ULDUM, the son of Mizraim, (Gen. x. 13.) and also the name of a people frequently mentioned in Scripture, Isa. lxvi. 19; Jer. xvi. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 10, xxvi. 5. We must, however, distinguish between the inhabitants of Mizraim, (Gen. x. 13.) or rather, a people or colony which had migrated from Egypt, and Lud the son of Shem, in verse 22, noticed above. These African Ludim are usually mentioned with Phil, Ethiopia and Phut. They were also mercenary auxiliaries to Tyre; and we must therefore expect to meet with them in a country which admits of all these particulars. Bochart inclines to Abyssinia; but this seems to have other characters, and is justly rejected by Michaelis. In Isaiah lxvi. 19, Lud is associated with
LUKE

Pul, or Phal, and described as a nation which draws the bow; also Jer. xvi. 19. In Ezekiel xxx. 5, it is in our translation taken for Lydia, being, however, mentioned with the mingled people, or Assyrian; it is distinguished from that country, but plainly placed in Africa. We may therefore admit of two Lydias under this name. (1.) Lydia in Asia; and (2.) Lydia, or Ludim, in Africa. Josephus affirms, that the descendants of Ludim had been long extinct, having been destroyed in the Ethiopian wars. The Jerusalem paraphrase translates Ludim, the inhabitants of the Marodeis, a part of Egypt. The truth is, that although these people were in Egypt, it is not easy to show exactly where they dwelt.

LUHITH, a mountain, in the opinion of Lyra, and the Hebrew commentators on Is. xvi. 5; but Eusebius thinks it to be a place between Antioch and Joara; others suppose between Petra and Sibor. From Jer. xlv. 5, it is evident that it was an elevated station, but whether a town on a hill, or a place for prospect, does not appear. It seems to be associated with other places which we know to be towns.

The order of the places named is not the same in both prophets, though both refer to the calamities of Moab, to which dominion Ludim belonged.

LUKE, the Evangelist, is the author of the Gospel bearing his name, and also of the Acts of the Apostles. As Mr. Taylor has bestowed much labor on an historical biography of this evangelist, with a view to the elucidation and authentication of several of the Scripture narratives, we shall lay before our readers the most material part of his dissertations.

It may be thought a somewhat singular mode of treating the biographical history of an individual to begin it with mention of his death; but, in the present instance, that becomes nothing less than a kind of key to the greater incidents of his life; for, as we have no regular history of the party, but are obliged to arrange incidental references to him, not recorded with any such intention, it is of consequence to be able to annex dates to those incidents, and to show the propriety of certain circumstances connected with them. On that propriety depends the cogency of our arguments.

It passes unquestioned, that the "Acts of the Apostles" were composed and published A. D. 62, or 61; that Luke, not very long afterwards, went, that he might take part in the scenes of the world, and to that end resided in Achaia, where he lived, perhaps, a year or two, and died aged 84. He was, therefore, more than an hundred years old when he wrote the first of the New Testament epistles. For instance, Paul says, "At my first hearing all forsook me, no man stood with me:" (2 Tim. iv. 16) yet Luke was with him at that time;—why did he not support the apostle? No answer can be given to this so rational, or so effectual, as the recollection, that Luke was then eighty years old, or less, a time of life when many infirmities may become innocent causes of absence in such a case, when the person can afford but little assistance, at best; an age which even persecutors may feel some compunction, if not reluctance, at bringing to the bar, and exposing to danger from "the mouth of the lion." We may also discover tokens of elderly weakness, in the circumstance, that whereas Paul and his company intended to travel on foot from Tarsus to Assos, a short but mountainous tract, (Acts xx. 13) Luke preferred proceeding by ship, as less fatiguing. He might be now about seventy-four or seventy-five years of age.

The same consideration manifests the discretion of the Christian missionaries in leaving Luke at Philippi, Acts xvi. 40. A. D. 51. (This appears from the change of persons in the narrative; compare verses 10—16.) After what had happened, it was impossible for Paul and Silas to remain in that city; of the other brethren, Timothy must not only as it concerned the care and superintendence of an infant church, but, as it is most likely that the family of Lydis (in whose house they abide) consisted principally of daughters, the residence of that young man in her family, however pious he might be, was unadvisable.

No such objection lay against Luke: he was then much beyond sixty years old; an age which prevented censure, while it bespoke prudence; and, accordingly, we find that under the charge of our intelligent as well as pious evangelist, this church speedily became flourishing, numerous, and composed of members who had something to spare for their spiritual father; and from whom their spiritual father would condescend to accept what he declined from other churches, and incident not to be overlooked.

Again, we read (Acts xii. 1. A. D. 45,) that there were in the church which was at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers,—as (1.) Barnabas, (2.) Simon, called Niger, (3.) Lucius of Cyrene, (4.) Manaen, who had been brought up by Herod the Great, (5.) Saul. It is inquired whether this Lucius was Luke the evangelist. General opinion inclines to the affirmative; but the argument has never been so clearly stated as it might be. There are two propositions necessary to be attended to, for the immediate understanding of this passage: the first is, that the writer Latinizes; the second is, that the names are ranked according to seniority. There needs no other proof that the writer Latinizes here than the appellation Niger, given to Simon. The import of this Latin term certainly is—black, dark, deep, secretly; but, unless Latin were the current language at Antioch, (which we know it was not,) this is a translation of the Greek term melan, which denotes the same thing; and, therefore, is a verbal accommodation. But if the writer Latinizes in the preceding name, it can occasion no surprise if he also Latinizes in writing Lucius instead of Luke; and perhaps we may find, before our inquiry terminates, that this is constantly observed when Latins are expected to be the readers.

The sectaries propose to account for this difference according to the age of the parties. To establish this we must reflect that Barnabas (though, perhaps, he may be placed first in compliment to his being a surpassing visitor sent from Jerusalem) was brother of Saul, there being a considerable age between his mother's son, John Mark, already old enough to accompany his uncle on various journeys; and to choose firmly for himself the cause of his own conduct. Barnabas was also of a certain dignified and majestic presence, proper to the currently understood character of Jupiter, the father of the gods, Acts xiv. 12. This is inconsistent with the notion of his being a young man. Moreover, as Mercury was son of Jupiter, according to the heathen theogony, Barnabas must have had the appearance of sufficient age, and gravity, the natural attendant on age, to pass for the father of Paul, whom the Lycaonians qualified as Mercury; for we cannot suppose that the mere eloquence of these missionaries was the sole cause of these people's mistake: there must have been a suitable deportment, figure, and relative time of life also; and these conspicuous. The second on the list is Simon, surnamed the Black; an epithet that well agrees with the complexion of a native of Cyrene in Africa; and, therefore, renders it extremely probable, that this is Simon the Cyrenian, the father of Alexander and Rufus, Mark xvi. 21. It appears from Acts xvi. 19, 20, that among the believers dispersed at the time of Stephen's martyrdom, were men of Cyrene, who travelled as far as Antioch, preaching the Lord Jesus. There is, therefore, nothing to hinder our reading of Simon the Cyrenian, otherwise Simeon the Black; but if so, and if the Rufus whom Paul salutes, (Rom. xvi. 13.) with his mother, were son of this Simeon, then he was, certainly, an elderly man; since both his sons were eminently distinguished in the church, when Mark composed his Gospel, and apparently long before. It is probable, also, that Simeon was deceased, when Paul wrote to the Romans, say A. D. 56. We come now to Lucius; and if he be Luke the evangelist — placing this transaction after his eight years at the age of sixty years; consequently, he might probably enough take precedence of Manasen, and certainly of Saul, who at this time, as the most judicious commentators suppose, was not more than about forty-five. Thus we have reduced to its true value one of Michaelis's two formidable objections; objections which appeared to him insurmountable, against the identity of Lucius and Luke. "Besides," says he, "the name of Lucius stands before that of Paul, an arrangement which is incompatible with Luke's modesty, if he himself were Lucius, for he would not then have placed his own name before that of an apostle." Now, this he had among the very right to do, without any imputation of his modesty — in fact he was obliged to do so, if this were the arrangement of the church lists at Antioch; and if the order were determined by seniority. And were we ought not to overlook the wisdom of the appointment made by the Holy Ghost in uniting Barnabas and Saul in the same mission; one was the eldest, the other the youngest, of the teachers at Antioch: the sedateness of one would temper the fire of the other; the character of Barnabas as a "son of consolation," as a "good man," mild, courteous, a man of experience, who had long been a companion of the apostles, and was familiar with their views of things, admirably combined with the fervor of his younger disciple, whose greater activity and promptitude would induce and enable him to improve every opening to "speak and be spent" in all directions, to discern possible advantages, and to act on contingencies, in cases which to his less vigorous partner might appear hopeless; and if he must speak he would think himself, at least, not altogether competent to. If Luke were about sixty years of age, when settled at Antioch, whither he, a Cyrenian, had followed some of his countrymen, he must have been about forty-eight years of age at the period of the crucifixion; — a time of life when the judgment is mature, when the reasoning faculties are vigorous; when the character of the man is formed; and when even the company and associates of a person assimilate to the same qualities with his own; for men of this number of years seldom choose boys or youths for their confidential friends. Nor was it a boy, or a youth, who accompanied the disciple whose name is omitted in the history of the travellers walking to Emmaus; it was Cleophas, or Alpheus; and Alpheus was the father of several of the apostles; he was, therefore, in advanced life. If his sons were of age to be called to that eminent station, their father was certainly not under the age attributed by our calculation to Luke; and forty-eight, or fifty, is likely to have been nearly the corresponding years of these two confidential intimates.

We are now arrived at that point of time when, according to our intention to support the competency of Luke as an eye-witness to some of the facts he records, it is of importance to consider what evidence of this his narrative affords. It is the earliest period at which he can, with propriety, be introduced; for though some have placed him among the seventy, yet every probability is against that notion. It appears that he was a native of Cyrene, not of Galilee; and, therefore, not likely to have been so early called. To understand this properly, we must observe, that there assembled on the morning of the resurrection a number of adherents to Jesus, beside the apostles; for the women ran and told their wonderful tale "to the eleven, and to all the rest (as Luke, and Luke only distinctly observes) — they believed them not; — However, Peter, starting up, ran to the monument, and stooping down, he saw the linen clothes laid by themselves, and went away, wondering in himself at what was come to pass." Nor was he the only one who ran; for we learn afterwards, from the traveller's recital, that "certain " (tinet, plural) of those who were with us went to the monument, and found it as the women had reported; but, 'they saw not.' Among this "rest," and this "us," we must place the speaker; but evidently, whoever the speaker was, this was not the first time of his associating with this company: he was, like his fellow-traveller Alpheus, a well-known friend. These travellers, who had the company after Peter and John had returned; it was the height of their universal amazement. And, going for Emmaus, they debated, they argued with each other, concerning these events. And as theydiscoursed together, and reasoned upon various incidents, Jesus himself approached them, (their eyes were held open that they should not know him) which implies that, otherwise, they would have known him; they, therefore, had a previous acquaintance with him, and said, "What are these subjects which ye are bandying backwards and forwards, one to the other, as ye walk and are sad?" Alpheus answering said, "Art thou the only stranger in Jerusalem, who hath not known what hath taken place there, in these days?" For he thought what he said, and they said — No, it was not they who said; for Alpheus had spoken already, and it was now his companion's turn to speak. The writer mentions the name of Alpheus, distinctly enough, but the name of his companion — that he must speak for himself . . . And, further, to avoid introducing "I said," as the fact really was, the writer takes a liberty with grammar, and puts that in the plural, which certainly passed in the singular. This license betrays the man; the writer and the speaker are the same person. The distinctness and accuracy of the speech mark more than mere second-hand narrative. The subsequent observation, "Did not our hearts burn within us by the way?" and the precision with which the action of Jesus is described, "he made as though he would have gone farther," are hints of participation, not of information. And they agree well with the correctness of the historian who has told us, that the inscription on the cross was "written in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew." How could he know this minute particular? He must have been in Jerusalem at the time, to see it. If he were in Jerusalem at that time, then we infer, at once, the competency of Luke as an eye-witness to some of the facts he records; which it is the purport of the present discussion to support.

Moreover, it is probable that all appearances of Jesus after his resurrection introduced by Luke are in, or near, Jerusalem. He says nothing of what happened in Galilee, at the sea of Tiberias, or any where else; he confines his history to facts which came within his own knowledge. Nor should we disregard remarks that might be made on the early chapters of the Acts, such as the writer's acquaintance with the number of the names recorded in the first Christian list; "they were about 120;" his full report of Peter's speeches; of the conduct of Cainaphas and the Sadducees towards the apostles, and towards the deacons, especially Stephen, whose speech he records in a manner that proves he heard it; with the action of the Jewish rulers, "they gnashed upon him with envy;" and, what is said by some of the ancients, that Luke, for the most part was a companion of Paul, has wise more than a slight acquaintance with the apostles.

It is proper, however, to state "the most in objection" of Michaelis to the identity of Lucius Luke, in his own words: "St. Paul wrote his first letter to the Romans from Corinth, and Lucius was with him at the time; for St. Paul sends a salutation Lucius, Rom. xvi. 21. Consequently, if Lucius be one, and the same person, the author of the Acts of the Apostles must have been with St. Paul at Corinth, when the Epistle to the Romans was written. But if we attend to the mode of writing the Acts of the Apostles, we shall perceive that the term is used by some of the ancients, as if Paul was in Corinth. He said behind at Philippi; he remained at Philippi (probably with a view of edifying the newly-founded community) during the whole of St. Paul's tare which are described in chapters xvi. xvii. xix. This corresponds with St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans from Corinth; and, therefore, the author of the Acts was not with St. Paul when he wrote that Epistle; consequently, he was not the same person as Lucius.

The consequence relied on by Michaelis from this extract does not seem to be strictly legitimate. It is absolutely necessary that Lucius should be with Paul in order to send his salutation to the Romans? We think not; and the following arguments may support this opinion. First, it is not improbable that Luke might be with Paul at any given time, in the interval of Acts xvii. xx. 5, though not mentioned in these chapters; for we learn, in the Acts of the first place, that Paul took place between his Philippian and the apostle, as we read, Acts xv. 10-18: "Now ye, Philippians, know also that the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with you; but in every city, where we entered, we spoke, after the manner of men in the Lord Jesus, our message hath ministered to our want;" chap. xx. 1. Similar communications reached the apostle's heart, from 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9: "I robbed churches, taking wages of them to do you service and when I was a prisoner, I was without money, and in want, chargeable to no man; for that which was mine the brethren who came from Macedonia supplied." Philippi, we know, was a chief city of Macedonia; and if we allow the possibility that the brethren which came from Corinth, might, on some occasion, be one, the possibility he might be present with Paul, when he sends salutation of Lucius to the Romans, follows of course. But, secondly, as we see that communications with the apartment were frequent, what is hindered Luke from desiring Paul to insert his mention to the Romans, though the evangelist was at Philippi? He certainly was acquainted with Paul's intentions, generally, as the apostle writes to the Romans.
mans, (chap. i. 15.) "Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I persons of come to you."—This often purposing was no secret; and admit that Luke might express his readiness to accompany Paul, and the reason of sending his salutation is evident. But this argument may be drawn still closer; for Luke was certainly informed of Paul's intention at this very time. The apostle writes to the Romans, (chap. xv. 13.) "Whencever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you, for I trust we shall see you in my journey. But now I go unto Jerusalem, to minister unto the saints; for it hath pleased them of Macedonia, to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem." Where, therefore, I have performed this,

I will come by you into Spain." Now this is, in other words, what Luke relates in Acts xix. 21:
"Paul purposed in spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia, to go to Jerusalem; saying, After I have made a pecuniary contribution to the church at Corinth, and to the saints in Macedonia, I will visit Jerusalem, when I have passed through Macedonia, I will see you in Damascus. Therefore I ask thee not violently to come with me; for now I go unto Rome unto the Jews."—Luke, however, means that when the apostles went to Rome, they might easily express his desire to be remembered to the Romans. Nor is there any thing unlikely in the thought, that Paul himself communicated to Luke what he purposed in spirit; and this is the written letter to him he should say, "I must also see Rome.
A hint on the Latinizing of the evangelist's name will conclude this part of the subject. We have already seen this mutation take place at Antioch; and we are at a loss to determine when it took place. It cannot have been in the time of Paul, though Antioch was a Greek city, yet a coin of Greek origin was distinguished by bearing the Latin name Antiochus, inscribed around a turreted female head, the genius of the city. It was struck under Nero, and is now a coin of rare value. It is, therefore, possible, that Simeon was really called Eusebius by the Roman citizens of Antioch, and by the Roman citizens of the church there, as Luke might be called Lucius by them. These Latin names the writer of the Acts retains, in compliment to his Latin readers in Italy, where he finished his history; and Paul adopts the name Lucius when writing to the same persons, in his Epistle to the Romans; although, when writing from Rome to the Greeks, he inserts this appellation in its Greek form, Lucas, as 2 Tim. iv. 11, et al.
We have presumed that Luke, at our first acquaintance with him, was of more mature age, a reasoning and considerate man; and we further presume, a physician. Such was the companion of Alpheus. But there is another personage of greater importance than Alpheus, on whose account the character of Luke peculiarly demands notice. For if we reflect, shall find that Mary, the mother of Jesus, was of much about the age of Luke; (say nearly fifty years, at the time of the crucifixion;) that she was no less reasoning and no less considerate than he was; and that his profession of physician admitted access to the confidence of the sect, without offence. The infERENCE we wish to draw is, that this evangelist received from the Holy Mother those papers which he has preserved in the early part of his Gospel; with that information which enabled him to assert his "perfect understanding (or diligent tracing) of all things connected with this history, from the very first." It is probable, that this confidence was the result of prolonged intercourse; and therefore, we cannot possibly say at what time it produced the effect we have attributed to it. Leaving this uncertain, yet placing it, as most convenient, in the interval from the resurrection to the dispersion subsequent to the martyrdom, and the birth of the church; we shall lay before the reader the arguments which may tend to establish our general position, relative to Luke's veracity as an historian, and his characteristic accuracy as a writer.
Nothing so fully establishes our confidence in a writer, as a knowledge of his personal character. If he be loose, inaccurate, heedless, we hardly know how to trust him when he declares the most solemn truths in the most solemn manner. If he be studious, punctilious, and particular, we can safely rely on his present work; and if he affirme a thing, we rest satisfied of its truth and reality. But persons of strict accuracy seldom trust to their memory entirely on important affairs; they make memoranda, or keep some kind of journal in which they record all transactions as they arise; so that, at after-periods, they can refer to events thus recorded, and refresh their memories by consulting their former observations. This, too, is customary, chiefly, if not wholly, among men of letters, men of history, and men of education, men who are conversant with science, and who know the value of hints made on the spot, pre-re nata. My first proposition is, that Luke the evangelist was a person of learning, of accuracy of character, and a scrupulous adherent to the method of the journal of events, of which we have traces in his writings. He did not trust to his recollection, but his custom was, to make memoranda of interesting occurrences.
Let us try a few passages of his travels by this proposition. We meet this evangelist in Acts xvi.
17, where he says, "Looming from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothrace, and the next day to Neapolis, from thence to Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia, and a (Roman) colony." These passages are precisely such as a traveller of education would insert in his pocket-book.

is a raceway called the Fair Haven, near Leseas. But advisable to remain here, the opinion prevailed to make for Phenice, said to be a good port of the same island, Crete, over against Africa, but bearing that south-west course, will be perceived, that every idea of these extracts is in the original; we have done no more than put them into current language, as we find in books of travels. They are mostly particulars of no consequence to the making us see whether the history; but are evident transcriptions, not from memory, but from manuscripts. The same we may say of the following.

Acts xxviii. 11.—After three months, we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the Heliopolis in the winter, was Cesar, and Polus; landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days; from thence, standing out to sea, and tacking frequently, we came to Mygge; and after one day the content himself with mentioning the year of the Pentecost, tarried there seven days, went on to Apollon Fornum, and the Three Taverns—arrived in Rome. This repeated mention of days' journeys, is clearly a continuation of the journal, and shows that the writer had not lost in the shipwreck at Malta. We often find travellers preserving their papers when they lose every thing else.

There are many other notes of time, &c. which might corroborate our assertion; but this specimen we think sufficient, and all we offer at present. Hence the inference is undeniable, that the writer of the "Acts of the Apostles" had, in composing that work, written evidence, of the most accurate description, before him. And whether he maintains the same character for precision in his Gospel; which he thus begins—"In the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar (the emperor), Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, Herod tetrarch of Galilee, his brother Philip tetrarch of Trachonitis, and the Tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being high-priests."—"Could any man take greater pains to insure precision, or to fix a date? He does not content himself with mentioning the year of the emperor, or the king of the country, in which the events he is about to narrate happened, but he calls in, by way of corroboration, as it were, the evidence of three sovereigns, for no other purpose than that of marking the period he intended; they being afterwards dropped by him. This shows clearly the particularity of a writer; of a man conversant with written documents of the most correct and precise description; one who trusted nothing to words, or to memory. How precise should we think the author, who dated a volume from Jamaica. "In the fifteenth... George III. such an one being governor of Jamaica, such an one governor of Barbadoes, such an one governor of Grenada, and the Rev. M. and N. archbishops of Canterbury and York." We should certainly conclude "this writer, whatever else he be, is correctness itself." Moreover, this method of notation is completely Egyptian, and therefore answers, to us, the double purpose of confirming the opinion that Luke was "the friend of Cyrene," and of the genuineness and authenticity of this part of the Gospel.

We turn now to the preface of Luke's Gospel, and we find it completely in union with this strongly marked exactness and precision. "Whereas many good men, and not to be blamed, have taken in hand, but did not complete their intention, to publish an orderly narration of certain events, as they have been delivered to us by those who, from the beginning of these events, were (some of them) eye-witnesses, (others) parties concerned in them, promoters of the personal participation; it has seemed good to having accurately examined all points from a more earlier period than they had done, indeed, from the very first rise of the matter, to write an orderly story of these things; and thereby to accomplish the desirable purpose in which these writers is so much more likely to be succeeded, will not necessarily succeed."

This man cannot bear the imperfections of the books which under his notice on a certain subject; they did not begin early enough, and they ended too soon; therefore determined to begin his history much earlier, and to continue it much later. This he has accomplished in a manner which we shall see he has accomplished. There is an instance of his accuracy and spirit of research which ought not to pass unnoticed, (A. xxviii. 36.), where he gives us (translated, probably from the Latin) a copy of the letter which Claudius Lycurgus, a man of the name of the language, observed of the seamen, as to the bearing of that port they intended to make, &c. This man did not bear the imperfections of the books which under his notice on a certain subject; they did not begin early enough, and they ended too soon; therefore determined to begin his history much earlier, and to continue it much later. This he has accomplished in a manner which we shall see he has accomplished.

The argument is stated on two suggestions. Luke had no intention at this time of composing the history. His procuring this letter was the effect of general character, and customary inquisitiveness. He had an intention at this time of composing a history, his procuring it is an instance of his selecting the most authentic materials possible for his purpose. The same may be said relative to the Songs of Mary and Zacharias, which he has preserved. But if these poems be genuine, they contribute to establish the genuineness of the history with which they are connected. The anecdotals attaching them are such as could only have been known, as the crucifixion, from Mary herself, Joseph dead; and it is certain, that whoever gave Luke papers might very easily give him further information. The preservation of them supposed to be by Mary, adds to the evidence of her being a constant person, and poinding events in her heart. And the establishment of the early chapters of Luke becomes an argument for the authenticity of early chapters of Matthew. The most wonderful circumstance alluded to by Matthew occupies a considerable space in the narrative of Luke; and it is admitted as authentic in this evangelist, no great reason can be given for rejecting it from that event list; since we should willingly receive it on the con of any one of the four. If, then, the history in Matthew must be exploded, let those who attempt it set aside these events from Luke; but on close examination, they will find that there are in this writer's history such natural and artless characters of authenticity, such internal demonstrations of genuineness and integrity, that if those who peruse them, even with suspicion, or aversion, have any tolerable portion of mental acumen, or critical skill, they will abandon the undertaking. See Gospel—Luke.

It imports nothing as to the character of those papers, whether they were spoken first and afterwards reduced to writing, or first composed in writing, and afterwards published; in either case, the care and industry of Luke in procuring them is the same, as we now have them, but in the language then spoken in the country, the Syriac Hebrew; and they follow the rules of Hebrew poetry, as to the parallelisms of verbal construction. Luke, then, receiving them in this form, transcribed them into Greek, and thus justifies the assertion in his preface, that he derived his materials from those who were eye-witnesses of the matters, as Mary was of Zachariah's prophecy, and the facts in his family; or were personal participators in them, as Mary was in what concerned herself. Of these very early events Luke, by his diligence, obtained perfect understanding, and he inserts these documents, that Theophilus might know the certainty of those things in which he had already been instructed. That there were very good reasons for sending these, to this purpose, and with undeniable internal marks of authenticity, must be evident to every careful reader of them.

We have no design of enlarging on the life of Luke; but would point out a few incidental allusions to him, in their regular order. For, notwithstanding what appears so conspicuously, his habitual correctness and diligence, we, by placing him in the number, on his account, the Holy Ghost fell, in a visible form, insist on his unquestionable inspiration; and that in no ordinary degree. He was, in this respect, though no apostle, yet equal to the apostles: and there can be no doubt, but what the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were profusely bestowed on him, and abundantly for the discharge of every duty to which he might be called, whether as a teacher or as a writer.

We suppose him, being a Cyrenian, to have felt a special interest in the opposition raised by "those of the circumcision," the Jews, against Stephen; whom he presided in the death of that proto-martyr, Acts vi. 9. And here, perhaps, began his acquaintance with the "young man, whose name was Saul." We suppose him, as the Holy Ghost fell, to have sympathized much with those who were scattered abroad on the persecution that followed the death of Stephen; "some of whom were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who went as far as Antioch," Acts xi. 20. But whether he quitted Jerusalem at this time, cannot be determined without reserve. If he did, he was now a sufferer through the persecution of that very man, Saul, with whom he afterwards contracted the most confidential intimacy. Little did either of them see the events of a few years.

But whatever becomes of this conjecture, if he be the same with Lucius, we must direct our attention to Antioch, to which city some of the expelled Cyrenians certainly travelled. And here it may be proper to notice a remarkable variation in Beza's ancient MS. now at Cambridge, (Acts xi. 28), where, instead of "There stood up one of them, (the prophets at Antioch, i.e. Agabus,) we read "And when we were gathered about him, he said," by which phraseology the writer evidently expresses his own presence, on the occasion, A. D. 43. It is, indeed, hazardous, as Michaelis well observes, to conjecture a writer of a single MS. unsupported by any other; yet it is difficult to account for this insertion, if the transcriber had no authority for it from the original before him. Moreover, if Lucius be Luke, we certainly find him among the teachers at Antioch, about twelve after; i.e. in the following year, A. D. 44, as we have already seen.

We conclude this article by remarking, that there are no indications in the history that Luke was merely an attendant on Paul in his travels, as many writers maintain. His language is not consistent with that opinion. He says, "A vision appeared to Paul—and immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering, suphpriva, collecting the sentiment of the plural, and unity in order to obtain a just inference, that the Lord had called us to preach the gospel in Macedonia." The writer does not say, nor does he mean, "Paul determined and we obeyed" no; he restates himself equally entitled to God and the Gentiles, and equally called to this expedition. Again at Philippi: "On the Sabbath-day, we sat down and spoke to the women." And when Lydia was baptized with her family, "she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be a true woman, according to the faith which I believe, follow me." Luke means to inform his readers, that he sat down and spoke to the women, and that he gave an opinion on the conduct proper to be observed towards Lydia. The voyage from Philippi to Judea is, of course, expressed in the plural, we and us. And when the company was arrived at Jerusalem, says Luke, "Paul and Silas and James and the elders," the equality is perfect; or if any thing, Paul follows his company. In addition to this, Paul's respectful mention of Luke is very observable. In writing to their common friend Philemon, he calls him his beloved fellow-laborer, verse 24. In Col. iv. 14, he describes him as Luke the beloved physician: beloved generally, both by you and by me. In writing to Timothy, (2 Epist. iv. 11.) he mentions the various places to which he had sent his attendance, "Cyprus, Cyrene, and the Alexandrians (all Africa) against Stephen; which ended in the death of that proto-martyr, Acts vi. 9. And here, perhaps, began his acquaintance with the "young man, whose name was Saul." We suppose him, as the Holy Ghost fell, to have sympathized much with those who were scattered abroad on the persecution that followed the death of Stephen; "some of whom were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who went as far as Antioch," Acts xi. 20. But whether he quitted Jerusalem at this time, cannot be determined without reserve. If he did, he was now a sufferer through the persecution of that very man, Saul, with whom he afterwards contracted the most confidential intimacy. Little did either of them see the events of a few years.

But whatever becomes of this conjecture, if he be the same with Lucius, we must direct our attention to Antioch, to which city some of the expelled Cyrenians certainly travelled. And here it may be proper to notice a remarkable variation in Beza's ancient MS. now at Cambridge, (Acts xi. 28), where, instead of..."
enlighten the Gentiles: and the Glory of the people of Israel." Jesus also describes John the Baptist as "a burning and shining light," and addressing his disciples as "the light of the world," he bids them not ashamed, but show their light, and be of use to mankind. In conformity with these ideas, Paul says to the Philippians, "Ye shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life," or, as some prefer to read it, "as ye are lights." It has indeed been said, that when the apostle directs the Philippians to "shine as lights," he uses the word φως, which alludes to the light-houses placed on various parts of a coast, where navigation required their services, to direct the pilots of vessels on the course they ought to steer. We have many such lights on our coasts. The most famous in antiquity was that of the Pharos at Alexandria. Under this allusion, the sacred writer may be considered as saying, "Shine in the midst of bad persons, as light-houses shine in a dark country; holding forth the word of life, holding up the word of fire," the lights and flames; that I may stand erect with confidence; may be seen, in the day of Christ." But Mr. Taylor is by no means satisfied that these active verbs are adequately understood, or that we do justice to the sense of the whole passage, which leads us to consider the subject, which rather suffer certain things to be done by their means, than are active in doing those things. A building can hardly be said to hold forth, or to hold fast; but if we reflect that some of the Phaeroses of antiquity were constructed in form of human figures, we shall advance, he thinks, nearer to the apostle's meaning. All the world heard of the Colossus at Rhodes; that immense brazen figure, which formed the monument of the (in)famous Nero, and under whose enormous stride vessels might pass in full sail. This figure held forth in one hand a prodigious flame, which enlightened the whole port: by this it directed the distant mariner whose course it attracted, and who looked up to this light for safety.

On the whole, then, Mr. Taylor thinks that Paul's expression refers to luminary figures, rather than to luminary buildings; in which case his words, "shine as luminaries, holding out the word of life," is a great Light, which, coming into the world, has light enough to enlighten every man, have peculiar spirit and propriety. --Nor is it certain, that the idea of a figure has totally quitted him in the next sentence; when he says "all nations," when we refer them to the day A, Christ, I may stand up with a stiff (upright) neck, and exult that I have not labored in vain." Is not this the very attitude of such a figure? --Some propose to translate "add lust the word of life," but this loses the beauty of the passage, if it may be supported by grammar, which is not now investigated.

"The word Phaeros was used in a metaphorical sense," says Montfaucon; "any thing was called a Phaer, which could enlighten and instruct; every man of letters, who could guide others. In this sense the poet Ronsard says to Charles IX. of France, "Be my Phaer, guide my sails through rolling seas." -- Might not this metaphorical application have been current in the first times of the gospel? and if so, do the apostles adopt it?

LUNATICS, a name given to those diseased persons, who suffer most severely on the changes of the moon; for example, epileptic persons, or those who have the falling sickness; insane persons, or those tormented with fits of morbid melancholy; as well as persons possessed by the devil, for often those have been believed who were subject to causes or the disease described, as so the first encouragement to the use of the moon, the change of the moon; the devil, after some torment, suffering most in these circumstances, may truly say to one among an epileptic and a lunatic, which was more disorderly than the other. The subject of epileptics are not all equal; some more frequently, others a distance between every day; lunatics affect the declination of the moon. (Comp. Lycus, Luke ii. 6.)

The irregular love of persons, for honor. Lust is not a sin; but in the first sense, we must respect the care of every man who would be to bridge his lust.

LUZ, Luz, the name of several places, in addition to the camp, Numb. iii. 34; Deut. iv. 39. 39. I. LUZ, a city of the Canaanites, in Benjamin towards called Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 19; Israel, David, and Solomon, 1 Kings xiv. 13; Numb. xxxi. 19. T. LUZ, a city attached to the name of Jehoshaphat near to Sichem, Josh. xvi. 2. It is principally on xvi. 2, that the second of these places is disclaimed from the first. There might, however, be a distance between the place of the ancient town of Luz; and indeed the name in Joshua, by alluding to mount Bethel, seems to point to the travelling patriarch slept on a hill near Luz, Judg. i. 26. I. LUZ, a city built by a man of Bethel, in the cities of Iconium, which fell 1 Kings vi. 6, 8, having cured a man who been lame from his mother's womb, and had a walk, the inhabitants of Lystra said, in the time of Lycaonia, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of a great deal of Syrie, and Paul, Mercuarius, because he was the speaker. This speech of Lycaonia is generally believed to have been a corrupt Greek; that is, mixed with a great deal of Syrie, and Paul, Lyitia, a province in the north-west of Asia nor, having Phrygia and Pisidia on the north, Mediterranean on the south, Pamphylia the north, and Caria on the west, 1 Max. xv. 33; Acts xxvii. 5. Paul landed at the ports of Patara Myra in this province, in different versions.

LYDDA, in Hebrew וֹלֵדָה, Leda, or Leda, by the Grecian
and Latins called Lydda, or Diospolis, is a city in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea Philippi. It lay east of Joppa four or five leagues, and belonged to Ephraim. It seems to have been inhabited by the Benjamites, after the Babylonish captivity, (Neh. xi. 35.) and was one of the three toparchies which were dismembered from Samaria, and given to the Jews, 1 Mac. xi. 34. Peter, coming to Lydda, cured Aëneas, who was sick of the palsy, Acts ix. 33, 34. The Jews inform us, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, they set up academies in different parts of Palestine, of which Lydda was one, where the famous Akiba was a professor, for some time. Gamaliel succeed him, and was obliged to retire to Japhna. Lydda, says D'Arvieux, "is situated on a plain, about a league from Rama. It is so entirely ruined as to be at present but a miserable village, noticeable only on account of the market which is held here, once a week. The dealers resort to it to sell the cotton and other commodities which they have collected during the week. Here was formerly a handsome church, dedicated to St. George, a saint who is equally in favor with Turks and Christians. Dr. Wittman says, (Trav. p. 203, 303, January 12.) "I rode across the plains of Jaffa and Lydda. We approached the town of Lydda, or Lodua, and saw the Arab inhabitants busily employed in sowing barley. The soil of these fine and extensive plains is a rich black mould, which, with proper care and industry, might be rendered extremely fertile. Lydda is denominated by the Greeks Diospolis, the city or temple of Jupiter, probably because a temple had been dedicated in its vicinity to that deity. Since the crusades it has received from the Christians the name of St. George, on account of its having been the scene of the martyrdom and burial of that saint. In this city tradition reports that the emperor Justinian erected a church."

I. LYDIA, a woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple, who dwelt in the city of Philippi in Macedonia, (Acts xvi. 14, 40.) and was converted by Paul's preaching. After she and her family had been baptized, she offered her house to Paul and his fellow-laborer so earnestly, that he was prevailed on by her entreaties. This woman was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte.

II. LYDIA, a celebrated kingdom of Asia Minor, peopled by the sons of Lud, son of Shem, Gen. x. 23. We have very little notice of these Lydians in Scripture. They are mentioned in Isa. lxvi. 19, if these be not rather the Lydians in Egypt. (Comp. 1 Mac. viii. 7.) See Lud, and Ludim.

LYING is condemned in many places in Scripture, Exod. xxiii. 1, 7; Lev. xix. 11; Prov. xii. 22; xiii. 5; xix. 1; Prov. xvi. 32; Wisd. i. 11; Eccl. vii. 13; x. 10; xxv. 23; Hos. iv. 1; Acts v. 4; Eph. iv. 25; James v. 12. Our Saviour requires his disciples to be "plain and sincere, that their word might be equivalent to the most solemn oath; and that in all their assertions, they should say only, "It is," or "It is not," Matt. v. 37. It is in vain, therefore, to attempt to justify some particular persons who have told lies; which persons are in other respects condemned in Scripture. It never praises their lying, but their good actions. That which is in itself evil never can become good. When Abraham calls Sarah his sister, not his wife; and Isaac says the same of Rebekah; when Jacob, by a lie, defrauds Esau of his father's blessing; and when the Egyptian midwives declare, that the Hebrew women are delivered without their assistance; they are not, any of them, in these particulars, to be commended; though the evil which they committed might be mitigated by circumstances not known to us. When we condemn lying, we do not condemn stratagems, hyperboles, or parables; which custom and general consent do not rank among lies.

God is said to have put a lying spirit into the mouths of false prophets; that is, he permitted them to follow the impressions of the evil spirit, 1 Kings xxii. 23; Prov. xxiii. 3. "We have made lies our refuge," (Isa. xxviii. 15.) i.e. we have placed our confidence in falsehood; in deceitful allies, or in the delusive promises of false prophets; or, lastly, in the assistance of idols, whom they call vanity and lying. "The hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies," (ver. 17.) i.e. the vain hopes, previously mentioned by the prophet. "A deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?" i.e. am I not in the wrong, thus to adore wood? Isa. xlix. 20; also Jer. viii. 6. Waters that fail, that lie, are those that flow part of the year only; they may be said to be false, for they should flow perpetually, Jer. xvii. 15. "Lying hills" (Jer. iii. 24.) are those which, after they have made a fine appearance to the eye, produce nothing. Hosea says, (ix. 2.) The vine shall lie to them; the vintage shall fail; and Habakkuk, (iii. 17.) that the olive-trees shall lie; that is, fail. The Latins have the same way of speaking.

LYSANIAS, or LYSIAS, tetrarch of Abilene, a small province in Lebanon, (Luke iii. 1.) was probably son or grandson of another Lysanias known in history, (Dio. lib. xlix. p. 44.) and put to death by Mark Antony, who gave part of his kingdom to Cleopatra. See ABILENE.

I. LYSIAS, a Roman tribune, see CLAUDIUS LTIAN.

II. LYSIAS, a friend and relation of king Antiocbus Epiphanes, to whom he left the regency of Syria when he passed beyond the Euphrates. See ANTIOCBUS EPIPHANES.

LYSIMACHUS, brother of Menelaus, high-priest of the Jews, who, in an attempt to pillage the treasury of the temple, was killed, 2 Mac. iv. 39, 40. He is sometimes reckoned among the high-priests, because he was viceroy to his brother Menelaus; but he never himself possessed that dignity.

LYSTRA, a city of Lycia, of which Timothy was a native. It is now called Latik. See LYCAONIA, MAC

MAACAH, MAACAH, MAACHATH, or BETH-MAACAH, a city and region of Syria, east and south of the sources of Jordan, not far from Gezer, at the foot of mount Hermon. It was called Abel-beth-maachah, because Abel was situated in it. The Israelites would not destroy the Maachathites, but permitted them to dwell in the land, (Josh. xiii. 13.) and their king assisted the Ammonites against David, 2 Sam. x. 5, 9. The lot of the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan extended to this country, Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5. See Abel II.

I. MAACAH, daughter of Abishalom, wife of Rehobom, king of Judah, and mother of Abijam, his successor; 1 Kings xvi. 2. In 2 Chron. xiii. 2, she is called Michal; wife of Uriel of Gibeah. See King's Mother.

II. MAACAH, the daughter of Abishalom, wife of Abijam, king of Judah, and mother of Asa, his successor; 1 Kings xi. 10, 13, 14. Asa deprived her of the office of priestess of the groves. There were several other persons of this name, mentioned in the Old Testament. See Maacah.

MAACHATH, see Maacah.

MAALEH-ACRABBIM, the ascent of scorpions, a mountain so called from the multitude of scorpions that infested it, at the southern end of the Salt sea, Numb. xxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3. See Acrabatene, II.

MACCABEES, a name assumed by a patriotic Hebrew and his descendants, who successfully resisted the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes. (See Judas.) It is generally supposed that their name was derived from the inscription on their ensigns, or bucklers—מנן שדה, which begin these words, המנה שדה.

Mi Camora Be-elaim Yehorah; (יְכֹרָה בֶּאֵלָיָם יְהוֹרָה) Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? (I Kings. xi. 11.) after the manner that the Romans put on their ensigns. S. P. Q. R. Senatus Populusque Romanus.

The Books of Maccaees are four in number: the first two are esteemed to be canonical by the church of Rome. The first book contains the history of forty years; i.e. from Antiochus Epiphanes to the time of Simon the high-priest; from A.M. 3829 to 3863. The second book contains a compilation of several pieces, but is far inferior in point of accuracy to the first. It comprises a history of about fifteen years; from the execution of Heliodorus's commission, who was sent by Seleucus to fetch away the treasures of the temple, to the victory obtained by Judas Maccabaeus over Nicanor; from A.M. 3829 to 3843. The third book contains the history of the persecution raised by Ptolemy Philopater against the Jews of Egypt, A.M. 3877, and should before be placed before the first book. The fourth book is very little known. It is found in the collected works of Josephus, under the title of the Government of Reason, though it is rejected as spurious by the best critics. It contains an embellishment of the persecution of the Maccabean family as related in 2 Mac. vii. viii. the scene of which it places at Jerusalem.

MACEDONIA, a country of Greece, having Thrace north, Thessaly south, Epirus west, and the Ægean sea east. It is believed that Macedonians of Bitium, son of Javan, (Gen. x. 4) that by Kittim, in the Hebrew text, Macedonians are meant, but this name is often to be understood. (See Chittim.) Alex, the Great, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, had conquered Asia, and subdued the Persians so that the name of the Macedonians became familiar throughout the East; and is often given to the Greeks in the successors of Alexander in the monarchy, (Apoc. xvi. 10, 11, and 2 Mac. viii. 20. So all Greeks are often put for the Macedonians, 2 iv. 35.) Paul, being called in a vision, while at Corinth, to preach the gospel at Macedonia, founded churches of Thessalonica and Philippi, Acts: xvi. 10. See A. D. 55.

The prophet Daniel describes Macedonia, among the nations, the emblem of a goat with one horn, and it is fore of great consequence that this symbol should be proved to be that proper to Macedonia; for it would show that this country had no such emblem belonging to it, and so look to another kingdom for a fulfillment of prophecy, which would be contrary to the true history, and would produce inextricable confusion.

The following observations on an ancient symbol, Macedonia, by Taylor Combe, Esq. F. A. S. were found useful:

"I had lately an opportunity of procuring an ancient bronze figure of a goat with one horn, which was the old symbol of Macedonia... It was dug up in Asia Minor, and brought into this country by a poor Turk. Not only many of the individual towns in Macedonia and Thrace employed this type, but the kingdom itself of Macedonia, which is the oldest in Europe of which we have any regular and connected history, was represented also by a goat, with particularity, that it had but one horn. Carus, first king of the Macedonians, commenced his reign 14 years before the Christian era. The title of his being led by the god to the city of Edessa, is the name of which, when he established the seat of his kingdom, he converted into Macedon... It is worthy of remark: Ubern Edessum, ob mens mensu mceria, Agora, popularum Ecclesias. (Justin, in cap. 1.) Herodotus says, that the Cretans call the carnus. Xenophon informs us in his first book of Greek history, that the word carnus signifies court. Now in the latter case the word carnus may regularly to be derived from the Greek word κατανόω, caput; but in former example it must be deduced from κρανος, the Hebrew word for a horn, or, which is the thing, from the Greek word κρανος. This last etymology will not appear improbable, when we consider the difference of pronunciation among the Macedonians, who were esteemed by the rest of Greece as barbarians, and who, we are expressly told, used a language different from that which was spoken in the southern parts of Greece. (Strabo..."
MACEDONIA

If, then, the above root be admitted, and for this the change of a single letter is only necessary, it will appear, I say, that Caranus was so called in conformity with an idea of power, which was annexed to the word horn, even in the earliest period of Macedonian history. In the reign of Amytus the First, nearly 300 years after Caranus, and about 547 years before Christ, the Macedonians, on being threatened with an invasion, became tributary to the Persians. In one of the pillars of Persepolis this very event seems to be recorded in a manner that throws considerable light upon the present subject. A goat is represented with an immense horn growing out of the middle of his forehead, and a man in a Persian dress is seen by his side, holding the horn with his left hand, by which is signified the subjection of Macedonia. A proverb in use at the present day is grounded upon this ancient practice of signifying conquest by the capture of the horns. "To take a bull by the horns" is an equivalent phrase for "to conquer." When Demetrius Phalereus was endeavoring to persuade Philip, the father of Perseus king of Macedonia, to make himself master of the cities of Ithome and Acrocorinthus, as a necessary step to the conquest of Peloponnesus, he is reported to have used the following expression; "Having caught hold of both horns, you will possess the ox itself:" thereby meaning, that if those cities which were the chief defence of Peloponnesus were once taken, it could not but happen that the conquest of Peloponnesus would follow. (Strabo, lib. vii. p. 361.)

In the reign of Archelaus of Macedonia (A. C. 413), there occurs on the reverse of a coin of that king, the head of a goat having only one horn. Of this coin, so remarkable for the single horn, there are two varieties; one is engraved by Pellerin, and the other is preserved in the cabinet of the late Dr. W. Hunter.

But the custom of representing the type and power of a country under the form of a horned animal is not peculiar to Macedonia. Persia was represented by a ram. Ammianus Marcellinus acquaints us, that the king of Persia, when at the head of his army, wore a ram's head made of gold, and set with precious stones, instead of a diadem. (Lib. xix. cap. 1.) The type of Persia, the ram, is observable on a very ancient coin, undoubtedly Persian, in Dr. Hunter's cabinet.

The relation of these emblems to Macedon and Persia is strongly confirmed by the vision in the prophet Daniel, (chap. viii. 3—8) which, while it explains the specimens of antiquity before us, receives itself in return no inconsiderable share of illustration. The whole of this vision is afterwards explained by the angel Gabriel, verses 21—23. Nothing, certainly, is more directly applicable to overthrow the joint empire of the Medes and Persians by Alexander the Great, than these verses in the book of Daniel; nor at the same time can better authority be required for the true meaning of the single-horned goat, than may be derived from the same source.

There is a gem engraved in the Florentine collection, (plate 51.) which, as it confirms what has been already said, and has not hitherto been understood, I think worthy of mention. It will be seen by the drawing I have made of this gem, that nothing more nor less is meant by the ram's head with two horns and the goat's head with one, than the kingdoms of Persia and Macedon, represented under their appropriate symbols. From the circumstance, however, of these characteristic types being united, it is extremely probable that the gem was engraved after the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great.

This testimony is of great value, especially to those who know that the writer had the best means of instruction in numismatics, under his father, Dr. Combe, who edited the publication of Dr. Hunter's medals, &c. Mr. Taylor, however, has endeavored to collect some additional circumstances.

The Macedonians are supposed by Dr. Mede to have derived their origin from Media. Without determining on the conclusiveness of the doctor's etymologies, Mr. Taylor supposes that Media, a province adjoining Persia, is much more likely to be alluded to, on the walls of Persepolis, a Persian palace, than Macedonia, a province very remote from the seat of empire. The triumph of Persia over Media, or any advantage gained over that country, was of importance, and worth recording; but of what importance was a triumph over Macedonia? It is observable, also, that in the general procession which adorns the palace of Persepolis, and which is supposed to be a representation of the various provinces of the empire, in the act of paying their annual presents to the king, each of them being denoted by its proper symbol, there is the number of two goats, each having only one horn. This would be extremely embarrassing, if we did not know that there were two Medias, the Upper and the Lower; which as they were in some respects but one province, though divided, so they are represented by two goats walking together, but each directed by his proper superintendent. He therefore concludes that Media was symbolized by the single-horned goat; and that the Macedonians, being derived from the same, retained the symbol of their original country. This will also explain the reason of Daniel's perplexity on seeing the vision, as he could not tell which of the two countries, that in the East, or that in the West, was intended as the conqueror of Persia. It was not likely that he should think of Media, unless informed to the contrary.

This medal is given in proof that Macedonia was divided into several provinces, four at least, under the Roman government. Many medals of the first province—extant, mostly in silver, and they enable us to assert, that the evangelist Luke (Acts xvi. 12.) means not to describe Philippi as the first or chief city of Macedonia, which was not true in any sense; but as a city of the first Macedonia, which is the correct import of his words. See Philipp.

Among the medals of Macedonia is one with a lion devouring a bull; and it is remarkable that the same subject is sculptured in very large figures on the palace of Persepolis. What could induce Macedonians, a country where there are no lions, to adopt this emblem? Yet if it were derived from the East, then it contributes to prove the derivation of this people from the same quarter; and we must look to the East for its explanation.

Macedonians is in the Apocryphal books sometimes used as an appellative, for an enemy to the Jews. Thus, in the additions to the book of Esther, it is said Haman was a Macedonian by nation and inclination, or party; that he was desirous to transfer the empire of the Persians to the Macedonians; that is, to the greatest enemies of the state.

Machir, or Macheronte, a city and fort beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben, north and east of the lake Asphaltites, two or three leagues from Jordan, and not far from where that river discharges itself into the Dead sea. This castle had been fortified by the Asmonæans; but Gabinius demolished it, and Aristobulus re-fortified it. Herod the Great made it much stronger than before. Here John the Baptist was imprisoned, and beheaded, by order of Herod Antipas. (Joseph. Ant. iv. 10, 11; xviii. 7.)

Machpelah, or Machpelah, the name of the plain in which the cave which Abraham bought of Ephron was situated, Gen. xxiii. 19, 17.

Mad, madness, insanity, or deprivation of reason; medically defined to be delirium without fever. Our Lord cured, by his word, several who were deprived of the exercise of their rational powers; and the circumstances of their histories prove, that they could neither mistake nor collude respecting them. How far madness may be allied to, or connected with, demoniacal possession, is a very intricate inquiry; and whether in the present day (as perhaps anciently) evil spirits may not take advantage from distempers of the bodily frame, to augment evils endured by the patient, is more than may be affirmed, though the idea seems to be not absolutely repugnant to reason. Nevertheless, what may be, is probably different on most inquiries from what we can prove really is.

The epithet mad is applied to several descriptions of persons in Scripture; as (1.) to one deprived of reason, Acts xxvi. 24; 1 Cor. iv. 23.—(2) To one whose reason is deprived, and overruled by the fury of his passion, with all the works of whose mind is perplexed and bewildered, so disturbed that he acts in an uncertain, extravagant, irregular manner, Deut. xxvii. 34; Eccl. vii. 7.—(5) To one who is infatuated by the prevalence of his desires after idols and vanities, Jer. 1. 38. (2.) To the madman or (5.) After folly, deceit and falsehood, Hosea ix. 7.

David’s madness (1 Sam. xxi. 13.) is by many supposed not to have been feigned, but a real epilepsy or falling sickness; and the LXX. use words which strongly indicate this sense. It is urged in support of this opinion, that the troubles which David underwent might very naturally weaken his constitutional strength; and that the force he suffered in being obliged to seek shelter in a foreign court, would disturb his imagination in the highest degree.

Madaï, the third son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2) and father of the Medes. Others suppose that Media is too distant from the other countries peopled by Japheth, to be comprehended under the name of “The Isles of the Gentiles,” which were allotted to the sons of Japheth. For these reasons some learned men have been led to suggest, that Madaï was father of the Macedonians, whose country was called Amathis, as if from the Hebrew or Greek island, and Madaï; q. d. the isle of Madaï, (Josh. xv. 31.) first given to Judah, very far towards Gades, I sa. x. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 49.

Magdala, a tower, was not far from Tib. it is sometimes called by the Jews Magdala cedars.” From hence, probably, Mary of Magdala, Mary the Magdalene, was b. ed, Matt. xxvii. 56. Luke viii. 2.

1. Magi, or Magians, is a name given to a sect of Persians who are worshippers of fire. Their later name is Parsa, or Guebres. They have three books, which contain the whole of their religion, Zend, Pazend and Abesta, which they are. Abraham. Abesta is a commentary on the two. They maintain the existence of two prime one, which they call Oromazde, the author of good and the other, Ahuramazde, the author of evil. They worship in temples called Ateshe-kana, or Ateshe-ka that is, the house of fire, where they carefully conceal the flame. To fire they give the name e. i.e. part; because they acknowledge this element as the principle of all things. The Magi observe religious and religious silence, when they eat, having first said certain words; and from month to year, every day, star, mountain, collection of water, and tree, they ascribe part of their beauty, angels created before man, who sinned fidelity and disobedience, and therefore were exiled from what they call the country of Genii, unlike to our notions of Fairy-Land. See Zoroaster, and Media.

They represent the good principle by light, the evil principle by darkness; they acknowledge the gods, and address prayers and adorations to them. Yet they were divided in opinion, some thinking both had existed from eternity; others, that the good principle was eternal, and the evil only created. These two principles they believe to continual opposition, and that they will cease to the end of the world, when the good principle will prevail; after which, each will have its distinct world; the good reigning with all good things, the evil with all evil things. The principles of the most ancient Magi, till imperfectly known, have been lately communicated to Europe in several translations from the works of their sect, obtained from its adherents in India. The Zend-Avesta, attributed to Zoroaster; Zoroaster; translate French by M. Anquetil Du Perron, 4to, 3 vols. 1771. That this is really the work of the most ancient Zoroaster, and therefore of the Magi, it is very difficult to prove; but it contains the principal ceremonies and maxims of those who now call themselves his disciples, in India. It has some true ancient simplicity and sublimation, but interspersed with much later and barbarous additions and expressions. More recently has been published Bombay, (1818,) by Mulla Firuz bin Kaus, the chief priest of the Parsee religion at Bandra, “The Desarat, or Sacred Writings of the ancient Persian Prophets, with an English Translation.”

written in a dialect now wholly extinct; and have been unintelligible, but for the fortunate circumstance of being attended with a Persian translation and glossary. Among these writings is attributed to Zoroaster, who stands here as the thirteenth of the eleven Sasan, who lived in the time of Khosrow Parvez, who was contemporary with the emperor Heraclius; and died only nine years before the destruction of the ancient Persian monarchy. No account is given of the times of the other prophets, whose works preceded.

The doctrines inculcated in these writings are, the eternity and self-existence of the Supreme Deity, who created another intelligence, who made the world, who made several heavens, and gave to each a soul, and a body, also the stars; (the planets and the fixed stars, called slow-moving stars;) that the elements, meteors, &c. have each its guardian angel; that in a former state ferocious animals have been guilty of crimes, for which they now suffer punishment in being hunted, &c. and that men who now commit crimes, will be punished by becoming such, or like, animals, or vegetables, or minerals. The inessential attributes of Deity are emphatically celebrated in these works; which contain much laudable theism, but little or nothing of rites and ceremonies. They direct that prayer be made to light, or fire, not as being themselves deities, but as conveying the sacrifice to divine intelligences.

MAI, or Max Man, who came to adore Jesus at Bethlehem, (Matt. ii. 1.) are commonly thought to have been philosophers, whose chief study was astronomy, and who dwelt in Arabia Deserta, or Mesopotamia, which the sacred authors express by the word East. (See Numb. xxiii. 7. and Jerem.) [This name, Magi, is properly an appellation given, among the Persians, to priests, wise men, philosophers, &c. who devoted themselves to the study of the moral and physical sciences, and particularly cultivated astrology and medicine. As they thus acquired great honor and influence, they were introduced into the courts of kings and consulted on all occasions. They also followed them in warlike expeditions; and so much importance was attached to their advice and opinions, that nothing was attempted without their approbation. (See Xen. Cyr. iv. 5. 51. iv. 6. 11. vii. 5. 57. Aelian. Var. Hist. ii. 17. iv. 10. Porphyry de abstinent. Anim. iv. 16. Strabo i. 43. xv. 1043. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxiv. 23. xxix. 3.)] R.

The star first seen by the Magi was an influenza meteor, in the middle of the air, which, having been observed by them to be attended with miraculous and extraordinary circumstances, was taken for the star so long foretold by Isaiah; and that after it had resolved to follow the Magi, and to seek the new-born king, whose advent it declared. It was therefore, as he thinks, a light that moved in the air before them, something like the pillar of cloud in the desert.

MAGE, that is, all those arts, the superstitious ceremonies of magicians, sorcerers, enchanters, necromancers, exorcists, astrologers, soothsayers, interpreters of dreams, fortune-tellers, casters of nativities, &c. are all forbidden by the law of God, whether practised to hurt or to benefit mankind. It was also forbidden to consult magicians on pain of death, Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6. Daniel speaks of magicians and diviners in Chaldees, under Nebuchadnezzar, (Dan. iii. 20, &c.) of whom he names four sorts: Chaldeum, Assaphim, Meraphims, and Cush. (chap. ii. 2.) but their distinctions are not certainly known.

MAGOG, son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) and father, as is believed, of the Scythians and Tartars; a name which comprehends the Geta, the Goths, the Sarmatians, the Scæcæ, the Magasætæ, and others. The Tartars and Muscovites possess the country of the ancient Scythians, and retain several traces of the names Gog and Magog. They were formerly called Mogli, and in Tartary are the provinces Lug, Mong, Canzzi, and Gigi; Eungul, Corangul, Caezul, &c. Gog and Magog have in a proverb, to express a multitude of powerful, cruel, barbarous and implacable enemies to God and his worship. (See Gog.) The Arabsians and other oriental writers speak of the same people under the names of Jorgiz and Mogiz.

Suidas says Magog is the Persians; whence we might suppose, that Ezekiel, who describes the army of Magog, intended the army of Xerxes. Josephus says, the people named Magoges were so called from their leader, Magog, who, by the Greeks, is called a Scythian. It should seem, therefore, that Josephus speaks of a name and a people well known in his own time. And Ebedjeus, in the thirteenth century, says, that Adeus planted Christianity throughout Persia, the regions of Assyria, Armenia, Media, Babylonia, the land of Huz, (in the south of Persia, not far from the Tigris, whose metropolis is marked Alva in D'Anville, about lat. 40.) to the confines of India, and even to the land of Gog and Magog.—In the country, evidently, which we now call Tartary. Gog appears to designate the king, and Magog, the people.

MAHALALEEL, or Malaleel, son of Canaan, of the race of Seth, Gen. v. 15, &c.

MAHALATH is the title of Psalms lxx. and lxxxiii. “To the chief musician on Mahalath;” which signifies a musical instrument; probably a stringed instrument to be accompanied by song. In Ethiopic the corresponding word, Macalat, signifies song, psalm, but also a string, a lyre, a zither, &c. R.

MAHANAIM, the two camps or hosts, a city of the Levites of the family of Merari, in Judah, on the brook Jabbok, Josh. xxi. 38; xxii. 30, 39; 1 Chron. xi. 80. Jacob gave it this name, because here he had a vision of angels, Gen. xxxii. 9. In the map of the kingdom of Abosheth, after the death of Saul, (2 Sam. ii. 9—12) and thither David retired, during the usurpation of Absalom, 2 Sam. xvii. 38, &c. In the Vulgate it is sometimes called simply Castra, or the castra. Josh. xxi. 3; 2 Sam. iii. 18, 19, 20, xvii. 24; xix. 32, &c. a harp, a guitar, &c. R.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, he hasteneth to the prey, a name given to one of the sons of the prophet Isaiah, by way of prediction; (Isa. viii. 3.)

The prophet observes that children would be resolved to follow the Magi, and to seek the new-born king, whose advent it declared. It was, therefore, as he thinks, a light that moved in the air before them, something like the pillar of cloud in the desert.

MASHIAH, or Maha, a daughter of Zelophehad, who, with her sisters received their allotment in the land of Canaan, because their father died without male issue, Numb. xxvi. 33; xxvii. 1; Josh. xvii. 3; 1 Chron. vii. 15.

MAHLO, son of Elimelech and Naomi, (Ruth i. 2, &c.) who in the country of Moab married Ruth, a Moabite woman, but died without children: his widow followed her mother-in-law Naomi to Bethlehem, where she married Booz.

MAIMED implies the loss of a limb or member; often the absolute loss of it, not a suspension of its use, by a contraction, or diminution. This total loss is clearly the import of the original word, “If thine hand or foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee—enter into life maimed—rather than have—" ing two hands,” &c. Matt. xviii. 8. And this should the rather be observed, to distinguish it from withered, contracted, &c. and because it may be asked, what we should think of a person who could restore a lost limb, or member. Perhaps we are not always sensible of the full import of this word, when reading the history of the miraculous cures performed by our Lord.

MAKAZ, a city probably of Dan, (1 Kings iv. 9,) supposed by Calmet to be the Maketis, the jaw-tooth, or E-n-hakkore, of Judg. xv. 19; Zeph. i. 11.

MARELOTH, an encampment of Israel in the desert, Numb. xxxiii. 25, 26.

MAKKEDAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 41,) which Eusebius places 8 miles from Eleutheropolis, east, Josh. x. 29. Called Maked, 1 Mac. v. 28, 29.

MAKETSH, meret, probably the name of a quarter or district in or near Jerusalem, perhaps one of the adjacent valleys, Zeph. i. 11. *R.

MALACHI, the last of the twelve minor prophets, and so little known that it is doubted whether his name be a proper name, or only a generical one, signifying the angel of the Lord, a messenger, a prophet. It appears by Hag. i. 13. and Mal. iii. 1. that in these times the name of Malach-Jehovah, messenger of the Lord, was given to prophets. The LXX have rendered Malachi, his angel, instead of my angel, as the original expresses; and several of the fathers have quoted Malachi under the name of “the angel of the Lord.” The second book of Esdras and Tertullian unite the name Malachi and angel of the Lord. Orig. thought that Malach was an angel incorruptible, rather than a prophet; but this opinion is insupportable. It is much more probable that Malach was Ezra; and this is the opinion of the ancient Hebrews, of the Chaldee paraphrast, of Jerome, and of several of the fathers. The author of the Lives of the Prophets, under the name of Epiphanius Dorotheus, and the Chronicon Alexiandrum, say, that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebulun, and native of Sephah; that the name Malachi was given to him because of his angelic mildness, and because an angel used to appear visibly to the people, after the prophet had spoken to them, to confirm what he had said. He died very young, as they say, and was buried near the place of his ancestors.

It is going farther and farther from them, Meleda; that it does not appear that ever men had such an establishment at Meleda as at the purpose of “ wintering in the island,” which her arrival before the stormy season:—a objections form a strong argument against the proposed opinion.

MELITA. That the latter is the one on which suffered shipwreck is probable, because he island a ship of Alexandria which had w there on her voyage to Italy, and after tour, Syracuse and Rhegium, landed at Puteoli; th ing on a direct course. The other Melita w far out of the usual track from Alexandria p and in sailing from it to Rhegium, Syracuse would be out of the direct course. The f the vessel was tossed all night before the ship in the Adriatic sea, does not militate against th ability of its afterwards being driven upon Malta; because the name Adria was applied to the whole island. In which lay by between Sicily and Greece. So Strabo ii. p. 185. C. vii. p. 488. A. (See Wetstein on Acts xxvii. 27. and Adria.) R.

MAMMON, a Chaldee word signifying riches. Our Saviour says, we cannot at the same time serve God and mammon; (Mat. vi. 24,) that we ought not to make ourselves adherents of mammon, or of the riches of unrighteousness, that is, of worldly riches, which are commonly the instruments of sin, and are acquired too often by unrighteousness and iniquity.

MAMRE, the name of an Amorite in alliance with Abraham, Gen. xiv. 13. 24. Hence the oaks of Mamre, (Engl. tr. plain of Mamre, Gen. xiii. 18; xviii. 1.) or simply Mamre, (xviii. 17, 19. xxxv. 27.) a grove near Hebron. R.

MAN, the generic name of the human race, (Gen. i. 27,) were created after the image and likeness of God. See Adam.

"A man of God" generally signifies a prophet; a man devoted to God; to his service. Moses is called peculiarly "the man of God," Deut. xxxiii. 1; Josh. xiv. 6. Our Saviour frequently calls himself "the son of man," in allusion, probably, to the prophecy of Daniel, in which the Messiah is spoken of, Dan. vii. 13.

MAN OF SIN, see Antichrist.

MANAHEM, a Christian historian, and foster-brother of Herod Antipas, (Acts xiii. 1.) was at Antioch with other prophets, when the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." It is conjectured that he was one of the seventy disciples, but no particulars of his life are known.

MANAHEM, the sixteenth king of Israel, was originally general of the army of Zachariah. He was at Tirsah when he b. d. of his master's murder, and immediately marched against Shalum, who had shut himself up in Samaria, whom he killed, and then ascended the throne. He reigned in Samaria ten years, and did evil in the sight of the Lord. Pulp. king of Assyria, having invaded Israel during the reign of Manahem, obliged him to pay a tribute of a thousand talents, which Manahem raised by a tax on all his subjects of fifty shekels a head. Manahem slept with his fathers, and his son Pekahiah reigned In his stead; 2 Kings xv. 15—32.

MANASSEH, the eldest son of Joseph, (Gen. xii. 50, 51,) was born A.M. 2290, and named Manasseh, (causing to forget.) because Joseph said, "God has made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house." When Jacob was about to die, Joseph brought Manasseh to him, Gen. xlviii. 1, &c. Jacob adopted them; made them come to his bed-side, and kissed them. Joseph having placed Ephraim at Jacob's left hand, and Manasseh at his right, Jacob put his right hand on Ephraim, and his left on Manasseh; which Joseph observing, would have had him reverse. Jacob, however, said, "I know what I am doing, my son; the eldest shall be father of a great people, but his younger brother shall be greater than he." He continued to bless them, and said, "In thee shall Israel be blessed, and it shall be said, 'God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh.'" The tribe of Manasseh came out of Egypt, in number 32,200 men, upwards of twenty year men, and the children of Gomaliach, son of Pedahzur, Numb. ii. 20, 21. The tribe was divided in the Land of Promise. One half settled east of the river Jordan, and possessed the country of Bashan, from the river Jabbock to mount Libanus, and the other half settled west of Jordan, and possessed the country between the tribe of Ephraim, south, of the tribe of Judah, north, and the Mediterranean sea, east, and the Mediteerranean west. See Canaan, pp. 229, 233.

II. MANASSEH, fifteenth king of Judah, and son and successor of Hezekiah, (2 Kings xx. 21; xxxi. 3; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1, &c. A. M. 3366,) was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty-five years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; worshipped the idols of Canaan; rebuilt the high places that his father Hezekiah had destroyed; set up altars to Baal, and planted groves to false gods. He raised altars to the whole host of heaven, in the courts of God's house; made his son pass through the fire in honor to Moloch; was addicted to magic, divinations, auguries, and other superstitions; set up the idol Ashtoreth in the house of God; and finally involved his people in all the abominations of idolatry to that degree, that Israel committed more wickedness than the Canaanites which the Lord had driven out before them. To all these crimes Manasseh added cruelty, and shed rivers of innocent blood in Jerusalem.

It is supposed that the prophet Isaiah raised his voice loudly against those enormities. He had been in great credit at court, in the reign of Hezekiah; and was probably of high birth. He was by many thought to have been put to death by this wicked king. See Isaiah.

The calamities which God had threatened, began towards the 22d year of Manasseh's reign. The king of Assyria sent his army against him, who, seizing him among the briars and brambles where he was hid, fettered his hands and feet, and carried him to Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. When in bonds, at Babylon, Manasseh humbled himself before God; who heard his prayers, and brought him back to Jerusalem. Here he acknowledged the hand of the Lord; and we have a prayer which, it is affirmed, he made in prison. The church, however, does not receive it as canonical. He restored the worship of the Lord; broke down the altars of the false gods; and abolished all traces of their idolatrous worship; but did not destroy the high places, which is the only thing Scripture reproaches him with, after his return from Babylon. He caused Jerusalem to be fenced; eleven cities, and the fortified city zone, which in his time was built west of Jerusalem, and which after his reign was called the second city. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. He also put garrisons into all the strong places of Judah. Manasseh was made king of Judah in his 20th year, and reigned 55 years. 2 Kings ii. 18. His son Ammon succeeded him, A. M. 3361.

Many believe that the history of Holophernes happened under Manasseh. See Neh. iii. 26.

III. MANASSEH, husband of Judith, who lived but a little while with her. He had been dead three years when Holophernes' war began. Manasseh was of the tribe of Simeon, and died in the time of barley harvest, of a stroke of the sun, which had affected his head, Judith viii. 2, 3.

IV. MANASSEH, high-priest of the Jews, son of John, and brother of Jaddua, succeeded Eleazar, his great uncle, and was succeeded by Onias II. his nephew. Makhath with Nicodemus, the breather of Sunbalat, governor of Samaria, and by his aid built the temple on mount Gerizim, in which he became the first high-priest. (Josephus xi. 7, 8. Compare Neh. xiii. 28.)
MANDRAKE, a plant called in Hebrew דוד, dudaim, (plural), is a species of melon, of which the ancients, and among others Josephus, have entertained many strange conceits. There are two sorts: the female, which is black, having leaves not unlike lettuce, though smaller and narrower, which spread on the ground, and have a disagreeable smell. It bears berries something like services, pale, of a strong smell, and having kernels within, like those of pears. It has two or three very large roots, twisted together, white within, black without, and covered with a thick rind. The other kind, or male mandrake, is called morion, or folly, because it suspends the use of the senses. It produces berries twice the size of those of the female, of a good scent, and of a color approaching towards saffron. Its leaves are white, large, broad and smooth, like the leaves of the beechn tree. Its root resembles that of the female, but is thicker and larger. This plant stupefies those who use it; sometimes depriving them of understanding; and often causes such vertigoes and lethargies, that if those who have taken it have not present assistance, they die in convulsions.

Pythagoras was the first who conferred on the mandrake the name of anthropophoros, which became very general. On what account this name was given is not certainly known; Calmet states it to have been because most of the roots are parted from the middle downwards, somewhat resembling thighs and legs.

From Gen. xxx. 14, 15, 16, we collect that the fruit was ripe in wheat harvest. And thus Hasselquist, speaking of Nazareth in Galilee, says, "What I found most remarkable at this village, was the great number of mandrakes which grew in a vale below it. I had not the pleasure to see this plant in blossom, the fruit now (May 5th. O. S.) hanging ripe on the stem, which lay withered on the ground. From the season in which the mandrake blossoms, and ripens fruit, one might form a conjecture that it was Rachel's dudaim. These were brought her in the wheat harvest, which in Galilee is in the month of May, about this time, and the mandrake was now in fruit." (Travels, p. 160.)

From Cant. vii. 13, it appears that the dudaim yielded a remarkable smell, at the same time as the vines and pomegranates flowered, which in Juden is always the month of April, or beginning of May. It is probable, therefore, that this circumstance of their smell is to be referred to the fruit rather than to the flower, especially as Brooke, who has given a particular description and a print of the plant, expressly observes that the fruit has a strong nauseous smell, though he says nothing about the scent of the flower. And this circumstance will in some measure account for what Hasselquist remarks, that the Arabs at Nazareth call it by a name which signifies in their language "the devil's virtuosity." So the Samaritan chief-priest told Maudrell, that the mandrakes were plants of a large leaf, bearing a certain sort of fruit, in shape resembling an apple, growing ripe in harvest, but of an ill savour, and not wholesome. But then he added, that the virtue of them was to help conception, being laid under the genital bed; and that the women were often wont so to apply it at this day, out of an opinion of its prolific nature.

From these accounts of the mandrake, it is evident that Rachel could not want them either for food or fragrancy; and from the whole tenor of the narration in Gen. xxx. compared with chap. xxix. 32—34, it appears that both she and Leah had some such notion as the Samaritan chief-priest entertained of their genital virtue. And does not the Jewish queen's advice to her husband, as given in Cant. vii. 13, intimate something of the same kind, and show that the same opinion prevailed among the Jews in the time of Solomon? Nor was this opinion confined to the Jews: the Greeks and the Romans had the same notion of mandrakes. They gave to the fruit the name of "Apple of Love," and to Venus that of Mandragora. The emperor Julian, in his epistle to Calixenes, says, that he drank the juice of mandrakes to excite amorous inclinations. And before him Dioscorides had observed of it, "The root is supposed to be used in philtres or love-potions." On the whole, there seems little doubt but this plant had a provocative quality, and therefore its Hebrew name, dudaim, may be properly deduced, says Calmet, from dudam, pleasures of love.

The mandrakes of the Bible have given rise to much dispute and diversity of opinion among interpreters. It seems to have been a plant to which was attributed the power of rendering barren women fruitful. According to most of the ancient versions, it was the Mandragora, mandrake, (Atropa Mandragora of Linna.) a plant of the genus Belladonna, with a root like a beet, white and reddish blossoms, and yellow apples, which ripen from May to July. To these apples the orientals to this day attribute the power of exciting to venery; and they are called poma amatoria, or love-apples. (See Schulz Leitungen, &c. p. 197. D'Herbelot's Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 17.)

MANNA, see Manna.

Manna, a substance which God gave to the children of Israel for food, in the deserts of Arabia. It began to fall on Friday morning, the sixteenth day of the second month, which from thence was called parah, and continued to fall daily in the morning, except on the sabbath, till after the passage over Jordan, and to the passover of the fortieth year from the exodus, that is, from Friday, June 5, A. M. 3513, to the second day of the passover, Wednesday, May 3, A. M. 3553. It was a small grain, white, like bear-frost, round, and the size of coriander-seed, Exod. xvi. 14; Numb. xi. 4. It fell every morning with the dew, about the camp of the Israelites, and in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey in the wilderness, that it was sufficient to feed the entire multitude, of above a million of souls, every one of whom gathered, for his share every day, the quantity of an omer, i. e. about three quarts. It maintained all this multitude, and yet none of them found any increasing or constant eating of it. Every Friday there fell a double quantity, (Exod. xvi. 5,) and though it putrefied and bred maggots when kept on any other day, yet on the sabbath it suffered no such alteration. And the same manna that was melted by the heat of the sun, when left in the field, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the house, that it was beat in mortars, and would even endure the fire. It was baked in pans, made into paste, and so into cakes. Numb. xvi. 5. It is somewhat easy to think that Calmet should think the "entire multitude" of Israel subsisted wholly on this manna. Certainly, the daily sacrifices were offered; and, no doubt, other offerings, affording animal food, on which the priests and Levites subsisted, according to their offices. That considerable flocks and herds accompanied the camp of Israel is clear from various passages, and it is equally clear these could not live upon manna.
Scripture gives to manna the name of "bread of heaven," and "food of angels"; perhaps, as intimating that it is a vegetable substance called manna which falls in Arabia, in Poland, in Calabria, in mount Libanus, and elsewhere. The most common and the most famous is that of Arabia, which is a kind of condensed honey, found in the summer heat on the leaves of trees, on herbs, on the rocks, or the sand of Arabia Petraea. That which is gathered about mount Sinai has a very strong smell, which it receives from the herbs on which it falls. It easily evaporates, insomuch that if thirty pounds of it were kept in an open vessel, hardly ten would remain at the end of fifteen days. Several writers think that the manna with which the Israelites were fed was like that now found in Arabia, and that the only thing that was miraculous in the occurrence was the regularity of the supply, and its cessation on the sabbath. The Jews, however, with the majority of critics, are of opinion that it was a totally different substance from the vegetable manna, and was specially provided by the Almighty for his people.

Burckhardt says, that in the valleys around Sinai the manna is still found, dropping from the sprigs of several trees, but principally from the Gharab. It is collected by the Arabs, who make cakes of it, and call it "Amal Be raw," or "Amal Beyrouth." (See Exod. xvi. 31.) The Arabs who collect it make cakes of it; so did Israel, loc. cit. Could a similar manna be the wild honey on which John the Baptist lived?

The following is Burckhardt's account of the manna found near Sinai at the present day. Since his time it has been ascertained by Dr. Ehrenberg and M. Rüpell, that the manna is occasioned by an insect, which the former has particularly described. That this, however, could not have been the manna of the Israelites, is sufficiently obvious; unless we regard it as having been miraculously increased, and its qualities miraculously changed—a supposition which involves as great an exertion of miraculous power, as the direct bestowment of a different substance. (See Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, t. i. p. 509, seq.)

"The Wady el Sheikh, the great valley of western Sinai, is in many parts thickly overgrown with the tamarisk or tahr (Hedysarum, Chief of Linn.). It is the only valley in the peninsula of Sinai where this tree grows, at present, in any great quantity; though small bushes of it are here and there met with in other parts. It is from the tarrain that the manna is obtained. This substance is called by the Bedouins manna, and accurately resembles the description of manna given in the Scriptures. In the month of March, it drops from the thorns of the tamarisk upon the fallen twigs, leaves and thorns, which always cover the ground beneath that tree in the natural state; the manna is collected before sunrise, when it is congealed; but it dissolves as soon as the sun shines upon it. The Arabs clean away the leaves, dirt, etc. which adhere to it, boil it, strain it through a coarse piece of cloth, and put it in leather skins: in this way they preserve it till the following year, and use it as they do honey, to pour over unleavened bread, or to dip their bread into. I could not learn that they ever made it into cakes or leaves. The manna is found only in years when copious rains have fallen; sometimes it is not produced at all. I saw none of it among the Arabs, but I obtained a small piece of the last year's produce, in the convent (of mount Sinai), where having been kept in the cool shade and moderate temperature of that place, it had become quite solid, and formed a small nugget. It is small for some time in the hand; if placed in the sun for five minutes, it dissolved; but when restored to a cool place, it became solid again in a quarter of an hour. In the season at which the Arabs gather it, it never acquires that state of hardness which will allow of its being pounded, as the Israelites are said to have done, in Num. x. 8. Its color is a dirty yellow, and the piece which I saw was still mixed with bits of tamarisk leaves; its taste is agreeable, somewhat aromatic, and as sweet as honey. If eaten in any considerable quantity, it is said to be slightly purgative.

"The quantity of manna collected at present, even in seasons when the most copious rains fail, is trifling, perhaps not amounting to more than five or six hundred pounds. It is entirely consumed among the Bedouins, who consider it the greatest dainty which their country affords. The harvest is usually in June, and lasts for about six weeks. In Nubia and in every part of Arabia, the tamarisk is one of the most common trees; on the Euphrates, on the Astaboras, in all the valleys of the Hedjaz and the Bedja, it grows in great plenty.

"It is remarked by Niebuhr, that in Mesopotamia manna is produced by several species of the same species; a similar fact was confirmed to me by the son of a Turkish lady, who had passed the greater part of his youth at Erzerum in Asia Minor; he told me that at Mouah, a town three or four days distant from Erzerum, a substance is collected from the tree which produces the galls, exactly similar to the manna of the peninsula in taste and consistence, and that it is used by the inhabitants instead of honey." (Compare Niebuhr's Descript. of Arabia, p. 145. Germ. edition.)

MAANOAH, father of Samson, of the tribe of Dan, and of the city of Zorah, Judg. xiii. An angel of the Lord having appeared to his wife, and having promised her a son, Manoah desired of the Lord that he might see him who had thus appeared, that he might know from him how to treat his son when born. The Lord heard his prayer, and the angel appeared again to his wife, being then in the fields; who ran to acquaint her husband. Manoah went to him, and obtained from him directions respecting his son. Manoah then said, "My Lord, I pray you be pleased to let us prepare you a kid." The angel replied, "I must not eat any food; but you may offer it for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord." Manoah said to him, (not knowing him to be an angel), "What is your name? that we may pay you honor and acknowledgment, if that shall happen which you have foretold." He answered, "Why ask you my name? which is a secret?" or, "and he kept it secret." Manoah therefore took the kid with the wine for the libations, and put them on the fire which he had lighted on a stone. As the smoke began to ascend, the angel also ended in the midst of the flame, towards heaven. Manoah was alarmed upon the discovery of the angelic nature of his visitant, but was rallied by his wife.

MAON, a city in the south of Judah, (Josh. xv. 55: 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25; xxv. 2) and about which Nahal the Carmelite had great possessions. It was very probably the Mann mentioned in the next article.

MAONITES, a tribe mentioned (Judg. x. 12.)
along with the Amalekites, Zidonians, Philistines, &c. In 2 Esdr. xxvi. 7, they are called Mæanæs, and are mentioned along with the Arabians. There is still a city Mæan with a castle in Arabia Petraea, south of the Dead sea and near Wady Mousa. (See Burekhardt's Travels in Syria, &c., p. 437.) R. MARAH, bitter-cress. When the Israelites, coming out of Egypt, arrived at the desert of Esham, they there found the water to be so bitter, that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink it, Exod. xv. 23. They therefore began to murmur against Moses, who, praying to the Lord, was shown a kind of wood, which, being thrown into the water, made it potable. This wood was called Alvah by the Mahometans, who maintain that Moses had received a piece of it, by succession, from the patriarchs, Noah having kept it in the ark, and delivered it to his posterity. (D'Hérelot, Bibl. Oriental, p. 105, col. 1, et p. 1022, col. 1.) The word _alvea_ has some relation to _aloës_, which is a very bitter wood; and some interpreters have hinted, that Moses took a very bitter sort of wood, on purpose that the power of God might be the more remarkable, in sweetening these waters. Josephus says, that this legislator used the wood which he found by chance, lying at his feet. [See more on this subject under the article _Exodus_.] R.

"El-vah, says Mr. Bruce, (Trav. vol. ii. p. 470.) is a large village, or town, thickly planted with pinetrees, the 'Oasis Parva' of the ancients, the last inhabited place to the west that is under the jurisdiction of Egypt; it yields cenna and coloquintide. The Arabs call El-vah, a shrub or tree, not unlike our Hawthorn, either in form or flower. It was of this wood, they say, that Moses' rod was made, when he sweetened the waters of Marah. With a rod of this wood too, say they, Kaleb Ibn el Waaalid, the great destroyer of Christians, sweetened these waters at El-vah, once bitter, and gave it the name from this miracle. A number of very fine springs burst from the earth at El-vah, which render this small spot verdant and beautiful, though surrounded with dreary deserts on every quarter; it is situated like an island in the midst of the ocean."

We believe that our colonists who first peopled some parts of America, corrected the qualities of the water, they found there, by immersing in it branches of sassafras; and it is understood that the first introduction of the Chinese to the general use of tea, was to correct the water of their rivers; it follows, therefore, that some kinds of wood possess such a quality; and it is clear, that God desired that Moses should provide wood proper for his purpose. But then it must be confessed that the water of these parts continues bad to this day, and is so greatly in want of something to improve it; that had such a discovery been communicated by Moses, it could hardly have been lost. Niebuhr, when upon the spot where this miracle was performed, inquired after wood capable of this effect; but could gain no information of any sort. It was, however, from hence follow, that Moses used a bitter wood, or even any ordinary wood; but, as Providence usually works by the proper and fit means to accomplish its ends, probably the wood used by Moses was, in some degree at least, corrective of that quality which abounded in the waters; though, perhaps, it might itself have other qualities equally bad, but of a different kind, (wherefore it has been lost,) adapted, perhaps, to neutralize the water, and so to render it potable. See _Exodus_, as above.

That other water also stands in need of correction, and that such correction is applied to it, appears from a custom in Egypt, in respect to the water of the Nile; a custom which, being of great antiquity, might have been familiar to Moses. "The water of the Nile is always somewhat muddy, but by rubbing with bitter almonds, prepared in a particular manner, in the earthen jars in which it is kept, this water is rendered clear, light and salutary." (Niebuhr's Travels, vol. i. p. 71.) Did these bitter almonds suggest the idea of bitter wood? MARAH-ATHA, the Lord comes, a form of threatening, cursing, or anathematizing among the Jews. Paul pronounces Ananthea Maran-atha against all who love not our Lord Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Commentators inform us, that Maran-atha is the greatest anathema among the Jews, and equivalent to Sham-atha, or Shem-atha, the name comes, or the Lord comes: q. d. "Mayest thou be devoted to the greatest of evils, and to the utmost severity of God's judgments; may the Lord come quickly to take vengeance of thy crimes." But Selden and Lightfoot maintain, that Maran-atha is not found in this sense among the rabbins, but that it may be understood in an absolute sense: "Let him that does not love our Lord Jesus Christ be anathema. The Lord is coming, the Messiah has appeared; evil to whomsoever receives him not." See more under _Ananthea_, p. 55, col. 2.

MAreshah, a fortified city of Judah; called also Moresheth. The prophet Micah was a native of this city. It was two miles from Hebron, and near to it, in the vale of Zephanthath, was fought a famous battle between Asa, king of Judah, and Zerah, king of Chus, in which Asa defeated a million of men, Josh. xv. 44; 2 Chr. xi. 8; xiv. 10; Micah l. 1, 15. In the latter times of the Jewish commonwealth, Maresheah belonged to Idumææ, as did several other southerly cities of Judah. It was peopled by the Jews, and their allies, in the time of John Hyrcanus. Alexander Janneus took it from the Arabsians, and Pompey restored it to its first inhabitants. Gabinius rebuilt it, and the Parthians destroyed it in the war of Antigonus against Herod. (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv.)

I. MARIAMNE, daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, and of Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus, high-priest of the Jews, was the most beautiful princess of her age. She married Herod the Great, by whom she had two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Salampe and Cypros; also a son called Herod, who died young, during his studies at Rome. Herod was excessively fond of Mariamne, who but slightly returned his passion; and at length cherished a deadly hatred towards him. Herod had her put to death; but afterwards his affection for her became stronger than ever. Josephus mentions a tower that Herod built in Jerusalem, which he named Mariamne. See _Herod._

II. MARIAMNE, daughter of the high-priest Simon, and wife of Herod the Great; by whom she had a son called Philip, who married first the famous Herodias, who afterwards lived with Herod Antipas, who put to death John the Baptist, Mark vi. 17; Matt. xiv. 3.

I. MARK, the Evangelist, according to Papias and others, was the disciple and interpreter of Peter, who speaks of him, as is thought, (1 Epist. chap. v. 13,) as his son in the spirit; probably because he had converted him. The place and time at which Mark wrote his Gospel are uncertain. Clemens Alexaudirens and others affirm that Peter going to Rome, about A. D. 44, Mark accompanied him, and there wrote his Gospel, at the request of the brethren, who desired that he would give them in writing what he had learned from Peter by word of mouth. And they add, that when he informed them of what his disciple had done, he commended his undertaking, and gave his Gospel to be read in the churches, as an authentic work. See Gospel.—Mark.

A number of things are related as connected with the life and travels of Mark, after the close of the history in the Acts of the Apostles; (see John Mark;) but as we have no means of attesting their truth, we omit all further mention of them here.

Calmet is of opinion that the Gospel of Mark is an abridgment of that by Matthew. He often uses the same terms, relates the same facts, and notices the same circumstances. He sometimes adds particulars which throw great light on Matthew's text; and there are two or three miracles in Mark, which are not in Matthew. (See chap. i. v. ix. xvi.) But what is the most remarkable is, that he forsook Matthew in the order of his narration, from chap. iv. 13, to chap. xiv. 13, of that writer. In these places he pursues the order of time as noted by Luke and John; and this has induced chronologers to follow Luke, Mark, and John, rather than Matthew. He opens his Gospel with the preaching of John the Baptist, and omits several parables related by Matthew, (chap. xx. xxii. xxv.) as also several discourses of our Saviour to his disciples, and to the Pharisees, chap. v. vii. xvi. xviii. The origin of Mark's Gospel forms an interesting subject of inquiry. We have seen that some of the ancients were of opinion that it was written under the dictation of Peter; but the grounds of this opinion are not ascertained. If Mark were son to that Mary (Acts xii. 13.) who resided at Jerusalem, and whose house was the resort of the faithful, he must have known many things which passed at Jerusalem, as well as Peter himself. He must also have been sufficiently versed in the Syriac language, and able to make use of whatever materials for true history were in circulation, which, probably, were many, though incomplete, while he would receive others from Peter. It appears from his history that Mark was much engaged in journeying; sometimes with or for Peter, sometimes with or for Barnabas, and Peter also. It is probable, that he composed his Gospel at intervals of such journeys, as Luke also did; and he is no more an epitomizer of Matthew than Luke is, with whom he agrees in many particulars.

And they add that in the cities of antiquity, was different from the market in our English towns, where flesh meat, &c. is usually sold. When we read (Acts xvii. 17.) of the apostle Paul disputing with philosophers in the market at Athens, we are apt to wonder what kind of philosophers these market-folks could be; or why the disputants could not engage in a place fitter for investigation and discussion of abstruse and difficult subjects. So, when we read that Paul and Silas, having expelled the Phrygian spirit, (Acts xvi. 19.) were led to the marketplace; and accused, we may not be aware of the fitness of a market for the residence of a tribunal of justice. But the fact is, that the forum was usually a public market on one side only, the other sides of the area being occupied by temples, theatres, courts of justice, and other public buildings. In short, the forums were sumptuous squares, surrounded by decorations &c. of various, and often of magnificent kinds. Here the philosophers met; and taught; here laws were promulgated; and here devotions, as well as amusements, occupied the populace. The nearest approach to the composition of an ancient forum, is, perhaps, Covent-garden, in London; where there is a market in the middle, a church at one end, a theatre at one corner, and sitting magistrates close adjacent; under the piazzas, too, suppose them to be the resort of philosophers, much philosophic discussion might take place, and many an intricate subject might be examined. In our climate, such a shelter from the cold, or rain, would hardly be thought sufficient; but in the East, it would be sought from the heat, and the cool shade, or the covered settle, would be the place chosen, no less than the sequestered groves of Academus, at Athens. In short, if we add such a school, or any other, for philosophical instruction, or divinity lectures, we have nearly the composition of an ancient forum, or market-place. This removes entirely the seeming incongruity between discourses and disputations on the principles of theology and Christianity, and those commercial avocations which we usually assign to a market-place. On the same principle, when the Pharisæes desired salutations in the market-places, (Matt. xii. 38.) it was not merely from the country people who brought their productions for sale, but, as they loved to be admired by religious people and magistrates, &c. so they desired salutations from persons of consequence, judges, magistrates, dignitaries, &c. in the forum, in order to display their importance to the people, to maintain their influence, &c.

MARRIAGE is, among the Hebrews, a matter of strict obligation. They understand literally, and as a precept, the words addressed to our first parents: (Gen. i. 28.) "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." They believe that he who does not marry his children, deprives God of the glory due to him, becomes in some sort a homicide, destroys the image of the first man, and is a reason why the Holy Ghost withholds himself from Israel. This question is mooted in the Philistia: "Who is he that prostitutes his daughter?" It is answered, "The father that keeps her too long in his house, or that marries her to an old man." (Comp. I Cor. vii. 36.) The age at which wedlock becomes an obligation, with them, is twenty years; though generally they marry their children sooner. And this marriage is supposed to precede the before the age of puberty, which is at twelve years and a half, she may be separated from her husband for any slight disgust. Still, the virgins were betrothed very early; though not married till after twelve years old; whence comes the expression "the guide of one's youth," (Prov. ii. 17.) or one espoused in early life; also "the guide of one's youth," expressing a husband married young.

In the first ages, marriages between brothers and sisters were necessary, because of the small number of persons then in the world; but after mankind had become numerous, they were unlawful, and were prohibited under great penalties. (See incest.) However, the patriarchs long continued to espouse their near relations, intending thereby to avoid alliance with families corrupted by the worship of false gods; or to preserve in their own families the worship of the true God, and the maintenance of the true religion, of which they were the depositaries. For this reason Abraham appears to have married his half-sister, Sarah; and also to have sent his steward Eliezer to fetch a wife for his son Isaac from among the daughters of his nephews. Jacob also espoused the daughters of his uncle.

From what has been said, it is easy to perceive why celibacy and barrenness was a reproach in Israel; and why the daughter of Jephthah went to bewail her virginity; (Judg. xi. 37.) that is, being compelled to die unmarried and childless.

Young women, before their marriage, were called

Moses, i.e., perhaps, maidens, because they seldom appeared in public. The manner in which a daughter was demanded in marriage, may be seen in the instance of Hamor and Shechem, when they demanded Dinah of Jacob: (Gen. xxxiv. 8, &c.) "The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter; I pray you, give her to me to wife." See also (Gen. xxiv. 35) the manner in which Eliezer demands Rebekah for Isaac; and (Tobit vii. 10, 11.) the demand that Tobias made of Sarah, the daughter of Raguel. The husband gave a dowry to his wife, as a kind of purchase-money. (See Deut. xvi.) Before the contract, they agreed on what portion the man should give his bride, and what presents to her father and brethren. Jacob gave seven years for Leah, and seven additional years for Rachel; (Gen. xxix.) and the sisters complain, some years after, that their father Laban, and staked their portions to his own use, Gen. xxxi. 15. (See also 1 Sam. xviii. 25.)

The betrothing was performed either by a writing, or by a piece of silver given to the bride, or by cohabitation and consummation. This is the form of the writing: "On such a day, of such a month, in such a year, N. the son of N. has said to N. the daughter of N. Be thou my spouse according to the law of Moses and the Israelites, and I will give thee for the portion of thy virginity the sum of two hundred Zuzim, as is ordained by the law. And the said N. has consented to become his spouse on these conditions, which the said N. has promised to perform on the day of marriage. To this the said N. obliges himself, and for this he engages all his goods, even as far as the cloak that he wears upon his shoulder. Moreover, he promises to perform all that is generally intended in contracts of marriage, in favor of the Israelitish women. Witnesses N. N. N." The promise by a piece of silver, and without writing, was made before the witnesses, when the young man said to his mistress: "Receive this piece of silver as a pledge that you shall become my spouse." Lastly, the engagement by cohabitation, according to the rabbis, was allowed by the law, (Deut. xxiv. 1.) but it had been wisely forbidden, because of the abuses that might happen, and to prevent clandestine marriages. After the marriage was contracted, the young people had the liberty of seeing each other, which was not allowed to them before; and if, during this time, the bride should trespass against that fidelity she owed to her bridegroom, she was treated as an adulteress. Thus the holy Virgin, after she was betrothed to Joseph, having conceived our Saviour Jesus Christ, might have been punished as an adulteress, if the angel of the Lord had not satisfied Joseph. Between the time of being espoused and the marriage, there frequently passed a considerable interval; whether because of the under-age of the persons espoused, or for other reasons of necessity or decency. When the parties were agreed on the terms of marriage, and the time was fit for completing it, they drew up the contract.

The rabbins inform us, that before the temple of Jerusalem was laid in ruins, the bridegroom and bride wore crowns at their marriage. In Scripture mention of the crown of the bridegroom, but that of the bride; and, indeed, the head-dress worn by women was by no means convenient for wear in public. (Compare Isa. lxi. 10. Cant. iii. 11.) Forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold Solomon with the crown wherewith he crowned him in the day of his espousals, and day of the gladness of his heart." The modern in some places throw handfuls of wheat on the married couple, particularly on the bride, "Increase and multiply." In other places mingle pieces of money with the wheat, which is gathered up by the poor.

We see by the gospel, that the bridegroom Paranymus, or bridan, called by our S. the bridegroom," John iii. 26. A number of young people kept him company during the wedding, to do him honor; and were kept company with the bride all the time. The companions of the bridegroom are mentioned in the history of Samson, (Judg. xiv. 1; 11.) also the companions of the Cant. i. 4.; ii. 7.; iii. 5.; iv. Ps. xlv. 9, 14.; office of the bridegroom was to perform the ceremonial of the wedding, instead of the bridegroom, and to obey his orders. Some think that the Archite or governor of the feast, at the marriage in Cana, the bridegroom, Paranymus, or friend of the groom, who presided at the feast, and had the care of providing for the guests, (John ii. 9.) The friends of the bridegroom sang the Epithalamic wedding song, at the door of the bride the day before the wedding. Ps. xlv. is an Epithalamion entitled "A song of rejoicing of the well-beloved." The ceremony of the wedding was performed with great decorum, the young people of each sex kept separate, in distinct apartments, and at different tables. The reservedness for the eastern people was required of them; and we see it in the marriage of Samson, in that of Solomon, and in the Caesars. The young men dined together sometimes in proposing riddles, and the bridegroom appointed the prize to those who could explain them, Judg. xiv. 14.; 15.

The marriage ceremony commonly lasted four days for a man, and three days for a woman. A man says to Jacob, respecting Leah—"Thou shalt prepare a week." Gen. xxix. 27. The ceremonies of Samson's wedding continued seven whole days, (Judg. xiv. 15.) and it is said that these seven days of rejoicing were commonly held in the house of the woman's father, after which the bride conducted the bride to her husband's home.

Marriage, its forms, and the ideas connected with it, are so dissimilar in different places, that it is extremely difficult to form an adequate concept of the subject. As a partial illustration of their many state, on the authority of the Gentoo Code in India, there are eight forms of contracting marriage. Some of these have little or no reference to customs alluded to in Scripture; but others are useful to us. We find among the Gentoo customary dowry given by the proposed husband to the bride's father, as in the case of Shechem, xxxiv. 12.) and of David, 1 Sam. xviii. 24. I may be referred the third and sixth forms. The fourth form contribute at least to throw light on the story of Jeth and Tamar? Gen. xxxviii.
the pledges of—thy signet and thy bracelets, and the saff that is in thine hand," as, at least, equally efficacious for preserving the confidence of the party giving them, as "necklaces or strings of flowers?" Did Tamar thus marry herself to Judah, though unwillingly in him? From the expression, (ver. 26.) "He knew her again no more," it would seem as if he might lawfully have known her again had he pleased. Although Tamar had been contracted to Er and to Onan, whether those marriages had been consummated may be a question. When the forms of marriage are so simple as those of the fifth class, we need not be surprised at the ready giving of daughters in marriage; as occurs frequently in Scripture. Is something like it alluded to, Malachi ii. 11? The seventh form illustrates Deut. xxi. 11, of marrying a captive taken in war. The eighth form seems to resemble the provision made in Exod. xxi. 16. From these different kinds, and, as it were, ranks of marriage, it appears that many ideas were attached to the connection anciently, and in the East, which differ greatly from those attending our uniform rites of contract; but they are necessary to be well understood, before we determine on certain passages of Scripture history.

The third form, Ashre, is so called when the parents of a girl receive one bull and cow from the bridegroom, on his marrying their daughter. The fourth form, Kandchrub, is so called, when a man and woman, by mutual consent, interchange their necklaces or strings of flowers, and both make agreement, in some secret place; as, for instance, the woman says, 'I am become your wife,' and the man says, 'I acknowledge it.' The fifth form, Penuqaput, so called, when the parents of a girl, upon her marriage, say to the bridegroom, 'Whatever act of religion you perform, perform it with our daughter;' and the bridegroom assents to this speech. The sixth form, Ashore, so called, when a man gives money to a father and mother, on his marrying their daughter, and also gives something to the daughter herself. The seventh form, Rakhats, so called, when a man marries a daughter of another, whom he has conquered in war. The eighth form, Petchach, so called, when, before marriage, a man, coming in the dress and disguise of a woman, debauches a girl, and afterwards the mother and father of the girl marry her to the man.

Mr. Harmer has the following observation, (No. liii. p. 513. vol. ii.) on the contracts for temporary wives: "Sir J. Chardin observed in the East, that in their contracts for temporary wives, (which are known to be frequent there,) which contracts are made before the Kady, there is always the formality of a measure of corn mentioned over and above the sum of money that is stipulated." It can scarcely be thought, that this formality is recent in the East; it may, possibly, be very ancient, as, apparently, connections of this description are: if it could be traced to patriarchal times, it would, perhaps, account for Hosea's purchasing a woman under this character, "for fifteen pieces of silver, and a certain quantity of barley." Chap. iii. 2.

The observations of baron du Tott appear to illustrate, in some degree, the origin of this custom; at least, his account is amusing, and may serve to complete the hints of Mr. Harmer: "I observed an old man standing, singly, before his door. The lot (by which was determined who should receive the newly-arrived guest) fell upon him. The arourd of my new host expressed his satisfaction; and no sooner had he shown me into a clean lower apartment, than he brought his wife and daughter, with their faces covered with a veil, the one carrying a gourd, and the second carrying a napkin, which she spread over my hands after I had washed them." The baron adds in a note, "We may observe, that the law of Namakrem, of which I have spoken in my preliminary discourse, is not scrupulously observed by the Tartar women. We ought also to remark, that these people have many customs, which seem to indicate the origin of those that are analogous to them among us. May we not also trace the motive of the matrimonial crown, and the comfits which are used at the marriages of Europeans, in the manner in which the Tartars portion out their daughters? They cover them with milklet. In the origin of society, seed grain ought necessarily to be the representing token of all wealth. A dish, of about a foot in diameter, was placed on the head of the bride; over this a veil was thrown, which covered the face, and descended to the shoulders; milklet was then poured upon the dish, which, falling, and spreading all around her, formed a cone, with a base corresponding to the height of the bride. Nor was her portion complete till the milklet touched the dish, while the veil gave her the power of respiration. This custom was not favorable to small people; and, at present, they estimate how many measures of milklet a daughter is worth. The Turks and Armenians, who make their calculations in money, still preserve the dish and the veil, and throw coin upon the bride, which they call 'spilling the milklet.' Have not the crown and the comfits the same origin?" (vol. i. p. 213.) If this be accepted as a probable reference to the origin of the custom of purchasing wives with seed corn, it may, undoubtedly, be very ancient; but it might have some relation to good wishes for a numerous progeny. So among the Greeks, various fruits, as figs, or nuts, &c., were thrown by the youthful attendants upon the head of the bride, as an omen of fruitfulness; and as good wishes of this kind were usual, (see Rebekah's dismissal, Gen. xxiv. 68.) could anything more aptly allude to them? Its antiquity may be, at least, as remote under this idea as under the other.

As the circumstances of Hosea's behavior appear sufficiently strange to us, it may be worth while to add the baron's account of marriages by Capin; which agrees with other relations of the same kind in the East: "There is another kind of marriage, which, stipulating the return to be made, fixes likewise the time when the divorce is to take place. This contract is called Capin; and, properly speaking, is only an agreement made between the parties to live together, for such a price, during such a time." (Preliminary Discourse, p. 23.) It is scarcely possible to expect more direct illustration of the prophet's conduct (Hos. iii.) than this extract from the baron affords. We learn from it that this contract is a regular form of marriage, and that it is so regarded, generally, in the East. Such a connection and agreement, then, could give no scandal, in the days of Hosea, though it would not be seemly under Christian manners. The prophet says—"So I bought her [my wife; for me fifteen pieces of silver, and for a homer of barley, and a half homer of barley. And I said unto her, Many days shall thou abide for me. Thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man; so will I also be for thee." What was this but a marriage by Capin, according to the account above given? And the prophet carefully lets us know, that he honestly paid the stipulated price; that he was very strict in his agreement, as to the behavior of his wife; and that he also bound himself to the same fidelity, during the time for which they mutually contracted. It may easily be imagined that this kind of marriage was liable to be abused; and that it was glanced at, and included, in our Lord's prohibition of hasty divorces, need not be doubted. Had a certain writer proceeded no further than to consider the direction, "Let every man have [retain] his own wife, and every woman have [retain] her own husband," (1 Cor. vii. 2), as relating to marriages of such imperfect connection, (for this is not the only kind contracted without much ceremony or delay,) both his work and his principles would have been gainers by his prudence.

MARRIAGE PROCESSIONS.—The procession accompanying the bride from the house of her father to that of the bridegroom was generally one of great pomp, according to the circumstances of the married couple; and for this they often chose the night. Hence, in the parable of the ten virgins that went to meet the bride and bridegroom (Matt. xxv.) it is said the virgins were asleep; and at midnight, being awakened at the cry of the bridegroom's coming, the foolish virgins found they had no oil to supply their lamps; which while they went to buy, the bridegroom and his attendants passed by.

Mr. Taylor has collected very copious information relative to the marriage processions among the oriental people, in Fragments 49, 557, and 674. Many of the circumstances attending these will be found to contribute aid in the elucidation of two or three passages of Scripture, but their value would not justify us in appearing to them the space they would occupy. "At a marriage, the procession of which I saw some years ago," says Mr. Ward, (View of Hist. of Hindoos, vol. iii. p. 171, 172), "the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Scarampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water; after waiting two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, 'Behold! the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.' All the persons employed now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands, to fill up their stations in the procession; some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride, at which place the company entered in a large and splendidly illuminated area, before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately shut, and guarded by Sepoys. I and others expostulated with the door-keepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with our Lord's beautiful parable, as at this moment—and the door was shut.' In the beautiful parable of our Lord, there are ten virgins, who took their lamps, and went in a company to meet the bridegroom. Five of them were wise, endowed with prudence and discretion; the other five were foolish, thoughtless and inconsiderate. The thoughtless took their lamps, but were so foolish as to take only a little oil in them to serve the present occasion. But the prudent, mindful of futurity, and knowing that the coming of the bridegroom was uncertain, as well as filling their lamps prodigiously, also took a quantity of oil in their vessels to supply them, that they might be ready to go forth at a moment's warning. Having waited long for the bridegroom, and he not appearing, they all, tired with long watching, and fatigued with the fatigue of the occasion, fell asleep. Then there came two at a distant village, with sleep, and sunk into profound repose. But lo! at midnight they were suddenly alarmed with a cry, "The bridegroom, the bridegroom cometh! Haste to meet and congratulate him!" Roused with the unexpected proclamation, they all got up and trimmed their lamps. But the oil, in those that belonged to the foolish virgins, being consumed, they were in the utmost confusion when they found them gone out; and having nothing in their vessels to trim them with, they began to see their mistake. In this extremity they entreated their companions to impart to them some of their oil, telling them that their lamps were gone out. To these entreaties the prudent answered, that they had only provided a sufficient quantity for their own use, and therefore advised them to go and purchase oil of those who sold it. They departed accordingly, but while absent on this errand, the bridegroom came, and the prudent virgins, being prepared for his reception, went along with him to the nuptial entertainment, and the door was shut. After some time the others returned, and, knocking loud, supplicated earnestly for admission. But the bridegroom repulsed them, telling them, Ye pretended to be my friends, and to do me honor on this occasion; but ye have not acted as friends, for which reason I know you not: I do not acknowledge you as my friends, and will not admit strangers.

From another parable, in which a great king is represented as making a most magnificent entertainment at the marriage of his son, (Matt. xxii.) we learn that all the guests, who were honored with an invitation, were expected to be dressed in a manner suitable to the splendor of such an occasion, and as a token of just respect to the new-married couple; and that after the procession, in the evening, from the bride's house, was concluded, the guests, before they were admitted into the hall where the entertainment was served up, were taken into an apartment and viewed, that it might be known if any stranger had intruded, or if any of the company were apprilled in raiment unsuitable to the genial solemnity they were going to celebrate; and such, if found, were expelled the house with every mark of ignominy and disgrace. From the knowledge of this custom, the following instructions were given to the king's servants: When the king came in to see the guests, he discovered among them a person who had not on a wedding garment. He called him and said, Friend, how came you to intrude into my palace in a dress so unsuitable to this occasion? The servant was struck dumb; he had no apology to offer for this disrespectful neglect. The king then called to his servants, and bade them bind him hand and foot, to drag him out of the room, and thrust him out into the midnight darkness. (Hastwood.)

LEVIRATE MARRIAGES. There is one circumstance connected with this subject among the Hebrews, that should not be omitted here. The law of Moses obliged one brother to marry the widow of another, who died without children, that there might be seed to him. This is called Levirate. The custom seems to have been in force, among the Hebrews and Canaanites, before the time of Moses; since Judah gives Er his first-born, and Onan his second son, to Tamar, and obliges himself to give her also Shelah. This third son of Ruth, who married Boaz, is an evidence of this practice under the judges. Boaz was neither the father of, nor the nearest relation to Elimelech, father-in-law of Ruth, the widow of Mahlon; yet he married her, after the refusal of the next of kin. The rabbins suggest many exceptions; and for the sake of the clause, "the marriage of the brother of the deceased," it is usual to confine the decision on the brother of marrying his sister-in-law, regards only brothers born of the same father and mother; that it has respect only to the eldest brother of the deceased; and further, supposes that he was not married; for if he were married, he might either take or leave his brother's widow. If the deceased brother had left a natural or adoptive son or daughter, a grandson or granddaughter, the brother was under no obligation to marry his widow. If the dead person left many wives, the brother could marry but one of them; if the deceased had many brothers, the eldest alone had a right to all his estate, and enjoyed the property which his wife had brought him. They add, that the marriage of the widow with her brother-in-law was performed without solemnity, because the widow of the brother who died not having children, passed for the brother-in-law's wife, without any occasion for further ceremony. Notwithstanding, custom required that this should be done in the presence of two witnesses, and that the brother should give a piece of money to the widow. The nuptial blessing was added, and a writing to secure the wife's dower. Some believe, that this law was not observed after the Babylonian captivity, because, since that time, there has been no distinction of inheritances among the tribes.

The law was this, in case of a refusal by the brother to marry the widow; (Deut. xxv. 7.) "If the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, 'My husband's brother will not perform the duty of a husband's brother; then shall his brother's wife come unto him, in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house.' And his name shall be called in Israel, 'The house of him who hath had his shoe loosed.'" Remark, (1.) The word rendered shoe (παπολ, ποδος) usually means sandal, i.e. a mere sole held on the foot in a very simple manner; and so is understood by the Chaldean Targum, by the LXX., and by the Vulgate. (2.) The primary and radical meaning of the word rendered face (φυτος, pent) is surface, the superstructure of any thing. Mr. Taylor suggests, then, that the direction given to the bridegroom is to be to this purpose; the brother's wife shall loose the sandal from off the foot of her husband's brother, and shall spit upon his face, or surface, (i.e. that of the shoe,) and shall say, etc.—in which case the ceremony is coincident with the following:

Tournefort says, (vol. ii. p. 316.) "A woman may demand to be separated from her husband if he"... decline her intimacy; "if the woman turn her slipper upside down in presence of the judge it is a sign," and is taken as evidence against her husband. "The judge sends to look for the husband, bastinates him, and dissolves the marriage." A more particular account of this ceremony is given by Aaron Hill: (Tracts, p. 104.) The third divorce practised by the Turks, is, when a man"... withholds his personal intimacy from his wife, "yet refuses to dismiss her. Being summoned by her friends before a judge, and forced to bring her with him to the same appearance, when the charge is read against him, she is asked if she will then affirm her husband of that accusation? Hereupon she stoops, and taking off her slipper, spits upon the sole; and strikes on her husband's forehead. Modesty requires no further confirmation from the female plaintiff; and sentence is immediately pronounced, in favor of the lady, who is therefore thenceforth free to take a husband; and is entitled, notwithstanding, to a large allowance from her former consort's yearly income."

These ceremonies differ in some things, however; for in the case of complaint against her own husband, for personal abstinence, the wife takes off her shoe and spits upon it; but in the case of complaint against her husband's brother for refusing to be his locum tenens, and declining her intimacy, she takes off his shoe and spits upon it. Moreover, the text does not say she shall turn up the sole, and spit upon it, (such inversion signifying a very different matter, as may be seen in Busebequius, (Ep. 169.) and could have no place in the case of the husband's brother,) but she shall spit upon the face or upper part of it, as an oath, affirmation, and evidence, of his refusal "to build up his brother's house." It deserves notice that the apppellative phrase which brands the character of the refuser is not "the house of him who had his shoe loosed, and was spitted upon;" but that of him who, with the shoe, laid down under the thigh, appears sufficiently strange to us, yet, being binding on those who took it, it might fully answer its purpose. Why the subject to which it alludes was signified by the shoe in particular, might possibly be ascertained by an accurate attention to some of the senses in which the word foot, or feet, is used, Jer. ii. 25; Ezek. xvi. 25; Isa. vii. 30; xxxvi. 13; in Heb. bsc. Is there a gradation observable in the treatment of more distant relatives, though the nearest kin remaining, as in the case of Ruth? The man himself plucked off his own shoe; and gave it to his neighbor; it was not plucked off by the petitioner, nor was it given to her; but it was loosened, perhaps decently, and deliberately, by himself, and given by him to his neighbor; implying, probably, a smaller portion of indignity, as the relation was more remote, and his obligation to comply with the custom proportionately less urgent. This affords an answer to Michal's question, (No. 59,) which Niebuhr has not replied to.

Christ has restored marriage to its first perfection, by banishing polygamy, and forbidding divorce, except in the case of adultery, (Matt. v. 32,) nor has he united to the parties so separated, the liberty of marrying again, Luke xvi. 18. (See Divorce.) Our Saviour blessed and sanctified marriage by being present himself at the wedding at Cana, (John ii. 1, 2,) and Paul declares the excellence of Christian marriage, when he says, (Eph. v. 32.) "Let every one of you so love his wife, even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband." "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies; he that loveth his wife, loveth himself. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the church." The union of husband and wife represents the sacred moral union of Christ with his church. The same apostle assures us (Heb. xiii. 4.) that "marriage is honorable in all, and the bed unbriddled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge.

The New Testament prescribes no particular ceremony for the solemnizing of matrimony; but in the church, a blessing has always been given to the married couple.

MARS' HILL. Our translators have entirely spoiled the narrative of the historian in Acts xvii. 19, 22, by rendering "they took Paul, and brought him unto Areopagus ... then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill." Now as Mars' hill is Areopagus translated, and as both Areopagus and Mars' hill signify the same place, there is no necessity for having preserved in both verses; in which case the narrative would have stood thus:—"They took Paul, and brought him before the court of the Areopagists," or the court which sat on Areopagus. . . . "Paul stood before the court of the Areopagists, and said, Ye chief men of Athens." (See Areopagus.) The propriety of the apostle's discourse is greatly illustrated by considering the important, the senatorial, and even the learned, character of his audience.

MARTHA, sister of Lazarus and Mary. Upon one occasion, when our Saviour visited them at Bethany, Martha was very busy in preparing supper, while Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, hearing his doctrine with great attention, Luke x. 38—42. Martha complained, and wished Mary to rise and assist her.
But Jesus made answer, "Martha, Martha, you are very busy and in much trouble to provide indifferent and unnecessary things; there is but one thing necessary, and Mary has chosen the better part, which shall not be taken from her." Some time after this, Lazarus falling sick, the sisters sent word to Jesus, who was then beyond Jordan; but he departed, and Mary all the while knew Lazarus to be dead. When he approached Bethany, Martha went out to meet him; expostulated with him on his delay; and professed her faith in him. Jesus told them bring him to Lazarus' tomb, and there raised this from the dead, John xi. 20, &c. (See Lazarus.) Six days before his passion, Jesus, being at Bethany, on his way to Jerusalem, was invited to eat by a Pharisee, called Simon the leper, John xii. 1. Martha attended upon the guests, of whom Lazarus was one.
and Mary prepared a box of precious perfume on the head and feet of Jesus, Matt. xxvii. 6, &c. This is all we know of Martha. The Latins and Greeks maintain, that she died at Jerusalem, as also Mary and Lazarus, and that they were all buried the same day.

MARTYR, properly, denotes a witness; in ecclesiastical history, a witness, by the shedding of his blood, in testifying the truth. Thus martyrs are distinguished from confessors, properly so called, who underwent great afflictions for their confession of the truth, but without suffering death. The term martyr

M A R Y, the wife of Joseph, the mother of Jesus, was, it is said, daughter of Joachim and Anna, of the tribe of Judah; but Scripture mentions nothing of her parents, not even their names, unless Hele (Luke iii. 23.) be the same as Joachim. She was of the royal race of David, as was Joseph her husband; and was also cousin to Elisabeth, wife of Zerubbabel the priest, Luke i. 5, 36. The Greek text (Matt. i. 18.) imports that Mary was espoused to Joseph, who, according to the usages of the Hebrews, had the same power over her as if she were his wife. (See Marriage.)

Some time after the espousals the angel Gabriel appeared to Mary, to acquaint her, that she also was the mother of the Messiah, Luke i. 26—37, asking how this could be, since she knew not the angel replied, that "The Holy Ghost come upon her, and that the power of the E should overshadow her." To confirm his word he said that nothing was impossible to G aided, that her cousin Elisabeth, who was be-barren, was then in the sixth month of her nancy. Mary answered, "Behold the hand the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word; and she kept all things which were told her by the angels. (See Limitations.)

MARY

The following remarks and suggestions are from the English translation of Gallican, and are given for what they are worth. On similar principles it would not be very difficult to prove or disprove any historical fact. R.

Traditions seldom or never retain, unadulterated, for any length of time, the original truth from which they took their rise. Yet some of them convey information, though disguised, which more regular history does not afford. Among these Mr. Taylor classes the report, that Luke was a painter, and had painted the portrait of the mother of our Lord; conceiving that we find in the writings of this sacred penman such a description of the Holy Mother, as may justly be called her portrait; that is—the portrait of her character and mind, not of her person and countenance. We are scarcely introduced to this interesting personage, (chap. i. 25.) when we are told, that "she was troubled, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be." The word rendered troubled, does not import any deficiency of natural courage, but simply the agitation of her mind, dashing, as it were, backwards and forwards like water; now thinking well, now suspecting ill, of this salutation. And to this sense agree the word ὑπομονή, reasoning within herself, examining both sides of the question, disputing pro and con, as to the nature of the present occurrence. A very natural action, surely, for a person of understanding and manners! And this character for reflection and thought is retained by Mary, where we next find her: (chap. ii. 19.) she kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart."—She collected and preserved these events in the storeroom of her mind, and laying them beside one another, compared them together; by this means they mutually served as objects illustrative of each other. Again, verse 51, "She kept all these sayings in her heart." But the form of the verb here used is ημετέραζεν, before, it was ἐκοιμήθη, she closely watched, with all the affection of her heart, all these sentiments, to see what turn they would take.

Now, nothing of this depicting of the character of Mary appears in any of the other evangelists; Luke alone has thus painted her. Moreover, this character is perfectly agreeable to the warning given her by Gabriel, that no man should have defiled her. Moreover, she kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart. This principle is perfectly agreeable, also, to the solicitude which, many say, she expressed in her refusal to see and hear John; when that child said of him, "He will be great before the Lord."—She thought her son, Our Lord, overdid himself; that is, exceeded his strength, in labor, &c.

We have seen a picture of the mind of Holy Mary; the evangelist draws another of her actions. We have found her thoughtful and reflective; she was, also, discreet and active; for after her salutation, she determined to put to the test the information she had received; and to judge by her own eyes and ears, whether her elder friend Elisabeth had really "conceived a son in her old age" and whether this was really the sixth month of her pregnancy. Elisabeth had concealed herself during five months, but this Mary did not know; Elisabeth's pregnancy might, however, be reported in her neighborhood, and so the informant of Mary might have told her no great news; nothing worthy of being a sign in confirmation of what he had predicted. It might also have been the third month, or the eighth, in which case the imperfection of the information would have been apparent. Mary said till she saw a son born. Nothing, then, could be so discreet as by using herself as a protection of a person of the age and character of Elisabeth. Nor is this all; for Mary went in haste on this, to her extremely important business: it follows, that she must have been in circumstances of life which permitted this instant exertion. No person extremely poor, no person in servitude, no person under any authoritative control, could have made this hasty journey. This, then, is another feature in the picture of Mary, as drawn by Luke. But the inference from Mary's situation in life is of still greater consequence. That education contributes essentially to form a thinking mind, we know from every day's experience; and we have seen that such a mind was Mary's. It is evident, also, from what is called her Song, that she had read the Scriptures of the Old Testament with attention; and as reading was not (as it is not, at this day) a common acquisition among women of the lowest class in the East, the possession of it removes Mary from that class, had we no other proof. It seems to have been an error in critics to take Mary's Song for a sudden vocal effusion, by instantaneous inspiration; there are so many allusions in it to passages of the then extant Scriptures, that this appears to be improbable. It is not likely that instantaneous inspiration would have repeated sentiments already recorded, and public to the whole nation. Something not yet known, something looking forward, something of sufficient consequence to justify its being revealed, is what we should rather expect from such an effusus of the Holy Spirit. It will be observed, also, that the author of the Song of Mary does not assert the instant inspiration of Mary: his words are, speaking of Elisabeth, she "was filled with the Holy Ghost;" and speaking of Zechariah, he "was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied;" whereas, concerning Mary, he says nothing of the kind; but simply, "Mary said." This distinction of phrase is not favorable to the notion of a sudden verbal inspiration, in which the party speaking is the mere organ of the Sacred Spirit. We know not whether it be necessary to remind our readers, that so often, when writing, not speech, is the subject. We have the phrase among ourselves, "He says in this letter"—"He tells us in such a place"—"Your correspondent says that"—and that the same idea is annexed to the verb to say, in Scripture, appears among many other places, from John i. 23. Isaiah, said, (that is, wrote,) viii. 38. The Scripture hath said, Rom. vii. 7. The law hath said, Gal i. 9. As we said (that is, wrote) before, so say (that is, write) I again, &c. We must have here a phrase very as composed—written—under the illumination of the Sacred Spirit; and being committed to paper, it comes under the principle which we have endeavored elsewhere to establish, (see Luke,) that Luke sought out and procured all the written documents which he could obtain for his purpose. The fact may be, that during the residence of Mary with Elisabeth (three months or more) she penned this song; and copies of it were extant, one of which Luke employed in his history.

Now, the acquisition of writing by a young Jewish woman, adds to proofs already suggested, that Mary was in respectable circumstances, and had received a liberal education; for we are not to attribute to those times, and to that country, the same diffusion of knowledge as obtains among ourselves. Writing and reading were rare among the men, much more rare among the women; and the possession of them seems to be decisive against that poverty which some have unwittingly attached to the condition of our Lord and his parents.

We remark, further, that Luke is the writer who last mentions Mary the mother of Jesus by name, (Acts i. 14,) and she is the only woman whom he thus distinguishes in the whole; the inference is clear, that we are obliged to him for a portrait of this highly distinguished person; not indeed of her features, but of her character and conduct: and thus the tradition, of which no critic has ever been able to make anything probable, may be explained with some appearance of consistency.

II. MARY, the mother of Mark, had a house in Jerusalem, to which it is thought the apostles retired after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. This house was on mount Zion, and Epiphanias says, it escaped the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and was changed into a very famous church, which continued several ages. After the imprisonment of Peter, the faithful were assembled in this house, praying, when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the gate, Acts xii. 5, 12.

III. MARY CLEOPHAS, the sister of Mary the mother of our Lord, was wife of Cleophas, and mother of James the Less, and of Simon, brethren of our Lord, John xix. 25; Luke xxiv. 10; Matt. xxvii. 55, 61. She believed early on Jesus Christ, and at length accompanied him in some of his journeys, to minister to him, followed him to Calvary, and was buried with him at the foot of the cross. She was also present at his burial, and prepared perfumes to embalm him. But going to his tomb on Sunday morning very early, with other women, they learned from an angel that he was risen, of which they informed the apostles. By the way Jesus appeared to them, and they embraced his feet, worshipping him. The year of her death is not known.

IV. MARY, sister of Lazarus, who has been confounded with the woman mentioned Luke vii. 37, 39. See Martha.

V. MARY MAGDALEN, one of the females who followed Jesus, in company with his apostles, when he preached the gospel from city to city. She took her surname either from the town of Magdala in Galilee, beyond Jordan, or from Magdolus, a town at the foot of mount Carmel, perhaps the Megiddo of Joshua xvii. 11; 2 Kings ix. 27; xxii. 16. Luke (vii. 2.) and Mark (xvi. 9,) observe, that she had been delivered by Christ from seven devils. This some understand literally; others figuratively, for the same reason, her wickedness of her past life. Others maintain, that she had always lived in virginity, and consequently was the sinner mentioned by Luke, (ch. vii. 53,) and by the seven devils, they understand a real possession, which is not inconsistent with a reclusive life. She followed Christ in his last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, and was at the foot of the cross with the Holy Virgin. She continued on mount Calvary till our Saviour's death, and saw him placed in his tomb; after which she returned to Jerusalem, to prepare to embalm him after the sabbath was over, John xix. 25; Mark xv. 47. All the sabbath day she remained in the city, and the next day, early in the morning, she went to the sepulchre, with Mary the mother of James and Salome, Mark xvi. 1, 2; Luke xxiv. 1, 2. Being come to his tomb, they saw two angels, who informed them that Jesus was risen. On this, Mary Magdalen returned to Jerusalem, to acquaint the apostles. Returning to the sepulchre, and stooping forward to examine the famous Judas Gaulonites, at the head of the Sicarii, or assassins. Flavius Sylva besieged the castle with such vigor, that finding escape impossible, Eleazar prevailed upon his companions to kill one another. The last that survived set fire to the castle. This happened A. D. 71. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 28—33.)

MATTAN, son of Eleazar, father of Jacob, and grandfather of Joseph, husband to the Virgin Mary. Luke (iii. 25.) makes Helin, son of Mattan, to be father of Joseph; but it is thought that Helin is the same as Joachim, father of Mary, and father-in-law to Joseph. So that Matthew (i. 15, 16.) gives the direct genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary.

MATTANAH, an encampment of Israel, (Num. xxi. 15, 16,) which Eusebius says was on the Arnon, twelve miles from Medaba, east.

I. MATTATHIAS, son of John, of the family of Joarib, and of the race of the priests, was the first who opposed the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Mac. ii. A. M. 3897. He had five sons, who inherited their father's undaunted spirit, and made a determined stand against the oppressors of their country and the persecutors of their religion. Mattathias and his sons being joined by the Asse- des, the most religious as well as valiant men of Israel, they marched through the country, destroyed the altars dedicated to false gods, circumscribed the children that had not received circumcision, humbled the children of pride, and delivered the law from the hands of the starless and the power of the king. Being near his death, Mattathias assembled his sons, and exhorted them to be truly zealous for the law, and ready to sacrifice their lives for the covenant of their ancestors. He was buried at Modin, in the sepulchre of his ancestors, and all Israel made a great mourning for him.

II. MATTATHIAS, son of Simon Maccabæus, and grandson of Mattathias, was killed treacherously, with his father and one of his brethren, by Ptolemy, son-in-law of Simon, in the court of Docus, 1 Mac. xvi. 14—16.

MATTHEW, an apostle and evangelist, was son of Alpheus, a Galilean by birth, a Jew by religion, and a publican by profession, Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 29. Josephus understands him as Luke vi. who was his Hebrew name; but he always calls himself Matthew, which was probably his name as a publican, or officer for gathering taxes. He does not dissemble his former profession, thus exalting the gospel. They might not count him as an apostle. His ordinary abode was at Capernaum, and his office out of the town, at the sea of Tiberias, whence he was called by Jesus to follow him, Matt. ix. 9; Luke ii. 13, 14. It is probable that he had a previous knowledge of the miracles and doctrine of Christ, whom he might have heard preach. He was made an apostle the same year he was converted, and, consequently, he was called to the apostleship in the first year of Christ's ministry. He is sometimes named the seventh among the apostles, and sometimes the eighth. The most general opinion of both ancients and moderns is, that he preached and suffered martyrdom in Persia, or among the Parthians, or in Caramania, which then was subject to the Parthians.

Matthew wrote his Gospel while in Judea, but whether in the Hebrew or Syriac language, then common in the country, or in Greek, cannot be determined. See Gospel.—Matthew.

I. MATTHIAS, one of those disciples who continued with our Saviour from his baptism to his ascension, (Acts i. 21, 22,) and was after the ascension associated with the eleven apostles. We know nothing further of him.

II. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon, A. M. 3993, and after one year was deposed by Herod the Great, because he thought him engaged in the confederacy with Matthias, son of Margaloth, and Judas, son of Bari- phesus, who pulled down from over the gate of the temple the golden eagle that Herod had set up. (Josep. Ant. xvii. 8.)

III. MATTHIAS, son of Ananias, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon Cananthus, A. D. 41. (Jos. Ant. xix. 6.)

IV. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus, and another high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Jesus, son of Gamaliel, A. D. 65. (Joseph. Bel. Jud. v. 33.)

V. MATTHIAS, a Jew, of the party of the Macedonians, or Syrians, sent by Nicander to Judea Maccabæus, with proposals of peace, 3 Mac. xiv. 19.

MAZZAROTH, Job xxxviii. 32. Our margin properly supposes this word to denote the twelve signs of the zodiac, a broad circle in the heavens, comprehending all such stars as lie in the path of the sun and moon. As these luminaries appear to proceed throughout this circle annually, so different parts of it progressively receive them every month; and this progression seems to be what is meant by "bring forth mazzaroth in his season," q. d.

Canst thou by thy power cause the revolution of the heavenly bodies in the zodiac, and the seasons of summer and winter, which ensue on their progress into the regular annual or monthly situations?

MEASURE. See the general table of Weights, Measures, and Money, of the Hebrews, at the end of the Dictionary. Also the particular names of each, as Shekel, Talent, Bath, Ephah, &c.

MEATS. (See Animals.) It does not appear that the ancient Hebrews were very nice about the seasoning and dressing of their food. We find among them roast meat, boiled meat, and ragouts. Meats that were offered were boiled in a pot, 1 Sam. ii. 15. Moses (Exod. xxvii. 19; xxxiv. 26.) forbids to see the kid in its mother's milk; which may be understood as for the child, which breast-fed; or that it should not be boiled in the milk of its dam; as the Hebrews explain it. They might not kill a cow and its calf in the same day; nor a sheep, or goat, and its young one at the same time. They might not offer the meat of an animal that died of itself, or that was killed by any beast, was to be unclean till the evening, and was not purified till he had washed his clothes. They ate of nothing dressed by any other than a Jew, nor did they ever dress their victuals with the kitchen implements of any but one of their own nation.

The prohibition of eating blood, or animals that are strangled, has been always rigidly observed by the Jews. They do not so much as eat an egg, if there appear the least streak of blood in it. When an animal is to be killed, it must be performed by a skilful person, because of the circumstances to be observed. For the time must be proper for the action, and the knife must be very sharp, and without notches, that the blood may run without interruption. They should kill itself upon the ground, or on ashes, and afterwards take it up. They put the meat into salt for an hour before they put it into the pot, that the blood may run quite out; otherwise they must not eat the meat, except they roast it. They take great care to cut away the sinew of the thigh of such animals as they intend to eat, according to Gen. xxxii. 22. And in several places of Germany and Italy, the Jews will not eat any of the hinder quarter, because great nicety is required in taking away this sinew as it should be done; and few know how to do it exactly. They forbear eating any fat of oxen, sheep, goats, or animals of this kind, according to Lev. vii. 23, 27; but other kind of fat they think is allowed them. See Fat.

The custom of refraining from things strangled, and from blood, continued for a long time. In the council of the apostles, held at Jerusalem, (Acts xv.) it was declared that converts from paganism should not be subject to the legal conditions, but that they should refrain from idolatry, from fornication, from eating blood, and from such animals as were strangled, and their blood thereby retained in their bodies; which decree was observed for many ages by the church. Augustine affirms, that in his church they observed the abstinence of certain meats, so long as the wall of separation was kept up between the Jews and the converted Gentiles, and the Christian church, composed of these two sorts of people, was not yet entirely formed; but that when there were no longer any Jewish sects according to the flesh, there were no longer any persons who made this distinction.

MEATS OFFERED TO IDOLS, 1 Cor. viii. 7, 10.—At the first institution of the sacrifice, there were many sacrifices concerning the use of meats offered to idols. Some newly converted Christians, convinced that an idol was nothing, and that the distinction of clean and unclean creatures was abolished by our Saviour, ate indiscriminately whatever was offered up to them, even among pagans, without inquiring whether the meats had been offered to idols. They took the same liberty in buying meat sold in the market, not regarding whether it was pure or impure, according to the Jews, or whether it was an idol. For among the heathen, as well as among the Jews, there were several sacrifices, in which only a part was offered on the altar, the rest belonging to him who offered it, which he disposed of at his pleasure, or ate with his friends. But other Christians, weaker, or less instructed, were offended at this liberty, and thought that eating of meat which had been offered to idols, was a kind of partaking in that wicked and sacrilegious offering. This diversity of opinion produced some scandal, to which Paul thought it behoved him to provide a remedy, Rom. xiv. 20; Tit. i. 15. He determined, therefore, that all things were clean to such as were clean, and that an idol was nothing at all. That a man might safely eat at whatever he was offered to eat, but that he should abstain from idolatry. And if an unbeliever should invite a believer to eat with him, the believer might eat of whatever was set before him, &c. 1 Cor. x. 23, &c. But at the same time it enjoins, that the laws of charity and prudence should be observed; that believers should be cautious of scandalizing or offending weak minds; for though all things might be lawful, yet all things were not always expedient. That no one ought to seek his own accommodation or satisfaction, exclusively, but that each should have regard to that of his neighbour. In this his brother's: in a word, that he who is weak, and thinks he may not indiscriminately use all sorts of food, should forbear, and eat herbs, Rom. xiv. 1, 2. It is certain, however, that Christians generally abstained from eating meat that had been offered to idols, for in Rev. ii. 20, the angel of Thyatira is reproved for suffering a Jezebel in his church, who called herself a prophetess, and seduced the servants of God to commit impurity, and to eat meat that had been consecrated to idols. Tertullian says, that Paul had put the key of the flesh-market into our hands, by allowing us the use of all sorts of meat, except that which has been offered to idols; and we know that in the persecutions by the Roman emperors, they often polluted the flesh sold in the shambles, by consecrating it to idols, that they might reduce the Christians to the choice of purchasing that, or of totally abstaining from flesh.

MEDAD and ELDAD, two men who were among those whom God inspired with his Holy Spirit, to assist Moses in the government, Num. xx. 26—30. The Jews affirm, that they were brothers, one of whom married his mother's side to Moses, and sons of Jochebed and Elisaphan.

MEDAN, or MADAN, the third son of Abraham and Keturah, (Gen. xxv. 2.) is thought, with Midian his brother, to have peopled the country of Midian or Madian, east of the Dead sea.

MEDEBA, a city east of Jordan, in the southern part of Reuben, (Josh. xiii. 16) not far from Heshbon. (xv. 3.) It is assigned to it Moab, because the Moabites took it from the Amorites, Gen. xxi. 31.) and a few shepherds speak of it to the Arabs, because they made themselves masters of it towards the conclusion of the Jewish monarchy. The inhabitants of Medeba having killed John Gatha, brother of Judas Maccabeus, as he was passing to the country of the Nabateans, Simon and Jonathan, his brethren, revenged his death on the children of Jambri, as they were conducting a bride to her husband. Burckhardt describes it as the ruins of this town, which still retains its ancient name.

MEDIA, a country east of Assyria, which is supposed to have been peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2. Esther (i. 3, 14, 19, 12; x. 2.) and Daniel (x. 28; vi. 3, 12, 15; viii. 20.) commonly put Madai for Media, and so most interpreters understand it. The Greeks maintain, that this country takes name from Medus, son of Medea; and truly if what has been said under the article Madai may be relied on, or if this son of Japheth peopled Macedonia, we must then seek another origin for the people of Media.

Media has been taken in sometimes a larger and sometimes a narrower extent. Prolemy makes its limits to the north to be a part of the Caspian sea, and the mountains of the same name, and the Cadissians; the greater Armenia west; the countries of the Parthians and Hycrania east; Persia, Susiana, and a part of Assyria, south. Its capital was Ecbatana, which is often mentioned Ezra vi. 2, under the name of Achmetha.

extended itself on the west and south of the Caspian sea, from Armenia on the north to Persia or Persia proper on the south; and included the districts now called Azerbaijan, Armenia, in the Persian Empire, and Irak Ademi. It covered a territory larger than that of Spain, lying between 30 and 40 degrees of north latitude; and was one of the most fertile and earliest cultivated among the kingdoms of Asia. It had two grand divisions; of which the north-western was called Jropriatien, or Lesser Media, and the southern Greater Media. The former corresponds to the modern Adserbijan, now, as formerly, a province of the Persian empire on the west of the Caspian, surrounded by high mountains of the Tauritic range, except towards the east, where the river Kur, or Cyrus, discharges its waters into the Caspian. The greater Media corresponds principally to the modern Irak Ademi, or Persian Irak.

Media is one of the four great cup-outr independent kingdoms of which history makes mention. Nineus, the founder of the Assyrian monarchy, encountered in his wars a king of Media, whom he subdued, and whom he added to the province of the Assyrian empire. For five hundred and twenty years, the Medes remained subject to the Assyrian yoke; but at last, when Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser began to depopulate whole districts of western Asia, and transport their inhabitants into the cities of the Medes, and other regions of interior Asia, the patience of the Medes was exhausted. They rebelled; and the overthrow of Sennacherib before Jerusalem, his subsequent flight and murder, and the confusion in the Assyrian royal family, completely overthrew the Medes; and deliverance. Six years they passed in a sort of anarchy, arising from internal dimensions and parties, until, at length, about 700 B.C. they found in Darius a wise and upright statesman, who was proclaimed king by universal consent. He reigned a Media alone, whose six tribes he united into a single nation. His son and successor, Peresorth, brought first the Persians, and then all upper Asia, to the river Halya, Cappadocia included, under the Median dominion. He ventured afterwards to attacks Assyria, and laid siege to Nineveh; but his army was defeated and he himself killed. His successor, Cyaxares, determined to take vengeance on the Assyrians for his father's death; but as he was about to besiege Nineveh, he received intelligence that the Persians had made an irruption into Media. He marched against them; was defeated; and it was not till after eight and twenty years, that Media could free itself from the oppression of these rude and unexpected enemies. Cyaxares, son of Cyaxares, then, before Nineveh, and conquered it, with the help of his ally, Nabopolassar, the first king of Babylon. Assyria now became a Median province. This widely extended Median empire was inherited, after the death of Cyaxares, by his son Astyages; who, thirty-five years afterwards, about 556 B.C. delivered it over to his grandson, Cyrus, king of the Persians. (Herodot. lib. i. c. 85-130.)

In this way arose the Medo-Persian kingdom; and the laws of the Medes and Persians are always mentioned by the sacred writers together. Esth. i. 19; x. 2; Dan. vi. 8, 12, et al. So also the annals of the Medes and Persians are mentioned together, Esth. x. 2. Indeed, from this time onward, the manners, customs, religion and civilization of the Medes and Persians ever to have become more and more amalgamated. And in general it would seem, as we may gather from the ancient Zend writings, that the Medes, Persians and Bactrians were originally the same people, having in common one language, the Zend, and one religion, the worship of Ormuzd, the highest being, under the symbol of fire. The priests of this religion, the Magi, were a Median race, to whom were intrusted the cultivation of the sciences and the performance of the sacred rites. Among these, and, as is supposed, before the time of Cyrus, appeared Zarathus, or Zoroaster, as a reformer, or rather as the restorer of the ancient but now degenerated religion of light; whose disciples have maintained themselves even to the present day in Persia and India, under the name of Guebres. (See Rosen- miller, Bibl. Geogr. l. p. 288, seq.)

Isaiah describes the Medes as instruments and executors of God's decrees against Babylon, (chap. xiii. 17, 18; xvi. 2, 3,) and Jeremiah (xxv. 25) speaks of the misfortunes which were to happen to the Medes. He foretells, that they also, in their turn, were to drink of the cup from which their fathers had drunk. It is likely that Cyrus made them suffer the evils they were here threatened with.

MEDIATOR. In covenants between man and man, in which the holy name of God is used, he is witness and mediator of all, of the necessities and engagements. Thus Laban and Jacob made a covenant on mount Gilead; (Gen. xxxi. 49-54,) and when the elders of this place made a covenant with Jephthah, they called on the name of the Lord, Judg. xi. 10. When God and the Hebrews, and made a covenant with them at Sinai, a mediator was necessary, who should relate the words of God to the Hebrews, and their answers to him; in order that the articles of the covenant being agreed to by each party, they might be ratified and confirmed by blood, and by oath. Moses on this occasion was mediator between God and the people, as Paul says, (Gal. iii. 18,) "The law was added because of transgression, and the promise was given by angels in the hand of a mediator." In the new covenant which God has been pleased to make with the Christian church, Jesus Christ is the mediator of redemption. He was the surety, the sacrifice, the priest, and the intercessor. God's covenant. He has sealed it with his blood, has proposed the terms and conditions of it in his gospel, has instituted the form of it in baptism, and the commemoration of it in the sacrament of his body and blood. Paul, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, enumerates on this office of mediator of the new covenant, exercised by Christ, Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24. (See also I Tim. ii. 5.)

In all ages, and in all parts of the world, there has constantly prevailed such a sense of the infinite holiness of the Supreme Being, that it has been a conviction of the imperfections of human nature, and the guilt of man, as to deter worshippers from coming directly into the presence of a being so awful— recourse has therefore been had to mediators. Among the Sabians the celestial intelligences were constituted mediators; among other idolaters their various idols; and this notion still prevails in Hindostan and elsewhere. Sacrifices were thought to be a kind of mediators; and, in short, there has been a universal feeling, a sentiment never forgotten of the office of an interpreter, or mediator, between God and man. As Luther said—"I will have nothing to do with an absolute God."
of Jacob, Gen. i. 2. The art of medicine, however, was very ancient in Egypt. They ascribed the invention of it to Thaut, or to Hermes, or to Osiris, or to Isis; and some of the learned have thought that Moses, having been instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, must also have known the chief secrets of medicine. They also argue it from his indications concerning diseases, the leprosy, infirmities of women, animals, clean and unclean, &c. It does not appear that physicians were common among the Hebrews, especially for internal maladies, but for wounds, fractures, bruises, and external injuries, they had physicians, or surgeons, who understood the dressing and binding up of wounds, with the application of medicaments. (See Jer. vii. 22; xlvi. 11; Ezek. xxx. 21.) As, being diseased in his feet, and having applied to physicians, is upbraided with it, as contrary to that confidence which he ought to have had in the Lord, 1 Kings xv. 23; 2 Chron. xvi. 12. Hezekiah, having a bane, probably a pestilential one, was cured by Isaiah, on the application of a cataplasm of figs, 2 Kings xx. 7; Isa. xxxviii. 21. But there was no remedy known for the leprosy, or for distempers which were the consequences of incontinence. When Job was afflicted with a very terrible distemper, we hear no mention of recourse to physic or to physicians; his malady was looked upon as an immediate stroke from the hand of God. The low state of the art of medicine, with the persuasion that distempers were effects of God's anger, or were caused by demons, was the reason that in extraordinary maladies the sufferers applied to diviners, magicians, enchanters, or false gods. Sometimes they applied to the prophets of the Lord for cure; or, at least, to know whether they should recover or not. When Ahaziah, king of Israel, by a fall from the roof of his house, was greatly hurt, he sent to consult the false god Baal-zebub at Ekron, 2 Kings i. 2, &c. Jeremiah (viii. 17.) speaks of enchantments used against the biting of serpents, and other venomous animals. Hazael was sent by the king of Syria to consult Elisha the prophet as to the issue of his distemper, 2 Kings viii. 8. Naaman the Syrian came into the land of Israel, to obtain from Elisha a cure for his leprosy, 2 Kings v. 5, 6. And when our Saviour appeared in Palestine, although there can be no doubt that there were physicians in the country, it is evident that the people placed but little confidence in them. (Comp. Mark v. 26; Luke viii. 43.) They brought to our Saviour and his apostles multitudes of diseased people for the relief of their malady.

MEDITATE, to think closely and seriously on any thing. The chief employment of the just is to meditate on the law of God day and night, Psm. i. 2. MEARKNESS, a calm, serene temper of mind, not easily ruffled or provoked; a disposition that suffers injuries without desire of revenge, and quickly acquiesces in the dispensations and will of God, Col. iii. 12. This temper of mind is admirably fitted to discover, consider, and to examine truth. (Jonn. 21.) and is ranked among the fruits of the Spirit, Gal. v. 23.

MEGIDDO, a city of Manasseh, (Josh. xvi. 11; Judg. i. 27.) famous for the defeat of king Josiah, (2 Kings xx. 39.) was overthrown and mortally wounded there by Pharaoh-neecho, king of Egypt, Herodotus, speaking of this victory, says that Neecho obtained it at Magdolos. The waters of Megiddo are mentioned in Judg. v. 19.

Megiddo was certainly in, or near, the great plain of Esdraelon, which had been the scene of many battles; as of Gideon with the Midianites, of Saul with the Philistines, of Josiah with Pharaoh-neecho, of Judas Maccabaeus with Tryphon; (1 Muc. xii. 49, &c.) as in later ages it was of comings between the Turks and the Greeks. It is alluded to by the prophet, Rev. xvi. 16. For a fuller account of the topography of Megiddo and its vicinity, see the Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 692.

MELCHISEDEC, king of righteousness, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God. Scripture tells us nothing of his father, or of his mother, or of his genealogy, or of his birth, or of his death, Heb. vii. 1-3. And in this sense he was, as Paul says, a figure of Jesus Christ, who is a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec; and not according to the order of Aaron, whose origin, consecration, life and death are known.

When Abraham returned from pursuing the confederate kings, (Gen. xiv. 17.) Melchisedec came to meet him as far as the valley of Shaveh, (afterwards named the King's Valley,) and presented him refreshments of bread and wine; or he offered bread and wine in sacrifice to the Lord, for he was priest of the Most High God. And he blessed Abraham, saying, (Gen. xiv. 18.) Blessed be the Most High God, who has delivered thine enemies into thy hand. Abraham, desirous to acknowledge in him the quality of priest of the Lord, offered him tithes of all he had taken from the enemy. After this there is no mention of the person of Melchisedec; only the psalmist, (ex. 4.) speaking of the Messias, says, "Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec." Paul (Heb. v. 6, 10.) unfolds the mystery of Melchisedec. First, he exalts the priesthood of Christ, as a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec—this in the quality, "in the days of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death; and was heard in that he feared," ver. 7. He also says, that our Saviour is a forerunner and enterer into heaven, being made a high-priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. "For," he adds, "to this Melchisedec, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God, Abraham gave tithe. Now Melchisedec is priest according to the order of his name; first, king of (Tweed) justice; secondly, king of (Salem) peace; who is without father, without mother, without genealogy; who has neither beginning nor end of life. Consider, therefore, how great this Melchisedec is, since Abraham himself gives him tithes, and receives his blessing. Moreover, Levi, who (now) receives tithes from others, paid them himself, as one may say, in the person of Abraham, since he was in the loins of Abraham his ancestor, when Melchisedec met that patriarch."

Jerome thought that Salem, of which Melchisedec was king, was not Jerusalem, but the city of Salem, near Scythopolis; and where he thinks Jacob arrived after his passage over the Jordan, when returning from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxix. 18. But the majority of interpreters differ from Jerome in this.

The person of Melchisedec presents an interesting subject of inquiry. He has been variously supposed to be the Holy Spirit, the Son of God, an angel, Enoch, and Shem. (But the safest and most probable opinion is that, which considers Melchisedec as a righteous and peaceful king, a worshipper and priest of the Most High God, in the land of Canaan; a friend of Abraham, and of a rank elevated above him. This opinion, indeed, lies upon the face of the sacred and honored by this name in Phrygia, where was a place, according to Athenaeus, (lib. iii. p. 47.) called Μέναβησθεία, 'The Street of Men;' and by the same name is called Μένα basin, opposite the isle of Juno; Men and the Areopagus; and by the same name is a town in Phrygia, near Thecla. Men also signifies a month in Greek; and there was a temple of Men, or Luneus, in this place. We see also the god Men, or Luneus, on several medals of the towns of Lydia, Pisidia, and Phrygia. On a medal of Antiochus, struck in Pidias, the god Luneus hath a spear in one hand, and holds a Victory in the other, and hath a cock, a symbol of the rising sun, at his feet. Spartan, in his life of Carcics, says, that prince came to Carthage (Charran) on his birth-day, in honor to the god Luneus. He adds further, that the people of Carthage did still say, what had formerly been written by learned authors, that 'they who call the moon by a feminine word, and consider her as a woman, will be always addicted to women and subject to their command; but those who think the moon to be a male god, will have the dominion over women, and suffer nothing by their intrigues; hence he concludes, that it comes to pass, that the Greeks and Egyptians, though they name the moon by a word of the feminine gender, in common discourse, yet in their mysteries they call him a male god.' (Montfaucon, Antiq. Explic. Supp. vol. 1.) See Idol-Ary.

I. MEBHABETH, a city of Reuben, (Josh. xiii. 18.) and yielded to the Levites of the family of Meru, (Josh. xxvii. 18, 19.)

II. MEBIHOSHETH, a son of Saul, and his concubine Rizpah, who was delivered by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord, (2 Sam. xx. 8, 9.)

MEN, an idol, worshipped by the idolatrous Jews in Babylon, and in honor of which, along with Gad, they held festivals and lecisternia, (Is. lv. 11.) Men, in the opinion of the best interpreters, was most probably the same as Astarte or the planet Venus, which occurs in the astrological mythology as the second star of fortune, along with the planet Jupiter, (Ged, or Basil.) (See Astathoth. I. and Basil. p. 121.) Jeremiah (vii. 18; xlv. 17, 18.) speaks of her as queen of heaven, and, with Isaiah, (lv. 11, Heb.) shows that her worship was popular in Palestine, and among the Hebrews. She was worshipped by the Phoenicians and Carthaginians, from whom Israel and the isles of Lycaonia received her; Isaiah reproaches them with setting up a table to Gad—fortune, good fortune, or the lord of fortune—and with making libations to Men. Jeremiah says, that in honor of the queen of heaven, the fathers light the fire, the mothers knead the cakes, and the children gather the wood to bake them. Elsewhere, the Israelites declared to Jeremiah, that notwithstanding his remonstrances, they would continue to honor the queen of heaven, by oblations, as their fathers had done before them; and that ever since they had left off to sacrifice to the queen of heaven, they had been consumed by the sword and by famine. (But it must not be denied that many interpreters have referred both Men and Astarte to the moon; of which the following remarks may serve as an illustration. R.)

We see by Strabo, (lib. xii.) that 'Men, the month, or moon, had several temples in Asia Minor, and in Persia, and that they often swore by the month, or moon, of the king, which is, by his fortune. 'As the worship of Diana Luna, or the moon, was very famous among the Greeks and Romans, so was that of the god Luneus in the East. There are a great many monuments of him; he was named Men (Mén) in Greek, to the Gibeonites, were sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, and wife of Adriel; but see under Adriel.

MERAIOTH, a priest of the race of Anron, son of Zerniah, and father of Amariah, among the high priests, 1 Chron. vi. 6.

MEROAN, or MERANA, a people of Arabian, Baruch iii. 23.

MERCURY, a fabulous god of the ancient heathen, the messenger of the celetials, and the deity that presided over learning, eloquence, and traffic. The Greeks named him Hermes, an interpreter, because they considered him as interpreter of the will of the gods. Probably, it was for this reason that the people of Lystra, having heard Paul preach, and having seen him heal a lame man, would have offered sacrifice to him, as to their god Mercury; and to Barnabas, as Jupiter, because of his venerable aspect, Acts xiv. 11.

MERCY, a virtue which inspires us with compassion for others, and inclines us to assist them in their necessities. That works of mercy may be acceptable to God, as Christ has promised, (Matt. v. 7.) it is not enough that they proceed from a natural sentiment of humanity, but they must be performed for the sake of God, and from truly pious motives. In Scripture, mercy and truth are commonly joined together, to show the goodness that precedes, and the faithfulness that accompanies, the promises; or, a goodness, a clemency, a mercy that is constant and faithful, and that does not deceive. Mercy is also taught, as a favor and benefit received from God to man; for probity, justice, goodness. Merciful men, in Hebrew chasidim, are men of piety and goodness. Mercy is often taken for giving of alms, Prov. xiv. 34; xvi. 6; Zach. vii. 9.

Mercy, as derived from misericordia, may import that sympathetic sense of the suffering of another by which the heart is affected. It is one of the noblest attributes of Deity, speaking after the manner of men, and explaining what, by supposition, may pass in the mind of God, by what passes in the human mind. The object of mercy is misery: so God pities human misery, and forbears to chastise severely: so man pities the misery of a fellow man, and assists to diminish it: so public officers occasionally moderate the enforcement of the laws, from pity to the culprit. But only those can hope for mercy, who express penitence, and solicit mercy: the impudent, the stubborn, the obstinate, rather brace the avenging hand of justice, than beseech the relieving hand of mercy.

MERCY-SEAT. The Hebrew rsz; copheth, from the verb cophar, to expiate, to pardon sins; to cover, to harden anything. It may be rendered, a covering; and indeed it was the cover of the ark of the covenant, or of the sacred chest in which the laws of the covenant were contained. At each end of this cover was a cherub of beaten gold; which, stretching out their wings towards each other, formed a kind of throne, where the Lord was considered as sitting. Hence the Hebrews invoked him sometimes as, he "who sitteth upon the cherub him." And perhaps, by translating copheth by propitiatory or mercy-seat, it may be intimated, that from hence the Lord hears the prayers of his people, and pardons their sins; while, by translating it oracle, as Jerome and others have done, they would show, that from hence he manifested his will and pleasure, and gave responses, as he did to Moses.

From the similitude, connected with this term in the New Testament, it is scarcely possible to attach too much consequence to it; nor can the few words of Calmet do it justice, though they may contribute to explain its nature and import. The root of term is cophath; hilazak signifies to placate, to pacify, to reconcile; or that is reconciling, or an atoning power, or thing, or consideration, by which parties at variance are reconciled. So Heb. ii. To make reconciliation, (iun. 3:18-21.) for the sins of the people? and (Luke xvi. 13.) the publican prays, "God be merciful, iun. 3:18-21. be reconciled to me with one, a sinner." (Comp. LXX. Psalm xxx. 32; Dan. ix. 18.) The propitiation (iun. 3:18-21.) is properly an offering from one party to another which possesses the power, or property, or influence of reconciling, or of uniting two parties, who have been separated by offences. It answers to the idea of forgiveness, (Psalm xxx. 32; Dan. ix. 18.,) an un, Numb. v. 8, "the ram of atonement, whereof atonement shall be made for his sins." So in 2 iii. 23, certain of Heleorum's friends prayed for him that he would call on the Most High to grant him life: "So the high-priest offered a sacrifice for man's restoration to health. Now, as the high-priest was making an atonement,—rather the atonement for iniquity,—that is, by means of the sacrifice.

In our term, a sacrifice is applied to Christ, by the apostle John (1 Epist. ii. 1.) He is a propitiation, a means of at-one-ment, for our sins, and to ours only, not for those of the Jewish nation, as were the sacrifices offered on the day of expiation for the sins of the people. So God sent his Son as the propitiation for our sins, in other words, we might live through him, (verse 9.) that is, the death, as the propitiating, the mediating sacrifice.

By the way, this allusion seems to suppose the at-one-ment to be in a course of performance, a time when this epistle was written.

Upon the whole, it seems that, if we read reconciliation, residence, seat, or lid of the ark, we shall come the nearest to the true idea of this subject. It was not a seat from whence was dispensed, only, but oracles; and these were occasionally withdrawn, i.e., until reconciliation was made: but the station of a person understood to be there until the sanctuary, where he might be reconciled to God, and for the sins of the nation. (Rosenm., Prop. iv.) God had set forth Jesus Christ to be an at-one-ment, a reconciliation-residence, through faith in his blood, i.e., as God was understood to be constantly a mercy-seat of old, there to be at-one-ed, so he is in Christ, who is his residence for the same beneficial purpose—that of at-one-ment.

Hilastrion is certainly taken for the mercy-seat. Heb. ii. 5, and over the ark of the covenant the cherubin of glory shadowing the mercy-seat. Nevertheless, it may be doubted, whether Christ is, strictly speaking, assimilated to the mercy-seat itself, and not rather to the sacrifice by which that mercy-seat was understood to be reconciling the people who had offended. For it seems hard to say, that the same which affected reconciliation was the same with one of the parties reconciled; but the mercy-seat, accepted figuratively for the Supreme Deity, who sat on it, was a part of the at-one-ment. Moreover, the apostle, alluding to the rise of expiation in the passage above quoted, as the place where the satisfaction of the Redeemer was to be paid.
MESHA, king of Moab, (2 Kings iii. 4.) paid Ahah, king of Israel, a tribute of a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, with their shecches. After the death of Ahah, however, he revolted against Jehoram, king of Israel, who declared war against him, and called to his assistance Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, who, with the king of Edom, then in subjection to him, marched against Mesha, and forced him to retire to Aroeropolis, his capital. Here they besieged him so closely that, not being able to escape through the camp of the Idumeans, which he attacked, he took his own son, the presumptive heir to his crown, brought him upon the wall of the city, and was going to sacrifice him. The kings of Judah, Israel, and Edom, seeing this, retired without taking the town, but making a great spoil in the land of Moab.

In a communication from sir John Shore, now lord Teignmouth, the British legation at Calcutta, he mentions a custom of the Brahmins, of sitting at a person's door, with some implement of suicide in their hands, and threatening to kill themselves, unless that which they demand be granted to them: this, when their demand is not excessive, is usually complied with, through fear of their self-murder. After which his excellency relates the following story, as it appeared on a trial before the English court of justice. It will elucidate the otherwise unaccountable conduct of Mesha—

"Beechuk and Adher were two Brahmins, and zemijara, or proprietors of landed estates, the extent of which did not exceed eight acres. The village in which they resided was the property of many other zemijaras. A dispute which arose between them, a competition for the general superintendence of the revenues of the village, had long subsisted between the two brothers, and a person named Gowy. The officer of government, who had conferred this charge upon the latter, was assassinated by the threats of the mother of Beechuk and Adher to swallow poison, as well as to a transfer of the management to the two Brahmins. By the same means of intimidation, he was deterred from investigating the complaint of Gowy, which had been referred to his inquiry by his superior authority. But the immediate cause which instigated these two Brahmins to murder their mother, was an act of violence said to have been committed by the emissaries of Gowy, (with or without his authority, and employed by him for a different purpose,) in entering their house during their absence at night, and carrying off forty rupees, the property of Beechuk and Adher, from the apartments of their women. Beechuk first returned to his house; where his mother, his wife and his sister-in-law related what had happened. He immediately conducted his mother to an adjacent rivulet, where being joined in the grave of the morning by his brother Adher, they called out aloud to the people of the village, that although they would overlook the assault, as an act that could not be remedied, yet the forty rupees must be returned. To this exclamation no answer was received; nor is there any certainty that it was even heard by any person; nevertheless, Beechuk, without any further hesitation, drew his cimeter, and at one stroke severed his mother's head from her body; with the professed view, as entertained and avowed both by parent and son, that the mother's spirit, excited by the beating of a large drum during forty days, might produce a bent, curved, bent, curved, bow, by the others concerned with him. The last words which the mother pronounced were, that she would bless the said Gowry, and those concerned with him. The violence ascribed to have been committed by the emissaries of Gowry, in forcibly entering the female apartments of Bouchak and Adier, might be deemed an indignity of high provocation; but they appear to have considered this outrage as of less importance than the loss of the money, which might, and would, have been recovered, with due satisfaction, by application to the court of justice at Bouchak. The act which they perpetrated had no other sanction than what was derived from the local prejudices of the place: where they resided; it was a crime against their religion; an the two brothers themselves quoted an instance of a Brahmin, who, six and seven years before, had lost his caste, and all intercourse with the other Brahmins, for an act of the same nature. But in truth, Bouchak and Adier, although Brahmins, had no knowledge, or education suitable to the high distinctions of their caste, of which they preserved the principle, being as grossly ignorant and prejudiced as the meanest pagans in any part of the world. They were surprised when they heard the doom of forfeiture of caste pronounced against them by a learned Pandit, and they openly avowed that so far from conciliating they had committed a horrid crime, both they and their mother considered this act as a vindication of their honor, not liable to any religious penalty. (Asiatic Researches, vol. ii.)

Sir John Shore gives two other instances of a like nature; one of which is, the murder of a daughter by a Brahmin who was provoked by an adversary. These instances are all of Brahmins; and probably are not general in India; but the idea connected with them appears to be of ancient date, and are similar to the action of the king of Mobb, failing in his attempt to repulse his assailants: "he took his eldest son, who should have reigned in his stead, and offered him up, a whole burnt-offering [ascension-offering] upon the wall. And great was the flaming with rage upon Israel. And they (the kings of Edom and Judah) went away from off him, and returned to their own land." Does our extract suggest a reason why the king of Mobb offered his son on the wall—publicly? i.e., that it might plainly appear to the attacking armies to what straits they had reduced him, q. d. "You see the whole process: the child brought out, the wool, the fire, the bloody knife; why will you force me to the slaughter? do you proceed? let him illiterate spirit haunt you, terrify you, blast you even to death." If these Brahmins thought they had such a right over the life of their daughter, with her consent, might not the king of Mobb think he had such a right over the life of his son? who, perhaps, was born more voluntarily to suffer it, like the son of Edommenus, in Fect. Telenarchus. Also, from whence was the "flaming rage" against Israel? no doubt from Mobb, thus deprived of her prince; but, probably, also from Edom, q. d. "These Israelites, not having such customs among themselves, despite our institutions; they push this king to extremities, and call his behavior superstitions, profane, impious; whereas we, being aware of this custom, and indeed respecting it, sympathize with the distressed king, and hate those who abominate what he is doing." Is not this a natural solution of the difficulty. Whence was this rage why, and wherefore Israel returned disgust to see into their own land? Did Ezek xxxvii. it exist, and have it been the case, that the Assyrians, and feeling this terror, flee to avoid it, same time cursing Israel, who had brought them? If this conjecture be applicable, the Mobb did not merely by this sacrifice implore peace from his gods; but he took this method of laying his adversaries, after his own personal approval, it on himself to destroy them.

The reader will notice more particularly the, the Brahmins, as related by Sir John Shore, disposal of the life of another person; especia especially, a parent's power over the life of his child, (with the instance given by sir John, was with the child's consent, the daughter being an infant,) laps it may be found to bear, very strongly on circumstances noticed in Scripture. It is the parent's power extended even to the depriving child of life among the Romans, the Gauls, the ancient nations, the sixth son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2) supposed to be the father of the people between Iberia, Armenia, and Colchis, as others believe, of the Moscovites. (See Ge. xxxvii. 13; xxvii. 30; xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 2.)

MESOPOTAMIA, the Greek name of Aram, A country between the two rivers; a province situated between the river Tigris a frontier, and celebrated in Scripture as the first among the children of the deluge. It gave birth to: Hebrew, Terah, Abraham, Nahor, Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, and the sons of Jacob. The plains of the Shinar were in this country; and it was often Mesopotamia Syrie, because it was inhabited by the Arameans, or Syrians; and sometimes called Palast (Gen. x. 24; xxviii. 2, &c.) the plains of Aram; Aram, the fields of Aram: to distinguish the plains from the uncultivated mountains of the Babylon, son of Beor, was of Mesopotamia, xxvii. i.) whose king Cush-harchathathunnu subdues the Hebrews after the death of Joshua, Judges iii. A Mesopotamia was afterwards seized by the Assyrians, continued united to the empire till its dissolution, and frequently formed part of the Medo-Persian, and it suggests the name of a Persian empire; and is now called modern Persia.

