PREFACE.

On account of the diffuse and heterogeneous character which the Dictionary of Calmet had been brought to assume, it was a judicious step to undertake a new revision, in which the Fragments should be incorporated with the Dictionary under one alphabet, and the whole condensed and reduced to a proper form and order. Such a work has been published in London, during the present year, in royal octavo, under the direction of the editor of the fifth quarto edition. In order to comprise the work within this compass, the plan appears to have been to leave out all articles not directly illustrative of the Scriptures themselves; and also many of the prolix and trivial critical discussions of the Fragments; omitting, however nothing which it would be of any importance to retain. This plan appears to have been acted upon throughout—but with some exceptions, and, as it would seem, in great haste. I am not aware, at least, that any thing has been omitted, which it would have been in any degree advisable to have retained.

Such was the work which the enterprising Publishers put into my hands, with the request that I would revise it, and prepare an edition for the American public. On examining it, I found that many retrenchments might still be made, in my judgment, with advantage; while many additions also might be introduced, from sources with which the English editors appear to have been unacquainted.

The retrenchments which I have ventured to make, have been chiefly in respect to such critical, etymological, and mythological discussions of Mr. Taylor, as the English editor had retained. Believing that a much better system of Hebrew philology is beginning to be prevalent in our country, and also a more sober and correct view of Biblical interpretation in general, I felt unwilling to sanction the circulation among us of any such crude and fanciful speculations as could only tend to divert the mind of the Biblical student from the right way I have, therefore, not hesitated to strike out every thing of this kind, which seemed to me positively wrong and of injurious tendency; although enough still remains to confirm to the sober-minded student the correctness of the preceding remarks.

In the place of these retrenchments, and to a much greater amount, I have made such additions as seemed to be desirable, from all the sources within my reach. The whole range of German labor, in the department of Biblical literature, appears to have been almost unknown to the English editors; I have drawn copiously from it. The works of modern oriental travellers have also been extensively used. During the whole progress of the work the latest quarto edition of the Dictionary has been open before me, as also the French edition of 1730, and the first English one of 1732; but I have not found occasion to draw from them to any great extent.

The present work contains very many things which I should never have inserted, but which, being once there, I did not feel myself at liberty to reject. Such a course would have resulted rather in the compilation of a new work; which it was neither my wish nor duty to undertake. My province was merely to prepare a revised copy of the English work. This I have done, and almost every page bears evidence of such revision. Of the very numerous Scripture references, many have been found wrong, and have been corrected; but no systematic collation of them has been made. Many errors also, which had come down through all the previous editions, have been corrected. At my request, the Publishers have given a new and important map of the country south of Palestine; and, at their own suggestion, have introduced a better plan of Jerusalem, and also added another map, illustrative of the passage of the Israelites through the Red sea.

In conclusion, I have to return my thanks to the guardians and officers of Harvard University, and the Boston Athenæum, for the very liberal manner in which they met my wishes for the use of books from their respective libraries. To the skilful and very accurate correctors connected with the Boston Type and Stereotype Company, the thanks of the Editor and of the readers of this work are especially due.

The plan of the work, it will be perceived, is neither doctrinal nor devotional. The object of it is simply to explain and illustrate the meaning of the Bible itself, leaving to other occasions the application of that meaning, as it regards both the understanding and the heart. That the work may have the effect to facilitate and promote the study of the Sacred Volume in our land, is now the Editor's fervent prayer, as it has long been the object of his anxious toil.

EDWARD Robinson.

The Publishers of this work have in press, and will soon publish, an Abridgment of the present edition of Calmet's Dictionary, with Engravings, for the use of Schools and young persons. Prepared by Professor Robinson.

Note.—In the following work, the letter R. at the close of a paragraph, indicates that the whole of that paragraph, or so much of it as follows the mark [, has been added by the American Editor. The same letter, preceded by an asterisk, *R. indicates that the whole of the preceding article, or so much of it as follows the mark [, is by him.

STEREOTYPED AT THE BOSTON TYPE AND STEREOTYPE FOUNDERY.
PREFACE

TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

The American public being here presented with the well-known Dictionary of Calmet, in a condensed and somewhat abridged form, it is proper to state the circumstances under which this edition has been brought forward, and the principles on which the revision of the work has been conducted by the present Editor.

Augustin Calmet was a French monk, of the Benedictine order, and, in the latter part of his life, abbot of Senones, in Lorraine. He devoted himself particularly to the studies connected with Biblical literature; and his chief works were a Commentary on all the Books of the Old and New Testament, (Paris, 1707-16, 23 vols. 4to.; reprinted in 26 vols. 4to., and also in 9 vols. folio,) and the Historical and Critical Dictionary of the Bible, (Paris, 1722-28, 4 vols. folio; reprinted at Geneva, 1730, in 4 vols. 4to., and again at Paris, 1730, in 4 vols. folio.) He published a few other works of a similar nature, which obtained less notoriety, and died at Paris in 1757, at the age of seventy-five years. His general character, as a scholar and writer, is that of a diligent and judicious collector and compiler, with more of tolerance than was usual among the Catholics of that day, but without any profound skill in original investigation, or any distinguished tact or taste in the plan and arrangement of his works.

His Dictionary is justly regarded as affording a popular exhibition of the learning then extant upon the subjects of which it treats; without making in itself any important additions to the common stock. It was translated into English by D'Oyly and Colson, and published in 1732, in 3 vols. folio. There are said to have been versions of it also in the Latin, Dutch, Spanish, and Italian languages. But no further edition of it appeared in England until 1797, when it was again published under the direction of the late Mr. Charles Taylor, with considerable retrenchments and additions. The retrenchments consisted, principally, in the omission of articles resting on the authority of rabbinic literature and Catholic tradition, and not directly illustrative of the Bible. The additions were given in a separate volume, under the name of Fragments, and consisted of discussions and illustrations of oriental life, character, and manners, drawn chiefly from travellers in the East. A second edition of Mr. Taylor's revision was printed in 1800-03; and afterwards a third, from which the American edition of 1812-16, was copied, in 4 vols. 4to. The fourth London edition appeared in 1823, enlarged by a second volume of Fragments; and the fifth edition in 1830, after the death of Mr. Taylor, in 5 vols. 4to., the fifth volume consisting only of the plates.

The character of Mr. Taylor as an editor, and the value of his additions to Calmet's work, may be given in few words. Acquainted with oriental philology only through the meagre system of Maslefe and Parkhurst; as an expounder of etymologies, outstripping even the extravagance of the latter; and as a theorist in the ancient history of nations, overstepping the limits which even Bryant had felt himself constrained to observe;—his remarks on these and many collateral topics, may be characterized as being in general fanciful, very often rash, and sometimes even involving apparent absurdity. They must ever be received by the student with very great caution. His chief and undoubted merit consists in diligently bringing together, from a variety of sources, facts and extracts which serve to illustrate the antiquities, manners and customs, and geography, of oriental nations.
On account of the diffuse and heterogeneous character which the Dictionary of Calmet had been brought to assume, it was a judicious step to undertake a new revision, in which the Fragments should be incorporated with the Dictionary under one alphabet, and the whole condensed and reduced to a proper form and order. Such a work has been published in London, during the present year, in royal octavo, under the direction of the editor of the fifth quarto edition. In order to comprise the work within this compass, the plan appears to have been to leave out all articles not directly illustrative of the Scriptures themselves; and also many of the prolix and trivial critical discussions of the Fragments; omitting, however, nothing which it would be of any importance to retain. This plan appears to have been acted upon throughout—but with some exceptions, and, as it would seem, in great haste. I am not aware, at least, that any thing has been omitted, which it would have been in any degree advisable to have retained.

Such was the work which the enterprising Publishers put into my hands, with the request that I would revise it, and prepare an edition for the American public. On examining it, I found that many retractions might still be made, in my judgment, with advantage; while many additions also might be introduced, from sources with which the English editors appear to have been unacquainted.

The retractions which I have ventured to make, have been chiefly in respect to such critical, etymological, and mythological discussions of Mr. Taylor, as the English editor had retained. Believing that a much better system of Hebrew philology is beginning to be prevalent in our country, and also a more sober and correct view of Biblical interpretation in general, I felt unwilling to sanction the circulation among us of any such crude and fanciful speculations as could only tend to divert the mind of the Biblical student from the right way. I have, therefore, not hesitated to strike out everything of this kind, which seemed to me positively wrong and of injurious tendency; although enough still remains to confirm to the sober-minded student the correctness of the preceding remarks.

In the place of these retractions, and to a much greater amount, I have made such additions as seemed to be desirable, from all the sources within my reach. The whole range of German labor, in the department of Biblical literature, appears to have been almost unknown to the English editors; I have drawn copiously from it. The works of modern oriental travellers have also been extensively used. During the whole progress of the work, the latest quarto edition of the Dictionary has been open before me, as also the French edition of 1780, and the first English one of 1782; but I have not found occasion to draw from them to any great extent.

The present work contains very many things which I should never have inserted, but which, being once there, I did not feel myself at liberty to reject. Such a course would have resulted rather in the compilation of a new work; which it was neither my wish nor duty to undertake. My province was merely to prepare a revised copy of the English work. This I have done, and almost every page bears evidence of such revision. DICTIONARY OF THE HOLY BIBLE.

A, the first letter in almost all alphabets. In Hebrew it is called aleph, (א) which signifies ox, from the shape of it in the old Phenician alphabet, where it somewhat resembles the head and horns of that animal. (Plutarch, Quast. Sympos. i. 2. Gesenii Thesaur. Heb. p. 1) This Hebrew name has passed over along with the letter itself, into the Greek alpha. Both the Hebrews and Greeks employed the letters of their alphabets as numerals; and A, therefore, (aleph or alpha) denoted one, the first. Hence our Lord says of himself, that he is (α ιον) alpha and omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the ending, as he himself explains it, Rev. i. 8, 11; xxi. 6; xxii. 13. R.

AARON, the son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, (Exod. vi. 20.) was born A. M. 2430; that is, the year before Pharaoh's edict for destroying the Hebrew male infants, and three years before his brother Moses, Exod. vii. 7. He married Elisheba, the daughter of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah, (Exod. vi. 21.) by whom he had four sons, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Itamar. The eldest two were destroyed by fire from heaven; from the other two the race of the chief priests was continued in Israel, 1 Chron. xxiv. 2 seq.

The Lord, having appeared to Moses, and directed him to deliver the Israelites from their oppressive bondage in Egypt, appointed Aaron to be his assistant and speaker, he being the more eloquent of the two, Exod. iv. 11—16; vii. 1. Moses, having been directed by God to return into Egypt, quitted Midian, with his family, and entered upon his journey. At mount Horeb he met his brother Aaron, who had come thither by a divine direction; (Exod. iv. 27.) and after the usual salutations, and conference as to the purposes of the Almighty, the brothers prosecuted their journey to Egypt, A. M. 2513. Upon their arrival in Egypt, they called together the elders of Israel, and having announced to them the pleasure of the Almighty, to deliver the people from their bondage, they presented themselves before Pharaoh, and exhibited the credentials of their divine mission, by working several miracles in his presence. Pharaoh, however, drove them away, and for the purpose of repressing the strong hopes of the Israelites of a restoration to liberty, he ordered their laborsious occupations to be greatly increased. Overwhelmed with despair, the Hebrews bitterly complained to Moses and Aaron, who encouraged them to sustain their oppressions, and reiterated the determination of God to subdue the obstinacy of Pharaoh, and procure the deliverance of his people, ch. v. In all their subsequent intercourse with Pharaoh, during which several powerful remonstrances were made, and many astonishing miracles performed, Aaron appears to have taken a very prominent part, and to have pleaded with much eloquence and effect the cause of the injured Hebrews, Exod. vi.—xii.

Moses having ascended mount Sinai, to receive the tables of the law, after the ratification of the covenant made with Israel, Aaron, his sons, and seventy elders, followed him partly up. They saw the symbol of the divine presence, without sustaining any injury, (Exod. xxiv. 1—11.) and were favored with a sensible manifestation of the good pleasure of the Lord. It was at this time that Moses received a divine command to invest Aaron and his four sons with the priestly office, the functions of which they were to discharge before Jehovah for ever. See PRIEST.

During the forty days that Moses continued in the mount, the people became impatient, and tumultuously addressed Aaron: "Make us gods," said they, "which shall go before us: for as to this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him," Exod. xxxii. 1 seq. Aaron desired them to bring their pendants, and the ear-rings of their wives and children; which, being brought, were melted down under his direction, and formed into a golden calf. Before this calf Aaron built an altar, and the people sacrificed, danced, and diverted themselves around it, exclaiming, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought

2. Among the most confirming signs given by God to Moses, may be placed the interview with his brother Aaron at Mount Horeb. This being predicted by God, and dramatically performed, was very convincing to Moses. [See something similar in the case of Jeremiah, chap. xxxii. 8.] It should seem also, that Aaron would not have undertaken a journey of two months, from Egypt to Mount Sinai, at great hazard, if he did not have a very clear assurance of the authority which sent him; neither could he have expected to find Moses, where he did find him, unless by divine direction; since the place afterwards called the mount of God, was then undistinguished and unfrequented. Aaron, therefore, was a sign to Moses, as Moses was a sign to Aaron.

3. It seems probable that Aaron was in circumstances above those of the lower class of people in Egypt. Had he been among those who were kept to their daily bondage, he could not have spared time and cost for a journey to Horeb. Although the brothers then, had no pretension to sovereign authority by descent, yet they were of consideration among the Israelites, either by property, or office, or perhaps from the fact of Moses' long residence and education at the Egyptian court, which could not fail to be a source of influence to himself and to his family. Both Moses and Aaron seem to be acknowledged by Pharaoh, and by many of his servants, as persons of consideration, and as proper agents for transactions between the Israelites and the king. Aaron performed the miracles before Pharaoh, too, without any wonder being expressed by him, how a person like him should acquire such skill and eloquence. Had Moses and Aaron been merely private persons, Pharaoh would, no doubt, have punished their intrusion and impertinence.

4. We cannot palliate the sin of which Aaron was guilty, when left in charge of Israel, in conjunction with Hur, while Moses was in the mount, receiving the law. His authority should have restrained the people's infatuation, instead of forwarding their design. [See Calf.] As to his persons concern in the affair, we may remark, that if his own faith or patience was exhausted, or if he supposed Moses to be dead, there could have been no collusion between them. Nor durst he have done as he did, had he expected the immediate return of Moses: His activity in building the altar to the calf rendered his subsequent submission to Moses utterly inexplicable, had not his authority been employed on the occasion. It is to be remarked, that nothing is said of the interference of Hur, the coadjutor of Aaron in the government of the people. The latter seems to have shrunk with unholy timidity from his duty of resistance to the proceedings of the people, fearing their disposition, as "set on his chief," which he pleads in excuse, Exod. xxxi. 29-34.

5. The sedition of Aaron and Miriam against Moses, (Num. xii. 1.) affords another argument against the supposition of collusion between the brothers. Aaron assumes, at first, a high tone, and pretends to no less gifts than his brother; but afterwards acknowledges his folly, and, with Miriam submits. Aaron was not visited with the leprosy, but he could well judge of its reality on his sister, it was his proper office to exclude her from the camp for seven days; and by his expression of "flesh hail consumed," it should seem that it was an invernal kind of the disease, and therefore more similar to Aaron's affection, interest, and passion, all concu red to harden him against any thing less than full conviction of a divine interposition. But he well knew that this was not in the power of Moses to inflict this disease, in so sudden and decided a manner.

6. The departure of Aaron for death, has something in it very singular and impressive. In the sight of all the congregation, he quits the camp for the mountain, where he is to die. On the way, Moses his brother, and Eleazar his son, divest him of his pontifical habits, and attend him to the last. We view, in imagination, the feeble old man ascending the mountain, there transferring the insignia of his office to his son, and giving up the ghost, with that faith, that resignation, that meekness, which become one who had been honored with the Holy Spirit, and with the typical representation of the great High-priest himself.

7. In the general character of Aaron there was much of the meekness of his brother Moses. He seems to have been willing to serve his brethren, upon all occasions; and was too easily persuaded against his own judgment. This appears when the people excited him to make the golden calf; and when Miriam urged him to rival his brother.

8. When we consider the talents of Aaron, his natural eloquence, and his probable acquirements in knowledge, that God often spoke to him as well as to Moses, and that Egyptian priests were exalted to a duty of their profession; it is not very unlikely, that he assisted his brother in writing some parts of the books which now bear the name of Moses; that, at least, he kept journals of public transactions; that he transcribed, perhaps, the orders of Moses, especially those relating to the priests. It this be admissible, then we account at once for such difference of style as appears in these books, and for such smaller variations in different places, as would naturally arise from two persons recording the same facts; we account for this at once, without in any degree, lessening the authority, the antiquity, or the real value of these books. It accounts, also, for the third person being used when speaking of Moses: perhaps, too, for some of the praise and commendation of Moses, which is most remarkable where Aaron is most in fault. See Numb. xii. 3. In Deuteronomy, Moses uses the pronoun, I, and me: “I said,”—“the Lord said to me,” which are rarely or never used in the narrative, or history of the Bible.

AARONITES, Levites of the family of Aaron; the priests who particularly served the sanctuary. Numb. iv. 5 seq.; 1 Chron. xii. 27; xvii. 17. See LEVITES.

AARON, the eleventh month of the civil year of the Hebrews, and the 5th of their ecclesiastical year, which began with Nisan. It had thirty days, and nearly answers to the moon of July. The name does not occur in Scripture. See the Jewish Calendar at the end of the volume.

ABADDON, or APOLLYON, the destroyer: the name ascribed (Rev. ix. 11.) to the angel of the abyss, or Tartarus, i. e. the angel of death. He is represented as the king and head of the Apocalyptic powers under the fifth trumpet, Rev. xi. 11. See LOCUST.

ABANA, or AMANA, (the former being the Kethib, or reading of the Hebrew text; and the latter the Keri, or marginal reading,) the name of one of the rivers cited by Naaman (2 Kings v. 12) as rivers of Damascus. The latter probably the true name, signifying perennial; the change of n into b being very common in the oriental dialects.

Interpreters have been much divided in regard to the streams probably designated by the names Abana and Pharpar. Generally is the present Barada (the cold), the Chryssonoma of the ancients, which rises in Anti-Libanus and flows through Damascus. Just above the city it is divided into several branches, (some travellers say three, and others five,) which pass around the city on the outside, and afford water for the numerous gardens by which the city is surrounded; while the main stream passes through and waters the city itself. Below the city they again mostly unite, and the river loses itself in a marsh a few miles S. E. from Damascus. The branches here mentioned are evidently artificial; and if we now suppose that originally there were but two branches in all, (the others being a work of later times,) these two branches may perhaps have been the Abana and Pharpar. Another supposition, however, is more probable, viz. that one of the streams is the Barada; while the other, (perhaps the Amana, or perennial stream,) may be the little river Fiyib, or Fige, which rises near the village of like name in a pleasant valley about 15 or 20 miles N. W. of Damascus. Dr. Richardson describes it as issuing at once from the limestone rock, a deep, rapid stream of about thirty feet wide. It is pure and cold as iced water, and after coursing down a rugged channel for above a hundred yards, falls into the Barada, which comes from another valley, and is here only half as wide as the Fiyib. Its waters, also, like those of the Jordan, have a white, sulphurous hue. *R.

ABAGARUS, see ABBAK.

ABARIM, mountains east of Jordan, over against Jericho, on the northern border of Moab, within the limits of the tribe of Reuben. It is impossible to define exactly their extent. Eusebius fixes them at six miles west of Heshbon, and seven east of Livias. The mountains Nebo, Pisgah, and Peor, were summits of the Abarim. Num. xxvii. 12; xxxiii. 47, 48. Deut. xxxiii. 49.

ABBA, a Syriac word signifying father, and expressive of attachment and confidence. When the Jews came to speak Greek, this word was probably retained from their ancient language, as being easier to pronounce, especially for children, than the Greek pater. Hence Paul says, “Ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father,” Rom. viii. 15.

I. ABDON, son of Hilled, of the tribe of Ephraim, and tenth judge of Israel. He succeeded Elon, and judged Israel eight years, Judg. xii. 13, 15. He died A. M. 2845, ante A. D. 1156.

II. ABDON, son of Micah, sent by king Josiah to Huldah the prophetess, to ask her opinion concerning the book of the law, lately found in the temple, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20. Some think him to be the same as Achbor, son of Micah, 2 Kings xxii. 12.

III. ABDON, a city of Asher, given to the Levites of Gershon’s family, Josh. xxi. 30. 1 Chron. vii. 43.
Creator, each offered the first-fruits of his labors. Cain, as a husbandman, offered the fruits of the field; Abel, as a shepherd, offered fatlings of his flock. God was pleased to accept the offering of Abel, in preference to that of his brother; (Heb. xi. 4) in consequence of which, Cain Abel, and allowing him to give himself up to envy, formed the design of killing Abel; which he at length effected, having invited him to go into the field, Gen. iv. 8, 9. 1 John iii. 12. It should be remarked, that in our translation no mention is made of Cain inviting his brother into the field:—"Cain talked with Abel his brother; and it came to pass when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him." But in the Samaritan text, the words are express; and in the Hebrew there is a kind of claim, thus:—"and Cain said unto Abel his brother,"—"and it came to pass," &c. without inserting what he said to his brother.

The Jews had a tradition that Abel was murdered in the vicinity of Damascus; and accordingly, his tomb is still shown on a high hill, near the village of Sinieh or Seneiah, about twelve miles north-west of Damascus, on the road to Baalbek. The summit of the hill is still called Nob. Abel; but circumstances lead to the probability that the site was the scene, or in the vicinity of the site, of the ancient Abel or Abila. The legend, therefore, was most likely suggested by the ancient name of the place.

This passage in commenatry of Abel, says, (Heb. xii. 4) "By faith he offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain; by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts; and by it he being dead yet speaketh," even after his offering had been accepted, as one of those saints who had been persecuted for righteousness' sake, and distinguishes him by the title righteous, Matt. xxiii. 35.

II. ABEL. (Heb. 'ebel.) Abel-beth-Maccah, or Abel, a city in the tribe of Simeon, of considerable size and importance, since it is called "a mother in Israel," 2 Sam. xx. 19. For the identity of the city under these three different names, comp. 2 Sam. xx. 14, 15, 18; 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4. The situation of Maccah marks it as belonging to or near to the region Maachah, which lay eastward of the Jordan, under Anti-Lebanon. It is perhaps the Abela mentioned by Eusebius as lying between Paeans and Damascus. R.

ABEL-CARMAIM, or Abil near the houses of Maacah; the same as Abel.

ABEL-CARMAIM, or the Place of the Vineyards, a village of the Ammonites, about six miles from Philadelphia, or Rabbath-Ammon, according to Eusebius, and in his time still rich in vineyards, Judges xi. 33.

ABEL-MAIM, the same as Abel-beth-Maccah, 1 Kings xv. 20. 2 Chron. xvi. 4. See Abel I.

ABEL-MEHALAH, the birth-place of Elisha, 1 Kings xix. 16. It was situated about ten miles south of Scythopolis or Bethshan, (1 Kings iv. 12.) and was celebrated in connexion with Gideon's victory over the Midianites, Judges vii. 22.

ABEL-MIZRAIM, "the place of the Egyptians," previously called "the threshing-floor of Atad," Gen. 1. 11. Jerom places it between Jericho and the Jordan; three miles from the former, and two from the latter, where Bethagha afterwards stood.

ABEL-SHITTIM was in the plains of Moab, beyond Jordan, opposite to Jericho. It is, undoubtedly, the Abila of Josephus, (Ant. v. 1. 1. Bell. Jud. iv. 7. 6.) and lay according to him about 60 stadia or furlongs from the Jordan. Num. xxxii. 40. comp. xxxii. 1. It is more frequently called Shittim alone, Num. xv. 1. Josh. ii. 1. Micah vi. 5. Eusebius says, it was in the neighborhood of mount Peor. Moses encamped at Abel-Shittim before the Israelites passed the Jordan, under Joshua. Here, seduced by Balak, they fell into idolatry, and worshipped Beal-Peor; on account of which God severely punished them by the hands of the Levites, chap. xxix.

ABELA, see ABLIA.

ABEZ, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 20.

ABGAR, a king of Edessa, and of the district Osroene, the seventeenth of the twenty kings who were in this name, and amongst whom appeared the text of the name does not occur in Scripture, but is celebrated in ecclesiastical history, on account of the correspondence which is said to have passed between him and Christ. The legend is, that Abgar wrote to the apostle about his health; and the reply he received caused him to come to Christ. Accordingly, he is said to have sent Thaddeus. Both letters are apocryphal, and may be found in Fabric. Codex Apoc. N. T. p. 317. See also the quarto ed. of Calmet. R.

AB, mother of Hezziak, king of Judah; (2 Kings xviii. 2.) called Abijah, 2 Chron. xxix. 1.

ABIA, in the N. T. the same as ABIAH in the O. T., which see.

ABIAH, second son of Samuel. Being intrusted with the administration of justice, he behaved ill, and induced the people to require a king, 1 Sam. viii. 2.

ABIAHAR, son of Ahimelech, and high-priest of the Jews. When Saul sent his emissaries to Nob to destroy all the priests there, Abiahar, who was young, fled to David in the wilderness, (1 Sam. xxii. 11.) with whom he continued in the character of high-priest, till the time of Solomon, excluding the dignity of the high-priesthood from Ithamar's family to that of Eleazar, by conferring the office upon Zadok. Thus there were, at the same time two high-priests in Israel; Abiahar with David, and Zadok with Saul. This double priesthood continued from the death of Ahimelech till the reign of Solomon, excluding the family of Ithamar, according to the prediction made to Eli the high-priest, 1 Sam. iii. 11, &c.

A difficulty arises from the circumstance, that: 1 Kings ii. 27, Abiahar is said to be deprived of the priest's office by Solomon; while in 2 Sam. vii. 1 Chron. xvii. 16, xxiv. 3, 6, 31, Ahimelech the son of Abiahar is said to high-priest among the Jews. (See one example under ABIGAIL.) In this way also we may remove the difficulty arising from Mark ii. 25, where Abigail is said to have given David the sheaf bread, in allusion to 1 Sam. xxi. seq. where it is Ahimelech.—Others suppose the passage in Mark to be merely a Jewish mode quotation, as if from the "History of Abiathar" Thia, however, does not remove the other difficulties mentioned above; and there are also other objects in opposition to it, arising from the Greek idiom. See Kuin Comm. II. p. 20. R.
ABIB, the first month of the ecclesiastical year of the Hebrews; afterwards called Nisan. It answered to our March, or part of April. Abib signifies green ears of corn, or fresh fruits. It was so named, because corn, particularly barley, was in ear at that time. It was an early custom to name times, as months, from observation of nature; and the custom is still in use among many nations. So it was with our Saxon ancestors; and the Germans to this day, along with the usual Latin names of the months, have also others of the above character: e. g. June is also called Bruckmonath, or month for ploughing; July, Hemonath, or Hay-month; November, Windmonath, or Wind-month, &c. See Month, and the Jewish Calendar.

ABIGAIL, formerly the wife of Nahal of Carmel, and afterwards of David. Upon receiving information of Nahal’s ingratitude to the king, (1 Sam. xxiv. 14, &c.) she loaded several asses with provisions, and, attended by some of her domestics, went out to meet David. Her manners and conversation gained for her his esteem, and as soon as the days of mourning for Nahal’s death, which happened soon afterwards, were over, he made her his wife. The issue of the marriage was, as some critics suppose, two sons, Chilah and Daniel, (2 Sam. iii. 3; 1 Chron. i. 1.) but it is most probable that these names were borne by one person.

ABIGAIL, sister of David, wife of Jether, and mother of Amas, 1 Chron. ii. 16, 17.

ABIHU, one of the two sons of Aaron who were destroyed by fire from heaven, for having offered incense with strange fire, instead of taking it from the altar of burnt offerings, Lev. x. 1, 2.

I. ABIJAH, son of Jeroboam, the first king of Israel. Having been seized with a dangerous disease, his mother disguised herself; and visited the prophet Ahijah to know whether he might recover. Ahijah answered her that he would die, and be the only person in his family who would receive funeral honors, and be lamented by Israel, 1 Kings xiv. 1.

II. ABIJAH, called Abijam, (1 Kings xv. 1.) was the son of Rehoboam, and second king of Judah. He succeeded his father, A. M. 3400, ante A. D. 932, and reigned three years only. In the first book of Kings, he is described as walking in all the sins of his father, and as waging war with Jeroboam, king of Israel. But in 2 Chron. xiii., he is represented as jealously guarding the honor of God, and for the Levitical priesthood. He is also there said to have obtained a decisive victory over Jeroboam.

III. ABIJAH, wife of Abaz, and mother of Hez- kiah, king of Judah; (2 Chron. xxix. 1.) called Abi, 2 Kings viii. 2.

IV. ABIJAH, a descendant of Eleazar, son of Aaron, and head of the eighth of the twenty-four companies of priests, 1 Chron. xxiv. 10; Luke i. 5. ABIJAH, the same as Abijah II.

ABILA, or ABELA. There were several towns of this name in Syria, each of which was called by the Greeks, Leucan, or Leucadia, "white." But the principal one was a town of Colossias, and the capital of Abila, a province of which Lysias was a tributary. Luke, in part of April, Abil, a valley, on the rocky declivity of a mountain, adjacent to the river Chryssorivias, or Barrada, about twelve miles N. W. of Damascus, perhaps on the site of the present village Samaiah, at the foot of the hill on which Abil is said to have been burned. See (Abel.) These rocks were whitish in color, and most of those in Judea are of grey limestone.) They would furnish the Greeks with a reason for giving to Abila the name of Leucadia—"White-rock-town." Compare Weissachus, i. e. White-rock, the name of a German city a few miles W. of Leipzig. It is worthy of remark, too, that Strabo, speaking of the city of Leucadia, in Acrania, says it was so called because of a great white rock in its neighborhood. There are several medals of Abila extant, two of which are of some importance, as they serve to identify the site of the town. On the reverse of one of these is a large bunch of grapes, from which it is to be inferred that the place where it was struck abound ed in vineyards. This agrees exactly with the rocky eminence or declivity upon which we have assumed it to have stood; besides which, Eusebius and Jerome agree that its vineyards were very extensive and rich. But the most remarkable and decisive medal extant is one which bears a half-figure of the river, with the inscription "Chrysoceus Claudisi," and on the reverse a figure of Victory, and the inscription "Leu- cadion," the Greek name of the city. We may also remark, that Abila adding the name of Claudius to its other appellations, as it appears to have done, is a proof that it did, affords a presumption that it was of some importance, and perhaps of considerable magnitude also; and the conjecture receives confirmation from some antiquities and inscriptions which are mentioned by Pococke, as still existing in the neighborhood. See Mod. Traveller, vol. iii. p. 65.

ABILENE, the name of a district of country on the eastern declivity of Antilibanus, from twelve to twenty miles N. W. of Damascus, towards Heliopolis, or Baalbeck; so called from the city Abila, (which see,) and also called Abila, or Abilene of Lysanias, to distinguish it from others. This territory had formerly been governed as a tetrarchy by a certain Lysanias, the son of Poltemy and grandson of Menneus, (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 13. 3,) but he was put to death, (A. C. 30.) through the intrigues of Cleopatra, who took possession of his province, (ib. xiv. 4. 1.) After her death it fell to Augustus, who hired it out to a certain Zenocharus; but as he suffered the country to be infested with robbers, it was taken from him and given to his son, (Joseph. B. J. i. 20. 4; Ant. xx. 10. 1.) At Herod’s death, a part of the territory was given to Philip; but the greater part, with the city Abila, seems then, or shortly afterwards, to have been bestowed on another Lyssanias, Luke iii. 1. He is supposed to have been a descendant of the former Lyssanias, but is no where mentioned by Josephus. Indeed, nothing is said by Josephus, or by any other prose writer, of this part of Abilene, until about ten years after the time referred to by Luke, when Caisura gave it to Agrippa Major, as the tetrarchy of Lyssanias, (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. 10,) to whom it was afterwards confirmed by Claudius, (ib. xix. 5. 1.) At the death of Agrippa, it went, with his other possessions, to Agrippa Minor.

1. ABIMELECH, king of Gerar of the Philistines. This prince, being captivated by the beauty of Sarah, took her into his harem, with the design of making her his wife. In a dream, however, the Lord threatened him with death, unless he immediately restored her to her husband. Abimelech concealed his ignorance of the relation between Sarah and Abram, and early the next day returned her to her husband, and complained of the deception that had been practised upon him by Abram, who had described Sarah as his sister. The King, with great severity, forthwith gave his order for the conduct, stating, at the same time, that although Sarah was his wife, she was also his sister, being of the same father by another mother. Abimelech dismissed them with presents, giving to Sarah, through her husband, a thousand pieces of silver, as a "covering of the eyes," i. e. an atoning present, and as a testimony of her innocence in the eyes of all. Gen. c. xx. See ABRAM.

It has been thought strange that a miraculous interference should have been necessary here, as well as in the case of Pharaoh, (Gen. xii. 14-20,) to convince Abimelech of his criminality in detaining the wife of Abraham; and equally strange that Abraham could not procure Sarah's release by proper application and request. But it must be remembered that God favored Abraham with his constant intercourse and direct protection, and in cases too of less difficulty than the one here in question. It is well known that oriental sovereigns in all ages have exercised the right of selecting the most beautiful females of their kingdoms for the use of their own harams, (Gen. xii. 15; Euth. ii. 3.) and that whenever a woman is taken into the haram of a prince in the East, she is secluded, without possibility of coming out, at least during the life of the prince, and is in fact, comunicated with the women in the haram is hardly to be obtained, and only by means of the keepers, (Euth. iv. 5.) and certainly not, when any suspicion occurs to the guards, to whom is intrusted the custody of such buildings. The whole transaction, then, may be placed in a stronger light than, perhaps, it has usually appeared in, by the following extract from a review of the travels of Peter Henry Bruce, Esq., an officer in the Russian army, under Czar Peter.

"The retreat of the Russians, we are told, was productive of an unfortunate incident to Colonel Pitt, an officer in that army. Immediately on descending from the fatal banks of the Pruth, he lost both his wife and daughter, beautiful women, by the breaking of one of their couch wheels. By this accident, they were so jolted that the ladies were involved and carried off. The colonel applied to the grand vizier, who ordered a strict inquiry to be made, but without effect. The colonel being afterwards informed that they were both carried to Constantinople, and presented to the grand signor, obtained a passport, and went thither in search of them. Getting acquainted with a Jew doctor, who was physician to the seraglio, the doctor told him that two such ladies as he described had lately been presented to the sultan; but that when any of the sex were once taken into the seraglio, they were never suffered to quit it more. The colonel, however, tried every expedient he could devise to recover his wife, if he could not obtain both; until, becoming outrageous by repeated disappointments, they shut him up in a dungeon, and it was with much difficulty he got released by the intercession of some of the ambassadors at that court. He was afterwards told by the same doctor, that both the ladies had died of the plague; with which information he was obliged to content himself, and return at once to Russia." Critical Review, vol. iii. p. 352.

II. ABIMELECH, another king of Gerar, probably a son of the former, and contemporary with Isaac. Having accidentally seen Isaac caressing his wife Rebekah, whom he had called sister, Abimelech reproved him for his dissimulation; and, at the same time, forbade his people to do any injury whatso to Isaac or to his wife. Isaac, increasing in rict and power, excited the envy of the Philistines; a of Abimelech, who was not above it. "It is much mightier than we." Isaac therefore, retired the valley of Gerar, and afterwards to Beerseba where Abimelech, with Ahuzzath, his favorite, a Philcol, his general, visited him. Isaac inquired "Wherefore came ye to me, seeing ye hate me, have I sent away from you?" To which Abimelech replied, that observing how much he was favor by God, he was desirous of cultivating his friend ship, and had come to make a covenant with his and entertained them splendidly; and the next d concluded a treaty with Abimelech, Gen. xx. 8-31.

III. ABIMELECH, son of Gideon by a concubine assumed the government of Shechem after the det of his father, and procured himself to be ancknow edged king; first, by the inhabitants of Sheche where his mother's family had an interest, and afterwards by a great part of Israel. At Gideon's hot in Ophirah, he killed his father's seventy sons, neents of Ephraim, on one stone the youngest, Jotham, or remaining, who, when the people of Shechem asse bled to inaugurate Abimelech, appeared on mount Gerizim, and reproved them by his celebrated fal of the trees. (See JOSTHAM.) After three years, desavad of the house of Jotham, the Shechemites, no reflect on their injustice, and detesting the cruelty of Ab elech, revolted from him in his absence, and laid ambuscade in the mountains, designing to kill h on his return to Shechem. Of this, Abimele received intelligence from Zebul, his governor Shechem. The Shechemites invited Gaal to th assistance, with whom, at a great entertainment, th utterted many imprecations against Abimelech; w having assembled some troops, marched all night towards Shechem. In the morning, Gaal went of Shechem, and gave battle to Abimelech, but w defeated, and, as he was endeavoring to re-enter t city, Zebul repulsed him. Abimelech afterw defeated the Shechemites, destroyed the city, a burnt their tower; but at the attack of the Bez town about seven miles to the S. of Shechem, from the top of the tower threw an upper mill-sto upon his head, and fractured his skull. (See MIL.) He immediately called his armor-bearer, and desir him to slay him, "that men say not of me, A wom slew him." Judg. ix.

IV. ABIMELECH, a high-priest in the time David, (1 Chron. xvii. 16.) the same as Abimelech (2 Sam. viii. 17.) and probably the same as ABAITH which see.

I. ABRAM, the eldest son of Hiel the Betheli Joshua, after having destroyed Jericho, uttered tl imprecation: "Cursed be the man before the Lor that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he sh lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and his youngest son shall he set up the gate of it," Jos. vi. 26. About 537 years after this, Hiel undertook to rebuild the city; and in conformity with the pr diction, he lost his children, 1 Kings xvi. 34. It not expressly said, either in the curse, or in the ra tion, that the children should die; but this is clearly implied. Hiel, it will be observed, is not blamed f his proceeding; his loss is mentioned only as remarkarke fulfillment of a prediction; and it possible that the prediction was unknown to his See BAREN.

II. ABIRAM, one of the three persons who co

viociously raised an altar. But, as both Abraham and Lot had large flocks, they could not conveniently dwell together, and therefore separated; Lot retiring to Sodom, Abraham to the plain of Mamre, near Hebron, Gen. xii. xiii.

Some years after this, Lot being taken prisoner by Chedorlaomer and his allies, then warring against the Kings of Sodom, and the neighboring places, Abraham with his household pursued the conquerors, overtook and defeated them at Dan, near the springs of Jordan, and retook the spoil, together with Lot. At his return, passing near Salem, (supposed to be the city afterwards called Jerusalem,) Melchisedek, king of that city, and priest of the Most High God, came out and blessed him, and presented him with bread and wine for his own refreshment, and that of his army; or, as some have thought, offered bread and wine to God, as a sacrifice of thanksgiving on Abraham’s behalf.

After this, the Lord renewed his promises to Abraham, with fresh assurances that he should possess the land of Canaan, and that his posterity should be as numerous as the stars of heaven.

As Abraham had no children, and could no longer expect any by his wife Sarah, he complied with her solicitations, and took her servant Hagar as a wife; imagining, that if he should have children by her, God might perform the promises which he had made to him of a numerous posterity. Soon after her marriage, Hagar, finding she had conceived, assumed a superiority over her mistress, and treated her with contempt; but Sarah complained to Abraham, who told her that Hagar was still her servant. Hagar, therefore, being harshly treated by Sarah, fled; but an angel, appearing to her in the wilderness, commanded her to return to her master, and to submit to her mistress’s authority. Hagar therefore returned, and gave birth to Ishmael, Gen. xvi.

Thirteen years after the birth of Ishmael, the Lord renewed his covenant and promises with Abraham, changing his name from Abram, or an elevated father, to Abraham, or father of a great multitude; and the name of Sarah, my princess, into Sarah, the princess; that is, of many; no longer confined to one. As a token and confirmation of the covenant now entered into, he enjoined Abraham to be himself circumcised, and to circumcise all the males in his family. He also promised him a son by Sarah, his wife, to be born of him in a year, Gen. xviii.

