It is evident from Ruth ii. 14, 2 Sam. xvii. 30, 39, &c. that parched corn [i.e. grain] constituted part of the ordinary food of the Israelites, as it still does of the Araba resident in Syria. Their methods of preparing it, and the matter of which it was formed, are the following: The threshing was done either by the staff or the flail, (Isa. xxviii. 27, 28)—by the feet of cattle, (Deut. xxiv. 4)—or by a "sharp threshing instrument having teeth," (Isa. xlii. 15) which was sometimes thrown at the corn. The grain was then sifted to separate all impurities from it, Amos iv. 9; Luke xxii. 31. Hence we see that the threshing-floors were in the open air, Judg. vi. 11; 2 Sam. xxiv. 18. The grain thus obtained was commonly reduced to meal by the hand-mill, which consisted of a lower mill-stone, the upper side of which was concave, and an upper mill-stone, the lower surface of which was convex. The hole for receiving the corn was in the centre of the upper mill-stone; and in the operation of grinding, the lower was fixed, and the upper made to move round upon it, with considerable velocity, by means of a handle. These mills are still in use in the East, and in some parts of Scotland. Dr. E. D. Clarke says, "In the island of Cyprus I observed upon the ground the sort of stones used for grinding corn in Scotland; and I also in England, and in all parts of Palestine. There are the primitive mills of the world; and they are still used in all corn countries, where rude and ancient customs have not been liable to these changes introduced by refinement. The employment of grinding with these mills is deemed solely to its efficacy; and nothing illustrates the prophetic observation of our Father, concerning the day of Jerusalem's desolation: "Two women shall be grinding at the mill; one shall be taken, and the other left," Matt. xxxiv. 11. Mr. Pennant, in his Tour to the Hebrides, has given a particular account of these hand-mills, as used in Scotland, in which he observes that the women always accompany the grinding noise of the stones with their voices; and that when ten or a dozen are thus employed, the fury of the storm rises to such a pitch, that you would think of charity, imagine a troop of female demons to be assembled. As the operation of grinding was usually performed in the morning at day-break, the noise of the females at the hand-mill was heard all over the city, which often awoke their times, and we have seen already that the return of vegetation in the spring of the year, has been adopted very generally, as an expressive symbol of a resurrection. The apostle Paul uses this very simile, in reference to a renewed life, when he says: 'baked corn of grain, of whatever kind it be, as wheat, or some other grain, but after a proper time, it rises to light, clothed with verdure; clothed also with a husk, and other appurtenances, according to the nature which God has appointed to that species of seed— analogous to this is the resurrection of the body," &c. 1 Cor. xv. 37. Our reference is, that if this comparison were in use among the ancients, (and a gem, in Montfaucon, declares its antiquity,) it could hardly be unknown to the Corinthians, in their learned and polite city, "The Eye of Greece!" neither could it be well confined to the philosophers there, but must have been known by those to whom the apostle wrote, generally; if so, then not only was the sacred writer justified in selecting it by way of illustration, but he had more reason for calling them "fools" who did not properly reflect on what was acknowledged and admitted among themselves, than modern inconsiderates have supposed; and whatever of harsh-

COTTON, a white woolly or downy substance, found in a brown bud, produced by a shrub, the leaves of which resemble those of the sycamore-tree. The bud, which grows as large as a pigeon's egg, turns black, and dries up into three parts; the cotton is as white as snow, and with the heat of the sun swells to the size of a pullet's egg.

Scripture speaks of cotton under the Hebrew name שֵׁסֶךְ (šēsēk), (Exod. xxv. 4.) which in the English version has the same sense as the Hebrew. The šēsēk designates generally cotton, afterwards called bat, πῦκτος. Both words, however, are also used of flax.

COVENANT, the word testamentum is often used in Latin, and διονέμων in Greek, to express the idea of the Hebrew nāḇāh, which signifies promise; whence the titles Old and New Testaments are used improperly to denote the Old and New Covenants. Grammarians remark that the alliance wherewith we term a covenant is expressed in Greek by two words: (1)
When both parties are equal, so that each may stand upon terms, or canvass the terms of the other, propose any bargain, or be master of the very means, (Coven. 2) but, (2) when the covenant is of that nature, when one party being greatly the superior, propose, and the other, willing to come to agreement, accepts his propositions; then the word used is (Coven. 3) which signifies an apprized—dispensation—institution; whereby the proposer pledges himself, but does not bind the acceptor, by the propositions, till he has actually accepted them. If this distinction be well founded, then it, will immediately appear, that there is great propriety in the title given to our “Book of the New Covenant,” the new (Coven. 4) inaccurately termed by us the “New Testament,” since herein the proposals of God to man are made, and recorded; but those proposals imply that the party to be benefited by them, should accept and appeal to them, in a personal and a binding manner.

There is an importance attached to the term covenanted, which must justify a little further enlargement on it. That it sometimes signifies simply a proposal.
(Coven. 5) the following instances will determine. 1 Kings xx.
34. Benhadad said to Ahab, “The cities which my father took from thy father, I will restore,” &c. Then said Ahab, “I will tach thee at thy word; I accept thy proposal.” (Coven. 6) and send thee away without the newco-venant.” And the king stood by a pillar, and made be sure of us. To this effect, 2 Kings xil. 3. They are the covenants of God, which were the same as what was required of them. This seems to be the import of the apostle’s reasoning, 2 Tim. ii. 13. “If we believe not,” and will not accept his proposals, made, with a view to our belief, and acceptance of them, “ye shall neither be saved,” and will entirely adhere to whatever he has offered, or proposed to us: (Coven. 7) “he cannot deny himself;” he cannot withdraw those proposals to which he has invited us to accede: i.e.
(Coven. 8) our subservience does not diminish the good faith, or the perpetuity of God’s offers. (See Rom. iii. 3.) Thus we see that the word covenant implies, (1) an appointment to which the respondent could agree pas-ively, only, by obedience; as a covenant made with day and night; (Jer. xxxiii. 20.) or with the earth, and the agreement of the dust, &c. (2) A proposal made, or given as a constituted regulation, and appointment; given to intelligent agents. (3) A proposal made, and offered to the acceptance of intelligent agents: not to be varied, or diversified by them; but to be accepted as in its terms. (4) A proposal made, which, after being properly canvassed and examined, are finally adjusted by them, and deliberately con-(Coven. 9) (5) The ratification—offering; customary on such occasions.

It may be proper here to hint at the signs of covenants, i.e. memorials, things never to be looked on without bringing to recollection the agreement made on the original and primary occasion of their appointment. (1) Was not, perhaps the tree of knowledge such a sign to Adam? (2) God says expressly of the rainbow, (Gen. ix. 12.) “This is the sign which I give of the covenant (the dispensation which I appoint) between myself and all flesh. And when I bodily with clouds (i.e. storms, rains, &c.) the earth, the bow shall appear in the clouds, and I will recollect my agreement, and there shall be no deluge to destroy the earth.” (3) Abraham received the sign—seal—memorandum—of circumcision. (4) Je-cob and Laban raised “the heap of witnesses,” as a memorial of an agreement made; and this heap was prescribed to be a witness against them for ever. (5) Most ages, without reminding themselves, or their posterity, of the original agreement thereby commemorated. (6) As such a sign the Israelites received circumcision, and the sabbath, Exod. xx. 16. The first covenant with the Hebrews was that made when the Lord chose Abraham and his posterity for his people; (Coven. 13) a second covenant, or a solemn renewal of the former, was made at Sinai, comprehending all who observe the law of Moses. The same covenant of which Christ is the Mediator and Atoner, and (Coven. 14) which was confirmed by his blood, comprehends all who believe in him, and are in his church.

The first covenant between God and man was made with Adam, at his creation, whereby he was (Coven. 16) prohibited to eat a certain fruit, Gen. ii. 17. A second Covenant God made with man after his fall, promising not only forgiveness, but also a Messiah, who should redeem the human race from the death of sin, and from the second death, Rom. v. 19.
13. A third covenant: God made with Noah when he directed him to build the ark, (Gen. vi. 16.)
and which was renewed, Gen. ix. The covenants (Coven. 18) between the patriarchs Adam and Noah, their posterity, were general; that made with Abraham was more limited; concerning the person and his (Coven. 19) family by Isaac exclusively; Gen. xii. 1; xx. 4, 5, 18.
The seal or confirmation of it, was the circumcision de all the males in Abraham’s family. The effects of this covenant appear throughout the Old Testament.
(20) the coming of the Messiah is the consummation (Coven. 21) and end of it. The covenant of God with Adam forms what we call the state of nature; that with Abraham, explained further under Moses, constitutes the law; (Coven. 23) that ratified through the mediation of Jesus Christ is the kingdom of grace.

In common discourse, we usually say the Old and New Testaments; the covenant between God and (Coven. 24) the posterity of Abraham; and that which he has made with believers by Jesus Christ; because these (Coven. 25) two covenants contain essentially all the rest, which are consequences, branches, or explanations of them.
The most solemn and perfect of the covenants (Coven. 26) of God with men, is that made through the mediation of our Redeemer; which must subsist to the end of time. The covenant of God is last confirmed with his blood; the end and object of it is everlasting life, and its constitution and laws are infinitely more exalted than those of the former covenant.

The prophet Jeremiah (chap. xxxiv. 18.) speaks of a remarkable covenant; the two parties attending a covenant. The Lord says, “I will give (to punishment) the men who have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof.” The custom of cutting a victim in two, of placing the several meat parts upon two different altars, and making those who contracted pass between both, is well known in Scripture, and in profane authors. The instance of the covenant made with Abraham was served to confirm this sense; the burning lamp (the shekelah) passed between the separated parts; as Abraham (Coven. 28) probably had already done. (See Gen. xv. 9, 10, 17.)
It is not easy to determine, however, in what manner the victim was anciently divided; whether crosswise, i.e. across the loins; or lengthwise, i.e. from (Coven. 29) the front of the belly, through the whole length of the back bone, and down the spinal marrow. It is mode would be much the most expressive and solemn. May there not be an allusion to this in Heb. iv. 12, "The word of God is lively and efficacious; more piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, and joints and marrow?" Oh, for that sincerity of heart and mind, which may be found acceptable under so critical an examination!

Among other descriptions of a covenant, there is one which demands explanation: Num. xviii. 10, "The offerings I have given to thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever; it is a covenant of salt, for ever, before the Lord." 2 Chron. xiii. 5, "Ought you not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David, for ever, to him and to his sons by a covenant of salt?"

It is generally thought that salt is here made an emblem of perpetuity; but the covenant of salt seems to refer to an agreement made in which salt was used as a token of confirmation. Baron de Tott says, "[Moldovanu Pacha] was desirous of an acquaintance with me, and seeming to regret that this business would not permit him to stay long, he departed, promising in a short time to return. I had already attended him half way down the staircase, when, stopping, and turning briskly to one of my domestics who followed me, 'Bring me directly,' said he, 'some bread and salt.' I was not less surprised at this fancy, than at the haste which was made to obey him. What he requested was brought; when, taking a little salt between his fingers, and putting it with a mysterious air on a bit of bread, he ate it with devout gravity; assuring me, that I might now rely on him. I soon procured an explanation of this significant ceremony; but this same man, when become visir, was tempted to violate his oath, thus taken in my favor. Yet if this solemn contract be not always religiously observed, it serves, at least, to moderate the spirit of vengeance so natural to the Turks." The Baron adds in a note: "The Turks think it the blackest ingratitude, to forget the man from whom we have received food; which is signified by the bread and salt in this ceremony." (Trav. part 1. p. 214. Eng. edit.) The Baron alludes to this incident in part iii. p. 36. Moldovanu Pacha, being ordered to obey the baron, was not permitted to do so, but put me in great confidence in the mysterious covenant of the bread and salt, by which this man had formerly vowed inviolable friendship to me." Yet he "dissembled his discontent," and "his presumptuousness only showed itself in his first letters to the Porte." It will now appear credible, that the phrase "a covenant of salt" alludes to some such custom in ancient times; and without meaning to symbolize very deeply, we take the liberty of asking, whether the precept, (Lev. ii. 13.) "With all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt," may have any reference to ideas of a similar nature. Did the custom of feasting at a covenant-making include the same, according to the sentiment of the Turks hinted at in the baron's note?

We ought to notice the readiness of the baron's domestics, in proof that they well understood what was about to take place. Also, that this covenant is usually punctually observed; and where not so, has a restraining influence on the party who has made it; and his non-observance of it disgraces him.

We proceed to give a remarkable instance of the power of this covenant of salt over the mind; it seems to imply a something attributed to salt, which it is very difficult for us completely to explain, but which is not the least one of the secrets which the power of salt has kept in darkness. "Jacob ben Laith, the founder of a dynasty of Persian princes called the Saffarides, rising, like many others of the ancestors of the princes of the East, from a very low state to royal power, being, in his first setting out in the use of arms, no better than a freebooter or robber, is yet said to have maintained some regard to decency in his depredations, and never to have entirely stripped those that he robbed, always leaving them something to soften their affliction. Among other exploits that are recorded of him, he is said to have broken into the palace of the prince of that country, and having collected a very large booty, which he was on the point of carrying away, he found his foot kicked something which made him stumble; he imagined it might be something of value, and putting it to his mouth, the better to distinguish what it was, his tongue soon informed him it was a lump of salt. Upon this, according to the morality, or rather superstition, of the country, where the people considered salt as a symbol and pledge of hospitality, he was so touched, that he left all his booty, retiring without taking anything away with him. The next morning, the rick they had run of losing many valuable things being perceived, great was the surprise, and steer the inquiry, what could be the occasion of their being left. At length Jacob was found to be the person concerned; who having given an account, very sincerely, of the whole transaction to the prince, he gained his esteem so effectually, that it might be said with truth, that it was his regard for salt that laid the foundation of his afterfortune. The prince employed him as a man of courage and genius in many enterprises, and finding him successful in all of them, he raised him, by little and little, to the chief posts among his troops; so that, at that prince's death, he found himself possessed of the command in chief, and had such interest in their affections, that they preferred his interests to those of the children of the deceased prince, and he became absolute master of that province, from whence he afterwards spread his conquests far and wide." (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 466. Also Harmer's Obs.)

Mr. Harmer has well illustrated the phrase, "We were salted with the salt of the palace," (Ezra iv. 14.) and the reader will be pleased with his remarks: It is sufficient to put an end to all conjecture, to recite the words of a modern Persian monarch, whose court Chardin attended some time about business. Rising in a wrath against an officer who was suspected to deceive him, he drew his sabre, fell upon him, and hewed him in pieces, at the feet of the grand visir, who was standing (and whose favor the poor wretch coveted by this deception.) And looking fixedly on him, and on the other great lords that stood on each side of him, he said, with a tone of indignation, I have, then, such ungrateful servants and traitors as these to eat my salt! Look on this sword; it shall cut off all these pernicious heads. It is clear, that this expression, "eating this prince's salt," is equivalent to—receive a maintenance from him. It is a common expression of the natives in the East Indies, "I eat such an one's salt;" meaning, I am fed by him. Tamerlane, in his Institutes, mentioning one Shah Behzam, who had quitted his service, joined the enemy, and fought against him, 'At length,' says he, 'my salt which he had eaten overwhelmed him with remorse: he again threw himself on my mercy, and humbled himself before me.

COVETOUSNESS. This word is sometimes used in a good sense, as 'to covet the best gifts,' (1 Cor. xii. 31.) but usually in a bad sense, to denote an inordinate desire of earthly things, especially of that which belongs to another. Covetousness is declared by the apostle to be idolatry, Col. iii. 5.

COUNCIL is occasionally taken for any kind of assembly; sometimes for that of the Sanhedrim, at others for a convention of pastors met to regulate ecclesiastical affairs. Thus the assembly of the apostles, &c., at Jerusalem, (Acts xvi.) met to determine whether the yoke of the law should be imposed on Gentile converts, is commonly reputed to be the first council of the Christian church. See TRIBUNALS.

COUNSEL. Beside the common significations of this word, denoting the consulations of men, it is used in Scripture for the decrees of God, the orders of his providence. God frustrates the counsels, the views, the designs of princes; but "the counsels of the Lord stand forever," Ps. xxxix. 11; ev. 11; Luke vii. 30. According to the LXX. Christ is called the angel of the great counsel; the minister, the executor of the great and admirable design of God, for the salvation of mankind, Isaiah ix. 6.

COUNTRY, a land, or town. It is taken likewise for a people, Ps. xxiv. 7. "Fools in Greece, signified a race, a nation. The learned commonly denote that residence in heaven, which is hoped for and sought by Christians.

COVET. The courts belonging to the temple of Jerusalem, (1) To court of the Gentiles, because the Gentiles were allowed to enter no farther; (2) the court of Israel, because Israelites, if clean, had a right of admission into it; (3) the court of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offerings stood, and where the priests and Levites exercised their ministry. Israelites, who offered sacrifices, might bring their victims to the inner part of this court, but could not pass a certain separation which divided it; they withdrew as soon as they had delivered their sacrifices and offerings to the priests, or had made their confession, with laying their hand on the head of the victim, if it were a sin-offering.

Before the temple was built, there was a court around the tabernacle, formed only of pillars, and of veils hung thereon. In the Hebrew, this is frequent: including all those towns in which the word Hazer is combined; as Hazer-Susa, the court of Susa; Hazer-Shual; so, Hazer-a, Hazer-im, Hazer-oth: these names of towns signify courts. The courts of Jerusalem are sometimes put for the city.

COURTS, JUDICIAL, SEE TRIBUNALS.

COZBI, daughter of Zuri, a prince of the Midianites, who, with others of her sex and age, seduced the principal Israelites to commit idolatry and impurity; Phineas slew her and Zimri at the same time, Num. xxxiv. 7-15.

CRANE, a tall and long-necked fowl, which, according to Liddare, takes its name from its voice, which we imitate in mentioning it. The prophet Jeremiah mentions this bird as insensit of the seasons by its noisive and involuntary observation of their appointed times, viii. 7. The same thing is said of Aristophanes and Heir, the latter of whom says, "When thou hearest the voice of the crane, chanting annually from the month on month, recollect that this is the signal for ploughing," which indicates the approach of snowy winter. [The Hebrew reads first two, swallows, and then two, crose; our translators have either transposed the two words, or, what is more probable, mistranslated the sense of them.

CREATION, TO CREATE. These terms properly signify a production of something out of nothing. The Hebrew uses the verb אכ, to bring into, to bring into, in order to signify creation, having no word which accurately expresses absolute production out of nothing.

CRESCEND, a companion of Paul, (2 Tim. iv. 10.) who is thought by Eusebius and others to have preached in Gaul, and to have founded the church of Vienna, in Dauphiny.

CRETE, a large island, now called Candia, in the Mediterranean, (1 Mac. x. 67.) almost opposite to Egypt; and it may be considered as having been originally peopled from thence, probably by a branch of the Cretans. The Cretans affected the utmost antitypality, as a nation, and distinguished themselves as miserents, "true Cretans." Homer celebrates this island as famous for its hundred gates, which Virgil (Aenid. lii.) seems to refer to cities; but in the Odyssey Homer calls it "almost a city," that is, it was a city surrounded by the sea, its inhabitants were excellent sailors, and its vessels visited all coasts. They were also famous for archery, which they practised from their infancy. But the glory of Crete was Minos the legislator, and to be son of Jupiter and Europa, or rather Minos, which was but another name for Jupiter himself. Minos was the first, it is said, who reduced a wild people to regularity of life; and in order to effect this the more completely, he retired during nine years into the caves of Jupiter: which seems to be the same as what is related by the Hins-doo Purana, that Sami Rama performed austere devocotion nine years in the hollow of a tree, before she effected her settlement. After nine years, Minos established the house of Minos; and the legends of Crete were copied by the Greeks. See CAPPADOCIA.

The Cretans were one of the three K's against whose unfaithfulness the Grecian proverb cautioned—

Kappadocia, Kiltics, and Krete. It happens also, that the character of the Cretans is fixed and established in ancient times; for in common speech, the expression "to Cretanize," signifies to tell lies; which contributes to account for that detestable character the apostle (Titus i. 12.) has given of the Cretans, that they were "always liars." This was not only the opinion of Epimenides, from whom Paul quotes this verse, but of Callimachus, who has the same words. When Epimenides adds, that "the Cretans are savage beasts," or fierce beasts, "and gour-belles"—bulls which take a long time in being filled—he completes a most disgusting description. Polybius represents them as diseased by piracy, robbery, and almost every crime, and Paul charges Titus to rebuke them sharply, and in strong terms, to prevent their adherence to Jewish fables, human ordinances, and legal observances.

Crete was taken by the Romans under Metellus, hence called Creticus, after a vigorous resistance of above two years, (A.D. 66.) and, with the small kingdom of Cyrene, on the coast of Libya, formed a Roman province. In the reign of the emperor Leo, it had twelve bishops, subject to Constantinople. In the reign of Michael II. the Saracens seized it, and held it 27 years, when they were expelled by the emperor Phocas. It remained under the dominion of the emperor, till Baldwin, earl of Flanders, being raised to the throne, rewarded Boniface, marquis of Montserrat, with it, who sold it to the Venetians, A. D. 1194. Under their government it flourished greatly; but was unexpectedly attacked by the Turks, A. D. 1645, in the midst of peace. The siege lasted 24 years, and cost the Turks 200,000 men. It is now subject to the Turks, and, consequently, impoverished and depopulated. In many places it is unhealthy.

Crimson, see Purple, Scarlet.

Crisspus, chief of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, was converted and baptized by Paul, (Acts xviii. 8.) about A. D. 52, I Cor. i. 14. Some affirm that Crispus was bishop of Ægina, an island near Athens. The Greeks observe his festival, October 4.

Crocodylie, see Levisathan.

Cross, a kind of gibbet made of pieces of wood placed transversely; whether crossing at right angles, one at the top of the other, or in the middle, or diagonally, or fork-wise. The Greek σταυρος, a cross, often denotes only a piece of wood fixed in the ground, by the Latins called pulsus, or sulsum. Death by it, a cross was a punishment of the meanest slaves; and was a mark of infamy. This punishment was so common among the Romans, that pains, afflictions, troubles, &c., were called cruces, and the verb crucire was used for sufferings both of body and mind. Our Saviour says, that his disciple must take up his cross and follow him. The cross is the sign of ignominy and sufferings; yet it is the badge and glory of the Christian. Jesus Christ is the way we are to follow; and there is no way of attaining that glory and happiness which is promised in the gospel, but by the cross of Christ. The punishment of the cross was common among the Syrians, Egyptians, Persians, Africans, Greeks, Romans, and Jews. Pharaoh's chief baker was beheaded, and his case was a type of the death of the Lord. (Eng. trans. gallows, tree.) Haman prepared a great cross, (Eng. trans. gallows,) on which to hang Mordecai, Esth. vi. 10. The Jews will not admit that they crucified people while living; they affirm that they first put them to death, and then fastened them to a cross either by the hands or the neck. But though there are many instances of men thus hung on a gibbet after death, there are indisputable proofs of their crucifying them alive. The worshippers of Baal-peor, (Num. xxv. 4.) and the king of Ai, (Josh. viii. 22.) were hung up alive; as were the descendants of Saul, by the Gibeonites; (2 Sam. xxi. 9.) and Alexander Jannaeus crucified 800 of his subjects at an entertainment.

The law ordained that persons executed should not be left on the cross after sun-set, because he who is hanged is cursed by God, Deut. xxxi. 23. The Jews believed that the souls of those who remained on the gibbet without burial, enjoyed no peace, but wandered until their bodies were buried. This also was an idea of the Greeks and Romans.

Sometimes the criminal was crucified on a tree, and fastened to it with cords; and sometimes he was fastened with his head downwards, as was Peter, from respect to his Master, Jesus Christ, not thinking himself worthy to be fixed to a cross in the same manner as he had been. Sometimes a fire was kindled at the foot of the cross, by the smoke and flame of which the sufferer might perish. The common way of crucifying was by fastening the criminal with nails, one at each hand, and one at each foot; both his feet, and that by which he was expelled by the emperor Phocas. It remained under the dominion of the emperor, till Baldwin, earl of Flanders, being raised to the throne, rewarded Boniface, marquis of Montserrat, with it, who sold it to the Venetians, A. D. 1194. Under their government it flourished greatly; but was unexpectedly attacked by the Turks, A. D. 1645, in the midst of peace. The siege lasted 24 years, and cost the Turks 200,000 men. It is now subject to the Turks, and, consequently, impoverished and depopulated. In many places it is unhealthy.
CRO

CROWNS, perhaps it was for this reason that Joseph of Arimathea desired leave from Pilate to lay the body of Jesus in his own tomb, that it might not be thrown undistinguished into the public burying-place.

CROWN, an ornament frequently mentioned in Scripture, and in very common use, apparently, among the Hebrews. The high-priest wore a crown about his mitre, or the lower part of his bonnet, tied behind his head. It seems as if private priests, and even common Israelites, also, wore a sort of crown; for God commands Ezekiel not to take off his crown, (Eze. Eng. trans.) nor assume the marks of mourning, Eze. xxiv. 17, 30. This crown was a riband or fillet, which surrounded the head. When Moses commands the Israelites to bind the words of the law on their hands, and as frontlets between their eyes, he alludes to the use of crowns and bracelets among them, Deut. vi. 8.

Crowns are so little in use among us, that we distinguish the supreme magistrates of countries by the phrase "crowned heads"; but in the East they are worn on many occasions which require demonstrations of joy. (Comp. Eccles. and Job.) Job (xxxi. 36.) speaks of binding a crown on his head, which we are not, we presume, to take as a royal crown, (that would not need binding,) but as one of those tokens of exalted standing in his country demanded at proper opportunities. But we have this custom described at full length in Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus:—"Let no flower of the spring pass by us; let us crown ourselves with rose-buds," chap. ii. 8. "Let us put on a crown, triumphing for ever," chap. iv. 2. "The fear of the Lord is a crown of rejoicing," Eccles. i. 3. These passages lead us to the true import of the crown of thorns, placed by the Roman soldiery on the head of our Lord—it was a decision of his inauguration as king of the Jews; and it was not a tarnished golden crown which they employed, but a prickly vegetable one; to degrade, in a very expressive, and intendedly ridiculous, manner, the triumphant occasion on which they thus besmeared him. The use of crowns among the victorious athletes, or combatants in the games of antiquity, is well known. Newly married people of both sexes wore crowns, more rich and beautiful than those generally used, Is. lix. 10; Cant. iii. 11.

The crown, mitre, and diadem, royal fillet, and kara, are frequently conjoined. Crowns are bestowed on gods, kings, and princes, as marks of their dignity. David took the crown from the god Moloch, or Milcom, which was of gold and enriched with jewels, (see Molocca,) (2 Sam. xii. 30; 1 Chron. xx. 4.) and the Amalekite who boasted of killing Saul, brought that prince's diadem, or royal fillet, to David, 2 Sam. i. 10. Queens among the Persians wore diadems, Esth. xii. 17. God says, he had put a crown of gold on the head of the Jewish nation, which is represented as his spouse, Ezek. xvi. 12. Kings used several diadems, when they possessed several kingdoms. Ptolemy, having conquered Syria, made his entry into Antioch, and put two diadems on his head, that of Egypt and that of Asia. In the Revelation, the dragon with seven heads had seven crowns, one on each head, (xii. 3.) and the beast which sprang out of the sea, with ten horns, had, likewise, ten crowns. Lastly, the Eternal Word, the True and Faithful One, had many crowns on his head, xiv. 12.

Crown is figuratively used to signify honor. "Ye are my joy and my crown," says Paul to the Philippians, iv. 1. Crown is used likewise for reward, because conquerors in the public games were crowned with wreaths, garlands, &c.

CRUCIFIXION, see Cross.

CRUSE, a small vessel for holding water, and other liquids, 1 Sam. xxvi. 11.

Our translators have rendered the word cruse, no less than three words, which are offered by the Hebrew; and which, no doubt, describe different utensils—though, perhaps, all may be taken as vessels for the purpose of containing liquid. The first occurs, 1 Sam. xxvi. 11. David, when in Saul's tent, would not smite him, but carried off his spear, and his cruse (teappachoth) of water. That this was a small vessel, not a capacious cistern, is evident; that it was a personal appendage to Saul, appears from its being readily recognized as belonging to him. Probably, as the spear was taken, so was the water-vessel. However, it is certain it was not large. In 1 Kings xvii. 12, the same word is used for the widow's cruse of oil. So also 1 Kings xix. 20.—We read also, 1 Kings xiv. 3, "Take in thy hands... a cruse of honey;" but here the word is different, (babkab dezech), because, honey not being, by a great deal, so fluid as water, a different vessel might contain it; this should, most properly, be rendered a jar or pot of honey. In 2 Kings ii. 20, Elisha says, "Bring me a new cruse (teappachoth)." This vessel is described by a word different from either of the former; and which, in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 13, appears to denote a vessel in which the sacrifices were boiled; but elsewhere, a vessel—a dish, brought to table, containing oil. 2 Kings xix. 13; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 13; xxv. 15. Perhaps this might answer to our bowl, or porringer. See Dish, and Kneading-trough.

Now, it seems to be most probable, that as Saul (like Eliah) was journeying, he took with him such vessels as are customarily used by those who now journey in the East; and, as the widow in Sarepta is described as being reduced to the very extremity of famine, we may conclude that the narrower, the smaller, the more diminutive, and the less capacious were her cruse, the better it agrees with the handful of meal, and with the other circumstances of her situation and history.

To those acquainted with the shape and nature of the Florentine flasks of oil, one of the above figures (a) will appear a close resemblance of them; and as there is, probably, a reason, in the nature of that commodity, for making the flask with a neck so long and so narrow, if the same reason hold in Judæa, the same would be the shape of the Jewish flaska. Moreover, as this is the shape of the water-flasks now used by travellers in the East, it may well represent the ancient teappachoth, which our translators have rendered cruse. The reader will observe the wicker case to this flask; which we may suppose, in the instance of Saul's, was of superior materials, or more ornamented than usual, by way of denoting its employment by a royal personage. But, as it must be admitted that it might be of another shape, we have in our engraving a vessel differently shaped, (a) which likewise is used by travellers in the East, to contain water, honey, or oil; and the ornaments on which might easily be rendered royal, and even superb. Pococke says, "If they go long journeys, they have such vessels for containing water as are represented in fig. (s) and (c) which they use in the journey to Mecca.

To CRY. This word is used in several senses. "The blood of Abel cried from the ground," where it was spilt, Gen. iv. 10. "The cry of Sodom ascended up to heaven," xviii. 20. The cries of the Israelites, oppressed by the Egyptians, rose up to the throne of God, Exod. iii. 9. "He looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry," Isa. v. 7. "If my land cry against me, or the furrows likewise thereof complain," says Job, xxxi. 36. The force of these expressions is such, that any explanation would only weaken them.

CRYSTAL. The Hebrew Kerech is rendered by our translators, crys'tal, (Ezek. i. 22.) frost, (Gen. xxxi. 40, &c.) and ice, Job vi. 16, &c. The word primarily designates a perfectly transparent and hyaline gem, from its resemblance to this substance.

CUBIT, a measure used among the ancients, and which the Hebrews call amadak. A cubit was originally the distance from a man's shoulder, or from the extremity of the middle finger; which is the fourth part of a well-proportioned man's stature. The Hebrew cubit, according to bishop Cumberland, and M. Pelleter, is twenty-one inches; but others fix it at eighteen. The Talmudists observe, that the Hebrew cubit was larger, by one quarter, than the Roman. It is thought that there were two sorts of cubits among the Hebrews, one sacred, the other common; the sacred containing three feet, the common, a foot and a half. Moses (Num. xxxiv. 4) assigns to the Levites 1000 sacred cubits of land round about their cities; and in the next verse he gives them 2000 common ones. The two columns of brass, in Solomon's temple, are reckoned eighteen cubits high, in 1 Kings vii. 15, and in 2 Chron. iii. 15, thirty-five cubits. (See Boaz.) Other writers, however, allow the sacred cubit to exceed the common cubit by only a hand's breadth. They suppose Moses to speak of the common cubit, when he describes it as the cubit of a man's hand, Exod. xxv. 15. Deut. iii. 11.) and that the sacred cubit was a hand's breadth longer than this, as Ezek. xlii. 13. The very learned and ingenuous Dr. Arbuthnot says, that to him it seems plain, that the Jews used two sorts of cubits, a sacred one, and a profane or common one; for in Deut. iii. 11., the bed of Og is said to have been nine cubits long, and four cubits broad, after the cubit of a man. But (Ezek. xi. 5.) Ezekiel's reed is said to be six cubits long, by the cubit and a hand-breadth; whence it appears, that the larger cubit, by which the reed was measured, was longer than the common one, by a hand-breadth, or three inches. But, notwithstanding these reasons, Calmet believes that there was but one cubit among the Hebrews, from the exodus to the Babylonish captivity; and that this was the Egyptian cubit, the measure of which was taken, some years ago, from the old standards extant at Grand Cairo; and that only after the captivity, Scripture notices two sorts of measures to distinguish the ancient Hebrew cubit from that of Babylon, which the captives had used during their abode in that city. On this, he thinks, is grounded the precaution of Ezekiel in observing, that the cubit he is speaking of is the true ancient cubit, larger by a hand's breadth than the common cubit.

CUCKOO, an insect bird, found in Italy and Spain; and the ornaments on which might easily be rendered royal, and even superb. Pococke says, "If they go long journeys, they have such vessels for containing water as are represented in fig. (s) and (c) which they use in the journey to Mecca.

CUCUMBER, a vegetable very plentiful in the East, especially in Egypt, (Num. xi. 5) where they are esteemed delicacies, and form a great part of the food of the lower class of people, especially during the hot months. (The swep, keshim, of Numb. xi. 5, is the Egyptian cucumber, the Cucumis chair of Linneas, similar in form to our cucumber, but larger, being usually a foot in length. It is described by Hasselquist as greener, smoother, softer, sweeter, and more digestible than our cucumber. (Travels, p. 530, Germ. ed.) He also says, that it grows in perfection around the lower and southern parts of the Nile. In other parts of Egypt it is less cultivated, because it does not succeed as well. They are not watery, but rather of a firm substance, like melons, with a sweetish and refreshing taste. In our climate they are brought upon the tables of the great, and of the Europeans in Egypt, as the best and most pleasant refreshment, and from which no ill consequences are to be apprehended.

CUD, the food deposited in the first stomach in cattle, and some other animals, for the purpose of rumination, i.e. of being chewed again, when it returns upwards, after having been swallowed. Animals not chewing the cud were prohibited as food to the Hebrews, Deut. xiv. 6—8. See Animals.

CUMMIN, a plant much like fennel; which produces blossoms and branches in an umbellate form. Our Lord reproved the scribes and Pharisees for so carefully paying tithes of mint, anise, and cummin, and yet neglecting good works, and more essential obedience to God's law, Matt. xxi. 23.

CUP. This word is taken in Scripture both in a proper and in a figurative sense. In a proper sense, it signifies a common cup, such as is used for drinking out of at meals; or a cup of ceremonial use, as used at solemn and religious meals; as at the passover, when the father of the family pronounced certain blessings over the cup, and, having tasted it, passed it round to the company and his whole family, who partook of it. In a figurative sense, cup generally imports afflictions or punishments: "Stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury," Isaiah li. 17. (See Psalm lxxv. 8). In the same sense, men are represented as drunk with sorrow, with afflictions, with the wine of God's wrath; whose expressions are consequences following this first metaphor of a cup. It is derived from the custom observed at entertainments for the guests to drink round out of the same cup. Such persons as refused to drink in their turn at feasts were not exculpated: "Let him drink or begone," was a kind of proverb. Cup denotes, likewise, share or portion, (Psalm xvi. 5) because at meals each had his cup. Or the prophet alludes to those cups which were drunk by every one in his turn: "I will have no share in the inheritance, the feast, sacrifices, portions, society of the wicked; God alone is sufficient for me; he is my portion and my cup; I desire nothing further."

11. Blessing (1 Cor. x. 16.) is that which was blessed in entertainments of ceremony, or solemn services, out of which the company drank all round. Or a cup over which God was blessed for having furnished its contents;—and occasionally, for having afforded cause, as well as means, of rejoicing. Our Saviour, in the last supper, blessed the cup, and gave it to each of his disciples to drink, Luke xxii. 20.

12. Cup of Salvation (Ps. cxvi. 13.) is a cup of thanksgiving, of blessing the Lord for his mercies. We see this practice where the Jews of Egypt, in their festivals for delivery, offered cups of salvation. The Jews have at this day cups of thanksgiving, which are blessed, in their marriage ceremonies, and in entertainments made at the circumcision of their children. Some commentators believe "the cup of salvation" to be a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, according to the law of Moses, Exod. xxix. 40.

13. Cup or Jezreu, by which, according to the English translation, he is said to have divined, Gen. xxiv. 5. From customs still used in the East, it seems probable that this, instead of being a cup by which to divine, was a cup of distinction, or one peculiar to the governor, which had been presented, as they now are in some parts, by the citizens whom he governed. See under Joseph.

14. Curse. God denounced his curse against the serpent which had seduced Eve, (Gen. iii. 14.) and against Cain, who had imbrued his hands in his brother Abel's blood, iv. 11. He also promised to bless those who should bless Abraham, and to curse those who should curse him. The divine maledictions are not merely imprecations, nor are they impotent wishes; but they carry their effects with them, and are attended with all the miseries they denounce or foretell.

Holy men sometimes prophetically cursed particular persons; (Gen. ix. 25.; xlix. 7; Deut. xxvii. 15; Josh. vi. 26.) and history informs us, that these imprecations had their fulfilment; as had those of our Saviour against the barren fig-tree, Mark xi. 21.

But such curses are not consequences of passion, impatience, or revenge;—they are predictions, and therefore not such as God condemns. No one shall presume to curse the father or his mother, on pain of death; (Exod. xx. 17.) nor the prince of his people; (xxii. 28.) nor one that is deaf; (Lev. xix. 14.) whether a man really deaf be meant here, or one who is absent, and therefore cannot hear what is said against him. Blasphemy, or cursing of God, is punished with death, Lev. xxii. 10, 11. Our Lord pronounces blessed those disciples who are (falsely) loaded with curses; and requires his followers to bless those who curse them; to render blessing for cursing, &c. Matt. v. 11.

The rabbins say, that Barak cursed and communicated Meroz, who dwelt near the brook Ki-shon, but who came not to assist Israel against Jabin. Wherefore Barak excommunicated him by the sound of 400 trumpets, according to Judg. v. 23. But Meroz is nowhere specially the name of a place. See ANATHHEMA, Devoting.

15. I. CUSH, eldest son of Ham, and father of Nimrod, Gen. x. 8. His sons were Seba, Havilah, Sab-tah, Raamah, Sabteca, and Nimrod, ver. 7.

16. CUSH, and CUSHAN, the countries peoples by the descendants of Cush, and generally called Ethiopia, in the English Bible, as though but one place were intended. Such, however, is not the fact, and to prevent all some passages of Scripture in inextricable confusion. [Commentators differ exceedingly in respect to the countries which are included under the name of Cush, or Ethiopia. Bochart every where understands the southern parts of Arabia; (Phileg. iv. 8.) Gesenius affirms that Cush, and all the tribes connected with this name, are to be sought only in Africa. (Lex. art. cv.) Michaelis supposed that both the African Ethiopia and southern Arabia were intended. (Spicileg. i. 163, seq.) To this opinion Rosenmüller also assents; (Bibl. Geogr. iii. p. 154.) and adds, that in a wider sense, the Hebrews designated by the name Cush all southern countries, or the torrid zone, with their inhabitants, so far as these were of a black or tawny color,—in an indefinite extent, from west to east. He supposes, too, that if the Hebrews had any knowledge of the countries around the Indus and Ganges, which we now call the East Indies, they also included all these regions under the name Cush; i.e. they employed that name generally and indefinitely, just as the Greeks did Ethiopia, and as we do, at the present day, the term East Indies. Mr. Bryant supposes the Scripture to mention three different countries of this name, viz. in Africa, in southern Arabia, and in the third, comprising the region of Persia, Chusistan, and Susiana. (Mythology, vol. iii. p. 180.; p. 175, seq.) As this last opinion is the more consonant, both with the Bible and with profane history, it will be proper here to point out the grounds on which it rests.

1. Cush, the oriental Cush, or Ethiopia, is mentioned by Herodotus; (vii. 70.) and Zephaniah manifestly alludes to it, when he speaks of the return of Judah from captivity: (Jer. ii. 10.) "From beyond the rivers of Cush (Ethiopia), my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall yet again obtain mine image." The principal of these rivers were, of course, the Ulai, Kur, Chobar, and Choaspes; all eastern branches of the Tigris; near which were the chief places of the captivity. (Bryant's Mythol. iii. p. 121.) Chalchis was also included in this oriental Cush or Ethiopia; for Jerome mentions St. Andrew's preaching the gospel in the towns upon the two Chalchic rivers, the Aparius and Phasis; and calls the natives Ethiopie interiores; he also relates the same circumstance of his mother, on pain of death; (Exod. xxii. 17.) nor the prince of his people; (xxii. 28.) nor one that is deaf; (Lev. xix. 14.) whether a man really deaf be meant here, or one who is absent, and therefore cannot hear what is said against him. Blasphemy, or cursing of God, is punished with death, Lev. xxii. 10, 11. Our Lord pronounces blessed those disciples who are (falsely) loaded with curses; and requires his followers to bless those who curse them; to render blessing for cursing, &c. Matt. v. 11.

II. CUSH, and CUSHAN, the countries peoples by the descendants of Cush, and generally called Ethiopia, in the English Bible, as though but one place were intended. CUSH [368] CUSH xvii. 94, where the king of Assyria is said to have transported from Babylon, and Cuthah, and Ava, and Hamath, colonies into the cities of Samaria, can hardly have been the same as the oriental Cush; the name Cuthah, or Cush, being only the Aramaean mode of pronouncing Cush; since the letters skin and sam were by them often thus interchanged; as in the name Susa, Cius, or Assyria, which they pronounced Susara, Susara, Cushara. From the fact of its being mentioned along with Babylon, it is evidently a country lying eastward of Palestine, and the coincidence of the name leaves little room to doubt its identity with the oriental Cush, as above described. To this country, then, we must assign the river Gíbon. (See Stuart's Heb. Chrestomathy on Gen. ii. 13.)

2. Cush, as employed by the Hebrews, included the southern parts of Arabia, principally along the coasts of the Red sea; since they are several passages of Scripture which apply to no other country; and last of all to the African Ethiopia, or Abyssinia. From this country originated Nimrod, who conquered Babel, Gen. x. 8, seq. The Ethiopian woman, whom Moses married during the march of the Israelites from Egypt, was said to have come from Cush, in Ethiopia, Gen. vii. 2.7, which would be nonsense, if the Cushans were the same as the Cushans of the Haran passages. From this description, and the fact of Cush being a name of place, and of Cushans being mentioned in the same passages as Cushans, it is evident that Ethiopia was the Cush to which the Hebrews referred; and this is confirmed by the genealogy of the Cushites in Gen. x. 9, 10, 11, where Cush is the father of Nimrod, the father of Peleg, the father of Reu, and the father of Serug. In this passage, Cush is as much as to say Cushans, or Cushites; and the passage is the earliest notice of Ethiopia, from which the word Cush, and Cushans, is derived.

The Cushans of the Bible were, therefore, a tribe of Cushites, who dwelt along the Red sea, and were the ancestors of the Cushites that dwelt along the shore of Egypt, and of the Cushites that dwelt along the shores of the Red sea.

3. Cush, Ethiopia, south of Egypt, or Ethiopia proper, now generally named Abyssinia, which name the Arabians derive from Habash, a son of Cush. This Habash is not mentioned in the Bible, nor the Cush from whom the Mahommedans suppose him to be descended; for the Scripture Cush was brother of Canna, and father of Nimrod, Seba, Sabtah, Havilah, Raamah, and Sabtecha; whereas, the Arabians make Cush the father of Habash to be son, and not brother of Canna; and certainly it is probable, that Cush the father of Nimrod, &c., who dwelt in Arabia, is different from Cush the son of Canna, who peopled Ethiopia proper. Ethiopia proper is described in the following passages: "I will make Egypt waste, from Migdol to Syene," (Assuan, on the confines of Ethiopia), Ezek. xxxi. 10, seq. and Jer. xiii. 22, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin?" Jeremiah joins the Cushim with the Libyans; Daniel, (xi. 45,) which can be naturally explained only of the Ethiopians and Abyssinians; also Essekél, xxx. 4, 5. Queen Candace's subjects was of the same country. In all these passages it appears that Cush comprehends not only Ethiopia, above Syene and the Cataracts, but likewise a part of the Thebaid, or Upper Egypt.

The Cushans of the Bible, (Gen. x. 9, 10; xii. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10; xvi. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17), reigned from the Indus to Ethiopia, that is, to Abyssinia; for Herodotus says, this country paid tribute to Darius son of Hystaspes. Isahiah says, (chap. xiv. 14,) "The labor of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia, and of the Cushans, men of stature shall come over to thee, and they shall be thine." Here, says Mr. Bruce, the several nations are distinctly and severally mentioned in their places, but the whole meaning of the passage would have been lost, had not the situations of these nations been perfectly known; or had not the Cushans been mentioned separately; for both the Cushans and the Cushites were certainly Ethiopian. The meaning of the term Cush is, that the fruit of the agriculture of Egypt, which is wheat; the commodities of the negro, gold, ivory, silver, and slaves, could not but be necessary to the Cushan shepherds, their carriers, and a nation of great power, who shall join themselves with you. Again, Essekél says, (chap. xxx. 8,) "And they shall know that I am the Lord, when I have set a prince over Cush; and they shall know that Cush is a land of princes." In that day shall messengers go forth from me to ships, to make the careless Ethiopians afraid. Now Nebuchadnezzar was to destroy Egypt (Esék. xxix. 10,) from the frontiers of Palestine to the mountains above Athens, where the Canopus is; and he threatened to destroy this and Egypt a great desert; the country beyond it and on both sides was possessed by half a million of men. The Cushite, or negro merchant, was secure, under these circumstances, from any insult by land; as they were open to the sea, and had no defender, messengers, therefore, in ships, or a fleet, had easy access to them, to alarm and keep them at home, that they did not fall into danger by marching into Egypt against Nebuchadnezzar, or intercepting the service on which God had sent him. But this does not appear from translating Cush, Ethiopian; the nearest Ethiopians to Nebuchadnezzar, most powerful and most capable of opposing him, were the Cushans of the Thebaid, and these were not included in that term (Assuan, fol. 139, lii. 568.) Hence the Chaldean paraphrase Jonathan was not far out of the way; when he translates the word Cush in Gen. x. 9, by Arabia; as also the paraphrase of the Chronicles, 1 Chron. i. 5, 6, 9. R.

3. Cush, Ethiopia, south of Egypt, or Ethiopia proper, now generally named Abyssinia, which name the Arabians derive from Habash, a son of Cush. These districts are of greater importance than it may at first appear; because, by attributing to one country, called Cush, what properly belongs to another Cush, at a considerable distance from the former, much confusion ensues; and confusion, too, of a nature not easily remedied. It should be, however, remembered, that all ancient writers have at least equal confusion in their descriptions of Ethiopia, (Cush,) and arising from the same cause, in the different families of the Cushites, which, by various removals, inhabited these places, so widely separated from each other.

We should not close this article without noticing the rivers of Cush, (Ethiopia, Eng. trans. men- tioned in Is. xvii. 1, although it is not practicable, within the limits prescribed by this work, to enter into a critical examination of the prophecy. Mr. Taylor has devoted two or three Fragments to the subject, and he arrives at the following conclusions: (1.) The prophet's object is to excite the Nubians and Ethiopians to send gifts to mount Zion, in honor of Jehovah; which they might as easily do, as confess before the House of King Israel. (2.) The object of the prophecy is to excite the Nubians and Ethiopians to send gifts to mount Zion, in honor of Jehovah; which they might as easily do, as confess before the House of King Israel. (3.) The people to whom it is addressed are the Nubians and Ethiopians, in their own country; though at this time their king was advancing toward the possession of Egypt. (4.) The history to which it belongs is that of the extension of the Ethiopian power over Egypt, and the silent termination of it. (5.) The person who sends the messengers. The prophet himself sends to the southern Egyptians; the southern Egyptians send to Nubia, which Nubia is the nation to which the message is ultimately addressed. If this representation be just, the restoration of the Jews to their own land, by any western power, is not the application of it.

CUTHITES, a people who dwelt beyond the Euphrates, and were from thence transplanted into Samaria, in place of the Israelites, who had before inhabited it. They came from the land of Cush, or Cutha; their first settlement being in the cities of the Medes, subdued by Shalmaneser, and his predecessors. (See CUSH.) The Israelites were substituted for them in those places. On their arrival in Samaria, the Cuthites resumed the worship of the gods they had adored beyond the Euphrates. The Lord, being hereby provoked, sent lions among them, which destroyed them. This being reported to Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, he appointed an Israelish priest to instruct them in that worship which was pleasing to God; but the people, thinking they might reconcile their old superstitions with the worship of the God of Israel, worshipped the Lord and their false gods together, and made of the lowest of the people priests of the high-places. They continued this practice longer, but afterwards forsook idols, and adhered to the law of Moses, as the Samaritans, their descendants, continue to do. When the Jews returned from their captivity, the Samaritans desired to assist them in rebuilding the temple, ( Ezra iv. 1, 2.) but Zerubbabel, and Joshua son of Josedek, with the elders of Israel, answered that they could not grant their request; the king of Persia, however, gave permission to build only a temple to the Lord. Hence it appears, that the Cuthites had hitherto no temple in their country; but that in each city they worshipped God, and, perhaps, idols in consecrated places. Josephus informs us, that they did not build a common temple on mount Gerizim till the reign of Alexander the Great. See SAMARITANS.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. There has been much conjecture as to the reason for which the priests of Baal "cut themselves, after their manner, with knives, and with lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them," 1 Kings xviii. 28. This seems, by the history, to have been after Elijah had mocked them, or while he was mocking them, and had worked up their fervor and passions to the utmost height. Mr. Harmer has touched lightly on this circumstance, but has not set it in so clear a view as it seems to be capable of, nor has he given very cogent instances. It may be taken as an instance of earnest entreaty, of conjuration, by the most powerful marks of affection; q. d. "Best thou not see, O Baal! with what passion we adore thee?—how we give thee most decisive tokens of our affection? We shrink at no pain, we decline no disfigurement, to demonstrate our love for thee; and yet thou dost not answer! By every token of our regard we answer thee! By the freely flowing blood we shed for thee, answer us!" &c. They certainly demonstrated their attachment to Baal; but Baal did not testify his reciprocal attachment to them, in proof of his divinity; which was the point in dispute between them and Elijah. Observe how readily these still bleeding cuttings would identify the priests of Baal at the subsequent slaughter; and how they tended to justify that slaughter; being contrary to the law, that ought to have governed the Hebrew nation; as we shall presently see. As the demonstration of love, by cuttings made in the flesh, still maintains itself in the East, a few instances may be, at least, amusing to European readers, without fear of its becoming fashionable among us: "But the most ridiculous and senseless method of expressing their affection is, their singing certain amorous and whining songs, composed on purpose for such mad occasions; between every line of which they cut and slash their naked arms, with daggers; and extend their arms, which possess their youth, to show their arms, all gashed and scarred from wrist to elbow; and express a great concern, but greater wonder, at their past simplicity." The "oddness of the style invited me to render some of the above-named songs into English:

Could I, dear ray of heavenly light,
Who now behind a cloud dost shine,
Obtain the blessing of thy sight,
And taste thy influence all divine;

Thus would I shed my warm heart's blood,
As now I dash my vein'y arm;
Wouldst thou but like the sun think good
To draw it upward by some charm.

Another runs thus:

O, lovely charmer, pity me!
See how my blood doth from me fly!
Yet were I sure to conquer thee,
Witness it, Heaven! I'd gladly die."

Aaron Hill's Travels, p. 108.

This account is confirmed by De la Motraye, who gives a print of such a subject. This custom of cutting themselves is taken, in other places of Scripture, as a mark of affection: so, Jer. xlvii. 37: "Every head shall be bald, every head clipped, and upon all hands cuttings; and upon the loins sackcloth;" as tokens of excessive grief, for the absence of those thus regarded. So, chap. xvi. ver. 6: "Both the great and the small shall die in the land; they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves;" in proof of their affection, and expression of their loss: "nor make themselves bale for them," by tearing their hair, &c. as a token of grief. So, chap. xlii. 5: "There came from Samaria fourscore men having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves; with offerings to the house of the Lord." So, chap. xlvii. 5.
Boys, among ourselves, have such a kind of smarmers; and the crotalaria of the ancients were no better.

CYPRIARCHES; that is, governor of Cyprus. Niceran has given these places.

CYPRUS, the largest island in the Mediterranean, situated between Cilicia and Syria; the inhabitants of which were plunged in all manner of luxury and debauchery. Their principal deity was Venus, who had a celebrated temple at Paphos. The island is extremely fertile, and abounded in wine, oil, honey, wool, copper, agate, and a beautiful species of rock-cystal. There were also large forests of cypress-trees. (See Chittim.) Of the cities in the island, Paphos and Salamis are mentioned in the New Testament. Timotheus Paul and Barnabas landed here, A. D. 44, Acts xii. 4. While they continued at Salamis, they preached Jesus Christ in the Jewish synagogue, and from thence they visited all the cities of the island, preaching the gospel. At Paphos, they found Bar-Jesus, a false prophet, with Sergius Paulus, the governor: Paul struck Bar-Jesus with blindness; and the proselytes embraced Christianity. Some time after, Barnabas went again into this island with John, a native of Cyprus, (Acts xv. 28.) and it is said he was martyred here, being stoned to death by the Jews of Salamis.

CYRÉNE, a city and province of Libya Pentapolis, between the great Syrites, and the Marcus; at present called Cyrene, in the kingdom of Barca. It was sometimes called Pentapolis, from the five principal cities which it contained—Cyrene, Apollo- nia, Arsinöe, Berenice, and Polieusiana. From hence came Simon the Cyrenian, father of Alexander and Rufus, on whom the Roman soldiers laid a part of our Saviour's cross, Matt. xxvii. 32; Luke xxii. 26. There were many Jews in the province of Cyrene, a great part of whom embraced the Christian religion, though others opposed it with much obstinacy. Among the most inveterate enemies of our religion, Luke reckons those of this province, who had a synagogue at Jerusalem, and excited the people against Stephen, Acts xi. 20.

CYRIENIUS, or P. Sulpiquius QUIRINUS, (according to his Latin appellation,) governor of Syria, Luke ii. 1, 2. Very great difficulties have been raised on the history of the taxing under Cyrieni; as it appears, by history, that Cyrieni was not governor of Syria till nine or ten years after our Saviour was born. Cyrieni was a long time procurator, called Cyprianus. He received a public service, and obtained the honor of the consuls of Rome, A. U. 742; and he gained a memorable victory over the Homonutenses, A. U. 747, or 748. Unier thinks he was then procurator of Cilicia; but others think he was sent into that province as an extraordinary officer. However, having finished this war, he might be sent, say they, into Syria, for the purpose of the enrolment to be made there, A. U. 749, which is about the time fixed by Luke; for Herod died A. U. 750, or 751. Cyrieni was appointed governor to Cnites Cæsar, A. C. 755. It is generally admitted that Cyrieni was not properly governor of Syria at the time of our Lord's birth, though he was afterwards, Saturninus being then governor. Still, however, Cyrieni might have been associated with him.

We should observe on Luke ii. 1, 2, (1.) that the word olynpoins, rendered all the world, sometimes signifies only the whole of a country, region, or district; and certainly, Luke xvi. 26, and perhaps, Acts xii. 28. But the expression all the country is peculiarly proper here, because Galilee, as well as Judea, was-eluded); and perhaps all places where there were Jews. (2) That the word ἐνδοχώρω, rendered enrolling, should have been rendered enrolment; as a taxation did not always follow such enrolment, though this was generally the practice in it. The difficulty lies in the word ἐνδοχώρω, "first," because there really was a taxation ten or eleven years afterwards, which, as a decisive mark of subjection to the Roman power, was very mortifying to the Jewish nation. And to this taxation Gessaniel alludes, Acts v. 37. Dr. Prideaux thought he had found traces of a Roman census, or universal assessment, or enrolment, in the second census of Augustus; and that the time occupied in making it, before it came to Judas, accounts for the difference between the dates when the decree was issued, ante A. D. 8, and the period of its execution, at Jesus's birth, ante A. D. 3 or 4; observing, that a census of the same kind, made by William the Conqueror in England, (Domesday Books,) was six years in making. Dr. Lardner, however, objects, that the census of Augustus was of Roman citizens only; whereas this of Luke is not so restricted; but, evidently, included Jewish subjects, and of every town. Justin Martyr, in his first Apology, says to the emperor and senate, "You may assure yourselves, (of the existence of Jesus, in the Jewish state.) En the census made in the time of Cyrenius, your first procurator in Judea," and this description of Cyrenius, as we shall see, deserves notice. Clement of Alexandria, Origen and Tertullian, appeal to this census of Cyrenius; and the Julian, the earliest of the Apostles says, "The Jesus whom you exalted, was one of Cæsars's subjects. If you make a doubt of it, I will prove it, by and by, though it may as well be done now: for you say yourselves, that he was enrolled with his father and mother in the time of Cyrenius." (Apud Cyril. lib. vi.)

Assisted by this information, we may combine the narrative of Luke into the following order; which, probably, is not far from its true import. "In those days, Caesar Augustus issued a decree, (he being displeased at some parts of Herod's conduct, and meaning that he should feel his dependence on the Roman empire,) that the whole land of Judea should be enrolled, as well persons as possessions, in order that the true state of the inhabitants of the empire, as to their value in property of every kind, might be known and recorded. Accordingly, all were enrolled, but the taxation did not immediately follow this enrolment, because Augustus was again reconciled to Herod, which accounts for Josephus's silence on an assessment not carried into effect. And this enrolment was made when Cyrenius the censor (afterwards better known under the title of Cyrenius the governor) was first sent into Judea; (Your first procurator in Judea, says Justin Martyr, above quoted;) or, more exactly, this was the first assessment, or enrolment, of Cyrenius, governor of Syria. And all went to be enrolled, each to his own city: and as the emperor's order was urgent, and Cyrenius was known to be a man for despaching business, even Mary, though far advanced in her pregnancy, went with Joseph; and whilst they waited for their turn, to be enrolled, Mary was delivered of Jesus; and Jesus was enrolled with Mary and Joseph, as Julian says expressly, in the quotation given above.

The difficulty which exists in Luke ii. 2, in regard to the census of Cyrenius, can probably never be fully removed, because of the absence of the necessary historical data. The passage may be properly translated thus: "This enrolment was the first, while Cyrenius was governor of Syria." Now Cyrenius, or Qirinus, was not procurator of Syria until A. D. 7 or 8, when, according to chronologers, our Saviour was 10 years of age; (Jos. Ant. xvi. 1.) but Saturninus, who was procurator of Syria at the time of his birth, and was succeeded by Quirinius Varus. The latter was recalled in A. D. 7, and was succeeded by Quirinus, who was sent expressly by the emperor to take the census of the country and collect a tax; which census and tax Luke also mentions, Acts v. 37. The difficulty, therefore, which arises here, is of a twofold nature; first, the existence of such an enrolment at the time of Christ's birth; and, secondly, the fact of its having been made by Cyrenius. Both of these facts rest on the authority of Luke alone; not being mentioned either by Josephus, or by any profane historian.

In regard to the enrolment, it may be said, that it was probably not thought of sufficient importance by Roman historians to deserve mention; being confined to a remote and comparatively unimportant province; nor was it perhaps of such a nature, as would lead even Josephus to take notice of it. It would seem to have been a mere enumeration of persons, capitulum descriptio; since the Jews at this time were not a Roman province, but were subject to Herod the Great, to whom they paid tribute. As Herod, however, like the other allied kings, was under the dominion of the Romans, it was in the power of Augustus to require an enumeration of his subjects; to which, in this instance, the Jews seem to have submitted willingly, since it involved no augmentation of their taxes, nor interference with their private affairs. But afterwards, when Archelaus had been banished to Vienne in Gaul, and his government had been reduced to the form of a Roman province, and when Quirinus was sent from Rome to make a census, not only of persons, but of property, with a view to taxation, the Jews resisted the measure, and under the conduct of Judas and his associate Sadduceus, broke out into open rebellion. (See Acts v. 37 and Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1. 1.)

In regard to the other part of the difficulty, there have been several modes of solution proposed.

1. The first is founded on the supposition, that Quirinus, at the time in question, was joined with Saturninus in the government of Syria, and was procurator of that province. We know that a few years previous to this date, Volumnius had thus been joined with Saturninus in the government of Syria; and in the same period, Quirinus was spoken of together by Josephus, and are then equally called governors of Syria. (Jos. Ant. xvi. 9. 1; xvi. 10. 8.) Josephus does not mention the recall of Volumnius; but there is certainly the possibility, that this had taken place before the time of Christ's birth, and that Quirinus, who had already distinguished himself, had been sent in his place. He would then have been, under Saturninus, a ἰωβός, governor, of Syria, just as Volumnius had been; and just as Pilate afterwards was ἰωβός, governor, of Judea. That he should then have been mentioned by Luke as such, rather than as Saturninus, is very naturally accounted for by the fact, that he returned, ten years afterwards, as procurator or chief governor, and held a second and more important census. The language of Justin Martyr, above quoted, would seem to favor this supposition. The objection sometimes urged against this view, that it requires the word ἰωβός to be taken in too wide a sense, is not valid; because Josephus applies the same word to the procurators Volumnius and Pilate. The only real objection is, the silence of all other historians. But, although profuse history does not always the facts of Cyrenius having formerly been procurator of Syria, before he was proconsul, yet she does not in any way deny it; and we may, therefore, safely rest upon the authority of the sacred writer for the truth of this fact, just as we do for the first election of Simon the first enrolment itself. We know that, in all other respects, his historical details are supported by the testimony of other writers; in this case, his statement is not impeached by any opposing testimony; why, then, not receive it in simplicity? It may here be remarked that the Medals, being copied under the article Antioch, by means of which Mr. Taylor claims to have solved the difficulty in this passage, that it contains the names of Saturninus and (as he supposes) Volumnius. This, however, the Parascletes might have succeeded him, and also have been so represented.

2. According to another mode of solution, the passage is made to read thus: "This enrolment was made before Cyrenius was governor of Syria." The antithesis of this view supposes, in this verse, as a sort of parenthesis, to prevent his readers from confounding this enrolment with the subsequent census made by Quirinus. The positive, or rather the superlative, yap tprai, is thus understood in the sense of the comparative yap tprai, and is made to govern the following genitive. That both the positive and superlative are sometimes used instead of the comparative, is no doubt true; (see Kypke on John iv. 54.) The question is: but such an expression in the present case would be, to say the least, harsh, and very foreign to the usual simplicity of Luke.

3. A third mode is sanctioned by the names of Calvin, Valpy, Wetstein, and others, and gives the sense of the passage thus,—first changing yap tprai into yap tprai: "In those days, there went out a decree from Augustus, that the whole land should be enrolled; but the enrolment itself was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria." The supposition here is, that the census commenced under Saturninus, but was not completed until 10 years after, under Quirinus. But this supposition is not only not supported by any historical evidence, but is contradicted by the evidence of Luke himself. The question is, how, by Jacob, do not mention any census having been begun previous to the arrival of Quirinus, but he says that Quirinus was sent by the emperor for the express purpose of taking a census, and speaks of the process and continuance of it, without a hint of its having been continued ten years, and under three successive proconsuls. (Antiq. xvii. 1.1.)

The above are the more important solutions which have been proposed in order to remove the difficulty from the passage before us. Besides these, some have supposed the verse to be a marginal gloss, which has crept into the text; others have boldly affirmed that the sacred writer has here made a mistake; and several others still have proposed various solutions, which have been adopted only by themselves. The conjecture of Michaelis furnishes a very good solution, were it any thing more than a mere conjecture: he proposes to insert yap tprai after Cyrenius, so that it would then read: "This was the first enrolment before that of Cyrenius," &c. But no manuscript furnish any trace of such a reading.

CYRUS, son of Cambyses the Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. He was born in the king his father's court, (A. M. 3405,) and was educated with great care. When he was about twenty years of age, his grandfather, Astyages, sent for him to court, with his mother, Mandane. Some time after, the king of Assyria's son invading Media, Astyages, with his son Cyaxares, and his grandson Cyrus, marched against him. Cyrus defeated the Assyrians, but Cambyses so bold, in the course which the Persians recalled him, that he might have him near his person. Astyages dying, his son Cyaxares, uncle by the mother's side to Cyrus, succeeded him in the kingdom of Media; and Cyrus, being made general of the Persians, who were composed of 10,000 armed men, to assist Cyaxares, whom the Babylonians were preparing to attack. Cyaxares and Cyrus gave him battle, and dispersed them; after which Cyrus carried the war into the countries beyond the river Halys, subdued Cappadocia, and marched against Croesus, king of Lydia, defeated him, and took Sardis his capital. Having reduced almost all Asia, he repassed the Euphrates, and turned his arms against the Assyrians: having defeated them, he laid siege to Babylon, which, however, fell to him on a critical day, after having diverted the course of the river which ran through it. On his return to Persia, he married his cousin, the daughter and heiress of Cyaxares. He afterwards subdued all the nations between Syria and the Red sea, and died at the age of seventy, after a reign of thirty years.

There are but few particulars respecting Cyrus in Scripture; but what there are, are more certain than those derived from the sources of tradition, such as the remarkable vision (chap. viii. 3, 20.) in which God showed him the ruin of several great empires, which preceded the birth of the Messiah, represents Cyrus as a ram which had two horns, both high, but one rising higher than the other; and the ram devouring the lamb. This ram "pushed westward, and northward, and southward, so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great." The years two years signify the two empires, which Cyrus united in his person—that of the Medes and that of the Persians. (See Persia.) In another place, Daniel compares Cyrus to a bear, with three ribs in its mouth, to which it was said, "Arise, eat thy fill of flesh, and devour much." Cyrus succeeded Cambyses in the kingdom of Persia, and Darius the Mede (by Xenophon called Cyaxares, and Astyages in the Greek of Daniel xii. 15.) also in the kingdom of the Medes, and the empire of Babylon. He was mortal, as he speaks of 70 all the earth, (Ezra i. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23.) when he permitted the Jews to return into their own country, A. M. 3466, ante A. D. 538. He had always a particular regard for Daniel, and kept him in high offices.

The prophets foretold the coming of Cyrus: Isaiah (xiv. 22) particularly declared his name, above a century before he was born. Josephus says, (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 2) that the Jews of Babylon showed this passage to Cyrus; and that in the edict which he granted for their return, he acknowledged, that he received the empire of the world from the God of Israel, and that the same God had described him by name, in the writings of the prophets, and foretold that he should build a temple to him at Jerusalem. The taking of Babylon, by Cyrus, is clearly foretold by the prophets, Is. xiii. xiv. xvi. xlvii. xxvi. xxi. xxxv. 12. and ii. Dan. viii. viii. Cyrus being a Persian by his father, and a Mede by his mother, he is called in an oracle, cited by Herodotus, (lib. i. cap. 33. 91.) "a mule!" "Be afraid," said the oracle to Cyrus, "when the Medes shall be commended by a mule." And Nebuchadnezzar some time before his death, said to the Babylonians, I foretell a misfortune, which none of your gods will be able to avert; a Persian shall come against you, who, with the help of their gods, shall bring you into bondage." (Megasthenes, apud Euseb. Prep. lib. ix. cap. 41.)

DABERATH. Joshua (xix. 12.) mentions Deborah as a town of Zebulun, or on its borders, but in chap. xxi. 36. it is placed in the tribe of Issachar; which tribe ceded it to the Levites. Josephus calls it Debaris, or Darabitha, in the great plain at the extremity of Galilee and Samaria; perhaps it is Deborah, which Jerome places toward mount Tabor, in the district of Dioscesarea. Maundrell speaks of Debora at the foot of mount Tabor.

I. DAGON, a god of the Philistines. The Eponymous Agoras says that Dagon was Saturn; others say, he was Jupiter; others say, Venus, whom the Egyptians worshipped under the form of a fish; because, in Tryphon's war against the gods, Venus concealed herself under this shape. (Ovid Met. lib. v. fab. 5.) Diodorus Siculus says (lib. ii.) that at Askalon the goddess Derceto, or Aretaria, was worshipped under the figure of a woman, with the lower parts of a fish; and Lucian (De Dea Syr.) describes that goddess, or Venus, as being adored under this form. There is an ancient fable, that (Sarraz. (Olahms), who was half a man and half a fish, came to Babylon, and taught several arts: and afterwards returned to the sea. . . . there were several of these Oannes . . . the name of one was Oadeus, i. e. Dagon (tun Dagon). Berosus, speaking of Oannes, says, he had the body and head of a fish; and above the head of the fish he had a human head; and below the tail of the fish he had human feet. This is the true figure of Dagon. Helladius reports of Oes, what Berosus reports of Oannes; (whence Scaliger thought Oannes was the same as Oannes mutilatus;) he says, he was a monster who came out of the Red sea. He had the head, the hands, and the feet of a man; in the rest of his body he was a fish: he first taught letters and astronomy to mankind. We conclude, then, that Oes and Oannes are the same person; and that Oannes is Dagon. See DILUCA. A temple of Dagon at Gaza was pulled down by Samson, Judg. xvi. 23. In another at Ashdod, the Philistines deposited the ark of God, 1 Sam. v. 1-3. A city in Judah was called Beth-Dagon, that is, the house [or temple] of Dagon; (Josh. xv. 41;) and another on the frontiers of Asher, Josh. xii. 27. Eusebius speaks of a town called Caspar Dagon, the Field of Dagon, between Jannias and Diosopolis. Philo-Biblia, in his translation of Sanchoniathon, says that Dagon was Silos, the god of wheat. Dagon does, in deed, signify wheat, in the Hebrew; but who is this god of wheat? probably Ceres, the goddess of agriculture and plenty: the Hebrews have no feminine names to signify goddesses: and Elian informs us, that among the names of Ceres, Siton was one. Ceres was "the goddess of wheat," in her character of the in-
The ancient name Ophraeeus, as if it flowed with gold, divided into several canals. The city has a great number of fountains, which are extremely agreeable. Its fertile and delightful meadows, covered with fruits and flowers, contribute, also, to its fame. Damascus, says Ibn Hawqal, or, as he writes it, Damascus, is a chief city; the right heart of the cities of Syria. It is also the seat of the mountains; and is well watered by streams which flow around. The land about it produces trees, and is well cultivated by husbandmen. This tract is called Gneeth. It extends about three miles by two. There is not in all Syria a more delightful place. Here is one of the largest mosques in all the land of the Mussulmans; part of which was built in ancient times, by the Seljuks. — He then traces this mosque into the wars of the Crusaders, the Jews, the Christians and the true believers: he adds, "The city of Damascus is very like this: and the cold air is delightful in a direct line. On both sides of it are shops, in which are sold the rich merchandise brought by the caravans. Near the eastern gate is a house, said to be that of Judah, where Paul lodged after his conversion. There is a place, called Tiberias, where tradition reports, that the apostle passed three days without food, till Ananias restored him to sight. Tradition also says, that here he had the vision referred to, 3 Cor. xi. 2. About forty paces from the house of Judah, stands a little mosque, where Ananias is said to have been buried. There is also in the Great Street, or Straight, a fountain, whose water is drunk by the Christians, in remembrance of that which the same fountain supplied for the baptism of Paul. Near the eastern gate, on the south of it, is a kind of window or port-hole, in the parapet of the great wall; by which tradition says Paul escaped from the Jews! Near the city, on the way leading to the Turkish burying-ground, is a building said to be that of Naaman the Syrian. It is an hospital for lepers; and near it is a tomb, reported to be that of Gehazi, servant to Elisha, who, after his disgrace, retired to Damascus, where he died! — The ancient name of Damascus lies between two mountains, not above a hundred paces distant from each other: both are round at bottom, and terminate in a point. That nearest the great road is called Cobac, the star, in memory of the dazzling light which here appeared to Paul. The other mountain is called Medaneer el Cobac, the circle of light. Towards the middle of this mountain is an old monastery, almost destroyed, of which only one grotto remains, and this so small that a man can scarcely turn himself in it. This is reported to have been Paul's shelter after his conversion, till he could make ready for continuing his journey to Damascus. South-west is the plain of Hauran, the granary of Turkey.

The external appearance of the houses in Damascus is mean; the internal is magnificent. There are many covered markets built of hewn stone, and well vaulted, with openings from space to space. The footways in the streets are raised; and there are many khans for lodging merchants and travellers. The Straight...
Street is at present a covered bazaar, exchange, or market.

Damascus is one of the most commercial cities in the Ottoman empire, and has many rich manufactories. The inhabitants are witty and cunning; they are, however, polite, and less oppressed by the pachas than elsewhere. The shrines of the holy martyrs, especially of the Greek church, with a few Maronites. The population is estimated at from 100,000 to 150,000.

Damascus was highly favored by the emperor Julian. It was a metropolis and a colony; it was called on the medals of Gordian and Philip; and it appeared that the latter gave his veteran soldiers establishments in the city and its neighborhood. It was also the capital of that part of Coele-Syria which was called from it Damascus. In the division of the territory by Constantine and his successors, it was included in Phoenicia Libanica, which had for its chief town, Heliopolis (Bealbek).

The city of Damascus, with the surrounding country, is celebrated by all travellers, as one of the most beautiful and luxuriant regions in the world. The orientals themselves call it the Paradise on earth. Mr. Carne gives the following account of his approach to the city from the E. W. and of the city itself: (Letters from the East, vol. ii. seq.)

"On the following day, we set out early, impatient to behold the celebrated plain of Damascus. A large round mountain in front prevented us from catching a glimpse of it; still, on turning a point of the rock, it appeared suddenly at our feet. Perhaps the barest and dreariest hills we had been for some days passing, made the plain look doubly beautiful, and we stood gazing at it for some time as we advanced. The dunes and sandhills of the sacred city rise out of the plain in terraces, but the contrast is so marked, the one so large, and the other so disproportioned to the length, which is above two miles. The walls of this, the most ancient city in the world, are low, and do not enclose it more than two-thirds round. The street still called Straight, and where St. Paul is said to have been born, is entered by the road from Jerusalem. It is as straight as an arrow, a mile in length, broad, and well paved. A lofty window in one of the towers to the east, is shown us as the place where the apostle was let down in a basket.

In the way to Jerusalem is the spot where his course was arrested by the light from heaven. A Christian is not allowed to reside in Damascus, except in a Turkish dress.

The great number of palm trees and cypress-trees in the plain of Damascus add much to its beauty. The fruits of the plain are of various kinds, and of excellent flavor. Provisions are cheap; the bread is the finest to be found in the East; it is sold every morning in small, light cakes, dark, flaky white, and surpasses in quality even that of Paris. This luxurious city is no place to perform penance in; the paths around, winding through the mass of woods and fruit-trees, invite you daily to the most delightful rides and walks. Summer-houses are found in profusion; some of the latter may be hired for a day's use, or are open for rest and refreshment, and you sit beneath the fruit-trees, or on the divan which spans into the garden. If one feels at any time satiated, he has only to advance out of the canopy of woods, and mount the naked and romantic heights of some of the mountains around, amidst the solitary beams of the sun, and hear the singing of the birds beneath, with fresh delight. Among the fruits produced in Damascus are oranges, citrons, and espriots of various kinds. The celebrated plain of roses, from the produce of which the rich perfume of the spices (of roses) is obtained, is about three miles from the town; it is a part of the great plain, and its entire area is thickly planted with rose-trees, in the cultivation of which great care is taken.

Our abode was not far from the gate that conducted frequently and charming walks around the city. Here four or five of the rivers meet, and form a large and foaming cataract a short distance from the walls. In this spot it was pleasant to sit or walk beneath the trees; for the exciting sounds and sights of nature are doubly welcome near an encasement of the air, to relieve the languor and stillness that prevail.

"We often went to the pleasant village at the foot of the mountain Selaedeh. One of the streams passed through it; almost every house had its garden; and above the mass of foliage, in the middle of them, rose the dome and minaret of the mosque, and, just beyond, the gray and naked cliffs. The finest view of the city is to the right of this place: a light cloud stands partly up the ascent of the mountains; and from its cool and upper apartment, the prospect of the city, its woods, plain, and mountains, is indescribably rich and delightful. The plain in front is unsurfaced, and its level extent stretches to the east as far as the large trees, which was twelve miles in circumference. Four or five small rivers ran through the forest and the city, glittering at intervals in the sun; and to form that vivid contrast of objects in which Asiatie so much excels European scenery, the plain was encircled on three of its sides by mountains of light and naked rocks.

After descending the mountain, we were some time travelling through avenues of trees and gardens before we entered the city. Damascus is seven miles in circumference; the width is proportioned to the length, which is above two miles. The walls of this, the most ancient city in the world, are low, and do not enclose it more than two-thirds round. The street still called Straight, and where St. Paul is said to have been born, is entered by the road from Jerusalem. It is as straight as an arrow, a mile in length, broad, and well paved. A lofty window in one of the towers to the east, is shown us as the place where the apostle was let down in a basket."

DAMNATION, a word used among us, in a theological sense, to express a total loss of the soul; or a state of suffering under spiritual punishment: but this is not its proper import in all places where it occurs in Scripture; and the use of it is in some passages of our translation extremely unfortunate. We read, John v. 29, of the "resurrection to damnation," of "eternal damnation," (Mark iii. 28.) of "the damnation of hell," (Matt. xxiii. 33.) where the stronger sense of the word is expressed by the context: but in Matt. xxiii. 14, we read of the "greater damnation," which evidently implies a lesser damnation; and in Rom. xiii. 2, St. Cor. xi. 23, and 1 Tim. v. 22, we should read "self-condemnation," or "judgment." Rom. xiv. 23, "He that doubteth is damned," should be read "self-condemned."—if he eat flesh, or any thing else which may offend a weak brother.

I. DAN, fifth son of Jacob, being his eldest by Ribah, Rachel's handmaid, Gen. xxx. 4, 5, 6. Jacob blessed Dan in those words: (Gen. xlix. 16, 17.) "Dan shall judge his people as one of the tribes of Israel. Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, (see SERPENT, CERASES) that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." meaning that, though this tribe was not the most powerful or the most celebrated in Israel, it would, notwithstanding, produce one, who should be the prince of his people; which prediction was accomplished in Sargon, who was of Dan. Dan had but one son, named Hashirim, (Gen. xlv. 23.) notwithstanding which, when the Israelites came out of Egypt, this tribe contained 63,700 men. Numb. i. 39.

The tribe of Dan possessed a very rich and fertile soil, between the tribe of Judah east, and the country of the Philistines west; but the limits of their land were narrow, because it was only part of the territories of Judah divided from the rest. For their success in enlarging their territories, see Judges xviii.

II. DAN, originally called Laish, (Judg. xviii.) a town at the northern extremity of Israel, in the tribe of Naphtali. "From Dan to Beer-sheba, (describes the two extremities of the land of promise, Dan being the northern city, and Beer-sheba the southern one. Dan was seated at the foot of mount Libanus, on the spring of Dan, or Jordan. Several authors have thought that the river Jordan took its name from the Hebrew Jor, a spring, and Dan, a town near its source. (See JORDAN.) Dan lay four miles from Panans, towards Tyre, though some have confounded it with Panans. Here Jeroboam set up one of his golden calves. 1 Kings xii. 49. Dan was afterward called Debop, 2 Mac. iv. 33.

DANIEL, called BELSHAZZAR by the Chaldeans, a prophet, descended from the royal family of David, who was carried captive to Babylon, when very young, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, A. M. 3398. He was chosen, with his three companions, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, to reside in Nebuchadnezzar's court, where he received a suitable education, and made great progress in all the sciences of the Chaldeans, but declined to pollute himself, by eating provisions from the king's table. Dan. i. 1.

Nebuchadnezzar, having dreamed of a large statue, composed of several metals, which was beaten to pieces by a stone, and believing this dream to be prophetic, had Nebuchadnezzar to have it explained; but having lost the recollection of it, he insisted that the Magi should not only interpret its meaning, but recall it to his mind; this being impossible, they were condemned to death. Daniel recovered and explained the dream; he was received into Nebuchadnezzar's favor, appointed governor of the province of Babylon, and chief of the Magi. ii. 14-48.

Another time, Nebuchadnezzar having dreamed of a large tree cut down, yet so that its root remained in the earth, Daniel explained it of the king himself, whose fate it prefigured. (See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.) In the reign of Belshazzar, Daniel had a vision of four beasts, which represented the four great empires of the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans, or, rather, the Seleucides and Lagidæ, Dan. vii. In the following chapter, he saw in vision a ram and a he-goat; (the ram denoted Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia, and the he-goat denoted Alexander the Great) the ram was overthrown, and the he-goat became irresistibly powerful. (See DARIUS.) He describes, also, the successors of Alexander; and particularly the persecutions of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes; the vengeance of God upon him; and the victories of the Maccabees. It was to this arch that Daniel explained the import of the mysterious writing on the wall. (See BELSHAZZAR.) Belshazzar, being killed on the night in which he had profaned the sacred vessels of the temple, was succeeded by Darius the Mede, (Dan. v. A. M. 3448,) who promoted Daniel above all his governors, and designed to give him the general administration of his kingdom. This mark of favor, however, excited envy in the governors, who prevailed upon the king to issue an edict, forbidding every man, during a time, to solicit any thing from God or man, except from the king. Daniel, continuing his prayers to God, setting his face towards Jerusalem, was eschewed by the king, who was obliged to enforce the unalterable law, and order him to be thrown into the lions' den. Early the next morning, Darius went thither, and, finding Daniel safe and unharmed, he bade him be taken out, and his accusers, with their wives and families, to be thrown to the lions, chap. vi.

Daniel, having read in Jeremiah that seventy years would be accomplished in the desolation of Jerusalem, prayed and fasted, to receive the explanation of this period of time. After his devotion, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and revealed something of much greater importance, even the death and sacrifice of the Messiah; which was to happen after seventy weeks of years, chap. ix. (See ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS.) In the third year of Cyrus's reign in Persia, which coincides with the first year of Darius at Babylon, Daniel had another remarkable vision, in which the angel Gabriel discovered to him, in a manner almost as clear as if he had related his history, what was to happen in Persia, after Cyrus, (chap. xiv.) viz. the coming of Alexander the Great, the overthrow of the Persian empire, the Greek dominion in Asia, the continued wars between the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, the destruction of that persecuting prince, and the victory and happiness of the saints, chap. xi. After the death of Darius the Mede, Cyrus ascended the throne of the Persians and Medes; and Daniel continued to enjoy great authority.

The reputation of Daniel was so great, even in his life-time, that it became a proverb. "Thou art wiser than Daniel," says Ezekiel, (xxviii. 3.) ironically, to the king of Tyre: and in chap. xiv. 13, 20, God says, "Though these be, or are explained, yet having lost the recollection of it, he insisted that the Magi should not only interpret its meaning, but recall it to his mind; this being impossible, they were condemned to death. Daniel recovered and explained the vision; he was received into Nebuchadnezzar's favor, appointed governor of the province of Babylon, and chief of the Magi. ii. 14-48.

Another time, Nebuchadnezzar having dreamed of a large tree cut down, yet so that its root remained in the earth, Daniel explained it of the king himself, whose fate it prefigured. (See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.) In the reign of Belshazzar, Daniel had a vision of four beasts, which represented the four great empires of the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans, or, rather, the Seleucides and Lagidæ, Dan. vii. In the following chapter, he saw in vision a ram and a he-goat; (the ram denoted Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia, and the he-goat denoted Alexander the Great) the ram was overthrown, and the he-goat became irresistibly powerful. (See DARIUS.) He describes, also, the successors of Alexander; and particularly the persecutions of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes; the vengeance of God upon him; and the victories of the Maccabees. It was to this

It is believed that Daniel died in Chaldea, being probably detained there by his high employments in the Persian empire. Epiphanes says he died at Babylon; and this sentiment is followed by most historians. Others think he died at Shushan, or Susa. Benjamin of Tudela relates, that his monument was shown at Crusoe, which is the ancient Susa.

Among Daniel's writings, some have at all times been esteemed canonical; others have been contested.

What is written in Hebrew or Chaldee is generally acknowledged as canonical both by Jews and Christians; but there has been constant opposition to those parts which are extant only in Greek;
as the history of Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon. The first twelve chapters of Daniel are written partly in Hebrew, partly in Chaldee. He writes Hebrew where he delivers a simple narrative; but he relates in Chaldee his conversations with the Magi, and Nebuchadnezzar's edict, published after the interpretation of his dream of the golden image. This shows the extreme accuracy of this prophet, who relates the very words of those persons whom he introduces as speaking. The Greek which we have of Daniel is Theodotion's; that of the LXX has been long lost. Porphyry asserted, that the prophecies which we receive as Daniel's were falsely ascribed to him; and that they were, in fact, histories of past events. But that Daniel lived at Babylon long before the existence of the Haggadah, it was the spirit of prophecy, they say, does not reside; (2) because he spent his life in a court, in honor and pleasure; contrary to the other prophets. Some add, that he was, personally, a eunuch, and, therefore, excluded from the conversation of the court. To which said the Greek, they quote the words of Isaiah to Zechariah, (2 Kings xx. 18.) "And of thy sons—shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs, in the palace of the king of Babylon." Many of the Jews, therefore, place his residence not in the Haggadah, but in the Scriptures of much less authority than the canonical Scriptures.

There are two or three things appertaining to this eminent prophet, which could not be noticed in their proper place, without breaking the thread of the narrative, but which we may pass over without remark.

A title given to the prophet in chap. v. 12.—"an unier of knots"—though it may appear strange to us, was highly patriotic to the spotters of his mind; and, as we learn from sir John Chardin, is not unknown at present in the East. The patent given to sir John by the king of Persia, is addressed—"To the Lords of Lords, who have the possession of a lion, the aspect of Deceit; the princes who have the stature of Tahan-teu-teu, who seem to be in the time of Ardevon, the regents who carry the majesty of Ferribours; the conquerors of kingdoms, superintendents that unloose all manner of knots, and wield, without the action of Mercury, the power of a God." In his explanation, sir John says, it is, in the original, who unloose all sorts of knots.—The Persians rank all penmen, books, and writings, under Mercury, whom they call Mardit; and hold all people born under that planet, to be endowed with a refined, penetrating, clear-sighted, and subtle wit. Now, on turning to Daniel v. 12, it will be observed with what accurate coincidence to those principles the queen describes the prophet; "In all respects an abundant spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, which out of itself in his interpreting dreams, and explaining intricate enigmas, and untying of knots, is found in Daniel." We gather from this comparison, that as superintendents (of provinces) are described as untyers of knots, and Daniel is thus described, he was, or had been, a superintendent. Daniel had been made governor of the province of Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar; as he is not so described on this occasion, it is every probable he was not now in that office, yet the queen continues his titles to him. The prophecy of the seventy weeks may justify, by its importance, a few remarks, or way of elucidation. Part of it is thus rendered in our translation:—"After three years and two weeks shall Messia be cut off, but not for himself," c. ix. 26.

The passage contains two expressions for examination; and, indeed, the edict, published after the interpretation of his dream of the golden image, this with all their might, that this term must not be restricted to a single individual, but means, "properly, the whole class, or race of those who were appointed, whether kings or priests."—That is to say, the legal exercise of civil or ecclesiastical functions; or the ancient title to the office and power of government, in both its branches. But observe, (1) This sense arises in some degree, from the placing of a point in the sentence; (2) that it is a new principle; and both Eusebius and Clement. Anointed to be by Miriam, Messia, or the Prince; in verse 25, understand an anointed governor, or settled government; and Eusebius expressly explains it to be, the series and succession of the highpriests who held the government till Herod's time. There is a different of meaning of the Hebrew words, during the words Messia the Prince.—Our present Septuagint, which is Theodotion's translation, says προτοτόκιον τού Χριστού, the Christ the governor; or the anointed governor: Arias Montanus says, unam decem, the anointed leader;) Or which said the Greek, they quote the words of Isaiah to Zechariah, (2 Kings xx. 18.) "And of thy sons—shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs, in the palace of the king of Babylon." Many of the Jews, therefore, place his residence not in the Haggadah, but in the Scriptures of much less authority than the canonical Scriptures. The patern given to sir John by the king of Persia, is addressed—"To the Lords of Lords, who have the possession of a lion, the aspect of Deceit; the princes who have the stature of Tahan-teu-teu, who seem to be in the time of Ardevon, the regents who carry the majesty of Ferribours; the conquerors of kingdoms, superintendents that unloose all manner of knots, and wield, without the action of Mercury, the power of a God." In his explanation, sir John says, it is, in the original, who unloose all sorts of knots.—The Persians rank all penmen, books, and writings, under Mercury, whom they call Mardit; and hold all people born under that planet, to be endowed with a refined, penetrating, clear-sighted, and subtle wit. Now, on turning to Daniel v. 12, it will be observed with what accurate coincidence to those principles the queen describes the prophet; "In all respects an abundant spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, which out of itself in his interpreting dreams, and explaining intricate enigmas, and untying of knots, is found in Daniel." The prophecy of the seventy weeks may justify, by claims, might excite the most animated hopes, the most fervid expectations—when was such a thing ever combusted that would behold their object sink in destruction, and the accomplishment of their prolonged anxiousness annihilated in utter impossibility! See Belshazzar.

Hieroglyphic animals.—Among the figures which Le Bruyn has copied from the ruins of Persopolis, in Persia, there are some which seem remarkably coincident with the purport of certain passages in the prophet Daniel. It is not easy to ascertain the era of these ruins, which are universally considered as having formed a palace of the Persian kings. Probably it is assuming too much to attribute them to Cyrus; but if, as is stated, they may date soon after that monarch, they will be sufficiently ancient to justify the use we propose to make of them. The palace of Persopolis was destroyed by Alexander the Great; yet, from its remaining ruins, we infer its former grandeur. Among its ornaments are several hundred figures, sculptured on the wall in baso relievos. Some of them are certainly of a religious nature; others are emblematical; of these, several have greatly the appearance of being political emblems, commemorating past events, which, being flattering to the Persian kings, they wished to perpetuate the memory of. Under this aspect they justify examination. Le Bruyn gives the following account of some of them:

"These portals are twenty-two feet and four inches in depth, and thirteen feet and four inches in breadth. In the inside, and on each pilar, is seen a large figure in low relief, and almost as long as the pilaster; with a distance of twenty-two feet from the floor to the hinder legs, and a height of fourteen feet and a half. The heads of these animals are entirely destroyed, and their breasts and fore feet project from the pilaster. Their bodies are, likewise, greatly damaged." . . . "The figures in the two first portals very much resemble a horse, both before and behind, only the head seems to be like that of an ape; and, indeed, the tail has no great similitude to that of a horse; but this may be imputed to the ornaments which are fastened to it, and were much used among the ancient Persians." . . . "Under a portal to the west, is the figure of a man hunting a bull, which has one horn in his forehead, which is grasped by the man's left hand. Le Bruyn has copied from the ruins of Persopolis a figure resembling a lion, having a horn in his forehead, and wings on the body. The same representations are to be seen under the portal to the north, with this exception, that, instead of the deer, there is a great lion, which a man holds by the mane." . . . "There are also two other figures on each side of the two noble columns, one of which grasps the horn of a goat with one hand, while the other rests on the neck of that animal." . . . "In one of these portals, to the east, we observed the figure of a man encountering a lion; and in another compartment, a man fighting with a bull. We likewise beheld, under the two portals to the west, several figures of lions, one of which is represented with wings." . . . "The Spanish ambassador was persuaded, that the animal attacked by the lion, on the staircase, represents an ox, or a bull; but I rather think it intended for a horse or an ass. This particular piece of sculpture is no more than a hieroglyphic, representing viribus victoriosus acerbus; and every one knows, that the ancient Persians and Egyptians concealed their greatest mysteries under equivocal figures, as Heliodorus observes. As all these animals, therefore, are represented with horns, which are not natural to them, some mystery must certainly be intended by that sculpture; and this supposition seems the more reasonable, because it is well known that horns were anciently the emblem of strength, and even of majesty itself." . . . "I take the other figure, which encounters a lion, and is habited like a Mede, to be a hieroglyphic; because the Egyptians, from whom the Persians borrowed several customs, represented strength and fortitude by the figure of a lion. The reader may consult Clemens Alexandrinus with relation to this particular. It may likewise be intended for a real combat, the Medes and Persians having been very fond of encountering animals, as Xenophon observes in his Institution of Cyrus.' Those who are versed in antiquity may judge of these figures as they think proper.”

It is evident from these extracts, that Le Bruyn had no fixed opinion as to what these figures represent. Without controvverting what he offers, Mr. Taylor thus proposes his own conceptions. One of these figures "represents a man who has seized a lion with one hand; in his other hand he holds a sword, as if drawn back, in order to plunge it the more forcibly into the body of the lion; the lion is lifted up from the earth, and stands upright on its hind legs; he looks behind him, as if fearing harm from thence. This lion is partly clothed with feathers; and these, from the lower part of the body up to the belly of the bull. The other side, the figure of another man clasps the horn with his right hand, and slays the beast with his left. The second portal discovers the figure of a man carved in the same manner; only he has a lion, which resembles a lion, having a horn in his forehead, and wings on the body. The same representations are to be seen under the portal to the north, with this exception, that, in

2. Having eagle's wings;

Danaan, chap. vii.

Does not this sculpture represent the destruction of this metaphorical lion? The ideas are remarkably coincident; they differ but as the language of sculpture necessarily differs from that of poetry.

HISTORICAL NARRATION.

1. The Babylonian empire;
2. Nineveh added to it—but;
3. Nineveh almost destroyed at the fall of Sar顺usip:
4. Agian raised, but by artificial means,
5. To stand in an unnatural posture,
6. Through the policy and good management of its king; perhaps Nebuchadnezzar.

"Another of these sculptures also represents a man, certainly no less a personage than a king, who with one hand seizes the [single] horn of an animal, which he has attacked; while, with the other hand, he plunge a sword into its belly. This animal has the body, fore legs, and head of a beast; he is also greatly clothed with feathers, has wings, and birds' legs, on which he stands upright. He seems to make a stout resistance.

It is not easy to determine what beast is here represented, but it seems to be clear that the king is breaking its [single] horn, (power,) and destroying it. It probably alludes to some province of the Persian empire, acquired by victory; and most likely the other emblems in this palace have similar reference: for we learn from Diodorus, that military actions of the Egyptian monarchs were represented on the temples and palaces of Egypt; and we may fairly presume that the vanity of Persia would not be inferior to that of Egypt.

Mr. Taylor's opinion is, that these figures represent the king, or the deity, under whose auspices the king conquered, by whom the neighboring powers, allegorized by these figurative beasts, were subdued; and that these are allusions to such actions; but his opinion goes no further, than to acknowledge their coincidence with the animals described by the prophet Daniel; whose emblems are not only justified by the comparison, but it is proved, also, that such national allegories were in use at that time, and were then well known and publicly admitted.

It is remarkable, that Daniel does not determine the species of the fourth beast in his vision; perhaps because its insignia were then unknown in so distant a region as Persia.

That ancient opponent of Christianity, Porphry, affirmed that the book of Daniel was a history written figuratively after the events it refers to had happened; even after Antiochus Epiphanes, and long after the empire of the Greeks; and Eichhorn and others adopt his notion; but, as the inscriptions on this palace are, at all events, prior to Alexander, who destroyed them, and have no Greek allusions among them, their antiquity becomes a voucher for the antiquity of Daniel, with whom they coincide so remarkably; and if the antiquity of Daniel be established, his prophetic character follows of course. The reader will reflect on the importance of establishing the antiquity of Daniel; since our calculations of the time of the Messiah's coming, &c. originate from his book. It is satisfactory, clearly, and systematically, calculates the periods and dates of following events.

Mr. Taylor further suggests, that the reason why Daniel calculates so systematically, perhaps was, because he dwelt in Babylon, where a new era was lately been established, which low named: this formed a fixed point, of which Daniel's proficiency in Chaldaean studies enabled him to avail himself. No such era was as yet adopted in Greece, Judea, or Egypt.

I. DARIUS THE MEDE, spoken of in Daniel (chap. v. 31; ix. 1; xi. 1.) was son of Astyages, king of the Medes, and brother of Mandane, mother of Cyrus, and Amyt, the mother of Evil-merodach and grandmother of Belshazzar: thus he was uncle, by the mother's side, to Evil-merodach and to Cyrus. The Hebrew generally calls him Dariusch, or Darius; the LXX, Artaxerxes; and Xenophon, Cyrusares. See Astyages II.

II. DARIUS CODOMANNUS was one of the most handsome men in the Persian empire; and at the same time the most brave and generous of the Persian kings. Alexander the Great defeated Darius several times, and at length subdued the Persian monarchy, after it had been established 206 years.

Darius was killed by his own generals, after a short reign of six years. Thus were verified the prophecies of Daniel, (chap. viii.) who had foretold the enlargement of the Persian monarchy, under the symbol of a ram, butting with its horns westward, northward, and southward, which nothing could resist: and its destruction, by a goat, with one large horn between his eyes, (Alexander the Great,) coming from the West, and overrunning the world without touching the earth. Springing forward with impetuosity, he ran against the ram with all his force, attacked him with fury, broke his two horns, and trampled him under foot, without any one being able to rescue him. Nothing can be added to the clearness of these prophecies.

DARKNESS, obscurity. "DARKNESS was upon the face of the deep," (Gen. i. 2,) that is, chaosimmersed in thick darkness, because light was withheld from it. The most terrible darkness was that brought on Egypt as a plague; it was so thick as to be, as it were, palpable; so horrible, that no one durst stir out of his place; and so lasting, that it endured three days and three nights, Exod. x. 23, 29; Wisd. xvii. 2. 3. The darkness at our Saviour's death began at the sixth hour, or noon; and ended at the third hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon. Thus it lasted almost the whole time he was on the cross; compare Matt. xxvii. 45, with John xix. 14, and Mark xvi. 25.

Some are of opinion, that this darkness covered Judea only; which is sometimes expressed by the whole earth; that is, land or country; others, that it extended over a hemisphere. It should be remarked, that the moon being at full, a natural eclipse of the sun was impossible; though Julius Africanus, Eusebius, and Jerome, in their several chronicles, refer that eclipse of the sun which Phlegon mentions, to our Saviour's death. That author says, it was the greatest eclipse ever seen, since at noon-day the stars were discernible in the heavens. It happened in the fourth year of the 102d Olympiad, which is that of Jesus Christ's death. And Tertullian refers the heathen to their public archives for an account of this darkness. The remarks, however, made by Dr. Lardner, in opposition to the application of what has been adduced from Phlegon, have great force. That ancient writer speaks of what passed in Lydia, not in Judea, and certainly over a hemisphere. The darkness, he says, was in Lydia, where the sun was seen to pass through the upper part of the hemisphere, and the moon to fill the lower part. The shadow of the moon spread out on the upper part of the hemisphere, so that the greater part of that side of the world was plunged into darkness. It was not directed to the upper part of the heavens, for they were discernible. The darkness did not appear as a complete darkness, but as being interspersed with light, as fig. 14 of the wood to be before the text. The philosophers and astronomers of that age, who were conversant with the phenomena of the heavens, did not consider it as a miraculous darkness, but as an occurrence deduced from the laws of nature. It is probable, that the darkness was not as total as is said, but sufficiently great to make the sun appear as a very large globe, or to make it shine with a very faint light, and to close the day after the setting of the sun. This is all the darkness is reported to have been. But this is not the case. The sun was not seen, and the moon was not seen, at the time the body of Christ was in the tomb; the stars were not visible, and the sun and moon were not distinctly seen. The sun did not shine, and the moon did not appear, at the time the body of Christ was in the tomb. The sun did not shine, and the moon did not appear, at the time the body of Christ was in the tomb. The sun did not shine, and the moon did not appear, at the time the body of Christ was in the tomb. The sun did not shine, and the moon did not appear, at the time the body of Christ was in the tomb.

DARKNESS is sometimes used metaphorically; for death, Job x. 22. The land of darkness—the grave. It is also used to denote misfortunes and calamities, Psalm cvii. 10. "A day of darkness," (Esth. xi. 8.) an unhappy day. "Let that day be darkness—let darkness stain it," (Job iii. 4, 5.) let it be reckoned among the unfortunate days. "I am encompassed with darkness." "I will cover the heavens with darkness." "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood," &c. These expressions signify very great calamities; personal and national. In a moral sense, darkness denotes sin; the children of light, in opposition to the children of darkness; the righteous in opposition to the wicked. "Ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light," Ephes. v. 8, 11. "God hath called us out of darkness," Ecc. (1 Pet. ii. 9,) from idolatry, ignorance, &c. to Christianity.

DAUGHTER. This word, like other names of relation employed in Scripture, being a noun expressing submissiveness, no less than kindred, is used in reference to many subjects, which are not properly the offspring of that person, but that thing, of which they are said to be daughters. The following are senses in which the word daughter is used in Scripture.

(1.) Female offspring, by natural birth, Gen. vi. 1; xxiv. 23, and other places. (2.) Grand-daughter; so the servant of Abraham calls Rebekah "my master's brother's daughter," (Gen. xxiv. 48,) whereas she was daughter of Bethuel, son of Nahor, as appears from verse 24; consequently, grand-daughter of Nahor, brother of Abraham, the master of the speaker. (3.) "Daughters of fastness", of the same family or tribe, but separated by many ages; "daughter of Heth," of his posterity; "daughters of Canaan, of Moab, of Ammon, and of Luke (i. 5.) says, Elisabeth was the "daughters of Aaron," of his descendants, though younger generations have intermarried. (4) [Deut. xii. 4,] later by nation. Dinah went out to see the young women of Shechem, called the "daughters of the land." Gen. xxxiv. 1. (See also Num. xxiv. 1; Deut. xvi. 17.)—(5.) Daughter, by reference to the human species; young women, or the female of a nation. Gen. xxxiv. 13. (See Prov. xxxii. 20; Cant. ii. 2.)—(6.) Daughter, by personification, of a people, or city, whence daughter of Jerusalem, or of Zion; of Babylon; (Isa. xlv. 1.) of Egypt, Jer. xlv. 11, 14. (7.) Daughter by law; (Ruth iii. 1.) and this is common in all nations, to call a son's wife daughter; but Boaz calls Ruth "daughter" by courtesy, as expressing kindness, affinity, affection, from a senior to a junior, or between equals, as in an inferior by election, iii. 16, 11. (8.) Daughter by adoption, as Esther was to Mordecai, (Esther ii. 7,) and as God promises his people by his grace, 2 Cor. vi. 18. (9.) Daughter, in reference to disposition and conduct: as we have a "daughter of life," Gen. xi. 29, and the same is said of a female bird, Gen. xlii. 10. (11.) The female offspring of a bird, (Isa. xxiii. 21. marpe.) of the "daughter of the owl." (12.) The branches, which are, as it were, the offspring of a tree, (Gen. xxvii. 34, the "mother of Jacob," compare, Gen. xxii. 10; Joseph, compared to a tree, spread over a wide wall. (13.) Towns, or villages, around a mother city, which is probably originating from it, or supported by it: so Tyre is called the daughter of Zion, Isa. xxvi. 12. (See also 2 Sam. xv. 19.) So we read of Ruth about Abner, that is, the mother-town; of a town being a mother in Israel: (see Num. xxiii. 32; Josh. xv. 43; 2 Chron. xiii. 19; Psalms xlvii. 11. In the Hebrew:) and many cities in ancient medals are qualified as matriarchal, mother-town, and mother-towns, and towns not equally ancient, as being included in their jurisdiction. We might ask whether the "daughter of Tyre" (Psalms xlv. 12.) be a person, the king's daughter, or a town, offering a present by its deposits. [The meaning is not sure.] It. The state of daughters, that is, young women, in the East, their employments, duties, &c. may be gathered from various parts of Scripture; and seem to have borne but little resemblance to the state of young women of respectable parentage among ourselves. Rebekah drew and fetched water; Rachel kept sheep, as did the daughters of Jethro; Jethro was a priest, or a prince, of Midian. They superintended and performed domestic services for the family; Tamar, though a king's daughter, baked bread; and the same of others. We have the same occupations for the daughters of Jethro; though the ancient poets, of which Homer is an unquestionable evidence.

DAVID, son of Jesse, of Judah, and of the town of Bethlehem, was born A. M. 2519. After the rejection of Saul, as to the descent of the crown in his family, the Lord sent Samuel to Bethlehem to anoint a son of Jesse to be the future king. Jesse produced his seven sons one after another; but the intended sovereign was not among them. David, therefore, was sent for, who was rejected, but later was chosen to play before him and the king appointed him his armor-bearer, 1 Sam. xvi. 14, 15. Some time afterwards, Saul fell into melancholy, David was chosen to play before him, and the Philistines, seeing their hero killed, fled, 1 Sam. xvii. 32. When Saul saw David coming against this Philistine, he inquired of Abner who he was; but Abner answered that he knew not. Calmet remarks that this appears strange, considering Saul had seen David in his own house, where he played before him on his harp, and had appointed him armor-bearer. He supposes that, after Saul's death, the Philistines must have been changed since that time; or that Saul, during his gloomy insanity, had acquired false ideas of David's person; or, after his recovery, had forgotten him. But we are not certain that David had ever been a regular attendant on the person of Saul; that he had often played before him; nor do we know under what circumstances of dress or place. It does not appear that even Jonathan had seen David, at least not familiarly, before, and this is the greater difficulty: Abner, as general, might have met him, but Jonathan was no doubt more or less about his father. Abner, however, presented David to the king, with the head and sword of Goliath in his hands. From this instant, Jonathan conceived a great affection for David, and Saul's son, and preserved David, 1 Sam. xvii. 33, 38; 18. 1—4. When Saul and David returned from this expedition, the women of Israel met them, singing, "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands;" which so enraged Saul against David, that he forthwith led him with an evil eye; though he kept him about his person, and gave him the command of some troops. He, however, refused to give him his daughter in marriage, though he had promised her to the man who should kill Goliath, xvii. 25. Saul's distress, having returned, David played on the harp before him, and Saul with his spear twice attempted to kill him, xviii. 10, 11. Having discovered that his second daughter entertained kind thoughts of David, Saul caused it to be communicated to him, that to merit the honor of becoming the king's son-in-law, he required no great gifts, dowry, or presents, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines; his design being to have David fall by their hands. David, however, with his people, killed two hundred Philistines, and brought their foreskins to the king, who thereupon, therefore, no longer kept him in his daughter's charge though he did not lay aside the intention of her destruction. His distemper again possessing him, David, as usual, played on the harp before him; but the king endeavours to pierce him with his lance, but he turned the shield, xxvii, 17; xix, 10, A. M. 2944.

Having thus repeatedly escaped from Saul's malice, David went to Samuel at Ramah, and related to him what had passed. They went together to Naioth, but David, not thinking himself secure here, secretly visited Jonathan, who once lend him, and promised to discover Saul's real disposition towards him, distinct from his disease. This proving to be altogether inimical to David, the two friends renewed protestations of perpetual friendship, and David retired to the greatest Abimelech at Nob, to whom he represented, that the king had sent him on business that required haste. Abimelech gave him Goliath's sword which was deposited in the tabernacle, and some of the sheaf-bread, taken the day before from the golden table. Not believing himself to be safe in Saul's territories, David retired to Achish, king of Gat; but being soon discovered, he was preserved, either by counterfeiting madness, or by a real expiry, 1 Sam. xx. xxii. From hence he went to Adullam, where his relations and others resorted to him, so that he was at the head of about four hundred men. The prophet Gad advised his return into the land of Judah, where Abinadab the priest joined him, bringing the priestly ornaments. The Philistines having invaded the threshing-floors of Keilah, David attacked and dispersed them; but Saul marching against him, he retreated to the desert of Maon. Saul pursued him thither; but, receiving information that he was near, he removed from the land, he desired, that the ark of the Lord's anointed; composed a mournful elegy in honor of Saul and Jonathan; and with all his people lamented their deaths, and the defeat of Israel, 2 Sam. xxi.

Directed by God, David advanced to Hebron, where the tribe of Judah acknowledged him as their king, (2 Sam. ii.), while Ishbosheth, son of Saul, remained at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, over the other tribes. For some years there were almost perpetual skirmishes between their troops, in which David was always successful; but Ishbosheth having reprimanded Abner, his general, he visited David, and promised to make him subproof if the king's disdained him. David ordered this Amalekite to be slain, who boasted that he had lain hands on the Lord's anointed; composed a mournful elegy in honor of Saul and Jonathan; and with all his people lamented their deaths, and the defeat of Israel, 2 Sam. xxi.

David, now enjoying peace, formed the design of building a temple to the Lord; and the prophet Nathan applauded his intention. The night following, however, God discovered to the prophet, that this honor was reserved for David's son, because David had shed blood. About A. M. 2860, David fought the Philistines, and Edom also from the Moabites, whom he treated with a severity, for which we are not well acquainted with the motives, nor, indeed, with all the circumstances. He subdued likewise all Syria; made an expedition as far as the Euphrates as conquered the Edomites in the valley of Salt, 2 Samuel viii. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, being dead, he sent compliments of condolence to his son and successor; but his couriers having persuaded him, that David sent them spies, the prince insulted the ambassadors, and thus provoked David's anger. Joab was sent against the Ammonites, who were routed, together with the Syrians; and the next year David marched in person against the former, who had received succours from the Syrians beyond the Euphrates and dispersed them. The year following, having resolved to subdue Rabboh, the capital of the Ammonites, he sent Joab with the army, which he continued at Jerusalem, ch. x. It was at this time that he fell into the dreadful crimes of adultery and murder in regard to Bathsheba, and Uriah her husband, x. 2—27. After the death of Uriah, David married Bathsheba. Joab having reduced Rabboh to extremities, David went thither, took the city, and plundered it; order-
David

In the account here given, chiefly from Calmet, the history of David only is narrated; but he must also be regarded as an eminent type of our Saviour, and as being the author of a large portion of the Psalms, from which the church of Christ in all ages has derived the utmost advantage in consolation, instruction, and assistance in divine worship; and in which the clearness and fulness of the prophecies relating to the advent, and offices, and kingdom of our Lord, are remarkable. See Psalms.

Josephus relates, that Solomon deposited abundance of riches in David’s monument; and that, 1300 years after, the high-priest Hircanus, being besieged in Jerusalem by Antiochus Pius, opened David’s monument, took out 3000 talents, and gave Antiochus part of them. He adds that, many years after, Herod the Great searched this monument, and took great sums out of it. In the memoirs published in Arabic by M. le Jay, in his Polyglott, we read that Hircanus, when besieged by king Antiochus Sidetes opened a treasure chamber, which belonged to some of David’s descendants, and, after having excavated a large sum out of it, he still left much, and sealed it up again. This is very different from Josephus’ account; but is probably the foundation of it. David’s monument was much respected by the Jews. Peter (Acts ii. 26) says, ‘David, cherishing the spirit of his soul, with Joab, with all his army, and with all his princes, and with all his posterity, and with Solomon his son, and with David his son, and with the princes of Israel, and with the princes of Judah, David, and King Solomon his son, and all Israel, and all Judah, assembled together at Jerusalem.’

There is one circumstance in the history of David which requires further notice than it has received in the narrative just given.

There is an apparent discrepancy between the accounts of his numbering the people, as given in 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. and 1 Chron. xxii. 5. In the former place, it stands thus—Israel 600,000, and Judah 500,000; in the latter it is, Israel 1,100,000; Judah 470,000. A very striking difference, certainly; and the question for solution is, Are the accounts to be reconciled? Patrick, Lightfoot, Hales, and others, are of opinion that the returns were not completed when sent in to the king; and that the writer of the book of Samuel mentions the number according to the list actually given in; whereas the author of the Chronicles gives the list not laid before the king, nor inserted in the public records, but generally known among the people. It is difficult, however, to conceive that the compiler of public annals, such as are the Chronicles, should depart from the authentic or authorized returns, and insert such as were obtained from a current report, or the memoirs of private persons. It is the conjecture of a more recent writer, Mr. Beruch, is better adapted to meet the case, and we shall, therefore, lay the substance of his remarks before the reader:—

“It appears,” he observes, “by 1 Chron. xxvii. that there were twelve divisions of generals, who commanded monthly, and whose duty was to keep guard near the king’s person, each having a body of troops, consisting of twenty-four thousand men, which, jointly, formed a grand army of two hundred and eighty-eight thousand; and as a separate body of twelve thousand men naturally attended on the twelve princes of the twelve tribes, mentioned in the same chapter, the whole will be three hundred thousand; which is the difference between the two accounts of eight hundred thousand, and of one million one hundred thousand. As to the men of Israel, the author of Samuel does not take notice of the three hundred thousand, because they were in the actual service of the king, as a standing army, and, therefore, there was no need to number them; but Chronicles joins them to the rest, saying expressly (בִּכְפָּךְ) "all those of Israel were one million one hundred thousand;" whereas the author of Samuel, who reckons only the eight hundred thousand, does not say, (נַפְרוּ הָאָדָם) "all those of Israel," but barely (וְנֶפֶר חַלָּה) and Israel were," &c. It must also be observed, that exclusive of the troops before mentioned, there was an army of observation on the frontiers of the Philistines' country, composed of thirty thousand men, as appears by 2 Sam. vi. 1, which, it seems, were included in the number of the hundred thousand of the people of Judah, by the author of Samuel; but the author of Chronicles, who mentions only four hundred and seventy thousand, gives the number of the tribes exclusive of those thirty thousand men, because they were not all of the tribe of Judah, and, therefore, he does not say, (כִּפָּךְ) "all those of Israel," as he had said, (נַפְרוּ הָאָדָם) "all those of Israel," but only, (נָפֶר הָאָדָם) and those of Judah." Thus the remark of the two writers, and the course to other parts of Scripture, treating on the same subject, which will ever be found the best method of explaining difficult passages."

The remarks which follow are so just and valuable, that they ought to be regarded by all who intend to come to a right understanding of the passages in question. The above observations are, in appearance, so glaringly contradictory, that, if the standing army of two hundred and eighty-eight thousand men, and the army of observation of thirty thousand, had not been recorded in the sacred books, by which the difficulties are solved, those modern critics who take a delight in finding seeming defects, blunders, and corruptions in our copies of the sacred books, might, with great plausibility, produce the present collocation, as an irreconcilable contradiction between the two writers. But let us, for a moment, suppose that those circumstances, though real facts, had not been recorded; how would the state of the question then rest? Those critics would plume themselves on what they would call the impossibility of such contradictory instances; but all their boasting would be grounded on the baseless fabric of a vision. I mean, on our ignorance of those particulars, which, if known, would immediately reconcile the variations. The inference I would draw from this observation is, that many difficulties may appear insurmountable, which might easily be solved, had the sacred writers been more explicit in recording circumstances, which, perhaps, they have omitted, as being well known in the time: and, therefore, critics should be more cautious, than peremptorily to pronounce all seeming variations to be a proof of corruption, since our present inability to reconcile them is no certain proof of any blunder or defect.

DAY. The day is distinguished into natural, astronomical, civil, and artificial; and there is another distinction which may be termed prophetic; the prophets being the only persons who call years days; of which there is an example in the explanation given of Daniel's seventy weeks. The natural day is one revolution of the sun. The astronomical day is one revolution of the equator, added to that portion of it through which the sun has passed in one natural day, by no stretch will be required for the formation and end of which are determined by the custom of any nation. The Hebrews began their day in the evening; (Lev. xxiii. 32) the Babylonians from sun-rising. The artificial day is the time of the sun's continuance above the horizon, which is unequal according to different seasons, on account of the obliquity of the sphere. The sacred writers generally divide the day and night into twelve unequal hours. The sixth hour is always noon throughout the year; and the twelfth hour is the last hour of the day. But in summer, the twelfth hour, as all the others were, was longer than in winter. See Hour.

To-Day, or the present day, is not to signify the particular day on which we are speaking, but any indefinite time; as we say, the people of the present day, or of that day, or time.

DEACON. Among the Greeks those youths who served the tables were called δισανωτα, δισας, i. e. ministers, attendants; and there is a manifest allusion to them in our Lord's rebuke of his disciples: (Luke xxii. 25.) "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them, and those who use authority over them, are called benefactors." But among you it shall not be so; but he who is greatest among you, let him be as the youngest; and he who takes place as a ruler, as he who serves (i. e. a deacon)." Persons of both sexes were appointed to perform the duties of this office; which consisted in a general inquiry into the situation and wants of the poor; in taking care of the sick, and in providing all necessary and proper relief. Phil. li. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 8, 13; Rom. xvi. 1. From this word, as applied to this office, is derived the English word deacon which, however, retains little of its original significance.

DEACONES. Such women were called δισανωτα, δισας, and the church in those offices in which the deacons could not with propriety engage; such as keeping the doors of that part of the church where the women sat; assisting the women to undress and dress at baptism; privately instructing those of their own sex; and visiting others imprisoned for the faith. They were of mature and advanced age when chosen; of good manners and reputation. They were, in the primitive times, appointed to this office, with the imposition of hands. Paul speaks of Phoebe, deaconess of the church at the port of Cenchrea, the eastern haven of Corinth, Rom. xvi. 1. See Deacon.

These persons appear to be the same as those whom Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, styles "μελοι κατα μητρετας διβεντωτος'—female attendants called assistants, ministers, or servants. It appears, then, that these were customary officers throughout the churches; and when the fury of persecution fell on Christians, those were among the first to suffer; the most cruel of tortures being inflicted on them, not sparing even extreme old age. Is it not remarkable that the office, which is so well adapted to the matronly character of the female sex, should have been excluded from our list of assistants in the church?
It is usually understood, that at first deaconesses were widows, who had lived with one husband only; not less than sixty years of age, which, by the fifteenth canon of the council of Chalcedon, was reduced to forty years. In later times, they wore a distinguishing dress. The apostle Paul says, that Phoebe had been his patrocinia, as well as that of many others, (Rom. xvi. 2,) which implies a dignity seldom considered; and shows that great respectability of station was the reverse of inconsistent with the office of deaconesses.

DEAD. It was natural that the Hebrews should have great consideration for the dead, since they believed the soul’s immortality, and a resurrection of the body. They esteemed it the greatest misfortune to be deprived of burial, and hence made it a point of duty to bury the dead, (Deut. i. 19; ii. 3, 9; iv. 17,) and to keep something on their garments for the poor. When an Israelite died in any house or tent, all the persons and furniture in it contracted a pollution, which continued seven days, (Num. xix. 14—16.) All who touched the body of one who died, or was killed in the open fields; all who touched men’s bones, or a grave, were unclean seven days.

To cleanse this pollution, they formerly took the ashes of the red heifer, sacrificed by the high-priest on the day of solemn expiation; (Num. xix. 9.) on these they poured water in a vessel, and a person who was clean dipped a bunch of hyssop in the water, and sprinkled with it the furniture, the chamber, and the persons, on the third day and on the seventh day. It was required that the polluted person should previously bathe his whole body, and wash his clothes; after which he was clean, ver. 17—22. Since the destruction of the temple, the Jews have ceased generally to consider themselves as polluted by a dead person.

It appears to have been a custom in Palestine, to embalm the bodies of persons of distinction and fortune; but this was never general. The evangelist John remarks, that our Saviour was wrapped in linen clothes, with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury; (John xix. 40.) and we read, that either with, or near, the bodies of some kings of Judah, abundance of spices was burnt; (2 Chron. xxii. 19,) but we cannot affirm that this was customary. Jer. xxvi. 5.

Anciently the Jews had women hired to lament at funerals, and who played on dolorous instruments, and walked in procession. The rabbins say, that an Israelite was enjoined to have two of these musicians at his wife’s chamber, besides the women hired to weep. Persons who met the funeral procession, in civility joined the company, and mingled their groans. To this our Saviour seems to allude: (Luke vii. 32.) “We have mourned to you, and ye have not wept.” And Paul—“Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep.” Rom. xii. 15. See BURIAL. For baptism of the dead, see BAPTISM.

DEAD SEA, see SEA. DEATH is taken in Scripture, (1.) for the separation of body and soul, the first death; (Gen. xxv. 11.) (2.) for alienation from God, and exposure to his wrath, 1 John iii. 14, &c.; (3.) for the second death, that of eternal damnation; (4.) for any great calamity, danger, or imminent risk of death, as persecution, 2 Cor. i. 10. “The gates of death” signify the grave; “instruments of death,” dangerous and deadly weapons; “bonds or snare of death,” snares intended to produce death; “a son of death,” one who deserves death, or one condemned to death; “the dust of death,” the state of the body in the grave, &c. Adam, having eaten of the forbidden fruit, incurred the penalty of death, for himself and his posterity. Had he continued obedient, it is generally supposed he would not have died, and the fruit of the tree of life was perhaps, intended to preserve him in a happy state of constant health; perhaps, too, after a long life, God might have translated him, by some easy mutation, into a life absolutely immortal. Death was, therefore, brought into the world by the envy and malice of the devil; (Wisdom iii. 94.) and the sin of Adam introduced the death of all his race. Rom. v. 12. He was driven out of paradise after his guilt, lest he should eat the fruit of the tree of life.

Our Saviour, by his death, however, subdued the power of death, and merited for us a blessed immortality, Heb. ii. 14, 15. Not that the soul, or mortal before, has been by him rendered immortal; or that he has merited for us the favor of not dying; for he has not changed the nature of the soul, nor exempted us from the necessity of dying; but he has given us the life of grace in this world, and has merited eternal happiness for us in the future world; provided the merits of his death are received by faith.

DEBIR, the name of a city. (It signifies that separated part of a temple floor; or the most retired or secret part, from which the oracle was understood to issue. In Solomon’s temple, the holy of holies was called the debir, in Hebrew, 1 Kings vi. 5, 10—23, &c.) The city Debir is called, also, Kirjath-sepher, “the city of the book,” or learning; and Kirjath-semen, the “city of purity,” from the Chaldee and Arabic root to cleanse. This ancient city was near Hebron, in the south of Judah, and its first inhabitants were giants of the race of Anak. Joshua took it, and slew its inhabitants; the city would have fallen by lot to Caleb; and Obadiah first entering the place, Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah, xv. 15, 18. It subsequently belonged to the Levites, xxii. 15; 1 Chron. vi. 55. See KIRJATH-SEpher.

There were two other cities of this name; one belonging to Gad, beyond Jordan, (Josh. xiii. 26,) the other to Benjamin, though originally to Judah, Josh. xv. 7.

I. DEBORAH, a prophetess, and wife of Lepidioth, judge the Israelites, and dwelt under a palm-tree between Ramah and Bethel, Judg. iv. 5. She sent for Barak, directed him to attack Sisera, and promised him victory. Barak, however, refused to go, unless she accompanied him; which she did, but she did not condescendingly, but boldly, and independently, said, “The Lord shall outdo thee.” She would not be impeded to a woman, and not to him. After the victory, Deborah and Barak composed a splendid triumphal song, which is preserved in Judges c. v. [For a translation of this song, with a commentary, see the Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 56.] The other to Benjamin, though originally to Judah, Josh. xv. 7.

II. DEBORAH, Rebeckah’s nurse, who accompanied Jacob, and was buried at the foot of Bethel, under an oak; for this reason called the oak of weeping, Gen. xxxv. 8. DEBT, an obligation which must be discharged by the party bound so to do. This may be either special or general: special obligations are where the party has contracted to do something in return for a service received; general obligations are those to which a man is bound by his relative situation. “Whoso shall swear by the gold of the temple—by the gift on the altar—is a debtor?” (Matt. xxiii. 16.) Is bound by his oath; is obliged to fulfill his vow. “I am debtor to the Greeks and barbarians;” (Rom. i. 14.) under obligations to persons of all nations and characters. (Exod. xxi. 9, &c.) He is subject to the law. — to do the whole law. Men may be debtors to human justice, or to divine justice; bound to obedience, and if that be not complied with, bound to suffer the penalties annexed to transgression.

DECALOGUE, the ten principal commandments, (Exod. xx. 1, &c.) from the Greek δέκα, ten, and λόγος, word. The Jews call these precepts, The ten words. DECANES, (from the Greek δικαίος, ten, and πόλις, a city,) a country in Palestine, which contained ten principal cities, on both sides of Jordan. Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20; vii. 31. According to Pline, they were, 1. Seythopolis; 2. Philadelphia; 3. Raphana; 4. Gadara; 5. Hippos; 6. Dios; 7. Pella; 8. Gerassa; 9. Canatha; 10. Damascas. Josephus inserts Otopos instead of Canatha. Though within the limits of Israel, the Decanecs was probably inhabited by foreigners; and hence it retained a foreign appellation. This may also contribute to account for the numerous heroes of swine kept in the district, (Matt. viii. 30,) a practice which was forbidden by the Mosaic law. See further under Canaan.

DECRÉE, a determination or appointment, judicial, civil, ecclesiastical, or divine. The divine appointments never err, being founded on truth, judgment, perfect wisdom, and perfect knowledge, united with perfect goodness, kindness, and grace. See Predestination.

DEDAN, Dedán, a country or city, and a people, several times mentioned in the Old Testament, but which there is some difficulty in identifying. D'Anville places a city called Dedan, or, according to Bochart, Dedana, in the eastern part of Arabia, near the Persian gulf. This is probably the Dedan of Gen. x. 7, and Ezek. xxvii. 15, the men of which are mentioned in conjunction with the merchants of many isles, as furnishing the men of Tyre with ivory and ebony, which they probably procured from India. About this spot a very extensive commerce flourished many ages after Tyre was destroyed, of which these various articles formed a considerable part.

It must be remarked, however, that there were two Dedans, who gave name to their descendants—the son of Rebah, the son of Cush, (Gen. x. 7,) and the son of Jokeshan, the son of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 3. The descendants of the latter settled in Arabia Petraea, in the vicinity of Idumea, (Jer. xlix. 8; Ezek. xxxv. 13,) and it is only by carefully attending to the genealogies in which the names are introduced, that the people to whom reference is made can be determined.

DEDICATION, religious ceremony, by which any thing is declared to be consecrated to the worship of God. Moses dedicated the tabernacle built in the wilderness, (Exod. xl; Numb. vii,) and the vessels set apart for divine service. Solomon dedicated the temple which he erected, (1 Kings viii,) etc. as did the Israelites, returned from the captivity, their new temple, Ezra vi. 16, 17. The Macedonians, having cleansed the temple, which had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, again dedicated the altar, 1 Mac. iv. 52—59. This is believed to be the dedication which the Jews celebrated in winter, at which our Lord was present, John x. 22. The temple rebuilt by Herod was dedicated with great solemnity; and in order to make the festival more august, Herod appointed it on the anniversary of his accession to the crown. This was towards the end of ante A. D. 40; and the temple which he built was dedicated at the end of his 36 years, the true date of the birth of Christ. Some think it probable that this was the dedication referred to above.

But not only were sacred places thus dedicated; cities, walls, and gates, and even the houses of private persons, were sometimes thus consecrated. Neh. xii. 27, the title of Ps. xxx; Deut. xx. 5. Hence the custom of dedicating churches, oratories, chapels, and other places of worship.

DEEP, see Abyss.

DEER, fallow; a wild quadruped, of a middle size, between the stag and the roe-buck; its horns turn inward, and are large and flat. The deer is naturally very timorous; it was reputed clean, and good for food, Deut. xiv. 5. Young deer were particularly esteemed for their delicacy; and are noticed in the Canticles, Proverbs, and Isaiah, as beautiful, lovely creatures, and very swift, Cant. iv. 5; viii. 3; Prov. v. 19. See Hind.

DEFILE, DEFILEMENT. Many were the blemishes of person and conduct, which, under the law, were esteemed defilements; some were voluntary, some involuntary; some originated with the party, others were received by him; some were inexcusable, being defects of nature, others the consequences of personal transgression. Under the gospel, defilements are those of the heart, of the mind, the temper, the conduct. Moral defilements are as numerous, and as strongly prohibited as ever; but ceremonial defilements are superseded, as requiring religious rites, though many of them claim attention as usages of health, decency, and civility. (See Matt. xv. 18; Gen. xxiv. 4; Rom. i. 34; James iii. 6; Ezek. xliii. 8; and also many passages in Leviticus and Numbers.) See Purification.

DEGREES, Psalms of, is the title prefixed to fifteen Psalms, from Ps. cxxvii. to Ps. cxxviii, inclusive. This title has given great difficulty to commentators, and a variety of explanations have been proposed. The most probable are the three following: (1) Pilgrim songs, carmina ascensionum, sung by the Israelites while going up to Jerusalem to worship; (comp, Ps. cxxvi. 4,) but to this explanation the contents of only a few of these Psalms are appropriate, e.g. of Ps. cxxvi.—(2) Others suppose the title to refer to a species of rhythm in these Psalms; by which the sense ascends, as it were, by degrees,—one member or clause frequently repeating the words with which the preceding member closes. Thus, in Ps. cxxvi.

1. I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, From whence cometh my help. 2. My help cometh from the Lord, Who made heaven and earth. 3. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved; Thy keepers will not slumber. 4. Lo, not slumber nor sleep will the keeper of Israel. 5. Jehovah is thy keeper, etc.

But the same objection lies against this solution, as before, viz. that it does not suit the contents of all these psalms.—(3) Perhaps the poetry of the Syrians may hereafter throw some light upon this title. Of the eight species of verse which they distinguish, one is called gradus, scale, degrees, like these psalms; and the name appears to refer to a particular kind of metre. But what that metre is, and whether it exists
The question concerning the universality of the deluge, is very curious and important. Some learned men have denied it, and pretended that it was so restricted as to remain, is an absurdity; that the universality of the deluge is contrary both to the divine power and the divine goodness; that it may be geometrically demonstrated, that were all the clouds in the air reduced to water, that water would not cover the superfluities of the earth to the height of a foot and a half; and that all the waters in the rivers and the sea, if spread over the earth, would never reach the tops of the mountains, unless raised in an extraordinary manner, and that then it could not support the weight of the ark; that all the air which encompasses the earth, if condensed into water, would not rise above thirty-one feet, which would be far from enough to cover the surface of the earth and the mountains to fifteen cubits above their tops. All this, they say, seems contrary to reason, as what follows is contrary to nature. Rain does not fall upon eminences above 600 feet high: it does not descend from a greater height; but if formed higher, it would immediately be frozen by the cold that prevails in those upper regions. Whence, then, it is asked, came the water to cover the tops of those mountains that rise above this region? Will any one say that the rain found a way back again? How could the plants be preserved so long under water? How could the animals that came out of the ark disperse themselves throughout the whole world? Besides, all the earth was not peopled at that time; why, then, should the deluge be universal? Was it not sufficient if it reached those countries which were inhabited? How were beasts brought from the extremities of the world, and collected into the ark?

The universality of the deluge, says Vossius, is impossible and unnecessary; was it not sufficient to deluge those countries where there were men?—But how did Vossius learn that the world was not then fully peopled? According to the LXX, whose chronology is supported by him, the world was above 2200 years old. Besides, he supposed the deluge only, what necessity was there to build, at a great expense, a prodigious ark? to bring all sorts of animals into it for preservation? or to oblige eight persons to enter into it, &c. Was it not more easy to have directed the people and animals to travel into those countries which the deluge was not to reach? How could the waters continue above the mountains of Armenia without spreading into the neighboring countries? How should the ark float many months on a mountain of water, without sliding down the declivity of it? which Vossius himself confesses would be the situation of the ark, supposing a partial deluge. He says, if the deluge extended throughout the world, the plants and trees would have died; but that they did not die, since Noah and the animals, when they quitted the ark, settled in those very countries which the deluge overflowed. In answer to this, Calmet asks why, if the plants and trees in this country did not die, they should die elsewhere. If the waters of the deluge destroyed the trees and plants where they reached, whence, he asks, came the shoot of the olive-tree, which the dove brought to Noah? and adds, that there is an infinite fertility of nature in the production and reproduction of plants; and that water is a principle much more proper to preserve, than to destroy them; that many plants grow under water, and that all vegetables require moisture to cause them to germinate. To this is to be added, that the waters of the deluge covered the whole face of the earth, above about a hundred and ten days; not half a year.

As to the bringing of beasts of all kinds to Noah, the difficulty is not so great as might be imagined. The number of beasts created in the beginning might not be very many; for, if the various tribes of mankind proceeded from one man and one woman, why might not the various kinds of animals proceed from one pair of each kind? The differences between the most unlike sort of dogs and horses, is not greater than between the different nations of men, of whom some are white and others black; some of an olive color, and others red. Besides, of every species of animals, some individuals might inhabit the country about paradise, where Noah most probably resided, perhaps not far from Armenia; and there is little doubt, but that Noah's ark was built in Mesopotamia, towards Chaldia. If there be any animals, that, through long habit, which becomes a second nature, cannot now live in this part of the world, (which, however, seems very difficult to prove,) it does not follow that there were such in Noah's time. If men or beasts were suddenly conveyed from the extremely heated regions of Africa, to the coldest parts of the North, then, indeed, it is credible, they would perish; but the case is greatly altered, if they remove, by insensible degrees, to those places, or if they were bred there; and if some creatures are found only in particular countries, we are not warranted to infer, that there never were any of the same kind elsewhere. On the contrary, we know, that formerly beasts of several species were numerous in countries where, at present, none of the kind inhabits, as the hippopotami of Egypt; wolves and beavers in England; and even several kinds of birds, as the crane, stork, &c. which formerly bred in England, where they are now unknown; though they still breed in Holland.

But the strongest objection against the universality of the deluge, is the quantity of water requisite to cover the earth to a height above the mountains. It has been said, as above, that if all the air in the atmosphere around our globe were condensed into water, it would not yield above two-and-thirty feet depth of water over all the earth. This is found; but as it is to prove the gravity of the air; but these experiments are contradicted by others, which allow us to question, at least, the precision of the inference, because there is a prodigious extent of atmosphere above that which can reasonably be supposed to have any influence on the barometer, or on any instrument which we can construct for the purpose of ascertaining the weight of the air. At the creation, the terrestrial globe was surrounded with water, the whole of which might not be excluded into the atmosphere, but of which a part might run into reservoirs below the surface of the globe. But wherever these primitive waters were deposited, and whatever became of them, certainly they were not annihilated; and it was as easy for God to restore them into the state and action of fluidity at the deluge, as in the beginning it was to raise the other portions of water into air or vapors; or to appoint them other (inferior, or superior) situations. Moses relates, (Gen. vii. 11, 12;) that the foundations of the great deep were broken up, as well as that the windows of heaven were opened; evidently meaning to describe a rising of waters from beneath the earth, no less than a falling of waters from above upon it.

But, supposing the ark to be raised fifteen cubits above the highest mountains, than in the plains, yet people do not die there from those causes. (1.) Though the air is colder and sharper on the tops of the highest mountains, than in the plains, yet people do not die there from those causes. (2.) The middle region of the air, in respect to temperature, is more or less elevated, according to the greater or lesser heat of the sun. During winter, it is much nearer the earth than in summer; or, to speak more properly, the cold which rises into the middle region of the air during summer, descends to the lower region during winter. Thus, supposing the deluge to be universal, it is evident, that the middle region of the air must have risen higher above the earth and waters, during the long winter of that calamity; consequently, the men and beasts enclosed in the ark, breathed nearly, or altogether, the same air as they would have ordinarily breathed a thousand or twelve hundred times lower, that is, on the surface of the earth. It is not intended, however, by these arguments, to prove, that the deluge was produced without a miracle; but only to show that it does not involve all the difficulties imputed.

Dr. Burnet attempted to explain the physical causes of the deluge. He supposed the earth in its beginning to be round, smooth, and even, throughout; without mountains or valleys; that the centre of the earth contained a great abyss of water; that the earth, by sinking in many places, and by rising in others, in consequence of different shocks, and of divers earthquakes, opened a passage for the internal waters, which issued impetuously from the centre where they had been enclosed, and spread over all the earth; that, in the beginning of the world, the earth was parallel with the axis of the world, moving directly under the equator, and producing a perpetual equinox; and that in the first world there were neither seas, nor rain, nor rainbow.

The objection of fifteen cubits arose rather from the extremes to which the author pushed his suppositions, than from the general idea itself. If, instead of maintaining that the earth was uniformly level, he had admitted hills and valleys, though not such high mountains as our present; if he had supposed that the equator was not a level, though not such oceans as at present; much might have been said in its support. For it is every way credible, that the state of the globe before the deluge was very different from what it is now; but to show in what those differences might consist, requires, besides a lively fancy, a correct judgment, and much scientific information. Mr. Whitson endeavored to account for this phenomenon by the projection of a comet, which, he supposed, passed so close to the body of the earth, at the time of the deluge, as to involve it in its atmosphere and tail; which, consisting of vapors, rarified and expanded in different degrees, caused the tremendous fall of rain spoken of by Moses. The presence of the comet would also occasion a double tide, by the power of which the orb of the earth would undergo a change, in which innumerable fissures would be made, whence the waters from its centre would rush,—corresponding with the other part of the narrative,—the fountains of the great deep being broken up. Dr. Woodward thought that the whole mass of the earth being dissolved by the waters of the deluge, a new earth was afterwards formed, composed of different beds or layers of terrestrial matter which had floated in this fluid; that these layers were disposed one over the other, almost according to their different gravities; so that plants or animals, and particularly shell-fish, which were not dissolved like others, remained enclosed by mineral and fossil materials, which have preserved them entire, or at least have retained impressions of them: and these are what we now call fossils. By this hypothesis he accounts for the shells found in places very remote from the sea, the elephants' teeth, the remains of animals, the Petrified fishes, and other things found on the tops of mountains, and other elevated places. In his work are many very curious facts and observations relating to the deluge; and Dr. Woodward ranks among the first, who, by inquiring into the actual appearances of nature, produced proofs of this great event still remaining in sufficient abundance. He opened these memorials of evidence which have since been enlarged—Mr. Whitehurst and Mr. Parkinson, and more recently Mr. Townsend and professor Buckland.

The Musæolus, P aggreg., Chinese, and Americans, have traditions of the deluge; but each nation relates its own particular history. Apion lib. i. cites Berosus, who, on the testimony of ancient documents, describes the deluge much like Moses; and gives also the history of Noah, of the ark, and of the mountains where it rested. Abydenus apud Euseb. Praep. lib. ix. cap. 18. relates, that one Scissaritis was informed by Saturn of a deluge approaching to drown all the earth; that Scissaritis, having embarked in a covered vessel, sent forth birds to learn in what condition the earth was; and that the first bird which returned true relations, Polybius relates the same story with Abydenus, adding that the four-footed beasts, the creeping things, and birds of the air, were preserved in this vessel. Lucian, in his book de Dea Syra, says, that many birds and having given themselves up to vices, the earth was drowned by a deluge, so that none but Deucalion remained upon it, it having sent shelter in a vessel, with his family, and the animals. Apollodorus, Ovid, and other writers, have discarded Deucalion's deluge; but have intermixed many circumstances, which agree only with that of Noah.

On these various traditions, as well as on the commemorative emblems of this event, preserved by the Egyptians, Hindoos, Druids, Greeks, Persians, Phœnicians, and others, Mr. Taylor has collected a large mass of information, in his Fragments; we select a few striking examples.

The following is from Syneculus:—"In the first year there came up, according to Berosus, from the waters of the Red sea, (the Indian ocean,) and appeared on the shore contiguous to Babylon, a creature void of reason [this is a palpable error, as the whole history shows; therefore, for θηρίον άπροσόν read θηρίον άπλήρωτον.] and as Apollodorus reports, having the whole body of a fish; above the head of this fish rose another head (of a man); he had human feet, (or legs,) which came out from each of the two sides of the tail; he had also anhorse's voice and language. They set up a serva at Babylon, says Berosus, his resemblance painted. This creature remained some time, during the day, among the natives, without taking any nourishment, and conversed with them from time to time; he taught them letters and learning; showed them the arts of life; instructed them to build cities; to raise temples to the Deity; to institute laws; to study geometry; the various manners (and seasons) of committing to the earth the seeds of fruits, and of gathering their productions; and generally, whatever conduces to soften and to polish the manners of mankind. Since that period nothing more has been heard of him. After the sun; by the light of the sun, this creature, Oannes, went toward the sea, plunged into it, and passed the night in the water. Afterwards, other similar creatures appeared; concerning whom Berosus promises to relate many things, in his history of the things. This history is entirely lost; but Oannes is thus mentioned by Apollodorus (in Syneculus). "Berosus reports, that Alorus was the first king of Babylon, native of that city; he reigned ten years; then came Huli, the famous, of the country of Panticlibos; then the Chaldean Ammonenus, under whose reign was seen to issue from the Red sea (the Indian ocean) that Oannes which Alexander Polybius, by anticipation of time, placed in the first of the Seven World monarchs of the earth, after a lapse of forty years. Abydenus places the second Oannes after a period of twenty-six years." Apollodorus goes on to mention other kings, as Meg Alorus, Da-onus, and Evedorachus, in whose time appeared another creature, half human, half fish, named θηρίον άπλήρωτον, in the Dagon. Helladius, an author of the fourth century, cited by Photius, (Bibiloth. p. 194.) also reports, "that a person named Oan was seen in the Red sea; who had the body of a fish; but his head, feet and hands were made of brass; and the fish's tail was covered with the use of letters and astronomy. Some said he was born of the first parent, which is the egg. This Oan was altogether a man; and he appeared like a fish, only because he was covered with the skin of a fish." It is clear that this history is Oannes; and that Oannes is the same as Dagon. "He was a man, but clad with the appearance of a fish?—"he was born of the first parent, the egg."—This egg once contained all mankind.

The most complete series of emblems coincident with this subject, hitherto procured, consists of a number of medals of Corinth, which represent very distinctly the ark, with the infant rising into renewed life, after having been preserved by the fish (the ark). The Apamean medal (see Apamea) contains a history of that event, rather than an emblem of it.

The incidental mention of the "Lady of the Egg," the "Goddess of the Egg," venerated among the Druidical Britons, invites me to wish to add a few words in illustration of that appellation. I do not know, indeed, that it occurs expressly in Scripture; yet, if the ravens have (or had) any authority for explaining the import of the terms Sacoth Beneth by reference to the emblem of the hen and chickens, (the doves, among the Greeks,) the occurrence of the title alluded to, is not impossible. Many creatures lay eggs; and the seed of a plant is but another term for an egg. The title "Goddess of the Egg," may, therefore, be taken in a general sense, as denoting the procreative power universal; otherwise, with a stricter reference to a specific object, symbolized under the type of an egg. And this was adopted among the Asiaties and the Greeks.
On some of the medals of Tyre is seen the emblem of a serpent embalming an egg. Now, that the serpent was on many occasions significant of benevolent superstition, is expressly recorded on some of the medals of Egypt, by the motto NEX ANAG. AAM, the New Good Genius, inscribed around a serpent crowned; on either side of which are the symbols of peace and plenty; poppy-heads and ears of corn, marking also, increase, fertility. The egg was that great and important object on which the power of benevolent superstition was most assiduously employed, most eminently, on a particular occasion. It was no other than, as the ark, with the world, its contents. But the difficulty of showing the issue of living beings, thousands of living beings, of different kinds, from an egg, when reduced to a type, is great, and hence the sculptors, and painters, and medallists of antiquity, have rather chosen to represent the same thing under emblems derived from vegetable nature: the poppy-head, or the pomegranate, contains thousands of seeds, each possessing, one of these principles of given natural life; whereas, an egg conveys the idea of a single life only, at the utmost, unless explained; and delineation cannot explain it. It might be thought, that the egg should properly refer to the creation; especially by those who believe the creation of God occurred (as a bird over her eggs) on the face of the deep: but the second creation, i.e. after the deluge, seems to be a more satisfactory reference. The following extracts are from Byunyn: (Anc. Mythol. vol. ii. p. 332.) "Of this species, according to Authentists, winged might produce an egg; from whence sprouted up like a blossom, Eros, (Love,) the lovely and desirable, with his golden winged wings." The egg is called ovum, OOFV, which is interpreted, Ovum squence concumbebat, but, like other eggs, was supposed to produce an egg; from whence sprouted up like a blossom, Eros, (Love,) the lovely and desirable, with his golden winged wings. "I have before observed, that one symbol, under which the ancient mythologies represented the ark, was an egg, called Ovum Typhonis. Over this sometimes a dove was supposed to have brooded, and to have produced a new creation... At other times, a serpent was described round it; either as an emblem of that providence, by which mankind was preserved; or else to signify, a renewal of life from a state of death; which circumstance was denoted by a serpent; for that animal, by annually casting its skin, was supposed to renew its life, and to become positae nova cruxia, vegete and fresh after a state of inactivity. By the bursting of this egg, was denoted the opening of the ark; and the disclosing to light whatever was within contained." p. 361.

We conclude by mentioning a re-action to which some of the ancient fathers have given occasion; it is that of placing in the heavens, in the form of constellations, memorials of those transactions which so greatly interested mankind. The constellation of the Ship, [Argos], of the Raven, of the Dove, of the Albatross, on mare, and the Sacrifice, bear the in-competent witness to the history of the deluge. See Anth., p. 95.

DEMAs, a Thessalonian mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. iv. 10.) who was at first a most zealous disciple of the apostle, and very serviceable to him at Rome during his imprisonment, but afterwards forsake him to follow a more secular life.

I. DEMETRIUS SOTER, king of Syria, reigned twelve years, from A. M. 3643 to 3584. He was son of Seleucus IV. surnamed Philopater; but, being a hostage at Rome when his father died, his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes, who in the interim arrived in Syria, procured himself to be acknowledged king, and reigned eleven years: after him his son, Antiochus Eupator, reigned two years. At length Demetrius Soter regained his father's throne. He is often mentioned in the books of the Maccabees.

II. DEMETRIUS NICON, son of Demetrius Soter, was for many years deprived of the throne by Alexander Balas; but he at length recovered it by the assistance of Ptolemy Philometor, his father-in-law. After a life of vicissitude, he was killed, ante A. D. 129, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Seleucus, to whom he left a dangerous rival in the person of Alexander, surnamed Zebina.

III. DEMETRIUS, a goldsmith of Ephesus, who made new or false coins of the famous temple, for Diana of Ephesus, which he sold to foreigners, Acts xix. 34. Observing the progress of the gospel, not in Ephesus only, but in all Asia, he assembled his fellow craftsmen, and represented the business of God would suffer, but that the worship of the great Diana of Ephesus was in danger of being entirely forsaken. This produced an uproar and confusion in the city; till at length the town-clerk appeased the tumult by firmness and arguments. See Ephesus.

IV. DEMETRIUS, mentioned by John as an eminent Christian, (3 John 12,) is by some believed to be the Demetrius of the former article, who had renounced heathenism to embrace Christianity. But this wants proof.

DEMON, or DEMON, delias. Good and bad angels, but generally bad angels, are called in Greek and Latin, Demons, or Daemons. The Hebrews express Demons by Serpent; Satan, or Tempter; Siva, or destroyers; Saphyr, goats, or sacral devices; and in Greek authors we find Daemons, or Diabolos, that is, calumniators, or impure spirits, &c. See ANGEL. The Jews represent evil angels as being at the left hand of God's throne, to receive his orders, while the good angels are at his right hand, ready to execute his will. Lactantius believed that there were two sorts of demons, celestial and terrestrial; that the celestial were the fallen angels who engaged in impure conceptions, and that the terrestrial were their issue; and the authors of all the evils committed on earth.

Many of the ancients allotted to each man an evil angel continually tempting him to evil, and a good angel continually inciting him to good. The Jews hold the same sentiment at this day; and the same may be remarked in the ancient philosophers.

We commonly hold that the devils are in hell, where they suffer the punishment of their rebellion. But the ancient fathers place them (see Ephes. ii. 2.) in the air, in the air; and Jerome says, it was the general opinion of the doctors in the church, that the air between heaven and earth is filled with evil spirit. Augustin, and others of the fathers, believed that the devils, by their wicked arts and arts, and by their desire to extend the dominion of the air into that near the earth, which is but darkness in comparison to the serenity and clearness of the other.

forts, that seem to be supernatural, may be effects of heated imagination, of melancholy blood, of trick and contrivance. But if a person suddenly should speak and understand language he never learned, talk of sublime matters he never studied, or discover things secret and unknown; should lie uplift him in the air without visible assistance, act and speak in a manner very distant from his natural temper and condition; and all this without any inducement from interest, passion, or other natural motive; if all these circumstances, or the greater part of them, concur in the same possession, can there be any room to suspect that it is not real? There have, then, been possessions in which all these circumstances have concurred. There have, therefore, been real ones, but especially those which the gospel declares as such. God was pleased to permit, that in our Saviour's time there should be many such in Israel, to furnish him with occasions of signalizing his power, and to supply further and convincing proofs of his mission and divinity. It is admitted, that true possessions by the devil are miraculous. They do not happen without divine permission; they were before suspended and restrained by Divine Providence. See Angel.

DENARIUS, a Roman coin, worth four shillings, generally valued at seven pence three farthings English, or, more properly, about 12½ cents. In the New Testament, it is the equivalent of a piece of money in general: Matt. xxii. 19; Mark xii. 15; Luke xx. 24.

DERBE, a city of Lycaonia, to which Paul and Barnabas fled when expelled from Iconium, Acts xiv. 6. A.D. 41.

DESERET. The Hebrews, by ārē, midbar; "a desert," mean an uncultivated place, particularly if mountainous. Some deserts were entirely dry and barren; others were beautiful, and had good pastures; Scripture speaks of the beauty of the desert, Psalm lxv. 13. Scripture names several deserts in the Holy Land; and there was scarcely a town without one belonging to it, i.e. uncultivated places, for woods and pastures; like our English commons, common lands. The principal deserts were the following: design of Hebrew: a word, that there never were any real possessions. In answer to this, it is observed, that, if there were no real possessions, Christ and his apostles cured great numbers of possessed persons. But as it has been found in many cases, that credulity has been imposed on, by fictitious possessions, some have maintained, that all were diseases of the mind, the effects of disordered imagination; that persons sometimes thought themselves really possessed; that others feigned themselves to be so, in order to be delivered from an annoyance, or to gain applause. In the New Testament, it is said that "the devil was present among the apostles." Thus the devil was present among the apostles, and the whole church, would be in error, and must willfully involve us in it, by believing, teaching, and praying, as if there were real possessions. Our Saviour speaks to and commands the devils, who actuated the possessed; which devils answered, and obeyed, and gave proofs of their presence by tormenting those miserable creatures, whom they were obliged to quit. They cast them into violent convulsions, throw them on the ground, leave them for dead, take possession of hogs, and hurry those animals into the sea. Can this be merely delusion? Christ alleges, as proof of his mission, that the devils are cast out; he promises his apostles the same power that he himself exercised against those wicked spirits. Can all this be nothing but chimera? It is admitted that there are several tokens of possession which are equivocal and fallible, but there are others which are indubitable. A person may counterfeit a demoniac, and imitate the actions, words, motions, contortions, cries, howlings, and convulsions of one possessed. Some ef-

PAPYRUS. Solomon built Pithyrus, in the desert, between the Euphrates, the Orontes, and the Chrysorhous. See TADMOIR.

PARAN, in Arabia Petraea, near the city of Paran. Islamel dwelt in this wilderness, Gen. xxi. 21. Habakkuk says (iii. 3) that the Lord appeared to his people in the mountains of Paran. The Hebrews remained long in this desert. See PARAN.

SHUR, on the north-east of the Red sea. Hagar wandered in this wilderness, (Gen. xvi. 7.) and Israel, after passing the Red sea, came into it, Exod. xv. 22. Here was probably, a city named Shur.

Sin. There are two deserts of this name in Scripture; the first, written שִׁינָן (Exod. xvi. 6.) lies between Elim and mount Sinai. The second, written סין, is near Kadesh Barnea, which was in the desert of Sin, or Tzin, Numb. xx. 1.

Sinai, adjacent to mount Sinai. The Israelites encamped here a long time, and received most of their laws, Exod. xix. 15-25.

DESSAU, a town, or castle, near to which the Israelites lodged themselves under Judas Maccabeus, 2 Macc. xiv. 16. Its situation is unknown.

DEVIL, a fallen angel, especially the chief of the sinners among the angels. See Angel, Demon, DIABOLUS, SATAN.

DEVOTING, cursing, anathema. The most ancient instance, and, indeed, the only instance, of devoting, strictly speaking, in Scripture, is that which Balak, king of Moab, would have had Balaam use against Israel, Num. xxii. 13-22. Josue has furnished us with another, in the case of the two brothers Hircanus and Aristobulus. But several devotions of another sort are noticed in sacred history, as when any people, city, country, or family, was devoted. See Anathema.

The heathen, who admitted a plurality of gods, and who believed them to be subordinate in power one to another, used enchantments and devotions to bring mischief on their enemies. They sometimes called forth the tutelary de-ties of cities, to deprive their enemies of their protection and defence. It is said that, for fear of this, the Tyrians chained the statue of Apollo to the altar of Hercules, the tutelary deity of their city, lest he should forsake them. The Romans, says Macrobius, being abounded with idolatry, that every city had its tutelary deity, when attacking a city, used certain verses to call forth its gods, believing it impossible otherwise to take the town; and even when they might take a place, they thought it would be a great crime to take the gods captive with it; for this reason the Romans concealed the real names of the tutelary deities very close; they were being different from what they were generally called; they concealed likewise the names of the tutelary gods of their cities. Pliny informs us that the secret name of Rome was Valentina, and that Valer-

DIABOLUS, an accuser, a calumniator. We rarely meet with this word in the Old Testament. Sometimes it answers to the Hebrew Belial; sometimes to Satan. The former signifies a libertine; the latter, an adversary, or an accuser. The word Satan in Job i. 6, is rendered 'the accuser,' by the LXX. The Eblos of the Mahometans is the same with our Lucifer; and the name is similar to that of Diabolus.

The Musulmans call him likewise Azazel, which is a name of the scape-goat; and is probably equivalent to the Hebrew Abazel, by which name the accuser, or refractory, which is nearly the meaning of the Hebrew, because, having received orders to proceed before Adam, he would not comply, and then, being of the superior nature of God, he would not proceed to the throne of God, and was cast out of the Garden of Eden. See Adam.

DIASPORA, the dispersion of the Jews. This instrument for the measuring of time is not mentioned in Scripture before the reign of Ahaz, (A. M. 2952,) and we cannot clearly ascertain that, even after his reign, the Jews generally dis-

DEUTERONOMY, the repetition of the law, the fifth book of the Pentateuch, so called by the Greeks, because in it Moses recapitulates what he had ordained in the preceding books. Some rabbins call it Miḥnah, the second law; others "the book of rephrations," from the reproaches which occur in it. This book contains the history of what passed in the wilderness from the beginning of the eleventh month to the seventh day of the twelfth month, in the fortieth year after the Israelites' departure from Egypt; that is, about six weeks. Some have doubted whether it was written by Moses, because it mentions his death, and the author speaks of the land beyond Jordan, like one who writes west of that river. (See Aaron.) It is admitted that the relation of Moses' death was added to the book; but the word מִּשְׁמַר, מֶרֶב, translated beyond Jordan, may be translated on this side. In the book of Deuteronomy, Moses recites to the people what had passed since their coming out of Egypt; explains, and adds some others, to the laws of God which he had received at Sinai; exhorts the people to obedience; and declares, that Joshua was ap-

This instrument for the measuring of time is not mentioned in Scripture before the reign of Ahaz, (A. M. 2952,) and we cannot clearly ascertain that, even after his reign, the Jews generally dis-

DEUTERONOMY, the repetition of the law, the fifth book of the Pentateuch, so called by the Greeks, because in it Moses recapitulates what he had ordained in the preceding books. Some rabbins call it Miḥnah, the second law; others "the book of rephrations," from the reproaches which occur in it. This book contains the history of what passed in the wilderness from the beginning of the eleventh month to the seventh day of the twelfth month, in the fortieth year after the Israelites' departure from Egypt; that is, about six weeks. Some have doubted whether it was written by Moses, because it mentions his death, and the author speaks of the land beyond Jordan, like one who writes west of that river. (See Aaron.) It is admitted that the relation of Moses' death was added to the book; but the word מִּשְׁמַר, מֶרֶב, translated beyond Jordan, may be translated on this side. In the book of Deuteronomy, Moses recites to the people what had passed since their coming out of Egypt; explains, and adds some others, to the laws of God which he had received at Sinai; exhorts the people to obedience; and declares, that Joshua was ap-

It was not quite noon; but at noon it could not be said of the shadow, "which now descendis," or is, at this time, going down; but it might be close upon noon, until which point the shadow might be considered as descending. Perhaps the prophet had said Hezekiah should die of sears, as his sickness was in its natural molar; if so, his stated return was necessary; and, as a sign of amendment, in a case so critical, the instant beginning of the shadow to retrograde, was equally necessary: the shadow retrograded, then, ten stations, or one fourth of the circle; and having reached this station, it thence resumed and re-accomplished its natural course.

If the instrument used in this instance were brought from Babylon, we see the reason why the king of Babylon was so peculiarly interested in the event, 2 Kings xx. 13.

As to the retrogradation of the shadow, and the means by which it was produced, there are various opinions. It seems the most probable that the change was in the shadow only; that is, the solar rays being deflected in an extraordinary manner by the interposition of a cloud, or some other means, they produced the change, or retrogradatory motion, of the place of the shadow in the dial.

DIAMOND, the sixth stone in the high-priest's breastplate, bearing the name of Naphthali, Exod. xxxviii. 18. It is, however, questionable whether the diamond was in use in the time of Moses. See Adamant.

DIA, a celebrated goddess of the heathen, and one of the twelve superior deities. In the heavens she was Luna, or Meni, (the moon,) on earth Dinna, in hell Hecate. She was invoked by women in child-birth under the name of Lucina. She was sometimes represented with a crescent on her head, a bow in her hand, and dressed in a hunting habit; at other times with a triple body, (triple-faced Prosperpine,) and bearing instruments of torture in her hands. At Rome there is a full length and complete image of this goddess, which is clearly an emblematical representation of the dependence of all creatures on the powers of nature; or the many and extensive blessings bestowed by nature, on all ranks of existence; whether man, lion, stag, oxen, animals of all kinds, or even insects. The goddess is symbolized as diffusing her benefits to each in its proper station. Her numerous rows of breasts speak the same allegorical language, i.e. fountains of supply: whence figures of this kind were called (μαντεύς) many-breasted. To cities, also, she bears a peculiar regard, as appears by the honorable station (on her head) of the turrets, their proper emblems. On her breastplate (pectoral) is a necklace of pearls; it is also ornamented with the signs of the zodiac, as an allusion to the seasons of the year, throughout which nature dispenses her various bounties. In fact, the whole course of nature, and her extensive distributions, are mystically represented in this image.

Here we have a representation of the front of the famous temple of Diana of Ephesus, (the pronaoe, or front of the naos,) from which it appears to have been octostyle, i.e. having eight columns: the image of Diana is in this temple represented clothed: a motto at bottom, "Of the Ephesians:" around it AEO-

KOPEO—a clear allusion to, and a strong confirmation of, what the grammateus asserts, that the city of Ephesus was justly entitled to, and held, by universal consent, the office of neokoros to the temple (and statue) of Diana; nor was this any thing new; the city had long been so esteemed. Neokoros signifies guardian of the temple and its contents, manager of its concerns—something analogous to our churchwarden; but of superior power and dignity. It might be rendered "superintendent of the sacra."

It is well known that many heathen deities resolve themselves into the sun and moon; and that Diana is the moon, in most or all of her offices and characters. "The precious things put forth by the moon," are mentioned, so early as the days of Jacob; and long afterwards we frequently read of the "queen of heaven," &c. The moon was also the goddess presiding over child-birth. This deity was known by distinction, as Diana of Ephesus, where she had a famous temple, (see Ephes.,) to some of the persons connected with which Paul rendered himself obnoxious by the discharge of his apostolic duties, Acts xix. 27, &c. The language of this narrative is worthy of notice here. Demetrius was a worker in silver, a band of artisans, who made representations—some on medals, some in alto-relievo—or other kinds of wrought, or of cast, work, (or small models, perhaps,) of the portico and temple (the naos) of the goddess Diana. Now, the city of Ephesus, in her magnificentsuperiority to any temple, was bound to promote its interests; it could not therefore be indifferent, or insensible, when this great and famous edifice was about to be degraded, to be rendered contemptible—through the iniquity of a few hated Jews. Notwithstanding the reported danger, however, and the danger always attendant on popular commotion, the grammateus, or recorder, (town-clerk, Engl. ver.) harangues the people on the subject of their riot; states, "that the honor of their city as neokoros was incontrovertible; that the persons in custody were neither guilty of sacrilege, nor of blasphemying their goddess, in particular, especially considering that this image was not made with hands," but was well known to be Jove-descended; and, moreover, that if the accused were guilty of any misdeemnor, they should be properly indicted for it; but if the complainers were desirous of extending their measures beyond merely inuring the honor and security of Diana, they should call a general meeting of the town, in which to propose their resolutions; because, if the image attained to the whole town, and not to any separate part of it...such as Demetrius with his fellow-craftsmen and associates."

There appears in the language of this very sensible man an ambiguity employed in describing the goddess, or her image—ΑΕΟΚΕΟ. Jove-descended, or fallen. For instance, supposing he might wish to say,—the things signified by the image of the goddess, i.e. the powers of nature, descended from Jove; this, taking Jove for the supreme deity, would be the truth; but, no doubt, the popular belief was, and the people would so understand the speaker, that the image itself, the object of their worship, fell down from Jove. If this be fact, it is an instance of the esoteric and exoteric doctrines; or, that the philosophers, by expressions capable of two senses, intended to convey ideas of principles understood by philosophers, in a sense different from what they inculcated on the people. It seems incredible that this very rational public writer could believe, that the marble image now standing in the adyrium of the temple, should fall from heaven, in its present wrought and allegorical state, though he might, perhaps, when speaking in public, call it "a divine image," which expression its votaries were at liberty to take literally, if they chose—as if wrought by the hand of Jove; while, in his own mind, he would consider this "divine image" as an image representing divine things; or things which descended from Jove.

I. DIBON, a city of Moab, and thought to be the Dimon of Isaiah xv. 9. It was given to the tribe of Gad by Moses, and afterwards yielded to Reuben, Num. xxxii. 3, 33, 34; Josh. xiii. 9. It was again occupied by the Moabites at a later period, Is. xv. 24, Jer. xlviii. 18, 22. Eusebius says, it was a large town on the northern bank of the river Arnon, Num. xxxiii. 45. Burckhardt speaks of a place called Dibán, about three miles north of the Arnon. See GAN.

II. DIBON, a city of Judah: the same, perhaps, as Debir, or Kirjath-Sopher, Neh. xi. 25. The LXX call that place Dibon, which in Hebrew is Deber, Josh. xiii. 30.

DIDACHA, a Greek word, signifying a piece of money, in value two drachmas, about fourteen pence English, or, more nearly, 25 cents. The Jews were by law obliged, every person, to pay two drachmas, that is, half a shekel, to the temple. To pay this, our Lord, in order to catch a fish, which, probably, had just swallowed such a coin, Matt. xvi. 24—27.

IDYMyoS, a twin. This is the signification of the Hebrew or Syrian word Thomas. See Thomas.

DIGIT, a finger (ξυμω, El.) a measure containing ⅛ of an inch. There are four digits in a palm, and six palms in a cubit.

DIKHAI, seventh son of Joktan, (Gen. x. 27.) whose descendants are placed either in Arabia Felix, which abounds in palm-trees, called Dikla in Chaldee and Syriac; or in Assyria, where is the town of Degla, and the river Tigris, or Dikkel.

DILEAN, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 38.

DIMNAH, a city of Zebulun, given to the Levites of Meroni's family, Josh. xxii. 33.

DIMONAH, a town in south Judah, Josh. xv. 22.

DINAH, daughter of Jacob and Leah, (Gen. xxx. 21.) horn after Zebulun, and about A. M. 2250. When Jacob returned into Canaan, Dinah, then about the age of fifteen or sixteen, attended a festival of Baal, the Canaanite false god, where the women of the province, (Gen. xxxvii, 3, 4) with Sinbad, "a son of Hamor the Hivites, prince of the city, ravished or seduced her, and afterwards desired his father to procure her for his wife. Dinah's brothers, being informed of what had passed, were much exasperated; and having made haste to Shechoke, to his father Hamor, and to the inhabitants of their city, slew and plundered them, and carried off Dinah, Jacob, when informed of the occurrence, cursed their anger and cruelty, xlix. 5–7.

DINAH, a people who opposed the rebuilding of the temple, Ezra iv. 9.

DINABAH, a city of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 32.

DIONYBIUS, the Areopagite, a convert of Paul, (Accts xvii. 34.) and supposed to have been a citizen of Athens. Dionysius is said to have been made the first bishop of Athens; and after having labored, and suffered much in the gospel, to have been burnt at Athens, A.D. 65. The works attributed to him are spurious.

DISPOLIS, the city of Jupiter, or Thebes. We do not meet with this name in the sacred writings; but Nahum is thought to have intended it under the name of No-amon. See AMON-No.

DIOCTRIUS, a person who did not receive with hospitality those whom the apostle had sent to him, nor suffer others to do so. (See 3 John 9.)

DISCERNING of spirits, a divine gift mentioned 1 Cor. xii. 10, and which consisted in discerning among those who professed to be inspired by God, whether they were inspired by a good or an evil spirit; whether truly or falsely; and also, probably, whether they were sincere in their profession of Christianity. This gift was of very great importance under the Old Testament, when false prophets often rose up, and seduced the people; and also in the primitive ages of the Christian church, when supernatural gifts were frequent; when the messenger of Satan was sometimes transformed into an angel of light, and false apostles, under the mask appearance of sheep, concealed the disposition of ravening wolves.

DISCIPLE signifies, in the New Testament, a believer, a Christian, a follower of Jesus Christ.

DISGUISE is mentioned in Scripture, and the Hebrews attributed several of them to the devil. Diseases and death are consequences of sin; and the Hebrews, not much accustomed to recur to physical causes, often informed them of evil spirits deriving their power from "Titi, shabu." If their infirmities appeared unusual, and especially if the cause were unknown to them, they concluded it to be a stroke from the avenging hand of God; and to him the wisest and most religious had recourse for cure. King Aza is blamed for placing his confidence in physicians, 2 Chron. xvi. 12. Job's friends ascribed all his distempers to God's justice. Paul delivers the incestuous Corinthian to Satan "for the destruction of the flesh:" that the evil spirit might affect him with diseases, 1 Cor. v. 5. (See SATAN.)
The same apostle attributes the death and diseases of many Corinthians to their communicating unworthily, chap. xi. 30. He also elsewhere ascribes the infirmities with which he was afflicted to an evil angel; "a thorn in the flesh—an angel of Satan," 2 Cor. xii. 7. An angel of death slew the first-born of the Egyptians; a destroying angel wasted Sennach-rib's army; an avenging angel smote the people of Israel with a pestilence, after David's sin. Saul fell into a fit of deep melancholy, hypochondriacal depression, and neither food nor drink came upon him." Abimelech, king of Gerar, for taking Sarah, the wife of Abraham, was threatened with death, (Gen. xx. 3, 4.) and the Philistines were smitten with an ignominious disease, for not treating the ark with adequate respect. See also Ps. cxlv. 3. Teachers and others that we read of, were evident interposi-tions of Providence, by whatever agency they were produced.

DISH. It has been remarked, on the subject of the words rendered exercise by our translators, that one of them seems to be totally different from that which bids fairest to explain the story of the widow's cruse of oil, or king Saul's cruse of water; that word it is here necessary to examine, with the destain to determine its application. Tzelloth (Hebr.)
or Tsellath (Sept.) is used to denote a vessel of some capacity; a vessel to be turned upside down, in order that the inside may be thoroughly wiped; (2 Kings xlii. 21.) "I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a fiver, turning it upside down." This implies, at least, that the opening of such a dish be not narrow, but wide; that the dish itself be of a certain depth; yet that the hand may readily reach to the bottom of it, and there may freely move, so as to wipe it thoroughly. This vessel was capable, also, of bowing the fire, and of standing conveniently over a fire; for we read in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 13, that "The priests and others boiled parts of the holy offerings in passe (Tselloth) and distributed them speedily among the people." Meaning, perhaps, that this was not the very kind of dish or boiler which they would have chosen, had time permitted a choice; but that haste and multiplicity of business made them use whatever first came to hand, that was competent to the service. This application of these vessels, however, shows that they must have been of considerable capacity and depth; as a very narrow or a very small dish, would not have answered the purpose required. A kind of dish or pan, which appears to answer these descriptions, is represented in the "Estampes du Levant," in the hands of a confectioner of the grand seignior's seraglio, who is carrying a deep dish, full of heated viands, (recently taken off the fire,) distributed in which he labours, in order that those viands may retain their heat and flavor. His being described on the plate as a confectioner, leads to the supposition that what he carries are delicacies; and to this agrees his desire of preparing them with speed. The form of the plate is evidently calculated for standing over a fire; and from its form it may easily be rested on its side, for the purpose of being thoroughly wiped. Now, a dish used to contain delicacies, is most likely to receive such attention; for the comparison, which appears to refer to, evidently implies some assiduity and exertion to wipe from the dish every particle inconsistent with complete cleanliness. (That the Hebrew Tsalchah means a dish in general, is obvious from the passages where the word occurs. All that is here said more than this, is mere fancy.)

We are now prepared to see the import of Eli-shah's direction to the men of Jericho, (2 Kings ii. 20.)
"Bring me a new—not cruse—but Tsalchah,"— one of the vessels used in your cookery—in those parts of your cookery which you esteem the most delicate; a culinary vessel, but of the superior kind;
"and put salt therein," what you constantly mingle
In your food; what readily mixes with water: and this shall be a sign to you, that in your future use of this, it shall find its salutary, and fit for daily service in preparing, or accompanying, your daily sustenance.

There is a striking picture of sloth, sketched out very simply, but very strongly, by the sagacious Solomon, in Prov. xiii. 4; and repeated almost verbatim, in chap. xxvi. 15:

A slothful man hideth his hand in the tzolahith; But will not re-bring it to his mouth.

A slothful man hideth his hand in the tzolahith—It grieved him to bring it again to his mouth.

Meaning, he sees a dish, deep and capacious, filled with confectionary, sweetmeats, &c. whatever his appetite can desire in respect to relish and flavor; and of this he is greedy. Thus excited, he thrusts his hand—his right hand—deep into the dish, and loads it with delicacies; but, alas! the labor of lifting it up to his mouth is too great, too excessive, too disquieting; he, therefore, does not enjoy or taste what is before him, though his appetite be so far allured as to desire, and his hand be so far exerted as to grasp. He suffers the viands to become cold, and thereby to lose their flavor; while he debates the important movement of his hand to his mouth; if he do not rather totally forego the enjoyment, as demanding too vast an action!

DIKHAN, and DISHION, sons of Sair, the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 21, 30; 1 Chron. i. 38, also 41, 42.

DISPENSATION, an authority to administer the ordinances of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 17. Called the dispensation of grace, (Eph. iii. 2.) and the dispensation of God, Col. i. 25.

DISPERSION. Peter and James wrote to the Jews of the dispersion, 1 Pet. i; Jam. i. 1. The former directs his letter to those who were dispersed in the countries of Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Asia, Cappadocia; but the latter more indefinitely addresses the twelve tribes scattered abroad. Not that all the tribes were then dispersed, for Judea was yet filled with Jews; (these epistles being written before the war with the Romans;) but, after the captivities into Assyria and Chaldea, there were many Jews of all nations constantly resident in various places throughout the East. This was called “The Dispersion.” Nehemiah prays God to collect the dispersion of his people; and the Jews said of Christ, (John vii. 35.) Will he go unto the dispersed among the Gentiles?

DIVAN, see BEDS.

DIVINATION. The eastern people were always fond of divination, magic, the art of interpreting dreams, and of acquiring the prescience of futurity. When Moses published the law, this disposition had long been common in Egypt, and the neighboring countries, and to correct the Israelites' inclination to consult diviners, wizards, fortunate-tellers, and interpreters of dreams, it was forbidden them, under very severe penalties; and the true spirit of prophecy was promised to them as infinitely superior. They were to be stoned who pretended to have a familiar spirit, or the spirit of divination; (Deut. xviii. 9, 10, 15,) and the prophets are full of invectives against the Israelites who consulted such, as well as against false prophets, who seduced the people.

Divination was of several kinds; by water, fire, earth, air; by the flight of birds, and their sing-ING; by lots, dreams, serpents, arrows, &c. See Akrow.

DIVORCE, or REPUDIATION, was tolerated by Moses, for sufficient reasons, (Deut. xxiv. 1—3,) but our Lord has limited it to the single case of adultery, Matt. v. 31, 32. There is great probability that divorces were used among the Hebrews before the law, since the Son of God says, that Moses permitted them by reason only of the hardness of their hearts; that is to say, because they were accustomed to this abuse, and to prevent greater evils. Abraham dismissed Hagar, on account of her insolence, at the request of Sarah. We find no instance of a divorce in the books of the Old Testament written since Moses; though it is certain that the Hebrews separated from their wives on trifling occasions. Samuel's father-in-law understood that, by his absence from her, his daughter was divorced, since he gave her to another, Judg. xv. 2. The Levite's wife, who was disinherited at Gibeah, had forsaken her husband, and would not have returned, had he not gone in pursuit of her, ch. xix. 2, 3. Solomon speaks of a libertine woman, who had deserted her husband, the director of her youth, and had forgotten the covenant of her God, Prov. ii. 16, 17. The prophet Malachi (i. 15.) commends Abraham for not divorcing Sarah, though barren; and inveighs against the Jews, who had abandoned the wives of their youth. Micah also (ii. 9.) reproaches them with having cast out their wives from their pleasant houses, and taken away the glory of God from their children for ever.

Josephus was of opinion (Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 11.) that the law did not permit women to divorce themselves from their husbands. He believes Salome, sister of Herod the Great, to be the first who put away her husband; though Herodias afterwards dismissed her, (Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7.) as did also the three sisters of the younger Agrippa, and others, theirs.

DIZAHAH, the name of a place, not far from the plains of Moab, mentioned Deut. i. 1.

DOCTOR, or TEACHER, OF THE LAW, may, perhaps, be distinguished from scribe, as rather teaching high rate, than giving written opinions. It is difficult, when the expression, “counsel learned in the law,” is used among us, to divest ourselves of the idea of the political law and its administration; but if we could wave that idea, and restrict the phrase to learned in the divine law, we should, probably, not be far from a just conception of what the doctors of the law were in Judea. It deserves notice, that Nicodemus, himself a doctor (h'gug, teacher) of the law, came to consult Jesus, whom he complimented in the same terms as he himself was accustomed to: “Rabbi, we know that thou art h'gugos, a competent teacher—from God?—and most probably adding, “Pray what is your opinion of such and such matters?” q. d. “Our glosses have been too far-fetched, too overstrained; they have never satisfied my mind—pray let me hear your sentiments.” So our Lord among the doctors (Luke ii. 46.) not only heard their opinions, but asked them questions—proposing his queries in turn, and examining their answers; whether they were consonant to the law of God: and the doctors, we find, were in ecstasies at the intelligence of his mind, and the propriety of his language and replies.

Doctors of the law were mostly of the sect of the Pharisees; but are distinguished from that sect, in Luke v. 17, where it appears that the novelty of our Lord's doctrines drew together a great company of law-doctors. (wesehweëna)

Doctors, or teachers, are mentioned among divine gifts in Ephes. iv. 11, and it is possible, that the apostle does not mean such ordinary teachers (or pastors) as the church now enjoys: but, as it seems to reason that among the extraordinaryizations of God, and uses no mark of distinction, or separation, between apostles, with which he begins, and doctors, with which he ends,—it may be, that he refers to the nature of the office of the Jewish doctors; meaning well-informed persons, to whom inquiring Christian converts might have recourse for removing their doubts and difficulties, concerning Christian observations, the sacraments, and other rituals, and for receiving from Scripture the demonstration that "this is the very Christ," and that the things relating to the Messiah were accomplished in Jesus. Such a gift could not be very serviceable in that infant state of the church, which, indeed, without it, would have seemed, in this particular, inferior to the Jewish institutions. To this agrees the distinction (Rom. xii. 7.) between Doctors, (ap교회ς) and exhorters, q. d. "he who gives advice privately, and resolves doubts, &c. let him attend to that duty; he who exhorteth with a loud voice, (φοράναι) let him exhort" with proper piety. The same appears in 1 Cor. xii. 28., who are the first, apostles, prophets, teachers, (εκκλησίας) and instructors; secondly, prophets, occasional instructors; thirdly, (εκκλησίας) doctors, or teachers, private instructors.

DODAI, one of David's captains, over the course of the house of Judah, 1 Chron. xxvii. 4.

DODANIM, the youngest son of Javan, Gen. x. 2. Several Hebrew MSS. read Rhodanim, and believe that he peopled the island of Rhodes. See Dodona.

DOEG, an Edomite, and Saul's chief herdsman. Being at Nob, a city of the priests, when David came thither, and received provision from Ahimelech, he reported this to Saul, who, thereupon, sent for the priests, and massacred them, by the hand of Doeg, to the number of fourscore and five, 1 Sam. xxvii. 10.

DOG, a well-known domestic animal, which was held in great contempt among the Jews. It was worshipped by the Egyptians.

The state of dogs among the Jews was probably the same as it is now in the East; where, having no owners, they run about the streets in troops, and are fed by charity, or by caprice; or they live on such offal as they can pick up. That they were numerous and voracious in Jezebel, is evident from the history of Jezebel. (See that article.)

To compare a person to a dog, living or dead, was a most degrading expression; so David uses it, (1 Sam. xxiv. 14.) "After whom is the king of Israel come out? after a dead dog?" So Mephibosheth, (2 Sam. ix. 8.) "What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?" The name of dog sometimes expresses one who has lost all modesty; one who prostitutest himself to abominable actions; for so several understand the injunction (Deut. xxik. 15.) of not offering "the hire of a whore?" or "the price of a dog?" and Ecclus. xiii. 18, "What fellowship is there between a pure and sanctified person, (Eng. tr. the hyena,) and a dog?"

Our Lord, in Rev. xxi. 15, excludes "dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, and idolaters" from the new Jerusalem. Paul says, "Beware of dogs" (Phil. iii. 2.)—of impudent, sordid, greedy professors; and Solomon, (Prov. xxvi. 11.) and Peter, (2 Pet. ii. 21.) compare sinners, who continually relapse into sins, to dogs returning to their vomit. (6) Mr. Harmer remarks, that "the great external purity which is so studiously attended to by the modern eastern people, as well as the ancient, produces some odd circumstances with respect to their dogs.

They do not suffer them in their houses, and even with care avoid touching them in the streets, which would be considered as a defilement. One would imagine, then, that, under these circumstances, as they do not appear by any means to be necessary in their cities, however important they may be to those that feed flocks, there should be very few of these creatures found in those places. They are, notwithstanding, there in great numbers, and crowd their streets. They do not appear to belong to particular persons, as our dogs do, nor to be fed distinctly by such as might claim some interest in them; but get their food as they can. At the same time, they consider it as right to take some care of them, and the charitable people among them frequently give money every week or month, to butchers and bakers, to feed the dogs at stated times; and some leave legacies at their deaths, for the same purpose. This is Le Bruyn's account; tom. i. p. 361. (Harmer's Obs. i. p. 353.)

DOGS, in the East being thus left to prow about without masters, and get their living generally as they can, from the offals which are cast into the gutters, are often on the point of starvation; and then they devour corpses, and in the night even attack living men. Ps. lx. 6, 15; 1 Kings xiv. 11, 13. "The DOORS, see Gates.

DOPKAH, the ninth or tenth encampment of the Israelites, Num. xxviii. 12. See EXODUS.

Dor, or Doris, in Hebrew, נָפְרָת-דֹּר, heights of Dor, the capital of a district in Canaan, which Joshua conquered and gave to the half-tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, Josh. xii. 23; xvii. 11.

Dor was situated on a peninsula, which, from projecting into the Mediterranean sea, rendered the city extremely strong, and very difficult of attack; especially on the land side. It pretended to be founded by Dor or Dorus, son of Neptune, assumed the title of sacred, and newarchidas; and enjoyed the right of asylum, and of being governed by its own laws.

The modern Dor or Doris is Tortora, and it is about midway between Cressarea Palestina and the bay of Acire. Captain Mangles mentions extensive ruins at Tortora, but says they possess nothing of interest.

DORCAS, Tabitha in Syriac, (the gazelle.) See Tabitha.

DOSITHEUS, an officer in the troops of Judas Maccabaeus, (2 Mac. xii. 19—21, &c.) sent to force the garrison of Charara, in the country of the Tubienians.

DOTHAN, or Dothaim, a town about twelve miles north of Samaria, where Joseph's brethren sold him to the Ishmaelites, Gen. xxxvii. 17. Holofernes' camp extended from Dothain to Belmain, Judith vii. 3.

DOUBLE has many significations in Scripture. "A double garment" may mean a lined habit, such as the high-priest's pectoral; or a complete habit, or suit of clothes, a cloak and a tunic, &c. Double heart, double tongue, double mind, &c. Double, the counterpart to a quantity, to a space, to a measure, &c. which is proposed as the exemplar.
"Double money"—the same value as before, with an equal value added to it, Gen. xiii. 12, 13. If a stolen ox or sheep be found—the thief shall restore double, that is, two oxen, or two sheep. For the right understanding of Isa. xi. 2. "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins"—read, the double of—also that which fits the commensurate quantity, extent, or number of her sins; that which is adequate, all things considered, as a dispensation of punishment. This passage does not mean twice as much as had been deserved, double what was wanted, but the fair, commensurate, adequate retribution. The same is the meaning of this phrase in other places, Is. lx. 7; Jer. xvi. 18; xvii. 18.

DOVE, a tame game bird; in its wild state called a pigeon. It was ordained (Lev. xii. 8) that when a woman went to the temple after child-bearing, she should offer a lamb, and a dove or turtle; or else a young pigeon, or a young turtle, Numb. vi. 16. The lamb was offered as a burnt-offering, the pigeon or turtle as a sin-offering. Or if she could not afford a lamb, then she might offer two pigeons, or two turtles. (See Luke ii. 24.) As it was difficult for all who came from distant places to bring doves with them, the priests permitted the sale of these birds in the courts of the temple. Our Lord one day entered the temple, and with a scourgè of cords drove out those who there traded in pigeons, Matt. xxvi. 1; Mark xi. 15. [In Jer. xxv. 35; xvi. 16; l. 16, the Hebrew word דַּקָּק is also rendered by the Vulgate, dove; but it is here the fem., participle of the verb רָצָא, to oppress, and is used as an adjective, signifying oppressive.] R.

The dove is used as a symbol of simplicity and innocence. Matt. iii. 16; x. 16; Hos. vi. 11, &c. Noch. sent the dove out of the ark, to discover whether the waters of the deluge were abated, Gen. viii. 8, 10. He chose the dove, probably, because it was a tame bird, and savor to carnion and ordure.

DOVES' DUNG. It is said, (2 Kings vi. 25,) that during the siege of Samaria, “the fourth part of a cab [little more than half a pint] of doves' dung was sold for five pieces of silver;” about twelve shillings sterling, or two and a half dollars. It is well known that the dung of a pigeon is not a nourishing food for man, even in the most extreme famine; and hence Josephus and Theodoret were of opinion, that it was bought instead of salt, to serve as a kind of manure for the purpose of raising excellent plants of quick vegetation. The Rev. J. G. Loriquet, of whose excellent opinion we approve, says that, a dove was a kind of chick-pea, lentil, or {tare}, which has very much the appearance of doves' dung, whence it might be named. Great quantities of these are sold in Cairo, to the pilgrims going to Mecca; and at Damascus, Belon says, "there are many shops where nothing else is done but preparing chick-peas. These, parched in a copper pan, and dried, are of great service to those who take long journeys." This may account for the stock of them stored up in the city of Samaria; and the cab would be a fit measure for this kind of pulse, which was the fare of the poorer class of people.

DOWRY. Nothing distinguishes more the nature of marriage among us in Europe, from the same connection when forming in the East, than the different methods of proceeding between the father-in-law and the intended bridegroom. Among us, the father usually gives a portion to his daughter, which becomes the property of her husband; and which often makes a considerable part of his wealth; but in the East, the bridegroom offers to the father of his bride a sum of money, or value to his satisfaction, before he can expect to receive her daughter in marriage. Of this procedure we have instances from the earliest times. When Jacob had nothing which he could immediately give for a wife, he purchased her, by his services,—that which fitted the commensurate quantity, extent, or number of her sins; that which is adequate, all things considered, as a dispensation of punishment. This passage does not mean twice as much as had been deserved, double what was wanted, but the fair, commensurate, adequate retribution. The same is the meaning of this phrase in other places, Is. lx. 7; Jer. xvi. 18; xvii. 18.

DRA., DR. A., DR. A. (Gen. xxxiv. 12). In this passage is mentioned, a distinction still observed in the East: (1.) A dowry to the family, as a token of honor, to engage their favorable interest in the desired alliance: (2.) A gift to the bride herself, e.g. of jewels and other decorations, a compliment of honor, as Abraham's servant gave to Rekabah. We find king Saul (1 Sam. xiii. 25) instead of wishing for a pecuniary part of David, which David was sensible he could not pay in proportion to the value of the bride, required one hundred foreskins of the Philistines, thereby proposing his daughter in reward of value, as Caleb had formerly done his daughter Aishah to whoever should take Kirjath-sepher; that is, he gave her, as a reward of honor, without receiving the accustomed dowry, Josh. xv. 16. The dowry was esteemed so essential, that Moses even orders it, in a case where it might otherwise, perhaps, have been dispensed with: "If a man entice a maid, that is not betrothed, he shall endow her to be his wife?" (Ex. xxi. 16.) he shall make her the usual nuptial present; according to that rank which he holds in the world, and to that station in which his wife is aptly justly be expected to maintain; proportionate also, to that honor which he would have put upon her, had he regularly solicited her family for her; that is, jewels, and other trinkets. "If her father refuse to give her unto thee, take for thee a pledge, according to the dowry of virgins; that is, what the father of a virgin of that rank of life might justly expect should have been offered for his daughter when solicited in marriage. And this we find was the proposal made by Shechem, in repARATION of the injury done to Dinah.

DRACHMA, a piece of money commonly reputed to be equal in value to the denarius; which is stated at seven pence three farthings, or near twelve and a half cents, and a half. Its name is of Arabic origin, and is the true meaning of the word daréma, containing, that in its various forms it uniformly signifies the crocodile; an opinion which can be supported by no authentic facts, and by no legitimate mode of reasoning. Mr. Taylor, who argues at great length for holding the word to amphibious animals, is of opinion that it includes the class of lizards, from the water-nemat to the crocodile, and also the seal, the manta, the morse, &c. His arguments are certainly ingenious and deserving of attention; but they have failed to convince us of the legitimacy of his deductions. The subject is involved in much obscurity, from the apparent latitude with which the word is employed by the sacred writers. In Exod. vii. 3, and seq., Deut. xxxii. 33, and Jer. xlii. 5, it seems to denote a large serpent, or the dragon, properly so called; in Gen. i. 21, Job xii. 13, and Ezek. xxxix. 3, a crocodile, or any large sea animal; and in Lam. iv. 3, and Job xxxiv. 38, the Heb. z signifies some kind of wild beast, most probably the jackal or wolf, as the Arabic fue.
DRAGON

Dagon denotes. It is to the dragon, properly so called, that we shall now direct our attention.

The proper dragon, the Daco volans of Linnaeus, is a harmless species of lizard, found in Asia and Africa, and several species of dragons were formerly distinguished in India; but they are unknown to modern naturalists. 1. Those of the hills and mountains. 2. Those of the valleys and caves. 3. Those of the seas and marshes. The first is the largest, and covered with scales, as resplendent as burnished gold. They have a kind of beard hanging from their lower jaw; their aspect is frightful, their cry loud and shrill, their crest bright yellow, and they have a protruberance on their heads the color of a burning coal. 2. Those of the flat country are of a silver color, and frequent rivers, to which the former never come. 3. Those of the marshes are black, slow, and have no crest. Their bite is not venomous, though the creatures be dreadful.

The following description of the boa is chiefly abstracted and translated from the Notice of the Serpent, by Mr. Taylor, who considers it as the proper dragon of the Scriptures. At any rate, some species of enormous serpent seems to have been intended.

The serpent resembles the lion or the elephant in quadrupeds; he usually reaches twenty feet in length, and to this species we must refer those described by travellers, as lengthened to forty or fifty feet, as related by Owen. Kircher mentions a serpent forty palms in length; and such a serpent is referred to by Ludolph, as extant in Ethiopia. Jerome, in his Life of Hilarion, denounces such a serpent, draco or dragon; saying, that they were called boas, because they could swallow (bore) beews, and waste whole provinces. Bosman says, entire men have frequently been found in the gullets of serpents on the gold coast; but the longest serpent I have read of, is that mentioned by Livy, and by Pliny, which opposed the Roman army under Regulus, at the river Bagrada in Africa. It devoured several of the soldiers; and so hard were its scales, that they resisted darts and spears: at length it was, as it were, besieged, and the military engines were employed against it, as against a fortified city. It was a hundred and twenty feet in length. At Batavia, once a large snake, which had swallowed an entire stag of a large size; and one taken at Bunna had, in like manner, swallowed a negro woman.

From his Travels, says, there are serpents fifty feet long in the island of Java. At Batavia they still keep the skin of one, which, though but twenty feet in length, is said to have swallowed a young maid whole. The serpent quaks, or libya, (hiss,) is unquestionably the biggest of all serpents; some being eighteen, twenty-four, and even thirty feet long, and of the thickness of a man in the middle. The Portuguese call it Cobre de hato, or the roebuck-serpent; because it will swallow a whole roebuck or other deer; and this is performed by sucking it through the throat, which is pretty narrow, but the belly vastly big. Such a one I saw near Paralla, which was thirty feet long, and as big as a barrel. Some negroes accidentally saw it swallow a roebuck, whereupon, thirteen musketeers were sent out, who shot it and cut the roebuck out of its belly. It is not venomous. This serpent, being a very devouring creature, greedy of prey, leaps from among the hedges and woods, and, standing upright on its tail, wrestles both with men and wild beasts; sometimes it leaps from the trees upon the traveller, whom it fastens on, and beats the breath out of his body with its tail.

From this account of the boa, it is, perhaps, not improbable, that John had it in his mind when he describes a prodigious serpent, which was cast into the sea, and devoured a great red dragon. The dragon of antiquity was a serpent of prodigious size, and its most conspicuous color was red; and the apocalyptic dragon strikes vehemently with his tail; in all which particulars it perfectly agrees with the boa. "And there appeared another wonder in heaven, and beheld a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth," Rev. xii. 3, 4, 15-17. The number of heads here given to this creature is certainly apocalyptic; as are also the ten horns, and the seven crowns which are attached to them. But in all these instances, says Paxton, it is presumed that the inspired writer alludes either to historical facts or natural appearances. It is well known, that there is a species of snake called amphisbeena, or double-headed, although one of them is at the tail of the animal, and is only apparent. A kind of serpent, in India, is so often found with two heads growing from one neck, that some have fancied it might form a species; but we have, as yet, no sufficient evidence to warrant such a conclusion. Admitting, however, that a serpent with two heads is an unnatural production, it is very reasonable it might be chosen by the Spirit of God, to be a prototype of the apocalyptic monster.

The horns seem to refer to the cerastes or horned snake, the boa or proper dragon having no horn. But this enormous creature has a crest of bright yellow, and a protruberance on his head, in color like a burning coal, which naturally enough suggests the idea of a crown. The remaining particulars refer to facts in the history of the boa, or other serpents. The tail of the great red dragon, according to the Scripture, did part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth. The boa frequently kills his victim with a stroke of his tail. Stedman mentions an adventure in his "Expedition to Surinam," which furnishes a very clear and striking illustration of this power of the serpent. He repels the ferocious snakes, which, though it certainly differs from the red dragon of Asia and Africa, combines several particulars connected with our purpose. He had not gone from his boat above twenty yards, through the jungle, when he discovered a snake rolled up under the fallen leaves and rubbish of the trees; and so well covered, that it was some time before he distinctly perceived the head of the monster, distant from him not above sixteen feet, moving its forked tongue, while its eyes, from their uncommon brightness, appeared to emit sparks of fire. He now fired; but missing the head, the ball went through the body, when the animal struck round, and with such astonishing force, as to cut away all the underwood around him, with the facility of a scythe moving grasses, and by fomenting his tail, caused the mud and dirt to fly over his head to a considerable distance. He returned, in a short time, to the attack, and found the snake a little removed from its former station, but very quiet, with his head as before, lying out among the fallen leaves, rotten boughs, and old moss. He fired at him immediately; and now, being but slightly wounded, he sent out such a cloud of dust and dirt, as our author declares he never saw but in a whirlwind. At the third fire, the snake was shot through the head; all the negroes present declared it to be but a young one, about half grown, although, on measuring, he found it twenty-two feet and some inches, and its diameter shone to be a black boy, who might be about twelve years old.

These circumstances account for the sweeping destruction which the tail of the apocalyptic dragon effected among the stars of heaven. The allegorical incident has its foundation in the nature and structure of the literal dragon. The only other circumstance which requires explanation is the flood of water ejected by the dragon, after he had failed in accomplishing the destruction of the woman and her seed. The venom of poisonous serpents is commonly ejected by a perforation in the fangs, or cheek teeth, in the act of biting. We learn, however, from several facts, that serpents have a power of throwing out of their mouth a quantity of fluid of an injurious nature. The quantity cast out by the great red dragon, is, in proportion to his immense size, and is called a flood or stream, which the earth, helping the woman, opened her mouth to receive. Gregory, the friend of Ludolph, says, in his History of Ethiopia, "We have in our possession a sort of arm. He is of a glowing red color, but somewhat brownish. This animal has an offensive breath, and ejects a poison so venomous and stinking, that a man or beast within the reach of it, is sure to perish quickly, unless immediate resistance be given.

At Moruya, a great snake being half under a heap of stones and half out, a man cut it in two, at the part which was out among the stones; and as soon as the heap was removed, the reptile, turning, made up to the man, and split such venom into his face, as quite blinded him, and so he continued some days, but at last recovered his sight."
The word dragon is sometimes used in Scripture to designate the devil, (Rev. xii. 3; Job.) probably on account of his great power, and vindictive cruelty; though not without reference to the circumstances attending the original definition of mankind.

DREAM. The eastern people, and in particular the Jews, greatly regarded dreams, and applied for their interpretation to those who undertook to explain them. We see the antiquity of this custom in the history of Pharaoh's baker and baker, (Gen. xl.) and Pharaoh himself, and Nebuchadnezzar, are also instances. God expressly forbade his people from observing dreams, and from consulting explainers of them. He condemned to death all who pretended to explain them, either in dreams or in oracles, even though what they foretold came to pass, if they had any tendency to promote idolatry, Deut. xiii. 1-3. But they were not forbidden, when they thought they had a significative dream, to address the prophets of the Lord, or the high-priest in his episcopal capacity, have it explained. Saul, before the battle of Gibbon, consulted a woman who had a familiar spirit, "because the Lord would not answer him by dreams, nor by prophets," 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 7. The Lord frequently discovered his will in dreams, and enabled the persons to explain them. The Midianites gave credit to dreams, as appears from that which a Midianite related to his companion; and from whose interpretation Gideon took a happy omen, Judg. vii. 13, 15. The prophet Jeremiah (xxii. 23, 24, 26) explains against impostors who pretended to have had dreams, and abused the credulity of the people. The prophet Joel (ii. 28) promises from God, that in the reign of the Messiah, the effusion of the Holy Spirit should be so copious, that the old men should have prophetic dreams, and the young men should receive visions. The words are confirmed, likewise, by the extent which they held in imagination while we sleep, which have no relation to prophecy, Job xx. 8; Isa. xxix. 17. (See also Eccl. v. 3, 7.)

Dreams should be carefully distinguished from visions: the former occurred during sleep, and, therefore, were liable to much ambiguity and uncertainty; the latter, when the person, being awake, retains possession of his natural powers and faculties. God spoke to Abimelech in a dream—but to Abraham by vision. Jacob saw in a dream the method of producing certain effects on his cattle; and God told Laban, in a dream, not to injure Jacob. Now, in these and other instances of dreams, the subjects dreamed of appear to be the very matters which had occupied the minds of these men while awake; and, when asleep, Providence overruled, or improved their natural cogitations, to answer particular purposes. But in the case of visions, the thing seen was unexpected; the mind was not prepared for it, nor could it be explained in details, as dreams are, at least, so nearly about to occur. But to fix the distinction between visions and dreams, we do not recollect more appropriate instances than those furnished by the book of Job. The vision is thus described, chap. iv. 12. "Now a thing was brought to me, and my ear heard a little thereof." In thoughts from, of, visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. Then a spirit passed before my face, the hair of my flesh stood up: it stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof; an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice, 5th. That is, his senses were in exercise, but the image was too fine, too aerial, for his complete discernment of it: his bodily organs were not defective, but the subject surpassed their powers;—probably the prophet had additional or superior powers bestowed on them, when they were enabled to behold visions. Now, a dream is described (chap. xxxiii. 15,) as happening when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed. Perhaps it is neither easy nor necessary to distinguish, always, when the word dream is used, whether it may not denote a vision, but it should seem likely that when the agency of an angel is mentioned, that then more than a mere dream is implied: so to Jacob, (Gen. xxxi. 11;) and to Joseph, Matthew i. 20; ii. 13, 19.