MESSIAH, or Messiah, anointed, a title principally, or by way of eminence, to that son of David, before born already and still expected by the Hebrews. They used to anoint their king-priests, and sometimes prophets, when they were about to their office; and hence the phrase, for an employment, sometimes signifies merely the designation or choice for such an employment, Cyrus, who founded the empire of the Persians of the Jews at liberty, is called (Isa. xli.) the Messiah, or anointed of the Lord; and in Ezek. xxvii. name of Messiah is given to the king of Tyre.

But as we have already observed, Messiah designation given by the Hebrews, commonly, to Saviour and Deliverer whom they expected, as was promised to them by all the prophets. holy motion was given to kings, priests and others, by describing the promised Saviour of the under the name of Christ, Anointed, or Messiah, a sufficient evidence that the prophet and high priest would eminently co-him; and that he should exercise them not only over the Jews, but over all mankind; and particularly over those who should receive him as their Saviour. Peter and the other believers, being assembled together, (Acts iv. 27.) quote from Psalm ii. "Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things?" The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together." Luke says, (iv. 18.) that our Saviour, entering a synagogue at Nazareth, opened the book of the prophet Isaiah, where he read, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor." After which he showed them, that this prophecy was accomplished in his own person. Such, too, was the uniform testimony of all the apostles.

It is not recorded that our Saviour Jesus Christ ever received an external officialunction. Theunction that the prophets and the apostles speak of, is the spiritual and internal unction of grace, and of the Holy Ghost, of which the outward unction, with which kings, priests and prophets were anciently anointed, was but the figure or symbol. He united in his own person the offices of king, prophet and priest, and eminently included in himself whatever the law and the prophets had promised or prefigured, that was most excellent or most perfect. Christians, his disciples and his children, enjoy, in some sense, the same privileges, by the anointing of the Holy Spirit, 1 Pet. ii. 9.

The ancient Hebrews, being instructed by the prophets, had clear notions of the Messiah; but these were gradually deprieved, so that when Jesus appeared in Judea, the Jews entertained a false conception of the Messiah, expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror, who should remove the Roman yoke, and subject the whole world. Hence they were scandalized at the outward appearance, the humility, and seeming weakness of our Saviour; and the modern Jews, indulging still greater mistakes, form to themselves chimerical ideas of the Messiah, utterly unknown to their forefathers. See Christ.

Our Saviour gave warning to his disciples, that false Messiahs should arise (Matthew xxiv. 24.) and false prophets in [Mal. iii. 18.], which they should perform signs and wonders, by which even the elect themselves would be in danger. The event has verified his prediction. Every age among the Jews has produced false prophets, and false Messiahs, and both have been successful in deluding that nation. One appeared even in the age of Christ himself; Simon Magus, who reported at Samaria that he was the great power of God, Acts viii. 9. In the following century Barcochbees, by his impostures, drew down on the Jews the most terrible persecution; and since his time several others have appeared, and succeeded in imposing upon the credulity of this infatuated people.

METUSelah, son of Enoch, (Gen. v. 21. 22.) was born A. M. 487: he begat Lamech A. M. 874, and died A. M. 1656, aged 980 years; the greatest age attained by any man. The year of his death was that of the deluge.

MEZUZOTH is a name the Jews give to certain pieces of parchment, which they fix on the door-posts of their houses; taking literally what Moses says, Deut. vi. 9, 11, 13, "Thou shalt never forget the laws of thy God, but thou shalt write them on the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." They pretend, that to avoid making themselves ridiculous, by writing the commandments of God without their doors, or rather to avoid exposing them to profanation, they ought to write them on parchement, and to enclose it. Therefore they write these words on a square piece of prepared parchement, with a particular ink, and a square kind of charactere, Deut. vi. 4-9. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," &c. Then they leave a little space, and afterwards go on, to Deut. xi. 13. "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently to my commandments," &c. as far as, "thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house." After this they roll up the parchment, put it into a case, and write on it Shaddai, which is one of the names of God, and then attach it to the doors of their houses and chambers, and to the knocker of the door on the right side. As often as they pass, they touch it in this place with their finger, which they afterwards kiss. The Hebrew mezuzah properly signifies a door-post of a house, but is a name also given to this roll of parchment.

I. MICAH, the Morashites, or of Mezarah, (q. v.) a village near Eleutheropolis, in the south of Judah, is the seventh in order of the lesser prophets. He prophesied under Joatham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, for about 25 years; from about A. M. 3345, or the beginning of the reign of Joatham, to A. M. 3366, or the last year of Hezekiah. He was nearly contemporary with Isaiah, and has some expressions in common with him. (Compare Isaiah ii. 2, with Micaah iv. 1, and Isaiah xii. 15, with Micaah iv. 13.) The extant prophecy of Micaiah contains but seven chapters. He first foretells the calamities of Samaria; afterwards he prophesies against Judah and Samaria; and then foretells the captivity of the ten tribes, and their return. The third chapter contains a pathetic invective against the princes of the house of Jacob, and the judges of the house of Israel. We are informed by Jeremiah (xxvi. 18, 19, &c.) that this prophecy was pronounced in the time of Hezekiah, and that in [Jer. xxxiii. 22.] that they should perform signs and wonders, by which even the elect themselves would be in danger. The event has verified his prediction. Every age among the Jews has produced false prophets, and false Messiahs, and both have been successful in deluding that nation. One appeared even in the age of Christ himself; Simon Magus, who reported at Samaria that he was the great power of God, Acts viii. 9. In the following century Barcochbees, by his impostures, drew down on the Jews the most terrible persecution; and since his time several others have appeared, and succeeded in imposing upon the credulity of this infatuated people.

II. MICAH, of Ephraim, son of a rich widow.
who became an occasion of falling to Israel, (Judg. xvii. v., by making an ephod (or priestly habit) and images of metal, for a domestic chaple. He made one of his own sons priest; and afterwards a young Levite. It is believed this happened in the interval, after the departure of the Israelites, and the elders that succeeded him, till Othniel judged Israel. During this time the tribe of Dan, being straitened in their inheritance, went six hundred men to seek a more convenient settlement. They passed by Micah's house, on the mountains of Ephraim, and desired the Levite who resided there, to inquire of the Lord about the success of their expedition. He answered them, that the Lord would prosper their undertaking. They came a second time to the house of Micah, and having persuaded the priest to join their party, they took away the ephod and the graven images. See DAN.

MICAIAH, son of Imah, of Ephraim, and a prophet, who lived in the time of Ahab. Having foretold the issue of this prince's expedition against Ramoth-Gilead, he was delivered over to Amon, the governor of Samaria, with orders that he should be fed with the bread of grief, and water of affliction, till Ahab returned in peace. Micahiah answered, 'If thou return at all in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me;' and the event justified his prediction, 1 Kings xxii. 7, seq.

MICHAEL, the name given to the archangel who is represented as presiding over the Jewish nation. (See ANGEL, p. 60.) Judg. (9, 10), speaks of his confounding with the devil, and disputing about the body of Moses; an expression which has given rise to many opinions. Without detailing these, we remark, that the opinion of Macknight seems to be the most reasonable, and the least liable to exception.

In Dan. x. 33—31, and xii. 1, Michael, he remarks, is spoken of as one of the chief angels, who took care of the Israelites as a nation: he may, therefore, he thinks, have been "the angel of the Lord," before whom Joshua the high-priest is said to have stood, "Satan being at his right hand to resist him," (Zech. iii. 1), namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish church and state, called by Jude, "the body of Moses," just as the Christian church is called by Paul, "the body of Christ." Zech. viii. 12, says, "And the Lord, even the Lord himself, said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan! even the Lord who hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee!" Dr. A. Clarke adopts this view of the passage, and adds to the remarks of Macknight the following: "Thus the Hebrew, subj. noun, is often used for a thing itself; so Rom. viii. 24, \textit{the body of sin}, signifies \textit{sin itself}. So the body of Moses may signify Moses himself; or that in which he was particularly concerned; namely, his institutions, religion, &c.

MICHAL, daughter of Saul, and wife of David, 1 Sam. xvii. 20; xix. 11. See DAVID, p. 315.

MICHMAS, a city of Ephraim, on the confines of Benjamin. ( Ezra ii. 27; Neh. vii. 31.) called also MICHAMISH, 1 Sam. xiii. 3; Isa. x. 28. (Compare Neh. xvi. 31.) Eusebius says, it was, in his time, a considerable place, about nine miles from Jerusalem, towards Rama.

MICHEMETHAH, or MACHMETHAH, a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the frontier of Ephraim and Manasseh; over against Shechem; Josh. xvi. 6; xvii. 7.

MIDIAN, fourth son of Abraham and Keturah, (Gen. xxv. 2) and father of the Midianites, mentioned Num. xxii. 4; 7; xxv. 15; xxxi. 2; &c. whose daughters seduced Israel to the worshipping of Baal-peor. The Midianites, who were overcome by Hadad, son of Bedad, king of Edom, (Gen. xxxvi. 35.) and those who oppressed Israel, and were defeated by Gideon, (Judg. vi. 1, &c. vii. 2), were also descended from Midian. The capital city was called Midian, and its remains were to be seen in the time of Jerome and Eusebius. It was situated on the Arnon, south of the city of Aroer. The Lord, intending to punish the Midianites, because their daughters had seduced Israel to the worship of Peor, directed Moses to take a thousand men out of each tribe, and send them under the command of Phinehas, son of the high-priest Eleazar, to execute vengeance upon them. Phinehas marched, therefore, at the head of 12,000 men, having with him the ark of the covenant, according to some commentators, and the trumpets of the tabernacle. He defeated the Midianites, and slew five of their kings, Levvi, Rekem, Zuar, Hur and Reha, who reigned over several cities of the country of Midian, east of the Dead sea. The wicked prophet Balaam was also involved in their misfortune, and lost his life. The Israelites took the women, the children, the flocks, and whatever belonged to the Midianites; and burnt their cities, villages and forts. (The original and appropriate district of the Midianites seems to have been on the east side of the Elanitic branch of the Red sea; where the Arabian geographers place the city Medin. But they appear to have spread themselves northward, probably along the desert east of mount Seir, to the vicinity of the Moabites; and on the other side also, they covered a territory extending to the neighborhood of mount Sinaï.) See Exod. iii. 1; xviii. 5; Num. xxxi. Judg. vi. — viii. (Gen. xxv. 2, 4, compared with verses 13—18, they are distinguished from the descendant of Ishmael; but elsewhere, the names Midianites and Ishmaelites seem to be used as nearly synonymous. (See Gen. xxvii. 25, compared with verse 36; Judg. xvii. 12, compared with viii. 23, 34.) R.

MIGDOL, a tower. When the Israelites came out of Egypt, the Lord commanded them to encamp over against Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the Red sea, over against Baal-zephon, Exod. xiv. 2. See EXODUS, p. 401, 403.

MILE. The Greek μιλή, mile, (Matt. v. 41,) is spoken of the Roman miliaire, or mile, which contained 8 stadia or 1000 paces, i. e. about 1611\% yards; while the English mile contains 1760 yards. (See Adam's Rom. Ant. p. 658.)

MILETUS, or Miletum, a city and seaport, and the ancient capital of all Ionia. Paul, going from Corinth to Jerusalem, in A. D. 58, passed by Miletus; and as he went by sea, and could not take Ephesus to meet him here, he desired the bishops of the church of Ephesus to meet him there, Acts xix. 35.

This city was originally a colony of Creatae; but at length became so powerful, that it sent out settlers to a great number of cities on the Euxine sea, and many others on the continent. What most contributed to its renown was a magnificent temple of Apollo. Dr. Chandler has an interesting account of the city. (Travels, p. 146—149.)

MILK. Moses forbids the keeping of a kid in its mother's milk, (Exod. xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 15; Deut. xiv. 21,) which the Hebrews, generally, understand literally; though some accept it metaphorically, as forbidding cruelty, Deut. xxii. 6.

A land flowing with milk and honey is a country of extraordinary fertility. In the prophet the king-dorm of the Messiah is represented as a time of great abundance, “when the mountains should flow with milk and honey.” (Josh. ii. 10. And Isaias, xxiv. 10.) “Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breasts of kings.” Paul compares his converts to little children, to be fed with milk, and not with solid food. (1 Cor. iii. 2; Hebr. v. 12.) and Peter exhorts the faithful, “As new-born babes, to desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby.” (1 Pet. ii. 2.)

MILL. For a description of the hand-mills commonly used in the East, see Coen.

MILLENIUM, a thousand years, the name applied to that period of the Christian church described in Rev. xx. 4, during which many sound commentators have supposed that Jesus Christ will reign personally on the earth, and that the bodies of martyrs and other eminent Christians will be raised from the dead, and in this renewed state constitute the subjects of his glorious kingdom. Other writers, however, understand those passages which refer to this blessed era in a figurative sense, and explain them of a period in which Christianity shall eminently prevail, in its purity and holiness, in the dominion it exercises over states and monarchies, and all other false religions; and triumphantly reign throughout all the earth.

MILLET, a kind of grain, of which there are several species cultivated in Italy, Syria and Egypt. It is used chiefly as fodder, and partly in the ripe grain for bread, &c. Ezekiel (iv. 9.) received an order from the Lord, to make himself bread with a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentil and millet. “Duru,” says Niebuhr, “is a kind of millet, made into bread with camel’s milk, oil, butter, &c., and is almost the only food eaten by the common people of Arabia Felix. I found it so disagreeable, that I would unwillingly have preferred plain barley bread.” This illustrates the appointment of it to the prophet Ezekiel, as a part of his hard fare.

I. MILLO, a part of the citadel at Jerusalem; or more probably of the fortifications themselves, 2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Kings ix. 15, 24; xi. 27, al. The house of Millo (2 Kings xii. 31.) is probably the same. R. II. MILLO, a place near Shechem. It is said (Judg. ix. 6.) that the inhabitants of Shechem and those of the house of Millo, made Abimelech, son of Gideon, king. House is here put for place or dwelling.

MINA, a species of money, called in Hebrew meneh, or meneh. It is only in the books of Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, and in Ezekiel, who tells us, (xlv. 12.) that it was valued at sixty shekels, which, in gold, made about 240 dollars, and in silver about 30 dollars. This is the Hebrew meneh, but the Greek or Attic mina, which is probably that mentioned in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, is valued at a hundred drachmes, or about 134 dollars. There was also a lesser mina, valued at seventy-five drachmes.

MINCHA, a Hebrew word, signifying an offering of meat, cakes, or biscuits, presented in the temple of the Lord. The LXX sometimes preserve this word; but instead of mincha, they read manna, which doubtless was the common pronunciation in their time. We find manna in Beruch i. 10: “Prepare ye manna, and offer upon the altar of the Lord our God.” Scripture uses the word manicha, in the Hebrew, to express the offerings that Cain and Abel made to the Lord of their first-fruits, (Gen. iv. 3, 4.) for the presents made by Jacob to his brother Esau, at his return from Mesopotamia; (Gen. xxxii. 14.) not only to true and literal, but spiritually wrought by saints or prophets sent from God, by good angels, by the finger of...
God, or by the Son of God; but also to the false miracles of impostors, and to wonders wrought by falsehood, by false prophecies, or by demons. Moses speaks of the miracles of Pharaoh's magicians, in the summer; he speaks of those wrought by himself, in the winter. For he says, Beelzebub, who wrought these miracles, did not arise from the earth, but from heaven above, as the woman that came up out of a pit; while the Lord himself, who wrought those, did arise from the earth, as the woman whom he raised up out of a sepulchre. (Matt. xxiv. 34. and John, in the Revelation, xxi. 14.)

MIRACLE, or prodigies, therefore, are not always sure signs of the sincerity of those who perform them; nor proofs of the truth of the doctrine they deliver; nor certain testimonies of their divine mission. The Lord and God only permits but commands us to examine miracles, and those who perform them, (Matt. xxiv. 24. and Moses Deut. xiii.) censured the Israelites for the same reason: The Lord mixed up with the prophets, or dreamers of dreams; adding, that the Lord permitted them to prove his people, to know whether they loved the Lord their God with all their heart, and with all their soul. It may, therefore, be affirmed, that the proof of miracles is not always unquestionable. To the mission of him who works miracles, must be joined the truth of the doctrine he advances, the holiness of his life, his good understanding, and his concurrence with those whose life, mission, and doctrine, have been already ascertained and approved. His miracles must be strictly examined, to see if they be true, and will stand the test; and are not juggling tricks, or magical operations; whether they lead to God, to peace, to righteousness, to salvation. If these marks and characters be found in him who works miracles, we must allow such a one to be a messenger from God.

Our Saviour complains (John iv. 48.) of the Jews: "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." When they said, We have seen him. (Matt. xii. 38.) he replied that they should see no other sign but that of the prophet Jonah. He says (John xv. 24.) that if he had not performed among them such miracles as were never before performed by man, they had had no sign; and Nicodemus acknowledged, (John iii. 2.) "No man can do these miracles that thou dost, except God be with him." Such a train of miracles, accompanied with so much innocence and righteousness, with a doctrine so pure and divine, could not be operations of falsity and delusion. When Christ sent his apostles to preach the gospel among the Jews, and among infidel nations, he gave them the power of working miracles in his name, (Matt. x. 26, 8.) than which nothing so much contributed to the propagation of the Christian faith.

The judgments, obstinacy and incredulity of the Jews must have been very extraordinary, not to yield to the miracles of Christ and his apostles. The doctors themselves could not give the lie to their own eyes, or oppose what was so public and notorious; they could not directly deny the miracles, but chose rather to ascribe them to Beelzebub. The modern Jews pretend, that Christ had stolen the name Jehovah out of the temple, by which he performed his miracles. If this were true, could it be conceivable, that God would favor an impostor with the gift of working miracles, and such a long train of miracle and of so high degree, and by one who profaned the subversion of the law and the Jewish religion? And would he permit him to transfer this power to disease, to apostasy, forsook him? (Matt. xxiv. 34.)

MIRIAM, sister of Moses and Aaron, and daughter of Amran and Jochebed. If she were the one who was watching when her brother Moses was exposed on the bank of the Nile, she might be ten or two years old at that time. When Pharaoh's daughter discovered the infant, Miriam proposed to fetch nurse for the little foundling; the princess accepted the offer, and Miriam brought her own mother, Ex. iv. 4. &c. It is thought that Miriam married Hur, the Levite, but it does not appear that she had any children by him.

Miriam had the gift of prophecy, as she insinuates in Exod. xvii. 10; 11; Num. xi. 2. After the passage of the Red sea, she led the choir and danced the women, and repeated with them the canticle "Sing ye to the Lord," &c. and Moses sung in the choir of men, Exod. xv. 21. When Zipporah, wife of Moses, arrived in the camp of Israel, Miriam and Aaron disparaged her, speaking against Moses her husband. The Lord smote Miriam with a plague by visiting her with a leprosy. Her death happens in the first month of the fortieth year after the exodus, at the encampment of Kadesh, in the wilderness of Sin, where Euniceus assures us in his time her eulogy was to be seen.

I. MIZPAH, or MZPH, elevation, a city of Judah, (Josh. xvi. 30.) south of Jerusalem, and north of Hebron; about six leagues from Jerusalem. Caleb thinks it is the Mizpah of Benjamin, where the Israelites were sometimes assembled for purposes of devotion. (1 Kings xxv. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 6. &c.)

II. MIZPAH, or MZPH, a city of God, in the mountains of Gilead, where Laban and Jacob made a covenant, Gen. xxxi. 49. Jephtha dwelt here when he made a covenant with the Israelites on the other side of Jordan, who chose him for their captain; and here assembled his troops, Judg. xi. 11, 29, 30. It is sometimes written Moseh, because the Moabites conquered and kept it.

III. MIZPAH, or MZPH, Joshua (xi. 3.) speaks the Hittites, who inhabited the country of Mizpah, the foot of mount Hermon, and consequently town.
the head of the Jordan. He adds, that the army of Judah and his allies took refuge at Mizpah, to the east of the city of Sidon, which was then under the control of the Philistines and the Amorites. MIZRAIM, son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Anamim, Lehahim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim, and Casluhim, Gen. x. 6. He was father of the Mizraim, or Egyptians. Mizraim is also put for the country of Egypt; the word signifies, which are perpetually confounded, and used promiscuously, sometimes denoting the land of Egypt, sometimes he who first peopled Egypt, and sometimes the inhabitants themselves. See EGYPT.

MNASON, of Cyprus, a Jew, converted by Christ himself; and one of the seventy, Acts xxi. 16. Paul lodged at his house at Jerusalem, A. D. 58.

MOAB, son of Lot, and of his eldest daughter; (Gen. xix. 31, &c.) born about the time of the birth of Isaac, A. M. 2158.

MOABITES, the descendants of Moab, son of Lot, whose habitation was east of Jordan, and adjacent to the Dead sea, on both sides the river Arnon, on which their capital city was situated; although the river Arnon was strictly and properly the northern boundary of Moab. This country was originally possessed by a race of giants called Emim, (Deut. xii. 12,) whom the Moabites conquered. Afterwards, the Amorites took a part from the Moabites, (Judg. xvi. 13,) but Moses reconquered it, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben. The Moabites, by Moses, the lawgiver, were absolutely restricted him: (Deut. ii. 9,) but there was always a great animosity between them and the Israelites, which occasioned many wars. Balaam seduced the Hebrews to idolatry and uncleanness, by means of the daughters of Moab, Num. xxiv. 1, 2. God ordained that this people should not enter into the congregation of his people, or be capable of office, &c. even to the tenth generation, (Deut. xxiii. 3,) because they had the inhumanity to refuse the Israelites a passage through their country, nor would supply them with bread and water in their necessity.

Eglon, king of the Moabites, was one of the first who oppressed Israel after the death of Joshua. Ehud killed him, and Israel expelled the Moabites, Judg. iii. 12. A. M. 2670. David subdued Moab and Ammon in the time of his reign, and delivered the borders of Jerusalem from the borders of Moab. (Ps. lxx. 8, &c.) We have little knowledge of the Moabites after this time; but Isaiah, at the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah, threatened them with a calamity which was to happen three years after his prediction, and which probably referred to the war of the king of Assyria, against the ten tribes, and the nations beyond the Jordan. Amos (i. 3, &c.) also foretold great miseries to them, which probably they suffered under Uzziah and Jotham, kings of Judah; if not under Shalmaneser; (2 Chron. vii. 7, &c.) and many years after the war of Nebuchadnezzar, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Calmet believes that this prince carried them captive beyond the Euphrates, as the prophets had threatened; (Jer. ix. 26; xiii. 14, 15; xxv. 11, 13; xliii. 47; xlix. 3, 6, 39; l. 16,) and that Cyrus sent them home again, as he did other captive nations. It is probable that in the later times of the Jewish republic, they obeyed the Ammonian kings, and afterwards Herod the Great.

The principal deities of the Moabites were Chemosh and Baal-peor. Scripture speaks of Nebo, of Baal-meon, and of Baal-dibon, as gods of the Moabites; but it is likely these are rather names of places where Chemosh and Peor were worshipped; and that Baal-dibon, Baal-meon, and Nebo, are no other than Chemosh adored at Dibon, or at Moab, or on mount Nebo.

For a description of the land of Moab, see CANAAN, p. 237.

MOTIN, a celebrated city or town in the tribe of Dan, whence came Matthias and his family, the Maccabeus, (1 Mac. ii. 1, 15; ix. 19,) and which is also famous for a battle fought there by a handful of men, under Judas Maccabeus, against Antiochus Eupator, 2 Mac. xiii. 5, &c.

MOLADAH, (Josh. xvi. 26; xix. 2,) a city first given to Judah, and afterwards to Simeon. It was in the southerly part of Judah.

MOLE, an unclean animal, (Lev. xi. 30,) several times referred to in Scripture. In the Vulgate and in the English Bible, the Mole is either the lizard or chameleon, which is improperly translated mole, this animal being called in Hebrew koled. The only passage requiring elucidation, in which the mole is spoken of, is Isa. ii. 20, and this the reader will find examined in the article LOOLA, p. 222.

MOLOCH, or MELCOM, a god of the Ammonites, to whom human sacrifices were offered. Moses in several places forbids the Israelites, under the penalty of death, to dedicate their children to Molech, by making them pass through the fire, (Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 5,) and God himself threatens to pour out his wrath against those who should be guilty of it. There is great probability that the Hebrews were addicted to the worship of this deity, even before their coming out of Egypt, since Amos (v. 26) and after him Stephen, (Acts vii. 43,) referred the word Molech to the idol carried in the wilderness the tabernacle of their god Molech. (See CHINN.) Solomon built a temple to Molech on the mount of Olives, (1 Kings xi. 7,) and Manasseh, a long time after, imitated his impiety, making his son pass through the fire in honor of this idol, 2 Kings xx. 3, 4. Such idolatry was practised chiefly in the valley of Tophet and Hinnom, east of Jerusalem, Jer. xix.

Some are of opinion, that the devotes contented themselves with making their children leap over a fire sacred to Molech; by this action consecrating them to that false deity; and as by a lustration purifying them; this being a usual ceremony on other occasions among the heathen. Others believe that they made them pass between two fires opposite each other, with the same intention; but it is generally thought that they really burnt their children as sacrifices. See Ps. cxi. 37; Isa. liii. 5; Ezek. xvi. 20, 21; xxii. 17, 18, where it is positively asserted, that the Hebrews sacrificed their children to devils, to Molech, and to strange gods. See FIRE.

The rabbins assure us, that the idol Molech was of brass, sitting on a throne of the same metal, adorned with a royal crown, having the head of a calf, and his arms extended so as to embrace someone; that when they offered children to him, they heated the statue from within, by a great fire; and when it was burning last, put the miserable vessel, together with all the tobacco, by the violence of the heat, and that the cries of the children might not be heard, they made a great noise with drums and other instruments about the idol. Others say, that his arms were extended, and resting on the ground, so that when they threw a child within his arms, it seems he arose and fell into a great fire which was burning at the foot of the statue.

There are various sentiments about Moloch; some believe that it represented Saturn, to whom it is well known that human sacrifices were offered. So Gershom in his Comm. x. 1. p. 354. (See also Curs. Others think he was Mercury, others say Venus, others Mars, or Mithras. Calmet has endeavored to prove, that Moloch signified the sun, or the king of heaven. (See also Saladin, de Die Syria; Spencer, de Logitas Hebraeorum Ritiuibus. Lib. ii. cap. 10. And Vossius, de Origine et Progressu Idolatriae, lib. ii. cap. 5.)

MONEY. Scripture often speaks of gold, silver, brass, of certain sums of money, of purchases made with money, of current money, of money of a certain weight; but we do not observe coined or stamped money till a late period; which induces a belief that the ancient Hebrews took gold and silver only by weight, and that they considered the purity of the metal, and not the stamp. The most ancient commerce was conducted by barter, or exchanging one sort of merchandise for another. One man gave what he could spare to another, who gave him in return part of his superabundance. Afterwards the more precious metals were used in traffic, as a value more generally known and stated. Lastly, they gave this metal, by public authority, a certain mark, a certain weight, and a certain degree of alloy, to fix its value, and to save buyers and sellers the trouble of weighing and examining the coins.

Abraham weighed out four hundred shekels of silver, to purchase Sarah's tomb; (Gen. xxi. 15, 16.) and Scripture observes, that he paid this in current money with the merchant. Joseph was sold by his brethren to the Midianites for twenty pieces of silver, (Gen. xxxvii. 28.) Heb. twenty shekels of silver. The brethren of Joseph brought back with them into Egypt the money they found in their sacks, in the same weight as before, Gen. xiii. 21. Isaiah describes the wicked as weighing silver in a balance, to make an idol thereof, (Isaiah xliii. 6.) and Jeremiah (xxxii. 10.) weighs seventeen pieces of silver in a pair of scales to pay for a field he had bought. Isaiah says, "Come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Wherefore do ye weigh money for that which is not bread?" (Amos (viii. 5.) represents the merchants encouraging one another to make the ephah small, wherewith to sell, and the shekel great, wherewith to buy, and to falsify the balances by deceit.

In these passages, three things only are mentioned: (1.) The metal; that is, gold or silver, and never copper, it not being used in traffic as money. (2.) The weight, a talent, a shekel, a gerah or obolus; the weight of the sanctuary, and the king's weight. (3.) The standard of pure or fine gold and silver, and of good quality, as received by the merchant. The impression of the coinage is not referred to; but it is said, they weighed the silver, or other commodities, by the talent and by the shekel. This shekel, therefore, and this talent, were not fixed and determined pieces of money, but weights applied to things used in commerce. Hence those deceitful balances of the merchants who would increase the shekel; that is, would augment the weight of the gold and silver they were to receive, that they might have a greater quantity than was their due; or the weight of the sanctuary, the standard of which was preserved in the temple, to prevent fraud; hence those prohibitions in the law. "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, (Heb. stones,) a great and a small," (Deut. xix. 20.) Hence those scales that the Hebrews wore at their girdles, (Hos. xii. 7.) and the Canaanites carried in their hands; to weigh the gold and silver which they received in payment.

And it is to be observed, that in the original text there is no mention of coined money, or of any thing like it. The gold and silver offered to Moses in the desert, for the use of the tabernacle; that which was given to Aaron to make a golden calf; that of which Gideon made an ephod; that which Tempted Achan; that which David left to Solomon; and that which Gabelni received from Naaman; was only gold or silver made into rings, bracelets, pendants, vessels, or ingots. Not a word of coined money of any mark or impression; nothing to show the form of the money, or the figure represented upon it; for, generally, coined money has the impress of some prince, some animal, flower, or other device. But the meaning of this kind occurs among the Hebrews.

It is true, that in the Hebrew (Isa. xxxiii. 19, 20.) we find Jacob bought a field for a hundred shekels; and that the friends of Job, (chap. xlii. 11.) after his recovery, gave to that model of patience each a hekal, and a golden pendent for the ephod; and there Darius, (Hec. Dariusmonis, or Adversus Medos) and Mine, Statares, Obole; but this kind of money was foreign, and is put for other terms, which in the Hebrew only signify the weight of the metal. The hekal is not well known to us; some take it for a sheep or a lamb; others for a kind of measure, having the impression of a lamb or a sheep. But Calmet rather thinks it to be a purse of money.

"The practice of weighing money is general in Syria, Egypt, and all Turkey. No piece, however effaced, is refused there: the merchant does not in scales and weights it, as in the days of Abraham, when he purchased his sepulchre. In considerable payments, an agent of exchange is sent for, who counts parsa by thousands, rejects pieces of false money, and is not content with the number of pieces, but gives the real weight of the metal. (Vonels, vol. ii. p. 425.) Does not this mention of an agent of exchange, give a new idea to the expression in Genesis, above referred to, "current money with the merchant;" i.e. much as was approved by a competent judge, whose business it was to detect fraudulent coin, if offered in payment? On this subject we may remark a much deeper inference that is usually discovered in the question of our Lord to the ill-designing Pharisees:—Whose image and superscription is this? For we ought to observe, that few, or none, of the early and truly Asiatic coins, had any image, or representation, of the king on them; that those of the original Jewish coinage, have the pot, or jug, (of manna, say some,) or the vine, or sheaf of corn, and the date when, and no image of any person, or power, (which the Jews would have held unlawful,) as the Roman coinage universally had, especially under the Cæsars. When, therefore, our Lord commands, "Show me the tribute-money," and asks, "Whose image and superscription is this?" and applies this (Roman) image of Cæsar, and appropriating this (Roman) coin to the payment of his tribute, they acknowledged Caesar's authority and power; thereby answering their own question. And this inference appears still more forcibly, when we recollect the utter aversion of the Jewish nation from images at this time, and that the figures on the standards of the Roman legions nearly occasioned an insurrection—In this view, the idea of image is stronger than that of superscription; though, in fact, one accompanied the other, the superscription, or epigraph, being the emperor's titles, usually inserted around his image, or bust, as on our British coins.

"They [the Turks] stamp nothing on their money (which is all of gold and silver, and consists in the sort aforesaid) but the emperor's name, and the year in which it was coined. They receive, nevertheless, foreign coins, with figures of living things, which seems contrary to their law." (De la Motraye's Travels, vol. i. p. 154.) Here we find the Turks receiving, through commercial policy, what the Jews were forced to receive, and to pass current, by reason of their subjection to the Roman emperor. It is also common, in the East, for coins to have some sentence on them, such as, "God is great," &c. The Roman coins had no such inscription, but were purely heathen, and solely presented the image and superscription of Caesar; or if any figure was added on the reverse, it was of some ideal or idolatrous deity.

It deserves notice, that the three evangelists who record this story, insert the word image, (and, indeed, they use coincided in the same words,) which seems to confirm the ideas above suggested. (See Matt. xxii. 20; Mark xii. 16; Luke xx. 24.)

MONTH. The ancient Hebrews had no particular names for their months; they said, the first, the second, the third, &c. In Exod. xiii. 4; xxiii. 15; xxxiv. 18, and Deut. xvi. 1, we find יִשָּׁנה yis 在, Chodesh אַבָּא Ab, or the month of the young ears of corn, or of the new fruits; which is, probably, the Egyptian name of that month, which the Hebrews afterwards called Nisan, and which was the first of the holy year. Everywhere else this lawgiver designates the months by their order of succession. In Joshua, Judges and Samuel we see the same method. Under Solomon (1 Kings vi.) we read of the month Zif, which is the second month of the holy year, and answers to that afterwards called Tisri. In the same chapter we read of the month Bul, which is the eighth of the holy year, and answers to Marchesvan, or October.

Lastly, in chap. viii. 2, we read of the month Ethanim, or the month of the valiant, which answers to Tisri, the seventh of the holy year.

Critics are not agreed about the origin of these names of the months. Scaliger thought Solomon borrowed them from the Phenicians, with whom he had much intercourse. Grotius believes they came from the Chaldeans; and Harlouin deduces them from the Egyptians. However this may be, we see nothing of them, either before or after Solomon. But after the captivity of Babylon, the people continued the names of the months as they had found them among the Chaldeans and Persians.

Names of the Hebrew months, according to the order of the sacred and civil years.

[Other interpreters, with greater propriety, reckon the beginning of Nisan from the new moon of April, and not of March; and this varies the beginning of the other months. (See Janh's Archaeol. § 103. Winer, Bibl. Realwörterb. p. 454.) R.Originally, the Hebrews followed the same distribution of their years and months as in Egypt. Their year consisted of 365 days, and of twelve months, each of thirty days. This appears by the enumeration of the days of the year of the deluge, Gen. vii. The twelfth month was to have thirty-five days, and they had no intercalary month, but at the end of one hundred and twenty years, when the beginning of the year following was out of its place thirty whole days.

After the exodus, which happened in the month of March, God ordained that the holy year, that is, the calendar of religious feasts and ceremonies, should begin at Nisan, the seventh month of the civil year, (the civil year being left unchanged,) which the Hebrews continued to do at the month Tisri (September). After the Babylonish captivity, the Jews, being but a handful of people in the midst of others surrounding them, compiled with such customs and manners of dividing times and seasons, as were used by the people that ruled over them; first, of the Chaldeans; afterwards, of the Persians; and lastly, of the Grecians. They took the names of the months from the Chaldeans and Persians, and perhaps their manner of dividing the year and the months. However, we cannot be sure of this, not exactly knowing the form of the Chaldean months. But we are plainly by Ecclesiasticus, (xiii. 6.) by the Maccabees, by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10.) and by Philo, (Vit. Mos. lib. iii.) that in their time they followed the custom of the Grecians; that is, their months were lunar, and their years solar.

These lunar months were each of twenty-nine days and a half; or, rather, one was of thirty days, the following of twenty-nine, and so on alternately: that which had thirty days was called a full or complete month; that which had but twenty-nine days was called incomplete. The new moon was always the beginning of the month, and this day they called נָאוֹמְנָא Neomnenia, new-moon day, or new month. They did not begin it from that point of time when the moon was in conjunction with the sun, but from the time at which she first became visible, after that conjunction. And to determine this, it is said, they had people posted on elevated places, to inform the Sanhedrim as soon as possible. Proclamation was then made, "The feast of the new moon! The feast of the new moon!" and the beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. For fear of any failing in the observation of that command, which directed certain ceremonies at the beginning of each month, they continued the Neomnenia two days; the first was called "the day of the moon's appearance," the other "of the moon's disappearance." So say the rabbins: but there is great probability, that if this was ever practised, it was only in provinces distant from Jerusalem. In the temple, and in the metropolis, there was always a fixed calendar, or at least a fixed decision for festival days, determined by the House of Judgment.

When we say that the months of the Jews answered to ours, Nisan to March, Jair to April, &c. with the same names, it is true, with some latitude; because the lunar months cannot be reduced exactly to solar ones. The vernal equinox falls between the twentieth and twenty-first of March, according to the course of the solar year. But in the lunar year, the new moon still falls in the month of March, and the full moon in the month of April. So that the Hebrew months will answer partially to two of our months, the end of one, and the beginning of the other.

Twelve lunar months making but three hundred and fifty-four days and six stones, the Jewish year was short of the Roman by twelve days. To recover the equinoctial points, from which this difference of the solar and lunar year would separate the new moon of the first month, the Jews every three years interpolated a thirteenth month, which they called Adar; the second Adar. By this means their lunar year equaled the solar; because in thirty-six solar months there would be thirty-seven lunar months. The Hebrews numbered the intercalation, and the thirteenth month was placed between Adar and Nisan; so that the passover was always celebrated the first full moon after the equinox.

MOON. The Lord created the sun and the moon on the fourth day of the world, to preside over day and night, and to distinguish times and seasons, Gen. i. 15, 16. As the sun presides over day, so the moon presides over night; the sun regulates the course of a year, the moon the course of a month; the sun is, as it were, king of the host of heaven, the moon is queen. The moon was appointed for the distinction of seasons, of festival days, and days of assembling, Gen. i. 14; Ps. civ. 19. For the days of the New Moon, see NEOMINIA.

We do not know whether the Hebrews understood the theory of lunar eclipses; but they always speak of them in terms which intimate that they considered them as wonders, and as effects of the power and wrath of God. When the prophets speak of the darkness or eclipse of the sun, they often say, that the sun shall be covered with darkness; the moon withdraw her light; and the stars fall from heaven, Isa. xiii. 10; xxiv. 23; Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8; Joel ii. 10; iii. 15. But we cannot perceive that there is any direct mention of the moon’s rising to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Je- chirin, or Jecomiah, king of Judah, A. M. 4 Eath. ii. 5, 6. He settled at Shushan, and there to the first year of Cyrus, when it is thought he lived Jerusalem, with several other captives: but afterwards he returned to Shushan. Mordecai is a Hebrew leap by nineteen letters, to the point gate to the news of the queen. During his attendance there discovered a conspiracy of two eunuchs to kill king; his service, however, was registered only, not rewarded. Ahaseurus raising Haman to be favorite, Mordecai refused to honor him; and Herod wrote letters to all his subject kings to exterminate all the Hebrews. It is evident that the anxiety of Mordecai women, and women dressed like men, sacrifice the moon. Maimonides thinks, that Moses inter- to forbid this, when he prohibited the sexes from change of habits. The moon was worshipped god, and not as a goddess, in Syria, Mesopotamia, with some among the Egyptians; as she was thea, the gracious king. Strabo calls her Mes- does Isaiah, lix. 11. She was represented clo as a man; and there are medals extant, on w" Mordecai was extreme; but we cannot fully enter into the circumstances of his walking day after day, (chap. ii. 16.) for he had probably held up all this a year, without recollecting the extreme vigilance with which the harrems of the East are guarded. On this subject Chardin says: "The place where the women are shut up is sacred, especially among persons of condition; and it is a crime for any person whatever to be inquiring what passes within those walls. The husband has there an absolute authority, without being obliged to give any account of his actions. And it is said, that there are most bloody doings in those places sometimes, and that poison despatches a world of people, which are thought to die a natural death." (p. 336.) "I could not learn what was done more the rest of the night; for I have already informed you how difficult it is to be informed of the transactions in those habitations, that seem to be regions of another world. There are some but women that can approach within a league of it, or some black eunuchs, with whom a man may as well converse as with so many dragons, that can discover those secrets; and you may as well tear out their hearts as a syllable upon that text. You must use a great deal of art to make them speak; just as we tame serpents in the Indies, till they make them hiss and dance when they please." (p. 54. Cor. Solym. 1. If we may observe, that Habas the second left behind him two sons; or, at least, I never heard that he left any more, nor is it known whether he left any daughters or no. For what is done in the women's apartment is a mystery concealed even from the grandees and prime ministers. Or, if they know anything, it is merely upon the account of some particular relation or dependence which the secret has to some peculiar affair, which, of necessity, must be imparted to their knowledge. For my part, I have spared neither pains nor cost to sift out the truth, but I could never discover any more; only, that they believed he never left any daughter behind him that lived. A man may walk a hundred days, one after another, by the house where the women are, and yet know no more what is done therein, than at the further end of Tartary." (p. 6.)

We learn from these extracts, (1.) That to inquire what passes in the harem is a crime. (2.) That it is possible, "by a great deal of art," and weighty reasons, no doubt, to make the Blanchmans "speak" on some occasions. (3.) That a man may walk a hundred days, one after another, yet obtain no intelligence from thence. (4.) That "bloody doings" are occasionally transacted there.

These hints may account for the conduct of Mordecai, who walked every day before the court of the women's house, to gather any intelligence that might chance to come within his cognizance, respecting his niece. An English reader is apt to say, "Why did not he visit her at once?" or, "To be sure, when he walked before the court, he inquired of the servants, and they told him as a matter of course." No: he walked, day after day, if perchance he might make some of these "dragons" in any degree tractable. In like manner, the English reader may suppose, that (chap. ii. 22.) when "Mordecai told Esther the queen" of the treason of the king's chamberlins, he spoke to her personally. This, however, is not probable: he sent her the intelligence by intervening agents. And whether in the utmost distress wished to communicate with Esther, (chap. iv. 2.) "he cried with a loud and bitter cry, even before the king's gate," which was the only means left him of gaining attention from the attendants of the place; some of whom, coming to him, he murmured, and told Esther, who was too far off to hear him. Esther sent her own chamberlain, Hatach, (a confidential person, no doubt,) to inquire from Mordecai himself the cause of his lamentation; and, by means of Hatach, messages passed between them, which agreed with what Chardin says, that it is possible on urgent occasions to make these officers "speak." We learn, also, that there are "bloody doings" in the harem; this agrees with the remark of Mordecai, (chap. iv. 13.) "Think not that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews." He certainly means that Haman would procure her death, even in the harem.

Moriah, a mountain upon which the temple of Jerusalem was built by King Solomon, 2 Chron. iii. 1. It is thought this was the place where Abraham intended to offer up his son Isaac, (Gen. xxii. 2, 14.) though this supposition is attended with some difficulties. Instead of Moriah, the Samaritan reads more, in Genesis, as if God sent Abraham near to Sichem, where certainly was a Moriah, Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30.

The name of Moriah is thought to be derived from a root implying height, or elevation; and it is certain, from the description given of it in Jerusalem, that it stands on the highest hill in the neighborhood, and is seen from a great distance. It is probable, therefore, that the idea of being seen from far, as if it lifted itself up, is included in the name Moriah, which we may observe is in the feminine. Probably there is some reference to this in those prophets, who say, The Mountain of the Lord's temple shall be exalted above the (surrounding) hills, and all nations shall flow to it, Isa. ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1. See Jerusalem.

Morrow. The word morrow denotes the next succeeding period of light, which commences a little before the rising of the sun, and is opposed to the preceding period of darkness, as day is to night. The Hebrew term Middr, rendered Morrow, signifies the exchange of one thing for another. It was light given instead of the preceding hours of darkness; during which the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, Gen. i. 2. The idea of the Hebrews, under the word Middr, may be further understood from the two following passages: "And a people stood all that day, as at night, and all day on the morrow," (Num. xii. 32,) as opposed to night. "But God prepared a worm in the rising of the dawn for the morrow," or against the morrow, which is, in our translation, when the morrow rose the next day, Jonah iv. 7. This phrase shows that the Hebrew morrow did not commence before the light. The Anglo-Saxon morrow is, no doubt, derived from the eastern Middr; and as it is evident from Tacitus and Julius Caesar, that both the Germans and the Gauls computed time in the manner of the Hebrews, and other eastern nations, there is the greater reason for supposing that our ancestors used the word morrow according to the idea of the Hebrew Middr. The Anglo-Saxon morrow, our Middr, is found in the following passages: Exod. vii. 15; viii. 23; xvi. 23; xvi. 9; xxxii. 5; xxxiv. 2; Num. xii. 1; Matt. vi. 30; Luke xii. 32, 33, &c.

Mortar. The mortar is a remarkable passage in Prov. xxii. 29. "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat, with a pestle, yet wilt not his foolishness depart from him." The mode of punishment here referred to may be proved to exist in the East, by positive testimony.

"Fanaticism has everywhere, in Turkey, in favor of the Ulema, [or body of lawyers] that their goods shall never be confiscated, nor themselves put to death, but by being brained in a morter. The honor of being treated in so distinguished a manner, may not, perhaps, be sensibly felt by every one; examples are rare; yet the insistence of the Mufti irritated Sultan Osman to such a degree, that he ordered the mortars to be replaced, which, having been long neglected, had been thrown down, and almost covered with earth. This order alone produced a surprising effect: the body of Ulema, justly terrified, submitted." (Baron du Tott, vol. i. p. 28.) "As for the guards of the Towers, who had let prince Coreckie [a prisoner] escape, some of them were emasculated, and some were pounded, or beaten to pieces, in great mortars of yron, wherein they do usually pound their rice, to reduce it to meal." (Knolles's History of the Turks, p. 1374.)

This last quotation is the very case in point; except that Solomon seems to suppose the God was pounded together with the wheat; whereas, in this instance, the guards were beaten to death, certainly, without any such accompaniment.

"The Mahometans consider this office as so important, and entitled to such reverence, that the person of a pasha, who acquires himself well in it, becomes inviolable, even by the sultan: it is no longer permitted to shed his blood. But the divan has invented a method of satisfying its vengeance on those who have perjured themselves, by this privilege, without departing from the literal expression of the law, by ordering them to be pounded in a mortar, . . . of which there have been various instances." (Volney, vol. ii. p. 250.)

MOSERÁH, or MOSEROTH, (Numb. xxxii. 30): a station of the Israelites, near mount Hor. Burckhardt mentions a valley east of mount Hor, called Wady Mousa, which is perhaps a corruption of Moseráh. See EXODUS, p. 418, and AARON, p. 2.

Moses, son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, was born in Egypt, A.M. 2433. In consequence of the decree of Pharaoh for putting the male children of the Hebrews to death, he was put into a kind of vessel made of rushes, and laid on the banks of the Nile. Here he was found by the daughter of Pharaoh, and placed unheededly with his mother to be nursed, Exod. ii. 1—9.

The princess named the infant Moses, (saved out of the water,) and adopted him for her son, Acts vii. 22. His own parents, however, who brought him up, were induced to this, through a sense of his forefathers; so that, when grown up, he preferred rather to partake with his people in their afflictions, than to share in the pleasures of a court, Heb. xi. 24—26.

Moses relates his own story with great simplicity, thus: (Exod. ii.) Being grown up he visited his brethren, and seeing an Egyptian oppressing a Hebrew, he vindicated him, slew the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. The transaction becoming known, Pharaoh sought for Moses to put him to death; but he fled into the country of Midian, in Arabia Petraea, south of mount Sinai; where he married Zipporah, a daughter of Jethro, priest or prince of Midian.

Moses, employed in feeding the sheep of Jethro, one day came to the mountain of Horeb, where the Lord appeared to him in a burning bush, and commissioned him, notwithstanding his reluctance and hesitation, to deliver his people Israel. See AARON.

Being arrived in Egypt, Moses and Aaron carried their message to Pharaoh, and demanded permission for the Israelites to journey to the desert of Arabia, to offer sacrifices to the Lord. Pharaoh refused, and augmented the burdens of the people, who complained to Moses, and he to the Lord. The ten plagues followed; and at midnight on the fourteenth day of Nisan, Moses led his people out of Egypt. See EXODUS.

Arrived in the wilderness of Sin, or Zin, between Eilim and Sinai, the multitude, tired with the length of their journey, began to murmur against Moses, saying, "Would God we had died in Egypt, where we sat at the flesh-pots, and where we are bread in abundance!" The Lord promised to rain food from heaven; of which Moses informed the people, and that very evening the camp of Israel was covered with quails, brought therewith by the wind. The next morning they saw all round the camp a kind of hoarfrost, or little grains, of the color of bdellium, and of the shape of coriander-seeds; the manna. (See MANSÁ.) Moses bade Aaron to fill an outer vessel with manna, and to lay it up before the Lord; to remain as a monument to future generations.

At Rephidim, the people, in want of water, murmured against Moses; but the Lord, by his ministry, drew water out of the rock of Horeb. Joshua, Amalekites attacking Israel, Moses sent Joshua against them; he himself, at the same time, with Aaron and Hur, being on an eminence, whence they could see the engagement. While Moses held up his hands toward heaven, Joshua had the advantage over the enemy; but when he held them down, the Amalekites prevailed. Aaron and Hur, therefore, put stones under him, that he might sit down, while each of them supported his arms, that he might not be tired. So the Amalekites were entirely defeated. The Lord desired Moses to write an account of this action in a book, and to instruct Joshua concerning it, he having determined utterly to destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven. On the third day of the third month from their coming out of Egypt, they arrived at the foot of mount Sinai, where they continued a year; here Moses was the mediator of a covenant between God and his people. See LAW.

Coming down from the mountain, Moses declared to the people the laws he had received, and the articles of the covenant that the Lord would make with them. The people answering, that they would perform whatever the Lord enjoined, Moses erected an altar of unhewn stones, at the foot of the mountain, and twelve masts and expectations in the name of the twelve tribes of Israel. Having offered sacrifices and peace-offerings, he took the blood of the victims, poured half upon the altar, and the other half into cups, and having read to the people the ordinances he had received from the Lord, and which he had written in a book, he sprinkled all the people with the blood that was in the cups. Thus was concluded the solemn and celebrated covenant between the Lord and the children of Israel.

The Lord then commanded Moses to come up again into the mountain, and to bring with him Joshua, his servant, that he might instruct him in all which he would have observed by the priests or people, in the public exercise of religion; all the parts of which he distinctly appointed. Descending from the mount, Joshua heard the shouts and rejoicings of the people, as if of an engagement with an enemy. But Moses observed that it was not the sound of an alarm, but cries of joy. When they approached the camp, they saw the golden calf, which had been made, (see Calf,) and the people singing and dancing about it. Moses indignantly threw down the tables of stone he held in his hands, and broke them; and taking the calf, he reduced it to powder, and scattered it into the water, which he made all the congregation drink of. Moses severely rebuked Aaron; and, standing at the entrance of the camp, he proclaimed, "Whoever is for the Lord, let him join himself to me." All the children of Levi assembling about him, he said, "Thus saith the Lord, Let every one of you take his sword, and let him go from gate to gate, across the camp, and slay even to his brother, his friend, or his kinsman." They did so, and that day there were slain about 3000 people. The next day Moses reminded the people on the heinousness of their sin; but told them he would again ascend the mountain, and endeavor to obtain forgiveness for them. He went up and entreated the Lord to pardon them; or otherwise, he begged that he himself might be blotted out of the book of the Lord. (See Book.) He also desired another favor, which was, that he might see his glory. The Lord answered him, that he could not see his face, for no man could support that sight; but that he would pass before the opening of the rock, where he might hear his name, and see his train, as he passed along.

Afterwards, Moses went up into the mountain, and carried new tables of stone. There God renewed the decalogue, that is, from the grace and pity of the law, the Lord commanded also, that each Israelite should contribute half a shekel; (about 2½ cents;) and that this contribution might be regularly raised, Moses took an account of the people, from twenty years old and upwards; of whom there were found 603,550, each of which paying a bekah or half shekel, the sum amounted to 100 talents of silver and 1775 shekels, or about $300,000. Six whole months they worked at the tabernacle that is, from the fourteenth of this holy year, after their leaving Egypt, A. M. 2513, to the first day of the first month of the following year, 2514. On the first day of Nisan, (April 21, according to Usher,) the tabernacle of the congregation was set up, and filled with the glory of the Lord, and on the fourteenth, the Israelites celebrated the second passover from their coming out of Egypt. About this time, Moses published the laws contained in the first seven chapters of Leviticus, consecrated Aaron and his sons, and dedicated the tabernacle with all its vessels.

The first day of the second month of this year, Moses took a second account of the people, in which the Levites were reckoned apart, and appointed to the service of the tabernacle. The priests of the tribes made their offerings to the tabernacle, each according to his rank, and on his day, during the twelve days of the dedication and consecration of this holy place. Lastly, and about this time, Moses made several ordinances relating to the purity to be observed in holy things, and the manner of approaching the tabernacle.

About the end of the year, Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, brought him his wife Zipporah, and his two sons, Gershom and Eliezer. Moses received him with all respect, and by his persuasion commissioned judges to assist in accommodating differences, and minor suits. On the arrival of Zipporah in the camp, Aaron, and Miriam his sister, spoke against Moses, because he had married an Ethiopian; but the Lord interposed in behalf of Moses, who was the meekest man upon earth. See AARON.

It is not easy to determine, whether the sedition of Korah, Dathan and Abiram happened after the arrival of the Hebrews at Kadesh-barne, or before. (See Korah.) At Kadesh, where Miriam died, the people murmured for water, which Moses and Aaron supplied, by causing it to gush out of a rock. But as they allowed some distrust in the Lord, he condemned them to die in the wilderness, without entering the land of promise. Hence they called this encampment Meribah, or waters of contradiction.

At Zalmonah, it is thought Moses erected the brazen serpent, to heal those who had been bitten by fiery serpents. Being come to mount Pisgah, in the desert of Kedemoth, he despatched ambassadors to Sihon, king of the Amorites, to solicit a passage through his country, which being refused, Moses gave him battle, overcame him, and took all his territories. Some time afterwards, Og, king of Bashan, was marched against and defeated by him; but he was conquered and his country taken.

While encamped in the plains of Moab, at Shittim, Balak, king of Moab, invited Balaam to come and curse Israel. But the soothsayer having rather blessed than cursed them, he sent the daughters of Moab into the camp, to tempt them to idolatry and fornication. This wicked counsel had the desired effect; but Moses put to death all who had abandoned themselves to the worship of Baal-peor, to the number of 35,000, besides 1000 others who were executed by the judges. After this, the Lord commanded Moses to make war against the Midianites, who had sent their daughters, with those of Moab, to debauch Israel. Phinehas was appointed chief of the expedition, with 12,000 chosen men, who routed the Midianites.

On the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the coming out of Egypt, Moses being in the fields of Moab, and knowing that he was not to pass over Jordan, made a long discourse to the people, recapitulating all that had taken place since the day that had happened from the coming out of Egypt. He set before them the happiness that would attend their constancy and fidelity, and the calamities which would punish their prevarication. He put into the hands of the priests a commandment with an injunction to have it read solemnly every seventh year in a general assembly of the nation. He composed an excellent canticle or poem, in which he exclaimed against their future infidelity, and threatened them with all the evils that in after-ages came upon them. A little before his death, he annexed to each of the tribes a particular blessing, in which he mingled several prophecies and predictions.

At the beginning of the twelfth month, the Lord commanded him to ascend mount Nebo, where he obtained a view of the country, both on this side and beyond Jordan. "So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died there in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knew of his sepulchre unto this day. And Moses was 120 years old when he died: his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated. And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plain of Moab thirty days." It is added, "There arose not a prophet since like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face: in all the signs and wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to his land, and in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses showed in the sight of all Israel.

Moses is the most ancient writer of whom there remain any authentic works. He has left us the Pentateuch, or the five books—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy—which were probably not originally separate works, as we find them now. These books are acknowledged as authentic and inspired, by both Jews and Christians. Some difficulties have been started about their author, because a few later passages have been inserted. But these additions make no alteration in the sense: they are by way of illustration only. See Bible.

In addition to the Pentateuch, the Jews ascribe to Moses eleven Psalms, from x. to c.; but there is no sufficient proof that these were all written by him. The greater part of the titles of the Psalms are not original, nor indeed very ancient, and some of them are wrongly placed. Besides, the names of persons, and other marks, that by no means agree with Moses. Some of the ancients believe that Moses was the author of the book of Job. Origens is of opinion, that he translated it out of Syrian, or Arabic, into Hebrew; in which he is followed by many of the moderns.

As to the death and burial of Moses, many difficulties have been raised. Scripture tells us expressly, that Moses died, according to the word of the Lord, Deut. iii. 26. But as the Hebrew (משה) literally imports, upon the mouth of the Lord, the rabbins have imagined that the Lord took away his soul by a kiss. Others have maintained that he did not die; and some have supposed that he was translated into heaven.

The rabbins do not content themselves with the miracles that Scripture relates of Moses, but add many particulars of a spurious description; as, for example, that he was born circumcised; that the daughter of Pharaoh, when she saw him in the basket, made to call him her own son; but God permitted that his neck should become as hard as a pillar of marble, and the rebound of the sword killed the executioner.

The history of Moses was so famous, for many ages, in almost all countries, that it is no wonder writers of different nations have each represented it after his own manner. The orientals, the ancient Greeks, the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, the Romans, have all made additions to his history. Some of them have improved on the miracles that the Scripture relates concerning his life; others have disguised his story by adding to it not only false, but mean and trifling, circumstances, of which we have just given a specimen. The character and life of this legislator is, however, one of the finest subjects for the pen of a philosophical historian, who is at the same time a competent antiquary.

His institutes have not only been maintained for several thousands of years, and by Jews, however dispersed in all parts of the globe, but they retain a vigor that promises a perpetuity, unless disturbed by some omnipotent interference. They have withstood the fury of persecution, and the more dangerous snares of seduction. They are essentially the same in all parts of Persia, and in all the countries of Europe. They may have been neglected, they may have been interpolated, they may have been abused, yet they are the same. Nor is the nation insensible to its relation in all its branches: the principle of canonicity is allowed and felt throughout. It is impossible not to discern the hand of Providence in the fate of this people. To assign too positively the termination of the Mosaic institutions, were rash; for even supposing the general conversion of the body of the Jewish nation to Christianity, it does not follow that every rite established under the Mosaic economy, should absolutely cease and determine.

MOTH, an insect which flies by night and of which there are many kinds. As some of them are particularly attached to woollen cloth, which they consume, & c. they are alluded to in Scripture under that description, Job xiii. 28; Isa. i. 9; Jam. v. 2. The moth is, as it were, a night butterfly, and is distinguished from the day butterfly by having its antennae, or horns, sharp-pointed, not tufted. In Job iv. 19, we read, "How much less in them who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust; which are crushed before the moth." The Hebrew מִתְעַבָּר, moth, is used in many of the passages of this poem, as ch. xiii. 28; xxviii. 18. and elsewhere. This creature is usually taken for the moth which consumes clothes and wool, by reducing them to a dust and powder. But, perhaps, it is more properly a moth-worm, for the moth itself is called מִתְעַבָּר, and is joined with מִתְעַבָּר, in Isaiah ii. 8. This moth-worm is one state of the creature, which first is enclosed in an egg, whence it issues a worm; after a time it quits this worm state, to assume that of the complete insect, or moth. It cannot be, then, a moth flying against a house and oversetting it, (as Mr. Harvey conjectured,) that this comparison is intended; but to the gradual consumption of the dwelling of the worm by its erosion; q. d. "As the habitation of a worm is consumed by its inhabitant, so is the person of man: it is no more capable of resisting disease than a woollen cloth is capable of resisting decay, when devoured and demolished by the worm appointed to it;" otherwise, "Crushed as a feeble and contemptible insect is crushed; as we crush a moth-worm, without reluctance or compunction."

MOTHER. This word is sometimes used for a metropolis, the capital city of a country, or of a tribe; and sometimes for a whole people. 3 Sam. xx. 19. "The synagogue is the mother of the Jews, and the church is of Christians." Isaiah asks, (l. l.) "Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement, whom I have put away?" that is, of the synagogue; and Paul, (Gal. iv. 26), says, "Jerusalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all." The great Babylon, that is, Rome, is called in the Revelation, "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," that is, of idolatry, Rev. xvii. 5.

A mother in Israel signifies a brave woman, whom God uses to deliver his people. This name is given to Deborah, Judg. v. 7. Wisdom calls herself the mother of chaste love. The earth, to which at our death we must all return, is called the mother of all men, Eccles. xi. 1.

MOUNTAIN. [See HILL.] Yet they retain a vigour that promises a perpetuity, unless disturbed by... ful and cultivated. Moses says, (Deut. xxxii. 13,) that the rocks of its mountains produce oil and honey, by a figure of speech, which elegantly shows their fertility. He says, (Deut. viii. 7, 9,) that in the mountains of Palestine spring excellent fountains; and that their boulders yield iron and brass. He desired earnestly of the Lord, that he might see the fine mountains of Judaea and Libanus, Deut. iii. 25. The most famous mountains mentioned in Scripture are, Sinir in Idumea—Hores, near Sinai, in Arabia Petraea—Sinai, in Arabia Petraea—Hor, in Idumea—Gilboa, south of the valley of Jezreel—Nezar, a mountain of Abaram—Taros, in Lower Galilee—En Geduri near the Dead sea—Libanus and Anti Libanus—Gerizim, in Samaria—Ebal, near to Gerizim—Gilead, beyond Jordan—Amalek, in Ephraim—Moriah, where the temple was built—Paran, in Arabia Petraea—Garam, in Ephraim—Olivet—Pisgam, beyond Jordan—Hermon, beyond Jordan, near Libanus—Carmel, near the Mediterranean sea, between Dor and Ptelemais. There are many other mountains, famous for having cities on them, as Hebron, Samaria, Nazareth, Gibeon, Shophim, Shilo, &c.

The Hebrews frequently give to mountains the epithet eternal, because they are as old as the world itself. Gen. xlix. 20; Deut. xxxii. 15. They were sometimes retitled as places of security.

Mountains and their properties are frequently objects of comparison in Scripture—their elevation, their stability, the breadth of their bases, &c. Many extraordinary events narrated in sacred history, took place on mountains, which seem to form, by their very structure and appearance, proper places of seclusion.

Warning. The Hebrews, at the death of their friends and relations, gave all possible demonstrations of grief and mourning. They wept, tore their clothes, smote their breasts, fasted, and lay upon the ground, went barefooted, pulled their hair and beards, or cut them, and made incisions on their breasts, or tore them with their nails, Lev. xix. 28; xxii. 5; Jer. xvi. 6. The time of mourning was commonly seven days, but it was lengthened or shortened according to circumstances. For Moses and Aaron was prolonged to thirty days, which Jeremiah says, ought to be sufficient for any man, on the loss of his nearest relation, or his dearest friend.

During the time of their mourning, the near relations of the deceased continued sitting in their houses, and in the streets. The food they took was thought unclean, and even themselves were judged impure: "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted," Hos. ix. 4. Their faces were covered, and in all that time they could not apply themselves to any occupation, nor read the book of the law, nor say their usual prayers. They did not dress themselves, nor make their beds, nor uncover their heads, nor shave themselves, nor cut their nails, nor go into the bath, nor salute any body. Nobody spoke to them unless they spoke first. Their friends commonly went to visit and comfort them, bringing them food, according to Prov. xxxi. 6, 7: "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty, (or affliction,) and remember his misery no more." (Compare Baptism for the dead.) Anciently, they set bread and meat at the tombs of the dead, that the poor might have the benefit of it, Tob. iv. 18; Elucid. xxx. 18; Baruch vi. 36, 31. They also went up to the roof, or upon the platform of their houses, to bewail their misfortune: "Through all the cities of Moab (says Isaiah) they shall gird themselves with sackcloth: on the tops of their houses, and in their streets, every one shall howl, weeping abundantly," chap. xv. 3. And (xxii. 1,) speaking to Jerusalem, he says, "What aileth thee now, that thou art wholly gone up to the house-tops?"

They hired women to weep and mourn, and also persons to play on instruments, at the funerals of the Hebrews. Persons in years were carried to their graves by sound of trumpet, as Servius says, and younger people by the sound of flutes. In Matt. ix. 23, we observe a company of players on the flute, at the funeral of a girl of twelve years of age. All that met a funeral procession, or a company of mourners, out of civility were to join them, and to mingle their tears with those who wept. Paul seems to allude to this custom when he says, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep," Rom. xii. 15. And our Saviour in the gospel, "The men of this generation are like unto children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept," Luke vii. 32; Matt. xi. 17.

When our Saviour was led away to his crucifixion, the women of Jerusalem followed him, making great lamentations, (Luke xxiii. 27,) and when the daughter of Jephthah was devoted by her father, she went with her companions upon the mountains, to lament her leaving the world without being married, Judg. xi. 38. In Palestine and Syria, the women go out into the burying-places at certain times, there to mourn for the death of their near relations.

The mourning habit among the Hebrews was not fixed either by law or custom. We only find in Scripture, that they used to tear their garments—a custom still observed; but they tear a small part merely, and for form's sake. Anciently, in times of mourning, they clothed themselves in sackcloth, or hair cloth, that is, in coarse or ill made clothes, of brown or black stuff. At this day, that they may not appear ridiculous, they wear mourning after the fashion of the countries where they live, without being constrained to do so by any law.

MOUSE, or RAT, in Hebrew עקר, Akkar, especially FIELD-MOUSE. By many this word is thought to denote the Jerboa, an animal described by Bruce, and which is often looked for in the Arabia under the El Akkar, or the largest of the Mouos montanae. The accompanying engraving will afford a good idea of this curious creature, which is very different from the common mouse. But the Jerboa is more probably the animal called in the English translation coneys. (See Coney.) The word rendered mouse probably includes various species of these animals, some of which were eaten. Moses (Lev. xi. 28,) declared it to be unclean, which implies that it was sometimes eaten; and Isaiah (lix. 17,) reproaches the Jews with this practice. Mice made great havoc in the fields of the Phœnicians, after that people had taken the ark of the Lord, (1 Sam. v. 6, &c.) which induced them to send it back with mice and emerods of gold, as an atonement for the irrever-erence committed, and to avert the vengeance that pursued them. The Assyrians, who besieged Bethiel, when they saw the Hebrews come out of the city in order of battle, compared them to mice, saying, "See, the mice are coming forth out of their holes," Judith xiv. 12. Vulgate.

MOUTH. It has been observed, on the article Aoraks, that to kiss one's hand, and to put it to one's mouth, was a sign of adoration. The Hebrews, by way of pleonasm, often say, He opened his mouth, and spoke, sung, cursed, &c. Also, that God opens the mouth of the prophet, puts words into their mouth, bids them speak what he inspires them with.
To inquire at the mouth of the Lord, is to consult him, Josh. ix. 14. God says, that he will be a mouth to Moses and Aaron, Exod. xvi. 15. "We will call damned, and inquire at her mouth," let us know Rebkekah's sentiments of the matter, Gen. xxiv. 37. "Let us hear what is in the mouth of Alithophel." (2 Sam. xvii.) let us consult him about this affair.

To open the mouth, is often used emphatically for speaking aloud, boldly, freely: (1 Sam. ii. 1.) "My mouth is enlarged—opened—over my enemies," says Hannah, the mother of Samuel. (Comp. Exod. xxiv.
27; Isa. liii. 4.) In a contrary sense, to shut the mouth, to silence, is a mark of humiliation and afflic-tion, Ps. xvi. 42; xxxviii. 14. "To set their mouth against the heaven." (Ps. lxxii. 6.) is when they speak arrogantly, insolently and blasphemy of God.

God directs that his law should be always in the mouth of his people; i.e. that the Israelites commune frequently with one another about it. He forbids them so much as to pronounce the name of strange gods, Exod. xxi. 13. To speak to mouth, like, is a Hebraism, which we render by face to face, Num. xii. 8. Heb. "With one mouth," is with common consent, Dan. iii. 51. To observe the mouth of the king, is to hear his words with attention, Ecclus. viii. 2. To walk by the mouth of any one, is to obey his orders. To transgress against the mouth of the Lord, is to disobey his commands. You shall be justified by your own mouth; you shall be condemned out of your own mouth: by the good or ill use of your tongue.

Hosea says, (vi. 5.) the Lord has put the people to death by the words of his mouth: i.e. he foretold death (or captivity) to them by his prophets. Isaiah says of the Messiah, (xi. 4.) He shall subdue the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his fins shall he slay the wicked." These expressions denote the absolute power of God, and that it requires only one breath to destroy his enemies—perhaps by his judicial sentence. The same prophet says, (xix. 2.) "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword." These ways of speaking energetically express the sovereign authority of God. "From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh; (Matt. xxii. 31.) i.e. our discourses are the echo of the sentiments of our hearts. It is not what enters into the mouth that defileth the man; it is neither meat nor drink that makes us unclean in the sight of God.

MULBERRY-TREE. The word translated mulberry-tree signifies literally creeping, and indicate the reume, some tree which distils balsam or gum.
The particular species is not known. 2 Sam. v. 23;
21: 1 Chr. xiv. 11, 13. In Ps. lxviii. 47, it is said that among other plagues with which the Lord vis-ted Egypt, he destroyed their trees with hail, and their mulberry-trees with frost. The English translation reads sycamore-trees; which are common Egypt. They have a leaf much resembling that of a mulberry-tree, and fruit something like figs; but the word sycamore, from sycos, a fig or fig-tree, means a mulberry-tree. See Sycamore.

MULE, the offspring of two animals of differ-species, as a horse and an ass.

There is no probability that the Jews bred mules, because it was forbidden to couple creatures of different species, Lev. xix. 19. But they were not bidden to use them. Thus we may observe, especially after David's time, that mules, male or female, were common among the Hebrews; formerly they used only male and female asses, 2 Sam.
29; xviii. 9; 1 Kings i. 33, 38, 44; x. 25; xvii. 5, &c.

Some have thought that Ahah, son of Zibecos, the posterity of Seir, being in the desert, found the manner of breeding mules. This opinion is much espoused by the ancients. But Jerome, notices it in his Hebrew questions on Genesis, translates, "that Ahah found hot waters." The Syr. says, a fountain; but rather it signifies a passeon whom Ahah surprised and defeated. See Ahah.

MURDER. This crime among the Hebrews was always punished by death, but involuntary murder was only punished by banishment. Citider were appointed for involuntary manslaughter whither the slayer might retire, and continue in peace till the death of the high-priest, Num. xxxv.
Then the offender was at liberty to return to his home, if he pleased. A murderer was put to death without resumption: the kinman of the murder person might kill him with impunity. Money could not redeem his life; he was dragged away even fi-the altar, if he had taken refuge there.

When a dead body was found in the fields, the murderer was unknown, Moses commanded the eders and judges of the neighboring places should resort to the spot, Deut. xxi. 1—8. The ders of the city nearest to it were to take a he-ch which had never yet borne the yoke, and were lead into some ruckle and uncultivated place, which not been ploughed or sowed, where they would cut its throat: the priests of the Lord, the elders and magistrates of the city, were to come near the ed body, and washing their hands on the heifer that had been slain, they were to say: "Our hands have not shed this blood; nor have ever seen it shed. Lord, be favorable to thy poor Israel, and impute not unto us this blood which been shed in the midst of our country." This euomy may inform us what idea they had of benignness of murder, and how much it was conceived at this crime: also their fear that God in avenge it on the whole country: and the pollu-

MUSIC. The ancient Hebrews had a great t

for music, which they used in their religious services, in their public and private rejoicings, at their feasts, and even in their mournings. We have in Scripture canticles of joy, of thanksgiving, of praise, of mourning; epikalamia, or songs composed on occasion of marriage; as the Song of Songs, and Psalm xiv. which were used to celebrate the marriage of Solomon. Also mournful songs, as those of David on the deaths of Saul and Abner, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah on the destruction of Jerusalem. Also Psalms to celebrate the accession of a prince to his crown, as Psalm lix. Songs of victory, triumph and gratulation, as that which Moses sung after passing the Red sea, that of Deborah and Barak, and others. The book of Psalms is an ample collection of different pieces for music, composed on all sorts of subjects by inspired authors.

Music is very ancient. Moses says that Jubal, who lived before the deluge, was the father of those who played on the kinnor, and the uggab, Gen. iv. 21. The kinnor manifestly signifies the harp, and uggab the ancient organ; and when Uriah the Hittite sang to the Pennatian pipes, 2 Sam. xvi. 10, Laban complains that his son-in-law Jacob had left him, without bidding him farewell, without giving him an opportunity of sending his family away with with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp." Moses, having passed over the Red sea, composed a song, and sung it with the Israelite men, while Miriam, his sister, sung it with dancing, and playing on instruments, at the head of the women. He caused silver trumpets to be made, to be sounded at solemn sacrifices, and on religious festivals. David, who had a great taste for music, seeing that the Levites were numerous, and not employed, as formerly, in carrying the boards, veils and vessels of the tabernacle, its abode being fixed at Jerusalem, appointed a great part of them to sing and to play on instruments in the temple.

Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun were chiefs of the music of the tabernacle under David, and of the temple under Solomon. Asaph had four sons, Jeduthun six, and Heman fourteen. These twenty-four Levites, sons of the three great masters of the temple music, were at the head of twenty-four bands of musicians, which served in the temple by turns. Their number there was always great, but especially at the times of the Passover day and of the Passover week, in order to sing about the altar of burnt-sacrifices. Those of the family of Kohath were in the middle, those of Merari on the left, and those of Gershom on the right hand. As the whole business of their lives was the service of the music, it must be supposed that they understood it well; whether it were vocal or instrumental.

The kings also had their particular music. Asaph was chief master of music to David. In the temple, and in the ceremonies of religion, female musicians were admitted as well as males; they generally were daughters of the Levites. Ezra, in his enumeration of those whom he brought back with him from the captivity,reckons 200 singing men and singing women. In 1 Chron. xiv. 20, the Hebrew says, that Zechariah, Azriel and Shimirathoosh presided over the seventh band of music, which was that of the young women.

As to the nature of their music, we can judge of it only by conjecture, because it has been long lost. Probably, it was a mixture of several voices, of which all sung together in the same tune, each according to his strength and skill; without musical counter-point, or those different parts, and that combination of several voices and tunes, which constitutes harmony in our concerts, or compounded music. Probably, also, the voices were generally accompanied by instrumental music. But if we may draw any conclusions in favor of their music from its effects, its magnificence, its splendor, the lofty sentiments contained in their songs, we must allow it great excellence. David, by his skill on the harp, dispelled the melancholy vapors of Saul. Subsequently, Saul having sent messengers to apprehend David at Naioth in Ramah, the messengers no sooner heard the sound of the instruments of the prophets, than they were transported (as it were) by a divine enthusiasm, to engage in the service. Saul sent a second and a third company after them, who did the same; and at last came thither himself, but was equally seized by the divine Spirit, and began to experience prophetic sensations even before he came to the place where the prophets were assembled. The prophet Elisha, finding himself agitated, caused a minstrel to play before him, to calm his spirits into a temper fit to receive the divine message.

The musical instruments of the Hebrews are, perhaps, what has been hitherto least understood of any thing in Scripture. Calmet considers them under three classes: (1.) striangled instruments; (2.) wind instruments, or divers kinds of flutes; (3.) different kinds of drums.

Of striangled instruments, are the nabal, and the psaltery, or psalmeterium, Dan. iii. 5. These three names apparently signify nearly, or altogether, the same thing. They considerably resembled the harp, the ancient cithara, or the asher, or the ten-stringed instrument; both were nearly of the figure: but the nabalum, or psaltery, was hollow toward the top, and played on toward the bottom; whereas the cithara, or ten-stringed instrument, was played on the upper part, and was hollow below: both were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the fingers. The kinnor, or ancient lyre, had sometimes six, sometimes nine strings, strung from top to bottom; and sounded by means of a hollow belly, over which they passed; they were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the finger. The ancient symphony was nearly the same as our viol. The cymbal was a striangled instrument, which was nearly the same, it is thought, as the modern psaltery.

We discover in Scripture various sorts of trumpets and flutes; of which it is difficult to ascertain the forms. The most remarkable of this kind is the ancient organ, in Hebrew uggab; the ancient pipe of Pan, now commonly music. It must be supposed that they understood it well; whether it were vocal or instrumental.

Drums were of many kinds. The Hebrew topah, whence comes tympanum, is taken for all kinds of drums or timbrels. The zalmot is commonly translated by the LXX and the Vulgate, cymbala; instruments of brass, of a very clattering sound, made in the form of a cap, or hat, and struck one against the other, while held one in each hand. Later interpreters by zalmot understand the sistrum; an instrument anciently very common in Egypt. It was nearly of an oval figure, and crossed by brass wires, which jingled upon being shaken, while their ends were secured from falling out of the frame, by their heads being larger than the orifice which contained the wire.

The Hebrew mentions an instrument calledasherim, which the LXX translate cymbala; but Jerome mista. It is found only 1 Sam. xviii. 6. The term asherim suggests that it was of three sides, (triangle... gular,) and it might be that ancient triangular instrument, which carrying on each side several rings together, was worked by a stick, and gave a sharp, rattling sound. The original also mentions mezolithain, which were of brass, and of a sharp sound. This word is usually translated cymbala: some, however, render it tinnitus, little bells, which is contemnented by Zechariah xiv, 20, which says, the time shall come when on the mezolath of the horses shall be written, "Holliness to the Lord!" We know that bells were anciently worn by horses trained for war, to accustom them to noise.

MUSTARD-Take. The description which our Lord has given of the sinapis, or mustard-tree, in Matt. xiii, 31, 32, and the parallel passages, has given rise to much conjecture. His words are, "A grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field; which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." In order to account for the discrepancy which exists between this representation and the character of the sinapis nigra, or common mustard plant it has been supposed that this may, in the more favorable climates of the East, exceed by far, in its dimensions and strength, that which is found in these colder countries. Lightfoot cites a passage from the Talmud, in which a mustard-tree is said to have been possessed of branches sufficiently large to cover a tent; and Scheuchzer describes and represents a species of the plant several feet high, and possessing a tree-like appearance.

In support of these conjectures, Dr. A. Clarke remarks, "Some soils, being more luxuriant than others, and the climate much warmer, raise the same plant to a size and perfection far beyond what a poorer soil, or a colder climate, can possibly do." Herodotus says, he has seen wheat and barley, in the country of Babylon, which carried a blade full four fingers' breadth, and that the millet and sesamum grew to an incredible size. The doctor states, that he has himself seen a field of common cabbages in one of the Norman isles, each of which was from seven to nine feet in height; and one in the garden of a friend, which grew beside an apple-tree, though the altitude of the place was only about 48 deg. 18 min. north, was fifteen feet high. These facts, and several others, which may be added, fully confirm Dr. Clarke's belief that Sir John Faber's statement of the identity of the wild mustard and the birthwort, which is found to obtain among productions of the same species in different climates and countries; but, then, their distinctive character remains the same; whereas the difference in our Lord's parable implies so essential a difference as, on these principles, to convert an herbaceous plant into a tree, which destroys the identity of its character.

For the purpose of removing these difficulties, Mr. Frost some time since published a work, in which he maintains that the sinapis of the New Testament does not signify any species of the genus we now designate sinapis, but a species of the phytolacea. We shall transcribe some passages from his work, and leave the reader to form his own judgment as to the conclusive nature of the arguments.

"The seed of an herbaceous plant, for such is the sinapis nigra, or common mustard, cannot possibly produce a tree; and however great a degree of altitude and circumference the stem of common mustard might attain, yet it could not afford support for the bowl of the air; even allowing it to grow to the height of eight feet, which it never does."

"Mustard seed is not the smallest of all seeds, as the translation implies, because those of foxglove (digitalis purpurea) and tobacco (nicotiana tabacum) are infinitely smaller; these are herbaceous as well as mustard, (sinapis nigra), and even granting for a moment that the common mustard seed was intended, the above evidence would annul the validity of the translation. This discrepancy has been endeavored to be reconciled by a reference to sinapis crucioides, or shrubby mustard; but even this has not the smallest seed: and allowing, for the sake of argument, that this shrub could, by luxuriance of soil and climate, increase in height and circumference, and throw off large branches, the size of the seed would remain the same, and the smallest of all seeds would not apply."

Among other statements made, as to the size to which the mustard plant will sometimes grow, Mr. Frost notices one which describes that he saw one so large that it became a great bush, and was higher than the tallest man he had ever seen, and that he had raised it from seed. This author readily conceives to be true, but does not consider it as at all explanatory of the subject, because an annual plant, such as sinapis nigra is, cannot become even a shrub, much less a tree. Having thus endeavored to prove that the mustard seed of the New Testament is not procured from sinapis nigra, or any species of that genus, he next proceeds to show the identity that exists between kokkon sinapes and phytolacca dodecandra, which he believes to be the dendron meges of the Scriptures: "Phytolacca dodecandra grows abundantly in Palestine; it has the smallest seed of any tree, and obtains as great, or even greater, altitude than any other in that country, of which it is a native."

"Common mustard is both used for culinary and medicinal purposes; so are several species of phytolacca. It is rather remarkable, that the acridity of the latter induced Limnæus to place that genus in the natural order Pipérace, whilst De Jussieu referred it to the family Apcilicace, which certainly bears out its edible and aerial properties. The North American phytolacca americana, or pokeweed (gardeners by the name of American pokeweed) wild mustard, Murray, in his Spermatiace Medicae, enters into a long history of the excellent quality of the young shoots; but remarks, that when mature, they cannot be used. They contain, as the green-willow, a species included in the Materia Medica, refers to the same circumstances. Its being edible, may be inferred from the Greek term lachanon, which occurs Matt. xiii. 32, and Mark iv. 32."

"Mustard seed is applied externally, as a stimulant, in the form of a snupium; and the foliage of phytolacca dodecandra was used as an outward application to cancerous tumours."

"Of the acrid qualities of phytolacca dodecandra there can be no doubt; so that there appears a very strong analogy between the effects and properties of this genus, sinapis and phytolacca; but I must observe, that I have ascertained the existence of a fourth ultimate chemical element, nitrogen, in the seed of a species of phytolacca. Nitrogen was said only to exist in plants belonging to the natural orders Cruciferae and Fungi, in the former of which the common mustard, sinapis nigra, is placed."

Mr. Frost then proceeds to sum up his argument, showing that the phytolacca dodecandra is the tree mentioned in the Gospels from the following circumstances:

"Because it is one of the largest trees indigenous to the country where the observation was made; because it has the smallest seed of any tree in that country; because it is both used as a culinary vegetable and medicinal stimulant, which common mustard is also; because a species of the same genus is well known in the United States, by the term wild mustard; because the ultimate chemical elements of the seed sinapis nigra and phytolacca dodecandra are the same."

In conclusion, the author adds the generic characters of the two vegetables, by which they are seen, botanically, to be very distinct families.

We must here express our regret that Mr. Frost should have thought it unnecessary to furnish a proper authentication, from the writings of accredited eastern travellers, of the various statements he has made relative to the phytolacca dodecandra.

MYNODUS, a maritime city of Caria, 1 Mac. xv. 23.

MYRA, a town of Lycia, where Paul embarked for Rome, on board a ship of Alexandria, Acts xxv. 5. and iii. 19.

MYRRH, MYRRA, a gum yielded by a tree common in Arabia: which is about five cubits high; its wood hard, and its trunk thorny. Scripture notices two kinds, one which runs of itself, without incision; the other a kind which was employed in perfumes, and in embalming, to preserve the body from corruption. The Magi, who came from the East to worship Christ, offered to him myrrh, Matt. ii. 11.

In the Gospel (Mark xv. 23.) is mentioned myrrh and wine, or wine mingled with myrrh, which was offered to Jesus previous to his crucifixion, and intended to deaden in him the anguish of his sufferings. It was a custom among the Hebrews to give such kind of stupefying liquors to persons who were about to be capitally punished, Prov. xxxi. 6. Some have thought that the myrrhèd wine of Mark is the same as the "wine mingled with gall" of Matthew; but others distinguish them. They suppose the myrrhed wine was given to our Lord from a sentiment of sympathy, to prevent him from feeling too sensibly the pain of his sufferings; while the potion mingled with gall, of which he would not drink, was given from cruelty. Others, however, think the word myrrha, writing in Syriac, used the word mawra, who himself discoursed of gall, in which, which the Greek translator took in the sense of gall, and Mark in the sense of myrrh. Wine mingled with myrrh was highly esteemed by the ancients.

MYRTLE, a beautiful evergreen tree, growing wild throughout the southern parts of Europe, north of Africa, and temperate parts of Asia; principally on the sea-coast. The leaves are of a rich and polished green; the flowers white, with sometimes a tinge of red externally; and the berries are of the size of a small pea, violet or white, sweetish, and with the aromatic flavor which distinguishes the whole plant. These are eaten in the Levant, Isa. xii. 19; lv. 13; Zechar. i. 8, 10, 11. R.

MYRIA, a province of Asia Minor, bounded north by the Propontis; west by the Egean sea; south by Lydia; and east by Bithynia. Paul preached in this country, Acts xvi. 7, 8.

MYSTERY, a secret. All false religions have their mysteries; that is, certain things kept private, not to be divulged, or exposed indifferently to all; but known only to the initiated. The pagans had their mysteries, but they were mysteries of iniquity, shameful mysteries, concealed because their exposure would have rendered their religion contemptible, ridiculous and odious. If men of sense and honor had known that what was called mysteries of certain false deities, they would have abhorred them. (See Bibli. Repository, ii. p. 261.) Scripture often speaks of the infamous mysteries of Astarte, Adonis and Priapus, wherein a thousand infamous actions were practised, and called religion. Baruch speaks of the prostitutions practised in honor of Venus at Babylon, chap. vi. 42, 43. The whole religion of the Egyptians was mysterious; but these pretended mysteries were invented subsequently, to conceal the folly and vanity of it. They could not vindicate, for example, the adoration paid to brutes, but by saying that their gods had sometimes assumed these shapes. In the Maccabees, mention is made of the mysteries of Bacchus, of the ivy imprinted on every one that was initiated therein, and of the garlands of ivy worn by those who assisted at these ceremonies, 1 Mac. vi. 7; 2 Mac. vi. 7. Ass, king of Judah, would not suffer the queen his mother to continue to preside over the mysteries of Priapus, 1 Kings xv. 13. No doubt but they gave abundance of such secret and secret reasons for the worship of Moloch, and for offering human sacrifices to him. It was, perhaps, a pernicious imitation of Abraham's intended sacrifice of Isaac. The Phrygians assigned a reason, not unlike this, for their cruel sacrifices to Hercules and to Saturn.

Taking the term mystery in another sense for typical, or predictive, we may say that the religion of the Jews was full of mysteries; the whole nation was a mystery, according to Augustine: It represented the people of Christ, and the Christian religion. Whatever happened to them, whatever they practised, all that was commanded, or forbidden them, was figurative, according to Paul. Their sacrifices, their priesthood, their purifications, their audience from certain sorts of food, included mysteries which have been explained by Christ and his apostles. The passage over the Red Sea symbolized baptism. The brazen serpent prefigured the cross and death of Christ. Sarah and Hagar, Isaac and Ishmael, denoted the two covenants. The tabernacle and its vessels hinted at the worship of God in the Christian church. The priesthood of Aaron has been admirably explained by Paul of the priesthood of Christ; who himself describes it of himself, that he was being three days in the whale's belly; that of the manna which represented his body and blood; and that of the union of Adam and Eve. The reproduction of the Jews, as to the adorations, were intimated in a hundred passages of Scripture; by Hagar and Sarah, by Ismael and Isaac, by Ephraim and Manasseh, by Saul and David, by Abaslon and Solomon, and even by Moses and Aaron, who were not permitted to enter the land, nor promise the Messianic promises concerning the person, the coming, the character, the death and passion of the Messiah, appear in a multitude of places in the Old Testament; but figuratively and mysteriously. The actions, the words, the lives of the prophets, were a continual and general prophecy, concealed from the people, and sometimes from the prophets themselves, and not explained and discovered till after the birth and death of Christ. These mysteries, too, were dispensed so wisely, that the first served as a foundation for the second, and the succeeding illustrated those that preceded. Daniel is much more explici than the earlier prophets; Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi speak of the coming of the day, and of the priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the calling of the Gentiles, more distinctly than the prophets before them.

The word mystery is also taken for secrets of a higher order, supernatural; for those the knowledge of which God has reserved to himself, or has sometimes communicated to his prophets and friends. Daniel gives to God the name of "reveler of mysteries": he tells Nebuchadnezzar, that only God who reigns in heaven can reveal hidden mysteries, things to come.

Our Saviour says to his disciples, (Matt. xvi. 17,) that they are peculiarly happy, because God has revealed to them the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Paul often speaks of the mystery of the gospel, of the mystery of the cross of Christ, of the mystery of Christ which was unknown to former ages, of the mystery of the resurrection, &c. Mystic Babylon, the great harlot, had written on her forehead, Mysterio, to show that she represented not any particular woman, but a corrupted and idolatrous people.

The mysteries of the Christian religion, as the incarnation of the Word, his hypostatical union with his human nature, his miraculous birth, death, resurrection, ascension, his grace, and the manner of its operation in our hearts, the resurrection of the dead, &c. are objects of faith to all true Christians.

These, then, were called mysteries, the doctrine of the gospel, the tenets of Christianity, and the Christian sacraments; not only because they included secrets which had not been known, if the Son of God and his Holy Spirit had not revealed them, but also because they were not opened indiscriminately to every body; according to the advice of Christ to his apostles, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine." Preachers in their sermons, and ecclesiastical writers in their books, did not fully express themselves on all the mysteries. They said enough to be understood by the faithful; while to the pagans they were secrets, mysteries. This precaution continued long in the church.

The Greek word mystery is expressed by the Latine word sacramentum; denoting the sacraments and mysteries of the Christian church. "God has made known unto us the mystery of his will," his incarnation, his coming, his gospel.

So far Calmet: but the word mystery has been so repeatedly discussed, and the import of it, apparently, so varied, that it has a few additional remarks. What follows is from Mr. Taylor.

We never hear the word mystery, without thinking of the old English term mistrēs: e. g. the mistērio of the Merchant Taylors, the mistērio of the Cordmayers, (cordwainers,) and of other arts and trades. In fact, the term is still currently used in the city of London: "the art and mystery of," occurs in the indentures of apprenticeship, used in most branches of business; meaning, that which may be a difficulty, or even an impossibility, to a stranger, to a novice, to a person only beginning to consider the subject, but which is perfectly easy and intelligible to a master of the business; whose practice, and whose understanding, have been long cultivated by habit and application. Or mystery may be defined a secret: and a secret will always remain such to those who use no endeavors to discover it. We often hear it said, such a person holds such a mode of accomplishing such a business, a secret. Now, imagine one who wishes to know this secret; he labors, strives, &c. but unless he proceed in the right mode, the object still continues concealed: suppose the possessor of this secret shows him the process, teaches him, gives him information, &c. then that secret (mystery) is no longer a mystery to him. And yet he enjoys the discovery, and profits accordingly; while others, not so favored, are as much in the dark respecting this peculiar process, as he was.

Secrets may be considered as various: some are known to a few, but are unknown to the many; some are kept closely a long time, but are revealed in proper season; some are kept entirely, totally, and never are revealed; some are of a nature not to be investigated by us; and some so far surpass our powers, that however familiar their effects may be to our observation, yet their principles, causes, progress, and distributions, exceedingly perplex our understanding, and confine us to probabilities, inference and conjecture. We might instance this in electricity, galvanism, magnetism, attraction or gravitation, &c.

We entertain that this familiar illustration of the word mystery may not be despised because of its familiarity; as we incline to think, that it is not far from a scriptural acceptance of the term. Let us therefore seize its force when applied to the word in the text of 1 Tim. iii. 16. "Great is the mystery, secret, of godliness:" that is, a thing not to be comprehended at first sight; nor until after many reflections, and much consideration. Rom. xi. 32. "I would not have you ignorant of this mystery, that a certain mystery shall come in;" strange indeed, if mystery denoted something utterly incomprehensible and inexplicable, that the apostle should wish them not to be ignorant of it! that he should instantly open to them this mystery! To the Jews, indeed, it was still a secret; and they did not believe that they labored under any blindness at all; while to the apostle, and among his fellow Christians, the mystery was clear and well understood. 1 Cor. xiv. 16. "Behold, I show you a mystery—" we shall not all sleep"—change the phraseology. "Behold, I tell you a secret, we shall not all sleep?" could the apostle mean to show them a thing utterly incomprehensible? 1 Cor. xiii. 2, the apostle speaks of a man's understanding all mysteries; that is, they were easy to be known. But 1 Cor. xiv. 2, he alludes to a man who, discovering in a language foreign to his auditors, may in the Spirit speak mysteries: he may tell all manner of secrets in a foreign language; but while he himself understands perfectly well, and finds all the meaning, and with the fact, yet his subjects of discourse, with all his explanations of those subjects, will continue secrets to such as are ignorant of the language he uses. "We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery," says the apostle; (1 Cor. ii. 7,) that is, the wisdom hitherto kept secret; but now the secret is explained, is let out; not indeed to the princes of the world; to them it is as much a secret as ever; but God by his Spirit hath given us information respecting it, and by that we know and understand it. "Stewards of the mysteries of God," that is, persons intrusted with some of the secrets of God, for the benefit of his church, 1 Cor. iv. 1.

So the saying of the Gentiles separately from the Jews, was a mystery, a secret, which no Jew would have thought of, or would have believed, had not God opened, and explained, and enforced it, by his Spirit, &c.; (Eph. iii. 3—6) nor would any Gentile: it would have remained unknown, unsuspected.
Mystery signifies also an allegory, that is, a mode of information under which partial instruction is given, a partial discovery is made, but there is still a cover of some kind, which preserves somewhat of secrecy: this the person who desires to know the secret thoroughly must endeavor to remove. So the mystery of the seven stars, (Rev. i. 20,) is an allegory representing the seven Asiatic churches under the figure, or symbol, of seven burning lamps. So the mystery, "Babylon the Great, is an allegorical representation of the spiritual Babylon, spiritual idolatry, spiritual fornication, &c. and to this agrees the expression afterwards, "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman;" that is, I will explain to thee the allegory of this figure, Rev. xvii. 5, 7.

We apprehend that, originally, the fathers understood the word in this sense; so the mystery of the sacrament of the Lord's body and blood, is the figurative representation of the Lord's body. But the mysteries among the heathen in time perverted this, and the true idea of the word mystery, into sentiments not merely unspiritual, but unwaranteeable and unwise. It may be proper here to state that the heathen mysteries continued to be performed with great pomp, during the second and third centuries of Christianity; and were not wholly suppressed till the emperor Theodosius closed the temples, more than a hundred years later.

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied, that there are mysteries, in the highest sense of the word, in Nature, Providence and Grace. The union of the human soul and body is a profound secret: the origin of life is a profound secret: the cause, manner, &c. of thought is a deep secret. So are many dispensations of Providence: why goodness should suffer and evil prosper, is a secret: and why one is called and another left, is a secret of secrets, a mystery of grace!

If the ways and works of God are mysteries, we may justly expect to find his attributes, his essence, his perfections, his nature, inescrutable mysteries to us, poor worms of mankind! Could we suppose—pardon the supposition—that God were inclined to instruct us in this, it would be (as we are constituted at present) teaching us a mystery, which we have no faculties capable of learning; it would be speaking to us in a language of which we could never comprehend a word; it would be overwhelming us with too mighty, too extensive, too profound, too exalted, discoveries, unless we were previously endowed with the attributes and qualities of the divine nature; with immensity, infinity, ubiquity, omniscience, eternity, in short, with deity!

Now, since none denies the existence of God, because he cannot comprehend his nature and essence, which is a mystery; so none ought to deny the existence of his power, goodness, wisdom, &c. because they imply the exercise of what is secret to mankind in general: and this principle, which is undeniable in nature, ought to be equally undeniable in religion. In short, what relates to God may, rather must, always include much of mystery. Even the most direct and profound intercourse between the human powers, and their ineffable Creator, mental emotions, prayer and praise, may be secrets, that is, mysterious services, but not, therefore, less devout, or less acceptable.

MYSTICAL. The mystical sense of Scripture is that which is gathered from the terms or letter of various passages, beyond their literal signification. For example, Babylon signifies literally a city of Chaldees, the habitation of kings who persecuted the Hebrews, and who were overwhelmed in idolatry and wickedness. But John, in the Revelation, gives the name of Babylon, mystically, to the city of Rome. So Jerusalem is literally a city of Judahs; but mystically, the heavenly Jerusalem; the habitation of the saints, &c. The serpent is, literally, naturally, a venomous reptile, but mystically is the devil, the old serpent, &c.

NAA

I. NAAMAH, daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain, (Gen. iv. 22,) who is believed to have been a stock of-wool, and of making or enriching cloth and stuffs.

II. NAAMAH, an Ammonites, wife of Solomon, and mother of Rehoboam, 1 Kings xiv. 21.

NAAMAN, a general in the army of Benhadad, king of Syria, who, being afflicted with a leprosy, was cured by washing seven times in the Jordan, agreeably to the command of Elisha the prophet, 2 Kings v. (Comp. Lev. xiv. 7, &c.)

The prophet having refused to receive a present offered to him by Naaman, the latter begged that he might be permitted to carry home two mules' burden of the earth of Canaan, assigning as a reason, that henceforth he would serve no God but Jehovah. It seems that his intention was to build an altar in Syria formed of that holy ground, as he conceived it to be, to which God had assigned the blessing of his peculiar presence, that he might daily testify his gratitude for the great mercy which he had received, that he might declare openly his renunciation of idolatry, and that he might keep a sort of communication, by similitude of worship, with the people who inhabited the land where Elisha dwelt, who had so miraculously cured him. This perverted Naaman's purpose, (Exod. xx. 24,) "An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me;" and it was very credible, that the temporary altars were usually of earth; especially on the high places. To such an altar, apparently, Elisha, after repairing it, added twelve stones, in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, 1 Kings xviii. 31. See, however, another suggestion in respect to this passage, under BAPTISM, p. 148.

Elisha having consented to this request, Naaman again addressed the prophet thus: "In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." And Elisha said to him, "Go in peace." This passage has given rise to many scruple. Many commentators think, that Naaman only asks leave to continue those external services to his master Benhadad, which he had been used to render him, when with which she killed Sisera, is called "nail," gâdâlî; it was formed for penetrating earth, or other hard substance, when driven by sufficient force, as with a hammer, etc. (Isa. ii. 24). So, in Isa. xxxii. 23, the idea is that of strength: "I will fasten him as a nail (mâlî) in a sure place," that is, he shall be strong enough to support whatever is suspended on him. This illustrates an allusion of the prophet Zech. ix. 4. "The Lord hath made (Judah) his flock of sheep, &c. which are naturally timid, as martial as a horse trained to battle; yea, out of Judah shall come the chief for the corner, (a hero,) out of Judah shall come the strong nail, or pike-head, (mâlî,) which shall effect whatever is requisite, by force or strength; out of him shall come the general regenerator, (the commander-in-chief, perhaps,) at once;" meaning, most probably, different ranks of men, (the lower class, the nail, humble but strong; a superior class, the battle-bow,) which, combined in their proper stations, should compose a formidable army. Observe, too, these shall come at once, without much disciplining; without that experience in former wars, which is usually necessary to form the complete military character.

We add Chardin's account of the manner of fastening nails in the East: "They do not drive with a hammer the nails that are put into the eastern walls; the walls are too hard, being of brick; or if they are of clay, they are too mouldering; but they fix them in the brick-work as they are building. They are large nails, with square heads like dice, well made, the ends bent so as to make them cramp-irons. They commonly place them at the windows and doors, in order to hang upon them, when they like, veils and curtains." (Harmer, vol. i. p. 191.)

(2) But we have another word for nails, which seems to imply ornament, rather than strength; or something of dignified stability. So we read, 2 Chron. iii. 9. "The weight of the nails (nâbâqî, mîsarîth) was fifty shekels of gold." These nails, then, being of gold, were used to adorn the holy door, no less than to strengthen it. We have the same word, though varied, in 1 Chron. xxii. 3. David prepared iron in abundance for the nails (mîsarîm, mîsarîm) designed to ornament, no doubt, the leaves of the doors of the sanctuary entrance; for, had the intention been only to fasten these doors, what need of so great a number of nails? Observe how Ezra employs his simile, chap. ix. 8:

"The Lord leaves us a remnant to escape, to give us a nail—not an ornamental nail, not a golden stud, but a gâdâlî, a nail of support in his holy place." Can any thing be less arrogant, than assimilation to such a nail? But the idea of Excl. xii. 11, seems to be the reverse of this: "The words (sayings) of the wise are as goats, as sharp, piercing, penetrating, stimulating; when taken each one by itself; but when combined they are like ornamental nails (mîsarîth) planted in a regular order, and disposed in symmetrical rows, or patterns, as those were in the holy place, or those in the doors of the sanctuary.

This gives also the true import of the expression, Isa. xii. 7: "The image is ready for joining together," that is, the junctures fit accurately to each other, now fix them to each other; and he strengthens it, by driving in ornamental nails, nails of the best kind, (mîsarîm,) or, at least, flat-headed nails, not brads; that it should not start, be separated, fall to pieces.

This is very different from the usual notion of the passage, but is supported by Jer. x. 4: "They deck the image with silver and with gold; with ornamental nails, (mîsarîth,) and with piercings; they bind it tightly together, openworked, brazen; it is given to the whole a delicate cost of paint, for complete decoration;" as we know was customary in early antiquity.

NAIM, a city of Palestine, where Jesus restored a widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Euæbusius says, it was in the neighborhood of Endor and Scythopolis; and elsewhere, that it was two miles from Tabor, south. The brook Kiahon ran between Tabor and Naim.

NAIOTH, a town near Ramah, where David withdrew to avoid the violence of Saul; and where Samuel, with the sons of the prophets, dwelt, 1 Sam. xix. 23.

NAKEDNESS. This term, besides its ordinary and literal meaning, sometimes signifies, void of decor, disarmed. So, after worshipping the golden calf, the Israelites found themselves naked in the midst of their enemies. "Nakedness of the feet was a token of respect. Moses put off his shoes to approach the burning bush; most commentators are of opinion, that the priests served in the tabernacle and temple with their feet naked; which idea is countenanced by the fact, that in the enumeration that Moses makes of the habit and ornaments of the priests, he nowhere mentions any dress for the feet. Some also maintain, that the Israelites might not enter this holy place, till they had put off their shoes, and cleaned their feet. (See Eccles. v. 1.)" "Nakedness of the feet" sometimes expresses what delicacy would conceal, Lam. 1. 9.

"Nakedness" should in many places be understood as our word undressed—not fully, or properly, or becomingly clothed. A king having on his under-clothing, is undressed, that is, naked, for a king; though his garb might suit a laborer. When the apostle says, (1 Cor. iv. 11.) "To this present hour we are naked," he does not mean absolute nakedness, in the same sense as Job says, (i. 21.) "I am made naked out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return," but he means unprovided with suitable clothing. To the same effect, a nation, or people, is said to be made naked; (Exod. xxxii. 25; 2 Chron. xxviii. 19.) "As made Judah naked;" unprovided with means of resisting the enemy. So the walls of Babylon are said to be made naked; (Jer. l. 58.) that is, stripped of their towers and other defences; and a tree in the wilderness is described as naked, deprived of its verdure, its foliage, Jer. xvii. 6, in warm countries slight clothing, or even nakedness, is more endurable than with us; but when nakedness is put absolutely, it usually intends a shameful discovery of the person; ruthless privation of necessaries, degradation, misery.

"Naked" is put for discovered, known, manifest. So Job xxvi. 6. "He is naked before him;" the sepulchre, the unseen state, is open to the eyes of God. Paul says in the same sense, "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and open unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do." Heb. iv. 12.

The nakedness of Adam and Eve was unknown that is, unfelt; they were unconscious of it, before they sinned. They were not ashamed at it, because concupiscence and irregular desires had not yet excited the flesh against the spirit. They were exempt from whatever indecency might now happen among their descendants on occasion of nakedness.

NAME. "The name," without any addition, sig-
To give a name is a token of command and authority. A father gives names to his children, a master to his slaves, to his animals. It is said, (Gen. li. 25.), that Adam gave name to his wife and to all the animals, and that the names he gave them became their true names. God changed the name of Abram, Jacob and Saul, as a token of honor, and a part of particular regard towards those whom he receives, more especially, into the number of his own. Hence he gave a name, even before their birth, to some persons whom he appointed, and who belonged to him in a particular manner: e. g. to Jedidiah, or Solomon, son of David, to the Messiah, to John the Baptist, &c.

God, speaking to Moses, promises to send his angel before him; and says, "My name is in him," Exod. xxiii. 31. He shall act, he shall speak, he shall punish in my name; he shall bear my name, he shall be my ambassador, he shall receive the same honors as belong to me. And in effect, the angel that spake to Moses, that appeared to him in the bush, that gave him the law on Mount Sinai, speaks and acts always as God himself; and Moses always gives him the name of God: "Thus saith the Lord," and "The Lord spake to Moses," &c.

To know any one by his name, (Exod. xxxiii. 12.) expresses a distinction, a friendship, a particular familiarity. The best lords of the kingdom had little communication with their subjects, and hardly ever appeared in public; so that when they knew their servants by name, vocations to speak to them, to call them, and to admit them into their presence, it was a great mark of honor. In many countries the true personal name of the king is unknown to his subjects; in Japan, to pronounce the emperor's real name is punishable; his general name, as emperor, is held to be sufficiently sacred. Titles often became names, or parts of names; by these titles many sovereigns are known in history; and varying with incidents and occurrences, they occasion great confusion.

Those who in the assemblies were called by their names, (Numb. xvi. 2) were principals of the people, the heads of tribes; or those who had some great employment, or particular dignity.

God, speaking of the fixed place where his temple should be built, calls it "The place which the Lord shall choose to place his name there," Deut. xiv. 2; xvi. 2. There his name should be solemnly invoked; this place should have the honor of bearing the name of the Lord, of being consecrated to his service and worship. These expressions show the veneration of the Hebrews for whatever in any wise belonged to God.

"Name" is often put for renown or reputation. The name of Joshua became famous over all country; (Josh. vi. 27.) and God said to David, when he reproached him with the crime he had committed with Bathsheba, "I have made thee a great name, like unto the name of the great men that are in earth;" (2 Sam. vii. 9.) I have given you honor, reputation, equal to that of the greatest of men.

"To rise up the name of the dead," (Ruth i. 10, &c.) is said of the brother of a man who died without children, when his brother married the widow of the deceased, and revived his name in memory of the children which he might beget; which were deemed to be children of the deceased. In a contrary sense to this, to blot out the name of any one, is to exterminate his memory; to excite his race, his children, works, or houses, and in general whatever may continue his name on the earth, Is. 5; Prov. x. 7.

Isaiah (iv. 1) describes a time of calamity and ruin in Israel, in which men should be very sea he says, "In that day seven women shall take one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by name, to take away our reproach." Take us wives, and let us be called by our names. The king complains in Ezekiel, that his spouses (Judah and Israel) are become prostitutes, though they bore his name; they defiled his holy name by abominable and idolatrous practices.

He often complains that the false prophets prophesied in his name; (Jer. xiv. 14, 15; xviii. 18, and Christ says, (Matt. v. 22.) that in the day of judgment many shall say, "Lord, Lord, have we prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works." He also says, (Mark i. 41.) whatsoever shall gather a troop of cold water in his name, shall not be hated; and he that receives a prophet or a saint, in the name of a prophet or saint shall receive a recompense in proportion to his intention, Matt. x. 41. In all these instances the "name" is put for the person, for his service, for his authority. So names of men are sometimes for persons. Rev. iii. 4. "Thou hast a few names, even the name of his grace, and of his patience; and thou hast left thy first love." And chap. xi. 13, seven thousand men perished in an earthquake,—names of men, Gr. Perhaps this shall be considered as implying many names, person consequent, nobles, &c. It is probable, also, that when we speak of a name, it is to a list or catalogue of names; very credibly, of eminent persons for we find it in Acts ii. 15, expressing the apostles' principal honors of the Christian church—"The number of the names was about a hundred and twenty." T were many thousands of followers of Jesus in Jerusalem; but the apostles, the Seventy and some of enough to make up about the number stated, to the principal honors.

There were certain mysterious nodities come with the names of individuals; hence, in calls musters-roll of soldiers, the sergeant always b with names of good omen, as Felix, Quintus, analogous to our Good-luck, Happy, &c. Also, number comprised in the letters of a name was tories, as that of Antichrist. See that article.

NAOMI, wife of Elimelech, and mother-in-law. See Ruth.

NAPHTALI, the sixth son of Jacob, by Bilhah. Rachel's handmaid, Gen. xxx. 8. We know but particulars of the life of Naphtali. His sons were Jabez, Guni, Jezer and Shillem, Gen. xiv. 24. The patriarch Jacob, when he gave his blessing, said, as the Hebrew Bible has it, "Blessed of the Lord shall he be, and rest of heart; and his good shall be in the land; and he shall dwell in safety." Gen. xxix. 21. For an illustration of this passage, see the article HIND.

NAPHTHUM, the fourth son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. He dwelt in Egypt, and probably peopled that part of Ethiopia, between Syene and Meroe, of which Napata, or Napatae, was the capital.

NARCISSUS, a freedman and favorite of the Roman emperor Claudius, who possessed great influence at court, Rom. xvi. 11.

NATHAN, a famous prophet, who lived under David, and had much of the confidence of that prince, whom he served in a number of ways. (See 2 Sam. xi. xii. &c.) The time and manner of Nathan's death are not known. 1 Chron. xxix. 29, notices that he, with God, wrote the history of David.

There are several other persons of this name mentioned in Scripture; one of them a son of David, 2 Sam. vii. 16.

NATHANAEL, a disciple of Christ, the manner of whose conversion is related John i. 45, &c. He is probably the same as Bartholomew. See Bartholomew.

NATION, all the inhabitants of a particular country (Deut. iv. 34), a country or kingdom, (Exod. xxxiv. 10; Rev. vii. 9) countrymen, natives of the same stock, (Acts xvi. 4.) the father, head, and original of a people, (Gen. xxv. 23) the heathen, or Gentiles, Isa. iv. 5. See Gentiles, or Heathen.

NATURE, in Scripture, expresses the course of things established in the world. So a crime is said to be against nature, because it is contrary to what is established by the Creator, Rom. i. 26; Judg. xix. 24. Paul says, to engraft a good olive-tree into a wild olive, is contrary to nature; (Rom. xi. 24.) the customary order of nature is thereby in some measure inverted. "Nature is also put for natural descent; (Gal. ii. 15; Eph. ii. 3.) and for common sense, natural instinct, 1 Cor. xi. 14. The nature of animals is that by which they are distinguished from other creatures, and from one another, James iii. 7.

Peter informs us that our Saviour has made us partakers of a divine nature; he has merited for us the character of children of God, and grace to practice godliness, which is our Father who is in heaven. (Comp. 1 John iii. 1.)

NAVIGATION was little cultivated among the Hebrews, till the days of their kings: Solomon had a fleet, but he had not sailors equal to the management of it; no doubt, from their want of habit, it is a thing foreign to their nature. And David, it should seem, rather acquired his great wealth by land commerce than by sea voyages. It is not easy to say what assistance the wisdom of Solomon contributed to his fleet and officers on the mighty ocean. Perhaps his extensive knowledge of natural things first suggested the plan of these voyages. We know that Judea had ports on the Mediterranean, as Joppa, &c. but probably the coast, during the days of the judges, was the hands of the Philistines, to the exclusion of Hebrew mariners; and this accounts for the means by which the Philistines, on so narrow a slip of land, could become powerful, and could occasionally furnish immense armies, because they were free to receive reinforcements by sea. In later ages the Greeks and Romans invaded Syria by sea, and the intercourse between Judea and Rome was direct as we learn from the voyage of Paul, &c. Comp. Joppa.

There were also many boats and lesser vessels employed in navigating the lakes, or seas, as the Hebrews called them, which are in the Holy Land; and there must have been some embarkations on the Jordan; but the whole of these were trifling; and it appears, that though Providence taught navigation to mankind, yet it was not the design of Providence that the chosen people, and the denizens of the Messiah, should have been other than a settled or local nation, attached to one country, to which country, and even to certain of its towns, peculiar privileges were attributed in prophecy, and by divine appointment. The legal observances, distinction of meats, &c. were great impediments to Jewish sailors, and prevented their attainment of any great skill in navigation.

NAZARENE, see Nazarene.

NAZARETH, a little town of Zebulun, in lower Galilee, west of Tabor, and east of Potseaia; celebrated for having been the residence of Christ for the first thirty-three years of his life, (Luke ii. 51.) and from which he received the name of Nazarene. After he had begun his mission, he sometimes preached here in the synagogue, (Luke iv. 16.) but because his countrymen had no faith in him, and were offended at the meanness of his origin, he did not stay amongst them, (Matt. xiii. 54, 55.) and fixed his habitation at Capernaum for the latter part of his life, Matt. xv. 13. Nazareth is situated on high ground, having on one side a precipice, from whence the Nazarenes one day attempted to throw down our Saviour, because he upbraided them with their unbelief, Luke iv. 29.

Nazareth is upon the side of a barren, rocky elevation, facing the east, and commanding a long valley, of a round, concave form, and encompassed with mountains. The place is shown where the house of the Holy Virgin stood; but the house itself, say the Catholics, was transported by angels to Loreto! Dr. E. D. Clarke, who describes Nazareth, mentions the village of Sephory, in which is shown the house of St. Anna, the mother of the Virgin Mary, five miles from the town; the fountain near Nazareth, called the Virgin Mary's fountain; the great church, or convent, at that time the refuge of wretches afflicted with the plague, hoping for recovery from the sanctity of the place; Joseph's workshop, converted into a chapel; the synagogue wherein Jesus is said to have preached, now a church; the precipice, whence the inhabitants would have thrown our Lord, concerning which "the words of the evangelist are remarkably explicit;" and it is, probably, the precipice spot alluded to in the text of Luke's Gospel." A stone, that is said to have served as a table to Christ and his disciples, is an object of worship to the superstitions of Galilee.

The following description of Nazareth, and the "brow of the hill" on which it stood, is given by Dr. Jowett, (Chr. Researches in Syria, p. 126, Amer. ed.) "Nazareth is situated on the side, and extends nearly to the foot, of a hill, which, though not very high, is rather steep and overhanging. The eye naturally wanders over its summit, in quest of some point from which it might probably be that the men of this place endeavored to cast our Saviour down, (Luke iv. 29.) but in vain: no rock adapted to such an object appears. At the upper part of the hill is a simple plain, surrounded by low hills, reaching in length nearly a mile; in breadth, near the city, a hundred and fifty yards; but farther on, about four hundred yards. On this plain there are a few olive-trees, and fig-trees, sufficient, or rather scarcely sufficient, to make the spot picturesque. Then follows a ravine, which gradually grows deeper and narrower; till, after passing through another like it, you find yourself in an immense chasm, with steep rocks on either side, from whence you behold, as it were beneath your feet, and before you, the noble plain of Esdraelon. Nothing can be finer than the apparently immensurable prospect of this plain, bounded to the south by the mountains of Samaria. The elevation of the hills on which the spectator stands in this ravine is very great; and the whole scene, when we saw it, was clothed in the most rich mountain-blue color that can be conceived. At this spot, on the right hand of the ravine, is shown the rock to which the men of Nazareth are supposed to have conducted our Lord, for the purpose of throwing him down. With the Testament in our hands, we endeavored to examine the probabilities of the spot; and I confess there is nothing in it which excites a scruple of incredulity in my mind. The rock here is perpendicular for about fifty feet, down which space it would be easy to hurl a person who should be unawares brought to the summit; and his perishing would be a very certain consequence. That the spot might be at a considerable distance from the city, is an idea not inconsistent with St. Luke's account; for the expression, thrusting Jesus out of the city, and leading him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, gives fair scope for imagining, that, in their rage and debate, the Nazarenes might, without originally intending his murder, press upon him for a considerable distance after they had quitted the synagogue. The distance, as already noticed, from modern Nazareth to this spot is scarcely two miles—a space, which, in the fury of persecution, might soon be passed over. Or should this appear too considerable, it is by no means certain but that Nazareth may at that time have extended through the principal part of the plain, which I have described as lying before the modern town; in this case, the distance passed over might not exceed a mile. It remains only to note the expression—the brow of the hill, on which their city was built; this, according to the modern aspect of the spot, would seem to be the hill north of the town, on the lower slope of which the town is built; but I apprehend the word hill to have in this, as it has in very many other passages of Scripture, a much larger sense; denoting sometimes a range of mountains, and in some instances a whole mountains district. In all these cases the singular word "hill," gebel, is used, according to the idiom of the language of this country. Thus, Gebel Carmel, or mount Carmel, is a range of mountains: Gebel Lebanon, or mount Lebanon, is a mountains district of more than fifty miles in length: Gebel rze-Zeitun, the mount of Olives, is certainly, as will be hereafter noted, a considerable tract of mountains country. And thus any person coming from Jerusalem and entering on the plain of Esdraelon, would, if asking the name of that bold line of mountains which bounds the north side of the plain, be informed that it was Gebel Naret, the hill of Nazareth; though, in English, we should call them the mountains of Nazareth. Now the spot shown as illustrating Luke iv. 29, is, in fact, on the very brow of this lofty ridge of mountains; in comparison of which, the hill upon which the modern town is built is but a gentle eminence. I can see, therefore, no reason for thinking other-wise, than that this may be the real scene where the divine Prophet Jesus, experienced so great and so honor from the men of his own country, and of own kindred," R.

NAZARETH, or Nazaréne, may signify, (1.) a native of Nazareth; or a native of that city. A sort of Christians. (3.) A man under a vow to observe the rules of Nazaritehood; whether for whole life, as Samson, and John the Baptist; or a time, as those in Num. vi. 18—22; Amos ii. 11. (4.) A man of distinction and dignity in the court of a prince. (Compare the Bibl. Repository, ii. p. 28.)

(1.) The name of Nazarene is given to Christ, only because of his having lived the greater part of his life at Nazareth, and because that place was considered as his country, but also because the prophets had foretold that he "should be called a Nazarene," Matt. ii. 23. We find no particular place in the prophets, expressly affirming, that the Messiah should be called a Nazaréne; and Matthew only mentions the fact, that the consecration of Nazarites, and their purity, was a type and prophecy referring to the Saviour; (Num. vi. 18, 19) or, that the name Nazarene, separated, given to the patriarch, was the same as in Christ, Gen. ixi. Deut. xxxiii. 29. Jerome was of opinion, that the name stood allus. to Isa. xi. 1; lxxi: "There shall forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots." This branch, or Nesper, and this rod, are certainly intended to denote the Messiah, by the general consent of the others and interpreters. Or, possibly, in a more gen. sense, "He shall be perfected, despised, neglected, every thing was that came from Nazareth; and might be a kind of prophetic proverb.

(2.) It may reasonably be doubted, whether the Nazarenes or Nazarénes spoken of in early ecclesiastical history were heretics: it is more probable, that they were descendants of the original Jewish Christians, as Jews, were no harder treated by those who should have been their Gentile brethren. They must have been well known to Jerome, who lived long in Judæa, and who thus describes them in several places, "The Nazarenes were not Christians: they were called Nazarenes from their country, the ceremonies of the Jewish law, which they joined with the gospel of Christ: They were Jews, but they did not abide the rites of the new law." He also describes the Nazarenes as people of "great regard to the Son of God, born of Virgin Mary," in whom the orthodox believe: who were nevertheless so bigotry to the Mosaic that they were rather to be considered a sect, than a Christian.

(3.) A Nazaréne under the ancient law, was an woman engaged by a vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let the hair grow, to enter any house polluted by having a dead body in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If, in such a case, any one should have died in their presence, they commenced the whole of their consecration and Nazaritehood. This vow generally lasted eight days and sometimes a month, and sometimes during the whole lives. When the time of Nazaritehood expired, the priests brought the person to the seat of the temple, who there offered to the Lord a loaf for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for an expiatory-offering, and a ram for a peace-offering. They offered likewise leaves and cakes, with wine for libations. After all was sacrificed and offered, the priest.
some other person, shaved the head of the Nazarite at the door of the tabernacle, and burnt his hair on the fire of the altar. Then the priest put into his hand a hoarse rooster and a cake, which the Nazarite returning into the hands of the priest, he offered them to the Lord, lifting them up in the presence of the Nazarite. From this time the offerer might drink wine, his Nazarite being accomplished. Perpetual Nazarites, as Samuel and John the Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazarethship by their parents, and continued all their lives in this state, without drinking wine, or cutting their hair. Those who made a vow of Nazarethship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were. The offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses, to be offered at the temple, by themselves, or by others for them, they deferred, till a convenient opportunity. Hence Paul, being at Corinth, having made the vow of a Nazarite, he had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, but deferred the complete fulfilment of his vow till he came to Jerusalem, Acts xviii. 18.

When a person found he was not in condition to make a vow of Nazarethship, or had not leisure fully to perform it, he contented himself by contributing to the expense of the sacrifices and offerings of those who had made, and were fulfilling, this vow; by which means he became a partaker in such Nazarethship. Josephus, magnifying the zeal and devotion of Herod Agrippa, says, he caused several Nazarites to be shaven. Maimonides says, that he who would partake in the Nazarethship of another, went to the temple, and said to the priest, "In such a time such an one will finish his Nazarethship; I intend to defray the charge attending the shaving off his hair, either in part, or in whole." When Paul came to Jerusalem, (A. D. 58, Acts xxii. 23, 24.) James, with other brethren, advised that, to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, he should unite with four persons, who had vows of Nazarethship, and contribute to their charges and ceremonies; by which the people would perceive, that he did not disregard the law, as they had been led to suppose. (4.) Nazarite expresses a man of great dignity; hence the patriarch Joseph is called a Nazarite, a prince, among his brethren; (Gen. xlix. 26.) Engl. trans. a chief prince. Mourners are specified as they were variously understood. Some think it signifies one who is crowned, chosen, separated, distinguished. Yecer in Hebrew signifying a crown. The LXX translate, a chief, or him that is honored. Nazar was a name of dignity, the courts of eastern princes. In the court of Persia, the Nezir is superintendent-general of the king's household, the chief officer of the crown; the high steward of his family, treasures and revenues. (Chardin, Government of the Persians, ch. 5.) In this sense Joseph was Nezir of the house of Pharaoh. Moses also gives to Joseph the title of Nazir, speaking of the tribes of his two sons, Ephram and Manasheh, Deut. xxxiii. 16.

NEAPOLIS, now called Napoli, (Acts xvi. 11.) a maritime city of Macedonia, near the borders of Thrace, whither Paul came from the isle of Samothrace. From Neapolis he went to Philippis.

NEBAJOOTH, a son of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 13; xxviii. 9.) the father of the Nabeathans, (q. v.) a people of Arabia Petraea, who lived by plunder and trade. See B. R. R.

NEBAT, or NABATH, of Ephraim, of the race of Joshua, and father of Jeroboam, the first king of the ten tribes, 1 Kings xi. 36.

I. NEBO, a city of Reuben, (Num. xxxii. 38.) taken by the Moabites, who held it in the time of Jeremiah, Jer. lxviii. 1.

II. NEBO, a city of Judah, (Ezra ii. 29; x. 43; Neb. vii. 83.) probably the village Nebaz, eight miles south of Hebron, which was forsaken in the time of Eusebius and Jerome.

III. NEBO, a high mountain east of the Jordan, where Moses died, and forming one of the mountains of Abarim, Deut. xxxii. 49; xxxiv. 1.

IV. NEBO, an idol of the Babylonians, Isa. xlvi. 1. In the astrological mythology of the Babylonians, this idol probably represented the planet Mercury. He is regarded as the scribe of the heavens, who records the succession of celestial and terrestrial events; and is related to the Egyptian Hermes and Anubis. He was also worshipped by the ancient Arabs. The extensive prevalence of this worship among the Chaldeans and Assyrians, is evident from the many compound proper names occurring in the Scriptures, of which this word forms part; as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzardan, Nebuzaradan, Nebuzaran, and also in the classics, as Naboned, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, &c. See Geniesius, Comm. zu Jesa. ii. p. 342. R.

I. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, or NABUPOLASSAR, father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, was a Chaldean, and was the first monarch of Babylon, who made himself independent of Assyria. See BABYLONIA, p. 138.

II. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, son and successor of Nabopolassar, succeeded to the kingdom of Chaldees, A. M. 3399. He had been some time before associated in the kingdom, and sent to recover Carachemish, which had been wrested from the empire by Necho, king of Egypt. Having been successful, he marched against the governor of Phœnicia, and Jehoiachim, king of Judah, tributary to Necho, king of Egypt. He took Jehoiachim, and put him in chains, to carry him captive to Babylon; but afterwards he left him in Judea, on condition of his paying a large tribute. He took away several persons from Jerusalem; among others, Daniel, Hannaniah, Mishael, and Azariah, all of the royal family, whom the king of Babylon had carefully educated in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, that they might be employed at court.

Nabopolassar dying about the end of A. M. 3399, Nebuchadnezzar, who was then either in Egypt or in Judea, hastened to Babylon, leaving to his generals the care of bringing to Chaldea the captives taken in Syria, Judea, Phœnicia, and Egypt; for, according to Berossus, he had subdued all these countries. He distributed these captives into several colonies, and in the temple of Belus he deposited the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and other rich spoils.

Jehoiachim, king of Judea, continued three years in slavery to Nebuchadnezzar, and then revolted; but after three or four years, he was besieged and taken in Jerusalem, put to death, and his body thrown to the birds of the air, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. See JEROBOAM.

In the mean time, Nebuchadnezzar, being at Babylon, in the second year of his reign, had a mysterious dream, in which he saw a statue composed of several metals; the interpretation of which was given by Daniel, and procured his elevation to the highest post in the kingdom. See DANIEL, and IMAGE OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR.
Jehoiakin, or Jeconiah, king of Judah, having revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, was besieged in Jerusalem, forced to surrender, and taken, with his chief officers, captive to Babylon; also his mother, his wives, and the best workmen of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand men. Among the captives were Mordecai, the uncle of Esther, and Ezekiel the prophet. Nebuchadnezzar also took all the vessels of gold which Solomon made for the temple and the king's treasury; and set up Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's uncle by the father's side, whom he named Zedekiah. Zedekiah continued faithful to Nebuchadnezzar nine years, at the end of which time he rebelled, and confederated with the neighboring princes. The king of Babylon came into Judæa, reduced the chief places of the country, and besieged Jerusalem; but Pharaoh Hopûra coming out of Egypt to assist Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar went to meet him, and forced him to retire to his own country. This done, he resumed the siege of Jerusalem, and was 330 days before the place. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, (A. M. 5418,) the city was taken, and Zedekiah, being seized, was brought to Nebuchadnezzar, who was then at Riblah in Syria. The king of Babylon condemned him to die, caused his children to be put to death in his presence, and then bored out his eyes, loaded him with chains, and sent him to Babylon.

Three years after the Jewish war, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre, which siege lasted thirteen years. But during this interval he attacked the Sidonians, Moabites, Ammonites, and Idumeans, whom he treated much as he had done the Jews. Tyre was taken A. M. 2432. Ithobaal, the king, was put to death, and Baal succeeded him. The Lord, to reward the army of Nebuchadnezzar, which had been so long before Tyre, assigned them to Egypt and its spoils, and they returned in triumph to Babylon, with a vast number of captives.

Nebuchadnezzar, being at peace, applied himself to the adorning, embellishing, and enriching of Babylon with the most magnificent buildings. About this time he had a dream of a great tree, loaded with fruit, which an angel, suddenly descending from heaven, commanded should be cut down, and the branches, leaves and fruit be scattered. The trunk and the root were to be preserved in the earth, and it was to be burned with the chimes of iron and brass, anointed with the beasts of the field, for seven years. The king consulted all his diviners, but none could explain his dream, until Daniel informed him, that it respected himself. "You," says Daniel, "are represented by the great tree; you are to be brought low, to be reduced to the condition of a brute, &c., but you shall afterwards be restored." About a year afterwards, as Nebuchadnezzar was walking on his palace at Babylon, he began to say, "Is not this Babylon the Great, which I have built in the greatness of my power, and in the brightness of my glory?" But he had hardly pronounced the words, when he was struck by a distemper or distraction, which so perverted his imagination, that he thought himself to be metamorphosed into an ox; and assumed the manners of that animal. After having been seven years in this state, God restored his understanding to him, and he recovered his royal dignity.

His repentance, however, was not sincere; for in the year of his restoration, he erected a golden statue, whose height was sixty cubits, in the plain of Dura, in Babylon. Having appointed a day for the dedication of this statue, he assembled the principal officers of his kingdom, and published by a herald, that he should adore it, at the sound of music, on penitential fasts cast into a burning fiery furnace. The Jews, companions of Daniel, would not bend the knee to the image. Daniel probably was absent. Nebuchadnezzar commanded Shadrach, Meshach Abednego to be called, and he asked them why they presumed to disobey his orders. They replied that they neither feared the flames, nor any penalty; that the God whom only they would ship knew how to preserve them; but that they should not think fit to deliver them out of his hands, for they would, nevertheless, obey the laws of God more than men.

Hearing this, the king caused them to be bound, and to be thrown into the furnace, which being hitherto heated, the flame consumed the men and cast them in; but an angel of the Lord abated the flames, so that the fire did not affect them. Nebuchadnezzar was much astonished, and said to his men, "Whence is it that I see four men walking in the midst of the flames? and the fourth is like of God." Then, approaching the furnace, he saw the three Hebrews, who came out of the furnace the greatest astonishment of the whole court. The king now gave glory to the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego; and he exalted the three Hebrews to great dignity in the province of Bab.Dan. iv. 1, &c.

Nebuchadnezzar died this year, A. M. 3442, having reigned 43 years.

Nebuzar-adan, general of Nebuchadnezzar's armies, and chief officer of his household.

Necho, king of Egypt, carried his arms to Euphrates, where he conquered the city of Caesaria. He is known not only in Scripture, but it is said to be a founder of some of the public buildings of the city. He conquered the city of Euphrates, which some think to be Jerusalem. Josiah, king of Judah, being tributary to the king of Babylon, posed Neghe, and gave him battle at Megiddo, and received the wound of which he died; and Necho passed forward, without making any long stay in Judah. Josiah stood at Riblah, in Syria, and sending for Jehoahaz, king of the Jews, he posed him, loaded him with chains, and sent him into Egypt. Then coming to Jerusalem, he set Elkanah, or Jehoiakim, in his place, and exacted tribute of one thousand talents of silver and a talent of gold. Jeremiah (xlvi. 2,) acquaints us, that he was taken and stayed in Egypt. It is said that he was taken to Babylon, in the fourth year of Jehoiachim, in Judah; so that Necho did not retain his crown above four years. Josia adds, that it was Nebuchadnezzar who, pursuing his victory, brought under domination the whole country, between the river Phœnicus and Egypt, excluding Judea. Thus Necho was again reduced within the limits of his own kingdom.

Neginoth, a term which is read before Psalms, and signifies stringed instruments or music, to be played on by the fingers. The title of these Psalms may be translated, A Psalm of David the master of music, who presides over the stringed instruments.

Nehemiah, the son of Hachaliah, was born in Babylon during the captivity. He was, accordi some, of the race of the priests; according to others, of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal family. Those who maintain the former opinion, support it by 2 Mac. i. 18, 21, where it is said, Nehemiah the priest offered sacrifices; and by Esdras x. 10, where he is reckoned in the number of the priests. Those who believe that he was with great reverence, say, (1.) That Nehemiah having governed the republic of the Jews for a considerable time, there is great probability he was of that tribe of which the kings always were. (2.) Nehemiah mentions his brethren Hanani, and other Jews, who, coming to Babylon during the captivity, acquainted him with the sad condition of their country. (3.) The office of cup-bearer to the king of Persia, to which Nehemiah was promoted, is a proof that he was of an illustrious family. (4.) He excuses himself from entering into the inner part of the temple, probably because he was not of the sacerdotal order. This last argument, however, appears to be very inconclusive. As to the Macrecabees, where he is mentioned as a priest, it is unwarranted, that the Greek text does not affirm him to be a priest, but only that he had the respect of the priests to perform their functions. As to his singing among the priests, this he might do in quality of governor, which gave him at least equal rank with the priests. Lastly, the name of Nehemiah is found in no catalogue or genealogy of Hebrew priests. Scripture gives him the name, or title, of Tirathatha, that is, cup-bearer; which office he held at the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus. He had a great affection for the country of his fathers, though he had never seen it; and one day, as some Jews recently come from Jerusalem acquainted him with the miserable state of that city, in its destruction, he fasted, prayed, and humbled himself before the Lord, entreatling that he would be favorable to the design he had conceived of asking the king's permission to rebuild Jerusalem. The course of his attendance at court having arrived, he presented the cup to the king, according to his duty, but with a dejected countenance. The king observed it, and thought he found some evil design; but Nehemiah discovering the occasion of his disquiet, Artaxerxes gave him leave to go to Jerusalem, and to repair its walls and gates; but appointed him a time to return. Nehemiah arrived at Jerusalem with letters and full power; and in the hundred and twenty days that he was there, he opened the occasion of his journey. On the night of the third day he went round the city and viewed the walls. After this, he assembled the chief of the people, produced his commission and letters, exhorted them to unite in doing the praises and works of God, and the walls of the city; and immediately all began the work. The enemies of the Jews only scoffed at them at first, but afterwards, seeing the chief breaches repaired, they used stratagems and threats to deter Nehemiah. He therefore ordered part of his people to stand to their arms behind the walls, while others worked, having also their arms near them. His enemies then had recourse to craft and stratagem, endeavoring to draw him into an ambuscade in the fields, where they proposed to finish their dispute at an amicable conference. Nehemiah, however, defeated all their stratagems, and continuing his work, completed it in fifty-two days. The walls, towers, and gates of Jerusalem having been dedicated with solemnity and magnificence, Nehemiah separated the priests, the Levites, and the princes of the people, into two companies, one of which walked to the south, and the other to the north, on the top of the walls. These two companies, which were to meet at the temple, were accompanied with music, vocal and instrumental. Having entered the temple, they there read the law, offered sacrifices, and made great rejoicings; and the Feast of Tabernacles happening at the time, it was celebrated with great solemnity. Nehemiah now observed that the city was too large for its present inhabitants, ordered that the chief of the nation should there fix their dwelling; and caused them to draw lots, by which a tenth part of the whole people of Judah were obliged to dwell at Jerusalem. Nehemiah then applied himself to the reforming of such corruptions as had crept into public affairs. He curbed the inhumanity of the great, who held in slavery and subjection the sons and daughters of the poor or unfortunate, keeping also the lands, which the poor had mortgaged or sold to them. He also undertook to dissolve the marriages with strange and idolatrous women, whom he sent away; obliged the people punctually to pay the ministers of the Lord their due; and enjoined the priests and Levites to strict attendance on their respective duties and functions. He enforced the observation of the sabbath, and would not permit strangers to enter the city to buy and sell, but kept the gates shut during the whole day. To perpetuate as much as possible these regulations, he engaged the chief men of the nation solemnly to renew their covenant with the Lord; and an instrument to this effect was drawn up, and signed by the chief of the priests and the people. We read in 3 Mac. i. 10, &c. that Nehemiah sent to search for the holy fire, which, before the captivity of Babylon, the priests had hidden in a dry and deep pit: not finding any fire there, but only a thick and muddy water, he sprinkled this upon the altar; and presently the wood which had been so sprinkled, took fire as soon as the sun began to shine, which miracle coming to the knowledge of the king of Persia, he caused the place to be encompassed with walls where the fire had been hidden, and granted great favors and privileges to the priests. It is recorded in the same books, that Nehemiah erected a library, in which he placed whatever he could find, either of the books of the prophets, of David, or of such princes as had made presents to the temple. After having fulfilled his commission, he returned to Babylon, according to his commission from Artaxerxes, about the thirty-second year of that prince; but afterwards he revisited Jerusalem, where he died in peace, having governed the people of Judah about thirty years. The second book, which in the Latin Bible bears the name of Esdras, bears, in the Hebrew and English Bibles, the name of Nehemiah. Its author speaks almost always in the first person; and at first reading one would think he had written it day by day; but if we read it with due attention, we may observe several things which could not have been written by Nehemiah. For example, memorials are quoted, in which were registered the names of the priests in the time of Jonathan, son of Eliashib, and even to the times of Jaddua, who lived under Darius Codomannus, and under Alexander the Great. It is therefore very probable, that Nehemiah wrote memoirs of his government, which are cited 2 Mac. ii. 13, and that from these memoirs this book has been compiled.

NEHILOTH, a word found at the beginning of the fifth Psalm, and which signifies the desert, or desert wastes of the country beyond the wilderness. The title of the fifth Psalm may therefore be thus translated, "A Psalm of David, addressed to the master of musick preceding over the dances, or over the flutes."

NEHUTERAN, a name given by Haschiah king of Judah to the brazen serpent that Moses had set up in the wilderness, (Num. xxi. 8,) and which had been preserved by the Israelites to that time. The superstition of people having made an idol of this serpent, and that Haschiah caused it to be burned, and in division gave it the name of Jehovahesh, q. d. this little brazen serpent, 2 Kings xviii. 4.

NEIGHBOR signifies a near relation, a fellow countryman, one of the same tribe or vicinage; and generally, any man connected with us by the bonds of humanity, and whom charity requires that we should consider as a friend and relation. At the time of our Saviour, the Pharisees had restricted the meaning of the word neighbor to those of their own nation, or to their own friends; holding, that to hate their enemy was not forbidden by the law, Matt. v. 43; Luke x. 30. But our Saviour informed them, that the whole world were neighbors; that they ought not to do to another, what they would not have done to themselves; and that this charity extended even to enemies. See the beautiful parable of the good Samaritan, the real neighbor to the distressed, Luke x. 30.

God is a neighbor near to those who fear him, and call upon him, Ps. xxxv. 8; civ. 18. He gives them tokens of his presence and protection: "Am I a God at hand, and not a God afar off?" Am I one of those gods that men have made not above two days ago? am not I an eternal God? Otherwise, I am a neighbor God, that sees every thing, knows every thing, and not an absent or a distant God, Jer. xxii. 33. (Comp. Elijah and Beel's prophets.)

NEOMENIA, (Col. ii. 16,) a Greek word, signifying the first day of the moon or month; in the Eng. tr. new moon. The Hebrews had a particular veneration for this day of the month, for which Moses appointed peculiar sacrifices, (Num. xxviii. 11, 12,) but he gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy day, nor can it be proved that the ancients observed it so; it was a festival of merely voluntary devotion, as the text renders it. It appears that even from the time of Saul they made, on this day, a sort of family entertainment, since David ought then to have been at the king's table; and Saul took his absence amiss, 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18. Moses insinuates, that besides the national sacrifices then regularly offered, every privater person had his particular sacrifices of devotion, Num. x. 10. The beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at the offering of solemn sacrifices, Idit. But the most celebrated neomenia was that at the beginning of the civil year, and first day of the month Tisri, Lev. xxiii. 24. This was a sacred festival, on which no servile labor was performed. In the kingdom of the ten tribes, the people used to assemble at the houses of the prophets, to hear their instructions, 2 Kings iv. 23; 1 Esd. i. 13, 14. Ezekiel says (xlv. 17;) see also 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. viii. 13,) that the burnt-offerings offered on the day of the new moon, were provided at the king's expense, and that on this day was to be opened the eastern gate of the court of the priests, ch. x. 1, 2.

Spencer has long a dissertation on the neomenia new moons, in which he shows that the Gentiles observed the first day of the month, out of veneration to the moon. He would infer, that the Pharisees in Hebr., who practiced from strange and idolatrous people. But by no means proves this; and it is much more probable that, without any design of imitating the Hebrews, Gentiles thought fit to honor the moon at the beginning of the month, that is, her first appearance.

NERGAL. Among the gods of the transpontine heathen, (2 Kings xvii. 30,) we find some, the etymology of whose names would never lead us to conjecture; but by what image, or figure, they might be represented. The rabbins, indeed, have occasionally used their nature, and sometimes their symbols; and, on that account, rabbinical authority is not always satisfactory. It is hardly to be supposed, that on many subjects present Jewish literati have really any tradition among them: and, in many instances, we hesitate in admitting the accuracy of what we report as traditional information derived from forefathers. Nevertheless, we may consider it as a description of Nergal as an instance either of the correctness or of their judgment. This god, when the prophet Isaiah saw the star, 2 Pet. iv. 8, and to make a pair of the species, Succoth Bzoz, they say, was worshipped as a hen and chick. For this latter conjecture we find no authority; the former seems to be more plausible.

The researches of Gesenius on the subject of astrological mythology of the Assyrians and Babylonians, go to show that the idol Nergal represented planet Mars, which was ever the emblem of his race. Mars is named, by the Zabians and Arabians, 2-fou, seti/fortune. He was represented as being in one hand a drawn sword, and in the other, by hair, a human head just cut off; his garments a blood red; as the light of the planet is also red. His temple among the Arabs was painted red; they offered to him garments sprinkled with blood and also a warrior, (probably a prisoner,) who cast into a pool. It is related of the caliph Hādat that, in the last night of his life, as he observed stars, and saw the planet Mars rise above the horizon, he murmured to himself, "Ah! what have I thas accursed shedder of blood? then is my hour come!" and at the moment the assassins sprung upon him from their hiding place. (Barhebræus, p. 25.)

The name Nergal appears also in the proper names Nergalsharzeru, Nergalsera. This name, in combination of the name of Mergal above mentioned, that this idol was represented under the form of a cock, may have arisen from the fact that in the Talmud the similar word, terngal, signifies cock; or from a Persian etymology proposed by some, viz. ner-gal, i. e. male cock. Gesenius inclines to regard it as a mere etymological synonym. (Comm. zu Jess. ii. p. 344.)

NEITHINIM, given, or offered, servants dedicated to the service of the tabernacle and temple, to perform the most laborious offices; as carrying of wood and water. At first the Gibeonites were destined to this station; afterwards, the Canaanites who sur- rendered themselves, and whose lives were spared, read, in Ezra vii. 20, that the Nethinim were also devoted by David, and other princes, to the service of the temple; and in Ezra ii. 58, that they were slaves given by Solomon: the children of Solomon.
servants. From 1 Kings i. 20, 21, we see that he had subdued the remains of the Canaanites, and it is very probable, that he gave a good number of them to the priests and Levites, for the temple service. The Nicanor who was one of the seven deacons, was, it seems, a Jew, and belonged to the tribe of Judah, and great numbers were placed not far from the Caspian sea, whence Ezra brought 220 of them into Judea, ch. vii. 17. Those who followed Zerubbabel, made up 382, Neh. iii. 36. This number was but small in regard to their offices; so that we find afterwards a solemnity called Xylophoria, in which the people carried wood to the temple, with great ceremony, to keep up the fire of the altar of burnt sacrifices.

NETOPHA, a city and district between Bethlehem and Anathoth, Ezra ii. 22; Neh. vii. 36; Jer. xi. 8; 1 Chron. ix. 16.

NETTLE. There are two words rendered nettle in the English Bible: zvvn, kimah, (Prov. xxiv. 31; Isa. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ix. 6,) about which there is no dispute; and vvrn, chardal, (Job xxx. 7; Prov. xxiv. 31; Zeph. ii. 9,) which we have no means of identifying, but which cannot be a nettle. Mr. Good, after Dr. Stock, translates the passage in Job:

Among the bushes did they bray;
Under the briars did they huddle together, and remarks, "Why Juniper and Tremellius, and Piscator should render 'net' by serico, and our common lection after them by nettle, I know not. In almost every other place in which the word occurs, it is uniformly rendered as it ought to be, thorns, brambles, briers."

NEW is used for extraordinary or unusual. (See Judg. v. 8; Numb. xvi. 30.) God promises a new heaven and a new earth, at the time of the Messiah, (Isa. lxv. 17; xlv. 22,) that is, a universal renovation of manners, sentiments and actions, throughout the world. This passage is also referred to the end of the world; when will commence a new heaven and a new earth; not that the present heaven and earth will be annihilated; but the air, the earth and the elements will be more perfect, or at least, together with the inhabitants, shall be of a nature superior to those vicissitudes and altercations that now affect these elements. God also promises to his people "a new covenant, a new spirit, a new heart;" and this promise was fulfilled in the covenant of grace, the gospel, Ezek. xvi. 10; xviii. 31; xxxvi. 26.

NIBHAZ, a god of the Avim, or Hivites, 2 Kings xvii. 31. The Jewish interpreters say the name means labator, Barker, (from ra,) and affirm that this idol had the shape of a dog. Historical traces have also been found of the ancient worship of idols in the form of dogs among the Syrians. In the Zabian books Nibhaz occurs as the Lord of darkness; which, according to the character of the Assyrian-Chaldean mythology, would point to an evil planetary demon.

I. NICANOR, a general in the armies of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was thrice defeated, and at last slain by Judas Maccabaeus. See ANTIQUUS EPIPHANES.

II. NICANOR, one of the first seven deacons, who were chosen and appointed at Jerusalem soon after the descent of the Holy Ghost, on occasion of a division among the believers, into those who spoke Greek, and those who spoke Hebrew, or Syrac, Acts vi. 5, &c. Nothing particular is known of him.

III. NICANOR, a king of Syria, who ascended the throne A. M. 3854. See DEMETRIUS II.

NICODEMUS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, a Jew by nation, and by sect a Pharisee. He was one of the council, who gave him notice that he must not conceal his belief in the divine character of our Lord. Afterwards, however, he avowed himself a believer, when he came with Joseph of Arimathaea to pay the last duties to the body of Christ, which they took down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in the sepulchre.

NICOLAITANS, see below in NICOLAS.

NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch, that is, converted from paganism to the religion of the Jews. He afterwards embraced Christianity, and was among the most zealous and most holy of the first Christians; so that he was chosen for one of the first seven deacons of the church at Jerusalem, Acta vi. 5.

His memory has been tarnished in the church by a blemish, from which it has not been possible hitherto to clear him. Certain heretics were called Nicolaitans, from his name; and though perhaps he had no share in their errors, nor their irregularities, yet he is suspected to have given some occasion to them. The early writers inform us that he had a wife who was very handsome, and that, in imitation of those who aimed at a high degree of perfection, he left her, to live in a state of continence. Epiphanius says he did not persevere in this resolution, but took to his wife again, and became an opponent of advanced principles contrary to truth and purity. He plunged himself into irregularities, and gave rise to the sect of the Nicolaites, to that of the Gnostics, and to several others, who followed the bent of their natural passions to crimes and wickednesses.

In this statement Epiphanius is supported by Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Hilary, Gregory of Nyssa, Phylaster of Bressa, Jerome, Cassian, Gregory the Great, Piacian, pope Gelasius, Gildas, and several moderns, who say that Nicolas the deacon was the author of the impious and infamous sect of the Nicolaitans. Clemens Alexandrinus, however, who is more ancient than Epiphanius, expresses much esteem for Nicolas, and relates the affair otherwise. The apostles, he says, having reproached Nicolas, as being too jealous of his wife, he introduced her before them, and declared that any one might espouse her that pleased. This declaration, made in pure simplicity, and without reflection, was only designed as a proof that his attachment and passion for his wife did not overcome him; but such as were glad to catch at the pretext of his authority, screened themselves under what he had done, in order to palliate and vindicate their irregularities. These heretics grounded themselves, says Clement, on a word that Nicolas let fall, that "the flesh ought to be abused." By which he meant nothing else, but that we ought to control and suppress our inclinations to sensuality and concupiscence; whereas, these disciples of pleasure explained the words according to their own sensuality, and not according to the meaning of Nicolas. Augustin, Victorinus Petaviansis, Isidorus, and the council of Tours, also acquit him; and the Apostolical Constitutions, and the interpolated letters of Ignatius the martyr, affirm that the Nicolaitans falsely assumed the name of Nicolas, or that they took their rise from another person of the same name.

The Lord (Rev. ii. 6, 15,) condemns the actions and doctrine of the Nicolaitans. He says he hates them; commends the bishop of Ephesus, that he abdicates; and reproaches the bishop of Pergamus that some of his church adopted their doctrine.

In regard to the Nicolaitans, a more probable supposition is, that the appellation is not here derived from a proper name, but is symbolical; and that it refers to the same persons who are said, in Rev. ii. 14, to hold the doctrine of Balaam; since the Greek name Νικολαίτης, Nicolas, corresponds to the Hebrew בָּלַעַם, Balaam, and signifies to overcome, seduce, a people. The allusion, then, would be to false and seducing teachers like Balaam; and refers more particularly, perhaps, to those who opposed the decree of the apostles in Acts xv. 29. (Compare the use of Ἰζεβέλ in Rev. ii. 20.)

I. NICOPOLIS, a city of Ephesus, on the gulf of Ambraecia; where Paul passed his winter, A. D. 64. He wrote to Titus, then in Crete, to come to him bither, Tit. iii. 12. Some are of opinion, that this Nicopolis, however, was not that of Ephesus, but that of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia, near the river Nessus. But the former is the prevailing opinion.

II. NICOPOLIS, a name given to Emmaus, a city of Palestine, under the emperor Alexander, son of Mamæus.

NIDDOU, the lesser sort of excommunication used among the Hebrews. He who had incurred this, was to withdraw himself from his relations, at least to the distance of four cubits. It commonly continued thirty days. If it was not then taken off, it might be prolonged for sixty, or even ninety, days. But if it was extended to six months, the communicant, if he did not give satisfaction, fell into the chereas, which was the second sort of excommunication; and thence into the third sort, called schamnatha, the most terrible of all. See Excommunication, and Anathema.

NIGER, the surname of Simon, (Acts xiii. 1.) who was a prophet and teacher, and one who laid his hands on Saul and Barnabas, for the execution of that office to which the Holy Ghost had appointed them. Some believe he is that Simeon the Cyrenian, who curried the cross of Christ to mount Calvary; but this opinion is founded only on a similarity of names. Epiphanius speaks of one Niger among the seventy disciples of our Saviour.

NIGHT. The ancient Hebrews began their artificial day in the evening, and ended it the next day evening; so that the night preceded the day; whereas it is said, (Gen. i. 5.) evening and morning one day. They allowed twelve hours to the night and twelve to the day; but these hours were not equal, except at the equinox. At other times, when the hours of the night were long, those of the day were short, as in winter; and contrariwise, when the hours of night were short, as at midsummer, the hours of the day were long in proportion. See Hora.

"Night" is put for a time of affliction and adversity, (Ps. xvii. 3; Isa. xxi. 12.) as also for the time of death, (John ix. 4.) for the end of the world, 1 Thess. v. 2.

Children of the day, and children of the night, in a moral and figurative sense, denote good men and wicked men, Christians and Gentiles. The disciples of the Son of God are children of light; they belong to the light, they walk in the light of gospel truths; while children of the night walk in the darkness of ignorance and infidelity, and perform only works of darkness. "Ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night nor of darkness," 1 Thess. v. 5.

NILE, the river of Egypt, whose fountains are in the mountains of Abyssinia towards the north, where it proceeds, and afterwards winds about the east, passing into a great lake, and then running towards the south. It waters the country Alauz, where it has several falls, continues its course far into the kingdom of Goian, then winds about the north, and at last running northward, enters Egypt at the cataracts, where it is made by meeting with rocks, of length of two hundred feet.

After passing these rocks, the Nile flows dire through the valley of Egypt. Its channel, accord to Villamont, is about a league broad. Eight miles below Cairo, it is divided into two arms, which form a triangle, whose base is at the Mediterranean and which the Greeks call the Delta, because of its figure, ∆. These two arms are divided into two which discharge themselves into the Mediterranean whose distance from the top of the Delta is about twenty leagues. These branches the ancients commonly reckoned to be seven mouths, Septempitis Nile. Ptolemy makes them nine; others eight eleven, others fourteen. Others maintain, that there are no more than the mouths of Damiet Rosetta, and of the two canals, one of which passes by Alexandria.

Several have thought that the Nile was the Ganges, one of the four rivers mentioned by Moses, as flowing from the terrestrial paradise. But this opinion is not supported, since the other rivers are far from the Nile. Yet the inhabitants of the kingdom of this river Gihan. The Abyssinians call it Ab Euchi, Abay, or the father of riv. The negroes call it Tam. Homer, Diodorus Siculus and Xenophon testify, that its ancient name was Egyptus; and Homer mentions it by no other name, but as Diodorus says, it took the name of Nilus, after the Nile of Egypt, called by that name. Pliny relates, that opinion of king Juba, who affirmed, that the Nile had its source in Mauritania; that it appeared disappeared in different places, first hiding itself under ground, and then showing itself again; in this country it was called Niger, and in Edith it had the name Astapus; that about Meroë it was divided into two arms, of which the right was called Astapus, and the left Astabrous: and lastly, it obtained the name of Nile only below Meotis, Plutarch, Dionysius the geographer, and others, testify that it was also named Siris. Diothus says, that the Ethiopians call it Siris, and after it passes Syene, it has the name of Nilus. Scripture the Nile has seldom any other name than the Nilus; excepting the name Astapus, given to the river by the name Schihor, or the river of troubled water. "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Schihor?" says Jeremiah. (But Simon.) The Greeks give it the name of Meotis, which also signifies black, or troubled. And the travellers inform us that the water of that river generally something muddy, but it is easily fined throwing into it some almonds or skinned beur Sorous, explaining that verse of Virgil, where, speaking of the Nile, he says, Ex viridi Egyptum nigrae succundat arena.

Georg. iv. 290 observes, that the ancients called the Nile, M Melo in Hebrew signifies fall, which may well agree with the Nile, because of its great floods, which come for about six weeks in the heat of summer, overflow Egypt.
Diodorus Siculus observes, that the most ancient name by which the Grecians knew the Nile, is Oceania. It had also the name of Aigle, afterwards of Aegyptus, and lastly of Nilus, from king Nileus. The Egyptians paid divine honor to the Nile, and called it the father Nilus; for the river sometimes threatens to render the river of Egypt, to dry it up, and kill its fishes; as it were to show the Egyptians the vanity of their worship, and the impotence of their pretended deity. Isa. xi. 15;
Ezek. xxiv. 3, &c.

Scripture, marking the limits of the Land of Promise, sometimes puts the river or the stream of Egypt for its southerly limits: “From the entering in of Hamath unto the river of Egypt,” 2 Chron. vii. 8. Or “from the channel of the river (Euphrates) unto the stream of Egypt.” Isa. xxvii. 12. Some interpreters, however, justly doubting whether the dominion of the Israelites extended to the Nile, have properly supposed that the stream of Egypt was a stream that fell into the Mediterranean sea, between Rhinocorura and Gaza, which is called in Scripture the river of the wilderness, Amos vi. 14. See EoRT, RIVER OF.

The Arabians and other orientals often give the Nile the name of a sea, and the surname or epithet of Fadha, which is common also to the Euphrates, because these two rivers, by their overflowing, increase the fertility of the countries they pass through. They also give it the name of Mobarak, blessed, as well on account of the fructification it occasions to the land, as the fecundity it is thought to procure to the women.

When the Nile rises only to the perpendicular height of twelve cubits, a famine necessarily follows in Egypt; for the famine less certain, if it should exceed sixteen cubits; so that just the height of the inundation is between twelve and sixteen cubits.

The Nilometer is a pillar erected in the middle of the Nile, on which are marked degrees measuring the ascent of the water. There were several of these in different places. At this day there is one in the island which divides the Nile into two arms, one of which passes to Cairo, and the other to Giza.

M. d’Herbelot notices several others, built or repaired by the Egyptians, and even by the Greeks.

The Nile rises usually in the month of August, in the higher and middle Egypt, where it hardly ever rains. But in lower Egypt the flood is less sensible and less necessary, because it frequently rains there, and the country is supplied with much water. It is less sensible, because they make fewer dikes, or receptacles for the water there, and the inundation spreading itself equally over the country, does not rise higher than a cubit through the whole Delta. Whereas in higher and middle Egypt, they have deep canals, to receive the waters of the river. They make a breach in these dikes by authority of the pacha, and when one district is sufficiently watered, the dike is stopped up, and another opened. The Egyptians have often contentions, as they are against village, which shall have the first distribution of the waters; and when the overflowing comes as they desire, they celebrate a great festival throughout the country.

When the waters are subsided, the culture of the land is easy. The seed is cast on the mud, and with little tillage produces great plenty. The mud which the Nile brings is earth washed away from the banks in its course; which same mud, covering the landmarks and furrows of the fields, obliges the proprietors to have recourse to the line and the measuring rod, to measure out their lands and inheritances every year anew. See EoRT, p. 370, 371.

"Some descriptions of Egypt would lead us to think that the Nile, when it swells, lay the whole province under water. The lands adjoining immediately to the banks of the river, however, are not under water, but the natural inequality of the ground hinders it from overflowing the interior country. A great part of the lands would therefore remain barren, were not canals and reservoirs formed to receive water from the river, when at its greatest height, which is thus conveyed every where through the fields, and reserved for watering them, when occasion requires." (Niebuhr’s Travels, vol. i. p. 87.)

"It is to be remarked, that though this water becomes thick, by washing off the clayey soil over which it passes, it appears, when drunk, as light and limpid as the clearest; the Egyptians themselves believe it is nourishing, and say, whoever drinks of the river will never remove to any great distance from its banks. The divine honors which the ancient Egyptians paid to the Nile, and for which the plenty it occasions may be some justification, are, in a manner, still preserved under the Mahometans; they give this river the title of Most Holy, they likewise honor its increase with all the ceremonies practised by pagan antiquity." (Baron du Tott, vol. ii. p. 24. part 4.)

The superior veneration paid to the eastern or Abyssinian branch of this celebrated river appears from the variety of names given to it, as well as from the import of these names; of this Mr. Bruce gives a full account, from which we shall only quote a part. By the Agows it is named Gzeir, Geea, or Seir; the first of which terms signifies a god. It is likewise called Ab, father; and has many other names, all implying the most profound veneration. In Gojam it is named Abay, which signifies overflowing. By the Gongas, on the south of mount Dyre and Tagia, it is called Dabhi; by those on the north, Kessa, both of which imply dog-star. Formerly the Nile had the name of Siris, both before and after it enters Beja, which the Greeks imagined was given to it on account of its black color during the inundation; but Mr. Bruce assures us that the river has no such color. The name given by the negroes, in the month of April, in the middle of August, and in the month of November, in the higher Egypt, is Bahar el Mo-lech, or the Salt sea. The junction of the three great rivers, the Nile, flowing on the west side of Merœi; the Tacazze, which washes the east side, and joins the Nile at Maggiran, in north latitude 17 degrees; and the March, which falls in this last something above the junction, gives the name of Triton to the Nile. The ancient name Egyptus, given it in Homer, is supposed to have been derived from its black color; but Mr. Bruce derives it from Y Gyps, the name given to Egypt in Ethiopia, that is, the country of canals.

We also quote from Mr. Bruce what he has said concerning the natural operation by which the tropical rains are produced; which are now universally allowed to be the cause of the annual overflowing of this and other rivers. "The air is so much raised by the sun, during the time he remains almost stationary over the desert, that the winds loaded with vapors rush upon the land from the Atlantic ocean on the west, the Indian ocean on the east, and the cold Southern ocean beyond the Cape. Thus a great quantity of vapor is gathered, as it were, into a focus; and as the same causes continue to operate during the progress of the sun northward, a vast train of clouds proceeds from south to north, which is sometimes extended much farther than at other times. In April all the rivers in the south of Abyssinia begin to swell, and greatly augment the Nile, which is further enlarged by the vast quantity of water poured into the lake Tana. In the beginning of June the rivers are all full, and continue so while the sun remains stationary in the tropic of Cancer. This excessive rain, which would sweep off the whole soil of Egypt into the sea, were it to continue without interruption, begins to abate as the sun turns southward; and on his arrival at the zenith of each place, on his passage towards that quarter, they cease entirely. Immediately after the sun has passed the line, he brings the rainy season to the southward. There are three remarkable appearances attending the inundation of the Nile. Every morning in Abyssinia is clear, and the sun shines. About nine a small cloud, not above four feet broad, appears in the east, white or even visibly round on an axis; but, arrived near the zenith, it first abates its motion, then loses its form, and extends itself greatly, and seems to call up vapors from all the opposite quarters. These clouds, having attained nearly the same height, rush against each other with great violence. The air, impelled before the heaviest mass, or swiftest mover, makes an impression of its form on the collection of clouds opposite; and the moment it has taken possession of the space made to receive it, the most violent thunder possible to be conceived instantly follows, with rain: after some hours the sky again clears, with a wind at north, and is always disagreeably cold when the thermometer is below sixty-three degrees. The second thing remarkable is the variation of the thermometer. When the sun is in the southern tropic, thirty-six degrees distant from the zenith of Gondar, it is seldom lower than seventy-two degrees; but it falls to sixty degrees, and sixty-three degrees, when the sun is at the pole. This is happily done to approach of rain compensate the heat of a too scorching sun. The third is that remarkable stop in the extent of the rain northward, when the sun, that has conducted the vapors from the line, and should seem now more than ever to be in possession of them, is here overruled suddenly; till, on his return to Gorri, again it resumes the absolute command over the rain, and reducts it to the line, to furnish distant deluges to the southward. The river, passing through the kingdom of Beunmar, the soil of which is a red bosc, becomes colored with that earth; and this mixture, along with the moving sand of the desert, of which it receives a great quantity when raised by the wind, precipitates all the viscous and putrid matters which float in the waters; whence Dr. Pococke judiciously observes, that the Nile is not wholesome when the water is clear and green, but when so red and turbid that it stains the water of the Mediterranean.

"This is remarkable of Nilius: (1) That it begins to increase and decrease on a certain day precisely. (2) That when it first increases it grows greatly in a day and a half; and appears red; and (3) that as it lengthens its channel sometimes. The day which it begins to increase is yearly the twelfth of June, on which day they observe the feast of Michael the archangel:—on this day the drops now these drops are nothing else, according to judgment of the inhabitants, but the blessings of God. As soon as this dew is fallen, water begins to be corrupt, and assumes a green color; this color increases more and more, till river appears as a lake covered all over with m The color is to be seen not only in its great channel, but also in all the ponds and branches that come from thence: only the cisterns keep the water pure. Some years this green color continues about two days, and sometimes more, but never above five. The Egyptians call this time, when the river green, it chedurapid, for they suffer much, because the water is corrupt, without taste, and unwholesome; and good water is very rare. As soon as green color is gone, the river Nilius begins to come red, and very dark; the wine or the fermentation is passed, and that the water is the Ethiopia are arrived in Egypt, which are of color, because of the red earth which the rivers torments fro1n the mountains carry into the river; and it is also found that the water becomes very black, should give it that color. In the year 1673, in the beginning of July, the water being red, and so continued till the end of December the time when the river returns to its ordinary channel. The Egyptians believe that the Nilius decreases also at a certain day, Sept. 21.