The enormous sins of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the neighboring cities, being now filled up, three angels were sent to inflict upon them the divine vengeance. Abraham, sitting at the door of his tent, in the valley of Mamre, saw three persons walking by; and, with true oriental hospitality, immediately invited them to take refreshment, washed their feet, and hastened to prepare them meat. When they had eaten, they asked for Sarah. Abraham answering that she was in her tent, one of them said, “I will certainly return unto thee, according to the time of life, and lo! Sarah thy wife shall have a son.” Upon hearing this, Sarah laughed; but one of the angelic visitors rebuked her unbelief, by remarking, “Wherefore did Sarah laugh? Is any thing too hard for the Lord? In a year I will return, as I promised, and Sarah shall have a son.” Gen. xvii. 1—19.

When the angels were ready to depart, Abraham accompanied them towards Sodom, whither two of them were to be sent to destroy the city: and Sarah’s maid returned to tell her husband their journey. The third remained with Abraham, and informed him of the approaching destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. Abraham interceded, praying, that if fifty righteous persons were found therein, the city should be spared; he reduced the number to thirty, but this number, or God, in answer to his prayers, would have averted his design. Lot, being the only righteous person in the city, was preserved from the calamity that destroyed it, Gen. xviii. xix. See Lor.

Sarah having conceived, according to the divine promise, Abraham left the plain of Mamre, and went south, to Gerar, where Abimelech reigned; and again fearing that Sarah might be forced from him, and himself be put to death, he called her here, as he had done in Egypt, sister. (See ABIMELECH.) Abimelech took her to his house, designing to marry her; but God having in a dream informed him that she was Abraham’s wife, he restored her with great presents. Sarah was this year delivered of Isaac, whom Abraham circumcised according to the covenant stipulation. For several years the two wives and the two children continued to live together; but at length Ishmael became apparently jealous of the affection shown to Isaac by his father, so that Sarah insisted that he and his tribe should be dismissed from the family. After very great reluctance, Abraham complied; as God informed him that it was according to the appointments of Providence, for the future ages of the world. About the same time, Abimelech came with Phicol, his general, could not find an alliance with Abraham, who made that prince a present of seven ewe-lambs out of his flock, in consideration that a well he had opened should be his own property; and they called the place Beer-sheba, or “the well of swearing,” because of the covenant then ratified with oaths. Here Abraham planted a grove built an altar, and resided some time, Gen. xx. xxii.

About the year A. M. 2133, God directed Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, on a mountain he should show him. Obedient to the divine command, Abraham took his son, and two servants, and went towards mount Moriah, on which the temple afterwards stood. On their journey, Isaac said to his father, “Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt-offering?” Abraham answered, that God would provide one. When the arrived within sight of the mountain, Abraham left his servants, and ascended it with his son. Having bound Isaac, he prepared to sacrifice him; but when about to deal the blow, an angel cried out to him, “Lay not thine hand upon the lad neither do thou any thing to him. Now I know thou fearest God, since to obey him thou hast not spared thine only son.” Upon looking round him, Abraham saw a ram entangled in the bush l his horns, which he offered as a burnt-offering, in stead of his son Isaac. He called the place Jehovah jireh, or the Lord will see, or provide, Gen. xx 1—14.

Several years afterwards, Sarah died in Hebron where Abraham came to mourn for her, and to perform the funeral offices. He addressed the peop at the city gate, entreating them to allow him to be buried with his wife among them; for, being a stranger, and having no land of his own, he could claim no right of interment in any sepulchre of that country. Therefore, bought of Ephron, one of the inhabitants the field of Machpelah, with the cave and sepulch in it, at the price of four hundred shekels of silver (about $900) and buried Sarah with due solemnities, according to the custom of the country, G. xxiii.
ABRAHAM

Abraham, being reminded by this occurrence, probably, of his own great age, and the consequent uncertainty of his life, became solicitous to secure an alliance between Isaac and a female branch of his own family. Eliezer his steward was therefore sent into Mesopotamia, to fetch from the country and kindred of Abraham a wife for his son Isaac. Eliezer executed his commission with prudence, and returned with Rebekah, daughter of Bethuel, grand-daughter of Nahor, and, consequently, Abraham's niece. The life of the patriarch was prolonged for many years after this event, and he died at the age of 175 years. He was buried by his sons Isaac and Ishmael, in the cave of Machpelah, where he had deposited the remains of his beloved Sarah, Gen. xxiv. xxv. A. M. 2183, ante A. D. 1821.

It appears from the thread of the sacred narrative, that Abraham took Keturah by marriage, and had by her children—Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah—after the death of Sarah, Gen. xxv. 1. This, however, is in itself improbable, his age at that time being 137 years, and his infirmity, long before, such as to render it highly improbable that he would have any children. On these grounds, it has been thought that he married Keturah while Sarah was living, and that the words may be rendered, in the pluperfect tense, "and Abraham had added, and taken a wife," which is worthy of remark, in support of this interpretation, that 1 Chron. i. 32, 33. places the sons of Keturah before Isaac, and calls her concubine, which would hardly have been the case had she been his legitimate wife, taken after the death of Sarah.

In reviewing the history of this eminent patriarch, there are several things worthy attentive consideration.

1. Abraham is introduced rather abruptly in the sacred Scriptures;—"And Jehu said to Abram," (Gen. xii. 1) but it may rationly be concluded, that before a man would undertake a long, fatiguing, and uncertain journey, at the command of another, he would be well assured of the authority which commanded him. It seems reasonable, therefore, to infer, that God had previously spoken to Abraham—perhaps often, though by what means we know not. However, we learn from other sources of information besides the Scriptures, that about this time Chaldea became polluted with idolatry; and it is therefore most probable that a principal reason for Abraham's quitting his own country, was his dread of this evil. At that time idolatry was not equally prevalent in Egypt; and the countries which were distant from the great cities, or had but little intercourse with them, were still less infected with it. This accounts for Abraham's travelling northward, instead of taking the direct road, which communicated through Carmania between Babylon and Egypt. Undoubtedly, the prevalence of idol-worship, made Abraham, for his own personal quiet, and that of his family, to seek a country less polluted than the dominions of Nimrod; and so far, no doubt, he may be said to have had a direct motive; but every thing leads to the conclusion, that he had also an express direction to the same purpose.

2. Previous to his journey, Abraham was a man of property, Gen. xii. 5. He was no adventurer for a fortune, but, having already enriched his wealthy part, had many dependants, most of whom, probably, accompanied him to his new residence. The dignity and power of Abraham are incidentally stated in the story of his rescuing Lot. He must have been a man of no trifling possessions, who had three hundred and eighteen servants born among his property, whom he could entrust with arms, Gen. xiv. 14. It implies, that he also had many not born in his house, but bought with his money; some also, doubtless, were old; some were women, and some children; these together make a considerable tribe. In fact, Abraham appears to correspond exactly to a modern emir; to possess many of the rights of sovereignty in no small degree; and to be little other than an independent prince, even while dwelling on the territories of sovereign princes, who greatly esteemed him. 3. As the incident of Abraham calling Sarah sister is liable to ambiguity, and has suffered by being placed in false lights, to the greater discredit of Abraham than is just or necessary, a few thoughts may be well bestowed on it. It has been affirmed by some writers, that by this conduct Abraham exposed Sarah to the danger of adultery; and that she seemed too easily to consent, by passing for his sister, and not his wife. In Abraham, there is thought to have been lying, disguise, and too great ainess to hazard his wife's chastity; and in her, too great forwardness of compliance. Chrysostom, who seriously endeavored to excuse him, acknowledges, that the patriarch exposed Sarah to the danger of adultery; and that she consented to this danger, to save the life of her husband. It deserves consideration, however, how far this might be a custom derived from the earliest ages of mankind; for as in the first, so also in the second infancy of the human race, the relations of blood were so very far, that it was little short of inevitable for the nearest in blood to intermarry; and it is by no means incredible, that some families had made a point of maintaining themselves distinct from others, by this custom; and that they chose to be thus restricted to the branches of their own family, (cousins, &c.) as afterwards among the Jews the restriction was enlarged to their own tribe. Augustine makes an apology for Abraham, saying, 1st. That he did not lie, by describing Sarah as his sister, as indeed she was; he only concealed a truth which he was not obliged to discover, by not calling her his wife. 2dly. That being exposed at the same time to two dangers, one of losing his life, the other of having his wife taken from him, and not being able to avoid, either by acknowledging her as his wife, but thinking it at least probable that he should escape death, by acknowledging her for his sister; of two evils he chose what seemed to him the lesser. But, independent of these considerations, it should be recollected, that every nation, and often every family, has its own manners; which appear not merely singular, but uncouth, to those not accustomed to them, and which, occasionally, are mistaken by casual observers. It is not usual in England, nor does it appear to have been so in Egypt, or in Canaan, for a husband to call his wife sister; but it seems to have been customary among the Hebrew families to use this term, and others of near consanguinity, for a more general relation than they strictly import. See Father, Brother, Sister, and also for a wife, a companion. —For example: We find Abram twice using this mode of speech, and twice experiencing the same and benefit from it. When finding Lot in the same appellation, with at least equal apparent art, and under the same apprehension, in the same place where Abram had used it. We recollect no other instances equally ancient; but it is observable, that the bridegroom, in the Canaanites, does not call his bride wife, but always sister. Now, whatever allowances, or of whatever kind, the poetical style may require; or whatever liberties of speech it may take, it must at least possess, as essential to it, a correspondence to the manners it depicts. This mode of adressing, then, was certainly founded on these manners. In later ages, we find Tobias calling his wife sister; (Tobit viii. 4.) "Sister, arise, and let us pray:"—and verse 7, "I take not this my sister for lust." These instances tend to prove, that it was nothing unusual for husbands to express affection for their wives, by calling them sister in familiarity, and in private. To return to Abraham: there seems to be no necessity for supposing, that the use of this appellative, but to have sprung when he thought to Egypt with Sarah. It was his general request, long before; (Gen. xx. 13.) but he now again desired Sarah to use the title brother, (as had been customary between them in private,) in ordinary discourse, when speaking of Sarah and Abrahah in that he thought of her with whom she might converse. What these Egyptian women reported of her beauty and manners, with such accidental night of her as might occur to the chief officers of Pharaoh's house, induced Pharaoh to take her into his harem, and give her apartments in his harem; but it does not appear that he ever saw her. Thus Sarah's calling Abraham brother, as was likely to have been the immediate cause of her being taken from him, as his calling her sister. That the nobleness, or at least the behavior of his officers, seems too much to justify Abraham's suspicion of the Egyptian manners. On the whole, so far as relates to this transaction in Egypt, while it is ascribed to the officers of Pharaoh, it is, indeed, held as an act of art and management, it must be equally admitted, that his fear was too well founded. Nor does it seem to have overcome his faith, as some have said; nor to have put him out of the regular custom of his life; but by Sarah; and Abraham in that yielded to her denial application in public of what had been his custom in private, though, perhaps, by this very prudence, he ran at least as great a risk from the anger of Pharaoh, when he dismissed him without delay, as he might have done, had he trusted entirely to the, ordinary course of things, and followed the simple path of his duty. The same effects seem connected with the same circumstances in the story of Abimelech, Gen. xx. 2. See Abimelech I.

Now, from this custom and practice of the Arabs, it is easy to see, that among the nations around him, Abraham took no other wife but that of his youth; and this, as it should seem, from his very great affection for Sarah. His connexion with Hagar was not proposed by himself, but by Sarah; and Abraham in that yielded to her wishes, rather than to his own. The same we find practised by Leah and Rachel, the wives of Jacob, who gave their handmaids to their husband, and considered themselves as having children by this substitution. (See Adoption.) Auch frequented. I myself, in my journey from Loheia to Beita el Fakah, was for several hours in such a public house in the village Meneyre, with all my fellow-travellers, servants, camel-drivers, and ass-drivers. The sheik of this village, that his house, was not only more hospitable Arab of this virtue.—A mere traveller, who wished to visit a sheik of rank in the desert, might expect, according to oriental custom, to live at the expense of the sheik during his stay, and perhaps to receive a present at his departure. In some of the villages, there are free caravanserais, or taverns, where all travellers may have lodging, food, and drink, for some days, without charge; provided they will put up with the common fare of the Arabs; and these houses are frequented by merchants, who have a house, was, not only more civil, as to come to US himself, and cause a better meal than usual to be set before us, but he also besought us to remain with him for the night."

The following is more specific, from La Roque: (Voyage dans le Levant, p. 124 seq.) "When strangers enter a village where they know no one, they inquire for the Menzel, (or house for the reception of strangers,) and desire to speak to the sheik, who is the lord of it; after saluting him, they signify their want of a dinner, or of a supper and lodging in the village. The sheik says they are welcome, and that they could not do him a greater pleasure. — But they seldom have occasion for all this; for as soon as the people of the village see any strangers coming, they inform the sheik of it, who goes to meet them, and, having saluted them, asks if they would dine in the village, or whether they choose to stay the whole night there. If they answer they would only eat a morsel, and go forward, and that they choose to stay under some trees or in the barn out of the village, the sheik goes or sends his people into the village, to cause a collation to be brought, and in a little time they return with eggs, butter, curds, honey, olives, fruit, fresh or dried, according to the season. If it is evening the women of the sheik's house never fail to cause fowls, sheep, lambs, or a calf to be killed and prepared, — which they send to the Menzel by the sheik's servants.

To the same purpose is the ensuing extract from Burchardt's Travels in Syria, p. 384. describing his visit to the little city of Kerak, in the region east of the Dead Sea. They have eight Menezes for the reception of strangers. A stranger takes up his lodging at one of these, one of the people present declares that he intends to furnish that day's entertainment, and it then his duty to provide a dinner or supper, which he sends to the Menzel, and which is always sufficient for a large company. A goose or lamb is generally killed on the occasion; and barley for the guest's horse is also furnished. When a stranger enters the town, the people almost come to blows with one another in their eagerness to have his horse, and under the shade of the oaks. That Abrah-ahm's tent was not the same as Sarah's tent, but placed at some little distance from it, as is the custom in the East; and also, that his guests gradually discovered themselves to Abraham. "Where is Sarah thy wife?" — How should entire strangers know his wife, and her name? and wherefore interfere in his domestic matters? "Sarah," says Abraham, "is in her tent." No doubt this excited Sarah's attention; — to which purpose it was adapted, and for which it was intended. Then one of them continued. "When I come this way again next year, I shall find her better engaged; she will not then be so much at leisure, but be caressing a son." Such may be thought the import of the expressions, freely taken. On hearing this, Sarah laughed; (Gen. xviii. 1—12) probably from a notion that the speaker knew nothing about her. Then, for the first time, "the Lord" speaks, reasoning, that the Lord could do any thing; and repeating, that Sarah should have a son. Thus, by Sarah's detection, a token of some extraordinary person as the speaker was given to her and to Abraham; and the circumstances, though not altogether miraculous as yet, are well calculated to excite attention and apprehension in the minds of those interested; especially if Abraham, who had so lately received the covenant from God, understood any allusion to it, or any mention of it, under these ambiguous expressions, which greatly resemble those used not long before; if so, then by this time he might begin to discern something of the dignity of his guests. At least, he must now have recollected his dream, and what his angel had said about going out and doing the things which had passed hitherto, does not demonstrate that they were super-human. Abraham, therefore, pleased and interested with their conversation, probably desirous of further information, and to be the honor to his countrymen and well-doing strangers to accompany them a part of the way towards Sodom; — and about the dusk of the evening, when the day was closing, he perceived on one who said with him, and the others having departed, those signs and tokens, brightening as it were, as if they were the image of a celestial being. Some have thought, that beside the person spoken to, the Abrahakseel appeared: it might be so; but it seems more probable, that this person who addressed Abraham, and who pronounced himself the sacred Abrahakseel to appear, and, without leading Abraham to suppose he had seen Jehovah, might yet convince his mind, that he had seen his commissioned messenger. If such honors might be gained by hospitality, the apostle might properly write to the Galatians, that they might take example of such as had unawares entertained angels. Such an afternoon, such an evening, emply repay the most liberal hospitality! Heb. xiii. 9. This kind of ambiguity, brightening into certainty, seems well suited to the circumstances of the subsequent conversation between Abraham and his glorious visitor. Had Abraham conceived that he was speaking immediately to Jehovah, that had left no room for reasoning, or representation; and he could not address a mere stranger, a mere stranger, a messenger of the sacred and distinguished guest, by such honorable terms as he bestows on the person with whom he converses. The principle of thus representing this part of the history, seems to be confirmed by the accuracy of distinction preserved in the original. The text then says, "Abraham stood before Jehovah," (ver. 23,) "and Jehovah spake," ver. 26, &c. Abraham, however, never uses this term in addressing this person, but merely Adonai. "Behold I have spoken to Adonai," ver. 27, &c. Probably, therefore, here is a further instance of the "unawares" with which Abraham entertained angels; since, though he perceived the dignity of his guest to be great, it was in reality, much greater than he understood. He saw the human exterior of this appearance fully; but the interior, or super-human, he saw very imperfectly and ambiguously; and, indeed, human nature could see it no otherwise. 7. Abraham's faith, respecting his son Isaac, when commanded to offer him for a burnt-sacrifice, has been so often urged and illustrated, as to need no enlargement here. — We may, however, remark, that Abraham, under these circumstances — as having a son in his old age, born after the covenant, and in consequence of that alliance, on whose issue depended invaluable promises, who was now arrived at man's estate, who was his heir, who was his mother's favorite—must have been well convinced, that he followed no idle phantasy, no illusive injunctions from any him, for the images of human nature, the unconning feelings of the aged patriarch, all protested against such a deed. The length of the journey, the interval of time, the discourse of Isaac, all augmented the anguish of the parent; unless this parent were well satisfied with his own mind, that he acted in obedience to authority fully and completely divine.

8. The Orientals, Indians, and Infidels, as well as Christians and Mahomedans, have preserved some knowledge of Abraham, and highly admired his character. See D'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 12. Indeed, a history of his life, though it would be highly fascinating, might easily be compiled from their traditions. The Persian magi believe him to have been the same as Mithra, Zoroaster; while the Zabians, their rivals and opponents, lay claim to a similar honor. Some have affirmed that he reigned at Damascus; (Nicola. Damasc. apud Joseph. lib. i. cap. 7. in Suidas. lib. xxvii.)—that he dwelt long in Egypt; (Armean. Enopeler. apud Useb. Prepar. lib. ix. cap. 17, 18.)—that he taught the Egyptians astronomy and arithmetic; (Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 8.)—that he invented letters, in the beginning to keep kings, (Suidas. in Abraham,) or the characters of the Syrians and Chaldeans; (Isidor. Hispal. Orig. lib. i. cap. 3.)—that he was the author of several works; among others, of the famous book entitled Jezeb., or the Creation, a work innocent in its design, for he leaves his son Rabbins; but those who have examined it without prejudice, speak of it with contempt. In the first ages of Christianity, the heretics called Sechius published "Abraham's Revelations;" (Epigraph. Anac. p. 25.) Athanasius, in his Syntagma, speaks of the "Assumption of Abraham," and Origen in Luc. Homil. 35.) notices an apocryphal book of Abraham's, wherein two angels, one good, the other bad, dispute concerning his damnation or salvation. The Egyptians, while moving to his temple, made tribute to him the Morning Prayer, the 89th Psalm, a Treatise on Idolatry, and other works.—The authorities on all these points, and for still other traditions respecting Abraham, may be found collected in Fabric. Cod. Paphlagon. v. T. 1. p. 344 seq.

We are informed (article Ben Scholman, D'Herbelot) that, A. D. 1119, Abraham's tomb was discovered near Hebron, in which Jacob, likewise, and Isaac, were interred. The bodies were found entire, and many gold and silver lamps were found in the place. The Mahomedans have so great a respect for his tomb, that they make it their fourth pilgrimage (the three others being Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem.) (See Hernon.) The Christians built a church over the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham was buried; which the Turks have changed into a mosque, and forbidden Christians from approaching. (Quar. Elmid. tom. ii. page 772.) The supposed oak of Mamre, where Abraham received the three angels, was likewise honored by Christians, as also by the Jews and Pagans.

Our Saviour assures us that Abraham desired earnestly to see his day, and that he saw it, and was glad, John viii. 56. Elsewhere, he represents the happiness of the righteous as a sitting with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; (Matt. viii. 11.) also a reception into Abraham's bosom, as into a place of rest, opposed to the misery of hell, Luke xvi. 22. The emperor Alexander Severus, who knew Abraham only by the works which the Jews and Christians related of him, and to whom so high an idea of him, that he ranked him, with Jesus Christ, among his gods. ABEALOM, son of David, by Maccabah, was the handsomest man in Israel, and had the finest head of hair, 2 Sam. xiv. 25. When his hair was cut at a certain time, because it incommended him, its weight was 300 shekels, by the king's standard; that is, probably about 30 ounces—an extraordinary, but not incredible, weight. Amnon, another of the king's sons, having violated his sister Tamar, Absalom resolved to revenge her dishonor, but for some time had no opportunity to carry his design into effect. At the end of two years, however, he invited all the royal family to a sheering-feast, at Baal-hazor, where Amnon was assembled in large numbers. Incommending of his father's displeasure, Absalom retired to Geshur, where he continued for three years, under the protection of the king, his grandfather, 2 Sam. xii. Joab having procured David's consent, Absalom returned to Jerusalem, although he was not permitted to come into the presence of the king. For two years he remained in disgrace, but at length David, at the intercession of Joab, again received him into favor, ch. xxvii. 2.

Absalom now, considering himself as presumptive heir to the crown, set up a magnificent equipage; and every morning came to the palace gate, where, calling to him familiarly all who had business, and came to demand something, he exacted his tribute from them; but those who have examined it without prejudice, speak of it with contempt. In the first ages of Christianity, the heretics called Sechius published "Abraham's Revelations;" (Epigraph. Anac. p. 25.) was yet breathing, and hanging on the oak, ten of Joah's armed bearers also smote him. His body was cast into a pit, and a heap of stones raised over it, 2 Sam. viii. 1-17.

Absalom, having lost his children, and being desirous to perpetuate his name in Israel, erected a pillar in the king's valley, 2 Sam. xvi. 18. Josephus says (Ant. vii. 10. 3.) it was a marble column, standing about two furlongs from Jerusalem. A monument bearing his name, is still shown in the valley of Jehoshaphat, but is evidently not of ancient origin.

ABSTINENCE, a voluntary and religious forbearance of any thing towards which there is an inclination; but generally spoken of with regard to forbearance from necessary food. Many persons have supposed, that the antediluvians abstained from wine, and from flesh as food, because the Scripture expressly notices, that Noah, after the deluge, began to plant a vineyard, and that God permitted him to eat flesh; (Gen. ix. 3. 20.) whereas he gave Adam no other food than herbs and fruits, i. 25. But the opposite opinion is supported by Calmet and other interpreters, who believe, that men, before the deluge, abstained from neither wine nor flesh. The Scriptures certainly represent violence as being the prevailing crime before the deluge; that is, the unjustifiable taking away of human life; and the precepts given to Noah against the shedding of blood, seem to confirm this idea. The Institutes of Menon inform us, that animal food was originally used only after sacrifice, and as a participation consequent upon that rite.

The Mosaic law ordained, that the priests should abstain from wine during the time they were employed in the temple-service, Lev. x. 9. The same abstinence was enjoined on Nazarites, during the whole time of their separation, Numb. vi. 3, 4. The Jews abstain from several sorts of animals, specified by the law; as do several other nations. (See Animals.) Among the primitive Christians, some abstained from meats prohibited by the law, and from flesh sacrificed to idols; others disregarded such forbearance, and used their Christian liberty. Paul has given his opinion concerning this, in 1 Cor. viii. 7-10. and Rom. xiv. 1-3. The council of Jerusalem, held by the apostles, enjoined believers, converted from heathenism, to abstain from blood, from meats
strangled, from fornication, and from idolatry, Acts
xvi. 20.

Paul says, (1 Cor. ix. 25.) that wrestlers, in order to obtain a corruptible crown, abstain from all things;
or from every thing which might weaken them. In his First Epistle to Timothy, (iv. 7.) he blames certain heretics, who condemned marriage, and the use of meats, which God had created. He requires Christians to abstain from all appearance of evil; (1 Thess. v. 22.) and, with much stronger reason, from every thing really evil, and contrary to religion and piety.

ABYSS, or DEEP. (1.) Hell, the place of punishment, the bottomless pit, Luke viii. 31; Rev. iv. 1;
x. 7. &c. (2.) The common receptacle of the dead;
the grave, the deep (or depths of the) earth, under which the body being deposited, the state of the soul residing thereto, still more unseen, still deeper,
still further distant from human inspection, is that more remote from human influence no traveller returns;" See Rom. x. 7. (3.) The deepest parts of the sea, Ps. lxviii. 22; xci. 26. (4.) The chaos, which, in the beginning of the world, was uniformed and vacant, Gen. i. 2.

The Hebrews were of opinion (as are many of the orientals) that the abyss, the sea and waters, encumpered the whole earth; that the earth floated upon the abyss; like a melon swimming on and in the water. They believe that the earth was founded upon the waters, (Psalm xxii. 2; xxxiii. 6. 7; xxxvi.
6.) or, at least, that it had its foundation on the abyss.
Their Sheol, however, or place of the dead, is in the interior of the earth, in those dark and dangerous
where the prophets describe the kings of Tyre, Babylon, and Egypt, as lying down, that is, buried, yet suffering the punishment of their pride and cruelty. See Hells, and Giants.

Fountains and rivers, in the opinion of the Hebrews, are derived from the abyss, or sea; issuing from thence through invisible channels, and returning through others, Ecc. i. 7.

ACCAD, a city built by Ninrod, Gen. x. 10. The LXX write it Ared; the Syriac Achar. Ephraim the Syrian says, Achar is the city Nisibis; and in this he is followed by Jerome and Athanasius. The Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan read Nisibin.
The antiquity of this city is unquestionable.

ACCEPT, to take pleasure in; either in whole, or in part. The phrase to accept the person of any one, as also to respect the person, &c. (which see) is a Hebrew idiom, found also in the New Testament, and signifies to regard as worthy. It is used both in a good and bad sense; e. g. in a good sense, Gen. xix. 21; Job
xl. 8; Mal. i. 3; in a bad sense, to show partiality, Job
xiii. 8. 10; xxxv. 21; Psalm lxxvii. 2; Prov. xviii. 5.

ACCHO, or Achi, a city of Judah, Judg. i. 31.
In the New Testament, Accho is called Potemaios, (Acts xxii. 7.) from one of the Polemians, who enlarged and beautified it. The Christian crusaders gave it the name of Acre, or St. John of Acre, from a magnificent church which was built within its walls, and dedicated to St. John. It is still called Akka, by the Turks. When Syria was subjected by the Romans, Akka was made a colony by the emperor Claudius. It sustained several sieges during the crusades, and was the last fortified place wrested from the Christians by the Turks.

The town is situated on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, on the north angle of a bay to which it gives its name, and which extends in a semicircle of three leagues, as far as the point of Mount Carmel.
The town was originally surrounded by triple walls,
and a fosse cut out of the rock, from which, at present, it is a mile distant. At the south and west sides it was washed by the sea, and Pococke thinks that the river Belus, which flows into the Mediterranean, was brought through the fosse, which ran along the ramparts on the north; thus making the city an island. Since the time of its memorable siege by Buonaparte, Accho has been much improved and strengthened. Its present population is esti-ated at from 18,000 to 20,000. See Mod. Traveller, i. p. 20.

Accho, and all beyond it northwards, was considered as the heathen land of the Jews.

There are several medals of Accho, or Potemaios, extant, both Greek and Latin. Most of the former have also the Phenician name of the city, ΑΚ or Accho. The one here given (as also others) re-resents the head of Alexander the Great, and appears to have been coined in consequence of favors received from that prince, perhaps at the time when he was detained in Syria by the siege of Tyre.

ACELDAMA, (the field of blood,) a small field, lying south of Jerusalem, where the priests purchased with the thirty pieces of silver that Judas had received as the price of our Saviour's blood, Matt. xxvii. 8; Acts i. 19. Pretending that it was not lawful to appropriate this money to sacred uses, because it was the price of blood, they purchased with it the potter's field, to be a burying-place for strangers. Helena, the mother of Constantine, had part of the field covered over for the purpose of receiving the dead, and it was formerly thought, that such was the sarcophagus virtue in the earth, that the bodies were consumed within the space of two or three days. It is now used as the sepulchre of the Armenians, and is called Heliopolis. See Mod. Traveller, i. p. 159. Miss. Herald, 1824. p. 66.

ACHAIA, taken in its largest sense, comprehended the whole region of Greece, or Hellas, now called Livania. Achaia Proper, however, was a province of Greece, of which Corinth was the capital; and embracing the whole western part of the Peloponnesus. It is worthy of remark, that Luke speaks of Galio as being deputy (proconsul) of Achaia, at the time that Paul preached there, (Acts xviii. 12,) which was, indeed, the title borne by the superior officer in Achaia at that time, but which did not long continue, nor had it long been so at the time he wrote. See Kuinoel on Acts xviii. 12.

ACHAICUS, a native of Achaia, and a disciple of the apostle Paul. He, with Stephanus and Fortunatus, was the bearer of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, and was recommended by the apostle to the churches at Achaia for the Tenth of Holophernes, he became with fury, answered him, "Since you have taken upon you to be a prophet, in telling us that the God of Israel would be the defender of his people, to show you there is no other god besides Nebuchadnezzar, my master, w. H. we have, but all these are as the edge of the sword, we will destroy you likewise, and you shall understand that Nebuchadnezzar is lord of all the earth." Achior was then carried out near to the city, and left bound, that the inhabitants might take him alive, and sell him to the Chaldeans, for which they conceived Achior, and Ozias, one of the leaders of the people, received him into his house, where he continued during the siege. After the death of Holophernes, and the discomfite of his army, Achior abandoned the heathenish superstitions, and was received into Israel by circumcision, Judith xiv. 6, seq.

ACHISH, king of Gath. David, having resolved to withdraw from the dominions of Saul, who sought his life, retired to Gath, a city of the Philistines; (1 Sam. xxv. 10,) but the officers of Achish having discovered his person, and expressed their jealousy of his character, David became alarmed, and feigned madness, and by this stratagem preserved his life.

Three or four years after this, David desired to be received, for a permanency, either into the royal city, or elsewhere in the dominions of Achish. The king, who knew his valor, and the animosity between him and Saul, willingly received him into Gath, with 600 men, and their families, and afterwards gave him to Zilla the daughter of Sevvi, xxxvii. 8, seq., for his wife.

ACHIMETA. Exod. vi. 2. "There was found at Achimeta a roll."—Achimeta is here the same with Ecbathana, the royal city, where, in the palace, the rolls were kept. So the Vulgate, which reads Ecbathana; and 1 Esdras vi. 20; also Josephus, Antiq. xiii. 7.

ACHOR, χάρ, a ravine, a valley in the territory of Jericho, and in the tribe of Benjamin, where Achan was stoned, Josh. vili. 34; xv. 7; Isaiah lxv. 10; Judges ii. 15. The name was still in use in the time of Jesus the holy place; and for which reason it was called Achor.

ACHSHAH, daughter of Caleb, who promised to give her as a reward to him who should take Kirjath-sepher. (See DOWRY.) Othiel, his brother's son, saving that town, married Achshah, and obtained from Caleb the gift of a field having the mountain on which it stood;—a valuable addition to Kirjath-sepher, Josh. xvi. 16; Judges i. 19. See Water, and Wells.

ACHZIB, a city of Asher, Josh. xil. 90; xix. 25. Its site is unknown.

I. ACHZIB, a city in the plain of Judah, Josh. xv. 44; Micah i. 14.

II. ACHZIB, a city on the seacoast of Galilee, said to be the city of Acher, but not conquered by them, Josh. xix. 39; Judges i. 31. According to Eusebius and Jerome, it lay about nine miles north of Ptolemais, or Acco; and after was afterwards called Ecippus, Josh. B. J. i. 18. 4. It is now called Zib. Med-Tovyease, ii. p. 29.

ACRA, a Greek word, signifying, in general, a citadel, in which sense it is also used in the Chaldee and Syriac. King Antiochus built a citadel at Jerusalem, on an eminence north of the temple, which commanded the temple and the holy place; and for which reason it was called Acra. Josephus says (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 7. & 14; lib. xiii. cap. 11.) that this eminence was semicircular, and that Simon Maccabæus, having expelled the Syrians, who had seized Acra, demolished it, and spent the years in levelling the mountain on which it stood; that no situation in future should command the temple. On mount Acra were afterwards built the palace of Helena, queen of the Adiabeneans; Agrippa's palace, the place where the public records were lodged, and that where the magistrates of Jerusalem assembled, Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 15; Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 7.

I. ACRABATENE. A district or topharchy of Judæa, extending between Shechem (now Napoleopolis) and Sebaste, and reaching to the sea, about twelve or fifteen miles in length. The name is not found in Scripture, but occurs in Josephus, B. J. ii. 12. 4; iii. 3, 4, 5.

II. ACRABATENE, or ACRABATITE, a district on the frontier of Idumea, towards the southern extremity of the Dead sea. It seems to be named from the Mandæus Aerobrim, or Hill of Scorpions, mentioned (Josh. xv. 3) as the southern extremity of the tribe of Judah.—It is found only in 1 Maccab. v. 3.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, a canonical book of the New Testament, written by Luke, and containing a considerable part of the history of Peter and Paul. The narrative begins at the ascension of our Saviour; and continues to Paul's arrival at Rome, after his appeal to Caesar; with his residence of two years in that capital; including about twenty-eight or thirty years. After Luke had given the history of Jesus Christ in his Gospel, he resolved to record the actions of the apostles, and the wonderful manner in which the Holy Spirit established that church which Christ had redeemed. Clemens (in Alex. page 28) calls the "Gospel of the Holy Ghost," Chrysostom (in Alex. Homil. 1) calls it, "the Gospel of our Saviour's resurrection," or "the Gospel of the risen Jesus Christ." It narrates most miraculous instances of the power of the Holy Spirit, attending the propagation of the gospel; and in the accounts of his first believers, we have most excellent patterns of a truly Christian life. So that, though Luke seems to give us but a plain narrative of facts, yet this divine physician, to use Jerome's expression, offers as many remedies to heal the soul's diseases, as he speaks words, Ep. 103.

It is believed that Luke's principal design in writing the Acts, was to preserve a true history of the apostles, and of the infancy of the Christian church; and to show to his readers how the Holy Spirit worked in them through their sufferings. He was himself a soldier, and has given us the history of his own wanderings, and his adoption by the church. Luke wrote this book, probably, about A. D. 64; i.e. soon after the point of time at which the narration terminates. The place where it was written is unknown.

The style of Luke is generally more pure and elegant than that of other parts of the New Testament. Epiphanius says (Heres. xxx. cap. 3 & 6.) that this book was translated by the Ebionites out of Greek into Hebrew; (that is, Syriac, the then common language of the Jews in Palestine) but that he has been so corrupted by heretics, as to be in many respects tedious, injurious to the character and memory of the apostles.

The Book of the Acts has always been esteemed canonical. (Theol. i. v. canon. Marc. cap. 1, 2.) though the Marcionites, the Manichees, and some other heretics rejected it, because their errors were too clearly condemned by it. Augustine (Ep. 315.) says, the church received it with edification, and read it every year. Chrysostome explains that in his time, it was too little known, and the reading of it too much neglected. As for himself, he very much extols the advantages of an acquaintance with it, and maintains, with good reason, that it is as useful as the Gospels.

In order to read the Acts of the Apostles with intelligence and profit, it is necessary to have a sufficient acquaintance with geography, with the manners of the times and people referred to, and with the leading historical events of the age. The Romans, with the nature and names of the public officers they established, and the distinctions among them, must of necessity be understood; as well as the disposition and political conduct and opinions of the unconverted Jews, which obtained, which obtained, strongly, among the Christianized Hebrews, and maintained themselves as distinctions, and causes of separation in the church, during many ages. In fact, their consequences are hardly extinct in the East at this day.

There were several spurious acts of the apostles. (1.) The Acts of the Apostles supposed to have been written by Abdius, who represents himself as a bishop, ordained at Babylon, by the apostles, when they were on their journey into Persia; but which is neither ancient nor authentic; it was not known to Eusebius, to Jerome, nor to any earlier father. The author says, he wrote in Greek, and that his book was translated into Latin by Julius
ADAM

Africanus; who is himself a Greek writer. He cites Hegesippus, who lived in the second century. (2.) The Acts of St. Peter, otherwise called Travels of St. Peter, (Peri Petri,) or "The Recognitions of St. Clement," is a book filled with visions and falsehoods, which came originally from the school of the Ebionites. See Cotelerius, in his Fathers of the first Century; likewise Fabricius’s Cod. Apocr. N. T. page 750, &c. (3.) The Acts of St. Paul, were composed after his death, as a supplement to St. Luke; continuing his narrative from the second year of the apostle’s first voyage to Rome, to the end of his life. Eusebius, who had seen this work, calls it spurious. (4.) The Acts of st. John the Ev- an-gelist, mentioned in Epiphanius and Augustine, contains credible stories called apocryphal. It was used by the Encratites, Manichees, and Priscillianists. They are thought to be the Acts of St. John, published among the forgeries of Abila. (Epiph. Hieras. 47. Aug. de Fide, cap. 4. and 405. Contra pag. 39. &c.) (5.) The Acts of St. Andrew, received by the Manichees, Encratites, and Apotheocetes. See Epiphanius, Hieras. 42, 61, and 62. (6.) The Acts of St. Thomas: Augustine, cites some things out of them, and says, the Manichees particularly used them. (7.) The Acts of St. Philip, was a book used by the Gnos-otics. (8.) The Acts of St. Matthias. See M. de Tillemont, Eccl. Hist. tom. i. p. 1186; and Fabricius’s Cod. N. T. p. 782. The authorities respecting all these spurious works, as well as of the Acts of Pilate, are collected in Fabrici Cod. Apocr. N. T. vol. i, ii.

ADADA, a city in the south of Judah, Josh. xv. 36.

ADAD-RIMMON, or HADAD-RIMMON, a city in the valley of Jezreel, where the fatal battle between Josiah, king of Judah, and Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, (2 Kings xxii. 29; Zech. xii. 11.) was fought. It is seventeen miles from Cesarea in Palestine, and ten miles from Jezreel. See Bib. Repository, vol. i. p. 602.

ADAM, red, the proper name of the first man. It has always the article, and is therefore originally an appellative. The word ἄνδρας, (as Adamah, earth, from the verb ἄραμ, to be red, [in Ethiop. to be beautiful],) is not improbable, when we take into account the reddish or brown complexion of the orientals. But the word Adam may also be primitive. R.

The Almighty formed Adam out of the dust of the earth, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and gave him dominion over all the lower creatures, Gen. i. 26; ii. 7. He created him in his own image, and having pronounced a blessing upon him, placed him in a delightful garden, that he might cultivate it, and enjoy its fruits. At the same time, however, he gave him the following injunction:—"Of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." The first recorded exercise of Adam’s power and intelligence was his giving names to the beasts of the field, and fowls of the air, which the Lord brought before him for this purpose. A short time after this, the Lord, observing that it was not good for man to be alone, caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and while he slept, took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh; and of the rib thus taken from man he made a woman, (WOMAN, SAXON,) whom he presented to him when he awoke. Adam received her, saying, "This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man." (Heb. דְּנָה, man, דְּנָה, woman.) He also called her name Eve, דַּנְא, because she was the mother of all living.

This woman, being seduced by the tempter, per- med her husband to eat of the forbidden fruit. When called to judgment for this transgression be- fore God, Adam blamed his wife, "whom," said he, " thou gavest me;" and the woman blamed the ser- pent-tempter. God punished the tempter by degra- diating him with the history of painful hoping and a situation of submission ; and the man by a life of labor and toil; of which punishment every day wit- nesses the fulfilment. As their natural passions now be- came irregular, and their exposure to accidents great, Con- nunciation was stowed on Adam, and for his wife. He also expelled them from his garden, to the land around it, where Adam had been made, and where was to be their future dwelling; placing at the east of the garden a flame, which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life, Gen. iii. 22. It is not known how long Adam and his wife con- tinued in paradise: some think, many years; others, not many days; others, not many hours. Shortly after their expulsion, Eve brought forth Cain, Gen. iv. 1, 2. Scripture notices but three sons of Adam: Cain, Abel, and Seth, and omits daughters: but Moses tells us, "Adam begat sons and daughters;" no doubt many. He died, aged 930, Gen. v. 31.