DRESSES, OF GARMENTS. The Hebrews wore a coat, or waistcoat, tunic, called φόρταν, πυρήνη; and a cloak, called ἄνδρος, χλωρός. The coat was their under garment, next the skin, and the cloak their upper one. These two garments made what Scripture calls a change of raiment, (2 Kings v. 13, 22) such as those of Samson, and as presents to Elisah. The coat was commonly of linen; and the cloak of stuff, or woollen; and as this was only a great piece of stuff, not cut, there were often many made, each of a single piece, of which they used to make presents. (1 Kings ii. 18; Ps. lxxxiv. 16.) The Hebrews never changed the fashion of their clothes, that we know of; but they dressed after the manner... of the country in which they dwelt. A white color, or a purple, was in the most esteem among them. Solomon, as we read in the book of Proverbs (Eccle. ix. 8), to let his garments be always white; and Josephus observes of this prince, that, being the most splendid and magnificent of kings, he was commonly clothed in bright and white garments. Angels generally appeared in white; and in our Saviour's transfiguration, his clothes appeared as white as snow.

It is well known that Christians newly baptized, immediately after the rite, put on white garments, a custom, as we are told, to be observed to holiness and piety. These garments they wore at least a week publicly. Hence we read in the Revelation of those who had washed their robes and made them white; and of those who should walk with the Lamb, in white, being worthy; and of being clothed in white raiment, as a mark of having overcome the world. This token of joy and gratulation was familiar at the time; and to a certain degree it is so still. Most virgins, when newly married, wear white; and that is thought becoming in them which, in a widow who re-married, would be deemed affectation.

Mention is made in Scripture of a coat of many colors, (Gen. xxxvii. 3,) with which Joseph was clothed; as also Tamar, the wife of Judah, (2 Sam. xiii. 18,) but interpreters are divided about the signification of this word. Some translate it by a long gown, reaching to the ankles, tallaris, and this is the more probable sense; others, by a gown striped with several colors; and others by a gown with large sleeves. The Arabsians wear very wide sleeves to their coats, having a very large opening at the end, which hangs sometimes down to the ground; but at the shoulder they are much narrower.

Some coats were without seams, woven in a loom, and had no openings, either at the breast, or on the sides; but only at the top, to let the head through. Such, probably, were the coats of the priests, (Exod. xxviii. 32,) and that of our Lord, (John xix. 23,) which the soldiers would not divide, but chose rather to cast lots for. The women formerly made the stuffs and cloth, not only for their own clothes, but also for their husbands and children, Prov. xxxi. 13.

Moses informs us (Deut. viii. 4,) that the clothes worn by the Hebrews in the wilderness did not wear out. "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years." Justin Martyr, and some interpreters, following the rabbinists, take these words literally, and think that not only the clothes of the Israelites did not grow old, or wear out, but also that those of the children grew with them, and constantly fitted them at every age! But others think, with much greater probability, that Moses intended only that God so effectually provided them with necessaries, that they did not want clothes, nor had been forced to wear old or ragged clothes in all their journey.

To distinguish the Israelites from other people, the Lord commanded them to wear tuffs, or fringes, at the four corners of their upper garments, of a blue color, and a border of galoaon on the edges, Num. xv. 38; Deut. xxii. 12. From Matt. ii. 20, we see that our Saviour wore these fringes; for the woman who had the issue of blood, promised herself a cure, if she touched him, that is, the fringe, of his garment. The Pharisees, still further to distinguish themselves, wore these borders, or fringes, longer than others, Matt. xxii. 5. Jerome adds, that to make a show of greater austerity, they fastened thorns to their robes, that when the sun shone on their naked legs, they might be reminded of the law of God.

The garments of mourning among the Hebrews were sack-cloth and hair-cloth; and their color dark brown, or black. As the prophets were penitent by profession, their common clothing was mourning. Widows, also, dressed themselves much the same. Judith fisted every day, except on festival days, and the sabbath day, and wore a hair-cloth next her skin, Judith viii. 6. The prophet Elias, (2 Kings i. 7,8,) and John the Baptist, (Matt. iii. 4,) were clothed in skins or coarse stuffs, and wore girdles of leather. Paul says, (Heb. xi. 37,) that the prophets wore (melodus) sheep-skins, or goat-skins. The false prophets put on habits of mourning and penitence, the better to deceive the people, Zech. xiii. 4.

It is well known that red-colored garments were the usual dresses worn by the frantic Baccantes. It is not, then, without a specific object, that the writer of the Revelation describes the woman—the prostitute—the mother of harlots, as "arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls—having a golden cup in her hand—and drunken with the blood of the saints, and of the martyrs," chap. xvii. His original readers would understand what power it was which the merchants of the earth lamened, as no longer purchasing her luxuries.

Presents of dresses are alluded to very frequently in the historical books of Scripture, and in the earliest times. When Joseph gave to each of his brethren a change of raiment, and to Benjamin five changes, it is mentioned without particular notice, and as a customary incident, Gen. xlv. 22. Naaman gave to Gehazi, from among the presents intended for Elisha, who declined accepting any, two changes of raiment; and even Solomon received raiment as presents, 2 Chron. ix. 24. This custom is still maintained in the East, and is mentioned by most travelers. The following extract from De la Motraye, notices, as a peculiarity, that the grand seignior gives his garment of honor before the wearer is admitted to his presence; while the vizier gives his honorary dresses after the presentation. This will, perhaps, apply to the parable of the wedding garment, and to the behavior of the king, who expected to have found all his guests clad in robes of honor, (Matt. xxii. 11,) as also to Zech. iii. where Joshua, being introduced to the angel of the Lord, stood before the angel with filthy garments; who ordered a handsome robe to be given to him. Jonathan divested himself of his robe, and his upper garment, even to his sword, his bow, and his girdle—partly intending David the greater honor, as having been apparel worn by himself; but principally, as it may be conjectured, through haste and speed, he being impelled of honoring David, and coveting the armament of his affection. Jonathan would not stay to send for raiment, but instantly gave David his own. The idea of honor connected with the cæstum, appears also in the prodigal's father,—"being forth, I have given to him that was in want;" We find the liberality in the kindest gifts was considerable.—Exra ii. 60, "The chief of the fathers gave one hundred priests' garments." Neh. vii. 70. "The Tirshatha gave five hundred and thirty priests' garments."—This would appear sufficiently singular among us; but in the East, to give is to honor, or the gift of garments, or of any other usable commoditives, is in perfect compliance with established sentiments and customs. "The vizier entered at another door, and their excellencies rose to salute him after their manner, which was returned by a little inclining of the head; after which he sat down on the corner of his sofa, which is the most honorable place; then his chancellor, his khatia, and the chinoz bakhew, came and stood before him, till coffee was brought in; after which M. de Chateauneuf presented M. de Ferriol to him, as his successor, who delivered him the king his master's letters, complimenting him as from his majesty and himself, to which the vizier answered very obligingly; then they gave two dishes of coffee to their excellencies, with sweetmeats, and afterwards the perfumes and sherbet; then they clothed them with caffetans of a silver brocade, with large silk flowers; and to those that were admitted into the apartments with them they gave others of brocade, almost all silk, except some slight gold or silver flowers; according to the custom usually observed towards all foreign ministers." (De la Motraye's Travels, page 190.) "Caffetans are long vests of gold or silver brocade, flowered with silk; with the grand seignior, and the vizier, present to those to whom they give audience; the grand seignior, before, and the vizier after, audience." Idem.

Very few English readers, however, are sufficiently aware of the importance attached to the donation of robes of honor in the East. They mark the degree of estimation in which the party bestowing them holds the party receiving them; and sometimes the conferring or withholding of them leads to very serious negotiation, and misunderstandings.

For some remarks on, and descriptions of, the dresses of the bride and bridgroom in Solomon's Song, see the article Canticles. Mr. Taylor has devoted much labor in attempts to elucidate several passages of Scripture in which articles of dress are spoken of; but as his speculations do not admit of abridgment, we can only thus refer to them.

To DRINK. This phrase is used sometimes properly, sometimes figuratively. Its proper sense needs no explanation. The wise man exhorts his disciple (Prov. v. 15) to "drink water out of his own cistern;" to content himself with the lawful pleasures of marriage, without wandering in his affections. To eat and drink is used in Ecclesiastes v. 18, to signify people living in the world; and in the gospel for living in a common and ordinary manner, Matt. xi. 18. "The apostles say, they ate and drank with Christ after his resurrection; that is, they conversed, and lived in their usual manner, free of, with him, Acts x. 11." This excludes the Jews with having had recourse to Egypt for muddy water to drink, and to Assyro, to drink the water of their river; that is, the water of the Nile and of the Euphrates; meaning, soliciting the assistance of those people. To drink blood, signifies to be satiated with slaughter, Ezek. xxxix. 18. Our Lord commands us to drink his blood and to eat his flesh: (John vi.) we eat and drink both figuratively, in the eucharist. To drink water by measure, (Ezek. iv. 11.) and to buy water to drink; (Lam. v. 4.) denote extreme scarcity and degradation. On fasting days the Jews abstained from drinking during the whole day, believing it to be equally of the essence of a fast, to suffer thirst as to suffer hunger.

DROMEDARY, a species of smaller camel, having on its back a kind of natural saddle, composed of two great hunches. Persons of quality in the East generally use dromedaries for speech; and we are assured that some of them can travel a hundred miles a day. The animal is governed by a bridle, which, being usually fastened to a ring fixed in the nose, may very well illustrate the expression, (2 Kings xix. 35.) of putting a hook into the nose of Steenbergh, and may be the further application to his swift retreat. (Isa. lx. 6.) calls this creature, as Bochart believes, bicerath. Bicerath, the feminine of bicer, is taken for a dromedary, in Jer. ii. 23, by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. Bonaparte, when commanding the French army in Egypt, formed a military corps mounted on dromedaries. See further under Camel.

DRUNK, DRUNKENNESS, a well known and debasing indisposition, produced by excessive drinking. The first instance of intoxication on record is that of Noah, (Gen. ix. 21.) who was probably igno- rant of the effects of the expressed juice of the grape. The sin of drunkenness is most expressly condemned in the Scriptures, Deut. xiii. 1, 5; 1 Cor. vi. 13; 1 Thess. v. 23; Eph. v. 18; 1 Thess. v. 7, 8. Men are sometimes represented as drunk with sorrow, with afflictions, and with the wine of God's wrath, Isa. xi. 6; Jer. ii. 37; Ezek. xxii. 33. Persons under the influence of superstition, idolatry, and delusion, are said to be drunk, because they make no use of their natural reason, Isa. xxviii. 7; Rev. xvii. 2. Drunkenness sometimes denotes abundance, safety, Deut. xxxii. 42; Isa. xlix. 26. To "add drunkenness to thirst," (Deut. xix. 19,) is to add one sin to another; i.e. not only pine in secret after idol-worship, but openly practise it. (See Stuart's Heb. Chrest. on this passage.)

DRUSILLA, the youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa I and sister of the younger Agrippa and of Bernice, celebrated for her beauty and infamous for her licentiousness. She was first espoused to Epilephas, son of Antiochus, king of Comagena, on condition of his embracing the Jewish religion; but as he afterwards refused to be circumcised, Drusilla was given in marriage by her brother to Azizus, king of Emessus. When Felix came as governor of Judea, he persuaded her to abandon her husband and her religion, and become his wife. Paul bore testimony before them to the truth of the Christian religion, Acts xxix. 24. (See Joseph. Ant. xix. 9. 1; xx. 7. 1, 12.)

DUKE. This word, being a title of honor in use in Great Britain, and signifying a higher order of nobility, is apt to mislead the reader, who, in Gen. xxxvi. 15, finds the Egyptians of Eton; but the word duke, from the Latin dux, merely signifies a leader or chief, and the word chief ought rather to have been preferred in our translation. (See 1 Chron. i. 31.)

DULCEMIER, (Dan. iii. 5, 10,) an instrument of music, as is usually thought; but the original word, which is Greek, (συμφωνία, symphony,) renders it doubtful whether it really mean a musical instrument, or a musical strain, chorus, or accompaniment of many voices, or instruments, in concert and harmony. It is difficult to account for the introduction of this Greek word into the Chaldee language, unless we suppose that some musicians from Greece, or from western Asia, had been taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, in his victories over the cities on the coast of the Mediterranean, and that these introduced certain of their own terms of art among the king's band of music; as we now use much of the language of Italy in our musical entertainments.

[The rabbins describe the tunqegro of Daniel as a sort of bagpipe, composed of two pipes connected with a long, and of a harsh, screaming sound. Even at the present day, the common pipe, or shalm of the common people, (nearly resembling the hautboy,) is in Italy called tunqeggio, and in Asia Minor samagou. The declarer, by which the Hebrew is improperly rendered in the English version, is an instrument of a triangular form, strong with about fifty wires, and struck with an iron key, while lying on a table before the performer. It is confined mostly to puppet shows and itinerant musicians. R. I. DUMAH, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 92.]

II. DUMAH, a tribe and country of the Ishmaelites in Arabia, Gen. xxv. 14; Isa. xxi. 11. This is doubtless the same which is still called by the Arabs Duma the strong, the Syrios Duma, situated on the confines of the Arabian and Syrian desert, with a fortress. (See Gesenius Lex. Heb. Man. Let. Niebuhr's Arabia, p. 364.) R.

DUMR. (1.) One unable to speak by reason of natural infirmity, Exod. iv. 11. (2.) One unable to speak by reason of want of knowledge we do not say, or how to say it; what proper mode of address to use, or what reasons to allege on his own behalf, Prov. xxxi. 8. (3.) One unwilling to speak, Ps. xxxix. 9. We have a remarkable instance of this venerating silence, or silence, in the case of Aaron, (Lev. x. 3) after Nadab and Abihu, his sons, were consumed by fire. "Aaron held his peace;" he did not exclaim against the justice of God, but saw the propriety of the divine procedure, and humbly acquiesced in it.

DUNG. The directions given to the prophet Ezekiel, (chap. iv. 12—16) have been much misunderstood, and have also given occasion for many imper- sonal remarks. In the following observations, the Æquinoctiam of Voltaire on this subject is set in a just light—

"Monsieur Voltaire seems to be extremely scandalized at this circumstance, for he has repeated the objection over and over again in his writings. He supposes somewhere that denying the providence of God is synonymous with impiety; in other places he supposes the prophetic intimation to Ezekiel, that he should prepare his bread with human dung, as expressive of the hardships Israel were about to undergo, could not come from God, being incompatible with his majesty; God, then, it naturally follows, never did reduce by his providence any poor mortals into such a state, as to be obliged to use human dung in preparing their bread; never could do it. But those who are acquainted with the calamities of human life will not be so positive on this point, as this lively Frenchman. To make the objection as strong as possible, by raising the disgust of the elegant part of the world to the greatest height, he, with his usual ingenuousness, supposes that the dung was to be eaten with the bread prepared after this manner, which would form an admirable concoction. Comme il n'est point d'usage de manger des selles contrefaites sur son pain, la pluspart des hommes trouvent ces commandements indignes de la Majesté Divine. (La Raison par Alphabet, Art. Ezekiel.) The eating bread baked by the fire would contribute to make it more certainly be great misery, though the ashesses were swept and blown off with care; but they could hardly be said to eat a composition of bread and human excrements. With the same kind of liberty, he tells us that cow-dung is sometimes eaten through all desert Arabia, (Lettre du Traducteur du Cantique des Cantiques,) which is only true as explained to mean nothing more than that their bread is not frequently baked under the sun; but, is eating bread so baked eating cow-dung?" (Harmen, Observations.)

As every reader may not be acquainted with the ordinary usages of the East, a few remarks may suggest the value of fire, i.e. fuel; which in all parts of Asia is considerable, and in some districts excessive, while they will tend to set the passages in the prophet in its true light.

"In Arabia," says Niebuhr, (vol. i. p. 91.) "the dung of asses and camels is chiefly used for fuel, because these two species are the most numerous and common. Little girls go about, gathering the dung in the streets and upon the highways; they mix it with cut straw; and of this mixture make cakes, which they place along the walls, or upon the declivity of some neighboring eminence, to dry them in the sun." But this is cleanliness itself compared with the accounts of Tournesfort, (vol. iii. p. 187,) who reports of Georgias,—"where our tents were pitched, and where we passed for the first time the holiday of the Persians, in a glade on the plains of Persia [we could see] a great many pretty considerable villages; but all this fine country yields not one single tree, and they are forced to burn cows' dung. Oxen are very common here, and they breed them as well for their dung as for their meat." Speaking of Erzerum, he says, (page 95.) "Besides the sharpness of the winters, what makes Erzeroum very unpleasant, is the scarcity and dearness of wood; nothing but pine wood is known there, and that they fetch two or three days' journey from the town; all the rest of the country is quite naked—you see neither tree nor bush; and their common fuel is cows' dung, which they make into turds; but they are not comparable to those our tanners use at Paris; much less to those prepared in Provence of the barks of the olive. I don't doubt better fuel might be found, in the country is not wanting in minerals; but the people are used to their cow-dung, and will not give themselves the trouble to dig for it. 'Tis almost inconceivable what a horrid perfume this dung makes in the houses, which can be compared to nothing but fox-holes, especially the country houses; every thing they eat has a stench of this vapor; their cream would be admirable but for this putrefaction; and one might eat very well among them, if they had wood for the dressing their butchers' meat, which is very good."
DUS [388] DUST

This country, without trouble, and at a small expense. They even apply human dung in this way."... This was in Persia also.

The accounts from Tournefort and Le Bruyn, who are describing much the same country, deserve our marked attention, as likely to illustrate the history of the prophet Ezekiel. Le Bruyn assures us that human dung is used to heat ovens for the purpose of baking food, (consequently Mr. Harmer misleads, when he says, "no nation made use of that horrid kind of fuel," and against this Ezekiel remonstrates and petitions, till he procures leave to use a fuel, which, though bad enough, is not quite so bad. Does the prophet's solicitation for his personal relief from that defilement, imply his hope of the same alleviation, in respect to the whom he typified? i.e. the Jewish people. It may also be asked, whether the custom, mentioned by Le Bruyn, may not tend to determine in what country the prophet resided at this time?—It is clear, he remarks, that he did not live constantly at Babylon, though involved in the Babylonish captivity; and if he were carried to, and stationed on, the confines of Persia, near to Georgia, then, possibly, in this very neighborhood, he received the command which has been so unjustly commented on by Voltaire; which appears so very unintelligible, or so very wretched to us; but which would excite no astonishment in the country where it was given. Perhaps Ezekiel, or his fellow Jews, unaccustomed to this usage, were the only persons likely to be scandalized at it. Let this consideration have its due force.

DUNGHILL. We are informed by Plutarch, that the Syrians were affected with a particular disease characterized by violent pains of the bones, ulcerations over the whole body, swelling of the feet and abdomen, and wasting of the liver. This madness was in general referred to the anger of the gods; but was supposed to be more especially inflicted by the Syrian goddess, on those who had eaten some kinds of fish deemed sacred to her. In order to appease the offended divinity, the persons affected by this disorder were taught by the priests to put on sackcloth, or old tattered garments, and to sit on a dunghill; or to roll themselves naked in the dirt as a sign of humiliation and contrition for their offence. (Menander apud Porphyrium: Plut. de Superstitions: Persius, Sat. v.; Marcus Epigraph. iv. 4.) This will be the reader of Job's conduct under his affliction, and that of other persons mentioned in Scripture as rolling themselves in the dust, &c.

DURA, a great plain near Babylon, where Nebuchadnezzar erected a colossal image of gold to be worshipped, Dan. iii. 1. See BABYLON.

DUST. The Hebrews, when mourning, strewn dust or ashes on their heads, (Josh. vii. 6) and in their afflictions sat in the dust; or threw themselves on their faces on the ground, Isa. xlv. 1.

Our Saviour commanded his apostles to shake the dust from off their feet against those who would not hearken to them, or receive them; to show that they desired to have no intercourse with them, and that they gave them up to God's judgment. "And hardness of heart, Matt. x. 14; Mark vi. 11; Luke ix. 5.

RAI N OF DUST. In Deut. xxviii, 24. God threatens to punish Israel severely, by a rain of dust. It may not be inferred from a little ignorance of dust, and properties of such a kind of rain; and in this the following extracts may assist. "Sometimes the wind blows very high in those hot and dry seasons [in Israel]—raising up into the air, to a very great height, thick clouds of dust and sand. These dry showers most grievously annoy all those among whom they fall; enough to unite them all with a present blindness; filling their eyes, ears, and nostrils; and their mouths are not free, if they be not also well guarded; searching every place, as well within as without our tents or houses; so that there is not a little key-hole of any trunk, or cabinet, if it be not covered, but receives some of that dust into it; the dust forced to find a lodging anywhere, every where, being so driven and forced as it is by the extreme violence of the wind." (Sir T. Roe's Embassy, p. 373.)

To the same purpose speaks Herbert: (p. 167). "And now the danger is past, let me tell you, most part of the last night we crossed over an inhospitable, sandy desert, where here and there we beheld the ground covered with a loose flying sand, which, by the fury of the winter weather, is accumulated into such heaps upon it, upon any great wind, the track is lost; and passengers (too oft) overwhelmed and stifled: yea, camels, horses, mules, and other beasts, though strong, swift, and steady in their going, are not able to shift for themselves, but perish without their instance; yea, running sands, when agitated by the winds, move and remove more like sea than land, and render the way very dreadful to passengers. Indeed, in this place I thought that curse fulfilled, where the Lord, by Moses, threatened instead of rain to give them showers of dust.

These instances are in Persia; but such storms might be known to the Israelites; as, no doubt, they occur also on the sandy deserts of Arabia, east of Judea; and to this agree Tournefort, who says, "As Gehtsii there arose a tempest of sand; in the same manner as it happens sometimes in Arabia, and in Egypt; especially in the spring. It was raised by a very hot south wind, which drove so much sand, that one of the gates of the Kervennas ray was half stopped up with it; and the way could not be found, being covered over, above a foot deep; the sand lying on all hands. This sand was extremely fine, and salt, and was very troublesome to our eyes, even in the Kervennas ray, where all our baggage was covered over with it. The storm lasted from noon to sunset; and it was so very hot the night following, without any wind, that one could hardly fetch breath; which, in my opinion, was caused by the action of the heat and rain upon each other. Next day I felt a great pain in one eye, which made it smart, as if salt had been melted into it," &c. Pt. ii. p. 338.

This may give us a lively idea of the penetrating powers of the dust, which Moses took, and sprinkled up toward heaven and (being driven by the wind to all parts, and entering 'anywhere, and every where') it became a boil breaking forth in blains upon man, and upon beast... the boil was even on the magicians, and on all the Egyptians." The phraseology "from heaven shall it come down upon thee," deserves notice; since we read that hardness of heart, the air only: why may it not be so taken where other things are said to come down from thence? as rain, fire, lightning, hail, &c. &c. Gen. vii. 11; xix. 24; xlix. 25; Josh. x. 11, &c.

The following extracts from the journal of Mr. Buckingham; it renders certain, what is above left as a conjecture: "Suez.—After having travelled all the morning in the bed of the ancient canal that formerly connected the Red sea with the Mediterranean ... we had entered upon a loose, shifting sand; here we found the sand turned into a sea of sand, perfect and dry, its surface incrusted over with a strong salt. On leaving the site of these now evaporated lakes, we entered upon a loose and shifting sand again, like that which Pliny describes when speaking of the roads from Pelusium, across the sands of the desert; in which, he says, unless there be reeds stuck in the ground to point out the line of direction, the way could not be found, because the wind blows up the sand, and covers the footsteps. The morning was delightful on our setting out, and promised us a fine day; but the light airs from the south soon increased to a gale, the sun became obscure, and as every hour brought us into a looser sand, it flew around us in such whirlwinds, with the sudden gusts that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted, therefore, for an hour, and took shelter under the lee of our beasts, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered in their wallings but a melancholy symphony. I know not whether it was the novelty of the situation that gave it additional horrors, or whether the habit of magnifying evils to which we are unaccustomed, had increased its effect; but certain it is, that fifty gales of wind at sea appeared to me more easy to be encountered than one amongst these sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete; we could see neither sun, earth, nor sky; the plain at ten paces distance was absolutely imperceptible: our beasts, as well as ourselves, were so covered as to render breathing difficult; they hid their faces in the ground, and we could only uncover our own for a moment, to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait impatiently for its abatement. Alexander’s journey to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and the destruction of the Persian armies of Cambyses, in the Libyan desert, rose to my recollection with new impressions, made by the horror of the scene before me; while Addison’s admirable lines, which I also remembered with peculiar force on this occasion, seemed to possess as much truth as beauty:

Lo, where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden the impetuous hurricanes descend;
Which through the air in circling eddies play,
Their muffled noise terrors, and their slay.
They scatter home the flocks, their prey.
The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And, smothered in the dusty whirlwind, dies.

“The few hours we remained in this situation were passed in unbroken silence: every one was occupied with his own reflections, as if the reign of terror forbade communication. Its fury spent itself, like the storms of ocean, in sudden lulls and squalls: but it was not until the third or fourth interval that our fears were sufficiently conquered to address each other; nor shall I soon lose the recollection of the impressive manner in which that was done. ‘Allah kereem!’ exclaimed the poor Bedouin, although habit had familiarized him with these resistless blasts. ‘Allah kereem!’ repeated the Egyptians, with terrified solemnity; and both my servant and myself, as if by instinct, joined in the general exclamation. The bold imagery of the eastern poets, describing the Deity as avenging in his anger, and terrible in his wrath, riding upon the wings of the wind, and breathing his fury in the storm, must have been inspired by scenes like these.”

There is a remarkable figurative representation in Job, (chap. xxx. 22,) thus rendered in our translation: “Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissipost my substance?” but it is probable that after we have examined the phraseology of the passage, its force may be further evident; and it may receive additional illustration. “Thou dost raise me up on high, into the air, by the agency of, upon the wind; thou dost make me to ride on it, as on a chariot, or other vehicle; and dost disperse, dissipate, my whole, my all; all that I ever was; all that I ever possessed.” Such is the power of the original, which might perhaps be referred to a vapor, raised by the wind, which, after being borne about among the clouds, is dissolved, and falls in dew: but, (1.) the wind which raises it seems rather to describe a storm, and during storms dew does not perceptibly rise. (2.) The current of wind, which, like a chariot, bears away the subject of its power, is a vehement, powerful, rapid blast; as we say, a high wind; and does not agree with the formation of dew, which is a tranquil, deliberate process. The word (מָי, Mīy, margin,) is applied to express the melting of a solid body; as of the earth with rain, (Ps. lxvii.) and of the hills through intense heat, Nahum i. 5; so Amos ix. 13. Mr. Scott has rendered the passage,

Roused by almighty force a furious storm
Upcaught me, whirled me on its eddying gust,
Then dashed me down, and shattered me to dust.

Under these considerations, we may, perhaps, refer the passage to a sand storm; possibly, such as that described by Mr. Buckingham, or such as is described by the following information, which the reader will not be displeased to peruse, as it stands high among the most picturesque and most terrible descriptions of the kind to be met with. “On the 14th, at seven in the morning, we left Assa Nagga, our course being due north. At one o’clock we alighted among some acacia-trees at Wandi el Halbon, having gone twenty-one miles. We were here at once surprised and terrified by a sight surely one of the most magnificent in the world. In that vast expanse of desert, from W. and to N. W. of us, we saw a number of prodigious piliars of sand at different distances, at times moving with great celebrity, at others stalking on with a majestic slowness; at intervals we thought they were coming in a very few minutes to overwhelm us; and small quantities of sand did actually more than once reach us. Again they would retreat so as to be almost out of sight, their course look- ing to the very clouds. There the tops often separated from the bodies; and these, once disjointed, dispersed in the air, and did not appear more. Sometimes they were broken near the middle, as if struck with a large cannon shot. About noon they began to advance with considerable swiftness upon us, the wind being very strong at north. Eleven of them ranged alongside of us about the distance of three miles. The greatest diameter of the largest appeared to me at that distance as if it would measure one foot. They retired from us with a wind at S. E. leaving an impression upon my mind to which I can give no name; though surely one ingredient in it was fear, with a considerable deal of wonder and astonishment. It was in vain to think of flying; the swiftest horse, or fastest sailing ship, could be of no use to carry us out of this danger, and the full persuasion of this riveted me as if to the spot where I stood, and let the camels gain on me so much in my state of lameness, that it was with some difficulty I could overtake them. The whole of our company were much disheartened, except Idries, and Issi; and it was noticed that they were advancing into whirlwinds of moving sand, from which they should never be able to extricate themselves; but before four o'clock in the afternoon, these phantoms of the plain had all of them fallen to the ground and disappeared. In the evening we came to Waadi Dimokes, where we passed the night, much disheartened, and our fear more increased, when we found, upon waking in the morning, that one side was perfectly buried in the sand that the wind had blown above us in the night. The sun, shining through the pillars, which were thicker, and contained more sand apparently than any of the preceding days, seemed to give those nearest us an appearance as if spotted with stars of gold. I do not think at any time they seemed to be nearer than two miles. The most remarkable circumstance was, that the sand seemed to keep in that vast circular space surrounded by the Nile on our left, in going round by Clasciug towards Dongola, and seldom was observed much to the eastward of a meridian passing along the Nile through the Magiran, before it takes that turn; whereas the simoon was always on the opposite side of our course, coming upon us from the south-east. The same appearance of moving pillars of sand presented themselves to us this day, in form and disposition like those we had seen at Waadi Halbour, only they seemed to be more in number, and less in size. They came several times in a direction close upon us; but I, believe, within less than two miles. They began, immediately after sunrise, like a thick wood, and almost darkened the sun: his rays, shining through them for near an hour, gave them an appearance of pillars of fire. (Bruce's Travels, vol. iv. p. 580—585.)

If this conjecture be admissible, we see a magnificence in this imagery, not apparent before; we see how Job's dignity might be exalted in the air; might rise to great grandeur, importance, and even terror, in the sight of beholders; might ride upon the wind, which bears it about, causing it to advance, or to recede; and, after all, the wind, diminishing, might disperse, melt, scatter, this pillar of sand, into the undistinguished level of the desert. This comparison seems to be precisely adapted to the mind of an Arab, who must have seen similar phenomena in the countries around him.

(To ride upon the wind, signifies in Arabic, "to be carried away suddenly." Instead of "thou destroyest my substance," others, as Codrus, translate; "thou causest my prosperity to melt away;" or if the Kethib be followed, "thou causest me to melt away, thou terrifyest me." But the common version, as above illustrated, seems to be preferable. R.)

EAGLE

EAGLE. By the Hebrews, the eagle was called |xxii, the lacerator; and as this species of birds is eminent for rapacity, and tearing their prey in pieces, the propriety of the designation is sufficiently obvious.

There are several kinds of the eagle described by naturalists, and it is probable that the Hebrew masher comprehends more than one of these. The largest and noblest species with which we are acquainted, is that called by Mr. Bruce, "the golden eagle," and by the Ethiopians, "Abou Aouch," or father long-beard, from a tuft of hair which grows below his beak. From wing to wing, this bird measures eight feet four inches; and from the tip of his tail to the point of his beak, when dead, four feet seven inches. Of all known birds, the eagle flies not only the highest, but also with the greatest rapidity. To this circumstance there are several striking allusions in the sacred volume. Among the evils threatened to the Israelites in case of their disobedience, the prophet names one in the following terms: "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flyeth." Deut. xxviii. 49. The march of Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem, is predicted in the same terms: "Behold, he shall come up as clouds, and his chariots as a whirlwind: his horses are swifter than eagles;" (Jer. iv. 13,) as is his invasion of Moab also: "For thus saith the Lord, Behold, he shall fly as an eagle, and shall spread his wings over Moab;" (chap. xviii. 40.) i. e. he shall settle down on the devoted country, as an eagle over its prey. See, also, Lam. iv. 19; Hos. viii. 7; Heb. i. 5.

The eagle, it is said, lives to a great age; and, like other birds of prey, sheds its feathers in the beginning of spring. After this season, he appears with fresh strength and vigor, and his old age assumes the appearance of youth. To this David alludes, when gratefully reviewing the mercies of Jehovah: "Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things, so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's?" (Ps. ciii. 5) as does the prophet, also, when describing the renovating and quickening influences of the Spirit of God: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; and they shall walk and not faint." Isa. xl. 31. It has been supposed that there is an allusion to the mounting of the eagle in the prophet's charge to the people, to mourn deeply, because of the judgments of God: "Make thee bald, and poll thee for thy delicate children; enlarge thy baldness as the eagle," (Mic. l. 16,) but we rather think that the allusion is to the natural baldness of some particular species of this bird, as that would be far more appropriate. The direction of the prophet is to a token of mourning, which was usually assumed by making bald the crown of the head; here, however, it was to be enlarged, extended, as the baldness of the eagle. Exactly answering to this idea is Mr. Bruce's description of the head of the "golden eagle:" the crown of his head was bare or bared; so was the front where the bill and skull joined. The meaning of the prophet, therefore, seems to be, that the people were not to content themselves with shaving the crown of the head merely, as on ordinary occasions, but, under this special visitation of punitive justice, were to extend the baldness over the entire head.

We have to admire frequently the intimate acquaintance which the writer of the book of Job displays with many parts of animated nature. His account of the eagle is drawn up with great accuracy and beauty.

Is it at thy voice that the eagle soars, And maketh his nest on high? The rock is the place of his habitation; He dwelleth on the crag, the place of strength. Thence he pouces upon his prey; And his eyes discern afar off. Even his young ones drink down blood; And wherever is slaughter, there is he.

Chap. xxxix. 27-30.

To the last line in this quotation, our Saviour seems to allude in Matt. xxiv. 28. "Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together;" that is, "wherever the Jewish people, who were morally and judicially dead, might be, there would the Roman armies, whose standard was an eagle, and whose strength and fierceness resembled that of the king of birds, in comparison with his fellows, pursue and devour them." In Deut. xxxii. 11. there is a beautiful comparison of the care and paternal affection of the Deity for his people, with the natural tenderness of the eagle for its young:

As the eagle stirreth up her nest; Fluttereth over her young; Expandeth her plumage, taketh them; Beareth them upon her wings.

So Jehovah alone did lead him, And there was no strange god with him.

In Lev. xi. 18, we read of the "gier eagle"—Heb. רָכַח; but being associated with water-birds, as the swan, the pelican, the stork, &c. it has been doubted whether any kind of eagle is the bird intended. Most interpreters are willing, after Bochart, to render the Hebrew word רָכַח by that kind of Egyptian vulture which is now called râchêmîs, and is abundant in the streets of Cairo, Vultur peronatus. Some want a water-fowl; Dr. Geddes translates stork, but, in his critical remarks, doubts its propriety, without, however, determining for any other bird. Nor must we close our eyes to the fact, that the râchêmîs, unhappily rendered "the barren worm," in our version. We close these remarks with Hamsquist's description of the Egyptian vulture, to which we have before referred, and which is thought by many writers to be the Hebrew רָכַח. "The appearance of the bird is so horrid as can well be imagined. The face is naked and wrinkled, the eyes are large and black, the beak black and crooked, the talons large and extended ready for prey, and the whole body polluted with filth. These are qualities enough to make the beholder shudder with horror. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants of Egypt cannot be enough thankful to Providence for this bird. For the places round Cairo are filled with the dead bodies of asses and camels; and thousands of these birds fly about and devour the carcasses, before they putrifY, and fill the air with noxious exhalations."—See under EAGLE.

E.A.R. "I will uncover thine ear," is a Hebraism, by which is meant, I will reveal something to thee, 1 Sam. ix. 15; 2 Sam. vii. 27, margin. The servant who renounced the privilege of freedom, in the sabbatical year, had his ear pierced with an awl, in the presence of the judges, at his master's door, Exod. xxxi. 6; Deut. xv. 17. This practice continued in Syria to the time of Juvenal:

—Molles quod in aure fontes, Arguerint, licet ipse negem? SAT. I.

"which the soft alits in the ear will prove, though I myself should deny it." The Psalmist says, in the person of the Messiah, "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ear hast thou opened," Ps. lx. 5. Heb. Thou hast digged my ears; thou hast opened them, removed impediments and made them attentive; i.e. thou hast prepared me for obedience; or, thou hast pierced them, as those of such servants were pierced, who choose to remain with their masters.

Paul reads, (Heb. x. 5.) "a body hast thou prepared me;" and thus the LXX and the generality of the ancient fathers read the passage—amounting to the same sense as above. "To have heavy ears," is said of natural as well as of voluntary deafness. "Make the ears of this people heavy," (Isa. vi. 10.), perhaps, repeat thy admonitions to them till their ears are tired of them; or tell them that I will give them to be pierced, as those of such servants were pierced, who choose to remain with their masters.

Scripture sometimes says the prophets do what they foretell only. See BLINDNESS.

EARING, an agricultural term. There is a passage, (Gen. xiv. 8,) which, if it has been occasionally misunderstood by a reader, may be pardoned:—"There remain five years, in which shall be neither earring nor harvest." The fact is, that earring is an old English word for ploughing:—the original word, the Hebrew, means "ploughing," and why it should not be so translated here we cannot tell, as earring now suggests the idea of gathering ears of corn after they are arrived at maturity; whereas Joseph means to say, "There shall be neither ploughing nor harvest during five years." The reader will perceive that this variation of import implies a totally different course of natural phenomena in Egypt; for the Nile must have risen so little as to have rendered ploughing impossible; or, its waters must have been so abundant, as to have overflowed the country entirely, and to have annihilated the use of the plough: moreover, if no ploughing, no sowing: that is, harvest was not expected; consequently it was not prepared for, in respect of corn. No doubt but the Nile was deficient; it did not rise; the peasants, therefore, did not plough; and to this agrees the account of an ancient author, that for nine years together the Nile did not rise to half a harvest. The same word chôris occurs, 1 Sam. xxii. 16:—"The king will appoint your sons, to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest." Heb. to plough his ploughing; which sounds, to modern ears, at least, as a very distinct branch of agriculture. We read, Exod. xxxiv. 31, "Six days spend in labor, but on the sev-
th day rest: in earing time (ploughing time, béchárdish) and in harvest thou shalt rest." And in Isa. xxv. 4 he axon likewise, and the young season which ear the ground:"—but in this place the word in the original for ear is not, as heretofore, charish, but badd, which signifies to labor in almost any manner. On this subject it should be observed, that our translation has used the word earing in the sense of tillage; general labor, labor of any kind, bestowed on the ground, in Deut. xxii. 4: "The elders shall bring down the heifer into a rough valley, (rather to the rough bank of a brook; or running water,) which is neither eared nor sown:"—read, which is not filled, cultivated in any manner; literally, "which has no cultivation in it:"—the word is badh here, also. Though, in strict propriety, these two very distinct Hebrew words ought to have been rendered by two answerable English expressions, equally distinct; yet, these latter instances of the word earing may satisfy us what was the intention of our translators when they used it, to represent that word which should be rendered ploughing; that is, that they took it generally for cultivation of any kind; and meant to imply (Gen. xlvi. 6) that Egypt should be five years without any hopeful exertions of agriculture. Whether this be accurate, is another question, as certainly there may be a cessation of ploughing, yet other labors designed to promote fertility may be advanced. They meant, also, (1 Sam. viii. 12,) to say, The king will appoint your sons to till his lands by some means; whether that means be ploughing, or any other. It follows, that we ought to make very great allowances for changes in our language since the time of our translators, and not blame them for the use of words now become obsolete; but which, in their day, well expressed their meaning.

EAR-RINGS. We have a passage in Gen. xxxiv. 4, which has been supposed capable of different senses; Jacob ordered his household to give up the "strange gods which were in their hands, and all their ear-rings which were in their ears:"—that is, say some, in the ears of the strange gods; while others with more propriety say, in the ears of the persons of Jacob's family. To determine this question, we subjoin an instance of ear-rings, which the patriarch Jacob would surely have buried as deep under ground, as he would any other instrument of idolatry. It is, Aniq. Exempl. vol. iii. Supp. "There was discovered at Porto, when I was at Rome, in a vault under ground, which was made for the family Cæsennius, two large statues; one of a man dressed like a senator, the other of a woman, in a Roman habit, with two gold pendants in her ears; one with the figure of Jupiter on it, the other with that of Juno: and also the statue of a little child, their son. Aulus Caesennius Hermaeus caused these statues to be made for himself and his wife; as the inscription informs us, which was found near them." See Amulet.

The word ear--ring sometimes occurs in the English Bible, when a similar ornament for the nose is rather intended.

EARTH. This word is taken in various senses:—
(1.) For that gross element, which sustains and nourishes us; which nourishes plants, and fruit; for the continent, as distinguished from the sea.—(2.) For that rude matter which existed in the beginning, Gen. i. 1.—(3.) For the terraqueous globe, and its contents, Psalm xxiv. 1; cxv. 16.—(4.) For the inhabitants of the earth, Gen. xi. 1. See also vi. 13; Psalm xvi. 1.—(5.) For the empire of Chaldea and Assyria, Ezra ii. 6. And (6.) for the land of Judea. The restricted sense of this word to Judea and the region around it, we apprehend to be more common. Scripture thus used is usually supposed to express the conception of it has great effect in elucidating many passages, where it ought to be so understood.

To demand earth and water, was a custom of the ancient Persians, by which they required a people to acknowledge their dominion; Nebuchadnezer, in the Greek of Judith, (chap. ii. 7,) commands Holofernes to march against the people of the West, who had refused submission, and to declare to them, that they were to prepare earth and water. Darius ordered his envoys to demand earth and water of the Scythians; and Megabyxus required the same of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, in the name of Darius. Polybius and Plutarch notice this custom among the Persians. Some believe, that these symbolical demands denoted dominion of the earth and sea; others, that the earth represented the food received from it, corn and fruits; the water, drink, which is the second part of human nourishment. Ecclesiasticus xv. 16. In much the same sense, says, "The Lord hath set fire and water before thee; stretch forth thy hand unto whether thou wilt:" and chap. xxxix. 26. "Fire and water are the most necessary things to life." Fire and water were considered by the ancients as the first principles of the generation, birth, and preservation of man. Prescribed persons were debarred from their use; as, on the contrary, wives in their nuptial ceremonies were obliged to touch them.

Earth, in a moral or spiritual sense, is opposed to heaven and spirit. "He that is of the earth, is earthly, and speaketh of the earth: he that cometh from heaven is above all," John iii. 31. "If ye then be risen with Christ, set not your affections on things on the earth, but on things which are in heaven."—Col. iii. 2.

EARTHQUAKE, a convulsion of the earth. Scripture speaks of several earthquakes. One of the most remarkable is that which swallowed up Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, Numb. xvi. This was, no doubt, a miraculous event; but whether the miracle consists in destruction, Gen. xxxv. 35 and in Josephus, who adds, that its violence divided a mountain, which lay west of Jerusalem, and drove one part of it four furlongs; when it was stopped by the wall on the east of the city, but not till the earth had closed up the highway, and covered the king's gardens. A very memorable earthquake was that which happened at our Saviour's death, (Matt. xxvii. 51) and many have thought, that it was perceived throughout the world. Others think it was felt only in Judea, or in the temple at Jerusalem. Cyril of Jerusalem says, that the rocks on mount Calvary were shown in his time, which had been rent asunder by this earthquake. Sandsy and Maundrell testify the same; and say that they examined the breaches in the rock, and were convinced that they were affected with an earthquake. It must have been terrible, since the centurion and those with him, were so affected by it, as to acknowledge the innocence of our Saviour, Luke xxiii. 47. The word earthquake is also used in a more limited sense, to denote prodigies of nature, earthquakes, shocks, and the foundation of the universe, effects of God's power, wrath, and vengeance,—figurative exaggerations, which represent the greatness, strength, and power of God, Psalms cxxii.; xvii. 7; xlv. 2; xxiv. 4. It sometimes figuratively expresses a dissolution of the powers of government in a country, or state, Rev. xvi. 18, 19.

EAST. The Hebrews express east, west, north, and south, by before, behind, left, and right; according to the situation of a man whose face is turned to the rising sun. Hence foreward means towards the east.

It appears from many places in the Old and New Testaments, that the sacred writers called the provinces around and beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, (Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Persia,) Kedem, or the East. Moses, who was educated in Egypt, and lived long in Arabia, might probably follow that custom; especially as Babylon, Chaldea, Susiana, Persia, much of Mesopotamia, and the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, are, for the greater part of their course, east of Palestine, Egypt, and Arabia. Besides this, as those who came from Armenia, Syria, Media, and Upper Mesopotamia, entered Palestine and Egypt on the east side, it was sufficient to warrant the Hebrews in saying, that these people lay east of them; and that those countries were known among the Hebrews under the name of the East, appears from several passages. Balaam says, (Num. xxiii. 7.) that Balak, king of Moab, had brought him from the mountains of the East; i. e. from Pethor on the Euphrates. Isaiah says, (xlii. 2.) that Abraham came from the East into the land of Canaan; and (xlv. 11.) that Cyrus should come from the East against Babylon. In chap. ix. 12. he places Syria east of Judea. Daniel says, (xlii. 44.) Antiochus should be troubled with news of a revolt of the eastern provinces; i. e. the provinces on the other side of the Euphrates; and Matthew says, that the wise men who came to worship Jesus, came from the East, chap. ii. 1. All this courted the opinion of the East; and that the East was often used for the provinces which lie easterly, though perhaps inclining to the north of Judea and of Egypt. It is remarked, that this word in the Greek of Matthew, (ii. 1.) gives us no certain idea of the locality; it might very well be so in the original Syro-Chaldaic document, from which the apocryphal copied. In that language, a certain country was most probably determined by this appellation. We know not whether the Talmudists may help us in this instance; but they thus speak: "from Reкам to the East, and Reкам itself is the East;'—that is, excluded from the land of Israel, eastward, and consequently is heathen land; if, then, Reкам joined the land of Israel, we need not go very far to seek the East, which joined Reкам. We may ask also to the Magi—What was their Syriac title? In the Gemara we have a story of an Arabian informing a Jew that the Messiah was born:—if this were a memorial of Eastern Arabia, it may agree with the country east of Reкам—which would not greatly differ from the districts occupied by the sons of Abraham, and called the "East," Gen. xxvi. 6; Judg. vi. 3.

We read (Gen. xi. 2, 9) that mankind departed from Kedem; in our translation, we have no authority upon which there has been much controversy. It would be useless to detail the various conjectures of learned men as to the situation of Kedem. We have seen that there are several districts in Scripture so called; some belong to Syria; but for this Kedem we must direct our researches to a country east of Babylonia; since the inhabitants of this country came thither after a journey "from the East." (The country here meant is, unquestionably, that in the vicinity of mount Ararat, where mankind first settled after the deluge. To come from that country to Babylonia, it was necessary to keep along on the east side of the Median mountains, and then issue at once from the east upon the plain. (See Bryant's Mythol. iii. p. 24; also Mr. Smith's letter under the article ARARAT.) R.

EAST WIND. See WIND.

EASTER. It is no honor to our translators, that this word occurs in the English Bible, Acts xii. 4; it should have been passover, which feast of the Jews we well know. Easter is a word of Saxon origin, and imports a goddess of the Saxons, or rather of the East, Estera, in honor of whom sacrifices being annually offered about the passover time of the year, (spring,) the name became attached by association of ideas to the chief festival of the Saxons, which happened at the time of the passover; hence we say Easter-day, Easter-Sunday, but very improperly; as we by no means refer the festival then kept to the goddess of the ancient Saxons. So the present German word for Easter, Ostern, is referred to the same goddess, Estera or Ostera.

EATING. The ancient Hebrews did not eat indiscriminately with all persons; they would have esteemed themselves polluted and disdained by eating with those of another religion, or of an odious profession. In Joseph's time they neither ate with the Egyptians, nor the Egyptians with them; (Gen. xlii. 32.) nor in our Saviour's time, with the Samaritans, John iv. 9. The Jews were scandalized at his eating with publicans and sinners, Matt. xix. 11. As there were several sorts of meats, the use of which was prohibited, they could not conveniently eat with those who partook of them, fearing to receive pollution by touching such food, or if by accident any particles of it should沾 to the table. So it was determined, that at their meals, some suppose they had each his separate table; and that Joseph, entertaining his brethren in Egypt, seated them separately, each at his particular table, while he himself sat down separately from the East. He might well send to his brethren portions out of the provisions which were before him, Gen. xliii. 31, et seq. Elkanah, Samuel's father, who had two wives, distributed their portions to them separately, 1 Sam. i. 4, 5. In Homer, each guest is supposed to have had his little table apart; and the master of the feast distributed meat to each, Odyssey. xiv. 446 seq. We are assured that this is still practiced in China; and that many in India never eat out of the same dish, nor on the same table with another person, believing they cannot do so without sin; and this, not only in their own country, but when travelling, and in foreign lands.

This is also the case with the Brahmins and various castes in India; who will not even use a vessel after a European, though he may only have drank from it water recently drawn out of a well. The same strictness is observed by the more scrupulous among the Mahometans; and instances have been known of every plate, and dish, and cup, that had been used by Christian guests, being broken immediately after their departure.

The ancient manners which we see in Homer, we see likewise in Scripture, with regard to eating, drinking, and entertainments. There was great plenty, but little delicacy; great respect and honor paid to the guests by serving them plentifully. Joseph sent his brother Benjamin a portion five times larger than those of his other brethren. Samuel set a whole quarter of a calf before Saul; Sam. ix.

24. The women did not appear at table in entertainments with the men; this would have been an indecency; as it is at this day throughout the East.

The Hebrews anciently sat at table, but afterwards imitated the Persians and Chaldeans, who reclined on table-beds, or divans, while eating. As a knowledge of this fact is of importance to a right understanding of several passages in the New Testament, we shall offer some remarks upon it. The accompanying engraving represents one of the common eating tables.

(1.) The reader is requested to notice the construction of the tables, i.e. three tables, so set together as to form but one. (2.) Around these tables are placed, not seats, but couches, or beds, one to each table; each of these beds being called clinias, three of these united, to surround the three tables, formed the triclinium (three beds). These beds were formed of mattresses stuffed; and were often highly ornamented. (3.) Observe the attitude of the guests; each reclining on his left elbow; and therefore using principally his right hand, that only (or at least chiefly) being free for use. Observe also, that the feet of the person reclining being towards the external edge of the bed, they were much more readily reached by any body passing, than any other part of the person so reclining.

In circular or crescent-formed tables, the right extremity was the first place of honor, and the left extremity the second place of honor. We may suppose the same of the square triclinium.
For want of proper discrimination and description, in respect to the attitude at table, as before noticed, several passages of the Gospels are not merely injured as to their true sense, but are absolutely reduced to nonsense, in our English translation. So Luke vii. 37: 'A woman, in the city who was a sinner, came to Peter's house, took a quart-measure of ointment, and stood at his feet behind him, weeping; and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with her hair, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.' Now, surely, when a person sits at meat, according to those ideas which naturally suggest themselves to an English reader, his feet, being on the floor under the table, are before him, not behind him; and the impossibility of any one standing at his feet behind him, and while standing, kissing his feet, wiping them, &c. is glaring. However, by inspecting the engraving, the narration becomes intelligible; the feet of a person reclining, being en trembesol, are most exposed to salutation, or to any other treatment, from one standing behind them. The same observations apply to John xii. 3: 'Lazarus was one who reclined at table (lestegege) with Jesus; and Mary anointed the feet of Jesus, &c.'

Assisted by these ideas, we may better understand the form of the beds and the discipline of feet, (John xiii. 5.) 'He poured water into a basin, and going round the beds whereon the disciples reclined, he began to wash their feet, which lay on the external edge of the couch, and to wipe them with the towel whereby he was girdled.' (Verses 12, 13.) 'The Deir el Kamar, having taken his garments and was reclined again, he said,' &c.

It is not easy to ascertain precisely the form of the beds anciently used among the Persians; but, by regarding them as something like what our engravings represent, we may see the story of Haman's petitioning Esther for his life, in nearly its true light. While the king went into the garden, Haman first stood up to entreat Esther to grant him his life; and being desirous of using even the most pathetic mode of entreaty, he fell prostrate on the bed where the queen was lying reclined; the king, that instant returning, observing his attitude, and his nearness to the queen, which was utterly contrary to female modesty, and to royal dignity, exclaimed, 'What will he also force the queen! she being in my company, in the palace? But, when Esther fell at the king's feet, (chap. viii. 3.) we are to consider the king as seated on the divan, or sofa, in a very different attitude and separation of his person, in his palace. This may be a proper place to notice the import of some other expressions, which, appearing to be similar, might seem to infer the same attitude. So, 'Mary sat at Jesus' feet' to hear his discourse; while Martha was cumbered about much serving. Martha, standing before Jesus, said, 'Lord, direct my sister to help me,' but Mary was sitting at the feet of Jesus, close to the divan on which he sat; where we see clearly that both the sisters, one standing, the other sitting, might be before Jesus, as he sat on the divan. See Dan.

It would be perhaps overstraining these remarks, to apply them to some of those slighter incidents which sacred history has recorded; it is nevertheless proper to notice, how justly John might be said to 'lie in Jesus' bosom' (John xiii. 23.) at the supper table. Is it supposeable, from circumstances, that our Lord was not in the chief place of honor, (according to the Greeks, the right extremity of the triclinium,) as such a person could not have any one lying in his bosom; or is it probable that the Jews esteemed some other part, perhaps the left extremity, as the place of honor? It is certain that the Turks and Chinses do so.

The table which the Jews are represented as partaking by washing, (Mark vii. 4.) are these kind of beds, (lestegege,) purifying, as if they had been polluted by the recumbence of strangers; unless it were customary, as in point of neatness it ought to be, to wash the tables after every meal, and before they received guests again. This, however, could not extend to the bolsters and pillows, as they could not be made sufficiently dry to receive guests, in so short a time as intervened between one meal and another. (The mode of reclining at table on couches was common in the East, and also among the Greeks and Romans. The general character of these meals appears to have been the same in the latter nations and among the Hebrews, and may be found described, with references to the necessary classical authorities, in Potter's Greek & Roman Times, vol. ii. p. 272, seq. and Adam's Rom. Antiq. Philad. 1807. p. 434, seq. It was at a later period, under the emperors, that the semicircular couch, above represented, was introduced. In still later times, the custom was adopted which still prevails, the reclining guest lying on the floor at meat, and at other times on cushions. &c.)

The present mode of eating in the East is shown in the following extracts from travellers. Dr. Jowett, while on a visit to Deir el Kamar, forcibly reminded me of Scripture scenes. 'The absence of the females at our meal has been already noticed. There is another custom, by no means agreeable to a European; to which, however, that I might not seem unfriendly, I would have willingly endeavored to submit, but it was impossible to learn it in the short compass of twenty days. There are set on the table, in the evening, two or three mesees of stewed meat, vegetables, and sour milk. To me, the privilege of a knife and spoon and plate was granted: but the rest all helped themselves immediately from the dish; in part for fear of no uncommon thing to see more than five Arab fingers at one time. Their bread, which is extremely thin, tearing and folding up like a sheet of paper, is used for the purpose of rolling together a large piece of meat, and vegetables; and, after being sufficiently well-bread, my mouth would have opened to receive it. On my pointing to my plate, however, he had the goodness to deposit the choice morsel there. I would not have noticed so trivial a circumstance, if it did not exactly illustrate what the Evangelists record of the Last Supper. St. Matthew relates that the traitor was described by our Lord in these terms—He that dippehth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me, xxvi. 33.' From this it may be inferred that Judas sat near to our Lord; perhaps on one side next to him. St. John, who was leaning on Jesus' bosom, describes the fact with an additional circumstance. Upon his asking, Lord, who is it? Jesus answered, He is to whom
EATING

I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. And after the sop, Satan entered into him, xiii. 23-27.

Niebuhr's account is as follows: (Descr. of Arabia, p. 52.) The table of the orientals is arranged according to their mode of living. As they always sit upon the floor, a large cloth is spread out in the middle of the room upon the floor, in order that the bits and crumbs may not be lost, or the carpets soiled. [On journeys, especially in the deserts, the place of the cloth is supplied by a mat and piece of leather, which the traveller carries with him. Travels ii. p. 372.] Upon this cloth is placed a small stool, which serves as a support for a large round tray of tinned copper; on this the food is served up in various dishes, which are always taken, instead of napkins, a long cloth, which extends to all who sit at table, and which they lay upon their laps. Where this is wanting, each one takes, instead of a napkin, his own handkerchief or, rather, small piece of leather, which he always carries with him to wipe himself with after washing. Knives and forks are not used. The Turks sometimes have spoons of wood or horn. The Arabs are so accustomed to use the hand instead of a spoon, that they can do without a spoon even when eating bread and milk prepared in the usual manner. Other kinds of food, as we commonly eat with a spoon, I do not remember to have seen.

It is, indeed, at first, very unpleasant to an European, just arrived in the East, to eat with people who help themselves to the food out of the common dish with their fingers; but this is easily got over, after one has become acquainted with their mode of living. The Mohammedans are even obliged to keep their hands so clean, that no impurity can collect under them; for they believe their prayers would be without any effect, if there should be the least impurity upon any part of the body. And since, now, before eating, they always wash themselves, and generally too with soap, it comes at length to seem of less consequence whether they help themselves from the dish with clean fingers, or with a fork.

Among the sheikhs of the desert, who require at a meal more than pulses, i. e. boiled rice, a very large wooden dish is brought on full; and around this one party after another set themselves, till the dish is emptied, or they are satisfied. In Merdïn, where I once ate with sixteen officers of the Waitâweh, a servant placed himself between the guests, and had nothing to do, but to take away the empty dishes, and set down the full ones which other servants brought in. As soon as ever the dish was set down, all the sixteen hands were immediately thrust into it; and that to so much purpose, that rarely could any one help himself three times. They eat, in the East, with very great rapidity; and at this meal in Merdïn, in the time of about twenty minutes, we sent out more than fourteen empty dishes. R.

In closing this subject, we may properly notice the obligations which are considered by eastern people to be contracted by eating together. Niebuhr says, "When a Bedouin sheikh eats bread with strangers, they must trust his fidelity and depend on his protection."—A traveller will always do well, therefore, to take an early opportunity of securing the friendship of your guide by a meal." The reader will recollect the complaint of the Psalmist, (xlii. 9) penetrated with the deep ingratitude of one whom he describes as having been his own familiar friend, in whom he trusted—"who did eat of my bread, and did not lift up his heel against me." To the multiplication of insult was added the violation of all confidence, the breach of every obligation connected with the ties of humanity, with the laws of honor, with the bonds of social life, with the unsuspecting freedom of those moments when the soul unbends itself to enjoyment, and is, if ever, off its guard. Under the article COVENANT OF SALT, we saw the obligation contracted by the participation of bread and salt; we now find, that among the Arabs, at least, the friends and the brethren partook of bread without less to bread. Hence, in part, no doubt, the conviviality that always followed the making of a covenant. Hence, also, the severity of some of the feelings acknowledged by the indignant man of patience, Job, as appearing in several passages of his pathetic expositions. It is well known that Arabs, who have given food to a stranger, have afterwards thought themselves bound to protect him against the vengeance, demanded by consanguinity, for even blood itself.

EBAL, a mountain in Ephraim, near Shechem, over against mount Gerizim, from which it is separated by a valley of about two hundred paces wide, in which stands the town of Shechem. Both mountains are much alike in length, height, and form, and their altitude is stated by Mr. Buckingham not to exceed 700 or 800 feet, from the level of the valley. But if they are alike in these particulars, in others they are very unlike; for Ebal is barren, while Gerizim is beautiful and fruitful. The Jews and Samaritans have great disputes about them. (See Gerizim.) Moses commanded Israel, that as soon as they had passed the Jordan, they should go to Shechem, and there set up a stone for a monument. To the fortification of six tribes, one placed on that, is, adjacent to, Ebal; the other on that, is, adjacent to, Gerizim. The six tribes on, or at, Gerizim, were to pronounce blessings on those who should faithfully observe the law; and the six on mount Ebal, were to pronounce curses against those who should violate it, Deut. xxxvii. This Joshua executed, Josh. viii. 30. 31. Moses enjoined them to erect an altar of unhewn stones on mount Ebal, and to plaster them over, that the law might be written on the altar; but the Samaritan Pentateuch, instead of Ebal reads Gerizim; because the altar and sanctuary of the Samaritans were there. See Shechem.

EBED-MELECH, a eunuch or servant of king Zedekiah, who being in Jerusalem, that Jeremiah was imprisoned in a place full of mire, informed the king of it, and was the means of his restoration to safety, though not to liberty. For this humanity he was promised divine protection, and after the city was taken by Nebuzaradan he was preserved, Jeremiah xxxvii. 7.

EBEN-EZER, stone of help, a witness stone erected by Samuel, of divine assistance obtained, 1 Sam. xi. 12.

EBODA, a town in Arabia Petraea. Probably Oboda, or Oboth, Num. xxii. 10; xxxiii. 43, 44.

ECBATANA, the ancient capital of Media, built, or, perhaps, enlarged and fortified, by Darius, or Artaxerxes, third king of the Medes. It was en-comprised with seven walls, of unequal heights; the largest, according to Herodotus (lib. i. cap. 98), was equal in extent with those of Athens; that is, 176 furlongs, or nearly eight leagues, (Thucyd. lib. i.) After the union of Media with Persia, Ecbatana became the summer residence of the kings of Persis, because of the freshness of the air. It was still inhabited, under the name of Hamadan, in lat. 34° 53' N. long. 40° E. Its inhabitants are stated by Mr. Kinnier to be about 40,000, including about 600 Jewish families. It is supposed to be mentioned under the name of Arametha, Ezra vi. 2.

ECCLESIASTES. This word is feminine in the Hebrew, and literally signifies, one who speaks in public; or, one who convenes the assembly. The Greeks and Latins, not regarding the gender, render it Eleusinian. In the Hebrews, Solomon describes himself in the first verse, "The words of Koheleth, (Eng. Vers. 'the Preacher,') the son of David, king of Jerusalem." He mentions his works, his riches, his buildings, and his proverbs, or whatever he wrote to speak to men, and all kings in Jerusalem; which description plainly characterizes Solomon. This book is generally thought to be the production of Solomon's repentance, towards the latter end of his life. It proposes the sentiments of.Ecclesiastes to the Emperors in their full force; proves excellently the vanity of all things; the little benefit of men's restless and busy cares, and the uncertainty of their knowledge; but concludes, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole of man." In all this his obligations terminate; this is his only means to happiness, present and future. In reading this book, care should be taken to avoid opinions from detached sentences, but from the general scope and combined force of the whole.

ECCLESIASTICUS, a book so called in Latin, either to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes, or to show that it contains, on which is most acceptable and exultations to wisdom and virtue. The Greeks call it "The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach." It contains maxims and instructions, useful in all states and conditions of life. Some of the ancients ascribed this work to Solomon; but the author is much more modern than Solomon, and speaks of several persons who lived after that prince. He mentions himself in chap. i. 27: "I, Jesus, the son of Sirach, have written in this book the instruction of understanding and knowledge of the fear of the Lord. It is inscribed, "A prayer of Jesus, the son of Sirach." The interpreter of it out of Syriac or Hebrew into Greek, says, that his grandfather Jesus composed it in Hebrew; but we have no authentic information who he was, nor when he lived. He praises the high-priest Simon, and speaks of him as not then living: but there were more high-priests than one of this name. Nevertheless, it is probable, he means Simon II. after whose death those calamities befell the Jews, which might induce the son of Sirach to speak as he does, chap. xxxvi. and i. The translator of it into Greek came into Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of Ptolemy VII. surnamed Euergetes, the second of that name; as he says in his preface. The author of the Latin translation from the Greek is unknown. Jerome says, the church receives Ecclesiasticus as edification, but not to authorize any point of doctrine.

ECDDIPPA, otherwise Achibib, which see.

ECLIPSE. The Hebrews seem not to have philosophized much on eclipses, which they considered as sensible marks of God's anger. See Joel ii. 30, 31; iii. 15; Job ix. 7; Ezekiel xxxiii. 20; xxvii. 7. Job (xxvi. 32) speak more particularly, that God covers the sun with clouds, when he deprives the earth of its light, by eclipses. Yet, when we read that "the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood," we can hardly disavow the kind of acquaintance with the appearance of those luminaries while under eclipse. The interruption of the sun's light causes him to appear black; and the moon during a total eclipse exhibits a copper color; or what Scripture intends by a blood color. See Darkness.

ED, witness, the name given to the altar erected by the two tribes and a half, who were settled beyond Jordan, Josh. xxii. 34. It was probably a copy or repetition of that which was used among the Hebrews, and at the time of the patriarchs. The word commonly signifies to testify to the interest of these tribes in the altar common to the descendants of the patriarch Israel.

I. EDEN, a province in Asia, in which was paradise. "The Lord planted eastward a garden, and there he put the man whom he had formed," Gen. ii. 8. The topography of Eden is thus described: "And a river went out of Eden to water the garden, and from thence it was parted, and became into four streams." The mountain ranges of the Pison; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where gold is ... balm, and the onyx-stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon; that is it that compasseth the whole land of Cush. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates," ver. 10-14.

There is hardly any part of the world in which it has not been sought: in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, in America; in Tartary, on the banks of the Ganges, in the Indies, in China, in the island of Ceylon, in Armenia; under the equator; in Mesopotamia, in Syria, in Persia, in Babylonia, in Arabia, in Palestine, in Ethiopia, across the mountains of Libanus, Anti-libanus, and Damascus. Huet places it on the river produced by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, now called the river of the Arabs; below this conjunction and the division of the same river, before it falls into the Persian sea. He selects the eastern shore of this river, which being considered according to the disposition of its channel, and not according to the course of its stream, was divided into four heads, or four different openings. This is the Tigris and Euphrates, and two below, the Pison and Gihon. The Pison, according to him, is the western channel, and the Gihon is the eastern channel of the Tigris, which discharges itself into the Persian gulf. It is said that Bochart was much of the same opinion. (Phalag. lib. i. cap. 4; De Anim. Sacr. part ii. lib. v. cap. vi.) Other skilful men have placed Eden in Armenia, between the sources of the rivers, (1.) Tigris, (2.) Euphrates, (3.) Araxis, (4.) Phasis, taken to be the four rivers described by Moses. Euphrates is expressly mentioned; Hiddekel is the Tigris; the Phasis is Pison; the Gihon is the Araxes.

"The orientals think, that the terrestrial paradise was in the island of Serendib, or Ceylon; and that when Adam was driven out of paradise, he was sent to the mountain of Rahuon in this island, two or three days' journey from the sea. The Portuguese call this mountain Pico de Adano, or mountain of Adam, because it is thought that this first of men was buried under it, after he had lived in repentance a hundred and thirty years. The Mussulmans do not believe that the paradise, in which Adam was placed, was a paradise terrestrial, but that it was in one of the seven heavens; and that from this heaven he was thrown down into the island of Ceylon, where he died, after having made a pilgrimage into Arabia, where he visited the place appointed for building the temple of Mecos. — They say also, that when God created the garden of Eden, he created there what the eye had never seen, the ear has never heard, and what has never entered into the heart of man to conceive. That this delicious garden has eight doors; whereas hell has but seven; and that the porters which have the care of them are to let none enter before the learned, who make a profession of despising earthly, and of desiring heavenly, things.

The orientals reckon four paradises in Asia. (1.) About Damascus, in Syria. (2.) About Obollah in Chaldea. (3.) About the desert of Naubendigian in Persia, in a place called Sheb-Baavan, watered by the Nilab. And lastly, in the isle of Ceylon, or Serendib. We may perceive from hence, that the opinion which places the terrestrial paradise about Damascus, and near the sources of the Jordan, is no novel opinion, nor peculiar to European writers— Heidegger in the Lives of the Patriarchs, M. le Clerc, father Abraham, and father Hardouin, having maintained it.

It may be inferred from a number of circumstances, that paradise was placed on a mountain, or at least in a country diversified with hills, because only such a country could supply the springs necessary to form four heads of rivers; and because all heads of rivers rise in hills, from whence their waters descend to the sea. Such a country has been found in Armenia, with such an elevation, or assemblage of elevations, also, as appeared to be requisite for this purpose. On these principles, the Phasis was the Pison of Moses, and the similarity of sound in the name seemed to confirm the opinion; it was a natural consequence, that the Arazas should be the Gihon; since its waters are extremely rapid, and the Greek name Arazas, like the Hebrew Gihon, denotes the dart, or spurt. [A full and satisfactory investigation in favor of this theory is given by Prof. Stuart in his Hebrew Christanomathy, on Gen. ii. 14. sq. R. Such were the principles most generally entertained among the learned; when captain Wilford came forth from his study of the Indian Puranas, opened what was at least a new source of information, and placed Eden on the Inauns mountains of India. (Asiatic Researches, vol. vi. p. 455.—Lond. ed.) We give his closing remarks:—

"It appears from Scripture, that Adam and Eve lived afterwards in the countries to the eastward of Eden; for at the eastern entrance of it, God placed the angel with the flaming sword. This is also confirmed by the Puranics, who place the progenitors of mankind on the mountainous regions between Cabul and the Ganges, on the banks of which, in the hills, they show a place where he resorted occasionally for religious purposes. It is frequented by pilgrims, and is called Swayamhuvastian: I have not been able yet to ascertain its situation, being but lately acquainted with it; but I believe it is situated to the north-west of Sri-Nagur. At the entrance of the passes, leading to the place where I suppose was the garden of Eden, and to the eastward of it, the Hindis have placed a destructive angel, who generally appears, and is represented like a cherub; I mean Garuda, or the Eagle, upon whom Vishnu and Jupiter are represented riding. Garuda is represented generally like an eagle; but in his compound form, Garuda Jupiter, he is represented like a young man, with the countenance, wings, and talons of the eagle. In Scripture, the Deity is represented riding upon a cherub, and flying upon the wings of the wind. Garuda is called Vahun (literally the vehicle of Vishnu or Jupiter, and he thus answers to the cherub of Scripture; for many commentators derive this word from the obsolete root Charah in the Chaldæan language, a word implicitly synonymous with the Sanscrit Vahun.

"Mr. Taylor has bestowed much labor on an examination of this hypothesis, and declares himself to be favorable to it. We give his concluding observations:

The situation of Paradise, in Armenia, where the heads of the Euphrates and Tigris springs, where the head of the Arazes, and a branch of the Phasis, rise not very distant from each other, according to the best accounts we are able to procure of that country, (which, however, are not altogether satisfactory,) has many plausibilities in its favor. Nevertheless, there is this to be said against it, that mankind could not journey from the East to Babylon, if Armenia were the seat of Noah's deliverance; and if that seat were adjacent to Paradise, as we have uniformly supposed. But the situation of Paradise on the Indian Caucasus, or Inauns mountains, unites all those requisites which are deemed necessary coincidences with the Mosaic narration. Mountains furnish the sources of rivers; many great rivers rise in these mountains, Paradise furnished four rivers; four rivers rise in these mountains, in a vicinity sufficiently near, though not now from the same lake. Man-kind travelled from the East to Babylon; these mountains are east of Babylonia. [But for the proper meaning of the East, and of the phrase travelled from the East, see the article EAST, and also the letter of Mr. Smith under the article ARABAT. R."

II. EDEN. —The prophet Amos (chap. i. 5.) speaks of the "House of Eden," or "Beth-Eden," which is supposed to have been a house of pleasure in the mountains of Lebanon, near to the river Adonis, and about midway between Tripolis and Baalbek.

EDER, a town of Judah, Josh. xv. 21.

EDOM, red, earthy, or of blood, otherwise Enau, son of Isaac, and brother of Jacob. The name Edom was given him, either because he sold his birthright to Jacob for a mess of red pottage, or because of the color of his hair and complexion, Gen. xxv. 30, 31. Idumea is named from Edom, and is often called the land of Edom. See EAU and IDUMEA.

EDOMITES. See IDUMEA.

I. EDER, a town of Mansaeach, east of Jordan, (Josh. xiii. 31.) called likewise Edraea and Adrea, and perhaps Edera in Ptolomy, when speaking of the towns in the Batanea. Eusebius places it about 25 miles north from Bostri.

II. EDERI, a town of Naphstali, Josh. xix. 37.

EGLAH, sixth wife of David, and mother of Ish-crem, 2 Sam. iii. 5. Many are of opinion, that Eglah and Michal are the same, and that she died in labor of Ish-crem. But see the note on Eglah.

EGLAIM, a city beyond Jordan, east of the Dead sea, in the land of Moab, which Eusebius places 8 miles south of Ar, or Arcopolis. Isa. xvi. 8. 1 Sam. xxxv. 44.

EGLON, king of Moab, (Judg. iii. 12. 15.) oppress Israel eighteen years, A. M. 2661—2679. In conjunction with the Ammonites and Amalekites, he advanced to the city of palm-trees, or Jericho, or Engedi, which he took, and where was his usual residence. The Lord raised up Ehud to deliver Israel from the hand of Eglon.

II. EGLON, a city of Judah, Josh. x. 3; xv. 39.

I. EGYPT, a celebrated country in Africa; in Hebrew called Mizraim; Greek Ἑγγυτος, whence the Latin Egyptus, and the English Egypt and Copt.; but the etymology of these names has not been satisfactorily determined. Mizraim was son of Ham; Egyptian was, it is said, an ancient king of this country, son of Belus, and brother of Arminia. The sons of Mizraim were Ludim, Anamim, Shubam, Naphshim, Pathruim, and Casluhim, who people several districts of Egypt, or adjacent to it. The word Mizraim, being the dual number, may express both Egypt, the superior and inferior, or the two parts of the country, east and west, divided by the Nile. Cairo, the capital of Egypt, and even Egypt itself, is still called Mezer by the Arabians. But the natives call it Chemi, that is, the land of Cham, or Ham, as it is also sometimes called in Scripture, Psalm lxviii. 12; cv. 23; cvi. 22. The prophet Micah (vii. 12) gives to Egypt the name of Mezer, or Matzor; and rabbis Kimchi, followed by several learned commentators, explains by Egypt what is said of the rivers of Mezer, 2 Kings xix. 24; Isaiah ix. 6; xxxvii. 25. Heb.

Egypt is a country of forty-two names, or districts, which were little provinces, or counties; and also into Upper and Lower. Upper Egypt was called Thebaïs, from Theba, its capital, and extended south to the frontiers of Ethiopia. Lower Egypt contained principally the Delta, and the country on the coast of the Mediterranean. The Egyptians call Lower Egypt, Rib, or Rif; Upper Egypt, Sais, or Thebaïs; and the part between, Souf. The word Souf occurs likewise, for Moses calls the Red sea by this name.

In the time of Herodotus, Egypt was divided into two parts, with distinct appellations: the one belonging to Libya, the other to Asia; and the same division appears in Sen Hunkal; who says, "The left side of the Nile is called Ahow; the opposite division, on the right side, they call Zeif." We may call these divisions Western Egypt and Eastern Egypt; which may throw some light on the expression, (v. 12.) "I will take the heads of Leviathan with the heads ofries, the heads of Python, and the heads of Leviathan out of the Red sea." There is another passage where the same imagery is adopted, Ezek. xliv. 3. "I am against thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is my own, I have made it for myself. But I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick to thy scales, and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers." In this prophecy Pharaoh is expressly named, so that we have no difficulty in referring it to that prince. Undoubtedly these allegories, by their similarity, strengthen the idea of a connection between India and Egypt; and show that in ancient times it was well understood, and adopted by the inspired writers. For, what is this dragon, but the Ratu of India? Homer calls the Nile, Egyptus (Odys. xiv. v. 255.); and several of the ancients assert, that Egypt was a tract of land produced by deposition of the mud of this river, which regularly overflows the country.

The Egyptians boasted of being the most ancient people on earth; this claim founded on temple records and upon the sciences. They communicated to the Greeks the names of the gods, and their theology; they excelled in superstition and idolatry, worshipping stars, men, animals, and even plants. Moses informs us, that the Hebrews sacrificed bulls whose slaughter was considered by the Egyptians as an abomination: (Exod. viii. 28.) and also that they would not eat with the Hebrews, because they abhorred all shepherds. This country, properly speaking, was the cradle of the Hebrew nation. Joseph being carried thither and sold as a slave, was, by God's wisdom and providence, established vicar of Egypt. Hitherto he invited his father and family, in number about seventy persons; after dwelling here 215 years, the whole family and their people departed hence, in number 603,550 men. The king of Egypt, however, would not permit them to leave his country, till he was compelled by miracles and chastisements. And after he had dismissed and expelled them, he repented, pursued them, and followed them into the Red sea, where he perished.

The common name of the Egyptian kings was Pharaoh, which signified sovereign power. History has preserved the names of several of these kings, and some of their dynasties should be inclination of the Egyptian historians to magnify the great antiquity of their nation, has destroyed their credibility. See PHARAOH.

The inhabitants of Egypt may be considered as including three distinctions: (1.) The Copts, or descendants of the ancient Egyptians. (2.) The Fellahs, or husbandmen; which are supposed to represent the people in Scripture called Phil. (3.) The Arabs, or conquerors of the country, including the Turks, Mamelukes, &c. The Copts have seen so many revolutions in the governing powers, [see §574a,] that they concern themselves very little about the successes or misfortunes of those who aspire to dominion. The Fellahs suffer so much oppression, and are so despised by the Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, and by their despotic rulers, that they seldom acquire property, and very rarely enjoy it in security. The Arabs hate the Turks; yet the Turks enjoy most offices of government; though they hold their sovereign in the most distant tenure.

It is usual to include under the name Egypt, from Syene, south, to the most northern point of the coast adjacent to the mouths of the Nile. At Syene, Ethiopia may be said to begin. The southern part of this extent is extremely rocky and arid. During this part of its course, the Nile is a single stream; where it divides into two or more streams, it embraces that part of Egypt which the Greeks named the Delta, in the north of Egypt. This region appears to be a vast plain, yielding an abundance of corn, and other productions, and interspersed with numerous villages, built on eminences surrounded by date-trees. On the banks of the Nile, the Arab inhabitants cultivate water-melons, gourds, tobacco, indigo, called zick, a few fruits, and other vegetables; also Indian corn. The water of the Nile not only fertilizes the lands included between its streams, but also those on each side of its external channels, even where the inundation itself does not appear. The Turks boast of Egypt as the most beautiful country in the world; one of them says, the soil is for three months in the year white and sparkling like pearl, for three months black like musk, for three months green like emeralds, and for three months yellow as amber. It is not surprising to find the Egyptians in the open fields, as well as in the temples. The ancient Egyptians had two crops of corn yearly from the same ground; at present they get but one. After barley harvest they sow rice, melons, and cucumbers. Egypt is said to have furnished to Rome annually, twenty millions of bushels of corn. Pliny says, they sow early in November; that they begin their harvest in April, and end in May. Moses observes, that in the middle of March, when the Israelites departed out of Egypt, the barley and flax, being far advanced, were spoiled by the hail; but that the wheat, being not so forward, was preserved, Exod. ix. 31. The Egyptians sowed their barley and flax in the beginning of November, after the waters of the Nile had reduced. The winter is very moderate. The wheat harvest was ended by Pentecost.

The heat of Egypt is excessive: Volney says, "The Egyptians, who go almost naked, and are accustomed to perspire, shiver at the least coolness. The thermometer, which at the lowest, in the month of February, stands at 9° or 10° Fahrenheit, (above the freezing point, enables us to determine with certainty, and we may pronounce that snow and hail are phenomena which no Egyptian has seen in fifty years." He says also, "Two seasons only should be distinguished in the climate of Egypt, spring and summer; that is to say, the cold season, and the hot. The latter continues from March to November; and from the end of February the sun is not supportable for a European at nine o'clock in the morning. During the whole of this season, the air is inflamed, the sky sparkling, and the heat oppressive to all accustomed to it. The body sweats profusely, even under the lightest dress, and in a state of the most profound repose." (Trav. vol. i. p. 66, 68.) Dr. Whitman says, "The night settles in, the day retires to rest; many of the men without doors, according to the usual practice of the Arabs in the summer season. They lie scattered over the plains, like flocks of sheep, with the clothes they have taken off spread before them, and themselves covered from head to foot by the large handkerchief, which they wear in the day time across the shoulders," p. 334. This sleeping in the open air, and so lightly covered, is among those customs which appear most strange to us Europeans; but which are, perhaps, pointed out in Scripture, and is adopted without hesitation throughout the East. "The inhabitants of humid countries cannot conceive how it is possible for a country to subsist without rain; but in Egypt, besides the quantity of water which the earth absorbs at the inundation, the dews which fall in the night suffice for vegetation. The water-melons afford a remarkable proof of this; for though they have frequently nothing under them but a dry dust, yet their leaves are always fresh. These dews, as well the rains, are more copious towards the sea, and less considerable in proportion to the distance from it; but differ from the latter by being more abundant in summer than in winter. At Alexandria, after sunset, in the month of April, the clothes exposed to the air, and the terraces, are soaked with dew, as if it had rained. Like the rains, again, these dews are more or less plentiful, according to the prevailing wind. The southerly and the south-westerly produce none; the north wind produces a great deal, and the westerly still more. When rain falls in Egypt and Palestine, there is a general joy; the people assemble in the streets;
they sing, they are all in motion; and about ye Allah; ye Moborsik! O God! O blessed! &c." (Volney's Trav. vol. i. p. 55).

On account of the scarcity of rain, the best part of Egyptian agriculture," says Niebuhr, "is the watering of their grounds. The water which the husbandmen need, is often in a canal much below the level of the land which he means to refresh. The water he must therefore raise to an equality with the surface of the grounds; and distribute it over them as it is wanted. The great art of Egyptian husbandry is thus reduced to the having proper machines for raising the water, and enough of small canals judiciously disposed to distribute it." (Trav. vol. i. p. 86.)

The great supply of water in Egypt is from the Nile, which river obtains its increase from Ethiopia and Abyssinia, and upon the rise of which the fertility of Egypt depends. The inhabitants suppose, that at 14 cubits rise, they may have an inferior harvest; at 18, a very good one; but should it rise much higher, there would not be time for the draining of the water off the lands, in order to their reception of the seed. These high risings do other mischief also; such as washing away villages, &c. See Nile.

The history is farther than traditional.

There can be no doubt that Egypt was peopled from the East; but the tribes which first entered it, seem to have been under no regular guide. We conceive that Ham was intent on establishing himself in Asia; and that he actually founded there several potent kingdoms. He might afterwards visit Africa; and his son Mizraim might govern Egypt. However that was, we find Egypt peopled in the days of Abraham; and governed also by a Pharaoh. There is some reason to think that the Hamites, who settled in the provinces allotted to the posterity of Shem, ejected them from thence; and were the cause of their transmigration into Egypt. At least, appearances indicate that the first Pharaoh of Egypt spake the language of Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph; and that the Hebrews, the God of those patriarchs, was not unknown to them. Between the period of Joseph's elevation in Egypt, and the exodus of Israel, we place an invasion of Egypt by the Palli, from India, and refer to this race that new king which knew not Joseph. These accounts agree, perfectly, with the primitive state of all uninhabited countries; and they contribute to support the opinion, that Egypt was peopled from India. See Philistines.

For the connexion of the Egyptians with the people of Israel, the reader is referred to the historical sketch under the article Hebrews. See also the additions below.

Ezekiel (xxx. 13.) says, that there never any more shall be a reigning prince of the Egyptian nation over this country. Egypt was, indeed, to be a base kingdom; and what can be more base than a government composed of rulers who have been slaves, and the properties of others? Governors, not hereditary, nor elective by the people, nor promoted according to merit; but rising by intrigue from the lowest station. These accounts agree, perfectly, with the primitive state of all uninhabited countries; and they contribute to support the opinion, that Egypt was peopled from India. See Philistines.

have been blended in succession, they have been so confounded, as to render it very difficult to discriminate their respective characters. We may, however, still distinguish the inhabitants of Egypt into four principal races, of different origin. (Travels, vol. ii., pp. 61-63.)

These four he considers as, (1.) Arabs, the classess of husbandmen and arisians; (2.) the Copts, the writers, and government collectors; (3.) the Turks, who are masters of the country; (4.) the Mamelukes, who possess the authority over it, and who are a race of slaves, bought in distant countries. Surely the country lorded over by slaves may be justly considered as "the boast of kingdoms!"

When we reflect on the revolutions which this country has undergone, and upon the length of time during which it has been under the dominion of strangers, we can no longer be surprised at the decline of its wealth and population. It has been successively subdued by the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Arabsians, and the Turks—has enjoyed no interval of tranquillity and freedom, but has been constantly oppressed and pillaged by the lieutenants of a distant lord, who scarcely left the people bare means of subsistence. Agriculture was ruined by the miseries of the husbandman; and the cities decayed with its decline. Even at present, the population is decreasing; and the peasant, although in a fertile country, is miserably poor; for the exactions of government, and its officers, leave him nothing to lay out in the improvement and culture of his lands; while the cities are falling into ruins, because the same unhappy restraint render it impossible for the citizens to engage in any lucrative undertaking.

The Copts are descended from the ancient Egyptians: and the Turks, on this account, call them, in derision, "the posterity of Pharaoh." But their uncouth figure, their stupidity, ignorance, and wretchedness, do little credit to the sovereignty of ancient Egypt. They have lived for 3000 years under the dominion of different foreign conquerors, and have experienced many vicissitudes of fortune. They have lost their manners, their language, their religion, and almost their existence. They are reduced to a small number in comparison with the Arabs, who have penetrated into the very heart of the country. Of the distribution of the numbers of the Copts, some idea may be formed from the reduction of the number of their bishops. There were seventy in number at the period of the Arabian conquest. There are now only twenty-six.

As both the country and the inhabitants of Egypt occupy so prominent a place in the history of the Jewish people, and almost every thing which relates to them, goes directly to illustrate the Hebrew Scriptures, it may not be improper to give here a more detailed account of this important country, than is found in the preceding interesting, but somewhat meagre, article.

E"gypt is, in the Old Testament, usually called Mitzri, after the second son of Ham, and grandson of Noah; less frequently it is called Mazor, 2 Kings xix. 24; Isa. xix. 6; xxxvii. 25; Micah vii. 12; where, however, our English version has rendered this word by besieged place, fortress, defence. The ancient name of the country among the inhabitants themselves, was Chami, or Chami. (Khami.) or in the dialect of Upper Egypt, Khami. which the Hebrews probably pronounced as, Cham, or Ham, and referred to Ham, the grandfather of Mizraim. The Egyptian word signified blacks, according to Piutarch; (De Is. et Oris. p. 384.) and the land was so called from the dark color of its fruitful soil, manured by the slime deposited by the inundations of the Nile. In the Old Testament the name of Rashed, (arrangement) is sometimes given to Egypt; (Jer. xxx. 7; xxvi. 19; Psa. lxxviii. 4; xxxix. 7; 106.) but it would seem to have been applied, in consequence of the arrogance and oppression experienced by the Jews from the Egyptians. The origin and meaning of the name Egyptian (whence Egypt) is unknown. The present Arabic name of this country, Misr, comes from the Hebrew Miriam.

The proper land of Egypt is, for the most part, a great valley, through which the river Nile pours its waters, extending in a straight line from north to south, and skirted on the east and west by ranges of mountains, which approach and recede from the river more or less in different parts. Where this valley terminates, towards the north, the Nile divides itself, about 40 or 50 miles from the sea-coast, into several arms, which enclose the so called Delta. The ancients numbered seven arms and mouths; the eastern was that of Pegasus, now that of Tinet; and the western that of Canopus, now that of Aboukir. As these branches all separate from one point or channel, i. e. from the main stream, and spread themselves more and more as they approach the coast, they form with the latter a triangle, the base of which is the sea-coast; and having thus the form of the Greek letter Δ. delta, this part of Egypt received the name of the Delta, which it has ever since retained. The northern and southern points of Egypt are thus assigned by the prophet Ezekiel, xxix. 10; xxxi. 6; from Magdol, i. e. Magdolin, not far from the mouth of the Pelusian arm, to Syene, now Esna, namely, to the border of Egypt.

The length of the country, therefore, in a direct line, is about 800 geographical miles. The breadth of the valley, between Esna and the Delta, is very unequal; in some places the inundations of the river extend to the foot of the mountains; in other parts there remains a strip of a bare mile of land over the whole country. Of the distribution of the numbers of the Copts, some idea may be formed from the reduction of the number of their bishops. There were seventy in number at the period of the Arabian conquest. There are now only twenty-six.

As both the country and the inhabitants of Egypt occupy so prominent a place in the history of the Jewish people, and almost every thing which relates to them, goes directly to illustrate the Hebrew Scriptures, it may not be improper to give here a more detailed account of this important country, than is found in the preceding interesting, but somewhat meagre, article.
the whole country presents nothing but an immeasurable surface of reddish or yellowish water, out of which rise date-trees, villages, and narrow dunes, which serve as a means of communication. After the rains have ceased, which usually remain only a short time at this height, you see, till the end of summer, only a black and slimy mud. But in winter, nature puts on all her splendor. In this season, the freshness and power of the new vegetation, the variety and abundance of vegetable productions, excede everything that is known in the most celebrated parts of the European continent; and Egypt is then, from one end of the country to the other, nothing but a beautiful garden, a verdant meadow, a field sworn with flowers, or a waving ocean of grain in the sea. This fertility, as is well known, depends upon the annual and regular inundations of the Nile. See Nile.

The sky is not less uniform and monotonous than the earth; it is constantly a pure unclouded arch, of a color and light more brilliant than in Europe. The atmosphere has a splendor which the eye can scarcely bear; and a burning sun, whose glow is tempered by no shade, scorches through the whole day these vast and unpopulated plains. It is almost a peculiar trait in the Egyptian landscape, that although not without trees, it is yet almost without shade. The only tree is the date-tree, which is frequent; but with its tall, slender stem, and bunch of foliage on the top, this tree does very little to keep off the heat, and casts upon the earth only a pale shade. About Egypt, accordingly, has a very hot climate; the thermometer in summer standing usually at 80 or 90 degrees of Fahrenheit; and in Upper Egypt still higher. The burning wind of the desert, Siwans, or Calasiris, is also experienced, usually about the time of the early equinox. The country is also not unfrequently visited by swarms of locusts. See Loc-custers.

The chief agricultural productions of Egypt are wheat, barley, beans, cucumbers, water-melons, leaks and onions; also flax and cotton. The date-tree and vine are frequent. The poppy is still found in small quantity, chiefly near Damietta; it is a reed about nine feet high, as thick as a man's thumb, with a tuft of down on the top. The animals of Egypt, besides the usual kinds of tame cattle, are the wild ox or buffalo in great numbers, the ass and camel, dogs in multitudes without masters, the ichneumon, (a kind of vassal,) the crocodile, and the hippopotamus; for which, see these articles respectively.

In the very earliest times, Egypt appears to have already been regarded under three principal divisions; and writers spoke either of Upper and Lower Egypt;
or of Upper Egypt or Thebais, Middle Egypt, Hap-tonis or Heptapolis, and Lower Egypt or the Del-tin, including the districts lying east and west. The provinces and cities of Egypt mentioned in the Bible may, in like manner, be arranged under these three great divisions.

I. Lower Egypt. The north-eastern point of this was the Broek of Egypt, (see below,) on the border of Palestine. The desert between this point, the Red sea, and the ancient Pelusium, seems to have been the desert of Sinae, (Gen. xx. 1. al.) now el-Djefer.
Six, "the strength [key] of Egypt", (Ex. xxi. 15.)
was probably Pelusium. The land of Goshen apppears to have lain between Pelusium, its branch of the Nile, and the Red sea, having been skirted on the north-east by the desert of Shur; constituting; perhaps, a part of the province Rameses; (Gen. xvii.

11.) In this district, or adjacent to it, are mentioned also the cities Pitron, Ramses, Pi-Berser, and Ow or Horsopon. In the proper Delta itself, by Tarkunites, C. M.; the Dijkunites, or"Delitain or Thebes of the Greeks; Leostopolis, mentioned perhaps in Is. xii. 18. To the west of the Delta was Alexandria.

II. Middle Egypt. Here are mentioned Memphis or Memphis; and Hems, the Copit Hese or Elens, the Hylas or Helene, the Anexy of Herodotus, and Great Heracleopolis of the Greeks.

III. Upper Egypt. The southern part of Egypt the Hebrews appear to have called Phoeres, (Jer. xiv.
18.) The Bible mentions here only two cities, viz.
No, or more fully, No-Ammon. Six, the Servan-pit Diospolis, the Greek name for Thebes, the most ancient capital of Egypt; (see Ammon and Thebes) and Syene, the southern city and limit of Egypt.

The early history of ancient Egypt is involved in great obscurity; and this is the not the place to enter into its details. All accounts, however, and the re-results of all modern researches, seem to concur, in representing culture and civilization as having been introduced and spread in Egypt from the south, and especially from Nubia; and that the country in the earliest times was possessed by several contemporary kings or sates, which at length were all united into one great kingdom. A priesthood seems to have ruled the land; and in some of the smaller states, the head of the state was also a priest. Long after the death of Joseph, apparently, the Hyksos or shepherds, most probably an Arabian nomadic tribe, began their irruptions, and at last got possession of the country. After they were driven out, the whole land appears to have been again united under one sovereign, and from this time, or about 1100 B. C., to have enjoyed its greatest prosperity. The first king of the 10th dynasty, as it is called by Manetho, was the celebrated Sesone, about 1500 B. C. His successors are all called in the Bible, not by their proper names, but by the general appellation Pharer, i. e. kings. The first who is mentioned by his proper name is Shishak, (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26.) supposed to be the Sesonechis of Manetho, about 970
B. C. In the same century, Ethiopian kings reigned over Upper Egypt. Two of them are mentioned in the Bible, viz. So, or Sevechus, (2 Kings xvii. 4.) about 722 B. C. and Tirhaka, contemporary with Her-echib, 2 Kings xix. 9. The latter is said by Herodotus, to have withdrawn from Egypt, (ii. 18.) After this, the whole country was for a time under twelve kings, (about 711 B. C.) who at length were all subduced by Psammetichus, to whom allusion is made in Isa. xiv. 9. His son Necho is mentioned 2 Kings xxiii. 25, seq. xxiv. 7, and elsewhere. The grandson of Necho was Hophra, who is also often mentioned in the Scriptures. This dynasty was overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar, as announced by the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jer. xiii. 10—13; xli. 13, seq.
Ezek. xxix. 18, seq. xxx. 16, seq. xxiii. 11, seq. xxiv. 20. With these anticipations the reports of Arabian writers distinctly agree.

Egypt was afterwards conquered by Cambyses, and became a province of the Persian empire about 525
B. C. Thus it continued until conquered by Alex-sander, 330 B. C., after whose death it formed, along with Syria, Palestine, Lydia, &c. the kingdom of the Ptolemaics. After the battle of Actium, 30 B. C. it became a Roman province. Since that time it has ceased to be an independent state, and its history is incorporated with that of its different conquerors and possessions. In 640, it was conquered by the Arabs; and in later periods has passed from the hands of the caliphs to the power of the Turks, Egyptians, Seldoms, Avars, and even the Turks, and since 1517, has been governed as a province of the Turkish empire.

The division of the inhabitants which prevails in Egypt, and especially the ancient division into castes, has been spoken of above.

From the histories of Egypt by Manetho, Herodotus, Diodorus, Strabo, Plutarch, and others, and from the modern discoveries of Champollion in hieroglyphics, chronologists have been led to divide the Egyptian empire into five periods. These are as follows: (1.)

The first begins with the establishment of their government, and comprehends the time during which all religious and political authority was in the hands of the priests, who laid the first foundation of the future power of Egypt, founding and embellishing the great city of Thebes, building magnificent temples, and instituting the mysteries of Isis, from Mizzraim to Menes. (2.) The second period begins at the abolition of this primitive government, and the first establishment of the monarchical government by Memnon. This time commences when is generally called the Pharonic age, and ends at the eruption of Cambyse. This is the most brilliant period of Egyptian history; during which Egypt was covered with those magnificent works which still command our admiration and excite our astonishment; and by the wisdom of its institutions and laws, and by the learning of its priests, was rendered the most rich, populous, and enlightened country in the world. (3.) The third epoch includes the period of the Persian domination, about 200 years. (4.) The fourth covers the reigns of the Ptolemies. (5.) The fifth begins when Egypt became a Roman province, and continues to the middle of the fourth century. Compare Spinoza’s Lectures on Hieroglyphics, p. 25, seq.

The religion of Egypt consisted in the worship of the heavenly bodies and the powers of nature; the priests cultivated at the same time astronomy and astrology, and to these belonged probably the wise men, scribes, and magicians, mentioned in the Bible. Both were probably this wisdom, in which Moses also was learned, Acts vii. 22. But the Egyptian religion had this peculiarity, that it adopted living animals as symbols of the real objects of worship. The Egyptians not only esteemed many species of animals as sacred, which might not be killed without the punishment of death, but individual animals were kept in temples and worshipped with sacrifices, as gods. (See Arts.) But although this worship of animals was common throughout Egypt, yet it differed in different parts of the country. There were but a few species which all Egypt worshipped. The others were sacred in one district, but not in another. In one province, they might be killed and eaten; in another, the punishment of death was the price of doing them an injury. (Herod. ii. 155, seq.) It was in consequence of this, that the destruction of the first-born in Egypt was made to extend also to the beasts. Ex. xii. 12.

The language of the ancient Egyptians differed essentially from all the Asiatic languages, as appears from the remains of it still extant in the Coptic. This last indeed has ceased to be a living language since the eighth century; for although the Copts continue to form a distinct class in the Egyptian population, yet, like the other inhabitants, they speak Arabic. But their former language still exists in their writings, which are limited to a version of the Scriptures, homilies, lives of the saints and martyrs, and the like.

The language of the Copts, in which the Gospel of the Copts is written, is a combination of the Pharonic language with some of the Greek words; and also the Coptic alphabet is borrowed from the Greek, with the addition of eight letters, for sounds which could not be marked by the Greek characters. With the help even of the language as found in these writings, learned men, particularly Jablonsky, Quatremere, and Champollion, as well as others, have been able to illustrate the meaning of many old Egyptian words which occur in the Old Testament, and in Greek and Roman writers. It cannot, however, be supposed, that the language at the time of the introduction of Christianity was in all respects the same as that spoken in the times of the Pharohs; and this is confirmed by the modern attempts to decipher the inscriptions on monuments, and the language of papyri rolls, from the times of the Pharohs and Ptolemies. The language of these differs from the Coptic, as was to be expected, in forms, flexion, and syntax. The subject will be more fully developed when the researches of Champollion and others shall have been completed, and laid before the public. For the connection or resemblance between the ancient Egyptian and Hebrew alphabets, see professor Stuart’s note in Groppe’s Essay on the Hieroglyphics, pp. 55, 56, to which work also the reader, who wishes to obtain further information respecting hieroglyphics, may be referred.

The most extraordinary monuments of Egyptian power and industry were the pyramids, which still subsist, to excite the wonder and admiration of the world. A description of these extraordinary structures has generally been considered as matter of curiosity, rather than as being applicable in illustrating the Scriptures, since there appears to be no allusion to them in the Bible. They have been supposed to have been erected by the Israelites during their bondage in Egypt. Josephus, indeed, says expressly, that the Egyptians “treated the Israelites inhumanly, and thought to wear them out by various labors; they caused the river into many channels, to build walls around the cities, and mounds to prevent the access of water where it would become stagnant; and by building the pyramids, also, they diminished our people.” (Antiq. iii. 9, 1.) Whether Josephus wrote from the authority of a national tradition, or as a conjecture of his own, cannot be determined. But the tenor of ancient history in general, as well as the results of modern researches, is against the supposition of the pyramids having been built by the Israelites; and they are usually assigned to a later period. Mr. Taylor, however, has adopted the above hypothesis, and attempts to support it by the arguments which follow. They may stand here, as a specimen of that kind of learning, which delights in doubtful and shadowy speculation, rather than in sober and judicial research. R.

Mr. Taylor conceives that Providence has left us the pyramids, as everlasting monuments of the veracity of that Sacred History with which we are favored. In fact, that they are part, at least, of the labors of the Israelites, previous to the exodus; and that they remain to witness the leading events of that portion of the history of the sons of Jacob. The following considerations are advanced in support of this opinion:

1. If we inquire what were the labors of the Israelites for the Pharaohs, we find that they consisted in making bricks, to be hardened in the sun, for such bricks as actually built the enormous edifices of stone in their construction, which material is expressly told us was gathered, mixed with mud, and built by the officers of this people, Exod. i. 14. Now, it appears from various travellers, that the internal construction of these mighty masses consists, among other materials, of brick of this description; and thereby agrees with that circumstance of the sacred narrative. This is true of the great pyramid, which is usually visited; but the pyramids of Sakkara, at some distance, are wholly composed of sun-burnt bricks, so that these are undeniable.

2. The multitude, when in the wilderness, regret the fish which they ate in Egypt, freshy, or dried; and the vegetables, the cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, garlic, Num. xi. 5. In conformity with this, we are told by Herodotus, that on the pyramid was an inscription, "expressing the expense of the articles of food consumed by the laborers; radishes, (the leeks, perhaps, of Scripture,) onions, and garlic; they cost 1,000 talents of silver." No doubt these vegetables were cheap enough; so that the whole time of building, and the various number of workmen, employed during a great length of time. Herodotus also admires the further sum which must have been expended in food and clothes.

3. As to the number of persons employed in their erection, Bunsen says, 380,000 workmen, or slaves, were occupied twenty years in constructing the pyramid of Cheops. Herodotus says 100,000 were employed in bringing stones; 10,000 at a time, who relieved each other every three months. It may be supposed, therefore, that the number given by Diodorus, includes the whole of the population employed in all departments, while the number given by Herodotus is that employed in a specific department; but, that all were relieved every three months, and that only a proportion of one tenth was employed at a time, seems to have been a kind of rule in the business. Now, it is very likely that the Israelites were in this manner relieved; for we find, (Exod. iv. 27.) that the mother of Moses was able to conceal him, when an infant, no longer than three months. And as we were told of the Genuine Nebuchadrezzar (which usually occupies two months, says Dr. Shaw,) he was employed under the mountains, and there he was visited by the young female, (the genuine Memory,) and there he was visited by the young female, who was told of the genuine Nebuchadrezzar. Moses, who, had he been kept without interruption to his labor, would have been impossible. Indeed, if the Israelites, bored in the field, they could not have been constantly employed in the field, but they did labor in the field. The Egyptians, says Diodorus, are not those that labor in the field, for the produce of the field is evident from their possession of great herds of cattle, when they went out of Egypt. Add to this, that their profession was that of shepherds, that they were placed in the richest pastureage in Egypt, that Moses stipulates that not a hoof should be left behind, and that the very institution of the passover-lamb implies the possession of flocks; these, with other circumstances, show clearly that the Israelites must have had immense flocks, in time, to which to pay attention to their own property and business.

4. It is almost certain that the native Egyptians, or the governing nation, at least, did not labor on these structures; for Diodorus Siculus says, (lib. i. cap. 2.) "He (Scopas) built . . . he employed in these works none of his own subjects, but only the labors of captives. He was even careful to engrave these words on the temples, 'No Egyptian had a hand in this structure.' They say further, that the captives brought from Babylon, unable to endure these labors, found means to escape, and . . . made war against the Egyptians," etc. It is therefore likely that the stranger Israelites found in Egypt, by "the king who knew not Joseph, and whose increasing numbers and strength he dreamed could be the ruin of Egypt," with more waste of their strength, on structures only useful in a political view, rather than any of the natural inhabitants, towards whom the same policy was not necessary. This conduct was afterwards adopted by Solomon; (1 Kings ix. 27.) "Solomon built . . . of the Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, etc., who were not of the children of Israel did Solomon levy a tribute of bond service—but of the children of Israel did Solomon make: no bondmen; but they were men of war," etc.

5. That it was anciently, as it still is in the East, the custom to employ bondsmen in building, is notorious; we have therefore only to inquire, whether this character was attached to the Israelites. It is expressly attributed to them; for they are said to have been brought out of the house of bondage; (Exod. xx. 2.) they are charged to remember they were bondmen in Egypt, Deut. vii. 9, 10. That the Israelites did not make brick only, but performed other labors, is evident from the number of buildings, (not poles, as in our translation,) and with this rendering agree the LXX, Vulgate, Symmachus, and others. It is recorded, indeed, that the Israelites built cities for Pharaoh, and in such building they might and must carry the burden, and the mortar-hod, (analogous to our mortar-hod,) yet as their delivery from these things is spoken of, as the furnace is evidently not distant from the residence of Pharaoh, and as there is no reason to suppose that soon after they had built these cities they were dismissed; these circumstances seem to corroborate a positive testimony of Josephus, that Israel was employed on the pyramids. We may, perhaps, attribute the omission of finishing the last pyramid to the confusion consequent on the death of Pharaoh in the Red sea, and the hatred which attended it in every land; the Hyksos, which race he did not belong; but was usurper over them, as he was a tyrant over Israel.

6. The space of time allotted to the erection of these immense masses, coincides with what is usually allotted to the slavery of the Israelites. Israel is understood to have been in Egypt 215 years; of which, Joseph ruled seventy years, nor was it till long after his death, that the "new king arose who knew not Joseph." If we allow about forty years for the extent of the generation which succeeded Joseph, added to his seventy, there remain about a hundred and five years to the exodus. Now—Herodotus tells us, (lib. ii. cap. 134.) that "till the reign of Ramses, (the Ramses of Scripture,) Egypt was not only remarkable for its abundance, but for its excellent laws. Cheops, who succeeded this prince, degenerated into the utmost profligacy of conduct. He barred the avenues to every temple, forbade the Egyptians from offering sacrifices, and next proceeded to make them labor servilely for himself by building the pyramids. Cheops reigned fifty years. (Cap. 137.) His brother Chephren succeeded, and reigned fifty-six years; he adopted a similar conduct. Thus for the space of 106 years, were the Egyptians grovelled to every species of oppression and calamity; not having in all this period permission to worship in their temples. For the memory of these two nations was so sad and bitter, that they were not willing to mention their names. They call their pyramids by the name of the shepherd Philip-tis, who at that time fed his cattle in those places. Mysterious succeeded Chephren; disapproved his father's conduct; commanded the temples to be opened, and the people, who had been reduced to the most extreme affliction, were again permitted to offer sacrifice."—Here are plain traces of a government from a foreign family, and of a worship contrary to that which had been previously established in Egypt, which agrees exactly with circumstances narrated in Exodus. The historian relates that it lasted 106 years, in which it coincides with the bondage-time of the sons of Israel.

But there is information couched under the ambiguous mention of the shepherd Philisti, which should not escape us. It is clear, that the Egyptians could not call the kings by whose order the pyramids (plural) were built, by this name, in the hearing of Herodotus, since they referred them to their king Cheops and Chephren; besides which, it would seem that the shepherd Philisti had formerly, and customarily, fed his cattle elsewhere. We may, therefore, understand this passage thus:—They attributed the labor of constructing these pyramids to a shepherd who came from Philistia; but who, at that time fed his cattle in the land of Egypt. Implying, that they more readily told the appellation of the workmen (the sons of Israel, the shepherds), Gen. xli. 51., employed in the building, than of the kings by whose commands they were built. They seem to have done the same in the days of Diodorus, who remarks: "They admit that these works are superior to all which are seen in Egypt; not only by the immensity of their mass, and by their prodigious cost, but still more by the beauty of their construction; and the workmen who have rendered them so perfect, are much more estimable than the kings who paid their cost: for the former have hereby given a memorable proof of their genius and skill, whereas the kings contributed only the riches left by their ancestors, or extorted from their subjects... They say, the first was erected by Arnumis, the second by Armanasis, the third by laron." The first name in Latin, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Moussis, interprets Αρημωνις, or Αρμωνις, which is, "the Syrian?" and then the title perfectly coincides with the mention of the shepherd of Palestine, by Herodotus. This passage being extremely curios, and perhaps never properly understood, the national Greek is subjoined. (Diod. Sic. ii. sect. 2.)

This coincidence will appear more striking if the names be considered distinct from their prefixes, for, if we compare them with the description of Moses and Aaron, (Ex. vi. 26, 27.) we find them the same, as near as traditionary pronunciation by natives of different countries could bring it: a Αρημωνις, or ha Αρημωνις, or ha Αρημωνις, or ha Λωρον, or ha Αρημωνις, or ha Λωρον, or Λωρον, or ha Αρημωνις, or ha Λωρον, or Λωρον, which, where two vowel sounds came together, took a consonant between them, when spoken,—Λωρον. This, therefore, confirms the supposition, that the Israelites were employed on the pyramids; first, under the appellation of the Syrian, or Αραμαν, (the very title given to Jacob, "An Aramaite ready to perish was my father, he went down into Egypt... and the Egyptians evil entreated us, and afflicted us, and压迫 us even with hard bondage, so that we cried unto the Lord, and the Lord heard our voice, and was mindful of our affliction, and remembered his covenant for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob..." Afterwards, under the names of the two most famous principals of that people.

But beside the names of Moses and Aaron, the builders, we may possibly find that the names of the kings by whose order they were built, are also pres-served, so far at least as by the help of Scripture to afford assistance in this inquiry. "Ramsesius, (supposed to be the Rames of the next paragraph, from Diodorus Siculus) possessed such abundance of wealth, that so far from surpassing, none of his successors ever equalled him in affluence..." says Herodotus; who also relates a history of his treasury, from which the least we can gather is that it was very extraordinary. "Rames, (son of Probus,)" having succeeded his father, employed the whole period of his reign in increasing his revenues, and amassing gold and silver... he left behind him more riches than any of his predecessors; for it is said that in his coffers were found 400,000 talents," (Diod. Sic. i. sect. 2.

Ramseses or Ramessenes (Benjamin of Tudela writes it Raphseses; Eusebius, Ramessae; Josephus, Ramphates; and such differences indicate a foreign origin) is the name of a town, (Exod. i. 11; xii. 37.) apparently named after this king of Egypt; and if pronounced Rucmeses, it would be the Indian Rucmesantes. This eliclion is common in India, and ma-Jor Wilford adopts it himself, by supposing that the Tumusates of this passage is the Tissares of the Greek writers. Rucmesates was, says the Purana, NOT OF THE ROYAL RACE OF EGYPT; but his grandfather Tumusates defeated the Egyptian king, "placed himself on the throne of Mira, and governed the kingdom with perfect equity: his son Bales-sates devoted himself to religion, having resigned his domominion to his son Rucmesates, who tenderly loved his people, and so highly improved this country, that from his just revenues he amassed an incredible treasure. His wealth was so great, that he raised three mountains called Rucmes, Rezatades, and Retnadri; or, the MOUNTAIN of gold, of silver, and of gems. The author says, mountains, but it appears, says major Wilford, from the context, that they were fabrics. (The Arnia and Turks call them Djebel Pharonim, or flies of the Pharaoh.) The mountains can be little or no doubt, that they are the three pyramids near Mira-sthan, or Memphis. Rucmesates was no tyrant to his own people, whom he cherished, says the "Malacupal," as if they had been his own children; but he might have been a native Egyptians to work, for the sake of keeping them employed, and subduing their spirit. The first was said to be of gold, because coated with yellow marble; the second of silver, because coated with white marble; the third of gems, because coated with variegated marble; or perhaps marbles set in some pattern.

Now, the opposite character of this Rucmesates is what we should expect would be delivered by writers of opposite nations. (1) He was a foreigner, introduced by conquest, therefore, "he knew not Joseph," nor cared for any former services rendered by that "Saviour of the Egyptian world." (2) He tenderly loved his people—his own people, foreigners like himself; but the Egyptians were not so fond of him, they rather banished his name from their memory, and hated the mention of it. (3) From his just revenues he amassed treasures—but his conquer-ad subjects would describe this as iniquitous exaction. (4.) This family shut up the temples; and we are almost certainly assured in the instance of Egypt. This might be referred to the civil and religious writers of the Mahasalpa; but the original Egyptians would esteem it persecution for religion's sake, and consequently wickedness of no common guilt. (5.) It is surprising that no other three mountains were built during the reign of his family;—on these he did not employ his own people, but partly the native Egyptians, with others whom he found in the country, (the sacred mastaba of Exod. xii. 35.) and partly the Israelites, whom he wished to subdue by force. The character of this prince agrees sufficiently to prove his identity; and it deserves sufficiently to prove, that on one side it is viewed with the eye of national and religious partiality; on the other, with the aversion of national and religious abhorrence. Thus the assertion of the Jews, that his Taxation accumulated wealth; wealth is dissipated in expensive buildings, and is accompanied by overdriven slavery; this issue in insurrection, and the escape of the sufferers. Precisely parallel to this is the conquest of the world, the three tribes from the family of Solomon, 1 Kings 3. 4, 18; 2 Chron.
x. 4. It is impossible to refrain from observing how aptly historical narration and geographical discussion illustrate each other. We form this general conclusion, that so many coincidences as you go on to believing that the pyramids of Egypt were built when Israel was in that land; were partly constructed by those people; and that the labors they exacted fostered that aversion of mind which the true Egyptians entertained against the memories of their oppressors; so that in later ages, the priests rather mentioned, to inquiring foreigners, the names of the operatives builders, than of the kings whose treasures had been consumed. And the difference of names between Cheops and Ramses; probably one may be a title, or a name taken on a certain occasion; or one may be a Hindoos, the other an Egyptian, appellation. At all events, we know so little on this subject, that no objection can be maintained from it, without further information.

The pyramids are such extraordinary works, that they justify extraordinary attention; and having atttempted to ascertain their builders, we shall subjoin a conclusion or report. They have been usually described as three mountains, but it appears from the context, says major Wilford, that they were fabrics;—and he adds, "As to the three stupendous edifices, called mountains, from their size and form, there can be little or no doubt that they were the three great pyramids near Miers-at-han or Memphis; which, according to the Purans and to Pliny, were built from a motive of ostentation, but, according to Aristotle, were monuments of tyranny." The Brunaces never understood that any pyramid in Mersathala, or Egypt, was intended as a repository for the dead; and no such idea is conveyed by the Maahalpa, where several other pyramids are expressly mentioned as places of worship. There are pyramids now at Benares, but on a small scale, with subterranean passages under them, which are said to extend many miles; when the doors, which close them, are opened, we perceive only dark holes, which do not seem of great extent, and pilgrims no longer resort to them, through fear of mephitic air, or of noxious reptiles. The narrow passage, leading to the great pyramid in Egypt, was designed to render the holy apartment less accessible, and to inspire the votaries with more awe. On my describing the great Egyptian pyramid to several very learned Brusselers, they declared it at once to have been a temple, appropriate to the worship of Osiris; and that the supposed tomb was a trough, which, on certain festivals, her priests used to fill with the sacred water and loto-flowers." These sentiments are repetitions of those which governed the builders of Bab, who supposed a temple, the top of which was
"should be (sacred) to the heavens;" and these Egyptian pyramids were limitations of that in the land of Shinar, and were intended for the same purposes. (See Babel.) But, we must not pass that consideration, as if it were only a mark of the agreement that it greatly contributes to strengthen our argument.

The Sphinx is a figure composed of a lion's body, and a woman or man's bosom, neck, and head. This is perfectly true, though the native of Egypt, supposing it to be a foreign nation, supposed to have over-run Egypt; and it forms an instance of the care taken to perpetuate the insignia of the original country. In short, the Hindoos, conquerors (see Babel) placed it in front of the pyramids, and go on to say, that they wish sufficiently to recall the memory of the Sun-rising land. The number of smaller pyramids, and of temples, still existing in ruins around, demonstrate that here was a prodigious establishment for national worship; such an one, no doubt, the builders at Bab placed;
but the want of stone in that country obliging them to use brick, the labors of the Pharaohs have outlasted the efforts of the chiefs of Babylon.

But though it be admitted that the Israelites contributed to erect the pyramids, it does not follow that they cased them with their coating of marble or granite.
That was, in all probability, performed by professed artists; the stones were brought from a distance, and the labor of the Israelites was in their preparation and use. It is indeed a tradition on the spot, that the Israelites dug out from the rocks adjacent those grottos which show from where came the layers of stone which accompany the ruble work; and this may be true; but the granite, it is presumed, they did not cut.

EGYPT, BROOK, OR RIVER OF. This is fre-frequently mentioned as the southern limit of the Land of Promise, Gen. xv. 18; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Num. xxiv. 5; Joshua xiv. 4. It has been variously rendered as Nile: remarking that Joshua (xiii. 3.) describes it by the name of Sibor; which is the true name of the Nile; "the muddy river:" and that Amos (vi. 14.) calls it the river of the wilderness, because the eastern arm of the Nile adjoined Arabia, one of the wilderness, in Hebrew Araba, and watered the district by the Egyptians called Arabian. In answer to this, it is said that this stream was the limit of Judea toward Egypt; and that the LXX. (Isaiah xxvii. 12.) unto the river of Egypt render "to Rhinocorura," a town certainly not adjacent to the Nile. Besides, it is extremely dubious whether the power of the Hebrew nation extended, at any time, to the Nile; and if it did, it was over a mere sandy desert. But as this desert is unquestionably the natural boundary of the Syrian dominions, no reason can be given why the political boundary should exceed it. Such an anomaly is an error against both nature and geography. We take the river of Egypt, therefore, to be the brook Besore between Gaza and Rhinocorura.
See Josh. xiv. 47. See Nile.

EHUD, son of Gera; a judge of Israel, who slew Eglon, king of Moab, Judg. ii. 15.
ELATH, or Eloth, a city of Edom on the eastern gulf of the Red sea, and which Smiths thinks was named Edom, or Elath, in the Vulgate. It was called Leuan, from the Leunites, a people that dwelt on the shores of the Elanitic gulf, which gulf was between Edloth and Gaza. In later ages it was commonly called Elana, and was, according to Jerome, the first port from which to sail from India to Egypt. After the decease of Alexander, and the wars consequent on his death, Elana was subject to the kings of Egypt; afterwards to those of Syria; then to the Romans, who, in the days of Jerome, stationed the tenth legion there.

Ibn Haukull (Appendix to Eng. Tr. of D'Arvieux,) describes Elah as "formerly a small town, with some fruitful lands about it: it is the city of those Jews who were turned into hogs and monkeys. It stands upon the coast of the Red sea, pretty near the road of the Egyptian pilgrims that go to Mecca. It is now nothing but a tower, the residence of a governor, who depends upon him of Grand Cairo. There are no longer any sown fields there.

There was formerly a fort built in the sea, but it is all gone to ruin, and the commander lives in the tower we were just speaking of, which stands by the water-side." This information is of consequence, as it shows that the character of the country is changed. It had formerly "fruitful lands;" it had "sown fields." It had also "a fort built in the sea," but there would have been no occasion for a fort, and still less for a fort in the sea, if it had not formerly been a seaport, and a place worth defending.

Describing the Red sea, the same writer says, (p. 383.)—"Leaving Madian, it comes to Aliah, which is under the 55th degree of longitude, and 29th of latitude. From Aliah the sea bends southward as far as Al-tour, which is mount Sinai, that by a very high cape, jutting out into the sea, divides it into two arms. From thence, turning back again northward, it comes at last to Kolzum, which stands to the west of Aliah, both of them having almost the same latitude. Kolzum and Aliah are situate upon the two ends of the sea we have been speaking of, and so are we arrived at the northern coast. We see the turnings and windings which this sea makes, which we have just now been describing, the land juts out on the south; and the place where it parts the sea is Al-tour,—mount Sinai, the longitude of which is almost the same as it stands upon the extremity of the eastern arm or channel, and Kolzum upon the extremity of the western one. Aliah is more easterly than Kolzum. What is between Kolzum and Aliah is mount Al-tour, which is more southerly than Kolzum, and Aliah lies at the end of the cape that runs out into the sea. The sea flows between Al-tour and the coast of Egypt, and shuts up the channel or arm, upon the extremity of which Kolzum stands. Just so between Al-tour and the shore of Hegiaz there is another channel, upon the extremity of which the town of Aliah stands. To go from Al-tour to either of the opposite lands is a very short passage by sea, but it is abundantly a longer way by the desert of Fakth, because those who come from Al-tour to go into Egypt must of necessity pass round Kolzum; or beyond Aliah, if they are going to Hegiaz. Al-tour is joined to the continent on the north side; but it is encompassed by the sea on the other three sides." The following is Mr. Bruce's account of the eastern or Elanic, gulf of the Red sea:--"We sailed from cape Mahomet, just as the sun appeared. We passed the island of Tyrone in the mouth of the Elanic gulf, which it divides nearly equally into two; or, rather, the north-west side is the narrowest. The direction of the gulf is nearly north and south. I judge it to be about six leagues over. Many of the Cairo ships are lost in mistaking the entry of the Elanic gulf for that of the Heropolitic gulf, or gulf of Suez; for, from the island of Tyrone, which is not above two leagues from the main, there runs a string of islands, which seem to make a semicircular bar across the entry from the point, where a ship, going with a south wind, would take its departure; and this range of islands ends in a shoal with sunken rocks, which reaches near five leagues from the main. Rehboorn perished when sailing for the expedition of Ophir, 2 Chron. xxvii. 37." (Trav. i. p. 241.)

The country around the eastern, or Elanic, gulf of the Red sea, has been, until very recently, a terra incognita. One of the most important of Burckhardt's discoveries, is said by his editor, Mr. Leake, himself a traveller and man of science, to be the ascertaining of "the exact and form of the Elanic gulf, hitherto so imperfectly known, as either to be omitted in the maps, or marked with a bifurcation at the extremity, which yet was not found to exist." (Preface to Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, &c. &c. p. v.)

It is to the same traveller, also, that we were first indebted for a knowledge of the existence of the long valley, known by the names of El Ghor, and El Araba, extending from the Dead sea to the Elanic gulf, and forming a prolongation of the great valley of the Jordan; that is, the Jordan once discharged itself into the Red sea. See Burckhardt's letter, inserted in the article CARMAN, also, the extract below, from Ruppell; and compare the articles EXODUS AND JORDAN.

It is to be supposed that about 1765, the Burckhardt visited the peninsula of mount Sinai, and examined the western coast of the Elanic gulf, with the intention of proceeding to Akaba, situated at its northern extremity. Having arrived, however, within sight of the land, he was unable to proceed, because of the hostile and perfidious character of the tribes of Bedouins, in that vicinity, to whom his guides were strangers. (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 506, seq.) "The Alowein and the Omran are the masters of the district of Akaba, insomuch that robbers, who are to this day entirely independent of the government of Egypt. Through them we must unavoidably pass, to reach Akaba; and Ayd [the guide] could not give me the smallest hope of being able to cross their valley without being attacked; I saw little chance of success, and knew, from what I had heard on my journey, that the Omran not only rob but murder passengers. I had no alternative but to turn back; and, under these circumstances, I reluctantly determined to retract my steps the next day. He had, indeed, advanced too far already; for the very next day he and his three Arab guides were attacked by a party of Bedouins, and escaped only after killing one of the latter."

"Akaba was not so far distant from the spot from which we returned. Before sunset, I could distinguish a black line in the plain, where my sharp-sighted guides clearly saw the date-trees surrounding the castle, which bore N. E. by E.; it could not be more than five or six hours distant. Before us was a promontory; and behind this, as I was told, another, which blackened the sea. We sailed for Akaba. The castle is situated at an hour and a half or two hours from the western chain of hills, down which the Hadjy route leads; and about the same distance from the eastern chain, a lower continuation of Tor Heuna, a mountain which I have mentioned. The journey through the northern parts of Arabia Petraea is long and steep, and has probably given to the place its name of Akaba, which in Arabic means a cliff or steep declivity; it is probably the Akabet Asia of the Arabian geographers. [Compare the extract from Ibn Haukal, above.] In Numbers xxxiv. 4. the "ascent of Akrabbin" is mentioned, which appears to correspond very accurately to this ascent of the western mountain from the plain of Akaba. Into this plain, which surrounds the castle on every side except the sea, issues the Wady el Araba, the broad sandy valley which leads towards the Dead sea, and which I crossed, in 1812, at a day and a half, or two days' journey from Akaba. At about the hour to which we arrived, the sea is strongly impregnated with salt, but farther north sands prevail. The castle itself stands at a few hundred paces from the sea, and is surrounded by large groves of date-trees. It is a square building, with strong walls, erected, as it now stands, by sultan el Ghoury, of Egypt, in the sixteenth century. The castle has tolerably good water in deep wells. The pantaloon of Egypt keeps here a garrison of about twenty men, to guard the provisions deposited for the supply of the Hadjy, [or annual caravan to Mecca,] and for the use of the cavalry, on their passage by this route to join the army of the Hadjy."

It appears that the gulf extends very little farther east than the castle, distant from which one hour, in a southern direction, and on the eastern shore of the gulf, lies a smaller and half-ruined castle, inhabited by Bedouins only, called Kaszer el Bedawy. At about three quarters of an hour from Akaba, and the same distance from the plain of Akaba, is a small island, which does not form a branch at this extremity, as it has always been laid down in the maps; but I was assured it had only a single ending, at which the castle is situated."

"Makrizi, the Egyptian historian, says, in his chapter on Aila (Akaba). 'It is from hence that the Hodejz begins; in former times it was the frontier place of the Greeks; at one mile from it is a triumphal arch of the Cæsars. In the time of the Islam, it was a fine town; inhabited by the Beni Omeya. Ibn Ahmed Ibn Toulon (a sultan of Egypt) made the road over the Akaba, a steep mountain before Aila. There were many mosques at Aila, and many Jews lived there; it was taken by the Franks, during the crusades; but in 566, [of the Hegira,] Sacheverell had taken it. The sultan of Damascus was sent against them, and they were made prisoners; all the Jews and a great part of the Moslems were destroyed; the rest were sold into slavery and transported to the islands, and only the monks of the mountains of Aila were saved.' Sacheverell had taken it from the Venetians, and afterwards made it a great fortified place, against the Turks, who had many times made incursions upon it.
ELATH [ 380 ]

With better success, Mr. Rüppell, in 1822, visited this region, and came to Akaba itself. His personal observation goes to show the great general accuracy of the information collected by Burchardt from the testimony of others. He approached the plain from the west, on the route of the Hadji, or great annual caravan from Egypt to Mecca, alluded to above. The following is a translation of his remarks upon this region. (Reisen, etc. Frankf. 1829, p. 247, seq.)

"On this high table-land, we remarked, as we descended by a steep path among the rocks, that we were elevated at least fifteen hundred feet above the level of the sea. The view from the terrace of this plateau was very picturesque; but probably produced the greater effect on me, because we had behind us a most hideous desert. From this point one beholds, in the distance, the steep blue granite mountains on the other side of Akaba; on the right, a section of the deep-green sea. In the foreground, are wild and ragged masses of dark primitive rocks; on which recline, in different parts, layers of yellowish shell-limestone. On the left is the valley of Wady Araba, through which the dry bed of a stream, shaded with bushes, winds among luxuriant meadow-groves.

"We occupied more than five hours in descending from this high table-land to the sea-shore, on account of the many windings of the road among wild masses of porphyry rocks. In the more dangerous places, the way is hewn out of the rock, thirty feet wide. Here, also, an inscription records the founder of this tolboone work; who is doubtless annually remembered with gratitude by the pilgrims upon their way to Mecca. This declivity is called Djebel Makmar; that on the other (eastern) side of the valley is named Djebel Araba.

"Our way now followed, for an hour, in an easterly direction, the sea-shore; which here forms a salt marsh. We then reached the site of an ancient town, distinguished by many large mounds of rubbish, and probably the remains of the ancient AiAlt (Elath); on this point I afterwards received express confirmation. The dry channel of the Wady Araba separates these ruins from the remains of a far more modern settlement, which lies scattered among date-trees. These consist of low walls of rough stones laid in clay. Some of these serve periodically as dwellings for the inhabitants. In the immediate vicinity, towards the east, lies the castle of Akaba, among plantations of date-trees. In form it is a square fortress, with walls in good preservation, and octagonal towers at the corners. It lies some hundred paces from the sea-shore. The palace of Egypt keeps here a garrison of forty soldiers. The gateway is still further defended by two bulwarks in the form of towers.

"It has been a general opinion, that the sea of Akaba forms here two bays. This, however, is incorrect; no one here knows anything of such a bifurcation. This information, however, was not enough to satisfy me; I wished myself to visit in person the eastern coast of the gulf. A good half-hour south-east of Akaba, I found, on an excursion along the coast, the ruins of a castle called Kasr el Bedour; it is an Arabian building, probably erected before the fortress of Akaba, to protect the caravans of pilgrims to Mecca. From this point I could see a great part of the eastern coast of the gulf; I afterwards visited very particularly its western coast; but I could no where perceive any bays like those which have been conjectured to exist here. In the region of Akaba there is not a single boat or water-craft of any kind; the Arabs in fishing use only rafts made of the trunks of palm-trees tied together. It was, therefore, impossible for me to make any investigation respecting the depth of the sea, or the nature of its bottom.

"On inquiring the name of the spot where the above mentioned mounds of rubbish are situated, I was told that it was called Djebel; probably the ancient site of Alait. I often wandered amongst these ruins in various directions, but never met with anything of importance.

"In the court of the castle of Akaba is a walled-up well, with excellent water; indeed, throughout this whole region, there is every where good water. I took some pains to assure myself, that, at the time of ebb, on digging a foot deep in the sand which the sea has just covered, the hole is instantly filled with most excellent water for drinking. I often quenched, in this way, my thirst during long walks; and it was so much the more refreshing, because, during the time of my stay in this place, the temperature of the air was sometimes above thirty degrees of Reaumur, or one hundred of Fahrenheit. The existence of this water can be explained in no other way, than by supposing a very copious filtration of the water which collects in the Wady Araba, through the layer of sand which covers the granite formation beneath."

Is it perhaps admissible here, to suppose that it is the waters of the Dead sea, which continue thus to filter through beneath the sands that have filled up the ancient channel, in which the Jordan would once have flowed?

"The environs of the castle of Akaba are very insecure; in all my walks and excursions I was accompanied by several soldiers; the Hamaran Arabs [Omran of Burchardt] who dwell in this region, are notorious on account of their faithless character. The Turkish garrison, however, described the danger, no doubt, as much greater than it really is, in order thus to magnify the value of the protection which they afforded me." R.

EL-BETHEL, to the God of Bethel, the name given by Jacob to an altar which he built, (Gen. xxxv. 7.) and which stood, probably, in the very spot where he had formerly seen the prophetic dream of the ladder, chap. xxviii. 22.

ELDAD and MEDAD, were appointed by Moses among the seventy elders of Israel, who were to assist in the divine service; consequently, when the general assembly, they were filled with the Spirit of God, equally with those who were there, and began to prophesy in the camp. Joshua would have had Moses forbid them, but he replied, "Enviest thou for my sake that the Lord's Spirit is not given to all his people? Surely the Lord's Spirit is not restrained by me!" Numb. xi. 24—29.

ELDERS OF ISRAEL, the heads of tribes, who, before the settlement of the Hebrew commonwealth, had a government and authority over their own groups and the people. When Moses was sent into Egypt to deliver Israel, he assembled the elders, and informed them, that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had appeared to him, Exodus iv. 28: "And Moses and Aaron treated the elders as representatives of the nation. When the law was given, God directed Moses to take the seventy elders, as well as Aaron, and Nadab and Abihu, his sons, that they might be witnesses, xxxiv. 1, 9, 10. Ever afterwards, we find this number of seventy, or rather seventy-two, elders; six from each tribe.

Some have been of opinion that these seventy elders formed a kind of senate in Egypt, for the better governing the people while in bondage; and that from hence the famous Sanhedrim was derived in later ages. But it is more credible, that in the beginning they exercised, each over their respective tribe, and all together over the whole people, a jurisdiction only like that which fathers of families exercised over their children; founded on the respect and obedience due to parents. The Levites appointed to inspect in what manner the children of Israel performed their tasks in Egypt, (called in Hebrew סונּה, Shoterim,) were, according to some, the elders of Israel, who judged and commanded the people. The LXX translate scaphes, that is, commissioners, who had lists of those that worked, who appointed them their tasks, and saw that they performed them.

After Jethro's arrival in the camp of Israel, Moses made a considerable change in the governors of the people. He established over Israel heads of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, that justice might be readily administered to applicants; difficult cases only being referred to himself, Exod. xviii. 24, 25, &c. This constitution, however, did not long continue; for on the murmuring of the people at the encampment called the Graves of Lest, (Num. xi. 24, 25,) Moses appointed seventy elders of Israel, to whom God communicated part of that legislator's spirit.

Judicial life has continued, not only during the life of Moses, but also under Joshua, if not under the Judges. See Josh. ix. 15; xxiii. xxiv. 1, 32. See Sanhedrin.

In allusion to the Jewish elders, the ordinary governors of the Christian church are called elders, or presbyters, and are the same as bishops or overseers, Acts xx. 17, 28; Tit. i. 5, 7.

ELEALEH, a town of Reuben, (Num. xxxii. 37,) placed by Eusebius a mile from Heshbon.

I. ELEAZAR, the third son of Aaron, (Exod. xvii. 10,) and his successor as high-priest, entered the land of promise with Joshua, and is thought to have lived there about twenty-five years. The high-priesthood continued in his family to the time of Eli, who was of Ithamar's family. Eleazar was buried at Gabaath, (a hill,) belonging to Phinehas, his son, in the tribe of Ephraim, Josh. xxv. 33.—II. A son of Aminadab, to whose care the ark was committed, when sent back by the Philistines, 1 Sam. vii. 1. It is believed that Eleazar was a priest, or at least a Levite, and not among the Levites.—III. One of the three gallant men who broke through the camp of the Philistines, to bring David water from Bethlehem. He checked an army of Philistines, and made great slaughter of them, 2 Sam. xxiii. 12; 1 Chron. xxi. 16, 17,—IV. Brother to Judas Maccabaeus, 1 Mac. vi. 43.—V. A venerable old man of Jerusalem, who suffered death under the persecution, and in the presence of Antiochus Epipli-a, 2 Mac. vii. 1, 2.—VI. Son of Onias I. and brother of Simon surnamed the Just. Simon having left his son, Onias, too young to be high-priest, Eleazar exercised this charge nineteen years in his stead; from A. M. 3727 to 3744. There are several others of this name in Scripture.

ELECT, ELECTION, see PRESELECTION.

ELECTA was, as is generally believed, a lady of quality, who lived near Ephesus, to whom John addressed his second Epistle, cautioning her and her children against heretics, who denied the divinity of Christ, and his incarnation. Some think Electa, which signifies chosen, is not a proper name, but an honorable epithet; [elect lady, Eng. tran.] and that the Epistle was directed to a church. The same apostle salutes Electa, and her children, in his third Epistle; but the accounts of this Electa are as perplexed as those of the former.

ELEPH, a town of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28.

ELEPHANT, the largest of existing quadrupeds, celebrated for its sagacity, faithfulness, and prudence. Calmet is of opinion that the behemoth of Job xli. is the elephant; but this notion is generally held to be untenable. See Behemoth.

There is frequent mention of elephants in the books of Maccabees; because, after the time of Alexander, they were much used in the armies of the kings of Syria and Egypt. We read, in 1 Mac. vi. 34, that the elephants of Antiochus Eupator's army laid the blood of grapes and mulberries shown to them for the purpose of animating them to the combat, and to accustom them to the sight of blood. In 3 Mac. v. we see that it was usual to intoxicate them by wine mixed with incense, with the design that they should crush the Hebrews to death under their feet.

The elephant yielded ivory, which is first mentioned in Scripture in the reign of Solomon. If the forty-fifth Psalm were written before the Conquest, and before Solomon had constructed his royal and magnificent throne, then that is the first mention of this commodity. It is spoken of as decorating those boxes of perfume, which contained odors employed to exhilarate the king's spirits: "I will make ivory palaces by which they have made thee glad." The application of it as an article of elegance, appears also in 1 Kings x. 18, where the throne of Solomon is described as decorated with ivory, and inlaid with gold;—the beauty of these materials relieving the splendor, and heightening the lustre of each other. Ivory is here described as שָׁהֵן-גַּדוֹל, "great tooth";—which shows clearly that it was imported into Palestine in the whole task. It was, however, ill described as a tooth; for tooth, properly so called, it is not, but a weapon of defence, not unlike the tusk of a wild-boar; and for the same purposes as the horns of other animals. This has prompted Ezekiel to use another paraphrase for describing it; and he calls it "horns of tooth," xxvii. 15. But this also is liable to great objection, since it is not usual among the animals, whose those who had never seen an elephant, must have been very confused, if not contradictory. The combination, however, is ingenious; for the defences which furnish the ivory answer the purposes of horns; while, by its uncoutedness, the metal is not unaptly likened to teeth, which they are called among the dealers, who know perfectly well that the elephant has teeth, expressly formed for mastication of food; grinders of no trifling weight and dimensions. Bochart was desirous of finding elephants themselves in Scripture, and inclined to read 1 Kings x. 22, שֶׁנ-חַחַבִּין instead of שֶׁנ-חַחֵבּין; but this is much better broken into two words, שֶׁנָּה, tooth, and חַבִּין, ebony wood; for which we have the authority of Ezek. xxvii. 15. As to beds and houses of ivory, they can only mean beds adorned, not constructed, of ivory. (See בָּהֲבִין, ad fn.) Indeed, ivory in every state is unfit for any use requiring firmness. See IVORY.

mans call him Damaszchek, and Damassucinus, and believe him to have been a black slave given to Abraham by Nimrod, at the time when he saw him, by virtue of the midst of the flames, (Ur) into which he had been cast by his orders. (See ABRAHAM.) Abraham conceived such regard for Eliezer, that he gave him the superintendence of his whole family; and, before the birth of his sons, designed him for his heir. When Abraham sent Eliezer into Mesopotamia, he

II. ELI, my God. Our Saviour on the cross cried, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" See Psalm xxii. 1; Matt. xxvii. 46.

III. ELI, a high-priest of the race of Ithamar, died A. M. 3688, having been forty years judge of Israel, 1 Sam. iv. 18. He succeeded Abdon, and was succeeded by Samuel in the government; but in the high-priesthood by his third son Ahitub. While Eli abjured the people, Samuel was the deliverer and deliverer of Israel. How Eli could receive the kingship, and by what means that dignity was transferred from Eleazar's family to that of Ithamar, from which Eli was descended, we are not informed. Some believe it was in consequence of the negligence, minoritv, or want of proper qualifications, of Eleazar's family.

I. What is meant by the phrase, "son of my house," which has been the stumbling-block to translators, is shown by the following extracts: "Since the death of All Bir, the Beys and the Cachas who owed their promotion to his house, (that is to say whom of whom he had been the patron: among the Mussulmans the freedman is called the 'child of the house'), had repined in secret, at seeing all the authority passed into the hands of a new faction." (Volney's Travels, vol. i. p. 153, and the note.) He had so multiplied and advanced his freedmen, that of the twenty-four Beys, which should be their number, no less than eight were of his household." II. ELIEZER, son of Moses and Zipporah, born in Midian, while Moses was in that country. He had a son, Jonathan (I Chron. viii. 17). Some have thought that what is said, (Exod. iv. 24, 25.) of an angel's meeting Moses, when returning to Egypt, is to be understood, as if this angel intended to kill Eliezer, because he was not circumcised. The Scripture does not say expressly, where the angel had a design to slay. There are several other persons of this name in the Old Testament.

ELIHU, one of Job's friends, descended from Na- hor, (Job xxxii. 9; xxxiv. 1,) and one of the most remarkable characters in Scripture. He is said to be of Bus ; which, as the name of a place, occurs only once in Scripture, (Jer. xxv. 28,) where it stands in connection with Tesa and Dedan, towns bordering on Idumea. The Chaldee paraphrase expressly describes him as a relation of Abraham. He enters the poem so late as chap. xxxii. and opens his discourse with great modesty. He does not enlarge on any supposed wickedness in Job, as having brought his present distresses on him ; but contrives his reply, his inferences, and his arguments. He observes on the mysterious dispensations of Providence, which he knows, however they may appear to mortals, are full of wisdom and mercy; that the righteous have their share of prosperity in this life, no less than the wicked; that God is supreme, and that it becomes us to acknowledge and submit to that supremacy; since "the Creator wisely rules the world he made;" and he draws instances of benignity from the constant wonders of creation, of the seasons, &c. His language is copious, glowing, and sublime; and it deserves notice, that Elihu does not appear to have offended God by his sentiments; nor is any sacrifice of correspondence demanded for him as for the other speakers in the poem. It is more than probable, that the character of Elihu has been thought figurative of a personage interpolated between God and man—a Mediator—one speaking "without terror," and not disposed to overcharge mankind. This sentiment may have had its influence on the acceptability and preservation of the book of Job.

ELIJAH, or Elias, a prophet, of Tishbe, beyond Jordan, in Gilead, was raised up by God, to oppose idolatry, particularly the worship of Baal, which Jezebel of Israel introduced into the land. God delivered him from Jezebel's plots, and he was delivered as delivering an unwelcome message to Ahab: "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." 1 Kings xvii. 1. Having delivered this message, the Lord commanded him to conceal himself beyond Jordan, near the brook Cherith, where the ravens brought him food. After a time, the brook which had supplied him with water being dried up, God sent him to Zarephath, a city of Sidon. Here he met a widow, whose cruse of oil and barrel of meal were miraculously the means of supporting the prophet, herself, and her son, for a period of two years. During Elijah's abode with this woman, her son died, and she, overwhelmed with grief, entreated the assistance and interposition of the prophet. Elijah, moved by her sorrow, took the child in his arms, and cried to the Lord for the restitution of its life. His prayer was heard, and the child restored, ver. 2—24. During the time that Elijah dwelt at Zarephath, the famine prevailing at Samaria, Ahab sent people throughout the country to seek pasturage for the cattle. Obadiah, an officer of the king's household, being thus employed, the prophet met him, and directed him to tell Ahab that Elijah was there. The king came and reproached him, as the troubler of Israel, with 400 of the prophets of Baal. The latter accused Elijah, prayed, and cut themselves, but no answer was given to them. Elijah ridiculed their folly with bitter irony, and then offered his own sacrifice and prayer. His sacrifice being consumed by fire from the Lord, all the people fell on their faces, crying, "The Lord he is the God." Elijah then ordered the people to slay the prophets of Baal, according to the law, and his directions were promptly obeyed. After this, the prophet promised rain, which fell immediately, ch. xviii. Jezebel, wife of Ahab, being informed that Elijah had caused the prophets of her god to be put to death, threatened him, that on the following day his life should be sacrificed for theirs. The prophet therefore fled to Beer-sheba, in the south of Judah, and from thence into Arabia Petrea. In this journey he was again miraculously supported during forty days and forty nights, until he came to Horeb, the mount of God. Having taken up his abode in a cave, the Lord inquired, "What dost thou here, Elijah?" The prophet complained of Israel's apostasy; but the Lord gave him tokens of his presence—a tempest, an earthquake, a fire, a still small voice. Elijah covered his face in his mantle; and the Lord again inquired, "What dost thou here, Elijah?" to which he answered as before. He was then desired to return to the wilderness of Damascus, and anoint Hazael king over Syria, Jehu king over Israel, and Elisha, his disciple, to succeed himself. The accompanying prophet was also encouraged by being informed that God had reserved seven thousand in Israel, who had not bowed their knees to Baal. Departing from mount Horeb, Elijah went into the tribe of Ephraim, and anointed Elisha to the prophetical office, 1 Kings xix.

Some years after this, Ahab having seized Naboth's vineyard, Elijah reproached him with his crime; and warned him of his own and Jezebel's violent deaths, ch. xxi. xxii. 38. On another occasion, Ahaziah, king of Israel, who had fallen from the platform of his house, having sent for doctors from Issachar, to Ekron, whether he should recover, Elijah met the messengers, reproached this criminal idolatry, and foretold the death of the king. By the description given of his person, Ahaziah knew it to be Elijah, and, enraged at the prophet's boldness, sought to get the captain, with fifty men, to apprehend him. These being destroyed by fire from heaven, and also a second fifty, the third captain entreated him to respect his life and his people's lives. The prophet accompanied him to the king, again denounced the divine displeasure, and foretold his speedy death, 2 Kings i.

Understanding by revelation, that God would soon translate him out of this world, Elijah was desirous to conceal it from Elisha, but his companion refused to leave him. In passing the Jordan, the prophet took his mantle and struck the waters with it, which divided, and they passed over on dry ground. He then said to Elisha, "Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee." "I pray thee," said Elisha, "let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me;" that is, obtain the gift of prophecy from God for me, in the same measure that thou possessest it; for double may signify like; or, give me a double share of thine inheritance, a double portion of thy spirit, the gift of prophecy, and of miracles, in a degree double to what I now possess;—the portion of the first-born. "Thou hast asked a hard thing," said Elijah, "nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so." As they continued their journey, a chariot and horses of fire suddenly separated them, and Elijah was carried in a whirlwind up to heaven, Elisha receiving his mantle, ii. 1—12.

Eight years after the miraculous ascension of Elijah, a letter of reproach, admonition, and threaten- ing, was brought from the prophet to Jehoram king of Judah. Some believe, that this was written by Elijah, after his translation; others, that it was sent before that event, or that Jehoram dreamed of it. May it not have been written prophetically by Elijah before his death, but laid by, with orders not to be produced till a certain time, or under certain events? The author of Ecclesiastes has an encomium on the memory of this prophet, (chap. xxviii.) and Malachi foretells the appearance of Elijah before "the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord." Our Saviour informs us, (Matt. xi. 14; xvii. 10—12,) that this was fulfilled in the person of John the Baptist. The evangelists relate, that at the transfiguration of our Saviour, Elijah and Moses both appeared and conversed with him concerning his future passion. Matt. xvii. 3; Mark ix. 3; Luke ix. 30.

Many of the Jews in our Lord's time believed him to be Elijah risen from the dead, Matt. xvi. 14; Mark vi. 15; Luke ix. 31, 35; vii. 28.

II. ELIPHAZ, one of Job's friends, probably a descendant of Eliphaz, son of Esau, Job iv. 1. He was of Teman, in Idumea, (Jer. xlix. 7. 20; Ezek. xxi. 13; Amos i. 11, 12; Obad. 8, 9,) and in the Greek versions of the poem, is described as a prince of Edom. His natural temper, as appears by his speeches, was mild and modest; he makes the first reply to the complaints of Job; argues that the truly good are never entirely forsaken by Providence, but that exemplary punishments may justly be inflicted for serious sins. He denies that any man is innocent, censures Job for asserting his freedom from guilt, and exhorts him to confess his concealed iniquities, as a probable means of alleviating their punishment. His arguments are well supported, but he is declared, at the close of the poem, to have taken erroneous views of the divine dispensations; and Job offers a sacrifice on his account.

ELISABETH, the wife of Zachariah, and mother of John the Baptist, was of the daughters of Aaron, or the race of the priests, Luke i. 5. An angel foretold to her husband Zachariah the birth of John, and Zachariah returning home, Elisabeth conceived. During five months she concealed the favor God had granted her; but the angel Gabriel discovered to the Virgin Mary this miraculous conception, as an assurance of the birth of the Messiah, by herself. (See ANNUNCIATION.) Mary visited her cousin Elisabeth, and when she saluted her, the child with which Elisabeth was pregnant leaped in her womb. When her child was circumcised, she named him John; according to previous instructions from her husband, Luke i. 39—45.

ELISEUS, the same as Elisha, in the English Trans. of the New Testament.

I. ELISHA, son of Sib'bat, and Elijah's disciple and successor in the prophetical office, was of Abel-meholah, 1 Kings xix. 16. Elijah having received God's command to anoint Elisha as a prophet, came to Abel-meholah, and finding Elisha ploughing with twelve pair of oxen, he threw his mantle over him. Elisha left his oxen, and accompanied Elijah, chap. xix. 19—21. We have observed in the article ELI- JAH, that Elisha was accompanying his master, when the Lord took him up in a whirlwind; and that he inherited Elijah's mantle, with a double portion of his spirit. He smote the Jordan and divided the stream; and cured the water of a rivulet near Jericho.

Going afterwards to Bethel, the children of the place ridiculed him, and Elisha cursing them in the name of the Lord, two bears came out of a neighboring forest, and, as Calmet says, devoured two and forty of them, 2 Kings ii. 14—24. Thus, however, is not credible. Surely one child had fully satisfied the hunger of one bear. Happily our own translation keeps clear of this error, and renders "two she-bears took these children,"—not limbs from limb; not "to death with blood and groans, and tears;" but scratched, clawed, wounded, tender them, as the Hebrew root (772) signifies.

The kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom, having taken the field against the king of Moab, who had revolted from Israel, were in danger of perishing by want of water; but, according to the words of Elisha, they received a miraculous supply, 2 Kings iii. 13—17. The widow of one of the prophets being reduced to great distress, and lamenting that a creditor of her husband was determined to take her two sons, and sell them for slaves, Elisha multiplied the oil in her house so abundantly, that by its produce she was enabled to discharge the debt, iv. 1—7. Elisha went hence to the Jordan, and Elisha sixty, squatting on the bank of the Jordan, where a tree, on which a Lottery, one of Job's friends, probably a descendant of Eliphaz, son of Esau, Job iv. 1. The prophet desired him to bring a bow and arrows, and bidding him to let fly an arrow, said, "This is the arrow of the Lord's deliverance; thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek." Elisha desired him again to shoot, which he did three times, and then stopped. The man of God said, "Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times, then hadst thou consumed Syria; whereas, now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice," chap. xii. 19—20. This sign was accomplished in the event, ver. 25.

After the death of Elisha, a band of Moabites invaded the land; and some Israelites, going to bury a man in a field, saw them, and, being terrified, threw the body hastily into Elisha's grave. The body having touched his remains, received life, and the man stood up, ver. 20, 21. This is noticed Ecclesiastical xlviii. 15, in the encomium on Elisha.

II. ELISHA, the fountain of, rises two bow-shots from mount Quarantania, and runs through the plain of Jezreel, into the Jordan; passing south of Gilgal, and dividing into several streams. This is said to be the fountain whose waters were sweetened by Elisha, 2 Kings ii. 19—22. See JACOBO.

ELISHA, son of Javen, (Gen. x. 4,) from whom the isles of Elahab are named, (Ezek. xxvii. 7,) is believed to have peopled Elia in the Peloponnesus. We find there the province of Elia, and a country called Albusium, by Homer. Ezekiel, above, speaks of the purple of Elahab, brought to Tyre. The fish used in dyeing purple were caught at the mouth of the Eurotas, and the ancients frequently speak of the purple of Laconia.

ELI-NATHAN, son of Achbor, and father of Nebra, mother of Jehoiakim king of Judah. He opposed the king's burning of Jeremiah's prophecies; and was sent into Egypt to bring back the prophet Urijah, Jer. xxvi. 22; xxxvi. 12; 2 Kings xxiv. 8.

ELOH, or ELOHIM, one of the names of God. Angels, princes, great men, judges, and even false gods, are sometimes called Elohim. The connection of the discourse assists us in determining the proper meaning of this word where it occurs. It is the same as Eloah; one being singular, the other plural. Nevertheless, Elohim is generally construed in the singular, particularly when the true God is spoken of; when false gods are spoken of, it is rather construed in the plural.

The Hebrew word Eloah comes from the verb אָהַב, to venerate, adore, and signifies, therefore, object of adoration. It is the same in all the Semitic languages, e.g. it is the Allah of the Arabs. The name Jehovah, on the other hand, seems to be the invariable name of the God of Iac. ix. 2. See Jehovah.

The Jewish critics find great mysteries in some of these words, Eloi, Elohi, Elohim, &c. which are always written full, while others are written deficient, as with the (god) or without it; with the (name) or without it. They prove, therefore, that some of the letters of the name Jehovah, are added to 'א, God, but not all at the same time; also, that Jehovah is sometimes pointed with the vowel points of Elohim, but Elohim never with the vowel points of Jehovah. Whether the word Elohim be singular or plural, adjectival or substantive, or whether it have any root in the Hebrew language, they are not agreed.

I. ELON, a grove of oaks; Elon-Mamre, Elon-More, Elon-Beth-Chanan, the grove, or oak of Mamre, &c. II. A city of Dan, Josh. xix. 43—III. He was of Zebulun, and judged Israel ten years; from A. M. 2830, to 2840.

ELUL, one of the Hebrew months, (Neb. vi. 15,) answering nearly to August, O. S. lasting only twenty-nine days. It was the twelfth month of the civil year, and the sixth of the ecclesiastical. Others suppose it to have included the time from the new moon of September to that of October.

ELYMAIS, the capital of Elam, or the ancient country of the Persians. 1 Mac. vi. 1 informs us, that Antiochus Epiphanes, understanding there were very great treasures in the temple at Elymais, determined to plunder it; but the citizens resisted him successfully, 2 Mac. i. 2. It is called this city Persepolis, probably because formerly it had been the capital of Persia; for Persepolis and Elymais were very different cities; the former situated on the Arazes, the latter on the Eulaes. The temple which Antiochus designed to pillage was that of the goddess Nana, according to Macrobeus; Appian says a temple of Venus; Polybius, Diodorus, Josephus, and Jerome, say a temple of Diana. See PARTHIANS.

ELYM-EANS. Judith i. 6 mentions Arioeh king of the Elymians; that is, probably, the ancient kingdom of Persia.

EMBALMING

EMBALMING. The ancient Egyptians and Hebrews embalmed the bodies of the dead. Joseph ordered the body of Jacob; and the Egyptian physicians, employed in this work, were forty days, the usual time, about it. Some think that embalming became necessary in Egypt in consequence of the inundation of the Nile, whose waters overflowing all the flat country nearly two months, obliged the people all this while to keep their dead in their houses, or to remove them to rocks and eminences, which were often very distant. To which we may add, that bodies buried before the inundation might be thrown up by it; a sandy moist soil not being strong enough to retain them against the action of the water.

When a man died, a coffin was made proportioned to the stature and quality of the dead person, and to the price, in which there was a great diversity. The upper exterior of the coffin represented the person who was to be enclosed in it. A man of condition was distinguished by the figure on the cover of the coffin; suitable paintings and embellishments were generally added. The embalmers' prices varied; the highest was a talent, £1600; twenty minas was moderate; the lowest price was small. The process of embalming dead bodies among the Egyptians was as follows:—A dissector, with a very sharp Egyptian stone, made an incision on the left side, and hurried away instantly because the relations of the deceased, who were present, took up stones, and pursued him as a wicked wretch, who had disfigured the dead. The embalmers, who were looked upon as sacred officers, drew the brains through the nostrils with a hooked piece of iron, and filled the skull with astringent drugs; they drew all the bowels, except the heart and kidneys, through the hole in the left side, and washed them in palm wine, and other strong and astringent drugs. The body was anointed with oil of cedar, myrrh, cinnamon, &c. about thirty days, so that it was preserved entirely, without putrefaction, without losing its hair, and without contracting any disagreeable smell; and was then put into salt for about forty days. Hence, when Moses says that forty days were employed in embalming Jacob, we understand him of the forty days of his continued in the salt of nitre; not including the thirty days engaged in the previous ceremonial of the whole. It was then restored to the relations, who enclosed it in a coffin, and kept it in their houses, or deposited it in a tomb. Great numbers of mummies have recently been found in Egypt, in chambers or subterranean vaults.

Those who could not defray such expenses as this process involved, contented themselves with infusing, by a syringe, through the fundament, a liquor extracted from the cedar, which they left there, and wrap up the body in salt of nitre. This oil preyed on the intestines, so that when they took it out, the intestines came along with it, but not putrefied. The body, being enclosed in nitre, became dry. The poor sometimes cleansed the inside by injecting a liquor, after which they put the body into nitre for seventy days to dry it. A recent discovery in Egypt informs us, that the common people of that country were embalmed by means of a bitumen, a cheap material, and easily managed. With this the corpse and its envelopes were smeared, with more or less care and diligence. Sepulchres have been opened, in which they had been deposited in rows, one on another, without coffins, preserved in this manner.

It is observed concerning Joseph, that he was embalmed, and put into a coffin, in Egypt, (Gen. l. 26.) but the LXX. who lived in translating this word δακτός, seem to allude to a stone receptacle, sarcophagus, for the whole, including the mummy chest, or proper coffin; so that at the departure of the people from Egypt, they had only to take the mummy, with its case or coffin, out of this stone receptacle, or tomb, in which it had been preserved, and by which it had been distinguished; and this being a public monument known to all, they were sure the body they carried with them was that of the patriarch Joseph, and of no other person.

Scripture mentions the embalming of Joseph, of king Ass, and of our Saviour. Joseph doubtless was embalmed after the Egyptian manner, as he died in Egypt. Ass was embalmed, or rather burnt, in a particular manner. The Hebrew is literally, "They laid him in the bed which they had furnished with sweet odors, and divers kind of spices; and they burnt odors for him with an exceeding great burning." (3 Chron. xvi. 14.) as if these spices had been burnt near his body. But the generality of interpreters believe, that he was burnt with spices in a bed of state, similar to the Roman emperors in later times. It seems certain, that dead bodies, of kings particularly, were sometimes burnt; and we know not whether the custom was not derived from this instance of Ass. Scripture notices of Jehovah, that "his people made no burning for him like the burning of his fathers," 2 Chron. xxii. 19. Jeremiah promises king Zedekiah, "According to the burning of thy fathers, so shall they burn colors for thee." The body of Saul was burnt after it had been taken down from the walls of Bethan; but this was, probably, because of its state of corruption.

As to the embalming of our Saviour, the evangelists inform us, that Joseph of Arimathea having obtained his body, brought a white sheet to wrap it in; and that Nicodemus purchased a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes, with which they embalmed him, and put him into Joseph's own unfinishéd sepulchre, which was a hewn rock. The body was then prescribed for the first service of the Lord's resurrection, with this difference, that there is no mention of spices. John xix. 40; xx. 5. See BURIAL.

EMERALD, a precious stone, of a green color; in Latin, smaragdus; which signifies rather a genus of precious stones including the emerald as one of its members. The emerald is placed (Exod. xxxviii. 18.) on the high-priest's ephod. [Our English version every where puts emerald for the Heb. 192, a kind of EMMAUS, a city of Judas, twenty-two miles from Lydda, and afterwards called Nicopolis. Here were hot baths, in which, it was reported among the inhabitants, our Lord washed his feet, and to which he communicated a healing virtue.

I. ENABRIS, a place between Scythopolis and Tiberias.

ENAIM, or ENAN, a town of Judah, (Josh. xv. 34.) mentioned also in Gen. xxxviii. 14, where the Vulgate reads, that Tamar sat in a place where two ways met; Heb. she sat at Enaim; LXX. she sat at Enam by the way. English translators, supply it as an open-place which is by the way. Enam, or Enan, signifies “the two wells,” or “the double well,” a very likely place of rendezvous.

I. ENAN, father of Ahira of Naphtali; (Numb. i. 15.) head of his tribe in the time of Moses.

II. ENAN. Ezekiel speaks of Enan, (chap. xlviii. 1.) or Hazar-Enan, as of a town well known; the northern boundary of the land. See also Numb. xxxiv. 9. This may be Enana, north of Damascus, or Ina, mentioned by Ptolomy, or Aenous in Peutinger's tables, south of Damascus. Possibly likewise the En-hazor of Naphthali, Josh. xix. 37.

ENCHANTMENTS, see INCANTATIONS.

ENDOR, or ENDO, a city of Manasseh, (Josh. xvil. 11.) placed by Eusebius four miles south of mount Tabor, near Nain, in the way to Scythopolis.

Here the witch lived whom Saul consulted, 1 Sam. xxviii. 12.

EN-GELAIM. Ezechiel (xlvii. 18.) speaks of this place in opposition to En-gedi: “The fowlers shall stand upon it from En-gedi, even to En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets.” Jerome says, En-eglaim is at the head of the Dead sea, where the Jordan enters it.

I. ENGANNIM, a city in the plain belonging to Judah, Josh. xv. 34.—II. A city of Issachar; given to the Levites of Gershom's family, Josh. xix. 31; xxi. 29.

EN-GEDI. This name is probably suggested by the situation among lofty rocks, which, overhanging the valleys, are very precipitous. A fountain of pure water rises near the summit, which the inhabitants call En-gedi—the fountain of the god—because it is hourly accessible to every other creature. It was called also Hazezon-Tamar, that is, the city of palm-trees, there being a great quantity of palm-trees around it. It stood near the lake of Sodom, S. E. of Jerusalem, not far from Jericho, and the mouth of the river Jordan; though later travellers place it about the middle of the western shore of the lake. In some case of the wilderness of En-gedi, David had an opportunity of killing Saul, who was then in pursuit of him. 1 Sam. xxiv. The vineyards of En-gedi are mentioned, Cant. i. 14. and the hills around it produce, at present, the best wines of the country.

ENGRAVING. This art of cutting precious stones and metals is frequently referred to in the Old Testament Scriptures. Its origin and progress, as connected with biblical inquiries, has been investigated and illustrated with much ingenuity by Mr. Landseer, in his "Sacramental Researches," passim. See SEAL, WAXING.

EN-HADDAH, a town of Issachar, Josh. xix. 31. Eusebius mentions a place of this name between Eleutheropolis and Jerusalem; ten miles from the former place.

EN-HAZOR, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 37. West of it was the Arabim plain, or Hassimian of Ezekiel, (xlvii. 17; xlviii. 1.) and of Moses, (Num. xxxv. 9.) it is difficult to determine.

EN-MISHPAT, Fountain of Judgment. Moses says, (Gen. xiv. 7.) that Chedorlaomer and his allies, having traversed the land of Canaan, came to the fountain of Mishpat, otherwise Kadesh. It had not this name till Moses drew from it the waters of strife; and God had exercised his judgments on Moses and Aaron, Num. xx. 13; xxi. 14. See Kadesh.

I. ENOCH, son of Cain, (Gen. iv. 17.) after whom the first city noticed in Scripture was called. It was east of Eden, and its name is thought to be preserved in Hanuchta, which Polemy places in the Susiana. The spurious Berossus, and Adrichomius after him, place the city Enochia, built by Cain, east of Libanus, towards Damascus.

II. Enoch, the son of Jared, was born A. M. 622, and begat Methuselah, at the age of sixty-five. He lived with God; and after he had lived three hundred and sixty-five years, "he was not, for God took him," Gen. v. 24. Paul says, "By faith Enoch was transfigured, that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him." Heb. xi. 5.

Jude (14, 15) cites a passage from the book of Enoch, which has much perplexed interpreters. The question is, whether the apostle took this passage from any book written by Enoch, which might be extant in his time; or, whether he received it by tradition, or by revelation. It is most probable, he read it in a book attributed to Enoch, which though apocryphal, might contain several truths; among others, this might be one, which Jude, favored with a supernatural degree of discrimination, might use to purposes of instruction. Justin, Athenagoras, Ireneus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Lactantius, and others, borrowed an opinion out of this book of Enoch, that the angels had connection with the daughters of men, of whom they had offspring. Tertullian, in several places, speaks of this book with esteem; and would persuade us, that it was preserved by Noah during the deluge. It has, however, been rejected by the church, and Origen, Jerome, and Austin, mention it as of no authority. Specimens of the book of Enoch have been brought into Europe from Abyssinia by Mr. Bruce and others, and translations of parts of it have been published. It should seem to be founded, as to its historical tenor, on the Mosiac history of the antediluvians, and the judgments that might naturally be expected to follow such enormous wickedness, violence, audacities, and gluttonies, as were then practised by the giants, or people in power. The lower classes were represented in it, as being extremely oppressed and ill treated; and, perhaps, the intention of the author was to inculcate on the great, lessons of humanity towards their inferiors, enforced by the instance of punishment inflicted by the deluge on criminals of the highest rank and the greatest power.

The eastern people have preserved several very uncertain traditions relating to Enoch, whom they call Edris. Eusebius, from Eupolemus, tells us, that the Babylonians acknowledged Enoch as the inventor of astrology; that he is the Atlas of the Greeks; that Methuselah was his son, and that he received all his uncommon knowledge by the ministry of an angel.

ENON, where John baptized, because there was much water there, (John iii. 23.) was eight miles south of Sebaste and Cilophon and the Jordan.

ENOS, son of Seth, and father of Caïnan, was born A. M. 335, and died, aged 905 years, A. M. 1140. Moses says that Eno began to call on the name of the Lord; that is, he was the inventor of religious rites and ceremonies in worship, and formed the public and external manner of honoring God. This worship was preserved in his family, while that of Caïnan involved itself in irregularities and impieties. Our translators say," Then began men to call on the name of the Lord," (Gen. iv. 26.) which several Jews translate, "Then began men to profane the name of the Lord," i.e. by calling on creatures and idols. It may likewise be translated, "Then began men to call themselves by the name of the Lord;" i.e. good men, to distinguish themselves from the wicked, began to take the name of sons or servants of God; for which reason Moses (Gen. vi. 1, 2) says, that "the sons of God," that is, the descendants of Eno, "seeing the daughters of men," &c. The eastern people make the following additions to his history. The father of Seth, his father, declared him sovereign prince and high-priest of mankind, next after himself; that Eno was the first who ordained public alms for the poor, established public tribunals for the administration of justice, and planted, or rather cultivated, the palm-tree.

EN-ROGEL, a fountain on the south-east side of Jerusalem, on the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, Josh. xv. 7; xviii. 10; 2 Sam. xvii. 17; 1 Kings i. 9. It would seem to have been the same with the fountain of Siloam.

EN-SHEMESH, was on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin, (Josh. xv. 7.) but whether it was a town or a fountain, is questionable. The Arabians give this name to the ancient metropolis of Egypt, which the Hebrews called On, and the Greeks, Hellopolis.

ENSIGN, a military token or signal to be followed; a standard. The ancient Jewish ensign was a long pole, at the end of which was a kind of chafing dish, made of iron, which held a fire, and the light, shape, &c. of which, denoted the party to whom it belonged. God says he would lift up an ensign, Isa. v. 96. Christ was an "ensign to the people; and to it shall the Gentiles seek," chap. xi. 10. The vessel was lifted up on an ensign pole. He who is true to this "our Lord compares his own "lifting up," (John iii. 14.) in consequence of which he will draw all men to him, as men follow an ensign, chap. xii. 32.

EPHESY, a malignant disposition, or state of mind, which grudges at the welfare of others, and would willingly deprive them of their advantages. Rachel envied the fertility of Leah; (Gen. xxx. 1.) and Joseph was envied by his brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 11. Envy slayeth the silly, (Job v. 2.) is rottenness to the bones; (Prov. xiv. 30.) in short, it defiles, destroys, consumes both soul and body; and is the very characteristic of Satan, through whose envy of human happiness, sin and death entered into the world.

EPAPHRAS was, it is said, the first bishop of Colossae. He was converted by Paul, and contributed much to convert his fellow-citizens. He came to Rome while Paul was there in bonds, and was imprisoned with the apostle. Having understood that false teachers, taking advantage of his absence, had sown tares among the wheat in his church, he engaged Paul, whose name and authority were reverence throughout Phrygia, to write to the Colossians, to correct them. In this epistle Paul calls Epaphras his "dear fellow-servant, and a faithful minister of Christ," chap. i. 7; iv. 12; Phil. 1. It is, however, not improbable, that Epaphras is the same person with Epaphroditus; the former name being merely contracted from the latter.

EPAPHRITOS, apostle, as Paul calls him, of Philippi; or, if we take the word epaphtos literally, a messenger of the Philippians, who was sent by that church to carry money to the apostle, then in bonds; and to do him service, A. D. 61. He executed this commission with such zeal, that he brought on himself a dangerous illness, which obliged him to remain long at Rome. The year following (A. D. 62) he returned with haste to Philippi, having heard that the Philippians, on receiving information of his sickness, were very much afflicted, and Paul sent a letter to them by him, Phil. iv. 18.

EPENETUS, a disciple of Paul; (probably one of the first he converted in Asia;) the "first fruits of Asia," in the Greek, "first fruits of Achaia," Rom. xvi. 5.

I. EPHIAH, the eldest son of Midian, dwelt in Arabia Petraea, and gave his name to the city Ephah, by the LXX called Geophra, or Geaphar, because they frequently pronounce the letter λ like α, Ephah, and the small extent of land around it, made part of Midian on the eastern shore of the Dead sea, very different from another country of this name on the Red sea. Potemons speaks of a town called Ipos on the eastern coast of the Dead sea, a little below Moidian, or Midian. The countries of Midian and Ephah abounded in dromedaries and camels, Judg. vi. 5; Isa. lx. 6.

II. EPHAH, or EPHAH, a measure of capacity used among the Hebrews, containing three pecks and thirteen pints. The Ephah was a dry measure; as of barley (Ruth ii. 17.) and meal, (Num. xvi. 15; Judg. vi. 18.) and was of the same capacity with the bath in liquids. (See BATH.) Sometimes it is confounded with the satahm or seah.

I. EPES, second son of Midian, and brother of Ephah; 1 Chron. i. 33. He dwelt beyond Jordan, (1 Kings iv. 10;) and might people the isle of Upharsin in the Red sea, or the city of Ophrah, in the Diaritck.

Jerome cites Alexander Polyhistor and Cleodemus, surnamed Malee, who affirm, that Ephah made an incursion into Libya, conquered it, and called it after his own name, Africa. Hereafter it is said to have accompanied him. —II. Son of Ezra, 1 Chron. iv. 17. III. Head of a family of Manasites, 1 Chron. v. 24.

EPHESUS, a celebrated city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, about 40 miles south of Smyrna; chiefly famous for its temple of Diana, the magnificence of which attracted a great concourse of strangers. Its length was 425 feet, breadth 220; and it had a hundred and forty-seven pillars, 100 feet high, presented by as many kings. All the provinces of Asia contributed to the expenses of its building, and two hundred years were employed on it. Paul first visited Ephesus, A. D. 54, (Acts xviii. 19, 21.) but after a few days he went to Jerusalem, promising the Jews of Ephesus to return; which he did some months afterwards, and continued there three years, when he was obliged to leave the city on occasion of a sedition, raised by Demetrius the silversmith.

From hence the apostle wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthians. The Ephesians were addicted to the study of curious arts, to magic, sorcery, and judicial astrology; so much so, that Ephesian letters (Ephecia grammatica) became a proverbial expression for magic characters. Certain Jews at Ephesus, who assumed authority, exercised persons possessed with the devil, were ill treated by one of the possessed, which so terrified several persons addicted to the curious arts, that they publicly burnt their books relating to such subjects, although of very considerable value, Acts xix. 14. The apostle, in his last journey to Rome, took Ephesus in his way, (A. D. 65.) and while he was prisoner at Rome, he wrote to the Ephesians a very pathetic, elevated and sublime letter. Aquila and Priscilla, with whom Paul had lodged at Corinth, came from thence with him to Ephesus, and made some stay there, Acts xvii. 2, 3, 18; and Apollos, a Jew of Alexandria, preached there. The apostle John passed a great part of his life at Ephesus, and died here; as did the Virgin Mary and Mary Magdalene, according to tradition.

Timothy, according to tradition, was made first bishop of Ephesus by the apostle; which, however, did not prevent John from residing in the city and performing apostolic functions. If it be true that Timothy did not die till A. D. 127, it is evident that he was the angel of the church at Ephesus, to whom a reprimand is addressed, Rev. ii. 1—5. See TIMOTHY.

Stephens the geographer gives this city the title of Ephephonaste, or, the "first illustrated;" Pliny styles it the "ornament of Asia." In Roman times it was the metropolis of Asia; and of the city then extant, Lysinachus was the founder. Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who repaired and embellished it. In the war between Mithridates and the Romans, Ephesus took part with the former, and massacred the Romans who dwelt in it. Sylla severely punished this cruelty; but Ephesus was afterwards treated with lenity, and enjoyed its own laws, with some degree of freedom. About the end of the eleventh century it was besieged by a Turkish pirate, named Tungripermes, and he was routed by John Ducas, the Greek admiral, in a bloody battle. In 1308, it suffered from the execution of the grand duke Roger, and drawing years afterwards it surrendered to Sultan Sceyan, who removed the inhabitants to Tyrannus, where they were massacred. Theodorus Lascarius, a Greek, made himself master of it in 1305. The Mahometans recovered it after 1383. Tamerlane, after the battle of Anora, (A.D. 1401.) commanded the lesser portion of the city of Ephesus; and our author employed a whole month in plundering the city and its adjacent squares. Dacier says, that the gold, silver, jewels, and even the clothes of the inhabitants were carried off. Shortly after, the city was set on fire, and many beasts, in a combat between the Turkish governor and the Tatars. In 1405–6, Mahomet I. took Ephesus, since which it has continued in the possession of the Turks. Dr. Chandler says, "The inhabitants are a few Greek peasants, living in extreme wretchedness, dependence, and insensibility: the representatives of an illustrious people, and inhabiting the wreck of their greatness; some in the substructions of the glorious edifices which they raised; some beneath the vaults of the stadium, once the crowded scenes of their diversions; and some by the abrupt precipices, in the sepulchres which received their ashes. Its streets are obscured and overgrown. A herd of goats was driven to it for shelter from the sun at noon; and a noisy flight of crows from the quarter soon drove away its peace. We heard the creaking voice in the form of the theatre and of the stadium. The glorious pomp of its heathen worship is no longer remembered; and Christianity, which was here nursed by apostles, and fostered by general councils, until it increased to fulness of stature, barely lingers on in an existence hardly visible." (Trav. p. 181. Oxford, 1775.)

The Jews, according to Josephus, were very numerous in Ephesus, and had obtained the privilege of citizenship: of course the Christians, being considered as a sect of Jews, would be pretty secure here from persecution by the political powers; as Ephesus was adiotonos—governed by its own laws.

The worship of the great goddess Diana was established at Ephesus in a remote age, and it is related, that the Amazons sacrificed to her here, on their way to Attica; Pindar says, in the time of Thesus. Some writers affirm that they first set up her image under an elm-tree; or in a niche, which they formed in the trunk of an elm. The statue is said to have been but small; the work was done by Pythin, of Cananias, an ancient artist, and witnessing its great antiquity by its attitude and form, having its feet closed together; like many Egyptian statues still remaining. It was of wood, by some reported to be cedar, by others either of Mithras, consul of Rome, (A. D. 75.) affirmed, from his own observation, that it was made of vine wood; and that its crevices were filled with nard, to nourish and moisten the wood, and to preserve it. It was gorgeously apparelled; the vest thrown over it being richly embroidered with symbolic devices. Each hand was supported by a her; most likely of gold. A veil hanging from the ceiling of the temple concealed it, except when the service required its exposure. It is said, that this statue was never changed, though the temple had been restored seven times. The people believed that it descended from Jupiter: it was, probably, an allegorical representation of the powers and productions of nature, generally; but especially as displayed in the country where the ark of deliverance discharged the catastrophe. The sacred groves and vestibles of the goddess were eunuchs; anciently assisted in their offices by virgins. There were also the sacred herald, the incenser, the flute player, and the trumpeter. The privilege of asylum was granted to the temple, first to the distance of one hundred and twenty-five feet:

Mithridates enlarged it to a bow-shot, and Mark Antony doubled it. Thabirius abrogated the privilege; it having been grossly abused. As the following inscription is only confirmed by a portion of the text in Acts xix. 25, but even approaches to several sentences and phrases used by the sacred writer, we copy it, verbatim, from Dr. Chandler: (Trav. p. 125.)

"TO THE EPHESIAN DIANA.

"Inasmuch as it is notorious, that, not only among the Ephesians, but also every where among the Greek nations, temples are sacred, and that he who is set up, and has an altar dedicated to her, on account of her plain manifestations of herself; and token of veneration is given; by us Artemision, by the Macedonians, and other Greek nations, and in their cities, Artemision, in which general assemblies and Hieronemias are celebrated, not in the holy city, the nurse of its own, the Ephesian goddess: the people of Ephesus, deeming it proper that the whole month should be sacred and set apart to the goddess, have determined by this decree, that the observation of it by Artemision be enacted in the way the whole month Artemision the days be holy, and that not only nothing be attended on to them, but that the yearly feastings, and the Artemisiac Panegyric, and whatever is connected with Artemision, be altogether prohibited to the goddess; for, from this improvement in our worship, our city shall receive additional lustre, and be permanent in its prosperity for ever."—The person who obtained this decree, appointed games for the month, augmented the prizes of the contest, and erected statues of those who conquered. His name is not preserved, but he probably was a Roman, as his kinsman, who provided this record, was named Lucius Flavius Fensus. The feast of Diana was restored to yearly by the Ionians, with their families.

This evidence proves, that the disposition to cry "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" was by no means confined to Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen; the whole city was guardian, seclusor, to the temple. See DIANA.

The phrase, "nurse of its own" goddess, in this decree, refers to a story of the birth of Diana in Ortygia, a beautiful grove of trees of various kinds, chiefly cypress; and hence the distance from the sea. This place was filled with shrines and images. A Panegyric, or general assembly, was held there annually; splendid entertainments were provided, and mystic sacrifices solemnized. This place, with its embellishments, appears no more. The extreme sanctity of the temple of Diana inspired universal awe and reverence. It was, for many ages, a repository of treasures foreign and domestic. This property was deemed secure; the temple having been spared by Xerxes, who spared scarcely any other; but Nero removed many costly offerings and images, and an immense quantity of silver and gold. It was again plundered in the time of Gallienus, A. D. 253, by Goths from beyond the Danube, who carried off a prodigious booty. The temple itself was probably destroyed at the same time as other heathen temples were, by an edict of Constantine. But there is a possibility that the total ruin of it was effected by an earthquake; although, by way of prevention, it was situated in a marsh: however that might be, "we now," says Dr. Chandler, "seek in vain for the temple; the city is prostrate, and the goddess is gone.

However, our history mentions some circumstances concerning Ephesus, which we subjoin: "This renowned city, with the finest temple that ever was consecrated to Diana, is reduced by the changes it has met with in the wars, and under the different masters it has had, to five or six miserable houses inhabited by Greeks, and about as many by Turks, with a castle for some of these, a poor church for the first, and a mosque tolerably handsome for the latter, which, as they say, was formerly a church consecrated to St. John; in short, it is nothing but a chaos of noble ruins, which, with some inscriptions and baso relieves, are the only marks of its ancient magnificence. I shall not add any thing to what Mr. Spoon and so many other travellers have already said of these ruins, only that there are almost nothing remaining, but subterraneous vaults and foundations of hard stone, or of brick, well cemented, upon which the temple was built." The "candlestick is," indeed, "removed out of his place." Rev. ii. 5.

In 1831, Mr. Pike, the American missionary, visited the site of Ephesus, of which he gives the following account: "We sent back our horses to Aiasaluck, and set out on foot to survey the ruins of Ephesus. The ground was covered with high grass or grain, and a very few herbs were growing, which made our walk extremely unpleasant. On the east side of the hill we found nothing worthy of notice; no appearance of having been occupied for buildings. On the north side was the circus or stadium. Its length from east to west is forty rods, or one stadium. The north or lower side was supported by arches which still remain. The area, where the races used to be performed, is now a field of wheat. At the west end was the gate. The walls adjoining it are still standing, and of considerable height and strength. North of the stadium, and separated only by a street, is a large square enclosed with fallen walls and filled with the ruins of various edifices. A street running north and south divides this square in the centre. West of the stadium is an elevated ground, level on the top, with an immense pedestal in the centre of it. What building stood there it is not easy to say. Between this and the stadium was a street passing from the great plain north of Ephesus into the midst of the city.

"I found on the plains of Ephesus some Greek peasants, men and women, employed in pulling up tares and weeds from the wheat. It reminded me of Matt. xiii. 28. I addressed them in Romanaic, but found they understood very little of it, as they usually answered one in Turkish. I ascertained, however, that they all belonged to villages at a distance, and came there to labor. Not one of them could read, but they said, there were priests and a schoolmaster in the village to which they belonged, who could read. I gave them some tracts, which they promised to give to their priests and schoolmaster. Tournefort says, that when he was at Ephesus, there were thirty or forty Greek families there. Chandler found only ten or twelve individuals. Now no human being lives in Ephesus; and in Aiasaluck, which may be considered as Ephesus under another name, though not on precisely the same spot of ground, there are merely a few miserable Turkish huts. 'The candlestick is removed out of his place.' How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people.'"

We live and stand. It was impossible not to think, with deep interest, of the events which have transpired on this spot. Here has been displayed, from time to time, all the skill of the architect, the musician, the tragedian, and the orator. Here was the birthplace of the most splendid and mighty of the poets—some of whom were in their glory, and here the event has shown its transitory nature. How interesting would it be to stand among these walls, and have before the mind a full view of the history of Ephesus from its first foundation till now! We might observe the idolatrous and impure rites, and the cruel and bloody sports of pagans, succeeded by the preaching, the prayers, the holy and peaceable lives of the first Christians—those Christians martyred, but their religion still triumphing—pagan rites and pagan sports abolished, and the simple worship of Christ instituted in their room. We might see the city conquered and reconquered, destroyed and rebuilt, till finally Christianity, arts, learning, and prosperity, all vanish before the pestiferous breath of the only people whose sole occupation has been to destroy.

"The plain of Ephesus is now very unhealthy, owing to the fogs and mist which almost continually rest upon it. The land, however, is rich, and the surrounding country is both fertile and healthy. The adjacent hills would furnish many delightful situations for villages, if the difficulties were removed which are thrown in the way by a despotic government, oppressive taxes, and wandering bandits." (Missionary History, vol. ii.

Ephod, an ornamental part of the dress worn by the Hebrew priests. (It was worn above the tunic and robe (mell); was without sleeves, and open below the arms on each side, consisting of two pieces, one of which covered the front of the body and the other the back, joined together on the shoulders by golden buckles set with gems, and reaching down to the middle of the thigh. A girdle belonged to it, by which it was fastened around the body. Ex. xxviii. 6—18. R.

There were two kinds of ephod, one plain, of linen, for the priests, another embroidered for the high-priest. As there was nothing singular in that of the priests, Moses does not describe it; but that belonging to the high-priest, (Exod. xxviii. 6,) which was composed of gold, blue, purple, crimson, and twisted cotton, was a very rich composition of different colors. On that part of the ephod, which came over the shoulders of the high-priest, were two large precious stones, on which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, six names on each stone. Where the ephod crossed his breast, was a square ornament called the pectoral, in which were set twelve precious stones, with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel engraved on them, one on each stone. (See Beraßplatz.) Calmet interprets of occupation, that the ephod was peculiar to priests, and Jerome observes, that we find no mention of it in the Scripture, except when priests are spoken of. But some considerations render dubious this opinion. We find that David wore it at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem; and Samuel, although a Levite only, and a child, yet wore the ephod, I Sam. ii. 18. The Jews held, that no worship, true or false, could subsist without the priesthood, or the ephod. God had handed out of the spoils of the Midianites, and this became an offence in Israel. Micah, having made an idol, did not fail to make an ephod, Judg. vii. 27; xvi. 5. God foretold, by the prophet Hosea, (iii. 5.) that Israel should long remain without kind of sacrifices, altar, ephod, and teraphim. The ephod is often taken for the pectoral; and for the Urin and Thummim also; because these were mitted to it.

The Levites did not regularly wear the ephod: Moses appointed nothing particular with relation to their dress. (See Levite.) But at the dedication of Solomon's temple, the Levites and singing men, who were not of the priests' order, were clothed in fine linen. Josephus remarks, that in the time of king Agrippa, a short time before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Levites desired that prince to convene the Sanhedrim, in order to allow them the privilege of wearing the linen ephod, like the priests. They flattered Agrippa that this would contribute to the glory of his reign. Agrippa complied; but the historian observes, that this innovation violated the laws of their country, which never had been violated with impunity. Spencer and Cumann both affirm, that the Jewish kings had a right to wear the ephod, and to consult the Lord by Urim and Thummim. Their opinion they ground principally on the behavior of David at Ziklag, who said to Abiathar the high-priest, "Bring me hither the ephod; and Abiathar brought thither the ephod." 1 Sam. xxx. 7. The sequel favors this opinion. "And David inquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop? Shall I overtake them? And he answered him, Pursue; thou shalt recover all," ver. 8. We read likewise, (1 Sam. xxviii. 6.) that "Saul inquired of the Lord," and that "the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." He consulted God by the Urim, consequently he put on the ephod. But most commentators are of opinion, that neither David, Saul, nor Joshua dressed themselves in the high-priest's ephod, to consult God in their own persons; but, that these passages signify only, "Put on the ephod, and consult the Lord for me?" literally, "Being the ephod to me, and Abiathar caused the ephod to be brought to David." Grothus believes, that the high-priest turned the ephod, or pectoral, towards David, that he might see what God should answer to him by the stones on the breastplate. (See Urim and Thummim.)

EPHATHA, be opened, a Syriac word, which our Saviour pronounced, when he cured one deaf and dumb, Mark vii. 34.

EPHRAIM, a city of Ephraim, and Gideon's birthplace; the situation is unknown; but it is thought to be the same as Ephrah, Judg. vi. 11.

I. EPHRAIM, Joseph's second son, by Asenath, Potipherah's daughter; born in Egypt, about A. M. 2284. Ephraim, with his brother Manasseh, was preferred above all the other sons of Joseph, each of them having a son on his death-bed. Jacob laid his right hand on Ephraim, the youngest, and his left hand on Manasseh, the eldest. Joseph was desirous to change this situation of his hands; but Jacob answered, "I know it, my son; he (Manasseh) also shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he," Gen. xlvi.13—19.

The sons of Ephraim having made an inroad on Palestine, the inhabitants of Gath killed them, 1 Chron. vii. 20, 21. Ephraim, their father, mourned many days for them, and his brethren came to comfort him. Afterwards, he had sons named Beriah, Rephah, Resheph, and Tela, and a daughter named Sherah. His posterity multiplied in Egypt to the number of 40,500 men, capable of bearing arms, Num. ii. 18, 19. Joshua, who was of this tribe, gave the Ephraimites their portion between the Mediterranean sea west, and the river Jordan east, Josh. xvi. 15. (See Canaan.) The ark, and the tabernacle, remained long in this tribe, at Shiloh; and, after the separation of the ten tribes, the seat of the kingdom of Israel being in Ephraim, Ephraim is frequently used to signify that kingdom. Ephraim is used also for Bethel, Mic. v. 2. The tribe of Ephraim was led captive beyond the Euphrates, with all Israel, by Salmanasar, king of Assyria, A. M. 3293, ante A. D. 721.

II. EPHRAIM, a city of Ephraim, towards the Jordan, whither it is probable, Jesus retired before his passion, John xii. 54. This Ephraim was a city in the confines of the land of Ephraim, (2 Chron. xiii. 18), and was famous for fine flour. Josephus calls Ephraim and Bethel, two small cities; and places the former not in the tribe of that name, but in the land of Benjamin, near the wilderness of Judah, in the way to Jericho.

III. EPHRAIM. The forest of Ephraim was east of the Jordan, and in it Absalom lost his life, 2 Sam. xvii. 6—8. It could not be far from Mahanaim.

I. EPHRAITAI, Psalm cxxxii. 6, denotes, the lot of Ephraim. See the latter part of the article Ephraim I.

II. EPHRAITAI, otherwise Bethlehem. See BETHLEHEM.

I. EPHRON, son of Zohar; who sold the cave of Machpelah to Abraham, Gen. xxiii. 6.

II. EPHRON, a city beyond Jordan, which Judas Maccabeus took and sacked, 1 Mac. v. 46.

EPICUREANS, (Acts xvii. 18.) the name of a celebrated sect of ancient philosophers, who placed happiness in pleasure; not in voluptuousness, but in sensible, rational pleasure, properly regulated and governed. They denied a Divine Providence, however, and the immortality of the soul. They were so named after Epicurus, a philosopher, whom they claimed as founder of their sect; and who lived about 300 years before A. D. so that whatever his doctrines originally were, the time that had elapsed since his death, was sufficient to allow of their disuse; and his later disciples adopted the sensual import of their master's expressions, rather than the spiritual power of his principles. It is well known, that they latterly were called "Epicurus's hogs;" (Hor. Epist. i. 4. i.) implying the sloth and sensuality of the sect. Against these debauches the apostle argues, that providence, whose provision is in all the affairs of men, as communities, and as individuals; that the resurrection of one person (Christ) is proof of a separate state; and that a future judgment, to be presided over by him, evinces the notice taken by the Deity of future deities, the ultimate reward and punishment of characters so opposite.

EPIPHANES, splendid, illustrious, an epithet given to the gods, when appearing to men. Antiochus, brother of Seleucus, coming fortunately into Syria, a little after the death of his brother, was regarded as some propitious deity; and was hence called Epiphanes—the illustrious. (See ANTIOCHUS IV.) We call that festival Epiphany, on which the church celebrates the adoration of the Messiah by the Magi, or wise men.

EPIPHANIA, a city of Syria, on the river Orontes, between Antioch and Apamea. Several of the ancients say, it was called Hamath, before Antiochus Epiphanes named it Epiphania. Jerome and others are of opinion, that it is Hamath the Great. He says, that even in his time, the Syrians called Epiphania, Emnas. But, that this was Emesa, in Syria, see HAMATH.
EPISTLE

EPISTLE, a letter written from one party to another; but the term is eminently applied to those letters in the New Testament which were written by the apostles, on various occasions, to approve, condemn, or direct the conduct of Christian churches. It is to be noted, note, or memorandum, written by the hands of those who composed them, or by their directions, was divinely inspired, or proper for preservation to distant ages; those only have been preserved, by the overseeing hand of Providence, from which useful directions had been drawn, and might in after-ages be drawn, by believers, as from a perpetual directory for faith and practice;—always supposing that similar circumstances require similar directions. In reading an epistle, we ought to consider the occasion of it, the circumstances of the person to whom it was addressed, the time when written, the general scope and design of it, as well as the intention of particular arguments and passages. We ought also to observe the style and manner of the writer, his mode of expression, the peculiar effect he designed to produce on those to whom he wrote, to whose temper, manners, general principles, and actual situation, he might address his arguments, &c.

The epistles afford many and most powerful evidences of Christianity: they appeal to a great number of extraordinary miracles; and the whole foundation of the principles, and opinions, as admitted, or as prevailing, or as opposed, among those to whom they are addressed. They mention a considerable number of persons described in the gospels, in their situations in life, hint at their connections with the churches, and by sometimes addressing them, and sometimes recommending them by name, they connect their testimony with that of the writer of the epistle; and often, no doubt, they gave a proportionate influence to those individuals. Besides this, it is every way likely, that individuals mentioned in the epistles, would carefully procure copies of these writings, would give them all the authority and all the notoriety in their power, would communicate them to other churches, and, in short, would become vouchers for their genuineness and authenticity. We in the present day, who possess these instructive documents, may learn from them many things for our advantage and our conduct; how to avoid those evils which formerly injured the professors of true religion, and how to prevent and to abate those abuses to which time and incident occasionally gave rise, or to whose spread and prevalence particular occurrences or conjunctures are favorable. See BRUCE, CARMICHAEL.

The epistles being placed together in our canon, without reference to their chronological order, are pursed under considerable disadvantages; and it would be well to read them occasionally in connection with what the history in the Acts of the Apostles relates respecting the several churches to which they are addressed. This would also give us, nearly, their order of time; which should also be considered, together with the situation of the writer; as it may naturally be inferred that such compositions would partake of the writer's recent and present feelings. The epistles addressed to the dispersed Jews by John and James, by Peter and Jude, are very different in their style and application from those of Paul written to the Gentiles; and those of Paul, no doubt, contain expressions, and allude to facts, much more familiar to their original readers than to later ages. For the several epistles, see the articles of the respective writers; or those of the churches to which they are addressed.

ER, Judah's eldest son, who married Tamar; but who, being wicked, brought himself to an untimely end, Gen. xxxviii. 7.

ERASTUS, a Corinthian, and one of Paul's disciples, Rom. xvi. 23. He was chamberlain of the city. 'Chamisopus,' that is, of Corinth, where Paul was at that time; but of Jerusalem, according to modern Greeks. He followed Paul to Ephesus, where he was A. D. 56, and was sent by Paul to Macedonia with Timothy, probably to collect alms expected from the brethren. They were both with him at Corinth, A. D. 58, when he wrote his epistle to the Romans, whom he salutes in both their names; and it is probable that Erastus afterwards accompanied him till his last voyage to Corinth, in the way to Rome, where he suffered martyrdom; for then Erastus remained at Corinth. 2 Tim. iv. 20.

ERECH, a city of Chaldea, built by Nimrod, grandson of Cush, (Gen. x. 10,) and probably Araca, placed by Ptolemy in the Susiana, on the river Tigris, below where it joins the Euphrates. Ammi- nius calls it Araca. From this city the Aramaean fields, which abound with naphtha, and sometimes take fire, derive their name. The capital of the province, under the Chaldeans and Assyrians, was Babylon; under the princes named, Carchemish, a place in Mesopotamia, called Bagana. It is called Chaldea, or Babylonia, by the Greeks and Latins.

ERI, son of Gad, and head of a family, Gen. xlv. 16; Numb. xix. 18.

ESAR-HADDON, son of Sennacherib, and his successor in the kingdom of Assyria, 2 Kings xx. 17. Nothing is said of him in Scripture, except it is mentioned that he had sent colonists, to Samaria, Ezra iv. 2. He is supposed to have been the founder of that of the prodigal historians. He is said to have resided 20 or 30 years at Nineveh, and thirteen years at Babylon; in all, forty-two years. See ASHTARHOL.

ESAU, son of Isaac and Rebekah, was born A. M. 2169. When the time of Rebekah's preparation she had twins; (Gen. xxxv. 24—30,) the first born being hairy, was called Esau; which signifies hairy. The other twin was Jacob. Esau delighted in hunting, and his father Isaac had a particular affection for him. One day, Esau returning from hunting, very greatly fatigued, and starving, found his brother's some red pottage, which he then made. Jacob consented, provided he would sell him his birthright. Esau, conceiving himself weakened almost to death, sold it; and by oath resigned it to his brother. Gen. xxvii. 30—34. At the age of forty, Esau married two Canaanitish women; Judith, daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Basemath, daughter of Elon, (Gen. xxvi. 34.) which were very displeasing to Isaac and Rebekah, because they intermingled the blood of Abra- ham with that of Canaanitish aliens. Isaac being old, and his sight decayed, directed Esau to procure him delicate venison, by hunting, that he might give him his last blessing, Gen. xxvii. Esau, therefore, went to the chase, but, during his absence, Jacob, disguised by his mother Rebekah, obtained Isaac's blessing. When Esau returned, he learned what had passed, and, with weeping, mourned a secondary benediction from his father. Esau now contracted an aversion against Jacob, and determined to slay him; but his designs were frustrated by Rebekah. Esau settled in the mountains south of the Dead sea, and became very powerful. When Jacob returned from Mesopotamia, Esau received his messengers kindly, and came with four hundred men to meet him. The two brothers embraced each other tenderly. Essau offered to accompany his brother over the Jordan; but Jacob declined his offer, and Esdraelon, a plain in the tribe of Issachar, extends east and west from Shechem to mount Carmel: it is called also the great plain; the valley of Jezreel; and the plain of Esdraelon.

The following notices of this plain by Dr. Jowett, may not be uninteresting. After leaving Nazareth for Jerusalem, he says: (Christian Researches in Syria, &c. p. 146.) “Our road for the first three quarters of an hour, lay among the hills which led to the plain of Esdraelon; upon which, when we were dismounted, we had no more inconvenience but rode for the most part on level ground, interrupted by only gentle ascents and descents. This is that ‘mighty plain’—μεγάλη ἀνατολίς, as it is called by ancient writers—which, in every age, has been celebrated for so many battles. It was across this plain, that the hosts of Barak chased Sisera and his nine hundred chariots of iron: from mount Tabor to that ancient river, the river Kishon, would be directly through the middle of it. At present, there is peace; but not the most visible evidence of enduring peace and civil protection, a thriving population. We counted, in our road across the plain, only five very small villages, consisting of wretched mud-hovels, chiefly in ruins; and very few persons moving on the road. We might again truly apply to this scene the words of Deborah, (Judg. v. 6, 7.) ‘The highways were unoccupied: the inhabitants of the villages ceased—they ceased in Israel.’ The soil is extremely rich; and, in every direction, are the most picturesque views—the hills to the north—summits covered with the snow, and the south—to the east, the mountains of Tabor and Hermon—and Carmel, to the south-west. About four o’clock in the afternoon, we arrived at the village of Gennym, which is situated at the entrance of one of the numerous vales which lead out of the plain of Esdraelon to the mountainous regions of Ephraim. One of these passages would be the valley of Jezreel; and from the window of the khan where we are lodging, we have a clear view of the tract over which the prophet Elijah must have passed, when he girded up his loins, and ran before Aban to the entrance of Jezreel. But, in the present day, no chariots of Ahab or of Sisera, are to be seen—not even a single wheel-carriage, of any description whatever.”

In another place he remarks, (p. 222.) “To the south of the chain of hills on which Nazareth is situated, is the vast and ever memorable plain of Esdraelon. We computed this plain to be at least fifteen miles square; making allowance for some apparent irregularities as its running out, on the west, toward mount Carmel, and south toward Jordan. We passed rather on the eastern side of the middle of the plain, in our way to Gennesareth. Although it bears the title of ‘plain,’ yet it abounds with hills, which, in the view of it from the adjacent mountains, shrinks into nothing. On this noble plain, if there were perfect security from the government—a thing now unknown for centuries—twenty-five good towns, where we saw but five miserable villages, might stand, at a distance of three miles from one another, each with a population of a thousand souls, to the great improvement of the cultivation of so bountiful a soil. The land is not, indeed, neglected; but let none suppose, that, in this country, the greatest, or any thing like the greatest possible profit is made of the soil; while wars, feuds, extortion, and all the disadvantages resulting from Turkish government and Arab rivalry are continually harassing the common people, and reducing husbandry and every art to the lowest state of degradation.”

This memorable plain has ever been a chosen place for battles and military operations in every age. The following rapid and brilliant sketch of the military events, which, during a period of thirty centuries, have passed upon this spot, is from the pen of the late Dr. C. D. Clarke, (Travels in Greece, Egypt, and the Holy Land, ch. xiv.) “Here it was that Barak, descending with his ten thousand men from mount Tabor, discomfitted Sisera, and all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron; and all the people that were with him—of the Canaanites, the Philistines, the Ge- untico, unto the river of Kishon; when all the host of Sisera fell on the sword, and there was not a man left. Here also it was, that Josiah, king of Judah, fought in disguise against Necho, king of Egypt, and fell by the arrows of his antagonist. It has been a chosen place for encampment in every contest carried on in this country, from the days of Nabuchodonosor, king of the Assyrians, (in the history of whose war with Arphaxad it is mentioned as the great plain of Esdraelon,) until the disastrous march of Napoleon Buonaparte from Egypt into Syria. Jews, Gentiles, Saracens, Christian Crusaders, and anti-Christian Frenchmen, Egyptians, Persians, Druses, Turks, and Arabs, warriors out of every nation which is under heaven, have pitched their tents upon the plain of Esdraelon, and have beheld the various banners of their nations wet with the dews of Tabor and of Hermon.”