The waters of this river cause an itch in those which trouble those who drink from them when they increase. This itch is very small, and appears about the arms, on the stomach, and on all the body, which causes a grievous pain. This itch comes not only upon such as drink on river; but such as drink of the waters of the cist filled with the river water. It lasts about six weeks. When the river runs over, it makes a great devastation; it carries away not only great pieces of bank, but destroys sometimes towns and villages near to it."

The prophet Nahum calls this river by the name oes, which signifies the rampart of poppy. No, which he says, was the sea, and her wall from the sea. This may appear very extraordinary to British readers, but the account of Ibn Hisnou who uses the same phraseology, will justify it. Thus writes: (Sir W. Ouseley's trans. p. 34.) that this sea is the islands, to which one may pass boats or vessels. Of these islands are Teneis Dainia. In each of these, agriculture is practicable, and cattle are kept; and the kind of clothes called cera comes from these places. "The waters of these islands are not very considerable, and vessels move by them one after the other. . . . From the borders of sea, to those of the sea of Syria, it is all sand." In these passages the mouths of the Nile, the is adjacent to them, the marshes, &c. appear to called seas in the Arabic; as such collections water also are in the Hebrew.

"The Nile," says Ibn Haukail, (Sir W. Ouseley trans. p. 31,) produces crocodiles, and the sekenkou; and there is also a species of fish called, which if any person take in his hand while alive, that person will be afflicted by a trebling of his body: when dead this fish resembles other fishes. The crocodile's skin is so hard, that it resists the blows of all weapons when stricken on the back; they therefore wound him under the arm-pits and between the thighs. The sekenkour is a species of that fish, (the crocodile,) but the crocodile has hands and feet: and they use the sekenkour in medicinal and culinary preparations."

It deserves notice that the crocodile is here reckoned a fish, though it is, as we well know, a lizard; and the sekenkour, or skinkore, or skink, of European naturalists, is referred to the same genus, that is, of fishes, though that also is a lizard, is amphibious, and is found in various countries of the East. It appears that the ancient Hebrews also included lizards in the division of Taninim, which comprised not only fishes but amphibilia; creatures using the water, generally; and even serpents. The crocodile, therefore, being called a fish by this Arab writer, we need not hesitate to admit the same idea among the learned Hebrews.

NIMRAH, BUST-NIMRAH, house of limpid waters, and NIMRAB, a city of Gad, or rather of Reuben, east of the Dead sea, Numb. xxxii. 3. Jeremiah (xlviii. 34.) speaks of Nimrum and its pleasant waters; Isaias (xxv. 6.) also mentions the waters of Nimrim. (Burckhardt mentions the ruins of Minara, probably the same as the ancient Nimruch, or Nimrums, as being on the eastern side of the Dead sea, towards its northern part. (Trav. in Syria, &c. p. 381.) *R. NIMROD, son of Cush, "and a mighty hunter before the Lord." His hunting was not only of wild beasts, but also to subdue men, to reduce them under his dominion. Ezekiel (xxxii. 30. Fage,) gives the name of hunters "against all tyrants. The foundation of the empire of Nimrod was at Babylon; and, very probably, he was among the most eager undertakers of the tower of Babel. He built Babylon as, or near, that famous tower, and from thence he extended his dominion over the neighboring countries, and Erech, Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. Moses adds, according to the English version: "Out of that land went forth Ashur, and built Nineveh, and the city Rechaboth, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah; the same is a great city." This Bochart and others understand still of Nimrod, and translate, "From this place he went out to go into Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rechaboth, Calah, and Resen." This is when Nimrod had established the beginning of his empire at Babylon, and in the land of Shinar, he advanced towards Assyria, where he built powerful cities, as so many fortresses, to keep the people in subjection. Comp. Assyria, p. 113, col. 2.

Many interpreters regard Nimrod as the same with Belus, founder of the kingdom of Babylon, and with Ninus, founder of that of Nineveh. (See Assyria, p. 113, Babylonia, p. 130.) Profane authors have embellished the history of Baccus with several circumstances taken from that of Nimrod. The name Nebrodeus, or Nebrodus, given to Baccus, is perhaps derived from Nebemrh, or Nimrod, though the Greeks derive it from a goat-skin, with which they pretend Baccus was clothed. The name Baccus may also be derived from Bar-chus, "son of Cush" because Nimrod was indeed the son of Cush. The Greeks gave to Baccus the name of hunter, just as Moses gives it to Nimrod. The expeditions of Baccus into the Indies are formed on the wars of Nimrod in Babylonia and Assyria. Most of Baccus is imputed the invention of idolatrous worship paid to men.

NINEVEH, the capital of Assyria, was founded by Assur, son of Shem; or more probably by Nimrod, son of Cush; or in Gen. x. 11, Moses seems to refer to Nimrod, mentioned above. However this may be, Nineveh was one of the most ancient, famous, potent and extensive cities of the world. It is very difficult to assign the time of its foundation; but it cannot have been long after the building of Babel. It stood on the banks of the Tigris; and in the time of the prophet Jonah, who was sent thither under Jeroboam the second, king of Israel, and, as Calmet judges, under the reign of Pul, father of Sardanapalus, king of Assyria; its circuit was three days' journey. Diodorus Siculus says, it was 150 stadia in length, 90 stadia in breadth, and 480 stadia in circuit; that is, about seven leagues long, three leagues broad, and eighteen leagues round. Its walls were a hundred feet high, and so broad, that three chariots could drive abreast upon them. Its towers, of which there were fifteen hundred, were each two hundred feet high.

Some place it on the west, others on the east, bank of the Tigris. At the time of Jonah's mission, (Jonah iv. 11.) it was reckoned to contain more than 120,000 persons, "who could not distinguish their right hand from their left?" that is, young children. By this computation, there ought to have been then in Nineveh more than 12,000 persons, which is impossible.

Nineveh, which had long been mistress of the East, was first taken by Arasses and Blesias, under the reign of Sardanapalus, in the time of Abaz, king of Judah, about the time of the foundation of Rome, A. M. 3257. It was taken a second time by Cyzares and Nabopolassar, from Chaldaed, king of Assyria, A. M. 3378, after which it no more recovered its former splendor. It was entirely ruined in the time of Lucian of Samosata, who lived under the emperor Adrian. It was rebuilt under the Persians, but was destroyed by the Saracens about the seventh century.

Profane histories say, that Ninus founded Nineveh. The sacred authors make frequent mention of Nineveh and its kings, Tiglath-pileser, Sennacherib, Shalmaneser, and Esar-haddon. Tobit lived in this city. Nahum and Zephaniah foretold its ruin in a very particular and pathetic manner, which Tobit repeated. The behavior of Jonah at Nineveh is well known: he was received with great repentance of the Ninevites, which is even commended in the gospel, Matt. xi. 41; Luke xi. 32.

Several writers are of opinion that the ruins on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite to the town of Mosul, point out the site of the ancient Nineveh. Mr. Rich, who was resident at Bagdad, describes on this spot an enclosure of a rectangular form, corresponding with the cardinal points of the compass, but the area of which is too small to have contained a larger town than Mosul. The boundary of this enclosure, which he supposes to answer to the palace of Nineveh, may be perfectly traced all around, and looks like an embankment of earth or rubbish, of small elevation; and has attached to it, and in its line, at several places, mounds of greater size and solidity. The first of these forms the south-west angle; and on it is built the village of Nebbi Yunus, where they show the tomb of the prophet Jonas. The next, and largest of all, is the one which Mr.
Rich supposes to be the monument of Noah, and is situated near the centre of the western shore, being joined like the others by a boundary wall; the natives call it Koyunjuk. Its form is that of a truncated pyramid, with steep sides and a flat top; and is composed of stones and earth, the latter predominating sufficiently to attain the height of the village of Koyunjuk, which is being its north-east extremity. The measurements of the mound were 178 feet for the greatest length, 116 feet for the breadth north and south. Out of the north face of the boundary wall was dug, at some time which were sculptured the figures of men and animals; so remarkable was this fragment of antiquity, that even most of the principal people of Mosul came out to see it. One of the spectators particularly recollected among the sculptures of this stone, the figure of a man on horseback, with a long lance in his hand, followed by a great many others on foot. These ruin on foot seem to attest the former existence of some extensive buildings on the spot, but whether belonging to the ancient Ninevites will admit of considerable doubt.

NISAN, a Hebrew month, partly answering to our March; and which sometimes takes from February or April, according to the course of the moon. It was the seventh month of the civil year; but was made the first month of the sacred year, at the conclusion of the night of Egypt, Exod. xxi. 2. In Moses it is called Abib. The name Nisan is only since the time of Ezra, and the return from the captivity of Babylon.

See the Jewish Calendar, and Months.

NISROCH, or NISROCH, a god of the Assyrians, and the LXX. call him Nisrac; Josephus, Arabeus; and the Hebrews of Tobit, published by Munster, Dogon. [According to the etymology, the name would signify eagle. Among the ancient Arabs, also, the eagle occurs as an idol. (See Genealogue, 3d."

NITRE, a sort of salt, or of salt-petre, a mineral alkali, common in Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt. The Hebrews call it Nether, and use this word to express a salt proper to take spoons out of cloth, and even from the niter, and 1 Tim. xxi. 20. 30.) a he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre; so is he that singeth songs to a heavy heart." That is, he makes bad worse who deprives the shivering wretch of a garment in cold weather; so also he who singeth songs to a heavy heart: vinegar poured on nitre makes a great ebullition; merriment, jollity and song are equally out of time, unsuiting, unsuitable to a mind overwhelmed with profound grief. Jeremiah, speaking to his people under the necessities of a faithless and abandoned spouse, says, "Though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thin inequity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." Thou art too much polluted in my eyes ever to be made clean. This passage proves the use of nitre, to purify from outward spots and blennishes. The nitre common among us, from which gunpowder is made, is apparently not the nitre of the Scriptures; it is nearer, we believe, to sal-ammoniac.

NO, or NO-AMMON, a city of Egypt. See Ammon I.

NOACHIDE, a name given to the children of Noah, and in general, to all men not of the chosen race of Abraham.

NOAH, repose, or rest, son of Lamech, was born A. M. 1056. Amidst the general corruption of man, there was one in whose eyes the Lord beheld 1 I. XXviii. 10. And Delitzsch. After having left the ark, Noah offered as a burnt-offering to the Lord one of the pure animals that had been preserved. His sacrifice was accepted, and the Lord promised to bring a more a deluge over the earth; of which promise th sign he gave to Noah was the rainbow.

Noah, being a husbandman, cultivated the vine and having unwarily intoxicated himself by drinking of wine, he fell asleep in his tent. Ham, the father of Canaan, discovering him in this condition, made sport of him, and jeered with his two brothers; who, going backwards, covered the father's nakedness of the vine mantle over him. Noah awaking, knowing what Ham had done, foretold the doom of slavery to Canaan and his posterity; while he blessed his other sons.

Noah lived after the deluge 350 years; his whole life being 950 years. He died A. M. 2006, leaving three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth, (see their articles, among whom, according to the common opinion, he divided the whole world, giving to Shet Asiel, he found favor in the sight of Europe.

Peter calls Noah a preacher of righteousness; (Pet. ii. 5.) because, before the deluge, he was incessantly declaring, not only by his discourses, but by his unblemishable life, and by building the ark, in which he was employed, the event of all the world of God, Matt. xxiv. 37. The passage in 1 Pet. iii. 20, has been the theme of much controversy. Several of the ancient fathers took the words literally; as if Christ after his death had really preached to the spirits in prison, before the deluge were closed, entreaty to the preaching of Noah. Others, by i, 2. He was employed 307;�312. 15, "he came and preached peace to you who were afar off,—not in person; but by his agents, his apostles. In this sense Noah, in his day, was an agent of Christ, being actuated by his Spirit. It is probable, that as fallen angels are described as being held in chains of darkness, unto judgment, so the benediction of human spirits they be delivered may be described as being in prison, that is, reserved to future judgment. (Coke, Job xvii. 5. as usually understood.)

The Bible of Deucalion, and his wife Pyrrha, manifestly derived from the history of Noah. Deucalion, by the advice of his father, built an ark, a vessel of wood, in which he stored all sorts of provisions necessary for life, and entered it with his wife Pyrrha; to secure themselves from a deluge, the drowned nearly all Greece. All the people since this country were destroyed, none escaped by those who took refuge on the tops of the highest mountains. When the flood was over, Deucalion came out of his ark, and found himself on mount Parnassus. There he offered sacrifices to Jupiter, who sent Mercury to him that he might discern the will of Jupiter. He requested that he might become the restorer of mankind, which Jupiter granted to him. He and Pyrrha were ordered to cast stones behind them, which immediately became so many men and women. The name Nurusio, given to the wife of Noah by the Syro-Chaldees, is derived from the Syriac, שׁוֹרַה, which signifies fire; hence Pyrrha (fire) is, by the Greeks, said to have been the name of the wife of Deucalion; and so far the Grecian story rests on authority more oriental than itself. Epiphanius has a reference to this derivation: he calls her "Noria, said to be the wife of Noah, whose name is, by interpretation, Pyrrha." There is also, much allegory couched under the names of Deucalion's father, Protheus, (forsighs,) by whom she was advised to build a vessel, and Pyrrha's father, Ephimeus, whose wife was Pandora, accomplished by gifts from all the gods, with her box of evils, in which, when opened, remained only Hope, &c.

NOB, a serpent-like city of Benjamin or Ephraim, not far from Diospolis. When David was driven away by Saul, he came to Nob, the priests of which city were slain by Saul, 1 Sam. xxix. 9, &c.; xxii. 6-11.

NOBLEMAN, John iv. 46. This was probably an officer of Herod's court, and of considerable distinction; not an hereditary nobleman. The word βασιλικός signifies a servant of the king; as the Syriac and Arabic versions render it. Many have conjectured that this nobleman, or royal servant, was Chuzas, Herod's steward, whose wife is thought to have been converted on this occasion, and afterwards to have become an attendant on Jesus, Luke viii. 3.

NOD, vagabond, a country so called, whither Cain withdrew after his fratricide, Gen. iv. 16. Jerome and the Chaldees have taken the word Nod in the sense of an appellative, a vagabond, or fugitive.

NOON, the middle time of the day, when the sun is highest in his daily course; in modern language, when he is direct south, on the meridian of any place. 1 Kings xxvii. 27; Ps. lv. 17. This time of the day being the brightest, is made a subject of comparison in several places of Scripture, Job v. 14; Ps. xxxvii. 6. The apostle Paul says, the brightness in which he walked, and not that which was superior to that of the sun at noon, Acts xxvi. 13.

NOPH, a city of Egypt, (Isa. xix. 13; Jer. ii. 16; xlv. 1; xlvii. 14; Ezek. xxx. 13, 16,) generally believed to have been the same with Moph, the Menouf of the Copts and Arabs, that is, Memphis. Memphis, says the Greek form of the Egyptian name, which, according to Plutarch, signifies the port of the good; it was therefore a compound word, men being an affix, and nob, or noph, being the distinguishing appellative. It is sometimes found with the article prefixed, in the form of Pano CON, that is, Pi-Nob. Nob, as Mr. Conder remarks, is evidently no other than the god Χαορ τος, the Αυσβαδειας of the Egyptian Pantheon. The situation of Memphis, formerly the capital of Egypt, has been a subject of considerable dispute, and has afforded materials for long and laborious investigation by the learned. Seward and Shaw fix its site at Djezeh, or Gizeh, directly opposite to Old Cairo. This opinion, however, has been controverted by Pococke, D'Anville, Niebuhr, and other writers and travellers, who place Memphis more in the direction of Metrahamy, about 15 miles farther south, on the bank of the Nile, at the entrance of the plain of mummies, at the north of which the pyramids are placed. (See Bunsen, Travels in Egypt, vol. i. p. 339—352. Eng. ed. Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. iii. 290.)

Memphis was the residence of the ancient kings of Egypt, till the times of the Ptolemies, who commonly resided at Alexandria. The Egyptians, in the places above referred to, forecast the miseries of Memphis was to suffer from the kings of Chaldea and Persia, and they threaten the Israelites who should retire into Egypt, or should have recourse to the Egyptians, that they should perish in that country. In this city they fed the ox Apis; and Ezekiel says, that the Lord will destroy the idols of Memphis, chap. xxx. 13, 16. Memphis retained its splendor till it was conquered by the Arabicians in the 18th or 19th year of the Hegira, A. D. 641. Amrou-Ben-As, who took it, built another near it, which was called Fustath, from the general's tent, which had long occupied that place. The Fatimite caliphs, becoming masters of Egypt, added another city, which they named Caberiah, "the victorious," the present Grand Cairo, which is built on the eastern shore of the Nile.

NORTH. As it was customary for the Hebrews to consider the cardinal points of the heavens in reference to a man whose face was turned toward the east, the north was consequently to his left hand. The north wind dissipates rain, (Prov. xxv. 23,) but this must depend on the situation of a place; as in different places the same wind has different effects. The north wind, "the anger of the Lord and country," Deut. xxix. 20. "Out of his nostrils goeth smoke," Job xli. 21. The ancient Greek and Latin authors speak much after the same manner.

Solomon alludes to the custom of women wearing golden rings in their nostrils, when he says, (Prov. xi. 22.) "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without discretion." And Ezekiel, (xvi. 12.) "I will put a jewel on thy forehead, [Heb. nose,] and ear-rings and a chain on thy neck, and put rings upon thine head." They also put rings in the nostrils of oxen and camels, to guide them by: "I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips," 2 Kings xix. 25. (See also Job xli. 2.)

NOTHING is sometimes put in opposition to body, solidity, or mass. It is also put for vacancy, and for what is not sensible. Job says, (xxvi. 7.) "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing." Upon the vacuum. Isaiah says, (xli. 22, Vulg.) "God spreads out the heavens as nothing;" he extends them in the air in invisible space. The wise man says, (Wis. ii. 2.) "We are born of nothing, and in some sense shall return to nothing again. We shall disappear from the face of the earth, as if we had never been."

Isaiah says, (xli. 24.) "Behold ye are of nothing, and your works of nought; an abomination is he that chooseth you." Idols are often called nothings, non-entities. "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought," Amos vi. 13. And Esther, (Apoc. xiv. 11.) "O Lord, give not thy sceptre unto them that be nothing;" deliver not over thy people to those gods that are nothing. Paul says, NUM

"We know that an idol is nothing in the world," 1 Cor. viii. 4. To bring to nothing is to exterminate, to destroy; utterly to rout out any thing.

NOVICE, or Neophyte, newly sown, or planted, a name given to new converts to Christianity, or to those newly baptized. Paul advises (1 Tim. iii. 6,) that a novice should not be made a bishop, "lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." As Lucifer, being puffed up with those eminence qualities he possessed, became proud and insolent, and was therefore precipitated into hell, so a man who finds himself suddenly exalted in dignity, easily flatters himself, and conceives that he has more real worth than others; that there is great occasion for his services, &c. Hence arises presumption and pride, and then follows the judgment of God, who always humbles the proud. The term Neophyte continued to be used among the primitive Christians during several ages, as appears from the tombstones of children, &c. who died when recently baptized.

NUMBERS, the book of, is the third of the Pentateuch. The Hebrews call it תַּנַּךְ, Tanakh, (and he spake) because in the Hebrew it begins with the words: Some Jews call it בֵּיתוּלָה, Beitulah, (in desert) because it includes the history of the Israelites' journeying in the wilderness. The Greeks, after them the Latins, call it the book of Num, because the first three chapters contain the numbering of the Hebrews and Levites, which was performed separately, after the erection and consecration of the tabernacle.

The people, having departed from Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, went to the wilderness of Paran, and thence to Kadesh, where they sent spies to view the Land of Promise. Their return the people were discouraged; for while God condemned them to die in the desert, having journeyed thirty-nine years in the wilderness, they arrived at last at the plains of Moab, being Jordan. What happened during this interval, is recorded in the book of Numbers.

NUN, son of Elishamah, and father of Joshu the tribe of Ephraim. The Greeks give his name of Nave, instead of Nun.

O

OAK

The religious veneration paid to this tree, by the original natives of Britain, in the time of the Druids, is well known to every reader of English history. We have reason to think that this veneration was brought from the East, and that the Druids did no more than transfer the sentiments of their progenitors. Trees of the same, or a grove of trees, which our translators render the plain of Mamre; and that he planted a grove of this tree, Gen. xxii. 23. In fact, since in hot countries nothing is more desirable, or more refreshing, than the shade of a tree, we may easily suppose the inhabitants would resort for such enjoyment.

Where'er the oak's thick branches spread
A deeper, darker shade.

Oaks, and groves of oaks, were esteemed proper places for religious services; altars were set up under them, (Josh. xxiv. 30,) and probably, in the East, as well as in the West, appointments to meet at conspicuous oaks were made, and many affairs transacted, or treated of, under their shade, as we read in Homer, Theocritus, and other poets.

It was common among the Hebrews to sit under oaks, Judg. vi. 11; 1 Kings xiii. 14. Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak, (Gen, xx. 4,) and Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried under one of these trees, chap. xxxv. 8; 1 Chron. x. 12. Abimelech was made king under an oak, Judg. ix. 6. Idolatry was practised under oaks, Isa. i. 29; lii. 5; Hosea iv. 13. Idols were made of oaks, Isa. xlv. 14.

There are several kinds of oak in the East, as Tournier observes: one of which he calls "the fairest species of oak in the world," and describes it as growing in the isle of Zin. He says also, of Anatolia, (vol. iii. p. 208,) "Beside the common oaks, and that which bears the Vesuvius, we saw several other kinds in the valleys." It is very reasonable to suppose that more than one kind is mentioned in Scripture.

OAT

OAT, n. A plant which is cultivated for its seed, the greatest part of which is used for the food of animals. The word, or its Arabic form, is found in the Anglo-Saxon Oth, in the Teutonic Oth, and in the Latin Othum, and is of Carian or Hittite origin. The word (grain for feeding) is also found in the Greek Grano, in the Latin Granum, and in the Hebrew Korax. The word for grain in general is Oth, in the Anglo-Saxon; Oat, in the Teutonic; Grano, in the Greek; Cornu, in the Latin; Gerz, in the Hebrew.

The famous oracle of Dodona stood among which tree was sacred to Jupiter, who often asked the advice of the oracle, and the answers were given by Aglauros, an oak garland: sacra Jonc Qua.

OATH, a solemn affirmation, accompanied by an appeal to the Supreme Being. God has promulgated all false oaths, and all useless and customary oaths in ordinary discourse; but when the need or importance of a matter requires an oath, he swears by his name. Among the Hebrews an oath was administered to the judge, who stood up, and adjured the party to be sworn. To this mode of administering oaths Moses alludes, when he says, (Lev. vi. 1,) person sin, hearing the voice of swearing, that adjuration, being called on to witness, whether he hath seen or known of the transaction then in question; and this we take to be true in Prov. xxix. 24, "When a promise is made, it is an abomination to the Lord." In this manner our Lord was adjured by Caiphas, Matt. 26. Jesus had remained out under long examination, when the high-priest rising up, knowing he had found a sure mode of obtaining an answer, said, "I tell you, he is guilty of perjury." (See 1 Kings viii. 31; 2 Chron. viii. 22.) In this manner our Lord was adjured by Caiphas, Matt. 26. Jesus had remained out under long examination, when the high-priest rising up, knowing the unanswerable, said, "I tell you, he is guilty of perjury." And this we take to be true in Prov. xxix. 24, "When a promise is made, it is an abomination to the Lord." In this manner our Lord was adjured by Caiphas, Matt. 26.
moment, and when the most solemn kind of oath was necessary.

An oath is a solemn appeal to God, as to an all-seeing witness, and an almighty avenger, if what we say be false, Heb. vi. 16. It is an act of religious worship, required by the ordinance of God's name, (Deut. x. 20,) and points out the manner in which it ought to be administered, and the duty of the person who swears, Ps. xv. 4; xxiv. 4; Jer. iv. 2.

An oath in itself is not unlawful, either as it is a religious act, or as God is called on to witness. See COVENANT.

God himself is represented as confirming his promise by oath, (Heb. vi. 13,) and thus conforming himself to what is practised among men, chap. v. 16, 17.

The oaths forbidden (Matt. xix. 34, 35; Jam. v. 12,) refer only to the unthinking, hasty and vicious practices of the Jews; otherwise, Paul would have acted against the command of Christ, Rom. i. 9; 2 Cor. i. 23. Neither atheists nor Epicureans, who deny, the former the being, the latter the providence, of God, can take an oath administered, and be bound by it, from the very form of an oath, which declares the omniscience and primitive justice of God. That person is obliged to take an oath, whose duty requires it, and whose act he takes by the law of nature. As we are bound to manifest every possible degree of reverence towards God, our greatest care is to be taken that we swear neither rashly nor negligently in making promises. To neglect performance is perjury; unless the promise be contrary to the law of nature, in which case no oath is binding. A person is guilty of perjury who takes an oath in a sense different from that in which it is (lawfully) tendered: such simulation and dissimulation, or mental reservation, is contrary to the law of nature, because a violation of duty. To swear by a creature is simply unlawful, from the nature of an oath, which implies omniscience and omnipotence in the party appealed to, and sworn by, perfections incumbent on all creatures.

We find Joseph using an extraordinary kind of oath, as it appears to us; (Gen. xlii. 15,) "As Pharaoh liveth," or, by the life of Pharaoh. This custom of swearing by the king still continues in the East. The most sacred oath among the Persians is "by the king's head," says Hanway, (Trav. vol. i. p. 313.) and among the Tzouans, "by the head of the Ambassadors," (p. 304.) There were but sixty horses for ninety-four persons. The Mehemaner, or conductor, bore the head of the king which is the greatest oath among the Persians) that he could not deny it even more, (Trav. p. 97, part ii.) His subjects never look upon him but with fear and trembling, and they have such respect for him, and pay so blind an obedience to all his orders, that no unjust soever his commands might be, they perform them, though against law both of God and nature. Nay, if they swear by the king's head, their oath is more authentic, and of greater credit, than if they swore by all that is most sacred in heaven and upon earth. These instances seem allied to that very common oath in Scripture, "As the Lord liveth," and it should seem, that as this oath could not be taken without naming the name of God, which the later Jews regarded as a profanation, that they gradually introduced the custom of swearing (not judicially) by sacred things, as heaven, the temple, the gold of the temple, the altar, &c. all which our Lord forbids, and refers oaths to the great object of swearing, God; or, if the subject in debate be too trivial to call upon God about, then swear not at all; use no subterfuges, no lesser oath, but either affirm, or deny, simply.

Our Lord further says, thou shalt not swear by thy head, as some we see are accustomed to do by the king's head. The apostle Paul observes, "men verily swear by the altar," (thou meanest, the altar of burnt-offering,) "as those no doubt understood they did, who swear by the king.

Grievous curses are promulgated against false swearers, and false oaths are among the greatest abominations before both God and man. (1.) That a person swear lawfully, he must swear by the Most High God, since only the Most High God can judge of the sincerity of his affirmation, which is the essence of an oath: to swear by any person or thing not omniscient to know, and omnipotent to remember, is to trifle with an oath. (2.) The veracity of an oath is its essence: to preserve this veracity we should swear only on due deliberation, only on actual knowledge, only agreeably to justice and equity: openly, candidly, with due circumspection, and if necessary, with due inquiry and explanation. (3.) The end of an oath is its essence: to preserve such the essence and nature of oaths, what apology shall be made for profane swearing? swearing without an object, and to no avail; for who credits such unmerited oaths beyond what they would credit simple assertion?

We have in Gen. xxi. 28. a curious account of a ceremony practised by Abraham, in respect to Abimelech: "Abraham set seven ewe lambs of the flock by themselves, and Abimelech said to Abraham, What mean these seven ewe lambs, which thou hast set by themselves? And he said, For these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witness unto me in my behalf that I have digged this well; wherefore he called that place Beersheba, because they there swore both of them. Thus they made a covenant at Beersheba."—Beersheba may signify the well of the oath, or the well of the seven.

Mr. Taylor inclines to the latter signification, from having read the following, in Bruce's Travels:—

"All that is required in the Travels of the Ambassador of the ambassadors, (p. 304,) "There were but sixty horses for ninety-four persons. The Mehemaner, or conductor, bore the head of the king which is the greatest oath among the Persians,) that he could not deny it even more, (Trav. p. 97, part ii.) His subjects never look upon him but with fear and trembling, and they have such respect for him, and pay so blind an obedience to all his orders, that no unjust soever his commands might be, they perform them, though against law both of God and nature. make child among them." (See 1 Sam. xxv. 22; 1 Kings xiv. 10; xvi. 11; xxi. 21; 2 Kings ix. 8.)

Medicines and advice being given on my part, faith and protection pledged on theirs, two bushels of wheat and seven sheep were carried down to the boat; nor could we decline their kindness; as refusing a present in that country is just as great an affront as coming into the presence of a superior without any present at all." Gen. xxxvii. 10, 11; Mal. i. 20; Matt. viii. 11.

There is a remarkable passage in Prov. xvi. 21, thus rendered by our translators, "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished; but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered;" i.e. though they make many associations, and oaths, and join hands among themselves, (as formed part of the ceremony of swearing among these shepherds of Sakkem,) yet they shall be punished. But Michaelis proposes another sense of these words, "hand in hand"—"my hand in your hand, i.e. as a token of swearing," the wicked shall not go unpunished."—How far this sense of the passage is illustrated by the foregoing and the following extract, the reader will judge:

"I cannot here help accusing myself of what, doubtless, may be well reputed a very great sin. I was so enraged at the traitorous part which Hassan had acted, that, at parting, I could not help saying to Ibrahim, 'Now, Sheik, I have done every thing you have desired, without ever expecting fee or reward; the only thing I now ask you—and it is probably the last—is, that you avenge me upon this Hassan, who is every day in your power. Upon this, he gave me his hand, saying, He shall not die in his bed, or I shall never see old age." (Bruce's Travels, vol. i. p. 196.)

We may remark further on this extract, that though Bruce's reflections do not appeal to this conduct in this instance, yet it seems, in some sense, similar to the behavior of David, when he gave charge to his son, Solomon, to execute that justice upon Joab and Shimel, which he himself had been unable to do by reason of the vicissitudes of his life and kingdom; and of the influence which Joab, the general, had in the army; but of which the pacific reign of Solomon would deprive him, 1 Kings ii. 6.

Perhaps, also, this joining of hands may add a spirit to the passage, 2 Kings x. 15: "Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?" says Jehu to Jehonadab; "if it be, give me thine hand."—And he (Jehonadab) gave him (Jehu) his hand;" i.e. in token of affirmation: "and he (Jehu) took him (Jehonadab) up into his chariot." So then, it was not as an assurance to enable Jehonadab to get into the chariot, that Jehu gave him his hand, but, on the contrary, Jehonadab gave his hand to Jehu. This seems confirmed by verse 10, "So they made him (Jehonadab) ride in his (Jehu's) chariot." All these pronouns embarrass our translation, but they were perfectly understood by those who knew the customs of their country.

This sense of the passage is further confirmed by the following extracts from Ockley's History of the Saracens:

"Several [of the Mahometan chiefs] came to Ali, and desired him to accept the government. He resolved not to accept of their allegiance in private; for they professed to give him their hands (the customary ceremony then in use among them, on such occasions) at his own house; but he would have it performed at the mosque. Teilha and Zobein came, and offered him their hands, as a mark, or token, of their approbation.

Ali bade them, if they did it, to be in good ease: otherwise he would give his own hand to either of that would accept of the government; which refused; and gave him theirs." (Vol. i. p. 4.)

(p. 36;):—"Teilha, being wounded in the leg, or his man to take him up behind him; who coning into a house in Bassora, where he died, just before, he saw one of Ali's men, and asked if he belonged to the emperor of the faithful. I informed that he did, Give me then, said he, your that I may put mine in, and by this action the oath of fidelity, which I have already made to Ali." (See 1 Sam. xxi. 17; 1 Chron. xxiv. 34, or 35; Lam. v. 6; 2 Kings xvi. 5; xv. 19.)

Whoever recollects the mode of swearing an oath, or doing homage for provinces, ancienly between sovereigns and vassals, (as the the king of France to those of France, while England provinces in that country,) will find considerable semblance in this to the eastern usage. The vassals both his hands into the hands of his sovereign, riging words to this effect; "Thus I do thee this for such or such a province," &c. After whi withdrew his hands. This was repeated acc to the number of fiefs or provinces held.

OABDIAH. There are several persons o mentioned in the Old Testament: it is necessary, however, that we should notice the first. It is not certain when he lived, but it is prob that he was contemporay with Jeremiah and king, who denounced the same dreadful judgment upon the Edomites as the punishment of their pride, and cruel insults over the Jews, aft destruction of their city. The prophecy, acc to Usher, was fulfilled about five years after thestruction of Jerusalem.

OBED-EDOM, son of Jeduthun, a Levite, 1 Ch xvi. 38. He had a numerous family, (1 Chron. 4.) because the Lord blessed him. After the death of Uzzah, David, terrified at that accident, durst not move the ark into the apartment he had provided it his palace, but left it in the house of Obed-Edom near the place where Uzzah was struck. The pro the ark became a blessing to Obed-Edom, encouraged David some months afterwards to it to the place he had appointed for it. Obe Edom and his family were exempt from the tribute of the temple, 1 Chron. xvi. 18, 21. In 2 Sam. Obed-Edom is called the Gittite, probably, he was of Gath Rimmon, a city of the Levites b Joshua, xiii. 24, 25.

and pronounced against them, and menaced them with

OFFENCE may be either active or passive. We may give offence by our conduct, or we may receive offence from the conduct of others. We should be very careful to avoid giving just cause of offence, that we may not prove impediments to others in their reception of the truth, in their progress in sanctification, in their peace of mind, or in their general course toward heaven. We should abridge or deny our selves in some things, rather than, by exercising our liberty to the utmost, give uneasiness to Christians weaker in mind, or weaker in the faith, than ourselves, 1 Cor. x. 23. On the other hand, we should not take offence without ample cause; but endeavor, by our exercise of charity, and perhaps by our increase of knowledge, to think favorably of what is dubious, as well as honorably of what is laudable.

It was foretold of the Messiah, that he should be a "stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." Perhaps predictions of this kind are among the most valuable to us, and we see by them, that we ought not to be discouraged because the Jews, the natural people of the Messiah, rejected him, and still reject him; since the very offence they take at his humiliation, death, &c. is in part to assure Christ of those prophecies which foretold, that however they might profess to wish for the great deliverer, yet when he came they would overlook him, and stumble at him.

OFFERINGS. The Hebrews had several kinds of offerings, which they presented at the temple. Some were free-will offerings; others were of obligation. The first-fruits, the tithes, and the sin-offerings were of obligation: the peace-offerings, vows, offerings of wine, oil, bread, salt, and other things, made to the temple, or to the ministers of the Lord, were offerings of devotion. The Hebrews called offerings in general Corban; but the offerings of bread, salt, fruits, and liquors, as wine and oil, presented to the temple, they called Mincha. Sacrifices are not properly offerings: nor are they generally included under this name. Offerings of grain, meat, bread, cake, fruits, wine, salt, oil, were common in the temple. Sometimes these offerings were alone; sometimes they accompanied the sacrifices. Honey was never offered with sacrifices, but it might be presented alone, as first-fruits, Lev. ii. 11, 12.

There were five sorts of offerings called Mincha, or Korban Mincha, Lev. ii. 1. (1.) Fine flour, or meal. (2) Cakes of several sorts, baked in the oven. (3) Baked cakes on a plate. (4) Another sort of cakes baked on a plate with holes in it. (5) The first-fruits of the new corn, which were offered either pure and without mixture, or roasted, or parched in the ear, or out of the ear. The cakes were kneaded with oil, olive, or fried in a pan, or only dipped in oil after they were baked. The bread offered to the altar was without leaven; for leaven was never offered on the altar, nor with the sacrifices, Lev. ii. 11, 12. But they might make presents of common bread to the priests and ministers of the temple. These offerings were appointed in favor of the poor, who should not afford the charge of sacrificing animals. Those also who offered living victims were not excused from giving meal, wine and salt, which were to accompany the greater sacrifice. Those who offered only oblations of bread, or of meal, offered also oil, incense, salt and wine, which were in a manner their seasoning. The priest in waiting received the offerings from the hand of him who brought them, laid a part on the altar, and reserved the rest for his own subsistence, as a minister of the Lord. Notice, it was wholly burnt up but the incense, of which the priest retained none. (See Lev. ii. 3, 13; Numb. xiv. 4, 5.)

When an Israelitish offered a loaf to the priest, or a whole cake, the priest broke it into two parts, setting aside that part reserved to himself, and breaking the other into crumbs, poured on it oil, salt, wine and incense, and spread the whole on the fire of the altar. If these offerings were accompanied by an animal for a sacrifice, this portion was all thrown on the victim, to be consumed with it. If the offerings were ears of new corn, (wheat or barley,) these ears were parched at the fire, or in the flame, and rubbed in the hand, and then offered to the priest in a vessel; over the grain he put oil, incense, wine and salt, and then burnt it, first having taken his own portion, Lev. ii. 14, 15.

The most of these offerings were voluntary, and of pure devotion. But when an animal was offered in sacrifice, they were not at liberty to omit them. Every thing pure we offer to God; we see by them, that we ought not to be discouraged because the Jews, the natural people of the Messiah, rejected him, and still reject him; since the very offence they take at his humiliation, death, &c. is in part to assure Christ of those prophecies which foretold, that however they might profess to wish for the great deliverer, yet when he came they would overlook him, and stumble at him.

As to the quantity of meal, oil, wine or salt to accompany the sacrifices, we cannot see that the law determines it. Generally, the priest threw a handful of meal, or crumbs, on the fire of the altar, with wine, oil and salt in proportion, and all the incense. The rest belonged to himself; the quantity depended on the liberality of the offerer. We observe, that Moses appoints an assearion, or the tenth part of an ephah of meal, for those who had not wherewith to offer the appointed sin-offerings, Lev. v. 11; xiv. 21. In the solemn offerings of the first-fruits for the whole nation, they offered an entire sheaf of corn, a lamb of a year old, two tenths or two asserions of fine meal mixed with oil, and a quarter of a hin of wine for the libation, Lev. xxvii. 10, &c. Numb. v. 15.

In the sacrifice of jealousy, when a husband accused his wife of infidelity, the husband offered the tenth part of a sheaf of barley meal, without oil or incense, because it was a sacrifice of jealousy.
Offerings of fruits of the earth, of bread, wine, oil, and salt, are the most ancient of any that the Lord required. Cain offered the first-fruits of his labor, Abel offerings of his flock, and of their fat. The heathen religion has nothing like these sorts of offerings made to the God of gods. The oil, wine, and accompanied them with their bloody sacrifices, and those used by the Hebrews in the tabernacle, consisted, chiefly, in casting the oblations on the flesh of the victim, already offered and laid on the fire. The Greeks put them on the head of the victim while it was alive, and when just going to be sacrificed. O.G., king of Bashan, was a giant of the race of the Rephaim. We may judge of his stature by the length of his bed, which was long preserved in the capital of the Ammonites, Deut. iii. 11. See Ban.

Moses says, (Num. xxxi. 23,) that after having conquered Sihon, king of the Amorites, he marched toward the country of Bashan; where Og, also, advanced toward him and his subjects. Og was conquered, and slain, with his children, and all his people. Og and Sihon were the only kings that withstood Moses. Their country was given to the tribe of Gad, Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh.

OIL. The Hebrews commonly anointed themselves with oil; they anointed also their kings and high-priests. See Anointing.

Bread, oil, and wine, were emblems, or vineyard, that was fruitful and fat, a horn, the son of oil, chap. v. 1. In chap. x. 27, he says, that God would destroy the yoke of the Israelites, by the quantity of oil that he would pour thereon. He would take it from all its roughness and hardness. The high-priest Joshua, and the prince Zerubbabel, are called sons of oil; (Zech. iv. 14,) that is, each of them had received the sacred unction. Job, speaking of the condition of his first prosperity, says that the rocks were then fountains of oil to him, Job xxix. 6.

The oil of gladness, (Ps. xlv. 7; Isa. lxii. 3,) was the perfumed oil with which the Hebrews anointed themselves on days of rejoicing and festivity. Moses says (Deut. xxxii. 13,) that God made his people to suck oil and bread in the desert; that is, that in the midst of dreary deserts, he abundantly provided them with all things not only necessary, but agreeable. The olive-tree shall fail to bring forth fruit, says Hab. iii. 17. James directs that the sick should be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord, by the elders of the church, Jam. v. 14.

OINTMENT. As perfumes are seldom made up among us in the form of ointment, but mostly in that of essence, while ointments are rather medical, we do not always discern the beauty of those comparisons in Scripture, in which ointments are mentioned. "Dead flies, though but small insects, cause the ointment of the apothecary (it should be, the fragrant unction of the perfumer) to emit a fetid vapor; so does a small proportion of folly, or perverseness, overcome, prevail above, over-power by its fœtor, the fragrance of wisdom and glory," Eccl. x. 1.

We read of ointments for the head; (Eccl. iv. 8,) our own pomatum, some of which are pretty strongly essenced, may indicate the nature of these, as being their representatives in this country. Ointments and oils were used in warm countries after baking; and as oil was the first recipient of fragrance, probably from herbs, &c. steeped in it, many kinds of unguents not made of oil retained that appellation. As the plants impart somewhat of their color as well as of their fragrant essence, the expression green oil, &c. in the Hebr. See Anointing, and Alabaster.

OL. L.D., ancient. We say the Old Testament, &c., of contradiction from the New. Moses was minister of the Old Testament, of the old age, not letter; but Christ is the Mediator of the New, or of the new covenant; not of the letter of the spirit, Heb. vi. 15—20.

The old man, (Rom. vi. 6,) the old Adam moral sense, is our derived corrupted nature, we ought to crucify with Jesus Christ, that the old sin may die in us. In Col. iii. 9, the apostle says to put off the old man with his deeds, and on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. Eph. iv. 22, we are instructed to put off the old which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts.

The old leaven is concupiscence, and adheres to literal and ceremonial observances of the law. Paul advises (I Cor. v. 8,) to keep the feast, of old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice wickedness; but with the unleavened bread sincerity and truth. Our Saviour expresses an abhorrence of every thing, when he says (Luke v. 37,) that a putrid new wine into old bottles, else the new will burst the bottles, and be spilled, and the vessel perish.

The old fruits and the new, which are gathered in earnestness, (Lev. xxi. 29; xxvi. 10;) Col. iii. 9 note great abundance. You shall have so that, to make room for the new, you shall be forced to remove the old.

Old age is promised as a blessing by God, a who maintain obedience to his commands; as probable that Providence did, and will do, over and prolong the lives of eminent piety. It was formerly thought a great blessing to die in the grave in a good old age, or as a shock to fully ripe; and though they are not to be which feign that the old fathers did look on transitory promises, yet we think we may say they did on various occasions expect mercies from God, even in this life; and the expectations were not disappointed. Old age entitled to peculiar honor, and no doubt, who lived to the age of several hundred years, the were must needs have acquired, the influence must needs have possessed over the young of the community, must have been much; if they are among ourselves. Very venerable have been the personal appearance of a patriarch three or four hundred years, or even of half that the eyes of his family, and of his descendents, immediate or remote.

There is nothing more decisively recorded respect paid among the ancients to old age; of Grecian story affords highly pleasing proofs that it was equal among the orientals we learn various allusions in the book of Job, the Proverbs.

Old is spoken of as a thing that decays; (Rom. i. 28; vi. 13,) of what has been destroyed; (2 Pet. ii. former times, Lam. i. 7.

OLIVE-TREE. Paul, in his Epistle to ti mans, (xi. 24,) distinguishes two kinds of olive (1.) the wild and natural; and (2.) those made and culture. The cultivated olive-tree is of a sn height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth, an colored; its wood is solid and yellowish; the are oblong, almost like those of the willow, of a green color, dark on the upper side, and white on the under side. On the south side of June it puts out white flowers that grow in bunches. Each flower is of one piece, widening upwards, and dividing into four parts; the fruit oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and when it is quite ripe, black. In the flesh of it is enclosed a hard stone, full of an oblong seed. The wild olive is smaller in all its parts.

When Noah sent forth the dove out of the ark, it brought back to him a small olive-branch with its leaves, (Gen. viii. 11,) which was a token to the patriarch that the waters of the deluge were sunk away.

In the temple of Jerusalem, Solomon made of olive-wood the cherubim, and the portal that parted the sanctuary from the temple, 1 Kings vi. 23, 33. Eliphaz (Job xv. 33,) compares a wicked man to a vine which sheds its blossoms, and to an olive whose flowers fall before its season, and consequently brings no fruit. The sacred writers often use similes taken from the olive.

OLIVES, Mount or, is situated east of Jerusalem, and separated from the city by the brook Kidron, and the valley of Jehoshaphat. On this mount Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites and Moabites, out of complaisance to his wives, 1 Kings xi. 7. Hence the mount of Olives is called the mountain of Corruption. 2 Kings viii. 13. Josephus says, it is five stadia (or furlongs) from Jerusalem. Luke says, a sabbath's day's journey; i.e. about eight furlongs, Acts i. 12. The mount of Olives has three summits, ranging from north to south; from the middle summit a ladder which was once called heaven; on the south summit Solomon built temples to his idols; the north summit is distant two furlongs from the middlemost. This is the highest, and is commonly called Galilee, or Vīrī Gāliiē, from the expression usual by the angels, Ye men of Galilee.

In the time of king Uzziah, the mount of Olives was so shattered by an earthquake, that half the earth or the western side fell, and rolled four furlongs, or five hundred paces, toward the opposite mountain on the cast; so that the earth blocked up the highways, and covered the king's gardens. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11, and Zechar. xiv. 5.)

Though this mount was named from its olive-trees, yet it abounded in other trees also. It was a station for the caravans, which were conducted by lights and flames, on various occasions. They were made of long staves of cedar, canes, pine wood, with coarse flax, which, while on fire, were shaken about till they were answered from other signals.

While standing at Tellin, by Rab. Janna, is extremely remarkable: "The Divine Majesty stood three years and a half on mount Olivet, saying, 'Seek ye the Lord, while he may be found; call on him while he is near.' Is this the language of a Jew?

The mention of these residences implies that this mount had various dwellings upon it.

There was a collection of water at Bethany on this mount, which was by some used as a place of purification.

The small building, erected over the place of ascension, is contiguous to a Turkish mosque, and is in possession of the Turks, who show it for profit; and subject the Christians to an annual contribution for permission to officiate within it on Ascension Day. From the mosque is a fine and commanding view of Jerusalem, mount Sion and the Dead sea.

Dr. Clarke found on the top of the mount of Olives a vast and very ancient crypt, in "the shape of a cone, of immense size; the vertex alone appearing level with the soil, and exhibiting by its section at the top a small circular aperture; the sides extending below to a great depth, lined with a hard red stucco." He thinks it to have been an idolatrous construction, perhaps as old as Solomon, and profaned by Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 13. The number of crypts about Jerusalem is well deserving attention. If Solomon built this crypt, he might, as the Jews say he did, construct one of the same kind for the reception of the ark, &c. in ease of danger; but this must continue undecided till the "times of the Gentiles are fulfilled."

"So commanding is the view of Jerusalem afforded in this situation, (says Dr. Clarke,) that the eye roams over all the streets, and around the walls, as if in the survey of a plan or model of the city. The most conspicuous object is the mosque, erected upon the site and foundations of the temple of Solomon. Hence the observation of the evangelist, (Luke xix. 39,) that Jesus beheld the city, and wept over it, acquires additional force. "Towards the south appears the lake Asphalites, a noble expanse of water, seeming to be within a short ride from the city; but the real distance is much greater. Lofty mountains enclose it with prodigious grandeur. To the north are seen the verdant and fertile pastures of the plain of Jericho, watered by the Jordan, whose course may be distinctly discerned." (Travels, vol. ii. p. 572.)

OMEGA, (2,) the last letter of the Greek alphabet; Alpha, Α, and Omega, Ω, therefore, include all; the first and the last. See ALPHA.

OMER, or Gomer, a measure of capacity among the Hebrews; the tenth part of an ephah, a little more than five quarts, which was divided from four handfuls by lights and flames, on various occasions. They were made of long staves of cedar, canes, pine wood, with coarse flax, which, while on fire, were shaken about till they were answered from other signals.

OMRI, or Amri, was general of the army of Elah, king of Israel; but being at the siege of Gibbethon, and hearing that his master Elah was assassinated by Zimri, who had usurped his kingdom, he raised the siege, and, being elected king by his army, attacked him at Tirzah, and forced him to burn himself and all his family, in the palace in which he had shut up himself. Zimri reigned but seven days, A. M. 3075, 1 Kings xvi. 2. After his death, half of Israel acknowledged Omri for king, the other half adhered to Tibni, son of Ginetah; which division continued four years. When Tibni was dead, the people united in acknowledging Omri as king of all Israel, who reigned twenty-two years; six years at Tirzah, and six at Samaria, 1 Kings xvi.

Tirzah had previously been the chief residence of the kings of Israel, but when Omri purchased the hill of Shomeron, (1 Kings xvi. 24, about A. M. 3060,) he there built a new city, which he called Samaria, from the name of the first possessor Shechem, or Shemer, and there fixed his royal seat. From this time Samaria was the capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes.
room for considerable diversity of opinion as to the geographical situation of Ophir; and, indeed, the best writers are of opinion that it must ever remain a matter of mere conjecture.

OPHNI, a city of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 24.) and thought to be the same as Gophni, or Gophnas, which was about 15 miles from Jerusalem, towards Naplouse, or Shechem.

I. OPHRAH, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 23; 1 Sam. xiii. 17. Instead of this Micah has Aaphrah, i. 10.

II. OPHRAH, a city of Manasseh, the birth place of Gideon, Judges vi. 11; vii. 27; ix. 5.

OPPRESSION is the spoiling or taking away of men's property by constraint, terror, or force, without having any right thereto; working on the ignorance, weakness, or fearfulness of the oppressed. Men are guilty of oppression when they offer violence to the bodies, property, or consciences of others; when they crush or overburden others, as the Egyptians did the Hebrews, Exodus iii. 9. There may be oppression which maligns the character, or studies to vex another, yet does not affect his life: as there is much persecution for conscience' sake, which is not fatal, though distressing.

ORACLE, a name sometimes given to the lid or covering of the ark, the mercy-seat, (see Mercy-seat,) and also to those supernatural communications of which such free reference is made in Scripture. Among the Jews we distinguish several sorts of oracles. (1.) Those delivered in a voice; as when God spake to Moses face to face, and as one friend speaks to another, Numbers xii. 8. (2.) Prophetical dreams; as those which God sent to Joseph, foretelling his future greatness, Genesis xxxvii. 5, 6, (3.) Visions; as when a prophet in an ecstasy had supernatural revelations, Genesis xv. 1; xlii. 4. (4.) The response of Urim and Thummim, which accompanied the ephod, or the pectoral worn by the high-priest, Numbers v. 26; 2 Samuel ii. 28. This manner of inquiring of the Lord was often used, from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem, (1 Samuel xxiii. 9; xxxvii. 7,) after which they generally consulted the prophets.

The Jews pretend that upon the ceasing of prophecy, God gave them what they call Bacth-kol, the daughter of the voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the divine will, either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or by a sensible and external voice, heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony to it; such as the voice heard at the baptism of Christ.

In the early period of the Christian church the gifts of prophecy and inspiration were frequent; after that the regular station of the heavenly oracles fell into contempt and silence.

Some have ascribed to demons all the oracles of antiquity; others impute them to the knavery of the priests and false prophets.

The most famous oracle of Palestine was that of Baal-zebub, king of Ekron, which the Jews themselves consulted, 2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 16. There were also oracular Traphim, as that of Miceh, Judges xvii. 1, 5. the ephod of Gideon, (vii. 27, &c.) and the false gods adored in the kingdom of Samaria, which had their false prophets, and consequently their oracles. Hosea (chap iv. 12) reproaches Israel with consulting wooden idols, as does the book of Wisdom, (xiii. 16, 17,) and the prophet Habakkuk, ii. 19.

The Hebrews, living in the midst of idolatrous people, accustomed to receive oracles, to have recourse to diviners, magicians and interpreters of dreams, would have been under a more powerful temptation to imitate these impious and superstitious men, if God had not afforded them an assurance of knowing some future events by priests and prophets, in their most urgent necessities. Thus, when Moses had forbidden the Israelites to consult magicians, witches, enchanters and necromancers, he promised to send them a prophet. (Deut. xix. 11, 15, &c.) These oracles of truth had no necessary connection with time or place, or any other circumstance; or with the personal merit of the individual by whom they were uttered. The high-priest, clothed with the ephod and pectoral, gave a true answer, whatever may have been his personal character.

The fathers inform us, that at the coming of the Messiah, the oracles of the heathen were struck dumb; and it is certain that since the preaching of the gospel, the empire of the devil is much contracted and weakened, and the most famous oracles are fallen into disuse. This silence of the oracles, however, did not happen all at once; John (Rev. xiii. 5, 6, 13) describing a persecution of the church, speaks of signs, wonders and delusions, which the deceiver and his accomplices should produce, to excite men to worship the image of the beast, and to entice them by idolatries.

It may, however, assist us in forming a right notion of oracles, to separate them into two classes; those which are proper oracles, and those which are oracles in a qualified sense only. The witch of Endor was no oracle, though irregularly applied to by Saul, when he could obtain no answer from the instituted means of consulting the Lord.

The Hag Eritcho, in Lucan's Pharsalia, was no oracle, as no temple, &c. was extant in her cove. Nor is that properly an oracle, which consists in catching up words which fall from certain persons. Many persons will recollect that Alexander the Great, by the false pronunciation of a Greek word by the priest of Ammon, (The Θαι θησ αοι instead of Θαι θησ αοι,) was made to pass for son of Jupiter, &c. says Plutarch. When, too, he visited the Delphic prophetess on a wrong day, and urged her, she at length complied, saying, 'Thou art irresistible, my son!' "That is all I want," answered Alexander; "to be irresistible is enough." These are not oracles; though policy and flattery might make them pass for such.

The most ancient oracle on record, probably, is that given to Rebekah, (Gen. xxv. 22,) but the most complete instance is that of the child Samuel, 1 Samuel iii. The place was the residence of the ark, the regular station of worship. The message was given by an audible and distinct voice: "The Lord called Samuel; and the child mistook the voice for that of Eli; and this more than once, for he did not yet know the word of the Lord;" the subject was of high national importance; no less than a public calamity, with the ruin of the first family in the land. Nor could the child have any inducement to deceive Eli; as in that case, he would have rather invented something flattering to his venerable superior. This conveniently voice, issuing from the interior of the sanctuary, was properly an oracle.

The highest instances of oracles are those voices which, being formed in the air by a power superior to nature, bore testimony to the celestial character of the divine Messiah; as at his baptism, (Matt. iii. 17; Mark i. 2; Luke iii. 22,) and again at his transfiguration; (Matt. xxi. 2; Luke ix. 29.) And this consideration, that if every individual were to oppose national institutions, no society could subsist, but by the tenor of Scripture and the common law. Nevertheless, Christianity does not interfere with political rights, but leaves individuals, as well as nations, in full enjoyment of whatever advantages the constitution of a country secures to its subjects.

OREB, a prince of the Midianites, killed with Zeeb, another prince of the same people, Judg. vii. 25.

ORIENTAL LANGUAGES, see LANGUAGE, p. 695.

ORION, one of the brightest constellations of the southern hemisphere. The Heb. מָכָא, Cheril, signifies, according to the best interpreters and the ancient versions, the constellation Orion, which, on account of its supposed connection with storms and tempests, Virgil calls nimbousus Orion. In Job xxxviii. 31, letters are ascribed to him; and this coincides with the Greek fable of the giant Orion, bound in the heavens. R. R. It also marks the west. Hence the LXX on Job ix. 11, and Theodotion on Amos vi. 8, translate it ἁγαθήματον. ORPHEA, a Moabitess, wife of Chilion, son of Elimelech and Naomi. Chilion, the husband of Orpah, being dead, she lived with Naomi, her mother-in-law; who returning into her own country, Orpah was prevailed on to stay in Moab, but Ruth followed Naomi to Bethlehem, Ruth i. 9, 10, &c. See RUTH.

ORPHAN. The customary acceptation of the word orphan is well known to be that of "children deprived of their parents," but the force of the Greek word ὄφον, (rendered comfortless in our translation, John xiv. 18) implies the case of those who have lost some dear protecting friend; some patron, though not strictly a father: and in this sense it is used, 1 Thess. ii. 7, "We also, brethren, being taken away from our care over you," ἀπελτοῦμεν διακμενεῖς. Corresponding to this import of the word, it might be used by our Lord, in the passage of John's Gospel referred to; and a very lively comment on it may perhaps be inferred from the following remark; especially if there were in the council of Herod or of the kings of Syria, or other western Asiatic monarchs, an order of soldiery of the same description; which is by no means impossible. "The soldiers of Nadir Shah are obliged to keep Yeitis at their own expense. Yeitis signifies an orphan; but these are considered as servants, who, when their masters die, or fall in battle, are ready to serve as soldiers." (Hawway's Travels in Persia, vol. i. p. 172.) May we now paraphrase our Lord's sentiment?—"You are about to see your master die, fall, as it were, in battle; and maybe that it would be your duty to succeed into my place, and to maintain the bloody conflict, till you also fell, as I had fallen; but I will not (long) leave you in that anxious situation: I will again return to you, and lead you on to victory under my protection and patronage: I will not now leave you Yeitis; though most of you may, at distant periods, close your lives as gallant soldiers in this noble warfare, after your master's example." There seems nothing inconsistent with the affection of Jesus to his followers, in this explanation.

OSPREY, a kind of eagle, whose flesh is forbidden, Lev. xix. 13. It is thought to be the black eagle; perhaps the Wiser Toookor described by Bruce. See BRITISH P. 181. of (now, peris,) an unclean bird, (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12.) But as to its identity interpreters are not agreed. Some read vulture, others the black eagle, others the falcon. The name peris denotes to crush, to break; and this name agrees with our version, which implies "the bone-breaker;" a name given to a kind of eagle, from its habit of breaking the bones of its prey, after it has eaten the flesh. John Aukels uses a passage which signifies, and leads us to the vulture: and, indeed, if we were to take the classes of birds in any thing like a natural order, in Lev. xi. the vulture should follow the eagle as an unclean bird. The Septuagint interpreter also renders vultures; and so do Munster, Schindler, and the Zurich versions. See Birds, p. 186.

OSTRICH. This singular bird is designated by three several appellations in the Hebrew Scriptures, each of which is, as usual, taken from some particular quality which it possesses, or habit to which it is addicted.

The first of these, יִפְתָּח, yiphtach, is frequently translated in our version, most improperly, by owl; a rendering which deprives several passages in which it occurs of all their strength and propriety. (See Job xii. 20; Is. xlix. 22; Mic. vii. 8.) In Lev. xi. 16, and Deut. xiv. 13, this bird is called הָגֶה, geh, "the daughter of the ostrich," in both these passages our translation reads "owl." In Job xxxix. 13, &c., where the ostrich is particularly described, it is called יִפְתָּח, a name which seems to be taken from its cry, or from the whirring noise made by its wings when it runs.

The ostrich is considered to be the largest of birds, and the connecting link between quadrupeds and fowls. Its head and bill somewhat resemble those of a duck; and the neck may be compared to that of a swan, but that it is much longer; the legs and thighs resemble those of a hen; but are very fleshy and large. The end of the foot is cloVEN, and has two very large toes, which, like the leg, are covered with scales. These toes are of unequal sizes; the largest, which is on the inside, being seven inches long including the claw, which is near three fourths of an inch in length, and almost as broad; the other toe is but four inches long, and is without a claw. The height of the ostrich is usually seven feet, from the head to the ground; but the back it is only four; so that the head and the neck are above three feet long. From the head to the end of the tail, when the neck is stretched in a right line, it is seven feet long. One of its wings, with its feathers stretched out, is three feet in length. The plumage is generally white and black, though some of them are said to be gray. There are no feathers on the sides of the thighs, nor under the wings. The lower half of the neck is covered with smaller feathers than those on the belly and back, and the head and upper part of the neck are covered with hair: at the end of each wing, there is a kind of spurt, resembling the quill of a porcupine, about an inch long; and about a foot lower down the wing is another of the same description, but something smaller.

The ostrich has not, like most other birds, feathers of various kinds; they are all bearded with detached hairs or filaments, without consistency and reciprocal adherence. The consequence is, that they cannot oppose to the air a suitable resistance, and therefore are of no utility in flying, or in directing the flight. Besides the peculiar structure of her wings, the ostrich is rendered incapable of flight by her enormous size, weighing seventy-five or eighty pounds; a weight which would require an immense power of wing to elevate into the air.
OSTRICH

The ostrich, he feelingly complains: "I am a brother to the vine; the lover of waters, and a lover of the sahara. Shy and timorous in no common degree, she retires from the cultivated field, where she is disturbed by the Arabian shepherds and husbandmen, into the deepest recesses of the sahara. In those dryness, she is reduced to subsist on a few tufts of coarse grass, which here and there languish on their surface, or a few other solitary plants equally destitute of nourishment, and, in the psalmist's phrase, even "withered before they are grown up." To this dry and parched food may perhaps be added, the great variety of land mites, which occasionally cover the leaves and stalks of these herbs, and which may afford her some refreshment.

Not is it improbable, that she sometimes repels herself on lizards and serpents, together with insects and reptiles of various kinds. Still, however, considering the voracity and size of this camel bird, (as it is called in the E. E.) it is wonderful how little cases should be nourished and brought up, and especially how those of full growth, and much better qualified to look out for themselves, are able to subsist.

The attachment of this bird to the barren solitudes of the sahara is frequently alluded to in the Holy Scriptures; prophesies in the prophecies of Isaiah, where the word "ox," as before observed, ought to be rendered the ostrich. In the splendid palaces of Babylon, so long the scenes of joy and revelry, the prophet foretold, that the shy and timorous ostrich should fix her abode; than which a greater and more affecting contrast can scarcely be presented to the mind.

When the ostrich is provoked, she sometimes makes a fierce, angry, and hissing noise, with her throat inflamed, and her mouth open; when she meets with a timorous adversary that opposes but a faint resistance to her assault, she chuckles or cackles like a hen, seeming to rejoice in the prospect of an easy conquest. But in the silent hours of night, she assumes a quite different tone, and makes a very dolorous and hissing noise, which sometimes resembles the roaring of a lion; at other times that of the bull and the ox. She frequently groans, as if she were in the greatest agony; an action to which the prophet beautifully alludes: "I will make a mourning for the ostrich," Mic. i. 8. The Hebrew term is derived from a verb which signifies to exclaim with a loud voice: and may therefore be attributed with sufficient propriety to the ostrich, whose voice is loud and sonorous; especially, as the word does not seem to denote any certain, determined mode of voice or sound peculiar to any one particular species of animals, but one that may be applicable to them all.

Dr. Brown confirms this account in every particular: he says, the cry of the ostrich resembles the voice of a hoarse child, and is even more dismal. It cannot, then, but appear mournful, and even terrible, to those travellers who plunge with no little anxiety into those immense deserts, to whom every living creature, man not excepted, is an object of fear, and a cause of danger.

Not more disagreeable, and even alarming, is the hoarse moaning voice of the ostrich to the lone traveller in the desert, than were the speeches of Job to that afflicted man. Of their harsh and groundless censures, which were continually
It would be perpetually flapping and priding itself with its quivering expanded wings, and seem, at every turn, to admire and be in love with its own shadow.

But of the stork and falcon for flight.

The argument drawn from natural history advances from quadrupeds to birds; and of birds, those only are selected for description which are most common to the country in which the scene lies, and, at the same time, are most singular in their properties. Thus, the ostrich is admirably contrasted with the stork and the eagle, as affording an instance of a winged animal totally incapable of flying, but endowed with an unrivalled rapidity of running, compared with birds whose flight is proverbially swift, powerful and persevering. Let man, in the pride of his wisdom, explain or arraign this difference of construction! Again, the ostrich is peculiarly opposed to the stork, and to some species of the eagle, in another sense, and a sense adverted to in the verses immediately ensuing; for the ostrich is well known to take little care of its eggs or its young; while, not to dwell upon the species of the eagle just glanced at, the stork has ever been, and ever deserves to be, held in proverbial repute for its parental fondness.

It may be remarked, that "the eagle spreading abroad her wings, and taking her young upon them," is mentioned, Deut. xxxii. 11, as an example of care and kindness. So that this passage may imply, that the wings of the ostrich, however wonderful for their plumage, are neither adapted for the flying of the possessor, nor for the shelter of her young; and so are peculiarly different from those of all other birds, and especially those most remarkable for their flight and other particulars.

She leaveth her eggs on the ground,
And warmeth them in the dust;
And is heedless that the foot may crush them,
Or the beast of the field trample upon them.

As for the stork, "the lofty fir-trees are her house;" but the improvident ostrich depothis her eggs in the earth. She buildeth her nest on some sandy hillock, in the most barren and solitary recesses of the desert, exposed to the view of every traveller, and the foot of every wild beast.

Our translators appear, by their version, which is composed, to have been influenced by the vulgar error, that the ostrich did not herself hatch her eggs by sitting on them, but left them to the heat of the sun; probably understanding so as of a total dereliction; whereas the original word signifies actively that she beareth them,—namely, by incubation. And Mr. Good, who also adopts this opinion, observes, that there is scarcely an Arabian poet who has not availed himself of this peculiar character of the ostrich in some simile or other. Let the following suffice, from Nawabah, quoted by Schultens:

There are who, deaf to nature's cries,
On stranger tribes bestow their food:
So her own eggs the ostrich flies,
And, senseless, rears another's brood.

This, however, does not prove that she wholly neglects incubation, but that she deserts her eggs, which may be because frightened away. The fact is, she usually sits upon her eggs, and the other birds do; but then she so often wanders, and so far in search of food, that frequently the eggs are addled by means of of strangers and enemies into Zion, and possessing it. Thus, in the twelfth verse of this chapter, it is said, "The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem;" and in ch. v. 2, "Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens."

With reference to the phrase, "her labor is vain," Mr. Vansittart remarks, while eggs are laid, and young ostriches produced, it can never be correct; and if the mother did even drive her young ones from her, still it could not be said that her labors had not been successful; because, while there was a young brood remaining, it would be evident that she had been prosperous. Labor in vain, he further remarks, must either be that which is not productive, or else what profits not the person who labors, or otherwise, what profits another who does not labor.

This, he conceives, is the case with the ostrich in the interpretation here suggested; and is, moreover, the true signification of the Hebrew phrase. The same phrase occurs, Lev. xxvii. 16, "Ye sow your seed in vain, for another shall reap it, not yourselves. Likewise, Isa. lxxi. 21-23, "They shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat; they shall not labor in vain: that is, profitless for themselves, and for the good of others. And again, ch. xlix. 4, "Then said I, Have I labored in vain? I have spent my strength for nought and in vain;" that is, when he had departed from the worship of Jehovah, and had been given up to the service of the gods of the nation, and consequently to their advantage, and not his own. It is in this sense that Mr. Vansittart proposes to understand the Hebrew word, which is not a forced signification, and is moreover the exact peculiarity and property of the ostrich intended to be marked.

Because God hath made her feeble of instinct, And not imparted to her understanding.

Natural affection and sagacious instinct are the grand instruments by which Providence continueth the race of other animals; but no limits can be set to the wisdom and power of God. He preserves the beneficence of the ostrich without those means, and even in a penury of all the necessaries of life.

In her private capacity, she is not less inconsiderate and foolish, particularly in the choice of food, which is often highly detrimental and pernicious to her. She swallows every thing greedily and indiscriminately, whether it be pieces of rags, leather, wood, stone or iron. They are particularly fond of their own ordure, which they greedily eat up as soon as it is voided; no less fond are they of the dung of lions and other poultry. It seems as if their appetite, as well as their olfactory nerves, were less adequate and conducive to their safety and preservation, than in other creatures. The divine Providence in this, no less than in other respects, "having deprived them of wisdom, neither hath it imparted to them understanding." This part of her character is fully admitted by Buffon, who describes it in nearly the same terms.

Yet at the time she saiththightly assumes courage; She scorneth the horse and his rider.

Dr. Durell justifies this translation, observing, that the ostrich cannot soar as other birds; and therefore the words in our version, "when she lifteth up herself," cannot be right; besides, the verb see occurs only in this place; and in Arabic it signifies to take courage, and the like.

Notwithstanding the stupidity of this animal, says Dr. Shaw, its Creator hath amply provided for its safety, by endowing it with extraordinary swiftness, and a surprising apparatus for escaping from its enemy. They, "when they raise themselves up for flight, laugh at the horse and his rider." They afford him an opportunity only of admiring at a distance the extraordinary agility, and the staleness, likewise, of their motions, the richness of their plumage, and the great propriety there was in ascribing to them an expanded quivering wing. Nothing, certainly, can be more entertaining than such a sight; the wings, by their rapid but unwearied vibrations, equally serving them for sails and oars; while their feet, no less assisting in conveying them out of sight, are no less insensible of fatigue.

The surprising swiftness of the ostrich is expressly mentioned by Xenophon, in his Anabasis; for, speaking of the desert of Arabia, he states that the ostrich is frequently seen there; that none could take them, the horsemen who pursue them soon giving it over; for they escaped far away, making use both of their feet to run, and of their wings, when expanded, as a sail to waft them along. This representation is confirmed by the writer of a voyage to Senegul, who says, "She sets off at a hard gallop; but, after being excited a little, she expands her wings as if to catch the wind, and abandons herself to a speed so great, that she seems not to touch the ground."

I am persuaded," continues that writer, "she would leave far behind the swiftest English courser." Buffon, also, admits that the ostrich runs faster than the horse. These unexceptionable testimonies completely vindicate the assertion of the inspired writer.

OTHNIEL, son of Kenaz of Judah, Josh. xv. 17. Scripture says, Othniel was brother to Caleb, (Judg. i. 13) meaning, probably, near relations, as cousins; for it is not likely they were literally brothers, since Othniel married the daughter of Caleb. See ACHSAY.

After the death of Joshua, the Israelites not exterminating the Canaanites, and not continuing in their fidelity to the Lord, he delivered them to Chushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, to whom they continued in subjection eight years. Judg. iii. Then they cried to the Lord, who raised them up for a deliverer Othniel, who, being filled with the Spirit of God, judged Israel; and the country had rest forty years. That is to say, it was in the peace the forthie year after the peace that Joshua had procured for it, A. M. 2974, nine years before the death. The year of Othniel's death is unknown.

OWL, an unclean bird, Lev. xi. 17. When Isaiah speaks of Babylon as reduced to a wilderness, he says that the owls shall answer one another there, (chap. xiii. 22) and the psalmist says, that in his affliction, he was as the owl sitting alone on the house-top, Ps. civ. 7. Interpreters, however, are not agreed on the signification of the Hebrew words translated owl, as may be seen under the article URTHECH. The owl was consecrated to Minerva, and on this account was honored by the Athenians, who represented it on their medallions.

PALESTINE, taken in a limited sense, denotes the country of the Philistines, or Palestinians; which was that part of the Land of Promise extending along the Mediterranean sea, from Gaza south to Lydda north. The LXX were of opinion that the word Philistim which they generally translate Allephylthes, signified strangers, or men of another tribe. Palestine, taken in a more general sense, signifies the whole country of Canaan, as well beyond, as on this side, Jordan; though frequently it is restrained to the country on this side that river: so that in later times the words Judea and Palestine were synonymous. We find also the name of Syria-Palesitina given to the Land of Promise, and even sometimes this province is comprehended in Coele-Syria, or the Lower Syria. Herodotus is the most ancient writer known who speaks of Syria-Palestina. He places it between Phoenicia and Egypt. See CANAAN.

PALM, a measure of a hand's, or four fingers' breadth, or 3.648 inches, Hebr. raš, Tephach; LXX, Palaùkē. Exod. xxv. 25. The Heb. Zereth, raš (LXX, τὸ ἱδρυτος, Exod. xxviii. 16.) is often translated palmes, though it signifies a span or half-cubit, and contains three ordinary palms; which ought to be observed, that two measures so unequal may not be confounded. Jerome sometimes translates Tephach by four fingers, and sometimes by a palm; but he always renders Zereth by palmus; and the Septuagint by Syphum. Goliath was in height six cubits and a Zereth; that is, six cubits and a half, making eleven feet ten inches and something more. We find in Ism. xi. 12, an expression that proves the Zereth, or palm, to signify the extent of the hand from the end of the thumb to the end of the little finger. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with a span?" a Zereth.

PALMER-WORM. Bochart is of opinion that the Hebrew גצל, gāzél, is a kind of locust, furnished with very sharp teeth, with which it graws off grass, corn, leaves of trees, and even their bark. The Jews support this idea, by deriving the word from gāz×, to cut, to shear, to mow; and Pisidias compares a swarm of locusts to a sword with ten thousand edges. Such is also the opinion of most commentators. But notwithstanding this, the LXX read γίγεται, and the Vulgate eruca, or caterpillar, which rendering is supported by Fuller. Michaelis also agrees with this notion, and thinks the sharp and cutting teeth of the caterpillar, which, like a sickle, clear away all before them, might give name to this insect. Caterpillars also begin their ravages before locusts, which seems to coincide with the nature of the creature here intimated. That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten.

Joel i. 4.

Palm-TREE. This tree is called צֵר, ħānav, from its straight, upright growth, for which it seems more remarkable than any other tree: it sometimes rises to the height of a hundred feet.

The palm is one of the most beautiful trees of the vegetable kingdom. The stalks are generally full of rugged knots, which are the vestiges of the decayed leaves: for the trunk is not solid like other trees, but its centre is filled with pith, round which is a tough bark, full of strong fibres when young, which, as the tree grows old, hardens and becomes ligneous. To this bark the leaves are closely joined, which in the centre rise erect, but after they are advanced above the vagina that surrounds them, they expand very wide on every side the stem, and, as the older leaves decay, the stalk advances in height. The leaves, when the tree has grown to a size for bearing fruit, are six or eight feet long; are very broad when spread out, and are used for covering the tops of houses, and similar purposes. The fruit, which is called "date," grows below the leaves in clusters; and is of a sweet and agreeable taste. The learned Kempter, as a botanist, an antiquary and a traveller, has exhausted the whole subject of palm-trees. The diligent natives, says Dr. Gibbon, celebrated, either in a true or poetic manner, the uses to which the trunk, the branches, the leaves and the fruit were skillfully applied. The extensive importance of the date-tree, says Dr. Clarke, is one of the most curious subjects to which a traveller can direct his attention. A considerable part of the inhabitants of Egypt, of Arabia and Persia, subsist almost entirely on its fruit. They boast also of its medicinal virtues. Their camels feed upon the date stone. From the leaves they make couches, baskets, bags, mats and brushes; from the branches, cages for their poultry, and fences for their gardens; from the fibres of the boughs, thread, ropes and rigging; from the sap is prepared a spirituous liquor; and the body of the tree furnishes fuel: it is even said, that from one variety of the palm-tree, the "phoenix farinifera," meal has been extracted, which is found among the fibres of the trunk, and has been used for food.

Several parts of the Holy Land, no less than of Idumeas, that lay contiguous to it, are described by the ancients to have abounded with date-trees. Judea, particularly, is typified in several coins of Vespasian, by a disemboweler woman sitting under a palm-tree. Upon the Greek coin, likewise, of his son Titus, struck upon a like occasion, we see a shield suspended upon a palm-tree, with a victory writing upon it. The same tree, upon a medal of Domitian, is made an emblem of Neposia, formerly Sichem, or Naploes, as it is now called; as it likewise of Sephoria, or Sepharchy, according to the present name, the metropolis of Galilee, upon one of Trajan's. It may be presumed, therefore, that the palm-tree was formerly much cultivated in the Holy Land.

In Deut. xxxiv. 3. Jericho is called the city of palm-trees, because, as Josephus, Strabo and Pliny have remarked, it anciently abounded with them; and so Dr. Shaw states that there are several of them yet at Jericho, where there is rare or no water; the tree require of being often watered; where likewise the climate is warm, and the soil sandy, or such as they thrive and delight in. At Jerusalem, Sichem, and other places to the northward, however, Dr. Shaw states that he rarely saw above two or three of them together; and even these, as their fruit rarely or ever comes to maturity, are of no further service, than (like the palm-trees of Deborah) to shade the retreats or sanctuaries of their sheikhs, as they might formerly have been sufficient to supply the solemn processions with branches. (See John xii. 13.) From the present condition and quality of the palm-trees in this part of the Holy Land, Dr. Shaw concludes that they never were either numerous or fruitful here, and that, therefore, the opinion of Reland and others, that Phoenicia is the same with "a country of date-trees" does not appear probable; for if such a useful and beneficial plant had ever been cultivated there to advantage, it would have still continued to be cultivated, as in Egypt and Barisary.

In the latter country, in the maritime, as well as the inland parts, there are several large plantations of the palm-tree; though such only as grow in the Sahara bring their fruit to perfection. Dr. Shaw, to whom we are so greatly indebted for our acquaintance with the natural history of the East, informs us that they are propagated chiefly from the roots of full grown trees, which, if well transplanted, and taken care of, will yield their fruit in the sixth or seventh year; whereas those which are raised immediately from the kernels, will not bear till about the sixteenth year. This method of raising the young, or palm, and particularly the fact that when the old trunk dies, there is never wanting one or other of these offsprings to succeed it, may have given rise to the fable of the phoenix dying, and another arising from its ashes.

It is a singular fact that these trees are male and female, and that the fruit which is produced by the latter will be dry and insipid without a previous communication with the former. In the month of March or April, therefore, when the sheaths that respectively enclose the young clusters of the male flowers, and the female fruit, begin to open, at which time the latter are formed, and the former are mealy, they take a sprig or two of the male cluster, and insert it into the sheath of the female; or else they take a whole cluster of the male tree, and sprinkle the meal or farina of it over several clusters of the female. The latter practice is common in Egypt, where they have a number of males; but the trees of Barbary are impregnated by the former method, one male being sufficient for four or five hundred females.

The palm-tree arrives at its greatest vigor about thirty years after transplantation, and continues so seventy years afterwards, bearing yearly fifteen or twenty clusters of dates, each of them weighing fifteen or twenty pounds. After this period, it begins gradually to decline, and usually falls about the latter end of its second century. "To be exalted," or "to flourish like the palm-tree," are as just and proper expressions, suitable to the nature of this plant, as "to spread about like a cedar." Ps. xcvii. 11.

The root of the palm-tree produces a great number of suckers, which, spreading upward, form a kind of forest. It was under a little wood of this kind, as Calmet thinks, that the prophetess Deborah dwelt, between Ravnah and Bethel, Judg. iv. 5. And probably to this multiplication of the palm-tree, as he suggests, the prophet alludes, when he says, "The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree," (Ps. xcvii. 12; comp. Ps. i. 3.) rather than to its towering height, as Dr. Shaw supposes.

The palm is much fonder of water than many other trees of the forest, and this will account for its flourishing so much better in some places than others. When Moses and his people on their way to the promised land arrived at Elim, they found twelvewaters, (Exod. xiv. 25.) and the Israelites watered there the cattle. (Exod. xv. 27.) And we learn from sir Robert Wilson, History of the Expedition to Egypt, p. 15.) that when the English army landed in Egypt, in 1801, expel the French from that country, sir Sidney Smith assured the troops that wherever date-trees grew water must be near; and so they found it on diggings usually within such a distance that the roots of the tree could obtain moisture from the fluid. Burchard confirms this statement in several places ((Travels in Syria, &c. p. 473, 509, 531, 562, &c.)

The prophet Jeremiah, describing, in a fine strain of irony, the idols of the heathens, says, "They are up right as the palm-tree," (chap. ix. 5.) which Calm takes to be an allusion to their shape, remarking from Diodorus Sinarus, that the ancients, before their art of carving was carried to perfection, made the images all of a thickness, straight, having their hands hanging down, and close to their sides, the legs joincd together, the eyes shut, with a very perpendicular attitude, and not unlike the body of a palm-tree. Such are the figures of those ancient Egyptian statues that still remain. The famous Greek architect an sculptor Dendalus set their legs at liberty, opened the eyes, and gave them a more free and easy attitude. The straight and firmly growing palm-tree, its longevity and great fecundity, the permanency an perpetual flourishing of its leaves, and their form resembling the solar rays, makes it a very proper emblem of the natural, and thence of the divine light. Hence in the holy place or sanctuary of the temple (the emblem of Christ's body,) palm-trees were engraved on the walls and doors between the coupled cherubs 1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35; Ezek. xiii. 18, 19, 20, 25, 26. Hence, at the Feast of Tabernacles branches of palm-trees were to be used, among others, in making the booths. (Comp. Lev. xxiii. 39; Neh. viii. 15.) Palm branches were also used as emblems of victory, both by believers and idolaters. The reason given by Plutarch and Aulus Gellius, why they were so among the latter is the nature of the wood, which so powerfully resists incendent pressure. But, doubtless, believer by bearing palm-branches after a victory, or triumph, meant to acknowledge the supreme Author of their success and prosperity, and to carry on the thought to the Immortal Light, and the tree of life over sin and death. (Comp. 1 Mac. xiii. 31; 2 Mac. x. 7; John xii. 13; Rev. vii. 2.) And the idolaters likewise, probably used palm on such occasions, without respect to Apollo or the sun, to whom among them, they were consecrated. Hence, probably, we have the name of a place, "Baal-Tamar," (Judg. xx. 33.) Tamar being, as we have said, the name of the palm-tree; it being so called in honor of Baal or the sun, whose image, it may be, was then accompanied by this tree. Herodotus states that there were many palm-trees at Apollo's temple, athus, in Egypt; and that at Sais, in the temple of Muirna, or Athem, (a name for the solar light,) they were artificial columns in imitation of palm-trees. In cant. vii. 7, the statue of the bride is compared to a palm-tree, which conveys a pleasing idea of the gracefulness and beauty. So Theocritus compare Helen to a cypress-tree in a garden; but Ulysses makes almost the same comparison as that of Solomon, by likening the palace of Neusian to a young palm-tree growing by Apollo's altar in Delos. It is probable that Tamar, (Ezek. xlviii. 19, &c.) e Tadmor, (1 Kings ix. 18.) built in the desert by Solomon, and afterwards called Palmyra by the Greeks, obtained its name from the number of palm-trees which grew about it.

As the Greek name for this tree signifies also the fabulous bird, called the phoenix, some of the fathers have supposed that the psalmist (xcii. 12.) alludes to the latter, and on his authority have made the phoenix an emblem of resurrection. Terullian calls it a full and striking emblem of this hope. But the tree, also, seems to have been considered as emblematical of the revivification of the human body, from its being found in some burial places in the East. In our colder climates, we have substituted the yew-tree in its place.

Palsy, a disorder which deprives the limbs of motion, and makes them useless to the patient. Our Saviour cured several paralytics by his word alone. (See Matt. iv. 24; viii. 6; ix. 2; Mark iii. 4, 5; Luke v. 18.) The sick man who was lying near the pool at the sheep-market, for thirty-eight years, was a paralytic, John v. 9.

Pamphylia, a province of Asia Minor, having Cilicia east, Lycia west, Paphlagonia north, and the Mediterranean sea south. It is contiguous to Cyprus, and the sea between the coast and the island is called the sea of Pamphylia. The chief city of Pamphylia was Perge, where Paul and Barnabas preached, Acts xiii. 14, 19.

PAPER, PAPYRUS, see Book, p. 200, 201.

Paphos, a famous city of the isle of Cyprus, where Paul converted the proconsul Sergius Paulus, and struck with blindness a Jewish sorcerer, called Bar-jesus, who would have hindered his conversion. Paphos was at the western extremity of the island, Acts xiii. 6, A. D. 44.

Parable, παράβολα, (Heb. סַקִּית, Maslaim), from the verb παραβιβάζω, which signifies to compare things together, to form a parallel or similitude of them with other things. What we call the Proverbs of Solomon, which are moral maxims and sentences, the Greeks call the Parables of Solomon. And when Jerome would express the poetic and sententious style of Balaam, (Numb. xxiii. 7, 18, &c.) he says, he began to speak in a parable. In like manner, when Job answers his friends, it is said, he began to take up his parable, Job xxxii. 1; xxxiii. 1. The parabolical, enigmatical, figurative and sententious way of speaking, was the language of the eastern sages and legislators, and nothing was more insupportable than to hear a fool utter parables. Prov. xxxvii. 7.

The prophets employed parables, the more strongly to impress prince and people with their threatenings or their promises. Nathan reproved David under the parable of a rich man who had taken away and killed the lamb of a poor man, 2 Sam. xii. 2, 3, &c. The woman of Tekoa, who was hired by Joab to reconcile the mind of David to Absalom, proposed to him the parable of her two sons who fought together, and one having killed the other, they were going to put the murderer to death, and so to deprive her of both her sons, 2 Sam. xv. 2, 3, &c. Jotham, son of Gideon, addressed to the Shechemites the parable of the bramble of Ishbin, whom the trees chose for king, Judg. ix. 7, 8, &c. Our Saviour most frequently addressed the people in parables; thereby verifying the prophecy of Isaiah, (vi. 9.) that the people should see without knowing, and hear without understanding, in the midst of instruction. Jerem. observes, that the purpose of instructing and speaking by similitudes and parables, was common in Syria, and especially in Palestine. It is certain that the ancient sages employed this style almost to affectation.

Some parables in the New Testament may perhaps be supposed to derive histories; as that of Lazarus and the wicked rich man; that of the good Samaritan; and that of the Prodigal Son. In others, our Saviour seems to allude to some points of history in those times; as that describing a king who went into a far country, to receive a kingdom; which may hint at the history of Archelaus, who, after the death of his father Herod the Great, went to Rome, to receive from Augustus the confirmation of his father's will, by which he had bequeathed the kingdom of Judea to him.

The word parable is sometimes used in Scripture in a sense of reproach and contempt. God threatens his people to scatter them among the nations, and to make them a parable (English translation, a proverb) to the people, 2 Chron. vii. 20. So that whenever one would express a nation hated of God, and which has suffered his fierce anger, he shall say, May you become like Israel!!

Paracles, a title given to the Holy Spirit by our Saviour, John xiv. 16. See Comforter.

Paradise. This word signifies a garden or forest of trees, a park, in which sense it is used, Neh. vii. 8; Eccles. i. 5; Cant. iv. 13.

The Septuagint use the word Parasis, (Gen. ii. 8) when they speak of the garden of Eden, in which the Lord placed Adam and Eve. This famous garden is indeed commonly known by the name of "the terrestrial paradise," and there is hardly any part of the world in which it has not been sought. See Enas.

In the New Testament, paradise is put for a place of delight, where the souls of the blessed enjoy happiness. Thus our Saviour tells the penitent thief on the cross, (Luke xxiii. 43.) "To-day shalt thou be in paradise," i.e. in the state of the blessed. Paul, speaking of himself in the third person, says, (2 Cor. xi. 4.) "I knew a man who was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." And again our Lord says, (Rev. ii. 7.) "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." The Jews commonly call paradise "the garden of Eden," and they imagine that at the coming of the Messiah they shall here enjoy an earthly felicity, in the midst of delight; and that, till the redemption and the coming of the Messiah, their souls shall continue here in a state of rest.

Parallelistism, see Poetry.

Paran, El-paran, or Paran, a desert of Arabia Petraea, south of the Land of Promise, and north-west of the gulf of Elanitis. (See the situation of this desert fully discussed under Exodus, p. 418.) Chedarlemmer and his allies ravaged the country, to the plains of Paran, (Gen. xiv. 6.) and Siger, being sent from Abraham, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where she lived with her son Ishmael, Gen. xxii. 21. The Israelites, having decamped from Sinai, came into this desert, (Numb. x. 12.) and thence Moses sent spies to inspect the Land of Promise, ch. xiii. 3. When David was persecuted by Saul, he withdrew into the wilderness of Paran, near Maon, and south of Carmel, 1 Sam. xxxv. 1, 2. The greater part of the habitations of this country, it is said, were dug in the rocks; and here Simon of Gerasa gathered together all that he took from his enemies.

Paran was also the name of a city of Arabia Po-three days' journey from Elam, or Alat, east, Deut. i. 11; 1 Kings xii. 18. But see Exodus, p. 416.

PARDON, entire remission of punishment due to guilt. God extends mercy as his darling attribute, and mercy delighteth in pardoning. God is said to multiply pardons, to be ready to pardon, to pardon for his name's sake, &c. Various similes are used to denote the nature of pardon; as, to take away iniquity, to cover sin, to blot out sin, to cast sins behind the back, not to remember them, &c. Man is liable to recollect transgressions, after having pardoned them, but God pardons effectually and completely. The gospel furnishes the noblest motive to us to pardon others; "even as God for Christ's sake hath pardoned us."

PARENT, a name properly given to a father or a mother, but extended also to relations by blood, especially in a direct line, upward. Scripture commands children to honor their parents, (Exod. xx. 12.) i.e. to obey them, to succor them, to respect them, to give them all assistance that nature, and their and our circumstances, require. Christ (Matt. xv. 5, 6) condemns that corrupt explication which the doctors of the law gave of this precept; by teaching that a child was disengaged from the obligation of supporting and assisting his parents, when he said, "It is a gift by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; q. d., he is no longer master of my own estate; it is consecrated to the Lord." See Corban.

Marriages among parents and relations were forbidden within certain degrees, Lev. xvii.

PARLOR, that room in a house where the master or his family customarily speak with visitors; but whether the word rendered parlor has always this import in the Hebrew, may be doubtful. (Compare Judges ii. 20; 1 Sam. ix. 25.)

PARMASITA, the seventh son of Haman; slain by the Jews, with his father, Esther ix. 9.

PAREMNAS, one of the first seven deacons, Acts vi. 5, 6.

Parsimath, the eldest son of Haman, put to death with his father, Esther ix. 7.

PART, PORTION. "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance," Ps. xvi. 5. "Thou art my refuge, and my portion in the land of the living," Ps. ex. 5. And Israel is the part, or portion of the Lord, his people; the portion of his people: Jacob is the lot of his inheritance," Deut. xxxii. 9.

But with this difference: God makes and constitutes the happiness of his people, but his people cannot augment God's happiness or glory. Part or portion always signifies a proper and certain portion or share. "This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the inheritance appointed unto him by God," Job xx. 29. "They shall be a portion for foxes," Ps. lxvii. 10. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup," Ps. xi. 6. This is their part or portion, and the just punishment of their iniquity. The Lord shall "appoint him his portion with the hypocrites," Matt. xxiv. 51.

PARTHA is thought to have been originally a province of Media, on its eastern side, which was raised into a distinct kingdom by Arsaces, ante A. D. 250. It soon extended itself over a great part of the ancient Persian empire, and is frequently put for that empire in Scripture, and other ancient writings. Partha maintained itself against all aggressors for nearly 500 years, but in A. D. 228, one of the descendants of the ancient Persian kings united it to the ancient empire, and Persia resumed its ancient name and dynasty.

The Parthians were celebrated, especially by the poets, for their mode of fighting, which consisted in discharging their arrows while they fled. They would seem to have borne no very distant resemblance to the modern Cossacks. It is said the Parthians were either refugees or exiles from the Scythian nations. Jews from among them were present at Jerusalem at the Pentecost, Acts ii. 9.

PARTRIDGE. The Hebrew name of this bird is ἄργα, ορθός, the caller. Forskal mentions a partridge whose name, in Arabic, is Jar; and Latham says, that in the province of Andalusia, in Spain, its name is charr, both taken, no doubt, from the Hebrew. The German hunters also say of the partridge, "It calls." As this bird is so well known in every part of the world, a particular description is unnecessary. There are only two passages of Scripture in which the partridge is mentioned; but these will repay our attentive examination. The first occurs in the history of David, where he expostulates with Saul concerning his unjust and foolish pursuit: "Saul, the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge on the mountains," 1 Sam. xxvi. 20.

The learned Bochart objects to the partridge in this place, and contends that the kore is more likely to be the woodcock, since the partridge is not a mountain bird. This, however, is a mistake; there is a species of the partridge which exactly answers to the description of David; and those of Barbakinda, in particular, are said to choose the highest rocks and precipices for their residence. "The Arabs have another though a more laborious method of catching these birds; for, observing that they become languid and fatigued after they have hastily been put up once or twice, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their scheid, or bludgeons." It was precisely in this manner Saul hunted David, coming hastily upon him, and putting him up from time to time, in hopes he should at length, by frequent repetitions, destroy him. In addition to this method of taking the partridge, Dr. Shaw states, that the Arabs are well acquainted with that mode of catching them which is called tunelling; and to make the capture of them the greater, they will sometimes place behind the net a cage, with some other bird or young creature as an object of their perpetual chirping and calling, quickly bring down the coves that are within hearing, and thereby decoy great numbers of them. This, he remarks, may lead us into the right interpretation of Eccles. xi. 30, which we render "a bird in a snare," not "a bird in a cage," yet so is the heart of the proud;" but should be, "like a decoy partridge in a cage, so is it," &c.

The other passage in which this bird is mentioned, is Jer. xvii. 11: "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so be it gethe riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool." It seems to be clear here that this bird sitteth on eggs not its own, to correspond to the getting of riches not by right: from these eggs it is driven away, leaving them to the midst of his days, before the time of hatching is expired. But why should it be said of the partridge, rather than any other bird, that it sitteth and hatcheth not? The reason is plain, when it is known that this bird's nest, being made on the ground, the eggs are frequently broken, by the foot of man or other animals, and she is often obliged to quit them, by the presence of intruders, which chills the eggs and renders them un-fruitful. Rain and moisture also may spoil them. Observing that Buffon makes a separate species of the barbevalla, or Greek partridge, Mr. Taylor proposes to eat, and the birds, the pomegranate rose and others. To the red partridge, and principally to the barbevalla, must be referred all that the ancients have related of the partridge. Aristotle must needs know the Greek partridge better than any other, since this is the only kind in Greece, in the isles of the Mediterranea; and, according to all appearance, in that part of Asia conquered by Alexander. Belon informs us, that the barbevalla keeps ordinarily among the rocks; but has the instinct to descend into the plain to make its nest, in order that the young may find at the birth a ready subsistence. It has another analogy with the common hen; this is, to sit upon (or hatch) the egges of strangers for want of its own. This remark is of a long standing, since it occurs in the sacred book. Now if in the absence of the proper owner, this barbevalla partridge sits on the eggs of a stranger, when that stranger returns to her nest, and drives away the intruder before she can hatch them, the partridge so expelled resembles a man in low circumstances, who had possessed himself, for a time, of the property of another, but is forced to relinquish his acquisition, before he can render it profitable; which is the simile of the prophet, and agrees, too, with this place.

ARVAIM, the name of a region, (2 Chron. iii. 6,) thought to be the same as Ophir.

PASDAMMIM, a place in the tribe of Judah, (1 Chron. xi. 13,) called Ephes-dammim, 1 Sam. xvii. 1.

PASSION. This word has several very different significations. First, it signifies the passion or suffering of Christ: ‘To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion,’ Acts i. 3. Secondly, it signifies shameful passions, (Rom. i. 26,) to which those are given up, whom God abandons to their own desires, Rom. vii. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 5.

PASSOVER, (Pasche, now, a passing over,) a name given to the festival established in commemoration of the coming forth out of Egypt, (Exod. xii.) because, the night before their departure, the destroying angel, who slew the first born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews, but cut off the lamb, which they were marked with the blood of the lamb, which, for this reason, was called the Paschal lamb.

The month of the exodus from Egypt (called Abib in Moses, afterwards called Nisan) was ordained to be thereafter the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings, that is, between the sun's decline and its setting—according to our reckoning, between three o'clock in the afternoon and six in the evening, at the equinox—they were to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The day following, being the fifteenth, reckoned from six o'clock of the preceding evening, was the grand feast of the passover, which continued seven days; but only the first and the seventh day were peculiarly solemn. The slain lamb ought to be without defect, a male, and of that year. If no lamb could be found, they might take a kid. They killed a lamb or a kid in each family; and if the number of the family were not sufficient to eat the lamb, they might associate two families together.

With the blood of the lamb they sprinkled the doorposts and lintel of every house, that the destroying angel, beholding the blood, might pass over them. Then they took the lamb, the same night, roasted, with unleavened bread, and a salad of wild lettuce, or bitter herbs. It was forbidden to eat any part of it raw or boiled; nor were they to break a bone; but it was to be eaten entire, even with the head, the feet, and the bowels of the same. Following, it was thrown into the fire, Exod. xii. 46; Num. ix. 12; John xix. 36. They who ate it were to be in the posture of travellers, having their loins girt, shoes on their feet, staves in their hands, and resting in a hurry. This last part of the ceremony was but little observed; at least it was of no obligation after the night in which they came out of Egypt. During the whole eight days of the passover, no leavened bread was to be used. They kept the first and last days of the feast; but it was allowed to dress victuals, which was forbidden on the sabbath day.

The obligation of keeping the passover was very strict; so much so, indeed, that Calmet thinks, whoever should neglect it was condemned to death, Num. ix. 13. Those who had any lawful impediment, as a journey, sickness, or uncleanness, voluntary or involuntary, were to defer the celebration of the passover till the second month of the ecclesiastical year, the fourteenth day of the month Jir, (which answers to April and May.) We see an example of this postponed passover under Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 2, &c.

We may add, that the oriental Christians, and especially the Syrians, insist that on the year that Christ died, the feast was celebrated on the thirteenth of Adar, being Saturday, that it began at the conclusion of the Friday before, and that our Saviour anticipated it by a day, celebrating it on the Friday, (beginning from the evening of the Thursday before,) because he was to suffer on the Friday.

The ceremonies with which the modern Jews celebrate their passover are described by Leo of Modena. (Part iii. cap. 3.) The feast continues a week, but the Jews of Palestine extend it to eight days, according to an ancient custom, by which the Sætered sent two men to observe the first appearance of the new moon, and immediately gave notice of it to the chief of the council. For fear of error, they kept two days of the festival. One was called dies lunae ante; the other, dies opparentis lunae. So that the first two days of the passover, and the last two also, are sacred, both from labor and business. But it is allowed to prepare victuals, and to remove from place to place whatever they have occasion for. For the four intervening days it is only forbidden to work; and they are distinguished from working-days only by some particulars. Will not these two days reconcile the day on which our Saviour kept the passover, with that of other Jews?—It cannot be thought that the priests at the temple would kill the lamb for any body before the proper time. During the eight days of the feast, the Jews eat only unleavened bread, and it is not allowed them to have in their custody any leaven, or bread leavened. They examine all the house with a very scrupulous care, to reject whatever may have any ferment in it. See LEAVEN.

While the temple was in being, the Jews sacrificed a lamb in the temple, between the two evenings; (that is, after the noon of the 30th of Nisan, from about two o'clock to six in the evening;) private persons brought them to the temple, and there slew them; they then offered the blood to the priests, who poured it out at the foot of the altar. The person himself, or a Levite, on this occasion, might cut the throat of a victim, but the effusion of the blood at the foot of the altar was appropriate to the priest.
As to the Christian passover, the Lord's supper, it was instituted by Christ, when, at the last passover supper he ate with his apostles, he gave them a sign of his body to eat, and a sign of his blood to drink, under the species of bread and wine; prefiguring that he should give up his body to the Jews and to death. The paschal lamb which the Jews killed, tore to pieces, and ate, and whose blood preserved them from the destroying angel, was a type and figure of our Saviour's death and passion, and of his blood shed for the salvation of the world. There has been a diversity of sentiment, and of practice, about the celebration of the Christian passover. From the time of Polycarp the churches of Asia kept Easter-day on the fourteenth day of the moon of March, whatever day that might happen upon, in imitation of the Jews; whereas the Latin church kept it on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon of March. Polycarp came to Rome and conferred with Anicetus on this subject; but neither of them being able to convince the other, they thought they ought not to disturb the peace of the church about a matter of mere custom. The dispute, however, grew warm under the pontificate of Victor, about A. D. 185, and the Asiatics continuing their practice, and Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, with the other bishops of Asia, having written to the pope a long letter in support of their opinion, Victor sent letters through all the churches, by which he declared them excommuni cated! The other churches did not approve of this rigor, and notwithstanding his sentence, they continued in communion with those who still kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon of March. At the council of Nice, A. D. 325, the greater part of the churches of Asia were found to have insensibly fallen into the practice of the Romans. The council, therefore, ordained, that all the churches should celebrate Easter-day on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon of March; and the emperor Constantine caused this decree to be published through the Roman empire. Those who continued the old practice were treated as schismatics, and had the name of Quarto-decimans, or partisans of the 14th day, given them.

It has been thought a famous question, whether our Saviour kept the legal and Jewish passover the last year of his life. Some have thought that the supper he ate with his disciples, when he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, was an ordinary meal, without a paschal lamb. Others, that he anticipated the passover, keeping it on the Thursday evening, while the other Jews kept it on the evening when he may be glad of a light to assist in directing his steps, so the word of God is a light to guide those in their course of duty and duty, who otherwise might wander, or be at a less for direction. Wicked men and women are said to have paths full of snares. The dispensations of God are his paths, Ps. xxxi. 10. The precepts of God are paths, Ps. xvii. 4. The phenomena of nature are paths of God; [Ps. xxvii. 19; Isa. xi. 18.] and to those depths which are beyond human inspection, the course of God in his providence is likened. If his paths are obscure in nature, so they may be in providence, and in grace too. May he show us, with increasing clearness, the path of life! See CAUSEWAT.

PAPHROS, (Jer. xliv. 1, 15; Ezek. xxvii. 14; xxx 14,) one of the three ancient divine cities of Upper Egypt, which Ezekiel speaks of as distinct from Egypt and the original abode of the Egyptians; as indeed Egyptian and Upper Egypt really were Ezekiel threatens the Paphrum with entire ruin. The Jews and thither, notwithstanding the resistances of Jeremiah; and the Lord says, by Isaiah, that he will bring them back from thence.
PATIENCE, endurance, calmness of mind, under disappointment or suffering. The patriarch Job is one of the most illustrious instances of this. When God permitted to afflict him, he did not behave impatiently, James v. 11. The patience of God, (1 Pet. iii. 20.) which invites our conversion, and delays to punish us, is the effect of his mercy, and of his infinite power. The patience of the poor, which shall not be lost (Ps. ix. 18.)—also, thou art my patience and my God (Ps. lxxxi. 5.)—is another thing; for patience in this place rather signifies hope and expectation. The hope which the poor has placed in God, shall not be in vain, Matt. xxviii. 20; Luke xvii. 7. They bring forth fruit with patience; (Luke viii. 15.) i.e. amidst sufferings, which exercise their patience, and perfect it; with perseverance. Not unlike this is the expression, "In your patience possess ye your souls,"—keep your minds quiet; and your self-possession shall enable you to save your lives out of pressing dangers.

PATMOS, an island of the Ægean sea, to which the apostle and evangelist John was banished, A. D. 94, Rev. i. 9. In this island he is said to have had his revelation, recorded in the Apocalypse. (But see under APOCALYPSE.) The island is between the island of Icaria, and the promontory of Miletus, or between Samos and Naxos, and is now called Patmos, or Patmos. To visit it is not less than fifty and twenty or thirty miles. It has a city called Patmos, with a harbor, and some monasteries of Greek monks, who show a cave, now a chapel, where they pretend that John wrote his Revelations.

PAVEMENT, see GARBATHA.

PAUL, originally named Saul, was of the tribe of Benjamin, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, and a Pharisee by sect. He was first a persecutor of the church, but afterwards a disciple of Christ, and the apostle of the Gentiles. He was a Roman citizen, (Acts xxii. 27, 28.) because Augustus had given him the freedom of Rome to the freemen of Tarsus, in consideration of his firm adherence to his interests. His parents sent him to Jerusalem, where he studied the law at the feet of Gamaliel, a famous doctor, Acts xxii. 3. He made very great progress in his studies, and his life was blameless before men; being very zealous for the full observation of the Mosaic law. His zeal persecuted Jesus Christ in his members, (1 Tim. i. 13.) and when the proto-martyr Stephen was stoned, Saul was not only consenting to his death, but he even stood by, and took care of the clothes of those who stoned him, Acts vii. 58, 59. This happened A. D. 33, some time after our Saviour's death. At the time of the persecution against the church, after the death of Stephen, Saul was one who showed the most violence in distressing believers, Gal. i. 13; Acts xxvi. 11. He entered their houses, and forcibly seized men and women, and sent them to prison, Acts viii. 3; xiii. 4. In the synagogues he caused those to be beaten who believed in Jesus Christ, compelling them to blaspheme the name of the Lord. Having received credentials from the high-priest Caiaphas, and the elders of the Jews, to the chief Jews of Damascus, with power to bring with him to Jerusalem all the Christians he should find there, he departed, full of threats, and breathing out slaughter. But on the road, near Damascus, and about noon, himself and his company were encompassed by a great light from heaven, the splendor of which struck him to the ground, and Saul heard a voice saying to him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Saul answered, "Who art thou, Lord?" The Lord replied, "I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest; it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." So, in consternation, asked, "Lord, what is it that thou wilt have me to do?" Jesus bade him go to Damascus, where he should learn his will.

Saul now, though his eyes were open, yet had no sight; his companions, therefore, led him by the hand to Damascus, where he continued three days, unable to see, or to take nourishment. On the third day, the Lord commanded Ananias, a disciple, to find him out, to lay his hands on him, and to cure his blindness. This was done, and Saul was baptized, and filled with the Holy Ghost; after which he continued some time with the disciples at Damascus, preaching in the synagogues, and proving that Jesus was the Messiah.

Saul subsequently went into Arabia, (Gal. i. 17.) probably in the neighborhood of Damascus, then under the government of Aretas, king of Arabia. After a while, he returned to Damascus, and preached the gospel; but the Jews, unable to bear its growing progress, resolved to put Saul to death. The apostle, however, escaped, by being let down along the wall in a basket, (Acts ix. 24. A. D. 37.) the third year after his arrival at Damascus. Visiting Jerusalem to see Peter, the disciples were fearful of interference with Saul, not believing him to be a real convert, Gal. i. 18. But Barnabas having introduced him to the apostles, Saul related to them the manner of his conversion, &c. From Jerusalem he went to Caesarea of Palestine, and thence to his own country, Tarsus.

Here he continued for five or six years, from A. D. 37 to 43; when Barnabas being sent to Antioch by the apostles, and finding many Christians there, he went to Tarsus to seek Saul, and brought him to Antioch, where they continued a year, Acts xi. 29, 30, 35. During this time there happened a great famine in Judea, and the Christians of Antioch having made collections to assist their brethren at Jerusalem, they deputed Paul and Barnabas to carry their offering thither, A. D. 44. Having returned to Antioch, it was intimated to them by the prophets in this church, that God had appointed them to carry his word into other places. The church, therefore, after fasting and prayer, with the prophets Simeon, Lucius and Manaen, laid their hands on them, and sent them to preach whither the Holy Ghost should conduct them. It is thought to have been about this time, (A. D. 44.) that Paul, being enraptured into the third heaven, saw ineffable things, 2 Cor. xii. 2—4.

Paul and Barnabas went first to Cyprus, preaching in the synagogues of the Jews. At Paphos (A. D. 45.) they found a Jewish magician called Bar-jesus, who did all he could to prejudice the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, against the Christian faith. As a punishment, Paul deprived him of sight for a time, and the proconsul, who had witnessed the miracle, became a convert. From Cyprus Paul and his company went to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark, Barnabas's cousin, left them to return to Jerusalem. Making no stay at Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, where, being desired to preach in the synagogue, Paul, in a long discourse, showed that Jesus was the Messiah foretold by the prophets; and that he rose again the third day. He was desired to speak upon the same subject the next sabbath day, when almost all the city came together to hear. The Jews, seeing this concourse, and being moved with envy, opposed what Paul said, upon which the apoc-
To turn from them to go to the Gentiles. From Damascus they went to Jerusalem, preached in the synagogues, and converted a number both of Jews and Gentiles, God confirming their mission by many miracles. In the mean time the Jews having increased the Gentiles against them, and threatening to stone them, they retired to Lystra and Derbe, cities of that coast. At Lystra they restored a cripple called Aeneas, in consequence of which the people declared, that "the gods had descended in human shape" and were with much difficulty restrained from offering sacrifices to them.

Shortly after, however, some Jews of Antioch in Pisidia and Iconium, coming to Lystra, animated the people against the apostles, and the rabble stoned Paul, and drew him out of the city, thinking him to be dead. But the disciples gathering about him, he rose up, and the next day went for Derbe. Having here also preached the gospel, they returned to Lystra, to Iconium, and to Antioch of Pisidia; to Pamphylia, and Peru, thence they went down to Antioch, and called for Antioch in Syria, whence they had departed, 11. Before Upon their arrival, they related to the church the great things God had done by their means.

Luke omits the actions of Paul, from A.D. 45 to the time of the council at Jerusalem, A.D. 50. There is great probability that, during this interval, the apostle preached from Jerusalem to Illyricum, as he asserts, (Rom. xv. 19, 20,) without making any stay in places where others had preached before him. He says, in general, that he had endured more labors than any other apostle, and had suffered in more prisons; was often very near to death, sometimes on the water, sometimes among thieves; sometimes from the Jews, and sometimes from false brethren and perverse Christians. He was exposed to great hazards, as well in cities as in deserts. He suffered hunger, thirst, nakedness, cold, fastings, watchings, and the fatigues inseparable from long journeys, undertaken without any prospect of human succor; in this very different from the good fortune of some who lived by the gospel, and who received subsistence from those to whom they preached it. He made it a point of honor to preach gratis, working with his hands, that he might not be chargeable to any; he having learned a trade, (as was usual among the Jews,) that he might work for soldiers. During this course of preaching, he five times received from the Jews thirty-nine stripes: was twice beaten with rods by the Romans; thrice he suffered shipwreck, and had passed a night and a day in the sea. He felt his body very aggrieved. Some think he was actually a night and a day at the bottom of the sea, God having there miraculously preserved him, as heretofore Jonah. Others that he was hidden for a night and a day at the bottom of a well, after his danger at Lystra, where he had been stoned. Others, that at Cyzicus he was put into a prison called Bythos, or the deep—for this is the term used by Paul, without adding sea to it, as in the Vulgate. But the greater part of the fathers, and several moderns, suppose that after a shipwreck the apostle was a day and a night in the sea, struggling against the waves; which seems to be the most reasonable opinion. Paul had suffered all this before A.D. 58, when he wrote his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xi. 25.

The five of the other letters in the New Testament come from Paul who was converted to Christianity.
they were forced to withdraw; and went on to Athens. Disputing with the Athenian philosophers, they brought Paul before the Areopagus (see Areopagus, and Altar), where he made his defence; meaning to oppose them respecting the "Unknown God." While here, Timothy came from Berea to Athens, according to the request of Paul, and informed him of the persecution which afflicted the Christians of Thessalonica, which obliged the apostle to return to Macedonia, that he might comfort them. After this, he went to Corinth, where he lodged with Aquila, a tent-maker; and being of the same trade, the apostle worked with him. Here he made several converts, and baptized Stephanus and his family, with Crispus and Gaius, 1 Cor. i. 14, 16, 17; xvi. 15. Silas and Timothy came to Corinth, (Acts xvii. 5; 1 Thess. iii. 9, A. D. 52,) and brought him great comfort, by acquainting him with the prosperous state of the disciples of Thessalonica. Shortly after this, he wrote his First Epistle to the Thessalonians, A. D. 52.

The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written not long after the first, and Paul, encouraged by the presence of Silas and Timothy, prosecuted the work of his ministry with new ardor. The Jews, however, opposing him with blasphemous and opprobrious words, shook his clothes at them, and said, "Your blood be upon your own head. From henceforth I go to the Gentiles." He then quitted the house of Aquila, and went to lodge with one Titus Justus, originally a Gentile, but one that feared God. In the mean time, the Lord encouraged him by a vision, and told him, that he had much people in Corinth.

Galatia, proconsul of Achaia, being at Corinth, the Jews brought Paul to his tribunal; but Gallio would not meddle with disputes foreign from his office. After having been at Corinth eight months, Paul sailed for Jerusalem, to be present at the Feast of Pentecost. Before he went on board the vessel, he cut off his hair at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth; because he had completed a vow of Nazaritenish. He arrived at Ephesus with Aquila and Priscilla, whence he went to Caesarea of Palestine, and thence to Jerusalem. Having performed his devotions, he came to Antioch, and spent a year and a half in preaching. At his mention of the churches of Galatia, and Phrygia, returning to Ephesus, where he abode three years; from A. D. 54 to 57, Acts xix. At Ephesus he found some disciples who had been initiated into the baptism of John the Baptist. Paul instructed them, baptized them with the baptism of Jesus Christ, and laying his hands on them, they received the Holy Ghost. He taught daily in the school of one Tyrannus, and omitted no opportunity, either by night or by day, to visit private houses, to confirm believers, and convince unbelievers; working with his hands, that he might not be burdensome to any. During his abode here, he suffered much, so that, as he informs us, he, after the manner of men, "fought with beasts." Here he wrote his Epistle to the Galatians, and also his First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Before he left Ephesus, the Christians were disturbed by a sedition raised by Demetrius, a silversmith, whose chief trade consisted in making little models of the temple of Diana. This man, fearing that the labors of the apostle would destroy his craft, tampered with the other workmen and silversmiths; the spirit of mutiny spread among the people, and presently the whole city was in an uproar. The town-clerk by his happy address appeased the tumult, and Paul, taking leave of the disciples, departed with Timothy into Macedonia. Here Titus visited him, and informed him of the good effects of his letter among the Corinthians; which induced him to write a second letter to that church.

Having passed through Macedonia, Paul came into Achaia, visited the church at Corinth, and having received their alms, as he was on the point of returning into Macedonia, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans. At last he came into Macedonia, intending to be at Jerusalem at the Pentecost. He said some time at Philippi, where he celebrated the passover; from hence he embarked, and came to Troas, where he continued a week, edifying the disciples. At Miletus, the elders of the church of Ephesus came to see him, to whom he delivered an admirable charge, and then embarked for Tyre, whence he proceeded to Caesarea. While here, the prophet Agabus arrived from Judea; and having taken the apostle's girdle, he bound his own hands and feet with it, saying, "Thus shall the Jews of Jerusalem bind the man who owns this girdle, and shall deliver him up to the Gentiles." The brethren upon hearing this would have dissuaded the apostle from going up to Jerusalem, but he informed them, that he could not avoid it, and he therefore fitted his readiness to die in the service of the Lord Jesus.

At Jerusalem the brethren received him with joy; and the day following he went to see James, at whose house he gave an account of what God had done among the Gentiles by his ministry. James informed him, that the converted Jews were strongly prejudiced against him, and advised that he should join himself to four men in Jerusalem, who had a vow of Nazaritenish, contribute to the charges of their purifications, and offer with them the offerings and sacrifices ordained in such cases. See Nazaritenish.

Paul, following this advice, went the next day into the temple, and made known to the priests his intention. The Jews of Asia, however, observing him in the temple, inflamed the people against him, and would have killed him, but not Lysias, the tribune of the Roman garrison, rescued him. Paul desired permission to speak to the people. Having obtained this, the apostle related the manner of his conversion, and his mission from God to preach to the Gentiles. The Pharisees, therefore, said, "Away with this wicked fellow out of the world, for he is not worthy to live!" Perceiving the people to be further exasperated by the apostle's address, the tribune brought him into the castle, and ordered that he should be put to the question by scourging; but being bound, Paul asked the tribune whether it was lawful to scourge a Roman citizen before he had been heard. This appeal produced its desired effect; the apostle was unbound, and the tribune, assembling the priests and chiefs of the Jews, brought Paul before them, that he might know the occasion of this tumult. After having surveyed the assembly, the apostle said, "Brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." At which words, Ananias, son of Neelus, the chief-priest, ordered him to be smitten on the face. Indignant at this unlawful proceeding, Paul exclaimed, "God shall smite thee, thou whitewall; for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and forgetting the duty of a judge, commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?" Those present rebuked him for reviling God's high-priest, but the apostle excused himself by saying, that he did not know he was the high-priest. Perceiving that he had no hope of obtaining an impartial judgway, where a magnificent church was afterwards built.

It is well known that commentators have differed on the reason of the change of name of the apostle from Saul to Paul, Acts xii. 9. Some have supposed the apostle to have been named Saul among the Jews, but Paul, his Roman name, among the Gentiles; may it not, however, be an admissible conjecture, that he chose the name of Paul by which to be baptized; and thereby showed his entire renunciation of his former Jewish notions, and his renunciation into Christian life under a new appellation? This new name, signifying "little," was probably taken from the same motives as induced the apostle afterwards to describe himself as "one born out of due time; the least among the apostles;" and "less than the least" of all saints. To this it may be answered, that long after his baptism we find him still called by the name of Saul, so that under this idea, we must allow that he went by either name, indifferently; or by both names, for a time. Luke's words seem best to agree with this, "Saul, who also is Paul;" the custom of having, and using, two names, was not uncommon at the time; so Luke was Leucius, John was Mark, Simon was Peter, &c. But whether the change of name at baptism be strictly applicable to the instance of Paul or not, it should seem to be derived from the earliest ages, and practised, as a demonstrative proof of a desire to manifest that "old things were passed away, and all things were become new."

The party who received new life, received also a new name; he contracted new relations, and esteemed himself, in more than a metaphorical sense, "a new man." This explains how easy it was for some to err, by "saying that the resurrection was past already."

[The foregoing is all from Calmet, with the exception of the last paragraph, which is from his English editor. It must, however, be remembered, that in regard to the events of Paul's life after he had dwelt two whole years in his own hired house" at Rome, we have no certain accounts; and that the stories above alluded to of his subsequent travels in Italy, Spain, and even Britain, all rest on uncertain traditions. Still, it is generally received opinion, in the earlier centuries, that the apostle was acquitted and discharged from his imprisonment at the end of two years; and that he afterwards returned to Rome, where he was again imprisoned and put to death. (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. ii. 22; Jerome de Script. Eccles. cap. v.) This would seem, however, to be not so much tradition, as an exegetical assumption in order to explain certain passages in the Second Epistle to Timothy; e.g. 2 Tim. iv. 6, compared with Phil. ii. 24. In respect to what Paul undertook between his first and supposed second imprisonment, there is no certain tradition. That sooner or later he died as a martyr under Nero's reign, seems to be generally admitted. (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. ii. 25; Clemens, Rom. Ep. i ad Corinth, c. v.) It is said above that Paul was set at liberty A. D. 63, which would require the beginning of his imprisonment to be placed in A. D. 61; and Lardner adopts the same chronology. Other interpreters, however, as Hug, De Wette, &c. fix the commencement of his imprisonment at Rome in A. D. 63, and his acquittal in A. D. 65.

The following chronological table of the principal events in Paul's life may be of use in directing and assisting inquiries into this most interesting portion of history. The different chronologies of Hug, De Wette, Kuinoel and Lardner are here presented side by side; and thus the table, while it shows the general agreement of chronologers, shows also that it is impossible to arrive at entire certainty in this respect; or, indeed, any nearer than to assign the principal dates to an interval of two or three years, within which the events may be regarded as having certainly taken place.

He goes into Arabia, (see Arabia, p. 86, col. 2) and returns to Damascus; (Gal. i. 17.) at the end of three years in all, he escapes from Damascus and goes to Jerusalem, Acts ix. 23, seq.
From Jerusalem Paul goes to Cilicia and Syria, Acts ix. 30; Gal. i. 21. From Antioch he is sent with Barnabas to Jerusalem to carry alms, Acts xi. 30. The first missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas from Antioch, continued about two years, (Acts xii. xiv.) commencing After spending several years in Antioch, (Acts xiv. 28.) Paul and Barnabas are sent a second time to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles respecting circumcision, etc. Acts xv. 2.
The Jews expelled from Rome A. D. 52-54; Paul, on his second missionary journey, (Acts xv. 40.) after passing through Asia Minor to Europe, finds Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth, Acts xviii. 2.
Paul remains eighteen months in Corinth, Acts xviii. 11. After being brought before Gallio, he departs for Jerusalem the fourth time, and then goes to Antioch, Acts xviii. 22. (Kuinoel supposes him to be imprisoned at Jerusalem.)
The apostle winters at Nicopoli, (Tit. iii. 12, Hug.) and then goes to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1.
After a residence of two years or more at Ephesus, Paul departs for Macedonia.
After wintering in Achaia, Paul goes the fifth time to Jerusalem, where he PAVILION is a word which usually gives the idea of an edifice, small but handsome; it is therefore unhappily used in 1 Kings xx. 12, 16, "Benhadad and others were drinking in pavilions," where the Heb. is booth. The author means that the tents of the army are much more likely to be the proper description of those places of intermixture. This Benhadad must have been a man of an unworthy spirit; a braggadocio, as appears by his inconsiderate orders; a drunkard, as appears from his history; and a coward, as appears from his hiding place.

PEACE is a word used in Scripture in different senses. Generally, for quiet and tranquility, public or private; but often for prosperity and happiness of life; as To go to peace; To die in peace; "God give you peace;" Peace be within this house; "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Paul in the titles of his Epistles generally wishes grace and peace to the faithful, to whom he writes. Our Saviour recommends to his disciples, to have peace with all men, and with each other. God promises his people to water them as with a river of peace, Isa. lxvi. 12, and to make with them a covenant of peace, Ezek. xxxiv. 25. [The Hebrew word shalom, usually translated peace, means, properly, health, prosperity, rest, warfare. It is the same as the salutation of the modern Arabs, and is in like manner used in salutations, R.

PEACOCK. The fleet of Solomon that went to Ophir brought a great number of peacocks, (1 Kings x. 22,) but whether from Ophir itself, or from any other source on their return is uncertain. The peacock is a tame and well-known bird, distinguished by the beauty of its plumage. It has a very long tail, diversified with several colors, and adorned with marks at equal distances, in the form of eyes. It has a little tuft or crown on its head; and its wings are mixed with azure and gold color. Its cry is so very harsh and disagreeable, that it is said to have the head of a serpent, the train of an angel, and the voice of a dragon.

PEARL. The Arabians, Persians and Turks, use the word Naracard to signify pearls, from which the word Margarites, or Margarita, used by the Greeks and Latins, seems to be derived. The finest pearls are fished up in the Persian gulf, and on the coast of East India, called from the name of that name, on the borders of Arabia; and, Idumeans and Palestine being not far distant, it is not to be wondered at that pearls were well known to Job, and the Hebrews. They are also found in other places; and many are now brought from China and Japan. They are mentioned together with other kinds of gems in the book of Proverbs, and are enumerated, with others, in the book of Revelation. The most celebrated pearls are the pearls of Ceylon, and the pearl of the sea of Cortez.

PELIGRON. The Peligrons were famous under the reign of David, as the most valiant men of his army, and the guards of his person. (The name comes from the Hebrew pelagan, to run, to go swiftly; and they seem, therefore, to have been the royal messengers; just as the Cherethites (from cethera, to cut, to cut off, etc.) were the king's executioners. The Peligrons and Cherethites are always mentioned together, and in the same manner of service, for pitting the king against his enemies. From the point of the bill to the opening of the mouth, there is a length of fifteen inches; and under the chap it is a bag reaching the entire length of the bill to the neck, and capable, it is said, of holding fifteen quarts of water. When this pouch is empty it is not seen; but when filled, its great bulk and singular appearance may easily be conceived. The pelican, says Labat, has strong wings, furnished with thick plumage of a slate color, as are the rest of the feathers over the whole body. Its eyes are very small when compared to the size of its head; there is a sadness in its countenance, and its whole air is melancholy: it is as dull and redundant in its motions as the flamingo is sprightly and active. It is slow of flight; and when it rises to fly performs it with difficulty and labor. Nothing, as R.

PELIS. A variety of lilies sold in our markets, and supposed to be the same as the wild lilies, found in the mountains of Elba, where they grow in great abundance, and in which the old monks of that island are accustomed to find them. They are generally of the same order of lilies which are found in the East, only the leaves more slender, and the flowers lighter and more delicate.

PELL. The flower is known by the name of Pell, and is the same as our winter cress. It is a common weed, and a very common name for it, in our English language. The flower is a small white one, and the leaves are slender and graceful. The plant is very hardy, and will stand the coldest weather. It is a good herb, and is much used in the country, and is esteemed a very good herb. It is a good herb, and is much used in the country, and is esteemed a very good herb. PENINNAH, the second wife of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 3, 4c. See HANNAH.

PENNY is usually put in the English translation for the Greek drachma and the Roman denarius, both of which were equal in value to seven-pence three farthings, sterling, or about 14 cents. As this was a single coin, perhaps we should do well, in translating, to express it by a coin of our own, as near to it in value as possible; say, for instance, a six-pence, or a shilling. Read in this way, the passages— When the Lord of the vineyard had agreed with the laborers for six-pence (or a shilling) a day;—Show me the tribute money; and they showed him a six-pence (or shilling);—Two hundred shillings’ worth of bread is not enough for this multitude; the good Samaritan took out two shillings, and gave them to the keeper of the khan. Something like this is absolutely necessary in Rev. vi. 6, “A small measure (or pint) of wheat for a shilling.” As the passage now stands it indicates great plenty to an English reader; whereas, it really is descriptive of a most distressing scarcity. Let this article stand in proof of the propriety of being acquainted with the minutes in Scripture; for who sees any hint at a famine in “a measure of wheat for a penny?” Former times, indeed, even in England, have given a laborer his choice of a measure of wheat, or a penny, for his wages; but the difference in the value of money renders this recollection very improper in our days. Nor is it less improper, at the present time, to suppose the Lord of the vineyard would so greatly undervalue the hire of laborers, as to pay them only a penny for the day’s work; it sounds like an avaricious advantage taken of the necessities of the poor; when, in fact, it is directly the reverse, a bounty, a liberality.

PENTATEUCH, the five books, the books of Moses; that is, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy (and also Ruth, Judges, and Joshua.) Some critics have disputed that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, upon the following grounds:—

There are in it, (1.) several things that agree neither to the age nor the character of this legislator. The author is a poet, and not a prophet, and his writings are treated as ancient narrations. (2.) He makes Leucen the bigamist, Gen. iv. 23. “Hear my voice, ye wives of Leucen, hearken unto my speech; for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt;” without informing us previously to whom this relates. (3.) Such observations as Gen. xii. 6, cannot be reconciled to the age of Moses, since the Cananites continued masters of Palestine during all the time of Moses. So, also, the passage out of the book of the Wars of the Lord, quoted Numb. xxi. 14, seems to have been inserted afterwards, as also the first verses of Deuteronomy. (4.) The account of the death of Moses, at the conclusion of the same book, cannot have proceeded from his own pen; and the same may be observed of other passages, in which it is said, that the places mentioned lay beyond Jordan; that the bed of Og was at Ramah to this day; that the Havoth, or cities, of Jair, were known to the author, though probably they had not that name till after the time of Moses, Numb. xxiii. 41; Deut. iii. 14. (5.) It is observed, also, that some parts are defective. Thus, in Exod. xi. 2, we find Moses speaking to Pharaoh, where the author omits the beginning of his discourse, which is found in the Samaritan copy. In other places, also, the Samaritan adds what is deficient in the Hebrew text; and its additions seem to be so well connected with the rest of the discourse, that it is difficult to separate them. (6.) There are, it is said, certain expressions in the Pentateuch, which can hardly agree with Moses, who was born and educated in Egypt; as, what he says of the earthly paradise of the rivers that watered it; of the cities of Babylon, Erecch, Ronen and Calneh; of the gold of Pison; of the dravelium, and of the stone of Sohem, found in that country. These particulars, it is thought, prove that the author of the Pentateuch lived east of the Euphrates.

These objections, however, are easily disposed of. The additions, the dislocations, and the omissions, referred to, will not determine that Moses was not the author of the books. They only prove that some amendments have been made, either by adding, or by expunging. God has suffered that the sacred books should not be exempted from such alterations as proceed from the hands of copyists, or which are consequences of great length of time. It’s slight additions, or change, in the text of an author, be thought sufficient to deprive him of his labors, what writer could remain in possession of his work even a single century? Besides, to divest Moses of a possession he has maintained for so many ages, as author of the Pentateuch; a possession supported by the joint testimony both of the synagoge and the church; of the sacred writers both of the Old and New Testament; of Jesus Christ and his apostles, certainly requires proofs beyond reply, i.e. conclusive; whereas the objections are even below convincing arguments.

So far Calmet, but since his time, the question of the originals of the Pentateuch has been discussed, with great acumen, and much critical investigation. The result seems to be not that those documents were composed, or arranged, since the days of Moses, (except so far as concerns Ezra’s revision for his edition,) but that they existed before Moses, and were brought together, and incorporated, in the form in which they were translated from more ancient memoirs, preserved in the families of Shem, Abraham, and the Hebrew patriarchs. As these came far east of the Euphrates, the objections derived from that incident are completely overwhelmed by this supposition; and the others dwindle into insignificance, by our better acquaintance with the ancient history of persons and places.

It may be admitted, for instance, (1.) that the book of Genesis contains various repetitions, or double narratives of the same early events; (2.) that these duplicate narratives, when closely compared, present characteristic differences of style; (3.) that these differences are too considerable, and too distinct, to admit of any other explanation, than that of different originals, taken into association. This may be justified by a short extract from Eichhorn’s comparison of the two supposed original documents used by Moses containing histories of the deluge.
Gen. vii. 5. And Jehovah saw that the wickedness of man was great on the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.

7. And Jehovah said, I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repeneth me that I have made them.

vii. 2. Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female; and of beasts unclean, by two, the male and his female.

3. Of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and the female, to keep seed alive on the face of the earth.

5. And Noah did according to all that Jehovah had commanded him.

1. And Jehovah said unto Noah, Come thou, and all thy house, into the ark.

8. And Noah was six hundred years old, when the flood of waters was upon the earth.

In this manner the ingenious author of this hypothesis proceeds to compare other passages. The reader will remark, that the most particular account is contained in that document in which the deity is denoted by the term Elohim; and this is its general character throughout. The system, however, is not without its difficulties; but for a discussion of these we must refer to those writers who have professedly reached on the subject.

PENTECOST, (Hebrews), the fiftieth; day is understood,) a feast celebrated the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the feast of the passover, Lev. xxiii. 15, 16. The Hebrews call it the feast of weeks, (Exod. xxxiv. 22), because it was kept seven weeks after the passover.

They then offered the first-fruits of their wheat harvest, which at that time was completed, Deut. xvi. 9, 10. These first-fruits consisted in two leaves of unleavened bread, of two assorons of meal, or five pints of meal each, Lev. xxiii. 16, 17. Some interpreters think, that each family was obliged to give two loaves for first-fruits; but others maintain, with more reason, that they offered but two leaves in the name of the whole nation. This is sufficiently marked by Josephus, who puts but one loaf of two assorons. In addition to these, they presented at the temple seven lamb's of that year, one calf, and two rams, for a burnt offering, two lambs for a peace-offering, and a goat for a sin-offering. We do not find that the Pentecost had an octave, though it was one of the three great solemnities, in which all the males were to appear before the Lord.

The Feast of Pentecost was instituted, first, to oblige the Israelites to repair to the temple of the Lord, and there to acknowledge his dominion over their country, and their labors, by offering to him the first-fruits of all their harvests. Secondly, to commemorate, and to render thanks to God for the law given from mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt.

The Christian church also celebrates the Feast of Pentecost, fifty days, or seven weeks, after the passover, or the resurrection of our Saviour. After the ascension of Christ, the apostles having retired to a house at Jerusalem, (which, it is said, was that Mary the mother of John, on mount Zion,) thence waited for the Holy Ghost, which our Saviour had promised. On the day of Pentecost, about three hours of the day, (nine o'clock in the morn-then suddenly they heard a great noise, like the rushing of mighty wind, from heaven, which filled the whole house where the apostles were assembled. At the same time there appeared among them, as it were tongues of fire, parted, or cloven, and resting on ev-each of them; they were all immediately filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak different tongues or languages, as the Spirit gave them utterance, A in an open place." Num. xxiii. 26. We may say the same of Beth Peor (Deut. iii. 29.) which appears to have been on an eminence; as the valley in which Israel abode was over against it, chap. iv. 46. It was a village. We may suppose, with a village at least around it.

PEREA, from Gr. περατά, beyond, signifies the country beyond Jordan, or east of that river, especially on the south. Josephus says that it had its limits, at Philadelphia east, the Jordan west, Ma- cheron south, and Pella north. Sometimes the word Perea is taken in a more extensive signification, for the whole country beyond Jordan. It was enclosed on the east by mountains, which divided it from Arabia Deserta. The name does not occur in Scripture.

PEREZ-UZZA, the breach of Uzza, the name of a place, 2 Sam. vi. 8. Uzzah is spelt differently, where the reason of the appellation is assigned, 1 Chron. xiii. 11. See Uzza.

PERFECTION. The Son of God commands his disciples (Matt. v. 48.) to be perfect, even as their Father in heaven is perfect. Not that we can ever attain his perfection, but we ought constantly to be making all possible effort, to serve him faithfully, purely, to propose to ourselves as our pattern, in the exercise of all virtue, and especially his mercy and charity. Hence Luke says, in the parallel passage, "Be ye, therefore, merciful, as your Father also is merciful." Luke vi. 36. In Matt. xix. 21, our Saviour says, that he who would be perfect must forsake all and follow him; and in Luke vi. 40, that the disciple who would arrive at perfection must become like his master. Paul often exhorts his disciples to be perfect; that is, to acquire the perfection of Christianity, to be convinced of the excellence of it, and to practise its truths, 1 Cor. i. 10; xiv. 10, &c.

In the Old Testament, the words perfect and perfection answer to the Hebrew words טמא and תחתמ, which properly signify entire and complete; without blemish or defect; irreproachable, perfect. Thus it is said, (Gen. vi. 9.) "Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations." And God says to Abraham, (Gen. xvii. 1.) "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." And speaking to his people, (Deut. xviii. 13.) "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God." In all these places, perfect is put for a character without reproach; unrehproveable, sincere. So to serve God with a perfect heart, to serve him faithfully, purely, not admitting a rival. Perfect joined with knowledge, law, charity, work, &c. signifies whatever may make those things complete, finished, entire, without deficiency. Paul says, (Heb. vii. 19.) "The law made nothing perfect;" i. e. it may be said to give only sketches of things; to enjoin things of less perfection than what the gospel requires.

PERFUMES; the use of perfumes was common among the Hebrews, and the orientals generally, before it was known to the Greeks and Romans. Moses also speaks of the art of the perfumer, in Egypt, and gives the composition of two perfumes, (Exod. xxx. 25.) of which one was to be offered to the Lord, on the golden altar; and the other (Exod. xxx. 34, &c.) to be used for anointing the high-priest and his sons, the tabernacle, and the vessels of divine service, Exod. xxx. 23. The former of these, called incense, was composed of stacte, the onyx, or odoriferous shell-fish, of galbanum, and incense, each of equal weight. It was sacred and inviolable, and "it was forbidden, on pain of death, for any man whatever to use it. The other perfume was rather an unction, to anoint the priests and sacred vessels of the tabernacle. It was composed of the best myrrh 500 shekels, of cinnamon 250 shekels, of can- neas aromatics and spikenard, and 600 shekels of galbanum; and 1 hin of oil-olive. God reserved this ointment, or perfume, for his own service; and whoever should make it, either for himself or another, was to be cut off from his people.

The Hebrews had also perfumes for embalming their dead. The composition is not exactly known, but they used myrrh, aloes and other strong and as- trigent drugs, proper to prevent infection and cor- ruption. See EMBALMING.

In addition to these perfumes, there are others noticed in Scripture. Those, for example, which king Hezekiah preserved in his repositories. "The spices and precious ointment;" (2 Kings xx. 13.) and those burned with the body of king Josiah, 2 Chron. xvi. 14. Judith perfumed her face when she was to appear before Holofernes; and they prepared the vir- gins which were to appear before the kings of Persia, for six months together, by the use of oil of myrrh, and for six other months, by various perfumes and scented ointments. (Esth. ii. 12.) The spouse in the Canticles commends the perfumes of her lover; who in return says, that the perfumes of his spouse surpass the most excellent odors. He names particularly the spikenard, the canna aromatics, myrrh and aloes, as composing these perfumes. The voluptuous woman described by Solomon (Prov. vii. 17.) says, that she had perfumed both her dower and her bed with myrrh, aloes and cinnamon. The book of Wisdom (i. 7.) encourage another to another the use of the most luxurious and costly perfumes. Isaias reproaches Judes, whom he describes as a faithless spouse to God, as being painted and perfumed to please strangers: (Isa. xlv. 9.) "Thou wentest to the king with ointment, and didst in- crease thy perfumes;" and Ezekiel (xxiii. 41.) seemed to accuse the Jews with having profaned the odors and perfumes, whose use was reserved to sacred things, by applying them to their own use: "Thou sittest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it, whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil." Amos (vi. 6.) inveiges against the rich men of Ephraim, who drank costly wines, and perfumed themselves with the most precious oils. The woman-miller (Luke vii. 37.) and Mary Magdalene (John xxi. 3.) anointed our Saviour's feet with costly perfumes. That of Mary Magdalene was spikenard.

These instances show the taste of the ancient He- brews, which was, and still is, the taste of the orientals, who made much use of scents and perfumes. They prove, also, that both men and women wore them, and that wise and serious men condemned the too frequent and affected use of them. It may also be observed, that to abstain from perfumes, scents and unctions, was esteemed a part of mortification. (See Esth. xii.; 2 Dan. x. 3.)

Solomon says, "that dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour;" i. e. as one dead fly is sufficient to spoil the scent of a whole box of perfumes; so one fault is enough to destroy a man's good name.

PERGA, a city of Pamphylia, Acts xiii. 14. This is not a maritime city, but situated on the river Ces- tus, at some distance from its mouth. It was one of the most considerable cities in Pamphylia; and when that province was divided into two parts, this city became the metropolis of one part, and bishop of the other. There was, on a neighboring mountain, a very famous temple of Diana, surnamed Pergusa, from the city.

PERGAMOS, (now Bergama,) a city of Myca, in Asia Minor, and the residence of the Attalid princes. There was here collected by the kings of this race a treasure of 300,000 talents, after which it became of no esteem after it was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, and added to the library at Alexandria. Hence the Latin name pergamum for parchment. Our Lord (Rev. ii. 15) speaks to the angel, or bishop, of Pergamos, know thou, that where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my name.

PERJURY. The law of God severely condemns perjury, false oath, vows and promises made under false pretense to perform them, Lev. xix. 19; Exod. xxiii. 13. Perjury-offends against the veracity and justice of God himself, and is a great insolence on his majesty, by appealing to him as a witness to a lie, and engaging his mighty name in consequence of a crime. Moses (Lev. v. 4; 6; vi. 2; 3.) seems to appoint sacrifices to stones for perjury; which is contrary to Paul, who assures us, that the sacrifices and ceremonies of the law did not really reach the sins of the people, Heb. iv. 16; Gal. ii. 16; Rom. viii. 3; Heb. ix. 9, 13. It must, therefore, be presumed, that the sacrifices ordained by Moses, regarded only the ignorancy or temerity of him who had made a rash promise, or a secret oath, or promise. Or he supposes, that he who was permitted to offer such a sacrifice, had already expiated his sin, by a perfect repentance and contrition; of which the prescribed external sacrifice is only the public acknowledgment, or ratification, as we may say, to satisfy for faults committed, by approaching holy things in a state of delitement. The wilful perjurer was punished by the sentence of the judges, when he was found guilty. (See Lev. i. 1; xix. 8; xx. 17; 18, 20; xxiv. 13; Numb. ix. 13.)

PERIZZITES, or PERIZZAIN, ancient inhabitants of Palestine, who had mingled with the Canaanites, or were themselves descendants of Canaan. They appear to have had no fixed habitats, and lived sometimes in one country and sometimes in another. They were some of them on each side of the river Jordan, in the mountains, and in the plains. In several places of Scripture the Canaanites and Perizzites are mentioned as the chief people of the country; as in the time of Abraham and Lot, Gen. xiii. 7. The tribes complained to Joshua, that they were too much confinéd in their possession, he bade them go, if they pleased, into the mountains of the Perizzites and Rephaim, and there clear the land, cultivate and inhabit it; Josh. xvii. 15. Solomon subdued the remains of these people, which the Israelites had not rooted out, and made them tributary, 1 Kings xi. 20, 21; 2 Chron. viii. 7. The Perizzites are mentioned by Ezra, after the return from Babylon; and several Israelites had married wives from among them, Ezra vi. 1. See CANAANITES, p. 244.

PERSECUTION has in all ages been the portion of good men. Cain persecuted Abel; Joseph was persecuted by his brethren; David by Saul; Elijah and Elisha by Ahab; the prophets by the kings and people of their time; our Saviour by Herod, and the chief of the Jews; John the Baptist and the apostles by the enemies of piety, truth and justice of every description. It is a maxim laid down by the apostle that all those who will lead a godly life shall suffer persecution; (2 Tim. iii. 12) but our Lord assures them happy, Matt. viii. 3-10.

PERUSA, (in Heb. פורה, Phara, Ezek. xxiv. 12) a vast region in Asia, the south-western portion of which appears to have been the ancient Perusia, called Phœnicis, or Paphus. The Per::::: usians were the Phœnicians, whose city of Tyrus was the capital of their monarchy, which, after the fall of Tyrus, was called Elamites by the Romans, emperors, Parthians, and Persians.

The Arabsians say, that Farz, the father of Anah, son of Zimmor or Azzaz, or Arphaxad, son of Shem, derive him from Japheth; but the other origin from Kainamuth, who i; that Adam is with us. They assure us that Adam has always kings of their own descent. Their succession has never been changed, nor long interrupted, the Curdes, and even the Romans, according to some authors, are descended from the Persians. The Dilemites inhabit the Capian sea, called also the sea of Dilemites, the Curdes are scattered in Asia, and give the name of Kurdistan; which they have derived from the river Ob. Turkmens.

Turkmens.

The Persians, who speak differently of the religion of ancient Persia. Herodotus says, "They have temples, nor statues, nor altars. They look only to make or to suffer any, because they believe, as the Greeks, that the gods were of origin." They sacrificed to Jupiter on the mountains, and gave the name of God to the circuit of the heavens. They sacrificed to the sun, and the moon, and the earth; to the water, and the winds. They originally learned from the Assyrians and the Arabians rites to Urania, or celestial Venus; whom syrians call Militta, the Arabians, Alitas, Persians, Mithra.

The modern Persians refer their religion ham, whom some confound with Zoroas, others will have to be the master of Zoroas.

They think the world was created in six days, in the beginning God created a man and an animal, and several terrestrial parishes, one universal one, Moses, one Solomon. All this, doubt, is taken from the history of the Jews, from the traditions of the Mahometans.

They have a great preference to the Israelites, one custom called in their language Josdan, or Ormazd is the true God, called by the Arabians A m. A. author of all good; also another god, darkness, whom they name Ahermaz, (pro Hebrew, darkness, has no seed) the god of evil. They have a very great reverence for darkness. God is the author of all things has produced light and darkness; and from a mixture of these two, of good and evil, the composition of the parts of the world is effected always continue, till light withdrawing itself, and darkness on the other, shall cause a extinction and dissolution. This is the substance doctrine of Zoroaster, which is still maintained by the Magians, or Guebres, who worship fire; always, when they pray, turn themselves toward rising sun.

The early history of the Persians, like that of the oriental nations, is involved in doubt.
plexity. We have already suggested their descent from Shem, through his son Elam, after whom they were originally named. It is probable that they enjoyed their independence for several ages, with a monarchical succession of their own; until they were subdued by the Assyrians, and finally attached as a province to that empire. This event is adumbrated in Persian history by the invasion of a foreign tyrant, named Zeburak. From this period, both sacred and profane writers distinguish the kingdom of the Medes from that of the Persians. It is not improbable that, during this period, petty revolutions might have occasioned temporary disjunctions of Persia from its sister kingdom, and that the Persian king was quickly again made sensible of his true allegiance. Such an event appears to have occurred in the reign of Xerxes, who, defeated the revolted Persians, and reduced them to a more complete subjection.

Xerxes, the successor of Darius, is briefly mentioned in Scripture, by Daniel, as the fourth king from Cyrus, who, by his strength, and through his great riches, should stir up all against the realm of Greece." That he invaded Greece with an immense army, is known to every one in the least acquainted with ancient history. He continued the privileges which his father Darius had granted to the Jews.

Artaxerxes, called by the Greeks Longimanus, from the length of his hands, and Ahasuerus in the book of Esther, is rendered memorable principally on the account of the friendship he evinced to the Jews, which it is thought proceeded from the intercession of Esther, her queen.

[Later interpreters, however, have come to different results in regard to several of these kings. Those may be seen among the commentaries of the fathers, especially on the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.]

PESTILENCE, or Plague, in the Hebrew tongue, as in most others, expresses all sorts of distempers and calamities. The Hebrew דבר, Deber, which properly signifies the plague, is extended to all epidemic and contagious diseases. The prophet generally connects together the word, the pestilence and the famine, as three evils which generally accompany each other.

The pestilent man (Prov. xv. 12. Vulg.) is the scorner, the pretender of fine things, who devotes himself with the simplicity of good people, and with the timidity of pious souls. The seat of the scorner, mentioned in the first Psalm, is the seat of such pernicious people. Solomon in many places cautions his readers against their discourses. The principal events, relating to Scripture, which occurred during the reign of Cyrus, were the restoration of the Jews, the rebuilding the city and temple, and the subjugation of Babylon. Of the successors of Cyrus, different persons are sometimes distinguished by different historians. The Persian annals give four, from Cyrus to Artaxerxes; the sacred annals five, and the Grecian six. The order of princes as given in the book of Ezra is, Cyrus, Ahasuerus, Artaxerxes, Darius, Artaxerxes; Xerxes, who reigned between Darius and Artaxerxes, being omitted to be mentioned, because nothing important in the Jewish history occurred during his reign. Ahasuerus was Cambyses, the son of Cyrus. He was so much enraged with Egyptian affairs to the Jews, that during his reign the progress of their works at Jerusalem was nearly suspended. His successor, Artaxerxes, was the usurper Smerdis the Magian, by whose decree a total stop was put to the buildings at Jerusalem. The next, according to Scripture succession, is Darius, called, by profane historians, Darius Hystaspes. He empowered the Jews to resume the works at Jerusalem, and likewise granted them other privileges; by virtue of which, the temple, which had been twenty years in building, was completed.

whence Peter. He was married; and dwelt with his mother-in-law, and his wife, at Capernaum, on the lake of Gennesareth, Mark i. 29; Matt. viii. 14; Luke iv. 38. Andrew, having been called by Christ, met his brother Simon, and prevailed upon him to come to Capernaum, Mark i. 41. (A. D. 30.) After having passed one day with our Saviour, they returned to their ordinary occupation, of fishing, though it is thought they were present with him at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. Towards the end of the same year, Jesus being on the shore of the lake of Gennesareth, while Peter and Andrew were busy washing their nets, (Luke v. 1, &c.) entered their boat, and bade Peter throw out his nets into the sea, in order to fish. Peter obeyed, though he had been fishing the whole night without success. The fish taken at this draught were so many, that their own vessel, and that of James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were filled. The miracle so impressed the mind of Peter, that he threw himself at the feet of Jesus, and said, "Depart from me, Lord, for I am a sinner." Jesus, however, bade them follow him, and promised to make them fishers of men. The four quitted their boats and followed him.

Jesus, coming to Capernaum some time after this, (Luke vi. 28; Matt. viii. 14.) entered the house of Peter, where his mother-in-law lay sick of a fever. He immediately healed her; and she assisted to serve them. A little while before the feast of the passover of the following year, (A. D. 32.) after he returned into Galilee, he chose twelve apostles, among whom Peter has the first place.

Upon one occasion, as our Saviour was near Cesarea Philippi, he asked his apostles, whom men took him to be, Matt. xvi. 13, 14. They answered, some took him for John the Baptist, others Elias, others Jeremiah, or one of the old prophets. But whom do you say that I am?" inquired Jesus. Simon Peter answered, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." Jesus said to him, "Happy are you, Simon, son of Jona, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Your name is Peter, [rock] and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; whatever you shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever you shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." (See Key.) About eight days after this, he was transfigured on a mountain, and had with him Peter, James and John, whom he showed a glimpse of his glory, Peter, being in an ecstasy, and seeing Moses and Elias with Jesus, explained, "Lord, it is good for us to be here; if you please, we will make three tents, one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elias!" Matt. xxi. Luke ix. 29.

One day, as Jesus was speaking concerning the forgiveness of injuries, (Matt. xviii. 21, 22.) Peter asked him how often they must forgive; whether seven times. Jesus answered, Seventy times seven. On another occasion, (Matt. xix. 32,) as he was speaking of the danger of riches, Peter said to him, "Lord, we have left all to follow thee; what reward shall we have?" Jesus answered, "An hundred-fold, even in this world, and in the other world eternal life." On the Wednesday before his passion, as they sat on the mount of Olives, he, with the other apostles, asked Jesus, when the temple was to be destroyed. On Thursday he was sent with John to prepare for the passover; and in the evening, when Jesus was at table, and began to speak of him who should betray him, Peter made signs to John, to ask him who this could be. After supper, the disciples disputed who should be the greatest; upon which Jesus, laying beside his garments, washed their feet, to give them an example of humility. Peter reluctantly consented, and washed his feet. After having washed them, and he did not wash his feet, he could have no part in him, John xiii. 6-10. Just before the apprehension of our Lord, he cautioned Peter of his danger: "Pet- er, Satan has desired to sift you as a man sift wheat;" but I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail; and when you are converted, confirm your brethren." Peter declared he was ready to follow his Master every where, even to death; but Jesus foretold to him, that he would abjure him three times that very night, before the cock should crow. Then supper was ended, our Saviour went to the garden of Olives, taking Peter, James and John apart, as witnesses of his agony. Here Peter, though he had lately shown so much resolution, fell asleep with the rest; which occasioned Jesus' affectionate reproof: "Do you sleep, Simon? Could you not watch with me one hour?" Mark iv. 37; Matt. xxvi. 40, &c.

Judas having come out with the soldiers to seize Jesus, Peter drew his sword, and cut off the right ear of Malchus, servant to the high-priest; which Jesus perceiving, bade him put up his sword, adding, those who fight with the sword perish by the sword; and at the same time healing Malchus' ear, John xvi. 10, &c. Jesus being led to the house of Caiaphas, Peter followed at a distance, and mingled with the soldiers and servants in the hall. While warming himself at the fire, a maid-servant said, "Surely this man was with Jesus of Nazareth!" But Peter answered, "I know not what you say; I do not so much as know the man." A short time afterwards, another maid recognized him. But Peter denied it with an oath; as he did a third time. At this moment the cock crowed the second time, and Jesus, being in the hall, and not far from Peter, turned and looked on him, with the assurance that Jesus had said to him, before the cock crowed twice he should deny him thrice, he rushed out of the house and wept bitterly, Matt. xxvii. 73, 75; Mark xiv. 30, 72.

It is said that his compunction was so acute that he remained in secret, and in tears, during the whole time of our Saviour's passion (Friday and Saturday;) but on Sunday morning Jesus being risen, and Mary having been at the tomb, and not finding the body of Jesus, she ran into the city, to tell Peter and John that their Master was taken away. The two disciples ran to the sepulchre, and Peter saw the linen clothes in which the body had been wrapped. They returned to Jerusalem, not understanding what had come to pass; but on the same day our Saviour appeared to Peter, John xx.; Luke xiv. 13, 34, &c.; Matt. xvi. 7.

Some days after this, while Peter with some others of the apostles were fishing on the lake of Gennesareth, Jesus visited and dined with them; and after dinner gave to Peter the memorable and impressive charge, "Feed my sheep;" adding, "I tell you for a truth, that when you were young, you girded yourself and went where you pleased; but now you are old, another shall gird you, and lead you where you would not go." From this time, Peter's zeal in his Master's service was unabating, and his boldness not to be subdued. On the day of Pentecost, he stood forth in the defence of his brethren, who were charged by the unthinking Jews with drunkenness, and so powerfully urged the converts from this propitiation of the person of Jesus, that a great number were converted, Acts ii. When taken before the Sanhedrin, with his companion John, in consequence of having healed the cripple, at the Beautiful gate of the temple, he boldly and undauntedly avowed that he was he who had crucified the Messiah, and refused, at the risk of his life, to refrain from preaching the truth to the people, Acts iv.

Upon several other occasions, Peter was subjected to imprisonment and scourging, in consequence of his zeal and fervor in the service of his divine Master; but none of these things moved him, nor retarded his labors in publishing the gospel. After having visited Samaria, where Philip had been declaring the word of life, and conferring the Holy Spirit upon many of those who had believed, Peter visited the disciples from city to city. At Lydda, he cured Æneas, who had been paralyzed for eight years. At Joppa, he restored Tabitha to life. And at Cesarea of Palestine, he opened the door of faith to the Gentiles, by converting and baptizing the family of Cornelius, a man who feared God, and desired to be instructed in the gospel, Acts ix. 10.

Upon his return to Jerusalem, his fellow apostles, who did not yet fully understand the economy of God, in his purposes toward the Gentiles, charged him with a violation of the law, in his intercourse with the uncircumcised; Peter, however, related the whole affair to them from the beginning, which led them to rejoice and glorify God, in that he had also granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life, Acts xi.

It is thought that soon after this, Peter went to Antioch, where he founded a Christian church, A. D. 36; and after visiting Asia Minor, Bithynia, Cappadocia, Pontus, and perhaps some of the islands farther north, he returned to Jerusalem, where he was, A. D. 44, at the passover. In this year, Herod Agrippa began a persecution against the church, in which James the greater, brother of John, was slain, and Peter apprehended for the purpose of being put to death. On the very night before he was to have been executed, however, and while he was sleeping loaded with chains, between two soldiers, the angel of the Lord awoke him, opened the prison, and brought him out into the open air. In that house of Mary the mother of John, he found many of the faithful assembled at prayer, on his behalf, and they all glorified God for his deliverance, Acts xii.

He soon afterwards left Jerusalem, and we lose sight of him, till the second year of the Antonines. At Antioch, Peter, as his custom had been, ate and drank with the Gentiles, without regarding the Mosaic distinctions of meats. But when some converted Jews from Jerusalem arrived, being unwilling to offend them, he separated himself from the converted Gentiles. Paul, however, fearing this might be interpreted as if meant to revoke and annul what he had determined in the council of Jerusalem, postulated with him on the propriety of such a course, and Peter submitted to his judgment, Gal. ii. 11.

From this time, little is known of Peter. Eusebius informs us that Origem, in the third tome of his Exposition on Genesis, wrote to this purpose: "Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia and Asia. And at length, coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards; himself having desired that it might be in that manner." Some learned men think, that Peter, in the latter part of his life, went into Chaldea, and there wrote his Epistle, because the salvation of the church at Babylon is sent in it. But their opinion is not supported by the testimony of ancient writers. Lardner says, "It seems to me, that when Peter left Judea, he went again to Antioch, the chief city in Syria. There, he might go into other parts of the continent, particularly Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, which are expressly mentioned at the beginning of his First Epistle. In those countries he might stay a good while. It is very likely that he did so; and that he was well acquainted with the Christians there, to whom he afterwards wrote two epistles. When he left those parts, I think he went to Rome; but not till after Paul had been in that city, and was gone from it." Many ancient writers have said, that Peter was crucified at Rome, while Nero persecuted the Christians. And their opinion has been espoused by learned men, both Papiists and Protestants. Some, however, particularly Scaliger, Scaliti, Spanheim, and others, deny that Peter ever was at Rome. If the reader wishes to see the evidence from antiquity, on which Peter's having been at Rome rests, he will find it fully set forth by Lardner, who concludes his investigation as follows: "This is the general, uncensored, disinterested testimony of ancient writers in the several parts of the world, Greeks, Latins, Syrians. As our Lord's prediction concerning the death of Peter is recorded in one of the four Gospels, it is very likely that Christians would observe the accomplishment of it, which must have been in some place. And about this place, there is no difference among Christian writers of ancient times. Never any other place was named, besides Rome; nor did any other city ever glory in the martyrdom of Peter: It is not for our honor, nor for our interest, either as Christians or Protestants, to deny the truth of events ascertained by early and well-attested tradition. If any make an ill use of such facts, we are not accountable for it. We are not from a desire to overthrow the credit of all history, the consequences of which would be fatal." (Macknight.)

Epistles of Peter.—We have two epistles attributed to Peter, by the common consent of the Christian church. The second has been disputed and is referred to as his accredited work, by several of the apostolical fathers. Commentators have been divided in opinion, as to the persons to whom this Epistle was primarily addressed; the best sustained by the text, has been intended for the Jewish and Gentile believers, indiscriminately, who were resident in the provinces enumerated in the introductory verses. It was written from Babylon, but whether the Chaldee or the Babylon, cannot be determined. (See Bish.) The Second Epistle was addressed to the same persons as the former one; its general design being to confirm the doctrines which had been delivered in that, and to excite the Christian converts to a course of conduct becoming in every respect their high profession of attachment to Christ.

Mr. Taylor conjectures that the First Epistle of Peter might be a kind of response to the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians. It is remarkable, he observes, that the tenor of this address is altogether independent of any respect to the Mosaic economy; that is scarcely alluded to, certainly, it is not recommended. Nevertheless, it is evident from the energy of the writer's expressions, (chap. v. 13.) "I have written to you, exhorting you, and strongly testifying that this is the true grace of God in which ye stand," that he felt a constraining necessity for clearly stating, as it were, under his hand, those principles which some, in their excess of zeal for legal observances, had confused, not to say impaired. And these persons were known to him; he does not mention them, but he corrects them; neither does he mention Paul, but he supports him. In his Second Epistle, however, he names Paul explicitly, and reminds his readers that this apostle had written an epistle "to them," iii. 15. We have no evidence, however, of any epistle written by Paul to Pontus, Cappadocia, Asia or Bithynia: he wrote to the Galatians, and to them only. [But if Paul wrote to the Hebrews, they were of the same nation as those to whom Peter writes in their dispersion. See the Bib. Repository, vol. ii. p. 412, seq. R.] It is a hazardous opinion of Macknight, that "the persons to whom Peter's Epistles were sent were, for the most part, Paul's converts." Surely not. Peter says, (i. 16.) "We made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," and then he alludes to the transfiguration; which he repeats, as what he had heretofore related to them. Paul could not do this.

There is no mark of time in the First Epistle by which to fix its date. The Second fixes itself to a period not long before the decease of the writer. The interval between them might be longer or shorter. If we assign an early date to the First, we must consider well where Sylvanus, if he were Paul's Silas, could be at the time; if we assign a later date, we must find circumstances so adjusted as to allow that Paul should receive, from the Sylvanus of Peter, the satisfaction of perusing Peter's Epistle, and of seeing corrected the errors of those who were misleading the Galatians. Each of these propositions has its difficulty, and must not be rashly determined on. It is clear, that Peter, when he wrote his Second Epistle, knew that Paul's writings were numerous; though it seems advisable to take the term all 'his Epistles,' rather generally than absolutely, rather loosely than strictly.

PHARAOH. It has generally been supposed, that the term "Pharaoh" is not employed by any Greek authors, prior to the establishment of Christianity; but only occurs in Scripture, and in the works of the Jewish historian, Josephus. Dr. Willan, however, has shown, from some passages in the Epitope of Herodotus, that this ancient writer intended to express in Greek characters the same word, which is originally Egyptian. Pharaoh is the word given by the ancient Egyptians to the name of the Persian king, Kersoros; and is among the words of a harsh sound; thus, in the Egyptian language, name of the Persian king, Kerosos, is by them pressed Koarians: Arslar is Artaxerxes: Belus: Adr-dar is Atestag: Zemstone is Zoroaster: Phraor, or Phraith, is Pharaoh; Ashur is Assy: Ashdod is Azos: and Japhus is expressed Jop.

An instance of a change similar to that of Pharao and Piron, occurs in the name of the Egyptian king Hophra, who is called by Herodotus and Diodorus Apries. In a treatise "On Providence," written by Sylvanus, and in the writings of the church of Egypt, there is a name which coincides with and illustrates the-captions of Herodotus. He says, "The father Osiris and Typhon was, at the same time, a king, priest, and a philosopher." The Egyptian historian says, "This king, priest, and philosopher, the Egyptians are disposed to believe, that many divinities reign in succession, before their country was governed men, and before their kings were reckoned in a catalogue of the reigns of Pharaoh after Piron..." Hence it appears that Pharaoh is a title signifying dignity, honor, exaltation. May it not be analogous to the title of unrighteous among ourselves? The reverer will notice the customary, and perhaps inevident variations made by the Greeks, in writing, and, doubt, in pronouncing, Oriental names; because may tend to moderate our surprise at those variations of certain names of the Old Testament, which occur in the New Testament, and which is especially 1 bicale in the genealogies of Matthew and Luke.

The word Pharaoh, according to Josephus, (A viii. 6, 2) and in the Coptic, (Jablonsky, Opusc. i. 374.) signifies king; and comes from the Coptic word with the article pi, viz. pi-iouro, pouro, pharoa; i
THE KING. The Hebrews, in adopting this word into their own language (so also in the name Moses), gave it a form adapted to a Hebrew etymology, and preserving at the same time, as nearly as possible, the original significance of the name. Hence they wrote it ṳISTS, as if from Ṱ-state, leader, prince. (See the Bibl. Reflector, Vol. ii. p. 581.)

Bochart supposes that Pharaoh signifies a crocodile; and it is a somewhat striking coincidence, that Champlain has found, that the word oure, with the article pi-oue, is the Egyptian name of the serpent or dragon Uraeus, which is pointed out on all the monuments as a characteristic sign of Egyptian sovereignty. This is a singular congruity; and it seems to explain the true significance of the title Pharaoh, and the reason why this symbol is placed upon the royal head-dresses. (See Greppu's Essay on the Hieroglyphic System, &c. p. 68.) Does not this afford some illustration of the passage in Ezek. xxix. 3? “Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers,” &c.