This word, we learn from Moses, was not dissatisfied with his concise relation, propose a thousand inquiries relating to the first man; and cer- tainly no history can furnish more questions, as well of curiosity as of consequence.

In reviewing the history of Adam, there are several things that demand particular notice.

1. The formation of Adam is introduced with cir- cumstances of dignity superior to any which at- tended the creation of the animals. It evidently ap- pears (whatever else be designed by it) to be the intention of the narrator, to mark this passage, and to lead his readers to reflect on it. God said, "Let us make man, (1.) In our image; (2.) According to our likeness; and let him rule," &c. Gen. i. 26. These seem to be two ideas, and our image in our similitude. This could not refer to his figure (1.) Because the human figure, though greatly supe- rior in formation and beauty to animals, is not so er- rely distinct from them in the principles of con- struction, as to require a special consideration about it, after the animals had been formed. (2.) If all the species of monkeys were made before man, the re- semblance in some of them to the human form greatly strengthens the former argument. (3.) The Scriptures, elsewhere, represent this distinction: referring to moral excellency; " in knowledge—after the image of him who created him," Col. iii. 1. "The new man, which, according to God, (εφιμερισμενον, created in righteousness and true holiness," Eph. ii. 24. In other places, also, the comparison turns: his purity, his station, &c. Secondly, "According to our likeness," is a stronger expression than the form, and more determinate to its subject. If we confine this with the following words, and that the import of the passage may be given thus:—"M shall have, according to his nature and capacity.

general likeness to such of our perfections as fit him for the purposes to which we design him; but he shall also have a resemblance to us, in the rule and government of the creatures; for, though he be incapable of any from our mind that knowledge, a purity, a rectitude, and a station of dominion, in which he may be our viceroy. Thus, then, in a lower and looser sense, man was the image of God; possessing a likeness to him in respect to moral excellency, of which the creatures were absolutely void; and having also a resemblance to God, as his deputy, his representative, among and over the creation; for which he was qualified by holiness, knowledge, and other intellectual and moral attributes.

As the day on which creation ended was immediately succeeded by a sabbath, the first act of man was worship; hence the influence and extent of the custom of setting apart a sabbath among his posterity; since not in paradise only would Adam maintain this right.

2. "Adam became a living soul," by which we understand a living person, (1.) Because such is the import of the original, simply taken: (2.) Having meant by the former of our ideas that knowledge (rather than earth), is a reason why the sacred writer should here mention his animation. But, (3.) It is very possible, that it implies some real distinction between the nature of the living principle, or soul, (not spirit,) in Adam, and that of animals. May we suppose that this principle, thus especially imparted by God, was capable of immortality; that, however the beasts might die by nature, man would survive by nature? that he had no inherent seeds of dissolution in him, but that his dissolution was the consequence of his sin, and the execution of the threatened, "dying thou shalt die?" In fact, as Adam lived nearly a thousand years after eating the fruit, which, probably, poisoned his blood, how much longer might he have lived, had that poison never been taken by him? See DEATH.

3. The character, endowments, and history of Adam, are very interesting subjects of reflection to the whole human race; and the rather, because the memorials preserved of him, of such a one as has been committed to us, are but brief, and consequently obscure.

In considering the character of Adam, the greatest difficulty is, to divine ourselves of ideas received from the present state of things. We cannot sufficiently divine, without the great regeneration of the human race; it is the only method of subdividing the subject, and which we have acquired by experience. We should, nevertheless, remember, that however Adam might be a man in capacity of understanding, yet in experience he could be but a child. He had no cause to distrust any, to suspect fraud, collusion, prevarication, or ill design. Where, then, is the wonder, if entire innocence, if total unsuspicion, should be deceived by an artful combination of appearances? by fraud and guile exerted against it? But the disobedience of Adam is not the less inexplicable on this account; because, as was his situation, such was the test given to him. It was not an active, but a passive duty; not something to be done, but something to be forborne; a negative trial. Nor did it regard the mind, but the appetite; nor was that appetite without fit, yea, much fitter, supply in abundance all around it. Unwarrantable presumption, unrestrained desire, liberty extended into licentiousness, was the principle of Adam's transgression.

4. The breaking of a beautiful vase, may afford some idea of Adam after his sin. The integrity of his mind was violated; the first compliance with sin opened the way to future compliances; grosser temptations might now expect success; and thus spotless purity becoming impure, perfect uprightness becoming warped, a Grace which had been its glory. Hereby Adam relinquished that distinction, which had fitted him for immediate communion with supreme holiness, and was reduced to the necessity of soliciting such communion, mediately, not immediately; by another, not by himself; in prospect, not instant; in hope, not in possession; in time, not in time present; in another world, not in "this. It is worthy of notice, how precisely the principles which infatuated Adam have ever governed his posterity; how suitable to the general character of the human race was the nature of that temptation by which their father fell!

5. It is presumable that only, or chiefly, in the garden of Paradise, were the prime fruits and herbage in perfection. The land around the garden might be much less finished, and only fertile to a certain degree. To promote its fertility, by cultivation, became the object of Adam's labor; so that in the sweat of his brow, he himself did eat bread. But the sentence, "Thy eyes shall be opened, and thou shalt eat of every tree of the garden," was doubtless regarded them as the representatives, the very concentration, of their posterity, the whole human race; and after attaching to themselves, it seems, prophetically also, to suggest the condition of the sexes in future ages, g. d. "The female sex, which has been the means of bringing death into the world, shall also be the means of bringing life—posterity—to compensate the ravages of death—and, to remind the sex of its original transgression, that which shall be its greatest honor and happiness shall be so dimensioned by no slight inconveniences. But the male sex shall be under the necessity of laboring for the support, not of itself only, but of the female and her family; so that if a man could with little exertion provide for himself, he should be far greater exertions, to toil, to sweat, for the advantage and support of those to whom he has been the means of giving life."

6. Death closes the sentence passed on mankind; and was also prophesied of an event which did not befall to Adam, and to all his descendants. But see how the favor of God mitigates the consequences announced in this sentence! It inflicts pain on the woman, but that pain was connected with the dearest comforts, and with the gift of a daughter (that will not subtlety) which we have acquired by experience. We should, nevertheless, remember, that however Adam might be a man in capacity of understanding, yet in experience he could be but a child. He had no cause to distrust any, to suspect fraud, collusion, prevarication, or ill design. ADAM

The Talmudists, Cabalists, Mahomedans, Persians, and other Eastern peoples, relate many fabulous stories relative to the creation and life of Adam, some of which may be seen in the larger edition of Calmet.

I. ADAM was the name of a city near the Jordan, not far from Zarethan; at some distance from which the waters of Jordan were collected in a heap, when the children of Israel passed through, Josh. iii. 16. The name was not improbably derived from the color of the clay in its neighborhood, which was used for casting the vessels of the temple, 1 Kings vii. 46.

ADAMAH, a city of Naphthali, Josh. xix. 36. The LXX call it Armath; the Vulgate, Edoma.

ADAMANT, νεώ χαμιρ, a name anciently used for the diamond, the hardest of all minerals. It is used for cutting or writing upon glass and other hard substances, etc. Jer. xvii. 1. It is also employed figuratively, Ezek. iii. 9; Zech. vii. 12. The same name of the diamond is common in Arabia.—Others suppose it to be the semiris, or emery.

ADAM, a city of Naphthali, Josh. xix. 33.

ADAMITES, a heretical sect of the second century, who affected to possess the innocence of Adam, and whose nakedness they imitated in their churches, which they called Paradise. Its author was Prodicus, a disciple of Carpocrates.

I. ADAR, the twelfth month of the Hebrew ecclesiastical year, and the sixth of the civil year. It has twenty-nine days; and nearly answers to our February and March, according to the Rabbins. (See Months, and the Jewish Calendar.) As the lunar year, which the Jews follow in their calculation, is shorter than the solar year by eleven days, which after three years make about a month, they then insert a thirteenth month, which they call Ve-Adar, or a second Adar, to which they assign twenty-nine days.

II. ADAR, a city on the southern border of Judah, Josh. xv. 3. In Numb. xxxiv. 4. it is called Hazar-Addar, or the court of Adar.

ADARSA, ΑΔΑΡΣΑ (1 Macc. vii. 40), a city of Ephraim, four miles from Beth-horon, and not far from Gophna, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 17; Esseb in Adar. Perhaps, between the upper Beth-horon and Diospolis; because it is said (1 Macc. vii. 45), the victorious Simon pursued the Syrians from Adar to Gedara, or Gaza, which is one day's journey. Adarsa is also called Adazer, and Adacco, or Acedo, in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 17. and de Bello, lib. i. cap. 1. Here Nicana was over-run, and his army put to flight by Judas Maccabeus, notwithstanding he had 3000 men only, while Nicana had 35,000. Josephus tells, that, Judas, in another war, was killed in this place, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 1.

ADDAR, see ADAR II.

ADDER, see ASP, and SERPENT.

ADIBÉNE, a region of Assyria, frequently mentioned by Josephus, whose queen Helena and her son Izzates were made converts to Judaism, Joseph. Antiq. xx. 2.

ADIDA, a city of Judah, where Simon Maccabeus encamped to dispute the entrance into the country with Tryphon, who had treacherously seized Jonathan at Pтолemia, 1 Macc. xii. 38 xiii. 12.

ADITHAIM, a city of Judah, whose situation is not known, Josh. xv. 36.

ADMAH, the most easterly of the five cities of the plain, destroyed by fire from heaven, and after

ADORAI, Art. Lord, Master, old plural form of the word, similar to that with the suffix of the first person; used as the pluralis excellens by way of dignity for the name of Jehovah. The same form, with the suffix, is also used of men; as of Joseph’s master, Gen. xxx. 2, 3, and of Joseph himself, Gen. xlv. 30, 33; so Isaiah xix. 4. The Jews, out of superstitious reverence for the name Jehovah, always, in reading, pronounced Adoni when Jehovah is written; hence the letters are usually written with the points belonging to Adonai.

ADONI-BEZEK, i. e. the lord of Bezek, king of the city Bezek, in Canaan, seventeen miles N. E. from Naperole, toward Scythopolis. — Adoni-bezek was a powerful and cruel prince, who, having slain Gibeon, and having seized their cattle, plundered their flocks, attacked their town, and wounded several of their people, fled abroad to the city of Bezek, which took refuge in it. The Israelites, under the leadership of Joshua, marched on against Bezek, hoping to capture the king of that city. The proposal was made to the king of Bezek to give himself up to the Israelites, which he strenuously refused to do. The king was put to death, and his city taken. The inhabitants of Bezek were disposed to surrender themselves, from fear of being cut off, like those of Gibeon, and also their right hands; but a barbarity the Gibeonites had threatened them with, unless they would surrender within five days! (Asiat. Researches, vol. ii.) Another resemblance to the history of the men of Bezek; who, after seven days and an interval, were cut off and their hands and feet devoured by Pharaoh’s horses, is in the story of the inhabitants of the town of Cirripit, and to cut off the noses and lips of every one, even the infants who were found in the arms of their mothers; ordering, at the same time, all the noses and lips that had been cut off to be preserved, that he might ascend how many souls there were; and to change the name of the town to Nisbatapers, which signifies the town of cut noses. The order was carried into execution with every mark of horror and cruelty, none escaping but those who could play on wind instruments; many put an end to their lives in despair; others came in great bodies to us in search of medicines; and it was most shocking to see so many living people with their teeth and noses resembling the skulls of the deceased, i. e. by being bare; because deprived of their natural covering. (Asiatic Researches, vol. ii. page 187.) The learned reader will recollect an instance of the same barbarity, in the town which, from that circumstance, was named Rhesocolura, or "cut noses" between Judea and Egypt. See Rhinocolura.

ADONIYAH, fourth son of David, by Haggith, was born at Hebron, while his father was acknowledged as king of only part of Israel, 2 Sam. iii. 3, 4. His elder brothers, Ammon and Absalom, being dead, Adonijah believed the crown by right belonged to him, and made an effort to get it acknowledged by the people; but his father’s death. For this purpose he set up a magnificent equipage, with chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him; and contracted very close engagements with Joab the general, and Abiathar the priest, who had more interest with the king than any others. Having matured his plans, Adonijah made a great entertainment for his adherents, near the fountain Kogel, east of the city, and below the wall, to which he invited all the King’s sons, except Solomon; and some principal persons of Judah, except Nathan, Zadok, and Benaiah, who were not of his party. His design was at this time to be proclaimed king, and to assume the government before the death of David. Neither, however, having obtained a knowledge of his design, went with Bathsheba to the king, who informed him of Adonijah’s proceedings, and interceded in favor of Solomon. David immediately gave orders that Solomon should be proclaimed king, which was presently done, and the intelligence so alarmed Adonijah and his party, that they dispersed in great confusion. Fearing that Solomon would put him to death, Adonijah retired to the tabernacle, and laid hold on the horn of the altar. Solomon, however, generously pardoned him, and sent him home, 1 Kings i.

Some time after David’s death, Adonijah, by means of Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, intrigued to obtain Abiaha, the recent wife of his, and being Solomon, suspecting it to be a project to obtain the kingdom, had put him to death, 2 Sam. xii. 26, et c. A. D. 1014.

ADONIRAM, the receiver of Solomon’s tributes, and, chief director, 1 Kings iv. 26; and also the prince sent to Lebanon, to cut timber, 1 Kings v. 14. The name Adoniram is made from this word by contraction, and applied to the same person, who was receiver-general from David until Rehoboam, 2 Sam. xvi. 8; 1 Kings xi. 2. He is also called Adoniram, 2 Chron. x. 18, 20.

ADONIS. According to the Vulgate, Ezek. viii. 14 imports that this prophet saw women sitting in the temple, weeping for Adonis; but the Hebrew reads, for Tammu-z, an idol among the Egyptians. Adonis was adored under the name of Osiris, husband of Isis. The Greeks worshipped Isis and Osiris under other names, as that of Bacchus; and the Arabians under that of Adonis:

Ogygia me Bacchum canit;
Osyrin Egyptus vocat; Arabica gena, Adonisum.

Australis.

But he was sometimes called Ammuz, or Tammu-z, the concealed, to denote, probably, the manner of his death, or the place of his burial. (Pride Phatarch de Delecta Oracul.) The Syrians, Phrygians, and Cyprians called him Adonis. The Hebrew women, therefore, of whom Ezekiel is speaking, celebrated the feasts of Tammu-z, or Adonis, in Jerusalem; and God showed the prophet those women weeping, even in his own sacred temple, for the supposed death of this infamous god.

The Rabbis tell us, that Tammu-z was an idolatrous prophet, who having been put to death by the king of Babylon, all the idols of the country flocked...
ADONI-ZEDEK, i.e. Lord of Righteousness, a king of Jerusalem, who made an alliance, with four other kings of the Amorites, against Joshua. A great battle was fought between Gibon, where the Lord aided Israel by a terrific hail-storm, and Joshua commanded the sun to stand still. The five kings were signally defeated, and having hid themselves in a cave at Makkodah, were taken by Joshua and put to death.

Jos. chap. x. R.

ADOPTION is an act by which a person takes a stranger into his family, in order to make him a part of it; acknowledges him for his son, and constitutes him heir of his goods. Adoption was not in general use among the Hebrews, as Moses says nothing of it in his laws; and Jacob's adoption of his two grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh, (Gn. xlvii. 5) was a kind of substitution, whereby he intended that his grandsons, the two sons of Joseph, should have each his lot in Israel, as if they had been his own sons: "Ephraim and Manasseh are mine; as Reuben and Simeon they shall be mine." As he gives no inheritance to their father Joseph, the effect of this adoption extended only to the increase of fortune and inheritance; that is, instead of one part, giving them (or Joseph, whom they represented) two parts.

Another kind of adoption in use among the Israelites, consisted in the obligation one brother was willing to take to marry the widow of another who died without children; so that the children born of this marriage were regarded as belonging to the deceased brother, and were by his name, Deut. xxv. 5; Matt. xxii. 24. This practice was also customary before the time of Moses; as we see in the history of Tamar, Gen. xxvi. 8. See Marriage.

But Scripture affords instances of still another kind of adoption—that of a father having a daughter only, and adopting her children. (1 Chron. ii. 21.) Machir, (grandson of Joseph,) called "Father of Gilead, that is, chief of that town," gave his daughter to Hezron, who took her; and he was a son of sixty years, (sixty years of age,) and she bare him Segub; and Segub begat Jair, who had twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead, which, no doubt, was the landed estate of Machir, who was so desirous of a male heir. Jair acquired a number of other cities,

How is this? Zedekiah is called, in Kings and 1 Chronicles, "the son of Josiah." In 2 Chronicles he is called, "the son of Jehoiakim." . . . By way of answer, we may observe, that perhaps Zedekiah was son, by natural generation. But thereby he was grandson to Josiah; but might not his grandfather adopt him as his son? We find Jacob doing this very thing to Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph; "as Reuben and Simeon they shall he mine," and they, accordingly, are always reckoned among the sons of Jacob. In like manner, if Josiah adopted Zedekiah, his grandson, to be his own son, then would this young prince be reckoned to him; and both places of Scripture are correct; as well that which calls him son of his real father, Jehoiakim, as that which calls him son of his adopted father, Josiah. That this might easily be the fact, appears by the dates; for Josiah was killed c.s. A.D. 605, at which time Zedekiah was eight or nine years old; he being made king c.s. A.D. 594, when he was twenty-one. By this statement the whole difficulty, which has greatly perplexed the learned, vanishes at once. [This mode of accounting for the apparent discrepancy in question, rests wholly on conjecture, and is of no certainty. We have only to take the word brother in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10, in the wider and not unusual sense of kinmen, relative, and the difficulty vanishes much more easily than before. Thus in Gen. xiv. 16, Abraham is said to have "brought back his brother Lot," although Lot was really his nephew. In the same manner in Gen. xxix. 13, 15, Jacob is said to be the brother of Laban, his uncle. B.]

It should seem, then, that in any of the instances above quoted, the party might be described, very justly, yet very contradictorily:—as thus,

1. Jar was son of Manasseh . . . .
2. Jar was begotten by Judah.
3. Attai was son of Sheban . . . .
4. Attai was begotten by Jarha.
5. Esther was daughter of Mordecai . . .
6. Esther was begotten by Abihail.
7. Moses was son of Pharaoh's daughter . .
8. Moses was begotten by Amram.
9. Obad was son of Naomi . . . .
10. Obad was the child of Ruth.

This kind of double parentage would be very perplexing to us, as we have no custom analogous to it; and possibly it may be somewhat intricate where it was practised; however, it occurs elsewhere, beside in Scripture.—We have a singularly striking instance of it in a Palmyrene inscription, copied by Mr. Wood, &c. who remarks, that it is much more difficult to understand than to translate: — "This," says he, "will appear by rendering it literally, which is easiest done into Latin," thus:

"Senatus popularese Ailamene, Pani filiun, Mocimi nepotem, Eranae pronepotem, Mocimi cognaticem; et Eranae patrem ejus, virum pios et patriae amicos, et omnino placet patrie patris patriaque diis, hono- ris gratia: Anno 450, mensis Aprilis."

"Our difficulty is, that Eranes is called the father of Ailamenes [whereas Ailamenes is himself called] the son of Panus." Wood's account of Palmyra.

The sense of this inscription may be thus rendered:

"Erated by the senate and the people to Ailamenes, the son of Panus, grandson of Mocimus, great-grandson of Eranes, great-great-grandson of ADOPTION

Mattheus; and to Eranes, (his then Alisalamene's) father; pious men, and friends to their country; and, &c.
Now this is precisely the case of Joseph, the supposed father of Jesus;—of whom Matthew says,
"Jacob begat Joseph;" but Luke calls Joseph "the son of Heli;"—unless, as is more probable, Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary. This contradiction in the inscription is so very glaring, that we are persuaded it is no contradiction at all, but must be explained on principles not yet acknowledged by us; for no man could possibly, under direction of the senate and people, in a public monumental inscription, and in the compass of a few short lines, call Alisalamene the son of Phares, and call Eranes the father of Alisalamene, without perceiving the gross error in which he involved as well himself as his country, the senate and people his employers, and all his readers!

This descent struck Dr. Halifax so much, who copied the same inscription, (Phil. Trans. No. cccvii. p. 83.) that he observes upon it, "This custom of theirs, of running up their genealogies or pedigrees to the 4th or 5th generation, shows them to have borrowed some of their facts as from their near-boors the Jews, with whom it is not unlikely they had old great commerce; and perhaps many of them were descended from that people, Zenobin herself being said to have been a Jewess; or else this must have been the manner of all Eastern nations.—The reader will recollect that Palmyra is usually thought to be the "Tadmor" of Solomon, (1 Kings xix. 19; 2 Chron. vii. 6.) which is its present name.

The date is that of the Greeks, from the death of Alexander the Great; as the Syrians generally date; the very Christians, at this day, following the same usage. It is 450, or A. D. 128." So that it is near enough to the age of Joseph and Mary. But it is generally thought the date is from the era of the Seleucidae, some years later, that is, beginning about A. D. 312.

We think this yields a fair argument, and worthy the consideration of the learned among the Jews, who have objected to the genealogies in the evangelists.

We learn from various writers that the custom of adoption is frequent in the East. Lady Wortley Montague says, (Letter xiii.) "Now I am speaking of their law, I do not know whether I have ever mentioned to your country, I mean ADOPTION, very common among the Turks, and yet more among the Greeks and Armenians. Not having it in their power to give their estate to a friend, or distant relation, to avoid its falling into the grand seignior's treasury, when they are not likely to have any children of their own, they choose some pretty child of either sex, amongst the meanest people, and carry the child and its parents before the judge, and there declare they receive it for their heir. The parents at the same time renounce all future claim to it; a writing is drawn and witnessed, and a child thus adopted cannot be dismembered. Yet I have seen some common beggars that have refused to part with their children in this manner to some of the richest among the Greeks; (so powerful is the instinctive affection that is natural to parents;) though the adopting fathers are generally very tender to those children of their souls, as they call them. I own this custom pleases me much better than our adoption, for curing our nation.' Methinks it is much more reasonable to make happy and rich an infant whom I educate after my own manner, brought up (in the Turkish phrase) upon my knees, and who has learned to look upon me with a filial respect, than to rear a child by the providence of others without merit or relation to me, other than that of a few letters. Yet this is an absurdity we see frequently practised."

We request the reader to note, in this extract, the phrases "brought up upon me, and took me up." Will this give a determinate sense to the awkward expression (in our version, at least) of Rachel, "My maid Bilhah shall bear upon my knees?" what can we understand by this phrase? but may we take it—"shall bear (children) upon my knees?" that is, to be nursed by me, to be reared by me as if I were their natural mother—an infant whom I educate after my own manner," as Lady Montague explains it. This seems a proper rendering of the passage. We think also the phrase (Gen. l. 52.) "the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees," expresses a greater degree of fondness now than it has done before;—was not this something like an adoption? does it not imply Joseph's partiality for Manasseh? which is perfectly consistent with his brother's dying Jacob, (Gen. xlvi. 18,) when he wished his father to put his right hand on the head of Manasseh, the eldest to whom, and to whose posterity, he still maintains his warmest affection, notwithstanding the prophetic notice of Ephraim's future precedence given him by the venerable patriarch.

Among the Mohammedans, the ceremony of adoption is sometimes performed by causing the adopted to pass through the skirt of the person who adopts him. Hence, to adopt is among the Turks expressed by saying—"to draw any one through one's shirt;" and they call an adopted son, Abidoglu, the son of another life—because he was not begotten in this. (D'Herbelet, Bibl. Orient. ii. 21.) Something like this is observable among the Hebrews: Elijah sets Eliasha by throwing his mantle over him. (1 Kings xix. 13.) and when Elijah was carried off in a fiery chariot, his mantle, which he left fall, was taken up by Eliasha his disciple, his spiritual successor, and deemed successor in the office of prophet. 2 Kings ii. 15. It should be remarked also, that Eliasha asks not merely to be adopted, (for that he had already,) but to be treated as the elder son, to have a double portion (the elder son's prerogative) of the spirit conferred upon him and peculiar to the country.

There is another method of ratifying the act of adoption, however, which is worthy of notice, as it tends to illustrate some passages in the sacred writings. The following is from Pitu;—"I was bought by an old bachelor; I wanted nothing with me; meat, drink, and clothes, and money, I had enough. After I had lived with him about a year, he made his pilgrimage to Mecca, and carried me with him; but before we came to Alexandria, he was taken sick, and thinking verily he should die, having a woven girdle about his middle, under his saaf, (which they usually wear,) in which was much gold, and also my letter of freedom, (which he intended to give me, when at Mecca,) he took it off, and bid me put it on about my neck, and put it on himself. My patron would speak, on occasion, in my behalf, saying, My son will never run away. He seldom called me any thing but son, and bought a Dutch boy to do the work of the house who attended upon me, and obeyed my orders as much as his. I often saw several bags of his money a great part of which he said he would leave me
He would say to me, 'Though I was never married myself, yet you shall be [married] in a little time, and then your children shall be mine.'"—Travels to Mesopotamia, p. 30.

This circumstance seems to illustrate the conduct of Moses, who clothed Eleazar in Aaron's sacred vestments, when that high-priest was about to be gathered to his fathers; indicating thereby, that Eleazar succeeded in the functions of the priesthood, and was, as it were, adopted to exercise that dignity. The Lord told Shechem, captain of the temple, that he would deprive him of his honorable station, and substitute Elakim, son of Hilkiah: (Isaiah xxii. 11.) "I will dash him, with thy rod, with the Lord, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand." And Paul in several places says, that Christians—"put on the Lord Jesus; that they put on the new man," to denote their adoption as sons of God, Rom. xiii. 14; Gal. iii. 27; Ephes. iv. 12; Col. iii. 10. The same, John i. 12; i Epist. John iii. 2. (See Son.) When Jonathan made a covenant with David, he stripped himself of his girdle and his robe, and put them upon his friend, 1 Sam. xviii. 3.

By the propitiation of our Saviour, and the communication of his merit, sinners became adopted children of God. Thus Paul writes, "Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." Rom. viii. 14, 15. We are foreordained before the foundation of the world to be children of God." And, "God sent forth his Son to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Gal. iv. 4.

ADORAIM, a city in the southern part of the tribe of Judah, fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 9. In the time of Josephus, it belonged to the Idumeans, Ant. viii. 3; xiii. 17. Compare 1 Macc. xiii. 20.

ADORAM, see Adoram.

ADRA, see ABRAD.

I. ADRAMMELECH, magnificient king, son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, (Isaiah xxxvii. 38; 2 Kings xix. 37) who, upon returning to Nineveh, after his fatal expedition into Judea, against Hezekiah, was killed by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sarezer, who fled to the mountains of Armenia. A. M. 3291, ante A. D. 713.

II. ADRAMMELECH, one of the gods adored by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, who settled in Samaria, in the stead of those Israelites who were carried beyond the Euphrates. They made their children pass through fire in honor of this false deity, and of another called Anammelech, 2 Kings xvii. 31. The Rabbins say, that Adrammelech was represented under the form of a mule. The more general opinion is, that Adrammelech represented the sun, and Anammelech the moon. At any rate, they seem to be the personifications of some of the heavenly bodies. See Genesis, Thes. Heb. p. 29, Comm. lib. Jes. iv. p. 347.

ADRAMYTIUM, a maritime town of Mycia, in Asia Minor, opposite to the island of Lesbos, (Acts xxvii. 2.) and an Athenian colony. It is now called Adramyttion. From some of the medals struck in this town, it appears that it celebrated the worship of Castor and Pollux, (Acts xxviii. 11) as also of Jupiter and Minerva.

ADRIA, an ancient city of Italy, on the Tartaro, in the state of Venice. It gave name to the Adriatic sea, or the sea of Adria, Acts xxvii. 27.

It appears from the narrative of Paul's voyage, just referred to, that although the name of Adria belonged in a proper sense only to the sea within the Adriatic gulf, it was given in a looser manner to a larger extent, including the adjacent and neighboring parts. Thus also Ptolemy says, (lib. iii. cap. 4.) that Sicily was bounded east by the Adriatic, and (cap. 16,) that Crete was washed on the west by the Adriatic sea; and Strabo says, (lib. vii.) that the Ionian gulf is a part of that which in his time was called the Adriatic sea.

ADRIAN, the fifteenth emperor of Rome. This prince is not mentioned in the New Testament, but some interpreters are of opinion that he is alluded to in Rev. viii. 10, 11. Where Barchochebas, the famous Jewish impostor, is thought to be foretold, (but without sufficient grounds.) The Jews having created several disturbances in the reign of Trajan, Adrian sent a colony to Jerusalem, for the purpose of keeping them in subjection, and also built within the walls of the city a temple to Jupiter. Not enduring that a strange colony should occupy their city, and introduce a foreign religion, the Jews began to murmur, about A. D. 134, and Barchochebas, who about the same time made his appearance, in the assumed character of the Messiah, animated them in their rebellion against the Romans. The presence of Adrian, who was at this time in Syria or Egypt, restrained in some measure their proceedings, but after his return to Rome, they fortified several places, and prepared for a vigorous resistance. Their proceedings, and the great increase in the numbers of the sedition, induced Adrian to send Timotheus Rufus into Judea. The Roman general married against them, and a dreadful slaughter ensued. The Jews fought desperately, and Rufus having been defeated in several conflicts, Adrian sent to his assistance Julius Severus, one of the greatest generals of his age. Severus besieged Beith or Bethoron, where the Jews had entrenched themselves, which he at length took, and put many to the sword. Others were sold as cattle, at the fairs of Mamre and Gaza; and the rest were sent into Egypt, being forbidden, under a severe penalty, to return to their own city. Jerome (in Zach. xi. 7,) applies to this calamity the words of the Jews to Zachariah: "I will feed the flock of slaughter." And the Hebrew doctors apply Jer. xxxii. 15: "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and weeping; Rachel weeping for her children." See Ezra.

The number of Roman soldiers and auxiliary troops that perished in the course of this war, which lasted, as Jerome and the Rabbins say, three years and a half, (Hieronym. in Dan. ix. Basmage Hist. des Juifs, tom. ii. page 134,) or, as others suppose, only two years, was very great. Dio remarks, that the emperor, in writing of the termination of the war to the senate, did not use the common form in the beginning of his letters, "If you and your children are in good health, I am glad of it; I and the army are in good condition;" in consequence of the great losses he had sustained. Dio. lib. 69, page 794.

After this revolt, Adrian finished the building of Jerusalem, and changed its name to Aelia, which see.

ADRIEL, son of Bazzilai, married Merab, daughter of Saul, who had been promised to David, 1 Sam. xviii. 19. Adriel had five sons by her, who were delivered to the Gibeonites to be put to death before the Lord, to avenge the cruelty of Saul, their great ancestor. (2 Sam. xxii. 8.) It imports, that these five were sons of Michael and Adriel; but either the name of Michal is put for Merab, sister of Michal, or, more probably, Michal had adopted the sons of her sister Merab, who was either dead, or incapable, from some cause, of bringing up her children. Perhaps, too, both sisters may have borne the name of Michal.

ADULLAM, a city in the valley or plain of Judah, the king of which was killed by Joshua. Josh. xii. 15. xx. 35. Eusebius, mistaking it for Eglon, places it ten miles east of Eleutheropolis; Jerome, eleven. Rehoboam rebuilt and fortified it, (2 Chron. xi. 7.) and Judas Maccabeus encamped in the adjacent plain, 2 Mac. xii. 38. When David withdrew from Achish, king of Gath, he retired to the cave of Adullam, 1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13.

ADULTERY is a criminal connection between persons who are engaged to keep themselves wholly to others; and in this it differs from, and exceeds the guilt of, fornication, which is the same intercourse between unmarried persons. Fornication may be, in some sense, covered by a subsequent marriage of the parties; but adultery cannot be so healed; and hence it is used by God to signify the departing of his own people (that is, of those who were under engagement to him) from his worship to that of other gods, to associate with strangers.—Hence God compares himself to a husband jealous of his honor; and hence the adoption of vile opinions and practices is compared to the worst kind of prostitution. It is an argument ad hominem, not merely to the Jews, but to human nature at large, against the flagitious wickedness of forsaking God and his worship for false gods.

By the law of Moses, adultery was punished with death, both in the man and the woman who were guilty of it. (Lev. xx. 10.) and a most extraordinary ordeal was prescribed for the trial of a woman whose husband suspected her of this crime. After having been duly admonished in private, to induce her to confess her infidelity, she was brought before the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, where various expedients, of a very solemn and imposing nature, were resorted to for the same purpose. If she still maintained her innocence, and her husband continued to press it, she was then compelled to drink the waters of jealousy, as prescribed in Numb. v. 14, seq.

This mode of trial or proof, which is described by Moses in so exact and circumstantial a manner, is one of the most extraordinary things that can be imagined, and could not be practised without a constant and perpetual miracle. It cannot be doubted, but that the wiser men of the nation must have disapproved of it, and that Moses allowed it to the Jews only because of the hardness of their hearts; having probably been used to see such kinds of trials among the Egyptians, or other nations, and fearing worse, or greater violence, if this had not been permitted.

It is well known that the Eastern people have long had a custom of making those undergo several kinds of trial, whom they suspected of crimes, the discovery of which could not be effected in the usual way. The most common of these proofs are those by red-hot iron, and by boiling water. They are very frequent at this time in China. When a man is accused of a capital crime, he is asked whether he is willing to undergo either of these trials. If he submit, they put upon his hand seven leaves from a certain tree, and upon those leaves they clap a red-hot iron. He holds it there for a certain time, and then throws it into a leather pouch, which they seal with the seal of the magistrate. At the end of three days, if the hand is found to be sound and well, he is declared innocent, and his accuser is condemned to pay a mark of gold to the use of the prince. The trial by water is performed by throwing a ring into a kettle of boiling water: if the person accused can take it out from thence with his hand, without suffering any harm, he is pronounced innocent. ("A Voyage to China, in the Ninth Age," page 57. notes, page 150. Comp. Asiat. Research, vol. iv.) This way of proof was not unknown to Sophocles, (Antigon. ver. 274.) and it was long used among Christians in Europe, (Dusance. Lexic. Ferrum candens; Juret. in Not. ad Yvon. Carnut.; Buluz. in Not. ad Capitular.) who even pretended to make it pass for a harmless and a religious rite; and we find masses and prayers said on these occasions. The Caffres oblige those who are suspected of any capital crime to swallow poison, to lick a hot iron, or to drink boiling water in which certain bitter herbs have been infused. The negroes of Loango and of Guinea, the Siamese and other Indians, have the same superstition, and are thoroughly persuaded that these trials do no harm to any who are innocent. Mr. Hastings, in his account of the ordeal trials of the Hindoos, states the trial by the coha to be as follows:—"The accused is made to drink three draughts of the water, in which the image of the sun, of Devi, and other deities, have been washed for that purpose; and if, within fourteen days, he has any sickness, or indisposition, his crime is considered as proved." Asiat. Researches, vol. i. p. 79.

The precise import of this ceremony can be only matter of conjecture. It seems to have contained the essence of an oath, varied for the purpose of peculiar solemnity; so that a woman would naturally hesitate to comply with such a form, understood to be an appeal to Heaven of the most solemn kind, and to be accompanied, in case of perjury, by most painful and fatal effects. From Mungo Park, we learn that a similar ordeal still obtains in Africa, as the following passages from his journal serve to show.

"At Baniesoule, one of our slaves (slave merchants) returning to his native town, as soon as he had seated himself on a mat, by the threshold of his door, a young woman (his intended bride) brought a little water in a calabash, and kneeling down before him, desired him to wash his hands: when he had done this, the girl, with a tear of joy sparkling in her eyes, drank the water; this being considered as the greatest proof she could possibly give him of her fidelity and attachment." Travels, p. 347. This action of the woman we understand to be a kind of oath: q. d. "May this water prove poison to me if I have been unfaithful to my absent husband." This the innocent might drink "with a tear of joy," while a guilty woman would probably have avoided such a trial with the utmost solicitude. Another instance is still more applicable. "At Kookorro, my landlord brought out his writing-board, or walla, that I might write him a saphie, to protect him from wicked men. I wrote the board full, from top to bottom, on both sides; and my landlord, to be certain of having the whole force of the charm, washed the writing from the board into a calabash, with a little water, and having said a few prayers over it, drank this powerful draught; after which, lest a single word should escape, he licked the board until it was quite dry."

Hence we find that the sentiments expressed in the saying supposed to be communicated to water; and that water, being drank, is supposed to communicate the effect of those sentiments to him who drank it. This drinking, then, is a symbolical action. In like manner, we suppose, when the priest of Israil wrote the curses in a sepher, (book, roll,) and washed those curses into the water that was to be drank, the water was understood to be impregnated, as it were—to be inculcated with the curse, the scripture of which it received; so that now it was metaphorically bitter, containing the curse in it. The drinking of this curse, though conditionally effective or non-effective, could not but have a great effect on the woman's mind; and an answerable effect on the husband's jealousy; which it was designed to cure and to dissuade.

It is worthy of notice, that if a husband loved his wife too well to part with her on suspicion, or if a woman loved her husband so well as to risk this exposure, to satisfy him, then the rite might take place; but if either did not choose to hazard this experiment, the way of divorce was open, was much easier, much less hazardous, more private, more honorable, and perhaps more satisfactory.

Michialis has well remarked, on this ceremony, that to have given so accurate a definition of the punishment that God intended to inflict, and still more, one that consisted of such a rare disease, would have been a step of incomprehensible boldness in a legislator, who pretended to have a divine mission, if he was not, with the most assured conviction, conscious of its reality. If in any case the oath of purgation had been taken, and the accused remained unaffected by the punishment, and yet afterwards had been legally convicted of the crime, all the world would have noticed the fraud of the pretended prophet, and looked upon his religion and laws as mere falsehood. Even the adulteress herself, who at first trembled at taking such an oath, would, in the event of not experiencing the threatened punishment, soon look upon religion as an imposture, and, in process of time, become impudent enough to avail her crimes publicly, and to state particulars, merely with a view to prostitute religion, and make it a means of procuring money. If such a case should become very apt, in private, with her paramours, to make merry at the expense of Moses, and his divine laws, and that a contempt of religion would spread more and more widely every day.

The Jews, having surprised a woman in adultery, brought her to our Saviour, (John viii. 3.) and asked him what they should do with her, Moses having ordered women guilty of this crime to be stoned. This they said, tempting him, to find accusation against him. Jesus, stooping down, as though he heard them not, wrote with his finger on the ground, and then, somewhat raising himself, he said, "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone;" and, stooping again, resumed his writing on the ground, seeming to take no notice of those around him, but leaving them to the operations of their own reflections and conceptions. Her accusers, self-convicted, retired one after another, beginning with the eldest. Jesus, raising himself up, and seeing himself left alone with the woman, said, a Woman, where are thy accusers? Has no one condemned thee?" She said, "No, Lord." Jesus answered her, "Neither do I (now) condemn thee; go, and sin no more."
and three children begging mercy of him. Jerome states, that in his time, the Jews bought from the Roman soldiers permission to look on Jerusalem, and to shed tears over it. (Paulin. ad Sever. Ep. 11.) Old men and women, loaded with rags, were seen to go weeping up the mountain of Olives, (see Mark xiii. 33) to lament from thence the ruin of the temple.

The city was consecrated by Adrian to Jupiter Capitolinus, after whom it was named Capitolium, and a temple was built to him on the spot where Jesus rose from the dead. A statue of Jesus was also set up on Calvary, a marble hog was placed on the gate leading toward Bethlehem, and at this place a grove was planted in honor of Adonis, to whom was dedicated the cave in which our Lord was supposed to have been born. Jacob married Rachel and Leah. (Gen. xxix. 13.) Notwithstanding these degradations, however, the places consecrated by the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus, continued to be held in repute, and were, in fact, identified by the very means employed by those who fostered the worship of the heathen deities; and put out their remembrance. See Calvary, and Sepulchre of Christ.

