cesar, and disused its own. No doubt at the same time a shrine of the young Cesar, with priest and ritual, was established. Thus it wrote on itself the name of this imperial god, and called itself the city of the imperial god. With this St. John contrasts what Christ will do for His own. There will be a name written on the victorious Christian, which will be the name of God and the name of the ‘Church,’ and the new name of Christ: see on 2:17.

14–22. To the Church in Laodicea Christ speaks as He through whom alone comes true life with its riches and blessings (v. 14). The Church is blamed for lukewarmness, self-satisfaction and worldliness (vv. 15f.). Instead of trusting in itself let it turn to Christ for the true riches (v. 18). He chastens the Church because He loves it. What it needs is zeal (v. 19). Even in this proud Church Christ humbly knocks at the door of each heart, and is ready to enter with blessing (v. 20). Those who share Christ’s victory over the world shall share Christ’s honour (v. 21).

14. Laodicea] SE. of Philadelphia and E. of Ephesus. Its site is now utterly deserted. In 60 A.D. Laodicea was destroyed by an earthquake, but did not accept help from the emperor for the rebuilding, as many cities did. It was a great banking centre. It was also famous for the glossy black wool of its sheep, and did a large trade in the garments made from the wool: cp. vv. 17 f. An article called ‘Phrygian powder,’ used to cure weakness of the eyes, may be alluded to in v. 18. A bishop of Laodicea was martyred 166 A.D.

14. Amen] i.e. Truth (cp. Isa 65:16 BM); He is the Reality behind all passing things; His life is the life which is life indeed; His promises are sure; He can be trusted utterly.

Sup] The blessings which Christ gives, both here and hereafter, are often spoken of under the figure of a feast: cp. 19 Mt 25:1 Lk 22:29 f. With him... me] cp. Jn 15:17 21:1.

CHAPTER 4
THE GLORY OF GOD

The Church has been encouraged in the midst of her tribulation and temptation by the vision of the presence and support of Christ. Now (chs. 4, 5) a further series of visions begins, in which are shown, under figures, the forces by which the life of the Church is affected, or, in other words, those who are for her and those who are against her. She is shown God and the Lamb, and she is shown the devil, the beast, the false prophet, and the apostate city. Then she is shown the victory of Christ, and the eternal defeat of the powers of evil.

In c. 4, for the comfort of the Church, the greatness and majesty of God the Father is shown in language adapted from Isa 6 and Ezekiel 1. 10. He is portrayed, on His heavenly throne, sitting ‘above the water floods,’ surrounded by beings representative of the angelic creation and of the Church. These beings ceaselessly watch Him to do His will, and worship Him as Creator.

We are not to understand the imagery as literally descriptive of heaven, but as pictorial symbols of spiritual things: see on 5-7.

1. First voice] i.e. the voice of 10.

3. Jasper] i.e. according to some, the diamond; but according to Flinders Petrie (HDB. ‘Stones, Precious’), the green jasper: cp. 21. 11. The diamond would be emblematic of God’s purity, the green jasper of His mercy. Sardine stone] RV ‘sardius,’ i.e. according to F. P., red jasper; emblematic of God’s judgments.

6. There was a sea of glass] RV ‘as it were a glassy sea,’ perhaps representing the waters that were above the firmament, Gen 1:10. Over this the throne of God is looked upon as set: cp. Ezekiel 1:22. In the midst of, etc.] i.e. probably, supporting the throne. Beasts] RV ‘living creatures’: cp. Ezekiel 1:5; in Ezekiel 10:26 identified with the ‘cherubim.’ The ‘cherubim’ seem to have been emblematic of the forces of nature, especially of the storm-cloud: cp. Gen 3:24 (‘sword’ perhaps = ‘lightning’), Ps 110:4 ‘To the Heb. poet the cherubim are not only the attendants of Jehovah, but the bearers and upholders of His throne. The thunderclouds are the dark wings of these ministers of God: cp. 2 K 19:15 Ps 80:1 99:1 Isa 37:16. . . In later Jewish theology the cherubim take their place among the highest angels of heaven’ (HDB.). Full of eyes] symbolising their unceasing watchfulness: cp. Ezekiel 10:12.

7. Beast] RV ‘creature.’ The four creatures were anciently taken as emblems of the four evangelists. 8. Beasts] RV ‘living creatures.’ Rest not] RV ‘have no rest’; cp. ‘watchers’ as title of angels, Dan 4:18. Holy, etc.] see on 14 and 15. Isa 68. 9. Those beasts] RV ‘the living creatures.’ Give] RV ‘shall give,’ i.e. whenever they give. 11. Hast created] RV ‘didst create.’ Give] RV ‘because of thy will.’ Are] RV ‘were,’ i.e. existed ‘in His idea from all eternity; and when the appointed moment came, they were created’ (Milligan).

CHAPTER 5
THE GLORY OF THE LAMB

The Church is shown that Christ is on her side. He has overcome by suffering. Now the future is for Him and His people, and He is worshipped with the Father.

x-4. A roll of a book, covered with writing on both sides, signifying the full contents of God’s purposes for the future (cp. Ezekiel 29:1).
'close sealed' (RV) with seven seals, i.e. completely hidden from the knowledge of angels and men, rests on the outstretched right hand of Him that sitteth on the throne,' signifying that God offers His will to be made known and His purposes to be worked out (v. 1). But no created being (RV 'no one') is fit to receive so high a mission (vv. 2 ff.), and St. John weeps, fearing lest the promise of 4 should fail (v. 4).

5–7. St. John is told the victory which Christ has won has fitted Him to take and open the book. Christ in His royal power and strength is spoken of as 'the Lion that is of the tribe of Judah' (RV), a reference to Gn 49, which was interpreted by the Jews of the Messiah (cp. Heb 7), and as the 'Root of David,' i.e. the stem or 'Branch' coming from the root (cp. 22:10 Isa 11:1,10 Jer 23:6 Zech 3), another accepted designation of the Messianic King (v. 5). St. John looks for the Lion and sees a Lamb (cp. Jn 1:29,38), 'standing, as though it had been slain' (RV), i.e. recently slaughtered or sacrificed. The reference is to Is 53, and the meaning is that it was by His sacrifice that Christ had won His victory. By the Cross, the devil and the world were already essentially overcome (cp. Jn 12:31f. 16:11,23 Col 2:15); and God's purposes for man, which depended on the Atonement of Christ, could now be carried out. It is implied that the persecuted saints, for whom this was written, were not to fear tribunal, because it was for them also the appointed means by which they should 'overcome.' The Lamb has seven horns and seven eyes, signifying the complete power and searching insight of the Spirit by which He rules His people and overthrows His enemies and carries out the divine purpose (v. 6): see on 14; cp. 4:6,8 18:2 10 Dan 7,20 Zech 3. Then the Lamb takes the book (v. 7).

We are not to understand that Christ literally has the form of a Lamb. The figures of a Lamb, and of horns and eyes, were familiar to all students of the OT, and the truth about Christ was expressed to St. John's mind in vision under this familiar imagery, just as it might have been expressed solely by words. If figures and words were equally expressive of spiritual realities, either might be employed.

5. Prevailed] RV 'overcome.' 6. In the midst] i.e. in front of the throne. Beasts] RV 'living creatures.'

8–14. The Church, in her praise and prayer, sings the glory of the conquering Lamb. All angels and all creation join their chorus.

8. Vials] RV 'bowls'; as used in the Temple for incense. Odours] RV 'incense'; cp. 8:4 Ps 141:2. Saints] RV 'the saints,' i.e. the true people of God. 9. Sung] RV 'sing.'

New] because belonging to the 'new' state of Redemption: see on 217; cp. 14:5.

CHAPTER 6

THE SIX SEALS

The afflicted Church has been reminded in chs. 4 ff. that God is over all, and that the future is committed to the Lamb. Now (chs. 6–8) she is shown that future, unrolling to its appointed end, i.e. the judgment of the enemies of God and the triumph of those who 'overcome.' The Lamb opens the seven seals. Apparently we are to understand that, as each seal is opened, a portion of that which is written in the book is revealed pictorially. C. 7 contains an episode between seals six and seven.

The first six seals. The key to this vision is the prophecy of Christ in Mt 24:21–51. In that prophecy, vv. 4–14 foretell the signs preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, vv. 15–28 the destruction of Jerusalem, and vv. 29–31 the signs which will precede the coming of Christ. There is the same threefold division in this c., but in place of the destruction of Jerusalem is the appeal of the martyrs to God, while the whole looks forward to the coming of Christ.

St. John had, doubtless, thought long on the prophecy recorded for us in Mt 24. It was a natural effect of his memory that the vision should follow the lines of that prophecy; and, at the same time, our Lord saw fit to make further use of the thoughts already implanted in the Apostle's mind. The working of the same prophecy appears in the visions of the trumpets and the bowls.