Of the kings of Egypt there are not less than eleven or twelve mentioned in Scripture, all of whom bore the general title of Pharaoh, except three. Along with this title, two of them have also other proper names, Necho and Hopheph. The following are their order: some of them have been identified, by the labors of Champlain, with kings whose proper names we know from other sources; while others still remain in obscurity.

1. PHARAOH, (Gen. xii. 15, seq.) in the time of Abraham. (Greppu, p. 85.)

2. PHARAOH, the master of Joseph, Gen. xxxvii. 36; xlii. &c. Some suppose that the Pharaoh to whom Joseph became prime minister, was the son of the one mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 36. (Greppu, p. 91, seq.)

3. PHARAOH, who knew not Joseph, and under whom Moses was born; perhaps RAMSES MEIMOUN, EX. i. 8, seq. (Greppu, p. 94.)

4. PHARAOH, under whom the Israelites left Egypt, and who perished in the Red sea, Ex. v. -xiv. Probably AMenua. (Greppu, p. 97, seq.)

5. PHARAOH, in the time of David, 1 Kings xi. 19-21. Perhaps Poneenius. (Greppu, p. 112, seq.)

6. PHARAOH, the father-in-law of Solomon; 1 Kings iii. 10; vii. 8; ix. 16, 24. Probably Joschor. (Greppu, p. 114.)

7. SHISHAK, near the end of Solomon's reign, and under Rehoboam, 1 Kings xi. 25, 26; 2 Chron. xii. 3. Sanchocha. (Greppu, p. 117.)

8. PHARAOH, who overthrew the proper names of the Egyptian kings are mentioned in Scripture.

9. ZERAH, the Ethiopian, 2 Chron. xiv. 9, seq. Rosenberg, with good reason, supposes him to have been a chief of the Arabian Ethiopians, having no connection with Egypt. (See Curs. p. 323. Greppu, p. 120.)

10. SO, or Senechus, contemporary with Ahaz, 2 Kings xvii. 4. (Greppu, p. 124.)

11. TIRHAKA, king of Ethiopia and Egypt, in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 9; Isa. xxxvii. 9. Probably the Tacharo of Strabo, and the Taracles of Manetho. (Greppu, p. 125.)

12. PHARAOH Necho, in the time of Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 39, 40, seq.; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-24, seq. Necho, the son of Peninnichus. (Greppu, p. 127.)

See EGYPT, p. 373.

13. PHARAOH HOPEPH, contemporary with Nebuchadnezzar, Jer. xiv. 30. He was the grandson of Necho, and is the Apries of Herodotus. See ARIAN. (Greppu, p. 129.)

(See, in respect of the kings, the article EGYPT, p. 373, seq. and Rosenberg's Bibl. Geogr. vol. iii.) *R.

PHARISEES. This was the most celebrated and influential of the Jewish sects in the time of Christ. They were of less local character than the Sadducees, but like the latter, dangerous to the Jewish commonwealth. The prophet Isaiah, indeed, as Brixner remarks, found among the Jews in his time several appearances of the spirit and character which afterwards distinguished this sect; (Isa. lxvii. 3; lviii. 5.) but, as he adds, we have no proof that they existed as a distinct body in the prophetic age; nor do we find any traces of them prior to the time of the first Ptolemies, when oral traditions, together with allegorical interpretations of the written law, were introduced. Although we meet with no satisfactory evidence of the existence of the sect of the Hasidim, which Scaliger (Eleus. Tribunes, cap. xxxi. p. 170. Reland. Antiq. Sac. p. 2 cap. ix. § 18.) supposes to have been the foundation of the Pharisaic sect, the writer just cited thinks there can be little reason to doubt that it arose soon after the return from the Babylonish captivity, in consequence of the introduction of traditioanl institutions and allegorical interpretations. That it was established, and had acquired great authority, in the time of Hyrcanus, and of his sons, Aristobulus and Alexander, has already been stated in the article ALEXANDER, III. The Jewish historian, who was himself of this sect, speaks of it as flourishing in the time of Jonathan the highpriest, together with those of the Sadducees and Essenes, which invalidates the conjecture of Basmage, that the Pharisaic sect owed its rise to the separation which took place between the schools of Hillel and Shammuel; for the Jewish writers agree that these celebrated doctors did not flourish earlier than a hundred years before the Christian era.

But although the exact time of the first appearance of the Pharisaic sect cannot be ascertained, its origin may easily be traced back to the same period when the Sadducean heresy arose. From the time that the notion of supernumerary acts of self-denial, devotion and charity was introduced, the idea of the traditional law, a wide door was open for superstition, religious pride and hypocrisy. Whilst, on the other hand, some would despise the pious and affectionate, of professing to be pious and holy beyond the prescription of the written law, others, through a fanatical disposition, or that they might provide themselves with a convenient cloak for their vices, would become scrupulous observers of the traditional institutions. And when these pretenders to extraordinary sanctity saw that many of those who observed only the written law, not only disclaimed all works of supererogation, but even renounced the hope of future rewards, they would think it necessary to separate themselves into a distinct body, that they might the more successfully display their sanctity and piety. These conjectures are confirmed by the name of the sect, which is derived from the word πρεπον to separate. Their separation consisted chiefly in certain distinctions respecting food, clothing, and religious ceremonies. But this does not seem to have interrupted the uniformity of religious worship, in which the Jews of every sect appear to have always united.

The peculiar character and spirit of Pharisaism consisted in the strict observance of the oral law, which they believed to have been delivered to Moses by an archangel, during his forty days' residence in mencent Sted, and to have been by him committed to seventy elders, who transmitted it to posterity. Their superstitious reverence for this law, and the apparent anxiety of manner which it produced, rendered them exceedingly popular. The multitude, for the most part, commended their interest; and the great, who had their articles of faith frequently obliged to court their favor. Hence they obtained the highest offices both in the state and the priesthood, and had great weight both in public and private affairs: in some instances they proved so troublesome to the reigning powers, as to subject themselves to severe penalties.
Hyrcanus and Alexander restrained their increasing influence, and treated them with great rigor. Under Alexander, they regained their consequence; the disputes between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, (see Apoc. x. 32.) a little before the Christian era, increased their number and power; and they continued, until the destruction of Jerusalem, to enjoy the chief influence in the Synagogue and the synagogue. After this period, when the other sects were dispersed, the Pharisees, with their ascetic discipline, and the use of their sages, were the only sects which remained in the Jewish religions; so that, at this day, except the Karaites, scarcely any Jews are to be found who are not, in reality, of the Pharisees.

The principal dogmas of the sect were these:——The oral law, delivered from God to Moses, on Mount Sinai, by the angel Metatron, and transmitted to posterity by tradition, is of equal authority with the written law. By keeping both of these laws, a man cannot only obtain justification with God, but perform meritorious works of supererogation. Fastings, almshavings, abstinence, and confessions are sufficient almonies for sin. Thoughts and desires are not sinful, unless carried into action. God is the Creator of heaven and earth, and governs all things, even the actions of men, by his providence. Man can do nothing without divine influence; which does not, however, destroy the freedom of the human will. The soul of man is spiritual and immortal. In the invisable world, beneath the earth, rewards and punishments will be dispensed to the virtuous and vicious. The wicked shall be confined in an eternal prison, but the good shall obtain an easy return to life. Besides the soul there are good spirits, or angels, both good and bad. The resurrection of the body is to be expected. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. i. xiii. c. 9; i. xvii. c. 2.
Bell. J. i. ii. c. 12.)

It appears, from many passages in the Jewish rabbinical literature, that the doctrine of the migration of souls from one body to another; and it is probable that they derived it from the ancient Pharisees, and these from the oriental philosophers. This metem-pysics is, however, to be understood in the Pythagoric, and not in the Stoic sense. The Jews, probably, borrowed this error from the Egyptians. There is no reason, as some writers have done, to consider the sect of the Pharisees as a branch of the Stoic school. For though the Pharisees resembled the Stoic in their affection of peculiar sanctity, their notion of Divine Providence was essentially different from the Stoical doctrine of Fate; and their cast of man-ers arose from a different source; that of the Stoics being derived from their idea of the nature of the soul, as a particle of the divine nature; and that of the Pharisees, from a false persuasion that the law might be fulfilled, and justification with God obtained, by ceremonial observances.

The peculiar manners of this sect are strongly marked in the writings of the evangelists, (Matt.
xx. xxii.; Luke vii. &c.) particularly the pas-ten in observing the rites and ceremonies of both written and traditional; the rigor of routines, in watchings, fastings, and ablutions, ascetic care to avoid every kind of ritua-ty; their long and frequent attendance at the synagogues and temple, and in the public their broad phylacteries on the borders of ments, in which were written sentences of assiduity in making proclamations; their chains, and, under all this show of piety, their vanity, avarice, licentiousness at , which called forth many severe rebukes Saviour. These representations are confirm-testimony of the Jewish writers themselves.
Talmudic books mention several distinct Pharisees, under characters which show they been deeply immersed in the idles and molous superstitions. Among these were the L Pharisee, who, that he might appear in mediation, as if destined for a sacrifice, was en from the ground; the Mortar Pharisee, who, right, might not be disturbed, wore a the shape of a mortar, that would only look upon the ground, as his feet; and the Pharisee, who, shaving his eyes as if to avoid the sight of women, often struck against the wall. Such wretched exped tions of some of these hypocrites make use of to the admiration of the vulgar. (Bricker's play, by Bredfield.)

The sect of the Pharisees, as already hi ness of the sect, those now extant are of this sect, and equall n to their traditions, which they call the find Gamaliel, a Pharisee, speaking in behalf of the apostles; whereas, we never find a Sadducee uttering a syllable in their favor, or showing them any mercy; it was, no doubt to a certain degree, favorable to the church at Jerusalem, that the power of the Sadducees was counterbalanced by their fear of the Pharisees. It will naturally be imagined, that a sect which held the existence of spirits separate from the body, would be best disposed towards the doctrine of a risen Saviour, and accordingly we find, that the Jewish Christian church was greatly composed of Pharisees, (Acts xv. 5) who insisted on the universal necessity of observing the Mosaic institutions. They would have imposed on the Gentiles those rituals which themselves adhered to, being Hebrews. The same spirit animated the body of Jewish believers long after; “Thou seest, brother, said James to Paul, (Acts xxi. 20.) how many thousands of Jews there are who believe, and they are all zealous of the law,” that is, zealous Pharisees, though Christian believers. Nor was this disposition subdued, till after the destruction of Jerusalem has rendered the observance of the legal ceremonies impossible. The Pharisaic Christians retained the national rites: the bishops of their church were circumcised; and the children were both circumcised and baptized; as they are at this day, where the churches are descendents of ancient Jewish converts.

It would seem, from the Talmud, that there were at least seven distinctions, or sects, among the Pharisees. So Paul says, “according to the most strict, the strictest of our religion, I lived a Pharisee.” Some were, probably, less severe in their opinions than others.

PHILADELPHIA, a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, where was one of the seven Asiatic churches, Rev. iii. 7. Philadelphia was so called from Atalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, by whom it was founded. It stood on a branch of mount Tmolus, by the river Cogamus, about twenty-eight miles east of Sardis. It greatly suffered by frequent earthquakes, owing to its vicinity to Cataukeaunene; and it was also by chance of surprise, that it was not on this account abandoned. It is now a mean but considerable town, of large extent, with a population of about 1000 Greek Christians, who have a resident bishop, and about 20 inferior clergy. (See Missionary Journal, p. 290, sec.)

PHILEMON, a rich citizen of Colossae, in Phrygia, who, Calmert thinks, was converted to the Christian faith, with Apphia his wife, by Epafras, a disciple of Paul; but it would appear from the expression in Philem. verse 19, “Thou owest to me even thy ownself, besides,” that Philemon was really a convert of Paul; unless we could admit that the apostle had formerly been the means of saving his life; for which we have no warrant. Some have supposed that Archippus was son to Philemon; and as the apostle termed him, “our fellow soldier,” it is possible, that the connection had been of long standing, and consequently, much intercourse might have taken place between Paul and Philemon, distinct from any reference to Philemon’s situation at Colossae. Lighfoot has no thoughts; but Niclus adopts it; but if Archippus were companion of Paul the aged, he was too old to be son to Philemon: not to insist, that no reason can be assigned why this son is distinguished from the rest of Philemon’s family. He might be brother to Philemon, (or to Apphia,) and, living with him, is placed after Apphia; but before the young members of the family, to whom he was uncle. This conjecture seems to be the most probable; and it agrees with the supposed time of life at which Archippus had (lately) been chosen to an office of deaconship.

Though it is usually said that Paul had converted and baptized Onesimus, the run-away slave of Philemon, (see Onesimus,) at Rome; yet from the phrase (Col. iv. 9) “who is one of you,” it is natural to infer, that Onesimus had professed Christianity before his elopement; (so Epafras is called one of themselves, chap. i. 7) otherwise, he could be no member of the church at Colossae: and very likely, this transgression of a professor had not only mortified Philemon extremely, but had scandalized the church, and had become publicly notorious among the heathen also.

Philemon was undoubtedly a man of property; and like Gaius, the lady Eclatina, and Phebe, he exercised great hospitality towards Christian brethren, especially evangelists. But from the expression of the apostle “to prepare him a lodging” (comp. Mark, et al. in loc.) in a hired house, in the city, where he might receive all visitors, it would appear that Philemon’s premises were not very extensive. Philemon might have been a deacon in or of the churches at Colossae, but the term “fellow laborer” is not sufficient to prove that he was a bishop; though it implies a previous personal knowledge, and perhaps much confidential communication, between the parties. If we might add a personal knowledge of Philemon, by those also who salute him in Paul’s letter.—Timothy, Epafras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke,—it would greatly heighten our conception of this good man’s character, and suggest a variety of occasions on which he might have rendered the brethren services equally extensive and important.

PHILESTUS, an apostate Christian, mentioned by Paul in connection with Hymenæus, 2 Tim. ii. 16.

I. PHILIP, or Herod-Philip, (Mark vii. 17; Luke iii. 19; Matt. xiv. 3,) son of Herod the Great. See Herod-Philip.

II. PHILIP, the apostle, was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee, and was called by our Saviour, at the beginning of his ministry, (John i. 43, 44,) and about a year afterwards. He was several times mentioned in the Gospels, but the incidents in his life do not require to be enlarged upon.

III. PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons, (Acts vi. 5,) is thought to have been of Cesarea in Palestine. (See Acts, xxi. 8, 9.) Stephen, nearly all the Christians, except the apostles, having left Jerusalem, and being dispersed in several places, Philip went to preach at Sebaste, or Samaria, where he performed several miracles, and converted many persons, Acts viii. He baptized them; and sent to the apostles at Jerusalem, that they might come and communicate the Holy Ghost to them. Some time after this, Philip was by an angel commanded to travel on the road that leads from Jerusalem to Old Gaza in the way to Egypt. Philip obeyed, and there met with an Ethiopian eunuch, belonging to Candace, queen of Ethiopia, whom he converted and baptized. (See Acts viii. 26.) Being come out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord took him away, and we subsequently find him at Azotus. He preached the gospel in all the cities he passed through, till he returned to Cesarea of Palestine, where he probably spent the remainder of his days.
PHILIPPI, a city of Macedonia, so called from Philip, king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it; whence it lost its former name of Bathos. In Acts xvi. 12, Luke says, "We came to Philippi, which (say our translators) is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and this translation requires correction, to this effect: "Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia? Macedonia Prima. The province of Macedonia had undergone several changes, and had been divided into various portions, which had received various names. At one time it was in six divisions; at another, it was united with Achaea, as Sextus Rufus observes; and on its conquest by Paulus Emilius, it was divided into four provinces, as appears from Livy. We have however nothing to do with any other than the first division of it. Luke says, "They came to Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia;" and Mr. Taylor has produced a medal which reads, ΜΑΚΕΔΟΝΙΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΗΣ, "of the first part of Macedonia," which is a complete justification of the evangelist's description of this district. We ought further to observe, says Mr. Taylor, that though our present copies read συν οἱ τῶν Συθήκων, the Syriac version and Chrysostom read πρότερος; and as this is the reading of the medal, as it agrees with matter of fact, and deliver us from some ambiguities, we risk little in recommending this reading; and its correspondent rendering "Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia?" for, in fact, Amphipolis was (or had been) the chief city of the district in which Philippi stood. (Livy, lib. xiv. c. 52.) Further, the sacred writer says, Philippi was "a colony;" intending, no doubt, a Roman colony; but as this was a favor Philippi seems to have had little reason to expect, having formerly opposed the interest of the Cæsarian imperial family, the learned have been embarrassed by the title here given it. However, after long perplexities among the critics, Providence brought to light some coins, in which it is recorded under this character: and one of which makes express mention, that Julius Cæsar himself had bestowed the dignity and advantages of a colony on the city of Philippi, which Augustus afterwards confirmed and augmented. The legend is, ΚΟΛΟΝΙΑ ΑΥΓΟΥΣΤΑ ΗΛΙΟΚΡΙΤΙΟΝ. This corroborates the character given to Philippi by Luke; and proves that if it had been a colony for many years, though no author but himself, whose writings have reached us, has mentioned it under that character; or has given reason to infer at what time it might be thus honorably distinguished. (It is, however, more probable that the reading of the Greek is correct, since there are no various readings; and Philippi is called the "first or chief city" of that part of Macedonia, perhaps from some peculiar privileges bestowed upon it, and not as being the capital of that division of the country; since this honor belonged to Amphipolis in the first division, and to Thessalonica in the second. (See Kuinoel on Acts xvi. 12.) R.

Paul preached here A.D. 52, and converted several inhabitants; among others, Lydia, a seller of purple. He also cast out a Pythian spirit from a servant maid, in consequence of which her masters stirred up the whole city against him, and the magistrates caused him and Silas to be seized, whipped, and put into the prison.

This ill treatment seems to have been recollected by Paul, with a resentment not common to him. He says to the Thessalonians, "We had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated at Philippi." It should seem that the military officers of the colony had assumed a power that did not belong to them; and Paul respected their proceedings with the feelings of a citizen, as well as of a Roman citizen—but he humbled them in a public manner; but he did not forget their shameful usage of him and his companion Silas.

The converted Philippians were always full of faith and hope, and received from God the ministry of Paul. They assisted him on various occasions; (Phil. iv. 16,) sent him money with Tychicus, who came from Asia; and being informed that he was at Rome, they sent a deputation to him by Epaphroditus, their bishop, (Phil. iv. 12, 18, A.D. 60,) went a second time, and carried with him the collection which is still remaining; and in which they commended their liberality, and showed great astonishment for their readiness. This church was destroyed by Paul and Silas, under the inscriptions at the head of the book. It is the first church in Europe; and the whole book, the LXX, whose age and experience qualify it, being a complete translation for that difficult office. He continued there for a time, probably several years, though he retains all mention of his services. (Comp. Acts xxi. 1ff., with chap. xx. 6.)

PHILISTINES, a people that came from Caphtor (see CAPHTOR) into Palestine, (A. D. 77; Jer. xviii. 4,) being descendants from the sons of Japheth, (Gen. x. 15, 16,) and also from Mizraim, (Gen. x. 13, 14,) father of the Egyptians. Moses says (Deut. ii. 25,) that the Caphtorim come out of Caphtor, dived out the Avim, dwelt from Hazeroth to Azaah, (or Gaza,) and in their stead. It is therefore supposed by the Avim, or Avites, or Ammonites, that the names came into Palestine, and possessed that district. The name of these people is not Hebrew. Septuagint generally translate it by ΛΑΜΠΠΟΝΟΕΓΕΡΩΝ. The LXX sometimes translate ΧΡΗΣΤΟΙ, ΩΡΙΜΟΙ, (ἐκκριτικοί,) See Ezek. xlvii. 5, 6.

The Philistines were a powerful people in their time, even in Abraham's time, (A. M. 2523,) and had then kings, and considerable cities. They were not enumerated among the nations devoted to destruction, whose territory the Lord assigned to the Hebrews, probably because they were not cursed seed of Canaan. Joshua, however, hesitated to give their land to the Hebrews, as they were always dangerous foes. They were not possessed of various districts promised to Israel, until these conquests must have been ill-maintained under the Judges, at the time of Saul, and at the beginning of the reign of David, the Philistines being their kings and lords. Their state was divided into five little kingdoms, or satrapies, and pressed Israel during the government of the priest Eli, that of Samuel, and during the time of Saul; for about 130 years, from A. M. 2845 to Shamgar, Samuel, Samuel and Saul oppressed and were victorious over them with great spirit at various times, but did not reduce their king power. They maintained their independence till David subdued them, (2 Sam. v. 17, 18;) from which time they continued in subjection to the kings of Judah, and to the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, (who reigned 18 years,) from A. M. 2960 to A. M. 3110, as they revolted, 2 Chron. xxii. 16. Jehoram met against them, and probably reduced them to subject; but as the country was very level, it is observed that they were again from Uzziah, who kept them to the period of his reign, and the kings of who rules there, and during his whole reign, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7, the unfortunate reign of Ahaz, the Philistines great havoc in the territory of Judah; but his... successor Hezekiah again subdued them, 2 Chron. xxvii. 18; 2 Kings xviii. 8. They regained their full liberty, however, under the later kings of Judah; and we see by the menaces uttered against them by the prophets Isaiah, Amos, Zephaniah, Jeremiah and Esaias, that they knew the truth at such times on Israel and for which God threatened to punish them with great misfortunes. They were partially subdued by Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, and afterwards by Psammeticus, king of Egypt; and there is great probability that they were reduced by Nebuchadrezzar, as well as the other people of Syria, Phoenicia and Palestine, during the siege of Tyre. They afterwards fell under the dominion of the Persians, then under that of Alexander the Great, who destroyed Gaza, the only city of the Phoenicians that dared to oppose him. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Athenians took several cities from them, which they subjected, and Tryphon, regent of the kingdom of Syria, gave to Jonathan the government of the whole coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt; consequently, all the country of the Philistines. The name Palestine comes from Philistines, although these people possessed but a small part of this country. See Pales.

Paul states the Colossians lest any man spoil them through philosophy, Col. ii. 8. In Acts xvii. 18, it is related, that when this apostle came to Athens, he there found Epicurean and Stoic philosophers, who made a jest of his discourse; and in many places this Epistles, he opposes the supposed wise men, and the false wisdom of the age—that is, the pagan philosophy—to the wisdom of Jesus Christ, and the true religion, which to the philosophers and sophists seemed to be mere folly, because it was taught neither on the eloquence nor the authority of those who preached it, but on the power of God, and on the operations of the Holy Ghost, which actuated the hearts and minds of believers.

About the time that the several sects of philosophers were formed among the Greeks, as the Academicians, the Peripatetics, and the Stoics, there arose also among the Jews several sects, as the Essenes, the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The Pharisees had some resemblance to the Stoics, the Sadducees to the Epicureans, and the Essenes were more the Mohicans. The Pharisees were proud, vain and boasting, like the Stoics: the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, and the existence of spirits, freed themselves at once, like the Epicureans, from all solicitude about futurity: the Essenes were more moderate, more simple and religious, and therefore approached nearer to the Academicians.

The philosophers, against whom Paul inveighs, in his Epistle to the Romans, boasted the extent of their knowledge, the purity of their morality, the eloquence of their writings, the strength of their reasonings, and the subtlety of their arguments. Their weaknesses were pride, curiosity, presumption, hypocrisy, ambition. They ascribed every thing to human reason, and would be thought superior in all things. Although their lives were disorderly, shameful, and even injurious to human nature, yet they would pass on the world for good men; and while boastings of their knowledge of God, they dishonored him by their actions. To them the apostle opposed the humility of the cross of Christ, the force of his miracles, the purity of his moral doctrines, the depth of his mysteries, and the evident proofs of his mission.

Many of the ancient fathers maintain, that the ancient heathen philosophers had nothing valuable but what they borrowed from the Hebrews— that they had drawn from the fountain of the prophets; that by the subtle artifice of the devil, some principles of truth slipped into their writings, in order to undermine Christianity, and to spread it among the heathens to the world. Eusebius has devoted two entire books (lib. xi. xii.) of his great work of the Gospel-Preparation, to show that Plato had taken the principal things of his philosophy and theology from the sacred books of the Jews.

I. PHINEHAS, son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron, was the third high-priest of the Jews, (A. M. 2571, to about A. M. 2500,) and is particularly commended in Scripture for zeal, in vindicating the glory of God, when the Midianites had sent their daughters into the camp of Israel, to tempt the Hebrews to fornication and idolatry, Num. xxv. 7. For his conduct upon this occasion, the Lord promised the priesthood to Phinehas by a perpetual covenant; evidently including this tacit condition, that his children should continue faithful and obedient. It continued in the race of Phinehas, down to the high-priest Eli, for about 335 years, when it passed into the family of Ithamar; and again reverted to the family of Eleazar under the reign of Saul, who, having put to death Abinadab and the other priests of Nob, gave the high-priesthood to Zadok, of the race of Phinehas. The priesthood continued in his family until after the captivity of Babylon, and even to the destruction of the temple.

We read also of another memorable and zealous action of Phinehas, (Josh. xxii. 30, 31,) when the Israelites beyond Jordan had raised upon the banks of the river a vast heap for an altar, those on the other side, fearing they were going to forsake the Lord, and to set up another religion, deputed Phinehas and other chief men, to inform themselves of their reason for erecting this monument. When they found that it was only in commemoration of their union and common origin, Phinehas praised the Lord, saying, We now know that the Lord is with us, since you are not guilty of that prevarication of which we suspected you.

Under the pontificate of Phinehas the story of Micah happened, (Judg. xvii.) also the conquest of Leish by the tribe of Dan, (Judg. xviii. 26,) which the enormity committed by the Episcopus, Levite of mount Ephraim, Judg. xix. Phinehas's successor was Abiezer, or Abishua, Judg. xx. 58.

II. PHINEHAS, son of Eli, the high-priest, and brother of Hophni. See Ezra.

PHEBRE, a deaconess of the church in the eastern port of Corinth, Cenchrea. It is most likely, from what the apostle says of Phoebe, that she had been a succourer of many, and of myself also, (Rom. xvi. 1, 2,) that she was a woman of property, not to say, of distinction. Cenchrea was a port of considerable commerce; and as it is clear that Phoebe went to Rome on important business in which the faithful at Rome might assist her, it is probable also, that she was engaged in trade on her own account; something like Lydia of Philippi. That she was much in the confidence of the apostle, cannot be doubted; and, we think, from the import of the term rendered succourer, (patroness,) she may be taken for the counterpart of the hospitable Galus, a mine host, (say, Paul,) and the host of the whole church. (Compare the second and third Epistles of John,) A laudable emulation! Galus at Corinth; and Phoebe at its neighboring port, Cenchrea.

PHENICIA, or Pharan, a province of Syria, which, in its more ancient and extenuated sense, comprehended a narrow strip of country extending nearly the whole length of the eastern coast of the Mediterranean sea, from Antioch to the borders of Egypt. But Phœnicia Proper was included between the cities of Laodicea and Tyre, and comprehended only the territories of Tyre and Sidon. Before Joshua conquered Palestine, this country was possessed by Canaanites, sons of Ham, divided into eleven families, of which the most powerful was that of Canaan, the founder of Sidon, and head of the Canaanites, properly so called, whom the Greeks named Phenicians. Only those preserved their independence under Joshua; also under David, Solomon, and the succeeding kings: but they were subdued by the kings of Assyria and Chaldee. Afterwards, they successively obeyed the Persians, Greeks and Romans. At this day, Phœnicia is in subjection to the Ottomans, not having had any national or native kings, or any independent form of government, for more than two thousand years. The name Phœnicia is not in the books of Hebrew Scripture; but only in the Maccabees and the New Testament. The Hebrew always reads Canaan. Matthew, who wrote perhaps in either Hebrew or Syriac, calls the same person a Canaanitish woman, (chap. xv. 22,) whom Mark, writing in Greek, calls a Syro-phenician, or a Phœnician of Syria; because Phœnicia then made a part of Syria; also to distinguish the people from the Phenicians of Africa, or the Carthaginians, which was a colony from the original country. See further under Tyre.

PHYRGIA was the largest kingdom of Asia Minor; it had Bithynia north, Pisidia and Lydia south, Galatia and Cappadocia east, and Lydia and Myasia west. Christianity was planted in this country by Paul, Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23.

PHUT, the third son of Ham, (Gen. x. 6.) is thought to have peopled either the canton of Phethemuphi, Phethemuphityi, of Phemus and PHEME, whose capital was Thara in Lower Egypt, inclining towards Libya; or the canton called Phethenotes, of which Buthas was the capital. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah, (xlii. 9.) this province was subject to Nechoh king of Egypt; and Nahun (iii. 8.) reckons them among those who ought to come to the assistance of No-Ammun. The Arabic versions by Phut understand a people in Southern Egypt, if not rather in Nubia; these might come down the Nile, to assist No-Ammun. According to Josephus, (Ant. i. 6. 2.) Phut is Mauritania, where the name is still preserved.

PHYGELLUS, a Christian of Asia, who, being at Rome while Paul was there in prison, (A. D. 63.) forsook him with Hermogenes, in his necessity, 2 Tim. iv. 21.

PHYLACTERIES were little rolls of parchment, in which were written certain words of the law, and were worn upon their foreheads, (see Fronetlet) and upon the wrist of their left arm, by the Jews. The custom was founded on a mistaken interpretation of Exod. xiii. 9: "And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes." And verse 16: "And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes."

Leo of Modena informs us particularly about these rolls. (Ceremonies of the Jews, p. i. cap. 11. n. 4.) Those that were to be fastened to the arms were two rolls of parchment written in square letters, with an ink made on purpose, and with much care. They were rolled up to a point, and enclosed in a skin of black calf-skin. They then were put upon a square bit of the same leather, but something stiffer, whence hung a thong of the same, and at the top of a finger's breadth, and a cubit and a half long. These rolls were placed at the bending of the left arm, and after the thong had made a little knot in the form of the letter Yodh, it was wound about the arm in a spiral line, which ended at the top of the middle finger. It was called Tybah-yad, or the Testilla of the hand.

PI-HAHIROTH, the mouth or pass of Hiroth, of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness, Exod. p. 401.

PILATE was sent to govern Judea in the room of Gratus, (A. D. 26 or 27,) and governed this provi- nce ten years. He was of a temper and obstinacy, and gave occasion to troubles and revolts among the Jews. Luke (xix. 1.) acquaints us, that he had mingled the blood of some Galileans with his sacrifices, but the occasion on which this was done is not known.

Pilate repeatedly endeavored to deliver our Saviour from the Jews, knowing that they accused him capital only from malice and envy. His wife wrote to him in a letter that the person had been disturbed with dreams, and desired him not to participate in condemning that person. In order to effect his purpose, he adop- ted several expedients: (1.) He required legal account, evidence, and conviction; and in default of these, proposed to refer his condemnation to the Jews; (2.) He had not, as he well knew, the power of inflicting capital punishment, John xviii. 30, 31. (2.) He attempted to appease the Jews, and to give them satisfaction, by whipping our Saviour. (3.) He took him out of their hands, by offering to delive- r him over to them for the feast, which was the passover. (4.) He wanted to discharge him from the accusation against him, by sending him to Herod king of Galilee. (5.) When he saw all this he did not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him, saying he could be no friend to the emperor he was the same, of about a year's service. He was at Jericho, and as he got there, he caused water to be brought, washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that person. Yet at the same time he delivered him to the soldiers, that they might crucify him. It was enough to justify Christ, and to show that Pilate held him to be innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge whose duty it was, as well to assert the cause of preserved innocence, as to punish the guilty criminist. He ordered to be put over our Saviour's cross it were, an abstract of his sentence, and the motive his condemnation, "Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews," written in Latin, Greek and Hebrew. So of the Jews remonstrated to Pilate, that he ought have written "Jesus of Nazareth, pretended king of the Jews." But Pilate answered them peremptorily "What I have written, I have written." That evening he gave leave to take the bodies down fr the crosses, that they might not continue there.
following day, being the passover, and a sabbath day. He also granted the body of Jesus to Joseph of Arimathea, that might be buried. When the priest came to desire him to set a watch about the sepulchre, lest the disciples should steal Jesus away by night, he answered, they had a guard, and might place it there themselves. This is the substance of the passage concerning Pilate. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Eusebius, and several others, ancients and moderns, assure us, that it was the custom for Roman magistrates to send to the emperor copies of all verbal processions and judicial acts which passed in their several provinces; and that Pilate, in compliance with this custom, having reported to Tiberius what had occurred relating to Jesus, the emperor wrote an account of it to the senate, in a manner which induced a suspicion that he thought favorably of Jesus, and was not unwilling they should decree divine honors to him. But the senate differed from this opinion, and the matter dropped. It appears by what Justin says of these Acts, that they mentioned the miracles of Christ; and even that the soldiers had divided his garments among them. Eusebius intimates that they spoke of his resurrection and ascension. Tertullian and Justin refer to these documents with so much confidence, as would induce a belief that they had copies of them in their hands. Neither Eusebius nor Jerome, however, who were both inquirers into this subject, and are among the most learned persons, nor any of the later authors, seems to have seen them; at least, not the true and original Acts. For those now extant are not authentic, being neither ancient nor uniform. (See Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T. p. 214, seq.)

Pilate became odious both to the Jews and Samaritans, for the severity and cruelty of his administration; and being accused by the latter before Vitellius, the governor of Syria, he was removed from his office, and sent to Rome to answer their accusations before the emperor. (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. c. 3, and c. 4, 1.) Before his arrival, Tiberius was dead; and Pilate is said to have been banished by Caligula to Vienna, in Gaul, and there to have died by his own hand. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 7, 8.) He is described by Philo the Jew, as a judge accustomed to sell justice; and for money to pronounce any sentence that was desired. He mentions his rapines, his injuries, his murders, the torments he inflicted on the innocent, and the persons he put to death without form or process. In short, he seems to have been a man that exercised excessive cruelty during all the time of his government.

PILGRIM denotes, properly, one who is going forward to visit a holy place, with design to pay his solemn devotions there. Whether pilgrimages are as ancient as the days of Jacob, we know not; but if they were, it gives a very expressive sense to the words of that good old man, who calls the years of his life "the days of his pilgrimage;" and is perfectly consistent with the apostle's observation, that the ancient patriarchs "confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on earth," Heb. xi. 3.

PILLAR, a column or supporter. A pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, signify a cloud, a fire, a smoke, which, rising up toward heaven, forms an irregular column. The pillars of heaven, (Job xxvi. 11;) and the pillars of the earth, (Job ix. 6; Ps. lxxx. 3;) are metaphorical expressions, by which the heavens and the earth are compared to an edifice raised by the hand of God, and founded upon its basis or foundation. This supports the sense of the Septuagint, Job, (xxxviii. 4—6;) "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, or who hath stretched the line upon it? Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened, or who laid the corner-stone thereof?"

James, Cephas, and John "seemed to be pillars of the church," Gal. ii. 9. "Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God," (Rev. iii. 17;) he shall be the support, strength, and ornament of the house of God. The church of Jesus Christ is called by Paul (1 Tim. iii. 15;) "the pillar and ground of the truth." When the Lord sent Jeremiah to preach to the nations, he said to him, (Jer. i. 18;) "Behold, I have made thee this day a defended city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls, against the whole land; able to withstand all the efforts of thine enemies, and incapable of yielding to their violence."

PILLOW, a cushion for the head or arm. See Bere, p. 155.

PINE, a well-known tree, of the nature of the fir. It is spoken in Scripture of a tree growing on mount Lebanon, (Isa. xi. 19; ix. 13;) which the Vulgate calls solum, clus; probably a species of platnus or pinae. In Isa. xi. 14, the Vulgate reads pinus, but the English Bible has ask. R.

PINNACLE of the temple. When the devil had tempted Jesus in the desert, (Matt. iv. 5;) "he took him up into the holy city, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple; and said, If thou art the Son of God, cast thyself down," &c. This pinnacle Calmet supposes to be the gallery, or parapet, on the top of the buttresses, which surrounded the roof of the temple, properly so called; and he remarks, that in Palestine the roofs of all houses were covered with terraces, or platforms: around which was a low wall, to prevent any one falling down, Deut. xxii. 8. Josephus, too, says, the roof of the temple was defended by tall golden spikes, to hinder birds from alighting upon it, that they might not defile it with their dung. It is by no means probable, however, that the temptation of Jesus to throw himself down among the people at worship, took place on any part of the high roof of the temple. It is much more likely that the place was in some more accessible part, to which there was a passage by stairs; for, as to the very vague, though common notion, of the person of Jesus being carried through the air by the power of the devil, it is by no means credible. The account given by Hegesippus of the death of James the less, may illustrate this evidence of the temptation. He went up into a gallery, whence he could be heard by the people, and from whence he was thrown down, without being instantly killed. (The summit or roof of the principal porch of the temple, next the southern wall, is called the Gentiles, is said by Josephus (Antiq. xxv. vii. 5. B. J. v. 5. 2;) to have been 500 cubits above the bottom of the valley below, and may well be considered as the pinnacle spoken of, R.*

PIRATHON, a city of Ephraim in mount Amalek, whence came Abdon, judge of Israel, Judg. xii. 15. Bichedda caused it to be fortified. It is called Pharrathom, in 1 Mac. iv. 50.

PSISGAH, a mountain beyond Jordan, in Moab, a summit, or peak, rising from, or among, a series of lower hills, and probably Pisaque, a mountain near Mount Seir. It is much more extensive: "All the land from the river of Egypt, to the river, the great river Euphrates, to the utmost sea." This was the extent of Solomon's dominions; and the utmost bounds of the royal power of the kings of Israel. But another use may be made of this passage, not without its importance. Could it have been seen from any other mountain in all Canaan? Was this the same extent as a temptation to our Lord, when Christ, "All this, the utmost bounds that by the ancient kings of thy nation, art descended; all the whole kingdom of thine ancestors, will I give to thee." He may account for this in our version, "all the land of Havilah, where excellent gold is found. It has, of course, been placed as variously as the garden of Eden, to which article the reader is referred. Eusebius and Jerome call it the Ganjas; Josephus calls it Gotha; and Solomon, the commentator, calls it the Nile.

PITTIOM, one of the cities built by the children of Israel for Pharaoh in Egypt, during their servitude, Exod. i. 11. This is probably the Pathmuses mentioned by Herodotus, (lib. ii. 158,) which he places on the canal made by the kings Necho and Darius, to join the Red sea with the Nile. We find also, in the ancient geographers, that there was an arm of the Nile called Pathmesticus, Phatamicus, Phatamius, or Phatamitzus. Bochart says that Pithom and Rameses are about five leagues above the division of the Nile, and beyond this river; but this assertion has no proof from antiquity. Marshall will have Pithom to be the same as Pelusium, or Damietta. (See Rosenmüller Bibl. Geogr. iii. p. 309.)

PLAY, TO PLAY. The Hebrews use this word to express all kinds of diversions, as dancing, sportive exercise, joying, and amusements proper for recreating and diverting the mind. The word ἀστραφάν, which signifies to play, is commonly used for laughing, mocking, jeering, insulting. When Sarah saw Ishmael play with her son Isaac, she was offended at it: it was a play of mockery and insult, or, perhaps, of squabbling, as in 2 Sam. i. 14. Let the young people (or maidens) get up and play before us—show their skil at their weapons—let them fight, as it were, by way of play; but the event shows that they fought in good earnest, since they were all killed. We see another kind of play in Exod. xxxii. 6. When the Israelites had set up the golden calf, they began to dance about it, and to divert themselves: "The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play." When Samson was delivered by Delilah into the hands of the Philistines, they bored out his eyes, put him in prison, and some time after made him play before them; that is, divert them by the tricks they played him, and by the motions he was forced to make, to avoid them, and to screen himself from their insults, Judg. xvi. 25. The women who came out to meet David and Saul, when they returned victorious from the slaughter of Goliath, danced and played on instruments, and showed their mirth after a thousand manners, 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7. In the procession at the removal of the ark from the house, Obad-Edom to the palace of David, he danced with great acclivity, played on instruments, and testified his joy before the Lord, 2 Sam. vi. 5, 21. And when Michal upbraided him for not observing the gravity suitable to his rank, he answered, "I will play before the Lord, and will be still more vile in my own eyes Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, opening her her before the Lord, says, I have never associated my self with those that play, Tob. iii. 17. And Jerimiah, (xvi. 17.) "I have never haunted the assembly of those that are given to play and diversion." To same prophet, comforting the daughter of Sion, tell her the time shall come in which she shall be rebuked and again shall divert herself in dancing with equal, ch. xxxi. 4. Solomon represents Wisdom playing before the Lord, and taking her pleasure living among men, Prov. viii. 30, 31.

There is no mention in Scripture of any particular sorts of plays; neither games of hazard, nor theatre representations, nor races either of horses or chariot nor combats of men or of beasts. The Israelites were a laborious people, who confined almost their diversions to the pleasures of the country, to those of the festivals of the Lord, their religious journeys, and their enjoyments in the temple. The passage, however, refers to the time when the law was maintained; the ancient periods of the Hebrew republic. For when they grew irreligious they adopted the utmost excesses of idolatrous practices; their wicked and shameless sports and diversions become the subject of observation, after the death of Alexander the Great, under the government of the kings of Syria in Judea, they began to study games and exercises of the Greeks. There we gymnasiums, or schools of exercise, in Jerusalem, places where they practised the exercises of the Greeks, wrestling, boxing, quoits, &c. 1 Mac. v. 2 Mac iv. 13—15. And when the Romans succeeded the Greeks, Herod built theatres and amphitheatres in the cities of Palestine, and instituted all sorts of games.

PLEDGE, a security or assurance given for performance of a contract. When a man of verme, pledges his word, his affirmation becomes an assurance that he will fulfill what he has promised. He as the word of every man is not equally valid, matters of importance, it becomes necessary the valuable article of some kind should be deposited, a bond on his part. So Joshua gave pledges to Tan Gen. xxxviii. 17. Under the law the taking of pledged: the mill-stone was not to be taken pledge, (Deut. xxiv. 16,) the person taking pledge to enter the house to fetch it, (ver. 10.) not detain necessary raiment after sunset; (ver. 12;) was the widow's raiment to be taken in pledge, 17. How mild, how benevolent are these directions and we find some reproofed that they take the brother's pledge, (Job xxii. 6.) that they take the wife's ox in pledge, (xxiv. 3, 9,) that they do not rest the pledge, (as the law directed, Deut. xxiv. 18.) Ez xviii. 7, 12; xxiii. 15. To understand Amos ii, "They lay themselves down on clothes laid the pledge by every altar," observe, how galling this must be the owners, to see carpets, &c. used in idolatry, cried abroad, laid under idolatrous sacred trees, What insolence in the lender who held these pledge what mortification to the borrower who had delivered them to see his property (1.) published and (2.) p.
tail; but on modern globes in the shoulder, and which appear at the beginning of spring. Job speaks of the Pleiades, (chap. xxvii. 31; ix. 8) and of the Hyades, which are seven other stars in the Bull's head, and mark out the east point and the spring; "Canst thou bind the sweet influence of the Pleiades?" Hebrew Chamah; Can you hinder the Pleiades from rising in their season? He gives them the name—the sweet influences of Chamah, because of the agreeableness of the spring season. Jerome has translated Chamah, by Hyades, (Job x. 8) and by Pleiades, (Job xxxviii. 31.) and by Arcturus, the Bear's tail, Amos v. 8. Aquila sometimes translates it in the same manner. The Bear is one of the most northern constellations; but Chamah rather signifies the Pleiades.

POETRY of the Hebrews. No point of criticism has been more discussed among the learned than that concerning Hebrew poetry; and yet we cannot say the matter is exhausted, or the difficulty cleared. We cannot pretend to know the true pronunciation of the Hebrew language; and consequently we cannot perceive either the harmony of the words, or the quantity of the syllables, which constitute the beauty of the verses. Nor have we in Hebrew, as we have in Greek and Latin, rules for ascertaining the quantity of the syllables, the number of feet, or the cadence and construction of verses; and yet it is plain that the Hebrews observed these things, at least in some measure, since in their poems we observe letters added to, or taken off, from the ends of words; which evinces submission to the rhythm, the number, or the measure of syllables.

From the manner in which Josephus, Origen, Eusebius and Jerome have spoken of the Hebrew poetry, it should seem that in their time the beauty and rules of it were well known. Josephus affirms in several places, that the songs composed by Moses are in heroic verse, and that David composed several sorts of verses and songs, odes and hymns, in honor of God; some of which were in trimeters, or verses of three feet; and others in pentameters, or verses of five feet. Origen and Eusebius adopted the same sentiment; but whether out of deference to the opinion of Josephus, or whether of their own judgment, is uncertain. Origen well understood the Hebrew, and Eusebius was one of the most learned men of his time.

Le Clerc composed an ingenious dissertation, to show, that the Hebrew poetry was in rhyme much like that of the Greeks or Egyptians. Others maintain, that in the old Hebrew verses there is neither measure nor feet; and Scaliger affirms, that this language, as well as that of the Syrians, Arabsians and Assyrians, is not capable of the restraint of feet or measures. Much of the Arabic poetry bears evidence of an origin cognate with the Hebrew; nor are the maxims of our British Druids, conveyed in sententious verses, for the greater accuracy of memory—and they were committed to memory, not to writing—altogether dissimilar.

The first thing remarkable in Hebrew poetry, is a duplication of phraseology, so constructed, that the memory, by recollecting one member of the sentence, could not fail of recollecting the other. The earliest specimen extant exemplifies this throughout. Lamuch, the first man who married two wives, intends on calming their apprehensions for his safety, does not say, in plain prose, "No one will be so unjust as to kill me for this trifling transgression;" but he puts his argument into verse; and by this means it has been preserved, because the memory retained it with ease and certainty; the names of the parties, once known, recall the whole when repetition is contemplated.

Adon and Zillah, hear my voice; Ye wives of Lamuch, hearken to my speech; Have I slain a man in bloody contests, a young man in violent assault? If Cain shall be avenged, Much more Lamuch seventy-seven times.

The first column, if read separately, opens the history; but the second column, by its duplication of phraseology, perfects the series of thoughts, and converts the whole into verses, and poetry. This duplication is so proper to Hebrew poetry, that a Hebrew poet would not be content to say, "Youth and beauty shall be laid in the dust;" but he would singularize these qualities; he would distinguish and repeat them: e. g.

Youth shall be laid in the dust; And beauty shall be consumed in the grave.

This is more explicit, has greater strength, as well as greater correctness; for beauty is not invariably conjoined with youth; and there is beauty proper to nature life, and even to old age. The ideas, then, are not precisely the same; yet they are so exquisitely similar, that the recollection of one brings the other to mind, instantly. Something like this we have in Isa. lv. 10. He does not say, "As the rain and the snow (plural) descend (plural) from heaven, and thither (plural) do not return;" but he keeps the entire passage in the singular, and thereby much increases its strength.

Verily, like as the rain descendeth from above, And the snow descendeth from the heavens; And thither it doth not return— So shall my word be.

The reader will observe the brevity, the compactness obtained by the poet, in this construction of his verse; to express his thoughts completely requires the insertion of the words marked in italics; yet the omission of these words occasions no confusion, no interruption, because the property of descending from the atmosphere is common both to rain and snow. To the original readers, in the Hebrew language, this was still clearer; yet in translation, similar supplements or repetitions are often necessary to a correct view of the poet's intention. So Balaam says, Micah vi. 7:

Wherever shall I come before Jehovah? Wherever shall I bow myself unto the High God? Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings? Shall I bow myself unto him with calves of a year old?

This supplementary repetition gives the sentiment at full; and in very many places of Scripture the critic must observe these elisions of words, and feel them too; though the poet may disregard them; and even deem the critic fastidious. This may be further evinced by an instance in which the supplement is taken, not from a preceding, but from a following, sentence: Samson says,

With the jaw-bone of an ass, heapes upon heapes have I smitten; With the jaw-bone of an ass, a thousand men have I smitten.

The sense of the first verse is imperfect, till the close of the second verse completes it. There, can
The subject of Hebrew poetry is too impo-the biblical student, to be passed over with meagre notice above given. Indeed, of all poetry, poetry alone was cultivated among the Hebrews, and was carried to a high degree of perfection by a nation of a people was influence of whom, whether didactic, sententious, or prophetic, is still lyric. Now the essence of lyric poetry is the vivid expression of internal emotions. It is true, subjectively; in opposition to epic poetry, which treats of external objects, and is therefore dramatic. The chief subject of Hebrew poetry was religion, then patriotism; which, under the theocratic religion, very nearly allied to religion. The most obvious characteristic of the poetry of the Hebrews is sublimity. Religious poetry is the poetry of almost peculiar to the Jews; the little that is among other ancient nations, as e.g. the Hymns, is not worthy of comparison with it.
The Koran, which is an attempted imitation poetical parts of the Old Testament.
The prevailing views of the nature of Hebrew poetry, &c., were first proposed by Lowth in his Lectures on the Poetry of the Hebrews (Lect. xviii.—xx.). He was followed by his spirit of Hebrew Poetry; sir William Je-Asiatic Poetry; and more recently by Thomas bell, in the first volumes of the New Monthly zine. Mr. Campbell, however, has drawn from Herder. (See also De Wette's Commentary on the Psalms. Einleitung.)

Hebrew poetry differs prose in three respects. (1.) In the poetical nature of the contents; of which all actories are sublimity, boldness, abruptness, and c. (2.) In the peculiarities of the dialectic or diction, which, however, are not so common as among the Greeks and Romans. They are the use of different words, significations of grammatical forms; and in syntactical peculiarities which the latter is more prominent in the former in modern languages. For the most part, the idioms of the Hebrew are the common ones kindred dialects, the Chaldee, Syriac and This circumstance goes to show the importan acquaintance with these latter. (3.) In the importing of a measure of syllables or feet, the former a poetic arrangement of words and members. The quintessence is much agitated in modern times, whether Hebrews had any measure of syllables, or p or metre. Josephus and Jerome affirm the he had; and some have thought they had discov-(See De Wette. Einl. § vii.) The best theories are those of Jones and Bellermann; but thing new appears on this general topic, in Ge at least, almost every year. It is, however, ion of those best acquainted with the subject, Hebrews had no prosody, i.e., no measure o bles. Their rhythm consisted only in the syncorrespondence of the larger members.
Rhythm may be of three species, viz. (1.)
only in the syllable, or poetic foot, as dactyls, &c., without any pauses or members. (2.) It may also exist, poetical feet or measures of syllables are neglect a certain measure of the larger members or clan.
This last is the usus ordinaria of the Hebrews; of the old German Meistersinger. (3.) The most perfect form of rhythm comprises both the and appears in Greek, Roman and modern
The rhythm of Hebrew poetry, then, consists in the parallelism of the members, (as it is called by Lowth,) of which the fundamental principle is, that every verse must consist of at least two corresponding parts or members. (See Lowth, Lect. xix. De Wette, Einl. §. viii.)

Laws of Parallelism.—The parallelism of Hebrew poetry occurs either in the thought, or solely in the form. Of the former there are three kinds, viz.:—

1. Synonymous; where the two members express the same idea in different, but closely, and often literally, corresponding words: e. g.

Ps. viii. 4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? And the son of man, that thou dost visit him?

ii. 1. Why do the heathen rage? And the people imagine a vain thing?

ii. 4. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; The Lord shall have them in derision.

Job vi. 5. Dost thou make thy horse understand by reason? Or lowest thou over thy foeder?

So also the song of Lamech, quoted above, Gen. iv. 23. and Job vii. 1, seq.

2. Antithetical; where an antithesis of thought is expressed by corresponding members: e. g.

Prov. xiv. 11. The house of the wicked shall be overthrown; But the tabernacle of the righteous shall flourish.

xv. 1. A soft answer turneth away wrath; But grievous words stir up anger.

(Compare Virgil. Ecl. iii. 8.)

3. Synthetic; which is a mere juxtaposition; or rather the thought is carried forward in the second member with some addition; the correspondence of words and construction being as before: e. g.

Ps. xix. 7. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.

8. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.

9. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever: The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.

Mere rhetorical parallelism is that in which no similarity or correspondence of thought exists; but the verse is divided by the cæsura, as it were, into corresponding members. This is the most imperfect species of parallelism; and may be compared with the hexameter, divided by the cæsura: e.g.

Ps. ii. 6. Yet have I set my king Upon my holy hill of Zion.

iii. 2. Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God.

This is most common in the book of Lamentations; where there is hardly any other species of parallelism.

Thus far we have had regard to the simplest and most perfect parallelisms of two members; such as are more usually found in the Psalms, Job, &c. But in the prophets and a few of the psalms, we find a less regular, and sometimes compound parallelism. Thus the parallelism is irregular, when one member is shorter than the other; as Hosea iv. 17:

Ephraim is joined to idols: Let him alone.

Of compound parallelisms there are various kinds; as when the verse has three members; and the two first correspond to the third: e. g.

Ps. iii. 6. O that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad.

Or when the verse has four members; of which the first and third correspond to the second and fourth: e. g.

Ps. xxxi. 10. For my life is spent with grief, And my years with sighing; My strength faileth because of mine iniquity, And my bones are consumed.

Or the verse may have four parallel members: e. g.

Ps. i. 1. Blessed is the man Who walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, Nor standeth in the way of sinners, Nor sitteth in the seat of scorner.

We may name Psalms ii. and xv. as affording examples of most of the species of poetic parallelism.

In the common manuscripts and editions of the Hebrew Bible, the members of the parallelisms in the poetical parts are not written or printed separately; but the accents serve to divide them. In the editions of Kennicott and Jahn, however, the members are printed separately. It is matter of regret, that this mode was not adopted in our English version; since the common reader has now often no means of distinguishing, whether that which he reads is Hebrew poetry, or Hebrew prose. Indeed, a good translation ought to adhere closely to the form of the original, and not give it a foreign costume. Hence the mere parallelism should be exhibited, without metre, and generally without feet.

The preceding principles refer solely to the rhythm of Hebrew poetry. Besides this, there are other peculiarities; e. g. the strophe, as in Ps. xiii. xiii.; where verses 5, 11, and 5, are a burden or refrain, repeated at the end of each strophe. So also the alphabetic psalms and poems; (see Letters;) and the psalms of degrees, in which the chief words of each verse are taken up and repeated at the beginning of the next verse. (See Degres, and Psalms.) Paronomasia, or the correspondence of like sounding words, a species of rhyme, occurs seldom in the Psalms; it seems too fitful and trivial for lyric poetry. The prophets employ it more frequently. R.

POETS. The Hebrew poets were men inspired of God; and among them we find kings, lawgivers and prophets. Moses, Barak, David, Solomon, Hesekiah, Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and most of the prophets, composed poems, or pieces in verse; the most pompous, the most majestic, and the most sublime. The expression, the sentiments, the figures, the variety, the action, every thing is surprising.

Paul gives a pagan poet the name of prophet.' (Tit.
i. 12, "One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said," etc.) because, among the heathen, poets were thought to be inspired by Apollo. They spoke by enthusiasm. Oracles were originally delivered in verse. Poets were interpreters of the will of the gods. The poet quoted by Paul is, Euphemides, whom the ancients esteemed to be inspired, and favored by the gods.
The same apostle quotes the poet Aratus, a native, as well as himself, of Cilicia: (Acts xvii. 28.) We are the children (the race) of God. This is part of a longer passage, whose import is, "We must begin from Jupiter, whom we must by no means forget. Every thing is replete with Jupiter. He fills the streets, the public places, and assemblies of men. The whole sea and its harbors are full of this god, and all of us in all places have need of Jupiter." It was certainly not to prove the being or to enhance the merit of Jupiter, that Paul quotes this passage. But he has delivered out of bondage, as we may say, a truth which this poet had uttered, without penetrating its true meaning. The apostle used it to prove the existence of the true God, to a people not convinced of the divine authority of the Scriptures, and who would have rejected such proofs as he might have derived from therein.

The son of Sirach, intent on praising eminent men, commemorates bard or poets; who were, he says, "Leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people; wise and eloquent in their instructions: such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing," Ecclus.
xliv. 4. It is evident that he considered them as of great importance to the community; and we know that they were of great antiquity, for Moses, himself a poet, refers to those who spoke in proverbs, (Numb.
xxi. 37;) of which he inserts a specimen. Jacob was a poet, as appears from his farewell benediction on his sons. And it appears to be extremely probable that the honorable appellation Nebi, equally denoted a prophet, a poet, and a musician, as the poets principally were.

Poets, like other men, could only draw comparisons from objects with which they were conversant; hence we have in Scripture many allusions to the phenomena of nature, as extant in the countries where the writers resided—storms, tempests, earthquakes, thunder and lightning. The shepherd, king describes the Lord as his shepherd, who leads him in security; not as his steersman, who brings him safely into port;
for he was little acquainted with nautical affairs.
Very few are the descriptions of the sea, or its inhabitants, in Job, although the writer ransacks earth and heaven, with wonderful science. Poets who dwelt in tents have little reference to extensive architecture.

But to understand their language, it is necessary to acquire an intimate knowledge as possible of the things they knew; and even when they treat of things spiritual or celestial; because these are signified by means of terrestrial objects or incidents; and the just understanding of one may lead to a just understanding of the other. Divine inspiration itself, however superhuman it may be, must, nevertheless, speak to men in the language of men, or the instruction it means to convey will continue a perfect blank.

POLYGAMY, see MARRIAGE.

POLYLOTT; see Bible, p. 177.
POMEGRANATE, the punica granatum of Linnaeus, called the malus granatum, that is, granate apple, (pomme grenade,) whence its name.

The tree grows wild in Palestine and Syria, as general in the south of Europe, and north of Africa.

The leaves are long, with a strong, red midrib;
and spreading branches, lancelet-formed leaving large and beautiful red blossoms. The fruit is the size of an orange, of a tawny brown, with astringent coat, containing abundance of see enveloped in a distinct, very juicy, crimson rind, which is rather acid; but in the cultivated plant, sweet and grateful. (Compare Cant. iv. 13; Numb. 3.
Deut. viii. 8.) Artificial pomagranates were made as ornaments on the robe of the high-priest (xxviii. 33;) and also as an architectural ornamental.

PONTUS, a province in Asia Minor, has

It is thought that Peter preached there, he

POOR. This word often denotes the im-h dictate, mean in their own eyes, low in the kine. Not so much a man desirous of all things of the earth, as a man sensible of his misery and insolvency, who applies for succor currency of God. In this sense the greatest am-men of the world are level with the poorest eyes of God. In Exodus xxiii. 3, Moses forbid the jud counten ance a poor man in his cause; or as

xix. 15, "Thou shalt not respect the per poor, nor honor the person of the mighty righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor, word, judge without respect of persons; in truth and justice before your eyes; consider stand in the place of God on the earth.

One of the characters of the Messiah was, the poor, (Ps. xxxii. 2, 4;) and to preach to them, Isa. xi. 4; Matt. xi. 5. Hence, Jesus disciples that were poor, and the greater pain believers were really poor men, as we in their history.

Solomon says, (Prov. xxiii. 2;) The rich meet together; they are like each other—thing—God created them both; and both rich poverty are of his beholding. Hence the rich not be supercilious, nor the poor despise the rich. Prov. xxix. 13, (vii. 6;) reproaches the Israelites with having poor for a contemptible prize; as for shoes dals. Probably the rich actually thus sold their debtors, for things of no value. James (ii.
11) carries the obligation of not respecting perso as to allow no mark of distinction to pass over it or in civil dignities, in the public assemblies.

But this ought to be understood of an preference, and of the sentiments of the hear than of external marks of respect. It is neve ed a Christian to prefer a rich man before man, only because he is rich, and to think him, to judge him more worthy of esteem a sideration, rather than he who has not the sa vantages of the goods of fortune.

Poverty was a great point of distinction among the Jews as a people, and a punishment from God. Job speaks of a prison, and a state of bondage, chap. xxxvi.
Isaiah (xlvi. 10,) compares it to a furnace ou able, wherein metal are purified. God tried state of his people, and improved them; they looked at nant; they knew the value of suffering, of tron, of insolence; they knew how to make use of them, and to convert them to their greatest advantage. They were poor in spirit, in the disposition of their hearts, before God made them suffer and die.

Nothing is more earnestly recommended in Scripture than alms and compassion to the poor. Moses would have them admitted to the religious feasts celebrated in the temple, Deut. xvi. 11, 12. He ordered, that in the fields, in the vineyards, and upon the trees, something should be left for them; (Lev. xix. 10; xxiii. 22.) that in the sabbatical years, and the years of jubilee, all should be left for the poor, the widow, and the orphan, Exod. xxiii. 11. He commanded to lend to the poor, and observed, that they should never be wanting in the country, but that the people should always have opportunity to bestow their alms, Deut. xv. 8, 9. That if any pledge were taken from the poor, the lender shall not enter the house to take it by force, (Deut. xxiv. 12, 14.) and that if the poor be forced to give his goods or his clothes, they shall be restored to him at night, that he may have wherewith to cover himself. Our Saviour has carried this point of the law, concerning almsgiving, to its perfection; he practised it himself; recommended it to his disciples, and has inspired his servants with the tenderest charity towards the poor. He advised those who would in earnest become his disciples, to sell all they had, and give to the poor, Matt. xix. 21. He gives excellent rules for preserving charity and avoiding vain-glory and ostentation, which otherwise may occasion our losing all the fruits of our charity, Matt. vi. 1—4.

POTIPHAR, an officer of the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, (Gen. xxxvii. 36.) general of his troops, according to the Vulgate; but chief of his executioners or body-guards, according to the Hebrew. Potiphar bought Joseph as a slave from the Midianites, who had taken him of his brethren; and seeing all things prosper in his hands, he gave him the superintendence of his whole property. His wife, however, taking an unlawful liking to Joseph, solicited him to the crime of adultery; and, Joseph repulsing her, her love changed into hatred, and she accused him to her husband, who put Joseph into prison; where his delegate, who had charge of the prisoners, transferred this care to Joseph. See JOSEPH.

POTTER, a maker of earthen vessels, of which there is frequent mention made in Scripture. Jeremiah (xviii. 3) represents him while at work, as sitting on two stones; and Ecclesiasticus (xxxviii. 29, 30) says, "So doth the potter sitting at his work, and turning the wheel with about his feet; who is always carefully set at his work, and maketh all his work by number; he fashioneth the clay with his arm, and boweth down his strength before his feet." When God would show his dominion over men, and his irresistible power over their hearts, he has recourse to the similitude of a potter, who makes what he pleases of his clay; of this a vessel of honor, of that a vessel of dishonor: now forming it, then breaking it; now preserving it, and then rejecting it. (See Ps. ii. 9; Ecclus. xxxiii. 13; Rom. ix. 21; Jer. xviii. 2, 3, &c.)

POTTER'S-FIELD, a piece of ground that was bought with the money for which Judah sold our Saviour Christ, but which he brought back again to the temple. (See ACRUSA.) It is south of mount Sion, about a stone's cast from the pool of Siloam, and is surrounded by walls, in length seventy cubits, in breadth fifty; and is covered with a vault, with seven openings above, to let down the bodies which are to be there buried. We read in the Mishna (Tract. de Sanhedr. cap. vi. n. 14, 15.) that they did not allow malefactors, or such as were executed for crimes, to be buried in the tombs of their fathers, except their flesh had first been consumed in other places, appointed for the punishment of such offenders. For this reason, perhaps, Joseph of Arimathea begged the body of Jesus from Pilate that he might deposit it in a private sepulchre, before it could be taken to this public burying-place where he might have been undistinguished from common criminals.

POVERTY has been sanctified by Christ in his own person, and in that of his parents; in that of his apostles, and of the most perfect of his disciples. Agur besought the Lord to give him neither poverty nor riches, (Prov. xxx. 5.) looking on each extreme as a dangerous rock to virtue. See POOR.

POWER, the ability of performing a thing. It is in a sovereign degree an attribute of Deity. God is all-powerful. It means sometimes a right, privilege, or dignity; (John i. 19.) sometimes absolute authority; (Matt. ix. 6.) sometimes the exertion, or act of power, as of the Holy Spirit, (Eph. i. 19.) of angels, or of human governments, magistrates, &c. (Rom. xiii. 1.) and perhaps it generally includes the idea of dignity, superiority. So the body is sown in weakness, but raised in power, dignity, honor. (For the word power in 1 Cor. xi. 10, see the article VEIL.)

PRAISE is one of the noblest acts of worship, and one which seems to be a direct, simple, unsophisticated dictate of nature; insomuch that it is wonderful how any possessed of rational powers can omit this delightful duty. If prayer, to which praise is the counterpart, can be neglected; if a sense of wants, necessities, transgressions and dangers, may not be sufficiently strong to excite prayer, yet it is only very ungrateful not to notice the benefits we have enjoyed or are enjoying. What we are in the actual possession of, ought at least so far to affect us, as to render us grateful to that hand which bestows them, that hand which might bestow far different distributions to us. What character is so odious among men as that of the ungrateful? What so common in respect to God? Those who deny the being of God may, to be sure, withhold thanks for mercies received; but that any who acknowledge the attributes should be thus insensible, is most astonishing!

PRAYER, directed to God, is the ordinary conveyance of graces received from him. The prayers of a just man are of great power, Jam. v. 16, 17. The saints under both covenants prayed; Jesus Christ himself, our great example, taught us to pray, to show that thereby we honor God, and draw on ourselves his favors and graces. Paul, in most of his Epistles, entreats the faithful to pray for him; or offers to God his prayers for them.

From the promulgation of the law, the Hebrews did not intermit public prayer in the tabernacle, or in the temple, as opportunity returned. It consisted in offering the evening and morning sacrifices, every day, accompanied by prayers by the priests and Levites in that holy edifice. Every day they offered sacrifices, incense, offerings, and first-fruits; they performed ceremonies for the redemption of the first-born, or the purification of pollutions; in a word, the Jews had a large part to discharge their vows, and to satisfy their devotions, not only on great and solemn days, but also on ordinary days; but nothing of this was performed without prayer.

The psalmist (cxxx. 1) says, he prayed to God, and praised him, seven times a day. And (Ps. Iv.) "Blessing, and morning, and noon, will I pray and cry aloud, and he shall hear my voice." Daniel (vi. 10) fasted his knees three times a day, and wor-served the Lord, opening his windows, and turning himself toward Jerusalem. The Levites, appointed to guard the temple, lifted up their hands in the night-time, and encouraged one another to adore the Lord, Ps. xxxivv. 3. The psalmist says, (Ps. cxxix. 2.) that he arose in the middle of the night, to praise the Lord, and Nehemiah (ix. 3.) mentions four hours of prayer on a fast-day.

During the captivity, Ezra, observing that several Jews mingled foreign terms with their prayers, which were not suitable to the sanctity of that exercise, composed eighteen benedictions, which every Jewish is obliged to learn, and to repeat daily. A little before the destruction of the temple, the rabbi Gama-Mal added a nineth, against apostasies and here-rods, which he pronounced, and which is still read, and observed by the Christians. Ezra also fixed the time for prayer, according to Maimonides.

In the Jewish prayers we observe, in general, their length, and their bitturgy, or tedious repetitions, which Christ reproved them for (Matt. vi. 7.) "When ye pray, use not vain repetitions as the heathen do; for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking." Secondly, as to their posture. They gen-ernally pray sitting, or stooping with their faces toward the ground. They stretch out their feet and their hands, and make a loud cry. Christ prayed thus in the garden of Olives: "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears," Heb. v. 7. Thirdly, they think that prayers supply the place of sacrifices, which ceased at the destruction of the temple and its altars; they give them the same name, and impute to them the same efficacy.

It is very likely that the prayers of the first Christians were formed on the model of those of the Jews. In the Lord's prayer, our Saviour principally intentended to oppose its brevity to their bitturgy. Paul (Ephes. vi. 18; 1 Thess. v. 17; 1 Tim. ii. 8.) directs that believers should pray in all places, and at all times, with every part of their bodies, towards heaven, and blessing God for all things, whether in eating, drinking, or any other action; and that every thing be done to the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31. In a word, our Saviour has recommended to us to pray with-out ceasing. (Lukes xivv. 1; xx. 36.)

PREDESTINATION. To PREDESTINATE, sometimes signifies merely a designation, or appointment of a particular thing to a particular use; or of a certain person to a certain office or employment. But, in theological language, predestination expresses the design formed by God, from all eternity, of bringing by his grace certain persons to faith and salvation, while he leaves others to their infidelity.

Divines agree, that predestination to salvation is of mere favor, but opinions are divided concerning it. Some regard it as merely gratuitous; others believe that God formed his predestination on a view of future merits in the elect. Austin, and the most celebrated schools of the Latin church, hold predestina-tion to be of mere favor. Some Greek fathers, and some Latin divines, adhere to predestination founded on foreknowledge. Augustin says, predestination is a foreknowledge and preparation of efficacious means, in virtue of which, the elect are most certainly saved; and he was fully persuaded of the gratuitousness of predestination. It is uttermost extreme, if we consider it, as is evident, from the very nature of predestination.

The ancient Hebrews were persuaded, as well as we are, that God had foreknowledge of what every person should be, do, and become. This is included in the very notion of God, his providence, and his infinite knowledge. God says to Jeremiah, (i. 5.) "Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations." But when we endeavor to form a just idea of their system of predestination, and how they reconciled grace and free-will, the attempt is not very easy. The author of the book of Wisdom, whom several have thought to be Philo, make Solomon thus speak: (chap. viii. 19, 30.) "I was a witty child, and had a good spirit; yea, rather, being god, I came into a body unformed." The apostles (John ix. 2.) proposed a question to Christ, when they saw a man born blind, whether his condition was as a punishment for his own sins, or for those of his parents. They therefore had a notion, that his soul had a previous existence, and had offended God, before it animated the present body.

Chrysostom, who may be considered as the oracle and mouth of the Greek church, maintained that God did not reject nor predestinate men on account of their past good or bad actions, or on foreknowledge of their future merits or demerits: "Whence it is (says he, on Rom. ix. 13.) that Jacob is beloved, and Esau hated? It is because one is good, and the other is bad. And whence is it, that, before their birth, God determined that the elder should be in subjection to the younger? It is because God has no need to stay for the event of things, as we must do, to judge whether a man shall be good or bad; he sees that even before he is born. It was by the effect of his predestination, that he chose Jacob and rejected Esau. He knew before their birth what they would one day prove. When he chose Matthew, there were several persons who ap-ppeared better than he; but by his infinite penetration, he knew how to discover the value of that jewel, that then lay upon a dunghill." In another place (Homil. lxxx. in Matt. xxv.) he says, that the kingdom of heaven was prepared for the elect from the beginning of the world. And he says, again, (Rom. viii. 29) because God foreknew what they would be. And writing on those words of the psalmist, (cxxxiv. 2.) "Thou understandest my thought afar off," he thus reasons: Some people are absurd enough to say, each creature is in one is a good man, because God has created him and loved him; and such another is wicked, because God hated him. But the prophet here tells us, on the contrary, that God proves us by our works. He knows whether we will be virtuous or no, even before our birth; and by that he gives us proofs of his prescience: he confirms it by our works, for fear it should be imagined, that his prescience was the cause of our virtue.

The Greek fathers, after Chrysostom, have expressed themselves much in the same manner, as the modern Greeks have followed the sentiments of the fathers before them.

This, however, is a very difficult subject. We may certainly conclude, that when God proposes as end, he also proposes the means; when he appoints an effect, he also appoints the causes. Now where is the essential difference, if we say, God foresees the elect would be holy, therefore chose them; or God chose the elect, to make them holy? because since their holiness is not from themselves, but from him, he must determine to bestow on them that which they cannot bestow on themselves. This is the order in which he determined to make A. B. holy, purposing his holiness, or determined to make A. B. holy, purposing his election. But observe, that God's determination to render A. B. holy is, in fact, an election of him; an election which implies salvation; and since this principle places an election of the party previous to its effects, it seems to be much more reasonable than contingency in any shape. Especially, considering that all things are known to God, from the beginning to the end, so that he has no need to stay till a certain event has taken place before he can adjust the following event, but in his divine, infinite and intimate foreknowledge of things, that which is to follow is equally present with him, as that which is to precede. And, doubtless, we had better on this subject not only think and speak with the most profound reverence, feeling our ignorance, and our scanty powers; but endeavor to persuade ourselves thoroughly of the infinite goodness, wisdom and love of God; and bind ourselves to submit heartily to these attributes, and their operations, rather than to perplex ourselves, and to render ourselves unhappy, about appointments whose concatenation and universal influence are infinitely beyond our ken. If we see one single link in the chain of the divine government, considered as compounded of cause and effect, what proportion does this bear to that infinitely prolonged combination of things, of which the divine mind only is capable of surveying at once both the extremes, and, together with the extremes, every connecting link, every acting cause, and every produced effect, from the most trivial, as we call it, to the most considerable, in our estimation! We say, in our estimation, because there is no lesser and greater in the sight of God; but each, being appointed by him, is of equal consequence in his appointment, and is equally valued by his infinite wisdom.

PRESS. This word is often used in Scripture not only for the machine by which grapes are squeezed, but also for the vessel, or vat, into which the wine runs from the press; in which it is received and preserved. Whence proceed these expressions: he digged a wine-press in his vineyard;—your presses shall run over with wine; thy press shall burst out with the issue of the grapes. Zech they slew at the wine-press of Zech. It was a kind of subterraneous cistern, in which the wine was received and kept, till it was put into jars or vessels, of earth or wood.

We read in several titles of the Psalms, as viii. lxxxi. lxxxiv. "for the presses," (on Gittith, Eng. tr.) which is differently explained. Some think that these Psalms are songs of rejoicing for the vintage, and were chiefly sung at the Feast of Tabernacles, after the harvest and the vintage. Others suppose, that gittith signifies an instrument of music, invented or used, perhaps, at Gath, and hence called Gittith. See the article Gittith.

PRETORIUM, a name given in the Gospels to the house in which dwelt the Roman governor of Jerusalem, Mark xv. 16. (Compare Matt. xxvii. 27; John xviii. 28, 33.) Here he sat in his judicial capacity, and here Jesus was brought before him. This was properly the palace of Herod at Jerusalem, near the tower of Antonia, with which it had communication. He, therefore, received residing in it whenever they visited Jerusalem; their head-quarters being properly at Cæsarea. The pretorium or palace of Herod (Engl. tr. judgment hall) at Cæsarea is also mentioned, Acts xxiii. 35. (See Joseph Antiq. xvi. 3. 3. also.) This was the pretorium (or palace) at Rome, in which he gave testimony to Christ, Phil. i. 13. Some think, that by this he means the palace of the emperor Nero; and others, that he means the place where the Roman pretor sat to administer justice, that is, his tribunal. It is certain that the emperor's palace did not bear the name of tribunal; but Paul, being accustomed to call by this name the governor's palace at Jerusalem, might give it to the emperor's at Rome. Others have maintained, with greater probability, that under the name of the pretorium at Rome, Paul would express the camp of the pretorian soldiers, whither he might have been carried by the soldier that always accompanied him, and who was fastened to him by a chain, as the manner was among the Romans.

PRICKS. The Greek word στυπαλίσσιον signifies properly a stimulus, a good, with which oxen were driven from behind. Hence the proverbial expression, πρός στυπάλισσιον κατακτεῖν, to kick against the good, applied to those who resist or offer resistance to one who is more powerful than themselves, and thus expose themselves to severe retribution, Acts ix. 5; xxvi. 14. The expression is common to the Greeks, Romans and Hebrews, e. g. Findar, Fyth. ii. 193. Eschyl. Agam. 1635. Eurip. Bacch. 781. Terent. Phormio i. 2. 27. Ammian. Marcell. xviii. 5. (See Kuinoel on Acts ix. 5.) *R.

PRIDE is a sin very odious to God and man, and Scripture condemns it in a multitude of places. What, indeed, is displayed in the whole sacred history but the pride, presumption and vanity of men overthrown? What else, but the humility, the meekness, the acknowledgment of human weakness, exalted, supported and recompensed. "God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble." A man's pride shall bring him low; but honor shall uphold the humble in spirit. Pride goeth before destruction; and a haughty spirit before a fall. Better is it to be of a humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the proud.

"Pride" is also put for the hardness and insolence of a sinner, in opposition to sins of infirmity or ignorance: "But the soul that doeth aught presumptuously, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off. (Pro. xix. 30. And Deut. xvii. 12.) And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest, or unto the judge, even that man shall die." The Lord treated the Egyptians with rigor, because they acted with pride and insolence toward the Hebrews, Exod. xviii. 11. Job and the psalmist have distinguished Pharaoh by the name of the proud, (Job xxvi. 12; Ps. lxxxix. 10 and Isaiah lii. 6) uses the same expression, to mark his destruction. Ezekiel says (xxii. 12.) the Chaldeans shall destroy the pride, the insolence, the cruelty of Egypt. (See Neh. ix. 16, 29.) Scripture reproaches the Moabites with their pride; and points them out under the name of children of haughtiness, or pride; for so we translate Numb. xxvi. 17. "He shall destroy all the children of pride," (Eng. Salkh.) or haughtiness; which is confirmed by Jer. xlvii. 29. "We have heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud,) his loftiness and his arrogance, and his pride and the haughtiness of his heart." (Comp. Numb. xxvi. 36; with Jer. xlviii. 45. Heb. Also Is. lvi. 6.)

The pride of Joseph expresses the inaudations of that river, Jer. xii. 5; xiii. 9; xix. 19; Deut. xvi. 24. See JORDAN.

The pride and the proud often reap what they sow. And the Babylonians; Isa. xiii. 19. And they are actuated by evil purposes, which are beyond the ken of even their own princes. The Babylonians are spoken of, Jer.iii. 10; Lam. iv. 8; Hab. ii. 8; Zeph. ii. 10; Joel iii. 9; Prov. xxvii. 12; Jer. ii. 19; and the city of Jerusalem is spoken of in connection with it in Zeph. ii. 9; Jer. vii. 7.

Babylon. Babylon, the seat of the king of Babylon, speaks, and says, Behold, I am against thee, O thou most proud, saith the Lord. The day is come, the time that I will visit thee. And the most proud shall stumble and fall, and none shall raise him up; and I will kindle a fire in his cities, and it shall devour all round about him. (See Ps. cxix. 21, 51, 63, 78, 85, 122.)

PRIEST, from the Greek, Probyteros, properly signifies an elder, or old man. The Hebrew word signifies a priest. In the Old Testament, the priesthood was annexed to a certain family, till after the promulgation of the law by Moses. Before that time, each family had its own priests, whose duties were to manifest the presence of God to the people. When Israel was in Egypt, Moses performed the office of mediator, and young men were chosen from among the Israelites to perform the office of priests, Exod. xxi. 5, 6. But after the Lord had chosen the tribe of Levi to serve him in his tabernacle, and the priesthood annexed to the family of Aaron, then the right of offering sacrifice to God was reserved to the priests of this family, Num. xvi. 40.

The punishment of Uzziah, king of Judah, (2 Chron. xxvi. 16.) was well known, who, having presumed to offer incense to the Lord, was suddenly smitten with leprosy. However, it seems that on certain occasions the judges and kings of the Hebrews offered sacrifice to the Lord, especially before a constant place of worship was fixed at Jerusalem. See 1 Sam. vii. 9, where Samuel, who was no priest, offered a lamb for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. See also chap. ix. 13, where it is said, that this prophet was to bless the offering of the people; which should seem to be a function appropriate to a priest. Lastly, 1 Sam. xxvii. 9, where David, in building the temple, offered incense, and caused there to be offered a sacrifice at the anointing of David.

Saul himself offered a burnt-offering to the Lord, perhaps as being king of Israel, 1 Sam. xiii. 9, 10. Elijah also offered a burnt-offering on mount Carmel, 1 Kings xviii. 39. He also offers the ark to the Lord, in the presence of the men of Shechem, and of the Philistines. He also offers sacrifices, 2 Chron. i. 6. We know that such passages are commonly explained, by supposing that these princes offered their sacrifices by the hands of the priests; but the text by no means favors such explication; and it is very natural to imagine, that in the quality of kings and heads of the people, they had the privilege of performing some sacred functions on certain extraordinary occasions. So we see David consulted the Lord, by the priestly ephod; and on another occasion he gave a solemn benediction to the people. His son Solomon did the same, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9; xxxvii. 7; 2 Sam. vi. 14, 18; 1 Kings viii. 55, 56.

Levi for the service of his tabernacle, Numb. 38, 43. Thus the whole tribe of Levi was appointed a sacred ministry, but not all in the same manner. The three sons of Levi, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, the heads of three great families, are here mentioned. Kohath and his family was appointed to the service of the tabernacle, and to exercise the function of the priesthood. All the rest of the family of Kohath, even the children of Moses, and the Levites, remained among the Levites.

sacrificed in the temple, of which certain parts were appropriated to them. In the peace-offerings they had the shoulder and the breast; (Lev. vii. 33, 34.) in the sin-offerings they burnt on the altar the fat that covers the bowels, the liver and the kidneys; the rest belonged to themselves, Lev. vii. 6, 10. The skin or fleece of every sacrifice also belonged to them; and this alone was no mean allowance. When an Israelite killed any animal for his own use, he was to give the priest the shoulder, the stomach and the jaws, Deut. xviii. 3. He had also a share of the wool when sheep were shorn, Deut. xviii. 4. All the first-born, both of man and beast, belonged to the Lord, that is, to his priests. The men were redeemed for five shekels, Numb. xviii. 13, 15. The first-born of impure animals were redeemed or exchanged, but were sacrificed to the Lord, their blood being sprinkled about the altar; the rest belonged to the priest. The first-fruits of trees, that is, those of the fourth year, belonged also to the priests, Numb. xvi. 15, Lev. xix. 23, 24.

The people offered at the temple the first-fruits of the earth; the quantity being fixed by custom to between the fortieth and sixtieth part. They offered also whatever any one had vowed to the Lord. They gave also to the priests and Levites an allowance out of their kneaded dough. They also had the tithe of the fruits of the land, and of all animals which passed under the shepherd's crook, Lev. xxvii. 31, 32. When the Levites had collected all the tithes and all the first-fruits, they set apart the tithe of this for the priests, Numb. xxvii. 28. Thus, though the priests had no lands or inheritances, they lived in great plenty. God also provided them houses and accommodations, by appointing forty-eight cities for their residence, Numb. xxxv. 1—7. In the precincts of these cities they possessed a thousand cubicits beyond the walls. Of these forty-eight cities, six were appointed as cities of refuge, for those who had committed casual and involuntary manslaughter. The priests had thirteen of these cities: the others belonged to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 10.

A principal employment of the priests, next to attending on the sacrifices and the temple service, was the instruction of the people, and the deciding of controversies in general. The priests were the umpires in all cases of leprosy, divorce causes, the waters of jealousy, vows, causes relating to the law and uncleannesses, &c. For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord. (Mal. ii. 7.) They publicly blessed the people in the name of the Lord. In time of war their duty was to carry the ark of the covenant, to consult the Lord, to sound the holy trumpets, and to encourage the army, Numb. x. 9, 10; Deut. xx. 2.

The consecration of Aaron and of his sons was performed by Moses in the desert with great solemnity, he performing the office of consecrating priest, Exod. xii. 12; Lev. viii. It is doubtful whether at every new consecration of a high-priest all these ceremonies were repeated. It is probable they contented themselves with clothing the new high-priest in the habit of his predecessor, as at the death of Aaron, Numb. xx. 25, 36. Yet some think they gave himunction also, which might be the Babylonian captivity, though there is no proof of the fact. We know, that after this, Jonathan the Asmonæan contented himself with putting on the high-priest's habit at the Feast of Tabernacles, in order to take possession of this dignity, 1 Mac. x. 21. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 5.)

As to the ordinary priests, we know not of any particular ceremony used at their consecration. They were admitted to the exercise of their function by filling their hands, as Scripture speaks; that is, by making them perform the offices of their order. It is not clear whether the Levites were required to make a public profession of their intention. In the case of the sons of Achan, Joshua, Numb. xiv. 25, 35, they were, perhaps, required to make such a profession.

The Levites, when they performed their office in the tabernacle, were clad in the fine linen vestments, Exod. xxviii. 29, 36. They had only coarse linen for ordinary use, Lev. xi. 41. They were subject to the same laws of uncleanness. Their children were put under the same restrictions as their parents. A leper could not enter the tabernacle, Lev. xiv. 28. When the Levites were consecrated as priests they were anointed with oil, Lev. x. 10. They were to make use of the best oil, without adding any other oil, Lev. vi. 26. They were also to wash, Lev. xi. 11. This was the only part of their dress mentioned in the books of the Old Testament. We learn from 2 Chron. xxiv. 3, 14; xxv. 3; xxvi. 11, that the Levites were in the habit of wearing girdles. The Hebrews, however, appear to have been chiefly distinguished by their hair and beard, as with respect to their dress, the Levites and the other tribes were similar. (See Lev. xvi. 4.)

The Hebrew priesthood passed from the family of Ithamar into that of Eleazar, and was thus divided into two branches. (See Exod. xvi. 25.) The family of Eleazar possessed it long. This high-priest was succeeded by his third son Ahitub, or, according to others, Ahiah, to whom succeeded Ahimelech, slain by Saul, with the other priests at Nob. Saul then gave the high-priesthood to Zadok. But Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, having adhered to the interests of David, was continued in possession of the high-priesthood in the kingdom of Judah. So that for a good part of David's reign the high-priesthood was exercised by two high-priests, Zadok and Abiathar; Zadok of the family of Eleazar; Abiathar of the family of Ithamar. Towards the end of David's reign, Abiathar having adhered to the party of Adonijah against Solomon, he was disgraced and, Zadoc alone was acknowledged as high-priest. He then began to exercise his high-priesthood at Jerusalem, having before only performed the functions of it in the temple of his father at Gibon, 1 Kings ii. 26, 27; 1 Chron. xvi. 39.

The Hebrew word cohen, which signifies priest, is sometimes used as a general term, in contradistinction to Exod. ii. 16, it is said that Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was priest (cohen) of Midian; that is, according to some, prince, or governor, of his city. In 2 Sam. viii. 18, it is said, the sons of David were priests, (cohenim,) that is, scribes, in the presence of the country as priests. The Septuagint say, they were Aroguyu, principal courtiers; chief of the court. The author of the first book of Chronicles (xviii. 17.) explains this, by saying, they were the nearest at the king's hand. They had the chief employments at court.

The Christian priesthood is the substance and truth, of which that of the Jews was but a shadow and figure. Christ, the everlasting priest, according to the order of Melchisedec, abides for ever, as Paul observes; whereas the priests, according to the order of Aaron, were mortal, and therefore could not continue long. Heb. vii. 23. &c. The Lord, to express the Hebrews what great favors he would confer on them, says he would make them kings and priests, Exod. xix. 6. And Peter repeats this promise to Christians, or rather he tells them, that they are in truth what Moses promised to Israel, 1 Pet. ii. 9. (See also Rev. i. 6.) A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF THE HIGH-PRIESTS OF THE HEBREWS.

1. Aaron, brother of Moses, created high-priest, A. M. 3514, died 3559, ante A. D. 1439.
2. Eleazar, A. M. 3569, died about 3571, ante A. D. 1439.
3. Phinehas, about A. M. 3571, died about 3593, ante A. D. 1414.
4. Abinadab, or Abiah, under the Judges.
5. Abiah.
6. Uzziah.
7. Eli, of the race of Eleazar, created in A. M. 3565, died in 3585, ante A. D. 1116.
8. Ahitub I.
9. Abiathar. He lived in A. M. 3511, or 3512.
10. Abimelech, or Abiathar, slain by Saul in A. M. 3544, ante A. D. 1060.
11. Ahiah, Abimelech, or Abibash, under David, from A. M. 3544, to 3559, ante A. D. 1015.
17. Amariah, perhaps Azariah, under Uzziiah, in A. M. 3221, ante A. D. 783.
20. Uriah, under Ahaz; he lived in A. M. 3365, ante A. D. 739.
22. Azariah, in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxxi. 10, about A. M. 3278, ante A. D. 736.
23. Hilkiah, under Hezekiah.
24. Eliakim, or Josiah, under Manasseh, and at the time of the siege of Bethulia, A. M. 3348. He lived under Josiah to 3360, and longer. Called Hilkiah. (Psalm 70.)
25. Azariah, perhaps Neriah, father of Seraiah and of Baruch.
26. Seraiah, the last high-priest before the captivity of Babylon, put to death A. M. 3414, ante A. D. 590.
27. Hilkiah, during the captivity from A. M. 3414 to 3449, ante A. D. 535.
28. Joshua, or Jesus, the son of Jehozadak; returned from Babylon, A. M. 3468 ante A. D. 536.
CONTINUATION, COLLECTED FROM EZRA, NEHEMIAH AND JOSEPHUS.

29. Joachim, under the reign of Xerxes, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 5.
30. Onias I, son of Onias, or Chasid, under Nehemiah, in A. M. 3550, ante A. D. 454.
31. Joidas, or Judas, Neh. xii. 10.
32. Jonathan, or John.
33. Jebedos, or Jaddus, who received Alexander the Great at Jerusalem, in A. M. 3792; died in 3932, ante A. D. 322.
34. Onias I, made high-priest in A. M. 3681, governed 21 years; died in 3702, ante A. D. 302.
35. Simon I, called the Just, in A. M. 3702, or 3703; died in 3711, ante A. D. 293.
36. Eleazar, in A. M. 3712. Under this pontiff, they tell us, the translation of the LXX was made, about A. M. 3727; died in 3744, ante A. D. 289.
37. Ananias, in A. M. 3745; died in 3771, ante A. D. 333.
38. Onias II, in A. M. 3771; died in 3785, ante A. D. 319.
40. Onias III, in A. M. 3805; died in 3829, ante A. D. 170.
41. Jesus, or Jason, in A. M. 3830; died in 3831, ante A. D. 173.
42. Onias IV, or otherwise Menelaus, in A. M. 3892; died in 3843, ante A. D. 162.
43. Lysimachus, vicegerent to Menelaus, killed in A. M. 3894, ante A. D. 170.
44. Alcimus, or Jacobus, or Joseph, in A. M. 3842; died in 3844, ante A. D. 160.
45. Onias V, not at Jerusalem; but he retired into Egypt, where he built the temple Onicon, in A. M. 3854, ante A. D. 150.
46. Judas Maccabeus, restored the altar and the sacrifices, in A. M. 3840; died in 3843, ante A. D. 161.
47. Jonathan the Athenorean, brother to Judas Maccabeus, created high-priest in A. M. 3843; died in 3860, ante A. D. 144.
48. Simon Maccabeus, made in A. M. 3860; died in 3869, ante A. D. 135.
49. John Hircanus, made in A. M. 3893; died in 3938, ante A. D. 105.
51. Alexander Janneus, king and pontiff 27 years, from A. M. 3899 to 3926, ante A. D. 78.
52. Hircanus, high-priest 39 years in all, from A. M. 3869 to 3908, ante A. D. 46.
53. Aristobulus, brother to Hircanus, usurped the high-priesthood; three years and three months, from A. M. 3935 to 3940, ante A. D. 64.
54. Antigonus, his son, also usurped the priesthood, in preference to the rights of Hircanus; possessed it for three years and seven months, from A. M. 3904 to 3907, when he was taken by Sosius, ante A. D. 7.
55. Ananeel of Babylon, made high-priest by Herod in 3963, till 3970, ante A. D. 54.

PRIESTHOOD. We may distinguish four kinds of priesthood. (1.) That of kings, princes, heads of families, and the first-born. This may be called a natural priesthood, but that, by nature and reason, teach us, that the honor of offering sacrifices to God should belong to the most mature in understanding, and the greatest in dignity. (2.) The priesthood, according to the order of Melchisedec, which does not differ from that now mentioned, but in its dignity; because Melchisedec was raised up of God to represent the commandments of God, is to transgress and violate them, Ps. lxxxix. 31. To profane the covenant, or promises sworn to by an oath, is to frustrate them, or not perform them, Ps. lxxxix. 34.

PROP. A declaration, or assurance of some future good. The word is, in the New Testament, usually taken for the promises made by God to Abraham and the patriarchs, to send them the Messiah. In this sense Paul commonly uses it, Gal. iii. 16; Rom. iv. 13, &c. passim. In Acts vii. 17, the time of the promise, is the time of the coming of the Messiah. In the children of the promise are, first, the Israelites descended from Isaac, in opposition to the Ishmaelites descended from Ishmael and Hagar; (Rom. ix. 8, Gal. iv. 29; 2ndly, the Jews converted to Christianity, in opposition to the unbelieving Jews. Christians enjoy the promises made to the patriarchs, from which the unbelieving Jews have fallen. The Holy Spirit of promise, which Christians have received, (Eph. i. 13,) is that which God has promised to those who believe, and which is the pledge of their everlasting happiness. The first commandment with promise. (Eph. vi. 2,) is, "Honor thy father and thy mother," to which God has subjoined this promise. "Their days shall be multiplied on the earth." The promises, in general, denote eternal life, which is the object of a Christian's hope, Heb. xi. 13. The ancient patriarchs were heirs of the promises by their faith and their patience, Heb. vii. 12. All the promises of God are accomplished and fulfilled in Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. i. 20.

The word promise is sometimes taken in our English version for the thing promised, as well as for the terms in which the engagement to confer a favor is made. (Heb. vi. 3.) Not appearing to have died in faith, "not having received the promises," whereas they certainly had received the promises, but not the things promised; and this is the more unfortunate, in this place, as we read immediately afterwards, the Abrahams and them "promises," that is, the birth of his son and heir, Isaac.

Promises always refer to future good; and in this they differ from threatenings, which always refer to evil: they differ also, insomuch as threatenings may be alleviated; but promises must be fulfilled. No man would claim the execution of threatenings; but a promise gives a right of claim to the party to be benefited. The fulfilment of promises may be delayed, as that which assured Abraham of posterity: they may be executed by means not apparent at the time. Man should be extremely cautious in making promises, lest he may fail in power to accomplish them; not so God, who has all power, at all times, and cannot be taken unprepared.

PROOF. Trial, temptation. God proved the Israelites to see if they would walk in his ways, Exod. xx. 20. After he had proved them and afflicted them, he had pity on them, Deut. viii. 16. As gold and silver are tried in the furnace, so God proves the heart, Prov. xvii. 3.

PROP. The foretelling of such events as could be known only to God. It is beyond dispute that there is a Power which governs the world; which raises one family to the throne, and one nation to the supremacy; and then, when this has answered the purposes for which it was exalted, transfers the scenes of rule to a stranger, and produces, from obscurity into reputation and splendor, another person, or another people; maintains this also, during its appointed time, and when that time is expired, suffers it gradually to decay; or directs a new ambition to rise from its ashes, and its palmed head, the ensigns of royalty, and the tokens of dignity.

It is said, "Kingdoms rise and fall by accidents," and it is asked, "If no superior power interfered, would not their changes be just the same?" It is sufficient for us, without inquiring what might be, to answer, by what is; and this subject deserves attention. We have seen infidel writers criticize books they had not read, (or had read years ago, and so criticized by memory; or had read them so superficially, as scarcely amounts to a reading,) and then retail unfounded observations and dogmatical remarks on what they should (by way of answer) be entertained first to understand.

We maintain, that if we find certain events predicted, long before they happened; if they be so clearly described, that when completed, the description determinately applies to the subject; if they be related by persons totally unconnected, and subsequent events, and expecting to be removed from the stage of life long before they take place, then we demonstrate that some power superior to humanity has been pleased to impart so much of its designs, and counsels, as are referred to in inspired predictions.

And where is the unfitness of this? May not a king, if he please, acquaint a person with his intention, that after such an one has been governor of a province for so many years, he designs to send such another to be governor after him? or that after A has held such an office during his appointed time, B shall succeed him? If this be nothing startling, or uncommon, in human concerns, let us see how this simple idea applies to the divine government of the world. One clear instance may justify this statement; and this instance we select from the prophet Daniel, because its coincidence with history is unquestionable; but other subjects are capable of the same enumerative demonstration: we say demonstration; for who, by the power of mere human faculties, could foresee such contingencies?

INSTANCE OF PROPHECY COMPARED WITH HISTORY:

THE CHIEF INCIDENTS ONLY BEING SELECTED, AND NUMBERED.

Prophecy of Four Kingdoms, represented by Four Beasts.

The First Beast.

1. A lion,
2. having eagle's wings;
3. the wings were plucked.

Corresponding Events, in their Historical Order.

AUSTRIAN EMPIRE.

1. The Babylonian empire;
2. Nineveh, &c. added to it—but
3. Nineveh was almost destroyed at the fall of Sardanapalus; have prophetic dreams. Peter (Acts x. 11, 12) fell into an ecstasy at noon-day, and had a revelation importing the call of the Gentiles. The Lord appeared to Abraham, to Job, and to Moses in a cloud, and discovered his will to them. His voice was sometimes heard articulate. Thus, he spoke to Moses in the burning bush, and on mount Sinai, and to Samuel in the night.

We have in the Old Testament the writings of sixteen prophets; that is, of four greater and twelve lesser prophets. The four greater prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. The Jews do not properly place Daniel among the prophets, because (they say) he lived in the splendor of temporal dignities, and led a kind of life different from other prophets. The twelve lesser prophets are Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi.

Chronological order of the prophets, according to Calmet.

1. Hosea, under Uzziah, king of Judah, who began to reign A. M. 3194; and under Joatham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and under Jeroboam II. king of Israel, and his successors, to the destruction of Samaria, A. M. 3283.

2. Amos, under Uzziah, A. M. 3219, and about six years before the death of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, A. M. 3225.

3. Isaiah, at the death of Uzziah, and at the beginning of the reign of Joatham, king of Judah, A. M. 3246; to the reign of Manasseh, A. M. 3286.

4. Jonah, under the kings Joatham and Jeroboam II. in the kingdom of Israel; about the same time as Hosea, Isaiah and Amos. Jeroboam II. died A. M. 3260.

5. Micah, under Joatham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. Joatham began to reign A. M. 3265, and Hezekiah died A. M. 3396. Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, but began later to prophesy.

6. Nahum, under Hezekiah, and after the expedition of Sennacherib, that is, from A. M. 3991.

7. Jeremiah, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3375. Jeremiah continued to prophesy under Shallum, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah and Zedekiah, to the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, A. M. 3418. It is thought he died two years afterwards in Egypt.

8. Zephaniah, at the beginning of the reign of Josiah, and before the twenty-eighth year of that prince, A. M. 3881; and even before the taking of Nineveh, A. M. 3978.

9. Joel, uter Josiah, about the same time as Jeremiah and Zephaniah. [But see under Joel.]

10. Daniel was taken into Chaldea, A. M. 3398, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. He prophesied at Babylon to the end of the captivity, A. M. 4348; and perhaps longer.

11. Ezekiel was carried captive to Babylon with Jeconiah, king of Judah, A. M. 4305. He began to prophesy in A. M. 4348. He continued till toward the end of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, who died A. M. 4342.

12. Habakkuk, in Judah, at the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, about A. M. 3394, and before the coming of Nebuchadnezzar in 3398.

13. Obadiah, in Judea, after the taking of Jerusalem, A. M. 3414, and before the desolation of Idumea, (as we believe), in 3410.

15. Zechariah prophesied in Judea at the same time as Haggai, and seems to have continued after him.

16. Malachi has no date to his prophecies. If he were the same as Ezra, which is very probable, he may have prophesied under Nehemiah, who returned into Judea, A. M. 3550. See the articles of these prophets.

Beside these, there are many whose names appear in Scripture, but of whom we have no writings remaining.

The Prophets are, (1.) Miriam, sister of Moses. (2.) Deborah. (3.) Hannah, the mother of Samuel. (4.) Abigail. (5.) Huldah. (6.) Esther. (7.) The midwives of Egypt, who preserved the first-born of the Hebrews.

After Malachi, there were no prophets in Israel, as before; so that in the time of the Maccabees, [1 Mac. iv. 46. ante A. D. 164.] when the altar of burnt-sacrifices was demolished, which had been profaned by the Gentiles, the stones thereof were set aside, till a prophet should arise to declare what should be done with them.

The prophets were the divines, the philosophers, the instructors, and the guides of the Hebrews in piety and virtue. They generally lived retired, in some country retreat, or in a sort of community, where they and their disciples were employed in study, prayer and labor. Their habitations were plain and simple. They exercised no trade for gain, nor did they undertake any work that was too laborious, or inconsistent with the reposes their employment required. Elisha quitted his plough, when Elijah called him to the prophetical office, 1 Kings xix. 20. Zechariah (xiii. 5.) speaks of one who is no prophet, but a husbandman. Amos says (vii. 14.) he is no prophet, but a herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit.

Elijah was clothed with skins, and girded with a girdle of leather, 2 Kings i. 8. Isaiah wore sackcloth, that is, a coarse rough habit, of a dark brown color, which was the ordinary clothing of the prophet. Zech. ii. 11. (xiii. 4.) speaks of the false prophets who imitated externally the true prophets of the Lord, that they should not wear a rough garment to deceive. In Rev. xi. 3, the two witnesses are clothed in sackcloth. Their poverty was conspicuous in their actions. They received presents of bread, fruits and honey; or the first-fruits of the earth; as being persons who possessed nothing themselves. The woman of Shunem, who entertained Elisha, put into the prophet's chamber no furniture but what was plain and necessary, 2 Kings iv. 10. The same prophet refuses the rich presents of Naaman, and drives away from his presence Gehazi, who had received them, 2 Kings v. 26. Their frugality appears throughout their history. It is well known what is related of the wild gourds, that one of the prophets caused to be boiled for the refreshment of his brethren, 2 Kings iv. 38, 40. The angel gave to Elijah only bread and water for a long journey, 1 Kings xix. 6. Obadiah, governor of Ahab's household, gave bread and water to the happy reigns of David and Solomon, they received no proselytes of justice, because there was reason to fear, that the prosperity of these princes, rather than any love to religion, made them converts to Judaism. The Talmudists say, that proselytes are, as it were, the canker and rust of Israel, and that very great caution must be taken not to admit them too readily. ‘When the proselyte had been well instructed, they gave him circumcision; and when the wound was healed, they gave him baptism, by plunging his whole body into a cistern of water, by one immersion. This ceremony, being a judicial act, was to be performed in the presence of three judges, and could not be done on a festival day. The proselyte also caused circumcision and baptism to be administered to his slaves, under thirteen years of age; those of that age, or older, could not be compelled; but he must sell them, if they were obstinate in not embracing Judaism. Female slaves were only baptized if they would become converts; if not, they were to be sold. Baptism was never repeated, neither in the person of the proselyte, though he should afterwards apostatize, nor in that of his children, born to him after baptism, unless they were born from a pagan woman; in which case, they were to be baptized as pagans, because they followed the condition of their mother. [See Buxtorf, Lex. Rab. Chald. Talm. col. 407, seq. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. and Kuinoel on Matt. iii. 6. Selden de Jure Nat. et Gent. ii. 2.] Boys under twelve years of age, and girls under thirteen, could not become proselytes, till they had obtained the consent of their parents, or in case of refusal, the concurrence of the officers of justice. Baptism in respect of girls, had the same effect as circumcision in respect of boys. Each of them by means of this, received into the new birth; so that those who were their parents before, were no longer regarded as such after this ceremony; and those who before were slaves, now became free. Children born before the conversion of the father, had no right to inherit. If a proselyte died without having had children after his conversion, his estate belonged to the first occupier, and not to the public treasury. When proselytes became Jews, the rabbins taught that they received from heaven a new soul, and a new substance in them. It is thought that our Saviour alluded to the baptizing of proselytes, when he told Nicodemus, (John iii. 5-10.) that for those who would obey his law, it was necessary that they should be born again. When Nicodemus appeared surprised at this, our Saviour replied, “Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?” as though he would infer, that his language had nothing extraordinary in it, since the baptizing of proselytes was practiced every day in Israel.

PROVERBS, a name given by the Hebrews, in common with that of parables or similitudes, to moral sentences, maxims, comparisons or enigmas, expressed in a poetical, figurative and sententious style. Solomon says, that in his time, maxims of this sort were the chief study of the learned: “A wise man will endeavor to understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings they follow; and the condition of them, says (Eccles. xxxix. 1-3.) “He will keep the sayings of the renowned men, and where subtle parables are, he will be there also; he will seek out the secrets of grave sentences, and be conversant in dark parables.” The queen of Sheba came to see Solomon, to prove him, and to propose dark riddles to him, 1 Kings x. 1. Hiram, king of Tyre, (they say,) kept a correspondence, by letters, with Solomon, and also proposed enigmatical questions to him, and explained those that were proposed to him by Solomon.

The Proverbs of Solomon are, without doubt, the most valuable part of his works; he says that the fruit of his most profound meditations, and of his most excellent wisdom, Eccles. xii. 9. Here we find rules for the conduct of persons in all conditions of life; for kings, courtiers and men of the world; for masters, servants, fathers, mothers and children. Some have doubted whether Solomon alone were the author of the Proverbs. Grotius thinks he had a compilation made for his own use, of whatever was extant, excellent in point of morality, from all the ancient writers or the frequent division of the chapters. Others ascribe the whole book to Solomon. True it is, we may observe some differences of style and method in this book. The first nine chapters, entitled “The Proverbs of Solomon,” are written as a continued discourse, and may be considered as a single composition. In chap. x., where we see the same title again, the style changes to short sentences, which have little connection with each other, and which, generally, contain a kind of antithesis. In chap. xii. ver. 17, we find a new style, approaching nearer to proverbs; this style is maintained in the rest of the book. In chap. xxxii. we are introduced into the proverbs of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out.”

And, doubtless, it was on this authority that Grotius advanced this collection to have been made by Elia- kim, Shebna and Joash, famous men under the reign of Hezekiah. In chap. xxxii. we are introduced into the proverbs of Agur, the son of Jakeh, and the title of chap. xxxii. is, “The words of king Lemuel.” From all this it seems certain, that the book of Proverbs is a collection of Solomon, compiled by several hands: but we cannot decide whether it is not the work of Solomon, who, being inspired by divine Wisdom, composed no less than three thousand proverbs, 1 Kings iv. 32. Several persons might make collections of them; Hezekiah among others, as mentioned chap. xxxv. 1. Isaiah and Ezra might do the same. From these collections might be composed the work which we now have; and nothing is more reasonable than this supposition. It is no where said, that Solomon himself had made a collection of proverbs; and the title, “Solomon’s Proverbs,” rather shows the author than the compiler. The rabbins generally maintain, that king Hezekiah, observing the abuse the people made of several works of Solomon, chiefly those which contained the virtues of plants, and secrets of natural philosophy, he suppressed several of these works, and only preserved those that are handed down to us.

PROVINCIAL, divine superintendence. It is a tenet of the Christian and Jewish religions, that God disposes and governs all things by his providence; that this providence is eternal and infinite; that it extends over every thing, to the hairs of our heads, to the most minute animals, to herbs of the field. The atheists, whose sentiments are combated by Solomon, in his book of Ecclesiastes; and the Saddu-
 Classification.—Some writers, as Auguste, have classified the Psalms according to their aesthetic or prosodic character, into odes, elegies, etc. The method of De Wette is preferable, who divides them into various kinds of psalmic compositions. In this way we may make six classes. (Compare De Wette's Commentar., Einl. § 1.)

I. Hymns in praise of Jehovah; Téhíímim in the proper sense. These are directed to Jehovah from various motives and views; e. g., as the God of nature, and the Creator of the universe, Ps. viii. civ.; as the Protector and Patron of Israel, Ps. xx. xxx. xxxiii.; or of individuals, with thanksgiving for deliverance from evils, Ps. xviii. xxx. xlvii.; while others refer to the more special attributes of Jehovah, Ps. xc. cxxix. These psalms express the highest sublimity in respect to God, nature, etc.

II. Temple Hymns; sung at the consecration of the temple, the entrance of the ark, etc. or intended for the temple service, Ps. xcv. cxxvii. So also psalm songs, sung by those who came up to worship in the temple, etc. e. g. the so called Songs of Degrees, Ps. cxxix. seq. See De Geskières.

III. Religious and moral songs of a general character: e. g., to convey the poetical expression of one's sentiments and feelings, and therefore subjective; e. g. confidence in God, Ps. xxiii. lxxii. cxxv.; devotion to God, Ps. xvi.; longing for the worship of the temple, Ps. xliii.; prayers for the forgiveness of sin, Ps. li. etc.; so also didactic songs; the poetical expression of some truth, maxims, etc. Ps. i. lxxxiv. cxxvi.-lxxxviii. lxxxvii. etc. This is a numerous class.

IV. Eulogic Psalms, i. e. lamentations, psalms of complaint; generally united with prayer for help. This class has several subdivisions, viz.

1. The lamentations of particular individuals, Ps. vii. xvi. xlii. lv. xvi. &c.

2. National lamentations; where the poet laments over the circumstances of the nation, mostly in a religious view. Most of these psalms are of a late date; and none of them are from David; Ps. xlv. cxxvii. etc. Some are both individual and national, Ps. lxxxvii. cii.

3. These sufferings of the nation and of individuals inspire a melancholy view of life in general; hence many psalms are general complaints against a wicked world, Ps. xvi. cxxxvii. xxvii.

4. Psalms, the authors of which attempt to reply to the complaining views of the preceding class, and satisfy them of the goodness of God, etc. Ps. lxiii. lxxix. To the Book of Job. This whole class comprises about one third of the whole number of Psalms.

V. Odes to kings, patriotic hymns, etc. Ps. xlv. xxxvii. xcvii. xxvii. xc. etc.

VI. Historical Psalms, in which the ancient history of the Israelites is repeated in a hortatory manner, Ps. lxxvii. cv. cxxiv.

The prophetic psalms are here distributed among these various classes. Perhaps they might with more propriety constitute another separate class.

Inscriptions.—With the exception of twenty-five psalms, hence called orphan psalms, all the rest have inscriptions of various kinds, and often very difficult of interpretation. They refer to the different kinds of song, the melody or rhythm, the instrumental accompaniment, etc. This they will perform, etc. These are mostly very obscure; because the music and musical instruments of the Hebrews are almost wholly unknown to us. Of more particular importance are those inscriptions, which profess to designate the author or historical occasion of many of the psalms. The genuineness of these has been much contested in modern times; the principal arguments on both sides are the following, viz.

1. That it is the custom of oriental poets to prefix their names to their various poems; so the Arabians. This is no doubt true in a sense; but then, the manner of doing this is different from that of the Psalms; Arabic poems commence with "The poet saith," &c. —2. The inscriptions are found in the Septuagint. But this merely proves that they are as old as the Septuagint, i.e. about 330 years before Christ. (See 4. in the next paragraph.)

Against the genuineness of the inscriptions, or at least of many of them, it is said: (1) That many of them are in direct contradiction with the contents of the psalms to which they are prefixed, and therefore cannot have proceeded from the author; as e. g. when those are ascribed to David, which have reference to the exile; as Ps. xiv. 7; li. 18; xlii. 36; or when a psalm ascribed to David exhibits Chaldee words and forms, as Ps. cxxix. David's style was pure. (2) Others do not well accord with the contents and occasion of the Psalms; as Ps. i. iii. iv. lvi. lii. lxxix. —3. In several instances it can be shown how the error, which lies at the bottom, arose. Thus in Ps. cxxxvii. which is ascribed to Solomon, the first verse speaks of a building, which was assumed to be the temple; hence the transition was easy to Solomon as the author. Psalm xxx. is said to be for the "dedication of the house of David," which has arisen out of the 7th verse. —4. The Septuagint has many more inscriptions than the Hebrew text. Hence it follows, that as the collectors or translators of the Psalms certainly affixed some inscriptions according to their own conjectures, so they may probably have prefixed others, if not all, in the same manner. Thus the Septuagint and Vulgate ascribe some psalms to Adam, Melchisedek, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Haggai, Zechariah, &c. (See the list given by Geskières.)

The result of the whole is, that many of the inscriptions cannot well be genuine; and therefore the others become suspicious. We cannot rely upon any one, when it does not accord with the contents of the psalms. They are probably conjectural assumptions of the later collectors, possessors, etc. of the book of Psalms; perhaps mostly out of the exile, or not long after it. On these grounds, our English translators have very properly separated the inscriptions from the body of the Psalms; (in the Hebrew they are united with them;) and given them merely as inscriptions.

Authors and Age of the Psalms.—Most of those psalms which are ascribed to an author, are ascribed to David and to his contemporaries, chiefly Levites and singers out of David's school. Psalm xc. is attributed to Moses. "To David are assigned seventy-one psalms in the Hebrew, and in the Septuagint eleven more; of these many cannot be his. The character of David's psalms is generally elegant and expressive of a soft and pensive melancholy; but he is also, on various occasions, sublime; as in Ps. xviii. xxix. &c. —Twelve are ascribed to Asaph; eleven to the sons of Korah; two to Solomon; and one to each of the sibyls Heman and Ethan. (lxxxvii. lxxxviii.) Those which are anonymous or pseudonymous, (e. g. xiv.) are probably all later than David; and are imitations of his style and manner. The rabbins have the custom to reckon all anonymous psalms to that author who has been last named; thus Ps. xci. —c.
captivity of Babylon; remarking that Scripture commonly applies the phrase, to ascend, to express this notion. Thus Cyrus, in his proclamation, (Ezra i. 2; ii. 2; vii. 5, 6.) says, "Who is among you of all his people? His God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem." And a good number of persons presented themselves to go up, says Ezra, i. 11; ii. 1. Sheshbazzar brought up—with them of the captivity, that were brought up from Babylon to Jerusalem. "Now these are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity," Ezra vii. 6, 7, 9. "This Ezra went up from Babylon. And there went up some of the children of Israel. For on the first day of the first month, was the beginning of the.going up from Babylon." In Psalm cxliii., which is one of the Psalms of Degrees, it is said, "whither the tribes go up." (to Jerusalem). And Jeremiah, (xxvii. 22.) foretelling the return from the captivity, says, "Then will I bring you up, and restore you to that place." Ezekiel (xxxxix. 2.) expresses himself in the same manner. These expressions, showing that the Hebrews used the term to go up, when they spoke of their journeying from Babylon to Jerusalem, Calmet thinks it is very natural to call those Psalms of Ascent which were composed on occasion of their deliverance from the captivity of Babylon; whether to implore this deliverance from God, or to return thanks for it, is not important. In either case, they may have some relation to this great event. They mention it in several places; and the greater part of them cannot be otherwise explained.

The above is the opinion of Calmet. Other more probable ones are under the article DEGREES. R. PTOLEMES, see Acco. PTOLEMY, the name of all the kings of Egypt, from Ptolemy, son of Lagus, to the conquest of Egypt by the Romans; that is, from A. M. 3861 to 3874 ; or from the death of Alexander to the death of Cleopatra, spouse of Mark Antony. See Eurry. PUBLICAN, an officer of the revenue, employed in collecting taxes. Among the Romans there were two sorts of tax receivers: some were general receivers, who in each province had deputies, who collected the revenues of the empire, and accounted to the emperor. These were men of great consideration in the government; and Cicero says, that among these were the flower of the Roman knights, the ornament of the city, and the strength of the commonwealth. But those who were under-farmers, the commissioners, the publicans of the lower order, were looked upon as so many thieves and pickpockets. Theocritus being asked, Which was the most cruel of all beasts, answered, "Among the beasts of the wilderness, the bear and the lion; among the beasts of the city, the publican and the parasite." Among the Jews, also, the name and profession of a publican was excessively odious. They could not, without the utmost reluctance, see publicans exacting tributes and impostions laid on them by foreigners—the Romans. The Galileans, or Herodians, the disciples of Judas the Gaulonite, especially submitted to this with the greatest impatience, and thought it even unlawful. Those of their own nation who undertook this office, they looked upon as heathen. (See Matt. xvii. 17.) It is even said, they would not allow them to enter the temple, or the synagogues: to partake of the public prayers, or offices of judicature; or to give testimony in a court of justice.

There was much envy and hatred in the time of our Saviour; Zaccheus, probably, was one of the principal receivers, since he is called a chief among the publicans; (Luke xix. 2.) but Matthew was only an inferior publican, Luke v. 29. The Jews reproached Jesus with being a "friend of publicans and sinners, and eating with them," Luke vii. 34. And our Saviour told the Jews, (Matt. xxii. 31.) that harlots and publicans should be preferred before them in the kingdom of heaven. In the parable of the publican and the Pharisee, who prayed at the same time in the temple, we see with what humility his condition inspired the publican, Luke xviii. 10. He keeps afar off, and probably dared not so much as enter the court of the people. Zaccheus assured our Saviour, who had done him the honor to visit his house, that he was ready to give half of his goods to the poor, and to return fourfold whatever he had unjustly acquired, (Luke xix. 8.) in conformity with the Roman laws, which required, that when any farmer was convicted of extortion, he should render four times the value of what he had extorted.

PUBLIUS, a wealthy inhabitant of Malta, when Paul was shipwrecked on that island, A. D. 60, Acts xxviii. 7—9. In acknowledgment, Paul restored to health the father of Publius, who was ill of a fever and bloody flux. It is said, that not only Publius and his father, but the whole island also, was converted to the Christian faith.

PUDENS, mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. iv. 21.) is thought by the ancients to have been a Roman senator, converted by Peter. But there is reason to think they confounded him with another Pudens, a senator, said to be father of Praxeus and Priscillian, in the time of pope Pius, above a hundred years afterwards. The Greeks put him in the list of the seventy disciples, and say, that after the death of Paul, he was beheaded by Nero. Some think that Claudius, mentioned by Paul after Pudens, was his wife.

ceptation of the term queen; but it seems to be used by the orientals in another sense, and corresponds to the official title of "king's mother." A knowledge of this circumstance will remove several discrepancies in the historical books of the Old Testament, which have greatly perplexed the commentators. See the article King's Mother.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN, a name which the Hebrew idolaters gave to the moon. Jeremiah (vii. 17. &c.) says, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven." And chap. xlv. 16-18, the disobedient Israelites say to the same prophet, "We will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven. For since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by famine." Calmet thinks it to be the Meni of Is. lxv. 11, who was worshipped as the moon, Asarte, Trivia, Hecate, Diana, the heavenly Venus, and Isis, according to different superstitions. They placed altars to her on the platforms or the roofs of their houses, at the corners of the streets, near their doors, and in groves. They offered her cakes kneaded with oil or honey, and made libations to her, with wine and other liquors. The rabbins think they printed on these cakes the resemblance of a star or half-moon. See IDOLATRY.

RAAMAH, the fourth son of Cush, who peopled a country of Arabia, whence were brought to Tyre spices, precious stones and gold. This country is thought to have been in Arabia Felix, at the entrance of the Persian gulf, Gen. x. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 22. The Sept. in Genesis have Regma; according to Ptolemy, a city on the Persian gulf.

RAAMESES, or RAMESSES, a city built by the Hebrews, during their servitude in Egypt, and which probably took its name from a king of Egypt, Gen. xlviii. 11; Exod. i. 11. It was situated in the land of Goshen; and appears to have been the capital of that country. It was most probably the same with Heropolis, situated on the great canal between the Nile and Sue, where are now the ruins of Aboukeshyid. See in Exodus, p. 400.

RAB, RABBI, RABBIN, RABBIN, or RABBAN; a name of dignity among the Hebrews, given to masters and doctors, to chiefs of classes, and to the principal officers in the court of a prince; e. g. Nebuzaradan, general of the army of king Nebuchadnezzar, is always called Rab Tubachin, master of the executioners, or guards, 2 Kings xxviii. 8, 20, et passim; Jer. xxxix. 9, 10, et passim. Esther (i. 6) says, that Ahaseurus appointed a new queen, and made her chief of the women of the court, chap. ii. 48. "This prophet was himself preferred to be chief interpreter of dreams, or Rab of the Chartumum, Dan. v. 11. It appears that the title came originally from the Chaldees; for before the captivity, when mention is made of Judges, we find it used only in reference to the officers of the king of Babylon.

Rab, or Rabbam, properly signifies master, or one who excels in any thing; Rabbi, or Rabbam, is my master. Rabbin is the plural. Thus Rab is of greater dignity than Rabbi. There were several gradations among the Jews before the dignity of Rabbi, as among us before the degree of doctor. The head of a school was called Hacham, or wise; he who aspiring to the doctorship had the name of Bacher, or Elia; and he frequented the school of the Hacham. When further advanced he had the title of Chabar of the Rab, or master's companion, and when perfectly skilled in the knowledge of the law and traditions, he was called only Rab, or Rabin, and Morum, our master. There seems to be an allusion to something of this sort in Matt. x. 24; Luke vi. 40: "The disciple is not above his master; but it is enough for the disciple to be as his master, or to be his master's companion.

The Hacham Rab, or master Rabbi, decided differences, determined things allowed or forbidden, and judged in religious and even in civil controversies. He celebrated marriages, and declared divorces. He preached, if he had a talent for it; and was head of the academies. He had the first seat in the assemblies, and in the synagogues. He reprimanded the disobedient, and could even excommunicate them. In the schools they sat on raised chairs, and their scholars were seated at their feet. Hence (Acts xxi. 3) Paul is said to have studied at the feet of Rabbi Gamaliel. Philo affirms that among the Essenes, the children sat in the schools at the feet of their masters. Ambrosiaster, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, observes, that in their schools the Rabbins sat in their chairs, the most advanced of their scholars sat by them on benches, and the juniors sat on the ground on mats. Hence the Jews are used to say to their children, but away with you. "Roll your eyes in the dust of your master's feet!" instead of saying, Frequent their schools diligently, and sit down at their feet. Our Saviour upbraids the Rabbins and masters of Israel with vanity, and eagerness to occupy the first places at the tables of the synagogues; also, with their being satiated in the streets, and desiring to be called Rabbi, my master.

The studies of the Rabbins are either the text of the law, or the traditions, or the Cabala; these three objects form so many different sorts of Rabbins. Those who chiefly apply to the letter of Scripture, are called Caraites, i.e. Literalists. Those who chiefly study the traditions and oral laws of the Talmud, are called Rabbinites. Those who give themselves to their secret and mysterious divinity, letters and numbers, are called Cabalists, i.e. Traditionaries.

RABBATH, or RABBAT-AMMON, or RABBAT OF THE CHILDREN OF AMMON, afterwards called Philadelphia, by Ptolemy Philadelphia, the capital of the Ammonites, was situated in the mountains of Gilead, near the source of the Arnon, beyond Jordan. It was famous even in the time of Moses, Deut. iii. 9. When David declared war against the Ammonites,

A general engagement of the Jews with the Egyptians, when the latter, under Pharaoh Necho, came up to Jerusalem (2 Kings xxi. 20; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6). This battle is mentioned by thepseudo-Josephus, in Ant. x. 307, and is described by Diodorus Siculus, iv. 38, 39, among other ancient writers.

RAB, a Jewish name of the Arab or Semitic race. Among the ancients it was associated with the names of kings, and in some cases of provinces, etc. It appears also prefixed to the names of various classes of men: thus, Rabban, Rab, Rab' (v. g. Raab), which in the modern Arabic is pronounced, and signifies the chief, or highest; Rab, a Jew, or a Jew by birth; Rab, one who is distinguished, eminent, or learned in Jewish matters; Rab, or Rab, a learned man; Rab, a Jew of great eminence; Rab, an elder, or high priest of a synagogue. Moreover, in the modern Syriac, we find the word Rab or Rab, a rabbi, a learned teacher (in contrast to the rabban of the Christian Church).

RABBASHAH, a title applied to the presidents of the Sanhedrim, or supreme council of the Jews, under the Babylonian and Persian empires. When the province of Judaea was restored to the Jews, after the Babylonian captivity, the chief of the Jews in this restored territory was called Rabban or Rab. The office of Rabban continued for many centuries, but was finally abolished by the prince of Galilee, John of Levi, in the first century of our era.

RABA, an Arab city of the district of Adh-Dhahirah, in the principality of Aden, on the west coast of Arabia. It is situated about 130 miles from the coast, and is about 10 miles in circumference. It is a well-watered and fertile country, and is celebrated for its vineyards and olive groves. The city is built on a hill, and is surrounded by a wall of stone. It is a seat of some importance, and is the residence of the chief of the tribe of the Raba, who are the principal inhabitants of the district. The population is about 5,000, consisting of Arabs and Circassians.
therefore it is not to be wondered at, that the constant character which Homer gives of Achilles is, that he was swift of foot; and in the Holy Scripture, David, in his poetical lamentation over those two great captains, Saul and Jonathan, takes particular notice of this warlike quality of theirs: "They were swifter than eagles, stronger than lions." 2 Sam. i. 23.

Those persons who designed to contend in these games were obliged to repair to the public gymnasiun, at Elia, ten months before the solemnity, where they prepared themselves by continual exercises. No man who had omitted to present himself in this manner was allowed to contend for any of the prizes; nor were the accustomed rewards of victory given to such persons, if by any means they introduced themselves, and overcame their antagonists. No person who was himself a notorious criminal, or nearly related to any such, was permitted to contend; and further, if any person were convicted of bribing his adversary, a severe fine was laid upon him. Nor were these precautions alone thought a sufficient guard against evil and dishonorable contracts and unjust practices, but the contenders were obliged to swear, that they had spent ten whole months in preparatory exercises; and both they, their fathers and brethren, took a solemn oath, that they would not, by any sinister or unlawful means, endeavor to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games. (Potter's Antiq. Grec.)

The rewards given in these games have been thus rendered into English by Addison, from the Greek —

Greece, in four games thy martial youth were trained, For heroes two, and two for gods ordained; Jove bade the olive round his victor wave; Phoebus to his an apple-garland gave; The pine Palemon; nor with less renown, Archemorus conferred the parsley crown. (Anc. Med. Dial. 2.)

Compare with these fadings vegetable crowns that immortal life which the gospel offers as a prize to the victor; in order to understand the apostle's comparison, 1 Cor. ix. 25; 1 Pet. v. 4.

RACHAL, a city of Judah, to which David sent some of the spoil taken from the three enemies who had plundered Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. 22.

RACHEL, a daughter of Laban, and sister of Leah, was married to Jacob, by whom she had Joseph and Benjamin. She died in childbirth with the latter, whom she named Ben-oni, son of my pain; but Jacob named him Benjamin, or the son of my right hand. See JACOB.

The prophet Jeremiah, (xxx. 15. 18.) and after him Matthew, (ii. 18. 19.) have, as it were, revived Rachel, in the tribes of Ephraim and Manassheh, descended from Joseph, son of Rachel. "In Rama (or, on the high-places) was there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not." This was fulfilled, when these tribes were carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates; but Matthew has accommodated the words to the lamentations of the mothers in Bethlehelm, when Herod slew their children. Then Rachel, who was buried there, might be said to renew her cries and lamentations for the death of so many infant innocents, sacrificed to his jealousy and cruelty!

It may be well to notice the objection which Mr. Levi and others have urged against this application of the prophet's language. It is said that the lamentation of Rachel, referring only to the carrying away of captives to Babylon, and being connected with a promise of their return, is not of that description to justify such an application of it. The passage stands thus, Jer. xxxi. 15 —

Thus saith the Lord;
A voice was heard in Ramah, Lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children, Refused to be comforted, because they were not. Thus saith the Lord;
Refrain thy voice from weeping, And thine eyes from tears:
For thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord:
And they shall come again from the land of the enemy.
And there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord,
That thy children shall come again to their own border.

This passage certainly closes with hopeful and grateful ideas; so far, therefore, as the prophet apostrophizes the tender mother of the tribes of Joseph and Benjamin, he addresses consolation to her: not so the evangelist; whose metaphorical Rachel deplores her children hopelessly cut off, and departed for ever. To remove this seeming discrepancy, Mr. Taylor offers the following remarks, on the authority of Le Bruyn — (1.) that it is customary for mothers in the East to seek the graves of their deceased children, in order to weep over them; (2.) that it is probable high places or hills a little way out of the towns, were usually the scenes of such lamentations, anciently; as we find by several passages in the Old Testament; and that such weepings are now maintained in the same places; the same customs, for the most part, prevailing in modern as in ancient times; (3.) that the word Ramah signifies high places in general; and that any high place, the usual scene of such maternal lamentation, would have answered the evangelist's purpose in reference to mourning mothers: (4.) that Rachel was buried at, or near Ramah, (Gen. xxxv. 9; xvii. 7; 1 Sam. x. 2.) where the Israelites were assembled to be carried into captivity; (Jer. xli. 1.) (5.) that the same custom of women's weeping for their children was probably maintained in the evangelist's time at Ramah near Bethlehem, as Le Bruyn found at Ramah near Lydda; and that Ramah being a high place fit for the purpose, and such high places being selected as scenes of maternal lamentation.

From these considerations it will follow, that there is nothing forced or constrained in the reference of Matthew, to a mourning of mothers over their children, and refusing to be comforted; since such was, as it still is, the custom of the vicinity. The allusion to this custom would be still more conspicuous, if it were, as no doubt it was, maintained at Rachel's Ramah; and the apostrophe to Rachel would be still more impressive, if those mournings were exhibited in an open and high place, or spot of ground, adjacent to her tomb, or the memorial of it. To call such mournings, mournings of Rachel, (not to say that this name might actually be given to them, by the people, in the days of Matthew, who, as he wrote in the language of the country, certainly was acquainted with the customs of the country, as well to this opinion; but Calmet thinks that jeth a signifies the rain of spring, and makalath that of autumn. In Judg. it commonly rained but in two seasons, spring and autumn. Jeth is always put first, and makalath afterward. The Septuagint have taken it in the sense of Calmet; and Hesiod has expressed the rain of the spring and autumn in words of the same import as those used by the Septuagint. He calls and \[ \text{ἐπιμέρισα, the rain of autumn.} \]

(Opera et Dies, lib. ii.)

Moses, describing the land of Canaan, and its advantages over Egypt, says, (Deut. xi. 10, 11,) it is a country of hills and valleys, watered by rain from heaven. Hence it is that God promised them, if they depart from their fidelity to God, that he will send them showers of sand and dust, Deut. xviii. 34. See Dust.

The Hebrews often compare wise and instructive discourse to rain, Deut. xxxii. 2; Ecclus. xxxix. 9; Job xxix. 21.

RAM, or BATTERING RAM, a well known engine of war, mentioned in Ezek. iv. 2; xli. 22. and used by Nebuchadnezzar at the siege of Jerusalem.

RAMAH. This word signifies an eminence; from hence are so many places in Palestine named Ramah, Ramath, Ramoth, Ramoth, and Ramath; or Ramath. Sometimes the same place is called by one or other of these names indiscriminately, all signifying the same. Sometimes Ram, or Ramoth, is joined to another name, to determine the place of such city, or eminence; and it is sometimes put simply for a high place, and signifies neither city nor village.

I. RAMAH, a city of Benjamin, between Gaba and Bethel, toward the mountains of Ephraim, six miles from Jerusalem north, and on the road from Samaria to Jerusalem. Baasha, king of Israel, caused it to be fortified, to obstruct the passage from the land of Judah into that of Israel. This is probably the Ramathai or Ramathaim-zophim, of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 19; ii. 11, &c. (See Ramathaim.) It was on the frontiers of Ephraim and Benjamin; and frontier cities were often inhabited by both tribes. It is also very probable, that Jeremiah speaks of this Ramah, (chap. xlii.) when he says, Nebuzaradan, who commanded the Chaldean army, having found him among the captives, they had been all brought, set him at liberty. Of the place of the same name he explains the prophecy (chap. xxxii. 15-17.) in which the Lord comforts Rachel, on account of the taking her children of Ephraim and Manasseh into captivity.

II. RAMAH, a city in mount Ephraim, the birthplace of Samuel; probably identical with the Ramah of Benjamin. (See Rosenmüller's Bibl. Geogr. ii. p. 186, and also the preceding article.)

III. RAMAH, a city about thirty miles north-west of Jerusalem, on the road to Joppa. M. le Bruyn describes the fine reservoirs of water to be seen here, and many other marks of antiquity. He says it is but four leagues from Jaffa, or Joppa, and stands in a plain and even country: he also says, that Lydda is on one side, and about three miles from Ramah. (See Arimathea.) Eusebius and some others seem to have thought that this city is the Ramah of Samuel, or Ramathaim-zophim, of the mountains of Ephraim. But this opinion cannot be supported.

RAMOTH, or Ramathaim-zophim, probably, because the city was divided into two parts. It was also called Zophim, because of a family of Levites dwelling there, who were descended from Zophi. It was probably the same with Ramah i. and ii. RAMOTH-LIBAN, in the height of the jaw-bone, or the east of the jaw-bone, the name of the place where Samson threw the jaw-bone on the ground, with which he had beaten the Philistines. Probably this is the Lehi of Judg. xv. 9. See LEM. RAMESSES, see RAMSES.

RAMOTH, a famous city in the mountains of Gilead; often called Ramoth-Gilead; and sometimes Ramath-mizpeh, or the Watch-tower, Josh. xiii. 36. The Vulgate makes it two cities, Ramoth and Maapha. It belonged to Gad, was assigned to the Levites, and became one of the cities of refuge beyond Jordan, Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 38. It was famous during the reigns of the later kings of Israel, and was the occasion of several wars between these princes and the kings of Damascus, who had conquered it, and from whom the kings of Israel endeavored to regain it, 1 Kings xxi. 3; 2 Kings viii. 28; 29; 2 Chron. xxii. 5. Jehoram, king of Judah, was dangerously wounded at the siege of this place; Jeshu, son of Nimshi, was here anointed king of Israel, by a prophet sent by Elijah; (2 Kings xi.) and Abiah was killed in battle with the Syrians before it, 2 Chron. xviii. 3. Ezechias says, Ramoth was fifteen miles from Philadelphia, east; but Jerome places it in the neighborhood of Jabbeck, and, consequently, not far from Philadelphia.

RANSOM, a price paid to recover a person or thing, from one who detains that person or thing in captivity. Hence prisoners of war, or slaves, are said to be ransomed, when they are liberated in exchange for a valuable consideration. Whatever is substituted or exchanged, in compensation for the party, is his ransom; but the word ransom is more extensively taken in Scripture. A man is said to ransom his life, (Exod. xxi. 30) to substitute a sum of money instead of his life; (chap. xxx. 12; Job xxxiv. 18; Ps. xlix. 7.) and some kinds of sacrifices might be regarded as ransoms, that is, as substitutes for the offerer. In like manner, Christ is said to give himself a ransom for all; (1 Tim. ii. 6; Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45.) a substitute for them, bearing sufferings in their stead, undergoing that penalty which would otherwise attach to them. (See Rom. iii. 24; vii. 23; 1 Cor. i. 30; Ephes. i. 7; iv. 30; Heb. xiv.)

RAMSES, see RAMESSES.

RAPHAEL, one of the seven archangels which stand continually before the throne of God, ready to perform his commands, Tobit xii. 15.

RAPHAH, a famous city on the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Raphon, famous for the victory of Philoctetes, king of Egypt, over Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, 3 Mac. i. 11.

RAVEN, a well-known bird of prey; unclean by the law, Lev. xi. 15. When Noah sent the raven out of the ark, to see if the waters were withdrawing from covering the earth, it did not return to him. Gen. viii. 6, 7. When the prophet Elisha retired near the brook Cherith, the Lord fed him for some time by means of ravens, who brought him bread and flesh, morning and evening, 1 Kings xvii. 6. See Eliah.

The blackness of the raven is proverbial: "His locks are bushy and black as a raven," Cant. v. 11.

The wise men says, (Prov. xxx. 17.) "The eye that mocks at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it."

RASHISH, the taking away of any thing from Rechabites were forced to take refuge in the city, still, however, lodging in tents. Jeremiah, however, under this siege, received orders from the Lord, to invite them into the temple, and to offer them wine to drink. But they answered, "We will drink no wine; for so the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us."

Then came the word of the Lord unto Jeremiah, saying, "The son of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; yet I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking, but ye hearkened not unto me." And then, directing his discourse to the Rechabites, he says, "Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever," Jer. xxxv. 2, seq.

The Rechabites were, probably, led captive, after the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; since we read in the title of Ps. lxx. that it was sung "by the sons of Jonadab, and by the principal captives," which were Ezekiel and Mordecai, carried away by the Chaldeans beyond the Euphrates, after the taking of Jerusalem under king Jehoiakim. They returned from their captivity, and settled in the city of Jabez, beyond Jordan; as appears by 1 Chron. ii. 55. No further mention is made of the Kenites in the books written after the captivity of Babylon.

Some have suggested that the Assidians of the Maccabees, (1 Mac. ii. 43; vii. 13; 2 Mac. xiv. 6.) were successors and followers of the Rechabites. Others have confounded them with the Essenes. But certain it is, that the manner of life of the Essenes, which is well known, was very different from that of the Rechabites. The former had fields, and dwelt in houses; but had neither wives nor children, and performed no religious ceremonies with the other Jews at Jerusalem; all which was contrary to the practice of the Rechabites.

Reconciliation, see Expiation, and Atonement.

Redeemer, a name given by way of eminence to Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world. In the law of Moses, (Lev. xxv. 25, 47, 48.) it is given to him who has the right of redemption in an inheritance, or even to a near kinsman, who may redeem it from a stranger, or any Jew who had bought it. Moses ordained, that neither estate in land, nor the persons of the Hebrews, should be sold for ever; but that every one might resume the possession of his estate, or his personal liberty, in the sabbatical year, and at the jubilee. But without waiting for these years, Moses commanded, that any kinsman, rich enough, and had power to redeem the goods or liberty of his brother, the law enabled him to do so. And this it calls the right of redemption; giving also the name of redeemer to the relation who claimed this right, Lev. xxv., xxvii.

We see an instance of the practice of this law in the history of Ruth, Ruth ii. 20; iii. 9, &c Boaz, being one of the nearest relations of Elimelech, married Ruth, the heireess of Elimelech, and thereby entered into the possession of her estate. Jeremiah redeemed the field of his nephew Hanameel, which was on the point of being sold to another, Jer. xxxii. 7, 8.

The same person was also called The Redeemer of Blood, (Eng. tr. The Resurrection of Blood,) who had a right to revenge the blood of his murdered kinsman, Numb. xxxv. 13, 19, 21; Deut. xix. 6, 12. To curb the resentment of these avengers, or redeemers, God appointed cities of refuge throughout Israel. See Kirjath, and Forts.

Red Heifer. The particulars relative to this sacrifice, which was an eminent type of our Saviour, (Heb. ix. 14.) will be found in Numb. xix. Spencer thinks, that the ceremony was designed in opposition to the Egyptian superstitions. But Mr. Taylor remarks, that though the Apis of Egypt was black, yet the Apis of India is "red-colored;" and consequently, the Hebrew red heifer could not be in opposition to this; which is the original of the Egyptian superstition. (See Apis.) The virtue of purifying from defilement by contact with a dead body, did not reside in the abundance of water with which the person previously washed himself; but in the ashes of the heifer, however small their quantity, with which he was baptized by sprinkling, Heb. ix. 10, 13, 14. It is no improbable conjecture, that the disentanglement between the disciples of John and the Jews about purifying (John iii. 25.) turned on this point, "How could simple water—water having no ashes in it—purify?" and the Baptist, in another place, pleads the authority of "him who sent me to baptize with simple water." As no heifer can be burnt under the present condition of the Jews, it follows, that they cannot, on their own legal principles, be fully purified from the defilements communicated by the dead; they wash their clothes, the furniture of their apartments, their rooms, &c. but the ashes are still wanting, for the purification of their persons. See Heifer.

Red Sea, see Sea.

Red. Ezekiel (xl. 3.) and John (Rev. xvi. 1.) speak of a measuring-rod; the former saying, it was in length six cubits and a hand-breadth; or rather, six cubits and six hand-breadths; that is, six Hebrew cubits, each larger by a hand-breadth than the Babylonian cubit. Refuge, cities of. To provide security for those who should undesignedly kill a man, the Lord commanded Moses to appoint six cities of refuge, or Asylums, that whoever should have thus spilt blood, might retire thither, and have time to prepare his defence before the judges; and that the kinman of the deceased might not pursue and kill him, Exod. xxii. 13; Numb. xxxv. 11, &c. Of such cities there were three on each side Jordan. On the west, were Kedeshe of Naphtali, Hebron and Sichem; on the east, Bezer, Golan and Ramoth-Gilead, Josh. xx. 7, 8. These cities were not only for Hebrews, but for all strangers who resided in the country, Deut. xix. 1—8. The Lord also commanded, that when the Hebrews should multiply and enlarge their land, they should add three other cities of refuge. As this command was never fulfilled, the rabbins say, that the Messiah will accomplish it.

Maimonides, from the traditions of the ancients, assures us, that all the forty-eight cities, appointed for habitations of the priests and Levites, were cities of refuge; and that all the difference between them was, that the six cities appointed by the law, were obliged to receive and lodge fugitives gratis; whereas the other cities might refuse to admit such as fled to them, and were not obliged to receive them gratuitously. Besides the cities of refuge, the temple, and especially the altar of burnt-offerings, enjoyed the privilege of an asylum. Those who took sanctuary in the temple, were immediately examined by the judges; and, if found guilty of murder, they were forced away, even from the altar, and put to death without the temple. But, if found innocent, they had a guard appointed, to conduct them safely to some city of refuge.

which they had well deserved, particularly Hand; this he was so imprudent as to mention to his uncle Szaléh, who was so vexed at not receiving a present, that he immediately divulged all the circumstances of our encounter. Hand, in consequence, was under the superintendence of an officer of the robbers; and having accompanied me on my return to Cairo, he remained with me some time there, in anxious expectation of hearing whether the robber's blood was likely to be revenged. Not hearing any thing, he then returned to his mountain; four months after which, a party of Omran, to which tribe the robbers had belonged, came to the tent of the sheik of the Towara, to demand the fine of blood. The man had died a few days after receiving the wound; and although he was a robber, and the first aggressor, the Bedouin laws entitled his relations to the fine, if they waived the right of retaliation. Hand was therefore glad to come to a compromise, and paid them two camels (which the two principal sheikhs of the Towara gave him for the purpose) and twenty dollars, which I thought myself bound to reimburse to him, when he afterwards called on me at Cairo. This was the third man Hand had killed in skirmish; but he had paid no fine for the others, as it was never known who they were, nor to what tribe they belonged.

"Had Hand, whom every one knew to be the person who had stabbed the robber, refused to pay the fine, the Omran would, sooner or later, have retaliated upon himself or his relations; or perhaps upon some other individual of the tribe; according to the custom of these Bedouins, who have established among themselves the law of 'striking sideways.' How far superior to this was the Mosaic institution of cities of refuge!"

REGENERATION is used in two senses by the sacred authors of the New Testament: (1.) for that spiritual birth received from grace; (2.) for that new life we expect at the resurrection. Properly speaking, there are only two places where the term regeneration occurs; Matt. xix. 28. and Titus iii. 5: the first refers to a change of state, the second to a change of profession. It will be of advantage, therefore, to notice the import of this term in other writers in the same sense. In ancient writers, vernacular, and ψευδοζωή, generation, or origin. It is used by Greek writers to express the state of the earth in the spring, when the face and appearance of nature is renewed, and the crops and vegetables, corn, &c. are regenerated in the successors of those of the last year. Trees, however, are not regenerated; but their leaves and fruits are; nature having formed the buds and germs previous to the winter, which, after the winter, put themselves forth, open, and spread themselves. Cicero, writing to Atticus, expresses the state and dignity to which he was re-appointed after his return from exile, by the term regeneration. Josephus, speaking of the Jews who were made acquainted by Zorobabel with the edict of Darius, permitting their return to Jerusalem, says,—"They gave thanks to God—and for seven days they continued feasting, and kept a festival for the rebuilding and restoration, regeneration, of their country." It is this last passage, principally, that induces Schleuuner to interpret Matt. xix. 28, of a renovation of the minds and characters of the Jews and Gentiles by means of the gospel. The Syriac translates, in the new age. This is perfectly agreeable to the phrases, the age to come, the world to come, the Father of the future age, the age of the Messiah, &c. which were familiar and customary among the Jews, previous to and at the time of Christ. In this acceptance, the term regeneration must be construed with the preceding words; and it is consistent with 2 Pet. iii. 13; 2 Cor. v. 17. But others incline to construe these words with the following part of the sentence, and are for the grand renovation of all things, at Christ's second coming; (comp. Acts iii. 21.) and particularly to God's children being born again, as it were, from their graves: that is, resurrection is regeneration. (Comp. Acts xiii. 33.) Either way the passage is metaphorical; but, as it was intended to be understood by the hearers, it seems most proper to explain it in that sense which was most likely to strike those hearers as consonant with phrases then current. This seems to establish the verbal meaning in coincidence with Schleuuner. A more exalted meaning might be couched under the term, and might even be present to the mind of the speaker; but the hearers would be most likely to understand its import according to its application by their native historian Josephus.

The second place in which the word occurs (Titus iii. 5.) alludes, beyond all question, to the rise of baptism. Our translators have taken the term connected with it, for the fluid with which that rite is administered; or the action by which it is performed; but the general course of the Greek language rather leads to the vessel containing the fluid. But in whatever sense that term might be taken, it is clear that regeneration, in this place, means a professional or ritual change of life, of personal habits, of objects, purposes, and endeavors. It is the external profession of those intentions of which the renewing of the Holy Spirit, mentioned in connection with it, is the prime mover and promoter; the outward and visible sign, of which the acting principle is the inward and spiritual grace. The fathers have uniformly employed the term regeneration to signify baptism; and this is so evident, that Phavorinus says expressly, referring to this place, the holy rite of baptism is called regeneration. It is so used by Justin Martyr and other Christian writers.

Baptism was always thought to denote a resurrection, a transplantation, a change of manners, of society, of interests and of cares, as those who are "risen with Christ," who are "alive from the dead," with whom "old things are passed away, and all things are become new," &c.

Very different is the term used, (John iii. 4, 5, &c.) it is there γίνομαι νέος, born again, or, as some prefer, born from above. But this latter acceptance seems inconsistent with the following words, and the objections raised by Nicodemus, "How can a man (γίνομαι νέος) be born again when he is old? Can he enter a second time into his mother's womb, and be born?" He must," says Jesus, "be born of water and Spirit." Ritually, professionally, or externally, of water; internally, or actuously, of the Spirit; that is, renewed in the spirit, disposition or habit of his mind; in this sense he is "a child of God;" "born of God;" "God is his father," &c.

Though these terms are currently used promiscuously and indiscriminately, yet this appears to be an incorrectness; which probably would appear more striking, if proper care were taken to distinguish accurately between the terrestrial and the celestial kingdom of God; the professional or temporal kingdom of grace, and the ultimate or eternal kingdom of glory, &c.

The term used by Peter, (1 Epist. 1.3.) who thanks God for his abundant mercy by which he regenerates us, (σώσεως,) in a lively or life-giving hope, by entirely, that no further mention shall be made of him, as a people. He says, (Ps. xxxiv. 16,) that "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth." And Ps. ix. 6, "Thou hast destroyed cities, their memorial, and the remembrance thereof, and casteth them down to the ground; and their image was given into captivity." The covenant, however, has promised to the righteous and just, that their memory shall be blessed, and shall never perish.

REMISSION is sometimes taken for the year of jubilee, or the sabbatical year, in which the slaves were set at liberty, and in which every one returned into his own inheritance. (So in the Vulgate, Lev. xxv. 10; Numb. xxvi. 4; Deut. xv. 1.) It is also used for pardon of sin. The gospel says, that "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins, Mark i. 4; Luke iii. 3. And that the blood of Jesus Christ was shed, to procure remission of our sins, Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; Matt. xxvii. 28.

It is somewhat remarkable, says Mr. Taylor, that the term pardon of sin, does not occur in the New Testament; but we read of remission and forgiveness. Certainly these words, with the ideas they represent, are allied; yet there seems to be some distinction preserved between them. When the observation is made, "This man who takes upon him to forgive sins, blasphemeth: who can forgive sins but God?" it should seem as if our Lord had said, "Thy sins are remitted," but that term would not have justified the inference made. When John preached the baptism of repentance, he was reproved, as being without conscience, and when our Lord gave power to his apostles, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained;" we cannot suppose that either of these parties invaded an acknowledged prerogative of God. If the remission of sins by the apostles was declaratory, if John the Baptist was the prophet of the Highest, to give the knowledge of salvation to his people, by the remission of their sins; if, in consequence of the confession of sins made previous to baptism by John, that prophet remitted sins by baptism, that is, declared them to be remitted; if Peter advised the Jews to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins; then we must admit that the exercise of this power by men, was by no means identical with the forgiveness of sins, as it pertains to God only. Under the law there was no remission of sins without shedding of blood; that is, until the proper sacrifices were offered, the priest could not pronounce the transgressor free from the consequences of his transgression. And the shedding of the blood was signified by John, or by the apostles; but the blood of Jesus Christ was shed for many, for the remission of sins; and remission of sins was preached in his name.

The term εἰσήγησιν, rendered remission, signifies to announce liberty to the captive, (Luke iv. 18,) to release the obligation of a debt, as in the sabbatical year, Deut. xv. 3. The term δικαιοσύνη, rendered forgiveth, is, with the greatest propriety, addressed to God; "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors."—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" and the power of forgiving, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee, assumed by our Lord, was greatly superior to that of announcing remission, confirming on the apostles, and could be becoming only in a personage infinitely above them in dignity and power.

REMIPHAN. Amos (v. 26,) upbraids the Hebrews with having carried, during their wanderings in the wilderness, the tabernacle of their Moloch, the image of their idol, and the star of their god. (Acts vii. 43,) quoting this passage, says, "Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remiphan." See CHUR, and MOLCH.

REPTENANCE is generally taken for that contrition, compunction, regret, or sorrow which arises in us, after having committed a sin; and repentance is certainly a duty; joined to a sincere resolution of avoiding the like in future. It is also taken for the works of penitence: fasting, weeping, alms, and works of satisfaction; that is, retribution. There is a false repentance, as that of Anathæus Epiphanes, of Judas Iscariot, of Pharaoh, of Saul, of Ahab. Judas wanted confidence in the mercy of God, and therefore fell into despair. Antiochus had no sincere contrition. Pharaoh and Saul were terrified, but not moved by a true repentance; they continued hardened, and changed neither their minds nor their manners. Ahab was indeed touched, but he wanted perseverance in recollection.

Samuel says to Saul, (1 Sam. xix. 29,) "The strength of Israel will not lie, nor repent, for he is not a man, that he should repent." That is, he will not change his resolution, as men make resolutions, and then repent of them, and perform them not. He has passed his sentence against you, and will not annul it. Paul says, in the same sense, the gifts and graces of God are without repentance. That is, God does not revoke his favors; he never forsakes us first; never changes his mind.

The Book of Wisdom (v. 23,) represents the wicked in another light, as repenting and bewailing; seized with compunction and despair, as seeing good men in honor, while they themselves are in trouble. We know that in another life, repentance and remorse are useless. See the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi. 24.

The sacred writers often represent God as a king, moved with regret or repentance, or relenting for having suffered, or having resolved on certain things. So Moses says, (Gen. vi. 5, 7,) God repented that he had made man, seeing the wickedness of his actions had proceeded to such extremity. So (1 Sam. xv. 11,) he repented of having made Saul king; not as if he had conceived any regret at what he had done, or that he repents of having taken a false step, as a man does when he perceives he has committed an error. God is not capable of repentance in this sense. But sometimes he changes his conduct towards those who are unfaithful to him, and, after having treated them with disregarded mercy, he corrects them with deserved severity.

God is said to repent of evil he was about to inflict, when, moved with compassion toward the miserable, or entreated by their prayers, or affected by their repentance, he remorse the punishment of their sins, and does not execute his threatenings against them. Thus it is said, (Ps. cvii. 48,) that he repented according to the multitude of his mercies, and that he caused his people to find favor in the eyes of those to whom he had given them up into bondage. And in Jeremiah xlvii. 8, the Lord declares, that if his people repent of their evil doings, he will also repent of the evil which he designed to inflict on them; that is, he would treat them favorably; but, on the contrary, if his people would not obey his commands, he would repent of the good he intended them.

These expressions are used after the manner of men, and in accommodation to human language, because in no other way can we conceive of the actions of Deity. When human passions are ascribed to RESPECT OF PERSONS. God appointed that the judges should pronounce sentence without respect of persons, Lev. xix. 15; Deut. xvi. 17, 19. That they should consider neither the poor nor the rich, the weak nor the powerful; but should attend only to truth and justice. God has no respect of persons. And the Jews—complimented our Saviour, that he told the truth, without respect of persons, without fear, Matt. xxii. 16. (See Isa. xxxii. 1—16.) Jude, (ver. 16,) instead of the phrase, "to have respect of persons," has "to admire persons."

Our English term respect seems to imply some kind of deference or submission to a party: but this is not always the proper meaning to be annexed to it in Scripture. When we read, (Exod. ii. 25,) "God had respect to the children of Israel," it can only express his compassion and sympathy for them: when God had respect to the offering of Abel, (Gen. iv. 4,) it importa to accept favorably, to notice with satisfaction. (Comp. 1 Kings viii. 22; Num. xvi. 15.)

REST, or RESPECT, was enjoined upon the Israelites on the sabbath-day, for the glory of God; in that he rested after the six days of creation. See SABBATH.

Rest also signified a fixed and secure habitation. You shall go before your brethren, "until the Lord shall give rest to your brethren, as well as to you, in the land which they are going to make a conquest of," Deut. iii. 29. And Deut. xii. 9, "For ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you." You are not as yet settled in that land which you are to possess. Naomi says to Ruth, "My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee?" (Ruth iii. 1.) "e. I shall endeavor to procure you a settlement. David, speaking of the ark of the covenant, which till his time had no fixed place of settlement, says, "Arise, O Lord, into thy rest, thou and the ark of thy strength," Ps. cxxxii. 8. And Ecles. xxxxi. 15, "O be merciful unto Jerusalem, thy holy city, the place of thy rest."

In a moral and spiritual sense, rest denotes the fixed and permanent state of repose enjoyed by the blessed in heaven; and to this Paul makes an application of the promise of the Israelites in the Land of Promise; "I sware to them in my wrath, that they should not enter into my rest," that is, into the land of Canaan, Ps. xxv. 11. Therefore, says Paul, (Heb. iii. 17; iv. 11;) as those who were numbered therein by reason of their unbelief, let us be afraid of imitating their example: for we cannot enter but by faith," &c.

RESTITUTION. Natural justice requires that we should repair whatever injuries we have done to our neighbor, whether in his person, property, or reputation. The law of Moses prescribed, (Exod. xxi. 23—25; Lev. xxiv. 20; Deut. xxi. 21;) "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe." Also, that they should render five ozen for one ox, and four sheep for one sheep; (Exod. xxii.) or that the thief should be sold, to make restitution for his theft: that if he had taken away any beast of service, as an ox, an ass, or even a sheep, he should restore it two-fold; that whoever should damage the field of another, should repair the damage, according to an estimate. He who, by ignorance, should omit to give to the temple what was appointed by the law, for example, in the tithes or first-fruits, was obliged to restore it to the priests, and to add a fifth part beside; over and above which, he was bound to offer a ram, for his expiation. Nehemiah prevailed with all those Israelites to make restitution, who had taken interest of their brethren, (Neh. v. 10, 11;) and Zaccheus (Luke x. 8,) promises a four-fold restitution to all from whom he had exacted, in his office as a publican. The Roman laws condemned to a four-fold restitution all who were convicted of extortion or fraud. Zaccheus here imposes that penalty on himself, to which he adds the half of his goods; which was what the law did not require.

He who had killed a beast, as an ox, was to render another for it, or the value of it, Lev. xxviii. 18, 21.

The Jews expected Elias in the day of the Messiah, who was to restore all things, Matt. xi. Mal. iv. 5, 6. And Peter (Acts iii. 21,) calls the last day the day of restitution of all things. At the end of the world Christ will unite the church with the synagogue, the Jew with the Christian, the Christian with the Gentile; then all will be united into a perfect union, and there will be but one shepherd and one flock.

RESURRECTION, revival from the dead. The belief of a resurrection is an article of religion common to Jew and Christian, and expressly taught in both Testaments. We speak not here of that miraculous resurrection, which consists in reviving for a time, to die again afterwards; as Elijah, Elisha, Christ, and his apostles, raised some from the dead; but of a general resurrection of the dead, which will take place at the end of the world, and which will be followed by an immortality either of happiness or of misery. So the psalmist says, (xvi. 10;) "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, (the grave,) neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." Job xix. 25—27. "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin, worm shall destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God; and I shall see myself, my mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me."

Ezekiel, also, in his vision of a great quantity of bones in a large field, which, at the breath of the Spirit of the Lord, began to unite, to rejoin flesh to flesh, nerves and sin, and at last to revive, has left us a proof and an assurance of a general resurrection, Ezek. xxxvii. (See also Isa. xxvi. 18.) The Book of Wisdom (chap. iii. iv. 15,) speaks of it in a very lively manner; and in the Maccabees, we see the same truth more vividly and still more expressly, 2 Mac. vii. 9, 14, 22, 29; Heb. xi. 35.

When our Saviour appeared in Judea, the resurrection from the dead was received as a principal article of religion by the whole Jewish nation; and kept the Sadducees, whose error our Saviour has effectually confuted. He has promised his faithful servants a complete state of happiness after the general resurrection; and he arose himself from the dead, to give, among other things a proof of the resurrection, a pledge, a pattern of the future resurrection. Paul, in almost all his Epistles, speaks of a general resurrection; refutes those who denied or opposed it; proves it to those who had difficulties about it; in some degree explains the mystery, the manner, and several circumstances of it; says, that to deny it, is the same as to deny our Saviour's resurrection; and that, if we were not to rise again from the dead, we should be of all men the most miserable, 1 Cor. xv.
The doctrine of a general resurrection as an article of faith, is expressly acknowledged by Martin, in the grave of Lazarus, (John xxi. 22.) and it is clear, that no individual can receive according to the deeds done in the body, unless the body be party to the sentence as well as to the deeds.

REUBEN, (behold! a son;) so called in reference to the sentiment of his mother, "The Lord hath looked on my affliction:" the eldest son of Jacob and Leah; born A.M. 2246, Gen. xxix. 32. Reuben, he is here called his father's counsellor; Bihlah, lost his birthright, and all the privileges of primogeniture, Gen. xxxv. 22. When Joseph's brethren had taken a resolution to destroy him, Reuben endeavored by all means to deliver him. He proposed to them, to let him down into an old water-pit, which had then no water; that afterwards he might take him up again, and restore him to his father Jacob. His brethren took the advice; but while Reuben was at some distance, they sold Joseph to a party of Ishmaelites. Reuben going to the pit, and not finding him there, tore his clothes, and bewailed his brother's loss.

Jacob, when dying, warmly reproached Reuben with his crime committed with Bihlah; saying, "Reuben, thou art my first-born, my might, but unsteady as water, thou shalt not excel, because thou wert sent up to thy father's bed: then didst thou it." Moses, before his death, said of Reuben, (Deut. xxxiii. 6.) "Let Reuben live and not die, yet let his number be but small." His tribe was never very numerous, nor very constant in Israel. They had their inheritance beyond Jordan, between the brooks Arnon south, and Jazer north, having the mountains of Gilgead east, and Jordan west. (See CANAN.)

The time of Reuben's death is unknown.

REUEL, son of Eau and Bashemath, daughter of Ishmael, was father of Nabath, Zerah, Shamshah and Mizzah, Gen. xxxvi. 4, 17.

REUMAH, concubine to Nahor, the brother of Abraham; was mother of Tebah, Gaham, Thahshah and Maacha, Gen. xxii. 24.

REVELATION, an extraordinary and supernatural discovery made to the mind of man; whether by dream, vision, ecstasy, or otherwise. Paul, alluding to his visions and revelations, (2 Cor. xii. 1, 7.) speaks of them in the third person, out of modesty; and declares, that he could not tell whether he were in the body or out of the body. Elsewhere he says, that he had received his gospel by a particular revelation: (Gal. i. 12.) again, that he did not go to Jerusalem after his conversion by the mere motion of his own mind, but in consequence of a revelation, Gal. ii. 2.

"Revelation" is used to express the manifestation of Jesus Christ to Jews and Gentiles: (Luke ii. 32.) the manifestation of the glory with which God will glorify his elect and faithful servants at the last judgment; (Rom. viii. 19.) and the declaration of his just judgments, in his conduct both towards the elect, and towards the reprobate, Rom. ii. 5—16. There is a very noble application of the word revelation to the consummation of all things, or the revelation of Jesus Christ in his future glory, 1 Cor. i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 13.

Revelation, Book of, see Apocalypse.

REVENGE, the return of an injury, from a desire of hurting the object. Hence it is generally said, that when Scripture says that God revenges himself, it speaks after a popular manner: the meaning is, he vindicates the injuries done to his justice and his majesty, and to the order established by him in the world; yet without any emotion of displeasure. He revenges the injuries done to his servants, because he must, to vindicate his justice and must be preserved. It may, however, be remarked, that our language maintains a distinction between the terms revenge and avenge, although it is too often overlooked. That God may avenge, that is, punish in proportion to sin committed, is a consequence of his infinite justice, of his moral government, holiness, &c. but to revenge seems rather the act of a man when he inflicts an injury on another, commensurate, in his estimation, to the injury he has received from that other, and in this he is likely to be guilty of excess. It is, therefore, not without pain that we read of God's revenging, since a disposition to revenge, or a spirit of revenge, is very improperly imputed to Deity, and we cannot be too cautious on this subject. To avenge a broken law, to avenge the injuries sustained by the widow and fatherless, that is, to punish those who oppress them in proportion to deserts, is no more than justice, and may be accomplished in various ways; possibly, even without inflicting evil on the culprit—but by bringing him to a penitent sense of his misconduct, inducing him to make restitution, to make amends, to compensate for damages, and to resolve on better conduct for the future, &c. In short, it should seem that determination to avenge, is a pure and simple wish to do justice or to see justice done; while the desire to revenge springs from pride, or self-love, and is a human impurity actuated by passion, vehemently assuming the character of retaliation, vexation, or injuring the object of it.

In the Old Testament, God appears to have tolerated revenge in certain cases, to avoid greater evils: "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, &c. Exod. xxiv. 16—18, &c. (See Revue.) However, God has sufficiently declared, that vengeance belongs only to him, Deut. xxxii. 35. He forbids malice and revenge in express terms; he will not allow us to keep any resentment in our hearts against our brethren, Lev. xix. 17, 18. And when God seems to have established the lex talionis, he does not thereby allow of revenge, but sets limits to it. He does not, as Augustin remarks, intend to provoke to anger, but to stop the progress and consequences of it.