It appears that Adrian’s order for expelling the Jews from Jerusalem did not extend to the Christians. The Jews were not forbidden to live in the city, and the church, which had been previously composed chiefly of converted Jews, who had connected many of the legal ceremonies with the Christian worship, was now formed exclusively of Gentile converts, who abolished the Jewish observances. From this period the name Elia became so common, that Jerusalem was preserved only among the Jews, and better informed Christians. In the time of Constantine, it was said: "He who dissuaded the Antiochenus, or Ed- exander the Great, of the Seleucidae, (or, in the language of the books of Maccabees, the year of the Greeks, and the year of Jesus Christ, or Anno Domini, are all eras.

The era of the first Olympiad is fixed A. M. 3229, before Jesus Christ 776. — (2.) The era of the foundation of Rome, A. M. 3253, before A. D. 751. — (3.) The era of Nabonassar, A. M. 3257, before A. D. 747. — (4.) The era of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, A. M. 3374, before A. D. 330. — (5.) The era of the Seleucidae, A. M. 3392, before A. D. 312. The Jews call this era the era of Contracts, because, when subjected to the government of the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were obliged to insert it in the dates of their contracts and other civil writings. The first book of the Maccabees places the beginning of it in spring, the second places it in autumn. In the Maccabees, it is called "the era of the kingdom of the Greeks." All other nations that computed by this era, began it from the autumn of the year before Christ 312, but the Chaldaes began it from the spring following, because, till then, they did not think Seleucus thoroughly settled in the possession of Babylon. — (6.) The era of the birth of Jesus Christ, A. M. 4000, three years at least before our vulgar era, in which we reckon he year 1832; whereas, if we take exactly the era of our Saviour’s birth, we should reckon it 1835, or at least 1836. See Erocha, also the Chronological Table. On this subject there are great difficulties to obtain precision; but we generally add three years to A. D.

AFFINITY. There were several degrees of affinity among the Hebrews, which were considered as obstructions to matrimony. (1.) A son could not marry his mother, nor his father’s second wife; (2.) a brother could not marry his sister, whether by the mother only, or by the mother only, much less his sister by both sides; (3.) a grandfather could not marry his granddaughter, either by his son or by his daughter; (4.) no one could marry the daughter of his father’s wife; (5.) nor the sister of his father or mother; (6.) nor the uncle his niece, nor the aunt her nephew; (7.) nor the nephew the wife of his uncle by the father’s side; (8.) a father-in-law could not marry his daughter-in-law; (9.) nor a brother the wife of his brother, while living, nor after his death, but if he left children; if he left no children, the surviving brother was to raise up children to his deceased brother, by marrying his widow; (10.) it was forbidden to marry a mother and her daughter at one time, or the daughter of the mother and the daughter of her daughter, or two sisters together. Lev. xviii. 7–18.

The patriarchs, before the law, sometimes married their half-sisters, as Abraham married Sarah, his father’s daughter, by another mother; two sisters together, as Jacob married Rachael and Leah. But these cases are not to be considered as examples, because they were authorized by necessity, or custom, and the law did not then prohibit them. Since the giving of the law, however, Scripture expressly disapproves of consanguinal connexion and intimate relations; as may be seen in the case of Reuben and Bilhah, his father’s concubine; Herod Antipas and Herodias his sister-in-law; and that which Paul reproves and punishes among the Corinthians, 1 Cor. v. 1. See Marriage.

AFRICA, one of the four principal divisions of the globe, and the third in magnitude. The origin of its name is uncertain. Bochart derives it from the Punica, per se, as sen men, many parts of the country being mere wastes of sand, a Taylor prefers to derive it from verb to break off or rend asunder, which certainly describes the African peninsula accurately enough, it being really broken off, as it was, from Asia, by the Red sea, and united to the great continent only at the isthmus of the Patharum. Of the derivations, however, the first is the most plausible; though as already intimated, open to dispute.

Africa is bounded on the north by the Mediterrannean sea; on the east by the Indian ocean, the Red sea, and part of Asia; on the south by the South Indian ocean; and on the west by the Atlantic. Its general form is triangular, the northern part being the base, and the southern extremity the vertex. Its length may be reckoned about 70 degrees of latitude, or 4000 miles; and its greatest breadth something more than 4000 miles.

Africa was peopled principally by Ham, or his descendants; hence it is called the land of Ham, in several of the Psalms. Mizrim peopled Egypt, (Gen. x. 6, 13, 14) the Negus, the Baslu- him, the Casluhim, and the Ludim, peopled other parts; but the situations they occupied are not now known distinctly. It is thought that many of the Canaanites, when expelled by Joshua, retired into Africa; and the Mahomмедans believe that the Amalekites, who dwelt in ancient times in the neighborhood of Mecca, were forced from thence by the kings descended from Zioran. Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. See CANAANITES.

The gospel is thought to have been carried to Africa by the brethren of Candace, whom Philip baptized; and probably also by some of those who, from different parts of it, attended the feast of Pentecost, Acts ii. 10. In after-times, very flourishing churches were situated on various points of the Mediterranean shore of Africa; but, at present, Messociamidian, or idolatry, involves almost the whole continent, which has been the case ever since its conquest by the Saracens.

The necessary information relative to those places in Africa, which are spoken of in Scripture, will be found under their respective names, AYRTBSIA, ALEXANDRIA, EGYPT, ETHIOPIA, LYBIA, CYRENE, &c.

AGABUS, a prophet, and, as the Grecians suppose, one of the seventy disciples of our Saviour. While Paul and Barnabas were at Antioch, on their way to Jerusalem, certain prophets came down from Judea, among whom was Agabus, Acts x. 28. And he stood up, and signified by the Spirit that there would be a great famine throughout all the world, or Roman empire. This famine, which Luke informs us happened in the days of Claudius, (A.D. 44.) is noticed by profane historians, and Suetonius (in Claudius) observes that during its continuance the emperor was himself insulted in the market-place, and obliged to retire to his palace. About ten years after this occurred the victory which Josuah obtained over them, but declared that he would destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven, Exod. xvii. 14. 16. About 400 years after this, Saul was commanded to march against them, and to "spare neither them, nor to desire any thing that was theirs, but to slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." Saul, in obedience to his orders, invaded the country of the Amalekites, and cut to pieces all whom he met with from Havilah to Shur. Agag, however, and the best of the sheep and oxen, he spared, and also preserved the most valuable of the spoil. This was highly displeasing to the Lord, and the prophet Samuel was sent forward to Gilgal, to meet him, and reprove him for his disobedience. Having denounced punishment upon Saul, Samuel called for Agag, for the purpose of inflicting upon him that punishment which his cruelties had merited. When brought into the presence of the prophet, Agag expressed his hopes that, upon the intercession of Saul, he might be spared. To this, which Samuel replied, "As thy sword hath made mothers childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women." Agag was then hewed in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, 1 Sam. xv.

That "hewing in pieces" is not unknown, as a punishment, in some parts of the world, is seen from a relation in Bruce's Travels in Abyssinia: "The bodies of those killed by the sword," he remarks, "were hewn to pieces, and scattered about the streets," where they were devoured by the hyenas; (see 1 Kings xxii. 23.) and upon one occasion, when crossing the market-place, he saw the Bani, door-keeper hacking to pieces three men, who were bound, with all the self-possession and coolness imaginable! Travels, vol. iv. p. 51. The character of Samuel has been vilified for cruelty, upon this occasion, with how much reason let the reader judge.

AGAPÆ, feasts of friendship, love, or kindness, in use among the primitive Christians. It is very probable that they were instituted in memory of the last supper of Jesus Christ and his disciples, which supper was concluded before he instituted the eucharist.

These festivals were kept in the assembly, or church, towards evening, after prayers and worship were over. Upon these occasions, the faithful ate together, with great simplicity and frugality; they partook of the sacramental signs of the body and blood, and gave each other the kiss of peace.

The Agape are placed before the eucharist, (1 Cor. xii. 21.) and if they did refer to our Lord's supper before he instituted the eucharist, this seems to be their natural order. But it is probable that, at least in some places, or on some occasions, the holy eucharist preceded the Agape; perhaps when persecution rendered extremest caution necessary; for it seems very likely that Piny speaks of these Agapes in his famous letter to Trajan: "A most sacred and holy peace... A tolerable judge... to Christ, (quasi Deo,) they departed, and returned to take a harmless rest in common."

The history of the Agape among the primitive Christians is so closely connected with the manners, customs, and opinions of times and places, that to treat it satisfactorily would lead us too far; we may, therefore, only offer a few remarks. There seems reason to conclude, that the social intercourse of early believers might enable them to discover many excellencies in each other, which might contribute to justify and to promote the observations of heathen strangers, "See how these Christians love one another!"

These Agapes were not only very powerful means, among the primitive Christians, of cultivating mutual affection throughout their body, and of gaining the good-will of those who observed their conduct; but, in all probability, they contributed to promote the Christian cause, by leading to conversions, and by supporting the minds of youth under the difficulties attending their situation. Tertullian (Apol. cap. 39.) speaks of them thus: "Nothing low or unseemly is committed in them; nor is it till after having prayed to God, that they sit down to table. Food is taken in moderation as wanted; and no more is drunk than it becomes discreet persons to drink. Each takes such refreshment as is suitable, in connection with the recollection that he is to be engaged, in the course of the night, in adorations to God; and the conversation is conducted as become those who know that the Lord heareth them. After water has been brought for the hands, and fresh lights, every one is invited to sing, and to glorify God, whether by passages from the sacred Scriptures, or of his own composition. This discovers whether proper moderation has been observed at the table. In short, the repet concludes as it begins; that is to say, with prayer.

These instances, however, even in the time of the apostles, appear to have degenerated, and become abused. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 30, 21.) complains, that the rich despised the poor in these assemblies, and would not condescend to eat with them: "When ye come together, says he, "in one place—this coming together, merely, is not eating the Lord's supper; one taking before another his own supper; one being hungry, another over full. What! have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and abuse them that have not?" In this discordant state of its members, a church could not but be unfit to celebrate the great commemoration of divine love. (Jude 12. "Spots in your feasts of charity—Agape—fasting themselves, &c.

It certainly seems to us extraordinary, that on any occasion, much more on occasion of a Christian institution recently attended to, and a solemn Christian ordinance about to be attended to, the Christians should, any of them, indulge to excess of any kind: but when we consider that public suppers and other meals were customary among the Greeks, (to which they might assimilate these Agapes,) and besides, that the sacrifices at which these Corinthians had been accustomed to attend, were followed (and some accompanied) by merriment, we shall see reason to wonder at their falling into intemperance of behavior so very different from the genius of the Christian institution itself, as the name implies, a feast for joy; but for joy of a much more serious kind. However, we must, in justice, vindicate the Corinthians from that gross profanation of the eucharist itself, with which, from our translators, we are led to connect the appellation of the phrase "Lord's supper," they have been reproached.

The Agape were abolished by the Council of Laodicea, Can. 38. Synod of Trullo, Can. 74. and the Council of Carthage, Can. 42.

The Jews had certain devotional entertainments, in some degree related to the Agape. On their great festival days, they made feasts for their family, for the priests, the poor, and orphans; or they sent contributions, or did something else, in excess of what was observed by our Saviour in Jerusalem, before the Lord. There were also certain sacrifices and first-fruits appointed by the law, to be set apart for that purpose, Deut. xxvi. 10—12; Neh. vii. 10, 12; Esth. ix. 19. A similar custom obtained among the heathen; at least so far as to partake convivially of what had been offered in sacrifice; and perhaps, also, sending portions to such as were absent. The Essenians also had their feasts in common; and probably many other confraternities or sects. To this fellowship, the institution of the Sodales or brotherhoods, which had become popular since the days of Augustus, might greatly contribute.

Agate, a precious stone, said to take its name from the river Agates in Sicily, where it was first found. Agates, which are of several kinds, are likewise procured in Phrygia, in India, in various parts of Europe, and at the Cape of Good Hope. The agate was the second stone in the third row of the high-priest's breastplate, Exod. xxviii. 19; xxxix. 12.

I. AGrippa, surname Herod, son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great, was born three years before our Saviour, and seven years before the vulgar era. After the death of his father Aristobulus, Herod, his grandfather, undertook his education, and sent him to Rome, to make his court to Tiberius. The emperor conceived a great affection for Agrippa, and placed him near his son Drusus, whose favor he soon obtained, as also that of the empress Antonia. Drusus, however, dying soon afterwards, (A. D. 23,) all the rest of his intimate friends were commanded by Tiberius to quit Rome, lest their presence should renew his affection. Agrippa, who had indulged his disposition to liberality, was obliged to leave Rome overwhelmed with debts, and very poor. He was sent to go to Jerusalem, because of his inability to make an appearance equal to his birth; he retired therefore to the castle of Massada, where he lived in private. Herod the tetrarch, his uncle, assisted him for some time with a share of his revenues; made him the prince, al magistrato of Tiberias, and presented him with a large sum. But all this being insufficient to answer the excessive profusion of Agrippa, Herod became weary of assisting him, and reproached him with his want of economy. Agrippa was so affected by his uncle's reproach, that he resolved to quit Judea, and return to Rome. A. D. 35.

To effect his purpose, he borrowed from Proclus, a freedman in the palace of Herod. On his arrival in Rome, he presented himself at the palace of Tiberius, with the sum of 20,000 drachmas, and from Alexander, the Alabarch or chief of the Jews at Alexandria, he procured 200,000 more. When Agrippa landed in Italy, Tiberius was with his court at Capreae, whither Agrippa, as sent intelligence of his arrival, he immediately went to present himself. Tiberius, whom time had cured of his affliction, was glad to hear of his return, received him with kindness, and, as a mark of distinction, gave him an apartment in his palace.

On the next day, letters were sent to the emperor from Herodias, who was charged with his affairs in Judea, in which it was stated that Agrippa, having borrowed 300,000 pieces of silver out of his exchequer, had fled from Judea, without repaying them. This intelligence, so unexpected, roused the emperor, that he commanded Agrippa to leave the palace, and to pay what he owed. Agrippa, however, addressed himself to the empress Antonia, from whom he obtained a sum of money sufficient to discharge the claim; and was restored to the emperor's favor. Agrippa now attached himself to Caius Caligula, the son of Germanicus, and grandson of Antonia; as if he had some presentiment of the future elevation of Caligula, who at that time was beloved by all, and whose affection he so engaged that he could not live without him. Joseph. Ant. xvii. 6. 1—5.

Upon the death of Tiberius, Caligula placed a diadem upon the head of Agrippa, and gave him the tetrarchy where Philip, son of Herod the Great, had possessed; that is, Batanæa and Trachonitis: to this he added that of Lycaonia, (see ABILENE,) and Agrippa returned into Judea, to take possession of his new kingdom, A. D. 39.

Caius, desiring to be adored as a god.
Agrrippa, who was at Rome at the time that Petronius, the emperor's lieutenant in Judea, addressed Caius upon the subject, so far succeeded in his entreaties, that the emperor desired, at least in appearance, from his design.

After the death of Caligula, Agrippa espoused the interest of Claudius, who, in acknowledgment for his services, bestowed upon him all Judea, and the kingdom of Chalcis, which had belonged to Herod his brother. Thus Agrippa suddenly became one of the most powerful princes of the East, and possessed a greater extent of territory, perhaps, than had been enjoyed by his grandfather, Herod the Great. He returned into Judea, and governed to the great satisfaction of his subjects. The desire of pleasing the Jews, however, and a mistaken zeal for their religion, induced him to commit an act of injustice, the memory of which is preserved in Scripture, Acts xii. 1, &c. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 4. About the feast of the passover, A. D. 44. James the greater, son of Zebedee, and brother of John the evangelist, was put to death by his orders; and Peter was thrown into prison, with a view to his execution, after the close of the festival. In this design, however, he was disappointed; the apostle being miraculously delivered from confinement. A short time afterwards, Agrippa went from Jerusalem to Cesarea, where he celebrated games in honor of Claudius. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 5 and Acts xii. 10, &c. Here the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon waited on him, to sue for peace. Agrippa, having come early in the morning to the theatre, to give them audience, seated himself on his throne, dressed in a splendid robe of silver tissue. The rays of the rising sun, darting upon his dress, gave it such a lustre and resplendence as the eyes of the spectators could scarcely endure. When, therefore, the king spoke to the Tyrians and Sidonians, the people, urged by his flatterers, exclaimed, "The voice of a god, not of a man." Instead of rejecting these impious flatteries, Agrippa received them with complacency; but at that instant the angel of the Lord smote him, because he did not give the glory to God. He was carried to his palace by his attendants, with the dire predictions which he had suffered in his bowels, and devoured by worms, Acts xii. 20—23. A. D. 44. Agrippa had reigned seven years. He left a son, of the same name, then at Rome, and three daughters—Berenece, who was married to a Roman, and two others to Claudius. Antiq. lib. xix. &c. He had been visited at the palace by the apostle Paul, who had been there in his flight from Damascus, Acts xix. 26, &c. When Agrippa heard of this, he was much moved, and desired to hear what he had to say. He therefore brought him to the palace, and Agrippa, after some conference with him, desired to speak to the king. Having obtained permission to speak, the apostle related his miraculous conversion, with his previous persecutions of the Christians, and his subsequent labors and suffering for the gospel, with such power, that he exhorted from Agrippa that memorable exclamation,—"Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Agrippa afterwards said, that his prisoner might have been set at liberty had he not appealed to Caesar, Acts xxvi.

About two years after this, Agrippa gave great offence to the Jews, by depriving Joseph Cabel of the high-priesthood, and bestowing it upon Ananus, a man of a severe and cruel disposition, by whose influence the apostle James was condemned to be stoned, Acts xix. 2. Joseph. Ant. xx. 9. 1. To extort them, he deposed Ananus after he had enjoyed the pontifical dignity only three months, and conferred it upon Jesus, the son of Damneus. Some time after this, he permitted the Levites to wear the linen ephod, which had been hitherto appropriated to the priests, inducing those who had not been appointed to sing in the temple service, to learn vocal music, that they also might share in the privilege. Jos. Ant. xx. 9. 6.

While every pretense tended to rebellion in Judea, Agrippa did all he could to quiet the people, and incline them to peace: but his endeavors were unsuccessful; he indeed suspended, but could not suppress, the passions of the Jews, exasperated by the cruelties and insolence of their governors. They declared openly against the Romans, A. D. 66, and Agrippa was forced to join his troops with those of Rome, to assist in taking Jerusalem. After the destruction of that city he retired to Rome with his sister Berenece, with whom he had long lived in a manner that had given occasion for reports very little to their advantage. He died aged about seventy years, towards A. D. 90. Jos. Ant. xix. c. 9. xx. c. 7. c. 8. c. 9. See Haz. iv. 4.

ACUR. The thirtieth chapter of the Proverbs is entitled "The words of King Solomon, son of David, which nothing further is known. He was probably an inspired Jewish writer, whose sentences were incorporated with those of Solomon, in consequence of the similarity of their style and manner.

Ahab, king of Israel, the son and successor of Omri, ascended the throne A.M. 3086, and reigned 22 years, 1 Kings xvi. 29. Ahab married Jezebel, the daughter of Eth-baal, king of the Zidonians, who introduced the idols Baal and Ashar into Israel, and engaged Ahab in their worship, who soon exceeded in impiety all his predecessors. Being displeased at his conduct, the Lord sent the prophet Elijah to reprove him, who predicted a famine of three years' continuance; after which he retired to Zarephath, lest Ahab or Jezebel should procure his death. Towards the close of the three years, Ahab sent Obadiah, the governor of his house, to seek pasture in the country, that he might preserve part of his cattle. In his progress Obadiah met Elijah, who directed him to go and tell Ahab that Elijah was there. Ahab immediately came, and said to him, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" The prophet answered, "I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house; in that thou hast forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and followed Baalim." He then desired Ahab to gather all the people, with the prophets of Baal, at mount Carmel; and when they were assembled, he brought fire from heaven on his sacrifice. After this the rain descended on the earth, and it recovered its former fertility, 1 Kings xviii.

Some years after this, Ben-hadad, king of Syria, besieged Samaria, and sent ambassadors to Ahab, who was in the city, with insolent messages; but Ahab significantly reproved him by saying, "Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off." Ahab then reviewed the people in Samaria, who amounted to 7000, and making a salute at noon-day, (while Ben-hadad and his associates were carousing in their tents,) killed all who opposed them, put the Syrian army to flight, and took a considerable booty, 1 Kings xx. 21.

Ahab being probably much elated by this victory, a prophet, supposed by the Jews to have been Micah, and by the Syr. and Arab. Amos, was appointed to prophesy to Ahab. An accursed bird, by the prophet of God, and his associates were carousing in their tents, and encamped against his enemies. On the seventh day they joined battle, and the Israelites slew 100,000 Syrians. The rest of them fled to Aphek; but as they were pressing to the city, the walls fell upon them, and killed 27,000 more. Ben-hadad, throwing himself on the clemency of Ahab, was received by him into his chariot; after which he formed an alliance, and permitted him to return, on condition that Ahab should be allowed to make streets in Damascus, as Ben-hadad's father had previously done in Samaria, 1 Kings xx. 22—34. This alliance, however, was displeasing to the Lord, who reproved Ahab by his prophet, and the king returned to Samaria depressed and displeased, ver. 35—43.

Upon the nature of the streets which Ahab proposed to build in Damascus, commentators are divided in opinion, variously understanding the expression to mean markets, courts of judicature, piazzas, citadels, and fortifications, for the purpose of keeping the Syrians check'd. &c. In illustration of the passage, Mr. Harmer adduces the privileges granted to the Venetians in recompense for their aid, by the states of the kingdom of Jerusalem; and observes, that it was customary to assign charaxes, and to give streets, in their towns, to foreign nations. These, however, are rather instances of rewards for services performed, than proofs of such terms as conditions of peace; and we may therefore cite the following passage from Knolles's "History of the Turks," (p. 206.) as being more applicable to the history of Ben-hadad, than any of those which Mr. Harmer has produced: "Beiazet having worthily relieved his besieged city, returned again to the siege of Constantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks against it on the one side towards the land; and passing over the strait of Bosphorus, built a strong castle upon that strait over against Constantinople, to impecch, so much as was possible, all passage thereunto by sea. Emanuel, the besieged emperor, wearied with these long wars, sent an ambassador to Beiazet, to intreat with him a peace; which Beiazet was the more willing to hearke vnto, for that he heard newes, that Tamerlane, the great Tartarian prince, intended shortly to warre upon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but upon condition that the emperor should grant the Turks to dwell together in one street of Constantinople, with free exercise of their own religion and laws, under a judge of their own nation; and further, to pay unto the Turkish king a yeerely tribute of ten thousand ducats. Which dishonorable conditions the distressed emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long siege broken vp, and presently a great sort of Turks with their families were sent out of Byzantium, to dwell in Constantinople, and a church there built for them; which not long after was by the emperor pulled downe to the ground, and the Turks againe driven out of the citie, at such time as Beiazet was by the mighty Tamerlane outuerthrown and taken prisoner." The circumstances of these two stories, and the terms of this article, is so very strange, that it merely remains to notice the propriety with which our translators have chosen the word streets, rather than any other proposed by commentators. Compare the builders' street, Jer. xxxvii. 21. It is by way of observation, that I give the name of Polemarias, referring to "Antioches in Polemarias," meaning, in all probability, establishments for the purposes of commerce, formed by companies of merchants in Syria, and other cities of the East, and similar to the streets of Ahab.

In the year following the events just narrated, Ahab, desiring to possess a kitchen-garden near his palace, sent him, as a present of fruit set, to him in his vineyard. Naboath, however, refused to alienate any part of his paternal inheritance, which grievously incensed the king, and brought down upon the patriotic man disgrace and death. Jezebel had him arraigned as a traitor, and witnesses procured his death. As Ahab was returning to Samaria, after having taken possession of Na-boath's vineyard, he was met by Elijah, who denounced the judgment of God against him and his house. Ahab expressed his sorrow and contrition, wherupon the Lord promised that the execution of these threatenings should be deferred till the days of his son Tello.
AHA

About two years after this, Ahah, contrary to the wish of the prophet Micahiah, joined his forces to those of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, who was going up to attack Ramoth-Gilead. He went out in disguise, being wounded by an arrow, immediately left the field of battle. He continued the whole day, however, in his chariot, the blood streaming from his wound, and in the evening he died. He was carried to Samaria, and there buried. His chariots, and the harness of his horses, were washed in the fish-pool of Samaria, and there the dogs licked up his blood, according to the prophet's prediction, I Kings xxii. A. M. 3107. See Ediah, Jezebel, Micahiah, Naboth.

II. AHAB, son of Kolaiah, one of the two false prophets who seduced the Israelites at Babylon, Jer. xxix. 21, 22. The Lord threatened them, by Jeremia, with delivering them up to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, should they put to death in the presence of those who had been deceived by them; and that the people should use their name proverbially, when they would curse any one, saying, "The Lord make thee like Ahab and Zebediah, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire." The rabbins, who have been followed by several expositors, believe these to be the two elders who endeavored to corrupt the chaste Susanna. But the punishment annexed to the crime of those in the apocryphal history, destroys this opinion; for Ahab and Zebediah were roasted in the fire, while the others were stoned. The text does not say, literally, they were stoned; but that they were treated as they would have used their neighbor;—that they were put to death according to the law of Moses; and as that law condemns adulterers to be stoned, which was the punishment they would have had inflicted on Susanna, it follows that this was the punishment they were to suffer in retaliation.

I. AHASUERUS, a king of Persia mentioned Dan. ix. 1, and called Astartes in the Vulgate, Dan. xiii. 65. He is evidently to be distinguished from the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther. See Astartes II.

II. AHASUERUS, a king of Persia, who is so conspicuous in the book of Esther, and is mentioned in Ezra and in Nehemiah, that we are at a loss to identify him with Darius Hystaspes, he was a descendant of the royal family of Achemones, and ascended the throne of Persia in the 28th year of his age, A. M. 3483; ante A. D. 321. In the second year of his reign, the Jews who had returned to Palestine, encouraged by the exhortations of the prophets Haggar and Zechariah, resumed the rebuilding of the temple, which had been interrupted under the reign of Cambyses. On this, the governors of the province for the Persians demanded by what authority they undertook this work, Ezra v. 3—6, 13. The Jews produced the edict of Cyrus; the governors wrote to Ahasuerus, who gave directions to seek this edict. Having found it at Ecbatana, he confirmed it, and commanded his officers to assist in the design, and to furnish things necessary for sacrifices. Ahasuerus having divorced Vashti, his queen, (see Vashti) Esther, the niece of Mordecai, a Jew, was chosen to be his wife, through whose intercession the edict appointing the massacre of the Jews was cancelled, and their enemy, Haman, disgraced and put to death. See Achmeta, Esther, and Haman.

The rest of Ahasuerus's life has no relation to sacred history. He died A. M. 3519, ante A. D. 455, after a reign of six-and-thirty years, and was succeeded by Xerxes, his son by Aptraera, or Vashti.

The foregoing statement is in conformity with the opinion of Usher and others, which supposes Ahasuerus to be Darius, the son of Hystaspes; but, as this opinion has been very difficult to obtain, Dr. Prideaux has suggested in support of his opinion, that Artaxerxes Longimanus was the Ahasuerus of Scripture, to whom Esther was queen. Usher thought Darius, son of Hystaspes, married Atossa, (who is Vashti), afterwards divorced by him; and that he took to wife Aristone, daughter of Cyrus, and widow of Cambyses, who is Esther. But this is contradicted by Herodotus, who informs us, that Aristone was daughter of Cyrus; consequently, she could not be Esther, who was too young. He says further, that Atossa had four sons by Darius, without reckoning daughters; and that she had so great an ascendency over him, as to prevail on him to declare her son, Xerxes, his successor, to the exclusion of his own sons. We forewarn the reader against the rejection, in our comment on Esther i. 9. and, without venturing to ascertain the Vashni divorced by Ahasuerus, we have shown that neither Atossa, whom we take to be the daughter of Cyrus, nor Aristone, who was a virgin when he married her, and might be Esther,—that neither of them was dismissed by Ahasuerus. Herodotus says expressly, in his third book, that the daughter of Cyrus, and wife of Darius, was Atossa, lib. iii. cap. 68. and 88. Dr. Prideaux adds, (Hist. part i. book iv.) that the principal reason which influenced Usher, was the notice, in the book of Esther (ch. x. 1.), "that Ahasuerus laid a tribute on the land, and on the isles of the sea," which we read also in Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 80. But Strabo attributes this to Darius Longimanus; while our author would refer it to Artaxerxes Longimanus. Strabo, lib. xv.

The reasons urged by Dr. Prideaux for Artaxerxes Longimanus are these: (1.) That Josephus expressly affirms Artaxerxes to have been Esther's husband.

(Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 6.) (2.) The Septuagint, and the Greek additions to the book of Esther, call Ahasuerus Artaxerxes. (3.) Several circumstances in the history cannot be applied to Artaxerxes Meneon. (4.) The extraordinary favor with which Artaxerxes Longimanus honored the Jews, strengthens the probability that he had married a Jewess. This opinion is maintained by Sulpinius Severus, and many other writers of both ancient and modern. See Artaxerxes Longimanus.

Scaliger supposes Xerxes to be the Ahasuerus of Scripture, and his wife Amestris to be queen Esther. (De emendat. Temp. lib. iv.) He grounds his belief on the resemblance of the names; but the circumstances related in the history of Amestris prove, indisputably, that she is not the Esther of Scripture; for Amestris, wife of Xerxes, had a son by that prince, who was of age to marry in the seventh year of his father's reign, Herod. lib. ix. She could not, therefore, be Esther, who was not married till the seventh year of his reign. (Thus far Calmet. The opinions of interpreters respecting the Persian king designated by this name in the books of Ezra and Esther, have been exceedingly diverse; and he has in turn been supposed to be Antigonus, Cyaxares II, Cambyses, Darius Hystaspes, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes Longimanus, i. e. each of the whole line of Persian kings from Astyages to Artaxerxes Longimanus, with the exception of Cyrus and Darius, there would strictly require the name to be understood of Cambyses; nor is there any violence or improbability in supposing, that this monarch had assumed this appellation (i.e. iox king, see below) along with his other titles. Or, on this supposition that Ahasuerus was Xerxes, we have only to suppose that the sacred writer, having in v. 5. spoken of the efforts of the enemies all the days of Cyrus and unto the reign of Darius Hystaspes, goes on to mention the continuance of their efforts in general in the days of his successor, Xerxes; while in v. 7. he goes back to describe their one great and successful effort in the days of Artaxerxes, who is here Smerdis.

One great difficulty in the way of settling this point, seems to have been an impression on the minds of the learned men who have endeavored to investigate the subject, that every event and circumstance mentioned in the sacred narrative, must also be found in, or made out from, the pages of profane history. Thus, we have seen above, that Esther builds his supposition of Darius Hystaspes chiefly on the fact, that the imposition of a tribute mentioned Esther x. 1. is also mentioned by Herodotus, and ascribed to Darius. But Strabo, as we have seen, mentions a similar fact, and a common notion with another monarch. Now, was the imposition of a tax by a Persian monarch a thing of such rare occurrence, that we must expect to find it recorded in every historian, and especially in every Greek historian? We ought rather to assume, and all that we know of the Persian monarchy leads us to assume—that such levies were not unfrequent; and we surely have no right to suppose, that Greek historians, writing about the affairs of a foreign and distant empire, would necessarily mention every arrangement of its internal policy. Just so, too, in regard to Esther. Interpreters have sought to identify her with various wives of the three Persian monarchs mentioned above by Colnet. In this they have as yet been unsuccessful; nor does this course seem necessary. The Jews were then a conquered, captive, and despised people. That an oriental monarch, who looked only to beauty, should make a selection from among his female slaves, and in this way take a wife from this degraded class, is a matter of common sense and contrary to sound critical judgment. They might be led by circumstances to mention other wives of the monarch, who were to them of more importance; while they might either know nothing of Esther, or have heard of her only as a female slave who had been chosen, like hundreds of others, for her beauty, and who had for them no further interest.

The objections, therefore, above made to the supposition that Xerxes is the Ahasuerus of Scripture, would seem to fall away. On the other hand, we may remark, that both Darius Hystaspes and Artaxerxes Longimanus are mentioned in Scripture by their usual names, (Ezra iv. 5. 24; v. 6 etc. vii. 1 etc. Neh. ii. 1 etc.) and there is therefore less probability that they would also be mentioned under another name; while Xerxes is apparently no where spoken of, or alluded to, unless it be under the appellation of Ahasuerus. To this we may add, that the character of Xerxes, as portrayed by Herodotus,—a monarch not more cruel than he was imitable, and therefore corresponded in the description of Ahasuerus in the book of Esther.—The statements of Josephus, in respect to the ancient history of his nation, are often so legendary, as to render here his testimony in favor of Artaxerxes Longimanus less authoritative than if it otherwise would be.

This supposition receives also a strong support in the etymology of the name Xerxes, as recently ascertained by the labors of Grooteveld and Champollion. The former, in deciphering a cuneiform Persian inscription, found the name of Xerxes to be there written Khâh-her-shê, or Khâh-ver-shê; (Heeren Ideen, ed. 4. i. 2. p. 348.) and this was confirmed by the latter from an Egyptian inscription in hieroglyphics and in Persian, (Précis du Système hieroglyphique, p. 24.) The meaning of this word is the lion king. For the initial sound, the Greeks substituted their similar letter χ, and gave the word their usual termination, making Xerxes. The Hebrews, by prefixing their not unfrequent prothetic al, formed the name Ahasheresh or Ahasheeresh, אחשערש, which we represent by Ahasuerus, combining the Hebrew and the Greek Ασσορες. See Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 74, 75.

On the whole, then, we may conclude with a good degree of probability that the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther was no other than the Xerxes of profane history, who succeeded his father Darius about B. C. 485, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes Longimanus, about B. C. 464. He was the second son of Darius Hystaspes; and being chiefly known in history by the vast preparations which he made for the invasion of Greece, against which he marched at the head of an army (according to the Greek historians) of more than five millions of men. His progress was first checked at Thermopylae by the devoted valor of Leonidas and his three hundred Spartans; and although he succeeded in burning the deserted city of Athens, he was nevertheless soon compelled to return disgracefully to his own dominions, where he was, not long after, assassinated. The only trait of moral feeling or humanity recorded of him, is the circumstance mentioned by Herodotus, (lib. vii.) that, while reviewing his vast army and fleet from an eminence on the shores of Abydos, he suddenly wept and expressed his thanks to Heaven, at the reason of this by Artabanes his uncle, he replied, that he wept at the thought of the shortness of human life, since, of all the vast multitudes before him, not one would be alive at the end of a hundred years. *

The description given of Ahasuerus's palace, in our translation of the first chapter of Esther, is anything but satisfactory, and most of the commentators have been embarrassed in their attempts to make it out its sense:—"The king made a feast to all the people that were present at Shushan, the palace; both unto great and small, seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace; where were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen, and purple, to silver rings, and to marble pillars of marble; the beds were of gold, and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble." What are we to understand by all this?—Hangings fastened to silver rings—to pillars of marble?—cords made of fine linen?—beds of gold and silver—laid on the pavement? &c. &c.

To justify this description, we may first consider the canvas the reader will judge of probability, and use from the following quotation:—Among the ruins remaining at Persepolis is a court, containing many lofty pillars; one may even presume that these columns did not support any architrave, as Sir John Gardner has observed, (p. 76. tom. iii.) but we may venture to suppose, that a covering of tapestry, or linen, was drawn over them, to intercept the perpendicular projection of the sun-beams. It is also probable that the tract of ground where most of the columns stood, was originally a court before the palace, like that which was before the King's house at Susa, mentioned Esther, chap. v. and through which a flow of fresh air was admitted into the apartments.” (Le Bruyn, vol. ii. p. 222.) This idea, formed almost on the spot, supports the suggestion of a canopy covering the court. It is confirmed also by the custom of India. We have been told by a gentleman from whom we requested information on this subject, that, “at the festival of Diwra Rajah in Calcutta, the great court of a very large house is covered with a covering, made of canvas lined with calico; and this lining is ornamented with broad stripes, of various colors, in which (in India, observe) green predominates. On occasion of this festival, which is held only once in three years, the master of the house gives wine and cake, and other refreshments, to the English gentlemen and ladies who wish to see the ceremonies; he also gives payment, as well as hospitality, to those who perform them.” That such a covering would be necessary in hot climates, we may easily suppose; nor is the supposition enfeebled by remarking, that the Colosseum, or Flavian Amphitheatre at Rome, has still remaining on its walls the marks of the masts, or scaffoldings, which were erected when that immense area was covered with an awning; as it was during the shows exhibited there to the Roman public. See House.

In the lower part of the court, the preparations consisted in what may be called a raised platform on a mustab; what these were the reader will understand, by an extract from Dr. Russell's History of Aleppo:—“Part of the principal court is planted with trees and flowering shrubs; the rest is paved. At the south end is a square basin of water with jet d’eau, and close to it, upon a stone mustab, is built a small pavilion; or, the mustab being only raised in, an open divan is occasionally formed on it. [A mustab is a stone platform, raised about two or three feet above the pavement of the court.] This being some steps higher than the basin, a small fountain is usually placed in the middle of the divan, the mosaic pavement round which, being constantly wetted by the jet d’eau, displays a variety of splendid colors, and the water, as it runs to the basin, through marble channels which are rough at bottom, produces a pleasing murmur. Where the size of the court admits of a larger shrubbery, temporary divans are placed in the grove; or arbors are formed of slight latticed frames, covered by the vine, the rose, or the jasmine; the rose, shooting to a most luxuriant height, when in full flower, is elegantly picturesque. Facing the basin, on the south side of the court, is a wide, boldly, arched above, about eighteen inches higher than the pavement, and entirely open to the court. It is painted in the same manner as the court pavement; but the roof is fixed in plain or gilt street, and the floor round a small fountain is paved with marble of sundry colors, with a jet d’eau in the middle. A large divan is here prepared, but being introduced by the master, chins, and Cairo mats, are employed, instead of cloth, velvet, and carpets. It is called, by way of distinction, The Divan, and by its north aspect, and a sloping painted shed projecting over the arch, being protected from the sun, it offers a delicious situation in the hot months. The sound, not less than the sight, of the jets d’eau, is extremely refreshing; and if there be a breath of air stirring, it arrives scented by the Arabian jasmine, the heuna, and other fragrant plants growing in the shrubbery, or ranged in pots round the basin. There is usually on each side of the alcove a small room, or cabinet, neatly fitted up, and serving for retirement. These rooms are called kubb, whence, probably, the Spaniards derived their al coba, which is rendered by some other nations in Europe alcove.” (Page 30.) In another place, Dr. Russell gives a print of a mustab, with several musicians sitting upon it, on which he observes, “The front of the stone mustab is faced with marble of different colors. Part of the court is paved in mosaic, in the manner of the mosaics; the marble facing of the mustab, the mosaic pavement between that and the basin, and the fountain playing.”

This account of Dr. Russell's harmonizes perfectly with the history in Esther; and we have only to imagine that the railings, or smaller pillars of the divan, (the balustrades,) on the mustab, in the palace of Ahasuerus, were of silver, (silver gilt,) while the larger, called columnas, placed at the corners, (as in our print,) or elsewhere, were of marble; the flat part of the mustab also being overspread with carpets, &c. on which, next the railings, were cushions richly embroidered, for the purpose of being leaned against. These things, mentioned in the Scripture narration, if placed according to the doctor's account, enable us to comprehend and justify the whole of the Bible description.
AHAVA; a country and river of Babylonia, or of Assyria, where Ezra assembled those captives who were returning to Judea. Ezra viii. 15. 21. 31. It is thought by some to have run along the province of Adiabene, where a river Diava, or Adiava, the Zab, or the Euphrates, received it, and joined the Tigris near a city Abene, or Asvane. The history of Izates, king of the Adiabenians, and his mother Helena, who became convert to Judaism some years after the death of Christ, proves that there were many Jews remaining in that country. Jos. Ant. xx. c. 2.—

[The above supposition would seem not to be well grounded; since it depends solely on the similarity of the names in Latin; of which there is no trace in the Hebrew. Besides, it is more probable that the rendezvous of the returning Jews would be in the S.W. part of Babylonia, rather than in the remote N.E. part of Assyria. See Rosenm. Bib. Geog. L. 2. p. 63. R.]

AHAZ, son of Jotham, and twelfth king of Judah. He was twenty years of age when he ascended the throne, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem, (2 Kings xvi. 1, 2.) that is, from A. M. 3282 to 3278.