ESHAAL, or Ishbosheth, fourth son of Saul, 1 Chron. viii. 33. The Hebrews, to avoid pronouncing the word Baal (lord) used Bosheth (blasphemy, confusion.) Instead of Eshbaal, they said Ishbosheth, 2 Sam. i. 8. See Ishbosheth.

I. ESHCOL, one of Abraham’s allies in the valley of Mamre, who accompanied him in the pursuit of Chedorlaomer, Gen. xiv. 24.—II. A valley in the south of Judah, where the Hebrews spies cut a bunch of grapes, as large as two men could carry.

ESHAN, a town of Judah, Josh. xv. 32.

ESHTAOIL, a town of Dan; though it belonged first to Judah, (Josh. xv. 33; Judg. xiii. 25; xvi. 31.) Eusebius says, it was ten miles from Eleutheropolis towards Nicopolis, between Azotus and Askalon. It is called by Jerome, Asco. Eshatal is thought to be a village, now called by the Arabs Esadat, about fifteen miles south of Yebun. It is a wretched place, composed of a few mud huts.

ESHTITAM, or Edentor, a town of Judah, Josh. xxi. 14; xv. 50; 1 Sam. xxx. 28. Eusebius says, it was a large town in the district of Eleutheropolis, north of that city. It was ceded to the priests, of which city of ESPouse, ESPOUSEs. This was a ceremony of betrothing, or coming under obligation for the purpose of marriage; and was a mutual agreement between the two parties, which usually preceded the marriage some considerable time (See Marriage). The reader will do well carefully to attend to the distinction between espousals and marriage; as espousals in the East are frequently contracted years before the parties are married, and sometimes in very early youth. This custom is allowed to be figurative, as between God and his people, (Jer. ii. 2), to whom he was a husband, (xxi. 32.), and the apostle says he acted as a kind of assistant (promulga) on such an occasion: "I have espoused you to Christ." (G Cor. xil. 2.) have drawn up the writings, settled the agreements, given pledges, &c. of your union. See Isa. liv. 5; Matt. xxv. 6; Rev. xix.

ESSENES, or EsseniA, a Jewish sect. We are not acquainted with the origin of the Essenes, or the etymology of their name. Pliny says, they had been many thousand years in being, living without marriage, and without the other sex. The first book of Maccabees (see AsIdEANS) calls them Hasidamis, and says, they were formed into a society before the time of Herod the Great. The Essenes, who are mentioned by Josephus, is just, in the time of Aristotle, and Antigonus, son of Hircanus. Suls, and some others, were of opinion, that the Essenes were a branch of the Rechabites, who subsisted before the captivity. Calmet takes the Chasdim of the Psalms, and the Asideans in the Maccabees, to be their true source.

Josephus gives the following account of the Essenes: They live in perfect union, and exhibit volunta, moses as a social union; they do not marry, but bring up other men's children as if they were their own, and instruct them in the duties of their own spirit and maxims; they despise riches, and possess all things in common. Oil and perfumes are prohibited their habitation; they have an austere and mortified air, but without affectation; they always dress in white; they have a steward, who distributes to each what he wants; they are hospitable to their own sect, and who are not obliged to take provisions with them. They are the same group which they educate are all treated and clothed alike, and do not change their dress till their clothes are worn out. Their trade is carried on by exchange; each giving what is superfluous, to receive what he needs. They do not speak before they pray, and when they pray, they stand while they pray; they are taught by their fathers, which they address to this luminaries, as if to incite it to appear; afterwards they work till the fifth hour, near eleven o'clock in the morning. They then meet together, and, putting on linen, bathe in fresh water, and retire to their cells, where no strangers enter. From thence they go into their common refectory, which is, as it were, a sacred temple, where they continue in profound silence; they are served with bread, and each has his own mess; the priest says grace, after which they eat: they finish their meal also with a prayer; then pull off their white clothes, which they wore while at table, and return to their work until the evening; at that time they come again to the refectory, and bring their guests with them, if they have any. They are religious observers of their word; their bare presence is as binding as the most sacred oaths; they avoid swearing, as they would perjury; their care of their sick is very particular, and they never suffer them to want any thing; they care seriously for the writings, so that they may acquire the knowledge of plants, stones, roots, and remedies. Before they admit any who desire it into their sect, they put them to a year's probation, and inure them to the practice of the most unnecessary exercises; after this term, they admit them into the common refectory, and the place where they bathe; but not into the interior of the house until after another trial of two years; then they are allowed to make a kind of profession, wherein they engage by horrible oaths to observe the laws of piety, justice, and modesty; fidelity to God and their prince; never to discover the secrets of the sect to strangers; and to preserve the books of their masters, and the names of angels, with great care. If any one violates these engagements, and incuritable guilt, he is expelled, and generally dies of want; because he can receive no food from any stranger, being bound to the contrary by his oath. Sometimes the Essenes, moved with compassion, receive such again, when they have given long and solid proofs of conversion. Next to God, they have the greatest respect for Moses, and for old men. The sabbath is very regularly observed among them; they not only forbear from kindling any fire, or preparing any thing, on the day of the sabbath, but that day is called the highest thing, nor attend to the calls of nature. They generally live long, owing to the simplicity of their diet, and the regularity of their lives; they show incredible firmness under torments; they hold the soul to be immortal, and believe that souls descend from the highest air into the bodies animated by them, whether they are drawn by some natural attractions, which they cannot resist; and after death, they swiftly return to the place from whence they came, as if freed from a long and melancholy career. In respect to the state of the soul after death, they have almost the same sentiments as the heathen, who place the souls of old men in the Elysian Fields, and those of the wicked in Tartarus. Some among them are married; in other respects they agree with the other Essenes. They live separate from their wives while pregnant. Slavery is esteemed by them an injury to human nature; wherefore they have no slaves. Many of them were said to have the gift of prophecy, which they wrote down while they were being taught by the sacred writers; and to their simple and frugal way of living. They believe that nothing happens but according to the decrees of God; and their sect is nearly related to that of the Pythago-

Although the Essenes were the most religious of their nation, yet they did not visit the temple at Jerusalem, nor offer bloody sacrifices; they were afraid of being polluted by other men; they sent their offerings thither; and themselves offered up to God the sacrifices of a clean heart. Philo says, the Es-ses were in number about four thousand in Judas; and Pliny seems to fix their principal about above En-gedi, where they fed on the fruit of the nectar tree. He adds, that they lived at a distance from the sea-shore, for fear of being corrupted by the conversation of strangers. Philo assures us, that in certain cities some of them occasionally resided; but that they usually chose rather to dwell in the fields, and apply themselves to agriculture, and other laborious exercises, which did not take them from their solitude. Their studies were the laws of Moses; espe-

ESSENES

I specialy on sabbath days, on which they assembled in their synagogues, where each was seated according to his rank; the elder above, the younger below. Of their company, the only learned expounded. They very much used symbols, allegories, and parables, after the manner of the ancients. We do not see that our Lord has spoken of them, or that he preached among them. It is not improbable that John the Baptist lived among them, till he began to baptize and preach. The wilderness, where Pity places the Essenes, was not very far from Hebron, which is thought by some to be the place of John’s birth.

The following particulars are from Philo, concerning the Essenes, who may be called practical, to distinguish them from the Therapeutæ, who may be termed contemplative Essenes. Some employ themselves in husbandry; others in trades and manufactures, of such things only as are useful in time of peace; their designs being beneficial only. They amass neither gold nor silver, nor make any large acquisitions of land to increase their revenues, but are satisfied with possessing what is requisite to relieve the necessities of life. They are, perhaps, the only men who without land or money, by choice rather than by necessity, find themselves rich enough; because their wants are but few, and, as they understand how to be content with nothing, as we may say, they always enjoy plenty. You do not find an artificer among them who would make any sort of arms, or warlike machines; they make none of those things, even in time of peace, which men pervert to bad uses; they concern themselves neither with trade nor navigation; lest it should engage them to be avaricious. The method which they follow in their explanation, is to unfold the allegorical meanings of Scripture. Their instructions run principally on holiness, equity, justice, economy, policy, the distinction between real good and evil; of what is indifferent, what we ought to pursue, or to avoid. The three fundamental maxims of their morality are, the love of God, of virtue, and of our neighbor; they demonstrate their love of God in a constant charity throughout their lives, in a great aversion from swearing and lying, and in attributing every thing that is good to God, never making him the author of evil; they show their love to virtue in disinterestedness, in dislike of glory and ambition, in renouncing pleasures, in patience, in modesty, in being easily contented, in mortification, modesty, respect for the laws, constancy, and other virtues; lastly, their love to their neighbor appears in their liberality, in the equity of their conduct towards all, and in their community of fortunes, on which it may be proper to enlarge a little.

First, no one among them in particular is master of the house where he dwells; any other of the same sect who comes thither, may be as much master as he is. As they live in society, and eat and drink in common, they make provision for the whole community, as well for those who are present, as for those who come unlooked for. There is a common chest in each particular society, where every thing is reserved which is necessary for the support and clothing of each member. Whatever any one gets is brought into the common stock; and, if any one fall sick, so as to be disabled from working, he is supplied with every thing necessary for the recovery of his health, out of the common fund. The young are taught in the manner of a public school, and treated in the almost in the same manner as children treat their parents in their old age. They choose priests of the most distinguished merit to be receivers of the estates and revenues of their society, who likewise have the management of the members of the family, and members of the household. There is nothing singular or affected in their way of living; it is simple and unassuming.

It is surprising commentators and divines make no reference to these peculiarities in the character, manners, and principles of the Jewish sect of the Essenes. The fact is, that, not being explicitly mentioned in the Gospels, they are usually disregarded. In many respects they seem to have agreed with the character of John the Baptist, as described or implied in the Gospels. They are also described as “having all things in common,” no one of them claiming personal property in goods, but referring them to the whole community. This then abates the singularity of the primitive church, of which we are told, no one said that ought “of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things in common,” Acts iv. 32. That is to say, these first converts imitated the Essenes, a sect well known among them; they were in the city what the Essenes were in the desert. This also sets the behavior of Ananias and Saphire in a strong light; since they must have known perfectly well the custom of this sect, and had, like them, made a profession of renouncing riches. It appears, “the Essenes took no provisions on their journeys; so the disciples; (Mark vi. 8; Luke ix. 3.) they were hospitable; (see Rom. xii. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 3; Titus i. 8; 1 Peter iv. 9.) they did not marry; perhaps the fear that this principle should be extended too far, ought to be taken into our consideration, when we examine the grounds of some of the apostle’s advice, 1 Cor. vii.; Heb. xiii. 14; 1 Tim. iv. 3. We may suppose, too, that the Christian deacons resembled “the steward among the Essenes, who distributed to every one what he wanted.” In short, if the reader will peruse with attention the articles Essenes and Therapeutæ, with these ideas in his mind, he will perceive that this sect deserves a consideration which it does not usually receive. A late ingenious writer has endeavored to prove that the Essenes were, in fact, a Christian society. (See Jones’s Ecclesiastical Researches.)

It has been supposed by some, that our Saviour was educated by, or even a disciple of John the Baptist. But this is mere conjecture, and does not harmonize with the other facts which are known. John was indeed a Novitiate, (Luke i. 15.) like Samuel and Samson, 1 Sam. i. 11; Judg. xiii. 5. R. ESTHER, or Hadassah, of the tribe of Benjamin, daughter of Abihail. Her parents being dead, Mordecai, her uncle by her father’s side, took care of her education. After Ahaseurus had divorced Vashti, search was made throughout Persia for the most beautiful women, and Esther was one selected. She found favor in the eyes of the king, and he married her with royal magnificence, bestowing largesses and pardons on his people, Esth. ii. Mordecai refusing to honor Haman, he, in revenge, obtained an order from the king to destroy the whole nation of the Jews. Mordecai apprized Esther of the plot, and by her means the danger was averted, (chap. iv.) and Haman executed, chap. vii. See HAMAN and MORDECAI.

The book of Esther has always been esteemed canonical both by Jews and Christians; but the authority of those additions in the Latin editions are disputed. The Greek copies are not uniform, and differ much from the Hebrew; while the old Latin translations differ from both the Hebrew and from the Greek. At the end of one of the Greek copies, we read, that in the "fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, Dositheus, accompanied by his son Ptolemy, carried the letter of Purim into Egypt," which was said to have been translated into Greek by Lyonschus, the son of Ptolemy." This Ptolemy is believed to have been Philometer, who died A. M. 3061, long after Ptolemy Philopator, in whose reign the version of the LXX is supposed to have been made. Lyonschus was, probably, author of the additions in the Greek of Esther. Clermont of Alexandria, some rabbins, and many commentators, suppose the original author of this book to have been Mordecai; and the book itself favors this opinion, saying, that he wrote the history of this event. Others think it was composed and placed in the canon by Ezra, or by the great synagogue. The time of the history is probably in the reign of Xerxes. See AMANUENSIS II.

ETHAM, a rock to which Samson retired, Judg. xv. 8, 11. Probably near a city of the same name in Judah, built by Rehoobam, (1 Chron. iv. 3; 2 Chron. xi. 6,) which lay between Bethelhem and Tekoa. Josephus speaks of a place of pleasure called Bethesa, distant from Jerusalem five leagues, to which Herod was wont to go from hence on his way to the Temple. Possibly, it is the same; but it is probably, Plato, some years before the destruction of Jerusalem, brought water through aqueducts into the city, at a great expense; in accomplishing which, he was forced to take a large compass round the mountain lying in the way. See CURTAT.

ETERNAL, ETERNITY. These words often signify a very long time, and therefore must not always be understood literally; so we find "eternal mountains," or "denote their antiquity, Gen. xlvi. 26; Deut. xxxiii. 15. God promises to David an "eternal kingdom and prosperity," that is, his and his son's empire will be of long duration; and even absolutely eternal, if we include the kingdom of the Messiah. But eternity, when God is the subject, always denotes an absolute eternity. "The Lord ruleth for ever. I lift up my hand to heaven, and swear, I live for ever," eternally. The Son of God is called "Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec;" his gospel, "the eternal gospel;" his redemption, "eternal redemption purchased by us, the blood of the covenant;" his glory, "an eternal weight of glory." For eternal punishment, see HELL.

ETHAN, the third station of the Israelites when coming out of Egypt, (Num. xxxiii. 6; Exod. xiii. 20,) lay at the extremity of the western Gulf of the Red sea.

ETHAN, the Ezrahite, and son of Kishi, was one of the wisest men of his time, except Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 31; Psal. lxxxix; 1 Chron. vi. 44. Ethan was a principal master of the temple music, 1 Chron. xv. 17, and other places. Ps. lxxxv. is attributed to him.

ETHANIM, a Hebrew month, (1 Kings viii. 2,) after the captivity called Tizri. It is supposed to answer to our September, O. S. See JEWISH CALENDAR.

ETH-BAAL, king of the Zidonians, father of Jezebel, wife of Ahah, 1 Kings xvi. 31.

ETHER, a city twenty miles from Elam,Etheropolis, near Malatia, in the province of Judah. Allotted first to Judah, afterwards to Simeon, Josh. xv. 42; xix. 7.

ETHIOPIA, one of the great kingdoms in Africa, part of which is now called Abyssinia. Ethiopia is frequently mentioned in Scripture under the name of Cush; but as there were several countries so named, care should be taken to distinguish the Africana country. (See under Cusites.) The Abyssinians are by some believed to have received the Christian faith from Matthew, or Bartholomew, or Philip, or from queen Candace's eunuch, who was baptized by Philip, one of the seven deacons, Acts viii. 27. But these opinions are unfounded. Matthew, we are told, preached the gospel to the Ethiopians, that is, those above the Arazes near the Persians. Bartholomew preached to the Indians, called by the ancients Ethiopians, that is, in Arabia Felix. Philip the deacon, or the eunuch, might preach the gospel to queen Candace, who reigned in the peninsula of Meroë, which is sometimes named Ethiopia.

[The various significations in which the name Cush or Ethiopia is taken in the Old Testament, have been discussed under the article Cush; which see. Ethiopia proper lay south of Egypt, on the Nile; and was bounded north by Egypt, i. e. by the cataracts near Syene; east by the Red sea, and perhaps part of the Indian ocean; south by unknown regions of the interior of Africa; and west by Libya and deserts. It comprehended, of course, the modern countries of Nubia, or Sennar, and Abyssinia. The chief city in it was the ancient Meroë, situated on the island or from hence probably, Pluteus, some years before the destruction of Jerusalem, brought water through aqueducts into the city, at a great expense; in accomplishing which, he was forced to take a large compass round the mountain lying in the way. See CURTAT.

The Ethiopian queen Candace, whose treasurer is mentioned, Acts viii. 27, was probably queen of Meroë, where a succession of females reigned, none bare this name. (Pliny, Hist. Nat. vii. 50.) As this courier is said to have gone up to Jerusalem to worship, he was probably a Jew by religion, if not by birth. There is a current tradition among the Ethiopians themselves, that the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, was called Magakuda, and she was not from Arabia, but was a queen of her own country. They say, that she adopted the Jewish religion, and introduced it among her people; and that her son and successor, Meniak, (whom she is said to have conceived by Solomon,) took the name of David I. (Bruce's Trav. i. p. 334.) Christianity was first introduced into Ethiopia about A. D. 330, by Frumentius, who became the first bishop of Ethiopia.

The old Ethiopian language is a dialect of the Arabic, having an alphabet of its own, and some distinctive peculiarities; thus, e. g. it is read from left to right, while the Arabic and all the other Semitic languages are read from right to left. In the alphabet, too, the vowels are represented by small hooks or circles appended in different ways to the consonants. It was in daily use so late as the 14th century; when it was supplanted by the Amharic dialect. It still continues to be used in books; but most of the literature in it is of a religious and ecclesiastical character; among which the first place is due to the Ethiopic version of the Scriptures. The principal works on the language, literature, and history, of Ethiopia, are those of Ludolph, R. EVANGELIST, one who publishes good news; they therefore who write, as well as they who preach, the gospel of Jesus Christ, are evangelists; and in general all who declare happy tidings. In Isaiah x. 27, the Lord says, he will give to Jacob one that is a propagator of the evangel, Philip the deacon is called an evangelist, Acts xxi. 8. Paul speaks of evangelists, (Eph. iv. 11,) and ranks them

Mai. viii. 8. Having joined the Romans in their war against Antiochus the Great, he received in return for the capture of the district (i.e. the Indians, Medes, and Lydians), as the text of the Maccabees reads; but it is probable we should read, "the Ionians, Mysians, and Lydians." Enn. 5, mother of Timothy; (2 Tim. i. 5.) was a Jewess by birth, but married to a Greek, who was Timothy's father. Paul found, at Lystra, Eunice and Timothy far advanced in grace and faith.

EUNCH. In the courts of eastern kings, the care of the beds and apartments is generally committed to eunuchs. The Hebrew saris signifies a real eunuch, whether naturally born such, or rendered such; but in Scripture this word often denotes an officer belonging to a prince attending his court, and employed in the interior of his palace. Potiphar, Pharaoh's eunuch or officer, and Joseph's master, had a wife, Gen. xxxix. 1-7. God forbade his people to make eunuchs; and prohibited such to enter into the congregation of the Lord, (Deut. xxiii. 1,) that is, deprived them the possession of some outward privileges belonging to the Israelites. They were looked on in the commonwealth as dry and useless wood; and might say of themselves—"Belong, I am a dry tree." But narrating a story, "Thus spake the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my sabbaths, and take hold of my covenant, even unto them will I give in mine house, and within my walls, a place and a name better than of sons and daughters," Isa. iv. 4. In the courts of the kings of Judah and Israel, were officers, called Serazim; probably real eunuchs, if they were slaves or captives, bought from foreigners; but if they were Hebrews, their name expresses simply their office and dignity. Our Saviour (Matt. xix. 12) speaks of men who "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven," who, on some religious motive, renounced marriage and carnal pleasures. Origen, and some ancient heretics, construed our Saviour's words literally; and Eusebius informs us, that this was done so commonly by the inhabitants of Syria and Cappadocia, in honor of the goddess Cybele, that king Abgarus, to abolish the practice, made a law, that they who were guilty of it should have their hands cut off.

EUCODIAS, a female disciple mentioned by Paul, Philp. 2:2. EUPHRATES, a famous river of Asia, which has its source in the mountains of Armenia, and runs along the frontiers of Cappadocia, Syria, Araba Deserta, Chaldia, and Mesopotamia, and falls into the Persian Gulf. At present it divides itself into several streams, one of which, the Tigris, joins the sea in union with the Tigris; but formerly it had a separate channel. Moses says, (Gen. ii. 14,) the Euphrates was the fourth river whose source was in Paradise. (See Eden.) Scripture often calls it, the Great River, and assigns it for the eastern boundary of that land which God promised to the Hebrews, Deut. i. 7; Josh. i. 4. The Euphrates overflows in summer, like the Nile, when the snow on the mountains of Armenia begins to melt. The source of the Euphrates, as well as that of the Tigris, is in the mountains of Armenia, some of the ancients were of opinion, that these two rivers rose from one common spring; but at present their sources are distant one from the other. The Arabians divide the Euphrates into the larger and the lesser; the larger, rising in the Gorrian mountains, discharges itself into the Tigris near Amur and Felonang. The smaller, whose channel is often wider than that of the larger, runs.

sin, are separated from the church, and deprived of spiritual advantages. There are two or three types of excommunication: 1. That by which the person offending is separated from the body of the faithful; thus Paul excommunicated the excommunicated, 1 Cor. v. 1-5. (2.) The lesser, by which the sinner is forbidden the sacraments. (2.) That which suspends him from the company of believers, which seems to be hinted at, 2 Thess. iii. 6. Augustin speaks in several places of this excommunication; and Theophylact says, that it was esteemed a great punishment. The primitive church was very cautious in the use of excommunication; using it only for very serious and important reasons, and always with great concern. The manner of excommunicating in the primitive church was this; the faithful separated themselves from those whose company the church had prohibited, without obliging their superiors to proceed any further. In process of time, however, the bishops used threatening, anathemas, and sentences of excommunication; and at last, to make these ceremonies more frightful, they were attended with actions proper for infusing terror, such as the lighting of wax candles, extinguishing them, throwing them on the ground, and trampling them under foot, while the bishop pronounced excommunication, thundering also curses against the excommunicated.

The principal effect of excommunication is, to separate the excommunicated from the society of Christians, from the privilege of being present in religious assemblies, from the eucharist, from attendance at the prayers, the sacraments, and all those duties by which Christians are connected in one society and communion. An excommunicated person is, with regard to the church, as a heathen man and a publican, Matt. xxi. 14. But this excommunication does not exempt him from any duties to which he is liable as a man, a citizen, a father, a husband, or a king, either by the law of nature and nations, or by the civil law. And when the apostles enjoin men to have no conversation with the excommunicated, not to eat with them, not to salute them, this is to be understood of offices of mere civility, (which a man is at liberty to pay, or to withhold,) and not of any natural obligations; such as are founded on nature, humanity, and the law of nations, 1 Cor. v. 1-5; 2 Thess. iii. 6-14; 2 John 10, 11.

Among the Jews we see excommunication practised in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah, with regard to those who would not dismiss the strange women whom they married. Ezra x. 7-10; Neh. xiii. 25-28. Our Saviour, speaking to his apostles, foretold that the Jews, out of hatred to him, would treat them ill, and excommunicate them, "cast them out of their synagogues." They generally scourged the excommunicated persons before they expelled them out of their synagogues. The act was preceded by censure and admonition, at first, privately; if the guilty person did not amend, the house of judgment, the assembly of judges, declared to him, with menace, the necessity for his reformation. If he continued obstinate on four sabbath days successively, his name and the nature of his fault were proclaimed, in order to bring him to shame; and then, if he were incorrigible, he was excommunicated. Our Saviour seems to allude to this practice, where he commands us to tell our brother of his fault between him and us alone; then—that we should take witnesses with us in order to ad-

Sah him; and lastly,—that we should inform the church against him. And if, after this, he do not return to his duty, then we should look on him as a heathen man and a publican, Matt. xviii. 15—17.

The sentence of excommunication among the Jews was conceived to be not the only Arabs, but the only one he be in excommunication, or separation." The judges, or the synagogue, or even private persons, had a right to excommuniqate; but regularly, "the house of judgment," or the court of justice, solemnly pronounced the sentence. One particular person might excommunicate another, and he might likewise excommunicate himself; as they who bound themselves under a curse, neither to eat nor to drink till they had killed Paul, Acts xxiii. 12. Beasts were sometimes excommunicated: and the rabbinic teacher, that excommunication has its effect even on dogs.

It has been a matter of surprise to some, that our Saviour, whose design was to build his church on the ruins of Judaism, and who evidently attacked the very foundations of the Jewish religious prejudices, was, notwithstanding, never excommunicated. Perhaps the Jews might look on Christ and his followers as a new sect; and as it was not then a custom to excommunicate whole bodies, they might receive the holiness as the Sadducees, Essenes, Herodians, and Pharisees. See ANTIQU. EXODUS, (from the Greek "Exodus, going out") the term generally applied to the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, under Moses, their divinely appointed leader and legislator.

There are a few things connected with the Exodus which require illustration previously to our consideration of the departure itself.

1. The true reason which actuated Moses in his conduct, was, no doubt, the ultimate deliverance of Israel from bondage; but, what is the nature and import of the apparent reason which he gives to Pharaoh, in Exod. v. 1, 3, "to go three days' journey into the desert, for the purpose of a festivity and sacrifice to the God Jehovah?"—This may perhaps receive elucidation, from the similar undertakings which are actually accomplished every year, from Egypt, by the caravan of Mecca; and the question naturally arises, Whether such a custom be as ancient as Moses?—Did Moses reason with Pharaoh something after the manner of other peculiar journeys through your dominions, and many of your own subjects also leave your dominions for a time, to perform their worship in what they esteem a peculiarly sacred place, whereas you do not suffer us to enjoy that liberty? a reason, not paradoxical, to which they also desire the same permission as they receive, and propose to form a caravan of Israelites, who may worship the God of their fathers, in a place, and in a manner of his own appointment, where we may be secure from the profane interference of bystanders, while performing our sacred services." To see the force of this supposition, it must be observed, (1.) That pilgrimages to certain cities and temples are of most ancient date in Egypt, and, in fact, appear to have been interwoven with the original establishments and institutions of that country; (2.) that the pilgrimage to Mecca, in particular, though now the most famous, was not instituted by Mahomet; he found it already established among the Arabs. Its antiquity is, beyond a doubt, very great; as is also, (3.) that of the Kaaba of Ishmael; and though we may reject the Arabian tale of the origin of the well Zemzem, and that of the miraculous deliverance of Ishmael (instead of Isaac) from the knife of Abraham, yet the Ishmaelite might dwell at Mecca, or in the country adjacent, is unquestionable, and is sufficiently credible: he might institute some kind of political, religious, or commercial meeting of the tribes called Arabs, (for the descendants of Ishmael are that caravans for commerce were customary long before the time of Moses, for to such a one travelling into Egypt, from Gilead, was Joseph sold. Did not, then, caravans for commerce, in those days, as they do at present, form the means of visiting particular places, and not such caravans either set out from, or pass through, the land of Egypt from the more westerly parts of Africa, as they now do, so that their nature and their purposes were sufficiently understood by Pharaoh? It must here be remembered, that the above is merely fanciful conjecture.

2. The places named, and the events of the journey of the Israelites.—(1.) It is said of the place from whence the Israelites departed; (Exod. xii. 37) "and the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses unto Succoth." See also Num. xxxii. 3.—Where, and what, was this Rameses? We are told, (Exod. chap. i. 11,) that the Israelites built, for Pharaoh, treasure cities—Rameses and Pithom. If, as has been generally supposed, Pithom was the ancient Pelusium, then it might be the extremity of Pharaoh's dominions toward the east, and probably Rameses was the extremity of his dominions toward the west; for in such frontier situations, in other periods and countries, the royal residence, or capital, or any other important town, would be placed. Now, in Niebuhr's map of the mouths of the Nile, on the western branch of that river, and rather south of the canal which goes to Alexandria, is a district, or village, named Rameses. If it be taken as an indication of the name and situation of the ancient Rameses, then these two accounts of Moses express—that all the Israelites, from the most distant parts of Pharaoh's dominions, assembled, with their property, at the proper station for the departure of caravans, Succoth; which, indeed, we know must have been the fact; but which has not previously been discerned in the Mosaic history. [With far more probability, Gesenius regards the city of Rames or Rameses as the capital of the land of Goshen, and consequently situated to the eastward of the Delta. This idea is also adopted by Prof. Stuart; who fixes the site of this city at about half the distance between the Nile and Suez, where the present village of Aboukryash is situated. (in accordance with M. Aymé and Lord Valentia, where are found extensive ruins. If thus located, Rameses lay on the borders of the great canal; or, if this were not yet in existence, it lay on the great valley or Wady, up which the waters of the Nile flow—] ed, as sometimes nearly to meet those of the Bitter lakes, which were connected with the Red sea. It would thus have been about twenty-four miles from Suez. (Stuart’s Course of Heb. Study, vol. ii. No. 1, p. 173. Modern Traveller in Arabia, p. 185. Amer. ed.)

(2.) Mr. Taylor supposes that Succoth, where the Israelites assembled, may be placed at Birkt-el-Hadji, or Pilgrim’s pool: here the caravans still assemble, and here that destined for Mecca waits the arrival of the western pilgrims. The reasons are evident; it is at a convenient distance from Cairo; it furnishes water, and vegetation; so that the same wants which occur in all caravans, inclined, in fact obliged, the ancient assemblage of Israel, as they now do the modern assemblage of Arabs, to make it their temporary residence. It appears also that Birkt-el-Hadji is considerably in advance towards Suez, and consequently the journey is shortened in proportion.

It is more probable, as Prof. Stuart supposes, that Succoth was merely a place of encampment—dividing the distance between Rameses and Etham (Adjerout), i.e. about twenty miles from each. R. We have seen under the article CARAVAN, that Moses probably regulated the Israelites in an accurate manner, and appointed proper officers. To accomplish this, the delay at Birkt-el-Hadji would furnish the opportunity of communicating the order, and as the various families arrived in succession, he might directly order them to their stations. In fact, some delay is implied in the name Succoth (booths); for, in general, the caravans only pitch their tents here; but if the first comers of the families, while waiting for their kinmen, built booths here, they might naturally enough call their temporary town by this name—"the booths." It is also probable, that having long dwelt in houses, few were provided with tents; so that the erection of booths was the most convenient mode of shelter in their power. This account of the matter seems justified by the history; (chap. xiii. 17.) "When Pharaoh had let the people go." So, verse 17. "And they took their journey from Succoth, and encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wilderness." As nothing particular happened at Etham, little need be said on it; its situation, described as being in the edge of the wilderness, marks distinctly enough in what direction we must look for it. We shall only observe, that the nearer to the wilderness, in the direct road towards the wilderness, (or north-west of the navigated Red sea,) we place Etham, the better we apply the description of it, as "in the edge of the wilderness." The chief difficulty which remains, is, to understand precisely the command given in chap. xiv. 2: “Turn and encamp.”—It is supposed, then, that the Israelites continued their route from Etham, toward the desert, to somewhere about the place marked with a turning-off in the map, and here turned toward the sea, which lay to their right—"encamp before (Hb. in the face of) Pi-ha-hiroth."—The word hiroth has usually been taken as a proper name; but Dr. Shaw justly renders it, "the gullet," though he did not perceive its direct application: Pi is the mouth, i.e. the mouth of the gullet.—Encamp in the face (in front) of the mouth of the gullet, between Migdol (the tower) and the sea." [The word Pi-ha-hiroth is more probably of Egyptian origin, denoting a place of reeds, a salt marsh. R.] To ascertain this Migdol or tower, we need not seek any distant town, but must be guided by the nature of the country; at the same time recollecting the orders given, "to turn." We may place this tower at Bir Suez, the well of water, because this well was worth protecting by a tower, a place of security from the enemies of Suez. (Stuart’s Course of Heb. Study, vol. ii. No. 1, p. 173. Modern Traveller in Arabia, p. 185. Amer. ed.)

It lies on the route between Adjerout (Etham) and Suez, and is situated just so that it corresponds with the description here, on the supposition that Pi-ha-hiroth was near the sea. R. "Encamp over-against (Hb. in the face of) Baal-zephon."—Baal-zephon is placed at Suez, because it joins Pi-ha-hiroth; so that what ever station was "in the face of Pi-ha-hiroth," was also "in the face of Baal-zephon." yet Pi-ha-hiroth being more extensive than the town of Baal-zephon, this repetition, descriptive of the position to be taken, was neither useless nor redundant. That a town should be established here anciently, appears every way reasonable, from the same causes as now maintain the town of Suez, notwithstanding its numerous inconveniences. Observe, also, "Encamp between the tower and the sea." i.e. from Bir Suez to the gulf, eastward, or from Bir Suez to the head of the sea, southward, either of which may answer the expression; but if we say from Bir Suez to the gulf, then the encamping from Baal-zephon to the sea, is from Suez, westward, along the head of the sea-shore. While Moses was in this position, Pharaoh approached; and he might justly say of the Israelites, that "they were encamped by the sea, and the sea," as verse 9—so that if he did not destroy them by a vigorous attack, they must inevitably perish by famine, while under his blockade.

We now come to the passage of the sea itself, and shall do well accurately to analyze the narration.—Moses said, "Fear not! Stand still!" Here seems to be an indication of intentional delay, as if time and circumstances were not at this moment ready or favorable. During this interval of waiting, Moses cried unto the Lord," verse 13. In this conjunction, a strong easterly wind blowing all night, divided the waters.—Now, the position of this gulf being from south to north, an east or perhaps north-east wind was the most proper that could blow for the purpose of dividing the waters in the middle, and thereby preserving a body of water, above and below, i.e. north and south, of that division; these waters defended the passage, like a wall, on the right and on the left, while the Israelites walked upon dry ground. "The Egyptians pursued to the midst of the sea; but in the morning watch"—this point of time, no doubt, was punctually expressed; and would be punctually understood by those accustomed to count time by watches: it has lost that punctuality to us, yet we may pretty correctly fix it at about three o'clock in the morning, about which time—the sands, &c. of the oozy sea-bottom took off the chariot wheels of the Egyptians; and now, the east wind sinking, the waters returned from the north and south, and overwhelmed the Egyptians; whereas the Israelites passed during the power of this strong wind, which blew full in their faces.

Such seem to be the circumstances of this famous passage; the result of the whole is, that Providence engaged natural means in accomplishing its purpose. The strong east wind is expressly recorded in the history; and, again, in the thanksgiving song for this deliverance, "Thou didst blow with thy wind."—After reflecting on this, can it possibly be regarded as any disparagement to the interference of the same Providence, if advantage were also taken of the tide? Certainly not; we ought rather to conclude, that all natural advantages were taken, and that by these, and over these, Providence operated. This idea seems to receive support from the command, to "stand still," which may relate to the abatement of the waters by the falling of the tide in the gulf, as it does to the rising of the wind for the division of the remaining waters after the tide was out; the two agents were probably concurrent.

We are now ready for an inspection of the map of the journey from Egypt to the Red sea.

Nearly opposite to Mitzr-el-Mitik, on the other side of the Nile, are the pyramids; at which it is supposed a considerable number of Israelites were engaged in labor. Lower down the Nile, to the north, lies the land of Goshen. The lines drawn from these extremes to Birket-el-Hadj, show the courses of the Israelites to the place of rendezvous, in order to join the main caravan. From Birket-el-Hadj, or Succoth, to Etham the caravan takes the usual route for the wilderness of Zin; but, being past Etham, it is ordered to turn towards Bani-sphon, where being encamped, the army of Pharaoh is supposed to come in sight; and here the Israelites are evidently enclosed, and unable to move to right or left, either forward or backward. The gulf, it must be remarked, extended much further north than is denoted by the shaded lines, and was wider toward the eastern shore; so that we may conceive of the Israelites as crossing at least double the space marked by being shaded; but, as geometrical precision is not our object, an extension of the shaded lines in the map would have answered no good purpose. The direction of the wind, with its fitness to divide the gulf, is apparent.—The following extracts are translated from Niebuhr: (p. 333, &c. French ed.)

"To go from Cairo to Suez requires thirty hours and three quarters, and from the Nile requires one hour more. The great caravan, which goes yearly from Cairo to Mecca, assembles some days before it sets off, at four leagues from Cairo, on the way to Suez, near Birket-el-Hadj, a small lake, which receives the water of the Nile. A great caravan, which is in haste, may go from Birket-el-Hadj to Suez in three days: we took 26 hours 40 minutes, not reckoning the hours of rest. Every where on the coast of Arabia, we met with indications that the waters are withdrawn; for instance, Masa, which all the ancient authors mention as a port of Arabia, is now at many leagues distance from the sea; near Loheia, and Djidna we see great hills filled with the same kind of shells, and corals, as are now found living in the sea: near Suez are petrifications of all these things. I saw, at three quarters of a league west of the city, a heap of shells, with living inhabitants, upon a rock covered only at high water, and shells of the same kind, uninhabited, upon another rock of the shore, which was too high for the tide now to cover it. Some thousand years ago, therefore, this Arabian gulf was much larger and extended much further north, especially that arm of it near Suez, for the shore of this extremity of the gulf to very low. The breadth of the arm of the sea, at Suez, is about 3500 feet [in its present state]. Though it would much shorten the distance of their way, no caravan now crosses this arm, nor could the Israelites have crossed it without a miracle. The attempt must have been much more difficult to the Israelites, some thousand years ago, the gulf being then probably larger, deeper, and longer toward the north. At the lowest time of the tide, I crossed when returning from mount Sinai, that arm of the sea, over to Kolsoum, upon my camel; and the Arabs who accompanied me, were only up to their thighs in water. I did not find in this sea, south of Suez, any bank or isthmus [ reef ] under water: from Suez to Girondel, we sounded, and had at first four fathoms and a half; in the middle of the gulf, at three leagues from Suez, we had four fathom; and about Girondel, near the shore, we had ten fathom. The banks of the Red sea are pure sand, from Suez to Girondel; but lower to the south, I saw banks of coral. Now, had the Israelites crossed the sea upon such banks, they would have been greatly incommoded by them; because they were very cutting, especially to the bare feet, or to feet but slightly defended."—What, then, must such rough banks have been to the women, the children, and the cattle?

It should be remembered, also, that the country further to the south (where some have supposed the Israelites passed) is so very rocky, that if the Israelites, marching on foot, with their cattle, women and children, could have journeyed by that road, Pharaoh's chariots could not have so journeyed, but would have had few wheels, if any, left on them, by the time they had reached the banks of the sea; not to insist on the difference between crossing a smaller portion of the bed of the gulf, and walking in the sand, and nearly level, with the water only 10 or 12 feet deep, and crossing a much longer distance, over a bottom of coral rock, and the water fifty feet deep at least. Those who say the magnitude of a miracle is no object to Almighty Power, may be asked, Which of the ways of Divine Wisdom, of which we have any knowledge, appears to justify the supposition of any superabundance of power exerted, in the production of any effect, beyond what is necessary to produce that effect? In what instance has such waste of power been detected? It is honorable to the Divinity, to believe that Divine Wisdom so proportioned the necessary power, that it shall be amply competent to the duty charged on it, but without an overplus, whose infructuous reserve, being unemployed, is mere idleness. But to return to our traveller—"Eusebius relates, after ancient traditions, that the Israelites passed at Clyma. The Clyma of the Greeks was apparently the Koloum of the Arabs, as Rochart proves, in his Pliniae (lib. ii. cap. 18, p. 107, 108.) Maciri, Abulidea, and the present inhabitants of Suez, assure us that Koloum was near Suez. The tide falls here three feet, or three feet and a half, which, considering the shallowness of this water, is a great proportion. Perhaps a thick fog hastened the destruction of the Egyptians: I cannot decide on what was the pillar of cloud of Moses."

Such are the notices of Niebuhr; to which may be added, that the Greek name Clystis signifies destruction; and Kolossos is of similar import in Arabic. A very strong and apt expression, surely, for commemorative of this destruction of the ancient Egyptian army.

A further confirmation of the supposition, that here the Israelites passed, may be drawn from the names of the adjacencies mentioned in the history, as Baal-zephon, i.e. on the northern extremity of the Red sea itself, or on the northern extremity of the gulf; either of which situations assures the part represented in the map.

We may now accompany the Israelites on their journey, by presuming, that so many of them as were employed on the pyramids quitted Memphis, to rendezvous at the Pilgrim's lake, where the caravan for Mecca now assembles, a few miles east from Cairo. Being joined by their kinsmen from the Delta, the whole body moved easterly towards the wilderness. [Professor Stuart supposes a general rendezvous to have been at Rameses, half way between the Nile and Suez. R.] We have already observed, that the northern extremity of the Red sea advanced much farther inland, anciently, than it does at present; indeed, the gulf of Aqaba nearly touches the land before long, will be dry land. This is owing to the sands driven by the easterly winds, from the continent of Arabia, which have also, according to the best evidence we can obtain, shifted the sands in so long a course of ages, from their ancient stations, very much westward. This circumstance will be found to have considerable influence on the character of the wilderness into which the Israelites entered; and not less on its extent. In all probability, in the days of Moses, it did not begin so near to Egypt as it does now; nor was it of that entirely sandy appearance, or of that absolute barrenness, which it now is. Indeed Egypt itself was anciently well covered with tall and noble trees on its eastern side; which usually marks a powerful vegetation. It will follow, also, that a district, affording food for a flock, as Moses conducted his flock on mount Sinai, and the numerous herds and flocks of the Israelites, (acustomed, it must be recollected, to the fertile pasture of the Delta) could easily feed themselves during this time lying between Egypt and mount Sinai. The same causes which have diminished the depth of water at Suez, and daily operate to that effect, have also contributed to overspread the adjacent country with a new and permanent vegetation: it is certainly vastly retiring southward. Kolossos, which was a part in the time of the caliphs, is now three quarters of a mile inland. It is probable, therefore, that Baal-zephon, though now represented as a town, by Suez, was nevertheless some miles further north. How far Baal-zephon was the same town in which afterwards was called Scarpus, we know not; but the probability is, that Baal and Scarpus were the same deity, so that the two names may refer to the same temple, under different appellations in different ages.

Having already accompanied the Israelites in their journey from Egypt to the Red sea, we shall here only observe, that most probably the resting places which had obtained names anciently are still used as resting places, though under other names; and as only Succoth, Edham, Pihahiroth, Migdol, and Baal-zephon occur in this passage, there needs no great skill to determine them. Succoth may be placed at Birzit el Hadji, or Pilgrim's pool, a few miles east of Cairo. Edham was probably north of the present Adjerouz; perhaps near the Birzit lake; although some, we believe, suppose Edham to be Adjerouz itself. D'Anville marks this "Calais Adjerouz," Sand-pit castle. Might this castle be the Migdol or "tower" of the Hebrew historian? Pharaoh was the opening of the present gulf of Suez; but probably further north. Baal-zephon might be a town at the point of a gulf in the Red sea; analogous to Suez at present. As to Migdol, Dr. Wells seems to have altogether mistaken its situation. The Antonine Itinerary places Magdolo, whose name coincides completely with the sacred books, nearly half way between Sitel and Pelusium, about twelve miles from each: it was therefore rather in the north of the islamum of Suez than in the south where the doctor places it. This is also confirmed by the order in which Jeremiah ranges the towns inhabited by the Jews, advancing from north to south: Migdol, Tapanhes, (Daphne, near Pelusium,) Noph, or Menouf, that is, Memphis, Pathros; and this order, equally with the distance from Pelusium, proves, that the Migdol near Baal-zephon could not be Magdolo. As the Hebrew Migdol signifies a "tower," we have thought it might be a Calais, or an erection at a wall, surrounded by walls; which suit no less the circumstances of the history, than a city of this name would do.

The road taken by the Israelites was a regular and customary track: during the first half of it, it was a direct road to Canaan; and it effectually concealed from Pharaoh what Moses ultimately intended, till after he had branched off from this road into that which led to mount Sinai. He appears to have halted at Edham, "in the edge of the wilderness;" and after his quitting this station, Pharaoh is informed that "the people fled," and immediately prepared to pursue and recover the fugitives.

[It has already been stated above, that a different view respecting the rendezvous of the Israelites is taken by professor Stuart; while in respect to the passage of the Red sea he coincides with the view here expressed. See a full discussion in his Course of Hebrew Study, vol. ii. Excursus iv. R.]

No part of the history of the Israelites is more perplexing and obscure, in its geography, than the circumstances of this passage out of the desert, and their progress toward Canaan. Geographers have, indeed, given us what they call "Maps of the Travels of the Children of Israel," but these have usually been constructed with so little resemblance to the actual real features of the country, to the necessities of a multitude, or to probability, that they have more perplexed the inquirer than if it had been left entirely unattempted. The following sketch of their route is given by Mr. Taylor, as the result of a very laborious investigation: it differs materially from that assumed by many respectable writers, especially as to the return, by the way of the Mediterranean sea. The reader will judge of the proofs by which it is supported. (The hypothesis alluded to cannot well be supported; see the additions at the end of this article. R.)

It is necessary, in the first place, to fix a few principal stations mentioned in the history, as points, if not absolutely yet comparatively certain; or at least of sufficient probability to be considered as settled: such as Baal-zephon or Suez; Elim; mount Sinai; Ethol or Ezion Gaber. These places being admitted, we may safely infer the station mentioned im mediately before, and that immediately after, each of these. This will contribute greatly to ascertain the general track, and will much reduce the number of stations which want of information obliges us to leave uncertain.

In Numb. xxxiii. we have a register of the stations where the people encamped for any considerable time: we identify those which, in the following list, are marked with small capitals. Those marked in italics, we cannot determine. Perhaps, the variations among the names which appear on comparison might be accounted for, by supposing the camp extended to places which had different names, and that the station was sometimes referred to one place, sometimes to the other.

To obtain a more easy conception of their respective situations and characters, we may divide these stations into four parts. (I.) The journey from Egypt to Sinai. (II.) Advance from Sinai to Kadesh Barne, in Palestine. (III.) Retreat to Ezion Gaber, near Sin. (IV.) From Ezion Gaber, eastward, to the passage of the river Jordan. From Egypt to Sinai we are certain that Moses followed the customary road still taken by caravans of pilgrims as far as Suez or Baal-zephon; that, from Sinai to Kadesh Barne, he did not forsake the regular track; that, in retreating from Kadesh Barne, westward, he also took much the same course as is now taken by assemblages of people; and, lastly, that the passage from Ezion Gaber to the east of Jordan is at this time in use. The roads thus fixed enable us to determine some of the places mentioned in them; and these will mutually confirm each other.

1. From Egypt to Sinai.— Succoth, we have already considered, as being fixed at Birket el Hadji, the usual place of the pilgrims' assembly; a small distance from Cairo.

The true situation of Baal-zephon was perhaps some miles more northerly than its present representative, Suez, as unquestionably this country has undergone considerable changes in the lapse of ages, and the sea is daily diminishing about it.

Marah is with great probability placed in the valley of Girondel, of which Dr. Shaw says: "Corondel, I presume, made the southern portion of the desert of Marah; from whence to the port of Tor, the shore, which hitherto was low and sandy, begins now to be rocky and mountaneous, while that of Egypt is still more impracticable; and neither of them affords any convenient place, either for the departure or the landing of a multitude. Moreover, from Corondel to Tor, the channel is ten or twelve leagues broad; too great a space, certainly, for the Israelites, in the manner at least they were encumbered, to traverse in one night. And at Tor, the Arabian shore begins to wind itself (round what we may suppose to be Ptel-emy's promontory of Paran) towards the gulf of Eloth; at the same time the Egyptian shore retires so far to the south-west, that it can scarcely be perceived. The Israelites, therefore, could neither have landed at Corondel nor at Tor, according to the conjectures of several authors. Over against Jibbel Attaakah, at ten miles' distance, is the desert, as it is called, of Sdur, the same with Shur, (Exod. xv. 22.) where the Israelites landed, after they had passed through an interval of interjacent gulf, travelling from Sdur towards mount Sinai, we come into the desert, as it is still called, of Marah, where the Israelites met with those bitter waters, or waters of Marah, Exod. xv. 23. And as these circumstances did not they had wandered till after they had wandered many days in the wilderness, we may probably fix it at Corondel, where there is a small rill of water, which, unless it be diluted by the dews and rains, still continues to be brackish. Near this place the sea forms itself into a large bay, called Berk el Corondel, which is remarkable for a strong current, that sets into it, from the northward. The Arabs preserve a tradition, that a numerous host was formerly drowned at this place; occasioned, no doubt, by what we are informed of in Exod. xiv. 30, that 'the Israelites saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea-shore.' There is nothing further remarkable, till we see the Israelites encamped at Elim, (Exod. xv. 27 ; Numb. xxxiii. 9.) upon the northern skirts of the desert of Sin, two leagues from Tor, and near thirty from Corondel. I saw no more than nine of the two wells that are mentioned by Moses; the other three being filled up by those drifts of sand, which are common in Arabia.
Yet this loss is amply made up by the great increase of the palm-trees, the 'seventy' having propagated themselves into more than two thousand. Under the shade of these trees is (Hamneas Mouse) the Bath of Moses, which the inhabitants of Tor have in extraordinary esteem and veneratio; acquainting us, that it was here that Moses himself and his particular household were encamped. We have a distinct view of mount Sinai from Elin; the Wilderness, as it is still called, of Sin, lying betwixt us.

These extracts determine the places not only of Marath, but of the Desert of Sin; the Desert of Marah; the promontory of Parah; the Wilderness of Sin; and of Elin. These, therefore, will not detain us.

Mount Sinai is thus described by the doctor: 'The summit of mount Sinai is somewhat conical, and not very spacious, where the Mahometans, as well as Christians, have a small chapel for public worship. Here, we were shown the place where Moses fasted forty days, (Exod. xxiv. 18; xxxiv. 28) where he recited the law, (Exod. xxx. 18,) where he hid himself from the face of God, (Exod. xxxii. 26) where his hand was supported by Aaron and Hur, at the battle with Amalek, (Exod. xvii. 8, 12) besides many other stations and places, are taken notice of in the Scriptures.' See Sinai.

Rephidim is by universal consent placed south-west of Sinai. Dr. Shaw gives the following information respecting it: 'After we had descended, with no small difficulty, down the western side of this mountain, we came into the other plain that is formed by it, which is Rephidim, Exod. xvii. 1. Here we still see that extraordinary antiquity, the rock of Meribah, (Exod. xvii. 6) which hath continued down to this day, without the least injury from time or accidents. It is a block of granite marble, about six yards square, lying tottering, as it were, and loose in the middle of the valley; and seems to have formerly belonged to mount Sinai, which hangs, in a variety of precipices, all over this plain. The monks show us several other remarkable places round about this mountain; as where Aaron's calf was molten, Exod. xxxii. 4, (but the head only is represented, and that very rudely,) where the Israelites danced at the consecration of it, (Exod. xxiv) where the history of the great trees which produced honey so copiously were swallowed up, (Numb. xvi. 32) and where Elias hid himself when he fled from Jezebel, 2 Kings viii. 9. But the history of these and other places is attended with so many monkish tales, that it would be too tiresome to relate.'

2. From Sinai to Kadesh Barnea.—The desert of Paran is thus described by Dr. Shaw: 'From mount Sinai, the Israelites directed their marches northward, towards the land of Canaan. The next remarkable stations, therefore, were in the desert of Paran, which seems not to have commenced, till after they departed from Hazeroth, three stations from Sinai, Numb. xii. 16. Now as tradition hath preserved to us the names of Shur, Marah, and Sin, so we have also that of Paran, which we enter at about half way betwixt Sinai and Corodell, in travelling through the midland road, along the defiles of what were probably the 'Black mountains' of Pulemy. In one part of it, ten leagues to the northward of Tor, there are several ruins, particularly of a Greek convent (called the convent of Paran) which was not long ago abandoned, by reason of the continual insults they suffered from the Arabs. Here likewise we should look for the city of that name, though, according to the circumstances of its situation, as they are laid down by Pulemy, Tor, a small maritime village, with a castle hard by it, should rather be the place. From the wilderness of Paran, Moses sent a man out of every tribe, to spy out the land of Canaan, (Numb. xiii. 8,) who returned to him, after forty days, unto the same wilderness, to Kadesh Barnea, Numb. xiii. 26; Deut. i. 19; ix. 23; Josh. xiv. 7. This place, which in Numb. xiii. 3, 36; and xxx. 36, is called Tzin Kadesh, or simply Kadesh, was eleven days' journey from mount Horeb, (Deut. i. 3) and, being ascribed both to the desert of Tzin and Paran, we may presume that it lay near upon the confines of them both.'

To this we add the testimony of Niebuhr: 'The Arabs call plains, which lie somewhat low, Wadi, or valleys, because water remains stagnant in them after heavy rains. We rested under a palm-tree, in a place called Ajoun Mous, Moses's Fountains. These pretended fountains, are five holes in the sand, in a well of very indifferent water, that becomes turbid whenever any of it is drawn. As the holes bear the name of Moses, the Arabs ascribe them to the Jewish lawgiver. The Arabs set up our tents near a tree, in the valley of Paran, and left us to amuse ourselves there in the best manner we could, while they went to see their friends in gardens of date-trees, scattered over the valley. We were at no great distance from our schiech's camp, which consisted of nine or ten tents. We were informed that the ruins of an ancient city were to be seen in the neighborhood. But, when the Arabs found us curiously to visit them, they left us, and would give us no further account of it. The famous valley of Paran, in which we now were, has retained its name unchanged since the days of Moses, being still called Wadi Paran, the valley of Paran. Its length is equal to a journey of a day and a half, extending from the foot of mount Sinai to the Arabic gulf. In the rainy season it is filled with water; and the inhabitants are then obliged to retire up the hills; it was dry, however, when we passed through it. That part of it which we saw was far from being fertile; but served as a pasture to goats, camels, and asses. The other part is said to be very fertile; and the Arabs told us, that, in the districts to which our Ghaisars had gone, were many orchards of date-trees, which produced dates enough to sustain thousands of people. Fruit must, indeed, be very plentiful there; for the Arabs of the valley bring every year to Cairo an astonishing quantity of dates, raisins, pears, apples, and other fruits, all of excellent quality. Some of these, who are very poor, sell us fresh dates, which were yellow, but scarcely ripe. The chief of our schiech's wives (for he had two) came likewise to see us, and presented us with some eggs and a chicken. One was placed at some distance from where our tents happened to be pitched, in order to manage a garden of date-trees. The other was our neighbor, and superintended the tattle and servants.'

These remarks were made in going to mount Sinai: the following were made on his return: 'In the afternoon of the 16th of September, we descended Jibbel Mous, and passed the night at the bottom of that cliffy mountain, at the opening into the valley of Paran. Next day, after advancing three miles through the vale, we halted near the dwelling of our schiech of the tribe of Said. Our Ghaisars left us again, and went to see their friends in the gardens of date-trees. Our Ghaisars returned, and we continued our journey on the 20th of the month. On the day following we had an opportunity of seeing a part of the road which we had passed by night when travelling to Jibbel Mura. In this place, near a defile, named Omzer-ridg-lein, I found some inscriptions in unknown characters, which had been mentioned to me at Cairo. They are coarsely engraved, apparently with some pointed instrument of iron, in the rock, without order or regularity.

The reader will observe, (1.) the ruins of an ancient city. (2.) Ancient inscriptions, roughly cut. As the sacred history marks the scenes of Kilroth Hatasaavah, the "graves of last," in the wilderness of Paran, there is a possibility that here or hereabouts, was the place of those events which gave that name to this station. At any rate, this station could not be far from the sea, as the quails are said to come flying from the sea to it; and this finds it in such a latitude as is parallel to some part of the sea, if such be a correct view of the passage. But if, on the contrary, the quails were flying to the sea, still this could not be far off; as is implied in such a reference.

At Mount Sinai, when intending to reach Canaan, the sacred legislator had the choice of three ways. The shortest and most direct, though treading a little to the east, may be called for distinction sake the northern. This, says Deur. 1: 2, was eleven days' journey that is, from Horeb to Kadesh Barnea, by Mount Seir, direct. This was occupied by enemies to Israel. The second road was the western; the same as they had taken from Egypt; and this they followed till they reached the confines of their expected country. But here they were repulsed by the faint-hearted reports of their spies, and by their own folly and discontent. The third road from Mount Sinai was the eastern, this they took at last; and by this they penetrated into Canaan, in a direction different from that before attempted, but which probably Moses had in view when he asked leave of Edom to pass through his territories. It appears from this that Moses judged rightly of his people at first, that war would have terrified them; and that even after they had been some time under regulation, their courage was very moderate, and their habits of submission very weak; as in the first instance, they would not fight, in the second they would not obey. But after this capricious generation was extinct, better success was produced better. And this irritable spirit no longer prevailing, Joshua, the successor of Moses, effected his purpose on the coast of Canaan.

It will be observed, that this change of the point of attack changed also the enemy which was to oppose them. The probability is, that the inhospitable east of Jordan became an easy prey in this instance, as the descendants of these very Israelites were in after-ages. This easiness of subjection seems to have been one character of this country.

We have no traces by name of any other station of the Israelites till we come to Libalath, and this we presume to be the same which Joshua smote, (Josh. x. 29, 30.) which he gave to the priests (xxii. 13.) which revolted, (2 Kings vili. 22.) and against which the king of Assyria fought; (xix. 8.) from all which texts it appears to be extremely south in the territories of Judah; or extremely north in those of Edom. It was probably west of Mount Hor; and after the repulse of Israel by the Canaanites, that Moses directed the permission of Edom to pass through his territories, in order to attack Canaan on the east. This Edom refused; and Israel was in no condition to enforce the request, but was obliged to return by the way of the Red sea, on the west; and to travel round the whole country of Edom by the south, in order to get to the eastward of the river Jordan.

3. Retreat from Libalath to Eilath Gades.—In opposition to other writers, Mr. Taylor considers the present El-Arish as Elamoth, the name of a lake, because it is at no great distance west from Libalath, and because it yields that necessary article water. It is on the road from Syria to Egypt, and is probably the last station in Syria. It agrees perfectly with the direction: (Numb. xix. 26.) 'Get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea.' Sozomenus says, 'Arisa is a small castle, environed with a few houses; the garrison consisting of 100 soldiers. This place is something better than desert, and blessed with good water.'—The territory of Canaanites at Arisa. The evangelist says, 'Riche (or Riche) is a village not far distant from the sea; it hath a castle well built of little rock stones, as all the houses are. They have so many lovely ancient marble pillars at Riche, that their coffee-houses and wells are made of them, and so are their burying-places full.' He had a stock of rain here, which lasted thirty hours. Velasquez, quitting Syria, 'El-Arish is the last place where water which can be drunk is found.'—It is three quarters of a league from the sea, in a sandy country, as is all that coast. As these travellers entered Egypt from Syria, their testimony is less appropriate than that of Mr. Morier, who entered Egypt from Syria, and who accompanied the Turkish army. He thus describes this station in his Journal of the March of the Turkish Army through the Desert between Syria and Egypt. 'Feb. 5. The army began its march towards Catath in the afternoon, and encamped at three hours' distance from El-Arish. An hour's march is calculated at two miles and a half, which is about the rate that a camel travels at. Feb. 6. A march of six hours: halted in the afternoon. Feb. 7. A march of nine hours. Feb. 8. Encamped at Catath: the French evacuated this place yesterday. The road from El-Arish to Catath lies through the most inhospitable part of the desert which separates Syria from Egypt. The sand that covers it is fine, and so white that the eyes suffer much from the strong glare produced by the reverberation of the sunbeams; and I should be inclined to attribute the sickness and disorders of these mountainous and combined with the irritation occasioned by the nitrous particles contained in the sand, of which clouds are constantly blown about by the least wind. But that is not the only suffering which the traveller is exposed to on those mountain slopes, for there, motion is disturbed by the excessive heat, increases by the altitude but false hope of soon quenching it; for the flat surface of the desert gives to the horizon a appearance which the stranger mistakes for water; and, while he is all anxious to arrive at it, it recedes as a new horizon discovers itself. The optical deception is so strong, that the shadow of any object on the horizon is apparently reflected as in water. [Compare Job vi. 19, 20; Isaiah xxxvi. 7.] At the first halt after leaving El-Arish, the water was palatable; after that, it can only be so to those who experience all the torments of thirst; and it is dangerous to drink much of it, as it occasions dysenteries. It is observed, that wherever date-trees grow, there the water is sweeter, and it is invariably found by digging to the depth of five or six feet in the sand. A party was generally sent before the army, to dig wells where it was to encamp. The impatience of the troops to satisfy their thirst was often productive of very serious quarrels. The native Arabs that cross this desert is all directions, carry their water with them in skins; but that resource would be attended with too many difficulties for the supply of a large army: a great number of camels would be necessary to carry water only for a day’s consumption.”

The reader may observe that at about seven miles distant from El-Arish, the Turkish army encamped; and that here only the water is palatable. The Hebrew word Keihalathah signifies “the place of assembling” now El-Arish itself is at present actually the place of assembling, for a numerous body of people which intends going into Egypt: as it was of the Turkish army which Mr. Morier accompanied. Nevertheless, it may be supposed that in ancient time the wells at one stage nearer to Egypt were the station for that purpose; as there evidently is a distinction between Rimeh and Keihalathah, though we cannot ascertain the distance between them. It is, however, clear, that where the Turkish army encamped, the Israelites might encamp; and it is indifferent whether this station were a few miles more or less in advance, as the course of the journey lies the same way.

If we follow this track, the next station of the Israelites is mount Shapher, or Sephir, another pronunciation of Sepher. Sepher appears to have been the ancient name of this mount, which is almost surrounded by the sea; and on which was afterwards built a temple dedicated to Jupiter Cassius of the Greeks, the ruling deity of the illustrious mountain, which is the same deity as was worshipped by the inhabitants of the Sephera, or Sepharvain; (2 Kings xvii. 31)—Adammelech, “the king of splendour,” or “the illustrious king.” “Catieh,” says Thevenot, “is a village where there is a well of water, unpleasant well, two miles off; but a well whose water is good after it hath stood a little: at Catieh we ate fresh fish half as long as one’s arm, as broad and thick as carp, and of as good a relish; they did not cost us five farthings apiece.” “Mount Cassius, or Catieh, is a huge mole of sand, famous for the temple of Jupiter and the sepulchre of Pompey,” says Sandys. It is probably alluded to under the name of Catieh, in Cant. iv. 2, so that, if this conjecture be just, its name had been changed during the intercourse with the Egyptians.

In further pursuing this route, the next station is Haradah, to which no resemblance is found among the names marked in the maps, except Haras, which is the next village to Catieh; but this is too slight a circumstance to determine our judgment.

There is, however, a possibility that the present “fountains of Mouse,” not far from the head of the Red sea, eastward, are the Mosera, or Moseroth, of Holy Writ: for, that they derived their name from having been used by Moses, immediately after the passage of the Red sea, is improbable, to say the least; as the sacred text assures us, the people “journeyed three days into the wilderness, and found no water, till they came to Marah;” Exod. xv. 22. Now, this was not the fact, if at that time Moses used the wells of Mouse; as these are but a few hours from the place of his passage. But if they were the Moseroth of this place, then, as they were used by Moses on this occasion, by a very easy corruption they are now called Ain el Mouse, instead of Ain el Mosera. This Mosera, if we take it either as the well Nahal, or Ain el Mouse, is about seven or eight miles from Suez. Niebuhr says of Suez, “The inhabitants of this town draw their principal commodities from Egypt, at the distance of three days’ journey; or from mount Sinai, distant five or six days’ journey; or from Gaza, distant seven or eight days’ journey.”—This implies that there is a direct road to Gaza; and if we reckon the stations from El-Arish, that is, Rimeh, to Mosera, we find them to be eight or nine, which agrees with the distance to Gaza well enough. Or, if we reckon forward, we find four or five stations, which also agrees with the distance given by Niebuhr; so that hereabouts we may probably place Moseroth (in the plural) without much risk of error. This, however, depends on the supposed difference of the face of the country between its ancient and its modern state.

We are now in the regular track of the caravans to Mecca, and may presume to determine the ancient stations by those in present use. The wells of the children of Jaakan, however, we cannot determine, as no wells are marked, in this course, after the well Nabi, till we come to Calant el Nahal, “the castle at the river,” which appears to stand on a stream, marked by D’Anville “torrent that has water,” in which it agrees with the description of Jobehahah, as a “land of rivers or streams.”

As the phrase Beni Jaakan is precisely according to the present phrasingology of the Arabs, it must not be passed in silence. The Arabs are all of some tribe; and this they express by saying they are “sons—beni—of such an one;” and the Beeroth Beni Jaakan, ought therefore most certainly to have been rendered “the wells of Beni Jaakan,” meaning, the wells belonging to the tribe so called. There can be no doubt that the Israelites paid for the use of these wells, as the Mecca caravan now does.

The stages adopted by the Mecca pilgrims are thus marked in Dr. Shaw’s list:

There is no doubt that the Elath of Scripture is that Elath which gave, and still gives, name to a gulf, the Red sea; for that Ezion Gabor, which is always mentioned with Elath, was nearly, or altogether, adjacent to it. It is probable, indeed, that Ezion Gabor is the port intended by Dr. Shaw under the name of Meeneah el Daseha, “the port of gold,” derived from the gold imported there by Solomon; but the doctor’s account of its situation is extremely imperfect, and his position for it seems rather to be assumed by conjecture, than determined from valid information. Mr. Taylor, therefore, places it near to Eloth; presuming, that neither of them stood precisely at the head of the gulf, that being of course too shoal and sandy for the building and fitting of large and stout ships; but rather at some small distance from it; one on one side of the gulf, the other on the other side, perhaps; or, both might be on the same side, though not close together. Having thus fixed Ezion Gabor, we must seek Ebron back, at the distance of one station from it, that is, towards Catieh; it must therefore either lie at Sat el Acaba, where is good water; or at Abier Alain; but the former of these seems to be the best situated for the station of a numerous caravan.

Jobehahah is described as “a land of brooks of water;” with this description there is only one place, at the distance of two stations from Elath, which can possibly agree. There is marked "a torrent of water," and here is marked good seer, on the authority of Dr. Shaw. It will be observed that Joshahah, Ezura, and Ezloth, are precisely in the road now traversed by the caravans of Idumea, and are stations of those caravans in their journey. This shows clearly that the same considerations influenced the Hebrew conductor formerly, as influence the caravan bashaws of the present day. It leads us also to unite the line of march from Caiaph, and to seek the intervening stations in various parts of that line, though we cannot identify the places.

4. From Ezion Gebier, eastward, to the Jordan.—In advancing from the station of Ezion Gebier, the next place named is the Wilderness of Zin. We cannot suppose, the progress of the Israelites having lately been wholly easternly, that they are now directed to retrace their steps, and to take a westerly course for Canaan; they must therefore take a north-easterly course, till they arrive at the eastern side of the Dead sea, and enter the country of Moab. That this very path, or one not far distant from it, is now followed by the pilgrims from Damascus to Mecca, is certain; but, as it is the most difficult to arrange, or describe. Every European traveller, Mr. Taylor endeavors to compensate this deficiency by other testimony.

Ishmael Alufiada, sultan of Hamah, describing the peninsula of Arabia, quotes Ibn Haukal, who says, "From Allah (Ezoth) to Harrah are twenty stations (of the caravan) from Harrah to Balaka (Balca) three stations; from Balaka to Masharik Hourvan, six stations; from Masharik Hourvan to Masharik Goutah, where the gardens of Damascus are, three stations." This agrees with the Moslem history, which says, from near Ezion Gebier to Kadesh in the Wilderness of Zin, one station; from Kadesh to mount Hor, marked by the Harrah of Ibn Haukal, (possibly a residence of some kind on the northern face of the mountain,) a second station. The third is Zalmonah; then Punon, Oboth, and Ile Abariim, near Moab; which answer to the three stations from Harrah to Balaka, of the Arab writer. That this is the track of the caravan, appears also from Volney, who says, "Damascus is the rendezvous for all pilgrims from the north of Asia. Their numbers every year amounts to from 30,000 to 50,000—this vast multitude set out confusedly on their march, and travelling by the confines of the desert, arrive in forty days at Mecca. As they travel through the country of several independent Arab tribes, it is necessary to make treaties with them. In general, the preference is given to the tribe of Sardia, which encamps to the south of Damascus, along the Hauran. South of Damascus are the immense plains of the Hauran. The pilgrims of Mecca, who traverse them for five or six days' journey, assure us they find at every step the vestiges of ancient habitations. The soil is a fine mould without stones, and almost without even the smallest pebble. What is said of its actual fertility, perfectly corresponds with the idea given of it in the Hebrew writings. Wherever wheat is sown, if the rains do not fail, it repays the cultivator with profusion, and grows to the height of a man. The pilgrims assert also, that the inhabitants are stronger and taller than the rest of the Syrians." This is further proved from an extract inserted farther on; and leaves no doubt but the present track of the caravan is east of the Jordan; the same as Moses took in former ages. Compare p. 415 below.

The general result of what has been said is, First, That Moses led his people to mount Sinai, for the purpose of solemnly engaging the congregation to the Deity who there (Exod. chap. iii.) and in so doing, may have made it seem that the whole of the land promised to the patriarchs was northwards, until they came within a moderate distance of the camp of Israel. The fugitives accordingly fly toward the grand encampment of that nation to which they were attached. It is clear, too, that this battle was not out of the districts of the Amalekites, since these were engaged in it; nor so far from Canaan, but that a detachment of Canaanites sent to watch the motions of Israel, contributed to the victory.

After the events at Kadesh, the people are ordered to turn and get them (again) by the way (the common road) of the wilderness by the Red sea—that is, into the districts they had formerly quitted; as appears by their passing mount Sinai, in their route to Ezion Gebier.

By invading Canaan on the east, after many years, and crossing Jordan for that purpose, not only an entirely different people was attacked now, from what had been attempted formerly, but (1.) The inhabitants east of Jordan not being quitted by the Jewish forces, that had passed over the west, their subjection was inevitable. (2.) The passage of the Jordan cut off the southern part of Canaan from the northern part; and being thus divided, each division opposed less resistance, as they could not act in concert; and they were attacked and employed against each, under their entire uncertainty of what district would be next invaded.

The general character of the desert, the edge of which was journeyed round, is thus described by Volney. The road in which the people of Gaza meet the caravans of Damascus, is the same, no doubt, as that which Israel took from Akaba, or Ezion Gebier, to the country of Moab. He says, "A branch of commerce advantageous to the people of Gaza, is furnished by the caravans which pass between Egypt and Syria. The provisions they are obliged to take for their four days' journey in the desert produce a considerable demand for their flour, oils, dates, and other necessaries. Sometimes they correspond with Suez, on the arrival or departure of the Djedda fleet, as they are able to reach that place in ten long days' journey. They fit out, likewise, every year, a great caravan, which goes to meet the pilgrims at Mecca, and conveys to them the convoy, or Djedda, of Palestine, and supplies of various kinds, with different refreshments. They meet them at Maon, four days' journey to the south-east of Gaza, and one day's journey to the north of Akaba, on the road to Damascus. They also purchase the plunder of the Bedouins; an article which would be a Peru to them, were these accidents more frequent. In the desert by the east, we meet with strips of arable land, as far as the road to Mecca. These are little valleys, where a few peasants have been tempted to settle, by the water courses which collect at the time of the winter rains, and by some wells.

Red sea near Suez, as we suppose. Indeed, this point would seem now to be very clearly established, after the researches of Niebuhr, with whose opinion Burckhardt coincides, and the discussion of the topic by Prof. Stuart in his Course of Hebrew Study, above referred to.

From the passage of the Red sea to mount Sinai, the stations of the Israelites mentioned between the passage of the Red sea and Sinai, are, (1.) Marah, after a march of three days through the wilderness of Shur. Here the water was bitter, and the Lord showed Moses a tree, which when he had cast into the waters, they were made sweet, Ex. xv. 22, seq. (2.) Elim, with twelve wells of water, and seventy palm trees, Ex. xv. 27.—(3.) Encampment by the sea-shore, Num. xxxiii. 16.—(4.) The wilderness of Sin, between Elim and Sinai, where manna was first given, Ex. xv. 1.—(5.) Dophkah.—(6.) Alush.—(7.) Rephidim, called also Massah and Meribah, Ex. xvii. 1—7. —(8.) Sinai. Among these, of Rephidim it can only be said, that it was near Sinai, probably on the west or north-west of that mountain, in which direction the Israelites must have approached Sinai. Dophkah and Alush are not mentioned in Exodus, and nothing more can be known about them. Other stations it will be less difficult to trace. We cannot do better than to take Burckhardt as our guide, who travelled over the same route in the year 1816. As the whole subject is interesting, our extracts will be copious. (See Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, etc. p. 470, seq.)

On the 25th of April, Burckhardt left Suez. "The tide was then at flood, and we were obliged to make the tour of the whole creek north of the town, which at low water can be forded. [Here we suppose the Israelites to have crossed.] In winter time, and immediately after the rainy season, this circuit is rendered still greater, because the low grounds to the northward of the creek are then inundated, and become so swampy, that the camels cannot pass them. We rode one hour and three quarters in a straight line northward, after passing, close by the town, several mounds of rubbish, which afford no object of curiosity except a few large stones, supposed to be the ruins of Ozyma or Asmus. We then turned eastwards, just at the point where the remains of the ancient town are very distinctly visible; two swellings of the ground, of which the eastern is about eight or ten feet high, and the western somewhat less, run in a straight line northwards, parallel with each other, at the distance of about two hundred and thirty feet. Towards a few hundred paces to the north-west of high-water mark, from whence northwards the ground is covered by a saline crust. We turned the point of this inlet, and halted for a short time at the wells of Ayoun Mouse, the 'fountains' of Moses, under the date-trees. We rested [for the night] at two hours and three quarters from the wells, in the plain called El Kordhaya." Mr. Carne remarks, that these fountains are a "few hours" distant from the head of the creek above mentioned; and this accords with Burckhardt's statement; for except the one hour and three quarters in the morning, and two hours and three quarters in the afternoon, the rest of the day was spent in passing between those two pieces. We started then about six miles south of the point opposite Suez. (Reisb. i. p. 225.)

Here, not improbably, the Hebrews rested, after the passage through the sea; when Moses and the people sang their triumphal song. Hence "they went out into the wilderness of Shur, and went three days in the wilderness, and found no water," Ex. xv. 22. With this corresponds the account of Burckhardt. "April 26th. We proceeded over a barren, sandy, and gravelly plain, called El Altha, direction south by east. For about an hour the plain was uneven; we then entered upon a widely extended flat, in which we continued south-south-east. Low mountains, the commencement of the chain of Tuy, run parallel with the road, to the left, about eight miles distant. At the end of four hours and a half, we halted for a few hours in Wady Seder, which takes its name of Wady only from being overflowed with water when the rains are very copious. Its natural formation by no means entitles it to be called a valley, its level being only a few feet lower than that of the desert on both sides. Some thorny trees grow in it, but no herds of cattle pass. From here our way south by east over the plain, which was alternately gravelly, sandy, and stony. At the end of seven hours and a half we reached Wady Wardan, a valley or bed of a torrent, similar in its nature to the former, but broader. Near its extremity, at the sea, it is several miles in breadth. A low chain of sand-hills begins here to the west, near the sea; and the eastern mountains approach the road. At nine hours and a half, south-south-east, the eastern mountains form a recession with the western range. At ten hours we entered a hilly country; at ten hours and three quarters we rested for the night in a barren valley among the hills, called Wady Anara. We met with nobody in this route except a party of Yembo merchants, who had landed at Fos, and were travelling to Cairo."

"April 27th. We travelled over uneven, hilly ground, gravelly and flinty. At one hour and three quarters, we passed the well of Howara, around which a few date-trees grow. Nibasha travelled the same route, but his guides probably did not lead him to this well, which lies among hills about two hundred paces out of the road. The water of the well of Howara is so bitter, that men cannot drink it; and even camels, if not very thirsty, refuse to taste it." This well Burckhardt justly supposes to be the Marsh of the Israelites; and in this opinion Mr. Leake, Gesenius, and Rosenmüller, concur.

From Ayoun Mouse to the well of Howara we had traveled over a sandy and a hilly country, and for a quarrel. Referring to this distance, it appears probable that this is the desert of three days mentioned in the Scriptures to have been crossed by the Israelites immediately after their passage from the Nile, and in which they arrived at Marah. In moving with a whole nation, the march may well be supposed to have occupied three days; and the bitter well at Marah, which was sweetened by Moses, corresponds exactly to that at Howara. This is the usual route to mount Sinai, and was probably, therefore, that which the Israelites took on their escape from Egypt, provided it be admitted that they crossed the sea at Suez, as Niebuhr, with good reason, conjectures. There is no other road of three days' march in the way, from Suez towards Sinai, nor is there any other well absolutely bitter on the whole of this coast. The complaints of the bitterness of the water by the children of Israel, who had been accustomed to the sweet waters of the Nile, and which the weary may daily hear from the Egyptian servants and peasants who travel in Arabia. Accustomed from their youth to the excellent water of the Nile, there is nothing which they so much regret in countries distant from Egypt; nor is there any eastern people who feel so beastly the want of good water, as the present nation of Egypt. With respect to the name employed by Moses to render the waters of the well sweeter, I have frequently inquired among the Bedouins in different parts of Arabia, whether they possessed any means of effecting such a change, by throwing water over it by any other process; but I never could learn that such an art was known. (See MARAH.)

"At the end of three hours we reached Wady Gharendel, which extends to the north-east, and is almost a mile in breadth, and full of trees. The Arabs told me that it may be traced through the whole desert, and that it begins at no great distance from El Aryan, on the Mediterranean; but I had no means of ascertaining the truth of this statement. About half an hour from the place where we halted, in a southern direction, is a copious spring, with a small rivulet, which renders the valley the principal station on this route. The water is disagreeable, and if kept for a night in the water skins, it turns bitter and spoils, as I have myself experienced, having tasted the water three times. If now, we admit Mr. Howara to be the Marah of Exodus, xx. 23, then Wady Gharendel is probably Elaan, with its well and date-trees; an opinion entertained by Niebuhr; who, however, did not see the bitter well of Elaan. The Abir, or spring of twelfth day, which wells at Gharendel must not be considered as evidence against the just-stated conjecture; for Niebuhr says, that his companions obtained water here by digging to a very small depth, and there was great plenty of Berber. In fact, as is usually by digging, in every fertile valley in Arabia, and wells are thus easily formed, which are filled up again by the sands.

"The Wady Gharendel contains date-trees, tamarisks, acacias of different species, and the thorny shrub Ghraksh, the Peganum thymbra of Forskal, which is extremely common in this peninsula, and is also met with in the sands of the Delta on the coast of the Mediterranean. Its small red berry, of the size of a pea of the pomegranate, is very juicy and refreshing, much resembling a ripe gooseberry in taste, but not so sweet. The Arabs are very fond of it. The shrub Ghraksh delights in a sandy soil, and reaches its maturity in the height of summer, when the dried fruit is picked and eaten dry. In fact, it is frequently found by the traveller, at finding so juicy a berry produced in the driest soil and season. Might not the berry of this shrub have been used by Moses to sweeten the waters of Marah? [The Hebrew in Ex. xvi. 12, means, "And the Lord showed him a tree, and he cast into the waters, and they became sweet." The Arabic translates, "and he cast it into the waters," &c.] As this conjecture did not occur to me when I was on the spot, I did not inquire of the Bedouins, whether they ever sweetened the water with the juice of berries, which would probably effect this change in the same manner as the juice of pomegranate grapes expressed into it."

See MARAH.

From Elim the children of Israel "removed and encamped by the Red Sea," Num. xxxiii. 10; and then "came into the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai," Ex. xvi. 1. From Elim, Burchardt says, "We continued in a south-east half east direction, passing over hills; and at the end of four hours from our starting in the morning, we came to an open, though hilly country, still slightly ascending, south-south-east, and then reached, by a similar descent, in five hours and a half, Wady Osseh, crossed by chalk hills. From here we rode over a wide plain south-east by east, and at the end of seven hours and three quarters came to Wady Thale. To our right was a chain of mountains, which extend towards Gharendel. Proceeding from hence south, we turned the point of this mountain, and entered the valley called Wady Tybe, which descends rapidly to the sea. At the end of eight hours and a half, we turned out of Wady Tybe into a branch of it, called Wady Ssebeya, in which we continued east-south-east, and halted for the night, after a day's march of nine hours and a quarter." This Wady Tybe, which "descends rapidly to the sea," the place of encampment by the sea? It would be about eight hours, or twenty-four miles, from Elim, a somewhat long journey for a multitude of this kind; but there does not seem to be a nearer place of encampment "by the sea," inasmuch as a "chain of mountains" runs along the coast to this point.

From this spot Burchardt was still four days in reaching the convent at the foot of Sinai. The way leads through several Wadys or valleys, and the traveller passes from one to another of these valleys, sometimes over elevated plains, and sometimes over mountains of sand. At the end of the first day (April 26th) they were at the foot of a large mountain, composed, to the very top, of moving sands, with a very few rocks appearing above the surface. We reached the summit after a day's march of nine hours and three quarters, and rested upon a high plain, called Ramel el-Moura. On the many tracts, (April 30th) after a steep ascent and descent, which occupied two hours, they continued to "descend into the great valley called Wady el Sheik, one of the principal valleys of the peninsula. It is broad, and has a very slight declivity; it is much frequented by Bedouins for its pasturage. Whenever rain falls in the mountains, a stream of water flows through this wady, and from thence through Wady Feiran into the sea." May we not regard the country between Wady Tybe and this great valley, which the Israelites could hardly have visited, as the desert of Sin? M. Rippey says in general of the route from Wady el Sheik to Suez through the Wady's and desert plains of Ramle, Hemer, Tie, and Gharendel, as being very uninteresting in its sandy and desolate appearance. "In one word," he says, "it is a most frightful desert, almost wholly without vegetation." (p. 363.)

If we regard this, then, as the wilderness of Sin, the stations Dophkah and Alush may be supposed to have been in it, and the Lord showed him a tree, and he cast into the waters, and they became sweet. The latter of these is a continuation of the former, which commences in the vicinity of Sinai, on its north-western side, and is prolonged in a north-western direction to the gulf of Suez. Burchardt fell into it on his return, a little lower down. "I found it here," he says, "of the same noble breadth as it is above, and in many parts it was thickly overgrown with the tamarisk or Tarfa; it is the only valley in the peninsula where this tree grows at present, in any great quantity; though small bushes of it are here and there met with in other parts. It is from the Tarfa that the manna is obtained." p. 599. (See MANNA.) "We descended this valley north-west by west, and at the end of four hours we entered the plantations of Wady Feiran through a wood of tamarisks. This is a continuation of Wady el Sheik, and is considered the finest valley of the whole peninsula. From the upper extremity, an uninterrupted row of gardens and date plantations extends four miles. In almost every garden is a well, by means of which the grounds are irrigated the whole year round." (p. 602.) This is the valley described above (p. 405.), by Niebuhr under the name of Furum, through which the Israelites, doubtless, passed on their way to Sinai after leaving the desert of Sin; but which they probably did not pass through on their way from Sinai to Kadesh, as it would be far out of their direct course. Here they could not want for water; nor did they murmur on this account until they came to Rephidim, which was most probably higher up among the mountains, and near the western base of Sinai itself.

The upper region of Sinai forms an irregular circle of thirty or forty miles in diameter, possessing numerous sources of water, a temperate climate, and a soil capable of supporting animal and vegetable nature. This therefore was the part of the peninsula best adapted to the residence of nearly a year, during which the Israelites were numbered, and received their laws from the Most High. This tract is thus described by Burekhard. 12 The upper nucleus of Sinai, composed almost entirely of granite, forms a rocky wilderness of an irregular circular shape, intersected by many narrow valleys, and from thirty to forty miles in diameter. It contains the highest mountains of the peninsula, whose jagged and pitted peaks, and steep and shattered sides, render it clearly distinguishable from all the rest of the country in view. It is upon this highest region of the peninsula, that the fertile valleys are found, which produce fruit-trees; they are principally to the west and south-west of the convent, at three or four hours' distance. Water, too, is always found in plenty in this district; on which account it is the place of refuge of all the Bedouins, when the low country is parched up. I think it probable, that this upper country or wilderness is, exclusively, the desert of Sinai so often mentioned in the account of the wanderings of the Israelites. 13

In approaching this elevated region from the north-west, Burekhard writes, May 1st, "We now approached the central summits of mount Sinai, which we had had in view for several days. Abrupt cliffs of granite from six to eight hundred feet in height, whose surface is blackened by the sun, surmount the plains leading up to the upper region, to which the name of Sinai is specifically applied. These cliffs enclose the holy mountain on three sides, leaving the east and north-east sides only, towards the gulf of Akaba, more open to the view. At the end of these cliffs there is a vast defile about forty feet in breadth, with perpendicular granite rocks on both sides. The ground is covered with sand and pebbles, brought down by the torrent which rushes from the upper region in the winter time." (Compare also the account of Niebuhr, Deser. of Arabia, p. 401.)

The general approach to Sinai from the same quarter is thus described by Mr. Carne. (Letter i. p. 308.) "A few hours more, and we got sight of the mountains round Sinai. Their appearance was magnificent. When we drew near and emerged out of a deep pass, the scenery was infinitely striking; and on the right extended a vast range of mountains, as far as the eye could reach, from the vicinity of Sinai down to Tor [on the gulf of Suez.] They were perfectly bare, but of grand and singular form. We had hoped to reach the convent by daylight, but the moon had risen some time, when we entered the mouth of a narrow pass, where our conductors advised us to dismount. A gentle yet perpetual ascent led on mile after mile, up this beautiful valley, whose aspect was terrific, yet ever varying. It was not above two hundred yards in width, and the mountains rose to an immense height on each side. The road wound at their feet along the edge of a precipice, and amidst masses of rock that had fallen from above. It was a toilsome path, generally over stones placed like steps, probably by the Arabs; and the moonlight was of little service to us in this deep valley, as it only rested on therowning summits above. Where is mount Sinai? was the inquiry of every one. The Arabs pointed before to Gebel Moussa, the mount of Moses, as it is called; but we could not distinguish it. Again and again, point after point was turned, and we saw but the same stern scenery. But what had the beauty and softness of nature to do here? Mount Sinai required an approach like this, where all seemed to proclaim the land of miracles, and to have been visited by the terrors of the Lord. The scenes, as you gazed around, had an unearthly character, suited to the sound of the fearful trumpet, that was once heard there. We entered at last on the mere open valley, about half a mile wide, and drew near this famous mountain. Sinai is not so lofty as some of the mountains around it; and in its form there is nothing graceful or peculiar, to distinguish it from others. Near midnight we reached the convent." 14

M. Rippel, in travelling from Akaba to the convent, approached Sinai from the north-north-east, through the Wadis Sufan and Salaka. "The nakedness of the landscape is frightfully mournful. In the distance lay before us a lofty chain of mountains; and three summits lift their heads above the whole chain. That in the middle, directly before us, is Gebel Mouss or Sinai; the south-western is St. Catherine, the Horeb of some. We penetrated into this chain from the north; very soon we turned towards the east; all is here of perpendicular and ragged granite formation. After some hours we reached the walls of the convent of St. Catherine, situated in a very narrow valley or chasm of the mountains, which extends from north-west to south-east. One chief object of my visit here was to determine the geographical position of the convent by means of the elevated region around the convent, especially to the south and west, are so lofty and perpendicular, that the moon was visible only for a very short time; and never at the same time with the sun or planets." (p. 367.) 15

"The road down to Gebel Mouss, to Burekhard, "in a valley so narrow, that one part of the building stands on the side of the [south] western mountain, [Gebel Mouss,] while a space of twenty paces only is left between its walls and the eastern mountain. The valley is open to the north, from whence approaches the road from Cairo; to the south, close beyond the convent, it is shut up by a third mountain, less steep than the others, over which passes the road to Sherim. The convent is an irregular quadrangle of about one hundred and thirty paces, enclosed by high and solid walls, built with blocks of granite, and fortified by several small towers. The convent contains eight or ten small court yards, some of which are neatly laid out in beds of flowers and vegetables; a few date-trees and cypress trees also grow there, and great numbers of vines." (p. 541.) 16 In the convent are two deep and copious wells of spring water. A pleasant garden adjoins the building, into which there is a subterraneous page 8, the soil is arid; but in this climate, when water is plentiful, the vegetation is very rich, and the rocks are covered with dense vegetation. The fruit is of the finest quality." (p. 544, 546.) According to tradition, the con vent dates from the fourth century, when the empress Helen is said to have built a church here; but the present building was erected by the empress Justinian, in the sixth century.

Directly behind the convent, towards the southwest, (Biebucker, Reiseb. i. 347.) rises Gebel Mouss, or the proper Sinsu; the path to the summit of which begins to ascend immediately behind the walls of the convent. At the end of three quarters of an hour's ascent is a small plain, on which is a large building called the convent of St. Elias, formerly inhabited, but now abandoned. According to the Koran and the Moslem traditions, it was in this part of the mountain, which is now called Djebel Orub, or Horub, that Moses communicated with the Lord. (Burckhardt, p. 563.) Is not this, perhaps, the real Horub, which indeed seems in the Scriptures to be synonymous with Sinai? From hence a still steeper ascent of half an hour leads to the summit of Djebel Mouss. The view from this summit is very grand. Mr. Carne says, "Sinai has four summits; and that of Moses stands almost in the middle of the others, and is not visible from below." (p. 231.) Burckhardt also speaks of a mosque on a lower peak, about thirty paces distant from the church on the proper summit, which is a plain of about sixty paces in circumference. To the west-south-west of Sinai lies Mount St. Catherine, one of the finest tourist sights of the country; it appears from the forest thorp by a narrow valley, which is situated a deserted convent, called El Erbyan, or the convent of the Forty. The eastern side of mount St. Catherine is noted for its excellent pasturage; herbs sprout up every where between the rocks, and, as many of them are odoriferous, the scent early in the morning, when the dew falls, is delicious. A slow ascent of two hours brought Burckhardt to the top of the mountain; which, like the Djebel Mouss, terminates in a sharp point. Its highest part consists of a single immense block of granite, whose surface is so smooth, that it is very difficult to ascend it. Luxuriant vegetation reaches up to this rock. (p. 574.) This mountain is higher than that of Moses; the view from its summit is quite extensive, and certainly more extensive than from the top of Sinai; it commands a view of some parts of the two gullies of Akaba and Suez. It is in this valley, between the two mountains, where the convent El Erbyan stands, that the site of Rameses is supposed. At twenty minutes' walk northward from El Erbyan, it opens into the broader valley which leads south-eastward to the convent of St. Catherine. At this point, i. e. on the northern side of Sinai, the valley has considerable width, and constitutes, according to Mr. Carne, (p. 227.) a plain capable of containing a large number of people. He remarks, (p. 222.) "From the summit of Sinai you see only innumerable ranges of rocky mountains. One generally places, in imagination, around Sinai, extensive plains or sandy deserts, where the camp of the hosts was placed, where the families of Israel stood at the doors of their tents, and the line was drawn round the mountain, which no one might break through on pain of death. But it is not thus. Save the valley by which we approached Sinai, aerial half a mile wide and a few miles in length, and a small plain was sometimes passed through, [just above mentioned], there appears to be few open spaces round the mountain." He says further on, (p. 266.) "We had not the opportunity of making the tour of the whole of the region of Sinai; yet we traversed several sides of the mountains, [the east, west, and north], and found it every where stony, bare and barren, except on the north, in which direction we had first approached it. Here there is, as before observed, a valley of some extent, and a small plain, in the midst of which is a rocky hill. These appear to have been the only places in which the families could have stood before the mount; because on the fourth (or south) side, though unvisited, we could observe from the summit, were only pines or small rocky valleys, as on the east and west.

Such is the most graphic account which the writer has been able to compile, from the accounts of travellers, of that celebrated region of which the summit Djebel Mouss is the centre; and which has now for centuries been supposed to be the Sinai of the Scriptures, and the scene of the awful communications between God and his covenant people of old, in the giving of the law. It must not, however, be denied, that the identity of this mountain rests upon traditions, corroborated by the existence of certain buildings; and several other circumstances; while some other circumstances seem to indicate a tradition of a still earlier date, in favor of another mountain, Mount Serbel, situated some distance to the west-north-west of Djebel Mouss. According to the Koran, it is separated from the upper region of Sinai by some valleys, especially Wady Heiran; and it forms, with several neighboring mountains, a separate cluster, terminating in peaks, the highest of which appears to be as high as Mount St. Catherine. It borders on Wady Feiran," (p. 575.) He afterwards ascended this mountain, and writes of it as follows: "The fact of so many inscriptions being found upon the rocks near the summit of this mountain, together with the existence of the road (steps) leading up to the peak, afford strong reasons for presuming that the Serbel was an ancient place of devotion. It will be recollected that no inscriptions are found either on the mountain of Moses, or on Mount St. Catherine. From these circumstances, I am persuaded that Mount Serbel was at one period the chief place of pilgrimage in the peninsula; and that it was considered the mountain where Moses received the tables of the law; though I am equally convinced, from a perusal of the ancient inscriptions, that the people of Egypt were accustomed to camp in the upper Sinai, and that either Djebel Mouss or the Mount St. Catherine is the real Horub. At present neither the monks of Mount Sinai nor those of Cairo consider Mount Serbel as the scene of any events of sacred history; nor have the Bedouins any tradition among them respecting it." (p. 608, 609.) To the opinion of this very intelligent and judicious traveller, formed from personal observation on the spot, we may well yield our assent; especially as the foundation of the present convent dates back to the fourth century.

The children of Israel left Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month of the sacred year, on the morning after the passover; [Num. xii. I.] nor is it to say, about the middle of April. They reached Sinai in the third month; (Ex. xii. 1.) and the expression, "the same day came they to Sinai," would seem to imply that they reached the mountain on the fifteenth of the third month, or June, having been just two months on the way. At any rate, it is manifest that they did not travel every day; and indeed, in the_414_ description, they probably remained several days. In Raphidim, at least, several important transactions took place, which imply a delay of some time; water was miraculously brought from the rock; the Amalekites were discomfited; Jethro visited Moses, and in consequence of his advice, a new arrangement of judges was introduced, Ex. xxvii. xviii. At Sinai the Israelites remained during all the transactions recorded in the remainder of the book of Exodus, in Leviticus, and in the first nine chapters of Numbers. In Num. x. 11, it is recorded, that “on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year, the cloud was taken up, and the children of Israel took their journeys out of the wilderness of Sin.” Their sojourn at Sinai must therefore be counted from the fifteenth day of June to the twentieth of May; a period of eleven months and five days, according to our mode of reckoning; but as they reckoned by lunar months, the whole interval was in fact something less than eleven of our months.

From Sinai to Kadesh, and the wandering in the Desert.—We have now a more difficult task, viz. to determine the course and stations of the Israelites after leaving Sinai, during all the years of wandering in the desert, until their arrival on the borders of the promised land. Until they reached mount Sinai, the Scripture accounts in Exodus and in Numbers xxxii. harmonize with each other; and the country has been visited and described by intelligent travellers. But from this time onward, the accounts of Scripture are apparently at variance with each other, or at least do not obviously harmonize; and the country through which they passed is still a terra incognita; having been visited by no modern traveller, except slightly. Burckhardt crossed the southern part of this desert from near Wady Mousa to Suez in 1812; and Seetzen travelled directly from Hebron to Akaba; but of his journey no account has reached us. In order to arrive at a better understanding of the subject, it will be proper here to give a general description of this whole region of country—a region of which very little has hitherto been known, and on some parts of which the travels of Bedouin tribes have left but little mark. Owing to the information will be drawn principally from this intelligent traveller. (See his Travels in Syria, p. 401, seq. passim.)

Of the two gulfs of the Red sea which enclose the peninsula of Sinai in the south, or gulf of Suez, there is a direct direction from Cairo to north-north-west, and terminates at Suez, in lat. 30° north, and long. 30° 12' east from Paris. The eastern, or gulf of Akaba, runs nearly from south by west to north by east, and ends at Akaba, in lat. 29° 30' north, and long. 32° 35' east from Paris. The distance between these two extremities, therefore, is about 143 miles of longitude in lat. 30°, or about 125 miles in a straight line, tending from west-north-west to east-south-east. The above positions are given from the chart of Rippell, which was constructed from astronomical observations. The peninsula included within these limits is filled up with mountains, and narrow valleys, and desolate plains. Of the mountains, the chain, or elevated circle, of Sinai, as described above, is the chief. West of this is the Serbal. “To the northward of this central region, and divided from it by the broad valley called Wady El Sheikh, and by several minor wadys, begins a lower range of mountains called Zebeir, which extends eastward; and rising at one extremity the two peaks called El Djoz, the so-called plantations of Wady Feiran, and losing itself to the east in the more open country towards Wady Sal. Beyond the Zebeir northwards are sandy plains and valleys. This part is the most barren and destitute of water of the whole country. It borders on the north of the chain of El Tyh, which stretches in a regular line eastwards, parallel with the Zebeir, beginning at Sarbou El Djemel.” (Burekli, p. 574.) According to the map of Burckhardt, this chain begins near the coast of the western gulf, between Wady Gharendel and Wady Taybe, and extends eastward; towards the middle of the peninsula it divides into two chains, which continue to run parallel with each other, and terminate near the mouth of the eastern gulf, at some distance south of Akaba. But low mountains, strictly the commencement of this chain, appear on the left of the road opposite Suez, about eight miles distant, and there run parallel with that road. (p. 471.) North of El Tyh, the great Egyptian Heli, a pilgrim road, passes from Suez to Akaba over the desert.

The northern end of the gulf of Akaba is connected with the southern extremity of the Dead sea by the great valley of wadys of wandering in the desert, until their arrival on the borders of the promised land. Until they reached mount Sinai, the Scripture accounts in Exodus and in Numbers xxxii. harmonize with each other; and the country has been visited and described by intelligent travellers. But from this time onward, the accounts of Scripture are apparently at variance with each other, or at least do not obviously harmonize; and the country through which they passed is still a terra incognita; having been visited by no modern traveller, except slightly. Burckhardt crossed the southern part of this desert from near Wady Mousa to Suez in 1812; and Seetzen travelled directly from Hebron to Akaba; but of his journey no account has reached us. In order to arrive at a better understanding of the subject, it will be proper here to give a general description of this whole region of country—a region of which very little has hitherto been known, and on some parts of which the travels of Bedouin tribes have left but little mark. Owing to the the south-east. There is not the slightest appearance of a road, or of human life, in this part of the valley. (p. 444.) At the southern extremity of the valley, where it opens upon the plain of Akaba, Rüppell describes it, towards the end of April (1853), as shaded by bushes and covered with luxuriant pasturage. See in Elath.

The chain of mountains on the east side of this great valley, forming the continuation of those which surround the eastern side of the Dead sea, is known in different portions of it by the names of Djebel, or massasias, Djebel Shera, and Djebel Hasma. The first, or Djebel, extends from the Dead sea, or the region about Kerak, to the wide valley El Ghoeyr, which descends towards the west into the Ghor; this part is manifestly the ancient Gebel of the Hebrews and the Gezelene of the Romans. Djebel Shera follows and extends to the south of the Wady Gherandel above mentioned; this name is the present Sier of Scripture, (which, however, probably comprised in general the whole chain,) and in this part are situated the ruins of Petra, the ancient capital of Edom, first discovered by Burckhardt. Further south Djebel Hasma forms the continuation of the chain to the waters of the Elanitic gulf. The whole of this tract appears to have constituted the ancient Edmund or Mount Sion. The mountains do not cover a broad extent; and beyond them, on the east, lies the vast plain of the Arabian desert, which the great Syrian caravan of pilgrims crosses on its way to Medina. It is covered with stones, especially flints, and may mountains be called a stone desert. The road of the caravan lies along the western edge of the plain, near the mountains. Burckhardt remarks of the mountains of Shera in particular, that "they are considerably elevated above the level of the Ghor, but they appear only as low hills, when seen from the eastern plain, which is upon a much higher level than the Ghor. This great valley [El Ghor] seems to have a rapid slope towards the south; for the mountains on the east of it appear to increase in height the farther we proceed southward, while the upper [eastern] plain apparently continues upon the same level." (p. 435.) Thus the mountains of Hasma are apparently higher than any of the others farther north. The whole of this chain is intersected by many wadys or valleys descending from the upper or eastern plain to the Ghor or El Arba. Not far from Besseyrs in the Djebel, in passing over the summit of a hill, Burckhardt remarks: "Here a fine view opened upon us; to our right we had the deep wady of Ghurba, and to our left, the long name on its south side; farther west, about four hours from Dhana, we saw the great valley of the Ghor; and towards the east and south extended the great Arabian desert." (p. 436.) The valley of Ghoeyr, mentioned above, which divides Djebel from Shera, "is a large, rocky and uneven basin, considerably lower than the eastern plain, upwards of twelve miles across at its eastern extremity, but narrowing towards the west. It is intersected by numerous wadys of winter torrents, and by three or four valleys watered by rivulets which unite below and flow into the great valley of the Ghor. The Ghoeyr is famous for the excellent pasturage produced by its numerous streams, or mud el, in consequence, becomes a favorite place of encampment for all the Bedouins of the Djebel and Shera." (p. 410.) The Wady Mousa, in which are the ruins of ancient Petra, is of the same description; so also the Wady Gherandel, above spoken of, which empties itself into the valley of El Arba, in whose sands its waters are lost, and into which it issues long passages, formed by the approaching rocks. (p. 441.)

Respecting the chain of hills on the eastern side of the Ghor, we have much less information. Burckhardt remarks, that they contain no springs of water whatever. (p. 443.) From the place where he crossed the great valley, opposite to the Wady Gherandel, he "ascended the western chain of mountains. The mountain directly opposite to [before] us appeared to be the highest point of the whole chain, as far as I could see north and south; it is called Djebel Beyane; the height of this chain, however, is not half that of the eastern mountains. It is intersected by numerous broad wadys, in which the Talh-tree grows; the rock is entirely silicious, of the same species as that of the desert which extends west of the plain. I saw some large pieces of flint perfectly oval, three to four feet in length, and about a foot and a half in breadth. After an hour and a half of gentle ascent, we arrived at the summit of the hills, and then descended by a short and very gradual declivity into the western plain, the level of which, although higher than that of the valley El Arba, is perhaps one thousand feet lower than that of the eastern desert. We had now before us an immense expanse of dreary country, covered with stones and with black flats, with here and there some hilly chains rising from the plain." (p. 444.) At Akaba, however, both the western mountain and plain are more elevated above the bottom of El Arba. Rüppell estimates the elevation there to be not less than fifteen hundred feet. (Reise, p. 247.) See in Elath.

Thus it appears, that the country on each side of the Ghor, beyond the mountains which skirt the valley, is a vast and almost pathless desert. This western desert, lying north of the peninsula of Sinai, was crossed by Burckhardt from the point where he entered it, as described in the preceding paragraph, to Suzeb. The time occupied in this journey was about five days. A few extracts from his journal will best point out the character of the country. He entered the desert, as above mentioned, on the 27th of August, 1812, toward evening. "Aug. 28th [first day.] In the morning we passed two broad wadys full of tamarisks and of Talh-trees. At the end of four hours we reached Wady el Layhane. In this desert the water collects in a number of low bottoms and wadys, where it produces verdure in winter time; and an abundance of trees with green leaves are found throughout the year. In the winter, some of the Arbas of Ghaiba, and the sand, form the sand, are filled with the Red sea, encamp here. The Wady Layhane is several hours in extent; its bottom is full of gravel. The road from Akaba to Gaza passes here; it is a journey of eight long days. At one distant on the 29th of August, we issued from the head of Wady Layhane again upon the plain. The hill on the top of this wady is called Ras el Kas, and is the termination of a chain of hills, which stretch across this plain in a northern direction for six or eight hours; it is a high promontory, and serves as a landmark to travellers. The plain which we now entered was a perfect flat, covered with black pebbles. The high insulated mountain, behind which Gaza is situated, bore from hence north by west, distant about a long day's journey." (p. 445. seq.)—"Aug. 28th [second day.] This day we passed several wadys of Talh and tamarisk-trees, intermixed with low shrubs. Direction west by south. The plain is, for the greater part, covered with flints; in some places it is chalky. Wherever the rain collects in winter vegetation of trees and shrubs needed. In the midst of this desert met a poor Bedouin woman, who begged some water of us. She was going to Akaba, where the tents of her family were, but had neither provisions nor water with her, relying entirely on the hospitality of the Arabs she might meet with on the road. She seemed to be as unconcerned as if she were merely taking a walk for pleasure. After an uninterrupted march of nine hours and a half, we reached a mountain called Dharf el Rokob, which extends for about eight hours from north-west to south-east. At its foot we crossed the Egyptian Hadj or pilgrim caravan road; it passes along the mountain towards Akaba, which is distant from hence fifteen or eighteen hours. The level plain over which we had travelled from Ras el Kaz terminates at Dharf el Rokob. Westward of it the ground is more intersected by hills and wadys, and here begins the desert El Ty, or of wandering, in which, according to tradition, both Jewish and Mohammedan, the Israelites wandered for several years, and from which belief the desert takes its name. (p. 447, seq.)—Aug. 30th [third day]. We passed a chain of hills called Ojime, running almost parallel with the Dharf el Rokob. We had now re-entered the Hadj route, a broad, well-trodden road, strewn with the whitened bones of animals that have died by the way. The soil is chalky, and overspread with black pebbles. At the end of five hours and a half we reached Wady Konak. Here the term wady is applied to a narrow strip of ground, the bed of a winter torrent, not more than one foot lower than the level of the plain, where the rain water, from the inequalities of the surface, collects, and produces a vegetation of low shrubs and a few Tulf-trees. The greater part of the wadys from hence to Egypt are of this description. The Coloequidita grows in great abundance in all of them; it is used by the Arabs to make tinder. In nine hours and a half we passed a low chain of chalky hills. On several parts of the road were holes, out of which rock salt had been dug. At the end of ten hours and a half we arrived in the vicinity of Nakhel, (i.e. date-tree), a fortified station of the Egyptian Hadj. Our direction was still west by north. Nakhel stands in a plain, which extends to an immense distance toward the west, but which north at about one hour's distance from Nakhel, in a low chain of mountains. The fortress is a large square building, with stone walls, without any habitations round it. The pasha of Egypt keeps here a great number of troops, and celebrates the 31st [fourth day]. We marched for four hours over uneven ground, and then reached a level plain, consisting of rich red earth, fit for culture, and similar to that of the northern Syrian desert. We crossed several wadys, in which we started a number of bares. At every twenty yards lay heaps of bones of camels, horses, and asses, by the side of the road. At the end of ten hours and a half we reached the mountainous country called El Thegher, or the mouth, which forms a boundary of the desert El Ty, and separates it from the peninsula of mount Sinai. We ascended for half an hour by a well-formed road, cut in several places in the rock, and then followed the windings of a valley, in the bed of a winter torrent, gradually descending. On both sides of the Hadj road we saw numerous heaps of stones, the tombs of pilgrims who had died of fatigue. At the end of fifteen hours we alighted in a valley of the Theghar, where we found an abundance of shrubs and trees. (p. 452.) Sept. 4th, on the fifth day, the route lay across the moving sands of the desert. Shingle sandshovels around the head of the western gulf of the Red sea, and our traveller encamped for the night about two hours short of Adjeroud.

The same general view of this journey is given in the letter of Burekhardt, inserted under the article CANAAN, p. 237. He there describes this desert as "the most barren and horrid tract of country he had ever seen."

In 1823, M. Rüppell travelled from Suez to Akaba, by the Hadj route, leaving Suez April 21st, and arriving at Akaba on the 29th. To Nakhel or Negele, his route was of course the same as that of Burekhardt, in an opposite direction. Further east, the country possesses the same character; chalky hills alternating with rolling plains. This same monotonous is in one place interrupted by a steep chalky mountain, near Dabt el Baggoe, over which pious Mussulmans have hewn a pass two hundred feet long in the rock. East of this is a green valley, and then the plain Darfure, which is wholly without vegetation, at least in the vicinity of the route. This high desert region is bounded on the east by the mountains of reddish sandstone, which skirt the plain of Akaba and the valley El Araba; and from which the Hadj route descends by a steep path in many places hewn out of the rock. The general character of this wide tract is given by Rüppell in the words—"a frightful desert." (p. 241—247.)

To this general description of the whole country between Mount Sinai and Palestine, we have heretofore devoted the more attention, because this information has no where else been brought together, and because it all tends to illustrate the journeys of the Israelites after leaving Sinai. Their departure from Sinai was on the 20th day of the second month, in the second year from the departure out of Egypt; (Numb. x. 11.) i.e. as we have seen above, not far from the middle of May. The stations are thus marked:—(1) Three days' march to the wilderness of Paran; to Taberah, where part of the camp was burned, Num. x. 12; xxxi. 3. (2) To Kibrot-hattavaah, the graves of lust, xii. 34. This is a different place from Taberah, although a departure from the latter is not mentioned. Moses speaks of the two stations as the same, but this is incorrect. (3) Mount Hor, where Aaron died, xx. 22. (4) Desert of Paran, i.e. Kadesh; xii. 16; xiii. 26. Here the spies returned; and hence the people were directed to turn and get them into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea, xiv. 25. (5) We next read (Numb. xx. 14) (440), seq. (to 2.) To Jethro-habon, in the first month, to Kadesh, where they abode, and Miriam died. Hence they sent to ask a passage through Edom (xx. 14.) which was refused.—(6) Mount Hor, where Aaron died, xx. 22. After this they journeyed by the way of the Red sea, (Ezra Gaber) to compass the land of Edom, xxx. 4.

With this representation agrees also that in Deut. i. where there are said to be eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of mount Seir to Kadesh Barnea; (verse 2) and where it is said that the Israelites departed from Horeb and "went through all that great and terrible wilderness, and came to Kadesh Barnea;" (verse 19) after which they were commanded to turn and take their journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea, verse 40. They are then described as abiding many days in Kadesh, (l. 46.) and afterwards as turning and taking their journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea, and compassing mount Seir many days; and then as passing by

Thus far all harmonizes. But in the catalogue of stations contained in Num. xxxiii. and which accords with the preceding statements (except Taberah) as far as to Hazeroth, there are no less than eighteen stations, placed between Fs with the first and second month, and among these is Exon-gaber, which is not mentioned elsewhere until after the Israelites had left Kadesh, and were about to compass Edom, Deut. ii. 8. How is this account to be reconciled with the other statements of the books of Numbers and Deuteronomy, as above exhibited?

Let us first examine the various references to time which are to be found in these accounts. The Israelites left Sinai about the middle of May, in the seventeenth year from their departure from Egypt, and within a month they had entered the wilderness of Paran. In the following year, they encamped at the source of the Jordan, and from this place they passed over into the wilderness of Edom, to approach Kadesh, Num. xiii. 26; apparently after eleven days (not necessarily successive days) of marching, and by the way of Mount Seir, Num. xiv. 25; and the Israelites were in the wilderness of Paran, Num. xxxiii. 20, 32, and 35. It is not certain when the spies were sent out to the land of Canaan, (Num. xiii. 2) who returned after forty days to Kadesh, (xiii. 25, 28) bringing with them a sample of the grapes of the land; it being "the time of the first ripe grapes," Num. xiv. 28, xx. 22. As the Canaan, (pp. 941, 942) that grapes ripen in Palestine in July and August. We may therefore conclude, that the Israelites were at Kadesh in August of the second year; there they rebelled on the report of the spies, and received the threat from Jehovah, that their carcases should all fall in the wilderness, and their children should wander in the desert forty years; and there they were commanded to turn back into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea. The next movement, recorded in Num. xx. 1, is, that "the whole congregation came into the desert of Zin in the first month, and abode in Kadesh." Does not this indicate a return to Kadesh, after having once left it? Before they left Sinai in the second month, or May, and were in Kadesh in August; now, they arrive at Kadesh in the first month, or April. Here Miriam now dies; the people murmur for water; Moses and Aaron disobey God's command in regard to the mode of obtaining water, and the people are threatened with being smitten with leprosy, and are told in consequence that they shall not enter the promised land; Moses begs a passage through Edom, which is refused; they then journey from Kadesh to mount Hor, in the edge of Edom, where Aaron dies in the fortieth year of his age, and from thence to the departure from Egypt, on the first day of the fifth month, Num. xx. xxxiii. 37, 38. These events all immediately succeed each other, and directly follow this last departure from Kadesh; Aaron dies here in fullness of the thousand years given, and in all probability in the same year of this return to Kadesh. But between the time of the return of the spies to Kadesh in August of the second year, and the death of Aaron on the first day of the fifth month (corresponding to August of the fortieth year), there is an interval of thirty-eight years. Again, in Deut. ii. 14, it is said, that "the space in which we came from Kadesh-Barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty-eight years." Must not this refer to the first departure from Kadesh, when they were commanded to turn back and wander in the wilderness; and not to the last departure from that place, just before the death of Aaron? If so, then the coming to Kadesh in the first month, (Num. xx. 1) and that mentioned in Num. xxxiii. 36, are the same, and refer to the subsequent return of the Israelites to that station. And as it is said in Deut. i. 46, that they abode in Kadesh (the first time) many days; and as Aaron's death took place in August, just thirty-eight years after,—and they came to the brook Zered just thirty-eight years after leaving Kadesh the first time, we may perhaps, infer that this year, and this departure from Kadesh, continued for the same space of time, as their subsequent march from mount Hor to the brook Zered. This, however, is a point of little comparative importance.

If now, the death of Aaron occurred in the fifth month of that same year, in the first month of which the Israelites returned to Kadesh, as there is every reason to suppose; i.e. the fortieth year of the departure from Egypt, then there is an interval of more than thirty-seven years that elapsed, and we may, therefore, without hesitation, assume the eighteen stations, there named between Hazeroth and Kadesh, as belonging to this interval of eight and thirty years. These, of course, are not all the stations occupied during this period; other stations are noted where they abode for some time. From Exon-gaber to Kadesh, for instance, (Num. xxxiii. 36) could not be much less than the whole length of the great valley of the Ghor—a distance of not less than one hundred miles, whatever might be the exact situation of Kadesh; and of course in passing from one to the other, there must have been several intervening stations, although none are mentioned.

To this hypothesis there seem to be but two objections. First, that in Num. xxxiii. 18, we have not read Paran or Kadesh, instead of Rithmah, as in xii. 16; xiii. 26. Secondly, that Exon-gaber, which, in Num. xxxiii. 36, is put before Kadesh, is not elsewhere mentioned, and the Israelites came to the land in order to compass the land of Edom, Deut. ii. 8.

To the first of these objections it may be replied, that Kadesh was the name not only of a city, but of the tract of desert country adjacent to it; as we shall afterwards see. It is therefore, to be taken as the desert of Kadesh (Ps. xxi. 8) in the account of the first coming to it; as indeed is sufficiently obvious from the language of the passage itself, Num. xiii. 36. Rithmah is then to be regarded as a place or station that period; only those probably strictly to the statement in Deut. ii. 2, that they came to Kadesh after eleven stations, then Makleboth in xxxii. 25, is the station corresponding to Kadesh. The solution is the same in either case. To obviate the force of the second objection, it is necessary to bear in mind the character and circumstances of the Israelish people, as well as the character of the country in which they were now placed. They were essentially a nomadic people; their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had ever been so; they were empirically Bedouins, removing with their flocks and herds from place to place, as occasion might require. In Egypt they had ever been shepherds—their province of Goshen was adapted to pasture, and not to tillage; and now, when they had come out into the deserts, with their flocks and herds, they were still the nomadic race they had ever been,—a people resembling those by whom these desert plains, and valleys, and mountains, are possessed to this very day. Hence, according to the command of God, they wandered in the desert; and their wanderings would be determined, like those of the Arabs at present, by the opportunities of water and pastureage. When the scanty “pastures of the desert” failed in one place, they removed to another; and they would naturally resort to those tracts, where water, and consequently vegetation, were most abundant. In the long period of eight and thirty years, therefore, while thus removing from place to place in the vast deserts between Palestine and the peninsula of Sinai, although they might not improbable at times take up their residence in the desert El Ty, or again on Mount Seir, in one place for a month or two, there is hardly to be supposed that they would not also sometimes visit the Ghôr, which even now is a favorite resort of the Bedouins in winter. Nor can we well suppose, that they would not visit the same places in year one, and these in year two. In the long period of eight and thirty years, the wells and springs of water are places of general resort, and the pastureage, which had been devoured in one year, would be renewed in other years. For the time, they did visit the Ghôr. It was the natural abode of the Eastern traveler, as is well known, it opens to a plain, and affords luxuriant pastureage. Indeed, the list in Num. xxxiii. seems to imply, that they did thus sojourn at times in the Ghôr, on the western skirt of the land of Canaan, in which the Ghor lies, as we know, on the east of the Ghôr, nearly half way from Akaba to the Dead sea. Hence we may infer, that this list of stations indicates in general the movements of the Israelites from north to south, and probably, following to the east, as above mentioned, yet in the southern extremity, they returned to Kadesh, advancing, probably, from station to station, in the same occasional and leisure manner. This return was a part of their thirty-eight years of wandering; but afterword, when they had in an unsuccessful attempt from Kadesh to pass through the territory of Edom, and found it necessary to march back to Kadesh, in order to pass around mount Seir, we may suppose, that their march was more rapid, and not Without much regularity, by a regard to an abundant supply of water and pastureage. In this manner we may not only remove the difficulty suggested above, but also another difficulty which has troubled commentators. In Num. xxxiii. 31, according to the Kedar, Edom, or to have arrived at the stations Moesoreth, Bene-janaan, Hor-hagidgad, and Jobathah; while in Deut. x. 6, 7, these same stations are named in a different order. -Beeroth of the children of Jaakan, Moesora where Aaron died, Gudgodah, and Jobath. That these names are at bottom the same, there can be no doubt. But in Numbers they are mentioned in reference to the first visit of the Hebrews, during the long wandering southward, before their return to Kadesh the second time; while in the Deuteronomy, they have reference to the second passage of the Israelites, when marching south in order to compass the land of Edom. It is easy to conceive, how Moesoreth and the wells of Jaakan might lie in such a direction from each other, that a nomadic tribe, wandering in different years southward along the great valley, might at one time take the former first in its way, and at another time, the latter.

is to be harmonized with the other accounts of the journeyings of the children of Israel; and in so doing have been led to give also an exhibition of the general course of these journeyings and wanderings themselves. It now remains to ascertain more particularly, if possible, the situations of some of the principal stations, in order to obtain a more definite idea of the route in general. Of the position of Tahorah, (Num. xiii. 3.) Kibroth-hattaavah, (xi. 34.) and Hazereth, (xi. 35.; xxxiii. 17.) we know nothing further, than that they were stations between mount Sinai and the wilderness of Paran, Num. x. 12.; xiii. 16.

The wilderness of Paran some have chosen to find in the Wady Feiran or Farun, which extends north-west from mount Sinai; but this hypothesis has been sufficiently confuted above, p. 460. This desert is in general to the north-east of Paran, and took for him a wife out of the land of Egypt, Gen. xxix. 14, 31. Beer-sheba, as is well known, was at the southern extremity of Palestine. David, also, after the death of Samuel, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where also the dach of Naaman, who dwelt in the southern Carmel, in the desert of the Dead sea, are represented as dwelling, 1 Sam. xiv. 1, seq. Both these notices go to show that the wilderness of Paran lay on the south of Palestine; the latter one would indicate that its borders were near Palestine; while the former would imply that it also stretched far to the south and west, including the present desert El Ty above described, p. 416. Moses, in his farewell song, says, (Deut. xxxiii. 2.) "The Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from mount Paran, and Habakkuk also says, (iii. 2.) "God came from Temsan, and the Holy One from mount Paran." In these descriptions of a φυλακή, God is represented as coming from the south, and the situation is in general to the north and northwest. But other mountains in the same direction are mentioned with it,—Seir and Paran. The location of Seir, we know, was on the east of the Ghor; that of Paran was, of course, in or adjacent to the desert of that name. This great mountain range form a chain on the west of the Ghor, bordering the desert of Paran on the east? or was it rather the mountains on the southern border of the desert, towards the peninsula? At any rate, it seems a necessary conclusion from that which occupied the stations Moesoreth, Bene-Janaan, Hor-Hagidgad, and Jobathah; while in Deut. x. 6, 7, these same stations are named in a different order.—Beeroth of the children of Jaakan, Moesora where Aaron died, Gudgodah, and Jobath. That these names are at bottom the same, there can be no doubt. But in Numbers they are mentioned in reference to the first visit of the Hebrews, during the long wandering southward, before their return to Kadesh the second time; while in the Deuteronomy, they have reference to the second passage of the Israelites, when marching south in order to compass the land of Edom. It is easy to conceive, how Moesoreth and the wells of Jaakan might lie in such a direction from each other, that a nomadic tribe, wandering in different years southward along the great valley, might at one time take the former first in its way, and at another time, the latter.

That Paran was a name given to this desert is a very wide and general sense, is also apparent from the fact, that in Num. xiii. 36, Kadesh is said to be situated on it; while in x. 11, and other passages, the Kadesh is spoken of as being in the desert of Zin. The conclusion, therefore, is, that the desert of Zin was a portion of the great desert of Paran. The wilderness of Zin lay toward the south-western shore of the Dead sea, and extended southward along the Ghor, as we know from Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 1. It constituted, therefore, the north-east part of the great desert of Paran; for how far it extended, we have no means of ascertaining. There seems also to have been in it a station called Zin; (Josh. xv. 23;) though the principal place mentioned is Kadesh.

Kadesh, or, more fully, Kadesh-Barnea, (Barnae signifies field or place of wandering; like the Arabic El Ty,) is described in Num. x. 15, as a city in the "uttermost border of Edom." It is mentioned as one of the south-eastern limits of the territory of Israel, Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3. In Josh. x. 41, it is said, that Joshua sent the Canaanites from Kadesh-Barnea even unto Gaza; where Kadesh stands for the eastern border of the children of Israel, as Gaza for the western. It is also said to be eleven days' journey from Horeb, by the way of mount Seir, Deut. i. 2. All these notices compel us to place Kadesh quite on the eastern side of the great desert of Paran; and especially the first, which says that it lay in the "uttermost border of Edom." So mount Hor is said to be "by the coast of the land of Edom," Num. xx. 23; and "in the edge of the land of Edom," xxxiii. 37. But we know that mount Hor is situated on the eastern side of the Ghor, at some distance up the Wady Sefran and similar valleys, until they issued upon the great plain or desert of Paran, and passed along its eastern part, and perhaps for some portion of the way in the valley of the Ghor, skirting mount Seir, until they arrived in the district of a hostile. Here the spies were sent out; and on their return, in August, the people murmured, and were commanded to turn back and wander in the wilderness. After remaining for some time in the vicinity of Kadesh, and making some unsuccessful attacks upon the Canaanites, (Deut. i. 41, seq.) they removed and commenced that wandering nomadic life which continued for the space of more than thirty-seven years; during which time they sojourned in different parts of the greater desert west of the Ghor, (El and in the Ghor itself, extending their removals in the latter to its southern extremity, from mount Hor (Moab) to Edom-gaber, and afterwards removing again northward, and being governed at all times in the choice of their stations by a regard to water and pasture-land, until, at last, in the first month (April) of the fortieth year from their departure out of Egypt, they found themselves again at Kadesh. Moses having given up all hope of penetrating into Palestine from the Ghor, and the country was rich, and of unburthening them with the death of the Israelites; (Burchard, Trav. in Syr. p. 443;) That Rithmah, or the desert of Kadesh, whether the spies returned, was in this valley, or possibly in some wady extending from it westward, seems probable from the facts mentioned in Num. xiv. 40, seq. where the Israelites are said to have got them up into the mountain;—"unto the hill-top," not far from the camp; and the "Amalekites and Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, came down and smote them, and discomfited them unto Hormah." (Num. xxxii. 31.)"
towards the east, and the Canaanites and Amalceites on the north, and also on the west, if they chose to make an attack from that quarter,—no alternative remained for the Israelites but to follow again the great valley El Araba southwards, towards the Red sea. In this journey Aaron died at mount Hor, and they rested again at several stations which they had visited in their former nomadic wanderings. Arrived at the Red sea, they turned to the left and crossed the ridge of mountains to the eastward of Ezion-gaber, where Bthurkhardt remarked, from the opposite coast, that the mountains were lower than elsewhere. (p. 592.) It was in this part of their route that the Israelites were discouraged on account of the way, and suffered from serpents; (Num. xxii. 5, 6.) of which Bthurkhardt observed traces of great numbers on the opposite side of the gulf, and some apparently very large. (p. 496.) He was informed, "that the fishermen are much afraid of them, and extinguished their fires in the evening before they went to sleep, because the light was known to attract them." (Comp. Deut. viii. 13.) The Israelites then issued into the great and elevated plains, which are still traversed by the Syrian pilgrims in their way to Mecca, and appear to have followed northward nearly the same route which is now taken by the Syrian Hadj, along the western skirts of this great desert, near the mountains of Edom; see p. 415, above. On entering these plains, Moses received the command, "Ye have compassed this mountain long enough; turn ye northward; ye are to pass through the coast of the children of Esau, and they shall be afraid of you," Deut. ii. 3, seq. The same people who had successfully repelled the approach of the Israelites from their strong western frontier, was alarmed now that they had come round upon the weak side of the country. But Israel was ordered "not to meddle" with the children of Esau, but merely "to pass through their coast," and to "buy meat and water of them for money," (ii. 6.) in the same manner as the Syrian caravan of Mecca is now supplied by the people of the same mountains, who meet the pilgrims on the Hadj route. After traversing the wilderness on the eastern side of Moab, the Israelites at length entered that country, crossing the brook Zered thirty-eight years after their first departure from Kadesh, and about forty years from the time of their departure out of Egypt.

In accordance with the views above exhibited, the several accounts given of the stations of the Israelites in Num. x. seq. and Deut. i. ii. x. may all be synoptically arranged with the list in Num. xxxiii. as follows:

Num. x. seq. Deuteronom. Num. xxxiii.

From Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month.

To the wilderness of Paran.
1. Taberah, Num. xi. 3.
2. Kibroth-hattaavah,
Num. xi. 34.
3. Hazeroth, Num. xi. 35.
4. Region of Kadesh, in the wilderness of Pa-ran, after eleven days of marching, Num.xi.
16; xii. 36; Deut. i. 2, 19.

B.
5. They turn back from Kadesh, and wander in the desert, Num. xiv. 25, seq.
8. Kibilathathah, 22.
15. Meseoth, 30.
17. Hor-hagidgon, 32.
19. Elbahuthah, 34.
20. Elkanah, 35.
21. Kadesh, the city, 36.

22. Return to Kadesh,
Num. xx. 1.
23. Beerouth Bene Jakan, Deut. x. 6.

24. Mount Hor, Num. xx.
Mount Hor, 37.

25. Elath and Ezion-gaber, Deut. i. 8.

27. The way of the Red sea, Num. xxxi. 4, from Elath and Ezion-gaber, Deut. i. 8.

29. Punon, 42.

30. Obad, Num. xxxi. 10.
31. Ije-abirim, in the wilderness east of Moab, Num. xxxi. 11.

32. The valley of Zered, Num. xxxi. 12; or the brook Zered, after thirty-eight years from the first departure from Kadesh, and about forty years from the time of their departure out of Egypt.

EXODUS, book of, the second of the sacred books in the Old Testament, is so called, because it contains the history of the departure of Israel out of Egypt under Moses. It contains the history of the birth of Moses; his education and flight; his return; the plagues of Egypt; the departure of the Hebrews; the passage of the Red sea; the giving of the law; the erection of the tabernacle; and the celebration of the second passover. It contains the history of 145 years, from the death of Joseph, A. M. 2303 to A. M. 2514, the end of the first year after the going out of Egypt. The Hebrews call this book "Tanach Eleh Shenach," because it begins with these words.

EXORCISTS. From the Greek word ἔξορκος, to conjure, to use the name of God, with design to expel devils from places or bodies which they possess. We see from the early apologists of our religion, that the devils dreaded the exorcisms of Christians, who exercised great power against those wicked spirits. The Jews had their exorcisms, as our Lord intimates, (Matt. xii. 27,) and as do also the apostles, in Mark i. 38; Acts xix. 13.

I. EXPIATION, the act of atoning for a fault. The Hebrews had several sorts of expiatory sacriiii.; — for sins of ignorance; for purifications from certain legal pollutions, as of a woman after childhood, or from a unclean state; etc.; so, also, those who having touched some unclean thing, had forgotten or neglected to purify themselves at the time and in the manner which the law prescribed. These expiatory sacrifices did not of themselves remit faults committed in it: they only repaired the legal and external fault, and cured the transgressor from the temporal penalty with which those faults were punishable. See Lev. iv.
27, &c.

I. A sin-offering, a ram, a lamb, a kid, or two pigeons might be offered; or the poor might offer meat. There were particular ceremonies, for the high-priest, or a prince of the people, or when all the people had committed trespasses. But in general, the high-priest, on behalf of the whole nation, offered for expiation, belonged exclusively to the priests. See SACRIFICE.

II. EXPIATION, THE GREAT DAY OF, was the tenth of the month Tisri. The Hebrews call it Ager-pur, or the heart, or the breast; because the faults of the year were then expiated. The principal ceremonies were the following. The high-priest, after he had washed not only his hands and his feet, as is usual at ordinary sacrifices, but his whole body also, and put on the holy garments, and put on the people, priests, wearing neither his purple robe nor the ephod, nor the pectoral, because he was to expiate his own sins with those of the people. He first offered a bullock and a ram for his own sins, and those of the priests; placing his hands on the heads of the victims, and confessing his own sins, and the sins of his house. Afterwards, he received from the princes of the people two goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, to be offered on behalf of the whole nation.

The lot having determined which of the two goats should be sacrificed, the high-priest put some of the sacred fire of the altar of burnt-offerings into a center, threw incense upon it, and entered with it, thus smoking, into the sanctuary. After he had purflamed the sanctuary, he came out, took some of the blood of the young bullock he had sacrificed, and carrying that into the sanctuary, he dipped his finger in it, and sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the vail, which separated the holy place from the sanctuary, or most holy. He then came out a second time, and at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings killed the goat which the lot had determined to be sacrificed. The blood of this goat he then placed into the most holy place, and sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the vail. Thence he returned into the court of the tabernacle, and after sprinkling both sides of it with the blood of the goat, he came to the altar of burnt-offerings, wetted the four horns of it with the blood of the goat and young bullock, and sprinkled it seven times with the same.

During the performance of this ceremony, none of the priests, or people, were admitted into the tabernacle, or into the court.

The sanctuary, the court, and the altar, being thus purified, the high-priest directed the goat, which was set at liberty by the lot, to be brought to him. This being done, he put his hand on its head, and after consecrating his own sins, and the sins of the people, he delivered the goat to a person, who was to carry it to some desert place, and let it loose; or, as others think, throw it down some precipice. (See GOAT, scape.) This being done, the high-priest washed himself all over in the tabernacle, and putting on other clothes, perhaps his pontifical dress, (that is, his robe of purple, the ephod, and the pectoral,) he sacificed two rams for a burnt-offering, one for himself, the other for the people.

The great day of Expiation was a day of rest, and strict fasting. Buxtorf and Calmet have collected many particulars respecting the observance of this solemnity by the modern Jews.

EYE. The Hebrews call lantcru, eyes; and give the same name to colors. "And the eye (color) of the manna was as the eye (color) of balsam," Numb.
xi. 7. By an "evil eye," is meant, derelict,- jealousy, grudging, ill-judged parsimony. "To lay their eyes on any one," is to regard him and his interests. "To find grace in any one's eyes," (Ruth ii.
10.) is to win his friendship and good graces.
Their feelings were often compared, or supposed to be comparable, as human or natural passions. "The wise man's eyes are in his head," (Eccles. ii. 14.) he does not act by chance. "The eye of the soul," in a moral sense, is the intention, the desire. God threatens to "set eye will act correctly; but if there be a film over the cornea, or a cataract, or a skin between any of the humors, the rays of light will not act on the internal coat of the retina. Therefore, if the mental eye, the judgment, be honest, virtuous, sincere, well meaning, pious, it may be considered as enlightening and directing the whole of a person's actions; but if it be perverse, malignant, biased by undue prejudices, or drawn aside by improper views—its darkness the understanding, perverts the conduct of the party, and suffers him to be misled by his unwise and his unruly passions; as Saul was towards David, see 1 Sam. xviii. 9, in Heb. ("Saul eyed David," Eng. Text).

May there not be an allusion to destempers of the eye, in Matt. vii. 37. Why behooldst thou the mote (the little black speck) which is in thy brother's eye—  but considerest not the beam (the almost cataact-like), which is in thine own eye? The translated mote (αμαξα) may, some, signify a small splinter of wood; others say, a little seed; it may be referred to a small film, or speck, the size of a seed, floating in the eye, a disease known among medical writers. The word beam, according to the Hebrew, or English, is, no doubt, used metaphorically—but must it not import a real disorder of the eye, far more injurious to distinct vision than the mote? This sense of the phrase is independent of any parable which might be used among the Jews, referring to a beam, or large piece of wood, being in the eye. As if it were said, Why behooldst thou with affected superiority and keenness of observation, the little seed-like film which floats in thy brother's eye, but art insensible of the purblind state of thine own eye? (p. 402)

There is an expression in Psal. cxviii. 2, "the eyes of servants look unto the hands of their masters," &c. the proper force of which we are not likely to perceive, unless it be explained by eastern customs. An accustomed to the free intercourse of conversation, to the expression by words of our thoughts as they rise within us, we relate every thing with freedom; and except a sentiment be openly conveyed by speech, we attribute no blame to those who do not regard it, or understand it. On the same principle, the orders we give our servants are directed to them in words, and according to our words we expect their obedience. But the case is altogether different in the East; in their life, especially before superiors, are there so highly esteemed, so respecting, that many of the most important orders which a master can give, or a servant can receive, are given and received in profound silence. This mode of bearing up to the Master's representation.

An illustration more happy than the following can hardly be expected. Some, indeed, have supposed the chastening hand of the master, or mistress, to be that to which the servant attends; but it should be remarked that the Persian is not core. The word signifying to the person who chastises him, but of the contempt and scorn (not strictly persecution) of the proud.

"One can hardly imagine the respect, civility, and serious modesty, that is used among them [the eastern ladies], when they are visited by any one, as I have been informed by some ladies of the Franks, who have been with several. No nuns, or novices, pay more deference to their abbess, or superior, than the maid-servants to their mistresses; they are waited on, as are likewise the female visitors, with surprising order and diligence, even at the least wink of the eye, or motion of the fingers, and that in a manner not perceptible to strangers, as I have said of the men elsewhere." (Hitroyce, vol. i. 249.) "Nobody appears on horseback second court, and they are not only in the palace, but the court yard number of people the first, where, generally masters, who are either at the Divan, or in some other part of the seraglio, that if a blind man were here, and did not know that they were speaking, among the Turks, in signs, like mutes, which are generally understood; and they add, in speaking against our manners of saluting, by pulling off our hats, and towards, that we seemed as if we were the flies, and wiping our shoes; they custom of putting their right feet into the bed, and putting down, that hangs down to his ankles, and bending feet, they put it about two feet, and kiss it." (P. 170.) Baron du Tott gives a remarkable instance of the authority attending this mode of saluting: and the use of significant motions—"The ceremonial ceremonies on these occasions were over, and Hamam [the new Vizier] continued to discourse familiarly with the ambassador, when the Mayor-Age [or High Provoet] coming into the hall, and approaching the Vizier, whispered something in his ear; and we observed that all the answer he received from him was a slight horizontal motion with his hand; after which, the Vizier, instantly recognizing an approved mark, continued the conversation for some time longer. We then left the hall of audience, and came to the foot of the great staircase, where we remounted our horses: here, nine heads cut off, and placed in a row on the outside of the gate, completely explained the stair which the Vizier had made use of in our presence." (vol. i. p. 30.)

These extracts prove, that not only in private and domestic concerns, but also in those of public importance, on occasions of life or death in the East do actually "look to the hands of their superiors," and receive orders from them. The orientals have even a kind of language for the fingers, and, by various positions of them, they give silent orders to their domestics, who are not to receive them. But this article has an aspect still more important on a usage frequently alluded to in Scripture, and regarded as nothing uncommon, though it appear strange to us.—No account of any such attendance as that of the court of Judges in the East;—that the most difficult matters are thus related; and very probably by means of the mutes, (in the Turkish seraglio, especially,) matters not always of the most agreeable..."
nature, are communicated to personages in the most important stations, whom they immediately concern.

The result of the whole is, that when the prophets under the Old Testament were divinely directed to act a portion of the information they had in charge to communicate to the people, they did little or nothing more than impressed the same upon the understanding, or besides their appreciation of it to themselves, or to circumstances; nor did it seem c crazy to them; as it might to us, who are not accustomed to such a mode of communicating ideas. When Jeremiah says, he and his children are for signs; — when Ezekiel saw his girdle marred — when Ezekiel was a sign to the people, in not mourning for the dead, (chap. xxiv.) — in his removing into captivity, and digging through the wall, (chap. xii.) these and similar actions were not only well understood, but they had the advantage of being in ordinary use among the people to whom they were addressed.

For some account of blinding the eyes, as a punishment, is frequently practised in the East; see Blindness.

EYE-LIDS. As it is not customary among us for women to paint their eye-lids, particularly, we do not usually perceive the full import of the expressions in Scripture which mention women as emblematic of beauty. Even the ancient poets as best as they may seem to be of very great antiquity, and which is still maintained in the East. So we read, (2 Kings ix. 30.) "Jezebel painted her face," Heb. "put her eyes in paint;" more correctly, "she painted the internal parts of her eye-lids." Even when they are not painted with silver wire, previously wetted, and dipped in the powder of ic, (a rich lead ore,) which, adhering to the eye-lids, formed a streak of black upon them, thereby, apparently, enlarging the eyes, and rendering their effect more powerful; inquiring as a sign of their vivacity. This action is strongly referred to by Jeremiah (iv. 30.) in our translation, "though thou rentest thy face with painting;" or, though thou causest thine eye-lids to seem to be starting out of thine head, through the strength of the black paint which is applied to them, yet shall that decoration be in vain. The powerful effect of this supposedly charming addition is alluded to by the sagacious preceptor: (Prov. vi. 25.) "Lest not after her beauty (of the eye,) let her want any thing of a man's heart, and she turn thee with her eye-lids," — which she has rendered so large and brilliant by the assistance of art, as to enchant beholders. So Ezekiel: (xxiii. 40.) "for which her hair is long, and is braided with tresses, and covered with a painted-the eyes (eye-lids, rather,) and haft ornamented thyself with ornaments?"

[Many authors have mentioned the custom which has prevailed from time immemorial among the females of the East, of tinging the eyes and edges of the eye-lids with a powder, which, at a distance, or by candle-light, adds much to the blackness of the eyes. Lady M. W. Montague speaks of this custom. (Letters, vol. ii. p. 32.) Pietro della Valle, the Italian traveler, giving a description of his wife, who was born in Mesopotamia, and educated at Bagdad, where he married her, says: (Viaggi, tom. i. lett. 17.) "Her eye-lashes, which are long, and, according to the custom of the East, dressed with stibium, as we often see in pictures of the Hierophants of the town; to women of old, (Ezek. xxiii. 40.) and in Xenophon, of Any-ages the grandfather of Cyrus, and of the Medes of that time, (Cypri. l.) give a dark, and, at the same time, majestic shade to the eyes."

Dr. Shaw affords us the following information: (Travels, p. 294. fol. ed.) "None of those ladies take themselves to be completely dressed, till they have coloured the hair and eyes. They sometimes use the powder of lead ore. Now as this operation is performed by dipping first into the powder a small wooden bodkin, of the thickness of a quill, and then drawing it afterwards, through the eye-lids, over the ball of the eye, we shall have a lively image of what the prophet (Jer. iv. 30.) may be supposed to mean by reading the eyes with painting. The sooty color, which is in this manner communicated to the eyes, is thought to add a wonderful gracefulness to persons of all complexions."

Similar is the testimony of Niebuhr: (Descr. of Arab. p. 65.) "The females of Arabia," he says, "color their natio blood red, and their hands and feet yellow, with the herb Al-henna. (See Camper.) They also tinge the inside of their eye-lids coal-black with k'ahl, a coloring material prepared from lead ore. They not only enlarge their eyes-brows, but also paint other figures of black, as ornaments, upon the face and hands. Sometimes they even prick through the skin, in various figures, and then lay certain substances upon the wounds, which eat in so deeply, that the ornaments thus impressed are rendered permanent for life. All this the Arabian women care for only because they make certain of their eyes k'ahl upon their eyes, under the pretext that it strengthens the sight; but they are regarded by the more judicious as petits maistres." This custom is not confined to the Semenitish matrons alone. Captives in the Hottentot state, that "the Birmans, both men and women, color their teeth, their eye-lashes, and the edges of their eye-lids, with black. The women of Hindostan and Persis, also, commonly practise the operation of coloring the eye-lashes. They deem it beneficial as well as becoming. The collyrium they use is called suras, the Persian name of antimony." (Embassy to Ava, vol. ii. p. 233.)

The ancients call the mineral, with which the eyes are thus colored, stibium or antimony; (Piny. xxiii. 23.) the usual Hebrew name is ps3, psx, but in Ezek. xxii. 40, we find the verb r, k'hal, to color, &c. to which the modern Arabic al cohol, or k'chol, corresponds. This is described as a fine mineral powder, usually a compound of lead ore and zinc, which is moistened with oil or vinegar, and is laid upon the inner part of the eye-lids, so as to cause a small black line to appear around the edge. (See Hart- mann's Hebrewier, Th. ii. p. 145, seq., R.)

Ezekiel, son of Buzi, a prophet of the sacer-dotal race, was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin king of Judah, A. M. 3405. He began his ministry in the thirteenth year of his age, according to the general account; but perhaps in the thirteenth year after the covenant was renewed with God in the reign of Josiah, (Ezek. i. 1.) which answers to the fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity, A. M. 3409. He prophesied twenty years, to A. M. 3430; the fourteenth year after the taking of Jerusalem.

When Ezekiel was among the captives on the river Chebar, the Lord appeared to him in a vision, on a throne, borne by four cherubim, supported by four wheels, and appointed him the watchman of his people. He was commanded to shut himself up in his house, and forewarned, that he should be seized, and bound with chains as a madman. While thus confined, God commanded him to delineate on a brick, or piece of soft earth, the city of Jerusalem, besieged and surrounded with ramparts; to put a wall of iron between himself and the city; and to continue 360 days lying on his left side, anaemic and withering the iniquity of the kingdom of Israel; and then, after 40 days on his right side, to signify the iniquities of Judah. These 430 days denoted, also, the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; its duration, and the subsequent captivity, from the sacking of Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah; or rather, in the fourth year after this siege, when Nebuzaradan carried away the remains of the Jews prisoners to Babylon, A. M. 3420, until the death of Belshazzar, A. M. 3468, according to Usher; or reckoning from the foundation of the city, according to Calmet's computation, the first year of Cyrus's reign at Babylon.

Ezekiel was afterwards commanded to make as many leaves of mixed corn as he was to continue daily lying upon his side, and to bake them with human excrements. (See Deut.) The prophet, expressing his reluctance to this, was permitted to substitute cow-dung, signifying hereby, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should be reduced, during the siege, to the necessity of eating unclean bread, in small quantity, and in continual terror. After this, he was to cut off his hair, to divide it into three parts,—to burn one part, to cut another to pieces with a sword, and to scatter the rest in the wind; hereby typifying the fate of the people. The year following, he was transported in spirit to Jerusalem, and shown the abominations and idolatries committed there; God commanding an angel to mark, as a plague, the city, and to slay there the inhabitants. Five years before the last siege of Jerusalem, the Lord directed Ezekiel to prepare for escape, as it were from enemies, by stealth; as king Zedekiah should also do. He sat in the midst of the city, and his prophetic denunciations against false prophets, and those seduced by them. During these predictions the prophet in Mesopotamia, Zedekiah king of Judah combined with Egypt, Edom, and neighboring princes, to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar. The Babylonian armies marched against Jerusalem, and besieged it, A. M. 3414; and on the same day, Ezekiel, who was two hundred leagues from Jerusalem, declared the event to his companions in captivity, and predicted to them the ruin of their city, and the destruction of the present generation. At this moment the prophet's wife was lying in her bed, dying. God forbade him to mourn for her; and the people inquiring the meaning of these figurative actions, Ezekiel answered, that God was about to deprive them of their temple, city, country, and friends; and that they would have even the sad consolation of mourning for them.

During the siege of Jerusalem, Ezekiel prophesied against Egypt and Tyre. He was not informed that Jerusalem was taken until the fifth day of the tenth month, A. M. 3417, about six months after the event; whence we may judge, that he was at that time in some retired situation remote from Babylon. In the evening of that day, the Lord opened the prophet's mouth, while the remainder of the remnant of the people would be dispersed; which happened four years after. He also foretold the calamities of Sidon, Tyre, Edom, and Ammon, as they occurred five years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

The end of Tyre, and Nebuchadnezzar's war against Egypt, are next to the affairs of the Jews, most remarkable in Ezekiel's writings. After these melancholy visions, God showed him more consolatory events;—the return from the captivity,—the re-building of the temple and city,—the restitution of the kingdom of Judah and Israel, &c. chap. xxxvi. xxxvii. xxxviii. &c.

Jerome (in his Commentary, that as Jeremiah prophesied at Jerusalem at the same time as Ezekiel did beyond the Euphrates, the prophecies of the latter were sent to Jerusalem, and those of the former into Mesopotamia, to comfort and encourage the captive Jews. It is said that Ezekiel was spared death by the prince of his people, because he exhort ed him to leave idolatry; but it is difficult to say who this prince could be. It is affirmed, that his body was laid in the same cave in which Schem and Arba lay, and that Calmet thinks, that on the banks of the Eu phrates. Benjamin of Tudela says, that his tomb is to be seen, and which they read every year on the great day of expiation.

Josephus (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 6, 10) says, that Ezekiel left two books concerning the captivity; that one of them having foretold the ruin of the temple, and that Zedekiah should not see Babylon, these writings were sent to Jerusalem; circumstances which we do not read in Ezekiel; but which seem to favor the opinion of Jerome. Athanasius believed, that one of these books of Ezekiel was lost; and Spinoza thinks, that what we have of his writings is a fragment only; but there is no proof of all this; nor do we know upon what authority Josephus made his assertion. The work of Ezechias, that Ezekiel was an acknowledged canonical; nor was it even disputed that he was their author. The Jews, however, say, that the Sanhedrim deliberated long, whether his book should form part of the canon. The great obscurity of his prophecies, and the general the national events, which he so clearly denounces, have made many persons consider him as an impostor, and also what he says in chap. xviii., 2—20, that the son should not bear the iniquity of his father; which was thought contrary to Moses, who says, the Lord visits the sins of the fathers on the children, to the third and fourth generation. But this difficulty was removed by Ananias. It may be observed, that Moses himself says the same thing, in Deut. xxiv. 16; "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin."

Ezekiel speaks of a resurrection, (ch. xxxviii. L.) and says, that having been conducted [in vision] into a field of bones, the Spirit of God induced him to prophesy to them, upon which they gradually re-assembled and revived.

Ezion-Gaber, or Ezion-geba, a city of Arabia Desereta, on a gulf of the Red sea, called the Elnitic gulf, and close by the city of Elath. The Israelites came from Ebron to Ezion-gaber; and thence to the wilderness of Zin. At this port Solomon equipped his fleets for the voyage to Ophir, Num. xxxiii. 35; Deut. ii. 8; 1 Kings ix. 26. See Ez. xxxxi. 18, Ezon.

Ezira, or Ednas, the famous Jewish high-priest and reformer, was of a scederian family; by some thought to be son of Jeriahe, the high-priest, who was put to death at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar, after the capture of Jerusalem; and as Calmet thinks, only his grandson, or great-grandson. It is believed, that the first return of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem was with Zerubbabel, in the beginning of Cyrus, as we have already observed in the history. He was very skilful in the law, and zealous for God's service; and had, doubtless, a great share in all the transactions of his time.

The enemies of the Jews procured from the court of Persia an order, forbidding them to continue the rebuilding of the temple, which they had resumed after the death of Cyrus and Cambyses; but this order being revoked in the beginning of Darius Hystaspes, (A. M. 3513,) they proceeded, and dedicated the temple in 3563, Ezra vi. Ezra, notwithstanding, returned to Babylon, probably on some affairs of his nation; and in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, (A. M. 3567,MESS A.D. 467,) was sent back to Jerusalem, with letters patent, permitting all Jews in his kingdom to return to Judea, with all their gold and silver, the vessels of the temple, and also offerings of the king and his counsellors, to buy victuals for the service. Artaxerxes commanded his treasurers in the province beyond the Euphrates to furnish Ezra with corn, wine, oil, salt, or money; granted immunities to the priests and ministers of the temple; and authorised Ezra to appoint judges and magistrates, and to govern and instruct those who returned to Jerusalem, chap. vii.

Ezra therefore assembled the chief company of the real estate, and set forth for Jerusalem. At the banks of the river Ahab, he sent to invite certain priests and ministers of the temple, who were at Casiphia, (probably in the Caspian mountains,) to return with him; and 2000 of whom joined him. He appointed a solemn day to pray to God for a happy journey; and gave an account of the gold and silver vessels which the king had restored. They proceeded on their journey, in number 1778 men, and all arrived happily in Judah, A. M. 3597, ch. viii. Ezra being informed that both priests and Levites, magistrates and common people, had married wives who were strangers and idolators, he rent his clothes, and having taken his seat in the temple, continued absorbed in grief and silence till the evening sacrifice. He then put up prayers to God for the sins of the people, ch. ix. A great multitude having flocked together, he engaged the principal of the people by the covenant, to renew the covenant with the Lord, to dismiss their children, to prevent whom Ezra directed all of them to assemble, within three days, at the temple for the same purpose, and with the same effect, ch. x. Ezra had the principal authority in Jerusalem till the arrival of Nehemiah.

In the second year of Nehemiah's government, the people being assembled at the temple, during the feast of tabernacles, Ezra was desired to read the law, which he did from morning to noon, accompanied by Levites, and seduced of the people. The next day they desired information from him how to celebrate the feast of tabernacles. This he explained to them, and continued eight days reading the law in the temple, which was followed by a solemn renewal of the covenant, Neh. viii.xix.

Josephus says, Ezra was buried at Jerusalem; but the Jews believe that he died in Persia, in a second journey to Artaxerxes, and show his tomb in the city of Samaria. He is said to have lived nearly 150 years. It is believed that Ezra was chiefly concerned in revising and arranging the books of Scripture. He had great zeal and knowledge, and having the spirit of prophecy, it is very probable that he took great pains in collecting the sacred writings and forming the present canon. It is also thought that he assisted in compiling both books of the Chronicles, and added in all the books what appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing them. Some are of opinion that Ezra and Malachi were the same person; and it is certain that Malachi is not so much a proper as a common name,—angel or messenger of the Lord; and that in Ezra's time, prophets were called Malachies, or angels of the Lord. (See Hag. i. 12. Mal. i. 1.) The fathers have cited Malachi under the name of Ezra, as he is called in the Vulgate.

There are four books in the Vulgate bearing the name of Ezra or Esdras; but the first only is acknowledged to be his. This is certainly the work of Ezra; and in it he relates events of which he was a witness, speaking often in the first person. The second book is attributed to Nehemiah, and is called after him in the English translation. It is admitted however, that some trifling matters have been added to it, which cannot belong to Nehemiah; as the mention of the high-priest Jachin, and king Darius, Neh. xii. 22. The third book is the same in substance as the first, but interpolated. The fourth book is written with art enough, as if Esdras himself had composed it; but the marks of falsehood are discernible throughout. It is not extant in Greek, and it never was in Hebrew. The Jews also ascribe to Ezra certain regulations, blessings, and prayers; and some speak of a revelation, a vision or dream; but this is spurious. They have an extraordinary esteem for him; and say, he directed them given by Moses, Ezra would have deserved to have been their legislator. The Mahometans call him Ozair the son of Serahiah.

EZRA, overseer of the gardens, or of the agricultural and farming department under David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 36.

FABLE

FABLE, a story destitute of truth. Paul exhorts Timothy and Titus to shun profane and Jewish fables, (1 Tim. iv. 7; Tit. i. 14,) as having a tendency to seduce men from the truth. By these fables some understand the Gnostics' cabalistical interpretations of the Old Testament. But the fathers, generally, and especially of the most of the ancient Christians, interpret them of the vain traditions of the Jews, especially concerning meats, and other things to be abstained from as unclean, which our Lord also styles "the doctrines of men," Matt. xv. 9. This sense of the passages is confirmed by their context. In another sense, the word is taken to signify an apologue, or instructive tale, intended to convey truth under the concealment of fiction, as Jotham's fable of the trees, Judg. ix. 7—12. See FAC.

FACE. The Lord promised Moses, that his face should go before Israel: "If my face," say the LXX, but rather "the angel of my face." This, and the angel of his presence, (Isa. lxiii. 8,) mean the Messiah.

Moses begged of God to show him his face, or to manifest his glory. God replied, "I will make all my goodness pass before thee; and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee;—but thou canst not see my face;—for there shall no man see me and live." Exod. xxxiii. The persuasion was very prevalent in the world, that no man could support the sight of Deity, Gen. xvi. 13; xxxii. 30; Exod. xx. 19; xxiv. 11; Judg. vi. 22, 23. We read in Numb. xiv. 8 that "God spake mouth to mouth with Moses, even apparently, and not in dark speeches." And in Num. xiv. 14: "The Canaanites have heard that thou, Lord, art among this people, and seen face to face." In Deut. v. 4 God talked with the Hebrews "face to face, out of the midst of the fire." All these phrases are to be understood as intimating that God manifested himself to the Israelites; that he made them hear his voice as distinctly as if he had appeared to them face to face; not that they actually saw him.

The face of God sometimes denotes his anger, Psal. lxxxvi. 2. Sometimes it is used in a different sense. To consider the face of any one, is to respect his person, Prov. xxvii. 21. The judge ought to see his accused as not appearing any person-where comes before him, and to open them only to justice. Sometimes, to know thy face, signifies to do a favor, Mal. i. 8, 9; Gen. xix. 21. "I have accepted thee concerning this thing also." Heb. "I have accepted thy face." To spit in one's face, is a sign of the utmost contempt, Isa. i. 6; Matt. xxvii. 67.

We have an expression in Joel ii. 6—"Before their approach [the locusts] the people shall be much pained; all faces shall gather blackness" which is also adopted by the prophet Nshum, ii. 10. "The heart melts, the knees smite together, much pain is in all joints, and the faces of them all gather blackness"—which sounds uncouth to an English ear; but it is elucidated by the following extract from Ockley's history of the Sarmatians. (Vol. ii. p. 319.) Mr. Hamner has referred this blackness to the effect of hunger and thirst; and Calmet to a bedaubing of the face with soot; a proceeding not very consistent with the hurry of flight, or the terror of distress.

"Kumeil, the son of Ziyad, was a man of fine wit. One day, Hejige made him come before him, and reproached him, because in such a garden, and before such and such persons, whom he named to him, he had made a great many imprecations against him, saying, the Lord blacken his face, that is, fill him with shame and confusion; and wished that his neck was cut off, and his blood shed." The reader will observe how perfectly this explanation agrees with the sense of the passages above quoted. To gather blackness is equivalent to suffering extreme confusion, and being overwhelmed with shame, or with terror and dismay. In justice to Kumeil, we ought not to omit the ready turn of wit, which saved his life. "It is true," said he, "I did say such words in such a garden; but then I was under a vine-arbor, and was looking on a bunch of grapes, that was not yet ripe; and I wished it might be turned black soon; that they might be cut off, and be made wine of." We see, in this instance, as the sagacious moralist remarks, that "with the well-advised is wisdom; and that the tongue of the wise is health; that is, preservation and safety."

[In both these passages, however, the Heb. וָשָׁאָר, parir, does not signify blackness, but brightness, beauty, countenance, &c. The phrase is, therefore, illustrated by Joel i. 10, where it is said to gather in, withdraw their shining." So here, men's faces are said to gather in, withdraw their brightness, cheerful expression;" etc. i.e. grow pale with fear before the judgments of God.] R.

FAIR-HEAVENS, Actx. xxvii. 8, called by Stephen, the geographer, "the fair shore." It was, probably, an open kind of road, not so much a port as a bay, which did not afford more than good anchorage for a time, on the south-east part of Crete. Jerome and others speak of it as a town on the open shore.

FAITH, a disposition of mind by which we hold for certain the matter affirmed. This faith, which produces good works, gives life to a righteous man, Rom. i. 17; Hab. ii. 4. It may be considered, either as proceeding from God, who reveals his truths to man; or from man, who assents to, and obeys the truths of God; in both these senses it is called faith, Rom. iii. 3. Faith is taken also for a firm confidence in God, by which, relying on his promises, we address ourselves without hesitation to him, whether for pardon or other blessings, Matt. xvii. 20; James i. 5, 6.

Faith is a reliance on testimony. If the human testimony in reference to human things, it is not entitled to reception until after examination and confirmation. Human testimony, in reference to divine things, must also be scrupulously investigated before it is received and acted on; since the grossest of all deceptions have been imposed on mankind in the name of God. Nor is testimony, assuming to be divine, entitled to our adherence or affection, or obedience, until after its character is proved to be genuine, and really from heaven. The more genuine it is, the more readily will it undergo and sustain the trial; and the more clearly will its character appear.

But after a testimony, a maxim, or a command, is proved to be divine, it does not become a creature so ignorant and so feeble as man, to doubt its possibility, to dispute the obedience to which it is entitled, or to question the beneficial consequences attached to it, though not immediately apparent to human discernment.

Faith has respect to evil as well as to good; and in this it differs from hope. Hope wishes for good only; no man hopes for afflictions or evils. Hope desires rewards only; faith expects punishments as well as rewards. Faith deters from bad conduct, through fear, no less than through desire of advantage; hope allures through promises of blessings. Faith is the full assurance of things hoped for; and by faith the world was originally created by God; through which we can form no conception of, much less can we see, the matter out of which it was composed. By faith we believe in the existence of ancient cities, as Babylon, Jerusalem, &c. also of distant cities and places, as Rome, Egypt, &c. also of persons formerly living, as Abraham, David, our Lord Jesus Christ. Faith anticipates things never seen as yet; so Noah, by faith, built the ark, though no general deluge had ever then been witnessed; so Moses, actuated by faith, in the descent of the Messiah from Israel, quitted the honors and pleasures of Egypt; and so every pious Christian, believing that what God has promised he is able to perform, looks forward with realizing believe in the existence of heaven and of hell; of rewards and punishments beyond the grave; not such as are restricted to this world; but such as coincide with the immortality of the soul, and with the power and wisdom of the supreme and universal Judge.

Faith is taken for honesty, fidelity in performing promises, and in this sense it is applied both to God and man.

FAITHFUL, an appellation given in Scripture to professing Christians, to all who had been baptized; and it is used to this day in that application in ecclesiastical language. See 1 Cor. iv. 17; Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 9; 1 Pet. v. 12; Acts xvi. 1, 15; 9 Cor. vi. 15; 1 Tim. v. 16 and many other passages. The apostle directs Titus (chap. i. 6.) that the children of the bishops should be faithful; no doubt, as examples to the flock, or as the dedication of the children of the clergy to the most holy Trinity, by the introductory ordinance of Christianity.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS, see Divination.

FAMINE. Scripture records several famines in Palestine, and the neighboring countries, Gen. xii. 10; xxvi. 2. The most memorable one was that of seven years in Egypt, while Joseph was governor. It was distinguished for continuance, extent, and severity; particularly, as Egypt is one of the countries least subject to such a calamity, by reason of its general fertility. Famine is sometimes a natural effect, as when the Nile does not overflow in Egypt, or rains do not fall in Judea, at the customary seasons, spring and autumn; or when catastrophes, locusts, or other insects, destroy the fruits. The prophet Joel foretells these last causes of famine. He compares locusts to a numerous and terrible army ravaging the land, Joel i. Famine was sometimes an effect of God's anger, 2 Kings viii. 1, 2. The prophets frequently threaten Israel with the sword of famine, or with war and famine, 2 Sam. xi. 7, and generally go together. Amos (viii. 11) threatens another sort of famine: "I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord."[1]

FAN, an instrument used in the East for winnowing corn. Fans are of two kinds; one a sort of fork, having teeth, with which they throw up the corn to the wind, that the chaff may be blown away; the other is formed to produce wind when the air is calm, Isa. xxxv. 10. It is esteemed as a sign of wealth, and fans are carried in the hand, in order to purge his floor. By the Christian dispensation, and the moral influence which it introduced, men are placed in a state of trial, and the righteous separated from the wicked, Matt. iii. 11; John xiv. 17; 1 John iv. 1, 2. In the Christian church, by these he subjects nations and individuals to the blast of his vengeance, and scatters and dispurses them for sins. See Thrashing.

FASTING has, in all ages and among all nations, been practised in times of mourning, sorrow, and affliction. It is in some sort inspired by nature, which, under these circumstances, refuses nourishment, and suspends the cravings of hunger. We see no example of fasting properly so called, before Moses, whether the patriarchs had not observed it, which was a divine prescription, since there were great mournings among them, which are particularly described, as that of Abraham for Sarah, and that of Jacob for Joseph; or whether he did not think it necessary to mention it expressly, is uncertain. It appears by the law, that devotional fasts for expiation of sins were common among the Israelites. Moses passed forty days in fasting on mount Horeb, (Exod. xxix. 18; Deut. x. 10,) as did our Lord in the wilderness, Matt. iv. 2; Luke iv. 2. The Jewish legislator enjoined no particular fast; but it is thought that the great day of expiation was strictly observed as a fast. Joshua and the elders of Israel remained prostrate before the ark, from morning until evening, without eating; after which was the Passover, (Josh. vii. 6,) and the eleven tribes which fought against that of Benjamin, did the same, Judg. xxi. See also 1 Sam. vii. 6; 2 Sam. xii. 16. The king of Nineveh, terrified by Jonah's preaching, ordered that not only men, but beasts also, should continue without eating or drinking; should be covered with sackcloth, and each after their manner cry to the Lord, Joel ii. 16. They begin the observance of their fasts in the evening after sunset, and remain without eating until the same hour the next day, or until the rising of the stars; on the great day of expiation, when they are more strictly enjoined to fast, they continue without eating for twenty-eight hours. Men are obliged to fast from the age of full thirteen, and women from the age of full eleven years. Children from the age of seven years fast in proportion to their strength. During this fast, they not only abstain from food, but from bathing, perfumes, and ointments; they go barefoot, and are continent. This is the idea which the eastern people have generally of fasting; it is a total abstinence from pleasures of every kind. The principal fast-days of the Jews may be seen in the Jewish Calendar, at the end of the Dictionary. Besides those fasts, which are common to all Jews, others, which are devotional, are practised by the most zealous and pious. The Pharisees says, (Luke xviii. 12,) "I fast twice a week," that is, on Thursday, in memory of Moses going up mount Sinai on that day; and on Monday, in memory of his coming down from thence. It is said, that some Pharisees fasted four days in the week; and in the Greek of Judith, we read, that she fasted every day, except "the eyes of the sabbaths, and the sabbaths; and the eyes of the new moons, and the new moons; and the feasts and solemn days of the house of Israel." It does not appear by his own practice, or by his commands, that our Lord instituted any particular fast. When, however, the Pharisees reproached him, that his disciples did not fast so often as theirs, or as John the Baptist's, he replied, "Can you make the children of the bridegroom fast, while the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days," (Luke xiv. 35.) Accordingly, the life of the apostles and first believers was a life of self-denials, of sufferings, austerities, and fastings. Paul says, (2 Cor. vi. 5; xii. 27.) he had been, and still was, "in hunger and thirst, in fastings often," and he exhorts the faithful to imitate him in his patience, in his watchings, in his fastings. Ordinations and other acts of importance in the church were attended with fasting and prayers. The fasts of Wednesday and Friday, called stations in the Roman church, and that of Lent, particularly of the holy week, have been thought to be of early institution.

FAT. God forbade the Hebrews to eat the fat of beasts. "All the fat is the Lord's. It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all right to call God our father, by reason of the adoption and filiation which he has merited for us, by clothing himself in our humanity, and purchasing us by his death; "Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The spirit itself being a groan which cannot be uttered, but the children of God," Rom. viii. 15, 16. The devil is called the father of the wicked, and the father of lies, John viii. 44. He deceived Eve and Adam; he introduced sin and falsehood; he inspires his followers with his spirit and sentiments. The prophets reproach the wicked Jews with calling idols, "my father," Jer. ii. 27. They said so in effect, if not in words, since they adored them as gods. The heathen gave the name father to several of their divinities—as to Jupiter, "father of gods and men," father Jove, &c. and to Bacchus, Liber Pater, &c. These appellations the idolatrous Jews repeated andimitated. The father of Sichem, the father of Tekoah, the father of Bethlehem, &c. signify the chief person who inhabited these cities; or he who built or rebuilt them. To be gathered to their fathers, to sleep with their fathers, are common expressions, signifying death; and perhaps referring to interment in the same sepulchre. Christ is called, (Isa. ix. 6.) "the everlasting Father," &c. Because he is the true and only Mediator between us and God, whom we are to call any man "master," because we have one in heaven. Rather, to call no man father, in the same sense as the sons of the prophets called their teacher father; to follow no earthly leader; to follow blindly the dictates of no man, however eminent or dignified; but to obey God only. Not that we should abandon, or despise, earthly fathers; God requires us to honor that relation; but, when the glory of God, or our salvation, is at stake, if our fathers or our mothers are obstructions, we should say to them, "We know you not;" and to God, " Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: thou, O Lord, art our father, our redeemer," Isaiah lxxii. 16. Abraham is the father of the living; Abraham is the father of the faithful; called also the father of many nations, because many people sprung from him; as the Jews, Ishmaelites, Edomites, Arabs, &c.

FEAR, a painful apprehension of danger. In the Scripture, who use of as exercised towards God, or in a religious sense, it means rather reverence, veneration. It is sometimes used for the object of fear; as the fear of Isaac, that is, the God whom Isaac feared, Gen. xxxi. 42. God says that he would send his fear before his people, to terrify them and the inhabitants of Canaan. Job (vi. 4.) speaks of the terror of God, as set in array against him; and the Psalmist, (lxxxvii. 15.) that he had suffered the terror of the Lord upon him, and called their fatherless, and the judge of the widow; (Psalm lxviii. 5.) and he is frequently called heavenly father, and simply father; eminently, the father, creator, preserver, and protector of all, especially of those who invoke him, and serve him. See Deut. xxxii. 6. Since the coming of our Saviour, we have a new now revealed. We read, that “God is love,” and to be loved; not that God is fear, and to be feared, or dreaded; though we read of godly fear (Heb. xii. 38.) and of the fear of God, as showing itself in reciprocal affection between Christian brethren, 2 Cor. vii. 15; Eph. v. 21. Compare Rom. viii. 15; 2 Cor. vii. 14, 15, 16; 1 Pet. ii. 17, 18.

FEASTS. God appointed several festivals among the Jews: (1.) To perpetuate the memory of great events wrought in favor of them: the Sabbath commemorated the creation of the world; the Passover, the departure out of Egypt; the Pentecost, the law given at Sinai, &c. (2.) To keep them steadfast to their religion, by the view of ceremonies, and the majesty of divine service. (3.) To procure them certain pleasures and allowable times of rest; their festivals being accompanied with rejoicings, feasts, and innocent diversions. (4.) To give them instruction; for in their religious assemblies the law of God was read and explained. (5.) To renew the acquaintance, correspondence, and friendship, of their tribes and families, which, coming from distant towns in the country, met three times a year, in the holy city. For a description of these feasts, see Sabbath, Jubilee, Passover, Pentecost, Trumpets, Moon, Expiation, Tabernacles, Purim, Dedication.

Of the three great feasts of the year, (the Passover, Pentecost, and that of Tabernacles,) the octave, or the eighth day, was a day of rest as much as the festival itself; and all the males of the nation were obliged to visit the temple. But the law did not require them to continue there during the whole octave; except in the feast of Tabernacles, when they seemed to be obliged to be present for the whole seven days.

In the Christian church we have no festival that clearly appears to have been instituted by our Saviour, or his apostles; but as we commemorate his passion as often as we celebrate his supper, he has hereby seemed to institute a perpetual feast. Christians have always celebrated the memory of his resurrection on every Sunday. We see from Rev. i. 10. that it was commonly called “the Lord's day.” and Barnabas, Ignatius, Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen, say, we celebrate the eighth day with joy, because on that day Jesus Christ rose from the dead. It appears from Scripture, that after the promulgation of the Gospel, the apostles and Jewish Christians kept the Jewish feasts; but these, being national, did not concern other nations; nor could other nations come from their distant residences to attend them at Jerusalem. But, so early as we can trace, and certainly as early as the second century, the Gentile Christians kept certain feasts, analogous to those of the Jewish Passover and Pentecost;—that is to say, Easter, or rather the Pascha, on which was commemorated the death and resurrection of Christ; and Whit-sun tide, on which was commemorated the descent of the Holy Spirit. This was a favorite time for receiving baptism; and the white robes then worn by the new converts, gave name to the season. Some have thought that Easter was kept in the Christian sense, by the apostles; and that it is referred to in 1 Cor. v. 8. As no Jewish feast fell about Christmas, there is no probability of any substitution in this festival, as in the others.

We sometimes read of the governor or master of the feast. He gave directions to the servants, and superintended every thing as he thought proper. He tasted the wine, and distributed it to the guests.

The author of Ecclesiastes thus describes his officer (chap. xxxii. 1, 2.) “If thou be made the master of a feast, lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care of them, and so sit down. And when thou hast done all thy office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for all thy wise-working.” This office is mentioned in John ii. 8, 9, upon which Theophylact has a good remark: “That no one might suspect their taste was vitiated, by having drunk to excess, so as not to know water from wine, our Saviour orders it to be first carried to the governor of the feast, who certainly was sober; for those who on these occasions are intrusted with this office, observe the strictest sobriety, that they may be able properly to regulate the whole.”

FEET, see Foot.

FELIX, see Claudius III.

FENCE. The Hebrews use two terms to denote a fence of different kinds; גָּדוֹר, gadôr, and נֶפֶךְ, nefekh, and nefelah, &c. According to Vitringa, the latter denotes the outer thorny fence of the vineyard; and the former, the inner wall of stones surrounding it. The chief use of the former was to keep off men, and of the latter, to keep off beasts; not only from gardens, vineyards, &c., but also from the flocks at night. See Prov. xv. 19; xxiv. 31. From this root the Phoenicians called any enclosed place gadôr, and particularly gave this name to their settlement in the south-western coast of Spain, which the Greeks from them called Cadiz, the Romans, Cadiz, and the moderns, Cadiz. In Ezek. xliii. 5, xliii. 30. gadôr appears to denote the fortifications of a city; and in Ps. lxxvii. 3, the wicked are compared to a tottering fence, and bowing wall; i.e. their destruction comes suddenly upon them. Fenced cities were such as were walled or fortified.

FERRET, a sort of weasel, which Moses declares to be unclean, Lev. xi. 30. The Greek πυάλις, is composed of μας, a rat, and γαλέ, a weasel, because this animal has something of both. The Hebrew וָפָא, ovaac, [Eng. tran. ferret] is by some translated hedgehog, by others leech or salamander; by Bochart, lizard. It was most probably a species of lizard.

FESTUS, PORTIUS, succeeded Felix in the government of Judea, A. D. 58. To one of his Felix, when he resigned his government, left Paul in bonds at Caesarea in Palestine, (Acts xxiv. 27.) and when Festus arrived, he was entrusted by the principal Jews to condemn the apostle, or to order him up to Jerusalem; they having conspired to assassinate him in the way. Festus, however, answered, that it was not customary with the Romans to condemn any man without hearing him; and promised to hear their accusations at Caesarea. But Paul appealed to Cæsar; and so secured himself from the prosecution of the Jews, and the intentions of Festus. Finding how much robbing abounded in Judea, Festus very diligently pursued the thieves; and he also suppressed a magician, who drew the people after him into the desert. He died in Judea, A. D. 62, and Albinus succeeded him.

FIELD, see Furrows.

FIG. The fig-tree is very common in Palestine and the East; and flourishes with the greatest luxuriance in those barren and stony situations, where little else will grow. Figs are of two sorts, the “boccore” and the “kermouse.” The black and white boccore, or early fig, is produced in June, though the kermouse, the fig properly so called, which is preserved, and made up into cakes, is really ripe before the last winter. There is also a large dark-colored kermes, that sometimes hangs upon the trees all winter. For these figs generally hang a long time upon the tree before they fall off; whereas the bocores drop as soon as they are ripe, and, according to the beautiful allusion of the prophet Nahum, "fall into the mouth of the eater, upon being shaken," ch. iii. 12. Dr. Shaw, to whom we are indebted for this information, remarks, that these trees do not properly blossom, or sand out flowers, as we render reser, Hab. iii. 17. They may rather be said to shed out their fruit, which they do like so many little buttons, with their flowers, small and imperfect as they are, enclosed within them.

When this intelligent traveller visited Palestine, in the latter end of March, the bocores was far from being in a state of maturity; for, in the Scripture expression, "the time of figs was not yet," (Matt. xi. 13.) or not till the middle or latter end of June. The "time" here mentioned, is supposed by some authors, quoted by F. Chusius, in his Hierobotanicon, to be the third year, in which the fruit of a particular kind of fig-tree is said come to perfection. But this species, if there be any such, needs to be further known and described, before any argument can be founded upon it. Dioscurides Syrus, as he is translated by Dr. Lofus, is more to the purpose: "it was not the time of figs," he remarks, because it was the month Nisan, when trees yielded blossoms, and not fruit. It frequently happens in Barbary, however, and it need not be doubted in the warmer climate of Palestine, that, according to the quality of the preceding season, some of the more forward and vigorous trees will now and then yield a few ripe figs, six weeks or more before the full season. Something like this may be alluded to by the prophet Hosea, when he says, he "saw their fathers as the first-ripe in the fig-tree at her first time?" (ch. ix. 10.) and by Isaiah, who, speaking of the beauty of Samaria, and her rapid declension, says, she "shall be a fading flower, and as the hasty fruit before the summer; which, when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand, he eateth it up," ch. xxviii. 4.

When the bocores draws near to perfection, then the kermes, the summer fig, or carice, begin to be formed, turneth they red, and grow upon the tree, with which time there appears a third crop, or the winter fig, as it may be called. This is usually of a much longer shape and darker complexion than the kermes, hanging and ripening on the tree, even after the laburnum and syrynum; and, provided the winter prove mild and temperate, is gathered as a delicious morsel in the spring. We learn from Pliny, that the fig-tree was bifera, or bore two crops of figs, unnamed, the bocores, as we may imagine, and the kermes; though what he relates afterwards, should intimate that there was also a winter crop. "Scri fructus per hiemem in arbore mancet, et ostate inter novas frondes et folia maturescunt," says Columella, "et in hiemem seram different materiantur." It is well known, that the fruit of these prolific trees always precedes the leaves; and consequently, when our Saviour saw one of them in full vigor having leaves, (Mark xi. 13.) he might, according to the common course of nature, very justly "look for fruit," and haply find some bocores, if not some winter figs likewise, upon it. But the difficulties connected with the narrative of this transaction, will not allow of its dismissal in this summary manner.

Mr. Taylor conjectures that this tree was the sycomore, which bears from several times in the year, without observing any certain seasons, so that a person cannot determine, without a close inspection, whether it has fruit or not. But, to say nothing against the authority by which the εὐκρέτεια is here proposed to be rendered a sycomore, which has its own proper appellation, εὐκρέτεια. (Luke xix. 4.) the assumption seems inadequate to account for the malediction which was levelled against it; because it is plain that such a tree might at that time have been destitute of fruit, and yet by no means be barren. Dr. Shaw's conjecture, therefore, seems to be the most satisfactory; namely, that as the fig always puts forth the fruit before its leaves, and this was not the season for figs, (rather fig harvest, for so the words εὐκρέτεια εὐκρέτεια import, our Saviour was justified in expecting to meet with some on the tree. As Mr. Bloomfield remarks, The whole difficulty results from the connection of the two last clauses of the 10th verse: "And when he came to it he found nothing but leaves—for the time of figs was not yet," for the declaration, it was not yet fig harvest, cannot be (as the order of the words seems to import) the reason why there was nothing but leaves on the tree; because, as we have seen, the fig is of that tribe of vegetables on which the fruit appears before the leaf. Certain fruit, says Mr. Wiston, might be expected of a tree whose leaves were distinguished afar off, and whose fruit, if it bore any, preceded the leaves. If the words had been, "he found nothing but green figs, for it was not the time of ripe figs," says Campbell, we should have justly concluded that the latter clause was meant as the reason of what is affirmed in the former, but as they stand, they do not admit this interpretation. All will be clear, however, if we consider, with the writer above referred to, that the former of these clauses is parenthetical, and admit such a sort of trajectio as is not infrequent in the ancient languages. The sense of the passage will then be as follows: "He came to see if he might find any thing thereon; (for it was not yet the time to gather figs;) but he found leaves only; and he said," &c. Similar inversions and trajections have been pointed out by commentators in various other parts of the New and Old Testaments, and Campbell points out the mistake before Auguste; and, [chap. xvi. 3. 4.] "They said, Who shall roll us away the stone? and when they looked, the stone was rolled away, for it was very great"—that is, "They said, Who shall roll us away the stone; for it was very great." [The fruit of the fig-tree is one of the delicacies of the East; and is of course very often spoken of in Scripture. Dried figs are probably like those which are brought to our own country; sometimes, however, they are dried on a string. We likewise read of cakes of figs, (κέδρι) 1 Sam. xxv. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 40. 2 Kings xx. 7. These were probably formed by pressing the fruit forcibly into baskets or other vessels, so as to reduce them to a solid cake or lump. In this way dates are still prepared in Arabia. In Djedda, Burekhardts remarks, (Travels in Arabia, p. 25.) are "eight date-sellers; at the end of June the new fruit comes in; this lasts two months, after which, for the remainder of the year, the date-paste, called adoue, is sold. This is formed by pressing the dates, when fully ripe, into large baskets, so forcibly as to reduce them to a hard, solid paste or cake, each basket weighing usually about two hundred weight; in the market, it is cut out of the basket, and sold by the pound." He describes also smaller baskets, weighing about ten pounds each. See under Flagon. R.

FIGURES, see TYPES.

To FIND, to meet with, is used sometimes for to attack, to surprise one's enemies, to light on them such as are darkness, as in Gen. xxxvi. 24. (See EMEN.) So the verb to find is used in Judg. i. 5. "They found Adoni-bezek in Bezek;" that is, they attacked him there. The Philistine archers found king Saul; they reached him, hit him, 1 Sam. xxxi. 8. See also 1 Kings xiii. 24. It is said of a man smitten by God, that he is no more found; he has disappeared. Comp. Psalm cxvii. 10; Job vii. 10; xx. 9. To find favor in the sight of any one, is an expressive form of speech common in Scripture.

FINGER. The finger of God denotes his power, his operation. Pharaoh's magicians discovered the finger of God in some of the miracles of Moses, Exodus viii. 19. That legislator gave the tables written with the finger of God to the Hebrews, Exod. xxxi. 18. The heavens were the work of God's fingers, Psalm viii. 3. Our Lord says, he casts out devils with the finger of God; meaning, perhaps, by his authority, Luke xi. 20. To put forth one's finger, is a contemptuous gesture. If they take away from the mouth of thee the chain or yoke wherewith thou overlavest them, and forbear pointing at them, and using jeering and insulting gestures, Isaiah lxxx. 8. Some take this for a menacing gesture, as Nicodemus stretched out his hand against the temple, threatening to burn it, 2 Macc. xiv. 33. FIR, an evergreen tree, of beautiful appearance, whose lofty height and dense foliage afford a spacious shelter and shade. It is worth observing, on the Heb. vr. serah, how contradictory the LXX. have rendered it, for want of established principles of natural history—cypris, fr. myrtle, juniper. The Chaldeans read fr. constantly; and it is likely this translator should be quite as well acquainted with the subject as any foreigner. The Hebrew word seems, however, to mean the cypris; or possibly an evergreen tree in general.

In 2 Sam. vi. 5, it is said, that "David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir-wood," &c. Mr. Taylor infers, that the word known in this passage, may express some instrument of music, rather than the wood of which such instrument was made; but with his usual candor, he gives the following passage from Dr. Burney's history of music: "This species of psaltery, with its accompanying harp, seems to have been preferred by the ancients, as well as the moderns, to every other kind, for the construction of musical instruments, particularly the bities of them, on which their tone chiefly depends. Those of the harp, lute, guitar, harpsichord, and violin, in present use, are constantly made of fir-wood."

I. FIRE is often a symbol of the Deity, Deut. iv. 24. He appeared to Moses, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John, in the midst of fire; the Psalmist describes his chariot as a flame, (Psalm xcvii. 9, 10,) and Daniel says (vii. 10,) that a fiery stream issued from before him. Fire is a common symbol of God's vengeance, also; and the effects of his wrath, as war, famine, and other scourges, are compared to fire. Fire from heaven fell on victims sacrificed to the Lord, as a mark of approbation; but when Abraham made a covenant with the Lord, a fire passed between the divided pieces of the sacrifices. This was probably the Shekinah.

A perpetual fire was kept up in the temple, on the altar of burnt-sacrifices, by burning wood continually on it. In addition to this fire, there were several kitchens in the temple, where the provisions of the priests and the peace-offerings were dressed.

The Son of God says, that he had brought fire on the earth, and desired nothing more than to have it kindled; (Luke xvi. 48,) that is, to subject the land of Judea to judgments, in consequence of its wicked-ness; part of which was already begun in the dominions of the Romans. The sword of this people would complete the punishment. He came to baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire, (Matt. iii. 11,) and to verify this prediction, the Holy Ghost descended on his disciples in the form of tongues of fire, Acts ii. 3.

Fire will one day consume this world, according to Peter, 2 Epist. iii. 7, 12. The heathen had some knowledge of this, whether they received it from the Hebrews, or from the sacred writings; from tradition, or from reasoning, and their knowledge of the elements and the actual state of the earth, we know not. Josephus speaks of an ancient tradition, that before the deluge the sons of Seth had learned from Adam that the world would be destroyed first by water, afterwards by fire. Herschel held, that all that it had passed through the flames, it would receive a new birth amidst the fire; the Stoics maintained the same; and Cicero particularly notices it in his book De Nat. Deorum, lib. ii.) as does Ovid, (Met. lib. i.)

The Chaldeans, Persians, and some other peoples of the East, adored fire; and there is a tradition that Abraham was thrown into a fire, because he refused to worship this element. See ZORASTER, ABRAHAM.

Few things are more shocking to humanity than the custom of which such frequent mention is made in Scripture, of making children pass through fire in honor of Moloch; a custom, the antiquity of which appears from its having been repeatedly forbidden by Moses, as Lev. xvi. 21, and at length, in chapter xx. 1—5, where the expressions are very strong, of "giving his seed to Moloch." This cruelty, one would hope, was confined to the strangers in Israel, and not adopted by any native Israelite; yet we afterwards find the kings of Israel themselves, practicing this superstition, and making their children pass through the fire.

There is a remarkable variation of terms in the history of Alain, who, in 2 Kings xvi. 4, is said to have "burnt his children in the fire." Now, as the book of Chronicles is last understood, being considered as a supplementary and explanatory history to the book of Kings, it is rather singular, that it uses by much the strongest word in this passage—for the import of בנה is, generally, to consume, to burn up, so Psal. lxxxiii. 14. "As the fire burnt a wood," so Isaiah i. 31, and this variation of expression is further heightened, by the word son (who passed through) being singular in Kings, but plural (sons) in Chronicles. It seems very natural to ask, "If he burnt his children in the fire, how could I bear my posterior to succeed him?"

The rabbins have histories of the manner of passing through the fires, or between the fires, or into coves of fire; and there is an account of an image, which received children into its arms, and let them sleep fire length, and the shouts of the multitude, the noise of drums, and other instruments, to drown the shrieks of the agonizing infant, and the horrors of the parent’s mind. Waving further allusion to that account, the following extract may afford a good idea, in what manner the passing through, or over, fire, was anciently performed; the attentive reader will notice the particulars.

“A still more astonishing instance of the superstition of the ancient Indians, in respect to the venerated fire, remains at this day in the grand annual festival held in honor of Darna Rajah, and called the Feast of Fire; in which, as in the ancient rites of Moloch, the devotees walk barefoot over a glowing fire, extending forty feet. It is called the feast of fire, because they then walk on that element. It lasts eighteen days, during which time, those that make a vow to keep it, must fast, abstain from women, lie on the bare ground, and walk on a brisk fire. The eighteenth day, they assemble, on the sound of instruments; their heads crowned with flowers, the body bedaubed with saffron, and follow in cadence the figures of Darna Rajah, and of Droboden, his wife, who are carried there in procession. When they come to the fire, they stir it, to animate its activity, and take a little of the ashes, with which they rub their forehead, and when the gods have been three times round it, they walk either fast or slow, according to their zeal, over a very hot fire, extending to about forty feet in length. Some carry their children in their arms, and others kiss, salute, and standards. The most fervent devotees walk several times over the fire. After the ceremony the people press to collect some of the ashes to rub their foreheads with, and obtain from the devotees some of the flowers with which they were adorned, and which they carefully preserve.”

(Somner’s Travels, vol. i. 154.) See Bala.

This extract is taken from Maurice’s “History of Hindostan,” (p. 448) and it accounts for several expressions used in Scripture: such as causing children (very young, perhaps) to pass through fire, as we see they are carried over the fire, by which means, though devoted, or consecrated, they were not destroyed; neither were they injured, except by being pricked with thorns. It might, however, happen, that some of those who thus passed, were hurt or maimed in the passing, or if not immediately slain by the fire, might be burned in this superstitious pilgrimage, in such a manner as to contract fatal disease. Perhaps, then, while some of the children of Ahaz passed safely over the fire, others were injured by it, and injured even to death? But this could not be the case with all of them: as beside Hezekiah, his successor, we read of “Manasseh, the king’s son,” 2 Chron. xxviii. 7.

[Similar rites are still practised by the Chinese devotees. The following account is from the journal of Mr. Abel, American missionary at Canton, under date of April 14th, 1831. “This afternoon we rode about six miles in the country and attended a Chinese ceremony, which reminded us of the rites of “Moloch, bloody king.” It occurs on the birthday of the Tao Gods, and is performed by running barefoot, through a heap of ignited charcoal. The fire covered a space of about 10 or 12 feet square, and was probably about 18 inches in height. It threw out a swelling heat, and kept the spectators at some distance. The concourse was large, and the crash of gongs almost deafening. When we arrived, we found two priests standing near the fire, earnestly combed a book, and performed various acts which its pages appeared to prompt. One of them held a cow’s horn in his hand, with which he occasionally assisted the noise. The other was more actively engaged in burning paper, making his obeisances, sprinkling water upon the heap, and striking it violently with a sword. During these ceremonies, he frequently bowed to the ground, and gazed upward, with an expression of most intense earnestness. There was something striking in the whole appearance and conduct of the man. It was very evident, that if not himself fully persuaded of the presence and power of the being he invoked, he well knew how to produce this persuasion in the minds of the ignorant around him.

“The prescribed rites being performed, the priest approached the pile, went through a number of antics, and dashed furiously through the coals. A passage was kept clear from the adjacent temple, and as soon as the signal was given by the priest, a number of persons, old and young, came running with idols in their hands, and bore them through the fire. Others followed, and among them an old man who halted and staggered in the very jaws of death. The scene was one of mad confusion, but its continuance was short, and the crowd soon dispersed. It is thought a test of the character of those who attempt it; if they have a “true heart” and confidence in the gods, they cannot receive injury. Some of them pass through the fire in fulfillment of a vow made in time of danger or necessity. One of the votaries last year fell in the midst of the fire, and was severely burned.” (Miss. Herald for 1832, p. 97.) “R.

“Humanity would induce us to hope that the expression “burned,” should be taken in a milder sense than that of slaying by fire; and, perhaps, this idea may be justified, by remarking the use of it in Exod. iii. 2, “The bush burned (ဆွဲ ဗျှ) with fire, yet the bush was not consumed (ချှိ ဗျှိ).” The word, therefore, being capable of a milder, as well as of a stronger sense, like our English word, to burn, it is desirable, if fact would permit, to take it in the milder sense in the instance of Ahaz, and possibly in others.

Nevertheless, the Indian custom of widows burning themselves to death with the body of their deceased husbans, is probably derived from the use of the word or test of the word to burn; as the superstitious cruelty which can deprive women of life, may easily be thought guilty of equal barbarity in the case of children. In fact, the drowning of children in the Ganges, as we have seen, that while some of the children of Ahaz passed safely over the fire, others were injured by it, and injured even to death. But this could not be the case with all of them: as beside Hezekiah, his successor, we read of “Manasseh, the king’s son,” 2 Chron. xxviii. 7.

The narrative of Daniel and his three companions being thrown into the fiery furnace, by order of Nebuchadnezzar, (Dan. iii.) has been thought to involve some difficulties; indeed Elienhorn selects this, among other reasons, for divesting Daniel of the prophetic character. The difficulty in the narrative, however, results, it is more than probable, from our want of information as to the form of the furnace, or place of fire, in which the memorable occurrence took place. An enclosed structure, similar to our ovens or furnaces, is certainly incompatible with some of the circumstances attendant upon the event; but we are not compelled to adhere to this notion. Maundrell discovered, in Syria, near Tortosa, a singular structure, which was no doubt a temple of the Phoenician and Chaldean idol, Baal, or the sun, whose representative was fire, and which may be very fairly supposed to represent, on a small scale, the temple or court in which Nebuchadnezzar erected his image, and in which the flames were kindled for the Hebrew confession. There was a court of fifty-five yards square, but in the natural rock; the sides of the rock standing round it, about three yards high, supplied the place of walls. On three sides it was thus encompassed, but to the northward it lay open. In the centre of this area was a square part of the rock left standing; being three yards high, and five yards and a half square. This served for a pedestal to a throne erected upon it. The throne was composed of four large stones, two at the sides, one at the back, another hanging over all at top, in the manner of a canos. The whole structure was about twenty feet high, fronting toward that side where the court was open. The stone that made the canopy was five yards and three quarters square, and carved round with a hand-some cornish. What all this might be designed for, we cannot imagine; unless perhaps the court may pass for an idol temple, and the pile in the middle for the throne of the idol; which seems the more probable, in regard that Hercules, that is, the sun, the great abomination of the Phoenicians, was wont to be adored in an open temple. At the two innermost angles of the court, and likewise on the open side, were left pillars of the natural rock; three of each at the former, and two at the latter. (Journal, Sunday, March 7.)

The account of the apocryphal writer of the history of this miracle says, that "the angel of the Lord descended, and smote the flame of fire out of the furnace, (or place of fire,) and made the middle of the furnace as if a moist, dewy, whistling wind" were passing over it. Admitting this passage of wind over it, it could not be a close building; and this seems to be finally determined by the recollection, that Nebuchadnezzar saw what occurred within it; which was absolutely impossible, if the furnace were closed like our tile-kilns; but, supposing it to be open, like the place of fire in our engraving, he might easily contemplate every occurrence of which it was the scene.

This notion of an open furnace, or place of fire, appears, then, to be of some consequence to the proper understanding of the history. It is more congenial with the customs of the country, the idolatry of the people, and the supposed dignity of the occasion. It leads us also to infer, that the transaction passed in the very sight, so to speak, of the golden image, in defiance of its influence and power, which, no doubt, were presumed to be most vigorous, most concentrated, within the precincts of its own immediate residence: yet here, where most competent to exertion, it was baffled, counteracted, and defeated.

There is no just reason for doubting, as Mr. Taylor supposes, from whom we have abridged these observations, that the open temple, mentioned by Maundrell, being in the country of Tyre and Sidon, were used for the worship of the Tyrian Hercules, the Baal of the East; that is, the sun, whose representative on earth was elementary fire. (But see under Baal.) This element, we know, was the primary deity of Chaldees, and the chief object of their veneration, and all others, because he was able to consume their representations, whether in wood, stone, or metal. The identity of these deities was maintained by the Tyrians also; hence we read, that to prevent his descent from their city, they claimed the statue of Hercules in the sacred grove of Apollo. If, then, the deity of the Chaldeans was also the deity of the Tyrians, doubtless the rites of his worship were similar in both countries; and since we find an open court in Syria when remaining, it takes off the difficulty (if any were supposed) in considering an open court as the scene of religious rites addressed to the same deity in Chaldees.

It is probable enough that the history of the fiery furnace is much more intelligible in the East than among ourselves; that the publicity of this execution would there be better understood; that the contest between (Baal) the deity fire, and Jehovah, would there excite not merely the liveliest interest throughout the nation, but that the result of it would produce the most general confusion on one side, and the most vehement joy on the other; also, that, when the Chaldeans saw their national deity vanquished, not by another element, as water, of which we have a history, but by protecting, preserving power independently its superior, their perplexity would be extreme; and they would feel their embarrassment with all the tenderness of eastern sympathy, and the exquisite sensibility of eastern imagination.

There are among the eastern people, as already noticed, traditions of a similar trial of Abraham by Nimrod, and a similar deliverance. They might confirm our remarks; but for the present we draw no other conclusion, than that of the open construction of the Chaldean place of fire: that the Saviour was transaction as a kind of sacrifice to the deity, and in the immediate presence of his consecrated image.

Hell-fire is clearly described in the Old Testament. Moses says, "A fire is kindled in my anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains." Here hell-fire or the place of torment is placed in the deepest parts of the earth. Isaiah, 14th, 15th, says, "Where shall we dwell with devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" Our Saviour speaks of eternal fire prepared for the devil, his angels, and reprobates; and John (Rev. xx. 14, 15.) saw a lake of fire, into which the beast and his false prophet were cast, and which was the portion of infidels, murderers, and abominable persons. But whether these expressions are to be understood literally or metaphorically; that is, whether the fire of hell consists only in vehement anguish, and the worm in remorse and despair, is what critics and fathers are much divided about. Origen, Ambrose, Jerome, Gregory of Nice, and John Damascenus, say expressly, that it is not a material fire, but that the fire is bitterness for past sins, and the worm remorse of conscience; a sentiment still common among the Greeks. But in the Latin church, the general opinion is, that the damned are tormented with real fire, and gnawed by a real worm, which does not die. If it be asked, How can an elemental fire, or a living worm operate on the soul, which is a spiritual substance? Augustin replies, Why should not this be credible of the soul when separated from the body, since the mind of man, which certainly is not corporeal, does actually experience the pain of fire? For, after all, it is not the body which suffers heat, or cold, or pain; it is the soul, united to that body. And why should not devils, and the souls of the damned, be inseparably linked to the fire that burns them, and the worm which gnaws them, as well as our soul during our life-time united to our body? It has been thought, that there is an allusion in Isaiah lxvi. 24, and Mark ix. 44, to different modes of consuming dead bodies among the ancients;—by burning, and by burial; and, d. "the punishment which is in the future state will not become extinct, as fire must needs be extinguished when the subject of it, that is, the body, is consumed; nor will they cease to exist, as the body cannot, when the soul is separated from it, perish the earth, or wholly consumed by worms, which worm the spirit survives, so its punishments shall continue." This interpretation implies that the punishments spoken of are wholly spiritual and eternal, existing independently of a body.

FIRMAMENT. Moses says, that God made a firmament in the midst of the waters to separate the inferior from the superior waters. By the word γαλαξία, the Hebrews understood the heavens, which, like a solid and impenetrable arch, served as a barrier between the upper and lower waters, having windows through which, when opened, the upper waters descended and formed the rain. But we are not to infer from this idea of the ancient Hebrews, that it really was so; in matters indifferent, the sacred writers generally suit their expressions to popular conceptions.

FIRST. This word does not always signify priority of rank, or order, but sometimes before that, as—John i. 15, 30. Gr. "He was before me; he was before me. And chap. xv. 18. "If the world hate you, ye know it hated me before it hated you," &c. Our Saviour required his disciples to "seek first the kingdom of God," i.e. before all things else. (Matt. xix. 33) and Paul says, that God displayed his mercy towards him, "who was the chief [first] of sinners," and that in him first [eminently, wonderfully] "he showed forth all long-suffering," 1 Tim. i. 13, 16.

FIRST-BORN. This phrase is not always to be understood literally; it is sometimes taken for the prime, most excellent, most distinguished of things. Thus, "Jesus Christ is "the first-born of every creature, the first-begotten, or first-born from the dead, who is "the Son of God," Col. i. 15. Or, "before all things, the most precious, the most magnificent, the most terrible of deaths. After the destroying angel had killed the first-born of the Egyptians, God ordained that all the Jewish first-born, both of men, and of beasts for service, should be consecrated to him; but the male children only were subject to this law. If a man had many wives, he was obliged to offer the first-born son by each one of them to the Lord. The first-born were offered at the temple, and redeemed for five shekels. The firstling of a clean beast was offered at the temple, not to be redeemed, but to be killed; an unclean beast, a horse, an ass, or a camel, was either redeemed or exchanged; an ass was redeemed by a lamb, or five shekels; if not redeemed, it was killed. Commentators hold that the first-born of dogs were killed, because they were unclean; and that nothing was given for them to the priests, because there was no trade or commerce in them. See Deut. xxii. 18.

It has been questioned whether our Saviour, as first-born of the Virgin, was subject to this law. Some believe that he was not; others, that by the terms of the law he was.