"The day of vengeance" sometimes expresses the day of judgment, in which God will take vengeance on all his enemies; sometimes the day of vengeance stands for the punishment God exercises on his enemies, when they continue to have the full measure, Exod. xxxii. 34; Isa. xxxiv. 8; xli. 2; xliii. 4; Luke xxi. 22.

REVENGER, or REVENGER of BLOOD, is a name given in Scripture to the man who had the right, according to the Jewish policy, to avenge on him who had killed one of his relations. If a man had been guilty of manslaughter, involuntarily and without design, he fled to a city of refuge. See the subject fully treated under Revue.

REVERENCE, a respectful, submissive disposition of mind, arising from affection and esteem, from a sense of superiority in the person reverenced. Hence children reverence their fathers, even when their fathers correct them by stripes; (Heb. xi. 8.) hence subjects reverence their sovereign; (2 Sam. ix. 6.) hence wives reverence their husbands; (Eph. v. 33.) and hence all ought to reverence God. We reverence the name of God, the house of God, the worship of God, &c.; we reverence the attributes of God, the commands, dispensations, &c. of God; and we ought to demonstrate our reverence by outward acts, such as are suitable and becoming to time, place and circumstances; for though a man may reverence hand, the effects of his omnipotence, Exod. xv. 6; Ps. xxi. 8; xiv. 3, &c.; Matt. xxvi. 64; Col. iii. 1; Heb. i. 14.

The right-hand commonly denotes the south, as the left-hand denotes the north. For the Hebrews speak of the quarters of the world in respect of a person, whose face is turned to the east, his back to the west, his right-hand to the south, and his left-hand to the north. Thus Kidem, which signifies before, denotes also the east; and Achor, which signifies behind, marks the west; Yamin, the right-hand, is the south; and Shemol, the left-hand, the north. For example: "Doth not David hide himself with us in strong holds in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon?" Heb. on the right-hand of Jeshimon, 1 Sam. xxvii. 19, 24.

The accuser was commonly at the right-hand of the accused, (Ps. cix. 6) and hence, Satan stands at the right-hand of the high-priest Joshua, to accuse him, Zech. iii. 1. But, often, in a quite contrary sense, to be at any one's right-hand, signifies to defend, to protect, to support him, Ps. xvi. 8; cix. 1; evii. 6.

"To depart from the law of God, neither to the right-hand nor to the left," is a frequent Scripture expression, meaning a strict adherence to it: neither attempting to go beyond it, and doing more than it requires; nor doing less: we must observe it closely, constantly, invariably: as a traveller, who does not quit his way, either to the right or the left, lest he should lose it entirely.

Our Saviour, to show what liberty we should do good works, says, (Matt. vi. 3.) "That our left-hand should not know what our right-hand does." Above all things we should avoid vanity and ostentation in alms and beneficence.

To give the right-hand is a mark of friendship. Paul says, that James, Cephas and John gave him the right-hand of fellowship, Gal. ii. 9. And in the Books of the Maccabees this expression occurs very often. See HAND.

In taking an oath, the Hebrews lifted up their right-hand, Isa. lix. 6; Gen. xiv. 22; Deut. xxxiii. 40. See OATH.

This article might be extended to an inconvenient length: it is, however, worth while to become acquainted with some of the distinctions allotted by Scripture to right-hand and left-hand. When Jacob called Benjamin the son of his right-hand, as the margin reads, it certainly denoted a special degree of affection for that child of his beloved Rachel; and when he purposely crossed his hands, so as to lay his right-hand on his head, Eph. (Gen. xliii. 14); this token, indicating greater prosperity, was readily understood by Joseph, as it was intended by his father. When we read (1 Chron. xxix. 24) on occasion of the inauguration of Solomon, that "all the sons of David gave the hand unto Solomon as king," we should understand the right-hand, given in token of allegiance and submission. In like manner of Babylon, (Jer. l. 15.) "She has given her hand," that is, her right-hand, has pledged her fidelity; and the same in Lam. v. 6, "We have given the hand, the right-hand, protesting thereby our submission, to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians, to be satisfied with bread." When Abraham says, (Gen. xiv. 22.) "I have lifted up my hand to the Lord, and I cannot retract," he certainly means that he had sworn to the Lord, by lifting up his right-hand. What, then, can we think of those of whom it is alleged, (Ps. cxlii. 8,) their right-hand is a right-hand of false-hood; their oath is not to be taken; or of those who are so besotted as to worship gods of their own making, and never questioning whether the lie in their right-hand; where truth, fidelity, and even scrupulous accuracy, should be maintained without intermission, Isa. xlv. 20.

The right-hand was stretched forth as an act of address, whether of a priest, (as Prov. x. 24; Isa. lxv. 2) or of oratory, (as Acts xxvi. 1) or of protection, direction, &c.

The right-hand, especially, was lifted up in prayer; and it deserves notice that every figure delineated by the early Christians, remaining in their sepulchres, or elsewhere, intended to represent the action of prayer, has the hands—but especially the right-hand—lifted up, solemnly and steadily.

As much of the labor of life is performed with the right-hand, and as most of our Lord's hearers were laboring men, we ought not to pass without notice the emphatic nature of his advice—"If thy right-hand cause thee to offend, cut it off," Matt. v. 30. The inducement could not be slight, nor the conviction trivial, that could effect a loss and a suffering expressing by this figurative language.

To seat a person at the right-hand is a token of peculiar honor; so Buthsheba, as the king's mother, was placed at the right-hand of Solomon: (1 Kings ii. 19; comp. Ps. xiv. 9.) and when Christ is said to be seated on the right-hand of God, (Acts vii. 55; Rom. viii. 34; Col. iii. 1) it imports unequalled dignity and exaltation.

It is evident, that when a hand, or the right-hand, is attributed to Deity, the expression should be taken only after the manner of men. Deity has neither right-hand nor left-hand; but the strength, the skill, the power of man lying much, and principally, in his right-hand, the idea is transferred to God, by an inevitable, and therefore a justifiable, liberty of speech.

RIGHTeous, and RIGHTouSNESS, are terms taken in several senses in Scripture. As for (1) absolute perfection of rectitude and holiness; in which sense they are applied to God, who always observes the very strictness of equity, as well from the justice of his own nature, as in regard to his creatures, Job xxxvi. 2; John xvii. 25. (2) The truth and faithfulness of God, in performing his promises, the rectitude by which he is governed in his promises. (Gen. xiii. 14.) (3) The righteousness of Christ, the righteousness acceptable to God, the manner of becoming righteous in the sight of God, are other acceptations of the word. (4) Righteousness is spoken comparitively of men. No man is absolutely righteous: but he who is in justice, equity, integrity, in his conduct, behavior, dealings, &c. is comparatively righteous. Whoever in his course of life "walks in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord, blameless," is so far righteous. Hence some persons in Scripture are called righteous, as Noah; (Gen. vii. 1-8.) that is, a man of integrity and holy manners. So Abraham supposes (Gen. xviii. 23.) there might be fifty righteous in Sodom, men who were not profane like the Sodomites in general; and this sense is frequent in the Psalms, &c. Alms are called righteousness, Matt. vi. 1. (5) Righteousness in the New Testament is applied to God; to Christ the righteous, (1 John ii. 1) and to men; but as men have, at best, but a broken, damaged, and imperfect righteousness, this word is applied to men in a very limited and qualified sense; and also with respect to a better righteousness than merely human; that obtained by against certain evils, or for procuring certain advantages in good or evil.

The rings and pendants for the ears, so fine in Palestine and Africa, were probably superstitious, or talismanic. When Jacob arrived at Cato his return from Mesopotamia, he ordered people to deliver to him "all the strange gods which were in their hands, and all their ear-rings which were in their ears," (Gen. xxi. 4.) which seems insinuate, that those strange gods were superstitious and magical figures, engraved on their rings, bracelets, and the pendants in their ears. Some commentators, however, think these rings were not upon the hands and in the ears false gods. See EAR-RINGS, and AMULET.

RIPPATH, second son of Gomer, and great-grandson of Japheth, Gen. x. 3; 1 Chron. i. 6. The sons are not agreed what country was peopled by the descendants of Rippath.

RISSAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness. They came from Libnah to Rissah, and from Rissah they went to Kehelathah, Numb. xxxii. 7. See EXODUS.

RITHMAH, another encampment of Israel. From Hazeroth they arrived at Rithmah, where they went to Rimmon-parez, Numb. xxxiii. 18. See EXODUS.

RIVER, a running stream of water. The lips give the name of the river, without adding sometimes to the Nile, sometimes to the Euphrates and sometimes to the Jordan. The tenor of the passage must determine the sense of this unceasing and indeterminate way of speaking. They give the name of river to brooks and rivulets at all times and in all places.

The principal rivers and brooks of Palestine are the Jordan, the Arnon, the Jabbeh, the Cherith, the Horeb, the Besor, the Kishon, the brook of Jordan, the brook of Reeds or of Kanah, the Barragy, or Nah and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus. See proper articles.

The name of river is sometimes given to the name of Jonathan (ii. 5.) he was surrounded by four rivers; that is, the waters of the sea, currents.

And the lips of the poet, the prophet, and the scribes, give the name of river to the brooks and streams which they cultivated. And Psalms xlvii. 2, "The Lord hath made earth upon the sea, and established it upon the waters, which signify the same in both places.

It is with good reason that nobody offers sacrifices there, O thou deceitful and turbulent river." See RIZPAH, the daughter of Ahia, concubine of Saul; soon after whose death, Abner, the grandson of his son, fell in love with Rizpah, and took Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, who reigned at Anathoth, and was supported in his regal state, on the credit of Abner's valor, resented this act and had him put to death. This is an address which he would have thought to be a friend of the greatest integrity.

We read of magical rings, to which several extraordinary effects were ascribed, either as preservatives of Saul, by Adriel, son of Barzillai; or rather by Phinehas (1 Sam. xxv. 44), all whom were buried on a mountain near Gibeah, at the beginning of barley-harvest. Rizpah, upon receiving the intelligence, took a sackcloth and spread it upon the rock, where she continued from the beginning of harvest, till water from heaven fell on them; or till the Lord sent his rain on the earth, and restored its former fertility. She hindered the birds from tearing the bodies by day, and the ravens beasts from devouring them by night. When this was related to David, he was moved with compassion, and sent for the bones of Saul and Jonathan, which were at Ja- beah-gilead, and deposited them in the tomb of Kish, the father of Saul, at Gibeah; together with the bones of the seven men who had been executed by the Gibeonites.

ROCK, a large and natural mass of stone. Palestine, being a mountainous country, had many rocks, which were part of the strength of the country; for in times of danger the people retired to them, and found refuge against sudden invasions of their enemies. When the Benjamites were overcome and almost exterminated by the other tribes, they secured themselves in the rock Rimmon: (Judg. xx. 47.) and, during the oppression of Israel by the Midianites, they were forced to hide themselves in cavities of the rocks. (Judg. vi. 19.)

Samson, we are told, (Judg. xv. 8.) took his station in the rock Etam, whence he suffered himself to be dislodged by the persuasion of his brethren, not by the force of his enemies; and David, it is said, repeatedly hid himself in the caves of rocks. It appears that rocks are still resorted to, in the East, as places of security, and some of them are even capable of sustaining a siege, at least equal to any the Philistine army could have laid to the residence of Samson. So we read in De la Roque: (p. 203.) ‘The grand seignior, wishing to seize the person of the emir, gave orders to the pacha to take him prisoner: he accordingly came in search of him, with a new army, in the district of Chouf; which is a part of mount Lebanon, wherein is the village of Gesin, and close to it the rock which served for retreat to the emir. It is named in Arabic Magara Gesin, i.e. the cavern of Gesin,’ by which name it is famous. The pacha pressed the emir so closely, that this unfortunate prince was obliged to shut himself up in the cell of a great rock, with a small number of his officers. The pacha besieged him there several months; and was going to blow up the rock by a mine, when the emir capitulated.” Thus David might wander from place to place, yet find many fastnesses in rocks, or caverns, in which to hide himself from Saul. Observe, too, that this cliff in the rock is called a cavern; so that we are not obliged always to suppose that what the Scripture calls cases or caverns were under ground; though such is the idea conveyed by our English word. We may remark also, that before the invention of gun-powder, fastnesses of this kind were, in a manner, absolutely impregnable; and, indeed, we have in Bruce accounts of very long sieges sustained by individuals and their families, or adherents, upon rocks; and which at last terminated by capitulation. The idea of retiring to rocks for security; of considering the protection of God as a rock, &c. which often occurs in Scripture, will now appear extremely natural.

The number of caves, and dwelling places in rocks, which late travellers have discovered, as well in parts of Judea as in Egypt, greatly exceeds what had formerly been supposed. Many of these are still occupied as retreats by the peasants; and Denon gives an account of skirmishes and combats, fought in the grottoes or caverns of Egypt, by the Arab residents, against their invaders under Buonaparte. On the east of the Jordan, as Sreetzen reports, entire families, with their cattle and rocks, take possession of caves and caverns in rocks and secluded places, where they are not easily discovered, and whence they could not easily be dislodged. The people inhabiting the Persian gulf lived in the same manner. For this reason they were called in Greek Τρογλυται, Τρογλυδετες, that is, people who dwell in caves and mountain grottoes. Those that inhabited the desert about Tekaob, lodged in caverns dug in the earth, says Jerome. The Idumeans had their abodes in clefs of the rocks. Jer. lxxxviii. 25. “O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole’s mouth.” Hither the Moabites used to retreat, in times of calamity. The Kenites, who dwelt south of the Dead sea, had similar dwellings: “And he looked on the Kenites, and said, Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock,” Numb. xxiv. 21.

In Isa. i. 1, God says to the Jews, “Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged;” that is, to Abraham and the patriarchs, your ancestors.

Moses says, that God would give the Hebrews a country, whose rocks and stones should supply them with plenty of honey and oil, Deut. xxxii. 13. “He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock.” The psalmist says, (lxiii. 16,) speaking of the miracle by which Moses drew water out of the rock, “With honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.” In Palestine the bees often store up their honey in holes of the rocks; and it is to this that the Scripture alludes. Job says, (xxix. 6,) in the same sense, that in his prosperity, “the rock poured out rivers of oil,” because olive-trees generally grew on stony mountains.

For a description of the most eminent rocks mentioned in Scripture the reader is referred to their respective articles. See also SEPULCHRE, and TOMB.

ROD. This word is variously used in Scripture. (1.) For the branches of a tree; (Gen. xxx. 37.) (2.) For a staff or wand; (Exod. iv. 17, 20.) (3.) For a shepherd’s crook; (Lev. xxvii. 32.) (4.) For a rod, properly so called, which God uses to correct men; (2 Sam. vii. 14; Job ix. 34.) (5.) For a royal sceptre, Esth. iv. 11; Ps. xiv. 6; Heb. i. 8. The empire of the Messiah is represented by a rod of iron, to express its power and might, Ps. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27; xii. 5; xix. 15. (6.) For a young sprout, or branch, to distinguish the miraculous birth of the Messiah from a virgin mother, (Num. xxiv. 17.) “There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre (or rod) shall rise out of Israel.” And Isaiah says, (xi.) “There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots.” In Jer. i. 11, the watchful rod, according to the Hebrew, is a branch or rod of an olive tree; and the tree flourishes the earliest of any; and the Lord intended to denote by it Nebuchadnezzar, who was just then ready to pour his forces upon Judea. (7.) For a tribe or people, Ps. lix. 3; Jer. x. 16.

ROE: It is probable that the Hebrew word חצב, which is translated roe, in the English Bible, is the gazelle, or antelope: See ANTELOPE.
ROGEL, a fountain near Jerusæm, in Judah, Josh. xv. 7; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. xvii. 17; 1 Kings i. 9. It is said in another fountain of Rome, in which, probably, the articles were washed, by treading with the feet. It seems to have been not far from the fountain Siloam. (See Rosenmüller's Bibl. Geogr. II. ii. p. 233.)

ROGELMUS, a place in Giland, beyond Jordan, where Barzillai, the friend of David, lived, 2 Sam. xviii. 27; xix. 32.

ROLL, see Book.

ROME, ROMANS. Jerome seems to have thought that Chittim was put for Italy in Num. xxiv. 24, where Balaam says, "And ships shall come from the coasts of Chittim, and shall afflict Ashur and Eber." He translates, "Ships shall come from Italy." But this ought rather to be referred to the Greeks, who, under Alexander the Great, invaded the Hebrews, at that time under the Persians. The Greeks overthrew the Persian empire, but were themselves overthrown by the Romans. Jerome says, (on Ezck. xxvi. 6.,) that the workmen of Tyre used what came from the islands of Italy, to make cabins for the captives of Tyrian ships. But what rarities could there be in these islands of Italy, that were not in Phœnicia and the neighboring provinces? (See Chittim.) Bochart has carried all his learning to support the opinion of the rabbi, who by Chittim understand Rome and Italy; and he shows, that in this country are found cities named Cethim and Echetia, as also a river called Cethus; but he also brings good proofs that Chittim imports Macedonia.

The Jews, according to the rabbis, generally called the Romans Idumæans; and the Roman empire, the cruel empire of Edom. It is difficult to conceive their reason, since Italy and Rome are far from Idumæa, and have never had any affinity with the Idumæans. When the more learned rabbis are asked for a reason, they maintain, with great assurance and obstinacy, that the Idumæans embraced Christianity, settled themselves in Italy, and there extended their dominions.

The Roman empire is generally thought to be denoted in Dan. ii. 40, by the kingdom of iron, which bruises and breaks in pieces all other kingdoms; but Calmet thinks it is rather the empire of the Lagides in Egypt, and of the Seleucides in Syria.

In the books of the Old Testament written in Hebrew, we find no mention of Rome, Romains, or Italy. But in the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, they are often mentioned. 1 Mac. viii. 1, 2, "Judas had heard of the fame of the Romans, that they were mighty and valiant men, and such as would lovingly accept all that joined themselves unto them, and make a league of union with all that came unto them; and that they were men of great valor. It was told him also of their wars and noble acts, which they had done among the Galatians, and how they had conquered them, and brought them under tribute." Judas had also been informed of their conquests in Spain, &c. that they had subdued Philip and Persus, kings of Macedonia, or Chittim, and Antiochus the Great, king of Syria; that they had deprived him of various provinces; and had also reduced the Greeks, who attempted to resist them; in a word, that they confirmed in their kingdoms all whom they desired to reign, or deprive those of those crowns whom they intended to punish. Nevertheless, that none of them wore the diadem or the purple, but that they had a senate, consisting of three hundred and twenty senators, who consulted every day about the affairs of the republic; and that they committed every year to reign magistracy to one person, who came through all their territories, and thus all were set one to one, without envy or jealousy.

The first alliance between the Jews and Romans was made ante A. D. 162. Some years after this, (ante A. D. 144,) Jonathan, brother of Judas Maccabeus, finding the opportunity favorable for the Jews, to renew this alliance. Maccabeus, also, sent to Rome an ambassador to Numænius, with a present of a great golden bowl, 1 Mac. xiv. 24, ante A. D. 149. Before this A. D. 163, 2 Mac. xi. 34-36. Quintus Minucius and Titus Manilius, the Roman legates, being sent to Syria to settle some affairs with Antiochus Epiphanes, interested themselves in promoting the quillity of the Jews.

The Romans took the city of Jerusalem times: first by the arms of Pompey, ante A. D. 67; by Titus, A. D. 70. When both the city and the temple were desolated, they reduced Judea into a province; that took from it the privilege of being a kingdom of having kingly government. First, after the destruction of king Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, A. D. 16, and this continued to A. D. 37, again reduced to a province after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, A. D. 43; it remained in this condition till it was entirely overthrown.

The term Roman is used (1) as denoting a native or inhabitant of the city of Rome; or of the country round that metropolis; as Epistle to the Romans. (2) For the power of the Roman government; (John xi. 48.) "The 1 shall come and take away both our place and our power." Acts xxv. 16, "It is not the manner of the to deliver any man to die, till we have heard the voice;" chap. xxvii. 17, &c. (3) For a person possessed the privileges attached to the citizen Rome: (Acts xxvii. 25.) "Is it lawful for a man who is a Roman, he being as a condemned?" Paul, who pleads this privilege not actually a Roman, having been born at or in Italy. Some think, that being born in favor with the communication of the privilege the imperial city, he was competent to claim except, by his birth-right; being a native of this place. Others think that Paul's claim was never the privilege of the Romans, whether of a military or civil nature; which would render it so much the more deserving of this privilege to a man entitled to special marks of honor. Thus be the title, as such a reward was received by Jews, about this time.

The Valerian law forbade that a Roman should be bound: the Scyprian law forbade he should be scourged, or beaten with rods, a man falsely claiming the privileges of a Roman was, he was severely punished; by the Claudius with death.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—This is placed under the other Epistles of Paul, not because it was composed in order of time, but because of the imperial city, to which it is directed, or excellence of its contents; or of the magnificence and simplicity of the mysteries of which it treats; for the most exalted and the most difficult questions in all Paul's Epistles. Jerome (Epist. 151. cap. of opinion, that not one book only, but many v were necessary, for a full explanation of it. And some have thought that Peter had chiefly this Epistle in his eye, when he said, (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) "As our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction." But others, with good reason, think Peter rather refers to Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews. (See Bibl. Repository, vol. ii. p. 412, seq.) Or, perhaps, to what were earlier written, and to countries nearer to those addressed by Peter. The dates of the Epistles must be considered in this reference.

Paul's design, in his Epistle to the Romans, is to terminate certain domestic disputes, which then prevailed among the believers at Rome, and divided the converted Jews and Gentiles into two parties. The Jews insisted on their birthright, and the promises made to their fathers; on account of which they assumed a certain priority of preference over the converted Gentiles, whom they regarded as foreigners and interlopers, out of pure favor admitted into the society of believers, and to the participation of Christian privileges. The Gentiles, on the other hand, maintained the merit of their own feelings, the prudence of their legislators, the purity of their morality, and their exactness in following the law of nature. They accused the Jews of infidelity toward God, and violation of his laws. They aggravated their faults by the faults of their fathers, and thus the greater part of them from the inheritance of the saints, from the faith, &c. as witnessed by their own Scriptures, &c.

To terminate these contentions, Paul applies himself to restrain the presumption of both parties. He shows that neither could pretend to merit, or had reason to glory, or boast of their calling; which proceeded from the mere grace and mercy of God. He proves that even if the Jews had observed the law of Moses, and the Gentiles the law of nature, this could not have merited for either the grace they had received. That nothing but the faith in Jesus Christ, enlivened by charity and good works, can justify us. He answers objections from arguments taken from these principles, e.g. the gratuitous vocation, or the non-vocation, of Jew and Gentile; the insufficiency of the works of the law without faith; the superiority of the Jews above the Gentiles; and the infallibility of the promises of God. This introduces a discussion of predestination and reproduction, which makes a principal part of this Epistle, and contains some of the greatest difficulties in it.

In chapters xii.—xv. the apostle gives excellent rules of morality, concerning mutual harmony, mutual forbearance, and reciprocal condescension to infirmities, for fear of scandalizing or offending one another by indiscreet liberties. He describes the false apostles, and exhorts believers to avoid them. Chap. xvi. contains salutations and commendations, addressed to particular persons.

This Epistle was written A. D. 58, in Corinth, whence Paul was immediately to depart, to carry to Jerusalem some collections made for the saints. Phoebe, a deaconess of the church of Cenchrea, near Corinth, was the bearer of it. No doubt has ever been made of its authenticity; and though it was addressed to the Romans, yet it was written in Greek. Tertius was Paul's secretary on this occasion.

The Marcionites made great declinations in the Epistles of Paul, especially in this to the Romans, of which they suppressed the last two chapters. There is much probability that Paul designed to finish this Epistle at the end of the fourteenth; but afterwards added the concluding chapters. At the end of the fifteenth chapter, we find this conclusion: "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen," which seems to show that the letter was then finished. We see the same conclusion no less than three times in the sixteenth chapter, (verses 20, 34, 37,) which leads us to imagine that these additions were composed at intervals. Probably, while waiting for an opportunity of sending it off, whether by Phoebe, or by any other safe hand.

Paul is supposed to have visited Rome twice. First, A. D. 61 or 62, when he appealed to Caesar; and then A. D. 66, a year before his imprisonment, which happened in A. D. 66. See Paul.

ROOT. Covetousness is the root of all evil, 1 Tim. vi. 10. That is, the origin, the cause, the occasion. Lest any root of bitterness trouble you, Heb. xii. 15.

The root may also denote the race, the posterity, Prov. xii. 3. The root of the just shall not be disturbed, shall not fail. And Jeremiah, xix. 3. "Whence do the wicked prosper in all things? Thou hast planted them, and they have taken root." In Daniel, and in the Macabees, Antichus Epiphanes, the persecutor of the Jews, is represented as a young sprout or sucker, or root of iniquity, proceeding from the king, the successors of Alexander the Great. And Jesus Christ, in his human nature, is described as a root ill nourished, growing in a dry and barren soil. Isa. lii. 10. Chap. xi. 1, 10, he is called the root of Jesse. (See Rom. xv. 2.)

In the contrary sense, Paul says, (Rom. xi. 16—18.) that the Jews are, as it were, the root that bears the tree into which the Gentiles are grafted. And that the patriarchs are the pure and holy root of which the Jews are, as it were, the branches. Jesus Christ is the root on which Christians depend, and from which they derive life and subsistence, Col. ii. 7.

ROSE, a well-known shrub. It is evident from Eccles. xxiv. 14, that the rose was a favorite with the Jewish people, and also, that "the rose of Jericho" was a very different plant from that now bearing the same name. In Cant. ii. 1, Solomon has chosen the rose to represent the matchless excellence of the bride: "I am the rose of Sharon!" but the Septuagint and Jerome, instead of rose, render, "the flower of the fields." The Chaldee, however, which has been followed by most western interpreters, calls it (in Canticles) doora; and circumstances seem to determine it to be the wild rose, the uncultivated flower, which thereby corresponds to the lily in the next verse. But beside this rose, Schleuscher refers to Hillerus, who rather seeks this flower among the bulbous-rooted plants, and declares for the asphodel, whose flowers resemble those of the lily. It is very fragrant, and Homer and Hesiod praise it. Hesiod says it grows commonly in woods; and Homer calls the Elysian fields, meads filled with asphodel. It is said, words which agree with the sentiment of Solomon here, if we take Sharon (as seems proper enough) for the common fields: "I am the asphodel of the meadows (or woods); the lily of the valleys," or places not cultivated as a garden is. (Genesius pronounces for the derivation from ἐφασκεῖν, to beth, with a prefixed, as is often the case. The ancient versions, as the Septuagint, Vulgate, and also the Targum on Isaiah, render it by Lý, or Narcissus; of which the latter SABOTH, or rather Tsaaboath, a Hebrew word, signifying hosts or armies; Jehovah Sabaoth, is The Lord of Hosts; whether we understand the host of heaven, or the angels and ministers of the Lord, or the stars and planets, which, as an army ranged in battle array, perform the will of God; or, lastly, the people of the Lord, both of the old and new covenants, which is truly a great army, of which God is the general and commander.

The Hebrew Tsaaba is often used, also, to signify the service his ministers perform to God in the temple; because they are there, as it were, soldiers or guards, attending the court of their prince, Numb. iv. 3, 33, 30, &c. This word is also used to express the duty of the women who watched at the door of the tabernacle, and kept guard there during the night-time, Exod. xxxviii. 8.

SABBATH, rest; God, having created the world in six days, rested on the seventh; (Gen. ii. 2, 3,) that is, he ceased from producing new beings in this creation; and because he had rested on it, he blessed or sanctioned it, and appointed it in a peculiar manner for his worship. The Hebrew, afterwards, in consequence of this designation, and to preserve the memory of the creation, sanctioned, by his word, the day of the Sabbath day, the seventh day of the week, abstaining from all work, labor and servile employment, and applying themselves to the service of the Lord, to the study of his law, and to prayer.

The days of sabbath are taken sometimes for all the Jewish festivals. "Keep my sabbaths," (Lev. xix. 3, 30,) that is, my feasts; as the Passover, Pentecost, Feast of Tabernacles, &c.

It is disputed, whether, from the beginning of the world, God gave the law of the sabbath; and whether this day was also observed, at least among the more pious of the first men, as the patriarchs, before the promulgation of the law; whether this be the sense of those words, (Gen. ii. 2,) "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it"?—Some fathers, and some Jewish doctors, have asserted the affirmative; and Menasseh Ben-Israel assures us that, according to the tradition of the ancients, Abraham and his posterity, having preserved the memory of the creation, possible to keep them all; and the rabbins affirm, that if the people of Israel could keep but two sabbaths as they ought to be kept, they should soon see themselves delivered from the evils under which they groan. Their scrupulosity even forbids to peel or to roast an apple; nor will a fish, a fly, or insect, if it is big, but the sun may be distinguished; to sing, or to play on an instrument, so loud as to awaken a child. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the Samaritans pretend, that the Jews are not religious enough in their observation of the sabbath. As for them, they will not light a fire on this day; they abstain from the use of marriage: they do not stir from their places, save only to go to the house of the Lord: they employ themselves wholly in reading the law, in prayers and thanksgivings. (Letter of the Samaritans to Mr. Huntington.)

Of all the festivals God has enjoined, there are none of which the Jews are so jealous, or of which they speak so magnificently, as of the sabbath. They call it their spouse, because God has given it to them, specially, exclusive of all other nations. Leo of Modena, who alone is equivalent to all the modern Jews, says, the rabbins have reduced all that is forbidden on the sabbath day, to thirty-nine heads, each of which have their circumstances and dependences. But they are of little importance, and their enumeration would occupy much space.

Such profane authors as have ventured to speak of the origin of the sabbath, have shown their ignorance of Jewish affairs. Tactius thought they observed the sabbath in honor of Saturn, to whom Saturday was consecrated by the pagans. But Plutarch asserts that it was kept in honor of Bacchus, who is called Sabaoth; and because in the festivals of this false deity they used to cry Sabaoth. Apion, the grammarian, maintained that the Jews celebrated the sabbath in memory of their being cured of a shameful disease, which in the Egyptian language was called Sabaoth. Pagan authors speak frequently of the fast of the sabbath; as if the Jews had ordinarily fasted on this day; whereas fasting was utterly forbidden on the sabbath.

The obligation of devoting a portion of our time to God, to be employed in his worship and service, is founded on natural right and reason. The law had fixed a sabbath in honor of Saturn, to whom Saturday was consecrated by the pagans. But Plutarch asserts that it was kept in honor of Bacchus, who is called Sabaoth; and because in the festivals of this false deity they used to cry Sabaoth. same person. At any rate, they all seem to have settled in Arabia Felix, probably in the southern part of it; and even if they were originally different persons, yet they would appear to have been at a later period confounded; and such names continue to have been applied equally to the descendants of all. Indeed, in Job i. 15, where the Sabeans are said to have plundered Job, the name seems to stand for Arameans, or Arabrobbers, generally.

The Sheba of Scripture appears to be the Saba of Strabo (xvi. 4. 2), situated towards the southern part of Arabia, at a distance from the coast of the Red sea, the capital of which was Marib, or Mabre; whence Abulfeda affirms that Mabre and Saba were synonymous names. (See Bibl. Repos. No. 8. Art. 2. fourth note.) The queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, (1 Kings x. 1, seq.; 2 Chron. ix. 1, seq.) and made him presents of gold, ivory and costly spices, was most probably the mistress of this region; indeed, the Sabeans were celebrated, on account of their important commerce in these valuable products, among the Greeks also, (Strabo, ibid.) Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 23; Ps. lxx. 10, 15; Joel iii. 8; Job vi. 19. The tradition of this visit of the queen of Sheba to Solomon is founded on this narrative of the Arabs, who call her Balkis, and affirm that she became the wife of Solomon. The 27th Surah of the Koran has taken up this tradition and probably exaggerated it. She is also registered in the series of the sovereigns of Yemen. (Pococke's Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 277.)

It would seem that the two names Seba and Sheba, Heb. סֶבָּה and שְׁבָה, have often been confounded; and hence, Sheba has often been referred to Ethiopia, the proper location of Seba. In this way the queen of Sheba was also often regarded as queen of Ethiopia, even by the Ethiopians themselves, who also have traditions respecting her. See more on this subject under SABA; and also the article ETHIOPIA. R.

SABTAN, the third son of Cush, (Gen. x. 7.) people part of Arabia Felix, where is a city called Saba, and a people called Sabateans.

SABTECHA, fifth son of Cush, who also peopled, as is thought, part of Arabia, or some country toward Assyria, or Armenia, or Caramania; for in all these regions there are names that sound treacherous like Sabtecha, Gen. x. 7.

SACK, SACK-CLOTH. These are pure Hebrew words, and have spread into almost all languages. Sack-cloth is a very coarse stuff, often of hair. In great calamities, in penitence, in trouble, they wore sack-cloth about their bodies, 2 Sam. iii. 31, "Gird yourselves with sack-cloth, and mourn for Abner."—"Let us gird ourselves with sack-cloth; and let us go, and implore the eleency of the king of Israel," 1 Kings xx. 31. Abash rent his clothes, put a shirt of hair cloth next to his skin, fasted, and lay upon sack-cloth, 1 Kings xxi. 27. When Mordecai was informed of the destruction threatened to his nation, he put on sack-cloth, and covered his head with ashes, Esth. iv. Job says, that he sewed a sack over his flesh, chap. xxi. 15. The prophets were often clothed in sack-cloth; and generally in coarse clothing. The Lord bids Isaiah put off the sack-cloth from about his body, and to go naked, Isa. xx. 3. Zechariah says, (xiii. 4.) that false prophets should no longer prophesy in sack-cloth, to deceive the simple. John (Rev. xv. 3) says, that the two prophets of God should prophesy 1260 years, clothed in sack-cloth. Baruch intimates, that this habit of sack-cloth was that in which good people clothed themselves when they went to pray; Jer. iv. 30. But sack-cloth was mourning, as appeared from numerous passages of Scripture; and as is very credible, also, that it was used for enwrapping the dead, when about to be buried. So that its being worn by survivors was a kind of assimilation to the shroud, or dress, of the departed; as its being worn by penitents was an implicit prayer of their guilt exposed them to, that is, death. This we gather from an expression of Chardin, who, in his description of Ispahan, says—"Kel Anayet, the Shah's buffoon, made a shop in the seraglio, 'which he filled with pieces of that coarse kind of stuff of which winding-sheets for the dead are made.' And again—"the sufferers die by hundreds;—mortuary wrapping-cloth is doubled in price." So that, however, in later ages, some eastern nations might bury in linen, yet others still retained the use of a coarser material, that is, sack-cloth.

In times of joy, or on hearing good news, those who were clad in sack-cloth tore it from their bodies, and cast it from them, Ps. xxx. 11.

SACKBUT, a wind musical instrument, like a trumpet, which may be lengthened or shortened. Italian trombone. R.

SACRIFICE was an offering made to God on any altar. It would seem that this differed from oblation; in a sacrifice there was a real change or destruction of the thing offered; whereas an oblation was but a simple offering or gift. As men have always been bound to acknowledge the supremacy and divine dominion of God in the cosmos, and to do whatever begets to them, and as there have always been persons who have conscientiously acquired themselves of this duty; we may affirm, that there have always been sacrifices in the world. Adam and his sons, Noah and his descendants, Moses, Aaron, and his posterity, Job and Melchisedec, before the Mosaic law, offered to God real sacrifices. That law did but settle the quality, the number, and other circumstances of sacrifices. Before that, they offered fruits of the earth, the fat or the milk of animals; the fieshes of sheeps; or the blood and the flesh of victims. Every one pursued his own mode of acknowledgment, his zeal, or his devotion; but among the Jews, the law appointed what they were to offer, and in what quantities. Before the law, every one was priest and minister of his own sacrifice; at least he was at liberty to choose what priest he pleased, in offering his victim. Generally, this honor belonged to the most ancient, or the head of a family, or to a prince, or to men of the greatest virtue and integrity. But after Moses, this was, among the Jews, confined to the family of Aaron.

It is disputed, whether, at first, there were any other sacrifices than burnt-offerings: no other appear in Scripture. The Talmudists assure us, that Abel offered only holocausts, consuming the flesh of the victim by fire; because it was not allowed to eat it. Grotius is of opinion, that this patriarch did not offer a bloody sacrifice. The text of Moses informs us, (Gen. iv. 4.) that he offered "of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof.

We are told by Servius, that the ancients put no fire to sacrifices, but obtained it by their prayers; and most of the fathers think it was thus that God accepted the sacrifice of Abel: he consumed it, say they, by fire from heaven; which favor was not vouchsafed to Cain's sacrifice. In the same manner he consumed the sacrifices offered at Aaron's consecration, those offered by Gideon, those offered by Solomon, at the dedication of his temple, those of Elijah on mount Carmel, and those offered by the SACRIFICE

Maccabees, at restoring the worship of the temple, after the proscription by Antiochus Epiphanes.

The Hebrews had properly but three sorts of sacrifices: (1) the burnt-offering or holocaust; (2) the sacrifice for sin, or sacrifice of expiation; (3) the pacific sacrifice, or sacrifice of thanksgiving. Besides these, there were several kinds of offerings, of corn, of meal, of cakes, of wine, of fruits; and one manner of sacrificing, which has no relation to any now mentioned, that is, the setting at liberty one of the two sparrows offered for the purification of leprous persons; (Lev. xiv. 4, 5, &c.) also the scape-goat, which was taken to a distant and steep place, whence it was thrown, Lev. xvi. 10, 26. These animals, thus left to themselves, were esteemed victims of expiation, loaded with the sins of those who offered them.

The holocaust was offered and burnt up, on the altar of burnt-offerings, without any reserve to the person who gave the victim, or to the priest who killed and sacrificed it; only the priest had the skin; for before the sacrifices were offered to the Lord, their skins were flayed off, and their feet and entrails were washed. (See Lev. vii. 8.)

The sacrifice for sin, or for expiation, or the purification of a man who had fallen into any offence against the law, was not entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. No part of it returned to him who had given it, but the sacrificing priest had a share of it. If it were the high-priest who had offended through ignorance, he offered a calf without blemish; he brought it to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the sacrifice, confessed his sin, asked pardon for it, killed the calf, &c. (See Lev. iv. v.) If it were the whole people which had offended, they were to offer a calf, in like manner. The elders shall bring it to the altar of the tabernacle, shall put their hands upon its head, confess their offence, &c. If it be a prince of the people who had offended, he shall offer a goat, shall bring it to the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon its head, shall confess his sin, &c. Calmet remarks, that though Moses orders a goat, it is understood, that they might offer a ram. (See Lev. vii. 1—4, and compare Lev. v. 6, 7.) If it be a private person who has committed an offence, he shall make an offering of a he-goat, without blemish, shall present it to the priest at the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon the head of the sacrifice. The priest shall sacrifice it, &c. (See Lev. iv. v.) But if he be not of ability to offer a sheep, or a she-goat, he shall offer two turtledoves or two young pigeons; one for his sin, and the other for a burnt-offering. That is which for the burnt-offering, shall be entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. That is which to be offered for his sin, shall be presented to the priest, who shall kill it, &c. If the person was extremely poor, he might offer the tenth part of an ephah of meal, that is, a little more than a gallon of meal, without oil or spice. He presented it to the priest, who took a handful of it, and threw it on the fire: the rest was for himself. (For other circumstances belonging to this subject, see Lev. v. 15, 16; vi. 1—3.) When a ram was offered, his rump, or tail, was burnt along with the rest of the fat. But if it were a goat, the fat only was burnt, Lev. vii. 2, 3. See Rump.

The peace-offering was offered to return thanks to God for benefits; or to solicit favors from him; or to satisfy private devotion; or simply, for the honor of God. The Israelites offered this when they pleased; no law obliged them to it. They were free to choose what animal they would, among such as were allowed to be sacrificed. No distinction was of age, or sex, of the victim, as in the burnt sacrifice and the sacrifices for sin, Lev. iii. The law required that the victim should be without blemish. He who presented it came to the door of the temple, put his hand on the head of the victim, and it. The priest poured out the blood about the burnt sacrifices: he burnt on the fire of the fat of the lower belly, that which covers theneys, the liver and the bowels. And if it be lamb, or a ram, he added to it the rump of the animal, which, in that country, is very fat. Before things were committed to the fire of the altar, the priest put them into the hands of the officers, and made him lift them up on high, and wave toward the four quarters of the world, the priest were offering and directing his hands. The breast, right shoulder of the sacrifice belonged to the priest that performed the service; and it appears, that the rest of them were put into the hands of him who purchased; though Moses mentions only the breast animal. After this, all the rest of the sacrificed went to him who presented it, and he might dispose of it with his family and friends, at his pleasure, Lev. 30, &c. The sacrifices or offerings of meat, or which were offered for sin, were in favor of the sort, who could not afford to sacrifice an ox, or sheep, Lev. vi. 14, &c. They contented themselves with offering meat or flour, sprinkled with oil, or spices. A priest, taking a handful of this flour, with frankincense, sprinkled it on the fire of the altar, and the rest of the flour was his own: he eat it without leaven in the tabernacle, and no priests were to partake of it. As to other things, fruits, wine, meal, wafers, or any thing else, they always cast a part on the altar, the rest belonged to him and the other priests. These offerings were always accompanied with salt and wine, but without leaven, Lev. ii.

Sacrifices, in which they set at liberty a big goat, were not properly such; because there was no shedding of blood, and the victim remained. E.g., the sparrow offered for the purification of a leper, and the two sparrows, offered for the sin of the entire community, are about the same. A pair of sparrows were presented to the priests, with a bundle of hyssop, and the scarlet string. The priest killed one of them over running water, which was in a clean vessel; he took the other, and poured it into the bundle of cedar and hyssop, with the blood towards the handle of the vessel, he plunged the water mingled with the blood of the firrow; sprinkled the leper, or the house, with the living sparrow at liberty, to go pleased.

The other animal set at liberty was a goat: day of solemn expiation. See Goats, Scape.

Sacrifices of birds were offered on three occasions.

(1.) For sin, when the person offering was not enough to provide an animal for a victim, Lev. viii. (2.) For purification of a woman after her period, Lev. xii. 6, 7. When she could offer a lamb, or a young pigeon; she gave both: the lamb for a burnt-offering, the pigeon for a sin-offering. But were not able to offer a lamb, she gave a young turtledove, or a pair of young pigeons; one for a burnt-offering, the other for a sin-offering. (3.) Offered two sparrows for those who were...
from the leprocy; one was a burnt-offering, the other was a cæpe-sparrow, as above, Lev. xiv. 4, &c. 49—51.

For the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, see Passover.

The perpetual sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 38—40; Num. xxvii. 3), was a daily offering of two lambs on the altar of burnt-offerings; one in the morning, the other in the evening. They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer. The lamb of the morning was offered about sunrise, after the incense was burnt on the golden altar, and before any other sacrifice. That in the evening was offered between the two evenings; that is, at the decline of day, and before night. With each of these victims was offered half a pint of wine, half a pint of the purest oil, and an amaranth, or about five pints, of the finest flour.

Such were the sacrifices of the Hebrews; sacrifices, indeed, very imperfect, and altogether incapable in themselves, to purify the soul! Paul has described these and other ceremonies of the law, "as shadow and begging elements," Gal. iv. 9. They represented grace and purity, but they did not communicate it. They convinced the sinner of the necessity to purify himself, and make satisfaction to God; but they did not impart sweetness to him: The sacrifices were only prophecies and figures of the true sacrifice, which eminently includes all their virtues and qualities; being at the same time holocaust, a sacrifice for sin, and a sacrifice of thanksgiving; containing the whole substance and efficacy of those ancient sacrifices, were only representations. The paschal lamb, the daily burnt-offerings, the offerings of flour and wine, and all other oblations, of whatever nature, promised and represented the death of Jesus Christ. See further on Covenant.

The sacrifice of a humble and contrite heart is that which, on our part, constitutes the whole merit of what we can offer to God, Ps. li. 17. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. The Jews, without these dispositions, could not present any offering acceptable to God; and he often explains himself on this matter in the prophets, Ps. xi. 6: Isa. li. 14; Jer. xxiv. 15; Amos v. 21, 22; Hos. xiv. 2—4; Joel ii. 12; Zec. i. 26; Ps. li. 17.

The very natural notion common to mankind, that whatever we most value must be offered to God, has prevailed in several nations, so far as to induce them to offer human sacrifices. But it is not agreed who first established this custom. Some ascribe it to Ilius, or Saturn, who, they say, practised it among the Phoenicians, offering up to the gods his own son Jehoud, whom he had by the nymph Anahbreth. Philo insinuates that the custom of offering such sacrifices was known in Canaan before Abraham; and some learned men think, that the example of these people abated much of that horror Abraham would otherwise have had, at the intention of sacrificing his own son. But it is much more probable that Abraham's example, misunderstood and ill applied, gave rise to this custom. Some learned men have thought, that among the Canaanites and Moabites, they contented themselves with making their children pass through the flames, between two fires, which they called austercy procession. No doubt they often did so; but often they really consumed them in the flames. Moses (Lev. xviii. 21) forbids this practice, though we afterwards read of a son of king Ahaz, who had been offered to Moloch, and yet reigned after his father, 2 Kings xvi. 3, compared with ch. xvii. 1.

In Lev. xx. 1—3, it is said, "Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed to Moloch, he shall surely be put to death, the people of the land shall stone him with stones. And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Moloch, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. And if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Moloch, and kill him not, then I will set my face against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, to commit whoredom with Moloch, from among their people." Moses repeats the same in Lev. xx. 10. It appears, however, from Amos v. 26, that the people did not forbear, even in the desert, to carry with them a tent consecrated to Moloch.

It is beyond all doubt that the Canaanites put their children to death in honor of their gods. Ps. ci. 17. Jeremiah (xix. 5) says, "They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire, for burnt-offerings unto Baal." (See also chap. xxxii. 35.) For these crimes God drove out the Canaanites. (See Deut. xxi. 10, 11.) When God, by the treaty he made with them, he obliged them to renounce the custom of sacrificing their children to Saturn; and Justin assures us, that Darius imposed the same command on them by an embassy, to leave off human sacrifices. But notwithstanding this, they continued them till the proconsulate of Tiberius, who caused the priests of Saturn to be hanged on trees around their temples. Diodorus Siculus gives a description of Saturn, as adored by the Carthaginians: the figure was of brass; the hands of which were turned backward, and bending toward the ground; so that when they put upon his arms a child, to be consecrated to him, he immediately fell into a pan of burning coals beneath, and died miserably at the foot of the statue. It would be to little purpose to accumulate examples of human victims. Porphyry assures us, that the book of Sanchoniathon was full of them. They were frequent, not only in Phoenicia, in Palestine, in the countries of Ammon and Moab, in Idumæa, in Arabia, and in Egypt; but also in Gaul, among the Scythians, the Thracians, in the islands of Rhodes, Chios and Cyprus; even among the Athenians; and also in India, the South seas, and America. In Deut. xxi. 10, we have been practised in all parts of the world, with very few exceptions.

As to what is affirmed, that Ahab had the same son for his successor, whom he had caused to pass through the fires for Moloch, is nothing given of this. It is true, his successor was Heresiah; but he might have had several other sons. We know another of his sons, whose name was Measiah, who was put to death at the command of the king of Israel, 2 Chron. xxi. 5.

Sacrilege, the action of profaning holy things, or of committing outrage against holy things, or holy persons. Theft, or abuse, or profanation of sacred things, is sacrilege. Scripture gives the name of sacrilege to idolatry, and to other crimes which more knowledge of the holy (or saints) is understanding."

Prov. xxx. 3. "I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy, or saints." Ps. xxxiv. 9. "O fear the Lord, ye his saints; for there is no want to them that fear him." Ps. xvi. 2, 3. "My goodness extendeth not to thee, but to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight." Saints is often put for angels: (Job v. 1.) "To which of the saints wilt thou turn?" And, behold, he putteth no trust in his saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight," chap. xv. 15. Daniel says, (iv. 13, 23.) "An holy one (or saint) came down from heaven." And Moses, (Deut. xxxiii. 3, 4.) "The Lord shed forth from mount Paran, and came with ten thousands of saints." See Holy.

SALAH, or SALEH, son of Arphaxad, born in the thirty-fifth year of his father, A. M. 1033. He begat Eber at thirty years old, and died, aged 433 years, A. M. 2126, Gen. xi. 12, 13.

SALAMIS, the chief city of the island of Cyprus, visited by Paul and Barnabas, A. D. 44, when they converted Sergius Paulus, Acts xii. 5. It was situated on a south-eastern promontory of the island, and was afterwards called Constantia.

SALATHIEL, son of Jeconiah, and father of Zerubbabel, (1 Chron. iii. 17.) died at Babylon during the captivity. He was also son of Neri, according to Luke iii. 27, who makes him to have descended from Solomon by Nathan; whereas Matthew (i. 12) derives him from Solomon by Rehoboam. In Salathiel were united the two branches of this illustrious genealogy; so that Salathiel was, according to Calmet, son to Jeconiah, according to the flesh, as appears from the Chronicles, which say, that Jeconiah had two sons, Assir and Salathiel, at Babylon; and son of Neri by adoption, or by having married the heiress of Neri's family; or as issue of the widow of Neri, he being dead without children. In either of these cases it would be son of Neri according to the law. Luke does not say in what sense he was son to Neri. See Gentile, and Adoption.

SALCHA, a city of the kingdom of Og, in the country of Bashan, beyond Jordan, toward the northern extremity of the portion of Manasseh, Deut. iii. 10; 1 Chron. v. 11; Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11.

I. SALEM, peace, a name given to Jerusalem, which see.

II. SALEM, a city of the Shechemites, where Jacob arrived at his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 18. Eusebius and Jerome notice this city; but some commentators translate the Hebrew, "Jacob came safe and sound to a city of Shechem." See Shechem, and Shechemites.

III. SALEM, or SALIM, a place where John the Baptist baptized on the Jordan, (John iii. 23.) the situation of which, however, is unknown.

SALMANESER, see SHALMANESER.

SALMON, son of Nahson, married Rahab, by whom he had Boaz. A. M. 3553, 1 Chron. ii. 11, 51, 54; Ruth iv. 20, 21; Matt. i. 4. He is named "the father of Bethlehem?" that is, his descendants peoples Bethlehem; or he greatly improved and adorned it: he was, as we say, "the making of that town" or he was the chief man, by office; the Abyssinian shum of a town.

SALMONE, or SALMONE, the name of a promontory which forms the eastern extremity of the isle of Crete, Acts xxvii. 7.

I. SALOME, daughter of Antipater, and sister of Herod the Great, one of the most wicked of women. She first married Joseph, whom she accused of adultery with Mariamne, wife of Herod, and thus procured his death. She afterward married Philip, but being disguised with him, she put him away, a license till then unheard of among the Jews, whose law (says Josephus) allows men to put away their wives, but does not allow women equal liberty. After this, she accused him of treason against Herod, who put him to death. She caused much division and trouble in Herod's family, by her calumnies and mischief informations; and she may be considered as the chief author of the death of the princes Alexander and Aristobulus, and of their mother Mariamne. She afterwards conceived a violent passion for an Arabian prince, called Silius, whom she would have married against her brother Herod's consent; and even after she had married Alexas, her inclination for Silius was notorious. Salome survived Herod, who left her by will, the cities of Jamnia, Azoth and Phasaelis, with 50,000 pieces of money. She favored Antipas against Archelaus, and died A. D. 8, a little after Archelaus had been banished to Vienne in Dauphiny. Salome was five children by Alexas--Berenice, Antipater, Calles, and a son and a daughter, whose names are not mentioned. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. 4--xvii. cap. 8.)

II. SALOME, a daughter of Herod the Great and Euphia, who married one of the sons of Phereoros. (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 1.)

III. SALOME, the dancer, daughter of Herodias, and of Herod-Philip, first married Philip, her uncle, and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had three sons, Lacedaemon, Agrippa and Aristobulus. (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 7.) When Herodias left Philip, her daughter Salome accompanied her, and by her cunning procured the death of John the Baptist. See Antipas i., and Herodias.

Nicophorus and Metaphrastes state that Salome accompanied her mother Herodias, and her father-in-law Herod, in their banishment to Vienne in Dauphiny; and that the emperor having obliged them to go into Spain, as she passed over a river that was frozen, the ice broke under her feet, and she sunk in up to her neck; when the ice uniting again, she remained thus suspended by it, and suffered the same punishment she had made John the Baptist undergo. But some of the ancients mention this; and it is contrary to Eusebius, who tells us Philip married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, who died about A. D. 33 or 34, and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, her cousin-german, by whom she had several children. She was thirty years after the exile of her father-in-law.

IV. SALOME, wife of Zebedee, mother of James Major and John the Evangelist, one of those holy women who attended our Saviour in his journeys, and ministered to him, Matt. xxvii. 56. She requested of Jesus, that her two sons, James and John, might sit one on his right hand, and the other on his left hand, when he should possess his kingdom; (comp. Matt. xxvii. 56, with Mark xvi. 40,) but the Son of God answered, "Ye know not what ye ask; to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared by my Father." Salome gave a strong proof of her faith, when she followed Christ to Calvary, and did not forsake him even at the cross, Mark xvi. 40; Matt. xxvii. 55, 56. She was also one of those women who brought perfume to embalm him, and who came for this pur-
The country of Samaria lies between Judea and Galilee. It begins, according to Josephus, at a town called Gines, in the great plain, and ends at the town of Ebal, in the plains of Amonens. Samaria, under the first temple, was the name of a city; under the second, of a country. Rabbi Benjamin, of Tudele, says, "Sebaste is Samaria, where the palace of Ahab, king of Israel, is still known. Now that city was on a mountain, and well fortified, had springs, well watered land, gardens, paradises, vineyards and oliveyards. Distant eight miles is Neapolis, that is, Sychem, in mount Ephraim. It is seated in a valley between the mountains Gerizim and Ebal; in it are about a hundred Cutheans, observing the law of Moses only; they are called Samaritans; and have priests of the seed of Aaron. They sacrifice in the temple on mount Gerizim on the day of the passover, and on feast days on the altar built there of the stones set up by the children of Israel, when they passed over Jordan."

The following is the account of the modern city, as given by Richardson: "Its situation is extremely beautiful, and strong by nature; more so, I think, than Jerusalem. It stands on a large, insulated hill, surrounded all round by a broad, deep valley; and, when fortified, as it is stated to have been by Herod, one would have imagined, that in the ancient system of warfare, nothing but genius would have reduced such a place. The valley is surrounded by four hills, one on each side, which are cultivated in terraces to the top, sown with grain and planted with fig and olive-trees, as is also the valley. The hill of Samaria, likewise, rises in terraces to a height equal to any of the adjoining mountains.

"The present village is small and poor, and, after passing the valley, the ascent to it is very steep; but, viewed from the station of our tents, it is extremely interesting, both from its natural situation, and from the picturesque remains of a ruined conven of good Gothic architecture.

"Having passed the village, towards the middle of the first terrace, there is a number of columns still standing. I counted twelve in one row, besides several that stood apart, the brotherless remains of other rows. The situation is extremely delightful, and my guide informed me that they belonged to the serai or palace. On the next terrace there are no remains of solid building, but heaps of stone and lime, and a few pieces of architecture in great profusion. Ascending to the third, or highest terrace, the traces of former buildings were not so numerous, but we enjoyed a delightful view of the surrounding country. The eye passed over the deep valley that compasses the hill of Sebaste, and rested on the mountains beyond, that retreated as they rose with a gentle slope, and met the view in every direction, like a book laid out for perusal on a writing desk.

"From this lofty eminence we descended to the south side of the hill, where we saw the remains of a stately colonnade, that stretches along this beautiful exposure from east to west. Sixty columns are still standing in one row; the shafts are plain, and fragments of Ionic vultus, that lie scattered about, testify the order to which they belong. These are probably the relics of some of the magnificent structures with which Herod the Great adorned Samaria. None of the walls remain."

SAMARITANS. The account given of these people by Calmet is extremely prolix, and by no means accurate. We shall, therefore, omit it entirely, and supply its place by a narrative deduced from sources, many of which were not known at the time when Calmet wrote. The Samaritans were descended from the remnant of the Israelites who were taken into captivity, and afterwards intermixed with Gentiles from the neighboring parts of Assyria, especially the Cuthi, who had come to colonize and occupy the vacant situations of the former inhabitants. In this new colony idolatry was introduced and permitted from the very first; yet so as to worship Jehovah in conjunction with the false gods, 2 Kings xvii. 29. When, afterwards, Cyrus permitted the Jews to return from captivity and rebuild their temple, the Samaritans, who wished to form a union in religious matters with the Jews, requested that the temple might be erected at the common labor and expense of both nations. But Zerubbabel, and the other Jewish rulers, rejected their request, urging that Cyrus had committed the work to them only, and had charged the governors of Samaria to keep away from the place, and only assist the Jews out of the public revenues of the province. The Samaritans, however, said they were at liberty to worship there, since the temple had been erected for the worship of the Supreme Being by all the human race. When the Samaritans had received this repulse from the Jews, they felt much mortified, and laid wait for revenge; they endeavored to obstruct the restoration of the temple, and the increase and prosperity of the Jewish state by various methods. Hence originated a mutual hatred between the nations, which was afterwards kept up and increased by the revolt of Manasseh, and the erection of the temple on mount Gerizim. For Manasseh, a brother of Jaddus, the high-priest, had, contrary to the laws and customs of the nation, taken in marriage the daughter of Sanballat, the ruler of Samaria, (Neb. xiii. 23, seq.) and when the Jews, indignant at this, had ordered that he should divorce her as an alien, or no longer approach to the altar and the sacred institutions, he fled to his father-in-law, a high-priest, who alienated many from the religious worship of the Jews, and by gifts and promises drew over great numbers, and even some of the priests, to the Samaritan party. But now that the temple was erected on mount Gerizim, still greater contentions arose between the Jews and Samaritans concerning the place of divine worship. For the Samaritans denied that the sacred rites at Jerusalem were pure and of divine ordination: but of the temple at Gerizim they affirmed that it was holy, legitimate, and sanctioned by the presence of the Deity. The Samaritans, moreover, only received the books of Moses. The rest of the sacred books (since they vindicated the divine worship at Jerusalem) they rejected, as also the whole body of the traditions, keeping solely to the letter. From these causes the Jews were inflamed to the most rancorous hatred towards this rival nation; inasmuch that to many of them the Samaritans were objects of greater detestation than even the Gentiles. (See Luke x. 33.) It is no wonder, then, that there should have been such a constant reciprocity of injuries and calamities as had served to keep up a perpetual exasperation between the two nations. The fault, however, was not all on the side of the Jews; for (as we learn from Bartonus ad Roscherania, i. 2, cited by Schoettgen) the Samaritans inflamed this enmity by taking every opportunity of injuring, or at least offering provocations to the Jews. The following account as an example:—""When the time of the new moon was just at hand, the Jews had a fire kindled on the highest mountains, the same reason, which induced them to reject the other Scriptural books, (from which we should, perhaps, except that of Joshua,) would also have induced them to reject the Pentateuch itself, had they not been antecedently in possession of it, and therefore been most fully assured, that it was not a production of late date: since, therefore, their defection from Judah and Benjamin occurred in the reign of Jeroboam, we must, on this account, conclude it to have been edited long before, and to have been in circulation before the separation of the tribes. If then they thus had the books of Moses, we may argue them to have been acquainted with those Psalms of David, which had been sung in the tabernacle and the temple, and those Psalms were replete with the expectations of the Messiah. Consequently, after their accension from Judah, they could not have failed to have carried away with them these vivid hopes and ardent expectations, and to have transmitted them to their descendants. What, then, is more natural, than to suppose, that when they rejected the other canonical books, they ingratiate these ideas, elsewhere recorded, in their interpretations of them,—or, in fact, they must have seen the promises partially accomplished in the extent of dominion which David and Solomon acquired. That passover, which was celebrated, in the days of Josiah, which Israel ex- tend to Jerusalem, (2 Kings xlix.) 2 Chron. xxxv.) manifestly proves to us, how deeply the true religion was rooted in those who had not deflected from it, and likewise offers to us an epoch, to which we may refer the first of the three hypotheses. To this we may also add that period, when the second temple was erected, during which there was an intercourse between the Jews and the Samaritans, (Jos. Ant. xii. 17.) who, doubtless, imparted to the Samaritans these opinions, in which they had been educated. These periods, therefore, either separately or conjointly, are adequate to the solution of the difficulty; nor can we err in maintaining, that at one, or another, or all of these, the doctrines and expectations of Judah respecting the Messiah were circulated in Samaria.

We have no reason to believe, that those who selected Gerizim as their place of religious worship, in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, were infected with idolatry: the sacred page authorizes us not in such cases to retract the allegations to a legitimate and historical source. We are no where informed to what deity Sanballat dedicated his temple; we nowhere read of its appropriation to idols. Josephus says nothing of Manasseh's apostacy; those who relate the Samaritan temple to Ephraim were dedicated to the true God. Had it been dedicated to an Assyrian idol, or to the Baal-Berith, who once had a temple at Sichem, and, like the Zeus θεός of the Greeks, and Deus Filius of the Romans, was accounted the God of oaths and covenants, can we suppose, that so many Jews, just emigrated from Babylonian oppression, would have flocked to it, or have followed the priesthood and fortunes of Manas-
s? More than a hundred and sixty years after its erection, the Jewish historian called it θεός των αγαθων; could he have so called it, if it had been dedicated to an idol?

Our more immediate inquiry, however, respects the Samaritans after the erection of Sanballat's temple; between whom and the Jews they chief points of dispute lay, in their rejection of all the canonical books, except the Pentateuch, and their affirmation, that Gerizim was the only place where God could be acceptably worshipped. Cæleus, Hottinnes, and even Harold, in some remarks, have been led astray on this point; the fable of the brazen bird, which the Romans erected on Gerizim, on the authority of the Samaritan chronicle, if it were not the Roman eagle, was evidently a tradition compounded of the news of the men of Hamath, and the war of those of Ava. Some of their statements, indeed, refer their first copy of the law to the thirteenth year after the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan, which they aver to have been made by Ahiahu, the son of Phinehas; but this can only be regarded as an idle pretension, which is not even accredited by all the Samaritans. Of the antiquity of their copies there can be no doubt, any more than of the frauds, of which they were guilty in certain passages. Yet, although they have corrupted the Pentateuch by occasional interpolations, the value of their copy is evinced by some readings, which appear to supply lacunae in the Hebrew, and by the great accordance between its chronology and that of the Septuagint. The Jews admit, that Ezra aban- doned the old Samaritan characters, and introduced the Assyrian, or Chaldee, wherefore the Samaritans still call theirs the Hebrew, or the characters of the Sacred language, and say, that "the Jewish Books were written by Ezra." So violent has the animosity respecting the Pentateuch ever been be- tween these two claimants of it, that when Sasdiah's Arabic version appeared, (whom they designate as the doctor of Psalm,) Abu Said was deputed to commence a Samaritan-Arabic version in opposition to it, a copy of which is in the Bibliothèque du Roi, at Paris.

Maimonides himself, who, perhaps, was the most unbiased writer among the Jews, and who represented the right practice of the law, and, even whilst he is relating the tale of the dove, evidently seems disinclined to believe it. Josephus also, (Ant. ix. 14.) bore the same testimony to them.

So scrupulous were they still respecting the institutes of the lawgiver, that on the sabbaths they kindled no fires, nor even on their festivals; they affirm their priests to be Levites, but regret that they have no high-priest of the race of Phinehas, offering, in their epistles, should such an individual be found, to install him in the order of the allegation to a legitimate and historical source. We are no where informed to what deity Sanballat dedicated his temple; we nowhere read of its appropriation to idols. Josephus says nothing of Manasseh's apostacy; those who relate the Samaritan temple to Ephraim were dedicated to the true God. Had it been dedicated to an Assyrian idol, or to the Baal-Berith, who once had a temple at Sichem, and, like the Zeus θεός of the Greeks, and Deus Filius of the Romans, was accounted the God of oaths and covenants, can we suppose, that so many Jews, just emigrated from Babylonian oppression, would have flocked to it, or have followed the priesthood and fortunes of Manas-
s? More than a hundred and sixty years after its erection, the Jewish historian called it θεός των αγαθων; could he have so called it, if it had been dedicated to an idol?

considerable number of copies of the Samaritan Pentateuch. We saw also the relic of the Polyglott Bible mentioned by Maunder. The Bible of the Samaritans contains only the five books of Moses. They have, however, Joshua and Judges, but in separate books. They say that since Joshua there has been no prophet. He was the disciple of Moses, and inferior to him. David was king in Jerusalem, but not a prophet. We inquired whether the Samaritans held it lawful to read the books of Christians. They said there was no law against it, and we left with them one Testament in Arabic, and another in Hebrew." 8 R.

SAMGAR-NEBO, a general officer in Nebuchadnezzar's army, Jerem. xxxix. 3.

SAMLAL, king of Maacerah, in Idumea, Gen. xxxvi. 36.

SAMOS, an island of the Archipelago, on the coast of Asia Minor, opposite Lydia, from which it is separated by a narrow strait. The island was devoted to the worship of Juno, who had there a magnificent temple. It was also celebrated for its valuable potteries, and as the birth-place of Pythagoras. The Romans wrote to the governor in favor of the Jews, in the time of Simon Maccabaeus, 1 Mac. xvi. 33. Paul landed here when going to Jerusalem, A. D. 56, Acts xx. 15.

SAMOTHRACIA, an island in the Eganean sea; so called because it was peopled by Samians and Thraceans. It was an asylum for fugitives and criminals. Paul, departing from Troas, for Macedonia, arrived first at Samothrace, Acts xvi. 11.

SAMSON, son of Manoah, of the tribe of Dan, Judg. xiii. 2, &c. A. M. 2648. His mother had been long barren, when an angel of the Lord appeared to her, telling her she should have a son; but she must take care not to drink intoxicating liquor, or to eat any impure food; that she must use the same care with regard to her son; and must consecrate him to God from his infancy, as a Nazarite, and not let a razor come upon his head: adding, "For he shall begin to deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines." Samson was born in the following year, and the Spirit of God gave him extraordinary strength of body. One day, as he went to Timnath, a Philistine city, he saw a young woman, whom he desired, and married her. For him and his wife. They demonstrated that she was not of their own nation; but he persevered, and the young woman was contracted to him. Upon a subsequent journey to Timnath, he saw a young lion, which he seized, and carried it home, and ate of it for his food. He had been a youth and a child; and some time after, returning thither, to celebrate his marriage, he stepped aside to see the carcass of the lion. He found it dried up, and a swarm of bees lodged in it, which had there formed a honeycomb, of which he took a part. At his wedding-feast he proposed a riddle to this effect:

"The greedy eater yields to others meat, And savage strength now offers lascivious sweet." His companions continued to the seventh day, lost in conjecturing its meaning; when, partly by threats, and partly by entreaties, they urged the bride to get the secret from her husband. Before sunset on this day they came to Samson saying,

"What sweeter flows than honey o'er the tongue? Whose strength exceeds a lion's, wild and young?"

His reply was, that if they had not ploughed with his heifer they could not have expounded his riddle; meaning that they had abused him by too intimate familiarity with his wife, and that she had been unfaithful to him.

He paid the fine expected on account of the riddle, but left his wife, and returned to his father. Some time after, the woman married the principal bridegroom at her former wedding, and Samson's anger being subsided, he returned to see her, bringing a kid with him as a present. But her father refusing to admit him, he went and caught three hundred foxes or jackals, (see Fox,) which he tied tail to tail, putting between each pair a fire-brand, which he fired, and turned them into the corn-fields of the Philistines; where the flames made a great havoc, not sparing even the vines and the olive-trees. When the Philistines knew it was Samson who had done this, to revenge the affront received from his father-in-law at Timnath, they burned the man and his daughter.

In a combat, Samson slew a great number of Philistines. The narrative of this exploit (Judg. xv. 8.) cannot but appear obscure to the English reader, as, indeed, it has been thought by translators in general. Samson smote the Philistines "hip and thigh, with a great slaughter." Hip under thigh, say some; leg under thigh, say others; or leg against thigh, or leg over, or upon, thigh; as the words literally express. These are not all the varieties of interpretation which this passage has experienced. Mr. Taylor proposes to illustrate the expression by the following extract:

"It appears probable, from the following circumstances, that the exercise of wrestling, as it is now performed by the Turks, is in every respect that was anciently used in the Olympic games. For, besides the previous covering of the palæstra with sand, that the combatants might fall with more safety, they have theirellowen basse, or master wrestler, who like the 'spargitores' of old, is to observe and superintend over the jura palæstrae, and to be the umpire in all disputes. The combatants, after they are anointed all over with oil, to render their naked bodies the more slippery, and less easily be taken hold of, first of all look one another steadfastly in the face, as Diomedes or Ulysses does the palladium upon antique gems; then they run up to, and retire from, each other several times, using all the while a variety of antics and other postures, such as are commonly used in the course of wrestling; then they seize upon each other, as Diomedes and Ulysses draw nearer together, and challenge each other, by 'clapping the palms of their hands first upon their own knees or thighs, then upon each other, and afterwards upon the palms of their respective antagonists. The combatants having thus been made acquainted, immediately close in and struggle with each other, striving with all their strength, art and dexterity, (which are often very extraordinary,) who shall give his antagonist a fall, and become the conqueror. During these contests I have often seen their arms, and legs, and thighs, so twisted and linked together, (cænades palæstrae, as Propertius calls it,) that they have both fallen together, and left the victory dubious; too difficult sometimes for the pellorinan basse to decide. Palæstræ in antiquity occurs in ancient inscriptions, (Murrat. tom. ii. page 627.) The παλαιστρῆ, therefore, being thus acted in all the parts of it with open hands, might very properly, in contradiction to the caestus, or boxing, receive its name απὸ τὸν παλαιστρῶν, from struggling with open hands. We have a most lively picture of this ancient gymnastic exercise upon an antique urn, in Patini's Imp. Roman. Numismat. page 128; and likewise upon a coin of Trebonianus Gallus, the figure of which is.
a descendant of Kohath, and Samuel himself dwelt there the greater part of his time.

The circumstances connected with the birth and early life of Samuel are of a peculiarly interesting nature. It was at the time when Eli was residing as high-priest at Shiloh, that Hannah, the wife of Elkanah, having a normal and fruitful first at Shiloh, availed herself of an opportunity to "pour out her soul" before God, at the tabernacle; requesting the removal of the reproach so daily suffered from Peninnah, her copartner in the embraces, though far inferior in the affections, of Elkanah, by the bestowal of a son. The fervent, yet silent manner of her appeal induced Eli to mistake her emotions for intoxication, with which he precipitately accused her; but upon the circumstance being explained, he ascribed it to the grace and changed the language of unbelief into that of benediction. The acceptance of Hannah's prayer was at length corroborated by the birth of a son, whom her piety and her gratitude concurred to name Samuel, that is, "asked of God," having been devoted to a Nazarite from his infancy, in compliance with his mother's vow when she asked him of the Lord, he was, while in his infancy, presented to Eli, for the service of the tabernacle, by whom he was invested with the distinguishing epibol, etc., etc.

The extraordinary character of Samuel soon began to be developed, in a commission which he received immediately from heaven, to denounced his displeasure against Eli, for his criminal impiety in regard to his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, whose libertinism was scarcely repressed, and not at all restrained, by parental authority. The spirit of the aged priest upon the occasion demands notice, and the reproofs with which he charged him, "let him do what seemeth him good." The appearance of a prophet like Samuel in this period of suspended revelations, awakening in the bosoms of the almost despoothing Israelites the liveliest anticipations; they industriously adopted measures to disenfranchise themselves from Philistine subjugation; but they were defeated with the loss of four thousand men. As they imputed this disaster to the absence of the ark, it was fetched into the camp amidst great excitement and overawed the Philistines, the loss of thirty thousand foot, (among whom were Hophni and Phinehas,) and above all of the ark, which the enemy captured: intelligence of which latter calamity being suddenly communicated to Eli, he fell backwards "and had a neck broken, and he died." The Philistines had but little cause to triumph in the captivity of the ark. This sacred possession was carried into the temple of Dagon, to whom they ascribed their victory; and the priests, upon entering the national shrine, the next morning, found their god fallen to the ground before the ark. Imputing this circumstance to accident, they again set up the statue. The following day the image was discovered again fallen, and the head and hands broken upon the threshold of his own temple, so as to leave the trunk only remaining. The people themselves were smitten with grievous bodily diseases, which pursued them from city to city, wherever they transported the ark, until they restored it, with commemorative offerings, to the Israelites. (see 1 Sam., chap. vi.)

The captivity of the ark, and the consequent suspension of the public services at Shiloh, tended to the increasing debauchery and dégénération of the people, which only stimulated our eminent prophet and ruler to exert his energies to accomplish a general reformation, by whose means an assembly was at length convened at Mizpeh, for the purpose of publicly renouncing their sins, and returning to God by fasting, humiliation, sacrifice and prayer. This solemnity excited the apprehensions of their enemies, who accordingly determined upon frustrating their plans; by coming suddenly upon Samuel and the people at Mizpeh, and their consequent reconciliation to offended goodness immediate, the Supreme Being declared himself in their favor after Samuel's sacrifice and intercession: the Philistines were panic-struck by a tremendous thunder-storm, and by their flight and dispersion enabled the pursuers of Israelites ultimately to dictate terms of peace; in commemoration of which deliverance, Samuel erected a monumental memorial, which he called Ebenezer, or "the stone of help." While victory had now rendered the Israelites secure from external attacks, the proper administration of justice, by their illustrious governor, conferred upon them internal prosperity and happiness. Samuel exercised his judicial authority with vigilance and advantage to all classes of the community, and by annual circuits took upon himself the inspection and regulation of civil affairs. He moreover erected a public altar of worship, as the best substitution for the deserted ordinances of Shiloh; with the proceeds of which he had been instructed and endowed in the cities of the Levites, which were diffused through the different tribes, for the sake of facilitating the plan of general instruction. In these seminaries the prophets devoted themselves to the study of the law, were taught the art of prophecy, and awaited the call into public life under the superintendence of one of the same class, venerable for wisdom or years. Age, however, relaxed the vigor of his administration; and Samuel, in consequence of appointing his two sons, Joel and Abish, to execute his office, was much grieved by the complaints of the elders, that he had devolved it into unworthy hands. He was in consequence solicited to appoint a king over them, that they might enjoy a similar form of government to that of other nations. This was no doubt as offensive to Samuel, as it was an impious suggestion ungentle one toward their supreme Lord and Benefactor. He at once, therefore, applied to God, in the exigency, who directed him to comply with their desires, after a solemn protest against their choice. The introduction of Saul, the son of Kish, to Samuel, and the several circumstances which attended his election to royalty, furnish remarkable illustrations of the ever active agency of Providence; controlling every seeming casualty, and subordinating to its plans the most trifling coincidences. Saul and his servant were despatched in pursuit of his father's asses, which had strayed from home; and having arrived at Ramah, at the instigation of the latter, Samuel was inspired to confer with them. The prophet had been already prepared for the visit, and instructed how to act by a divine intimation. Treating him, accordingly, with marked distinction and respect, he first held a conference with Saul in the evening, probably to explain the secret designs of Providence, and in the ensuing morning, after sending the servant to a proper distance, proceeded to anoint him the future king of Israel, giving him prophetic information of some other events in which he would be personally interested. This appearance was a mere juggling trick upon the part of the woman. The text, however, gives no countenance to this notion; but, on the contrary, it is said, in verse 14, that "Saul perceived that it was Samuel himself."

The Samuels are ascribed the Book of Judges, that of Ruth, and the First Book of Samuel. There is, indeed, great probability that he was the author of the first twenty-four chapters of the first of Samuel, since they contain nothing but what he might have written, and in which he was not a principal agent. However, in these chapters, there is some trifling addition, probably inserted after his death. We read, (1 Chron. ix. 22) that he assisted in regulating the distribution of the Levites made by David for the service of the temple, which Calebot suggests may be explained by saying, that David pursued the order settled by Samuel, during his administration, after the death of the high-priest Eli; or, as Mr. Taylor thinks, he may have left in MS. some plan for such a purpose.

We read also, (1 Chron. xxix. 28) that Samuel enriched the tabernacle of the Lord, by magnificent presents, and by valuable spoils, taken from the enemies of Israel. Also, (1 Chron. xxix. 29) that he wrote the history of David, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad. Probably he might write the beginning of his history, which the other prophets continued and concluded; for Samuel was dead before David came to the throne. The first two Books of Kings bear the name of Books of Samuel; but it must be evident that he could not be the author of the second of these Books, which contains transactions after his death. Neither could he write the latter end of the first, since his death is mentioned in chap. xxvi. It is said (chap. x. 25.) of the First Book of Samuel, that this prophet wrote in a book, "the manner of the kingdom," describing the rights, privileges, and revenues of the king, and the extent of his power and authority; a repetition of what he had proposed, said and done, a little before to the people. See further under Raws, Books of.

Samuel began the chain of the prophets which was never broken from his time to that of Zechariah and Malachi, Acts iii. 24.

Sanballat, chief, or governor, of the Cuthites, or Samaritans, and a great enemy to the Jews. When Nehemiah came from Shushan to Jerusalem, (Neh. ii. 10, 19. ante A. D. 454,) and began to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Sanballat, Tobiah and Geshem met him, and sent to inquire what authority he undertook this work and whether it was not a revolt against the king. Nehemiah, however, proceeded with vigor in his undertaking, and completed the walls of the city.

Finding that they could not succeed against the Jews by the course they had pursued, Sanballat, Tobiah and Geshem sent to Nehemiah, to desire him to meet them in the field, that they might make an alliance, and swear inviolable friendship. But Nehemiah, saying he read this was only a stratagem, as he did also a subsequent attempt to ensnare him, and escaped in both cases.

Nehemiah being obliged to return to king Artaxerxes at Shushan, (Neh. xii. 6, 28. A. M. 3533, ante A. D. 441,) in his absence, the high-priest Elisah married his grandson Manasseh, son of Joiada, to a daughter of Sanballat, and allowed Tobiah, a kinsman of Sanballat, an apartment in the temple. Nehemiah, on his return to Jerusalem, (the exact year of which is not known,) drove Tobiah out of the temple, and would not suffer Manasseh, the high-priest's grandson, to continue in the city, nor to perform the functions of the priesthood. Manasseh, being thus expelled, retired to his father-in-law, Sanballat, who provided him the means of exercising his priestly office on mount Gerizim, on the following occasion. See Gramm.

When Alexander the Great came into Phoenicia, and invested Tyre, Sanballat abandoned the interests of Darius, and went, at the head of 8000 men, to offer his service to Alexander, who readily received him, and gave him leave to erect a temple on mount Gerizim, where he constituted his son-in-law Manasseh the high-priest. Sanballat must have been in this time very old, for 120 years before (A. M. 3550) he was governor of the Samaritans. Indeed, some have been of opinion that the Sanballat who lived in the time of Alexander was different from him who so eagerly opposed Nehemiah; but Calmet sees no necessity for admitting this. However, Josephus makes Sanballat a Cuthite originally, and does not mention him who withstood Nehemiah. The wife of Manasseh he calls by the name of Nicaeo, and says that Sanballat died nine months after he had submitted to Alexander.

Dr. Prideaux, however, rejects the solution of this difficulty, by two Sanballats, and endeavors to reconcile the history to truth and probability, by showing a mistake in Josephus. This author makes Sanballat to flourish in the time of Darius Codomannus, and to build his temple upon mount Gerizim by license from Alexander the Great, whereas it was performed by leave from Darius Nothus, in the fifteenth year of his reign. This removes the difficulty arising from the great age of Sanballat, and allows him to be contemporary with Nehemiah, as the Scripture history requires.

Sanctify often signifies to prepare. Thus Joshua says to the people, (chap. iii. 5.) "Sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." Prepare yourselves to pass over Jordan. In Isa. xiii. 3, the Lord calls the Medes his sanctified. I have appointed, and, as it were, consecrated them to be the executioners of my vengeance against Babylon. (See also Numb. xi. 18; Josh. vii. 13; Jer. vi. 4; xii. 3; ii. 27, 28; Joel i. 14; Mic. iii. 5; Zeph. i. 7.) Comp. Holt.

We desire of God, that his name may be sanctified, or hallowed; that is, honored, praised and glorified throughout the world; especially by those who have the happiness of knowing him. Let them sanctify it by their good lives, their fidelity, their submission to his orders; and they who know him not, that they may obtain the knowledge of him, may hear his word, may become obedient to his instructions; &c. We may apprehend yet better what is meant by sanctifying the name of God, by the opposite to it; that is, profaning the name of God, by vain swearing, blaspheming, ascribing his name to idols; by furnishing wicked men and infidels with occasion of blaspheming it by our bad lives, and scandalous conversation, &c.

It is said, "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me;" (Lev. x. 3,) in his priests, when, by the terrible and exemplary punishment of Nadab and Abihu, the Lord showed what purity he required in his servants, and what punctual exactness he expected in his service. The Lord complains, in another place, that Moses and Aaron did not sanctify him before Israel: "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have sanctuary, or to prophesy at all. And how did they not him? By showing some distrust in his words: ye believed me not. God sanctified the on the contrary, between the communication of and that of pollution. The Sometimes the word sanctuary is used generally for the temple, or the holy place, the structure appointed for the public worship of the Lord. It should seem also, that Moses uses it instead of the Holy Land. Exod. xv. 17, "Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thy inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in;

in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established." And in Lev. xx. 3, of those who offer their children to Moloch, he says, they "defile my sanctuary, and profane my holy name." He forbids the high-priest to go out of the temple, to mourn for his relations, Lev. xxvi. 12: "Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God." The temple is here denoted by its principal part. It is believed that sanctuary is put for heaven, in Deut.
xxvi. 15: "Look from the dwelling of thy sanctuary," from the high heaven.
SANDBAGS. A similitude taken from the aggregate sand of the sea, is often used, to express a very great multitude, or a very great weight; or from a single sand, something very mean and trifling. God promises Abraham and Jacob to multiply their posterity as the stars of heaven, and as the sand of the sea, Gen.
xxii. 17; xxxi. 12. Job (vi. 3.) compares the of his misfortunes to that of the sand of the sea; mon says, (Prov. xxvii. 3.) that though a gavel are very heavy things, yet the anger is much heavier. And Ecclesiastes says that is more insupportable than the weight of as

SANDBAGS, [Heb. 27ph; Gr. vitko.]
The sandals or shoes of the orientals were in times, and are still at the present day, merely hide, leather, or wood, fastened to the bottom foot by two straps, one of which passes over the toe, and one on the ankle. Niebuhr says, (Deser. of
p. 63, Ger. ed.) "The shoes of the Arab middles and lower classes, consist only of with one or two straps over the foot, and one the ankle. These straps are by no means as those which painters are accustomed to assid

These were probably also unknown among

In the course of the festival, the Sanhedrin and gave them to the buyer, in confirmation of the bargain, Ruth iv. 7. The looting of the sandals was also a ceremony when a man refused to marry the widow of his deceased brother, Deut. xxv. 9. R.

Writers say, that when Hercules became slave to Omphale, she used to give him correction with her sandal, which was the most degrading and effeminate kind of correction. So Lucian makes Venus say to Cupid, "Already I have given him some correction, and taken him on my knee, have chastised him with my sandal." But Mr. Morier, in his Second Journey to Persia, (p. 8) mentions a servant of the ambassador who was "abundantly beaten on the back with a stick, and on the mouth with a shoe heel," which he further explains, p. 95. The king of Persia examined some of his officers, who, not answering as he desired, he exclaimed, "Call the Ferashehs, and beat these rogues till they die. The Ferashehs came and beat them violently; and when they attempted to say anything in their own defence, they wrote on the mouth with a shoe, the heel of which was shod with iron." He adds in a note, "The use of the shoe is quite characteristic of the eastern manners described in Scripture. The shoe was a weapon, and when it was allowed to enter sacred or respected places; and to be smitten with it, is to be subjected to the last ignominy. Paul was smitten on the mouth by the orders of Ananias." (Acts xxiii. 2) Whether this were with a shoe, may deserve consideration; such ignominy, if that were the case, might well excite Paul's anger, and excite his threat.

SANHEDRIN, or BETH-DIN, house of judgment, was a council of seventy-one or seventy-two senators, among the Jews, who determined the most important affairs of the nation. The room in which they met, according to the rabbins, was a roundel, half of which was built without the temple, and half within; the latter being that in which the judges sat. The Nasi or president, who was generally the high-priest, set on a throne at the end of the hall, his deputy, or vice-president, called Ab-beth-din, at his right-hand, and the sub-deputy, or Hakam, at his left; the other senators being ranged in order on each side. Most of the members of this council were priests or Levites, though men in private stations of life were not excluded.

The authority of the Sanhedrin was very extensive. It decided causes brought before it by appeal from inferior courts; and even the king, the high-priest, the prophets, were under its jurisdiction. The general affairs of the nation were also brought before this assembly. The right of judging in capital cases belonged to it; and this sentence could not be pronounced in any other place, but in the hall called Libnah-th-aggarith; from whence it came to pass, that the Jews were forced to quit this hall, when the power of life and death was taken out of their hands, forty years before the destruction of their temple, and three years before the death of Jesus Christ.

The rabbins insist that the Sanhedrin subsisted in their nation, constantly, from the time of Moses, (Numb. xvi. 16.) to the destruction of the temple by the Romans. But this is strongly contested. Petavi fixes its origin at the time when Gabinius, governor of Jerusalem, Sedem, Amathus, Jericho, and Sapho, or Sundoris. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 10; de Bello, lib. i. cap. 6.) Bemage fixes its origin to the time of Judas Maccabaeus, or that of his brother Jonathan. This question, however, cannot be determined. We have no proof of its very early existence.

Our Saviour (Matt. v. 22) distinguishes two tribunals: "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment;" that is, the tribunal of the twenty-three judges. "And whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council;" that is, of the great Sanhedrim, which had the right of life and death, at least generally, and before this right was taken away by the Romans. Some think that the jurisdiction of the council of twenty-three extended to life and death also; but it is certain that the Sanhedrin was superior to that council. (See also Mark xiii. 9; xiv. 55; x. 1; Luke xxii. 52, 66; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 21, 22, where mention is made of the Syedrion.)

The Talmudists do, indeed, speak of a tribunal or Sanhedrin of twenty-three judges; but such tribunal is mentioned by Josephus. He, however, speaks of a tribunal of seven judges, which existed in each town, and took cognizance of smaller offences, which is called ish eiries, judgment or court of justices in Matt. v. 21, 22; and which also seems intended by ovicer, council, in Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9. (See Joseph. Antiq. iv. 8, 14; John's Bib. Arch. § 245.) R.

SAPPHIRE, a Christian woman, and wife of Ananias. They having conjointly sold a field, which was their property, brought a part of the price, and laid it at the feet of the apostles, as if it had been the whole, reserving the rest. For this prevarication they were both struck with sudden death, Acts v. See ANANIAS.

SAPPHIRE, a precious stone often mentioned in Scripture, Exod. xxviii. 18; xxxix. 11. Job says (xviii. 6) there are places whose stones are sapphires; that is, sapphires are very common there. Pliny says that the best come out of Media; perhaps out of the country of the Sepires, or from the mount of Sephar mentioned by Moses, Gen. x. 30; Ezek. i. 26; x. 1. The oriental sapphire is of a sky blue color, or a fine azure; hence, the prophets describe the throne of God, as the color of a sapphire; that is, of a celestial blue or azure, Exod. xv. 10. It is next in hardness, and value to the diamond.

I. SARAH, or SARA, wife of Abraham, and daughter of Terah his father, but by another mother; since Abraham asserts, (Gen. xii. 13; xx. 12.) that she was really his sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother. The Bible says, that he had several wives at once, according to the custom of the country; or he might have married again, after the death of Abraham's mother, by which latter wife he might have had Sarai. This opinion Calmet prefers to that which makes Sarah the same as Iscah, daughter of Hanan, niece of Abraham, and granddaughter of Terah, (Gen. ii. 29) which is the opinion of Josephus, and many commentators.

Sarai was born A.M. 2018, and married Abraham before he left Ur, and as soon as he arrived with Sarah, that she should call herself his sister, being afraid she should be taken away from him, and that she might be put to death on her account, if she were known to be his wife.

The principal incidents in Sarah's life having been detailed in the article ABRAHAM, it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

SATAN, a boundary city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 10, 12.

SATAN. This Hebrew word is used in the general sense of an adversary, an enemy, an accuser. (See 1 Sam. xxix. 4; 1 Kings xi. 14, 33, 34; v. 4.) At other times Satan is put for the devil, Job i. 6, 7, 11; Ps. cxxvi. 6; Zech. iii.

Mr. Taylor has some remarks as to the probability of loyal angels being, occasionally, agents of punishment; and also makes a distinction between loyal and rebellious angels—hinting that loyal angels may punish for crimes committed, though they may not tempt to their commission. (Compare Angel.) This suggests the idea that punishment, in itself, may be perfectly free from malice toward the party suffering under it; and may even consist with much sorrow on account of the necessity for its infliction, and much sympathy with the sufferer. Whereas, to propose temptations, to provoke and stimulate to the sin of evil, by delusive representations of ures or its profits;—or by taking advantage of passions, propensities, &c. or of accidental occasions, of time, place, situation, character, utility, &c. is utterly abhorrent from the nature and disposition of a loyal angel. Mr. Taylor applies these ideas of reference to Satan, and thence endeavors to prove the precise import of several passages of Scripture where the agent of punishment, simply to be the person referred to, by the term Satan, is intended.

The Prologue to the Book of Job certainly expresses the idea of punishment by officer, in the court of heaven; and if Satan be considered as the minister of punishment, he is the punisher without authority. Consider the stricture of Sodom, Gen. xix. of Egypt, Ex. xxxiv. 18, of Semancherib, 2 Kings xix. 35, also, Jos. xxvi. 22; Ps. vii. 13.

The following passages are from the New Testament which have a very close resemblance to 1 Cor.

"As the design of punishment is reformatory suffering, I command you not, yourselves, the party, but, to deliver such a transgressor than, the proper angel of punishment; that is, castigation and affliction, may bring the client into a sense of his duty; even should those afflictions be ameliorate in the destruction of his person; rather, of his fleshly powers, or appetite, or in order that the more important part of the spirit, may be saved in the day of the appearance of Lord Jesus." This passage seems to include the same principles as those above given, but

(1.) The criminal is he who had committed the fornication; and such fornication as the apostle denounces, 2 Peter 2:20.

(2.) The sense of his infraction of moral law, is loss, injury, exilium stigmariae, whatever in a nutshell, and ultimately deadly; death seems closely to correspond to the consummating death of a person, of the form of that person, both to person and property, as it arises from the cause, and (without repentance) were the same fatal issue. (3.) That word, flesh, meaning here intended means no proof; affords a glimpse of the punishment inflicted upon the sinner; he suffered defeat, impotence, very wrong, which he had transgressed. The import of 1 Tim. i. 10? Hymenaeus aander, I have delivered, put into the hands of the angel of punishment, that they may learn son (as we teach children at school, by the rod, or, xanarchism) not to blaspheme. —Is it the apostle who had in view his own case? xii. 7. Lest I should be exalted above measure; I, given, favorably, kindly, to me a learn to be bodily infirmity, an agent of Satan, Quytus 2 punishment, or rather of probation, and ex-patience, patience, faith, &c. to produce humility. I, infirmity, i.e. for its removal, or at least its tion, that it might not appear to be, nor be prolongaged as a punishment, nor operate as an impediment to the universal performance of my ministry, I brought the Lord repeatedly. If so, this case is analogous to the probation of Job, under the agency of Satan. Hence we see, as the pious Mr. Henry might say, that afflictions, i. e. sufferings, are not always infections, i. e. punishments.

Having concluded, from these instances, that we risk nothing in supposing that loyal angels may sometimes be employed in offices of punishment—punishment included in the kind purpose of reformation—
Mr. Taylor proceeds to inquire whether some things are not said of a Satan of a different kind; or, at least, whether Scripture does not allude to circumstances utterly irreconcilable with the character of holy and happy spirits, under any official capacity or employment whatever.

Matt. iv. 1, 3, &c. “Jesus was tempted of the devil,”
i. e. to sin; to despair, to pride, &c. Matt. v. 37, “Let your discourse be simple and direct: for oaths and swearing, &c. come from the evil one.” So these words may signify as they stand; but some copies read explicitly, from the devil. Matt. xii. 26, “If Satan cast out Satan;” this cannot signify two mesengers of punishment sent from the same beneficent Deity; as it implies a contradiction, an opposition, in the purposes of these Satans. Matt. xiii. 38, “The enemy that sowed the tares, which shall be burned, is the devil.” Mark iv. 15, “Satan cometh and taketh away the word sown in their hearts,” &c.
John viii. 44, “The devil was a murderer from the beginning; he is a liar, and the father of it.” verse 41, “Ye do the deeds of your father: who prompts you to murder me,” verse 40. Acts v. 3, “Why has Satan filled thine heart, to lie to the Holy Ghost?”
Rom. xvi. 20, “The God of peace shall shortly bruise Satan under your feet.”—Not the holy angel of punishment, but an adversary of the soul, &c. 1 Cor.
vi. 3, “We—human persons—shall judge—condemn —angels?”—surely not holy angels;—but, “though we are but men, yet our piety shall condemn the impiety of our superiors by nature.” 2 Cor. xi. 14, “False apostles transforming themselves into apostles of Christ, and no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light”—consequently he is no holy angel; for a holy angel can neither need, nor use, such a wondrous power; while it is evidently spoken of as contrary to nature. 2 Thess. i. 9, “The working of Satan with all lying wonders, and deceit-fulness of unrighteousness.” Jam. iv. 7, “Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.” 2 Pet. i. 4, “God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell; and delivered them into chains of darkness, until the judgment.” Jude 6, “The angels which kept not their first estate, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day.” The passage, Rev. xx. 2. (τον ὁρμοντα τον ὄρη τον ἀρχαῖον, ἐπὶ ἑκατὸν διαμελος καὶ Ἀνατώ το ἤπειρο 争论) as Mr. Taylor somewhat quaintly remarks, might almost pass for a modern indictment, in which special care is taken to identify the culprit, by a sufficient number of aliases. An angel from heaven having the key of the prison of the abyss, and a great chain, to secure his prisoner, “apprehended the dragon, alias, the serpent, the old one; alias, the devil; alias the Satan; alias the seducer of the world”—who was sentenced to a thousand years’ imprisonment. Can this passage possibly be describing of a loyal and honest character? Throughout the book the same idea may be observed.

Now it is demonstrable that no holy angel would tempt the Son of God, nor promote lies, murders, deceivableness, ungodliness, hypocrisy, &c. all which are attributed to a Satan, i. e. the devil. Perhaps, after we have well considered this double usage of the word Satan, we shall more readily attend to its probable history. Much have been said respecting the word Satan; and that the ideas connected with it are subsequent to the Babylonian captivity; in proof of the contrary, the late bishop of Llandaff has referred to Ps. cix. 6, “Let Satan stand at his right hand;” as well as to the “Satanas the sons of Zerubbabel,” 2 Sam. xix. 22.
Mr. Taylor adds, that it appears, by the story of Balsam, above quoted, that the word was used long before; and that it answers perfectly well to the sense of adversary. Nor is it clear on what principles, in the case of Baslam, it can be rendered accusing; unless it might be understood thus,—the angel of the Lord stood in the way, to remonstrate against his proceeding;—i. e. to accuse him of his criminal intention; for so we find he does; and, indeed, he rather remonstrates and accuses, than punishes. This might be queried, therefore, (1). Whether in early ages, e. g.
under the Hebrew republic, the word Satan signified much, if anything, more than simply an adversary, an accuser, a remonstrant; one who makes him to task, as our familiar expression, “curse and deride,” but, (2). After the institution of monarchy, such an agent of punishment being a constant attendant on a court, the cupc, bach, messeur, or chief executioner; (see 1 Sam.
xiii. 17; 2 Kings xxxv. 8; Jer. xlix. 11, 12; bii. 19; Dan. ii. 14; ) often also the accuser, was an idea which became involved in the word Satan; then, (3). Because this accuser received a profit from the spoils of criminals condemned, the sense of rejoicing in the condemnation of those accused became gradually connected with the word: and, (4). It being notorious that such an one who had exercised this office of punisher, had beheld with pleasure the commission of crimes, and had laid temptations in the way of culpits, whom he hoped afterwards to punish, and to turn their spoils to his profit; all these ideas at length united in the word Satan; an adversary, who accuses, and who takes such delight in accusation, that he tempts unwary souls to transgress, for the sake of enjoying the gratification attending their punishment.

If this history of the word be admissible, we may perceive much stronger ideas attached to it in later ages than at first; or, perhaps, a milder and a stronger sense, according to the circumstances not only relates to those who affirm that it was altogether a Babylonian term, and of Babylonian import; but it shows, (1). How an adversary, a Satan, might “rise up against Israel, and prompt David to number the people,” how David might be “a Satan to the Philistines;” (1 Sam. xxix. 4.) how “Hadad and Rezon might be Satans against Solomon;” (1 Kings xi. 23.) and in this simple original sense of the word, how Peter might be “a Satan” to Christ (Matt. xvi. 23.)—he might take him to task, remonstrate, &c. unseasonably. (2). It shows how a loyal angel might perform the office of a minister of punishment; and be honored while so doing, and this supposition cannot be relinquished:—and, (3).
Since these are human ideas transferred to the spiritual and spiritual existences, and since we have found so great depravity among mankind as rejoicing in the sufferings of others, what forbids our transferring this idea also to a spiritual being? We should remem-SAUL

His armor was carried by the Philistines to the temple of Ashdod; and they hung his body against the walls of Beth-shan, probably opposite to the chief street; because it is said in 2 Sam. xxii. 12, that his body was hung up in the street of this city; and in 1 Chron. x. 10, that his head was fastened in the temple of Dagon. When the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead were informed of these indignities, they went by night and took down the bodies, and brought them into their city beyond Jordan, where they burnt the remains of the flesh, and buried the bones, which were, several years afterwards, removed by David into the sepulchre of Kish, at Gibeah, 3 Sam. xxii. 12-14. Jah-boaeth, the fourth son of Saul, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned beyond Jordan, over eleven tribes; David reigning over the tribe of Judah.

The character of Saul is that of a gloomy, apprehensive, melancholy man; and after taking, without success, what remedies were customary, his servants, or physicians, (see Gen. i. 12;) finding his case beyond the reach of their art, thought proper to represent it as a visitation from on high; yet to recommend the use of music, as a recipe whose effects might be favorable. The event justified their expectations; and the amusement, the sympathy, and the enjoyment of Saul, while his attention was engaged, produced an interval of disease, which gradually improved to convalescence. Calmet does not consider Saul as a madman, but as a hypochondriac, whose low spirits were relieved by the cheerful and animating visitation of the young shepherd's careless harp: the sprightly effusions

Of linked sweetness long drawn out,
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through tunes running,
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.

How well adapted the unstudied strains of a shepherd's harp, whose harp, at the same time, was held through the courage of his master, free through his "native wood-notes wild," and sedate through his piety; how well such a remedy was adapted to the cure of Saul, may be estimated by a moment's reflection. See 2 Kings iii. 15, for the tranquillizing effects of the harp in the instance of the prophet Elisha.

It is a singular fact, that there is preserved in the second volume of the Asiatic Researches, in a translation from the Persian, an abridgment of the history of the Afghan, a people of India, generally admitted to be of Israelish origin, in which they are represented to be the descendants of Saul, the first king of Israel. The extract is too long to be introduced here; it must suffice to say, that it comprises a tolerable abridgment of the history, as recorded in Samuel; resembling it in many particulars, yet varying from it in others. We have clearly mentioned, among other incidents, the loss of the ark, the presumption of the Philistines, the fall of Dagon, the cattle which brought the ark to Bethshemesh, the application of the people to Samuel for a king, the description of the person of Saul, the loss of the asses, (or cow, as it is here,) Saul seeking them, the behavior of the sons of Belial to him, the valor of David, the death of Saul, and the appointment of David to the kingdom of Israel.

It is said, (1 Sam. xv. 12,) that Saul, after the defeat of the Amalekites, "set him up a place," i.e. a monument on Carmel. This was, probably, some heap of stones, or a column, to perpetuate the memory of his victory. The author of the Hebrew traditions on the Books of Kings says, that Saul's triumphal arch was composed of branches of myrtle, palm and olive-trees.

SAUL, the Hebrew name of Paul. See PAUL.

SAVIOR is a name eminently appropriated to our Lord Jesus Christ, who was prefigured by those to whom the Old Testament gives the appellation, as Joshua, the judges of Israel, the kings David, Solomon and Josiah, and the other great men raised up to deliver the people of God, as Mattathias, Judas Maccabaeus, and the rest. The prophets have described Jesus under the name of Saviour in many places: as Isa. xii. 3, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation," a title of the Saviour. "The Lord shall send them a Saviour, even a great one, and he shall deliver them," chap. xix. 20. "I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no Saviour," chap. xiii. 11. And the apostles and sacred writers of the New Testament generally give to him the name of "the Saviour," by way of eminence. When the angel foretold his birth, he said he should be called Jesus, that is, a Saviour, assigning, as the reason, that he should "save his people from their sins," Matt. i. 21. (See also John iv. 42; Acts xiii. 23; Philip. iii. 20, &c. See SALVATION.) The expression of the Samaritans, (John iv. 42,) with regard to our Saviour, is particularly strong. "We know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world," where the articles present a special force in them, together with a general import. It is somewhat unhappy that the term prince has been adopted in connection with Saviour, in Acts v. 31, since it suggests the notion of temporal priority, not to say of temporal authority. It is rendered in the margin author, and seems to denote properly a leader, the first of a company, or body of followers. "Him (Jesus) hath God exalted to be leader—precursor of his followers into heaven—also Saviour, by giving repentance to Israel, and remission of sins." Christ is called the "Saviour of the body," in Eph. v. 23, where the comparison is to the head, which is the protector, the guardian of the whole person; that which completes, governs and superintends the entire man. The Saviour is said to be expected from heaven, (Phil. iii. 20; Titus ii. 13,) and in short, the title of Saviour is so connected with Deity, that it seems to be impossible to separate them, and to draw the line of distinction between them, (Titus i. 3; ii. 10; iv. 4; 2 Pet. i. 1; Jude v., et al.) independent of the rule of Greek syntax, developed and applied by the late Mr. Granville Sharp, and subsequently by other writers, though strongly corroborated by it.

God often takes to himself the name of Saviour of Israel, (1 Sam. xiv. 35,) and David calls him, his strength and his Saviour, 2 Sam. xxii. 3. "There is no Saviour beside me," says the Lord, in the prophet Hosea, xiii. 4. And Isa. xxv. 10, "Thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, or thy Saviour. And in truth, God is the Saviour of saviours, the God of gods; without him there is neither salvation nor deliverance, nor succor. He raised up saviours to his people, in the persons of Othniel; (Judg. iii. 9,) Ehud, (iii. 15,) &c. Obadiah (21,) promises that the Lord will send saviours on the mountain of Sion, to judge the mountain of Esau; meaning, probably, the Maccabees, who subdued the Idumeans.

SCANDAL, a snare, an incumbrance. In Scrip-idea of a pedagogue, who assumes an air of authority over others, which does not belong to him. But among the Hebrews the pedagogue were those who, they committed the care of their children, to lead them, to observe them, and to instruct them in their first rudiments. Thus the office of a pedagogue nearly answered to that of a governor or tutor, who constantly attended his pupil, teaches him, and forms his manners. Paul (1 Cor. iv. 15.) says; "For though you have ten thousand instructors (pedagogues) in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers." Representing himself as their father in the faith, since he had begotten them in the gospel. The pedagogue, indeed, may have some power and interest of his pupil, but he can never have the natural tenderness of a father for him. To the Galatians, the apostle says, (iii. 24, 25.) "The law was our schoolmaster (pedagogue) to bring us to Christ." It pointed out Christ in the Scriptures, the figures, the prophecies, of the Old Testament: but since we are advanced to superior learning, and are committed to the tuition of the faith which we have embraced, we have no longer need of a schoolmaster, or pedagogue; as such are of no further use to young persons when advanced to years of maturity.

- "But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster—pedagogue." Mr. Taylor remarks, that the term schoolmaster was no longer used by the teachers, to accompany youth to school from home, and from school to home again; and adds, that the Greek word didaskalos, or teacher, approaches much nearer to the notion of a schoolmaster, and is distinguished accordingly by Plutarch, de Pueriorum Educatione, x. 9. Among the great number of slaves possessed by certain families, it was customary to intrust the care of the children of the family to some confidential slave, who superintended their conduct, and directed their proceedings. A domestic usher, then, may be thought to resemble the ancient pedagogue: and, for females, the duenna of foreign countries. That such an attendant is more proper to early youth than to mature manhood, is obvious. Another class of instructors were called by the Greeks prozomenetes, teachers of children. (Quint. lib. i. cap. 11.)

SCORPION. It is generally admitted that the Hebrew word κηφήν, καρήν, denotes the scorpion, which is the largest and most malignant of all the insect tribe. It was valued in some countries for its general appearance, but is much more hideous. Those found in Europe seldom exceed four inches in length, but in the tropical climates it is an uncommon thing to meet with them twelve inches long. They are the most insensible to cold and heat, and not more irascible, than the scorpion; but happily for mankind, they are equally destructive to their own species, as to other animals. Goldsmith states, that Maupertuis put about a hundred of them together in the same glass; and they scarcely came into contact, when they began to exert all their rage in mutual destruction; so that in a few days there remained but fourteen, which had killed and devoured all the rest. But their malignity is still more apparent in their cruelty to their offspring. He enclosed a female scorpion, big with young, in a glass vessel, and she was seen to devour them as fast as they were excluded. There was only one of the number that escaped the general destruction, by taking refuge on the back of its parent; and this soon after revenged the cause of its brethren, by killing the old one in its turn. Such is the terrible nature of this insect; and it is even asserted, that when placed in circumstances of danger, from which it perceives no way of escape, it will sting itself to death. Surely Moses, says Mr. Shaw in his account of the scorpions among the dangers of the wilderness, Deut. viii. 15. And what shall we think of the hazardous situation of Ezekiel, who is said to dwell among scorpions, (chap. ii. 6.)—people as inscrutable as this terrible insect; nor could our Lord select a fitter contrast; "If a man shall ask of his father an egg will he give a scorpion?" Luke xi. 11, 12. But the passage most descriptive of the scorpion, is Rev. ix. 3—10, in which it is to be observed, that the sting of these creatures was not to produce death, but pain so intense that the wretched sufferers should seek death, (ver. 6.) rather than submit to its endurance. Dr. Shaw states, that the sting of scorpions is not always fatal; the malignity of their venom being in proportion to their size and complexity. The torment of a scorpion when he stricketh a man is thus described by Dioscorides, as cited by Mr. Taylor: "When the scorpion has stung, the place becomes inflamed and hardened; it reddens from tension, and is painful by intervals, being now chilly, now burning. The pain soon rises high, and ranges sometimes more, sometimes less. A sweating follows, attended by a shivering and trembling; the extremities of the body become cold; the groin swells; the bowels expel their wind; the hands and feet hang down; the members become pale, and the skin feels throughout it the sensation of a perpetual prickling, as if by needles." Our Saviour gave his disciples power to tread on these terrible creatures, and to disarm them of their power of hurting, Luke x. 19.

It may be necessary to remark on the contrast which our Lord draws between a scorpion and an egg, that the body of this insect is much like an egg; especially those of the white kind, which is the first species mentioned by Zosimus, Avicenna, and others; and Bochart has shown that the scorpions of Judea were about the size of an egg.

The Jews used whips on some occasions, which were called, from the suffering they occasioned, scorpions. To these it is probable the haughty Hophzbam was alluded, when he menaced the house of Israel with increasing their oppressions, 1 Kings xi. 11.

SCOURGE, or Whip. The punishment of scourging was very common among the Jews. Moses ordains, (Deut. xxv. 1—3,) that "if there be a controversy between men, and they come to judgment, then the judges may judge them. And if the wicked man were found worthy to be beaten, the judge was to lay his hand on the neck of the offender, and to beat him, not more than forty stripes. And if the fault were not great, he might strike him thirty times; but if it were great, he might strike him forty and nine times. The offender was stripped from his shoulders to his middle, and tied by his arms to a low pillar, that he might lean forward, and the executioner the more easily strike his back. Some maintain that they never gave more nor less than thirty-nine strokes, but that in greater faults they struck with proportionate violence. Others think, that when the fault and circumstances required it, they might increase the number of blows. Paul informs us (2 Cor. xi. 24.) that at five different times he received thirty-nine stripes from the Jews; which seems to imply that this was a fixed number, not to be exceeded. The apostle also clearly shows, that correction with rods was different from that with a whip; for he says, "Thrice was I beaten with rods." And when he was seized by the Jews in the temple, the tribune of the temple said to him, "Do you not know that the courts of God are not places for filthiness?" (Aets xxii. 24, 25.) for thus the Romans commonly put prisoners to the question. The hastened was sometimes given on the back, at others on the soles of the feet.

The rabbis affirm that punishment by the scourge was not ignominious; and that it could not be objected as a disgrace to those who had suffered it.
They maintain, too, that no Iscrite, even the king,
or the high-priest, was exempt from this law.
This must be understood, however, of the whipping inlicted in their synagogues, which was rather a legal and particular penalty, than a public and shameful correction. Philo, speaking of the manner in which Flaccus treated the Jews of Alexandria, says, having made them suffer the punishment of the whip, which (as he remarks) is not less insupportable to a free man, than death itself. Our Saviour, speaking of the pains and ignominy of his passion, commonly puts his scourging in the second place, Matt. xx. 19; Mark
x. 34; Luke xvii. 32.

SCRIBE, (xero, Sophër; LXX, ἱεραπετή, Gram-matê) a word very common in Scripture, and having several significations. (1.) A clerk, writer or secretary, which constituted an important employment in the court of the kings of Judah, in which Scripture mentions the secretaries as officers of the crown.
Seraih was scribe or secretary to David; (2 Sam. viii. 17.) Shemaiah exercised the same office under the same prince; (1 Chron. xxiv. 6.) Elihoreph and Ahiah were secretaries to Solomon; (1 Kings
iv. 3.) Shebna filled the same office under Hezekiah, (Kings xix. 2.) and Shaphan under Josiah, (2 Kings xxii. 8-10.)

(2.) A scribe is put for a comissary or muster-master of an army, who reviews the troops, keeps the list or roll, and calls them over. It is said, (Judg.
v. 14.) that in the war of Barak against Sisera, "Out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that bear the staff of a leader." In the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, is found Jeiel the scribe, who had under his hand the king's armies, 2 Chron. xxv.
I. Jeremiah, a scribe by birth, and chief of the solcitaries, who superintended the military exercises of the newly raised troops, chap. liii. 25; 2 Kings xxv.
19, (Heb.) the scribe, prince of the army, who made the people of the country go to war. Judges directed the scribes to stand on the banks of the brook that the army was to cross; to let no one remain beyond the water, but to cause all to pass over, to the war, 1
Mac. v. 42.

(3.) Scribe is put for an able and skilful man, a doctor of the law, a man of learning, or one who understands affairs. Jonathan, David's uncle by the father's side, was "a counsellor, a wise man, and a scribe," 1 Chron. xxvii. 32. Baruch, the disciple and secretary of Jeremiah, is called a scribe; so is Gerariel, son of Shaphan, and Elieazari, who lived under the reign of Josiah, Jer. xxxvi. 10, 12, 20, 26. Jesus son of Sirach, says, ( Eccles. x. 5.) "In the hand of God is the prosperity of man, and upon the person of the scribe shall he lay his honor." Great commendation is given in Scripture to Ezra, who is celebrated as a skilful scribe, "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," Ezra vii. 6. The scribes of the people, frequently mentioned in the Gospels, were public writers,
The rule of the church seems to have been, to admit no book into the New Testament that was not the work of an apostle, or derived from an apostle; hence the Gospels of Mark and Luke were said to have been written by the apostles Peter and Paul (though some suppose, that being historically only, and not dogmatical, they formed an exception to the rule). The Epistle of James was doubted of, because some questioned whether it were written by James the apostle, or by another James. That of Jude was long excluded; and even lately, Michaelis rather negatives its canonical authority, proof of its composition by an apostle being very deficient. The Second and Third Epistles of John, being written to private persons, were but little known in early ages; and we cannot wonder that they long continued not generally acknowledged. On the whole, the scrupulous diligence and judgment of the early Christians in selecting that series of books which afterwards formed the canon of the New Testament, must give us equal satisfaction and pleasure. Successive ages have gradually received what formerly was deemed questionable; and our present canon is certainly more complete than that of the first Christians, not only because of their hesitation, but because the difficulty of procuring copies of the New Testament entire was very great while they existed in manuscript only. See BIBLE.

SCYTTHOPOLIS, a name of Bethshean, which see.

SEA. The Hebrews give the name of sea (כָּנָן) to any great collection of water; as, (1.) to a lake or a pool. Thus we have the sea of Galilee or of Tiberias, the Dead sea, &c. (2.) To great rivers, as the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, &c. which, by their magnitude, or by the extent of their overflows, seem little seas, or great lakes. (See Is. xi. 15; xviii. 1, 2; xx. 1; Jer. li. 36, 43, &c.) The following are the principal seas mentioned in Scripture.

1. The great sea, the western sea, or the sea of the Philistines, generally denotes the Mediterranean, which lay west of the Land of Promise. The sea is often put for the west, as the right is put for the south. Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 14, et passim. On the Mediterranean there was stationed a number cut down from mount Libanus, which was brought to Joppa, for building the temple, &c.

2. The sea of Suhp, or the Red sea, lies between Arabia on the east, and Egypt and Abyssinia on the west, and is in length one thousand six hundred miles long. Scholars are of two opinions concerning this name; some think it was given by the Israelites, and some that it was derived from the great quantity of coral found in it. Pliny says, it obtained the name of the Red sea, in Greek Ερυθρα, from a king called Erythra, who reigned in Arabia, and whose tomb was seen in the island Tyrrhe, or Agrya. Learned men believe, that this king Erythraus is Eem, or Edom; Edom, in Hebrew, signifying red or ruddy, as Erythros does in Greek. But the dwelling of Edom was east of Canaan, towards Bozra; and Caemarum, on the Elanitic coast, not five miles from Edom, had spread themselves westward as far as the Red sea. It might then receive the name of the sea of Edom, which the Greeks rendered Thalassæ Erythreæ, or the Red sea. That part of the sea where the Israelites passed, is thought to have been near Kolem, the sea about which bears the name of Bahr al Kolem, or the sea of destruction, and is in depth about three leagues, and in width varies from 9 to 14 fathoms.

The term Red sea appears to be improperly adopted in Num. xxvi. 14. (See in BIBLE, 170, col. 2.) So also in Deut. i. 1, where it should be in the plain "over against Suhp." Here our translators confess, by their italics, that they have inserted the word sea between Paran, Tophel, &c. and by this insertion the geography is sadly confused. It is evident, that a station which was in any tolerable sense over against the Red sea, could not possibly be near to Paran, nor to Hazeroth; neither could it be "eleven days' journey from Horeb, by the way of mount Seir," that is, at Kadesh Barne. See BIBL.

3. The Dead sea, Salt sea, Eastern sea, sea of Sodom, or sea of the wilderness, or plain, is the lake Asphaltites, which is situated in the southern part of Judea, and which occupies the site of the cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim. Its real size, we believe, is not yet ascertained, for we are not aware that any modern traveller has measured it; and the measurements of Josephus, who found it seventy-two miles long, and eighteen broad, are still referred to. Diodorus affirms that it is 180 miles long, and seven and a half broad; but the calculation of Pliny is much greater, for he says, it is one hundred long, and twenty-five wide, in the broadest part. Maundrell considers it seventy-two miles long, and eighteen or twenty in breadth. Pococke agrees with Diodorus, and Dr. Clarke with Josephus; and the abbe Maritti, who seems to have paid much attention to its peculiarities, maintains that it is one hundred and eighty miles in circuit. We cannot but consider it singular that its dimensions should not have been more perfectly ascertained.

The waters of the Dead sea are clear and limpid, but uncommonly salt, and even bitter. Their specific gravity exceeds that of all other waters known. Josephus and Tacitus say that no fish can live in it; and according to the concursory testimony of several travellers, those carried thither by the Jordan instantly die. Maundrell, nevertheless, states, that he found some shell-fish resembling oysters on the shore, and bishop Pococke has seen that a monk had seen fish caught in the water: these are assertions, however, that require further corroboration. The mud is black, thick and fetid, and no plant vegetates in the water, which is reputed to have a petrifying quality. Branches of trees, accidentally fallen into it, are speedily converted into stone, and the curious in Jerusalem then collect them. Neither do plants grow in the immediate vicinity of the lake, where every thing is dull, cheerless and inanimate; whence it is supposed to have derived the name of the Dead sea. But the real cause of the absence of animals and vegetables, Volney affirms, is owing to the saltiness and acridity of the water, infinitely surpassing what exists in other seas. The earth surrounding the sea is deeply impregnated with the same saline qualities, too predominant to admit of vegetable life, and even the air is saturated with them. The waters are clear and incorruptible, as if holding salt in solution, nor is the presence of this substance equivocal, for Dr. Pococke found a thin crust of salt upon his face after bathing in the sea, and the shores where it occasionally overflows, are covered with a similar crust. Galen considered it completely saturated with salt, for it would dissolve no more, when thrown into it.
There are mines of fossil salt in the south-western bank, from which specimens have been brought to Europe; some also exist in the depressions of the mountains, and have been formed, from time immemorial, for the consumption of the Arabs and the city of Jerusalem. Great quantities of asphaltum appear floating on the surface of the sea, and are driven by the winds to the east and west bank, where it remains fixed. Ancient authors inform us, that the neighboring inhabitants were careful to collect it, and went out in boats, or used other expedients for that purpose. On the south-east bank are hot springs and deep gullies, dangerous to the traveller, were not their position indicated by small pyramidal edifices on the sides. Sulphur is likewise found on the edges of the Dead Sea, and a kind of stone, or coal, called musca, by the Arabs, which, on attrition, exudes an intolerable odor, and burns like bitumen. This stone, which also comes from the neighboring mountains, is black, and takes a fine polish. Mr. Maudrell saw pieces of it two feet square, in the convent of St. John in the wilderness, carved in bas-relief, and polished to so great a lustre as black marble is capable of. The inhabitants of the country employ it in paving churches, mosques, courts, and other places of public resort. In the polishing its disagreeable odor is lost. The citizens of Bethlehem consider it as endowed with antiseptic virtues, and bracelets of it are worn by attenuate on the sick, as an antidote against disease. As the lake is at certain seasons covered with a thick dark mist, confined within its own limits, which is dissipated by the rays of the sun, spectators have been induced to allege that black and sulphureous exhalations are constantly issuing from the water. They have been no less mistaken in supposing, that birds attempting to fly across are struck with pestiferous fumes. Late and reputable travellers declare, that numerous swallows skim along the surface, and from thence take up water, necessary to build their nests; and on this head Heyman and Van Egmont made a decisive experiment. They carried two sparrows to the shore, and having deprived them of some of the wing feathers, after a short flight both fell in, or rather on, the sea; but so far from expiring there, they got out safely. An uncommon love of exaggeration is testified in all the older narratives, and in some of modern date, of the nature and properties of the lake. Chater, in his "Rambles in Ecbatana," speaks of a "fossil sound proceeding from this lake of death, like the stifled chasons of the people engulfed in its waters!" that its shores produced fruit beautiful, but containing nothing but ashes; that it burns upon its surface the heavier metal. Thus, and a thousand other stories of a like character, have been perpetually repeated with barely any foundation of truth. Among other facts apparently unaccountable, has been ranked that of this lake constantly receiving the waters of the Jordan without overflowing its banks, seeing that there is no visible outlet. Some have therefore conjectured the possibility of a subterraneous communication with the Red sea; others, more ingenious, are of opinion, that the daily evaporation is all the waters discharged into it, which is a simple solution of the apparent paradox. See Jordan, p. 357, and Elwyn, p. 389.

A small quantity of the water of the Dead sea, brought to the heads of the West indies, at the request of the late Sir Joseph Banks, was analyzed by Dr. Marcet. It was perfectly transparent, and deposited no crystals on standing in closed vessels. Its taste was peculiar, bitter, saline and pungent. Solutions of silver produced from it a very copious deposit, showing the presence of marian oxalic acid instantly discovered lime in the solutions of boracic produced a cloud, shou existence of sulphuric acid.

Whereas it appears that this water contains one fourth of its weight of salts in a state of existence, but if there can be said to be decomposed the temperature of 180° they will amount to cent. of the water. (Edin. Cyclop. vol. ii. p. 215.)

The Dead sea is said, in sacred writings, to have been the scene of divine wrath against it of Sodom and Gomorrah, for their unexpiated iniquity. Five cities, all governed by kings, involved in the general destruction, then covering the fertile vale of Siddim where they stood. Some writers, among whom is Mr. Horne, (vol. iii. p. 71, 1st ed.) are of the opinion that they were destroyed by lightning having set fire to bituminous substances with which they supplied place to have abounded; or else to have been by a volcanic eruption in the neighborhood. Hence, however, to have been taken out sufficiently considering that the existence of these materials in the neighborhood of the Siddim is incompatible with the description of the inspired writer gives of the nature of those seas. Nothing can be more than that those places where brimstone and bitumen are naturally most abundant and Hence the sacred writers, in representing their desolate places, describe them as abounding in brimstone and fire. See Gen. xiv. 19. which was consumed, in any other part of the land. Gen. xiv. 10, which it appears that the sulphur or brimstone the salt and saline matter, as well as the kind of subterraneous fires, which are to be found the Dead sea now, are rather the effects of striction poured upon the spot, than any destructions of the place before that event. Gen. iv. 15, 24. Ex. xiv. 9.

The general features of the Dead sea, shores, especially at the southern end, have been described in different articles. See esp. Canaan, p. 253; Exod. iv. 14; Salt, xxv. p. 16. B.

Mr. Gordon of Chonic, in the land; as we call it a tongue, or neck, which advances into the sea. Josh. xx. 37: & n. xi. 15.
for the temple, was a vessel which stood in the temple, and contained three thousand baths, according to 2 Chron. iv. 5, or two thousand baths, according to 1 Kings vii. 26. Calmet thinks this may be reconciled, by saying that the cup or bowl contained two thousand baths, and the foot, which was hollow, a thousand more. It stood on its foot now mentioned, besides which it was supported by twelve oxen of brass.

Mr. Taylor expresses his dissatisfaction with the solution of the difficulty, relative to the capacity of this vessel, as just given from Calmet, and devotes a very considerable article (Fragm. 254) to its investigation; of which we shall give the substance.

Calmet, as we have seen, supposes that the bowl, or cavity, held 3000 baths, and the foot or hollow, 1000 more,—but what could be the use of this hollow? Not, surely, to contain so much water; it must have been for the purpose of furnishing it when it was wanted; but in this case, the cocks should be placed at the bottom of it, which they are not in Calmet’s engraving.

In proposing his solution, Mr. Taylor offers the following remarks:

(1.) No figure of this sea yet published has preserved a proper inlet and outlet for the necessary body of water, which was not stagnant, but flowing, as is evident from two considerations: (1.) that most, if not all, of the Jewish purifications, were performed over running water; (2.) the Jerusalem Talmud and Maimonides agree, that a pipe of water came into the fountain Etam, and constantly flowed from it, for the use of the priests who ministered at the altar.

(2.) The construction of a fountain implies pipes, &c. for forcing the water upwards, and corresponding pipes for passing the water through (or at least among the oxen, &c. around the basin. It seems plausible, therefore, he suggests, that the writer of the Chronicles does not merely state the quantity of water which the basin held, but that also which was necessary to work it, to keep it flowing as a fountain; that which was necessary to fill it and its accompaniments. This opinion he supports by pointing out the different phraseology used in the two passages. In 1 Kings vii. 26, it contained, comprehended, held 2600 baths; but in 2 Chron. iv. 5, two words are used, one as before, “it held,” the other, “it received.” Now the writer, as he remarks, would not have used two words, adding a second word, merely to signify the same thing; there was, then, a difference between this receiving and this holding.

When playing as a fountain, and when all its parts were filled for that purpose, they, together with the sea itself received 3000 baths; whereas the sea exclusively held only 2000 baths when its contents were restricted to those of the circular basin: “It received, and held, three thousand baths.”

But being unwilling to rest upon mere assumption, Mr. Taylor refers to the “Fountain of the Lions,” now extant in the Moorish palace at Granada, usually called by its Arabic name, Al-hambra, and which bears a curious resemblance to the brazen sea.

This fountain is composed of twelve lions, holding the place of Solomon’s twelve oxen, “their hinder parts turned inward;” and three toward each corner of the heavens, of course. Solomon’s basin stood upon the oxen, and this basin is supported by pillars, which pillars enter the hinder parts of the animals, and through the pillars the water passes into the animals. Whether Solomon’s basin had these pillars we know not; but as it stood upon the oxen, (no doubt, at their hinder parts, which were turned inward,) the opportunity for communication by pipes is obvious. In the centre of this basin rises a smaller one, or cup, which is indeed the fountain, and supplies water to the larger. It is impossible to determine whether Solomon’s had any cup like this; but, if it had, the difference between 2000 baths and 3000 baths is accounted for at once, and with at least as much propriety as the “hollow foot” of Calmet accounts for it. Such a cup, adding nothing to the external measure of the basin, might be omitted in the account. If this be not to be recollected, says our author, that to supply the rising column of water, of considerable diameter, and, no doubt, of a majestic elevation; to supply also the discharge of twelve lesser fountains from the mouths of the oxen—ass in this instance from the mouths of the lions—together with what was contained in the various pipes, may well be thought to require half as much water as was held by the basin itself; so that the water necessary to supply the whole, or what was received by the entire fountain when at work, was 3000 baths; while the basin alone held only 2000 baths.

Without affecting to determine whether Solomon’s basin had a cup, Mr. Taylor inquires, whether it is absolutely certain, from the arrangement of the passages in the original, that the same rim which had knobs compassing it, “ten in eighteen inches,” is the same as that which was “wrought like the brim of a cup, with flowers of liaves” under the cup of Al-hambra? The flowers of liaves are like those of flowers; those of the basin are different; might it not be so in Solomon’s brazen sea?

This solution seems greatly preferable to the supposition, that one writer means dry-water basins and the other liquid-measure baths; or that the bath had varied in its quantity after the time of Solomon; since the foundation of this explanation is matter of fact, and since the coincidence of ideas between Solomon’s and the Moorish fountain is striking. (See Swinhorne’s Travels in Spain, p. 178.)

The fountain may serve to answer another question, which has been raised on the manner of casting Solomon’s brazen sea—How such an immense body could be cast at once? The difficulty has arisen from taking as certain that the sea was strictly a circle; whereas the Arabian fountain, though circular, is divided into twelve faces, each face being itself a plane, and forming an angle with the next. If this were the fact, as with respect to the common’s mouth, how easily each face might be cast separately, and afterwards the whole be united; notwithstanding which few persons, if any, would hesitate in describing it as a round basin. This would determine, too, that Solomon's oxen stood, like the Moonish lions, one to each face, with equal intervals between them, all round the circumference, and not, as might be gathered from the description, there on one side, each facing a cardinal point of the heavens, which has been the sentiment of the rabbins, and is adopted by Calmet and others.

Is there an allusion to the brazen sea as a fountain, in Zech. xiii. 1. "In that day there shall be a fountain opened, not merely to the priests in divine service in the temple, but it shall be free to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem in general, to the whole nation, &c. for cleansing of sin and uncleanness," &c.?

SEAL, SEALING. The allusions and references to seals and sealing are very frequent in the sacred writings. Seals or signets were in use at a very early period; and they were evidently of various kinds, so that the same expression, as it might at first sight be thought, has a diversity of meaning, determinable by its connection or application.

The principal use of seals was for authentication, and they appear to have been worn by the parties to whom they respectively belonged. The seal of a private person was usually worn on his finger, or on his wrist, or in a bracelet, being small in size. The seal of a governor was worn by him, or carried about his person, in the most secure manner possible. The royal seal was, (1.) personal, to the king; (2.) public, to the state; in other words, the seal of the king, and the seal of the crown: the first the king retained; the latter he delivered to the proper officer of the state. So far our own usages enable us to comprehend clearly the nature of this important instrument.

The art of writing is so generally diffused among us, that we think meanly of an individual who has not acquired that noble qualification; and we can scarcely conceive of a governor, or a king, who is destitute of the accomplishment, being fit for discharging the duties of his office. We must, therefore, recollect, that in the East the art of writing is practiced by a body of men whose mean of livelihood, and who engage almost the whole of its practice. The civil governor may be considered as never authenticating by signature; but to give validity to an order, he stamps it with an impression of his seal which he bears, and this sufficiently denotes, to all who inspect it, that he has been informed of the contents, and has confirmed them by his stamp manual. This shows the vast consequence of this implement; for, should an order, under the governor's seal, command the death of A. B. that person would be treated as a criminal, and executed on the warrant thus authenticated. Or, should an order, thus authenticated, command the disbursement of a considerable sum of money, the treasurer would disburse it, and justify himself by this authority. So that, in fact, whoever possesses this seal possesses all the power of the real owner, all the resources of the country, &c.

Hence we may in some degree estimate the incalculable confidence of Judah, who gave his seal to Tamar, by which act he, with his property, was placed entirely in her power; and we may also perceive the fidelity of Tamar, who made no ill use of this authority.

Seals were usually made of silver, but others were of inferior metals; and some of precious stones. The form of their cutting must also oe properly stood, because such seals as are in use and selves would very ill answer the purpose of ing or marking. Were they dipped in a th ink, (printer's ink, for examples,) they would soon be worn out, and the image and leaving blanks corresponding to the hollows formed the letters. It is necessary, therefore, seals which are to be thus dipped should inscriptions upon them raised, so that these tions may hold the ink, and imprint on the forms of the letters which compose them. manner the excuse stamps on a variety of which pay duty in Britain are cut and and also post-marks on letters, letters for market and, universally, types used for printing.

The nature of the inscription is another quiring notice. It is not enough that e the initials of the owner's name; they contaicially when they belong to a person of cons a description of his office, residence, &c. A long line of ancestry is reckoned to inre honor of an individual, this in the East is of some of their seals with a parade (as we call it) verging on affectation and ostentation. them have additions which seldom occur cipher seals, such as inscriptions, mottoes, apophthegms of moral wisdom, and sen pious or political; which answer in some m the mottoes of our coats of arms, but ext lengths which custom forbids.

Mr. Taylor, from whom these remarks are a has selected the following Scripture refers seals and sealing.

We read in Est. viii. 8. "Write in the king and seal it with the king's seal ring; for i which is written in the king's name, and wit with the king's ring, no man may reverse al ver. 10.) It clearly appears that the king called tabaath had a seal in it; this ab name of Pharaoh's ring; and we read (chaps that the king took off his ring from his he gave it to Haman, empowering him thereby pleasure, to authenticate his commands v stamp of royal authority.

Precisely the same instance is that of Phara respect to Joseph: (Gen. xli. 42.) "And I took off his ring (tabaath) from his hand, a it, and placed it on the hand of Joseph; which moment the power of life and death, civil government, although vested in Pharaoh transferred to Joseph; and since this ring ai the same name as the former, we may justly c that it was of the same nature. But here query. It is said these rings were worn on ti were they worn on the wrist or, being the finger, are they said to have been wore hand?

We have, however, an earlier instance of i and it should seem to be a seal-ring, as be property of the wearer, known by an appro priation—in the instance of Judah, (Gen. 18.) who left with Tamar his seal or signet haim. That this was a ring appear from the consideration of Judah's wearing i person. The word is used, too, in Jer. 3 "Though Coniah, son of Jehoiakim, were a ( haim) ring on my right hand;" and we have in 17., (Heb.) the act of sealing described by it a stone was brought and placed on the moun and, the king sealed it (haim) with his ri and the prince also sealed with their rings." Hence it appears that we have three words to denote a seal, or rather three different kinds of seals, denoted by three very distinct and different words. (1.) Hôthôm, which is used the earliest, we believe, in the instance of Judah; it denotes a seal of such a kind as a private person might carry about him. (2.) Thebath, a seal which we find worn by kings, as by Pharaoh and Absaeraus. (3.) Ethk, a seal employed both by the king and his princes; and therefore not appropriate restrictively to royalty. It is not said that this article was worn about the person.

Hôthôm, Mr. Taylor takes to be a general word for seal; and he thinks it means a precious stone, cut in the manner of seals. So we read, Exod. xxviii. 11: "Two onyx stones, the work of an engraver in stone, (seal-cutter,) engraved, or cut in, with the engravings, incisions, of a hôthôm. The same,* (ver. 21.) "The names of the children of Israel (twelve) were to be upon the twelve stones of the pectoral, like the engravings of a hôthôm; each stone containing one name;" also ver. 39. "And thou shalt make a plate (flower) of pure gold, and shalt make incisions—openings; that is, shall engrave upon it like the engraving of a hôthôm. "Holiness to the Lord." The same phrase (chap. xxxix. 6) expresses that the onyx stones were engraved with the engravings of a hôthôm; (also ver. 14.) and it deserves remark, how carefully these articles are described as being wrought with a peculiar, or at least with a distinct, species of engraving. Now, certainly, there could have been no room for this distinction, if no more than one manner of engraving letters had been known at that time. This, we see, was cut into the metal, or jewel, or seal; it was used in engraving the name of the proprietor on the seal belonging to him; it was used by private persons; and it was commonly known and understood. This remark has its influence on the question of the origin of writing. But we read in Exod. xxviii. 16, that the tables of the law contained writing engraved (vivo) upon them. What kind of engraving was this? It happens that the word occurs only in this place; the LXX renders it ἐνγραφήνων, which, if it be from the verb ἐγράφω, may signify cut out, or rather chiselled, that is, hollow lines, wrought in stone by a chisel, (or something similar to a chisel,) and driven through by a mallet, as ἐσκελπίζω is understood to signify; instrumentum lopicidarium malico simile, a hammer. This, possibly, was the idea intended to be conveyed by those interpreters; at least it is the idea which Mr. Taylor uses. But it appears to have been dissatisfied with the term, for he says, (2 Cor. iii. 7.) "If the ministration of death written with letters engraved on stones (interimvenit et legis) was glorious,* he has preferred a word of more general significature; formed, imaged, typified, in any manner. Under this uncertainty the English word chiselled may express this manner till a better is suggested.

The result of these inquiries is, that the devices, or marks, of certain seals, were incised cut into the metal; while those of others were raised for the purpose of stamping.

Among the representations of seals collected by Mr. Taylor, is one from Tavernier, being that of the first minister of state of some oriental prince. The seal, in the original, is set on the back of the patent, no man daring to affix his seal on the same side as the king's; and this Mr. Taylor thinks may give the true bearing of the apostle's expression: (2 Tim. ii. 18.) *The foundation of God standeth sure, having this motto around the seal,—this inscription, "The Lord knoweth them who are his." And this inscription is on the enclosed, the folded, side of the patent, not visible to us; whereas, on the open side, the exposed part of the patent, is the counter inscription, "Let all who name the name of Christ depart from iniquity;"—this character is conspicuous to all, and, as it were, a continuation of the former, its counterpart, and in perfect coincidence with it. The notion of a writing fully, amply confirmed, (that is, a royal patent,) suits this passage, he remarks, extremely well, even better than that of a foundation stone; for how can the inscription on such a stone be open for inspection? or why two mottoes? and, as appears, one on one side of it, the other on the other side? The security of God—his bond shibeth sure, absolutely immovable; its seal-motto is, "The Lord knoweth, approves, them who are his." This idea of a seal on the back of a writing, seems to be that of the apostle John, also: (iii. 33.)"He who hath received his (the Messiah's) testimony has set to, added, his seal, covenating—not properly confirming—the veracity of God." Circumcision was a seal, or a token in confirmation of a previous engagement. The Corinthians were seals of the apostle's ministry, conclusive evidences, like seals to a deed. In general the gifts of the God, the Holy Spirit, &c. were tokens of validity, given for confirmation of a delegated power to parties possessing them.

Sealing.—It is necessary to observe, that the method of sealing, mentioned in the sacred writings, does not restrictively imply a waxen seal, or a seal for evidence only, but to close up, to secure, by some solid, or glutinous matter. So Deut. xxxii. 34, "Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up (closed up, secured, for preservation) among my treasures?" In Job xxxviii. 14, a seal is mentioned as being made of clay; which, indeed, is customary in the East; and in Jer. xxxii. 14, a similar practice seems referred to, with regard to a certain deed which was enclosed in a roll of some strong substance, pitched over, to protect it from water, or surrounded with a coat of clay, to the same purpose, and placed at the bottom of an earthen vessel; while a writing not thus enclosed, or coated over, was laid among a quantity of dry matters, "stones, bricks, or sea-sand," above the vessel.

That the word sealing was so understood is shown by the authority of clossing, or cementing, which is allied to sealing in the East, appears in part from the following extract from Niebuhr: (vol. ii. p. 261.) "They sign their letters with a sort of cipher, to prevent the possibility of counterfeiting signatures; at least the great and the learned do so... Their letters folded are an inch in breadth, and the leaves are pasted together at one end. They cannot seal them, for wax is so soft in hot countries, that it cannot retain an impression. See further under clay, and Boox, p. 212.

Seal. The seal of Moses, on which the scribes and Pharisees sat, expresses the authority of the doctors of the law, and their office of teaching. Our Lord commanded that they should be heard, and respected; but he forbade that their actions should be made precedents, or themselves taken for examples. The seal of the sinner, mentioned in the first Psalm, alludes to the abominable discourse, and the licentious manners, of libertines, who corrupt equally by their scandalous example and conduct, as by their loose principles. The Hebrew says sealors, revilers, those pretended free-thinkers, who deride the simplicity of plain and honest minds. Solomon often speaks of them in his Proverbs, and carefully guards his pupil against their dangerous tongues, Prov. i. 22; iii. 34; ix. 7, 8, 12; xii. 1; xiv. 6; xv. 12; xix. 25; xx. 1, &c. The seat of honors, (Eccles. vii. 4), is the chief place in the synagogues, which the Pharisees assumed; (Matt. xxiii. 6), the seat prepared for Job in the assemblies; (Job xxix. 7) the seat or throne of the king, and that of God, are clear enough. The throne belongs to God, and to the king; the seat of honor to the friends of the king, and to great men. (Compare Bed.)

SECAEAH, a southern city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 61.)

SECRET, see MYSTERY.

SECT, a Latin word which has the same signification as the Greek word Heresia, though the sound is not so offensive to us. Among the Jews there were four sects, distinguished by their practices and opinions, yet united in communion with each other, and with the body of their nation, viz. the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenes, and the Herodians. (See the respective articles.) Christianity was originally considered as a new sect of Judaism; hence Tertullian, accusing Paul before Felix, says, that he was chief of the sedulous sect of the Nazarenes; (Acts xxiv. 5) and the Jews of Rome said to the apostle, when he arrived in this city, that "as to this sect, it was every where spoken against." Acts xxviii. 22. Peter (2 Epist. ii. 1–10) foretells that false teachers should arise among them, "who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, (or sects,) even denying the Lord that bought them, and bringing upon themselves swift destruction." He adds, that these people, being great lovers of themselves, are not afraid to introduce new sects; where the word sect is taken in the same sense as heresy.

Among the Greeks, philosophers were divided into different sects; as the Academics, the Stoics, the Peripatetics, the Cynics, the Epicureans, &c. The Jews, in imitation of the Greeks, began to divide themselves into sects, about the time of the Maccabees; and it seems as if the Corinthians had a mind to introduce something like this into Christianity, when they boasted, I am a disciple of Peter, I of Paul, I of Apollos, I Cor. i. 12; iii. 22, &c.

SECUNDUS, a disciple of Paul. (Acts xx. 4) but we know nothing of his life, farther than he was of Tessalonica, and followed the apostle from Greece into Asia, A. D. 58.

SEED, the prolific principle of future life, is taken in Scripture for posterity, whether of man, beasts, trees, &c. all of which are said to be "begotten," and to fructify, as the means of producing a succeeding generation, Jer. xxxi. 27. Hence seed denotes an individual, as Seth, in the seed of Abel, (Gen. iv. 15, et al. freq.) and the whole line of descent; as the seed of Abraham, of Jacob, &c. the seed-royal, &c. match in the same acceptation as children. The seed of Abraham denotes not only those who descend from him, by natural issue, but those who imitate his character, (Rom. iv. 16,) for, if he be "the father of the faithful," then the faithful are his seed, acter, independent of natural descent; and Messiah is said to see his seed, though in fact left no children by descent, but by grace or sion only, Isa. xi. 10. This is occasionally given to one chief, or principal, seed, one who has the name of the seed of the woman (Gen. iii. 15; Gal. iii. 16), the seed of Abraham, the seed of Abraham, the David, meaning the most excellent descends of Abraham, of Abraham, of David. Or, under the "seed of the woman," the offspring of the sex only; as verified in the supernatural case of Jesus, (Matt. i. 18, &c.; Luke i. 26, &c., which the birth of Abraham's seed (Isaac) figure.

Seed is taken figuratively for the word, (Luke viii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 22,) for a distinction of a divine origin, (1 John iii. 9,) and for true persons, Matt. xiii. 38.

SEEING, To SEE. This is said, not on sense of vision, by which we perceive extas, but also of inward perception, of the kn of spiritual things, and even of the supernatural or hidden things; of prophecy, visions, &c. Whence it is that those persons were former seers, who afterwards were called Nabi, or prophets, and that such prophecies were called vision PROPHET.

The verb to see, is used to express all sensations. It is said (Exod. xx. 15,) that there sees voices, thunder, lightnings, the sound trumpet, and the whole mountain of Sinai with clouds or smoke. To see good, or go enjoy them; "I believed to see the goodness Lord in the land of the living," Ps. xxvii. 10, I hope that God will bring me back into my owry, into the land of Juden, where I shall live and prosperity. Job says, (vii. 7) "I shall see me no more; I shall no longer enjoy the goo of this world." And the psalmist says, (L. There be many that say, who will show good?" that is, to enjoy any happiness in the world, to see the face of the king, is to be of his household, or to approach him. The Persia, to maintain their respect, and majesty permitted their subjects to see them, and had the honor of their acquaintance in public; so did intimate friends, or their familiar domestics, honor of beholding their faces, Esth. i. 10, I quent allusion is made to this custom in S which mentions the seven principal angels the face of the Lord, and appear in his p Rev. xiv. 10-13, and ANgel.

II. SEGEL, a son of Hiel of Bethel, who undertook to rebuild Jericho, was punished death of Abiram, his first-born son, who die was laying the foundation; and by the death glb his younger son, when he hung up the city. 1 Kings xvi. 34. See HIEL, and J.

I. SEIR, the Horite, whose dwelling was south of the Dead sea, in the mountains: where at first reigned his descendants, Gen. 21–30; 1 Chron. i. 38, &c. The posterity afterwards possessed the mountains of Seir, as themselves dwell there when Jacob returned fire opatimia, Gen. xxxii. 3; xxxii. 14; xxxx Moses informs us, (Deut. ii. 12,) that Esau m with the Horites, and destroyed them. S have lived very early, since his children were already a powerful and numerous people in the time of Abraham, before the birth of Isaac, when Chedorlaomer and his confederates came to make war against the kings of Pentapolis, Gen. xiv. 6.

This last mode of interpretation is rejected, stretching from the southern extremity of the Dead sea, to the gulf of Ezion-Geber. Mount Hor formed part of Seir, and the only part that retained its original name. Mount Seir is more particularly described under the article Ezion, p. 415.

There would seem to have been a mountain on the frontiers of Judah and Dan, bearing the name of Seir, Josh. xv. 10.

SELA, the name of a place mentioned in 2 Kings xiv. 7, where it is said that Amaziah, king of Judah, slew ten thousand men of Edom, in the valley of Salt, and took Selah by war, and called the name of it Joktheel. Selah in Hebrew signifies a rock, and answers to the Greek word Petra; whence it has been reasonably inferred that the city bearing this name, and which was the celebrated capital of Arabia Petraea, is the place mentioned by the sacred historian. There are two places, however, which contend for the honor of having been the capital of the Nabateans, or Agarceans—Kerek, and Wady Mouse; but the extensive ruins which have been discovered in the latter place, has induced most writers to consider this as the site of the ancient Petra, though in opposition to the traditions of the people who inhabit the country. Mr. Manndorf has followed those writers who think that both Kerek and Wady Mouse appear to have been called Petra by the Greeks, and each to have been the capital of the country, though in different ages. In proof that the former was so called, he remarks, that when the expedition of the Macedonian Greeks, which Antigonus sent against the Nabateans, or under the command of his son Demetrius, first penetrated into this country, we are informed by Diodorus that this people placed their old men, women and children, upon a steep rock, having only one access to the summit, and situate three hundred stadia beyond the lake Asphaltites. Now, both the description and position of this place agree with Kerek, as described by Burckhardt; while the city of Wady Mouse appears to the west of Petra, or to the north of the lake, and to be in a deep glen, instead of on a precipitous rock. He conceives, however, that in process of time, and probably from increase of commerce, or for better security, or as lying in a more central position, the new city was built in Wady Mouse, the probable site of a former city of the Edomites, to which the name of the old capital was transferred, and with equal propriety, for here, too, all was rock; while the old city was distinguished by its indigenous name of Kerek, moulded by the Greeks into Charax.

The remains in the valley of Wady Mouse, which are described by Burckhardt and Legh, and by captains Isby and Mangles, attest the splendor of the former city. At the western end of the valley, the road ascends to the high platform on which mount Hor and the tomb of Aaron stand; in the vicinity of which Josephus and Eusebius agree in placing the ancient city. A full description of Wady Mouse under CANTAB, p. 238, 239.

SELAH, a musical term, which occurs frequently in the Psalms, and is found also in Hab. iii. 3, 9, 13. It usually occurs at the end of a period or strophe; but sometimes at the end only of a clause. According to Gascinski, this difficult word may be explained in three different ways: either directly, as symphony, (so the Sept. διάρμα) or as pause of the song, when the instruments strike up, i.e. symphony, as before; or again, some suppose the word to consist of the initial letters of three words, signifying da capo, repeat, etc. This last mode of interpretation, but does not decide in respect to the others. (See his Lexicon.) R.

I. SELEUCIA, a name given by king Seleucus to the city of Gadara, which see.

II. SELEUCIA, a city of Syria, on the Mediterranean, near where the river Orontes falls into it. Paul and Barnabas embarked at Seleucia, for Cyprus, Acts xiii. 4. The coins of this city are remarkable for exhibiting four different eras: first, that of the Seleucides, in the year of Rome, 442; that of its own laws, 645 of Rome, under the reign of Antoninus VIII.; that of Pompey, in the year of Rome, 600; and that of Augustus, in the year of Rome, 723.

SELLING. The Hebrews might sell their own liberty; and fathers might sell that of their children, Lev. xxv. 39. If your brother sells himself to you because of his poverty, you shall not oppress him, nor sell him again as a slave: he shall abide with you only as a workman for hire. Maimonides says, that a Hebrew could not sell his liberty, but in extreme necessity. Exod. xx. 17. "If a Hebrew come to be a maid-servant, she shall not go out as the maidservant do." Her master shall not dismiss her, as a man-slayer is dismissed at the sabbatical year. He shall take her as his wife, or shall marry her to his son. If he can give her a wife, she shall be set free as a slave.

SENIR, mount Hermon was so called by the Amorites, Deut. iii. 8, 9; 1 Chron. v. 25.

SENNACHERIB, king of Assyria, son and successor of Shalmaneser, began to reign, A. M. 3290; and reigned but four years, 3294. Hezekiah, king of Judah, having shaken off the yoke of the Assyrians, by which Ahaz, his father, had suffered under Tiglath-pileser, Sennacherib marched an army against him, and took all the strong cities of Judah. Hezekiah, seeing he had nothing left but Jerusalem, which he, perhaps, found it difficult to preserve, sent ambassadors to Sennacherib, then at Nineveh, saying, "I have committed a fault; but withdraw your army out of my territories, and I will bear whatever you shall impose upon me." Sennacherib demanded three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, which Hezekiah remitted to him. Sennacherib received the tribute, but refused to leave

Mr. Taylor has devoted several fragments consideration of the ancient sepulchres of in Philistia, or in which a part of the town was on Mount Calvary. He has collected much and, to the antiquarian and historian, much information; but a great deal of it is useless elucidation of Scripture. We shall make use these more justly.

It is more than possible, that if we could nate accurately the meaning of words emp the sacred writers, we should find them ade a surprising precision to the subjects on w might, probably, afford convincing evidence perhaps, it is a leading idea in passages w not hitherto been observed. The numerous or be, properly, descriptive of, that mode which prevails among ourselves. Single gr ments customary in this country, as are the East.

Nor is it unlikely that the mode of burial i

The changes of persons, and genders, and phrases in these verses are extremely perplexing, and equally unaccountable; and a strict representation of the passage, verbatim, would be less intelligible than this looser version. Here we have Ashur or Assyria, Elam or Persia, Meshech and Tubal, the present Muscovy and Siberia, also Edom, the Zidonians and the countries adjacent, north of Sidon, perhaps as far as Antioch, &c. (certainly, not intending the north of Europe) — and though the condition of these is described, generally, in nearly the same terms, yet there are remarkable variations introduced by the prophet. From the sepulchres of the kings, yet extant in Egypt, we know that the sovereigns were, as we may say, buried in society, many sepulchres encircling the area, and several chambers in one sepulchre. Of the Assyrian kingdom but little, that country being almost new to our researches; yet we have every reason to confide in the correctness of the prophet, who speaks of the sides of the pit (that is, the cells in those sides) as being inhabited. Persia, we know, cut sepulchres in rocks, of which evidences are yet remaining. Not so (probably) Meshech and Tubal; they threw up vast barrows over their valiant leaders; their followers who fell with them shared in the same highly raised mound: they made a point of honor of burying their weapons and military ornaments with the dead; and their swords are found under the heads of their skel-tons to this day: — Susque arma viro, as Virgil speaks. Dr. Clarke's notices (and views) of the nuumerous barrows in the steppes of Russia, are sufficient evidence on this subject; and the phrase "In-quities (ravages, perhaps) shall lie heavy on their bones," is an allusion to the weight of earth under which they are deposited. It is the very contrary of the ancient wish; " Light lie the earth upon them." The sepulchres of Edom are illustrated by what our countrymen have found in the ancient Petra. The princes of the north of Syria and of Asia Minor have left wonderful proofs of their powers in excavating rocks, of which every day affords new discoveries.
(See the publications of the Dilettante Society of modern Travellers—Dr. Clarke, Burchhardt, Legh, Irby and Mangles, Beaumont, Walpole, &c.) Those of the Zidonians have been described by Maundrell, Shaw, and others. Dr. Shaw describes the crypts at Latikea, or Laodicca, in the northern part of Syria, as being sepulchral chambers, hollowed in the rocky ground, some of which are ten, others twenty or thirty, feet square, but not proportionate in height.
The descent into them is artfully contrived. A range of narrow cells, wide enough to receive a sarcophagi, and long enough for two or three, runs along the sides of most of them, and appear to be the only provision that has been made for the reception of the dead. . . The sepulchral chambers near J ebilee, Tortosa, and the Serpent mountain, together with those that are commonly called the Royal sepulchres at Jerusalem, are all of them exactly of the same workmanship and contrivance with the crypts of Latikea.

It is somewhat remarkable that the prophet omits the sovereignty of Babylon. Was this because Babylon, being built on marshy ground, afforded no opportunity for excavating sepulchres in rocks? It does not appear that such sepulchres could be formed in that city. What places of interment have hitherto been discovered, are in erections above ground. Mr.
Rich mentions them; but he found them in masses of brick work. Still, it is impossible to overlook the occupied, it may be supposed, by individuals of the same family; others are buildings of at least one story in height, and, by doors and windows, or openings, seen as if they might, on occasion, accommodate the living; as indeed we find by several travelers who have taken refuge in them that they do. This will elucidate the circumstances of the demoniacs, who dwelt about at Emmaus, and of the two travelers, mentioned in the eighteenth chapter, who saw him and believed; and the tenth chapter, where it is said, "and some waited the resurrection of Jesus; and have seen his glory," as recorded by the apostle Paul (Phil. iii. 12). And we see how readily they might serve as habitations to those unhappy sufferers. They show, also, the propriety of our Lord's comparison of the Pharisees to white, embellished, beautiful, sepulchres; handsome without, but polluted within: and the opportunities persons professing extraordinary zeal for God, or regard for his servants, might have, of "garnering the sepulchres of the righteous," as well as of repairing, or "building, the monuments of the prophets:" (Matt. xxiii. 27.) which at the same time as they paid unsolicited, and even extraneous honor to the dead, they detracted, dejected, or persecuted the living; who addressed them with messages of the divine will, with authority superior to that of the dead, and the pleasure of such solicitous attentions, to admire and to reverence.

Some erection certainly, though probably of much smaller dimensions than many of these, did Jacob construct and the grave of Rachel; perhaps a simple pillar within an enclosure, Gen. xxxv. 20. That called the tomb of Rachel, near Bethlehem, has no just pretensions to such remote antiquity.

The reader will recollect the descriptive epitaph of Job (chap. xxv. 22), which, perhaps, may be thus understood: "in like manner (that is, as the pillar of sand is dissolved) thou wilt turn my face, or direct my passage toward death; and toward the house which has long been, and ever is in continual preparation to receive the bones of him, who, in conversation, is the psalmist's idea: (ver. 9.) The throat of the wicked is an open sepulchre; ever ready to devour; constantly gaping to receive all comers: and to this Jeremiah very forcibly likens the quiver of the Chaldeans: "It is an open sepulchre:" certain death; insatiable; swallowing up all. Hell, the grave, and destruction, are never full, (Prov. xxvii. 20.) but keep continually crying, Give, give, ch. xxx. 15, 16.

The representations which Le Brun has given of such sepulchres, at certain lights into the rock, at Nazi Rustam, near Persepolis, in Persia, show that they must have been works of great labor and expense, beyond the powers of ordinary persons, and must have employed many laborers, and for a long time. Vain solicitude for a kind of terrestrial, posthumous immortality! This gives a spirit to the exultation of the prophet Isaiah (chap. xxvi. 16.) with Shebna the treasurer:—What hast thou here? what lasting settlement dost thou expect? that thou hast hewn thee out a sepulchre, here, like as one heweth out at a great height his sepulchre; that cuttest out at a great expense a habitation, for himself, after death, a dwelling, a residence, in the solid rock: it shall be finite; for the Lord shall take thee, as a ball, into a large country, where thou shalt die;" &c. It may be thought, that Shebna had actually constructed a magnificent monument, si be et suis, as the Latin speak: the contrast of such stability, with the rollings of a ball into a far country, is very strong. That Shebna meant to settle where he built his sepulchre; that he connected the idea of security with it, is very credible. Will this apply to the pharsology of Balaam: (Numb. xxiv. 21.) "He said of the Kenites, Strong is thy dwelling-place, where thou passest thy life: and thou dost dwell in a rock thy nest, wherein thou dost possess a place more than thy decrease, that is thy sepulchre: notwithstanding this thou shalt be beard," &c. It is by no means certain that this is the true sense; because, we often read in Scripture of inhabitants of rocks—nevertheless, this sense may be included; especially, when we consider the strong affection of the Orientals toward the places of sepulchre appropriated to their families. (See 2 Sam. xix. 33; Neh. ii. 3.)

From the general constructions of these sepulchres, we see the propriety of Scripture allusions to their various parts; as to the gates of hell—of hades, the unseen world; the lowest hell—hades, &c. We see also the attention bestowed on his sepulchre by the party himself, while living. It is very probable that sepulchre was buried in the garden of his house, (2 Kings xxiv. 16) and not non were buried in the sepulchre in the garden of Uzzah. Hence the sepulchre of Lazarus (John xi. 38.) is explained—distinguished—as being a cave; a chamber somewhat sunk into the ground; and hence, we find, Joseph of Arimathea had prepared a very large, and not dug (like graves) in the earth, but into the heart of a rock; hence Samuel was buried in his own house, that is, garden, probably, at Ramah, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. Manasseh was buried in the garden of his house, (2 Kings xxiv. 16) and not non were buried in the sepulchre in the garden of Uzzah. Hence the sepulchre of Lazarus (John xi. 38.) is explained—distinguished—as being a cave; a chamber somewhat sunk into the ground; and hence, we find, Joseph of Arimathea had prepared a very large, and not dug (like graves) in the earth, but into the heart of a rock; hence Samuel was buried in his own house, that is, garden, probably, at Ramah, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. Manasseh was buried in the garden of his house, (2 Kings xxiv. 16) and not non were buried in the sepulchre in the garden of Uzzah.

It is customary, when a sepulchre is not in a garden, to surround it with fragrant herbs, flowers, &c.; hence, the allusions to favorable situations for sepulchres; "The clogs of the valley shall be sweet unto him." If the reader will bear in mind these distinct kinds of sepulchres, he will find many places in Scripture become more intelligible by means of such discrimination, since what is descriptive of one kind, is inapplicable to others.

We find in Scripture various appellations given to the sepulchre; among others, that of the house appointed for all living—the longingly curiously—a rock—a rock not dug (like graves) in the earth, but into the heart of a rock; hence Samuel was buried in his own house, that is, garden, probably, at Ramah, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. Manasseh was buried in the garden of his house, (2 Kings xxiv. 16) and not non were buried in the sepulchre in the garden of Uzzah. Hence the sepulchre of Lazarus (John xi. 38.) is explained—distinguished—as being a cave; a chamber somewhat sunk into the ground; and hence, we find, Joseph of Arimathea had prepared a very large, and not dug (like graves) in the earth, but into the heart of a rock; hence Samuel was buried in his own house, that is, garden, probably, at Ramah, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. Manasseh was buried in the garden of his house, (2 Kings xxiv. 16) and not non were buried in the sepulchre in the garden of Uzzah.

It is customary, when a sepulchre is not in a garden, to surround it with fragrant herbs, flowers, &c.; hence, the allusions to favorable situations for sepulchres; "The clogs of the valley shall be sweet unto him." If the reader will bear in mind these distinct kinds of sepulchres, he will find many places in Scripture become more intelligible by means of such discrimination, since what is descriptive of one kind, is inapplicable to others. This rest, o f the kind in an inscription in Gruter, (p. 696.) and in another, (p. 934.) Fecit sibi sepulchrae; He made himself a resting-place. (See Job iii. 13, 17, 18; xvii. 14.) "This resting-place is called frequently, too, an eternal house; in his eyes he built himself an eternal house; says one epitaph, 'He made himself an eternal house with his patrimony,' says another. 'He thought it better (says another epitaph) to build himself an eternal house, than to desire his heir to do it? and another, 'He put an inscription upon his eternal house.' And another, 'He made a perpetual house for his good and immortal companion.' They thought it a misfortune, when the bones and ashes of the dead were removed from their place, as imagining the dead suffered something by the removal of their bones. This notion occasioned all those precautions used for the safety of their tombs, and the curses they laid on those who removed them.
sparrow, &c., of which I myself am witness." These serpents, Mr. Taylor thinks, are not unlike in size to the Rattles; one of their feet is in length, and the other, where narrow, one and a half. One is spotted, black and white, the other is gray, black and white in bands. Both are fatal. The Rattles follow their venom, as in other serpents. The epithet deaf is observable; for in Ps. viii. 4, deafness is ascribed to the Pethen. It is also mentioned in Job xxi. 4.

(3.) The Sdruf, or flying serpent, derives its name from a root which signifies to burn, either on account of its vivid fiery color, or from the heat and burning pain occasioned by its bite. In Numb. xxi. 6, &c., we read that these venomous creatures were employed by God to chastise the unbelieving and rebellious Israelites, in consequence of which many of them died, the rest being saved from the effects of the calamitous visitation, through the appointed medium of the brazen serpent, which Moses was enjoined to raise upon a pole in the midst of the camp, and which was a striking type of the promised Saviour, John iii. 14, 15. In Isa. xxxiv. 29, and chap. xxxv. 6, the same word, with an additional epithet, is used, and is translated in our Bible "fiery flying serpents;" and if we may rely on the testimony of the ancients a cloud of witnesses may be produced, who speak of these flying serpents; although we do not find that any of them affirm they actually saw such a creature. Michæelis, however, so far influenced by these testimonies, that in his eighty-third question, he recommends it to travellers to inquire after the existence and nature of flying serpents. In conformity with these instructions, Niebuhr communicated the following information: Description de l’Arabie, p. 186. "There is at Bakr a sort of serpents which they call

Heie surwur, or

Heie thidra. They commonly keep upon the date-trees; and, as it would be laborious for them to come down from a very high tree in order to ascend another, they twist themselves by the tail to a branch of the former, which, making a spring by the motion they give it, throw themselves to the second. Hence it is that the modern Arabs call them flying serpents, Heie thidra. I know not whether the ancient Arabs of whom Michæelis speaks in his eighty-third question, saw any other flying serpents." Niebuhr refers also to lord Anson’s report of flying serpents in the island of Quibbo. The passage is as follows: The Spaniards, too, informed us, that there was often found in the woods a most mischievous serpent, called the flying snake, which, they said, darted itself from the boughs of trees on either man or beast that came within its reach, and whose sting they took to be inevitable death. (Voyage, by Walter, p. 308. Svo. 1748.) After citing these passages, we may conclude that the Sdruf mœphemep mentioned in the passages we have referred to, was of that species of serpent, which, from their snaking motion, the Greeks called Acontias, and the Romans Jaculus; and to these the term mœphemep seems as properly applicable in Hebrew, as Vouer, which Lucan applies to them in Latin, Jaculique volutus.

(4.) The Cerastes, or Horned Viper, is among the most deadly of the serpent tribe, and is distinguished by the peculiarity of its horns. It is numerous in Egypt and Syria, so that it could not escape the notice and illusions of the sacred writers. Mr. Bruce has published an interesting letter to a correspondent with a concise account of its manners, part of which we shall extract. He says "There is no article of natural history the ancients have dwelt on more than that of the viper, whether poets, physicians, or historians. All have enlarged on the particular sizes, colors, and qualities, yet the knowledge of their manners is but little extended.