Azaz imitated the kings of Israel and Samaria, in idolatry and all manner of disorders. He offered sacrifices and incense on the high places, and in groves; and consecrated one of his sons, making him pass through fire, in honor of Moloch. Shortly after his accession to the throne, his kingdom was invaded by the united forces of Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, who defeated his troops, and besieged Jerusalem, 2 Kings xv. 1—8; 2 Chron. xxvii. 5, seq.; 1 Chron. xii. 1. When they found they could not take it, they divided their army, plundered the country, and made prisoners every where. Rezin and his party retired with all their spoil to Damascus. But Pekah, having in one battle killed 120,000 of Ahaz's army, took prisoners 200,000 persons, men, women, and children. As they were carrying these captives to Samaria, the prophet Oded, with the principal inhabitants of the city, came out to meet the captors, and prevailed on them, by remonstrances, to liberate their prisoners, and restore the booty. Those who were not able to perform the journey homeward on foot, were conveyed in carriages. Pekah and Rezin again returned, and laid waste the kingdom of Judah. The Philistines and Edomites also spread themselves like an inundation over the territories of Ahaz, committed great disorders, killed many people, and exacted much booty. In these circumstances, and just before the siege of Jerusalem, the prophet Isaiah, with his son Shear-jashub, went to meet Ahaz, and foretold the deliverance of his country, and the destruction of his enemies, offering him the choice of any prodigy, in confirmation of the prediction. Under the appearance of declining to tempt the Lord, Ahaz refused to select a sign. "Hear, then," said Isaiah, "O house of David; behold the sign which the Lord gives you; a virgin conceiving and bearing a son, whose name shall be called Emmanuel. (See Emmanuel.) Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good." Then, pointing to his own son, Isaiah assured Ahaz, that before that child should be able to distinguish good and evil, the two kings confederated against Judah should be slain; which accordingly happened, Isaiah vii. In this extremity, Ahaz applied to the king of Assyria, presenting him the gold and silver from the temple and the palace. Tiglath-pileser accepted the presents, and marched to assist Ahaz; attacked and killed Rezin, took Damascus his capital, and removed the inhabitants to Tyrene, that part of Iberia where the river Cyrus runs. Ahaz went to Damascus to meet the king of Assyria, whence he was sent a message the same year, to make peace with Jachin, that he might place one like it in the temple at Jerusalem. Upon this he offered sacrifices, and commanded its exclusive use. He ordered also the bases to be taken away, and the lavers of brass; the brazen sea, and its supporting oxen; and commanded them to be placed below, on the pavement of the temple, 2 Kings xvi. In his greatest affliction, Ahaz showed the highest contempt of God; he sacrificed to the Syrian gods, to render them propitious; he broke the vessels of the temple, shut the gates, and erected altars in all parts of Jerusalem, and in all the cities of Judah, to burn incense on them, 2 Chron. xxvii. 22, 33, &c. He died, and was buried in Jerusalem; but not in the sepulchres of the kings of Judah, because of his iniquities. Other princes, his predecessors, as Jehoram and Josiah, as well as Manasseh and Amon, two of his successors, were treated with the same ignominy; and denied the privilege of being interred among the kings. For some remarks on some of the seals of Ahaz, see Dial.

I. AHAZIAH, son and successor of Ahaz, king of Israel, 1 Kings xxii. 40. 51. He reigned two years, alone and with his father, who associated him in the kingdom the year before his death, A. M. 3106. Ahabaziah imitated Ahaz's impiety; and was shipped to Baal and Asarthe, whose rites had been introduced into Israel by Jezebel his mother. In the second year of his reign, the Moabites, who had been subject to the kings of Israel since its separation from Judah, revolted against Ahaziah, and refused to pay him the ordinary tribute. About the same time, he fell from the terrace of his house, and being considerably hurt thereby, he sent to Ekon, for the purpose of consulting Beelzebub concerning his indisposition. His messengers were met on their way by the prophet Elijah, reproved for their impiety, and sent back to Ahaziah, with the assurance that his illness would be fatal. Incensed at the interference of the prophet, Ahaziah gave orders to have him seized with fifty men each, successively perished by fire from heaven, while endeavoring to execute this command; but Elijah yielded to the supplications of a third, and accompanied him into the presence of the king, whom he again rendered much better; instead of betaking himself to Jehovah, and repeated his declaration that he should not recover. The prophet's words were verified by the death of Ahaziah, after a short reign of two years, A. M. 3105. He was succeeded by his brother Jehoram, 2 Kings i; 2 Chron. xx. 35.

II. AHAZIAH, otherwise Jehovahaz, or Azariah, king of Judah, son of Jehoram and Athaliah, succeeded his father, A. M. 3119, 2 Kings viii. 25; 2 Chron. xxvii. 2. He was twenty-two years of age when he ascended the throne, and he reigned but one year at Jerusalem. He followed the house of Ahab, to which he was allied by his mother, and did evil. Joram, king of Israel, having attacked Ramoth-Gilead, was there dangerously wounded; and being carried to Jezreel for cure, Ahaziah, his friend and relation, went thither to visit him. In the meanwhile, Jehu, son of Nimshi, whom Joram had left besieging Ramoth, rebelled against him, designing to extirpate the house of Ahah, according to the commandment of the Lord, and for this purpose set out for Jezreel with a party of horsemen. Jehu, the son of Jehaziah, ignorant of his intentions, went to meet him. Jehu, after reproaching Joram with the wickedness of his family, pierced him through the heart with an arrow. Jehaziah fled; but Jehu's people overtook him near Ibleam, and mortally wounded him. He had sufficient strength, however, to reach Megiddo, where he died, (2 Kings ix. 21, 25, &c.) or, as it would seem from 2 Chron. xxii. 8, 9, was sought out and put to death by the command of Jehu. The text of the book of Chronicles imposes that Jehaziah was forty-two years of age when he began to reign, in which it differs from that of the Kings. This difficulty, however, may be removed, by reading with the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic versions, twenty-two instead of forty-two; on the supposition that the reading in Chronicles arose in transcribing, by the substitution of γς for γς, 22.

AHIJAH, son and successor to the high-priest Ahimelech, 1 Sam. xiv. 3. His son Ahimelech was put to death by Saul, 1 Sam. xxv. 18. There are several other persons of this name mentioned in the Scripture history, but none of any importance.

AHIJAZER, son of Ammishaddai, and chief of the tribe of Dan, who came out of Egypt at the head of 72,000 men of the tribe. His dwelling was the same as that of his fellow-chiefs, Numb. vii. 66, 67.

I. AHIJAH, a prophet of the Lord, who dwelt at Shilo, and is conjectured by some to be the person who spoke twice to Solomon from God, 1 Kings vi. 11; xi. 11. Ahijah wrote the history of this prince's life, 2 Chron. ix. 29. Jeroboam, going one day out of Jerusalem, was met by the prophet Ahijah, (1 Kings xi. 28, 29.) who, noticing the wife of the man of God, who had wrapped himself, (see Veil) from off his shoulders, and, tearing it in twelve pieces, gave ten of them to Jeroboam, and declared that God would thus rend the kingdom, after the death of Solomon, and give the ten of the tribes to himself. See 1 Kings xii. 2, seq. Jeroboam's son having fallen sick, his wife went in disguise to Ahijah, to inquire whether he would recover. Notwithstanding the disguise of the queen and the husband's blindness, however, the prophet discovered her, and foretold the death of her son, and the entire extinction of the house of Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiv. The event was answerable to the prediction. Ahijah, in all probability, did not long survive.

II. AHIJAH, father of Baasha, king of Israel, 1 Kings xv. 27. Baasha killed Nadab, son of Jeroboam, and usurped his kingdom, thereby executing the predictions of the prophet Ahijah.

AHIKAM, son of Shaphan, and father of Gedaliah, sent by Josiah to consult Huldah, the prophetess, concerning the book of the law, found in the temple, 2 Kings xxii. 13; xxvi. 22; Jer. xxvi. 24; xl. 14.

AHIKAMMAZ, son of Zadok the high-priest, succeeded his father about A.M. 3000, under Solomon. He rendered David very important service during the war with Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 27, seq. xvii. 17. While his father, Zadok, was in Jerusalem with Hushai, the friend of David, Ahimaaz with Jonathan continued a little way without the city, near the fountain Rogel. Being informed of the resolutions of Absalom's council, they immediately hastened to give the king intelligence; but being discovered by a young lad, who informed Absalom, he sent orders to pursue them. Ahimaaz and Jonathan, fearing to be taken, retired to a man's house at Baharin, in whose court-yard was a well, in the sides of which they concealed themselves. Upon the mouth of this well the woman of the house spread a covering, and on the covering, corn-ground, or rather parched. When Absalom's people came and inquired after them, the woman answered, 'They have passed over the little brook of water.' Deceived by this answer, the pursuers passed over a brook at no great distance, but not finding them, returned to Jerusalem, and, the same and Jonathan continued their journey to David. After the battle in which Absalom was slain, Ahimaaz was the first who arrived with the fatal intelligence to the king. Some years afterwards, Ahimaaz succeeded his father in the high-priesthood, and was himself succeeded by Azariah his son, 1 Chron. vi. 9.

AHIMAN, a giant of the race of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron, when the spies visited the land of Canaan, Numb. xiii. 22. He was driven from Hebron by his brother Abehai and Talmai, when Caleb took that city, Josh. xv. 14.

I. AHIMELECH, son of Ahihur, and brother of Abia, whom he succeeded in the high-priesthood. He was, flying from Saul, (1 Sam. xxi. 1,) went to Nob, where Ahimelech, with other priests, then dwelt, and representing to the high-priest that he was on pressing business from the king, obtained the shew-bread, and also the sword which he had won from Goliah. Doeg, the Edomite, who was then at Nob, related what had passed to Saul, who immediately sent for Ahimelech and the other priests, and, after accusing them of having conspired with David, commanded his guards to slay them. These having refused Ahimelech, with other priests, went to the king, and informed him of what had passed. Doeg then went and killed the priests. On being informed of what had happened, the king ordered Doeg to execute the deed, which he immediately did, and massacred fourscore and five persons. He went afterwards to Nob, with a party of soldiers, and put men, women, children, and cattle, to the sword. One of Ahimelech's sons, (A比亚har,) however, escaped the carnage, and retired to David, 1 Sam. xxi. xii. xiii. Probably Ahimelech himself also bore the name of Abiahar. See Abiathar, and Ahimelech IV.

II. AHIMELECH, the son of Abiathar, is he is also called, Ahimelech, probably the same as Abiathar, which see, 1 Chron. xxiv. 3. G. 31; 2 Sam. viii. 17. Comp. 1 Chron. xviii. 16.

AHINADAB, son of Iddo, governor of the district of Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, under Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 14.

I. AHINOAM, daughter of Ahimeaz, and wife of Saul, 1 Sam. xiv. 50.

II. AHINOAM, David's second wife, and mother of Ammon, was a native of Jebus. Saul was taken by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziglag, but was recovered by David, 1 Sam. xxx. 5.

AHIO, with his brother Uzzah, conducted the ark from the house of Abinadab to Jerusalem, 1 Chron. xii. 7. See UZZAH.

AHIRA, son of Enan, chief of Naphtali, (Numb. ii. 29.) came out of Egypt at the head of 53,400 men.

AHITHOPHEL, a native of Gilo, and a person who bore a conspicuous part in the war between Absalom and his father David. He was originally one of David's most intimate and valued friends, but upon the defection and rebellion of Absalom, he espoused the cause of that prince, and became one of the biting enemies to his sovereign. Upon hearing of Ahithophel’s position in the party of Absalom, David became extremely uneasy, and after praying that the Lord would turn his counsel into foolishness, he despatched Hushai, who had accompanied him in his flight, to Jerusalem, for the purpose of endeavoring to counteract the effects of Ahithophel’s expected advice. The anticipations of David, as to the counsel of this eminent statesman, were not without foundation, for the measures he recommended were of a description the most calculated to extinguish all the authority and power of the king, and secure the success of the usurper’s designs. Ahithophel advised, in the first place, that Absalom should publicly abuse his father’s concubines; for the purpose, no doubt, of impressing the public mind with an idea, that the breach with his father was irremediable, and also of inducing Absalom, under the impression that all probability of pardon was past, to follow up his plans with determination and vigor. In addition to this, he proposed that David should be immediately pursued by twelve thousand chosen men, who might take up with him while he was weary, and fall upon him while off his guard. The advice was approved by Absalom and his chiefs, but was defeated by the prompt and skilful interposition of Hushai, who foresees its consequences upon David. (See 1 Chron. xii.) Ahithophel foresaw that the plan proposed by Hushai would most probably issue in the defeat of Absalom, and the return of the king, returned to Gilbo, where he hanged himself, and thus averted that ignominious punishment which he justly apprehended as the reward of his perfidy, 2 Sam. xv. 13; xvi. 15, seq. xvii. Ahithophel seems to have been the grandfather of Bathsheba, 2 Sam. xxiii. 34, compared with xi. 3.

I. AITHUB, the son of Phinehas, and grandson and successor of Eli, the high-priest, 1 Sam. xiv. 3.

II. AITHUB, son of Amariah, and father of Zadok, the high-priest, 1 Chron. vi. 8. It is uncertain whether he ever sustained the sacerdotal character himself. See Amariah I.

AHIHUD, the son of Shelomi, of Asher, and one of the commissioners appointed by Moses to divide the land of Canaan, Num. xxxii. 27.

AHOLAH, and AHOLIBAH, two fictitious or nameless women, adopted by Solomon, (chap. xxiii. 4) to denote the two kingdoms of Judah and Samaaria. They are represented as sisters, and of Egyptian extraction. Aholah stands for Sanamaar, and Ahilibah for Jerusalem. The first signifies a tent, (i. e. a tent or tabernacle of her own—her religion and worship is a human invention;) the second, my tent is with her, (i. e. I, the Lord, have given to her a tabernacle and religious service.) They both prostituted themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, in imitating their abominations and idolatries; whereas the Lord abandoned them to the power of those very people, for whom they showed such excessive and impure affection. They were carried into captivity, and reduced to the servile servitude.

AHIOLAB, son of Ahishmac, of Dan, appointed with Bezaleel to construct the tabernacle, Exod. xxxv. 34.

AHUZZATH, the friend of Abimelech, king of Gezer, who accompanied him with Phicol, a general in his army, when he visited Isaac at Beersheba, to make an alliance with him, Gen. xxxvi. 26.

I. AI, a city near Bethel, eastward, Josh. vii. 2. The LXX call it Εἰρήνη, and Josephus, Εἰρήνη; others Αἰα and Σαία. Joshua having detached 3000 men against Ai, God permitted them to be repulsed, on account of the sin of Achan, who had violated the anathema pronounced against Jericho, by appropriating some of the spoil. (See Achan.) After the expiration of this offence, Joshua sent by night 30,000 men to lie in ambush behind the city, and, early the next morning, marched upon it with the remainder of his army. The king of Ai sallied hastily out of the town with his troops, and attacked the Israelites, who fled, as if under great terror, and by this feint drew the enemy into the plain. When Joshua saw the whole of them out of the gates, he elevated his spear, as a signal to the ambuscade, which immediately entered the place, now without defence, and set it on fire. The people of Ai, perceiving the rising smoke, endeavored to return, but found those who had set fire to the city in their rear, while Joshua and his army, advancing in front, destroyed them all. The king was taken alive, brought to Joshua, and afterwards hanged, Josh. viii. 32. Ai was afterward rebuilt, and is mentioned under the name of Aiath, Is. x. 28. After the exile, its former inhabitants, Benjamites, returned again to their former home, Ezra ii. 28; Neh. vii. 32; xi. 31. In the time of Eusebius and Jerome, its ruins only were visible. Euseb. Onomast. under Αἴα. A difficulty has been felt in reconciling the relations in ch. viii. verse 3 and 12. In the former verse, the writer says, that Joshua chose out 30,000 men, and sent them away by night, to lie in ambush between Bethel and Ai; whereas the latter states that he chose 5000 men the next morning, whom he sent to lie in ambush also between Bethel and Ai. Marius allows 5000 men for the ambuscade, and 25,000 for the attack of the city, being persuaded, that an army of 600,000 men could only create confusion on this occasion, without either necessity for, or advantage in, such numbers. The generality of interpreters, however, acknowledge two bodies to be placed in ambuscade, both between Bethel and Ai, one of 85,000, the other of 5000 men. Let it be stated thus: Joshua at first sent 30,000 men, who marched by night, and, to avoid discovery, went behind the eminences of Bethel. These posted themselves at the place appointed for the ambuscade. The officer at the head of them then detached 5000 men and lay hid as near as possible to the town, in order to throw themselves into it on the first opportunity. Interpreters are divided in opinion, as to the nature of the signal used by Joshua upon this occasion. Some suppose that the inscription on the bow—"Save Israel, and exalted on the point of a spear, and others that it was a javelin; the rabbins believe it to have been a staff belonging to some of their colors.

II. AI, in Jer. xxxix. 3, seems to have been a city in the land of the Ammonites, not far from Rabban.

AIAH, mother of Rizpah, who was Saul’s concubine. David delivered her children to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord, 2 Sam. xx. 6.

AIALON, from βίος, a deer, properly deer-field, the name of at least three cities in Israel.

I. AJALON in Dan, assigned to the Levites of Kohath’s family, Josh. xiv. 42; xvi. 24. It lay in or near a valley, not far from the valley of Gibeon, between Bethshemesh and Timnah, (2 Chron. xxviii. 15) and is the place in which Joshua commanded the light of the moon to be stayed, Josh. x. 12. It is probably the place mentioned by Jerome as being sitated near Nicopolis, about 30 miles N. W. of Jerusalem.

3. Aλαον in Benjamin, fortified by Rehobom, 2 Chron. xi. 10. A city of this name is mentioned by Eusebius as being three miles east of Bethel.

4. In the tribe of Zabulon, where Eleon was buried, Judg. xii. 13.

5. (feminine) a city first given to the tribe of Judah, and then to the Simeonites, Josh. xv. 32. 1 Chron. iv. 32.

AIR. The air, or atmosphere, surrounding the earth, is often denoted by the word heaven; so the birds of the air, for the air of this, Gen. xiii. 24, "Let fire come down from heaven," that is, from the air, 2 Kings i. 10. Moses menaces Israel with the effects of God's wrath, by destruction with a pestilential air, (Deut. xxxii. 22) or perhaps with a scorching wind, producing mortal diseases; or with a blast which ruins the corn, 1 Kings viii. 37. See Wind.

To "beat the air," and to "speak in the air," (1 Cor. xiv. 40; xiv. 20) are modes of expression used in most languages, signifying—to speak or act without judgment, or understanding; or to no purpose; to fatigue ourselves in vain. "The powers of the air" (Eph. ii. 2) probably mean devils, who exercise their powers principally in this air, exciting winds, storms, and tempests, or other malignant influences, (see Job i. 7) and to which, perhaps, the apostle may allude; if it be not rather an accommodation to the Jewish belief which was current in his days, that the air was the abode of evil spirits. See Air.

ALABARCHA (Am. 117), a term not found in Scripture, but which Josephus uses repeatedly, to signify the chief of the Jews in Alexandria. Philo calls this magistratus, Proconsul, Genarches, and Josephus, in some places, Edinarches; which terms signify the prince, or chief, of a nation. Some believe, that the term alabarcha was given in raillery, to the principal magistrate, or head of the Jews at Alexandria, by the Gentiles, who despised the Jews. Some derive it from Alabu, which signifies to write with; Alabarcha would then signify the "chief secretary," or collector of the customs and duties on cattle carried out of the country. Fuller derives it from the Syrian Halaph, and Arum, or Areon, that is, the undertaker, or the sovereign's delegate; for in places where the Jews were numerous, a principal of their own nation, or some other to whom they might address themselves, in their own affairs, was placed over them. Perhaps it originally signified the person who had the custom of salt; but was wantonly given to the head, or governor, of the Jews at Alexandria.

ALABASTER (Am. 117), a genus of fossils having the color of the human nail, nearly allied to marbles, and, according to Pliny, found in the neighborhood of Thebes, in Egypt, and about Damascus, in Syria. This material being very generally used to fabricate vessels for holding unguents, and perfumed liquids, many vessels were called alabaster, though made of a different substance, as gold, silver, glass, etc. In Matt. xxvi. 6, 7, we read, that "Jesus brake at table in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, a woman (Mary, sister of Lazarus, John xii. 3) poured an alabaster box of precious ointment on his head. Mark says "she brake an alabaster box," that is, the seal upon the box, or upon the neck of the vase or bottle, which kept the perfumes from evaporating, had never been removed, but was, on this occasion, first opened.

ALCIMUS, or, as he is called by Josephus, Jacimus, or Joachim, high-priest of the Jews, A. M. 3842. He was of the sacerdotal race, but his ancestors had never enjoyed the high-priesthood. Besides, he had been polluted with idolatry, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, (3 Macc. xiv. 3,) and he obtained his dignity by very irregular means. After the death of Menelaus, he was confirmed in his office by Antiochus Eupator, but did not perform its functions till after the death of Judas Maccabeus. Having obtained intelligence that Demetrius, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, had privately left Rome, and arrived in Syria, he put himself at the head of the apostate Jews who were then at Antioch, and throwing himself at the feet of the new king, besought him to defend them from the violence of Judas Maccabeus, whom he accused as an oppressor of the king's party, and who had dispersed and driven them out of their country. He also entreated him to send some one into Judea, to examine into the mischief and disorders committed by Judas Maccabeus, and to chastise his insolence. Demetrius immediately sent Bacchides with an army into Judea, and, confirming Alcimus in his office of high-priest, charged them both with the conduct of the war. Upon their arrival in Judea, they endeavored to enmure Judas and his brethren, under the presence of treating with them; but suspecting or discovering the snare, the brothers happily avoided it. About sixty Assideans, however, and many scribes and doctors of the law, relying on his oath, that no injury should be offered to them, but themselves in his power, and were all murdered.

Bacchides, having established Alcimus by force in Judea, returned into Syria, having committed the province to Alcimus, and left troops sufficient to secure the purpose. Alcimus, for some time, successfully defended himself, but Judea soon recovered the superiority, and Alcimus returned to the king, with a present of a gold crown, a palm-tree, and golden branches; which, in all probability, he had taken out of the temple, 2 Macc. xiv. 3, 4, &c. Having represented to Demetrius that his authority could not be established in Judea so long as Judas lived, the king sent another army against him, under the command of Nicanor, 1 Macc. vii. 25, seq. After several intellectual attempts to secure the person of Judas, Nicanor was killed at Caphar-salum, and his army routed. Demetrius, being informed of this, again sent Bacchides and Alcimus, with a strong reinforcement, formed of the choicest of his troops. Judas, whose little army had been so reduced, that he had not above eight hundred men, ventured, with this small force, to attack the enemy, and after prodigies of valor, died, overwhelmed by numbers, 1 Macc. ix. 1—22.

The death of Judas delivered Alcimus and his party from a formidable enemy, and he began to exercise the offices of the high-priesthood; but, attempting to pull down the wall of the inner court, which had been built by the prophets (that, probably, which separated the altar of burnt offering from the priest's court,) God punished him by a stroke of the palm, of which he died, after enjoying the pontificate three or four years, 1 Macc. vii. 9; ii. 54.

ALEXANDER

I. ALEXANDER THE GREAT, son and successor of Philip king of Macedon, is denoted in the prophecies of Daniel, by a leopard with four wings, signifying his great strength, and the unusual rapidity of his conquest, ch. vii. 6; also as a one-horned bear, running over the earth so swiftly as not to touch it; attacking a ram with two horns, overthrowing him, and trampling him under foot, without any being able to rescue him, ch. viii. 4—7. The bear-profile augured Alexander: the ram, Darius C odor Mannus, the last of the Persian kings. In the state beheld by Nebuchadnezzar, in a dream, (ch. ii. 38.) the belly of brass was the emblem of Alexander, and the legs of iron denoted his successors. He was appointed by God to destroy the Persian empire, and to substitute the Grecian monarchy. Alexander was born at Pella, ante A. D. 355. Philip was killed at a marriage feast, when Alexander was about eighteen. After he had performed his last duties to his father, he was chosen by the Grecian general of their troops against the Persians, and entered Asia with an army of 34,000 men, A. M. 3670. In one campaign he subdued almost all Asia Minor. He was then taken and sacked, one of Xerxes' generals; and Darius himself, whose army consisted of 400,000 foot, and 100,000 horse, in the narrow passes which lead from Syria to Cilicia. Darius fled, abandoning his camp and baggage, his children, wife, and mother, to the mercy of the conqueror. And Darius himself, whose army consisted of 400,000 foot, and 100,000 horse, in the narrow passes which lead from Syria to Cilicia. Darius fled, abandoning his camp and baggage, his children, wife, and mother, to the mercy of the conqueror. Alexander came to Tyre, and the Tyrians opposing his entrance into their city, besieged it. At the same time he wrote to Jaddus, high-priest of the Jews, that he expected to be acknowledged by him, and to receive those submissions which had hitherto been paid to the king of Persia. Jaddus refusing to comply, as having sworn fidelity to Darius, Alexander resolved to march against Jerusalem, when he had reduced Tyre. After a protracted siege, the city was taken and sacked. This victory over the Persians he extended to Palestine, and reduced it. As he was marching against Jerusalem, intending to punish the high-priest, Juddas, fearing his resentiment, had recourse to God by prayers and sacrifices. The Lord, in a dream, commanded Jaddus to open the gates to the conqueror, and, dressed in his pontifical ornaments, attended by the priests, in their formalities, at the head of his people, to receive Alexander in triumph. Jaddus obeyed; and Alexander, seeing from a distance this company advancing, was struck with admiration, and approaching the high-priest, saluted him first, then adored God, whose name was engraved on a thin plate of gold worn by the high-priest on his forehead. The people, in the mean while, surrounded Alexander, with great acclamations. The kings of Syria, who accompanied him, and the great officers about Alexander, could not comprehend the meaning of his conduct. Parmenio alone ventured to ask, Why he, to whom all people prostrated themselves, had prostrated himself before the high-priest of the Jews? Alexander replied, that he paid this respect to God, and not to the high-priest; "for," added he, "while I was yet in Macedon, I saw the God of the Jews, who appeared to me in the same form and dress as this high-priest, and enjoined me to march into Asia, promising, under his guidance, to render me master of the Persian empire. For this reason, as soon as I perceived this habit, I recollected the vision, and understood that my undertaking was favored by God, and that, under his protection, I might expect very soon to obtain the Persian empire, and happily to accomplish all my designs." Having said this, Alexander accompanied Jaddus into the city, and offered sacrifices in the temple, punctually conforming to the directions of the priests, and leaving to the high-priest the honors and functions annexed to his dignity. Jaddus showing him the prophecies of Daniel, in which it was said that a Grecian prince should destroy the Persian empire, the king was confirmed in his opinion, that God had chosen him to execute that great work. At his departure, he bade the Jews ask what they would of him; but the high-priest desired only the liberty of living under his government, according to their own laws, with an exemption from tribute every seventh year, because in that year the Jews neither tilled their grounds, nor reaped their products. Alexander readily granted this request; and as they bestowed on the Jews the same favor to the Jews beyond the Euphrates, in Babylonia and Media, they promised that privilege, as soon as he had conquered those provinces. This done, he left Jerusalem, and visited other cities; being everywhere received with great testimonies of friendship and submission. The Samaritans dwelt at Sichem, observing how kindly Alexander had treated the Jews, resolved to say that they also were, by religion, Jews; for it was their practice, when they saw the affairs of the Jews prosper, to boast that they were descended from Manasseh and Ephraim; but when they thought it their interest to say the contrary, they would not fail to affirm, and even to swear, that they had no relation to the Jews. They came, therefore, with many demonstrations of joy, to meet Alexander; entertained him to visit their temple and city, and petitioned him for an exemption from taxes every seventh year, because they also neither tilled nor reaped that year. Alexander replied, that he had granted this exemption only to Jews; but at his return, he would treat the Samaritans in a just manner, and do them justice. Joseph. Ant. xi. c. 8.

It should here be observed, that these accounts of Alexander's reverence for the high-priest, his dream, etc. rest only on the authority of Josephus, and are probably to be regarded as a Jewish legend. — R.

Alexander, having conquered Egypt, and regulated it, gave orders for the continuation of his new city, Alexandria, and departed thence about spring, into the East, in pursuit of Darius. Passing through Palestine, he was informed that the Samaritans, in a general insurrection, had killed Andromachus, governor of Syria and Palestine, who, coming to Samaria, to regulate some affairs, had been burned in his house by the inhabitants. This act incensed Alexander, who loved Andromachus, and he therefore ordered all who were concerned in his murder to be executed; the rest he banished from Samaria, and settled a colony of Macedonians in their room. The Samaritans who escaped this calamity, collected in Sichem, at the foot of mount Gerizim, which became their capital, as it still continues. And lest the 8000 men of this nation, who were in his service, and had accompanied him since the siege of Tyre, if sent back into their own country, might renew the spirit of rebellion, Alexander was commanded to send to the southern province of Egypt, and there assigned them lands. Josephus, c. Apion. ii.

After Alexander had subdued Asia, and opened a way to India, with incredible rapidity, he gave himself up to intemperance; and having drank to excess, he fell sick, and died, after he had obliged "all the world to be quiet before him," 1 Macc. i. 3.

Being sensible that his end was near, he sent for his court, and declared, that he gave the empire to the most deserving." Some affirm, however, that he regulated the succession by a will. The author of the first book of Maccabees (chap. i. 6.) says, he divided his kingdom among his generals while he was living; and it is certain, that a partition was made of his dominions among the four principal officers of his army. He died A. M. 3831, ante A. D. 323, at the age of thirty-three, after reigning twelve years; six as king of Macedon, and six as monarch of Asia.

The name of Alexander is equally celebrated in the writings of the orientals, as in those of the Greeks and Romans; but they vary extremely from the accounts which western historians give of him. They call him Alexander Balas, "the drugged Alexander," alluding to the two horns of his empire (or his power) in the east and west.

II. ALEXANDER BALAS, so called from Bala, his mother, was the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes: he is, on medals, surnamed Theopator Eucratides. Some historians, however, will not allow him to be even the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes. Florus calls him an unknown person, and of uncertain extraction. Justin says that the enemies of Demetrius, king of Syria, subdued a young man, from among the meanest of the people, to declare himself son and heir of Antiochus; and that he, warring with success against the king of Syria, obtained his kingdom. Appian affirms that Alexander Balas pretended to be of the family of the Seleucidae, without any right to that pretension; and Athenaeus says, that he was the supposed son of Antiochus Epiphanes. But the Roman senate, the Jews, the Egyptians, and the Syrians, acknowledged him as son and heir of that prince. Herodotus of Byzantium was the first who declared with Demetrius Alexander Bala on the throne of Syria, and to displace Demetrius, who was his particular enemy. He carried Alexander, and Laodicea, a daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes, to Rome, and by presents and intrigue prevailed on the senate not only to acknowledge Alexander as the heir of Antiochus, but also to afford him assistance in recovering the dominions of his father. Having made preparations at Ephesus to prosecute the war against Demetrius, Alexander sailed into Syria, and having obtained possession of Ptolemais, he wrote to Jonathan Maccabees, sending him a purple robe and a crown of gold, to induce him to espouse his cause, 1 Macc. x. 18. Jonathan yielded to his solicitation, and, notwithstanding the liberal promises and assurances of Demetrius, declared for Alexander.

The contending kings committed the determination of their cause to a decisive battle, in which Demetrius, after being deserted by his troops, and performing prodigies, was killed, 1 Macc. x. 19 and 20. Josephus, Ant. xiii. 2. Alexander Balas, having thus obtained possession of the kingdom, determined to strengthen himself by an alliance with the king of Egypt, whose daughter he demanded in marriage. Ptolemy complied with the demand, and the marriage was celebrated in the town of Aulaca, in the western province of Egypt, where the kings met, 1 Macc. x. 51-58. Jos. Ant. xiii. 4. Jonathan was also present, and received marks of distinction from both the princes.

Alexander Balas, however, did not long remain undisturbed in possession of his throne. Within two years, Demetrius Nicator, the eldest son of the former Demetrius Soter, at the head of some troops which he had received from Lasithenes, of Crete, passed into Cilicia. Alexander was then in Phœnicia, but instantly returned to Antioco, that he might prepare for the arrival of Demetrius. In the mean while, Apollonius, who had received the command of Demetrius's troops, was defeated by Jonathan Maccabees and his brother Simon, who also took Azotus and Ascalon, and returned laden with spoil to Jerusalem. Alexander, in reward for these services, advanced Jonathan to new honors, sent him the buckle of gold, which was generally given only to near relations of the king, and made an addition to his territory, 1 Macc. x. 57.

While this was transpiring in Syria, Ptolemies Philometer was devising how to unite the kingdom of Syria with Egypt, and determined upon private measures to destroy both Demetrius Nicator and Alexander Balas. Under pretence of assisting his son-in-law Alexander, he entered Syria with a powerful army, and after having seized several cities, he represented that Balas had prepared ambuscades for him in Ptolemais, with intention to surprise him. Ptolemy advanced to Antioco without resistance, assumed the throne, and put on his head the two diadems of Egypt and Syria, 1 Macc. xi. 1-13. Jos. Ant. xiii. 4.

Balas, who had returned into Cilicia, there gathered a numerous army, with which he marched against Ptolemy and Demetrius Nicator, now con federated against him, and gave them battle on the river Orantheas; but being overcome, he fled, with five hundred horse, into Arabia; where Zabdiel, a prince of the Arameans, cut off his head, and sent it to Ptolemy. Such is the history, at least in the first book of Maccabees, (xi. 15-17.) but other historians relate, that Alexander's generals, considering their own interests and security, treated privately with Ptolemy; and Balas, to secure himself, sent his head to Ptolemy at Antioco, A. M. 3859. Alexander Balas left a son very young, called Antiochus Theos, whom Tryphon raised to the throne of Syria.

III. ALEXANDER JANNAEUS, third son of John Hircanus, who left three sons, or five, according to Josephus, de Bello, i. 3. The father was particularly fond of Antigonus and Aristobulus, but could not endure his third son, Alexander, because he had dreamed that he would reign after him; which dream extremely afflicted him, insomuch as, according to the law of nature, it implied the death of his two brothers. Events justified the dream. Antigonus never reigned, and Aristobulus reigned but for a short time. After his death, Salome, or Alexander's widow, liberated Alexander, whom Aristobulus had confined in prison since their father's death, and made him king. Alexander, being seated on the throne, put to death one of his brothers, who had formed a design to put him to death, and his name is blotted in a written record under another name, called Abalama, who, being contented with a private condition, lived peaceably, and retired from public employments. Alexander was of a warlike, enterprising disposition; and when he had relinquished his dominions he marched against Ptolemais, but was soon compelled to relinquish the object of his expedition, in order to defend his own territories against Ptolemy Lathyros, who had marched a powerful army into Galilee. Alexander gave him battle near Asaphus, not far from the Jordan; but Ptolemy killed 30,000, or, as others say, 50,000 of his men. After this victory, he met with no resistance. His mother, Cleopatra, however, apprehensive for the safety of Egypt, determined to stop his further progress, and for this purpose levied a numerous army, and equipping a large fleet, soon landed in Phoenicia. Ptolemais opened its gates to receive her; and here Alexander Janneus presented himself in her camp with considerable presents, and was received as an unhappy prince, an enemy of Ptolemy, who had no refuge but the queen's protection. Cleopatra made an alliance with him in the city of Scythopolis, and Alexander marched with his troops into Cæcilia-Syria, where he took the town of Gadara, after a siege of ten months, and after that Amathus, one of the best fortified cities in the country, where Theodorus, son of Zeno, had lodged his most valuable property, as in absolute security. This Theodorus, falling suddenly on Alexander's army, killed 10,000, and plundered a vast number of cattle. Alexander, however, was not deterred by this disaster from prosecuting his purposes: having recruited his army, he besieged Raphia, Anthedon, and Gaza, towns on the Mediterranean, and took them; the latter, after a desperate resistance, was reduced to a heap of ruins.

After this, Alexander returned to Jerusalem, but did not find that peace he expected. The Jews revolted; and on the feast of tabernacles, while he, as high-priest, was preparing to sacrifice, the people assembled in the temple had the insolence to throw lemons at him, taken from the branches which they carried in their hands. To these insults they added reproaches, crying that he who had been a slave, was not worthy to go up to the holy altar, and offer solemn sacrifices. Provoked by this insolence, Alexander put the seditious to the sword, and killed about 6,000. Afterwards he erected a partition of wood before the altar and the inner temple, to prevent the approach of the people; and to defend himself in future against such attempts, he took into his pay guards from Pisidia and Cilicia. Finding Jerusalem likely to continue the seat of clamor and discontent, Alexander quitted the metropolis, at the head of his army; and, having crossed the Jordan, he made war upon the Moabites and Ammonites, and obliged them to pay tribute; attacked Amathus, the fortress beyond Jordan, before mentioned, and razed it; and also made war with Obeda, king of the Arabs, whom he subdued. On his return to Jerusalem he found the Jews more incensed against him than ever; and a civil war shortly ensued, in which he killed above 50,000 persons. All his endeavors to bring about a reconciliation proving fruitless, Alexander one day asked them what they would have him do to acquire their good will. They answered unanimously, "that he had nothing to do but to kill himself." After this they sent deputies to desire succor from Demetrius Eucerus, against their king, who marched into Judea, with 3,000 horse, and 40,000 infantry, and encamped at Sichem. A battle ensued, in which Alexander was defeated, and compelled to fly to the mountains for shelter. This occurrence, however, contributed to his re-establishment, for a large number of the Jews, touched with the unhappy condition of their king, deserted Demetrius, retiring into Syria, left the Jews to oppose their king with their own forces. Alexander, collecting his army, marched against his rebellious subjects, whom he overcame in every engagement, and having shut up the greatest of them at Bethopolis, he forced the town, made them prisoners, and carried them to Jerusalem, where he ordered eight hundred of them to be crucified before him, during a great entertainment which he made for his friends; and before these unhappy wretches had expired, he commanded their wives and children to be murdered in their presence—an unheard-of and excessive cruelty, which occasioned the people of his own party to call him "Thracian," meaning "as cruel as a Thracian." Some time afterwards, Antiochus, surnamed Dionysius, having conquered Damascus, resolved to invade Judea; but Alexander defeated his intention, and compelled him to return into Arabia, where he was killed. Aretas, the succeeding king of Damascus, however, came into Judea and defeated Alexander, in the plain of Sephalis. A peace being concluded, Aretas returned to Damascus; and Alexander ingratiated himself with the Jews. Having given himself up to excessive drinking, he brought on a violent fever, which terminated his life. His queen, Alexandra, observing him to be near his end, and foreseeing all she had to fear from a mutinous people, not easily governed, and her children not of age to conduct her affairs, was greatly distressed. Alexander told her, that to reign in peace, she should conceal his death from the army, till Ragab, which he was then besieging, was taken; that, when returned to Jerusalem, she should give the Pharisees some share in the government; that she should send for the principal of them, show them the dead body, and give them permission to treat it with what indignities they pleased, in revenge for the ill treatment they had received from him, and promise that she would in future do nothing in the government without their advice and participation. "If you do thus," he added, "you may be assured, they will make a very honorable funeral for me, and you will reign in peace, supported by their credit and authority among the people." Having said these words, he expired, aged forty-eight, after a reign of twenty-seven years.

A. M. 3906, ante A. D. 76. This admission of the Pharisees into the government, demands the especial notice of the reader, as it accounts, not only for their influence over the minds of the people, but also for their connection with the rulers, and their power as public governors, which appear so remarkably in the history of the Gospels; much beyond what might be expected from a sect merely religious. Alexander left two sons, Hircanus and Aristobulus, who disputed the kingdom and high-priesthood, till the time of Herod the Great, and whose dissensions caused the ruin of their family, and were the means of Herod's elevation. Joseph. Ant. xiii. c. 12—16. [21—24.]

See ALEXANDER.

IV. ALEXANDER, son of Antigonus and Alexandra, and grandson of Alexander Janneus, was to have been carried captive to Rome, with his brother Antigonus, when Pompey took Jerusalem from Aristobulus. On the way, however, he found means to escape, and, returning to Judea, with 600 infantry and 150 horse, in which he performed many gallant actions, and seized the fortresses of Alexander.