The ceremonies of the Jews for the redemption of their first-born, are as follows: If the child be a boy, when he is thirty days old, a descendant of Aaron is sent for, who is most agreeable to the father; and the company being met, the father brings gold or silver in a cup or basin. The child is then put into the priest's hands, who asks the mother aloud, whether this boy is hers. She answers, Yes. He adds, "Is this child male or female; no untimely birth, or miscarriage?" She answers, No. "If so," says the priest, "this child, as the first-born, belongs to me." Then turning to the father, he says, "If you desire to have him, you must redeem him." This is the usual form in which the priest replies the father, "is offered to you for that purpose only." The priest, turning to the assembly, says, "This child, as the first-born, is therefore mine, according to this law,—those who are to be redeemed from a monitory, and who really possess any means of estimation, for the money of five shekels." &c. "But I am content with this in exchange." He then takes two gold crowns, or thereabouts, and restores the infant. If the father or mother are of the race of priests, or of an address, they do not redeem their son. The first-born among the Hebrews, as among all other nations, enjoyed particular privileges. See BIRTH-RIGHT.

In addition to the first-born of men and beasts which were offered to the Lord, or were redeemed by money, there was another kind of first-born, which were carried to the temple, in order to furnish the table for beasts of charity. Of this kind was the_harvest, Deut. xix, 13. "Thou mayest not eat within thy gates the tithe of thy corn or wine, or the firstlings of thy herds, or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows . . . but thou must eat these things before the Lord thy God in the place which the Lord shall choose, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, thy man-servant and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates." And again Deut. xii. 18. (See below.)

FIRST-FRUCTS were presents made to God, of the first fruits and the firstborn of the land, and of the firstfruits of all the increase of the nation, before the entrance of any creature was produced; the first who rose from the dead by his own power. Wisdom says, that she came out of the mouth of the Most High before he had produced any creature. Eccles. xxiv. 3; Isa. xiv. 30. "The first-born of the poor," signifies the most miserable of the poor; Job xviii. 13. "the first-born of death," the most terrible of deaths. After the destroying angel had killed the first-born of the Egyptians, God ordained that all the Jewish first-born, both of men, and of beasts for service, should be consecrated to him; but the male children only were subject to this law. If a man had many wives, he was obliged to offer the first-born son by each one of them to the Lord. The first-born were offered at the temple, and redeemed for five shekels. The firstling of a clean beast was offered at the temple, not to be redeemed, but to be killed; an unclean beast, a horse, an ass, or a camel, was either redeemed or exchanged; an ass was redeemed by a lamb, or five shekels; if not redeemed, it was killed. Commentators hold the priests that evening at supper, with the other offerings; and that all were to be eaten that day where they were offered. To these first-fruits, every private person was obliged to bring his first-fruits to the temple; but Scripture prescribes neither the time nor the quantity. The rabbins say, they were obliged to bring at least the sixtieth part of their fruits and harvest. The most liberal gave the fortieth, the least liberal, the fiftieth or sixtieth. They met in companies of four and twenty persons, to carry their first-fruits in a ceremonious manner. The company was preceded by an ox appointed for the sacrifice, with a crown of olives on his head, and his horns gilded; and a player on the flute walked before them to Jerusalem. The first-fruits were of wheat, barley, grapes, figs, apricots, olives, and dates. Each carried his basket. The rich had gold or silver, (Prov. xxvi. 11, "a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold, in pictures of silver," &c. perhaps of first-fruits carried in baskets of figleaf-work, on such a joyful occasion,) the poor had wicker baskets. At Jerusalem, the citizens came out to meet and salute them. When they arrived at the mountain on which the temple was situated, each one, even the king himself, if he were there, took his basket on his shoulder, and carried it to the court of the priests; the Levites singing, "I will magnify thee, O Lord," &c. Psal. xxx. He who brought the first-fruits, said, "I profess this day unto the Lord thy God, that I am come unto the country, which the Lord sware unto our fathers for to give us?" (Deut. xxvi. 4, 5, &c.) and then putting the basket on his hand, (the priest supporting it at the bottom,) he continued—"A Syrian ready to perish was my father," &c. He then put his basket by the side of the altar, prostrated himself, and went away.

There was besides this, another sort of first-fruits paid to God, Num. xvi. 19, 21. When the bread in the family was kneaded, a portion of it was set apart, and given to the priest, or Levite, of the place: if there were no priest, or Levite, it was cast into the oven and there consumed. The law had not fixed the quantity of this bread; but Jerome says, that custom and tradition had determined it to be between the fortieth and sixtieth part of what was kneaded. Philo speaks of this custom; and Leo of Modena declares, it was observed in his time. This is one of the offerings which was called for, because they generally make the bread. The rabbins hold that no one is obliged to pay the first-fruits, excepting in the Land of Promise.

These offerings are often called first-fruits, which were brought by the Israelites from devotion, to the temple, for the feasts of thanksgiving, to which they invited their relations and friends, and the Levites of their cities. The first-fruits and tenths were the most considerable revenue of the priests and Levites.

Paul says, Christians have the first-fruits of the Holy Spirit, a greater abundance of God's Spirit, more perfect and more excellent gifts than the Jews. "Christ is risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that sleep," (1 Cor. xv. 20,) the first-born from the dead, or the first-born of those who rose again: the Thessalonians were, as it were, the first-fruits whom God had chosen to salvation; (1 Thess. ii. 12,) chosen with a particular distinction, as first-fruits were chosen from amidst the most exquisite of the several fruits, with a design of offering them to the Lord.

FISH, 1736, dag, a general name in Scripture for aquatic animals, which the Hebrews place among reptiles. We have few Hebrew names, if any, for particular fish. Moses says in general, (Lev. xi. 9,) that all sorts of reptiles may be eaten if they have scales and fins; others are uncertain.

Some interpreters believe that the fish which swallowed Jonah was a whale; but others, with more probability, suppose that it was a shark.

FISHERS are frequently spoken of by the prophets, in their metaphysical discourses. A passage or two requires notice. Jeremiah says, (ch. xvi. 16,) "Behold, I will send for many (כַּנָּה, דַּנָּהוּ) fishers, and they shall (כָּבְדִּים, בֶּשָּׁם) fish them; and after, I will send for many hunters, and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks." Mr. Taylor thinks this would be more correct, if understood thus,—"I will send divers who shall dive after them, or, take them by wading, diving, plunging, following them among the holes and caverns of the rocks, and bringing them from thence.” For it should seem, he remarks, that the hunting associated with this fishing, being an active pursuit, demands more than mere angling, or fishing with nets, standing on land among holes of the rocks are nets of use; but diving is an active pursuit by water, as hunting is by land, and seems to maintain the requisite association of import in this passage. Diving for pearls was (and is) practised in the East; and, that diving is practised as one way of taking fish, is strongly implied in the subsequent quotation from Nebiwhr.

There is no reason whatever for taking the word fisher out of its usual sense,—nothing can be more appropriate than its being employed along with hunters as above. Still, a diver might, by possibility, be included under it, as it is in English. R.

Is this the allusion of the prophet Ezekiel, (chap. xlvii. 10,) "And fishers shall stand upon it, from Engedi to Eden-glaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets?" Such is our translation; but, reading with the keri (יָכְּד, אֲדֹנֶה) shall gather, instead of (יָכְּד, אֲדֹנֶה) shall stand, the words may be rendered thus: "And divers shall gather upon its banks; and from the kid's fountain to the calves' fountain, shall be the extent of separations." But what does this mean? Mr. Taylor suggests, "They shall gather into heaps, (the word signifies to compress close together,) as pearl oysters are gathered into distinct hillocks; and the ground under the hill is covered by the sand and shells which, shall be from En-gedi, the kid's fountain, to En-eglaim, the calves' fountain." The prophet goes on to say, this river shall also have all other kinds of fish, in the same number and variety as the ocean itself. If this be the import of the place, then divers, or those who use and pierce as those used by divers to strike at the fish which they pursue.—By this rendering, he observes, the idea of driving forward cattle is preserved throughout the passage; and the change of meta-

FLAG. There are two words in the original, νεκρός and σπύς, translated "dead" in our Bible, though not uniformly so; for in Gen. xli. 2, 18, the former word is rendered meneō, and in Jonah ii. 5, the latter is translated weeds. It probably denotes the sedge or long grass, which grows in the meadows of the Nile, very grateful to the cattle. The former is from Dr. Harris. Jerome, in his Hebrew questions or traditions on Genesis, writes,

"Αχι neque Graecus sermo est, nec Latinus, sed et Hebraeus ipse corruptus est."

The Hebrew שָׁאֹר (ṣawr) and סְפָּר (spār) being like one another, and differing only in length; the LXX interpreters, he observes, wrote ws, achi for ws, achi; and according to their usual custom, put the Greek χιλιάρες γιγαντεύοντας, quid hic sermo significaret, audivi ab Αἰγυπτίων hoc nomine linguae eorum omne, quod in palude viridem masticatur.

We have no radios," says the learned Chappelov,

"for ws, unless we derive it, as Schultens does, from the Arabic achi, to bind or join together." Thus it may be defined "a species of plant, sedge, or reed, so called from its fitness for making ropes, or the like, to connect or join things together; as the Latin "juncus," a bulrush, a jungendo, from joining, for the same reason;" and some suppose that it is the plant, or reed, growing near the Nile, which Hesselephus describes as having numerous narrow leaves, and growing about eleven feet high; of the leaves of which the Egyptians make ropes. It should, however, be observed, that the LXX, in Job viii. 11, render butomos which Hesychius explains as "a plant on which cattle are fed, like to grass;" and Suidas, as "a sort of reed, on which oxen feed;"

These explanations are remarkable, because we read,

Gen. xli. 3, that the fat kine of Pharaoh fed in a meadow, says our translation, on achi in the original. This leads us to wish for information on what aquatic plants the Egyptian cattle feed; which, no doubt, would lead us to the achi of these passages.

The word νεκρός, is considered by Aben Ezra to be "a reed growing on the borders of the river." Bochart, Fuller, Rivetus, Ludolphus, and Junius and Tremellius, joined by the Latins, call it Νιλός, and by the Latins nīlēs, nīlēga. Ausonius says the gith is "pungent as pepper, and Pliny adds, that it is good for seasoning food." He also states it to be of great use in the bakehouse, and that it affords a grateful seasoning to bread; perhaps by sprinkling upon it, as we do caraway and other small seeds. Some think the gith to have been the same as our fennel, and Ballester is quoted as saying

"gith is commonly met with in garden; it grows a cubit in height, sometimes more. The leaves are small, like those of fennel, the flower blue, which disappearing, the every shows itself on the top, like those of a poppy, furnished with little horns, oblong, divided by membranes into several partitions and cells, in which are enclosed seeds of a very black color, not unlike those of a leek, but very fragrant. But the circumstance of Ballester comparing the gith to the fennel is decisive against the notion that it was this particular plant. That it classes with the fennel may be readily admitted; but not that, it was the same.

FLAGON. In Cant. ii. 5, the bride says,

"Stay me with flagons; comfort me with apples." Some kind of fruit would seem to be intended here by flagons, in order to parallel the following versicle,

"comfort me with apples!" for as the latter is a fruit, it seems necessary that the former should be a fruit also. And as these apples are a round fruit, something of the melon kind may be intended, as extremely refreshing, sweet, and juicy; which seems to be the ideas included,—whether an apple, or a citron be theellow-fruit referred to. As one kind of gourd is by us called flagon, so might another kind, but of a similar genus, be formerly called. The word occurs here without the insertion "of wine," but in Hoshea
FLAX, a well known plant, upon which the industry of mankind has been exercised with the greatest success and utility. Moses speaks of the flax in Egypt, (Exod. ix. 31.) which country has been celebrated, from time immemorial, for its production and manufacture. The "fine linen of Egypt," which was manufactured at the Nile, is spoken of for its superior excellence, in Scripture, Prov. vii. 16; Ezek. xxvii. 7. It was under the stalks of this plant that Rahab hid the spies, Josh. ii. 6. In predicting the gentleness, caution, and tenderness, with which the Messiah should manage his administration, Isaiah (xiii. 3.) happily illustrates it by a proverb, "The bruised reed he shall not break, and the smoking flax he shall not quench."—He shall not break even a bruised reed, which snare ascends immediately, when pressed with any considerable weight; nor shall he extinguish even the smoking flax, or the wick of a lamp, which, when it first begins to kindle, is put out by every little motion. This is quoted in Matt. xii. 20, where, by an easy metonymy, the material for the thing made, flax, is used for the wick of a lamp or taper; and that, by a synecdoche, for the lamp or taper itself, which, when near going out, yields more smoke than light. He will not put out or extinguish the dying lamp.

FLUSHING, a word of the nunnery, for the substance which comprises bodies, whether of men or animals, Gen. vi. 13. The word flesh is also used to denote a principle opposite to the spirit: "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these two are in conflict with each other," ver. 16. "Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh," ver. 16. To crucify the flesh with its lusts; not to fulfill the desires of the flesh; the wisdom of the flesh, &c. are expressions which require no explanation. "We are thy flesh and thy bone," "We are thy flesh and thy bone," are familiar expressions to denote kindred and relationship, Gen. xxix. 14; xxxvii. 27.

The wise man says, that the flesh of the invertebrate is consumed by innumerable diseases, Prov. v. 11. See also Ecclus. v. 6. Ecclusanitis requires a prudent man to separate his flesh from a prostitute, chap. xxv. 26. In 2 Peter ii. 10, we read of "those who walk after the flesh, in the lust of uncleanness;" and in Jude 8, of "going after strange flesh." In both places reference is expressed to the vile practices of the Sodomites. In 2 Pet. ii. 7, we read of "the filthy conversation of the wicked;" and also of their "unlawful deeds," ver. 8. The intention of the sacred writers is clear; though veiled for the sake of decorum in a general term.

"Oh that we had been watchmen in red rust," said Job's enemies, even his domestics, in his affliction, chap. xxxii. 31. They would have eaten him up alive, says Calmet; thus they repaid with ingratitude his services to them. But Job seems rather to describe his former condition, as having been so honorable, that what ever was placed on his table was longed for as the most desirable of its kind. So Rosenmüller: "Did not my domestics say, Who is there that is not filled with his banquet?" The Psalmist says, The wicked, even mine enemies, came upon me to eat up my flesh, Ps. xxvii. 2. Wisdom (xii. 5) reproaches the Canaanites with devouring man's flesh; and Jermiah threatens the inhabitants of Jerusalem that they should be constrained to eat the flesh of their friends and children. See also Lam. ii. 20; Jer. x. 10; and Ezek. v. 10. Josephus relates an instance of this during the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans.

The revolting custom of eating human flesh is still common in many islands of the eastern seas. Some eat their parents when they are old; others eat Europeans, when they can seize them. The Fugazz sold human flesh publicly. In Whidah, also, it is said that human flesh is sold as food.

FLOOD, see DELUGE.

FLORIS, G. the last procurator of Judea, succeeded Albinus in the government, A. D. 64. His excesses exasperated the Jews beyond patience, and forced them to rebel against the Romans, A. D. 65. He is thought to have left Judea, when Vesuvius went there, A. D. 67.

FLOUR, see BREAD, CAKES, OFFERINGS, &c.

FLUTE, a musical instrument, sometimes mentioned in Scripture by the names Chali, Machalah, Masekoth, and Uggab. The last word is generally translated organs; but Calmet thinks it was nothing worse than a flute; though his description of it corresponds to "the Pandean pipes," which are extremely ancient, and were perhaps the original organ.

There is notice taken in the Gospels, of players on the flute, (Eng. trans. tinismada,) who were collected at funerals. See Matt. ix. 24, 34. The rabbins say, that it was not allowable to have less than two players on the flute, at the funeral of persons of the meanest condition, besides a professional woman hired to lament; and Josephus relates, that a false report of his death being spread at Jerusalem, several persons hired players on the flute, by way of preparation for his funeral. In the Old Testament, however, we see nothing like it. The Jews probably borrowed the custom from the Romans. When it was an old woman who died, they used trumpets; but flutes when a young woman was to be buried.

FLY, an insect well known; in the law, declared to be unclean, Lev. xi. 22. The Philistines and Canaanites adored a god of flies, under the name of Beezelzub. Wisdom xii. 8.

The Hebrew language has at least two words for flies: the first is arb, (Exod. viii. 21; Psal. lxxiii. 45; cv. 31.) which the Seventy interpreters, sitting on the spot, have had the best opportunity of identifying, have rendered the dor; fly; the Zimb of Abyssinia. Others suppose it to be the cockroach, an insect very common in the East. Another word for a fly is, jebab, (Eccles. x. 2.) which some have conjectured might be the "great blue-bottle fly," or flesh-fly. Barbut says, (p. 236.) "This is one of the numerous classes of insects. Variety runs through their forms, their structure, their organization, their metamorphoses, their manner of living, propagating their species, and providing for their posterity. Every species is furnished with implements adapted to its exigences. What constitutes this what proportion in the several parts which compose the body of a fly! What precision, what mechanism in the springs and motion!—Some are oviparous, others viviparous; which latter have but two young ones at a time, whereas the propagation of the former is by hundreds. Flies are lascivious, troublesome insects, that put up with every kind of food. When storms impend, they have most activity, and sting with greatest force. They multiply most in hot, moist climates; and so great was formerly their numbers in Spain, that there were fly-hunters commissioned to give them chase."

Schindler, in his Lexicon, considers the Hebrew word zeboi, with its Chaldean and Arabic cognates, as including the whole of winged insects: coelis, the gnat; ceespa, the wasp; estrum, the god-fly; and crabo, the hornet: this certainly implies the inclusion of true flies, generally; a species well known to be sufficiently numerous. Moreover, that word should hardly be restricted to a single species of fly, may be inferred from the pun employed in playing on the appellation of the deity Beelzebub, "Lord of flies," to convert it into Beelzebul, "Lord of the dunghill!"—alluding probably to the disposition of certain kinds of flies, which roll themselves and their eggs in the filth of such places; so that the change of name has a reference, a degrading reference, to the manners of the symbol of this deity, including, no doubt, a sarcastic sneer at those of his worshippers. The general import of this word may be further argued from what Pliny tells us (lib. x. cap. 18) concerning the deity Achorem, from the Greek achor, which may be from the Hebrew Ekeron or Akeron, the city where Beelzebub, the "Lord of flies," was worshipped. "The inhabitants of Cyrene," he says, "invoke the assistance of the god Achorem, when the multitude of flies produces a pestilence; but when they have placated that deity by their offerings, the flies perish immediately." Whether only one species of fly pestered the Cyreniacum does not appear.

The following description of the Zimb, the Ethiopian fly (zeboi) mentioned by the prophet Isaiah, (chap. vii. 18), is furnished by Mr. Bruce. "This insect is called Zomb; it has not been described by any naturalist. It is, in size, very little larger than a bee, of a thicker proportion, and has wings, which are broader than those of a bee, placed separate, like those of a fly; they are of pure gauze, without color or spot upon them; the head is large, the upper jaw or lip is sharp, and has at the end of it a strong pointed hair, of about a quarter of an inch long; the lower jaw has two of these pointed hairs; and this pencil of hairs, when joined together, makes a resistance to the finger, nearly equal to that of a strong hog's bristle. Its legs are serrated on the inside, and the whole covered with brown hair or down. As soon as this plague appears, and their buzzing is heard, all the cattle forsake their food, and run wildly about the plain, till they die, worn out with fatigue, fright, and hunger. No remedy remains, but to leave the black earth, and hasten down to the sands of Abbara; and there they remain, while the rains last, this cruel enemy never daring to pursue them further.

With his size in immensity, as is his strength, and his body covered with a thick skin, defended with strong hair, yet even the camel is not able to sustain the violent punctures the fly makes with his pointed proboscis. He must lose no time in removing to the sands of Abbara; for, when once attacked by this their enemy, they cannot shift to desert and dry places, as the season may require, are obliged to roll themselves in mud and mire; which, when dry, coats them over like armor, and enables them to stand their ground against this winged assassin: yet I have found some of these taberecles upon almost every elephant and rhinoceros that I have seen, and attribute them to this cause.

"All the inhabitants of the sea-coast of Melinda, down to Cape Gardehan, to Saba, and the south coast of the Red sea, are obliged to put themselves in motion, and remove to the next sand, in the beginning of the rainy season, to prevent all their stock of cattle from being destroyed. This is not a partial emigration; the inhabitants of all the countries, from the mountains of Abyssinia northward, to the confines of the Nile, and Astaboras, are once a year obliged to change their abode, and seek protection on the sands of Beja; nor is there any alternative, or means of avoiding this, though a hostile band was in their way, capable of spoiling them of half their substance.

"Of all those that have written upon these countries, the prophet Isaiah alone has given an account of this animal, and the manner of its operation, Isa. vii. 18, 19: And it shall come to pass, in that day, that the Lord shall kiss for the fly that is in the utmost part of the rivers of Egypt. And they shall come, and shall rest all of them in the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks, and upon all thorns, and upon all bushes."—That is, they shall cut off from the cattle their usual retreat to the desert, by taking possession of those places, and meeting them there, where ordinarily they never come, and which, therefore, were the refuge of the cattle.

"We cannot read the history of the plagues which God brought upon Pharaoh by the hands of Moses, without stopping a moment to consider a singularity, a very principal one, which attended this plague of the fly [Exod. vii. 21, &c.]. It was not till this time, and by means of God said, that they should separate his people from the Egyptians. And it would seem that then a law was given to them, that fixed the limits of their habitation. It is well known, as I have repeatedly said, that the land of Goshen or Goshen, the possession of the Israelites, was a land of pasture, which was not tilled or sown, because it was not overflowed by the Nile. But the land overflowed by the Nile was the black earth of the valley of Egypt, and it was there that God confined the flies: for, he says, it shall be a sign of this separation of the people, which he had then made, that not one fly should be seen in the sand, or pasture-ground, the land of Goshen; and this kind of soil has ever since been the refuge of all cattle, emigrating from the black earth, to the lower part of Africa. Isaiah, indeed, says, that the fly shall be in all the desert places, and, consequently, the sands; yet this was a particular dispensation of Providence, to a special end, the desolation of Egypt, and was not a repeal of the general law, but a confirmation of it; it was an exception for a particular purpose, and a limited time."
"I have already said so much on this subject, that it would be tiring my reader's patience, to repeat any thing concerning him; I shall, therefore, content myself by giving a very accurate design of him, only observing that, for distinctness sake, I have magnified him a little, and represented him in the natural size. He has no sting, though he seems to me to be rather of the bee kind; but his motion is more rapid and sudden than that of the bee, and resembles that of the gad-fly in England. There is something particular in the sound or buzzing of this insect. It is a jarring noise, together with a humming; which induces me to believe it proceeds, at least in part, from a vibration made with the three hairs at his snout.

The Chaldee version is content with calling this animal simply zebab, which signifies the fly in general, as we express it in English. The Arabs call it zimzab in their translation, which has the same general signification. The Ethiopic translation calls it tsalzango, which is the true name of this particular fly in Geez, and was the same in Hebrew." (Bruce's Travels, vol. i. p. 5; vol. v. p. 191.)

Thus, at length, we have the true signification of a word which has embarrased translators and commentators, during two thousand years. The reason is evident: the subject of it did not exist nearer than Ethiopia;—and who knew that it existed there? or who would go there to inspect it? What shall we say now to the difficulties in Scripture?—are there any, distinct from our own want of information respecting them?

FOOL and FOLLY, in Scripture, signify not only, according to the literal meaning, an idiot, or one whose senses are disordered; the discourses and notions of fools and madmen; but also, and particularly sins of impurity, Psal. xxxviii. 5; 2 Sam. xiii. 12, 13.

The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, 1 Cor. i. 20, 21; iii. 18, 19. The character of fool, as well as the attribute folly, seems to be used in the Proverbs in more than one sense; sometimes it seems to mean lack of understanding, and sometimes perverseness of will. Mr. Taylor supposes that a companionized picture of Wisdom and Folly is included in the description presented in the ninth chapter of the Proverbs. He thinks that the former verses of the chapter contain a description of Wisdom personified of her actions, conduct, and behavior; and that from verse 13 to 18 contains a description of Folly, similarly personified; who mimics the actions, conduct, and behavior of Wisdom; and so closely mimics them, that a person who will not exercise deliberation and reflection, would as readily be persuaded to follow the false, the impostious goddess Folly, as to obey the true, the genuine power of Divine Wisdom herself. That such personification is common in the Proverbs, and in Ecclesiastes, must be evident to every reader.

This idea may open the way also, he thinks, to a true construction and correction of the passage, which, as it stands at present, is obscure; and, as some think, corrupted. The LXX read, verse 13. "A foolish and brazen-faced woman, she comes to want a piece of bread; she has no shame;" the Chaldee reads, "she has no goodness." Some have supposed that the word (mava) simplicity is redundant; but if any word be redundant, it was probably the first word, "a woman," in which case, as the nouns are of the feminine gender, and imply a woman, without that distinctive description, the import of the passage would stand thus:

"Simplicity is foolish and clamorous;" or, "Folly is clamorous—simplicity itself!" that is, extremely simple; and drives away knowledge of any valuable kind from her. Yet she sits at the door of her house, and imitates the actions of Wisdom; as appears by comparing these two personages, and their addresses, to those who need instruction.

WISDOM.

Wisdom hath built her house,
She hath hewn out her numerous ornamental pillars,
She hath killed her beasts,
She hath mingled her wine;
She hath furnished her table;
She hath sent forth her maidens;
She crieth on the highest places of the city.

"Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither;"

To him who wanteth understanding, she saith,
"Come, eat of my bread,
And drink of the wine I have mingled,
Forsake the foolish and live,
And go in the way of Understanding;
For by my thy days shall be multiplied,
And the years of thy life shall be many."

Thus Folly assumes the counterpart of Wisdom, and invites no less generally; but her invitation is easily detected by due consideration, being very different from that of real wisdom. The consequences of following the counsel of these contrasted personages are very strongly marked, and are diametrically opposite; one tending to prolonged life, the other to premature and violent dissolution. It appears by the reference to the fatal ends of her guests, that the gratification of illicit passion is what Folly intends by "stolen waters," and "secret bread:" this is the utmost enjoyment she offers, and this enjoyment terminates in death! a description how applicable to great numbers of unhappy youth among us! Compare Flesh.

FOOT. By this word the Hebrews modestly express those parts which decency forbids us to name; e. g. "the water of the feet," urine. "To cover the feet," to dismiss the refuse of nature. "The hair of the feet," of the pubes. "Withhold thy foot from being shod, and thy throat from thine;" (Jer. ii. 2), i.e. do not prostitute yourselves, as you have done, to strange people. Ezek. xvi. 25. "Thou hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by." Feet, in the sacred writers, often mean inclinations, affections, propensities, actions, motions. "Guide my feet in thy paths; keep thy feet at a distance from evil; let none seduce thee with empty words. Unless thou do so, in the day of judgment, thy feet shall be like those of a swan, which goeth down to death by the waters. And if thou goest not, 'Let not the feet of pride come upon me,' &c. (Prov. vi. 13.) i. e. he uses much gesture with his hands and feet while talking, which the ancient sages blamed. Ezekiel (xxxv. 6) reproaches the Ammonites with clapping their hands and stamping with their feet in token of joy on seeing the desolation of Jerusalem. He also describes similar motions as signs of grief, because of the ruin of his people, chap. vi. 11. To be at any one's feet, is used for obeying him; being in his service, following him, 1 Sam. xxxv. 27. Moses says, that "the Lord loved his people, and those that sat down at his feet," who heard him, who belonged to him, who were instructed in his doctrine (his pupils). Paul says, he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel (as his scholar). Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, and heard his word. Jacob said to Laban, (Gen. xxx. 30.) "The Lord hath blessed thee at my feet," which Jerome translates ad introitum meas, even since I came to you, and undertook the conduct of your flocks. To be under any one's feet, to be a footstool to him, signifies the subjection of a subject to his sovereign, of a slave to his master. "My foot standeth right," 1 have pursued the paths of righteousness; or, rather, supposing a Levite to be the speaker. My foot shall stand in the place appointed for the Levites in the temple, in the court of the priests, where my proper station is. Job says, (xix. 13.) he was "feet to the lame, and eyes to the blind," he led one, and supported the other. In another place, that God had "put his feet in the stocks, and looked narrowly to all his paths," like a bird, or some other animal led along, with a foot fastened to a cord, and unable to go the least step, but as he who guides it pleases. Nakedness of feet was a sign of mourning: God says to Ezekiel, "Make no mourning for the dead, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet," &c. It was likewise a mark of respect, Exod. iii. 5. Moses put off his shoes to approach the burning bush; and most commentators are of opinion, that the priests served in the tabernacle with their feet naked, as they did afterwards in the temple. The Talmudists teach, that if they had but stepped with their feet upon a cloth, a skin, or even upon the foot of one of their companions, their service would have been unlawful. That, as the pavement of the temple was of marble, the priests used to incur several inconveniences, because of the nakedness of their feet; to prevent which, in the second temple there was a room in every wall of the temple, where the frequent ablutions appointed them in the temple seem to imply, that their feet were naked. It is also thought that the Israelites might not enter this holy place, till they had put off their shoes, and cleaned their feet. To this purpose Excl. v. 1 is applied: "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God." Take care that your feet be clean. Maimonides says expressly, that it was never allowed to enter the house of God on the holy mountain with shoes on, or with their ordinary clothes on, or with dirty feet. The Turks never enter their mosques till after they have washed their feet, and their hands, and have put off the outward covering of their legs. The Christians of Ethiopia enter their churches with their shoes off; and the Indian Brahmans and others have the same respect for their pagodas and temples.

WASHING OF FEET. (See also under SANDALS.) The orientals used to wash the feet of strangers, who came off a journey, because they commonly walked with their shoes bare, and their feet were defended only by sandals. So Abraham washed the feet of the three angels, Gen. xviii. 4. They washed the feet of Eliezer, and those who accompanied him, at the house of Laban, (Gen. xxiv. 38) and also those of Joseph's brethren, when they came into Egypt, Gen. xliii. 24. This office was commonly performed by servants and slaves; and hence Abigail answers David, who sought her in marriage, that she should think it an honor to wash the feet of the king's servants, 1 Sam. xxv. 41. When Paul recommends hospitality, he would have a widow assisted by the church, to be one who had washed the feet of saints, 1 Tim. v. 10. Our Saviour, after his last supper, gave his last lesson of humility, by washing his disciples' feet, John xiii. 5, 6. "Then cometh he to Simon Peter; and Peter saith unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." Our Saviour's observation to Peter, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me," gave occasion to several of the early Christians to believe, that the washing of feet had something of the nature of baptism. On Good Friday, the Syrians celebrate the festival of washing of feet. The Greeks perform the sacred Niptere, or holy washing; and in the Latin church this ceremony is practised. The bishops, abbots, and princes in many places, practise it in person. The council of Elvira, seeing the abuse that some persons made of it, by putting a confidence in it for remission of sins, suppressed it in Spain.

FORESKIN, see CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST, a woody tract of ground. There were several such tracts in Canaan, especially in the northern parts. The chief of these were, THE FOREST OF EPHRAIM, near Mahanaim. See EPHRAIM IV.

THE FOREST OF HARETH, in Judah. In addition to the proper forest of Libanus, where the cedars grow, Scripture thus calls a palace, which Solomon built at Jerusalem, contiguous to the palace of the king of Egypt's daughter; and in which he usually resided. All the vessels of it were of gold, and it was called the house of the forest of Libanus, probably from the great quantity of cedars used in it, 1 Kings vii. 2; x. 27.

FORNICATION. This word is used in Scripture, not only for the sin of impurity, but for idolatry, and for all kinds of lewdness. Adultery and fornication are frequently confounded. Both the Old and New Testaments condemn all impurity and fornication, corporal and spiritual; idolatry, apostasy, heresy, infidelity, &c.

FORTUNATUS, mentioned 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 17, came from Corinth to Ephesus, to visit Paul. We have no particulars of his life or death, only that Paul calls Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, the first-fruits of Achaia, and set for the service of the church and saints. They carried Paul's first epistle to Corinth.

FOUNTAIN, a spring of water. The word is metaphorically used in Prov. v. 16, for a numerous posterity; and in Cant. iv. 12, the chastity of the bride is denoted by a sealed fountain. "A fountain of living water," or fountain of life, (Cant. iv. 15.) is a source of living water, whether it spring out of the earth like a fountain, or rise in the bottom of a well. FOWL; the Hebrew נף, הב, which we translate foes, from the Saxon foess, to fly, is a word used to denote birds in general. See Birds.

FOX, or JACKAL. This animal is called in Scripture שׁעָל, probably from his burrowing, or making holes in the earth, to hide himself, or to dwell in. They make the whole earth a的数据, viz. the Vulture, the Honey buzzard, the Vulture, and our English translation, fox. But still, it is no easy matter to determine, whether the animal intended be the common fox, or the jackal, the little eastern fox, as Hamelkiss calls him. Several of the modern oriental names of the jackal, from their resemblance to the Hebrew, favor the latter interpretation; and Dr. Shaw, and other travellers, inform us, that while jackals are very numerous in Palestine, the common fox is rarely to be met with.

We shall be safe, perhaps, under these circumstances, in admitting, with Shaw and other critics and writers on natural history, that the Hebrew שָׁעָל comprehended at least the jackal; although this animal has also his distinctive name in Hebrew, viz. גָּרְבָּא, the jackal of the East. We shall first describe this animal, and then notice those passages of Scripture in which he is spoken of.

The jackal, or Thaleh, as he is called in Arabia and Egypt, is said to be of the size of a muddling dog, resembling the fox in his head, his eyes, particularly the tail; and the wolf in the fore parts, especially the nose. Its legs are shorter than those of the fox, and its color is of a bright yellow. There seems to be many varieties among them; those of the warmest climates appear to be the largest, and their color is rather of a reddish brown, than of that beautiful yellow by which the smaller jackal is chiefly distinguished.

Although the species of the wolf approaches very near to that of the dog, yet the jackal seems to be placed between them; to the savage fierceness of the wolf, it adds the impudent familiarity of the dog. Its cry is a howl, mixed with barking, and a lamentation resembling that of human distress. It is more noisy in its pursuits even than the dog, and more voracious than the wolf. The jackal never goes alone, but always in a pack of forty or fifty together. These unite regularly every day, to form a combination against the rest of the forest. Nothing then can escape them; they are content to take up with the smallest animals; and yet, when thus united, they have courage to face the largest. They seem very little afraid of mankind, but pursue their game to the very doors, testifying neither attachment or apprehension. The character he was to keep, but still to respect as to honor. For these scruples, however, there is no ground; the character of Herod as a cruel, insidious, and crafty prince, was too notorious to be disguised among any part of his subjects; and he who knew his heart, as well as witnessed his conduct, could speak with certainty as to his dispositions and motives. Besides this, such metaphorical applications as these are much more common in the East than here, and would, therefore, not appear so strong to our Lord's attendants as to us. This is shown by a passage in Iusbequius: (p. 58). "They, the jackals, or ciaeas, as the Asiatics call them, go in flocks, and seldom harm a man or beast; but get their food by craft and stealth, more than by open force. Thence it is that the Turks call subtle and crafty persons, especially the Asiatics, by the metaphorical name of Ciaeas."

In Judges xvi. 4, 5, we read, that "Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took firebrands, and turned tail to tail, and put a firebrand in the midst between two tails; and when he had set the brands on fire, let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines, and burnt up both the shocks, and also the standing corn, with the vineyards and olives." This narrative has frequently been made the butt of ridicule by the unbeliever in divine contiguity into the midst of Israel, with an air of triumph. How could Samson catch so many foxes in so short a time? And when caught, how could he make them the instruments of his revenge on the Philistines, in the manner which the story represents? To this question we think several satisfactory replies have been given; but as they are still pertinaciously urged, it becomes our business again to show, that they possess no weight, as militating against the claims which the history presents to our belief. That the species of fox of which David was speaking is not at present very rare; and there is a prodigious quantity of the middle species named Sanguis, which in Syria is called sasmine, from its howl; they go in droves. And again, foxes are concealed by hundreds in the gardens, and among ruins and towns. We say, then, Where was the difficulty for Samson to procure three hundred of these animals, especially as the time during which he had to provide for them in his purpose is not limited to a week or a month? Besides this, it should be recollected, that Samson at this time sustained the highest office in the commonwealth, and consequently could be at no loss for persons to assist him in this singular enterprise. Having seemed by which was designed to ruin the property of the oppressors of his country, the next thing for consideration is the method by which he effected his purpose.

In considering the circumstances of this narrative, there must be attention due to the nature and use of the torches, or flambeaux, or lamps, employed by Samson in this procedure: and perhaps, could we identify the nature or form of these, the story might be relieved from some of its uncouthness. They are called lampas, lampas, or, rather lampados, as the Chaldee and Syriac write it; whence the Greek lampas, and our lamp. Now, these lamps, or burners, were placed between two jackals, whose tails were tied together, or, at least, there was a connection formed between them by the一根的 of the LXX in the Complutensian. Possibly, then, this cord was of a moderate length, of this burner, being tied in the middle of it, had something of the effect which we have seen among ourselves, when wanton malice has tied to the tail of a dog crackers, squibs, &c. which, being fired, have terrified the poor animal to his den, where, supposing them still to burn, they might set all around them on fire. We know it is the nature of the jackal to roam about dwellings and out-houses; this would lead them to where the corn of the Philistines was stored; which, being ignited, would communicate the conflagration in every direction. Besides this, the fire giving them pain, they would naturally fight each other and their associates, to which he was tied. This would keep them among the corn longer than usual; and few pairs of them would agree to return to the same den as they had formerly occupied in the mountains; so that nothing could be better adapted to produce a general conflagration, in this expedient of treading—communicating jackals. We must therefore suppose, first, that these burners were at some distance from the animals, so as not to burn them. Secondly, that they were of a nature to hold fire long, without being consumed. Thirdly, that they were either dim, in the manner of their burning, and their light; or, perhaps, while an air of triumph. How could Samson catch so many foxes in so short a time? And when caught, how could he make them the instruments of his revenge on the Philistines, in the manner which the story represents? To this question we think several satisfactory replies have been given; but as they are still pertinaciously urged, it becomes our business again to show, that they possess no weight, as militating against the claims which the history presents to our belief. and the strings, being girt about the head, make a knot in the form of the letter ρ; they are then brought before, and fall on the breast. It is called Tu b’Shvat. (Josh. iii. 14.) Joshua, the most devout Jews put it on both at morning and noon-day prayer; but the generality wear it only at morning prayer. Only the chanter of the synagogue is obliged to put it on at noon, as well as morning.
It has been much disputed whether the use of frontlets and phylacteries was literally ordained by Moses. Those who believe their use to be binding, observe, that the text speaks as positively of this as of other precepts. Moses requires the commandments of God to be written on the doors of houses, as a sign on their hands, and as an ornament on their foreheads, Exod. xiii. 16. If there be any obligation to write these commandments on their doors, as the text intimates, then it is said, there is the same for writing them on their hands and foreheads. The use of frontlets was common in our Saviour’s time, not only in Judea, but also among the Indian Jews, the Persians, and Babylonians. Indeed, long before that time, the doctors, whom the high-priest Eleazar sent to Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, speak of the phylacteries, and referred the origin of them to Moses.

Others, on the contrary, maintain, that these precepts should be taken figuratively and allegorically; many, from one reason or another, think there is a remembrance of God’s law, and observe his commands; that they should always have them in their mind’s eye.” Before the Babylonish captivity, no traces of them appear in the history of the Jews;
the prophets never inveigh against the neglect of them; nor was there any question concerning them in the reformation of manners in the time among the Hebrews. The almost general custom in the East of wearing phylacteries and front-lets, determines nothing for the obligation or usefulness of the practice. Christ did not absolutely condemn them; but he condemned the abuse of them in the Pharisees, their wearing them with affection, and larger than other Jews. The Carata Jews, who adhere to the letter of the law, and deserve praise, are among the smallest Jews “bridled asses,” because they wear these tephillin and front-lets. See also MIZVOOTH, and PHYLACTERIES.

FRUIT. By this word is sometimes meant reward, Prov. i. 31: they shall receive the reward of their labours; and also, as in Ps. xxxv. 12: “The fruit of the lips,” the punishment or reward of words, bad or good, Isa. x. 12. “Uncircumcised fruit,” or impure fruit, (Lev. xix. 23.) is the fruit of a tree newly planted, during the first three years. In the fourth year it was offered to the Lord; after which it was in general use.

"The fruits of the Spirit," mentioned by Paul, are love, joy, peace, Gal. v. 22. "The fruits of righteousness," mentioned by the same apostle, are sown in peace, Phil. i. 11. Irregular passions and carnal disposition produce the fruits of death: they are devoted to the soul, James iii. 18; Rom. vii. 8.

FULFIL. This is one of the most difficult words in the Bible, to treat within a narrow compass; for as it refers to something foretold, and there are many modes of foretelling, as well as different degrees of clearness, with which future events may be foretold, we naturally expect as many corresponding modes of fulfilment as there are varieties in such predictions.
For instance, Abijah the prophet foretold to the wise of Jeroboam, that as soon as she got home, her child should die; this prediction received an instant and direct fulfilment in the death of her child, 1 Kings
iv. 17. Joshua said, the most devout Jews, in the taking of Jerusalem, should begin with the loss of his first-born son, and finish it with the death of his youngest; this was not fulfilled for 500 years, and we are uncertain whether it included the death of the intermediate children; but Heli of Bethlehem experienced its fulfilment. See Amih.

Sometimes prophecy has a direct and sole refer-ce to a certain fact to come to pass hereafter, at a distant period; but sometimes it refers (doubtly) as well to a fact which is appointed to take place at no very distant period, as to another fact of which the first is only a sign or earnest. (See Hazekiah.) So that when the first fact has actually happened, the prediction may be said in one respect to be fulfilled; while in another respect it may be said to continue unfulfilled; because its complete and final accomplishment is not yet arrived. Many prophecies seem to be in this state at present: they have been partly fulfilled in past events, and they are fulfilling now progressively; but the final and complete accomplishment is to be looked for hereafter. The Jewish nation is a striking instance in proof of this observation.

Sometimes a remarkable phraseology, which has a direct reference only to one special event, is said to be fulfilled in another event; that is, the phrase may be well applied to, may be remarkably illustrated by, or may, indeed, in a loose and distant acceptation, be referred to the latter event; which appears as another and further fulfilment, though, strictly speaking, the first fulfilment was enough to satisfy (and actually did satisfy) the prophecy. The slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem may be taken as an instance of this nature; for certainly the prophet Jeremiah (cxxi. 15.) employed the phrase of "Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted," as a reference to an event much nearer to himself than that to which the evangelist Matthew applies it; though the latter event was a remarkable coincidence, and the expression might readily be accommodated to it.

Sometimes a phrase which originally meant to describe a particular m., or class of men, is said to be fulfilled by a class of men distinct, and distant, from those of whom it was first spoken; because the resemblance is so close, and their character so similar, that what was predicted of one, may very aptly and expressively be applied to the other. So, when the prophets complain of the perverseness of the Jews in their days, the same kind of perverseness in the days of the Messiah may naturally be described by the same kind of language; the import of which is revived, or more powerfully fulfilled, in the later application of it, though to a very distant generation.

Proverbial expressions, which do not refer to any specific occurrence, or fact, are said to be fulfilled when an event happens—not which may be applied or referred to them—but to which they may be applied or referred as very similar and descriptive.
All these, and many other modes of fulfilment, are expressed in Scripture; and it requires attention to distinguish whether a stricter or a looser sense is to be put on the word fulfil. We ought also to remark, that some things are said to be done, "that it might be fulfilled;" but in general, persons who were absolutely engaged in fulfilling prophecy, had no suspicion that their actions were in any degree predicted; nor did they perceive the relation of them to the prophecy, or the prophecy to them, till after the events which accomplished the prediction were over. Still, it would seem, that our Lord did purposely, and with design to fulfil former predictions, use certain expressions, and perform certain actions, so he reeled on an ass, "that it might be fulfilled" which was spoken by the prophet; and Jesus himself knew that he was fulfilling this prophecy, but his disciples did not know it; they did not recollect that Scripture contained any such passage; still less, that it thus described any part of the Messiah's character or conduct. This appears very remarkably in John xix. 28. "After this, Jesus, knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, said, I thirst."

Time is said to be fulfilled, or filled up, in various places of Scripture. Disposition of mind is said to be fulfilled, Deut. i. 36; 1 Kings xi. 6. The counsels of God are said to be fulfilled: the law and the prophets, &c. but these phrases require no explanation.

FULLER'S FIELD, FULLER'S FOUNTAIN, see Rogel, and Siloam.

FULLER'S SOAP, see Soap.

FUMING, a word which is used to signify very different things; but it usually denotes perfection, completion, consummation.

FUNERALS, see Burial, and Dead.

FURNACE, a large fire used for melting and refining metals, &c. but metaphorically taken for a state of affliction. Thus, Egypt is called an "iron furnace," with reference to Israel, Deut. iv. 20; Jer. xi. 4. For some remarks on the miraculous preservation of the Hebrew youths in the fiery furnace, see Firz.

FURROWS, openings in the ground, made by a plough, or other instrument. The sacred writers sometimes borrow similitudes from the furrows of the field, Job xxxi. 38. "If my land cry against me, or the furrows thereof complain," &c. I have employed the poor to till my ground, without paying them for their labor. "Thou waterest the ridges abundantly," (Psalm ixxxv. 10.) "thou settlest the furrows thereof," Heb. thou brakest the clods of it, Ecclesiastes vii. 3, says, figuratively, "Sow not upon the furrows of unrighteousness," for if thou sowest iniquity, thou shalt reap all sorts of evils and misfortunes. (See Gal. iv. 7; Hoesen x. 4. "Judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field." Judgment and wrath will produce bitterness, bitter herbs, as it were a ploughed field, ready to receive seed. And verse 11, 12, I will make Judah plough, and Jacob shall break the cords, and form the furrows. The ten tribes and Judah shall, one after the other, endure the effects of my anger. But the prophet adds, immediately, "Sow in righteousness, and reap in mercy.""

FURY is attributed to God metaphorically, or speaking after the manner of men; that is, God's providential actions are such as would be performed by a man in a state of anger. So that when he is said to pour out his fury on a person, or on a people, it is a figurative expression for dispensing afflictive providences; but we must be very careful not to attribute human infirmities, passions, or malevolence to the Deity.

GAAL, son of Ebed, having entered Shechem, to assist it against Abimelech, the people amidst their entertainments cursed the invader. Gaal advanced to oppose him, but was defeated, Judg. ix. 25. A. M. 2771.

I. GAASH, a mountain of Ephraim, north of which stood Timnah-Serah, celebrated for Joshua's tomb, (Josh. xxv. 30) which, Eusebius says, was kept holy in his time.

II. GAASH, a brook or valley, (2 Sam. xxiii. 30.) probably at the foot of mount Gaash.

GABA, a city at the foot of mount Carmel, between Ptolemais and Cesarea. Josephus says, it was called the city of horsemen, because Herod gave it to his veteran cavalry. Reland is of opinion, that it is the same as Caipha, or Hephah; but Eusebius places a little town called Gaba, or Gabe, sixteen miles from Cesarea in Palestine, on the side of the great plain. It is mentioned only by Josephus, iii. 2. In Josh. xviii. 24, a Gaba is mentioned, which is elsewhere called Geba, which see.

GABALA, see Gebal.

GABATHA, a town in the south of Judah, twelve miles from Eleuthropolis, where the prophet Habakkuk's sepulchre was shown.

GABBATHA, high, or elevated. In Greek, ἡσαυρίζω, paved with stones. This was the Hebrew name of a place in Pilate's palace, (John xix. 13.) from whence he pronounced sentence against our Saviour. It was probably an eminence, or terrace, paved with stone or marble, and of considerable height. It was properly a tessellated marble pavement, or a pavement of mosaic work. From the time of Sylla, ornamented pavements of this sort became common among the wealthy Romans; and when they went abroad on military expeditions or to administer the government of a province, they carried with them pieces of marble ready fitted, which, as often as an encampment was formed or a court of justice opened, were regularly spread around the elevated tribunal on which the commander or presiding officer was to sit. Julius Cesar followed this custom in his expeditions. (See Sueton. Ces. 46. Plin. H. N. xxxv. 25.) The word τρίτος therefore refers to a raised tribunal of this sort. Others, considering the origin of the word - that the fact that Josephus, in describing the exterior of the temple, speaks of a pavement of this sort, (B. J. V. 5, 2,) suppose that a particular part of Jerusalem is intended, pertaining, it would seem, to that part of the temple which was called the court of the Gentiles. (Winer Bibl. Renn., p. 414.) R.

GABINUS, (Aulus,) one of Pompey's generals, who was sent into Judea against Alexander and Antigonus. (See Alexander, and Antigonus III.) He restored Hircanus at Jerusalem, confirmed him in the high-priesthood, and settled governors and judges in the provinces, so that Judea, from a monarchical, became an aristocracy. He established courts of justice at Jerusalem, Gadara, (or at Dora,) Amasa, Jericho, and Sepphoris; that the people, finding judges in all parts of the country, might not be obliged to go far from their homes. Learned men were of opinion that the establishment of the Sanhedrim owed its origin to Gabinus. On returning to Rome, Gabinus was prosecuted by the Syrians, and exiled, Acts A. D. 33. He was recalled by Julius Caesar, and returned to Syria triumphant, about Acts A. D. 41. He showed great friendship to Phasael and Herod, and fell in the civil war. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 6—10; Bel. Jud. i. 6.)

GABRIEL, a principal angel. He was sent to the prophet Daniel to explain his visions; also to Zacharias, to announce to him the future birth of John the Baptist, Dan. viii. 17; ix. 21; x. 16; Luke i. 11, &c. Six months afterwards, he was sent to Nazareth, to the Virgin Mary, Luke i. 26, &c. (See Archangel.) Probably, also, Gabriel was the angel which appeared to Joseph, when thinking to divorce him; the Virgin Mary; also, on another occasion, enjoining him to retire to Egypt; and, after the decease of Herod, directed him to return into Judea. The Catholic, says, Gabriel was master or preceptor to the patriarch Joseph.

The tribe of Gad came out of Egypt, in number 45,650. After the defeat of the kings Og and Sihon, Gad and Reuben desired to have their allotment east of Jordan, alleging their great number of cattle. Moses granted their request, on condition that they should accompany their brethren, and assist in conquering the land west of Jordan. Gad had his inheritance between Reuben south, and Manasseh north, with the country of Gilead east, and Jordan west. See CANAN.

II. GAD, David’s friend, who followed him when persecuted by Saul. Scripture styles him a prophet, and also a seer, 1 Sam. xxiv. 11. The first time we find them with this privilege, they were the priests of the land of Moab, to secure his father—David’s mother, (1 Sam. xxii. 5.) in the first year of his flight, fled Saul’s persecution. The prophet Gad warned him to return into the land of Judah. After David had determined to number his people, the Lord sent the prophet Gad to him, who gave him his choice of three scourges: seven years’ famine, or three months’ flight before his enemies, or three days’ pestilence. Gad advised David to erect an altar to the Lord, in the threshing-floor of Ornan, or Araunah, the Jebusite. He wrote a history of David’s life, which is cited 1 Chron. xxiv. 25.

III. GAD, a heathen deity, mentioned in several passages of Script, is he who is the same as Baal, i.e. the planet Jupiter, the star of good fortune. (See Baal.) We find a place in Canaan, called the Migdal-Gad, Josh. xv. 37, and another in the valley of Lebanon, called Baal-Gad, Josh. xi. 17. In Isaiah lv. 11, those who prepare the table for Gad are allotted to the sword; and those who furnish a drink-offering to Meni, to the slaughter. Perhaps these were services to the powers of heaven, to conjure them to be favorable to the productions of the earth, &c.; therefore the consequent threatening is famine. We have, in various parts of England, the ceremonies of the wassail bowl; of going round the orchards, sprinkling and sprinkling the trees on twelfth night; wishing them fertility, &c. Is this a relic of the services prepared for Gad and Meni? or may it, by resemblance, serve to illustrate it? It seems to be a rite derived from deep antiquity; as are many others of which traces remain. See BAAL, ad loc., and MENI.

Although the deity hitherto commemorated under the name of Gad, is masculine, we have a female divinity, also, of this name in Hazar-Gadahah, Josh. xv. 27, and as Fortune is most commonly female, in such statues and figures of her as remain, we need not doubt but the Canaanites adored her under this sex.

GADARA, surrounded, scaled, a city east of the Jordan, in the Decapolis. Josephus calls it the capital of Peraea; and Ptolomy (lib. v. cap. 16.) places it on the river Hieromax, (Jarmuth,) about five miles from its junction with the Jordan. It gave name to a district which extended, probably, from the region of Sicythopolis to the borders of Tiberias. Pompey repaired Gadara, in consideration of Demetrius his freedman, a native of it; and Gabinus settled there one of the five courts of justice for Judea. Polybius says, that Antiochus the Great besieged this city, which was thought to be one of the strongest places in the country, and that it surrendered to him on composition. Epiphanius speaks of its hot baths.

The evangelist Mark (v. 1.) and Luke (viii. 36, Gr.) say that our Saviour, having passed the sea of Tiberias, came into the district of the Gadarenes. Matthew (viii. 28.) calls it Gergesæa; but as the lands belonging to one of these cities were included within the limits of the other, one ev gelist might think, by way of economy, the country of the Gergesæa, another the country of the Gadarenes; either being equally correct.

Mr. Bankes thinks that the place called Oom-kais, where are shown numerous caverns and extensive ruins, marks the site of Gadara; but Mr. Buckingham speaks of Oom-kais as Gamala. If Gadara be properly understood as denoting a fenced protection, the name might, with great propriety, be common in many parts; and such retreats would be no less necessary at the northern extremity of the country, than at the southern. See GEDER.

GADDI, son of Susi, of Manasseh, sent by Moses to explore the land, Num. xiii. 11.

GADDIEL, son of Sodi, of Zebulun, one of the spies, Num. xiii. 10.

I. GAUS, the Greek form of the Latin name CAUS. He was Paul’s disciple, (Acts xix. 29.) and was probably a Macedonian, but settled at Corinth, where he entertained Paul during his abode there,
The possessors of Galatia were of three different nations, or tribes of Gauls: the Tolstoiobogi, the Ercori, and the Gruoci, which tribes met together in the sidion raised the sound of the great Dianas, the Ephesians ran to the house of Gaus and Aris- tarchus, and dragged them to the theatre.

II. GAIUS, the person to whom the apostle John directed his third epistle, was, in the opinion of several commentators, the same as we have just noted; but others think he is mentioned in Acts xx. 4, as being of Derbe, in Lycaonia; and consequently not the Macedonian. The fact is, that the name was so common in antiquity, that there is great difficulty in fixing on any one as the person to whom John wrote. He might be neither of those known to us in the New Testament; if we might be guided by his character, he is certainly the Gaus of Corinth; for Paul describes him, not only as being his host, but also, that of the whole church; not of the Corinthian church, which could not need a host; but of the whole Christian church, whether Jews or Gentiles by nation; whether in opinion followers of Peter or of Paul. Such was his Christian benevolence, and unrestricted hospitality. Now, this is the very virtue for which the Gaus to whom John wrote is highly praised by the apostle, who could not have described the host of the whole church in terms more appropriate than he uses of Gaus. It would also appear, that the Gaus of Corinth was known at Ephesus, he having been with Paul, and in great personal danger; and John, writing from Ephesus in favor of certain traveling Christian brethren, might probably take this opportunity of commending Gaus.

GALATIA, a province in Asia Minor, having Pontus on the east, Bithynia and Paphlagonia north, Cappadocia and Phrygia south, and Phrygia west. The Gauls, having invaded Asia Minor, in several bodies, conquered this country, settled in it, and called it Galatia, which, in Greek, signifies Gaul.

The apostle Paul preached several times in Galatia; first, A. D. 51, (Acts xvi. 6) afterwards, A. D. 54, (Acts xviii. 23) and formed considerable churches there. It is probable he was the first who preached there to the Gentiles; but, possibly, Peter had preached there to the Jews, since his first epistle is directed to Hebrews, scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. These Jews were probably the persons who occasioned the apostle to write his second epistle, the account of which Paul wrote his epistle, in which he takes some pains to establish his character of apostle, which had been disputed, with intention to place him below Peter, who preached generally to Jews only, and who claimed the law.

In 2 Mac. viii. 20, it is said, that Judas Maccabaeus, exhorting his people to fight valiantly against the Syrians, related to them several instances of God's protection; among others, that which they had experienced in a battle fought in Babylonia, wherein 6000 Jews killed 120,000 Galatians. We have no particulars of the time or circumstances of this defeat; but it is probable, that the Galatians, settled in Galatia, were not meant, but the Gauls, who at that time overrun Asia, as we have observed from Pausanias: the Greek Galatia being taken equally for either.

The Galatians worshipped the mother of the gods, Callimachus, in his hymn, calls them "a foolish people;" and Hilary, himself a Gaul, as well as Jerome, describes them as Gallus indicatus; expressions which may well excuse Paul's addressing them as "foolish," chap. iii. It was probably an appellation given to them, current in their neighborhood.

The early date was asserted by Marcellus, in the second century; and Tertullian represents the writer as a "Neo Phyton," full of zeal, and not yet brought to become a "Jew to the Jews, that he might gain the Jews." Without adopting this sentiment, we may conclude that Paul's first visit to the Galatians was not long after his return to Antioch from the council at Jerusalem, (Acts xvi.) when he and Silas went through Phrygia and Galatia, &c. Calmet has fixed this journey to A. D. 51, but Michelsen argues for A. D. 49, and it would seem that this letter was written very soon after the departure of the apostle from his converts on this journey; for he expresses his wonder that they were so soon alienated from him, their spiritual father, chap. i. 6. The apostle writes this epistle in his own name, and in the names of the brethren who were with him; and who were, in all probability, personally known to the Galatians, Acts xv. 40; xvi. 2. This leads us to think, that it was written before he went into Macedonia; probably from Troas, where the apostle made some stay, (Acts xvii. 8) and where he had books and parchments, which he committed to church, but which were not ordered to be destroyed, (Ephes. iii. 17) but which were preserved. Paul, however, have supposed it to have been written at Corinth, (Acts xviii.) about A. D. 51 or 52; or, at Ephesus; (Acts xviii. 23, 24.) or at the same time with the epistle to the Romans; (Acts xx. 4.) or at Rome, which is more improbable; but the Galatians mentions nothing of his bonds, as he does in all his epistles written from hence; nor could he, at that time, have reproached the Galatians with being so soon perverted from his principles. See more under Paul.

GALBANUM, a gum, or sweet spice, and an ingredient in the incense burned at the golden altar, in the holy place, Exod. xxx. 34. It is a juice, drawn by incision from a plant, much like the large kind of fennel. The smell is not very agreeable, especially alone. The word signifies—fat, unctuous, gummy.

It is the gum of a plant growing in Abyssinia, Arabia, and Syria, called by Pliny Stagonitis, (xii. 23.) but supposed to be the same as the Rubon Galbanus of Linnaeus. The gum is unctuous and adhesive, of a strong and somewhat astringent smell.

GALILEE, one of the most extensive provinces into which the Holy Land was divided; but it probably varied in its limits at different periods. It is divided by the rabbins into (1.) The Upper; (2.) The Nether; and, (3.) The Valley. Josephus limits Galilee was, by the city of Ptolemais and mount Carmel; on the south by the country of Samaria and Scythopolis; on the west by the sea of Galilee, Hermon, and Gaulen; and on the north by the confines of the Tyrians. Lower Galilee reaches in length from Tiberias to Chabalon, or Zabalon, the frontier of Ptolemais; in width from Chaloth, in the great plain, to Barambe. The breadth of Upper Galilee begins at Bersabe, and extends to Baca, which separates it from the Tyrians. Its length reaches from Telle, a village on the river Jordan, to Meror. But the exact situation of these places is not known.

This province contained four tribes: Issachar, Zebulon, Naphtali, and Asher; a part also of Dan; and part of Peres, beyond the river. Upper Galilee abounded in mountains, and was termed "Galilee of the Gentiles," as the mountainous nature of the country enabled those who possessed the fastnesses to maintain themselves against invaders. Strabo (lib. xvi.) enumerates among its inhabitants Egyptians, Syrians, and Phœnicians. Lower Galilee, which contained the tribes of Zebulon and Asher, was also fertile and rich; the plateau being the Great Field, the "champaign." Deut. xvi. 30. The valley was adjacent to the sea of Tiberias. Josephus describes Galilee as being very populous, containing two hundred and four cities and towns, the least of which contained 15,000 inhabitants. It was also very rich, and paid two hundred talents in tribute. The natives were brave, and made good soldiers; they were also sedulous, and prone to insurrection and rebellion. Their language and customs differed considerably from those of the Judeans, Mark xiv. 70.

Josephus states that the Galileans were naturally good soldiers, bold and intrepid; that they bravely resisted the foreign nations around them; that their country was fruitful, and well cultivated; and the people laborious and industrious. The Galileans, according to Josephus, agreed in all things with the Phœnicians; but were distinguished by an excessive love of liberty; being strongly prejudiced with the idea, that they ought to obey God alone as their prince. Perhaps there was some reference to this, in representing Jesus as a Galilean to Pilate, Luke xxiii. 2. His accusers, to render him suspected of this heresy, say, they found him perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar.

Gall. Moses, in the name of God, threatens the Israelites to make their grapes—grapes of gall, and their wine the poison of dragon. (Deut. xxxii. 29, 33.) i.e. to change the sweetness of their grapes into bitterness, and their wine into poison; which, instead of cheering and nourishing, would intoxicate and destroy them. In the story of Tobit, the gall of a fish is used in curing his father's eyes, Tobit vi. 8; xi. 8, 13. In Jeremiah viii. 14; ix. 15, to give water of gall to drink, denotes very bitter affliction, Lam. iii. 18. The Psalmist (ixix. 21.) says, that his enemies, or rather the enemies of the Messiah, offered him gall to eat, and vinegar to drink. (See Bitterness, and Wine.) "The gall of bitterness," (Acts viii. 32.) signifies the most excessively bitter gall; the most desperate disposition of mind; the most incurable enmity, as difficult to be corrected as to change gall into sweetness.

Gallim, a city of Benjamin, having many fountains, 1 Sam. xxv. 44; Is. x. 30.

Gallo, brother of Seneca the philosopher, and procurer of Achaea, A. D. 53. Like his brother Seneca, he was put to death by order of Nero. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 3; xy. 73.) The Jews being enraged against Paul, for converting many Gentiles, dragged him to Gallio's tribunal, who, as procurer, generally resided at Corinth, (Acts xvi. 12, 13.) and accused him of "teaching men to worship God contrary to the law." Paul being about to speak, Gallio told the Jews, that "if the matter in question were a breach of justice, or an action of a criminal nature, he should think himself obliged to hear them; but as the dispute was only concerning their law, he would not determine such differences." Sooth Een, the chief ruler of the synagogue, was seized and beaten, before Gallio's seat of justice, without his concerning himself about it.

Gamala, a considerable town beyond Jordan, in the Galilee; called Gamala, because its appearance somewhat resembled the form of a camel. It is not mentioned in Scripture. It is placed by Josephus over against Taricheae, but on the opposite side of the lake. Gamala was part of the kingdom of Agrippa; but the inhabitants refusing to submit to him, it was besieged, first by Agrippa's forces, and afterwards by the Romans, who, after a long siege, took and sacked it. Mr. Legh supposes the ruins of Om-raks to mark the site of Gamala; we have, however, identified them with Gadara, which see.

I. Gamaliel, son of Fedaham, prince of Mas- seah when the Israelites left Egypt, Num. li. 19; ii. 29; vii. 54.

II. Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, a Pharisee, and Paul's master. The Jews having brought Peter before the assembly of rulers, Gamaliel moved that the apostles should retire; and then advised the assembly to take heed what they intended to do touching these men, and to treat them with lenity. Gamaliel's advice was followed; and the apostles were liberated. Acts v. 34.

Games, see Race.

Gammadim, brave, valiant warriors. It is very uncertain what people are meant by this term, in Ezek. xxvii. 11. The learned Fuller supposes them to be the people of Phœnicia; Ludolphus conjectures that they were Africans; the Chaldee paraphrase makes them Cappadocians; and the Vulgate renders the word "pygmies." Dr. Spencer thinks they were images of the tutelar gods, like the larus among the Romans, not above a cubit in height. Many of the conjectures on this word are ridiculous. It is not necessary to understand it as the name of a people; but rather as an adjective, brave, valiant. See Geessius.

Garab, a hil near Jerusalem, (Jer. xxx. 38.) the situation of which is not known.

Garments, see Dress.

Gate. The gates or doors to the houses of the Hebrews, with their posts, were generally of wood; such were the gates of Gaza which Samson carried away on his shoulders; (Judg. xvi. 3.) that is, the gate, bars, posts, and locks, if there were any. "Gate" is often used in Scripture to denote a place of public assembly, where justice was administered, (Deut. xxv. 5, 8; xxi. 19; xxii. 15; xxv. 6, 7, &c.) because, as the Jews mostly labored in the fields, assemblies were held at their city gates, and justice administered there, that laborers might lose no time; and that country people, who had affairs of justice, might not be obliged to go to the city. See Ruth iv. 1; Gen. xxiii. 10, 18. (The gates of oriental cities were at the same time the market-places, the place of justice; Prov. xxii. 22; Amos v. 10, 12, 13; there, too, people assembled to spend their leisure hours, Gen. xix. 17.) Hence,”they that sit in the gate” is put for idlers, loungers, who are coupled with drunkards, Ps. lxxix. 12.

Hence, also, “gate” sometimes signifies—power, dominion; almost in the same sense as the Turkish sultan’s palace is called the Porte. God promises Abraham, that his posterity shall possess the gates of their enemies—their towns, their fortresses, (Gen. xxii. 17,) and Christ says to Peter, “Thou art Peter; and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,” Matt. xvi. 18.

It is remarked, that the idol Dagon, having fallen before the ark, and the two bands of its statue having fallen on the threshold of its temple, the priests afterwards forbore to tread on this part of the doorway, 1 Sam. v. 5. The prophet Zophaniah, perhaps, alludes to this custom of the Philistines, under the expression of “Those who leap on” or “over the threshold,” cl. i. 5.

GATES OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, (Psalm cxviii. 19,) those of the temple, where the righteous, the saints, true Israelites, pay their vows and praises to God; where none enter but purified Israelites—a nation of consecrated men.

GATH, (a wine-press,) a city of the Philistines, and one of their five principalities; (1 Sam. v. 8; vi. 17.) was famous for having given birth to Goliath. It was 18 miles south of Joppa, and 33 west of Jerusalem. David conquered Gath in the beginning of his reign over all Israel, (1 Chr. xviii. 1,) and it continued subject to his successors till the declension of the kingdom of Judah, 2 Chr. xxvii. 6. Rehoboam rebuilt or fortified it, (2 Chron. xi. 8,) and it was afterward occupied by the Philistines, but Uzziah reconquered it. Josephus makes it part of the tribe of Dan. Methoe or Methoe-Ammah (Methoe the Mother) of 2 Sam. viii. 1, is explained in 1 Chron. xvii. 4, by—“Gath and her daughters”; Gath being the mother, and Methoe the daughter. Or it may be, that the district of Gath, and its dependencies, was in David’s time called Methoe-Ammah; which, being unusual, or becoming obsolete, the author of the Chronicles explains it to be Gath and its villages.

Jerome says, there was a large town called Gath, in the way from Eleutheropolis to Gaza; and Eusebius speaks of another Gath, five miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Lydda, and, consequently, different from that of which Jerome speaks. The former author, also, speaking of Gath-Hepher, the place of the prophet Jonah’s birth, says, it was called Gath-Hepher, or Gath in the district of Hepher, to distinguish it from others of the same name. Gath signifying fallen on the threshold of its temple, it is no wonder that we find several places of this name in Palestine, where wine-presses were common. Calmet, who is followed by many subsequent writers, makes Gath to be the most southern city of the Philistines, and Ekron the most northern; when he supposes that Ekron and Gath are placed as the boundaries of their land.

1 Sam. v. 8; 10; xvii. 52. But, as Mr. Conder remarks, this phrase may be more properly interpreted as intimating that Gath was the south-eastern border, as Ekron was the north-eastern; and this much better accords with the sense of the passages. David had a companion at Ekron, 2 Sam. xx. 2. Gath was the residence of the Gittite guards.

GATH-HEPHER was the birth-place of the prophet Jonah, 2 Kings xiv. 25. Joshua (xiii. 13) places it in Zebulum; and Jerome says it was two miles from Sephoris, or Diosarea, on the way to wards Tiberias.

GATH-RIMMON, the wine-press of Rimmon, or of the deity, whose symbol was the pomegranate.—I. A city of Dan, (Josh. xix. 45,) which Jerome places ten miles from Diospolis, towards Eleutheropolis. It was given to the Korathites.—II. A town in the half-tribe of Manassah, west of Jordan; given to the Korathites, Josh. xxi. 25.—III. A city of Ephraim, given to the Korathites, 1 Chron. vi. 69.

GAULAN, or GOLAN, a city of Bashan, from which the small province of Golanitis was named. It was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh, (Deut. iv. 43,) but was ceded to the Levites of Gershon’s family, and became a city of refuge, Josh. xxi. 27. Eusebius says, that in his time, the city of Gaulan was still considerable, but he does not exactly describe its situation. It was in Upper Galilee, and Judas of Gaulan, head of the Galileans, was a native of it.

GAZA, or AZZA, (Ged. xix. 19,) a city of the Philistines, given by Joshua to Judah, Josh. xvi. 7; 1 Sam. vi. 17. It was one of the five principalities of the Philistines, towards the southern extremity of Canaan. It was situated between Raphia and Askelon, about 60 miles south-west of Jerusalem. Its advantageous situation exposed it to many revolutions. It belonged to the Philistines; then to the Hebrews; recovered its liberty in the reigns of Joatham and Ahaz; but was reconquered by Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 8. It was subject to the Chaldeans, with Syria and Phoenicia; and afterwards to the Persians, and the Egyptians, who held it when Alexander the Great besieged, took, and destroyed it, (Ant. A. D. 98. (See Zeph. ii. 4.) A new town was afterwards built, nearer to the sea, which is now existing. Loke speaks (Acts viii. 36) of Gaza as a desert place; meaning, not merely, the greater Gaza, situated on a mountain twenty miles from the sea; not Little Gaza, or Majuma, which was very populous. Didorus Siculus mentions old Gaza, and Strabo notices “Gaza the desert,” which agrees with Acts viii. 36. The emperor Constantine gave Majuma the name of Constantinople, in honor of his son; and granted it the honors and privileges of a city, independent of Gaza. The emperor Julian deprived it both of its name and its privileges.

Gaza was a city of great antiquity; being noticed among those cities which marked the boundaries of the Canaanite territory. It was a frontier defence against Egypt, and has at all times been a town of importance.

The rabbins mention a street outside the city of Gaza, where were shambles and an idol temple; as also a place called the Leper’s Cloister. See 2 Kings vii. 3, &c. Dr. Wittman gives the following description of the modern town:—

“Gaza is situated on an eminence, and is rendered picturesque by the number of fine minarets which rise majestically above the buildings, and by the beautiful date-trees interspersed. A very fine plain commences about three miles from the town, on the other side, in which are several groves of olive-trees.”
Advancing toward Gaza, the view becomes still more interesting; the groves of olive-trees extending to the town, in front of which is a fine avenue of these trees. About a mile distant from the town is a commanding height. The soil in the neighborhood is of a superior quality. Much pastureage. On the east side of the city is a grove of olive-trees with which it is supplied. Samson performed his exploit of carrying away the gate of the city; and where he threw down the building which killed him and his adversaries. The suburbs of Gaza are composed of wretched mud huts; but the interior of the town contains buildings superior in appearance to those generally met with in Syria. The streets are of a moderate breadth: many fragments of statues, columns, &c. of marble, are seen in the town walls and other buildings. Ophthalmia and blindness are very prevalent. The suburbs and environs of Gaza are rendered extremely agreeable by a number of large gardens, cultivated with great care, on the north, south, and west of the town. Plantations of date-trees, also, are numerous. The landing place of Gaza is an open beach, highly dangerous to boats, especially if laden, a heavy surf constantly beating on the shore. Quails are very abundant in the neighborhood.

Gaza distinguishes itself on its medals as sacred, and an asylum. Some of them have a key of a peculiar shape, which seems to have been the appropriate symbol of the city. It is possible that, beside the character of this city, as the key of Syria towards Egypt, which it really is, the inhabitants might boast of the excellence of a kind of key or bolt which was proper to it. Whether such might or might not be the fact, this representation may perhaps illustrate a circumstance mentioned in Judges xvi. 2. The Gazaites laid wait (or snares) for Samson, all night, in the gate of the city, and were quiet, depending on the impossibility of his opening the bolt of their city door—but Samson, at midnight, took away the door—the two posts—bar (bolt) and all—which had been the reliance of the Gazaites for securing him. This bolt is what Mr. Taylor thinks appears on the medals of Gaza. The middle bar of the instrument is represented as shooting through that which crosses it; and this is precisely the application elsewhere of the word rendered bar in this passage, as appears from Ezek. xxvii. 22. "Let it be given to him to sally forth through the boards from one end to the other," which is otherwise phrased, chap. xxvi. 28, "the middle bar in the midst of the boards shall reach from end to end. These two ideas are very consistent; for if Gaza possessed such a key, this would secure her at this day, it seemed to be the only means of securing her; and just by it, both built by sultan Ibrahim. In the former his body is deposited. We were admitted to see his tomb, though held by the Turks in great veneration. We found it only a great wooden chest, covered with a capsule of painted calico, extending on all sides down to the ground. In this capsule we saw several large incense pots, candlesticks for altars, and church furniture, being the spoils of Christian churches at the taking of Cyprus. Close by the mosque is a very beautiful bagnio, and a small grove of orange-trees, under the shade of which travellers are wont to pitch their tents in the summer time. Jeblee seems to have had anciently some convenience for shipping. There is still to be seen a ridge composed of huge square stones, running a little way into the sea, which appears to have been formerly continued further on, and to have had a mole. Near this place we saw a great many pillars of granite, some by the water side, others tumbled into the water. There were others in a garden close by, together with capitals of white marble, finely varied: which testify, in some measure, the ancient splendor of this city. But the most considerable antiquity in Jeblee, and greatest monument of its former eminence, is the remains of a noble theatre, just at the north gate of the city. All of it that is now standing is the semicircle. It extends from corner to corner, just a hundred yards. In this semicircular part is a range of seventeen round windows, just above the ground; and between the windows all round were raised, on high pedestals, large massive pillars, standing as buttresses against the wall, both for the strength and ornament of the fabric; but these supporters are at present most of them broken down. Within is a very large arena. On the west side the seats of the spectators remain still entire, as do likewise the caves or vaults which run under the subsellia all round the theatre. The outward wall is three yards three quarters thick, and built of very large and firm stones; which great strength has preserved it thus long from the jaws of time, and from that general ruin which the Turks bring with them into most places where they come."

GEber, son of Uri, governor of Gilead, in the reign of Solomon. 1 Kings iv. 19.

I. Gedaliah, son of Ahikam, was made governor of Palestine, by Nebuchadnezzar, after the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; (Jer. xl. xii. 2 Kings xxv. 22.) A. M. 3416. Jeremiah and many Jews who had fled into Moab and Ammon, retired to him at Mizpah. Gedaliah assured them of Nebuchadnezzar's protection, on condition that they lived peaceably. Ishmael, son of Nathaniah, of the royal family of Judah, having been entertained at the table of Gedaliah, the prince and his associates massacred him, and its blood was shed as well Jews as Chaldeans.

II. Gedaliah, son of Amariah, and grand- father of the prophet Zephaniah, Zeph. i. 1.

Gedar. This word signifies a wall, enclosure, fortified place; as do also the names in the following articles, which are all derived from it. Geder itself was an ancient Canaanitish place, in the plain of Judah, (Josh. xii. 13;) and was probably the same with the following Gedera.

Gerah, a city in the plain of Judah, (Josh. xv. 36;) probably the same with the preceding Geder, and with Beth-Gader, 1 Chron. ii. 51. It would thence seem to have pertained to the family of Caleb.

Gerethoth, a place in the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 26.; 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. R.

Gerethothaim, a place in the plain of Judah, Josh. xv. 36. R.

Gedor, a city apparently in the south of the mountains of Judah, surrounded by fat pastures, and fortified by the Amorite; 1 Chron. iv. 39 seq. xii. 7; Josh. xv. 58. It is also the name of a man, 1 Chron. viii. 31; ix. 37. R.

Gehazi, Elisha's servant, almost continually attended that prophet, and was concerned in whatever happened to him; till being overcome by avarice, he solicited, and obtained, in the prophet's name, from Naaman the Syrian, a talent of silver, and two changes of garments, 2 Kings v. 20. His avarice, however, was punished, for he was seized with a leprosy, and quitted Elisha. The king of Israel would sometimes make Gehazi relate the wonders which God had wrought by Elisha, 2 Kings vii. 4, 5, &c. See Elisha.

Gehenna, or Geennom, or valley of Hinnom; or valley of the son of Hinnom, (see Josh. x. 8; 2 Kings xxiii. 16. Heb.) a valley adjacent to Jerusalem, through which the southern limits of the tribe of Benjamin passed. Eusebius says, it lay east of Jerusalem, at the foot of its walls; but we are cerfrom Adam to Joseph his father, and to Mary his mother. It is observed in Ezra ii. 66, that such priests, because of their families, were not permitted to exercise their sacred functions; and Josephus says, that they had an uninterrupted succession of priests for 3000 years; that the priests were particularly careful to preserve their genealogies, not only in Judea, but wherever they were. They never married but into their own rank, and they had exact genealogical tables, prepared from those authentic documents which were kept at Jerusalem, and to which they had recourse. It is observable that the genealogies recorded by Ezra and Nehemiah vary in some particulars; the reason of which is thus assigned by Prideaux: "For the true settling of these genealogies, search was made by Nehemiah for old registers, and having among them found a register of the genealogies of those who came up at first from Babylon, with Zerubbabel and Joshua, he settled this matter according to that, adding such as afterwards came up, and expounding others whose families were extinguished; and this hath caused the differences between the accounts which we have of these genealogies in Ezra and Nehemiah. For in the second chapter of Ezra, we have the old register, made by Zerubbabel; and in the seventh of Nehemiah, from the sixth verse to the end of the chapter, we have a copy of it as settled by Nehemiah, with the alterations I have mentioned." (Connect. &c. part i. book iv.)

Since the last war of the Romans against the Jews, about thirty years after the death of our Saviour, and particularly since their dispersion in the reign of Adrian, they have lost their ancient genealogies; and perhaps not even one of the sacred text race can produce his pedigree.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ.—The variations in the genealogical tables of Matthew and Luke have been discussed by almost every commentator from the earliest times, and different methods have been proposed for their solution. It is obviously impossible, however, within the limits of an article of any reasonable length, in a work like the present, even to enumerate the various hypotheses that have been advanced on the subject. One thing is certain—that they were derived from authentic sources, and were at least sufficiently accurate to satisfy the persons for whom they were more especially intended. It cannot be believed for a moment, that in an affair of so much importance as that of an exhibition of the evidence by which the descent of Jesus from Abraham and David was to be proved, upon which, in fact, the official character depended, and in which a single error, accidental or otherwise, would have been fatal—it cannot be believed that here the evangelists would either have copied incorrectly, or have willfully falsified. Had they done so, the public registries, which were open to inspection, would have enabled any one to expose the fraud; and we may be sure that among the enemies of the Redeemer, men who denied his Messiahship, many would have been found to undertake that which would so completely effect their wishes. That no such attempts were made, furnishes a sufficient guarantee of the accuracy of these tables, whatever difficulties they may present to modern readers.

In the article Generation, Mr. Taylor has suggested a different idea of the fourteen generations of Matthew to that generally entertained; yet being desirous of doing justice to other modes of determining those generations, he gives the following comparative Genealogy. [The following comparative table is constructed on the hypothesis, that Matthew gives the genealogy of our Saviour through Joseph his father; while Luke exhibits that of his mother Mary.]

GENERATION. Besides the common acceptation of this word, as signifying race, descent, lineage, it is used for the history and genealogy of a person; as Gen. v. 1. "The book of the generations of Adam," i.e. the history of Adam's creation and of his posterity. So Gen. ii. 4. "The generations of the heavens and of the earth," i.e. their genealogy, so to speak, the history of the creation of heaven and earth. Matt. i. 1. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ," i.e. the genealogy of Jesus Christ, the history of his descent and life.

The present generation comprises all those who are now alive. Matt. xxiv. 34. "This generation shall not pass away, till all be fulfilled;" some now living shall witness the event foretold. Acts ii. 40. "Save yourselves from this untoward generation;" from the punishment which awaits these perverse men. —Sometimes also the word refers to future ages; "To generation and generation," i.e. to future ages; Isaiah lili. 8. "Who shall declare his generation?" who can enumerate his posterity? i.e. He was cut off by an untimely death, yet his posterity, his followers, shall be innumerable.

The Hebrews, like other ancient nations, sometimes computed loosely by generations. Thus Gen. xv. 18. "In the fourth generation thy descendants shall come hither again." Deut. xxiii. 3. "A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to his tenth generation." The duration of a generation is of course very uncertain; indeed, it is impossible to establish any precise limits. Hence it has been fixed by some at one hundred years; by others, at a hundred and ten; by others at thirty-three, thirty, twenty-five, and even twenty years; being neither uniform nor settled. It is, however, generally admitted, that a generation in the earliest periods is to be reckoned longer than one in later times.

It is well known that the learned have been much embarrassed to make out the even number of fourteen generations in the genealogy of Christ, reckoned by the evangelist Matthew; (chap. i.) "So all the generations from Abraham to David, are fourteen generations; and from David unto the Babylonian captivity, are fourteen generations; and from the Babylonian captivity to Christ, are fourteen generations." Bishop Pearce proposes to read "seventeen generations" in the second number; and others say, "Cut out the whole." Upon this perplexing subject, Mr. Taylor has the following remarks. [These remarks are suffered to remain here, although they are built on very slight foundations, and amount to nothing but conjecture after all. The best mode of reconciling the two genealogies of our Lord is given above. A very judicious view of the whole subject, is given by Newcome in the notes to his Harmony of the Gospels, which see. E.

It is notorious, (1.) that three princes of short reigns are omitted, between Jehezam and Uzziiah, in verse 8. (2.) Some MSS. in order to make up the number of fourteen generations, insert in verse 11. "And Jehoiakim begat Jeconiah." (3.) Other variations of the numbers of these generations, are well known to those who have investigated the subject. Now, to preserve the number of fourteen generations in each class, is impossible, if we adhere to the historical succession of the kings, and refer the word "generation" to literal descent. But if we see the consequences, if we take the word "generation" as expressing a portion of time, or mean of calculation, by the general (not individual) course of human life.

"From Abraham to David is fourteen generations." Now, a generation, in those early ages, might be taken at 93, 80, or 70 years, in the former part of the period; and 60, 50, or 40 years, at the close of it. If we take the average, or medium, it will be 65 years— for Abraham was born about ante A. D. 1906, and David ante A. D. 1065, making the interval 911 years—which, divided by fourteen, gives full sixty-five years to a generation. That about 70 years might denote a generation, in the days of Abraham, seems probable from Gen. xv. 16. "In the fourth generation—from thy posterity's going into Egypt, or servitude—they shall return to Canaan;" the interval being about four periods of 70 years each, i.e. 280 years; for Joseph was sold ante A. D. 1729, and Israel entered Canaan, under Joshua, about ante A. D. 1451. But if it should be thought a generation in the days of Abraham extended to a hundred years, it will not affect the argument; because human life was proportionably diminished towards the time of David.

It seems that forty years was not esteemed to be a complete generation in the days of Moses, since those sinners who had griev'd God forty years in the wilderness (Psalm. cxxv. 10) are considered as having been cut off at an untimely period of life. From the birth of David to the Babylonian captivity, the medium of fourteen generations approaches very near to that of the regular estimate of generations among the ancients, which were usually reckoned three to a century, say 33 years. In this interval they are about 30 years; for David was born ante A. D. 1065, and the deportation to Babylon was ante A. D. 581. The difference is about 504 years; which, divided by fourteen, gives 36 years to a generation. From the Babylonian captivity to Christ, the generations are varied to forty or forty-one years each.

Now the Messiah was restricted by divine appointment, (1.) to the posterity of Abraham. (2.) To the family of David. (3.) To the then existing temple.
The preceding calculations are taken from the behavior of the residue of the period of a generation, but they should rather be taken from periods more immediately connected with the pedigree of the Messianic. As thus:—From the covenant made with Abraham, including “the blessing of all nations.” &c. or from the period of the New Testament, the period of the revival of this promise, and the fixing of Messiah to the family of David, (2 Sam. vii. 16.) about ante A. D. 1044. This interval is 550 years; which, divided by 14, gives somewhere about 60 years to a generation. From the promise fixing the Messiah in the family of David, (ante A. D. 1044,) to that of his coming to visit his people, this temple, &c. (ante A. D. 592)—the next great promise, at the commencement of a new order of things, attaching the Messiah to place and time—the interval is 524 years; which divided by 14, gives 37 years to a generation. The remaining 589 years, from the promise made in honor of the second temple, till Christ was brought to that temple, evidently gives the same number of 37 years to a generation.

We believe it is usual in the English court of chancery to reckon generations from 33 to 35 years, but on some occasions the court reckons so low as 30 years. However, in estimating the genealogy given by Matthew, we do not seek precisely legal accuracy; it is enough, if we show that the mode of his computation may be explained, without referring to names of kings or descendants, admitted or omitted, or to other circumstances which have perplexed the learned, which is what we have in view. This leads to a few observations; as, (1.) Our Lord uses the term generation to express a period of about 36 or 37 years, when he says, “This generation shall not pass away till Jerusalem be destroyed;” say A. D. 70. (2.) That fourteen periods of 37 years each, reckoned upwards from Christ, bring us up to the consecration of the second temple, being about 520 years. (3.) That fourteen periods of 37 years each, (524 years,) from the consecration of the second temple, reckoned upwards, bring us to that period of David's reign, when he received the promise that the Messiah should spring from his family. (4.) That there were more ways than one of calculating the time of the expected coming of the Messiah; and, after the interval of a generation, which is the consequence of a misapprehension of Jeremiah and Tertius, that “about this time the king of the Jews was expected,” had more (we do not say better) foundations than we know of, or are aware of: and that it is very likely, when the ancient prophets examined to what period the New Testament makes, by their present reference, they might obtain (and might also commence) much information, which has not come down to us. Daniel's seventy weeks are closely connected with our last period of fourteen generations.

The following are the sentiments of Muffaucon on the period of time, intended among the ancients by the word generation, and the use of it in calculation. The ancients painted the several parts of time under human forms; as for example wise and wise, an age and a generation. The first of these (the wise) is taken by the Greeks in various senses. Jerome, in his commentary on Ezekiel xxix. says, that the word wise, or age, is the space of 70 years; and may be reckoned about the full age of a man. It is likewise often taken for the full term of a man's life; sometimes for an undetermined time, and at other times for eternity. As the Greeks had their wise, generation, so the Latins also had their seculum, or generation; concerning both which words there have been great disputes, that is, as to the space of time signified by them. For, besides the two words (that is, seculum or generation) to be equivalent to, and to denote, a space of thirty years; but at length custom prevailed, and determined the seculum to be a hundred years; while the most common opinion was, that the Greeks generally reckoned a generation to be less than thirty years. I know not certainly whether the Greeks ever represented their (wise) generation under a human form, as well as other parts of time; though it is very probable the did, considering that in those days they expressed almost every thing so. As to the custom of reckoning their years by generations, it is of great antiquity; seeing we find Herodotus reckoning in that manner in several places.”

Among the Syrians it appears to have been customary to compute time by generations; at least, it occurs in several places in their writings. In Nor-berg, (vol. i. p. 51, 53, 95,) we read, “After the lapse of twenty-five generations, the world was visited by water, and the sons of men by the progress of this water were exiled from the body … except Nuh, the man, and Nurrato, his wife, also Shum, Jamin, and Jafet, sons of that Nuh; who were delivered from death by water, and by whom the world was restored. From Schurbai and Scharhabil to the generation of Nuh were fifteen generations … But from Nuh and the ark until Ibrahim, who had the prophetic spirit, and until Mescho [Melchizedek?]; and until the city of Jerusalem was built, were six generations. They also say, that, “From Adam to Ram and Rud were thirty generations; from these to Schurbai and Scharhabil were twenty-five generations.” As it is evident, then, that the chronology of the Syriac sacred history was computed by generations, there is nothing unreasonable in assuming, independently of the proofs previously given, that in giving a genealogical epitome of that history, the evangelist conformed his text to documents extant in the language in which he wrote. If this were the case, it follows, that all the names which, by the omission of three names in the genealogical table, have been unnecessary; and also, with evidence little short of demonstration, that the genealogy formed part of Matthew's original; and, consequently, was the basis of our text. Let us now paraphrase the evangelist's words, connecting the sense of the first with that of the seventeenth verse. “I said, in the beginning of my discourse, that Jesus was the son of David; the son of Abraham; and, by this descent, by which I have proved his relation to those ancestors. Now, you might desire that I should say something to justify the expectation of his coming about this period of time. We know it has been disputed among our wise men, what number of years, precisely, elapsed from Abraham to David; but it is enough for my purpose to observe that, however they may differ as to a few years, (for no two of them agree,) they all reckon a period of time equal to fourteen generations, as they were then calculated; that is, to say, the time previous to the settlement of the kingly office, and to the promise of the descent of the Messiah in the family of David, was fourteen generations; and so, from David to the restoration from the Babylonian captivity, after the kingly office was suspend- ed, when our hopes of Messiah revived, is admitted to be fourteen generations, as they were then calculated; and you will, with me, think it very remarkable, that from the time of the Babylonian captivity, to the appearance of the person, whose memoirs I am about to write, was fourteen generations also—a coincidence certainly deserving attention, and on which the true course of our nation, though they should again enjoy, about this time, a king of their own blood, has been (in some degree) founded."

That there was really such a general expectation of a Jewish king at the time the evangelist alludes to, may be seen in the article Cæsar.

The design of Providence in giving us two genealogies of Jesus Christ, may be presumed to have been to show that he was not only of the family of David, but of the house of David, and that his descent was properly royal. (Ps. cxvi. 10.) Hence Luke remarks, (and it seems to be the precise import of his word ἐναντίως, chap. ii. 4.), of the direct line, the elder branch of the family; and, in short, that very person who, if the exercise of royalty had continued in the family of David, would have legally sat on the throne: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, until he come whose right it is:" (Gen. xlix. 10.) that is, that person who ought legally to sway the sceptre. Strange indeed, that, when he comes whose right it is, it should then depart; but such is the provision; and might there not be a reference to this in the question of John the Baptist, "Art thou he that should come?" Matt. iii. 1 q. d. "Art thou he whom we expect shall deliver Israel?" as afterwards the apostles asked, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom of Israel?" Our Lord avoids a direct answer, yes, or no; but says, "Go, tell John what you have seen; no signs of external greatness; but the blind receive sight... and to the poor the gospel is preached: John will thence infer, decidedly, that my kingdom is not of this world; but is infinitely more beneficial to the sons of men, than if I assumed the most magnificent monarchy, as sovereign over Israel." See further in the article Cæsar.

GENESIS, the first of the sacred books in the Old Testament, so called from the title given to it in the Septuagint, and which signifies "the book of the generation, or production," of all things. Moses is generally admitted to have been the writer of this book; and it is believed that he penned it after the promulgation of the law. Its authenticity is attested by the most indisputable evidence, and it is cited as an inspired record thirty-three times in the course of the Scriptures. The history related in it comprises a survey of all the principal events of the human race, from the creation to the period immediately preceding the birth of Jesus Christ. It contains an account of the creation; the primeval state and fall of man; the history of Adam and his descendants, with the progress of religion and the origin of the arts; the genealogies, age, and death of the patriarchs, until Noah; the general defection and corruption of mankind, the general deluge, and preservation of Noah and his family in the ark; the history of Noah and his family subsequent to the time of the deluge; the re-peopling and division of the earth among the sons of Noah; the building of Babel, the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion of mankind; the lives of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph.

GENNESARETH, a small district of Galilee, adjacent to the lake of the same name, or, as subsequently called, the sea of Tiberias, and described by Josephus as being extremely fertile, and, in consequence of the temperature of the air, abounding in fruits of different climates. For a description of the lake, see TIBERIAS II.

GENTILES, a name given by the Hebrews to all those that had not received the law. Those who were converted, and embraced Judaism, they called proselytes. Since the true course of our nation, through all nations, God, who had proselyted Gentiles to the faith, having fulfilled his promise, so that the Christian church is composed of the Jews being too proud of their privileges, to acknowledge Jesus Christ as their Messiah and Redeemer. In the writings of Paul, the Gentiles are generally called Greeks; (Rom. i. 14, 16; ii. 9, 10, 13; I Cor. i. 28; Gal. iii. 28;) and Luke, in the Acts, expresses himself in the same manner, chap. ii. 10, xiii. 48. et al. Paul is commonly called Paul the apostle of the Gentiles, (I Tim. ii. 7;) or Greeks, because he, principally, preached to them; whereas Peter, and the other apostles, preached generally to the Jews; and are called apostles of the Circumcision, Gal. ii. 9.

The prophets declared, very particularly the calling of the Gentiles. Jacob foretold that the Messiah, he who was to be sent, the expectation of the Gentiles, and Solomon, at the dedication of his temple, should there enter God. The Psalmist says (ii. 8.) that the Lord shall give the Gentiles to the Messiah, his inheritance; that Egypt and Babylon shall know him; (Ps. xvi. 9.) that Ethiopia shall hasten to bring him presents; (Ps. xlii. 9, 10,) and that the kings of Tarsia, and of the isles, the kings of Arabia and Sheba, shall be tributary to him. Isaiah abounds with prophecies of a similar nature, on which account he has justly been distinguished by the name of the prophet of the Gentiles.

In the New Testament, we see that Gentiles came to Jerusalem to worship. Some of these, a little before the death of our Saviour, addressed themselves to Philip, desiring him to show them Jesus, John xii. 20, 21.

Many of the fathers believed, that Gentiles, who lived in a laudable manner, and observed the law of nature, were saved; and Paul (Rom. ii.) assigns "glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." Clemens Alexandrinus asserts, that the Gentiles had two means for acquiring justification, the law and philosophy; the latter of which might at least disapprove of those that recording the lowest computation, but according to Dr. Hales, a much larger period. It contains an account of the creation; the primeval state and fall of man; the history of Adam and his descendants, with the progress of religion and the origin of the arts; the genealogies, age, and death of the patriarchs, until Noah; the general defection and corruption of mankind, the general deluge, and preservation of Noah and his family in the ark; the history of Noah and his family subsequent to the time of the deluge; the re-peopling and division of the earth among the sons of Noah; the building of Babel, the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion of mankind; the lives of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph.

In the courts of the Gentiles. Josephus says, that there was, in the court of the temple, a wall, or balustrade, Breast high, with pillars at certain distances, with inscriptions on them in Greek and Latin, importing that strangers were forbidden from approaching nearer to the altar.
GERAH, the smallest piece of money among the Hebrews, twenty of which made a shekel, Exod. xx. 3.

GERAR. We find a city of this name so early as Gen. xx. 1; xxvi. 1, 17, expressly stated to be a city of the Philistines. The probability is, that some wandering tribe of this people had settled here, before the great influx of their nation into these parts, during the captivity of the Israelites in Egypt. As Abraham himself was a pilgrim from a region not very distant from their original country, they might, perhaps, feel some kind of sympathy with him and for him. He appears to have been, on the whole, on good terms with the king of Gerar; and Isaac lived many years in the neighborhood. Gerar appears to have been a favorable station for flocks; and it might be called “the fixed residence,” that is, not tents, but build’ ga, by those who here abode, whether they were, properly speaking, cities or not. Gerar was not far from Gaza, in the south of Judah. Moses says, it lay between Kadesh and Shur; and Jerom states, that from Gerar to Jerusalem was three days’ journey. Moses also mentions the brook or valley of Gerar, Gen. xxvi. 17.

GERASA, or Gerasa, a city, east of the Jordan, and in the Decapolis, Matt. viii. 28; Burekhard, Buckingham, and other writers consider the ruins of Djerash to be those of the ancient Gerasa. They are about seventy-five miles from the sea of Tiberias, and nearly opposite to mount Ebal.

GERGESENES, or Gerasites, a people of the land of Canaan, who settled east of the sea of Tiberias, and gave name to a region and city. See GERAH, and Gerasa.

GERIZIM, a mount in Ephraim, a province of Samaria, between which and Ebal lay the city of Shechem. (See Judg. ix. 7.) Gerizim was fruitful, Ebal was barren. God commanded that the Hebrews, after passing the Jordan, should be so divided, that six tribes might be stationed on mount Gerizim, and six on mount Ebal. The former were to pronounce blessings on those who observed the law of the Lord; the others, curses against those who should violate it, Deut. xi. 29; xxviii. 12.

After the captivity, Manasseh, by permission of Alexander the Great, built a temple on Gerizim, and the Samaritans joined the worship of the true God to that of their idols: “They feared the Lord, and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations whom they carried away from thence,” 2 Kings xvii. 33.

The Samaritans maintain, that Abraham and Jacob erected altars at Gerizim, and that here Abraham prepared to sacrifice his son Isaac, Gen. xii. 6, 7; xiii. 4; xxvi. 20. They, too, affirm, that God required the blessings to be given from mount Gerizim, to those who observed his laws, and the curses from Ebal, (Deut. xxvii. 12, 13,) and they further cite from their Pentateuch the passage; (Deut. xxvii. 4.) “When ye be gone over Jordan, ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in mount Gerizim, [in the Hebrew copies, Ebal,] thou shalt plaster them,” &c. (verses 12, 13,) thus making Moses direct an altar to be erected in Gerizim instead of Ebal. They accuse the Jews of falsifying the text in this passage, and of putting Ebal instead of Gerizim, in order to deprive this mountain of the honor of having been a place appointed for the public worship of Jehovah. They, however, falls much more heavily upon the Samaritans than upon the Jews; since they had a far greater interest to change the reading Ebal into Gerizim, than the Hebrews had to change Gerizim for Ebal. For after the prophecies of the Samaritans, to take part in rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, had been rejected by the Jews, (Ezra iv. 1-3,) the former erected a temple for themselves in mount Gerizim, which is mentioned 2 Macc. vi. 2. By changing the text, therefore, of this passage from Ebal to Gerizim, they wished to procure for their temple the honor of standing on that mountain, where, after the conquest of Canaan, the first public religious transaction was to be performed.

This temple was built on Gerizim, and consecrated to the God of Israel, ante A. D. 332; and as the mountain was very high, there were steps cut for the convenience of the people. When Antiochus Epiphanes began to persecute the Jews, (ante A. D. 168,) the Samaritans treated him, that their temple upon Gerizim, which hitherto had been dedicated to an unknown and nameless God, might be consecrated to Jupiter the Grecian; which was readily consented to by Antiochus.

The temple was destroyed by John Hircanus, and was not rebuilt till Gabinius was governor of Syria; who repaired Samaria, and called it by his own name. In our Saviour’s time, this temple was in being; and the true God was worshipped there, John iv. 20. Herod the Great, having rebuilt Samaria, and called it Sebaste, in honor of Augustus, would have compelled the Samaritans to worship in the temple which he had erected, but they constantly refused; and have continued to this day to worship on Gerizim. See Ebal and Shechem.

GERSHOM, son of Levi, and under Moses prince of a family of the Levites, consisting of 7500 men, Num. iii. 21, &c. Their office, during marches, was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle; and their place in the camp was west of the tabernacle.

I. GESHUR, Geshuri, Geshurites, the name of a district and people in Syria, of whose king Tolmai, David married the daughter, by whom he had Absalom; 2 Sam. iii. 5; xiii. 37; xv. 8. It lay upon the eastern side of the Jordan, between Bashan, Maachah, and mount Hermon, and within the limits of the Hebrew territory, (2 Chron. ii. 23; Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5,) but the Israelites did not expel the inhabitants, Josh. xiii. 13. That they were not conquered at a later period, appears from the fact of their having a separate king. The word Geshur signifies bridge, and corresponds to the Arabic Djiar; and in the same region, where, according to the above data, we must place Geshur, between mount Hermon and the lake of Tiberias, there still exist an ancient stone bridge of four arches over the Jordan, called Djirr-Beni-Jakub, i.e. the bridge of the children of Jacob. There seems to have been here an important pass.

II. GESHURI, Geshurites, a people in the south of Palestine, near the Philistines, Josh. xiii. 2; 1 Sam. xxvii. 8.

GETHESEMANE, the oil-press, a place at the foot of the mount of Olives, over against Jerusalem, to which our Saviour sometimes retired to meditate upon the burden belonging to which he endured his agony; and was taken by Judas, Matt. xxvi. 36 seq. It is an even plat of ground, according to Maundrel, about 57 yards square. There are several ancient olive-trees standing in it. (See the Missionary Herald for 1824. p. 66.) See JERUSALEM.

GEZEZ, formerly a royal city of the Canaanites,
III. GIBEAH. Another Gibeah, which appears to have been called "Hill of Phinehas," is rendered "hill" in our version (Josh. xxiv. 32), when Eleazar married; but in the original it is "Gibeah of Phinehas.

GIBEAH, a city, probably not far from Gibbon, which might be an old one, as its name imports, from a narrow and contracted road or country, to one more open; or it might be an erosion of water, as it were, from the mountain, 2 Sam. iii. 34.

GIANT, (Heb. נאש, nephilim, one who bears down other men.) Scripture speaks of giants before the flood; "Nephilim, mighty men who were of old, men of renown," Gen. vi. 4. Aquila translates nephilim, men who attack, who fall with impetuosity on their enemies; which agrees very well with the force of the term. Symmachus translates it θυρασίαν, violent man, cruel, whose only rule of action is violence. Scripture sometimes calls giants Rephaim, Gen. xiv. 5, &c. The Emim, ancient inhabitants of Moab, were of a gigantic stature, that is, Rephaim. Job says, that the ancient Rephaim groaned under the waters; and Solomon, (Prov. xi. 18; xix. 18,) that the ways of a loose woman lead to the Rephaim, and that he who deviates from the ways of wisdom, shall dwell in the assembly of Rephaim; that is, in hell, Prov. xxv. Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 11, 20; xili. 11, 12; Josh. xiv. 4; xili. 12; Job xvi. 5.) The Asshurim, or sons of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron, were the most famous giants of Palestine, Numb. xii. 33.

The LXX sometimes translate νασαρίαν, gibbor, giant, though literally it signifies—a strong man, a man of valor, a warrior. See in the LXX, Gen. x. 2; Ps. xix. 5; Isa. iii. 2; xili. 2; xlix. 24, 25; Ezek. xxxix. 18, 20.

It is probable that the first men were of a strength and stature superior to those of mankind at present, since they lived a much longer time; long life being commonly the effect of a strong constitution. Giants, however, were not uncommon in the times of Joshua and David, notwithstanding that the life of man was already shortened, and, as may be presumed, the size and strength of human bodies proportionately diminishecl. Goliath was ten feet seven inches in height, (1 Sam. xvii. 4) according to Calmet; but this depends on the length at which the Hebrew cubit is taken.

GIBBETHON, a city of the Philistines, given to Dan, and allotted to the Levites, (Josh. xiv. 44; xvi. 23.) and probably the same as the Gabatho of Josephus. Baasha killed Nadab, son of Jeroboam, in Gibbethon, 1 Kings xv. 27.

I. GIBEAH, (a hill,) a city of Benjamin, (1 Sam. xi. 15; 2 Sam. xxviii. 28,) and the birth-place of Saul king of Israel; whence it is frequently called "Gibeah of Saul," 1 Sam. xi. 4; xv. 34; 2 Sam. xii. 6; Is. x. 29. Gibeah was also famous for its sires; particularly for that committed by forcing the young Levite's wife, who went to lodge there; and for the war which succeeded it, to the almost entire extermination of the tribe of Benjamin, Judg. xix. Scripture remarks, that this happened at a time when there was no king in Israel, and when every one did what was right in his own eyes. Gibeah was about seven miles north from Jerusalem, not far from Gibon and Kirjath-jearim.

II. GIBEAH. There was another Gibeah in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 57,) which, for distinction, is written Gibbethon, (with an n final in the Hebrew,) 1 Chron. ii. 49.
days to the mountains of Gilead, where Laban overtook him, Gen. xxxi. 21. Here they made a covenant, and raised a heap of stones as a monument of the same;' that Laban called it Bet-Edrei, 'the house of God.' But Jacob called it Gilgal, the heap of witness; whence came the name Gilead. Eusebius says that mount Gilead reached from Libanus to the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, which was given to the tribe of Reuben. It must, therefore, have been above seventy leagues from south to north, and have included the mountains of Bashan, and perhaps, also, those of the Trachonitis, Auran and Hermon. See also Jer. xxiii. 6. Gilead, however, is sometimes put for the whole of the country east of the Jordan, between the river and Arabis.

The scenery of the mountains of Gilead is described by Mr. Buckingham as being extremely beautiful. The plains are covered with a fertile soil, the hills are clothed with forests, and at every new turn the most beautiful landscapes that can be imagined are presented. The Scripture references to the stately oaks and herds of cattle in this region are well known. [The name Gilead, as is said above, is sometimes put for the whole country east of the Jordan. Thus in Deut. xxxiv. 1, God is said to have showed Moses from mount Nebo “all the land of Gilead unto Dan.” The proper region of Gilead, however, lay south of Bashan, but probably without any very definite line of separation. Bashan and Gilead are often mentioned together, Josh. xvii. 1, 5; 2 Kings x. 33, &c. A part of Gilead was the district now called Belka, one of the most fertile in Palestine. See the description of it by Burchhardt, inserted under the article Bashan.

MOUNT GILEAD, in the strictest sense, was doubtless the mountain now called Djebel Djedael, or Djebel Djelaoud, mentioned by Burchhardt, (p. 348) the foot of which lies about two hours’ distance, or six miles south of the Wady Zerka, or Jabok. The mountain itself runs from east to west, and is about two hours and half (eight or ten miles) in length. Upon it are the ruined towns of Djedael and Djelaoud; probably the site of the ancient city Gilead of Hose. vi. 8; elsewhere called Ramoth Gilead. Southward of this mountain stands the modern city of Szaal. It was probably in this mountain where Jacob and Laban set up their monument, as above related.—In Judg. v. 3, those in the army of Gideon who are fearful are directed “to depart early from mount Gilead.” Some have, therefore, supposed, that there was another mount Gilead near the plain of Esdraelon, where Gideon then was. But there is elsewhere no allusion to such a mountain, and the passage is unnecessary. The Hebrew reads, “Let him turn back again from mount Gilead,” i.e. from Gilead beyond Jordan, whence the Midianites have come up, and whither they must be driven back. R

II. GILEAD, son of Machir, and grandson of Ma-nasseh, received his inheritance in the mountains of Gilead, whence he took his name, Numb. xxvi. 29, 30.

I. GIGAL, a celebrated place between the Jordan and Jericho, where the Israelites first encamped, after the passage of that river, Josh. v. 9. It continued to be the head-quarters of the Israelites for several years, while Joshua was occupied in subduing the land, Josh. ix. 6; x. 6, 9, 15, 43. A considerable city was afterwards built there, (xv. 7,) which became famous for many events. (1.) It was a religious station; for we read (Judg. ii. 1) that a “messenger of the Lord came up from Gilgal." Comp. 2 Kings ii. 1. (2.) It was a station of justice; for Samuel in his circuit went yearly to Gilgal, 1 Sam. vii. 16. (3.) It was where the coronation of Saul was performed, (1 Sam. x. 5; comp. 2 Sam. xix. 15, 40,) and there was a fair place for national business. Sacrifices were offered at Gilgal, 1 Sam. x. 8; Hos. xii. 11.

Gilgal was named upon the occasion of Joshua circumcising the Israelites who had been wandering during forty years in the wilderness. "The Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you: wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal, unto this day;"—the literal meaning of "Gilgal" being rolling, Josh. v. 2-9. Here Joshua placed the twelve stones that were taken out of the Jordan, when the waters of that river were miraculously divided, to form a passage for Israel into the promised land. The placing of these stones, taken in connection with other similar acts mentioned in the early books of Scripture, presents an interesting subject of inquiry, and leads to conclusions of a singular nature. See Stones.

II. GILGAL, the city of an ancient Canaanitish king, Josh. xxi. 23. It is also mentioned by Moses (Deut. xi. 30,) in order to designate the position of Jericho and Ebal, and was therefore probably not far from Shechem. Gesenius and others suppose this to be the same with the preceding Gilgal; but there is no hint that the Gilgal near Jericho was ever the seat of a king. (Compare Josh. iv. 19, 20; v. 10.) R. CALHOUN, a city of Judah, Josh. xvi. 51; 2 Sam. xvi. 12.

GIMZO, a city in the south of Judah, which the Philistines took from Abaz, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.

GIRDLE. The Hebrews only wore a girdle when at work, or on a journey. At these times, they girt their clothes about them, as the eastern people now do, as appears from many passages of the Old and New Testaments. Our Saviour, preparing himself to wash the feet of his disciples, girt himself about with a towel, John xiii. 4, 5. Soldiers also had their belts generally girt about them, Ps. xxviii. 39.

Bands were often made of precious stuffs. The virtuous wife made rich girdles, and sold them to the Canaanite or Phœnician merchants. Prov. xxxi. 24. The girdle was therefore prized by men and women. Gen. xxviii. 10. We may judge of their value, by the kings of Persia sometimes giving cities and provinces to their wives, for the expense of their girdles. (Pliny Alcib. Athen. 1.) Our Lord, in the Revelation, (i. 13,) appeared with a golden girdle; and the seven angels, who came out of the temple, had similar ones. On the contrary, the prophets, and persons secluded from the world, wore girdles of skin or leather, 2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4. In times of mourning, the Hebrews used girdles of ropes, or sackcloth, as marks of humiliation, Isa. iii. 24; xxi. 12.

The military girdle, or belt, of the Hebrews, did not come over the shoulder, as among the Greeks, but was worn upon the loins; whence the expression of "sword girded on the loins." They were generally rich; and sometimes given as rewards to soldiers. 2 Sam. xviii. 11. Job, exalting the power of God, says, "He lootheth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle," (chap. xii. 18;) where we observe two kinds of girdles, (1,) the royal cinature; (2,) the ordinary girdle. The girdle was used as a purse, (Matt. x. 9; Hag. i. 6,) where the English version has purse.

GIRGASHITES, see GERSHENSES, and CANAANITES, p. 545.

GITH, a grain, by the Greeks called Melanthion, by the Latins Nigella, because it is black. In our translation fitches or vetches, which see.

GITYTITES, the inhabitants of Gath, Josh. xiii. 3. Obed-Edom and Itai are called Gittites, (2 Sam. vi. 10; xv. 18,) and they were of another tribe than the five sons of Japheth, because they were natives of Gittaim, a city of Benjamin, 2 Sam. iv. 3.

GITTAIM, a town of Benjamin, 2 Sam. iv. 3; Neh. xi. 33.

GITTHITH, a word which occurs frequently in the titles of the Psalms. The conjectures of interpreters as to its import are various. Some think it signifies a sort of musical instrument, invented at Gath; others that the Psalms with this title were sung during the vintage. The word Gath, from which this is the feminine gentile form, signifies wine-press.

GLEANING. The Hebrews were not permitted to go over their trees or fields a second time, to gather the fruit or the grain, but were to leave the gleanings for the poor, the fatherless, and the widow, Lev. xix. 10; xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 21.

GLORY, splendor, magnificence. The glory of God, in the writings of Moses, denotes, generally, the Divine presence, Exod. xxiv. 9, 10, 16, 17. Moses, with Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel, went up upon Mount Sinai, and "saw the glory of the Lord." The glory of the Lord appeared (Exod. xvi. 7, 10,) to Israel in the cloud, also, when he gave them manna and quails. Moses having earnestly begged of God to reveal his glory to him, was answered that he could not see his face and live, Exod. xxxiii. 18, 22.

The ark of God is called the glory of Israel; and the glory of God, (1 Sam. iv. 21, 22; Ps. xxvi. 8,) and Calvin remarks that the Psalmist calls his instruments of music his glory, in Ps. xxx. 12; iv. 8, but he perhaps rather means, his voice, his tongue. The priestly ornaments are called "garments of glory," (Exod. xxviii. 2, 40,) and the sacred vessels, "vessels of glory," 1 Sam. x. 12. Where the prophets describe the conversion of the Gentiles, they say, "the glory of the Lord" shall fill all the earth; or, the whole earth shall see "the glory of the Lord." Paul terms the happiness of believers, "the glory of God which is by faith;" 2 Cor. xiii. 9. When the Hebrews required an oath of any man, they said, "Give glory to God!" confess the truth, give him glory, confess that God knows the most secret thoughts, the very bottom of your hearts, Josh. vii. 19; John xi. 23; 2 Cor. xii. 12. When a child's father, or his crown of old men, and the glory of children are their fathers," Prov. xvii. 6. "Woman is the glory of man," 1 Cor. xi. 7. When God thought fit to call his servant Moses to himself, he directed him to go up to Mount Abarim, and the Lord commanded him to take Joshua, saying, "He is a man in whom is the spirit; lay thine hand upon him, and set him before Eleazar, and before all the congregation, and give him a charge in their sight. And thou shalt put some of thine honor [Heb. glory] on him," Numb. xxvii. 20. The question is, what was this glory? Onkelos, and some rabbins, are of opinion, that Moses imparted to him that lustre which surrounded his countenance after his conversation with God; that is, a part of it. Exod. xxxiv. 29. Moses, they say, shined like the sun, and Joshua like the moon. But it may be better understood of that authority of which he stood in need, for the government committed to him. Moses gave him his orders and instructions, that he might acquaint GNAT, a small insect well known. Several commentators differ from our translators in the one place where the latter use the word gnat (Matt. xxiii. 24) by introducing another insect, more immediately referable, as they suppose, to the subject there intended. (See CAMEL.—On the other hand the LXX, Wisdom, Philo, Origen, and Jerome, consider the insects which produced the plague translated of, (Exod. viii. 16.) as rather being effected by gnats. It will be remarked, that those insects permitted in Egypt refer mostly, if not entirely, to the water, and to the air; gnats would be a mixture of both. Barbut says of these creatures, "Before they turn to flying insects, they have been in some manner fishes, under two different forms. We observe them from the beginning of May till winter, small grubs, with their heads downwards, their hinder parts on the surface of the water; from which part arises a kind of vent-hole, or small hollow tube, like a funnel, and this is the organ of respiremption. The head is armed with hooks, that serve to seize insects and bits of grass, on which it feeds. On the sides are placed four small fins, by the help of which the insect swims about, and dives to the bottom. These larvae retain their form during a fortnight or three weeks, after which period they turn to chrysalids. All the parts of the winged insect are distinguishable through the outward robe that shrouds them. The winged insect is one day to breathe. After three or four hours it forsakes its其实, dries itself, rolls up into spirals. The situation and shape of the windpipe is then altered; it consists of two tubes near the head, which occupy the place of the stigmata, through which the winged insect is one day to breathe. After three or four days it forsakes its wings, just as the apostles Peter and Paul, in their epistles, if they did not attack the heretics who afterwards were known by this name, did certainly oppose those principles which afterwards produced the Gnostic heresy. They professed to enjoy a higher degree of gnats, knowledge; and regarded all the Gnostics who held to a literal interpretation of the Scriptures, as simple and ignorant. (Comp. 1 Tim. i. 3; iii. 2.)

1. GOAT, (γάρβα) a well known animal, which was used under the law both for food and for sacrifice. — Dr. Russell observed two sorts of goats about Aleppo: one that differed little from the common sort in Britain; the other remarkable for the length of its ears. 'The size of the animals,' he tells us, 'is somewhat larger than ours, but their ears are often a foot long, and broad in proportion. They were kept chiefly for their milk, of which they yielded no inconsiderable quantity.' (p. 52.) The present race of goats in the vicinity of Jerusalem are, it seems, of this broad-eared species, as I have been assured by a gentleman that lately visited the Holy Land, (in 1774,) who was struck with the difference between the goats there, and those that he saw in countries not far distant from Jerusalem. 'They are,' he says, 'black, black and white, and some gray, with remarkable long ears, rather larger and longer than our Welsh goats.' This kind of animal, he observed, in some neighboring places, differed greatly from the above description, those of Balbec in particular, which were generally, if not always, so far as he observed, of the other species. These last, I presume, are of the sort common in Great Britain, as those about Jerusalem are mostly of the long-eared kind; and it should seem they were of the same long-eared kind that were kept anciently in Judea, from the words of the prophet, 'As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion, two legs, or a piece of an ear; so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Samaria . . . . and in Damascus,' Amos iii. 12. Though it is, indeed, the intention of the prophet to express that smallness of that part of Israel that escaped a deviation, from being seated in foreign countries; yet it would have been hardly natural to have supposed a shepherd would exert himself to make a lion, only of a common goat; it must be supposed, I should think, to refer to the large-eared kind. It is rather amusing to the imagination, and a subject of speculation, that the same species of goats should chiefly prevail about Jerusalem, and the other at Balbec; and that what are now chiefly kept in the Holy Land, should have been the same species that were reared there two thousand five hundred years ago. Is it the nature of the country, or the quality of the feed of it, that is the occasion of the continuance of this breed, without deviation, from very remote times? Rauwolf observed goats about Jerusalem with hanging ears, almost two feet long; (p. 234.) but he neither mentions their being all, or mostly, of that species, nor that it is customary in that country to keep the goats commonly kept in some of the neighboring countries.

Whether the kids of the two species are equally delicious, travellers have not informed us; but it appears from the Hariri, a celebrated writer of Mesopotamia, that the smallness of that part of Israel that escaped, and was commonly kept in some of the neighboring countries.

The following ceremonies, the Jews say, were observed relating to the scape-goat. Two goats were led into the inner court of the temple, and presented to the high-priest on the north side of the altar of burnt-offerings; one being plighted for the Lord, the other on his left hand. An urn was then brought and set down between them, and two lots were cast into it, of wood, silver, or gold, (under the second temple, always of the last.) On one lot was engraved, for the Lord, on the other hand, whatever the lot for the Lord was in the right hand, sometimes in the left, and sometimes in the right. After drawing these lots, the high-priest fastened a long fillet, or narrow piece of scarlet, to the head of Azazel, the scape-goat. Under Simon the Just, the Jews say, this piece appeared always white, which was a divine favor, signifying that God granted the people remission of sins; whereas, under other high-priests, it appeared sometimes white, and sometimes of its natural color, scarlet. To this they apply the words of Isaiah: 'Though their sins were as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow.' (Isa. xlv. 17.) After the sacrifice of that goat, which the lot had determined for the Lord, the scape-goat was brought to the high-priest, who putting both his hands on its head, confessed his own sins, and those of the people. It is then supposed to have been taken into the wilderness by some fit person, and left on the brink of a precipice, at a great distance from Jerusalem; thus, figuratively, carrying away with it all the sins of the people of Israel.

The following curious ceremony, related by Mr. Bruce, presents a striking relation to that of the scape-goat:—

We found that, upon some discussion, the garrison and townsmen had been fighting among themselves, in which disorders the greatest part of the ammunition in the town had been expended; but it had since been agreed on by the old men of both parties, that nobody had been to blame on either side, but the whole wrong was the work of a camel. A camel, therefore, was seized, and brought without the town, and there a number on both sides having met, they upbraided the camel with every thing that had been either said or done. The camel had killed men; he had threatened to set the town on fire; the camel had threatened to burn the aga’s house, and the castle; he had sown the seeds of Mecca; (the sovereigns of the two parties;) and, the only thing the poor animal was interested in, he had threatened to destroy the wheat that was going to Mecca. After having spent great part of the afternoon in upbraiding the camel, whose measure of iniquity, it seems, was nearly full, each man thrust him through with a lance, devoting him, die manibus et dirae, by a kind of prayer, and with a thousand curses upon his head. After which every man retired, fully satisfied as to the wrongs he had received from the camel! The reader will easily observe in this some traces of the Azazel, or scape-goat of the Jews; which was turned out into the wilderness loaded with the sins of the people, Levit. vii. 21. Such is the remark of Mr. Bruce, to which it is not necessary to add. We remember an account of the Hindoo Ashamed Jug, or sacrifice of a horse, which is greatly analogous to the above.

III. GOAT, WILD GOAT. (Sow.) There are three places in Scripture where an animal of the goat kind is mentioned, either directly or by allusion, which it is desirable to identify.—(1.) 1 Sam. xxiv. 2. Saul went to seek David and his men on the rocks of the wild goats; literally, on the supercrites, or on the face of the rocks of the gazels. (2.) Ps. lxxiv. 18. "The high mountains to the ibexes are a refuge; rocks are the refuge to the saphanum." But (3.) there is a third passage, (Job xxxix. 1.) where this creature is more distinctly referred to, and its manners described at greater length; in our translation, "Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? Canst thou mark when the hind do calve? Canst thou number the months they defy? or, knowest thou the time when they bring forth? They bow themselves; they bring forth their young ones; they cast out their sorrows. Their young ones are in good liking; they grow up with corn: they go forth, and return not to them." (4.) A fourth passage (Prov. v. 19.) presents this creature (the gazal,) in a feminine form; the word yahwe, thy wife be as the living hind, and the pleasant roe."

These two last passages seem to be unhappily rendered: for (1.) what is in one, the wild goat of the rocks, is in the other, the pleasant roe; a creature so very different, that while the heiress or the other must be erroneous; (2.) the wild goat of the rocks is said to nourish its young with corn; but corn is not cultivated on or about the rocks where these wild goats are found; and still more unfortunately, the original word, if taken in the sense of corn, denotes corn which has been threshed, and stripped of its husk; a state of preparation every way ill associated with the barrenness intended to be described, as marking the residence of the wild goats of the rocks. We may, without scruple, take the word for the ibex, or rock-goat; and to this agree all the manners attributed to the creature in Scripture; which describes it as inhabiting rocks and mountains, and of a strongly affectionate disposition.

It is proper in the first place to discharge the passage in Job from its corn; in fact, the word rendered corn [bar.] signifies a wild desert place, an open clear country; a roaming track. So, in Dan. ii. 38, animals of a wild country have the epithet bar; and the Targumus use it frequently in this sense; bare and horns, in the Chaldee form. This correction leads to a different view of the passage.

Knowest thou the time of delivery of the ibices of the rock?
And the parturition of the hind how long thou noted?
How art thou numbered the months they dieth?
And knowest thou the period when they bring forth?
They bow themselves; they discharge their conceptions;
They cast forth their burdens;
Their offspring increase in strength;
They augment in size in the wilds;
They go off, and return to them [their dams] no more.

This paragraph, then, it appears, forms the continuation of one inquiry; a representation perfectly accordant throughout, which agrees with matter of fact, and is therefore entitled to be received as correct. The ibex being extremely rare, and inhabiting the highest and almost inaccessible mountains, the descriptions of it have been very inaccurate and confused. For the best description of its nature and manners we are indebted to Dr. Girtanner and M. Van Berchem.

From the information communicated by these two writers, we learn that the ibex is now chiefly found upon that chain of mountains which stretches from Dauphine through Savoy to the confines of Italy, and principally on the Alps bordering on Mont Blanc, which is the most elevated part of the chain. Naturalists agree in taking the specific character of the ibex from the beard and the horns, which they describe as knobbed along the upper or anterior surface, and inclining towards the back. The male is larger than the tame goat, but resembles it in the outer form. The head is small in proportion to the body, with the muzzle thick and compressed, and a little arched. The eyes are large, round, and have much fire and brilliancy. The horns are large, when of a full size, weighing sometimes sixteen or eighteen pounds, flatbed before and rounded behind, with one or two longitudinal ridges, and many transverse ridges; which degenerate towards the tip into knobs.

The color is dusky brown; the beard long, tawny, or dusky. The legs slender, the hoofs short, hollow on the inside, and on the outside terminated by a salient border, like those of the chamois. The body is short, thick, and strong; the tail short, naked underneath, and the rest covered with long hairs, leathery in figure, she resembles a goat that has been castrated while young. She has two teats, like the tame goat, and never has any beard, unless perhaps in an advanced age.

In a state of tranquility, the ibex commonly carries the head low; but in running it holds it high, and even bends it a little forward. It mounts a perpendicular rock of fifteen feet at three leaps, or rather three successive bounds. It does not seem as if it found any footing on the rock, appearing to touch it merely to be repelled, like an elastic substance striking against a hard body. If it be between two rocks which are near each other, and want to reach the top, it leaps from the one rock to the other; alternately, till it has attained the summit.

The ibex feed, during the night, in the highest woods; but as soon as the sun begins to gild the summits, they quit the woody region, and mount, feeding in their progress, till they have reached the most considerable heights. They betake themselves to the sides of the mountains which face the east or south, and lie down in the highest places and hottest exposures; but when the sun has finished more than three quarters of its course, they again begin to feed, and to descend towards the woods; to which they retire when it is likely to snow, and where they always pass the winter. They assemble in flocks, consisting at the most of ten, twelve or fifteen; or in small flocks, according to M. Van Berchem; but Burchardt says, of forty or fifty.

The females go with young five months, and produce in the last week of June, or the first of July. At the time of parturition they separate from the males, retire to the side of some hill, and Borradao brings forth only one young, though some naturalists affirm that they occasionally produce two. The female shows much attachment to her young, and even defends it against eagles, wolves, and other enemies; she seeks refuge in some cavern, and prevents her head at the entrance of the hole, thus opposes the enemy.

The reason for hunting the ibex is towards the end of summer, and in autumn, during the months of August and September, when they usually are in good condition. None but the inhabitants of the mountains engage in the chase; for it requires not only a head that can bear to look down from the great height, but also the address and sure-footedness in the most difficult and dangerous passages, and to be an excellent marksman, but also much strength and vigor to support hunger, cold, and prodigious fatigue.

A reader will gather from these accounts, that the rock-goat feeds on plants sufficiently distinct from the nature of corn; insomuch that corn may be considered as the food allotted by Providence for the support of its young. Also, that the time of gestation is long—being nineteen months. But, direct proof is still wanting of the affectionate constancy of the female ibex, which it has been supposed might be the reference intended in Prov. v. 19. However, the general nature and habits of both sexes of this rock-goat are doubtless so similar, that the circumstantial evidence to this effect is little short of positive testimony. Moreover, Pennant informs us, that "the females at the time of parturition separate from the males, and retire to the side of some hill, to bring forth. This looks as if the females usually kept company with the males; and where the creature is scarce, it is probable they associate in pairs. Neither is this probability diminished by observing that the female ibex has usually one kid, very rarely two. This, if admissible, sets aside the opinion of Mihaesius, who says, "The only passage, where may appear not to agree with the ibex, is Prov. v. 19. This difficulty may be removed, if it be possible, or customary, among the orientals, to consider the female ibex as an emblem of a beautiful woman; but I cannot conceive how an animal so uncomely can, in any language, be adopted as an image of the fair sex." (Quest. No. 81.)

There is another species of ibex, the horns of which are smooth. It inhabits the mountains of Cauda and Taurus, all Asia Minor, and perhaps the mountains on the west of the Nile, and to the other, alternately, till it has attained the summit.

(The 7th, yd3, of Scripture, is doubtless the ibex or mountain-goat, several families of which still feed upon the scanty vegetation of the mountains in the peninsula of Sinai. It is the Capra Arabica, and is called by the Arabs Beden. They exist also in great numbers in the mountains east and south of the Dead sea, the ancient mount Seir. The following season, according to M. Van Berchem, but Burchardt says, of forty or fifty. 4 In all the wadys south of the Modjeb (Armen), and particularly in those of the Modjeb and El Assa, large herds of mountain-goats, called by the Arabs Beden, are met with. This is the Steier herd. They abound on the inhospitable hills of Laur and Khorasan in Persia. It is an animal of vast agility, for Monardus saw one leap from a high tower, and fall on its horns; then springing on its legs, leap about, without having received the least hurt. Pennant thinks this may be the origin of the tame goat. The female of this kind is either destitute of horns, or has short ones.

The same traveller relates the following incident in ascending mount St. Catharine, adjacent to mount Sinai, on the south-west: (p. 574.) "As we approached the summit of the mountain, we saw at a distance a small flock of mountain-goats feeding among the rocks. One of our Arabs left us, and by a widely circuitous route endeavored to get to the herd of them; but, knowing, and near enough to fear that the shepherds on the heights might smell him. The chase of the Beden, as the wild goat is called, resembles that of the chamois of the Alps, and requires as much enterprise and patience. The Arabs make long circuits to surprise them, and endeavor to come upon them early in the morning, when they feed. The goats have a leader, who keeps watch, and on any suspicious smell, sound, or object, makes a noise, which is a signal to the flock to make their escape. They have much decreased of late, if we may believe the Arabs; who say that fifty years ago, it's stranger came to a tent, and the owner of it had no sheep to kill, he took his gun and went in search of a Beden. They are, however, even now more common here than in the Alps, or in the mountains to the east of the Beden. I had three or four of them brought to me at the convent, which I bought at three fourths of a dollar each. The flesh is excellent, and has nearly the same flavor as that of the dear. The Bedouins make water-bags of their skins, and rings of their horns, which they wear on their thumbs. When the Beden is met with in the plains, the dogs of the hunters easily catch him; but they cannot come at the sheiks, where he can make leaps of twenty feet. "R

GOATS' HAIR was used by Moses in making the curtains of the tabernacle, Exod. xxxv. 4, 6c. The hair of the goats of Asia, Phrygia, and Cilicia, which is cut off, in order to manufacture stuffs, is very bright and fine, and hangs to the ground; in beauty it almost equals silk, and is never shorn, but combed off. The shepherds carefully and frequently wash these goats in rivers. The women of the country spin the hair, which is carried to Angora, where it is worked and dyed, and a considerable trade in the article carried on. The natives attribute the quality of the hair to the soil of the country.

GOB, a plain where two battles were fought between the Hebrews and Philistines, 2 Sam. xxii. 18, 19. In 1 Chron. xx. 4, we read Gezer instead of Gob. The LXX. in some copies, read Nob instead of Gob; and in others, Gath.

GOD. This name we give to that eternal, infinite, and unchangeable being, who has created all things, who preserves and governs all, by his almighty power and wisdom, and is the only proper object of worship. God, properly speaking, can have no name; for as he is one, and not subject to those individual qualities which distinguish men, and on which the different denominations given to them are founded, he needs not any name to distinguish him from others, or to mark a difference between him and any, since there is none like him. The names, therefore, which we ascribe to him, are descriptions or epithets, which express our sense of his divine perfections, in terms necessarily ambiguous, because they are borrowed from human life or conceptions; rather than true names which justly represent his nature. (See ELOAH.)

The Hebrews call God, JEROVAH, or Jhbo, which they never pronounce; substituting for it, Adonai, or Elohim; lords, masters, or El, strong: or Shaddai, or Elion, the Most High: or El-Sabaoth, God of Hosts: or Jah, God. In Exod. iii. 13, 14, the angel who spoke in God's name, said to Moses, "Thus shalt thou say, I AM hath sent me unto you." I AM He who is: or, I shall ever be He who shall be. See JEROVAH and NAME.

GODLY, that which proceeds from God, and is pleasing to him. Godly in the Hebrew Scriptures is always connected with his will, and an assimilation to his character, Ps. xii. 1; Mal. ii. 15; 2 Cor. i. 12; Tit. ii. 12, &c.

GODS, FALSE GODS. The name of God (Elohim) is very ambiguous in the Hebrew Scriptures. The true God is other than man: as are the angels, judges, and sometimes idols and false gods. (See Gen. i. 1; Exod. xxi. 20; Ps. lxxxvi. 8, also the following passages in the Hebrew: Exod. xxi. 6; xxii. 8; 1 Sam. ii. 25; Exod. xxii. 28.) Josephus and Philo believe, that Moses, in the last passage, designed to forbid the speaking evil of strange gods. Good Israelites had so great an aversion and contempt for strange gods, that they would not name them; but substituted some term of contempt: so, instead of כ zk, Elohim, they called them כ zk, elimin, nothing, vanities, gods of no value. Sometimes they called idols, ordures; Heb. כ zk, gallima. God forbids the Israelites from swearing by strange gods, or pronouncing their names in oaths, Exod. xxi. 13. Moses says, that the Israelites worshipped strange gods, whom they knew not, and whom he had not given to them. (Deut. xxix. 26.) gods who were not their own; gods to whom they did not belong; which increases the ingratitude, and the crime of their rebellion. The Hebrew may be translated, strange gods, and those who gave them nothing. When we compare this passage with others of Scripture, God seems to have abandoned other nations to strange gods, to the stars, to their idols, but to have reserved his own people to himself; not that he hereby excuses the idolatry of other people; but it is without comparison, less criminal than that of the Hebrews. (Compare Deut. xxix. 26, with iv. 19; xvii. 3; Acts vii. 42; Jer. xix. 13; 2 Kings xvii. 16; xxx. 3, 5; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3, 5; Amos v. 25-28.)

GOG and MAGOG. We unite these two names, because Scripture generally joins them. Moses (Gen. x. 2) speaks of Magog, son of Japheth, but says nothing of Gog, who was prince of Magog, according to Ezekiel xxxvii. Gog, no doubt, signifies the country, or people; and Gog signifies the king; but critics are much divided as to the people and country intended under these names. The Scythians, the Goths, the Persians, and several other nations, have been identified by interpreters as the nation of Gog of the Scriptures. But we incline to think that it is a name given generally to the northern nations of Europe and Asia; or the districts north of the Caucasus.—Calmet is of opinion, that Gog was Cambyses, king of Persia. He thinks Gog and Magog, in Ezekiel and the Revelation (ch. xx. 7—9) are to be taken allegorically, for princes who are enemies to the church. By Gog in Ezekiel, many understand Antiochus Epiphanes, the persecutor of the Jews; and by Gog in the Revelation, Antichrist.

GOLAN, see GAULON.

GOLD, a well-known valuable metal, found in many parts of the world, but the greatest quantity of which is obtained from the coast of Guinea. It is spoken of throughout Scripture; and the use of it among the ancient Hebrews, in its native and mixed state, and for the same purposes as at present, was very common. The ark of the covenant was overlaid with pure gold; the mercy-seat, the vessels and utensils belonging to the tabernacle, and those also of the house of the Lord, as well as the drinking vessels of Solomon, were of gold.

GOLGOTHA, (in Greek, η αναψηπτη, a place, the top of the skull, or head.) a small hill, or rising, on a greater hill, or mount, north-west of Jerusalem; so called, either from its form, which resembles a human skull; or because criminals were executed there. Here our Saviour was crucified; and near to it he was buried, in a garden belonging to Joseph of Arimathæa, in a tomb cut in the rock. The emperor Adrian, when he rebuilt Jerusalem, and called it Eia, projected the tomb, filling it up, and placing idols over it; but the empress Helena had it cleansed, and built over it a magnificent church. See CALVARY and SEPULCHRE.

I. GOLIATH, a famous giant of Gath, (1 Sam. xvii. 4, &c.; A. M. 2941. ante A. D. 1063.) who defied the Hebrews, and was encountered and slain by David. He was descended from Arapha; that is, the old Rephaim.

II. GOLIATH, another giant, killed by Elhanan, son of Jair, of Bethlehem, 2 Sam. xxi. 19. In 1 Chron. xx. 5, he is called the brother of Goliath the Gittite; but whether he were really his brother, or only resembled him in the height of his stature, and therefore his brother in the sense of being his equal, we know not.
GOSHEN

I. GOMER, the eldest son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) possessed a considerable part of Asia Minor, particularly the region of Phrygia; the appellation of which Bochart conceives, with great probability, to be a translation of Greek of the Hebrew word Gesser, "a gourd." Phrygia is literally the gourd country. From Phrygia it extended to Asia Minor, and probably the route of Guesen, (as the word is written,) till Germany, France, and Britain, were peopled by them. They still continue marked, if not distinct, in the ancient Britons in Wales, who consider themselves to have emigrated from the Crimse, and by that route, from the East; a course which well agrees with the hypothesis here proposed. In fact, as Mr. Mansfield remarks, under the names of Cimmeria, Cimber, Cymric, Cumbri, Umbri, and Cambr, the tribes of Cimmerians extended themselves from the Euxine to the Atlantic, and from Italy to the Baltic, having to their original names, those of Celts, Gauls, Galatians, and Gades superadded.

II. GOMER, a harlot, whom Moses the prophet married. Hos. i. 3.

GOMORRAH, one of the principal cities of the Pentapolis; consumed by fire from heaven. (See Sodom.) The Hebrew reads Amora, or Homora; but the LXX frequently express the latter as, p, by g.

GOOD, beautiful, perfect in its kind. "God behold all he had created, and it was very good," (Gen. i. 31.) every creature had its proper goodness, beauty, perfection. "This man never prophesied good to me," (2 Chron. xviii. 7.) nothing agreeable, beautiful, perfect in its kind. The prophet, the prophet's work, the prophet's words, the prophet's throne, the prophet's garb, the prophet's language. The term is used of God, and of God's works and words. The word also can be used to conceal an evil person or an evil idea under the cover of a good one.

GOPHER WOOD. Bochart, Fuller, and some other writers have maintained, that the gopher wood of which the ark was made (Gen. vi. 14.) was cypress. This is argued—First, from the appellation; for it, from the Greek ἀκοράκης, be taken the termination ἄκοράκης, ἀκορακής, and ἄκόρακης, which will nearly resemble each other. Secondly, because, as they prove from the ancient wood, no wood is more durable against rot and worms. Thirdly, because, as Bochart particularly shows, the cypress was very fit for ship-building, and actually used for that purpose where it grew in sufficient plenty. And lastly, because it abounded in Assyria, where Noah probably built the ark. On the other hand, Asenarius, Mommsen, and the Nis. Taylor, and some other critics, think the pine bides fairest to furnish the wood described by the Hebrew word; its relative gopheri signifying sulphur, brimstone, &c. and no wood producing pitch, tar, turpentine, and other inflammables, in more abundance than the pine. Good, perfect, right, or in its kind, is generally a name for such trees as abound with resinosous inflammable juices; as the cedar, cypress, fir-tree, pine, &c.

GOPSNA, GOPSNA, OR GOPSIS, the principal place of one of the ten parochies of Judea. Josephus generally joins it with the Acabaratan; and Eusebius places it fifteen miles north of Jerusalem.

I. GOSHEN, the name of that tract of country in Egypt, which was inhabited by the Israelites from the time of Jacob to that of Moses. It was most probably the tract lying eastward of the Pelusian arm of the Nile, towards Arabia, i.e. between that arm on the one side, and the Red sea and the borders of Palestine on the other. Some, however, have been greatly divided in respect to the situation of Goshen. Cellarius, Shaw, and others, suppose it to be the region around Heliopolis, not far from the modern Cairo; Bryant places it in the Sutic nome or province; O.P. the Plaques of Egypt; while Jablonsky strangely endeavors to fix it near Heraclea in Middle Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile! But most to the view eastward of Rosicmmiller, French and German geographers, have been the route of Guesen, while the French had possession of Egypt in 1799. In accordance, therefore, with this view, professor Stuart, has treated the subject of the Phœnician or Philistian parts of Egypt, as usual, with the prince and the subject of the present study, Vol. ii. Ch. ii. p. 158; to which the reader is referred. The reasons on which this opinion is founded may be briefly stated as follows:

1. The name of Goshen is said, from the arrival of the Israelites in it, to have been given to it, from the Arabian habitants of it, who always went towards Palestine, by taking Elyon, the top of the mountain, and that part of it, as Abraham, by that name, was, to the number of the Christian world, they were all familiar with, and that part of it was unknown to the Egyptians, nor could it be surpassed in the natural beauty of its situation. (1.) According to Ex. xiii. 17, and 1 Chron. vii. 21, it appears that the land of Goshen was adjacent to the land of the Philistines, parts of Egypt, and so, from the arrival in it of the Israelites, a mode of expression which is always used in respect to those who go from Egypt towards Palestine, while those who go from Palestine to Egypt are always said to go down. (2.) According to Gen. xli. 16, Goshen was not far off from the royal residence of the kings of Egypt at the time, which, according to the statement of the text in the Revised Version, was about Memphis, but according to Ps. lxxiii. 13, was Zaan or Tanis, on the second branch of the Nile, and within the Delta. (3.) The Israelites set off from Rameses, (Ex. xii. 37.) the metropolis of Goshen, and probably near the eastern end of the Nile; and the course which they took, as far as the temple of Elyon, was about a day's journey. A day's journey was the distance of the Red sea in three days; or more probably is, if Etham lay at its northern extremity, in the edge of the desert. This would have been impossible, had they come from the vicinity of the Nile.

2. With the above notice agree also those existing in the ancient translators of the Scriptures, and in other writers. The Hebrew mahr is the Arabic maher, and the Egyptian mehr, marr, which is the Arabic meer or meer, marr, in the name of a town in the eastern part of Egypt, near Zelten, and the Omiri, which is the ancients' name for the eastern part of Egypt, and which is still retained among the inhabitants of the country.

3. The authorities of the Bible, the Arabic memoirs, and all the accounts of the ancient history of Egypt, agree here very great, as he was himself an Egyptians, Fyreneus; he always, for Goshen, puts Shof. This was the name of a fortress and of the region around it, in the Egyptian province Shariyeh, in which also was the name Turbol, the Arabic name of Phalasina, as is shown by De Sacy and also by Quadra-mera. (Mem. sur l'Egypte i. p. 61.) In accordance with this view is also the testimony of Makrizi, the celebrated Arab historian, who describes the land of Goshen as being the country around Bilbeis, and extending to the land of the Amalekites.

With the above hypothesis agrees well also the general character of this district. It is in general not capable of cultivation, because it lies for the most part beyond the reach of the inundations of the Nile; but it is so much the more adapted to the uses of nomadic shepherds, such as were Jacob and his sons, and was consequently for them the best of the land. (Gen. xviii. 6, 11.) So true was this, that even in later times, after the conquest of Egypt by the Mohammedans, the region around Bilbeis (the land of Goshen) was assigned to the Arabian nomadic tribes, who had taken part in the conquest, as their appropriate portion. (Quatremère, Mem. i. p. 60.)

This tract of country in general, or isthmus, is described by M. Ruziére, a member of the French expedition above-mentioned, as a vast plain, but little elevated above the sea; now and then having a rolling surface; interspersed also with hills, in general small, steep on one side, and gradual on the other. It is everywhere intersected by valleys, (wadys) wide, but not deep, apparently made by the Nile and the rains. In these, particularly during the rainy season, there is abundance of grass, bushes, and other vegetation, on which the camels that cross the deserts in caravans, are fed. In general, the whole plain is covered with more or less of vegetation, excepting those parts where the drift-sands impose the principal part of the soil, or where there are salt lagoons, near which the whole soil is covered or mixed with saline excrescences.

In February, 1837, the Rev. Mr. Smith, American missionary, passed with a caravan direct from Bilbeis to El Arish, on the borders of Palestine, across the desert, and of course through the northern part of the district of Goshen. From Bilbeis they traveled the first day over an immense plain of coarse sand, almost entirely destitute of vegetation. After-wards, he observes, "the desert became uneven and hilly, and presented a great variety of surface and prospect as we advanced, the fine movable sand increased, forming little hillocks around the shrubs, and covering the tops of the highest hills with immense drifts, formed and shaped in the same manner as banks of snow. Several species of evergreen shrubs, resembling our whitethorn bush, find sustenance in the sand of the desert, and are scattered in such places, where the sand is so thickly drifted over, that it is even the whole of it. Of grass I saw none, except a little in a very few places, growing in hogs, as if in swamps. It is on the shrubs just mentioned, that the Bedouins pasture their flocks. Of these we saw none until the fifth day; after that, many, which were always composed of goats and sheep together, and attended by females." (Stuart's Course of Heb. Study, II. p. 163.)

A very striking feature of this region of country, i.e. Goshen, is the great valley of Saba Byar, i.e. seven wells, through which passed the ancient canal that united the Nile with the Red sea. This canal was found by the French engineers to be still in a state of preservation in many parts of it. The first section of it begins near the land of the Red sea, just north of Suzy (see under Exodus, p. 410.) and runs up through a low wady to the Bitter lakes, about thirteen and a half miles. The second section consists of the basin of these lakes, which run in a northwestern direction about twenty-seven miles, and the bottom of which is from twenty to fifty-four feet lower than the high-water mark of the Red sea. The third section of the canal runs from Serapeum, at the head of these lakes, westward, through the above-mentioned Wady Saba Byar, about thirty-nine miles, to Abasshe, at the western end of the wady, where it joins the valley of the Nile. The fourth and last section runs from Abasshe to Bubastis, (Fi Besoet, Ezek. xxx. 17,) which was on the Pelusian, or eastern branch of the Nile, about twelve miles from Abasshe. The whole valley of Saba Byar, from Abasshe to Serapeum, is subject to be overflowed by the Nile, at the full swell. In 1800, while the French were there, the Nile not only flowed into the valley, but broke through a great dyke near the middle of it, and penetrated almost to the Bitter lakes. The water on this valley, the eastern valley, was from twenty to thirty feet deep. The soil is consequently covered by the rich deposit of the Nile, and is of the same character as that of the rest of Egypt near the Nile, though not so deep. We were not able to find very far where found in it on digging a few feet. The canals run along the northern side of this valley, upon the hill or ascent which bounds it on that side. A similar, but more extensive, valley still farther west is mentioned by Mr. Smith on his own journey from Bilbeis to El Arish. Soon after leaving Bilbeis, they struck off to the right into the desert. Afterwards, he says, "We passed one tract of land, the features of which were so distinctly marked as to excite considerable curiosity. It was a sort of valley, a little lower than the surrounding country, into which we descended, about ten and a half hours [some thirty-five miles] from Bilbeis. It extends north-west and south-east, descending towards the Nile, and narrowing in this direction. At the eastern extremity of this mountain, which now for the first time showed itself, bore south by east. The soil of this tract was a dark mould. I do not doubt that water might be found in any part of it, by digging a few feet. Indeed, after traveling upon it for a half hours, [about fourteen or fifteen miles] we came to a well only twelve or fifteen feet deep, but sufficiently copious to water the two hundred camel and fill the water-skins of the whole caravan, and containing the only sweet water that we found in this thickly, deeply, dry, and the whole of it. Of grass I saw none, except a little in a very few places, growing in hogs, as if in swamps. It is on the shrubs just mentioned, that the Bedouins pasture their flocks. Of these we saw none until the fifth day; after that, many, which were always composed of goats and sheep together, and attended by females." (Stuart's Course of Heb. Study, II. p. 163.)

Valleys or wadys like these would furnish to the Israelites an abundance of fertile soil to live upon, with the opportunity of pasturing their flocks in the surrounding desert. That this was, therefore, the best of the land of Egypt for the Hebrews, is manifest; that it was so also for the Bedouin tribes who helped the Mohammedans to conquer Egypt, has been mentioned above; and that at a still later period it was regarded as one of the wealthiest provinces of Egypt, is apparent from a circumstance mentioned in De Sacy's translation of Abdallatib's Description of Egypt. Appended to this work is a valuation of the Egyptian provinces made in A. D. 1576, for the purposes of taxation. The province Sharkiyeh (Go GOSPEL, Bréviary, good news. The subject of the apostolic message is called the Gospel; that is, a good message, or glad tidings, as the same word is sometimes rendered, Luke i. 10; Acts xiii. 32. It is also called "the Gospel of peace." (Rom. x. 5) because it proclaims peace with God to guilty rebels through Jesus Christ. 4. The word of reconciliation," (2 Cor. v. 18) because it shows how God is reconciled to sinners, and contains the great motive or argument for reconciling their minds to him. "The Gospel of salvation," (Eph. ii. 13) because it holds forth salvation to the lost or miserable. 5. The Gospel of the grace of God," (Acts xx. 24) as being a declaration of God's free favor and unmerited love and good-will to the utterly worthless and undeserving. 6. The Gospel of the kingdom," (Matt. xxiv. 14) because it proclaims the power and dominion of the Messiah, and the nature and privileges of his kingdom, which is not of this world. — It is termed the truth, (John xviii. 37; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 John ii. 21) not only as being the most important of all truths, and the testimony of God, who cannot lie, (1 John v. 20) but also because it is the accomplishment of Old Testament prophecies, and the substance, spirit, and truth of all the shadows and types of the former economy. A general idea of the Gospel may also be formed from the short summaries given of it in various parts of the New Testament. Jesus ascend up the Gospel to Nicodemus thus: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life. 9. For God so loved the world, that he gave his own begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life," John iii. 14, 15, 16. Paul gives several brief compendiums of the Gospel, from which we shall select the following: "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you—by which ye are also saved—how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures," 1 Cor. xv. 1—5. "God hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation, to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them. For he hath made him (Jesus) a sin-offering for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Cor. v. 19—21. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief," 1 Tim. i. 15. John gives the substance of the Gospel testimony in these words: "This is the record (testimony) that God hath given unto us, eternal life; and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life," 1 John v. 11, 12. Morley.

The settings which contain the recital of our Saviour's life, miracles, death, resurrection, and doctrine, are called Gospels, because they include the best news that could be published to mankind. We have but four canonical Gospels—those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. These have not only been generally received, but they were received very early, as the standards of evangelical history: as the depositories of the doctrines and actions of Jesus. They are appealed to under that character both by friends and enemies; and no writer impugning or denying Christianity, acknowledges a fifth Gospel as of equal or concurrent authority, although there were many others which purported to be authentic memoirs of the life and actions of Christ. A full account of these spurious productions may be found in Fabricius's Codex Apocryphus Novi Testament. Jones's well-known work in the Apocryphal canon also gives an account of the principal of them.

The evangelist Luke, in the preface to his Gospel, observes, that "many" had taken in hand to draw up histories of Christian events. He does not blame these writers; but rather associates himself with them by the phrase, "It hath seemed good to me also." Nothing could be more natural, than that transactions which raised so much interest, among the Jewish people especially, should excite the wishes of those at a distance from the places where they occurred, to receive that information which writing only could correctly furnish. Paul, pleading before Agrippa, ascribes to that prince a knowledge of Christian events; and asserts, that "these things were not done in a corner." What was so public and notorious was, doubtless, in general circulation, as well by writing as by report; but, after the publication of the four Gospels now extant, the former documents sunk into oblivion, and were no longer distinguished.

[The remarks which follow here are from the pen of Mr. Taylor. They exhibit a view of the subject which has been taken by some; but which more thorough investigation and research would disprove. The present state of the question as to the sources of the striking resemblances, as well as striking differences, of the three first Gospels, see the additions below.]

Matthew.—The following remarks on the Gospel of Matthew may have their effect in solving some difficulties of chronology, &c.

Let us suppose that Matthew wrote his Gospel the first of the four—not in one continued or orderly narrative, but divided into books, according to the different subjects, or classes of transactions. If this be admissible, it removes entirely the chronological difficulties which embarrass commentators, in attempting to reconcile Matthew with Luke; because it supposes Matthew to associate similar facts in one book, while Luke proposes an "ordered history," according to the course of events. The different plans of these writers led them to adopt different ent arrangements. This also furnishes a reason why Luke might compose an orderly history, which Matthew's, however correct, was not, he having no such design; while in the Mark from the charge of having abstracted Matthew. It has been maintained by many eminent critics, that Matthew wrote his Gospel first in Syriac, and that it was afterwards translated into Greek; whether by himself is not certain, though it is highly probable. Some of the fathers date the writing of this Gospel eight years after the death of Jesus; while others date it fifteen or even twenty years after. (See the additions below.)

MARK'S GOSPEL may be considered, upon the traditional testimony of antiquity, and a collection of facts, gathered by him from authorities adduced by Peter; as well from his private discourse, as from his public preachings. Now, it is not very likely that these facts, which might be heard, or obtained, at that time, in relation to their order as a series of events. But we see no reason why Mark might not also avail himself of such written information as was extant at the time; such, for instance, as Matthew's Gospel. This would account for the verbal resemblance observed between several parts of Mark and some parts of Matthew; while, elsewhere, Mark might adhere to such facts as he had collected, and to such expressions as he had adopted. To exchange these for others, when the histories were the same, would have answered no valuable purpose.

LUKE—It remains that we consider the Gospel of this evangelist as the most regular in arrangement, and the most trustworthy of all the Gospels, and as the most likely to reflect with the deepest gratitude on the pains taken by him to acquire such a knowledge of the series of Gospel events, as that which his history presents. In fact, in his Gospel, no less than in his "Acts of the Apostles," Luke displays manifest proofs of a liberal and cultivated mind, and of ardent research after truth. This is of great importance; for on the accuracy and research of Luke depend much of our satisfaction, if not of our faith. See Luke.

A certain clearness of persons has manifested great anxiety to get rid of the first two chapters of Luke, in conjunction with part of the first chapter of Matthew; but it has never, perhaps, been suggested that a question of the utmost importance rests exclusively upon these impugned portions of the sacred history. The people of the Jews expected, and with the utmost propriety, that Messiah should be, (1.) of the tribe of Judah; (2.) of the posterity of David; (3.) in the direct line of that prince; so that, had he enjoyed his own, as a descendant from David, his right to the throne itself was unquestionable; (4.) born in David's town, Bethlehem of Judah. (Compare John vii. 42; Matthew xxii. 43; Mark xii. 35, 37.)

Now, it happens, that no other parts of the Gospels will prove this fact; so that if we had not these chapters, whatever we might think of the person termed in repurpose "Jesus born at Nazareth," "Jesus the Nazarene," we could not prove that we received as the Messiah, Jesus born at Bethlehem; we could not prove that this person traced his descent from David, still less in the immediate line, and direct descent, from him; we could not even prove that he was of the tribe of Judah; all which particulars are absolutely indispensable in determining the person of Messiah. And then what will follow?—That the Jews, in rejecting Jesus born at Nazareth, as Messiah, were perfectly laudable; for he was defective in a main branch of that evidence which was necessary, indispensably necessary, to vindicate his claim to this title. Supposing him to be born at Nazareth, he was not of Judah, but of Galilee; he was not of Bethlehem, by the terms of the affirmation; he was not descended from David, or at least there could be no proof of it; for how should the town records of Bethlehem concern themselves about a birth at Nazareth?—then why could he not be our Messiah. It appears that those who were unacquainted with the early history of Jesus, uniformly considered him a Galilean, Matt. xxi. 11; Luke xxi. 6; see John vii. 41. They also unanimously described him as born at Nazareth;—this was a circumstance of such direct opposition to a justly founded characteristic mark of Messiah, that we cannot but approve of Saul's opposing, with all his might, the prevalence of Jesus born, as he supposed at Nazareth. Indeed, a prominent topic between those who favored and those who opposed Jesus, was—the place of his birth; and, unless we can prove negatively, that he was not born at Nazareth, or in Galilee, as the Jews affirm; and positively, that he was born in Judah, and in Bethlehem, in which our one old chronicles place these to-be-expelled chapters—we have no (complete) rational evidence to produce, nor any (decisive) reasons to justify us, in supporting our faith. Such is the importance of the introductory chapters to the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. To dismantle the Gospels of any integral part is to injure the religion of which they are the basis, in proportion to the importance of that part; and, if we be not mistaken, a more important branch of the subject, which has now been directed to, can hardly be selected. The genealogy in Matthew was necessary to evoke the descent of Jesus in the royal line of David, and his right to the kingdom; a right, that he constantly refused to recognize during his life—and, being asserted only after his decease, could give no just umbrage to the ruling powers. That was a public document. The genealogy in Luke was a private document; and his preservation of it coincides with the instructions which is characteristic of John.

JOHN—This Gospel is universally allowed to be supplementary to the others. It abounds more in instructive discourses than in narrative; which is easily accounted for, if we suppose John to have had a knowledge of Matthew and Luke's writings. He would, naturally, not desire to load the public with books, for the reasons assigned by him, at the close of his own work.

There are many indications, in the Gospel by John, that the writer had especially in view the refutation of certain religious errors which were prevalent in his time, (see SABRENS), affecting both the divinity and the humanity of the Son of God.

(The preceding remarks furnish only a very meagre and one-sided view of a very interesting and important subject. But the very extent of the subject itself precludes the possibility of doing it justice in a work of this kind; and these additions, therefore, must be limited to a bare outline of the present state of the question.)

The four Gospels contain, in general, the record of the birth, actions, teaching, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Mat
The arrangement of the Gospels in a harmony shows at once to the eye, that, both in the facts and in the language, there is a close relation between the three first Gospels; and that the Gospel of John is a great measure supplementary to the others. Indeed, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, sometimes correspond word for word; at other times, the sense and general language are the same, with variations in the single expressions. One needs only to open a Greek Harmony, to be convinced of this fact. Still more striking is the relation in which Mark stands to both Matthew and Luke; he has only twenty-four verses peculiar to himself; all the rest is found in the other two. He seldom stands independently between the two; but follows sometimes one and sometimes the other, or is the medium of harmonizing all the three. According to bishop Marsh, in that which is common to all three, Luke never accords perfectly with Matthew, except where Mark also accords with him; though, in such cases, Luke is sometimes nearer to Matthew than Mark is. It is singular that Mark sometimes has a mixed text, compounded from those of Matthew and Luke. (See Matt. viii. 3; Mark i. 42; Luke x. 43—Mark viii. 4; Mark i. 44; Luke x. 14—Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 3; Luke v. 37; and elsewhere.)

To account for these remarkable appearances, there has been a subject of deep interest to learned men, and also of great research, especially during the last half of the eighteenth century. It is obvious, that the resemblances can be accounted for only on two hypotheses, or by a union of the two, viz. (1) that one evangelist saw and copied from the others; or (2) that they all drew from a common source; or (3) that they not only had this common source, but also copied from each other. These hypotheses seem, in themselves, very simple; but to carry them out and apply them in detail is attended with difficulties which no writer has yet been able wholly to himself. On the first hypothesis, some have adopted the order of the canon, without further inquiry, and have at once assumed that Mark made use of Matthew's Gospel, which he abridged and corrected; while Luke corrected and supplied what he thought necessary is both the others. So Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, and Hug. Storr held Mark's Gospel to be the oldest, and the source of the others; while others ascribe the same character to Luke. Griesbach showed from observation that the writing of the Matthew and Luke has strictly followed the order of time in his narration, and, therefore, accommodating the narrations of the other evangelists to his; others (as Mr. Taylor above) adopting Luke as the standard of chronological order; others again preferring Mark; and others, still, supposing that neither evangelist has adhered strictly to the order of time in his narrative. Such is the opinion of Newcome: "In fact, chronological order is not precisely observed by any of the evangelists; St. John and St. Mark observe it most; and St. Matthew neglects it most." (Pref. to Harmony.) Indeed, it is every where obvious, as the same writer remarks, "that the evangelists are more intent on representing the substance of what is spoken, than the words of the speaker; that they neglect accurate order in the detail of particular incidents, though they pursue a good general method; that detached and distant events are sometimes joined together on account of a sameness in the scene, the person, the cause, or the consequences; and that in such concise histories as the Gospels, transitions are often made from one fact to another, without any indication that important matters intervened." (Ibid.)
difficulties. He assumed a certain original Gospel, which existed and was used by the evangelists in different editions or recensions; that which they all have in common is from the groundwork of body of this original Gospel; that which only two of them have in common is from some accretions, which were made by the evangelists, and that which o...one has, is from another recension used by him alone, or from some other source. This original Gospel he supposed to be written in Aramaean; and thus was able, very naturally, to explain, how the three Gospels, as being independent translations, might coincide in similar terms and expressions. But still he could not thus account for the remarkable coincidence in the use of the same Greek words and expressions, some of which are unusual and singular. Bishop Marsh, therefore, (in the additions to his translation of Michaelis's Introduction,) improved Eichhorn's theory, by supposing that there existed a Greek translation of this Aramaean original Gospel, which Mark and Luke used in the composition of their Greek Gospels; he supposed, too, that the Greek translator of Matthew probably made use of the Greek texts of Mark and Luke. These suggestions were afterwards adopted in substance by Eichhorn. This theory, for a time made great noise in the world; but when it came to be seen, that a theory so complex and artificial, and requiring the aid of so many subordinate theories, is utterly at variance with the simple character of the apostolic writings; and that no hint occurs of the existence of any such written Gospel, which could be of such paramount authority; on these and other grounds, the good sense of the public recollected from this hypothesis; and the only wonder now is, how it could ever have been received with so much favor.

On the whole, then, we must give up the hope of finding any definite theory, which will entirely account for the close resemblances of the three first Gospels, and at the same time solve the opposite difficulties. We can only, in general, make the supposition, that the evangelists wrote down the traditional accounts (so to speak) which they had retained of the actions and words of Jesus. In their teaching and preaching, the apostles must necessarily often have heard these accounts; and when under the influence of the purposes of their Lord and Master; those relations and repetitions would naturally assume, at length, a definite shape, and were, no doubt, written down and copied among the Christian community. But a written work, coming into circulation, could not have the sanction of apostolical authority; and, therefore, it would be very natural that the apostles themselves, or those who were intimately connected with them, should at length give a more full and complete account of all these things. It is to such previous writings, and to such a state of things, that Luke alludes, ch. i. 1. In this way, the writers would naturally follow the same train as in their oral discourses, and might, perhaps, make occasional use of writings already extant. Thus far only can we safely go.

Gospel of Matthew.—The time when this Gospel was written is very uncertain. All ancient testimony, however, goes to show that it was published before the others. Hug draws from internal evidence the conclusion, that it was written shortly before the siege and capture of Jerusalem by the Romans, when they already had possession of Galilee, about A. D. 65. It has been much disputed, whether this Gospel was originally written in Hebrew or Greek. The unanimous testimony of ancient writers is in favor of a Hebrew original; i. e. that it was written in the language of Palestine and for the use of the Hebrew Christians. But, on the other hand, the definiteness and accuracy of this testimony is drawn into question; there is no historical notice of a translation into Greek; and the preservation of the Gospel, as we now have it, is of being an original; the circumstances of the age, too, and the prevalence of the Greek language in Palestine, seem to give weight to the opposite hypothesis. Critics of the greatest name are arranged on both sides of the question.

Gospel of Mark.—All the writers of the church are unanimous in the statement, that Mark wrote his Gospel under the influence and direction of the apostle Peter. The same traditionary authority makes it to have been written at Rome, and published after the death of Peter and Paul.

Gospel of Luke.—In like manner, Luke is said to have written his Gospel under the direction of Paul, whose companion he was on his journeys. Hug supposes this Gospel to have been written at a later period, after those of Matthew and Mark, and after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Gospel of John.—The ancient writers all make this Gospel the latest. Hug places its publication in the first year of the emperor Nero, A. D. 68, or five years after our Saviour's death, and when John was now more than eighty years of age. This would be about thirty years later than the Gospel of Matthew.

I. GOURD, WILD, a plant which produces leaves and branches similar to garden-cucumbers, which creep on the earth, and are divided into several branches; Cucumis sativus. Its fruit is of the size and figure of an orange, of a white, light substance beneath the rind, and extremely bitter, 3 Kings iv. 39. It furnished a model for some of the carved work of cedar in Solomon's temple, 1 Kings vi. 18. Eng. version, knaps.

II. GOURD or ONAH. There is some difficulty in ascertaining the plant intended by the Hebrew word, kikdym, and interpreters are greatly at variance. Modern writers, however, almost all agree, that it signifies the Palma Christi, or Ricinus; in Egypt called Kilis; a plant like a lily, having smooth leaves some feet long, which bear many seeds. This is of the size and figure of an orange, of a white, light substance beneath the rind, and extremely bitter, 3 Kings iv. 39. It furnished a model for some of the carved work of cedar in Solomon's temple, 1 Kings vi. 18. Eng. version, knaps.

Niebuhr has the following remarks:—"I saw for the first time, at Basra, the plant el-kheroa, mentioned in Michaelis's "Questions." (No. 87.) It has the form of a tree; the trunk appeared to me rather to resemble leaves than wood; nevertheless, it is harder than that which bears the Adam's fig. Each branch of the kheroa has but one large leaf, with six or seven corners. This plant was near to a rivulet, which watered it amply. At the end of October, it had risen, in five months' time, above eight feet, and bore at once flowers and fruit, ripe and unripe. Another tree of this species, which had not had so much water, had not grown more in a whole year. The flowers and leaves of it, which I gathered, withered in a few minutes; as do all plants of a rapid growth. This tree is called at Aleppo, Palma Christi." (Descrip. Arab. p. 148, Fr. edit.) Volney, speaking of the vegetation of Egypt, says, "Wherever plants have water, the rapidity of their growth is prodigious. Whoever has travelled to Cairo, or Rosetta, knows that the species of gourd called keroa, will, in twenty-four hours, send out shoots near four inches long." (Trav. vol. i. p. 71.)

3. Descriptions agree well enough with the plant of Jonah, and may be taken to identify the species to which it belonged.

[Niebuhr, at the close of the passage above quoted, farther remarks: "The Jews and Christians at Mosul and Aleppo affirm, that el-kerro is not the plant which furnished shade for Jonah, but a species of gourd, called el-kerrou, which has very large leaves, and bears a very large fruit; and which does not last more than about four months." GOZAN, a river of Media (9 Kings xvii. 6) and also a province, (chap. xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12) probably that through which the river ran. Salmas, after he had subdued the ten tribes, carried them beyond the Euphrates, to a country bordering on the river Gozan; and Sennacherib boasts, that the kings of Assyria had conquered the people of Gozan, Haran, and others. Ptolemy places the Gauzanites in Mesopotamia; and there is a district in Media called Gozan, between the rivers Cyrus and Cambyses.

[The passage in 2 Kings xvii. 6, Genesis, translates thus:—"and placed them in Chalced (Halah) and in the Chabor (Habor), a river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." This would make the river to be the Chabor, the Chabor of Ezekiel, which empties into the Euphrates in the northern part of Mesopotamia. This accords with the notice of Ptolemy, (v. 18,) who calls the region lying between the rivers Chaboras and Laocoros, by the name of Gozanitis, e. g. the Hebrew Gozam. In 1 Chron. v. 26, the name Haar is inserted between Chabor and the river of Gozan,—which may be an error of transcribers, as the reading of 2 Kings xvii. 6 seems correct and appropriate. In other places, too, Gozan is mentioned along with and before other cities and countries of Mesopotamia, 2 Kings xix. 43; Isa. xxxvii. 12. According to Bochart, Habor, or Chabor, is the mountain Chaboras, between Assyria and Medina; (Ptolem. Geogr. vi. 1.) between this mountain and the Caspian sea there is, according to Ptolemy, (vi. 2,) a city and country called Gauzana, with a river of the same name, probably the present Kizizz-Guzan or Kizel-Ozan, which flows eastward into the Caspian. (Sir R. K. Porter's Travels in Persia, i. p. 267.) That this tract is the Gozam mentioned in the account of the building of the tower (Gen. x. 10, 11,) and the mention of it along with the "cities of the Medes" would seem to indicate a remote district. See Haror.]

GRACE is taken (1.) for beauty, graceful form, or agreeableness of person, Prov. i. 9; iii. 22. (2.) For favor, friendship, kindness, Gen. vi. 8; xviii. 3; Rom. ix. 6; 2 Tim. i. 9. (3.) For pardon, mercy, unexpected remission of offenses, Eph. ii. 5; Col. i. 6. (4.) For certain gifts of God, which he bestows freely, when, where, and on whom he pleases; such are the gifts of miracles, prophecy, languages, &c. (Rom. xv. 15; 1 Cor. xv. 10; Eph. iii. 8,) which are intended rather for the advantage of others, than of the person who possesses them; though the good use he makes of them may contribute to his sanctification. (5.) For the gospel dispensation, in contradistinction to that of the law, Rom. vi. 14; 1 Pet. v. 12. (6.) For a liberal and charitable disposition, 2 Cor. viii. 7. (7.) For eternal life, or final salvation, 1 Pet. i. 8. (8.) There are several sorts of inward grace; for the greater part of the understanding may be called by this name, as well as the graces of the will. There are habitual graces, and actual graces. Augustin defines inward, actual grace to be the inspiration of love, which prompts us to practise according to what are known out of a religious affection and compliance. He says, also, that the grace of God is the blessing of God's sweet influence, by which we are induced to take pleasure in that which he commands, to desire and to love it; and that if God does not prevent us with this blessing, what he commands not only is not perfected, but is not so much as begun in us. Without the grace of Christ, man is not able to do the least thing that is good. He stands in need of this grace to begin, continue, and finish all the good he does, or, rather, which God does in him and with him, by his grace.

This grace is free; it is not due to us; if it were, it would be no more grace, but a debt, Rom. xi. 6. It is in its nature an assistance so powerful and efficacious, that it surrounds the obscurity of the most rebellious human heart, without destroying human liberty.

There is no subject on which theologians have written so largely, as on the grace of God. The difficulty consists in reconciling human liberty with the operation of divine grace; the consequence of man with the influence and assistance of the Almighty.

And who is able to set just bounds between these two things? Who can pretend to know how far the privileges of grace extend over the heart of man, and what that man's liberty is, who is prevented, enlightened, moved, and attracted by grace?

Although the books of the Old Testament express themselves very clearly with respect to the fall of man, his incapacity to good, his continual necessity of God's aid, the darkness of his understanding, and the evil propensities of his heart; although all this is observable, not only in the historical parts of the Bible, but also in the prayers of the saints, and in the writings of the prophets; yet these truths are far from being so clearly revealed in the Old Testament as in the New.

GRAIN, see CORN.

1. GRAPES, the fruit of the vine. The bunch of this fruit cut in the valley of Eschol, and brought on a staff; between two men, to the camp of Israel, at Kadesh-Barnna, (Num. xii. 24) may give an idea of its excellence in that country. Douban assures us, that in the supposed valley of Eschol there are still bunches of grapes of ten and twelve pounds' weight; and Pomponius Mela, who was informed by a Jew, who had lived many years in Palestine, that there were some in the valley of Hebron, so large that two men could scarcely carry one of them.

Scripture speaks of the grapes of Sorek, which were so called either because they grew in the valley of Sorek, or because they had no stones. (See Lev. v. 2; Heb. v. 8.) See Sorek.

Moses commanded, that when the Israelites gathered their grapes, those that fell, or were left on the vine, should be for the poor, Lev. xiv. 10. It was permitted to people who were passing, to enter a vineyard and eat the grapes, but not to carry any away, Deut. xxiv. 21, 22; xxvii. 34. Some learned men are of opinion, the prohibition against gathering grapes after the vintage may signify a second vintage, Lev. xiv. 10; Deut. xxiv. 21; Eccles. i. 16.

Scripture frequently describes a total destruction, by the similitude of a vine wholly stripped; without a bunch of grapes being left for those who came bleeding, Isa. xxi. 5. (8.) There are several sorts of inward grace; for the greater part of the understanding may be called by this name, as well as the graces of the will. There are habitual grapes; probably because of the nitre and sulphur with which the soil was impregnated, Deut. xxxix. 32.

"The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," was a proverb, (Jer. xxxi. 14.) a warning for the people to abstain from sins, lest their children bear the punishment. In using this proverb, the Jews reproached God, who punished in them those sins of which they pretended they were not personally guilty. The Lord said, he would cause this proverb to come in Israel, and that every one should suffer the punishment of his own faults.

II. GRAPEVINES, WILD, the fruit of a wild vine, Cissus, which, according to Flory, bore a red grape that never came to maturity. It is probably the Vitis Arborea of Linnaeus, the wild claret-grape. The fruit of the wild vine is called Oenanthus, or the flower of wine. They never ripen, and are good only for varjuice. In Isaiah (v. 4.) God complains of his people whom he had planted as a choice vine, an excellent plant, that he expected they would bear good fruit, but had brought forth only wild grapes; Heb. fruit of a bad smell, and a bad taste. (See Genesis' Commentary on Jesus, v. 2.)

In the sweat of grass, as food for cattle, in the East, the idea connected with it, and the similes drawn from it, or the allusions to the nature of it, which there is extremely perishable, are so different from the attention paid to that article of agriculture in ourselves, and from the permanent value of it in our own meadows, that we are in constant danger of mistaking the representations which refer it to Scripture. "The internal area of the theatre of Bacchus at Athens is now annually sown with barley, which, as the custom here is, is converted into ephips.; little or no grass being produced in the neighborhood of Athens." (Stuart's Athens, vol. ii. p. 54.) In general "they mow not their grass (as we do) to make hay, but cut it off the ground, either green or withered, as they have occasion to use it. And here a strong argument, that may further and most infallibly show the goodness of their soil, shall not escape my pen; most apparent in this, that when the ground there has been destitute of rain nine months together, and the grass blazed like the barren sand in the deserts of Arabia, where there is not one spire of green grass to be found, within a few days after those fat and enriching showers begin to fall, the face of the earth there (as it were by a new resurrection) is so revived, and thenceforth as if the desert bloomed with verdure, the grass covered all over with a pure green mantle." (Sir T. Roe's Voyage to India, p. 360.) To the same purpose Dr. Russell speaks, in his account of Aleppo; and calls it "a resurrection of vegetable nature." This rapidity with which grass grows in the East may illustrate several passages of Scripture; among others the 16th verse of Psalm cxxxix. "There shall be a handful of corn sown in the earth, in the head of the mountain, the fruit thereof shall grow so tall, that it shall shacle as majestically as cedars of Lebanon; so from the city the people shall flourish in like manner as the grass of the earth:"—meaning, at once as rapidly and as extensively, as this vegetable resurrection. The writers who have furnished these extracts, agree in calling the renovation of vegetation a resurrection; the idea had not escaped the prophets: "Thy dead shall live; with my corpse shall they arise; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out her dead," Isa. xxvi. 19.

Grass is described in Scripture as fresh, perish-face, as may be supposed, grass and weeds grow fast, so such grass, like summis altius ad usus useless and bad." (Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, p. 82).}

GRASSHOPPER. It appears from the testimony of Denon, that there are grasshoppers in Egypt; for so we understand his "locusts which do no damage"—but the creature intended by our public version, under this name, is certainly a kind of locust. See LOCUST.

GREECE, Heb. yw, the same as Ἰώνια, Ἰωνία. This word, in Scripture, often comprehends all the countries inhabited by the descendants of Javan, as well in Greece as in Ionia and Asia Minor. After the time of Alexander the Great, when the Greeks became masters of Egypt, Syria, and the countries beyond the Euphrates, the Jews included all Gentiles under the name of Greeks. In the Old Testament, both Greece and Greeks are called Javan. Isaiah says, (lvvi. 19.) "The Lord shall send his ambassadors to Javan, who dwells in the isles afar off." Ezekiel (ch. xxvii. 13, 19.) that Javan, Tabal, and Meshech came to the fair at Tyre. Daniel, (xi. 2.) speaking of Xerxes, says, "He shall stir up all against the realm of Javan." Alexander the Great is described by the same prophet as "king of Javan," (chap. vii. 21.) Javan was a son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2, 4.) after whom that part of Greece called Ionia was named. It is remarkable that the Hindoos call the Greeks Yavanas, which is the ancient Hebrew appellation. They also regard them with a certain respect, and are seldom described in the Hindoo books, but as molesting other people, who are better than themselves.

Greece, in its largest acceptation, as denoting the countries where the Greek language prevailed, included from the Scythian mountains north, to the Levant south, and from the Adriatic sea west, to Asia Minor east. Hence it is used by Daniel to denote Macedonia; whereas, we read in Acts xx. 2, that Paul, passing through Macedonia, came to Greece; that is, Greece Proper. In this more restricted sense, Macedonia and the river Styron formed the northern boundary of Greece. The Greeks were called Achaei, or Achivi, from Achaeus, son of Jupiter; hence the name of Achaea. They were called Epirot and Helleni, from Hellas. It is probable, however, that these names describe distinct nations, or the inhabitants of Greece at different periods. The name Iones is not only the most ancient, but the most general.

The name Greece in the New Testament is Ἑλλας. Hellas. The name Hellas is supposed to have been originally appropriated to a single city in Thessaly, said to have been built by Helen, the son of Deuaneus, and named from himself. It was afterwards applied to the region of Thessaly, then to Greece exclusive of the Peloponnesus, and at last to the whole of Greece including the Peloponnesus, and extending from Macedonia to the Mediterranean sea. The name of Greeks, Έλλοι, by some is supposed to be derived from a people of that name in the southern part of the country, a part of whom migrated to Italy, and founded the colonies of Magna Graecia; others suppose the name to have come from Επώνιοι, an ancient king of the country. About the year 146 after Christ, the Romans under Mummius conquered Greece, and afterwards divided it into two great provinces, viz. Macedonia, including Macedonia Proper, Thessaly, Epirus, and Illyricum; and Ἑλλας including all the country which lies south of the former province. (See Achaea.) In Acts xx. 2, Greece is probably to be taken in its widest acceptation, as including the whole of Greece Proper and the Peloponnesus. This country was bounded north by Macedonia and Illyricum, from which it was separated by the mountains Acracorinii and Candemii; south by the Mediterranean sea; east by the Ægean sea; and west by the Ionian sea. It was generally known under the three great divisions of Peloponnesus, Hellas, and Northern Greece.

The Peloponnesus, more anciently called Pelagasia, and Argos, and now the Morea, included the following countries, viz. Arcadia, with the cities Megalopolis, Tegae, Mantinea; Laconia, with Sparta, now Misitra, Epidauros Limeria, Messene, with the cities Messene, Methone, now Modon, Elis, with the village Olympia and the city Elis; Achaea, more anciently called Ægiali, or Ionia, with its twelve cities, including the minor states of Stygon and Corinth; Argolis, with the cities Argos and Tegea.

The division of Hellas, which now constitutes a great part of Lycia, included the following states and territories, viz. Attica, with the city Athens, now Atina, or Sestos; Megara, with the city Megara; Boeotia, with the cities Thebes, Pharsae, Leuctra, Corinth, Chersonae, Orchomenus; Phocis, with the cities Delphi, Anticyra; Doris, Locris, with the towns Thermopylae, Naupactus, now Lepanto; Etolia, with the cities Calydon, Chalcis, Thermis; Arcadia, with the city Acarnis, now Asia. The remaining division of Northern Greece included the following territories, viz. Thessaly, more anciently called Pelagasia, Eleusis, or Hellas, with the cities Larissa, Larissae, Thermessa, Phthia, Magnesia, Methone, Phlius; Epirus, more anciently Dodonea, now Albanis, with the cities Ambracia, Nicopolis, Apollonia, Dyrrhachium, or Epidamnum. The most important islands which belonged to Greece were the following, viz. Euboea, now Negropont, with the cities Chelis, Eretria, Cos, Crete, now Candia, with the cities Cnosus, Gortyna, Minos, Cydonia; the islands of the Archipelago, i.e. the Cyclades, including Naxos, Paros, Delos, and about fifty others; the Sporades, including Samos, Patmos, Rhene of Deuaneus, and Samos, the western sea, as Samothrace, Lemnos, Lesbos, with the city Mitylene; and the Ionian islands, including Cytherea, now Cerigo, Zacynthus, Cephalonia, Ithaca, now Tekki, Leucadia, now Santa Maria, Paxos, Coreysa, now Corinth, now Cerigo.

Scripture refers but little to Greece, till the time of Alexander, whose conquests extended into Asia, where Greece had hitherto been of no importance. Yet that some intercourse was maintained with these countries from Jerusalem, may be inferred from the desire of Baasha to shut up all communication between Jerusalem and Joppa, which was its port, by the building of Ramah; and from the anxiety of Asa to counteract his scheme, 1 Kings xv. 2, 17. Greece was certainly symbolized by a goat having a strong horn between his eyes, Dan. viii. 5, 21.

After the establishment of the Grecian dynasties in Asia, Juden could not but be considerably affected by them, and the books of the Maccabees afford proofs that they were. The Roman power superseded the Grecian establishments, but left traces of Greek language, customs, and to the days of the Herods, where the gospel history commences. By the activity of the apostles, and especially of Paul, the

Habakkuk

Habakkuk, one of the minor prophets. Of his life we have no account, except in the apocryphal part of Daniel; (Dan. xiv. 33, seq. in the Vulgate;) according to which he must have lived in the last years of the exile, in the palace of the king of Babylon. This legend, however, carries with it its own condemnation; for this date accords in no degree whatever with the contents of the book of Habakkuk. The latter necessarily presupposes the commencement of the Chaldean period; when this people began to wax powerful, and to become dangerous to the Jewish nation. (See ch. i. 5, seq.) The actual destruction of the Jewish state by the Chaldeans he seems not to have experienced; at least there is no allusion to it in his prophecy. We may, therefore, best regard him as contemporary with Jeremiah; but rather with the earlier period of the latter's life.

The book of Habakkuk consists of three chapters, which all constitute one oracle; or at least may properly be regarded as one. They contain complaints almost all the East, and was generally used in commerce. As the sacred authors had principally in view the conversion of the Jews, then scattered throughout the East, it was natural for them to write to them in Greek, that being a language to which they were of necessity accustomed. [For the character of the Greek language of the New Testament, see a celebrated essay by H. Planck, published in the Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 638, seq. and also Winer's Grammar of the New Testament. For the prevalence of the Greek language in Palestine, see an essay by Hug, in the Bibl. Essays, vol. i. p. 530, seq. E.]

At this time, many Jews had two names, one Greek, the other Hebrew; others Greekized their Hebrew names: of Jesus they made Jason; of Saulus, Paulus; of Simon, or Simeon, Petros, etc.

Greeks were, properly, the inhabitants of Greece; but this is not the only acceptance of the name in the New Testament. It seems to import,

(1) Those persons of Hebrew descent who, being settled in cities where Greek was the natural language, spoke this language rather than their parental Hebrew. They are called Greeks, to distinguish them from those Jews who spoke Hebrew. (2) Such persons as were Greek settlers in the land of Israel, or in any of its towns. After the time of Alexander, these aliens were numerous in some places.

It seems that we have, in Mark vii. 26, the name of Greek, applied not to a native, or an inhabitant of Greece, but to a descendant of a Greek family settled in Syria. We read there, "in the borders of Tyre and Sidon, a woman who was a Greek, a Syrophcenecian by nation," addressed our Lord. The evangelist characterizes her as a Syrophcenecian, to distinguish her from the Greeks of Europe. In the parallel passage, (Matt. xv. 21,) she is called a woman of Cananae, and the history is said to pass in the coasts of Tyre and Sidon.

Gudgodah, a station of the Israelites in the wilderness; (Deut. x. 7,) called Hor-bagidgad, Numb. xxxii. 32.

Habakkuk

Habakkuk, one of the minor prophets. Of his life we have no account, except in the apocryphal part of Daniel; (Dan. xiv. 33, seq. in the Vulgate;) according to which he must have lived in the last years of the exile, in the palace of the king of Babylon. This legend, however, carries with it its own condemnation; for this date accords in no degree whatever with the contents of the book of Habakkuk. The latter necessarily presupposes the commencement of the Chaldean period; when this people began to wax powerful, and to become dangerous to the Jewish nation. (See ch. i. 5, seq.) The actual destruction of the Jewish state by the Chaldeans he seems not to have experienced; at least there is no allusion to it in his prophecy. We may, therefore, best regard him as contemporary with Jeremiah; but rather with the earlier period of the latter's life.

The book of Habakkuk consists of three chapters, which all constitute one oracle; or at least may properly be regarded as one. They contain complaints over the calamities brought upon the Jews by the Chaldeans; together with the expression of strong desires, and hopes that these savage enemies will be requited. The costume is highly poetical; the train of thought something like the following: He begins with laments over the cruelties exercised upon the Jews, and then describes the rude and warlike Chaldeans, (see that article,) and awaits an answer from God, ch. i. The answer is, that deliverance is near still remote, but will certainly arrive at last, ch. ii. Upon another prayer of the prophet, there follows in ch. iii. a solemn theophanie, where God appears in his majesty in order to destroy the enemy and set free the Jewish people.

This third chapter is one of the most splendid portions of the prophetic writings; the language of it rises to the loftiest flight of lyric poetry. On the ground of this portion of his prophecy, Habakkuk may be placed in the first rank of the Hebrew poets. He is not entirely original; for this chapter contains an imitation of earlier writings; (Judg. v. 4; Ps. lxviii. 7, seq.) but he is distinguished for the purity and elegance of his diction, and the fire and vivacity of his imagery. R.

HABERGON, [a coat of mail; an ancient piece of defensive armor, in the form of a coat, descending from the neck to the middle, and formed of small iron rings or meshes, linked into each other. It is also written haubert, and hauberk. Our translators have used this word (Ex. xxviii. 32; xxxix. 23.) for the Heb. נֵרָה, nērāh, which denotes a thick quilted linen, נַעְרֵי, or garment furnished above with a coat of mail. In other passages, habergeon stands for the Heb. שִׁרְיוֹן, shirion, a coat of mail in general. So in Job xii. 26. [Heb. 18.] for נֵרָה, nērāh, where the context seems to require some offensive weapon, as dart, javelin. R.

HABITS. Moses forbids women and men to interchange their habits. The importance of these laws will be apparent if we consider the manners of the East. There the women continue secluded in close apartments, to which men, who are strangers, have no access. Some writers believe, that the prohibition principally forbade those superstitious ceremonies, which accompanied certain heathen festivals. In the feasts of Bacchus, Venus and Mars, men disguised themselves like women; in the first, the men put on women's clothes; in the second, the women put on men's. In the East, the men sacrificed generally to the moon dressed in women's clothes, and the women sacrificed to that deity dressed in men's clothes; because this planet was adored both as a god and a goddess; and was affirmed to be of both sexes. This interpretation is rendered probable by the declaration that "all who do so are an abomination to the Lord."

A change of habit, and the washing of the clothes, were enjoined on the Jews, to prepare them for actions of particular purity, Gen. xxxv. 2; Exod. xix. 10, 14.

To tear the clothes, as a token of mourning, is a custom frequently noticed in the sacred writings. See Mourning, or Burial, Dead.

The strange apparel mentioned in Zeph. i. 8, may denote habits worn by the Hebrews in imitation of strangers; or (in the fashions of strangers;) who, not content with the stuffs and clothes, the colors and dyes, of their own country, must seek others among strange peoples. By Babylonian, Chaldean, Egypt, Lyian, &c. Some believe that the Hebrews not only imitated the worship and superstitions of idolaters, but also wore their habits in their sacrilegious ceremonies. Others, by "strange habits," suppose those to be meant, which were taken in pawn from the poor and unfortunate, contrary to the prohibition of the law, which required that they should be returned against night, Exod. xxii. 26, 27.

The habit down to the foot, or that trails along the ground, (Wisdom xviii. 24; Eccles. xxvii. 8; Rev. i. 13.) signifying, literally, a habit or garment hanging down to the feet; a long, trailing habit, used on days of ceremony. In Wisdom, it denotes the high-priest's sacerdotal mantle. In Ecclesiasticus, a habit of honor and distinction, allowed only to persons of dignity. In the Revelation, our Saviour appeared to John in a long habit, girt with a golden girdle. See Dress.

HABOR, HABOR, CHABORAS, a river in Mesopotamia, which falls into the Euphrates, whither part of Israel was transplanted. Ezekiel addressed his prophecies from the river Chebar, or Habor. Our translation takes Habor for a city situated "by the river of Gozan," and major Rennell says there is found in the country anciently named Medea, in the modern northern quarter, towards the Caspian sea, and Ghilan, a considerable river named Osan, or Kizal-ozan. There is also found a city named Abhar, or Habor, situated on a branch of the Ozan; and it has the reputation of being exceedingly ancient. (Herod. p. 385, 313.) This is probably the place mentioned in Scripture. See GOZAN.

HACHILAH, a mountain about ten miles south of Jericho, where David concealed himself from Saul, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19. Jonathan Maccabaeus built here the castle of Massada.

I. HADAD, son of Bedad, succeeded Hushan, as king of Edom, (Gen. xxxvi. 35,) and obtained a victory over the Midianites in Moab. The city where he reigned was named Avith; but its situation is not known.

II. HADAD, king of Syria, reigned at Damascus when David attacked Hadadezer, another king of Syria, 2 Sam. viii. Nicholas of Damascus states that Hadad carried succors to Hadadezer, as far as the Euphrates; where David defeated them both. (See 2 Sam. vi. 15.)

III. HADAD, son to the king of Edom, was carried into Egypt by his father's servants, when Joab, general of David's troops, extirpated the males of Edom. Hadad, who was then a child, had a house and lands given to him by the king of Egypt, who married him to the sister of Tahpenes his queen. Hadad, being informed that David and Joab were dead, returned into his own country, where he raised disturbances against Solomon, 1 Kings xi. 17.

IV. HADAD, son of Boaz-hanan, king of Edom. He reigned in the city Pae, and after his death, Edom was governed by dukes or princes, 1 Chron. i. 51, &c.

The name of Hadad was long common to the kings of Syria.

HADADEZER, king of Zobah, a country which extended from Libanus to the Orontes. David defeated Hadadezer, and took 700 horse and 20,000 foot, 2 Sam. viii. 3, and A. D. 1044. Seven years afterwards, the king of the Ammonites dying, David sent ambassadors to Hume his son, with compliments of condolence. The young prince afforded his ambassadors, and called the neighboring princes to his assistance, particularly Hadadezer; who, not daring to declare his independence, submitted quietly to Mesopotamian, and there hired troops for the king of the Ammonites. These auxiliary forces, in all probability, came after the battle had been won by Joab, 2 Sam. x. 6, seq.

HADAD-RIMMON, a place in the valley of Megiddo, Zech. xii. 11.

HADAR, son and successor of Achbor, king of Edom, reigned in the city Pae, Gen. xxxvi. 39.

HADASHAH, or CHABASSA, a town in Judah. (Josh. xv. 37.) which Euzebius says lay near Tapha. HADASSAH, see ESTHER.

HADES, see HELL.

HADID, or CHADID, a city of Benjamin, (Ezra ii. 33; Nehem. vii. 37.) probably the Adida or Adida of Josephus, and of 1 Macc. xii. 39, 40, 3. Saphera, or in the plain of Judah. Euzebius and Jerome speak of two cities called Adida, or Adi; one near Gaza, the other near Diospolis, or Lydda. But this carries us too far from Benjamin.

HADBRACH, or Hadbrach, (Gen. xvi. 1.) mentioned by Zechariah, (ix. 1.) who denounced dreadful threatening against it. Pulnoy notices a city called Adra, in HAG, an Egyptian servant belonging to Sarah, who, being barren, gave her to Abraham for a wife, that she might have children. Sarah bore him Ishmael, a son. But Sarah died first; and Ishmael, being a lad, was left without a mother. The Angel of God commanded Sarah to return to Abraham, and he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran. (Gen. 16:1-14.)

HAGAR, the Egyptian servant of Abraham, who was born to Sarah, the wife of Abraham, by whose command he was given in marriage to Sarah as her servant (Gen. 16:1-4). When Sarah died, Abraham sent Hagar and Ishmael away, and they wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. Hagar and Ishmael were appointed to be the vassals of Sarah, and were sent away to the wilderness of Beersheba, where they remained for many years until the birth of Ismael. (Gen. 21:7-17.)

Hagar and Ishmael were appointed to be the vassals of Sarah, and were sent away to the wilderness of Beersheba, where they remained for many years until the birth of Ismael. (Gen. 21:7-17.)

HAGARENEs, the descendants of Ishmael, who were summoned by Sarah, the wife of Abraham, to assemble at Beersheba. They assembled at Beersheba, and there they remained for many years, until the birth of Ismael. (Gen. 21:7-17.)

HAGGAI, the son of Zechariah, the son of the high priest Zechariah, who was sent by God to the people of Judah, to rebuke them for their sins and to encourage them to rebuild the temple. (Ezra 5:1-17.)

HAGGAI, the son of Zechariah, the son of the high priest Zechariah, who was sent by God to the people of Judah, to rebuke them for their sins and to encourage them to rebuild the temple. (Ezra 5:1-17.)

HAi, or Ai, a city near Bethel, west of the LXX. call it Aghai; Josephus, Alia; others, Alath. See Ai.

HAI! a salutation, importing a wish for the welfare of the person addressed. It is now seldom used among us; but was customary among our Saxon ancestors, and imported as much as "joy to you," or "health to you," including in the term health all kinds of prosperity.

HAIL-SHOWERs are concealed drops of rain, formed into ice by the power of cold in the upper regions of the atmosphere. Hail was among the plagues of Egypt; (Exod. x. 36.) and that hail, though uncommon, is not absolutely unknown in Egypt, where we have the testimony of Volney, who mentions a hail-storm, which he saw crossing over mount Sinai into that country, some of whose stones turned to ice; and says, "I drank cold water in Egypt." Hail was also the means made use of by God, for destroying an army of the kings of Canaan. (Deut. x. 11.) God's judgments are likened to a hail-storm, in Isaiah xxvii. 9. But the most tremendous hail mentioned in Scripture, or in any writer, is that which afflicted the Philippians. (Rev. xvi. 21.) "Every stone about the weight of a talent." The Jewish talent was about 125 lbs. How strong is this description! In comparison with it all accounts of hail-stones and hail-storms are diminutive. We have in the Philosophical Transactions, mention of hail as large as tulip-trees, eggs, and in America, hail-stones sometimes fall of several pounds weight; but what is this to the weight of a talent?

HAIR. The law enjoined nothing respecting the mode of wearing the hair. The priests had their hair cut, it is said, every fortnight, while in waiting at the temple. They were forbidden to cut their hair in honor of the dead; that is, of Adonis; though, on other occasions of mourning, they cut it without scruple. "Ye shall not round the corners of your heads;" in imitation of the Arabians, Ammonites, Moabites, and the Edomites; of the people of Dedan, Tema, and Buz; who did this, as it is said, in imitation of Bactrians. The LXX. translate, "Ye shall not make into a loop of the hair of your head." The Hebrew word sāāc imports a loop of hair offered to Saturn. Lucian is an evidence, that the Syrians offered their hair to their gods; and it is well known to have been common among other peoples.

It was usual with the heathen to make vows, that they would suffer their hair (or their beards) to grow, till they had accomplished certain things. Caius, having taken arms against the Romans, vowed never to cut his hair, which was of a red color, and which, est of more artifices, he wore long, after the manner of the Germans, till he had defeated the legions. (Thucydides, Hist. lib. iv.) This has some relation to the law of the Nazarites, who never to have their hair cut, Numb. vi. 5, 6. It was supposed, on having a leprosy, inspection was carefully made, whether the color of his hair were changed, or if it fell; this being one indication of the disease. When he was healed, he washed his body and his clothes, cut off the hair of his head, and of his whole body, and presented his offering at the door of the tabernacle, Lev. xii. 4, 10, 31, 33, &c. But he did not enter into the camp till eight days after, again cutting away all the hair off his body, in demonstration of his desire not to leave any place where the least pollution might remain uncovered, and uncleaned, Lev. xiv. 8, 9. The Levites, on the day of their consecration to God's service, shaved their whole bodies.

Black hair was thought to be the most beautiful, Cant. v. 11. This was also the taste of the Romans; at least, in the days of Horace.

Finishing off the hair was a species of punishment. See Punishment.

HALAH, a city or country of Media, to which the kings of Assyria transplanted the ten tribes. It is mentioned with Habor; (2 Kings xvii. 6,) which shows it to have been on the river Gozan. Hyde supposes it to be Holvan; Bochart thinks it to be Calasadene in Media. (Gezerius and Rosenmüller), and also the opinion of Hyde, and suppose it to be the same as Calah, which is, R.

HALHUL, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 50,) thought to be near Hebron.

HALI, Calil, or Calli, a city of Phoenicia, in Asher, Josh. xix. 25.

HALLELUJAH, see ALELELUJA.

To HALLOW. (See Sanctification, Holy.) To hallow, is to render sacred, set apart, consecrate. The English word is from the Saxon, and is properly to make holy; hence hallowed persons, things, places, rites, &c.; hence also, the name, power, dignity of God, is hallowed; that is, revered as holy.

HALT, to go lame on the feet or legs. Many persons who were halt were cured by our Lord. To halt, is to have no prosthesis. Haman's bleeding, (1 Kings iv. 21,) should, perhaps, be to stagger from one to the other, repeatedly; but some say, it is an illusion to birds, who hop from spray to spray, forwards and backwards,—as the contrary influence of supposed conviction. His mind in alternate affirmation and doubtfuless.

HAM, or CHAM, burnt, snaughty, black; the youngest son of Noah. One day when Noah had drank wine, Ham perceived his parent lying in his tent with his person exposed, which he ridiculed. Noah, when he awoke and was informed of his sin, said, "Cursethe Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be to his brethren." Ham was father of Cush, Meroz, and Canaan. It is believed that he had Africa for his inheritance; and that he peopled it; but he dwelt in Egypt. (See Egypt.) Africa is called "the land of Ham" in several places of the Psalms.

Many writers have been of opinion, that the posterity of Ham suggested the design, and formed the presumptuous project, of building the tower of Babel. But this is without proof.

In the Rezit ul Suffa it is written, that God bestowed on Ham nine sons—Hind, Sind, Zen, Nuba, Kusan, Kush, Kopt, Berber, and Hebrew; and their children having increased to an immense multitude, each tribe to speak a different language, they separated and each cultivated their own land. (Asiatic Misc. p. 345, &c.) Most of these nations may be traced with tolerable certainty to the origin of the Hindoos.

Hand, the origin of the nations bordering on the Indus.

Zayz, may we please, Nube, father of Africa.

Canana, and Kush, the same as are well known from Scripture.

Kopt, the Egyptian, who, it appears, did not receive a name from any town called Coptos, as the learned have usually said, but from a father of this name, after whom such a town might be called.

Berber, whence the Barbary, beyond Nubia, and remotely, Barbery.

Hebrew, Abyssinian, from its present name among the Turks and Arabs in Havesch.

We find, that the more or less of Kush, remained in Asia, notwithstanding the allotted portion of Ham. With this accords, in part, the tradition of the Brahmins, who acknowledge India, but came from the Suidar, or Hardwar. This also contributes to account for the existence of humane kingdoms, and powerful armies, in western Asia; and so, when we recollect, in perfect coincidence with this observation, that "God caused each tribe to speak a different language; wherefore they separated." This restrains the interference of deity in the confusion of tongues to the sons of Ham; which certain the access to us the vital import of the Mosaic history of that event: not—all mankind on the face of the earth, but—all the tribes connected with Shinar, and its progeny.