"I have travelled across the Cyrenaicum in all directions, and never saw but one species of viper, which was the Cerastes, or Horned Viper; neither did I ever see any of the snake kind that could be mistaken for the viper.... One name under which the Cerastes goes, is equivoque, and has been misunderstood in Scripture: that is, tisboc, which name is given it in Hebrew from its different colors and spots. And hence the Greeks have called it by the name of Atena, because it is of the same reddish color, marked with black spots, as that quadruped is. And the same fable is applied to the serpent and the quadruped, that they change their sex yearly. The Cerastes hides itself all day in holes in the sand, where it lives in contiguous and similar houses to those of the jebus; and I have already said, that I never but once found any animal in this viper’s belly but one jebus in a gravid female Cerastes.

"The Cerastes moves with great rapidity, and in all directions, forwards, backwards and sideways. When he inclines to surprise any one who is too far from him, he creeps with his side towards the person, and his head arched, till, judging his distance, he turns round, springs upon him, and fastens upon the part next to him; for it is not true what is said, that the Cerastes does not leap or spring. I saw one of them at Cairo, in the house of Julian and Ross, crawl up the side of a box, in which there were many, and there lie still as if hiding himself, till one of the people who brought them to us came near him, and, though in a very disadvantageous posture, sticking, as it were, perpendicular to the side of the box, he leaped near the distance of three feet, and fastened between the man’s fore finger and thumb, so as to bring the blood.

"Of the incantation of serpents, there is no doubt of its reality. The Scriptures are full of it. All that have seen or heard in Egypt have seen as many different instances as they chose. Some have doubted that it was a trick, and that the animals so handled had been trained, and then disarmed of their power of hurting; and, fond of the discovery, they have rested themselves upon it, without experiment, in the face of all antiquity. But I will not hesitate to aver, that I have seen at Cairo (and this may be seen daily without trouble or expense) a man who came from above the catacombs, where the pits of the mummy-birds are kept, who has taken a Cerastes with his naked hand from a number of others lying at the bottom of the tub, has put it upon his bare head, covered it with the common red cap he wears, then taking it out, put it in his breast, and tied it about his neck like a necklace; after which it has been applied to a hen, and bit it, which has died in a few minutes; and, to complete the experiment, the man has taken it by the neck, and beginning at its tail, has ate it as one would do a carrot or a stock of celery, without any seeming repugnance. ... I can myself vouch, that all the black people in the island of Sicily, whatever be the name whether Funge or Nuba, are perfectly armed against the bite of either scorpion or viper. They take the Cerastes in their hand at all times, put them in their bosoms, and throw them to one another, as children throw pebbles; they have never irritated them by this usage so much as to bite." See INSECTA.
"Horned Viper," and is distinguished by two small horns or ossicle eyes, was adopted as a hieroglyphic among the Egyptians, and appears not only on obelisks, columns of temples, statues, and walls of palaces, but on mummies also.

The Cerastes have always been considered as extremely cunning, both in seizing their enemies, and in seizing their prey; they have been named insidious, and it is reported of them that they hide themselves in holes adjacent to the highways, and in the runs of wheels, in order more suddenly to spring upon passengers.

Calmes, as we have seen, thinks the Shekhphönon, to which the tribe of Dan is compared, (Gen. xix. 17.) might be the Cerastes; and it is so rendered by the Vulgate. Michaelis observes, that this serpent is called by the Oriental, "the fer in ambusa." Pliny says, that "the Cerastes hides its whole body in the sand, leaving only its horns exposed; which attract birds, who suppose them to be grins of barley, till they are undeceived, too late, by the darting of the serpent upon them."

Michaelis, however, finds a difficulty in the mode of attack used by the Hebrew Shekhphönon on "the heels of a horse, so as to make his rider fall backward." He supposes that the phrase restrictively means, that the horse throws the rider off behind him, and says, "I should be curious to know how that is accomplished. Commentators commonly say, because the horse rears up when wounded in the heel. Peribas, they are bad horses. In such circumstances, a horse would kick rather than rear upon his hind legs; and the rider would be thrown over his neck, rather than over the crupper." Mr. Taylor admits the force of this observation, and therefore doubts whether the word rendered backward should be restrictively so taken. He proposes to explain the phrase by supposing, that when the Cerastes bites the horse in one of his legs, the horse kicking out that leg, and his rider perceiving the case, would, to avoid the serpent, throw himself off on the further side of the horse from where the serpent was; and this, he thinks, sufficiently meets the meaning of the Hebrew word.

There is another circumstance in which Dan probably resembled the Cerastes—that of feeding full, and then sinking into torpidity. The document before the spies by the plains, (Judges xix. 9-10,) are precisely adapted to a tribe of this character; and the end of this chapter informs us, that they set up the graven image, had their priests, and here they remained, "till the day of the captivity of the land," that is, from their flight and interment with the general affairs of Israel, and determinately settled, apart from their brethren. (See verses 7, 25.)

For an account of the other serpents enumerated above, the reader is referred to the respective articles.

Interpreters have largely speculated concerning the nature of that serpent which tempted Eve. Some have thought, that serpents originally had feet and speech; but there is no probability that this creature ever was otherwise than it now is. Besides, it cannot be doubted, but that by the serpent, (Vachabas,), we are to understand the devil, who merely employed the serpent as a vehicle to seduce the first woman, Gen. iii. 13. (See Balaam.) In the curse of God on the serpent, he said that the seed of the woman should bruise his head: (Rash;) because, the serpent having his heart under his throat, the readiest way to kill him is to crush or cut off his head. Another part of the curse was, that it should turn its body, Gen. iii. 14. Isaiah also says, (lxix. 5.) shall be the serpent's meat." And Micah, (v.) "They shall lick the dust like a serpent." It that serpents eat flesh, birds, frogs, fish, fruits, &c. But as they continually creep on the earth in search of their food, they may be said to be with dust and dirt. Some may really eat out of necessity; or earth-worms, which they swallow without much dirt.

The worship of the serpent is observable in all pagan antiquity. The Babylonians, in 1 time, worshipped a dragon, which was born by this prophet. It is well known that worst paid to the serpent at Epidaurus; and in a place in which they pretended he was brought to The Egyptians sometimes presented their with the bodies of serpents; and they paid it a vious worship to those odious and dangerous creatures, which they called their good genii, regarded them as symbols of medicine, of the Apothe. They were committed to the care of Proserpine; and Herodotus says, that, near Thesee, were to be seen pents, consecrated to Jupiter.

One would have supposed, says Mr. Tay, speaking upon this custom, that the effigy of the serpent would have been executed, and at all by mankind; and that the mere proposi ship this reptile would have raised the detesta the whole human race; but fact justifies us in that no kind of worship has been more p How can this be accounted for? This he is to investigate, by considering, (1.) the serpent nothing or producing evil: (2.) The serpent noting or producing good; which, contradicts it may appear, yet is founded on fact. (3.) It serpent as denoting a family or nation; and is, as denoting a being of supernatural power.

That the serpent tribe, from possessing all active powers of destruction, has been cursed a source of evil, or as producing calamity, known. In India the destroying power, or signified by the serpent. In classic antiquity, giants who attempted to scale heaven are called half-serpents; and in the northern mythology, the genius of evil, is styled "the father of titans," the father of the Levites, the adversary of the gods," &c. N. Antiq. vol. ii. p. 190.) The coincidence of the Sathan of Scripture striking, Scripture descriptions of the serpent are as follows:

On the other hand, the serpent has always lived for its motion; possessing neither nor feet, nor other exterior members able to make progress, its motion is nevertheless speedy, and even rapid; it springs, leaps, and or climbs and glides, not merely with ease, but with alacrity. Solomon observes this, in Prov. 3 and others have equally remarked it as an exact and wonder. The serpent, also, shows is, and after this manner, he shows by the flowers of its colors, and the vivacity of its operation, that it has acquired new life.

The serpent is still domesticated in many dwellings of the natives of Eastern India; a tribe of Western Africa carry him in their hair. It is true, the serpent tribe divides into these harmless, and those which are malignant the malignant in India, at least, enjoy equal legen with the harmless. Pausanias says, "All the dragons [had] naked eyes," and particularly that species which is of the clearest yellow, are esteemed sacred to Esculapius, and are familiar with mankind." (Lib. ii. cap. 28.) Pliny also speaks of the Eusebian snake, which is commonly fed, and resident in houses. As for Esculapius, he was adored in Epirus under the form of a serpent; under which form he is said to have been brought to Rome, A. U. 463. The Egyptians, as we have said, had a small serpent which they called Aepathodemon, that is, "good genius," and Eusebius says the same of the Phoenixes.

From these and many other instances which might be referred to, it is evident that the serpent has been acknowledged under the contradictory characters of a promotor of good, and a promoter of evil; and has also been regarded as belonging to a rank of beings superior to man.

That Scripture usually presents the serpent under an evil designation is admitted; but possibly those embarrasments which have arisen from the history of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, might be removed, by accepting the benevolent character of the serpent. Why must his malignant powers be presented to us, when considering this instance of salutary virtue? Why should Israel be prohibited from considering him (symbolically) in the same light as other nations then and afterwards did? Why should he not be savour to them, on this occasion, (symbolically) as well as to Gentiles? Why may not Moses adopt the favorable notion of this reptile, as well as the unfavorable? Did not all antiquity do the same? And if all antiquity did so, why should we be startled at it here? We know well, that when pressed, by enemies to revelation, to explain how the serpent, in the essence of evil, could, on this occasion, be connected with the idea of restoration, Christian divines have given various answers, on other principles; all of which may be proper; nor are they superseded by this favorable reference of the symbol. If this be admitted, then we may discern, as Mr. Taylor observes, greater propriety in our Lord's allusion to this history than we have previously been aware of. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that Whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: That, as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, such as look upon it, live; even so must the Son of man be lifted up: (John v. 14, 15, 34.)"

"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: That, as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, (John v. 34, 35.)"

So the Philistines, Syrians, and other nations were servants of David; i. e. they obeyed and paid him tribute.

The servants of God are those who are devoted to his service, and obey his written word.

SETH, a son of Adam and Eve, was born A. M. 130, (Gen. v. 3.) in the age of 105 years. He died A. M. 1042, and was the chief of the "children of God," (Gen. vi. 2.) who preserved the true religion and piety, which the descendants of Cain had abandoned.

SEVEN. As from the beginning this was the number of days in the week, so it has ever in Scripture a sort of emphasis attached to it, and is very often and generally used as a round number, or, as some would say, a perfect number. Clean beasts were taken into the ark by sevens, Gen. vii. The years of plenty and famine in Egypt were marked by sevens, Gen. xii. With the Jews, not only was there a seventh day sabbath, but every seventh year was a sabbath, and every seven times seventh year was a jubilee. Their great feasts of unleavened bread and of tabernacles, were observed for seven days; the number of animals in many of their sacrifices was limited to seven. The golden candlestick had seven branches. Seven priests with seven trumpets went around the walls of Jericho seven times; and seven times seven on the seventh day. In the Apocalypse we find seven churches addressed; seven candlesticks, seven spirits, seven stars, seven seals, seven trumpets, seven thunders, seven vials, seven plagues, and seven angels to pour them out. Seven seem often put for any round or whole number, just as we use ten, or a dozen. (So in Matt. xii. 45; I Sam. ii. 5; Job v. 19; Prov. xxvi. 16, 25; Isa. iv. 1; Jer. xv. 9.) In like manner seven times or seven fold means often, abundantly, completely, Gen. iv. 15, 16; Lev. xxv. 24; Ps. xii. 6; lxix. 19; Matt. xviii. 21. And seventy times seven is still a higher superlative, Matt. xviii. 23, 32.

SHADDAI, or SADDAI, or SADDAI, or SADDA, or SADDAI, or SADDAI, a city of Dan, (Josh. xix. 42.) adjoining to Ajalon and Heres, (Judg. i. 35.) and near the cities of Dan and Ashdod.

SADDAI, a city of Simeon, (1 Chron. iv. 31.) apparently the Sharam of Judah, (Josh. xv. 36.) which was transferred to Simeon.

SHADDAI, one of the Hebrew names of God, which the LXX and Jerome generally translate God-Almighty. Job frequently uses it than any other of the sacred writers. It is sometimes joined with El, which is another name of God, El-Shaddai, God-Almighty, Gen. xvii. 1.

Shaddai has been derived from the Arabic wад, to ascend, or sit in the highest place; and in this view it is synonymous with מָשָׁל Most High. It has also been derived from wע, to be strong, to prevail; which sense the Vulgate and our translators give, Gen. xviii. 1. Others derive it from wע, he that is sufficient, all-bountiful, or all-sufficient. These derivations are far more suitable than that from wע, to destroy, which Calmet adopts. But it seems the most natural to take the word wע as the pluralis cardinale, of the singular form wע, mighty, cognate with the Arabic wavד, wavד, mighty, violent.

SHADDAI, the privation of light by an object interposed between a luminary and the surface on which the shadow appears. But it is credible that light which is under the term shadows, or darkness; such defects, says the apostle, may be in the sun, but there are none in God. A shadow, falling on a plane, follows the course of the body which causes it. hence it is often extremely swift, as that of a bird flying, which very rapidly, indeed, appears, and disappears from observation; human life is compared to this, 1 Cor. xxix. 15.

As the shadow of a man, &c. when it falls on the ground, is of different lengths at different times of the day, and as the time of the day was originally estimated by this, the first sun-dial, so it is very natural that the birdling, who wished his day of labor ended, should desire the shadow, (Job vii. 2,) meaning the long shadow falling on the ground, and lasting in the shadow of night itself. Indeed, it seems to have been customary in later ages, to estimate the time of the day by the length of the shadow; so we have in Aristophanes, Conon: "When the letter of the alphabet denoted the shadow to be ten feet long, it was time to think of dressing and going to supper," that is, the sun began to grow low; for twelve feet was the full length of the shadow. (Comp. Ps. cxii. 1; Jer. vi. 4.)

An Arab, when relating the history of his day's march, says, "We started at day-break, we rested at noon near the water, we set out again, when a man's shadow was equal to his length, and after sunset we lighted and slept, in such or such a place," This is still the eastern phraseology, as remarked by Burekhard, Trav. vol. i. p. 180.

Shadows are also taken for unsubstantial; so Job says, "My members are a shadow;" (xvii. 7) that is, they are diminished to a total, or comparative, privation of substance. Hence, the Messiah is called a shadow, a very obscure representation of things, which in the gospel are clearly revealed. But it is thought that this word (Heb. x. 1) alludes to the sketch of an artist or painter, who first forms with chalk on his canvas, the rude outlines of his subject, a just visible, rough, merely indicative representation of what is to be afterwards finished correctly and carefully. To this is strongly opposed the complete image, the beautiful statue exhibited in the gospel; yet this statue, be it remembered, is not living, not animated; the full perfection of life, motion, sensibility and happiness is reserved for the world of bliss and glory, the celestial state.

Shadow is taken for the obscurity of night, for the total absence of light in a night of clouds; and hence "the shadow of death," immense darkness; to which add, the horror which naturally attends the tomb, and the unexplored regions of death; the valley of the shadow of death; gloom and dismal terrors, horrors fatal and perpetual.

This word is taken in a sense directly contrary to this, because in countries near the tropics, every spot exposed to the burning heat of the sun is dangerous to health, therefore nothing is more acceptable than shade, nothing more refreshing, or more salutary; hence the shadow of a great rock is desirable in a land of weariness; (Isa. xxxii. 2.) hence shadow signifies protection; (Isa. xxxii. 2; Dan. iv. 12; Hos. iv. 13) hence the shadow of wings in a bird is protection also, and hence the shadow, that is, protection of God, Ps. xxvii. 5; xvii. 7; vii. 1; Isa. xlix. 2. Perhaps the word shade, however, might in these phrases be preferable to shadow, and would preserve a distinction.

SHADRACH, the Chaldean name given to筋, a companion of Daniel, at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. 7. See ANANIAS.

SHALISH, or BAAL-SHALISH, is mentioned in Isaiah iv. 4, and Baal-shalishah, 2 Kings iv. 42. It was fifteen miles from Diospolis, in the canton Thmimites, north of Jerusalem. See LISHA.

I. SHALISH, of Naphata, chief of tii Numb. xxvi. 49.

II. SHALISH, son of Jabez, or a native of Tishbe, Zebulun, Israel, and usurped his kingdom. He held it one month, when Menahem, son of Gadi, in Samaria. Scripture says, that Shallash, the executioner of the threatenings of the Lord on the house of Jehu, 2 Kings xv. 10. A. M. 3

III. SHALISH, son of Tikvah, or Tishai, native of Tikvah, husband of the prophet's dam, who lived under Josiah, king of Judah, xxiv. 14.

IV. SHALISH, fourth son of Josiah, Judah, (1 Chron. iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 11) and as Jehoahaz, was made king after the death of Josiah. He was slain by the king of Egypt, carried prisoner to Egypt, (2 Kings xxiii. 30, 33.) See JEHOOAHAZ.

V. SHALISH, son of Korah, 1 Chr. xxvi. 26, and fled to Hilkiah, high-priest, 1 Chron. 26. He is called Meshullam in 1 Chron. xiv. 11, in the time of Hezekiah or of Ahaz. He was the Salom of Baruch 1. 7.

VI. SHALISH, son of Korah, 1 Chr. 26. He is mentioned as a high-priest in the Old Testament; but nothing is known of him.

SHALMANESER, king of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser, and had Samacharib for his son. He ascended the throne A. M. 3278, reigned, and died A. M. 3290. 2 Kings xxiv. 3. It is to be noticed, that the word of the Targum is not from the Greek (L.) and Shalman, in Hosea x. 14. Supports that he came into Palestine, subdued and obliged Hoshea, son of Elah, to pay him tribute in the third year, being weary of the burden of Hadiel Shahdah combined secretly with Shalman, the king of Assyria, against him, ravaged Samaria, his capital, and notwithstanding his resistance for three years, (2 Kings xxiv. xxvii. 9, 13; xxxi. 17, 31,) he, by the power of the Assyrian king, and the united forces of the people beyond the Euphrates, not only the city and kingdom of Samaria, but 251 years from A. M. 3290, to 3237, Profane authors say, that this policy against the Tyrians. That is, the power of the king of Tyre, Shalman, who marched with all his forces against the Tyrians. At his approach, the city of Shalmaneser, of the Tyrians, the inhabitants of Tyre, made it clear, that without his assistance, it was impossible to receive from him. The Tyrians, however, with only twelve ships of war, and a sea-fleet defeated the united fleet of the Phoenicians, and captured the city of Tyre. The Phoenicians, and all other tribes, were purchased by the Tyrians, who were ever since called the Tyrians. At his approach, the city of Shalmaneser, of the Tyrians, the inhabitants of Tyre, made it clear, that without his assistance, it was impossible to receive from him. The Tyrians, however, with only twelve ships of war, and a sea-fleet defeated the united fleet of the Phoenicians, and captured the city of Tyre. water into the city, which reduced the Tyrians to the last extremity, but they dug wells, and by this means held out five years longer. In the mean time, Shalmaneser dying, they were delivered from the siege. Usher places this siege A. M. 3387. See Assyria.

SHAME, a bashfulness arising from a self-conviction of guilt; an affliction of mind, occasioned by a sense of impropriety, whether of conduct or of appearance. This is the natural consequence of proper reflection on past misconduct, behavior, or turpitude of any kind. Shame in this sense is an expression of uneasiness. Shame is also an expression of contempt from others, a charge of misconduct, of impropriety, from some who endeavor to bring to shame, to render ashamed, the subject of their charge, whether such a charge be true or false.

Shame denotes an idol; a thing which will make ashamed those who trust in it; and of which they ought to be ashamed, even while they worship it.

For the import of that shame, see BAAL-POR.

To uncover the shame, ignominy, or nakedness of a person, are synonymous terms, Lev. xviii. 15, 17, &c. Isaiah (xx. 4.) threatens the Egyptians, that they should be led away captive, without any thing to cover their shame or nakedness. The golden calf worshipped by the Israelites in the wilderness, is called by Moses, (Exod. xxxi. 25,) a filthy shame, an idol of brass and filth. Paul (Rom. i. 26.) calls shameful or vile affections, those ignominious and brutish passions, which were indulged by the carnal pagans.

Prov. iii. 35. "Shame shall be the promotion of fools;" that is, their promotion shall be their own shame, and the disgrace of those who promote them. Prov. ix. 7. "He that reproves a scorner, getteth to himself shame;" he loses his labor, and shall only get discredit or calumny, and abuse, and disgrace, a retort neither courteous nor considerate.

Ps. lxxxi. 16. "Fill their faces with shame;" reprove them, O Lord, and then let them fall into disgrace. When the Syrians took king Josiah captive, they executed shameful judgments against him; they treated him shamefully, made him suffer corrections that were shameful, not befitting the dignity of a king. See SHAR.

SHAMGAR, son of Anath, the third judge of Israel; after Ehud, and before Barak, Judg. iii. 31. Scripture only says that he defended Israel, and killed six hundred Philistines with an ox goad. From the peace obtained by Ehud, (A. M. 3678,) written in his day, the context, and the Canaanites, A. M. 3699, are twenty years.

SHAMMUTH of Israhel, a general of David and Solomon, who commanded 24,000 men, 1 Chron. xxvii. 8.

I. SHAMIR, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 48. Some copies of the LXX read Saphir instead of Shamir.

II. SHAMIR, a city of Ephraim, in the mountains of this tribe, where dwelt Tola, judge of Israel, Joshua xxi. 14.

SHAMMAL, son of Rekem, and father of Maon, (1 Chron. ii. 54,) a city of Arabia Petraea, near Beth-shur, on the south of Judah.

SHAPHAN, son of Azailah, secretary of the temple in the time of Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 18; 2 Chron. xxiv. 20; Jer. xxxix. 3; xxxvi. 1; Ezek. viii. 11. Shaphan informed Josiah of the discovery of the book of the law of the Lord in the temple. We find several sons of Shaphan, viz. Ahilikm, Elias, Gamariah and Jezoniah; but we cannot say they are all sons of the same Shaphan.

I. SHAPHAT, of Abel-meholah; father of the prophet Eliasah, 1 Kings xix. 16; 2 Kings iii. 11.

II. SHAPHAT, son of Shemaiah, (1 Chron. iii. 22,) of the royal family of David, by Jehoniah.

III. SHAPHAT, son of Adam, who had the chief care of David's cattle in Beisan, 1 Chron. vii. 25.

SHAPHER, a mountain in the desert of Paran, an encampment of Israel in the desert, between Kadeshbar and Haradah, Numb. xxxviii. 23.

SHARAIM, a city of Judah, afterwards given to Simeon, Josh. xvi. 36; 1 Sam. xvii. 52; 1 Chron. iv. 54.

I. SHAREZER, second son of Sennacherib, 2 Kings xix. 37.

II. SHAREZER, see NERGAL-SHAREZER.

SHARON. This name was almost proverbial to express a place of extraordinary beauty and fruitfulness, Isa. xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2. It was properly the name of a district south of mount Carmel, along the coast of the Mediterranean, extending to Cesarea and Joppa. It was extremely fat and fertile, Josh. xii. 18; Cant. ii. 1; 1 Chron. xxvii. 29; Isa. xxxii. 9; xxxv. 2; Is. xiv. Acts ix. 35. Some have unnecessarily assumed a Sharon beyond Jordan, in the country of Bashan, and in the tribe of Gad, 1 Chron. vi. 18. But Reland maintains that there was no Sharon beyond Jordan, and that the tribe of Gad may have come to feed their flocks as far as Joppa, Cesarea and Lydda; which, as Calmet remarks, seems incredible, because of the distance of the places, and because the country of Bashan was itself very fine and fruitful.

Modern travellers give the name of Sharon to the plain between Edicpe and Ptolemais.

SHAVEH, THE VALLEY OF, or "valley of the king." (Gen. xiv. 17.) was probably near Jerusalem, because Melchisedec, with the king of Gomorrah, came to meet Abraham, at his return from the defeat of the five kings, as far as this valley.

SHAVING. The practice of shaving the beard and hair, and sometimes the whole body, was very common among the Hebrews, Numb. viii. 7; Lev. xiv. 8, 9. The Levites on the day of their consecration, and the lepers at their purification, shaved all the hair off their bodies. A woman taken prisoner in war, when she married a Jew, shaved the hair off her head, (Deut. xxii. 12,) and the Hebrews generally, and also the nations bordering on Palestine, shaved themselves when they mourned, and in times of great calamity, whether public or private, Isa. xxx. 20; xiv. 3; Jer. xii. 5; xlviii. 37; Baruch vi. 30. God commanded the priests not to cut their hair or beards, in their mournings, Lev. xxi. 5. It may be proper to observe, that among the most degrading of punishments for women, is the loss of their hair; and the apostle hints at this; (1 Cor. xi. 6.) "If it be a shame for a woman to be shorn, or shaven," &c. See Hair, and Beard.

SHEAF, Lev. xxiii. 10—12. The day after the feast of the Passover, the Hebrews brought into the temple a sheaf of corn, as the first-fruit of the barley-harvest, with accompanying ceremonies. On the fifteenth of Nisan, in the year, when the feast of the first day of the Passover was ended, and the second day begun, the house of judgment debated three men to go in solemnity, and gather the sheaf of barley. The inhabitants of the neighboring cities assembled to witness the ceremony, and the barley was gathered into the territory of Jerusalem. The deputies demanded three times, if the sun were set; and they were as often answered, it is. They afterwards demanded as many times, if they might have leave to cut the sheaf; and leave was as often granted. They reap'd it out of three different fields, with three different sickles, and put the ears into three boxes, to carry them to the temple.

"Many (such as Justin, Cyprian, Epli, Cyril) have thought this queen was Abraham, Saba was a separate state, and the Sabean people from the Ethiopians and the Arabs continued so till very lately. We know, if that it was a custom among the Sabean women for their sovereigns in preference custom which still subsists among their ancestors, the Arabs, the Sabean, Macquadas. Our Saviour calls her queen of South, without mentioning any other nation is in his sanction to the truth of the voyage. South of the (or Saba, or Azab) shall rise no judgment with this generation, and shall come from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, that is Solomon is here," Matt. xii. 42; "No other particulars, however, are mentioned in Scripture; and it is not probable omissions, we shall be able to determine the name of the continent behind her. The gold, cassia and frankincense were all the prodigal own country.

"When she was a Jewess or a pageant; Sabaism was the religion of all thine was the constant attendant and staminal power because considering the multitude, the abundance was not impossible she was able, and when the queen of Sheba heard of Solomon concerning the name of the came to prove him with hard questions," 1 and 2 Chron. ix. 1. Our Saviour speaks of her with praise, pointing out her amount to the Jews, Matt. xii. 42; and, she was xl in her thanksgiving before Solomon, when God's blessing on the seed of Israel for ever x. 9; 2 Chron. ix. 8) by no means a pagan, but of a person skilled in history of the Jews. She likewise been a person of learning, and that sort which was then almost peculiar to Palestine. For we see that one of the reasons was to examine whether Solomon the learned man he was said to be; liberty in allegories, or parables, in which he had instructed Solomon.

"The annals of Abyssinia, being very this point, have taken a middle opinion, not an improbable one. They say. she is gone when she left Azab, but being full of the sight of Solomon's works, she went to Judaism in Jerusalem, and bore him a child she called Menelik, and who was their prince. However strong they assert this, however it would be to doubt it in Abyssinia, I aver it for truth, nor much still will contradict it, as Scripture has said nothing.

The Abyssinians, both Jews and Christians, are the forty-fifth Psalm to be a prophecy of a voyage to Jerusalem; that she was the daughter of Hiram's from Tyre to Jers that the last part contains a declaration of a son by Solomon, who was to be king of Gophites.

"To Saba, or Azab, then, she returns son Menlek, whom, after keeping him some years, she sent back to his father to be instructed. Solomon, neglecting his charge, and he was subsequent crowned king of Ethiopia, in the temple of Jerusalem, and at his inauguration took the name of David. After this, he returned to Azob, and brought with him a colony of Jews, among whom were many doctors of the law of Moses, particularly one of each tribe, to make judges in his kingdom, from whom the present Umbares (or supreme judges, three of whom always attend the king) are said and believed to be descended. With these came also Azaria, the son of Zadok the priest, and brought with him a Hebrew transcript of the law, which was delivered into his custody, as he bore the title of Nebrit, or highpriest; and this charge, though the book itself was burnt with the church of Axum in the Moorish war of Adel, is still continued, as it is said, in the lineage of Azaria, who are Nebrits, or keepers of the church of Axum, at this day. All Abyssinia was thereupon converted, and the government of the church and state modelled according to what was then in use at Jerusalem.

By the last act of the queen of Sheba's reign she settled the mode of succession in her country for the future. First, she enacted, that the crown should be hereditary in the family of Solomon for ever. Secondly, that after the death of a king, his eldest son should be capable of wearing that crown or being queen, but that he should descend to the heir male, however distant, in exclusion of all heirs female whatever, however near; and that these two articles should be considered as the fundamental laws of the kingdom, never to be altered or abolished. And, lastly, that the heirs male of the royal house should always be sent prisoners to a high mountain, where they were to continue till their death, or till the succession should open to them.

The reason of this last regulation is not known; it being peculiar to Abyssinia; but the custom of having women for sovereigns, which was a very old one, prevailed among the neighboring shepherds in the last century, and for what we know prevails to this day. It obtained in Nubia till Augustus's time, when Petreus, his lieutenant in Egypt, subdued her country and took the queen Candace prisoner. It endured also after Tiberius, as we learn from St. Irenaeus (v. 7, cap. 27), who says of Petreus, governor of queen Candace, who must have been a successor to the former; for she, when taken prisoner by Petreus, is represented as an infirm woman, having but one eye. (This shows the falsehood of the remark Strabo makes, that it was a custom in Meroë, if their sovereign was any way mutilated, for the subjects to imitate the imperfection. In this case Candace's subjects would have all lost an eye, Strabo, lib. xvii. p. 777, 778; Candace, indeed, was the name of all the sovereigns, in the same manner as Caesar was of the Roman emperors. As for the last severe part, the punishment of the princes, it was probably intended to prevent some disorders among the princes of her house, that she had observed frequently to happen in the house of David, (2 Sam. xvi. 22; 1 Kings ii. 13), at Jerusalem.

The queen of Sheba having made these laws irrevocable to all her posterity, died, after a long reign of forty years, in 680 before Christ, placing her son Menlek upon the throne, whose posterity, the annals of Abyssinia would teach us to believe, have ever since reigned. So far we must indeed bear witness to them, that this is no new doctrine, but has been steadfastly and uniformly maintained from their earliest account of time; first when Jews, then in later days, after they had embraced Christianity. We may further add, that the testimony of all the neighboring nations is with them upon this subject, whether they be friends or enemies. They only differ in name of the queen, or in giving her two names. As for her being an Arab, the objection is still easier got over. For all the inhabitants of Arabia Felix, especially those of the coast opposite to Saba, were reputed Abyssinians, and their country part of Abyssinia, from the earliest ages to the Mahometan conquest and after. They were her subjects; first Salem pagans like herself, then converted (as the tradition says) to Judaism, during the time of the building of the temple and continuing Jews from that time to the year 622 after Christ, when they became Mahometans.

"Of their kings of the race of Solomon descended from the queen of Saba, the device is a lion passant, proper upon a field gulles, and their motto, Mo Abasa am Nigael Solomon Negael Jude; which signifies, "The Lion of the Race of Solomon and Tribe of Judah hath overcome." (So far Mr. Bruce, vol. i. p. 471, &c.)

On the motto of the Abyssinian kings, Mr. Taylor remarks, that we find allusions to it in Scripture. It appears to have originated from the simile in Gen. xix. 9, and to this motto, or title, a reference he thinks may be found in Ps. l. 22, "Consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver you"— where the phrase differs from Ps. vii. 2, in which place, the psalmist speaks of being himself torn in pieces. (See Mich. v. 8.) He thinks there is a direct quotation of this motto in Rev. v. 8, "The lion of the tribe of Judah hath prevailed," or overcome; so that the comparison of a chief of the tribe of Judah to a lion, is not only sanctioned by the original comparison in Genesis, but appears to have been constantly kept in memory, and preserved by a public and authoritative memorial; in fact, by national and royal insignia.

Mr. Bruce adds the following information, which shows the practicality of the queen of Sheba's journey. Indeed journeys of a much greater length are now annually made, in order to visit Mecca; and it is very credible, that the antiquity of similar journeys is very great.

In the gentle reigns of the Malamukas, before the conquest of Egypt and Arabia by Selim, a caravan constantly set out from Abyssinia directly for Jerusalem. They had then a treaty with the Arabs. This caravan rendezvous at Harran, a small town, and terraces abounding in provisions, about two days' journey from Doharwa, and nearly the same from Musaiah; it mounted sometimes in number to a thousand pilgrims, ecclesiastics as well as laymen. They traveled by very easy journeys, not above six miles a day, halting to perform divine service, and setting up their tents early, and never beginning to travel till towards nine in the morning. They had hitherto passed in perfect safety, with mild beating, and colors flying, and in this way traversed the desert by the road of Suakim." (Travels, vol. ii. p. 158.)

V. SHEBA, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 2.
VI. SHEBA, son of Bichri, of Benjamin, a turbulent fellow, who, after the defeat of Absalom, when the tribe of Judah came to David, and brought him over the river Jordan, on his way to Jerusalem, sounded a trumpet, and proclaimed, "We have no share in David." Israel, in consequence, forsook David, and followed Sheba, 2 Sam. xx. 1, &c. When the king arrived at Jerusalem, he sent Abishai in pursuit of the traitor. Joab also took soldiers, and, crossing the country north of Jerusalem, he arrived at Abel-bethmaacah, a city at the entrance of the pass between Libanus and Anti-libanus, to which Sheba had retired. Joab besieged the place; but a discreet woman occupying the city, having persuaded the people to cut off Sheba's head, and to throw it over the wall, Joab and his army retired.

SHEBUEL, the eldest son of Gershom, son of Moses, had the care of the treasures of the temple, 1 Chron. xxiii. 16; xxvi. 24.

I. SHECHEM, son of Hamor, prince of the Shechemites, seduced Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, as he was passing the festival of the Shechemites, Gen. xxxiv. A. M. 2395. He afterwards obtained her in marriage, on condition that he, and all the men of Shechem, should be circumcised. This was agreed to; but on the third day, when the wounds of the circumcision were at the worst, Simon and Levi, the two brothers of Dinah, entered Shechem, and slew all the males, and afterwards, with their brethren and domestics, plundered the city. It is probable that this prince gave name to the city of Shechem.

II. SHECHEM, SICHAR, or SICHEM, (Acts vii. 16.) a city of Ephraim, Josh. xvii. 7. Jacob bought a field in its neighborhood, which, by way of evergreen, he gave to his son Joseph, who was buried here, Gen. xlviii. 22. In its vicinity was Jacob's well or fountain, at which Christ discoursed with the woman of Samaria, John iv. 5. After the ruin of Samaria by Shalmaneser, Shechem became the capital of the Samaritans; and Josephus says, it was so in the time of Alexander the Great. At the present day, it is also the seat of the small remnant of the Samaritans. (See SAMARITANS.) It is 10 miles from Shiloh, and 40 from Jerusalem, toward the north. The following is Dr. Clarke's description of this city and its neighborhood:

"The view of the ancient Sichem, now called Napolose, otherwise Neapolis, and Napolis, surprised us, as we had not expected to find a city of such magnitude in the road to Jerusalem. It seems to be the metropolis of a very rich and extensive country, abounding with provisions, and all the necessary articles of life, in much greater profusion than the town of Ace. White bread was exposed for sale in the streets of a quality superior to any that is to be found elsewhere throughout the Levant. The governor of Napolose received and regaled us with all the magnificence of an eastern sovereign. Refreshments, of every kind known in the country, were set before us; and when we supposed the list to be exhausted, to our very great astonishment a most sumptuous dinner was brought in. Nothing seemed to gratify our host more, than that any of his guests should eat heartily; and, to do him justice, every individual of the party ought to have possessed the appetite of ten hungry pilgrims, to satisfy his wishes in this respect.

There is nothing in the Holy Land finer than a view of Napolose, from the heights around it. As the traveller descends towards it from the hills, it appears luxuriantly embossed in the most delightful and fragrant bowers, half concealed by rich grass. By stately trees collected into groves, all a bold and beautiful valley in which it stand seems to flourish among its inhabitants principal employment is in making soap; but the more the town supply a very lively neighborhood and there is exposed to a taste, upon camels. In the morning after we met caravans coming from Grand Com. we noticed others reposing in the large olive grove near the gates.

"The history of Sichem, referring to events prior to the Christian dispensation, directs inquisitions, which owe nothing of their celeb rational tradition. The traveller, directing his to-wards its ancient sepulchres, as everlasting rocks wherein they are hewn, and its promontory, where the Gentiles娱乐场 authority of sacred and indelible record, to plate the spot where the remains of Joseph, and of Joshua were severally deposited, thing connected with the memory of past calamities so as to awaken local enthusiasm, around this city is preeminently entitled reflection. The sacred story of events trans. fields of Sichem, from our earliest years, met with delight; but with the territory, when the tribes took place, and in the objects existing as they were described three thousand years ago, the grateful kindle into ecstasy. Along the valley was a company of Ishmaelites, coming from (Gen. xxxvii. 25), as in the days of Reuben dah, "with their camels bearing spicery, and myrrh," who would gladly have purified other Joseph of his brethren, and conveyed a slave, to some Petchar in Egypt. Upon account, flocks and herds were feeding, also in the simple garb of the shepherds of Samaria where anything repugnant to the notions we have of the appearance presented by the Jacob. It was indeed a scene to abstract all vate the mind; and, under emotions so excited by every circumstance of powerful coin, single moment seemed to concentrate whole existence. The Jews of the twelfth century acknowledged that the tomb of Jacob was in Sichem, although both the city and the to the possession and boast of a people they 0. 'The town,' says rabbi Benjamin, 'lies in the possession of Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal, we are a hundred Carthagines, who observe the law of Moses, whom men call Samaritans have priests of the lineage of Aaron, who peace, and those they call Aaronites; we marry but with persons of the sacerdotal family they may not be confounded with the people priests of their law offer sacrifices and bus. ings in their congregations, as it is written it (Deut. xi. 29.) The situation of the city is very romantic. The following is Dr. Jowett's notice of it in 1823: and is coupled with a scene illustrative of Scripture manners: (Chr. Researches in Syr. p. 147. Amer. ed.)

"It was about an hour after mid-day that we had our first view of the city of Nabalos, romantically situated in a deep valley, between the mountains of Ebal on our left and Gerizim on the right. There is the kind of sublime horror in the lofty, craggy and barren aspect of these two mountains, which seem to face each other with an air of defiance, especially as they stand contrasted with the rich valley beneath, where the gardens and extensive olive-grounds, rendered more verdant, by the lengthened periods of shade which they enjoy from the mountains on each side. Of the two, Gerizim is not wholly without cultivation.

"We had always been informed, that the facility of passing by way of Nabalos depended very much on the character of the governor of the city. Our case was singular; for we had to learn what kind of reception we should meet with. We entered the city at no time celebrated for its hospitality, struck a very dismal impression upon my mind. They accompanied us a few paces; but it soon appeared that the gate was their station; to which, having received us, they returned. We then learnt, in the course of the evening, that these were only a small detachment of a very numerous body of cunning women, who were filling the whole city with their cries—taking up a wailing, with the design, as of old, to make the eyes of all the inhabitants run down with tears, and their eyelids gush out with waters, Jer. ix. 17, 18. For this good service, they would, the next morning, wait upon the government and principal persons, to receive some trifling fee."

SHEEP. (The Hebrew name of this animal is רע, reh, a word which is merely a noun of unity, and has no plural. The noun of plurality or multitude is כָּנָה, kanah, which includes all small cattle, as sheep, goat, &c. like the English word flock.)

In its present domestic state, the sheep is of all animals the most defenceless and inoffensive. With its liberty it seems to have been deprived of its swiftness and cunning; and what in the wild may rather be called patience, in the sheep appears to be stupidity. With no one quality to fit it for self-preservation, it makes vain efforts at all. Without swiftness it endeavors to fly; and without strength sometimes offers to oppose. But it is by human art alone that the sheep is become the tardy, defenceless creature that we find it. In its wild state it is a noble and active animal, and is every way fitted to defend itself against the numerous dangers by which it is surrounded.

Of the Syrian sheep there are two varieties: the one called Bedouin sheep, which differ in no respect from the larger kinds of sheep among us, except that their tails are something longer and thicker; the others are those often mentioned by travellers on account of their extraordinary tails; and this species is by far the most numerous. The tail of one of these animals is very broad and large, terminating in a small appendage that turns back upon it. It is of a substance between fat and marrow, and is not eaten separately, but mixed with the lean meat in many of their dishes, and also often used instead of butter. A common sheep of this sort, without the head, feet, skin and entrails, weighs from sixty to eighty pounds, of which the tail itself is usually fifteen pounds or upwards; but such as are of the largest breed, and have been fattened, will sometimes weigh above one hundred and fifty pounds, and the tail, alone, fifty—a thing to some scarcely credible. To preserve the tails from being torn by the hares, &c. they fix a piece of thin board to the under part, where it is not covered with thick wool, and some have small wheels to facilitate the dragging of this board after them; whence, with a little exaggeration, the story of having carts to carry their tails. (Russell's Aleppo, p. 31.)

The sheep or lamb was the common sacrifice under the Mosaic law; and it is to be remarked, that when the divine legislator speaks of this victim, he never omits to appoint, that the rump or tail be laid whole on the fire of the altar. The reason for this is seen in the extract just given from Dr. Russell, from which it appears that this was the most delicate part of the animal, and therefore the most proper to be presented in sacrifice to Jehovah. Mr. Street, however, who is cited by Dr. Harris, considers this precept to have had respect to the health of the Israelites; observing that “bilious disorders are very frequent in hot countries; the eating of fat meat is a great encouragement and excitement to them; and though the fat of the tail is now considered as a delicacy, it is really unwholesome.”

In a domesticated state, the sheep, as already noticed, is a weak and defenceless animal, and is, therefore, altogether dependent upon its keeper for protection as well as support. To this trait in their character, there are several beautiful allusions in the sacred writings. Thus, Micah describes the destitute condition of the Jews as a flock “scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd” (2 Kings xxi. 17; see also Matt. iv. 31) and Zechariah prophesies, that when the good shepherd should be removed and removed from his flock, the sheep should be scattered, Zech. xii. 7. “To the disposal of these animals to wander from the fold, and thus abandon themselves to danger and destruction, there are also several allusions made by the inspired writers. David confesses that he led immured their flocks conduct: “I have gone astray like a lost sheep,” and conscious that, like them, he was only disposed to wander still further from the fold, he exclaims, “seek thy servant” Ps. cxix. 151. Nor was this disposition to abandon the paternal care of God peculiar to David, for the prophet adopts similar language to depict the dangerous and awful condition of the entire species: “All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way.” Isa. liii. 6. It was to seek these “lost sheep,” scattered abroad, and having no shepherd, that the blessed Redeemer came into the world. He is “the good shepherd, who gave his life for the sheep” (John x. 11) and his people, though formerly “as sheep going astray,” have now “returned to the shepherd and bishop of their souls.” 1 Pet. ii. 25. His care over them, and their security under his protection, is most beautifully and affectingly described in the chapter which we just now cited. “He calleth his own sheep, and bringeth them out. And when he putteth his hand upon them, they follow him.” John x. 3, 4; and he goes on to say that “they follow him, because they know his voice.” John x. 4, 5. And when the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father, and lay down my life for the sheep. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of the Father, even so know I and lay down my life for the sheep. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of the Father. He is the Father of life; and yet he saith, I lay down my life. I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father.” John x. 11, 14, 15, 17.

There is a remarkable passage in Isaiah (xv. 4), comprehending the station and birth of these animals, perhaps, be deemed an unparalleled one; and yet, we fear we shall be able to that will satisfy the mind of the inquisitive reader, is requested to has before him, while pursing the following lines upon it, chiefly taken from Calmet Clarke.

Winter’s Talk.

By the name of sheep, Scripture often understands the people. Ps. lxxix. 13, “We are thy people, and the sheep of thy pasture;” also, “O shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock.” Our Saviour says, that he was sent to the lost sheep of Israel, Matt. xv. 24. The righteous are often compared to sheep exposed to the violence of the wicked, to the fury of the wolves; to slaughter, Ps. xlv. 22. At the last judgment, the just (represented by sheep) shall be in the right hand of the sovereign Judge, and put in possession of heaven. Our Saviour describes deceivers as wolves in sheep’s clothing, Matt. vii. 15.

The sheep-folds, among the Israelites, appear to have been generally houses, or enclosures, walled round, to guard the sheep from beasts of prey by night, and the scorching heat of noon. John x. 1—5 is a curious passage, in reference to the subject of this article, and deserves attention.

Shekel, the Hebrew weight and money, Exod. xxx. 23, 24; 2 Sam. xiv. 26. The word is used to denote the weight of any thing, as iron, hair, spiceries, &c. Among the different opinions, concerning its weight and value, Calmet adheres to that of M. le Pelletier, who says it weighs half an ounce, or four Roman drachmas; that is, nine penneweights, three grains; and that the shekel of silver was worth two shillings three-pence farthing and a half, sterling, or about 30 cents; perhaps nearest 32 cents. Moses and Ezekiel say the shekel had weight, served fourteen years, and had got no patrimony whatever, though he had now a family of twelve children, eleven sons and one daughter, besides his two wives and their two maidens. It was high time that he should get some property for these; and as his father-in-law was excessively parsimonious, and would scarcely allow him to live, he was in some sort obliged to make use of stratagem to get an equivalent for his services; but this he pushed so far, as to ruin his father-in-law’s flocks, leaving him nothing but the refuse. (See ver. 42.)

So far Dr. Adam Clarke: but from ch. xxxi. 12, &c. it seems clear that the stratagem which was resorted to by Jacob, and which we are about to consider, was adopted by him, under divine direction, the reason for which is there distinctly assigned.

The expedient was this: “He took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chestnut-tree, and piled white stumps in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods. And he set the rods which he had piled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering-oughs, when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink.” The consequence of this is stated to be, that “the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth white and black, speckled, and spotted.”

Now, in this process there does not appear to have been any thing miraculous, or out of the ordinary course of nature. It is a fact attested by both ancient and modern philosophers, as well as our constant experience, that whatever makes a strong impression on the mind of a female in the time of conception and gestation, will have a corresponding influence on the mind or body of the fetus. Nor is it any objection to this fact, that we know not how to account for the effect, on rational principles.

Shekinah, a word signifying the dwelling, the abiding. It does not occur in the Bible; but nothing is more frequently mentioned in the writings of the Jews, than the Shekinah, by which they understand the presence of the Holy Spirit. In the Targums, and Chaldee paraphrases, we find the names Jehovah, or God; Memra, or the Word; and Shekinah, or the Holy Spirit. They suppose the Holy Spirit speaking and communicating itself to men by revelation; (1) in the prophets; (2) in the Urim and Thummim of the high priest, which were kept in the ark of the Hebrews, called Bath-col, or the daughter of the voice. The Shekinah is the presence of the Holy Spirit, which resided in the temple of Jerusalem; and which, the rabbins say, drove thence the princes of the air, and communicated a particular sanctity.

The Shekinah was the most sensible symbol of the presence of God among the Hebrews. It rested over the propitiatory, or over the golden cherubim, which were attached to the propitiatory, the covering of the ark. Here it assumed the appearance of a cloud; and from hence God gave his oracles, as some think, when consulted by the high-priest on account of his people. Hence Scripture often says, God sits on the cherubim, or between the cherubim; that is, he gives the most evident tokens of his divine presence, by answering from hence the inquiries of Israel. The rabbins affirm, that the Shekinah first resided in the tabernacle prepared by Moses in the wilderness, into which it descended on the day of its consecration, in the figure of a cloud. It passed from thence into the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, on the day of its dedication by this prince, where it continued until the destruction of Jerusalem, and the temple, by the Chaldeans, and was not afterwards seen there.

The presence of the Holy Spirit, by the appearance of the Shekinah, is frequently referred to in the New Testament. It appeared at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus, and is called the excellent glory by Peter, 2 Epist, ii. 10. The idea of a radiance, or glory, a mild effulgence, seems to be always annexed to it. The Shekinah may be "the glory of the Lord," spoken of 2 Cor. iii. 18, under the allusion of being distributed to believers, as it really was at the time of the descent of the "clove" tongues like as of fire," which sat on each of the hundred and twenty, (Acts ii.) and on the assembly at Cornelius's, Acts x. 44; xi. 15. It might also be "the glory of the Lord," (Luke ii. 9.) and "the tabernacle of God with men," Rev. xxi. 3. In short, we find it frequently: but always gentle, and, as it were, lambent; not fierce or vindictive, as exemplified at the burning bush, (Exod. iii.) where the whole was enveloped, but nothing consumed.

SHEM, son of Noah, (Gen. vi. 10.) was born A. M. 1558, 98 years before the deluge, and was, probably, younger than Japheth, and older than Ham. (See JAPHEH.) In consequence of his conduct upon the occasion of Ham's discovering his father's nakedness, Noah predicted blessings on Shem, saying, "The Lord God of Shem be blessed, and let Canaan be the slave of Shem." His great prerogatives were, that from his race was to proceed the Messiah, and that the worship of the true God was to be preserved among his posterity. At 100 years of age he begat Arphaxad, and died aged 600 years.

Shem had five sons, Elam, Asher, Arphaxad, Lud and Aram, who peopled the finest provinces of the East. (See their articles.) The principal design of Moses being to give the history and laws of the Jews, he has carried the genealogy of Shem further than the genealogies of the other sons of Noah, without any immediate object.

SHEPHERDS, or PASTORS. When the Joseph invited his father and brethren to Egypt, he bade them tell Pharaoh they were not breeders of sheep, that they might have Goshen assigned for their habitation; he added, the Egyptians hold shepherds in ab See EWER.

Abel was a keeper of sheep, (Gen. iv. 2)
the greater number of the ancient patriarchs. When men began to multiply, and to follow different employments, Jabez, son of Leach and his wife Adah, was acknowledged as father, that is, founder, of shepherds and nomades, Gen. iv. 30. God sometime times takes to himself the people (Is. xxvii. 14) that belong to him, and kings, both in Scripture, and ancient writers, are distinguished by the title of shepherds of the people. The prophets often inveigh against the shepherds of Israel, against the kings who feed themselves and neglect their flocks; who distress, ill-treat, seduce and lead them astray. (See Ezek. xxxiv. 10, sq.; Num. xxvii. 17; 1 Kings xxii. 17; Isa. xi. 11; xiv. 28; Judith xi. 15.)

The Lord says, (Isa. lxxiii. 11,) that he brought his people through the Red sea, with their shepherds; that is, Moses, Aaron and the chief of the people at their head. Micah says, (v. 5,) that the Lord shall raise seven shepherds over his people, and an eighth over the land of Amor, to bring from thence the people of Israel. These seven or eight shepherds are taken to be the seven princes confederate with Darius, son of Hystaspes, who killed Smerdis the Magian, who had seized the empire of Persia, after the death of Cambyses.

The Messiah is often called a shepherd. "I will set up shepherds over them, which shall feed them," Jer. xxiii. 4, 5. Isaiah (xl. 11) speaks in the same manner: "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs in his arms, and gently lead those that are with young." And Zech 11. 7, says, "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts. Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn my hand upon the little ones." Christ refers this passage to his passion, (Matt. xxvi. 31,) and elsewhere takes on himself the title of the good shepherd, who gives his life for his sheep, John x. 11, 14, 15. Paul calls him the great shepherd of the sheep, (Heb. xiii. 20,) and Peter gives him the appellation of prince of shepherds, 1 Pet. v. 4.

In the passage just referred to, our Saviour says, the good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep; that he knows them, and they know him; that they hear his voice, and when he goes before them; that no one shall force them out of his hands, and that he calls them by their name. These, however, being all incidents taken from the custom of the country, are by no means so striking to us as they must have been to the Israelites, who every day witnessed such methods of conducting this domesticated animal. The heriling, or bad shepherd, forsakes the sheep, and the thief enters not by the door of the sheep-fold, but climbs in another way. Shibboleth. After Jephtha had beaten the Ammonites, the men of Ephraim were jealous of the advantage obtained by the tribes beyond Jordan, and complained loudly that they had not been called to that expedition. Jephtha answered with much moderation; but that did not prevent the Ephraimites from using contemptuous language toward the men of Gilead. They taunted them with being only fugitives from Ephraim and Manasseh, a kind of bandits, that belonged to Gilead, which was desolate when the Israelites first returned, and the men of Gilead killed a great number of Ephraim; after which they set guards at all the passes of Jordan, and when an Ephraimite who had escaped, came to the river side, and desired to pass over, they asked him if he were not an Ephraimite? If he said No, they bade him pronounce Shibboleth; but he pronouncing it Sibboleth, according to the dict of the Ephraimites, they killed him. In this way there fell 42,000 Ephraimites, Judg. xii. This incident should not be passed over without observing, that it affords proof of dialectical variations among the tribes of the same nation, and speaking the same language, in those early days. There can be no wonder, therefore, if we find in later ages the same word written different ways, according to the pronunciation of different tribes, or of different colonies or residents of the Hebrew people: whence various pointings, &c.

That this continued, is evident from the peculiarities of the Galilean dialect, by which Peter was discovered to be of that district.

The term Shibboleth signifies an ear of corn, and also streams. In this case it is probably to be taken in the latter sense, as the Ephraimites would thus be understood to ask permission to pass over the stream.

(Comp. Ps. lxxv. 15; Is. xxvii. 12, 13.)

Shibmah, or Sihmah, a city of Reuben, Num. xxxii. 38; Josh. xiii. 19. Isaiah (xvi. 8, 9) speaks of the vine of Sihmah, which were cut down by the enemies of the Moabites; for that people had taken the city of Sibmah, (Jer. xlviii. 32,) and other cities of Reuben, after this tribe was carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, 1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Kings xv. 29.

Jerome says that between Hebron and Shibmah there was hardly the distance of five hundred paces.

Shichron, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 11,) thought to have been yielded to Simeon.

Shield, a piece of defensive armor. (See Armor.)

God is often called the shield of his people, (Gen. xv. 1; Ps. v. 12,) as are also princes and great men, 2 Sam. i. 22.

Shiggaiun, (Ps. vii. title,) and Shigionoth, (Har, iii. 1;) probably song, or song of praise; perhaps some particular species of ode. R.

Shihor-Libnah, see Libnah.

Shiloh, see Loam. i. Shiloh. This term is used (Gen. xlix. 10,) to denote the Messiah, the coming of whom Jacob foretells in these words: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." It must be admitted, however, that the signification of the word is not well ascertained. Some translate, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah till he comes to whom it belongs." Others, till the coming of the pacific, or of prosperity, (Adonah signify to be in peace, or prosperity.) Some of the rabbins have taken the name Shiloh for a city of this name in Palestine, and render, "the sceptre shall not be taken from Judah, till it comes to Shiloh." "It has ceased, it has finished," says Le Clerc, "till it be taken from him, to be given to Saul, at Shiloh." But, as Calmet asks, where is it said, that Saul was acknowledged king, or consecrated at Shiloh? And if it be understood of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, the matter is equally uncertain. Scripture mentions no assembly at Shiloh that admitted him king.

The Septuagint read ἔσχε, ἐστίν, that is, (γενέσθαι) ἐσχη εἰς τὸν θρόνον αὐτοῦ, meaning the sceptre was to be handed over, as Capellus observes; for in the original and best edition of their version, as Justin Martyr affirmed, this ἕστη was rendered, ἐσχη ἐς τὸν θρόνον αὐτοῦ, as it now stands in the Alexandrian manuscript. The Samaritan copy has ἔστη, which is the same in the Chaldean dialect as ἕστη. Onkelos, the Jerusalem Targum, the Syriac, the Arabic and Aquila, speak the same sense. According to this reading, then, the sense is this: The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a governor from between his feet, until he have come, whose right the sceptre is, and until the nations shall obey him, that is, have been governed by him. A prediction which, as Mede well observes, was afterwards applied and explained by our Saviour himself, in those words, "And this gospel of the kingdom of Christ shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come;" (Matt. xxiv. 14.) that is, the end of the Jewish state.

But how did the sceptre depart from Judah when Shiloh came? First, it actually had departed in the transference of the public government to the Herod family, and by the intrusion of the Romans. This is usually held to be an adequate answer to the prophecy; but Mr. Taylor thinks there is a better:—Our Lord was the antitype of David's family entitled to rule, and he dying without issue, the ruling branch of David's family became extinct; so that, after his death, there was no longer any possibility of the continuance of the kingly office, in the direct proper line of David. The person who should have held the sceptre was dead: the direct descent of the family expired with him; and, consequently, the sceptre was bound fide departed; since, (1.) it was actually swayed by a stranger, and strangers, (Herod and the Romans) and, (2.) no one who could possibly claim it, though he might have been of a collateral branch of David's house, could have been the direct legal claimant by birthright.

This statement appears to be supported by the manner in which the sons of David by Bathsheba are recorded: (2 Sam. v. 14.) "These sons were born to David, after he was king in Jerusalem, Shammua, Shobab, Nathan, Solomon:" which, in 1 Chron. iii. 5. are thus reckoned, "Shimea, Shobab, Nathan, Solomon, Shua; whom of Bathshua (Bathsheba) the daughter of Ammiel." Now we know that David had promised Bathsheba that one of her sons should succeed him: Shimea died in his infancy; (2 Sam. xiii. 15, & c.) nothing is recorded of Shobab; perhaps he also died young. This reduces the sons of Bathsheba to two—Nathan and Solomon. For what reason Solomon (the younger) was preferred before Nathan (the elder) we know not, unless on account of the promise of God referred to below; but we ought to consider, (1.) that none of the sons of David, born before he reigned in Jerusalem could claim succession to his whole kingdom, on the principles adopted in the East. (See Genealog.) (2.) That the first sons born to him in Jerusalem, appear to be by his connection with Bathsheba, so that in one of them, as first born after he was there established king over all Israel, the natural right to the crown vested, by usage. But, (3.) we find (2 Sam. vii. 12.) that the son who should proceed out of the bowels of David, was to be his successor. The question is, whether Solomon was born at this time, or whether, as this promise respected a future event, Solomon was not begun after filment of it? However that might be credible that the sons of David, by Bathsheba, reduced to two, Nathan and Solomon; and, we have the crown in his line, centred in Hez, the father of Solomon having actually reigned, only crown in his posterity, in which line is Joseph. The union of these two lines (as of no third line to oppose them) was one person of Jesus; and when he expired, both lines of descent expired with him.

This agrees perfectly with the ancient "he whose right it is;" for, (1.) the right long since dormant, and involved in obscurity at Bethlehem brought it forth doubt, very cautiously, to light: (2.) tho' in the ancestors of Joseph, after the return of captivity, yet another branch also had 1 that (3.) Jesus was the first person who, himself the claim of norn lines of descendent could be especially denoted and designated whose indisputable and unequivocal right occupy the throne of the whole Hebrew nation.

II. SHILOH, or Silo, a famous city (Josh. xviii. xix. xxii.) 12 miles from Shechem to Eusebius, or 10, according to Justin, Joshua assembled the people to make the distribution of the Land of Promise, (Josh. xix. 39.) where the tabernacle of the Lord was set up and dwelt in the midst of the people. In the xix. 51. the tabernacle continued at Shilo, from A. M. 2855, when it was taken by the Israelites under the administration of the high-priest Shiloh Samuel began to prophesy. (1 Sam. iii. 1.) Here the prophet Abijah dwelt, 1 Kings xvi. 32. and foretold that the temple of Jerusalem would be reduced to the same condition as Shilo 13, 14; xxvi. 6.

SHIMEAI, brother of David, and father of Adonijah, 2 Sam. xii. 3; xxxvii. 13, and Jonadab, 2 Sam. xi. 13; xx. 20 was others of this name, of whom nothing is known.

SHIMEI, son of Gera, a kinsman of David when David was obliged to retire from Jerusalem, and to throw stones at his feet, and to throw stones 5. When he returned to Jerusalem, having the defeat and death of Absalom, Shimei cursed the man of God, and with them cursed Benjamin, and threw himself at his feet to forgive his fault. Abishai, son of Zeruiah, David's uncle, promised Shimei, that he would not put him to death, even though he cursed God, for his promise, but before his death he recommended him to Shimei, to let Shimei go entirely unpunished, his exercise discretion upon him. Solomon knew that Shimei would come to Jerusalem, where he dwelt for some of his slaves ran away, and to with Achish in Gath. Shimei followed, him to Jerusalem, but the king, being it, had him put to death. The conduct of both David and Solomon to Shimei, having been frequently following remarks upon their conduct by worthy attention:

1. David's charge to Solomon refers to one of three different descriptions; (1.) a clearly consigned to punishment; (2.) a Barzillai, who are clearly recommend and (3.) to Shimei, who is neither sentenced to punishment, absolutely, nor to safety, absolutely; but is recommended to be treated according to his eventual demerits. Thus understood, the passage reads to this effect:—"Shimei did not shed blood, as Joab did; he only cursed with a grievous curse; and that I gave him, swearing to him by the Lord. Now I would advise thee not to let him go at large with impunity, nor (2.) to bring down his hoary head to the grave by bloody execution; but do as thy wisdom shall direct thee,"—i.e. steer a middle course. Solomon's subsequent conduct proves the accuracy of this view of the passage: he confined Shimei to Jerusalem, where he was under strict inspection and vigilance; and when he had violated the conditions of his safety, he was punished for his previous conduct. Which illustrates the observation of David, "for thou art a wise sovereign, and knowest in what manner to treat a man who is a rebel in his heart, therefore dangerous to thy crown; yet one who has been solemnly pardoned by me for his former misconduct; and who has not misconducted himself towards thee." There are several other persons of the same name, but of no importance.

SHISHMAD, a secretary who, with Rehum, the chancellor, wrote to Artaxerxes against the Jews, returned from captivity, Ezra iv. 5. A. M. 3470.

SHINAR, a province of Babylonia, and thought by some writers to be the plain between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, Gen. x. 10; Is. xi. 11; Zech. v. 1.

SHIP. Among the perplexities which occur in reading the sacred Scriptures, none are greater than those which arise from the use of technical words and phrases, terms peculiar to certain professions, and employed in their own restricted and appropriate sense. Few persons of one business understand the directions, or the descriptive appellations, of another; few are the land-men who understand properly the terms used by sea-men, even in our own natural country; and should a voyager insert seratai the orders given by the captain or officers, on board the ship in which he sailed, what proportion of his readers, who were not mariners, would comprehend their meaning? This passage will suggest an apology for errors committed by men of learning in translating, and they may restrain those snears, which unreflecting persons sometimes throw out against such descriptions of nautical affairs, in our version of the sacred books, which involve obscurities of other difficulties. Among the most prominent of these instances is the history of Paul's voyage, in Acts xxvii., and which has been thought so utterly irreconcilable with the nature of things, that some writers, in exposing the ignorance of the author of this book on sea affairs, have exposed themselves to the imputation of, at least, equal ignorance in learning; and of more than equal inconconsiderateness, if not perverseness of mind.

The sacred historian says, (verse 29.) "Fearing lest they should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern." This has been thought to be an insurmountable objection. Four anchors! When our largest men-of-war would have but two; and, certainly, would not cast four anchors, and all four from the stern! But, if we inquire into the form and construction of these anchors, and if it should appear, that they were not like our own, the subject will assume a different aspect. And such is the matter of fact. Instead of translating "seratai" for "four anchors," it should have been rendered "the four-flushed anchor," the anchor which had four points, flukes, for holding the ground. We have such anchors represented in books of antiquities, and we know further, that such are used in the East, to this day, from representations furnished by Bruce and Norden. (Oriental Researches, p. 99.) "We threw our anchors," says the record which most likely to hold the ground, and to keep us from driving; even the four-flushed anchor, that it might hold us back from striking against the rocks," and the supposed absurdity disappears at once. If the sailors "let go but one anchor," from the ship, they could carry it out fairly enough, as verse 30 informs us, pretend to carry out other anchors (whether four-flushed, or not) from the prow of the ship: i.e. affecting to moor the vessel head and stern.

The next difficulty is well stated in Doddridge's note on the passage: (verse 40.) "When they had weighed the anchors, they committed the ship to the sea." Some rather choose to render this, that having cast away the anchors, they left them in the sea: and the original indeed is dubious, and will admit of either sense: παραλειπομενοι τας γραμμας, θης της τοιοουσας. (See De Dieu, in loc.) "Loosing the rudder-bands; artiées της περιμετρίας των παλαιων." Dr. Benson observes, agreeable to the judgment of ancient writers, that their ships in those days had commonly two rudders, one on each side, which were fastened to the ship by bands or chains; and on loosing these bands, the rudders sunk deeper into the sea, and by their weight rendered the ship for a time subject to the violence of the winds. (Hist. vol. ii. page 256.) But it seems rather, that the rudders had been fastened before, when they had let the vessel drive; and were now loosed, when they had need of them; to steer her into the creek: and after they had banked stern, they hove out their corn to lighten the ship, it is not easy to suppose they should immediately conrute a method to increase the weight of it. That they had frequently two rudders to their ships, Bochart and Elmen have conirmed by several authorities. (See Bochart, Hieroz. Part. ii. lib. 4. cap. 1. page 453. and Elmen Obserr. vol. i. page 488, 489.)" The rudder-bands were, as Mr. Taylor has shown from the representations still extant of ancient ships, a kind of brace for the purpose of keeping the rudder steady, and preventing its action against the side of the vessel; in fact, without some such confinement a current of water rushing from under the ship, would, against the brood of the rudder, could carry it away, in spite of the strongest arm that might endeavor to retain it. At the same time, the bands prevented that entire play, or freedom of the instrument, which was occasionally necessary. These, then, were knocked off, says Luke; so that the steerers had greater scope for the exertions of his arms, as circumstances required, than he could possibly have while they remained in their places.

There are two words used to describe vessels in Isa. xxxvii. 31. "Therein shall go a galley [πηγή], with oars; nor gallant ship." (Ps. cxviii.) where πηγή seems to be the name of a capacious vessel, a vessel of considerable tonnage. (See also Numb. xxiv. 24; Ezek. xxx. 9; Dan. xi. 38.) In Jonah 1. 5, we have another word, σεπήχων a ship; "Jonah had descended into the sides of sepikch;" but this seems to be a Chaldee word. Here are, then, several kinds of ships, which were known to the Hebrews.

The most complete description of an ancient ship however, is that furnished by the prophet Ezekiel, (ch. xxvii.) when comparing the commercial city of Tyre to one of those magnificent constructions, by means of which she carried on her commerce.

For the Ships of Tarshish, see Tarshish.

SHIPRAH, one of the midwives of Egypt, who preserved the Hebrew children, Exod. i. 15.

SHISHAK, a king of Egypt, who declared war against Rehoboam king of Judah, in the fifth year of his reign. He entered Judaea with an innumerable multitude of people, out of Egypt, the countries of Libim, of Cushim, and of Cushi, captured the strongest places in the country, and carried away from Jerusalem the treasures of the Lord's house, and of the king's palace, as well as the golden bucklers of Solomon. Jeroboam having secured the friendship of Shishak, his territories were not invaded, 2 Chron. xii. 1 Kings xiv. 25, 36. See Egypt, p. 373, and Pharaoh.

SHITTIM, a valuable kind of wood, of which Moses made the greater part of the tables, ark, and pews belonging to the tabernacle. Jerome says, "The shittim wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, that it is like white thorn in its color and leaves, but not in its size, for the tree is so large, that it affords very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, without knots, and extremely beautiful; so that the rich and curious make screws of it for their presses. It does not grow in cultivated places, nor in any other places of the Roman empire, but only in the deserts of Arabia." He also says, that sittim wood resembled white thorn, and is of admirable beauty, solidity, strength and smoothness. From this description, it is thought he means the black acacia, which is found in the deserts of Arabia, and the wood of which is very common about mount Sinai on the mountains which border on the Red sea, and is so hard and solid as to be almost incorruptible. It is by no means certain, however, that the acacia is the wood described by the Hebrew shittim. The LXX, unable to identify it, have rendered the word, "incorruptible wood."

SHOBAH, general of the army of Hadadezer, king of Syria, was defeated by David at Helam, 2 Sam. x. 16. &c.

SHOBABA, of Nahash, of the city of Rabba, came with Barzillai to meet David when he fled from Absalom, and brought him refreshments, 2 Sam. xxvii.

SHOCOI, see Socoh.

SHOES. Among the Hebrews, women of fashion and property wore very valuable shoes, of which the instance of Judah affords proof, 2 Chron. xvi. 19. The military shoe, as we see from Moses, was sometimes of metal, (Deut. xxxiiii. 25.) and from the description of the armor of Goliath, we find he had boots of brass, 1 Sam. xvii. 6. Homer gives to his heroes boots of brass, others of copper. In the army of Antiochus the Great, luxury was so great, that most of the soldiers had golden nails under their shoes. See Sandal.

SHOULDER. To give or lend the shoulder, for bearing a burden, signifies to submit to servitude: Gen. xiii. 15. The priest advises his pupil to submit his shoulder to the yoke of wisdom, Eccles. vi. 36. Baruch (ii. 21.) advises the captive Jews at Babylon to submit their shoulders to Nebuchadnezzar, that they might live more comfortably under his government. In a contrary sense, Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder, (Neh. ix. 29.) which will not submit to the yoke. (See Zeph. iii. 9.)

Marks of honor and command were worn on the shoulder; and Job, (xxvi, 36.) when he desires of God to decide his case: "Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown upon my head, that the Messiah shall insinuate his government on his shoulders. Elamik, son of Hilkiah, to the house of David, and to lay it shoulder." The respect paid by offering the shoulders to God, and to men of distinction, as a delicate part, should not be overlooked. Shoulders of the heave offering, at the consecration of priests was to be sanctified, (Exod. xxix. 27.) shoulder of the Nazarite's offering was to be burned, (Numb. xvi. 19.) So Samuel showed a man respect to Saul, by reserving the right shoulder of the heave offering, (1 Sam, ixxiv. i.) every time he treated Saul as king elect. It is probable that the right shoulder was the precious part; and this became the prerogative of the priest who officiated. (Compare Lev. viii. 26; ix. 21; x. 14.)

I. SHUAH, of Asher, daughter to Heber, vii. 32.

II. SHUAH, daughter of Bira of Adullam, wife of the patriarch Judah. She was the mother of Er, and Onan, Gen. xxxviii. 24.

SHUAL, a country in Israel, which the Philistines invaded in the time of Saul, (1 Sam. xiii. 17.) situation of it is not known.

SHUBAEL, son of Amram, and father of Moses, (Exod. vi. 23.) was head of the order among the twenty-four families of the 1 Chron. xxv. 42. In the parallel passage, Gen. xlv. 2.

SHULAMITE, or SULTHAM, the name borne in Canticles, vi. 13. See Canticles.

SHUMATHTHES were the inhabitants of Josha, (Josh. xviii. 26.) or sons of Sebal, 1 Chron. vi. 27.

SHUNEM, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 23. Philistines encamped at Shunem, and in the grove or plain of Esdraelon; (1 Sam. xxvii. 20.) encamped at Gilboa. Eusebius places Shoth miles south of Tabor. He also mentions a town called Samin, in Aerathetene, in the neighborhood of Samaria.

SHUR, a city in Arabia Petraea, which was the desert of Sin, Gen. xvi. 7; Exod.; Sam. xvi. 7; xxvii. 8. See Exodus, p. 404. S. Shushan, (Ps. lx.) or Shoshannin, (lxv.) the name of a musical instrument; signifies a lily, or lilies; and if the instrument named from its similarity to this flower, we understand the symbol.

II. Shushan, or Sus an, the capital city of Persia, (Dan. viii. 2.) on the river Ulai. I winter residence of the Persian kings, a place where Daniel had the vision of the ram and the lamb, and the third year of Belshazzar, Dan. viii. 2. N was also at Shushan, when he obtained the privilege to return into Judea, and the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. i.

The present Shouster, the capital of Chu generally believed to be the ancient Susa; Kurneir rather thinks the ruins about thirty miles west of Shushan are those of that ancient city of royalty, "stretching not less, perhaps, than the same distance from one extremity to the other. The immense space between the rivers Ki Abzai and, like the ruins of Ctesiphon, Bagh, on the Khes, consist of huge blocks of earth and covered with broken pieces of brick and col
The largest is a mile in circumference, and nearly one hundred feet in height; another, not quite so high, is built of stone, and covered with pieces of tiles, with irregular layers of brick and mortar, five or six feet in thickness, to serve, as it should seem, as a kind of prop to the mass. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not infrequently here discovered by the Arabs, when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids (ruins) stands the tomb of Daniel, a small and apparently a modern building, erected on the spot where the relics of that prophet are believed to rest." Major Renmel coincides in the opinion that these ruins represent the ancient Shussa; but Dr. Vincent determines for Shousser. The site of Shussa is now a gloomy wilderness, infested by lions, leopards, and other beasts of prey, the dread of whom compelled Mr. Monteith and Mr. Kinnaeir to take shelter for the night within the walls that encompass Daniel's tomb, a small modern building, which is supposed to mark the site of the prophet's place of sepulture.

SIBRECHAI, a hero in David's army, who killed the giant Saph, in the battle of Gob, or Gazee, 2 Sam. xxvi. 18.

SIBMAH, see SHIMMAH.

SIBRAIM, or SABA, the northern boundary of the land of Promise. Episcopel says, (chap. xlvii. 16.) it lay between the confines of Hanath and Damescus.

SICHER, see SKECHEM.

SIDON, or Zidon, now called Saide, is a celebrated city of Phoenicia, on the Mediterranean sea, north of Tyre and Sarepta. It is one of the most ancient cities in the world, (Gen. xlix. 13.) and is believed to have been founded by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan. In the time of Homer, the Sidonians were eminent for their trade and commerce, their wealth and prosperity. Upon the division of Canaan among the tribes by Joshua, Sidon fell to the lot of Asher; (Josh. ix. 28.) but that tribe never succeeded in obtaining possession, Judg. i. 31. The Sidonians continued long under their own government and kings, though sometimes tributary to the kings of Tyre. They were subdued, successively, by the Babylonians, Egyptians, Seleucids and Romans, the latter of whom deprived them of their freedom. Many of the inhabitants of Sidon became followers of our Saviour, (Matt. x. 23.) and there was a Christian church there, when Paul visited it on his voyage to Rome, Acts xxvii. 3. It is at present, like most of the other Turkish towns in Syria, dirty and full of ruins, though there is a considerable trade carried on there. Its present population is estimated at from 8000 to 10,000.

Among the medals of Sidon collected by Mr. Taylor, are some with a Greek inscription, "to the Sidonian goddess," which agrees exactly with the appellation in 1 Kings xi. 5, 33: "Ashtoreth, goddess of the Sidonians." They have also Phoenician inscriptions on them, and the date is supposed to be 155-183, from the era of the Seleucids.

SIGN, a token, or whatever serves to express, or represent, another thing. Thus the Lord gave to Noah the rainbow, as a sign of his covenant, (Gen. ix. 19, 13.) and for the same purpose he appointed circumcision to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 11. (See also Exod. iii. 12; Judg. vi. 17.) In Is. vii. 18, the word is used for a prophetic similitude, "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel." (See also Ezek. iv. 3, and Hts, of fhn.)

SIHON, king of the Amorites, on refusing passage to the Hebrews, and coming to attack them, was himself slain, his chariots filled with clays, and pieces of tiles, with irregular layers of brick and mortar, five or six feet in thickness, to serve, as it should seem, as a kind of prop to the mass. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not infrequently here discovered by the Arabs, when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids (ruins) stands the tomb of Daniel, a small and apparently a modern building, erected on the spot where the relics of that prophet are believed to rest." Major Renmel coincides in the opinion that these ruins represent the ancient Shussa; but Dr. Vincent determines for Shousser. The site of Shussa is now a gloomy wilderness, infested by lions, leopards, and other beasts of prey, the dread of whom compelled Mr. Monteith and Mr. Kinnaeir to take shelter for the night within the walls that encompass Daniel's tomb, a small modern building, which is supposed to mark the site of the prophet's place of sepulture.

SIHOR, a river, by some thought to be the Nile; but more probably the little river in the south of Judah. (See Josb. xiii. 3, and Ezek. River or.) (In Is. xxiii. 3, and Jer. ii. 18, this name must necessarily be understood of the Nile. R.

SILOS, (Acts xv. 22.) and SIVANUS, (2 Cor. i. 19.) the former name being a contraction of the latter; one of the chief men among the first disciples, and thought by some to have been of the number of the seventy. On occasion of a dispute at Antioch, on the observance of the legal ceremonies, Paul and Barnabas were chosen to go to Jerusalem, to advise with the apostles, and those returned with Judas and Silas. Silas joined himself to Paul; and after Paul and Barnabas had separated, (Acts xv. 37-41, A. D. 51.) he accompanied Paul to visit the churches of Syria and Cilicia, and the towns and provinces of Lycaonia, Phrygia, Galatia and Macedonia, &c. See Paul. Silas was very useful in preaching the gospel, (2 Cor. i. 19.) and some refer to him what Paul says to the Corinthians: (2 Cor. vii. 18, 19.) "And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel, throughout all the churches; not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us, with this grace which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord," &c. Peter conveyed his First Epistle to the persons to whom he addressed it by the hand of Silas, whom he calls "a faithful brother."

SILK. The question whether silk were known to the ancients may seem, at first sight, to have little relation to biblical inquiry; but it leads to matters of some importance. For when we read in the Acts of Lyd, a seller of purple, we are naturally led to inquire what was the subject of that color; was it woollen, or linen, or cotton? To answer these questions properly, demands some previous inquiry. It is certain that silk was imported into Europe, ages before the silk-worm that produces it; and it much resembled the hanks, known at present, in form, color and substance. In this state it was called koleserica, or whole silk; and a method was discovered of separating the threads, and working them up again, in a thinner state, so that when woven the web resembled the modern gauze. It appears that Pamphila, a woman of Cos, first practised this art; and that the Cosan vases, which were so transparent as to be called "a poet, "women of air," were made of it; although it is possible that they might originally be of cotton, or fine muslin. Silk was manufactured at Tyre and Berytus, as well singly, as intermixed with other materials. If so, it might easily form dresses for the use of the rich men in the parable, who wore purple. But this leads to inquiry, whether purple were silk.

It is well known that the dress of the Roman nobility was purple; but Ammianus Marcellinus complains that "the celebrated silk of the Seres anciently composed the dress of the Roman nobility, but the quality of it was not kept up in his days, the extravagant and indiscriminate clothing of the lower ranks." Here the silk is synonymous with purple; or it is stained with purple; as in the Hippolytus of Seneca, Act ii. sc. 1. Juvenal says, that "formerly the provinces were not plundered of their property, of conchylia Cos, the purple dyed at Cos; veste Cos conchylata, that is, purpurea irrorata, says a commentator. These, as we
II. Simon, another high-priest of the Jews, son of Onias II. was advanced to the high-priesthood, A. M. 3785, and died A. M. 3805, Eccles. 1. 2, 3. There are several other high-priests of the Jews bearing this name, mentioned by Josephus.

III. Simon Macabeus, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas and Jonathan, was chief, prince and pontiff of the Jews, from A. M. 3860 to 3868, and was succeeded by John Hircanus, his son. Simon contributed greatly by his valor and wisdom to advance the happiness of his nation, and to render it prosperous and secure. He took Joppa, and made a harbor of it to improve the trade of the Jews; and every way extended the limits of his country. He was at length treacherously killed by his son-in-law Ptolemy, son of Ambibus, I Mac. ii. 65, et passim.

IV. Simon, the son of Benjamin, and superintendent of the temple, 2 Mac. iii. 4, 5.

V. Simon the Cyrenian, father of Alexander and Rufus, was compelled by the Jews to carry the cross after Jesus, Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21. But nothing is known of him further.

VI. Simon the Canaanite, or Simon Zelotes, an apostle of Jesus Christ. Luke gives him the surname of Zelotes, the zealot, (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13,) which is supposed by some to be a translation of the proper name Canaanite, given him by the other evangelists, Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18. The particulars of his life are unknown; nor does it appear where he preached, or where he died. See Zelotes.

VII. Simon the Pharisee, with whom Jesus dined, after he had raised the child of the widow of Nain, Luke vii. 36, A. D. 31. While they were at table, a woman, noted for her ill life, entered the room, poured perfume on the feet of Jesus, wiped them with her hair, and washed them with her tears. Simon was displeased with her conduct, but was reproved by Jesus; who forgave the sinner, and condemned the unforgiving Pharisee by a similitude.

VIII. Simon the Leper dwelt at Bethany, near Jerusalem, (Matt. xxvi. 6; Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 1, 2,) and Jesus, coming thereto a few days before his passion, was invited to eat with him. Lazarus, who had been raised from the dead some time before, was at table with them, and Martha, his sister, was very busy in attendance. Mary, the other sister of Lazarus, to show her love and respect for our Saviour, brought a box of perfume, which she poured on his feet.

IX. Simon Niger, or the Black, (Acts xi. 1,) was among the prophets and teachers of the Christian church at this time. Simon the Cyrenian; but there is no other proof of this, than the similitude of names, which Calmet thinks is not a good one, since Luke always calls Simon the Cyrenian by the name of Simon; but Simon Niger, by the name of Simon. Mr. Taylor remarks, however, that if Calmet could think, as he did, Simon, bishop of Jerusalem, to be the same as Simon our Lord's cousin, it would require no great exertion to infer the identity of Simon the Cyrenian with Simon Niger. Besides, it is certain that Luke, who calls Simon Peter by the name of Simon, also calls him Simon, in reporting the speech of James, Acts xv. 14. If, then, Simon and Simeon denote the same person in this instance, why may they not in the instance of Simon the Cyrenian and Simon Niger? X. Simon the Tanner, a person at Joppa, in whose house Peter lodged, when the messengers from Cornelius the centurion came to him, Acts x.

XI. Simon Magus, of the Sorcerers. Philip the deacon, coming to preach at Samaria, Acts viii. 5-13, converted many, and among others this Simon also believed, and was baptized. The apostles Peter and John subsequently communicated the Holy Spirit to those baptized by Philip; at which Simon offered money to them, saying, "Give me also this power." Peter replied with great indignation, "Thy money perish with thee, and thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity." Luke adds, Acts viii. 9-11, that Simon had ad dicted himself to magic before Philip came to Sama ria, and by his impostures and enchantments had seduced the people, who said, "This man is the great power of God."

Irenaeus says, that after Peter had rejected, with correr, his proposal of selling the power of imparting the Holy Spirit, Simon fell into much greater errors and abominations; applying himself to magic more than ever, taking pride in withstanding the apostles, and infecting a great number of persons with his impius errors. For this purpose, it is said, he left Samaria, and travelled through several provinces; seeking places where the gospel had not yet reached,
that he might prejudice the minds of men against it.

At Tyre, Theodoret says, he bought a public prostitu tte, called Selene, or Helene, and carried her with him, committing crimes in secret with her. Having run through several provinces, and made himself ad mired by vast numbers of persons, for his false mira cles and impostures, he came to Rome in the time of the emperor Claudius, about A.D. 41, where it is said by Justin that he was honored as a deity by the Romans, and by the senate itself, who de creed a statue to him, in the isle of Tiber, with this inscrip tion—To Simon, the holy God. Simonii Deo sancto.
This fact, however, is disputed by able critics, who think Justin mistook a statue dedicated to Sema Sanca, a pagan deity, for one erected Simonii san to.

As to the heresies of Simon; in addition to those imputed to him, Acts viii. 10, the fathers accuse him of pretending to be the great power of God; of affirming that he came down as the Father in re spect of the Samaritans, as the Son in respect of the Jews, and as the Holy Spirit in respect of the Gen tiles; but that it is indifferent which of these names he went by. Jerome quotes these blasphemous ex pressions out of one of his books: "I am the word of God; I am the beauty of God; I am the comforter;
I am the Almighty; I am the whole Essence of God."
He was the inventor of the Eons, which were so many persons of whom they composed their idea of God; he called the first intelligence, the mother of all things, and sometimes, the Holy Ghost, Prunica, or Minerva. He said, that by this first in telligence he had originally a design of creating the angels; but that she, knowing this will of her father, had descended lower, and had produced the angels, and the other spiritual powers, to whom she had given no knowledge of her father; that these angels and powers had afterwards made angels and men;
that Helen had passed successively into the bodies of various women; among others into that of Helen, wife of Menelaus, who occasioned the war of Troy;
and at last into the body of this Helen of Tyre.

He did not acknowledge Christ to be the Son of God, but considered him as a rival, and pretended himself to be the Christ. He believed not the resour ception of the body, but barely a resurrection of the soul. He taught that men need not trouble them selves about good works, all actions being indifferent, and that the distinction of actions into good and was only introduced by the angel men subject to them. He rejected the i and said he had come to abolish it. He SIN is any thought, word, desire, acti action of sin, contrary to the law of Ge tive when compared with it. The H several words for expressing sin.

The example, that (1) reša, Chataath, signifi minded against a positive precept; (2) math, a sin committed against a negati and (3) ἁμαρτία, Shegagah, a sin of ignor fulness, omission, or inadvertency. But it is certain that in Israel sins were often used interchangeably, and that Scripture seldom observes such a distinction. It often calls very great sins by the name of ignorance, or folly; and at other times gives the name of sin to faults of inadvertency.

Sin often denotes the sacrifice of expiation, or the sacrifice for sin—the sin-offering, Lev. iv. 3, 25, 29; v. 6; vii. 2; Ps. xl. 6; Rom. viii. 3. Paul says, for example, that God was pleased that Jesus, who knew no sin, should be our victim of expiation: “for he hath made him to be sin [a sin-offering: sin, by analogy of ideas] for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him,” 2 Cor. v. 21. In conformity with this idea, some, for sin lieth at the door, (Gen. iv. 7) read, thou shouldest lay a sin-offering.

God was not the author of sin, or of death, the consequence of sin; but sin and death entered the world by the malice of the devil, Wisd. i. 13, 14; ii. 24. Adam, by his disobedience, rendered all his posterity depraved, guilty before God; his sin involved them all in death; through him we are born children of sin, and are inclined to evil from the womb, 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22; Rom. v. 12; vi. 13; Ps. li. 5; Rom. iii. 23; Gen. viii. 21. Our Saviour, by his death, has recovered life for us; his obedience has reconciled us to God; and he has merited for us the character of children of God.

The sin against the Holy Ghost is differently explained by the fathers and interpreters. We believe Athanasius to have been the nearest to the truth. He thinks this sin was chargeable on the Pharisees, because they maliciously imputed the works of Christ to the power of the devil, though they could not but be convinced in their own minds, that they were effected by a good spirit. This also involved a denial of the divinity of the Son, which was clearly proved by his works, works performed by the divine power of the Holy Spirit.

SINA, a mountain in Arabia Petraea, in the peninsula formed by the two northern arms of the Red Sea, and rendered memorable as the spot where the law was given to Israel by the hand of Moses, Exod. xix. &c. There is considerable difficulty in determining the particular spot honored by the Deity for the purpose, but it is believed that it was on a small eminence which stands separated from the sandy plain, and is visible from the western shore of the Gulf of Aqaba. The mountain, according to Burckhardt, is a prodigious pile of mountains, comprising many separate peaks, and extending thirty or forty miles in diameter. A peak in the central group, called Dyedem Moses, the mount of Moses, is pointed out by tradition as the scene of the wonderful occurrences recorded in Exod. xx. and a higher elevation, separated from it by a deep cleft, and called mount St. Catherine, from a ridiculous legend relative to the miraculous interment, on its summit, of the saint bearing this name, is considered to be the mountain called Horeb, and which is frequently spoken of as belonging to the same aggregation of mountains as Sinai. (Comp. Dent. v.; Exod. xx.) Mr. Crusader (Mod. Trav. Arabia, p. 144, seq. Amer. ed.) has carefully examined and compared the accounts of Burckhardt and other writers with the Scripture references to Sinai and Horeb, but without arriving at any satisfactory result. (For a full account of Sinai, see Exodus, p. 412, seq.)

SINCERITY, truth and uprightness; an agreement of the heart and tongue. Sincerity is opposed to double mindedness, or deceit, when the sentiments of the heart are contrary to the language of the lips. The Latin word sinceritas is derived from sincerus, without deceit. The Gr. means wax; that is, perfectly pure; honey. In Scripture sincerity signifies pure, without mixture. Paul (Phil. i. 10.) would have the Philippians to be pure, their behavior innocent, free from offenses, “That ye may be sincere, and without offense till the day of Christ.” And Peter (3 Epist. iii. 1.) exhorts the pure, sincere minded of the faithful. Paul speaks (1 Cor. v. 8.) of sincerity and truth, or of purity and truth, in opposition to the leavened bread of iniquity. He reproaches the false apostles with not preaching Jesus Christ sincerely, purely, with upright and disinterested sentiments, Phil. i. 15.

SINITE, the descendants of the eighth son of Canaan, who dwelt in the region of mount Lebanon, Gen. x. 17.

I. SION, a name given (Deut. iv. 48.) to one of the elevations of the mountain-ridge called Hermon, which see.

II. SION, the name of one of the mountains on which the city of Jerusalem was built, and transferred its court thither from Hebron, whence it is frequently called the city of David; and from his having deposited the ark there, it is also frequently called "the holy hill." (See Jerusalem.) When Dr. Richardson visited this spot, one part of it supported a crop of barley, and another was undergoing the labor of the plough, in which circumstance we have another remarkable instance of the fulfilment of prophecy—"Therefore shall Zion for your sakes be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps," Mic. iii. 12.

SIRION, see HERMON.

SISERA, a general in the army of Jabin, king of Hazor, (Judg. iv. 3.) was sent by his master against Barak and Deborah, who occupied mount Tabor with an army. He marched with 900 chariots armed with scythes, and a great number of infantry; but, entangling himself among broken ground, was attacked by Barak, at the head of 10,000 men, and entirely routed. Sisera himself fled on foot towards Harosheth of the Gentiles. Approaching the tent of Heber, the Kenite, Jael, wife of Heber, desired him to enter, and hide himself; but while he was asleep, she drove a tent peg through his head, with a hammer, and fastened him to the ground. See JAPF.

SISTER. In the style of the Hebrews, sister has equal latitude with brother. It is used, not only for a sister by natural relation, from the same father and mother, but also for the same father only, or by the same mother only, or a near relation only, Matt. xiii. 58; Mark vi. 3. Sarah is called sister to Abraham, (Gen. xii. 13; xx. 12.) though only his niece, according to some, or sister by the father's side, according to others. In Leviticus, (chap. xvi. 18.) it is forbidden to wed the sister of a wife; i.e. to marry two sisters; or, according to some interpreters, to marry a second wife, having one already. Literally, "Thou shalt not take a wife over her sister, and afflict her;" as if to forbid polygamy. Sometimes the word sister expresses a resemblance of conditions and of inclinations. Thus the prophets call Jerusalem the sister of Sodom, and of Samaaria, because that city delighted in the iniquity called the holy hill. (See Jer. iii. 8, 10; Ezek. xvi. 45.) So Christ describes those who keep his commandments as his brothers and his sisters, Matt. xii. 50.

SITTING, see Bed, and Eating.

SIVAN, the name of a Hebrew month; the third is, pebbles; so is honor completely overwhelmed by base comparisons, if given to a fool.

SMELL. Jacob said to his sons, after the slaughter of the Shechemites, (Gen. xxxiv. 30.) "Ye have troubled me, to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land."—Ye have given me an ill scent, or smell, among this people. The Israelites in a similar manner complained to Moses and Aaron, (Exod. v. 21.) "The Lord look upon you, and judge, because you have made our savor to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants."

This manner of speaking occurs frequently in the Hebrew. In a contrary sense, Paul says, (Rom. ii. 15, 16.) "We are unto God a sweet savor of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish; to the one we are the savor of death unto death, and to the other the savor of life unto life."

In the sacrifices of the old law, the smell of the burnt-offerings is represented in Scripture as agreable to God: (Gen. viii. 21.) And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar; it is a burnt-offering unto the Lord; it is a sweet savor, an offering made by fire unto the Lord. The same thing, by analogy, is said of prayer: (Ps. cxlii. 2.) "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands, as the evening sacrifice." And John, in allusion to this service of the Old Testament, represents the twenty-four elders with "golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of the saints," Rev. v. 8.

SMITE, to strike. The word is often used for to kill. Thus, David smote the Philistines; i.e. he killed Goliath. The Lord smote Nabal and Uzziah; he put them to death. To smite an army, is to conquer it, to rout it entirely. To smite with the tongue, is to load with injuries and reproaches, with scandalous reflections. Noah smote his sons, and smote them with indignation, trouble, astonishment, Jer. xxxi. 19.

SMYRNA, a city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, situated on the Archipelago, and having a fine harbor. Our Lord, by the mouth of John, addresses the angel or bishop of Smyrna, (Rev. ii. 8—10.) who is thought to have been Polycarp, the martyr, who was put to death, A. D. 166. Smyrna is still a place of great consideration, having a great foreign trade, and a population of about 140,000.

SNOW, being white, forms a frequent object of comparison in Scripture, Exod. iv. 6; Numb. xii. 10; 2 Kings v. 27. Snow is enumerated among the stores in the treasury of God, his atmospheric mists, &c. The expression in Prov. xxv. 13, in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them who send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters, seems to refer to the cooling effect of snow on the wines drank in the East; or to what in Italy is termed alfresco, that is, snow put into water to cool it, previous to its being drank, which is esteemed extremely refreshing. This removes the apparent contradiction of this passage with chap. xxvi. 1. As snow, that is, a fall of snow, in summer, is unnatural, and ill-timed, so honor is not seemly for a fool; but it is quite out of character, out of season.

SO, king of Egypt, made an alliance with Hoes, king of Israel, and promised him assistance, yet gave none, nor prevented Shalmanezer king of Assyria from taking Samaries, and subverting the kingdom, 2 Kings xvii. 4.

Usrher and Marsham think So to be Sabacon, king of Ethiopia, who is taken for the first king of the dynasty of Ethiopians in Egypt, and who, according to Usbher, began to reign A. M. 3377, having taken and burnt alive Bocchoris king of this country. He reigned eight years, and had for his successor Sevechus, whom Usbher thinks to be the Sethon of Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 141. (But see the article Emet, p. 379; and also under Pharaoh, R.)

SOAP, or DETERGENT SOAP, named in Hebrew bordith, signifying the cleanser, is by some supposed to be a salt, extracted from the earth, called by the Arabs bera. But others prefer a vegetable, in accordance with the LXX, who render νεσσας, or σάσανας, herb. The ancients certainly employed vegetables and the salt extracted from them, for the purpose of washing linen. Dioscorides and Pliny mention the striction as so employed, and the Persians use this plant as soap. The κανά, κεφι, κεφις, καυχος, or σάσανας, in the London Pharmacopoeia, is said; as there seems to be sufficient reason to consider it as the bordith-plant of Jeremiah, (ii. 24.) at least it is the best known to us of those plants which possess the property of cleansing, either by themselves or their roots. In its wild state it rises about a foot in height; the leaves are long, narrow and prickly, the flowers whitish or rose-color. It is found on the sea-shore, and is considered as a sea-weed. The best, burned into a hard mass with salt and brimstone, is used. Combined with fat, it forms soap, the cleansing virtures of which are well known in every family, Jer. ii. 22; Mal. iii. 2.

SOBRIETY is commonly taken for the opposite to intemperance; but sometimes also for moderation, modesty, and that virtue which chooses the golden mean, Rom. xii. 3. Paul (1 Tim. ii. 9.) would have women dress themselves "in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety," as decency requires. The word sobriety is also taken for temperance at Tim. iii. 2. "A bishop must be vigilant, sober," prudent, moderate. We have, however, no English word that properly expresses the whole meaning of the term rendered sober. It imports steadiness of mind, prudence, the power of forming a just estimate of things; a sense of what is becoming; which differs, according to time, place and circumstances; together with a suitable behavior and conduct.

SOCOH, or Socoh, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 35; 1 Sam. xvii. 1.) three miles westward. Solomon afterwards fortified, 2 Chron. xi. 7. Eusebius says, there were two cities of this name, the higher and the lower, nine miles from Eleutheropolis toward Jerusalem. It is also the name of a man, 1 Chron. vi. 79. It is in the Pentapolis; and for some time the dwelling-place of Lot, Gen. xiii. 12, 13. Its crimes, however, were so enormous, that God destroyed it by fire from heaven, with three neighboring cities, Gomorrah, Zeboim, and Admah; which were as wicked as itself, Gen. xlix. A. M. 2107. The plain in which they stood was pleasant and fruitful, like an earthly paradise, but it was first burned, and afterwards overflowed by the waters of the Jordan, which formed the present salt lake of Sodom. The prophets mention the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, or allude to it, and intimate, that these places shall be desert, and dried up, and uninhabited; (Jer. xlix. 16; 1 L. 40.) that they shall be covered with thorns and briars of salt and sulphur, where can be neither planting nor sowing, Deut. xxxix. 23; Wisd. ii. 9; Amos iv. 11. Throughout Scripture the ruin of Sodom and Gomorrah is represented as one of the most signal effects of God's anger. See Sza, Dead.
deep disgrace on his character. He took wives and concubines, to the number of 1000, from among the harem women, Idols of the Moabites, and the daughters and heitoites, who perverted his heart, so that he worshipped Ashoreth of the Sidonians, Moloch of the Ammon-tites, and Chemosh of the Moabites, to whom he built temples on the mount of Olives. These sins brought on him the judgments of the Lord, who said to him in a dream, "Since you have not kept my covenant, nor obeyed my commandments, I will rend and divide your kingdom, and will give it to one of your servants." Before his death, he saw the commencement of revolt, in the troubles raised by Jeroboam, and Hadad the Edomite. He died, after he had reigned forty years, (A. M. 3029, ante A. D. 975,) at about 58 years of age. His history was written by the prophet Nathan, Ahijah and Iddo; and he was buried in the city of David. Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead, but not over all Israel. See Rehoboam.

* Of all the works composed by Solomon, we have nothing remaining but his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles. Some have ascribed to him the book of Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus. (See the articles.)

The Jews think he was the author of Psalm cxix. "Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son," &c. And Psalm cxlix. v. "Except the Lord build the house," &c.

SOLOMON'S SONG, see CANTICLES.

SON, a word used in several senses, both in the Old and New Testaments. It denotes (1.) the immediate offspring. (2.) Grandson: so Laban is called son of Nahor, (Gen. xxiv. 5) whereas he was his grandson, being the son of Bethuel: (Gen. xxiv. 29.) Mephibosheth is called son of Saul, though he was the son of Jonathan, son of Saul, 2 Sam. xix. 24. (3.) Remote descendants: so we have the sons of Israel, many ages after the primitive ancestor. (4.) Son-in-law:—There is a son born to Naomi, Ruth iv. 17. (5.) Son by adoption, as Ephraim and Manasseh, to Jacob, Gen. xlvi. (See Adoption.) (6.) Son by nation; sons of the East, 1 Kings iv. 30; Job i. 3. (7.) Son by education; that is, a disciple; Elie calls Samuel his son, 1 Sam. iii. 6. Solomon calls his disciple his son, in the Proverbs, often; and we read of the sons of the prophets, (1 Kings xx. 35, et al.) that is, those under a course of instruction for ministerial persons; perhaps son, 1 Tim. i. 2; Titus i. 4; Phil. eem. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 15; 1 Pet. v. 13. (8.) Son by disposition and conduct, as sons of Belial, (Jude, xii. 2; 1 Sam. ii. 12.) unargentful persons; sons of the mighty, (Pa-xx. 23.) heroes, sons of the band (2 Chron. xxv. 13.) soldiers rank and file; sons of the scribes, who study or practise sorcery, Isa. lvii. 9. (9.) Son in reference to age; son of one year, (Exod. xii. 5,) that is, one year old; son of sixty years, &c. The same in reference to a beast, Micah vi. 6. (10.) A production, or offspring, as it were, from any parent; sons of the burning coal, that is, sparks, which issue from browning wood, Job v. 7. Son of the bow, that is, an arrow, (Job iv. 19.) because an arrow issues from a bow; but an arrow may also issue from a quiver, therefore son of the quiver, Lam. iii. 13. Son of the floor, threshed corn, Isa. xxi. 10. Sons of oil, (Zech. iii. 14.) the branches of the olive-tree. (11.) Son of beating, that is, deserving beating, Deut. xxv. 3. Son of death; that is, deserving death, Sam. xii. 2. Son of perdition; that is, deserving perdition, John xvii.

12. (12.) Son of God, by excellence above all; Jesus the Son of God, Mark i. 1; Luke i. 15; John i.

34; Rom. i. 4; Heb. iv. 14; Rev. ii. 18. The only-begotten; and in this he differs from Adam, who was son of God, but not by adoption, like the princes and Histoites, who perverted his heart, so that he worshipped Ashoreth of the Sidonians, Moloch of the Ammon-tites, and Chemosh of the Moabites, to whom he built temples on the mount of Olives. These sins brought on him the judgments of the Lord, who said to him in a dream, "Since you have not kept my covenant, nor obeyed my commandments, I will rend and divide your kingdom, and will give it to one of your servants." Before his death, he saw the commencement of revolt, in the troubles raised by Jeroboam, and Hadad the Edomite. He died, after he had reigned forty years, (A. M. 3029, ante A. D. 975,) at about 58 years of age. His history was written by the prophet Nathan, Ahijah and Iddo; and he was buried in the city of David. Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead, but not over all Israel. See Rehoboam.

In addition to those senses in which the word son is used in Scripture, there are others, which show the extreme looseness of its application. So, when we read of some of the bride-chamber, (Matt. ix. 15; Mark ii. 19,) it merely indicates the youthful companions of the bridegroom, as in the instance of Samson.

And when the Holy Mother was committed to the care of the apostle John, (John xix. 36,) the term son is evidently used with great latitude.

SONG OF SOLOMON, see CANTICLES.

SOOTHSAYER, see DIVINATION, and MAGIC.

SORCERER, see DIVINATION, and MAGIC.

I. SOREK, a place where Delilah dwelt, not far from Zorah and Eshtaol, Samson's usual abode, Judg. xvi. 4.

II. SOREK, VINE OF, a finer and nobler species of vine, yielding, according to the rabbins, the small sweet grapes which seem to have no seeds or kernels, and which are still called in Morocco Sork. The word, however, may signify red grapes. (See Niebuhr Descr. Arab. p. 147. Germ. edit.) The English version gives the word by choice, noble, &c. Gen. xlix. 11; Isa. v. 2; Jer. ii. 21.

SORROW. Sorrows convert men to Christ, but afflict the heart, sin the spirits, and injures the health. Scripture cautions against it, (Prov. xxv. 20; Eccles. iv. 1—3; xxx. 24, 25; 1 Thess. iv. 3, &c.) but Paul disliguishes two sorts of sorrow; one a godly the other a worldly sorrow. 2 Cor. vii. 10, "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation, not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world worketh death." So, the wise man (Eccles. vii. 3) says that the grave and serious air of a master who reproves, is more profitatable than the laughter and carelessness of those who flatter. Our Lord upbraided that counterfeit air of sorrow and mortification, which the Pharisees affected when they fasted; and cautioned his disciples against all such affection, which proposes to gain the approbation of men. Matt. vi. 16.

SOSIPATER, a disciple of Berech, mentioned by Paul, (Rom. xvi. 21.) and who was his kinsman, as some think.

reasonably supposes that other plants of an inferior description, and more commonly used, used to be substituted for it and that it is one of these spurious nards that the Roman naturalist speaks. Horace mentions a Nardus Austiaca, and Dioscorides speaks of a Nardus Syracaeca, as a species different from the Indica, which certainly was brought from some of the remote parts of India; for both Dioscorides and Galen, by way of fixing more precisely the country whence it comes, call it also Nardus Gangulae.

This plant was highly valued among the ancients, both as an article of luxury, and as a medicine. The Unguentum Nordum, or ointment manufactured from the nard, was the favorite perfume used at the ancient baths and feasts; and it appears from a passage in Horace, that it was so valuable, that so much of it as could be contained in a small box of precious stone was considered a sort of equivalent for a large vessel of wine; and a handsome quota for a guest to contribute to an entertainment, according to the custom of antiquity.

This leads us to notice the narrative of the evangelist, of a woman, having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious; and she brake the box and poured it on his [Christ's] head, Mark xiv. 3. In verse 5, this is said to have been worth more than three hundred pence (denarii); and John (ch. xii. 4) mentions the pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly;—the house was filled with the odor of the ointment;—it was worth three hundred pence (denarii). As this evangelist has determined the quantity, a pound, and the lowest value (for Mark says more) was nearly forty dollars, we may safely suppose that this was not a Syrian production, or made from any fragrant grass growing in the neighboring districts; but was of the true Indian spikenard, very costly. In the answer of our Lord on this occasion, there seems also to be some allusion to the remoteness of the country whence this unguent was brought. Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also, that she hath done, shall be spoken of for a memorial of her, Mark xiv. 5. As much as to say, This unguent came from a distant country, to be sure, but the gospel shall spread to a much greater distance, yes, all over the world; so that in India itself, whence this composition came, shall the memorial of its application to the highest be retained with honor.

The idea of a far country, connected with the ointment, seems to have suggested that of "all the world." In Cant. iv. 13, 14, the spikenard is twice mentioned in a peculiar manner: "Camphire with spikenard, spikenard with saffron." Why should this plant be twice named? A question to which no satisfactory answer can be given, unless we suppose, with the writer just named, that the first word means the Syrian and Arabian plant, which no doubt was familiar to Solomon, and the second, the Indian nard, true spikenard. If this be admitted, the passage is clear, and it is probable that the latter word merely wants some discriminating epithet, answering to spikenard, which transcribers, not understanding, have dropped; or that a different mode of pronunciation distinguished the names of these two plants when mentioned in discourse. In the printed copies the words are differently pointed, and what is still more deserving attention is, that the first word is nardes, plural; whereas the second seems to be put absolutely, nard, or the nard, singular.

From a similar use of this word in the singular form, in Cant. i. 12, "While the king slept at his table, my spikenard sent forth the smell thereof," Mr. Taylor inclines to think that this nard was in the form of an essence, in a small bag, or a number of sprigs of the fragrant grass, worn like a nosebag in the bosom of the bride. What seems to strengthen the idea is, that the different perfumes mentioned in connection with it are all flowers in their natural state.

SPIRIT (Heb. נrotch; Greek, Πνεύμα) is a word employed in various senses in Scripture. (1.) For the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Holy Trinity, who inspired the prophets, who animates good men, pours His unction into our hearts, imparts to us life and comfort; and in whose name we are baptized, as well as in that of the Father and the Son. When the adjective holy is applied to the term spirit, we may safely take it as here explained; but there are many places where it must be taken in a sense, although the term holy is omitted. (2.) Breath, respiration, animal life, common to men and animals: this God has given, and this He recalls when He takes it away, Gen. vii. 15; Num. xvi. 22; Job xii. 10. (3.) The rational soul which animates us, and preserves its being, after the death of the body. That spiritual reasoning and choosing substance, which is capable of eternal happiness: (See Bořk.) (4.) An angel, a dispensation sent from the body. It is said, (Acts xxiii. 8.) that the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Christ, appearing to His disciples, said to them, (Luke xxiv. 38.) Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. Heb. i. 14, good angels are called ministering spirits. It is said (1 Sam. xvi. 14; xvii. 10; xix. 3.) that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul. And in the gospel the devils are often called "unclean spirits, evil spirits, spirits of darkness," &c. (3.) Spirit is sometimes taken for the disposition of the mind or intellect; because it was presumed, that the good or evil inclinations of these proceeded from good or bad spirits. So, a spirit of jealousy, a spirit of fornication, a spirit of prayer, a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of wisdom and understanding, a spirit of fear of the Lord, &c. Num. v. 14; Hos. iv. 12; Zech. xii. 10; Luke xiii. 11; Eccles. xv. 5; Isa. xi. 2.

DISTINGUISHING, or DISCERNING, OF SPIRITS, was a gift of God, which consisted in discerning whether a man were really inspired by the Spirit of God, or was a false prophet, an impostor, who only followed the impulse of his own spirit, or of Satan. Paul speaks (1 Cor. xii. 10.) of the discerning of spirits, as being among the miraculous gifts granted by the Spirit to the faithful, at the first settlement of Christianity. And John exhorts believers not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits, whether they were of God; because many false prophets had gone out into the world, 1 Epist. iv. 1.

TO QUENCH THE SPIRIT (1 Thess. v. 19.) is a metaphorical expression easily understood. The Spirit may be quenched, (1.) by forcing, as it were, that divine agent to withdraw from us, by sin, irregularity of manners, vanity, avarice, negligence, or other crimes contrary to charity, truth, peace, and his other gifts and qualifications. (2.) The Spirit might have been quenched by such actions as caused God to take away his supernatural gifts and favors, such as prophecy, the gift of tongues, the gift of healing, &c. For though those gifts were of mere grace, and God might communicate them sometimes to doubtful characters, yet he has often granted them to the
These places were called stadia, because they were distinguished into courses, or distances, by certain resting places; so that some of the racers run but one distance, some two or more, each according to his strength.

SAR. Under the name of stars, the Hebrews comprehended all constellations, planets and heavenly bodies; all luminaries, except the sun and moon. The psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of God, says, "He numbers the stars, and calls them by their names." He is described as a king taking a review of his army, and knowing the name of every one of his soldiers. To express a very extraordinary increase and multiplication, Scripture uses the similitude of the stars of heaven, or of the sands of the sea, Gen. xxv. 5; xxvii. 17; xxvi. 4; Exod. xxxv. 13, &c. In times of disgrace and public calamity, it is said, the stars withhold their light; that they are covered with darkness; that they fall from heaven, and disappear. These figurative and emphatic expressions, which refer to the governing powers of nations, are only weakened and evaporated by being explained.

To caution the Hebrews against the idolatry that prevailed over almost all the East, of worshipping the stars, moon and sun, king David (Psalm lxxxv. 15—16), that God gave the stars their being, and separated them from that mass of matter which he created; and Job (xxxviii. 7) describes them as praising the Creator at the beginning of the world.

The beauty and splendor that men ascribed to the stars; the great advantages they derived from them; the wonderful order apparent in their courses; the influence ascribed to their returns, in the production and preservation of animals, fruits, plants and minerals, have induced almost all people to impute to them life, knowledge, power, and to pay them a sovereign worship and adoration. See IDOLATRY.

The sacred books seem to ascribe knowledge to the stars; hence we are told that they praised the Lord, (Job xxxviii. 7.) and elsewhere they are excited to this. These expressions, however, are popular, or poetical, and are not to be understood literally; for then we must admit, that the earth, the trees, the waters, are animated and intelligent, since we find in Scripture expressions that import as much. All the creatures of God praise him, (Psalm cxv.) and God, the Lord, and obey him, each in its way.

The star foretold by Balaam, (Num. xxiv. 17.) was, according to the modern Jews, king David, who conquered the Moabites, and reduced them under his obedience. But the paraphrastics Onkelos and Jonathan explain it of the Messiah, as the natural sense of the passage. The Jews were so well convinced of this, at the time of Christ, and afterwards, that the famous impostor Bar-chabba caused himself to be called Bar-cocheba; "son of the star," pretending to be the Messiah; which involved the Jews of Palestine in a revolt, that completed the ruin of their unfortunate nation.

STATER, a Greek coin of the value of one shekel, Matt. xvii. 27, in the Greek. It was worth about 33 cents.

STEPHANAS, a Christian of Corinth, whose family Paul baptized; probably about A. D. 32, 1 Cor. i. 16. He was forward to the service of the church, and came to Paul at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 15; 17.

STEPHEN, the first Christian martyr, was probably a Hellenistic Jew, and Epiphanius thinks he was among the 72 disciples; but this is not probable. He is always first among the deacons in the church at Jerusalem; and it is believed he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. He was full of the Holy Spirit, and of zeal, and performed many miracles, Acts vi. 5. Some of the synagogue of the freedmen, of the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, and others, disputing with him, desired being unanswerable wisdom and spirit, sowed false witnesses, to testify, that they had heard him blaspheme against Moses and against God, and drew him before the Sanhedrim. Stephen appeared in the midst of this assembly, with a countenance like that of an angel; and upon the high-priest asking him what he had to answer, he denied that he had said any thing against Moses or the temple—but he showed that the Jews had always opposed God and his prophets; upbraid ed them with the hardness of their hearts, with their putting the prophets to death, and with slaying the Messiah himself. His boldness enraged the unbelieving Jews; but Stephen, lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, "I see the heavens open, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God." Unable to endure any more, his enemies cried out, stopped their ears, and falling upon him, drew him out of the city, and stoned him; the witnesses laying down their clothes at the feet of a young man called Saul, then one of the most eager persecutors of the Christians, but afterwards one of the most zealous preachers of Christianity. Stephen called upon the Lord, and said, "Lord, impute not this sin to them;" after which he fell asleep in the Lord, and some pious persons took care to bury him, and accompanied his funeral with great mourning, Acts viii. 2.

STEWARD, one who manages the affairs, or superintends the affairs of another. Thus Elizeber was the steward of Abraham's house; (Gen. xvi. 2.) Christian ministers are the stewards of God over his church or family, (Tit. i. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2.) and believers are stewards of his gifts and graces, to dispense the benefits of them to the world, 1 Pet. iv. 10.

On reading the parable of the unjust steward, who defrauds his principal by collusion with his under tenants, (Luke xvi.) we find it concluded by what seems to be a strange expression: (ver. 12.) "If ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" Certainly that which is a man's own he may naturally expect should he give it to him; for who has a right to withhold it? The propriety of the phrase, therefore, and the inferential connection of the sentiment with the parable, is not clear to a general reader; but the following custom of the Turks (2 Lans. i. 51.) may contribute to its better understanding: "It is a common custom with the merchants of this country when they hire a broker, book-keeper, or other [confidential] servant, to agree, that he shall claim no wages; but, to make amends for that unprofitable disadvantage, they give him free and uncontrolled authority to cheat them every way they can, in managing their business; but with this proviso, that they must never exceed the privileged advantage of ten per cent. All under that, which they can fairly gain in serving of accounts with their respective masters, is properly their own; and by their masters' will is confirmed to their possession." He proceeds to say, "The servant knowing he has nothing to depend on but these profits... puts himself upon a wily method of over-reaching others, in the goods he buys by order of his master. His master, on the other hand, well knows that unless he watches carefully his servant's management, he will probably go beyond the tolerated limits of ten per cent."
This kind of allowance, though appearing extremely singular to us, is both ancient and general in the East. It is found in the Gentoo Laws: (chap. ix.) “If a man has hired any person to conduct a trade for him, and no agreement is made in regard to wages, in that case, the person hired shall receive one tenth of the profit.” “If the person be hired to attend cattle, he shall receive one tenth of the milk. If the person be hired for agriculture, one tenth of the crop. If he plough the ground, receiving victuals, one fifth of the crop, if he receive no victuals, one third.” (Halhed’s Code of Gentoo Laws, p. 140.)

We see, then, that Mr. Hill has been too severe in describing the taking of such an allowance as a “eateating” of the principal; since he admits, it has that principal’s permission, and is “a privileged advantage.” We see, too, that the Gentoo laws admit a detention of one third part, in certain cases, as payment for a servant’s labor and attention.

The phrase which appears so offensive to us, now becomes intelligible. If vineyards have not been faithful in the administration of your principal’s property, how can you expect to receive your own share (as the word may signify) of that advantage which should reward your labors? If you have not been just toward him, why, or how, do you expect he should be just toward you? May not this principle set the conduct of the unjust steward in a different light from what it hath hitherto appeared in? (1.) We see that this steward had a right to expect from his master the value of a share of the oil and wheat as his due—But if his master had once got possession of this value, he might have seized it in compensation for former deficiencies: the steward prevents this, by negotiating with the debtors themselves, before their accounts are inspected by his master. (2.) The steward had a right to a portion of the value, but he takes abundantly more than his due; and then carries in the unregistered account to his master, as if it were the produce of the whole, not accounting for the quantity reserved by him for his future dependence in the hands of those who, having had their share of the fraud, might return the advantage by receiving this unjust agent into their habitations. (3.) The steward’s master confounds him as having adopted an expedient not easily to be detected, but, in fact, a cunning contrivance; being evidently founded in custom and equity; readily enough to be represented as merely doing himself that justice which, as he might say, his master denied him; and, as to the quantity he withholds, he might plead somewhat analogous to what is provided for in the Gentoo laws, which, we see, in some cases allow of one third as a compensation for extraordinary care and trouble.

May our Lord’s inference be thus understood: “This steward could only expect that his friends would receive and maintain him, so long as what he could claim of this value, or stock, of oil or of wheat, lasted: when that was exhausted, they would desire his absence; but, contrary to this, I advise you, by your management of worldly riches, to make friends—men who may receive you into, not temporary, but lasting residence; who may welcome your arrival, not into a mere transitory shelter, but into an ever-shading toward each. I beseech this upon you, because riches are so slippery, so perverting, so delusive, that they may well be called deceitful; and they but too often are allurements to unrighteousness—to unrighteous modes of acquiring them, and to unrighteous modes of disposing of them; but if they be used with a disposition of mind contrary to that of this unjust steward, if, instead of being wickedly withheld, if, and liberally circulated, and, as it were account, the benevolence of true piety will to such salutary purposes, as may lay a but necessaries persons under great obloquy will do their utmost to soothe and relieve; will hereafter congratulate your happy unnever-ending beauty and glory.”

This passage (Luke xvi. 8) is more properly impersonally; the phrase “that they may” being equivalent to “that ye may be recr homing habitation.” &c. Impersonal verbs are frequent in Greek; e.g., Luke xii. 20, “Shall they require of you soul of thee,” for “thy soul shall be required of thee,” as “the soul shall be required of men.”

STOICS, a sect of heathen philosophers from the Greek στοική, a porch, or portico, Zeno, its founder, held his school in a city of Athens. They placed the supreme man in living agreeably to nature, affecting the same stiffness, patience, apace, and insensibility, as the Pharsicenses, whom, Josephus, they much resembled. They erable at Athens when Paul visited the city.

STONES. For the names of the probem stone, which were in the high-priest’s breast xviii. 17, &c.) the reader may see their BRASSEPLATE.

BRASS SPREADER, or head stone of the corn put at the angle of a building, whether a foundation or on the top of the wall. (See Cor Our Saviour, though rejected by the Je corner stone of the church, (Ps. cxvii. 16; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 6; Matth. xxii. 4; 10; Luke xx. 17. The Hebrews sometim name of stone, or rock, to kings or princes to God himself.

Moses forbids the Hebrews to set up any stone that is exalted, or reaps xxvi. 1. This may be translated by sight: “a land-mark that stands on a hill in some great road, to be seen from a distance” (lib. xvii.) mentions such stones on the border of Egypt; and he says also, there are severa and eminent stones upon Libanus. The Egyptians had much respect for them that adorned them. They were usually built into a see in Apuleius, kissed and saluted probable that this worship is what Moses prohibited; for heaps of stones, raised in memorable events, are to preserve the remembrance of matters of great importance, are the monuments among the Hebrews. In these were used instead of inscriptions medals or histories. Jacob and Laban railing monument on mount Gilgal, in memory of the event, Gen. xxxi. 46. Joshua erected on of stones taken out of the Jordan, to p memorial of his miraculous passage; (Jos and the Israelites beyond Jordan raised b roads of that river, as a testimony that they but one nation with their brethren on the Josh. xxii. 10.

In illustration of this practice, Mr. Ta from Chardin the following passage:—“U hand of the road are to be seen LARGE heewn stone, which the Persians affirm to sign that the Caous, making war in Media, held a council in that place; it being the custom of those people, when they had consulted with him, to carry a stone to serve instead of a chair: these Caous were a sort of giants. What is most to be admired, after observation of these stones, is this: that they are so big that eight men can hardly move one; and yet there is no place from whence they can be imagined to have been fetched, but from the next mountains, which are six leagues off."

(p. 371)

This extract deserves notice on two accounts: (1.) The Persian notion of stones being used instead of chairs, at a council, must have had some origin; and must also have been customary at some time in that country:— the sitting upon stones, then, could not have been always totally unknown in Mesopotamia, where Laban resided, and Jacob with him; and what was customary at a council, might be practiced at a covenant agreement, as in the case of Laban and Jacob. (2.) The resemblance of these circles of large stones to the Druidical monuments of Great Britain (Stonehenge, Avebury, &c.) is striking. And the stone circles in regions so distant, demonstrates the extensive spread and influence (if not the identity) of that religion, the exercises of which had occupied their erection. (Fragment 165, 734—735.)

Mr. Taylor has collected much information relative to heaps and circles of stones, wholly or partly remaining, in different parts of Great Britain, and elsewhere, for the purpose of throwing light on a practice so often alluded to or referred to in the Old Testament, and especially in connection with Gilgal, a religious station, in the early period of the Israelitish history. The practice of raising and consecrating stones in commemoration of memorable events connected with religion, which has so extensively prevailed in various parts of the world, and among peoples altogether dissimilar in their general character and habits, he considers as affecting a striking proof that the religion of mankind was originally the same, in its objects, its principles and its rites: and that, to wherever the original tribes of men migrated, with their natural fathers at their head, or wherever they settled, they retained those religious customs, notions and references, which they had received as part of their patrimony, in the land of their primary existence.

Rough and unformed stones were considered to be more pure and fit for sacred uses than those that were hewn. Moyses directed (Exod. xx. 25.) an altar to be made to the Lord, of rough stones not hewn; and he consecrated it, which he declared to be polluted. (See also Deut. xxvii. 5; Josh. viii. 31, 32; Ezra v. 8; 1 Mac. iv. 46, 47.)

"A heart of stone" may be understood several ways. Job. (xli. 24.) speaks of a beast, whose heart is as hard as stone, incompenetrable as an anvil; q. d. he is of a very extraordinary strength, boldness and courage. The heart of Nabat became as a stone, when he comprehended the danger he had incurred; and yet, though a man of iron, and a head of cedar, his heart became inimicable like a stone; it was contracted or convulsed, and this convulsion occasioned his death. Ezekiel says, (xi. 19; xxxvi. 36.) the Lord will take away from his people the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; i. e. he will convert them, and inspire them with mildness and more gracious feelings. Nearly in the same sense, John the Baptist said, (Matt. iii. 9.) God was able to raise up to Abraham children from the stones of the desert.

Daniel, speaking of the kingdom of the Messiah, compares it to a small stone loosed from the mountain, and by no human power, that struck upon the feet of the colossal which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, and afterwards filled the whole earth, Dan. ii. 34.

STONING was a punishment much in use among the Hebrews, and the rabhins reckon all crimes as being subject to it, which the law condemns to death, without expressing the particular mode. They say, that when a man was condemned to death, he was led out of the city to the place of execution, and there exorted to acknowledge and confess his fault. He was then stoned in one of two ways, either stones were thrown upon him till he died, or he was thrown headlong down a steep place, and a large stone rolled upon his body. To the latter mode it is supposed there is a reference in Man. xxi. 44.

SWAN. This bird is only mentioned in Lev. xi. 18, and Deut. xiv. 18, and it is extremely doubtful whether it was ever denoted by the Hebrew word. The LXX render Porphyrom, or purple ken, which is a water bird, not unlike in form to those which precede it in the text. Geddes observes, that the root signifies to breathe out, to expire; and adds, if etymology was our guide, I would say it points to a well-known quality in the swan, that of being able to expire a long time with its bill and neck under water, and even plunged in the mud. Some think the conjecture of Michaelis not improbable, "that it is the goose, which every one knows is remarkable for its manner of breathing out, or hissing, when provoked." "What makes me conjecture this," says Michaelis, "is that the same Chaldee interpreters, who in Leviticus render 'Cheres, do not employ this word in Deuteronomy, but substitute 'the white Kak,' which, according to Buxtorf, denotes the goose." Perhaps Egypt has birds of the wild goose kind, one of which is here alluded to. Norden (vol. ii. p. 33) mentions a "goose of the Nile, whose plumage was extremely beautiful. It was of an exquisite aromatic taste, smelted of ginger, and had a great deal of flavor." Can a bird of this kind be the Hebrew Tzachemeth?

SWARING, see OATH.

SWINE, a well-known animal, forbidden as food to the Hebrews (Lev. xi. 7; Deut. xiv. 8) who held its flesh in such detestation, that they would not so much as pronounce its name.

Among the gross abominations and idolatrous practices of which the Israelites were guilty in the time of the Israel, however, the eating of swine's flesh is mentioned, ch. lv. 4: "A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick; which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments; which eat swine's flesh; and brood of abominable things is in their vessels," &c. Their punishment is denounced in the next chapter: "They that sanctify themselves and purify themselves in the gardens behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the Lord," ch. lvii. 17.

It was an established custom, among the Greeks and Romans, to offer a hog in sacrifice to Ceres at the beginning of harvest, and another to Bacchus, before the vintage, which, however, that animal is equally hostile to the growing corn and the loaded vineyard. To this practice there is probably an allusion in Isa. lv. 3: "He that killeth an ox is as if he sware a lie; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol; yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abomination."

There is an injunction in Matt. vii. 6, which demands notice here: "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before the swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and read you." This passage, as it stands, is somewhat obscure, since it refers both the malignant acts specified to the last-mentioned animal. Dr. A. Clarke, however, has restored it to its true meaning, by transposing the lines; and Bishop Jebb, essaying himself of the hint, has shown it to be one of those interverted parallels which so frequently present themselves in the sacred writings, and which he has generally so beautifully illustrated. Placed in this form, it will stand as follows:—

Give not that which is holy to the dogs;
Neither cast your pearls before the swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet,
And turn about and rend you.

Here the first line is related to the fourth, and the second to the third. The sense of the passage becomes perfectly clear, on thus adjusting the parallelism:—

Give not that which is holy to the dogs;
Lest they turn about and rend you:
Neither cast your pearls before the swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet.

The more dangerous act of impiety, with its fatal result, is placed first and last, so as to make, and to leave, the deepest practical impression. To cast pearls before swine, is to place the pure and elevated morality of the gospel before sensual and besotted wretches, who have . . . Nor ear, nor soul, to comprehend

The sublime notion, and high mystery; but will assuredly trample them in the mire. To give that which is holy (the sacrifice, as some translate it) to the dogs, is to produce the deep truths of Christianity before the malignant and profane, who will not fail to add injury to neglect; who will not only hate the doctrine, but persecute the teacher. In either case, an indiscriminate and over-profligate zeal may do serious mischief to the cause of goodness; but in the latter case, the injury will fall with heightened severity, both on religion, and on religious injudicious friends. The warning, therefore, against the dogs, is emphatically placed at the commencement and the close. (Jebb's Sacred Literature, p. 338, &c.) This certainly places the allusion in a striking and beautiful light, but we doubt whether the bishop has caught the true sense of the passage. In this part of his discourse our Lord is warning his hearers not to be uncivil and severe in censuring others, in marking and aggravating their faults; not to correct their vices or mistakes, while they are chargeable themselves with much more heinous crimes. They were not to suffer sin in their brother, but were bound to reprove his faults, and endeavor his reformation; their counsels and reproves, however, were to be managed with wisdom and prudence, and were not to be unreasonably lavished on hardened and profane sinners, who, instead of receiving them in a becoming manner, would be exasperated by them, and turn with fury upon their indiscreet advice. "Give not wisdom," says the Hebrew adage, "to him who knows not its value, for it is more precious than pearls, and he who seeks it not is worse than a swine that defiles and rolls himself in the mud; so he who knows not the value of wisdom, profanes its glory."

The hog delights more in the fetid mire than in the clear and running stream. The mud is the chosen place of his repose, and to wallow in it seems to constitute one of his greatest pleasures. To wash him is vain; for he is no sooner at liberty than he hastens to the puddle, and becomes himself anew. Such is the temper of corrupt and wicked men, who have escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, but are again entangled and overcome. It is happened unto them according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire," 2 the hyperbola is varied, a mountain being substituted for the sycamore tree. The passage is thus paraphrased by Rosenmüller: "So long as you trust in God and me, and are not sufficient in self-reliance, you may accomplish the most arduous labours under taken for the furthering of your religion."

SYCHAR, see Sechem.

SYENE, a city on the southern frontiers of Egypt towards Ethiopia, between Thebes and the cataracts of the Nile. (Ezek. xxi. 10; xxx. 4) and now called Assouan. Pliny says it stands in a peninsula on the eastern shore of the Nile; that it is a mile in circumference, and has a Roman garrison.

SYNOAGUE, a word which primarily signifies an assembly; but, like the word church, came at length to be applied to a place in which any assem bles, especially those for the worship of God, met, or were convened. From the silence of the Old Testament with reference to these places of worship, most commentators and writers on biblical antiquities are of opinion that they were not in use till after the Babylonian captivity. Prior to that time, the Jews seem to have held their social meetings for religious worship either in the open air, or in the houses of the prophets. (See 2 Kings iv. 23.) Synagogue could only be erected in those places where ten men of age, learning, piety, and easy circumstances could be found to attend to the service which was enjoined in them. Large towns had several synagogues, and soon after the captivity, their utility being increased, several were set up in those places which were trespassed over, and became the parish churches of the Jewish nation. Their number appears to have been very considerable, and when the erection of a synagogue was considered as a mark of piety, (Luke vii. 5) or passport to heaven, we need not be surprised to hear that they were multiplied beyond all necessity, so that in Jerusalem alone there were not fewer than 400 or 480. They were generally built on the most excellent ground, and chose orations to which the one on the most western part of the building contained the ark, or chest, in which the book of the law and the sections of the prophets were deposited, and was called the temple by way of eminence. The one in which the congregation was assembled, was termed the body of the temple. The people met with their faces towards the temple, and the elders in the contrary direction, and opposite to the people; the space between them being occupied by the pul pits. In the other, the elders were considered as more holy than the others, and are spoken of as "the chief seats in the synagogues," Matt. xxiii. 6.

The stated office-bearers in every synagogue were seven, though in rank they were but six. Their names and duties are given by Lightfoot, to whom the reader is referred. But we must notice the Archi synagogue, or ruler of the synagogue; who regulated all its concerns, and granted permission to preach. Of these there were three in each synagogue. Dr. Lightfoot believes them to have possessed a civil power, and to have constituted the lowest civil tribunal, commonly known as "the council of three," whose office it was to decide the differences that arose between any members of the synagogue, and to judge of money matters, thefts, losses, &c. To these officers there is probably an allusion in 1 Cor. vi. 5. The second office-bearer was "the angel of the church," or minister of the congregation, who prayed and preached. In allusion to these the pastors of the Arian churches are called angela, Rev. ii. iii.

The service of the synagogue was as follows:-

The people being seated, the minister, or angel of the church, ascended the pulpit and offered up the public prayers; the people rising from their seats, and standing in a posture of deep devotion, Matt. vi. 5; Mark xi. 25; Luke xvi. 16; and many others. The number were nineteen in number, and were closed by reading the exorcism. The next thing was the repetition of their phylacteries; after which came the reading of the law and the prophets. The former was divided into 54 sections, with which were united corresponding portions from the prophets; (see Acts xxv. 21; xiii. 27;) and these were read through once in the course of the year. After the return from the captivity an interpreter was employed in reading the law and the prophets, (see Neh. viii. 3—10;) who interpreted them into the Syro-Chaldaic dialect, which was then spoken by the people. The last part of the service was the expounding of the Scriptures, and preaching from them to the people. This was done either by one of the officers, or by some distinguished person who happened to be present. The reader will recollect one memorable occasion, on which our Saviour availed himself of the opportunity thus afforded to address his countrymen, (Luke iv. 20) and there were several instances of himself and his disciples teaching in the synagogues. (See Matt. xiii. 54; Mark vi. 2; John xviii. 20; Acts xiii. 5, 15, 44; xiv. 1; xviii. 2—4, 10—12, 17; xvii. 4, 25; xii. 6.) The whole service was concluded with prayer or benediction.

The Jewish synagogues were not only used for the purposes of divine worship, but also for courts of judicature, in such matters as fell under the cognizance of the council of three, of which we have already spoken. On such occasions the sentence given against the offender was sometimes carried into effect in the place where the council was assembled. Hence we read of persons being beaten in the synagogue, and scourged in the synagogue, Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9.

SYNTYCHE, (Phil. iv. 2) a woman illustrious for virtue and good works in the church at Philippi.

SYRACUSE, the capital of Sicily, on the eastern coast, (Acts xxvii. 12,) where Paul spent three days, on his voyage to Rome.

SYRIA, called Aram, from the patriarch who peopled its chief provinces, comprehended the country lying between the Euphrates east, the Mediterranean west, Cilicia, Judea and Arabia Deserta south. Syria of the two rivers is Mesopotamia of Syria, which see.

Syria of Damascus extended eastward along mount Libanus; but its limits varied according to the power of the princes that reigned at Damascus. Syria of Zobah, or Sobal, was probably Cela-Syria, or hollow Syria. Syria of Damascus, or Beth-maschach, or Machati, was also towards Libanus, (2 Sam. x. 6, 5; 2 Kings xv. 29,) extending beyond Jordan, and was given to Manasseh, Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 13. (See Assy.) Syria of Rohob, or Reoboab, was that part of Syria of which Reoboab was the capital, near the northern frontier of the land of Promise, (Num. xiii. 21,) on the pass that leads to Emath, or Hamath. It was given to Ascher, and lay contiguous to Arab in Libanus, Josh. xix. 28, 30; xxi. 31. Laish, situated at the fountains of Jordan, was in this country, Judg. i. 31. Syria of Tob, or of Ish-tob, or of the land of Tob, or of the Tubenus, as they are called in the Maccabees, was in the neighborhood of Libanus, the northern extremity of Palestine, Judg. xi. 3, 5; that is, 35,350. 7s. 6d. sterling, or nearly 157,000 dollars, chap. xxxviii. 25.

The learned Spencer imagined that Moses borrowed his design of this tabernacle from Egypt. But this notion, as Jennings has shown, is directly at variance with many other circumstances of the subject, differing from those used in the heathen worship most essentially, both in situation and form, and also with its typical design and use, as pointed out by the apostle in the ninth chapter of the Hebrews.

The tabernacle was of an oblong rectangular form, thirty cubits long, ten broad, and ten in height; (Exod. xxvi. 18—29; xxxvi. 23—34,) which, according to bishop Cumberland, was fifty-five feet long, eighteen broad, and eighteen high. The two sides, and the western end of the tabernacle, were made of tim wood, overlaid with thin plates of gold, and fixed in solid sockets, or bases of silver. Above, they were secured by bars of the same wood, overlaid with gold, passing through rings of gold, which were fixed to the bases. On the east end, where was the entrance, there were no boards, but only five pillars of shittim wood, whose chapiters and fillets were overlaid with gold, and their hooks of gold, standing on five sockets of brass. The tabernacle, thus erected, was covered with four different kinds of curtains. The first and inner curtain was composed of fine linen, magnificently embroidered with figures of cherubim, in shades of blue, purple and scarlet. The second covering was made of goats' hair; the third of rams' skins, died red; and the fourth and outward covering was made of badgers' skins, as our translators have it, but which is not quite certain, as it generally are not informed in what proportions the materials of some description, dyed of a particular color. We have already said, that the east end of the tabernacle had no boards, but only five pillars of shittim wood; it was, therefore, enclosed with a richly embroidered curtain, formed from the pillars, and the golden candlestick, Exod. xxv. 31—39.

Such was the external appearance of the sacred tent, which was divided into two apartments, by means of four pillars of shittim wood, overlaid with gold, like the pillars before described, two cubits and a half distant from each other; only they stood on sockets of silver, instead of sockets of brass; (Exod. xxvii. 22; xxxvi. 33,) and on these pillars was hung a veil, formed of the same materials as the one placed at the east end, Exod. xxvi. 31—33; xxxvi. 33. We have already seen, that the number of the pillars of the tabernacle was thus divided; but it is generally conceived that it was divided in the same proportion as the temple afterwards built according to its model; that is, two thirds of the whole length being allotted to the first room, or the holy place, and one third to the second, or most holy place. Thus the former would be twenty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high, and the latter ten cubits every way. It is observable, that neither the holy nor most holy places had any window. Hence the need of the candlestick in the one, for the service that was performed therein; the darkness of the other would create reverence, and might, perhaps, have suggested the similar contrivance of the Adynas in the heathen temples.

The tabernacle thus described stood in an open space, of an oblong form, one hundred cubits in length, and fifty in breadth, situated due east and west, Exod. xxvii. 18. This court was surrounded with posts, this formed the beautiful sitting, and was at the distance of five cubits from each other. Their sockets were of brass and were fastened to the earth with pins of the same metal, Exod. xxxviii. 10, 17, 20. Their height is not stated, but it was probably five cubits, that being the length of the curtains that were suspended on them, Exod. xxxviii. 18. These curtains, which formed an enclosure round the court, were of fine twined linen, (Exod. xxvii. 9; xxxviii. 9, 16,) except that at the entrance on the east end, which was of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine white twined linen, with cords to draw it either up, or aside, when the priests entered the court, Exod. xl. 6, 8.) The latter stood between the altar of burnt-offering, and the laver and its foot. The former was placed in a line between the door of the court and the door of the tabernacle, but nearer the former; (Exod. xl. 6, 8,) the latter stood between the altar of burnt-offering, and the door of the tabernacle, Exod. xxxviii. 8. But although the tabernacle was surrounded by the court, there is no reason to think that it stood in the centre of it; for there was no occasion for so large an area. In the first place, the altar of burnt-offering was raised on an elevated platform, and the laver and its foot were placed against the wall of the court. In the holy place were three objects worthy of notice, viz. the altar of incense, the table of the shewbread, and the candlestick for the lights, each of which have been described in their respective places. The altar of incense was placed in the middle of the sanctuary, before the veil, (Exod. xxx. 6—10; xl. 26, 27,) and on the south side of the shewbread, and the candlestick, Exod. xxviii. 38; xl. 22, 23.) On the south side of the altar of incense, that is, on the right hand of the priest as he entered, stood the table for the shewbread, (Exod. xxvii. 38; xl. 28, 29,) and on the south of the altar of burnt-offering, stood the golden candlestick. Exod. xxv. 31—39. In the most holy place were the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubim, for a description of which their articles may be consulted.

The remarkable and costly structure thus described was erected under the superintendence of the priests, on the first day of the first month of the second year, after the Israelites left Egypt; (Exod. xl. 17.) and when erected was anointed, together with its furniture, with holy oil, (ver. 9—11,) and sanctified by blood, Exod. xxviii. 6—8; Heb. ix. 21. The table for the shewbread, especially, was sanctified by sacrifices during seven days, (Exod. xxix. 37.) while rich donations were given by the princes of the tribes, for the service of the sanctuary, Numb. vii.

We should not omit to observe, that the tabernacle was so constructed as to be taken to pieces and put together again, as occasion required. This was indispensable; it being designed to accompany the Israelites during their travels in the wilderness. As often as they encamped, it was pitched amid their tents, and while the tabernacle was taken to pieces, and borne in regular order by the Levites, Numb. iv. Wherever they encamped it was pitched in the midst of their tents, which were set up in a quadrangular form, under their respective standards, at a distance from the tabernacle of 2000 cubits; while Moses and Aaron, with the priests and Levites occupied a place between them.

"Tabernacle" is sometimes put for heaven, for the dwelling-place of the blessed, Ps. lxxxv. 4. "I will abide in thy tabernacle forever." Ps. xxviii. 1. "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!"
place at which Jesus raised the only son of a widow from death to life, and restored him to his afflicted parent, Luke vii. 11—15. The range which bounds the eastern view is thought to be the mountains of Gilboa, where Saul, setting an example of self-destruction, threw himself on his own sword, rather than fall into the hands of the uncircumcised Philistines, by whom he was defeated, I Sam. xxxi. The sea of Tiberias, or the lake of Gennesaret, famed as the seat of many miracles, is seen on the north-east, filling the hollow of a deep valley, and contrasting its light blue waters with the dark brown shades of the barren hills by which it is hemmed around. Here, too, the steep is pointed out, down which the herd of swine, who were possessed by the legion of devils, ran headlong into the sea, Luke vii. 31. In the same direction, below, and on the plain of Galilee, and about an hour's distance from the foot of mount Tabor, there is a cluster of buildings, used as a bazaar for cattle; somewhat farther on is a rising ground, from which, it is said, that Christ delivered the long and excellent discourse, called the 'Sermon on the mount,' and the whole view in this quarter is bounded by the higher range of Gebel-el-Telj, or the mountain of Snow. The city of Sepphoris, supposed to be the ancient Bethulia, a city said to be seen far and near, and thought to be alluded to in the apocryphal which says, 'a city set on a hill cannot be hid,' (Matt. v. 14) is also pointed out in this direction. To the north were the stony hills over which we had journeyed hither; and these completed this truly grand and interesting panoramic view." (Travels, p. 107—108.)

Deborah and Barak assembled their army on Tabor, from which they marched to give battle to Sisera; (Judg. iv. 6) and subsequently, Hosea (chap. v. 1) reproaches the princes of Israel, and the priests of the golden calves, with having been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor; referring, no doubt, to the idols, or superstitious altars, which they here set up. When Josephus was governor of Galilee, he strongly fortified the top of Tabor; but Vespasian by stratagem drew down the Jews into the open country, and there cut them to pieces.

TADMOR, a small species of drum, e. g. Timbrel, which see.

TADMORG or TADMOUS, subsequently called Palmyra by the Greeks, was a city founded by Solomon in the desert of Syria, on the borders of Arabia Desertia, near the Euphrates. Its situation was to give battle to Sisera; (Judg. iv. 6) and subsequently, Hosea (chap. v. 1) reproaches the princes of Israel, and the priests of the golden calves, with having been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor; referring, no doubt, to the idols, or superstitious altars, which they here set up. When Josephus was governor of Galilee, he strongly fortified the top of Tabor; but Vespasian by stratagem drew down the Jews into the open country, and there cut them to pieces.

TALENT. Several authors have supposed that among the Hebrews there were two sorts of talents, a larger and a smaller; the talent of the sanctuary, and the common talent; the former being double the weight or value of the other. But we cannot find this distinction in Scripture.

The weight of the Jewish talent, according to Dr. Arithnattus was 113 pounds, 10 ounces, 1 pennyweight and 10 2-ths grains Troy weight. Its value in (English) money was 342.5 shillings or about $1500. The talent of gold was of the same weight; its value, 54,752 or $343,000.

The following thought of Mr. Bruce is perhaps worth inquiring into; that is, that the talents appropriated to different commodities might be of different weights, and adds, that if a talent could be discovered, which, at the mine, was of less weight than the talent of Judea, we might, perhaps, be justified in estimating the riches in gold of David, or of Solomon, by the weight of that talent. "David took possession of two ports, Eloth and Ezion-geber; (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17) from which he carried on trade to Ophir and Tarshish, to a very great extent, to the day of his death. We are struck with astonishment, when we reflect on the sum that prince received in so short a time from these mines of marriage, at that time customary in her country, as seems implied in the declaration of Judah—"She has been more righteous than I." The phrase is not—she is less to blame—but—"she is more righteous." Among the eight forms of marriage specified in the Gento code, is one by a mutual interchange, between the parties, of necklaces or strings of flowers, which bears a very striking resemblance to the case of Judah and Tamar, the latter receiving from the former his signet and bracelets. Might not Tamar thus marry herself to Judah, though unwittingly in him? From the expression, (ver. 29.) "He knew her again no more," it seems as if he might lawfully have done so, had he pleased. It is important to remark, that although Tamar had been contracted to Er and Onan, it is very doubtful whether those marriages had been consummated.

In the Asiatic Researches (vol. iii. p. 35.) there is a passage, which affords a similarity to the narrative under consideration, that is extremely remarkable:—

"I discovered these circumstances of the marriage ceremony of the Gurroses, from being present at the marriage of Lungree, youngest daughter of the chief Odyssey, seven years of age, and Buglun, twenty-three years old, the son of a common Gurroso; and I may here observe, that this marriage, disproportionate as to age and rank, is a very happy one for Buglun, as he will succeed to the Booneship and estate: for among the Gurroses, the youngest daughter is always heiress, and if there were any other children born before her, they would get nothing on the death of the Boonesh; what is more strange, if Buglun were to die, Lungree would marry one of his brothers; and if all his brothers were dead, she would then marry the father; and if the father afterwards should prove too old, she would put him aside, and take any one else whom she might choose."

Upon this extract Mr. Taylor has the following remarks. It is clear, that Lungree would have acted exactly like Tamar; who, because Sheelah was not given to her, considered him "as dead," and therefore she "married the father;" in doing which, Judah not only acquires her of any transgression, but confesses she had more closely adhered to the law than himself ("is more righteous than I"). It appears also, that the orthodox Jews derive their actually inherit as his sons, lawfully, as well as naturally; hence they are reckoned to him in 1 Chron. ii. 4. "And Tamar his daughter-in-law bare him Pharez and Zerah." In Num. xxvi. 20, we read, "The sons of Judah were Caleb of Hebron, and Pharez of Zerah, without any particular mark of abasement on Pharez; and in Ruth iv. 18, the pedigree of David is expressly derived from this same son of Judah by Tamar. If the pedigree of David be so derived, that of the Messiah must follow it; and it needs little consideration to determine which has most propriety, to allow the legality of Tamar's marriage, with the legal acknowledgment of her children, or to bastardize not merely Pharez but his posterity, Boaz, David, Solomon; a long line of Hebrew heroes, and all the Kings of Judah.

II. TAMAR, the daughter of Maachah, wife of David, and by courtesy reckoned among the king's children, 1 Chron. iii. 8. Her great beauty was the occasion of great trouble in the family of David. See AMNON.

III. TAMAR. Absalom had a daughter whose name was Tamar, 2 Sam. xiv. 27; xiviii. 28.) somewhere about the southern extremity of the Dead sea.

TAMMUS, the tenth month of the Hebrew civil year, and the fourth of the sacred year. (See the Jewish Calendar at the end of the volume.)

TAMMUZ, a pagan idol, mentioned in Ezek. viii. 14, where the women are represented as weeping over it. It is generally thought that Tammuz was the same deity as Adonis, to which article the reader is referred, also to the article IDEOLATRY.

TANACH, or TANACH, a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan, (Josh. xii. 21; xx. 25; Judg. i. 27.) yielded to the Levites. Eusebius, Jerome and Procopius of Gaza say, that in their time it was a considerable place, three miles from Legio.

TANNIM, or TANNUIM, see DRAGON.

I. TAPPUAH, a city of Manasseh, but belonging to Ephraim, (Josh. xviii. 29.) probably the En-tappuah of the former verse.

II. TAPPUAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 34.) perhaps the Beth-mephuch of verse 28, which is also attributed to Judah, and which Eusebius places beyond Raphia, 14 miles toward Egypt.

TARAH, an encampment of Israel in the desert, to which they came from Tahath, and went hence to Mithkah, Num. xxxiii. 27.

TARES. It is not easy to decide, whether by the term Γαβρα, in Matt. xiii. 25, seq. the Saviour intends indiscriminately all plants which grow among grain, or some particular species. All we are certain of from the circumstances of the parable is, that it is a plant which rises to the height of the corn. Minter says, "It is a plant in appearance not unlike corn or wheat, having at first the same kind of stalk, and the same virility, but bringing forth no fruit, at least none good." John Melchior also says, that Zerua does not signify every weed, in general, which grows among corn, but a particular species of weed known in Cansan, which is not unlike wheat, but, being put into the ground, degenerated and assumed another nature and form. The Talmudists name it Zerua. "Among the hurtful weeds," says Johnson, "darnell (Lotus album) is the first. It bringeth forth leaves like those of wheat or barley, yet ruder, with a long ear, made up of many little ones, every particular whereof is both thinner than three grains lesser than those of wheat; scarcely any chaffy husk to cover them with; by reason whereof they are easily shaken about, and scattered abroad. They grow in fields among wheat and barley. They spring and flourish with the corn planted in August; and the seed is ripe. Darnell is called, in the Arabic tongue, zizania.

Forskal says, the darnell is well known to the people of Aleppo. It grows among corn. If the seeds remain mixed with the meal, they render a man drunk by eating the bread. The reapers do not separate the plant; but, after the thrashing, they reject the seeds by means of a fan or sieve. Nothing, says Mr. Taylor, can be more clearly elucidate the plant intended by our Lord, than this extract. It grows among corn—so in the parable. The reapers do not separate the plants—so in the parable; both grow together till harvest. After the thrashing they separate them—so in the parable. They are gathered from among the wheat, and separated by the hand, then gathered into bundles. Their seeds, if any remain by accident, are finally separated by winnowing; which is, of course, a process preparatory to being gathered—the corn into the garner, or storehouse;}
the injurious plant into heaps, for consumption by fire, as weeds are consumed.

TARGUMS, or Chaldee versions of the Hebrew Scriptures, see Versions.

I. TARSHISH, the second son of Javan, Gen. x. 4. He is supposed to have been the founder of Tarshish in Cilicia.

II. TARSHISH, the proper name of a city and country (Tartessus) in Spain, the most celebrated emporium in the west to which the Hebrews and Phenicians traded. That it was situated in the west is evident from Gen. x. 4, where it is joined with Elisah, Kittim and Dodanim. See also Ps. lxxi. 10. According to Ezek. xxxviii. 13, it was an important place of trade; according to Jer. x. 9, it exported silver; and according to Ezek. xxviii. 12, 25, silver, iron, tin and lead to the Tyrian markets. They embarked for this place from Joppa, Jon. i. 3, 4. In Isa. xxxii. 1, 6, 10, it is evidently represented as an important Phenician colony. It is named among the seven principal seaports of the empire, and it was the place of residence of the Phenicians; for in Polybius and Stephanus Byzantius occurs Tarshias, as synonymous with Tartessos.

In the interval between the composition of the Books of Kings and Chronicles, this name seems to have been transferred to denote any distant country, as in the case of wandering tribes that went to Ophir (1 Kings xxii. 49.) are said expressly by the writer of Chronicles to have gone to Tarshish, 2 Chron. xx. 21, xx. 36, 37. There is no necessity, then, for the adoption of a second Tarshish (perhaps in India or Ethiopia). (Genesius, Heb. Lex. sub. ben. cana.)

Tarshish ships is employed in Is. xxxii. 1, 14; ix. 9, &c. to denote large merchant ships bound on long voyages, (perhaps distinguished by their construction from the common Phenician ships,) even though they were sent to other countries instead of Tarshish. — The English phrase an Italianan is very similar. The phrase is also used of the ships that went to Tarshish (1 Kings xii. 22.)

TARSUS, the name of a celebrated city, the metropolis of Cilicia, situated on the banks of the river Cydnus, which flowed through and divided it into two parts. Hence in the Greek writers the city is sometimes called Taras, as Xen. Anab. i. 2. Taras was distinguished for the culture of Greek literature and philosophy, so that at one time, in its schools and in the number of its learned men, it was the rival of Athens and Alexandria. (Strabo xiv. p. 463, ed. Cassub.) In reward for its exertions and sacrifices during the civil war of Rome, Tarsus was made a free city by Augustus. (Appian. Bell. Civ. v. p. 1077. Θαρσους δὲ καὶ Ταρσους ταρσιναν υπηρετ. Dio. Chrysost. in Tarisc. post.) It was the privilege of such cities, that they were governed by their own laws and magistrates, and were not subjected to the jurisdiction of a Roman governor, nor to the power of a Roman garrison; although they acknowledged the supremacy of the Roman people, and were bound by treaty with them against the enemies to the freedom of Tarsus, however, was not equivalent to being a Roman citizen, appears from this, that the tribute, although he knew Paul to be a citizen of Tarsus, (Acts xxii. 33.) yet ordered him to be scourged, (Acts xxii. 34.) but desired from his purpose when he learned that Paul was a Roman citizen.

(Tars xxii. 27.) It is therefore probable, ancestors of Paul had obtained the privilege of citizenship in some other way, Acts ix. xxii. 3. (See Ruiudol on Acts xvi. 37.)

TEKOA, a city of Judah, (2 Chron. viii. 14.) in the south on the borders of the Philistines, five miles south of Jerusalem. The wilderness of Tekoa, 2 Chron. xx. 20, is not far from the Dead Sea.

TEL-ABBIB, the name of a place to which Israel were carried captive, (Ezek. i. 26.) and which is called in Mesopotamia, on the river Chebar. In Chart of the Euphrates and Tigris, it is between 36° and 37° north latitude, and 36° east longitude.

TELASSER, or Thalassar, a province (Isa. xxxviii. 12; 2 Kings xix. 12.) the exact place of which is unknown. It is thought to be in Armenia and Mesopotamia, and about the place of the Euphrates and Tigris, because it is Eden, who inhabited that country.

TEMA, or Tema, son of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 15.) is thought to have peopled the city of Arabia Deserta. Job speaks of the caravan and sheep, (chap. vi. 13.) and Ptolomy Plancus, who was called Theman, or Telman, in Arabia /wards the mountains of the Chaldaeans.

TEMAM, or Teman, son of Eliphaz, son of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 15. In the ver.: a king of Idumea, called Ishlum, of the race of the Temunim, Jeremiah, (xlix. 20.) Es 20, and Amos (i. 12.) speak of Teman, places Theman in Arabia Petraea, five miles to, and says there was a Roman garrison. This was the doubtless the country of the T Eman or Theman, as is called in the Bible, the place where the Temple, the house of God, the same tabernacle of the Lord, the palace of the king of the bones are often used synonymously in the same sense, strictly speaking, they import ve things. Temple was but one part of the word temple; neither does the word scribe the tabernacle, or tabernacle the temple. The Hebrews, before Solomon, could not properly be said to have had a temple, yet they did not scruple by the word temple to describe the tabernacle; as, on the contrary, they sometimes by the tabernacle of the Lord, expressed the temple built by Solomon. And, as this was the place where the glory of God dwelt, it was the place he had chosen, in which to fix his dwelling, that pious prince began to realize his design of preparing a temple for the Lord, that might be something worthy of his divine majesty. He opened his mind on this subject to the prophet Nathan, but the Lord did not think fit that he should execute his purpose, however laudable. The honor was reserved for Solomon, his son and successor, who was to be a peaceable prince, and not like David, who had shot his arrows abroad with his bow, to collect great quantities of gold, silver, brass, iron, and other materials for this undertaking.

The place chosen for erecting this magnificent structure was Mount Moriah, the summit of which, on the east, is 320 yards from the place of the tabernacle, viz. God himself; and it was built much in the same form as the tabernacle, but was of much larger dimensions. The utensils for the sacred service were also the same as those used in the tabernacle, only the altar of horns of copper, the tabernacle was of wood, and the more spacious edifice to which they belonged. The foundations of this magnificent edifice were laid by Solomon, in the year of the world 3992, and it was finished A. M. 3000, having occupied seven years and six months in its construction. The walls of the temple, with peculiar solemnity, to the worship of Jehovah, who condescended to make it the place for the special manifestation of his glory, 2 Chron. v. vii. The front or entrance to the temple was on the eastern side, as was the case with the tabernacle, with which it was the principal gate of the temple. It was by far the largest of all the courts pertaining to the sacred building, and comprised a space of 188,901 superficial cubits, or fourteen English acres, one rood, twenty-nine poles, and thirteen cubits, and consequently reached exactly to half the height of the side walls, and end of the temple; so that there was abundance of space, above these, for the windows which gave light to the temple, ver. 4. Josephus differs very materially from this in his description, on which we know not how to account, but by supposing that he has confounded the Scripture account of Solomon's temple with that of the temple after the captivity and of Herod.

In noticing the several courts of the temple, we naturally begin with the outer one, which was called the court of the Gentiles, and into which persons of all nations were permitted to enter. The most natural approach to this court was by a low passage from the tabernacle, viz. God himself; and it was built much in the same form as the tabernacle, but was of much larger dimensions. The court of the women, called in Scripture the new court, (2 Chron. xx. 5.) and the outer court, (Ezek. xlvi. 21.) was so designated by the Jews, not because none but women were permitted to enter it, but because it was their appointed place of worship, beyond which they might not go, unless when they brought a sac-rifaces, in which case they went forward to the court of Israel. The gate which led into this court, from that of the Gentiles, was the beautiful gate of the temple, mentioned Acts ii. 2, so called, because the folding doors, lintel and side-posts, were all of 24 cubits, with Corinthian brass. The court itself was 135 cubits square, having four gates, one on each side; and on three of its sides were piazzas, with galleries above them, whence could be seen what was passing in the great court. At the four corners of this court, were four rooms, appropriated to different purposes, Ezek. xlvii. 21-24. In the first, the lepers purified themselves after they were healed; in the second, the wood for the sacrifices was laid up; the Nazarites prepared their oblations, and shaved their heads, in the third; and in the fourth, the wine and oil for the sacrifices were kept. There were also two rooms more, where the Levites' musical instruments were laid up; and also thirteen treasure chests, two of which were for the half shekel, which was paid yearly by every Israelite; and the rest for the money for the purchase of sacrifices and other oblations. It was in this court of the women, called the treasury, that our Saviour delivered his striking discourse to the Jews, related in John xii. 1-36. It was into this court also, that the Pharisees and publican went to pray, (Luke xviii. 10-13), and into which the lame man followed Peter and John, after he was cured; the court of the women being the ordinary place of worship for those who brought no sacrifices, Acts iii. 2. From thence, after prayers, he went back with them, through the beautiful gate of the temple, where he had been lying, and through the sacred fence, into the court of the Gentiles, where, under the eastern piazza, or Solomon's porch, Peter delivered that sermon which converted five thousand. It was in the same court of the women that the Jews laid hold of Paul, when they judged him a violator of the temple, by taking Gentiles within the sacred fence, Acts xxi. 25, 26. In this court the high-priest, at the fast of Expiation, read a portion of the law. Here also the king, on the sabbatical year, did the same at the Feast of Tabernacles.

The court of Israel was separated from the court of the women by a wall 24 cubits high, on that side, but on the other only 25. The reason of which difference was, that as the rock on which the temple stood always became higher on advancing westward, the several courts naturally became elevated in proportion. The entrance into the court was by a flight of 15 steps, of a semicircular form, on which it is by some thought that the Levites stood and sung the "Psalms of degrees" (xxx—ccxxiv.) at the Feast of Tabernacles. This gate is spoken of under several apppellations in the Old Testament; but in the time of our Saviour it was known as the gate Nicana. It was here the leper stood, to have his atonement made, and his cleansing completed. It was here they tried the suspected wife, by making her drink of the bitter water; and it was here likewise that women appeared after childbirth, for purification. The whole length of the court from east to west was 157 cubits, and the breadth from north to south, 135 cubits. This was divided into two parts, one of which was the court of the Israelites, and the other, the court of the priests. The former was a kind of piazza surrounding the latter, under which the Israelites stood while their sacrifices were burning in the court of the priests. It had 15 gates, with chambers above them, each of which had its particular name and use. The space which was comprised in the court of the priests was 165 cubits long, and 119 cubits was raised 24 cubits above the surrounding court from which it was separated by the pillars that supported the piazza, and the railing which separated the 2, and 2, stood the brazen altar, on which the sacrifices were consumed, the molten sea, in which the 2, ed, and the ten brazen lavers, for washing My hands; also the various utensils and vessels that were used in the work, and sacrificed, which are enumerated in 2 Cor.

It is necessary to observe here, that a court of the priests was not accessible to all as that of Israel was to all the priests, yet enter it on several occasions; viz., hands on the animals which they offer them, or to waive some part of them. An entrance was not by the east gate, and the place where the priests stood, but in one north or south side of the court, according as the sacrifices were to be slain on the north or south altar. In general, it was a rule that returned from this court by the same door entered, Exod. xlvii. 9. From the court of the asent to the temple was by a flight of 15 steps, to the work, and sacred porch. Of the dimensions of this the sanctuary and holy of holies, we hear. We shall therefore only observe, that it was within the door of the porch, and in those who stood in the courts immediately that the two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, were Chron. iii. 17; Ezek. xl. 49.

The temple thus described, retained splendor but 33 years, when it was pillared by the flames of Shishak, king of Egypt, 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26, 2 Chronicles iii. 17; Ezek. xl. 49.

purified by Judas Maccabeus, who restored the divine worship, and dedicated it anew.

Herod, having slain all the Sanhedrim, except two, in the first year of his reign, B. C. 37, resolved to stone for it, by rebuilding and beautifying the temple. This he was the more inclined to do, both from the peace which he enjoyed, and the decayed state of the edifice. For, besides the common ravages of time, it had suffered considerably by the hands of enemies, since that part of Jerusalem was the strongest, and consequently the last resort of the inhabitants in times of extremity. After employing two years in preparing the materials for the work, in which 1000 wagons and 10,000 artificers were employed, besides 1000 priests to direct the works, the temple of Zerubbabel was pulled down, B. C. 17, and 46 years before the first Passover of his ministry. Although this temple was fit for divine service in nine years and a half, yet a great number of laborers and artificers were still employed in carrying on the out-buildings, all the time of our Saviour's abode on earth, and even till the coming of Caius Florus to be governor of Judea.

The temple of Herod was considerably larger than that of Zerubbabel, as that of Zerubbabel was larger than Solomon's. For, whereas the second temple was 70 cubits long, 60 broad, and 40 high, this was 100 cubits long, 70 broad, and 100 high. The porch was raised to the height of 100 cubits, and was extended 15 cubits beyond each side of the rest of the building. All the Jewish writers praise this temple exceedingly in its workmanship; for it was built of white marble, exquisitely wrought, and with stones of large dimensions, some of them 25 cubits long, 8 cubits high, and 12 cubits thick. To these there is no doubt a reference in Mark xii. 1; Luke xxi. 3: "And as he went out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Master, see what manner (Luke, goodly) of stones, and what buildings are here!"

The several courts have been already described, with some little variation, in our observations on the temple of Solomon. We may add, however, that the vast sums which Herod laid out in adorning this structure, gave it the most magnificent and imposing appearance. "Its appearance," says Josephus, "had every thing that could strike the mind, and astonish the sight. For it was on every side covered with solid plates of gold, so that when the sun rose upon it, it reflected such a strong and dazzling effulgence that the eye of the beholder was obliged to turn away from it, being no more able to sustain its radiance than the eye of the beholder, when he approached the capital, it appeared, at a distance, like a huge mountain covered with snow. For where it was not decorated with plates of gold, it was extremely white and glistering. The historian, indeed, says, that the temple of Herod was the most astonishing structure he had ever seen or heard of, as well on account of its architecture as its magnitude, and likewise the richness and magnificence of its various parts, and the fame and reputation of its sacred appurtenances. And Tacitus calls it, "immense opulentum templum—a temple of immense opulence." Its external glory, indeed, consisted not only in the opulence and magnificence of the building, but also in the rich gifts with which it was adorned, and which excited the admiration of those who beheld them, Luke xxi. 5.