Alexandrium and Machæmus. Gabinus, the general of the Roman troops, however, drove him from the city, killed 6000 of his men, and made many prisoners. By the mediation of his mother, Alexander, matters were accommodated with Gabinus, and the Romans marched into Egypt, but were soon compelled to return, by the violent proceedings of Alexander. Wherever he met with Romans, he sacrificed them to his resentment, and a number were compelled to fortify themselves on mount Gerizim, where Gabinus found him at his return from Egypt. Being apprehensive of engaging the great number of troops who were with Alexander, Gabinus sent Antipater with offers of general paroles, if they laid down their arms. This had the desired success; many deserters Alexander, and retired to their own houses; but with 30,000 still remaining, he resolved to give the Romans battle. The armies met at the foot of mount Tabor, where, after a very obstinate action, Alexander was overcome, with the loss of 10,000 men.

Under the government of Cassius, Alexander again began to embolden affairs; but after the unsuccessful expedition against the Parthians, Cassius obliged him, under conditions, to continue quiet, while he marched to the Ephrates, to oppose the passage of the Parthians. During the wars between Cassius and Pompey, at Alexandria, and the other dispositions of the Macedonians, Herod was expelled his interest. Aristobulus was poisoned, and Alexander beheaded at Antioch, A. M. 3845. Joseph. Ant. xiv. Bell. Jud. i. c. 8. [c. 6, 7.]

V. ALEXANDER, son of Jason, was sent to Rome to renew the alliances the Jews and Romans: he is named in the decree of the senate directed to the Jews, in the ninth year of Herod's pontificate, A. M. 3865; B. C. 69. Jos. Ant. xiv. 21.

VII. ALEXANDER, son of the Theodora, was sent to Rome, by Hiero, to renew his alliance with the Jews. He is named in the decree of the senate, addressed to the magistrates of Ephesus, made in the conscription of Dolabella; which specified that the Jews should not be forced into military service, because they could not bear arms on the sabbath day, nor have, at all times, such provisions in the armies as were authorized by their law. Jos. Ant. xiv. 17.

This intelligence confirmed the fears of Herod, and rendered him suspicious of all persons about his court. Alexander was put in prison, and his principal friends to the torture. The prince, however, was not dejected at this storm. He not only denied nothing which had been extorted from his friends, but admitted even more than they had alleged against him; whether designing to confound the credulity and suspicions of his father, or to involve the whole court in perplexities, from which they should be unable to extricate themselves. He conveyed letters to the king, in which he represented that the court of Alexandersion was useless; that, in fact, he had laid ambuscades for him; that the principal courtiers were his accomplices, naming, in particular, Phereor, and his most intimate friends; adding that he came secretly to him by night, and that the whole court wished for nothing more than the moment when they might be delivered from that pain in which they were continually kept by his cruelties.
ALEXANDER

In the mean time, Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and father-in-law of Alexander, informed of what was passing in Judea, came to Jerusalem, for the purpose of effecting, if possible, a reconciliation between Herod and his son. Knowing the violence of Herod's temper, he desired to try his present situation, and to condemn the unnatural conduct of Alexander. The sympathy of Archelaus produced some relentings in the bosom of Herod, and finally led to his reconciliation with Alexander, and the detection of the guilty parties. But this calm did not last long. On one Eurycles, a Lacedemonian, having insinuated himself into Herod's favor, gained also the confidence of Alexander; and the young prince opened his heart freely, concerning the grounds of his discontent against his father. Eurycles repeated all to the king, whose suspicions against his sons were revived, and he at length ordered them to be tortured. Of all the charges brought against the young princes, nothing could be proved, except that they had formed a design to retire into Cappadocia, where they might be free from their father's tyranny, and live in peace. Herod, however, having substantiated this fact, took the rest for granted, and despatched two envoys to Rome, demanding from Augustus justice against Alexander and Aristobulus. Augustus ordered them to return to Syria, the lordly sovereignty of the neighboring provinces, particularly mentioning Archelaus as one; and giving Herod permission, should they be found guilty, to punish them as he might deem proper. Herod convened the judges, but basely omitted Archelaus, Alexander's father-in-law; and then, leaving his sons under a strong guard, at Puteane, he pleaded his own cause against them, before the assembly, consisting of 150 persons. After adducing against them every thing he had been able to collect, he concluded by saying, that, as a king, he might have tried and condemned them by his own authority; but that he preferred bringing them before such an assembly to avoid the imputation of injustice and cruelty. Saturninus, who had been formerly consul, voted that they should be punished, but not with death; and his three sons voted with him: but they were overruled by Volumnius, who gratified the father, by condemning his sons, deeply, and in such a manner as to join with him in this cruel and unjust sentence. The time and manner of carrying it into execution were left entirely to Herod. Damascenus, Tyro, and other friends, interfered, in order to save the lives of these unfortunate princes. The rain remained some time in confinement; and, after the report of another plot, were conveyed to Sebaste, or Samaria, and there strangled, A. M. 3390, one year before the birth of J. C. and four before the usual computation of A. D. Joseph. Ant. xv. xvi.

The reader is requested to pay particular attention to this history of the behavior of Herod to his two sons, because it has a strong connection with the gospel histories of the massacre of the infants—for the king who could slay his own sons, would not scruple to slay those of others; and it suggests good reasons for the alarm of the whole city, and of the priests, from whom Herod inquired where the Messiah should be born; also, for the flight of Joseph and Mary into Egypt, and for their fear of returning again into Judea, under the power of his successor, who, as they supposed, might very probably inherit this king's cruel and tyrannical disposition.

VIII. ALEXANDER, a Jew, apparently an orator, mentioned Acts xix. 33. The people of Ephesus being in uproar, and incensed against the Jews for despising the worship of Diana, the Jews put Alexander forward, to plead their cause, and probably to disclaim all connection with Paul and the Christians. The mob, however, would not hear him.

IX. ALEXANDER, a copper smith or brazier, who deserted the Christian faith, 1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 14.

X. ALEXANDER, a man who had apparently been high-priest, Acts iv. 6.

XI. ALEXANDER, the son of Simon, and brother of Rufus. His father, Simon, was compelled to aid in bearing the cross of Jesus, Mark xv. 21.

ALEXANDRA, or SALOME, was first married to Aristobulus, and afterwards became the wife of Alexander Janneus, his brother. In the account of this prince, we have noticed the advice which he gave upon his death-bed to Alexandrea, with a view to conciliate the Pharisees, and establish herself in the kingdom. Alexander followed his counsel, and secured the object of her wishes. The Pharisees, won by the marks of respect which she paid to them, exerted their influence over the people, and Alexander Janneus was buried with great pomp and splendor, and Alexandra ruled during the space of nine years. Under her government, the country enjoyed external peace, but was distracted by internal strife. The Pharisees, having obtained an ascendancy over the mind of the queen, proceeded to exact from her many important advantages for themselves and friends, and then to obtain the punishment and persecution of all those who had been opposed to them during the king's reign. Many of the Sadducees, therefore, were put to death; and their vindictiveness proceeded to such acts of cruelty and injustice, that none of Alexander's friends could be secure of their lives. Many of the principal persons who had served in the late king's armies, with Aristobulus at their head, entreated permission to quit their country, or to be placed in some of the distant fortresses, where they might be sheltered from the persecution of their enemies. After some deliberation, she adopted the expedient of distributing them among the different garrisons of the kingdom, excepting those, however, in which she had deposited her money. In the mean time, her son Aristobulus was devising the means of seizing upon the throne, and an opportunity at length presented itself for carrying his project into effect. The queen being seized with a dangerous illness, Aristobulus, in the name of the judges, presented her son Aristobulus was devising the means of seizing upon the throne, and an opportunity at length presented itself for carrying his project into effect. The queen being seized with a dangerous illness, Aristobulus, in the name of the judges, presented her son Aristobulus with the title of king, and she died on the same day. In the year 34 B.C. Herod the Great, having been raised to the throne, had the fortresses in which his friends had been placed, and, before the necessary measures could be taken to stay his progress, he was placed at the head of a large number of troops. Alexandra, finding her death at hand, left the crown to devolve upon Herod, her eldest son; but he, being opposed by Aristobulus, retired to private life. Alexandra died, B. C. 63, aged seventy-three years. Jos. Ant. xii. ult. xiv. 1.

ALEXANDRIA, a celebrated city in Egypt, situated between the Mediterranean sea and the lake Marenos, the basin of which is now filled up by sand. It was founded by Alexander the Great, under Dinocrates, the architect who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, B. C. 332, and peopled by colonies of Greeks and Jews. Had this prince realized his ambitious projects for becoming the undisturbed master of the world, he could hardly have selected a more convenient situation for commanding and concentrating its resources. Alexandria rose to the rank of a city, combining in itself the point of magnitude and wealth, second only to Rome itself.

The ancient city, according to Pliny, was about fifteen miles in circuit, peopled by 300,000 free citizens, and as many slaves. From the gate of the sea ran one magnificent street, 3000 feet broad, through the entire length of the city, to the gate of Canopus, affording a beach, and a view of the shipping in the port, whether north in the Mediterranean or south in the noble basin of the Mareotic lake. Another street, of equal width, intersected this at right angles, in a square half a league in circumference. Thus the whole city appears to have been divided by two streets intersecting each other.

Upon the death of Alexander, whose body was deposited in his new city, Alexandria became the capital of Egypt, under the Ptolemies, and rose to its highest splendor. During the reign of the three first princes of this name, its glory was at the highest. The most celebrated philosophers from the East, as well as from Greece and Rome, resorted thither for instruction, and eminent men in every department of knowledge, were found within its walls. Ptolemy Soter, the first of that line of kings, formed the museum, the library of 700,000 volumes, and several other splendid works, and his son Philadelphus consummated several of his undertakings after his decease. At the death of Cleopatra, c.sxt. A. D. 36, Alexandria passed into the hands of the Romans, under whom it became the theatre of several memorable events, and after having enjoyed the highest fame for upwards of a thousand years, it submitted to the arms of the caliph Omar, A. D. 646. Such was the magnificence of the city, that the conquerors themselves were astonished at the extent of their acquisition. "I have taken," said Amrou, the general of Omar, to his master, "the great city of the West. It is impossible for me to enumerate the variety of its riches and beauty; I shall content myself with observing that it contains 4000 palaces, 4000 baths, 400 theatres or places of amusement, 12,000 shops for the sale of vegetable goods, and 40,000 tributary Jews." With this event, says a modern geographer, the sun of Alexandria may be said to have set: the blighting hand of Islamism was laid on it; and although the genius and resources of such a city could not be immediately destroyed, it continued to languish until the passage by the Cape of Good Hope, in the fifteenth century, gave a new channel to the trade which for so many centuries had been its support; and at this day, Alexandria, like most Eastern cities, presents a mixed spectacle of ruin and wretchedness—of fall'n greatness and enslaved human beings.

[The present Alexandria, or, according to the pronunciation of the inhabitants, Skenderia, occupies only about the eighth part of the site of the ancient city. The splendid temples have been exchanged for wretched mosques and miserable churches, and the magnificent palaces for mean and ill built dwellings. The city, which was of old so celebrated for its commerce and navigation, is now merely the port of Cairo, a place where ships may touch, and where wares may be exchanged. The modern city is built with the ruins of the ancient. The streets are so narrow, that the inhabitants can lay mats of reeds from one roof to the opposite, to protect them from the searching sun. The inhabitants consist of Turks, Arabs, Copts, Jews, and Armenians. Many Europeans have counting houses here, where the factors exchange European for oriental merchandise.

It was under Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to Aristaeus, that the Greek or Alexandrine version of the Scriptures was made here by learned Jews, seventy-two in number; and hence it is called the Septuagint, or version of the Seventy. But this narration is entitled to little credit. It is true, however, that the Jews established themselves in great numbers in this city, very soon after it was founded. Josephus says, (c. Apion. ii. 4. Ant. xiv. 7. 2.) that Alexander himself assigned to them a particular quarter of the city, and allowed them equal rights and privileges with the Greeks. Philo, who himself lived there in the time of Christ, affirms (Opp. ii. p. 565. ed. Mangely,) that of five parts of the city, the Jews inhabited two. According to his statements also, there dwelt in his time in Alexandria, and the other Egyptian cities, not less than ten hundred thousand Jews. (ib. p. 532.) This, however, would seem exaggerated. At that period they suffered cruel persecutions from Flaccus, the Roman governor; which Philo has described in a separate treatise,—Christianity was early known and found professors here. According to Eusebius, (Hist. Ecc. ii. c. 17.) the apostle Mark first introduced the gospel into Alexandria; and according to less authentic accounts, he suffered martyrdom here, about A. D. 68. A church dedicated to this evangelist, belonging to the Coptic Jacobite Christians, still exists in Alexandria. See Rosenmueller. Bib. Geog. iii. p. 291, seq. *R."

The Jewish and Christian schools in Alexandria were long held in the highest esteem, and there is reason to believe that the latter, besides producing many eloquent preachers, paid much attention to the multiplying of copies of the sacred writings. The famous Alexandrian manuscript, now deposited in the British Museum, is well known. (See Bible.) For many years Christianity continued to flourish at this seat of learning, but at length it became the source, and for some time continued the stronghold, of the Arab heresy. The divisions, discord, and animosities, which were thus introduced, rendered the churches of Alexandria an easy prey to the Arabian impostor, and at the time to which we have already referred, they were swept away by his followers.

The commerce of Alexandria being so great, especially in corn—for Egypt was considered to be the granary of Rome—the centurion might readily send a ship of Alexandria—corn-laden—sailing into Italy." Acts xxvii. 6; xxviii. 11. It was in this city that Apollos was born, Acts xviii. 24.

ALEXANDRIUM, a castle built by Alexander Janneus, king of the Jews, on a mountain, near Corea, one of the principal cities of Judea, on the side of Samaria, in the direction of Jericho, towards the frontiers of Ephraim and Benjamin, which was demolished by Gabinius, but afterwards rebuilt by Herod. Here the princes of Alexander Janneus's family were mostly buried; and hither Herod ordered the bodies of his sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, to be carried, after they had been put to death at Sebaste, or Samaria. ALGUM, see ALMUG.

ALIEN, a stranger or foreigner. Those who are without an interest in the new covenant, or who are not members of the church of Christ, are said to be "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel." Eph. ii. 12.

ALLEGORY, a figurative discourse, which employs terms appropriate to one thing, in order to express another. It is a metaphor prolonged and pursued; as, for example, when the prophets represent the Jews under the allegory of a vine, planted, cultivated, watered, by the hand of God, but which, instead of producing good fruit, brings forth sour grapes; and so of others. The same, when the apostle compares the two covenants of Sinai and the gospel, or Jerusalem that now is, and the heavenly Jerusalem; "which things," he says, "may be allegorized." As this was common among the Jews, in writing to Jews, he adopts their custom, in which, having been deeply learned, he could, no doubt, have greatly enlarged; but then, where had been the power of the cross of Christ; the genuine unsophisticated doctrines of the gospel?

Allegories, as well as metaphors, parables, similitudes, and comparisons, are frequent in Scripture. The Jews, and the people of the East in general, were fond of this sort of figurative discourse, and used it in almost everything they said. One chief business of a commentator is, to distinguish between the allegorical and literal meaning of passages, and to reduce the allegorical to the literal sense. The ancient Jews, as the Therapeutæ, the author of the Book of Wisdom, Josephus, and Philo, (and in imitation of them, many of the fathers,) turned even the historical parts of Scripture into allegories; although the literal sense in such passages is most clearly seen. Allegorical explanations may interest, perhaps, but they are good for little; they cannot justly be produced as proofs of anything; unless where Christ, or his apostles, have so applied them.

The ancient philosophers and poets also used to deliver doctrines, and to explain things allegorically. Pythagoras instructed his disciples in this symbolical manner, believing it to be the most proper method of explaining religious doctrines, and to be a help to memory. Euripus of Megara did, indeed, forbid the use of allegories and emblems, and to rend things obscure; and Socrates taught in a manner the most natural and simple, excepting those ironies which he sometimes interspersed in his discourses. But the philosophers, generally, were excessively fond of allegorical and mystical theology, and they were too closely imitated by the early Christians. See Symbols.

ALLELUIA, or Hallelujah, (praise Jehovah.) This word occurs at the beginning, and at the end, of many of the Psalms. It was also sung on solemn days of rejoicing; "and all her streets (i. e. of Jerusalem) shall sing alleluia," says Tobit, speaking of the rebuilding of Jerusalem, Tob. xiii. 18. John, in the Revelation, says, (chap. xix. 1. 3. 4. 6.) "I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, who cried, Alleluia; and the four living creatures fell down, and worshipped God; saying, Alleluia." This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church, and it is still occasionally used in devotional psalmody.

ALLON BACHUTH, the oak of weeping, a place in Bethel, where Reuben's nurse was buried, Gen. xxxv. 8.

ALLOPHYLI, Allophylus, a Greek term, used by the LXX., which signifies, properly, strangers; but the Hebrew term, to which it corresponds, is generally taken, in the Old Testament, to signify the Philistines.

ALLUSH, or ALUS. The Israelites, being in the wilderness of Shur, departed from Dophkah to Alush, and from thence to Rephidim, Numb. xxxii. 13. In Judg. (chap. i. 9.) Ochos or Chalusa, and Kesat, are set down as being near each other. Eusebius and Jerome fix Alus in Idumea, about Gabala, that is, about Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea; for, according to them, the Gabalene is near Petra. Alus is also called Eluza, or Chalusa. In the accounts of the empire, it is situated in the third Palestine, and is placed by Ptolemy among the cities of Idumea. The Jerusalem Targum on Genesis xxv. 18, and on Exodus xv. 22, translates Shur and the desert of Shur, by Allus. But Shur could not have been far from the present Suez, Exod. xv. 22. It is impossible to assign definitely the position of Alus, the encampment of the Israelites.

ALMON, a city of Benjamin, given to Aaron's family, Josh. xxi. 18; probably the Alameth mentioned 1 Chron. vi. 60.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, one of the stations of the Israelites before they reached mount Nebo, Numb. xxxii. 46.

ALMOND-TREE, ʾawr, shaken, from a root which signifies to watch; for, in fact, the almond-tree is one of the first trees that blossom in the spring, and, as it were, awakes, while most are asleep by reason of winter. This tree is often shaken, or shaken. The Lord, intending to express to Jeremiah (l. 11.) the vigilance of his wrath against his people, showed him the branch of an almond-tree; where the duplicity of meaning in the word shaken is difficult to express in a translation. "What see the watchman?" He answers, "I see the rod of an almond-tree," (i. e. a watcher.) The Lord replies: "I will watch over my word to fulfil it." The almond-tree resembles a peach-tree, but is larger. In Judea it blossoms in January, and by March has fruit. Aaron's rod, which bore blossoms and fruit in the wilderness, (Numb. xviii. 8,) was of the almond-tree. The author of Ecclesiastes, (xii. 5,) expressing metaphorically the whiteness of an old man's hair, says, "The rod of an almond-tree shall flourish." The blossoms of this tree are white.

ALMS, charitable donation. The word is derived ultimately from the Greek ἀλμός, mercy, pity, compassion.

ALMUG, or by transposition Aluros, a kind of wood which Hiram brought from Ophir, 1 Kings x. 11; 2 Chron. ii. 8. The rabbins generally render it coral; others, ebony, or pine. It certainly is not coral, for this is not proper to make musical instruments, nor to be used in rails, or a staircase, to which uses, the Scripture tells us, the wood almug was put. The pine-tree is too common in Judea, and the neighboring country, to search for it as far as Ophir. The word ʾamun (by which the word is rendered in the Vulgate) is that of the cypress-tree, known to the ancients, and much esteemed for its odor and beauty. It came from Mauritania. Phin. xiii. 16.

Calmet is of opinion, that by almug, or alurg, or simply gim, taking a for an article, is to be understood oily and gummy wood, particularly of the tree which produces gum Arabic. It is said gum Asmo- nic, proceeds from a tree resembling that which bears myrrh; and gum Arabic comes from the black acacia, which he takes to be the same as the Shittim wood, frequently mentioned by Moses; if so, Solomon's Almsg and Moses's Shebes, his remarks, would be the same wood. See Surpars.

[See also Almsg.] The Almsg of the East Indies, is a native of the East Indies, and much used for costly work. So Romans.

Kermekhi compares the Arabian Basamasa, which is the Arabian name of the wood usually known in Europe by the appellation Sandal-wood, from the tree Casellapius of Limnos. There are various species of this tree. That called the Casselapius cappa is a native of the East Indies, Siam, the Moluccas islands, and Japan; as are also several other species. Its wood is very durable, and is used in fine cabinet work. It yields also a dye of a beautiful red color, for which it is much used. Its resemblance in color to coral may have given occasion for the name Cappia, which, in Babylon, still signifies coral; and then the meaning of the name would be coral-wood. Ge-oremia adopts this supposition. See Roe's Cyclop. Art. Casellapius: R.

I. ALOES, or Aloes, an East Indian tree, that grows about eight or ten feet high. At the head of it is a large bunch of leaves, thick and indented, broad at the bottom, but narrowing towards the point, and about four feet in length; the blossom is red, intermixed with yellow, and double like a pink; from this blossom comes fruit, like a large pea, white and red. The leaves are divided by cutting them with a knife; and afterwards it is received in bottles. The eastern geographers tell us, that the wood of aloes, the smell of which is exquisite, is found only in those provinces of India which are covered with the first climates; that the root is that which grows in the isle of Sant, situated in the Indian seas, towards China. Others are of opinion, that the wood of aloes, produced in the isle of Comor, or at Cape Comorin, is the best, and that it was of this kind a certain king of India made a present, weighing ten quintals, to Nounchavan, which, when applied to the fire, melted, and burned like wax. This wood is brought likewise from the islands of Sumatra and Ceylon. The Siamese ambassadors to the court of France, in 1665, brought a present of it from their sovereign; and were the first to communicate any consistent account of the tree. It is said to be about the height and form of the olive-tree; its trunk is of three colors, and contains three sorts of wood, the best part, called teak or calamebbr, is used to perfume dresses and apartments. It is worth more than its weight in gold; and is esteemed a sovereign cordial against fainting fits, and other nervous disorders. From this account the reader will perceive the rarity and value of this perfume, implied in the notice taken of it by the Jovius in the Canticus, (iv. 14.) and the boast of the prostitute, Prov. vii. 17. The sandal-wood approaches to many of its properties; and is applied to similar uses, as a perfume at sacrifices, &c.

The aloes of Syria, Rhodes, and Candia, called Aspallatis, is a shrub full of thorns; the wood of which is used by perfumers; after they have taken off the bark, to give consistency to their perfumes.

This tree or wood was called by the Greeks Αλσόις, and later ฿ολίας, and has been known to moderns by the names of aloe-wood, paradise-wood, eagle-wood, &c. Modern botanists distinguish two kinds; the one more precious, the other more common and inferior. The former grows in Cochin-China, Siam, and China, is never exported, and is of so great rarity in India itself, as to be worth its weight in gold. Pieces of this wood that are resinous, of a dark color, heavy, and perforated as if by worms, are called Sri Almsg; the tree itself is called by the Chinese si-lu-ba. It is represented as large, with an erect trunk, and lofty branches. The other or more common species is called gare in the East Indies, and is the wood of a tree growing in the Moluccas, the eucalyptus agilicae of Linnæus. The leaves are like those of a pear-tree; and it has a milky juice, which, as the tree grows old, hardens into a fragrant resin. The trunk is knotty, crooked, and usually hollow. The domestic name in India is gare; whence the Europeans who first visited India gave it the name of Aggeas aquile, or eagle-wood. From this same root the Hebrew name ivume seems also to be derived. But as this is also, as to form, the plural of ivum, a tent, the Vulgate in Numb. xxiv. 5, has translated this: "As tents which the Lord hath spread;" while the Hebrew is: "As aloes which the Lord hath planted:," —in our version, "lin-aloises."—Aloe-wood is said by Herodotus to have been used by the Egyptians for embalming dead bodies; and Nicodemus brought it to the Sepulchre, mingled with myrrh, to embalm the body of our Lord, John xix. 39. See Gesenius, Theol. Lex. Heb. p. 33.

II. ALOES, a pl. or herb, the leaves of which are about two inches thick, prickly, and chamfered; in the middle rises a stem; and the flower yields a white kernel, extremely light, and almost round. These aloes are not uncommon among us. It has been said, that one kind of aloes flowers but once in a hundred years; and that, as its flower opens, it makes a great noise; but there have been several seen blowing in the gardens at and round London, without making any noise. As the flowers have six stamens, and one style, Limnos ranges this plant in the sixth class, called Asclepiadea monosis. Our knowledge of it is obtained not so much from oriental specimsens, as from American, which could not be known to the ancients. The Cape of Good Hope furnishes many kinds.

From this plant is extracted the common drug called aloes, which is a very bitter resin. Some have supposed that this was what Nicodemus brought for embalming the body of Christ, John xix. 39. See the close of the preceding article.

ALPHA, (Αλφα) in Greek alphabet. See the letter A. Martial, in imitation of the Greeks, who used to distinguish the rank of people by letters, says:

Quod Alpha dixi, Codre, penulatorum,
To nuper, situs, cum locoerant in charta:
Si forte bilem movit hic tibi versus,
Dicas licetim Beta me togorum.

ALPHABET, see HEBREW LETTERS.
I. ALPHEUS, father of James the less, (Matt. x. 3; Luke vi. 15.) and husband of the Mary who was sister to the mother of Christ; (John xix. 25.) for which reason, James is called the Lord's brother. (See BROTHER.) By comparing John xix. 25, with Luke xxiv. 10. and Matt. x. 3, it is evident that Alphæus is the same as Cleophas; Alpheus being his Greek name, and Cleophas his Hebrew or Syriac name, according to the form of the province, or the time, when men often had two names, by one of which they were known to their friends and countrymen, and by the other to the Romans, or strangers. More probably, however, the double name in Greek arises from a diversity in the ground which is his Aramean name, "ψήφι; a diversity which is common also in the Septuagint. See Kuno Joel on John xiv. 25. See also Names.

II. ALPHŒUS, father of Levi, or Matthew, the apostle and evangelist, Mark ii. 14.

1. ALTAR, the place on which sacrifices were offered. Sacrifices are nearly as ancient as worship; and altars are of nearly equal antiquity. Scripture speaks of altars, erected by the patriarchs, without describing their form, or the materials of which they were composed. The altar which Jacob set up at Bethel, was the stone which had served him for a pillow; and Gideon sacrificed on the rock before his house. The first altars which God commanded Moses to raise, were of earth or rough stones; and the Lord declared, that if iron were used in constructing them, they would become impure, Exod. xx. 24, 25. The altar which Moses enjoined Joshua to build on Mount Ebal, was to be of unpolished stones, (Deut. xvii. 5; Josh. viii. 31.) and it is very probable, that such were those built by Samuel, Saul, and David. The altar which Solomon erected in the temple was of brass, but filled, it is believed, with rough stones, 2 Chron. iv. 1. That built at Jerusalem, by Zerubabel, after the return from Babylon, was of rough stones; as was that of the Maccabees. Josephus says, (De Bello, lib. vi. cap. 14.) that the altar which was in his time in the temple, was of rough stones, fifteen cubits high, forty long, and forty wide.

Among the ancient Egyptian pictures that have been discovered at Herculaneum, are two of a very curious description, representing sacred ceremonies of the Egyptians, probably in honor of Isis. Upon these subjects we shall lay the substance of Mr. Taylor’s remarks before our readers.

In the first picture, the scene of the subject is in the area before a temple; (as usual;) the congregation is numerous, the music various, and the priests engaged are at least nine persons. The temple is raised, and an ascent of eleven steps leads up to it. On this altar we observe, (1.) Its form and decorations. (2.) The birds about it. In the original, one Isis is lying down at ease, another is standing up, without fear or apprehension; a third, perched on some paling, is looking over the heads of the people; and a fourth is standing on the back of a Sphinx, nearly adjacent to the temple, in the front of it. It deserves notice, that this altar (and the other also) has at each of its four corners a rising, which continues square to about half its height, but from thence is gradually sloped off to an edge, or a point. These are, no doubt, the horns of the altar; and probably this is their true figure. See Exod. xxvi. 2, 3; xxix. 12; Ezekiel xliii. 15. On these Jaob caught hold, (1 Kings ii. 28.) and to these the Psalmist alludes, (cxviii. 27.) "Bind the sacrifice with cords unto the horns of the altar." It is probable that the primary use of these horns was to retain the victim.

(1.) Observe the ground with which this altar is decorated. (2.) Observe the occupation of the priest, who, with a kind of fan, is blowing up the fire. No doubt this fan is employed, because to blow up the sacred flame with the breath would have been deemed a kind of polluting it. It may bear a question, whether something of the same nature were not used in kindling the fire on the Jewish altar. That fans were known anciently in the East, is highly probable, from the simplicity of the instrument, no less than from its use. The ancients certainly had fans to drive away flies with, (Greek μύγωμεν, Latin muscarium, Martialis, xiv. Ep. 67.) We do not know indeed that any Jewish writer mentions the use of a fan in kindling the altar fire; nor, indeed, should we have thought of it, had it not occurred in this Egyptian representation.

The other figure shows the horns of the altar, formed on the same principle as the foregoing; but this is seen on its side, and its general form is more elevated. It has no garlands, and perfumes appear to be burning on it. In this picture the assembly is not so numerous as in the other; but almost all, to the number of ten or a dozen persons, are playing on musical instruments.

Both these altars have a simple projecting ornament, running round them on their upper parts; but this has also a corresponding ornament at bottom. Upon the base of it stand two birds, which deserve notice, on account of their being unquestionable representations of the true ancient Egyptian Isis; a bird long lost to naturalists. Perhaps the publication of these portraits of the bird may contribute to recover and identify it; which will be deemed a service to natural history. They also deserve especial notice, on account of their situations, as standing on the altar itself, or lying down close to it, even while the sacred fire is burning, and the sacred ceremonies being performed by the priests, close around them. From their confident familiarity, it should seem that these birds were not only tolerated, but were considered as sacred; and, in some sense, as appertaining to the altar. Would it not have been a kind of sacrilege to have disfigured, or expelled from their domicile, their residence, these refugees, if refugees they were, at the altar? (See the history of Aristodicus, Herod. lib. i. cap. 139.) Diodorus Siculus (lib. i.) reports, that the Egyptians were very severe to those who killed a cat, or an Isis, whether purposely, or inadvertently; the populace, he says, would attack them in crowds, and put them to death by the most cruel means; often without observing any form of justice; by a kind of judgment of zeal.

As these Ibis were privileged birds in Egypt, so might some clean species of birds be equally privileged among the Jews, and be suffered quietly to build in various parts of the temple, in the courts around the altar; and if they were of the nature of our domestic fowl, they might even make nests, and lay their eggs, at or about the altar, or among the interstices and projections of the bottom layer of large rough stones, which formed the base of it. If they were the property of the priests, or of their children, or of any constant residents in the temple, (alluded to in the next verse,) they might give no more offence, by straggling about the sacred precincts, than the vicar’s sheep or horse grazing in the church-yard does among ourselves. We know, too, that there is scarcely a country church among ourselves, in which sparrows, and swallows too, do not make their nests; and yet, though we dislike the defilement they occasion, we do not think the building the less sacred. By these considerations, we may perhaps illustrate the passage, Psalm xxxiv. 3. The sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself; where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts.

The Altars in the tabernacle and in the temple at Jerusalem were as follow:—(1.) The Altar of Burnt-offerings. (2.) The Altar of Incense. (3.) The Table of Shew-bread; but this is improperly called an altar. See SHEW-BREAD.

1. THE ALTAR OF BURNT-OFFERINGS is thus described by Calmet. It was a kind of coffer of Shittim-wood, covered with brass plates, (Exod. xxvii. 1, seq.) five cubits square, and three in height. Moses placed it towards the east, before the entrance of the Tabernacle, in the open air, that so the fire which was to be kept perpetually upon it, and the smoke arising from the sacrifices which were burnt there, might not disfigure the inside of the Tabernacle. At the four corners were four horns, of a cubit square, covered with the same metal as the rest of the Altar. They were hollow, that part of the blood might be poured into them. Within the depth or hollow of it was a grate of brass, on which the fire was made, and through which fell the ashes, which were received in a pan below. At the four corners of this grate were four rings, and four chains, which kept it up at the four horns of the Altar above mentioned. As this Altar was portable, Moses had rings made, and fastened to the sides of it, into which were put staves of Shittim-wood, overlaid with brass, by means of which it was removed from place to place.

Such was the Altar of Burnt-offerings belonging to the tabernacle erected by Moses in the wilderness; but in Solomon’s temple it was much larger. This was a kind of cube, twenty cubits long, as many wide, and ten in height, covered with thick plates of brass, and filled with rough stones; and on the east side there was an easy ascent leading up to it. When the Jews returned from the captivity of Babylon, they rebuilt the Altar of Burnt-offerings, upon the model of Solomon’s; but after both the temple and the altar had been profaned by the orders of Antiochus Epiphanes, this altar was demolished, and the stones of it laid in some part of the temple which was unpolluted, till a prophet should be raised up by God, who should come and declare the use for which they were reserved, 1 Macc. xiv. 41. Herod the Great, having built a new temple, raised an altar of burnt-offerings like that which had been there before; but Josephus says, that the ascent to it was on the south side. B. J. vi. p. 918. edit. Col
ALTAR

The Altar of Burnt-offerings, according to the rabbins, was a large mass of rough and unpolished stones, the base of which was 32 cubits, or 48 feet square. From hence the altar rose one cubit, or a foot and a half; then there was a diminishing of one cubit in thickness; of from the altar, being only 30 cubits square, rose five cubits, and received a new diminution in benching of two cubits, and consequently was reduced to 28 cubits square. From hence again it rose three cubits, but was two cubits smaller. Lastly, it rose one cubit, and so being in all 24 cubits, or 36 feet square, it formed the hearth on which the sacrifices were burnt, and the perpetual fire kept up. The diminution of two cubits, which was nearly in the middle of the altar, served as a passage for the priests to go and come about the altar, to attend the fire, and to place the sacrifice on it.

This altar, being composed of large plates of massy brass, whereon called the brazen altar, 1 Kings viii. 64. The ascent was by a sloping rise on the south side, called Kibbes, 32 cubits in length, and 16 in breadth; it landed upon the upper benching, in near the hearth, or top of the altar; because to go up by steps was forbidden by the law. The priests might go round about the altar, and perform their offices very conveniently upon the two benchings which we have described; namely, that of the middle, and that above it, both of which were a cubit broad.

The following is an explanation of the profile of the altar of burnt-offerings according to the rabbins, and Dr. Prideaux.

a. A Trench which went quite round the Altar, wherein was thrown the blood of the sacrifices.

b. The Foundation of the Altar, one cubit high, and 32 cubits square.

c. The first benching, one cubit broad.

d. The second benching, one cubit broad.

e. The elevation of three cubits.

f. The third benching, one cubit broad.

g. The last rising, one cubit.

h. The length of 24 cubits, or 36 feet square.

k. The Horns of the Altar, of one cubit, and hollow, half a cubit square.

l. The sloping ascent to the Altar, 32 cubits in length.

m. The passage on both sides the Kibbes, to the second benching.

The altar of burnt-offerings, both in the tabernacle and temple, was regarded as an asylum or place of refuge. 1 Kings i. 50, seq. li. 29, seq.

2. The Altar of Incense was a small table of Shittim-wood, covered with plates of gold, of one cubit in length, another in width, and two in height, Exod. xxx. 1, seq. At the four corners were four horns, and all around a little border or crown over it. On each side were two rings, into which staves might be inserted for the purpose of carrying it. It stood in the holy place, (not in the holy of holies,) over against the table of shew-bread. Every morning and evening the priest in waiting for that week, and appointed by lot for this office, offered incense of a particular composition upon this altar; and to this end entered with the smoking censer filled with fire from the altar, being but a cubit from the holy place. The priest, having placed the censer on it, retired out of the holy place. This was the altar which was hidden by Jeremiah before the captivity, 2 Macc. ii. 5, 6. On the Altar of Incense the priest Zacharias was appointed to place the perfume; and while engaged in this service he received the announcement of the birth of a son, Luke i. 11.

II. ALTAR at Athens, inscribed 'Aπρότερον Στήν "to the unknown God." Paul, discoursing in that city on the resurrection of the dead, was captured by some of the philosophers before the judges of the Areopagus, where he uses this expression: (Acts xvii. 22, 33.) "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious, over fond of gods; for as I passed round your sacred temples, I found an altar, with this inscription—"To the unknown god," him, therefore, whom ye worship as "unknown,"—him declare (represent, announce) I unto you. The question is, What was this altar, thus consecrated to the unknown god?" Jerome says, that it was inscribed "to the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa; to the unknown and strange gods?" and that the apostle uses the singular form, because his design was only to demonstrate to the Athenians, that they did adore an unknown god. In Ep. ad Tit. c. 12.

Some, as Grotius, Vossius, Beza, believe that Paul speaks of altars extant in several places of Attica, without any inscription, erected after a solemn expiation for the country, by the philosopher Epimenides; see the note of Dr. Doddridge below. Others conceive that this altar was the one mentioned by Pausanias and Philostratus, (Attic. lib. vi. cap. 2.) who speak of 'Aπρότερον Στήν, altar, at Athens, consecrated "to the unknown god." Lucian, in the Dialogue attributed to him, entitled Philopatris, swears—"by the unknown god, at Athens." He adds, "Being come to Athens, and finding there the unknown god, we worshiped him, and gave thanks to him, with hands lifted up to heaven." Another statement is made by Peter Comestor. He relates, that Dionysius, the Areopagite, observing, while he was at Alexandria, the eclipse, contrary to nature, the day after the death of our Saviour, from thence concluded, that some unknown god suffered; and not being then in a situation to learn more of the matter, he erected, at his return to Athens, this altar, "to the unknown god," which gave occasion to Peter to discourse at the Areopagus. Theophylact, Oecumenius, and others, give a different account of its origin and design, but each of their opinions, as also those we have noticed, has its difficulties.

Chrysostom thinks the altar, entitled, "To the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa, to the unknown and strange gods," is not that mentioned by Paul; as the Areopagites would never have understood this altar by the bare designation of the "Unknown God." He conceives it to be more probable that the Athenians, who were a people extremely superstitious, being apprehensive that they had forgotten some divinity and omitted to worship him, erected altars in some parts of their city, inscribed, "To the unknown god," whence Paul took occasion to preach, first Jerovon, and then Jesus, to them, as a God, with respect to them truly unknown, yet, in some sort, adored without their knowing him. Chrysost. in Acta.

Augustin did not doubt but that the Athenians, under the appellation of the unknown God, worshipped the true one. Others also have thought, that the God of the Jews was the object of this altar, he being a powerful God, but not fully known, as the Jews never used his name in speech, but substituted the Lord for Je ho van.

The following is Dr. Dodridge's note on the passages—"the express testimony of Lucian (Philopat. ad fin.) sufficiently proves that there was such an inscription at Athens; and shows how unnecessary, as well as unwarrantable, it was in Jerome to suppose, that the apostle, to serve his own purpose, gives this turn to an inscription, which bore on its front a plurality of deities. Whence this important phenomenon arose, or to what it particularly referred, it is more difficult to say. Witsius (Melet. p. 85.) with Heinæus (in loc.) understands it of Je ho van, whose name, not being pronounced by the Jews themselves, might give occasion to this appellation; and to this sense Mr. Bischoe inclines. (Boyle's Lect. chap. viii. § 12. p. 322. 323.) Dr. Welwood (pref. to the Banquet of Xenophon, p. 12, 19.) supposes that Soconos reared the altar to express his devotion to the one living and true God, of whom the Athenians had no notion; and whose incomprehensible being he insinuated, by this inscription, to be far beyond the reach of their understanding, or his own. And in this I should joyfully acquiesce; could I find one ancient testimony in confirmation of the fact. As it is, to omit other conjectures, I must give the preference to that which Beza and Dr. Hammond have mentioned, and which Mr. Haller (Disc. on Script. vol. i. p. 307. 308.) has laboured at large to confirm and illustrate; though I think none of these learned writers has set it in its most natural and advantageous light. Diogenes Laërtius, in his life of Epimenides, (vide lib. ii. p. 29, C. with the notes of J. Cesarebon and Menagius,) assures us, that in the time of that philosopher (about 600 years before Christ) there was a terrible pestilence at Athens; in order to avert which, when none of the deities to whom they sacrificed, appeared able or willing to help them, Epimenides, who lived among the Areopagite, and letting them loose from thence, to follow them till they lay down, and then to sacrifice them (as I suppose the words τo υπό τους θεος to the unknown god; meaning thereby, the deity who had sent the plague, whoever he were; one of which altars, at least, however it might have been repaired, remained till Paul's time, and long after. Now as the God whom Paul preached as Lord of all, was indeed the deity who sent and removed this pestilence, the apostle might, with great propriety, tell the Athenians, he declared to them him whom, without knowing him, they worshipped; as I think the concluding words of the 293 verse may most fairly be rendered."