HAMAN, son of Hammedath, the Amalekite, of the race of Aag; or, according to Hammedath the Buegan or Googean; that is, of the race of Gog, or it may be read, Haman the son of Hammedath, which Haman was Bagua or Bagos, eunuch or officer to the king of Persia. We have no proof; Haman was Amalekite; but Esther iii. 1. reads, of the race of Agag. In the apocryphal Greek, (chap. ix. 24,) and the Latin, (chap. xvi. 5,) he is called a Macedonian. Ahaseurus, having taken him into favor, promoted him above all the princes of his court, who when he entered the palace. This Mordecai the Jew declined; for which slight, Haman plotted the extirpation of the whole Jewish nation; which was providentially prevented. He was hanged on a gibbet fifty cubits high, which he had prepared for Mordecai; his house was given to queen Esther, and his employments to Mordecai. His ten sons were also executed. See Esther.

There is something so entirely different from the customs of European civilization, in Hamman's presumed destruction of the Jewish people, (Esther, chap. iii.) that the mind of the reader, when perusing it, is alarmed into hesitation, if not into incredibility. And, indeed, it seems barely credible that a king should endure a massacre of so great a proportion of his subjects—a whole nation cut off at a stroke! However, that such a proposal might be made, is attested by a similar proposal made in later times, which narrowly escaped witnessing a catastrophe of the same nature. M. De Peyssonel, in describing HAMMON, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 28. Also another in Naphtali, 1 Chron. vi. 71.
HAMPSTEAD, a city of the Levites, in Naphtali, ceded to the family of Gershon, Josh. xxi. 59.
HAMONAH, a city where Ezekiel (xxxix. 16) foretold the burial of Gog and his people would be.
We know not any town of this name in Palestine. Hamonah signifies numberless; and the prophet intended to show, that the slaughter of Gog's people would be so great, that the place of their burial might be called numberless.
HAMOE, prince of Shechem; father of young Shechem, who ravished Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, Gen. xxxiv. (See Dinah, and Shechem.) Jacob, returning from Mesopotamia, set up his tents at Shechem, and bought of Hamor, for the price of a hundred kesites, or pieces of silver, (about 22,000), that part of the field where he had pitched his tents, Gen. xxxii. 18, seq. The bones of Joseph were afterwards buried there, Josh. xxiv. 32.
HAMUTAL, daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, wife of king Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, kings of Judah, 2 Kings xxiii. 31.
HANAMEEL, son of Shallum, a kinsman of Jeremiah's, who sold the prophet a field at Anathoth, Jer. xxxvii. 7, &c.
HANANEEL, an Israelite who gave name to one of the towers of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 1; xii. 39; Jer. xxxiii. 38; Zech. xiv. 10.
I. HANANI, the father of the prophet Jehu, 1 Kings xvi. 7.
II. HANANI, a prophet, who came to Ass, king ofJudah, and said, "Because thou hast put thy trust in the king of Syria, and not in the Lord, the army of the king of Syria is escaped out of thine hands," 2 Chron. xvi. 7. We know not on what occasion the prophet spake thus; but Ass ordered him to be seized and imprisoned. Some suppose him to have been father to the prophet Jehu; but this does not appear from Scripture. Jehu prophesied in Israel; Hanani in Judah. Jehu was put to death by Baasha, king of Israel, who died A. M. 3078; but Hanani reproved Ass, king ofJudah, who reigned from A. M. 3040 to 3060.
I. HANANIAH, one of the three young men of the tribe of Judah and of the royal family, who, being carried captive to Babylon, were selected for instruction in the sciences of the Chaldeans, and to wait in Nebuchadnezzar's palace. His name was changed to Shadrach; and he became celebrated for his refusal to worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. 11; iii. 4.
II. HANANIAH, son of Azur, (Jer. xxviii. 1.) a false prophet of Gibeon, who, coming to Jerusalem in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah, (A. M. 3405,) foretold to Jeremiah and all the people, that within two years all the vessels of the Lord's house, that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, had carried to Babylon, would be restored. At the same time Hananiah laid hold of the chains (or yokes) which Jeremiah wore about his neck, as emblems of the future captivity of Judah, and, breaking them, said, "Thus saith the Lord, even so in two years' time will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon." Jeremiah answered, "Thou hast broken the yokes of wood, but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron; and thou shalt die the death of all the people that hast taught rebellion against the Lord." He did so.
HAND sometimes denotes the power and ven-
The hand of the Lord was heavy on them of Ashdod; after they had taken the ark, 1 Sam. v. 6, 7. "Hand" is also used for parts, times, or degrees. Daniel and his companions were ten hands (נָשָׁבָּה) vizier than all the magi and diviners of Babylon, i.e. ten times, Dan. i. 50. To pour water on any one's hand signifies to serve him. 2 Kings iii. 11. (See Washing, and Baptism.) To wash one's hands denotes innocence, Matt. xxvii. 24. The righteous washes his hands with the innocent, (Ps. xxvi. 6.) in token of innocence. To kiss one's hand, is an act of adoration, 1 Kings xix. 18; Job xxxi. 27. (See Kiss.) To fill one's hands, to take possession of the priesthood, to perform the functions of that office; because in this ceremony, those parts of the victim which were to be offered, were put into the hand of the new-made priest, Judg. xvii. 5, 12; Lev. xvi. 32; 1 Kings xxi. 33. To lean upon any one's hand is a mark of familiarity and superiority. The king of Israel had a confidant upon whom he thus leaned, 2 Kings vii. 17. The king of Syria leaned on the hand or arm of Naaman, when he went up to the temple of Rimmon, 2 Kings v. 18.

To stretch out the hand signifies (1) to chastise, to exercise severity, or justice, Ps. lv. 11. God delivereth his people out of Egypt with a stretched-out hand, and an arm lifted up, by great power, by performing many wonders, and inflicting many chastisements on the Egyptians. (2) The hand of God is still stretched out; he is still ready to strike, Is. v. 25; ix. 12, 17. (2) Mercy: "I have stretched out mine outstretched hand towards an ungrateful and rebellious people, Isa. lxv. 2. "I have called," says the wise man, "and ye have refused: I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded," Prov. i. 34.

Joining of hands, or placing one's hand in that of another person, is a very common method of pledging oneself, making an alliance, or swearing fidelity. Bruce says, "These were priests and monks of their religion, and the heads of families; so that the house could not contain half of them. The great people among them came, and, after joining hands, repeated a kind of prayer, of about two minutes long, this kind of oath was in use among the Arabs, or shepherds, as early as the time of Abraham, Gen. xxi. 22, and certain persons by which they swore, and their children accursed, if ever they lifted their hands against me, the land, or by extension, in the desert or on the river; or, in case that I, or mine, should fly to them for refuge, if they did not protect us, at the risk of their lives, their families, and their fortunes, or, as they emphatically expressed it, 'to the death of the last male child among them.' (See 1 Sam. xxv. 22; 1 Kings xiv. 10; xvi. 11; xxi. 21; 2 Kings ix. 8.) Medicines and advice being given on my part, faith and protection pledged on theirs, two bushels of wheat and seven sheep were carried down to the boat; nor could we decline their kindness; as refusing a present in that country, is just as great an affront as coming into the presence of a superior, without any present at all," Gen. xxxiii. 10; Mal. i. 10; Matt. viii. 11.

There is a remarkable passage in Prov. xi. 21, thus rendered by our translators, "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished; but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered," i.e. though they make many associations and oaths, and join hands among themselves, (as formed part of the ceremony of swearing among these shepherds of Suckem, as related by Mr. Bruce, yet they shall be punished," G. B. Michelin proposes another sense, "hand in hand"—my hand in your hand, i.e. as a token of swearing, "the wicked shall not go unpunished."—How far this sense of the passage is illustrated by the foregoing and the following extract, the reader will judge. —"I cannot help here accusing myself of doubtless, may be well advised against a very sin. I was so enraged at the traitorous part which Hassan had acted, that, at parting, I could not help saying to Ibrahim, "Now, sheik, I have done every thing you have desired, without ever expecting les or reward; the only thing I now ask you, and it is probably the last, is, that you avenge me upon this Hassan, who is every day in your power." Upon this, he gave me his hand, saying, He shall not die in his bed, or I shall never see old age." (Bruce's Trav. vol. i. p. 195.) Bruce's conduct in this instance, seems, in some sense, similar to the behavior of David, when he gave charge to his son Solomon, to execute that justice upon Joab and Shimei, which he himself had been unable to do, by reason of the visitudes of his life and kingdom; and of the influence which Joab, the general, had in the army; but of which the pacific reign of Solomon would deprive him, 1 Kings ii. 6. We learn from Ockley that the custom is observed by the Turks. (But in this passage (Prov. xi. 21.) the second clause refers to the seed of the righteous: the parallelism requires, therefore, that the first clause should refer to the seed of the wicked.) Hence A. Schultens and Rosenmüller translate: "From hand to hand the wicked shall not be unpunished," i.e. from generation to generation his seed shall see punishment; in allusion to the descent of name, property, &c. from hand to hand, father to son. This seems more appropriate.

Perhaps, also, this joining of hands may add a spirit to the passage, (2 Kings x. 15.) "Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart? if it be, give me thy hand." And he (Jehonadab) gave him (Jehu) his hand i.e. in token of affirmation; and he (Jehu) took him (Jehonadab) up into his chariot. So that it was not as an assistance to enable Jehonadab to get into the chariot, that Jehu gave him his hand, but, on the contrary, Jehonadab gave his hand to Jehu. This seems confirmed by verse 16: "So they two rode together in the chariot."

Another thing deserves remark—the elevation of hands in the common act of prayer, (Deut. xxii. 1.) "I have lifted up mine hand to the Lord," Deut. xxxii. 40; Ezek. xx. 28. This is the attitude of prayer also: (Psalm xxvii. 2.) "Hear the voice of my supplication—when I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle; again, (Psalm lxviii. 4.) "I will lift up my hands in thy name," et al. This continued to be the attitude of prayer in New Testament times: "I will that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands," 1 Tim. ii. 8. It is supposed that this lifting up the hand by attendants on prayer, was a sign of their participation in the prayer offered. The right hand was held up on all the occasions; no doubt, as implying the most active, the most ready member of the person. Does this not give us the import of the passages, Psalm cxlv. 8: "Their right hand is a right hand of falsehood," that is, they lift up their right hand in swearing to lies.—Isa. xiv. 20: "Is there not a lie in my right hand?" Am I not swearing to a falsehood?
I. HABAN, oldest son of Terah, and father to Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. He died before his father Terah, Gen. xi. 32.

II. HABAN, or ORANIA, a city in Mesopotamia, to which Abraham retreated after he had left Ur; and where Terah his father died, Gen. xi. 31, 32. Haboe, likewise, Jacob retired to Laban when he fled from his brother Esau, Gen. xxvii. 43. At Haran, Cas- sum the Roman general was defeated and killed by the Parthians. Haran, as it is now called, is situated in 36° 59’ N. lat. and 36° 5’ E. long. in a flat and sandy plain, and is only peopled by a few wandering Arabs, who select it for the delicious water which it contains.

HARD imports difficult, sad, unfortunate, cruel, austere, &c. Pharaoh overwhelmed the Israelites with hard labor, with tasks that were difficult and insupportable, Exod. i. 14. Ye are a people of "a hard head," untractable, inflexible, indecisive, Exod. xxxii. 9. These sons of Zerahiah are "too hard for me;" treat me with insolence, with overbearing, insufferable cruelty, Nabal was "a hard and evil-conditioned man," without humanity, gentleness, or consideration, 1 Sam. xxv. 3. "I followed hard ways," an austere life; my behavior was morose, Psalm xvii. 4. "A hard heart," a hardened, insensible mind. "A hard forehead," determined, resolute. "I have made their forehead hard against their foreheads?" (Exek. iii. 8,) the Israelites are hardened to inaccessibility, have lost all shame; but I will make you still harder, still bolder in reproving evil, than they are in committing it. Isa. l. 7, "I have made thy face like a rock," very hard; for their sins have become hard, and they are become incorrigible.

HARE, an animal resembling a rabbit, but something larger. Moses ranks it among unclean creatures, notwithstanding it cheweth the cud, because it divides not the hoof, Lev. xi. 6. Naturalists generally say that the hare does not chew the cud, but Cowper, the poet, in his account of the three hares he domesticated, asserts that they "chewed the cud all day till evening." See Coxt.

HARETHER, a forest in Judah, to which David fled from Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

HAROD, a well or fountain not far from Jezreel and Mount Gilboa; called from the apprehensions and fears of those who were here tried by Gideon, Judg. vii. 1, 3, i. e. "Palpitation" of the heart, as a symptom of alarm and terror.

HAROSETH of the Gentiles, a city in the north of Palestine, probably not far from Hazor, where Sisera, who commanded the troops of Jabin, dwelt, Judg. iv. 2.

HARP. The ancient Hebrews called the harp the pleasant harp; and not only employed it in their devotions, but in their entertainments and pleasures. Those who have heard it, as animated by ancient British vivacity, will probably be of opinion that it was quite as well calculated for mirth as for solemnity. The harp was nearly the earliest, instrument constructed for music. David danced when he played on the harp; and the Levites: it was, therefore, light and portable, and its size was restricted within limits, which admitted of that action, and of that manner of employment. Such instruments have been found at Herculisemum. [The harp played upon by David was the Heb. בַּשָּׁרַת, Phanor, the Greek στρογγυλή, more properly called a lyra. Josephus describes it as having ten strings, and says it was struck with a plectrum or key;

HAZ (Ant. 19, 9) but this seems to refer to 1 Sam. xvi. 10; xii. 9, where David is said to have played with the hand. Another kind of harp mentioned in Scripture is the psaltery, Greek τύπλα, lit. tabby, which Josephus (I. c.) describes as having twelve strings, and as played upon with the bow. Jerome says it had the form of a triangle, or inverted Delta v. Ps. iv. 7. et al. — It is also mentioned as having sometimes as many strings, Ps. xxxiii. 3; ex. vi. 9. (See John, § 94.) B.

HATACH, Esther’s chamberlain, Esth. iv. 9.

HATE, HATRED, are not always to be taken rigorously, but frequently signify merely a lesser degree of love. “No one can serve two masters: for he will hate the one, and love the other” (Luke xvi. 13) he will neglect the service of one, and attach himself to the other. “He who spareth the rod, hates his child,” i.e. fathers often spare their children out of excessive love to them; but to bear fiercely correcting them is improper affection. “If any man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated,” or less beloved, Deut. xxi. 15. Thus Christ says (Luke xiv. 18) he who would follow him, must “hate father and mother,” that is, love them less than his devotion to him.

I. HAVILAH, son of Cush, (Gen. x. 7,) according to Bochart, peopled the country where the Tigris and Euphrates unite, and discharge themselves together into the Persian gulf. This Calmef takes to the land of Havilah, (Gen. xxii. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7,) which extended to Shur, over against Egypt. (It adjoined the eastern limits of the Ishmaelites, (Gen. xxvii. 20.) and also of the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xv. 7.) Geon-nian takes it for the Cassandra of Sardis, (xvi. p. 729.) near the Persian gulf. The name then probably extended westward over a wide extent; indeed, so as to include the whole country to the borders of Egypt. B.

II. HAVILAH, son of Joktan, (Gen. x. 28,) probably peopled Colchis, and the country encompassed by the river Pison, or Phasis, Gen. ii. 11. There are in Armenia, and in the territories of the Colchians, the cities Colva and Cholvata, and the region of Cholbota, noticed by Haidon. (See Roseum. Bibl. Geogr. l. i. 293.)

1. The Hebrew and Arabic Ha-

zad signifies cabins, or huts, such as belong to the Arabians, and are placed in a circle; such a collection of them forming a hamlet or village. The district mentioned in Numb. xxxiii. 41; Deut. iii. 14, was in the extreme north of the land of Havilah, in Arabia Peraea, where, as is well known, Gilead, and belonged to the half-trade of Manassèsh.

HAURAN (Ezek. xlvii. 16.) was originally a small district between Damascus and the sea of Tiberias; but was afterwards extended, and under the Romans was called Auranitis. It now includes the ancient Trachonitis, the Djebel Haouran, Iyume, and part of Batania, and is very minutely described by Burchhardt. See CANAAN, p. 236.

HAZAE.EL, the prophet Elijah, (1 Kings xiii. 16, 18,) being commanded by God to anoint Hazael to be king of Syria, returned home for this purpose, but it does not appear that he himself executed his commission. Some years afterwards, (2 Kings viii. 7,) Hazael was sent by Benhadad, who lay ill, to inquire of Elisha whether he should recover. The prophet, forewarning the cruelty of the new king, and said, “The Lord hath revealed to me that thou shalt be king of Syria.” Hazael returned to the king, his master, and told him he would recover; but the next day he led a cloth dipt in water over his person, which caused his death; and immediately he anointed the throne. Mr. Taylor thinks it probable that Hazael did not intend the death of his master; and has shown that an application of cold water to the person is used in the East, in certain cases of fever. However unamiable the character of Hazael was, there is nothing in the text, we believe, which positively fixes this upon him as an act of murder.

HAZED, without delay, executed on Israel all the evils which Elijah had foretold. When Jehu raised the siege of Ramoth-Gilead, Hazael took advantage of his absence, fell on his territories beyond Jordan, and destroyed Maasean, from Aroer to Bashan. Many years passed without his attacking the kingdom of Judah, because it was more remote from Damascus; but he began to distress it in the reign of Josiah, son of Je-boaz. He took Gath, and marched against Jerusalem; but Josiah, perceiving himself unable to resist, gave him all the money in his treasury, and the treasures of the house of God, to purchase his forbearance. The year following, however, Hazael returned against Judah and Jerusalem, slew all the princes, and sent a very rich spoil to Syria. The Syrian army was not numerous; but God delivered it up to the inhabitants of Judah. Job himself was treated by the Syrians with great respect, as was also the king of Israel. Hazael died about the same time as Jehobaz, king of Israel, (2 Kings xiii.) and was succeeded by his son Ben-hadad, and A.D. 899.

HAZERIM, HAZEROOTH, HAZOR, AZERO-

THAIM, are all names which signify villages or hamlets; and are often put before the names of places. There is a town called Hazerim, (Gen. x. 28,) where, as is well known, Gilead, and belonged to the half-trade of Manassèsh.

HEAVEN and Earth (Gen. i. 1.) are used to denote all visible things.

Heavens often denotes the air, and the firmament, or expanse. (See Gen. xix. 54; i. 14—17, et al.)

The Heaven of Heaven is the highest heaven; as the song of song is the most excellent song; the God of gods; or the Earth, the Lord of lords, or the supreme of lords. Paul mentions the third heaven, (2 Cor. xii. 2,) which has always been considered as the place of God's residence, the dwelling of angels and blessed spirits. (The third heaven is the same as the highest heaven; and both are used to express the idea of the highest exaltation and glory; q. d. God dwells not only in heaven, but above the heavens, in the third, or very highest heaven. So the rabbins and the Mohammedans make, in the same way, seven heavens. Compare 2 Cor. xii. 2; Eph. iv. 10; Heb. vii. 26.)

I. HEBER, or EBER, son of Salah, was born A. M. 1728. It has been thought that from Heber, Abraham and his descendants were called Hebrews; but it is more probable, that this name was given to Abraham and his family, because they came from beyond (over) the Euphrates or some other river, further east, into Canaan. Why should Abraham, who was the sixth in generation from Heber, take his name from this patriarch, rather than from any other of his ancestors? Why not rather from Shem, for example, who is styled by Moses, the father of all the children of Heber? Abraham is first called a Hebrew about ten years after his arrival in the land of Canaan, on occasion of the war with Che- dorlaomer. The LXX and Aquila translate Heber, Peraees, or Parades, which signifies a passenger, one who came from beyond the river. See Hebrews.

II. HEBER, the Kenite, of Jethro's family, and husband of Jael, who killed Sisera, Judg. iv. 17, xco. Heber's tents and flocks were near the city of Hazor.

HEBREWS. The Hebrew writers regard this term as a patronymic from Heber; but, as we have suggested under that article, it is more reasonably considered to have been originally an appellative, from נָבָא, eber—"the country on the other side," and hence "those who live on the other side," or come from there—a name which might very appropriately be given by the Cannanites to the migrating herdsmen under Abraham, Gen. xiv. 13. It was the proper name of the people, by which they were known to foreigners; and thus distinguished from "the children of Israel," the common domestic name. The name Hebrew is used in the Bible principally by way of antithesis to other nations.

The origin and history of this extraordinary people is replete with instruction of the most important nature, and should be attentively studied by every student of the Bible.

At a very remote period of antiquity, when the sacerdotal caste in Babylonia had begun to spread idolatry even among the nomad tribes of the land, a man named Abraham, distinguished by wealth, wisdom, and probity, in obedience to the commands of the Deity, quitied the land of his fathers, and journeyed with his family and his herds towards the land of Canaan. His faith in the only God, and his obedience to his will, were here rewarded by increasing wealth and numbers. His son and grandson continued the same nomadic life, in Palestine, which Abraham and his fathers had led. By a surprising turn of fortune, one of the sons of Jacob, the grandson of Abraham, became vizier to the king of Egypt; he brought his father and family to that country, and dwelt in the district in the north-east of Egypt was assigned to them by the king, for the sustenance of themselves, and their flocks and herds.

During 430 years their numbers increased exceedingly. A new dynasty now filled the Egyptian throne, and they feared the power of the people attached to the former line, and dwelling in the key of the land towards Asia. They sought, therefore, to change their mode of life, and, by imposing heavy tasks upon them, to check their increase, and gradually wear them out.

During this period of oppression, Moses was born. The Egyptian monarch had ordered all the male children of the Israelites to be destroyed at the birth; and the mother of Moses, after concealing him for some time, was obliged to expose him. The daughter of the king found him, and reared him as her own. As he grew up, he was instructed in the sacred wisdom of the priests; but neither knowledge, nor the honors and splendors of the court, could make him behold with indifference the state of his native people. He mourned over their oppression, and panted to behold them in their former happy independence.

Seeing an Egyptian ill-treat an Israelite, he slew him; and, fearing the vengeance of the king, fled to Arabia, where he led a shepherd's life, near Sinai, in the service of an Arab sheik. While here, he received the command of God to lead his people out of Egypt; he returned thither, and, by performing many wonderful deeds, compelled the reluctant monarch to let his slaves depart. But Pharaoh resolved, pursued, and he and his whole army perished in the waves of the Red sea.

During their long residence in Egypt, the Israelites had gradually been passing from the nomad to the agricultural life, and had contracted much of the impure religious ideas and licentious manners of the Egyptians. They were now to be brought back to the simple religion of their fathers, and a form of government established among them calculated to preserve them in the purity of their simple faith. It pleased the Deity to be himself, under the name of Jehovah, the KING of Israel, and their civil institutions were to resemble those of the country they had left, freed from all that might be prejudicial to the great object in view—that of making them a nation of monothestic faith.

In the midst of lightning and thunder, while Sinai re-echoed to the roar, the first simple elements of their future law were presented to the children of Israel. No sacrifices, nor hieroglyphics were admitted into the religion now given: ceremonies of significant import were annexed, to employ the minds and engage the attention of a rude people. There was a sacerdotal caste, to whom the direction of all matters relating to religion and law (which were in this government the same) was intrusted; but they had no dogmas or mysteries wherewith to fetter the minds of the people; and being assigned for their maintenance, not separate lands, but a portion of the produce of the whole country, their interest would lead them to stimulate the people to agriculture, and thus carry into effect the object of the constitution.

As priests, judges, advocates, and physicians, they were of important service to the community, and fully earned the tenth of the produce which was allotted to them. Their division into priests and Levites, was a wise provision against that sharp distinction which in Egypt and India prevailed between the sacerdotal and the other castes. The Levites, being assigned a distinct class, and a corresponding link between the priests and the cultivators.

Agriculture being the destination of the Israelites, trade was discouraged; for the fairs and markets were held in the neighborhood of the heathen temples. But a number of a numerous people attached to the former line, and dwelling in the key of the land towards Asia. They sought, therefore, to change their mode of life, and, by imposing heavy tasks upon them, to check their increase, and gradually wear them out.

During this period of oppression, Moses was born. The Egyptian monarch had ordered all the male children of the Israelites to be destroyed at the birth; and the mother of Moses, after concealing him for some time, was obliged to expose him. The daughter of the king found him, and reared him as her own. As he grew up, he was instructed in the secret wisdom of the priests; but neither knowledge, nor the honors and splendors of the court, could make him behold with indifference the state of his native people. He mourned over their oppression, and panted to behold them in their former happy independence.

Thus, many years before Con-fu-tse gave the Kings to the Chinese, long ere any lawyer arose in Greece, Moses, directed by God, gave to Israel, in the wastes of Arabia, a constitution, the wonder of succeeding ages, and even memorable for the influence it has exerted on the minds and institutions of a large and important portion of mankind.

During forty years, till all the degenerate race who had left Egypt had died off, Moses detained the Israelites in the deserts of Arabia, accustoming them to obey their law, and preparing them for the conquest of the land assigned as their possession. At the end of that period, their inspired legislator led them to the borders of the promised land, and, having appointed Joshua to be his successor, he ascended a hill and spake to the people from off the top of the country he was not to enter: he there died, in the 120th year of his age. Under the guidance of Joshua, Israel passed the Jordan; the God of Moses was with them, and inspired them with valor to subdue their foes. A speedy conquest gave them the land. No fixed government had been appointed; the people gradually fell from the service of Jehovah to worship the idols of the surrounding nations; and Jehovah gave them up to the power of their enemies. At times there arose among them heroes, designated judges, who, inspired with patriotism and zeal for the law, aroused the slumbering tribes, and led them to victory. Then, too, arose that noble order of prophets, who, in heaven-inspired strains of poetry, exalted the Mosaic law, and impressed its precepts, its rewards, and threats, on the minds of the people.

After the time of the judges, the temporal and spiritual dignities were, contrary to the intention of the lawgiver, united, and the high-priest received the temporal power. This union was left in the person of the upright Samuel, a prophet, the temporal was again divided from the spiritual dignity. The sons of Samuel trod not in the steps of their virtuous father. The prospect of being governed by them, and the want of a military leader to command them, in their wars with the surrounding nations, made the people call on Samuel to give them a king. He complied with their wishes, warning them of the consequences of their desire, and appointed Saul. This monarch was victorious in war; he disobeyed the voice of the prophet, and misfortune ever after pursued him. It pleased Jehovah to take the kingdom from him, and Samuel anointed the youthful David to occupy his place. Saul was seized with a melancholy derangement of intellect. David, who was his son-in-law, won the affections of the powerful tribe of Judah; but while Saul lived, he continued in his allegiance, though his sovereign sought his life. At length Saul and his elder and more worthy sons fell in battle against the Philistines, and David became the next in the line of succession to the vacant throne. The other tribes adhered, during seven years, to the remaining son of Saul. His death, by the hands of assassins, gave all Israel to David.

David was the model of an oriental prince, handsome in his person, valiant, mild, just, and generous, humble before his God, and zealous in his honor, a lover of music and poetry, himself a poet. Successful in war, he reduced beneath his sceptre all the countries from the borders of Egypt to the mountains where the Euphrates springs. The king of Tyre was his ally; he had ports in the Red sea, and the wealth of commerce flowed, during his reign, into Israel. He fortified and adorned Jerusalem, which he made the seat of government. Glorious prospects of extended empire, and of the diffusion of the pure religion of Israel, and of happy times, floated before the mind of the prophet king.

The kingdom of Israel was hereditary; but the monarch might choose his successor among his sons. Solomon, supported by Nathan, the great prophet of those days, and by the affection of his father, was nominated to succeed. The qualities of a magnificent eastern monarch met in the son of David. He, too, was a poet; his taste was great and splendid; he summoned artists from Tyre, (for Israel had none,) and, with the collected treasure of his father, erected at Jerusalem a stately temple to the God of Israel. He first gave the nation a queen, in the daughter of the king of Babylon, then dwelling in that city. The wealth of Solomon and the power of the empire, made him the centre of commerce and of the arts. He passed his time in ease and pleasure, and in the enjoyment of scenes of splendour and magnificence. He brought horses and chariots out of Egypt, to increase the strength and the glory of his empire. Trade and commerce deeply engaged the thoughts of this polite prince: with the Tyrians, his subjects visited the ports of India and eastern Africa; he built the city of Tadmor, or Palmira, in the desert, six days' journey from Babylon, and one from the Euphrates, a point of union for the traders of various nations. Wealth of every kind flowed in upon Jerusalem; but it alone derived advantage from the splendor of the monarch: the rest of Israel was heavily taxed.

On the death of Solomon, the tribes called on his son to reduce their burdens: he haughtily refused, and the tribes revolted and chose another king. An apparently wise, a really false, policy, made the kings of Israel set up the symbolical mode of worship practised in Egypt. Judah, too, wavered in her allegiance to Jehovah. A succession of bold, honest, and inspired prophets reproved, weaned, confused, and brought the kindred nations, and a return to the service of the true God was always rewarded by victory and better times. At length, the ten tribes, by their vices and idolatry, lost the divine protection: they were conquered, and carried out of their own country by the king of Assyria, and their land given to strangers. A similar fate befell the kingdom of Judah: the house of David declined, and the kingdom of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar, carried away the people to Babylon. On the fall of that state, seventy years afterwards, Cyrus, king of Persia, allowed to return to their own land a people whose faith bore some resemblance to the simple religion of the Persians, and whose country secured him an easy access to Egypt. Restored to their country, the Israelites, now called Jews, became as distinguished for their obstinate attachment to their law, as they had been before for their facility to desert it. But the purity and simplicity of their faith was gone; they now mingled with it various dogmas which they had learned during their captivity; and the dispensations of Jehovah, in olden time, had enwrapped such lofty inspiration, simple piety, and pure morality, were at an end; sects sprang up among them, and the haughty, sable, tribe-loving Pharisees, the worldly-minded Sadducees, and the simple, contemplative Essenes, misunderstood and misinterpreted the pure, ennobling precepts of the Mosaic law. (Cabinet Cyclop. part i. c. 2.)

During a period of nearly three hundred years, after their return from Babylon, the Jews enjoyed almost uninterrupted tranquillity, governed by their high-priests, though subject first to Persia, then to Syria. The persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes raised up the valiant family of the Maccabees, who, after a war of twenty-six years, succeeded in establishing the independence of Judea, and the sovereignty of the Maccabees, or Asmoneus:—so called from Asmoneus, father of Mattathias. These princes united in their persons the regal and sacerdotal dignity, and governed the Jews for a period of 128 years, when the disputes between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus gave a pretext for the interference of the Romans, under Pompey, and Judea was reduced to a province of the empire. Julius Cesar gave the prefecture of the province to Antipater, an Idumean, who, at his death, divided it between his sons Phasael and Herod, but the latter was afterwards made sole ruler, by the Roman senate, with the title of king.

During the reign of this cruel tyrant, misnamed "the Great," the people groaned under numerous oppressions, though he greatly added to the external splendor of the country. At his death, which happened in the first year after the birth of our Saviour, he divided his kingdom, by will, among his three sons—Archelaus, Antipas, and Philip. These princes, however, did not long maintain the Herodian dynasty; for about A.D. 44, Judas surnk to the rank of a minor province, and the government was confided to procurators sent from Rome, under whom it continued till the destruction of Jerusalem. After the destruction of the once holy city, it was compartmentalized under the government of the presidents of Syria, and the Jews continued subject to the Romans till the reign of Adrian; when they rebelled, and were entirely dispersed.

The government of the Hebrews is, by Josephus, called a theocracy; by which he means a form of government which assigns the whole power to God, with the management of all the national affairs—all, in fact, being the proper king of the state. This government, however, underwent several changes. Calmest notices the legislator Moses; his successor Joshua; the judges; the kings, and the high-priests. Under all these revolutions, God was considered as the monarch of Israel; but he did not exercise his authority and jurisdiction always in the same manner. In the time of Moses he governed immediately; for, on all emergencies, he revealed his will, which was put in execution. He dwelt among his people as a king in his palace, or in the midst of his camp; always ready to give an answer when consulted, to restrain those who transgressed his laws, to instruct those who had difficulties about the sense of his ordinances, to determine those who were in suspense about any important undertaking. This was, properly, the time of the theocracy, in the strictest sense of the term. Under Joshua and the judges it continued the same; the former, being filled by the spirit which animated Moses, would undertake nothing without consulting Jehovah; and the latter were leaders, raised up by himself, to deliver the Hebrews and to guide them, his name. In the time of Moses he governed immediately; for a king occasioned the prophet-judge great disquietude, for he regarded it as a rejection of the theocratic government, 1 Sam. viii. 5, 7. God complied with the wishes of the people, but he still retained the real sovereignty. He governed them as a king; settles his rights; disposes of him as he pleases; and reproves him when he fails in obedience and submission. God "granted them a king in his indignation, and took him away in his wrath," Hos. xii.

Moses, in anticipation of this event, had prescribed a number of regulations for the government of the Hebrew kings, in which the principle of theocracy is fully recognized, Deut. xvii. 14, 16. The monarchs were to be chosen by God; to be instructed by his priests; to be submissive to his orders; not to undertake any thing of consequence without consulting him; and to be under such dependence on his will that he might reject them, as he did Saul, when they neglected their duty. When God promised David to make the crown hereditary in his family, it was a departure from the fundamental maxim of the monarchy, that the kings should be elective, and be placed over the people by God.

It must be admitted, that after this prince, the kings of Judah and Israel governed according to their own will; and after the schism of Jeroboam, few of them observed the rules of the theocracy. They would not submit to restraint, but endeavored to cast off that happy subjection to which the judges and the first kings had submitted. All kinds of calamities then poured in upon them and their subjects; they were delivered as a prey to their enemies, and had no peace or prosperity at home or abroad. God visited them with a multitude of troubles, and at last dispersed them into distant countries. To remind them of their dependence, and bring them back to their duty, however, the Lord raised up, from time to time, prophets, full of zeal and courage, who boldly upbraided them with their prerogatives and impieties; and who opposed themselves, like a wall of brass, to whatever they committed contrary to the rights of God. These holy men did not only appear in Judah, where the public worship of Jehovah was maintained, but also in Israel, however schismatic and polluted that might be.

It is obvious, therefore, that, notwithstanding the almost general defection of the two kingdoms, God still maintained his theocracy in them, as well by his vengeance executed against wicked kings, as by those good princes who obeyed his commands, and those prophets whom he raised up, from time to time, till the captivity of Babylon.

During the captivity, we are not to expect any certain form of government in Israel, nor any regular polity. In vain the Jews pretend to find one beyond the Euphrates, either before or since Cyrus's time. We know of none that was well supported even after the return from the captivity, during the time the Hebrews were subject to the kings of Persia and of Greece. During these times the government was a kind of aristocracy, subordinate to the Persians and the Grecians. The high-priest was at the head of the principal people, whose power, being limited by the sovereign authority, only extended to matters relating to the law and religion. It was a kind of voluntary or conventional jurisdiction, to which the people submitted, so far as they pleased.

The Asmonanean princes introduced a fifth period, which presents a new aspect of government. After the Maccabees had got the country, with great hazard of their lives, and had, with extraordinary bravery, repelled the wicked commands of Antiochus Epiphanes, they shook off the yoke of the kings of Assyria, and, asserting their liberty, they reigned. He gave them, as kings, and of kings. By the consent of the people, they united the high-priesthood to the supreme authority. Under the government of these princes, we find evident traces of the theocracy. The supreme governor was invested with the sacerdotal character; so that the kingdom was what Moses calls "a kingdom of priests," (Exod. xix. 6.) or, as Peter speaks, (1 Epist. ii. 9.) "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood." The royal power, and the sacerdotal united, made a singular kind of polity, under princes entirely devoted to the service of God, instructed in his laws, and interested by the rules of politics to support them, and to make the people observe them. They could by no possibility endure idolatry, ignorance, impurity; or those gross disorders which had prevailed under the kings. So that the commonwealth of the Hebrews was never more in earnest to perform the laws of God, or more exempt from those crimes denounced by the prophets, than under the Asmonanean princes.
HEBREWS

Under their government, the Romans did not inter-fer with religion; they even left a considerable share of authority to the lesser princes of the As-sonian race. Herod succeeded to the kingdom, under the protection of the Romans, but he sacrificed every thing to his ambition and politics; and though he made an outward profession of the Jewish religion, he violated it on many occasions. The priests and people, however, continued firmly attached to it; and when Christ appeared, external religion was in a flourishing condition. His preaching chiefly re-proved the Pharisees, who, by their subtle distinctions, and refinements on the law, had obscured its true sense, and subverted its real intention. Our Saviour exposed their hypocrisy, censured and corrected their mistakes, restored primitive piety, and gave the rules of a pure and sincere worship, in mind and in truth.

The religion of the Jews may be considered in different points of view, with respect to the different conditions of their nation. Under the patriarchs, they were occasionally instructed in the will of God, found ed in the promise to Abraham, and the appointed seal of the covenant made by God with Abraham, and followed the laws which reason, assisted by the lights of grace and faith, discover to honest hearts, who seriously seek God, his righteousness, and truth. They lived in expectation of the Messiah, the desire of all nations, to complete their hopes and wishes, and fully to instruct and bless them. Such was the religion of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Joseph, &c. who maintained the worship of God, and the tradition of the true religion.

After the time of Moses, the religion of the Hebrews became more fixed. Previously, every one honored God according to his heart and judgment; but now, ceremonies, days, feasts, priests and sacrifices were determined with great exactness. The legislator described the age, sex, and color of certain victims; their number, qualities, and nature; at what hour, by whom, and on what occasions they were to be of-erred. He prescribed the several purifications to be used in preparing themselves for their approach to things holy, and the legal impurities which forbade their approach; the means of preventing, of avoiding, and of expiating pollutions. He regulated the tribe, the family, the bodily qualities, the habits, order, of God, and the tradition of the true religion.

He specified the measures, metals, woods, and works of the tabernacle, or portable temple; the dimensions, metal, and figure of the altar, and its utensils; in a word, he omitted nothing which concerned the worship of God, who was the first and principal; few, more properly speaking, the only object of the Jewish religion.

The long abode of the Hebrews in Egypt had cherished in them a strong propensity to idolatry; and neither the miracles of Moses, nor his precautions to withdraw them from the worship of idols, nor the rigor of his laws, nor the splendid marks of God's presence in the Israelitish camp, were able to conquer this unhappy perversity. We know with what facility they adopted the adoration of the golden calf, when they had scarcely passed the channel of the Red sea, where they had been eye-witnesses of divinely preserving wonders!

Moses delivered his laws in the wilderness; but they were not all observed there. (See Deut. xii, 8, 9.)

The Hebrews did not circumcise the children born during their wanderings, because of the danger to which infants newly circumcised would have been exposed; and also because the people of Israel, not being then mingled with other nations, were under such a necessity of taking that sign, which was instituted primarily to distinguish them, Josh. v. 4, 5, 6, 7.

During the wars of Joshua against the Canaanites, and before the art of God was established in a fixed place, it was difficult to observe all the laws of Moses; and hence we see under Joshua and the Judges, and even in the reign of Saul, much laxity of conduct, ot observable under David or Solomon, when the Hebrews were at peace, and when there was more easy access to the tabernacle. "In those days there was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes," Judg. xvii. 5, 6. Hence Nehemiah's epithet, at Laish, (ch. viii. 31,) that which Gideon made in his family, (ch. xviii. 27,) the irre-regularities of Elisha's sons, (1 Sam. xi. 12, 13,) the crime of the inhabitants of Gibeah, (Judg. xix. 22, &c.) and the frequent idolatries of the Israelites.

Saul and David, with all their authority, were not able entirely to suppress such inveterate disorders.
Supercilious, to exercise in public, were practised in private.
They sacrificed on the high places, and consulted diviners and magicians. Solomon, when God had chosen to build his temple, was himself a stone of stumbling to Israel. He erected an altar to the false gods of the Phoenicians, Moabites, and Ammonites; and not only permitted his wives to worship the gods of their own country, but himself adored them, 1 Kings xi. 5—7.
Most of his successors showed a similar weakness.
Barabbas introduced the worship of the golden calves into Israel, which took such deep root that it was never entirely extirpated.

By the captivity in Babylon the Hebrews were brought to repentance, and renounced idolatry.
Henceforth they became devoted to the service of the true God, and no false gods were tolerated amongst them. During the reign of the Maccabean princes, however, another evil, equally pernicious in its effects on genuine religion, sprung up among them. The sect of the Pharisees, who diverted the law of its simplicity and purity, and superadded to it a number of pernicious doctrines, said to have been preserved by tradition from Moses, acquired great importance in the state, and their opinions and observances had the tendency of dividing and Levitiing the state from the essence of religion—the pure and spiritual worship of God, and attaching them to a number of unmeaning, and to some immoral, ceremonies.
At the time of our Saviour's appearance, he found the Hebrews divided into two principal sects, the sects of the Pharisees and the Sadducees; the former of whom made the law of God void by their tradition, and the latter of whom were a sort of religious Epicureans. They denied the resurrection of the dead, and the existence of angels and spirits. Never had there been so much zeal and punctuality among the Hebrews in the observance of their ritual, united with so great an aversion to the religion of the heart, which these were intended to promote. His remonstrances, instructions, and denunciations were fruitless, as to the nation generally; they pursued their infatuated career, until, having filled up the measure of their iniquity, they were given over by God to those bitter punishments, which have rendered them a by-word among all people.

The Hebrew ceremonial was of a typical character; prefiguring the priesthood and kingdom of Christ, and the privileges and happiness of his people. Their

Of judicial procedure, or form of process, as we call it, our information is scanty. In the early period of the Hebrew commonwealth, the procedure was no doubt very summary, as few rules are prescribed for conducting it. Every man managed his own cause; 1 Kings iii. 15—28. From a passage in Job, (xxix. 15—17.) Michaelis infers that men of wisdom and influence might be asked for their opinions in difficult cases, and that they might also interfere to assist those who were not capable of defending themselves against malicious accusers. The exhortation in Isa. i. 17. he also thinks to have a reference to such a practice. In criminal cases the judges' first business was to exhort the accused person to confess the crime with which he stood charged, "that he might have a portion in the next life," Josh. vii. 19. The oath was then administered to the witnesses, (Lev. v. 1.) who offered their evidence against him; after which he was heard in defence, John vii. 51. In matters where life was concerned, one witness was not sufficient; (Numb. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvi. 6, 7; xix. 15.) but in those of lesser moment, particularly those relating to money and value, it seems that a single witness, if unquestionable, and upon oath, was enough to decide between plaintiff and defendant. For the account of our Saviour's trial before the supreme council, we see that witnesses were examined separately, and without hearing each other's declaration, and that it was necessarily in the presence of the accused. This is evident, from the contradiction in the evidence of the two witnesses brought against Jesus, (Mark xiv. 56, seq.) which would doubtless have been avoided, had they been admitted into court together.

Sentence having been pronounced on a person found guilty of a capital crime, he was hurried away to the place of execution; and in cases where the punishment of stoning was inflicted, the witnesses were compelled to take the lead, Deut. xvii. 7; Acts vii. 55, 59. It was also customary for the judge and the witnesses to lay their hands on the criminal's head, saying, "Thy blood be upon thine own head." In allusion to this usage, which was a declaration of the justice of the sentence, the Jews alluded, when they said, we have此处 to lay our hands on the thief, his blood shall be upon us and our children," Matt. xxvii. 25. In Matt. xxvi. 39, 42, where our Lord says, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me," there is an allusion to the practice which obtained of giving to the malefactor a cup of wine, in which there was infused a grain of incense, for the purpose of intoxicating and stupefying him, that he might be the less sensible of pain. For deciding in disputed cases of property, where no other means remained, recourse was had to the sacred lot, which was regarded as the determination of God, Prov. xvi. 33; xviii. 18. It was for this purpose that the wort and thummah was employed; as it was in criminal cases for the discovery of the guilty; but never for convicting them.

During the times of the New Testament, the Roman tribunal was the last resort, in cases of coercion. The Jews could put no man to death without the consent of the governor, (John xviii. 31.) though they had the power of inflicting inferior punishments, and in most other respects lived according to their own laws. Hence the allusions to the Roman law of trial, &c. in the New Testament are very numerous; as (1.) crucifixion; (2.) hanging; or the Wherever settled, and for however long, they still cherish a recollection or reverence, unparalleled among nations. They have not lost it; they will not lose it; and they transmit it to their posterity, however comfortably they may be settled in any residence, or in any country. They hope against hope, to see Zion and Jerusalem revive from their ashes.

7. The number of the Jewish nation was estimated, a few years ago, for the information of Buonaparte, at the following amount; but from what documents we know not:

- In the Turkish empire .......................... 1,000,000
- In Persia, China, India, on the east ......... 300,000
- In the west of Europe, Africa, America ...... 1,700,000
- Total ........................................... 3,000,000

This number is probably very far short of the truth. Melchior estimates them at 4,000,000 to 6,000,000.

8. The long-continued existence of the Hebrews as a separate people, is not only a standing evidence of the truth of the Bible, but is of that kind which defies hesitation, imitation, or parallel. Were this people totally extinct, some might affect to say, that they never existed; or that if they did once exist, that they never practiced such rites as were imputed to them; or that they were not a numerous people, but a small tribe of ignorant and unsettled Arabs. The care with which the Jews preserve their sacred books, and the conformity of those preserved in the East with those of the West, as lately attested, is a satisfactory argument in favor of the genuineness of both; and, further, the dispersion of the nation has proved the security of these documents; and it is not been in the power of any one enemy, however potent, to destroy the entire series, or to consign it to oblivion. There appears to have been a distinction or pre-rogative generally attached to the appellation Hebrew, in the early days of the gospel. Paul describes himself as a "Hebrew of the Hebrews" (Phil. iii. 5.) and the Grecians are said to murmur against the Hebrews, (Acts vi. 1.) though both parties were of the same nation. It seems, therefore, that the residents in the Holy Land, at least, if not the whole nation, preferred the name of Hebrew to that of Jew, which was rather a foreign appellation imposed upon them, especially out of their own country. This discovers a propriety in Paul's addressing, as most respectful, his epistle "to the Hebrews," not "to the Jews," that national constancy which demonstrates a most wonderful energy in the Mosaic institutions; which are still fresh and vigorous, and not obsolete.

5. They are divided into various sects. Some of them are extremely attached to the traditions of the rabbins, and to the multiplied observances enjoined in the Talmud. Others, as the Caraites, reject these with scorn, and adhere solely to Scripture. The majority of the Jews in Europe, and those with whose works we are mostly conversant, are rabbinites; and may be taken as representatives of the ancient Pharisees. But all Jews profess a veneration for their sacred books; and according to the best information that can be obtained, they preserve them carefully, and read them with respect in their places of worship; to which, in all countries, they fail not to resort.

6. They everywhere consider Judea as their proper country, and Jerusalem as their metropolitan city.
remark, that its canonical authority, and its genuineness and authenticity, are so fully attested by the ancient authorities, both external and internal, that they may safely be pronounced impecuniable. "That the church, during the first century after the apostolic age, ascribed it to some one of the apostles, remarks the writer to whom we have just referred, "is clear, from the fact, that it was inserted among the canonical books of the churches in the East and the West; that it was comprised in the Peshitto; in the old Latin version; and was certainly admitted by the Alexandrine and Palestine churches. The object of this epistle, which ranks amongst the most important of the new-covenant Scriptures, was to prove to the Jews, from their own Scriptures, the divinity, humanity, atonement, and intercession of Christ; particularly his pre-eminenve over Moses and the angels of God—to demonstrate the superiority of the gospel to the law; and the real object and design of the Mosaic institutions—to fortify the minds of the Hebrew converts against apostasy under persecution, and to engage them to a deportment becoming their Christian profession. In this view, the epistle furnishes a key to the Old Testament Scriptures. (See the Bibl. Repository, vol. ii. p. 406.)

HEBRON, or CHERRYON, one of the most ancient cities of Canaan, being built seven years before Tammuz, the capital of Lower Egypt, Numb. xiii. 29. It is thought to have been founded by Arba, an ancient giant of Palestine, and hence to have been called Kirjath-arba, Arba's city, (Josh. xiv. 15,) which name was afterwards changed into Hebron. The Anakim dwelt at Hebron when Joshua conquered Canaan. Josh. xv. 13.

Hebron, which was given to Judah, and became a city of refuge, was situated on an eminence, about twenty-seven miles south of Jerusalem, and about the same distance north of Beersheba. Abraham, Sarah, and Isaac were buried near the city, in the cave of Machpelah, Gen. xxiii. 7, 9, 19. After the death of Saul, David fixed his residence at Hebron, and it was for some time the metropolis of his kingdom, 2 Sam. ii. 2—5. It is now called El Hilla, and contains a population of about 400 families of Arabs, besides a hundred Jewish houses. "They are so mutinous," says D'Arvieux, "that they rarely pay [the duties] without force, and commonly a reinforcement from Jerusalem is necessary. The people are brave, and when in revolt extend their incursions as far as Bethlehem, and make amends by their pillage for what is exacted from them. They are so well acquainted with the windings of the mountains, and know so well how to post themselves to advantage, that they close all the passages, and exclude every assistance from reaching the Souba-chi... The Turks dare not dwell here, believing that they could not live a week if they attempted it. The Greeks have a church in the village."

The mutinous character of this people, one would think, was but a continuation of their ancient disposition; which might render them fit instruments for serving David against Saul, and Absalom against David. — The advantage they possessed in their knowledge of the passes, may account also for the protracted resistance which David made to Saul, and the necessity of the latter employing a considerable force in order to dislodge his adversary. David was so well aware of this advantage of station, that when Absalom had possessed himself of Hebron, he did not think of attacking him there, but fled in all haste from Jerusalem, northward. [The Turks now dwell there, and there is a Turkish governor. (See Mod. Trav. Palestine, p. 182, seq.)]

HEIR. The order for this service is given in Numb. xix. Spencer believes it to have been instituted in opposition to Egyptian superstition. Jerome and others think, that the red heifer was sacrificed yearly; but some of the rabbins maintain, that one only was burnt from Moses to Ezra; and from Ezra to the destruction of the temple by the Romans, only six, or at most nine. The ceremony is said to have been always performed on the mount of Olives, over against the temple, after the ark was fixed at Jerusalem. See Red Heifer.

Some authors suppose that the red heifer was one of the sacrifices offered in the name of all the people. It was to be without blemish; its blood was sprinkled seven times towards the entrance of the tabernacle; the whole body was consumed; and the ashes used in purifying those who were polluted by touching any dead body, or otherwise. Calmet thinks the red heifer was a sacrifice for sin, but not an oblivation, that name being proper only to what was offered solemnly to God on the altar of burnt-offerings. When the red heifer was burned without the camp, its ashes were gathered and preserved in a clean place. Part of them were occasionally put into water, with which all who had contracted legal defilement were to be sprinkled; on pain of being cut off from the congregation. It was a water of separation. The heifer was a type of Christ, Heb. ix. 13.

HEIFERS. As the words ox and bull, in their figurative sense, signify rich and powerful persons, who live in influence, who forget God, and contemn the poor; so by heifers are sometimes meant women who are rich, delicate, and voluptuous,—who make pleasure their god, Amos iv. 1; Hos. iv. 16; x. 11.

HEIR, a person who succeeds by right of inheritance to an estate, property, &c. But the principles of heirship in the East differ from those among us; so that children do not always wait till their parents are dead, before they receive their portions. Hence, when Christ is called, "heir of all things," it does not imply the death of any former possessor of all things; and when saints are called heirs of the promise of righteousness, of the kingdom, of the world, of God, "joint heirs" with Christ, it implies merely participation in such or such advantages, but no decease of any party in possession would be understood by those to whom these passages were addressed; though among ourselves there is no actual heirship till the parent, or proprietor, is departed. Another principle in which the orientals differ from us, is that which regulates the heirship of princes and the succession to the throne. The following extracts will illustrate the subject:—"The word sultan is a title given to the Ottoman princes, born while their fathers were in possession of the throne, and to those of the Gungnissian family. The epithet sultan, therefore, is bestowed on him who enjoys the right of succession; and this, by the Turkish law, belongs to the family. It is to be remembered, as has been before remarked, that he must be born while his father possesses the throne." (Baron du Tott, vol. i. p. 63.) To these principles we find an eastern prince appealing; and as he also states the fact on which they are founded, it may not be amiss to introduce his discourse on this subject. "Zemes, sailing to Rhodes, was there..."
honorable received by the great master, and all the rest of the knights of the order; to whom, in their publick assemblies three days after, he openly declared the Emperor, together with his brother and him; alledging for the color of his rebellion, that Alaric was his elder brother, yet that he was born whilst his father yet lived in private estate, under subjection and command, long before he possessed the kingdom, and so no king's son: whereas he himself was the first born of his father, being an emperor, and so not heir of his private fortune, (as was Alaric,) but of his greatest honour and empire," &c. (Knoller's History of the Turks, p. 462.) This usage will, perhaps, remove the difficulty which presents itself in the Scripture statement of the age of Hezekiah, when he ascended the throne. If this prince were but 25 years old, when he began to reign, as stated in 2 Chron. xxix. 1. then he must have been born when his father Ahaz was under 11 years of age—an almost natural impossibility. But if we refer to this principle which regulates the succession to the throne in the East, and consider Hezekiah as having been the first born after his father's accession, then he was but 30 years old; emerging from his servitude from that period, all will hit about ral. and easy. It is obvious to remark, that computations of time, by descents, (as that of Christ, by his genealogy,) are greatly affected by this principle; since the length of lives, reigns, &c., which the succession, is affected thereby, and the younger, are rendered obviously, and materially, imperfect by it. See Adoption.

HELAM, a place celebrated for a defeat of the Syrians by David, in which he took their horses and chariots. (1 Sam. x. 17.) it would seem to have been not far from the Ephrataes. But in 1 Chron. xix. 17, instead of Helam (of which city we have no knowledge) we read 27th, (Melchom,) * David fell upon them, which Calmet takes to be the best reading. HELLHAI, or CHELIA, a city of Asher; (Jos. 1. 31.) perhaps Helbon in Syria.

HELON, a city of Syria famous for its wines, (Ezek. xxviii. 18.) and probably the present Haleh, or, as called in Europe, Aleppo. It is situated, according to Haze, to whom has given a very full description of it, in lat. 31° 11' 30° long. 37° 47' 9' E. about 180 miles north of Damascus, and about 80 inland from the coast of the Mediterranean sea. In 1622, Aleppo was visited by a dreadful earthquake, by which it was partly destroyed. HELLON, a celebrated city of Egypt, called in Coptic, the Hebrew, and in the English version, On, Gen. xii. 45. The Egyptian name signifies height, sun; and hence the Greek name Helipolis, which signifies city of the sun. The Seventy render express that On is Helipolis, Sept. Ex. i. 11. Jeremiah (xiii. 13.) calls this city in Hebrew Beth-She'mash, i. e. house or temple of the sun. In Ezek. xxx. 17, the name is pronounced Aen, which is the same as On. The Arabian call it Ash-Shema, Eun. All these names come from the circumstance, that the city was the ancient seat of the Egyptian worship of the sun. Thus Joseph's father-in-law, Potipher, was priest at On, i. e. he was a priest of the sun, as his name Potipher denotes, viz. one who belongs to the sun. Strabo visited the ruins of this city, the destruction of which he refers to Cambyses, and saw there still large buildings in which the priests dwelt. He remarks that the city was formerly the seat of priests who occupied themselves with philosophy and astronomy; but that now they only took care of the sacrifices and rites of worship. "The city," he says, "lies upon an immense dikes. In it is the temple of the sun beset on three sides by the sea; and is surrounded by the inhabitants, like the Apsi at Memphis. At present the city is deserted. The temple is very ancient, and, in the Egyptian style. Two obelisks of this temple, which were the least injured, have been carried to Rome; the rest are still in their places." (xxvii. 49.) To these obelisks or images the prophet Jeremiah probably refers, xlix. 13. These obelisks and ruins are also mentioned by Abuulfeda, and likewise by Aboulalattif, who gives a particular description of them. (Relation de l'Egypte, ed. De Sacy, p. 180.)

The present state of these ruins is described by Niebuhr: ('Reisebesch. i. p. 68.) "The ruins of this ancient city (Helipolis) lie near the village Mestaretat, about two hours [six miles] from Cairo, towards the north-east. But nothing now remains except immense dikes and mounds full of small pieces of marble, granite, and pottery, some remnants of a sphinx, and an obelisk still standing erect. This last is one single block of granite, covered on its four sides with hieroglyphics. In 1622, above ground stood 90 feet. It belonged to the ancient temple of the sun."

Another Helipolis is alluded to in Scripture under the name of the "plain of Aven," or field of the sun, Amos ii. 5. This was the Helipolis of Cale-syria, now Salém or Salkum. 6:11. HELL. The Heb. 'ysh, Sheel, and the Gr. "αἰθής. Hades, often signify the grave, or the place of departed spirits, Ps. xi. 10; Is. xiv. 9; Ezek. xxii. 18. Here was the rich man, after being buried, Luke xvi. 23. The rabbinous angels were described as cast into hell, and delivered unto chains of darkness," 2 Pet. ii. 4. These and many other passages in the Old Testament show the fertility of that opinion, which attributes to the Hebrews an ignorance of a future state. The Jews place hell in the centre of the earth: they call it the deep, and destruction: they believe it to be situated under waters and mountains; they also term it Gehennom, or Gehena, which signifies the valley of Hinnom, or the valley of the sons of Hinnom, which was, as it were, the common sewer of Jerusalem, where children were sacrificed to Moloch. See GRZINNA.

But the term hell is most commonly applied to the place of punishment in the unseen world. Jews, Musulmans, and Christians have different notions of the torments of heaven as well as of the purgatory, and the punishments of hell as their several fancies have conceived of it; but without entering into a discussion upon these topics, we may remark, that Scripture is decisive as to the principal punishment, consisting in a horrid degradation, a separation from God, and a privation of his sight, and of the beatific vision.

The eternity of hell-torments is acknowledged throughout Scripture: the fire of the damned will never be extinguished, nor their worm die. (See Pizz.) But the Jews believe, that some among them will not continue for ever in hell. They maintain that every Jew, not infected with heresy, or who has not acted contrary to certain points mentioned by the rabbins, is not above a year in purgatory; and that infidels only, or people utterly wicked, remain perpetually in hell. Manasseh Ben Israel names three sorts of persons who would be damned eternally: (1.) Atheists, who deny the existence of God; (2.) they who deny the divine authority of the law; (3.) they who reject the resurrection of the dead. These people, though otherwise of moral lives, will be punished with endless tortures. Other rabbins, such as Maimonides, Alarabedel, &c., assert, that after a certain time, the souls of wicked men will be annihilated.

As the happiness of paradise is expressed in Scripture under the idea of a feast or wedding, surrounded by abundant light, joy, and pleasure, so hell is represented as a place of dismal darkness, where is nothing but grief, sadness, vexation, rage, despair, and gnashing of teeth. The regret, remorse, and despair of the damned are expressed by the rabbins under the name of disorder in the soul: which is what Isaiah (xvi. 34), and Mark (ix. 43, 45.) mean by that worm which gnaws and does not die.

"The gates of hell," mentioned by our Saviour, (Matt. xvi. 18,) signify the power of hell; for the eastern people call the palaces of their princes gates. (See Gate.) The Jews say there are three gates belonging to hell: the first is in the wilderness, and by that Kornah, Dathan, and Abiram descended into hell: the second is in the sea; for it is said that Jonah, who was thrown into the sea, "cried to God out of the belly of hell," Jonah ii. 3. The third is in Jerusalem; for Isaiah tells us that "the fire of the Lord is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem," Isa. xxxi. 9.—I. Earth; 2. water; 3. fire. These are evidently three modes of death, or destruction.

The Sheol of the Old Testament or the Hades of the New, according to the notions of the Hebrews, was a vast subterraneous receptacle, where the souls of the dead existed in a separate state until the resurrection of their bodies. This region of blessed or paradise, they supposed to be in the upper part of this receptacle; while beneath was the abyss or Gehenna, in which the souls of the wicked were subjected to punishment. Is. xiv. 9, seq. Luke xvi. 23, seq. (See Locut, Lect. on Heb. Poetry, vii. Campbell, Prel. Diss. vi. p. 32. § 2, seq. 129.) R.

Hellenists, "the Grecians," Acts vi. 1, et al. They were called Hellenistical Jews, who lived in cities and provinces where the Greek tongue was spoken. Not being much accustomed to Hebrew or Syriac, they generally used the Greek version of the LXX, both in public and private, which was disapproved of by Hebraizing Jews, who could not endure that the Holy Scriptures should be read in any language but in their original Hebrew. This, however, was not the only difference between the Hellenistical and the Hebraizing Jews. The latter reproached their brethren with reading Scripture after the Egyptian manner, that is, from the left to the right, as the Mischas, that as the sun moves from east to west, so they should read from the right hand to the left. This difference, however, produced no schism or separation.

HELMET, a piece of defensive armor for the head. See Arms, and Armor.

HEMLOCK. In Amos vi. 12, we read of "righteousness turned into hemlock;" the very same word which in chap. v. 7. is rendered wormwood: "turn judgment to wormwood." This impropriety is obvious; the word is usually rendered wormwood, which see.

HEN, a city of Mesopotamia, the same, probably, which was afterwards called Nine, situated on a ford of the Euphrates, 2 Kings xviii. 34; xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 35; Jer. 21.

HEREPHE, a Cannanish city with a king, subdued by Joshua, Josh. xii. 17.

HERESY, (Arocia,) an option, or choice. It is usually taken in a bad sense, for some fundamental error in religion, adhered to with obstinacy. Paul says that there should be heresies in the church, that they who are tricked might be made manifest, 1 Cor. xix. 2. He requires Titus to shun, and even wholly to avoid the company of a heretic, after the first and second admonition, Tit. iii. 10. Luke speaks of the heresies of the Sadducees and Pharisees, Acts xii. 12; xvi. 13. Christianity was called a sect or heresy, (Acts xxviii. 22,) for in the beginning it was scarcely looked upon by strangers as anything more than a sect of Judaism; and the primitive writers made no difficulty in calling it, sometimes, a divine sect. Tertullian, the advocate of the Jews, accused Paul with being the head "of the sect of the Nazarenes," Acts xxiv. 5.

From the beginning of the Christian church, there have been dangerous heresies, which attacked the most essential doctrines of our religion, such as the divinity of Jesus Christ, his office of Messiah, the reality and truth of his incarnation, the resurrection of the dead, the liberty of Christians from legal ceremonies, and many other points. The most ancient of these heresies was Simon Magnus, who desired to buy the gift of God with money, (Acts vii. 9, 10,) and who afterwards set himself up for the Messiah, God Almighty, the Creator of the world, and those false apostles against whom Paul inveighs in his epistles, who determined that the faithful should receive circumcision, and subject themselves to all the legal observances, are considered to be heretics, Acts xiv. 13, 17; v. 11, vi. 12; Phil. iii. 18. The Nicolaitans, who, it is said, allowed a community of women, committed the most ignominious actions, and followed the superstitions of heathenism, are charged by John, (Rev. ii. 6, 15,) with producing great disorders in the churches of Asia.—At the same time there were false Christs and false prophets. Paul speaks of Hymenaeus and Alexander, (1 Tim. i. 20,) and of Hymenaeus and Philetus, (2 Tim. ii. 17,) who departed from the truth. He foretold that the Christs should depart from the truth, and give themselves up to a spirit of error, and to doctrines of devils, 1 Tim. iv. 1. Peter and Jude foretell the same things, and herein only repeat what Christ himself had said, that false Christs and false prophets should come, who would seduce the simple.

HERMAS, a disciple mentioned Rom. xvi. 14, was, according to several of the ancients, and many learned modern interpreters, the same as Hermas, whose works are said to be still extant.

HERMON, a mountain often mentioned in Scripture. In Deut. iii. 9, it is said that Hermon is called by the Sidonians Sirion and by the Ammonites She- nir. In Deut. iv. 48, it is also said to be called mount Sinai. (Heb. siriw, different from the Sion of Jerusalem, which is written siriw.) It is an eastern arm of Anti-Lebanus, branching off from the former a little lower down than Damascus, and extending in a direction S. S. E. to the vicinity of the lake of Tiberias. The northern part is lofty, and is now called Djebel el Sheikh, and the southern, which is lower, Djebel Heish. (See Burkhardt, Trav. in Syria, p. 313.) Some have, without good reason, supposed that there was another Hermon, near mount
HEROD

Tabor; and have, therefore, improperly given this name to the mountain of Gilboa, Ps. lxxix. 13. In Isa. iii. 16 the mountain is called the hill of the sea, which seems to be the same as Mount Carmel, and should be the Hermon, the word in Hebrew being in the plural to denote a chain of mountains; just as the Alps are always spoken of in the plural. The psalmist says in Ps. cxxxiii. 3, that the unior of brethren is pleasant; 4 as the dew of Hermon, which descend upon the mountains of Zion," L. a. Jerusalem.—This it stands makes no sense, and the thing apparently expressed is an impossibility. Our translators have, therefore, justly and properly supplied the words necessary to fill out the comparison; as the dew of Hermon and as the dew which descended upon the mountains of Zion.

We read in Judg. iii. 3, of a mount Beal-Hermon, and in 1 Chr. v. 36, of a Beal-Hermon, which seems to be a city near mount Hermon. The former, perhaps, may be taken as the name of a portion of the mountain near the city Beal-Hermon. This latter appears to be the same as the city Beal-Gad (fortune) mentioned Josh. xi. 17; xii. 7; xiii. 5, and which appears from these passages to have been situated on the northern confines of the territory of the Israelites, in the vicinity of Lebanon, and, particularly, under mount Hermon. Hence it appears abundantly, that Beal-Gad cannot have been (as Egan, Naum, Rosenmuller suppose) the town which Peter with Helipolis, or Bealbeck, but lay rather in the vicinity of the source of the Jordan. Bealbeck lay much farther to the north, in the great valley of Cana-Syris, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon; and we have reason to believe that Joshua extended his conquests thus far, or even to Damascus; nor is it indeed probable, from the nature of the country. He must, then, have conquered mount Lebanon, which is no where said of him; but, on the contrary, it is expressly said, (Judg. iii. 3) that the Hivites continued to dwell in mount Lebanon, from Beal-Hermon to Hamath, just as it is said in Josh. xiii. 5, that all Lebanon toward the east, i.e. Anti-Lebanon, from Beal-Gad under Hermon even to Hamath, remained unsettled. HEROD, son of Antipater and Cypros, and brother of Phassael, Joseph, Pheroras, and Salome. He married (1.) Doris, by whom he had Antipater. (2.) Mariamne, of the Ammoun family, by whom he had Alexander, Aristobulus, Herod, Salamone, and (4.) Archea. (3.) Malthace, by whom he had Archea, Philip, and Olympia. (4.) Cleopatra, by whom he had Antipater, and his sons. (5.) Pallas, by whom he had (7.) Philip. (6.) Fasila, by whom he had Roxana. (7.) Elpis, by whom he had Salome, who married one of the sons of Pheras. He also had two other wives, whose names are not known.

Herod was born c. A. D. 72, and, at the age of twenty-five was appointed governor of Galilee, with the approbation of Hyrcanus. By his prudence and valor he restored the peace of his province, which had been interrupted by the depredations of hordes of robbers, and procured the friendship of Sextus Caesar, governor of Syria. The Jews, becoming jealous of the growing power of Antipater and his sons, laid complaints against them before Hyrcanus, and Herod was cited to appear and answer for his conduct, at Jerusalem. Herod, before the summons but played his part so well that Hyrcanus advised him to retire into Syria. After the death of Julius Caesar, Herod was appointed governor of Canea-Syris, by Cassius and Marcus Brutus, who promised him the kingdom of Judea, when the war with Mark Antony should terminate.

The invasion of Judaea by the Parthians secured to Herod the possession of the kingdom. The Parthians had taken Jerusalem, and placed Antigonus, the nephew of Hyrcanus, on the throne, and carried away Hyrcanus with them as their prisoner. In this emergency Herod hastened to Rome, intending to ask the kingdom for his brother-in-law, Aristobulus, the brother of Mariamne; but Antony was so willing to advance Herod himself, and, withal, so accessible to the influence of promises of remuneration, that a decree was instantly proposed to the senate, importing that in consideration of the dangers which might arise from the Parthian invasion, it was expedient to make Herod king of Judea. The senate did not hesitate to confirm the decree; and at the breaking up of the assembly, Antony and Augustus, placing Herod between them, and accompanied by the consuls and magistrates, went in solemn procession to enrol the decree in the capitol. The day concluded with a sumptuous entertainment, given to Herod in the houses of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, a daughter of Hyrcanus; hoping by this union with the royal family of the Ammonites, to insure the affection of the Jews to his person. To pave the way for this union, he divorced his former wife Doris, the mother of his son Antipater: but if he sought the marriage at first only from motives of interest, it became afterwards, on his part at least, a union cemented by the strongest affection; but the uncertainty of the weak efforts of mere human policy may be seen in the subsequent events of his history; for this marriage, which seemed most conducive to his power, and which he achieved by most unjust behavior to his former wife, proved to him the source of almost all the miseries which he endured.

After a siege of six months, Jerusalem surrendered. The first acts of Herod's government were marked with cruelty and wantonness, and some tincture of generosity. He advanced to rank and power those persons who had espoused his interest, and conferred the highest distinction upon Pollio and his son, as men who during the war had given during the siege to deliver up the city. Of the adherents of Antigonus, forty-five persons were put to death, and the most vigilant search was made that none should escape; the gates of the city being guarded, and even the dead bodies searched as they were carried out, lest the living should escape by concealment among them.

Herod found the high-priest's office vacant. It belonged of right to his brother-in-law, Aristobulus, the son of Alexander, the young man for whom, on his flight to Rome, he at first intended to have asked the kingdom; but upon him Herod was afraid to confer this honor, lest the influence attached to the office should prove a source of danger to himself; he therefore sent to Babylon for or at least there he had given during the siege to deliver up the city. Of the adherents of Antigonus, forty-five persons were put to death, and the most vigilant search was made that none should escape; the gates of the city being guarded, and even the dead bodies searched as they were carried out, lest the living should escape by concealment among them.

whose influence with Antony, Aenaccelus was deposed, and Aristobulus, now a youth of sixteen years of age, was summoned. On his arrival, Herod, secretly determined to rid himself of Aristobulus; and his purpose was soon effectuated, while the youth was bathing in the pools which adorned the gardens of the palace at Jericho. Herod was液压 enough to shed tears, and pretend sorrow for his death, and further tried to conceal the murder by the most magnificent display of expense at his funeral. Such vanities could ill compensate Alexandria for the loss of her son, or soothe her anger. She communicated the particulars of the transaction to Cleopatra, and found in her a most powerful ally. Antony was on his way to Laodicea, and by the advice of Cleopatra, he summoned Herod to appear and answer before him. Herod obeyed the command; but money soon soothed the pretended indignation of Antony, and Herod returned to Jerusalem, having been received as a prince instead of condemned as a criminal.

When Herod was summoned to Laodicea, fearful of the worst, he secretly commissioned his uncle Joseph, in the event of his death, not to suffer Mariamne or Cleopatra to live, and become the partner of Antony. Joseph communicated to her and to Alexandra the orders which he had received. On the return of Herod, his sister Solome, in revenge for some insult which she had received from Mariamne, instigated against her own husband Joseph, the existence of a criminal intercourse between them. The accusation was as unfounded as it was malicious, and Mariamne soon assuaged the wrath of Herod; but having happened to reply to some expression of his affection, that his having given orders to put her to death, was no proof of love, this betrayal of his secret instructions, convinced Herod of the truth of the charge of illicit intercourse with Joseph, and it was with difficulty that he restrained himself from ordering her immediate death; Joseph, however, was instantly executed, without being heard in his defence.

The fall of Antony was justly a cause of alarm to Herod: his friends dreaded of his safety; his attachment to the rival of Augustus was commonly known; and his enemies rejoiced at the prospect of his ruin. On his departure to visit Augustus, he committed Alexandria and Mariamne to the custody of friends, Joseph and Soemus, with orders that neither of them should be permitted to survive the event of his death, lest the spirit of Alexandria should disturb the settlement of the chief power in the hands of his children. At Rhodes, Herod met Augustus, who was, in the first, a man conscious of having displayed towards his friend a fidelity which was in the highest degree praiseworthy; he did not palliate his conduct, but seemed rather to lament that the assistance in money and provisions which he had afforded to his unfortunate ally, was, if possible, less than his duty required. He represented that he had been prevented from joining actively in the war, but that he had done all that was in his power to advance the best interests of his friend; and that Augustus had taken his advice, and put Cleopatra aside, he might still have lived, and have been reconciled to Augustus. He proceeded then to state of himself, that from his fidelity to Antony, Augustus might judge of his general disposition to do his high-prize. Not in his interest that such as he was to Antony, was also to all those to whom he was bound by the ties of gratitude and affection. Such openness and generosity, seconded by liberal presents, both to Augustus and all who were about the person of the con-queror, obtained for Herod the safety of his person, and the security of his kingdom; the possession of which was continued to him, not as king, but as chief of the senate. Augustus soon after passed through Judea, and was attended by Herod, who presented him with the immense sum of 500 talents, and furnished him with provisions. Herod naturally expected that now would reap so much at the happy result of his interview with Augustus, as Mariamne, Soemus, however, having revealed to her the orders of Herod, he found to his surprise, that neither the relation of the dangers which he had escaped, nor the honors which he had received, excited the least interest in her bosom. Hate and love by turns distracted him; at one moment he determined to punish her with death; at the next, his passion returned, and disarmed his intention of its cruelty. The state of Herod's mind could not be concealed from his mother and his sister Solome, who viewed with barbarous exultation the changed temper of the king, as affording them the fairest opportunity of revenging upon Alexandria and Mariamne some words which they had contemptuously spoken of the wife and favorite of Herod. The discord of Herod and Mariamne had continued a whole year after his return from Augustus; it happened one day that the king, retiring to rest about noon, sought her company; she came, but instead of receiving the usual mark of affection, she reproached him with the murder of her father and her brother. The king naturally was indignant, but his anger might have passed away, had not Solome seized the opportunity which she had long sought, to excite him to severity against his wife, by suborning her cupbearer to assert that Mariamne had bribed him to give a certain potion, the nature of which, however, he knew not. Herod would not condemn her wife without the appearance at least of a regular sentence; he therefore summoned his most familiar friends, and accused her of administering the potion. The result was a sentence of death; which Herod commuted into imprisonment. Soemus, however, persuaded the king that the death of Mariamne was necessary to secure himself against the tumults of the populace; and by her advice she was led away to execution. Mariamne met her death displaying in her end a firmness of character which would have grace on the tomb of her benefactor; but however, soon felt all the miseries of a wounded conscience, increased by the remembrance of ardent love. He sought for pleasure in frequent banquets, but it fled from him; until at last he declined all regard to putting his love to the test by the annoyances of the chase, he retired from society, and passed his days sorrowing in solitude; in a short time, the sufferings of his mind brought on him a fever and delirium, which baffled the skill of his physicians; who, regarding all remedies ineffectual, left him to his fate. Whilst laboring under this disorder, the king resided at Samaria. That he should recover from such an illness, appeared to be impossible. Alexandria, therefore, lost no time in preparing measures to secure to himself the chief command, in the event of his death, and made proposals to the officers who were intrusted with the two forts in Jerusalem, which commanded the temple and the city, that for the sake of security under the present calamity of losing the king, he would relieve them of the charge to herself and to Herod's sons. The officers were faithful to Herod, and sent him intelligence of Alexandria's proposal. The result was the immediate execution of Alexandria.
In process of time Herod recovered from his illness, and a remarkable change took place in his conduct: he threw off the mask of religion, and instead solemnly pronounced the prejudices of the Jews in favor of the law of Moses, by introducing among them the customs of heathen nations. All his views seem to have been henceforth directed to Romanize Judea.

The designs which he had manifestly formed against their religion, and his violation of every custom dear to the Jews, were, however, considered by many as sure forerunners of still more dreadful evils. Herod was, in name, their king, but, in deed, the enemy of their country, and their God. Ten men, zealous for the law, conspired to assassinate him in the theatre. The plan was discovered, and the conspirators were arrested, with daggers concealed about their persons. Herod now understood the feelings of the people, and found it necessary to increase his fortifications for the security of his own person, and to provide against rebellions. He now planned the restoration of Samaria, and fortified it, probably as a balance to the strength of Jerusalem; for he not only rebuilt it, but peopled it with inhabitants, calling it Sebastia, in honor of Augustus. He erected a temple, which he dedicated to Caesar. These fortresses, with many others, were built for safety; but to increase the prosperity of his kingdom by trade, he entertained and executed the grand design of converting the temple into a circus and an amphitheatre, which he dedicated to Caesar. The sums which he expended in building cities and fortresses must have been immense; but he took care to prevent the Romans from interrupting the completion of his designs, by making his numerous dedications to Augustus seem so many public testimonies of his dependence upon the emperor. In many instances, however, the structures which he erected were monuments to the memory of his family, and of his friends. The city Antipatris he built as a testimony of his affection to his father; and dedicated to his mother a magnificent castle at Jericho, which, after her, was called Cypros. The tower of Phasael and Hippicus, in the fortifications of Jerusalem, were lasting memorials of fraternal and friendly affection; nor was his love to the unfortunate Mariamne forgotten, for the fairest tower in the walls bore her name.

When the indignation of the Jews at his conduct began to display itself in open murmurs, Herod strove to prevent their participation by a most rigid and vexatious system of police; but finding this to be in vain, he perceived that it would be better to yield entirely to their prejudices; and in proof of his good will to their religion, he undertook to rebuild the temple on the greatest scale of magnificence. In a set oration he exposed his designs to them; but so great was their unwillingness to undertake the execution of such vast plans, as well as their suspicion lest the building once begun should remain unfinished, that Herod found himself obliged to make all his preparations for the erection of the new temple, before he could venture upon removing a single stone of the old structure. The execution of that part of the former building which strictly constituted the temple, and which comprehended the porch, the holy place, and the holy of holies, occupied a space of not more than eighteen months; but the porticoes and other works surrounding the temple were not completed until a lapse of a further space of eight years. The adjoining of the building occupied a much longer time, as appears both from John ii. 20,
They disclaimed any approval of the transaction, and recommended that the authors of it should be punished; upon which Herod gave orders to burn Matthias alive, and all who were concerned in the affair. Herod's disease soon after became more violent; his sufferings were painful in the extremity; attended with ulcerations in the lower parts of the body, and strong convulsions. His torments, instead of moving him to repentance, seemed rather to excite anew the cruelty of his temper; for, having collected together the chiefs of the Jewish nation, he shut them up in the Hippodrome at Jericho, and gave orders to Salome, as soon as he should be dead, to put them all to death; lest, in the joy at his decease, mourners should be wanted for his funeral. In the meanwhile the ambassadors returned from Rome, and brought the dispositions of Cæsar for the punishment of Antipater, either by exile or by death. The pleasure which Herod derived from the success of his embassy, for the moment, revived him; but his pains soon returned with such violence, that he made an attempt on his own life: the arm created by the event ran through the palace, and was heard by Antipater, who, concluding that his father's death occasioned it, endeavoured to bribe the jailer to permit his escape; but the man was faithful to his trust, and communicated the proposal to the king, who immediately gave orders for his death, attaching to it a command to bury him in an ignoble manner at Hyrcania. Herod then, once again, made his will; giving the kingdom of Judea to Archelaus; the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peraea, to Antipas; Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and Batanea, to Philip; and the cities Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, besides very considerable sums of money, to Salome. To each one of them he gave his landed and personal estates and legacies, leaving them in the possession of affluence and wealth. His legacies to Augustus, and his wife Julia, were worthy the acceptance of chiefs of the Roman empire.

On the fifth day after the death of Antipater, Herod died, having reigned thirty-four years from the death of Antigonus, and thirty-seven from the time of his investment by the Romans. Before the report of his death was noise abroad, Salome and Alexander dismissed those who were imprisoned in the Hippodrome; but as soon as the event was known they assembled the soldiery in the amphitheatre, and read to them the will of Herod. The troops proclaimed Archelaus king, and rent the air with shouts of joy, and praises for his prosperity and latitude.

Josephus (xvii. 8.) thus sums up the character of Herod: "He was a man universally cruel, and of an ungovernable anger; and though he trampled justice under foot, he was ever the favorite of fortune. From a private station, he rose to the throne. Reckless on every side with a thousand dangers, he escaped them all; and prolonged his life to the full boundary of old age. They who considered what befell him in the bosom of his own family, pronounced him a man most miserable; but to himself he ever seemed most prosperous, for, of all his enemies, there was not one whom he did not overcome." Such is the history of a prince whose name is familiar to us, from our childhood, as the first persecutor of our blessed Lord, and the murderer of the infants at Bethlehem. The account given of the transactions of his life will evince, that if, according to the judgment of the world, he who reigns splendidly and fortunately, in spite of all the difficulties opposed to his government, be entitled to the attribute of greatness, that appellation has not been unjustly bestowed upon Herod. HERODANS, a sect of the Saviour's time, (Matt. xxv. 16; Mark iii. 6; vii. 15.) but as to their particular character there is much diversity of opinion. Dr. Prideaux has shown, that they held doctrines distinct from those of the Pharisees and Sadducees; against which our Saviour cautions his followers; and he thinks there can be no doubt that they were the creatures, or domestics, as the Syriac version calls them, of Herod the Great. He judges that their doctrines were reducible to two heads: (1.) a belief that the dominion of the Romans over the Jews was just, and that it was their duty to submit to it; (2.) that in the present circumstances they might with a good conscience follow many heathen modes and usages. It is certain these were Herod's principles, who pleaded the necessity of the times, for doing anything contrary to the maxims of the Jewish religion. Calmet, however, thinks that the characteristics of the Herodians, as they may be gathered from the Gospels, will agree to none but the disciples of Judas Goulonitis, who formed a sect which was in its vigor in our Saviour's time.

HERODIAS, daughter of Aristobulus and Berenice, and granddaughter of Herod the Great. Her first husband was her uncle Philip, by whom she had a son, Salome; but he falling into disgrace, and being obliged to live in private, she left him, and married his brother Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, who offered her a palace and a crown. (See Philip.) As John the Baptist censured this incestuous marriage, (Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17.) Antipas ordered him to be imprisoned. Some time afterwards, Herodias suggested to her dancing daughter, Salome, to ask John the Baptist's head, which she procured. (See Antipas.) Mortified to see her husband tetrarch only, while her brother Agrippa, whom she had known in a state of indigence, was honored with the title of king, Herodias persuaded Antipas to visit Rome, and procure from the emperor Caius the royal title. Agrippa, however, sent letters to the emperor, informing him of the imprisonment of John, and desiring him to be set at liberty for seventy thousand men, and by this means procure his banishment to Lyons. Herodias, who accompanied her husband to Rome, followed him in his banishment she had thus brought upon him. (See HERON.)

Josephus (xvii. 7.) has taken in the rendering of the Hebrew נָאָפָח, anaphah; some critics interpreting it of the crane, others of the curlew; some of the kite, others of the woodcock; some of the peacock, some of the parrot, and some of the falcon. But let not the reader be alarmed at this diversity of rendering, since it is the necessary consequence of the scantiness of references to the bird in the sacred text, and the absence of all description of its character and qualities, in those passages in which it is spoken of. The truth is, it is only referred to in the catalogue of birds prohibited by the Mosaic code, (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18.) and it is only from the import of its name, or the known character of the birds with which it is grouped, that we can form any opinion of its specific character. Thus the creature intended is some species of water-bird, there can be little doubt, if we give the sacred writer any credit for propriety in his grouping, or system in his arrangement; but what that species may be, we are unable to decide. See Brbd, p. 188.
HEZ

HEZBON, a celebrated city of the Amorites, twenty miles east of Jordan, Josh. xiii. 17. It was given to Bashan; but in two years afterwards transferred to God, and then to the tribe of Reuben. It was between the Moabites, by Sihon, and became his capital; and was taken by the Israelites a little before the death of Moses, Num. xxi. 23; Josh. xxi. 39. After the ten tribes were carried into the country beyond Jordan, the Moabites recovered it. Pity and Jerome assign it to Arabia. Solomon speaks of the pool of Hezbon, Cant. vii. 4. The town still subsists under its ancient name, and is situated, according to Burckhardt, on a hill. (Travels, p. 365.)

HESHMON, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 37.

HETh, father of the Hittites, was eldest son of Canaan, and dwelt south of the promised land, or near Hebron. Ephron, of Hebron, was of the race of Heth; and that city, in Abraham's time, was peopled by the children of Heth. Some think there was a city called Heth; but we find no traces of it in Scripture.

HEThlon, a city mentioned in Ezek. xlvii. 15; xlviii. 1, as limiting the land of promises, north.

HEZEkiaH, King of Judah, succeeded his father Ahaz, c. 715 B.C. (See Hezekiah.) He destroyed the high places, cut down the groves, and broke the statues which the people had adored; he broke also the brazen sea, as much as Moses had made, because the children of Israel had been taught by the children of Israel, to offer sacrifices and entertain the great doors of the Lord's house to be opened and repaired; he exorted the priests and Levites to purify the temple, and to sacrifice in it as formerly. As the institution of the passover had been neglected, he invited not only all his own subjects to keep it, but likewise all Israel. Some ridiculed his proposal; but many observed it with great solemnity. Hezekiah took care to maintain the good regulations which he had established in the temple, and to provide for the priests and Levites. Some years afterwards, Hezekiah shook off the Assyrian yoke, and refused to pay tribute; he also defeated the Philistines, and destroyed their country, 2 Kings xviii. 7; 2 Chron. xxxii. He repaired and fortified the walls of Jerusalem, laid in stores, appointed able commanders over his troops, stopped up the springs without the city, and put himself in a condition of making a vigorous resistance. Sennacherib invaded Judah, and subdued almost every town; and Hezekiah, observing that the king of Egypt, Esarhaddon, with whom he had made an alliance, did not come to his assistance, sent ambassadors to the Assyrian, desiring peace. Sennacherib demanded 300 talents of silver, and that he should deliver gold. To raise this sum, Hezekiah exhausted his treasures, and pulled off the gold plates with which he had formerly overlaid the temple doors. His infidelity to God, however, was severely chastised; for Sennacherib, instead of withdrawing his troops, sent three of his principal officers from Lachish, which he besieging, to Jerusalem, summoning it to surrender. Hezekiah sent Eliahim, Shebannah, and Joah, to hear their proposals, to whom Rabshakeh addressed himself with extreme insolence. Hezekiah, having heard of this, rent his clothes, put on sackcloth, went to the house of the Lord, and sent to the prophet Isaiah. Sennacherib, sitting down before Libnah, was informed that Tirhakah, king of Egypt and Ethiopia, was marching against him. He went, therefore, to meet Tirhakah; and sent letters to Hezekiah to persuade him not to trust his confidence in his God. Hezekiah, having received these letters, went up to the temple, and spread them before the Lord; whom he entreated to deliver him from this insolent enemy. The Lord heard his prayer, and sent the prophet Isaiah to inform him, that Sennacherib should not remain in Jerusalem. The very night after this prediction, an angel of the Lord destroyed in the camp of the Assyrians 185,000 men, which obliged Sennacherib to retire to Nineveh. Soon afterwards, Hezekiah fell dangerously ill, and Isaiah, who visited him, said, "Thou shalt die." Hezekiah, turning his face to the wall, prayed to God, and Isaiah was commanded to return, saying, "I have healed thee, and will add fifteen years to thy life." (See Dial.) Hezekiah, after his recovery, composed a song of thanksgiving, which Isaiah has preserved, chap. xxxviii. 10, 11.

Merodach, or Berodach-Baladan, king of Babylon, having heard of this miracle, sent letters and presents to Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. The king was delighted with the respect implied in this embassy, showed the envos all his treasures, spices, and rich vessels, and in fact conveyed nothing from them. Isaiah afterwards foretold that a time would come, when all he had showed would be removed to Babylon; and when his sons would be made eunuchs in the palace of that king. Hezekiah passed the latter years of his life in tranquillity, laid up great riches, conveyed water into Jerusalem, and died, c. 683 B.C. The sacred writers praise his piety and rectitude; and Ecclesiastes has an encomium on him, chap. xlviii.

There are several other persons of the same name mentioned in Scripture, but they are of no importance in this connection.

HIDDEKEL, see Eder.

HIEL, of Bethel, rebuilt Jericho, notwithstanding the predictive curse of Joshua against the person who should attempt it, and of which he experienced the effects, by losing his eldest son Abiram, and his youngest son Segub. See Abiram.

HIERAPOLIS, a city of Phrygia, not far from Colosee and Laodicea, Colos. iv. 12. "Hierapolis, (now called by the Turks, Pambash, or Pamphylia,) or the sacred Cotton Tower, by reason of the white cliffs lying thereabouts,) a city of the greater Phrygia, lies under a high hill to the north, having to the southward of it a fair and large plain about five miles over, almost directly opposite to Laodicea, the river Lycus running between, but nearer the latter; now utterly forsaken and desolate, but whose ruins are so glorious and magnificent, that they strike one with horror at the first view of them, and with admiration too; such walls, and arches, and pillars of so curiously wrought, being still to be found there, that one may well judge, that when it stood, it was one of the most glorious cities not only in the East, but of the world. The numerousness of the temples there erected in the times of idolatry, with so much art and cost, might sufficiently confirm the title of the holy city, which it at first derived from the hot waters flowing from several springs, to which they ascribed a divine healing virtue, and which made the city so famous; for the sacred Apollo, whom both Greeks and Romans ascribed as the god of medicine, had his votaries and altars here, and was very probably their chief deity. In the theatre, which is of a large compass and height from the top, there being above forty steps, we found, upon a cushion of wrought marble belonging to a portal, these words, ΑΠΑΟΑΙΝΙΑΙ ΑΡΧΗΣ. 'To Apollo the chief presiding, a title peculiar to him. Where these springs rise is a very large bath, curiously paved with white marble, about which formerly stood several pillars, now thrown into it. Hence the waters make their way through several channels which they have formed for themselves; oftentimes overflowing them and covering the ground thereabouts, which is a whitish sort of earth, they turn the superficial parts into a taphus. Several tombs still remain; some of them almost entire, very stately and glorious, as if they had been accounted a kind of sacrifice to the deity that had given the place up to them. The water that they had abstained from defacing their monuments—entire stones of a great length and height, some covered with stone, shaped into the form of a cube; others ridge-wise. On the 14th, in the morning, we set forward for Colossos, where, within an hour and a half, we arrived. (Travel by T. Smith, B. D. 1678.)

HIGH PLACES. (םעע, Banamoth). The ancient Canaanites, and other nations, worshipped their idols upon hills and mountains, Deut. xii. 2. The Israelites were commanded to destroy these places of idol worship; but instead of this, they imitated the practice, and at first worshipped Jehovah in high places; (1 Sam. iv. 12, seq.; 1 Kings iii. 4.) and afterwards idols, 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xix. 31; 1 Esdr. viii. 7, et al. Here, also, they built chapels or temples, houses of the high places, (1 Kings xii. 32; 2 Kings xvii. 31,) and had regular priests, 1 Kings xiii. 32; 2 Kings xvii. 32. The prophets reproach the Israelites with want of zeal, for worshipping on the high places, the destroying of which is a commendation given but to few princes in Scripture; though several of them were zealous for the law. Before the temple was built, the high places were not absolutely contrary to God, as provided God was adored there. Under the judges, they seem to have been tolerated; and Samuel offered sacrifice in several places where the ark was not present. Even in David's time, the people sacrificed to the Lord at Shiloh, Jerusalem, and Gibbon.

The high places were much frequented in the kingdom of Israel; and on these hills they often adored idols, and committed a thousand abominations.

HIGH-WAY, see CAUSEWAY.

HILCIAH. Several persons of this name occur in Scripture, of which the following are the chief:—

1. The father of Jeremiah, Jer. i. 1—(2.) A high-priest in the reign of Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 8, 10—(3.) The father of Elkanim, 2 Kings xviii. 16, 30; 1 Esdr. xxiii. 20.

HIN, a Hebrew measure containing half a seah, or the sixth part of a bath—one gallon and two pints. The hin was a liquid measure; as of oil, (Exod. xxvii. 24; Ezek. xiv. 24,) or of wine, Exod. xxi. 40; Lev. xxvii. 13.—The prophet Ezekiel was commanded to drink an allowance of water, to the quantity of the sixth part of a hin, (iv. 11.) that is, one pint and two thirds.

HIND, or FEMALE DEER. (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵל, ayadah; and יִשְׂרָאֵל, ayadith,) a lovely creature, and of an elegant shape: she is more feebler than the hart, and is destitute of horns. It is not known, we believe, that the hind is more sure-footed than the hart, although the figure employed by both David and Habakkuk seems to indicate this as the fact. The royal psalmist, alluding to the security of his position, under the protection of his God, says, "He maketh my feet like hind's feet, and setteth me upon my high places;" (Ps. xviii. 33.) and the prophet, reposing in the same power, anticipates a full deliverance from his existing troubles, and a complete escape from surrounding dangers: "He will make my feet like hind's feet, and he will make me to walk upon mine high places," Hab. iii. 19.

In our version of Ps. xxxix. 9, we read, "The voice of the Lord maketh the hind to calve, and discovereth the forest." This passage has given rise to considerable discussion among the learned, who are much divided on its interpretation. Bishop Lowth contends that this rendering agrees very little with the rest of the imagery, either in nature or dignity; and dissents from the reasoning of the learned Bochart on the subject. For רַעִית, hind, the Syriac appears to have read רַעִית, e.g., in which words the reader will perceive there is but the variation of one letter. For this reading, bishop Lowth decides, remarking, that the oak, struck with lightning, admirably agrees with the context. Dr. Harris thus verifies the passage, according to Lowth's rendering:

Hark! his voice in thunder breaks,
And the lofty mountain quakes;
Mighty trees the tempests tear,
And lay the spreading forests bare!

We confess, however, that we are so averse from artificial emendations of the sacred text, that we admit them without the most obvious necessity; but this passage has been unerringly understood, we are not prepared to concede. It is a fact well known, that the hind calves with considerable difficulty, and in extreme pain. The writer of the book Job alludes to this circumstance: "Canst thou mark when the hind doth calve? They bow their necks, they bring forth their young ones, they weep over them," chap. xxxix. 1, 3. Is it not true, then, that the parturition of this animal sometimes be promoted by awakening her fears, using her frame by the rolling thunder—a circumstance which is mentioned in Job xli. 25, "If thine oxtread upon the king's manger, then is the king at thy right hand;" the proverbial expression of "the voice of the Lord." The reader will see his choice of these interpretations. In Job vi. 18, 19, Solomon admonishes the young man to let the wife of his bosom be to him "as the loving hind and the young roe," a beautiful allusion to the mutual fondness of the stag and hind.

The only remaining passage of Scripture in which this animal is mentioned, requiring illustration, is the prophetical blessing pronounced on Naphthali by the dying patriarch—a passage which is involved in considerable difficulty and obscurity. In our translation it stands thus: "Naphthali is a hind let loose, he giveth good words," Gen. xlix. 21. In adjusting the sense of the text, little assistance is derivable from the versions ancient or modern. One of the Greek versions, the Vulgate, the Persian, the Arabic, and others; and, with a slight metaphor, the Syriac, agrees in the sense of our translation. Whereas the Septuagint, Onkelos, Bochart, Houbigant, Durand, Buthe, Michaelis, and Godlins, render, "Naphthali is a spreading terebinth, producing beautiful branches." This, it is true, renders the simile uniform, but should be received with extreme caution, since it proceeds upon an arbitrary alteration of the original text, wholly unsupported by ancient MSS. (The first of these, or the English version, is probably the correct one, except that instead of let loose, the Heb. רְנֶה, shelehadh, should be translated (as we say of any thing which grows rapidly) shot up, i.e. grown up in a slender and graceful form. A fine woman is compared to the roe or hind, (Prov. v. 19.) and also swift-footed heroes, 2 Sam. ii. 18. Such are to be the descendants of Naphthali: they are also to "give goodly words," i. e., the tribe is to be distinguished for its orators, prophets, poets, perhaps, also, for its singers, etc.—The other senses above given is not a bad one; but it rests upon a change of reading in two of the principal works. 2

HIV, see SAMUEL.

I. HIRAM, a king of Tyre, distinguished for his magnificence, and for adorning the city of Tyre. When David was acknowledged king by Israel, Hiram sent ambassadors, with artists, and cedar, to build his palace, 1 Chron. xvii. 1. He also sent ambassadors to Solomon, to congratulate him on his accession to the crown; and subsequently supplied him with timber, stones, and laborers for building the temple, 1 Kings v. 1, seq. These two princes lived in mutual respect for many years. It is said that in Joseph's time, their letters, with certain riddles, which they proposed to one of the other, were extant. When Solomon had completed his works, he presented to Hiram twenty towns in Galilee; but Hiram, after the death of Solomon, gave the land of Cabul, saying, "Are these my brother's, the towns which you have given me?" 1 Kings ix. 10, seq. See CABUL.

II. HIRAM, an excellent artificer in brass or copper. He covered the columns called Jachin and Boaz, the brasen sea, the smaller brasen basins for the priests; 2 Chron. viii. 13, 14.

HIRCANUS, see JOHN.

To HIRUTS express insult and contempt: "All they who shall see the destruction of this temple, shall be astonished and shall hiss, and say, How comes it that the Lord hath thus treated this city?" 1 Kings iii. 8. Job, (xxvii. 23,) speaking of the wicked, says, "They have hasted to make thee afraid, and shall hiss at him out of his place." I will make this city the subject of ridicule and scorn; "I will make it desolate and a hissing; every one that passeth by shall be astonished and hiss, because of all the plagues thereof;" Jer. xlix. 9; 12; Lam. ii. 15, 16; Ezek. xxviii. 36; Zechar. ii. 15.

To call any one with a hissing, is a mark of power and authority. The Lord says, that in his anger he shall hiss, and call the enemies against Jerusalem. "He hisseth upon them from the end of the earth," Isa. v. 28. He will bring them with a hiss from the remotest countries. And ch. viii. 18, "The Lord shall hiss for the fly, and shall bring it, that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee in the land of Amurath." (See Ps. lxxix. 13; Lam. iii. 17; Jer. xix. 13; Ezek. xlvii. 12.) He will hiss the goat and the sheep of the desert, and call them to the fold, and make them to hear his voice, and come into his hands, and put them upon his shoulders, and carry them into the fold, and bring them back again with the sound of a flute, and the noise of hissing. Zechariah, (x. 8.) speaking of the return from Babylon, says, that the Lord will gather the house of Judah, as he were, with a hiss, and bring them back into their own country; which shows the ease and authority with which he would perform them. Called Theezeth, the descendants of Heth, inhabited the country round Hebron, Gen. xxiv. 7, 10. (See CANAANITES, p. 244.) A man of Bethel went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name of it Luz, Judg. i. 26.

HITTITES, the descendants of Heth, inhabited the country round Hebron, Gen. xxiv. 7, 10. (See CANAANITES, p. 244.) A man of Bethel went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name of it Luz, Judg. i. 26.

HIVITES, the descendants of Hamus, a son of Canaan. The name, in the Chaldee, imports serpents; and we find people so called (Ophites) in many places.

Whether, as some suppose, the Hivites were Troglodytes, and dwelt in caves, and from that circumstance derived their name by comparison with serpents; or whether it be distinguished from the Hebrews, Phoenicians, Canaanites, mountaineers, especially in mount Lebanon, as is indicated in Josh. xiii. 3, writers are not agreed. They might be of the widely spread serpent family and nation; and yet dwell in mount Lebanon as their abode, Gen. xxxiv. 2; xxxvi. 2. In Gen. xv. 16, the Samaritan and LXX insert Hivites after Canaanites, apparently with propriety. See CANAANITES, p. 243.

HOBAB, another name of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses. The inspired legislator prevailed upon him to accompany Israel when departing from mount Sinai for the promised land, Num. x. 26. Some think that the Kenites, who dwelt south of Judah, were the descendants of Hobab, Judg. i. 10; 1 Sam. xv. 6.

HOBAB, the conquered, (Gen. xiv. 15,) is probably, some hollow, between mountains, which effectually excludes those who occupy it. It lay north of Damascus.

HOBAM, king of Hebron, one of the five who besieged Gibbethon, with Adoni-seidek, and were hanged by Joshua's order, Josh. x. 4.

HOLFERNES, lieutenant-general of the armies of Nabuchodonosor, king of Assyria, was sent against Syria, in the head of a powerful army. He passed the Euphrates, entered Cilicia and Syria, and subdued almost all the provinces north of Palestine, where exercising cruelties, and endeavoring to have his master worshipped as a god. Having resolved to conquer Egypt, he advanced toward Jubes, (Judith v.) where he was informed that the Jews were preparing to oppose him; and Achior, commander of the Ammonites, represented to him that they were a people protected in a particular manner by God, so long as they were obedient to him; and that, therefore, he should not flatter himself with the expectation of overcoming them, unless they had committed some offence against their God. Holfernés, provoked at this discourse, commanded his servants to convey Achior before the walls of Bethulia; where they tied him to a tree, and left him. In the mean time, Holfernés commenced the siege of Bethulia, and having cut off the water, and set guards at the only fountain near the walls; the city was reduced to extremity, and resolved to surrender, if God did not send them succor in the interim. Informed of their situation, conceived the design of killing Holfernés in his camp, which he effected, and delivered her people. See JUDITH.

I. HOLON, a city of refuge, belonging to the priests, in the mountaineous region of Judah, Josh. xv. 51; xii. 15. Perhaps the same as HILON, v. q. v.

II. HOLON, a city of Moab, Jer. xxxviii. 21.

HOLY, HOLINESS. These terms sometimes denote outward purity or cleanliness; sometimes inherent holiness. God is holy in a transcendent and infinitely perfect manner. He is the fountain of holiness, purity, and innocence. He sanctifies his people, and requires perfect holiness in those who approach him. He rejects all worship which is not pure and holy, whether internal or external. The Messiah is called "the Holy One," (Ps. xvi. 10; Isa. xlii. 14; Luke iv. 34; i. 35; Acts iii. 14,) and holy is the common epithet given to the third person of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit.

The Israelites are generally called holy, because they are the Lord's, profess the true religion, and are called to holiness, Ezek. xix. 6; Lev. xi. 44, 45; Numb. xvi. 3; Tobit ii. 18. Christians are declared

Holy

23. Among the Israelites (Num. iii. 13, 13), the tribe of Levi was afterwards substituted, and was holy, inheriting the birthright holiness of the first-born; but the Levites, in his epistle, generally describe Christians under the name of saints, or holy persons.

In the original, as well Greek as Hebrew, two words are used, which appear under one, "holy," in the English translation. But they are not synonymous: for one seems to import what may be called, for distinction's sake, "holiness imported," that is, external; the other, "holiness inherent," that is, internal—one seems to be passive, the other active: one appertains to rites and ceremonies, the other to character: one imports a strict separation from common things of the same kind and order; whereas, the other imports a condescension extended to others, whether common or inferior.

Holiness by separation:—(1) Purity of places. The Hebrew word נְדָשֶׁה, kadesh, to which the Greek ἁγίος, answers, imports the opposite to foul, filthy, defiled; that is, clean; so we have (Deut. xxii. 14.) a precept for preserving the camp from excrementitious ordure, "for the Lord thy God is walked in the midst of thy camp; therefore shalt thy camp be holy, that he see no unclean thing in thee." So Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 5.) commands the Levites to "sanctify the house of the Lord," that is to say, "cleanse, and make holy," &c. as immediately follows. (2) Purity of persons: and this is by avoiding pollution; as, not eating unclean food, (Lev. xi. 41.) also, by removing from a dead body, (chap. xxxi. 1.) in a case of the priests; by purifying the person and the clothes, Exod. xix. 10, 14, 20; comp. Josh. iii. 5. In Numb. v. 17, what the Hebrew reads "holy water," the LXX read "clean water," and this sense of free from pollution occurs in the Targums, as expressing the import of the Hebrew kadesh, as Isa. lv. 5. "I am holier (cleaner) than thou." It is also strongly implied in 1 Sam. xxi. 5. "the vessels of the young men are holy," whether we take the term vessels literally or figuratively. (3) Separation, or preparation, for a special purpose. So Josh. xxi. 7, Eng. tr. "and they appointed." Heb. "sanctified Kadesh in Galilee," &c. The mother of Micah (Judg. xvii. 3) had "wholly dedicated," Heb. "in sanctifying had sanctified her silver," to make an idol. Hence the prophets Jeremiah, (vi. 4.) Joel, (iii. 9.) and Amos (vi. 5.) apply the word sanctifying war. Hence kadeshah is a woman sanctified to an idol: a class well known throughout India: also, kedeshim, of the male sex. (Comp. 2 Kings x. 20; Isa. lxvi. 17.) (4) Holiness was sometimes temporary; ceasing after a special purpose had been accomplished. Moses was directed to take off his shoes, "for the place whereon he stood was holy ground;" (Exod. iii. 5; Acts vii. 33.) that is, holy for the time being. Peter (2 Pet. i. 18.) speaks of the "holy mount" of transfiguration: that is, holy for the time being. In Lev. xxvii. 14, Moses supposes that a man had "sanctified his house," and afterwards wished to redeem it: after it was redeemed, it could be no longer holy. And when persons were sanctified to qualify them for attending a sacrifice, as Jesse and his sons, (1 Sam. xvi. 5.) the sanctification eventually ceased; for only David was distinguished "from that day forward." (Comp. Zeph. i. 7, margin.) (5) Holiness was necessary to the priestess of the family, was, by pre-eminence and destination, holy to the Lord. (Exod. xx. 2; Luke ii.)

Now, if holiness be conferred for a temporary or a special purpose, it is of course restricted, the conjugal relation, already contracted, might be sanctified specially to (or by) a wife, or a husband; that is, to its purposes, duties, and affections, without conferring holiness generally. This idea may elucidate the true import of a passage (1 Cor. vii. 14.) that has been too often wrested from its proper sense. And, if holiness attached by descent, previous to the law, and under the law, to the very last, it might, also, and most justly, attach by descent from a Christian parent, as the apostle determines:—"for the unbelieving husband is sanctified, to all the purposes of marriage, through the believing wife; and the unbelieving wife is sanctified, to all the purposes of marriage, through the believing husband; else were your children (that is, of the Corinthians, though church members] unclean; whereas, now they are holy." It should be observed, also, that in the Jewish books, the children of proselytes are called holy, as is shown by Brunius, referred to by Schlesner, sub vocæ ιαγιος. Holiness by election (Sanctifying war) rendered holy by our translators, to which attention is also due.—Ουαζ —the import of which may be best understood from its application in the Old Testament by the LXX, Prov. x. 29: "The way of the Lord is strength to the upright; but destruction to the workers of iniquity:" it is evident from the contrast of ideas in the passage, that "workers of good" should stand opposed to workers of iniquity. "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be upright?" (xx. 11.) whether the intention, the bias of his mind, be benevolent. "The blood-thirsty hate the upright:" (xxix. 10.)—the very opposite to blood-thirsty, the beneficent. We may now trace the intention of the apostle in 1 Tim. ii. 8, "I will that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands," more than υαζ, that is, beneficent, pacific, the very contrary to "wrath and squabbling." If Christians at large should be thus kindly affected, much more so a Christian bishop: (Tit. i. 8.) who must be—ουαζ, the stranger's friend, υαζ, the good man's lover, steady in his deportment, just towards all,—"Ουαζ, holy, much rather beneficent, extending his bounty beyond the stranger whose friend he is, or the good man of whom he is the lover, to the miserable and the distressed. The great Christian pattern is repeatedly denoted by this term: (Ps. xvi. 10; Acts ii. 27; Heb. vii. 28.) “Such a high, holy, and aarie exalting universally the sympathies of his compassion, his tenderness, his pity; and, as such, the distinguished object of prophecy—thou wilt not leave his soul in hell, nor suffer thine holy one—thine commissioned agent, who went about doing good—to see corruption.” This term is applied a second time to the Messiah, in full conviction that it could apply to no other, as every hearer must acknowledge, Acts xiii. 35.—as Clem. Alex. exclaims, what benefits (“Gospe”) do we owe to Christ! And though our opinion differs from that of commentators, (comp. Dr. Campbell’s Discourses.) we cannot but think, that this term retains the same meaning in Rev. xiv. 5; xvi. 5: “Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name, for thou only art benevolent!”

HONEY was formerly very plentiful in Palestine; and hence frequent expressions of Scripture, which import that that country was a land flowing with milk and honey. Moses says that the Lord brought his people into a land whose rocks drop oil, and whose stones produce honey, Deut. xxxii. 13. (See also Ps. xxxvi. 6.) Modern travellers observe, that it is still very common there, and that the inhabitants mix it in all their sauces. Forskal says, the caravans of Mecca bring honey from Arabia to Cairo; and often in the woods in Arabia has he seen honey flowing. It would seem that this flowing honey is bee-honey, which may illustrate the story of Jonathan, 1 Sam. xiv. 29. Apparently, it could not be palm-honey which Jonathan found; for it was a honeycomb, and so far out of his reach that it required the putting forth the end of the rod that was in his hand, to be able to dip it into the refreshing delicacy. John Baptist, too, fed on wild honey, Matt. iii. 4. There is, however, as incidentally alluded to above, a vegetable honey that is very plentiful in the East. Burchardt, speaking of the productions of the Ghor, or valley of the Jordan, says, one of the most interesting productions of this place, is the Benzal-honey, or, as the Arabs call it, Assal Beyrouk. It was described to him as a juice dropping from the leaves and twigs of a tree called gharrab, of the size of an olive tree, with leaves like those of the poplar, but somewhat broader. The honey collects upon the leaves like dew, and is gathered from them, or from the ground under the tree, which is often found completely covered with it. It is very sweet when fresh, but turns sour after being kept for two days. The Arabs eat it with butter; they also put it into their gruel, and use it in rubbing their water skins, for the purpose of excluding the air. (Travels in Syria, p. 382.)

Children were fed with milk, cream, and honey, (Isa. vii. 15.) which was the sweetest substance in use before sugar was manufactured. The following extracts will give a different idea of this mixture from that generally entertained:—D’Arvieux, (p. 205), speaking of the Arabs, says, “One of their chief breakfasts is cream, or fresh butter, mixed in a mess of honey: these do not seem to suit very well together, but experience teaches that this is no bad mixture, nor disagreeable in its taste, if one is ever so little accustomed to it.” The last words seem to indicate a delicacy of taste, of which D’Arvieux was sensible in himself, which did not, at once, relish this mixture. Thenewot also tells us, that “the Arabs knead their bread-paste fresh; adding thereto butter, and sometimes also honey.” (Part i. page 173.) (Burchardt informs us, that “the Hedjaz abounds with honey in every part of the mountains. Among the lower sands the common tree is a tree of honey.” (A tree of honey.)) This honey poured over crumbs of bread as they come quite hot from the oven. The Arabs, who are very fond of paste, never eat it without honey. (Travels in Arabia, p. 92.)

In 2 Sam. xvi. 29, we read of honey and butter being brought to king David, as well as other refreshments, “because the people were hungry, weary, and thirsty.” Considering the list of articles, there seems to be nothing adapted to moderate thirst, except this honey and butter; for we may thus arrange the passage: the people were hungry, to satisfy which were brought wheats, barley, flour, beans, lentiles, sheep, cheese: the people were weary, to relieve which were brought beds; the people were thirsty, to assuage which purpose of drink was brought a mixture of butter and honey; food fit for breakfast; light and easy of digestion, pleasant, cooling, and refreshing. That this mixture was a delightful liquor, appears from the maledictory denunciation of Zophar: (Job xx. 17.) The wicked man “shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter.” Honey alone could hardly be esteemed so flowing as to afford a comparison to rivers or torrents; but cream, in such abundance, is much more fluid; and mixed with honey, may dilute and thin it, into a state more proper for running—poetically speaking, as freely as water itself. “Honey and milk are under thy tongue,” says the spouse, Cant. iv. 11. Perhaps this mixture was not merely a refreshment, but an elegant refreshment; which heightens the inference from the predictions of Isaiah, and the description of Zophar, who speak of its abundance; and it increases the respect paid to David, by his faithful and loyal support at Megiddo.

Honey was not permitted to be offered on the altar of the Lord, (Lev. ii. 11.) for which various reasons are assigned. Conjecture, however, has hitherto been fruitless. But, though God forbade honey to be offered in sacrifices, he commanded his people to eat it as part of the manna offered to them, Exod. xx. 22. (In which God enjoins the first-fruits of the palm-tree, or the dates, or the fruit of the date, or the dates themselves, from which honey is extracted; and when God enjoins the first-fruits of honey to be offered to him, the first-fruits of dates seem to be meant; for generally, the produce only of fruits was offered.

HONOR is taken not only for respect paid to superiors, but for real services: “Honor thy father and thy mother,” (Exod. xxi. 12.) i. e. not only show respect and deference, but assist them, and perform such services as they require. Balak, king of Moab, said to Balaam, “I thought to promote thee to great honor, but, lo, the Lord hath kept thee back from honor.” (Num. xxiv. 11.) i. e. from reward. “Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of increase,” (Prov. iii. 9.) i. e. testify your respect and obedience to him. “Honor” also denotes that adoration which is due to God only, Esth. xiii. 4, Apocrypha. Ps. xxix. 2, margin; Mal. i. 6; 1 Tim. i. 17.
HOPE, a confident expectation of future good.
In the New Testament, it is generally taken for hope in Jesus Christ, hope of eternal blessings, hope of a future resurrection: “Experience prodromes hope, and hope maketh not ashamed,” Rom. v. 4, 5. Our hope is not of the same kind as that of the ancient Jews, which we derive from the Scriptures. Faith, hope and charity are the treasures of Christians, 1 Cor. xiii. 13. Jesus Christ is all our hope; (1 Tim. i. 1.) our hope in this life, and the next, arises from his merits, blood, grace; his promises, and his Spirit.
Hope is distinguished from faith by its desire of good only; and by its reference to futurity. Faith contemplates evil as well as good, and refers to things past, as well as to things future; but this is not the case with hope. We are, therefore, said to be “saved by hope” by the hope, or conviction, or desire, of unseen things; and we read of the “full assurance of hope,” which may be taken as synonymous with cheerful and earnest expectation.

Hopes, like all other graces, admit of degrees; it is sometimes feeble, but when it is the result of experience, it is certain, and proof against shame, or hesitation; it is sometimes limited to things near, or to things likely; but it also extends beyond this world, to things in heaven, to glory, immortality, and eternal life. It is repeatedly connected with patience, with waiting, with expectation, with rejoicing, and with reason; for the hope of a Christian, however it may refer to divine things, or be founded on divine promises, or be derived from personal piety, and promoted by the sacred Spirit, is yet a reasonable hope, and combines purity of heart and life; that is, obedience, with devout and fervent reliance on the promises and perfections of God.

The hope of Israel was the end of the Babylonish captivity, the coming of the Messiah, and the happiness of heaven. The Lord is the hope of the righteous; their hope shall not be confounded; the hope of the ungodly shall perish: it shall be without effect; or they shall live and die without hope. Abraham against hope believed in hope, when, being advanced in years, God promised him a son. The prisoners of hope, (Zech. ix. 12.) are the Israelites who were in captivity, but in hopes of deliverance.

HOPHNI and PHINEHAS, sons of Eli, the high-priest, were sons of Belial; that is, wicked and dissolute persons, 1 Sam. ii. 12. They knew not the Lord, nor performed the functions of their ministry, as we have seen. But when an Israelite had sacrificed a peace-offering, the son or servant of the priest came while they were dressing the flesh, and, holding a fork with three teeth in his hand, he put it into the pot, and what he could take up was the priest’s portion. So, before the fat was burnt, the priest’s servant came, and said to him who sacrificed, “Give me flesh to roast, for I will have the flesh raw.” “Let us first burn the fat, according to custom,” said he who sacrificed; but the servant replied, “No; you shall give it me instantly, or I will take it by force,” ver. 13–16. Rightly to understand this transgression, it should be observed, that the text refers not to burnt-offerings, or sacrifices for sin, but to peace-offerings, or those presented from voluntary devotion. The blood of these, and also the fat, the kidneys, and the caul, were offered to the Lord; all the rest of the sacrifice belonged to the offerer: the priest’s portion was the right shoulder and the breast. Moses does not say, (Lev. vii. 31, 32,) whether this should be given to him dressed or raw; but it appears from this place, that it was not given to the priest till it was dressed; and that he had no right to demand it, till the fat had been offered on the fire of the altar.

Some years after these young men had entered upon the office of the priesthood, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, the Lord threatened them and their father by the young prophet Samuel; and soon afterwards Hophni and Phinehas were slain in battle by the Philistines, together with 30,000 men of Israel. See Exod. xxi. 4.

HOPHRAH, or APRAH, king of Egypt, in the time of Zedekiah, king of Judah, and of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, king of Chaldea, Jer. xxvi. 19. Zedekiah, being weary of the Babylonish yoke, made an alliance with Hophra, king of Egypt, for which Ezekiel denounces him in very strong terms, chap. xlv. 18. In the ninth year of his reign, Nebuchadnezzar came against Jerusalem, and took all the cities of Judah except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxv. 1; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17; Jer. xxxix. 1; III. 4, 11. Hophra advanced to his assistance; and Nebuchadnezzar marched against him. Jeremiah, however, foretold (chap. xxxviii. 5, 6) that the Egyptians would return without venturing a battle against the Chaldeans, and also (chap. xxxiv. 30) that the king of Egypt should be delivered into the hands of his enemies, as Zedekiah had been into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar. See also Ezekiel xxx. 33, who describes the fall of Egypt in a very pathetic manner.

These predictions were executed, first against Apries, or Hophra, by Amasis; and afterwards against Egypt and the Egyptians, by Nebuchadnezzar. After the death of Hophra, Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem, and attacked Tyre, which he took after a siege of thirteen years. During this long siege, he was reduced to great difficulties, but God promised him, by Ezekiel, the land of Egypt, (Zech. xix. 10, 30; xxx. 1, 19. See Ezek. and Pharaoh.)

HOR, a mountain in Arabia Petraea, on the confines of Idumea, and forming part of mount Seir. Here Aaron died and was buried, in the land of Moab, seven years after the departure from Egypt, Deut. xxxiv. 7. Israel promised him, by Ezekiel, the land of Egypt, (Zech. xix. 10, 30; xxx. 1, 19. See Ezek. and Pharaoh.)

See Ezek. and Pharaoh.)

HORAGIDAG, an encampment of Israel, when coming out of Egypt, Numb. xxxiii. 29, 30. See Exodus, p. 418.

HORITES, or HORIMS, an ancient people, who dwelt in the mountains of Seir, Gen. xvi. 3. The name imports dwellers in caves, Troglodytes. They had princes, and were powerful before Egypt conquered their country. Deut. ii. 22. The Horites and the Edomites seem afterwards to have been disposed both by people, Gen. xxxvi. 30.

HORHAM, a city taken from the Canaanites by Judah and Simeon, (Judg. l. 17; Numb. xxv. 13, 17; and originally called Zophath.

HORN, an eminence or angle, a corner or rising.

Horn, I. 1. By horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, many understand the angles of that altar; but there were also horns or eminences at these angles, Exod. xxvii. 2; xxx. 3. See Altar.
As the anciently frequently used horns to hold liquor, vessels containing oil, and perfumes, are often spoken of as being of great size and strength of which their horns and hence the horn is often a symbol of strength and power. The Lord exalted the horn of David, and the horn of his people; he breaketh the horn of the uncanny; he cutteth off the horn of Moab; he cutteth off, in his fierce anger, all the horn of Israel. He promises to make the horn of Israel to bud forth; to re-establish its honor, and restore its vigor. There may be an allusion in these passages, however, to a very common part of the female dress in some parts of the East. Mr. Buckingham, describing the ornaments of a female at Tyre, says, "She wore also on her head a hollow silver horn, rearing itself upwards obliquely from her forehead, being four or five inches in diameter at the root, and pointed at its extreme; and her ears, her neck, and her arms were laden with rings, chains, and bracelets. This peculiarity reminded me very forcibly of the expression of the psalmist: 'Lift not up thine horn on high, speak not with a stiff neck. All the horns of the wicked will I cut off, but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted' (Ps. lxxv. 5, 10.) similar illustrations of which, Bruce had also found in Syria, in the silver horns of warriors and distinguished men." Kingdoms and great powers are also described by the symbol of horns, 1 Mac. vii. 46. In Dan. vii. viii. horns represent the power of the Persians, of the Greeks, of Syria, and of Egypt. The prophet describes these animals as having many horns, one of which grew from another. In 1 Mac. ix. 1, the wings of an army are called its horns.

HORNET, a kind of large wasp, which has a powerful sting. The Lord drove out the Canaanites before Israel by means of this insect, Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12; Exod. xxxii. 28. (Compare FXT.) For an illustration of the manner in which this might be effected, without at the same time injuring the Israelites, it should be remarked, that the latter, in the sandy wilderness, would escape this creature. HORÓN, or Oronaim, a city of Arabia, whence Sanballat came, Neh. ii. 10, &c.

HORONAIM, a town of Moab, Isa. xv. 5; Joseph. Antiqu., cap. iii. 23. HORSE, a domestic animal, well known, but not so common among the Hebrews, till the time of Solomon. God forbade the kings of Israel to keep many horses. (Deut. xvii. 16.) and their judges and priests might not go in saddles on mules and asses. Josiah took away the horses which the kings of Judah, his predecessors, had consecrated to the sun, 2 Kings xxi. 11. This luminary was worshipped over all the East, and was represented as riding in a chariot, drawn by the most beautiful and swiftest horses in the world, and performing every day his journey from east to west, to enlighten the earth. In Persia, and among the Massagetae, horses were sacrificed to the sun. (Herodot. lib. i. cap. 35. Ovid Fast. lib. viii. Xenoph. Cyropaed. lib. viii.) It is thought that those which Josiah removed from the court of the temple, were appointed for a similar purpose.

HORSE-LEACH, or Blood-sucker. The import of the Hebrew ἐπερρέω, rendered horse-leach by the LXX, the Vulgate, and the Targum, as well as in the English, and other modern versions of Scripture, is by no means ascertained. "The alukah, (horse-leach)," says Solomon, "hath two daughters, crying, Give, give," Prov. xxx. 15. Bochart thinks the translators have mistaken the import of one word for that of one another. The Leech should be translated destiny, or the necessity of dying; to which the rabbins give two daughters, Eden, or Paradise, and Hades, or Hell; the first of which invites the good, the second calls for the wicked. This interpretation is thought to be strengthened by chap. xxviii. 20: "Hell and destruction (Hades and the grave) are never satisfied." Professor Paxton, on the other hand, contends that the common interpretation is in every respect entitled to the preference. Solomon, having in the preceding verses mentioned those that devoured the property of the poor, as the worst of all the generations he had specified, proceeds, in the fifteenth verse, to state and illustrate the insatiable cupidity with which they prosecuted their schemes of rapine and plunder. (Genesis) refers the word to a fabulous monster of oriental superstition, which sucks the blood of human victims, like the vampyre of western popular belief. Rosenmüller adheres to the sense leach.

As the horse-leach has two daughters, cruelty and thirst of blood, which cannot be satisfied; so the oppressor of the poor has two dispositions, cruelty and avarice, which never say they have enough, but continually demand additional gratifications.

HOSAH, a town of Asher, Josh. xix. 29.

HOSAI, a prophet or seer, in the time of Manasseh, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 19. margin. The Jews are of opinion, that Hosai and Isaiah are the same person; the LXX take Hosai in a general sense for prophets and seers: the Syriac calls him Hanan; the Arabic Esphan.

HOSANNA, save now, bannock now, make him victorious! is a form of blessing or wishing well. At our Saviour's entrance into Jerusalem, when the people cried Hosanna, their meaning was, Lord, preserve this son of David; hark favors and blessings on him! Mr. Harmer is of opinion, (Obs. vol. iii. p. 37.) that the people scattered rose leaves in the way as he went. However, to say no more, though rose leaves might possibly be attainable at that early season, yet rose trees hardly grew on the public way; and besides, this does not give any reason for the exclamations of hosanna, nor does it appear to be connected with them. But in Levii's "Lingua Sacra," under the Hebrew word יַסָּחַ כְּפִּי קַנָּה, we find the following extracted from the Talmud: "The willow (used in the Feast of Tabernacles) is of the foundation of the prophets; that is, the prophets instructed the people in the proper form and manner thereof, as it was delivered by tradition; and which, having been forgotten, was restored by the prophets. Hence we meet, in rabbinical Hebrew, with the phrase 'the precept of the willow, on Hosanna the Great.' This is the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles, when each person has (carries) a branch of willow, and in the prayer of the day, frequently makes use of the word Hosanna! save, we beseech thee; whence the willows used at that time are called the 'Hosannuth.'" If this be correct, we see that the people applied to our Lord a custom with which they were well acquainted, and which, indeed, formed an annual ceremony.

They formed, as they were used to do on Hosanna the great, a procession; and those in the leading division of it, cried, 'Hosanna! blessed be the king of Israel, who cometh in the name of the Lord! Peace in heaven! Glory in the highest!' to which those who brought up the rear, answered, 'Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosea in the highest! [the prophecy, and that have been used to show at our Feast of Tabernacles.

Does not this history apply, under this elucidation, to be a clearer reference of the Feast of Tabernacles to the Messiah than heretofore, and a reference that is in some degree wanted? Are not the spots of the multitude strong indications of what they so earnestly looked for—a king to deliver them from their present bondage? Did the prophets hint at such a king, to be expected, when they appointed the willow of the great Hosanna? Is this the covert meaning of the rulers of the synagogue, "Hearest thou what these children say? in allusion to a king whom we expect; which they refer to thee?" And is this the import of our Lord's answer, "Yes; did you never hear the remark, that children will tell the truth when men will not; that when men are afraid, or incredulous, the mouths of babes and sucklings may strongly protest due and proper praise? Was our Lord's action of driving the intruding dealers from the temple an act of royalty, coincident with these acclamations, and national ideas, which on this occasion he thought proper to exert, and to which those concerned thought proper at this time to submit, as unable to foresee how far the popular feeling might extend?"

I. HOSEA, son of Beeri, the first of the minor prophets, and said to have been of Reuben, and of the tribe of Beelzeboul, beyond Jordan. He lived in the kingdom of Israel, and his prophecies for the most part regard that state. The title of his works says, he prophesied under the reign of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and under Jeroboam II. king of Israel; which would embrace, at the very least, a period of eighty years. There is nothing, however, to induce a belief that he prophesied so long; besides that it is strange his prophecies should be dated by the reigns of the kings of Judah, when he did not live under their dominion. It is therefore probable, that the title is not Hosea's, but that the true beginning of his work is, "The beginning of the work of the Lord by Hosea." Or the specification may relate to his life rather than to his prophesying. Calmet thinks he began to prophesy about the end of the reign of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, but before the accession of the kings of Judah, their ancient rival. He saw the first captivity of the four tribes, by Tiglath-pileser; and the extinction of the kingdom of Samaria, by Salmanasar.

In the third book of Hosea's prophecy, we read, that the Lord directed him to take unto him "a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms;" i. e. to marry a woman who had formerly lived a debauched life, but who, after her marriage, should retire from all bad conversation. Many interpreters, however, shocked at the idea, have maintained that this was only a parable; and that the prophet called the wife whom he married a prostitute, only with design of awakening the attention of the Israelites; or that the whole was transacted in a vision. But the sequel of the narrative sufficiently shows, that the marriage was real, though figurative as to the things it symbolized.

As the circumstances, however, appear sufficiently strange to us, it may be worth while to add baron du Tott's account of marriages by Capin—which agrees with the relations of other travellers into the East: "There is another kind of marriage, which, stipulating the time when the divorce is to take place. This contract is called Capin and, provided an agreement is made between the parties to live together, for such a price during such a time." (Preliminary Discourse, p. 23.) It is scarcely possible to expect more direct illustration of the prophet's conduct than the extract affords. We learn from it that this contract is a regular form of marriage, and regarded, generally, in the East; consequently, connection and agreement could give no scandal, in the days of Hosea, though it would not be justifiable under Christian manners. The prophet says—"fifteen pieces and a half for another man; and I will also be for thee." "So I bought her [my wife] to me, 30 pieces of silver, and for a horn of barley, 10 pieces of barley. And I said unto her, Many a day shalt thou abide with me; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man; so I will also be for thee." What was this but a marriage by Capin, according to the baron's account? And the prophet carefully lets us know, that he honestly paid the stipulated price, that he was very strict in his agreement, as to the behavior of his wife, and that he also bound himself to fidelity, during the time for which they mutually contracted. It may easily be imagined that this kind of marriage was liable to be abused; and that it was glanced at, and even prohibited by the Lord's prohibition of hasty divorces, need not be doubted.

II. HOSEA, or Hosea, son of Elah, and king of Israel. Having conspired against Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of the ten tribes, and seized his dominions. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, however, though not equal to the kings of Israel, who preceded him; that is, say the Jewish doctors, he did not restrain his subjects from going, if they would, to Jerusalem, to worship the kings of Israel, his predecessors, had forsaken it, and placed guards on the roads to prevent it; 2 Kings xv. 30. Salamanazar, king of Assyria, having intelligence that Hosea meditated a revolt, and had conferred measures with So, king of Egypt, to shake off the Assyrian yoke, marched against him, and besieged Samaria, which was taken after a siege of three years, in the ninth year of Hosea's reign; and was reduced to a heap of ruins. The king of Assyria removed the king to Bethel to be an house to countries beyond the Euphrates, ch. xviii. 3, 6.

The chronology of Hosea's reign is extremely perplexed, by the inconsistency of certain dates. It is said in ch. xv. 30, that Hosea began to reign in the sixteenth year of Jotham, son of Uzziah; (this was the fourth of Ahaz;) for Jotham his father died four years before, having reigned only sixteen years, ver. 39, 33,) but in ch. xvii. 1, it is said, that Hosea began to reign in the twelfth of Ahaz; ver. 37. also allows Pekah to have reigned but twenty years; whereas, if the last year of Pekah and the first year of Hosea concur with the twelfth of Jotham, (ver. 30.) Pekah must have reigned twenty-two years, since Jotham began to reign in the second year of Pekah. To reconcile these differences, Calmet supposed that Hosea was conspired against Pekah in the twentieth year of that prince, which was the eighteenth of Jotham's reign; and that it was two years longer before Hosea made himself master of Pekah's dominions, and was acknowledged king of Israel; that is, in the fourth year of Ahaz, and the twelfth of Jotham. In the twelfth year of Ahaz, he reigned quietly over all Israel, according to chap. xvii. 1.
HOSPITALITY has ever been much in esteem among civilized people. The ancient Greeks believed hospitality to win and maintain friends, and they took it for granted that it was a common grace and duty of men; and the old writers express the same sentiment. Thus Hesiod, in one of his most pious and just instructions, says, "To give refreshment to the stranger is the first duty of hospitality." Homer, in his Iliad, says, "Hospitality is the first duty of a man, and a stranger is the first object of regard." The ancients, in their laws and custom, made hospitality a matter of law and duty. Thus the code of the Twelve Tables, which was the foundation of the Roman law, makes hospitality a duty of every citizen. The same is true of the Code of Justinian, which was the basis of the modern law of hospitality in Europe.

The practice of hospitality was carried to a great extent by the ancient Greeks and Romans. They made it a matter of honor and duty. They believed that hospitality was a sign of good breeding and of a liberal mind. They believed that it was a duty to receive strangers with kindness and courtesy, and to provide for their wants. They believed that it was a duty to entertain them with a good meal, and to provide them with a bed to sleep in. They believed that it was a duty to give them a cordial welcome, and to make them feel at home.

had nothing to set before them? so uncomman case; but, if this were occasioned by real passa, and many others in cry the shame of the people, or to the feelings of the individu, als, and however urgent, must be warded.

The primitive Christians considered one principal part of their duty to consist in showing hospitality to strangers; and when their houses were crowded, whatever was given to such an one, though but a cup of cold water, should not lose its reward, Matt. x. 40, 41. They were, in fact, so ready in discharging this duty, that the very heathens admired them for it. They were hospitable to all strangers, but especially to those of the household of faith. Believers scarcely ever travelled without letters of commendation, which testified the purity of their faith, and procured them a favorable reception wherever the name of Jesus Christ was known. Calvin is of opinion, that the two minor epistles of John may be such letters of commendation and recommendation.

This article should not be closed without notice of the obligations understood to be ostromated by the interstices of the table. Niebuhr says, "When a Bedouin sheikh eats bread with strangers, they may trust his fidelity and depend on his protection. A traveler will always pay them therefore, to take an early opportunity of securing the friendship of his guide by a meal." This will bring to recollection the complaint of the psalmist, (xii. 8.) penetrated with the deep ingratitude of one whom he describes as having been his own familiar friend, in whom he trusted—"who did eat of my bread—ever he hath lifted up his heel against me!"To the mortification of insult was added the violation of all confidence, the breach of every obligation connected with the ties of humanity, with the laws of honor, with the bonds of social life, with the unsuspecting freedom of those moments when the soul unbinds itself to enjoyment, and is, if ever, off its guard. We have seen the covenant contracted by the participation of bread and salt. (See COVENANT OF BALTH.) We now find that, among the Arabs at least, the friendship and protection implied attaches no less to bread.—Hence, in part, no doubt, the conviviality that always followed the making of a covenant. Hence, also, the saying that the feelings acknowledged by the indignant man of patience, Job, appears in several passages of his pathetic expostulations. It is well known that Arabs who have given food to a stranger, have afterwards thought themselves bound to protect him against the vengeance demanded by consanguinity, for even blood itself.

HOURS. The ancient Hebrews did not divide the day and night into hours, but into parts. The word hour, in the Septuagint, signifies the seasons of the year; as in Homer and Hesiod. In the books of Moses, and in other Hebrew writings, hour is used for the time, or season. In Daniel, we find the Chaldee word שָׁカード, which is translated hour, and is derived from the verb שָׁקַד, which signifies to see, to look, and hence the noun שָׁקד properly means a glance, a moment of time. The books of Daniel, Tobit, and Judith are the earliest in which we find the word hour used to signify a part either of day or night. Daniel (iv. 19.) says he was about an hour (properly a moment) considering king Nebuchadnezzar's vision. Tobit (xi. 14.) uses it, he considered about half an hour in very great pain; and also (xii. 29.) that after the angel Raphael had discovered himself, they prostrated themselves for about two hours. Judith (vii. 15.) declares that the people of Bethulia spent many hours in crying for the absence of the people, or to the feelings of the individuals, and however urgent, must be warded.

The Greeks knew nothing of the origin of hours among foreign nations, and trace them no higher among themselves than the time of Anaximenes, or Anaximander, in the reign of Cyrus, toward the end of the Babylonish captivity. This author had travelled into Chaldea, and might have brought from thence the manner of dividing the day by hours. Herodotus says expressly, that the Greeks received from the Babylonians the use of the gnomon and dial. (See Dial.) And Xenophon introduces Euthydemus, saying, that the sun discovers to us the hours of the day, and the stars the hours of the night. Aristophanes also speaks of the gnomon or index, and of hours. The result of what has been said is, that the use of time-measurers, or sun-dials, and the distribution of the day into hours, is more ancient in the East than among the Greeks; that the author of the invention is not known, and that we cannot tell in what manner the ancient Babylonians and Chaldeans divided their hours of day and night.

We have already intimated that the Hebrews divided the day and night into parts: some further information may be useful. We derive it chiefly from Godwin.

The night was divided into four quarters, or greater hours, termed Sotah, each watch containing three lesser hours. The first they called the beginning of the watches; (1 Sam. ii. 19.) the second the middle watch, (Judg. vii. 19.) not because there were only three watches, as Drusius (on Judg. vii. 19.) thinks, but because it lasted till midnight; the third watch began at midnight, and continued till three o'clock in the morning; (Luke xxi. 38.) the last, called the morning watch, (Exod. xiv. 24.) began at three o'clock, and ended at six in the morning, Matt. xiv. 24, 25. These watches were also called by other names, according to that part of the night which closed each one. The first was called בָּּתַם, the even; the second, בָּּתַם בָּּתַם, midnight; the third, בַּתַּם בָּּתַם, cock-crowing; the fourth, בַּתַּם בַּתַּם, the dawning. Ye know not when the master of the house will come, (1.) at even, or (2.) at midnight, or (3.) at cock-crowing; or (4.) at the dawning. Mark xiii. 35. The day was also divided into four quarters, as appears by the parade of the laborers hired into the vineyard, Matt. xx. The first quarter began at six o'clock in the morning, and continued nine; the second quarter ended at twelve; the third quarter at three in the afternoon; the fourth quarter at six at night. The first quarter was called the third hour, (verse 3.) the second quarter the sixth hour, (verse 5.) the third quarter the ninth hour, (verse 5.) the last quarter the eleventh hour, verse 6.

This shows that the hours among the Jews were of two sorts; some lessor, of which the day consisted twelve; others greater, of which the day consisted four; the lessor are termed hours of the day, (John ix. 9.) the greater, hours of the temple, or hours of prayer, Acts iii. 1. But in fact there were but three hours of prayer, the third, the sixth and the ninth. At the third hour the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles, Acts ii. 15; the disciples ascended up to the house-top to pray, Acts x. 9. At the sixth, Peter and John went into the temple, Acts iii. 1.

The word hour, as previously stated, is used with great latitude in Scripture: it seems to imply the space of time, or the continuation of the same.
Rev. iii. 3, "If thou shalt not watch, thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee." Matt. xxiv. 43, 44; xxv. 13, "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." In addition to these instances quoted above, these now given prove a connection between the word in the watch and the word in a watch. The same may be inferred from some of the following passages, Luke xxii. 59: Peter having denied his knowledge of Jesus to the guard, a new set of guards came to relieve the former; among them was one who challenged Peter, about the space of one hour, one watch, after his former denial. Felix ordered Paul to be sent away at the third hour, perhaps a military watch, of the night, Acts xxiii. 23.

The word hour is used with no less latitude in modern languages. "The house" are the seasons of the year in Italian; and the four hours of the day, in French, are morning, noon, evening, night. The hours of divine service, or canonical hours, according to the Roman ritual, contain three common hours; add to these the usual calculation of hours, and we shall perceive, that, however the significance of this word may have become fixed since the invention and adoption of mechanical time-measurers among us, yet it, in fact, expresses little beyond a definite portion of time; or a portion varying its limits, according to the usages of places and nations. See Dat.

(The word hour in Scripture signifies, one of the twelve equal parts into which each day was divided, and which of course were of different lengths at different seasons of the year. This mode of dividing the day prevailed among the Jews at least after the exile, and perhaps earlier. Anciently, however, the usual division of the day was into four parts, viz. the morning; the heat of the day, commencing about the middle of the forenoon; midday; and evening. In a similar manner the Greeks appear at first to have divided the day into only three parts, viz. the morning, the middle, or second watch, (Judg. vii. 18,) and the morning, or third watch, Ex. xiv. 24. But after the Jews became subject to the Romans, they adopted the Roman manner of dividing the night into four watches, as above described. (Winer, Bibl. Realw. p. 470, § 681. Jahn, § 101.) R.

House, a place of residence. The purpose of a house being for dwelling, and that of tents being the same, they are called by one name (beth) in the Hebrew. On the same principle, the tabernacle of God, though only a tent, is sometimes called the temple, that is, the residence, of God.

Of the ordinary buildings, or houses, in the East, the intelligent traveller Dr. Shaw has given a very full and interesting description, of which we shall here avail ourselves, as it will tend to the illustration of several passages in Scripture:

"The general method of building, both in Barbary and the Levant, seems to have continued the same, from the earliest ages, without the least alteration or improvement. Large doors, spacious chambers, marble pavements, cloistered courts, with fountains sometimes playing in the midst, are certainly conveniences very well adapted to the circumstances of these climates, where the summer heats are generally so intense. The jealousy, likewise, of these people is less apt to be alarmed, whilst all the windows open into their respective courts, if we except a latticed window or balcony which sometimes looks into the streets. It is during the celebration only of some Zeenah, as they call a public festival, that these houses and their latticed windows and balconies are left open. For this being a time of great liberty, reveling, and extravagance, each family is ambitious of adorning both the inside and the outside of their houses with their richest furniture; whilst crowds of both sexes, dressed out in their best apparel, and laying aside all modesty and restraint, go in and out where they please. The account we have (2 Kings ix. 30) of Jezreel's painting her face, tiring her head, and looking out at a window, on Jehu's public entrance into Jezreel, gives us a lively idea of an eastern lady at one of these Zeenahs, or solemnities.

The streets of these cities, the better to shade them from the sun, are usually narrow, with sometimes a range of shops on each side. If from these we enter into one of the principal houses, we shall first pass through a porch or gate-way, with benches on each side, where the master of the family receives visits and dispatches business; few persons not even the nearest relations, having a further admission, except upon extraordinary occasions. From hence we are received into the court, or quadrangle, which, lying open to the weather, is, according to the ability of the owner, paved with marble, or such materials as will immediately carry off the common sewers. There is something very analogous betwixt this open space in these buildings, and the atrium, or Casa Eduta, of the Romans; both of them being alike exposed to the weather, and giving light to the house. When much people are to be admitted, as upon the celebration of a marriage, the circumcision of a child, or occasions of the like nature, the company is rarely or never received into one of the chambers. The court is the usual place of their reception, which is strewn, accordingly, with mats and carpets for their more commodious entertainment. Now, as this part of the house is always allotted for the reception of large companies, being also called the middle of the house, literally, according to (παρακεντής) "the midst" of Luke, (iv. 19.) it is probable, that the place where our Saviour and the apostles were frequently accustomed to give their instructions, might have been in the like situation; that is, in the area, or quadrangle, of one of this kind of houses. In the summer season, and upon all oc-cations when a large company is to be received, this court is commonly sheltered from the heat or inclemency of the weather, by a Ficus, umbrella, or veil, which, being expanded upon ropes from one side of the parapet wall to the other, may be folded or unfolded at pleasure. The psalmist seems to allude either to the tents of the Bedouins, or to some covering of this kind, in that beautiful expression, of spreading out the heavens like a veil, or curtain. The court is for the most part surrounded with a cloister; as the Cava Edum of the Romans was with a Peristylum, or Colonnade; over which, when the house hath one or more stories (and I have seen them with two or three,) there is a gallery erected, of the same dimensions with the cloister, having a balustrade, or else a piece of carved or lattice work going round about it, to prevent people from falling from it into the generally of a recess, where several persons may be conducted into large spacious chambers, of the same length with the court, but seldom or never communicating with one another. One of them frequently serves a whole family; particularly when a father indulges his married children to live with him; or when several persons join in the rent of the same house. From whence it is, that the cities of these countries, which in general are much inferior in bigness to those of Europe, yet are so exceedingly populous, that great numbers of people are always swept away by the plague, or any other contagious distemper. A mixture of families of this kind seems to be spoken of by Maimonides, as he is quoted by Dr. Lightfoot on 1 Cor. x. 16.

"In houses of better fashion, these chambers are hung with velvet or damask from the middle of the wall downwards, are covered and adorned with velvet or damask hangings of white, blue, red, green, or other colors. (But on account of the Greek, I. i.) and, when taken down at pleasure; but the upper part is embellished with more permanent ornaments, being adorned with the most ingenious wreatheings and devices, in stucco and fret-work. The ceiling is generally of mantling, either round or square, painted, or else thrown into a variety of panels, with gilded mouldings, and scrolls of their Coran intermixed. The prophet Jeremiah (xxvii. 14.) exclaims against some of the eastern houses that were covered with cedal and painted with vermilion. The floors are laid with painted tiles or plaster of terrace; but as these people make little or no use of chairs, (either sitting cross-legged, or lying at length upon these floors,) they always cover or spread them over with carpets, which are of silk, or other costly materials. (Hab. ii. 6.) Along the sides of the wall, or floor, a range of narrow beds, or mattresses, is often placed upon these carpets; and for their further case and convenience, several damask or velvet bolsters are placed on these carpets; and to the stretching themselves upon couches, and the seining of pillows to arm-holes, as we have it expressed Amos vi. 4.; Ezek. xiii. 18, 20. At one end of each chamber there is a little gallery, raised three, four, or five feet above the floor, with a balustrade in the front of it, with a few steps likewise leading up to it. Here they place their beds; a situation frequently alluded to in the Holy Scripture.

"The stairs are sometimes placed in the porch, sometimes at the entrance into the court. When there is one or more stories, they are afterwards continued, through one corner or other of the gallery, to the top of the house, whither they conduct us through a door, that is constantly kept shut, to prevent their domestic animals from daubing the terrace, and thereby spoiling the water which falls thence into the cisterns below the court. This door, like most others we meet with in these countries, is hung, not with hinges, but by having the jambs formed at each end into an axiétre, or pivot; whereas the uppermost, which is the longest, is to be received into a correspondent socket in the lintel, whilst the other falls into a cavity of the like fashion in the threshold. The stone door so much admired and taken notice of by Mr. Mannrell, in his Description of the Royal Seat over in Jerusalem, is exactly of this fashion, and very common in most places.

"I do not remember ever to have observed the staircase conducted along the outside of the house; neither, indeed, will the contiguity and relation which these terraces have one to each other, and the exclusiveness of the supposed privacy of them, admit of any such contrivance. However, we may go up or come down them, by the stair-case I have described, without entering into any of the offices or apartments, and, consequently, without interfering with the business of the house; which will be explanatory enough of Matt. xxiv. 17.: 'Let him that is upon the house-top not come down to take any thing out of the house, provided the action there recorded required any such move previous.'

"The top of the house, which is always flat, is covered with a strong plaster of terrace; from whence, in the frank language, it hath attained the name of The Terrace; a word made use of, likewise, in several parts of these countries. It is usually surrounded by two walls; the outermost whereof is partly built over the street, partly making the partition with the contiguous houses, being frequently so low that one may easily pass from one to another, but the terrazas are, with balustrades only, or latticed work: in which fashion probably, as the name seems to import, was the [222e] set, or lattice, as we render it, that Abashah (2 Kings i. 2.) might be carelessly leaning over, when he fell down from the piazza. The terraces of these houses, as they are called, are, in several cases, offices or apartments; and several terrazas of the family are performed; such as the drying of linen and flax, (Josh. ii. 6.) the preparing of tigs and raisins; here, likewise, they enjoy the cool, refreshing breezes of the evening; conversing with one another on business matters. The Feast of Tabernacles booths were erected upon them, Neh. viii. 16. When one of these cities is built upon level ground, we can pass from one end of it to the other, along the tops of the houses, without coming down the streets, and the street itself.

"Such, in general, is the manner and contrivance of the eastern houses. And if it may be presumed that our Saviour, at the healing of the paralytic, was preaching in a house of this fashion, we may, by attending only to the structure of it, give no small light to one circumstance of that history, which hitherto has been generally given offence to some unbelievers. For, among other pretended difficulties and absurdities relating to this fact, it hath been urged, that he was unable to uncorking or breaking up of the roof, (Mark ii. 4.) or the letting a person down through it, (Luke v. 18.) supposes the breaking up of tiles, rafters, &c. so it was well as the author goes on in his ludicrous manner; if Jesus and his disciples escaped with only a broken..."
foot also observes out of the Talmud, on Mark ii. 4, will, by an alteration only of the preposition which answers to δι', further vouch for this interpretation. For, as it is there clitic (κακοῦ Ἰησοῦς was dead, and his bier could not be carried out through the door, which was too straight and narrow, therefore) in (order, as we may supply, to bury it) οἵτινες γὰρ τελείωσαν, they thought good to let it down [ου γὰρ] through the roof, or through the way of the roof, as the doctor renders it, but it should be rather, as in διὰ τῶν κεφαλῶν, or διὰ τοῦ τελείου, by the way of, or over the roof, viz. by taking it upon the terrace, and letting it down upon the wall, that way, into the street. We have a passage in Aulus Gellius, [112:4] 8: παραλυτικός, as the latter part of the street, where it is said, that if any person in chains should make his escape into the house of the Flamen Dialla, that he should be forthwith loosed; and that his fetters should be drawn up through the Impluvium, upon the roof, (terrace), and from thence be let down into the highway or street. When the use, then, of these phrases, and the fashion of these houses, are rightly considered, there will be no reason, I presume, for supposing any breach to have been made in the tegulae, or κεφαλῶν, since all that was to be done in the case of the paralytic, was, to carry him up to the top of the house, either by forcing their way through the crowd, up the stair-case, or else by conveying him over some of the neighboring terraces; and, after they had drawn away the κεφαλῶν, veil, to let him down, along the side of the roof (through the opening or Impluvium) into the midst (of the court) before Jesus."

Such are Dr. Shaw's remarks on this narrative; but there are some omissions which Mr. Taylor has attempted to supply.

It should be premised, that, in general, houses in the East are but one story high; so that the men who carried the paralyzed man, had not far to put him on the roof, and nor far to lower him down from the roof to which they had ascended. They went up the private stair-case of the olea, or attached building, which was free from the crowd, because Jesus, being in the interior, was distant from this entrance. In fact, Jesus was in the middle court of the house; for Dr. Shaw tells us, that the (τὸ κενόν) "the midst" of Luke, is the el Woost, the court allotted for the reception of large companies, whereas, in our version, this "in the midst" means to imply among the people, in the midst of the crowd; and that a large company was now attending the discourses of Jesus, is plain from the history. The mention of a middle court implies a large house; while the observation, that doctors of the law and Pharisees were sitting by (who come from surrounding towns, and even from Jerusalem), agrees with an extensive building, inhabited by a person of consequence, who accommodated these dignified visitors on this occasion;—which some have supposed was an appointed meeting of these great men. Now, to a house of magnitude, a private stair-case always is an appendage; and is next the porch, or street, says the doctor, "without giving the least disturbance to the house. Up these steps, therefore, the bearers of the paralytic carried him and his bed; and so far over the (flat) roof of the house, till they came to the middle court;—but, when arrived here, how should they make known their errand?—they could not possibly show the people (nor communicate with any, not even with Jesus himself) below them; so they determined on letting him down over the paret. Our patient is now on the roof; (τὸ διὸμα;) but this roof was flat, and even paved; we must, therefore, absolutely prohibi t the idea of tiles covering this roof, which, without such prohibition, will rise in the mind of English readers. On the contrary, these men lifted up their burden over the parapet, (say two feet in height), and having tied the four corners of the bed with cords, they lowered him down the face of the wall, along the painted tiles, with which that face was adorned, into the middle court, where Jesus stood, teaching.

To establish this representation, we remark, that the

and the disciples escaping with only a broken pate, by the falling of the tiles, and the rest being smoker with the dust," which is the ludicrous language of a remark on the miracles of Jesus; but with what judiciousness of this belief, and the need of the reader now, and the necessity for accurate information on some minutiae, seemingly unimportant, in order to vindicate, correctly and adequately, the miracles of Jesus.

We now turn to the evangelist Mark's account of this event, chap. ii. 4. Our translators say, "And when the man who carried the paralytic could not come nigh to Jesus for the press [read, through the crowd] they uncovered the roof (axiosiavm books: n 4) where he was; and when they had broken it up, (piogpato) they let down the bed (pdlkrflw) wherein the sick of the palsy lay." The first action here, as it seems, is—they uncovered the roof, and broke it up; notwithstanding that Luke says, this occurred in the middle court of a great house, which court could have no roof. But Dr. Shaw tells us, we know from other sources, that the court was covered by a canopy, as a shelter from the solar rays; and this is clearly expressed by the word oria, rendered roof, which should have been rendered covering, or shade. This is the rendering of the Syriac version; tattlic, any kind of covering, and the phraseology of the evangelist afforded a kind of paranomasia, or no word at all; as if we should say, "they uncovered the covering" of the court; this conveys the idea, though the phraseology is not pleasant. To say simply, "remove the covering," though it marks the action, yet does not convey the relation of the words to each other; but, had the relation of the words been expressed, our translators could never have been understood as meaning "unroof the roof? that would have appeared preposterous; a labor and a liberty not to be taken by four strong men, who might with propriety have waited till the sermon was over. But if the braces of this veil, as we suppose, were fastened to hooks, or something similar, in the parapet wall, or into the roof, or beams of the building, then the men, by unfailing ideas of this transaction let the reader know when they entered the roof of the house, and going along the roof, till they arrived at the inner court, they负荷 some of the braces of the covering, and covered the man over that court; which braces were connected with the parapet on the roof. And when they had separated the covering, (krabbaton) from the bed, (oriav) they tied a cord to each of the four corners of the covering, and let the person that was sick, with that cord, open the canopy, which prevented them from seeing below, and prevented the people below from seeing them. This opening would remove the obstruction to the presence of Jesus; and thus they would, strictly speaking, uncover the canopy the covering; according to the phraseology of the mind of English readers. Our translators, having mentioned the roof, seem to say, "they broke it up."—But this word (pdiogpato) rather refers to the bed; though whether it signifies broke up may be questioned. It is omitted in the Cambridge MS, and is not regarded in the Syriac version; the Persian version renders, "to the four corners of the bed they attached cords." We find the same word in Gal. iv. 15, rendered plucked out—but how can that be its meaning in this instance? The answer becomes easy, after we have considered, that the evangelists use two words, both inacuately rendered bed. Luke's word (oriav) signifies a kind of truckle-bed; that is, a bedstead, or a bed having a frame-work round it; whereas, Mark calls it krabbaton, a bed consisting of a single carriage, or a bedstead only. Yet there is no contradiction between the evangelists, because it was both these kinds of bed.

be considered, first, that this man was 'borne upon':—which may safely be taken to imply one of the blessedness of the grace and of the sickness brought into the middle court, through the opening of this canopy, which prevented them from seeing below, and prevented the people below from seeing them. This opening would remove the obstruction to the presence of Jesus; and thus they would, strictly speaking, uncover the canopy; according to the phraseology of the mind of English readers. nor could the people avoid looking up, to see where the disabled sufferer came from."

We now resume Dr. Shaw's description of an eastern house:

"To most of these houses there is a smaller one annexed, which sometimes rises one story higher than the house; at other times it consists of one or two rooms only, and a terrace; whilst others, that are built (as they frequently are) over the porch or gateway, have (if we except the ground floor, which they have not) all the conveniences that belong to the house, properly so called. There is a door of communication from them into the gallery of the house, kept open or shut at the discretion of the master of the family; besides another door, which opens immediately from a privy-stairs, (Luke xxiv. 17.) down into the porch or street, without giving the least disturbance to the house. These back-houses are known by the name of Alees, or Oolah, (for the house, properly so called, is Der, or Beet,) and in them strangers are usually lodged and entertained; in them the sons of the family are permitted to keep their concubines; and thither, likewise, the men are wont to retire, from the hurry and noise of their families, to be more at leisure for meditation or diversions; besides the use they are at other times put to, in serving for wardrobes and magazines.

"The Oolah (אֶלֹה) of Holy Scripture, being literally the same appellation, is accordingly so rendered in the Arabic version. We may suppose it, then, to have been bestowed over the house of the like contrivance. The little chamber, consequently, that was built by the Shunemite for Elisha; (whither, as the text instructs us, he retired at his pleasure without breaking in on the private affairs of the family, or being in his turn interrupted by them in his devotions;) the inner chamber of Eglon; (which, in the same manner with these, seems to have had privy-stairs belonging to it, through which Eleud escaped after he had revenged Israel upon the king of Moab;) the chamber over the gate; (whither, for the greater privacy, king David withdrew himself to weep for Absalom;) and that upon whose terrace Azahz, for the same reason, erected his altar; seem to have been structures of the like nature and contrivance with these Oolahs. Besides, as each of these places, called Oolah (אֶלֹה, or אֶלַּה) in the Hebrew text and in the Arabic version, is expressed by וַתֶּפֶשׂ, in the LXX., it may be presumed, that the same word, וַתֶּפֶשׂ, where it occurs in the New Testament, implies the same thing. The upper chamber, therefore, (וַתֶּפֶשׂ) where Tabitha was laid after her death, and that where Euthychus fell down from the third loft, besides other instances, may be taken for so many of these back-houses, or Oolahs, as they are indeed so called in the Arabic version. That וַתֶּפֶשׂ denotes such private apartments as these (for garrets, from the flatness of the roof, are not known in these climates) seems likewise probable from the use of the word among Chaldean authors. For the word נְסֶפֶר, where Mercury and Mars (II. 2. 184.) carried on the amours, and where Penelope (Od. 5. 515.) and the young virgins kept themselves at a distance from the solicitations of their wooers, appear to carry along with them circumstances of greater privacy and retirement than are consistent with chambers in any other situation. Further, that וַתֶּפֶשׂ could not barely signify a single chamber (כְּסָרָם) or dining-room, but one of these contiguous houses, divided into several apartments, seems to appear from the circumstance of the altar which Azahz erected upon the top of his Oolah. For, besides the supposed privacy of his idolatry, (which could not have been carried on undiscovered in any apartment of the house, because under the perpetual view and observation, as it may be supposed, of the family,) if his Oolah had been only one chamber of title with the house, the roof would have been ascribed to the Beth, and not to the Oolah, which, upon this supposition, could only make one chamber of it. A circumstance of the like nature may probably be collected from the Arabic version, which in the 39, where it is not rendered as in ver. 37, but גִּירָס, intimidating, perhaps, that part or particular chamber where the damsel was laid. The falling, likewise, of Euthychus, from the third loft (as the context seems to imply) of the Oolah (for there is no mention made of a house) may be received, I presume, as a further proof of this supposition. For it hath been already observed that these Oolahs are built with the same conveniences as the house itself; consequently, what position soever the וַתֶּפֶשׂ may be supposed to have, from the seeming etymology of the name, will be applicable to the Oolah as well as to the house. The word וַתֶּפֶשׂ will admit of another interpretation in our favor; denoting not so much a chamber remarkable for the high situation of it, (as Eustathius and others after him gave in to,) but such a building as is erected upon or beyond the walls or borders of another; just as the Oolahs are actually contrived in regard to the houses. Nor will any interpretation interfere with the high situation that וַתֶּפֶשׂ may be further supposed to have, from being frequently joined with רָעָתו, or רָעָתוֹת. Because the going in or out of the house (whose ground-floor lieth upon the same level with the street) could not be expressed by words of such import: whereas, the Oolahs being usually built over the porch or gateway, a small staircase is to be mounted before we can be said properly to enter them, and consequently רָעָתו, and רָעָתוֹת, are very applicable to structures in such a situation.

"The eastern method of building may further assist us, in accounting for the particular structure of the temple or house of Dagon, (Judg. xvi.) and the great number of people that were buried in the ruins of it, by pulling down the two principal pillars. We read, (ver. 27.) that about "three thousand persons were upon the roof to behold while Samson made sport." Samson must, therefore, have been in a court situation. Further, that Oolah, or וַתֶּפֶשׂ, may be of the same kind with the ancient Ῥήξις or sacred enclosures, surrounded only in part or altogether with some plain or cloistered buildings. Several places and Dau-winas, as they call the courts of justice in these countries, are built in this fashion; where, upon their festivals and rejoicings, a great quantity of sand is strewn upon the area for the (Pello-wans) wrestles to fall upon; whilst the roof of these cloisters, round about, are crossed with spectators of their strength and agility. I have often seen several hundreds of people diverted in this House

Examine upon the roof of the day's palace at Algiers; which, like many more of the same quality and destination, hath an advanced closure, over against the gate of the palace, (Kiosk) made in the fashion of a large pent-house, supported only by one or two contiguous pillars in the front, or else in the centre. In such open structures as these, in the clock of their guards and counsellors, are the business, business, and other grand officers, to distribute justice and transact the public affairs of their provinces. Here, likewise, they have their public entertainments, as the haras and others of the Philistines had in the house of Deogies. Upon a supposition, therefore, that in the house of Deogies there was a clapped structure of this kind, the pulling down the front or centre pillars only which supported it, would be attended with the like catastrophe that happened to the Philistine.

(Shaw's Travels)

The elephant has not alluded to Peter's vision, (Acts x. 8) yet as that was on the top of the house, on the terrace, we may see how fit a place it was for such a purpose; as being, (1.) open to the heavens, where the sheet ascended to descend; (2.) private, and at that time secluded, fit for prayer. David walked on his terrace; Nebuchadnezzar walked on his royal terrace; whence he could have a full prospect of "the great Babylon which he had built." Abimelech defiled his father's wives on the terrace of the royal palace; that is, in the open sight of heaven and of men. We have repeated intimations in Scripture, of a custom which would be extremely inconvenient in this country—that of sleeping on the top of the house, exposed to the open air, and sky. Thus, "Samuel came to call Saul about the spring of the day, not far, but on, the top of the house, and commended with him or the house-top," 1 Sam. i. 25, 26. So Solomon observes, "It is better to dwell in a corner on the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house," Prov. xxiv. 34. "It has ever been a custom with them, (the Arabs in the East,) equally connected with health and pleasure, to pass the nights in summer upon the house-tops, which, for this very purpose, are made flat, and divided from each other by walls. We found this way of sleeping extremely agreeable; as we thereby enjoyed the cool air, above the reach of grates and vapoors, without any other covering than the canopy of the heavens, which unavoidably presents itself in different pleasing forms, upon every interruption of rest, in the silence and solitude strongly dispose the mind to contemplation." (Wood's Balbec. Introduction). "I determined he should lodge in a kiosk, on the top of my house, where I kept him till his exatuation to the patriarchate, which, after a long negotiation, my wife's brother obtained, for a pretty large sum of money, to be paid in new sequins." (Baron du Tott, vol. i. p. 83.) The propriety of the Mosaic precept, (Deut. xxii. 8) which orders a kind of balustrade, or parapet, to surround the roof, lest any man should fall thence, is strongly enforced by this relation: for, if we suppose a person to rise in the night, without being fully awake, he might easily kill himself by falling from the roof. Something of the kind appears in the history of Amaziah, 2 Kings i. 2. In several places we read of grates growing on the house-tops; (see Grass) also of persons on the house-top hastily escaping thence without enter the house to secure their property—as if hastily awaked out of sleep, by the clamors of the encircling enemy. There remains to be noticed something of the internal structure of these houses; so far, at least, as is necessary to elucidate some occurrences mentioned in Scripture.

In one of the halls of the seraglio at Constantinople, says De la Motraye, "the eunuch made us pass by several little chambers, with doors shut, like the cells of monks or nuns, as far as I could judge by one that another eunuch opened, which was the only one I saw; and by the outside of others." (Vol. i. p. 170.) "Assan Fethli Bey—being summoned by his friends—came out of a little house near the towers, where he had been long hidden in his harem, which, had it been suspected by the mulhti, he had not denied his fate to the emperor, for seizing his person, even there."—The harems are sanctuaries, as sacred and inviolable, for persons pursued by justice, for any crime, debt, &c. as the Roman Catholic churches in Italy, Spain, or Portugal; though the grand seignior's power over his creatures is such, that he may send some of his eunuchs even there, to apprehend those who resist his will." (Vol. i. p. 265. Note.) "The harems of the Greeks are almost as sacred as those of the Turks; so that the officers of justice dare not enter, without being sure that a man is there, contrary to the law: and if they should go in, and find what they look for, the women may punish, and even kill them, without being molested for any infringement of the law: on the contrary, the relations would have a right to make reprisals, and demand satisfaction for such violence." (p. 360.) Those persons who have not seen the cells of monks, or nuns, in foreign countries, may conceive of a long gallery, or other spacious apartment, as a large hall or gallery, into which the doors of the cells open. So it appears, that in the East, also, we must first pass through a long hall, or gallery, before we can enter the peculiar abode of any particular woman of the harem. We may first apply this mode of dwelling to a circumstance threatened by the prophet Messiah to his opponent, Zedekiah, in 1 Kings xxv. 29, "Thou shalt go into an inner chamber, to hide thyself." Our translators have put in the margin, "from chamber to chamber."—The Hebrew is "within chamber;" which exactly agrees with the de-cription extracted from Motracy; but it is new, to consider this threat as predicting that Zedekiah should fly for shelter to a harem; (as we find Assan Furuly Bachaw had done;) that his fear should render him, as it were, effeminate, and that he should see no other means of safety to a man to seek in it; where neither "the officers of justice," nor even those of conquerors, usually penetrated. There is an additional disgrace, a sting in these words, if this be the intention of the speaker, stronger than what has hitherto been noticed in them. Is not something similar, also, related of Benhadad, in 1 Kings xx. 30, "He fled," and was so overcome with fear, that he hid himself in "a chamber within chamber?" As it is very characteristic of braggets and drunkards (see verses 16, 18, &c.) to be eminently overwhelmed, when in adversity, may we suppose that Benhadad was now concealed in the harem? —The circumstances following do not militate against this supposition. That the word čider means a woman's chamber, appears from Judg. xv. 1, where Samson says, "I will go to my wife into her chamber." (1 Sam. iii. 4.)

Does not this representation also illustrate the story of Michal's stratagem to save David? (1 Sam. xiv. 11, 12;) in which we observe, that, to effect his purpose, Saul sent messengers to Michal; but these messengers treated the harem of Michal (the king's daughter) with too much respect to enter it at first; but, being subsequently authorized by Saul, they entered even into her chamber, and during the delay occasioned by their respect for the privacy of Michal, David escaped. How urgent was this order of Saul, which thus, in the person of his daughter, violated the propriety and decorum due to the sex! A confirmation of this idea may be deduced from horror du Tott; in whose work we find a sick prince confined to the harem of his palace: "Krin Guaray [the cabin of the Crimes] was so weak, he scarcely could appear in public; but the artful physician declared it a salutary crisis, describing the symptoms as they followed, and warranted a cure. Krin Guaray, however, was confined to his harem; and I was justly terrified at his situation. I had lost all hope, and never expected more to see the chasm, when he sent for me, to come and speak to him. I was introduced into his harem, where I found several of his women, whose grief, and the general consternation, had made them forget to retire. I entered the apartment where the chasm lay . . . ." (Vol. i. part iii. p. 208.)

It is needless to say that the harem figures also with the story of Joel and Jisern:—for, doubtless, Jisern expected the greatest security, by retiring into the peculiarly private tent of Joel; and certainly, if the harem of the Greeks (a conquered and despised nation) are now "almost as sacred as those of the Turks," the private tent of the wife of Heber, the Kenite, might have been esteemed a sanctuary, sufficiently secure from intrusion among the Israelites, with whom she was in alliance.

By means of this construction of cells, or chamber within chamber, Mr. Taylor also proposes to elucidate the account of Samson and Delilah, (Judg. xvi. 8;) which is generally explained by means of an alcove to contain the bed, in the chamber. But it is submitted, whether the idea of chamber within chamber does not better suit this history than that of an alcove, separating (or separated from) part of the chamber; —whether it do not allow more conveniences for concealment, as well as for requisite operations, and is not more commensurate to that decency, of which the appearance, at least, was necessary to deceive Samson, and to elude the consequences of his wrath, if he had discovered his enemies in their ambush.

There seems to be an allusion to the kind of chambers (citer harem, house of chambers) which we have been describing, in Prov. xxvi. 24, q. d. "If a person, by good fortune, should dwell in the most distant chamber of the gallery, from a quarrelling woman, yet her contention will disturb the whole dwelling, and every one of its inhabitants will suffer by their troublesome neighbor, who will either spread the flame of strife from chamber to chamber, or annoy the whole gallery by her brawls and squabbles."

The houses of the poorer class of people in the East are very bad constructions, consisting of mud walls, reeds, and rushes; whence they become apt comparisons to the fragility of human life; and as mud, slime, or at best unburnt brick, is used in forming the walls, the expression (Job xxiv. 16.) of "digging through houses" is easily accounted for; as is the behavior of Ezekiel, (chap. xii. 5;) who dug through such a wall in the sight of the people; whereby, as may be imagined, he did little injury to his house, notwithstanding which, the symbol was very expressive to the beholders. Niebuhr describes and represents an Arabian hut, in Yemen, composed of stakes, and plastered with clay. To such a one Job seems to allude: (chap. iv. 19;) "God puttest no confidence in his angels; how much less in them who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust; who are crushed by a moth striking against them?" He compares the human body and constitution to one of these tenements of clay, by reason of its speedy dissolution, under any one accident of the many to which it is exposed. How uncertain is health, strength, favor! —a breeze of wind too strong, a shower of rain too heavy, often produces disorders which demolish the tenement. The appearance of this hut seems to imply the very contrary of durability; and, indeed, those houses made of merely dried clay, are often endangered by a shower of rain, if it be of any continuance. Such a house, only set, as it were, on the ground, would easily be swept away by one of those torrents which in the rainy season burst from the hills, according to our Lord's description, in Matt. vii. 27.

Heaven is considered as the house of God: (John xiv. 2;) "In my Father's house are many mansions."

The grave is the house appointed for all the living, (Job xxx. 23;) Isa. xiv. 18.

House is taken for the body: (2 Cor. v. 1;) "If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved;" if our bodies were taken to pieces by death. The comparison of the body to a house is used by Mr. Harmer to explain the similes, Exod. xii. and is illustrated by a passage in Plutarch, Mostell. Act. i. Scene 2.

The church of God is his house: (1 Tim. iii. 15;) "How thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, that is, the church of the living God." In the same sense, Moses was faithful in all the house of God, as a servant, but Christ as a son over his own house; whose house are we (Christians). But this sense may include that of household, persons composing the attendants, or retainers to a prince, &c (See Household.) This intimate reference of the house or dwelling, to the adherents, intimates, or partisans of the householder, is, probably, the foundation of the simile used by the apostle Peter: (1 Epist. ii. 5;) "Ye (Christians) as living stones are built up into a spiritual house."
HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD. The word house is frequently used in Scripture to denote a family or household. Thus the Lord pleaded with Pharaoh and his house, Gen. xii, 17. What is my house, that thou hast brought me hither? 2 Sam. vii. 18. So Joseph (Luke i. 29; ii. 4) was of the house of David, but more especially he was of his royal lineage, or family; and, as we conceive, in the direct line or eldest branch of the family; so that he was next of kin to the throne, if the government had still continued in possession of the descendants of David. (See also 1 Tim. v. 8.)

The following extracts have a bearing upon this sense of the word house, and illustrate the passages to which they are referred: "This Turk, accustomed to see me employed by the grand seignior, instructed me with all his intended military operations, and made no doubt but I should escort myself in the reduction of the rebels of the Morea. The army he had collected, the command of which he designed for me, was only composed of volunteers; his domestics were of the number; and this body appeared more armed than a body of plunder than the love of glory." (Baron de Tocqueville, vol. ii. p. 128, part 4.) This extract is very similar to the history in Gen. xiv. 14: "Abraham armed his trained servants, born in his house, (born among his property,) three hundred and thirty-seven." The number of these domestics can occasion no difficulty; for many grandees in the East have at least an equal number in their households, or under their orders.

As to the numbers engaged by great men in the East, either in house, or in other services, there is no room to doubt that they are very considerable, and much beyond what European manners are accustomed to. "The most powerful house is that of Ibrahim Bey, who has about six hundred Mamlouks. He has a house who has not above four hundred; but who, by his audacity and prodigality, forms a counterpoise to the insatiable avarice of his rival. The rest of the boys, to the number of eighteen or twenty, have each of them from fifty to two hundred. Besides these, there is a great number of Mamlouks who may be called individuals, who, being sprung from houses which are extinct, attach themselves sometimes to one, and sometimes to another, as they find it their interest, and are always ready to follow the service of the best bidder." (Volney, vol. i. p. 116.)

Niebuhr says, (Descrip. Arab. p. 264,) "Bel arrab ben Sultan, brother of Seif ben Sultan, two sons of Seif ben Sultan, and probably many other of the family of Mamelukes, are known individuals in the country of the imam; nevertheless, so sufficiently respectable, that Bel arrab is able to maintain, by his revenues, from three to four hundred slaves." Consequently, he must have many born in his house; and these he might arm, on occasion; for Niebuhr mentions, a few lines lower, that "the slaves and soldiers of imam Seif ben Sultan had been infamous robbers."

That the term house expresses property, see 1 Kings xii, 8, compared with Psalm cxv. 21, Joseph had been over Potipher's house, i.e. his property generally, before he was placed, by Pharaoh, in the same office of superintendent over the royal property, or house.

It should be observed, that in the New Testament there are two Greek words which our translators have rendered both house and household: in their time usage did not separate them. The first (οἰκία) signifies the immediate family of the household; the other (σπάδων) includes his servants also; and they are not interchanged, in respect to persons, in the original. Hence we never read of a household being polluted, but of σπάδων only: the children following their parents in this rite; but not the servants their proprietor, master, or mistress. This is a city of Asher; the same probably as that of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 34,) yielded to the Levites, and assigned for a city of refuge, 1 Chron. vii. 31. Some think it is the same with Helkath, Josh. xix. 30; xxi. 31.

HULDAH, a prophetess, wife of Shallum, who was consulted by Josiah concerning the book of the law, which had been found in the treasury of the temple. See JOSIAH.

HUMILITY is the virtue of Christ and Christians. It consists in low thoughts of ourselves, founded on the knowledge of our unworthiness, and our dependence on God for everything. "Learn of me," says our Saviour, "for I am meek and lowly in heart," Matt. xi. 29. Humility, though it be not overmuch in favor among men, has many excellent things said of it in Scripture: "Before honor is humility," Prov. xxiv. 33. "By humility, and the fear of the Lord, are riches, honor, and life," Prov. xxiv. 9, 34. Humility is a settled and permanent disposition of the mind, which shows itself in external actions, and is very expressively alluded to by the apostle Peter: (1 Pet. v. 5.) "Be clothed with humility,"—as with an outer, defensive garment, tied closely upon the wearer,—implying that the humility of Christians should constantly be manifested in their deportment and behavior,—should constantly envelope every other grace, or excellence, or amiable quality, which they may possess or practice; as a surtout envelops inner garments; like a strong covering, bound around them, and attached to them by the firmest connections; by connections proof against temptations, calamities, or far more dangerous adversities.—Prosperity. With reference to Luke i. 45, it may be inquired, whether the "low estate" of the Virgin referred to her disposition of mind, whether her meekness, or whether her humility? (Prov. xxxiv. 22.) The text (εἰκοσιοίδος) occurs also in Acts vii. 33: "In his humiliation his judgment was taken away." Also is Philip. iii. 21: "Who shall change the body of our abasement ("vile body") to the likeness of his glorious body." And James i. 9, 10: Let the humble, abased, trembling in his expectation of glory, to "brother of low degree react in that he excelled" but the rich in that he is abased, humbled, made low." Now, in this passage it seems clearly to refer to a disposition of mind; for no man is called to rejoice in loss of wealth, or of power; or to show well and wisely rejoice in receiving an humble disposition of mind, as a divine grace, or which is imparted by divine grace, and which will lead him to think less valuable in himself, to his riches, than formerly, and to value them less. Moreover, if the poor brother is to rejoice in attaining that state which this person is to rejoice at quitting, then there seems to be a contradiction in the spirit of the passage: but as one brother may have a mind which rejoices in his divine grace, yet continue poor in the world; so another brother may possess a mind humbled by divine grace, notwithstanding the temptation to which his worldly riches subject him. This is, indeed, impertinental to man, but practicable to God. If the use of the word be admitted, it does not follow from the use of it in the Virgin's song, that her station is described by it, determinately and exclusively, whatever Erasmus might insist on.
That there may be a vicious or bastard kind of humility, or that humility may exceed in degree or in kind, would appear from the apostle's caution (Col. ii. 18). It may be vainly put up of a falsely mind, agreed by carnal and inadequate conceptions and fancies, totally misrepresenting the subject.

To humble signifies often to afflict, to subject, to best, to subdue, 2 Sam. vili. 11; Ps. lii. 5. To humble a virgin, or a woman taken in war, signifies to prostitute her chastity, 2 Sam. xxii. 16; xxii. 24, 25; 1 Sam. xii. 11; 2 Esdr. xx. 10.

HUNTING. To HUNT. Hunting is a kind of apprenticeship to war, and an imitation of the hardships and occurrences of the chase. Nimrod was a mighty hunter before God, Gen. x. 9. He was a warrior, a conqueror, a tyrant, who subdued free people, and who put to death those who would not submit to his dominion. The prophet sometimes depicts war under the idea of hunting. "I will send my men hunters, says Jeremiah, "and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks, ch. xvi. 16. He speaks of the Chaldeans, or Persians, who hunted or subdued the Jews, and held them under their dominion. Some are of opinion that these hunters are the Persians, who set the Hebrews at liberty; and, in a more elevated sense, the apostles, who are, as it were, hunters, that endeavored to take men with their preaching. Est. x.; 2 Cor. xi. 14, who were persecutors of the Jews, under the name of hunters. The psalmist thanks God for having delivered him from the snares of the hunter, Ps. cxii. 5, Micah complaining (vii. 2) that every one lay waste his neighbor, his neighbor, and that one brother hunts after another to destroy him. Jeremiah (Lam. iii. 25) represents Jerusalem as complaining of her enemies, who have taken her, like a bird, in their nets.

I. HUR, son of Caleb, of Ezron, and, according to Josephus, husband of Miriam, sister of Moses. We know but few particulars concerning his life; but by the little which Scripture relates, we see that Moses had a great affection for him. When he had sent Joshua against the Amalekites, he went up the mountain and prayed, Kings xii. 22, and when he lifted up his hands in prayer, Aaron and Hur supported his arms, to prevent their growing weary. When he ascended Mount Sinai to receive the law, he referred the elders, if any difficulty should arise, to Aaron and Hur, ch. xxi. 14. Hur was the father of Uri, and Uri was the father of Bezalel.

II. HUR, a prince of Midian, killed in an encounter between Phinehas and the Midianites, Num. xxxi. 4.

HUSBAND, a married man, the house-band, or band which connects the whole family, and keeps it together. Johnson refers the term to the Runic, house-bonds, master of the house; but several of his instances seem allied to the sense of binding together, or assembling into union. So we say, to husband small portions of things; meaning, to collect and unite them, to manage them to the greatest advantage, &c. which is, by associating them together; making the most of them, not by dispersion, but by union. A man who was betrothed, but not actually married, was esteemed a husband, Matt. i. 16, 30; Luke ii. 5. A man recently married was exempt from going out to war; (Deut. xx. 7; xxiv. 5.) yet we have, in Homer, instances of young men slain, whose horses waited for them at home; or, who had preluded their troth to their spouses, but were never more to see them.

The husband was also a hypocrite, hummed and whined, and having control over her conduct, as so to suppress her voice, &c. Num. xxv. 6-8. He is also the guide of her youth, Prov. xii. 17. Sarah called her husband Abraham lord; a title which was continued long after, Hos. ii. 16: (as also in Egypt.) The apostle Peter says to recommend it as a title implying great respect, as well as affection, 1 Pet. iii. 6. Perhaps it was rather used as an appellation in public than in private. Our own word, master, (and so correlatively mistress) is scandalously misused, and passed among women, when speaking of their husbands; but the ordinary use made of this word to all persons, and at all occasions, deprives it of any claim to the expression of particular affection or respect, though it was probably in former ages implied by it, or connected with it; as it still is in the instances of preceptors, chiefs, teachers, and superiors, whether in civil life, in polite arts, or in liberal studies.

HUSBANDMAN, one whose profession and labor is to cultivate the earth; to dress it, to render it fertile, and generally to manage it. This is the most noble, as well as the most ancient of all professions; it was begun by Adam, resumed by Noah, and has been always the most comfortable state of human life. God is compared to a husbandman, (John xv. 1; 1 Cor. iii. 6.) and the simile of land carefully cultivated, or of a vineyard carefully dressed, is often used in the sacred writings. The art of husbandry is from God, says the prophet Isaiah, (xxxvii. 9-25.) and the various operations of it are each in their season. The sowing of seed, the waiting for harvest, the in-gathering when ready, the storing up in granaries, and the use of the products of the earth, afford many points of comparison with the various operations and beauties in Scripture. The course of husbandry in the East differs greatly from that among us. See THRESHING, &c.

HUSHAI, the Archeite, David's friend. Being informed of Absalom's rebellion, and that David was obliged to fly from Jerusalem, he met him on an eminance without the city, with his clothes rent, and his head covered with earth. David suggested, that if he went with him, he would be a burden to him; but that he might remain, and pretend to be in Absalom's interest, in order to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel, 2 Sam. xv. 34. Hushai, therefore, returned to Jerusalem, and by defeating the counsel of Ahithophel, and gaining time for David, to whom he bore an important message of Absalom's sickness, the cause of Ahithophel's suicide, and of Absalom's miscarriage, chs. xvi. 10-19; xvii. 5, &c.

HUSBAM, king of Edom, successor to Jobab, Gen. xxxvi. 34.

HUSKS. (Kεντρία, κεφάλες,) shells, as of peas or beans. The prodigal son, oppressed by want, and pinched by hunger, desired to feed on the husks given to the hogs, Luke xv. 16. Most interpreters are of opinion that the Greek word signifies carob-beans, the fruit of a tree of the same name; and that reference of Linnaeus. There was a sort of wine or liquor, much used in Syria, drawn from it, and the lees of it were given to the hogs. The Greeks and Latins both name carob-beans Ceratitis; and Plany, as well as the Vulgate, calls them Silique. This fruit is common in Palestine, Greece, Italy, Provence, and Barbary: it is suffered to ripen and grow dry on the tree; the poor eat it, and cattle are fattened with it. The tree is of a middle size, full of branches, and abounding with round leaves, an inch or two in diameter. The blossoms are little red clusters, with abundance of yellowish stalks. The fruits are flat pods, from half a foot to fourteen inches long, and an inch and half broad: they are brown at the top, sometimes covered with a gland. Two husks, united into a membrane into several cells, and containing flat, shining seeds, something like those of cassia. The substance of these husks is filled with a sweetish, honey-like kind of juice, not unlike that of the pistis of cassia.
In all my Travels this plant figured, and its occasioned its being called, in Greek, Keratia, which signifies little horns.

HYACINTH. By this word we understand, (1.) a precious stone; (2.) a sort of flower; and, (3.) a particular Hebrew flower. Hyacinth is not spoken of in Scripture, but the color and the stone of this name are. The spouse compares her beloved's hands to gold rings set with hyacinth, (Cant. v. 14.) [Eng. tr.
bery]; and John (Rev. xxi. 20.) says, that the centrinal foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem is of a hyacinth [Eng. tr. jacinth]. There are four sorts of hyacinths. The first is something of the color of a ruby; the second is of a gilded yellow; the third of a citron yellow; the fourth the color of a granite.
The Hebrew of Canticles, instead of hyacinth, reads the stone of Tsurhish, which; mentioned also in Exod. xviii. 20. [Eng. tr. bery]. We do not certainly know what stone it is; but interpreters generally explain it of the chrysolite, or the yellow topaz of modern travellers. It took the name of Tsurhish because brought from that country, i.e. from the vicinity of Ca-
diz. Spain is rich in topazes, rubies, and other gems.

Of the hyacinth color—according to the most learned writers—it is an archetypal or deep pur-pal, like a violet color—Moses often speaks; as Ex.
xvii. 4, 31; Num. i.v. 6, seq.; also Ezek. xxiii. 6;
xv. 7, 54; where the English version renders, blue.
It was dyed with the blood of a shell-fish; in Latin, moreover, it is related, in the account of the

HY.ENA, a wild beast. The animal known to us as the hyena is a quadruped almost as large as a wolf, whose hair is rough, and its skin spotted or streaked. Hyenas were formerly produced at Rome in the gardens, and from this they were represented in ancient medals. Pliny speaks of the hyena, but describes it in a fabulous manner; [Nat. Hist. lib. viii.
cap. 30; lib. xviii. cap. 8.] as, that it changes its sex every year, being one year male, and the next female. And that it devours its own young at birth.
Stones, called hyena. Aristotle and Helian say, that it makes dogs dumb with its shadow; that it imitates the speech of mankind, and deceives them, endeavoring to draw them out of their houses and devour them. They add, that it has feet like a mouse, and no vertebra in the neck. Busbequius, in his travels in Asia, (p. 76.) says the hyena is almost like a wolf, but not so tall; that its hair is like that of a wolf, except in being more brawling, and marked at certain distances with great black spots. It has no length of neck, but is forced to turn itself quite round when it would look behind. It is very cruel and volexious; drags dead bodies out of their graves, and devours them; instead of teeth, has one continued bone in the jaw. It is said to imitate the voice of a man, and by this it often deceives travelers.

It is singular that a creature so well known in the East as the hyena is, should be so seldom mentioned in Scripture. It is understood to be named in two places only; the first is 1 Sam. xiii. 18, "the valley of Zeboim," which Aquila renders "of the hyenas;"
the second place is Jer. xii. 9, where the LXX render the "speckled bird" of our translation by "the cave of the hyena." Bochart labors to introduce the hyena in this place, and Scheuchzer also inclines this way; but they would render, "My heritage me as a fierce hyena; all the beasts round about are against her;" which is then entirely parallel with verse 8. (See under Birds.) The hyena is the animal most probable to be this tzebua, at present; and as such we receive it. "It is well known at Aleppo," says Russel; "lives in the hills, at no great distance from town, and is held in great horror; is the size of a large dog; is remarkably striped or streaked; has much similitude to the wolf, in nature and form;
but has only four toes on each foot, in which it is very nearly singular; is extremely wild, sullen, and ferocious; will sometimes attack men; rushes with great fury on flocks and cattle; ravens graves; devours dead bodies, &c. is untamable."

We suggest the possibility that that very obscure animal, the sheeb, may be the tzebua of this place.
Russel (vol. ii. p. 165.) gives the following account of it: "The natives talk of another animal, named sheeb, which they consider as distinct from the wolf, and reckon more ferocious. Its bite is said to be mortal, and that it occasions raging madness before death... is like a wolf... is perhaps only a mad wolf. Long intervals elapse in which nothing is heard of the sheeb. In 1772, the fore-part and tail of one was brought from Spheery to Dr. Freer. It was shot near Spheery; was one of several that had followed the Bassora caravan over the desert, from near Bassora to Aleppo. Many persons in the caravan had been bitten, all of whom died in a short time, raving mad. It was reported that some near Aleppo were bitten, and died in like manner; but the doctor saw none himself. The circumference of the body and neck rather exceeded that of the wolf. Color yellowish gray." As this creature was scarce, (never seen by Dr. Russel or his brother) and the account for the rare insertion of it in Scripture, and the ignorance of travellers. It would seem rather to accord with the accounts we sometimes see of mad wolves or hyenas. Were a mad dog to establish himself in any part of the kingdom, it would be his family not to be terrified, and abandon it?

HYMENÆUS was probably a citizen of Ephesus, converted by some of the early discourses of Paul.
He fell afterwards into the heresy which denied the resurrection of the body; and this was already complished, 2 Tim. ii. 17. Augustin thinks that the error of such opinions consisted in saying, there was no resurrection beside that of the soul, which by faith, profession, and baptism is revived from sin to grace. Paul informs Timothy that he had excommunicated Hymenæus, and given him over to Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20. Two years afterwards, Hymenæus engaged with Philetus in some new error, 2 Tim. ii. 17.
We know nothing of the end of Hymenæus.

HYMN, a religious song or poem. The word is used as synonymous with canticle, song, or psalm, which the Hebrews scarcely distinguish, having no particular term for a hymn, as distinct from a psalm or canticle. Paul requires Christians to entertain one another with "psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs." Matthew says, that Christ having supped, sung a hymn, and went out. He probably recited the hymns or psalms which the Jews used to sing after the Passover, which they called the Halal; that is, the Hallelujah Psalms.
HYPERBOLE

HYPERBOLOC language is among the loftiest flights of poetic composition—of unrestrained imagination; and it prevails principally among those who are in the habit of such fancies; as the Sumerians or Assyrians in their recorded imagery; or those who, being well acquainted with the ideas drawn from natural things, which it means to convey; readily admit such exalted phraseology, because they understand it imperfectly and the intention of the author who employs it. On the contrary, those who have little or no acquaintance with the natural ideas meant to be conveyed by hyperbolic extravagances, are always surprised, and sometimes shocked, when they meet with them in themselves. Who, in simple truth is the object of the reader's researches. Hyperbolic expressions are but rare in Scripture, though figurative or poetical expressions are abundant; rare as they are, however, they have been severely commented on by infidels, and have occasionally embarrassed believers. They are certainly some force in the reflection, "What would infidels have said, had it pleased God to have chosen eastern Asia, instead of western Asia, for the seat of revelation?" What would they have thought of the uncorrect truth, had it happened, under the influence of such locality, to have been arrayed in the hyperbolic attire of that country?"

By making western Asia the seat of revelation, a medium is obtained between European frigidity, as the Asiatics would think it, and Asiatic hyperbole, as Europeans would think it: so that the Asiatic may find some similarity to his own metaphorical manner, and suited to excite his attention; while the European who proceeds to be charmed with the simplicity of truth, may find in Scripture abundance of the simplicity, most happily adapted to his more sober judgment, his more correct and better regulated taste. Add to this remark two other hints: (1.) There is reason to think the Scripture writers, in imitated, in any degree, the authors of the passages produced below, though their mode of expression is sometimes strikingly similar; (2.) that however, in complimenting (or in describing) mortal men, kings, and heroes, Indian poetry may succeed by the use of hyperbole, yet the Hebrew writers, when describing Deity, employ, beyond all controversy, a style much more pleasing to genuine and correct taste.

Without supposing that all readers will feel the effects of numbers in the Red sea; the following remarks, it is hoped that the style of the following extracts may moderate the surprise of some at certain poetic phrases which occur in Holy Writ. They are transcribed from the Asiatic researches: "Riches and life are two things more marvelous than a drop of water trembling on the leaf of a lata, [the water-lily] shaken by the wind." For similar ideas, see Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Job, &c. "Gospant, king of the world, possessed matchless good fortune: he was lord of two brides, the earth and her wealth. When his innumerable army marched, the heavens were so filled with the dust of their feet, that the birds of the air could rest upon it." (Compare Nahum 1. 3.) "The clouds are the dust of his feet." *At Moundgheerre, where is encamped his victorious army; across whose river a bridge of boats is constructed for a road, which is mistaken for a chain of mountains; where immense herds of elephants, like thick black clouds, so darken the face of day, the people think it the season of the rains; whither the princes of the north send so many troops of horses, that the dust of their hoofs spreads darkness on all sides; whither resort so many mighty chiefs of Jumbod-

weep, to pay their respects, that the earth sinks beneath the weight of their attendants." After this, how flat and low is the fulsome boast of the haughty Semmacherit! 2. "When the foot of the goddess, with its tinkling ornaments, [compare Isa. iii. 18, the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet,] was planted on the head of (the evil spirit) Molecbasasoor, all the bloom of the new-born flower of the fountain (the lotos) was dispersed with disgrace by its superior beauty. May that foot, radiant with a fringe of reflectant beams, issuing from its pure bright nails, [compare Hab. iii. God's brightness was as the light; as had horses coming out of his hand; i. e. no glistening beams issuing from the hollow of it; where was the concealing of his power,] endue you with a steady and unexamined devotion, offered up with fruits; and show you the way to dignity and wealth." For further instances of the word Deity, see the reflective scripture of Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 29, and of our Lord, Mark ix. 15; also Acts ix. 3. It is probable that all these ideas may ultimately be referred to appearance of the Shekinah. See also Rev. i. 15: "His eyes were as a flame of fire; his feet resplendent as fine brass, burning in a furnace; his countenance as the sun shining in its strength; so greatly was it radiant, &c." "The expression of Heshkuk, above quoted, is nearly a transcript of the verse of Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 2: "From his right hand issued [not a fiery low, but] fiery streams—rather radiant streams of reflectant splendor, unto them." "There the sun shines not, nor the moon and stars; there the lightnings flash not: how should even fire blaze there? God irradiates all this bright substance; and by its effulgence the universe is enlightened."—(Compare Isa. ix. 19.) "The sun shall be no more by day light by day, nor the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory, &c."—"The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did enlighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof," Rev. xxi.

Herodotus records a remarkable hyperbole, of which he did not penetrate the meaning; he inserts it indeed, but professes his disbelief of it: "In Arabia is a large river named Corys, which loses itself in the Red sea; and said to have formed a canal of the skins of oxen and other animals, sewed together, which was continued from the river to the desert, a journey of twelve days, in three distinct canals." (Thas. ix.) Those who have perused the article on bottles will be at no loss to understand the nature of "the skins of oxen, &c. sewed together," i. e. the Girda; and the "canal" is, probably, merely an hyperbolical expression for a very long train of camels, &c. bearing a very plentiful supply of water, and journeying in three divisions. We meet with an hyperbole exactly similar in Ockley's History of the Saracens: (vol. i. p. 314.) "Omar wrote to Amrou, acquainting him with their extremity, and ordered him to supply the Arabians corn out of Egypt; which Amrou did in plenty, that the train of camels, which were laden with it, reached in a continued line from Egypt to Medins; so that when the foremost of them were got to Medins, the latter part of the garrisons were still in the bounds of Egypt."—Now this, being a journey of forty days, and six or seven degrees of latitude, is evidently impossible, even if all the camels in the world had been collected on the spot. It imports no more, in plain language, than that by the time the first troop of camels might be supposed to have reached the place of their destination, the last troop quitted Egypt. How necessary it is to understand the figurative language of a people, which often, if not commonly, arises from local peculiarities!

HYPOCRITE, one who feigns to be what he is not; one who puts on a false person, like actors in tragedies and comedies. The epithet is generally applied to those who assume the appearances of a virtue, without possessing the reality. Our Saviour accused the Pharisaice of hypocrisy. In the Old Testament, the Hebrew שֵׁנֵחַ, which is rendered hypocrite, counterfeit, signifies also a profane, wicked man; a man polluted or corrupted; a man of impiety, a deceiver, Job viii. 13; xiii. 16, &c. Jeremiah (iii. 1; xxiii. 15.) uses the verb שֵׁנֵחַ to express the infection, the pollution of the land of Judah, caused by the sins of its inhabitants.

HYSSOP is an herb generally known, and often mentioned in Scriptures. It was commonly used in purifications as a sprinkler. God commanded the Hebrews, when they came out of Egypt, to take a bunch of hyssop, to dip it in the blood of the paschal lamb, and sprinkle the lintel and the two side-posts of the door-way with it. Sometimes they added a little scarlet wool to it, as in the purification of lepers. Hyssop is mentioned as one of the smallest of herbs. 1 Kings iv. 33. It is of a bitter taste, and grows on the mountains near Jerusalem. The hyssop of John xix. 29, is probably what is called a reed or cane in Mark xv. 26; Matt. xxvii. 38; or else this hyssop was like a sponge imbued with the drink. It was perhaps a handful gathered of the nearest herbs to the spot, which might be mostly hyssop. Hasselquist says, there grows out of the city, Jerusalem, near the fountain of Solomon, (Silom?) a very minute moss; and he asks, "Is not this the hyssop? It is at least as diminutive as the cedars is tall and majestic." (Letter, Sept. 22, 1751.)

IDBEX, a wild goat. See GOAT (Wild).

IDBOS, yaslah, Engl. trans. eezab, an unusual bird, common in Egypt. Lev. xi. 17. Strabo describes it as being like a stork; some are black, and others white. The Egyptians worshipped them because they devour the serpents, which otherwise would overrun the country. It was a capital crime to kill an ibis, though inadvertently. Cambyses, king of Persia, being acquainted with this, placed some of them before his army, while he besieged Damasita. The Egyptians, not daring to shoot against them, sacrificed the town to be taken. Mr. Taylor is of opinion that the yaslah is not the ancient ibis, but the Ardea ibis, described by Hasselquist. See Birds.

IBLEAM, a town in the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan; (Josh. xvii. 11.) probably the Bileam (1 Chron. vi. 70.) given to the Levites of Kohath's family.

IBZAN of Judah, the eighth judge of Israel, succeeded Jephthah, (A. M. 2953) and died at Bethlehem, after seven years' government, Judg. xii. 8-10.

IKOBOD, son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli, the high-priest. He was born at the moment when his mother heard the fatal news of the ark being taken; whence he obtained his name, "Alas, the glory!" i.e. inglorious, 1 Sam. iv. 19-21.

IONIUM, now called Cogni, or Konieh, formerly the capital of Lycaonia, as is now of Caramania, in Asia Minor. Paul, visiting Iconium, (A. D. 45.) converted many Jews and Gentiles; (Acts xiii. 51; xiv. 1, &c.) but some unbelieving Hebrews excited a persecution against him and Barnabas, and they escaped with difficulty. He undertook a second journey to Iconium, A. D. 51.

IDALAH, a city of Zebuhun, Josh. xix. 15.

III. IDDO, (aw) chief of the Nethinim, in captivity in Captivity, (Ezra xii. 17.) who were invited by Ezra to return to Jerusalem.

II. IDDO, rau chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan, 1 Chron. xxvii. 21.
Writers are not agreed about the origin of idolatry, or the superstitious worship paid to idols and false gods. The Book of Wisdom (xii. 13, 14; xiv. 13; xv. 7, 8) proposes three causes of it:—First, The love of a father, who, having lost his son in an advanced age, to comfort himself, causes divine honours to be paid to him. Secondly, The beauty of works engraven. Thirdly, The skill of an artist. In poster's earth, who consecrates a statue of his own making, as if it were a deity.

A large number of writers on this subject are persuaded, that the first objects of idolatrous worship were the sun, moon, and stars.

The order, the regularity, and the beauty of the ordinances of the heavens, have been at all times subjects of gratulation and wonder. Whether men were rude or refined, in a social or a savage state, they felt the importance preparable from the benefaction of the year, and gradually associated in their minds the periodic returns of those luminaries which at first announced the returns of the seasons, and at length were supposed to exert an influence over them. The sun and the moon were, indubitably, the two greater lights of heaven; to these the most powerful influences were ascribed; and the most important obligations universally acknowledged. They led on the years and the months, with their respective productions; they afforded means of calculating time, and of defining periods; and eventually, they contributed to the formation of systems, and to extensive combinations of numbers into multiples, progressions, and series.