1–8. Four riders are summoned, each by the word 'come' (RV omits 'and see'); cp. Zech 6:14, where the horses stand for the four winds, symbolising the divine judgments (v. 1).

The white horse and the crown of the first rider are symbols of victory, and for the bow cp. Ps 45:4. The victorious progress of the gospel is perhaps represented (cp. Mt 24:14), or, as many think, Christ: cp. 19:11 (v. 2).

The second and third riders represent war and famine respectively (vv. 3–5). A 'penny' (cp. Mt 18:22 RM) was the wages of a labourer for a day's work (cp. Mt 20:2); the 'measures' contained two pints. Judgment is tempered with mercy, for the wheat and the barley are not to be wholly destroyed, and the oil and the wine are to be uninjured (v. 6).
Then Death and Hades (RV 'Hades,' i.e. the ' underworld' of the dead) come to claim a fourth part, i.e. not the whole, of the ungodly, by God's four judgments of sword, famine, death (i.e. pestilence), and wild beasts: cp. Ezk 14:8 (v. 8).

9–11. The opening of the fifth seal reveals that the death of the martyrs is not unregarded by God. As they sacrificed their lives, they are represented as having been offered on a heavenly altar, at the foot of which their blood (or 'souls,' or 'lives': cp. Lv 17:11) has been poured out: cp. Ez 29:12 (v. 9). Their blood is said to call out upon God, as Abel's did (cp. Gn 4:10), and as every crime does, for punishment (v. 10). God is not unheeding, but the final judgment must wait till the number of the martyrs is fulfilled. Meanwhile these, having overcome (cp. 3:1f.), are given robes of victory (v. 11).

10. Lord] RV 'Master.'

12–17. At the opening of the sixth seal the day of the wrath of God and of the Lamb is impending. The description is founded on the words of Christ: cp. Mt 24:21f. The prophets had expressed the awfulness of the 'day of the Lord,' by associating it with terrible catastrophes, and these are heaped together in this passage to create a picture of fear and ruin. The details are not to be literally understood: cp. Isa 2:10, 34:4, 50:8, Jer 24, Am 8:9, Nah 1:5f., Hag 2:6f., Lk 21:8, Heb 12:26.

The picture seems to be, as it were, foreshortened to the Apostle, so that he is not able to see the length of the interval which separates the Fall of Jerusalem from the conquest of the empire by Christianity, nor of the interval which separates that conquest from the Day of Judgment. So throughout the book, yet see the 'thousand years' of c. 20.

17. His] RV 'their.'

CHAPTER 7
 THE REDEEMED

Two visions interposed between the sixth and seventh seals. There are similar episodes between the sixth and seventh trumpets and bowls.

1–3. Four angels are holding in check the four winds of God's judgments (v. 1), and are ordered not to release them until God's servants are sealed, i.e. marked as His: cp. Ezk 9:14, Eph 1:14, 4:30, 2Tim 2:19 (v. 2f.). These four winds may be the horsemen of 6:14. The meaning is, that Christians need not fear the judgments of c. 6. Not a hair of their head shall perish (Lk 21:18).

4–6. The complete number of God's people (see on 21:14), and that a large one (144,000 is the square of 12 a thousandfold), is being gathered together for everlasting safety. The Church of Christ is spoken of in OT. language: cp. Ro 2:28f. The tribe of Dan is not mentioned, perhaps because of a Jewish tradition that Antichrist was to come from that tribe.

9–17. St. John sees, in another vision, how the saints, the '144,000,' are preserved. They may not be delivered from death, but they will be delivered by death: cp. Lk 21:19f. Robes and palms of victory (vv. 9f.) are for those who 'overcome,' and they are enabled to overcome by the 'blood,' i.e. by the communicated power of the sacrificed life of the Lamb: cp. 12:11 (v. 14). Their blessed state is pictured in sweet imagery drawn from the OT. (vv. 15–17).

10. Salvation] i.e. victory: cp. Ps 3:8 R.M.

11. Beasts] RV 'living creatures.'

CHAPTER 8
THE SEVENTH SEAL. THE FOUR TRUMPETS

1. The seventh seal is opened. Heaven waits in hushed awe for a brief period. 8–11. The Seven Trumpets.

2. The seven angels, regarded in later Jewish belief as having a special position in God's presence (cp. Tob 12:16 Lk 1:19), are given seven trumpets, symbols of judgment: cp. Mt 24:15 1 Cor 15:21 Th 4:10. It is best to understand the vision of the trumpets as being the contents of the seventh seal. This appears from the character of the events belonging to the first four trumpets, which spring from the third division of Christ's prophecy (Mt 24:29f., Lk 21:24f.), and are parallel with the sixth seal: see on c. 6. Therefore the trumpets represent the judgments on the heathen world, especially on the Roman empire, to come after the Fall of Jerusalem. It will be noticed that the arrangement of the trumpets is parallel to that of the seals, and that there is an episode of two visions between the sixth and seventh trumpets as there was between the sixth and seventh seals.

3–5. The incense of the prayer of heaven is joined to the Church's prayer that Christ will not tarry, cp. 6:10 Ro 8:26 (vv. 3f.), and, in answer, the fire of God's judgment is cast on the earth, cp. Ezk 10:1 (v. 5), after which the sounding of the trumpets begins.

3. Offer it with] RV 'add it unto.'

6–13. The first four trumpets announce convulsions of nature, affecting earth, sea, rivers and the heavenly bodies. The language... is in part borrowed from the narrative of the plagues of Egypt, but the whole fourfold vision looks like the picture of a volcanic eruption. Destruction comes upon one-third only, i.e. the mercy is greater than the judgment. The details are not to be pressed. The general idea is that the convulsions of nature are the shadow cast before by the approach of the terrible day of Christ (vv. 6–12).

After the fourth trumpet, an eagle (not ‘angel,’ as AV), whose swoop upon the prey is another symbol of judgment (cp. Hosea 8:1 Mi:24:28), announces three woes upon the ungodly (v. 13). Each of the last three trumpets heralds one of these woes.

7. Hail and fire mingled, etc.] RV ‘hail and fire, mingled,’ etc. Upon the earth] RV adds, ‘and the third part of the earth was burnt up.’

10. As it were a lamp] RV ‘as a torch.’

CHAPTER 9

THE FIFTH AND SIXTH TRUMPETS

These herald woes upon the ungodly and idolatrous, inflicted both by demonic and by human agency.

1–12. The fifth trumpet initiates the first of the three woes. A star fallen to the earth, i.e. an angel who has descended from heaven (cp. 1:20), not necessarily an evil angel (v. 1), opens the pit of the abyss. The abyss is the abode of evil spirits or demons, and the ‘pit’ is the shaft which was supposed to lead to it. St. John uses this Jewish idea, which may have been derived from volcanoes, as a figure of spiritual things. At the opening of the pit smoke pours forth (v. 2), and from the smoke issue evil spirits with the appearance of locusts (v. 3). They are not to hurt green things, for they are not really locusts; but, besides being like locusts in their numbers and their devastating power, they are to be like scorpions in that they give pain to men, but only for a limited period—a visitation of locusts was usually limited to five months, from May to September. They are to afflict those who are not sealed: see on 7:12 (v. 4f.). The description of the locusts is partly taken from Joel 1:6 2:11. No special significance need be sought in the details, which probably are only meant to increase the vivid terror of the picture (vv. 7ff.). Unlike the locusts of Prov 30:27 they have a king, Abaddon or Apollyon, i.e. ‘Destroyer’ (cp. Job 26:6 RV Prov 15:11 RV): names which at first signified the place of the lost, and afterwards, as here, the ruler of the hosts of evil (v. 11). This vision may be regarded as a picture of the mental and spiritual misery which follows sin. It is a contrast to the fifth seal; cp. v. 6, ‘seek death and in no wise find it,’ with 6:11, ‘rest’: cp. Isa 48:22.

10. And there were stings, etc.] RV ‘and stings; and in their tails is their power to hurt men five months.’ 11. RV ‘They have over them as king the angel of the abyss,’ etc.

13–21. The sixth trumpet sounds, and a voice from the altar answers the prayers of the martyrs crying for vengeance, cp. 6:9. 8:3 (v. 13), by commanding the four angels, bound at the Euphrates, to be loosed (v. 14). Immense armies of horsemen issue forth, and kill the third part, i.e. a large number, but not the whole, of the ungodly: cp. vv. 20f. The Euphrates is the river of Babylon, and Babylon in this book represents Rome. Perhaps, therefore, this vision speaks of devastation caused by Roman armies, possibly in the civil wars that followed the death of Nero.

In the ‘four angels bound,’ St. John uses a familiar Jewish apocalyptic idea. Each country was supposed to have its angel or angels (cp. Dan 10:13, 20), ‘Prince of Persia,’ ‘Prince of Greece,’ and see on 1:10. The four angels would be the invisible representatives of the hosts of Babylon, i.e. Rome, and their ‘binding’ or ‘loosing’ would represent the spiritual cause of the restraint or letting loose of the armies. The angels were held in leash until the exact moment foreordained by God (v. 15). As with the locusts, the details of the description probably have no special meaning.