Dr. Lardner has an article on this subject, which may be consulted with advantage; it is in the quarto edition, vol. iv. p. 174.
in migrating parties, in caves, or in tents. The Israelites had scarcely passed the Red sea, when the Amalekites attacked them in the desert of Rephidim, and slew those who, through fatigue or weakness, lagged behind. Moses, by God's command, directed Joshua to repel this assault; and to record the act of inhumanity in a book, to perpetuate its remembrance for future vengeance. Joshua attacked the Amalekites, and defeated them, while Moses was on the mountain, and, with Aaron and Hur in his company, held up his lifted hands to heaven, A. M. 3513. According to the Scripture mode of expression, Moses required all the virtue of his rod and his prayers, to defeat so dreadful an enemy; and if God had not interposed on behalf of his people, the number, valor, and advantage of Amalek's arms, had given them the victory. Moreover, victory, which God gives or withholds at his pleasure, had certainly favored the Amalekites, if Aaron and Hur, who accompanied Moses on the mount, remote from danger, had not supported the extended arms and hands of that legislator. The mystery of this we leave to commentators. The battle continued till the approach of night; for Scripture says, (Exod. xvi. 12.) "And dispersed them, and recovered all the edge of the sun." As the success of this action was the sole work of God, he said to Moses, "Write this for a memorial in a book." Under the Judges, (Judg. vi. 3.) we see the Amalekites united with the Midianites and Moabites to oppress Israel; but Ehud delivered them from Eglon, (Judg. iii. 13.) and Gideon delivered them from Midian and Amalek. Many years after, the Lord directed Samuel to say to Saul, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember what Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way when he came up from Egypt: now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all." Saul marched therefore against the Amalekites, advanced to their capital, defeated and drove them from Havilah (towards the lower part of the Euphrates) to Shur, (on the Red sea towards Egypt,) destroying the people: but he spared the best of the cattle and moveables; thereby violating the command of God. Nevertheless, some fugitives were left; which, in history, yet some years after Saul's expedition against them, a troop of Amalekites pilaged Ziklag, then belonging to David, where he had left his wife and his property. David, returning, pursued, overtook, and recovered all the houses and property, which they had carried off, 1 Sam. xxx. 1. In Judges x. 14. and xii. 15. we read of an Amalek and a mount of the Amalekites in the tribe of Ephraim. It is hence probable that colonies of this people had formerly migrated into Canaan; and that one of them had thus maintained itself against the Ephraimites. See Bib. Repos. I. p. 394. The Arabs have a tradition, that Amalek was a son of Ham; a notion which we are not disposed to reject; for certainly it is not easy to conceive how the Amalekites, if only the posterity of the son of Eliphaz, grandson of Esau, could be so powerful and numerous as this tribe was when the Israelites departed out of Egypt. Besides, Moses relates, (Gen. xiv. 7.) that in Abraham's time the five confederate kings invaded Amalek's country about Kadesh, as likewise, that of the Amorites at Hazzezon-tamar. Moses also (Num. xxiv. 20.) relates, that Balaam, observing from a distance the land of Amalek, said, in his prophetic style, "Amalek is the first (the head) of the original, of the nations, but his end shall be, that he perish for ever." This will not agree with the Amalekites, if they were so modern; for the generation then living was but the third from Amalek himself, as appears by the following comparative genealogy:

- Esau,
- Jacob,
- Eliphaz,
- Levi,
- Amalek,
- Keth,
- Amram,
- Aaron.

It is worthy of notice, also, that Moses never reproaches the Amalekites with attacking the Israelites, their brethren; an aggravating circumstance, which it is probable he would not have omitted if they had been descended from Esau, and, by that descent, brethren to the Israelites. Lastly, we see the Amalekites almost always joined in Scripture with the Canaanites and Philistines, and never with the Edomites; and when Saul destroyed Amalek, the Edomites neither assisted nor avenged them. It is therefore probable that the Amalekites, so often mentioned in Sacred History, were a people descended from Canaan, and very different from the descendants of Amalek, the grandson of Esau, who perhaps might be but a small tribe, and not conspicuous at the time; if, indeed, they ever rose to much importance.

Of the Amalek destroyed by Saul, too, the Arabs had a tradition, that he was the father of an ancient tribe in Arabia, which contained only Arabs called pure; the remains of which were mingled with the posterity of Joktan and Adam, and so became Mosarabes, or Mostarabes, that is, mixed Arabs—blended with foreigners. They believe, also, that Goliath, who was slain by David, was king of the Amalekites, and that the giants who inhabited Palestine in Joshua's time, part of whom retired into Africa while Joshua was living, and settled on the coasts of Barbary, were of the same race; an account which has many circumstances to recommend it. The son of Amalek was Ad, a celebrated prince among the Arabs, and as some suppose, the son of Uz, and grandson of Aram, the son of Shem. The Mahomedans say, Ad was father of an Arabian tribe called Asar, and little more is known of it. The heathen had a tradition, that he was the son of Eber, who preached the unity of God to them. (D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient.) These accounts are, indeed, very imperfect; but on the whole, we seem to be warranted in suggesting, (1.) That there were more kinds of Amalekites than one: (2.) That the tribe which Saul destroyed might not be very numerous at that time, and that the tract of country mentioned in relation to them, was that of their flight, not that of their possession, unless as rovers, or Bedouins: (3.) That they were turbulent and violent toward their neighbors, as formerly they had been toward the strangers of Israel; which suggests the reason why their neighbors were not displeased at their expulsion: (4.) That such being their character, they might have produced a war, by giving a recent cause of offence to Israel; though Scripture only mentions the fulfilment of an ancient prophecy—perhaps there never had been peace between the two nations: (5.) That Agag, slain by Samuel, had been extremely cruel—a supposition which seems warranted by the expression, "As thy sword has made mothers childless;" therefore he met with no more than his just punishment in the death he received. See AGAG and SAMUEL.

Mr. Taylor arranges the different tribes bearing the name of Amalek in a geographical view, thus:
(1.) Amalek, the ancient, Genesis xiv. 7. where the phrase is remarkable, "all the country of the Amal- ekites," which implies a great extent. This people was in some place near the Jordan. Num. xix. 20. (2.) A tribe in the region east of Egypt; between Egypt and Canaan, Exod. xvii. 8; 1 Sam. xvi. &c. (3.) The descendants of Eliaphaz. — It was against the second of these that Moses and Joshua fought; (Exod. xvii. 8—13) against which tribe perpetual hostility was to be maintained, ver. 16; 1 Sam. xvi. It was also, probably, to the ancient Amalekites (1.) that Balaam alluded (Num. xxiv. 20.) as having been "first of the nations," for the descendants of Esau were very far from answering to this title; in fact, they were both just appearing as a tribe, or family. Even at this day, the Arabs distinguish between families of pure Arab blood, and those of mixed descent; but they include the posterity of Ishmael among those of mixed descent, while they reckon the Amalekites by parentage as of pure blood. The posterity of Esau, therefore, could hardly claim privilege above that of Ishmael, either by antiquity, or by importance. Neither is it any way likely, that the Amalekites of Esau should have been able to extend their settlements to where we find those Amalekites (2.) who attacked Israel at the very borders of Egypt, and on the shores of the Red Sea. Instead of Amalek, (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 6; xiii. 12, 13) the LXX read, "the Kings of the Amalekites," which implies that this people had occupied very extensive territories. The same countries seem to be alluded to by David, in Psalm lxxxii. 7. where he had already mentioned Edom, the Ishmaelites, Moab, &c. yet distinct from these he mentions Gebel, Ammon, and Amalek; consequently this Amalek was not of the descent of Esau, or of Ishmael.

The spies sent to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii. 28.) report, that the Amalekites inhabited the south; which agrees exactly with the occasion of David to Achish, 1 Sam. xxvii. David invaded the Amalekites, ver. 8. but in ver. 10. he says, he went "against the south of Judah," the south of the Jerusalemites, the south of the Kenites; which indeed was very true, as he went against the Amalekites, who were south of all those places.

I. Amana, a mountain, mentioned in Cant. iv. 8. and by some supposed to be mount Amnon, in Cilicia. Jerome and the rabbinns describe the land of Amna, existing, and probably in a mountain; and it is known that Solomon's dominion did extend so far. Mount Ammon, with its continuations, separates Syria and Cilicia, and reaches from the Mediterranean to the Ephrates.—The Amana of the Cantic. however, is rather the southern part or summit of Antiliasus; so called perhaps from the river Amna, which descended from it. See Gesenius Heb. Lex. Reland Pal. p. 320. R.

II. Amna. Design. See Amana. See Amana.

I. Amariah, eldest son of Merculoth, and father of the high-priest Ahitub, was high-priest in the time of the Judges, but we are not able to fix the years of his pontificate. His name occurs 1 Chron. vi. 7. and if he actually did exercise this office, he should be placed, as we think, before Eli, who was succeeded by Ahitub, who, in the Chronicles, is put after Amariah, ver. 7.—[There was another of this name, viz.—]

II. Amariah, high-priest at a later period, the same Azariah, but the father of the second Ahi- tub, 1 Chron. vi. 11. In like manner, in the same list, there are three high-priests bearing the name of Azariah. R.

III. Amariah, great-grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah, and father of Gedaliah, Zeph. i. 1.

I. Amasa, son of Jether or Ishma, and Abigail, David's sister. 2 Sam. xxiv. 20. (2.) A man of great renown when war was between David, placed his cousin, Amasa, at the head of his troops, (2 Sam. xvn. 25.) but he was defeated by Joab. After the extinction of Abshalom's party, David, from dislike to Joab, who had killed Abshalom, offered Amasa his pardon and the command of the army, in room of Joab, whose insolence rendered him unsupportable, 2 Sam. xix. 13. On the revolt of Sheba, son of Bichri, David ordered Amasa to assemble all Judah against Sheba; but Amasa delaying, David directed Abishai to pursue Sheba, with what soldiers he then had about his person. Joab, with his people, accompanied him; and when they had reached the great stone in Gibeon, Amasa joined them with his forces. Joab's jealousy being excited, he formed the most daring and cruel purpose of assassinating his rival; —"Then said Joab to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother? and took him by the beard with the right hand to kiss him;' but at the same time smote him with the sword. Such was the end of Amasa, David's nephew, ch. xx. 4—10. A. M. 2652.

II. Amasa, son of Hadoram, opposed the admission of such captives as were taken from the kingdom of Judah, in the reign of Azaz, into Samaria, 2 Chron. xxvii. 12.

AMASAI, a Levite, who joined David with thirty gallant men, while in the desert, flying from Saul. David went to meet them, and said, "If ye be come peaceably to help me, mine heart shall be knit unto you; but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no wrong in mine hands, the God of our fathers look thereon and rebuke it." Then said Amasa, "Thine heart is true, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers." David, therefore, received them; and gave them a command in his troops, 1 Chron. xiv. 18.

AMATH, or EMATH, a city of Syria; the same with Emesa on the Orontes. See Hatnath.

AMATHITIS, a district in Syria with the capital city Hatnath, on the Orontes, 1 Macc. xii. 25. See Hatnath.

I. Amaziah, son of Joash, eighth king of Judah, (2 Chron. xxvii. 27.) succeeded his father, A. M. 3165. He was a twelfth part of a Levite; and it began to reign, and reigned twenty-nine years at Jerusalem. He did good in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart. When settled in his kingdom, he put to death the murderers of his father, but not their children; because it is written in the law, "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin," Deut. xxiv. 16; 2 Chron. xxv. 2, 3, 4. He did in the ten of Amaziah, 2 Kings viii. 20.) Amaziah murdered 300,000 men able to bear arms. To these he added 100,000 men of Israel; for which he paid 100 talents, about $150,000. But a prophet of the Lord came to him, and said, "O king, let not the army of Israel go with thee; for the Lord is not with Israel." Amaziah, hereupon, sent back those troops: and they returned strongly irritated against him. They dispersed themselves over the cities of Judah, from Beth-horon to Samaria, killed 3000 men, and carried off a great booty, to make themselves
Amen, in Hebrew, signifies true, faithful, certain. It is used likewise in affirmation; and was often thus used by our Lord: Amen, Amen, verily, verily. It is understood as expressing a wish, Amen! so be it! or an affirmation, Amen, yes: I believe it. Num. v. 22. She shall answer, Amen! Amen! Deut. xxvii. 15, 16, 17, &c. All the people shall answer, Amen! 1 Cor. xiv. 16. How shall he who occupieth the place of the unlearned say, Amen! at thy giving of thanks? seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest. The promises of God are Amen in Christ; i.e. certain, confirmed, &c. Ex. ii. 2 Cor. i. 20. The Hebrews end the five books of Psalms, according to their distribution of them, with Amen, Amen; which the Septuagint translate ὠ̔ροτο, ὠ̔ροτο, and the Latins Fiat, fiat. The gospels, &c. are ended with Amen. The Greek, Latin, and other churches, preserve this word in their prayers, as well as alleluia and hosanna. At the conclusion of the public prayers, the people anciently answered with a loud voice, Amen! and Jerome says, that, at Rome, when the people answered, Amen! the sound was like a clap of thunder. Pref. in Lib. ii. Ep. ad Galat. The Jews assert, that the gates of heaven are opened to him who answers Amen! with all his might.

The word Amen is strictly an adjective, signifying firm, and metaph. faithful. So in Rev. iii. 14, our Lord is called "the Amen, the faithful and true Witness;" where the last words explain the preceding appellation. So Is. lxv. 16, it is in the Heb. "the God of Amen," which our version renders "God of truth." I. e. of fidelity. In its adverbial use it means certainly, truly, surely. It is used at the beginning of a sentence, by way of emphasis, rarely in the Old Testament, (Jer. xxviii. 6) but frequently by our Saviour in the New, where it is commonly translated Verily. In John’s Gospel alone, it is often used by him in this way double, i.e. Verily, verily. In the end of a sentence it is often used, singly or repeated, especially at the end of hymns and prayers; as Amen and Amen, Ps. xli. 14; lxix. 19; cxviii. 83. The proper signification of it here is, to confirm the words which have preceded and invoke the fulfilment of them; so be it, flat, Sept. ὠ̔ροτο. Hence in oaths, after the priest has repeated the words of the covenant or imprecation, all those who pronounce the Amen, bind themselves by it. Num. v. 29; Deut. xxvii. 15, seq. Neh. v. 13; viii. 6; 1 Chron. xxvi. 36. Compare Ps. cxi. 48. R.

Amethity, a precious stone, of the ninth in order on the high-priest’s breastplate, bearing the name of Elisabeth, Ex. xxviii. 19; xxxix. 12. Its color resembles that of a new wine, and reflects a violet, Rev. xxi. 20.

Ambia, a hill opposite to Gileon, not far from Gideon, where Asaiah was slain by Abner, 2 Sam. xii. 24.
AMMAN, the capital of the Ammonites, called in Scripture, Rabbath Ammon, and in profane authors, Philadelphia. See RABBATH.

AMMAN is in the Jewish writers, the same as mount Hor; a mount in the northern boundary of the land. In the Jerusalem Targum, mount Hor is called mount Manus; Jonathan writes it Umanis. Inwards from Ammanah was within the land, beyond Ammanah was about the land, according to the opinions of the Talmudists.

I. AMMON, or NO-AMMON, or AMMON-NO, a city of Egypt. The Vulgate generally takes this city for Alexandria, although they could not be ignorant that Alexandria is much more modern than Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Nahum, who speak of No-Ammon. But they might believe that this city had stood at or near the place where Alexandria now stands; though there is no evidence in history that such was the fact. The prophets describe No-Ammon as being situated among the rivers; as having the waters surrounding it; having the sea as its rampart; and being extremely populous. This description has induced some interpreters to consider No-Ammon as having been the same with Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter, in Lower Egypt. The ruins of this city, so distinctly foretold by the prophets, occurred partly under Sargon; and more fully, though still not completely, under Cambyses.

(The name of the city is properly No-Ammon, i.e. the seat or dwelling of the god Ammon. In Ezek. xxx. 14—16 it is called simply No; and in both Nah. iii. 8 and Jer. xlvii. 25, the English version has also only No; in the latter case with a misapprehension of the sense. See the next article. It means, beyond all reasonable doubt, the city of Thebes, the ancient and renowned capital of Egypt, called also Diospolis by the Greeks, and the chief seat of the worship of Jupiter Ammon. The vast ruins of the temples of Luxor and Carnac still proclaim the grandeur and magnificence with which this worship was conducted. Nahum indeed describes No-Ammon as situated among the rivers, and that its rampart was the sea; but this, in the highly figurative language of the prophet, applies rather to the city of Thebes as a whole. No-Ammon is sometimes called the representative of the whole country, than to its literal position.—The other Diospolis, although literally situated among the branches of the Nile, was not of sufficient importance to bear the comparison with No-Ammon. The name Ammon signifies sometimes the ram, sometimes the heifer; and Nahum, in his prophecies, designates it as one of the symbols of the god. The name, therefore, was given to the city of Thebes, and was afterwards applied to other places of a similar character.)

II. AMMON, AMOUN, or in later times JUPITER AMMON, the supreme god of the Egyptians, worshipped also by the Ethiopians and Lybiens, and held by the Greeks and Romans to be the same with their Jupiter. (Herod. ii. 42. Diod. i. 61. Macrob. De somn. ii. 13.) The Greek language declares the god Ammon to be the representative of the Sun; and this view is supported by Egyptian inscriptions, in which, besides his usual name, he is also called Amen-Re, i.e. Ammon, the Sun. His image is always represented as the head of a ram; and Jahannesky hence supposed this to have been an emblem of the Sun in spring, when entering the sign Aries. (Pantheon Egypt. i. p. 166.) The New Platonists held this god to be the emblem of the eternal mind, and hidden source of light, the supreme creator of the universe, δυσφωστήρ. Euseb. Prep. Evang. xi. 7.

The origin and etymology of the name are uncertain. Champollion supposes it to come from the Egyptian word AMOUN, signifying glory, sublimity; (Egypte sous les Pharaons i. p. 217.) though in another place (Pantheon No. 1.) he follows Manetho, and makes the word Amen signify occult, hidden.

The images of Amman, as found on Egyptian monuments, represent a human figure, with a youthful visage, sitting upon a throne; or sometimes with the head and sometimes the whole body of a ram. (Champollion, Pantheon No. 1.) He was addressed also by the Egyptians with the epithets Lord of the regions of the world, supreme Lord, king of the gods. This name also occurs in the epistles bestowed on the Pharaohs; c. g. Son of Ammon, approved of Ammon, beloved of Ammon, &c. He was worshipped in temples of the utmost splendor at Meroe, and in an oasis of the Lybian desert, whence Alexander the Great made an expedition; but the chief seat of his worship was at Thebes, the celebrated capital of Egypt, which on this account was called No-Amon. (See the preceding article.) The god himself is only once referred to in the Bible, viz. Jer. xvi. 25. "The Lord of Hosts saith, Behold I will punish Amon of Judah, and Egypt, with their gods and their kings," &c. The English version has here incorrectly translated the word Amon by a multitude. —See Gesenius, Thea. Ling. Heb. p. 115. Grap- po, Essay on the Hieroglyphic Syst. Bost. 1830. Ap- pendix M. p. 223. 48.

III. AMMON, or Ben-Ammi, (son of my people,) son of Lot, by his younger daughter, Gen. xix. 34, 38. He was the father of the Ammonites, a famous people, always at enmity with Israel.

AMMONITES, the descendants of Ammon, or Ben-Ammi, a son of Lot; and called, sometimes, Ammonites. They destroyed an ancient race of giants called Zammuthmim, and seized their country, which lay south-east of Judea, Deut. ii. 19–21. Their territory extended from the Arnon to the Jab- bok, and from the Jordan a considerable distance into Arabia. Their capital city was Rabbah, (also Rab- bath Ammon, and afterwards Philadelphia,) which stood on the Jabbek. They were gross idolaters; their chief idol being Molech, supposed to be the same with Saturn. They were possessed of part of their territories by Sihon, king of the Amorites; but God restrained Moses and Israel from attacking them, because he did not intend to give any of the remaining part of their land to the Hebrews. Never- theless, as, before Israel entered Canaan, the Amo- rites had conquered a great part of their country, Moses retook it, and divided it between the tribes of Gad and Reuben.—After the death of Ethiel, the Ammonites and Amalekites joined with Edom, king of Moab, to oppress Israel, whom they governed for 18 years. In the time of Jephthah the Ammonites declared war against Israel, under the pretence that the latter detained a great part of the country which had formerly been theirs, before the Amorites pos- sessed it. But Jephthah defeated them with great slaughter, Judg. xi. In the beginning of Saul’s reign, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, having at- tacked Jabesh-Gilead, reduced it to a capitulation, (1 Sam. xiv. 47), but the inhabitants were not de- feated but the Amorites attacking them when exposed to the ravages of Antiochus Epiphanes. Judas Macabeus, however, visited them with the just reward of their conduct, 1 Macc. v. 6–45. Their power was broken, their hostility ceased, and, in a short time, all the Ammonites, except the one city of Rabbath, became dependent on Judah, which they soon after became extinct, as a nation. They were gradually blended with the Arabs, and Oribius assures us, that in his days they were only known under this general name. Oribius in Job. lib. i.

AMNON, the eldest son of David, who had the misfortune to attack the Ammonites, Amalekites, and the Syrenians, their allies, 2 Sam. x. From this period to the death of Ahab, about 140 years, Ammon and Moab continued subject to the kings of Israel, 2 Kings iii. 7, to the end; but it does not appear that they reduced them to obedience. At the same time the Ammonites, Moabites, and other peo- ple, made an irruption into Judah, but, according to the word of the Lord revealed to Jazehiel, the combined army was wholly destroyed by mutual slaughter, 2 Chron. xx.

The Ammonites and Moabites seem now to have been reduced to a condition in which they were no longer able to harass their enemies, the Israelites; but after the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half- tribe of Manassah, had been carried captive by Tig- lath-Pileser, (A. M. 3364,) they took possession of the cities belonging to those tribes; and for this they were punished by God, 2 Kings ix. 28, 29, Jer. xlix. 1–6. But great as had been their guilt up to this time, it was much aggravated by their insolent triumph over the people of Israel, when their temple was destroyed and themselves carried away by Nebuchadnezzer, in making war on the Jews, 2 Kings xxiv. 2. Urged on, too, by Baalis, king of the Ammonites, Israel, the son of Nathaniah, murdered Gedaliah, the governor over Judea appointed by Nebuchadnezzer, Jer. xl. 14, seq. xli. 1–10. The Lord, however, showed his disapproval at their conduct, and Ezekiel was commissioned to foretell that, as the reward of their unfeeling and profane triumph, they should themselves be delivered to the men of the East for a possession, and be cut off, so as to perish out of the countries, Ezek. xxv. 3, 10. We believe that the former part of this prediction was fulfilled, about four years afterwards, when Nebuchadnezzer invaded all the countries around Judea, and carried away their people, A. M. 3417–1. (Josephus.) The fulfilment of the latter part of the prediction was deferred for a time. Cyrus, it is probable, gave permission to the Ammonites and the Moabites to return into their own country; for we find them subsequently in their former settlements, exposed to those revolutions by which the people of Syria and Palestine were visited; and subject sometimes to the kings of Egypt, and sometimes to those of Syria. This agrees, too, with Jer. xlix. 6, where the prophet foretells that they should be for a time restored. But the calamities to which these people had been themselves exposed, did not tend in any degree to alloys their animosities towards their neighbors; and hence we find them ready to hinder the Jews from again building the walls of Jerusalem, (Nehemiah) and attack them when exposed to the ravages of Antiochus Epiphanes. Judas Macabeus, however, visited them with the just reward of their conduct, 1 Macc. v. 6–45. Their power was broken, their hostility ceased, and, in a short time, all the Ammonites, except the one city of Rabbath, became dependent on Judah, which they soon after became extinct, as a nation. They were gradually blended with the Arabs, and Oribius assures us, that in his days they were only known under this general name. Oribius in Job. lib. i.
He soothed her, and advised her to be silent, but formed a determination to avenge her insult. David, when informed of what had transpired, was extremely affected; but, as he tenderly loved Amnon, who was his brother, and was his own child, he determined to avenge him. The end of two years, Absalom, who had restrained his resentment during this time, determined to create an opportunity to avenge it, and for this purpose he invited the king, his father, and all his brothers, to an entertainment, at Baal-hazor. David declined the invitation, but the princes went down to the festival, where Amnon was assassinated by Absalom's orders. 2 Sam. xiii.

AMON, the fourteenth king of Judah, son of Manasseh and Meshullemeth daughter of Haruz, of Bethel, began to reign, A. M. 3551, and A. D. 665, at the age of twenty-two, and reigned only two years at Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Manasseh had done, by forsaking Jebovaam, and worshipping idols. His servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house; but the people killed all the conspirators, and established his son Josiah on the throne. He was buried in the garden of Uziah, 2 Kings xxi. 19, seq. 2 Chron. xxiii. 21, seq.

Amos, a people descended from the fourth son of Canaan, Gen. x. 16. They first peopled the mountains west of the Dead sea, dwelling in Hazecontimar, and near Hebron; but afterwards extended their limits, and took possession of the finest provinces of Moab and Ammon, on the east, between the brooks Jabok and Amnon, Josh. v. 1; Num. xiii. 29; xxii. 29. Moses took this country from their king, Sihon, (A. M. 2553,) who refused the Israelites a passage, on their way out of Egypt, and attacked them with all his force. The lands which the Amorites possessed on this side Jordan, were given to the tribe of Judah, and those beyond the Jordan to the tribes of Reuben and Gad.

Amos (ch. ii. 9) speaks of their gigantic stature and valor, and compares their height to the cedar, their strength to the oak. The name Amorite is often taken in Scripture for Canaanite in general, Gen. xvi. 16. See Rosenmueller, Bibl. Geog. ii. 1. p. 253. Reland, Palest. p. 138.

I. AMOS, 25:4. the fourth of the minor prophets, believed to be (like Jeroboam) under Jeroboam II. about A. M. 2615; and Amoniah, high-priest of Bethel, accused him before the court, as conspiring against him, and ordered the prophet to return into Judah. Amos answered Amaziah, "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdman, and a dresser of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel," Amos vii. 10, to end. (See Stcma- more.) He began to prophesy the second year before the earthquake, in the reign of King Uzziah, (Amos i. 1) which Josephus (with most commentators) refers to that prince's usurpation of the priest's office, when he attempted to offer incense. The rabbins, and Poccopius of Gaza, are of opinion that this happened in the twenty-fifth year of Uzziah, A. M. 2619; but this cannot be, for Jotham, son of Uzziah, born A. M. 2521, was of age to govern, that is, between fifteen and twenty years old, when his father was struck with a leprosy. —It is, however, impossible to determine the exact date of this earthquake, although it is also referred to in Zech. xiv. 5.

The book of Amos is divided into two parts. The first six chapters contain admonitions and denunciations; the three others, visions. The former are directed partly against Israel and Judah, and partly against foreign nations, viz., the Syrians, Phenicians, Moabites, and Edomites. Amos is not mentioned by name, but is clearly implied in ch. v. 17. He employs sharp invectives against the sins of Israel, and especially of the inhabitants of Samaria, their effeminacy, avarice, and harshness to the poor; the splendor of their buildings, and the delicacy of their tables. He reproves Israel for going to Bethel, Dan, Gilgal, and Beersheba, which were the most famous pilgrimages of the country; and for swearing by the gods of those places.

The time and manner of Amos's death is not known. Some authors relate, that Amaziah, priest of Bethel, provoked by the discourses of the prophet to silence him, had his teeth broken; (Cyril, Pref. in Amos,) others say, that Hosea, or Uzziah, son of Amaziah, struck him with a stake on the temples, and almost killed him; that in this condition he was carried to Tekoa, where he died, and was buried with his fathers. Epiph. de Vita Prophet. c. 12.

(All this, however, is useless, for the context shows that, in acc. to the circumstance that Amos was a herdman, we cannot draw the conclusion that he was therefore rude and unpolished, or destitute of cultivation. The example of David has shown long before, that even among the lower classes a high degree of poetical talent and cultivation was sometimes to be found. In regard to style, Amos takes a high rank among the prophets. He is full of fancy and imagery, concise, and yet simple and perspicuous. His language is occasionally harsh. His prophecies are arranged in a certain order; so that we may suppose that, after having uttered them, he had carefully written them out. As interpreters have been aware of his having been a herdman, they have mostly set themselves to find only pastoral figures and images in his writings, and also something which should be low and incorrect. But he exhibits no more imagery from pastoral life than the other Hebrew poets; and as to incorrectness, there is nothing which can be taken into account. It is true, that Amos's language sometimes calls him sermones imperitum, i.e. rude in speech.

Such is the judgment of Gesenius. R.

II. AMOS, 6:11, father of the prophet Isaiah, it is said, son of king Joash, and brother of Amaziah. The rabbins pretend, that Amos, Isaiah's father, was a prophet, as well as his son, according to a rule among them, that when the father of a prophet is called in Scripture by his name, it is an indication, that he also had the gift of prophecy. Augustin conjectured, that the prophet Amos was the father of Isaiah; but the names of these two persons are written differently: WL, father of Isaiah; WL, AR, the prophet Amos. Some are of opinion, that the man of God who spake to king Amaziah, and obliged him to send back the hundred thousand men of Israel, whom he had purchased to march against the Edomites, (2 Chron. xxiv. 7, 8,) was Amos, the father of Isaiah, and brother of king Amaziah. But this opinion is supported by no proofs. See ISAIAH.

III. AMOS, son of Nahum, and father of Matthathias, in the genealogy of our Saviour, Luke iii. 25.

AMOZ, see AMOS II.

AMPHIPOLIS, a city of Macedonia, situated not far from the mouth of the river Strymon, which flowed around the city, and thus occasioned its name.
ANANA

It was originally a colony of the Athenians, founded by Cimon. Under the Romans it became the capital of the province of Macedonia. Paul and Silas passed through Amphipolis to Thessalonica, after they had been set at liberty by Philippi, Acts xvii. 1. In the middle ages it received the name of Chrysopolis. The village which now stands upon the site of the ancient city is called Empoli or Yamboli, a corruption of Amphipolis. R.

AMRAM, son of Kohath, of Levi, married Jochebed, by whom he had Aaron, Miriam, and Moses. He died in Egypt, aged 137, Exod. vi. 20.

AMRAPHEL, king of Shinar, confederated with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and two other kings, to make war against the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the three neighboring cities, which they plundered and carried off many captives, among whom was Lot, Abraham's nephew. Abraham pursued them, overtook Lot, and recovered the spoil, Gen. xiv. A.M. 2092.

AMULETS are properly certain medicines worn around the neck or on other parts of the body, as a preservative against diseases. Among oriental nations they exist in the form of charms or talismans, not only against diseases, but also to ward off danger, or witchcraft, or the influence of evil spirits. Such amulets are of great antiquity, (Pliny, xxx. 24.) and are also found at the present day not only in the East, but also among the negro tribes of Africa. They consist usually of strips of paper written over with sacred sentences, etc. or of gems and stones or pieces of metal prepared for this purpose. These were also not unknown to the Hebrews. In Isa. iii. 20, the rings or earrings, there mentioned, appear to have been amulets of this kind, made thus to serve also the purpose of ornament. These were probably precious stones, or small plates of gold or silver, with sentences of the law or magic formulas engraved upon them, and worn in the ears, or suspended by a chain around the neck. It is certain that earrings were sometimes instruments of superstition in this way, e.g. Gen. xxxvi. 4, where Jacob takes away the earrings of his family, along with their false gods. Chardin says (in Harms' Obs. iv. p. 248.) "I have seen some of these earrings with figures on them and strange characters, which I believe may be talismans or charms, or perhaps nothing but the amusement of old women. The Indians say they are preservatives against enchantments. Perhaps the Hebrews of Jacob's family were of this kind." Augustin also speaks zealously against earrings which were worn as amulets in his time, Ep. 73 ad Poetid. See Gesenius, COMM. on Isa. iii. 20. Schroder, p. 168, seq. Fundgruben des Orients, p. 126, 156.

The later Jews regarded also as amulets the phylacteries, or sentences of the law which Moses had commanded them to wear on their foreheads and wrists; although this command of Moses is probably to be understood no more literally than the command to impress them upon their hearts. Deut. vi. 8. There are also various cabalistic amulets among the later Jews. R.

ANAB, a city in the mountains of Judah, (Josh. xi. 31, xxv. 50,) which Jerome believed to be the same with Beth-anaba, eight miles east of Diospolis or Lydda. Eusebius places Betho-anab four miles distant from this city. But neither of these is the Anab mentioned by Joshua, which he places, with Hebron and Debir, more to the south of Judah.

ANAH, son of Zibeon, the Hivite, and father of Ahobilamah, Eanu's wife, Gen. xxxvi. 24. While feeding asses in the desert, he discovered "springs of warm water," as Jerome translates the Hebrew nov. The English version has mute, as also the Arabic and Venetian. Paul and Silas, who does not signify mules in any oriental dialect; while the meaning "warm springs" is supported by the Arabic; see Rosenm. Comm. in loc. Such springs are also found on the eastern coast of the Dead sea, which was not far from the dwelling of the Seirites, to whom Anah belonged, and who inhabited at that time the country to the south-west and south of that sea. Five or six miles south-east of the Dead sea, towards Petra, and, consequently, in or near the same region in which the Seirites, and afterwards the Edomites, dwelt, is a place celebrated among the Greeks and Romans for its warm baths, and called by them Callirhoë. Josephus mentions (B. J. i. 33.) that it was visited by Herod; and says that the waters emptied themselves into the Asphalitis sea, and are also potable on account of their sweetness. Pliny also mentions these baths, Hist. Nat. v. 17. Mr. Leigh also visited the place. In a deep ravine, a stream of considerable size tumbles from a perpendicular rock on one side, the face of which is of a splendid yellow from the sulphur deposited by the water. A hot rapid stream flows at the bottom, and receives the smaller streams of boiling water which rush down on all sides. The water is so hot that it would be impossible to hold the hand in it had a minute. The deposit of sulphur is very considerable. Rosenm. Bibl. Geog. ii. 1. p. 217, seq. R.

ANAHARATH, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 19. ANAK, ANAKIM, famous giants in Palestine. Anak, father of the Anakim, was son of Arba, who gave name to Kirjath-Arba, or Hebron. He had three sons, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai, whose descendants were terrible for their ferocity and stature. The Hebrew spies reported, that in comparison to those monstrous men, they themselves were but grasshoppers, Num. xiii. 33. Caleb, assisted by the tribe of Judah, took Kirjath-Arba, and destroyed the Anakim, Josh. xv. 13, 14. Judges ii. 19. A few only remained in the cities of the Philistines, Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, Josh. xi. 22. See GIANT.

ANAMIM, second son of Mizraim, Gen. xii. 13. He peopled the Marcotia, if we may rely on the paraphrase Jonathan, son of Uzzie; but rather the Pentapolis of Cyrene, according to the paraphrase of Jerusalem. Perhaps the ancestors of Jacob's family dwelt in the countries around the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and in the Nasonomites. We believe the Anamites and Garamantes to be descended from Anamim. The Hebrew Ger, or Gar, signifies a pas- senger or traveller. The name Anamim may be derived from Gar-anaam: their capital is called Garamanta, in Solinus. All this, however, is mere conjecture.

ANAMMELECH. It is said (2 Kings xvii. 31,) that the inhabitants of Sebaraim, sent from beyond the Euphrates into Samaria, burned their children in honor of Anammelech and Adrammelech. (See ADRAMMELECH.) The god Anammelech is probably also the name of some divined heavenly body. Those who make the former to be the name supposed to be the moon; but this is not well supported. Hyde understands it of the constellation Cybeus, which in oriental astronomy is called the Herdman and cattle, or the Cattle-star. This accords well with the worship of the stars, &c. which was prevalent in those regions. (Hyde de Rel. vet. Persarum, p. 131.) The latter part of both these names is the oriental word Melech, i.e. king. R.
I. ANANIAS, son of Nebo, and high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Joseph, son of Caiaphas, A. D. 47. He was governor of Syria, called to Rome, to answer for his conduct to the emperor Claudius; but he justified himself, was acquitted, and returned. Jos. Ant. x. 6. (2) He did not, however, again recover the high priesthood; for during the time that Felix was governor of Judea, Jonathan, the successor of Ananias, was high-priest. But Felix having caused him to be assassinated in the temple, (Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 5.) the office remained vacant, until king Agrippa gave it toiasd the son of Phasaelus. (ib. xx. 8.) During this interval the events in which Paul was concerned with Ananias, as given below, seem to have taken place. Ananias at that time was not in fact high-priest, but had usurped the dignity, or acted rather as the high-priest’s substitute.

The tribunal of the Roman troops which guarded the temple at Jerusalem, having taken the apostle Paul into its custody, when he was assaulted by the Jews, (Acts xxiii. 39; xxiv. 1, seq.) convened the priests, and placed the apostle before them, that he might justify himself. Paul commenced his address, but the high-priest Ananias immediately commanded those who were near him to strike him on the face. To this injury and insult the apostle replied, “God is about to smite thee, thou whitened wall; for thou art full of subtle enmity against me. But those men commanded me to be smitten contrary to the law.” Being rebuked for thus addressing himself to the high-priest, the apostle excused himself by alleging that he was ignorant of his office. See Paul.

Paul was detained, and the tribunal ordered Paul to Cesarea, and thither Ananias, and other Jews, went to accuse him before Felix. Acts xxiv. Ananias was slain by a seditionist faction, at the head of which was his own son, at the commencement of the Jewish wars. Some writers, not distinguishing what Josephus relates of Ananias, when high-priest, from what he relates of him after his deposition, have made two persons of the same individual.

II. ANANIAS, summoned the Sadducees, was one of the warmest defenders of the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans. He was sent by Eleazar, leader of the mutineers, to Medius, captain of the Roman troops, then shut up in the royal palace at Jerusalem, to promise him and his people their lives, provided they would lay down their arms and hand over to the Roman commander their arms. Medius having surrendered on these conditions, the faction murdered all the Romans, except Medius, who escaped on promising to turn Jew, A. D. 66. Ananias was also sent by Eleazar to the Idumeans, (A. D. 66.) and promised to them the freedom of the rebel Jews, and the city of Jerusalem, against Ananias, whom they accused of designing to deliver up the city to the Romans. Jos. B. J. ii. 16 or 32.

III. ANANIAS, one of the first Christians of the city of Jerusalem, who, in concert with his wife, Sapphira, sold an estate, and secreting part of the purchase-money, carried the remainder to the apostles, as the whole price of his inheritance, Acts v. 1. Peter, knowing the falsehood of this pretension, reproved him sharply, telling him, “that he had lied to the Holy Ghost, not to men only;” and Ananias fell suddenly dead at his feet. Shortly after, his wife, Sapphira, ignorant of what had transpired, came into the assembly, and Peter, having put the same question to her, as he had before put to her husband, she also was guilty of the like falsehood; and was suddenly struck dead in the same manner.

A number of conjectures have been formed as to the reasons which induced the Holy Spirit thus to punish the falsehood of Ananias and Sapphira. (But sin committed by them was surely a common ordinary sin. They had defrauded the apostles of their property; they had attempted to deceive the apostles; they had deliberately undertaken to commit a fraud, and even a sacrilegious one, inasmuch as the money destined to the use of the church of God was itself a consecrated thing; in short they had ‘lied unto the Holy Ghost.’) The meanness and flagrancy of their crime was also aggravated by the circumstance, that those who thus really gave up their possessions for the common use, appear to have been themselves sustained from the public treasury. The sacred history does not detail to us specifically the motives which impelled them to this course; but God read their hearts; and we may rest assured that in this awful doom, as well as in all things else, the ‘Judge of all the earth did right.’