The skill of an artist, to principal, known to all as the sources of light, the heavens presented, to the observer and intelligent, various minor luminaries, the periods of which were not only incommensurate among themselves, but required longer or shorter investigation of their appearances, to obtain materials for the theory of their orbits and motions. It had been well, had mankind stopped here; but, having acquired an elementary knowledge of the heavenly bodies and their circuits, the misplaced gratitude of some, and the pious credulity of others, attributed to them offices for which their Creator never designed them, and consequently never prepared them. The smallest spark of rationality too powerfully illuminates the human breast, to check, or prevent, the worship of gods abroad into the fields, covered with a white veil. Tacitus speaks of an unknown goddess, who resided in an island of the ocean, and for which the worshippers kept a covered chariot, which none dared approach. When the vessel was placed in it, two heifers were harnessed to it, who drew it where they thought fit, and then brought it back into her grove. They washed the chariot, and the veil that covered it, and drowned the slaves that were employed in the service. Here are examples of gods carried in niches and in chariots; and the car of Juggernaut, and others in the East Indies, will press themselves on the mind of the intelligent reader.

The heathen also employed little temples of metal. Diodorus Siculus speaks of two small temples of gold; and we know that there was, at Lacedemon, one entirely of brass, and therefore called Chalcotichos, or the house of brass. Victor, in his description of Rome, gives an account of some of the same metal in that city. Calhaut thinks that the silver temples of Diana of Ephesus, which were made and sold by Demetrius the silversmith, were either small models of the temple of this goddess, or niches in which she was represented, for devotion.
Such was the state of things when the sacred penman composed his history of the origin of the creation, in which he describes, in direct terms, the origi and the offices of the sun and the moon, but confines his account of other celestial bodies to a single phrase—"he made the stars also." It was not because Moses was ignorant of the importance attached to the stars, that he studied this brevity; it was because he knew it too well, and had too sensibly felt its evil consequences, in the course of his own life, and had seen them too extensively prevalent, to the great injury of the world at large, and to the no small crimination of that peculiar people over which he had now the charge. This argument acquires additional strength on a reference to the original text; for the fact is, that the stars are not spoken of, except as being placed under the power or influence of the two greater lights: "And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; the stars also," Gen. i. 16.
The beginnings of all arts, and of all practices, are extremely simple, and it is impossible, from the simple beginnings of practices founded on a mere mental idea, so much as to conjecture in what they may issue, when the ingenuity of man has refined upon them, and they have been the study of successive generations. To suppose that every star, and especially every revolving planet, was animated by a resident angel peculiar to itself, was, doubtless, accepted as the happy thought of a mind deeply infused with the learning of the age, with astronomical knowledge in more than usual proportion, and perhaps favored by some superior power, with a revelation, by which it was enabled to penetrate into mysteries far "beyond this visible diurnal sphere."
Nor less felicitous and convenient was the formation of a symbolical representation of a star; it required no skill; a mere effort of the hand was sufficient to execute the design; and the model once obtained, the idol was constantly before the eye of the wor-shipper, whether the original were above or below the horizon. And yet, in these rude efforts originated that idolatry which eventually, like a flood, overwhelmed the whole human race; to which the sacred books, though standing in direct opposition, bear but too striking witness, and which to this day erect in many places an idol of the very name of a star, and puts the notion of which they became the human representatives.
Hence gods and goddesses of every description and attribute; until at length their numbers became incredible, and their characters flagitious, and "darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people."
A few thoughts on this inveterate moral malady of the human mind, from which no nation has been wholly exempt, may with propriety introduce our views of the incidents recorded in Scripture.

The modern system of planetary worlds, of which our earth is one, was not generally received, even if it were known, in the early ages. The Persian sages, for instance, adopted a scheme essentially differ-et; and, perhaps, they received it from remote antiques.
That scheme is expressed in the following terms, in the Zendâ, which professes to contain the sentiments of the prophets of Persia, including those of Zarostcr, anterior to the time of Alexander the Great. The notes enclosed in parentheses ( ) are those of the original editor, who was a Zoroastrian.

"The simple being—of his own beneficence created a substance free and unconfined, unmixed, immaterial—the chief of angels. By him he created inferior heavens, and to each an intelligence, and a soul, and a body; as for example, Fermin, (the intelligence sphere of Kihwan [Saturn] also, Latins [its soul], and Amnus [its body].) And Anjumadh (the intelligence of the sphere of Hormad [Jupiter], and Nevmad (its soul) and Shatirah (its body), and Bezmad (the intelligence of the sphere of Behrim [Mars], and Fersad (its soul), and Rizbadwad (its body), and Shatdram, (the intelligence of the sphere of the sun), and Shadayam (its soul), and Neshdusaf (its body), and Nirnwah (the intelligence of the heaven of Nahal [Venus], and Tirwâh (its soul), and Rizwân (its body).
And Idris (the intelligence of the sphere of Thy (Mercury), and Erías (its soul), and Worras (its body).
And Ferunn (the intelligence of the sphere of the moon), and Werniush (its soul), and Artush (its body).
The heavy-moving stars are many, and each has an intelligence, a soul, and a body. And, in like manner, every distinct division of the heavens and planets has its intelligence and its soul. The number of the intelligences, and souls, and stars, and heavens, Mezdan [only] knows." The reader will observe the order of these intelligences:—Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, the Moon. It might be compared with the systems of Ptolemy, and of Tycho Brahe; but that is not our present object.
The Persian prophet proceeds to say. "The lower world is subject to the sway of the upper world.
In the beginning of its revolution, the sovereignty over this lower world is committed to one of the slow-moving stars, which governeth it alone for the space of a thousand years, and for other thousands of years each of the heavy-moving stars, and swift-moving stars, becometh its partner, each for one thousand years. Last of all, the moon becometh its associate. After that, the first associate will get the sovereignty. The second king goeth through the same round as the first king; [for a thousand years] and the others are in like manner his associates...
And understand, that the same is the course as to all the others. When the moon hath been king, [when] all have been most odious and destructive forms. For over, one grand period is accomplished. After which the sovereignty again returneth to the first king, and in this way there is an eternal succession.
... After performing the worship of Mezdan, namely, the worship of the stars they have, and and names them p. 107.
Make figures of all the planets, and deem them proper objects to turn to in worship... that they may convey thy prayers to Mezdan. ... In prayer turn to any side; but it is best to turn to the stars, and the light..."
upon earth; and these gross and deceptive imaginations led the way to the vilest degradation of the human character.

Whatever might be the conceptions of the learned and scientific among the orientals, who studied the courses and properties of the heavenly bodies, their mutual relations, and their alleged powers and influences, when they became objects of worship among the multitude, they became also subject to their caprice, superstition, and ignorance, as well as to their depravity. Not long could the simple star remain the sole representative of a celestial intelligence; the idea of personality prevailed over every other, and with it combined the varied passions and dispositions which form the character and distinguish the persons of our species. But, most probably, the progress, though rapid, was not instantaneous; and though too fated in the issue, it was not, at first, considered as absolutely unlawful or unbecoming. There was much to be said in favor of the doctrine, that the planetary bodies governed the seasons; that they produced, and, consequently, that they bestowed, abundant harvests, and plentiful supplies of the rich and important productions of the field, the vineyard, the orchard, and the garden. Not did their operations terminate here; the increase of the food was attributed to their agency; together with that of cities, tribes, and families. Precisely in this spirit is the argument of the Israelis who professed to ask counsel of Jeremiah, the prophet of the Lord, but who acted in direct opposition to it, when they not only determined to go into Egypt themselves, but carried the renouncing prophet along with them, Jer. xiv. What had been their practices we learn from chap. vii. 17, seq.

Sect. thou not what these are doing,
In the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem?
The sons gather wood,
And the fathers kindle the fire,
And the women knead the dough,
To make cakes for the regency of the heavens,
[queen of heaven, Engl. tr.]
And to pour out libations to strange gods.

This is Blayney's translation; who also reads chap. xlv. 15, seq. in the following manner: "Then all the men, who knew that their wives had burned incense unto strange gods, and all the women who stood by, a great company, even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah, saying. As for the word which thou hast spoken to us in the name of Jehovah, we will not hearken unto thee. But we will surely perform what is gone forth out of our mouth, in burning incense to the regency of the heavens, [queen of heaven,] and pouring out libations thereunto; like as we did, we, our fathers, our kings and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, when we had plenty of bread and were prosperous, and saw no adversity. But from the time we left off to burn incense to the regency of the heavens, and to pour out libations thereunto, we have been in want of everything, and have been consumed by the sword and by famine: and when we burned incense to the regency of heaven, pouring out also libations thereunto, did we, exclusively of our men, make cakes for it, worshipping it, and pouring out libations thereunto?"

From our imperfect acquaintance with the idolatrous rite here described, this passage presents many difficulties. But, before we proceed further, it should be observed, that our English margin, adopting the reading of the Complutensian, (vii. 18,) renders, the frame or workmanship of heaven: the LXX render, τό στάρτιον, the host of heaven; but, in chap. xlv. 17—19, they render τό διαδοχον τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, the king of heaven. [Eng. marg., frame or workmanship, in verse 17; queen, in verses 18, 19, according to the Complutensian; which strangely varies the reading in these verses, though intending the same power.] These variations are sufficient proofs of confusion; and that arising from a cause of no modern date. But by the help of the second extract from the Desacr above, we may, perhaps, be able to explain this. We there read that the planets, in succession, obtain first as associates, afterwards as principals, the office of king, each for a thousand years; and that the series ends with the moon. It is evident that when a feminine planet is king, whether as associate or as principi. she would be called queen. Now the moon is not fe, mine, but is addressed as "Lord of moistures"—and is, in many languages, as well as in these ancient Persian prayers, of the masculine gender. It follows that Venus is the only planet which can be, properly speaking, queen of heaven; and during her millennium she would be the counterpart of all the characters described in this passage,—a female regent, enjoying dominion, rule, or superiority; a delegated agent; especially, in association with a slow-moving sun; and, in such association, not only one of the host of heaven, herself, but also, and especially, by her connection with her principi, according to the frame, workmanship, or organization of the celestial orbs in their courses and mutual relations.

We see now the reason why the women were principals in the idolatry so severely reproved by Jeremiah; they worshipped the female regent in her grosser character of Venus Genetrix; and are, therefore, threatened, in opposition to her character, with the very annihilation of their desires: "I will pour out my fury upon man and upon beast, and upon the trees of the field, and upon the fruits of the ground: in short, on all the powers of increase, animal and vegetable."

The prophet, in continuation, charges all the people as parties to the idolatry practised in their country:

At that time, saith Jehovah, shall they cast forth
The bones of the kings of Judah, and the bones of the princes,
And the bones of the priests, and the bones of the prophets,
And the bones of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, out of their graves;
And they shall spread them before the sun and the moon,
And all the host of heaven, which they have loved,
And which they have served, and after which they have gone,
And which they have served, and to which they have bowed down, &c.

Here we have the sun, the moon, and the host of heaven—the stars, generally; but in 2 Kings xxi. 5. we have a more particular enumeration—"They burned incense to Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, to all the host of heaven," (vii. 18;) and to the planets, and to all the host of heaven." Here Baal is distinguished from the sun, (see Baal, p. 121,) and the planets are clearly distinguished from the fixed stars, though usually reckoned among the host of heaven. As this text is the only one that
Among the most determinate and obvious consequences of the gods, rivers held a distinguished place; for not a few of them were considered as gods themselves, and this probably arose, not merely from a sense of the benefits they confer on a country, but also from appearances somewhat striking and peculiar in their sources. All who have read Homer—and who has not read Homer?—know that the river Scamander was esteemed a deity, and venerated as divine. Herodotus says of the Persians, that they held rivers in especial veneration, that they worshipped them, and offered sacrifices to them; nor would they suffer any thing to be thrown into them, that could possibly pollute their waters. The same notion obtained among the Medes, the Parthians, and the Saratians. The Nile was certainly consecrated in Egypt, was venerated as a god (as was the Tiber in Rome), was esteemed their prime national deity, and was worshipped accordingly. They supposed it gave birth to all their deities who were born, they said, on its banks. That the Nile concealed its head, was proverbial; and something of the kind was, it is credible, believed of the other divine streams. All know that Idâ was the seat of the immortal gods, of which Jove was the sovereign. But why, and how, was the Scamander said to flow from him, to be his offspring, &c.? Dr. E. D. Clarke has at this in a striking light. (Trav. vol. ii. p. 183.) On ascending Gargarus, the chief summit of Idâ, he says, "Our ascent, as we drew near the source of the river, became steep and stony. Loftly summits towered above us, in the greatest style of Alpine grandeur; the torrent, in its rugged bed below, all the while foaming on our left. Presently, we entered one of the sublimest natural amphitheatres the eye ever beheld; and here the guides desired us to alight. The noise of waters silenced every other sound. High, craggy rocks rose peculiarly to an incalculable height; whose sides and fissures, to the very clouds, concealing their tops, were covered with pines, growing in every possible direction, among a variety..."
of evergreen shrubs, wild sage, hanging ivy, moss, and creeping hebes. Enormous plane-trees waved their vast branches above the torrent. As we approached its deep gulf, we beheld several cascades, all of foam, pouring impetuously from chasms in the naked face of a perpendicular rock. It is said that the same magnificent cataract continues during all seasons of the year, wholly unaffected by the casualties of rain or melting snow. That a river so ennobled by ancient history should at the same time prove equally eminent in circumstances of natural dignity, is a fact worthy of being related . . . it bursts at once from the dark womb of its parent, in all the grandeur of the divine origin assigned to it by Homer:—where the voice of nature speaks in her most awful tone; where, amidst roaring waters, waving forests, and broken precipices, the mind of man becomes impressed, as by the influence of a present Deity. I climbed the rocks with my companions, to examine more closely the nature of the chasms whence the torrent issues. Having reached those, we found, in their front, a beautiful natural basin, six or eight feet deep, serving as a reservoir for the water in the first moments of its emission. It was so clear that the rocks were discerned at the bottom. The copious overflowing of this reservoir causes the appearance, to a spectator below, of different cascades falling to the depth of about forty feet: but there is only one source. Behind are the chasms whence the basin is covered with moss; close to the basin grew hazel and plane-trees; above were oaks and pines; all beyond was a naked and fearful precipice. Such is the source of the river, the offspring of Jove. On the summit of the mountain whence it flows, the deities of classic antiquity hold their court, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Venus, Mercury, Diana, &c., who were, in short, the celestial intelligences of the planets transferred to earth.

The deities of Greece were not originally Greek; neither were they, strictly speaking, Egyptian; but India was their primary station — not the provinces now called Bengal, but those more to the north, where rises the long chain of Mount Himalaya, in all the pride of eternal snows, and endless peaks of ice. Since the days of Homer, the Ganges, the Ganges, the famous lake Mansarowara, whose capacious waters are deemed sacred by all the Brahminical tribes and their followers. Here also rise the most famous rivers; the Brahmaputra; ("son of Brahman"); the Indus, which has formed into an octagon basin, the course of which begins from the head of the Indian Jove; the Indus, or Nilah, with its contributing streams; and the Gihon, which runs northerly, a direction contrary to the former. As we are not able to offer so particular an account of the sources of these rivers as Dr. Clarke has furnished of the sources of the river Scamander, we must entreat the reader to bear in mind the identity of the Grecian deities with those of the original India, and to expect to meet them again, in exactly the same situation, at the summit of a mountain, at the source of a stream, rendered sacred by their presence, and doubly sacred as being their off-spring.——Change of name effects no change of character.

A Plate of the Origin of the River Ganges in the larger edition of Calmet, (No. LXXVI) shows these ideas in the form of an allegory, at once mythological and geographical; the principal deities of India are represented on the summits of the snowy mountains, giving birth to the Ganges; which, from those mountains, falls from pinnacles to precipices, forming the entrance into the lower provinces, which it annually overflows. The river is seen to issue from the foot of Vishnu, the pervading spirit of the supreme, who here assumes a female form. Behind her sits Nara, (Mercury,) playing on the pipes, a musical instrument, analogous to the lyre of Mercury; and before her dances Bhavani, (Venus,) animating no doubt by Nara's celestial melody; near Bhavani stands Brahma, (Jupiter,) who sanctions the joyful occurrence by his presence. Adjacent are the temples of Scehu Log; that is, of Siva, (the changer of forms,) of Parvati, (Cybele,) the "general mother," and in the sanctuary adjoining is Ganesa, with the head of an elephant. Attached is a dwelling of Chiven, and of the Brahmins engaged in his service. Another temple marked Breschan Log, "the residence of Vishnu," is inhabited by the Brahmins attached to his worship. Here are worshipped Lachmi, wife of Vishnu, the goddess of riches. A third structure, marked Hoo, "the residence of the Brahmins," contains the dwelling of Brahma, and of the Brahmins attached to him. It is said that this temple no longer exists; which, if true, seems to prove that the original drawing of it was composed while it was standing; which cannot, however, be without the antiquity of the receipt and Saris appear in the chapel of this convent; the last is the wife of Brahma, and the goddess of the sciences, Minerva. Sano Cenamand, the eldest of her sons, is here in the chapel dedicated to his family. The stream that issues from the foot of the goddess dashes on the head of a deity, sitting at some distance below, on a great rock; and in the early part of its course it is visited by Brahma, who receives part of the water into a patera or vase, as if he intended to drink of it; and by this he confers additional sanctity on the stream. From the head of the deity, the water rebounds into another direction, and falls in a cascade, or cataract, forming a mass of spray, where it is received by seven men, the Richis, particularly holy persons, or devotees; and it seems that baptism, by being wetted with the falling spray of this cataract, is esteemed a very happy and sacred ablution; and is a kind of baptism very ancient among the Hindoos, and others. These seven Richis are said to come from the surface of the moon every "sacred" day of the week, to receive this falling shower on their heads. From this cataract the river proceeds to another rock, signed by the head of a cow, and known under the name of "the Cow's Mouth," through this rock it passes, and is received and showered, leaving which, it continues its course to another fall, near the city of Hordar, or Hardwar, (Heridwar,) where it enters the fertile provinces of India.

The image of a female form, as giving birth to a river, appears, with some variation, on medals of Antioc, of Carina, of Damascus, of Potemmas, of Russia, of Singara, of Shinar, of Tartus; and in fact, on coins of very many other cities:—cities of the greatest antiquity, situated in the midst of deserts, and wanting water themselves: cities very distant from each other, and by no means likely to appropriate each other's device. The inference is conclusive, therefore, of a common and early origin of this type; and that origin could be no other than the one whence all these people drew their own origin; or, derived from localities, the memory of which they all desired to preserve; as in their religious rites, so also on their public tokens. But if it be granted that these people commemorated the country of their common and early origin, and that origin was at, or near, the sources of the Ganges, it will lead to a conclusion confirmatory of the opinion for a very eastern position of Paradis, etc. (See Foss.) The resemblance between the Hindoo and the Egyptian deities will suggest themselves to the reader. See Asiatic Researches, vol. i. p. 242.

With these tokens we should also connect the traditional accounts, which cling continu’d among the heathen, of that most memorable catastrophe, the deluge. There can be no doubt, but what many memorials of that event were popular, and even were venerated, throughout Asia; and with little risk we may affirm, that the country in which the great father of mankind resided, gave occasion to various emblems, and to figures as well compound as simple, which entered deeply and extensively into the rituals and the mysteries of those tribes of his descendants which flourished in Asia, and obtained settlements in distant parts. See DELUGE.

It is proper to mention a reaction, to which some of the principles now adduced have given occasion; it is that of placing in the heavens, in the form of constellation, the memorials of transactions which so greatly interested mankind. The constellation of the ship, [Argo.], of the raven, of the dove, of the altar, of the victim, and the sacrificer, bear no inconstant witness to the history of the deluge. Orion has been thought to be Noah; and the asterism of the river, as Ptolemy calls it, the head of which river commences at the foot of Orion, will be easily understood by the reader of the preceding pages. As we are about to say something to this reaction of Scripture, it may be passed over with this slight notice. But the subject may bear a few general remarks. The first remark is, that since idolatry had several sources, and more than one origin, it is not correct to refer all the deities of the Gentiles, without exception, to a single source. When Macrobius affirms, that all deities run ultimately into the sun, he is certainly mistaken; nor is Bryant less mistaken, when he refers all deities to persons and events connected with the sun. Still, it must be admitted, that many deities confluence in the sun, and that many memorials of the deluge became, eventually, objects of veneration, and gradually of worship. Nor must we forget, that the intelligences, or guardians of the elements, and those who ruled over the rivers, the trees, and groves, had its titulary protector or protectress. That the Magian notion of guardians over the elements was by no means confined to Persia, is evident from the opinions of the Egyptians, who, says Porphyry, commenced the worship of Serapis by fire and water. Diodorus says, “The Egyptians esteemed fire, which they called Hephaestos, to be a good god.” —They even thought it to be a living animal, endowed with a soul, according to Herodotus, lib. iii. cap. 16. And this might be independent of reference to the sun. Moreover, every traveller into Greece and Italy knows abundance of caves, and forests, and hills, which formerly were haunts of dryads and nymphs.

A second remark is, that it is desirable, in reading Scripture, and other historical writings, to distinguish the species of idolatry alluded to, where it is possible. For instance, the teraphim of Laban may be the earliest idols mentioned; yet, whether they were commemorative of the deluge, or of Noah, the principal personage of the deluge, may be questioned. The time seems to be too early; and, probably, there would be a feeling of opposition in the families descended from Shem, to all the proceedings at Babel, where, certainly, idolatry of the commemorative kind was patronized. The teraphim were, doubtless, guardians: and Laban supposed that with them was connected the prosperity of his residence and his family.

The prophets allude to many idols which do not occur in the historical books of Scripture; and to several among other nations than their own. It is well to be able to distinguish these, because, for want of such distinction, the threatenings directed against them are unintelligible; or, at least, their forcible import remains undiscerned.

The apostles and writers of the New Testament had the same deities to contend against; but under another form, and presented under the more elegant fashion of Grecian skill. Hence the originals were forgotten; Vishnou and Bhavani, Nared and Sureswati, gave place to Jupiter, to Venus, to Mercury, to Ceres; and the deities best known, held their court on mount Ida, not on mount Meru, at the head of the Scamander, not of the Ganges. Still, their attendant emblems continued much the same; the same animals marked the shrines; and these gave occasion to a worship addressed to brutes, to plants, to insects —to every kind of absurdity, at which the mind revolted while it complied. We have, however, the consolation of knowing, that as the western idols disappeared before the light of the truth of the Gospel, so the eastern idols, though the parents of the other, will in time be expelled from their station; and their influence, their dominion, and their destructive powers, to the memory of history and of wonder to succeeding generations.

The prophet Isaiah has clearly predicted this, in his threatening against pride and idolatry: (ch. ii. 20.)

Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust, For fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty.

For the day of the Lord of hosts is upon all that is proud and lofty.

And the idols he shall utterly abolish.

And they shall go into the caverns,

And into hollow places of the dust.

In that very day the chief shall cast His idols of silver, and his idols of gold, and Which they had made for him to worship,

To the moles and to the bats,

To go into the cliffs of rocks,

And into the cavities of the rugged rocks;

For fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, &c.

Bishop Lowth says, on this passage, “They shall carry their idols with them into the dark caverns, old ruins, or desolate places, to which they shall flee for refuge; and so shall give them up, and relinquish them to the filthy animals that frequent such places, and have taken possession of them as their proper habitation.” There is, however, a confusion of ideas in this note of the learned author; because, (1.) those who fled, did not flee to old ruins, to places already ruined, already desolated, but to rocks; (2.) their “carrying their idols with them,” in order to leave them behind when they came out again—“exquisited them to the filthy animals” —seems directly...

contrary to the prophet's meaning; which implies a getting rid of these idols as fast as possible—instan-seasonally; neither is it very natural, after their fright is over, to leave their deities behind them. Schrouzcher has approached much nearer, probably, to the import of the passage; and, indeed, has given it fairly, though with possibly a little too much poetic merit. In that men shall cast down (the idols) from the top of the altar to the bottom of it; and to avoid all occasion of defilement and superstition, shall hide them in dark places, and at the bottom of caverns.

This process of error is generally from bad to worse. We have seen idolatry addressed in the first instance to the celestial luminaries; next, it transferred the intelligences with which it had animated those luminaries, to the seats of their conspicuous effects on earth, and invested with imaginary powers the guardians which it appointed over the permanent and non-permanent meteoric phe-omena of the globe we inhabit, and the atmosphere that surrounds it. We are now about to notice a third step in this deplorable progress; which led to consequences and practices more degrading to the human mind, more fatal to human life, and more detrimental to morals, than either of those which preceded it. A little more difficult to conceive of notions more revolting to the good sense and feelings of mankind, than those which attended the sec-cond general declension, at which we have hinted.
What could be more base than the dedication of dis-crowned kings?—that the folly of wisdom had not terminated with the second.

First may pass almost for innocence, when placed in comparison with the second; the second may pass almost with indifference, when placed in comparison with the third.

The great retail worth, should tread with reverence the places formerly inhabited by their great forefathers, should venerate such memorials of them as bear the stamp of antiquity and authenticity, is a natural sentiment; neither desplicable nor blamable. Hence the value of emporiums set on portraits and other recollections of the mighty dead, or of those who rendered themselves illustrious by the benefits they conferred, whether such benefits were public or private, national or individual, intellectual or practical; whether they improved the condition of man, by institutions of the legislator, or by teaching the most effectual processes of handicraft, of mechanics, of agriculture, or of domestic establishment. But of all persons who ever breathed, none could possibly be so singularly distinguished beyond his compatriots as the patriarch Noah. His history was a tissue of wonders of the most striking kind; and his sufferings and deliverance were of a nature to make an indelible impression on the minds of all who knew them, of all who were interested in them. Add to this, the deference and obedience due to parental supremacy:—and it must be acknowledged, that the motives he entertained toward his king, the great second father of our race might be justified on some of the noblest principles of humanity. But, not content with this, his posterity, profoundly venerating his piety, doubted not of his reception to celestial glory, or of the immortality that awaited him, when he exchanged his tabernacle of clay for a spiritual existence, nor of his power, connected with that spiritual existence, nor of his good will to interpret the power, in favor of those whose advantage he had promoted, by all possible means, when on earth.

In short, their unbounded affection, their sympathy, their duty, their reverence, were not satisfied till they had raised their father and benefactor to the rank of a deity; and his name and person, and the representations of his person, gradually assumed as well the form as the fervency of the most direct, and eventually of the most perverse, idolatry. The events of his life were commemorated by images, by symbols, by expressive appellations infinitely varied, by imitative processes, extensively practised, by whatever art could devise, or ingenuity could ex-cute, or language could express. By degrees, the images, the processions, the symbols, the images, though nothing more than shadows, were contemplated as the substance; and they remained long after their original intention had been buried in the depths of oblivion.

Will it be believed, that from the deification of the best of men arose the custom of defiling the worst?
that the apotheosis of eminent personages, who had departed this life, was gradually abused and debased, till the living, who also claimed divinity; and to gods who were yet to die, were erected temples, statues, altars, and were consecrated priests, victims, and incense, with all the pompous paraphernalia of sacrifice? To the most infamous of men, to murderers of fathers, and murderers of mankind? Our contempt for the second series of deities strongly prompts us to wish, in behalf of decorum, and the honor of human nature, that mankind had stopped at the first: our abhor-rence of the third series will still more strongly excite our regret, that the folly of wisdom had not terminated with the second. The first may pass almost for innocence, when placed in comparison with the second; the second may pass almost with indifference, when placed in comparison with the third.

In India, the moon is masculine, in the character of the god Soma; and we have already seen that the moon is King, in its turn, among the heavenly bodies, according to the notions of the ancient Chaldeans, as stated in the Desair. We must, therefore, fix in our minds this intercommunity, or rather adhibet assumption of gender, among the pagan immortals, before we can justly appreciate, or understand, though imperfectly, certain passages of Scripture. Nor should

Dispensing male and female light, Which two great sexes animate the world:
but in the German language, the moon is masculine, der Mond, and the sun is feminine, die Sonne. An Arabian poet says expressly,
To be in the feminine gender is no disgrace to the sun;—
Not to be of the masculine gender is any honor to the moon.

In India, the moon is masculine, in the character of the god Soma; and we have already seen that the moon is king, in its turn, among the heavenly bodies,
according to the notions of the ancient Chaldeans,
as stated in the Desair. We must, therefore, fix in our minds this intercommunity, or rather adhibet
assumption of gender, among the pagan immortals,
before we can justly appreciate, or understand, though imperfectly, certain passages of Scripture. Nor should we be surprised to find Moloch, though king, as a potential and throned as a male, yet merging into a female, possessing female properties, with the qualities and attributes of Venus herself, the goddess of love and beauty. For instance; 1 Kings xi. "Solomon loved many strange women . . . who turned away his heart . . ., and put the golden calves of Ashereth, goddess of the Zidonians, and Milcom, the abomination of the Ammonites. . . . He built a high place for Moloch, the abomination of the children of Ammon." It seems clear, that Moloch is the same as Milcom, bearing the same character; and Lach is a goddess of the Ammonites, no less than Ashereth, with whom she is associated, is goddess of the Zidonians. By female deities the heart of Solomon was turned away. (This, however, is nowhere said; and the god Moloch, of which Milcom and Milcom are only di, according to the Hebrew, is always masculine, and most probably represents the planet Saturn. See Milcom. R.)

It will be naturally inferred, from what has been said, that the only deities of heathenism is known, where Christianity, the greatest blessing ever offered to suffering humanity, has prevailed. Happily, they have been suppressed by public opinion, as well as by public law. Nor should it be forgotten, that the better carried off his of heathen, alive to the feelings of natural conscience, and of shame, endeavored to palliate these monsters of immorality under the pretext of their being symbolical stories, "ceasingly devised fables," myChoos for the initiated, and causing wonderful mysteries, to be only to be disclosed under the seal of secrecy. To what subterfuges will not the perversity of the human mind have recourse, to evade the clear dictates of unpolluted nature?

But it is not our province to narrate the period at which the worship of idols was introduced. Some of the rabins say, that the descendants of Cain had introduced it into the world before the flood. They believe Enoch had been the inventor of it; and in this they explain Gen. iv. 26, which, according to the Hebrew, may be thus interpreted—"Then the name of the Lord was profaned," &c. by giving it to idols. But the old Greek interpreters and Jerome understood it otherwise. Still there is reason to think that idolatry was common before the deluge: the inculcation of wickedness intimated in the expression, "All flesh had corrupted its way," no doubt included impiety of worship, as well as the infamous irregularities of incontinence and violence. Josephus, and many of the fathers, were of opinion that soon after the deluge, idolatry became the prevailing religion; and certainly wherever we turn our eyes after the time of Abraham, we see only a false worship. The heathen's forefathers, and even himself, were engaged in it; as is evident from Josh. xxiv. 14.

The Hebrews had no peculiar form of idolatry; they imitated the superstitions of others, but do not appear to have been inventors of any. When they were in Egypt, they worshipped Egyptian deities; in the wilderness they worshipped those of the Canaanites, Egyptians, Ammonites, and Moabites; in Judaea those of the Phoenicians, Syrians, and other people around them. Rachel probably had adored idols at her father Laban's, since she carried off her husband. Gen. xxxi. 30. Jacob, after his return from Mesopotamia, required his people to reject the strange gods from among them, and also the superstitious pendants worn by them in their ears, which he hid under the turpentine-tree near Shechem, preserved his family in the worship of God while he lived; but after his death, part of his sons worshipped Egyptian deities. (See Josh. xxiv. 23.)

Under the government of the judges, they often fell into idolatry. Gideon, after he had been favored by God with so particular a deliverance, made an ephod, which ensnared the Israelites in unlawful worship, Judg. vii. 27, goddess of the Ammonites, and known, and the worship of them continued in Israel till the dispersion of the people, Judg. xvii. 3; xvi. 30, 31. Previously "the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim. They forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashereth, &c. Solomon, seduced by complaisance to his strange wives, caused temples to be erected in honor of their gods, and himself impiously offered incense to them, 1 Kings xiv. 5—7. He adored Ashereth, goddess of the Ammonites, and Milcom, goddess of the Ammonites, and Chemosh, god of the Moabites. Je-roboam, who succeeded Solomon, set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel, and made Israel to sin. The people, no longer restrained by royal authority, and worshipping their gods, fled to the deities of the Phoenicians, Syrians, Ammonites, and Moabites. Under the reign of Ahaz, idolatry reached its height. The impious Jezebel endeavored to extinguish the worship of the Lord, by persecuting his prophets, and giving their fathers, &c. of the people in the true religion, till God, incensed at their idolatry, abandoned Israel to the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, who transplanted them beyond the Euphrates. Judah was almost equally corrupted. The nation, being furnished with the irregularities and idolatries, their abominations and heathenishness on the high places, and in woods consecrated to idols, fill us with dismay, and discover the corruption of the heart of man. After the return from Babylon, we do not find the Jews more reproached with idolatry. They expressed much zeal for the worship of God; and except some transgressors under Antiochus Epiphanes, (1 Mac. i. 12, &c.) the people kept themselves clear from this sin.

There is a passage in the prophet Jeremiah, having a reference to this subject, which requires a more specific consideration than it has hitherto received;—we have had occasion to notice it incidentally once or twice already—we mean Acts xxiv. 26, quoted by Stephen, in Acts vii. 43. The following is Doddridge's note on the latter text:—"The learned De Dieu has most curiously and amusingly, but to us a very unsatisfactory, note on this verse. He says,—"and we wonder so many great commentators should not have seen—the absurdity of inventing, the Moses would have suffered idolatrous processions in the wilderness. Therefore he maintains that Amos here refers to a mental idolatry, by which, considering the text of the Hebrew, the word idolatrous (a fancy, to be sure, as old as Philo and Josephus) they referred it, and the worship there paid, to Moloch, so as to make it in their hearts, in effect, his shrine; and there, also, to pay homage to Saturn, whom he would probably be the same with Chana or Reuiph, who (as this critic thinks) might be called their star, because some later rabbins out of their great regard to the sabbath, which was among the heathen Sama’s day, have said that many extravagant and ridiculous things in honor of that planet. Celsus hints at this interpretation too. But the words of the prophet, and of Stephen, so plainly express making of images, and the pomp of their superstitious processions, (see Young on Idolatry, vol. i. p. 128—131.) that we think, if external idolatry is not referred to here, it will be difficult to prove it was ever practised. We conclude, therefore, considering what was urged in the beginning of this note, that God here refers to the idolatry, to which, in succeeding ages, they were gradually given up; (after having begun to revolt in the wilderness by the sin of the golden calf;) which certainly appears (as Grosius justly observes) from its being designated as the cause of their rejection and doom in chap. xxxi. 14. Compare 2 Kings xvii. 16; xxi. 3; xxiii. 5. “Such are the embraiments of the learned!—Feeling these, Mr. Taylor has submitted for consideration, whether the nature and design of such tabernacles, on some ancient monuments, may not contribute toward elucidating the obscurity. The words of Amos, he remarks, may bear the following interpretation (and the quotation in the Acts may be rendered to the same effect): “But you set up the succoth, booths, tabernacles, temporary residences of your king [Moloch]; and of that Chum you set up your images; and the star of your divinities which ye made, formed, instituted, to yourselves.” (See Chum.) Now, if we suppose the tent or tabernacle, on the same principle, were formed for the like purposes as those to which we have alluded, and like them might have been entitled to the honor of the neokorate, then we see how easily any tents, or tabernacles, might be converted into such receptacles. which in the camp, or apart from it, or in retirements at a little distance up the country, and might be appropriated—consecrated to similar purposes, in a manner more or less private. As these tents are distinguished by a peculiar kind of figure, or on the thought of those on their professed votaries be; or if not—yet they might equally be considered as sacred to the impure divinity, though appearing as ordinary tents, and under this explanation, the notorious publicity of the tabernacles, the taking up the succoth, booths, and so forth, might be dismissed from these passages. As to the “star,” as this was of small size, it might easily be concealed, and carried about the person; as we find practised by the soldiers of Judas Maccabees, (2 Mac. xii. 36.) also ear-rings, or other ornaments, which in the same practices. No doubt, there were various degrees of guilt among the individuals of the Israelitish nation. On the whole, it is clear, (1.) That tents, or temporary residences, were erected to Venus; (2.) That the Israelites sinned by consecrating; (3.) Baal-peor was an obscene deity; and therefore it should seem, that we risk little in referring these tabernacles, not so much to public processions, and carrying about—as to a vice at first practised in private, and spreading generally in the camp, and at length transmitted so publicly as to require an equally general and public punishment. The passage in Amos might be understood to this effect: “I hate your feast days, tents, &c. because they are not the pure religion. The. In the camp, not the worship of me, they inconsistently, and at length, notoriously, worshipped also impure deities; the same temper and spirit is in you, and therefore I will punish you, by banishment from your country.” The quotation in the Acts coincides with this in sense.

As the maintenance of the worship of the only true God was one of the fundamental objects of the Mosaic polity, and as that God was regarded as the king of the kingdom, &c. may be understood as the worship of other gods, occupying in the Mosaic law, the first place in the list of crimes. It was indeed a crime, not merely against God, but also against the fundamental law of the state, and thus a sort of high treason, upon the commandments which God gave to the people of Israel, the first was, “I Jehovah am thy God, who have brought thee out of Egypt, the prison of slavery; thou shalt have no other god before my face.” Exod. xx. 2, 3.

It is, therefore, the more necessary, that we understand the true nature of this crime, and the light in which it is viewed in the Mosaic law. The crime to which Moses annexed the punishment of death, consisted not in ideas and opinions, but in the actual act of worshipping other gods. Though a man believed that there were more gods than one, he would not, therefore, by the Mosaic statute, have become amenable to the magistrate, nor would an inquisition have taken place.
We must be careful, therefore, to distinguish between two crimes, which, by the idiom of our language, are sometimes comprehended under the common name of idolatry, and which, when even speaking about Israelitish matters, we are very apt to confound together. These are—(1.) The crime of worshipping other gods besides the only true God, to whom Moses gave the name of Jehovah; this was, properly speaking, the state crime already described, and it is at the same time the greatest of all offences against sound reason and common sense. (2.) The crime of image-worship, which is not always idolatry, because not merely false gods, but even the only true God, may be worshipped under the form of an image. Thus the Israelites wanted to worship under the similitude of a golden calf, the God who had delivered them from Egyptian bondage, claiming a festival on its being set up, expressly denounced the God, in honor of whom that festival was to be solemnized, Jehovah, Exod. xxxii. 4, 5. Image worship, it is true, indicated a crime against the true God; but it was then but the open talk, high treason, or a crime against the fundamental law of the state; nor is it so clearly and so completely repugnant to sound reason, as the crime of idolatry. These two crimes, therefore, are in their nature extremely different, and the one of them is much more heinous than the other. If, however, we read the descriptions of them given by Moses, we shall not be apt to confound them; for to serve other gods besides Jehovah, or to serve the gods of strange nations, and to make an image in order to serve it or adore it, must strike us at the first glance as very different modes of expression.

Idolatry, properly so called, was, as we have already mentioned, the greatest of all crimes against the state itself, and expressly prohibited in the very first of the commandments. Moses besides prohibited every thing that was likely to give any occasion or temptation to it, or to excite a suspicion of its being practised; and the principal scope of his last discourses in the book of Deuteronomy, is to warn the Israelites against idolatry, and to exhort them in the most urgent manner to the service of the only true God. The curses, also, and blessings which he proposes to the people in Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii. xxvii. xxviii. and xxix. turn chiefly on the transgression or observation of this commandment. If any individual Israelite worshipped strange gods, he subjected himself to the punishment of death, Exod. xx. 2—5. This punishment may appear unnecessarily severe, but it resulted from the principle of the Mosaic polity. The only true God was the civil legislator of the people of Israel, and accepted by them as their king, and hence idolatry was a crime against the state, and, therefore, just as deservedly punished with death, as high treason is with us. Whoever worshipped strange gods, shook at the same time the whole fabric of the laws, and rebelled against him in whose name the government was carried on. When a whole city became guilty of idolatry, it was considered in a state of rebellion against the government, and treated according to the laws of war; its inhabitants and all their cattle were put to death. No spoil was made, but every thing it contained was burnt with itself; nor durst it ever be rebuilt, Deut. xiii. 13—19. Whether the children were also to be put to death, is not expressly specified in the statute. The appropriate term by which the punishment pronounced against any such idolatrous city was expressed in the law, is (יַעֲשֹׁרֶה) הֹכֵסָהָה, to consecrate to Jehovah; or, as Longueil renders it, to put under ban, to outlaw, or proscrib. It was regarded as wholly consecrated to Jehovah, for the execution of its punishment; the people being devoted to the sword, and the city itself consigned to the flames, by way of an offering, according to which is said on the subject of spoil in Deut. xiii. 15—17, "It shall be consumed as a burnt-offering, of which nothing remains."

When it thus happened that the people, as a whole, became guilty upon themselves by their idolatry, God reserved to himself the infliction of the punishments denounced against that national crime, which consisted in wars, famines, and other national judgments; and when the measure of their iniquity was completed, it was accompanied by the destruction of the transportation of the people into other lands, Lev. xxvi.; Deut. xxviii. xxix. and XXXII.

For the crime of seducing others to the worship of strange gods, but more especially where a premeditated plan was carried on, if we would only see what would come to pass, uttered predictions that tended to lead the people into idolatry, the appointed punishment was stoning to death, Deut. xiii. 2—12.

With regard to private seducers, although Moses in other cases provides for encouragement to those who should expose such as he is the rigor of his law, that it enjoins informing without reserve upon every such seducer; even although it were a husband, a son, a daughter, a wife, or one's best friend, it would not affect the punishment. For even the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who survived the ruin of the state, and wrote in the beginning of the Babylonish captivity, take notice of it, and describe it not as an antiquated or obsolete abomination, but what was actually in use a little before and even during their own times.

The other practices prohibited by Moses as idolatrous, or as, at any rate, suspicious on account of idolatry, are the following:—(1.) The making images of strange gods. This was already forbidden in the case of the true God; but the curse in Deut. xxvi. 15, seems to be especially levelled against idolatrous images.—(2.) Prostration before, or adoration of, such images, or of any thing else revered as a god, such as the sun, moon, and stars, Exod. xx. 5; xxxiv. 14: Deut. iv. 19. These prostrations before men, not before gods, were by no means prohibited; but, as we see from the writings of Moses himself, were very common. Adorare is the Latin term applied to the act of prostration; and the Greeks, who, out of national pride, commonly refused to pay that honor to the Persian kings, expressed it by the word οἰκείωσθαι. It consisted in falling down on one's knees, and at the same time touching the ground with the forehead.—(3.) Having altars or groves dedicated to idol or images thereof. By the Mosaic law these were all expressly to be destroyed; (Exod. xxiv. 13; Deut. vii. 5; xii. 3) and considering the strange propensities of mankind in those days to idolatry, it became necessary to obliterate every such memorial of idolatrous practices; else, in aftertimes, the sight of an image, an idol god, might have inspired such ideas of its divinity, or have impressed men's minds with such superstitious terrors, as, in a consecrated grove, would soon pass into prayer and veneration. This rigor in the extermination of every remnant of idolatry, was carried so far, that by the sternness of Deut. vii. 25, 26, the Israelites durst not even keep nor bring into their houses the gold and silver that had been on any image, lest it should prove a snare and lead them astray. Because, having been once consecrated as an idol god, considering the current of superstition as to the reality of such deities, some idea of its sanctity, or some dread of it, might still have continued, and have thus been the means of propagating idolatry afresh among their children. Moses, therefore, declared it an abomination in the sight of God, and warned them against bringing it to their houses, lest it should, being itself accursed, bring a curse upon them. Conformable to the Mosian prohibition is the language of the prophecy of Isaiah, in chap. xxx. 22, where he says, "The silver and gold wherewith your graven and molten images were coated, you shall account unclean, and turn from with aversion, as from a menstruous woman, saying," (40.) Other sacrifices to idols.—(5.) Eating of offerings made to idols by other people, who invited them to their offering feasts; in other words, attending the festivals of other gods.—(6.) Eating or drinking of blood, which naturally created aversion.—(7.) The razing of the name of a strange god.—(8.) All usages and ceremonies, whereby a man dedicated himself to a strange god.—(9.) Prostitution in honor of an idol, and which was privately practised within the temple of the idol and its temple.—(10.) Imitation of the idolatrous ceremonies of the Canaanites, and attempting to transfer them into the worship of the true God.

In fact, every audacious transgression of the ceremonial law, in other words, of that law which prescribed the usages of divine worship and the different ceremonies of purification, that were to be performed in different cases, was regarded as an abandonment of the services of the true God, and of course as a transition to the services of other gods punished with extermination, that is, with death. (Michaelis's Commentaries.)

IDOLATROUS MARKS AND TOKENS.—We read in the book of Revelation of a persecuting power that prevailed so far as to "cause all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their forehead; and that no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name," chap. xiii. 16, 17. It may not strike English readers, that this custom still prevails, in India, to this day. The following extracts from Paulino’s Voyage to the East Indies will set it in its true light: "As the Pagans, Mahometans, and Christians, in India, all wear white cotton dresses, and made almost in the same manner, you must look very closely at their forehead or breast, if you wish to distinguish an idolater from a Christian."—(41.) Other sacrifices to idols.—(5.) Having sacrificed to idols.—(6.) Eating of offerings made to idols by other people, who invited them to their offering feasts; in other words, attending the festivals of other gods.—(7.) Eating or drinking of blood, which naturally created aversion.—(8.) The razing of the name of a strange god.—(9.) All usages and ceremonies, whereby a man dedicated himself to a strange god.—(10.) Prostitution in honor of an idol, and which was privately practised within the temple of the idol and its temple.—(11.) Imitation of the idolatrous ceremonies of the Canaanites, and attempting to transfer them into the worship of the true God.

In fact, every audacious transgression of the ceremonial law, in other words, of that law which prescribed the usages of divine worship and the different ceremonies of purification, that were to be performed in different cases, was regarded as an abandonment of the services of the true God, and of course as a transition to the services of other gods punished with extermination, that is, with death. (Michaelis’s Commentaries.)

IDUMEA, the name given by the Greeks to the land of Edom, which extended, originally, from the Dead sea to the Elantic gulf of the Red sea. Afterwards it extended farther to the mouth of the Jordan, towards Hebrum. The character and present state of mount Seir, the ancient Edom, or Idumea, is described in the article EXODUS, p. 415. Besides this region, the proper seat of the Edomites, they appear to have extended their conquests to the east and north-east of Moab, and on the south, where they had possession of the country of which Bozra was the chief city. To this they of course had access through the intervening desert, without crossing the countries of the Moabites and Amorites. The capital of East Edom was Petra; the capital of south Edom was Petra, or Jœtæs. The Idumeans, or Edomites, were, as their name implies, descendants of Edom, or Esau, elder brother of Jacob. They were governed by dukes or princes; and afterwards by their own kings. Gen. xxxvi. 31. They continued independent till the time of David, who subdued them, in completion of Isaac’s prophecy, that Jacob should rule Esau, xxvii. 29, 30. The Idumeans bore their subjection with great impatience, and at the end of Solomon’s reign, Hadad the Edomite, who had been carried into Egypt during his childhood, returned into his own country, where he procured himself to be acknowledged king, 1 Kings xi. 22. It is probable, however, that he resigned only in East Edom, for that south of Judah continued subject to the kings of Judah till the reign of Jehoram, against whom it rebelled, 2 Chron. xxii. 8.
Amaziah, king of Judah, took Petra, killed 1000 men, and compelled 10,000 more to leap from the rock on which the city of Petra stood, xxxv. 11. But these conquests were not permanent. When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, the Idumæans joined him, and encouraged him to raise the very fortifications of the city; but their cruelty did not long continue unpunished. Five years after the taking of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar humbled all the states round Judæa, particularly Idumæa; and John Hircanus entirely conquered the people, and obliged them to receive circumcision and the law. They continued subject to the later kings of Judea till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. Ultimately, the Idumæans became mingled with the Ishmaelites, and the mountain thus called Nahalathæmus, from Nabal, a son of Ishmael.

IGNORANCE is taken, in Scripture, in several senses. It denotes (1.) the absence of knowledge or information, when the subject in question was truly unknown, Lev. iv. 19, and was ignorant of Saul's oath, 1 Sam. xvii. 27. (See also 2 Sam. xv. 12.) (2.) The absence of distinguishing knowledge, or the not rightly discerning when the subject was known; (Lev. iv. 2-4, 5, 22; Num. xv. 25; Heb. v. 12, 13.) that is, for mistake, after having been the subject meriting by incorrect judgment. Ignorance is sometimes simple, sometimes willful; or ignorance of the power of God, while surrounded by the works of God, ignorance of the will of God, while favored by the light of God.

JE. ABARIM, an encampment of Israel, east of the land of Moab, Num. xxvi. 11. Jeremiah (xlix. 3) speaks of Hai, or Gai, which is Je, or Jai, in the land of Moab.

ION, a fortified place in Naphtali, 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4.

ILLYRICUM, a province lying to the north-west of Macedonia, of which the old northern limits were the Panons, the Adriatic sea south, Istria west, and Upper Moesia and Macedonia east; so that Paul (Rom. xv. 9) preached in Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Galatia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Treas, Asia, Cædia, Lydia, Ionia, Lydia, the isles of Cyzicus and Crete, Thracia, Macedonia, Thessalia, and Achaia.

I. IMAGE, or representation of any thing. God created man after his own image; that is, as another self upon earth, to exercise a dominion subordinate to his. [See xxxvii. 4.] Otherwise (Gen. xvii. 3), he created him after his image, immortal, good, just, provident, intelligent, &c. Lastly, God imprinted his image in man, his holiness, virtue, wisdom. He created man, gave him an earthly body and a rational soul; as, in after ages, his Word, his Wisdom, was to assume the nature of man—body and soul. Adam, by sin, disfigured his image of God, and forfeited the gifts of grace and immortality; which Christ, by his Spirit, forms anew in our hearts. God forbade the Hebrews from making any image or representation of any creature in heaven, or in earth, or in the waters, with intent to worship it. Moses and Solomon, however, made cherubim over the ark, and in the tabernacle. Moses made the brazen serpent; and Solomon cast lions and oxen, and placed them in the temple. But this was not with design that they should be worshipped, though the brazen serpent of Moses did receive worship. Who knows whether the oxen, &c. of the temple might not have received the same perverted attention, had they not been taken away to Babylon?

Beside the common acceptation of the word image, meaning a representation of something real, as of a horse, an ox, a star, &c. this term is understood in several other senses: Psalm lxiii. 20, says, "Thou shalt dissipate their image," their shadow, their figure; thou shalt reduce them to nothing. Ephesians says (Joh. iv. 16.) that God is a Spirit, and his children ought to appear to him; he heard, as it were, a voice, or whisper. "Image" is sometimes taken in a contrary sense, in opposition to a transient image, a phantom; so "the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things," it represented these good things in a slight and superficial manner, like shadows, which have nothing substantial and permanent; whereas the gospel represents the same good things under a lively, solid, firm, visible, and real house; we read (Rev. xii. 14, 15.) that God is a Spirit; so we should endeavor to retrace on our souls the features of the heavenly man, Christ Jesus; his obedience, humility, patience, meekness, &c.; or as the passage, perhaps, more properly means, to be cast in the mould, and形象化.
image and pedestal both together. For that image being seated to have been but six cubits broad, or thick, it is impossible that the image could have been sixty cubits high. For that makes its height to be ten times its breadth or thickness, which exceeds all the proportions of a man; no man's height being above six times his thickness, measuring the slenderest man living at his waist. But where the breadth of this image was measured, is not said; perchance it was from shoulder to shoulder; and then the proportion of six cubits breadth will bring down the height exactly to the measure which Diodorus hath mentioned. For, the usual height of a man being four and a half of his breadth between the shoulders, if the image were six cubits broad between the shoulders, it must, according to this proportion, have been twenty-seven cubits high, which is forty foot and a half.

Besides, Diodorus tells us, that this image of forty foot high contained a thousand Babylonish talents of gold; which, according to Pollux, who, in his Onomasticon, reckons a Babylonian talent to contain 7000 Attic drachmas, i.e. 300,000 Attic drachmae, or, as it would amount to three millions and a half of our money. But if we advance the height of the statue to ninety foot, without the pedestal, it will increase the value to a sum incredible; and therefore it is necessary to take the pedestal also into the height mentioned by Daniel. Other images and sacred images were also in that temple, all of solid gold. (Connect. p. 100, 101.) It will be perceived that Prideaux supposes the image itself to have been only forty foot high, while his pedestal was fifty feet high; a disproportion of parts, which, if not absolutely impossible, is utterly contradictory to every principle of art, even of the rudest art; and à fortiori of the more refined periods of art. We have no instance of such disproportion remaining. The arts had long been cultivated in India and Egypt, and doubtless in Babylon, also.

Let us hear the original authors. Herodotus, who saw the temple of Belus, is the best authority respecting it: "The temple of Jupiter Belus, whose huge gates of brass may still be seen, is a square building, each side of which is one furlong, and rises at the rate of a tower, of the solid depth and height of one furlong; upon which, resting as upon a base, seven other lesser towers are built in regular succession. The ascent is on the outside, which, winding from the ground, is continued in the temple, and rises to the height of the temple, and on the whole structure there is a convenient resting place. In the last tower is a large chapel, in which is placed a couch, magnificently adorned; and near it a table covered with gold; but there is no statue in the place. In this temple there is also a small chapel, lower in the building, which contains a figure of Jupiter, in a sitting posture, with a large table before him: these, with the base of the table, and the seat of the throne, are all of the purest gold; and the latter, distinguished, by the Chaldeans, to be worth eight hundred talents. On the outside of this chapel are two altars; one is of gold, the other is of immense size, and appropriated to the sacrifice of full grown animals: these, which are not left the frames may be offered on the golden altar. On the larger altar, at the anniversary festival in honor of their god, the Chaldeans regularly consume incense to the amount of a thousand talents. There was formerly in this temple a statue of solid gold, twelve cubits high: this, however, I mention from the information of the Chaldeans, not from my own knowledge. (Connect. p. 100) Diodorus Siculus, a much later writer, speaks to this effect: (lib. ii.) "Of the tower of Jupiter Belus, the historians who have spoken have given different descriptions; and this temple being now entirely destroyed, we cannot speak accurately respecting it. . . . It was excessively high; constructed throughout with great care; built of brick and bitumen. Semiramis placed on the top of it three statues of massy gold, of Jupiter, Juno, and Rhea. Jupiter was erect, in the attitude of a man walking: he was forty feet in height, and weighed a thousand Babylonian talents. Rhea, who sat in a chariot of gold, was of the same weight. Juno, who stood upright, weighed eight hundred talents." Diodorus proceeds to mention many more articles of gold and of vast urn, placed before the statue of Jupiter, which weighed twelve hundred talents."

The reader will judge for himself respecting this extract: it seems that the Babylonians, regretting exceedingly the loss of their sacred treasures from this temple, magnified both their value and their importance, when speaking of them to inquiring strangers. Diodorus acknowledges that "he could not speak accurately respecting it." The relation of Herodotus is the more credible, as at least in these particulars: (1) there was no statue in the highest chapel; but (2) in another chapel there was a statue of Jupi- ter [Belus] sitting; (3) the worth, not the weight, was calculated at so many talents; i.e. including the labor, skill, preparation, and accompaniments of the statue, its throne, &c. (4) the festival, in honor of the god Belus, was annual; and it was prodigious, since, no doubt, the other offerings corresponded to that of the income—a thousand talents! (5) a statue of solid gold, of twelve cubits, (eighteen feet,) is mentioned by the historian as a thing barely credible: observe, of solid gold; yet a statue not solid, but an external shell of that metal, as statues are usually cast, might have been very much larger, at much less expense of gold. (6) We conclude that Nebuchadnezzar, having conquered Egypt, and ravaged Egypt but a few years before this period, had undoubtedly seen there the colossal statues of that country, erected by its ancient monarchs; and, as those were esteemed not only sacred objects, but also capital exertions of art, it is inferred that he proposed to imitate these, as to their magnitude, and to surpass them, as to their materials. These assumptions being admitted, we proceed to examine some of those colossal which still continue to ornament Egypt.

Norden (plate 110) represents two colossal figures which remain at the ancient Thebes, and thus describes them:—"This figure, A, seems to be that of a man; the figure B of a woman. They are about fifty Danish feet in height, from the base of the pedestals to the summit of the head; from the sole of the feet to the knees is fifteen feet; the pedestals are five feet in height, thirty-six and a half long, nineteen and a half broad." He here speaks of perpendicular height; and this idea of perpendicular height has contributed to embalm the pride of the[P. 330] king, made an image of gold, whose proportional height, if it had stood upright, was sixty cubits; but, being in a sitting posture, and conformable to the style of Indian and of Egyptian art, in reference to their deities, it was little more than thirty cubits, or fifty feet, perpendicular height; and its thickness, or depth, measured from breast to back, not its breadth, measured, as Calmet has understood, and as our translation renders, was one tenth part of its perpendicular height; i. e. six cubits. The proportion of a full-grown man, from breast to back, is one tenth part of the height. — Since, then, the accepting of this work in reference to depth, rather than to breadth, reduces its application to appropriate and accurate measurements, no more need be said in vindication of the version proposed.

But we have another image, generally called after Nebuchadnezzar; namely, the statue seen by this monarch in his dream, Dan. ii. 31, &c. It was very large and terrible: its head was of gold, its breast and its arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet partly of iron and partly of clay. Calmet's exposition is: — that the empire of Nebuchadnezzar, i. e. of the Chaldeans, was represented by the head of gold; the empire of the Persians, founded by Cyrus, by the breast and arms of silver; the empire of the Grecians, founded by Alexander the Great, by the belly and thighs of brass; the empire of the Romans by the legs of iron; or rather, this empire being divided into two, first, that of the Seleucidae in Syria; secondly, that of the Egyptians in Egypt. To the latter has been added, as the heads of the kings of Egypt and Syria, to unite their interests by intermarriages, not succeeding, are represented by the feet being partly of iron and partly of clay. The little stone that issues from the mountain, and overthrows the empire of the Romans, under which appeared the Messiah, whose kingdom saw the fall of the Roman colossus. Others vary a little, supposing the ten toes to be the ten kingdoms of the Roman empire. Mr. Taylor, however, doubts whether any part of this image should be extended beyond the empire of Nebuchadnezzar; for if so, why, he asks, add the vision of the four beasts? and why reveal to Nebuchadnezzar what in nowise concerned him or his kingdom? The attempt has been made to prove, by this passage, that the fourth kingdom was that of the Seleucidae; for, it is said, the image had ten toes, and those his; and, therefore, the ten kingdoms of the Gentiles were supposed to have been the ten toes, in which case the king of the image was a king of Babylon, and not of the Chaldeans. But, as this is not consistent with the common consent, and no sense can be made of the ten toes, unless the empire of Nebuchadnezzar be extended to the Gentile nations, it is plain that the ten toes denote the ten kingdoms of the Gentiles, that is, the Roman empire included, and the power or dominion is given to the Gentile nations. The ancient Medes and Persians were the only people that had any share in the empire of Nebuchadnezzar, and they, therefore, are not the ten toes of the image; and the gentile nations, the Roman empire, are the ten toes of the image. The ten toes, then, are not the Medes and Persians, but the ten jealous nations of the Gentile world, into which the dominion of the Gentiles fell; and Nebuchadnezzar's empire is not that of the Medes and Persians, but that of the Chaldeans, whose dominion was but a part of the whole; and the king of the image is that of Nebuchadnezzar.

part of the Roman empire may be referred to in this figure, yet only the eastern part of that empire; excluding the dominion of Greece. This principle is supported, no less than others appear to be, by those ancient interpretations which refer to the Romans, (as Jerome, and others,) but does not allow of that comparison between the ten toes of this image, and the ten horns of the beast in chap. vii. to which commentators have resorted. It considers them as subjects independent of each other, and to be explained by independent history accordingly.

It may be worth while here to insert the observation of Gibbon, that Babylon was reckoned equal to one third of Asia, in point of revenue, previous to the time of Cyrus; and latterly, the daily tribute paid to the Persian satrap was equal to an English bushel of silver. If we ask, What is its present condition? Mr. Kinneir informs us, (p. 327.) “The mighty cities of Nineveh, Babylon, Seleucia, and Ctesiphon have crumbled into dust: the humble tent of the Arab now occupies the spot formerly adorned with the palaces of kings, and its flocks procure but a scanty pittance and food amidst the fallen leaf of ancient magnificence. The banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, once so prolific, are now, for the most part, covered with impenetrable brushwood; and the interior of the province, which was traversed and frequented with innumerable canals, is destitute of either inhabitants or vegetation.” He adds in a note: “Where private property is insecure, and where the cultivator can never reckon on reaping the fruits of his labors, industry can never flourish. The landholder, under the iron despotism of the Turkish government, is at all times liable to have his fields laid waste, and his habitation pillaged by the myrmidons of those in power.” What is this but the inconsistent mixture of iron and clay?

IMMANUEL, see EMMANUEL.

IMMORTALITY, in an absolute sense, belongs to God only; he cannot die. Angels are immortal, but God, who made them, can terminate their being; man is immortal in part, that is, in his spirit, but his body dies; inferior creatures are not immortal, they die wholly. Thus the principle of immortality is differently communicated, according to the will of the communicator, who can render any creature immortal by prolonging its life; can confer immortality by the death of another, and who maintains angels in immortality by maintaining them in holiness. Holiness is the root of immortality; but God only is absolutely holy, as God only is absolutely immortal. All imperfection is a drawback on the principle of immortality; only God is absolutely perfect; therefore, only God is absolutely immortal.

IMPOSIION OF HANDS is understood in different senses in the Old and New Testaments. For the ordination and consecration of priests and sacred ministers, as well among the Jews as Christians, Num. vii. 10—12; Acts vi. 6; xiii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14; v. 22; 2 Tim. i. 6. To signify the establishment of judges and officers, used by them when they were invested with their offices, Num. xxvii. 18. The Israelites who presented sin-offerings at the tabernacle, confessed their sins while they laid their hands upon those offerings, Lev. i. 4; iii. 2; ix. With numerous laid their hands upon the head of the accused person, Dan. xiii. 34. Apoc., as if to signify that they charged on him the guilt of his blood, and freed themselves from it. Our Saviour laid his hands upon those children who were presented to him, and blessed them, Mark x. 16. We find imposition of hands used also in confirmation, 1 Cor. xii. 7; xix. 6. The apostles conferred the Holy Ghost by laying their hands on those who were baptized; as the Israelites laid their hands on the Levites, when they offered them to the Lord, to be consecrated to his service, Numb. viii. 10, 12.

IMPUITY, LEGAL. There were several sorts of impurity under the law of Moses. Some were voluntary, as the touching a dead body, or any animal that had died; or any creeping thing, or unclean creature; or the touching things holy by one who was not clean, or who was not a priest; or the touching one who had a leprosy, one who had a gonorrhoea, or one who was polluted by a dead carcass; a woman who had newly lain in, or was in her courses, or was unclean with an extraordinary issue of blood. Sometimes these impurities were involuntary; as when any one unknowingly entered the chamber of a person who lay dead, or touched bones, or a sepulchre, &c.; or, either by night or day, suffered an involuntary pollution; or such diseases as issues of blood, or defilement by bathing, or defilement by the use of marriage, lawful or unlawful. Beds, clothes, movables, and utensils, which had touched any thing unclean, contracted a pollution, and often communicated it. Legal pollutions were generally purified by washing, or by bathing, or by washing himself and his clothes separately. Some pollutions, however, continued seven days, as that contracted by touching a dead body; others forty or fifty days, as that of women lately delivered; while others lasted till the person was cured, as the leprosy or a gonorrhoea. Certain diseases excluded the patients from all social intercourse, as the leprosy; others excluded only from the use of things holy, as the involuntary touching of an unclean creature, the use of marriage, &c. Others only separated the person from his relations in his own house, restraining such to a particular distance; as women who had newly lain in, &c. Many of these pollutions were purified by bathing; others were expiated by sacrifices; others by a certain water, or water, made with the ashes of a red heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation. When a leper was cured, he went to the temple, and offered a sacrifice of a kid. Others with one hand, were out of the temple, and other liberated. He who had been polluted by touching a dead body, or by being present at a funeral, was to be purified with the water of expiation, on pain of death. A woman who had the pollution of a child, came to the temple of God at the time prescribed, and there offered a turtle-dove and a lamb for her purification; or two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.

The impurities, which the law of Moses expressed with so much accuracy and care, were figures of other more important impurities, meant to be prohibited; such as sins against God, or trespasses against our neighbor. Believers under the Old Testament well understood this difference; and our Saviour has strongly insisted that outward, and corporeal; all inward pollutions, such as infect the soul, and violate piety, truth, and charity.

The regulations prescribed by Moses, relating to impurity, and numbered upon the hands upon the heads of the worshippers, and upon the Levites, when the rabbins have multiplied them enormously, and thereby have made the law a still more insupportable burden. A great part of the Mishnah is occupied in resolving cases of conscience on this subject. See TALMUD.
INCENSE, more properly FRANKINCENSE, an aromatic and odoriferous gum, which issues out of a tree named by the ancients Toruieria; some suppose it is derived from the Arabic word Thora, or Thor, but others are of opinion that it is the name of a pear-tree, according to Theophrastus, and it grows in Arabia and around mount Lebanon. Incisions are made in it, in the dog-days, to procure the gum. Male incense is the best; it is round, white, fat, and kindles on being put to the fire. It is also called Olbaum. Female incense is described as soft, more gummy, and less agreeable in smell than the other. That of Saba was the best, and most esteemed by the ancients, who speak of it with great approbation. (See Rees' Cyclopedia, art. Frankincenses.)

The proper incense burnt in the sanctuary, was a mixture of sweet spices, Ex. xxx. 34 seq. To offer incense among the Hebrews was an office peculiar to the priests; for which purpose they entered into the holy apartment of the temple, every morning and evening. On the great day of expiation, the high priest burnt incense in his censer as he entered the sanctuary, that the smoke which arose from it might prevent his looking with too much curiosity on the ark and mercy-seat, Lev. xvi. 13. The Levites were not permitted to touch the censers; and Korah, Dathan, and Abiram suffered a terrible punishment for violating this prohibition. Incense sometimes signifies the sacrifice and fat of victims, as no other kind of incense was offered on the altar of burnt-offerings, 1 Chron. vi. 49. For a description of the altar of incense see the article Altar, p. 48.

INCEST, an unlawful conjunction of persons related within the degrees of kindred prohibited by God and the church. In the beginning of the world, and even long after the deluge, marriages between near relations were allowed. God prohibits such alliances, in Lev. xviii. 3 and the degrees of consanguinity, within which the prohibition applied, are detailed in ver. 6-18.

Most civilized people have held incest as an abominable crime. (See 1 Cor. v. 1.) Tamar's incest with her father-in-law Judah is well known. (See Tamar.) Lot's incest with his two daughters can be palliated only by his ignorance, and the simplicity of his daughters, who seem to have believed, that after the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, there remained no man upon the earth to perpetuate the race of mankind. The manner of their procedure shows that they regarded the action as lawful, and the question, they did not doubt but their father would have abominated it, had they not put it out of his power to detect it, by making him drunk, Gen. xix. 31, &c.

INCHANTMENTS. The law of God condemns incantations and enchanters. Several terms are used in Scripture to denote incantations. (1.) Libahhah, (סנה) which signifies to mutter, to speak with a low voice, like magicians in their evocations, and magical operations, Ps. lii. 5.—(2.) Latin, (sorcery) secrets, when Moses speaks of the enchantments wrought by Pharaoh's magicians. (3.) Casaph, (כפה) meaning those who practise juggling, begerdenaim, tricks and witchery, deluding people's eyes, and senses, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6.—(4.) Khbar, (Balancer) which signifies, properly, to bind, assemble, associate, re-unite; this occurs principally among those who charm serpents, who tame them, and make those gentle and sociable, which before were fierce, dangerous, and untractable, Deut. xviii. 11.

We have examples of each of these modes of enchanting. It was common for magicians, sorcerers, and enchanters to speak in a low voice, or to whisper. They are called ventioloqui, because they spake, as one would suppose, from the bottom of their stomachs. They affected to see, its leave or secrets, to conceal the vanity, folly, or infamy of their personific art; though their pretended magic often consisted in cunning tricks only, as sleight of hand, or some natural secrets unknown to the ignorant. They affected obscurity and night, and would show their skill only before the uninformd, and feared nothing so much as serious examination, broad daylight, and the inspection of the intelligent.

The enchantments of Pharaoh's magicians, in imitation of the miracles wrought by Moses, were either more witchcraft and illusion, by which they deceived the eyes of the spectators; or, if they performed miracles, and produced real changes of the rods, of the water of the Nile, &c. they did it by the application of second causes to the production of effects, which depend originally on the power of God; and by giving certain forms to, or impressing certain motions on, a created substance; and as these changes and motions were above the popularly known powers of nature, they were thought to be miraculous. But God never permits miracles produced by evil spirits to be such as may necessarily seduce us into error; for either he limits their power, as with Pharaoh's magicians, who were obliged to acknowledge the finger of God in some instances, and to cover themselves by their impiety, or bad conduct; which are the marks appointed by Moses for discerning a false from a true prophet, Deut. xiii. 12, &c.

The incantation of serpents, the cure of wounds by charms, fueled metamorphoses, &c. were common among the ancients. The psalmist speaks (Ps. lxxxviii. 5) of "the serpent, or deaf asp, that stoppeth her ears, lest she should hear the voice of the charmers, charming wisely," Heb. The voice of those who speak low, and of those who make use of charms with skill, or the voice of him who taking the softest serpents. The Lord (Jer. viii. 17) threatens the Jews, "Behold, I will send serpents among you, which will not be charmed." Ecclesiastes (x. 11) says, "A babbling is like those serpents against which charms have no power." Job also speaks of enchanters by whose power serpents were burst asunder: "Shall the inchanter cause the levan- than to burst?" Job xl. 25, and Eccles. xii. 13. "Who will pity a charmer that is bitten with a ser- pent's wound?" (2.) "They have seen what the nations of Italy, had formerly the secret of incanting serpents: Any one you say, that serpents understood the language of this people, so obedient do we see them to their orders; as soon as the Marsian has done speaking, they come out of their holes." Origen and Eusebius speak of the charm of serpents as being common in Palestine.

The accounts given by travellers in Egypt and the East, respecting the power which certain persons possess of charming serpents by music or other means, are too remarkable not to be inserted here; although a probable solution of these appearances has not yet been given. The facts, however, seem too well attested to admit of doubt; and they are also, often alluded to by the poets (see Apollonius Rhodius, iv. 147. Ovid, Metamorph. vii. 153. Virgil, Æneid. vii. 753, &c. See Asp.)

Mr. Browne, in his Travels in Africa, &c. (p. 83) thus describes the charmers of serpents: "Romeili is the name given to a place, or rather a term, where fests of juggling are performed. The charmers of serpents seem also worthy of remark; their powers seem extrorary. The serpent most common at Kahira, [Cairo], is of the viper class, and undoubtedly poisonous. If one of them enter a house, the charmer is sent for, who uses diverse forms of words. I have seen three serpents enticed out of the cabin of a ship lying near the shore. The operator handled them, and then put them into a bag. At other times I have seen the serpents twist around the bodies of these Præs, and all directions, without having had their fangs extracted or broken, and without doing them any injury.”

Nebhur, in speaking of the puppet-shows and sleight-of-hand tricks exhibited for the amusement of the populace in Cairo, remarks: (Reisebesch. i. p. 189.) “Others exhibit serpents dancing. This may appear incredible to those who are unacquainted with the natural propensities of these animals; but certain kinds of serpents seem to be agreeably affected by them. They raise their heads, when they hear a drum, and this, their instinctive propensity to elevate the head and part of the body and to make some motions and turns, is called dancing.”

That some species of serpents have this sort of musical ear, is also confirmed by Chardin, in a manuscript note on the “dead adder” of Ps. lvii. 4, 5. (Harmer’s Obs. iii. p. 305.) “Adders will swell at the sound of a flute, raising themselves up on one half of their body, turning the other part about, and beating proper time; being wonderfully delighted with music, and following the instrument. Its head, before round and long, like an eel, it spreads out broad and flat, like a fan. Adders and serpents twist themselves round the certain dishes and body of young children, belonging to those that charm them. At Surat, an Armenian seeing one of them make an adder bite its flesh, without receiving any injury, said, I can do that; and causing himself to be wounded in the hand, he died in less than two hours.”

In Forbes’s Oriental Memoirs, (vol. i. p. 43,) we find an account of the Cobra de Capello, or hooded snake, (Coluber Naja,) called also the spectacled snake; it is a large and beautiful serpent, but one of the most poisonous known; its bite occasions death usually in less than an hour. (See under COCKATRICE.) Oft this kind are the dancing serpents, which are carried about in baskets throughout all Hindostan by a certain class of persons, who get their living in this way. They dress and lot the upper part of their body from the ground, and follow the music in graceful curves, like the undulating movements of a swan’s neck. It is a fact sufficiently well attested, that when any or these or of other kinds of vipers have got into a house, and make havoc among the poultry or other small domestic animals, it is customary to send for one of these musicians, who, by tones upon his flute or flageloet, finds out the hiding-places of the serpents and allure them to their destruction; indeed, so soon as the serpents hear the music, they creep quietly out of their holes, and are easily taken. This may serve to illustrate Ps. lvii. 4, 5. In regard to the dancing serpents, the music seems essential to their motions; for as soon as they cease, the serpents lies motionless; and unless it is immediately replaced upon the rack, the spectators are in great danger. Mr. Forbes had a drawing of a Cobra de Capello, which danced for an hour upon a table while he made the drawing. He took it several times in his hand in order the better to observe the head and spectacles, not doubting but that its fangs had been extracted. But the next day, in the market place, the same serpent was a young woman in the neck, who died in half an hour.”

The following remarks are from Hasselmier’s Travels in Palestine, &c. (p. 76, 79, seq. Germ. edit.) “The Egyptian jugglers can perform some feats, which those of Europe are not able to imitate; viz. they can deprive serpents of their poison. They take the most poisonous vipers in their naked hands, play with them, place them in their bosom, and make them perform all sorts of tricks. All this I have often seen. The man whom I saw to-day, had only a small viper: but I have seen him lying he had others three or four feet long, and of the very worst species. I examined in order to see whether the serpents had been deprived of their poisonous fangs; and convinced myself, by actual observation, that this was not the case. . On the 3d of July, I received at once, four different species of serpents, which I described and preserved in spirits. They were the Viper vulparis, Cerastes Africani, Juculus, Anguis martiana. We were brought me by a female, who excited the astonishment of all of us Europeans, by the manner in which she handled these most poisonous and dangerous animals, without receiving the least injury. As she put them into the bottle in which I intended to keep them, she managed them just as one of our ladies would handle their ribbons or lacing. The others gave her no difficulty, but the vipers did not seem to like their intended dwelling; they slipped out, before the bottle could be covered, and sprang upon her hands and naked arms; but she betrayed no symptoms of fear. She took them quite tranquilly from her body, and placed them in the vessel that was to be their grave. She had caught them, as our Arab assured us, without difficulty in the fields. Without doubt she must possess some secret art or skill; but I could not get her to open her mouth upon the subject. This art is a secret even among the Egyptians. The ancient Mursi and Foggli in Africa, who daily exhibited specimens of the same art in Rome, afford evidence of its antiquity in Africa; and it is a very remarkable circumstance, that such a thing should remain a secret above two thousand years, and be retained only by a certain class of persons.” (See also a similar extract from Bruce, under SERPENTS, Cerastes, &c.)

Music and singing, which is a kind of charm, were sometimes used to cure certain diseases of the mind, or at least diseases caused by disorder of the mind, or of the passions. Galen (Il lib. vii. cap. 8.) says, that he had great experience in this, and that he could produce the authority of Ἀρεσκαλιστις, his countryman, who by melody and music relieved consistencies impaired by too great heat. The Hebrews, though a people extremely superstitious, did not carry so far the use of charms and enchantments in the cure of diseases, because they were restrained by their law, and because their kings and priests were vigilant in preventing these misdoings. Still we find traces of superstitions among the Old of Saul employed music, David’s harp, to procure relief in his fits of melancholy.

INDIA, the appellation which the ancients appear to have given to that vast region of Asia, east of Persia and Bactria, as far as the country of the Sinae; its northern boundary being the Scythian desert, and its southern limit the ocean. The name is generally supposed to have been derived from the river Indus, which waters its western extremity, and which signifies the Blue or Black river. Mr. Conder thinks, however, that the exactness of the application of the word renders it more probable, that it was employed to denote the country of the Indi, or Asiatic Ethiopi; answering to the Persian Hindostan, or the country of the Hindoos. The only place where India is mentioned in Scripture is Esth. i. 1.

It is said in the passage above referred to, that Abasurus reigned from India to Ethiopia. This fixes the extent of the Persian dominions eastward to the original station of the Hidcoos, at the head of the Indus. There is, not, we believe, any memorial of the Persian power having permanently maintained itself east of the Indus, Alexander the Great only having ever thought of establishing a dominion in those countries. The Mahometans, indeed, have so done; but then they have renounced the west. Nadir Shah ascended to Delhi, but he returned to Persia, and did not attempt to retain both regions under his rule.

It will be seen in the article on idolatry, that we have assumed, as a principle, that India was the great source of those observances which we find established wherever our knowledge extends. It may be necessary here to remark, in addition to what is there said, that the Hindoos could not have adopted religious rites from the Romans, the Greeks, the Egyptians, or the Persians. Whoever has bestowed a moment’s attention on this people, must know, that it would be in utter violation of their most sacred tenets to do so; and whoever recollects that the sages of Greece, and the_vales of the Gospel, are more than thirty centuries removed from the Hindoos, will confirm the persuasion, that others derived information from them, not they from others. In fact, all testimony brings letters, learning and knowledge from the East.

INHERITANCE, a portion which appertains to another, after some particular event. As the principles of inheritance differ in the East, from those which are established among ourselves, it is necessary to notice them particularly. The reader will observe that there is no need of the death of the parent in these countries, as there is among us, before the children possessed their inheritance. (See Hizk.) Among the Hindoos, the rights of inheritance are laid down with great precision, and with the strictest attention to the natural claims of the inheritor in several degrees of affinity. A man is considered but as tenant for life in his own property; and, as all opportunity of distributing his effects by will, after his death, is precluded, hardly any mention is made of such kind of bequest. By these ordinances, also, he is hindered from disposing of his children of his property in favor of aliens, and from making a blind and partial allotment in behalf of a favorite child, to the prejudice of the rest; by which the weakness of parental affection, or of a misguided mind in its doings, is admirably remedied. These have strongly elucidate the story of the prodigal son in the Scriptures, since it appears from hence to have been an immemorial custom in the East for sons to demand their portion of inheritance during their father’s lifetime, and that the parent, however aware of the dissipated inclinations of his child, could not legally refuse to comply with the application. If all the sons go at once in a body to their father, jointly requesting their respective shares of his fortune; in that case, the father is required to give equal shares of the property earned by himself, to the son incapable of getting his own living, to the son who has been particularly dutiful to him, and to the son who has a very large family, and also to the other sons who do not lie under those three circumstances; in this case, he has not power to give any one of them more or less than to the others. If a father has occupied any glebe belonging to his father, that was not before occupied, he has not power to divide it among his sons in unequal shares, as in the case of property earned by himself. (Halked’s Genito Laws, p. 53.)

Our translators have frequently used the term inheritance in the sense of participation or property. So Mark xii. 7. Let us kill the son, and the inheritance, the property, shall be ours. Acts xx. 32; xxvi. 18. An inheritance, participation, among those who are sanctified. Eph. i. 18, The riches of the glory of his inheritance, his immediate property, in the saints. (Compare I Pet. i. 4.) So Abraham is spoken of (Ezek. xxxiii. 34) as inheriting the land; which could not be true, as his family had no previous possession in Canaan; and it is expressly contrary to Acts vii. 5, which says, Abraham had no inheritance there; but he had possessions, or property. (Comp. 2 Chron. x. 16, et al.)

INQUIETY. This word means not only sin, but the punishment of sin, and the expiation of it: “Aaron will bear the iniquities of the people,” he will stone for them, (Exod. xxviii. 38.) “The Lord will bear the iniquities of the fathers upon the children,” (Exod. xxi. 5.) he sometimes causes visible effects of his wrath to fall on the children of criminal parents.

“To bear iniquity” is to endure the punishment of it, to be obliged, to expiate it. The priests bear the iniquity of the people; that is, they are charged with the expiation of it, Exod. xxviii. 38; Lev. x. 17.

INKHORN. The prophet Ezekiel (chap. i. 2.) describes six men clothed in linen, and having each a writer’s inkhorn by his side, which may require some explanation to occidental readers. The following remarks are from Mr. Harmer:

“The modern inhabitants of Egypt appear to make use of ink in their sealing, as well as the Arabs of the desert, who may be supposed not to have such conveniences as those that live in such a place as Egypt; for Dr. Pococke says, that ‘they make the impression of their name with their seal, generally of cornelian, which they wear on their finger, and which is rendered effective when they have occasion to seal with it.’ This may be taken as evidence of a closer connection between the vision of John (Rev. vii. 2.) and that of Ezekiel, (chap. i. 2.) than commentators appear to have apprehended. They must be joined, I imagine, to have a complete view of either. John saw an angel with the seal of the living God, and therewith multitudes were sealed in their foreheads; but to understand what sort of mark was made there, you must have recourse to the inkhorn of Ezekiel. On the other hand, Ezekiel saw a person with an inkhorn who was to mark the servants of God on their foreheads, with ink, that is; but how the ink was to be applied is not expressed; nor was there any need that it should be, if in those times ink was applied with a seal; a seal being in the one case plainly supposed; as in the Apocalypse. The application of a seal made it needless to take any notice of any inkhorn by his side.

“This position of the inkhorn of Ezekiel’s writer may appear somewhat odd to a European reader, but the custom of sealing by the side, continues in the East to this day. Olearius, who takes notice (Voy. en Muscovie, &c. p. 857.) of a way that they have of thickening their ink with a sort of paste they make, or with sticks of Indian ink, which is the best paste of all, a circumstance favorable to their sealing with ink, observes—(Dr. Shaw also speaks of their writers suspending their inkhorns by their side. I should not, therefore, have taken any notice of this circumstance, had not the account of Olearius led us to something further)—that the Persians carry about with them, by means of their girdles, a dagger, a knife, a handkerchief, and their money; and those that follow the profession of writing out books, their inkhorn, their penknife, their whalebone to sharpen it, their letters, and every thing the Muscovites were wont in his time to put in their boots, which served them instead of pockets. The Persians, in carrying their inkhorn, after this manner, seem to have retained a custom as ancient as the days of Ezekiel; while the Muscovites, whose garb was very much in the eastern taste in the days of Olearius, and who had many oriental customs among them, carried their inkhorns and their papers in a very different manner. Whether some such variation might cause the Egyptian translators of the Septuagint version to render the words, a girdle of sapphire, or embroidery, on the loins, I will not take upon me to affirm; but I do not imagine our Dr. Cassel would have adopted the sentiment in his Lexicon, (see Louth on this place) had he been aware of this eastern custom: for with great propriety is the word keseth mentioned in this chapter three times, if it signified an inkhorn, the requisit instrument for sealing those devout mourners; but no account can be given why this keseth should be mentioned so often, if it only signified an embroidered girdle.” (Obs. vol. ii. p. 455.) It should be recollected, also, that in the East the artisans carry most of the implements of their profession in the girdle; the soldier carries his sword; the butcher his knife; and the carpenter his hammer and his saw.

INNOCENT, INNOCENCE. The signification of these words is well known. The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults committed contrary to the law; hence they often join innocent with hands, Gen. xxxvii. 22; Ps. xxiv. 4; xxvi. 6. “I will wash my hands in innocence,” Ps. li. 9; “Then have I cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocence.” Josephus admits of no other sins than those actions which are put in execution. Sins in thought, in his account, are not punished by God. To be innocent, in that sense, is sometimes for being exempt from punishment. “I will not treat you as one innocent.” (Jer. xlvi. 28.) literally, I will not make thee innocent: I will chastise thee, but like a kind father. Jeremiah (xlix. 12.) speaking to the Edomites says, They who have not (so much) deserved to drink of the cup of my wrath, have tasted of it. Nahum (i. 3) declares that “God is ready to exercise vengeance, he will make no one innocent: he will spare no one.” Exod. xxxiv. 7. Heb. “Thou shalt make no one innocent; no sin shall remain unpunished.” “With the pure, thou wilt show thyself pure,” Ps. xxvii. 26. Thou treatest the just as just, the good as good; thou never dost confound the guilty with the innocent.

INSPIRATION, in the highest sense, is the immediate communication of knowledge to the human mind by the Spirit of God; but it is commonly used by divines, in a less strict and proper sense, to denote such a degree of divine influence, assistance, or guidance, as enabled the authors of the Scriptures to communicate knowledge to others, without error or mistake, whether the subjects of such communications were things then immediately revealed to those who declared them, or things with which they were before acquainted. Hence it is usually divided into three kinds,—revelation, suggestion, and superintendence. See REV.

INTERCESSION, an entreaty used by one person toward another; whether this person solicit on his own account, or on account of one for whom he is agent. Man intercedes with man, sometimes to procure an advantage to himself, sometimes as a mediator to benefit another; he may be said to intercede for another, when he puts words into the supplicant’s mouth, and directs and prompts him to say what otherwise he would be unable to say, or to say in a more persuasive manner what he might intend to say. The intercession of Christ on behalf of sinners, (Rom. viii. 34; 1 John ii. 1.) and the intercession of the Holy Spirit, (Rom. viii. 26.) are easily illustrated by this adaptation of the term. See CONVENOR.

IOTA, ι. (Eng. tr. iot.) a letter in the Greek alphabet, derived from the (ι) jod of the Hebrews, or the jadh of the Syrians. Our Lord says, (Matt. xv. 18.) that every iota, jod, or tittle, in the law, would have its accomplishment; which seems to have been a kind of proverb among the Jews, meaning that all should be completed to the uttermost. Iota is the smallest letter in the Greek alphabet.

IR-MELACH, city of salt, Josh. xiv. 62. It stood probably on the margin of the Salt seas, or lake Asphaltites.

IR-NAHASH, city of the serpent, a city of Judah, which some supposed to have been named from the abundance of serpents in its neighborhood; but more probably from a person named Nahash, or from an image of the animal, worshipped here, 1 Chron. iv. 12.

IR-SHEMESH, city of the sun, a city in Dan, (Josh. xix. 41.) supposed to be the same with Beth-shemesh, the temple of the sun, 1 Kings iv. 9.

IR-TARARIM, city of palm-trees, that is, Jericho, Deut. xxxiv. 3; Judg. i. 16; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15.

IRAM, the last duke of Edom, of Esau’s family, Gen. xxxvi. 45.

IRIJAH, an officer who arrested the prophet Jeremiah as he was going to Anathoth, Jer. xxxvii. 13, &c.

IRON. Moses forbids the Hebrews to use any stones to form the altar of the Lord, which had been in any manner wrought with iron: as if iron communicated pollution. He says the stones of Palestine are of iron, (Deut. viii. 9.) that is, of hardness equal to iron; or that, being smelted, they yielded iron. “An iron yoke,” (1 Kings viii. 31.) is a hard and insupportable dominion. “Iron sharpeneth iron,” says the wise man, “so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend? I. e. the presence of a friend gives us more confidence and assurance. God threatens his ungrateful and perfidious people with making the heaven iron, and the earth brass; that is, to make the earth barren, and the air to produce no rain. Chariots of iron are chariots armed with iron, with spikes, and scythes. See CHARIOTS.

The following extract from Bruce will diminish the apparent strangeness of Zedekiah’s conduct, (1 Kings xxi. 11.) who made himself Horns of iron, and said, “Thus saith the Lord, With these military insignia shalt thou push the Syrians until thou hast consumed them.” We are apt to conceive of ISAAC, having grown very old, (137 years) and his sight being extremely weakened, called Esau, his eldest son, and directed him to procure for him some venison. But while Esau was hunting, Jacob surreptitiously obtained the blessing, so that Isaac could only give the blessing to Jacob. (See Jacob, and Esau.) Isaac lived some time after this, and sent Jacob into Mesopotamia, to take a wife of his own family. He died, aged 188 years; and was buried with Abraham, by his sons Esau and Jacob. The Hebrews say, that Isaac was instructed in the law by the patriarchs Shem and Eber, who were then living; and that when Abraham departed, with a design to sacrifice Isaac, he told Sarah, that he was carrying his son to Shem's school. They believe, likewise, that Abraham composed their morning prayers, Isaac their noon prayers, and Jacob their evening prayers.

ISAIAH was the son of Amos, who is thought by some to have been of the royal family of Judah, but without any good foundation. The commencement of Isaiah's prophecies are dated by Calmet from the death of Uzziah; and his death is fixed in the reign of Manasseh, who ascended the throne a.d. 686. Isaiah's wife is called a prophetess; (chap. viii. 3.) and thence the rabbins conclude, that she was the spirit of prophecy. But it is probable, that the prophet's wives were called prophetesses, as the priest's wives were called priestesses, only from the office of their husbands. The Scripture mentions two sons of Isaiah, one called "Shear-Jashob," the remainder shall return; the other "Hashabiah," anointed to the slaughter. The first showed, that the captives carried to Babylon should return, after a certain time; the second showed, that the kingdoms of Israel and Syria should soon be ravaged.

The prophecies of Isaiah are divided by Calmet into three parts; the first, including six chapters, which relate to the reign of Jotham; the six following to the reign of Ahaz; and all the rest to the reign of Hezekiah. The principal objects of Isaiah's prophecies are, the captivity of Babylon, the return of the Jews from that captivity, and the reign of the Messiah. For this reason the sacred writers of the New Testament have cited him more than any other prophet; and the fathers say, he is rather an evangelical poet than a prophet.

In the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, coming against Judah, Isaiah foretold the destruction of his army, and shortly afterwards the miraculous lengthening of Hezekiah's life. (See Hezekiah, and Sennacherib.) He received orders from the Lord to walk three years barefoot and without his upper garment, to denote the approaching captivity of Egypt and Cush.

There is a rabbinical tradition, that Isaiah was put to death by the saw, in the beginning of the reign of Manasseh, the pretence of this impious prince for thus executing him, being an expression in chap. vi. 1, "I saw the Lord sitting on a throne;" which he affirmed to be a contradiction to Moses, (Exod. xxxiii. 20.) "No man shall see me and live." But Gesenius, who has traced this tradition to its source, has shown it to be of a very doubtful character. Some say that his body was buried near Jerusalem, under the fuller's oak, near the fountain of Siloam; whence it was removed to Panias, near the sources of Jordan, and from thence to Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius the younger, A. D. 442.

Isaiah is esteemed to be the most eloquent of the prophets. Jerome says, that his writings are, as it were, an abridgment of the holy Scriptures, a collection of the most uncommon knowledge that the mind of man is capable of; of natural philosophy, morality, and divinity. Grotius compares him to Demosthenes. In his writings we meet with the purity of the Hebrew tongue, as in the orator, with the delicacy of the Attic taste and soundness of judgment in their style, vehemence in their emotions, copious in their figures, and very impetuous when they describe things of an enormous nature, or that are grievous and odious. Isaiah was superior to Demosthenes in the honor of illustrious birth. What Quintilian (lib. x. cap. 20.) says of Corvinus Messalla may be applied to him, that he speaks in an easy, flowing manner, and a style which denotes the man of quality. Caspar Sacntius thinks Isaiah to be more florid, and more ornamental with space and figure; and that in all kinds of discourse he excels every author, either Greek or Latin. The prophet appears to justify this character even in our own tongue, and in the elevation of his style, Lowth, he more eminently supports it. In addition to the writings which are in our possession, Isaiah wrote a book concerning the actions of Uzziah, which is cited 2 Chron. xxvi. 23, and is not now extant.

The chronological division of the prophecies of Isaiah into three parts, as mentioned above, is of very doubtful propriety; since several of the chapters are evidently transposed and inserted out of their chronological order. But a very obvious and striking division of the book into two parts, exists; the first part, including the first thirty-nine chapters, and the second, the remainder of the book, or chap. xli. — xlvvi. The first part is marked with prophetic and historical accounts, which Isaiah wrote during the period of his active exertions in behalf of the present, when he mingled in the public concerns of the rulers and the people, and acted as the messenger of God to the public. In the second part, he refers to their internal and external existing relations. These are single prophecies, published at different times, and on different occasions; afterwards, indeed, brought together into one collection, but still marked as distinct and single, either by the superscription, or in some other obvious and known method. The second part, on the contrary, is occupied wholly with the future. It was apparently written in the later years of the prophet, when he had probably left all active exertions in the theatre to his younger associates, and related to this period of his life and public life. He himself transferred his contemplations from the joyless present, into the future. In this part, therefore, which was not, like the first, occasionally by external circumstances, it is not so easy to distinguish in like manner between the different single prophecies. The whole is more like a single gush of prophecy.

The prophecies of the second part refer chiefly to a twofold object. The prophet first consoles his people by announcing their deliverance 2 Sam. xii. 16. He names the monarch whom Jehovah will send to punish the insolence of their oppressors, and lead back the people to their home. But he does not stop at this trifling and inferior deliverance. With the prospect of freedom from the Babylonish exile, the prophet connects the prospect of deliverance from sin and error through the Messiah. Sometimes both objects seem closely interwoven with each other; sometimes one of them appears alone with particular clearness and prominence. Especially is the view of the prophet sometimes so exclusively directed upon the latter that he is made a mere spectator of the contemplation of the glory of the spiritual kingdom of God and of its exalted founder, he wholly loses sight for a time of the less distant future. In the description of this spiritual deliverance, also, the relations of time and magnitude are in their style, vehemence in their emotions, copious in their figures, and very impetuous when they describe things of an enormous nature, or that are grievous and odious. Isaiah was superior to Demosthenes in the honor of illustrious birth. What Quintilian (lib. x. cap. 20.) says of Corvinus Messalla may be applied to him, that he speaks in an easy, flowing manner, and a style which denotes the man of quality. In the description of this spiritual deliverance, also, the relations of time and magnitude are... reproved him, and Abner, being thereby provoked, swore he would endeavor to transfer the crown from the house of Saul to David; but he was treacherously killed by Joab. Ishbosheth, informed of Abner's death, lost all courage; and Israel fell into great disorder. Ishbosheth was assassinated by two captains of his troops, who killed him in his house while he was sleeping during the heat of the day: and cutting off his head, they brought it to David at Hebron, thinking to receive a considerable reward. David, however, commanded the murderers to be killed, and their heads and the heads of the two who killed Ishbosheth were hung next the pool in Hebron. The head of Ishbosheth he placed in Abner's sepulchre at Hebron. With this prince terminated the royal family of Saul, ante A.D. 1048.

ISHMAEL, son of Abraham and Hagar, was born A.M. 2004. The angel of the Lord appeared to Hagar in the wilderness, when she fled from her mistress, and bade her return, adding, "Thou shalt bring forth a son, and call his name Ishmael; for the Lord hath heard thy affliction. He shall be a fierce savage man, whose hand shall be against all men, and the hands of all men against him." Hagar returned, therefore, to Abraham's house, and had a son, whom she called Ishmael. (See Hagar.) Fourteen years after this, the Lord visited Sarah, and Isaac being born to Abraham, by his wife Sarah, Ishmael, who till then had been considered as the sole heir, saw his hopes disappointed. Five or six years after this, Ishmael dispossessed Sarah, who prevailed on Abraham to expel him and his mother. Hagar, with Ishmael, wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba, and when reduced to great distress, a voice from heaven said, "Be not afraid, for the Lord thy God is come, and will hear the voice of the child." Ishmael calleth God, "The Father of a great people." They abode in the wilderness of Paran, where Ishmael became expert in archery, and his mother married him to an Egyptian woman. He had twelve sons; viz. Nahasheth, Kedar, Abdeel, Milsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hader, or Hadad, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, Kedemath. He had likewise a daughter named Mahalath, or Bashemath, (Gen. xxxvi. 3) who married Esaai, Gen. xxvii. 9. From the twelve sons of Ishmael are derived the twelve tribes of the Arabians, still subsisting; and Jerome says that in his time they called the districts of Arabia by the names of their several tribes. The descendants of Ishmael inhabited from Havilah to Shur, i.e., the part of the Persian Gulf, and from Egypt; and are usually mentioned in history under the general name of Arabians and Ishmaelites. Since the seventh century, they have almost all embraced the religion of Mahomet. Ishmael died in the presence of all his brethren, (Gen. xxxv. 18.) as the Vulgate renders; or, according to another and better translation, his inheritance lay to the eastward of that of all his brethren. (See Gen. xvi. 12.)

Arabia was peopled by old Arabians, before the sons of Ishmael settled there, and not till after long disputes with the Goshamides, the first possessors. The old Arabians still subsist, but blended with the Ishmaelites. See ARABIA.

It was very spacious, and encompassed round with walls of waxed cloth. In the middle was his pavilion, of green waxed cloth, lined within with flowered tapestry, all of one set. Within the precincts behind, and on the sides of his pavilion, were chambers and offices for his women. Round the pale of his tent, was a third line of the tents, pitched in such a manner, that the doors of them all looked towards the basha's tent; and it ever is so, that they may have their eye always upon their master's lodging, and be in readiness to assist him, if he be near them. Did not the basha dwell over against the faces of those who lodged in these tents? and was not this one sign of his superiority? Did Ishmael, in like manner, announce his superiority? and if so, was this, in part at least, his dwellings, or in the dress of these women, or in the protection given to them? "That the Arabs often pitch their tents in a circle, is no doubt true, as is affirmed also by D'Arvieux; but it is not always the case, nor apparently is it usually so. A fine sketch of a Bedouin encampment, where the tents are represented in a circle, is prefixed to Carne's Letters from the East." R.

II. ISHMAEL, son of Nathaniah, of the royal family of Judah, treacherously killed Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had established over the remains of the people, in Judea, after the destruction of Jerusalem; but was obliged to fly to Baalas, king of the Ammonites, Jer. xxi.

ISLANDS, ISLES. Considerable errors in sacred geography have arisen from taking the word rendered Isalma, for a spot surrounded by water. It rather imports a settlement; that is to say, a colony or establishment, as distinct from an open, unappropriated region. Thus we should understand Gen. x. 3. "I will make the faces of all the heathen." Isalma, translated islands, in Isa. xlvii. 15; "I will make the islands;" and the word rendered islands, in Ps. lix. 10, "O He (God) shall deliver the island of the innocent," i.e., settlement or establishment. "The words of the Gentiles;"—"rather settlements of human population. In these places, and many others, the true idea of the Hebrew word is establishments, or colonies, understood to be at some distance from others of the same name, as is the case of Africa, which are small districts comprising wells, verdure, and population, surrounded by immense deserts of sand, are called islands, in Arabic, to this day; and no doubt but such were so called by the Hebrews, norwithstanding they had no strict notion of water within many days' journey around them.

[The Hebrew word les, which is more commonly translated island, means strictly dry land, habitable country, in opposition to water, or to seas and rivers. See Is. xii. 13. "I will make the faces of all the heathen." The phrase in the English version, "he shall dwell in the presence of his brethren," refers to the mode in which the Arabs pitch their tents; to illustrate which he adds the following extract from Themenos; (part ii. p. 148.) "The basha's tent, pitched near Cairo, was a very lovely tent, and reckoned to be worth ten thousand crowns, which would make no sense. Hence, as opposed to water in general, it means land adjacent to water, either washed or surrounded by it, i.e. maritime country, coast, island. Thus it means coast, when used of Ashdod; (Is. xx. 6.) of Tyre; (Is. xxvii. 9, 6.) of Peloponnesus, or Greece, (Ezek.xxvii.7.) "The isles of Elishah." It means island when used e. g. of Caphtor, or Crete; (Jer. xiv. 4.) also Ezek. xxvi. 6; Jer. ii. 10; so also Esth. x. 1, where the phrase sides of the sea is in antithesis with the land or continent. The plural of this word, usually translated islands, was employed by the Hebrews to denote distant regions beyond the sea, whether coasts or islands; and especially the islands and maritime countries of the west, which had become indistinctly known to the Hebrews, through the voyages of the Phoenicians: so Is. xxiv. 15; xl. 15; xlii. 4, 10, 12; li. 5; Ps. lxxii. 10, et al. In Ezek. xxvii. 15, the East Indian Archipelago would seem to be intended.

IRASIA, the province with God, a name given to Jacob, and of Canaan wrested with him at Mahanaim, or Penuel, Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, and 26, 29, 30; Hosea xii. 3. (See Jacob.) By the name Israël is sometimes understood the person of Jacob; sometimes the people of Israel, the race of Jacob; and sometimes the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes, as distinct from the kingdom of Judah.

ISRAELITES, the descendants of Israel, called afterwards Jews, (Judee,) because, after the return from the captivity of Babylon, the tribe of Judah was the most numerous, and foreigners had scarcely any knowledge of the other tribes. See Hebrews.

ISSACHAR, the fifth son of Jacob and Leah, was born about 140 A. D. He had four sons, Tola, Phuvah, Joel, and Shimron, Gen. xvi. 13. We know nothing particular of his life. Jacob, blessing him, said, "Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens. And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." The Chaldees translate it in a quite contrary sense, "He shall subdue provinces, and make those tributary to him, who shall remain in his land." The tribe of Issachar had its portion among the best parts of the land of Canaan, which was allotted to the Israelites on their entrance into the Promised Land, except the valley of Jezreel, with the half-tribe of Manassëh to the south, Zebulon to the north, the Mediterranean sea west, and Jordan, with the south point of the sea of Tiberias east. See Canaan.

ITALY, a Latin word, which some derive from Phlebus, or Phlebas, because this country abounded in calves and heifers; but others, from a king called Italus. We know not the ancient name of Italy in the Hebrew language. Jerome has sometimes rendered Clitas, Italy, (Num. xxiv. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 6. and in Isa. xlv. 19, he translates Thablas, Italy, though, according to others, the Thibarensians are here meant. In the New Testament, written in Greek, there is no ambiguity in the word Italy; it signifies that country of which Rome is the capital.

(The Italian band mentioned in Acts x. 1, was probably a Roman cohort from Italy, stationed at Cesarea; so called to distinguish it from the other troops, which were drawn from Syria, and the adjacent region. See Acts iii. 1.)

THITAMAR, Aaron's fourth son, who, with his descendants, exercised the functions of common priests only, till the high-priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eleazar. The Duke of Etruria, son of the Duke of Tuscany, was Abihai, Abias, Abimelech, and Abiab, whom Solomon deposed, 1 Kings ii. 27. See Elia.

ITUREA, a province of Syria, or Arabia, beyond Jordan, (see Trachonitis;) it seems to have been the same as the ancient Auranitis, or modern Haouran; or it was, perhaps, a general name including Auranitis, Batanea, & c. Luke (iii. 1) speaks of Iturea; and 1 Chron. v. 19, of the Itureans, or of Jetham, and was one of the sons of Ishmael, and gave name to Iturea. Early in his reign, Aristobulus made war with the Ituræans, subdued the greater part of them, and obliged them to embrace Judaism; as Hircanus his father had some years before done. Publius Cornutus, in the same manner, gave them their choice, either to be circumcised and embrace the Jewish religion, or to leave the country. They chose the former. Philip, one of Herod's sons, was tetrarch of Iturea, when John the Baptist entered on his ministry, Luke iii. 1.

IVORY is first mentioned in the reign of Solomon, unless, indeed, Psalm xlv. were written previously to his time, in which ivory was employed in decorating those boxes of perfumes, whose odors were employed to exhilarate the king's spirits. It is probable that Solomon, who traded to India, first brought thence elephants and ivory to Judea. For the king had at sea a navy (Jos. iii. 4.) with the navy of Hiram: once in three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold and silver and ivory. 1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. x. 21. It seems that Solomon had a throne decorated with ivory, and inlaid with gold; the beauty of these materials relieving the splendor, and heightening the lustre, of each other. 1 Kings x. 18. Ivory is here described as γυαίκας γυάς γυάς, "great tooth," which clearly shows, that it was imported in the whole task. It was, however, ill described as a tooth, for tooth it is not, but a weapon of defence, not unlike the tusks of a wild boar, and for the same purposes as horns of other animals. This has prompted Ezekiel (xxvii. 15.) to use another period for describing it; and he calls it μέρη καρακώς, "horns of teeth." This, however, is liable to great objection, since the idea of horns and of teeth, to those who have never seen an elephant, must have been very confused, if not contradictory. Nevertheless, the combination is ingenious, for it assigns defences which furnish the ivory, answer the purposes of horns; while, by issuing from the mouth, they are not unsightly allied to teeth. Several of the ancients have expressly called these tusks horn, particularly Varro, Ling. De ling. 8. 17. The Vulgate render the two Hebrew words by obstrictia locupletioria, and the Vulgate dentes obcurrentes. The Targum, however, in Ezekiel, separates γυαίκας and γυάς, explaining the former word by horn, of the rock goats, and the latter, by episcopus, a bishop. Cabinets and wardrobes were ornamented with ivory, by what is called marquetry, Ps. xiv. 8. These were named "houses of ivory;" perhaps, because made in the form of a house or palace; as the silver * reallocus* of Diana, mentioned Acts xiv. 24, were in the form of her temple at Ephesus; and as we have now ivory models of the Chinese pagodas or temples. In this sense, Dr. Harris understands what is said of the ivory house which Ahab made, 1 Kings xxii. 39, for the Hebrews. A subterranean house, is used as Dr. Taylor well observes, for a place, or case, where in any thing lieth, is contained, or laid up. Ezekiel gives the name of house to choise of rich apparel; (chap. xxvii. 94.) and of elephants, or of gold, because overlaid with gold. This method of ornamenting buildings or apartments was very ancient among the Greeks, and is mentioned by Homer, Odyssey, iv. v. 72. The Romans sometimes ornamented their apartments in the same manner, as is evident from Horace, Carm. i. 8. Ode xviii. v. 1.

Our marginal translation of Cant. v. 13, renders the IVORY

Hebrew words "towers of perfume," which Hamburger, (Class., p. 166,) may mean scents, in which Hymettian vines are some of the spices or flowers of ivory. (See Exod.) If we might trust to Classic interpreters, the knowledge of ivory would be much more ancient than we have supposed it; for this authority informs us, that Joseph placed his bed upon an ivory pillow. This interpretation is not altogether to be rejected; for ivory might be known in Egypt, either from Ethiopia, or by the caravans from the central parts of Africa, or it might be procured from India, by means of trading vessels, or trading merchants; and certainly its beauty and ornament should well become the residence of the Nazir, or Egyptian Pharaohs. In Ezek. xvii. 6, the benches of Tyrian ships are said to be "made of ivory." The meaning is, ornamented, probably, though Mr. Taylor contends that "shrines" must be intended.

JAB

JABAL, son of Lamech and Adah, father of those who lodge under tents, and of shepherds; (Gen. iv. 20,) that is, instigator of those who, like the Arab Bedouins, live under tents, and are shepherds. See Pardah.

JABBOK, a brook east of the Jordan, which takes its rise in the mountains of Gilead, and falls into the Jordan at some distance north of the Dead sea. It separated the land of the Ammonites from the Gentiles, and that of Og, king of Bashan, Gen. xxxii. 29, 32. It is now called El Zerkah.

I. JABESH, father of Shalum, the fifteenth king of Israel, or of Samaria, 2 Kings xv. 10.

II. JABESH, a city in the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan, and generally called Jabesh-Gilead, because situated at the foot of the mountains so named. Eusebius places it six miles from Pella, towards Gerasa. Jabesh-Gilead was sacked by the Israelites, because it refused to join in the war against Benjamin, Judg. xx. 8, and at a subsequent period, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, besieged it, but Saul dislodged him. In remembrance of this service the men of Jabesh-Gilead carried off the bodies of Saul and his son Jonathan, which the Philistines had hung upon the walls of Bethshan, and buried them honorably at their city, 1 Sam. xxxi. 11–13.

I. JABIN, king of Hazor, in the northern part of Canaan, Josh. xii. 1, &c. Discomfited at the conquest of Joshua, who had subdued the south of Canaan, he formed, with other kings in the northern part along the Jordan, and the Mediterranean, and in the mountains, a league offensive and defensive. With their troops they rendezvoiced at the waters of Merom, and defeated them; and bore them unto the valley of Jezreel, the valley of Mizpeh. He lamed their horses, burnt their chariots, took Hazor, and killed Jabin, about A. M. 2553.

II. JABIN, another king of Hazor, who oppressed the Israelites twenty years, from A. M. 3590, to 2719, Judg. iv. 2, &c. Sinea, his general, was defeated by Barak, at the foot of mount Tabor; and the Israelites were delivered.

I. JABNEEL, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 11.

II. JABNEEL, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33.

JABNEH, or JABNIA, a city of the Philistines, (3 Chron. xxvi. 6,) called Jannah, (1 Mac. iv. 15,) and Jannim, chap. 5. 58; 2 Mac. xii. 8. Its situation may be gathered from the passage last cited, as being not far from Jaffa, or Joppa. The following is Dr. Wittman's account of it: "Yebna is a village about twelve miles distant from Jaffa; in a fine open plain, surrounded by hills and covered with herbage. A rivulet formed by the rains supplies water. It is conjectured that the rock, surmounted by the Philistian, is a lofty hill, from which an extensive and pleasing view of the valley, distant about five miles. On sloping the plains are bordered, Ashkelon, were in sight?" (Comp. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 20; and 1 Sam. xiv. 14.) It was given to the tribe of the Philistines by Uzziah, Dan. It was taken from 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. In 2 Mac. xii. 9, it is stated to be 254 furlongs from Jerusalem.

JACCHIN, stability, the name of a brass pillar placed at the porch of Solomon's temple. See BEAN.

JACIONTH, see HACINTH.

JACOB, son of Isaac and Rebekah, was born about A. D. 1890. He was twin-brother to Esau, and as at his birth he held his brother's heel, he was called Jacob, the heel-holder, one who comes behind and catches the heel of his adversary, a deceiver, Gen. xlv. 36. This was a kind of predictive intimation of his future conduct in life. While Rebekah was pregnant, Isaac consulted the Lord concerning the struggling of the twins in her womb, and declared that she should have two sons, who should become two great people; but that the elder should be subject to the younger. Jacob was meek and peaceable, living at home; Esau was more turbulent and fierce, and the consideration of the family was partial to Esau, Rebekah to Jacob. Jacob having taken advantage of his brother's necessity, to obtain his birthright, (see BIRTHRIGHT,) and of his father's infirmity, to obtain the blessing of primogeniture, was cast out by his father, and fled in fear of his brother, Gen. xxvii. 18. He avoided the consequences of his brother's wrath, Gen. xxvii. 20. On his journey the Lord appeared to him in a dream, promised him his protection, and declared his purpose relative to his descendants possessing the land of Canaan, and the descent of the Messiah through him, chap. xxviii. 10, &c. Arriving at Mesopotamia, he was received by his uncle Laban, whom he served fourteen years for his two daughters, Rachel and Leah.

Jacob had four sons by Leah; but Rachel, having no children, gave her servant Bilhah to Jacob, who by her had Dan and Naphtali. Leah also gave her servant Zilpah to her husband, who brought Gad and Asher. After this Leah had Issachar and Zebulun, and Dinah, a daughter. At last the Lord remembered Rachel, and gave her a son, whom she called Joseph, chap. xxxix. Jacob's family having become numerous, and his term of service to Laban being expired, he desired to return into his own country with his wives and children. Laban, however, having prospered by his services, and wishing to retain him, proposed to Joseph should take as his wages in future, the marked sheep and kids of the flock. To this, Joseph assented, and, by a singular stratagem suggested to him in a dream, acquired as much property, that Laban and his sons became afraid of his presence. Jacob therefore desired him to return into his own country, chap. xxx. 25, &c. He took his wives, therefore, his children and his cattle, and had performed three days' journey before Laban was aware of his departure. He immediately pursued him, however, and overtook Jacob on the seventh day of his pursuit, on the mountains of Gilgal. He reproached him for his flight, and having stolen his gods, or teraphim, which Rachel had taken without her husband's knowledge, chap. xxviii. 19. Having come to a mutual explanation, Jacob and Laban entered into a covenant, and then separated. Arriving at the brook Jabbok, east of Jordan, Jacob, fearing that Esau might reach his former resentment, sent him now to prepare for his approach, and Esau advanced with four hundred men to meet him. After all his people had passed the brook Jabbok, Jacob remained alone, on the other side, and wrestled with an angel in the form of a man, who, not being able to stand, Jacob, being thrown to the ground, and his head laid upon the hollow of his thigh which immediately withered. His name was also changed from Jacob to Israel, i. e. a prince with God. Jacob called the place Peniel, saying, I have seen God face to face, yet my life is preserved, chap. xxxii. When Esau advanced toward him, Jacob went forward, and threw himself seven times on the earth before him; as did also Leah and Rachel, with their children. The two brothers then embraced each other, and Jacob prevailed upon Esau to accept his presents. Esau returned home, and Jacob arrived at Succoth beyond Jordan, where he dwelt some time. He afterwards passed the Jordan, and came to Salem, a city of the Shimeites, who set his tents, having purchased part of a field for the sum of a hundred kesites or pieces of money, of the children of Hamor, Shechem's father, chap. xxxiii. While Jacob dwelt at Salem, his daughter Dinah was ravished by Shechem; and her brethren, Leah, Rachel, and Rachel, and the sacrificial covenant which he was to offer there, he desired his people to purify themselves, to change their clothes, and to reject all the strange gods, which they might have brought out of Mesopotamia. These he took, and buried under an oak near Shechem. At his sacrifice the Lord appeared to him, and renewed his promises of protecting him, and of multiplying his family. After he had performed his devotions, he took the way to Hebron, to visit his father Isaac, who dwelt in the valley of Mamre. In the journey Rachel died in labor of Benjamin, and was buried near Bethlehem, where Jacob erected a monument for her, (Gen. xxxv. 16, 17.) and, proceeding to Hebron, pitched his tent at the tower of Edar. He had the satisfaction to find his father Isaac, and that good patriarch lived twenty-two years with his son, chap. xxxv. About ten years before the death of Isaac, Joseph was sold by his brethren, and Jacob, believing he had been devoured by wild beasts, was afflicted in proportion to his tenderness for him. He passed about twenty-two years mourning for him, but at length Jacob learned that Joseph was alive, and came to Egypt, chap. xlix. 21. Being informed that Joseph was living, Jacob awaked, as it were, from slumber, and exclaimed, "It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive, I will go and see him before I die." On his arrival in Egypt, Jacob purchased the land of Goshen, and they embraced with tears. Joseph presented him to the king, and Jacob having wished him all happiness, Pharaoh asked him his age. He answered, "The time of my pilgrimage is a hundred and thirty years; few and evil have my years been, in comparison of the age of my fathers," chap. xlvi. 29, &c. Jacob lived seventeen years in Egypt, and some time before his death adopted Ephraim and Manasseh, and directed that they should share the land of Canaan, which God had promised him at Bethel. Joseph placed his sons on each side of his father, Ephraim on Jacob's left, and Manasseh on his right hand. But Jacob, directed by the spirit of prophecy, laid his right hand on Ephraim, and his left on Manasseh's. Joseph would have changed the disposition of his hands; but Jacob answered, "I know what I do, my son." Thus he gave Ephraim the pre-eminence over Manasseh; and the tribe of Manasseh is inferior to the tribe of Joseph, as to posterity, chap. xlvi. 29, 30. Jacob also foretold that God would bring his posterity back into the land of Canaan, which was promised to their fathers, and bequeathed to Joseph one portion above his brethren, which he took from the Amorites with his sword and his bow, chap. xlviii. Some time after this, Jacob assembled his sons to give them his prophetic blessing. He desired to be buried in the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham, Isaac, and Rebekah were buried, and then laid himself down and died. Joseph embalmed him after the manner of the Egyptians; and there was a general lamentation for him in Egypt seventy days; after which, Joseph and his brethren, with the principal men of Egypt, carried him to the burying-place of his fathers, near Hebron, chap. xlix.

There are two or three incidents in the life of this patriarch which require more particular notice than they have received: the testament, to which we have concluded between him and Laban (Gen. xxx. 32.) appears sufficiently singular to us; and not a little sarcasm has been usefully wasted on the patriarch, for the cunning and depth of plan which he manifested in this agreement. Union by the sacrifice which he was to offer there, he desired his people to purify themselves, to change their clothes, and to reject all the strange gods, which they might have brought out of Mesopotamia. These he took, and buried under an oak near Shechem. At his sacrifice the Lord appeared to him, and renewed his promises of protecting him, and of multiplying his family. After he had performed his devotions, he took the way to Hebron, to visit his father Isaac, who dwelt in the valley of Mamre. In the journey Rachel died in labor of Benjamin, and was buried near Bethlehem, where Jacob erected a monument for her, (Gen. xxxv. 16, 17.) and, proceeding to Hebron, pitched his tent at the tower of Edar. He had the satisfaction to find his father Isaac, and that good patriarch lived twenty-two years with his son, chap. xxxv. About ten years before the death of Isaac, Joseph was sold by his brethren, and Jacob, believing he had been devoured by wild beasts, was Most readers, no doubt, have been used to consider the case of Jacob, in his marriage with the two sisters, Leah and Rachel, as not merely hard, but as uncustomary and illegal; perhaps, as scarcely binding, Gen. xxi. 21, seq. Had he not been imposed upon by Laban, he would have married Rachel, but would have declined Leah; though, after having married her, he would not divorce her. Admitting, as extremely probable, that Laban's conduct was more cunning than upright, yet the excuse he makes for himself, we must acknowledge was founded in fact; though it leaves him guilty of not having explained the laws or usages of the country to Jacob. On the contrary, he encouraged him to believe he had bargained for one daughter to be his wife, and afterwards deluded him by substituting another. Mr. Halket observes, in his notes on the Hebrew laws, (p. 89), that "We find Laban excusing himself, for having substituted Leah in the place of Rachel, to Jacob in these words: It must not be done in our country, to give the youngest daughter before the first-born, but if a disease is placed in the ram of thy flock have I not eaten; that which was torn of beasts, though the laws and usages in such cases would have authorized me, yet I brought not unto thee the railest limb, for a convincing proof of such an accident; I bore the loss of the creature, in silence; of my hand didst thou also require the equivalent for that which was stolen by day, or even that stolen by night, when I could not possibly prevent the theft! In short, to avoid words, I have borne more loss, than in strictness, and according to custom, I need have done," Gen. xxxii. 38, 39.

It may not be out of place to remark, that this representation gives additional spirit to the valor of David: "Thy servant has kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock; and as I could not endure to be liable to any imputation of negligence or cowardice, though the loss was not by my fault, and the laws would have excused me, but I ran after the beast, and risked my life, to recover my father's property," l Sam. xviii. 34. See also Amos iii. 12: "Thus saith the Lord, As the shepherd recovereth out of the mouth of the lion, two legs, or a piece of an ear,"—in order that he may carry to his owner "convincing proof from the animal's body," of the accident that has happened to it, that he himself had neither sold nor slain the creature, to his owner's injury. Is not this the allusion?—Is not the behavior of Jacob's sons also founded on the same principle? Gen. xxxvii. 2. They took Joseph's coat, and dipped it in the blood of a kid, and sent (not brought) it to their father—saying, This have we found; discern, now, whether it be thy son's coat, or no. And Jacob knew it, and said, It is my son's coat, and it is gone from me, and is, as I doubtless, retorted by this "pieces" by a wild beast.—Did not his brethren thus endeavor to send "convincing proof" of Joseph's hopeless fate; as they would have brought "the head, the tail, or the four feet of an animal" in the true characteristic style of shepherds?
We must judge of it by the feelings of those among whom the right of avenging the blood of a relative was so strongly rooted, that even Moses could not take it away. Jael was an ally by blood of the Israelite nation; their chief oppressor, who had mightily oppressed them for the space of twenty years, now lay so deeply convulsed, that not only one of those whom Israel was bound by the command of Jehovah to extirpate. Perhaps, too, she felt herself called to be the instrument of God in working out for that nation a great deliverance, by thus exterminating their heathen oppressor. At least, Israel viewed it in this light; and in this view, we cannot reproach the heroine with that as a crime, which both she and Israel felt to be a deed performed in accordance with the mandate of Heaven.

JAH, one of the names of God; contracted from Jehovah. It is compounded with many Hebrew words; as Adonijah, Halleliuah, Malchsin—God is my Lord. Praise the Lord, The Lord is my King, &c. JAHAZ, also JAHAZAH, and JAHZEH, a city east of Jordan, near to which Moses defeated Sihon. It was given to Reuben, (Deut. ii. 32,) and was situated to the north, near Ar, the capital of Moab. It was given to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 73.

I. JAIR, of Manasseh, possessed the whole country of Argob beyond Jordan, to the borders of Geshur and Maachah, Judg. x. 3. He succeeded Tola in the government of Israel, and was succeeded by Jephthah. His government continued twenty-two years, from A. M. 2735 to 2717. (Comp. Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 39; 1 Kings iv. 13; 1 Chron. ii. 22.)

II. JAIR, the eighth month of the Hebrew civil year, and the second of the sacred year. It corresponded partly to March and April.

JAIRUS, chief of the synagogue at Capernaum, whose daughter was restored to life by Jesus, Mark v. 22; Luke viii. 41, seq.

JAMBRES, a magician, who opposed Moses in Egypt. See JANES.

I. JAMES, surnamed Major, or the elder, to distinguish him from James the younger, brother of John the Evangelist, and son of Zebedee and Salome, Matt. xxi. 21. The nature of the men's tent in the East, (see Text,) and that the victor would not have intruded there; the implied pledge of security in the food Jael had given to Sisera, which in the East is of considerable solemnity. (See Text,) that the words, "At her feet he bowed, he fell," &c. (chap. v. 27,) imply, that he attempted rudeness to her; and that to resist such violation, she had recourse to the workman's hammer. But it should be remembered, that a fugitive, as Sisera was, would have had little inclination at such a time; and it appears clearly that fatigue and sleep overpowered him. We suggest as probable, (1.) that Jael had herself felt the severity of the late oppression of Israel by Sisera; (2.) that she was actuated by motives of patriotism, and of gratitude toward Israel; (3.) that the general character of Sisera might be so atrocious, that at any rate his death was desirable. We find a similar procedure in the case of Judith, whose anxiety for the deliverance of her people led her to the employment of artifice to accomplish her purposes.

As to the morality of the proceeding of Jael, in putting Sisera to death, we have no right to bring it to the test of modern principles and occidental feelings.
the judges was so affected with his constancy in confessing Christ, that he declared himself a Christian, and was condemned, as well as the apostle, to be beheaded.

II. JAMES, surnamed the Less, brother of our Lord, (Gal. i. 19; Joseph. Ant. lib. xx. cap. 6,) was son of Cleopas (or Alphonse) and Mary, sister of the Virgin Mary. (See Mark xv. 40; xvi. 1; compared with John xix. 25.) He was consequently consignen- german to Christ, and is therefore termed his brother, in the wider sense of that word, Gal. i. 19. (See Barret a.) He was surnamed the Just, for the mir- able holiness and purity of his life. By Clemens Alexandriaus and Hegesippus he is said to have been a priest, and to have observed the laws of the Nazarites from his birth, eating or drinking nothing capable of intoxicating; but this is not credible. Jerome assures us that the Jews so greatly esteemed him, that they strove to touch the hem of his garment, and the Talmud relates several miracles said to have been wrought by James, the disciple of Jesus the carpenter.

Our Saviour appeared to James eight days after the resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. He was appointed bishop of Jerusalem; and we are assured by Eusebius, was at Jerusalem, and considered as a pillar of the church, when Paul first visited that city after his conversion, Gal. i. 18. In the council of Jerusalem, (A. D. 51.) James gave his vote last; and the result of the council was principally formed on what he said; who, notwithstanding that he himself observed the ceremonies of the law, with his church, (comp. Gal. ii. 11, 12,) was of opinion, that such a yoke was not to be imposed on converts from among the heathen, Acts xv. 13. The progress of the gospel alarmed the chief of the Jews, and Ananus, son of Caiaphas, the high-priest, mentioned in the gospel, undertook to put James to death, and accomplished his purpose.

James was stoned by the Pharisees, and buried near the Sepulcher, in the place where he had suffered martyrdom, and where a monument was erected, which was much celebrated till Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans. The wisest of the Jews much disapproved this murder, and the behavior of Ananus, of which they made complaints to king Agrippa, and to Albinus, the Roman governor of the province. The latter threatened to punish his temerity; and Agrippa divested him of the high-priesthood, which he had exercised only three months. Josephus is cited as affirming, that the war which the Romans made against the Jews, and all the following calamities, were imputed to the death of this just man. The ancient heretics forged writings, which they ascribed to James, the brother of our Lord; but the church acknowledges his epistle only as authentic. In this he argues principally against the abuse which many made of Paul’s principle, that faith and not works justifies before God, strongly maintaining the necessity of good works.

It is probable that James’s strict observance of the Mosaic institutions, contributed to his preservation during many years at Jerusalem; and shows the pru- dence of those who desired him to reside in the Christian church there; as he would be least offen- sive to the Jewish rulers, through his being an apostle; nor would he detract from the reputation of the national rites among his own people.

The Epistle of James.—There are doubts to which James the church is indebted for this Epistle. The most ancient traditionary reports ascribe this Epistle to James the elder, the son of Zebedee, and consequently the brother of John. He was one of the three apostles in whom Christ placed the greatest confidence, who alone were witnesses to the raising of Jairus’s daughter from the dead, to the transfiguration of Christ, and to his agony in the garden. In the Syriac version, undoubtedly one of the oldest, and perhaps the best, into which the First Epistle of Peter, the First of John, and the Epistle of James, only, are admitted, there is a subscrip- tion, according to the edition of Wincknast, to this effect:—"In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ we here close the three Epistles of James, Peter, and John, and who were witnesses to the revelation of our Lord, when he was transfigured on mount Tabor, and who saw Moses and Elias speaking with him." To this Michælis adds the subscrip- tion to the edition of the Syriac version, published by Theodotus, wherein is to be added, in the report: also, that of a manuscript of the old Latin version, the Codex Corhiensis, which is, Exposita Epistolae Jacobij, filij Zebæi. Could we depend on these subscriptions, the question were settled; but all subscriptions are doubtful, and can justly claim no great reliance. However, they show what some, at least, thought anciently. James the elder was behended about A. D. 43 or 44. "If, therefore, he was the author of this Epistle," says Michaelis, "it must have been the first written of all the Epis- tles." But this opinion is not tenable, if the First Epistle of John were written in Jerusalem, if it were addressed to the visitants of that city, and if its objects were such as most properly may be attributed to the influence of the church at Jerusalem. A comparison between these two Epistles might be instituted with considerable effect. The coincidence is more than accidental.

Sentiments of John.

God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all. 1 John i. 5.

Whose hath this world’s good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth. iii. 17.

If a brother or a sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye drunken with the love of God, how much of the love of God is there in you? My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth. iii. 17.

This commandment have we from him. That he who loveth God, love his brother also. iv. 21.

If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, thou dost well. ii. 8.
Lore not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him, for all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. v. 15.

If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. v. 16.

It is not proper to do more than submit these passages to the reader, who will draw his own conclusions from them. If they really were written by the two brothers, these traces of similarity are easily accounted for, as the first printed papers in behalf of the Christian cause, they justify an additional portion of respectful consideration; and if we had the history of the time completely before us, we should find them very suitable to the state of the Jews during the Maccabees. The "wars and fightings" mentioned by James may well be thought those which took place under Antiochus and Anileus, in Mesopotamia, &c. about A. D. 40, as described by Josephus. If so, this Epistle must be placed after the First Epistle of John. Though whatever others in various parts, might occasion the Epistle; and the Epistle might occasion the death of the author. To examine the style or the phraseology of this tract, would be out of place here. It may be observed, however, that the term "synagogue" applied to places of worship, where Christians met, marks a very early date; since that appellation was certainly not long continued among believers. If it be thought, that these places of worship were those which appertained to the Jewish nation, as such, under the indulgence of the governing powers, it agrees equally well with an early date; since it proves that the separation between Christians and Jews had not yet taken place. The same believe were the design parts, continued to hold communion with their nation; they had not been expelled, neither had they, as yet, withdrawn themselves.

The attempt here made to refer the Epistle of James to the apostle of the same name, is unsatisfactory in itself; nor does it accord with the tradition of the church, nor the results of critical research. Commentators are almost unanimous in ascribing it to James the Less, and suppose it to have been written just before his death, about A. D. 62, to the elders and others present, in the church of Jerusalem. JAMES and JAMBRES, two magicians who resisted Moses, in Egypt, 2 Tim. iii. 8. As these names are not found in the Old Testament, the apostle probably derived them from tradition. They are often mentioned by Jewish and rabbinical writers. The paraphrase of Jonathan, on Numb. xxvii. 22, says they were the two sons of Balaam, who accompanied him to Balak, king of Moab. They are called by several names, in several translations. Artapanus affirms, that Pharaoh sent for magicians, from Upper Egypt, to oppose Moses; and Ambrosius, or Hilary the Deacon, says, they were brothers. He cites a book entitled Janues and Mambres, which is also quoted by Origen, and ranked as apocryphal by Gelasius. "There is a tradition in the Talmud, that Jannus and Mannre, chief of Pharaoh's physicians, said to Moses, "Thou bringest straw into Egypt, where abundance of corn grew?"—To bring your magical arts hither, is to as much purpose as to bring water to the Nile. Numenius, cited by Aristobulus, says, "James and Jambres were sacred scribes of the Egyptians, who excelled in magic at the time when the Jews were driven out of Egypt. These were the only persons whom the Egyptians found capable of opposing Moses, who was a man whose three sons, were very powerful. These two men, Jannes and Jambres, were alone able to frustrate the calamities which Moses brought upon the Egyptians." Pliny speaks of the faction or sect of magicians, of whom he says Moses, Jannes, and Jocabod, and Jambres, were heads. The Musalmans have several particulars to the same purpose. Their recital supposes, that the magicians wrought no miracle, but only played conjuring tricks, in which they endeavored to impose upon the eye of spectators. Moses, however, was a magician himself. As if Pharaoh's magicians really operated the same effects as himself; so that Pharaoh and his whole court were persuaded, that the power of their magicians was equal to that of Moses, till those magicians, not being able to produce lice, as Moses had done, were constrained to acknowledge that the finger of God was in the work, Exod. viii. 18, 19.

JANOH, a city of Ephraim, on the frontiers of Manasseh, Josh. xvi. 8.

JAPHA, a city of Galilee, near Jotapata, according to Josephus. Probably the city called Japhia, (Josh. xix. 12) belonging to Zebulun.

JAPHETH, the enlarger, the eldest son of Noah, though generally named last of the three sons of Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Japheth is known in profane authors under the name of Ispetus. The poets (Hesiod, Theogonia) make him father of heaven and earth, or of Titan and the earth. His habitation was in Thessaly, where he was celebrated for his power and violence. He married a nymph named Asia; by whom he had four sons, Hesperus, Atlas, Epimetheus, and Prometheus, who are all very famous among the ancients. The Greeks believed that Japheth was the father of their race, whence the proverb, "As old as Japheth." It is very possible that Neptune is a memorial or transcript of Japheth. There is some resemblance in the character; Neptune is god of the sea, as Japheth is lord of the isles. Saturn divided the world among his three sons, Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune; thus Noah distributed the earth among Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Jupiter is Ham, Pluto is Shem, and Japheth is Neptune. The sons of Japheth were Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. Gen. x. 4. Gomer was probably father of the Cumri, or Cimmerians; Magog of the Scythians; Madai of the Macedonians, or of the Medes; Jason of the Ionians and Greeks; Tubal of the Tiberianians; Meshech, of the Muscovites, or Russians; and Tiras of the Thracians. By the isles of the Gentiles, the Hebrews understood the islands of the Mediterranean, and all other countries to which they could go by sea only, as Spain, Gaul, Italy, Greece, Asia Minor, &c.

The descendants of Japheth possessed all Europe, the islands in the Mediterranean, Asia Minor, and the northern parts of Asia. Noah, when blessing Japheth, said, "God shall enlarge Japheth; and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." Gen. x. 28. This prophecy, when understood by the Greeks and after them, the Romans, subordinated Asia and Africa, where were the dwellings and dominions of Shem, and of Canaan. It is worthy of remark, that the allusion to countries the most distant which occur in the Bible, is in this prophetic benediction. Noah, "God shall enlarge the enlarger" (Japheth). Now, as from the earliest ages, the eldest son was, by his birthright, entitled to a double portion of his father's property, it leads us to conceive of such a distribution in this instance.

JAPHE, see JOPPA.

JAREB, (Hos. v. 13; x. 6.) the name of a king; or more probably it signifies hostile, i.e. here, the hostile king. Others make it the great king, viz. the king of Assyria. (Compare 2 Kings xviii. 18.)

JASHER, Book of, see JIbble, p. 171.

I. JARMUTH, a city of Issachar, given to the Levites of Gershom; it was a city of refuge, Josh. xxii. 39.

II. JARMUTH, a city of Judah, the wife of which, according to 1 Chron. xlii. 8, was the wife of Joshua, Josh. x. 5, etc. Jerusalem is placed four miles from Eleuthropolis, near Eshcol, in one place, but in another ten miles, in the way to Jerusalem.

JASHOBAM, a son of Zadok, who commanded twenty thousand men, who did duty in David's court in the month Nisan, 1 Chron. xxvii. 2. Some believe him to be Jashobeam son of Hachmoni, which signifies the wise, and was perhaps a surname, 1 Chron. xi. 11. In the corresponding passage in 2 Sam. xvii. 8, we read: "The Tachmonite, that sat in the seat, the head of the three, Adino of Ezni, who lifted up his spear against eight hundred men, whom he slew." But the text of Chronicles imports that "Jashobeam, a Hachmonite, chief of the thirty, lifted his spear against three hundred, whom he slew at one time." How are these statements to be reconciled? Jashobeam is the son of Hachmoni, he kills three hundred men, and he is chief of the thirty. Adino, on the contrary, is head of the three, and kills eight hundred men. When we examine the subject closely, however, it appears, that the difference proceeds only from some letters which are read differently in the texts. Calmet would therefore correct the text in the second book of Samuel thus: "Jashobam, son of Tachemon, was head of the three. This is Adino the Ezniite, who drew his sword against eight hundred." In the Roman edition, Jebosthe the Canaanite, head of the three, &c. We cannot see from whence they took Adino the Ezniite, which is entirely superfluous in this place. Another mode of removing the discrepancy is by supposing that Jashobeam, the Hachmonite, died during David's life, and that Adino, the Ezniite, was appointed in his place. And it is remarked that 2 Sam. xxvii. 8, literally rendered, import, "these are the names of the mighty men whom David had"—who sat in the seat of the Tachmonite, that is, of Jashobeam the Hachmonite, who was chief among the captains, he is Adino, the Ezniite:—who perhaps is the Adino, son of Shiza, (1 Chr. xi. 42) "duty of the Reubenites, who had thirty under him." Shiza might be the name of his family; Ezniite that of his country.

JASHUB, or Schar-Jashub, son of Jashub, (Gen. iv. 19.) 2. Jeshua signifies the remainder shall be left (Jeshua); and the prophet, by giving his son this name, intended to show, that the Jews, who should be carried to Babylon, were much more numerous than the Jews who should be preserved. (Neb.)

I. JASON, a high-priest of the Jews, and brother of Onias III., was a man of unmixed ambition, who scrupled not to divide the priesthood, in order to seize that dignity himself, sacrilegiously purchasing it of Antiochus Epiphanes. Jason did all he could in Jerusalem, and to adopt the religion of the Hellenists, were the destruction of the Jews under Antiochus. He died at Lacedemon, a city in alliance with Athens, from Aretas, and remained without burial, which could be offered to him.

II. JASON, Paul'skinsman, and his host at Thessalonica, (Rom. xvi. 21.) hazarded his life to preserve him during a sedition.

JASPER, in Latin, in Greek Jasus, in Hebrew יָשָׁב, a precious stone of various colors, as purple, (Rev. vii. 10; Rev. iv. 3.)

JATTIR, a city of Judah, (Josh. xvi. 48.) afterwards given to the Levites of Kohath's family, chap. xxi. 14. Eusebius places it in the district of Dorona, twenty miles from Eleutheropolis.

JAVAN, fourth son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2, 4.) and father of the Ionians, or Greeks. See GREEK.

JAVELIN, a kind of long dart, or light spear, thrown as a missile weapon at the enemy.

JAZER, a city east of Jordan, and at the foot of the mountains of Gilead, given to Gad, and afterwards to the Levites, Josh. xxii. 39.

JEALOUS, JEALOUSY, suspicions of infidelity, especially as applied to the marriage state. God's tender love toward his church, a sometimes tinged jealousy. Paul says to the Corinthians, that he is jealous over them with a godly jealousy, that he might present them as a chaste virgin to Christ. The word, however, is frequently used to express the vindictive acts of disloyalty. Thus the psalmist, (lxix. 5.) representing the church as smarting under divine judgments, occasioned by her infidelity to God, says, "How long, Lord, shall thy jealousy burn like fire?" (See also 1 Cor. x. 22.)

JAVO, son of Saba, of the house of Reuben.

JAW, or JOW, a kind of pork, or wild boar, which is very common in Africa.

JAW, son of Japheth, king of Egypt, (Gen. x. 1.)

JAWAS, a city of Canaan, Josh. xiv. 51, 52, which came to David at Ziklag.

JEBUS, son of Canaan, and father of the Jebusites, (Josh. xv. 63.) who dwelt in Jerusalem, and in the mountains around it.

JEBUS, the ancient name of Jerusalem, derived from Jebus, the son of Canaan, Judg. xxi. 11. See JERUSALEM.

JEBUSITES, see JERUSALEM.

JEDIDAH, of Manasseh, a brave man at David's army, who abandoned Saul's party, (1 Chron. xi. 45; xii. 20.) and came to David at Ziklag.
JEHOIACHIN

M. 3405, when he was killed by the Chaldeans in the eleventh year of his reign. Jehoiachin succeeded him, and reigned alone three months and ten days; after having reigned ten years in conjunction with his father. By this distinction, the proper titles of the passages are corrected. In the second book of Kings, it is said he was eighteen years of age when he began to reign; whereas in the Chronicles it is said he was but eight; that is, he was but eight years old when he began to reign with his father, but eighteen when he began to reign alone. The Kings and Chronicles intimate, that the people set up Jehoiachin, or that they acknowledged him as king in his father's room. But Josephus (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 9) says, Nebuchadnezzar gave him the kingdom; and some months after, fearing he might revolt, to avenge the death of his father Jehoiakim, he sent an army against him, which besieged him in Jerusalem. Jehoiachin would not expose the town on his account; he sent his mother and his nearest relations as hostages to Nebuchadnezzar's generals, having first received a promise and an oath from them, that they would not injure the town or the hostages. Nebuchadnezzar, however, ordered his generals to send the prince to Babylon, where he died, with his mother and his friends, thirteen years, 2 Kings xiii. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, like Jeroboam, son of Nebat, wherefore the anger of the Lord delivered Israel during all his reign to Hazael, king of Syria, and Benhadad, son of Hazael, and had formerly, and afterwiser, so many of the inhabitants, prostrated himself before the Lord; and the Lord heard him, and sent him a saviour in Joash his son, who re-established the affairs of Israel, and secured his people from the Kings of Syria. Of all his soldiers, Jehoahaz had left only 30 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 foot; for the king of Syria had defeated them, and made them like the dust of the threshing-floor. Neither punishment nor mercy, however, was sufficient to prevail with the Israelites to forsake their evil ways. Joash, the successor of Jehoahaz, was more fortunate than his father, but not more pious.

II. JEHOIAHAZ, or Shalum, son of Josiah, king of Judah, succeeded his father (2 Kings xxi. 30—32) though he was not the eldest son. He was 23 years old when he began to reign, and reigned about three months, (ante A. D. 608,) when he was deposed by Necho, king of Egypt, who led him prisoner into Babylon. The reason of this preference is not known, but it seems unquestionable, and a number of conjectures have been offered for its solution. Is it probable that Jehoiachin was born before Josiah's elevation to the throne? See HER.

Jehoiachin, like Shalum, (Jer. xxvii. 20), or Ceniah, (Jer. xxxvii. 1), son of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, and grandson of Josiah, reigned but three months over Judah; 2 Kings xviii. 4; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. It is believed that he was born about the time of the first Babylonish captivity, (A. M. 3883,) when Jehoiakim, or Eliakim, his father, was carried to Babylon. Jehoiachin afterwards returned, and reigned! See A. M. 3405, when he was killed by the Chaldeans in the eleventh year of his reign. Jehoiachin succeeded him, and reigned alone three months and ten days; after having reigned ten years in conjunction with his father. By this distinction, the proper titles of the passages are corrected. It is believed that he was born about the time of the first Babylonish captivity, (A. M. 3883,) when Jehoiakim, or Eliakim, his father, was carried to Babylon. Jehoiachin afterwards returned, and reigned! See A.
hies in his kingdom: for neither Salathiel, who was born and died in captivity, nor Zerubbabel, who returned from Babylon, nor any of Jehoiachin's descenddants, sat on the throne of Judah. This is fairly implicated in the words, "No man of his seed (that is, posterity) shall prosper:" so that it appears he might ever succeed; but no one who should enjoy the royal dignity. The passage should be rendered, "Write this man forsook, successors." We know not the year of his death.

JEHOIADA, by Josephus called JOADUS, succeeded Azariah in the high-priesthood, and was succeeded by Zechariah. In 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10, Johanan and Azariah seemed to be confounded with Jehoiada and Zechariah. This high-priest, with his wife Je-oiahbomeah, rescued Josiah, son of Joram, king of Judah, when but one year old, from the murderous violence of Athaliah; and concealed him in the temple. After seven years, he set him on the throne of David, 2 Kings xi. xii. and 2 Chron. xxiii. xxiv.
(See ATHALIAH, and JOSPH.) While Jehoiada lived, everything happened according to his advice, every thing happened as he succeeded. The high-priest formed a design of repairing the temple, and collected considerable sums in the cities of Judah; but the Levites did not acquit themselves of their commissions with diligence till after the王朝, and age of sixty, and the priests and high-priest united their authority in promoting the design, 2 Kings xii. and 2 Chron. xxiv. 5, &c. Jehoiada left a son, Zechariah, who was high-priest after him, and was put to death by Josiah, with an ingrattude which has loaded his memory with eternal ignominy, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21. Jehoiada died, aged one hundred and thirty, ante A. D. 834. He was buried in the porch of the kings at Jerusalem; a distinction due to those services which he had rendered to the king, the state, and the royal family.
ver. 15.

JEHOIAKIM, or ELIAKIM, brother and successor of Jehoshah, king of Judah, was made king by Necho, king of Egypt, after he returned from an expedition against Carshenaiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 34—36, ante A.
D. 609. Necho changed his name from Eliakim to Jehoiakim, and set a ransom on him of a hundred talents of silver, and ten talents of gold; to raise who, he laid heavy taxes on his people. He was twenty-five years old when he began his reign, and he reigned eleven years at Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and Jeremiah (xxii.
13, &c.) reproaches him with building his house by unjust means, with oppressing unjustly his subjects, with keeping back the wages of those whom he had employed; with having his heart and his eyes turned to avarice and inhumanity; and with following his inclination to barbarities and wicked actions. The same prophetic informs us, that he sent men to bring the prophet Urim out of Egypt, whether he had fled; that he put him to the sword, and left him without burial, Jer. xxvi. 23. For these and other crimes, the Lord threatens him with an unhappiness; and he shall die, says Jeremiah, (xxiv. 10,) and shall be neither mourned for nor regretted.
"He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." After about four years' sucession to the king of Egypt, Jehoiakim fell up to the devotion of Nebuchadnezar, king of the Chaldeans, who, having recovered what Necho had taken on the Euphrates, came into Phoenicia and Judea, subdued Jerusalem, and subjected it to the same burdens and conditions which it suffered under the king of Egypt, 2 Kings xxiv. 1.

2. Jehoiakim was taken, and Nebuchadnezzar put him in fetters, intending to carry him to Babyl on; but he restored him to liberty, and left him in his own country, on condition of paying a large tribute.
Thus, Daniel and Jeremiah are reconciled with the Kings and Chronicles. In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, according to the Hebrew, it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim in chains to carry him to Babylon; and Daniel relates, that the Lord delivered Jehoiakim into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar; that that prince carried to Babylon a great part of the vessels belonging to the house of God, with some captives, among whom were Daniel and his companions; but he does not say that Jehoiakim was carried there. The books of Kings and Chronicles inform us, that Jehoiakim reigned eleven years at Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxiii. 30; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 3.
Jeremiah says, that Nebuchadnezzar took Carcechnish from Nebuchadnezzar, king of Egypt, in the fourth year of the fourth of Jehoiakim; and elsewhere, that the first year of Nebuchadnezzar agreed with the fourth of Jehoi-akim. All these chronological marks evidence that Nebuchadnezzar did not come into Judah till A. M.
3399, which is the fourth year of Jehoiakim; that Jehoiakim was not carried into Babylon, but put in chains in order to be removed thither, yet afterwards was set at liberty, and left at Jerusalem; and lastly, that Jehoiakim was four years subject to Nebuchadnezzar, before he became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah having dictated to Baruch the prophecies which he had pronounced till then; that time, the scribes read them the year following before all the people in the temple, Jer. xxxvi. 1—10. 20—32. Jehoiakim was informed of this, and, ordering the book to be brought to him, he had a page or two read, and then destroyed the rest by cutting and burning. He also gave orders for seize-ing Jeremiah and Baruch; but the Lord consigned them.

The prophet, having been commanded to have his prophecies again written down, pronounced terrible menaces against Jehoiakim, of which the king soon experienced the truth. Three years afterwards, he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, who sent troops of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites into all the country, who carried 5220 Jews to Babylon.
In the seventh year of Jehoiakim, the following years afterwards, Jehoiakim himself was taken, slain, and thrown into the common sewer, as Jeremiah had predicted. He was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, ante A. D. 605.

JEHOIARIB, head of the first family of priests established by David, 1 Chron. xxiv. 7. From this illustrious family the Maccabees descended.

JEHO'NADAB, see JONADAB.

I. JEHORAM, son of Joram, (2 Kings xi. 2.) son and successor of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, (2 Kings vii. 16.) was born A. M. 3080, and associated with his father in the kingdom, A. M. 3112. He reigned alone according to Usher, ante A. D. 885. His queen, Ath-aliah, daughter of Omri, engaged him in idolatry, and other sins, which produced calamities throughout his reign. Jehoram, being settled in the kingdom, was his murder of all his brothers, whom Jehoshaphat had removed from public business, and placed in the fortified cities of Judah.

To punish his impunity, the Lord permitted the Edomites who had been subject to the kings of Judah to revolt, 2 Kings vii. 20, 21; 2 Chron. xxiii. 9. Jehomarched against them and defeated their cavalry, but could not subdue them from that time they continued free. Libnah and some other places in Judah, also rebelled. The Philistines and Arabians ravaged the territories of Judah, plundered the king's palace, and carried away his wives and children, so that he had none remaining except Jehosheba, the youngest. In addition to this, God afflicted him with a cruel dysenter-ry, which tormented him two years, and brought him to his grave. The people refused to pay him the same honors as they had paid to his predecessors, by burning spices over their bodies. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in a royal sepulchre, and A.D. 885.

II. JEHORAM, king of Israel, see Joram II.

JEHOYAHAD, see Jehoysheba.

JEHOJABHATH, king of Judah, son of Asa, ascended the throne when aged thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years. He prevailed against Baasha, king of Israel; and placed garrisons in the cities of Judah and Ephraim, which had been conquered by his father. He demolished the high places and groves, and God was with him, because he was faithful. In the third year of his reign, he sent officers, with priests and Levites, throughout Judah, with the book of the law, to instruct the people, and God blessed his zeal. He was feared by all his neighbours; and the Philistines and Arabians were tributaries to him. He built several houses in Judah in the form of towers, and fortified several cities. He generally kept an army, or more probably an enrolled militia, of 1,000,000 men, without reckoning the troops in his strong holds. Scripture reproaches Jehoshaphat on account of his alliance with Ahaz, king of Israel, 1 Kings xxii. 44; 2 Chron. xviii. 35. Being on a visit to this wicked prince, at Samaria, Ahaz invited him to march against him with Ramoth-Gilead. Jehoshaphat consented, but asked first for an assurance from a prophet of the Lord. In the battle, the enemy took him for Ahaz, but he crying out, they discovered their mistake, and he returned safely to Jerusalem. The prophet Jechonias reproved him sharply for assisting Ahaz, (2 Chron. xix. 1, &c.) and Jehoshaphat repaired his fault by the regulations and good order which he established in his dominions, both as to civil and religious affairs; by appointing honest and able judges, by regulating the discipline of the priests and Levites, and imposing on them the keeping of their duty. After this, the Mosaic, Ammonites, and Moabites, people of Arabia Petraea, declared war against him. They advanced to Hazazon-Tammar, or Edom, and Jehoshaphat went with his people to the temple, and offered up prayers to God. Jehaziel, son of Zachariah, encouraged the king, and promised, that the next day he should obtain a victory without fighting. This was fulfilled, for these people, being assembled against Judah, quarreled, and killed one another; so that Jehoshaphat and his army had only to gather their spoils, chap. xx.

Some time afterwards, Jehoshaphat agreed with Ahaziah, king of Israel, jointly to equip a fleet in the port of Ezion-geber, on the Red sea, in order to go to Tarshish, ver. 35, 36. Eliezer, son of Dodohab, of Maresah, came to the king, and said, "Because thou hast made an alliance with Ahaziah, God hath disappointed thy designs, and thy ships are shattered." Jehoshaphat continued to walk in the ways of the Lord; but did not destroy the high places; and the hearts of the people were not directed entirely to the God of their fathers. — He died after reigning twenty-five years, and was buried in the royal sepulchre.

His son Jehoram reigned in his stead, and A.D. 886. 2 Chron. xvii. 1, &c. 1 Kings xxii. 47.

JEHOJABHATH, son of Jehoysheba, or Jehoshaphath, the VainCVHCVH, or a, narrow gven which runs from north to south, between the mounds Olives and Moriah, and through which flows the Kidron. The prophet Joel (iii. 2, 12,) says, "The Lord will gather all nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there. Jehoshaphat, in Hebrew, signifies the judgment of God; and there can be no doubt that the valley of Jehoshaphat, that is, of God's judgment, is symbolic, as well as the valley of decision, i.e. punishment, in the same chapter. From this passage, however, the Jews, and many Christians also, have been of opinion, that the last judgment will be solemnized in the valley of Jehoshaphat. See Jerusalem.

JEHOYAHAD, or Jehoysheba, daughter of Joram, and sister of Ahaziah, king of Judah. She married Jehoida the high-priest, and saved Joash, then but a year old, from the fury of Athaliah, who murdered all the princes of the royal family, 2 Kings xi. 1—3; 2 Chr. xxiii. 11. See Joash, and Athaliah.

JEHOJABHATH, (Num. xiii. 16,) see JEHOSHEBA.

JEHOVAH, the ineffable and mysterious name of God. I appeared, says the Almighty, to Abraham, and to Isaac, and to Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, (Al-Shaddai,) but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them. Shaddai signifies the almighty, (or all bountiful) Jehovah signifies the self-existent, he who gives being and existence to others. Calmet thinks that when God declared to Moses, that he had not made known his name Jehovah, he did not mean, that former patriarchs had been ignorant of him, as God the creator, the self-existing; but that he had not revealed this name, which so well expresses his nature, and by which he would afterwards be invoked; and that where Moses uses the name when speaking of times prior to this appearance, (Gen. iv. 26; xiv. 12; xv. 7,) he uses it by way of anticipation, and because, at the time when he wrote, the Jews used the name Jehovah; that is, he followed the custom of his own time, not that of the patriarchs.

The Jews, after the captivity of Babylon, out of superstitious respect for this holy name, ceased to repeat it, and forgot its true pronunciation. Calmet is of opinion that the LXX were accustmomed not to pronounce it, but punning it out in our English, the Lord. Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius testify, that in their time the Jews left the name of Jehovah written in their copies with Samaritan characters, instead of writing it in the common Chaldee or Hebrew, which shows how the sacred name, and their fear lest strangers should discover and misuse it. These precautions, however, did not hinder the heathen from misapplying it frequently, as we learn from Origen and others. The modern Hebrews affirm that Moses, by virtue of the word Jehovah engraved on his rod, performed all his miracles; and that Christ, while in the temple, stole the ineffable name, which he put into his thigh between the skin and the flesh, and by its power accomplished all the prodigies imputed to him. Facts which they add, that we might be able to do as much as they did, if we could attain the perfect pronunciation of this name. They flatter themselves that the Messiah will teach them this mighty secret. The Tetragrammaton, or four-lettered name, is called by Josephus, τὸ μέγα τῶν πλαστῶν ὀνόματα—"the sacred letters, the slandering name of God" and Caligula, in Philo, swear to him and the ambassadors his associ-
JEHOVAH MESEI, Jehovah my banner. Among the most perplexing passages of Scripture is Exod. xvii. 15, 16, "And Moses built an altar, and called its name Jehovah Nishe, in acknowledgment of the Lord hath sworn with a solemn oath, but the Hebrew is; because the land of Canaan was given to the Israelites, and not to be desecrated.

JEHOVAH SHALOM, Jehovah of peace, or of success, a name given by Gideon to an altar which he built in a place where an angel of Jehovah had appeared to him, and saluted him by saying, "Peace be to thee," Judges vi. 24. Probably the name may be taken, (1.) to Jehovah of peace, that is, taking peace for general welfare, to the divine Protector, (2.) as the words are usually rendered, Jehovah shall send peace; that is, we expect prosperity under the auspices of Jehovah. The phrase appears to have become, in after-ages, a kind of proverb, as probably was the case with all those remarkable titles, which are come down to us.

JEHOVAH SHAMMAH, Jehovah is there; that is, God's city; Jehovah's city; a name given by Ezekiel to a future holy city, which he describes in the close of his prophecies, (Ezek. xxxi. 18.)

JEHOVAH TZIDEKENU, Jehovah our righteousness, Jer. xxxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16, margin. In the first of these passages we read of a branch, a king, called the Lord our righteousness; in the second verse we read, "This is the name whereby she [Jerusalem] shall be called, the Lord our righteousness."

JEHOIZADAK, son and successor of Seraiah, high-priest of the Jews, (1 Chron. vi. 14, 15; Ezra iii. 2) though it does not appear that he ever exercised the sacred functions. He died at Babylon; but his son Joshua, or Jesus, returned from the captivity, and assumed the sacerdotal dignity, after rebuilding the temple, (Ezra iii. 2; x. 18, &c.)

J. JEHU, son of Hanani, was sent by God to Baasha, king of Israel, to predict punishment for his misdeeds, (1 Kings xi. 14, 15."

The Vulgate adds that Baasha, surrounded by the walls of the city, shall the dogs eat; and him that death of his in the fields, shall the fowls of the air eat." The Vulgate adds that Baasha, incensed at this message, put Jehu to death; but the Hebrew says, Jehu having declared to Baasha what the Lord had pronounced against him, and that the Lord would treat his house as he had treated the house of Jeroboam; for this he slew him; leaving it doubtful whether Bas-JEHU, or the Lord slew Baasha. What renders the latter more credible, is, that about thirty years after the death of Baasha, we find Jehu, son of Hanani, again sent by God to Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xix. 1, &c. Some think there were two Jehus; but the latter is called Jezebel; but Car- met is of opinion that in the passage above quoted, the death of Baasha, not that of Jehu, is intimated. It is said in chap. xx. 34, that the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, first and last, are written in the book of Jehu, son of Hanani, who is mentioned in the book of the Kings of Israel; whence it appears, that the prophets employed themselves in recording the transactions of their times, and that what Jehu had written of this kind, was thought worthy to be inserted in the Memoirs, in which the several events in every prince's reign were registered.

II. JEHU, son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, captain of the troops of Joram, king of Israel, was appointed by God to reign over Israel, and to punish the sins of the house of Ahah. The Lord had ordered Elisha to anoint Jehu, (1 Kings xix. 16.) which order was executed by one of the sons of the prophets, 2 Kings ix. 1, &c. The Lord declared his will to Elisha concerning Jehu, ante A. D. 907, but he was not anointed till twenty-three years after the order given to Elisha. Jehu was at Ramoth-Gilead, besieging the citadel of that place, with the army of Israel, when a young prophet entered, who took him aside, and when they were alone, poured oil on his head, saying, "Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee king over Israel; thou shalt extirpate the house of Ahab, and avenge the blood of the prophets shed by Jezebel." The prophet instantly opened the door and fled; and Jehu, returning to his officers, declared to them what had passed, upon which they rose up, and each taking his clock, they made a kind of throne, and sounding the trumpets, cried, "Long live king Jehu!" ver. 11—13.

Jehu instantly quitted the army, in order to surprise Joram, who was at Jezreel. The king came out to meet him, riding in his chariot, with Ahaziah, king of Judah. Joram said, "Is it peace, Jehu?" who answered, "What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" Joram immediately exclaimed, "We are betrayed!" and Jehu, drawing his bow, smote him between his shoulders, and pierced his heart. He then commanded his body to be thrown into the portion of Naboth, the Jezreelite, to fulfil the prediction of the prophet Elijah, ver. 15—16.

Jehu afterwards went to Jezreel, and as he entered the city, Jezebel, who was at a window, said to him, "Can he who has killed his master hope for peace?" Jehu immediately commanded some eunuchs, who were above, to throw her out of the window, which they did, and she was trampled to death under the horses' feet. Her corpse was afterwards devoured by dogs, so that when Jehu sent to have her buried, they found only parts and bones, 2 Kings ix. 30, 31. After this, Jehu commanded the inhabitants of Samaria to slay all the late king's children, besides which he slew all his relations and friends, the great men of his court, and his priests, who were at Jez- reel. On his way to Samaria, he met the relations of Ahaziah, king of Judah, going to Jezreel to salute the late king and queen's children, of whose death they were ignorant. Jehu ordered them to be massacred; and proceeding to the city, he slew all who remained of Ahaziah's family. After this, he collected all the priests and prophets of Baal, as if for a great festival, and had the whole of them massacred. The statue of Baal was pulled down, broken, and burnt; and the temple itself destroyed, and converted into a draught-house, chap. x. 15—27.

The Lord promised Jehu that his children should sit on the throne of David for evermore, and that there should be no one to overthrow them; but Scripture accuses him of following the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nebat; and the prophet Hosea (i. 4.) threatens him, "Yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezebel on the house of Jehu." He had, indeed, been the instrument of God's vengeance on the house of Ahah, but in what he had done he had been impelled by the spirit of animosity and ambition. He had followed his own passion, rather than the will of God. He had not kept within due bounds; and God, therefore, while he rewarded his obedience, punished his injustice, ambition, and idolatry, and the blood unjustly spilt by him. He reigned twenty-eight years over Israel, and was succeeded by Jehoahaz, his son, 2 Kings x. 35, 36. The reign of Jehu was perplexed with war against Hazael king of Syria, who ravaged the frontiers of Israel, and wasted the whole country east of Jordan, and the tribes of Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben.

JEKABZEEL, a village belonging to the tribe of Judah, after the captivity; Neh. xi. 55.

JEPHTHAH, judge of Israel, successor to Jair, was a son of Gilead by one of his concubines, Judg. xi. 1, 2. Being driven from his father's house, Jephthah retired into the land of Tob, where he became captain of a band of ravers. At this time the Israelites beyond Jordan, being oppressed by the Ammonites, offered Jephthah the command. He reproached them with their injustice to him when he was forced from his father's house; but agreed to succour them, on condition that, at the end of the war, they would acknowledge him for their prince. Having been acknowledged prince of Israel, in an assembly of the people, Jephthah sent a message of defiance to the king of the Ammonites, assembled his troops, and afterwards marched against him, vowing to the Lord, that if he were successful, he would offer up a burnt-offering, and whatsoever should first come out of his house to meet him. He vanquished the Ammonites, and ravaged their land; but as he returned to his house, his only daughter came out to meet him, with timbrels and dances, and thereby became the subject of his vow. The tribe of Ephraim, jealous of Jephthah, passed the Jordan in a tumultuous manner, and, complaining that he had not invited them to share in the war, threatened to fire his house. Jephthah answered, that he had sent to desire their assistance, but that they did not come. But he did more than reply; he assembled the people of Gilead, gave the Ephraimites battle, and defeated them. The conquerors made them themselves masters of the fords of Jordan, and when an Ephraimite desired to go over, the Gileadites asked, "Art thou an Ephraimite?" If he replied, "No!" they said, Pronounce, then, Shibboleth, (which signifies an ear of corn;) but if, instead of Shibboleth, he said Sibboleth, without an aspiration, he was immediately killed. Forty-two thousand men of Ephraim fell on this occasion.

Jephthah judged Israel six years, and was buried in Mizpeh, in Gilead, Judg. xii. 7. Paul (Heb. xi. 32) places him among the saints of the Old Testament, whose faith had distinguished them. The fable of Jephigenia, daughter of Agamemnon, seems to have been borrowed from the history of Jephthah and his daughter.
JEPHTHAH’S VOW. There is something so extraordinary in Jephthah’s vow, that notwithstanding Scripture mentions it in clear terms, yet difficulties perplex commentators. The Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah, says the sacred writer, (Judg. xi. 32.) and he judged Israel a day or two. He made no vows to gather troops, and form an army against the Ammonites. “And he made a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord’s, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.” He does not say the first thing, the first animal, but—the first person; he does not say, barely, that he will vow, consecrate, or offer him to the Lord, but adds that he will offer him up for a burnt-offering. This is the true meaning of the text, and the fathers so explained it. Several modern interpreters, however, translate thus: “And the thing which shall go forth out of the doors of my house when I return in peace from making war with the Ammonites, that shall be the Lord’s, and I will offer it up to him for a burnt-offering.” Jephthah, they remark, vows to God whatever should come forth to meet him, whether man or beast, but not in the same number; that is, if it be a man or woman, I will consecrate him (or her) to the Lord; if it be an unclean animal, I will kill or redeem him. Would he have dared say, “should he have offered a dog?” Could Jephthah be ignorant, that the sacrifice of human victims was odious to God? Would not the principal men of the nation, and the priests, have opposed such a sacrifice? Supposing that he had devoted his daughter, was he ignorant of the law which allowed him to redeem her for a moderate sum of money? “He who shall have vowed his life to the Lord, shall pay the price that shall be ordained: a man fifty shekels; a woman thirty.” &c. Lev. xxvii. 3. But thus it is replied, (1.) That this interpretation wrests the meaning of the text, which says expressly, “He who should come out to meet him should be the Lord’s, and should be offered up for a burnt-sacrifice.” (2.) No one attempts to justify either the precipitate vow of Jephthah, or his literal execution of it. It is acknowledged, that the vow was not according to the law; and that God did not require such a victim. Jephthah had done much better, had he asked forgiveness, and imposed on himself, with the advice of the high-priest, some penalty proportioned to his fault. (3.) It is objected, that if the law permits, not of things devoted by man, but of such only as are devoted simply; in the former case they are not redeemable. “No devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast . . . shall be sold or redeemed . . . . none devoted which shall be devoted of men shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death,” Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. (4.) The fathers and many learned commentators have found no difficulty in acknowledging, that Jephthah did really offer up his daughter for a burnt-sacrifice. Josephus (Antiq. lib. v. cap. 9.) expressly says he did so. The Chaldee paraphrast says, “He sacrificed her without consulting the high-priest;” and that “if he had consulted him, he would have redeemed his daughter with a sum of money.” Ambrose, Augustine, and others, disapprove the conduct of Jephthah, and say, that in this particular, he did what was forbidden by the law. Jerome and Chrysostom believe, that God permitted the performance of it, to punish the imprudent father for his temerity.

This is the substance of Calmet’s remarks on the subject; whether they are satisfactory, must be left to the determination of the reader. We may observe, however, that the question, in some measure, depends on the acceptance of the Hebrew particle (ו) in verse 31. The text may, without doing it violence, be rendered, “Whatever comes to meet me, I will devote to the Lord; and I will offer up to him a burnt-sacrifice;” although the most obvious rendering is, “And I will offer up to him that which comes out of my house,” as Calmet. We ought further to notice, that Jephthah’s rashness had time to subside, since his daughter went two months into the country to bewail her virginity, (it is not said, her sacrifice,) which seems to mean her consecration to God, which obliged her to remain single, without posterity. Moreover, the Israelite women went yearly four times a year to mourn for the daughter of Jephthah; to lament her seclusion from the world, and the hardship of her situation, cut off from domestic life and enjoyment. Now, if in the course of two months nobody could have suggested to Jephthah a reason for his daughter, yet surely she must have been alive, though dead to him and his family, (she being his only child,) and to the world, by her seclusion—if the Israelite women went to ensole for or with her. It should be observed, also, that it is not said afterwards, that he sacrificed her, but, “he did with her according to his vow;” and it is added, she knew no man. If she were sacrificed, this remark is frivolous; but if she were consecrated to perpetual virginity, the idea coincides with the visits of the Israelite women. If there were at this time women attendants at the tabernacle, as Calmet supposes, might not the daughter of Jephthah have joined their company?

prophecies. They turn on the sins of Judah, and their punishment by Nebuchadnezzar.

The prophet, as we have already observed, was the most active and persevering of all the minor prophets, and he is placed after the first part of the book, during the last years of the Babylonian captivity. He lived and preached during the last years of the first Babylonian captivity, and his prophecies were written during that period. His prophecies were prophetic in the sense that they foresaw the destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonian captivity.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, and took prisoners Jehoiakim and others, among whom was Daniel. He designed to carry them to Babylon; but set Jehoiakim at liberty. In this year Jeremiah again positively foretold the captivity of the Jews, and its duration for seventy years, after which he declared that God would punish the Chaldeans and Babylonians in their turn. In this year also, the prophet was ordered to write what had been revealed to him, from the thirteenth year of Josiah to this time, chap. xxxvi. He dictated his prophecies to Baruch, and directed him to read them in the temple, himself being in fetters by the king's command. Baruch went to the temple, and on the great day of expiation read, before the concourse of people, the unwelcome predictions of Jeremiah. The king was informed of the occurrence, and Baruch was examined concerning the manner in which this volume was dictated by Jeremiah. The king heard three or four columns of the prophecies read; when, being enraged, he cut the manuscript with a pen-knife, and threw it into the fire, and commanded Baruch and Jeremiah to be seized. Jeremiah received orders to dictate a second time to Baruch, what had been thus burnt; and God added many new things.

In the seventh year, the prophet, by God's order, brought the Rechabites into the temple, and presented them with wine, which they declined drinking, because Jonadab, their ancestor, had forbidden them. Jeremiah took occasion from this circumstance to reproach the Jews with their want of submission to God's laws, while the Rechabites showed so much regard to the command of their ancestor. After this, Jehoiakim was killed, and thrown by the Chaldeans into a common sewer. His son Jehoiachin succeeded him, and reigned only three months; when he, too, was taken by the Chaldeans, and carried captive to Babylon. Zedekiah succeeded Jehoiachin.

The countries of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Tyre, and Sidon sent ambassadors to Zedekiah in the beginning of his reign. To each of these ambassadors, Jeremiah gave a yoke to carry to their masters, with orders to tell them from God, that whosoever should refuse submission to Nebuchadnezzar, should be compelled to yield it. He said the same to Zedekiah; and as the prophet wore on his neck, hinting to the Israelites the approach of captivity, Hananiah, a false prophet, laid hold of them, and breaking them publicly, said, "Thus will the Lord break the yoke which Nebuchadnezzar would impose on the Jews." As Jeremiah was sitting, God secretly directed him to return to Hananiah, and tell him that instead of the wooden yoke which he had broken, Nebuchadnezzar would put on them (the Jews) another of iron. The prophet added, "Since you (Hananiah) abuse the name of God with your lips, you shall die before the end of this year." He died within two months, chap. xxviii.

In the reign of Zedekiah, as Calmet supposes, Jeremiah received God's orders to go to some cavern near the Euphrates, and hide a linen girdle. Some time afterwards he returned, and found the girdle rotted; prefiguring thereby God's desertion of Judah, which heretofore he had valued as a girdle. In the fourth year of the same prince, Seraiah, Baruch's brother, being sent to Babylon, the prophet of Nebuchadnezzar the restitution of the vessels belonging to the temple, Jeremiah gave him his prophecies against Babylon, with directions to read them to the captive Jews; and then to fasten them to a stone, and throw them into the Euphrates, ch. 1. 16—21, 61. He wrote again to the same captives, by Gemariah, whom the king sent to Babylon, advising them to settle in that country, and to build houses, and marry, because their captivity was to last seventy years. Shechaniah at Babylon wrote to Zephaniah, one of the chief priests, and reproved him for permitting Jeremiah to write these things. Zephaniah read the letter to Jeremiah, and the prophet wrote again to the captives of Babylon, and foretold to Shechaniah, that he should die in captivity, and that neither he, nor any of his posterity, should see the deliverance of Judah.

While Nebuchadnezzar was besieging Jerusalem, in the tenth year of Zedekiah, Jeremiah, who was continually prophesying adversities, was imprisoned in the court of the palace. Hanameel, the son of his uncle, visited him, and told him, that the right of redeeming a certain field at Anathoth was his. Jeremiah bought the field, sealed the writings, and paid the money for it. He committed the writings to Baruch, to keep them, remarking that the time would come when the land would be again cultivated and inhabited. During the siege, the king and the inhabitants of Jerusalem liberated their slaves, because it was a sacred year; but Nebuchadnezzar, having withdrawn, to oppose the king of Egypt, who advanced to the relief of the city, the king and people seized again their slaves, regardless of their word, or of the law of God, for which they were terribly threatened by the prophet. After the siege was succeed, Jerusalem was restored, and Zedekiah recommended himself to his prayers. The prophet sent the king word, that Nebuchadnezzar would return against the city, that he would take it, and reduce it to ashes. When he was retiring to Anathoth, the place of his activity, the guards seized him as a deserter, and the princes threw him into a dungeon, where his life was in great danger. Zedekiah some time afterwards released him, and ordered bread for him every day while there should be any in the city.

Nebuchadnezzar returned to the siege, and the prophet continuing to foretell calamities, the great men of Jerusalem complained to Zedekiah, who permitted them to do with him what they pleased. The king was afraid of death, and decided to send Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon, but he must have soon perished, if Ebedmenechel had not informed the king, who commanded him to be taken out. He was kept in the court of the prison till the city was taken, (chap. xxxviii.) when with other captives he was brought to Babylon. Nebuzaradan gave him the choice of going to Babylon, or remaining in Judea. The prophet chose the latter, and went to Gedaliah at Mizpah, where they lived in security, when Ishmael, son of Nathaniah, murdered Gedaliah, chap. xi. 12.

Johanann having collected together a number of Jews at Bethel, they consulted Jeremiah, whether they should stay in Judea, or retire into Egypt. The prophet desired time to consult God; and after ten days he answered them, that if they went into Egypt, they would there perish by the sword, famine, and pestilence; but that if they continued in Judah, God would preserve them. The chief of the people as- sured, that this answer proceeded not from God, but from Baruch, to divert them from going into Egypt. They resolved therefore to proceed, and compelled Jeremiah and Baruch to accompany them. Here the prophet uttered several predictions against the Jews and Egyptians; among others, that Nebuchadnezzar would invade the country, and destroy the very place where he would set up his tent; that God would give the king of Egypt into the hands of the Chaldeans, as he had given Pharaoh, chap. xli. 9. The place of Jeremiah's death is uncertain. Several of the ancients maintain, that he was put to death at Taphath in Egypt, by the Jews, who were enraged at his enemies and reproaches; and they explain Heb. xi. 27. ("They were stoned,") as relating to his death. Some think he returned into Judea; others, that he died in Babylon.

In addition to the book of Jeremiah's prophecies, we have his Lamentations, in five chapters, which are mournful songs, composed on occasion of those calamities which befell Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. He also wrote lamentations on the death of Josiah, (2 Chron. xxxv. 25.) but they have not come down to us. He is said by some also to be the author of Ps. cxxxvi.; and some believe that he compiled the two books of Kings; because the last chapter of one of these books is composed of his prophecies in the same with the last chapter of the second book of Kings. But the reason of this seems to be, that the last chapter of Jeremiah was taken from the second book of Kings, as a supplement to his prophecy. Jerome observes, that Jeremiah's style is lower and more neglected than that of the others of the prophets, (Isaiah's, for example, which ascribes to the prophet's birth and education, chap. vii.) as also to Anathoth, a village or little commandery town. Other critics discover a sublimity and grand- ness in his style. Grotius thinks, that his talent lies principally in touching and exciting the tender passions; and certainly, the Lamentations are a masterpiece in this way. See LAMENTATIONS.

Mr. Harmer (vol. ii. p. 276.) has some remarks on the double evidences of Jeremiah's purchases, (chap. xxxiii.) which passage he supposes he has illustrated, by an extract from Chardin. His words are these: "Both the writings were in the hands of Jeremiah, and at his disposal; (ver. 14.) for what purposes, then, were duplicates made? To those unacquainted with the mode of conducting external business, it must have been a question of some difficulty. "The open, or unsealed writing," says an eminent commentator, "was either a copy of the sealed deed; or else a certificate of the witnesses, in whose presence the deed or purchase was signed and sealed. But it still recurs, of what use was a copy that was to be buried in the same carbon vas- sel, and run exactly the same risk with the original? —Why were they separate writings, and why was one sealed, and not the other? Mr. H. then quotes from Chardin: "After a contract is made, it is kept by the party himself, not the notary; and they cause a copy to be made, signed by the notary alone, which is shown on proper occasions, and never exhibit the other." This illustration certainly leaves much to be wished for; as appears by quoting the passage: "I bought the field, subscribed the evidences, sealed it, took witnesses, and weighed the money in the balances. I took the evidence of the purchase, that was sealed according to law and custom, and that which was open—I gave the evidence to Baruch, and I charged Baruch, Take these evidences, the sealed and the open, and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days; for thus saith the Lord, Houses, and fields, and vineyards, shall be possessed again in this land," ver. 44. "Men shall buy fields for moneys, and subscribe evidences, and seals thereof for them, in the land of Benjamin." The incident in the fourth illustration, perhaps, from the Gentoo law of boundaries, and limits, which is thus translated:—"Dust, or bones, or se-seas, (bran,) or cinders, or scraps of earthenware, or the hairs of a cow's tail, or the seed of the cotton plant; all these things above mentioned, being put into an earthen pot filled to the brim, a man must privately bury upon the confines of his own boundary; and there preserve stones also, or bricks, or sea sand; either of these three things may be buried by way of landmark of the limits; for all these things, upon remaining a long time in the ground, are not liable to rot, or become putrid; any other thing, also, which will remain a long time in the ground, without becoming rotten or putrid, may be buried for the same purpose. Those persons who by any of these methods can show the line of their boundaries, shall acquaint their sons with the respective landmarks of those boundaries; and, in the same manner, those sons also shall explain the signification of their limits to their children,—If all persons would act in this manner, there could be no dispute concerning limits and boundaries." Might not Jeremia-iah's earthen pot, which would last, "without becoming rotten," many days, be destined to conceal the purchase-deeds of this field, to be buried nowhere in the field itself, if possible; in order for its preservation, that it might be, at a future period, an evidence of the purchase?—This seems to be strengthened by the consideration, that, at the future period foretold by the prophet, the inhabitants should be restored to their own lands, and in order to resume them, they should seek after such concealed tokens of their forefathers' possession; at which time, being able to describe the nature of such vessels, their situation and their contents, the identity of the claimants, and their families, with the truth of their claims, should appear undeniable. If this pot were buried in the city of Jerusalem, the end would be answered, though not so completely, since Baruch might inform the proper heirs where to seek it, and how to describe its contents.

We may remark, further, on the method of sealing, that the word here rendered seal does not resignify this word, or this form of sealing, only, but to close up, to secure, by some solid or glutinous matter. So, Deut. xxxii. 34, "Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up (closed up, secured, for preservation) among my treasures?" In Job xxxvii. 14, a seal, is mentioned as being made of clay; which, indeed, is customary in the East. Suppose, then, this deed were enclosed in a roll of some strong substance, pitched over, to protect it from water, or surrounded with a coat of firm clay, for the same purpose, and placed at the bottom of an earthen vessel; while the writing thus not enclosed, or coated over, was laid among a quantity of dry matters, "stones, bricks, or sea-sand," above the vessel. In this case, both, or very probably one, of them in an earthen vessel, well closed, and carefully buried, might last a much longer period than seventy years; and the peculiarity of its contents might be much longer remembered by those to whom it was communicated, and who were concerned in claiming the property. Whoever has been conversant with the history of our civil wars, and of later times, must recollect many instances of posts of money and other treasures found in such good condition, that bad they been accompanied by papers, they would have been legible, and well preserved. Now, as Jeremiah could not himself go out of his prison, he delivers these deeds to Baruch, for the purpose of their preservation from the general pillage, burning, &c. of the city, when taken; in which otherwise they had little chance of escaping total destruction; and, probably, for the purpose of being buried, as above described.

JERICHO, a city of Benjamin, about 20 miles E. N. E. from Jerusalem, and 6 from Jordan, Josh. xviii. 21. This was the first city in Canaan taken by Joshua, (Josh. ii. 1, &c.) who sent spies thither, that were received by Rahab, and preserved lives of the king. Joshua received God's orders to besiege Jericho, soon after his passage over Jordan, and perhaps on the evening before, or on the day of the first passover, which the Hebrews celebrated in Canaan, chap. vi. 1, &c. The manner of the siege was very extraordinary. God commanded them once a day for seven successive days to march round the city. The soldiers marched first, (probably beyond the reach of the enemy's arrows,) and after them the priest, and elders, with trumpets at the head. During the first six days the people continued in profound silence; but on the seventh, Joshua commanding them to shout, they all exerted their voices; and the walls being overthrown, they entered the city, every man in the place opposite to him. The city being devoted, (see ANATHEMA,) they set fire to it, and consecrated all the gold, silver, and brass. Joshua then said, "Cursed be the man before the Lord, who shall rebuild Jericho." Hiel of Bethel, about 907 years after Baruch, rebuilt it in the neighborhood of the original site. Josephus distinguishes these two places when he says, that in his time, near ancient Jericho, which was destroyed by Joshua, there was a fountain which abounded with water; and when Hiel of Bethel had rebuilt old Jericho, no one scurped to dwell there. Herod built a very beautiful palace there; and our Saviour wrought some miracles on a visit to the city.

In the article BARNABITES, we have ventured to associate Jericho with other towns producing abortion; and to what is there said may be added the testimony of Josephus, who says, (Bell. Jud. iv. 8.3.) "Near Jericho is a very plentiful spring; it rises near the old city; of which spring there is a preserthat, in former times, it did not only make the fruits of the earth end of the trees to decay, but also the offspring of women; and was universally deleterious; . . . . but this was amended by Elias . . . . these waters have now so great a virtue, that wherever they are conveyed, they produce very speedy ripeness." To these observations on the nature of the soil of Jericho, we may add, that the rabbins mention another place in the mountains of JERicho, which they call Cafchar-decarinae, because "unless the women departed from this town to some other place, they could not bring forth male children,"—meaning they were liable to abortions. (Hieroc.

Taimith, fol. 69. l.) The second city in Judæa: in its royal palace Herod died; it had also a hippodrome and an amphitheatre. There is a tradition in the Jerusalem Talmud, that there were at least twelve thousand priests at Jericho, ready to supply any deficiency that might occur at Jerusalem. (Comp. Luke x. 31, 32.) The wheat at Jericho was gathered before the first fruits at Jerusalem; as the productions of this neighborhood were much forwarder in respect of ripeness.

D’Arriau thus describes the state of Jericho in his time; (A.D. 1659) but it is likely that the village was visited, and the same that is described by more modern travellers, was at some distance from the ancient town; not a vestige of which now remains, unless some tumulus, discovered by Mr. Buckingham, three or four miles nearer to Jerusalem, may be supposed to mark the course of its walls. "After having travell’d a quarter of a league in the plain, we encamp’d near to the gardens of Jericho, by the side of a small brook; and while our supper was preparing, we walked in the gardens, and among the ruins of Jericho. This very ancient city is now desolate, and consists of only about fifty poor houses in bad condition, wherein the laborers who cultivate the gardens shelter themselves. The plain around is extremely fertile; the soil is middling fat; but it is watered by several rivulets, which flow into the Jordan. Notwithstanding these advantages, only the gardens adjacent to the town are cultivated. We saw here abundance of those trees which are called in Arabic Zacoum; they are furnished with thorns like acacias, and resemble bushes. They bear fruits the size of large plums; the stone of which resembles a rough-sid'd melon. These are pounded, and the kernel yields an oil, which is a kind of balasm, perfectly good against bruises, cold tumors, nervous contractions, and rheumatism. We visited the fountain of the prophet Elias, which, for many ages, has furnished water for the gardens; it was formerly bitter, but is now sweet, and has a charming taste. The head of this water is enclosed in a basin of a triangular shape, of which each side is about three fathoms in length. It is lined with wrought stone, and is even paved in parts. There are two niches in one of its sides, which is higher than the other, by which the water issues, in a stream sufficient to turn a mill. It is said that several sources discharge themselves into the same basin; but their depth prevents them from being explored. In returning to our tents we passed by some ruins on the side of a hill, where is a cistern and some buildings, with a channel which conveys to the Jordan the waters of a spring which issues on the mountains of Quarantania." Maundrell calls Jericho "a poor, nasty village of the Arabes." The Plain of Jericho, in which the city lay, extends from Scythopolis to the bay of the Dead sea, and is overhung on all sides by ridges of barren and rugged mountains. The road from the city to Jerusalem is through a series of rocky defiles, and the surrounding scenery is of the most gloomy and forbidding aspect. "The whole of this road is held to be the most dangerous in Palestine; and, indeed, the very aspect of the scenery is sufficient, on the one hand, to tempt to robbery and murder, and, on the other, to occasion a dread of it in those who pass that way. The bold projecting mass of rocks, the dark shadows in which everything lies buried由此, the towering height of the cliffs above, and the forbidding desolation which everywhere reigns around, present a picture that is quite in harmony throughout all its parts. With what propriety the beholder can choose this spot, as the scene of that delightful tale of compassion recorded by St. Luke, x. 30-34. One must be among these wild and gloomy solitudes, surrounded by an armed band, and feel the impatience of the traveller, who rushes on to catch a new view at every post and turn; one must be alarmed at the very stamp of the horses' hoofs, resounding through the caverned rocks, and at the savage shards of the footmen, scarcely less loud than the echoing thunder, produced by the discharge of their pieces in the valleys; one must witness all this upon the spot, before that the full force and beauty of the admirable story of the good Samaritan can be perceived. Here pilage, wounds, and death would be accompanied with double terror, from the frightful aspect of every thing around. Here, the unfeeling act of passing by a fellow creature in distress, as the priest and Levite are said to have done, strikes one with horror, as an act almost more than inhuman. And here, too, the compassion of the good Samaritan is doubly virtuous, from the purity of the motive which must have led to it in a spot where no eyes were fixed on him to draw forth the performance of any duty, and from the bravery which was necessary to admit of a man exposing himself by day, to the dastardly fate to which his good fellow creature was exposing himself." (Buckingham's Travels, p. 269, 269, 4to.)

JERIMOTh or JEREMIOTh, one of the warriors who came to David to Ziklag, 1 Chron. xii. 8. He was the son of Becher, a Benjaminite, viii. 8.—Also the name of several other persons.

1. JEROBOAM, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, is often characterized in Scripture as the author of the schism and idolatry. His mother was a widow, named Zeruah, and was born at Zereda, in Ephraim. Jeroboam was bold and enterprising, and Solomon gave him a commission to levy the taxes of Ephraim and Manasseh. As he went out of Jerusalem, the head of the prophet Ahijah met him, having on a new cloak, 1 Kings xi. 20, which he rent in twelve pieces, saying to Jeroboam, "Take ten to thyself; for the Lord will rend the kingdom of Solomon, and give ten tribes to thee," 1 Kings xi. 26, 27. But Jeroboam and the ten tribes were not content with the notice by which he was disappointed, soon began to incite the people to revolt; but Solomon having intelligence of his designs, he fled into Egypt, and there continued till the death of the king. His successor, Rehoboam, behaving in a haughty and menacing manner, ten of the ten tribes separated from the house of David; and Jeroboam, returning from Egypt, they invited him among them to a general assembly, in which they appointed him king over Israel. He fixed his residence at Shechem, 1 Kings xi. 40, 41, 42. Forgetting the fidelity due to God, who had given him the kingdom, Jeroboam resolved to make two golden calves, in imitation, probably, of the god Apis; to place one at Dan, the other at Bethel. "Henceforth," said he to his people, "go no more to Jerusalem," chap. xii. (See CALVANS.) He appointed a solemn feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, to dedicate his new altar, and to consecrate his golden calves. Jeroboam himself went up to the altar to offer incense and sacrifices; (1 Kings xii.) and just at that time a man of God (generally believed to be
When Judea was made a Roman province, under the governor of Syria, the Romans kept a garrison in Jerusalem. And when Titus entered the city, he found it in a state of great disorder. The Jews, by their besieging this fortress, had forced the city to destroy the Roman garrison. The year following (A.D. 70) Titus besieged the city, and reduced it to a heap of ruins. Josephus remarks, that Titus commanded his soldiers to demolish the whole city, except three of the largest and most beautiful towers—those of Phasael, Hippicus, and Mariamne, which he was desirous of preserving, as a monument of the valor and power of the Romans. He also left the city walls, on the western side, as a rampart to the Roman camp and troops. The rest of the city was so completely levelled, that it scarcely appeared to have been inhabited. Jewish authors assure us, that Terentius Rufus, whom Titus left in command, ploughed up the grounds over which the temple had stood, that it might not be rebuilt; the Roman laws prohibited the rebuilding of places where this ceremony had been performed, without permission from the senate. It is generally believed, however, that this was not done till after that revolt of the Jews under Adrian, down to whose time a number of Jews certainly remained in the city. See ADRIA.

The city of Jerusalem is situated in 31° 50' north latitude, and 35° 20' east longitude; about twenty-five miles west of Jordan, and forty-two east of the Mediterranean; 102 miles south of Damascus, and 150 north of the Elamite gulf of the Red Sea. It was built on four hills, called Sion, Acra, Moriah, and Bezetha. Indeed, the whole foundation was a high rock, formerly called Moriah, or Vision, because it could be seen afar off, especially on the south, Gen. xxii. 4. The mountain is a rocky limestone hill, with steep ascents on every side, except on the north; surrounded with a deep valley; again encompassed with hills, in the form of an amphitheatre, Ps. cxlv. 2. The accurate and minute account of Josephus is the highest authority to which we can resort for ascertaining the form and limits of the Jewish capital. It is as follows: "The city was built on two hills, which are opposite to each other, having a valley to divide them asunder; at which valley the corresponding rows of houses on both hills terminate. Of these hills, that which contains the upper city is much higher, and in length not distant from Mount Moriah, which was called the 'citadel,' by king David: he was father of that Solomon who built this temple at the first; but it is by us called 'the upper market-place.' But the other hill, which is called Mount Sion, at the lower city, is of the shape of the moon when she is horns; over against this there was a third hill, but naturally lower than Acra, and parted, formerly, from the other by a broad valley. In the time when the Asmonæans reigned, they filled up that valley with earth, and had a mind to join the city to the temple. They then took off part of the height of Acra, and reduced it to a less elevation than it was before, that the temple might be superior to it. Now the valley of the chesemongers, as it was called, was of such a degree distinguished the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, and extended as far as Siloam; for that is the name of a fountain which hath sweet water in it, and this in great plenty also. But on the outskirt of these hills are surrounded by deep valleys, and, by reason of the precipices belonging to them on both sides, are every where impassable."

He afterwards adds, "As the city grew more populous, it gradually crept beyond its old limits, and those parts of it that stood northward of the temple, and joined that hill to the city, made it considerably larger, and occasioned the temple to spring up, as it is in nuns. the fourth, and is called bejetha,' to be inhabited also. It lies over against the tower Antonia, but is divided from it by a deep valley, which was dug on purpose. This now built part of the city was called 'bejetha' in our language, which, if interpreted in the Grecian language, may be called 'the new city.' " (Jewish Wars, book v. ch. 4.)

This account describes the gradual extension of the holy city, from the time when the Jebusites were de-possessed, till the foundation of the northern walls was laid by Herod Agrippa. It is evident that the old city was built upon "aera," and the "strong hold of Sion" (2 Sam. v. 7.) upon the hill bearing that name; both of which were taken from the Jebusites by David. After having possessed himself of these important places, this magnificent prince appropriated the latter for the royal residence, and named it "the city of David." The extent of this "upper city," as it is called by Josephus, seems to be pointed out by an expression in 2 Sam. v. 9: "David built round about, from Millo inward." Now, whether by "Millo" we understand, with some critics, the "house of Millo," which stood on the north-east of mount Sion, or with others, the valley which divided the upper and the lower city, and which was filled up by Solomon, and called Millo, the meaning still appears to be, that David built from one side of mount Sion quite round to the opposite part.

Moriah, properly so called, which is the third hill of Josephus, lay on the eastern side of Jerusalem, over against mount "aera." This hill, on which Solomon erected the temple, was originally divided from aera by a broad valley, subsequently filled up by the Ammonians, and thus joined to the lower city. The valley which divided Sion from aera and Moriah is called, by Josephus, "the valley of Cheesemongers," and extended as far as Sилоam. Across this valley Solomon appears to have raised a causeway, leading from the royal palace on mount Sion to the temple on mount Moriah. The way was not level, but was an easy ascent and descent from one mountain to the other. Hence we read of "the ascent by which Solomon went up to the house of the Lord," and of "the causeway," or "going up."

On the east of the city, and stretching from north to south, and from one mountain to the other, the City of David, or Goliath, But so much has the City moved in that direction, that it now stands in its very centre.

When the city of Jerusalem became the capital of the kingdom, and the chosen place of Jehovah's worship, every mean was used to render it improveable, by high walls, mossy gates, and towers of observation and annoyance. But of its fortifications we have no particulars extant till after the captivity, when Nehemiah recorded the portions, which the several individuals engaged in the work, repaired. This document being of great importance in settling the circuit of the city, and its principal gates, we shall attempt to follow the patriotic governor in his description. Beginning with the sheep gate, (chap. iii. 1.)
which was on the east side of the city, in the neighborhood of Bethesda, and through which the sheep destined for sacrifice were driven to the temple, we travel along the east wall, with our faces to the north,
Having given a slight sketch of the history and topography of the city of Jerusalem, we proceed to a more minute examination of its ichnography and antiquities, as well as of some historical incidents connected with it.

The alterations made by time on the face of the earth, though considerable, are not comparable to those produced by the labors of man; mountains, rocks, and for the most part rivers, also, remain, not greatly changed from their ancient appearances, where only acted upon by the lapse of ages; but where the devices and exertions of human art, and the varying intentions of human purpose have been directed, the consequent changes are striking, and their effect in producing dissimilarity is wonderful. Every city bears witness to the truth of this; but, as very few cities, in addition to the character of society, habitation or politics, add that of sanctity, we with difficulty make proper allowance for the power of this principle, or for the various permanent effects which inevitably follow it. Votaries who attribute to a particular locality the character of sanctity, will desire not only to honor, but also to adorn the subject of their consecration; they will dignify the place of their devotion to the utmost of their power—while this very attention will excite rivalry and envy; and a place thus distinguished will be distinguished also by the consequences of that enmity; it will be attacked and defended, destroyed and restored, with a resolution and perseverance not always experienced by establishments merely civil. Such has been the lot of the ancient city of Jerusalem. We have already stated that we consider the ancient Salem as the nucleus of the succeeding Jerusalem, the name of which was compounded of the two more ancient appellations—Jebus-salem, or Jeru-salem.

Instances of a sacred precinct, or spot set apart for worship, giving rise to a town, are numerous, and the progress is nothing more than natural; yet must it be carefully remembered, that every sacred precinct is not a temple, nor does it imply the existence of a temple; for, in early ages, many places were allotted for religious ceremonies, and for public worship, to which no building ever was attached. Indeed, tribes who constantly dwelt in tents, and were perpetually on the move, had no place to which they could return, and from which they could no longer be removed, for the sake of religious observance; but the towns, orSemay, might consecrate particular patches of ground, and remarkable rocks or hills, but could have no inducement to erect buildings upon them for purposes of devotion. To God's glory properly, it must be assumed that mount Moriah was one of those places esteemed sacred. It afforded, probably, a plot of ground of convenient size, for the resort of worshippers, and this obtained repute on account of its character. Such a separate hill-top being resorted to, at first a few tents were pitched; to these succeeded a few houses, and, by degrees, the village increased to a town, until at length the establishment assumed the importance of a city. In one of these stages, probably that of a small town, we first become acquainted with Salem; of which we read, that Melchisedec came forth from it; that the valley of “Shaveh,” or “the King's Dale,” was adjacent to it; that it was considered as a place peculiarly sacred, and where the word of the Lord was communicated to the sons of men. It is not easy to say with certainty whether this mount Moriah be that on which Abraham offered up his son Isaac, Gen. xxii. General opinion favors the affirmative; but general opinion is not decisive, though it may be accepted as presumptive, evidence. This would point to its acknowledged sanctity at a still earlier period, for it appears that Abraham did not find an altar constructed on that mountain where he sacrificed; yet it was probably a consecrated place.

That many places were distinguished in the manner described is well known in classic antiquity; and they are the most ancient high places; a kind of sacred establishments that afterwards occur frequently enough in the history of the Hebrews.

The next event of importance to the city of Salem is, apparently, in 2 Sam. v. 6, &c. (but really the incident of David's depositing there the head of Goliath, happened some years earlier; of which hereafter). It might be asked, why David should wish to establish himself in this city particularly. Was it because here had been the scene of transactions in ancient time, analogous to those which he meditated as proper for the seat of his sovereignty? or because this was the place chosen by the Lord, anciently, to put his name there? Certainly this presumed sanctity is at least plausible; and it agrees with the supposable motives by which the Jebusites were induced to refuse David. The addition of the royal residence could add nothing to its dignity, but rather the contrary, in the opinion of those whose veneration it was attached from the best of ancestors. But here it is necessary to inquire, Who was this Jebusite which so tauntingly insulted David? Looking back to Josh. xvii. 28, we find Jebus the name of Jerusalem, which is varied, in Judg. xix. 10, to Jebus; it is noticed also as one of the tribes of the Jebusites, a people "not of the children of Israel." In Gen. x. 16, we read, that Canaan was the father of the Jebusite; and it seems that from the early age to which that chapter refers, this family had been settled here;—a family unquestionably of the ancient Canaanites, such as those with whom Abraham and Isaac covenanted.

We are now prepared to assign reasons for two circumstances which have strangely puzzled interpreters; the first is, that in Sam. i. 19 the Jebusite is called "king," (and in all copies and all versions, as Gesenius notes with surprise), meaning, probably, that he derived a pedigree from the ancient Canaanite kings of the place, and even at this time held at least a local authority over the smallest inhabitants of the town. Perhaps, too, the name Ornan given him (I Chron. xxxi. 18,) was his Hebrew, or Jewish, name; while Araunah was his Canaanite, or Jebusite, appellation. The second circumstance, which is of greater consequence. We read in Josh. x. 29,) that the Jewish national altar, on which David certainly ought to have sacrificed, was at this time stationed at Gibeon. But if so, what could induce the angel of the Lord to tell God, and God to tell David, (verse 18,) that he should go up, and raise an altar to the Lord, in the threshing-floor of Ornan, that is, Araunah, the Jebusite, unless here had been a consecrated place formerly? Why did David go out from his royal palace, mount Zion, and pass through the intercinct city? Was there not ample space on Zion, with plenty of conveniences, the king's own property, but he must, under peremptory direction, go down mount Zion, and go up mount Moriah, to raise an altar on premises not his own? If this threshing-floor adjoined the originally consecrated spot on mount Moriah, then it was the nearest approach to that most ancient Fanum, which was in David's power; he could not enter this holy place personally; but he sacrifices as near to it as possible, close to it. This threshing-floor be purchases of Aramah (with cattle, &c.) for "fifty shekels of silver," but, afterwards, explaining to the Jebusite his intention of removing the temple of Moriah, he obtained in addition, for that purpose, the whole summit of the mountain, including the site of ancient Famen, itself, from its natural guardian Aramah, for "six hundred shekels of gold," 1 Chron. xxi. 23. The price seems to have been very great: too great, indeed, for the mere value of the ground; but this view of the subject accounts for it, if it was sacred property, it would not have been alienated, even for the reception of a royal establishment or a palace; but as its sacred character was to be preserved and perpetuated, as additional religious honor was the purpose for which it was resigned, objections subsisted. David obtained it for perpetual consecration, yet at a great price; so that Aramah received, on occasion of this transfer, fifty shekels of silver in payment for his own private property; and six hundred shekels of gold as a consideration for the public property of his family and of his people. Thus, the sacred character of the place marks it as the proper station for an intercessory altar, under circumstances so urgent, extraordinary, and affective; while these very circumstances, in connection with the impulse of piety, induce David to purchase it, and Aramah to part with it; perhaps not without reluctance, and certainly at a price liberal, if not magnificent. The reader will turn to the map, and estimating the relative situations of mount Zion and mount Moriah, he will perceive to what distance David proceeded from one, that he might erect an altar on the other. It should be remarked, also, that David afterwards brought the tabernacle-altar, &c., into his own palace, mount Zion, and Solomon transferred them to the temple on mount Moriah; which seems to manifest a pretent steady adherence on the part of the Jebusite to the honor of his possession, which he did not relinquish, till every thing was ready for constructing the intended temple. It was too sacred to be made a working place, 1 Kings vi. 7.