14. In] RV ‘at.’ 15. Were prepared] RV ‘had been prepared.’ An hour, etc.] RV ‘the hour and day and month and year.’

CHAPTER 10

THE LITTLE BOOK

Between the sixth and seventh trumpets, as between the sixth and seventh seals, is an episode consisting of two visions. The first vision is related in this c.

Another mighty angel (cp. 5:2), depicted as clothed with God’s power and mercy, which he is commissioned to minister, comes from heaven (v. 1), holding a little book open in his hand. The book is different from that of c. 5, and contains a special revelation for St. John to make: cp. v. 11 (v. 2). Seven thunders utter their voices, apparently signifying that there will be a cycle of judgments not included in the seals, trumpets, and bowls (v. 3), but these St. John is forbidden by the herald angel (cp. 1:10) to record: cp. Dan 12:4 (v. 4). The angel of v. 1 (v. 5) now declares (cp. Dan 12:7) that the ‘little time’ of 6:11 shall be brought to an end (v. 6) in the days of the seventh trumpet, when God’s eternal purpose of salvation, the revelation of which had gladdened the prophets of both dispensations (cp. Dan 9.4,10; Zech 1.16; Ro 11.1), shall be fulfilled (v. 7). At the command of the herald-angel, St. John takes the book (v. 8), and eats it. It is sweet in his mouth, but bitter in his belly (cp. Ps 119.108; Ezk 2.9f. 3.14f.), signifying that it is sweet to him to receive God's revelation, but that its wrath and judgment fill him with sorrow (vv. 9f.). The two angels bid him announce the contents of this new revelation, which are, probably, to be found in chs. 12f. (v. 11).

3. Seven] RV 'the seven.' 7. Shall begin] RV 'is about.' Mystery] cp. Ro 16.18f. As he hath declared] RV 'according to the good tidings which he declared.'

CHAPTER 11

THE TWO WITNESSES. THE SEVENTH TRUMPET

1-14. Second episode. There is much difference of opinion as to the meaning of this vision. Perhaps the key may be found in the parallelism of the book. There were two visionary episodes after the sixth seal (see on c. 7), the first signifying that Christ's people were separated and preserved from God's judgments, the second that they were preserved not from but through death. The same meaning may be found here.

1, 2. The sanctuary and altar of Jerusalem, with the worshippers, are to be measured, i.e. with a view to preservation : op. 288f. Ezk 40.1 (v. 1). But the court of the Gentiles has been given over, with the rest of the city, to the nations (v. 2). This is plainly a reference to, or prophecy of, the siege and capture of Jeru- salem, 70 A.D., as foretold by Christ : cp. Lk 21.24. But it is to be interpreted symbolically. The temple, altar, and worshippers signify the Christian Church and its worship (cp. 1 Cor 318), which have arisen in the midst of Judaism, and which are to be preserved, although Judaism is doomed. The time named, 42 months, i.e. 3½ years (v. 2), the half of seven the holy number, is not to be understood literally. It was the duration of the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, and signifies a period, of whatever extent, in which evil had power : cp. v. 3, 12f. 13f. Dan 7.20 127.

3-14. But the people of Christ, although to be preserved, will be preserved through death. They are represented now under the figure of two 'witnesses' (cp. Ac 12f.), prophesying during the period of evil (v. 3). They are compared to the olive trees and candlesticks (Zerubbabel and Joshua) of Zech 4, because they give forth the light of the truth of Christ and are fed with the oil of divine grace (v. 4). They are also compared, in language which is meant to assure them of God's special favour and protection, to Elijah and Moses (vv. 5f.). Yet God's favour will be shown in preserving them not from but through death. The 'beast,' i.e. the Roman power (cp. 13f. note, 17f.) will persecute them to the death (v. 7). There is, perhaps, an allusion to the death of two godly men in Jerusalem, of whom James, the Lord's brother, may have been one. As their dead bodies were treated with dishonour by the Jews, so, too, will the heathen dishonour the martyred Christians. But in all this they are identified with Christ (vv. 8f.), and will share His life with God (vv. 11f.). In the judgment which falls upon the wicked world, of which Jerusalem, now that the Christian Church has been separated from her (v. 1f.), has become a figure ('Sodom,' 'Egypt,' 'great city,' v. 8; see on 14f.), many are converted : cp. Ac 2.23f. (v. 13f.).

1. The angel stood, saying] RV 'one said,' 2. Out] RV 'without.' 3. RV 'And I will give unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy'—a Hebraism for 'cause them to prophesy.' 5f. Cp. Ex 7.19 1 K 17.11. 2 K 1.10 Lk 4.20. 5. Will...will] RV 'desireth...shall desire to.' 7. Bottomless pit] RV 'abyss': see on 92. Cp. Dan 7.1,7,11,12. 8. Our] RV 'their.' 9. RV 'And from among the peoples and tribes and tongues and nations do men look upon their dead bodies...and suffer not,' etc. 10. They...earth] i.e. the ungodly.

15-19. The seventh trumpet sounds. This will bring about the consummation (cp. 10f.), and therefore the rest of the book is developed out of it. Instead of a silence in heaven, such as that which followed the opening of the seventh seal, St. John hears a heavenly chorus anticipating and celebrating the victory of the Kingdom which the seventh trumpet is to bring, and which is related in chs. 12-20 (vv. 15-18). Now is opened the temple of God in heaven, and in it is seen the ark of the covenant of mercy, and from it proceed lightnings and thuderings of judgment (cp. 8f. 16f, 'seals' and 'bowls') (v. 15). Of this mercy and judgment the following chs. narrate the exercise.

CHAPTER 12

THE WOMAN AND THE MAN-CHILD. THE DRAGON

The persecution which the Church had already suffered, and which was about to burst forth again, is the great fact which underlies the whole 'Revelation.' The sufferings of the Church and its members have been referred to again and again, particularly in 11:1-13. In the 'seals' and the 'trumpeteas' the Church has been assured, in a broad and general manner, that God's judgments will fall upon the world of wickedness, and that the ungodly will bow before the power of the Lamb. In the remainder of the book (chs. 12-22), the victory of Christ and His Church is foretold in more definite detail. The great enemies of Christ are brought forward, under the personifications of the Dragon (c. 12), the two Beasts (chs. 13:1), and the harlot City (c. 17). Then we are shown Christ's battle against them, and the complete overthrow both of them and of all evil (chs. 18-20), after which the book ends with the glorious and everlasting blessedness of the New Jerusalem (chs. 21:1).
12. 1 REVELATION 13.

The first great enemy of Christ's Church, the cause of all the hostility against her, is Satan. Christ suffered his enmity, but passed through it triumphantly (vv. 1-6). Satan is already conquered in principle (vv. 7-9), though for a short time the Christian Church experiences his malignity (vv. 10-17).

2-6. The Church, of both the OT. and NT. covenants, is shown under the figure of a woman, clothed with heavenly glory (v. 1) from whom the Messiah is about to come: cp. Isa 66:10 Mic 4:10. She is opposed by the devil (v. 9), pictured, red with the blood of the saints: cp. 17:14 (v. 3). His seven heads and ten horns (cp. Dan 7?) represent the Roman emperors, through whom he exercised his power. The seven crowned heads perhaps signify the seven emperors, from Augustus to Titus, who had really reigned. The ten horns may stand for the same emperors with the addition of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius: cp. 13:1 17:10f. (see C. A. Scott, 'Century Bible: Revelation, p. 53). The dragon waits to attack the Messiah (v. 4), but when He is born (cp. Ps 2:7f.), the dragon has no power over Him, and He is exalted to God's throne: cp. Phil 2:9 (v. 5). The Church escapes from the dragon, as the Church of Israel escaped from Pharaoh into the wilderness, to be kept during a time of trouble: see on 11:2 (v. 6). The reference here may be to seasons of rest which the Palestinian Church experienced during the troubles which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem (cp. Ac 9:31), and to the escape of the Christians of Jerusalem to Pella before the siege: cp. Mt 24:10.

1. 2. Wonder] RV 'sign.' 3. Crowns] RV 'diadems,' i.e. kingly crowns. 4. Tail, etc.] i.e. he was huge and mighty: cp. Dan 8:10. 6. Feed] RV 'nourish.'

7-9. The Christians for whom St. John wrote were beginning to experience persecution: cp. 26:10f., 34 note. Yet their victory is assured. This is symbolically expressed under the figure of a war in heaven between good and evil angels (v. 7) in which Satan and his host are conquered and cast down from heaven (vv. 8f.). The figure is derived from Jewish apocalyptic ideas, but the meaning for Christians is that in the Death and Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, Satan was already essentially conquered: cp. Jn 12:21f., 16:8.