This splendid building, however, which was once the admiration and envy of the world, has for ever passed away. According to our blessed Lord's prophecy, that "there should not be left one stone upon another that should not be thrown down," (Mark xiii. 2,) it was completely demolished by the Roman soldiers, under Titus, A. D. 70, on the same month, and on the same day of the month, on which Solomon's temple was destroyed by the Babylonians.

Concerning the high veneration which the Jews cherished for their temple, Dr. Harwood has collected some interesting particulars from Philo, Josephus, and the writings of Luke. Their reverence for the sacred edifice was such, that rather than witness its defilement, they would cheerfully submit to death. They could not bear the least disrespectful or dishonorable thing to be said of it. The least injurious slight of it, real or apprehended, instantly awakened all the choler of a Jew, and was an affront never to be forgiven. Our Saviour, in the course of his public instructions, happening to say, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again," (John ii. 19.)—it was construed into a contemptuous disrespect, designedly thrown out against the temple—his words instantly descended into the heart of a Jew, and kept rankling there for several years; for upon his trial, this declaration, which it was impossible for a Jew ever to forget or to forgive, was alleged against him, as big with the most atrocious guilt and impurity, Matt. xxvi. 67. Nor was the morose and virulence by which this expression had occasioned at all softened by all the affecting circumstances of that excruciating and wretched death they saw him die—even as he hung upon the cross, with infinite triumph, scorn, and exultation, they were visibly slaking their heads, and saying, "O Thou, who couldst demolish our Temple, and rear it up again in all its splendor, in the space of three days, do now save thyself, and descend from the cross!" Matt. xxvii. 40. Their superstitious veneration for the temple further appears from the account of Stephen. When his adversaries were baffled and confounded by that superior wisdom, and those distinguished gifts he possessed, they were so exasperated at the victory he had gained over them, that they went among suborned persons to swear, that they had heard him speak blasphemy against Moses and against God. These inflaming the populace, the magistrates, and the Jewish clergy, he was seized, dragged away, and brought before the Sanhedrim. Here the false witnesses, whom the Jews had procured, stood up and said, "This person, before you, is continually uttering the most reproachful expressions against this sacred place." (Acts vi. 13.) meaning the temple. This was blasphemy not to be pardoned. A judicature composed of high-principled men would never forgive such impiety. We witness the same thing in the case of Paul, when they imagined that he had taken Trophimus, an Ephesian, with him into the temple, and for which insult they had determined to imbrue their hands in his blood, Acts xxv. 25, &c.

We have only to add, that from several passages of Scripture it appears that the Jews had a body of soldiers who guarded the temple, to prevent any disturbance during the ministration of such an immense number of the priests and Levites. "To this body of men, whose office it was to guard the temple, Pilate probably referred, when he said to the chief priests and Pharisees who waited on him to desire him would make the sepulchre secure, 'You have a watch; go your way and make it as secure as you can.'" Matt. xxvii. 65. Over these guards one person had the supreme command, who in several places is called captain of the temple, or officer of the temple.

A few remarks on the daily service of the temple will close this article.

The first thing we notice is the morning service. After having enjoyed their repose, the priests bathed themselves in the rooms provided for that purpose, and waited the arrival of the president of the lots. This officer having arrived, they divided themselves into two companies, each of which was provided with lamps or torches, and made a circuit of the temple, going in different directions, and meeting at the pastryman's chamber, on the south side of the gate Nicanor. Having summoned him to prepare the cakes for the high-priest's meat-offering, they retired with the president to the south-east corner of the court, and cast lots for the duties connected with the altar.

The priest being chosen to remove the ashes from the altar, he again washed his feet at the laver, and then with the silver shovel proceeded to his work. As soon as he had removed one shovel-full of the ashes, the other priests retired to wash their hands and feet, and then joined him in cleansing the altar and removing the fires. The next duty was to cast lots for the thirteen particular duties connected with offering the sacrifice, which being settled, the president ordered one of them to fetch the lamb for the morning sacrifices. While the priests on this duty were engaged in fetching and examining the victim, those who carried the keys were opening the seven gates to the court of Israel, and the two doors that separated between the porch and the holy place. When the last of the seven gates was opened, the silver trumpets gave a flourish, to call the Levites to their desks for the music, and the stationary men to their places, as the representatives of the people. The opening of the folding doors of the temple was the established signal for killing the sacrifice, which was cut in pieces and carried to the top of the altar, where it was salted, and left while the priests once more retired to the room Gazzith to join in prayer. While the sacrifice was being slain in the court of the priests, the two priests appointed to trim the lamps and cleanse the altar of incense were attending to their duties in the holy place. After the conclusion of their prayer, and a rehearsal of the ten commandments and their phylacteries, the priests again cast lots, to choose two to offer incense on the golden altar, and another to lay the pieces of the sacrifice on the fire of the brazen altar. The lots being determined, the two who were to offer the incense proceeded to discharge their duty, the time for which was, between the sprinkling of the blood and the laying the pieces upon the altar, in the morning; and in the evening between the laying the pieces upon the altar and the drink-offering. As they proceeded to the temple they rang the megaphone, or great bell, to warn the absent priests to come to worship: the absent Levites to come to sing; and the stationary men to bring to the gate of Nicanor those whose purification was not perfected. The priest who carried the censer of coals, which had been taken from one of the three fires on the great altar, after kindling the fire on the incense altar, worshipped and came out into the porch, leaving the priest who had the incense alone in the holy place. As soon as the signal was given by the president, the incense was kindled, the holy place was filled with perfume, and the congregation without joined in the prayers, Luke i. 9. These being ended, the priest, who had the lot to lay the pieces of the sacrifice upon the altar, threw them into the fire, and then, taking the tongues, disposed of them somewhat of their natural order. The fire who had been in the holy place now appers the steps that led to the porch, so as to raise their hands higher heads, one of them pronounced the solemn Numb. vi. 24—26. After this benediction meat-offering was offered; then the meat- high-priest; and last of all the drink-offering, the conclusion of which the Levites began of praise; and, at every pause in the trumpets sounded and the people worshiped, the termination of the morning sacrifice began with the dawn of day, except in the festivals, when it began much earlier; the service offered immediately after sunrise.

During the middle of the day the priests seized readiness to offer the sacrifices which were presented by any of the Israelites, either voluntary or an expiatory nature. Their duty therefore vary according to the number and the offerings they might have to present.

The evening service is a very trifling fraction of that of the morning; and the same priest, except when there was one in the father who had never burned incense in that case of office was assigned to him; if were more than one, they cast lots who should perform the sacrifice. The holiness of the place, and the inj Lev. xix. 3. "Ye shall reverence my sanctuary the people under an obligation to maintain and holy behavior when they come to the temple. (See Acts vii. 5. "None might spit in the temple; if we tated to spit, it must be done in some cor garment." one, however weakly, might sit down at the court." The only exception was made to the kings of the house of David.—(12) "None might pray with his head uncovered. And the wise men and their scholars never prayed without a veil." This custom is alluded to in 1 Cor. i. 4, where the apostle directs the men to reverse the practice adopted in the Jewish temple.—(13) Their bodily gesture in bowing before the Lord, was either "bending of the knees,""boing the head," or "falling prostrate on the ground."—(14) Having performed the service, and being about to retire, "they might not turn their backs upon the altar." They therefore went backward till they were out of the court. (Temple Service, chap. x.)

The word temple denotes, sometimes, the church of Christ: (Rev. iii. 12.) "Him that overcometh I will make a pillar in the temple of my God." And Paul says, (2 Thess. ii. 4.) that Antichrist "as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." Sometimes it imports heaven: (Ps. xi. 4.)
"The Lord is in his holy temple: the Lord's throne is in heaven." The martyrs in heaven are said to be "before the throne of God, and to serve him day and night in his temple," Rev. vii. 15. The soul of a righteous man is the temple of God, because it is inhabited by the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 16.

TEMP, TEMPLATION, to try, to prove. God tempted Abraham, by commanding him to offer up his son Isaac; (Gen. xxii. 1.) intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial, and to furnish in his person an example and pattern of perfect obedience, to all succeeding ages. God does not tempt or try men, in order to ascertain their tempers and dispositions, as if he were ignorant of them; but to exercise their virtue, to purify it, to render it conspicuous to others, to give them an opportunity of receiving favors from his hands. When we read in Scripture that God proved his people, whether they would walk in his law, or no; (Exod. xvi. 4.) and that he permitted false proph-ests to arise among them, who prophesied vain things to try them, whether they would seek the Lord with their whole hearts, we should interpret these expressions by that of James, (i. 13.) "Let no man say when he is tempted, 'I am tempted of God,' for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed."

The devil tempts us to evil, of every kind, and lays snares for us, even in our best actions. He tempted our forerunners, the Hebrews, unmercifully to en-slave them into sentiments of pride, ambition and distrust, Matt. iv. 1; Mark i. 13; Luke iv. 2. He tempted Ananias and Sapphira to lie to the Holy Ghost, Acts v. 3. In the prayer that Christ himself has taught us, we pray God "not to lead us into temptation;" (Matt. vi. 13.) and a little before his death, our Saviour exorted his disciples to "watch and pray, that they might not enter into temptation," Matt.xxvi.
41. Paul says, "God will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear." 1 Cor. x. 13.

Men are said to tempt the Lord, when they unseasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power or goodness. Without doubt, we are allowed to seek the Lord for his assistance, and to pray him to give us what we need; but it is not allowed us to tempt him, nor to oppose ourselves to his will and pleasure, which we cannot escape, unless by miraculous interposition of his omnipotence. God is not obliged to work miracles in our favor; he requires of us only the performance of such actions as are within the ordinary measures of our strength. The Israelites in the desert repeatedly tempted the Lord, as if they had reason to doubt of his presence among them, or of his goodness, or of his power, after all his appearances of their favor, Exod. xvi. 2, 7, 17; Num. xx.
12; Ps. lxxvii. 18, 41, &c.

Men tempt or try one another, when they would know whether things are really what they seem to be; whether men are such as they are thought or desired to be. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon, by proposing riddles for him to explain, 1 Kings xi. 1; 2 Chron ix. 1. Daaniel desired of him who had the care of feeding him and his companions, to prove them for some days, whether abstinence from food of certain kinds would make them leaner, Dan. i. 13, 14. The scribes and Pharisees often tempted our Saviour, and endeavored to decoy him into their snares, Matt. xvi. 1; xix. 3; xvii. 18.

TENT. Among the artificial conveniences for the habitations of men, tents were of very early invention. Jabal, before the flood, is called the father of all such as dwell in tents. Noah, after the flood, spent in his tent, and prophesying of the future destiny of his family, he said, "Japheth shall dwell in the tents of Shem." The patriarchal ages are described as of shepherds dwelling in tents. Abraham dwelt in tents with Isaac and Jacob; Lot had flocks, and herds, and tents; Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents, and his descendants succeeded a people designated Shepherd Kings, in the land of Goshen, under the Pharaohs of Egypt. On the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, throughout their peregrinations, until they obtained the promised land, they adopted the same kind of habitation. Tents were very generally used in ancient times among the nations: their way of life being in general pastoral, locomotion became necessary for pasturage, and dwellings adapted for such a life became indispensable. The Egyptians, already mentioned, the Mid-anees, the Philistines, the Syrians, the descendants of Ham, the Hagarites and Cushanites are mentioned in Scripture as living in tents. But the people most remarkable for this unsettled and wandering mode of life are the Arabs, who, from the time of Ishmael to the present day, have continued the custom of dwelling in tents. Amidst the revolutions which have transferred kingdoms from one possessor to another, these wandering tribes still dwell, unshatdowed and wild as was their progenitor. This kind of dwelling is not, however, confined to the desert, but is used throughout the continent of Asia. The word tent is formed from the Latin, "to stretch;" tents being usually made of canvas stretched out, and sustained by poles with cords and pegs. The same may be understood of a pavilion, or a portable lodging, under which to shelter in the open air, from the injuries of the weather.
Mr. Taylor remarks, that erections answering the purpose of tents, however slight they may be, must have (1.) a supporting pole or poles, placed towards the centre; (2.) hangings and curtains of some kind; (3.) cords, or stakes, attached to (4.) pins, which are driven into the ground, in order to take sure hold of it.

Of the various kinds of tents, some were made of slight materials, and others were erected for greater permanency; others, again, were mere shades or bower or, and not made of canvas. Tents were also appropriated to different sexes; Sarah had her tent; Laban went into Jacob's tent; Leah's tent, Rachel's tent, and the maid servant's tent, are also particularized. Sisera fled to Jael's tent. The custom of setting apart tents for the use of the women, is still in use, perhaps, however, a little varied; and the common Arabs have a separate apartment in their tents for their wives, made by letting down a curtain or carpet from one of the pillars. The part of the tent thus appropriated is called karas; and no stranger is permitted to enter it, unless introduced. Hence, perhaps, Sisera's hope of greater security in the harem of Heber, Jael's husband. There were also tents for cattle. From the smaller kind of tents, the town, or what may be, of Sisroth was named (Gen. xxii. 17), and an allusion to the fruity of this description of shelter is made by Job, in chap. xxvii. 18, which very aptly describes the prosperity of the wicked:—

"He buildeth his house like the mole, Or like a shed which the watchman contriveth, His support shall rot away."

The watchman is here supposed to be the keeper of a vineyard, and the shed of the simplest kind, and merely intended to defend him, while on guard, from the intense heat of the sun. The Vulgate translates the term umbella, a little insignificant shade, probably similar to those reared by the watch-negro on plantations in the West Indies, and which generally consists of four upright stakes joined together at right angles, to others which support a covering of plantain or banana leaves.

Besides Sisroth, two other terms are used in the sacred Scripture to denote tents; namely, abken, which may perhaps be taken for an inferior kind of tent or tabernacle; similar to the huts of the natives of New Holland, which are formed of a few branches crossing each other, covered with brushwood and clay, six feet in depth, and four or five in breadth: the other, called ebel, may denote a tent whose accommodation may be varied so as to suit a few persons, a family; or great men, as generals and kings, enriched and ornamented. Of this kind of tent, a description is given by Sir John Cluardin, in his Travels, who relates that the deceased king of Persia caused a tent to be made that cost 25,000,000. It was called the house of gold, because there was nothing but gold that glistened in every part of it. Its corners was embellished with verses, which concluded in this manner: "Thou still demandest at what time the throne of this second Solomon was built, I will tell thee—Behold the throne of the second Solomon!" here the last words being taken for numerals, make 1057, the date of the year.

The Turks spare for nothing in rendering their tents convenient and magnificent; those of the grandees are said to be exceedingly splendid, and entirely covered with silk, besides being lined with a stuff of the same material. Van Egmont and Heyman mention one which cost 25,000 piastres, and washed in less than three years: it was his single piece made of camels' hair, and decorated with festoons, and sentences in the Koran. Nadir Shah had a very sum covered on the outside with scarlet brocade lined within with violet colored satin, or with a great variety of flowers, &c, entirely of pearls and precious stones.

The tents of princes are frequently illuminated with hangings of scarlet. In the time of Gog and Magog, others by forty lamps suspended before a screen of chequer work; and the general as of the camp of Darius, as related in Quinna, is very characteristic of a modern Persia. Whoever has seen at night, at a distance, a tent, or indeed a camp of any of the nations, will be struck with the correctness of the similitude to confabulation. Tents are also of various colors; black tents of Kedar; red, as of scarlet cloth; gold shining brilliantly; white, as of the tent of the prophet Micah, the house of David; and of the tent of the seed of Jacob. Some of the Arab nations adopt the same kind of tent. Thavenet says, the Curds of Mesopotamia and Turcomans, who are a nation living in Land, dwell in tents of white linen cloth very neat in their camps, and lie in good health; the Egyptians and Moors and inhabitants of Asia, also, use white tents. Turcomans, who are a nation living in Land, dwell in tents of white linen cloth very neat in their camps.

The modern royal tents of the Arabs are eralrly no other covering than black hair-cloth. Turcomans, who are a nation living in Land, dwell in tents of white linen cloth very neat in their camps, and lie in good health; Egyptian and Moorish inhabitants of Asia said to use white tents; and D'Arvieux mentions the tents of an Arab emir he visited, was dressed from the rest of his being of white cloth.

The Roman emperors had an ancient custom of spreading a scarlet cloak over their tents, guish those of officers of rank. Among the Turks, the tents are often of cloth, and higmented. Lieutenant Brown, of the Royal Horse Artillery, brought an entire tent from the late Egyptian. It was of strong silk-cloth, of a delicately ornamented with painting. Mr. Jacks's overland journey from India, on his entourage in the place where the river Nil joins the river Nile at Coate, fell in the British embassy, which appeared to him some of the tents being red, some green, and the others they, being of white cloth. (Hamer's Observations, 1816.)

The ambassador's of Holstein Gottorp, invited by a late Persian monarch to accompany him on a party of pleasure hunting, &c, found in a village many tents preparing reception of the company, which, by the white, their colors, and the peculiar manner in which they were pitched, made a most pleasing appearance.

Tents are still used for religious solemnities. They appear from the following extracts:—When arrived at Sis, a large town near the Nile, leagues above Cairo, it was the first day of the month, and, going to the town, we found many tents in an innumerable concourse of people, in a town, to the southward of it. These people partly of Sis, and partly from the circumscribedalogues, who came thither to celebrate the festival. The Rev. Cornelius Radeon, a missionary Dorbet Horde by whom the Cgalnuc superstitions are held in veneration, especially in towns. If we went out to the 'Churull,' this is the name of that part of the encampment where the temple Kibitjes, (or sacred tents,) and those belonging to the lamas and galloggnes, or priests, are pitched. The word is derived from a verb which signifies 'to gather,' and in this place all orders of assemblies for worship are held. In the church were six temple Kibitjes."

"A custom prevails in the East, of persons in all stations of life living in certain seasons of the year in tents, whilst in other seasons they dwell in houses. Dr. Pococke mentions a pleasant place near Aleppo, where he met an aga, who had a great entertainment, accompanied with music, under tents. The custom of taking air in the neighborhood of Cairo in tents, is noticed by Maillet as a manner of course.

It was customary to pitch tents near water-springs or fountains. The army of Ishbooth sat down by the pool of Gibeon, 2 Sam. xii. 13. Chardin informs us that Tahmsap, the Persian monarch, used to retire, in the summer, three or four leagues into the country, where he lived in tents, at the foot of mount Olounvent, in a place abounding in cool springs and pleasant shrubs. The following stanza from the Bedavi, a Persian poet, translated by Fox, will further illustrate this. Speaking of the shepherd, he says,

"Or happy when the summer sun-beam pours Intensely o'er th' unshaded wide extent He leads instinctive where the grove embowers And rears beside the brook his sheltering tent."

The words success and success are variously rendered in our translation, curtain, tabernacle, covert, pavilion, college, booth, tent, a hanging, and a covering.

Tephilim, i.e. Frontlets, which see.

Teraa, son of Nahor, and father of Nahor, Haran and Abraham, (Gen. xii. 24.) was born A.M. 1678. He begat Abraham at the age of 72 years, and left Ur, of the Chaldeans, to settle at Haran, in Mesopotamia, A.M. 2063, Gen. xii. 32. He died there the same year, aged 257 years. Scripture intimates plainly, that Terah had fallen into idolatry, (Josh. xiv. 5-14.) and some think that Abraham himself at first, worshipped idols; but that afterwards, God being gracious to him, convinced him of the vanity of this worship, and that he undeceived his father Terah. See Abraham.

Terebinth, idols, or superstitious figures, to which extraordinary effects were ascribed. The eastern people are still much addicted to this superstition of talismans. The Persians call them "telus," a name nearly approaching to teraphim. Those of Rachel must have been images, made of some precious metal. See Gen. xxxi. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Judg. xxvii. 5; Ezek. xxi. 21; Zech. x. 2, where the word teraphim is used for an idol, or superstitious figure. See Earrings, and Amulets.

The prophet Hosea, (iii. 4, 5.) threatening Israel, says, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim:" that is, during their captivity they shall be deprived of the public exercises of their religion, and even weaned from their own superstition. The passage is highly descriptive of the depth of their suffering. (See Fragment, 703.)

Terebinth. The Heb. "rej is sometimes rendered by the ancient versions oalol, and sometimes semineth. The tree is called the Pistacia tungrata, or the common turpentine tree, whose resin or juice is the Chian or Cyprus turpentine, used in medicine, and finer than that produced by the fir tribe. The tree grows to a large size and great age, and is common in Palestine. According to Pliney, it is an evergreen; although this does not coincide with the experience of modern botanists. The Hebrew word would seem rather to be used, in a broader sense, of any large tree in general; like the Greek ari. In Isa. xi. 13, it is improperly translated "sycamore," which is the same as the tree or "hadasa." - R.

Tertullian, a disciple of Paul, writing in his epistle to the Romans, Rom. xvi. 22. Lightfoot conjectures that he was the same as Silas, this Hebrew name signifying the same as the Latin Tertius.

Testament is commonly taken in Scripture for the covenant, the law, the promises. See Covenant.

Testimony, a proof, testimony or witness. (See Exod. xx. 16; xxxii. 1; Gen. xxxii. 47, 48, 52; Josh. xiii. 27; John i. 8; v. 31, &c.)

The law is called a testimony, (Deut. xxix. 2.); because when the Lord gave it to the Israelites, he gave testimony of his presence by prodigies performed before them, and he required an oath of them, that they should continue faithful to him. The ark is called the ark of testimony, because it contained the tables of the law; and the tabernacle of testimony, because in that tent the tables of the law were kept.

Tetrarch, a sovereign of a fourth part of a state, province or kingdom, Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 19; ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1. It was a title frequent among the descendants of Herod the Great, to whom the Roman emperors distributed his dominions at their pleasure. But the word tetrarch ought not to be understood rigorously, as it was occasionally given to a prince who possessed, perhaps, a half, or a third part, of a state.

I. Thaddeus, a surname of Jude, the apostle, Mark iii. 18.

II. Thaddeus, one of the seventy disciples, who is related to have been sent to king Abgarus at Edessa. (Euseb. Phase.)

Thanksgiving, the act of acknowledging the mercies of God. (See Praise.) There are various modes, under the Old Testament, of offering thanksgiving; sometimes it was public, sometimes in the family. It was frequently accompanied with praise, joy, gladness, and the voice of melody, (Isa. ii. 3.) or (as Neh. xi. 17.) with singing and with honor; (Rev. vii. 12.) but occasionally, if not generally, with supplication (Phil. iv. 6.) and prayer, (1 Tim. ii. 1; Neh. xi. 17.) For thanksgiving, we have examples in the best men in all ages, and also in Christ, our Lord. Whoever possesses any good without giving thanks for it, deprives him who bestows that good of his glory, sets a bad example before others, and prepares a recollection severely painful for himself, when he comes in his turn to experience ingratitude. Let only that man withhold thanksgiving, who has no enjoyments for which to give thanks.

Tharsis, see Tarshish.
THEBERT, a city of Epirus, at the siege of which Abimelech, son of Gideon, was killed, Judg. ix. 50, &c. Eusebius says, there was a village called Thess, 13 miles from Shechem, towards Syenopolis.

THEBES, among the Hebrews, was not punished with death: (Prov. vi. 30, 51.) "Men do not despise (overlook?) a thief, if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry. But if he be found, he shall restore seven-fold; he shall give all the substance of his house." The Mosaic law condemned a common thief to make double restitution, Exod. xxii. 4. If he stole an ox, he was to restore five-fold; if a sheep, only four-fold, Exod. xxii. 1. But if the animal stolen were found alive in his house, he only rendered the double of it. If he did not make restitution, they seized and sold his property, his house, and even himself, if he had not wherewith to make satisfaction, Exod. xxii. 33. In the passage of Proverbs, the wise man seems to say, that the thief should restore seven-fold the value stolen; but seven-fold is here put for many-fold. Zaccheus declared he would restore four-fold whatever he had fraudulently acquired in his office of publican, (Luke xix. 8) because the civil law condemned receivers of the public money to a four-fold restitution of their unjust gains.

If a thief were taken, and carried before a magistrate, he was interrogated judicially, and adjured in the name of the Lord to confess the fact. If he persisted in denying it, and was afterwards convicted of perjury, he was condemned to death; not for the theft, but for the perjury. An accomplice, or receiver of stolen goods, was subject to the same penalty, if he did not discover the truth to the judges, when he was examined, and adjured in the name of the Lord, Lev. v. 1; Prov. xxii. 34. To steal a freeman, or a Hebrew, and to reduce him to servitude, was punished with death, Exod. xxi. 16. If a stranger were stolen, the thief was only condemned to restitution.

The night-rober might be killed with impunity in the fact; but not a thief taken stealing in the daytime, Exod. xxii. 2. It was presumed, that he who attempted to break open a house, and steal by night, had a design on the life of the person molested; and under this presumption he might be prevented and killed. But it was not so with him who stole by day; there was then opportunity of defense against such an attack; and the thief might be prosecuted before the judges, and compelled to make restitution.

THEOPHILUS, an honorable person, to whom the evangelist Luke addressed his Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles, Luke i. 3; Acts i. 1. He was probably a Christian of quality, and most likely governor or intendant of some province; such having generally the title of most excellent. It is right to observe, however, that it does not of necessity imply a Roman appellation of honor; nor does the name Theophilus occur in Roman history, as a governor. It is found among the Jewish high-priests, in a son of Annaus, who was high-priest in the year when our Saviour was crucified. Theophilus was nominated to that office instead of his brother Jonathan, who had been deposed by Vitellius, (Joseph. Ant. xviii. xix. xx.) and Michaelis countenances the notion that this was Luke's Theophilus. [We can only say of Luke's friend, in general, that most probably he was a man of some note, who lived out of Palestine, and had abjured paganism in order to embrace Christianity. R.

THESSALONICA, a city and seaport second part of Macedonia. (It is situated a of the Sinus Thermaicus. Strab. vii. p. 500.) inhabited by Greeks, Romans and Jews, from whom the apostle Paul gathered a church. R.] There was a large number of Christians in this city, where they had a syn which Paul (A. D. 52) preached to them successive sabbaths. Some of the Jews, of the Gentiles, embraced the gospel, but the Jews determined to maltreat the apostles and surround the house in which they believed lodging. The brethren, however, secured and Silas out of the city, towards Berea, escaped from their enemies, Acts xvii. This new called Saloniti, is at present a wretched, but having been inhabited by about 50,000 people.

When Paul left Macedonia for Athens, in he left behind him Timothy and Silas might confirm those in the faith who had vored under his ministry. Being subsequently of the state of the church of Thessalonica, he addressed to them the first Epistles, so directed, in our present canon, or 33.

In this letter, the apostle instructs them of the last judgment, and of the manner and th which Christians should be afflic death of their relations. He expresses munition and tenderness for them, with an ear of coming to see them. He reproves them wrathfulness and pride, intermingling express praise, and marks of tenderness, with his tions. The Second Epistle was written from a short time after the First; and in it the apostles the Thessalonians against misapp mọi occasioned by a false interpretation of a former Epistle, in which Paul said the Lord was at hand. THIMNATHAH, (Josh. xix. 43) the same as Timnah, which see.

THIRST is a painful, natural sensation, occasioned by the necessity of moistening liquids from the stomach. As this sensation is accompanied by vehement desire, the term is sometimes used in Scripture in a moral sense, as Jer. ii. 25: "Withhold thy throat from thirst; but thou madest, I loved strangers, and after them will I go." In other words, "I desire the commission of sin—I thirst for criminal indulgence." And Matt. v. 6, "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness." Ps. lxxii. 2, "My soul thirsteth for God." The same figure is employed in the discourse of our Lord with the woman of Samaria: "Whosoever drinketh of the water which I shall give him shall never thirst;" an allusion which the woman mistook as if intended of natural water, drawn from some spring possessing peculiar properties.

THOMAS, the apostle, (Matt. x. 3.) called in Greek Didymus, (John xx. 24.) was probably a Galilean, as well as the other apostles; but the place of his birth, and the circumstances of his calling, are unknown. He was appointed an apostle A. D. 31, (Luke vi. 13—15.) and continued to follow Simon Peter during the three years of his preaching. We know no particulars of his life, till A. D. 33, a little before the passion of Christ; when Jesus intending to go to Judea to raise Lazarus, Thomas said to the rest: "Let us also go, that we may die with him." (John xi. 16.) meaning that by going to Judea they should be exposed to certain death from the hatred and malice of the Jews against his Master. At the last supper (John xiv. 5, 6.) Thomas asked Christ when he was going, and what way. Our Saviour answered, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." After the resurrection, when Christ appeared to his apostles, in the absence of Thomas, he so far expressed his disbelief in what they assured him of, as to say, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe," John xx. 25—29. Eight days after, Jesus appeared to the apostles, Thomas being with them, who thrust his hand into his side, and said, "Thou art foolish, and thy heart is dull. Have not you believed, because I have shown you myself." Jesus said to him, "Thomas, because thou hast seen, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." A few days after, while Thomas and the other apostles were fishing, on the sea of Galilee, Jesus appeared to them, caused them to take a very great draught of fishes, and dined with them.

 Tradition says, that in the distribution of the apostles to the several parts of the world, to preach the gospel, the country of the Parthians was allotted to Thomas, who preached to the Medes, the Persians, the Caramianians, the Hircaniens, the Bachtrians, and the Manianians, people which then composed the empire of the Parthians. The author of the Imperfect Work on Matthew says, that being arrived at the country in which the Magi were still living, who came to worship Christ at Bethlehem, he baptized them, and employed them in preaching the gospel. Several of the Fathers inform us, that he preached in the Indies; and others say, that he preached in Ethiopia, near the Caspian sea.

There are Christians in the East Indies, which bear the name of St. Thomas, because they report that this apostle preached the gospel there. They dwell in a peninsula of the Indus, on this side the gulf. There are also many in the kingdom of Cranigor, and in neighboring places; as also at Negapatam, Melapuur, Engunam, beyond Cochini, where their bishop resides, who is the successor of the patriarch of Babylon. It is said that the first Christians of the Indies, converted by Thomas, relapsed into their former infidelity, and so far forgot the instructions they had received from the apostle, that they did not remember there had ever been any Christians in their country. They believe that a certain holy man, called Mar-Thome, a Syrian, brought them the light of the gospel, and converted a great number of the people, with the assistance of some priests from Syria and Egypt, whom he invited thither. Cainet inclines to believe, that they derived the name of Christians of St. Thomas only from Mar-Thome; but Mr. Taylor remarks, that the uniform tradition and testimony of their writers, as collected by Assemani, forms a body of evidence on this subject which is so difficult to resist; Thomas travelled very far east; and it can hardly be supposed that the Syrians would introduce into their public worship, commemorations of him, with thanksgivings to God for his zeal and example, unless their ecclesiastics, who have given these reports, thought themselves warranted by facts. There remains, however, the question, what countries the Syrian writers intended by the terms they use. When they speak of China, it does not necessarily follow that they mean the country we now call China; and certainly not in its whole extent. It appears to be prudent to restrict the evangelical labors of Thomas to the peninsula of India; yet without denying that he might in some excursion, by sea or land, touch on some part of the Chinese empire. Here he might first plant the gospel; but he returned to his residence in India. The confusion occasioned by the revival, under a second Thomas, should not be allowed to invalidate the evidence thatfixes so firmly on the first.

THORNS. There are several species of thorns or briars, and not less than eight different words are employed by the sacred writers to denote one or other of them. The first time they are mentioned in Gen. iii. 18, (vulgarly "thorny plants of the field"). The word θόρνος is put for thorns in other places, (Exod. xxii. 6; Judg. viii. 6; xxvii. 24.) but it is not certain whether it means a specific kind of thorn, or is a generic name for all kinds of thorny plants. In the passage first cited, it seems to be used generally, for all those noxious plants, shrubs, &c. by which the labors of the husbandman are impeded, and which are only fit for burning. The radical import of the word is to set on fire, to wound, or to burn.

In Judges viii. 16, we read of Gideon taking "thorns" (撖) and "briers" (Parser.) The former word we have noticed; the latter now claims our attention. There can be no doubt that it means a sharp, jagged kind of plant; the difficulty is to find one, where so many offer themselves. The LXX preserve the original word. We should hardly think, says Mr. Taylor, that Gideon went far to seek these plants; the "thorns" are expressly said to be from the "wilderness," or common, hard by; probably the harkinians were from the same place. In our country this would lead us to the black-berry bushes on our commons; but it might not be so around Succoth. There is a plant mentioned by Hasselquist, whose name and properties somewhat resemble those which are required in the barkanim of this passage: "Vobis patiuntur Athenei, the nabka of the Arabs. There is every appearance of this being the tree which furnished the crown of thorns put on the head of our Lord. It is common in the East; a plant more proper for this purpose could not be selected; for it is armed with thorns; its branches are supple and plant, and its leaf of a deep green, like that of the ivy. Perhaps the enemies of Christ chose this plant, in order to add insult to punishment, by employing a plant approaching in appearance that which was used to crown emperors and generals." I am not sure, continues Mr. Taylor, whether something of the same ideas did not influence Gideon: at least, it is remarkable, that though in ver. 7, he threatens to thrust the flesh of the men of Sareth with thorns, that is, to beat them severely, yet, in ver. 16, it is said, he taught, made to know, perhaps made to be known by wearing them, as at once insult and punishment. The change of words deserves notice; and so does the observation, that "he slew the men of Peniel," which is not said of the men of Sareth. If the nabka (nabaka) of the Arabs might be the na-barkan of this passage, the idea of its employment is remarkably coincident in the two instances. (The barkanim of Gideon are understood by Gesenius to be the sharp stones (sometimes, perhaps, thorns) underneath the threshing machines of the Hebrews; and these Gideon used as instruments of punishment and torture. See Tha-aring. R.)

Another word used to denote a plant of this description, is "tsirim, Numb. xxxiii. 55; Josh. xxiii. 13; and Job v. 5. From its application, it seems to describe a bad kind of thorn: "But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you, then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be thorns in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherin ye dwell," Numb. xxxiii. 55. So in the second passage referred to. The passage in Job is thus rendered by Good—

Their harvest the wild starving devoureth;
He setteth it to the very thorns;

which supports the interpretation of the word above proposed, as far as the idea is concerned, although Dr. Good seems inclined to think, with Syrach and Jerome, that the allusion is here rather to "hostile arms" than to vegetable prickles. Perhaps Ephraim may refer to a hedge of thorns, which surrounds for security a threshing-floor, granary, or some such place; and Dr. Harris proposes, as the particular kind, the chamnum patiuntur, a deciduous plant or tree, a native of Palestine, Spain and Italy. It will grow nearly to the height of fourteen feet, and is armed with sharp thorns, two of which are at the insertion of each branch, one of them straight and upright, the other bent backward.

In Prov. xv. 18, there is a beautiful apophasis, which involves a reference to some kind of thorny shrub:

The way of the slothful is as a hedge of thorns.
But the way of the righteous is plain.

The word here used is zulon, chedek, but the particular kind of thorn which is intended, it seems hardly possible to determine. Celsius and Ray make it the podonum pumilum fructu spinosa; but Dr. Harris thinks it is the cadinum spinosa of Forskal, which is called in the Arabic kaddad, or engraving in Russell. In Mic. vii. translated "brier," and perhaps word may be retained without injury, too, this chedek may be vesture, like our brier, and of what kind "sweet-brier;" so a judge—

Saints at a rate pinchus paius.
Hoc etiam judex semper aver.

With regard to the passage in the Thorn of a beautiful opposition, which is followed:—The narrow way of the complex pathways among sharp the broad road of the righteous is a highway, and not a causeway; yet the road is hard and thorny. A person in the most intimate, the most obliging of the thorny measures, to accom the honest man prefers the most lit forward.

We have no means of determining plant meant by zulon, sirim, read Exod. vii. 6; Nah. i. 10, and Heb. and Nah. they are spoken of as a kind quickly Harris up, and in Hos. a hedge. The like uncertainty attends to the zulon, "thorns," of 2 Chron. xxvi. 9; Cant. ii. 2; Hos. ix. it would lead us to look for a kind of vined spines, like fish-hooks. In Chron. xxv. 14; Job xxxi. 18, the zulon "thistle;" *in Job Ali. 2." Hos. ix. 6, "thicker;" and in Isa. xxxiv. 14.

The zulon, natsirim of Isa. "thorns" by the Chaldees interpreted by our translators; but bishop Lowth and others, referring it, probably, to the r Taylor, however, thinks that it refers to plants—"shadows, or flow that the zulon, malhim, is cited, and which we rendering be understood of "pasture ground-worlded;" and as this makes three subjects mentioned places, the four should be a place, not a plant. The following distribution of the psalm:

In that day,
The Lord shall bless for the fly
Which is in the uttermost part of the land;
Which shall come and settle on all
And on all fruitful pastures.
And for the bee,
Which is in the land of Assyria,
Which shall come and settle on
And in the crevices or cloths of the

The zulon, zilon, of Gen. iii. 18
Ezek. ii. 6, and chap. xxviii. 24, is to be a kind of thorn, overspread of ground, as the dew-brier. Mr. Taylor, from its association in the two last passages, inclines to think that some kind of animal is intended, rather than a vegetable substance. His reasons, however, seem to possess little weight, and the passage in Gen. iii. 18, although it is a very suggestive passage, though the particular kind cannot be ascertained. From the vexatious characters ascribed to it, Harris thinks it to be the kanthafo as described by Bruce.

The θίροι, théró, of Isa. lv. 13, means, apparently, some kind of wide-spread ing thorn. Hiller calls it the ruscus.

In addition to the words already enumerated, we find γκανθός, gkanthós, used in Job xxx. 7; Prov. xxiv. 31, and Zeph. ii. 9. It is only in the second passage, however, that it is rendered thorn, and the particular kind it is impossible to determine. Indeed, it is no wonder, that among so many kinds of thorns as are to be found in the East, we should be embarrassed in identifying them. The difficulty in all the preceding remarks is, that the writers have felt no embarrassment, but have decided with self-complacency, where real scholars are at a loss. R.

The word employed in the New Testament for "thorns" is ἀκήρια, akhíria. Wetstein has quoted a passage from Selden, very similar to Matt. vii. 16: "The husbandman would never be able to make the thorns produce grapes." On Matt. xxvii. 29, Harris cites, with apparent approbation, Dr. Pearce's note on the passage, which is as follows: "The word ἀκήρια may very well be the genitive of the word ἀκήριος, of ἄκηρ, etc.; if of the latter, it is rightly translated 'of thorns,' but the former would signify what we call 'bear's foot,' and the French 'branche urinaire.' This is not of the thorny kind of plants, but is soft and smooth. Virgil calls it 'mollius scanthus, so does Pliny secundus; and Pliny the elder says that it is 'levis, smooth,' and that it is one of those plants that are cultivated in gardens. I have somewhere read, but cannot at present tell where, that this soft and smooth herb was very common in and about Jerusalem. I find nothing in the New Testament concerning the crown which Pilate's soldiers put on the head of Jesus to incline one to think that it was of thorns, and intended, as is usually supposed, to put him to intense suffering; and, if I find, it is mentioned by any of the primitive Christian writers as an instance of the cruelty used towards our Saviour before he was led to crucifixion, till the time of Tertullian, who lived after Jesus' death at the distance of above one hundred and sixty years. He, indeed, seems to have understood ἀκήριος in the sense of thorns, and says, "Quale oro te, Jesus Christus serutum pro utroque sexu subit? Ex spinis, opinor, et rabulis." The total silence of Polycarp, Hermas, C. Romanus, and all the other Christian writers whose works are now extant, and who wrote before Tertullian, in particular, will give some weight to incline one to think that this crown was not placed with thorns.

This conjecture of Pearce, which has been embraced by Michaelis, is solely refuted by Campbell. Not a single version favors it; and, as Bloomfield remarks, the word proposed no where in the New Testament or the Sept., ingests. The Italian and Syriac render thorns; and the ancient Greek and Latin fathers so took it. There is, therefore, the highest probability opposed to mere conjecture. Bodeus and Thoeplyphact think that our Lord's crown was of acacia; others conjecture differently. It was, doubtless, of some kind of prickly shrub, although what that kind is cannot now be ascertained. Certainly it was not of mere thorns, nor were under his head with an intent to torture him; every thing in this occurrence seems to have been done with a view to mockery and derision, not pain; and, as Whitby remarks, not to deride Christ's pretensions to the Messiahship, but to his title to be king of the Jews. Doddridge thinks, that had ridicule alone been intended, a crown of thorns might have done as well. But crown was usually made of such shrubs as admitted of being woven, and such are usually softer or more or less prickly. That they meant cruelty, he argues from their striking him; but with what—a reed, not a cane; or, as Doddridge thinks, a walking-staff, as Wetstein has satisfactorily shown.

THOUGHT, THINKING, are words not always used in Scripture for the simple operation of the mind; but as including a formed design of doing something. (See Jer. xi. 19; Gen. xi. 6, &c.)

When our translation was made, the word thought included the sense of determination or resolution; so that when we are directed "take no thought for the morrow," the meaning was, no anxiety, no carefulness; the same when we are told to take no thought for our life, or living. (Matt. vi. 8) or for our raiment. (Matt. vi. 9.) On the contrary, when we are by taking thought, by anxiety, by solicitude, can add one cubit to his stature, or to his age? verse 25. It cannot be supposed that our Lord forbids a proper care, foresight, or provision for future time; he only meant to restrain inordinate desire, anguish of mind, corroding cares, aversion.

THRASHING, the separating of corn from the shell or husk in which it is enclosed. In England this operation was, till lately, usually performed by the staff or flail; but it was not so among the Hebrews.

In Isaiah xli. 15, we read, "Behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument, having teeth; thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff; thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away, and the whirlwind shall scatter them." Here every idea, every allusion, every sentence, was familiar to an eastern agriculturist; but what can an Englishman understand by a "new sharp threshing instrument, having teeth?" He who naturally thinks of the flail, as his threshing instrument, may well be permitted to wonder in what part of this instrument its teeth can be placed, and how it was to be used, when increased by this addition. As to our modern threshing machines, they are out of the question. In the same prophet we have another passage, (chap. xxvi. 10,) which has not been understood: "Moab shall be trodden down under him, even as straw is trodden down by the dunghiller." The margin reads, "Moab shall be threshed, as straw is threshed in Madmenash." Now, to tread straw by labor purposely and specifically for the dunghill, is an occupation of persons unknown to our rural economy; but our translators were aware, that an allusion to the threshing of straw, in Madmenash, was to delude the rustic reader by a seeming translation of no information to him; and they, therefore, preferred that which, though it had no foundation in fact, yet seems less uncut to English ears. Translators, in general, have referred the passage to threshing, as appears by consulting them; Coverdale has "threshed upon the ground;" the Downey translation, "broken with the wain;" and bishop Lowth, "threshed under the wheels of the car;" each something right, and something wrong; but bishop Lowth is the nearest to accuracy.

Very full of the real import, the haste, or the value, of the proposed present of Otem to David (1 Chron. xvi. 25) can be understood in this country: "I give the threshing instruments for wood;" i.e. to burn the sacrifice of the oxen, &c. How many flails (our threshing instruments) must Otem have possessed, to accomplish this purpose? Could nothing better be found, nothing be fetched from the adjacent city, but must all the flails of this Joelite be consumed for this service? Surely Otem did not hold such a quantity of wood, as required so great a number of flails for the purpose of threshing the produce of it, that they might serve to consummate the sacrifice of two oxen? But why not conclude, that this offer was made for instant use, Otem hereby hoping to terminate it without a quires ad, as he says, "and doth not with a thumb turned off, but rather on a bread corn threshing bruise it in the Lord's excellent wheels of Israel;" but the difficulty:

"The second remark is concerning the manner and manner of a sledge drawn by two oxen; and in which the man who drives them is on his knees, whilst another man is the case of drawing back the straw, and of raising it from the ground, and then again to throw it into the cart. At the threshing of the corn in Egypt and Nebuchadnezzar, the Hebrews lay their sheaves down in a certain order, and then load them on two oxen, dragging a great plow. This mode of extracting the ears from the straw, is not unlike that of Egypt; (Nebuchadnezzar's Threshing 220.) The corn was as the sheaves did, to bear out their corn by trampling upon the sheaves, and dragging after them an enemy machine. This machine is not, as in Arabia, a stone cylinder; nor a plank with sharp stones as in Syria; but a sort of sledges consisting of three rollers, fitted with iron, which turn upon axes. A farmer casts scot out a level spot in his field, and has his corn cast thither in sheaves, upon three rollers, which turn about axes. He then stands on a ladder, and is done. The heifer was one of his oxen; and the rail the whole corn. As the heifer was one of his oxen, so the harrow was one of his oxen."

above mentioned, and this was done with the greatest convenience to the driver: for he was seated in a chair fixed on the sledge. Two such parcels or layers of corn are thrust out in a day, and they move each of them as many as eight times, with a wooden fork of five prongs, which they call Meddore. Afterwards they throw the straw into the middle of the ring, where it forms a heap, which grows bigger and bigger. When the first layer is thrashed, they replace the straw in the ring, and thrash it as before. Thus the straw becomes every time smaller, till at last it resembles chopped straw. After this, with the fork just described, they cast the whole some yards from thence, and against the wind; which driving back the straw, the corn and the ears not threshed out fall apart from it, and make another heap. A man collects the clods of dirt and other impurities, to which any corn adheres, and throws them into a sieve. They afterwards place in a ring the heaps, in which a great many entire ears are still found, and drive over them, for four or five hours together, a dozen couple of oxen joined two and two, till, by absolute trampling, they have separated the grains, which they throw into the air with a shovel (Luhh) to cleanse them.

The ancient Arabs, Syrians, Egyptians and Romans threshed their corn in the same manner, by the feet of cattle, as may be seen on the picture, (fig. 302, 310). "The Moors and Arabs," says Dr. Shaw, "continue to tread out their corn after the primitive custom of the East. Instead of beehives, they frequently make use of mules and horses, by tying in the like manner, by the neck, three or four of them together, and whipping them afterwards round about the neddars, (as they call the threshing-floors; the Lybica Are of Horace,) where the sheaves lie open and expanded, in the same manner as they are placed and prepared, with us, for threshing. This, indeed, is a much quicker way than ours, but less cleanly: for, as it is performed in the open air (Hos. xiii. 5) upon any round level plat of ground, dabbed over with cow's dung, to prevent, as much as possible, the earth, sand, or gravel, from rising; a great quantity of them all, notwithstanding this precaution, must unavoidably be taken up with the grain; at the same time the straw, which is their only fodder, is hereby shattered to pieces; a circumstance very perturbing. Paul in 2 Kings xiii. 7, where the king of Syria is said to have made the Israelites like the dust by threshing." (Travels, p. 221, folio.)

THRON, that magnificent seat on which princes usually sit to receive the homage of their subjects, or to give audience to ambassadors. The throne, in pomp and ceremony, whence they dispense justice, &c. The throne, the sceptre, the crown, are extraordinary symbols of royalty and royal authority. Scripture often represents the Lord as sitting on a throne. The psalmist says, that God had confirmed his throne in heaven from all eternity, Ps. civ. 19; xciii. 2; xlv. 6. This throne was supported by justice and equity, xvii. 2. The throne of the Lord which was shown to Ezekiel, (chap. i.) was at the same time the most terrible, and yet the most magnificent, object that can be imagined. It was an animated chariot, borne by four cherubim of an extraordinary figure. The wheels were of inexplicable beauty and magnitude, also animated and conducted by a spirit. The throne of the Lord, which was over the wheel and the cherubim, was like glittering crystal, with a seat of sapphire. He who sat on the throne was surrounded with splendor like that of fire, or of metal in fusion; and round him glowed the colors of the rainbow. (See also Isa. vi. 4.)

The cherubim, the ark of the Lord, were also considered as a kind of throne of the Deity: whence it is said in many places that God sits between the cherubim; (1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings xiv. 15; Ps. xviii. 10; xxx. 1; xcv. 1; Isa. xxvii. 16.) whether we consider the cherubim of the ark, or the cherubim which Isaiah and Ezekiel describe as being under, and about, the throne of the Almighty; and probably to the same cherubim Paul refers by the term thrones, Col. i. 16.

The throne of Solomon is described in Scripture as the finest and richest in the world, 1 Kings x. 20. It was of ivory, inlaid with gold. The ascent was by seven steps; the back was round, and two arms supported the seat; twelve golden lions, one at each end of every step, made a principal part of its ornaments.

The Jews sometimes swore by the throne of God, or by heaven; but our Saviour forbids such oaths; (Matt. v. 34, 37.) for "Whoever swears by heaven, swears by the throne of God, and by him who sits upon it." There is a passage (Exod. xvii. 16.) that might be understood in the sense of an oath, sworn by the throne of God: "The Lord has lifted up his hand from his throne (he has sworn by his throne) that he would make war against Amalek." (See Osea, vol. i. p. 303.) Thus in Judg. v. 21, Nohuchonserzar swears by his throne, that he would make war against all who had rejected his ambassadors.

In Scripture, the Son of God is represented as sitting on a throne at the right hand of his Father, Ps. cx. 1; Heb. i. 8; Rev. iii. 21. And he himself assures his apostles, that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke xxi. 30. In the Revelation, we find the twenty-four elders seen in vision, sitting on thrones before the Lord, Rev. iv. 4. (And Dan. vii. 9.) when God is about to enter into judgment with men, thrones are prepared for judges. The Ancient of Days is seated; his throne is as a flame of fire; his wheels are as consuming fire; streams of fire radiate from his face; millions of millions of angels attend upon him, and thousands of thousands are round about him.

Thrones, in the sense of an order of the celestial hierarchy, (Col. i. 16.) may signify, as above hinted, the cherubim, which were considered as the throne of God. Paul claims in 2 Peter ii. 1, the possession of the most exalted celestial spirits that compose the angelic hierarchy, (Eph. iii. 10; vi. 12.) and hence some suppose that by thrones, principalities, powers and dominions, the apostle means no more than temporal powers, subordinate one to another. They appear in the New Testament, the kingdom of God, the nations, and the care and instruction of the Church; the essence of power; principalities, governors or princes; and powers, judges, magistrates of cities, &c.

THUMMIM, see URIM.

THUNDER is a re-persuasion of the air violently agitated, among dense clouds, by the lightning or electric flash; and as this is the loudest natural noise with which mankind are acquainted, it was, like many other surprising things, expressed by an addition of the name of God. So we have, in Scripture, the terms "fair to God," extremely beautiful; "great cities of God," extremely great cities; "trees of God," extremely tall trees; and hence thunder is called "the voice of God," that is, the prodigious sound, noise, or report; "voices of God," (Heb. Exod. ix. 28.) are mighty thunderings; (Ps. xxxiii. 3, 4, 5.) the voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars, divideth the flames of fire, &c.; the psalmist tells us, verse 3, he means thunder.
THYATIRA, a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, anciently called Magnesia and Euphobia, now Akyur. It was situated on the confines of Lydia and Mysia, near the river Lycaon, between Sardis and Pergamus, Acts xvi. 14; Rev. i. 11; ii. 18, 34. The art of dyeing purple was particularly cultivated at Thyatira, as appears from the mention found there, for which see Kunoed on Acts i. (See Wells, Sac. Geogr. No. 337. Miss. Horr. for 1831, p. 531.) *R.

THYINE-WOOD, (Rev. xviii. 12.) the wood of the thyia v. thyia artificiata of Linnaeus, an aromatic evergreen tree, resembling the cedar, and found in Libya. The wood was used in burning incense. R.

I. TIBERIAS, a city of Galilee, on the western shore of the lake of Gennesareth, the original name of which is thought to have been Cinnereth, or Hammath, or Enath, or Rakkath, or Racheath. Beland, however, shows that this is very doubtful, and only founded on the sea of Gennesareth being afterwards called the sea of Tiberias; which by no means proves that Cinnereth and Tiberias were the same town. Besides, as he observes, the portion of Naphtali did not begin towards the south, but at Capernaum, (Matt. iv. 13) which is more to the north than Tiberias; and yet Cinnereth, Hammath, Rakkath, belong to the portion of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 35.

Josephus states (Ant. lib. viii. cap. 3; De Bel. lib. ii. cap. 8,) that Tiberias was built in honor of Tiberias by Herod Antipas, and that it was 30 furlongs from Hippos, 60 from Gadara, 120 from Scythopolis, and 30 from Tauricha. (De Vita sua, p. 1025, 1050.) Herod endowed it with great advantages; which, with its convenient situation, soon made it the metropolis of Galilee. When he was obliged to leave Rome, he retired hither with his uncle Herod, and the emperor Claudius afterwards bestowed it upon him, it had the name of Claudia Tiberia. Josephus took possession of it at the time of the wars with the Jews, and gave the bastiando to the officer who came to propose terms of peace to it from the Romans. Vespuccius intended to put all the inhabitants to the edge of the sword; but Agrippa prevailed on him to be satisfied with beating down part of its walls. Tiberias was famous for its baths of hot waters, from which diseased people received great benefit.

In this city, some of the most learned of the Jews, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, assembled, and laid the foundation of an academy, which became famous by the Mishna that was composed in it; by the celebrated labors of the Masorites, the authors of the vowel points; and by the reputation of the doctors who there kept their schools. Here the patriarch of the nation also resided.

Dr. E. D. Clarke says, (Trav. vol. ii. p. 467.) "The town of Tiberias is situated close to the edge of the lake. It is fringed by walls, but has no artillery; and, like all Turkish citadels, ranks a great figure from without, exhibiting, at the same time, the utmost wretchedness within. Its castle stands upon a rising ground in the north part of it. No antiquities now remain, except a very ancient church, of an oblong square form, to which we descend by steps. There is reason to believe this the first place of Christian worship erected in Tiberias, and that it was constructed as long ago as the fourth century. The root is of stone, and it is vaulted. It is called the house of Peter. About a mile south of the town are the celebrated hot baths of Emmanuel."

II. TIBERIAS, SEA OF. This lake, which is almost equal in the grandeur of its appearance to the lake of Genesareth, is called indifferently, Genesareth, the lake of Tiberias, the sea of Gennesareth, from the adjas. or the principal towns upon its shores and Pliny agree in stating it to be also 6 in length, and about 6 in breadth. Mr. Wood considers it to be a deep basin, surrounded on all sides with excepting only the narrow entrance and Jordan at each extreme; for which reason it is subject to whirlwinds, squalls and storms from the highest mountainous parts, while other similar basin, are of short duration and give, however, a cast of dulness to the sea, this is increased to melancholy by the disturbance of its waters, and the silence which reigns in its whole extent, where not a boat or vessel kind is to be seen.

Dr. E. D. Clarke, describing its appearance, "The wind renders its surface rough, a mind the situation of our Saviour's discipic, one of the small vessels which traversed it, they were tossed in a storm, and saw Jesus at the fourth watch of the night, walking on the waves, Matt. xiv. 24, 25, 26. Often as he has been painted, combining a number of fanciful ideas, the representation of the artist has been aware of the uncommon and picturesque scenery, memorable as one of the most remarkable features of the lake of Genesareth is surrounded well calculated to heighten the solemn mystery, made by such a picture; and, independent of the feelings likely to be excited in its contemplation, it affords one of the most striking prospects of the land. It is by comparison alone that the impression of the appearance it presents can be compared to the minds of those who have not been in it. It is inferior in magnitude, as it is inferior to any of the other Westmoreland lakes, although, perhaps, the most stupendous features of Loch in Scotland. It does not possess the vast extent of the lake of Geneva, although it much resembles it, and the scenery of it is almost equal in the grandeur of its appearance to the lake of Genesareth, from the adjacent towns upon its shores, and the distance between them is about 6 miles. Every Christian pilgrim approaches it, with a sense of dignity unparalleled by any similar scenery."

TIBERIUS CAESAR, second emperor
i. e. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero. He was the son of Livia, and step-son of Augustus; and, being adopted by that emperor, he succeeded to his throne A. D. 14. He died A. D. 37, after a cruel reign of 234 years. It was in the 14th year of his reign that John the Baptist first appeared; and the crucifixion of him took place in the 3d or 4th year after, Luke iii. 1. R.

TIBHATH, a city of Syria-Zoba, taken and plundered by David, 1 Chron. xviii. 8.

TIBNI, a son of Ginath, and competitor with Omri for the kingdom of Israel, 1 Kings xvi. 21.

TIDAL, king of nations, or of Gentiles, (goim,) Gen. xiv. 1. Some think he was king of Galilee of the Gentiles beyond Jordan; (Matt. iv. 15,) and Joshua speaks of a king of the nations of Gilgal, or of Galilea according to the Septuagint, Josh. xii. 23.

TIGLATH-PILESER, king of Assyria, reigned at Nineveh. Ahaz, king of Judah, finding himself pressed by Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, and unable to oppose them, sent embassadors to Tiglath-pileser, to desire his assistance against those kings, 2 Kings xv. 7, &c. At the same time he sent him all the gold and silver found in the treasures of the temple and of the palace. Tiglath-pileser marched against Rezin, killed him, plundered Damascus, and transported the inhabitants to places on the river Euphrates. Ahaz went to meet him at Damascus, (3 Chron. xxvii. 20, 31,) but Tiglath-pileser, not being satisfied with the presents of Ahaz, entered Judah, and ravaged the whole country. He did the same in Samaria, carried away the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and transplanted them to Halah, Habor and Hareon, on the river Gozan, 1 Chron. v. 26. He took also the cities Ijon, Abel-beth-maacah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Galilee, and the countries of Gilead and Naphtali, and carried away the inhabitants into Assyria, 2 Kings xv. 29. He reigned nineteen years at Nineveh. His successor was his son Shalmaneser. See more in Assyria.

TIMBER, an instrument of music, often mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews called it se, laph, under which name they comprehended all kinds of drums, tabors and timbrels. We do not find that the Hebrews used it in their wars, but only at their public feasts. It was sometimes used by the women. It consisted and still consists of a small rim, over which a skin is drawn. The rim is also hung with small bells. The timbrel is used as an accompaniment to lively music, being shaken and beaten with the knees. After the passage of the Red sea, Miriam, sister of Moses, took a timbrel, and began to play and dance with the women, Exod. xv. 20. The daughter of Jephthah came to meet her father with timbrels and other musical instruments, Judg. xi. 34.

TIMNATH, or Timnath, an ancient Canaanitish city, to which Judah was going when he met with Tamar, Gen. xxxvii. 12. It was at first assigned to Judah, on whose northern borders it lay, (Josh. xv. 10, 57,) but afterwards to the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 43,) where it is written TIMNATH. It remained mostly, however, in the possession of the Canaanites. Judg. xiv. 1; 2 Chron. xxvii. 18. (Compare Joseph. Antiq. As to the place of Timnath, the name is not to be identified with Timnath-serah, a city of Ephraim, which Joshua chose for his dwelling and burying-place, Josh. xix. 50; xxiv. 30.

TIMOTHY, a disciple of Paul. He was of Derbe or Lystra, both cities of Lycaonia, Acts xvi. 1; zev. 6. His father was a Gentile, but his mother a Jewess, 2 Tim. i. 5; iii. 15. When Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, about A. D. 51, or 53, the brethren spoke highly of the merit and good disposition of Timothy; and the apostle determined to take him along with him, for which purpose he circumcised him at Lystra, Acts xvi. 3. Timothy applied himself to labor in the gospel, and did Paul very important service throughout the whole course of his preaching. It is not known when he was made bishop; but it is believed that he received very early the imposition of the apostle's hands, and this in consequence of a particular revelation, or intimation from the Holy Spirit, 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6. Paul calls him, not only his dearly beloved son, but also his brother, the companion of his labors, and a man of God; observing that none was more united with him in heart and mind than Timothy.

He accompanied Paul to Macedonia, to Philippi, to Thessalonica, and to Berea, where he left him and Silas to confirm the converts, Acts xvii. 14, &c. When at Athens, he directed Timothy to come to him, (A. D. 52,) and thence sent him back to Thessalonica, from whence he afterwards returned with Silas, to Paul at Corinth, (Acts xviii. 5,) where he continued with the apostle, and is named with Silas at the beginning of the two epistles to the Thessalonians.

About A. D. 56, Paul sent Timothy with Erastus into Macedonia, (Acts xix. 22,) and directed him to call at Corinth, to refresh the minds of the Corinthians in the truth. Some time after, writing to this church, (1 Cor. iv. 17,) he recommends to them the care of Timothy, and directs them to send him back in peace.

Timothy returned to Paul in Asia, who there stayed for him, whence they went together into Macedonia, and the apostle joins Timothy's name with his own, in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which he wrote from this province, about the middle of A. D. 57. He also sends his epistles to the Romans, in the letter which he wrote to them from Corinth, the same year, or about A. D. 58, Rom. xvi. 21.

Though it does not appear, by the Acts, that Timothy was with Paul the two years in which he was prisoner at Cesarea, nor during his voyage to Rome; yet he had accompanied him employed by him in the women. It consisted and still consists of a small rim, over which a skin is drawn. The rim is also hung with small bells. The timbrel is used as an accompaniment to lively music, being shaken and beaten with the knees. After the passage of the Red sea, Miriam, sister of Moses, took a timbrel, and began to play and dance with the women, Exod. xv. 20. The daughter of Jephthah came to meet her father with timbrels and other musical instruments, Judg. xi. 34.

TIMNAH, or Timnath, an ancient Canaanitish city, to which Judah was going when he met with Tamar, Gen. xxxvii. 12. It was at first assigned to Judah, on whose northern borders it lay, (Josh. xv. 10, 57,) but afterwards to the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 43,) where it is written TIMNATH. It remained mostly, however, in the possession of the Canaanites. Judg. xiv. 1; 2 Chron. xxvii. 18. (Compare Joseph. Antiq. As to the place of Timnath, the name is not to be identified with Timnath-serah, a city of Ephraim, which Joshua chose for his dwelling and burying-place, Josh. xix. 50; xxiv. 30.

TIMOTHY, a disciple of Paul. He was of Derbe or Lystra, both cities of Lycaonia, Acts xvi. 1; zev. 6. His father was a Gentile, but his mother a Jewess, 2 Tim. i. 5; iii. 15. When Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, about A. D. 51, or 53, the brethren spoke highly of the merit and good disposition of Timothy; and the apostle determined to take him along with him, for which purpose he circumcised him at Lystra, Acts xvi. 3. Timothy applied himself to labor in the gospel, and did Paul very important service throughout the whole course of his preaching. It is not known when he was made bishop; but it is believed that he received very early the imposition of the apostle's hands, and this in consequence of a particular revelation, or intimation from the Holy Spirit, 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6. Paul calls him, not only his dearly beloved son, but also his brother, the companion of his labors, and a man of God; observing that none was more united with him in heart and mind than Timothy.

He accompanied Paul to Macedonia, to Philippi, to Thessalonica, and to Berea, where he left him and Silas to confirm the converts, Acts xvii. 14, &c. When at Athens, he directed Timothy to come to him, (A. D. 52,) and thence sent him back to Thessalonica, from whence he afterwards returned with Silas, to Paul at Corinth, (Acts xviii. 5,) where he continued with the apostle, and is named with Silas at the beginning of the two epistles to the Thes-

About A. D. 56, Paul sent Timothy with Erastus into Macedonia, (Acts xix. 22,) and directed him to call at Corinth, to refresh the minds of the Corinthians in the truth. Some time after, writing to this church, (1 Cor. iv. 17,) he recommends to them the care of Timothy, and directs them to send him back in peace.

Timothy returned to Paul in Asia, who there stayed for him, whence they went together into Macedonia, and the apostle joins Timothy's name with his own, in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which he wrote from this province, about the middle of A. D. 57. He also sends his epistles to the Romans, in the letter which he wrote to them from Corinth, the same year, or about A. D. 58, Rom. xvi. 21.

Though it does not appear, by the Acts, that Timothy was with Paul the two years in which he was prisoner at Cesarea, nor during his voyage to Rome; yet he had accompanied him employed by him in the women. It consisted and still consists of a small rim, over which a skin is drawn. The rim is also hung with small bells. The timbrel is used as an accompaniment to lively music, being shaken and beaten with the knees. After the passage of the Red sea, Miriam, sister of Moses, took a timbrel, and began to play and dance with the women, Exod. xv. 20. The daughter of Jephthah came to meet her father with timbrels and other musical instruments, Judg. xi. 34.

as is probable, he must have been a witness there of the martyrdom of Paul, A. D. 66. Calvin and some other commentators incline to think that Timothy must be the angel of the church of Ephesus, to whom John writes, (Rev. ii.) though they are of opinion that the reproaches contained in the address do not so much concern Timothy personally, as some members of his church whose zeal had become cool. We have nothing that can be depended upon, concerning the latter part of his life.

TIN is the word commonly employed in the Scriptures to designate the metal tin, as in Num. xxxi. 22. But in Isa. i. 23, the Hebrew word is put for brass, or that which is separated by smelting; and here our translators have also improperly rendered the word tin. R.

TIPHSAH, the ancient Tiphsaes, an important city on the western bank of the Euphrates, which constituted the north-eastern extremity of Solomon's dominions. There was here a celebrated ford or ferry over the Euphrates, 1 Kings iv. 24. Perhaps the same city is meant, 2 Kings vi. 16; though others understand here a city of the same name near Samaria. (Xen. Anab. i. 4. Arrian. Exped. Alex. iii. 7.) R.

TIRHAKAH, king of Ethiopia, or Cush, bordering on Palestine and Egypt. (See Canaan, p. 329, and Egypt, p. 373.) This he was, at the head of a powerful army, attempted to relieve Hezekiah, when attacked by Sennacherib, (2 Kings xvi. 9,) but the Assyrian army was routed before he came up. See Sennacherib.

TIRZAH, pleasant, a city of Ephraim, and the royal seat of the kings of Israel, from the time of Jeroboam to the reign of Omri, who built the city of Samaria, which then became the capital of this kingdom. Israel killed the king of Tirzah, Josh. xxi. 21. Menahem, the son of Gadi, of Tirzah, slew Shallum, the usurper of the kingdom of Israel, who reigned at Samaria, and assumed the government himself. But the city of Tirzah shuffling about, as gates against him, he made it suffer the most terrible effects of his indignation. (2 Kings xxvii. 16.)

TISBE, a city of Gilead, cast of the Jordan, and the country of the prophet Elijah, who from hence was called the Tishbite. 1 Kings xviii. 1.

TISRI, the first Hebrew month of the civil year, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical year. (See the Jewish Calendar, at the end of the volume.)

TITHE, so Tythes.

TITUS, a Gentle, (Gal. ii. 3.) converted by the apostle Paul, who calls him his son, Tit. i. 4. Paul took him with him to Jerusalem, (Gal. ii. 1.) during the time of the question whether the converted Gentiles should be subject to the ceremonies of the law. Some would have obliged him to circumcise Titus; but neither he nor Titus would consent. Titus was afterwards sent by the apostle to Corinth, (2 Cor. xii. 18,) on occasion of some disputes in that church. He was well received by the Corinthians, and much satisfied by their ready compliance, but would receive nothing from them; thereby incurring the disapprobation of his master. From Corinth he went to Paul in Macedonia, and gave him an account of the state of the Corinthian church, (2 Cor. vii. 15.) A short while afterwards, the apostle desired him to return to Corinth, to regulate things against his own arrival there. Titus readily undertook this journey, and departed immediately, (2 Cor. vii. 3, 16, 17,) carrying with him Paul's second letter to the Corinthians. Titus was made bishop of Crete about A. D. 63, when Paul was obliged to leave that island, to take care of other churches. The following year he wrote to him to desire as he should have sent Tychicus, or Attily his place in Crete, Titus would consider Nicopolis in Macedonia, (or to Nicopolis on the gulf of Ammaon,) where the apostle was to pass winter, Tit. iii. 12.

Titus was deputed to preach the gospel; and he was there A. D. 65, when he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, 2. He afterwards returned to Crete, where he propagated the gospel in the neighborhood, and died, A.D. 94.

The subject of the Epistle to Titus, is the qualities that should characterize church officers. As a principal function of Titus in the church was to ordain bishops and deacons, it was incumbent on him to make a discreet choice. He also directs the advice and instructions of the apostle, give to all sorts of persons; to the aged, to women; to young people of either sex; to servants. He exhorts him to exercise authority over the Cretans, and to reprove them sharply, on account of their lying, idleness, and as such, to those who are pure. In mind of imparting the faithful to be strong in the temporal power to avoid disputes, quarrels; to engage in honest callings; and to be a company ofheroes, after the first and second. It is supposed by many, from the contents of the Epistle, that the Epistle to Titus was written at a great time. See under Paul.

TOB, a country beyond Jordan, in the extreme part of the portion of Manasseh. The situation of it appears to be in Judg. xi. 3, where Jephthah fled into the land of Tob to fetch them, and use 5. This is to be the same as Ish-Tob, 2 Sam. also read of this country apparently 1 where the family of Jezreel to Judah's complaining of the hand of the Ammonites this city under the name of Thadhah probably have been written Thubab. R. ben Laysays, the Tob, which Jephthah was afterwards called Susita; in the country of the Jezreel-people. It is a city hippo, when the Jews and Gentiles.

TOBIAH, an Ammonite, and an enemy of the Israelites, who strenuously opposed the return of the temple buildings, after the return from Babylon. (Zach. ib. 3, 13. x. 1, 13, 14.) He is called in some parts, or slave of Nebuchadnezzar; probably originally of servile condition. How came of great consideration among the people; he was governor, with Sandalki, the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, Jew of Jerusalem, and had a powerful city itself. Neh. vi. 18. Nebuchadnezzar being return to Babylon, after he had repaired Jerusalem, Tobiah took this opportunity to dwell at Jerusalem; and even obtained of Elisahiah, who had the care of the house of the Lord, an apartment in the temple. But Nehemiah returning from Babylon, some years after, drove Tobiah away, and threw his goods out of the holy place, Neh. xiii. 4—8. So the subject of Tobiah is further mentioned of Tobiah: he probably retired to Samaria at Samaria.

I. TOBIJAH, a Levite and doctor of the law, sent by king Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah, to instruct the people. 2 Chron. xvi. 8.

II. TOBIJAH. The Lord commanded the prophet Zachariah (vi. 10, 14.) to ask of Tobiah, Helcias, Judahiah and Josiah, son of Zephaniah, lately returned from Babylon, a certain quantity of gold and silver, which they intended for an offering to the temple, to make crowns thereof, to place on the head of Joshua, son of Jehoshadah, high-priest of the Jews. The rabbins are of opinion, that these four persons were the same as Daniel, Ananias, Azariah and Misael.

TORGARMAH, the third son of Gomer, (Gen. xiii.) is thought by Josephus and Jerome to have been the father of the Phrygians; but the majority of learned men are for Cappadocia or Armenia. Ezekiel says, (xxii. 14.) "This is the house of Torgarman in the land of Tyrus, with horses and horsemen and mules:" which agrees very well with Cappadocia.

TOI, king of Hamath, in Syria, who, when he heard that David conquered king Hadadezer, sent his son Joram to congratulate him, and to offer him vessels of gold and silver. 2 Chron. xvii. 9—11.

I. TOLA, the tenth judge of Israel, succeeded Abimelech, and judged Israel 23 years; from A. M. 2772 to 2795. Scripture says, Tola was the son of Puah, uncle to Abimelech, by the father's side, and consequently brother to Gideon; yet Tola was of the tribe of Issachar, and Gideon of Manasseh. (See ADOPTRON.) He was buried at Shamir, a city in the mountain of Ephraim, where he dwelt, and was succeeded by Jerboam.

II. TOLA, the eldest son of Issachar, and chief of a family. Gen. xvi. 13; Numb. xxvi. 23.

TOLAD, a city of Judah, (1 Chron. iv. 29.) yielded to Simeon. Probably the Tolaad of Josh. xv. 30; xix. 4.

TOMB, see SEPULCHRE.

TONGUE is taken in different senses: (1.) For the organ of speech.—(2.) For the language spoken in any country. —(3.) For discourse: thus we say, a bad tongue, a soft tongue, etc.

To gnaw one's tongue is a sign of fury, despair and torment. The worshippers of the beast "gnawed their tongues for pain; and blasphemed the God of heaven, because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds." Rev. xvi. 10.

Tongue of the sea.—Tongues of land—are terms used in Scripture for an extremity or point of a sea. Or a peninsula, a cape, a promontory of land, having the sea on both sides.

The wise man says, (Eccles. xxvi. 6.) that a jealous woman is a scourge of the tongue. In families where polygamy was frequent, jealousy among women was the foundation of a great number of evil discourses and backbittings. The same author says, (Eccles. xxvii. 17, 18.) "The stroke of the whip maketh marks in the flesh, but the stroke of the tongue breaketh the bone. Many have fallen by the edge of the sword; but not so many as have fallen by the tongue." And Job says, (v. 21.) "God shall defend you from the lash of the tongue; shall not be exposed to its strokes. The gift of tongues with which God endowed the apostles and disciples assembled at Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii.) was communicated to the faithful, as appears by the Epistles of Paul, which regulate the manner in which this great privilege was to be used in their assemblies; (1 Cor. xii. 10; xiv. 2.) and it continued in the church to be used, when necessary, for the conversion of heathens, and the confirmation of believers. Irenæus testifies, (lib. v. cap. 6.) that it subsisted in the church in his time.

When Paul says, that though he should speak with the tongue of men and of angels, it would be nothing without charity, he uses a supposed hyperbole; as when we say, angelical beauty, angelical voice, &c. e. g. "I would have every one set a due value on the gift of tongues; but though a man possessed the most exquisite eloquence, this inestimable gift would be of little use to him, as to salvation, if he be without charity."

TOPAZ. The Heb. תֹּפֶז, Topher, (Exod. xxviii. 17; xxxii. 10; Job xxviii. 19; Ezek. xxviii. 13.) is translated in most of the ancient versions, they used in modern times, is supposed to be the same as the chrysolite.

TOPHET, a place near Jerusalem, in the valley of the children of Hinnom. It is said that a continual fire was kept here for burnt offerings, and other sacrifices, which were thrown in the pit, both from the city. Isaiah (xxix. 33.) seems to allude to the custom of burning dead carcasses in Tophet: when speaking of the defeat of the army of Sennacherib, he says, "For Tophet is ordained of old; yea, for the king of glory it is prepared; he shall make it deep and large. The pit thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it." Hence some think the name of Tophet was given to the valley of Hinnom, because of the sacrifices offered there to the god Moloch, by beat of drum, to drown the cries of the consuming children. In Hebrew a drum is called topah. See GENNETH.

Jeremiah (vii. 31.) upbraids the Israelites with having built temples to Moloch: "The high places of Topheth, which is in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire." We learn from the same prophet that Tophet was a polluted and unclean place, where they threw the carcasses to which they refused burial, chap. vii. 32; xii. 11—13. King Josiah defiled the place of Tophet, where the temple of Moloch stood, that nobody might go thither any more, to sacrifice their children to that cruel deity. 2 Kings xxiii. 10.

TORTOISE, (Lev. xi. 29.) a class of animals strongly allied to the reptile kinds. The Hebrew word, however, does not signify a tortoise, but a lizard, called in Arabic tmtn.

TRACHONITIS, rocky, or rugged, a province between Palantine and Syria, having Arabia Deserta east, Batanea west, Iduma south, and the country of Damascus north. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7.) says, it is situated between Palestine and Coelo-Syria, and was peopled by Hush, or Cush, a son of Aram. Of this province Herod Philip was tetrarch, Luke iii. 1.

TRADITION, a sentiment or custom not written, but delivered down by succession. The Jews had numerous traditions, which they did not commit to writing, before their wars against the Romans, under Adrian and Severus. Then rabbi Judah, the Holy, composed the Mishnah, that is, the second law; which is the most ancient collection of Jewish traditions. To this were added the Gemara of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon, which, together with the Mishnah, form TRE.

The Talmud of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon. (See TALMUD.) Our Saviour often censured the false traditions of the Pharisees; and reproached them with preferring these to the law itself, Mark vii. 7, &c. Matt. xv. 2, 3, seq. He gives several instances of their superstitions adherence to vain observances, while they neglected essential things.

The Christians also had traditions, which they received from Christ, or his apostles. Paul (2 Thess. ii. 15,) says, "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle." The ancient fathers acknowledged the truth and authority of the apostolic traditions; but they have not pretended that we must blindly receive as apostolical traditions all that may be put upon us as such.

TRANSMIGRATION. After our Saviour had inquired of his disciples what men thought of him, and what they themselves thought, Peter answered, that he was the Son of the living God. Jesus then began to speak of his passion, as at hand, (Matt. xxvi. 28,) adding, "Verify I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Six days after this promise, (Matt. xxvii. 1, says six days; but Luke ix. 28, mentions eight days;) probably because he could not, or did not, reckon the day of the promise, and the day of the execution of that promise; whereas the other evangelist regarded only the six intermediate days. One evangelist also says, about eight days, the other, after six days. Jesus took Peter, James, and John his brother, and brought them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light; and behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him. The subject of his expected suffering and death at Jerusalem. The chief design of the Son of God in this transfiguration, according to the fathers, to fulfill his promise made a few days before, that he would let some of his disciples see a glimpse of his glory before his death, and to fortify them against the salami of the cross, by giving them this consoling proof that he was the Messiah. It is observed, with great reason, that the elevation in which Christ appeared among men, the splendor of his robe, his divinity, were manifest, in this transfiguration itself; in which, he showed himself in the raiment of his glory, his true and natural condition.

It is probable, too, that being well aware of the sufferings which awaited him at Jerusalem, Jesus gave the disciples warning of these events. It was referred by this manifestation, and by the encouragement resulting from a view of the glory that should follow his crucifixion. Hence his discourse is not expressed by the usual term for dark, but by the term implying a deliverance from suffering, with an admission into a state of lightness; as the Israelites were received, by their victory, from the bondage of Egypt, and conducted into Canaan, the land of rest from their labors and wanderings. It is the opinion of many interpreters, that this transfiguration occurred upon Mount Tabor; but this opinion is attended with difficulties.

The fathers observe in this manifestation, that the law, represented by Moses, and the prophets, represented by Elias, gave testimony to our Saviour.

TREASURE, any thing collected together, in stores. So a treasure of corn, of wine, of oil; treasures of gold, silver, brass; treasures of coined money. Snow, winds, hail, rain, waters, are in the treasures of God, Ps. xcvii. 7; Jer. li. 16. W. treasure of good works, treasures of in up treasure in heaven, to bring forth out of the treasures of the heart. Hebrews treasure-cities, or magazines, Exodus. i. 11. treasures is linen, who express any thing in abundance; (Col. ii. 3.) In Jesus Christ all the treasures of wisdom and knowle wise man says, that wisdom contains in understanding, the knowledge of religion (Rom. xi. 3) speaks of heapsing up treasures against the day of wrath; and the prophets (iii. 10) they treasure up iniquity, they lay as it were in a store-house, which will be thousand calamities. The treasures of iniquity. (Prov. x. 2) express ill-gotten treasure of iniquity, says the wise man, all bring no profit; and, in the same song calls the riches of iniquity, maimonum of those, an estate wickedly acquired. Luke 12. (1) Gospel faith is the treasure of the just man, says, (2 Cor. iv. 7.) "We have this treasure vessel." Isaiah says of a good man, "The fear of the Lord is his treasure." (Prov. once, a kind of ditch, cut into the purpose of receiving and draining the adjacent parts. Something of this kind trench cut by the prophet Elijah, to contain which he ordered to he poured on his Kings xvii. 1, which when filled with water, was entirely exhausted, evi fire of the Lord, which consumed the TRENCHES is also a military term, one description of the approaches to a fort were trench-cuttings, which assisted close the besieged, and to secure the easier attacks from them. Trenches could not rock; and it is probable, that when our Lord entered Jerusalem, Luke xix. 29. "They made the trench about thee," an exulting, they shall call me blessed. He foretold what the nation should do, from the nature of the case what they considered as impossible; ye dence of God has so ordered it, that we to that fact, in which his soldiers, they surrounded Jerusalem wall in the space of three days, although opinion had pronounced it impossible. I denial prevented any escape from them he deferred from all attempts at retrieving it into it.

Such being the nature of trenches, our tranquillizers have used this word into Sun. xxxii. 3: "Saun was sleeping within A trench demanded too much labor, ev in an operation, to be cut round every camp lodged for a night. The trench hints at a circle, or ring, of cattles; an interpreter of the word. It seems, however, that it means a circular enclosure, or a which stood the tent of Saul; or a tent which surrounded the royal tent, as Mr. 1 poses. Mr. Taylor thinks, however, description given of the tent of Nadab Shab mean a circular screen, with passages, which, surrounding the royal tent, kept off all persons but those to whom the guards gave regular admission. This screen might be of canvas, or of any other substance, like the tent itself.

TRIBUNAL is an offence committed, a hurt, or wrong done to a neighbor; and partakes of the nature of an error, or slip, rather than of deliberate or gross sin. Under the law, the delinquent who had trespassed was of course bound to make satisfaction; but an offering or obligation was allowed him, to reconcile himself to the Divine Governor, Lev. v. 6, 15. It deserves notice, that whoever does not forgive the trespasses of a fellow man against himself, is not to expect that his Father in heaven will forgive his trespasses; if he will not forgive smaller, inadvertent, non-intentional offences, but harbors a bitter, revengeful disposition, how should he propitiate God when God withholds forgiveness for his lesser crimes; and moreover, charges him with accumulated guilt by great transgressions? May this thought promote a forgiving spirit, a spirit of reconciliation and mutual charity between neighbors and friends!

TRIBE. Jacob having twelve sons, who were heads of so many families, which together formed a great nation, each of these families was called a tribe. But this patriarch on his death-bed adopted Ephraim and Manasseh, the two sons of Joseph, and would have them also to constitute two tribes in Israel, Gen. xlix. 8. Instead of twelve tribes, there were now thirteen, that of Joseph being two. However, in the distribution of lands by Joshua, under the order of God, they reckoned but twelve tribes, and made but twelve lots. For the tribe of Levi, being appointed to the sacred service, had no share in the distribution of the land; but received certain cities to dwell in, with the first fruits, tithes and oblations of the people.

The twelve tribes, while in the desert, encamped round the tabernacle of the covenant each in due order. To the east were Judah, Zebulun and Issachar: to the west Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin; to the south Reuben, Simeon and Gad: and to the north Dan, Asher and Naphtali. The Levites were distributed round about the tabernacle, nearer to the hair of the earth than the other tribes; so that Moses and Aaron, with their families, were to the east, Gershon to the west, Kohath to the south, and Merari to the north.

The marches of Israel, the twelve tribes were divided into four great bodies. The first body, in front of the army, included Judah, Issachar and Zebulun: the second was composed of Reuben, Simeon and Gad. Between the second and third body of troops came the Levites and priests, with the ark of the Lord, and the furniture of the tabernacle. The third body was composed of Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin; and the fourth, which brought up the rear, was Dan, Asher and Naphtali.

In the division made by Joshua of the land of Canaan, Reuben, Gad and half of Manasseh, had their lot beyond Jordan, east; all the other tribes, and the remaining half of Manasseh, had their distribution on this side the river, west. See CANAAN.

TRIBULATION expresses in our version much the same as trouble, or trial; importing afflictive dis-TROGILLIUM, the name of a town and promon-tory of Ionia, in Asia Minor, between Ephesus and the mouth of the river Meander, opposite to Samos. The promontory is a spur of mount Mycale, Acts xx. 15.

TROPHimus, a disciple of Paul, a Gentile by religion, and an Ephesian by birth, came to Corinth with the apostle, and accompanied him in his whole journey to Jerusalem, A. D. 56, Acts xx. 4. When the apostle was in the temple there, the Jews had hold of him, crying out, "He hath brought Greeks into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place," because having seen him in the city, accompanied by Trophimus, they imagined that he had introduced him into the temple. It is probable that Trophimus followed Paul to Rome, and attended him while in bonds; and it is also related, that after the apostle had obtained his liberty, he went into Spain, and passing through Gaul, left Trophimus at Aries, as bishop. This, however, as Calvin remarks, is very difficult to reconcile with what Paul writes to Timothy, (2 Tim. iv. 20.) that he left him sick at Mileten. Trophimus must then necessarily have returned to Asia, about a year after Paul had thus left him at Aries. He realized any special good, he had done, as a faithful, true, fulfilling the desires, or advantage, of those who confided in him.

TRUMPET. The Lord commanded Moses to make two trumpets of beaten silver, for the purpose of calling the people together when they were to decamp, Num. x. They chiefly used these trumpets, however, to proclaim the beginning of the civil year, the beginning of the sabbatical year, (Lev. xxii. 21; Num. xxix. 1) and the beginning of the jubilee, Lev. xxv. 9, 10. Josephus says, that they were near a cubit long, and that their tube or pipe was of the thickness of a common flute. Their mouths were no wider than just admitted to blow into them, and their ends were like those of a modern trumpet. There were originally but two in the camp, though afterwards they made a great number. In the time of Josiah there were seven, (Josh. iii. 4,) and at the dedication of the temple of Solomon there were 120 priests that sounded trumpets, 2 Chron. v. 12.

In the sacred trumpets of the temple, whose use was restricted to the priests, even in war and in battle, there were others used by the Hebrew generals, Judg. iii. 27. Elisha sounded the trumpet to assemble Israel against the Moabites, whose king, Eglon, he had lately slain. Gideon took a trumpet in his hand, and gave each of his people one, when he assaulted the Midianites, Judg. vi. 10. Joshua sounded the trumpet as a signal of retreat to his soldiers, in the battle against Amor, (2 Sam. ii. 28,) in that against Ai, Jerousalem, (2 Sam. viii. 16.) and in the pursuit of Sihon, son of Hitin, (2 Sam. xx. 22.)

TRUMPEI. The feast of trumpets was kept on the first day of the seventh month of the sabbatical year, which was the first of the civil year, called Tisz. The beginning of the year was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, (Lev. xxiii. 24; Num. xxvi.) and the day was kept solemn; all servile business being forbidden. A solemn holocaust was offered in the name of the whole nation, of a rite, two rams, and seven lambs of the same year, with offerings of flour and wine, as usual with those sacrifices. Scripture does not mention the occasion of appointing this feast. The rabbins say, it was in remembrance of the deliverance of Israel by the substitution of a ram.

TRUTH is that accurate correspondence of what is related of a subject, or of what is expected from it, which fully justifies the relation; or, it is the precise conformity of a description, an assertion, a proposition, &c. to its subject. In Scripture in insanity, God is truth; that is, in his deception, perverseness, &c. Jesus truth, the true way to God, the true image, character of the Father; the truth of God, the Spirit of truth, who communica; maintains the truth in believers, the truth; and who hates and punishes lies, even to the death of the transgressors; John xiv. 6, 17; Acts v. 3, &c. Certain truth, speak the truth, practise truth are careful that their words, actions correspond with what is correct, acc. right.

Truth, as a substance, is opposed to sentations, as shadows; the law was gi but the grace and the truth—the real blesses came by Jesus Christ.

Every man should speak truth to that is, honestly, sincerely, with inte on the part of God, is often united with mercy, goodness, &c. because fidelity being one great branch of truth, and goodness &c. being implied in the divine promi TRYPHAEN, and TRYPHOSAN, men, whom Paul mentions in Rom., whom much mention is made in the Talmud.

TRYPHON, a king of Syria, who holds the British, and is the leader of the Syrian and Alexandrian Phalans. He was called Tyras, and he assumed the name of Alexander. Varus, Nicander, and placed Antiochus on the Syrian throne. (2 Macc. ii.)

TRULY, fifth son of Japheth, who united with Mesopotamia, under his rule. It was peopled countries bordering on each other, and this chart is very copious to prove, that by the Tulaeis were intended the Muscovites or Cossacks.

TRURL-CM, son of Lachem the of Zizeh the of Zizeh, G. iv. 24. Scripture calle it the land of Ireland, that is, that was the country of the ancient, and of making all kind. It has been thought that he gave or Asch of the earth.

TURTLE-Dove, or Turtle, often mentioned in Scripture, and which might offer in sacrifice. It was app of the poor, who could not afford to sacrifice, (Josh. xxiv. 22.)

Before the law, (Gen. xxv. 9.) Abraham which were a turtle and a pigeon; and when he divided the other victims he left the birds entire. See Dove.

Jeremiah (viii. 7.) speaks of the turtle as a bird of passage: "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, and the time of their coming.

TYCHICUS, a disciple employed by the apostle Paul to carry his letters to several churches. He was of the province of Asia, and accompanied Paul in his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, Acts xx. 4. He carried the Epistle to the Colossians, that to the Ephesians, and the first to Timothy. The apostle calls him his dear brother, a faithful minister of the Lord, and his companion in the service of God, (Eph. vi. 21, 22; Col. iv. 7, 8;) and had intentions of sending him to Rome, as he desired to be there and dwell, Titus, Tit. iii. 12. It is thought also, that he was sent to Ephesus, while Timothy was at Rome, when he carried a letter to the Ephesians from this apostle. The Greeks make him one of the seventy, and bishop of Colophon, in the province of Asia.

TYPE is a Greek word which generally signifies a resemblance, however it may be produced. Thus, (Acts vii. 44.) Moses was to make the tabernacle according to the type, model, or exemplar, he had seen in the mountain. The same word is used in reference to the copy of the letter sent from Claudius Lyssias to Felix, (Acts xxiii. 25.) and also concerning the form of doctrine into which believers were inducted, and, as it were, pressed as clay is pressed into the mould, the impression, form, or resemblance of which it exactly takes. (Comp. 1 Cor. x. 6, 17; Phil. iii. 17, et al.)

A type is however more usually considered as an example, pattern, or general similarity to a person, event, or thing, the residence of God in this it figures from a representation, memorial, or commemoration of an event which is past. For instance, the ceremony of the passover among the Jews, with its bitter herbs, its lamb slain, &c. was a commemoration, or memorial representation of their liberty and originally transacted at their exodus from Egypt. The same may be said of their dwelling in booths, and the opinion may be justified, which considers sacrifices themselves as commemorative. Being ordained for that purpose, in that they, perpetually revived in Adam, and in his posterity, the recollection of his first gift, and of the victim which died instead of himself, on that occasion.

In the nature of commemorative ordinances, Jews and Gentiles are equally eligible; but it is the more that many, or most, if not all, the sacred institutions among the Jews were prefigurative hints, or notices of what was to happen under a more perfect dispensation. Hence a sacrifice, the blood of which was shed before the ark, or other symbolical presence of God, prefigured a more noble, more dignified blood, which should be shed before God at some future time; that as such blood was shed to reconcile man and God, to mediate between those otherwise distant parties, so the nobler blood should mediate, with their unlimited success, in restoring unity between God and man. They say also, that the dwelling in tabernacles, or booths, prefigured the appearance of a great personage, whose residence in human nature was to him but a mere temporary humble dwelling; as much below his true dignity as a slight booth or hut is below the dignity of a palace. In like manner the passover lamb was a victim which exempted from evil, while it also prefigured a nobler deliverance (and deliverance from divine wrath and anger, than could possibly be accomplished in the exemption of Israel from the stroke of the destroying angel which smote the first-born of the Egyptians; a nobler deliverance from the moral tyranny of sin than that of the Israelites was from the oppressive dominion of Pharaoh, which deliverance is accomplished by the blood of the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world.

Types differ from signs, in that signs were occasional, and usually pointed to a time, but little distant, in the first place; though ultimately to a much more distant event, of whose accomplishment the accomplishment of the sign was a token, an earnest, and in some sense a proof; as it manifested a divine interposition on the subject to which the sign related. So when Ezekiel, at a great distance from Jerusalem, brought out his hand, and did some work, he signified the fate of Jerusalem; so, when Isaiah was ordered to beget a son by a young woman, then a virgin, this being accomplished, was a sign of a much greater birth to be expected in the person of Emmeneel, to whom the prophet expressly directs the ultimate reference.

If this be correct, what should prevent types also from looking forward? If it pleased God to encourage the hope and faith of his people by occasional signs, why not also by lasting types? Why not the same ideas be conveyed every day, every year, on public occasions, as incidentally, only, in a less conspicuous manner? Nevertheless, that may be true of public services under a general idea, which it would be imprudent and unadvisable to apply to every minute circumstance attending them. E. g. The holy of holies in the Jewish temple might be emblematic of heaven, the situs or residence of God; consider whatever may, at any rate, and by any construction, bear a reference to the holy of holies, as therefore assimilated to a correspondent antitype in heaven. The wit and ingenuity of many of those references, which once occupied some of our early fathers, may be admirable, but admiration differs from approbation. Though we read that the bellies of the pillars in Solomon's temple were decorated with lily work, it is by no means certain that "the typical meaning was, that after their death the pillars of the gospel church, and lilies being emblems of the care of Providence, therefore gospel ministers should leave to Providence the care of their bellies." Whatever may be thought of the doctrine, it is far more easy to transpose it from ancient times to our present day. Whether the history which happened in ancient times were designed to instruct us or to serve as a pattern for future events, it is not easy to determine: but it is likely (1.) that such histories are recorded (being selected from among many occurrences) as might be useful lessons to succeeding ages: (2.) that there being a general conformity in the dispensations of providence and grace, to different persons, and in different ages, instances of former dispensations may usefully be held up to the view of later times, and may encourage, check, direct, or control, those placed in circumstances similar to what is recorded, though their times and their places may be widely separated. We have New Testament authority for this.

Types may be considered as possessing different degrees of that clearness which determines their reference to their antitype. Some may be evident, and palpable; others more obscure: some may be referable in a general or leading sense, or under some particular view; but, if only that general (or that particular) view were originally designed, it is not for us to particularize every division, every particular or its probable ramifications seen under every aspect, and tinged with every hue which the multiplication glass of a fertile imagination may offer, or may induce us to admire.

The Jewish literati delighted in the studies and the application of learning derived from the types: they even thought certain letters, and their positions, to be of the nature of types; and hence arose their Cabala. But the fallacy of this mode of instruction as to any reliance to be placed on it, appears from considering that scarcely any two commentators agree in their explanations and inferences, when such principles are the basis of their remarks.

Types should be referred from a lesser to a greater, as from the death of a beast to the death of a man; from a lower to a higher, as from earth to heaven; from time present to futurity, as from this world to the eternal state; from lesser degrees of perfection to more absolute, as from man to God. If the sacrifice of a lamb availed officially to restore peace, or to conciliate favor, that of a person in whom dwelt the fulness of Divinity, must be infinitely more available to mediate reconciliation: if pardon and exemption from punishment in this world be desirable, justification and deliverance from eternal misery is infinitely more desirable: if the tender feelings of a father in this unequal state, and amidst all the imperfections of the social principle, be powerful, how much more those of the great Father of all, the Father of our spirits! Whatever is divine is infinitely more capable of comprehension, however urged by the most vehement imagination; under this reflection, types may be useful by offering similitudes adapted to our powers; but when that which is perfect is come, that which is imperfect shall be done away. (On the general subject of types, see the Bibl. Repos. vol. i. p. 183.)

TYRANNUÆ. We read, Acts xix. 9, that Paul, at Ephesus, withdrew from the synagogue, but taught every day in the school of one Tyrannus, who is generally thought to have been a converted Gentile.

TYRE, a famous city of Phoenicia, allotted to the tribe of Asher, with other maritime cities of the same coast; (Josh. xix. 29;) but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Yet by very learned men, it is said, in his time Tyre was not built; and that Strong Tyre——well-fortified Tyre——Tyre the Great, is not the city of Tyre. Isaiah, it is said, (xxxi. 12;) calls Sidon the daughter of Tyre, that is, a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus says, Tyre was built not above 240 years before the temple of Solomon; which would be 200 years after Joshua. That there was such a city as Tyre, however, in the days of Homer, is quite certain, seeing, that in the reign of Solomon, there was a king of Tyre; and we apprehend that the Scripture text will be held a sufficient proof of its having had an existence before the land of Canaan was conquered by the Israelites. Nor is Josephus's chronology so accurate as to render his authority on such a point very important. There was Insul Tyre, and Tyrins on the continent, or Pale Tyrus; and it is supposed by some learned writers, that the island was not inhabited till after the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. But this supposition is not merely at variance with the doubtful authority of Josephus, but is scarcely reconcilable with the language of the prophets Isaiah and Ezek. both seem to speak of Tyre as an isle. xxxii. 2, 6; Ezek. xvi. 17; xxvii. 3; 2 Kings iv. 11; and Nebuchadnezzar would not have destroyed the island were it altogether neglected time people. The coast would, indeed, be fortified, and the fortified city mentioned in the Joshua was in all probability on the coast as the commercial importance and wealth increased, the island would naturally be and it must have been considered as the greatest security. Volney supposes that it retired to their isle when compelled to adorn ancient city of Nebuchadnezzar, and the time the death of water had prevented it much built up. Certain it is, that when Nebuchadnezzar took the city, he found it elaborated as to afford him no compensating labor. (See Ezek. xxxi. 18, 19.) The city was, at all events, on the main land, and the denunciations of ultimate ruin strictly apply. It never rose from its overthrow by the conqueror, and the Macedonian conquest which then followed, but by the Cilicians, the influence of Insul Tyre were for the time though it afterwards recovered from this invasion.

Ancient Tyre, then, probably consisted of a fortified city, which commanded a considerable on the coast, and of the port which was the sea.
not rebuilt till the same number of years after the return of the Jews from Babylon. Old Tyre, the continental city, remained, however, in ruins up to the period of the Macedonian invasion. Insular Tyre had then risen to be a city of very considerable wealth and political power, and by sea her fleets were triumphant. It was the rebellious (Ezek. xxv. 12, 19) of old Tyre, thirty furlongs off, that supplied materials for the gigantic mole constructed by Alexander, of 200 feet in breadth, extending all the way from the continent to the island, a distance of three quarters of a mile. The sea that formerly separated them, was shallow near the shore, but towards the island, it is said to have been three fathoms in depth. The causeway has probably been enlarged by the sand blown up by the sea, which now covers the surface of the isthmus. Tyre was taken by the Macedonian conqueror, after a siege of eight months, B. C. 332, two hundred and forty-one years after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, and consequently about one hundred and seventy after it had been rebuilt.

Though now subdued, it was not, however, totally destroyed, since only thirty years afterwards it was an object of contention to Alexander's successors. The fleet of Antigonus invested and blockaded it for thirteen months, at the expiration of which it was surrendered under promise, and received a garrison of his troops for its defence. About three years after it was invested by Ptolemy, in person, and owing to a mutiny in the garrison, fell into his hands. Its history is now identified with that of Syria. In the apostolic age it seems to have gained some measure of its ancient character as a trading town; and Paul, in touching here, on one occasion, in his way back from Macedonia, found a number of Christian believers, with whom he spent a week; so that the gospel must have been early preached to the Tyrians. (Acts xxii. 3, 4.) Josephus, in speaking of the city of Zabulon as of admirable beauty, says that its houses were built like those in Tyre, and Sidon, and Berytus. Strabo also speaks of the loveliness and beauty of the buildings. In ecclesiastical history, it is distinguished as the first archbishopric under the patriarchate of Jerusalem. It shared the fate of the country in the Saracen invasion, in the beginning of the seventh century. It was reconquered by the Muslims in the twelfth century, and was the seat of the main of the kingdom of Jerusalem, as well as an archiepiscopal see. William of Tyre, the well-known historian, an Englishman, was the first archbishop. In 1229, it was retaken by the Saracens, the Christians, had lost it a second time. When the sultan Selim divided Syria into pashalics, Tyre, which had probably gone into decay, with the depression of commerce, was merged in the territory of Sidon. In 1768, it was taken possession of by the Mouslesseis, who repaired the port, and enclosed it on the land side, with a wall twenty feet high. The wall was standing, but the repairs had gone to ruin, at the time of Volney's visit (1794). He noticed, however, the choir of the ancient church, also mentioned by Maunrell, together with some columns of red granite, of a species unknown in Syria, which Djiezjar Pascha wanted to remove to Acre, but could find no engineers fit to accomplish it. It was at that time a miserable village: its exports consisted of a few sacks of corn and cotton, and the only merchant of which it could boast was a solitary Greek, in the service of the French factory at Sidon, who could hardly gain a livelihood. It is only within the last five-and-twenty years that it has once more begun to lift its head from the dust. (Modern Traveller, Syria, vol. i. p. 37, seq. Amer. ed.)

TYTHERES. We have nothing more ancient concerning Tythes, than what is read Gen. xiv. 30, that Abraham gave tythes to Melchizedek, king of Salem, of all the bootie he had taken in the enemy. Jacob imitated this piety of his grandfather, when he resolved to the Lord the tythes of all the substance he might acquire in Mesopotamia, Gen. xxviii. 22. Under the law, Moses ordained, "All the tythes of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the trees, is the Lord's; it is holy unto the Lord. And if a man will at all redeem sigh of his tythes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof. And concerning the tythes of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord," Lev. xxvii. 30—32.

The Pharisees in the time of Christ, to distinguish themselves by a more scrupulous observance of the law, not content with tithing the grain and fruits growing in the fields, also paid tythes of pulse and herbs growing in their gardens, which was more than the law required. Our Saviour did not censure this exactness; but he blamed their hypocrisy and pride in it, Matt. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42.

Tythes were taken from what remained after the offerings and first-fruits were paid. They brought the tythes to the Levites in the city of Jerusalem, as appears by Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8. The Levites set apart the tenth part of their tythes for the priests, (for the priests did not receive them immediately from the people,) and the Levites were not to enjoy the tythes they had received, before they had given to the priests such a part as the law assigned to them. Of the nine parts that remained to the proprieators, after the tythes was paid to the Levites, they took another tenth part, which was either sent to Jerusalem in kind, or, if that were too far, they sent the value in money, adding thereto, as the rabbins inform us, a fifth from the whole. This tenth part was applied towards celebrating the festivals in the temple; and was nearly resembled by the Agapes, or love feasts, of the first Christians. Thus Deut. xiv. 22, 23, is understood by the rabbins: "Thou shalt truly tythe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the Lord the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tythe of thy corn, of thy wine and of thy oil, and the firstlings of thy herd and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always.

Josephus also speaks of these as the fruits of their labours, which were delivered to the temple, and in the holy city, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8.

Tobit says (l. 6.) that every three years he paid punctually his tythes to strangers and proselytes. This was probably because there were neither priests nor Levites in the city where he dwelt. Moses speaks of this last kind of tythe, Deut. xiv. 26; xxvi. 12. "At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tythe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates. And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou dost." Calmet thinks this third tythe not to be different from the second kind already noticed, except that in the third year it was not brought into the temple, but was used on the spot, by every one in the city of his habitation. Therefore, properly speaking, there were only two sorts of tythes; (1.) that which was given to the Levites and priests; (2.) that which was applied to feasts of charity, either in the temple at Jerusalem, or in other cities.

Samuel tells the children of Israel, that their king would take the tenth part of their seed, and of their vineyards, and give to his officers and his servants. He will take the tenth of your sheep, and ye shall be his servants," 1 Sam. vii. 15. Yet it does not clearly appear from the history of the Jews, that they regularly paid tythe to their princes. But the manner in which Samuel expresses himself seems to insinuate, that it was looked upon as a common right among the kings of the East.

Tythes are not enforced by the New Testament. Our Saviour has commanded nothing as to the support of ministers; only, when he sent his apostles to preach in the cities of Israel, he forbade them to carry either purse, or provisions, and commanded them to enter the houses of those who were willing to receive them, and to eat what should be set before them; for, as he adds, the laborer is worthy of his hire, that is, of his maintenance, Matt. x. 10; Luke x. 7, 8. Paul also determines, that he who receives instruction, should administer some of these things to him who gives it, Gal. vi. 6.

In the infancy of the church, the ministry of the alms and oblations of believers.

lands and fixed revenues were settled on and their ministers, and people began to take a certain portion of their substance, which tythe, in imitation of that paid to the old covenant, though every one gave one twelfth, it was not binding on the sixth century; though not under the same obligations. F. P. V. Treatise of Benefices, observes, that till the ninth century, tythes were not paid nor in Africa.

UNICORN

ULAI, a river which runs by the city Shushan in Persia, on the bank of which Daniel had a famous vision, Dan. viii. 2, 16. It was the Cheopse of the Greeks, and is now called Kervah. It empties its waters into the united stream of the Euphrates and Tigris, Dan. viii. 2. (See R. K. Porter's Travels, vol. ii. p. 412.) R.

UNICORN. (Heb. ṣeynt, rema.) It is hardly necessary to remark, that the unicorn, as represented by poets and painters, has never been found in nature, and never, perhaps, had an existence but in the imagination of the one, and on the canvass of the other. [See, however, the additions at the end of this article. Indeed the whole of the article which follows might, perhaps, be more properly omitted; as it proceeds on the erroneous supposition that the animal denoted by the Hebrew word rema is the rhinoceros; and because one of the main arguments for this supposition is based upon a word not found in the Hebrew, but inserted by the English translators, as will be shown below.]

Still, as the general information here exhibited is not uninteresting, the whole may be permitted to remain; referring the reader, however, for a probably more correct view to the additions below. R.

Before we inquire what creature is denoted by the Hebrew rema, it will be well to ascertain its precise character from a careful examination of the several passages in which it is mentioned. The first allusion to it is in the reply of Balaam to Balak, when improper by the terrified king to curse the invading armies of Israel: "God brought them out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn," Numb. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8. From this it is evident, that the rema was conceived to possess very considerable power. With this idea corresponds the passage in Isaiah, where the prophet associates with him other powerful animals, to symbolize the leaders and princes of the hostile nations that were destined to desolate his country: "And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and they shall feed with blood, and their dung with fatness," chap. xxxiv. 7. From Job we learn, that he was not only an animal possessing strength, but also of a very imposing position: "Will the unicorn be willing to abide with thy threshing floor? Can any one confine him with his bands in the furrow, or will he roll the valleys after thee? Wilt thou trust him for strength, or wilt thou leave thy work to him? Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring forth seed, and gather it into thy barn?" chap. x.

Another particular we collect from Ps. lxxxix. 14; and that in an erect posture, unlike other animals: "My horn shall thou exalt like the unicorn;" while it is evident from the foliosage, that it was sometimes found with a horn of Joseph's.] But his horns are like an unicorn," Deut. xxxiii. 17. There are more passages, in which the rema is mentioned: these are Ps. xxxii. 21. and From the former we are unable to gather any information, and the latter will add to our stock: "He made them also to skip like Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn."

We are now better prepared to examine the validity of the claims that have been advanced of these animals which are supposed to be the unicorn of the Hebrew Scriptures. Let us consider them, as Mr. Bruce.

It is very remarkable, says this distinguisher, that two such animals as the elephant and the rhinoceros should have wholly escaped the detection of the sacred writers. Moses and the children were long in the neighborhood of the crown produced them both, while in Egypt The clashing of the animals into clean as seems to have led the legislator into a kim city of describing in one of the classes, an animal which made the food of the principal pagan nations in the neighborhood. Considering the long and intimate connection Solomon had with the south coast of the Red sea, it is next to impossible that he was not acquainted with them, as both David his father, and he himself, made plentiful use of ivory, as they frequently mention in their writings, which, along with gold, came from the same parts. Solomon, besides, wrote expressly on zoology, and we can scarcely suppose was ignorant of two of the principal articles of that part of the creation, inhabitants of the great continent of Asia east from him, and that of Africa on the south, with both which territories he was in constant correspondence.

There are two animals named frequently in Scripture, without naturalists being agreed what they are. The one is the behemoth, the other the reem; both mentioned as types of strength, courage and independence on man; and, as such, exempted from the ordinary lot of beasts, to be subdued by him, or reduced under his dominion. Though this is not to be taken in a literal sense,—for there is no animal without the fear or beyond the reach of the power of man,—we are to understand it of animals possessed of strength and size so superlative, as that in these qualities other beasts bear no proportion to them.

The behemoth Mr. Bruce takes to be the elephant, in which we differ from him: the reem he argues to be the rhinoceros, from the following considerations:

The derivation of the word, both in Hebrew and Arabic, seems to be from reem, which signifies straight. This is certainly no particular quality in the animal itself, who is not more, nor even so much, erect as many other quadrupeds, for its knees are rather crooked; but it is from the circumstance and manner in which its horn is placed. The horns of all other animals are inclined to some degree of paralleli tism with the nose, or of frontis. The horn of the rhinoceros alone is erect or perpendicular to this bone, on which it stands at right angles; thereby possessing a greater purchase or power, as a lever, than any horn could possibly have in any other position. This situation of the horn is very happily alluded to in the sacred writings: "My horn shall thou exalt like the horns of a reem," Ps. xxii. 10. And the horn here is prefixed as a symbol or figure, but was really an ornament worn by great men in the days of victory, prefersment, or rejoicing, when they were anointed with new, sweet, or fresh oil; a circumstance which David joins with that of erecting the horn.

In addition to these particulars, Mr. Bruce informs us, that the rhinoceros does not eat hay or gruss, but lives entirely upon trees; he does not spare the most thorny ones, but rather seems to be fond of them; and it is not a small branch that can escape his hunger, for he has been known to and writers to consider the unicorn as being of the deer or antelope kind, it is difficult to conceive of, since this is of a genus, whose very character is fear and weakness, very opposite, as Mr. Bruce continues, to the qualities by which the reem is described in Scripture. Besides, it is plain the reem is not of the class of clean quadrupeds; and a late traveller very whimsically takes him for the leviathan, which certainly was a fish. Balaam, a priest of Midian, and so in the neighborhood of the haunts of the rhinoceros, and intimately connected with Ethiopia, (for they themselves were shepherds of that country,) in a transport, from contemplating the strength of Israel whom he was brought to curse, says, they had it as well "the strength of the reem," Num. xxiii. 22. Job makes frequent allusion to his great strength, ferocity and inconstancy, chap. xxxix. 8, 10. He asks, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or to abide at thy crib?" That is, Will he willingly come into thy stable, and eat at thy manger? and again, "Canst thou bind the reem with a band in the furrow, and will he harrow the valleys after thee?" In other words, Canst thou make him to go in the plough or harrows?

Isaiah, (chap. xxxiv. 7,) who, of all the prophets, seems to have known Egypt and Ethiopia the best, when prophesying about the destruction of Idumes, says, that "the reem shall come down with the fat cattle: a proof that he knew his habitation was in the neighborhood. In the same manner as when foretelling the desolation of Egypt, he mentions as one manner of effecting it, the bringing down the fly from Ethiopia, to meet the cattle in the desert, and among the bushes, and destroy them there, where that insect did not ordinarily come but on command, (comp. Isa. vii. 18, 19, and Exod. viii. 22;) and where the cattle feed every year, to save themselves from that insect.

The rhinoceros in Geez is called arwe hariah, and in the Amharic, aurarias, both of which names signify the large wild beast with the horn. This would seem as if applied to the species that had but one horn. On the other hand, in the country of the Shangallia, and in Nubia adjoining, he is called girmangim, or horn upon horn, and this would seem to denote that he had two. The Ethiopic text renders the word reem, ruwe hariah, and this the Septuagint translates parassos, or unicorn.

If the Abyssinian rhinoceros had invariably two horns, it seems improbable that the Septuagint would have called him monoceros, especially as they must have seen an animal of this kind exposed at Alexandria in their time, when first mentioned in history, at an exhibition given to Ptolemy Philopatus, at his accession to the crown, before the death of his father.

The principal reason for translating the word reem, unicorn, and not rhinoceros, is from a prejudice that he must have but one horn. But this is by no means so well founded, as to be admitted as the only argument for establishing the existence of an animal, which never has appeared after the search of so many ages. Scripture, as we have seen, speaks of the horns of the unicorn; so that, even from this circumstance, the reem may be the rhinoceros, as the Asiatic and part of the African rhinoceros may be the unicorn.

In addition to these particulars, Mr. Bruce informs us, that the rhinoceros does not eat hay or gruss, but lives entirely upon trees; he does not spare the most thorny ones, but rather seems to be fond of them; and it is not a small branch that can escape his hunger, for he has been known to and writers to consider the unicorn as being of the deer or antelope kind, it is difficult to conceive of, since this is of a genus, whose very character is fear and weakness, very opposite, as Mr. Bruce continues, to the qualities by which the reem is described in Scripture. Besides, it is plain the reem is not of the class of clean quadrupeds; and a late traveller very whimsically takes him for the leviathan, which certainly was a fish. Balaam, a priest of Midian, and so in the neighborhood of the haunts of the rhinoceros, and intimately connected with Ethiopia, (for they themselves were shepherds of that country,) in a transport, from contemplating the strength of Israel whom he was brought to curse, says, they had it as well "the strength of the reem," Num. xxiii. 22. Job makes frequent allusion to his great strength, ferocity and inconstancy, chap. xxxix. 8, 10. He asks, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or to abide at thy crib?" That is, Will he willingly come into thy stable, and ease as an ox would do a root of celery. (Bruce's Travel, vol. v. p. 89—85.)

Such is the description which this intelligent writer gives of the animal which he supposes to be the rem of the sacred writers; but it is necessary that we shall notice the objections urged against this opinion.

Mr. Scott, who considers the rem to be a species of the wild bull, an animal bred in the Arabian and Syrian deserts, objects, that the rhinoceros cannot be the animal intended, because the rem is represented as having high and terrible horns; whereas, this creature possesses but one, and that a very short one, placed just over the nose. That the former part of this objection is founded in misapprehension, we have already seen; since the rem is, in one passage of Scripture at least represented as having only one horn; and that horn, as is evident from the allusion, placed in a position exactly answering to the description of this weapon of the rhinoceros, which is furnished by Mr. Bruce. Nor is the remaining part of the objection of greater weight, since the horn of the rhinoceros is by no means so contemptible a size as it represents. In the forty-second and fifty-sixth volumes of the Philosophical Transactions, Dr. Parsons has given drawings of the horns of the rhinoceros, from Dr. Mead's, and also from Sir Hans Sloane's, collections. From these delineations we ascertain, that the straight horn on a double-horned animal was twenty-five inches in length; the curved one being something shorter; and the two diameters of the bases thirteen inches. Nor were these the largest of the kind, for the doctor mentions a horn in the collection of Sir H. Sloane, which was thirty-seven inches long and another thirty-two inches; and Buffon mentions one whose length was three feet eight inches—an altitude sufficient, surely, to justify the allusions of the sacred writers.

But in addition to this, we must remark, that the wild bull, which in all its varieties is possessed of two horns, can never be identified with an animal represented as varying in these particulars: possessing sometimes one and sometimes two. The LXX, as we have shown, uniformly translate the Heb. rēm, by ἄρα, i.e. one-horned; and the controversy is equally apparent, whether they designed to describe a bull having two horns, or whether they designed the double-horned rhinoceros. But when we consider that a wild bull, having only one horn, would be contrary to the nature of the beevie kind, and, indeed, would be a monster; whereas a unicorn, or single-horned rhinoceros, would suit some passages of Scripture, and be perfectly well known to their readers; while another species of rhinoceros, having two horns, would suit other passages of Scripture, where a similar animal is meant, and this also was known to their readers;—we cannot but approve of the choice they made in preferring the rhinoceros to the aurochs, as the animal intended by the Hebrew rēm. We consider this choice and this opinion of the Egyptian translators, who certainly knew full as well as modern writers can know, the animal most likely to be described by the sacred poet, as no despisuble authority on this side of the question.

We now leave the reader to determine for himself respecting the identity of this disputed animal. To us it appears, that the arguments in favor of the rhinoceros preponderate, and that we shall not be very far from the truth, if we conclude this to be the rēm of the sacred volume.

From what has been already said, some idea may be formed of the external appearance, as dispositions of the rhinoceros. A few marks, however, may not be unacceplable.

Next to the elephant, the rhinoceros is the most powerful of animals. It is usually twelve feet long, from the tip of the nose to the tip of the tail; from six to seven feet his circumference of his body is nearly equal; it is, therefore, equal to the elephant in the reason of its appearing so much smaller than that animal is, that its legs are shorter. Words, says Goldsmith, can very confused idea of this animal's shape there are few so remarkably formed. The horn, which we have already described would have the appearance of that part of skin of the rhinoceros is naked, rough, lying upon the body in folds, in a very peculiarly, the skin, which is of a dirty brown thick as to turn the edge of a cimeter, or musket-ball.

Such is the general outline of an animal so chiefly formidable from the horn great its mouth, and formed rather for war, are propensity to engage. The elephant, the rhinoceros, are obliged to strike with their weapons; but the rhinoceros, from the robustness of his horn, employs all his force with it, so that the tiger will more willingly attack an animal of the forest than one whose strength is unapparent. Indeed, there is something in this terrible animal has to apprehend; it sees every side, by a thick, horrid hide, which if the lion or the tiger are unable to pierce, before with a weapon that even the elephant could oppose. Travellers have seen the elephant is often found dead in the fore with the horn of a rhinoceros.

The preceding arguments are the stronger indeed the only ones, which can be urged against the rhinoceros as being the rēm of the Hebrews. They are however rebutted by the fact that the rēm was obviously an animal well known to the Hebrews, being every where met with; and other animals common to the country; while the aurochs was never seen till the discovery of the coasts where it was spoken of by the sacred writers among the forests, either by Aristotelian in animals, nor by Arabian writers. The habits and life of the rhinoceros at all so described to the rēm. The promise of the latter is its horns, in respect to classed with animals that push, which is case with the rhinoceros. Besides, the horn added above for the rhinoceros, a rēm is sometimes described with one horn and four horns with more, is filthy. The truth is, in its own self is new to be horns at all, in the animal is spoken of with any all members. The expression is in the plural, Psa. xxxii. 17, "His Joseph's horns, horns of an unicorn;" Psa. xxii. 21, "The land delivered me from the horns of the in Ps. xxxii. 10, which is referred to above that the rēm is sometimes represented as one horn, the Hebrew reads simply, "My horn like an unicorn," where the word stands in the English version, is nowhere although there is undoubtedly an elision of other parallel passages, e.g. "horns in the plural, rather than w gular. (See Stuart's Heb. Gram. § 550, 4th ed.)

Thus the whole argument in question rests not on the Hebrew original, but on an interpolation of the English translators.—Indeed the supposition of the rhinoceros has been long since refuted by Bochart, to whose learned work the reader is referred. (Hieroz. Terr. i. 690, edit. 1712.)

But on the other hand, Bochart, and after him Rosenmüller and others, regard the re'em of the Hebrews as a species of antelope, the rim of the Arabs, and the oryx or leucoryx of the Greeks. The argument of most weight in Bochart's mind, seems to be the fact, that rim in Arabic, which is equivalent to re'em in Hebrew, is thus used of a species of white gazelle or antelope, (Niesbuhr, Deser. of Arab. p. xxxviii. Germ. ed.) which would seem to be very probably the leucoryx. But then, the other characteristics of these animals by no means correspond to those of the re'em, which is everywhere described as a fierce, intractable animal, acting on the offensive and attacking even men of its own accord. Now, however wild and untameable many species of antelopes may be, they are universally described as a shy and retiring animal, always flying from pursuit, and avoiding even the approach of man. In opposition to this, Bochart and Rosenmüller produce a passage of Martial, where he gives to the oryx the epithet ferox, (servus oryx, Epigr. xiii. 95.) and another from Oppian, where he says, "There is a beast, with pointed horns, familiar to the woods, the savage oryx, most terrible to other beasts" (Cynegetic. ii. 445.)

Now all these epithets and descriptions, even allowing nothing for poetical amplification, are perfectly applicable to the stag of our forests and of Asia; they imply no more than that the oryx, when hard pressed, will turn upon its pursuers, and defend himself with fury. Yet no one would hence draw the conclusion, that it was characteristic of the stag to act on the offensive; nor can such a conclusion be drawn with better reason in regard to the oryx.—The oryx of Piloy and other ancient writers is understood to be the antelope oryx of zoologists; the gazella Indica of Ray, the capra gazella of the Syst. Nat., the Egyptian antelope of Pennant, and the passas of Buffon. It is about the size of a full-grown deer, having straight, slender, and rather sharp horns, 4 to 5 feet long; the horns are about three feet long, the points sharp, and about fourteen inches in diameter; the body and sides are of a reddish ash color; the face is white, with a black spot at the base of the horns, and another on the middle of the face. It is a native of Asia and Africa.---The leucoryx, which some suppose to be the oryx of Oppian, is in general similar to the animal above described, except that the body is of a milk white color. It inhabits the neighborhood of Bassorah, on the Persian gulf.—Most obviously neither of these animals answer the description of the Hebrew re'em. The fact that the Arabs apply the word rim to this class of animals, has probably its origin in the same cause, which also leads them to apply to the race of deer and antelopes, in general, the epithet wild oxen. (See Schultens, Comm. in Job xxxix. 9.)

Other writers have supposed the re'em of the Hebrews to be the urus, bison, or wild ox, described by Caesar, which is understood to be the same animal as the American buffalo. The characteristics of this animal accord well with those attributed to the re'em; but there is no evidence that the bison existed in Palestine, or was known to the Hebrews. A more obvious supposition, therefore, is that of Schultens, De Wette, Gesenius, and others, that under the re'em we are to understand the buffalo of the eastern continent, the bos bubalus of Linnaeus, which differs from the bison or American buffalo chiefly in the shape of the horns and the absence of the dewlap. This animal is indigenous, originally, in the hotter parts of Asia and Africa, but also in Persia, Abyssinia and Egypt; and is now also naturalized in Italy and North America. As, therefore, it existed in the countries all around Palestine, there is every reason to suppose that it was also found in that country, or at least in the regions east of the Jordan and south of the Dead Sea, as Bashan and Idumea.

The oriental buffalo appears to be so closely allied to our common ox, that without an attentive examination it might be easily mistaken for a variety of that animal. In point of size it is rather superior to the ox; and upon an accurate inspection, in order to differ in the shape and magnitude of the head, the latter being larger than in the ox. But it is chiefly by the structure of the horns that the buffalo is distinguished, these being of a shape and curvature altogether different from those of the ox. The three are of gigantic size in proportion to the bulk of the animal, and of a compressed form, with a sharp exterior edge; for a considerable length from their base these horns are straight, and then bend slightly upwards; the prevailing color of them is dusky, or nearly black. The buffalo has no dewlap; his tail is small and destitute of vertebrae near the extremity; his ears are long and pointed. This animal has the appearance of uncommon strength. The bulk of his body and the mighty muscular limbs, denote his force at the first view. His aspect is ferocious and malignant; at the same time that his physiognomy is strongly marked with features of stupidity. His head is of a ponderous size; his eyes shine, and what serves to render his visage still more savage, are the tufts of frizzled hair which hang down from his cheeks and the lower part of his muzzle.

This animal, although originally a native of the hotter parts of Asia and Africa, has been artificially naturalized to the climate of the south of Europe. Mr. Pennant supposes the wild bulls of Aristotle to have been buffaloes, and Gmelin and other distinguished naturalists are of the same opinion. Gmelin also supposes that Buffon sees the same animal. Buffon, however, endeavors to show, that the buffalo of modern times was unknown to the Greeks and Romans, and that it was first transported from its native countries, the warmer regions of Africa and the Indies, where it was naturalized in Italy, not earlier than the seventh century.

The buffalo grows in some countries to an extremely large size. The buffaloes of Abyssinia grow to twice the size of our largest oxen, and are called elephant bulls. Mr. Pennant mentions a pair of buffaloes in the British Museum, which are six feet and a half long, and the hollow of which will hold five quarts. Father Lobk affirms that some of the horns of the buffaloes in Abyssinia will hold ten quarts; and Dillon saw some in India that were ten feet long. They are sometimes wrinkled, but generally smooth. The distance between the points of the two horns is usually about five feet.

Wild buffaloes occur in many parts of Africa and India, where they live in great herds. In the forests, and are regarded as excessively fierce and dangerous animals. In all these particulars they coincide with the buffaloes of America. The hunting of them is a favorite but very dangerous pursuit; the hunters never venture in any numbers to oppose these ferocious cious animals face to face; but conceal themselves in the thickets, or in the branches of the trees; whence they attack the buffaloes as they pass along.

In Egypt, as also in southern Europe, the buffalo has been partially domesticated. In Egypt especially, it is much cultivated, where, according to Sommiv, it yields plenty of excellent milk, from which butter and various kinds of cheese are made.

"The buffalo," says Sommiv, "is an acquisition of the modern Egyptians, with their ancestors were unacquainted. It was brought over from Persia [?] into their country, where the species is at present universally spread, and is very much propagated. It is even more numerous than the common ox, and is equally domesticated, though but recently domesticated; as is easily distinguishable by the constantly uniform color of the hair, and still more by a remnant of ferocity and intractability of disposition, and a wild and lowering aspect, the characteristics of all half-tamed animals. The buffaloes of Egypt, however, are not near so wild nor so much to be feared as those of other countries. They there partake of the gentleness of other domestic animals, and only retain a few sudden and occasional caprices.—They are so fond of water, that I have seen them continue in it a whole day. It often happens that the water which is fetched from the Nile, near its banks, has contracted their musky smell."

"These animals multiply more readily than the common ox; they breed in the fourth year, producing young for two years together, and remaining sterile the third; and they commonly cease breeding after their twelfth year. Their term of life is much the same as that of the common ox. They are more robust than the common ox, better capable of bearing fatigue, and, generally speaking, less liable to diseases. They are therefore employed to advantage in different kinds of labor. Buffaloes are made to draw heavy loads, and are commonly guided by means of a ring passed through the nose. In its habits the buffalo is much less cleanly than the ox, and delights to wallow in the mud. His voice is deeper, more mournful and hideous than that of the bull. The milk is said by some authors to be not so good as that of the cow, but more plentiful. Buffon, on the contrary, remarks that it is "superior to the milk of the ox.""

The skin and horns are of more value than all the rest of the animal; the latter are of a fine grain, strong, and bear a good polish, and are therefore in much esteem with cutlers and other artisans.

"Only in the country proper, when buffaloes are scarce, is the most common perhaps in a domesticated state. They are used more particularly in the Pontine marshes and those in the district of Sisera, where the total want of the climate acts unfavorably on an oxen cattle, but affects the buffaloes less. The Spaniards also have paid attention to them; and out of the cultivation of this useful animal seems to be pretty general in all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, both in Europe and Africa. Nicolas remarks, that he has buffaloes not only in Egypt, but also at Bombay, Surat, on the Cape of Good Hope, and other places in the Mediterranean, and in India, where, in almost all marshy regions and near large rivers. He says: "But they are not to be found anywhere in Arabia, where being perhaps is that country too little water for this animal."

"In the Arabian, p. 165, German, edit.

We have been thus particular in describing the buffalo of Asia, in order to show that it possesses, in its wild state, all the characteristics attributed to the Hebrew reem. All the evidence goes to show that the has been domesticated only at a very remote period; and that the Hebrews therefore by acquaintance with it only as a wild, vicious animal, resembling the ox; and it is probably often intended by them under this name, and in the preceding description to the Hebrew reem will on a closer inspection of the passages will be noticed.

In Deut. xxxiii. 17, and Ps. xcii. 10, there is his horses; which requires no fanciful interpretation after what is said above. In Num. xxvii. 8, it is said, "he hath as was the a reem;" this is certainly most appro the word strength, as the passage.

But the Hebrew word here rendered means strictly, rapidity of motion, speed, which more forwards with tremendous power. (See of major Long's expedition to the Rocky.

In three other passages, the reem is close with the common ox, or with the episcopal bull, the reem. In Deut. xxvii. 6, it is said, "He shall also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and reem;" where the young of the are parallelism with the calf, so that we really expect a great similarity between the two. And the reem is also the LXX. and Genesis, that the reem means, i.e. shall make part of this sacred bullocks, old and young, of the land that their "shall be soaked with water."

The other passage is Job xxix. 9—12, "be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy bands in the valley of the jazz will not trust him because his strength is great, a workman to him? Wilt thou believe with thy eyes, and gather the young of reem, and gather not to trust in the reem, and trust upon the reem; as a roaring and raving coming."

"Nothing is more appropriate to a wild buffalo than the and we have seen above that the Hebre taken from the sword, come from the sword, hence the power of the dog."

We have been thus particular in describing the buffalo of Asia, in order to show that it possesses, in its wild state, all the characteristics attributed to the Hebrew reem. All the evidence goes to show that the almost intestable, that the recension of verse 21 are the princes of verse 12, the bulls of Bashan, as has been already suggested above. At least we may infer that the reem was an animal not so unlike those bulls, but that it might with propriety be interchanged with these animals in other respects, we feel justified in assuming the taurus boulaios, or wild buffalo, to be the reem of the Hebrew Scriptures and the unicorn of the English version.

The principal difficulty in the way of this assumption, the fact is that the LXX have usually translated the Hebrew reem by ἄντροπον, unicorn, one-horned.
It must, however, be borne in mind, that these transla tors lived many centuries after the Hebrew Scriptures were written, and not long indeed before the birth of Christ; they lived, too, in Egypt, where it is not im possible that the buffalo had in their age begun to be domesticated. In such circumstances, and being un acquainted with the animal in his fierce and savage state, they may have thought that the allusions to the reem were not fully answered by the half-domesticated animal before them, and they may, therefore, have felt themselves at liberty to insert the name of some animal which seemed to them more appropriate.
That they did often take such liberties, is well known. An instance occurs in the very passage of Isaiah above quoted, ch. xxxiv. 7, where the Hebrew is עַרְרָם הַגֶּן, "and the bullocks with the bulls," i.
. the bulls with the strong ones, or, according to Gesenius, "the bulls both young and old." This the LXX translate, υἱὸς αἰθρίων, υἱὸς τῶν βοῶν, "and the reams (or wethers) and the bulls."—certainly a quid pro quo not less striking than that of putting unicorn for buffalo.

That the LXX, in using the word monoceros, (uni corn, one-horned) did not understand it by the rhino ceros, would seem obvious; both because the latter al ways had its appropriate and peculiar name in Greek, (i.e., rhinozeros), and again because it is matter of fact, taken from the position of its horn upon the snout; and also from the cir cumstance so much insisted on above in the extract from Mr. Bruce, that the rhinoceros of that part of Africa adjacent to Egypt actually has two horns. The two horns come from the same part of the animal, and are seen in the well-known, described by Pliny, but lost sight of by all subsequent naturalists; although imperfect hinds and accounts of a similar animal have been given by travellers in Africa and India in different centuries, and entirely independent of each other.
The interesting nature of the subject, renders it proper to exhibit here all the evidence which exists in respect to such an animal; especially as it is no where brought together in the English language, or at least in no such form as to render it generally accessible.

The figure of the unicorn, in various attitudes, is depicted, according to Niebuhr, on almost all the stair-cases found among the ruins of Persepolis.
One of these figures is given in vol. ii. plate xxiii.
of Niebuhr's Travels; and also in vol. i. p. 584, 585, of the Travels of Sir R. K. Porter. The latter traveller supposes it to be the representation of a bull with a single horn. Pliny, in speaking of the wild beasts of India, says with regard to the animal in question: Asperrimam asutem feram monoceram, re tique corpore equa similem, capite cerno, pedibus ele phantini. cauda aporo, mugitu gravi, uno corno negro media fronte cubitorum diuum eminente. Hanc feram siam negram capi. (Hist. Nat. vii. 21.) The uni corn is an extraordinary fierce and magnificent horse as to the rest of its body, but having the head like a stag, the feet like an elephant, and the tail like a wild boar: its roaring is loud; and it has a black horn of about two cubits projecting from the middle of its forehead. These seem to be the chief ancient notices of the existence of the animal in question.

In 1550, Ludovico de Bentera, a Roman patrician, travelled to Egypt, Arabia and India; and having assumed the character of a Mussulman, he was able to visit Mecca with the Hadjis, or great caravans of pilgrims.
In his account of the curiosities of this city, in the Ramu sio's Collection of Travels, (Racolta di Viaggi, Venet.
1653, p. 163) he says: "On the other side of the Caaba is a walled court, in which we saw two unicorns, which were pointed out to us as a rarity; and they are indeed truly remarkable. The larger of the two is built like a three-year-old colt, and has a horn upon the forehead about three ells long. The other uni corn was smaller, like a yearling foal, and has a horn perhaps four spans long.—This animal has the color of a yellowish-brown horse, a head like a stag, a neck not very long, with a thin mane; the legs are small and slender, like those of a hind or roe; the hoofs of the forefeet are divided, and resemble the hoofs of a goat. These two animals were sent to the sultan of Mecca, as a rarity of great value, and very seldom found, by a king of Ethiopia, who wished to secure, by this present, the good will of the sultan of Mecca.

Don Juan Gabriel, a Portuguese colonel, who lived several years in Abyssinia, assures us, that in the re region of Agamore in the Abyssinian province of Damo ta, he had seen an animal of the form and size of a middle-sized horse, of a dark chestnut-brown color, and with a whitish horn about five spans long upon the forehead; the mane and tail were long and thin;
the legs short and slender. Several other Portuguese, who were placed in confinement upon a high mountain in the district Namwa, by the Abyssinian king Adumas Saghe, related that they had seen, at the foot of the mountain, some strange animal, des cribed by Ludolf's "Ethiop. lib. i. c. 10. n. 80, seq.
Those accounts are confirmed by father Lobo, who lived for a long time as a missionary in Abyssinia.
He adds, that the unicorn is extremely shy, and evades from concealment the hunters who pursue him in the forests; for which reason there is no exact description of him. (Voyage histor. d'Abyssinie, Amst.
1728, vol. i. p. 83, 291.)
All those accounts are cer tainly not applicable to the rhinoceros; although it is singular that Mr. Bruce speaks only of the latter animal as not uncommon in Abyssinia, and makes apparent no allusion to the above accounts.

In more recent times we find further traces of the animal in question in Southern Africa. Dr. Spar mann, the Swedish naturalist, who visited the cape of Good Hope and the adjacent regions, in the years 1772-1776, gives, in his travels, the following ac count: Jacob Kock, an observing peasant on Hippo tamus river, who had travelled over the greater part of Southern Africa, found on the face of a perpendicular rock a drawing made by the Hottentots, represent ing a quadruped with one horn. The Hottentots told him, that the animal there represented was very like the horse on which he rode, but had a straight horn upon the forehead. They added, that these one horned animals were rare, that they ran with great rapidity, and were also very fierce. They also described the manner of hunting them. "It is not probable," Dr. Sparrmann remarks, "that the savages which invented this custom, and that too so very curiously and systematically: still less can we suppose, that they should have received and retained, merely from history or tradition, the remembrance of such an animal. These regions are very seldom visited: and the creature might, therefore, long remain unknown. That an animal so rare should not be better known to the modern world, proves nothing against its existence. The greater part of Africa is still among the terra incognita. Even the giraffe, which, till recently, was held to be a fable of the ancients."

A somewhat more definite account of a similar animal is contained in the Transactions of the Zoological Society of London. (Pt. xx., Middl. 1792. Proc. p. ixi.) The account was transmitted to the society in July 1791, from the cape of Good Hope, by Mr. Henry Cloet. It states that a bastard Hottentot, Gerrit Slinger by name, related, that while engaged several years before with a party in pursuit of the savage Bushmen, they had got sight of nine strange animals, which they followed on horseback, and shot one of them. This animal resembled a horse, and was of a light-gray color, with white stripes under the lower jaw. It had a single horn, directly in front, as long as one's arm, and at the base about as thick. Towards the middle the horn was somewhat flattened, but had a sharp point; it was not attached to the bone of the forehead, but fixed only in the skin. The head was like that of the horse, and the size also about the same. The hoofs were round, like those of a horse, but divided below, like those of oxen. This remarkable animal was shot between the so-called Table mountain and the Hottentots river, about sixteen days' journey on horseback from Caxembe, which would be about a month's journey in ox-wagons from Capetown. Mr. Cloet mentions, that several different nattives and Hottentots testify to the existence of a similar animal with one horn, of which they profess to have seen drawings by hundreds, made by the Bushmen on rocks and stones. He supposes that it would not be difficult to obtain one of these animals, if desired. His letter is dated at the Cape, April 8, 1791. (See also T. J. A. von Hohenemser, "A tour in" Leips. 1812.)

Such appear to have been the latest accounts of the animal in question, when it was again suddenly brought into notice, as existing in the Central Provinces of Central India. The Quarterly Review for Oct. 1820, (vol. xxiv. p. 136) in a notice of Frazier's tour through the Himalaya mountains, goes on to remark as follows: "We have no doubt that a little time will bring to light many objects of natural history peculiar to the elevated regions of Central Asia, and hitherto unknown in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, particularly in the two former. This is an opinion which we have long entertained: but we are led to the expression of it on the present occasion, by having been favored with the perusal of a most interesting communication from Major Latter, commanding in the migh of Sikhim's territories, in the billy country east of Nepal, addressed to adjutant-general Nicol, and transmitted by him to the marquis of Hastings. This important paper explicitly states that the unicorn, so long considered as a fabulous animal, actually exists at this moment in the interior, where it is well known to the inhabitants—"we copy from the major's letter—"is a real animal, and it may be necessary to mention it to the world. In a manuscript, containing the names of different animals which I procured the other day from the hillmen, two of the head of those whose divided: it is called the one-horned brah, inquiring what kind of animal it was, to which the person, who brought the manuscript exactly the unicorn of the ancients that it was a native of the interior of Thibet, the size of a horse, with twelve hands high, and exceedingly wild; ever, caught alive, but frequently shot; and flesh was used for food."—"The person," adds, who gave me this information, has seen these animals, and eaten the flesh. They go together in herds, like our wild cattle, and are very frequently to be met with in the great desert, about a month's journey from Lassa, in that part of the country inhabited by wandering Tartars." The description is accompanied by a drawing made by the messenger from recoll, bears some resemblance to a horse, but has, a long curved horn growing out of the head, and a huge-shaped tail, like that of it's living model. From his description, as well as from the rest of the description and it cannot be the rhinoceros, which animal; besides major Latter states Thibetian manuscripts, the rhinoceros is under the name of serra, and chased with plant: (neither, says he, is it the wild known in Thibet,) for that has also a different and is chased in the manuscript with it which have the hounds. I have the subject, to the Sikkim Lama, request procure me a perfect skin of the animal head, horn, and hoofs, but it will be a little more I can get it down, for they are not with nearer than a month's journey long. As a sequel to this account, we find the paragraph in the Calcutta Government Gazette, 21st: "Major Latter has obtained a young unicorn from the Sikkim Lama now before us. It is twenty inches in length, it is four inches and a half in diameter, and at the tips to a point: it is black, rather flat, and has fifteen rings, but they are only one side: it is nearly straight. Major L. to obtain the skin of the animal with the skin, very shortly, which will afford proof of the form and character of the horse-like animal, unicorn."

Such are the latest accounts which have of this animal; and although their credibility will be contested, and the anecdote description with that of Pliny is so striking, that in the lapse of more than two thousand years, it should have been heard so interesting. But whatever may be the existence of this animal, the adoption of the Hebrews, as the LXX, as being the Hebrews, is very notable. It is so very recent; but for the reasons already adduced; and from the circumstance, that is evidently an animal frequent and well known in the countries where the scenes of the Bible while the unicorn, at all events, is and was an animal of exceeding rarity.

In the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and the birth-place of Abraham, (Gen. xii. 20.) but its precise situation is unknown. [It is called 'Ur of the Chaldees'; and by the Seventy, country, or region of the Chaldees. Traces of it most probably remain in the Persian fortress 'Ur, between Nisibis and the Tigris, mentioned by Ammianus, xxv. 8. Alexander Polyhistor calls it a city of the Chaldeans. (Ap. Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 17.) The word 'Ur in Sancert signifies city, town, place, &c.]

II. Ur'iah, a Hittite, and husband of Bathsheba, was killed at the siege of Rabbah, in consequence of the orders of David, 2 Sam. x. 3. See Bathsheba.

1. Urijah, chief priest of the Jews under Azaz, king of Judah, introduced, under Ahab’s direction, a new altar into the temple of the Lord, 2 Kings xxiv. 10—12. (See Ahaz.) Urijah succeeded Zadok II. and was succeeded by Shallum.

II. Urijah, a prophet of the Lord, son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, (Jer. xxvi. 30, 21.) prophesied at the same time as Jeremiah, and declared the same things against Jerusalem and Judah. Jehoiakim resolved to secure him, and put him to death; but Urijah escaped into Egypt. Jehoiakim sent messengers, who brought him out of Egypt; and he was put to death by the sword, and ordered to be buried dishonorably in the graves of the meanest of the people. A. M. 3385, ante A. D. 609.

Urim and Thummim, light and perfection, or doctrine and judgment, is supposed to have been an ornament in the high-priest’s habit, which was consulted as an oracle upon particular and difficult public questions. Some think it was the precious stones in his breastplate, which made known the divine will by casting an extraordinary lustre. Others assert that they were the words manifestation and truth, written upon two precious stones, or upon a plate of gold. Various, in fact, are the conjectures upon this subject, and Moses has no where spoken of the Urim and Thummim in such terms as to remove the difficulty. When the Urim and Thummim was to be consulted, the high-priest put on his robes, and, going into the holy place, stood before the curtain that separated the holy place from the most holy place, and then, turning his face directly toward the ark and the mercy-seat, in which the Urim were, he proposed what he wanted to be resolved about; and directly behind him, at some distance without the holy place, stood the person at whose command orentany God was consulted, and there, with all humility and devotion, expected the answer. According to Josephus, this oracle ceased about 112 years before Christ.

Usury, a premium received for the loan of a sum of money, over and above the principal. It is said in Ezek. xxviii. 25, 26: If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. If thou at all take thy neighbor’s raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down. And in Lev. xxv. 35—37: If thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen into decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him; yes, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner, that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase, but fear thy God, that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase. The Hebrew may be translated: “When your brother shall fall into poverty and misery, you shall support him; and as to the stranger or foreigner that shall be settled among you, you shall take no usury of him, neither shall you lend him your money for usury,” &c. So that this passage would contain two precepts: first, that a brother was to be maintained when in poverty; secondly, that even a stranger was to be relieved without paying usury. In Deut. xxiii. 20, 21, however, we have the following: “Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother, usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury. Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury, but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou setttest thine hand to, in the land whither thou goest to possess it.” In this place the Lord seems to tolerate usury towards strangers; that is, the Canaanites, and other people devoted to subjection, but not toward such strangers against whom the Hebrews had no quarrel, and against whom the Lord had not denounced his judgments. To exact usury is here, according to Ambrose, an act of hostility; it was a kind of waging war with the Canaanites, and of ruining them by means of usury. The true inference seems to be, that God did indeed tolerate, but not approve, the usury which the Hebrews received from the Canaanites. He allowed thus much to the hardness of their hearts, because it could not be entirely prevented.

Our Saviour has revoked all such tolerations, which obtained under the old law, Luke vi. 30—33.

I. Uz, the eldest son of Aram, and grandson of Shem, is thought to have peopled Trachonitis, a province beyond Jordan, having Arabia Deserta east, and Batanea west. The ancients say, that Uz founded the city of Damascus; and the Arabsians affirm, that Uz had Ad for a son, who was father of a people called Adites, in Arabia Felix.

II. Uz, Land of. Eusebius and Jerome assure us that, according to the tradition of the people of Palestine, and around it, the city of Azarah-Carmim was the place of Job’s habitation; but Asaroth-Carmim was beyond Jordan, between Mehalaim and Edrei, on the Jabbok. Others suppose he lived in the country of Bozra, the capital of Idumea; but Calmet, who thinks that Job may be the Jobab mentioned in Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34, and 1 Chron. i. 43, 44, believes that the city of Dinhah, in Moab, was the country which Scripture assigns in order of time to the race of Bithia. Dr. Good, in one of the dissertations prefixed to his translation of the Book of Job, has bestowed much labor on this question. The following extract cannot fail to be acceptable to the reader:—“The immediate district of Aram, to which the ensuing poem directs our attention, is the land of Uz, which by some geographers has been placed in Sandy, and by others in Stony, Arabia. Bochart took a lead in the former opinion, and has been powerfully supported by Spanheim, and the writers of that very excellent work, the Universal History. The general argument is as follows: Polomye has described a region which he calls Asite, as situated in this very province, bounded by the Cauchabei, who inhabited the southern banks of the Euphrates, on the north, and by the mountains of Chaldeas on the east; and as the Septuagint, and the Greek writers generally, translate Uz by Ararat, Asite, there is a probability, it is contended, that the Asitas, or Ausital, of the poem of Job, was the same as the Asite of Polomye; a probability which is considerably strengthened by our finding, in Polomye’s delineation of this same province, three districts, denominated Sabe, Thems, and Bussits, very closely corresponding in sound with the Sebæ, Teman, and Buz of the same poem. In addition to which, are expressly told, in the very opening of the poem, that the country was often infested by hordes of Chaldean banditti, whose mountains form the bound-dary line between the Ptolemaic Asita and Chaldea.

In consequence of which it is ingeniously conjectured that the land of Uz and of Buz, the Asita and Busith of Ptolemy, were respectively peopled and named from Uz and Buz, two of the sons of Nahor, and consequently nephews of Abraham, the residence of whose father, Terah, was at Haran, or Charræ, on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, and necessarily, therefore, in the neighborhood of Asita.

Yet, this hypothesis can by no means be recon-cluded with the geography of the Old Testament, which is uniform in placing the land of Uz, or the Asita of the Septuagint, in Stony Arabia, on the southwestern coast of the lake Asaphilæus, or the Dead sea, in a line between Egypt and Philistia, surrounded by Edom, Teman, and Midian, all of them deserts of Stony Arabia; and, as though to set every remaining doubt completely at rest, situated in Idumea, or the land of Edom or Esaun, (of whose position there can be no question,) and comprising so large a part of it, that Idumea and Asita, or the land of Uz, to the land of Edom, were convertible terms, and equally employed to import the same region. Thus Jeremiah: [Lamb. iv. 22.] Rejoice, and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwelleth in the land of Uz.
Whence Esdræus: Edom is the same as Esaun, surnamed Edom it is that part which lies about Petrae, (Stony Arabia;) now called Gabaïæae, and with some writers is the Asita, or country of Job;

an opinion advanced with great modesty, considering that he himself appears to have contents in it.

In effect, nothing is clearer than that all the persons introduced into the ensuing poem were Idumeas, dwelling in Idumea; or, in other words, Edomites Arabia. Three characters are, Job himself, of the land of Uz, Eliphaz of Teman, a district of as much repute as Uz; and, upon the joint testimony of Jeremiah, [Lam. iv. 39.; Ezckiel, xvi. 33.; Amos. iv. 11.; 12.; and Obadiah, iv. 23.; part, and principal part, of Idumea; Bildad of Shush, always mentioned in conjunction with Seba and Dedan, the first of which was probably named after one of the brothers of Jok-tan or Kretain, and the two last from two of his sons, all of them lying uniformly placed in the vicinity of Idumea,] Zerubbabel of Buz, a city importing ple-antu, which is also stated by Joshua [xiv. 21.; 23.] to have been situated in Idumea, and to have him in a southern direction, towards its coast, or the shore of the Red sea; and Eliph of Buz, which, as the name of a place, occurs only once in Sacred Scriptures, but is there mentioned in connection with Teman and Dedan, [Jer. xxvi. 23.] and hence in essentially, like themselves, a border city upon Asita, Uz, or Idumea.

Kedar, therefore, appears clearer, than that the Uz, or Asita, mentioned in the ensuing poem, may have been situates in Stony, and not in Sandy, Arabia; and that the Asita of Ptolemy could not have been the same place. In reality, to make it so, Bochart and those who have adopted his opinion are obliged to suppose, first, a typographical error of Asita for Asita in the text of Ptolemy; and next, that the position of Asita itself is not correctly laid down in Ptolemy's delineation, which they admit ought to be placed in a higher northern latitude, by nearly two degrees. Uz, Buz, Teman, and Dedan a place not unfrequent in the earlier parts of the Scriptures; and hence it is not instructed that, in different pro-able that the Saba of the Ptolemy is in this instance, it was drawn by oxen, on a cart, as if this carriage by beasts was good enough for it: it was hereby assimilated to the processions of the heathen, who drew their gods about in carriages.

(2.) The ark ought to have been enveloped, wholly concealed, by the priests, before the Levites approached it; whereas, no priest attended this procession. Was it carried openly, exposed to view as it was by the Philistines? 1 Sam. vi. 13—19. Uzzah, being a Levite, ought to have known these rules, and being the principal in conducting the procession, and, as may be supposed, the elder brother, he was principally guilty; Ahio being subordinate to him.

(3.) It is likely, that the oxen drew it safely while in a straight road, but when they came to the threshing-floor, one or both of them became restive and stumbled, which, provoking Uzzah, put him off his guard.

This solution seems to be most in accordance with the words of David afterwards, when about to bring the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Zion. 1 Chron. xv. After saying (verse 2) that “none ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites,” he summons all the priests and Levites to assist in the removal of it, and then says, (verse 13), “Because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us, for that we sought him not after the due order.” This is said in evident allusion to the breach made upon Uzzah, i.e. the breaking forth of God’s anger against Uzzah, 2 Sam. vi. 8, and 1 Chron. xiii. 11. VEI

VANITY is put (1.) for vain glory, or pride, which infects men with a great opinion of themselves; boasting, or self-conceit, Ps. cxix. 37; 2 Pet. ii. 18; (2.) for lying, Ps. iv. 2; (3.) for more emptiness, Eccles. i.; Ps. cxliv. 4; (4.) for idols, Deut. xxxii. 21; 2 Kings xvi. 15; Jer. ii. 5; (5.) for wantonly, unnecessarily, &c. Exod. xx. 7. (6.) Vanity is opposed to true, real, substantial. Ps. v. 10, “Their heart is vain, or full of vanity and lying.” Ps. xiii. 2. They have deceived their neighbors by vain discourses, by words of deceit and lies. To lift up the soul to vanity, (Ps. xxiv. 4.) is, to swear vainly and falsely.

VASHI, a wife of Ahasuerus, divorced by him, in favor of Esther. See Esther, and Ana. Alexanderus.

VEIL, a kind of scarf or mantle, with which females in the East cover the face and head.

In the history of Abimelech and Sarah, (Gen. xx. 16.) the veil is by some supposed to be described by the circumlocution of “a covering to the eyes.” But the phrase “covering to the eyes” refers evidently to the money given by Abimelech, viz. the thousand pieces of silver, which were to be a covering to the eyes of others, i.e. an atoning present, a testimony of her innocence in the eyes of all. See Abimelech I. B.

It is related of Moses, (Exod. xxxiv. 33.) that after coming down from the mount, “the skin of his face shone;” so that, in order to quiet the minds of the people, “he put a veil over his face.” This veil is called muno, maruch, and seems to denote not a close texture, but a loosely woven, or open net-work material. This idea shows the propriety of the application of a like word in Isa. xxxv. 7, “The Lord shall take away, in this mountain, the superficial wrapper, covering close up, which is upon all nations, whereby they are totally precluded from correct knowledge of God; as well as the veil of a looser texture, (maruch,) the spreading spread over all people; which permits some small glimpse (by natural conscience, Rom. ii. 14, 17) of the divine excellences to pass through it; affording, not a clear view, but a confused perception, to those who wish to examine beyond it. This seems to be the very idea of the apostle, 2 Cor. iii.
From this use of this kind of veil, it appears that it was esteemed a very ornamental part of the head-dress; and herein it agrees with the directions of Naomi to Ruth, to dress herself to advantage. It was, perhaps, not, therefore, a veil to be taken off and put on, but was constantly worn on the head, and has, possibly, its representatives in the modern caps or turbans of our young women.

We read, Gen. xxiv. 65, that Rebeckah, seeing Isaac advancing towards her, covered herself with a veil, or rather with the veil, (παράκλησις, huts-talaph,) either, (1.) that which it was customary for brides to wear, or, (2.) that which had been provided for her at home: if these ideas may concur into one, then this was provided at home, for Rebeckah to wear as a bridal veil. That it was used for that purpose in her intention, is certain; but was it adopted on account of haste? or was it that veil which due formality required? This question is rendered perplexing, by the same word being used in the history of Tamar, who "put away the garments of her widowhood, and covered up herself in a taliaph," "whereas it seems, this was not a widow-like dress, or dress of grief, but of joy; yet it could hardly be the regular bridal veil, (notwithstanding Mr. Harmer thinks it was,) for what could any observer, or bystander, think might induce a woman to sit as Tamar sat, "like a harlot, by the way side?"—Besides, could Judah think her a bride, and yet make such proposals as he did to her? It is, therefore, likely, that this veil was worn by Chaldean women, or stranger women—foreigners to the country of Canaan; hence it seems to be certain, that Rebeckah brought with her that kind of veil which in her own country would have been esteemed honorable, on any occasion; and Tamar, (a Canaanitess,) by wearing such a veil, appeared to Judah to be a foreigner—a stranger-woman—who had strayed from her associates, or whose living depended on the disposal of her person.

(Another Hebrew word rendered veil in the English version, is רָהָד, rāhād, which, however, seems properly to have been a fine upper garment or mantle, which females were accustomed to throw over their other garments when they went out, Cant. v. 7; Is. iii. 23. The Greek word ἱματία, phelon, which is also thus translated in 1 Cor. xi. 10, seems there more properly to have been put for emblem of power or of honor and dignity, i.e., a veil. This, Paul says, should be worn by females in the churches, on account of the angels. Who are these? Some say, the angels of the churches, i.e., the bishops. Others, better, the messengers, i.e., spies of the heathen, so some are the assemblies in order to spy out irregularities. Others, still, take angels in the usual sense, and consider Paul as representing the angels of heaven as beholding with deep interest the doings of Christian assemblies. R.

These remarks will have prepared the way for noticing some of the eastern ideas attached to the veil.

In the first place, it is proper to notice the affront committed against a female in the East, by lifting up her veil. We might quote from Schubinius, who shows, from Arabians writers, that the image of tearing or taking away the veil expresses the unhappy state of eastern virgins, when affronted, violated, and insulted. So Cabibah, the mother of Khalifé Motza, complained of Saleh, the Turkish chief, "He has torn my veil;" to express with decency, "He has dishonored me;" but we rather appeal to the story of Susanna, in the Apocrypha, as best adapted to the following illustration. The writer notices a "Now Susanna, a very fair and beauteous to behold; and they commanded to uncover her face, they mightbe filled a Therefore, her friends, and all that said i.e. the elders unveiled her face;"

Many have been the inquiries of the Lord's word in Matt. v. 28, has given over soever looketh on a woman, to lust committed adultery with her already. Great stress has usually been laid on very justly; but Lardner and others must be taken for a marriage common enough; nevertheless, the passage, Mr. Taylor thinks, can stand, by considering the closest and most eastern women, under their veils, it totally concealed, they offer no occurs looked upon; but would take it as a solence—as nothing short of the great could dictate the offence—they shud their side. Understand, therefore, the "You have heard that it was said to Thou shalt not commit adultery; but that my purer principles forbid the mention to that crime, any common may lead to it; whoever removes the any woman, (whether married or unmof rigid or of easy virtue,) if he violates a liberty for excuses; purposes, of female dress, and is frequently, at true import of the term to look on with a question turning? [But does not this meaning detract much from the fore precept? Cannot a man, according idea, just as much commit adultery in his heart by casting his eyes upon a after her, or even in thinking of her, tearing away her veil to look upon her with such trifling! R.

In the Fragments from which the selected, and some others which follows 165., are collected from various trsample accounts of the forms of eastern the manner in which they are worn accounts is manifest that it is a mode considered, not distinctly or apparently spoken of VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES. must be confined, in this article, to the may be usually denounced as "ungodly" These are the following: The Greek which the Septuagint or Alexandrine chief; the Latin versions, viz. the Itala; the Chaldee versions, or Targum version; the Peshitta and other ñ and the Arabic versions. After the Hebrew had ceased to el had become a dead language, in the before Christ, and still more after the s tainly, translations of the Hebrew: the prevailing languages of the age, of necessity, both to Jews and Christianity in other countries. Accordingly language then current received at least which became the ecclesiastical auth used instead of the original Hebrew way, there arose, almost contemporaneous and Jesuits version for the Grecian and 1 and the earliest Chaldee versions for ti in Palestine and Babylonia. After the introduction of Christianity, the Christians adopted at first the Septuagint; but in the second century there appeared three or four other Greek versions from the hands of Jewish and Christian translators, the object of which was to improve this version. But, however, they did not succeed; and these works are now lost. About the same time, the Syrian Christians made the Syriac version; and the Latin Christians procured a Latin version of the Septuagint, which at the close of the fourth century gave place to the version of Jerome, the present Vulgate. After the wide extension of the Arabic language in the seventh century, both Jews and Christians began to translate the Scriptures into Arabic also; the Jews out of the original Hebrew, and the Christians from the Septuagint. Indeed, this latter is the case with all translations of the Old Testament, made by the Christians, into the oriental languages.

The versions of the Scriptures are usually divided into the immediate, or those made directly from the original text, and the mediate, or those made from other versions. The latter are also sometimes called daughters of the former. It is only those of the first species which have any hermeneutical value; those of the latter kind can only be used for aid in the verbal criticism of the versions from which they have flowed, and are indeed of no special importance, even here, except in the case of the Septuagint, the text of which has been so much corrupted. The present translators possessed neither grammatical nor lexicographical help, and followed, therefore, everywhere, every exegetical tradition. As their object, too, was always practical, rather than a learned or scientific one, they are often apt to fail in the requisite degree of exactness; and sometimes also they interweave their own views and impressions in their versions. This last circumstance renders these versions less valuable as it respects exegesis; but makes them so much the more important as historical documents, in regard to the views of the age and of the sect to which they belong.

Septuagint, or Alexandrine Version. The Septuagint, or the version of the LXX, or the Alexandrine version, is undoubtedly the oldest of all the Greek, or, in other words, the Old Testament. There was, it is true, a legend among the Fathers, that there had existed an earlier Greek version, in which Plato had read the Bible; but this is absurdly without foundation, and was suggested by the Fathers in order to prove the antiquity of the translation, that Plato and the Greek philosophers had borrowed from Moses. (Clom. Alexandr. Stromata, i. p. 326. ed. Potter.) The origin of this version, like that of the canon, in some degree, is veiled in Jewish legends; according to which Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, from 284 to 246, B. C. having formed the wish, through the advice of his librarian, Demetrius Phalerius, to possess a Greek translation of the Mosaic writings for the Alexandrine library, sent an embassy to Jerusalem for this object, and obtained a Hebrew manuscript, and 73 learned Jews to translate it. These labored together in the translation, which, after mutual consultation, they dictated to Demetrius. This legend is given in an epistle said to have been written by Aristeus to his brother in Alexandria, but which is spurious. Josephus also relates the story, lib. xii. 2-14. The pretended epistle of Aristeus is found in Van Dale's Diss. sup. Aristæum, Amst. 1725; in H. H. de Biblior. Text. originalibus, Or. 1763; in Josephis Opp. ed. Haver-camp. Amst. 1736. The legend, as transmitted to us by the Fathers, is far more romantic. According to Justin Martyr, the 72 interpreters were distributed into as many separate cells, in which they were confined until they had completed each his separate translation, or Pentateuch. In this manner, which, however, was compared, were found to agree verbatim throughout.

If, now, we leave out of view those later fabulous additions, still, even the earlier narrative of the Jews is full of improbability. An Egyptian monarch would hardly have thought it necessary to send an embassy to Jerusalem to obtain a manuscript; and the circumstance as related savors strongly of Jewish national self-complacency and pride. The most probable supposition is, that after the Jews had in great numbers settled down permanently in Egypt, and had, by degrees, forgotten in a great measure the Hebrew language, a Greek version of their Scriptures, and especially of the Law, or Pentateuch, became necessary for the use of their public worship in their synagogues and temple. (See Alexandri, p. 43.) This would be, in all probability, prepared under the authority of the Sanhedrim, which consisted of 72 members. Or this number, moreover, is a sort of round number, and might be used merely to denote a version made by some 72 scribes. Such a version would not improbably be received by Demetrius into the library; for we know that he set on foot a collection of all known codes of law, with reference to a new code contemplated by Ptolemy. The translation of the Pentateuch, seems to have taken place gradually, between this time and the birth of Christ. Of the book of Esther, it is said, in a note at the end, that it was translated under Ptolemy Philomator. The book of Daniel seems to have been translated last of all; on which account it is, perhaps, that this book is not contained at all in our manuscripts of the Septuagint. The translation of Daniel, in our editions, is that of Theodotion. The genuine Alexandrine version of Daniel was first discovered in the preceding century, and published at Rome, 1772, reprinted Gottingen, 1773.

The character of this version is different, according to the different books. It is very distinguishing five or six different versions. The Pentateuch is best translated, and exhibits a clear and flowing Greek style; though it seems to have been made from a different and interpolated original text. The next in rank is the translator of Job and Psalms; indeed often more truly and nearer the true sense, but still gives every where a good idea, and his style is like that of an original writer. The Psalms and the prophets are translated worst of all; often, indeed, without any sense. The version of Ecclesiastes is distinguished by an anxious literal adherence to the original.—Indeed, the real value of the Septuagint, as a version, stands in no sort of relation to its reputation. All the translators engaged in it appear to have been wanting in a proper knowledge of the two languages, and in a due attention to grammar, etymology and orthography. Hence they often confound proper names, and appellations, kindred verbs, similar words and letters, etc. and this in times w. L. were at liberty to confer various readings. The whole version is rather free than literal; the figures and metaphors are resolved, and there are frequent insertions inserted to later times and later Jewish dogmas; e. g. Is. xiii. 21; xi. 18, 25; xxxiv. 14. Not uninteresting, too, particular references and allusions to Egypt, and
VERSIONS

Egyptian antiquities, are inserted; e.g. Isa. xix. The Greek of the Septuagint is that of the Jews in Egypt, a branch of the later Greek of the common people, and called usually τὸ ἑπτάκιον, the common, or also the Macedonian-Attic-Greek dialect. This common, vulgar language, spread itself, after the time of Alexander, over all the nations which spoke Greek, and was distinguished from the Attic, &c. by the circumstances, that it adopted much from the ancient Doric. It was first used as the language of books, in the version of the LXX, and is, hence, often called the Alexandrine dialect. From the mixture of Hebrewisms which it received in the mouth of the Jews, who spoke Greek, i.e. the Hellenistic Jews, it is also named the Hellenistic dialect. The New Testament is written in the same dialect, but in a purer form. It is also the language of the Apocrypha and of some of the Fathers. The chief philosophical helps for the study of the Septuagint, are the concordance of Tremon, and the lexicon of the Old Testament by Biel and Schleusener.