There is another passage, which must not be overlooked in this inquiry. That it was customary for victors to carry the trophies of their victory to the temples of their deities, and there to consecrate them, is well known. So we find the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 21, 22) building in triumph over the body of Saul and his sons on the walls of Beth-Shan; but the armor of Saul they deposited in the temple of Ashtaroth. So also, (1 Sam. xvii. 51) David carried the head of Goliath in triumph to Jerusalem; but he put his armor in the sacred tent not in David's own tent, for he had none, being merely sent out on a message, but in the national tabernacle, for here we find part of it (the sword) long after; and from the tabernacle he received it again, by the hand of Ahimelech, 1 Sam. xxi. 9. Now, what could induce David to carry the bloody trophy of his victory to Jerusalem, rather than to any other sacred, or public, or famous depository, unless Jerusalem were renowned for sanctity? Was the national ark there? Was this city at this time a royal residence? No. Had it a stronger claim than Bethlehem, where the victor lived? Not unless it were derived from superior sanctity, under which all becomes easy; and clearly the subsequent proceedings of the Philistines with the body of Saul, were but a repetition of David's proceedings with the head of Goliath.

The result of these considerations affirms the proposition, that here was a sacred place of worship from the most remote antiquity, and before Solomon embellished this mount, by erecting his temple, and building a great city and palace, called "Jehovah, "never call Jerusalem by any other name, than Zeku, the Holy. Sometimes adding the epithet Et-shephir, the noble. This word, Et-kudu, seems to me the etymological origin of all the Canaanites of antiquity, which, like Jerusalem, were high placed, and had temples and holy places erected on them." (Vol. ii. p. 305.)

This extract confirms the opinion of the learned Pridaux, that the Caduce of Herodotus is the city of Jerusalem. (See Connect. vol. i. p. 57, where he traces the etymology of the word.) But it is remarkable on another account:—for what reason did the orientals call Jerusalem, the zowx, so early as the days of Herodotus, and why continue that title while it is under their subjection, and in a low and distressed state, unless some peculiar holiness had been generally attributed to it? It accounts also for that remarkable choice of expression, in Matt. xxvii. 53, the saints arose and went into the holy city." So, chap. iv. 5, "take him into the holy city." It does not appear that the other evangelists have used this appellation of Jerusalem. Is it a Syriasm, remaining in Matthew? It is proper, therefore, strongly to urge the difference between mount Zion the city of David, and mount Moriah the city of Jerusalem. These names are frequently used by theological writers, as if they were identically the same place; whereas, one of them, Zion, was distinguished as being the seat of the royal or kingly office; the other as being the seat of the national worship; and how frequently soever these may be associated by the sacred writers, after the time of David, yet they are not the same; neither are they, strictly taken, equivalent to each other, but are distinct, though combined.

We have already stated that the city was built on hills, and was encompassed with mountains, (Ps. cxvii. 2) on a stony and barren soil. It was about sixty furlongs in length, according to Strabo, lib. xvi. Jerusalem had never been so large as when it was attacked by the Romans. It was then thirty-three furlongs in circumference:—nearly four miles and a half. Josephus informs us, that the wall of circumvallation, constructed by Titus, was thirty-nine furlongs in length, and seventy-five in circumference; and there were many gates. Others describe a much larger extent. The condition of Jerusalem in the time of Christ was much the same as afterwards, when assaulted by the Romans; and what this was, Tacitus, being a Roman, and a military man, may inform us. He says, "Jerusalem stood upon an eminence, difficult of approach. The natural strength of the place was increased by redoubts and bulwarks, which, even on the level plain, would have made it secure from assault. Two hills, that rose to a prodigious height, were enclosed by walls, constructed with skill, in some places projecting forward, in others retiring inwardly, with the angles so formed, that the besiegers were always liable to be annoyed in flank. The extremities of the rock were sharp, abrupt, and craggy. In convenient places, near the summit, towers were raised 60 feet high, and others, on the declivity of the sides, rose no less than 120 feet. These works presented a spectacle altogether astonishing. To the distant eye they seemed to be of equal elevation. Within the city, there were other fortifications enclosing the palace of the king. Above all was seen, conspicuous to view, the new of Antonia, so called by Herod in honor of the triumvir, who had been his friend and benefactor. The temple itself was a strong fortress, in the nature of a citadel. The fortifications were built with consummate skill, surpassing those at Pergamum, all the rest of the works. The very peristyles that surrounded it were a strong defence. A perennial spring supplied the place with water. Subterraneous caverns were scooped under the rock. The rain water was saved in pools and cisterns. Since the reduction of the place by Pompey, experience had taught the Jews new modes of fortification; and the corruption and venality that pervaded the whole reign of Claudius favored all their projects. By bribery, they obtained permission to rebuild their walls. The strength of their works plainly showed, that in profound peace they meditated future resistance. (Tacitus, Hist. lib. v. Mr. Murphy's translation.)

These accounts are particularly interesting, because they clearly illustrate the natural strength of Jerusalem, and justify the boastings of the native Hebrews; of which Scripture gives instances, as Ps. cxxiii. 3; cxxxv. 2. Under these circumstances, how very unlikely, perhaps even ridiculous, did the preaching of Christ appear to the Jews, (Luke xix. 43.) every word of which opposes their confidence in these defences. "Thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee (rather raise a circumvallation) and compass thee around—and shall keep thee in every side—shall lay thee even with the ground—and thy children within thee—and they shall not leave within thee one stone on another." It is not impossible that this was literally fulfilled in every particular, so far as regarded Jerusalem itself; though certain towers, or even lines of houses, or streets, of the cities, appended to the ancient town, might be spared, to accommodate the Roman garrison stationed in the place.

Our Lord also promised the present state of Jerusalem, the Holy City, the Holy Temple, "rudded down by the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." It is necessary that we should fix this idea in our minds, "till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"—and then the probability is, that this same spot, which, during so many ages, has been distinguished, and still is distinguished, by consecration and sanctity, though degraded, shall again enjoy favors which will render it conspicuous. Different opinions may be entertained respecting the nation of the Jews, and the fate of the temple of the capital, Jerusalem; but the result of these inquiries is not adverse to the conjecture, that it is still to be the scene of events foretold in prophecy, which will be no less corroborative of faith, when they do happen, than those events have been which are narrated in history; events which surely no one can properly consider without feeling a persuasion, rising to expectation, of a somewhat; though to describe, or to determine, that somewhat may be difficult.

The places distinguished by any remarkable occurrence in the city of Jerusalem, may be distinguished into (1.) those well ascertained; (2.) those credibly supposed to be genuine; (3.) those of little or no authority. Among places the situation of which warrants our confidence, may be reckoned the Temple with its courts, the pool of Bethesda, the house of Pilate, or fort Antonia; for it is credible that Pilate had no house in Jerusalem, but his residence as governor being at Caesarea, that is, at the palace on the coast, he came to the great feasts yearly, or on other occasions, he occupied the residence of the commanding officer of the Roman garrison in Jerusalem, which, no doubt, was fixed in fort Antonia. Now, we know that fort occupied the north side of the temple; and here is shown what is denominating Pilate, or fort Antonia, as we may accept as such. Opposite to the house of Pilate is the palace of Herod; and tradition seems, in this respect, to agree with history. The gate of Justice is likely to maintain the true situation of one of the gates of the ancient city; as may be inferred no less from its proximity to Calvary, the place of public execution, than from the direction of the roads leading to it. The Iron gate is so generally thought to be accurately placed by travellers, that we concur in the opinion. Most of the places without the city may be considered as certain, from their nature; such as the mount of Olives, the brook Kedron, the pool of Siloam, the valleys, Calvary, &c. These being natural and permanent objects, cannot have changed their situation at all, nor their forms, to any considerable degree. It is also probable, that the spot where Stephen is said to have been stoned, is not far from where that fact happened; because, he seems to have been led from the presence of the council to the nearest convenient spot without the city, as a consecrated precinct; and the council sat not far from this corner of the temple, in the cloisters. The house of Mark may be correct; and possibly the houses of Aneas, and of Caiphas, in the city of David, i. e. mount Zion.

The reader will remember that the jealousy of the Turks does not permit measurements of any kind to be taken; so that all plans of this city, and its adjacencies, being composed in a private and surreptitious manner, are liable to mis-recollections, and to errors of a slighter nature. There is no opportunity of surveying the city of Jerusalem, as the city of London is surveyed, by a map. Still, those who are used to estimate by the eye, or to calculate distances by the number of their steps, can form a judgment sufficiently exact to guide our inquiries, if not to satisfy precision; and, in fact, the error of a few yards, which is all that can happen, may well be excused; and is of no great importance to general purposes. We must also recollect, that, in the course of so many ages during which Jerusalem has existed, the buildings, their foundations, repairs, and alterations, the sieges which the city has suffered, its repeated confabulations, and its numerous changes, both public and private; the labor of the capital, Jerusalem; but the result of these inquiries is not adverse to the conjecture, that it is still to be the scene of events foretold in prophecy, which will be no less corroborative of faith, when they do happen, than those events have been which are narrated in history; events which surely no one can properly consider without feeling a persuasion, rising to expectation, of a somewhat; though to describe, or to determine, that somewhat may be difficult.

Having fixed the situation of the temple, and of the Roman governor's residence, we next inquire, not so much where was the situation of the palace, that is, the stated residence of the high-priest, as of that building which the evangelists denote by the title of the high-priest's hall; in our translation, his "palace." We mean to ask, whether some of the buildings in the courts of the temple might not be thus denominated, either because Caiphas had built them; or much rather, because here he sat in council with the Sanhedrim; and being his public office, this might naturally be named "the hall of the high-priest." To justify this idea, we should recollect, that in the time of our Lord, the Sanhedrim sat in some of the chambers, rooms, or halls, of the clusters around the temple; and indeed more than one of them was occupied as a court of justice; for the court of twenty-three (judges) sat in one room of the temple; but the Sanhedrin having quitted the room twenty-four years before the destruction of the temple, because they could no longer execute capital sentences, sat now in the room hence, or elsewhere, near the east gate, or the gate of Shushan. This information we derive from the rabbis, through Lightfoot.

As this is a point of some consequence in establishing the principles assumed in the following narration, the reader will compare what the evangelists say respecting it.

Matt. xxvi. 57, &c.

And they, holding Jesus in custody, led him to Caiphas the high-priest, where the scribes and the elders were assembled. Peter followed at a distance, even to the hall of the high-priest. Now the chief priests, elders, and all the Sanhedrin, sought false witness against him, to put him to death.

Mark xiv. 53, &c.

And they led away to the high-priest; and with him were assembled all the chief priests, and elders, and scribes. And Peter followed afar off, even into the court of the high-priest. And in the morning the chief priests held a counsel with the whole Sanhedrin.

Luke xxii. 54.

They took Jesus, and led him to the house of the high-priest (rev. of v. 53.)—Peter followed afar off: they kindled a fire in the midst of the hall. And when it became day, the elders, &c., led him into the Sanhedrin. And the full body of them arose, and led him to Pilate, &c.

These accounts evidently imply that the examination of Jesus passed in the regular and usual mode before the Sanhedrin; and had it been at an unusual hour, and to the voice of the evangelists have noticed that irregularity? We observe, that three of the evangelists use the word αὐτῷ, hall, (rather than palace, in the sense of residence,) but Luke uses the word σπίτι, house; and this is, we think, the only case in which assigning simply that this hall of the high-priest was that house of apartments usually occupied, as a public court, by him as the public officer of his nation, with the Sanhedrin, as his council, during their sittings. However, this clause does not compel us to accept this as the dwelling of Caiphas, who most probably did not dwell in the temple, or in any part of it; and certainly at whose dwelling-house the Sanhedrin, &c., could not regularly assemble for purposes of judgment. In this view the expressions of the evangelists are remarkable; they do not say, the house of Caiphas, but the hall of the high-priest, says Matthew, Mark, and John; the house of the high-priest, says Luke, which we need not scruple to consider as the official hall where the high-priest sat at the head of the Sanhedrin. If there were two houses, the word σπίτι, house, which Luke appears to have translated in this passage, and the import of the Greek term σπίτι, when applied to buildings, and to apartments, larger or smaller, in buildings, will perceive at once that it cannot be taken restrictively, for a house to dwell in. We conclude, therefore, that the Sanhedrin was convened, and held its sittings on this occasion, in the same place as was usual at this time; which was in that room of the temple-court called κονδύλιον.

The evangelists are understood to describe two meetings of the Sanhedrin; the first, over night; the second, early the next morning; or, one long-continued sitting might have intervals, as some commentators suppose. It should seem, that Judas had made his bargain, not with the whole Sanhedrin, but with the chief rulers; who, nevertheless, having Jesus in their custody, assembled the Sanhedrin; (whether in private, by previous appointment, or by summons sent by the usual officers;) and what that body was convened in the customary place of its sittings, it consulted both publicly and privately, with reference to the person of Jesus, as it would have done the day before, or the day after, on any other business within its jurisdiction. But we suppose, the first assembling of the members by night, or so very early in the morning as the second meeting, was an accommodation to the necessity of the occasion; though it might also be designed to secure a majority of those members who adopted the sentiments of Caiphas, on the political necessity for cutting off Jesus.

We may now state pretty correctly the management of this seizure of our Lord, by the priests. If Jesus suppose that high on mount Zion, as is usually said, it follows, that he was at that time at a distance from the temple, and in a place of security, in the city; but he voluntarily retired to a privacy, Gethsemane, where he knew he could have no rescue or assistance from any of his numerous friends in the city; and this was in strict conformity to his previous declarations, and to his perfect foreknowledge of the event. Jesus (at supper, probably) having given some hint that he designed to visit the garden of Gethsemane that evening, Judas hies to the temple, which was in his way thither; or, if it be supposed, that Caiphas was now at his own dwelling on mount Zion, the situation of that residence was equally convenient for the purposes of Judas, who might, as it were, instantly follow our Lord's mention, "What you do, do quickly," by stepping directly to the high-priest's dwelling; he acquaints the priests what an admirable opportunity they would have for arresting Jesus, who would be within their reach at a given time; that they had only to go down the temple stairs, to cross the Kedron, and they might seize him, before he was aware, and certainly before the people, from any part of the town, could assemble in his favor, or even know of his capture. To this the priests asssenting, they ordered out from the temple a band, which seized Jesus in Gethsemane, and brought him into those precincts of the temple, those chambers, halls, or courts, where the Sanhedrin usually sat. Here he was examined, adjudged, guarded, abused, and detained, till, having been adjudged to death by the supreme council of his nation, they remitted him to Pilate. Now Pilate, residing in fort
Jerusalem [563]

Antonia, which was close adjacent, (on the north side of the temple,) and had various communications with the courts of the temple, some more open, as the great staircase, (Acts xxi. 40.) and others more private, for convenience of the guards, garrison duty, &c. the Sanhedrin could easily fill the courts of the fort and pretorium with their partisans, and, by such management, make their clamors appear to the governor as the voice of the people of Jerusalem and Judea, now assembled at the feast. The governor, aware of this artifice, and desirous of gaining time, among other reasons, sent Jesus through fort Antonia, to Herod, whose palace was not far off. Herod returned Jesus to Pilate, and Pilate returned him to the Jews, who, by the Roman soldiers in fort Antonia, prepared for his crucifixion. He was led, therefore, along the Dolorous Way to Calvary, just without the gate of Justice, and there executed.

On considering this order of events, does it not assume an appearance of credibility, equally strong, at least, as that which supposes Jesus to have been led from Gethsemane, through the whole extent of the city, to and from the house of Caiaphas, on mount Zion, where the Sanhedrin were convened, though not accustomed there to hold their sittings? Is this extent of perambulation consistent with the policy of those who would not seize Jesus, "on a feast-day? lest there should be an uproar among the people," and who had been sufficiently alarmed at the cries of Hosanna! a few hours before? And may this rapid execution of the plan adopted by the high-priest contribute to account for the notes of time recorded by the evangelists, q. d. "All this was performed in so short a space of time as a few hours;—from over night, to six o'clock the next morning." Is not this the import of John's note of time, chap. xix. 14, as if he had said, "It was about the sixth (Roman) hour from the seizure of Jesus?"—which was coincident with the same time from the preparation of the passover peace-offerings, to which Mr. Harmer would refer this sixth hour. (Observations, vol. iii. p. 134.) Suppose, too, that the soldiers mocked our Lord, in fort Antonia; whence they led him to be crucified: (Matt. xxvii. 31.) "And, coming out of the fort? they found Simon the Cyrenian;" to which Mark agrees; "they led him out, and pressed Simon, who was passing by, to bear his cross." From this statement it results, that the seizure of Jesus was conducted with all the privacy of fear, that he was hurried to condemnation and execution, with all the terrors of rulers who dreaded a popular commotion, the dread of the inhabitants by a popular and majority only, in the Sanhedrin; and, when sentence had been wrung from the terrified mind of Pilate, it was rapidly completed; no delay, no reprieve, no after-consideration being permitted, to clear the innocent sufferer, or to alloy the anguish of his friends.

The situation of Calvary demands peculiar attention, as being just without the gate:—to which the apostle alludes: ( Heb. xiii. 12.) "Jesus also suffered without the gate," &c. But it was so near the walls, that possibly the priests from thence might see the whole process of the execution, without hazarding defilement either by too familiar intercourse with the Roman soldiers, or by approaching the dead or dying bodies. Here they might safely quote, "He trusted in God," &c. But it supposes Jesus as crucified, "Let him descend from the cross, and we will believe on him,"

Matt. xxvii. 42; Mark xv. 39. Calvary appears to have been a piece of waste ground, just on the outside of the city walls, or rather beyond the ditch that surrounded those walls; being itself an elevation, and about the centre of it, perhaps, an eminence of small extent rising something above the general level, like a kind of knob in the rock, (the true Calvary, whatever was transected here was conspicuous at a distance. Thus the evangelists Matthew notes: (xxvii. 55.) "Many women of Galilee, beholding afar off," possibly from some rising ground on the other side of the road, Mark xv. 40; Luke xxiii. 49. John observes, that the title put on the cross was read by many of the Jews; the place where Jesus was crucified being nigh the city." The two roads from Bethlehem and Joppa meeting about this spot, and both entering the city by this gate, would afford enough of "those who passed by," i. e. travellers, from the country, who might "revile Jesus," Matt. xxvii. 39; Mark xv. 39.

After the destruction of the city by Titus, the history of Jerusalem presents little other than a series of struggles and desolations. The same fatal persuasion, that it was the peculiar residence of Deity, and therefore could not be taken, continued to influence the Jewish nation with expectations of recovering it. Many of the Jewish Christians returned to the devastated city, and were suffered to inhabit it. But in the time of Adrian, (A. D. 134 to 179,) the Jews of Judea and the neighboring countries rebelled; and the emperor completed the destruction of whatever could remind them of their former policy. He forbade them from entering the city, on pain of death. He built a new city, which he named "Elia Adria Capitolina." He erected several temples to heathen divinities; and especially a very magnificent one to Jupiter. He placed the figure of a hog over the gate leading to Bethlehem; and did his utmost to obliterate the memorials of Christianity as well as of Judaism. This state of things continued till the time of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, (A. D. 306,) notwithstanding occasional commotions under Antoninus, Septimius Severus, and Caracalla. Helena, mother of Constantine, built many churches in Judea, and in Jerusalem, about A. D. 336; and Julian, who, after his father, succeeded to the empire of his uncle Constantine, endeavored to rebuild the temple, but his design in that of the Jews, whom he patronized, was frustrated, A. D. 333.

The subsequent history of Jerusalem may be dismissed in a few words:—In A. D. 613, it was taken by Cosroes, king of the Persians, who slew 90,000 inhabitants of the city; and by a popular resolution, majority only, in the Sanhedrin; and, when sentence had been wrung from the terrified mind of Pilate, it was rapidly completed; no delay, no reprieve, no after-consideration being permitted, to clear the innocent sufferer, or to alloy the anguish of his friends. The situation of Calvary demands peculiar attention, as being just without the gate:—to which the apostle alludes: ( Heb. xiii. 12.) "Jesus also suffered without the gate," &c. But it was so near the walls, that possibly the priests from thence might see the whole process of the execution, without hazarding defilement either by too familiar intercourse with the Roman soldiers, or by approaching the dead or dying bodies. Here they might safely quote, "He trusted in God," &c. But it supposes Jesus as crucified, "Let him descend from the cross, and we will believe on him,"
The city of Jerusalem, which in the time of Christ is said to have contained nearly three millions of inhabitants (?), now included from twelve to fifteen thousands. The circumference of the city itself, as we may conceive, had proportionately decreased: for within an hour I had completed its circuit. It appeared to me as if I were going round a very great fortification; and I could not explain to myself, why David should have been so prodigal in the acquisition of Israel in general, here fixed their abode; for the country is destitute of attraction and desolation, girt all round by naked blue rocks and cliffs, without water, without level ground, without any of the common recommendations of a country. Here and there, indeed, in this season, (at the beginning of April,) the fields were green; but I was assured, that in June, not the smallest vestige of this color would be seen, and that when the heat began, not even a salad would be found in the gardens.

The streets are mostly narrow, and the pavings-stones uneven, hard as marble; and when it rains, the path is as if composed of bits of soap; it is, indeed, as slippery as if it were actually made of this material: for, in walking, a person needs be as careful as if he were treading upon ice.

From Solomon's temple, probably, the true locale is preserved: there, the elegant mosque now magnificently raises itself, on a clear and airy height, on a free and spacious plain. From the mount of Olives, this stupendous building forms a structure to which nothing can be compared; but it is forbidden to any but a Mussul man to enter.

Situated, however, is reported to have entered the mosque himself, to see how he would be received by the people; and it is said that he himself did enter.

Dr. Richardson entered the mosque, of which he has given a minute description in his Travels.

"It is also said, that since this event the Turks have become in general more tractable. Before this, it was common in the streets of the Christians and foreigners resident here, as they walked in the street, to say nothing of other like contumelies. It has now ceased in a great degree; in consideration of which, however, more gold is extorted from the Christians at least by the officers than formerly. When the French advanced to the neighborhood, all the Christians were thrown into prison; and, as it actually pressed forward to the city, these would have been all put to death, without a solitary exception. Their imprisonment, notwithstanding, continued for several months, and the government availed itself of this circumstance, afterwards, to require a payment of money.

David's palace, also, lies outside of the present city, on the height of Zion. At present, it is converted all round into a fortification, and a firm sold is required before it can be entered. But notice is stated to be within it: but I did not enter it.

The convent of St. James, (St. Giousomas,) belonging to the Armenians, is of vast circumference; it is esteemed the most wealthy in the Levant. This convent, as well as that of the Greeks, contains many religious curiosities. It is the prevailing custom to adorn the walls of the churches with white and blue China plates: this sight involuntarily reminded me of the tile ovens which were formerly common among us, and is very far from being prepossessing. The appearance of the many inlays of mother-of-pearl work on a dark ground is more beautiful and is far better.

The mount of Olives, situated on the eastern side of Jerusalem, offers a lovely prospect: on its very summit is a mosque, where the ascension is declared to have taken place. All the spots visited by the Christians are guarded by Turks: everywhere the caffaro is presiding over them, which is only a few parasas. It is better to endure this than the insolence of these insolently guards.

The mount of Olives, probably, was in another condition formerly. I had represented it to myself as a seat of the Jews, and there were buildings, of a yellowish earth: possibly not more than fifty olive-trees can be found upon it. I occasionally met with some vines, almonds, and fig-trees, which, however, as yet pushed forth no leaves. In Switzerland, the mountain would only be accounted a small hill; for in a quarter of an hour I had ascended from its foot to its top.

But there is a splendid view on its summit towards the east: in the distance, are seen the Dead sea and the course of the Jordan, which empties itself into it; the ruins of Jericho lie farther to the left, and at its feet is Jerusalem. The mosque, on the site of Solomon's temple, with the wide and spacious flat floor and green country around it, raises itself magnificently with its dark cupolas and blue porcelain ornaments above the groups lying in the background, and the roofless houses of Jerusalem, gradually rising... in an amphitheatrical form. The structure of the Turkish mosque is in beautiful style; the immense court, and the brilliant and parti-colored hues of this building, the roof of the mountain of the yellow stones, the marble columns, and the huge wall of the same color which surrounds the whole with the multitude of its irregular towers.

"At a little distance below the top of the mount is the Grotto of the Apostles, as it is called, which, according to ancient taste, is built underground. This building, with its twelve splendidly turned arches, which are gradually sinking into the masonry, assuredly belonged formerly to the finest works of architecture. Many similar remains of dwellings in this place, part of them half sunk, part of them entirely covered, prove that the mount of Olives might have been in a very different condition some centuries or thousands of years ago. Likewise at its foot is the grotto of the Madonna, almost entirely under ground; its remains even now attest the grand and rich style of its magnificent structure. Stairs, indeed, of white marble, about thirty feet broad, consisting of fifty steps, lead into this grotto, where the Greeks account devotion and the power of God their peculiar employment; all which, in fact, the building is capable of in the environs of the exterior announce.

"On a festival, I descended for the second time to inspect this beautiful building: I beheld much that was brilliant in the ceremonies, the vestments, and other emblems of divine worship; but when I returned home, and perceived the whole street be set on both sides by cypresses, larch, blind, and beggars, who personified misery itself, I was indignant at the sanctified display of this external mockery, and the entire want of the chief object—relief for the afflicted. Not far from this grotto, the Garden of Gethsemané is said to have been situated; eight fine olive-trees, belonging to the most ancient times, (whose roots are surrounded with heaps of stones, and whose preservation is effected by continual supplies of good earth,) rear their heads on this memorable spot.

"The tomb of Abasalmon, as it is called, lies in the lower part of this same place. It contains a tower, in Gothic taste, which raises itself on high; and in what surrounds may yet be seen the very same style. Nevertheless, the building appears much older than Gothic architecture: by its side also are found several subterranean apartments, of very great extent. Tradition avers these to have been the grottoes or caves into which the chief object—relief for the afflicted—was to be conveyed by means of a sliding passage and steps. Close to these cavities are shown the graves of the kings and judges of Israel: they likewise merely present fragments of arches and walls under rubbish and earth. It is as incredible, that the Jews should not have sufficient public spirit to honor these venerable remains, even if it were but in a trifling degree.

"The entrance to these sepulchres would rather induce us to conjecture a place which led to a chance than to the catacombs of chiefs. In the same district is situated the burial-place of the Jews of the present Jerusalem:—it comprises a circuit scarcely to be walked round in half an hour—this cemetery is covered with well-hewn, quadrangular flag-stones, placed one upon the other, each being furnished with inscriptions. Without the possession of a prophetic spirit, it may be easily foreseen, that this quantity of excellent stones will at some time become very useful to the building of massive edifices.

"Beside the mount of Olives and the hill on which the city of Jerusalem rests, flows the brook Cedron. Here also was my expectation disappointed. I had conceived it to myself much greater, and found merely a ditch about two feet broad, which at this time was almost, and in summer is totally, dry; but in winter it becomes like a wide stream in one instant impetuously swells on its course, and in the other disappears.

"Deeper down lies the spring of the Siloe: a long, stony flight of steps leads to it, far below the earth, below which a crystalline clear water springs up. It is light, though somewhat saline; yet it is uncommonly pleasant, and tasted, in my opinion, like milk. This spring is said to have an ebbing and flowing in common with the ocean; during six hours it is full, and during six it is empty. (This is perhaps the most satisfactory solution of the phenomenon which has yet been given, and, if true, fully accounts for every legend which the Arabians have written respecting it.)

"On the left hand, on the height, is situated the village of Siloe; there but little is seen of dwelling-houses, which mostly consist of grottoes or caves, which are built in rocks. This place, whose wild inhabitants are in every respect Turks, is a miserable nest:—as far as lighting lamps or fires; boys from ten to twelve years of age were peeling us from the heights." (For a description of the holy sepulchre, see Sepulchre.)

"How unlike the ancient city is the modern Jerusalem! "From the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed!" Dr. Clarke, who approached Jerusalem from the direction of the Napesaleo, on which side it is seen to the greatest advantage, has described its first appearance in the most glowing terms. But his description is decidedly overcharged. In the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, the neighboring elevations he would see a wild, rugged, mountainous desert—no herds depasturing on the summit; no forests clothing the acclivities; no water flowing through the valleys; but one rude scene of melancholy waste, in the midst of which ancient glory of Judea bows her head in widowed desolation. On entering the town, the magic of the name and all his earlier associations would suffer a still greater violence, and expose him to still stronger disappointments. For, in the midst of the city, no high-raised arches of triumph, no fountains to cool the air, or porticoes to exclude the sun, no single vestige to announce its former military greatness or commercial opulence; but in the place of these, he would find himself encompassed on every side by walls of rude masonry, the dull uniformity of which is only broken by the occasional protrusion of a small grated window. The following very spirited sketch of modern Jerusalem, from the pen of Mr. Buckingham, may close this account. "Reposing beneath the shade of an olive-tree upon the brow of this hill, (the mount of Olives,) we enjoyed from hence a fine prospect of Jerusalem on the opposite one. This city occupies an irregular square, of about two miles and a half in circumference. Its shortest apparent side is that which faces the east, and in this is the supposed gate of the ancient temple, now closed up, and the small projecting stone on which Mohammed is to sit, when the world is to be assembled to judgment in the vale below. The southern side is exceedingly irregular, taking quite a

The southwest extremity being terminated by the mosque built over the supposed sepulchre of David, on the summit of mount Zion. The southern and western sides of the city are marked by the walls which are not distinctly seen from hence; but every part of this appears to be a modern work, and executed at the same time. The walls are flanked at irregular distances by square towers, and have battlements running all around on their summits, with loop-holes for arrows or musketry close to the top. The walls appear to be about fifty feet in height, but are not surrounded by a ditch. The northern wall runs over slightly declining ground; the eastern brow runs straight along the brow of mount Moriah, with the deep valley of Jehoshaphat below; the southern wall runs over the summit of the hill assumed as mount Zion, with the vale of Hinnom at its feet; and the western wall runs along on more level ground, near the summit of the high and stony mountains over which we had first approached the town. As the city is thus seated on the brow of one large hill, divided by name into several smaller hills, and the whole of these slopes gently down towards the east; this view, in the opinion of Olives, presents the city in a situation of greater height than that on which the highest part of the city stands, commands nearly the wholeness of it at once.

On the north, it is bounded by a level and Arguments fertile plain, now covered with olive-trees, particularly near the north-east angle. On the south, the steep side of mount Zion, and the valley of Hinnom, both show patches of cultivation and little garden enclosures. On the west, the sterile summits of the hills where barely light their outlines above the dwellings. And, on the east, the deep valley of Jehoshaphat, now at our feet, has some partial spots relieved by trees, though as forbidding in its general aspect as the vale of death could ever be desired to be, by those who have chosen it for the place of their interment.

"Within the walls of the city are seen crowded dwellings, remarkable in no respect, except being traversed by flat roofs, and generally built of stone. On the south are some gardens and vineyards, with the long red mosque of Al Sakhrayr, having two tiers of windows, a sloping roof, and a dark dome at one end, and the mosque of Sion and the sepulchre of David in the same quarter. On the west is seen the high wall there barely light their outlines above the dwellings near the Bethlehem gate. In the centre rise the two cupolas, of unequal form and size; the one blue, and the other white, covering the church of the Holy Sepulchre. Around, in different directions, are seen the minarets of eight or ten mosques, amid an assemblage of about two thousand dwellings. And on the east is seated the great mosque of Al Harrem, or, as called by Christiana, the mosque of Solomon, from being supposed, with that of Al Sakhrayr near it, to occupy the site of the ancient temple of that splendid and luxurious king." (Travels in Palestine, &c. p. 203—205, 4to.)

The plan of Jerusalem which we have placed opposite the title-page of this work, is that given by Dr. Jowett, who had ample opportunity of testing its correctness. It varies from most others in representing the Kidron as bending to the south-west after passing the valley of Hinnom. Mr. Carne, however, describes the stream from Silo [the Kidron was dry when he saw it] as passing in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and winding between rugged and desolate hills towards the wilderness of St. Saba. According to the same traveller, the course of the Tyche crosses the deep and rugged glls through which the Kidron flows in order that the city may be built. The breach of this stream in the south-west part of the plan, therefore, is probably nothing more than a winding of the valley. R.

JERUSALEM, THE NEW. The city of Jerusalem furnishes a metaphorical application of its name, in an exalted and spiritual sense. The first hint of this in the New Testament, occurs in Gal. iv. 25, where the apostle refers to the formation of the Jewish nation into a church state, by the giving of the law from Sinai; under which terrific and enslaving dispensation, the "Jerusalem that now is," he says, "continues; but the Jerusalem above is free, which is the mother of us all." Gentiles as well as Jews, (perhaps Thessalonica, or the Universal Mother,) the formation of all mankind, as it were, (not of a single nation,) into a church state, beginning at Jerusalem, the city of peace; though properly originating in heaven, the seat of the celestial Jerusalem, the mansion of complete and uninterrupted tranquillity. The metaphor is resumed and enlarged by the writer of the Revelation: (Rev. iii. 12.) "The city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven, from my God." It appears here, by its coming down from heaven, to refer to the Christian establishment or church, which now had taken place of the Jewish. But the same writer afterwards employs it in a still higher sense: (chap. xxi.) "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away—and I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem," ver. 1. This he describes at large, (ver. 10, et seq.) in a spirit of oriental metaphor, that can only agree to the celestial sense: similar allusions to certain parts of its decorations are found, Is. liv. 11; Tobit xxx. 13.

This celestial city, called the holy city, and the great city, was to have no temple, nor other peculiarities of the Jewish service; and the whole description of it, the dimensions, the parts, and the properties of it, are symbolical in the highest degree. The new Jerusalem on earth should be carefully distinguished from the new Jerusalem in heaven, in explaining this book; nor should it be forgotten, that much of the scenery in it is conceived in the spirit of one who had been familiar with the courts, altars, &c. of that Jewish Jerusalem and temple, of which he had the same manner," the same monogram near the Bethlehem gate. In the centre rise the two cupolas, of unequal form and size; the one blue, and the other white, covering the church of the Holy Sepulchre. Around, in different directions, are seen the minarets of eight or ten mosques, amid an assemblage of about two thousand dwellings. And on the east is seated the great mosque of Al Harrem, or, as called by Christiana, the mosque of Solomon, from being supposed, with that of Al Sakhrayr near it, to occupy the site of the ancient temple of that splendid and luxurious king." JESHANAH, a city of Ephraim, 2 Chron. xiii. 19. Eusebius and Jerome place it seven miles north from Jericho.

JESMON, perhaps the same as Hammon, Asmon, Esmon, Esamom, and Esmeom, a city in the wilderness of Moan, belonging to Simeon; in the south of Palestine, or Arabia Petrea, 1 Sam. xxiii. 24.

JESHDAN, or JOSHUA, son of Jozedek, the first high-priest of the Jews, after their return from the Babylonian captivity, Ezra iii. 2; iv. 3. His first care after his arrival at Jerusalem, was to restore the sacrifices, to regulate the offices and orders of the priests and Levites, and to rebuild the temple, as far as the condition of the Jews would allow of the work. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah often mention Jeshua, or Joshua, son of Jozedek. Haggai (i. 1.) addresses himself to him and Zerubbabel, exciting them to build the temple after the death of Cyrus and Cambyses; and Zechariah refers to him as "Joshua, son of Jozedek," as the one who would help the Lord, and who might be seen before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to accuse him. The same prophet having seen a vision of two olive-trees, which furnished oil for the golden candlestick, through which the oil ran into the lamps, the angel of the Lord told him, that the Northern olive would be cut off, and Josaphat, son of Jozadek, and Zerubbabel, son of Salathiel, "who are the two anointed ones that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." (See also Zech. vii, and the article CANDLESTICK.) Jesus, son of Sirach, in Ecclesiasticus, commends Jesus, (Joshua,) son of Jozadek, and Zerubbabel, as signets on the Lord's right hand, chap.
xlii. 12. Joshua was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his son Joachim, who was high-priest in the reign of Xerxes.

JESURUN, a poetical name given to Israel, in Deut. xxxii. 5; xxxiii. 15, &c. Translators differ in their ideas of its meaning, some rendering it, the just, or upright; others, the beloved; others, taking it as a diminutive, render it, little Israel," i.e. the beloved, the little, little Israel. It is derived from ως, upright.

JESSE, son of Obed, and father of David, Eliab, Abinadab, Shammah, Nethaneel, Raddai, and Ozem. David was the youngest son; but became the most illustrious, Ruth iv. 17, 23; 1 Chron. ii.
12; 7. v. 5. 13; Matt. i. 5. 18.

I. JESUS CHRIST, the son of God, the Messiah, and Saviour of the world, the first and principal object of the prophecies, who was prefigured and promised in the Old Testament, was expected and desired by the ancient sages; the hope and salvation of the Gentiles; the glory, happiness, and consolation of Christians. The name Jesus, or, as the Hebrews pronounce it, Jehoshuah, or Joshua, signifies, he who shall save. No one ever bore this name with so much justice, nor so perfectly fulfilled the signification of it, as Jesus Christ, who saves from sin and hell, and has merited heaven for us by the price of his blood. See Christ.

III. JESUS, surmounted Justus, see JUSTUS II.

JETHRO, priest, or prince, of Midian, (for the Hebrew כֹּן, signifies a prince as well as a priest,) the father-in-law of Moses. It is believed that he was a priest of the true God, and maintained the true religion, being descended from Midian, son of Abraham and Keturah. Moses entered into console his alliance with Jethro's family, but invites him to offer sacrifices to the Lord, on his arrival in the camp of Israel, as one who adored the same God, Exod. xvii.
11. 12. So Moses has the barbarous names, Jethro, Reuel or Reuel, Hobab, and Ceni. Others, that Jethro and Raguell were the same person; that Hobab was son of Jethro, and brother of Zipporah; and that Ceni is a common name, signifying the country of the Kenites, inhabited by the posterity of Hobab, south of the promised land. The Hebrew hophen, which Jerome translates kinman, is used in Numb.
x. 29, and Exod. xviii. 1, 27, to denote the relation between Moses and Hobab; in Numbers, however, Hobab is called son of Raguell, whence others are of opinion that Raguell was the father of Jethro, and Jethro the father of Hobab. On the other side, Raguell gives Zipporah to Moses, Exod. ii. 21.
The signification of the Hebrew hophen not being fixed, it is impossible to determine this question with certainty. Moses, having killed an Egyptian who ill-treated a Hebrew, was obliged to fly from Egypt, in to the land of Midian, east of the Red sea, near the gulf of Elam, where he married one of the daughters of Jethro. After he had been here forty years, he saw the vision of the burning bush, and Jethro, understanding the will of God, permitted him to return eto Egypt with his wife and children. Zipporah being obliged to return to her father, Jethro brought him to Moses, at the foot of mount Sinai, about a year after the Hebrews came out of Egypt. Moses went out of the camp to meet Jethro, and falling prostrate, embraced him, introduced him into his tent, and retained him what the Lord had done for Israel. Jethro blessed God for it, offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, and ate with Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel, in the presence of the Lord. The next day, Moses sitting to judge Israel, from morning, to evening, Jethro insisted that the fatigue was too great, and advised him to appoint deputies for lesser causes.

When the Israelites were decamping on their journey, Moses imported Jethro to accompany them; but he returned to Midian, leaving, as some believe, Hobab his son, to conduct the Israelites, Exod. xxvii. 5, 27. But Hobab was more probably Jethro himself.

JEWELS, valuables, whether for store, or for apparel. This word does not mean jewelry works, gems, &c. but whatever is stored up in consequence of its superior estimation; 5. God calls his people jewels; (Mal. iii. 17.) the lips of knowledge are a jewel, Prov. xx. 15.

JEWS, the name borne by the Jews, among foregn nations, especially after the return from Babyl-on, from Judah, their ancestor. See HEBREWS.

JEZEBEL, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zi-donians, and wife of Ahab, king of Israel, (1 Kings xxvi. 31.) introduced into the kingdom of Samaria the public worship of Baal, Asarate, and other Phœnician deities, which the Lord had expressly forbidden; and with this impious worship, a general prevalence of those abominations which had formerly increased God against the Canaanites, to their utter extirpation.

Jezebel was so zealous, that she fed at her own table four hundred prophets belonging to the goddess Asarte; and Ahab in like manner kept four hundred of Baal's prophets, as ministers of his false gods.
Jezebel seems to have undertaken the utter abolition of the worship of the Lord in Israel, by persecuting his prophets; and she had destroyed them all, if a part had not been saved by some means or other.
Ahab, who lived at this time, having brought fire from heaven on his burnt-offering, in sight of Ahab and of all Israel, assembled at mount Carmel, and the peoples having killed four that he had and fifty of the prophets, Jezebel went to Elijah, declaring, that the next day she would take care he should be despatched, 1 Kings xix. Some time afterwards, Ahab being desirous to buy Naboth's vineyard, but meeting with arefusal from him, Jezebel wrote in the king's name to the principal men of Jezezel, requiring them to accuse him of blaspheming God and the king, and to punish him capitally. These orders were but too punctually executed. Ahab returning from Jezezel, Elijah met him, and threatened his destruction in the name of God; and that Jezebel, who had been the cause of this evil, should be eaten by dogs in the field of Jezezel; or, according to the Hebrew, by the outward wall of Jezezel. These predictions were verified, when Jehu had her thrown out of the window, and left exposed by the outer wall, 2 Kings ii.
35. "And they went to bury her, but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands." (See JEZ.) To an English ear it sounds very surprising, that, during the time of a single meal, so many dogs should be on the spot,

ready to devour; and should so speedily despatch this business, in the very midst of a royal city, close under the royal gateway, and where a considerable train of people had so lately passed, and, no doubt, many were continually passing: this appears extraordinary without account of numbers; but we well accounted for by Mr. Bruce, whose information the reader will receive with due allowance for the different manners and ideas of countries; after which, this rapid devouring of Jezebel will not appear so extraordinary as it has hitherto done: "The bodies of those killed by the sword were hewn to pieces, and scattered about the streets, being denied burial. I was miserable, and almost driven to despair, at seeing my hunting dogs twice let loose by the careless- ness of my household, bringing into the court-yard the heads and arms of slaughtered men, and which I could no way prevent, but by the destruction of the dogs themselves; the quantity of carrion, and the stench of it, brought down the hyenas in hundreds from the hills, and made the town uninhabitable; and, as few people in Gondar go out after it is dark, they enjoyed the streets to themselves, and seemed ready to dispute the possession of the city with the inhabitants. Often, when I went home late from the palace, (and it was then that the king chose chiefly for conversation, though I had but to pass the corner of the market-place before the palace, had lanterns with me, and was surrounded with armed men, I heard them growling by twos and threes, so near me, as to be afraid they would take the opportunity of seizing me by the leg. A pistol would have frightened them, and made them speedily run, and I constantly carried two loaded at my circle; but the discharging a pistol in the night would have alarmed every one that heard it in the town, and it was not now the time to add any thing to people's fears. I at last scarce ever went out, and nothing occupied my thoughts but how to escape from this bloody country, by way of Senouma, and how in that course to extert my power and influence over Yassine at Ras el Feel to pave my way, by assisting me to pass the desert, into Abbara. The king, missing me at the palace, and hearing I had not been at Ras Michael's, began to inquire who had seen me. Ayro Combi soon found Yasine, who informed him of the whole matter. Upon this I was sent for to the palace, where I found the king, without any body but menial servants. He immediately remarked, that I looked very ill; which, indeed, I was, as the case, as I had so rarely ate anything since I saw him last, or even for some days before. He asked me, in a condoling tone, what ailed me—that, besides looking sick, I seemed as if something had ruffled me, and put me out of humor. I told him, that what he observed was true: that, coming across the market-place, I had seen Za Mariam, the Ras's door-keeper, with three men bound, one of whom he fell a-hacking to pieces in my presence, and upon seeing me running across the place, stopping my nose, he called me to stay till he should come and despatch the other two, for he wanted to speak with me, as if he had been engaged about ordinary business; that the soldiers, in consideration of his haste, immediately fell upon the other two, whose cries were still remaining in the ears; that the hyenas, at night, would scarcely let me pass in the streets, when I returned from the palace; and the dogs fled into my house, to eat pieces of human carcasses at their leisure." (Travels, vol. iv. p. 51, &c.)

Without supposing that Jezebel was restored with hyenas, like Gondar, though that is not incredible, we may easily admit of a sufficiency of dogs, accustomed to carrion, which had pulled the body of Jezebel to pieces, and had devoured it before the palace-gate, or had withdrawn with parts of it to their hiding-places. But, perhaps, the mention of the head, hands, and feet, being left on the spot, indicates that it had not been removed by the dogs, but was eaten where it fell, (as those parts joined the members most likely to be removed, so that the prophecy of Elijah was literally fulfilled, "as the portion of Jezebel, shall dogs eat Jezebel." See Does.

This account illustrates, also, the readiness of the dogs to lick the blood of Ahab, (1 Kings xxii, 38.) in perfect conformity to which is the expression of the prophet Jeremiah, (xx. 3.) "I will appoint over them the sword to slay, and the dogs to tear, and the heathen of the heaven and the beasts of the earth, (the hyenas of Bruce, perhaps,) to devour and destroy." It also explains the mode of execution adopted by the prophet Samuel, with regard to Agag, king of the Amalekites, whom Samuel thus addresses: "In like manner as thy sword has made women barren, so shall thy mother be rendered barren [childless] among women," I Sam. xv, 33. If these words do not imply that Agag had ripped up pregnant women, they at least imply that they had been used towards him, which he had formerly used towards others. The character of the prophet Samuel has been vilified for cruelty on account of this history; with how little reason let the reader now judge; and compare a similar retributive justice on Adoni-bezek, Judg. i. 7.

In Rev. ii, 26, the angel of Thyatira is reproached with suffering Jezebel, "that woman who calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce the servants of Jesus Christ," &c. Jezebel is here a figurative name, and signifies some impious and cruel woman, who dogmatized and domineered in the church.

II. JEZEREEL, son of Etam, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 3.

III. JEZEREEL, son of the prophet Hosea, i. 4. In verse 11 there is an allusion to the meaning of the name, which seems proper to the context.

IV. JEZEREEL, a celebrated city of Issachar, (Josh. xix. 18.) in the great plain, between Legio west, and Scythopolis east, Ahab had here a palace; and this city became famous on account of his seizure of Naboth's vineyard, and the vengeance executed on Ahab, 2 Kings ix. 10, &c. Jerome says, Jezebel was near Maximianopolis; and that not far from it was a very long vale. Josephus calls Jezebel Azarias, or Azureas. In the time of William of Tyre, it was called Little Gerain. There was a fine fountain in it.

JOAB, son of Zeruiah David's sister, and brother of Abishai and Asahel, was one of the most valiant soldiers and greatest generals in David's time; but he was also one of the most cruel, revengeful, and imperious of men. He was commander in chief of his troops, when David was king of Judah only, and was always firm to his interests. He signalized himself at the battle of Gibeon against Abner, (2 Sam. ii. 13, 14, &c.) but Asahel, his brother, was killed in that engagement by Abner. To revenge his death, Joab...
Joah, who had one to Hebron to make an alliance with David, and bring all Israel to his obedience, 2 Sam. iii. 27, 39. David abhorred the base action; but did not dare to punish Joab, who was too formidable. After David was acknowledged king by all Israel, who directed the army to be placed at the entrance of the temple, and on account to be given of what money was collected, that it might be faithfully employed in reparations of the house of God. Jehoiada dying at the age of a hundred and thirty years, Joash was raised by the counsels of his courtiers, who had before been restrained by this high-priest's authority. They began to forsake the temple of the Lord, and to worship idols and groves, or Astaroth, goddess of the groves, which drew curses on the nation. In the twelfth year of Jehoash, 2 Kings xi. 17. He interceded for Absalom's return from exile, and his restoration to favor. But though he showed himself a friend to Absalom in his disgrace, he was his enemy at his rebellion. He overcame him in a battle near Mahanaim; and being informed that he hung by the hair on an oak, he pierced him to death with his own hands, though he well knew that David had given strict orders to preserve Absalom. When the king discovered too much sorrow for the death of his son, Joab remonstrated with him. When Adonijah, David's eldest son, aspired to the throne, he carefully secured the friendship of the assistance of Joas, (see Adonijah,) went, by leaving himself to the designs of the prince, increased David's aversion from him, so that, when near his end, he advised Solomon to punish him for the various misdeeds of which he had been guilty. Some time after the death of David, Joas, being informed that Solomon had caused Adonijah to be put to death, and had banished the high-priest Abiathar to his country residence at Anathoth, thought it time to pay him the respect due to Jehoiada, his and his son's, Hazzaz, king of Syria, besieged Gath, which belonged to Judah; and, having taken it, he marched against Jerusalem. Joash, to redeem himself from the difficulties of a siege, and from the dangers of having been plundered, took what money he could find in the temple, which had been consecrated by Ahaziah his father, Jehoram his grandfather, and himself, with what he had in the royal treasury, all of which he gave to Hazael, to stay his hostilities. It is believed that the next year the Syrian army marched again into Judah; but Hazael was not with it in person. The Syrians made great havoc, defeated the troops of Joash, entered Jerusalem, slew the prince, and took the temple, the treasures of the temple and the royal palace, and returned in triumph to Damascus. They treated Joash himself with great ignominy; and left him extremely ill. Shortly afterwards, his servants revolted against him, and killed him in his bed, by which the blood of Zecharias the high-priest was avenged. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchre.

I. JOAKIM, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Joshua, son of Jozedek, his father, after the return from the captivity.

II. JOAKIM, son of Hilkiah, high-priest of the Jews, in the reign of Manasseh, Joash, generally known by the name Hilkiah, or Eliakim, Judith iv. 6, 14.

JOANNA, wife of Chuzu, Herod's steward, (Luke viii. 3) was one of those women who followed our Saviour into Syria, and observed that these women had been delivered by Christ from evil spirits; or cured of diseases. It was customary among the Jews, for men who dedicated themselves to preaching, to accept services from women of piety, who attended them without any scandal.

I. JOASH, or Jeroash, son of Ahaziah, king of Judah, was saved from the design of the impious Athaliah, by Jehoshebah, or Jehoshabath, daughter of Joram, sister of Ahaziah, and wife of the high-priest Jehoiada. In the seventh year, Jehoiada procured him to be acknowledged king, and so well concerted his plan, that the young prince was placed on the throne, and saluted king, in the temple, before the queen had notice of it, 2 Kings xi. xii. Joash received the diadem, with the book of the law, from the hands of Jehoiada, the high-priest, who, in the young king's name, made a covenant between the Lorn, the king, and the people, for their future fidelity to God; and also obliged the people to take an oath to the king. Joash reigned forty years at Jerusalem, and governed with justice and piety, so long as he was guided by Jehoiada. In the king's minority, the high-priest had issued orders for collecting voluntary offerings to the holy place, with a design of repairing the temple; but his orders were ill executed, till the twentieth year of Jehoash, which directed cheats to be placed at the entrance of the temple, and on account to be given of what money was collected, that it might be faithfully employed in reparations of the house of God. Jehoiada dying at the age of a hundred and thirty years, Joash was raised by the counsels of his courtiers, who had before been restrained by this high-priest's authority. They began to forsake the temple of the Lord, and to worship idols and groves, or Astaroth, goddess of the groves, which drew curses on the nation. In the twelfth year of Jehoash, 2 Kings xi. 17. When the king discovered too much sorrow for the death of his son, Joab remonstrated with him. When Adonijah, David's eldest son, aspired to the throne, he carefully secured the friendship and assistance of Joas, (see Adonijah,) went, by leaving himself to the designs of the prince, increased David's aversion from him, so that, when near his end, he advised Solomon to punish him for the various misdeeds of which he had been guilty. Some time after the death of David, Joas, being informed that Solomon had caused Adonijah to be put to death, and had banished the high-priest Abiathar to his country residence at Anathoth, thought it time to pay him the respect due to Jehoiada, his and his son's, Hazzaz, king of Syria, besieged Gath, which belonged to Judah; and, having taken it, he marched against Jerusalem. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchre.

I. JOASH, king of Israel, son and successor of Jehoahaz, was declared king in his father's life-time, A.M. 3163. He reigned sixteen years, including the two that he reigned with his father; and though he did evil in the sight of the Lord, and imitated Jeroboam, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, the Lord re-established, during his reign, the affairs of the kingdom of Israel, which had been thrown into very great confusion under Jehoahaz his father. Elisha falling sick, Joash went to visit him, and wept before the prophet, who directed him to shoot with arrows. The king shot three times, and ceased; he gained, therefore, only the three victories over Syria. Amaziah, king of Judah, having been victorious over the Edomites, challenged Joash, saying, 'Come, let us see one another in the face;' but Joash reproved him by the fable of the cedar, and the thistle of Lebanon. Amaziah, however, would not take his counsel, and was defeated, and taken in the battle Joash entered Jerusalem, and ordered four hundred cubits of the city walls to be demolished, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner-gate. He took all the treasures of the temple and the royal palace, and returned in triumph to Samaria, where he died in peace soon afterwards, and was succeeded by Jeroboam, 2 Kings x. 10.

Job was a man of great probity, virtue, and religion, and he possessed much riches in cattle and slaves; which at that time constituted the principal wealth even of princes in Arabia and Edom. He had seven sons and three daughters; and was in great repute among all people, on both sides of the Euphrates. His sons, by turns, made entertainments for each other; and when they had gone through the circle of their days of feasting, Job sent to them, purified them, and offered burnt-offerings for each one, that God might pardon any faults committed against him during such festivities. He was wholly averse from injustice, idolatry, fraud, and adultery; he avoided evil thoughts, and dangerous looks; was compassionate to the poor; a father to the orphan, a protector to the widow, a guide to the blind, and a support to the lame.

God permitted Satan to put the virtue of Job to the test; at first giving him power over his property; but forbidding him to touch his person. Satan began with taking away his oxen; a company of Saulites slew his husbandmen, and drove off all the beasts: one servant only escaping to bring the news. While he was reporting this misfortune, a second came, and informed Job that fire from heaven had consumed his sheep, and those who kept them; and that he alone had escaped. A third messenger arrived, who said, "The Chaldeans have carried away the culled, have killed all thy servants, and I only am escaping." He had scarcely concluded, when another came, and said, "While thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking in their eldest brother's house, an insidious wind suddenly overthrew it, and they were all crushed to death under the ruins; I alone am escaped to bring thee this news." Job rent his clothes, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground saying, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." As Job endured these calamities without repenting against Providence, Satan solicited permission to afflict his person, and the Lord said, "Behold he is in thine hand, but touch not his life." Satan, therefore, smote him with a dreadful disease, probably the leprosy; and Job, seated in ashes, scraped off the corruption with a potsherd. His wife incited him to "curse God, and die!" but Job answered, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" In the mean time, three of his friends, having been informed of his misfortunes, came to visit him—Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite. A fourth was Elihu the Buzite, who from chap. xxxii. bears a distinguished part in the dialogue. (See Elihu.) They continued seven days sitting on the ground by him, without speaking; but at last Job broke silence, and complained of his misery. His friends, not distinguishing between the evils with which God tries those whom he loves, and the afflictions with which he punishes the wicked, accused him of having indulged some secret impiety, and urged him to return to God by repentance, and humbly to submit to his justice, since he suffered only according to his deserts.

Job, convinced of his own innocence, maintained, that his sufferings were greater than his faults, and that God sometimes afflicted the righteous only to try them, to give them an opportunity of manifesting or of improving their pious dispositions; or because it was his pleasure, for reasons unknown to mankind. Elihu takes a middle path, referring strongly to the sovereignty of God. To terminate the controversy, the Deity appears in a cloud, and decides in favor of Job; but does not approve those harsh expressions, which the extremity of his sorrow, and the warmth of dispute, had excited. Job humbly acknowledges his fault, and asks forgiveness. The Lord condemns his friends, and enjoins them to expiate their sins with sacrifices, offered by his hands. He restores Job to health, gives him a double portion of the riches which he before possessed, blesses him with a beautiful and numerous family, and crowns a holy life with a happy death.

The time in which this pious man lived is much contested. But supposing him to have been contemporary with Moses, and fixing the time of his trial at some years after the departure of the Hebrews out of Egypt, (it cannot be placed earlier, because it is supposed he speaks of this event,) he might have lived till the time of Christ. Supposing, for instance, that he was afflicted seven years after the Exodus, (A. M. 2520,) and that he lived 140 years afterwards, he must have died in 2960.

Tomb, called Job's, have been shown in several places. The most celebrated is in the Trachonitis towards the springs of the Jordan, where for many ages a pyramid was believed to be Job's tomb. It is placed between the cities of Teman, Sinah, and Naamath, which are supposed to have been in this country. Some writers have doubted whether there ever was such a person as Job; but there is no denying his existence without contradicting Ezekiel, Tobit, and James, who speak of him as a holy man, and hold him up as a true pattern of patience: and without opposing also the current of tradition among both
JOE

Jews and Christians. Others place his history as low as the time of David or Solomon, and some even so late as the time of Augustus. He says that he is cited by Tobit and by Ezekiel as an ancient patriarch.

The Book of Job.—Various conjectures have been made concerning the author of this book. The original work was probably more ancient than the time of Moses, and seems to have been written in the old Hebrew, or perhaps the Arabic. Our present copy is evidently altered in its style, so as to have transfused it into a Hebrew phraseology, resembling that in the age of Solomon, to the writings of which author the style bears a great resemblance. This idea, for which we are indebted to Dr. J. P. Smith, meets the difficulties that have been urged from the style of the book, against its antiquity, and unites the discordant opinions that have been entertained on the subject. It is written in verse, whose beauty consists principally in noble expressions, bold and sublime thoughts, lively emotions, fine descriptions, and great diversity of character. We believe there is not in all antiquity a piece of poetry more copious, more lofty, more magnificent, more diversified, more adorned, or more affecting. The author has praiscd all the beauties of his art, in the characters of the four persons whom he brings upon the stage. The history, as to the substance of it, is true; the sentiments, reasons, and arguments of the several personages are faithfully expressed; but the terms and turns of expression are the poet's own.

The canonical authority of the book of Job is generally acknowledged. Paul, in several places, seems to quote the book of Job; or, at least, to allude to it; and James commends the patience of Job, which, he says, was well known to them to whom he wrote.

JOCHEBED, wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Moses, and Aaron. Several difficulties are started concerning the degree of relationship between Amram and Jochebed, she being called in Ex. vi. 20, the father's sister to Amram. Some assert that she was the daughter immediately of Levi, and aunt of Amram, her husband, because (Exod. ii. 1; Numb. xxvi. 50) she is called daughter of Levi. Others maintain, that she was only cousin-german to Amram, being daughter of one of Kohath's brethren. The Chaldee, on Exod. vi. 20, says, she was daughter of Amram's sister; the LXX say, she was the daughter of Levi's son. Calmet thinks it most probable, that Jochebed was only cousin-german to Amram; because, (1.) had she been the immediate daughter of Levi, the disproportion between her age and Amram's would have been too great; (2.) marriages between aunt and nephew were forbidden by the law; and we have no proof that they were allowed previously; (3.) by daughter of Levi, may very well be meant granddaughter, according to the style of the Hebrews.

I. JOEL, the prophet Samuel's eldest son, who with his brother Abish was judge over Israel, 1 Sam. viii. 1. 2, &c. They exercised their jurisdiction in Beerheba, in the south of Palestine. Their injustice induced Israel to desire a king.

2. JOEL, one of the minor prophets. Of the circumstances of his life, and of the time in which he lived and prophesied, the Scriptures afford us no account whatever; except what may be inferred from different hints and circumstances contained in the book itself. From these it is clear, first, that he lived in the kingdom of Judah, at a time when the temple and the temple-worship still existed. (Compare chap. i. 14; ii. 1, 15, 32; iii. 1, seq.) We may, secondly, priest, and father of another Azariah, 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10. Some believe him to be Jehoiada, the father of Zacharias, the son of Joas, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 11, &c.

I. JOHN, father of Mattathias, the celebrated Maccebeus, 1 Mac. ii. 1.

II. JOHN, a son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas, Jonathan, and Simon Maccebeus. He was treacherously killed by the sons of Jonathob, as he was conducting the baggage belonging to his brethren the Maccebees to the Neophytes, their allies, 1 Mac. ix. 30.

III. JOHN HIRCANUS, son of Simon Maccebeus, was by his father made governor of the sea-coast of Judea, where he defeated Cendebeus, general of Antiochus Sidetes, then besieging Tryphon in Dora. He escaped from the intended slaughter of the Maccebees family by his brother-in-law Poinaya, in which his father Simon fell; after whose death, John was acknowledged prince and high-priest of his nation. He was attacked in Jerusalem by Antiochus; but defended the city vigorously, and took occasion of the Feast of Tabernacles to negotiate a peace which he effected, paying the king a great sum of money (300 talents); which, some say, he obtained from David's sepulchre. John accompanied Antiochus in his war against the Parthians; which, however favorable at first, at length issued in the defeat of the king; and John seized the opportunity to render himself independent of the kings of Syria. In the following year, he conquered the Idumeans, and compelled them to receive circumcision after the Jewish manner, with other Jewish rites. He sent ambassadors to Rome, to renew the alliance with that people; and, some years afterwards, besieged Samaria, which was taken by his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus, after a year's resistance. John ordered the city to be demolished, in which state it continued to the time of Galbinus. He was now master of all Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and many frontier towns; so that he was one of the most powerful princes of his time. At home, however, he was troubled by the Pharisees, who envied his exaltation, and at length their mutual ill-will broke out into open enmity. John forbade the observance of such ceremonies as were founded on tradition only; and he enforced his orders by penalties on the contumacious. He is said to have burned the castle of Beth ears, the temple, which became the palace of the Asmoncean princes; and where the pontifical vestments were kept. After having been high-priest twenty-nine years, John died, 1 Matt. A. D. 106. Josephus says he was deposed, with the merit of prophecy, Antiq. i. lxxiii. 17, 18; xvii. 6. 2 Mac. iii. 11, et al.

IV. JOHN THE BAPTIST, the forerunner of our Lord Jesus Christ, and son of Zacharias and Elisabeth, was born A. M. 4000, about six months before Jesus Christ. His birth, name, and office were foretold to his father Zacharias, when he was performing his functions as a priest in the temple of Jerusalem, Luke i. 10, 11, &c. (See ANNUXTION.) On the eighth day after the birth of the child, when the time for circumcising him was come, they called him by his father's name, Zacharias; but his mother told them his name should be John, which his father confirmed. The child grew, and was strengthened in spirit, and dwelt in the wilderness till the day of his manifestation to Israel, ver. 20—21.

Chrysostom and Jerome believe that John was brought up from his infancy in the wilderness, where he abode without eating or drinking, as Jesus says, Matt. xi. 18, (that is, eating and drinking little, and things of a plain kind,) and being clothed only with a camel's skin, and a leathern girdle, Matt. iii. 4. (See CAMEL'S HAIR.) When he had arrived at thirty years of age, God manifested him to the world, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, A. D. 28; and he began his ministry, by publishing the approach of the Messiah, in the country along and beyond Jordan, preaching repentance. He induced many persons to confess their sins; whom he baptized in the river Jordan, exhorting them to believe in him who was coming after him; and who would baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. From this baptism, John derived the surname of Baptist, or Baptist. Many persons became his disciples, exercising themselves in acts of repentance, and urging it on others. When Jesus presented himself to receive baptism from him, John excused himself, saying, "I need rather being baptized by thee;" but Jesus declaring that it became them to fulfill all righteousness, John complied. This was A. D. 30. The next day John publicly announced Jesus, as the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world, John i. 29—30.

Herod Antipas having married his brother Philip's wife, John, with his usual boldness, reproved him to his face. Herod, incensed, ordered him into custody, in the castle of Machæerus, where he remained a long time. Herod fearing to do him further harm, knowing that he was much beloved by the people. Herodias, however, sought an opportunity of putting him to death, which she accomplished (Matt. xiv. 1—12,) about the end of A. D. 31, or early in A. D. 32. The Gospels do not say where John was buried; but in the time of Julian the Apostate, his tomb was shown at Samaria, where the inhabitants opened it, and burnt part of his bones; the rest were saved by some Christians, who carried them to an abbot of Jero- sum, named Philip. (Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 3. Chronic. Alex. p. 68.)

V. JOHN THE EVANGELIST, son of Zebedee, was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee, and by trade a fisherman. Our Saviour called him and his brother James, sons of thunder. It is believed that John was the youngest of the apostles. Our Saviour had a particular friendship for him, and he describes himself by the phrase of "that disciple whom Jesus loved." He was present at the transfiguration, and as he sat on the mouth of the temple, he beheld, with all the disciples, a certain young man, who discovered to him who should betray him, John xii. 22; xvi. 20. Jesus also chose James and John, with Peter, as witnesses of his agony in the olive-garden. After the soldiers had seized his master, it is believed that John was the disciple who followed him to Caiphas' house, where he went in, and afterwards introduced Peter. He attended our Saviour to the cross; and Jesus observing him, said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son;" and then to his disciple, "Behold thy mother." xix. 26, 27.

After the resurrection, and while several of the disciples were fishing on the sea of Tiberias, Jesus appeared on the shore, where John first discovered him, and told Peter. They came on shore, dined with their risen Lord, and after dinner John following him, Peter asked Jesus, what was to become of John. Jesus answered, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?"—a remark which induced the disciples to believe, that Jesus had said he should not die. John himself, however, confutes his opinion. The period referred to was, no doubt, the punishment of Jerusalem, which this evangelist lived to see: not the general judgment, which is yet distant.
Within a few days after the apostles had received the Holy Ghost, Peter and John went up to the temple at Jerusalem on the feast of Pentecost, according to Acts iii. 1–10. This miracle occasioned their imprisonment, but the next day they were liberated, and forbidden to speak in the name of Jesus Christ. They continued preaching, however, and were again imprisoned several times.

Peter and John were sent to Samaria, to confer the Holy Ghost on those whom Philip the deacon had baptized, Acts viii. 5–14. John was of the council of Jerusalem, and was evidently one of the pillars of the church. It is believed that he preached to the Parthians, and the Indians maintain, that he published the gospel in that country. There is no doubt of his preaching in Asia, and of his remaining some time at Ephesus, and near it, though we do not know the exact time. It could scarcely be before A. D. 66. Jerome says, he founded and governed the churches of Asia.

The emperor Domitian persecuted the church in the fifteenth year of his reign; (A. D. 95.) and John, it is said, was carried to Rome, where he was plunged into boiling oil, without being hurt, and afterwards exiled to the island of Patmos, in the Ægean sea, where he wrote his Revelations. (See Apocatast.) Domitian being killed in A. D. 96, his successor, Nerva, recalled all who had been banished; and John returned to Ephesus, A. D. 97, being about ninety years of age. The bishops and Christians of Asia pressing him to write what he had heard from our Saviour, he complied, and wrote his Gospel, after a public fast and prayers. His principal view in this narration was, to relate such things as might confirm the divinity of the Son, in opposition to heretics of that time. See Gospel.

John lived to a very great age, so that he could scarcely go to the assembly of the church, without being carried by his disciples. Being now unable to make long discourses, his custom was to say, in all assemblies, to the people, "My dear children, love one another. At length they grew weary of this concise exhortation; and when he was informed of this, his answer was, "This is what the Lord commands you; and this, if you do it, is sufficient." He died at Ephesus, in the third year of Trajan, the 100th of Jesus Christ, being then, according to Epiphanius, nine years old, but the gospel says, he was 85 or 90 years old, others 104, 106, or 120. He was buried near city; and several of the fathers mention his sepulchre as being there.

We have three Epistles by John. The first is a kind of tract, designed to refute certain erroneous doctrines, which had been propagated in the church, similar to, if not the same with, those of the Cerinthians and the Gnostics. The second is addressed to a lady of rank, named Electa; or, as others think, to a Christian church. The third letter is directed to Gaius, whom John praises for hospitality to the faithful, and exhorts to continue his pious practice. It should be remarked, that the intention of these two epistles is directly contrary one to the other. In that to Electa, the apostle cautions her against receiving and patronizing travelling teachers who held not the truth correctly; whereas in that to Gaius, the apostle greatly commends him for receiving travelling teachers, generally; censures Diotrephes for rejecting some; and praises Demetrius for his candor. It should seem, therefore, that these epistles are misplaced. If Gaius be Paul’s host, the epistle to him may be placed the earliest in point of time; and to does not agree the absence of allusion to heretical opinions, which had not yet infected the church; but, in the next age, there was much of the same kind, and consequently Christian hospitality was exposed to imputation. It seems likely, also, that Gaius, living at Corinth, was visited by a deacon; but as John had met (probably) at Ephesus, with "the children of Electa, whom he found walking in the truth," to his great joy, and to their mother’s praise, it is very credible, if not rather certain, that this lady lived at no great distance from that city, that is, in Asia Minor; so that notwithstanding his advanced age, he might easily, "having many things to say, come unto her, and speak face to face." Her sister probably lived at Ephesus, near, or possibly with, the apostle.

Several apocryphal writings are attributed to John; as, a book of his supposed travels, another of his acts used by the Encratites, Manichaeans, and Priscillianists; a book concerning the descent; and the assumption of the Virgin, &c. John is generally surmised "the Divine," from the sublimity of his knowledge, particularly in the beginning of his Gospel. He is painted with a cup and a serpent issuing out of it, in allusion to a story of poison given to him by some heretics in a glass, the venom of which he dispelled under the form of a serpent, by making a sign of the cross over it.

VI. JOHN MARK, cousin to Barnabas, and his disciple, was the son of a Christian woman named Mary, who had a house in Jerusalem, where the disciples and apostles met. Here they were at prayers in the night, when Peter, who was delivered out of prison by an angel, knocked at the door, (Acts xii. 15.) and in the same house the celebrated church of Sion is said to have been afterwards established. John attached himself to Paul and Barnabas, whom he followed to Antioch, and thence to Perga and Pamphylia, where he left them, and returned to Jerusalem, Acts xv. 38. A. D. 45.

Six years afterwards, he accompanied Barnabas to the isle of Cyprus; and, in A. D. 63, we find him at Rome, performing signal services for Paul during his imprisonment. The apostle speaks advantageously of him, in Col. iv. 10, and again in his epistle to Philemon, (ver. 24.) written A. D. 62. Two years afterwards he was in Asia, and with Timothy: Paul desires him to bring Mark with him; (2 Cor. IV. 2.) he is useful to him for the ministry of the gospel, 2 Tim. iv. 11. It is thought that John Mark died at Ephesus; but the year of his death, and the manner of it, are unknown.

Calmet is of opinion, that John Mark is a different person from Mark the evangelist; but they are considered to have been the same person by Jones, Lightfoot, Wetstein, Lardner, Michalisch, and Taylor. To strengthen this opinion, Mr. Taylor remarks that it should be observed, that throughout the Acts he is spoken of as "John whose surname was Mark:" that is, Luke, writing in Italy, Latinizes; it being customary for Jews, when in foreign countries, to use names more familiar to those countries than their Hebrew appellations; and if Mark, as is beyond a doubt, accompanied Peter to Rome, he would be known there by his surname only.

JOKMEAM, a city of Ephraim, afterwards given to the Levites of Kohath’s family, 1 Chron. vi. 68.

JOKNEAM, a city of Zebulun, given to the Le-JONAH, son of Amittai, and one of the minor...
Philistines, after the ark was taken, or the more remarkable captivity of the ten tribes, which wandered away beyond the Euphrates by the Assyrian kings.

II. JONATHAN, son of Saul, and the faithful friend of David, was a prince of great valor and piety. During the war between Saul and the Philistines, Jonathan, intent upon following up the victory, with his armor-bearer, attacked the camp of the enemy, and threw them into such disorder, that they killed one another. Saul pursued the enemy, and pronounced a curse on the man who should hinder the pursuit by taking of food. Jonathan, who was absent when this anathema was uttered, ate of some honey which he found in the wood, and was only saved from death by the firmness of the people, 1 Sam. xiv.

War breaking out between the Hebrews and the Philistines, Saul and Jonathan encamped on mount Gilboa with the army of Israel; but their camp was forced, their troops routed, and themselves slain, ch. xxxi. ante A. D. 1055. The news being brought to David, he mourned for a year, and composed a funeral song to their honor, thus evincing his tenderness toward his friend Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. He left a son named Mephibosheth, on whom David conferred various favors.

III. JONATHAN, son of Abiathar, the high-priest, who gave notice to Adonijah and his party, near the fountain of Rogel, that David had declared Solomon his successor, 1 Kings i. 42, 43.

IV. JONATHAN, or JOHANAN, or JOHN, high-priest of the Jews, son of Jehoiada, and father of Jeddo, or Jedus, celebrated in the time of Alexander the Great, Neb. xii. 11. He lived under Ezra and Nehemiah. He died, after having exercised the high-priesthood thirty-two years, and was succeeded by Jeddo, his son.

V. JONATHAN, a scribe, and keeper of the prisons in Jerusalem under Zedekiah, Jer. xxxvii. 13, 20. He was very severe to the prophet Jeremiah, who therefore earnestly desired Zedekiah that he might not be sent back into that dungeon, where his life was in danger.

VI. JONATHAN BEN UZZIEL, see TARSHUM.

VII. JONATHAN, surnamed Apphus, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas Maccabæus, was, after the death of Judas, appointed general of the troops of Israel, and, after a number of feats of valor, was basely killed by Tryphon, ante A. D. 144, 1 Mac. ii. There are several persons whose names are mentioned in Scripture, but they have no important relation to such events as we are required to notice.

JOPE, JAPH, or JAFFA, is one of the most ancient seaports in the world; its traditional history stretching far back into the twilight of time. Pliny assigns it a date anterior to the deluge. It was a border town of the tribe of Dan, and is situated in a fine plain, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, thirty miles south of Cesarea, and forty-five northwest of Jerusalem. It owes all the circumstances of its celebrity, as the principal port of Judea, to its situation with regard to Jerusalem.—As a station for vessels, its harbor is one of the worst on the coast. Josephus speaks of it as "not fit for a haven, on account of the impetuous south winds which beat upon it; which, rolling the sands that come from the sea against the shores, do not admit of ships lying in their station; but the merchants are generally there forced to ride at their anchors on the sea itself." D’Arvieux, however, is of opinion that this port was anciently much superior to what it is at present. He observed, in the sea, south of the port, the vestiges of a wall, which extended to a chain of rocks at some distance from the shore, by which the port was formed, and protected against the violence of the south-west winds. To this port he remarks, "with no doubt, sufficiently good before it was filled up, although its entrance was exposed to winds from the north." As it was used by Solomon for receiving his timber from Tyre, and by the succeeding kings of Judah, as their port of communication with foreign nations, they would unquestionably bestow upon it all the advantages within their power.

The present town of Jaffa is seated on a promontory, jutting out into the sea, rising to the height of about 150 feet above its level, and offering, on all sides, picturesque and varied prospects. Towards the west is extended the open sea; towards the south spread fertile plains, reaching as far as Gaza; towards the north, as far as Carmel, the flowery meads of Sharon present themselves; and towards the east, the hills of Ephraim and Judah raise their towering heads. The town is walled round on the south and east, towards the land, and partially so on the north and west, towards the sea. Mr. Buckingham describes the approach to Jaffa as quite destitute of interest. The town, seated on a promontory, and facing chiefly to the northward, looks like a heap of buildings, crowded as closely as possible into a given space; and, from the steepness of its site, they appear in some places to stand one on the other. The interior of the town corresponds with its outward mien, and has all the appearance of a poor village. The streets are very narrow, uneven, and dirty; and are rather entitled to the appellation of alleys. The inhabitants are estimated at between four and five thousand, of whom the greater part are Turks and Arabs; the Christians are stated to be about six hundred, consisting of Roman Catholics, Greeks, Maronites, and Armenians. The Latins, Greeks, and Armenians have each a small convent for the reception of pilgrims.

The high antiquity attributed to the town of Joppa, as well as the remarkable circumstances connected with its history, excites a laudable curiosity regarding it. We have already stated that Pilny assigns its foundation to a period anterior to the flood; and a tradition is preserved, that here Noah lived and built his ark. Some authors ascribe its origin to Japheth, son of Noah, and thence derive its name. However fabulous such accounts may be justly deemed, they afford proofs of the great antiquity of the place, having been recorded by historians, for so many ages, as the only traditions extant concerning its origin. In the time of Pilny and Jerome the inhabitants pretended to exhibit the marks of the chains with which Andromeda was fastened to a rock. The skeleton of the huge sea-monster, to which she was exposed, is said by Pilny to have been brought to Rome by Scæurus, and there carefully preserved. Pausanias, too, insists that near Joppa was to be seen a fountain, where Peræus washed off the blood with which he had been covered from the wounds received in his combat with the monster; and adds that, from this circumstance, the water ever afterwards remained of a red color. This fable has been ingeniously explained, by supposing that this daughter of the Ethiopian king was courted by the captain of a ship, who attempted to carry her off, but was prevented by the interposition of another more faithful lover. From this port the JOSEPHUS reffers to the seawhale as the sea-monster, which, from the presence of the Lord; (Jos. i. 3.) and it is more than probable, that the profane account of the sea-monster may have some connection with the sacred story of the large fish that swallowed up the prophet, Amos. 8: 14; for the whale was forty feet in length, and the other anatomical proportions given of the sea-monster to which Andromeda was exposed, was it really a whale. These statements, coupled with the fact that fish having been, from the earliest times, an object of worship at Joppa, though it by no means proves the foundation of this city before the deluge, as has been assumed, gives the appearance of some affinity between the accounts of the Jews and Gentiles regarding it.

In the wars of the Maccabees, when Judea was a scene of great contention, a deed of treachery is laid to the charge of the men of Joppa, in destroying the innocent with the guilty. This was so completely in the spirit of the early wars that delayed this country with blood, as almost to justify the exemplary vengeance which was taken on their town for such an act. It was burnt and exposed to pillage by Judas Maccabaeus, who called on God, the righteous judge, to avenge him on the murderers of his brethren, 2 Macc. i. 7. About this time, Joppa appears as sustaining a siege, and at length falling before the arms of Jonathan, the high-priest, who had invested it. It was soon afterwards entered a second time by an officer of Simon, the brother of Jonathan, who had been entangled at Ptolemais. He had been elected, by acclamation, to become the captain and leader of the Jews, instead of Jonathan, and had sent down a force from Jerusalem, to cast out those who were in Joppa, and to remain therein, 1 Macc. x. 74. It is afterwards enumerated among the cities desired to be restored to the Jews, by a decree of the Roman senate, after having been taken from them by Antiochus, as expressed in a letter sent by the ambassadors of the Jews, from Jerusalem to Rome. It was about this time, also, peculiarly privileged by a decree of Julius Cesar, emperor and dictator, in being exempted from the yearly tribute, which all the other cities of the Jews were obliged to pay, for the city Jerusalem. Its history, in the days of the apostles, is more familiar to us; and the vision of Peter, who saw the Gentile descending from heaven, and a Gentile, clean and unclean, and heard a voice exclaming, "Rise, Peter, kill and eat," as well as the raising of Tabitha, the female disciple, from the dead, and the reception of the messengers from Cesarea thereby, which was mentioned to be reunited with Jerusalem. The history of the taking of this place from the pirates, by Vespasian, (Joseph. Ant. iii. c. 9. s. 2.) is worthy of being consulted; particularly as the operations strikingly illustrate the local description by which the account of them is accompanied, and which is remarkable for its clearness and fidelity.

About two centuries after this, it was visited by Jerome, who speaks of it under its original name of Japho, which it still retained, with very little corruption, when it was held by the Saracens, into whose hands it had fallen during the Syrian war. It was necessarily a contested point with the crusaders, as the port of debarkation for Jerusalem; and it therefore retained all the naval operations of their war. The rabbi Benjamin, who has been so often accused of magnifying the numbers of the Jews, in all parts of the world, with a view to enhance the importance of his own nation, found here, about this period, only one solitary individual, who was a dyer of linen, seemingly the most common occupation of the laboring Jews in those days, as that of money-changing is at present.

After the last crusade of Louis IX. of France, Jaffa fell, with the other maritime towns of Syria, under the power of the Mamelukes of Egypt, who first shut up the Franks within their last hold at Acre, and soon after closed, by its capture, the bloody history of these holy wars. In 1776, it again suffered all the horrors of war, having its population, young and old, male and female, barbarously cut to pieces, and a pyramid formed of their bleeding heads, as a monument of a monster's victory. (Volney, Trav. vol. i. p. 150.) Its history, since that period, is numbered among the events of our own day.

I. JORAM, son of Toli, king of Hamath, was sent to David by his father, to congratulate him on his victory over Hadadezer, 2 Sam. viii. 10.

II. JORAM, or Jehoram, son of Ahab, king of Israel, and successor to his eldest brother, Ahaziah, who died without children, 2 Kings iii. 1, &c. He did evil before the Lord; but not like Ahab, his father, and Jezebel, his mother. He removed the statues of Baal which Ahab had erected; but he continued to worship the golden calves. Mesha, king of Moab, having refused to pay his tribute, Joram warred against him, and invited Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to accompany him, who also brought the king of Edom, his tributary. These princes advanced through the wilderness of Edom; but were soon in danger of perishing for want of water, from which they were relieved by Elisha. The prophet afterwards rendered very important services to Joram during his wars with Syria, by discovering to him the designs of Benhadad. During the siege of Samaria, the famine was so terrible, that a woman ate her own son. Joram, being informed of the calamity, rent his clothes, wore sackcloth, and ordered a servant to go and cut off Elisha's head; as if the cause of these distresses had been with the prophet. Elisha, who was then in his house, desired his friends to hold the door, and to prevent such a sorrow from entering; adding, that Joram was close at his heels, to revoke the order. Accordingly, the king came almost at the same instant, and complained to Elisha, who comforted him, and forestalled a great plenty for the next year, when Elisha died. Joram reigned in the twelfth year of his reign, ante A. D. 884.

III. JORAM, see Jehoram I.

JORDAN, the principal river of Canaan. It was formerly believed, chiefly on the authority of the Jewish historian, that the source of the Jordan was in the lake Phiala, about 12 miles distant from Paneas or Cesarea Philippi, whence it passed under ground, and emerged again from the cave of Paneas, in the vicinity of the town. This double source of the river is now, however, generally exploded. Barzillai says, it rises an hour and a quarter, or about 4 miles north-east from Panias, in the plain, near a hill called Tel-el-Radi; it is soon after joined by the river of Panias, which runs east of the Jordan for some distance, and the united streams, now a considerable piece of water, fall into the Bahr-el-Houly, or the lake Merom, or Semechonitis, which has several other tributary streams, and is, perhaps, better entitled to be considered as the source of the Jordan than any other place to which this honor is assigned. Leaving this lake, the river runs in a southerly direction for about 128 or 150 miles; in its way passing through the lake of Tiberias, 7 1/2 miles itself in the Dead sea. See CANAAN, p. 323.

It is not to be expected that we should have a very accurate description of the dimensions of this celebrated river, owing to the great disadvantages under which travellers are obliged to make their observations. Modern writers vary much in their accounts as to its breadth; a comparison of their statements induce a belief that it is about thirty yards in breadth, having a very rapid current, and therefore discharging a great body of water. To course and channel of the river are accurately described by Maundrell, Burckhardt, and Buckingham. "The whole of the plain," says the last mentioned writer, "from the mountains of Judea on the west, to those of Arabia on the east, may be called the vale of Jordan, in a general way; but in the centre of the plain, which is at least 10 miles broad, the Jordan runs in another, still lower valley, perhaps a mile broad, in some of the widest parts, and a furlong in the narrowest. There are here the thickest silt along the edge of the stream, as well as upon this lower plain, which would afford ample shelter for wild beasts; and, as the Jordan might overflow its banks when swollen with rains, sufficiently to inundate this lower plain, through which it over a long time, was most probably, from these that the lions were driven out from the inundations, which gave rise to the prophet's simile, 'Behold, he shall come up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan.'" (Jer. xii. 19; 1. 44.) (Trav. p. 313.)

Volney is positive as to this fact. He says, "In winter it overflows its narrow channel; and, swelled by the rains, forms a sheet of water sometimes a quarter of a league broad. The time of its overflowing is generally in March, when the snows melt on the mountains of the Shaik: at time, more than any other, its waters are troubled, and of a yellow hue, and its course is impetuous. Its banks are covered with a thick forest of reeds, willows, and various shrubs, which serve as an asylum for wild hours, owls, jackals, hares, and different kinds of birds."

(Burckhardt, however, is more particular as to the exact course of the river: "The valley of the Jordan, or El Ghor, which may be considered as the northern extremity of the lake of Tiberias, has, near Byzan, a direction of north by east and south by west. Its breadth is about two miles. The great number of rivulets which descend from the mountains on both sides, and form numerous pools of stagnant waters, produce, in many places, a pleasing verdure, and a luxuriant growth of wild herbage and grass; but the greater part of the ground is a parched desert, of which a few spots only are cultivated by the Bedouins...." The river Jordan, on issuing from the lake of Tiberias, flows for about three hours near the western hills, and then turns toward the eastern, on which side it continues its course for several hours. The river flows in a valley of about a quarter of an hour in breadth, which is considerably lower than the rest of the plain of the Ghor: this low valley is covered with high trees of a luxuriant verdure, which affords a striking contrast with the sandy slopes that border it on both sides. The river, where it passes it, was about eighty paces broad, and about three feet deep; this, it must be recollected, was in the midst of summer. In the winter it inundates the plain in the bottom of the narrow valley; but never rises to the level of the upper plain of the Ghor, which is at least 40 feet above the level of the river."

The general form of the Jordan has been described under the article CANAAN, pp. 322 and 323, in which latter passage the great valley El Ghor and El Araba, stretching from the Dead sea to the Elanitic gulf, is described. This is also done, with still more particularity, under the article EXODUS, p. 414. Through this valley it is highly probable that the Jordan, in very ancient times, pursued its course to the Red sea, until the convulsions occasioned by the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the subsequent filling up of the bottom of the valley by the drifting sand, caused the stoppage of its waters. See under CANAAN, p. 238, and ELAM, p. 380. R.

The Talmudists say that "the waters of the Jordan are not fit to sprinkle the unclean, because they are mixed waters," meaning, mixed with the waters of other rivers and brooks, which empty themselves into it. The reader will compare with this the opinion of Naaman the Syrian, (2 Kings v. 11, 12,) who probably had received the same notion. Perhaps, too, their inferiority was well understood, and not forgotten by the prophet of Ismael.

The regular passages over the Jordan were, (1.) Jacob's bridge, between the lakes Merom and Gennesaret, said to be the place where Jacob met his brother Esau, and where he was refreshed by an angel. (2.) A bridge at Chammath, at the issue of the river from the lake of Gennesaret. (3.) A ferry at Beth-abera, 2 Sam. xix. 18; 2 Kings ii. 6. (4.) It is probable that there was another at Bethanah, or Scythopolis.

The phrase "beyond Jordan," in the early books of Moses and in Joshua, sometimes means the west of the river; but subsequently, that is, when the Hebrews had taken possession of the country, the term has the opposite meaning, denoting the country east of the river.

1. JOSEPH, son of Jacob and Rachel, was born in Mesopotamia. He was favored by God, in his youth, with prophetic dreams, and his father, Jacob, loved him tenderly, and gave him a coat of many colors; or rather a long robe, as a mark of partial paternal affection. His brothers became jealous of these marks of affection; and Joseph unconsciously increased the evil disposition in them, by accounting him of some crime, or by reporting to his father their wicked discourses; but, above all, by relating to them certain dreams, in one of which he had seen twelve sheaves, belonging to them, bow before his shaf, which stood upright in the field. His father heard the relation without remark; but his brethren could not bear the allusion. Being sent by his father to visit his brethren, they conspired against him, and would have slain him; but Reuben opposing this, they threw him into an old well, which was dry; and soon after, perceiving a caravan of Midianite merchants going into Egypt, they sold him, and deceived Jacob into a belief of his destruction by a wild beast.

The merchants carried Joseph into Egypt, and sold him as a slave to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, whose confidence he soon obtained, and was by him made steward of his house, and director of all his domestic affairs, Gen. xxix. But Potiphar's wife, conceiving a criminal passion for Joseph, has also beseeched him to gratify her desires; and at last pressed him so closely, that he could only escape by leaving his cloak in her possession. Seeing herself thus despied, she cried out, and complained that the young Hebrew maid had struck her, showing her certain evidence against him. Potiphar, believing him to be guilty, threw Joseph into prison, where by his conduct he soon obtained the confidence of the warden, and was made overseer. It so happened that two of the king's officers, his butler and baker, having incurred his displeasure, were put into the same prison with Joseph. Each of them had a dream in reference to himself, which Joseph explained, and his interpretation of both was fulfilled. The butler was restored to his dignity, but did not remember Joseph. Two years after this event, Pharaoh had dreams by which he was perplexed, but which none of his wise men were able to explain. His butler at length remembered Joseph, whom Pharaoh commanded to be brought into his presence. The king related his dreams, and Joseph interpreted them; foretelling a prodigious plenty, which would be succeeded by exhausting famine; to guard against the consequences of which he recommended that a prudent man should be appointed to lay up stores, during the season of plenty. His counsel was approved by Pharaoh, and himself appointed to the office. The king also put his own ring on Joseph's finger, clothed him in fine linen, or cotton, put a chain of gold about his neck, made him ride in the chariot next to his own, and gave orders to proclaim him governor of all Egypt. He changed his name to Zaphnath-panemah, which in Egyptian signifies "Saviour of the world," a high-sounding title, like those given to oriental princes at the present day. Joseph married Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, or Heliopolis, by whom he had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

During the famine which had been foretold, and which extended to Canaan, Jacob sent his ten sons to extremities, sent his sons into Egypt to purchase corn, retaining only Benjamin, his beloved one, at home. On their arrival they were introduced to Joseph, and stated the nature of their errand. Joseph immediately recognized his brethren, but being desirous to obtain from them an artless statement of their family circumstances, and especially an account of his father Jacob and his brother Benjamin, he assumed a great sternness of manners, affected to doubt the truth of their story, and accused them of being spies. This had the desired effect; the sons of Jacob procrastinated themselves before him, and related their artless tale. Joseph, however, detained them three days in custody, probably to observe them more narrowly, and to penetrate in the proper sense of the misconduct which had marked their past lives, and then consented that they should, with the exception of Simeon, return to their father, and bring back Benjamin. Feelings of remorse were now awakened in their minds, and they exclaimed with one voice, "We are very guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us." Jacob was greatly affected at the command to send Benjamin into Egypt, the reason for which he could not comprehend, but after a severe struggle with his feelings, consented that he should depart with his brothers. They again arrived in Egypt, and were introduced into the presence of Joseph, who, scarcely able to conceal the yearnings of his affection towards Benjamin, ordered a dinner to be prepared. After this they were sent off on their journey, but an expedient was resorted to by Joseph again to bring them back. Their corn was loaded, and in Benjamin's sack was concealed, by Joseph's orders, his silver cup. Scarcely had they left the city, therefore, when they were pursued, charged with robbery, and brought back trembling into the presence of their brother. The time had now arrived for the discovery to be made. The hearts of his brethren had been fully made bare before Joseph, and he felt convinced that they had deeply bewailed and deplored their former cruel demeanour towards him. He threw off his disguise, embraced them with all the ardor of genuine affection, and such a scene ensued as only the pen of inspiration could portray. (See Gen. xliii. xlviii. xlv.) Joseph immediately, with the approbation of Pharaoh, sent for his father, and the land of Goshen was appropriated for the residence of the family.

But we must glance at the affairs of Egypt during this period, in relation to Joseph's administration. During the years of famine the Egyptians necessarily purchased their supplies of corn from the royal granaries; and in order to obtain these they parted first with their money, next with their cattle, and then with their lands and persons. Their lands and cattle were restored, on condition of the payment of a fifth part of their crops to the king.

Joseph attended the death-bed of his venerable parent, who gave to the two children of his favorite son—Ephraim and Manasseh—portions among the tribes, and assured Joseph that the Lord would again bring his family into the land of his fathers. At this time Joseph was about 50 years of age; he is supposed to have lived 54 years afterwards, and then died in Egypt, "by faith making mention of the departing of the children of Israel, and giving commandment concerning his bones."—i. e. that his brethren should carry them up into Canaan when they departed thence, Heb. xi. 32; Gen. xlvii. 4. After his death, his body was put into a stone coffin, and was carried away at the exodus, Exod. xiii. 19. The tribe of Ephraim buried it near Shechem, in the field which Jacob had given to Joseph, Josh. xxiv. 32.

There are one or two incidents in the life of Joseph that seem to require further notice than we could give them in this brief narrative. A difficulty has suggested itself to the minds of some persons regarding them of being mentioned in Gen. xlv. 5. In our translation it is said, not only that it was the cup out of which he drank, but the one also "wherby he divineth." Now, as divination is by no means a study which reflects honor on a people, it is proper to regard this, as one of the jealousy of the patriarch's piety, giving another rendering to the passage—and for which he would search accurately." So ver. 5, instead of "know you not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" they render, "I would search carefully," i.e. for the cup. Without disputing these ideas, Mr. Taylor proposes a different import of the passage. Dining one day, he remarks, with a relation, he took particular notice of a silver cup, used as a salt-cellar, which was a present from a friend, who had received it from a governor of Madras. This cup was three inches long, and two inches and a third wide at the brim; which at bottom was diminished to an inch and three quarters long, and an inch and a third wide. It had two handles, one at each end; and was ornamented with compartments, filled with flowers, &c. in relief, on the sides. The centre compartments contained Arabic inscriptions, in relief also. It was an inch and a half in depth; and was cut off oblique-ly at the corners. It was the custom, it seems, for the town of Madras (probably not the European part of it) to make every new governor, as a token of respect, sit at a table with him, and drink his arrack after dinner. The governor's name and titles, with those of the party who presented it, compose, probably, the Arabic inscriptions upon it. Now such was, as he thinks, Joseph's cup; i.e. like this small, flat, for the hand to cover and slip away (turned bottom upward, it exactly fills the hand; thereby rendering Benjamin's theft plausible); it was a cup used at table, in the cheerful hours of drinking, after the meal was ended; so that Benjamin was charged with having abused the hospitality and confidence of Joseph; it was a cup of privilege, such as the town could not be supposed to furnish the fellow of; so that Benjamin could not pretend he had bought it; but all the citizens must have been witnesses, that this was their present (properly inscribed) to their governor, and must have been interested accordingly. [But there is no necessity for this far-fetched attempt at illustration. The Hebrew word ונשא has translated to divine, this meaning also in the intellectual sense i.e. to conjectures, guess out, e. g. divine that some one would take the cup, or who had got the cup. R.]

This view of the subject absolves Joseph from the crime and folly of divination. The following extract, however, still shows that in this particular cup, annexed to his office by way of distinction, was neither peculiar to the ancient governor of the Egyptian metropolis, nor to the modern governor of Madras: "One day, Ras Michael, (who was governor of the province of Tigré, and prime-minister of the kingdom,) dining with Kumati Gits, the queen's brother, who was governor of Sämënen, and drinking out of a common glass decanter, called Brulhè, when it is the privilege and custom of the governor of Tigré to use a gold cup, being asked why he did not claim his privilege, he said, 'All the gold he had was in heaven;' alluding to the name of the mountain Samayat, where his gold was surrendered, which word signifies heaven. The king, who liked this kind of jests, of which Michael was full, on hearing this, sent him a gold cup, with a note written, and placed within it, 'Happy are they who place their riches in heaven;' which Michael directed to be engraved by one of the Greeks upon the cup itself. What became of it, I know not; I saw it the first day he dined after coming from council, at his return from Tigré, after the execution of Iba Salamana; but I never observed it at Scbraxos, nor since. I heard, indeed, a Greek say, he had sent it as a present to a church of Saint Michael, in Tigré." (Bruce's Travels, vol. ii. p. 137.) The reader will notice the engraving, the inscription, on this cup of privilege.

Joseph has been severely censured by some writers for his method of procuring, for the king of Egypt, the property and persons of the inhabitants in exchange for food; but it should not be overlooked, that the thought seemed to originate with the people themselves, and that probably it was not uncommon in those times. The subjoined extract from the Gentoo Laws, (p. 140.) will support this idea, and inform us, further, on what terms the slave might regain that liberty which he had been induced to pledge, in the hour of distress. This institute certainly differs in this respect from that of Joseph, who laid the rewards of his service upon the pound on the Egyptians, but suffered them to retain the use of their property. "Whoever, having received his victuals from a person during the time of a famine, hath become his slave, upon giving to his provider the harvest of two years; but if he do not give it, the victual, and also two head of cattle, may become free from his servitude, according to the ordinance of Pächeshputtea Misr.—Approved. Chandwara upon this head speaks thus: ['that he who has received victuals during a famine, and hath, by those means, become a slave, on giving two head of cattle to his provider, may become free.'] Whoever, having been given up as a pledge for money lent, performs service to the creditor, recovers his liberty whenever the debtor discharges the debt; if the debtor neglects to pay the creditor his money, and takes no thought of the person whom he left as a pledge, that person becomes the purchased slave of the creditor. Whoever, being unable to pay his creditor a debt, hath borrowed a sum of money from another person, and paid his former creditor therewith, and hath thus become a slave to the second creditor; or who, to silence the importunities of his creditor's demands, hath yielded himself a slave to that creditor, such kind of slaves shall not be released from servitude, until payment of the debts.

May not these principles suggest some sort of reason why Pharaoh retained the Israelites in bondage? i.e. that their fathers had originally been supported and preserved in time of famine, by Egyptian benevolence? It is true, the Pharaohs of the former dynasty might have considered the sustaining of Israel as a small return for advantages derived by Egypt from the wisdom of Joseph; but this Pharaoh "knew not Joseph," and either was willfully ignorant of past events, or disregarded, disacknowledged Joseph; or was of a new race, from a distant country, and treated as a fable the services that "Saviour of the Egyptian world! had formerly rendered the kingdom. That the Israelites were considered in the light of bondmen is openly acknowledged, "Thou shalt say to thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen, in Egypt:" "Thou shalt remember thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and I delivered thee," Deut. vi. 21; xv. 16. The bondmen were taken for debt appears from the fears of Jacob's sons: (Gen. xlii. 18.) "Because of the money that was in our sacks—he may take us for bondmen." So (chap. xlii. 33.) Judah offers himself to be put instead of Benjamin; and that this custom continued long after, we learn from 2 Kings iv. 1, where the prophet's widow complains, "the creditor may take my children for bond-slaves, we being unable to pay him," and from Matt. xvii. 25: "But, whereas he had not property to pay with, his lord commanded him to be sold, his wife, and his children, and all that he had."

But another consideration presents itself in looking at the payment imposed on the Egyptians by Joseph. Was this the only tax they paid to Pharaoh in support of his government? If it were, it is much more easily vindicated than some have thought; it being evident that the nation could not repay what they had received, in kind; and, or, indeed, in any mode, except by their productive labor, which operated as an annuity in favor of Pharaoh.

II. JOSEPH, son of Jacob, and grandson of Matthan, husband of Mary, and foster-father of Christ, Matt. i. 15, 16. His age, the circumstances of his birth, and the narrative of events which are related in the Gospels, are uncertain. Many of the ancients believed that before his marriage with the Virgin, he had a wife, named Escha, or Mary, by whom he had James the Less, and those who are called in Scripture, "brethren" of our Lord. But this opinion is not maintainable, since Mary the mother of James was living at the time of our Saviour's passion, and it is not probable that she had been divorced by Joseph, to marry the Virgin, or that he was married at the same time to two sisters; which is contrary to the law, Lev. xviii. 18. Joseph (Matt. i. 19.) was a just man; (see Annotation;) his ordinary abode was at Nazareth, particularly after his marriage; and he lived by labor, at a trade, (Matt. xiii. 39. Or x 38. ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐν τῇ ἐποχῇ τούτῃ ἐπιτρέποντος τῆς τεκνικῆς,) which has been generally thought to be that of a carpenter. It is thought that he died before Jesus entered upon his public ministry.

Joseph Barsabas, the Just, who was proposed to fill up the traitor Judas's place, Acts i. 25.

IV. Joseph of Arimathea was a Jewish senator, and privately a disciple of Christ, John xix. 38. He did not consent to the act of the Sanhedrin, who condemned Jesus; and when our Saviour was dead, he went boldly to Pilate and desired the body, that he might bury it, which he did, in his own tomb, Mark xv. 43; John xix. 38, &c.

Joseph, son of Mary and Cleophas, was brother of James the Less, and nearly related to our Lord, being son of the Virgin's sister, and of Cleophas, Joseph's brother, Mark xv. 40, 47.

Joseph, see Barnabas.

J. Joshua, son of Nun, by the Greeks called Jesus, son of Naue, was of the tribe of Ephraim; and is commonly called the servant of Moses. His first name was Osen, (Num. xxxii. 8, 16.) which some believe Moses changed, by adding that of God to it. Osena signifies servus: Jeshuouka, the salvation of God, or he will save. In the New Testament he is called Jesus, which signifies the same, Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8. Joshua displayed his valor against the Amalekites, and routed their whole army. When Moses went up Mount Sinai, to receive the law, and remained there forty days and forty nights, Joshua abode with him, though in all probability not in the same place, nor with the same abstinence: and when Moses descended from the mountain, Joshua heard the noise of the people, shouting about the golden calf; and thought it was the cry of battle, Exod. xxxi. 17.

Joshua was very constant at the tabernacle of the congregation; of which he had the care and custody, (Exod. xxxiii. 11.) and seems to have dwelt in or near it. When the people came to Kades-Berna, he, with others, was deputed to survey the land of Canaan; and when these deputies returned, and represented the difficulties of conquering the country as extremely great, Joshua and Caleb maintained, that the conquest was easy, if the Lord were with them. The murmurers were all excluded from the land of promise; but God promised Joshua and Caleb that they should enter and possess it.

When Moses was near his end, God commanded him to lay his hands on Joshua, to communicate to him part of his spirit, and his glory, that the people might obey him. After the death of Moses, he took the command of the Israelis; and after leading them into the promised land, subduing their enemies, and dividing the country among the tribes, he called them together, and foretold that the people should not receive from God, and exhort them to continue faithful. He then made a covenant on the part of God with them, and the people reciprocally engaged to serve the Lord. Joshua wrote it in a book of the law of the Lord, and laid it up in the temple, under the oak, near Shechem. He died, aged a hundred and ten, A. M. 3270.

2. Joshua, a high-priest, see Jerahmeel.

3. Joshua, the book of, is generally attributed to the person whose name it bears, though it contains certain terms, names of places, and particular circumstances, which do not agree with his time. These are accounted for, by supposing that the book has been revised, and that additions and corrections were made by Ezra in his edition.

The Samaritans have a copy of this book, which they preserve with respect, and use in support of their pretensions against the Jews. It contains forty-seven chapters, filled with fables and childish stories, commencing where Moses chooses Joshua to succeed him. It relates the history of Balaam; of the war of Moses against the Midianites, with the occasion of it; of Balaam's death; of the death of Moses, and the lamentation made for him. It relates the passage of the river Jordan at large; the taking of Jericho; and adds a great number of miracles which are not in the genuine book of Joshua. It describes a certain war which it mentions to have been carried on between Elam, king of Persia, and Babylon, with the addition of a thousand fabulous circumstances. After the death of Joshua, it names one Teraph, of the tribe of Ephraim, for his successor.

There are some other apocryphal works ascribed to Joshua; but they carry the common refutation.

Upon the miracle wrought at the word of Joshua, recorded in Josh. x. 12—14, much has been written. Objectors have urged that the language of Joshua, in correspondence with which the miracle is said to have occurred, is not in accordance with the ascertained economy of the universe; and that if even this objection could be disposed of, an unanswerable one against the fact would remain, because such an occurrence must have involved the whole system in a common ruin. To these objections it has been replied, (1.) that the Hebrew general expressed himself in popular language, as, indeed, he was compelled to do, unless he would have incurred the charge of impiety; and, (2.) that the miracle consisted in an extraordinary refraction of the solar and lunar rays and did not imply any cessation of the motion of the heavenly bodies. In support of this view of the transaction, Mr. Taylor has an essay, the close of which we lay before the reader.

It must be granted, that Joshua saw the objects respecting which he spoke. E.g. that looking toward the sun, he beheld the place of that luminary, and its rays shining abroad; then turning towards the place of the moon in the heavens, he beheld that luminary also; so that both luminaries were above the horizon (therefore visible) at the time when he uttered these words: "Thou sun—thou moon.

This supposition is reasonable enough, and, indeed, undeniable; but its consequences are important, and influence the whole history. It shows, (1.) that the time of the year was a spring, when the sun is at its highest northern station; (2.) that it was at nearly full moon, because then the moon would be visible in the heavens at the close of the day; yet would shine all night till the next morning: (3.) that it was at the close of the day, because before the evening of the day, there was no occasion for the desire of prolonged light.
whether it kept moving along the horizon; provided it gave him light, that was all he wanted; and this it would equally do, in motion, as at rest.

This statement of the subject answers, in Mr. Taylor’s opinion, every objection respecting the injury done, by disturbing the progress of nature, since it shows that, in fact, the progress of nature was neither delayed nor accelerated, but maintained its regular proceeding. The moon was not deviated from her course; neither was the sun, but his light kept moving along the horizon that night, in Judea, as it does now annually in the Shetland islands, or in Torena, in Lapland; where the body of the sun (which is not necessary in this miracle) is visible at midnight, before and after the solstice.

JOSIAH, son of Amon, king of Judah, and Jedidah, daughter of Adahiah, of Boscath, (2 Kings xxiii.) began to reign when eight years of age, ane A.D. 61. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of David. He began to seek after God from the eighth year of his reign, which was the sixteenth year of his age; and in the twelfth year of his reign, he cleared Judah and Jerusalem from high places, groves, idols, and superstitious images; and visited, and searched, and broke down the shrines of Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, and Naphtali, which he is thought to have held under the kings of Chaldea. He next proceeded to repair the temple of the Lord, which in the preceding reigns had been neglected. As the workmen were removing the money which had been offered by the Israelites at the temple, the high-priest Hilkiah found in the treasury-chamber “a book of the law of the Lord given by Moses,” which is thought to have been the original of the law, found either in some wall, or chest,—for it appears, that the ark was not then in the sanctuary, since Josiah commands the priests to restore it to its place, and forbids them to carry it about any more. Josiah, having heard this book read, rent his clothes, and sent to Huldah the prophetess for advice; after which he convened the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, and went up with them to the temple of the Lord. Here he read to them the book lately found, and made a covenant with God, engaging to walk in his ways, and to observe his precepts and ordinances; and he made the assembly promise the same. He afterwards ordered the destruction of all the remains of superstitious and idolatrous monuments in Jerusalem and Judah: he cut off the screechers, those who worshipped the stars, and the sodomites; and enjoined those priests who had offered sacrifices on the high places, to desist. He defined Tophet and the valley of Hinnom, and profaned all places which had been consecrated to superstition and idolatry, filling them with dead men’s bones, and breaking down the statues which were in them. He demolished the altar erected by Jeroboam at Bethel, and dug up the bones of the false prophets and priests of the golden calves, but spared the sepulchre of the prophet whom the Lord had sent to prophesy against Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiii. 31, 32. Josiah afterwards commanded all his people to keep the passover according to the law, and Scripture says, that from the time of the judges, and during the reigns of all the kings, no passover had been kept like this; and that no king before Josiah turned as he did to the Lord with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his strength.

Some years afterwards, Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, desiring to pass through Judea, to attack the city of Carchemish on the Euphrates, Josiah opposed his passage at Megiddo, at the foot of Carmel, and was mortally wounded; he died at Jerusalem, ante A.D. 10. His people mourned very much for his death, and Jeremiah composed an elegy on the occasion. Josiah was buried with the kings his predecessors at Jerusalem, and the people made Jehoahaz, or Shallum, one of his sons, king in his stead. Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks highly of king Josiah, Ecclus. xli. 1, &c.

There were several prophets in Judah while Josiah reigned; Jeremiah and Baruch, Joel and Zechariah; as also the prophetess Huldah. Some critics have been of opinion, that the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which are now extant, were composed on the death of Josiah; and that these are the Lamentations mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 24, 25, which were so celebrated, that they continued to be sung long after. But this opinion is certainly wrong. The mourning of the people on the death of this prince, passed, as it were, into a proverb; and the prophet Zechariah, (xii. 11) speaking of the lamentation of future ages at the death of the Messiah, alludes to that of Josiah, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo.

JOTBATIHAH, an encampment of Israel, in the wilderness, between Gidgad and Elbronah, Numb. xxxiii. 34. See EXONI.

I. JOTHAM, Gideon's youngest son, escaped the slaughter with the inhabitants of Ophrah made of his seventy brethren, Judg. ix. 5. The men and soldiers of Shechem, having made Abimelech, who had executed this bloody deed, king because he was their countryman, Jotham went up to the top of mount Gerizim, whence he addressed them in the famous fable of the trees, and then fled to Beer. We know not what became of him after this, but his prediction against Shechem and Abimelech was soon accomplished, Judg. ix. 5, &c.

II. JOTHAM, son and successor of Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah, who having been smitten with a leprosy for attempting to offer incense, (2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 17.) the government was committed to Jotham his son, ante A.D. 783. After having governed twenty-five years he assumed the title of king, and reigned alone sixteen years, to ante A.D. 712; so that he governed Judah forty-one years. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and imitated the piety of his father Uzziah, but did not destroy the high places of the gods, or of the temple, and other works on the walls of Jerusalem, in Ophel, and also caused forts and castles to be erected in the mountains and in the forests of Judah. The Ammonites, who had been brought into subjection by Uzziah his father, having attempted to revolt, he defeated them, and imposed on them a tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and ten thousand measures of wheat, with as many of barley. Towards the end of his reign, the Lord sent Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, against him; and it appears from I. i., that Judah was in a very distressed and unhealthy condition in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, his son and successor.

JUBL, son of Lamach and Adah, and the inventor of musical instruments, Gen. iv. 21.

JUBILEE, a Hebrew festival, celebrated in the fiftieth year which occurred after seven weeks of years, or seven times seven years, Lev. xxv. 10. Several commentators, however, maintain that it was celebrated in the forty-ninth year, the last year of the seventh week of years, and Lev. xxv. 8 favors this opinion: "Thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years, seven times seven years, and the space of seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. It is but a draft that it would have involved many inconveniences to have celebrated the jubilee in the fiftieth year, after the sabbatical rest of the forty-ninth year. Our limits will not permit of entering into this controversy, which, after all, involves a question of moment.

If we were certain that the civil year began at a different time from the ecclesiastical year, that would solve the difficulty; that is, the fiftieth year, by one account, might begin before the forty-ninth year, by the other account, was fully completed. Besides, we know that any part of a year was reckoned as a whole year, by the Hebrews, as it commonly is in the East.

The jubilee year began on the first day of Tizri, (the first month of the civil year,) and above the annual equinox. During the year no one either sowed or reap'd; but all were satisfied with what the earth and the trees produced spontaneously. Each resumed possession of his inheritance, whether it were sold, mortgaged, or alienated; and Hebrew slaves of every description were set free, with their wives and children, Lev. xxv. The first nine days were spent in festivity, during which no one worked, and every one put a crown on his head. On the tenth day, which was the day of solemn expiation, the Sanhedrim ordered the trumpets to sound, and instantly the slaves were declared free, and the lands returned to their hereditary owners. This law was mercifully designed to prevent the rich from oppressing the poor, and reducing them to perpetual slavery; and also to prevent their getting possession of all the lands by purchase, mortgage, or usurpation; that debts should not be multiplied too much; and that slaves should not continue, with their wives and children, in perpetual bondage. Besides, Moses intended to preserve, as much as possible, the liberty of persons, a due proportion of fortunes, and the order of families; as well as that the people should be bound to their country, their lands, and inheritances; and that they should cherish an affection for them, as estates descended from their ancestors, and to be transmitted to their posterity.

There were several privileges belonging to the jubilee year, which did not belong to the sabbatical year; though the latter had some advantages also. At the former, a tenant was not allowed to sell his property, which the jubilee did not; but the jubilee restored slaves to their liberty, and lands to their owners; besides which, it made restitution of the lands immediately on the beginning of the jubilee; whereas in the sabbatical year, debts were not discharged till three close. Houses and other edifices built in walled towns did not return to the proprietor in the jubilee year. After the captivity of Babylon, the Jews continued to observe the sabbatical, but not the jubilee, year. Alexander the Great granted the Jews an exemption from tribute every seventh year, by reason of the rest which they then observed. But as the jubilee was instituted only to prevent the utter destruction of the partition made by Josiah, and the confusion of tribes and families, it was no longer practicable before the dispersion of the tribes, that it would be returned from the captivity settling as they could, and where they could, while a great number of families and perhaps whole tribes, continued in the place of their captivity. Usher places the first jubilee after the promulgation of the law by Moses, A.M. 298; the second, A.M. 3358; the third, A.M. 3707.
JUDAH, or JEHUVA, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2249. He advised his brethren to selj to Joseph to the Ishmaelites merchants, rather than to imbrue their hands in his blood. He married Shuah, daughter of a Canaanite, named Shirah, and had three sons by her, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Gen. xxxvii. 26. He married Er to a young woman named Tamar; but Er died prematurely. Judah required Onan his second son to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed to him; but Onan eluded the purpose of his father, and the law, and was punished with death. Judah, being afraid to give Shelah his third son to Tamar, amused her with promises, till at length she disguised herself, and taking her seat in a way by which Judah was to pass, she imposed upon his ignorance, and obtained two children by him. See Tamar.

Judah was always considered as the chief of Jacob's children, and his tribe was the most powerful and numerous. The blessing given by Jacob on his death-bed to Judah was as follows: "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, thy hand shall be on the neck of thine enemies, thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion, who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." This seems to imply a transfer of the birth-right to Judah, Reuben having forfeited it; and it also includes a promise that the regal power should not go out of his family, and that the Messiah should derive his birth from him. See Shiloh.

The southern part of Palestine fell to the lot of Judah. (See Canaan.) His tribe was at the exodus composed of 74,600 men capable of bearing arms. After the return from the captivity, this tribe in some sort united in itself the whole Hebrew nation, who from that time were known only as Judah. Jews, descendants of Judah. Judah, when named in contradistinction to Israel, or the kingdom of the ten tribes, or Samaria, denotes that of Judah, and of David's descendants. One of the principal prerogatives of this tribe was, that it preserved the true religion, and the public exercise of the priesthood, with the legal ceremonies in the temple at Jerusalem; while the ten tribes gave themselves up to idolatry, and the worship of the golden calves.

I. JUDAS MACCABEUS, son of Mattathias, succeeded his father as captain of the people during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Macc. iii. 1. He gave numberless proofs of his valor, and of his zeal for God's law, by opposing those who forsook the Lord, and sacrificed to idols; and at last fell nobly in battle while opposing the Syrian army, under Bacchides. Calmet thinks that this great man was one of the figures of the Messiah, the true Saviour of Israel; and in his opinion, the prediction of Isaiah prophetically referred to him, as a figure of Christ: (chap. lxxxii.) "Who is he that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" &c.

II. JUDAS ISCARIOT, being chosen by Christ as one of his apostles, and appointed their treasurer, was so wicked as to betray his Lord into the hands of his enemies, for thirty shekels, about fifteen dollars.

It has been disputed whether Judas partook of the eucharist in the last supper. The affirmative opinion is the most general, but it is not recommendcheest and abdomen. If the body be kept till putrescence takes place, a gas is evolved from the fluid in such quantity as to expand enormously, and sometimes to rupture, the peritoneum and abdominal muscles: this effect has been observed in bodies hung on gibbets in England; and it would take place much more readily in warmer climates.

III. JUDAS, or Jude, named Barsabas, was sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to the church at Antioch, to report the resolution of the apostles at Jerusalem, concerning the non-observance of the law by the Gentiles, Acts xv. 22, 23. A. D. 54. Some think, that this Judas was the brother of Joseph, named also Barsabas, who was proposed, with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas, Acts ii. 36. Luke says that Judas Barsabas was a prophet, and one of the chief among the brethren; and it is also believed that he was one of the seventy disciples.

IV. JUDAS, or Jude, named Thaddeus, or Lebbaeus, or Lebbaeus, or the Zealot, is called the Lord's brother, (Matt. xii. 50,) because he was, as is believed, son of Mary, sister to the Virgin, and brother to James the Less. In the last supper he asked Jesus "how he could manifest himself to his apostles, and not to the world?" Paulinus says, that he preached in Libya, and that he regarded, that his body remained there. Jerome affirms, that after the ascension, he was sent to Edessa, to king Abgarus; and the modern Greeks say that he preached in that city, and throughout Mesopotamia; and in Judea, Samaria, Idumea, Syria, and principally in Armenia, and Persia. But we know no particulars of his life.

We have a canonical epistle written by Jude, addressed to all the saints who are beloved by the Father, and called by the Son, our Lord. It appears by the 17th verse, where he cites the Second Epistle of Peter, and throughout the letter, in which he intimates that the expressions of that apostle were already known to those whom he writes to, that he had principally in view the converted Jews, who were scattered throughout the East, in Asia Minor, and beyond the Euphrates. He contends against false teachers, the Gnostics, Nicolaitans, and Simonians, who corrupted the doctrine, and disturbed the peace of the church. The date of the epistle is uncertain; but Jude speaks of the apostles as of persons who have seemed to be long since dead: he quotes the Second Epistle of Peter, and alludes to Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy; whence it appears, that it was not written till after the death of these apostles, and consequently after A. D. 66. It is credible that he did not write it till after the destruction of Jerusalem. (Comp. Jude 17, with 2 Pet. ii. &c.; and 2 Tim. iii. 1. with Jude 18.)

V. JUDAS GAULANITUS, or the Gaulanite, opposed the enrolment of the people made by Cyrenius in Judea; (see Cyrenius;) and raised a very great rebellion, pretending that the Jews, being Free, ought to acknowledge no dominion besides that of God. His followers chose rather to suffer extreme torments than to call any power on earth lord or master. The same Judas is named Judas the Galilæan, (Acts v. 37,) because he was a native of the city of Gamala in the Gaulanthus, which was comprised in Galilee. Calmet believes that the Herodians were the followers of Judas.

JUDEA, see Jude IV.

JUDA, a province of Asia, successively called Canaan, Palestine, the Land of Promise, the Land of Israel, and Judea after the Jews returned from the Babylonian captivity; because then the tribe of Judah was the principal; the territories belonging to the other tribes being possessed by the Samaritans, Idumeans, Arameans, and Philistines. The Jews, when returned from the captivity, settled about Jerusalem, and in Judah, from whence they spread over the whole country.

Judea may be considered as divided into four parts: (1) the western district, Palestine, inhabited by the Philistines; on the east of this, (2) the mountainous district, called the hill country, (Josh. xxi. 11; Luke i. 39,) which the rabbins affect to call the king's mountain; whether because on the northern part of this ridge Jerusalem is situated, or for any other reason, is not known. East of these mountains was, (3) the wilderness of Judea, along the shore of the Dead sea; (4) the valley, &c. west of Jerusalem, towards the Mediterranean. Judea, no doubt, derived its name from Judah, which tribe was settled in the south of the land, and maintained its kingdom after the northern tribes had been expatriated. This circumstance, together with that of Judah being principally peopled with Israelites after the return from the captivity, and being first settled, on account of the temple being established in it, accounts for the general name of Jews being given to the Hebrews. Judea is one of the principal divisions of the Holy Land in the days of Christ; it included from the Mediterranean sea west, to the Dead sea east, and was bounded north by Samaria, and south by Edom, or the Desert. It is extremely mountainous in some parts, as from Hebron to Jerusalem. West of these mountains is the principal extent of country; but this has many hills. East of them, running along the western shore of the Dead sea, is a wilderness, viz.

The Wilderness of Judea. Here John Baptist first taught, (Matt. iii. 1.) and Christ was tempted; probably towards the north of it, not far from Jericho. Some parts of it were not absolutely barren or uninhabited; of other parts the following descriptions are, we believe, very accurate. Dr. Carlyle, who visited the monastery of St. Saba, which stands in this wilderness, says, "The valley of St. Saba is an immense chasms in a rifted mountain of marble. It is not only destitute of trees, but of every other species of vegetation; and its sole inhabitants, except the wandering Bedouins, are wild Arabs." Chateaubriand describes it in truly melancholy terms: "I doubt whether any convent can be situated in a more dreary and desolate spot than the monastery of St. Saba. . . . As we advanced, the aspect of the mountains continued the same—that is, white, dusty, without shade, without tree, without heritage, without moss." Mr. Buntingham says, "Nothing can be more forbidding than the aspect of the hills; not a blade of verdure is to be seen over their whole surface, and not the sound of any living being is to be heard throughout their whole extent." What a scene surrounded the Saviour when he dwelt in this wilderness, with the wild beasts! Matt. iv.; Luke iv. See Canaan.

There are several religious cities, representing women in the daughter of Zion, and standing under a palm-tree, in a mournful attitude, and having around her a heap of arms, shields, &c. on which she is seated. The legend is Judea capta, &c. This may remind us of the captives in Babylon, who sat down and wept." "But I will make thee a sore and easy place, says Mr. Addison, "we find Judea represented as a woman in sorrow, sitting on the ground, in a passage of the prophet which foretells the very captivity recorded on these medals.” (See Isa. iii. 28; xlvii. 1.)

[The name Judea was applied in different ages either to the whole or to a part of Palestine. In the time of David it denoted that portion of the country which belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, Josh. xi. 21; comp. verse 10; 8 Sam. v. 5; 1 Chron. xxii. 5. After the succession of the ten tribes, the territory of the kingdom of Judah was called Judea, including the tracts belonging to Judah and Benjamin, and also part of that which appertained to the tribes of Dan and Simeon. Hence it became at length a general name for the southern part of Palestine, while the northern part was called Galilee, and the middle Samaria. After the captivity, as most of those who returned were of the kingdom of Judah, the name Judea was applied generally to the whole of Palestine, Hag. i. 1; 14; ii. 3. When the whole country fell into the power of the Romans, the former division into Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, seems to have again become current. Josephus describes Judea in his day as bounded north by Samaria, its northern extremity being the village of Anathoth, east by the Jordan, west by the Mediterranean, and south by the territory of the Arabs. These boundaries would seem to include a part at least of Idumea. Judea in this extent constituted part of the kingdom of Herod the Great, and afterwards belonged to his son Archelaus. When the latter was banished for his cruelties, Judea was reduced to the form of a Roman province, annexed to the proconsulate of Syria, and governed by procurators, until it was at length given as part of the province of Herod Agrippa II. During all this time the boundaries of the province were often varied, by the addition or abstraction of different towns and cities. See Jos. B. J. iii. 5, et passim. Rob. Hist. Palest. p. 31, 174, 178 ff. John xvi. 13 ff. R.

JUDGES (נביאים, shophethim) governed the Israelites from Joshua to Saul. The Carthaginians, a colony of the Tyrians, had likewise governors, whom they called Suffetes. Simonides, himself like those of the Hebrews, almost equal to that of kings. Some are of opinion, that the archontes among the Athenians, and dietarists among the Romans, were similar to the judges among the Hebrews. Groton compares the government of the Hebrews, under the judges, to that of Gaul, Germany, and Britain, before the Romans changed it. This office was not hereditary among the Israelites; they were no more than God’s vicereges. When the Hebrews desired a king, God said to Samuel, “They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them,” 1 Sam. viii. 7. (See also Judg. viii. 23.)

The dignity of judge was for life, but the succession was not always constant. There were anarchies, or intervals, during which the commonwealth was without rulers. There were likewise long internals of servitude and oppression, under which the Hebrews groaned, and were without either judges or governors. Although God only did regularly point the judges, yet the people, on some occasions, chose that individual who appeared to them most proper to deliver them from oppression; and as it often happened, that the oppressions which occasioned recourse to the election of a judge, were not felt over all Israel, the power of such judge extended only over that province which he had delivered. We do not find that Jephthah exercised his authority on this side Jordan; nor that Barak extended his beyond it. The authority of judges was not inferior to that of kings: it extended to peace and war: they decided causes with absolute authority; but had no power to make new laws, or to impose new burdens on the people. They were protectors of the laws, defenders of religion, and avengers of crimes, particularly of idolatry: they were without pomp or splendor; and without guards, train, or equipage, unless their own wealth might enable them to appear answerable to their dignity. Their revenue consisted in presents exclusively. The time of the judges from Joshua to Saul is 389 years. For their succession see the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES. See also TRIBUNALS.

JUDGES, THE BOOK OF, is by some ascribed to Phinehas, by others to Ezra, or to Hezekiah, and by others to Samuel, or to all the judges, who wrote each the history of his time and judicature. But it appears to be the work of one author, who lived after the time of the judges; and he is generally thought to be Samuel, for the following reasons:—

(1) The author lived at a time when the Jebusites were masters of Jerusalem, and consequently before David, Judg. i. 21. (2) It appears that the Hebrew commonwealth was then governed by kings, since the author observes, in several places, that at such a time, there was no king in Israel.

There are considerable difficulties, however, against this opinion, as Judg. xviii. 30, 31: “And the children of Dan made Jonathan and his sons priests in the tribe of Dan, until the day of the captivity of the land. And they set them up Micah’s graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh.” Now, the tabernacle or house of God was not at Shiloh till about the time of Samuel’s first appearance as a prophet; for then it was brought from Shiloh and consecrated to the Lord, and手里 was taken by the Philistines; and after this time it was sent back to Kirjath-jearim, 1 Sam. iv. 4, 5, &c.; vi. 21. As to the captivity of the tribe of Dan, it can scarcely, one would think, be understood of any other than the Philistines, who were left in possession, many hundreds years after Samuel, and, consequently, he could not write this book; unless it be supposed that this passage has been added since.

JUDGMENT is taken (1) for the power of judging absolutely: (Deut. i. 17; John v. 27.) (2) for rectitude, equity, and the other good qualities of a judge; (Ps. lxxii. 1; cxix. 4; lxxxi. 14.) (3) the vindictive justice and rigor of God’s judgment. For example, Exod. xii. 12; Ps. cxix. 94; Isa. xxvi. 9. (4.) To do judgment and justice denotes the exercise of all virtues—justice, equity, truth, and fidelity, Gen. xviii. 19; Ps. cxix. 121; Isa. v. 7. (5.) Judgment is often put for the laws of God, and particularly for judicial laws, Exod. xxii. 1; xxiv. 3; Ps. cvi. 20. (6.) For a court of justice. See TRIBUNALS.

It is not improbable, that the decisions given from the oracle, or by he priests, in cases of difficulty, which had been brought to Jerusalem, according to the law, formed, in process of time, a body of judges, and destroyed destructions: hence, in the Psalms, we frequently read of the judgment of God being according to truth, to justice, to equity; meaning, not his judgment, in the sense of punishment inflicted on individuals, or on nations; but his legal or-disastrous decisions. On the other hand, care should be taken not to confound the divine judgments in the sense of punishments—evils inflicted—with those decisions which were merely judicial and administrative.

Judgment is taken for the last judgment. "It is appointed that all men should die, and that judgment should follow," Heb. ix. 27. In Joel iii. 2, the Lord says, "that he will gather together all the nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will enter into judgment with them, to avenge his people, whom they have oppressed." (See also Ecclus. xi. 9: Ps. cxiiii. 2.)

Judgment of Zeal. The Jews affirm, that under particular circumstances, when any one saw a Jew offending against God, or violating the law, or even if any one saw a heathen, whom would be divided, and would engage large people in irregularities, in idolatry, or in the breach of God's laws, they might with impunity kill him; and, without any form of justice, remove this scandal from the people. They cite the example of Phinehas, son of Eleazar, who, having seen an Israelite enter the tent of a Midianitish woman, took a javelin, followed them, and killed them both, (Numbb. xxv. 6, &c.) and also the example of Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, who, in his transport of zeal, killed an Israelite while he was sacrificing to false gods, 1 Macc. ii. 34, 35. But the inconveniences of this sort of judgment are very evident: an inconsiderate multitude, a provoked Israelite, or a fanatic, might believe themselves allowed to kill any man whom they wildly fancy to be an enemy to the interests of God and religion. With this mistaken zeal the Jews stoned Stephen, they laid hands on Paul, determined on his death, and more than forty more, in the same manner; and now, neither to eat nor drink till they had killed him. James, bishop of Jerusalem, was executed in this manner; and Christ had not escaped death in the temple, when they imagined he uttered blasphemy, had he not retired, John viii. 59.

A Fountain of, is the same as the Fountain of Kadesh, sometimes the Arnon, by a synonyme, the waters of which were called the Waters of Strife, because Moses was here contradicted and provoked by the murmurs of the Israelites. It was also called the Fountain of Judgment, as here God displayed his displeasure against Israel, and, in his anger, placed him that he should not enter the promised land, because he had not honored him in the eyes of Israel. Eng. version, Ex-Misbeath.

JUTTH, of Reuben, daughter of Merari, and widow of Manasseh, is celebrated for her beauty, and for the deliverance of Bethulia, when besieged by Holofernes. Being informed that Ozias had promised to deliver the town up, within five days, to Holofernes, he sent for Cæcilia, elder sister of the people, and informed them of her purpose, but without explaining the mode by which it was to be effected. She then prayed, dressed herself in her best apparel, and pretending to have fled from the city, went over to Holofernes, and prevailed with the tyrant herself before him. As soon as he saw her, he was captivated, and, ordering her to be raised, assured her of protection.

Judith continued with Holofernes, but had liberty of going out of the camp at night. On the fourth day, he sent Bagoss, his eunuch, to invite her to pass the night outside the walls; hence, in Holofernes was so transported, that he indulged largely in wine. In the evening, his servants retired, and Bagoss shut the chambers doors and departed. Holofernes, being overcome with drink, slept very soundly. Judith, both his maid on the watch, and having severly his head from his body, wrapped him up in the curtains of his bed, and, giving the head to her maid, directed her steps to Bethulia. The head of Holofernes being exhibited on the walls of the city, his army was seized with dismay; and their defeat was so extraordinary, that the whole country was enriched with their spoils. The high-priest Jehosiah came from Jerusalem to Bethulia, to compliment Judith; and every thing belonging to Holofernes was presented to her, and afterwards consecrated to the Lord. Having lived 165 years at Bethulia, and made her maid free, she died; and was buried with her husband. All the people lamented for her seven days, and the day on which the victory was obtained was placed among the Hebrew festivals.

There is great difficulty relating to the time of this history. The Greek and Syriac seem to decide, that it was not after the captivity of Babylon, but the Vulgate may be explained as referring to a time preceding that captivity. To remove all difficulties, and answer all objections, seems impossible. Those who maintain that the history of Judith passed before the captivity of Babylon, or that the crime of Holofernes may have been observed by Holofernes, that those two princes made war with one another in the twelfth year of Saoduchines; that Arphaxad was being overthrown, Saoduchines was Holofernes to reduce by force those who refused to acknowledge him for sovereign; and that this time in Babylon, now dwelt at Jerusalem, concerning himself little with the government, but leaving it mostly to Joschin, or Elinikin, the high-priest. Supposing all this, there is nothing in it against the Nabuchodonozor and Arphaxad is placed A. M. 3347, the expedition and death of Holofernes in 3345. Manasseh was carried to Babylon in 3339. He returned some years afterwards, and died in 3326.

The opinion of the history of Judith after the captivity of Babylon is founded principally on the authority of the Greek copy, which is certainly very ancient. This translation says in chap. iv. 2, "that the Israelites were newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judea were lately gathered together, and the vessels, and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after the profanation." Achior, general of the Ammonites, says the same to Holofernes: "Their army was very sore, and were led captives into a land that was not theirs; but now they are returned to their God, and are come up from the places where they were scattered, and have possessed Jerusalem, where their sanctuary is established," this last passage is taken from the Vulgate; but the Greek adds, "And the temple of their God was overthrown;" literally, reduced to the pavement, or trampled under foot, and their cities were taken by the enemies, and they dwell again in the mountains which were not inhabited." It is in vain to endeavor to correct the sense of these passages: the bare reading of them naturally leads us to say, that this history was translated after the return from the captivity; and thus almost all the ancients, and many of the moderns, have believed. Eusebius places it in the reign of Cambyses; Synesius in that of Xerxes; Sellinus Severus in that of Ochus; others under Antiochus Epiphanes, and in the time of the Maccabees.

The last opinion, Calmet thinks, is the most easy to maintain. Grocius, and other learned writers, are of opinion that this book is rather a parabolical than a real history; [Præfatio ad Annotationem in Librum Judith] and Prideaux almost gives up its authenticity, in consequence of the historical difficulties it involves.

JULIA, a female Christian, mentioned Rom. xvi. 15.

JULIUS, a name given by Philip to Bethsaida, in honor of Augustus's wife. See BETHSAIDA.

1. JULIUS CAESAR, the first Roman emperor, had some connection with Jewish affairs, although he is not mentioned in the New Testament. He was the son of Lucius Cæsar and Aurelia, daughter of Cotta, and born in the year of Rome 654; 88 years before Jesus Christ. After having passed through the offices of tribune, questor, edile, high-priest, and pretor or governor of Spain, he obtained the consulship in the year of Rome 655, and chose the government of Gaul, which he reduced into the form of a province, after nine or ten years of government. After the death of his daughter Julia, he went to war with Pompey, but when he entered Italy with his victorious army, he so terrified his enemies, that they fled. He set at liberty Aristobulus, king of Judea, and sent him with two legions to support his interests in Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia. But Pompey's party found means to poison him by the way. Alexander, son of Aristobulus, had already levied troops in Syria, to join his father, but Pompey sent orders to Scipio in Syria, to have him killed, which was done. Passing into Egypt, Cæsar was shut up in Alexandria, with some troops, where he was very much embarrassed, and pressed by the Egyptian army. He therefore sent Mithridates into Syria and Cilicia, to procure succors; and Antipater, father of Herod the Great, who governed the high-priest Hircanus, joined him. He himself marched into Egypt with 3000 men, and, joining Mithridates, they together attacked Pelusium, which they carried; and afterwards advanced towards Alexandria, where Antipater induced the Jews in the city of Onias, to open the passages, and declare for Cæsar, who obtained a complete victory, and thus became master of Egypt. Cæsar always preserved a grateful recollection of the important service which Antipater had rendered him. He confirmed all the privileges of the Jews in Egypt, and caused a pillar to be erected, on which he ordered them all to be engraved, with the decree which confirmed them. As he passed through Palestine, Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, threw himself at his feet, and represented to him in a very affecting manner the death of his father and brother. The first had been poisoned, and the second beheaded, for supporting his interests. He desired to be restored to his father's principality, and also complained of the wrong done him by Antipater and Hircanus. Antipater, however, who was still in Cæsar's retinue, justified their conduct. In his fifth and last consulship, Cæsar permitted Hircanus to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had demolished. He was killed March 15, a.d. 44.

II. JULIUS, the first Roman emperor, in the cohort of Augustus, to whom Festus, governor of Judea, committed Paul, to be conveyed to Rome. Julius had great regard for Paul, Acts xxvii. 1, &c. He suffered him to land at Sidon, and to visit his friends there; and in a subsequent part of the voyage he opposed the violence of the soldiers directed against the prisoners, generally, in order to save the apostle. When he delivered his charge to the custody of the chief captain of the guard, there can be no doubt but that his favorable report of the apostle contributed essentially to the indulgences he afterwards met with, and by which his imprisonment was greatly moderated.

JUNIA, or, as some copies read, JULIA, is joined with Andronicus, in Rom. xvi. 7, "Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen and fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles."

JUSTICE is generally put for goodness, equity; that virtue which renders to every man his due. Sometimes for virtue and piety in general; or for the conjunction of all those virtues which make a good man, Ezek. xvii. 5-9. It branches out into so many significations, and is applied so diversely to men and things, that it deserves peculiar and even anxious investigation. In general, it seems to refer to some rule, law, or standard, by which a quality, an intention, or an action, may be estimated. So Xenophon speaks of a car as being just, meaning, what it ought to be, fit for the use intended: and Pollux calls good and fertile land just, and barren land unjust. The same idea may be transferred to man. Hence one who fulfils the law is a just man; he answers the intention of the lawgiver. Cicero says, justice is used for conduct as it regards man, but piety is the proper term as referring to God; whence we may learn that the heathen acknowledged the impotence of man to equal what God had a right to expect; though man might be just toward his fellow man. Still, those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness," who earnestly desire complete rectitude of heart and life; who endeavor after perfect conformity with the rule of action, as well in the sight of God as men, are pronounced blessed.

As parts of righteousness, or justice, due from man to man, single virtues are sometimes put for the whole; as truth, justice, equity, etc. So there are a species of righteousness, that is, from man to man; so kindness and moderation, not pushing to the utmost, whether of strictness or severity, those demands which we have a right to make on others; or not pressing them unreasonably, or at all events, in these respects, and the like, it may well be, that our Lord insists on the righteousness of his disciples surpassing that of the scribes and Pharisees, whom he frequently brands with the appellation of hypocrites.

It requires considerable skill in the Greek language to trace the correct import of this word in the several places where it occurs, either in its direct forms, or in collateral phraseology; and to distinguish when it is used in a more classical or in a more Hebrew sense; not omitting its sacrificial application, in various parts of holy writ.

We ought not to pass over a personification of the justice of God, rendered "vengeance" in our public version, but properly importing the power commissioned by the Deity to punish malefactors, the divine nemesis. The barbarians said among themselves, when they saw the viper fasten on the hand of Paul,
JACOB, a city in the south of Judah, [Josh. xv. 21], called Jekabzeel, Numb. xi. 23.

KADISH, or KADESH-BARNEA, or EN-NISPHEH, [Gen. iv. 7] a city and desert around it, in the southeastern part of the Promised Land, Numb. xxxiv. 12; Josh. x. 3. Here Miriam died; [Numb. xx. 1.] and here Moses and Aaron, distrusting God’s power, when they smote the rock at the waters of strife, were appointed to the without the satisfaction of entering the promised land, Numb. xxvii. 11. The king of Kadesh was killed by Joshua, [Josh. xii. 22.] and the city given to Judah. The situation of Kadesh has been fully treated of in the article Ezem, p. 419.

KADOMITES, [Gen. xx. 19] a tribe of people who inhabited the promised land east of the Jordan, about mount Hermon. They were descended from Canaan the son of Ham. Cadmus, the founder of Thebes in Bœotia, has been conjectured to have been originally a Kadomite, and his wife Hermione to have been so named from mount Hermon. The Kadomites, says Calmet, were Hittites; the word Hittites is derived from a root which signifies a serpent: and fable says, that Cadmus sowed serpents’ teeth, from which sprung up armed men because he settled at Thebes, his Hittites, or Kadomites, who were valiant and martial.

KANA, a brook on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh, [Josh. xvi. 8; xix. 29] which falls into the Mediterranean, a few miles south of Cæsarea.

KANA, a city of Asher, [Josh. xix. 28].

KARKAA, a town on the southern confines of the tribe of Judah, [Josh. xiv. 3].

KATAI, the limit of the tribe of Zebulun, [Josh. xix. 15] in Judg. i. 30, called Kimron, which is the same in sense. The Vulgate, i.e., Syriac, and Arabic, render these names, which are from the same root, by small, trifling, insignificant things; the Chaldee to the same effect; whence the name of this city, perhaps, might be analogous to our name littleton, Littleton.

KEDAR, a region in the desert of the Agaren, Gen. xxv. 21: 1 Chron. i. 20.

KEDAR, a city, as some think, called by Josephus, Canaan, 1 Sam. xliii. 11: iv. 7; Ezek. xxvi. 21: Ps. xxx. 5: Jer. ii. 10; xix. 28.

KEDAR, a son of Ishmael, [Gen. xviii. 13] the father of the Kedarians, Cadre, mentioned by Pliny, (H. N. x. 11) who dwelt in the neighborhood of the Nabathæans, in Arabia Deserta. These people living in tents, it is not possible to show the place of their habitation, because they often changed it. Arabia Deserta is sometimes called Kedar; but the Kedarians dwelt principally in the south of Arabia Deserta, or in the north of Arabia Petræa; there were some as far as the Red sea, Cant. i. 5; Is. xlix. 11.

KEDEM, see EAST.

KEDEMAI, Ishmael’s youngest son, who dwelt as did his brethren, east of the mountains of Gilead, Gen. xxv. 15. The town of Kedemoth might at first perhaps belong to his descendants; but we cannot consider him as father of the Kadomites; [Gen. xvi. 19] for these were ancient inhabitants of Canaan, and already powerful in the time of Abraam.

KEDEMOTH, a town of Reuben, east of the brook Arnon, [Josh. xxi. 13] and one of the stations of the Hebrews in the wilderness; [Deut. ii. 20.], given to the sons of Merari, the Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 79. The name also included the desert around it.

KEDESH, a city in Judah, [Josh. xv. 23].

KEDESHI, a city in Naphtali, [Josh. xii. 22; xix. 37; xxi. 32; Judg. iv. 6, 9; 1 Chron. vi. 76].
KEY

III. KEDESH, a city in Issachar, 1 Chron. vi. 72; called Kishion, Josh. xix. 20; xxi. 28. IV. KEDESH NAPHHTALI, called by Josephus Cadess, or Cedess, and in the Greek of Tobit (i. 2) Gadess; lies in Upper Galilee, above Nazmon, having Saphet to the north. It was given to Naphtali, and afterwards ceded to the Levites of Gershom's family, (Josh. xix. 37.) and became a city of refuge, Josh. xvi. 7.

KEDRON, see KIDRON.

KEHELATHAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness, Numb. xxxiii. 22. As it appears to denote "the place of assembly," some have thought the gathering and revolt of Korah, Dathan and Abiram happened here.

KEHILAH, a town of Judah, (Josh. xxiv. 44.) which Eusebius places seventeen miles from Eleutheropolis, on the side of Hebron; and Jerome eight miles from the late city. It is said that the prophet Habakkuk's tomb was shown there.

KEMUEL, the third son of Nahor, and father of the Syrians; or rather of Aram, Gen. xxii. 21. He had a son surnamed "the Syrian," or "the Aramite," for the Syrians were really derived from Aram, a son of Shem. Kemuel may have given name to the Kamites, a people of Syria lying west of the Euphrates.

KENATH, a town of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, (Numb. xxxii. 42.) named Nobah, after Nobah, an Israelite, had conquered it. Eusebius places it in the "Theme of about Bosra; and Pliny in the Decapolis, lib. v. cap. 18.

I. KENAZ, father of Othniel and Caleb, Josh. xv. 17; Judg. i. 13; iii. 9, &c.

II. KENAZ, the fourth son of Eliphaz, a duke, or chief, of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 15.

KENI, a region of the Philistine, 1 Sam. xxvii. 10; Judg. i. 16. "The children of the Kenites," should be, according to the LXX, "of Jethro, the Kenanites."

KENITES, a people who dwelt west of the Dead sea, and extended themselves far into Arabia Petraea. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite, and out of regard to him all of this tribe who submitted to the Hebrews were suffered to live in their own country. The rest fled, in all probability, to the Edomites and Amalekites. (See 1 Sam. xiv. 6.) The lands of the Kenites were in Judah's lot. Balaam, when invited by Balak to curse Israel, stood on a mountain, whence, addressing himself to the Kenites, he(Gen. xix. 35, 36.) began by dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock; nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted until Ashur shall carry thee away captive," Numb. xxxiv. 21. They were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar.

KENIZITITES, an ancient people of Canaan, whose land God promised to the descendants of Abraham, (Gen. xv. 19.) and who dwelt, it is thought, in Idumea. Kenaz, son of Eliphaz, probably took his name from the Kenizzites, among whom he settled.

KETURAH, Abraham's second wife, (Gen. xxv. 1, 2.) is thought by the Jews to be the same as Hagar. We know nothing of her, except as the mother of Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. Abraham gave presents to these, and sent them east into Arabia Deserta.

KEY, an instrument frequently mentioned in Scripture, as well as in a natural as in a figurative sense. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were generally closed with bands, and the key served only to loosen or fasten those bands. Chardin says, that a lock in the East is like a little harrow, which enters half way into a wooden staple, and that the key is a wooden handle, with points at the end of it, which are pushed into the staple, and so raise this little harrow. A key was a symbol of power or authority. Isa. xxi. 22. "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: he shall open and none shall shut; he shall shut and none shall open," i. e. he shall be grand master and principal officer of his prince's house. Christ gives Peter authority in his church, (Matt. xvi. 19.) the key of the kingdom of heaven, the power of binding and loosing; that is, opening and shutting; for this frequently consisted only, as we have said, in tying and untying. Jewish remarks, that Elijah should wear his key upon his shoulder, as a mark of office, of his power to open and shut with authority. Callimachus says, that Ceres carried a key upon her shoulder; a custom which appears very strange to us; but the ancients had large keys in the form of a sickle, and which, from their weight and shape, could not otherwise be carried conveniently.

Christ reproaches the scribes and Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge; (Luke xi. 52.) that is, with reading and studying the Scriptures, without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth; which in some sort they held captive in unrighteousness, Rom. i. 18. He also says (Rev. i. 18.) that he has the key of death and hell; that is, power to bring to the grave, or to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death. The rabbins say, that God has reserved to himself four keys; the key of rain, the key of the grave, the key of fruitfulness, and the key of barrenness.

KEZIZ, a valley, and perhaps a city, in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 21.

KIBEROOTH-AVAH, or KIBEROOTH-HATTAHVAH, the graves of Elisha, was one of the encampments of Israel in the wilderness, where they desired of God flesh for their sustenance, declaring they were tired of manna, Numb. xi. 34, 35. Quails were sent in great quantities, but while the meat was in their mouths, (Ps. lxxviii. 30.) God smote so great a number of them, that the place was called the graves of those who lusted.

KIBZAIM, a city of Ephraim, (Josh. xxi. 22.) but as the name is in the dual form, it is probable there were two cities comprehended under it, adjoining each other.

KID, see LAMB.

KIDRON, a brook in the valley east of Jerusalem, between the city and the mount of Olives, and which discharges itself along the valley of Kidron, and winding between rugged and desolate hills through the wilderness of St. Saba, into the Dead sea. It has generally but little water, and often none; but after storms, or heavy rains, it swells, and runs with much impetuosity. A branch of the valley of Kidron was the sink of Jerusalem, and here Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah burnt the idols and abominations of the apostate Jews, 2 Kings xxiii. 4. (See GRENNAH.) The blood poured out at the foot of the altar in the temple, as well as other filth, ran by a drain into the brook Kidron; a fact which confutes the notion, that virtue was imparted to the pool of Bethesda from the blood of the sacrifices, as some have supposed. (Baal. Jom. 58. 2.)

KINAH, a town in the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 29.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN is an expression used in the New Testament, to signify the reign, dispem-
KING, or towns with their adjacent villages, are said to have bad kings. Being unaware of this lower sense of the word king, many persons have been embarrassed by the passage, Deut. xxxii. 4. 5. "Moses commanded a law—he was king in Jeshurun," or king among the Israelites, i. e. he was the principal among the assembly of the heads of the Israelites. He was the chief, the leader, the guide of his people, fulfilling the duties of a king, though not king in the same sense as David or Solomon. This also explains Gen. xxxiv. 91, "These kings reigned in Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel," Moses, though he was king in an inferior sense, yet did not reign, in the higher sense, over the children of Israel;" the constitution not being monarchical under him. These remarks will remove the surprise which some persons have felt, at seeing that so small a country as Canaan contained thirty-one kings, who were conquered, (Josh. xii. 9. 24.) beside many who, no doubt, escaped the arms of Jesus. Amonized, himself no very powerful king, mentions seventy kings, whom he had subdued and mutilated. (See also 1 Kings iv. 20.)

Idolatrous nations, and even the Hebrews, sometimes called their gods "kings." Thus, Moloch, Milcom, Adramelech, and Ananilach, are names of deities importing the title of king. The words of Isaiah, (xxxvii. 13.) "Where is the king of Haman," and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sephavrin, Heah, and Ivah?" seem parallel to those of chap. xxxvi. 19. "Where are the gods of Hamath? Where are the gods of Sepharvain?" In Amos i. 15, God threatens Milchca, the god of the Moabites, with sending him and his princes into captivity. In Scripture, God is called in every page almost, the king of the Hebrews. See Hebrews (government).

KING is used metaphorically by Job, (chap. xviii. 14.) "the king of terrors:" i. e. death; the ruler, the supreme of terrors. So chap. xli. 34. "The Levithian is king; i. e. chief, principal, superior over all the children of pride;" those who most pride themselves on their stations, or qualities, are nevertheless compelled to acknowledge, that the Levithian is their superior; and to refrain from comparing, or equaling, their powers to those of the tyrant of the nations. The word is also used figuratively by our Lord (John xvi. 37.) Pilate said, "Therefore the king then?" Jesus answered, "Thou sayest, thou express what is the fact; I am a king, but not of this world. Accordingly, in Rev. i. 15, we read of Jesus Christ the prince of the kings of the earth, i. e. superior to all earthly monarchs—and in 1 Tim. i. 17, of "The King eternal, immortal," and again, (vi. 15.) "Our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed and only potentate: King of kings and Lord of lords." See also Rev. xvii. 14. This application of the title "king" to our Saviour, subjected the primitive Christians to many inconveniences; as appears, among other places, from Acts xvii. 7, where they are accused of acting "contrary to the decree of Caesar, saying, there is another king, one Jesus." Kings sometimes signifies government, such as a king usually exercises; even though it be not conducted under one person. Rev. xvi. 16, "There are (rather, have been) seven kings—forms of government; five are fallen, one is; the other is not come," so ver. 12. We may now proceed to give an account of the person and office, with other circumstances connected with the Hebrew kings.
It appears to have been a maxim of the Hebrew law, that the person of the king was inviolable, whatever his character may have been, 1 Sam. xxiv. 5—8; 2 Sam. i. 14. We have already seen, that by the law of Moses the Israelitish monarchy was to be hereditary, and the history of the Jews shows that this law was observed. Nevertheless, it appears from the history of David, that the succession did not automatically go by the right of primogeniture, for he appointed Solomon as his successor, in preference to Adonijah, his eldest brother. In this the people yielded to the will of the king; and that the subjects really considered the right as inherent in him, appears the more clearly from the circumstance, that David at the time he caused Solomon to be anointed, was scarcely more than nominally king, while Adonijah, his eldest son, had Josiah, the commander-in-chief of the army, on his side. No sooner, however, was the king's mandate made known, than it was obeyed, and Solomon seated on the throne. This right, exercised by David in a matter determined by him, was later to be recognized as a natural right. In order to have the best of the eldest of his sons for his successor, seems to have been the great cause of all the complications which arose during his reign. His first-born son was Amnon, whom Absalom despatched, probably not so much to revenge the disgrace of his beloved sister, Tamar, as to become eldest of himself. As soon as he had regained his father's favor, he set on foot a rebellion; because he saw that he had otherwise no chance of succeeding to the throne, from the preference his father gave to Solomon. He was slain in battle, and the next, Adonijah, formed in his father's old age a fresh conspiracy, in order to become king. From all this it is plain, that such a despotic right as allows a king thus to determine his successor arbitrarily, and not according to an inviolable law, is extremely prejudicial to his own curiosity, as well as to the peace of the state. After David's time, we find none of the kings exercising it; because probably it had been altered, from an observation of its unhappy effects.

The inscription on the king next demands our attention. The first thing in this pompous ceremony was the anointing. Godwyen, following the Talmudic rabbins, asserts, that all kings were not anointed, but those only in whom the succession was broken; and if the first was anointed for his successors, except in cases of dispensation, where there was a renewed union, for the confirmation of his authority. There can be little doubt, however, that all the kings were anointed; hence, king and anointed seem to have been used as synonymous terms, 1 Sam. ii. 10; 2 Sam. i. 14, 21. This anointing was sometimes performed privately by a prophet, (1 Sam. x. 1; xvi. 1—31; 1 Kings xix. 16; 2 Kings ix. 1—6.) and was a symbolical prediction that the person so anointed should, at some future period, ascend the throne. After the monarchy was established, this union was performed by a priest, (1 Kings i. 32; at first in some public place, (1 Kings i. 33—34) and afterwards, in the temple, the monarch being surrounded by his guards, 2 Kings xi. 12, 13; 2 Chron. xiii. Some are of opinion that he was at the same time girded with a sword, Ps. xiv. 3. The manner of performing this ceremony appears to have been by pouring the oil upon the head, 1 Sam. x. 1; 2 Kings ix. 6. From these passages it appears probable, that the kings were anointed in the same plentiful manner, as their coronation, as the priests were; the ointment, or oil, was poured upon the head in such a quantity, as to run down upon the beard, and even to the skirts of the garment, Ps. cxix. 2. The next step was to place the diadem, or crown, upon the sceptre in his hand. To the former of these there is an allusion in Ps. xxi. 3, "Thou preparest him (the king) with the blessings of thy good-will; thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head;" and also in Ezek. xxvi. 26, and to the latter in Ps. xvi. 6, "Thou art the sceptre O God, is for ever and ever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre." It appears to have been the custom of the Jewish kings, as well as those of the neighboring nations, to wear the crown constantly when they were dressed. Saul had a crown or diadem when slain at the battle of Gilboa, (2 Sam. i. 10,) as also the king of the Ammonites, when he headed his army in battle, 2 Sam. xxi. 30. When the diadem was placed on the head of the monarch, he entered into a solemn covenant with his subjects, that he would govern according to the law; (2 Sam. v. 3; 1 Chron. xii. 3,) after which the nobles pledged themselves to obedience, and confirmed the pledge with the kiss of peace, and then, the king called it, the kiss of majesty, 1 Sam. x. 1. This ceremony is probably alluded to in the following passage of the psalmist, "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry," &c. (Ps. li. 12,) that is, acknowledge him as your king, pay him homage, and yield to his subjects his due submission. Loud acclamations, accompanied with music, then followed, after which the king entered the city, 1 Kings i. 39, 40; 2 Kings xii. 13, 19; 2 Chron. xxvii. 11. To this practice there are numerous allusions both in the Old Testament (Ps. lxix. 11 xlvii. v.) and the New; (Matt. xxi. 9, 10; Mark xi. 9, 10; Luke xix. 35, 38,) in which last cited passages the Jews, by welcoming our Saviour in the same manner as kings were formerly, manifestly acknowledged him to be the Messiah whom they expected.

The ceremonies attending the inauguration of a king among the Abyssinians have evidently been derived from the Hebrews. Of one considerable part of this ceremony, however, we find no direct mention made as forming part of the Hebrew monarchs, although there certainly appears to be some allusions to such a practice in Psalms xxiv. and xlv.

On the 18th of March, (according to their account, the day of our Saviour's first coming to Jerusalem,) this festival began. All the great officers, all the officers of state, and the court, then present, were every one dressed in the richest and gayest manner, nor was the other sex behind-hand in the splendor of their appearance. The king, dressed in crimson damask, with a great chain of gold about his neck, his head bare, mounted on a horse richly caparisoned, advanced at the head of his nobility, passed the outer court, and came to the paved way before the church. Here he was met by a number of young girls, daughters of the Umbares, or supreme judges, together with many noble virgins standing on the right and left of the court. Two of the noblest of these held in their hands a crimson cord of silk, somewhat thicker than a common whipcord, but of a looser texture, stretched across from one company to another, as if to shut up the road by which the king was approaching the church. When this cord was prepared and drawn tight, about breast-high, by the girls, the king entered, advancing at a moderate pace, conscious of, and showing the movement of his horse. He was stopped by the tension of the string, while the damsels on each side, asking who he was, were answered, ‘I am your king, the king of Ethiopia.’

To which they replied, with one voice, ‘You shall not pass, you are not our king.’ The king then retarded some pace, and then presents himself as to pass, and the cord is again drawn across this way by the young women, so as to prevent him; and the question again repeated, ‘Who are you?’ The king answered, ‘I am your king, the king of Israel.’ But the damsels resolved, even on this second attack, not to surrender but upon their own terms: they again answer, ‘You shall not pass; you are not our king.’

The third time, after retiring, the king advances with a pace and air more determined; and the cruel virgins, again presenting the cord, and asking who he is, he answers, ‘I am your king, the king of Zion;’ and drawing his sword, cuts the silk asunder.

Immediately upon this, the young women cry, ‘It is a truth, you are our king; truly you are the king of Zion.’ Upon which they begin to sing Hallelujah, and in this they are joined by the court and army on the plain; fire-arms are discharged, drums and trumpets sound; and the king, amidst these acclamations and rejoicings, advances to the foot of the stair of the church, where he dismounts, and there sits down upon a stone, which, by its remains, was apparently an altar of Amnias, or the dog-star. At his feet there is a large slab of freestone, on which is the inscription mentioned by Ptolemy.

The king is first uncrowned, then crowned, and is accompanied half up the steps by the singing priests, called Diptrmens, chanting hymns and psalms. Here he stops at a hole, made for the purpose, in one of the steps, and there is fumigated with incense and myrrh, aloes and cinnamon: divine service is then celebrated; and, after receiving the sacrament, he returns to the camp, where fourteen days should be regularly spent in feasting, and a manmour of rejoicing, and military exercise. After the king comes the Norbit, or keeper of the book of the law in Axum, supposed to represent Aazaris, the son of Zadok; then the twelve Umbarise, or supreme judges, who, with Aazaris, accompany Menlek, the son of Solomon, when he brought the book of the law from Jerusalem, and the king is supposed to represent the twelve tribes.

After these follow the Almna at the head of the priests, and the Ichecque at the head of the monks; then the whole court, who pass through the aperture made by the division of the silk which remains still upon the ground. The king then gives and receives presents, according to established custom and value; of which a list is kept.” (Bruce.)

This extract will, if we mistake not, serve to illustrate the forty-fifth Psalm, where the writer speaks of things touching the king.” He is thus represented as in great splendor, magnificently dressed, his sword girded on his thigh, mounted on horseback, equipped with the bow, &c. anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows, his garments swelling with myrrh, aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, (curious inlaid boxes of ivory,) the virgins—"kings daughters," on his one side, and his consort on the other, the rich and honorable presenting gifts, and the acclamations and rejoicing of the people.

The apparel of the Jewish monarchs was rich and splendid. Hence our Saviour, speaking of the beauty which God had imparted to the limbs of the field, remarks, “Even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.” Josephus and the rabins assert, that the robes of the Jewish kings were white; but this, however, wants better support than their critics upon the word λαμπρος, which is applied by the Greek writers to any gay color. Xenophon applies the word to such as are clothed in purples, or who are adorned with bracelets and jewels, and splendidly dressed. It is much more probable that the king’s robes were made of purple and fine white linens, Est. viii. 15; Luke xvi. 19. The royal diadem was made most probably of gold, the shape of which resembled those worn by the ancient Romans, and was inlaid with precious stones, 2 Sam. xiii. 30; Zech. vi. 11. Nor was the throne less magnificent.

That of Solomon was made of ivory, overlaid with fine gold, raised on six steps, and adorned with the images of lions, 1 Kings x. 18—20. In noticing the state and grandeur of the Jewish monarchs, we must not omit mentioning their attendants and guards; particularly the Cherethites and Peleleithes, of whom there is frequent mention in the histories of David and Solomon. That they were soldiers, appears from their making part of David’s armed army; marched out of Jerusalem on occasion of Ababam’s rebellion; (2 Sam. xxv. 18,) and likewise when they were sent against the rebel, Sobaeth son of Bichri, chap. xx. 7. That they were a distinct class from the common soldiers, is evident from their having a peculiar commander, and not being under Josab the general of the army, 2 Sam. viii. 16, 18. They seem, therefore, to have been the king’s body-guard, like the praetorian band among the Romans. These guards appear to have been skilful archers. The Chaldee paraphrase every where calls them archers and slingers. Their number may probably be gathered from the targets and shields of gold, which Solomon made for his guards; which were five hundred, 1 Kings x. 16, 17, compared with 2 Chron. xii. 9—11.

The eastern monarchs, and indeed the whole of their great men, were never approached but with presents. This is particularly noticed by Solomon: “A man’s gift maketh room for him, and bringeth before him great men.” (Gen. xlviii. 11, 25;) and in like manner, the Magi who came from the East to worship Christ, brought him gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Likewise, it was also usual to pay them the most marked respect, by prostrations to the ground, Gen. xxxvii. 10; 1 Sam. xxiv. 8; 2 Sam. xiv. 4. Morier informs us, that a similar practice obtains amongst the Persians at the present day. The king then, and the three grandees of the Christian emperor,” says Irlandia, “were obliged to kneel down, and slowly bow to our heads to the ground.” Ovington tells us that “the mark of respect which is paid to the kings in the East appears very near to adoration.” The manner of saluting the great mogul is, to touch with the hand first the earth, then the heart, and then to lift it above, which is repeated three times in succession as you approach him.” The last honors paid the king was at his death. The royal corpse is said, was carried by nobles to the sepulchre, though it were at a considerable distance. However this be, we read public mourning observed for good kings, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 24; Jer. xxii. 18; xxxiv. 5. Yet, notwithstanding all this royal state and grandeur, they were only God’s viceroy’s, bound to govern according to the statute-law of the land, which they, as well as their subjects, were required to obey.
The king was forbidden keeping a large body of cavalry, or an immoderate number of horses. These were unnecessary for the defence of Palestine, being a mountainous country, and could only be resorted to for the purpose of conquest, than which nothing could be more contrary to the dictates of justice and equity. The king was forbidden "multiplying wives to himself, that his heart turn not away," (Deut. xvii. 17) but no law was less observed than this. (See 2 Sam. iii 2—8; v. 13; lii. 8; xlv. 16, &c.) He was likewise forbidden "greatly to multiply to himself silver and gold," (Deut. xvii. 17.) lest he should make himself absolute and despotic. This prohibition, however, did not extend to the formation of a public treasury, or of one appropriated to the service of the sanctuary and tabernacle. It only lay against the king amassing treasures for his own use alone, lest he should employ them as engines of despotism, and for crushing the liberties of the people. In order that the monarch might not be ignorant of religion and of the Mosaic law, he was commanded to have by him a copy of the law carefully taken from the Levitical exemplars, and to read it daily; (Deut. xvi. 18. Nor was a knowledge of the law enough; he was to govern by it, (Deut. xvii. 19, also 1 Kings xx. 1.) He was to love and to keep his kind laws, not as slaves but as brethren; (Deut. xvii. 20.)

Besides this original and fundamental law, a special capitulation was sworn to by the kings of Israel, 1 Sam. x. 25; 2 Sam. v. 3. Their power had, nevertheless, a tendency to despotism. They had the right of making war and concluding peace; they had not only the power of life and death, but could, on particular occasions, put criminals to death, without the formalities of justice, (1 Sam. xxi. 11—19; xxii. 17, 18; 2 Sam. i. 5—15, &c.) though they generally administered justice, duly constituted, to hear and determine causes in their name, 1 Chron. xxiii. 4; xxvi. 29—32. In Jerusalem there might probably be superior courts, wherein David's sons presided, (see Ps. cxxxii. 5) but no mention is made of a supreme tribunal erected in that city earlier than the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xix. 8—11. It was composed of priests and heads of families, and had two presidents, one in the person of the high-priest, and another who sat in the name of the king. Although it was composed of persons not of the royal house, it must be remembered that the power was enjoyed by them not as absolute sovereigns in their own right, but as the viceroys of Jehovah, who was the sole Legislator of Israel.

Concerning the royal revenues, Moses left no ordinances, having appointed no king; the following particulars may be collected as the sources of these revenues from the writings of the Old Testament:—

1. Voluntary offerings, or presents, which were made conformably to the oriental custom, Gen. xxiii. 11—20; 1 Sam. iv. 27; xvi. 20. This was the most ancient source of the king's revenue, and was probably abolished by David. (2) One tenth part of all the produce of all the fields and vineyards, was given to the king. There is an allusion in Mal. i. 8, and Neh. v. 18, to the custom of paying dues in kind to government, which obtains to this day in Abyssinia. (3) The produce of the royal demesnes, consisting of arable lands, vineyards, olive and sycamore grounds, &c. which had originally been unenclosed and uncultivated, or were the property of state criminals confided to the sovereign; these demesnes were cultivated by bondsmen, and perhaps also by the people of conquered countries, (1 Chron. xxvii. 29—31; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10.) and it appears from 1 Sam. viii. 14; xii. 22; that the kings assigned part of their domains to their servants in lieu of salary. (4) To the cultivation of their demesnes, the kings must have required bond services; and accordingly we find these mentioned by Samuel among the royal rights established by use among the neighboring nations, 1 Sam. viii. 12, 16. These services seem to have been increased by Solomon, (1 Kings v. 17, 18,) and it was probably Rehoboam's having refused to lessen them that gave occasion first to the complaints, and then to the rebellion, of the ten tribes against him. (5) Another source of the king's revenue was the produce of the royal flocks. The Arabian deserts being common to the king and his subjects, for the pasturage of cattle, they did not neglect to take advantage of this privilege, but kept large herds of oxen, sheep, goats, asses and camels there, 1 Chron. xxxvii. 20—31. (6) Michaelis is of opinion that a passage in Amos (viii. 1) refers to a royal right of watering the pastures. If this be correct, the kings have asserted, at least, at this time, the right of cutting the first and best grass of the public pastures, leaving only the after-growth to the Israelitish herdsmen. (7) Not only did the most considerable part of the plunder of the conquered nations flow into the royal treasury, (2 Sam. viii. but the latter also paid tributes, which were imposed on them partly in money and partly in agricultural produce, 1 Kings iv. 21; Ps. lxxxi. 10. It is probable, from 1 Kings x. 14, that the Israelites also paid a tax in money. (8) Lastly, Solomon discovered a source of revenue entirely new to the Israelitish monarchs, and which must have been very productive. As the Mosaic law did not encourage foreign commerce for the subject, it became an object of attention to the crown. Michaelis is of opinion that Africa was circumnavigated by Solomon's fleets; be this as it may, it is certain that he carried on a most extensive and lucrative trade in gold, silver, Egyptian horses, and the byssus or fine linen of Egypt, 1 Kings x. 22, 28, 23. The foreign merchants, who carried on other branches of trade in the ports of the coast of Egypt, paid to Solomon, paid him customs, which afforded a considerable revenue to that monarch, 1 Kings x. 15.

KINGS, Books of. The Vulgate has four books under this name, viz. the two Books of Samuel and those of Kings, as they stand in the English version, and also in the Hebrew Bibles. Under this name the Greeks cite them all four as the Books of Kingdoms, the Latin as the Books of Kings.

The First Book of Kings, i. e. the First Book of Samuel, in the English Bible, contains the history of 100 years; from the birth of Samuel, A. M. 2849, to the death of Saul, in 2940. It comprises an account of the birth of Samuel, the war between the Philistines and Hebrews, in which the ark of the Lord was taken; the death of Eli, the high-priest, and of his sons Hophni and Phinehas; the restoration of the ark by the Philistines; Samuel's being acknowledged judge of Israel; Saul's election to be king; his successful beginning; his wars and victories; his rejection; the anointing of David, his valor, his misfortunes, his flight; the war between the Philistines and Saul, with the death of that prince.

The Second Book of Kings, i. e. the Second Book of Samuel for 39 years; Hebron, A. appointed Solomon before his death, in David's being anointed as King of Judah, while the elders of the people, having consulted the Bible, contains the history of the second anointing of David at 2988, in which David appointed his successor, two years before the death of Saul. It includes an account of the destiny that befell the tribes of Israel, seeking refuge in the tribes of Asher, Zebulun, Naphtali, and the ten tribes of Israel were cut off from the land of Canaan. David was acknowledged as the king of the ten tribes; as Iddo, Obed, Ahijah, Elieishah, Hosea, Amos, Jonathan, &c.

As to the author or authors of the four books of Kings, critics are not agreed. Many ascribe the first two to Samuel, whose name we find in their titles in the Hebrew. The Jews assign him only twenty-seven chapters in the first book, which include the history of his life, and a recital of the actions of Saul and David, while Samuel was living; the rest they believe was continued by Gad and Nathan, according to 1 Chron. xxix. 29. This opinion is very probable; notwithstanding that we find certain remarks, which do not properly belong to the time of Samuel, or the time of Nathan; e.g. it is said, I Sam. iii. 1, that while Samuel was living, "prophecy was rare in Israel;" which intimates, that when the author wrote, it was more frequent. I Sam. xiv. 28, Bethel is called Bethaven, or "the House of Iniquity;" a name not given to it till Jeroboam had set up one of his golden calves there. The author often alludes to the story of David's invading the Geshurites and Gezrites, that "this country of old was well peopled, from Shur even unto the land of Egypt;" (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), that is, it was so in David's time, but not when the author was living. In 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, those who formerly were called seers, were in his time termed nabi, or prophet. Now in Samuel's time the name of seer was common; the author, therefore, of these books is later than that prophet. He speaks of Samuel as of a person dead long before, and praises him, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. He observes that the city of Ziklag belonged to the kings of Judah, ever since the accession of Achish to David; (1 Sam. xxvii. 6) which remark must have been made after the separation of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel; and shows the writer to have lived not only after Samuel, but after David and Solomon.

From several other observations of this nature, some have concluded, that David, Hezekiah, Jeremiah, or Ezra, compiled these books from memoirs composed under the guidance of Samuel, David and Solomon; and if we compare the different characters of the books, we shall see some remarkable agreement. On the one side, there are circumstances which support the opinion, that a later writer revised them, and added some particulars, and certain terms, intended to explain what the distance of time had rendered obscure. Now, if we suppose that Ezra, an inspired author, had in his hands original writings of Samuel, and the ancient writers of Saul and David's times, that he digested them into order, and connected them, all difficulties are easily solved, and the seeming contradictions are reconciled. That these works are authentic and canonical is not disputed; both the Jewish and the Christian church unanimously receive them as inspired Scripture; and Christ quotes them in the Gospel, Matt. xii. 3; Mark ii. 25; Luke vi. 3. There are many more remarks to be made with relation to the third and fourth books of Kings. Some have imagined that David, Solomon and Hezekiah wrote the history of their own reigns. Others, that the prophets who lived under their government, in Israel and Judah, took this office upon them; as Isaiah and Jeremiah, Gad and Nathan. We know that several of the prophets wrote the lives of those kings who reigned in their times; and the names and writings of these prophets are mentioned in several places of the books of Kings and Chronicles. Besides, the memoirs and annals of the kings of Judah and Israel are cited in almost every chapter, and these included the particulars of those princes’ actions, of which the sacred books have handed down only summaries and abridgments.

It must be admitted, therefore, that two descriptions of writers were concerned in the books of Kings. (1.) Those original, primitive and contemporary authors, who wrote the annals, journals and memoirs of their own times; from which the matter and substance of our sacred history has been formed; and from which the authors who came afterwards have taken what they record. (See NOTE.) These ancient memoirs have not descended down to us, but were certainly in the hands of those sacred men, whose writings are in our possession, since they cite them, and refer to them: but (2.) Who composed and digested these ancient writings? and when did they live? It is generally believed that Ezra is the editor of the books of Kings and Chronicles, as we have them at present; and the proofs are these: (1.) The author lived after the captivity of Babylon. At the end of the fourth book of Kings he speaks of the return from that captivity, 2 Kings xxv. 29, &c. (2.) He describes the ten tribes as still captive in Assyria, whether they were carried as a punishment for their sins. (3.) In the seventeenth chapter of the fourth book of Kings, he introduces reflections on the calamities of Judah and Israel, which demonstrate that he wrote after the event. (4.) He refers almost everywhere to ancient memoirs, which he had before him, and abridged. (5.) The author, as far as we are able to judge, was a priest, and much attached to the house of David. All these marks agree well with Ezra, a learned and very inquisitive priest, who lived during the captivity, and after it; who might have collected a great number of documents, of which time and the persecutions suffered by the Jews gave kind occasion.

There are a few particulars in these books which do not seem to agree with the time of Ezra: he says, that in his time the ark of the covenant was still in the temple, (1 Kings viii. 8.) that the kingdoms of Judah and Israel were united, (2 Kings xx. 35, xxiii. 17, xxiv. 48.) and that he speaks of the months Sif and Bul, (vi. 1, 37, 38.) names which in the time of Ezra were no longer in use. He also expresses himself throughout as a contemporary and as a writer who had witnessed what he wrote. But these discrepancies may be easily removed. Ezra generally transcribes word for word the memoirs which he had in his possession; and this is a proof of his fidelity and honesty. In other places, he inserts reflections or illustrations, which naturally arise from his subject; and this shows that he was master of the subject on which he engaged, and that, being inspired, he was not afraid of intermixing his own words with those of the prophets, whose writings lay before him.

KING’S MOTHER. Nothing is more agreeable than to establish the conjectures of learning and ingenuity; and a favorable opportunity for this purpose, combining illustrations of a passage of Scripture, is afforded by the learned work of Mr. Raphael Barush, who thus expresses his sentiments on the passage, 1 Kings xv. 1, 2, 7, 8, collated with the same facts in 2 Chron. xiii. 1, 2: ‘There is a very remarkable variation in this collation, in the name of king Abijam’s (or Abijah’s) mother: in the book of Kings she is called Maaca, the daughter of Abaslon; and even in Chronicles, (chap. xx. 26.) she is also called by this same name; but in this passage, Chronicles calls her by the name of Micayau, the daughter of Uriel, of Gibea. To solve this difficulty, I beg leave to offer, that the title ἡ γυνὴ, (am kass-melkē;) king’s mother; and that of ἡ γυνὴ, (kag-gobireth;) translated queen, (2 Kings x. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16.) describe one and the same thing: I mean, that the phrase, “And his mother’s name was,” &c., when expressed on a king’s accession to the throne, at the beginning of his history, does not always imply, that the lady whose name is then mentioned was the king’s (natural) mother; I apprehend, that (ὡς) the king’s mother, when so introduced, is only a title of honor and dignity enjoyed by one lady, solely, of the royal family at a time, denoting her to be the first in rank, chief sultana, or queen dowager, whether she happened to be the king’s (natural) mother or not. This remark seems to be corroborated by the history of king Ass, (1 Kings xv. 10, and 2 Chron. xv. 16.) who was Abijah’s son. In the book of Kings, at his accession, this same Maaca, Abaslon’s daughter, is said to be his mother, and Ass afterwards deprived her of the dignity of ἡ γυνὴ, (kag-gobireth;) or chiefest in rank, on account of her idolatrous proceedings. But it is certain that Maaca was his grand-mother, and not his mother, as here described; therefore, if we look upon the expression of the King’s Mother to be only a title of dignity, all the difficulty will cease: for this Maaca was really Abijah’s mother, the dearly beloved wife of his father Rehoboam, who, for her sake, appointed her son, Abijah, to be his successor to the throne; but when Abijah came to be king, that dignity of the king’s mother, or the first in rank of the royal family, was, for some reason, perhaps for seniority, given to Micayau, the daughter of Uriel of Gibea; and afterwards, on the death of Micayau, that dignity devolved to Maaca, and she enjoyed it at the accession of Ass, her grandson, who afterwards degraded her for her idolatry. This I submit as a rational way of reconciling all the passages, and passing the contradiction and repugnant to each other. The better to prove this assertion, let it be observed, that in 2 Kings xxiv. 12, it is said, ‘And Jehoiachim, the king of Judah, went out to the king of Babylon, he and his mother, and his officers, and the officers of the king of Babylon took him,’ &c.; and, verse 15, ‘And he carried away Jehoiachim to Babylon, and the king’s mother, and the king’s wives, and his officers, &c. and Jeremiah, (xxiv. 5) mentioning the same circumstances, says, ‘After that, Jeconiah the king, and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah, &c. departed from Jerusalem.’ Now it is evident, that the queen, in this verse, cannot mean the king’s wife, as it would seem, by the translators’ rendering always the word ἡ γυνή, (kag-gobireth;) queen; but means the lady that is invested with that dignity, of being called the king’s mother; the phrase ἡ γυνὴ, (kag-gobireth;) in Jeremiah, corresponding with ἡ γυνὴ, (am kass-melkē;) the king’s mother; and ἡ γυνὴ, (kag-gobireth;) in Kings. The Vulgate translates the word ἡ γυνὴ, (kag-gobireth;) (1 Kings xi. 19, and 2 Kings x. 13.) Regina, (1 Kings xv. 13.) Princes, (2 Chron. xv. 16.) Deputis Imperio, (Jer. xxix. 2.) Domina, (ibid. xiii. 18.) Dominatrix; and the English translators always render it queen. That "king's mother" was a title of dignity is obvious by 1 Kings ii. 19: "Bathsheba, therefore, went in to king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah; and the king rose to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother, and she sat on his right hand; for it was better to say, 'and caused a seat to be set for her'; but he says, 'for the king's mother;' and, perhaps, it was on this occasion that Bathsheba was first invested with the honor of that dignity." These conjectures of Mr. Baruch are established beyond any reasonable doubt, by the following extracts: "The Osoo Kani is not governor of the Crimea. This title, the literal translation of which is "great queen," simply denotes a dignity in the harem, which the Khan usually confers on one of his sisters; or, if he has none, on one of his daughters, or relations. To this dignity are attached the revenues arising from several villages, and other rights." (Barron du Tott, vol. ii. p. 64.) "On this occasion, the king crowned his mother Manlocksar; conferring upon her the dignity and title of Itehe, the consequence of which station I have often described:—i.e. as king's mother, regent, governor of the kingdom when under age." (Bruce's Travels, vol. ii. p. 531.) "Gushe had confiscated, in the name of the king, all the gendar's [i.e. the Itehe's] or king's mother's villages, which made her believe, that this offer of the king to bring her to Gendar was an insidious one. In order to make the breach the wider, he had also prevailed upon the king's maternal mother to come to Gendar, and insist with her son to be crowned, and take the title and estate of Itehe. The king was prevailed upon to gratify his natural mother, under pretence that the Itehe had refused to come upon his invitation; but this, as it was a pretense only, so it was expressly a violation of the law of the land, which permits of but one Itehe, and never allows the nomination of a new one, while the former is in life, however distant a relationship she may be to the then reigning king. In consequence of this new coronation, two large villages, Teshmernua and Toucousua, which belonged to the Itehe, as appendages of her royalty, of course devolved upon the king's own mother, newly crowned, who sending her people to take possession, the inhabitants not only refused but appealed to her officers, which forcibly drove them away, declaring they would acknowledge no other mistress but their old one, to whom they were bound by the laws of the land." (Ibid. vol. iv. p. 244.)

From these extracts, we perceive, [1]: that the title and dignity of Itehe, or king's mother, Conferring much in public affairs, keeping a separate palace and court, possessing great influence and authority; [2]: while any Itehe is living, it is contrary to law to crown another; which accounts for the absence of Itehe, or king's mother, being his grandmother, the same person as held that dignity before he came to the crown; [3]: that this title occurs also in other parts of the East; and [4]: is given without consideration of natural maternity. (4.) It should seem, that "Queen," in our sense of the word, is a title and station unknown in the royal harem throughout the East. If it be taken at all, it is by that wife of the king as a sign of the king's coronation; such son being presumptive heir to the crown, his mother is sometimes entitled "Sultah Queen," or "prime Sultane," but not with our English ideas annexed to the title queen. (5.) That this person is called indifferently, "Queen," or "Itehe," or "King's Mother," even by Bruce; whence arises the very same ambiguity in our extracts from him, as has been remarked in Scripture. This illustration also sets in its proper light the interference of the "queen," in the story of Belshazzar; (Dan. vi. 10,) who, by her reference to former events, appears not to have been any of the wives of Belshazzar; neither, indeed, could any of his wives have come to that banquet, (see Esther iv. 16,) or have appeared there under those circumstances, even had such a one been acquainted with the powers and talents of Daniel, as a prophet, or as a public man, or servant of the king; or, if intelligence of what passed at the banquet had been carried into the harem, both of which ideas are very unlikely. Whereas, the queen evidently speaks with much influence, if not authority; and was a proper person to be informed, and consulted also, on any emergency. Besides, as her palace was separate and distant from the king's, (though it might be, within the circuit of Babylon, and certainly was, at this time, as Babylon was now under siege,) it allows for the interval of confusion, conjecture, introduction of the wise men, &c. before the queen's coming. Accounts must have been carried to her, and her coming from her own palace to the king's must have taken up time. In order, therefore, to determine who was this "queen," which has been a desideratum among learned men, it is not enough to know, who might be Belshazzar's wife, or wives, at the time: but also who was Itehe, or king's mother, before he came to the crown; and who, therefore, being well acquainted with former events, and continuing in the same dignity, might naturally allude to them on this occasion. Had inquiry into this matter been conducted on these principles, in all probability, it had been more conformable to the manners of the East, and had superseded many ineffectual conjectures.

I. KIR, a city of Moab, probably the modern KEREE, Isa. xv. 1.
II. KIR, part of Medin, where the river Kyrus, or Cyros, flows, 9 Kings xvi. 9; Isa. xxil. 6; Amos i 5; ix. 7.

KIR-HARESHETH, probably the same with KIR. See AR.

I. KIRIATH, a city in Judah, Josh. xv. 25.
II. KIRIATH, a city of Moab, Jer. xlvii. 10, 24; 41; Amos vi. 2.

III. KIRIATH, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28; KIRIATHAIM, a town beyond Jordan, ten miles from Medin, west, Josh. xiii. 19.

I. KIRIATHAIM, a city of Naphthali, 1 Chron. vi. 76. This is said to be the Kiria or Kiria of Josh. xxi. 29.
II. KIRIATHAIM, a city of Moab, or partly in the lot of Reuben, Gen. xiv. 5; Numb. xxxii. 37; Josh. xii. 10; Jer. xlvii. 1, 23; Ezek. xxix. 9.
KIRIATH-ARBA, or HEBRON, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 13) so called from its founder, Aram. See HERMON.

KIRIATH-BAAL, a city in Judah, called also KIRIATH-jeanin, (Josh. xv. 69; xviii. 14; Jer. xxxvi. 20,) and also IZבת the Kiriah of Josh. xvi. 20; KIRIATH-HEZOUCHOTH, the city of squares, was the royal seat of Balak, king of Moab; and therefore may well be supposed to have had handsome streets, &c. Numb. xxii. 39.

KIRIATH-jeamin, a city of the Gibeonites, afterwards given to Judah. It was on the confines of Benjamin, (Josh. xv. 9,) about nine miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Lydda. Here the ark was lodged for many years in the house of Abinadab; till David removed it to Jerusalem, 1 Chron. xii.
KIRJATH-SEPHER, the city of books, otherwise Debir, Kirjath-debir, the city of words, a city in the tribe of Judah, afterwards given to Caleb. It was taken by Othniel, to whom Caleb for his reward gave his daughter Achshah in marriage, Josh. xv. 15; Judg. i. 16. This city was so called long before Moses; at least it would seem so by the manner of mentioning it, which proves that books were known before that legislator, and that he is not the oldest writer, as the fathers have asserted; a character which, it is too observable, he never assumes. It is possible that the Canaanites might lodge their records in this city, and those few monuments of antiquity which they had preserved; or it might be something like the cities of the priests in Israel, the residence of a learned; a kind of college. This idea receives confirmation from its other name Debir, which designates an oracle; and seems to hint at a seat of learning; an establishment, probably, of priests, for the purpose of educating the younger members of their body. The circumstance is very remarkable, because it occurs so early as the days of Joshua; and is evidently an establishment by the Canaanites, previous to the Hebrew invasion. It contributes, therefore, greatly to prove that the origin of letters was not the revelation of them to Moses on mount Sinai, as some have imagined; since, beside the silence of Moses on that matter, we find indications of their being already in use elsewhere. See Debir.

KISH, son of Abi Gibeon and Machaah, 1 Chron. viii. 30.

KISHION, a city of the tribe of Issachar, yielded to the Levites of Gerahom's family, Josh. xix. 20. It is the same with KEDESH III.

KISHON, a brook which rises in the plain of Jezreel, near the foot of mount Carmel, and passing through the great plain and receiving the waters of various smaller streams, it passes along the foot of mount Carmel, and discharges itself into the Mediterranean, a short distance south of Acco, or Acco, Judges v. 21. (See Carmel II.) For a most particular account of the Kishion, see the Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 601. R.

KISS. There are in the language of Scripture, kisses of friendship, adoration, homage, and respect; kisses in general, Kishon speaks frequently of the kiss of peace, used among believers, and given by them to one another, as a token of love and union, publicly in their religious assemblies, Rom. xvi. 16. See ANOKE.

Mazarak tells Joseph, Thou shalt be over my house; and upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss: our translation reads, "according to thy word shall all my people be ruled;" but places in the margin, "as thy word shall all my people kiss." We read in Prov. xxiv. 9. "The lips shall be kissed that give right words in answer;" and as this seems to express the same action as is referred to Joseph, it may be proper to examine the import of the phrase. It is probable that it refers, ultimately, to the mode of kissing the royal decree, or writing, which contains the orders of a sovereign prince, as is still the custom in the East, that is, the written orders of Joseph should be treated with the same respect, by inferior officers, as those of the king. The passage in Proverbs is rendered by the LXX., "Lips shall kiss those things that answer to right words;"—that is, those writings, whose decrees are based on principles of equity and justice, shall be treated with the utmost reverence, even to kissing. The mode of honoring a writing from a sovereign in the East, is by kissing it, and then putting it up to the forehead. See Joseph, 1:12.

It deserves notice, that various parts of the person were occasionally, and still are, kissed in the East; probably according to the degree of intimacy of the parties, or to their relative stations—as the lips, the hands, the feet, the garments, the earth where the feet had trodden, &c. and in many instances, things sent by a superior to an inferior. So Isaac says to his son, "Come near and kiss me;" (Gen. xxvi. 28.) so Joseph fell on his father's face, and kissed it; (Gen. xxxiii. 1.) so Jonathan took Ahimaaz and Abiathar, and went and told David it; (2 Sam. xix. 9,) and so the woman kissed the feet of Christ, Luke vii. 45. We should remark, also, that not only men who were related kissed each other, as Laban and Jacob, (Gen. xxvii. 14.) Essau and Jacob, (Gen. xxviii. 4.) and Joseph and his brethren; but Samuel kissed Saul, (1 Sam. x. 1.) as a token of respect to the king; in like manner, when the Son is declared King, (Ps. xi. 2.) the kings and judges of the earth are directed to kiss him; no doubt to show the submission, reverence and affection. Jonathan and David kissed each other, (1 Sam. xx. 41.) and "Absalom kissed any man—of whatever rank, or situation—that came near to him;" 2 Sam. xv. 5. This custom long continued, for "the brethren fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him," Acts xix. 37. This accounts, very naturally, for the custom of the "kiss of peace," among the primitive Christians; which, however it might seem to us to be undignified, was to them a symbol of affectionate honor. It should be remembered, too, that the sexes sat apart in Jewish and in Christian places of worship; though the heathen took occasion from the use of this custom to charge the Christians with injurious mixture with Christian purity. It did not long continue to be practised in public assemblies, being probably gradually relinquished. There is some reason, however, to think that it continued among several of the sects denounced by the emperors; where it gave occasion to the same reports of profaneness and embraces as it had done when in general use among Christians.

KNAPPING-TOUGHS. In the description of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, (Exod. xii. 34.) we read that "the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading-toughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders." Persons who know how cumbersome our kneading-toughs are, and how much less important they are than many other utensils, may wonder at this statement, and find a difficulty in accounting for it. But this wonder will cease, when it is understood that the vessels which the Arabs make use of, for kneading dough, consist of a circle of copper, in which they prepare for those who are on a journey; or travel in the very desert through which Israel passed, are only small wooden bowls; and that they seem to use no other in their tents for that purpose or any other; these bowls being used by them for kneading their bread, and serving up their provisions when cooked. It will appear, that nothing could be more convenient than kneading-troughs of this sort for the Israelites in their journey. Mr. Harmer, however, expresses himself as being a little doubtful, whether these were the things that Moses meant, since it seems that the Israelites had made a provision of corn sufficient for their consumption for about a month, which they were preparing to bake all at once; but which their own little wooden bowls, used to knead the bread in, they wanted for a single day, could not contain, nor yet well carry a number of those things they had borrowed of the Egyptians. Besides, he adds, Dr. Pococke informs us, that the Arabs actually carry their dough in something else; for, after having spoken of their copper dishes put one within another, and their wooden bowls, in which they make their bread, and which make up all the kitchen furniture of an Arab, even where he is settled; he gives us a description of a round leather coveret, which they lay on the ground, and which serves them to eat from. This piece of furniture has, he says, rings round it, by which it is drawn together with a chain, that has a hook to it, to hang it by. It is drawn together, and in this manner they bring it full of bread, and when the repast is over, carry it away at once, with all that is left. (Vol. i. p. 182.) Whether this utensil is rather to be understood by the word translated kneading-troughs, than the Arab wooden bowl, Mr. Harmer does not positively determine; but he remarks that there is nothing, in the other three places in which the word occurs, to contradict this explanation. These places are Exod. viii. 3; Deut. xxviii. 5 and 17, in the two last of which places it is translated store. See also under CARRYING-SEAL.

Nebiuh's description of this travelling equipage, in which we find a piece of furniture of the same nature as that just spoken of, and suitable, not only for the same purpose, but for others also, may be useful. He assures us that the camels, in travelling; which accounts for the remark of the Israelite writer, that the people "carried their kneading-bags on their shoulders" koumpas-feschion, bound up, that is, drawn close; which may be assigned to two coincident causes: (1) they had not camels sufficient to transport the bagage of such a numerous host; (2) they were sent away with speed, and had no time allowed them to procure travelling animals for general accommodation; they must either carry their food themselves, or relinquish it. "In the deserts through which we were to travel, (says Niebuhr,) a tent and beds were indispensably necessary. We had a neat collection of kitchen utensils made of copper, and tinned without and within. Instead of glasses, which are so liable to be broken, we used also copper bowls completely tinned. A bottle of thick leather served us as a candlestick. Our butter we put up in a leather jar. In a wooden box, covered with leather, and parted out into shelves, we stored our scripories of all sorts; and in another similar box we laid our candles; in the lid of the latter, we fixed an iron socket which served us for a candlestick. We had large lanterns of folded linen, with the lid and bottom of tin. For a table, with table linens, we had a round piece of leather, into which were sewn the different legs, and which was strong enough, each of them, to contain twenty ordinary bottles. These vases are very liable to be broken by the jolting of the camels, as we found by the loss of a part of our wine. It is much better to put your wine, when you are to carry it upon camels, into goat-skin bottles. This species of vessels may at first appear little suitable for the purpose; but they communicate no bad taste to the liquor, if the skins have been properly dressed. The same vessels answer best to carry the store of water that is requisite in travelling through dry and desert countries." (Vol. i. p. 163. Eng. edit.) The reader may now have a much clearer idea of the article designed by the Hebrew historian, than was possible for him to conceive from the rendering of the English version—kneading-trough. The notion of a kneading-trough, and that of an open leather cover, forming a bag, are so dissimilar, that it seems absolutely necessary, were it only to avoid that ridicule to which scepticism is ever prompt, that a different word should be substituted; a word more expressive of the subject and utensil intended, and also of its state, as "bound up." In fact, if proper terms were selected to particularize, if it did not describe, the utensils of the East, as well domestic as others, with which we are now much more intimately acquainted than our worthy and venerable translators were, many of the sneers that pass for wit, while they are nothing better than sheer ignorance, would lose even that shadow of support to their profanities at which they catch, for want of more correct information.

KNOWLEDGE. To consider this word fully, would make a very extensive article; a few remarks must suffice. (1.) It imports, to understand—to have acquired information respecting a subject. (2.) It implies discernment, judgment, discretion; the power of discrimination. It may be partial; we see but in part, we know but in part, 1 Cor. xiii. 9. (3.) To have ascertained by experiment, Gen. xxvi. 12. (4.) It implies discovery, detection; by the law is the knowledge of right and wrong, Gen. ii. 19. (5.) To have acquired notions, Gen. ii. 30. (6.) To have information, Rom. iv. 36 of art and elegance, (Exod. xxxv. 31.) in the instance of Bezaleel. Spiritual knowledge is the gift of God; but may be improved by study, consideration, &c.

The priests' lips should keep knowledge; (Mal. ii. 7.) not keep it to themselves, but keep it in store for others; to communicate knowledge is the way to preserve it.

Knowledge is spoken of as an emblematical person, as riches, and treasures, as excellency, and as the gift of God.

"Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth; (1 Cor. viii. 1.) i. e. the knowledge of speculative and useless things, which tend only to gratify curiosity and vanity, which contribute nothing to our own salvation nor to our neighbor's, neither to the public good, nor to God's glory; such knowledge is much more dangerous than profitable. The true science is that of salvation; the best employment of our knowledge is in sanctifying ourselves, in glorifying God, and in edifying our neighbor: this is the only sound knowledge.

God is the source and fountain of knowledge; He knows all things, at all times, and in all places. Jesus Christ is possessed of universal knowledge; knows the heart of man, and whatever appertains to his mediatorial kingdom. Men know progressively; and ought to follow on to know the Lord; what we know not now we may know hereafter. Holy angels know in a manner much superior to man; and, occasionally, reveal part of their knowledge to him. Unholy angels may know many things, of which man is ignorant. The great discretion of life and of godliness is, to discern what is desirable to be known, and what is best unknown; lest the knowledge of "good lost and evil got," as in the case of our first parents, should prove the lamentable source of innumerable evils.

Knowledge of God is indispensable, self-knowledge is important, knowledge of others is desirable; to be too knowing in worldly matters is often accessory to sinful knowledge; the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ is a means of escaping the pollutions which are in the world. Workers of iniquity have no knowledge; no proper conviction of the divine presence. Some men are brutish in their knowledge; e.g., he who knows that a wooden image is but a shapely-formed stump of a tree, yet worships it; he boasts of his deity, which, in fact, is an instance of his want of discernment, degrading even to brutality. Some are wicked in their knowledge, "knowing the depths of Satan, as they speak," Rev. ii. 20. Strange indeed! that men should boast of what is to their detriment, and pride themselves on knowing that the absence of which were their greatest felicity!

KOHATH, son of Levi, and father of Amram, Jehar, Hebron, and Uzziel, Gen. xlii. 11. Kohath's family was appointed to carry the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle, while Israel marched through the wilderness, Exod. vi. 18; Numb. br. 4-6, &c.

I. KORAH, son of Esau and Aholibamah, succeeded Kenaz in part of the kingdom of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 15, 16.

II. KORAH, a son of Jehar, and head of the Korites, a celebrated family among the Levites. Korah being dissatisfied with the rank he held among the sons of Levi, and envying the authority of Moses and Aaron, formed a party against them; in which he engaged Dathan, Abiram, and On, with 250 of the principal Levites, Numb. xvi. 1-3, &c. At the head of these rebels, Korah complained to Moses and Aaron, that they arrogated to themselves all authority over the people of the Lord. Moses, falling with his face upon the earth, answered them, "Let every one of you take his censer, and to-morrow he shall put incense into it; and offer it before the Lord; and he shall be acknowledged priest whom the Lord shall choose and approve." The next day Korah, with 250 of his faction, presenting themselves with their censers, the glory of the Lord appeared visibly over the tabernacle; and a voice was heard, "Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment." Moses and Aaron, hereupon, falling with their faces to the ground, interceded for the people; and the Lord commanded them all to depart from about the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. When the people were retired, Moses said, "If these men die the common death of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me; but if the earth open and swallow them up alive, then ye shall know that they have blasphemed the Lord." As soon as he had spoken, the earth opened and swallowed the rebels up, with all that belonged to them. One thing which added to this surprising occurrence was, that when Korah was swallowed up in the earth, his sons were preserved. David appointed them their office in the temple, to guard the doors, and to sing praises. Several psalms are inscribed to them, under the name of Korah; as the 42, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, and the 84, 85, 87 88.

LABAN, son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, brother of Rebekah, and father to Rachel and Leah. See JACOB.

LABOR is sometimes taken for the fruit of labor, Ps. cv. 44, "And they inherited the labor of the people." And elsewhere, "Let strangers spoil his labor, and the first-fruits of their labors;" that is, what they have acquired by their labor.

LACHISH, a city in the south of Judah, Josh. x. 23; xvi. 39. It was rebuilt and fortified by Rehooboam, 2 Chron. xi. 9. Sennacherib besieged but did not take it, 2 Kings xvii. 17; xix. 8; 2 Chron. xxvii. 9.

LAISH, a city in the northern border of Palestine, acquired by the tribe of Dan, from whom it was subsequently called Dan, Judg. xviii. 7, 29. (See DAX.) The Laish mentioned Isa. x. 90, may, or may not, be the Laish of Dan. The prophet commands the daughter of Gallim to lift up her voice, so that it may be heard to a distance; but whether to so great a distance as Dan, may be doubted. Indeed, it does not appear for what purpose her screams should be heard so far off; but if this Laish were a town nearer to Geba, Gibeah, and the other places mentioned, then this alarm might be intended to reach Laish, for the purpose of inducing its inhabitants to join in the general flight.

LAKE, a confluence of waters. The principal lakes in Judaea were the lake Asphaltites, or Dead sea, the lake of Tiberias, and the lake Senechon, or Meron. See the respective articles.

LAMB, the young of a sheep; but in Scripture it sometimes comprehends the kid; the Hebrews at the passover were at liberty to choose either for a victim. The original, shēh, in general signifies a youngling, whether of a goat or ewe. "A lamb of a year old," may be interpreted a lamb of the year, born in the year, but which does not suck; for to sacrifice the paschal lamb while it used the teat, or to see it in the milk of its dam, was prohibited, Exod. xxi. 5; Lev. xxiii. 12. On other occasions the law required, that the young should be eight days with its dam before it was offered, Exod. xxii. 30; Lev. xxii. 27. The prophets represent the Messiah, in meekness, like a lamb which is sheared, or carried to the altar, without complaint, Isa. liii. 7; John xix. 1. In the Revelation our Saviour is symbolized as a lamb that had been sacrificed. The wicked at the judgment are compared to goats, the righteous to lambs.

LAMB OF GOD. By this name John the Baptist called our Saviour, (John i. 29, 30.) to signify his innocence, and his quality as a victim to be offered for the sins of the world. Or, he might allude to these words of the prophet: “He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth,” Isa. liii. 7. If it were a little before the passover—then the sight of a number of lambs going to Jerusalem to be slain on that occasion, might suggest the idea; as if he had said, Behold the true, the most excellent Lamb of God.” &c.