10-12. Satan being already potentially conquered, heaven celebrates in anticipation the victory which the persecuted saints will win because Christ died for them and gives them strength to die.

10. Accused] cp. 1 Tim 3:8f., 11. By] RV 'because of' (twice). Word of, etc.] i.e. the word of Christ to which they testify.

13-17. The devil is not able to hurt a section of the Church, perhaps the Palestinian Church at Pella is meant, for God protects her. God's protection is described in terms of the deliverance of the exodus, when Israel was borne by God on eagles' wings, cp. Ex 19:4 (v. 14), and escaped from Pharaoh into the wilderness, passing safely through the Red Sea ('water as a river,' vv. 15f.). This being so, Satan turns against the Church in Gentile lands (v. 17).

In this c. St. John used figures which were frequently employed in Jewish apocalypses. These may have been derived originally from the ancient myth of the fight between the sun and darkness. Whatever was their original meaning, here they are symbolical of Christian truth: cp. note, c. 6, on St. John's use of the prophecy in Mt 24.

CHAPTER 13

THE TWO BEASTS

Personification of the two powers inspired by the devil to persecute the Church.

1-10. The dragon stands by the sea (i.e. the Aegean Sea), from which there rises to meet him a 'beast,' i.e. something inhuman: signifying the Roman empire, which came to the Province of Asia, in which were the Churches addressed in Rev., from the sea. The beast has ten horns and seven heads: cp. Dan 7. On the horns are diadems and on the heads 'names of blasphemy,' i.e. blasphemous titles: cp. 17:8. The ten horns (see on 12:9) are the ten emperors from Augustus to Titus. The seven horns are those of the ten who had reigned long enough for worship to be paid to them, i.e. omitting Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. The 'names' were, probably, 'Augustus' or 'Sebastos,' i.e. 'reverenced,' under which the emperors were worshipped: cp. vv. 12, 21 note (v. 1).

1. The emperor represented the majesty, the wisdom, and the beneficent power of Rome: he was in many cases actually represented in different parts of the empire as an incarnation of the god worshipped in that district. Domitian delighted to be idolised as the Divine Providence in human form; and it is recorded that Caligula, Domitian, and Diocletian were the three emperors who delighted to be styled dominus et deus' (Ramsay, 'Church in Rom. Empire,' pp. 191, 275).

The monster combines the powers of the four beasts in Dan 7 (v. 2). One head is smitten unto death, but the death stroke is healed. This head probably represents Nero (54-68 A.D.), of whom popular report said that he was not dead, or that if dead he would return to life (Tacitus, 'Hist.' ii. 8, Suetonius, 'Nero,' 57): cp. 17:8. The word translated wounded, RV 'smitten,' is that translated 'slain,' of the Lamb, 5:6. It is implied that Nero, both as the head of the world kingdom, and in his death and return to life, was the counterpart of Christ in God's kingdom. St. John took this Nero superstition, and used it to symbolise the breaking out again of Nero's persecuting spirit in Domitian, 81-96 A.D. (v. 3). As Nero is represented as the counterpart of Christ, so the worship of the dragon and the beast is the evil counterpart of the worship of God: cp. 'who is like,' etc., with Ex 15:11 (v. 4). The beast blasphemes God and His tabernacle (i.e. the Church, the dwelling-place of God) by the assumption of divine honour and by imputing evil practices to Christianity: cp. 1 Pet 2:18 (vv. 5f.). He is appointed (i.e. by God, who overrules the work of evil men to His glory) to war against the 'saints' in worldwide power (v. 7), and worship is offered to him by the ungodly (vv. 8f.). The description of the beast ends with an injunction to the saints to submit to God's will in unresisting patience (v. 10).

6. And them, etc.] RV 'even them.' Christians are themselves God's 'tabernacle,' because He is 'in the midst of' them: cp. 21:8.

Dwell] Gk. 'tabernacle.' In heaven] Christians are here said to dwell in heaven, because they belong to the kingdom of heaven on earth and because in Christ they have begun to live the heavenly life: cp. Eph 2:6.

7. All kindreds, etc.] The Roman empire was world-wide. 8. Book of Life] see on 3:4.

From the foundation, etc.] i.e. in God's eternal counsel: cp. 1 Pet 1:20. RV 'if any man is for captivity, into captivity he goeth' (i.e. his captivity is by God's will): 'if any man shall kill with the sword, with the sword must he be killed,' i.e. Christians are not to fight against the persecutors, but are to submit to God's will: cp. Mt 26:52.

A second beast is seen. It comes out of the earth (contrast v. 1), because it belongs to the Province of Asia, the land of the writer and first readers of this book. This beast represented 'the Province of Asia, in its double aspect of civil and religious administration, the Proconsul and the Commune. It had two horns, corresponding to this double aspect, and was like a lamb, for Asia was a peaceful country where no army was needed' (Ramsay). Yet it spake as a dragon, i.e. it made the same blasphemous assertions and demands as those which the first beast had learnt from the dragon: cp. v. 5f. (v. 11). The authority of the Imperial Government had been delegated to the Provincial Government, which used its authority in enforcing the worship of the emperor. As the persecuting spirit of the empire was incarnate in Nero, the Imperial Government is identified with Nero himself, restored to life; i.e. the succeeding emperors will act in the spirit of Nero (v. 12). The worship of the emperor's image is recommended to the credulous populace by the aid of trickery and conjuring (v. 13f.), and by ventriloquism. (Hence the beast is also called the 'false prophet,' cp. 16:13 19:20 20:10.) The punishment for refusing to worship the image is death (v. 15). No one in the Province is allowed to buy or sell, who cannot produce a certificate, under Imperial seal ('the mark, even the name of the beast,' RV), showing that he has joined in the worship of the emperor. Or the meaning may be that all must offer incense with the hand, or bow the head, to the image, before they are allowed to trade (v. 16f.). The name of the beast, i.e. of the smitten head, is given as 666 (v. 18). The reference is to the numerical value of letters. In both Greek and Hebrew, letters of the alphabet were used as numbers. It has been found that if 'Neron Cesar' be written in Hebrew letters, the sum of the letters is 666. This is generally accepted at present, although, to get 666, 'Cesar' has to be written deflectively. If spelt 'Nero Cesar,' the sum of the letters is 616, which is the reading of some MSS. Some hold that 616 is the original reading, and that it represents 'Gaious Cesar,' i.e. Caligula. Irenaeus took the number as standing for 'Lateinos,'
CHAPTER 14

THE LAMB AND HIS FOLLOWERS. JUDGMENT ON HIS ENEMIES

In the last two chs. were seen the enemies of the Church, and their fierce power. Now, by way of contrast, and to encourage the Church to resist her enemies with complete certainty of victory, pictures are shown of the blessedness of those who witness a true confession for Christ, and of God's judgment on the ungodly.

1-5. The Lamb (cp. 5:6, etc.) is seen on Mount Zion, i.e. the true and heavenly home of the Church; cp. Heb 12:22. With Him are the perfect number (cp. 7:4) of those who had been marked with His name and the name of His Father, instead of with the mark of the beast; see on 3:12, and cp. 7:3 13:16f. Both here, and in 7:4, '144,000' is a figurative expression for the whole number of the Redeemed (v. 1). A heavenly chorus is heard, in which the voice of Christ is followed by the voices of the living creatures and of the elders (v. 2). The Redeemed join in the strain (v. 3). They are described as undefiled by idolatry, which is often described in Scripture as adultery against God, and which was itself commonly allied with impurity; as following the Lamb through suffering to glory; as a choice offering to God (v. 4); as having confessed the true God and not the lying idol (guile, RV 'lie'); and as an undefiled (fault, RV 'blemish') sacrifice, perhaps with an allusion to the death of the martyrs: cp. Heb 9:14 1Pet 1:19 (v. 5).

1. Looked] RV 'saw.' A Lamb] RV 'the Lamb.' His Father's name] RV 'his name, and the name of his Father.' 2. A voice] see on 1:10. I heard the voice of] RV 'the voice which I heard was as the voice of.' 3. They] i.e. the 144,000. Beasts] RV 'living creatures.' 4. Being] RV 'to be.'

6f. An angel announces the glad tidings for those who fear God, that He is about to be manifested for the salvation of His oppressed people.

6. Heaven] i.e. the sky. 8. The Fall of Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great, which hath made,' etc.: cp. Isa 21:9 Dan 4:30. The wrath of her fornication] i.e. the wrath of God incurred by her unfaithfulness to God in which they had shared: cp. 17:2 Jer 51:17.

9-13. God's wrath is denounced on any who fall away from the Lamb to the beast (v. 9). Their woe is described in language drawn from Isa 34:8, and from the account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 10f.). The wrath of God is more terrible than that of the beast, hence the endurance of the 'saints' is justified (v. 12). Therefore, also, it is well with those who have died in persecution in the faith of Christ; for while death brings no rest to those who worship the beast (cp. v. 11), the death of the saints brings rest from their labours and sorrows (v. 13).