The authority of this new version soon became so great, as to supersede the use of the original Hebrew among all those Jews who spoke Greek. In the Egyptian synagogues, indeed, the original Hebrew was still read along with the Greek version, but the common people no longer understood it. Even scholars, like Philo, no longer understood the national mother tongue, and held entirely to the Greek translation. In Palestine also, this became the degrees current, and was used along with the Chaldee versions, especially by the more learned, who were acquainted with Greek. This appears even in Josephus, and from the New Testament. In both, the version of the LXX seems to lie at the foundation; though the citations do not always accord with it, and the writers sometimes (e.g. Matthew) seem to have had the original before them. On the citations from the O. T., see Surinam, 52. Annot. 713; also the Tracts of Owen and Randolph, as published at Andover, 1607. From the Jews the reputation and authority of the Septuagint passed over to the Christians, who employed it with the same degree of reverence as the original. It became of course the point of appeal in the controversies between Jews and Christians, and hence began to lose its consequence in the eyes of the former. As in those controversies the Jews often found the Greeks worsted, they declared that this lay solely in the Greek translation, and carried their appeal to the Hebrew original, and also to other versions, which they said were more literal. The Talmudists, among whom the ancient hatred against the Greek again arose, proclaimed a curse upon the Greek law, or Penta- teuch, and appointed a fast upon the day on which they supposed the translation to have been suggested.

The Text of the Septuagint has suffered greatly. Through the multitude of copies, which the very general use rendered necessary, and by means of ignorant critics, the text of this version, in the first hundred years, had fallen into the most hopeless state. In order to remedy this evil, Origen set himself to obtain a correct text by means of a comparison of the original Hebrew and the other Greek versions. The plan which he adopted was, to place the original text and the different versions in parallel columns; by which means, also, he was able to give to the Christians, in their polemics with the Jews, the benefit of all the versions of the Old Testament in one view. This work was the celebrated Hexapla of Origen. Sc.e. i.e. in the Bible in six ed.

It contained, besides the Hebrew LXX, also the three later Greek version Symmachus and Theodotion, described together with the Hebrew text, written in C in a column with the original, in which he used it of learned Jews. Where there was an Greek, he supplied it from one of the versions, usually that of Theodotion; in additions with an asterisk at the beginning of the name of the translator at the end. LXX had anything too much, he let it but marked it with an obelisk or da beginning, to denote its spuriousness. Work consisted of fifty rolls or volume afterwards seen and used by Jerome in graphs, but was, not long after, lost, and only in fragments.

These fragments have been collected, at by Montfaucon, Paris, 1574, 4 vols. fol. an abridgment by Bahrdt, Leipzig, 1760-97. very plan adopted by Origen became a sequel, the occasion of still more us corruption of the Greek text of gaps between the manuscripts and signs which Origen had employed, words which he had inserted in the text: evil was worse than before.

The text which has come down to us consists in the Codex Vaticans, in distinction from the earlier text, with the τὸ ἑπτάκιον, or the common, or the Greek the manuscripts which exist at the present also in the printed editions, three principal manuscripts, viz. the text Codex Vaticans, the basis of which is an earlier common text; and the Alexandrinus Codex Alexandrinus, in the British museum, which exhibits more of the reading points of the Hexapla of Origen. editions of the Septuagint fall also into viz., those which follow the Codex Vaticans edition of L. Ross, 1769, and Reineccius, and those which follow the Codex Alex editions of Grabe, Ox. 1767, and of Debye. A critical edition of the Septuagint, with section of various readings from all the and also out of the versions which have it, was undertaken in England, by T in the second century. of Genesis was published in folio, in 1781; Genesis, 1801; Judges and Ruth in six remaining historical books, in the f bowing: thus completing the second work is still continued. See, on the 1 Septuagint, Etymological Dictionary, 1705; and Fabrici Bibliothecae Graeci, vol. ii. in.

The principal midate versions, which were from the Septuagint, are the Bible: Latin version, one of the Second century. Egyptian, Armenian, Georgian, Slavonian, and several Arabic versions.

Other Greek Versions. In the latter second century after Christ, there appeared contemporaneously, three new Greek ve whole Old Testament. The author of the first was Aquila, a Jew by birth, whose translation, therefore, was adopted for use in many synagogues. The authors of the two others, Symmachus and Theodotion, were Jewish Christians. All these are more exact than the LXX; they retain the figures and metaphors of the original, and none of them exhibit the arbitrary caprices of the Alexandrine translators. Aquila, especially, is in the highest degree anxious; he is often so literal as to destroy the sense; and expresses with the utmost care even the etymologies of the Hebrew. Symmachus, on the contrary, aims at a better Greek style. Theodotion is more eclectic, and he seems to have been wanting in a knowledge of Hebrew. Fragments of all these versions are found in the Hexapla of Origen, as published by Montfaucon. From Theodotion alone we have the whole book of Daniel extant, which stands in our editions of the Septuagint.

Of less importance are some anonymous Greek versions, which Origen denounces as the 5th, 6th and 7th. Of rather more value is a Greek-Samaritan translation, which was made from the Samaritan version.

In the latter part of the preceding century, a new Greek version of several books of the Old Testament was discovered by Villeison, in a manuscript in the library of St. Mark’s cathedral, Venice; hence called the Persio Venta, or Græcus Venteus. It comprises the Pentateuch, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, and Daniel. The Pentateuch was published by Ammon, Erlangen, 1790–91; the other books by Villeison himself, Strasburg, 1784. It follows slavishly the original, and the verbal interpretation of the Jews; even the Parashah or Jewish divisions of the text are given, and the pages of the manuscript run backwards, like the Hebrew; the Greek diction is in the highest degree affected. The translator is ever striving after a poetic and Attic style; along with which occur, nevertheless, the grossest mistakes in language and newly formed words. Jerome he translates Ἰωνής. The translator was, most probably, a Byzantine Jew, of the middle ages.

Ancient Latin Version, or Itala. After Christianity had become established (350 A.D.), when the Bible also became necessary. In the time of Augustin, there were several of these; although only one of them was adopted by the church, i.e. by ecclesiastical authority. This was called vulgata, (common, popular,) because it was made from the Greek common version, τὰ νεωτερικὰ. In modern times this ancient Latin version is often called Itala, in consequence of a passage in Augustin: (De Doctr. Christi. ii. 15.) but the reading is there false, and it should be read sedata. This translation was made literally from the Septuagint, and gives, most conscientiously, even all the verbal mistakes of the Greek. There are still extant of it the Psalms, Job, and some of the apocryphal books, complete, besides fragments; these were all collected and published by Sabatier, Rheims, 1721–49, 3 vols. fol. As the manuscripts of this version had become by degrees very much corrupted, a revision of the Psalter and book of Job was undertaken, in A. D. 383, by Jerome, in pursuance of a commission from the Roman bishop Damasus; this is still extant, and called Psalmier Romanum, because it was introduced into the Roman diocese.

The modern Vulgate, or Jerome’s Version. While Jerome was still employed in the revision of the ancient Vulgata, or Itala, he ventured to commence, also, a new version of his own, out of the original Hebrew; being induced to the undertaking partly by the counsel of his friends, and partly by his own feeling of the necessity of such a work. He began with the Books of Kings, and completed the work A. D. 405, with Jeremiah. While engaged in this work, he enjoyed the confidence and counsel of the leading Jewish rabbins in Palestine, (see language, p. 609,) and availed himself of all the former Greek versions and of the Hexapla of Origen. His new version surpasses all the preceding in usefulness. The knowledge of Hebrew which Jerome possessed was, for the age, very respectable; and he also made himself master of the Chaldee. His manner of explanation connects itself very closely with that of the Jews; and his choice of Latin expressions is, for the most part, very happy. Still, this production did not meet with the anticipated success and general reception; and especially Augustin and Rufinus wrote against it with violence, as if a new Bible were about to be introduced. Nevertheless, the new version maintained itself along with the ancient one; and at length, in the seventh century, supplanted it almost entirely.

But the frequent and constant use of the new version now occasioned again, in turn, a very considerable corruption of the text; so that already in the time of Charlemagne, no copies entirely alike were any longer to be found. In order to remedy this evil, Charlemagne commissioned Alcuin to make a revision of the manuscripts of the new Latin version. Similar revisions of this version, (the Vulgate,) were made occasionally during the whole of the middle ages, under the name of Correctoria. These are a kind of Latin Masorah, and consist of various readings, and all kinds of critical remarks. Only one correctorium has ever been printed, viz. at Cologne, 1508, 4to.

The Vulgate was the first book ever printed. The first edition is without date or place; the first with a date was printed at Mayence, 1468. At the council of Trent, in 1545, the Vulgate was adopted as the standard version of the Catholic church, and to be of equal authority with the original Scripture. Since this time, the study of the original text has been regarded by the Catholics as a verging towards heresy.

The Targums, or Chaldee Versions. All these are the works of Jews living in Palestine and Babylon, from a century before Christ, to the eighth or ninth century after. They bear the name Targum, i.e. translation, from the Chaldee תָּרָгу, to translate. The name paraphrase, by which they are sometimes called, is unsuitable, since they are not all paraphrasic. That Chaldee translations were already in use in the time of Christ is apparent from Matt. xxvii. 46, among other passages, where the words are quoted according to the Chaldee version. The more ancient of the Targums are well translated, and may be reckoned among the best works of the kind. After later ones are more prolix and paraphrasic, and fall of ridiculous interpolations. There are, in all, eleven Targums, of which the four following are the most important.

1. The Targum of Onkelos, containing the Pentateuch. The author, was most probably, a pupil of Rabbi Akiba, and the father of Gamaliel. It was the instructor of the style is pure, and the translation very exact and literal. (See Winer, de Onkeloso Penat. Interp. Lips. 1820.)

2. The Targum of Jonathan Ben Uziel, comprising the historical books and prophets. He lived a short time before the birth of Christ, but his work is far inferior to the preceding. It exhibits a multitude of arbitrary explanations, interpolations, and later views; especially such as tend to the honor of the Pharisees. (Comp. Gesenius Comm. zu Isa. Exe. § 11.)

3. The version of the Pentateuch, professedly by the same Jonathan, but which is spurious. It is hence called the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan.

4. The Targum of Jerusalem, on the Pentateuch. All these Targums are to be found in the rabbinic Bibles and the Polyglots.

There are smaller separate Targums on the books of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. A separate Targum on the Chronicles was first discovered at later period in the library of Erfurt, and published by Beck, 1680—83, 4to; and by Wilkins, A.D. 1715, 4to.

Samarian Version. There exists a copy of the Pentateuch among the Samaritans, in the Hebrew language, but written with Samaritan letters. (See Samaria, p. 810.) But besides this, there exists also a version of the Pentateuch in the Samaritan language. About the time of Christ's appearance, they had forgotten the ancient Hebrew, as much as the Jews of that age; and spoke instead of it a peculiar dialect, mixed up from Hebrew and Chaldee, but with many peculiar words. In this dialect the version is made, following their copy or recension of the Pentateuch. Nothing is certainly known respecting the age of this version, except that it had existed a considerable time before Origen's day; for this father cites a Greek version, which had already been made from the Samaritan. The Samaritan version itself is difficult to be understood, since, besides this, and some few poems, we have nothing in this dialect. The version stands in the Polyglot; and Winer has written an essay upon it.—Die Version Samaritana, Lips. 1817. See Bib. Repos. Vol. II. p. 78.

Greek Versions. There are two of these, both of which are of Christian origin, having been made by Christians of the Syrian church, who dwelt in Mesopotamia and Armenia. The earliest and most celebrated of these is the Peshito, or plain, simpler, or the literal. It is the regular version of the Syrian church, and of all its sects and parties, the orthodox and also the heterodox. The Syrian church regards this version as so exceedingly old, as to have been made, by command of King Solomon, for the church in Syria. What is certain is, that in the third century it already was the authoritative version of the church. The author was, possibly, a Jewish Christian, and has availed himself of the Chaldee version. The Peshito follows, in general, the Hebrew literally; but exhibits also traces of the occasional use both of the Septuagint and Chaldee. It stands in the Polyglot; and a beautiful edition has also been published in England, under the superintendence of professor Lee.

The other Syrian version was made from the Septuagint, and from the text of the A. D. 616, for the use of the Monophysite importance only for the criticism of the text. There is a complete manuscript of the version in the Ambrosian library at Milan, which has been printed, except Jerome, 1787, and Daniel, 1788.

Arabic Versions. After the era when the Arabic became the mother tongue of the Jews, and of very numerous bodies, especially of those in Egypt. It is evident that Arabic versions of the very soon felt to be necessary. Of a number, flowing sometimes from but chiefly from the Septuagint, and from Peshito and Vulgate. The most important are the following:

1. The Arabic version of R. Al. director of the Jewish academy at the tenth century. It probably comprises the Old Testament; but there are only the Pentateuch and Isaiah, the books, e.g. Job, are extant in many version is paraphrasical, and resolves and anthropomorphisms; in other lows very closely our uncorrected Heb. Pentateuch stands in the Polyglot; published by Paulus, in 1791.

2. The Maritain version of the made in the thirteenth century, by a version is paraphrasical, and resolves and anthropomorphisms; in other lows very closely our uncorrected Heb. Pentateuch stands in the Polyglot; published by Paulus, in 1791.

3. The Arabic version of the Polyglot, which was made on apparently by a Christian of Alexandria time of Mohammed. For the Polyglot, p. 177. *R.

4. VETCHES, see PITCHES.

VIALS, see CENSER, p. 257.

5. VINE. Of this valuable and we the vineyards were several species, and there exists to it in the sacred writings. It in Palestine, and was particularly in the districts. The Scriptures celebrate Sorek, Siloam, Jazer, and Abel; and the vineyards of Gaza, Sharon, Ascalon and Tyre. Egypt being particularly small, we may be sure which was occasioned by witnessing the bunch of grapes six to the camp, from the valley of Esch. 21. The account of Moses, however, by the testimony of several travelers assures us, that in the valley of Eschus of grapes of wine and twelve pounds, that he was informed by a Religious, many years in Palestine, that there were grapes in the valley of Hebron, so much so scarce to carry once. (Cot 24.) And Rosenmüller says, "Though religion does not favor the culture vine, there is want of vineyard. Besides the large quantities of grain which are daily sent to the markets of other neighboring places, Hebron at half of the eighteenth century, an hundred casks loads, that is, nearly thousand weight of grape juice, or to Egypt. Bochart informs us that a triple vine is gathered every year.
the vine has produced the first clusters, they cut away from the fruit that wood which is barren. In April, a new shoot springs from the branch that was left in March, which is also topped; this shoots forth again in May, loaded with the latter grapes. Those clusters which blossomed in March come to maturity and are fit to be gathered in August; those which blossomed in April are gathered in September; and those which blossomed in May must be gathered in October.

In the East, grapes enter very largely into the provisions at an entertainment. Thus, Norden was treated by the -ag of Esauen with a feast, and some bunches of grapes of an excellent taste. To show the abundance of vines which should fall to the lot of Judah in the partition of the promised land, Jacob, in his prophetic benediction, says of this tribe, he shall be found—

Binding his colt to the vine,
And to the choice vine, the foal of his ass.
Washing his garments in wine,
His clothes in the blood of the grape.

Gen. xlix. 11.

It has been shown by Paxton, that in some parts of Persia, it was formerly the custom for the shepherd to turn their cattle into the vineyard after the vintage, to browse on the vines, some of which are so large, that a man can hardly compass their trunks in his arms. These facts clearly show, that according to the prediction of Jacob, the ass might be securely bound to the vine, and without damaging the tree by browsing on its leaves and branches. The same custom appears, by the narratives of several travellers, to have generally prevailed in lesser Asia. Chandler observed, that in the vineyards of Smyrna, the leaves of the vines were decayed or stripped by the camels, or herds of goats, which are permitted to browse upon them, after the vintage. When he left Smyrna, on the 30th of September, the vineyards were already bare; but when he arrived at Phrygia, on the 5th or 6th of October, he found its territory still green with vines, which is a proof that the vineyards at Smyrna must have been stripped by the cattle, which delight to feed upon the foliage.

But if the vine leaves were generally eaten by cattle after the winter was over, how, says Mr. Harker, "could the prophet (Isa. xxxiv. 4,) represent the dropping of the stars from heaven, in a general wreck of nature, by the falling of the leaf from the vine? If they were devoured by the cattle they could not fall." The answer is easy: the prophet refers to the character of the vine-leaf, not to any local custom; nor is it reasonable to suppose that the leaves of every vineyard were so regularly and completely consumed, that the people had never seen them showering from the branches by the force of the wind; or the nipping colds in the close of the year. (Paxton, vol. i. p. 180.)

The law enjoined that he who planted a vine should not eat of the produce of it before the fifth year, Lev. xix. 24, 25. Nor did they gather their grapes on the seventh year; the fruit was then left for the poor, the orphan and the stranger. A traveller was permitted to gather and eat grapes in a vineyard, as he passed along, but was not permitted to carry any away, Deut. xxiii. 24.

In John xv. our Lord declares himself to be the “true vine.” Doddridge, after Wetstein, has supposed that the idea might be suggested by the sight of a vine, either from a window or in some court by the side of the house; but this is contradicted by Harmer, who remarks, that there were no gardens in Jerusalem, and that it is not likely there were vines about the sides of the houses. Harmer’s assertion, however, is set aside by Dr. Russell, who states, that it is very common to cover the windows leading to the upper apartments of the harem with vines. This fully explains the beautiful metaphor in Ps. cxxxviii. — Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house,—with which Mr. Harmer is so much embarrassed; but whether such a vine gave rise to our Saviour’s discourse, is a matter of great doubt. The intention of the similitude is that which is most important for us to attend to and understand; which is, that no fruit can be expected from professing Christians, either in their personal or official character, but by perseverance in the appointed way, and in communion, by faith and love, with him who is the source of all that is good in man.

Rosenmüller has a long article on the parable, which Dr. Waitz has translated in his “Repertorium Theologicum,” and of which the following is the substance. After having remarked that the whole of the discourses in John xiii. — xlviii. were not delivered in one place, and in an unbroken connection, he proceeds to show that the comparison of the vineyard is not that of a real or natural vine, since John always uses the adjective ἄνθεμα, true, in opposition to something falso, counterfeitz, and not genuine; e. g. iv. 23; i. 47; viii. 31. “But what is the opposition in this passage, where Christ is designated? It would be, according to the preceding expositions, a natural or real vine:—yet it will be urged, that this would have far greater claims to the συγκεντρωμένος branch than Christ, who only compared himself to such, and merely represented him in the image of it. Since then he calls himself the ‘true vine,’ he must necessarily have had a certain object in contrast, which represented a vine without being a natural or real vine, between which also himself is most significant analogy existed.” What this probably was, he proceeds to show.

In the temple at Jerusalem, above and round the gate, seventy cubits high, which led from the porch to the holy place, a richly carved vine was extended as a border and ornament. The branches, tendrils and leaves were of the finest gold; the stalks of the bunches were of the length of the human form, and the bunches hanging upon them were of costly jewels. Herod first placed it there; rich and patriotic Jews from time to time added to its embellishment, one contributing a new grape, another a leaf, and a third even a bunch of the same precious materials. If to compute its value at more than 13,000,000 of dollars be an exaggeration, it is nevertheless indisputable, that this vine must have had an uncommon importance and a sacred meaning in the eyes of the Jews. With what majestic splendor must it likewise have appeared in the evening, when it was illuminated by tapers!

If, then, Jesus, in the evening, after having celebrated the passover, again betook himself to the temple with his disciples, what is more natural, than, as they wandered in it to and fro, that above every thing this vine blazing with gold and jewels should have attracted their attention? that, riveted by the gorgeous magnificence of the sight, they were absorbed in wonder and contemplation respecting the real import of this work of art? Let us now conceive that Jesus at this moment, referring to this vine, said to his disciples: "I am the true vine"—how correct and striking must his words then have appeared!—how clearly and determinately must then the import of them have been seen!

The Jews accounted the vine the most noble of plants, and a type of all that was excellent, powerful, fruitful and fortunate. The prophets, therefore, compared the Jewish nation and the Jewish church to a great vine, adorned with beautiful fruit, planted, tended and guarded by God. Jer. vi. 21; Ezek. xix. 10, seq.; Ps. lxxiii. 9, 15, seq. God was the dresser of the vineyard; Israel was the vineyard and vine; Isa. lxxv. 1, 3; xxxiv. 2, seq.; Hos. x. 1. Every true Israelite, especially the head and chief of the people, were the branches; (Isa. xvi. 8; Ezek. xix. 10.) the might and power of the nation were the full swelling branches. The basis of the metaphor was an old idea, that "Israel is the first and the most holy nation on the earth, that God himself is the founder and protector of it."

The curiously-wrought and splendid vine-alabaster, above described, which Herod introduced into the temple, was a symbol of this peculiar, proximate and joyful relation in which God stood to Israel. The patriotic Jews, as they looked at it, thought with joy and pride of the high dignity and preeminence of their people. To go out and to enter under the vine, was a phrase, by which they denoted a peaceful, fortunate and contented life. Hence this ornamental, extended over the holy place, was a striking and full meaning, as it was edifying to the orthodox Jews; in no case, could it have been used to increase its المنیفی and to authenticate himself, as a worthy member of this holy and glorious nation.

Jesus having thus depicted himself as the individual who was preferred by this vine, the idea which he would express by this parable, could not have been misunderstood.

This parable, therefore, more immediately concerns the apostles. Jesus does not merely represent himself under the metaphor of a vine in the more confined sense of a teacher, but in the comprehensive and comprehensive one of the Messiah, set forth from heaven to found a new kingdom of God. He considers his apostles as the branches in him, not merely as disciples and friends, but as deputies and assistants chosen and called by him to found and extend his kingdom. The connection which he would maintain between himself and them, consists not merely in love and friendship; but in the true execution of his commands, grounded on a faith in his exalted nature and dignity. The fruits which he expects from them are not merely faith and virtue, which are the concerns of all Christians, but important services in the extension of Christianity. And he invites them to perform them by a promise of divine grace and assistance.

The expression of "sitting every man under his own vine," (1 Kings iv. 25; Mic. iv. 14) alludes to the delightful eastern arbors partly composed of vines. Norden speaks of arbores as being common in the Egypt and the Punic vineyard, in Shaws the figure of an ancient one. The intended to refer to a time of public trust of profound peace.

In the passage of Isaiah to which we referred, there is mention made of a wild requires notice; and he looked that it forth grapes, and it brought forth wild v. 2. Jeremiah the same image, to the same purpose, in an elegant parable, part of Isaiah's parable, in his flowing manner — But I planted thee a sycamore, a genuine; how then art thou chased, a me the degenerate shoots of thestrang. v. 21. By these wild grapes, or poison fruits, we must understand not merely poisonous grapes, such as wild grapes offensive to the smell, noxious, poison force and intent of the allegory, to good; to be opposed fruit of a dangerous in quality; as in the explanation of it, to true pomegranate, and to righteousness oppressed that is, in the true vine, in the common name of get several species under it: and Moses, the true vine, or that from which wine was pressed, calls it gephen hagaygin, the wild v. 4. Some of the other sorts were as

"And one, the field to gather pot herds, and he found and he gathered from it wild fruit, his lap went and shed them into the pot of pot he knew them not. And they poured on it to eat; and it came to pass as they were potage, that they cried out and said, 'The in the pot, O man of God! and they eat it, and he said, Bring meal; and he and the pot. And he said, Pour out for me they may eat. And there was nothing pot?' 2 Kings iv. 39. 41."

From some such poison its sorts of it, Moses has taken those strong and holy axes, with which he has set forth the renovation and extreme degeneracy of the vineyard which has a near relation, both and imagery, to this of Isaiah. Deut. vii. 19: "Their vine is from the vine of S. And from the fields of Gedorra. Their grapes are grapes of gall: Their clusters are bitter. Their wine is the poison of grape. And the cruel venom of asp.

"I am inclined to believe," says Hess the prophet here (Isa. v. 2, 1., means thence, adottor immatia. Because it is Egypt, Palestine and the East; and the agree well with it. The word of the vine is, well-grapes. The second says, It is well-known species of the vine, and sorts. The prophet could not be more opposite to the vine than this, rich in the vineyards, and is very wild, wherefore they rear it up. It produces a vine by its shrubry stalk." For see GRAPES, WILD, p. 471."
The following scriptural account of the cultivation of the vine, the vintage and the wines of Palestine, which will doubtless be acceptable to the reader, is taken from the "Investigator."

The Jews planted their vineyards most commonly on hills or even on the mountains, the stones being gathered out, and the space hedged round with thorns, or walled, Isa. v. 1–6; Ps. lxix. and Matt. xxi. 33. A good vineyard consisted of a thousand vines, and produced a rent of a thousand siclesings, or shekels of silver, Isa. vii. 53. It required two hundred more to pay the dressers, Cant. viii. 11, 12. In these, the keepers and vine-dressers labored, digging, planting, pruning and propping the vines, gathering the grapes and making wine. This was at once a laborious task, and often reckoned a base one, 2 Kings xxv. 12; Cant. i. 6; Isa. xli. 5. The vines with the tender grapes gave a good smell early in the spring, (Cant. i. 13) as we learn also from Isa. xviii. 5, etc. The harvest, that is, the barley-harvest, when the bud is perfect, and the sour grape is ripeening in the flower.

The Vintage followed the wheat harvest and the thrashing, (Lev. xxvi. 5; Amos ix. 13.) about June or July, when the clusters of the grapes were gathered with a sickle, and put into baskets, (Jer. viii. 9) carried and thrown into the wine-vat, or wine-press, where they were probably first trodden by men, and then pressed, Rev. xiv. 12–30. It is mentioned as a mark of the great work and power of the Messiah, that he had trodden the figurative wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with him, Isa. lxii. 3; Rev. xiv. 15. The vintage was a season of great mirth. Of the juice of the squeezed grapes were formed wine and vinegar.

The Wines of Canaan, being very hearty, were generally mixed with water for common use, as among the Italians; and they sometimes scented them with frankincense, myrrh, calamus and other spices; (Prov. x. 2; 2 Sam. xxii. 11) they also scented them with pomegranates, or made wine of their juice as we do of the juice of coryntums, gooseberries, &c. fermented with sugar. Wine is best when old, and on the lees, the dregs having sunk to the bottom, Isa. xxvi. 6. Sweet wine is that which is made from grapes full of sugar, kept, etc. of molinta, and two stones of vinegar: the one was a weak wine, which was used for their common drink in the harvest field, (Ruth ii. 14) as the Spaniards and Italians still do; and it was probably of this that Solomon was to furnish twenty thousand baths to Hiram for his servants, the heuven that cut timber in Lebanon, 2 Chron. ii. 10. The other had a sharp acid taste, like ours; and hence Solomon hints, that a slaggard hurts and vexes such as employ him in business, as vinegar is disagreeable to the teeth, and smoke to the eyes; (Prov. x. 26.) and as vinegar poured upon nitre spoils its virtue, so he that singeth songs to a heavy heart, does but add to his grief, chap. xxv. 20. The poor were allowed to glean grapes, as well as corn, and other articles: (Lev. xix. 10; Deut. xxiii. 25; Isa. lii. 14; chap. xvi. 6; xxiv. 13; Micah vii. 1) and we learn that the cleaning of the grapes of Ephraim was better than the vintage of Abiezer, Judg. viii. 2.

The vessels in which the wine was kept were probably, for the most part, bottles, which were usually made of leather, or goat-skins, firmly sewed and pitched together. (See BOTTLES.) The Arabs pull the skin off goats in the same manner that we do from rabbits, and sew up the places where the legs and tail were cut off, leaving one for the neck of the bottle, to pour from; and in such bags they put up and carry, not only their liquors, but dry things which are not apt to be broken; by which means they are well preserved from wet, dust or insects. These would in time crack and wear out. Hence, when the fathers had procured a bottle from a far country, amongst other things they brought wine bottles, old and new, and bound up where they had leaked, Josh. ix. 4, 13. Thus, too, it was not expedient to put new wine into old bottles, because the fermentation of it would break or crack the bottle, Matt. xix. 17. And thus David complains, that he had become like a bottle in the smoke; that is, a bottle dried and cracked, and worn out, and unfit for service, Ps. cxxix. 33. These bottles were probably of various sizes, and sometimes very large; for when Abigail went to meet David and his 400 men, and took a present to pacify and supply him, 200 loaves and five sheep, ready dressed, &c. she took only two bottles of wine; (1 Sam. xxv. 18.) a very disproportionate quantity, unless the bottles were large. But the Israelites had bottles likewise made by the potters. (See Isa. xxx. 14, marg.; Jer. x. 1, 10; ch. xlviii. 12.) We hear also of vessels called barrels. That of the widow, in which her meal was held, (1 Kings xvii. 12, 14.) was not, probably, very large; but those four in which the water was brought up from the sea, at the bottom of mount Carmel, to pour upon Elijah's sacrifice and altar, must have been large, 1 Kings xiii. 33. We read also of the water-jugs, or jars of stone, of considerable size, in which our Lord caused the water to be converted into wine, John ii. 6. See BOTTLES.

Grapes were also dried into raisins. A part of Abigail's present to David was 100 clusters of raisins; (1 Sam. xxv. 18.) and when Ziba met David, his present contained the same quantity, 2 Sam. xvi. 1; 1 Sam. xxx. 12; 1 Chron. xii. 40.

VINEGAR, see VINE, ad fin. See SERPENT.

VIRGIN, νεα, ἀθάνατος, παρθένος. properly signifies a young unmarried woman, or more generally, one who has preserved the purity of her body.

The authors of the books of the Maccabees, and Ecclesiasticus, speaking of the young unmarried women, give them the epithets, kept in, secluded, hidden, to distinguish them from young men, and females who occasionally appear in public; and Jerome preserves a distinction between bethula, a virgin, and almah, in that the latter is one who never has been seen by men. This is its proper significance, in the Punic or Phoenician language, which is well known, is the same as the Hebrew. It occurs in the famous passage of Isaiah, vii. 14: "Behold a virgin [almah] shall conceive, and bear a son." The Hebrew [according to some] has no term that more properly signifies a virgin, than almah; but it must be admitted, without lessening, however, the certainty or application of Isaiah's prophecy, that sometimes, by mistake, for instance, a young woman, whether truly a virgin or not, is called almah. Jerome remarks, that the prophet declined using the word bethula, which signifies a young woman, or young person, but employed the term almah, which denotes a virgin never seen by man. This is the proper import of the word, which is derived from a root that signifies to conceal. It is well known that young women, in the East, do not appear in public, but are shut up in their houses, and in their mothers' apartments, like nuns.

The Chaldee paraphrase and the Septuagint, translate almah by νεα, the, famous rabbit, a great enemy to Christ and Christians, who lived in the second century, understands it thus: the apostles and evangelists, and the Jews of our Saviour's time, explained it thus, and expected a Messiah born of a virgin; and, further, Mahomet and his followers acknowledge the virginity of the mother of our Lord.

[The above remarks are by Calmet. The English editor has subjoined a long discussion, in which he advances a theory (respecting Isa. vii. 14.) apparently his own, or at least unlike what any other person would be apt to strike upon. It is, however, so complicated, and rests on assumptions so obviously unfounded, that it would both be a waste of time to insert it here, and would only tend to mislead the reader.

Before entering on the consideration of the passage in question, a few words may be premised on the proper meaning of the Hebrew word נֵוָא, aleph, rendered every where virgin. The earlier interpreters all derive it from the Hebrew verb וָאָ, dem, to conceive, (so Jerome, as cited above,) with reference to the oriental custom of keeping young females shut up. But a more direct and far better etymology is found in the same word (aleph) as employed by the Arabs, among whom it signifies to grow up; whereas also they have derivative nouns, signifying adolescens and adolescentula, youth and young maiden (dicamath); so also the Syriac dianathai, from the same verb in Syriac. Hence derived, the idea of the Hebrew aleph, is young maiden, dianath, virgin, i.e. a young unmarried woman; without direct reference to chastity of person, although this is naturally implied. That this, however, is not necessarily to be understood, is obvious from Prov. xxx. 19, "The way of a man with a maid," where the Hebrew word is aleph, which is properly rendered by the English word maid, in its general significations, and not its special one of virgo inacta.

The passage in Isa. vii. 14-16, stands thus: Abaz having refused to ask a sign by which he may be assured of deliverance from the kings of Syria and Israel, the prophet exclaims: "Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign; behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that until he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." This prophecy Matthew quotes (Matt. i. 23.) as referring to the Messiah; and introduces his citation by the words, "Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled," etc.

In regard to this passage of Isaiah, we may say, that it must obviously either be understood as wholly prophetic of the Messiah, or else as having no reference to him, but as relating merely to a sign to be given to Abaz, viz. the birth of a son from the prophets within a certain time, within the period of whose childhood the promised deliverance should take place. Between these two there would seem to be no middle way, which does not lead to inextricable confusion and absurdity—whether we suppose a change of subject, the prophet speaking sometimes of Immamuel and sometimes of Sheer-jashub, which is mere hypothesis; or whether we suppose that the sign was to Abaz alone, but consisted in the birth of a child from a virgin who had not known man—a supposition from which there is no hint in history, nor any ground of necessity or probability.

The Messianic exposition has been that of the church at large, in all ages, down to the eighteenth century; except that some I with it a double sense, making it refer to Messiah and to an event in the time which there seems no rational who, since the middle of the last eon, the passage is prophetic of the Messiah word aleph as signifying a young woman, whether married or unmarried; or at pose that it might be employed of a woman, without a violation of usage. The wife of the prophet to be intended sign is, her conception and delivery, in accordance with this distinct and definite the fulfillment of this prediction will be king, that the promise of deliverance it will also be fulfilled. They suppose in the beginning of v. viii. is the the very fulfillment, where the prophet and goes in unto the prophetess, and bears a son; of whom it is said child shall have knowledge to cry My mother, the riches of Damascus and maria shall be taken away before the king, and I shall not look on the about to follow the birth of Immamuel viii. 3, the father is directed to call the shalal-hashab, instead of Immamuel, creates no greater difficulty, it is said 21, whereas, although this passage refers of Immamuel is quoted, yet the angel and the name of Mary's son Jesus, is asked, Moreover. Of what sign be to Abaz, which was first to the 700 years; or what connection could his deliverance from the invasion of Israel and Syria? Those who adopt exposition understand, of course, that Matthew to be made merely by way of an allusion to a fact or circumstance just as in Matt. ii. 15, it is said of Egypt have I called my son," quo xi. 1, where it refers simply and solely of Israel. It must indeed be admitted quotation in Matthew not extant, there be nothing to suggest that this passed could have any reference to the Messiah.

But, on the other hand, it is very difficult the conclusion, that the evangelist intended this passage as a direct prophecy of Messiah. I merely says, "that it might be fulfilled rendered, so that there was a full higher sense, i.e. as God formerly a son out of Egypt, so now his own well the Messiah. But here, in e. i., expressly, "Now all this was done, the fulfilled," i.e. intimating that all the previous to the birth of Christ had to do passage in Isaiah, and that the directly prophetic of these circumstances is as strong as possible; had intended to express this idea with the same and plainness, he could not probably any other language, or at least none in this view, too, coincide with the other prophesies of Messiah in Isa. ix. 6, and Micah v. 2.

In respect to the objection, that if the citation of the Messiah, it could be no be replied, that the prophet direct not much to Abaz, as to the piou or Abaz being, indeed, the representative nation. He had cast off the fear of God; the land was invaded; he had just contemned the promise of the Lord through his prophet. The people, or at least the pious part of them, feared the total destruction of the state. In these circumstances, the prophet reminds the people of their firm belief in the coming of a Messiah, and shows them that this belief is in contradiction with their present fear of the total downfall of the state. His language to them is: "Because the king has contemned the miraculous sign which I was commissioned to offer him, therefore God, through me, recalls to your minds that great event of the future, which is well known to you, although you now forget it, the miraculous birth of the Messiah. This may serve to you as a sign of present deliverance; for surely as that event will take place, so surely can the state not now come to destruction."

The words of verse 16 have occasioned much difficulty: "Before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." If the passage be taken as non-Messianic, these words are easy and natural; and they constitute, indeed, one of the greatest difficulties in the way of the other mode of exposition. The idea unquestionably is, that in the interval between the birth of the child and the time when it will begin to distinguish between good and evil, i.e., an interval of 3 or 4 years, the kingdoms of Israel and Syria will be overthrown. But how could the prophet say this, if the child was the Messiah; that child was 700 years old? The best, and indeed the only solution, seems to be that of Vitringa, Lowth, Koppe, Hengstenberg and others, which is as follows: The prophet, beholding the fullness of vision, sees all things as present; thus in c. ix. 6, he says, "Unto a child is born, unto a son is given;" so here we may with entire propriety translate, "Lo! the virgin conceives and brings forth a son," &c.—the prophet beholding, in vision, that the strict law, as the measure of the law before the deliverance of the land shall take place; i.e., the prophet assumes the time between the birth of this child and the development of his faculties, as the measure of the time before the deliverance of the country from its enemies. He means to say, that in the interval of 3 or 4 years, the fall of both the hostile kingdoms will take place. This he expresses by saying, that this interval will be the same as the interval from the birth of the child whom he now beholds in vision, to the age when this child will be able to choose the good and refuse the evil." (See Hengstenberg's Christologie, Th. ii. p. 69, seq.)

VOMIT. Supernatural presentation of certain scenery or circumstances to the mind of a person, while awake. (See DREAM, ad fin.) When Aaron and Miriam murmured against Moses, (Num. xii. 6—8,) the Lord said, "Hear now my words: if there be a prophet among you, I, the Lord, will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak to him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house; with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold." The false prophet Balaam, whose heart was perverted by covetousness, says of himself, that he had seen the visions of the Almighty, Numb. xxiv. 15, 16. In the time of the high-priest Eli, it is said, (1 Sam. iii. 1,) "The word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision;" literally, "the vision did not break forth, because an open vision was not vouchsafed to any prophet then existing."

To VISIT; VISITATION. These words are sometimes taken for a visit of mercy from God, but oftener for a visit of rigor and vengeance; day of visitation, year of visitation, or time of visitation, generally signifies the time of affliction and vengeance; or of close inspection.

VITELLIIUS, the censor, father of the emperor A. Vitellius, was made governor of Syria, at the expiration of his consulate, A. D. 35, the same year, or the year following, he came to Jerusalem at the feast of the passover, and was very magnificently entertained. He released the city from a tax on fruits; committed to the care of the Jews the high-priest's habit, with the pontifical praesidium, and the Romish pontiff was compelled to wear it; and the Romans had kept, till then, in the tower Antonia. He deposed Joseph Caiphas from the high-priesthood, and put in his place Jonathan, son of Ananus; but deprived him of his dignity two years afterwards, and put in Phanuel, his brother. (Josephus, Ant. v. 8. 6.)

VOLUME, see Book. VOW, a promise made to God of doing some good thing hereafter. The use of vows is observable throughout Scripture. Jacob, going into Mesopotamia, vowed the tenth of his estate, and promised to offer it, at Bethel, to the honor of God, Gen. xlvii. 22. Moses enacts several laws for the regulation and execution of vows. A man might not make himself or his children to the Lord. Jephthah devoted his daughter, (Judg. xii. 30, 31,) and Samuel was consecrated to the service of the Lord, 1 Sam. i. 21, &c. If a man or woman vowed themselves to the Lord, they were forbidden to change this service, according to the conditions of the vow; but in some cases they might be redeemed. A man from twenty years of age till sixty, gave fifty shekels of silver, and a woman thirty. From the age of five years to twenty, a man gave twenty shekels, and a woman ten: from a month old to five years, they gave for a boy five shekels, and for a girl three. A man of sixty years old or upwards, gave fifteen shekels, and a woman of the same age ten. If the person were poor, he was permitted to redeem himself, according to his abilities, Lev. xxvii. 3. See Devoting and Consecrate.

If any one vowed an animal that was clean, he had not the liberty of redeeming it, or of exchanging it, but must sacrifice it to the Lord. If it were an unclean animal, such as was not lawful in sacrifice, the priest made a valuation of it, and the proprietor, if he desired to redeem it, added a fifth part to the value, by way of fine. They did the same, in proportion, when the thing vowed was a house or a field. He could not devote the first-born, because, in their own nature, they belonged to the Lord. Whatever was devoted by anathema could not be redeemed, of whatever nature or quality it was; if an animal, it was put to death; and other things were devoted forever to the Lord, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. The consecration of Nazarites was a particular kind of vow, and had special rules. See Nazarites.

The vows and promises of children were void, of course, except ratified by the express or tacit consent of their parents, Numb. xxx. 1—5, &c. Also the vow of a married woman was of no validity, except confirmed by the express or tacit consent of her husband. But widows, or liberated wives, were bound by their vows, of whatever nature. Deut. xxiii. 21, 22, "When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not be slack to pay it; for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee, and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee." (See Eccl. v. 3, 4, &c.) Paul had a vow of Nazariteneship, when he left Cenchrea, (Acts xviii. 18,) and when he arrived at Jerusalem, James, the apostle, and the brethren, advised him to join four Judaizing Christians, who had a vow of Nazariteneship, and to contribute to the expenses of their purification in the temple, chap. xxi. 18, &c.

The vows of the Jews always implied a kind of unrequited kindness against themselves, if they failed in the performance. Such vows were generally expressed in a distinct and plain manner, but the penalty was declared conditionally or hypothetically. For example, Exod. xix. 17, "I have sworn in my wrath, and in my great heat, they shall enter into my rest." I have sworn they shall not enter, and I have said, Let me be a liar—or something else, not expressed—if they do enter. David vows to the Lord to build him a temple, saying, "Surely I will not come [or if I come] into the tabernacle of my house—until I find out a place for WAW

WAFER, in Scripture, a thin cake of fine flour, which was used in various offerings, anointed with oil, Ex. xxix. 22, Lev. ii. 14; vi. 15. R.

WAGES, reward for service performed. The wages, the reward, the deserved retribution, of sin is death, Rom. vi. 23.

WAGON, see CHARIOT.

WALK, WALKING. This word, in Hebrew, signifies, not merely to proceed or advance, step by step, steadily, but to proceed with increased velocity; it signifies to swell out louder a mutter note or voice, a crescendo, as musicians term it; and so, generally, to augment a moderate pace till it acquires rapidity. Under this idea, examine Isa. vi. 31: "The youths shall faint and grow weary, the young men shall utterly fall of their power; but they who wait on the Lord shall renew strength; shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk, shall increase their girth, augment their velocity, and not faint." The passage is often quoted by God Joshua Macal.
In the latter times of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we find their kings bearing the shock of the greatest powers of Asia, the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, Shalmaneser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, Esar-Haddon and Nebuchadnezzar, who made the whole East to tremble. Under the Macabees, the business was, with a small army, to separate the Jews of the kingdom of Syria, to uphold the religion of their fathers, and to free themselves from the despotism which designed to subvert both their religion and liberty. In the last times of their nation, with what courage, intrepidity, and constancy did they sustain the war against the Romans, now masters of the world!

Under Moses and Joshua, the Israelites were all soldiers, and men bearing arms. They came out of Egypt with 600,000 fighting men. When Joshua entered Canaan, he fought sometimes with detachments, and sometimes with his whole army. To signalize his omnipotence, and humile the pride of man, God often gave victory to very small armies, under Gideon, when he ordered that general to dismiss the greater part of his attendants, and only to keep with him three hundred men, with which he defeated innumerable multitude of Midianites and Amalekites. Saul and David.

We may distinguish two kinds of wars among the Hebrews. Some were of obligation, being expressly commanded by the Lord; others were free and voluntary. The first were such as those against the Amalekites, and the intrusive and wicked Canaanites, nations devoted to an anathema. The others were to avenge injuries, insults, or offences against the nation. Such was that against the city of Gibeah, and against the tribe of Benjamin beyond that of David against the Ammonites, whose king had insulted his ambassadors. Or they were to maintain and defend their allies, as that of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, to protect Gideon. In fact, the laws of Moses suppose that Israel might make war, and oppose enemies.

The first law of war is, that it should be declared to the enemy, and that reparation should be demand ed for the wrong supposed to have been suffered, before the enemy is attacked. The laws of the疵 (3 Kings xiv. 14, &c.) have the same effect.

In the sacred writings, we have several examples of defiance, challenge, or declaration of war; and complaints of those who were attacked, without having had war formally declared. When the Ammonites by surprise attacked the Israelites beyond that of David against the Ammonites, whose king had insulted his ambassadors. Or they were to maintain and defend their allies, as that of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, to protect Gideon. WAR ing-rams and slings. The Hebrew רָהַם, ear, (Ezek. iv. 1, 2; xxii. 32,) in Greek ἐχθρῆς, which Scripture uses to express this machine, signifies a real ram; by metaphor a machine, with which they battered down gates and walls of cities. Ezekiel, (xxvi. 8, 9,) speaking of this siege, alludes to the ancient manner of besieging places: "He shall slay with the sword daughters in the field, and he shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, and lift up the buckler against thee. And he shall set ensigns of war against thy walls, and with his axes he shall break down thy towers." When the ancients besieged a place, they usually surrounded it with mounds, towers and trenches, but the besieged might neither make sallies, nor receive succours from without. To make a tortoise as intimate what the Romans called facere testudinum, to make a tortoise; when they caused their soldiers to close each other to join their bucklers, in the form of a tortoise, in order to sap the walls, to beat away the earth. Cases of cords, were the Baschi of casting stones or darts; and cast away, and thrown on the house they were under. Of these iron walls, as it is understood, (Sam. xvii. 15,) then shall all Israel bring nigh the city, and we will draw it into the river, not one stone found there. But open and violent modes of attack, the every gate, and the king's gardens; sapping the fatal, method, of sapping a city: the besieged, the same mode for purgation of reining the works of the city, their enemies, or for the siege, when desperate. We have been living in Zedekiah; I went forth out of the king's gardens, by the walls; but he was overthrown, which it is said, "all the men of war fled by night, by the way of the gate between two walls, which is by the king's gardens (now the Chaldees were against the city round about)."—Should not this rather be understood, "by the rough, rugged way, or track, between two walls?" which is the one wall below the other, around a part of the king's gardens; rather "between the defences," that is, of the city, in that part of the works of defence which went round the king's gardens; for, as the Chaldeans surrounded the city, they would certainly watch every gate; and Zedekiah would hardly have chosen to issue by a regular and customary passage, since he wished for secrecy, and to screen himself from observation; in which, apparently, he in some degree succeeded. Thus understood, the history will agree with the figurative representation of it by Ezekiel; (chap. xii. 7,) "I brought forth my stuff, baggage, by day, as baggage for going into captivity; and in the evening, at twilight, I digged through the wall with mine own hand; I brought it—my baggage—forth, in the twilight: I bare it upon my shoulder," see verse 12. In like manner, Zedekiah passed over the precipices, or steps, and digged through a part of the defences of his city; and endeavoured to escape at this breach made by his own hands, or his own order in his own fortification. Probably, too, Zedekiah carried about his person whatever of valuables he from his palace; so that the resemblance in loading himself with baggage, was altogether, perfect. It might be more con aware of, if Zedekiah digged the breach himself, not merely in which we see no improbability; and also have a subterraneous passage of before he issued from the wall into at WASHING, purification. WEEK. Among the Hebrews the kinds of weeks: (1.) Week of days, or one sabbath to another. [The Jews we ed, instead of the term week, to make of expression eight days; just as the Gerri present day; and just as we also say, fourteen nights] instead of two weeks, to serve to illustrate John xx. 26, where are said to have met again after "eight days," i.e. evidently after a week; on the eighth day after our Lord's resurrection. R.] (2.) Weeks of years, reckoned from one sabbatical year to another, and consisting of seven years. (3.) Weeks of seven times seven years, or of forty-nine years, reckoned from one jubilee to another.

WEIGHTS. The Hebrews weighed all the gold and silver they used in trade. The shkel, the halfshkel, the talent, are not only denominations of moneys, of certain values, in gold and silver, but also of certain weights. The Weight of the Sanctuary, or Weight of the Temple, (Exod. xxi. 13, 24; Lev.
v. 15; Numb. iii. 50; vii. 19; xviii. 16, &c.) was probably the standard weight, preserved in some apartment of the temple, and not a different weight from the common shkel; (1 Chron. xxiii. 29;) for though Moses appoints, that all things valued by their price in silver should be rated by the weight of the sanctuary, (Lev. xxvi. 35;) he makes no diffERENCE between this shkel, or shkel, and the twenty gerahs, and the common shkel. Ezekiel, (xlv. 12;) speaking of the ordinary weights and measures used in traffic among the Jews, says, that the shkel weighed twenty oboli, or gerahs;—it was therefore, in the morning, when we had, or twenty gerahs, the common shkel. Neither Josephus, nor Philo, nor Jerome, nor any ancient author, speaks of a distinction between the weights of the temple and those in common use.

Besides, the custom of preserving the standards of weights and measures in temples is not peculiar to the Hebrews. The Egyptians, as Clements Alexandrinus informs us, had an officer in the college of priests, whose duty it was to examine all sorts of measures, and to take care of the originals; the Romans had the same custom. Fannius, de Amphora; and the emperor Justinian decreed, that standards of weights and measures should be kept in Christian churches.

A weight of glory, of which Paul speaks, (2 Cor.
iv. 17,) is opposed to the lightness of the evils of this life. The troubles we endure are really of no more weight than a feather, or of no weight at all, if compared to the weight or intenseness of that glory, which shall be hereafter a compensation for them.
In addition to this, it is probable the apostle had in view the double meaning of the Hebrew word cedeb, which signifies not only weight, but glory: glory, that is, intensity, is in the one word cedeb, or nature;
but in the other world it may be real, at once substancial and radiant.

WELLS, or SPRINGS, are frequently mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews call a well beer; whence this word is often compounded with proper names, as Beer-sheba, Beer-oth-bene-jaaakan, Beer-oth, Beerah, &c.

How little do the people of this country understand feelingly those passages of Scripture which speak of want of water, of paying for that necessary fluid, and of the strife for such a valuable article as a well! So we read, "Abraham reproved Abimel-heech, because of a well of water, which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away," Gen. xxv. 25.
So, chap. xxvi. 29, "The herdsmen of Gerar did smite with Isaac's herdsmen; and he called the well Ezkok, contention."—To what extremities contention about a supply of water may proceed, we learn from the following extracts:—Our course lay along shore, betwixt the main land and a chain of little islands, with which, as likewise with rocks and shoals, the sea abounds in this part; and for that reason, it is the practice with all three vessels to anchor every evening; we generally brought up close to the shore, and the land-breeze springing up about midnight, wafted to us the perfumes of Arabia, with which it was strongly impregnated, and very fragrant; the latter a parcel of about a quart such morning, and continued till eight, when it generally fell calm for two or three hours, and after that the northerly wind set in, after obliging us to anchor under the lee of the land by noon. It happened that on the morning we had been among the weather into a small bay, called Birk bay, the country around it being inhabited by the Budoes, [Bo-dowemeis,] the Noquedah sent his people on shore
o get water, for which it is always customary to pay.
The Budoes were, as the people thought, rather too ex-ceptant in their demands, and not choosing to comply with them, returned to make their report to their master. On hearing it, rage immediately seized him, and, determined to have the water on his own terms,
or perish in the attempt, he buckled on his armor, and attended by his myrmidons, carrying their match-lock guns and lances, being twenty in number, they rowed to the land. My Arabian servant, who went on shore with the first party, and the Budoes were for fighting, told me that I should certainly see a battle. I accordingly looked on very anxiously, hoping that the fortune of the day would be on the side of my friends; but Heaven ordained it otherwise for, after a parcel of about an hour, with which the Budoes amused them till near a hundred were assembled, they proceeded to the attack, and routed the sailors, who made a precipitate retreat, the Noquedah and two others having fallen in the action, and several being wounded; they contrived, however, to bring off their dead, &c.
(Major Rooke's Travels from India to England,
page 53.)

This extract especially illustrates the passage in Numb. xxv. 12:—"We will not drink of the water of the wells:—If I and my cattle drink of thy water, then will I pay for it."—This is always expected; and though Edom might, in friendship, have let his brother Israel drink gratis, had he recollected their rancor against his nation, and the family feud;
they contrived, however, to bring off their dead, &c.
(Major Rooke's Travels from India to England,
page 53.)

WICKED, vicious, sinful. "The wicked one," taken absolutely, is generally put for the devil: "Deliver us from the wicked or evil one." (Matt. vi. 13;)

w "Then counsel the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart," Matt. xiii. 19.
The evil day (Ephes. vi. 13) is the day of temptation, or trial; the day in which one is most in danger of downfall, envy, rancor, worldliness, being opposed to liberality and charity. Or it may denote a grudging or malign aspect. In the East, they believe the eye to have great powers of striking the party looked on; and perhaps the phrase alludes to this: a mischievous, malignant, injurious direction of the eye; eye-shot, as our poets speak.
"daring malignant fires."

WIDOW. Widowhood, as well as bareness, was a kind of shame and reproach in Israel. Isaiah (iv. 4.) says, "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, [passed in celibacy and barrenness,] and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more." It was presumed, that a woman of merit and reputation might have found a husband, either in the family of her deceased husband, if he be dead childless, (see MARRIAGE,) or in some other family, if he had left children. It is true, indeed, that a widow was commanded, when, from affection to her first husband, declined a second marriage, and continued in mourning and widowhood, as was the case of Judith.

It was thought the greatest misfortune that could happen to a man, to die, and not be bewailed by his widow; that is, without receiving the solemn honors of a funeral, which the tears and praises of the widow made a chief part. The wicked and his children shall die, says Job, "and their widows shall not mourn for them." (chap. xxvii. 15.) and the psalmist, speaking of the lamentable death of Hophni and Phinehas, observes, as a great disaster, that they were not bewailed by their widows, Ps. cxvi. 64.

God frequently recommends to his people to be very careful in relieving the widow and orphan, Exod. xxii. 22; Deut. x. 18; xiv. 29, et passim. Paul would have us honor widows that are widows indeed, and desolate; (1 Tim. v. 3, &c.) that is, the bishop should have a great regard for them, and supply them in their necessity; for this is often signified by the verb to honor. God forbids his high-priest to marry a woman who is either a widow, or divorced, Lev. xxi. 11.

Formerly there were widows in the Christian church, who, because of their poverty, were placed on the list of persons to be provided for at the expense of the church. There were others, who had certain employments in the church; as, to visit sick women, to assist women at baptism, and to do several things which decency would not permit to the other sex. Paul did not allow any woman to be chosen into this number, unless she were three-score years old, at least, 1 Tim. v. 9. Such must have been marbred but once; must have produced sufficient testimony of their good works; must have given good education to their children; must have exercised hospitality, washed the feet of the saints, and bestowed succor on the miserable and afflicted. He forbids that young widows should be admitted among these, or, at least, among such as were on the church list for maintenance.

WILDERNESS, see DESERT.

WILL. Besides the common acceptation of this word, to signify that faculty of willing, with which we are endued; that is, of choosing, desiring and loving, it is taken, (1.) For the absolute and immu-nitable will of God, which nothing can withstand, as the Sirocco which he had felt at Malta, and which also prevails in Sicily and Italy; except that the Sirocco, in passing over the sea, acquires great dampness. The Sirocco is described by Brydone, as resembling a blast of burning steam from the mouth of an oven. For several months, the air seemed to it fine, every fibre relaxed in an extraordinary manner. This wind is more or less violent, and of longer or shorter duration at different times; seldom lasting more than 30 or 40 hours; and, notwithstanding its scourging heat, it has never been known to produce epidemic disorders, or to do any injury to the health of the people. These characteristics, except the dampness, apply entirely to the east wind of Palestine, which is dry and withering.

Many interpreters, however, have chosen to render the kadhir, or east wind of the Scriptures, to the oft described wind of the desert, called by the Arabs Simeon, (Samoen, Sannoem, or Sounam,) by the Turks Samiel, and in Egypt Cansau; which has long retained the character of a pestilential wind, suddenly overtaking travellers and caravans in the deserts, and almost instantly destroying them by its poisonous and suffocating breath. The result, however, of the researches of more modern and judicious travellers, seemingly show, that the former accounts of the destructive power of this wind have been, at least, much exaggerated; and that the authors of these accounts either had their credulity imposed upon by the Arabs, or else have described certain facts in such a way, as to impart to them a color and cause them to make an impression which the naked facts themselves would not warrant.

Among writers of this class, we may probably reckon with justice Mr. Bruce and sir R. K. Porter. The latter has every where given the first accounts which he received from by-standers, as matters of fact; without ever seeming himself to have any question of their correctness, and usually without even indicating that they are not matters of his own personal knowledge or experience. In 1830 and 1831, Messrs. Smith and Dwight, American missionaries, travelled in Armenia over much of the same ground as this writer; and they do not hesitate to affirm that his accounts are, in general, to be received with great distrust, and that not a few of his statements are in direct variance with the reality. In regard to Mr. Bruce, it is well known, that his book was generally considered, on the first appearance of it, as a mere romance; later travellers, however, have confirmed the accuracy of his general knowledge; and even established the fact, that his work has a broad basis of truth at the bottom; while it is well understood, that in filling up the details he drew largely from his imagination—not perhaps with the design of stating any falsehood, he did not suppose it to be true; but partly in consequence of that tendency to exaggeration and high coloring, which is the characteristic of so many minds; and partly, no doubt, from the circumstance, that his narrative was first written out, sixteen years after the events therein described, when the whole had become to him, in a measure, like a dream. Mr. Salt, his Travels in Abyssinia, has produced some strong instances, on the part of Bruce, of aberration from strict veracity and manifold frankness.

After these preliminary remarks, we proceed to give the accounts of the Simeon as furnished by various travellers, placing that of sir R. K. Porter first, as being, although one of the latest, yet, probably, one of the most exaggerated.

At Bagdad, October 9, 1818, sir R. K. Porter informs us, (Travels, vol. ii. p. 220,) the master of the khan, "told me, that they consider October the first month of their autumn, and feel it delightfully cool in comparison with July, August and September; for that during forty days of the two first-named summer months, the air was hot enough to drive him, and its effects are often destructive. Its title is very appropriate, being called the Samiel, or Baude Semoon, the pestilential wind. It does not come in continued long currents, but in gusts at different intervals, each blast lasting several minutes, and passing along with the rapidity of lightning. No one dare stir from their houses while this invisible flame is sweeping over the face of the country. Previous to its approach, the atmosphere becomes thick and suffocating; and appearing particularly dense near the horizon, gives sufficient warning of the threatened mischief. Though hostile to human life, it is so far from being prejudicial to the vegetable creation, that a continuance of the Simeon tends to ripen the fruits. I inquired what became of the cattle during such a plague, and was told they were seldom touched by it. It seems strange that their lungs should be so perfectly insensible to what seems instant destruction to the breath of man; but so it is, and they are regularly driven down to a certain time on a cloud of this day, even when the blasts are at the severest. The people who attend them are obliged to plaster their own faces and other parts of the body usually exposed to the air, with a sort of muddy clay, which in general protects them from the most malignant effects.

The periods of the winds' blowing are generally from noon till sunset; they cease almost entirely during the night; and the direction of the gust is always from the north-east. When it has passed over, a sulphuric, and indeed loathsome smell, like putridity, remains for a long time. The poison which occasions this smell must be deadly; for if any unfortunate traveller, too far from shelter, meet the blast, he falls immediately; and, in a few minutes his flesh becomes almost black, while both his body and his bones are once arrive at so extreme a state of corruption, that the smallest movement of the body would separate the one from the other."

It is but justice to sir R. K. Porter to say, that his account of the Simeon tallies entirely with that given by Chardin in his Travels in Persia. Both travellers doubtless drew from similar sources—the stories of the common people. Chardin says, (Travels, vol. iii. p. 286. edit. of Lang&c.) that "this wind blows with a great noise, apparently have establish'd the fact, that his work has a broad basis of truth at the bottom; while it is well understood, that in filling up the details he drew largely from his imagination—not perhaps with the design of stating any falsehood, he did not suppose it to be true; but partly in consequence of that tendency to exaggeration and high coloring, which is the characteristic of so many minds; and partly, no doubt, from the circumstance, that his narrative was first written out, sixteen years after the events therein described, when the whole had become to him, in a measure, like a dream. their nostrils to the earth, and men, by covering their heads in their mantles, have nothing to fear from these meteors. This demonstrates the impossibility, that a poison, which can only penetrate the most delicate parts of the brain or lungs, should calcine the skin, flesh, nerves, and bones. I acknowledge that accounts are had from the Arabs themselves; but their picturesque and extravagant expressions are a kind of imaginary coin, to know the true value of which requires some practice. *"I have twice had an opportunity of considering the effect of these siphons, with some attention. I shall relate simply what I have seen in the case of a merchant and two travellers, who were struck during their sleep, and died on the spot. I ran to see if it was possible to afford them any succor, but they were already dead, the victims of an interior suffocating fire. There were apparent signs of the dissolution of their fluids; a kind of intense mixture issued from the nostrils, mouth and ears; and in something more than an hour, the whole body was in the same state. However, as, according to their custom, they (the Arabs) were diligent to pay them the last duties of humanity, I cannot affirm that the putrefaction was more or less rapid than usual in that country. As to the meteor itself, it may be exactly estimated at a distance of three or four fathoms; and the country people are only afraid of being surprised by it when they are asleep; neither are such accidents very common, for these siphons are only seen during two or three months of the year; and as their approach is felt, the camp-guard and the people awake, are always very careful to rouse those that sleep, who also have a general habit of covering their faces with their mantles."

All these accounts bear upon the face of them, the stamp of exaggeration. But this is not all. Of the accounts of Chardin, Mr. Morier, well known as a judicious observer, remarks, in speaking of this very passage, (p. 63) "On inquiry, we learned that the present inhabitants of these countries (around the Persian gulf) know nothing of the fatal effects of this wind upon those who are exposed to it, and of which this traveller [Chardin] addresses examples. The "sand" and "kiss" occasions great devastation in this region; it was introduced, and is especially destructive to the vegetation. About six years before, this wind blew during all the summer months, and destroyed all the grain, then nearly ripe, in such a manner, that no animal would touch a leaf or kernel of it." This account is borne pretty probable in itself; apart from the well-known character of the writer; and it is also sustained by the following extract from the Journal of Mr. Jackson, who made the overland journey from India to England in 1795. This writer gives the following account of this wind, which is probably very near the truth:

When on the Tigris, about five days' journey from Bagdad, (in the same region as sir R. K. Porter, he remarks: "I had here an opportunity of observing the progress of the hot winds, called by the natives "sand," which sometimes proves very destructive, particularly at this season. They are most dangerous between twelve and three o'clock, when the atmosphere is at its greatest degree of heat. Their force entirely depends on the surface over which they pass. If it be over a desert, where there is no vegetation, they extend their dimensions with amazing velocity, and then their progress is sometimes to windward; if over grass, or any other vegetation, they soon diminish and lose much of their force; if over water, they lose all their electrical force, and ascend have a where penal bating a hot and his circum he dec present others appears no trace of the poisonous Simoom on the way between Bassorah and Aleppo.

"According to the Arabs, both men and beasts are suffocated by this wind, in the same manner as by the ordinary hot wind, of which I have spoken above. When the heat of the season is extraordinarily great, there comes a black blizzard which is still hotter; and when men or beasts have already become so weak as almost to perish from the heat, it would seem that this additional degree of heat, though small, takes away their breath entirely. In the case of those who are suffocated by this wind, or, as they say, whose heart has burst, it is said that the blood starts from the nose and ears sometimes in two hours after death. Their bodies are said to remain a long time warm, to swell, to turn blue and green, and, if the attempt is made to raise them by the leg or arm, this separates itself at once. Some profess to have observed, that those who are not previously so weakened, usually suffer less; and, hence, in a large caravan, sometimes not more than four or five have died on the spot, while others have lived several hours, and some have even been restored by refreshing cordials. The Arabs, it is said, take with them leeks and raisins upon their journeys, and by means of these they have often relieved persons who were well nigh suffocated.

"After this description of the Simoom, it will readily be supposed, that I had no great inclination to make the experiment proposed in the 34th question of Professor Michaelis. And even if I had kept everything in readiness for this purpose, my trouble would all have been in vain, for I have myself never met with this wind.

The preceding extracts relate chiefly to the interior of Arabia and Asia; those which follow refer more to Africa, and the southern coast of Arabia. The first which we shall give, go to show that the Simoom has in general the same bad name in these regions as in other places.

Malliet, in speaking of the great Hadj, or annual caravan of pilgrims from Egypt to Mecca, remarks: (Let. xiv. p. 233.) "If the north wind happens to fail, and that from the south comes in its place, which, however, is rather uncommon, then the whole caravan, which, at any rate, contains three or four hundred persons are wont to lose their lives; and even greater numbers, as fifteen hundred, of whom the greatest part are stitied on the spot, by the fire and dust of which this fatal wind seems to be composed."

The same writer, in narrating the events attending the caravans that pass between Egypt and Nubia, further remarks: (Lett. dem. p. 218.) "The danger is infinitely greater when the south wind happens to blow in these deserts. The least rashness that it produces is the making dry their leather bottles, or goat skins filled with water, which they are obliged to carry with them in these journeys, and by this means depriving both man and beast of the only relief they have against its violent heats. This wind, which the Arabs call poisouneus, stites on the spot those that are unfortunate enough to breathe in it; so that to guard against its pernicious effects, they are obliged to throw themselves speedily on the ground, with their face close to these burning sands, with which they are surrounded, and to cover their heads with some cloth or carpet, lest, in respiration, they should suck in that deadly quality which every where attends it. People ought even to think themselves very happy when this wind, which is always, besides, very violent, does not raise up large quantities of sand with a whirling motion, which, darkening the air, renders their guides incapable of discerning their way. Sometimes whole caravans have been buried by this means under the sand, with which this wind is frequently charged."

The next traveller whom we quote is Mr. Bruce, who speaks more in detail, and professes to give the results of his own personal experience. On the general character of his work, and the degree of confidence to be placed in the accuracy of his narratives, we have made some remarks above. (p. 237.) His account is as follows:

"On the 16th, at half-past ten, we left El Mont At eleven o'clock, while we contemplated with great pleasure the rugged top of Chiggré, to which we were fast approaching, and where we were to solace ourselves with a view of good sea air. "Fall upon your faces, for here is the Simoom!" I saw from the S. E. a haze come, in color like the purple part of the rainbow, but not so compressed or thick. It did not occupy twenty yards in breadth, and was always to be felt high up in the ground. It was a kind of blast upon the air, and it moved very rapidly, for I scarce could turn to fall upon the ground, with my head to the northward, when I felt the heat of its current plainly upon my face. We all lay flat on the ground, as if denied to fly; it was blown over. The meteor, or purple haze, which I saw, was indeed passed, but the light air that still blew was of heat to threaten suffocation. For my part, I found distinctly in my breath that I had imbibed a part of it, nor was I free of an astonishing sensation, till I had been some months in Italy, at the baths of Poreta, near two years afterwards. A universal despondency had taken possession of our souls. They ceased to speak to one another, and when they did, it was in whispers, by which I easily guessed that they were increasing each others' fears, by vain suggestions, calculated to sink each other's spirits still further. . . . This phenomenon, of the Simoom, occurring but seldom, though foreseen by Idris, caused us all to relapse into our former despondency. It still continued to blow, so as to exhaust us entirely, though the blast was so weak as scarcely would have raised a leaf from the ground. At the end of twenty minutes, the Simoom ceased, and a comfortable and cooling breeze came by starts from the north." (Vol. iv. p. 558, 559.)

"We had no sooner got into the plains than we felt great symptoms of the Simoom, and about a quarter before twelve, our men fell down. Our guide, Idris, cried out, The Simoom! The Simoom! My curiosity would not suffer me to fall down without looking behind me; about due south, a little to the east, I saw the colored haze as before. It seemed now to be rather less compressed, but had a tinge of blue. The edges of it were not defined as those of the former; but like a very thin smoke, with about a yard in the middle tinged with those colors. We all fell upon our faces, and the Simoom passed with a gentle rushing wind. It continued to blow in this manner till near three o'clock; so that we were all taken ill at night, and scarcely strength was left us to load the camels." (Vol. iv. p. 581.)

"The Simoom with the wind at S. E. immediately followed the wind at N. and the usual despondency that always accompanied it. The blue meteor, with which it began passing over us about twelve, and the ruffling wind that followed it, continued till near two. Silence, and a desperate kind of indifference about life, were the immediate effects upon us; and I began, seeing the condition of my camels, to fear we were all doomed to a sandy grave, and to contemplate it with some degree of resignation.

"I here began to provide for the worst. I saw the fate of our camels first approaching, and that our means of escape were not enough to relieve our situation; our bread, too, began to fail us, although we had plenty of camel's flesh in its stead; our water, though to all appearance we were to find it more frequently than in the beginning of our journey, was nevertheless brackish, and scarce served the purpose to quench our thirst; and above all, the dreadful Simoom had perfectly exhausted our strength, and brought upon us a degree of cowardice and languor, that we struggled with in vain." (Vol. t. p. 582, 284).

Such is the strongest evidence which is or can be brought forward, to establish the poisonous qualities of the Simoom, or wind of the desert. We must now reverse the picture, and produce the evidence to show that all these stories probably rest either upon the gross exaggeration of the writers, or imagination of exaggeration. Our first witness is Burchardi, who lived and travelled, from 1810 to 1811 inclusive, in Syria, Arabia, and the countries between these, in Egypt, Nubia, Soudan, &c.—in all the great residua in which he gives the account, the Simoom is said to be prevalent. He was, moreover, thoroughly acquainted with the language, and travelled everywhere as a native, which of course gave him far greater facilities of obtaining information than fall to the lot of other European artists. His good judgment and extreme accuracy are everywhere apparent, and are also vouched for by all subsequent travellers. In describing his journey across the great Nubian desert, in 1814, the same which Mr. Bruce crossed, he gives the results of all his observations upon the Simoom, in the following manner:

"March 22, 1814.—At the end of five hours we halted in a Wady. The wind was still southerly. I again inquired, as I had often done before, whether my companions had often experienced the Semoom, which we translate by the poisonous blast of the desert, but which is nothing more than a violent south-east wind. They answered in the affirmative, but none had the remotest idea of its having proved fatal. Its worst effect is, that it dries up the water in the skins, and so far endangers the traveller's safety. In these southern countries, however, [Nubia], water-skins are made of very thick cow-linen, which are almost impenetrable to the Semoom. In Arabia and Egypt, on the contrary, the skins of sheep or goats are used for this purpose; and I [afterwards] witnessed the effect of a Semoom upon them, in going from Giza to Suez, in 1815, when in one morning a third of the contents of a full water-skin was evaporated. I have repeatedly been exposed to the hot wind, in the Syrian and Arabian deserts, in Upper Egypt and Nubia. The hottest and most violent I ever experienced was at Susakin, [on the Sudan coast of the Red sea.] yet, even there, I felt no particular inconvenience from it, although exposed to all its fury in the open plain. For my own part, I am perfectly convinced, that all the stories which travellers, or the inhabitants of the towns of Egypt and Syria, relate of the Semoom of the desert, are greatly exaggerated; and I never could hear of a single well authenticated instance of its having mortified, either to man or beast. The fact is, that the Bedouins, when questioned on the subject, often frighten the strange people with tales of men, and even of whole caravans, having perished by the effects of the wind; when, upon close inquiry, no person whom they find not ignorant of the state, they will state the plain truth. I never on the Semoom blows close to the ground, a great deal more bears the south-east wind, when it appears as if it was in a state of combustion, and sand and are carried high into the air, with a reddish, or bluish, or yellowish tint, as nature, and color of the ground, from which rises. The yellow, however, always predominates. In looking through a glass of yellow color, one may form a pretty clear appearance of the air, as I observed on a stormy Semoom at Esn, in Upper Egypt on 1818. The Semoom is not always accompanied with wind; in its less violent degree, it has its hours with little force, although with opposite directions, as the whirlwind which rises the dust, it is much less even than several hours in a state, on longer than the whole weather. The most disagreeable effect of the Semoom is, that it stirs up the perspiration, dries up the skin, and produces blisters. I never saw a man down flat upon his face, to escape the Semoom, but as Bruce describes himself to be crossing this desert, I think the air seldom remains longer than a few hours in this state, or longer than the whole.

The Semoom is not always accompanied with wind; in its less violent degree, it has its hours with little force, although with opposite directions, as the whirlwind which rises the dust, it is much less even than several hours in a state, on longer than the whole weather. The most disagreeable effect of the Semoom is, that it stirs up the perspiration, dries up the skin, and produces blisters. I never saw a man down flat upon his face, to escape the Semoom, but as Bruce describes himself to be crossing this desert, I think the air seldom remains longer than a few hours in this state, or longer than the whole.
Arabia Petraea, in the years 1817 and 1818; but returned to Europe in this latter year, in order to make the necessary preparations, and examine those of the adjacent regions in a more scientific manner. He pursued the necessary studies, both in natural philosophy and natural history, at the university of Pavia, under the general advice and direction of the celebrated astronomer, Baron von Zach; and procured also an apparatus of astronomical and other instruments. Thus prepared, he arrived in Egypt in the beginning of 1822, and continued to reside and travel in that country, in Nubia, Kordofan, and south-western Arabia, until the middle of 1827. His remarks upon the wind of the desert are contained in the following extract, and are those of a scientific observer:—

“During the march from Suez to Cairo, I had opportunity to make a meteorological observation, which surprised me, and which may perhaps lead to interesting results. It was on the 21st of May, 1822, at the distance of seven hours [about 22 miles] from Cairo, that we were overtaken by the violent south wind, of which forewarned travellers have given the most strange and incredible accounts. Not long after sunrise, we had been during the night a light wind from the north-east, there sprung up a fresh breeze from the south-south-east, which by degrees increased to a violent gale. Clouds of dust filled the whole atmosphere to such a degree, that one could recognize nothing fifty paces off; not even a camel was to be distinguished at this distance. Along the surface of the earth there was a constant current, which I supposed to arise from the rolling sand, which the wind lashed so impetuously. All those parts of our bodies which were turned towards the wind, were uncommonly heated; and we experienced a most painful feeling of pain, somewhat like the prickling of needles, accompanied by a peculiar sound. I supposed, at first, that this feeling of pain in the exposed parts of the body, was caused by the small stones which were borne along by the tempest and hurled against us; and in order to judge of the size of these stones, I attempted to catch some of them with my cap; but how great was my surprise, when I found I could not succeed in obtaining a single one of these supposed stones. I now remarked, for the first time, that this painful feeling in the skin was not caused by the stones or sand, but was rather the effect of some invisible physical power, which I could compare only with the passing off of a stream of electric fluid. After this first conjecture, I began to think that the phenomena were more closely connected with the human mind and me. I noticed, that our hair became more or less erect; and that the prickling pain in the skin was especially perceptible in the joints and at the extremities, just as if I had been exposed to an electric shock upon an isolated stool. In order to convince myself entirely, that this feeling of pain did not arise from the stroke of stones or sand, I stretched a sheet of paper, and held it against the wind. The smallest stone or grain of sand, and even what is called sand, would have been distinctly perceptible to the ear or eye; but nothing of this took place. The surface of the paper remained unchanged and noiseless. I now stretched out my arm, and the prickling pain was immediately increased at the extremities of my fingers. These observations led me very strongly to conjecture, that the violent wind known in Egypt by the name of Cassius, is either accompanied by a large quantity of the electric fluid, or else that this is occasioned by the motion of the dry sand in the desert. Hence the thick clouds of dust which accompany this wind, consisting of isolated atoms or grains of sand, and of the air produced by the hot sun in a cloudless sky. In this way one could perhaps explain how this wind might, through its electrical properties, sometimes prove fatal to caravans, as has been related by some travellers. I must, however, here remark, that in the countries through which I have travelled, I have never heard the least hint of any such accident. At any rate, the supposition that such a calamity might be occasioned by the caravan's being buried under the sand, is most ridiculous.

“The Cassius, or gale from the south-east, usually blows in Egypt two or three days at a time, with less violence, however, during the night. It occurs only in the interval between the middle of April and the middle of June; hence its Arabic name, which signifies fifty, or the fifty days' wind. It is much to be wished, that scientific travellers, provided with the proper instruments, may subject the electrical quality of this wind to an accurate examination; but for this purpose it would be necessary to select an intermediate station than Cairo, or any other inhabited place, where, in consequence of the vicinity of trees, or houses, or towers, the electricity of the air would be already weakened or lost. The observer of the Cassius must betake himself across the flat of the desert, far from all running or standing water, where the wind shows itself in its full strength; and there may he with certainty expect, that his investigations will lead to interesting and important results.”

In a note appended to this passage, M. Rüppell further remarks: “I had myself opportunity, a year afterwards, to make some investigations in Dongola, respecting the electricity which accompanies violent gales in Africa. It was during a gale which occurred in that province, on the 7th of April, 1823. The instrument employed was the common Voltaic straw-electrometer. On the first experiment, at 8 o'clock A.M. while it was blowing violently from N. N. W. from the great African desert, and the thermometer stood at 10° of Reaumur, [68° Fahr.] the electricity of the air was at its maximum; the straw instantly touched the sides of the bottle. The electricity was negative. At 10 o'clock, during a whirlwind, with the like temperature, the electrometer showed ten degrees, and that positive. About 12 o'clock, the wind had somewhat abated; the thermometer stood at 16°, [72°] and the electrometer showed only four degrees, negative. Afterwards, as the wind abated more, the electricity of the air disappeared entirely.”

To these statements of Burckhard and Rüppell, it is almost unnecessary to add, that they are confirmed by the oral testimony of the American missionaries, who have visited those regions. The Rev. Mr. Smith, in particular, stated expressly to the editor, that so far as his opportunities of experience and inquiry, in Egypt and Palestine, had extended, the views given by Burckhard were entirely correct. We must, therefore, renounce the old prevalent idea of the poisonous nature of the hot wind of the desert; while it may no doubt be true, that individuals, previously exhausted by the heat of the season, have sunk under the augmented heat of this wind, in the manner described above; this wind, and as is, also, not very seldom the case in the more sultry days even of our own climate. In the caravans, too, which cross these arid wastes, there are always more or less who are feeble and languid, and who thus may be easily overcome, and perish by a greater degree of heat, and especially by a sudden augmentation of it through a sultry wind. The great Hadji route, across the desert El Tyh, is stewed with the bones of animals, and studded with the graves of pilgrims, that have died on the route, from fatigue, exhaustion, disease, &c. but not in general from any fatal influence of the wind, or atmosphere. (See the extracts from Burckhardt, under Exod., p. 416.)

WINE. (See Vynx, ad fin.) Hardly any sacrifices were made to the Lord, without being accompanied by libations of wine, Exod. xxix. 40; Numb. xv. 5, 7. Its use, however, was forbidden to the priests during the time they were in the tabernacle, employed in the service of the altar, (Lev. x. 9.) as it was also to the Nazarites, Numb. vi. 3.

Wine, or the cup in which it is contained, often represents the anger of God: “Thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment,” Ps. ix. 3. “In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same. But the eyes thereof are all the wicked shall wring them out and drink them,” Ps. lxxv. 8. The Lord says to Jeremiah, (chap. xxv. 15.) “Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it.”

Wine was administered medically to such as were sinking in trouble and sorrow: (Prov. xxxi. 4–6.) “Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts.” The rabbins tell us, that it was customary to give wine and strong liquors to criminals condemned to die, at their execution, to stupefy them, to abate their fear, and dull the sense of their pain. There were certain charitable women at Jerusalem, they say, who used to send them drugs with wine, to make it stronger, and more effectual in diminishing the sense of pain. It is thought a mixture of this kind was offered to our Saviour to drink, before he was fastened to the cross: (Mark xv. 23.) “And they gave him to drink, mingled with myrrh; but he received it not.”

Wine of Hebron (Ezek. xxvii. 18.) was of a kind of excellent wine, sold at the fairs of Tyre. It was made at Damascus.

Wine of astonishment (Ps. ix. 3.) may represent the cup of God’s anger, with which he infects the wicked; or rather, according to the Hebrew, the cup of the wine of affliction, irrigated with its lees; it might also be translated, wine of trembling, that produces death, that poisons, that stupifies, Ps. lxxv. 8. The LXX translate it, wine that strikes inwardly, that causes affliction, or compunction: Aquila, wine of superstition; Symmachus, wine of agitation, or disturbance.

Wine of the palm-tree (Deut. xiv. 26.) is made of the juice of the palm-tree, and is common in the East.

Wine of libation (Deut. xxvii. 38; Exod. xiv. 17.) was the most excellent wine, poured on the victims in the temple of the Lord. Or pure wine, because in libations they used no mixture.

Wine of Uprightness (Cant. i. 4; vii. 9; Prov. xxiii. 30.) is good wine, true and excellent wine.

WING, Ha. By this word, the Hebrews understood not only the wings of birds, but also the lapet, skirt, or flap of a garment, the extremity of a country, the wings of an army; figuratively and metaphorically, protection or defence. God says, that he has borne his people on the wings of eagles, (Exod. xxxi. 4; see also Deut. xxxii. 11.) that is, he had brought them out of Egypt, as on a eagle’s wings, to the congregation at Mount Sinai.

The prophet begins to depict them under his wings, (Ps. xviii. 8.) the children of men put their trust in his wings, Ps. xxxvi. 7. Isaiah, speaking of the army of the kings of Israel and Syria coming against Judah, says, (Isaiah xxxiii. 7.) “Their wings shall fill the breadth of thy staff,” chap. viii. 8.

WINTER, in Palestine, see under 240, seq.

WISDOM is a word used with great frequency in the Scriptures, and its precise importance cannot be ascertained by a close attention to the Folly.

1. The term wisdom is used to express a quality or knowledge of things, both divine and human. It is often so used in the Psalms, this wisdom which Solomon entreats of God.

2. It is put for ingenuity, skill, dexterity, in the case of the artificers Bezaleel and Axxviii. 3; xxxii. 3.

3. Wisdom is used for subtility, cunning, or whether good or evil. Pharaoh feared the Israelites, Exod. i. 10. Jehovah slandered and crafty, 2 Sam. xiii. 3; (xviii. 8.) it is said, “The wisdom of the under-stand what his way.”

4. For doctrine, learning, expertise. Job xii. 13; xxxvii. 57; Ps. cv. 22.

5. It is put sometimes for the skill of magicians, wizards, fortune-tellers, &c.

6. Wisdom is also the Eternal Wisdom, the Son of God, Prov. i. 9; vii. 22; also the Book of Wisdom, vii. 22, 25; 96, &c. Also Eccles. xiv. 5, &c.

7. Wisdom of the flesh, of this kind, is opposed, by Paul, to true wisdom of Christ, the wisdom of the Saviour, 1 Cor. i. 24, &c. James also (iil. 4, &c.) speaks which is earthly, sensual, devilish, and wisdom that is from above, which is pure, &c.

WISDOM, Book of, [or, as it is a Wisdom of Solomon.] Just as the book of Proverbs is called the Book of Solomon, so this book is called the Book of Wisdom, Solomon’s views and culture in Palestine, in the preceding the Christian era, so also Wisdom does the same for the far more religious culture of the Alexandrine period, the WISDOM is a peculiar religious philosophy of itself in Alexandria among the Jews, a mixture of the national views, Platonist and the oriental, or more especially Persian and Egyptian. The great book is, to enforce the value of religion; and this is done by showing not only to greater honor and esteem in the rewards of a future state of existent Solomon is everywhere introduced, in the first part; and it would seem to be the plan of the writer, that he should be throughout. This, however, is not the latter part, the writer often speaks of the third person. From chap. xvi. onward, there is anything that is in the something rhetorical, which verges sometimes towards the artif-cial and pompous. This is more particularly the case with the latter part. There is, however, along with the impressiveness, a sap of Christianity, as to betrays a very extensive knowledge, and especially an acquaintance with heathen learning.

As to the author and the time in which he wrote, nothing can be said definitely, except that he must have been a Jew of Alexandria, in the centuries next preceding Christ. In consequence of the similarity of some points in the book with the doctrines of the Essenes, it has been supposed that the author was of this sect; but there are also, in other places and respects, certain resemblances between the Essenes and Alexandrines. Others, as Grotius, have assumed certain interpolations from some Christian hand, viz.
respect to the doctrine of immortality: but, regarded more closely, the immortality of this book is not that of Christianity, inasmuch as it speaks only of the immortality of the pious. In a philosophical respect, moreover, interpolations are not admissible.
The assertion of Jerome, perhaps, deserves the most attention, viz. that Philo was the author. But yet, after all the points of a close resemblance with Philo's writings, there is still a difference; nor can it well be explained, if Philo were the author, why the book should not stand among his acknowledged works.

The Latin version of this book, which is found in the Vulgate, is not by Jerome, but is of an earlier date. See Versions. *R.

WITCH OF ENDOR, see in Samuel.

WITNESS, one who bears testimony to any thing:
thus it is said, you are a witness—a faithful witness —a false witness—God is witness, &c. Christ is the faithful witness; (Rev. i. 5,) the martyr of truth and justice. God promises to give to his two witnesses (which some think to be Enoch and Elijah) the spirit of prophecy; (Rev. vi. 3,) after which (he says) they shall be put to death.

The law appoints, that two or three witnesses should be credited in matters of judicature; but not one witness only, Deut. xvii. 7. 7. The law condemned a false witness to the same punishment as that he would have subjected his neighbor to, Deut.
xix. 16—19.

The prophets are the witnesses of our belief; they witness the truth of our religion, Heb. xii. 1. The apostles are still further witnesses of the coming, the manifestation of Christ. Luther, in his Synopsis, says,Paul then, are we false witnesses, 1 Cor.
15. We are witnesses, says Peter, Acts x. 35, 41.) of that all of Jesus did in Judea; and when the apostles thought fit to put another in the place of Judas, (Acts i. 22,) they selected one who had been a witness of the resurrection along with themselves.

WIZARD, see Magic, and Incantations.

WO is used in our translation where a softer expression would be at least equally proper: "Wo to such an one!" is in our language, a threat, or imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicial, to befall a person; but this is not always the meaning of the word in Scripture. We have the expression: "Wo is me," that is, Alas, for my sufferings! and "Wo to the women with child, and those who give suck," &c. that is, Alas, for their redoubled sufferings, in times of distress! It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus, to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether of man, or city, or imprecating, or even as denouncing them; since his character of judge formed no part of his mission. If, then, we should read, "Alas, for thee, Chorazin! Alas, for thee, Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiments of the place, or to the character of the person speaking. "Wo to the watchmen, say the people," which phrase is understood, in which wo is always to be taken; as when we read,
"Wo to those who build houses by unrighteousness, and cities by blood:" wo to those who are "rebellious against God," &c. in numerous passages, especially of the Old Testament. The import of this word, then, is in some degree qualified by the application of it; where it is directed against transgression, crime, or any enormity, it may be taken as a threatening, a maladiction; but in the words of our Lord, and where the subject is suffering under misfortunes, though not extremely wicked, a kind of lamentatory application of it should seem to be most proper.

WOLF, a wild creature, very well known. The Scripture notices these remarkable things respecting the wolf: (1.) It lives upon rapine. (2.) It is violent, cruel and bloody. (3.) Voracious and greedy. (4.)
Seeks its prey by night. (5.) It is very sharp-sighted.
(6.) It is the great enemy of sheep. That Benjamin shall raven as a wolf, Gen. xlix. 27. False teachers are wolves in sheep's clothing. Persecutors of the church, and false pastors, are also ravenous wolves.
The prophets speak of evening wolves. Jer. v. 6, "A wolf of the evening shall spoil them." And Hab. i. 8, "Their horses are more fierce than the evening wolves." And Zeph. iii. 3, "Her judges are evening wolves." The Chaldee interpreters explain—Benja-meh shall raven as a wolf—of the altar of burnt-offerings at Jerusalem, which stood in the tribe of Benjamin. Others refer it to that violent seizure, by the sons of Benjamin, of the young women that came to the tabernacle at Shiloh, Judg. xvi. 21. Others refer it to Mordecai, or to Saul, who were of the tri-ob of Benjamin. Others explain it of Paul, who was also of this tribe; and this interpretation has commonly prevailed among Christian interpreters.
The wolf is a fierce creature, dwelling in forests, rauenous, greedy, crafty, and of exquisite quickness of smell.

Isaiah, (xi. 6; lv. 25,) describing the tranquil reign of the Messiah, says, "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatting together, and a little child shall lead them." Our Saviour, (Matt. x. 16,) says, that he sends his apostles out as sheep among wolves. Luke x. 3, and it is known, that both Jews and pagans, like ravenous and vo-raocious wolves, persecuted and slew almost all of them. At last, however, these same wolves themselves became converts, and docile as lambs. Paul, one of the most eager persecutors of the church, was afterwards one of its most zealous defenders.

WOMAN was created as a companion and assistant to man; (see Adam;) equal to him in authority and jurisdiction over the animals; but after the fall, God subjected her to the government of man; (Gen.
iii. 16,) "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." In addition to the duties prescribed by the law, common to men and women, certain regulations were peculiar to this sex; as those respecting legal uncleanness during their ordinary infirmities, those attending child-bearing, &c. The law did not allow any action of the woman against the man; but it permitted the husband to divorce his wife, and to cause her to be stoned, if she violated her conjugal rights, &c. &c.

If a married woman made a vow, of whatever nature, she was not bound by it, if her husband forbade it the same day. But if he said till the next day, before he contradicted it, or knowing the thing, in His heart, he was then. All need to come to it;
to it; and the woman was bound by her vow, Num.
xxx. 7, &c. (See 1 Cor. vii. 2, &c. for the duties of women towards their husbands.) The apostle would have them submissive, as to Christ, Eph. v. 2. He forbids them to speak or teach in the church; or to appear there with their heads uncovered, or without veils, 1 Cor. xi. 5; xiv. 34. He does not allow women to teach, or to dominate over their husbands, but would have them continue in submission and silence.
(See Vex.) He adds, that the woman shall be saved in hearing and educating her children, if she bring them up in faith, charity, sanctity, and a sober life.
See Titus ii. 4, 5, and 1 Pet. iii. 1—3, where modesty is recommended to them, with great care in avoiding superfluous ornaments and unnecessary finery.

WOMB. The fruit of the womb is children, (Gen.
xxx. 2.) whom the psalmist (cxxxvi. 3.) describes as the blessing of marriage. Ps. xxii. 10, "Lord, thou art my God from my mother's womb."

WONDER is some occurrence, or thing, which so strongly engages our attention, by its surprising greatness, rarity, or other properties, that our minds are struck by it into astonishment. Wonder is also nearly synonymous with sign: "If a prophet give thine signs of wonder," says Moses, (Deut. xiii. 22) and "if the sign or wonder come to pass," &c.
Isaiah says, he and "his children are for signs and wonders," (chap. viii. 18,) that is, they were for signs, indications of, allusions to, prefigurations of, things future, that should certainly take place; and they were to excite notice, attention and consideration in beholders; to cause wonder in them. Wonder also signifies the act of wondering, as resulting from the observation of something extraordinary, or beyond what we are accustomed to behold.

W.O.R.D is in Hebrew often put for thing or matter;
as Exod. ii. 14: "Surely this thing [Heb. word] is known." "To-morrow the Lord shall do this thing [Heb. word] in the land," Exod. ix. 5. "I will do a thing [Heb. word] in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle," 1 Sam. iii. 11.
"And the rest of the acts [Heb. words] of Solomon,"
1 Kings xi. 41.

Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the word of God supernatural effects; it represents it as animating and moving. So, "He sent his word, and healed them." The Book of Wisdom ascribes to the word of God, the death of the first-born of Egypt; (Wisd. xviii. 15; xvi. 26; ix. 1; xvi. 12.) the miraculous effects of the manna; the creation of the world; the healing of those who looked up to the brazen serpent. The centurion in the Gospel says to our Savour, (Matt. viii. 8.) "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." And Christ says to the devil that tempted him, (Matt. iv. 4.) "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Hence we see that word is taken either, (1.) for that eternal word heard by the prophets, when under inspiration from God.
Or, (2.) for that which they heard externally, when God spoke to them; as when he spoke to Moses, face to face, or as one friend speaks to another, Exod.
xxxviii. 11. Or, (3.) for that word which the ministers of God, the priests, the apostles, the servants of God, declare in his name to the people. (4.) For what is written in the sacred books of the Old and New Testaments. (5.) For the only Son of the Father, the uncreatedWisdom: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that is in the world." John i. 1.
The Chaldee paraphrases, the most writers extant, generally use the name Rhema for the Word, where Moses speaks of God: so that under this term they allude to the New, their testimony is so much the more able, as, having lived before or at the same time, they are irrefragable witnesses of the truth of this article; since, in the explanation, it has always been, and is still esteemed among them.
In the great passages where the sacred name occurs, phrases substitute Memra Jehovah, ("word of God;" and as they ascribe to Memra butes of deity, it is concluded that the divinity of the Word. In effect, according we use the word Memra, clearly denote

The author of the Book of Wisdom

It was this Word that fed the Israelites,

But the most full and distinct testipersonality and real deity of the vangelist John in his Gospel, in his in the Book of Revelation.
The following remarks on the ations of the terms Rhema and Log-Testament, are from Mr. Taylor.
We do not find that Rhema is ever that personal actions are attributed generally speaking, when relating to of our English word facts, unquestioned intended; in other cases, authority power.
The word Logos imports simple s which the party hearing it may be written information, that by which he speaks to them; as when he spoke to Moses, face to face, or as one speaks to another, Exod.
xxxviii. 11. Or, (3.) for that word which the ministers of God, the priests, the apostles, the servants of God, declare in his name to the people. (4.) For

New Testaments. (5.) For the only Son of the Father, the uncreated Wisdom: "In the beginning

And this word Logos is personified, and personal actions are attributed to it. It is not easy to suggest English terms by which to fix this distinction in every instance; but it is very desirable to represent the original as accurately as possible, and to avoid interchanging terms which, certainly, were not adopted by the sacred writers, to express such difference, without valid and efficient reasons.

In addition to these remarks on the application of the word Logos, Mr. Taylor has elsewhere some observations on the probable origin of its personal reference. The following extracts are from Bruce’s Travels:

"An officer, named Kal Hatzé, who stands always upon steps at the side of the lattice window, where there is a hole covered in the inside with a curtain of great taffeta, behind that curtain the king sits." (Vol. iv. p. 76)

"Hitherto, while there were strangers in the room, he [the king] had spoken to us by an officer called Kal Hatzé, the voice or word of the king." (Vol. iii. i. 234.)

"But there is no such ceremony in use; and exhibitions of this kind, made by the king in public, at no period seem to have suited the genius of this people. Formerly, his face was never seen, nor any part of him, excepting sometimes his foot. He sits in a kind of balcony, with lattice windows and curtains before him. Even yet he covers his face on audiences, or public occasions, and when in judgment. On cases of treason, he sits within his balcony, and speaks through a hole in the side of the lattice, to an officer called Kal Hatzé, the voice or word of the king, by whom he sends his questions, or any thing else that occurs, to the judges, who are seated at the council table." (Vol. iii. p. 265.)

Of the use of this officer, Mr. Bruce gives several striking instances: in particular, one on the trial of a rebel, when the king, by his Kal Hatzé, asked a question, by which his guilt was effectually demonstrated. It appears, then, that the king of Abyssinia makes inquiry, gives his opinion, and declares his will by a deputy, a go-between, a middle-man, called "his word." Assuming for a moment that this was a Jewish custom, we see to what the ancient Jewish paraphrasts referred by their term, "Word of Jehovah," instead of Jehovah himself; and the idea was familiar to their doctrine, and to that of their readers: a no less necessary consideration than that of their own recollection.

If it be inquired, What traces of this officer, as an attendant on official dignity, occur in Scripture? we may reply, that traces of the office of the deputy in Scripture would be too extensive for this place; but by way of selection, consult the history of the calling of Samuel, 1 Sam. iii. 21. "Jehovah revealed himself to Samuel, in Shiloh, by the word of the Lord (Jehovah)" why not say at once, simply, "by himself," without this interposing "word?"

What shall we say to Job xxxiii. 23? and does not Elisha (2 Kings v. 10), assume somewhat of the same state? And is it not probable, that Naaman felt himself treated like an inferior, a subject, by the prophet’s sending a messenger (a Kal Hatzé) to him, instead of coming out to him? See also 1 Kings xiii. 9, &c. a prophet directed by the word of the Lord. There is something very remarkable in the terms employed by the old prophet: (v. 18.) Am Nowek spake to me by the word of the Lord: what a circumstantial combination of phraseology! Why not at once, "The Lord spake to me." Why not at most, "The word of the Lord spake to me?"

The author of the Wisdom of Solomon has given an activity to his "Word of God," which exceeds what appears to be the duty of Abyssinian Kal Hatzé. This Almighty Word leaped down from heaven, from the royal throne, (or, according to the representation of Bruce, down the steps at the side of the window next the throne,) and brought fires unignited commandment, as a sharp sword, and filled all with death, &c. chap. xviii. 15, 16.

It may now be considered as hardly bearing a question, whether the ancient Jewish writers (Philo included) derived this idea, or mode of speech, from the heathen, or from the customs and manners of the kings of the East, and those of their own country in particular. Shall we not, hereafter, acquit the evangelists from adopting the mythological conceptions of Plato? Rather, did not Plato adopt eastern language? and is not the custom still retained in the East? See all accounts of an ambassador’s visit to the grand seignior, who never himself answers, but directs his vis-à-vis to speak for him. So in Europe, the king of France directs his keeper of the seals to speak in his name; and so the lord chancellor in England prorogues the parliament, expressing his majesty’s pleasure, and using his majesty’s name, though in his majesty’s presence.

WORLD, in addition to its natural meaning, as embracing the whole of created nature, and more particularly the respective parts of our own planet, is used in Scripture, as, for instance, in John viii. 12; xvii. 25; xv. 18, &c. In several passages of the New Testament, the Greek word ἡγίασμα, now translated word, would be more correctly rendered name.

WORMWOOD, a plant which grows wild about dunghills, and on dry waste grounds. It flowers in summer; the leaves have a strong, offensive smell, and a very bitter, nauseous taste; the flowers are equally bitter, but less nauseous. Its bitter qualities are mentioned in several comparatives in Scripture.

WORSHIP OF God is an act of religion, which consists in paying a due respect, veneration and homage to the Deity, from a sense of his greatness, of benefits already received, and under a certain expectation of reward. This internal act is to be shown and testified by external acts; as prayers, sacrifices, (formerly,) thanksgivings, &c.

Worship may be taken as (1.) internal, or (2.) external: (1.) private, or (2.) public: (1.) personal, or (2.) social: (1.) active, or (2.) passive; for there is a worship of God in sentiment, in submission to his will, in intentional obedience, &c. which is not external or active, but which becomes a habit of the mind, and indeed forms it to a devout disposition for active worship.

That it is the duty of man to worship his Maker, no one can deny; it is not, indeed, easily to be conceived how any one who has tolerably just notions of the attributes and providence of God, can possibly neglect the duty of private worship; and if we admit that public worship does not seem to be expressly enjoined in that system which is called the religion of nature, yet it is most expressly commanded by the religion of Christ, and will be regularly performed and promoted by every one who reflects on its great utility, or who enjoys its extensive beneficence.

The Hebrews had always years of twelve months. But at the beginning, and in the time of Moses, they were solar years of twelve months, each month having thirty days, excepting the twelfth, which had thirty-five days. We see, by the enumeration of the days of the deluge, (Gen. vii.) that the Hebrew year consisted of 365 days. It is supposed that they had an intercalary month at the end of 120 years; at which time the beginning of their year would be out of its place full thirty days. It must be admitted, however, that no mention is made in Scripture of the thirteenth month, or of any intercalation; and hence some think that Moses retained the order of the Egyptian year, which was solar, and consisted of twelve months of thirty days each. After the time of Alexander the Great, and of the Greeks, in Asia, the Jews reckoned by lunar months, chiefly in what related to religion and to the festivals; (see Ecclus. xiii. 6, 7) and since the completing of the Talmud, they use years wholly lunar; having alternately a full month of thirty days, and a defective month of twenty-nine days. To accommodate this lunar year to the course of the sun, at the end of three years they intercalate a whole month after Adar, which intercalated month they call Ve-adar, that is, second Adar.

Their civil year has always begun in autumn, at the month Tisri; but their sacred year, by which the festivals, assemblies and other religious acts were regulated, began in the spring, at the month Nisan. See MONTHS, and JEWISH CALENDAR, infra.

Nothing is more equivocal among the ancients than the term year; and hence it has always been, and still is, a source of dispute among the learned. Some think, that from the beginning of the world to the 1686th year of Enoch, mankind reckoned only by weeks; and that the angel Uriel revealed to Enoch the use of months, the years, the revolutions of the stars, and the return of the seasons. Some nations formerly made their year to consist of one month, others of two, others of six, others of ten, others of twelve. Some have made one year of winter, another of summer. The beginning of the year was fixed sometimes at autumn; sometimes at spring; sometimes at midnight. Some used lunar months, others solar. Even the days have been diversely divided; some beginning them at evening, others at morning, others at noon, others at midnight. With some, the hours were equal, both in winter and summer; with others, they were unequal. They counted twelve hours to the day, and twelve to the night. In summer the hours of the day were longer than those of the night; on the contrary, in winter the hours of the night were longest. See HOUR.

In some parts of the East, particularly in Japan, (says Baron Thumberg,) the year ending on a certain day, any portion of the foregoing year is taken for a whole year; so that, supposing a child to be born in the last week of our December, it would be reckoned one year old on the first day of January. This sounds like a strange solution to us: a child not a week old, months; and therefore a few days younger than those previously described: "according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men:"—in their second year and under.

The influence of this remark, on the proper placing of the birth of our Lord, before the death of Herod, is considerable: it lessens, too, the number of infants slain by his order; it draws a strong distinction between those appointed to death, and those allowed to escape; while it shortens the interval between the appearance of the star to the Magi, and their visit to Jerusalem, if we are not mistaken, full one half of what some have allowed for it.

YESTERDAY is used to denote all time past, however distant; as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day on which one speaks: Exod. xxi. 29. "If the ox was wont to push with his horn in time past; Heb. yesterday. And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time; Heb. yesterday; whereas thou camest but yesterday," 2 Sam. xv. 20, or lately, et al. freq. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and for ever," Heb. xii. 8. His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yesterday nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day.

Job says, (viii. 9.) "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing; because our days upon earth are a shadow."

YOE. It appears that yokes were of two kinds, as two words are used to denote them in the Hebrew: one refers to such yokes as were put upon the necks of cattle, and in which they labored, Numb. xix. 2. Deut. xxi. 3. The subjects of Solomon complain that he had made his yoke heavy to them, (1 Kings xii. 10,) and they use the same word; but Jeremiah (xxvii. 2) made him bonds and yokes of another construction, and fitted to the human neck; which he expresses by another word; most probably they were such as slaves used to wear when at labor; however, they were the sign of bondage. We read of yokes of iron, Deut. xxi. 48; Jer. xxviii. 13. The ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual are called a yoke, (Acts xv. 10; Gal. v. 1;) as also tyrannical authority, but Christ says, his yoke is easy, and his burden is light, Matt. xi. 29.

Z

ZAANANIM, a city of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 33; Micah i. 11,) contracted into Zenan, Josh. xv. 37.

ZABADEANS, Abrahams who dwelt east of the mountains of Gilead, and who were overcome by Jonathan Maccabeus, 1 Mac. xii. 31. Calmet thinks that, instead of Zabadeans, which is a name entirely unknown, we should read Nabateans, as Josephus does.

I. ZABDIEL, father of Jashobeam, commanded the 24,000 men who served in the first month, as the life-guard of David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 2.

II. ZABDIEL, a king of Arabia, who killed Alexander Balas, king of Syria, and sent his head to Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, 1 Mac. xi. 17.

ZACCHAEUS, chief of the publicans; that is, farmer-general of the revenue, Luke xix. When Christ passed through Jericho, Zacchaeus greatly desired to see him, but could not, because of the multitude, and because he was low of stature. He therefore ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree. Jesus, observing him, called him down, and proposed to become his guest. The result was, that the heart of Zacchaeus was opened, and he declared he would make four-fold restitution to all whom he had injured.

I. ZACHARIAH, king of Israel, succeeded his father, Jeroboam II. A. M. 3320, and reigned six months. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; (2 Kings xiv. 29,) and Shallum, son of Jabesh, conspired against him, killed him in public, and reigned in his stead. Thus was fulfilled what the Lord had foretold to Jehu, that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation; 2 Kings xv. 8—11.

II. ZACHARIAH, or ZACHARIAS, a Levite, who was sent by Jehoshaphat throughout Judah, to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 7.

III. ZACHARIAH, or ZACHARIAS, son of Jehoiada, high-priest of the Jews, and probably the Azariah of 1 Chron. vi. 10, 11, was slain by order of Joash, A. M. 3164, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20—22.

Jerome (on Matt. xxiii.) followed by a great number of commentators, believed that this Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was he of whom our Saviour speaks in Matt. xxiii. 34, 35. But to this opinion three things are objected: (1.) That Zachariah, son of Barachia, according to the intention of Christ, seems to have been the last of the prophets, or just, slain by the Jews, as Abel was the first of the just who suffered a violent death. (2.) That Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was stoned in the court of the house of God; whereas Zachariah, son of Barach, was killed between the temple and the altar. (3.) That though it be true that the Hebrews had often two names, it is hardly to be thought that Christ would here omit the name of Jehoiada, which was so well known, and substitute that of Barach, which was not so familiar. Calmet, therefore, thinks that our Saviour points at Zachariah, son of Barach.

IV. ZACHARIAS, or ZACHARIAH, the eleventh of the lesser prophets, was son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo. He returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and began to prophesy in the second year of Darius son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3484, and A. D. 530, in the eighth month of the holy year, and two months after Haggai. These two prophets, with united zeal, encouraged the people to resume the work of the temple, which had been discontinued for some years, Ezra v. 1.

This prophet has been confounded with Zachariah, son of Barachiah, contemporary with Isaiiah, (viii. 2,) and with Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, which opinion is plainly incongruous. He has been thought to be the Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whom our Saviour mentions as killed between the temple and the altar, though no such thing is anywhere said of him.

Zachariah begins his prophecy with an exhortation to the people, to return to the Lord, and not to irritate the wrathfulness of his fathers. He foretells very distinctly the coming of Christ, a Saviour, poor, and sitting on an ass, and a colt, the foul of an ass. In the eleventh chapter he speaks of the war of the Romans against the Jews, of the breach of the covenant between God and his people Israel; and of thirty pieces of silver given for a recompense to the shepherd; of three shepherds put to death in one month, &c.

Zachariah is the longest and the most obscure of the twelve minor prophets. His style is broken and wordy, and in this respect his prophecies resemble those of the Messiah. They are more particular and express than those of some other prophets. Several modern critics have been of opinion, that chap. ix.—xi. of this prophecy were written by Jeremiah; because in Matt. xxiii. 32, the name of Jeremiah, we find quoted Zach. xi. 12; and as the chapters make but one continued discourse, they concluded, that all three belonged to Jeremiah. But it is much more natural to suppose, that the name of Jeremiah, by some mistake, has slipped into the text of Matthew.

V. ZACHARIAH, or Zacharias, a priest of the family of Abia, father of John the Baptist, and husband to Elisabeth, (Luke i. 5, 12, &c.) with whom he was righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. They had no child, because Elisabeth was barren, and they were both well stricken in years; but about fifteen months before the birth of Christ, as Zachariah was waiting his week, and performing the functions of priest in the temple, “there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord, standing on the right side of the altar of incense. And when Zachariah saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him. But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zachariah; for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. And Zachariah said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years. And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings. And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which yet shall be fulfilled in their season.” See Annunciation.

The people were waiting till Zachariah came forth out of the holy place; and they were surprised with his long delay. But when he came out, he was not able to speak; and by his making signs to them, they found that he had seen a vision, and had become dumb. When the days of his ministry were completed, that is, at the end of about a week, he returned to his own house; and his wife Elizabeth conceived a son, of whom she was happily delivered in its due time. Her neighbors and relations assembled to congratulate her on this occasion; and on the eighth day they circumcised the child, calling his name Zachariah, after the name of his father; but Elisabeth interposed, and directed his name to be called “John.” They then desired a token from his father, who, making signs for a tablet, wrote on it, “His name is John.” At this instant his tongue was loosened; he praised God: and, being Holy Ghost, he prophesied, by a oracle, Luke has preserved, chap. ii.

Zadok, or Sadoc, son of Ahitub, the chief of the race of Elai, the high-priesthood had family of Ithamar; but it was restored to Eleazar, in the time of Saul, in the days of David, who was put in the place of Ahitub to Saul, A. M. 3444, 1 Sam. xxii. 17, 19, those priesthoods disappeared. At the time of Saul, Ahimelech performed them till Saul, the reign of Solomon, there were priests in Israel, Zadok, of the race of Eliezer, and Ahimelech, of the race of Ithamar, 1 Kings v. 4, 7.

When David was forced to leave Jerusalem, and his son Absalom, Zadok would have accompanied him to the court of Solomon, (2 Sam. xv. 24.) but the king did not permit them. To Zadok he said, O son, go to thy father Ahimaaz your son, and let him bring thee word from the city. And I will send thee word in the bulk of the people; and thou shalt return, and tell me. When Zadok and Abiathar returned, therefore, but their two sons, Ahimaaz, and Zadok, went with Solomon's carriage, 2 Kings xxv. 8. It is said, in the reign of Solomon, which was after the death of David, Solomon excluded Zadok and Ahimelech from the high-priesthood, because of his marriage with Adonijah, and Zadok was high priest. When the Babylonian captivity, his son Abiathar continued the high-priesthood under Rehoboam.

Zalmonah, an encampment of desert, (Num. xxxiii. 41.) where a town, a Mose set up the brazen serpent.

Zarah, son of Judah and Tamar, (2 Ch. xxvii. 19.) He had five sons, Etham, Zara, Shema, Neheemiah, and Shephatiah; and eight daughters.

Zered, or Zered, a brook by the bank of the river Jordan, which falls into the sea of the Philistines.

Zarephath, a city of the Sidonians, on Mount Carmel, on the Mediterranean sea, and afterwards called Zarephath-Haror, a city of the kingdom of Rehoboam, king of Israel, Josh. xiii. 19.

Zaretan, a town in the land of the Midianites, called Zarzathan, is not included in the index of Joshua, 13. 12. It is said to be near Beth Shan, the northern frontier of Manasseh.

Zaretan, the waters dried up, (Josh. xiv. 15.) Zaretan upwards, they stood on a heap of vessels for the temple were cast into the sea between Zaretan and Succoth, 1 Kings xiv. 19.

Zeal, a public spirit, enthusiasm.

Zee, the head of a tribe, or the head of a family, (Gen. x. 27.)
which any thing is pursued: "I have been very jealous (or zealous) for the Lord God of hosts," 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. I burn with zeal for his honor. "Phinehas was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the congregation of Israel" (Num. xvi. 10). Now notice that Simeon and his brethren were filled with the zeal of the Lord, to revenge the injury done to their sister, Judith ix. 4.—(2). Zeal is put for anger: (2 Kings xix. 31.) "the zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this," that is, his anger. Ps. lxxix. 5. "How long, Lord? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy (or zeal) burn like fire?" The whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy, or zeal, Zeph. i. 18; iii. 8.

ZEAL, JUDGMENT OF, see JUDGMENT, ad. fin.

The Idol of Zeal (Ezek. viii. 3, 5) was Adonis; called the idol of jealousy, because he was beloved by Venus; and therefore Mars, stimulated by jealousy, sent a wild boar against him, which killed him. In pursuing the discourse of Ezekiel, we see that the same idol, which at the fifth verse is called the idol of jealousy, is called Thammuz at the fourteenth verse. See ADONIS.

ZEBEDEE, father of the apostles, James, and John the elder, of the family of the Lesser. His wife was called Salome, and his two sons left him to follow our Saviour, Matt. iv. 21.

ZEBULUN, governor of the city of Shechem for Abimelech, son of Gideon, Judg. ix. 25. Zebulun was the sixth son of Jacob and Leah, (Gen. xxx. 20.) was born in Mesopotamia, about A. M. 2550. His sons were Sered, Elon and Jabez, Gen. xlv. 14. Moses gives us no particulars of his life; but Jacob in his last blessing (Gen. xlix. 13.) said, "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be near for a haven of ships." His border shall be unto Zidon." His portion extended to the coast of the Mediterranean, one end of it bordering on this sea, and the other on the sea of Tiberias, Josh. xix. 10. (See CANAAN.) Moses joins Zebulun and Issachar together: (Deut. xxxiii. 12.) "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand." Meaning, that these two tribes, being at the greatest distance north, should come together to the temple at Jerusalem, to the holy mountain, and should bring with them such of the other tribes as dwelt in their way; and that, occupying the northmost of the twelve tribes, on the twentieth day of May, they should apply themselves to trade and navigation, and to the melting of metals and glass, denoted by those words, Treasures hid in the sand. The river Belus, whose sand was very fit for making glass, was in this tribe. See GLASS.

When the tribe of Zebulun left Egypt, its chief was Eliab, son of Elon, and it comprehended 57,400 men able to bear arms, Numb. i. 9, 30. In another review, 39 years afterwards, it amounted to 60,500 men, of age to bear arms, Numb. xxvi. 26, 27. The tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali distinguished themselves in the war of Barak and Deborah, against Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin, Judg. iv. 5, 6, 10; v. 4, 18. It is thought they were the first carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, by Pul and Tigrash-Pileser, kings of Assyria, 1 Chron. v. 26. But they had the advantage of hearing and seeing Christ in their country oftener and longer than any other of the tribes, Isa. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 13, 15.

II. ZEBULUN, a city of Asher, (Josh. xix. 27.) but probably afterwards yielded to Zebulun, whence it took its name. It was not far from Ptolemais, since Josephus makes the length of lower Galilee to be 50 miles. (Geograph. 1. 11.) The city of Zebulon of men, probably from its great populousness. Elen, judge of Israel, was buried in this city, Judg. xii. 12.

ZACHARIAS, see ZACHARIAH.

ZEDAD, a city of Syria, in the most northern part of the Land of Promise, Numb. xxxiv. 8; Ezek. xlvii. 15.

I. ZEDEKIAH, or MATTATHIAS, the last king of Judah, before the captivity of Babylon, was son of Josiah, and uncle to Jeconiah, his predecessor, 2 Kings xxiv. 17, 19. When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jeconiah to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judea, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, and made him promise, with an oath, that he would maintain fidelity to him, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13; Ezek. xvii. 12, 14, 18. He was 21 years old when he began to reign at Jerusalem, and he reigned there eleven years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, in committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim, 2 Kings xxiv. 18—20; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11—13. The princes of the people, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, imitated his impiety, and abandoned themselves to all the abominations of the Gentiles.

In the first year of his reign, Zedekiah sent to Babylon, Elasah, son of Shaphan, and Gemariah, son of Hilkiyah, probably to carry his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar; and by these messengers Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives of Babylon, Jer. xxix. 1, 2—9. Four years afterwards, either Zedekiah went thither himself, or sent thither, (Jer. xxxii. 12; ii. 59; Baruch i. 1.) his chief design being to entreat Nebuchadnezzar to return the sacred vessels of the temple, Baruch i. 8. In the ninth year of his reign, he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings xxv. 4; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14. The consequence of which the Assyrian marched his army into Judea, and took all the fortified places, except Lachish, Azekah and Jerusalem. During the siege of the holy city, Zedekiah often consulted Jeremiah, who advised him to surrender, and denounced the greatest woes against him if he should persist in his rebellion, Jer. xxvii. 3—10; xxv. But the unfortunate prince had neither patience to hear, nor resolution to follow, good counsel. In the eleventh year of his reign, on the nineteenth day of the tenth month (July), Jerusalem was taken, 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxix. lii. The king and his people endeavored to escape by favor of the night; but the Chaldean troops pursuing them, were overtaken in the plain of Jericho. Zedekiah was taken and carried to Nebuchadnez- zar, then at Riblah, in Syria, who reproached him with his perfidy, caused all his children to be slain before his face, and his own eyes to be put out; and then, loading him with chains of brass, he ordered him to be sent to Babylon, 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxix. lii. Thus were accomplished two prophecies, which seemed contradictory; one of Jeremiah, who said that Zedekiah should see, and yet not see, Nebuchadnezzer with his eyes; (chap. xxxix. 4, 5; xxxiv. 3;) the other of Ezekiel, (xii. 13;) which intimated that he should not see Babylon, though he should die there. The year of his death is not known. Jerem-iah had assured him (chap. xxxix. 4, 5;) that he should die in peace; that his body should be burned as those of the kings of Judah usually were: and that they should mourn for him, saying, Alas, my lord! He languished seven years at Jerusalem; and after that the kingdom of Judah was entirely sup prised.

II. ZEDEKIAH, son of Chenaanah, a false prophet of Samaria, (1 Kings xxii. 11,) who put iron boxes on his head, and sent to Ahaz, king of Israel, saying, "Thus saith the Lord, You shall beat Syria, and toss it up into the air with these boxes." The prophet Micah, son of Imah, being sent for, and denouncing the direct contrary, Zedekiah came near him, and giving him a blow on the face, said to him, "Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me, to do this to you?" Micah answered, "You will see that, when you shall be obliged to hide yourself in an inward chamber." It is not said what became of Zedekiah; but all the prophecies of Micah proved true.

III. ZEDEKIAH, son of Masheiah, a false prophet, who always opposed Jeremiah. Against him, and Ahaz, son of Kohath, the prophet pronounced a terrible curse; (chap. xxiv. 21, 22,) "Of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahaz, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire."&c.

ZEEBR, a prince of Melun, was found at a winepress, and slain by the Ephraimites, who sent his head to Gideon beyond Jordan, whether they pursued their enemies, Judg. vii. 25.

ZELAH, a city of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 28,) where Saul was buried in the tomb of his father Kish, 2 Sam. xxi. 14.

ZELOTES, a surname given to Simon the Canaanite, one of the apostles. It signifies, properly, our passionately and in any cause, a zealot, as in Thuc. ii. 14, in the Greek. Thus, among the ancient Hebrews, those who, from zeal for the institutions of their religion, repented or punished such as committed offences against them, were said to be zealous. (Comp. Numb. xx. 11-16; 1 Mac. ii. 10.)

In the age of Christ and the apostles, this name was applied particularly to an extensive association of private individuals, who undertook to maintain the purity of the national worship, by inflicting punishments on the persons, or the forms of tax on all who should violate any of the institutions, &c. which they held sacred. They were impelled, as they said, by a more than human zeal; and were certainly guilty of some excesses and outrages. (See Jos. B. J. iv. 5, 6, vi. 8. 1 John, iii. 11.)

The name Zebedee, or Zebedeus, probably given to Simon from the circumstance of his having been one of the Zelotes. The name Cairent, or more properly Canaire, is also most properly here of the same signification, being derived from the Hebrew, Shemid, which is entirely equivalent in meaning to Zelotes. — R.

ZENAS, a doctor of the law, and disciple of Paul, Tit. iii. 13.

ZEDEKIAH, son of Masheiah, called 2 Kings xxv. 18 the second priest, while the highpriest Zeraijah performed the functions of the highpriesthood, and was the first priest. It is thought Zephaniah was his deputy, to discharge the duties of the highpriest, to mark the year when his highpriestship was about to end, and to mark the time when the highpriest was sick, or when any other accident hindered him from discharging his office. After the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, Zeraijah and Zephaniah were taken and sent to Babylon, where they were murdered.
ZIL, son of Jeduthun, the fourth among the twenty-four families of the Levites, which attended in the temple, 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 11.

ZERUBBABEL, or ZOROBABEL, son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. Matthew (i. 12.) and the Chronicles (1 Chron. iii. 17, 18.) make Jcoseaiah, king of Judah, to be father of Salathiel, but they do not agree as to the father of Zerubbabel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but Matthew, Luke, Ezra and Haggai constantly make Salathiel his father. We must, therefore, take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterwards considered as his father. Some think that Zerubbabel had also the name of Zicheliah, and that he is as called, Ezra i. 8. Josephus and the first book of Eedras describe him as one of the three famous body-guards of Darus, son of Hystaspes; but this must be a mistake, for he returned to Jerusalem long before the reign of Darus, son of Hystaspes.

Cyrus committed to care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem, Ezra i. 11. He is always named first, as being chief of the Jews that returned to their own country, Ezra ii. 2; iii. 8; v. 2. He laid the foundations of the temple, (Ezra iii. 9; iv. 2; 1 Chron. iv. 26.) and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices. When the Samaritans offered to assist in rebuilding the temple, Zerubbabel and the principal men of Judah refused them this honor, since Cyrus had granted his commission to the Jews only, Ezra iv. 3. When the Lord showed the prophet Zachariah two olive-trees, near the golden candlestick with seven branches, the angel sent to explain this vision informed the prophet, that these two olive-trees, which supplied oil to the great candlestick, were Zerubbabel, the prince, and Joshua, the high-priest, son of Josechiah. Scripture says nothing of the death of Zerubbabel, but it informs us, (1 Chron. iii. 19.) that he left seven sons and one daughter. These were Meshulah, Hananiah and Shelomith, their sister; Hashubah, Obel, Berechiah, Hashadia and Jushabhesed. Matthew (i. 13.) makes the name of one of his sons to be Abid, and Luke (iii. 27.) makes it Jersammael. Consequently, one of the sons of Zerubbabel, above enumerated, must have had more than one name.

ZIBA, a servant to Saul, 2 Sam. ix. When David was expelled from Jerusalem, by his son Absalom, Ziba went to meet him, with two asses loaded with provisions, 2 Sam. xv. The king gave him all that belongeth to his lord. ZICHRI, of Ephraim, a very stout and valiant man. He killed Maseiah, son of king Abaz, Azrikam, the governor of the palace, and Elnathan, who was second after the king, 2 Chron. xxvii. 7.

ZIDON, see Syon.

ZIF, the second month of the holy year of the Hebrews; afterwards called Ijar; it answers nearly to April, 1 Kings vi. 1. See the JEWISH CALENDAR.

ZIKLAG, a city that Achish, king of Gat, gave to David, when he took shelter among the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxvii. 6.) and which, after that time, always belonged to the kings of Judah. The Amalekites took it, and plundered it, in the absence of David. Joshua had allotted it to the tribe of Simeon, Josh. xix. 9. Eusebius says it lay in the south of Canaan.

ZILLAH, a wife of Lamech, the bigamist. She was mother of Tubal-cain and Naamah, Gen. iv. 21, 22.

I. ZIMRI, son of Zerah, and grandson of Judah and Tamar, 1 Chron. ii. 6.

II. ZIMRI, son of Salu, prince of the tribe of Simeon, who went publicly into the tent of Cozbi, a Midianite woman, and was followed by Phinehas, son of Eleazar the high-priest, who slew him with Cozbi, Numb. xxiv. 14.

III. ZIMRI, a general of half the cavalry of Elah, king of Israel, when he rebelled against his master,(1 Kings xvi. 9, 10.) killed him, and usurped his kingdom. He cut off the whole family, not sparing any of his relations or friends; whereby was fulfilled the word of the Lord, denounced to Baelus, the father of Elah, by the prophet Jehu. Zimri reigned but seven days; for the army of Israel, then besieging Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, made their general, Omri, king, and came and besieged Zimri in the city of Tirzah. Zimri, seeing the city on the point of being taken, burnt himself in the palace with all its riches. ZIN, a desert south of the Land of Promise. See in EXODUS, p. 419.

ZION, or Ston, a mountain of Jerusalem. See STON.

I. ZIPH, the second Hebrew month, 1 Kings vii. 7; iv. 9.

II. ZIPH, son of Jehalaleel, of Judah, and of the family of Caleb; (1 Chron. iv. 16.) he probably gave his name to the city of Ziph, in Judah.

III. ZIPH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 24.) near Hebron, eastward, and in the wilderness of which David kept himself concealed for some time, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15.

IV. ZIPH, another city near Masoe and Carmel of Judah, Josh. xv. 33.

ZIPPORAH, or SEPHORA, daughter of Jethro, wife of Moses, and mother of Eliezer and Gershom. When Moses fled from Egypt, (Exod. ii. 16, &c.) he withdrew into Midian, where, having stood up in defence of the daughters of Jethro, priest, or prince, of Midian, against shepherds who would have hindered them from watering their flocks, Jethro took him into his house, and gave him his daughter Zipporah in marriage, by whom he had two sons, Eliezer and Gershom. See MOSES.

ZOAN, a royal city of Egypt, and extremely ancient. Called in Greek Times, (Judith i. 10.) and built, no doubt, by emigrants, Numb. xiii. 22; Ps. cviii. 13, 43; Isa. xiv. 11, 13; xxx. 4; Ezek. xxx. 14.

ZOAR, a city of the Pentapolis, on the southern extremity of the Dead sea, was destined, with the other five cities, to be consumed by fire from heaven; but at the intercession of Lot, it was preserved, Gen. xiv. 2. It was originally called Bela; but after Lot entreated the angel's permission to take refuge in it, and insisted on the smallness of this city, it had the name Zoar, which signifies small or little.

ZOBAH, a kingdom or country of Syria, whose king carried on war with Saul and David, 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3; x. 6. It seems to have lain near Damascus, and to have included the city Hamath, (2 Chron. viii. 8.) but also to have extended towards the Euphrates, 2 Sam. viii. 3, &c.

ZOHELETH, a stone near the fountain of Rogel, or En-rogel, just under the walls of Jerusalem, 1 Kings i. 8. The rabbins tell us, that it served as an exercise to the young men, who tried their strength by throwing it, or rather rolling it, or lifting it. Others think it was useful to the fuller, or whistlers, to beat their clothes upon, after they had washed them.
ZOPHAR, the Naamathite, a friend of Job, chap. ii. 11. The LXX call him Sophar, king of the Mineans; the interpreter of Origen makes him king of the Nomades.
I. ZORAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 33.) built, or rebuilt and fortified, by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 10.
II. ZORAH, a city of Dan, and the birth-place of Samson, (Judg. xvi. 31.) on the frontier of Dan, and of Judah, not far from Eshtaol. Eusebius places it ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis, not far from Kaphar-Sorek. Calmet thinks the Zorites, (1 Chron. ii. 54.) and the Zorathites, (1 Chron. iv. 2.)
were inhabitants of Zorah.
ZUPH, a Levite, great-grandfather of Elkamah, the father of Samuel, and head of the family of the Zuphim, who dwelt at Ramah; whence it had its name of Ramathaim Zophim, (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron.
vi. 33.) and the land of Zuph, 1 Sam. ix. 5.
ZUR, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 1 Chron. ii. 45; 2 Chron. xi. 7, and described as a strong town in 2
I. ZUR, a prince of Midian, father with Zimri, was killed by Phinehas, xxxvi. 8.
II. ZUR, son of Jehiel and Mejamin, inhabitants of Gibeah, 1 viii. 30.
ZURIEL, son of Abihail, chief of the Mahites and the Mushites, Num.
ZURISHADDAI, father of Sheichief of the tribe of Simeon at the bers i. 6.
ZUZIM, certain giants who dwelt and were conquered by Chedorlaomer.
Gen. xiv. 5. The Chaldee and the 1
Zuzim in the sense of an appellative valiant men. Calmet conjectures the Zanzummim of Deut. ii. 20. 8

CALENDAR OF THE JEWS.

The year of the Hebrews is composed of twelve lunar months, of which the first has thirty days, and the second twenty-nine; and so the rest successively, and alternately. The year begins in autumn, as to the civil year; and in the spring, as to the sacred year. The Jews had calendars, anciently, wherein were noted all the feasts—all the fasts—and all the days on which they celebrated the memory of any great event that had happened to the nation, Zech. viii. 19; Esth. viii. 6, in Oeeco. These ancient calendars are sometimes quoted in Talmud, (Misa Tract. Taanith, n. 8.) but the rabbins acknowledge that they are not now in being. (Fide Maimonides et Bartenora, in eodem locum.) Those that we have now, whether printed or in manuscript, are not very ancient. (Fide Geneser. Biblioth. Rabinic. p. 319; Buxtorf. Levit. Talmud. p. 1046; Bartolocci. Bibl. Rabinic. tom. ii. p. 550; Lamy’s Introduction to the Scripture; and Plantav. Isagog. Rabin. ad finem.) That which passes for the oldest, is Megillath Thaanith, “the volume of affliction,” which contains the days of feasting and fasting heretofore in use among the Jews; which are not now observed; nor are they in the common calendars. We shall insert the chief historical events, taken as well from this volume, Thaanith, as from other calendars.

TISRI.
The first month of the civil year; the seventh month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of September.

The same day, the abolition of written contracts. The wicked kings having forbidden the Israelites to pronounce the name of God, when they were restored to liberty, the Ammonians, or Maccabees, ordained, that the name of God should be written in contracts after this manner: “In such a year of the high-priest N., who is minister of the most high God,” &c. The judges to whom these writings were presented, decreed they should be satisfied; saying, for example, “On such a day, such a debtor shall pay such a sum, according to his promise, after which the schedule shall be torn.” But it was found that the name of God was taken away out of the writing; and thus the whole became useless and ineffectual. For which reason they abolished all these written contracts, and appointed a festival day in memory of it. (Megil. Thaanith, c. 7.)
7. A fast, on account of the worshipping the golden calf, and of the sentence God pronounced against Israel, in consequence of that crime, Exod. xxxii. 5—8, 34.
10. A fast of expiation, Lev. xxiii. 19, &c.
15. The fast of tabernacles, with its octave, Lev. xxiii. 34.
21. Hosanna-Rabbah. The seventh day of the feast of tabernacles, or the feast of branches.
22. The octave of the feast of tabernacles.
23. The rejoicing for the law, a solemnity in memory of the covenant that the Lord made with the Hebrews, in giving them the law by the mediation of Moses.
On this same day, the dedication of Solomon’s temple, 1 Kings viii. 65, 66.
30. The first new-moon of the month Marchesvan.

MARCHESVAN.
The second month of the civil year; the eighth month of the sacred year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of October.

Day 1. The second new-moon, or first day of the month.
6, 7. A fast, because Nebuchadnezzar put out the eyes of Zedekiah, after he had slain his children before his face, 2 Kings xxv. 7; Jer. lii. 10.
19. A fast on Monday and Tuesday, [Thursday?] and the Monday following, to expiate faults committed on occasion of the feast of tabernacles. (Fide Calendar, a Bartolocci editum.)
23. A fast, or memorial of the stones of the altar, profaned by the Greeks; which were laid aside, in expectation of a prophet, who could declare to what use they might be applied, 1 Mac. iv. 46. (Megillath, c. 8.)
25. A fast in memory of some places possessed by the Cuthites; which the Israelites recovered at their return from the captivity.
A dispute of Rabbi Jonathan, son of Zechariah, against the Sadduces, who pretended that the leaves of the first-fruits (Lev. xxiii. 17, 18.) were not to be offered on the altar, but to be eaten hot. (Megil. c. 9.)
KISLEI.

The third month of the civil year; the ninth month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to our month of November.

Day 1. New-moon, or the first day of the month.
3. A feast in memory of the idol which the Astomaces threw out of courts, where the Gentiles had placed them. (Megill. Taanith.)
5. A feast in memory of the book of Jeremiah, torn and burnt by Jehoiakim, Jer. xxxvi. 32.
7. A fast in memory of the death of Herod the Great, son of Antipater; who was always an enemy to the sages. (Megillath, c. 11.)
21. The feast of mount Gerizim. The Jews relate that when their high-priest Simon, with his priests, went out to meet Alexander the Great, the Cutheans or Samaritans went also, and desired this prince to give them the temple of Jerusalem, and to sell them a part of mount Moriah, which request Alexander granted. But the high-priest of the Jews afterwards presenting himself, and Alexander asking him what he desired, Simon entreated him not to suffer the Samaritans to destroy the temple. The king replied to him, that he delivered that people into his hands, and he might do what he pleased with them. Then the high-priest and inhabitants of Jerusalem took the Samaritans, bound a hole through their heads, and tying them to their horses' tails, dragged them along to mount Gerizim, which they ploughed and sowed with tares, just as the Samaritans had intended to do to the temple of Jerusalem. In memory of this event, they instituted this festival. [Comp. Sivan 25.]
21. Prayers for rain. (Calendar Bartolocci.)
23. The dedication, or renewing of the temple, profaned by order of Antochus Epiphanes, and purified by Judas Maccabaeus, 1 Mac. iv. 52; 2 Mac. ii. 16; John x. 22. This feast is kept with its octave. Josephus says, that in his time it was called the feast of lights; perhaps, he says, because this good fortune of restoring the temple to its ancient use, appeared to the Jews as a new day. (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 11.) But the Jewish authors give another reason for the name of lights. They report, that when the Jews were employed in cleansing the temple, after it had been profaned by the Greeks, they found there only a small ball of oil, sealed up by the high-priest, which would hardly suffice to keep in the lamps so much as one night; but God permitted that it should last several days, till they had time to make more, in which time the Jews lighted up several lamps in their synagogues, and at the doors of their houses. (Teb Selden, de Syned. lib. iii. cap. 13; Others affirm as the Scholastical History, Thomas Aquinas, cardinal Hugues, on 1 Mac. iv. 23: that the application of the feast of lights was a memorial of that fire from heaven which inflamed the wood on the altar of burnt-offerings, as related 2 Mac. i. 25.)

Some think this feast of the dedication was instituted in memory of Judith. (Teb Silden, lib. iii. cap. 13, de Repubb. Hebr.) But it is doubted whether this ought to be understood of Judith, daughter of Macher, who killed Holofernes; or of another Judith, sister of Mattathias, and sister of Judas Maccabees, who slew Nicanor, as they tell us. (Teb Ganz, Zechar. David; Millerman, 4. an. 422; et aquid Selden, de Synedriis, lib. iii. cap. 13. n. 11.) This last Judith is known only in the writings of the rabbins, and is not mentioned either in the Maccabees, or in Josephus. But there is great likelihood that the Jews have altered the Greek history of Judith in the time of Judas Maccabees. A prayer for rain. Time of sowing. 30. First new-moon of the month.

TEBETH.

The fourth month of the civil year; the ecclesiastical year. It has twenty answers to the moon of December.

Day 1. New-moon.
8. A fast, because of the translation of Hebrew into Greek. This day, following days, were overseen by the first of the tenth month. (Caled.)
9. A fast for which the rabbins assi.
10. A fast in memory of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. 2 Kings xxv. 1.
28. A feast in memory of the exodus of the Sabeans out of the Sambudrim, where the power in the time of king Alex holds Shimon, son of Shabtai, found ending them one after another, and Pharseus. (Megillath, Taanith.) [Comp. Nisan 26.]

SHEBET.

The fifth month of the civil year; the of the sacred year. It has thirty day to the moon of January.

Day 1. New-moon, or the first day of the year. Rejoicing for the death of El Jannaeus, a great enemy to the Pharis.
4 or 5. A fast in memory of the death of Judas, who succeeded Joshua, Judg. ii. 10.
15. The beginning of the year of from hence they begin to count the year during which trees were judged time of their being planted. Lev. xix. 2 place the beginning of these four ye day of the month.
22. A fast in memory of the death of Niskalos, who had ordained the picture figures in the temple, which was for law; but he died, and his orders were. The Jews place this under the lists, but it is not known who this is. (Megill. c. 11.)
23. A fast for the war of the ten tribes of Benjamin, Judg. xxvi.
They also call to remembrance the day. (Judg. xvi.)
21. A memorial of the death of Ammone; an enemy of the Jews. (Megill. lib. i. 25.)
30. First new-moon of the month.

ADAR.

The sixth month of the civil year; the sacred year. It has but twenty days, and answers to the moon of February.

Day 1. New-moon.
7. A fast, because of the death of xxix. 5.
8. 9. The trumpet sounded, by way of remembrance for the rain that fall in this month. (Megill. Taanith.)
9. A fast in memory of the several schools of Shammai and Hillel.

Tzadchum.}
THE JEWISH CALENDAR.

12. A feast in memory of the death of two proselytes, Hollianus and Pipus his brother, whom one Tyrinus or Turianus would have compelled to break the law in the city of Lodicea; but they chose rather to die, than to act contrary to the law. (Selden, de Synder. lib. iii. cap. 13. ex Megill. Taanith.)

13. Esther's fast; probably in memory of that, Esth. iv. 16. (Genebr. Bartolocci.)

14. The first purim, or lesser feast of lots, Esth. ix. 21. The Jews in the provinces ceased from the slaughter of their enemies on Nisan 14, and on that day made great rejoicing. But the Jews of Shushan continued the slaughter till the 15th. Therefore Mordecai settled the feast of lots on the 14th and 15th of this month.

15. The great feast of purim, or lots; the second purim. These three days, the 13th, 14th and 15th, are commonly called the days of Mordecai; though the fast for the death of Nicanor has no relation either to Esther or to Mordecai.

The collectors of the half-shekel, paid by every Israelite, (Exod. xxxi. 13.) received it on Adar 15, in the cities, and on the 25th in the temple. (Talmud. Tract. Shekalim.)

17. The deliverance of the sages of Israel, who, flying from the persecution of Alexander Jannaeus, king of the Jews, retired into the city of Kosilk in Arabia; but finding themselves in danger of being sacrificed by the Gentiles, the inhabitants of the place, they escaped by night. (Megill. Taanith.)

20. A feast in memory of the rain obtained from God, by one called Onias Haggai, during a great drought in the time of Alexander Jannaeus. (Megill. Taanith.)

23. The dedication of the temple of Zerubbabel, Ezra vi. 16. The day is not known. Some put it on the 18th, the calendar of Sigionus puts it on the 23d.

28. A feast in commemoration of the repeal of the decree by which the kings of Greece had forbidden the Jews to circumcise their children, to observe the sabbath, and to decline foreign worship. (Megill. Taanith. et Gemar. ut Tit. Thaenith. c. 2.)

When the year consists of thirteen lunar months they place here, by way of intercalation, the second month of Adar, or Ve-adar.

NISAN, or ABIB. Exod. xiii. 4.

The seventh month of the civil year; the first month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of March.

Day 1. New-moon. A fast, because of the death of the children of Aaron, Lev. x. 1, 2.

10. A fast for the death of Miriam, the sister of Moses, Numb. xx. 1. Also in memory of the scarcity of water that happened, after her death, to the children of Israel in the desert of Kadesh, Numb. xx. 2.

On this day every one provided himself a lamb or kid, preparatory to the following passover.

14. On the evening of the 14th they killed the paschal lamb; they began to use unleavened bread, and ceased from all servile labor.

15. The solemnity of the passover, with its octave. The first day of unleavened bread, a day of rest. They ate none but unleavened bread during eight days.

After sunset they gathered a sheaf of barley, which they brought into the temple. (Cod. Menachot. vi. 3.)

Supplication for the reign of the spring. (Genebr.)

16. On the second day of the feast, they offered the barley which they had provided the evening before, as the first-fruits of the harvest. After that time, it was allowed to put the sickle to the corn.

The beginning of harvest.

From this day they began to count fifty days to pentecost.

21. The octave of the feast of the passover. The end of unleavened bread. This day is held more solemn than the other days of the octave; yet they did not refrain from manual labor on it.

30. The first new-month of the month Jiar.

The book called Megillah Taanith does not notice any particular festival for the month Nisan.

JIAR, or IYAR.

The eighth month of the civil year; the second month of the ecclesiastical year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of April.

Day 1. New-moon.

6. A fast of three days for excesses committed during the feast of the passover, that is, on the Monday, Thursday, and the Monday following. (Calendar Bartolocci.)

7. The dedication of the temple, when the Asmoneans consecrated it anew, after the persecutions of the Greeks. (Megill. Taanith, c. 2.)

10. A fast for the death of the high-priest Eli, and for the capture of the ark by the Philistines.

14. The second passover, in favor of those who could not celebrate the first, on Nisan 15.

23. A feast for the taking of the city of Gaza, by Simon Maccabees. (Calendar Scalig. I Mac. xiii. 43, 44.)

Or for the taking and purification of the citadel of Jerusalem, by the Maccabees; according to the calendar of Signionus, 1 Mac. xiii. 49, 53; xvi. 7, 36.

A feast for the expulsion of the Caritaes out of Jerusalem, by the Asmoneans or Maccabees. (Meg. Taanith.) [Comp. Tebeth 23.]

27. A feast for the expulsion of the Galileans, or those who attempted to set up crowns over the gates of their temples, and of their houses; and even on the heads of forty oxen and asses; and to sing hymns in honor of false gods. The Maccabees drove them out of Judea and Jerusalem, and appointed this feast to perpetuate the memory of their expulsion. (Megill. Taanith.)

28. A fast for the death of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

SIVAN.

The ninth month of the civil year; the third month of the ecclesiastical year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of May.

Day 1. New-moon.

6. Pentecost, the fiftieth day after the passover. Called also the Feast of Weeks, because it happened seven weeks after the passover. We do not find that it had any octave.

15, 16. A feast to celebrate the victory of the Maccabees over the people of Bethsan, 1 Mac. v. 53; xii. 40, 41. (Megill. Taanith.)

17. A feast for the taking of Cesarea by the Asmoneans; who drove the pagans from thence, and settled the Jews there. (Megill. Taanith.)
22. A fast in memory of the prohibition by Jeroboam, son of Nebat, to his subjects, forbidding them to carry their first-fruits to Jerusalem, 1 Kings xii. 27.

25. A fast in commemoration of the death of the rabbinic, Simon, son of Camael, Ishmael, son of Eliaha, and Chelina, the high-priest’s deputy.

A fast in memory of the solemn judgment pronounced in favor of the Jews by Alexander the Great, against the Ismaelites, who, by virtue of their birthright, maintained possession of the land of Canaan, against the Cæculeans, who claimed the same, as being the original possessors, and against the Egyptians, who demanded restitution of the vessels and other things, borrowed by the Hebrews, when they left Egypt. (Vide Megillath Tannith.) But the Gemara of Babylon (Tita. Sanhedrin, c. 11.) puts the day of this sentence on Nisan 14. [Comp. Cisleu 21.]

27. A fast, because rabbi Chelina, the son of Thaddeon, was burnt with the book of the law.

30. The first new-moon of the month Thammuz.

THAMMUZ, or TAMUZ.

The tenth month of the civil year; the fourth month of the holy year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of June.

Day 1. New-moon.

14. A feast for the abolition of a pernicious book of the Sadducees and Bethusians, by which they endeavored to subvert the oral law, and all the traditions. (Megillath Tannith.)

On this day the city of Jerusalem was taken. The perpetual evening and morning sacrifice was suspended during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. Epistemon tore the book of the law, and set up an idol in the temple. It is not said whether this happened under Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, or the Romans.

AB.

The eleventh month of the civil year; the fifth month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of July.

1. New-moon. A fast for the death of Aaron the high-priest.

5. A commemoration of the children of Jethuel, of the race of Judah, who, after the return from the captivity, were brought up in the temple. (Megillath Tannith.)

9. A fast of the fifth month, in memory of God’s declaration to Moses on this day, that none of the murmuring Israelites should enter the land of promise, Num. xiv. 29, 31.

8. Iyar. April.
THE JEWISH CALENDAR.

12. A feast in memory of the death of two proselytes, Hollaunus and Pipus his brother, whom one Tyrius or Turianus would have compelled to break the law, in the city of Laodicea; but they chose rather to die, than to act contrary to the law. (Selden, de Synadr. lib. iii. cap. 13. ex Megill. Tannith.)

13. Esther’s fast; probably in memory of that, Esth. iv. 16. (Gesen. Bartolocci.)

A feast in memory of the death of Nicbor, an enemy of the Jews, 1 Mac. vii. 44; 2 Mac. xv. 30, &c. Some of the Hebrews insist, that Nicbor was killed by Judith, sister of Judas Maccabaeus.

14. The first purim, or lesser feast of lots, Esth. ix. 21. The Jews in the provinces ceased from the slaughter of their enemies on Nisan 14, and on that day made great rejoicing. But the Jews of Shushan continued the slaughter till the 15th. Therefore Mordecai settled the feast of lots on the 14th and 15th of this month.

15. The great feast of purim, or lots; the second purim. These three days, the 13th, 14th and 15th, are commonly called the days of Mordecai; though the feast for the death of Nicbor has no relation either to Esther or to Mordecai.

The collectors of the half-shekel, paid by every Israelite, (Exod. xxx. 13.) received it on Adar 15, in the cities, and on the 23rd in the temple. (Talmud. Tract. Shkelim.)

17. The deliverance of the ages of Israel, who, flying from the persecution of Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, retired into the city of Koæik in Arabia; but finding themselves in danger of being sacrificed by the Gentiles, the inhabitants of the place, they escaped by night. (Megill. Tannith.)

20. A feast in memory of the rain obtained from God, by one called Ovias Haggagel, during a great drought in the time of Alexander Jannæus. (Megill. Tannith.)

23. The dedication of the temple of Zerubbabel, Ezra vi. 16. The day is not known. Some put it on the 16th, the calendar of Sigonius puts it on the 23d.

28. A feast in commemoration of the repeal of the decree by which the kings of Greece had forbidden the Jews to circumcise their children, to observe the sabbath, and to decline foreign worship. (Megill. Tannith. et Gemar. ut Tef. Tannith. c. 3.)

When the year consists of thirteen lunar months, they place hore, by way of intercalation, the second month of Adar, or Ve-adar.

NISAN, or ABIB. Exod. xiii. 4.

The seventh month of the civil year; the first month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of March.

Day 1. New-moon. A fast, because of the death of the children of Aaron, Lev. x. 1, 2.

10. A fast for the death of Miriam, the sister of Moses, Numb. xx. 1. Also in memory of the scarcity of water that happened, after her death, to the children of Israel in the desert of Kadesh, Numb. xx. 2. On this day every one provided himself a lamb or kid, preparatory to the following passover.

14. On the evening of the 14th they killed the paschal lamb; they began to use unleavened bread, and ceased from all servile labor.

15. The solemnity of the passover, with its octave. The first day of unleavened bread, a day of rest. They ate none but unleavened bread during eight days.

After sunset they gathered a sheaf of barley, which they brought into the temple. (Cod. Menachot. vi. 3.)

Supplication for the reign of the spring. (Genesh.)

16. On the second day of the feast, they offered the barley which they had provided the evening before, as the first-fruits of the harvest. After that time, it was allowed to put the sickle to the corn.

The beginning of harvest.

From this day they began to count fifty days to pentecost.

21. The octave of the feast of the passover. The end of unleavened bread. This day is held more solemn than the other days of the octave; yet they did not refrain from manual labor on it.

30. The first new-moon of the month Jiar.

The book called Megillath Tannith does not notice any particular festival for the month Nisan.

JIAR, or IYAR.

The eighth month of the civil year; the second month of the ecclesiastical year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of April.

Day 1. New-moon.

6. A fast for the death of Eli, and for the capture of the ark by the Philistines.

14. The second passover, in favor of those who could not celebrate the first, on Nisan 15.

23. A fast for the taking of the city of Gaza, by Simon Maccabeus. (Calendar. Bcal. 1 Mac. iii. 43, 44.)

Or for the taking and purification of the citadel of Jerusalem, by the Maccabees; according to the calendar of Sigonius, 1 Mac. xiii. 43, 53; xvi. 7, 36.

A feast for the expulsion of the Samaritans out of Jerusalem, by the Asmoneans or Maccabees. (Megill. Tannith.)

28. A fast for the death of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

SIVAN.

The ninth month of the civil year; the third month of the ecclesiastical year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of May.

Day 1. New-moon.

6. Pentecost, the fifteenth day after the passover. Called also the Feast of Weeks, because it happened seven weeks after the passover. We do not find that it had any octave.

15, 16. A feast to celebrate the victory of the Maccabees over the people of Bethan, 1 Mac. v. 29; xili. 40, 41. (Megill. Tannith.)

17. A fast for the taking of Cesarea by the Asmoneans; who drove the pagans from thence, and settled the Jews there. (Megill. Tannith.)
22. A fast in memory of the prohibition by Jeho-boam, son of Nebat, to his subjects, forbidding them to carry their first-fruits to Jerusalem, 1 Kings xii. 27.
23. A fast in commemoration of the death of the rabbi, Gamaliel, Ishmael, son of Eliezer, and Channa, the high-priest's dey.
A fast in memory of the solemn judgment pronounced in favor of the Jews by Alexander the Great, against the Ishmaelites, who, by virtue of their birthright, maintain a possession of the land of Canaan, against the Canaanites, who claimed the same, as being the original possessors, and against the Egyptians, who demanded restitution of the vessels and other things, borrowed by the Hebrews, when they left Egypt. (Priest Megilla Thannith.) But the Jews of Babylon (Tit. Sandins, c. 11.) puts the day of this sentence on Nisan 14. [Comp.
Cislen 21.]
27. A fast, because rabbis Channin, the son of Thadon, was burnt with the book of the law.
29. The first new-moon of the month Thammuz.

THAMMUZ, or TAMUZ.
The tenth month of the civil year; the fourth month of the holy year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of June.

Day 1. New-moon.
14. A feast for the abolition of a pernicious book of the Sadducees and Bethusians, by which they endeavored to subvert the oral law, and all the traditions. (Megill. Thannith.)
17. A fast in memory of the tables of the law, broken by Moses, Exod. xxxii. 19.
On this day the city of Jerusalem was taken. The perpetual evening and morning sacrifices was suspended during the siege of Jerusalem by Tiberius.
Epistemon tore the book of the law, and set up an icon in the temple. It is not said whether this happened under Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, or the Romans.
AB.
The eleventh month of the civil year; the fifth month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of July.

1. New-moon. A fast for the death of Aaron the high-priest.
5. A commemoration of the children of Jethuel, of the race of Judah, who, after the return from the captivity, furnished wood to the temple. (Megill. Thannith.)
9. Thammuz, the fifth month, in memory of God's declaration to Moses on this day, that none of the murmuring Israelites should enter the land of promise, Num. xiv. 29, 31.

A GENERAL

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF THE

HOLY BIBLE.

The Author places the true date of the birth of Christ four years before the common Era, or A.D.

A.M. 1 corresponds to the 710th year of the Julian Period.

We have added the Chronology adopted by Dr. Hales; and also a reference to the sources of information, both sacred and profane. [It must, however, be borne in mind, that the particularity of the dates here assigned rests chiefly on mere conjecture.]

<td>The Lord appears to Moses in a burning bush, while feeding his father-in-law's flock; sends him to Egypt to deliver Israel. Moses returns into Egypt. His brother Aaron comes to meet him, to mount Horeb. The two brothers announce to Pharaoh the commands of the Lord; Pharaoh refuses to set Israel at liberty; but loads them with new burdens. Moses performs several miracles in his presence; these failing to convince the king, his people suffer several plagues. 1. Plague. Water changed into blood; about the 15th of 6th month. 2. Plague. Frogs; 25th of 6th month. 3. Plague. Gnats or lice; 27th of 6th month. 4. Plague. Flies of all sorts; about the 29th and 29th of 6th month. 5. Plague. Murrain on the cattle; about the 1st of 7th month. 6. Plague. Boils; about the 3d of 7th month. 7. Plague. Lizard and fire from heaven; 4th of 7th month. 8. Plague. Locusts; 7th of 7th month. 9. Plague. Darkness; 10th of 7th month. On this day Moses appoints that this month in future should be the 1st month, according to the sacred style. Orders the passover, and sets apart the paschal lamb, which was to be sacrificed four days afterwards. 10. Death of the first-born of the Egyptians, in the night of the 14th or 15th of Abib. This same night, the Israelites celebrate the first passover; and Pharaoh expels them from Egypt. Israel departs from Ramesses to Succoth. From Succoth to Etham. From Etham they turned south, and encamped at Pi-hahiroth; between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon. Pharaoh pursues Israel with his army, and overtakes them at Pi-hahiroth: God gives the Hebrews a pillar of cloud to guide and protect them. The water splits, and Israel goes through on dry ground. The Egyptians are drowned; 21st of the first month. Moses, having passed the sea, is now in the wilderness of Etham; after marching three days in the desert, Israel arrives at Marah, where Moses sweetens the water. From Marah they come to Elim. From Elim to the Red sea; then into the desert of Sin, where God sends manna; from thence to Dophkah, Alush and Rephidim, where Moses obtains water from a rock; 21st month. About this place the Amalekites slay those who could not keep up with the body of Israel. Moses sends Joshua against them, while he himself goes to a mountain, and lifts up his hands in prayer. On the third day of the third month, after their departure from Egypt, Israel comes to the foot of Mount Sinai, where they encamp above a year. Moses returns to Egypt. His brother Aaron comes to meet him, to mount Horeb. The two brothers announce to Pharaoh the commands of the Lord; Pharaoh refuses to set Israel at liberty; but loads them with new burdens. Moses performs several miracles in his presence; these failing to convince the king, his people suffer several plagues.

1. Plague. Water changed into blood; about the 18th of 6th month.
3. Plague. Gnats or lice; 27th of 6th month.
4. Flies of all sorts; about the 28th and 29th of 6th month.

6. Boils; about the 3rd of 7th month.
7. Hail, thunder and fire from heaven; 4th of 7th month.
8. Locusts; 7th of 7th month.
9. Darkness; 10th of 7th month.

On this day Moses appoints that this month in future should be the 1st month, according to the sacred style. Orders the passover, and sets apart the paschal lamb, which was to be sacrificed four days afterwards...

10. Death of the first-born of the Egyptians, in the night of the 14th or 15th of Abib.

This same night, the Israelites celebrate the first passover; and Pharaoh expels them from Egypt. Israel departs from Rameses to Succoth.

From Succoth to Etham.

From Etham they turned south, and encamped at Pi-hahiroth; between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon. Pharaoh pursues Israel with his army, and overtakes them at Pi-hahiroth; God gives the Hebrews a pillar of cloud to guide and protect them. The waters divided. Israel goes through on dry ground. the people what the Lord had proposed. The people declare their readiness to enter into this covenant.

Moses again ascends the mountain; God orders him to bid the people prepare themselves to receive his law.

On the third day after that notice, the glory of God appears on the mountain, accompanied by sound of trumpet and thunder. Moses stations the people at the foot of Mount Sinai; he alone goes up the mountain. God directs him to forbid the people to ascend lest they should suffer death. Moses goes down and declares these orders to the people. He then ascends again, and receives the decalogue.

He returns, and proposes to the people what he had received from the Lord. The people consent, and covenant on the terms proposed.

Moses goes again up the mountain; God gives him several judicial precepts of civil polity. At his return, he erects twelve altars at the foot of the mountain, causes victims to be sacrificed to ratify the covenant, and sprinkles with the blood of the sacrifices the book that contained the conditions of the covenant. He also sprinkles the people, who promise obedience and fidelity to the Lord.

Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel, go up the mountain, and see the glory of the Lord. They come down the same day; but Moses, and his servant Joshua, stay there six days longer. The seventh day the Lord calls Moses, and during forty days shows him all that concerned his tabernacle, the ceremonies of sacrifice, and other things.

After these forty days, God gives Moses the decalogue, written on two tables of stone, and bids him hasten down, because Israel had made a golden calf, and was worshipping it.

Moses comes down, and finding the people dancing about their golden calf, he throws the tables of stone on the ground, and breaks them. Coming into the camp, he destroys the calf; slays by the sword of the Levites, three thousand Israelites, who had worshipped this idol.

The day following, Moses again goes up the mountain, and, by his entreaties, obtains from God the pardon of his people. God orders him to prepare new tables for the law; and promises not to forsake Israel.

Moses comes down and prepares new tables; goes up again the day following; God shows him his glory. He continues again forty days and forty nights on the mountain, and God writes a second time his law on the tables of stone.

After forty days, Moses comes down, not knowing that his face shines with glory. He puts a veil over his face, discourses to the people, and proposes to erect a tabernacle to the Lord; to accomplish this, he taxes each Israelite at half a shekel. This occasions a numbering of the people, who amount to 603,550 men. He appoints Bezaleel and Aholab to oversee the work of the tabernacle.

Construction of the tabernacle, on the first day of the first month of the second year, after the exodus.

A second numbering of the people, the first day of the second month.

Consecration of the tabernacle, the altars and the priests, the fifth day of the second month.

Solomon lays the foundation of the temple, the 2d day of the 3d month (May). Temple of Solomon finished; being seven years and a half in building, and dedicated the year following, probably, because of the solemnity of the year of Jubilees that then happened. Solomon finishes the building of his palace, and that of his own, the daughter of Pharaoh; Visit of the queen of Sheba. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, rebels against Solomon. He flies into Egypt. Solomon dies. Rehoboam succeeds him; alienates the Israelites, and occasions the revolt of the ten tribes. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, acknowledged king of the ten tribes.

Solomon gives a remarkable sentence between 3 women Hiram, king of Tyre, congratulates Solomon on his accession to the crown; Solomon requires of him timber and workmen to assist in building the temple. Solomon lays the foundation of the temple, 2d day of the 2d month (May). Temple of Solomon finished; being seven years and a half in building, and dedicated the year following, probably, because of the solemnity of the year of Jubilee that then happened. Solomon finishes the building of his palace, and that of his queen, the daughter of Pharaoh. Visit of the queen of Sheba. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, rebels against Solomon. He flies into Egypt. Solomon dies. Rehoboam succeeds him; alienates the Israelites, and occasions the revolt of the ten tribes. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, acknowledged king of the ten tribes.</td>

The chronology of this reign is perplexed. 2 Kings xv. 8, 12, places the death of Zachariah in the 28th year of Uzziah, allowing him a reign of but six months. Yet, reckoning what time remains to the end of the kingdom of Israel, we must either admit an interregnum of nine or eleven years, between Jeroboam II. and Zachariah, as Usher does; or

Kings of Israel—254 Years.

Hoshea makes an alliance with So, king of Egypt, and endeavors to shake off the yoke of Shalmaneser.

Shalmaneser besieges Samaria; takes it after three years' siege. Carries beyond the Euphrates the tribes that Tiglath-pilesar had not already carried into captivity; the ninth year of Hoshea; of Hezekiah the sixth year.

Among the captives carried away by Shalmaneser to Nineveh, is Tobit, of the tribe of Naphtali.

The Jews of Asia confirmed in their privilege of not being compelled to serve in the wars.

Cassius demands 700 talents from Judea. Malichus causes Antipater to be poisoned.

Herod causes Malichus to be killed, to revenge the death of his father Antipater.

Felix, having attacked Phazzel, is shut up by him in a tower, whence Phazzel would not release him but on composition.

The era of Spain, Spain being now subdued to Augustus by Domitius Calvisus.

Herod and Phazzel tetrarch of Judea.

Antigonus II, son of Aristobulus, gathers an army, and enters Judea.

Herod gives him battle, and routs him.

Mark Antony coming into Bithynia, some Jews resort to him, and accuse Herod and Phazzel before him; but Herod, coming thither, wins the affections of Antony.

Mark Antony, being at Ephesus, grants the liberty of their nation to such Jews as had been brought captive by Cassius, and causes the lands to be restored that had been unjustly taken away from the Jews.

Mark Antony coming to Antioch, some principal Jews accuse Herod and Phazzel, but, instead of hearing them, he establishes the two brothers tetrarch of the Jews.

The Jews afterwards send a deputation of a thousand of their most considerable men to Antony, then at Tyre; but in vain.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, prevails with the Parthians to place him on the throne of Judea.

The Parthians seize Hyrcanus and Phazzel, and deliver them up to Antigonus.

Phazzel beats out his own brains; the Parthians carry Hyrcanus beyond the Euphrates, after Antigonus had cut off his ears.

Herod forced to flee to Jerusalem, and thence to Rome, to implore assistance from Antony. He obtains the kingdom of Judea from the senate, and returns with letters from Antony, who orders the governors of Syria to assist in obtaining the kingdom. He reigns thirty-seven years.

He first takes Joppa, then goes to Masada, where his brother Joseph was besieged by Antigonus.

He raises that siege, and marches against Jerusalem; but, the season being too far advanced, he could not then besiege it.

He takes the robbers that hid themselves in the caves of Galilee, and slays them.

Macchera, a Roman captain, and Joseph, Herod's brother, carry on the war against Antigonus, while Herod goes with troops to Antony, then besieging Samosata.

After the taking of Samosata, Antony sends Sosius, with Herod, into Judea, to reduce it.

After several battles, Herod marches against Jerusalem; the city is taken; Antigonus surrenders himself to Sosius, who insults him.

<td>Alexandria dies. Hyrcanus, her eldest son, and brother of Aristobulus, is acknowledged king. Reigns peaceably two years. Battle between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; Hyrcanus is overcome at Jericho. Hyrcanus had been high-priest under the reign of his mother nine years; then is king and pontiff two years; is afterwards only priest nineteen years; after which he is exarch four years. At last, he is Herod's captive and sport eight years. So that he survived his father, Alexander Jannaeus, forty-eight years... Peace concluded between the brothers, on condition that Hyrcanus should live private, in the enjoyment of his estate, and Aristobulus be acknowledged high-priest and king. Thus Hyrcanus, having reigned three years and three months, resigns the kingdom to Aristobulus II. who reigns three years and three months... Hyrcanus, at the instigation of Antipater, seeks protection from Aretas, king of the Arabians. Aretas, king of the Arabians, undertakes to replace Hyrcanus on the throne... Aristobulus is worsted, and forced to shut himself up in the temple at Jerusalem. He sends deputations, first to Gabinius, and then to Scænus, who were sent by Pompey into Syria; offers them great sums of money to engage on his side, and to oblige Aretas to raise the siege of the temple. Scænus writes to Aretas, and threatens to declare him an enemy to the Roman people, if he does not retire. Aretas withdraws his forces; Aristobulus pursues him, gives him battle, and obtains a victory over him. Pompey comes to Damascus, and orders Aristobulus and Hyrcanus to appear before him. He hears the case of the two brothers, and advises them to live in good understanding with each other... Aristobulus withdraws into Jerusalem, and maintains the city against Pompey, who besieges it. The city and temple taken. Aristobulus taken prisoner. Hyrcanus made high-priest and prince of the Jews, but not allowed to wear the diadem. Judea reduced to its ancient limits, and obliged to pay tribute to the Romans. Alexander, son of Aristobulus, having escaped from the custody of those who were carrying him to Rome, comes into Judea, and raises soldiers... End of the kingdom of Syria. Augustus, afterwards emperor, is born. Gabinius, a Roman commander, hunts Alexander, and besieges him in the castle of Alexanderion. Alexander surrenders, with all his strong places.</td>