I. LAMECH, son of Methuselah, and father of Noah. He was 182 years old at the birth of Noah; and he lived after it 305 years; his whole life was 777; being born A. M. 574, and dying 1651. 2. LAMECH, son of Methusael, and father of Jubal, Tubal-Cain, and Naamah, Gen. iv. 18, &c. He is conspicuous for his polygamy, of which he is thought to be the author, having married Adah and Zillah. There is some obscurity in Lamech’s address to his wives: “Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech; have I slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt? If Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, truly Lamech seventy-seven fold.” A tradition among the Hebrews says, that Lamech, growing blind, when hunting, killed Cain ignorantly, believing that he killed some beast; and that afterwards he slew his own son Tubal-Cain, who had been the cause of this murder, because he had directed him to shoot at a certain place in the thicket where he had heard something stir. Other conjectures have been formed to explain the passage, all equally uncertain and absurd. Josephus says, Lamech had seventy-seven sons by his two wives; but Scripture mentions only three sons and one daughter. [The following would seem to be a more appropriate translation of Lamech’s address: “Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech; have slain a man who wounded me; a young man who smote me. If Cain, &c.” It is not to be understood that Lamech had slain two persons; it is more the repetition of poetic parallelism.]

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH, a mournful poem, composed by the prophet, on occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The first two chapters principally describe the calamities of the siege of Jerusalem; the third deplors the persecutions which Jeremiah himself had suffered; the fourth describes the ruin and desolation of the city and temple, and the misfortune of Zedekiah; and the fifth is a kind of form of prayer for the Jews in their captivity. At the close the prophet speaks of the cruelty of the Edomites, who had insulted Jerusalem in her misery, and threatens them with the wrath of God.

The first four chapters of the Lamentations are in the acrostic form; every verse or couplet beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order. The first and second chapters contain twenty-two verses, according to the letters of the alphabet; the third chapter has triplets beginning with the same letter; and the fourth is like the first two, having twenty-two verses. The fifth chapter is not an acros-

better idea of the lanterns that were anciently made use of at Jerusalem? 'By night,' says that author, (Descript. of the East, vol. i.) speaking of the travelling of the people of Egypt, 'they rarely make use of tents, but lie in the open air, having large lanterns, made like a pocket paper lantern, the bottom and top being of copper, turned over: and instead of paper, they are made with linen, which is extended by hoops of wire, so that when it is put together it serves as a candlestick, &c. &c. and they have a contrivance to hang it up abroad, by means of three staves. It appears from travellers, that lamps, wax-candles, torches, lanterns, and cresset-lights, (a kind of movable beacon,) are all made use of among the eastern people. (Thevenot, part ii. p. 35 and 37; Norden, part i. p. 124; Hanway.) I think also, that there are only three words in the New Testament to express these things by, of which ἡ λαμπαδος seems to signify the common lamps that are used in ordinary life, (Luke xv. 8.) which, according to Norden, afford but little light. σμοκανια, which is one of the words made use of, (John xvii. 3,) seems to mean any sort of light that shines brighter than common, whether torches, blazing resiny pieces of wood, or lamps that are supplied with more than ordinary quantities of oil, or other unctuous substances; such as that mentioned by Hanway, in his Travels, (vol. i. p. 250,) which stood in the court-yard of a person of some distinction in Persia, was supplied with tallow, and was sufficient to enlighten the whole place, as a single wax-candle served for the illumination of the room where he was entertained; and such, I presume, were the lamps our Lord speaks of in the parable of the virgins, which were something of the nature of common lamps, for they were supplied with oil; but then were supposed to be sufficient for enlightening the company they went to meet, on a very joyful occasion, which required the most vigorous lights. Sir J. Chardin, in his MS. note on Matt. xxv. 44, informs us, that in many parts of the East, and in particular in the Indies, instead of torches and flambeaux, they carry a pot of oil in one hand, and a lamp full of oily rags in the other. This seems to be a very happy illustration of this part of the parable. He observes, in another of the MSS. that they seldom make use of candles in the East, especially among the great; can only be had in great little light, and that at a considerable distance from them. Ezek. i. 13, represents the light of lamps accordingly as very lively. The other word, (φως) which occurs in John xviii. 3, is not the word for lamp, but the word for light, as it is used in the New Testament; and as it is used by our translators render the word, I do not certainly know. If it do, I conclude, without much hesitation, that it signifies such linen lanterns as Pococke gives an account of, rather than those mentioned by Norden, which seem rather to be machines more proper for illuminations than for common use; and if so, the evangelist perhaps means, that they came with such lanterns as people were wont to make use of when abroad in the night; but lest the weakness of the light should give an opportunity to Jesus to escape, many of them had torches, or such large and bright burning lamps as were made use of on nuptial solemnities, the more effectually to secure him. Such was the treachery of Judas and the zeal of his attendants!’’

The remarks introduced in explanation of marriage processions, (see MARRIAGE,) have furnished materials for a correct judgment on the nature and form of the lamps used in evening perambulations, on such public occasions. Mr. Harmer is more happy in rerferring those described by Chardin to the parable of the virgins, than in some other of his conjectures. To do this subject justice, it might be considered under several distinctions: as, (1.) Military lamps, those intended to meet the exigencies of night, in the external air, when the breeze is lively, or when the wind is high. (2.) Domestic lamps, those intended for service in the interior of a dwelling, or to be carried about into all parts of it; but not powerful enough to resist a gale of wind in the open air. (3.) Lamps for religious uses; those hung up in temples, or deposited in the sacred recesses of edifices, public or private, &c. We shall, however, attend only to this distinction between lamps for the exterior, the open air; and lamps for the interior, domestic purposes. It is the more necessary to institute a distinction of this kind, because Scripture uniformly employs two very different terms to express artificial lights; as well in the Old Testament as in the New. We might add, because Schleusner has been somewhat too liberal in his definition of the term lampas, of which he says, ‘generatam esse proprietatem, constituisse. But whatever shines is not a lamp in Scripture, as may appear from comparing certain passages.

I. We meet with the Hebrew term הָלָם, laphad, properly lampad, (whence the word lamp,) in that remarkable history of the burning lamp, which ratified the covenant made with Abraham, (Gen. xv. 17.) where the meaning is simply a flame. The text observes, that (1.) it was after the sun was gone down, (2.) when it was dark, what is rendered a furnace, passed; and this is expressly noted as (3.) smoking. Whatever light, or splendor, overcame the darkness of the evening, with the much greater darkness occasioned by the density of the smoke by which it was immediately surrounded, and in the centre of which it blazed, was certainly not feeble, or dim, but lively, vigorous, and even powerful. The action took place in the open air; and this lamp, described as burning, was competent to resist, and more than resist, every impulse of the atmosphere. With this we may compare the appearances at the giving of the law, (Exod. xx. 18.) when we read (ver. 21.) of ‘the thick darkness’ where God was; of the ‘mountain smoking,’ and of the ‘thunderings’—implying the concussiveness of dense clouds—but not powerful impediments to the passage of light, yet the lamadim—less properly ‘lightnings’ than glowing flames—distinguished themselves by the intensity and the continuance of their effulgence; ‘from the vision of the people. The immediacy of rendering lampadim by ‘lightnings,’ is evident, on considering a passage where the two words meet, and must be distinguished in the description of a majestic person, (Dan. x. 6.) whose countenance had the brightness of lightning, whose regular term for the flashes of this meteor,) and his eyes were as lamad of fire; that is, glowing, clear, steady, conspicuous flames; not vibrating, not blazing, but compact and still. It would manifest a deplorable deficiency in taste and propriety, to compare an earthly productions with these celestial appearances; but whoever has contemplated a great body of gas lights, purposely combined, will at least be prepared to admit the overpowering effulness of a brightness very different from that of light and the pitchers, and lamps within the pitchers.” There can be no doubt but what this hero would adopt the most powerful lights he could obtain. Weak rush lights would not answer his purpose. His intention was to make the most tremendous noise possible with his trumpets; and the most terrific display of blazing brightness by means of his lamps, suddenly being with malignant splendor, in several parts of the Midianite host, at the same moment. They were, therefore, strong luminaries. We may say the same of the lampid of Samson; (Judg. xvi. 4;—it was a burner not to be extinguished by the rude blast of night. Moreover, the lampid is made an object of comparison in Isa. xlii. 1, "I will not hold my peace—until the salvation of Zion go forth as a lamp that burneth." (Comp. Ezek. i. 13; Zech. xii. 6, et al.) Certainly, these comparisons imply a vehement, or at least a glowing, brilliant illuminator.

There is a passage in Job xii. 5, which should be illustrated in the present article; but the critics are by no means agreed on its import; whether this attempt to explain it be satisfactory must be left for others to determine. Our translation reads, "He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despaired in the thought of him that is at ease." Scott renders,

Contempt pursues the fall’u; exalted case
With scornful eye unhappy virtue sees.

Good takes an unjustifiable liberty with the text, and transfers the first word of this verse to the end of the preceding one: he reads,

The just, the perfect man, is a laughing-stock to the proud;
A reversion, amidst the sunshine of the prosperous, While ready to slip with his feet.

The simplest interpretation, however, is that of the common translation. The sense plainly is, that a man in adversity is, to the prosperous man, as a lamp about to expire, which gives but a fainter and fainter light, and is, therefore, of no value. K.

The LXX. have constantly rendered the Hebrew term lampid by the Greek lampas, which we shall find employed in the New Testament, as well as in the Old, to signify a light for exterior service. Having noticed the effulgent appearances attendant on celestial powers descending upon earth, we shall be excused for calling the attention of the reader, in the first place, to a like phenomenon in heaven, Rev. iv. 5. "Out of the throne proceeded lightnings, and thunders, and voices; and there were seven lamps of fire (κλιτα και δωμεγια και δωματε) burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God." This appearance is sufficiently explained by comparison with what has been said on Exod. xx. 18. Again, in chap. viii. 10. There fell from heaven a great star, burning as it were a lamp, κατημειχθανεις απο του φωτος— the comparison implies a flame sufficiently vigorous to resist the effect of the velocity with which the meteor travelled, to resist the extinguishing powers of the atmosphere, incalculably increased by that velocity. The allusion is, probably, to a comet, said to fall to the earth. Comets were reckoned among stars by the ancients; and the Romans sometimes called a comet, feo, a torch, or feo caleidri, a heavenly torch. The term lampas, however, adding the notion of a long train of fire streaming behind it, seems more appropriate in this place than that of torch.

The parable of the virgins (Matt. xxv.) can give us no trouble, after what has been said: the allusion is, plainly, to lamps of sufficient strength to retain their flame, however agitated, whether by the bearer, or by the wind. And the same we must conceive of the lamps, not "torches," of John xviii. 3, where we read, "Judas, having received a band of men and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, came with lanterns, and torches, and weapons"—ανωγεις και ακατασκευη. The term lampas certainly means a luminary, having the light on the outside; but it is not easy to fix on the form of the lamp. If this band of men and officers were Roman soldiers, the lamp might be the same as the Romans employed in their armies; one of which is carried among other necessaries attending the army of Trajan, at the commencement of his military expedition across the Danube, represented on his memorial pillar at Rome. It is a square pot (of iron, no doubt) fixed on the end of a tall pole; it is close on the sides, and open only at the top, in which it differs from implements used for the same purposes by modern inhabitants of the East. Major Hope says, "A Turkish camp is lighted up, at night, by a kind of large lanterns, formed of iron hoops, and fastened on long poles. Several of these lights, in which rags impregnated with grease, oil, or resinous substance, are burned, are placed in front of the tent of each of the pachas."—The greater number implies the greater dignity.

Baron du Tott (p. iii. 114.) describes the means used by the Turks to surprise their enemies as passing strange: "The high treasurer, commanding a detachment in the night, was lighted by the flame of resinous wood, burning in iron chafing-dishes fixed to long poles. He therefore got the surname of The Blazer. If the detachment sent to seize Jesus were Jewish guards, rather than Roman, it might be thought that open cages, as Hill calls them, or chafing-dishes, as Baron du Tott describes them, were the lamps they carried; but the term does not appear to determine their form or construction.

2. A lamp for domestic use is called κανθανατος, καιρος, or καιρος, in the Hebrew; a word which is frequently rendered "candle" in our version. It imports apparently a weaker kind of light. We read of the industrious woman, (Prov. xxxi. 18.) "Her candle (καιρος) goeth not out by night." Whether the term "candle" be unexceptionable here, might be questioned; but it is probably understood to be the inside of her house. Candles, among us, are columns of solid tallow, wax, &c. surrounding a wick; but in countries where oil is plentiful, and especially in hot countries, the preference was given to portable oil-lamps; and perhaps it were to be wished that our language afforded a diminutive to express this piece of domestic furniture;—as in Spanish, lampara, lamparilla. When we read of the "golden candlestick," in Exodus and Leviticus, we naturally connect with it the idea of a stand for holding candles, but we find directions for trimming and filling the lamps, which shows this idea to be erroneous. See CANDLESTICK.

This restriction of the term καιρος to an interior light, corrects the usual acception of a passage in Job xxix. 3, which is commonly understood of the benefit derived from the light of a lamp, by a man who is walking abroad in a dark night; thus rendered in our English translation:

When his (God's) candle shined upon my head, And when by his light I walked through darkness.
LAMP

But Scott saw the application of this to a domestic incident: "His candle, or rather his lamp, is probably an allusion to the lamps which hung from the ceiling of the wealthy Arabs." He adds, "The latter phrase, 'by his light I walked through darkness,' refers, it is likely, to the fires, or other lights, which were carried before the caravans in their night travels through the deserts," such as we have already noticed. — Good, slightly changing the tense of the verb, reads,

When he suffered his lamp to shine upon my head,
And by its light I illumined the darkness!

The reference is probably to the mode by which the palaces and mansions of the great were illuminated in ancient times, of which we have an excellent description in Lucrètius, well known to have been afterwards closely copied by Virgil. (De Rer. Nat. ii. 24.)

Good's change of the agent has the air of an imperfection in this passage: after the action, or supposed action, of Deity, the party honored should be perfectly quiet; he should not affirm, "I illuminated the darkness." Job means to say, "I was admitted to the interior of his residence, his splendid abode; and lamps for interior illumination enabled me to pass through those approaches to his presence, which, without such irradiation, were absolute darkness." This differs somewhat from Scott's conception of the latter verse; yet, if the lights of that verse be referred to those which stand before the tents of Turkish grandees, as already stated, the difference would disappear. Such luminaries would direct the person who approached, however dark the night might be.

A similar conception verifies the import of another passage:

The light of the wicked shall be cast out,
And the spark of his fire shall not shine:
The light shall be dark in his tabernacle,
And his candle shall be put out with him.

Job xviii. 5, 6.

"In his tabernacle"—rather, in his most splendid tent (cam); that of his dignity and grandeur. "His candle," rather his lamp, (cam) "which is hung high over him in the ceiling of his tent, even that shall be expected," and therefore "the lamp for interior illumination, the most important, as marking an interior light. Scott's note on the passage is characteristic of the manners of the country: "These metaphors denote, in general, the splendor and festivity in which such men live. There is, however, an allusion, we think, in the fifth verse, to what an Arabian poet calls the fires of hospitality—beacons lighted on the tops of hills by persons of distinction among the Arabs, to direct and invite travellers to their houses and table. Hospitality was their national glory; and the loftier and larger these fires were, the greater was the magnificence thought to be a wicked rich man, therefore, would affect this piece of state, from vanity and ostentation. Another Arabian poet expresses the permanent prosperity of his family almost in the very words of our author: 'Neither is our fire, lighted for the benefit of the night stranger, extinguished.' " It is but just to call the attention of the reader to his choice between this illustration and that which we have above suggested from major Hope.

This term occurs so frequently, that much time might be spent in tracing it; but what has been said is sufficient to justify the analogy that derives from this domestic lamp the metaphor of life, and of renewed life, rather than from the external lamp, though that was much the commoner. So we have read (2 Sam. xxii. 17) that David's servants forbade his exposing himself any more in battle—that thou quench not the light (the lamp, cam) of Israel—this allusion to the king's life, is, with the greatest propriety, drawn from the domestic, the family lamp. Again, (1 Kings xi. 36) God says, "And unto his son will I give one tribe, that David my servant may have a light (cam, a domestic lamp) always before me in Jerusalem, the city which I have chosen to put my name there." This certainly implies the continuance of David's family; but when the ten tribes were broken off from his royal descendants, the simile would have been without resemblance, in fact, contradictory, had it referred to the splendid blaze of the more conspicuous illuminator, the greater lamp. Hence arises something of difficulty, to distinguish whether the term be used literally, or metaphorically, in certain passages. When we read, that the light, the domestic lamp, of the wicked shall be put out, we are not always sure that it means a luminary; it may mean posterity—his family shall fail; or, on the contrary, what seems at first sight to imply posterity, may refer to the light, the lamp of the tent, tabernacle, or dwelling.

We come now to the consideration of the representative of this domestic lamp, in the New Testament, where, we believe, there is no instance of the word lampas being applied to an article of interior use. Λυγρα, a light, whence λυγρόν, a light-holder badly rendered in the English version; a candle, and a candlestick, imports an illuminator proper to an apartment; and when we read (Rev. i. 12, &c.) of the "seven golden candlesticks," and of "one walking in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks," we should by no means conceive of loose, isolated candlesticks, like those in use among ourselves, but of the seven-branched lamp-stand, a principal article of furniture in the Mosaic tabernacle. (See Candlestick.) So we read (Matt. v. 14) "Neither do men light a candle, (λυγρα, a lamp,) and put it under a bushel, (a measure less than a peck,) but put it on a candlestick, (λυγρόν, a lamp-stand,) and it giveth light to all in the house." This passage would read more correctly, "Neither do they light the lamp, and place it under a measure, but hath set it upon a candlestick, and it giveth light to all the residence." It seems to import the customary lamp of the family, and one only; like that of the poor widow, (Luke xvi. 8) who, having lost one piece of silver out of ten, lights the lamp, (λυγρα) which she has put into all parts of her residence, searching every creek and corner. The simplicity, not to say the poverty, of the family, is very expressive in this simile; they surely would not conceal the only lamp they had. A more wealthy establishment had many lamps. Luke xii. 33. Let your loins be girded about, and your lights (αλαίρω, the lampa) brightly burning, (εφέληκατε, because fresh trimmed,) like servants expecting their lord's return from a wedding-feast, that at whatever time of night he come home, they may open to him instantly; and he may find all things in order.

These passages prove sufficiently that λυγρα, the household implement, a domestic lamp, a lamp that shines in a dark place; (2 Pet. i. 19) a lamp, the services of which may be dispensed with in the heavenly Jerusalem; (Rev. xxii. 5) for there shall be no night there; and they need no candle
The description given of John the Baptist may seem to militate against this notion: He was a burning and a shining light; (John v. 36.) properly, he was the lamp, ἵβι αἵρον, the burning and shining lamp; also, he certainly was much in the desert, and at no time very domestic. As to the term burning (καίμωρεις) Campbell dissents from the opinion of those who would make it refer to the arbor, zelaz, or power of John's example; he observes, very properly, that a lamp is used, not for warming people, but for giving them light. And certainly, the good servants (Luke xii. 35.) are not expected to have their lamps burning for the purpose of warming their lord, but for enlightening the apartments, or the passages to the apartments, and giving him an honorable reception. Moreover, since the days of Campbell, we are able to give a further account of John, whom his followers boasted of as the light, the apostle of light, (see Zarahs.) Insomuch, that the evangelist found it necessary to say explicitly, "He was not that light; but came to bear witness," &c. Since, then, the phrase was current among the Jews, concerning John, our Lord takes it in its sense and application, implying splendor, brilliancy; but we may well question, with Campbell, whether it implies heat, or any thing beyond the brightness of which a domestic lamp is susceptible. If this be correct, the other part of the objection of course fails.

Another metaphorical use of this lamp respects the eye; the light, lamp of the body is the eye, (Matt. vi. 22.) but as the eyes of some have been compared to burning lamps, (lumpadion,) should not the same comparison be maintained here? We apprehend not; because this lamp is understood to illuminate only the body itself; not beyond it; and as a domestic lamp may enlighten all parts of a house, being properly directed, so may the eye be directed to all the members of the body, and inspect them all in succession; which it is not the intention of the comparison employed by Daniel, and in the Revelation, to express.

This article may be closed by remarking, that we are so much accustomed to the use of glass for transparent vessels in every form, and application, that it is with some difficulty we conceive of a light-holder, or lantern, as complete without it. But we should not forget the horn lanterns used by our carriers, ostlers, waiters, &c. horn being much safer, because less brittle, than glass; and though it is confessed that the ancients had glass equally perfect with our own, yet we are a loss to prove that they used it in the construction of lanterns. That they employed a transparent substance of some kind, is evident, from a ship's lantern hanged from the uppermost of a vessel in which Trajan is voyaging. It seems to distinguish the ship of the commander-in-chief; as the vessels in company have it not.

The torches of antiquity were of all sizes, from a foot in length to six feet; and the largest of these were employed not only in military affairs, for signals, &c., but also in religious processions. It may be questioned, whether lights of either of these kinds are really mentioned in Scripture, but as commentators have inclined to find both torches and lanterns there, they could not well be passed over without notice.

LAND, in the Old Testament, often denotes the country of the Israelites, or the particular country, or district, spoken of; the land of Canaan, the land of Egypt, the land of Ahab, the land of Moab. "Hold, my land is before thee;" (Gen. xx. 15.) set where you please. In many places of our public version the phrase "all the earth" is used, which the meaning should be restricted to the land, or the land and the burning and shining lamp; also, he certainly was much in the desert, and at no time very domestic. languages which were formerly unknown to the learned of Europe; among them the most venerable is the Sanscrit of India. Its structure is, apparently, too perfect, too refined and artificial, to warrant our admitting it as the first language of mankind; yet in point of antiquity, it may compete with the Hebrew, as current in the days of Moses; and it is remarkable that the Mosaic writings seem to contain several words of Sanscrit origin; (chiefly in the history of Baalam;) which may give occasion to various reflections.

The following extracts from Niebuhr will show the fate of language, when those who speak it are subjected to foreigners of another tongue: nevertheless, that some remains of it may survive the general wreck, in different places, is not incredible; and such an account, with the manner in which it is preserved, is subjoined from the same author: "Many people living under the dominion of the Arabsians and Turks, have lost the use of their mother tongue. The Greeks and Armenians settled in Egypt and Syria speak Arabic; and the services of their public worship are performed in two languages at once. In Natolia, these nations speak their own languages in several different dialects. The Turkish officers sometimes extend their despoticism to the language of their subjects. A pasha of Kayser, who could not endure to hear the Greek language spoken, forbade the Greeks in his pashalik, under pain of death, to use any language but the Turkish. Since that prohibition was issued, the Christians of Kayser and Angora have continued to speak the Turkish, and at present do not even understand their original language." (Vol. ii. p. 258.) "In Syria and Palestine, indeed, no language is to be heard but the Arabic; and yet the Syriac is not absolutely a dead language, but is still spoken in several villages in the pashalik of Damascus. In many places, in the neighborhood of Merdin and Mosul, the Christians still speak in the Chaldean language; and the inhabitants of the villages who do not frequent towns, never hear any other than their mother tongue. The Christians born in the cities of Merdin and Mosul, although they speak Arabic, write in the Chaldean characters, just as the Maronites write their Arabic in Syriac letters, and the Greeks write their Turkish in Greek letters.

Many languages now spoken may be traced to one common and primitive stock, as the original. Sir W. Jones has demonstrated, that three great branches of language are sufficient to account for all the languages of Asia and India, and form a very strong, as well as a new, argument in favor of the Mosaic history of the early post-Diluvian ages, which represents the three great families as being implicated in the confusion of languages at Babel. But, should we allow a fourth branch, we should do violence to the narration of Moses. It is now, perhaps, impossible to combine, or even to ascertain, what words remaining in either, or in all, of the three branches, should be considered as belonging to the primitive language; but, by way of showing how words may sometimes be traced into different dialects, to which at first sight they appear to have little relation, the reader will accept the following note from a popular work: "—Numberless instances might be given, but our limits permit us to produce only a few. In the Sanscrit, or ancient language of the Gentoo, our signifies a day. (See Halhed's preface to the Code of Gentoo Laws.) In other eastern languages, the same word was used to denote both light and fire. Thus in the Chaldee, or is fire; in the Egyptian, or is the sun, or light; (Plut. de Osir. et Isid.;) in the Hebrew, or is light; in Greek, or is the air, often light; in Latin, aer is the air, from the Ionic Greek; and in Irish it is aur."

From what appears on this subject, we may warrantably suppose, (1.) That the ancient Hebrew language retained a considerable portion of original words, and expressions, or modes of expression. (2.) That some of these may occur in the Hebrew Scriptures. (3.) That the sister dialects to the Hebrew, the Chaldee, the Arabic, &c. may also have retained many original words; and that these radical words are similar to those retained by the Hebrew, an adequate knowledge of these languages cannot but contribute essentially to our understanding of the Hebrew, where derivatives from such words occur in the Hebrew. And this is particularly fortunate, when such words occur but once in Holy Scripture; when they have, as we may say, neither friend nor brother in the Holy language, the advantage to be derived from their relations, in foreign but kindred dialects, becomes invaluable. See Letters.

[To the student of the Bible one of the most important subjects is the character and history of the original languages in which that holy book was written. Oriental or Semmith languages.—The languages of western Asia, though differing in respect to dialect, are radically the same; and have been so far back in the same family as to form a very strong, as well as a new, argument in favor of the Mosaic history of the early post-Diluvian ages, which represents the three great families as being implicated in the confusion of languages at Babel. 18.) was spoken in Palestine, and probably, with little variation, in Phoenicia and the Phoenician colonies, e.g., at Carthage and other places. The remains of the Phoenician and Punic dialects are too few and too much disfigured, to enable us to judge with certainty how extensively these languages were the same as the dialect of Palestine.—Of the Arabic, to which the Ethiopic bears a special resemblance, comprises, in modern times, a great variety of dialects as a spoken language, and is spread over a vast extent of country; but so far as we are acquainted with it, the whole of the Chaldees is almost a century, to have been limited principally to Arabia and Ethiopia.

The Arabic is very rich in words and forms; the Syriac, so far as it is yet known, is comparatively barbarous and less numerous as the provinces where the language is spoken. In all these cases, however, we commonly name the slantier differences provincial rather than dialects.

It is uncertain whether any of the oriental or Shemitish dialects were spoken in Assyria proper, or in Asia Minor. The probability seems to be against the supposition that the Assyrians used them; and a great part of Asia Minor, before it was subjected by the Greeks, most probably spoke the same language as Assyria, i.e., perhaps a dialect of the Persian. A small part only of this section of Asia seems to have spoken a Shemitish dialect. (Gesen. loc. cit. § 17, 21.) When we speak of the Arabic languages, the exceptions just made are to be uniformly understood.

All of the oriental languages, the Hebrew bears marks of being the most ancient. The oldest records that are known to exist are composed in this language; and there are other reasons which render it probable, that it preceded its kindred dialects. It flourished in Palestine, among the Phoenicians and Hebrews, until the period of the Babylonian exile, soon after which it declined, and finally was superseded by a kind of Hebrew-Aramaean dialect, such as was spoken in the time of our Saviour among the Jews. (See Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 309, 317.) The most ancient Aramaean language flourished before this; for a long time, in the east and north of Palestine; but it now advanced farther west, and during the period that the Christian churches of Syria flourished, it was widely extended. It is at present almost a dead language, and has been so for several centuries. The Hebrew may be regarded as having been a dead language, except among a small circle of rabbis, for about the space of two thousand years.—Our knowledge of Arabic literature extends back very little beyond the time of Mohammed. But the followers of this pretended prophet have spread the dialect of the Koran over almost half the population of the world. Arabic is now the vernacular language of Arabia, Syria, Egypt, and in a great measure of Palestine and all the northern coast of Africa; while it is read and understood wherever the Koran has gone, in Turkey, Persia, India, and Tartary.

The remains of the ancient Hebrew tongue are contained in the Old Testament, and in the few Phoenician and Punic words and inscriptions that have been here and there discovered.—The rest of the Aramean tongues are extant in a variety of barbarous dialects. In Chaldee, we have a part of the books of Daniel and Ezra, (Dan. ii. 4—vii. 28. Ezra iv. 8—vi. 19. vii. 12—27.) which are the most ancient specimens of this dialect. The Targum of Onkelos is that of the Pehlevi or ancient Persian, and affords the next and purest specimen of that language. All the other Targums, the Mishna and German are a mixture of Aramean and Hebrew. It has been said that there are still some small districts in Egypt, where the Chaldean is a vernacular language.

In Syriac, there is a considerable number of MSS. and MSS. extant. The oldest specimen of this language, that we have, is contained in the Peshito Syriac, version of the Old and New Testament made by a MS. of writers in this dialect. (vid. Asemanni Bibliotheca Orientalis,) many manuscripts which are extant, although but few have been printed in Europe.—In Arabic there exists a great variety of MSS. and books, in both scientific and literary. The means of illustrating this living language are now very ample and extensive. See Talmud and Versions.

It is quite obvious from the statements made above, that a knowledge of the kindred dialects of the Hebrew is very important, for the illustration of language. Who can, even now, have a very extensive and accurate understanding of the Egyptian language, that is unacquainted with the Latin, Greek, French and Sanskrit? Besides, the English has been a dead language for more than two thousand years, and that all the remains were comprised in one moderate volume; could well explain this volume, that did not in the time of Mohammed? The answer to this question will decide whether the study of the languages, kindred with Hebrew, is important to the thorough understanding and illustration of the Hebrew Scriptures.

The difference between the Chaldean and Syriac is very great. The diversity in the tribe of the Hebrews, and the scriptural language is, important to the understanding of the Hebrew Scriptures. The difference is also greater. It bears more resemblance to the divergent language of the Hebrews, and the German and Spanish, and not to the Hebrew, as is commonly used by the Chaldean and Syriac.

The fundamental words are of common use, but the inflections differ in some considerable respects: derivative words are diverse in point of form and not a few words have been adopted in the different languages, and not in others; or are used in a different sense. The language between the Chaldean and Syriac is very proper.

The oriental languages are distinguished from the western or European tongues, in general, by their peculiar phonetic characters; in referring to the names of peculiar traits; viz. (I.) Several peculiar phonetic letters are found in them, which we do not distinctly mark; and some of which are unpronounced after the age of puberty. (2.) The vowels are triliteral, or syllables. By far the greater part of the words are verbs. (3.) Pronouns, whether personal or possessive, are, in the oblique cases, united in the word with the noun or word to which they in relation. (4.) The verbs have two tenses, the present and future; and in general, there are not only subjunctive moods, but also effective moods, determined by the context, and the future, as in the case. (5.) For the present, the cases are marked... propositions. Two nouns coming together, the latter of which is in the genitive, the first, in most cases, suffers a change which indicates this state of relation, while the latter noun remains unchanged; i.e. the governing noun suffers the change, and not the noun governed. (7.) To mark the comparative and superlative degrees, no special forms of adjectives exist. From this observation the Arabic must be excepted, which, for the most part, has an intensive form of adjectives that marks both the comparative and superlative. (8.) Scarce any composite words exist in these languages, if we except proper names. (9.) Verbs are not only distinguished into active and passive, by their forms; but additional forms are made, by the inflections of the same verb with small variations, to signify the cause of action, or the frequency of it, or that it is reflexive, or reciprocal, or intensive, &c. (10.) Lastly, all these dialects (the Ethiopic excepted) are written and read from the right hand to the left; the alphabets consisting of consonants only, and the vowels being generally written above or below the consonants.

Hebrew Language.—The appellation of Hebrew, (הָעַדָּה), so far as we can learn from history, was first given to Abraham by the people of Canaan among whom he dwelt, Gen. xiv. 10. As the first names of nations were commonly apppellatives, it is quite probable that this epithet was applied to Abraham because he came from beyond the Euphrates, רָא meaning over or beyond; so that רָא, Hebrew, meant as much as one who came from beyond the Euphrates. But whatever exact meaning was attached to the appellation Hebrew before the time of Jacob, it appears afterwards to have been limited only to his posterity, and to be synonymous with Israelite.

The origin of the Hebrew language must be dated further back than the period to which we can trace the appellation Hebrew. It is plain from the history of Abraham, that wherever he sojourned he found a language in which he could easily converse. That Hebrew was originally the language of Palestine appears plain, moreover, from the names of persons and places in Canaan, and from other facts in respect to the formation of this dialect. E. g. the west is in Hebrew ⒲, which means the sea, i.e. towards the Mediterranean sea. As the Hebrew has no other proper names, so it will be evident that the language, in its distinctive and peculiar form, must have been formed in Palestine. That this dialect was the original language of mankind, is not established by any historical evidence, which may not admit of some doubt. In the light of the history which the original parents of mankind were placed in western Asia, they spoke substantially the language which has for more than fifty centuries pervaded those countries. This probability is greatly increased, by the manner in which the book of Genesis makes use of appellatives, as applied to the antediluvians; which are nearly all explicable by Hebrew etymology, and would probably all be so, if we had that part of the Hebrew which is lost.

How far back then the Hebrew dialect in its distinctive form is to be dated, we have no sure means of ascertaining. At the time when the Pentateuch was written, it had reached nearly, if not quite, its highest point of culture and grammatical structure. The usual mode of reasoning would lead us to say, therefore, that it must, for a long time before, have been spoken and cultivated, in order to attain so much regularity of structure and syntax. But reasoning on this subject, except from facts, is very uncertain.

Many of the savage tribes in the wilds of America possess languages which, as to variety in combinations, declensions, and expression, are said to surpass the most cultivated languages of Asia or Europe. Homer was as little embarrassed in respect to variety of form, combination or structure, as any Greek poet who followed a thousand years later. The best pledge for the great antiquity of the Hebrew is, that there never has been, so far as we have any knowledge, but one language substantially in western Asia; and of the various dialects of this, the Hebrew has the highest claims to be regarded as the most ancient.

Sketch of the Hebrew language.—From the time when the Pentateuch was composed until the Babylonian exile, the language, as presented to us in the Old Testament, wears a very uniform appearance; if we except the variety of idiom, which belongs of course to different writers. This period has been usually called the golden age of the Hebrew. On account of this uniformity, many critics deny that the Pentateuch could have been composed five hundred years before the time of David and Solomon, or even long before the captivity. They are willing to admit the antiquity of a few laws, and of some fragments of history in Genesis and some other books. But it is against all analogy, they aver, that a language should continue so nearly the same, as the Hebrew of the Pentateuch and of the historical books, for a space of time so great as this. And besides, they affirm, there are many internal evidences of a later origin, contained in occasional notices of later events, which could not possibly be known in the time of Moses.

In regard to this last allegation, only a single consideration can be here stated. It may be safely admitted, that some things were added to the Pentateuch by writers in later times; such as a completion of the genealogy of the Edomitic princes, Gen. xxxvi., an account of the death and burial of Moses, Deut. xxxiv.; and a few other things of a similar nature. But the other allegation, that universal analogy, in respect to other languages, renders it highly improbable that such uniformity in the Hebrew could have been preserved, so long as from the time of Moses down to that of David, or down to the period of the captivity, we may be permitted to doubt; for a greater philological wonder than this, which so much excites their incredulity, could not happen.

Dr. Marshman is very extensively acquainted with the Chinese language, and has published a copious grammar and dictionary of it, with a translation of the works of Confucius, which were written about 550 years before the birth of Christ, and much earlier. He asserts, that there is very little difference between the style of Confucius and that of the best Chinese writers of the present day. One commentary on his works was written 1500 years after the text; and another still later, which Dr. Marshman consulted. He found no difference between them and the works of Confucius, except that the original was somewhat more concise. The documents of this philologist, gathered from Chinese records, prove that the written and spoken language of the Chinese (nearly one fourth part of the human race) has not varied, in any important respect for more than 2000 years. (Quarterly Review, May, 1811, p. 401, &c. Marshman's Chinese Gram. in var. loc.) In respect to seclusion from other nations, the Jews bore a very exact resemblance to the Chinese. Like them, they had no foreign commerce or intercourse to corrupt their language. New inventions and improvements in the arts and sciences there were not. What then was there to change the language? And why should not David and Solomon, and others write in the same manner, substantially as Moses did?

In respect to the argument, which concludes against the composition of the Pentateuch by Moses, because there are some things in it, which, if written by him, must be admitted to be predictions, it can here be observed only, that if the inspiration of the Scriptures be admitted, criticism has no right to reject it in any investigations respecting these books; for inspiration constitutes one of the circumstances in which the books were composed, and cannot, therefore, be omitted in the critical consideration of them, without virtually denying the fact of inspiration, and conducting the investigation in an uncritical manner.

The second or silver age of the Hebrew, reaches from the period of the captivity down to the time when it ceased to be a living language. The distinguishing trait of Hebrew writings belonging to this age is, that they approximate to the Chaldee dialect. Nothing is more natural, than that the language of exiles, in a foreign country for seventy years, should approximate to that of their conquerors who held them in subjection. To this period belong many of the Psalms, and the whole books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Zechariah, Haggai, Malachi, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and perhaps some others. The books of Job and Ecclesiastes abound in Arabism; and Canticles exhibits a considerable number. The age of these three last books, as also that of Jonah, Daniel, and the Pentateuch, has been the subject of animated contest among critics on the continent of Europe, for almost half a century. The Chaldaisms, or Arabisms, of the silver age, consist, either in adopting both the form and meaning of Araban words, or in preserving the Hebrew form, but assigning to it an Arabic signification. (Ges. Gesch. § 10, 4, 5.) What is called the younger or later Hebrew is somewhat distinct from Arabism. It does not consist in using foreign words, but in a departure from the customary idiom of the older Hebrew, by the adoption of different expressions to convey the same idea. E. g. the early Hebrew calls the shee-bread מַעֲשָׂה מִנָּה; the younger Hebrew מַעַשָּׂה. The Hebrew of the Talmud, and of the rabbins, has a close affinity with the later Hebrew.

All the books belonging to the second age are not of the same character in respect to idiom. The book of Job, if it be set down to a later age, though full of Arabism, in other respects is a peculiar example of the original spirit of the language, in union with many Psalms, which belong, as their contents plainly show, to the second period. Of the other authors comprised in this period, Jeremiah and Ezekiel merely border upon the silver age in regard to diction. Esther, Canticles, Chronicles and Daniel are strongly tainted with the characteristics of later Hebrew; and the remaining later books are not less strongly marked. Nearly half of the books of Daniel and Ezra is composed in pure Chaldee. In general, the earlier Hebrew writers are entitled to preeminence in respect to their compositions, when considered merely in a rhetorical point of view. But still, among the later class are some of most exquisite taste and genius. Some parts of Jeremiah have scarcely been excelled. Psalms cxxxxix, clxi, lxxxv, lxxxv; several of the Psalms of degrees, cxx, &c. Dan. vii, &c. and other parts of later authors, are fine specimens of writing; and some of them may challenge competi-in respect to excellence of style, with the writings of any age or country.

The Hebrew language throughout, both earlier and later, exhibits a twofold diction, viz. the prose and the poetic. Hebrew poetry, so far as we can ascertain, never comprised any thing of the Roman and Greek measure of long and short syllables, and the varieties of verse arising from this cause. Its distinguishing characteristics are four; viz. a rhythmical conformation of periods or distichs; a parallelism of the same in regard to sense or expression; a figurative, parabolic style; and a diction peculiar to this species of composition. (See Lowth's Lectures on Heb. Poetry, Lec. xviii. xx; also the Introduction to his Commentary on Isaiah. De Wette's Commentaries über den Psalmen, Einleitung, § 7.)

The poetic diction displays itself in the choice of words, the meaning assigned to them, and the forms which it gives them. In other respects, too, poetic usage gives peculiar liberty. The conjunctions Piel and Hithpael are sometimes used intransitively; the imperfect tense stands for the common future; the participle is often used for the verb; and anomalies in respect to concord, ellipsis, &c. are more frequent than in prose.

As the Aramaean dialect was learned by the Jews during their captivity, and a mixture of this and the Hebrew, after their return, was perhaps spoken in Palestine by the people at large; so it is evident, that many words of the old Hebrew, in consequence of this, must fall into disuse, and the meaning of them become obscured. Of course, the later Hebrew writers were obliged to avoid such words. A comparison of the books of Kings with those of the Chronicles, where they are parallel, is full of instruction in respect to this subject. It will be found, that the author of the Chronicles has introduced the later orthography and forms of words; substituted new words for old ones; given explanations of the ancient text from which he drew the materials of his history; and inserted grammatical glosses of the same, so as to accommodate his style to the times in which he wrote. (Ges. Gesch. § 12.)

There is no probability that the Hebrew language ceased, during the captivity, to be cultivated and understood, in a good degree, by those who were well educated among the Jews. The number of books already extant in it at this period; the reverence with which they were regarded; the care with which they were preserved; all render such a supposition entirely inadmissible. Every nation subjected to a foreign yoke and to exile, does indeed gradually lose its own language. Such is the case with the Hebrews. Yet the Jews, who hold all foreign nations in abhorrence, were less exposed to this than most others would be. The fact, that after the return from exile, so many authors wrote in the Hebrew dialect, and for public use, demonstrates that the knowledge of the language was not generally lost, although the dialect spoken may have been a mixed one. After the worship of God was renewed in the second temple, the ancient Hebrew Scriptures were unquestionably used in it. In the synagogues, which appear to have been erected not long after this, the Hebrew Scriptures were always used. Even so late as the time of the apostles, this was the case, (Acts xv. 21.) as it has continued to be ever since.

How long the Hebrew was retained, both in writing and conversation, or in writing, after it ceased to be the language of conversation, it is impossible to determine. The coins stamped in the time of the Maccabees are all the oriental monuments we have, of the period that elapsed between the latest canonical writers and the advent of Christ; and the inscriptions on these are in Hebrew. At the time of the Maccabees, then, Hebrew was understood, at least as the language of books; not generally among the better informed, as the language of conversation. But soon after this, the dominion of the Seleucid in Syria over the Jewish nation, uniting with the former influence of the Babylonia captivity to diffuse the Aramean dialect among them, appears to have destroyed the remains of proper Hebrew, as a living language, and to have universally substituted, in its stead, the Hebrew-Aramean as it was spoken in the time of our Saviour. A representation very different from this has been made by the Talmudists and Jewish grammarians; and, in following them, by a multitude of Christian critics. This is, that the Hebrew became altogether a dead language during the Babylonian exile; which, say they, is manifest from Neh. viii. 8. But as this sentiment is wholly built on a mistaken interpretation of the passage, and as it also speak so plainly against such an opinion, it cannot be admitted. (Ges. Gesch. § 13.)

From the time when Hebrew ceased to be vernacular, down to the present day, a portion of this dialect has been preserved in the Old Testament. It has always been the subject of study among learned Jews. Before and at the time of Christ, there were flourishing Jewish academies at Jerusalem. Those of Hillel and Shammai are the most celebrated. After Jerusalem was destroyed, schools were set up in various places; but particularly they flourished at Tiberias, until the death of rabbi Judah, surnamed Hakkodesh, or the Holy, the author of the Mishna, about A. D. 230. Some of his pupils set up other schools in Babylonia, which became the rivals of these. The Babylonian academies flourished until near the tenth century. From the schools at Tiberias and in Babylonia, we have received the Targums, the Talmud, the Masora, and the written vowels and accents of the Hebrew language.

The Mishna or second law, i. e. the oral traditions of the fathers, was reduced to writing by rabbi Judah Hakkodesh, in the beginning of the third century, as above stated. This constitutes the text of both the Jerusalem and Babylon Talmuds; and though tinctured with Aramean, still exhibits a style of Hebrew that is pretty pure.

The Gemara or commentary on the Mishna is later. The Jerusalem Gemara belongs, perhaps, to the latter part of the third century; that of Babylonia is about three centuries later. Both exhibit a very corrupted state of the Hebrew language. Other Jewish writings, composed about this period, are similar to their dialect.

The Targums, or translations of the Old Testament, are confessedly Chaldee; but they are quite impure, if you except that of Onkelos. See Versions.

The Masora consists of critical remarks on the text of the Old Testament. A part of it is older than the Targums; but it was not completed, or reduced to its present form, until the eighth century. In its contents or criticisms show, that already the substantial principles of Hebrew grammar, and the analogical structure of the language, had been an object of particular study and attention.

Among Christians, during the first twelve centuries after the apostolic age, the knowledge of Hebrew could scarcely be said to exist. Epiphanius, who before his conversion was a Jew, probably had a knowledge of the Hebrew tongue; and perhaps Theodoret and Ephrem Syrus whose native language was Syriac, may have understood it. But among all the fathers of the Christian churches, none have acquired any reputation for the knowledge of Hebrew, except Origen and Jerome. In regard to the former, it is very doubtful whether he possessed any thing more than a superficial knowledge of it. (Ges. Gesch. § 27. 1.) But Jerome spent about twenty years in Palestine, in order to acquire a knowledge of this tongue, and has left the fruits of his knowledge behind him, in the celebrated translation of the Hebrew Scriptures called the Vulgate. See Versions.

In consequence of the persecutions and vexations of the Jews in the East, by Christians, and especially by Mohammedans, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, their literati emigrated to the west, and their schools in Babylonia were destroyed. The north of Africa, but particularly Spain, and afterwards France and Germany, became places of resort for the Jews; and here, during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, almost all those important Jewish works in grammar and lexicography were composed, which have been the means of preserving a knowledge of the Hebrew language in the world, and eventually of rousing Christians to the study of this sacred tongue. It was during this period, that the Kimchi, Jeiel, Aven Ezra, and Maimonides flourished; and somewhat later appeared Ben Gerson, Ben Melech, Abarbanel, Elia Leviq, and others; who, by their philological labors, prepared the way for the diffusion of Hebrew learning over the Christian world.

During the dark ages, the knowledge of Hebrew appears to have been banished from the Christian world, and to have been commonly regarded as a proof of heresy. But in the fourteenth century, some glimmerings of light appeared. The council at Vienne, in A. D. 1311, ordered the establishment of professorships of oriental literature in the universities. After this, slow but gradual progress was made among Christians in the study of Hebrew, until the sixteenth century; then the reformation, operating with other causes, served to increase the attention among the learned to the original Scriptures. But as yet, the study of Hebrew was embarrassed by many Jewish traditions and conceits, which had been propagated by the rabbinical and Talmudic pupils. Nor was it until about the middle of the seventeenth century, that Hebrew philology made real advances, beyond the limits by which it had as yet been circumscribed. During this century, many Hebrew grammars and lexicographers were published, which increased the means of investigation for future philologists. In the first part of the succeeding century, Schultens published his philological works, which exhibited deeper researches into the structure and nature of the Semitic languages than had hitherto appeared. The application of the kindred dialects, especially of the Arabic, to the illustration of the Hebrew, was urged much beyond what had before been done. Many eminent philologists were nurtured in his school at Leyden. The great body of critics, almost until the present time, have followed in the path which he trod. Many of them have made an excessive use of the Arabic languages in tracing the signification of Hebrew words. Some of the best lexicographers, such as Eichhorn and Michaelis, are not free from this fault.

Of late years, a new and much better method of Hebrew philology has commenced, and is still advancing, in a great measure, under the patronage and by the labors of Gesenius at Halle. A temperate use of all the kindred dialects is allowed by this method, or rather enjoined, in illustrating the sense of words; but the most copious illustrations, borrowed from the kindred languages, are those which respect the forms, their significance as connected with the forms, and the syntax of the Hebrew language. There is reason to hope that the present age will advance greatly beyond preceding ones, in respect to a fundamental and critical knowledge of the Semitic languages. See further under Letters I. *R.

LAODICEA. There are several cities of this name, but Scripture speaks only of that on the confines of Phrygia and Lydia. Its ancient name was Diospolis, then Rhoeas, and lastly, Laodicea. It was situated on the river Lycus, not far above its junction with the Meander; and was the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana. Paul had never been in this city, nor had the Laodiceans ever seen his face in the flesh; (Col. ii. 1.) but on information from Ephesians their messenger, that false teachers had propagated pernicious doctrines there and at Colossae, he wrote to the inhabitants of the latter, and desired them, when they had read his letter, to send it to the Laodiceans. He writes also, as is thought, in the same epistle, that the Laodiceans should also send their letter to the Colossians. "That ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea," say 1 Tim. iv. 16. This expression, however, is ambiguous. It may either signify the letter which the apostle wrote to Laodicea, or that which the Laodiceans wrote to him. The letter to the Laodiceans, which has been attributed to Paul, has generally been admitted to be spurious.

Laodicea was on an insubstantial place, but it increased towards the time of Augustus Caesar. The fertility of the soil, and the good fortune of some of its citizens, raised it to greatness. Hiero, who adorned it with many offerings, bequeathed to the people more than two thousand talents; and though an inland town, it grew more potent than the cities on the coast, and became one of the largest towns in Phrygia, as its present ruins prove. Among the ruins seen here is an oblong amphitheatre, in the area of which was about one thousand feet in extent, with a number of other splendid ruins.

"Laodicea was often damaged by earthquakes, and restored by its own opulence, or by the munificence of the Roman emperors. These resources failed, and the city, it is probable, became early a scene of ruin. About the year 1027, it was possessed by the Turks, and submitted to Duran, general of the emperor Alexis. In 1120, the Turks sacked some of the cities of Phrygia by the Meander, but were defeated by the emperor John Comnenus, who took Laodicea, and repaired and built anew the walls. About 1161, it was again uninhabited. Many of the inhabitants were then killed, with their bishop, or carried with their cattle into captivity by the Turkish sultan. In 1190, the German emperor Frederick Barbarossa, going by Laodicea with his army toward Syria on a crusade, was received so kindly, that he prayed on his knees for the prosperity of the people. About 1190, this region, with Caria, was dreadfully ravaged by the Turks. The sultan, on the invasion of the Tartars in 1255, gave Laodicea to the Romans, but they were unable to defend it, and it soon returned to the Turks. We saw no traces either of houses, churches or mosques. All was silence and solitude. Several strings of camels passed eastward of the hill; but a fox, which we first discovered by ears peeping over a brow, was the only inhabitant. Laodicea." (Trav. p. 225.)

The grandeur of this city in A.D. 79, is sufficient to astonish us, if we consider, that at the date of the Epistle to the Colossians, (A.D. 61,) it was a place of consequence. Whether their church here were numerous we know not; but from the epistle in the Revelations addressed to minister, it should seem to have fallen into a lukewarm state, (about A.D. 96,) and it is threatened cordingly. It seems, also, that the Laodiceans boasted of their wealth, and knowledge, and garment which agrees with their history, that they were enriched by the flocks of their sheep, and magnificent politic studies, as evinced by the odeum, the theatre, the amphitheatre, and the magnified sculptures, at the remains of which are still discernible.

LAPIDOTIH, the prophetess Deborah's husband Judges iv. 4.

LAPWING, a bird by Moses declared to be clean, Lev. xi. 19. It is about the size of a thrush; its beak is long, black, thin, and a little hooked; legs gray and short. On its head is a tuft of feathers of different colors, which rises or lowers at pleasure. Its neck and stomach are something reddish; and its wings and tail black with white streaks. See Birds, p. 188.

LASHA. Moses, describing the limits of the land of Canaan, says, that it reaches south to Lasha, or x. 19. The Chaldees and Jeromc take this to be the place Callirhoe, east of the Dead sea, where warm springs, (as A. H.) and this is the more probable opinion; but Calmet thinks it is the city of Lasa, or Elasa, at nearly an equal distance between the Dead sea and the Red sea. Pтолемей mentions this city of Lusa, as do Stephens the geographer and Josephus.

LATTICK, see House, p. 506.

LAVER, a basin, as directed (Ex xxx. 15.) to make, among other articles of furnim for the services of the tabernacle, a laver of brass. This is not particularly described as to form; the lavers made for the temple were borne by four oxen, standing upon bases with wheels, or on brazen wheels, and having handles belonging to them, by means of which they might be drawn, or conveyed from one place to another, as they should be wanted. These lavers were double, that is two basins composed of a basin, which received the water it fell from another square vessel above it, from which they drew water with a cock. The whole work of brass; the square vessel was adorned with heads of a lion, an ox, and a calf; that is to say, of extraordinary hieroglyphic creatures. Each of these contained forty baths, or four basins, for one pint, and forty cubic inches of Paris measure. There were ten made in this form, and of this capacity; five of them were placed to the right, five to the left of the temple, between the altar and the burnt-offerings and the steps which led to the porch of the temple.

In describing the laver made for the tabernacle the sacred writer says, Moses "made it of brass, the foot of it of brass, and of the looking-glass for the women assembling, which assembled at the tabernacle of the congregation," Exod. xxx. 8. The impropriety of introducing looking-glass here is obvious, since a laver of brass could not have been formed out of these; besides, our glasses...
mirrors are quite a modern invention. Dr. A. Clarke conceives, therefore, that the Hebrew word מֵאָשׁ, maresh, denotes mirrors simply, and here, mirrors of polished metal, which was in common use among the ancients; and which Dr. Shaw states to be still used by the Arab women in Barbary. (Jahn, Bib. Arch. § 132. Hartmann, Hebräerinn, ii. p. 240. Adam Rom. Antiq. p. 422.)

LAUGHTER is an indication of joy, insult, mockery, assurance, or admiration. Sarah in her transport of joy called her son Isaac, that is, laughter, Gen. xvi. 6. “At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh;” i. e. thou shalt not fear it, thou shalt be perfectly secure against those evils. God laughs at the wicked; he despises their vain efforts. Ishmael laughed at Isaac; he insulted him, he vexed him. (See Gal. iv. 29.) Laughter in general implies rejoicing. “There is a time to laugh, and a time to weep;” that is, a time to rejoice, and a time to be afflicted, Eccl. iii. 4. “Blessed are ye who weep now, for ye shall laugh,” Luke vii. 21, 25. “I said of laughter,” of joy, pleasure, “it is mad,” Eccl. ii. 2. “Your laughter shall be turned into mourning;” your joy shall terminate in sorrow, repentance, remorse, James iv. 9. Laughter does not become a wise man. “A fool lifteth up his voice with laughter, but a wise man doth scarcely smile a little. The laughter of a fool is as noisily as the cracking of thorns,” Ecclus. viii. 8. Abraham’s laughter, when God promised him a son, was an expression of adoration and gratitude, not of doubt; the Scripture, which relates it, does not disapprove of it, as it does of Sarah’s, Gen. xvii. 17.

LAW denotes in general a rule by which actions are to be determined; and is either natural or positive; the former is founded on the unchangeable nature of things, and is therefore immutable; the latter is founded on the circumstances in which rational creatures may happen to be placed, and is therefore changeable. The former is called moral; the latter, civil.

The rabbins pretend that Noah’s sons received certain laws which compose the law of nature, and bind all people, in all countries. Maimonides believes, that the first six were given to Adam, and that God added a seventh to Noah. Of these precepts the first ordains submission to judges and magistrates; the second forbids blasphemy against God; the third, idolatry and superstition; the fourth, incest, sodomy, bestiality, and sins against nature; the fifth, murder, and all effusions of blood; the sixth, theft; the seventh, the eating of the limb of an animal while living, that is, of cruel blood, &c.

LAW is usually the name of the law of nature and positive laws. The law of nature is impressed on our hearts; such are our obligations to worship the Supreme Being, to honor our parents, to obey superiors, to do to no man what we would not have done to us, &c. Positive laws are of several kinds; civil and political or ceremonial. Judicial, civil and political laws regard principally the duties of men in society, and the order and policy of the state; they restrain the violence of wicked men, defend the weak from the oppression of the strong, and regulate duties, rights and powers. Ceremonial laws respect the external worship of God, the duties of ministers and people towards God, and their reciprocal obligations to one another, with relation to the Divine Being.

The law was given to the Hebrews, by the intervention of Moses, on mount Sinai, fifty days after their departure out of Egypt. A. M. 2510, anno A. D. 1491. (See Exod. xx. 8.)

Some learned men have been of opinion, that Moses in most of the laws he pretended either to imitate those of the Egyptians, or to reverse their customs and maxims, or to circumcribe the Hebrews, to prevent their falling into those errors, idolatries, and superstitions, which they had seen in Egypt. Others, on the contrary, have asserted, that the Egyptians imitated, in part, at least, the Hebrew laws. Calmet most reasonably concludes, that there was a reciprocal imitation; bearing in mind that the practices of the Mosaic laws, which oppose the superstition of Egypt, were not instituted without design, and that the Jewish legislator intended to cure the Israelites of their proclivity to idolatry, and to correct the evil habits which they had contracted in Egypt. What was useful among those of Egypt, might be retained; and such as had been perverted, might be restored to their purity.

The law of Moses being the shadow only of good things to come, (see Type) but bringing nothing to perfection, (Heb. x. 1; vii. 19.) it was necessary that Jesus Christ should come to take what was imperfect in it, reform what abuses it tolerated, and fulfil what it only promised and typified. This he has executed with great precision. He declares, (Matt. v. 17.) that he came not to destroy the law, but to perfect it. He has enlarged, modified, or restrained it, more particularly the explanations which the rabbins, and masters in Israel, had given of it; explanations, which were rather corruptions than illustrations. Paul has, in some sort, finished what our Saviour had begun; or rather, he has set in their full light the purposes of his Master. E. g. that the law of Moses is superseded or abrogated by the gospel; that since the death of the Messiah the legal ceremonies are of no obligation; that believers are no longer under the yoke of the law, but under grace; (Rom. vi. 14.) that Christ has procured for us the liberty of sons, instead of the spirit of bondage, which reigned under the Old Testament; in a word, that it is neither the law, nor the works of it, that justify Christians, (Rom. viii.) but faith animated by love, and accompanied with good works, Gal. iv. 31; v. 13. When we say that the gospel has rescued us from the yoke of the law, we understand only the appointments of the ceremonial and judicial laws; all other precepts, whose obligation is indispensable, and whose observation is much more perfect, and extensive, and enforced, under the law of grace, than it was under the old law.

The Jews affirm, that Moses received with the written code, on mount Sinai, an oral law; that the latter was given only by word of mouth, and has been transmitted by the elders. They give a preference to the oral law, before the written law; for this, they say, is in many places obscure, imperfect, or defective, and could not be used as a rule without the assistance of the oral law, which supplies all that is wanting in the written law, and removes all difficulties. They therefore add to the written law the explanations, modifications and glosses of the oral law, and it is a sort of maxims among them, that the covenant which God made with them at Sinai, consists less in the precepts of the written law than in those of the oral law; and to the latter they generally give the preference. They say that the words of the Levites are more lovely than those of the law; that the words of the law are sometimes weighty and sometimes light; whereas those of the doctors are always weighty: that the words of the elders were of greater weight than those of the prophets. They compare the sacred text to water, and the Mishna, or Talmud, which contains their tradition, to wine; or the written law to salt, but the Mishna and Talmud to most exquisite spices; the law is only, as it were, the body, but the oral law or tradition, is the soul of religion. They have been justly reproached with making the word of God of no effect by their traditions, Mark vii. 13.

The word "law" often implies the Scriptures of the Old Testament. In the Jewish division of the Old Testament into the law, the prophets and the hagiography, the laws, or torah, designates the Pentateuch. R.

LAWYERS. These functionaries, so often mentioned in the New Testament, were men who devoted themselves to the study and explanation of the Jewish law; particularly of the traditionary or oral law. They belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, and fell under the reproof of our Saviour for having taken from the people the key of knowledge. They were as the blind leading the blind. See Scribes.

L. LAZARUS, brother of Martha and Mary, dwelt with his sisters at Bethany, near Jerusalem; and our Saviour sometimes lodged with them, when he visited that city. While he was beyond Jordan with his apostles, Lazarus fell sick; and his sisters sent information to him. He remarked, "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God;" and after two days he said to his disciples, "Lazarus is asleep, but I go to awake him," meaning, that he was dead, but that he would restore him to life. On his arrival at Bethany, he found that he had been already four days in the grave, but proceeding to the sepulcher, he commanded those who stood by to take away the stone; and having returned thanks to his Father for always hearing him, cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth!" Lazarus came forth bound hand and foot with grave-clothes, and his face was wrapped up in a napkin, and returned home to his family, John xi.

Six days before his last passover, Jesus again visited Bethany, and Lazarus reclined at table with him. The Jews, observing that the resurrection of Lazarus had made a great impression on the people's minds, took a wicked and foolish resolution to effect the death of both. That part of their design which related to our Saviour, they executed; but Scripture does not inform us what became of Lazarus.

L. LAZARUS. In Luke xvi. 19, Jesus in a parable speaks of a poor man, named Lazarus, who lay at a rich man's gate full of sores, and desired the crumbs which fell from his table, without finding relief or pity; while the rich man enjoyed great plenty, was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. Lazarus having died, was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom; the rich man also died, and while he was in hell amidst his torments, he saw Lazarus afar off, and cried out, Father Abraham, have pity on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the end of his finger in water to refresh my tongue. But Abraham answered him, Son, thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and Lazarus his evil things; now he is happy, thou art miserable.

LEAD is a very heavy metal, sufficiently well known. The mode of purifying it from the dross which is mixed with it, by subjecting it to a fierce flame, and melting off its acrid, furnishes several allusions in Scripture to God's purifying, or punishing, his people. The Hebrews (xxvi. 18, 20.) compare the Jews to lead, because of their guilt, and dross, from which they must be purged as by fire. Mention is made of a talent of lead in Zechar. v. 7, 8., which probably was of a figure and size as well known as any of our weights in ordinary use. Nor is it probable that though weights are usually called in Hebrew stones, yet, perhaps, they had some of metal only; as this talent of lead, for instance.

Lead was one of the substances used for writing upon by the ancients. See Books.

LEAH, wife of Jacob, and Laban's eldest daughter. See Jacob.

LEAVEN was forbidden to the Hebrews, during the seven days of the passover, in memory of what their ancestors did, when they went out of Egypt; they being then obliged to carry unleavened meal with them, and to make bread in haste; the Egyptians pressing them to be gone, Exod. xii. 19, 20; Lev. ii. 11. They were very careful in cleansing their houses from it before this feast began. God forbade either leaven or honey to be offered to him in his temple; that is, in cakes, or in any baked meats. But on other occasions they might offer leavened bread, or honey. See Numb. xx. 29, 31, where God commanded them to give the first fruits of the bread, which was kneaded in all the cities of Israel, to the priests and Levites. Paul (1 Cor. v. 7, 8) expresses his desire, that Christians should celebrate their passover with unleavened bread; which figuratively signifies sincerity and truth. The apostle here teaches us two things: first, that the law which obliged the Jews to a literal observance of the passover is no longer in force; secondly, that by unleavened bread, truth and purity of heart were denoted.

Paul alludes to the care with which the Hebrews cleansed their houses from leaven, when he says, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" that is, if there were but a small portion of leaven in a quantity of bread or paste, during the passover, it was thereby rendered unclean, and was to be thrown away and burned. Our Saviour (Matt. xxi. 11) warns his apostles to avoid the leaven of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians; meaning their doctrine.

LEBANON, see LIBANUS.

LEBANOTH, a town in Judah and Simeon, (Josh. xxi. 32.) called Beth Lebanoth, in Josh. xix. 6.

LEBBAUS, otherwise Judas, or Thaddeus, brother of James the Less, son of Mary, sister of the Virgin, and of Cleophas, and brother of Joseph. He was married and had children. Nicephorus calls his wife Mary. The Moscovites believe, that they received the faith from him. See Judas IV.

LEBONAH, (Judg. xxi. 19.) a place which Manassah takes for Chian-Leban, four leagues from Sicem southward, and two from Bethel.

LEECH, see HORSE-LEACH.

LEER, a pot-herb generally known. The Hebrews complained in the wilderness, that many grew insipid to them; they knew for them onions of Egypt. Hasselquist says the karrot, or leek, is surely one of those after which the Israelites repined; for it has been cultivated in Egypt from time immemorial. The favorable seasons for this plant are winter and spring. The Egyptians are extremely fond of it.

LEES, faces. To drink up the cup of God's LEH [613]

wrath, "even to the lees," is to drink the whole cup to the bottom, Ps. lxxxv. 8; Is. li. 17; Ezek. xxviii. 34. The rabbins say that Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, drank the lees of all the foregoing ages. "The lees of the people," signifies the vilest part of them, Is. xliii. 6. 7. God threatens by Zephaniah, to visit those who are settled on their lees; i. e. hardened in their sins, Zeph. i. 12.

LEGION. The Roman legions were composed of each ten cohorts, a cohort of fifty maniples, and a maniple of fifteen men; consequently, a full legion contained six thousand soldiers. But the number varied at different times. In the time of Polybius it was 4200. (See Adam's Rom. Antiq. p. 367.) Jesus cured a demoniac who called himself "legion," as if possessed by a legion of devils, Mark v. 9. He also said to Peter, who drew his sword to defend him in the olive-garden: "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, who shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?" Matt. xxvi. 53.

LEGS are properly those limbs of an animal, by which it moves from place to place; yet, to manifest the divine omnipotence, and that God is not confined to one mode of action, many creatures have no legs, though they move, (and some swiftly too,) as serpents, worms, snails, &c. and various kinds of fishes, which pass from one place to another, not having even the rudiments of legs. Limneas classes some kinds of fishes by the situation of their fins, which he considers as answering the purposes of legs, or feet, to land-animals. But, beside being the instruments of motion, the legs of the human frame are the supporters of the body, and great means of strength they are, when in health, firm, stable, secure. As such Scripture often alludes to them, Ps. cxix. 10. "Leg" is sometimes used modestly, in the same manner as foot, which see.

LEHABIM, the third son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. Some think that Lehahim denotes the Libyans, one of the most ancient people in Africa. In Neb. iii. 9, and Dan. xi. 43, we find mention of the Lubim, which the Vulgate and LXX. every where render Libyans; or, what comes to the same in Nahum and Daniel, they render Nubians. It is clear that this name describes colonies of Egyptians; whether to the south, or to the north of the country of Cyrene, inclusive of the cities of Berenice, Arisco, Tolummaus, and Cyrene; and this is usually considered as a very probable situation for the Lehahim. These and the Lubim are doubtless the same.

LEHI, the jaw-bone. Samson, having vanquished the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, after the conflict threw away the jaw which had been his weapon, and called the spot where it fell, "the place of the lifting up of the jaw-bone—Ramath Lehi." Becoming, soon after, very thirsty, he cried to the Lord, and said, "It is thou, Lord, who hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised?" Upon which God opened one of the large teeth in lehi, the jaw-bone, and a fountain sprang out of it, to allay Samson's thirst; and the place retained the name of Lehi, or the Jaw-bone, Judg. xv. 18. To explain this, Calmet remarks, that the Hebrews sometimes called naked, sharp, and steep rocks, tooth. (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5; Job xxxix. 25.) and that in this case God opened a rock called Machtesh, or the Cheek-tooth, which was at the place where Samson obtained his victory, and which, for this reason, he called Lehi, the Jaw-bone. This fountain issuing out of a rock called the Cheek-tooth, at a place named Lehi, or the Jaw-bone, had induced some to believe that it came immediately out of a tooth-hole in the jaw-bone, which would be a surprising miracle indeed. But as Calmet explains the matter, the miracle of the fountain issuing out of the rock at Samson's prayer is acknowledged; and wonders are not to be multiplied without necessity. This opinion is adopted by Josephus, by the paraphrast Jonathan, and by many commentators. The fountain subsisted long, and still subsists, probably, in Palestine; Glycerus, and the martyr Antoninus, speak of it as in the suburbs of Eleutheropolis.

Mr. Taylor has observed, that perhaps this fountain gushed out at the very point in the rock where the jaw-bone of the ass struck when thrown away by Samson; and thus, though the water really issued from the rock, it might seem to issue from under the jaw-bone. He queries, in fact, whether the violence with which the jaw-bone was thrown away by Samson, did not make a breach, or open a cleft in the rock, from which issued water; that part of the rock which before confined it being broken off. If this be just, we see the reason of the name of the fountain, with the veracity of the remark, "it exists to this day," which, if it had issued merely from the aliveole, the hole of a tooth in the jaw-bone of the ass, is not within the compass of credibility; as the jaw itself must have perished in a few years at furthest.

LENTIL, a species of pulse; or a kind of bean. We find Essau longing for a mess of potage made of lentiles, (Gen. xxiv. 34,) and Augustin says, "Lentiles are used as food in Egypt, for this plant grows abundantly in that country; which is what renders the lentiles of Alexandria so valuable, that they are brought from thence to us, as if none were grown among us." In Barbary, Dr. Shaw says, that lentiles are dressed in the same manner as beans, dissolving easily into a mass, and making a potage of a chocolate color; and in Muscovy, he says, that which Essau, from thence called Edom, (دراس, red, Gen. xxxvi. 30) exchanged for his birthright.

LEOPARD, a fierce animal, spotted with a diversity of colors; it has small white eyes, wide jaws, sharp teeth, round ears, a large tail; five claws on his fore feet, four on those behind. It is said to be extremely cruel to man. Its name, leo-pard, implies that it has something of the lion and of the panther in its nature. It seems from Scripture, that the leopard could not be rare in Palestine. Isaiah, describing the happy reign of the Messiah, says, (chap. xi. 6) "The leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion, and the fawning together." Jeremiah says, (chap. v. 6) that the leopard lies in ambush near the cities of the wicked; that all they who go out thence shall be torn in pieces by it. And Hosea (chap. xiii. 7) affirms that the Lord will be unto them as a lion, and as a leopard, lurking in the way of the Assyrians, to devour those who pass by. Jeremiah speaks of the leopard's spots: "Can the Ethiopian change his color, or the leopard his spots?" Scripture often joins the leopard with the lion, as animals of equal fierceness. Habakkuk says, (i. 8) that the Chaldean horses are swifter than leopard.
ardis. The spouse in the Canticles speaks of the mountains of the leopards, (Cant. iv. 3), that is to say, of mountains such as Libanus, Shebair, and Hermom, which wild beasts dwell. Brocard says, that the mountain called by the name of Leopards is two leagues from Tripoli northwards, and one league from Libanus; but we can scarcely believe that Solomon in the Canticles had this mountain in view.

LEPER, a person afflicted with the leprosy. The law excluded such from society; banishing them into the country, and to places uninhabited, Lev. xiii. 45, 46. This law was observed so punctually, that even kings, under the disease, were expelled their palaces, shut out of society, and deprived of the government, as Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah, who was afflicted with this malady for attempting to offer incense in the temple, 2 Kings xv. 5; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20. When a leper was cured, he appeared at the city gate, and the priest examined whether he were truly healed, Lev. xiv. 1, &c. After this he went to the temple, took two clean birds, made a wise with a branch of cedar, and another of hyssop, tied together with a scarlet riband made of wool; an earthen vessel was then filled with water, and one of these birds was fastened alive to the wise we have mentioned. The leper who was cured killed the other bird, and let the blood of it run into the vessel filled with water. The priest then took the wise with the live bird, dipped both into the water tinged with the blood of one of the birds, and sprinkled the leper with it. After this the live bird was set at liberty, and the person healed, and purified in this manner, was again admitted to the society of the healthy, and to the use of sacred things.

Many commentators are of opinion, that Job's disease was a leprosy, but in a degree of malignity which rendered it incurable, and produced a complication of diseases.

LEPROSY. Moses mentions three sorts of lepers; in (1) men; (2) houses; and (3) clothes.

1. Leprosy in men. This disease affects the skin, and sometimes increases in such a manner, as to produce scurf, scabs, and violent itchings, and to corrupt the whole mass of blood. At other times it is only a deformity. The Jews regarded the leprosy as a disease sent from God, and Moses prescribes no natural remedy for the cure of it. He requires only that the diseased person should show himself to the priest, and that the priest should judge of his leprosy; if it appeared to be a real leprosy, capable of being communicated to others, he separated the leper from the company of mankind. He appoints certain sacrifices and particular ceremonies already mentioned for the purification of a leper, and for restoring him to society. The marks which Moses gives for the better distinguishing a leprosy, are signs of the increase of this disease. An outward swelling, a pimple, a white spot, bright, and somewhat reddish, created just suspicions of a man's being attacked with it. When a bright spot, something reddish or whitish, appeared, and the hair of that place was of a pale red, and the place itself something deeper than the rest of the skin, this was a certain mark of leprosy. Those who have treated of this disease, have made the same remarks, but have distinguished a recent leprosy from one already formed and become invertebrate. A recent leprosy may be healed, but an invertebrate one is incurable. Travellers who have seen lepers in the East, say, that the disease attacks principally the feet. Maundrell, who had seen lepers in Palestine, says, that their feet are swelled like those of elephants, or horses' feet swelled with the farcy. The common marks by which, as physicians tell us, an invertebrate leprosy may be distinguished, is, in fact, all a scurfy serum, without due mixture; so that salt put into it does not melt, and is so dry, that vinegar mixed with it bubbles up; the urine is undigested, settled, ash-colored, and thick; the sediment like meal mixed with bran: the face is like a coal half extinguished, shining, meagre, blotted, full of very hard pimples, with small kernels round about the bottom of them: the eyes are red and inflamed, and project out of the head, but cannot be moved either to the right or left: the ears are swelled and red, corroded with ulcers about the root of them, and encompassed with small kernels: the nose sinks, because the cartilage rots: the nostrils are open, and the passages stopped with ulcers at the bottom: the tongue is dry, black, swollen, ulcerated, shortened, divided in ridges, and beset with little white pimples: the skin of it is uneven, hard and insensible; even if a hole be made in it, or it be cut, a putrid and sanguineous liquid issues from it instead of blood. Leprosy is very easily communicated by close contact, and much precaution to prevent lepers from communication with persons in health. His care extended even to dead bodies thus infected, which he directed should not be buried with others.

We can hardly fail of observing the character, and terror in consequence, of this disease. How dreadful is the leprosy in Scripture! how justly dreadful, when so fatal, and so hopeless of cure! Mungo Park states that the negroes are subject to a leprosy of the very worst kind; and Mr. Grey Jackson, in his "Account of Morocco," (p. 182) informs us, that the species of leprosy called jeddis, is very prevalent in Barbary. "At Morocco there is a separate quarter, outside of the walls, inhabited by lepers only. Those who are affected with it are obliged to wear a badge of distinction whenever they leave their habitations, so that a straw lat, with a very wide brim, tied on in a particular manner, is the signal for persons not to approach the wearer. Lepers are seen in many parts of Barbary, sitting on the ground, with a wooden box of his leprous food, begging. They intermarry with each other." (To the above somewhat meagre account of this terrible disease, it may not be improper to subjoin the accounts given us by some other writers. The following extract from John's Archaeology, as translated by professor Upham, affords, perhaps, sufficiently full information: (see p. 189, seq.)

"The leprosy exhibits itself on the exterior surface of the skin, but it infects, at the same time, the marrow and the bones; so much so that the farthest joints in the system gradually lose their powers, and the members fall together in such a manner, as to give the body a mutilated and dreadful appearance. From these circumstances, there can be no doubt, that the disease occurs, and ravages internally, before it makes its appearance on the external parts of the body. Indeed, we have reason to believe, that it is concealed in the internal parts of the system a number of years, for instance, in infants commonly till it appears on the external parts, and in adults as many as three or four years, till at last it gives the fearful indications on the skin, of having already gained a well-rooted and permanent existence.

It is progress subsequently to its appearance on the external surface of the body is far from being rapid; in the number of years it is, at least, six; and in the number of the whole number after to its final state. A person who is leprous from his nativity may live fifty years; one who in after life is infected with it may live twenty years, but they will be such years of dreadful misery as rarely fall to the lot of man in any other situation.

The appearance of the disease externally, is not always the same. The spot is commonly small, resembling in its appearance the small red spot that would be the consequence of a puncture from a needle, or the pustules of a ringworm. The spots for the most part make their appearance very suddenly, especially if the infected person, at the period when the disease shows itself externally, happens to be in great fear, or to be intoxicated with anger, Num. xii. 10; 1 Chron. xxvi. 15. They commonly exhibit themselves, in the first instance, on the face, about the nose and eyes; they gradually increase in size for a number of years, till they become, as respects the extent of surface which they embrace on the skin, as large as a pea or bean. The white spot or pustule, morphea alba, and also the dark spot, morphea nigra, are indications of the existence of the real leprosy, Lev. xiii. 2, 39; xiv. 56. From these it is necessary to distinguish the spot, which, whatever resemblance there may be in form, is so distinct, discovers itself by the touch, and also the harmless sort of scab, which occurs under the word rána, mispagah, Lev. xiii. 6—8, 29.

Moses, in the thirteenth chapter of Leviticus, lays down very explicit rules for the purpose of distinguishing between those spots which are proofs of the actual existence of the leprosy, and those spots which are harmless, and result from some other cause. Those spots which are the genuine effects and marks of the leprosy, gradually dilate themselves, till at length they cover the whole body. Not only the skin is subject to a total destruction, but the whole body is affected in every part. The pain, it is true, is not very great, but there is a great debility of the system, and great uneasiness and grief, so much so, as almost to drive the victim of the disease to self-destruction, Josh vii. 15.

There are four kinds of the real leprosy. The first kind is of so virulent and powerful a nature, that it separates the joints and limbs, and mutilates the body. The second is called the white leprosy. The third is the black leprosy, or Poror, Deut. xxvii. 35; Lev. xvi. 20—22. The fourth description of leprosy is the aloperia, or red leprosy.

The person who is infected with the leprosy, however long the disease may be in passing through its several stages, is at last taken away suddenly, and, for the most part, unexpectedly. But the evils which fall upon the living leper, are not terminated by the event of his death. The disease is to a certain extent, hereditary, and is transmitted down to the third and fourth generations; for this fact there seems to be an allusion in Exod. xx. 4—6; iii. 7; Deut. v. 9; xxiv. 8, 9. If any one should undertake to say, that in the fourth generation it is not the real leprosy, still it will not be denied, there is something, which bears no little resemblance to it, in the shape of defective teeth, of foetid breath, and a diseased hue. Leprous persons, notwithstanding the deformities and mutilation of their bodies, give no special evidence of a liberation from the strength of the sexual passions, and cannot be influenced to abstain from the procreation of children, when at the same time they clearly foresee the misery of which their offspring will be the inheritors. The disease of leprosy is communicable not only by transmission from the parents to the children, and not only by sexual cohabitation, but also by much intercourse with the leprous person in any way whatever. Whence Moses acted the part of a wise legislator in making those laws, which have come down to us, concerning the inspection and separation of leprous persons. The object of these laws will appear peculiarly worthy, when it was considered, that they were designed, not wantonly to fix the charge of being a leper upon an innocent person, and thus to impose upon him those restraints and inconveniences which the truth of such a charge naturally implies, but to ascertain in the fairest and most satisfactory manner, and to separate those, and those only, who were truly and really leprous. As this was the prominent object of his laws, that have come down to us on this subject, viz. to secure a fair and impartial decision on a question of this kind, he has not mentioned those signs of leprosy which admitted of no doubt, but those only which might be the subject of contention; and left it to the priests, as persons of great learning in diseases, to distinguish between the real leprous, and those who had only the appearance of being such. In the opinion of Hensler, (Geschichte der abendländischen Aussetz, p. 273,) Moses, in the laws to which we have alluded, discovers himself to us, as the physician, Every species of leprosy is not equally malignant; the most virulent species defies the skill and power of physicians. That which is less so, if taken at its commencement, can be healed. But in the latter case also, if the disease has been of long continuance, there is no remedy.

Bokah.—We find mention, in the rules laid down by Moses for the purpose of ascertaining the true tokens of leprosy, of a cutaneous disorder, which is denominated by him Bokah, and of which there is a slight mention above. It was thought by the translator, that it might be interesting to the reader to have some further account of this disorder, and he has accordingly introduced here the answer of Niebuhr, found at page 153 of his Description of Arabia, to the inquiry of Michaelis on this subject. The words of Moses, which may be found in Leviticus xiii. 38, 39, are as follows: 'If a man or woman have white spots on the skin, and the priest see that the color of these spots is faint and white, it is, in this case, the Bokah, that has broken out on the skin, and they are clean.' A person, accordingly, who was attacked with this disease, the Bokah, was not declared unclean, and the reason of it was, that it is not only harmless in itself, but is free from that infectious and hereditary character, which belongs to the true leprosy.

Niebuhr says, 'The Bokah is neither infectious nor dangerous. A black boy at Mocha, who was attacked with this sort of leprosy, had white spots here and there on his body. It was said, that the use of sulphur had been for some time of service to this boy, but had not altogether removed the disease.' He then adds the following extract from the papers of Dr. Forskal. 'May 15th, 1761, I myself saw a case of the Bokah in a Jew at Mocha, in which this disease are unequal size. They have no shining appearance, nor are they perceptively elevated above the skin; and they do not change the color of the hair. Their color is an obscure white or somewhat reddish. The rest of the skin of this patient was blacker than that of the people of the country in general, but the spots were not so white as the skin of a European when not sunburnt. The spots in this species of leprosy do not appear on the hands, nor about the navel, but on the neck and face; not, however, on that part of the head where the hair grows very thick. They gradually spread, and continue sometimes only about two months; but in some cases, indeed, as long as two years, and then disappear, by degrees, of themselves. This disorder is neither infectious nor hereditary, nor does it occasion any inconvenience. That all this, remarks Michælis, should still be found exactly to hold at the distance of three thousand five hundred years from the time of Moses, ought certainly to gain some credit to his laws, even with those who will not allow them to be of divine authority. (Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, Smith's translation, vol. iii. p. 283, art. 210.)

Michælis, in discussing the subject of leprosies, expresses his gratitude to God, that the Leprocorubrum, as it is termed by the learned, is known to the physicians of Germany only from books and by name. But this disease, although it is very frequent in Europe, indeed almost extinct, made its appearance about the year 1750, on the western continent, and spread its ravages among the savage lands of the West Indies, particularly Guadaloupe. The inhabitants of this island, alarmed and terrified at the introduction of so pernicious a disorder among them, petitioned the court of France to send to the island persons qualified to institute an inspection of those who labored under suspicion of being infected, in order that those who were in fact lepers, might be removed into lazarets.

M. Peyssonel, who was sent to Guadaloupe on this business, writes as follows on the 3rd of February, 1757: *It is now about twenty-five or thirty years since a singular disease appeared on many of the inhabitants of this island. Its commencement is imperceptible. There appear only some few white spots on the skin, which, in the whites, are of a blackish red color, and in the blacks, of a copper red. At first, they are attended neither with pain, nor any sort of inconvenience; but no means whatever will remove them. The disease imperceptibly increases, and continues many years to manifest itself more and more. The spots become larger, and spread over the skin of the whole body indiscriminately; sometimes a little elevated, though flat. When the disease advances, the upper part of the nose swells, the nostrils become enlarged, and the nose itself soft. Tumors appear on the jaws; the eye-brows swell; the ears become thick; the points of the fingers, as also the feet and toes, swell; the nails become scaly; the joints of the hands and feet separate, and drop off. On the palms of the hands, and on the soles of the feet, appear deep, dry ulcers, which increase rapidly, and then disappear again. In short, in the last stage of the disease, the patient becomes a hideous spectacle, and falls in pieces. These symptoms supervene by very slow and successive steps, requiring often many years before they all occur. The patient suffers to violent pain, but feels a sort of numbness in his hands and feet. During the whole period of the disorder, those afflicted with it experience no obstructions in what are called the naturalia. They eat and drink as usual; and even when their fingers and toes mortify, the loss of the mortified part is the only consequence that ensues; for the wound heals of itself without any medical treatment or application.

When, however, the unfortunate wretches come to the last period of the disease, they are hideously disfigured, and objects of the greatest compassion. It has been remarked, that this horrible disorder has, besides, some very lamentable properties; as, in the first place, that it is hereditary and hence some families are more affected with it than others secondly, that it is infectious, being propagated by contagion; and, even by long-continued intercourse: thirdly, that it is incurable, or at least no means of cure have hitherto been discovered. Mercurial medicines, and laphroaïtes, and all the usual prescriptions and plans of regimen for venereal complaints, have been tried, from an idea that the infection might be venereal, but in vain; for instead of relieving, they only hastened the destruction of the patients. The medicines serviceable in these venereal, have no other effect than to bring the disease to its acme; inducing all its most formidable symptoms, and making those thus treated die some years sooner than other victims to it.

2. The leprosy of houses, mentioned in Lev. xiv, 34, &c. must have been known to the Israelites, who had lived in Egypt, and must have been common in the land of Canaan, whither they were going, since Moses says to them: *When ye come into the land of Canaan, whither I will bring you; thy possession, if there be a house infected with a leprosy, he to whom the house belongs shall give notice of it to the priest, who shall go thither. If he sees as it were little holes in the wall, and places disfigured with pale or reddish spots, which in sight are lower than the wall; the house shall go out of the house, and direct it to be shut up for seven days. At the end of this time, if he find that the leprosy is increased, he shall command the stones infected with the leprosy to be taken away, and thrown without the city into some unclean place. New stones shall be put in the room of those which were plucked out, and the wall shall be again roughcast. If the leprosy do not return, the house shall be thought clean; but if it return, it is then an invertebrate leprosy; the house shall be declared unclean, and immediately be demolished: all the wood, stone, mortar and dust shall be cast out of the city into an unclean place."

The rabbins and others conclude, that this leprosy of houses was inflicted by God on wicked Israelites; but Calmet is of opinion that it was caused by animalcula, which erode the stones like mites in a cheese. Might it be similar to the dry-rot in timber? Or, rather, it arose more probably from the effects of sulphur, which shows itself in greenish or reddish spots on the walls of stone houses, and spreads wider and wider. In the long run it injures the walls; and at all times corrupts the air and is injurious to the health. Hence the propriety of the strict regulations of Moses. (See Michaelis's Mos. Recht, or Commentary on the Laws of Moses.)

3. The leprosy in clothes is also noticed by Moses, as common in his time. He says, if any greenish or red spots be observed on any woollen or linen stuffs, or on any thing made of skin, they shall be carried to the priest, who shall shut them up for seven days; and if at the end of this time the spots increase, and spread, he shall burn them, as infected with a real leprosy. If these spots are not increased, the priest shall command the clothes to be washed, and if he afterwards observes nothing extraordinary in them, he shall declare them to be clean. If the greenish or red spots remain, he shall order the garments so

Egyptians used letters in their writing. Of this we cannot be certain, but two things we know; first, that there were great resemblances in the ancient characters of the two people; and secondly, that Moses, who was instructed in all the learning of Egypt, wrote in Phoenician characters. The old Egyptian letters are at present unknown, though many of them remain. This people lost the use of their writing when under the dominion of the Greeks, and the Coptic, or modern Egyptian character, is formed from the Greek.

The Phoenicians spread the use of their letters throughout all their colonies. Cadmus carried them into Greece; the Greeks perfected them, and added others. They communicated them to the Latins, and after the conquests of Alexander, extended them over Egypt and Syria. So that the Phoenician writing, which is so ancient, and the parent of so many others, would at this day have been entirely forgotten, had not the Samaritans preserved the Pentateuch of Moses, written in the old Canaanite, or Hebrew, character; by the help of which, medals, and the small remains of Phoenician monuments, have been deciphered.

Some learned men, however, maintain that the square Hebrew character still in use, is the same as was used by Moses; but the greater number suppose that the Jews gradually abandoned the original character while in captivity at Babylon, and that ultimately Ezra substituted the Chaldee, which is now used; while the Samaritans preserved their ancient Pentateuch, written in old Hebrew and Phoenician characters.

It is generally said that the Hebrews have no vowels, and that to supply the want of them, they invented the vowel-points, sometimes used by them in their books. The vowel-points are modern, and the invention of the Massorets, probably from the sixth to the eighth century. They are ten in number, and express the five vowels according to their different changes and pronunciations. The inquisitive reader may find the substance of the dispute for and against the antiquity of the vowel-points clearly and concisely represented by Prideaux, in the first part of his Connection, book v. and from thence may have a distinct view of the chief arguments produced pro and con in this controversy, by those eminent antagonists, Capellus, the two Buxtorfs, &c.

[The subject of the Hebrew letters and vowel points is too important to the biblical student, to be passed over thus slightly. The best source of information on these topics is Geschicht der Heb. Sprache u. Schrift, the results of which are also given by professor Stuart in the Introduction to his Hebrew Grammar, first and second editions. From this the following statements have been condensed. See also LANGUAGE.]

The origin of letters is lost in remote antiquity. But in tracing the history of them, we arrive at a very satisfactory degree of evidence, that in hither Asia they originated among those who spoke the Hebrew language; that they passed from thence to the Greeks; and through these to the European nations in general. The ancient Semitic alphabets may be divided into two kinds:

1. The Phoenician character. To this belong: (a) Inscriptions discovered at Malta, Cyprus, &c. and upon Phoenician coins. (b) Inscriptions upon Hebrew coins. (c) Phoenico-Egyptian inscriptions on the bandages of mummies. (d) The Samaritan letters. (e) The most ancient Greek alphabet.
II. The Hebrew-Chaldaic character. To this belong: (a) The square character of our present Hebrew Bibles. (b) The Palmyrene inscriptions. (c) The old Syriac, or Estrangelo. (d) The old Arabic or Kufish character, which preceded the Nishri or common character of Arabia at the present time.

To all these characters it is common, that they are read from the right to the left; and that the vowels constitute no part of the alphabet, but are written above, in, or below the line. The old Greek character is, in part, an exception to this remark.

There are three kinds of characters, in which the remains of the ancient Hebrew are presented to us, viz. (1.) The square character in common use. This is sometimes called the Chaldee, or Assyrian, character, because as the Talmud avers, Gem. Sanh. fol. 31. c. 2. the Jews brought it from Assyria, or Babylon, on their return from the captivity. (2.) The inscription character. This is found on ancient Hebrew coins, stamped under the Maccabees. (3.) The Samaritan character. This is only a variety, or degenerate kind, of the inscription character.

Although it is highly probable, that the present square character was introduced among the Jews by means of the exile, yet it is not likely, that it usurped the place of the more ancient character at once, but came into gradual use, on account of its superior beauty, and the tendency of the language towards what was Aramaean. It is most probable, that the inscription-character approximates the nearest of all the alphabets now known, to the ancient Hebrew, or Phoenician. The square character gradually expelled this use among the Hebrews; as the Nishri did the Kufish among the Arabs; the present Syriac, the old Estrangelo among the Syrians; or the Roman type, the old black letter among the English. The Palmyrene inscriptions seem to mark the character in transitu; about one half of them resembling the square character, and the other half the inscription-letters. It was very natural for the Maccabees, when they stamped coins as an independent government, to use the old characters which the nation had used when it was free and independent.

The square character was the common one in the time of our Saviour; as in Matt. v. 8, Yodh is evidently referred to, as being the last letter of the alphabet. It is highly probable, that it was the character used throughout the whole MSS. when the Septuagint version was made; because the departures from the Hebrew text in that version, so far as they have respect to the letters, can mostly be accounted for, on the ground that the square character was then used, and that the final letters, which vary from the medial or initial form, were then wanting. (Gen. Gesch. § 40—43.)

Manner of writing. It has commonly been advanced as an established position, that all the ancient Greek and Hebrew MSS. are without any division of words, i. e. are written continua scrib. But the Eugubine tables, and the Sigean inscriptions, have one or two points to divide words; others, still more: which, however, are not used at the end of lines, nor when the words are very closely connected in sense, as a preposition with its noun. Most of the old Greek is written without any division of words. Most of the Phoenician inscriptions are written in a similar way, but not all. Some have the words separated by a point. In this manner, the Samaritan, and the wedge-character among the Persians, are separated. The Kufish, or old Arabic, had spaces between words. So have all known Hebrew MSS. now extant. It is probably, however, that the sacred MSS. were written without any division of words, was found in the MSS. used by the LXX because many errors, which they have committed, arise from an incorrect division of words. Every synagoge-rolls of the Jews, written in imitation of the ancient Hebrew manuscripts, have no division points, but exhibit a small space between the words. The Samaritan Pentateuch also destitute of vowels, but divides the words.

The final letters with a distinctive form are coeval with the alphabet. The LXX manuscript was acquainted with them; as they often divide wo in a manner different from that which used with these final letters. But the Talmud, Jerome, and Epiphanius acknowledge them.

It can hardly be supposed that the square character now in use, and which has become uniform consequence of appearing only in printed books was altogether immutable while it was transmitted only by MSS. Jerome complains of the smallness of the Hebrew characters; but whether this owing to the scribe who wrote his manuscripts, or the form of writing then generally used, cannot be determined. From what Origen and Jerome say of the similarity and relation of Hebrew let each other, it appears that the characters were essentially the same as they now are. (Gesch. § 46. 1.)

Hebrew MSS. exhibit two kinds of writing: (1.) The Talm letter, probably so named from Targum Yonah, which is a collection of the Targumim, or interlinear interpretations, of the Hebrew Bible from the 1st century AD. The Talm letter is an abbreviation of the Hebrew letters, and is used in the Targumim and other early Jewish writings.

(2.) The Vavkh letter, such as we see in the Hebrew Bible of Simonon and Van der Hoeve. In MSS., however, this species of character has remained upon some of the letters. The Span printed Hebrew character resembles the Vavkh; German resembles the Talm letter. The coron in both are omitted. The Spanish letters are set upright; the German, slanting and slanting. The Italian and French Hebrew character medium between both.

Hebrew vowels. It has been mentioned that Shemitic languages exhibit alphabets destitute of vowels; and that these, when added to the text are written to indicate the vowels of the ancient Hebrew text. The vowels of the Hebrew language were coeval with the consonants, or at least very ancient, has been sigmatized by many critics, for three centuries with great interest and much learning. On the other hand, it has been maintained, that the vowels of the Hebrew language were coeval with the consonants. It is considered, by critics of any note, as settled. The principal reason for this may be simply stated, in a summary.
The allocation that the Targums approximate very closely to the sense of our present Hebrew text as furnished with vowels, is true; but the inference therefrom, that the Targumists must have used MSS. with vowel-points, does not follow. On the contrary, we may draw the inference with more probability, that the vowel-points were conformed to the sense which the Targums gave. Both merely convey the traditional explications of the Jewish schools; and the same thing is done by Origen and Jerome in their commentaries. All that can be proved by such arguments is, that the vowel-points have faithfully transmitted to us the sense which the Jews very early affixed to the words of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Laying aside Jewish traditional stories, the first certain marks of our present vowel-system may be found in the Masora, compiled, though not concluded, about the fifth century. Most of the vowels are there named. A few of the accented and unaccented readings, selected in the eighth century and printed in some of our Hebrew Bibles, respect the diacritical points; e. g. two of them respect Mappiq in He.

The various readings of Ben Asher and Ben Naphtali (about A. D. 1034) have exclusive regard to the vowels and accents. The Arabic version of Saadia, made about this time, is predicated upon a pointed text; and the Jewish grammarians of the ninth century appear plainly to proceed on the ground of such a text. The time when the vowel-system was completed cannot be definitely fixed, for want of historical data. Most probably, it was during the sixth or seventh century. Probably, too, it first began, as the accentuation of Greek did, in the schools; and gradually spread, on account of its utility in a dead language, into a great part of the Hebrew manuscripts.

The importance of the vowel-points to learners, can be fully estimated only by those who have studied Hebrew without and with the use of them. In respect to their being a constituent part of the Hebrew language, it may be observed, (1.) That no language can exist without vowels; although it is not necessary that they should be written; and originally, as we have seen, they were not written in the Hebrew. (2.) It is certain that the vowel-points exhibit a very consistent, deep, and fundamental view of the structure of Hebrew words, which cannot be obtained without them, by those who study it as a dead language. (3.) Comparison with the Syriac and Aramit, the latter of which is a living language, shows that the vowel-system, as to its principles, is analogous to the sounds of the modern Jewish languages. (4.) It is quite certain, from comparing the sense of the Hebrew Scriptures as given in the Targums and in the versions and notes of Jerome, that the vowel-points do give us an accurate, and for the most part, clear account of the manner in which the Jews of the first four centuries of the Christian era understood the text of the Old Testament. Indeed, it is very remarkable, that there should be so exact a coincidence between the vowel-system and commentaries, or rather versions, of so remote an age; and this only serves to show with how great exactness the vowel-system has been arranged, agreeably to the ancient Jewish ideas of the sense of the Old Testament. The importance, then, of the written vowels, as conveying to us a definite idea of the ancient commentaries of the Jewish church, in regard to a great number of difficult and dubious passages, is obviously great. (5.) The critic and interpreter, being satisfied that the written vowel-system is not coeval with the composition of the Hebrew Scriptures, will not feel himself bound to follow it in cases where it makes no sense, or a sense inconsistent with the context.

The unwary student who is betrayed into the system of Maschkeif and syllables, which regard the vowel-points of the Semitic languages, can scarcely conceive how much loss and disappointment he will experience, by pursuing the study of Hebrew in this method.

In a period of one year, the progress by the use of the vowel-points is considerably greater than without them.

In two years it is doubled.

Moreover, if the student uses the points from the first, he will be able, with almost no trouble, to pass to the reading of Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic.

One thing is pretty evident; there never was, and it may be doubted whether there ever will be, a thorough Hebrew scholar, who is ignorant of the vowel-system.

Hebrew accents.—The system of accents, as it now appears in our Hebrew Bibles, is inseparably connected with the present state of the vowel-points; inasmuch as these points are often changed by virtue of the accents. The latter, therefore, must have originated contemporaneously with the written vowels; at least, with the constitution of the vowel-system.

Respecting the design of the accents, there has been great diversity of opinion, and much dispute. The three uses have been assigned them, viz. (1.) To mark the tone-syllable of a word. (2.) To mark the interjection. (3.) To regulate the reading or intonation of the Scriptures.

This latter seems to have been their primitive and most important use; just as similar marks are now found in the Koran to indicate the manner in which it is to be read or intonated.

The cantillation must necessarily have reference to the tone-syllables of every word; and also, in a greater or less degree, to the divisions of the sense; and so far as this, the use of the accents serves to mark two particulars. R.

The Hebrews have certain accentive verses, which begin with the letters of the alphabet, ranged in order.

The most considerable of these is Psalm cxxix., which contains twenty-two stanzas of eight verses each, all accentive; that is, the first eight begin with א, the second with ב, the third with ג, and so on. Other Psalms, as xxv., xxxiv., have but twenty-two verses each, beginning with one of the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. Others, as ex., xxix., have one half of the verse beginning with one letter, and the other half with another. Thus:

... Blessed is the man who fears the Lord...

Who delighteth greatly in his commandments.

The first half of the verse begins with א, but the second with ב, both which are also in accentive verse, as well as the thirty-first chapter of Proverbs, from the eighth verse to the end.

The Jews use their characters not only for writing, but for numbers, as did the Greeks, who, in their arithmetical computations, fixed a numerical value on their letters. But we do not believe the ancient Hebrews did so, nor that letters were numerical among them.

The sacred authors always write the numbers entire and without abbreviation. We know that some learned men have attempted to rectify dates, or supply years, on a supposition that the letters served for numbers in the Scripture; but it was incumbent on them, first, to prove that the ancient Hebrews used that manner.
in the streets of London; messengers, sent with letters, desire passengers to read the directions for them. The messengers sent to Hezekiah are described as saying, 'when in fact they say nothing;' but only deliver a letter containing the message.

A name is sometimes relative to the customary kind of homage which, in the East, is paid not only to sovereignty, but to communications of the sovereign's will, whether by word or by letter. "When the Mogul, by letters, sends his commands to any of his governors, those papers are entertained with as much respect as if himself were present; for the governor, having intelligence that such letters are come near him, himself, with other inferior officers, rides forth to meet the Patawar, or messenger, that brings them; and as soon as he sees those letters, he alights from his horse, falls down on the earth, and takes them from the messenger, and lays them on his head, whereon he binds them fast: then, retiring to his place of public meeting, he reads, and answers them." (Sir Thomas Roe's Embassy, p. 453.) This binding of these letters on his head is, no doubt, to do them honor. What then shall we think of the force of Job's expressions, chap. xxxi. 35: "O that mine adversary had written a book, a roll, an accusation, let. surely I would write it on a roll of paper; I would write it on my page as my crown upon me," that is, on my head. This idea, then, of the poet, was drawn from real observation of life; not from fancy, but from fact; though to us it seems singular, if not extravagant. The letter which was to be presented to the new monarch was delivered to the general of the slaves. It was put up in a purse of cloth of gold, drawn together with strings of twisted gold and silk, with tassels of the same; and the chief minister put his own seal upon it, to bind it. Nor was any omitted of those knacks and curiosities, which the oriental people make use of in making up their epistles. The general threw himself at his majesty's feet, bowing to the very ground; then, rising upon his knees, he drew out of the bosom of his garment the bag wherein was the letter which the assembly had sent to the new monarch. Presently he opened the bag, took out the letter, kissed it, laid it on his forehead, presented it to his majesty, and then rose up." (Chardin's Coron. of Soleiman, p. 44.) This is a chair confirmation of a sense given to the passages quoted in the article Kisses.

LEVI, the third son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2245, Gen. xxix. 34. After Sichem, the son of Hamor, had violated Dinah, sister of Joseph, these two brethren fraudulently engaged him to receive circumcision, and on the third day, when the pain was greatest, they entered the town, slew all the males, carried off their sister Dinah, and pillaged the place, chap. xxxiv. 25, 26. This action was very displeasing to their father Jacob, who characterized it as one of extreme cruelty and abhorrence, Gen. xlv. 11; xlix. 5, 6.

Levi was, according to his father's prediction, scattered over all Israel, having no share in the division of Canaan, but certain cities in the portions of other tribes. He was not the worse provided for, however, since God chose the tribe for the service of the temple and priesthood, and bestowed on it many privileges above the other tribes, in dignity, and in the advantages of life. All the tithe, first-fruits, and offerings, presented at the temple, as well as several parts of all the victims that were offered, belonged to the tribe of Levi. See Levites.

LEVIATHAN. This word (prob) occurs in four places in the Old Testament, and is variously translated, whale, dragon, serpent, and sea-monster; not improperly, probably, since it appears to be employed by the sacred writers to describe all these, and perhaps other animals also; though one description of an animal appears to be marked out more particularly by the term.

Many of the old commentators were of opinion that the whale was the animal described by Job; (chap. xii.) but Beza, Diodati, and some other writers, contended for the crocodile, which interpretation Bochart has since defended with a train of argument which defies contradiction. (Hieron. iii. p. 757—774. Rosenmüller.) It is a sufficient objection to the whale tribes, says Dr. Good, that they do not inhabit the Mediterranean, much less the rivers that empty themselves into it. This family of marine monsters, moreover, have neither proper snout nor nostrile; they have a mere spiracle, or blowing hole, with a double opening on the top of the head, which has not hitherto been proved to be an organ of smell; and for teeth, a hard expanse of horny laminae, which we call whalebone, in the upper jaw, but nothing of the sort in the under. The eyes of the common whale, too, instead of answering the description here given, are most disproportionately small, and do not exceed in size those of an ox.

Nor can this monster be regarded as of fierce habits, or unconquerable courage; for instead of attacking the larger sea animals for plunder, it feeds chiefly on crabs and medusae, and is often itself attacked and destroyed by the ork or grampus, though less than half its size.

The crocodile, on the contrary, is a natural inhabitant of the Nile, and other Asiatic and African rivers; of enormous voracity and strength, as well as fleetness in swimming; attacks mankind, and the largest animals, with most daring impetuousity; when taken by means of a powerful net, will often overturn the boats that surround it; has, proportionally, the largest mouth of all monsters whatever; moves both its jaws equally, and is extremely swift; and not less than forty, and the lower than thirty-eight, sharp, but strong and massy, teeth; and is furnished with a coat of mail so scaly and callous, as to resist the force of a musket-ball in every part, except under the belly. The general character of this animal, in fact, seems so well to apply to this animal, in modern as well as in ancient times, the terror of all the coasts and countries about the Nile, that it is unnecessary to seek further.

The following is a copy of a letter from an American gentleman in Manila, dated October 6, 1831, gives a graphic view of the strength and size of the crocodile: "I have recently been sick, but have passed a month in the country, and am entirely recovered. I resided on a large plantation on the lake, about thirty miles in the interior, and was treated with the utmost attention and hospitality. I hunted deer and wild bear with much success. My last operation in the sporting line, was no less than killing an alligator or crocodile; which for a year or two before had infested a village on the borders of the lake, taking off horses and cows, and sometimes a man. Having understood that he had killed a horse a day or two before, and had taken him into a small river, I proceeded to the spot, which was distant, accompanied by my host, closed the mouth of the river with strong nets, and attacked the huge brute with guns and spears. After something of a desperate battle, we succeeded in driving him against the nets, where, having swallowed which, was drawn on shore despatched.

Hast thou put a ring in his nose,
Or pierced his cheek through with a chisel?

This has been usually supposed to refer to a manner of muzzling the beast, so as to be able to take him by a hook or ring in the nostrils, threatened Pharaoh under the emblem of the crocodile, Ezek. xxxix. 4. But Mr. Vansittart thinks the words here used expressive of ornaments; and this second verse may be considered as expressive of Leviathan led about, not as a sight, but in his dignity; and the στρέμα: a gold ring or ornamental bearing ear-rings, from their lying extremity upon the lower jaw, perhaps they were put upon the other parts, or the historian, hearing that the crocodile was adorned with ornaments, fixed upon the ears and fore feet, as ear-rings, necklaces were the most usual ornaments of the Greeks. Very likely the ornaments were not put upon the same parts, but varied at different times; and that in the time of the Hebrew writer, the ears and the lips received the ornaments which, in Greek days, the Greek historian, were transferred to the fore feet. The exact place of the ornament is, however, of no material consequence; it is evident for our purpose to know, that ornaments were put upon the sacred crocodile, and that he was adorned with great distinction, and in some degree considered a domestic animal. The three verses immediately following, speak of him as being endowed with a covenant of peace, being retained in subjection to the "divine" domination of the gods.

Has he made many supplications to thee?
Has he addressed thee with flattering words?

And received him into perpetual service?

The irony here is very apparent. The sacred crocodile shows a wonderful address in managing this delicate detail of speech, in such a manner as not to detract from the majesty of the great Being into whose hands it is put.

Hast thou played with him as a bird?
Shall thy partners spread a banquet for him?
And the交易 strangers bring him portions?

Jehovah, as we have observed, is an example of the "partners" ("charmers of birds"); hence rendered by the Chaldee, צבִּיר, wise men; and that it is to be applied to priests who had the charge of the sacred crocodile, and might as well be called "charmers of the crocodile."
LEVIATHAN

The impenetrability of his skin is here intimated, and is afterwards described at large. The attempt to wound him with missile weapons is ridiculed. This is a circumstance which will agree to no animal so well as to the crocodile. The weapons mentioned are undoubtedly such as fishermen use in striking large fish at a distance.

Make ready thy hand against him.
Dare the contest; be firm.
Behold! the hope of him is vain;
It is dissipated even at his appearance.

The hope of mastering him is absurd. So formidable is his very appearance, that the resolution of his opposer is weakened, and his courage daunted.

None is so resolute that he dare rouse him. Who then is able to contend with him?
What will stand before me, yea, presumpiously?
Whatever is beneath the whole heavens is mine. I cannot be confounded at his limbs and violence, nor at his power, or the strength of his frame.

"However man may be appalled at attacking the Leviathan, all creation is mine; his magnitude and structure can produce no effect upon me. I cannot be appalled or confounded; I cannot be struck dumb."

Job is, in this clause, taught to tremble at his danger in having provoked, by his murmurs and litigation, the displeasure of the Maker of this terrible animal. The poet then enters upon a part of the description which has not yet been given, and which admirably pairs with the detailed picture of the war-horse and behemoth. Nor does he descend from the dignity high and hitherto ascribed to the great Creator as displaying his own wonderful work, and calling upon man to observe the several admirable particulars in its formation, that he might be impressed with a deeper sense of the power of his Maker.

Who will strip off the covering of his armor?
Against the doubling of his nostrils who will advance?

This verse is obscure. The first line, however, seems to describe the terrible helmet which covers the head and face of the crocodile. The translation might be, "Who can uncover his mailed face?"

If, in the days of Job, they covered their war-horses in complete armor, the question will refer to the taking off the armor; and the scales of Leviathan be represented by such an image. Then, the second line may denote bridling him, after the armor is stripped off, for some other service.

The doors of his face who will tear open?
The rows of his teeth are terror:
The plates of his scales, triumph!
His body is like embossed shields;
They are joined so close one upon another,
The very air cannot enter between them.

Each is inserted into its next;
They are compact, and cannot be separated.

The mouth of the crocodile is very large; and the apparatus of teeth perfectly justifies this formidable description. The indescribable texture, and the largeness of the scales with which he is covered, are represented by the powerful images of these verses.

His snorings are the radiance of light;
And his eyes as the glancing of the dawn.

Schultens remarks, that amphibious animals, the longer time they hold their breath under water, require so much the more strongly when they begin to emerge; and the breath, confined for a length of time, effervescences in such a manner, and breaks forth so violently, that they appear to vomit forth flames.

The eyes of the crocodile are small, but they are said to be extremely piercing out of the water. Hence, the Egyptians, comparing the eye of the crocodile, when he first emerged out of the water, to the sun rising from out of the sea, in which he was supposed to set, made the hieroglyphic of sunrise. Thus Horus Apol. says, (lib. i. § 65.) "When the Egyptians represent the sunrise, they paint the eye of the crocodile, because it is first seen as that animal rises out of the water."

From out of his mouth issue flashes;
Spears of fire stream out;
From his nostrils bursteth flame,
As from the rush-kindled oven.
His breath kindleth coals;
Raging fire spreadeth at his presence.

Here the creature is described in pursuit of his prey on the land. His mouth is then open. His breath is thrown out with prodigious vehemence; it appears like smoke, and is heated to that degree as to seem a flaming fire.

The images which the sacred poet here uses are indeed very strong and hyperbolical; they are similar to those in Ps. xvii. 8: "There went a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured; coals kindled by it." Ovid (Metam. viii.) does not scruple to paint the enraged boar in figures equally bold:

Lightning issueth from his mouth,
And thunders are set on fire by his breath.

Silius Italicus (l. vi. v. 208.) has a correspondent description.

In his neck dwelleth might:
And destruction exulteth before him.

Might and destruction are here personified. The former is seated on his neck, as indicating his power, or guiding his movements; and the latter is leaping and dancing before him when he pursues his prey, to express the terrible slaughter which he makes.

The flanks of his flesh are compacted together
They are firm, and will in no wise give away.
His heart is as hard as a stone,
Yea, as hard as the nether mill-stone.

These strong similes may denote not only a material, but also a moral, hardness—his savage and unrelenting nature. Ilian calls the crocodile "a voracious devourer of flesh, and the most pitiless of animals."

At his rising, the mighty are alarmed;
Frighted at the disturbance which he makes in the water,
The sword of the assailant is shivered at the onset,
As is the spear, the dart, or the harpoon.
He regardeth iron as straw;
Copper as rotten wood.
The arrow cannot make him flee,
Sling-stones he deemeth trifling;
Like stubble is the battle-axe reputed;
And he laugheth at the quivering of the javelin.

These expressions describe, in a lively manner, the strength, courage, and intrepidity of the crocodile. Nothing frightens him. If any one attack him, neither swords, darts, nor javelins avail against him. Travelers agree, that the skin of the crocodile is proof against pointed weapons.

His bed is the splinters of flint,
Which the broken rock scattereth on the mud.

This clause is obscure, and has been variously rendered. The idea seems to be, that he can repose himself on sharp-pointed rocks and stones with as little concern as upon mud.

He maketh the main to boil as a caldron;
He sauneth up the tide as a perfume.
Behind him glittereth a pathway;
The deep is embroidered with hour.

To give a further idea of the force of this creature, the poet describes the effect of his motion in the water. When a large crocodile dives to the bottom, the violent agitation of the water may be justly compared to liquor boiling in a caldron. When swimming upon the surface, he cuts the water like a ship, and makes it white with foam; at the same time his tail, like a rudder, causes the waves behind him to froth and sparkle like a trail of light. These images are common among the poets. Thus Homer, (Odys. i. xii. v. 235.) as translated by Pope:

. . . . . . . "Tumultuous boil the waves;
They toss, they foam, a wild confusion raise;
Like waters bubbling o'er the fiery blaze."

He hath not his like upon earth,
Even among those made not to be daunted.
He looketh upon every thing with haughtiness;
He is king over all the sons of the fierce.

Mr. Good observes, that all the interpreters appear to have run into an error in conceiving, that "the sons of pride or haughtiness, in the original πρεστ, refer to wild beasts, or monsters of enormous size; it is far more confounding to the haughtiness and exultation of man,—to that undue confidence in his own power, which is the very object of this sublime address to humiliate, to have pointed out to him, even among the brute creation, a being which he dares not to encounter, and which laughs at all his pride, and pomposity, and pretensions, and compels him to feel in all these respects his real littleness and inferiority. It is difficult, perhaps impossible, to find a description so admirably sustained in any language of any age or country. The whole appears to be of a piece, and equally excellent."

The word leviathan is also found in the original of Job, chap. iii. 8, in our version rendered "mournings." Mr. Good has a long note, explaining the passage as having a reference to ancient sorceries, and exorcising incantations. Gesenius supposes it to refer to the power of drawing out serpents from their lurking places by means of music. (See INCHANTMENTS.) Mr. Scott's version and note are as follows:

Let them curse it that curse the day
Of those who shall awake leviathan.

To stir up, or awake, leviathan is represented, in chap. xli. 8-10, to be inevitable destruction. It was natural to mention such a terrible casualty in the strongest terms of abhorrence, and to lament those who so miserably perished with the most bitter imprecations on the disastrous day. Job here calls for the assistance of such language, to exacerbatethe final night of his nativity. Or it may have a reference to the execution expressed by the Omniblitz against the Tentyrites. The Omniblitz were the inhabitants of Ombos, a town upon the right bank of the Nile, not far from the cataracts of the ancient Siene, now Assuan. This people were remarkable for the worship of the crocodile, and the foolish kind manner in which they treated and cherished him. Their nearly opposite neighbors, the Tentyrites, were, on the contrary, conspicuous for their hatred and persecution of the same animal. The different modes of treatment of this animal produced deadly feuds and animosities between the two people, which Juvenal, in his fifteenth Satire, ridicules most justly. He was an eye-witness of the hostility described, residing as a Roman officer at Syene. If there be any allusion to this in the passage before us, it would mean, "Let my birth be held in as much abhorrence, as is that of those who are the rousers of leviathan."

Between two neighboring towns a rancorous rage
Yet burns; a hate no leniency can assuage.

Juv. Sat. xii. v. 35.

By leviathan, (Ps. lxxvii. 14.) we may suppose Pharaoh to be represented, as a king of Egypt was called by Ezekiel, (chap. xxix. 3.) "the great dragon or crocodile" that lieth in the midst of his rivers; and if, says Mr. Merrick, the Arabic lexicographers quoted by Bochart (Phalag. i. i. c. 15.) rightly affirm that Pharan, in the Egyptian language, signified a crocodile, there may possibly be some such allusion to his name in these texts of the psalmist and of Ezekiel, as was made to the name of Draco, when Herodicus, in a sarcasm recorded by Aristotle, (Rhet. i. ii. c. 23.) said that his laws, which were very severe, were the laws of a dragon, a draco, in Greek, nomen draconis. Moses Chorenensis mentions some ancient songs, which called the descendants of Astygases a race of dragons, because Astygases in the Armenian language signified a dragon, (l. i. c. xxix.)

LEVIRATE, see MARRIAGE.

LEVITES. All the descendants of Levi may be comprised under this name; but chiefly those who were employed in the lower services in the temple, by which they were distinguished from the priests, who were of the race of Levi, by Aaron, and were employed in higher offices. The Levites were the descendants of Levi, by Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, excepting the family of Aaron; for the children of Moses had no part in the priesthood, and were only common Levites. God chose the Levites instead of the first-born of all Israelites, for the service of his tabernacle and temple, Numb. iii. 6, &c. They obeyed the priests in the ministrations of the temple, and sung and played on instruments, in the daily services, &c. They studied the law, and were the ordinary judges of the country; but subordinate to the priests. God provided for the subsistence of the Levites, by giving to them the tithe of corn, fruit and cattle; but they paid to the priests the tenth of their tithes; and as the Levites possessed no estates in land, the tithes which the priests received from them were considered as the first-fruits which they were to offer to the Lord, Numb. xviii. 21—24.

God assigned for the habitations of the Levites forty-eight cities, with fields, pastures and gardens, Numb. xxvi. 51. Of these, thirteen were given to the priests, six of which were cities of refuge, Josh. xii. 7; xxi. 19, &c. While the Levites were actually employed in the temple, they were supported out of the provisions kept in store there, and out of the daily offerings. (See Deut. xii. 18; xviii. 6—8.) The consecration of the Levites was without much ceremony. (See Numb. viii. 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 34.)

The Levites were no peculiar habit to distinguish them from other Israelites, till the time of Agrippa, whose innovation in this matter is mentioned by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 5,) who remarks, that the ancient customs of the country were never forsaken with impunity.

The Levites were divided into different classes; the Gershonites, Kohathites, Merarites and the Aaronites, or priests, Numb. iii. &c. The Gershonites were in number 7,500. Their office in the marches through the wilderness was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle. The Kohathites were in number 8,600. They were employed in carrying the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle. The Merarites were in number 6,200. They carried those pieces of the tabernacle which could not be placed on chariots. Thus we find that the whole number of the Levites amounted to 22,300, of whom 8,580 were fit for service, and 13,720 unfit, being either too old or too young, Numb. iii. iv. When the Hebrews encamped in the wilderness, the Levites were placed round about the tabernacle; Moses and Aaron at the east, Gershon at the west, Kohath at the south, and Merari at the north.

The Levites were not to enter upon their service at the tabernacle till they were 25 years of age; (Numb. vii. 24,) or, as in chap. iv. 3, from 30 to 50 years old. But David fixed the time of service at 20 years. The priests and Levites waited by turns, weekly, in the temple, 1 Chron. xxii. 24; 2 Chron. xxxii. 17; Ezra iii. 8.

LEVITICUS, the third book in the Pentateuch; called Leviticus, because it contains principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests, Levites and sacrifices. The Hebrews call it "the priestly law," and also ταγικα, because in Hebrew it begins with this word, and he called. The first seven chapters prescribe the ceremonies in offering burnt-sacrifices, meat-offerings, bread and cakes, peace-offerings or thani of all kinds; for the seasons; regulating what parts were to be consumed on the fire of the altar, and what were to be given to the priest, who offered them. This is followed by directions as to the manner in which the priests were to be consecrated, and what sacrifices were to be offered on that occasion. On occasion of the punishment of Nadab and Abihu, Moses appoints the mourning of the priests, and forbids them to drink wine while waiting in the temple. Chapter xxix. gives rules for the distinguishing beasts clean and unclean; also relative to the leprosy of men, of houses and of habits; for the purification of men indisposed with gonorrhoea, and of women after child-birth. After this, the ceremonies on the day of solemn expiation are regulated; also the degrees of relation permitted or forbidden in marriage. Then follow prohibitions of alliances with the Canaanites, of idolatry, theft, perjury, calumny, hatred, Gentile superstitions, magic, divination, soothsaying, prostitution and adultery. Chapter xxxii. notices the principal festivals in the year, (including the story of a man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed the sacred Name,) the sabbatical and the jubilee years, and some directions relative to vows and tithes.

This book is generally held to be the work of Moses, though probably assisted by Aaron. It contains the history of the eight days of Aaron and his sons' consecration, A. M. 2514.

LIBANUS, or LEBANON, a long chain of limestone mountains, on the northern border of Palestine. It consists of two principal ridges, the easterly ridge being called Anti-Libanus by the Greeks. The western ridge, or proper Libanus, runs nearly parallel to the coast of the Mediterranean; the eastern, or Anti-Libanus, runs to the east, but soon inclines like a manner to the north. Between these two ridges is a long valley called Canle-Syria, or Hollow Syria, the Valley of Lebanon, (Josh. xi. 17,) at present Bbukah; it opens towards the north. The elevation of Lebanon is so great, that it is always covered in many places with snow; whence in all probability it derives its name. It is composed of four enclosures of mountains, which rise one on the other. The first is very rich in grain and fruits; the second is barren, abounding in thorns, rocks and flints; the third, though higher than this, enjoys a perpetual spring, the trees being always green, and the orchards filled with fruit; it is so agreeable and fertile, that some have called it a terrestrial paradise. The fourth is so high as to be always covered with snow. Mr. Buckingham, who ascended one of the highest parts of Lebanon, states that it occupied him and his companions four hours in reaching it, from the place where the cedars grow. "From hence the view was, as may be easily imagined, grand and magnificent. Towards the prospect of all the side of Lebanon down to the plain at its foot, and, beyond, a boundless sea, the horizon of which could not be defined, from its being covered with a thick bed of clouds. . . . To the east we had the valley of the Bukkah, which we could see from hence was on a much higher level than the sea; the descent to it on the east appearing to be about one third less in depth than the descent to the plain at the foot of Lebanon on the west, and scarcely more than half of that to the line of the sea. The range of Anti-Libanus, which forms the eastern boundary of the Bukkah, was also covered with snow at its summit, but not so thickly as at this part of Libanus where we were, and which seemed to us the highest point of all. We could distinguish that from the northward towards Bahbek, the Jebel-el-want was in an even range, without pointed summits like this, and that from thence there extended two forks to the southward, the eastern, or principal one, ending in the great Jebel-el-Sheik, or Jebel-el-Tell, of the Arabs, the mount Hermon of the Scripture; and the western, or lesser one, in the point which I had passed in valley between them being called the range of Anti-Libanus, though of the same height as that of the eastern part of it; although, as before, that is the highest point of view which they, therefore, must have in view which says this mountain proceeds in a manner to the Ephraimites; the description altogether, both of the cedars, there is reason to believe little but lies over it. (Travels among the Arab Tribes, p. 477.)

D'Arvier, in describing this magnificent region, says, "These are not barren mountains, but almost all well cultivated, and well-peopled. Their summits are in many places level, and form vast plains, where are sown corn (comp. Ps. 33. 15.) and all kinds of puces. They are watered by numerous springs, and rivulets of excellent water, which diffuse on all sides a freshness and fertility, even in the most elevated regions. The soil of their declivities, and of the hollows which occur between them, is excellent, and produces deliciously corn, oil and wine, which is sent to Syria, and is praised it highly in the single word. Drinkers, who esteem themselves judges, make no difference between this wine and that of Cyprus. Their principal riches, at present, is the silk which they produce. They are inhabited by the Greeks, by the Medes, also by Druzes and Mahometans. The Christians here have many privileges, and in some places complete liberty. Though the mountains which compose Lebanon are of this considerable extent, yet the vulgar restrain the name to that district whereon the cedars grow; (see Cedars;) and they give other names to other portions which compose this famous mountain. After travelling six hours in pleasant valleys, and over mountains covered with different species of trees, we entered a small plain on a fertile hill, wholly covered with walnut-trees and olives, in the middle of which is the village of Eden. This village has a bishop. In spite of my weariness, I could not but incessantly admire this beautiful country. It is, truly, an epitome of the terrestrial paradise, of which it bears the name. . . . We quitted Eden about eight o'clock in the morning, and advanced to mountains so extremely high, that we seemed to be travelling in the middle regions of the atmosphere. Here the sky was clear and serene as elsewhere, from this cloud dissolving in rain and watering the plains."

De la Roque, after commending in strong terms the beauty of the valley watered by the Kadiisha, says, "In pursuing our route, and tracing up the source of this agreeable river, our sight was still more gratified. The trees rise higher than before, being for the most part plantains, pines, cypresses, and evergreen oaks, forming a continual assemblage of verdure of different kinds; among which peep out, from time to time, either a chapel or a grotto, always situated on some spot apparently impossible to be attained, and absolutely astonishing to the sight. We passed twice or thrice over the Kadiisha, by means of stone bridges, or of trees laid along to form a passage; we proceeded in this manner two or three leagues, by a very easy and agreeable road, walking almost constantly among groves and covered alleys formed by the band of nature, and too abundant in foliage to be penetrated by the rays of the sun. After quitting the Kadiisha, we continued to find everywhere a wonderful abundance of water, issuing from diverse sources, forming rivulets; and proceeding to unite their waters with those of that river. Canobin, the convent established on Lebanon, is a large irregular building, situated on the declivity of his mountain. Its environs are, nevertheless, very cheerful; the lands adjacent are well cultivated, and adorned with hedges, gardens and vineyards. I would be difficult to find anywhere superior win to that which was offered us: from which I concluded, that the reputation of the wine of Lebanon, as alluded to by the prophet, (Hos. xiv. 7) was extremely well founded. These wines are of two sorts: the most common is the red; the most exquisite is of the color of Vins Mucet, and is called galon, on account of its color."

He mentions his fear, in some of his excursion of meeting with tigers, or with bears, which are great numbers on Lebanon; and come down during the night to drink. He also mentions the finding a quantity of eagles feathers on the mountain, at the cedars.

Lebanon furnishes many rivers and streams. Th first described by De la Roque is the Orontes, which rises in the northern district, and during a course of more than thirty leagues runs almost due north, passing Emesa and Apamea; then turning to the west it passes Antioch and Seleucia; its whole course being about seventy-five leagues. The river Eleutherus also rises in the heights of Lebanon. It falls into the Mediterranean between Orthocas and Tripolis; it is the Nahr Abris, Leper's river; the third is Nah Aezher, red river; and there is a fourth, less considerable, called Almas Alberida, or the Cold water. Following the coast southward, we find the Nah Kadiisha, or Holy river, which receives the stream by which it is greatly enlarged in its passage to the sea. Among others, Ras Ain, Fountain Head, is itself a small stream, but is greatly swelled by the melting of the snows, and furnishes a considerable body of water. The next stream is the Nahr Elsh him, Abraham's river, which discharges itself into two lakes from Jabile; it is the Adonis of the ancients. After this follows the Nahr Kelb, Dog river; the Lycus, or Wolf's river, of antiquity. Abou, a small river, may be viewed from this mountain. The Nahr Ates, so called because it is the nearest stream to the city of Berytus. Between Berytus and Sidon is the Nah Damor, pronounced by Europeans d'Amour, the Janzus of former times: the passage of it is very dangerous. About a league south of Sidon, the river called Arie by the peasants; by the Franks called Fiumiero: its source is perhaps in As- ti-Libanus. About an hour short of Tyre, is the river Kasemiech, which rises in Anti-Libanus and is increased by the waters of the Lezani, which flow along the valley of Bekaa. The Barrady rises in Anti-Libanus, not far from the territory of Damascus, which city it visits; and being divided into streams and canals, contributes to the delightful district, and its environs, this little river, called Barrady, perhaps the Abana of Nephal, 1 Kings v. 28, discharges itself into the Barrady. After having passed Damascus, these streams issue in a large lake and marshes. The course of the Barrady is southerly. The Jordan, too, has its source in Anti-Libanus, in the west, and is called Wadi Naur, which supplies the mount Hermon of the ancients, not far from the celebrated spot which pagan antiquity called Panium, or Panus. See JORDAN.

The following is Volney's account of this celebrated mountain: (Travels, vol. i. p. 293, 301.) "A view of the country will convince us that the most elevated point of all Syria is Lebanon, on the south-east of Tripoli. Scarcely do we depart from Lar- naca, in Cyprus, which is thirty leagues distant, before we discover its summit capped with clouds. This is also distinctly perceivable on the map, from the course of the rivers. The Orontes, which flows from the mountains of Damascus, and loses itself below Antioch; the Kasmia, which, from the north of Baalbec, takes its course towards Tyre; the Jor- dan, forced, by the declivities, towards the south, prove that this is the highest point. Next to Leb- anon, the most elevated part of the country is Mount Akkar, which becomes visible as soon as we leave Maarr in the desert. It appears like an enormous flattened cone, and is constantly in view for two days' journey. No one has yet had an opportunity to ascertain the height of these mountains by the barometer; but we may deduce it from another consideration. In winter their tops are entirely covered with snow, from Alexandretta to Jerusalem; but after the month of March it melts, except on mount Lebanon, where, however, it does not remain the whole year, unless in the highest cavities, and towards the north-east, where it is sheltered from the sea winds, and the rays of the sun. In such a situation I saw it still remaining, in 1784, at the very time I was almost suffocated with heat in the valley of Baalbec. Now, since it is well known that snow, in this latitude, requires an elevation of fifteen or sixteen hundred fathoms, we may conclude that to be the height of Lebanon, and that it is consequently much lower than the Alpes, or even the Pyrenees.

"Lebanon, which gives its name to the whole extensive chain of the kesrouan, and the country of the Druses, presents us every where with majestic mountains. At every step we meet with scenes in which nature displays either beauty or grandeur, sometimes singularity, but always variety. When we land on the coast, the loftiness and steep ascent of this mountainous ridge, which seems to enclose the country, those gigantic masses which shoot into the clouds, almost carcass of which, the curious traveller then climb these summits which bounded his view, the wide-extended space which he discovers becomes a fresh subject of admiration; but completely to enjoy this majestic scene, he must ascend to the top of Mount Lebanon, and see the Sanamoun from there. There, on every side, he will view an horizon without bounds; while, in clear weather, the sight is lost over the desert, which extends to the Persian gulf, and over the sea which bathes the coasts of Europe. He seems to command the whole world, while the wandering eye, now surveying the successive chains of mountains, transports the imagination in an instant from Antioch to Jerusalem.

"If we examine the substance of these mountains, we shall find they consist of a hard calcareous stone, of a whitish color, sonorous like free-stone, and disposed in strata variously inclined. This stone has almost the same appearance in every part of Syria; sometimes it is bare, and looks like the pebbled rocks on the coast of Provence. The same stone, under a more regular form, likewise composes the greater part of Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, the mountains of the Druses, Galilee and mount Carmel, and stretches to the south of the lake Asphaltites. The inhabitants every where build their houses and make lime with it. I have never seen, nor heard it said, that these stones contain any petrified shells in the upper regions of Lebanon; but we find, between Batroun and Djebail, in the Kesrouan, at a little distance from the sea, a quarry of schistous stones, the flakes of which bear the impressions of plants, fish, shells, and especially of the sea onion. Iron is the only mineral which abounds here; the mountains of the Kesrouan, and of the Druses, are full of it. Every summer the inhabitants work these mines which areochorous.

"It appears equally extraordinary and picturesque to a European at Tripoli, to behold under his windows, in the month of January, orange-trees loaded with flowers and fruit, while the hoary head of Lebanon is covered with ice and snow. If in Seida, or Tripoli, we are incarcerated by the heats of July, in six hours we are in the neighboring mountains, in the temperature of March; or, on the other hand, if chilled by the frosts of December at Besbarrai, a day's journey brings us back to the coast, amid the flowers of May. The Arabian poets have therefore said, that 'the Sanamoun bears winter on his head, spring on his shoulders, and autumn in his bosom, while summer lies sleeping at his feet.'

"Mr. Plate describes Lebanon in the following manner: "You would like, perhaps, to know how mount Lebanon looks. It is not, as I used to suppose, one mountain, but a multitude of mountains thrown together, and separated by very deep, narrow valleys, which seem to have been made merely for the sake of dividing the hills. There are more trees on mount Lebanon than on the hills of Judea, yet there is nothing which Americans would call a forest. Most of the trees, where I have been, are either pines or fruit trees. I have not yet seen the cedars. The roads are bad, worse and worst; steep and rocky, I presume, beyond any thing you ever saw in Vermont, or any where else. I generally ride a mule or an ass, and it is often literally riding up and down stairs, for a considerable distance together. These mountains present a variety of the most rude, sublime and romantic scenery." (Missionary Herald for 1894, p. 135.)

"From these descriptions the reader may conceive, not only with minute details, but with all the enthusiasm of discovery, "that godly mountain, even Lebanon." (Deut. iii. 25.) but what a supreme gratification a man who had been all his life habituated to a flat and arid desert, and to a low and level country, must have felt, had he been in the Sanamoun! There, on every side, he would witness hills and murmuring cascades of Lebanon. The renown of these paradises must have stimulated his curiosity, as a man and a naturalist, independent of his wishes as a sovereign and legislator for the welfare and settlement of his people. Almost all travellers who have visited these places have felt and noticed the propriety of the bridegroom's address to the bride, (Cant. iv. 15.) in which he compels her to "a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon;" but they have not observed the climax of this passage, which appears to stand thus, (1.) a fountain, (2.) a source, (3.) numerous and lively streams, communicating refreshment and pleasure, together with fertility.

These descriptions may also contribute to place in a new light a passage of the prophet Jeremiah, (chap. xviii. 14.) which stands thus in our translation: 'Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field; or shall the cold waters that come from another place be furnished?" The whole of this verse no doubt refers to the same object, mount Lebanon, though to different things which are found there; but it may be supposed, for the "cold flowing waters" of the prophet were the Nahal el herb, or Nahal el barada of Maudrell and De la Roque.

The prophet seems to think that no waters could be so refreshing as those which flowed from recently thawing congelation; and to persons who highly value the addition of snow to their beverage, to cool it, nothing could be more refreshing than drinking from streams which trickled down the sides of that mountain, the greatest of the reservoir of snow and ice. The narrations we have inserted show the vigor and energy of these similes.

The reputation attached to the wine of Lebanon, and the character given of it by travellers, render credible the idea that in this wine Damascans treated with Tyro, (Ezek. xxvii. 18,) and that Hellen was in the eastern part of Lebanon. The comparison of the wine of Lebanon to Vin Muscat, by De la Roque, includes, probably, the least as well as the best; and justifies the allusion of the prophet Hosea, xiv. 7.

It is not easy to determine, with certainty, what can be intended by the prophet in the phrase, "the glory of Lebanon," but very likely it refers to the verdure constantly maintained on it, and to the stately trees which cover it; for so we may best explain Isa. xxv. 2, the glory of Lebanon, magnificent cedars, plantains, pines, cypresses, &c. the excellency of Lebanon does, &c. (see Casarea,) and the meadow productions, flowers, shrubs, &c. of Sharon. This agrees perfectly with chap. xix. 13., "the glory of Lebanon—the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box-tree together." Perhaps, by some means, the prophet has noticed the trees growing upon Lebanon, we may ascertain those intended by the prophet. Is it the cedar eminently?

The discovery of eagles' feathers in great quantity by De la Roque, where they must have been dropped by the birds themselves, serves to justify this side of the prophet Ezekiel, (chap. xvii. 4,) of "a great eagle, with long wings, visiting Lebanon, and plucking off a branch from among the young twigs," &c. (meaning Nebuchadnezzar, who destroyed the temple, and carried away its treasures.) It shows the nature was considered in this particular of the parable.

The bears which frightened De la Roque, and the lions, which he says came down to the marshes of Jordan to drink, may point out the quarter that furnished those insatiable animals which destroyed the new settlers in the land of Israel, (2 Kings xxv. 25, 26.) as the country is the same; and it is likely that, during the interval of population, these wild animals should have roamed over a greater tract of country than usual; out of which they were not easily expelled. It is likely, too, that when the prophet threatened that the king of Babylon shall come "as a lion from the swelling of Jordan," (Jer. xlix. 19: 1. 44.) he may not so much allude to the stream of Jordan, where it runs in a considerable body, between its banks, as probably lions are rarely seen so low, but to the marshes of Jordan, to which De la Roque says they come down from the neighboring mountains; which marshes being at some times dry, and at other times overflowed, annually, may justly be described as the swellings of Jordan. (Comp. Zech. xi. 3.) The same place may also be intended under this description: (Jer. xii. 5.) "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have with horses? And if in the land of peace (solid land), firm footing thou hast been wearied, how wilt thou do in the mountain of Lebanon? in the swelling of the mountains of Jordan?"—such resembling, probably, the bogs or moors, the voids, the marshes, as swellings of the mountains.

Liturgy, which such others as we may suppose inhale or pant, the various branches of this mountain, may furnish the true view of Lebanon shall cover thee; even the terrors of wild beasts; to which the mountain affords shelter and cover.

Thus Solomon's palace is called the "house of the forest of Lebanon;" it was supported, probably, by pillars of cedar, as numerous as trees in a forest. When we read "The fruit thereof shall be shaken," we, the simile so, not the mouth of Jerusalem doth open, (John xxi. 13.) but as the majestic cedar furthers, (xi. 1.) speaks of the temple of the Chanana, says Zechariah of the destruction of the temple by the Romans.

Towns of Libanus.—Solomon (Cant. v. 4.), compares his spouse's nose to the tower of Lebanon, which looked towards Damascus. Travellers spoke of a tower built on Libanus on Damascus near Libanus, which seems to have been very high. Beside of Tudele assures us, that the stones of this tower, the remains of which he had seen, were two (two thousand) and twelve. Gellius Saec. x. says that it was a hundred cubits high, and fifty broad.

Libation, a word used in sacrificial language to express an affusion of liquor, poured upon vessels to be sacrificed to the Lord. The quantity of wine for a libation is a part of a heifer, rather more than two pints. Among the Hebrew libations were poured on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of it laid on the slain ready to be consumed by the flames. Lev. vi. 25, 26.; ix. 14.; xi. 19, 20.; xiii. 10. They consisted in offerings of bread, wine and salt. Fe describes himself, says Calmet, as a victim about to be sacrificed, the accustomed libations of meal and wine being already, in a manner, poured upon him (2 Kings iii. 14, 15.) and offered for his purification. It shows the nature was considered in this particular of the parable.

It is probable that the apostle refers to the manner of pouring the blood of the victims, at the foot of the altar which was the ceremony prescribed in the Hebraic ritual, rather than libation, the blood poured upon the victim, as practised by the heathens.—Eve's αὐτήν, 'For I am now pouring out, or going to pour out, as a libation. The same expressive as a libation. The same sacrificial term occurs in Phil. ii. 17, where the apostle represents the faith of the Philippians as a sacrifice, and his own blood as a libation poured out for the liberty of the children of God, and consecrate it;—Ἀλλ' οὖσα καὶ αὐτήσις εἰς τὸ δύσος καὶ ιστορία τῆς πίστεως τῶν ἐνώρων, καὶ συν καὶ μύχος πάντως γι' αὐτήν τ' ἡ στήρεσις καὶ τοπερήσις τ' δυναμικά, τῆς σωτηρίας καὶ τῆς ευδοκίας τῆς ἀποστολῆς. The strength and beauty of the passage cannot be comprehended from a translation.

Libertines, Synagogue of, Acts vii. 9. The Synagogue of the Libertines obviously stands connected with the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, both of which were of African origin; it is, therefore, not improbable that the Libertines were also of African origin; and without assenting to the entire history of the liberation of the Jewish captives in Egypt, by Peter Philadelphia, in its utmost extent, as to their now bers, it is credible, that there may be sufficient truth in it, to justify our believing that many Jews and Jewish families did obtain their liberty, by the munificence of that prince; the descendants of which freedom remains to this day, would be known under an appellation answering to the Latin, libertini. Moreover, their residence would naturally connect them with their fellow Africans, the Cyreniaca and Alexandriana. They are evidently separated, by the construction of the language, from "those of Cilicia, and of Asia:" and if Luke were of Cyrene, as is thought, we see the reason why this conduct of his compatriots excited his particular observation. It has been thought by some writers that they were a nation of servants. That there was slave Traffic, in Africa called Libertini, or some such name, is certain; for in the council of Carthage (c. 116.) two persons assumed the title of Episcopis Ecclésiae Libertinensis. (See Kinoel on Act. vi. 9.)

LIBERTY, as opposed to servitude and slavery, denotes the condition of a man, who may act independently of the will of another. There is frequent mention of this liberty in Scripture. The Jews valued themselves highly on their liberty; and they even boasted, in our Saviour's time, that they had never been deprived of it, John viii. 33. This from them was ridiculous; since we know that they were often subject to foreign powers, under the judges, and afterwards to the kings of Asaiah, Chaldea, and Persia. They waxed at this very time, also, subject to the Romans. It is however true, that the Israelites, according to the intention of Moses, were never to be reduced entirely to a state of bondage. They might be bound, or fall into servitude among their brethren; but always had a power of redeeming themselves, or procuring themselves to be redeemed by their relations, or of being liberated in the sabbatical year, or in the jubilee year. Probably, on this account this passage has ever been perverted to reduce to slavery. Paul speaks of the liberty of the gospel, in opposition to the servitude of the law: "We are not the children of the bond-woman, but of the free," (Gal. iv. 31.) i.e. we are not derived from Hagar, who was to descendents are slaves, but we are sons of Sarah the free-woman; we enjoy the liberty of God's children, by virtue of the adoption procured for us by Jesus Christ; which liberty delivers us from the yoke of legal ceremonies, from the obligation of observing purifications and distinctions of meats, and many other practices, to which the Jews were subjected; Rom. viii. 21; 1 Cor. x. 23; 2 Cor. iii. 17; Gal. ii. 4, 5; James i. 25; ii. 12.

"Liberty to righteousness," in opposition to the bondage of sin, is part of the justification which Christ has procured for us; which we acquire by faith in him, and preserve by a holy life, and the practice of Christian virtues; or it is one effect of justification by Christ. (Comp. Rom. vi. 20. Gr. and Eng. marg.)

LIBERTY and FREE-WILL, in opposition to constraint and necessity. Man is at liberty to do good or evil; (Eccles. xv. 14, &c.) there is, however, a great difference between our liberty of doing good and of doing evil. We have in ourselves the unhappy liberty of doing evil; we are prompted to it by our concupiscence, which indeed we ought always to resist, yet shall not really and effectually resist, without the assistance of God's grace; whereas, to do good, though we have the liberty of doing it, yet not so as we should without the help of grace, which, without violating our liberty, incites us agreeably, gently, (neverthless, efficaciously,) to prefer what is pleasing to God before what is desired by self-love and concupiscence.

Manasseh Ben Israel, a famous rabbi, says we stand in need of the concurrence of Providence in all virtuous actions; and as a man, who is going to take a heavy burden on his shoulders, calls somebody to help him up with it, so the just man first endeavors to fulfil the law, while God, like the arm of another person, comes to his assistance, that he may be able to execute his resolution. This seems to be exactly the idea of the apostle in Rom. viii. 26, which he expresses by the word συνυπηρετηθας, which Doddridge renders "lendeth us his helping hand," and which many Greeks signify "I bear together with another," by taking hold of the thing borne on the opposite side, as persons do who assist one another in carrying heavy loads. Ambrose, very properly, refers this to the weakness of our prayers (and of our minds too) without such aid.

But we ought to acknowledge that very important part of "preventing grace," which so arranges circumstances as to diminish, or to disappoint, opportunities of doing evil. The Scriptures mention not one thing in life that more strongly and more intelligibly calls for gratitude, than those preservations from evil, those preventions of bad consequences, those counteractions of perverse bias, of which every one must be conscious, and none more conscious than the most virtuous. (Comp. David, 1 Sam. xxv. 32, sq.)

I. LIBNAH, a city in the south of Judah, (Josh. xv. 42.) given to the priests, and declared a city of refuge, 1 Chron. vi. 54, 57. Eusebius and Jerome say, it was in the district of Eleutheropolis.

II. LIBNAH, a station of the Israelites in the desert, Num. xxxiii. 20. See EXODUS, p. 420. LIBNATH, or, fully, SHIHOR-LIBNATH, a stream near Carmel, near the sea, or the Red Sea, according to Michælinis, fluvius viter, the glass river, i.e. the Belus, from whose sands glass was first made, Josh. xix. 36. R.

LIBYA, a province of Egypt, which is thought to have been peopled by the descendants of Leukibim, son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. It reached from Alexandria to Cyrene, and perhaps farther. In Nah. iii. 9, Lubim is rendered Libya, because of its connection with Phut, which implies Africa; and probably, that part of Africa near and around Carthage, rather than Nubia. Josephus says, "Phut was the conducer of Libya, whose settlements were from him called Phutaei. It is beyond the river in the region of Mauritania. By this name it is well known in the Grecian histories; adjacent to the region which the Hebrews call Phut." We read of the Lubim in 2 Chron. iii. 3; xvi. 8; Nah. iii. 9; Dan. xi. 43. Sometimes all Africa is called Libya; but we believe it does not occur in this sense in Scripture.

LIFE, see GRAT.

LIFE, FUTURE, ETERNAL LIFE, or simply LIFE, signifies the state of the righteous after death, Matt. vii. 14; xix. 16, 17. Jesus Christ is sometimes called the Life, John xiv. 6; xi. 25. So, "in him was life; and the life was the light of men. John 1 v. 12." He is the life of the soul; he enlightens it, fills it with graces, and leads it to eternal life. He is himself the life of it, its sustenance, light and happiness.

In the Old Testament, God promises to those who observe his laws, long life and temporal prosperity; which were the figure and shadow of eternal life, and of those future blessings expressed more clearly in the New Testament. The carnal Jews confined their hopes to these transitory blessings; but the heathen, pagans, and most enlightened Hebrews, carried their views and expectations further. Moses says (Deut. xxx. 15, 18, 20), "See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil." Abraham, or a knowledge of truths relating to salvation, is called "the way of life," "the truth of life," "the fountain of life," or "life," simply. As life is the first of blessings belonging to the body, so wisdom is the supreme happiness of the soul; it promotes our well-being in this world, and is the source of felicity to eternity. The principal wisdom, the most serious study, of the Hebrews consisted in the knowledge of their law; and hence the Holy Spirit terms the law, as well as wisdom, life, and the source of life; and perhaps also because they both produce the same effects for time and for eternity.

Life is sometimes used for subsistence; thus it is said in Mark xii. 44, that a poor widow, who put two very small pieces of silver into the treasury of the temple, gave more than any of the rest, because it was all she had, even all her living, or life.

We find an expression in Deut. xxviii. 66, and in Job xxiv. 22, which requires explanation: "Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life." Some of the fathers understood this of Christ, crucified in the sight of the unbelieving Jews, who rejected the belief of that Saviour who was their life and salvation, but the meaning is more likely to be, "Ye shall be under perpetual fear and meanness, and shall have no assurance of your own lives." The words of Job must be interpreted in the same sense; "He riseth up, and no man is sure of his life." When the wicked man appears most resolute, he shall not be assured of his life; or, according to the Hebrew, when he riseth in the midst of his guards, he shall not be sure of his life.

LIFE; To LIVE. These words, as well as death, and to die, are equivocal, and are understood properly for the life of the body; figuratively, for the life of the soul; for the life of faith, grace and holiness; for temporal life and life eternal. A living soul signifies a living animal, a living person, "my soul shall live because of thee?" (Gen. xvi. 13) my life will be preserved in consideration of thee. "No man shall see thee any more" (Exod. xxxiii. 20) that is, no man can be able to sustain the splendor of my majesty, if he behold by his bodily eye. Jehovah was called the living God, in opposition to the gods of the Gentiles, who were but dead men, stars or animals, whose lives are transitory; whereas Jehovah is living, immortal, and the Author of life to every thing; in him we live; from him we derive motion and existence. Acts xvi. 28.

The "just man lives by faith," Rom. i. 17. Faith gives life to the soul, but it must be attained by charity, and accompanied with works, Gal. v. 6. James ii. 20. Even they who are dead in sin rise again, and lead a new life, when they believe in Christ, and put on Christ; and they who have a lively and entire faith never die, or rather after death enjoy eternal life, John xi. 25, 26. The letter kills, but the Spirit makes alive, 2 Cor. iii. 6. The law cannot make alive; (Gal. iii. 21) it cannot communicate righteousness, without gospel faith and charity.

In a figurative sense, "to give life" is used for delivering from great danger. The captives in Babylonia often ask of God, in the Psalms, to restore to life, to deliver them from a state of death, of prostration, of trouble, under which they groan. Some have supposed that the phrase is taken of the lifting up of一只手 by the Jews in their prayers, for the sake of the deliverance of those who were in captivity in Babylonia. (Jer. x. 6.) Lifting up the hands is, among the ancients, a common part of the ceremony of taking oath: "I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, and unto Ahiram, Gen. xiv. 22. And, "I will b you into the land concerning which I lift up hand," (Exod. vi. 8.) which I promised with oath.

To lift up one's hand against any one, is to attack him, to fight him, 2 Sam. xviii. 28; 1 Kings xi. 26.

To lift up one's face in the presence of any one is to appear boldly in his presence, 2 Sam. ii. 19; Ezra ix. 6. (See also Job x. 13; xi. 13.)

To lift up one's hands, eyes, soul or heart unto the Lord, are expressions describing the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly desires a thing with arder.

Light, a subtle fluid, which creates in us a sensation of colors, and enables us to discern superincumbent objects.

"Light" is often put figuratively for prosperous night for adversity: "The light shall shine in thine ways? i.e. God shall favor thy conduct. "I will lift up mine eye to the light of thy countenance, i.e. thou hast granted us thy favor.

The light of the living literally signifies life, great prosperity; but in a moral and spiritual sense, it signifies the felicity of eternal life: as misery of the wicked is described by the darkening of the voice, Ps. lxi. 13; cxix. 12; cxvii. 3, and xxxii. 30. God is said "the Father of light" (James i. 17.) the Author of all graces; and Christ is called "the Light of the world," (Ex. xii. 19) to enlighten the Gentiles; the Light of righteousness; the Light of life; John vii. 14; 8; (Comp. Is. 1.) the Apostles are the light of the world, v. 14) by showing forth the doctrines and grace of their divine Master.

LIGN-ALOES, see Aloes I.

Lift-up, to lift up, or shobab, so called, perhaps by reason of the number of its leaves, which are in Hob. on, or onob. There are lilies of different colors, white, red, yellow and orange-colored. They were common in Judea, and grew in the open fields. They do not resemble the lilies of the field, says Chrys. (Cant. vi. 22) how they grow, they tell not, neither do they spin: yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Luke 27. Father Socinian affirms, that the lily mentions in Scripture, is the crown imperial, that is, the sun lily, the tusia of the Persians, the royal lily, lilium bastetrum, of the Greeks. In reality it appears from the Canticles, that the lily spoken of by Solomon was red, and distilled a certain liquor, Cant. xii. 13. The very learned Celsius, however, supposes to be the white lily, which the Arabs call sancira has a great resemblance to this plant,namen, while whiteness surpasses lilies, and the most perfect smell is producible by the art of dyeing. White dyes were formerly reserved for the masters of the scissors. May we hence conclude, says Forskal, this, as well as the purple, was an appendage to royalty? There are crown immortals with yellow fl.
ers; but those with red are the most common. They are always bent downwards, and disposed in the manner of a crown at the extremity of the stem, which has a tuft of leaves at the top. At the bottom of each leaf of this flower is a certain watery humor, forming, as it were, a very white pearl, which gradually distils very clear and pure drops of water. This water is probably what the spouse in the Canticles called myrrh. Judith speaks of an ornament belonging to the women, which was called lily, Jud. x. 3. What these lilies were, we cannot tell. In the judgment of Grotius, they might be something which hung about the neck. Perhaps lilia may be a fault of the copist, who, instead of monilia, bracelets, which he did not understand, inserted lilia. The Greek says pelia, and the Syriac the same, i.e. chains, necklaces or bracelets.

LINE. To stretch a line over a city, is to destroy it, Zech. i. 16; Jer. ii. 8.

LINEN, χαλκ, bad, the produce of a well-known plant, flax, whose bark, being prepared, serves to make fine and much esteemed linen clothes. Another sort of linen Scripture calls ψηλή, sheesh; (Gen. xlii. 42) [and at a later period χαλκ, Greek βους, byssus, 1 Chron. xvi. 27; Esth. i. 6, et al. This, however, is strictly the fine Egyptian cotton, and the white cloth made from it. This cloth, so celebrated in ancient times, is still found wrapped around mummies; and appears to have been about of the texture and quality of the ordinary cotton sheeting of the present day. Both these Hebrew words signify originally white. R. H. LINUS, a Christian mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. iv. 21) and whom Irenæus, Eusebius, Opattus, Epiphanius, Augustin, Jerome and Theodoret affirm to have succeeded Peter as bishop of Rome. It was not possible that Calmet could have access to the Welch Triads, which only within these few years have appeared in English. Mr. Taylor thinks there is little hazard in taking Linus for the British Cyllinus, brother of Claudia. [The only ground for this conjecture seems to be that each of these names contains the three letters lin. R.] Ifso, it agrees with the history that Christianity had made converts in the family of Brennus, king of Britain, and Caractacus, his son, then prisoners at Rome; and the first (Gentile) bishop of Rome was a Briton. See CHASTITY.

LION, a well known and noble beast, frequently spoken of in Scripture. It was common in Palestine, and the Hebrews have seven words to signify the lion in different ages, (1.) כור, gur, or gor, a young lion, a whelp. (2.) קֵפֵר, kephir, a young lion. (3.) לִבְיָא, libya, a young lion. (4.) שָׂחָד, a lion in the full strength of his age. (5.) שַׁבָּת, shabath, a vigorous lion. (6.) לֵבָא, libba, an old lion. (7.) לֵאָש, laish, a decrepit lion, worn out with age. But these distinctions are not always used in speaking of the lion.

The lion of the tribe of Judah " (Rev. v. 5) is Jesus Christ, who sprang from the tribe of Judah, and the race of David, and overcame death, the world and the devil. It is supposed by some, that a lion was the device of the tribe of Judah: whence this allusion. (Comp. Gen. xlix. 9.)

The lion “from the swelling of Jordan,” (Jer. i. 44.) is, figuratively, Nebuchadnezzar marching like a lion against Judah. He is compared to a lion by reason of his strength and fierceness: to a lion driven by the rising waters from the neighborhood of Jordan, where he had lain amidst the thickets which cover the banks of that river. (See JORDAN.) A lion which in his anger falls with fury on every thing he meets in the fields.

Samson, on his way to Timnah, having torn a young lion to pieces with his hands, (Judg. xiv.) found, as he afterwards passed by that way, that bees had made their honey in the skeleton, which was then dried up. This furnished him with a rich prize which he proposed to the young men his companions at his wedding: “the devourer furnished meat, and the strong yielded sweetness.” See SAMSON.

David boseus, that he had killed a lion and a bear, (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35.) and Ecclesiastical says, (xliii. 3.) that he played with bears and lions, as he would do with lambs.

Isaiah, (xi. 6.) describing the happy time of the Messiah, says, “The calf, the young lion and the fatling shall lie down together, and a little child shall lead them;” and that “the lion shall eat straw like the ox;” signifying the peace and happiness of the church of Christ.

The roaring of the lion is terrible, (Amos iii. 8.) and therefore it is said, “The king’s wrath is as the roaring of a lion;” whose provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul;” (Prov. xix. 12; xx. 2.) i.e. he seeketh his own death.

LIP, in Hebrew, is sometimes used for the bank of a river, for the bank of the sea, the vessel or ship, (Isa. iii. 8; 2 Chron. iv. 2.) It also signifies language, Gen. xi. 1; Exod. vi. 12, &c. “We will render the calves of our lips,” says Hoses; (xiv. 2) that is, sacrifices of praise, instead of bloody victims. “I do not send thee,” says the Lord to Ezekiel, (iii. 5.) “to a people deep of lip,” of an unknown language.

LIZARD. Several species of lizards are well known. There are some in Arabia, a cubit in length; but in the Indies there are some much longer. They are still sometimes eaten, as they probably were in Arabia and Judea, since Moses forbids them as food. We find several sorts of lizards mentioned in Scripture; נא, lelah; הָכֹת, homet; נֶדֶל, tinamethem; (Lev. xi. 30.) and נֶדֶל, shamamoth. The third is translated mole; but Bochart maintains that it is the chameleon (which is a kind of lizard).

LOAVES, see BREAD.

LOCUST, a voracious insect, belonging to the grasshopper or Grylli genus, and a great scourge in oriental countries.

Moses declares all creatures that fly and walk on four feet to be impure, but he excepts those which, having their hind feet longer than the others, skip, and do not crawl upon the earth. Afterwards (Lev. xi. 22.) he describes four sorts of locusts, or, it may be, the same sort in different stages. They are (1.) סָלַם, salam, a green locust; (2.) קְרָגֵל, kargel, and זֵב, zagab; which Jerome translates bruchus, attacca, ophiomuscos, and locusta.

On many occasions the locust has been employed by the Almighty for chastising his guilty creatures. A swarm of locusts were among the plagues of Egypt, when they covered the whole land, so that the earth was darkened; and they devoured every green herb of the earth, and the fruit of every tree which the hail had left, Exod. x. 15. But the most particular description of this insect, and of its destructive career, mentioned in the sacred writings, is to be found in Joel ii. 3—10. This is, perhaps, one of the most striking and animated descriptions to be met with in the whole compass of prophecy. The contexture of the passage is extremely curious; and the double destruction to be produced by locusts, and the enemies of which they were the harbingers, is painted with the most expressive force, and described with the Most terrible accuracy. We may fancy the destroying army to be moving before us while we read, and imagine that we see the desolation spreading. The following extracts may furnish a commentary upon this and other passages in the Holy Scriptures:

"I never observed the mantes (a kind of locusts) to be gregarious, but the locusts, properly so called, which are so frequently mentioned by sacred as well as profane authors, are sometimes so beyond expression. Those which I saw, anno 1724 and 1725, were much bigger than our common grasshoppers, and had brown spotted wings, with legs and bodies of a bright yellow. Their first appearance was towards the latter end of March, the wind having been some time from the south. In the middle of April their numbers were so vastly increased, that in the heat of the day they formed themselves into large and numerous swarms, flew in the air like a succession of clouds, and as the prophet Joel expresses it, they darkened the sun. When the wind blew briskly, so that these swarms were crowded by others, or thrown one upon another, we had a lively idea of that comparison of the psalmist, (Ps. cix. 23.) of being tossed up and down as the locust. In the month of May, when the ovaries of these insects were ripe and turgid, each of these swarms began gradually to disappear, and retired into the Metjibal, and other adjacent plains, where they deposited their eggs. These were no sooner hatched in June, than each of the broods collected itself into a compact body of a furlong or more in square, and marching afterwards directly forward towards the sea, they let nothing escape them; eating up everything that was green and juicy, not only the lesser kinds of vegetables, but the vine likewise, the fig-tree, the pomegranate, the palm, and the apple-tree, even all the trees of the field. (Joel ii. 12.) in doing which, they kept their ranks like men of war, climbing over, as they advanced, every tree or wall that was in their way; nay, they entered into our very houses and bed-chambers like thieves. The inhabitants, to stop their progress, made a variety of pits and trenches all over their fields and gardens, which they filled with water; or else they heaped up therein heath, stubble, and such like combustible matter, which were severally set on fire upon the approach of the locusts. But this was all to no purpose, for the vents towards the sea were quickly filled up, and the fire extinguished by infinite swarms succeeding one another, whilst the front was regardless of danger, and the rear pressed on so close, that a retreat was altogether impossible. A day or two after, one of the swarms was in motion, and I was hatched to march and glean after them, graving off the very bark, and the young branches of such trees, as had before escaped with the loss only of their fruit and foliage. So justly have they been compared by the prophet to a great army, who further observes, that the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness." (Shaw's Travels, p. 157, 4to.)

Colonel Needham, who had lived some time in Teneriffe, informed sir Hans Sloane, that in 1640 locusts destroyed all the product of that island. They saw them come off from the coast of Barbary, the wind being a Levant from thence. They flew as far as they could; then one alighted in the sea, and another upon that, so that one after another they made a heap as large as the greatest ship above water, and were thought to be almost as many under. Those above water, on the next day, after the sun's refreshing them, took flight again, and came in clouds to the island, from whence they had perceived them in the air, and had gathered all the soldiers of the island and of Lagunes together, being 7000 or 8000 men, who, laying aside their arms, some took bags, some spades, and having notice by their scouts from the hills where they alighted, they went forward, made trenches, and brought their bags full, and covered them with mould. This, however, did not do, for some of the locusts escaped, or, being cast on the shore, were revived by the sun, and flew about and destroyed all the vineyards and trees. They ate the leaves and even the bark of the vines where they alighted. But all would not do; the locusts remained there for four months; cattle ate them and died, and so did several men; and others struck out in blotsches. The other Canary islands were so troubled also, that they were forced to bury their provisions. "I cannot better represent their flight to you," says Beaufort, "than by comparing it to the flakes of snow in cloudy weather, driven about by the wind; and when they alight upon the ground to feed, the plains are all covered, and they make a murmuring noise as they eat, and in less than two hours they devour all close to the ground; then rising, they suffer themselves to be carried away by the wind; and when they fly, though the sun shines ever so bright, it is no lighter than when most clouded. The first day was so full of them, that I could not eat in my chamber without a candle; (Joel ii. 10.) all the houses being full of them, even the stables, barns, chambers, garrets, and cellars, ver. 9. I caused cannon-power and sulphur to be burnt, but nothing to expel them, but I found no purpose; for when the door was opened an infinite number came in, and the others went out, fluttering about; and it was a troublesome thing, when a man went abroad, to be hit on the face by those creatures, sometimes on the nose, sometimes on the eyes, and sometimes on the cheeks, so that there was no opening one's mouth but some would get in. Yet all this was nothing for when we were to eat, those creatures gave us no respite; and when we cut a bit of meat, we cut a locust with it; and when a man opened his mouth to put in a morsel, he was sure to chew one of them. I have seen them at night, when they sit to rest them, that the roads were four inches thick of them, one upon another; so that the horses would not touch them, but turned aside, and the drivers much lashing, pricking up their ears, snorting and trembling fearfully. The wheels of our carts and the feet of our horses bruising those creatures, there came from them such a stink, as not only offended the noses, but those were almost out on that stench, but was forced to wash my nose with vinegar, and hold a handkerchief dipped in it continually at my nostrils. The swine feast upon them as a dainty, and grow fat; but nobody will eat of them so fattened, only because they abhor that sort of vermin that does them so much harm." (Gent's Mag. 1748.)

Mr. Moring says, "On the 11th of June, while seated in our tents about noon, we heard a very unusual noise, that sounded like the rustling of a great wind at a distance. On looking up we perceived an immense cloud, here and there semi-transparent, in other parts quite black, that spread itself all over the sky, and at intervals shadowed the sun. These we soon found to be locusts, whole swarms of them falling about us ... These were of a red color, and I should suppose are the red predatory locusts, one of the Egyptian plagues; they are also the 'great grasshopper,' mentioned by the prophet Nahum; no doubt in contradistinction to the lesser, chap. iii. 17. As soon as they appeared, the gardeners and husbandmen made loud shouts, to prevent their settling on their grounds. It is to this custom that the prophet Jeremiah, perhaps, alludes, when he says, 'Surely I will fill thee with men, as with caterpillars, and they shall lift up a shout against thee,' chap. ii. 14. They seemed to be impelled by one common instinct, and moved in one body, which had the appearance of being organized by a leader, Joel ii. 7. Their strength must be very great, if we consider what immense journeys they have been known to make."

(Second Journey, p. 20.)

[In order to afford the fullest information respecting these insects, which constitute so terrible a scourge in oriental countries, the following extracts from Niebuhr and Burckhardt are here subjoined. Each of these travellers relates only what he himself saw.]

Niebuhr thus gives the sum of all the information which he had collected respecting the locusts: (Descr. of Arabia, p. 188, Germ. ed.) "Locusts are very frequent in the East; but still, not so much so, perhaps, as is generally supposed in Europe. The first great flight of locusts that we saw was at Cairo, about the end of December, 1761; and on the 9th of January, 1762, there was another; in the same city, still more terrible, which came with the south-west wind, and consequently from over the Libyan desert. Of these last great numbers fell upon the roofs of the houses and in the streets, perhaps from being fatigued with their long journey. After this I saw no locusts in any great numbers until after our arrival in Djidda. An immense swarm of them arrived at this place in the night between the 10th and 11th of November, 1762, brought by a west wind, and consequently from across the Arabian gulf, which is here very broad. Very many of them had found their graves in the water. On the 17th of the same month, another flight of them arrived at Djidda, but not so large as the former. In May, as the dates began to ripen in Téhama, there came several times to Mocha immense swarms, from the west or south; consequently across the Red sea. They commonly the next day either turned back, or continued their journey eastwards to the mountainous parts of the country. The sea at Mocha, as is well known, is not very boundless and regular, and near Tel el Hana, on the way between Mousul and Nissebin, was entirely covered with young locusts, not yet much larger than a common fly. Their wings were as yet scarcely to be seen; and of the hinder legs they seemed to have only the upper half. These locusts are said to acquire their full size with astonishing rapidity. Had there been in this country a good police, it would have been easy to have destroyed here multitudes of these insects, in their birth, as it were; and thus probably have prevented much damage. A heavy rain would probably also have been fatal to these young insects; and, wherever I have seen locusts, there had been no rain for some time; and whenever rainy weather appeared, they departed."

"Except in the countries above mentioned, I have seen no locusts, at least, not in such numbers as to think it worth while to note them. The locust of these swarms is the same that the Arabs eat; and also, as I remember to have heard from Forakal, the same which has been seen in Germany."

Burckhardt first fell in with locusts in the Haouran, not far from Bozra: (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 238.) "It was at Naeme that I saw, for the first time, a swarm of locusts: they so completely covered the surface of the ground, that my horse killed numbers of them at every step; whilst I had the greatest difficulty in keeping from my face those that rose up and flew about. This species is called, in Syria, the Bjerd Nedjydat, or flying locusts, being thus distinguished from the other species, called Bjerd Deshaaf, or devouring locusts. The former have a yellow body, a gray breast, and wings of a dirty white, with gray spots. The latter, I was told, have a whitish gray body, and white wings. The Nedjydat are much less dreaded than the other, and lay upon the leaves of trees and vegetables, sparing the wheat and barley. The Deshaaf, on the contrary, devour whatever vegetation they meet with, and are the terror of the husbandmen; the Nedjydat attack only the produce of the gardener, or the wild herbs of the desert. I was told, however, that the offspring of the Nedjydat, produced in Syria, partake of the voracity of the Deshaaf, and like them prey upon the crops of grain."

"The natural enemy of the locust is the bird Semmar, which is of the size of a swallow, and devours vast numbers of them. It is even said that the locusts take flight at the cry of this bird. But if the whole feathered tribe of the districts visited by locusts were to unite their efforts, it would avail little, so immense are the numbers of these dreadful insects."

In Southern Africa, the plague of locusts would seem to be not much less than in Asia. The following is an extract from a newspaper published at Cape Town, July 30, 1831: "About a month ago an innumerable swarm of locusts made their appearance on the place of Mr. de Weal, Field Cornet, Cold Bokkeveld: the swarm covers more than a mile square, when they settle on the grass or among the bushes. An attempt was made to destroy them, by setting fire to the bushes in the morning, before they began to fly; but although millions have been destroyed in this manner, their number appears nothing decreased. Towards the afternoon, if the weather be warm, they are driven with the wind. They do not rise high, but their thickness is such as to darken the place over which they fly; they come round and cover the house and offices, and also the garden. When they arrive, they eat the place bare in a short space of time; there is, however, none sufficient to satisfy this immense multitude, without any loss being felt. A cloud of them passed within a few yards of my window yesterday afternoon, in a train of many millions thick, and about an hour in length; they were so near that I could catch them without going out: they were eagerly attacked by the turkeys and other poultry, which appeased to feed deliciously upon them. They have not as yet done any harm to the crops, they are, indeed, a blessing, and the grass more enticing. In their flight, myriads remain on the ground, which are devoured by the crows, black-birds, &c. The fear is, that the eggs or spawn which they leave, may produce equal, if not more, at some future period, which may then be destructive to the crops, after the grass begins to dry and waste. In cold, rainy weather they remain still; it is only when it is fine and warm that they move." R.

Even England has been alarmed by the appear-Locusts, a considerable number having visited that country in 1748, but they happily perished without propagating. They have frequently entered Italy and Spain, from Africa. In the year 591, an immense army of them ravaged a considerable part of the former country, and it is said that nearly a million of men and beasts were carried off by a pestilence occasioned by their stench.

Such is the general history of the locust-swarms, and their devastations: the following more particular account of the manners of this insect and its noxious quality is translated from Roxier’s Journal de Physique, Nov. 1786, p. 321, &c. It was furnished by M. Baron, Conseiller en la Cour des Comptes, &c. at Montpellier:

"These insects seek each other the moment they are able to use their wings: after their union, the female lays her eggs in a hole which she makes in the earth; and for this purpose she seeks light sandy earth, avoiding moist, compact and cultivated grounds. A Spanish author says, 'Should even a man to a locust fall on a cultivated land, the length of one of them may be expected to lay her eggs in it; but if there be in this space a piece of earth not cultivated, though it be very small, thither they will all resort for that purpose.' The sense of smelling is supposed to direct to this present. The eggs lie all the winter, till the warmth of spring calls them into life. They appear at first in the form of worms, not larger than a flea, at first whitish, then blackish, at length reddish. They undergo several other changes: according to the heat of the season, or the condition of the earth, they appear at different times. 1 have seen," says the Spanish writer already referred to, "at Almiera millions creep forth, in the month of February, because this spot is remarkably forward in its productions. In Sierra Nevada they quit the nest in April; and I have observed that in La Mancha they were not all vivified at the beginning of May." Heat also promotes their numbers; for, if the heat be sufficient, every egg is hatched; not so if cold weather prevails. Dryness favors the production of locusts; for, as this insect deposits its eggs in the ground, enclosed in a bag, and this bag is smeared with a frothy white mucous, if the season be wet, this mucous becomes rotten, the ground moistens the eggs, and the whole brood perishes. Eight or ten days' rain, at the proper season, is a certain deliverance from the broods committed to the earth.

There is no doubt on the changes to which the locust is subject. The same animal which appears at first in the form of a worm, passes afterwards into the state of a nymph; and undergoes a third metamorphosis by quitting its skin, and becoming a perfect animal, capable of continuing its species. A locust remains in its nymphal state 24 or 25 days, more or less, according to the season: when, having acquired its full growth, it remains some days from eating; and, gradually bursting its skin, comes forth a new animal, full of life and vigor. These insects leap to a height of two hundred times the length of their bodies; by means of those powerful legs and thighs, which are articulated near the centre of the body. When raised to a certain height in the air, they spread their wings, and are so closely embodied together as to prevent light from entering, or intercepting the rays of the sun, almost by a total eclipse.

"In the south of France, besides the laborers of men to discover the eggs of the locust, about September and October, or in the month of March, they turn troops of hogs into the grounds that are suspected of concealing their nests, and these animals, by turning up the earth with their snouts, in search of a & which they are fond of, clear away vast quantities. In Languedoc they dig pits, into which they throw them:—great care is necessary in destroying the that they are not hurtful after they are dead. Infection spread by their corrupting odors could not be supported. Surius and Cornelius Gemma, b mentioning a prodigious incursion of locusts in 15 report, that after their death, they infected the with such a stench, that the ravens, crows, and of birds of prey, though hungry, yet would not come near their carcasses. We have ourselves experi enced two years ago the truth of this fact; the where they had been buried, after twenty-four hours could not be passed."

Upon this information Mr. Taylor submits the following remarks:

1. Heat and dryness are favorable to the hatching of locusts. We think, therefore, that when threats bring to bear a plague of locusts over Israel in Joel (chap. ii.) it may imply also a summer drought. So we read, chap. i. verse 20: "The fire of water are dried up; the fire hath devoured pastures of the wilderness:"—and after the remonstrance of that plague: (chap. ii. 13.) The Lord gives fire for the sword, and the sword causeth light and rain will (by means, no doubt of these showers) cease the years that the locust hath eaten." Indeed, attentively perusing that chapter, we shall find it extracts to be direct comments upon it. Compare two verses: "Blow, the trumpet . . . sound an alarum . . . let all the inhabitants of the land tremble;" a Teneiff, when the whole population watched flying invaders with the most painful anxiety. "A of darkness and gloominess . . . of clouds . . . of darkness, as the morning spread on the mountains." "They are like flake of snow," says one writer, "when they fly: though the sun shines ever bright, it is no lighter than when most clouded: they darken the sun, so that travellers could not the town." "A great (rather a numerous) people, and a strong:"—their numbers are noticed every writer. "The land is as the garden of E before them, but behind them a desolate wilderness: they eat up all sorts of grain and green, and leaves, the fruits of poppies, and especially the leaves of the oak, grossly pulpy reeds."—yea, and nothing shall escape them: appearance of them is as the appearance of hell. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mount snow, they leap:"—"acres into acres they cover made by these insects in their flight."—Like noise of a flame of fire that devoureth stubble: "they make a murmuring noise as they eat."" For their face the people shall be much: They shall not run like mighty men; they shall be the wild like men of war . . . They shall run to the city: they shall run upon the walls: they shall climb upon the houses: they shall enter . . . town, like a thief." See what is over from Beaufan, of "every room being full; and every dish of meat." After the terrible devastations committed by these ravages, the Lord calls to attention and promises, on the penitential humi former his judgment to remove it off the north army; and drive him into a land, barren and desolate, with his face toward the East sea, and his heart toward the utmost sea: and his spirit shall cease up and his ill sav. It is remarkable, that our tracts agree in recording the stink and ill savo the locust: "They leave behind them an intolerable stench." They leave a great stench behind them;" and M. Barbier gives strict orders concerning the defunctual interment of these masses of corruption; observing, "The infection left by their carcasses is insupportable."

The prophet Nahum says of the locusts, that they camp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun arises they flee away. Every observer notices the torpid effect of cold, and the invigorating powers of heat, on the locust.

2. Another remarkable particular appears to have considerable connection with some things said on Exod. xvi. 13. that "in the morning, or evening, or in misty weather, locusts do not see equally well, nor fly so high; they suffer themselves to be more closely approached; they are stiff and slow in their motions;" or, as we may say, "they are not seen." This sentence is not re-er the opinion of those who consider the word selaq as denoting a mist, or fog; and think it possible that the word selav (Num. xi. 31,) may express those clouds of locusts, which compose these flying armies. The opposition of two winds was likely to produce a calm, and a calm to cause a fog; the lower flight of the locusts, the gathering them during the evening, all night, and the next morning, agree with these extracts; and the fatal effects (verses 32, 34,) while the flesh was yet between the teeth of the people, seem to be precisely such as might be expected, from the stench of the immense masses of locusts, spread all around about the camp. Could a more certain way of generating a pestilence have been adopted, considering the stench uniformly attributed to them, and the malignity attending such infection as their dead carcasses so exposed must occasion? [Several interpreters have supposed that the word selaq in Exod. xvi. 13, means a species of locust; but this opinion is now generally abandoned, although supported by Ludolf and Niebuhr.]

As locusts are commonly eaten in Palestine, and in the neighboring countries, there is no difficulty in supposing that the Selaq, used by Matthew, (iii. 4,) speaking of the food on which John subsisted, might signify these insects. The ancients affirm, that in Africa, Syria, Persia, and almost throughout Asia, the people did commonly eat these creatures. Some opinions were called Accridophagi, in the East; others of the locusts, because these insects formed their principal food. Clernard, in a letter from Fez, (A. D. 1541,) assures us, that he saw wagon-loads of locusts brought into that city for food. Kistenius, in his notes on Matthew, says, that the Selaq, as the Arabs call it, is in the Arabic master, that he had often seen them on the river Jordan; that they were of the same form as ours, but larger; that the inhabitants pluck off their wings and feet, and hang up the rest till they grow warm and ferment; and then they eat them, and think them good food. A monk, who had travelled into Egypt, assures us, that he had eaten of these locusts, and that in the country they subsisted on them four months in the year. More recent travellers corroborate these statements. [Niebuhr remarks that "it is no more inconceivable to Europeans, that the Arabs should eat locusts with relish, than it is incredible to the Arabs, who have had no intercourse with Christians, that the latter should regard oysters, lobsters, &c. as delicacies. Nevertheless, one is just as certain as the other.

Locusts are brought to market on strings, in all the cities of Arabia, from Babelmandib to Bassorah. On mount Sumara I saw an Arab who had collected a whole sack-full of them. They are prepared in different ways. All Arabs in Egypt, of whom we asked, stated that he would immediately eat locusts in our presence, threw them upon the glowing coal; and after he supposed they were roasted enough, he took them by the legs and head, and devoured the remainder at one mouthful. When the Arabs have them in quantities, they roast or dry them in an oven, or boil them and eat them with salt. The Arabs in the kingdom of Morocco boil the locusts, and then dry them on the roofs of their houses. One sees there large baskets full of them in the markets. I have myself never tried to eat locusts." (Descr. of Arabia, p. 171, Germ. ed.)

Burckhardt also relates the fact in a similar manner: (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 226.) "The Be-locusts eat grass in the early spring, exterminating the vegetation in the beginning of April, when the sexes cohabit, and they are easily caught. After having been roasted a little upon the iron plate on which bread is baked, (see Bazzan, p. 365,) they are dried in the sun, and then put in their boats to be traded.

After these statements, there can surely be no difficulty in admitting "locusts" to have been the food of John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 4. R.

There is a remarkable passage in Eccl. xii. 5, where Solomon describes the infestation of locusts, according to our translation: "The grasshopper shall be a burden unto him," but it is generally admitted, that the words should be rendered "The locust shall burden itself."" The word saq, hagab signifies a particular species of locusts in Arabia, the word implies to eat, or hide, and it probably denotes a kind of hooded locust, or the lesser yellowish locust, which greatly resembles our grasshopper. To this insect the preacher compares "a dry, shrunk, shrivelled, crumbling, craggy old man, his back and legs express scars. He thrusts projecting forwards, his arms backwards, his head downwards, and the apophyses or bunching parts of the bones in general enlarged." From this exact likeness, says Dr. Smith, without all doubt, arises the figure of the old man, of which in the fable of Tithonus, as inventor of them, he was at last turned into a grasshopper. This poetical use of the locust, as figurative of an old man, may be justified by quoting the pictorial figurative application of the same insect, to the same purpose. In the collection of gems in the Florintina gallery, (Plate 96,) appear several instances, as it seems, of this allegory.

The one here copied, appears to be perfectly coincident with what is understood to be the true import of the royal preacher's expressions. It represents an old man, under the emaciated figure of a locust, which has loaded his shrunk stature, his drooping wings, and his spindle shanks, with a supplicatory sacrifice to Venus. In this gem, the idea of an old man being signified by this locust, is conspicuous; for he stands upright, so far as he can stand upright, on his hinder legs; over his shoulder he carries a kind of yoke, with a loaded basket of offerings at LOCUST

Each end, (a very common instrument in representations of sacrifice,) which he grasped carefully with his two fore legs (the other fore legs being omitted for the sake of similarity,) and he proceeds creeping (not flying) on tip-toe, staggering towards the column which is consecrated, as appears by evident insignia, to the divinity of his adoration.

Surely, these are sufficiently remarkable coincidences of imagination; as will appear, on analyzing the words of the passage in Ecclesiastes:

Shall crouch all the daughters of song:
And of that which is high they shall fear;
And alarms [shall be] in the way;
And shall drop off the almond, or . . . . . . be dismissed the watcher, or . . . . . . be relinquished vigilance;
And shall burden itself the locust;
And abolished is enjoyment.

The Latin version of Pagninus gives the same sense, "Et repellatur coelum, et omnem durum, et dissipabitur concupiscientia."

The adoption of the same emblem of imbecility, by persons so distant and different as the royal preacher, and the engraver of this gem, at least merits this remark; but it seems also to favor the idea, that such was a common figurative representation; and, if so, it may justify the inference that the other parts of Solomon's description of old age were perfectly familiar to the reader in his day, though to explain them thoroughly now, requires no little share of penetration. If this representation be thought less common, it may be esteemed the more curious.

But the reason for allegorizing such a character under the figure of a locust, may be gathered from a note of M. Bariou: "Ces insectes sont si forment joints dans l'accouplement, que les pennis avec la main, il ne se separent point. Ils restent ainsi dans la meme situation plusieurs heures, les jours et les nuits et enfin; si vous tentez de les separer, vous sentez qu'ils font resistance, et que vous pouvez qu'avez effort que vous en venez a bout." This is a complete vindication of the version adopted by Pagninus; and, being drawn from nature, shows how the same notion might be expressed under the same similitude, as well by other observers as by the sagacious Solomon.

No apology is necessary for adding the following:

"Barzillai was a very aged man, fourscore years old, And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live? Can I discern between good and evil? Can thy servant taste what I eat, or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? Let thy servant return, to die in my own city, and to be buried in the grave of my father, and of my mother," 2 Sam. xix. 35.

The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slopped pantaloons,
With spectacles on'ts nose, and pouch on's side;

His youthful hose, well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk Shank; and his big main voice,
Turning again towards child'st shrill Tiresias
And whistles in his sound: Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childhood and mere oblivion;
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing.

Shakespeare.

But there is another, and perhaps a more difficult, application of the locust as an emblem, in the Book of Revelation, chap. ix. The passage has generally been thought singular, and has, indeed, been abandoned by most critics as desperate:

"And there came out of the smoke, locusts upon the earth; and unto them was given power, as the scorpions of the earth have power—and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man. And the shapes of the locusts were like unto (1) horses prepared unto battle; and on their heads were as it were (2) crowns like gold; and their faces were as (3) the faces of men; and they had hair (4) as the hair of women; and their teeth were (5) as the teeth of lions; and they had breast-plates as it were (6) breast-plates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of (7) chariots of many horses, rushing to battle; and they had (8) tails like unto scorpions; and there were stings in their tails . . . . (9) and they had a king one thousand years."

The following passage from Niebuhr serves in part to explain this representation: (Descrip. Arab. p. 173.) "An Arab of the desert near Basra [Bagdad] informed me of a singular comparison of the locust with other animals. The terrible locust of chap. ix. of the Apocalypse, not then occurring to me, I regarded this comparison as a jest of the Be- douin [Arab], and I paid no attention to it, till it was repeated by another from Bagdad. It was thus: He compared the head of the locust to that of the horse (1,6); its breast to that of the lion (5); its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion (8); its horns [horns], if I mistake not, to the locks of hair of a virgin (4); and so of other parts."

In like manner locusts are called by the Italians cavallette, little horses; and by the Germans Heupferde. R.

We have numbered these sentences, that the eye may more readily perceive their corresponding numbers. Every reader will wish that Niebuhrs had been aware of the similarity of these descriptions; he might then have illustrated, perhaps, every word of this passage. It seems more natural to compare, in No. 5, their teeth to those of lions; but this is more especially proper to the Apocalyptic writer's purpose, as he already had informed us of their resemblance to "horses prepared for battle." As to the armor, &c. of horses prepared for battle, in the East, Knolles informs us, that the Mamelukes' horses were commonly furnished with silver bridles, gilt trappings, and rich saddles; and that their necks and breasts were armed with plates of iron. It is not therefore unlikely, that they had also ornaments resembling crowns of gold to which the horns of the locust might be, with propriety, compared (2): we find they had really "breast-plates of iron;" (6) and by their rushing on the enemy, and the use they made of their mouths, as described by Knolles, the comparison of them to locusts seems very applicable. Without entering into the question, What these locusts prefigured? the reader will accept the following extracts from this old writer, (p. 75.) in which those who think that the Tartar, or Turkestan, nation was intended by the locusts, with its vast horde of resemblance.

"About this time (when in the space of a few years such mutations as had not before of long been seen, chanced in divers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tatars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare countries in the North side of Asia (of all others a most barbarous, fierce, and needle Nation,) stirred vp by their own wants, and the persuasion of one Zings, (or as some call him, Cangis,) hold amongst them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their Leader, and honoured by the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to say, the Mighty King, (commonly called the great Cham,) flocking together in number like the sand of the sea, and conquering first their poor neighbours, of condition and quality like themselves, and easy enough to be entreated with them to seeke their better fortune, like swarmes of grasshoppers sent out to devour the world, passed the high Mountaine Caucasus, part of the Mountaine Turrus, of all the Mountaines in the world the greatest; which, beginning neere into the Archipelago, and ending upon the Orientall Ocean, and running thorough many great and famous kingdoms, diuided Asia into two parts; over which great Mountaine, one of the most assured bounders of nature, that had so many worlds of yeares shut vp this rough and savage people, they now passing without number, and comming downe as it were into another World, full of such Nature's pleasant delights as were to them before scene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing being now able to stand in their way."

It is remarkable, that Solomon says, (Prov. xxx. 27.) "The locusts have no king;" but the locusts of the Apocalypse have a king, and a dreadful king too—Baalzebub,—the destroyer.

LOOKING-GLASSES. Moses says, that the devout women sat up all night at the door of the tabernacle in the wilderness, offered cheerfully their 40 loaves, which were employed in making a brazen laver for the purifications of the priests, Exod. xxvii. 8. These looking-glasses were, without doubt, of brass, since the laver was made out of them.

LAYER.

LOGO, Dominus; KEGOS: yea, Adoni, or Adonai; Elokim, or Jehovah: for the Greek and Latin interpreters often put KEGOS: and Dominus, for all these names. (1.) The name Lord belongs to God by pre-eminence, and in this sense ought never to be given to any creature. The Messiah as Son of God, equal to the Father, is also often called Lord in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. (2.) This name is sometimes given to angels; whether as representing the person of God, or as sent by God. Daniel (x. 16, 17.) says to the angel, or, as he calleth him, to one who spake to him under a human form: "O my Lord, by my vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. For how can the servant of this my Lord talk with this my Lord?" (3.) It is sometimes given to princes, and other personations which we would show respect, though the appellation Jehovah never is.—The word Lord in the English version, when printed in small capitals, stands always for Jehovah in the Hebrew. See JEHOVAH.

LO-RUHAMAH, not obtaining mercy, a symbolic name given by Hosea to his daughter, Hos. i. 6.

LOT, the son of Haran, and nephew of Abraham, followed his uncle from Ur, and afterwards from Haran, to settle in Canaan, Gen. xi. 31. A. M. 2082. Abraham had always a great affection for him, and when they could not continue longer together in Canaan, because they both had large flocks, and their shepherds sometimes quarrelled, (Gen. xiii. 6, 7.) he gave Lot the choice of his abode.

About eight years after this separation, Chedorlaomer and his allies having attacked the kings of Sodom, and the neighboring cities, pillaged Sodom, and took many captives, among whom was Lot. Abraham, therefore, armed his servants, pursued the confederate kings, overthrew them near the springs of Jordan, recovered the spoil which they had taken, and brought back Lot with the other captives. When the sins of the Sodomites and of the neighboring cities had called down the vengeance of God to punish and destroy them, two angels were sent to Sodom, to forewarn Lot of the dreadful catastrophe that was about to happen. They entered Sodom in the evening, and in the morning, before day, they took Lot, his wife, and his daughters, by the hand, and drew them out of the city, lest they should perish with them; saying, "Save yourselves with all haste: look not behind you; get as fast as you are able to the mountain, lest you be involved in the calamity of the city." Lot entertained the angels, who consented that he might retire to Zoar, which was one of the five cities doomed to be destroyed. His wife, looking behind her, was destroyed.

Lot left Zoar, and retired with his two daughters to a cave in an adjacent mountain.—Conceiving that all mankind was destroyed, and that the world would end, unless they provided new inhabitants for it, they made their father drink, and the eldest lay with him without his perceiving it; she conceived a son whom she called Moab. The second daughter did the same, and had Ammon.

Several questions are proposed concerning Lot's wife being changed into a pillar of salt. Some are of opinion, that being surprised and suffocated with fire and smoke, she continued in the same place, as was a stone in the earth, and became as a monolith, or monument of salt stone was erected on her grave; others, that she was stifled in the flame, and became a monument of salt to posterity; that it is a permanent and durable monument of her imprudence. The common opinion is, that she was suddenly petrifed and changed into a statue of rock salt, which is as hard as the hardest rocks.

The words of the original, however, have been much too strictly taken by translators. יֵשָׁה, rendered statue, by no means expresses form, but fixation, settlement; hence a military post; (1 Sam. v. 5.) that is, a fixed station; and as the Hebrews reckoned among salts both nitre and bitumen, so the term salt here used, may denote the bituminous mass which overwhelmed this woman, fixed her to the place where it fell upon her, raised her, and appear her in a height proportionable to that of her figure, and was long afterwards pointed out by the inhabitants as a memento of her fate, and a warning against loitering, when divinely ejected. Luke xvii. 32.

LOTS are mentioned in many places of Scripture. God commanded, that lots should be cast on the two goats, to ascertain which should be sacrificed. (See
LOTS

He required, also, that the land of promise should be divided by lot (Num. xxvi. 55, 56; xxxv. 19), and that the priests and Levites should have their cities given to them by lot (Josh. xiv. 13-16). In the time of David, the twenty-four classes of the priests and Levites were distributed by lot, to their order of waiting in the temple (see 1 Chron. xxiv. 13, 14). And it would seem from Luke i. 9, that the portions of daily duty were appointed to the priests by lot, as Zechariah's lot was to burn incense. In the division of the spoil after victory, lots were cast to determine the portion of each, 1 Chron. xiv. 25. And the lot for the Saviour's garments, as had been foretold by the prophet; and after the death of Judas, lots were cast to decide who should succeed in his place, Acts i. 26.

The manner of casting lots is not described in the Scriptures; but several methods appear to have been used. Solomon observes, (Prov. xxxi. 33.) that "the lot," pebble, is cast into the lap (Prov. xxxi. 33.); the bosom, that is, probably, of an urn, or vase, which leads to a very inauspicious idea from the lap of a person; yet, had our translators used the word bosom, which is a more frequent and correct import of the word, they would have equally misled the reader, had it not been referred to a person; for it does not appear that the bosom of a person, that is, of a garment worn by a person, was ever used to receive lots. But probably several modes of drawing lots, or of casting lots, were practised. In support of this remark it should be observed, that the same word is not always used in the Hebrew to express the event of a lot.

In Lev. vii. 9-10, the lot is said to ascend, הָלְךָ, i.e. come up out of the vase, or urn. Our translation says, "Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the lot has fallen," but the lot that has ascended, the direct contrary to falling. But the goat on which the lot ascended—"to be the scapegoat," &c. This compels us to dissent from the explanation of the action, by Parkehurst, (Art. ξυρα,) who says, "The stone or mark itself which was cast into the urn or vessel, and by the leaping out of which (when the vessel was shaken) before another of similar kind, the affair was decided." This is completely inconsistent with the action attributed (very credibly) to Simon the Just, of casting lots; but it may well enough describe what passed in the instance of Haman; (Esth. iii. 7.) they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from month to month. They "cast,"—rather perhaps, "to be cast," (Hiph. חָלָח) which is very different from drawing out. Also, the manner of casting lots on Jonah; (chap. i. 7.) הָלְךָ, "they cast lots, and the lot fell, was cast, on Jonah." It cannot well be supposed that these mariners had on board their ship the proper vase, with its accompaniments, for performing this action with suitable dignity; but, more probably, something of the nature of our dice-box was sufficient to answer their purpose.

We are now brought to a more accurate conception of the passage under consideration, in which neither of the words just noticed occurs, (Prov. xxxi. 33.) but a very different one, תָּנָה, the root of which means to cast out, rather than to cast in. It is taken sometimes, however, to express a casting in all directions; and hence Mr. Taylor infers that the intention of the royal preacher was to express an action of the person who holds the lot vase; that is, strongly shaking it, for the purpose of commingling the whole of its contents to prevent all preference for one lot over another, to the hand of him who is to draw—literally, "in a lot vase the lots are cast in all directions; neverless, from the Lord is their whole decision—judgment." The wise man also acknowledges the usefulness of this custom; (Prov. xxvii. 18.) "The lot casteth contentions to cease, and parteth between the nobility." It is sometimes forbidden, however; as, when it is practised without necessity; or with superstition; or with a design of tempting God; or in things in which there are other natural means of discovering truth, reason and religion furnish better ways to guide us. Hence (Ezr. vii. 7, &c.) used lots, not only out of superstition, but likewise in an unjust and criminal matter, when he undertook to destroy the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar did so in a superstitious manner, when, being on the way to Jerusalem, and Rabbah of the Ammonites, he cast lots to determine which of the two cities he should first attack, Ezek. xxi. 18, &c.

LOTS the Feast of, see Pur of Perim.

LOVE is a natural passion of the human mind; given to man for the most important purposes. It is denomimated from its object, as, (1.) Divine love, love to God, love to divine things, to whatever relates to God, or is appointed or approved by him. Love is generally excited in the mind by a sense of some good, some excellence, real or supposed, in the object beloved; wherefore, as all good is supremely excellent, absolutely certain and infinite, in God, he is entitled to our supreme affection. (2.) Brotherly love, is an affection proceeding from a sense of participation in certain enjoyments, benefits, &c., of which both parties are conscious. In a family, brothers love each other, because they are conscious of their mutual relation, of enjoying the same family advantages, privileges, &c. It is a general love, springing from the sentiments and feelings of the former: it is a sympathy actuated by a sense of communion in the same hopes, the same fears, the same affections, the same avarice, the benevolence of the same parent, and the general and particular sympathies connected with the principles of piety, the union of the Christian system, and the reciprocal kindnesses of truly renewed minds.

It is the excellence of the Christian system that it enables us to see that love is drawing out these objects, and moderates it within due bounds. Finding this principle in the human mind, it does not banish but encourage it; does not depress but exalt it; does not abate but promote it. It is conducted by piety to proper ends, and directs the man's affections, and is trained up for perpetual exercise in a world where it shall be perfectly purified, perfectly extended, and perfectly rewarded.

LOW is taken for station in life, for disposition of mind, for national depression, &c. As poverty of station is not poverty of spirit, so lowliness of condition is not lowliness of mind; neither is it always connected with it. Nevertheless, it is a great blessing which sometimes attends the dispensations of Providence, that they abase a person in this world, and bring him into a more suitable disposition of mind, a more lowly habit of thought and conduct than when his prosperity was high. So that if he have occasion to regret the loss of temporal goods, he may have much greater reason to rejoice in the acquisition of mental and spiritual advantages. See Humility.
LOWER PARTS of the earth are, (1.) Valleys, which diversify the face of the globe, and are evidently lower than hills, which also contribute to that diversity, Isa. xlv. 23.—(2.) The gulf, which, being dug into the earth, or into rocks, &c. is the lower part of the earth, or that portion of it which is usually opened up; this is sometimes called the deep, or abyss; and, indeed, it is secluded from our cognizance, till we are called to visit "that bourn from whence no traveller returns," Ps. lxix. 9; Eph. iv. 9.—(3.) As to the phrase, "lower parts of the earth," (Ps. xxxiii. 13), in reference to the mother's womb, it is obscure. Perhaps there is a mark of assimilation (s) dropped; the word may include the idea of a mere particle, an atom of earth,—When I was made in secret, when I was compacted together in the womb, in the most secret places, (the womb,) and endowed with life, though a minute particle of clay, an atom of earth,—as the fetus in the womb, the chick in the egg; quasi animalcula in semine, &c. Or the passage may have reference to the first man from the dust of the earth, Gen. ii. 7. It does not appear necessary to take the Hebrew word, rendered "lower parts," as expressing the extremely deep, or central parts, in reference to the general globe of the earth, (see Ps. lxxii., Eph. iv. 9; Is. xxv. 29) so commonly composed of dust of the earth, of which man was made, being taken from the moist valley, not from high hills, from a loamy soil, not from granite rock, may be understood by the phrase, if this be accepted, the psalmist may intend to say, "The formation of my body, the most secret of places, (the womb,) and endowed with life, though a minute particle of clay, an atom of earth,—as the fetus in the womb, the chick in the egg; quasi animalcula in semine, &c. Or the passage may have reference to the first man from the dust of the earth," or, "as a wonderful microcosm, a world,—a human world, with its many secret combinations, and interior constructions necessary to life; as wonderful as the composition of the body, itself, as it was acquainted with the speculations of the inquisitive on the mode of impregnation, will admit the truth of this representation, notwithstanding the unremitting labors of our own hunters, the experiments of the curious Spallanzani, and of various naturalists, which, probably, would have been thought little, if any thing, short of impiety among the Hebrews.—"The construction of my solid parts—my bones, &c. was not hidden from thee, though formed in the most secret place; and they became connected, and united in their proper place, and inspection, though originally a mere molecule of moist matter." (Comp. Job x. 9—12.)

LUCIFER. ["How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations!" Thou wast exalted in thine heart, when the word Lucifer occurs in the English Bible, and it is here evidently applied to the king of Babylon. The word signifies light-giver, and is the Latin epithet of the planet Venus, or the morning star,—a meaning which is also here explicated by the word "son of the morning." The Hebrew word is עִנְיָן, hêlêl, which may either have the meaning brilliant star, or it may be an imperative, signifying lament, howl. It is taken in this latter sense by the Syriac, Aquila and Jerome; but the general sense of the passage is thereby little changed; it would only read, "Howl, son of the morning," &c. The former sense is preferred by the Sept., Vulg., Targums, Rabbinas, Luther, and the English version. A brilliant star, and especially the morning star, is often put as the emblem of a mighty prince, Num. xxviii. 17. In Rev. ii. 20, it is said of Christ, "I will give him [cause him to be] the morning star;" and in Rev. xii. 16, Christ says of himself, "I am the bright and morning star." The Arabs, also, according to the Camoos, call a prince, the star of a people.

Tertullian and Gregory the Great understood this passage in Isaiah of the fall of Satan; and from this circumstance the name Lucifer has since been applied to Satan. This is now the usual acceptation of the word. R.

The Arabsians call Lucifer Eblis, and also Azazel, which is the name of the scape-goat that was sent into the wilderness, laden with the sins of the Jews. They relate, that the angels, having God's order to fall prostrates before the earth, the earth, the are cast out of the presence of the Lord, and are not induced to; they are now obedient to the one who sat on the throne, and to the Lamb. In whose hands are the hidden treasures of all the kings of the earth. —With them, as with all posterity, they are to remain in bondage, till the final resurrection. And when the great day of their judgment is come, they shall be punished with everlasting fire, in the torment of Gehenna. And this is the portion and inheritance of their ways; for ever and ever. But such have no share in the rewards of God. They shall have no part in his inheritance. For God is a consuming fire.

LUCIUS of Cyrene, mentioned Acts xiii. 1, was one of the prophets of the Christian church at Antioch. While employed in his ministry with the fall of Cyrus, the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Paul and Barnabas," &c. Some think that Lucius was one of the seventy. The disciple mentioned, (Rom. xvi. 21.) and styled Paul's kinsman is, probably, the same as Lucius the Cyrenian. He is by many supposed to be the same with the evangelist Luke. R.

LUD, the fourth son of Shem, (Gen. x. 22.) who is said by Josephus to have peopled Lydia, a province of Asia Minor. Arias Montanus places these Ludim where the Tigrius and Euphrates meet, and M. le Clerc, between the rivers Chaboris and Seacornas, or Masca.