14-20. St. John sees one 'like unto a son of man' (RV). The expression is derived from Dan 7:13, where it meant one in human form, as contrasted with the beasts. The title was interpreted of the Messiah, and the Jewish 'Book of Enoch' shows that under it the Messiah was regarded as a supernatural person. This was the significance of the term when our Lord applied it to Himself, and He joined to it the conception of the 'man of sorrows' of Isa 53. Now, after His sorrows, He is throned on a 'white cloud' (representing the glory of God, cp. Ex 40:34 1K 8:10 Mt 17:5 Mk 14:62), and crowned as king: cp. 19:12 (v. 14). He casts His sickle down to the earth, and the harvest of the saints is gathered (vv. 15f.).

Then the angel of the fire on God's altar (cp. 9:14 16f.), the fire of God's judgments (cp. 8:5), calls for the gathering of the wicked for the winepress of God's wrath: cp. 19:15 Isa 63:1. Joel 1:15. (v. 17f.). Those who are judged (v. 19) are separated from the heavenly state of the redeemed ('without the city,' cp. Zech 14:4,10 Heb 13:11f.). The awfulness of the judgment is described in language similar to that of a description of judgment in the 'Book of Enoch'; and its universality, by the extent of land covered by blood. 'Four' is the number symbolical of the earth, and 1600 is a thousand times the square of 4: cp. '144,000,' the number expressing the people of God (v. 20).

15. Temple] cp. 11:19. Crying...to him] i.e. the will of the Father is communicated to Christ. Thrust in] RV 'send forth' (and v. 18).

For these] RV omits. Ripe] RV 'overripe.' 16, 19. Thrust in] RV 'cast.'

18. Vine] RV 'vintage.' 20. By the space of] RV 'as far as.'

CHAPTER 15

THE SEVEN ANGELS OF THE BOWLS

The crisis of the book is drawing near. The enemies of Christ and His Church—Satan, the empire, and the Provincial Government—have been shown in their power and cruelty. In ch. 14 these were left standing in their might, while the blessed safety of the people of God was pictured. In this ch. is described the approach of the judgments which are about to fall on the empire and on the heathen world.

1-4. Seven angels appear, to whom are committed the 'plagues,' i.e. scourging punishments, which are the last (RV), because in them the temporal judgments of God are fully carried out (RV 'finished'). But yet once more there is a pause, as if the safety of God's people in the midst of all this sin and judgment could not be insisted on sufficiently, and a vision is granted of the blessedness of those who by faithfulness even unto death have conquered the beast. They stand by the 'glassy sea' (RV), i.e. the firmament (see on 48), having harps of God, i.e. harps such as are suited to the heavenly worship of God (v. 2). They sing the song of Moses and the song of the Lamb, i.e. a song called out by the deliverance wrought by Christ, as the song of Ex 15 was called out by the deliverance from Egypt—a song in praise of God who from the time of Moses to the time of Christ has never forgotten His oppressed people (vv. 3 f.).

Saints] RV 'the ages': cp. 1 Tim 1:7 (BM).

5-8. Again, as in 11:8, is opened the sanctuary of the heavenly tabernacle, by which is symbolized that presence of God to which the worship of heaven is directed, and from which the actions of heaven proceed, and which was typified on earth by the earthly tabernacle. In 11:8 it was God's mercy, represented by the ark of the covenant, which was manifested; now it is the declaration of His holy will, represented by the 'testimony,' i.e. the ten commandments, which is to be enforced (v. 5).

From the Divine Presence come forth the angels of the plagues, as priests, but arrayed with flashing gems (v. 6). To them are given golden 'bowls' (RV), corresponding to the basons used by the priests for the blood in the sacrificial ritual (cp. Ex 27:29) full of God's wrath (v. 7). The Presence of God, sanctioning the service, is manifested by the smoke of His glory: cp. Ex 40:35 1 K 8:10. Isa 6:4 (v. 8).

CHAPTER 16

THE SEVEN BOWLS

In the last c. there was a pause of suspense, during which the angels of the 'plagues' were seen coming forth from the Presence of God to pour out His wrath. In this c. the suspense is ended, and the angels pour out God's wrath into the earth.

x-9. The vision of the 'bowls' (RV) is parallel with that of the 'trumpets' (chs. 8-9). In each vision there are four preparatory judgments, falling upon the earth, the sea, the rivers and fountains, and the sun. But, in the 'trumpets,' it is the 'third part' that is affected; while in the 'bowls' it is the whole. At the fourth trumpet, the third part of the heavenly bodies are darkened; while at the fourth bowl, the sun blazes out with scorching heat. These differences are in harmony with the figure employed. The 'trumpets' herald the judgments, and give anticipations and warnings of them by calamities which foreshadow others. The first four trumpets and the first four bowls are parallel with the sixth seal (6:12 f.) and with Mt 24:29 f. They foretell judgments to fall upon the heathen world of the Roman empire (cp. v. 2) before, and leading up to, the destruction of Rome. As in the 'trumpets,' the description is partly derived from the plagues of Egypt. It is to be understood, not literally, but as figuring a time of intense calamity and terror.

1. A great voice] i.e. God's: see on 11:10.

5. Angel of the waters] As Churches (cp. 180), and nations and armies (cp. 9:14), so also the elements of nature (cp. 7:1 14:18) are in Rev. represented as having a spiritual counterpart. The exact idea occurs nowhere else in the Bible, though for what, possibly, may be approaches to it, cp. Job 4:18 25:4, 5 Ps 104:4 Isa 24:1 f. Dan 10:11, 12. Mt 18:10 Ac 12:10 Heb 1:7 (RV). In so poetical a book as Rev., it is difficult to decide whether these angels of water, fire, etc., are meant to be understood as real beings or merely as poetical personifications.

7. Another out of the altar] RV 'the altar': cp. 6:8 8:3. The altar is personified: see previous note. 9. God, which] RV 'the God which.'

10f. The fifth bowl is poured in judgment upon the city of Rome, the seat of empire. The heathen world governed by Rome becomes full of the darkness of terror and rebellion at God's judgments. This is parallel to the spiritual torments threatened at the fifth trumpet: cp. 9:11. It is in contrast to the fifth seal (cp. 6:9, 12), where the martyrs, who have suffered, call on God, while here the subjects of the beast blaspheme God because of their pains.

10. Seat] RV 'throne.'

12-16. The sixth bowl is poured out upon
Here the 'Euphrates' is to be dried up, to make a way for the kings from the sunrising, i.e. that they may be able to capture Rome; see on 17:16 (v. 12). The drying up of the Euphrates refers to the manner in which Cyrus took the literal Babylon by diverting the course of the river. The capture of Rome is preparatory to the final battle of the 'kings of the world,' i.e. ungodly nations, against the Lamb at Har-Magedon (RV); cp. 17:12L (vv. 14–16). Har-Magedon probably means 'the Mount of Megiddo,' and signifies that the future battle is typified by the defeat of the kings of Canaan (Jdg 5:19; cp. Zech 12:11). The kings of the earth are stirred up to fight against the Lamb by the influence of the Lamb's three great enemies: cp. 1 K 22:20. Their evil influence is shown under the figure of frogs (cp. Ex 8:7), because it was by producing frogs that the magicians deceived Pharaoh (vv. 13 f.).

17-21. The seventh bowl is poured out, and the voice of God announces that the end of the preparatory judgments is reached (v. 17). With the lightnings and thunderings and voices which close each vision (cp. 8:5 11:19), comes now a great earthquake (v. 18), which splits Babylon (Rome) into three, and overthrows other worldly powers (v. 19). Some have understood this as a literal prediction that Rome was to be destroyed by an earthquake. More probably the earthquake represents the shaking of all earthly institutions when God comes to judgment: cp. 6:12 8:5 11:19. The judgments of the bowls end with a picture, expressed in physical figures, of the upheaval and destruction which accompany the manifestation of the wrath of God: cp. 6:14 11:19 20:11 (vv. 20 f.). The cup] see on 14:8.

CHAPTER 17
Babylon the great harlot

The judgment on Rome, which had been announced before, is now shown in detail. The identification of 'Babylon' with Rome, here and elsewhere in Rev., is supported (HDB.) by the following considerations:—
The name Babylon in 17:5 'is described as mystery, i.e. a name to be allegorically interpreted... B. is described (1) as "the harlot"; the supreme antithesis of "the bride," "the holy city," "the new Jerusalem"; (2) as the centre and ruler of the nations, 14:8 17:1f., 15, 18; (3) (6) as engraven by luxury, 18:7,12f. 22; (7) as the arch-persecutor of the saints and of "the witnesses of Jesus," 17:4 19:2. Babylon, as the seat of world-empire, and the ancient and persistent enemy of the people of God, was a striking type of Rome. Many think Rome is meant in 1 Pet 5:13.

1 f. Rome is spoken of by the herald angel of the bowls as a harlot, cp. Isa 23:15f. (Tyre). Nah 3:4 (Nineveh), sitting on many waters, cp. Jer 51:13 (Babylon), which signify the peoples over whom Rome ruled, cp. v. 15. 1. Vials] RV 'bowls.'

3-6. St. John is taken to a wilderness to see the harlot city, as in Isa 21: the vision of Babylon's fall was declared from a wilderness. She is sitting on a beast, i.e. the Roman empire: cp. 13:10. The beast is scarlet, because of the blood shed by Rome. It is full of names of blasphemy (e.g. Sebestos; see on 13:1), for in coins and seals and statues and temples the empire was full of such names. It has seven heads and ten horns, explained in vv. 9, 12 (v. 3). The woman, i.e. the city, is clothed with luxury, and she has in her hand a golden cup, signifying debauchery: cp. 14:8 Jer 51:7 (v. 4). On her forehead, after the custom of Roman harlots, is a label with her name (v. 5). She is drunken with the blood shed in the persecution of Nero. St. John wonders at her iniquity (v. 6). 6. Admiration] RV 'wonder.' For some description of the condition of Rome, see Intro. Romans. The state of society at Rome, at the time of the Rev., was probably the worst the world had ever seen. The aristocracy, which alone had any voice in public affairs, was, with few exceptions, utterly given over to the most shameless wickedness. Vast wealth was in their hands, which was spent in unbridled luxury and debauchery. Their continual craving for new sensations was ministered to by foreign parasites, who introduced new vices and flagrant superstitions. With no feeling for others, their cruelty was appalling. With their appetite for life jaded by the pursuit of pleasure, suicide became common. The herded masses of the people were sunk in ignorance and pauperism. The public distribution of corn confirmed them in idleness, and the public shows helped to harden their hearts and to corrupt their feelings. The State religion was not believed in by the educated, while it had no moral teaching to provide for those who did believe in it, and there was no system of public education.

The Christians were accused of having caused the great fire which raged in Rome for nine days (64 A.D.) According to Tacitus, a great multitude were convicted, not only of incendiariam, but of hatred of mankind. Some were covered with the hides of wild beasts and worried to death by dogs; others were covered with pitch and set on fire at nightfall to illumine the imperial gardens. For some years Christians were punished on the accusation of horrible crimes. Afterwards, certainly by the time of Domitian, the mere profession of Christianity became punishable.

7-18. The angel interprets the mystery (v. 7). The beast, which has previously represented the empire, now stands for Nero, in whom the cruelty of the empire had been personified: see on 13:3. He shall come up out of the 'abyss' (RV), cp. 9:1 note, 117, i.e. return to life, and then go to perdition: cp. 19:20 Mt 17:18 (v. 8). The seven heads have two significations. They represent the seven hills of Rome on which the city sits (v. 9). They also represent seven kings, i.e. probably Augustus (27 B.C.-14 A.D.), Tiberius (14-37), Caligula (37-41), Claudius (41-54), Nero (54-68), Vespasian (69-79), Titus (79-81). Five are dead; therefore, apparently, the prophecy was written in the reign of Vespasian. Titus is about to come (v. 10). Then Domitian (81-96) will reign. Besides being the eighth king, he will be 'Nero,' because in him the persecuting spirit of Nero will have returned (v. 11). The ten horns are given an interpretation different from that in c. 13. Now they signify 'the kings of the rising' of 16:12 (v. 12). These are to join with the beast in war against the Lamb, and the Lamb will overcome them: cp. 16:18 19:10ff. (vv. 13ff.). In one sense, the Lamb overcomes them when not even death could make Christ's people unfaithful to Him; in another sense, when the empire became converted to Christ. The kings of the earth, joined to the beast, will turn against the city, and destroy and burn her. In v. 16 use is made of the common expectations that Nero, returned to life, and in alliance with the Parthians, would take signal vengeance on Rome for her rebellion against him (vv. 16ff.). In v. 18 the city is identified with Rome. It is clear that the prophecy of the destruction of Rome, of which this c. forms part, has not been fulfilled. It has been suggested that the rapid spread of Christianity in Rome altered the character of the city, and that, for this reason, God witheld the threatened judgment: cp. Gn 18:32f. (Sodom), Jos 10:30 (Nineveh).

8. That was] RV 'how that he was.' Yet is] RV 'shall come.' 9. Here is the mind, etc.] i.e. a wise man will be able to understand that which follows. The expression challenges the reader's attention: cp. 13:8.

10. There] RV 'they.' 10ff. He must continue, etc.] With a different punctuation of the Greek this might be rendered, 'he must continue a little while, and (so must) the beast which was and is not. And he himself is also an eighth,' etc. With this rendering, the beast is not identified with one of his horns. 11. Even he is the eighth] RV 'is himself also an eighth.' 12. One hour] i.e. a very short time. 14. And they . . . called] RV 'and they also shall overcome that are with him, called.' 16. Upon] RV 'and.'

CHAPTER 18

THE FALL OF BABYLON

In the last c., the fall of Rome, and the manner of its fall, were prophetically announced. In this c., the greatness of the tragedy is shown by songs of thanksgiving and of lamentation which it calls forth.

As was suggested on c. 17, we may believe that the songs of the joy of angels over sinners that repent have taken the place of these songs. Yet they serve their purpose in encouraging God's people to faith and endurance when at any time wickedness and worldliness seem to be triumphant.

The language of the prophets of the OT. is freely used. From the human side, we may say that the mind of the writer was so saturated with the old Scriptures that he naturally employed their language. From the divine side, we are to learn that 'no prophecy . . . is of any private interpretation,' 2 Pet 1:20, and that God looks on worldly wickedness at any time according to the same principles with which he regarded Babylon and Tyre of old.

1-3. Proclamation of the Fall of Rome.

3. RV 'For by the wine of . . . all the nations are fallen': cp. 14:8 17:3. Abundance of her delicacies] RV 'power of her wantonness.'

4-8. God's people are commanded to come out of Babylon as, before, they were warned to quit Jerusalem: cp. Jer 51:42 Mt 24:14. So, spiritually, God's people are to take care that the pleasures of wickedness do not entice them to have fellowship with it.

9-20. Dirge of those who loved the wicked city. The writer evidently had in his mind Ezek 26:1 (of Tyre). The dirge is suddenly overmastered (v. 20) by the exultation of those she has oppressed.

9. Deliciously] RV 'wanton.' 11. Rome was not a trading city, but must have been a great buyer of luxuries. 12. Thine wood] a very hard, fragrant wood, specially valued by the Greeks and Romans as a material for tables (HDB.).

14. Goodly] RV 'sumptuous.' Ye holy apostles] RV ye saints, and ye apostles,—SS. Peter and Paul were put to death at Rome. Avenged you] RV 'judged your judgment.'

21-24. An angel compares the casting down of Babylon to the casting down of a millstone into the sea, i.e. it shall be sudden, and 'with no restoration in the future' (Benson).

CHAPTER 19
CHRIST AND HIS ARMIES CONQUER THE BEAST AND HIS PROPHET

The harlot city having been destroyed, the marriage of the Lamb with the glorified Church is announced. But before this can take place, the other enemies of the Lamb must be overcome, and St. John sees in a vision the overthrow of the beast and of the false prophet.

1-4. The great multitude of the saints in heaven (see on 11:19) praises God (v. 1) because the wicked city, which corrupted the earth, and shed the blood of God's servants, is judged (vv. 2-3). The living creatures and the elders join in the worship and praise (v. 4).

1. Alleluia] RV 'Hallelujah,' lit. 'praise ye the Lord.' The word, which occurs only here in the NT., is common in the Psalms.

5-10. A voice calls on all God's servants to praise Him (v. 5). In response, a vast hymn of praise from Christ, the living creatures, and the saints (see on 11:19) is heard, announcing the marriage of the Lamb (vv. 6-7). In this way, as so often, the writer brings forward a new thought, which is to be developed later (see on 21:11). The bride, the New Jerusalem, is to be arrayed in the pure linen of righteous acts, in contrast to the harlot's red garment of sin: cp. 18:3 (v. 8). The herald angel declares the blessedness of those who are called (RV 'bidden') to the marriage supper: cp. 3:10; 17:14 Mt 22:8 Lk 14:15 (v. 9). Of course, except in idea, 'the bride' and those 'called,' i.e. the Church and its members, are identical. Filled with wonder and joy, St. John falls down to worship the angel: cp. 22:8. But the angel checks him, saying that his worship is for God alone (cp. Col 2:18), and that the fact that the testimony of Jesus, i.e. probably the Revelation made by Jesus, is ministered both by the angel and by Christian prophets and saints, is a sign that they are fellow-servants (v. 10).

5. Out of] RV 'forth from.' The voice does not seem to be God's. Perhaps it is the throne which speaks: see on 16:7. Servants, and ye] RV 'servants; ye.' Be arrayed] RV 'array herself.' Clean and white] RV 'bright and pure.' Righteousness] RV 'righteous acts.' These 'righteous acts' are not the cause of salvation, but its consequence.

10. For the testimony, etc.] probably a comment made by St. John. Spirit of prophecy] i.e. the inspiring force of all prophecy.

11-16. Before the fulfilment of the marriage, the Lamb's enemies must be overcome. Christ comes forth as a warrior (cp. Ps 45:11-12), riding the white horse of victory. HisCrowns show Him to be King of kings: cp. v. 16. He alone knows His name, i.e. He is greater than any one can say or understand: cp. 2:17; 3:14 Mt 11:27. Yet, as coming forth from the Father, He is called the Word of God (cp. Jn 1, 1 Jn 1); and when He conquers and rules the nations He is called King of kings and Lord of lords: cp. 17:14. His garments are sprinkled with blood, i.e. His enemies perish before Him: cp. Isa 63:16 (vv. 11-13). The heavenly hosts of angels (cp. 1 K 22:19) follow Him, but no blood is on their garments, for He alone overcomes the enemies, cp. v. 21 (v. 14), which He does by the word of His mouth: cp. 1:16; 21:19 Is 11:1 Jn 12:46 Heb 4:12. He treads God's enemies in the winepress of God's anger (a change of figure): cp. 14:10-11.

17. In the sun] i.e. in mid heaven; a central station to call to the vultures. Fowls] RV 'birds.' The supper, etc.] RV 'the great supper of God,' i.e. the supper which God has prepared.

19-21. The persecuting empire gathers all its forces to overcome Christ, cp.16:14-16 note, 17:12 (v. 19), but is itself overcome, together with the Asian Emperor-worship, figured by the beast and the false prophet or second beast: cp. 13:11f. note, 16:18. Both empire and Emperor-worship are cast into the lake of fire (v. 20). The 'lake of fire' (cp. 20:10, 14, 21) is Gehenna, cp. Mt 18:9 (RM) Mk 9:48 (BM), etc., i.e. 'the valley of Hinnom.' This is a valley outside Jerusalem, and was the place of idolatrous sacrifices to Molech: cp. 2 K 16:10 21:6 Jer 7:21f. 19:11. It came to be regarded as a figure for the place of punishment of the wicked: cp. Isa 66:24 2 Esdr 3:6f. Mt 5:29 (RM) 10:28 (BM): see HDB. Evidently the casting of empire and idolatry into such a place can only be a figure for the complete destruction of the persecuting and wicked systems. The 'rest' (RV), i.e. the kings of the earth and their armies, were killed with the sword.
of Christ’s mouth (v. 21). The distinction between their fate and that of the two beasts appears to have been made, partly because destruction by the lake of fire could not be the end of any human being before the Judgment, partly because the slaughter is symbolic. Christ overcomes men who are His enemies, in one way by strengthening His people to endure their assaults, in another way by converting them. But it is not so much individuals who are spoken of here, as the systems and principles of evil which succeeding generations of individuals nourish and carry out. It is those systems and principles which are conquered by Christ. The weapons which they turn against Him and His people are persecution, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, the spirit of materialism, etc. This spirit of the world is conquered by the preaching of the gospel of Christ, and by the Spirit of Christ in the hearts of men. This is the battle of Har- Magedon.

20. Miracles] RV ‘the sigma,’ i.e. those spoken of in 134, where see notes.

CHAPTER 20
SATAN CONQUERED. THE LAST JUDGMENT

In this c. the visions of the overthrow of Christ’s enemies are continued. The devil is bound for 1,000 years (vv. 1–3); the martyrs reign with Christ for 1,000 years (vv. 4–6). It is foretold that, at the end of the 1,000 years, Satan will be loosed, and will make a last assault against the saints, after which he is cast into the lake of fire (vv. 7–10). A vision of the Last Judgment follows (vv. 11–15).

The binding of Satan and the reign of the saints with Christ, both for 1,000 years, is known as the Millennium. Many of the later Jews expected that the Messianic kingdom, of which the prophets spoke, would come in the present age, and they distinguished it from the Final Judgment and new heaven of righteousness which would follow. By some it was said that the Messianic kingdom would last 1,000 years, though other periods were also named.

It is plain that St. John made use of this Jewish expectation in his prophecy. But it does not follow that he meant it to be understood literally. It is more in harmony with the character of the book to suppose that he meant this Jewish apocalyptic expectation to be understood spiritually. The same conclusion seems probable from the general circumstances. The Christians had just been told that the persecuting city and empire would be overcome. They might ask whether the devil, the author of all evil, would not raise up fresh enemies against them.

1–3. For a thousand years the devil will be bound and shut up in the abode of spiritual evil (the ‘abyss,’ see on 91, not ‘the lake of fire,’ which is the place of final punishment, see on 1920). The meaning is, that for 1,000 years the power of evil would not be able to gather itself into an organised attack upon Christianity. The ‘1,000 years’ are not to be understood numerically, but as a period of rest and happiness. For 1,000 is a multiple of 10, which was regarded as a sacred number because the commandments are 10; and it is the number which was considered to stand for the sabbath in the history of the world, 1,000 years’ rest coming after 6,000 years’ toil: cp. Ps90.

4–6. The Christians for whom St. John wrote would ask what share they had in these joyful tidings. Although generations to come would enjoy rest and peace, it was not to be in their day, and many of them must suffer death. So they are told that good things are in store for them. Although they die, yet their souls will live and reign with Christ (v. 4). ‘The rest of the dead,’ i.e. the ungodly dead, the men of the earth, ‘lived not,’ i.e. did not share in the presence of Christ, but remained for the Judgment: cp. v. 11. The life of the saints with Christ is called the first resurrection (cp. Jn525), because it depends upon the resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. As such, it belongs to all who are Christ’s, whether on earth or in paradise (v. 5). Over them the second death’ (cp. v. 14, 21) has no power, because they ‘have passed from death unto life,’ 1Jn314 (v. 6).

7–10. After the time of rest, and when the Final Judgment is near, the power of evil will gather force again (v. 7). Gog and Magog, i.e. the world hostile to God’s people, cp. Ezk38f. (v. 9), will assail the Church (the ‘camp of the saints and the beloved city,’ i.e. the spiritual Jerusalem). But God will overthrow these last enemies (v. 9), and the devil will be cast into the lake of fire, i.e. the power of evil will be destroyed for ever (v. 10).

11–15. God sits on a great white throne, i.e. in glory and purity (v. 11), to judge the wicked dead. They are not written ‘in the book of life’ (cp. 35 158 178 2177), and they are judged according to their works (vv. 12f.), and cast into the lake of fire. Into the lake of fire, Death and Hades (i.e. the abode of the dead) are also cast, for ‘the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death’ (1 Cor 552; cp. 214). This is the ‘second death,’ for it is the final separation from eternal life (vv. 14f.). This judgment does not apply to Christ’s people: cp. Jn 5:24. They are in the book of life. They already 'live' (cp. v. 4), and, therefore, are not reckoned among the 'dead' of v. 11.

It is plain that St. John's view is, as it were, foreshortened. He sees the overthrow of the anti-Christian persecution. He sees, farther on, the Last Judgment. But he does not specify the length of the time of rest and then of conflict for the Church which lies between.

1. 3. Bottomless pit: RV 'abyss.' 3. Him up: RV 'it.' Set a seal upon him: RV 'sealed it over him.' deceive: i.e. into attacking the Church: cp. v. 8, 10, 19; Gn 2 Jn 8:12, 44.

Witness: RV 'testimony,' i.e. the revelation made by Christ, 'the faithful witness': cp. 1, 5, 9, 12, 17, 19:10. Mark: cp. 13:14. Reigned: The saints share Christ's triumph over sin and death, and also, in ways which we know not, share the glories of His kingdom: cp. 5:10 Ro 8:17.

13, 14. Hell: RV 'Hades.'

14. The second death: RV 'the second death, even the lake of fire': cp. 21:1 Mt 25:41.

CHAPTER 21

THE HOLY CITY

The enemies of the Lamb have been conquered. The Judgment is over. The old condition of things has passed away: cp. 20:11. Now St. John sees in a vision the blissful glory of heaven, in which the Lamb's redeemed people will dwell for ever.

1–8. The eternal dwelling-place prepared for the redeemed is seen from a distance (vv. 1 f.), and the voice of God declares what it means (vv. 3–6), and for whom its glories are (vv. 7 f.).

Three points come out in the description.

1. The Presence of God with the Jew, symbolised by the tabernacle in the wilderness, will now be perfected by His dwelling ("dwell," lit. "tabernacle," v. 3; cp. Jn 1:14 RM) with the redeemed of all races ("men," v. 3). The "peoples," i.e. Gentiles, have become "His peoples" (v. 3 RV), and He their Emmanuel ("God...with them," v. 3): cp. Isa 7:14 Mt 1:23.

He will take them from and keep them from all sorrow, pain, and death (cp. 7:17 Isa 25:8 35:10 65:18f.), because these belonged to the first dispensation, while now, (2) all things are new. There is a new heaven, i.e. sky, and a new earth (cp. Isa 65:17 66:22), from which the sea, emblem of unrest and of separation, has departed (v. 1); there is a new society, 'new Jerusalem' (v. 2); and 'all things,' i.e. all ways and thoughts and circumstances of existence, are new: cp. 2 Cor 5:17 (v. 5). The word translated 'new' does not signify 'that which has never existed before,' but 'fresh,' 'that which has not been used or worn'; so it may be taken as meaning 'undimmed,' 'unsullied.'

The term 'new Jerusalem' is used figuratively for the divine society of the redeemed in glory. As "Jerusalem" represents the society of the redeemed on earth: cp. 20:9 Gal 4:20. It is a 'city' in the sense of being an organised community: cp. Eph 2:19 Heb 11:16. The New Jerusalem is compared to a bride (vv. 2–9; contrast 17:15), to denote that the happiness of the redeemed springs from their union with Christ: cp. Isa 61:10, 62:11. Mt 22:8 25:10 Lk 12:2 Eph 5:21.

(3) Those for whom these blessed things are in store: those who thirst for, i.e. intensely desire, God, righteousness, and eternal life, cp. Isa 55:1 Mt 5:6 Jn 5:7 Ro 2:7 (v. 6), and who 'overcome' (v. 7). Thus the chief purpose of the book, in encouraging the tempted and persecuted to overcome by resistance unto death, is maintained to the end. The 'city' is not for those who are too cowardly to endure, who fall from faith and join in heathen abominations (v. 8).

4. Former: RV 'first.'

5. He said: i.e. the herald angel. He said: i.e. God. It is done: RV 'They are come to pass'; 'they' = these words (v. 5).

7. All: RV these.

9–27. Further description of the city. St. John has seen the city descending in the distance. Now it is shown him in full view by one of the angels of the bowls (vv. 9 f.), probably the herald angel: cp. 17:1, see on 11:10. The visible cloud of God's glory is in the city (cp. vv. 3, 28 Ezk 43:24. Heb 9:4), and causes her to shine with glory as she descends (v. 11). Her walls represent her beauty and security, and, with the gates and foundations (cp. No. 2 Ezk 48 Eph 2:20), signify also that she is the home of the Church of both OT. and NT. The twelve Apostles are mentioned as a body, so that we need not ask whether the twelfth was Matthias or Paul (vv. 12–14). The city is measured, but as the city is figurative, so are the measurements. All the dimensions are compounded of 12, the number of the OT. and the NT. (cp. 7:4), the number which signifies that God is in the midst of His people: see on
11. 9. The city is a cube, which, when taken literally, would be monstrous, but in its symbolical meaning says that the whole city is a sanctuary like the Holy of Holies in the Tabernacle (vv. 15–17). The magnificence of the city is figured by the most beautiful and precious things (vv. 18–21). Her spiritual perfection is such that no special sanctuary is needed: cp. Jn 4:21. There is no one in the city who is not at one with God. All her people are united in His service. Thus 'there is no temple, because the city is all temple' (C. A. Scott) (v. 22).

12. Twelve gates] Four is the number which is the symbol of the world, three that of God. Twelve, therefore, is the signature of the covenant people among whom God dwells. The enclosure of the Tabernacle was a square space, three tribes being over against each of the four sides. Thus we have a square with the Tabernacle in the midst, expressive of God in the midst of His people' (Currey).

13. The wall] i.e. the thickness of the wall: cp. Jer 51:28. The angel] RV 'an angel,' i.e. the angelic cubit was of the same length as a human cubit.

19f. The stones are, with exceptions, the same as those in the high priest's breastplate (cp. Ex 28:17; 39:10f.), and those ascribed to the king of Tyre (Ex 28:18). Flinders Petrie (HDB.) says that precious stones were not so exactly distinguished from one another in ancient days as they are now. 'Jasper' was, according to him, green jasper; the 'sapphire' was our lapis-lazuli; the 'chaldéony' was diopside (silicate of copper); the 'emerald' should be rock-crystal, cp. 4:3 note; 'sardonyx' was the red and white onyx; the 'sardius' was red jasper; the 'chrysolite' in St. John's time was the present topaz; they 'eryl' was either beryl, i.e. an opaque emerald, or green felspar; the 'topaz' was peridé; the 'chrysoprasus' was probably, the green chaldéony; the 'jacinth' was the sapphire; the 'amethyst' was the modern amethyst.

24. Of them which are saved] RV omits.

CHAPTER 22

THE VISION ENDED. THE LORD IS AT HAND

The inner life of the heavenly Jerusalem is described. Then the 'Revelation' closes with the repeated assurance that Christ is at hand, and with the yearnings of the Church and of St. John for the joy of His advent.

1–5. In the New Jerusalem, the blessed life of Eden is more than restored. There is a river of life (cp. Gn 2:10), i.e. the Holy Spirit: cp. Jn 4:14 7:37. Cp. also Ezek 47:1 Joel 3:18 Zech 14:8, in which prophecies the waters come from the Temple: here there is no Temple, and the waters flow from the throne of God, i.e. they are the result of God's immediate presence, and of His fully accepted government (v. 1). On either side of the river as it flows in the midst of the street is a grove of trees, the tree of life:

26. 29. Ezek 47:12. The fruit is always available, for there is a fresh crop every month: cp. the manna, Jn 6:31. The leaves healed the sin of the 'nations' within the city, and the fruit nourishes their life. In the tree we see the cross on which Christ hung as precious fruit (v. 2). Now, too, as He became a curse for us' (Gal 3:13), the curse of Eden (cp. Gn 3:17, 22f.) is taken away: cp. Zech 14:11. Over the 'sweet societies' of the Redeemed, God and the Lamb reign for ever. The Redeemed offer up worship face to face with God (the 'baptistic vision') (cp. Ps 17:15 Mt 5:8, 1 Cor 13:1 1 Jn 3:2) and receive His Name, i.e. are marked as His (see on 7:9 and 14:1), and transformed into His likeness (vv. 3f.). And as His glory thus shines upon and enters into them, they 'reign,' i.e. their life can develop and expand to its fullest powers, there being no evil ('curse,' v. 3) in them to be restrained, nor hindering circumstances without to restrain them (v. 5).

1. Clear] RV 'bright.' 1f. And of the Lamb. In the midst of the street...river] RV 'and of the Lamb, in the midst of the street thereof. And on this side of the river and on that.'

2. manner] RM 'crops.'

3. Candle] RV 'light of lamp.'

6–9. Affirmation of the truth of the vision which is now concluded, and of the near approach of that of which it tells (vv. 6, 7). St. John, knowing the angel has finished his task and is about to leave him, falls before him in worship, as in 19:10, but is again charged to worship God alone (vv. 8f.).

6. The Lord God of the holy prophets] RV 'the Lord, the God of the spirits of the prophets': cp. 1 Cor 14:8. The meaning is that the words of the Christian prophecies do not speak their own mind, but God's. Christ's voice breaks in: cp. 16:15.

8. RV 'And I John am he that saw these things.'

10–15. The vision is not to be sealed, as was Daniel's (cp. Dan 12:4), because it's for immediate use (v. 10). Those who will not turn and repent because of the Revelation which Christ has now completed, will not have any greater power brought to bear on them before He comes again: Ezek 16:81 (Benson) (vv. 11–13). Happy are they who are purified, through faith, by His blood (cp. 7:14), for the life and joy of the city are theirs (vv. 14 f.).

10. Seal not] RV 'seal not up': cp. 10:1.

14. Do his commandments] RV 'their robes.' Right] RV 'the right to.'

16f. The Messiah attests the Revelations (v. 16). The Holy Spirit in the Church Ro 8:16, and the Church herself, hearing voice, call for His advent, and, at the same time, invite all who will to take part with Church in this joyful expectation (v. 17).

17. The root, etc. The reference is to Messiahship of our Lord, as son of David, as the 'star' of Balaam's prophecy: cp. Nu 24:17 Isa 11:10 Mt 1:22 22:42. Bri see on 21:16. Hear] see on 13. A thirst]

18f. A warning that the book is not to be falsified by addition or excision: cp. Dt 12:82.

20f. Christ sums up the book by announcing His speedy advent, and St. John prays for (v. 20). The book, and with it the Bible closes in prayer for that in which all its blessings are contained, 'the grace,' i.e. the man tested love, 'of the Lord Jesus' (v. 21).