IV. ANANIAS, a disciple of Christ, at Damascus, whom the Lord directed to visit Paul, then recently converted and arrived at Damascus, Acta ix. 10. Ananias answered, “A have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints.” But the Lord said, “Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto me.” Ananias therefore went to the house where Paul resided, and putting his hands on him, said, “Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus, who appeared unto thee on the road, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.” We know no other circumstance of the life of Ananias. The modern Greeks maintain, that he was one of the seventy disciples, bishop of Phrygia, a martyr, and buried in that city. There is a very fine church where he was interred; and the Turks, who have made a mosque of it, preserve a great respect for his monument

I. ANANUS, high-priest of the Jews; called Anan, Luke iii. 2; John xviii. 13. See Anna.

II. ANANUS, son of Ananias, the high-priest mentioned above, was high-priest three months, A. D. 68. Josephus (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8.) describes him as a man extremely bold and enterprising, of the sect of the Sadducees; who, thinking it a favorable opportunity, after the death of Festus, governor of Judea, and before the arrival of Albinus, his successor, assembled the Sanhedrim, and therein procured the condemnation of Jesus and the Heriheat of the Jews. Josephus, who is often called the bishop of Jerusalem, and of some others, whom they stigmatized as guilty of impiety, and delivered to be stoned. This was extremely displeasing to all considerate men in Jerusalem, and they sent privately to king Agrippa, who had just arrived in Judea, entreating that he would prevent Ananus from taking such proceedings in future. He was, in consequence, deprived of his office; and it is thought that he was put to death by Jerusalem, at the beginning of the Jewish war, A. D. 67.

Several other Jews of this name are mentioned by Josephus in his accounts of the last war between the Jews and the Romans. See Abirippa II.

ANATHHEMA, "Accursed," from άναθημα, signifies—something set apart, separated, devoted. It is understood principally to denote the absolute, irrevocable, and entire separation of a person from the communion of the faithful, or from the number of the living, or from the privileges of society; or the devoting of a man, animal, city, or thing, to be exterminated, destroyed and consumed, and, as it were, annihilated. The Hebrew כָּרָם, charam, in Hiph. signifies properly to destroy, exterminate, devote. Moses requires the Israelites to devote, and utterly extirpate those who sacrifice to false gods, Exod. xxii. 20. In like manner God commanded that the cities belonging to the Canaanites, which did not surrender to the Israelites, should be devoted, Deut. vii. 2, 26; xx. 17. Achan, having purloined part of the spoil of Jericho, which had been devoted, was stoned, and what he had secreted was consumed with fire, Josh. vi. 17, 21; vii.—The word anathema, or anathema, is also sometimes taken for that which is irrevocably consecrated, vowed, or offered to the Lord, so that it may no longer be employed in, or returned to, common uses, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. No devoted thing (absolutely separated) that shall be devoted (absolutely separated) to the Lord, of man, beast, or field, shall be sold or redeemed. Some assert, that persons thus devoted were put to death, and quote Jephthah's daughter as an example. (See Judges x. 31, 32.) The word anathema is used for a person, who, on some occasion, devoted himself for the good of his country; or as an expiatory sacrifice to the infernal gods.—Here the reader will recollect Codrus and Curtius. Sometimes particular cities, were devoted: the Israelites devoted king Arad's country; (Num. xxx. 2, 3) the people at Mizpeh devoted all who should not march against the tribe of Benjamin; (Judg. xx.) and Saul devoted those who should eat before sunset, while they were pursuing the Philistines, 1 Sam. xiv. 24. It appears by the execution of these excrements, that those involved in them were put to death.

Sometimes particular persons devoted themselves, if they did not accomplish some specific purpose. In Acts xiii. 12, 13, it is said that above forty persons bound themselves with an oath, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. The Essenians were engaged by oaths to observe the sabbath, and to abstain from eating flesh. (See Joseph. de Bello, ii. 12.)

Moses (Exod. xxxii. 32.) and Paul (Rom. ix. 3.) in some sort anathematize themselves. Moses conjures God to forgive Israel; if not, to blot him out of the book which he had written, and Paul says that he would wish to be accursed (anathematized, absolutely separated from life, devoted, and made over to death,—whether stoning,—burning,—or in the most tremendous form,—as Achan, &c.) for his brethren, the Israelites, rather than be numbered among the guilty of excommunication, were driven from their assemblies, and generally starved to death, being obliged to feed on grass like beasts, not daring to receive food which might be offered them, because they were bound by the vow, which he had made, not to eat any. (Joseph. de Bello, ii. 12.)

Excommunication was a kind of Anathema used among the Hebrews, as it is now among Christians. Anathema was the greatest degree of excommunication; and by it the criminal was deprived, not only of communicating in prayers and other holy offices, but of admittance to the church, and of conversation with believers. Excommunicated persons could not perform acts of charity; they could be neither judges nor witnesses; they could not be present at funerals, nor circumcise their own sons, nor sit down in the company of others, nearer than four cubits; they were incapable of the rites of burial; and a large stone was often marked with these words, stoned over them, as over Achan, and Absalom, Josh. vii. 26; 2 Sam. xviii. 17. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

ANATHOTH, a city of Benjamin, (Josh. xvi. 18.) about three miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius and Jerome, or twenty furlongs, according to Josephus, where the Prophet Jeremiah was born, Jer. i. 1. It was given to the Levites of Kohath's family, and was a city of refuge.

and called them to a regular attendance on his person and ministry, promising to make them fishers of men. (John vi. 39.) John iv. 39. John saw that his subsequent life nothing is known; the book of Acts makes no mention of him. Some of the ancients are of opinion, that Andrew preached in Scythia; others, that he preached in Greece; others, in Epirus, Achaea, or Argos. The modern Greeks make him a founder of the church of Byzantium, or Constantinople, which the ancients knew nothing of. The Acts of his Martyrdom, which are of considerable antiquity, though not authentic, affirm that he suffered martyrdom at Patras, in Achaea, being sentenced to be executed on a cross by Eppeus, praetor of that province. See Fabric. Cod. Aedep. N. T. vol. ii.

ANDRONICUS, one of the great men belonging to the court of Antioch Epiphanes, was left by that prince to govern the city of Antioch, while he went into Cilicia, to reduce certain places which had revolted. Meneaesus, the pretended high-priest of the Jews, thought this circumstance might favor his design of getting rid of Onias, who, in dignity he unjustly, and who had arrived in Antioch with accusations against him. He therefore addressed himself to Andronicus with large presents; but Onias, being informed of this, reproached him very sharply, and told him in the sanctuary at Damascus, a suburb of Antioch, where was a famous temple, and where Julian the Apatostate afterwards sacrificed, lest any violence should be offered to him. Meneaesus solicited Andronicus so powerfully to deliver Onias, that he went in person to Damascus, and promised, with solemn oaths, that he would do him no injury, thereby persuading him to leave his place of refuge. As soon as Onias had quitted the sanctuary, however, Meneaesus seized him and piled him to death. When the body returned from his expedition, and was acquainted with the death of Onias, he shed tears, commanded Andronicus to be divested of the purple, to be led about the city in an ignominious manner, and to be killed in the very place where he had killed Onias, 2 Macc. iv. A. M. 3894.

ANEM, (lit. two fountains,) a city of Ismael, given to the Levites, 1 Chron. vi. 73. In the parallel passage, Josh. xix. 31, it is called En-ghannim, i.e. fountain of grass, or greenness. See PTOLEMAIS.

I. ANER, a city of Manassheh given to the Levites of Kohath's family, 1 Chron. vi. 70.

11. ANER, Feahol, and Mamre, three Canaanites who joined their forces with those of Abrahahm, in pursuance of the alliance made, Amraphel, the king of Shinar, who had pillaged Sodom, and carried off Lot, Abraham's nephew, Gen. xiv. 24. They did not imitate the disinterestedness of the patriarch, however, but retained their share of the spoil.

ANGARIARE. The evangelists use this term as equivalent to pass:—to constrain or take by force. The word angariare, whence angariare is derived, comes originally from the Persians, who called the post-boys which carried the letters and orders of the king to the provinces, angariare. As these officers compelled the people, in places they passed through, to furnish them with guides, horses, and carriages, the word angariare became expressive of constraints of that nature. (See Xen. Cyr. viii. 6. 17. Herodot. viii. 89. Compare also Esth. viii. 10, 14.) It appears that the Jews were subjected to these servitudes under the Romans. Jesus said to his disciples, "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain;" and Simon, the Cyrenian, was compelled to bear our Saviour's cross, Matt. v. 41; xxvii. 39.

These remarks will be sufficient to convey a general idea of the importance of the word angariare, but a more accurate conception may be formed, from the following portrait of an angariare, as furnished by Colonel Campbell:—

"As I became familiarized to my Textor's guide, I found his character disclose much better traits than his first appearance bespake. The first object he seemed to have in view on our journey, was to impress me with a notion of his consequence and authority, as a messenger belonging to the sultan. As all these men are employed by the first magistrates in the country, and are, as it were, the links of communication between them, they think themselves of great importance to the state; while the great men, whose business they are employed in, make them feel the weight of their authority, and treat them with the greatest contempt: hence they become habitually servile to their superiors, and, by natural consequence, insolent and overbearing to their inferiors, or those who, being in their power, they conceive to be so. As camels possess a certain majesty and power and authority, wherever they go, in some points undisputed; and they can compel a supply of provisions, horses, and attendants, wherever it suits their occasion; so these angariare resist the right to take a camel, or to be seated on the emperor's business, be the owner's occasion ever so pressing. As soon as he stopped at a caravanserai, he immediately called loudly about him in the name of the sultan; demanding, in a menacing tone of voice, fresh horses, victuall, &c. on the instant. The terror of this great man operated like magic; nothing could exceed the activity of the men, the quickness of the women, and the terror of the children; but no quickness of men's and women's, nor effort could satisfy my gentleman; he would show me his power in a still more striking point of view, and fell to belaboring them with his whip, and kicking them with all his might." (Campbell's Travels, Part ii. pages 92, 94.) If such were the manner of behavior of this messenger, whose character opened so favorably, what may we suppose was the brutality of those who had not the same sensibility in their composition? and what shall we say to that meekness, which directed to go double what such a despotic power would require?—"If he compels thee to go a mile with him—go two," Matt. v. 41. See POATS.

I. ANGEL, a messenger. This word answers to the Hebrew רך, mellich. In Scripture, we frequently read of the messengers and angels, sent to declare the will of God, to correct, teach, reprove, or comfort. God gave the law to Moses, and appeared to the patriarchs, by the mediation of angels, who represented him, and who spake in his name, Acts vii. 50, 53; Gal. iii. 19.

Orogen, Bede, and others, think that angels were created at the same time as the heavens, and that Moes included them under the expression—"In the beginning, God created the heavens;" others suppose that they are included under the term angels, which God created on the first day; while some are of opinion that they were created before the world—which seems countenanced by Job xxxviii. 4. 7. "Where wast thou, when I laid the foundations of the earth—and all the sons of God shouted for joy?" Many of the fathers, led into mistake by the book of Enoch, and by a passage in Genesis, (vi. 2)
wherein it is said, "The sons of God saw the daughters of man, that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose," imagined that angels were corporeal, and capable of sensual pleasures. It is true, they call them spirits, and spiritual beings, but in the same sense as we call the wind, odors, vapors, &c. spiritual. Others of the fathers, indeed, and those in great number, have asserted, that angels were purely spiritual; and this is the common opinion. Before the captivity at Babylon, we find no angel mentioned by name; and the Talmudists affirm that they brought their names thenhe. Some have appropriated angels to empires, nations, provinces, cities, and persons. For instance, Michael is considered as protector of Israel: "Michaell, your prince," says the angel Gabriel to Daniel, ch. x. 21. Gabriel speaks also of the angel, protector of Persia, according to the majority of interpreters, when he says, "that the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him one-and-twenty days." Luke (Acts xvi. 9.) tells us, that a man of Macedonia appeared to Paul in the night, and said to him, "Come over into Macedonia and help us," which has been [improperly] understood of the angel of Macedonia inviting him into the province committed to his care. The LXX (Deut. xxxii. 40.) say, that God had set the bounds of the peoples, according to the number of the angels of Israel; which has been supposed to mean the government of each particular country and nation, where with God had intrusted his angels. But our English translators keep more exactly to the original, and render it, "He set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel." John addressed letters to the angels of the seven Christian churches in Asia Minor; meaning, in the judgment of many fathers, not the bishops of those churches, but angels, who were appointed by God for their protection. But, as the learned Prideaux observes, the minister of the synagogue, who officiated in offering up the public prayers, being the mouth of the congregation, delegated by them, as their representative, messenger, or angel, to address God in prayer for them, was in Hebrew called Sheichah-Zebbor, i.e. the angel of the church, and that has been the name of the ministers of the churches of Asia in the Revelation, by a name borrowed from the synagogue, called, angels of those churches. Connect. &c. Part i. Book vi.

Guardian angels, however, appear to be alluded to in the Old Testament. Jacob speaks (Gen. xlviii. 16,) of the angel who had delivered him out of all dangers. The Psalmist, in several places, mentions angels as protectors of the righteous; (Ps. xxxiv. 7; xcl. 11.) and this was the common opinion of the Jews in our Saviour's time. When Peter, having been released, came from prison to the house where the disciples were assembled, and knocked at the door, those within thought it was his guardian angel, and not himself, Acts xii. 15. Our Saviour enjoins us not to despise little ones, (i.e. his followers,) because their angels continually behold the face of our heaven Father, Matt. xviii. 10. Both Jews and heathen believed that particular angels were commissioned to attend individuals, and had the care of their conduct and protection. Hesiod, one of the most ancient Greek authors, says, that there are good angels on earth; whom he thus describes:

Aerial spirits, by great Jove designed
To be on earth the guardians of mankind;

Invisible to mortal eyes they go,
And mark our actions, good or bad, below;
The immortal spies with watchful care preside,
And thirce ten thousand round their charges glide.
They can reward with glory or with gold;
Such power divine as our defects may fold. Oper. et Dies, lib. i. ver. 121.

Plato says (de Legibus, lib. x.) that every person has two demons, or genii, one prompting him to evil, the other to good. Apuleius speaks but of one demon assigned to every man by Plato, Ex hae sublimiorem daemoni copiis, Plato autem singularis hominibus in vitis agenti testes, et custodes singularis additis, qui nemini compositi semper adiunt. Libel. de Deo Socratis.

The apostle Paul hints at a subordination among the angels in heaven, one differing from another, either in office or glory; but the fathers who have interpreted the apostle's words are not agreed on the number and order of the celestial hierarchy. Origen was of opinion, that Paul mentioned part only of the choirs of angels, and that there were many others of which he said nothing; and this notion may be observed in many of the subsequent fathers. Others have numbered up nine choirs of angels. The author, who is commonly cited under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, admits but three hierarchies, and three orders of angels in each hierarchy. In the first, are seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; in the second, dominions, principalities, and powers; in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. Some of the rabbins reckon four, others ten, orders, and give them different names according to their degrees of power and knowledge; but this rests only on the imagination of those who amuse themselves with speaking very particularly of things of which they know nothing.

Raphael tells Tobias, (Tobit xii. 15.) that he is one of the seven angels who attend in the presence of God. Michael tells Tobias, that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty, Dan. x. 13. In the Revelation, (viii. 2, 3.) John saw seven angels standing before the Lord. In the Apocalypse Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, they are called seven angels who are in charge of the seven churches of Asia, as in the Revelation, by a name borrowed from the synagogue, called, angels of those churches. Connect. &c. Part i. Book vi.

The number of angels is not mentioned in Scripture; but is always represented as very great, and, indeed, innumerable. Daniel (vii. 10.) says, that on his approach to the throne of the Ancient of Days, he saw a fiery stream issuing from it, and that "thousand thousands of angels ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him." Our Lord said that "his heavenly Father could give him more than twelve legions of angels" (Matt. xxvi. 53.)—more than—seventy-two thousand. The Psalmist describes the chariot of God as attended by twenty thousand angels, Ps. cxlviii. 17.

The Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits; (Acts xxiii. 8.) but other Jews paid them a superstitious worship. Col. ii. 18. The author of the book, entitled, "Of St. Peter's Preaching," a work of great antiquity, cited by Clemens of Alexandria, (Stromat. lib. vi.) says, the Jews pay re-
By the "angels of the Lord," are often meant, in Scripture—men of God—prophets; for example, (Judg. ii. 1.) "An angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you to go up out of Egypt, &c. And it came to pass, when the angel of the Lord spake these words, all the people lifted up their voices and wept; and they sacrificed there to the Lord, and Joshua let the people go." It has been thought, that this angel was Joshua, or the high priest, or a prophet; and several interpreters have been of opinion, that the angel is described by Moses, under the name of the angel of the Lord, who was to introduce Israel into the promised land. Prophets are certainly called angels of the Lord; e.g. Haggai i. 3. "Thus saith Haggai, the angel of the Lord, from among the angels of the Lord." (Heb. υπό τῶν ἀγγέλων τοῦ Κυρίου). Vulgate, in interpreting υπό τῶν ἀγγέλων, "Thus saith Haggai, the Lord's messenger, in the Lord's message, unto the people." Malachi, the last of the minor prophets, speaks several of the acts of the angel, called "the angel of God," as his name signifies in Hebrew; but some believe Ezra to be designated by the name Malachi, or angel of the Lord. (Jerome, Proef. in Mal.) Expositors, speaking of the prophet Nathan, who convicted David of his sin, calls him "an angel," or messenger, from the Lord. Calmet remarks that Manoah, Samson's father, (Judg. xiii. 2, &c.) calls, indifferently, angel, and man of God, him who appeared to his wife; till his vanishing with the smoke of the burnt-offering convinced him it was an angel; but it seems evident, that neither Manoah, nor his wife, took him for other than a prophet, till after his disappearance, v. 16.

Some times the name of God is given in Scripture to an angel. The angel who appeared to Moses in the bush, (Exod. iii. 19, &c.; Judg. xiii. 20, 21;) who delivered the law to him, who spake to him, and who guided the people in the wilderness, is often called by the name of God; and the Lord said, "My name is in him." Exod. xxii. 21. And the angel who appeared to the patriarchs, is likewise termed God: (Gen. xviii. 3, 17, 22, &c.) not only Elohim and Adonai, names sometimes attributed to judges and to princes, but also by the name Jehovah, which belonged to God as his own. 11. ANGEL, DECEIVING ANGEL, ANGEL OF DEATH, ANGEL OF SATAN, ANGEL OF THE BOTTOMLESS PIT. These terms signify the devil and his agents; evil angels, ministers of God's wrath, and vengeance. God smote Sennacherib, king of Assyria, with the sword of the destroying angel; (2 Kings xvii. 39.) also, the Israelites, by the sword of the angel of death, 2 Sam. xxiv. 16. The angel or messenger of Satan buffeted Paul; (2 Cor. xi. 12.) the same angel accosted the high-priest, Joshua, and the Lord; (Zech. iii. 1, 2;) and disputed with the archangel Michael, about the body of Moses, Jude 9. The angel of the bottomless pit, (Rev. x. 1;) or the angel king of the bottomless pit, as John, in the Revelation, calls him, is the same as the prince of devils, the destroying angel. See Satan.

The Angel of Death is the agent which God commissions to separate the soul from the body. The Persians call him Mordad, or Asuman; the rabbins and Arabians, Azrael; and the Chaldean paraphrasts, Malk-ad mouses. The book concerning the Assumption, or death of Moses, calls him Samael, prince of the devils; and states that when he advanced towards Moses, with a design of forcing the soul of that conductor of God's people out of his body, he was so struck with the lustre of his counenancce, and the virtue of the name of God written on his rod, that he was obliged to retire.

In the Greek of the book of Job, the angel of death (ρήγας θανάτου) is frequently mentioned. See chap. xxxiii. 22; xx. 15; xxxvi. 14. Job also says, "An evil man seeketh only rebellion, therefore a cruel angel shall be sent against him." Prov. xvii. 11. This is supposed to be the evil angel mentioned Ps. xxxv. 5, 6.

The devil is considered in Scripture as a prince, who exercises dominion over other devils of a lower rank, and of less power. In this sense, the gospel speaks of Satan's kingdom, Matt. xii. 26. Our Saviour came into the world to overthrow the power of Satan; and at the day of judgment it will condemn those who reject the gospel, to that eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels; (ch. xxv. 41.) his ministers and agents, being of the same nature, and sentenced to the same punishment with himself.

The preceding observations are derived from Calmet; but as the subject to which they relate is in itself very obscure, all we know of it being gathered from incidental hints, scattered here and there in the Bible, the reader is presented with the following additional remarks by Mr. Taylor.

As we must wholly rely on Scripture accounts, and wave all others, except so far as they are perfectly consonant with these, we shall do well to examine, first of all, the language of Scripture, in reference to angels, and their nature; and to ascertain its import in different places where it occurs.

I. The word Angel is taken rather as a name of office, than of nature: a messenger, an agent, an envoy, a deputy: (1.) personally taken, he who performs the will of a superior; (2.) impersonally taken, that which performs the will of a superior.

(1.) Personally taken, the word angel denotes a human messenger: for instance, in the Old Testament, 2 Sam. xiv. 19. "And David sent messengers (Hch. angels) to Jabez Gilead?" Prov. xxiii. 17. "A wicked messenger (αρσενικός, angel) falleth into evil?"—and so in various places. Also, in the New Testament, Matt. xii. 10. "I send my messenger (Gr. ὄγιος, τὸ ἀγγελίστα) before thy face." Also, Mark i. 2; Luke vii. 24. "And when the messengers, (Gr. the angels) of John were departed." James ii. 25. "Rahab received the messengers, (Gr. the angels.) Gal. iv. 14. "Ye received me as the angel of God, (αρσενικός, as Christ Jesus,) the prime messenger from God to man. Some commentators have referred this, which is the simplest idea of the word, to John v. 4. "An angel went down and troubled the water;" as if this were a messenger sent (by the priests, or others) for that purpose. So Acts xii. 15. "They said, It is the angel of Peter; i.e. a messenger from him. But this conception fails of the true import of these passages. (See BETHSEDA.) It seems, however, certain, from the Scriptures quoted, and from many others, that, person-ally taken, the sense of a messenger, or one de-pended upon, or sent for, is the true idea of the word angel, both in the Old and in the New Testament. Hence, therefore, Christ Jesus may well be called, "The angel of God:" he being eminently the deputy from God to man; the great angel of the covenant; (Mal. iii. 1.) the agent for God.
ANGER

(2.) Taken impersonally, the word angel implies, that agent which executes the will of another: and, as the great natural agents of the world around us are wholly beyond the direction of man, and, therefore, are esteemed as exclusively obedient to God, the word angel imports something empowered or commissioned to execute his will. Now, though all the powers of nature, in all their operations, are, in this sense, angels of God, as acting for him, yet their more extraordinary effects are principally noticed, as being most evidently his agents: these appearing most remarkable to feeble humanity, and most exciting its attention. In a sense greatly analogous to this, we say, in common speech, "Providence interposed so and so," and a thing is "the dispensation of Providence." But we rarely expressly ourselves thus, in respect to the ordinary occurrences of life. Extraordinary operations of providence, then, though accomplished by natural means, are in Scripture considered as angels (agents) of God: and so the Psalmist observes, (civ. 4.) that God can, if he please, "make winds his angels," to conduct his dispensations; "and flames of fire his ministers," or servants, to perform his pleasure.

But, beside agencies of natural powers, or providential angels, we have reason to infer, that there exists in the scale of beings, a series of created intelligent powers, who are angels, inasmuch as they are occasionally agents of God towards mankind. These, in capacity and dignity, are vastly superior to ourselves; indeed, they are so much our superiors, that in order to render them in any degree comprehensible by us, their nature, offices, &c. are illustrated by being compared to what occurs among mankind. Thus, if a human prince have his attendants, his servants, his guards, this circumstance is taken advantage of, and is employed to illustrate the nature of celestial angels; and to this effect, by way of similitude, and descending to the conception of man, are represented as attendants, servants of God. We know that God needs no attendants to perform his commands, being omnipresent; but being himself likened to a great king, his angels are compared to courtiers and ministers, statuaries in human form, and employed in his service. It cannot be said, God does not need angels, therefore angels do not exist; for God does not need man, yet man exists. This principle is evidently the foundation of the apologue which precedes the poetical part of the book of Job; (chap. i. 6.) "There was a day, when the sons of God came to present themselves (as it were, at court) before the Lord;" also, of 1 Kings xxii. 19. "I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him, on his right hand, and on his left." Isaiah's vision (chap. vi.) is to the same purpose; and our Lord continues the same idea, especially, when speaking of his glorious return,—"The Son of Man shall send his angels from his kingdom all that offends. He shall sit on the throne of his glory, and all his holy angels around him," Matt. xxv. 31, seq. Through-out the Revelation, many coincident representations may be observed. In reference to the services rendered by angels to mankind, we may safely adopt the idea of their being servants of this Great King, resulting from before his throne to this lower world, to execute his commissions: so far, at least, Scripture warrants us. In such services, some of them, probably, are always engaged, though invisible to us. We may receive from them much good, or evil, without being aware of any angelic interference. Thus the activity of Satan (an agent of evil) in Job, is represented as producing great effects, (by storms and other means,) but Job knew not that it was Satan: he referred all the calamities he felt, or feared, to the good pleasure of God acting by natural causes; and thus the angel might long have watched Abraham invisibly, before he called out to forbid the slaying of Isaac, Gen. xxii. In this sense, angels are "ministering spirits, sent forth to do a variety of services to the heirs of salvation," Heb. i. 14.

If angels are thus engaged invisibly in the care or service of mankind, then we can find no difficulty in admitting that they have had orders, on particular occasions, to make themselves known, as celestial intelligences. They may often have assumed the human appearance, for ought we can tell; but if they assumed it completely, (as must be supposed, and which nothing forbids,) how can we generally know it? How can we recognize them? This is evidently beyond human abilities, unless it be part of their commission to leave indications of their superior nature. This produces the inquiry—By what tokens have angels made themselves known?

(1.) Such discovery has usually been after they had delivered their message, and always for the purpose of a sign, in confirmation of the faith of the party whom they had addressed. It is evident, that the angel which appeared to Manoah, was taken by both Manoah and his wife only for a prophet, till after he had delivered his message, he took leave "wonderfully," to convince them of his extraordinary nature. Thus the angel that wrestled with Jacob, at last put the hollow of his thigh out of joint—a token that he was no mere man. The angel that spake to Zacharia, (Luke i. 20.) rendered him dumb—a token beyond the power of mere man (e. g. an impostor speaking falsely in the name of God) to produce; and so of others.

(2.) But sometimes angels did not reveal themselves fully; they prove, as it were, obscure, and very indistinct, though powerful, indications of their presence. When angels were commissioned to appear to certain persons only, others who were in the company with those persons, did not, therefore, indicated an extraordinary occurrence. Although the appearance was not to them, yet they seem to have felt the effects of it; as Dan. x. 7. "I, Daniel, alone saw the vision—the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves." So Acts ix. 7. "The men which journeyed with Saul stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man." xxvi. 9. "They that were with me saw a peculiar kind of light and were afraid; but the ward said, this voice (the distinct words) addressed to me." xxvi. 14. "We were all fallen to the earth." The guards of the sepulchre (Matt. xxviii. 4.) seem to have been in much the same situation; they probably did not distinctly (i. e. accurately, distinctly,) see the angel; but only saw a general splendid appearance, enough most thoroughly to terrify them, and to cause them to become as dead men, but not enough to resist the crafty explanations of the priests, and the influence of their money.

(3.) These instances evince, that angels discovered themselves as such, to angels with different degrees of clearness, as best suited their errand. Sometimes they were conjectured to be angels, but they did not advance those conjectures into certainty; and sometimes they left no doubt who and what they were, and, together with their errand, they declared their nature.

(4.) The general token of angelic presence, seems to have been a certain splendor, or brightness, accompanying their persons: but this seems to have had also a distinction in degree. It would seem, that sometimes a person only, not a splendor, was seen;
sometimes a splendor only, not a person; and sometimes both a person and his splendor. Of the person only, we have already given instances; of the splendor only, the burning bush seen by Moses, may be one instance; though afterwards a person spoke from it; the splendor in the sanctuary might be another. This splendor seems to have been worn by Jesus at his transfiguration; (Matt. xlvii. 3; Mark
ix. 2.) at his appearance to Saul; (Acts ix. 3; xxvii.
13.) also when seen by John. Rev. i. When not this splendor, when worn by a person, indicative of the presence of the great angel of the covenant?

III. Thus we trace a gradation in the use of the word angel, which it may be proper to exhibit in comparative measure, as follows:—

(1.) Divine messengers, yet human persons;
(2.) Divine messengers, yet human persons; i. e. angels for others.—(2.) Divine messengers, yet human persons; i. e. agents for God—as prophets (Haggai
i. 13.) and priests, (Mal. ii. 7; Eccles. v. 6.)—(3.) Officers or bishops of the churches.—(4.) Providence,
i. e. the agency of divine dispensations, conducting natural causes, apparent on remarkable occasions.—
(5.) Created intelligences; i. e. agents of a nature superior to man; performing the divine commands, in relation to mankind.—(6.) The great angel between God and man; i. e. the deputed agent of God, eminently so.

Not to extend this very delicate and obscure subject, too far, it is sufficient, if this mode of representing it excite the reader's consideration; we should be cautious of intruding into things not seen.

IV. In the same rank as to nature, though very different from celestial angels, as to happiness, Scripture seems to place the angels “who kept not their first estate.” But neither their number, their dignity, their power, are as ours are expressed. As the nature and offices of good angels are illustrated, similares, so are the nature and disposition of evil
angels;—e. g.

(1.) If a part of a prince's court be faithful to his government, and under his obedience, another part may be unfaithful, may be in rebellion, may hate him. This idea, then, is that of angels. What is said of Satan, and the fallen angels, his companions,
is analogous to such a revolt in a prince's court;
i. e. the idea of what passes among men, is transferred to spiritual beings, in order to help us to some conception on a subject otherwise beyond our powers.

(2.) As revolters in provinces distant from court may sometimes injure loyal subjects, so may we suppose that evil (rebel) angels are injured to injure individuals among mankind. They may inflict dis-cases, as in the case of Job; i. e. having the disposition, they are suffered to take advantage of natural disease, and to augment, and fix it, if possible, in the shape of other disease. As the case of the lunatic, Matt. xvii. 15; Mark v. Luke viii.

Also, if the thorn in the flesh, and the angel of Satan, be the same, in the case of Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 7.

(6.) We may suppose, that evil angels would, if permitted, destroy all good on earth; all natural good;
would blast the fruits of the earth, spread diseases, and deform the face of nature; would expel all thoughts of God, all emotions of gratitude to him, all piety, divine or human,—all moral good.

(4.) We may suppose, that the endeavors of these malignant beings to destroy, are, when they attempt to exceed their limits, checked and counteracted by the agency of benevolent spirits; or that these are employed to ward off or prevent the evils designed by Satan and his angels.

V. On the whole, we may sum up the contradictory characters of these active and intelligent agents,
by combining those particulars in which Scripture supports us. No doubt but many parts of their nature, powers, and offices, must remain hidden from us here; but when we exchange earth for heaven,
this subject, like many others, may be infinitely better understood by us; and if we should not become such agents ourselves, yet we may witness the im-pressably beneficial effects arising among our fellow mortals from that agency which now we call supernatural, and which we can only comprehend in a very small degree, and that by very inadequate comparisons.

Good angels are God's host; innumerable; they attend and obey him in heaven, but they occasionally do services, and give instructions, to the sons of men. Good angels attended on Christ, honored him, taught him, strengthened him; accompanied his resurrection, his ascension, and will attend his second coming, when they will separate the good from the evil, the goodly to glory, the ungodly to perdition. Good angels attend good men, defend and save them, direct them, carry their souls to heaven, will rejoice with them in glory, &c. They are humble and modest, obedient, sympathizing, complacent, &c.

Evil angels are unclean promoters of darkness
—of spiritual wickedness; they oppose good angels,
and good men; they are under punishment now;
they dread such suffering hereafter, everlasting fire being prepared for them.

Angels of Light, and Angels of Darkness.
We call good angels angels of light, their habitation being in heaven, in the region of light, clothed with light and glory; they stand before the throne of the Most High, and they inspire men with good actions, actions of light and righteousness.

Angels of darkness, on the contrary, are the devil's ministers, whose abode is in hell, the region of darkness. Paul says that “Satan sometimes transforms himself into an angel of light.” (2 Cor. xii. 14.) In like manner as our Saviour says, “that wolves sometimes put on sheep's clothing, to seduce the simple,” Matt. vii. 15. They are, however, discovered by their works; sooner or later they betray themselves by deeds of darkness, wherein they engage with their followers.

Anger is in Scripture frequently attributed to God; not that he is capable of those violent emotions which this passion produces; but figuratively speaking, after the manner of men, and because he punishes the wicked with the severity of a superior provoked to anger.

"Anger" is often used for its effects, i. e. punishment, chastisement. The magistrate is "a revenger to execute wrath." (Rom. xiii. 4.) that is to say, vengeants, or punishment. "Is God unjust, who makes people sensible of the effects of his anger?" or who takes away the existence of men, Rom. iii. 5. "Anger is gone out from the Lord, and begins to be felt," (Numb. xvi. 46.) by its effects, in a plague. Anger is often joined with fury, even when God is spoken of; but this is by way of expression more forcibly the effects of his anger, or what may be expected from the just occasions of his indignation, Deut. xxix. 24. "Turn from us the fury of thine anger," 2 Chron. xxix. 10; Dan. ix. 10.

"The day of wrath," is the day of God's judgment, the day of vengeance, or punishment, (Rom. ii. 5.) "the wrath to come!" (Matt. iii. 7; 1 Thess. i. 10.) "We were all children of wrath," "vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction," Eph. ii. 3; Rom. ix. 22.

Paul enjoins the Romans to "give way, or place, to wrath;" (Rom. xi. 19.) that is, provoke not the wicked, who are already sufficiently exasperated against you, but let their anger of itself sink and decline; also, do not expose yourselves unreasonably to their passion; as, when we meet a furious and unruly beast, we go out of the way, and avoid him; so behave toward your persecutors. The weapons of God's anger (Jer. i. 25.) are the instruments he uses in punishment, war, famine, barrenness, diseases, &c. but particularly war, which is the consequence of the misfortunes, and the fulness of the "cup of God's wrath." To consummate, finish, fill, his anger, is to cause the effects of it to be felt with the utmost rigor.

The Hebrews express anger by the same word which signifies nose and nostrils, borrowed from the idea of hard breathing or snuffling, and the consequent dilatation of the nostrils, which accompanies violent anger. So Theoc. i. 8. Martial vi. 64. See Nose.

Ani, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 50.) probably the Anam, or Anea, mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome, about eight or ten miles east of Hebron.

Animals. The Hebrews distinguish clean animals, i.e. those which may be eaten and offered in sacrifice to Jehovah, from those which are unclean, the use of which is prohibited. The distinction consists in the form of the foot or hoof, which must be thoroughly cloven into two parts, and no more, and in chewing the cud. Those animals which possess both these qualities are clean; those which have neither, or only one, of them, are unclean.

The sacrifices the Hebrews generally offered were, (1.) of the beeve kind; a cow, bull, or calf. When it is said oxes were sacrificed, we are to understand bulls, for the mutilation of animals was not permitted or used among the Israelites, Lev. xxii. 18, 19, (2.) of the goat kind; a she-goat, he-goat, or kid, xxi. 24. (3.) of the sheep kind; an ewe, ram, or lamb. In burnt-offerings, and sacrifices for sin, rams were offered; for peace-offerings, or sacrifices of pure devotion, a female might be offered, if pure and without blemish, iii. 1. Besides these three sorts of animals used in sacrifice, many others might be eaten, wild or tame; such as the stag, the roe-buck, and in general, all that have cloven feet, and that chew the cud. All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the cud, were esteemed impure, and could neither be offered nor eaten, Lev. xi. 3, 4. The fat of all sorts of animals sacrificed, was forbidden as food; as was the blood in all cases, on pain of death. Neither did the Israelites eat the same which lies on the hollow of the thigh, because the angel that wrested with Jacob at Mahanaim, touched it, and occasioned it to shrunk. Neither did they eat animals which had been torn, or touched, by a ravenous or impure beast, such as a lion, a wolf, a mad dog, or any kind of any animal, that died of itself. Whoever touched the carcass of it was impure until the evening; and till that time, and after he had washed his clothes, he could not associate with others, Lev. xiv. 50.

Fish that had neither fins nor scales were unclean, Lev. xi. 10. Birds which walk on the ground with four feet, such as bats, and flies that have many feet, were impure; but the law (Lev. xi. 21, 22.) excepts locusts, which have their hind feet higher than those before, and rather leap than walk. These are clean, and may be eaten; as, in fact, they were, and still are, in Palestine, and other eastern countries.

Interpreters are much divided with relation to the legal purity or impurity of animals. It is believed by some, that this distinction obtained before the flood; and since God commanded Noah (Gen. vii. 2.) to carry se ven couple of clean animals into the ark, and only two of unclean; (see Ark:) but others, as Augustine, Origen, Irenaeus, are of opinion, that it is altogether unbiblical, and that it denotes the moral purity which the Hebrews were to endeavor after, or that impurity which they were to avoid, according to the nature of these animals. Thus, if a hog, for example, signifies glutony; a hare, lasciviousness; a sheep, gentleness; then the principal design of Moses in prohibiting the use of swine's flesh, was to condemn glutony, and excess in eating or drinking; or in recommending sheep, or doves, it was to recommend gentleness, &c. Others, as Theodoret tells us, that God intended to preserve the Hebrews from the temptation of adorning animals, by permitting them to eat the generality of those which were reared as gods in Egypt; and leading them to look with horror on others, to which, likewise, divine honors were paid. They never had any idea of we Philipping the animals they ate; still less of adorning the seas which they could not persuade themselves to use, even for nourishment. Tertullian thought, the God proposed, by this means, to accustom the Hebrews to temperance, by enjoining them to deprive themselves of several sorts of food. Many commenta tors, however, discern in the animals which are forbidden as unclean, merely some natural qualities which are really hurtful, or which, at least, are de rero to be so by certain people. Mosesmight prohibit the use of those beasts, birds, and fishes, the flesh of which was thought pernicious to health; those which were wild, dangerous, or venomous, or th were so esteemed. God, likewise, who designed separate the Hebrews from other people, as a nation consecrated to his service, seems to have intended this use of certain animals, which were considered as unclean, that by this figurative purity they might be inclined to another purity, real and perfect, as intimated, Lev. xxiv. 24.

Most nations have fixed on certain animals as fit for human food than others; in other words, unclean; and this, independent of their properties, more or less salutary or injurious to health. Yet find considerable variations of opinion and practice even among nations of the same race and climate. The horse, held unlawful by the Hebrews, is eaten by the Tartars; the camel, forbidden to the Jews eaten by the Arabs; as is also the hare, and other reasts because as sacrifices were eaten either in whole o part, by the priest or offerer, or both, it is evident, that the admission of animals legally impure would have spread impurity under the sanction of the altar itself. And further, that the altar partook of the sacrifice, the fat, &c. which were consumed by its fire, that fire, with the sacred implement itself, would have been absolutely desecrated by such unwarrantable departure from the instituted rites. See the histories of this in the Maccabees, &c. The flesh of the swine was usually the pollution forced by persecutors on the Jews; but it is evident, that any kind of prohibited food, from whatever class derived, would have produced the same effect. See further under Goat, and Suck.

We cannot determine precisely the creatures meant in the original, under certain of the following names, as the eastern parts of the world have many animals different from those which inhabit Europe, and to which no English names can properly be given: but under their respective articles, what information we have been able to procure, will appear. The Vulgate has been followed in this catalogue; those who please may consult the large work of Bochart, concerning the animals mentioned in the Bible.

ANISE, an herb well known, which produces small seeds of a pleasant smell. Our Lord reproaches the Pharisees with their scrupulous exactitude in paying tithe of anise, mint, and cummin, while they neglected justice, mercy, and faith, which were the most essential principles and practices of religion, Matt. xxii. 23.

I. ANNA, daughter of Tobit, of the tribe of Naphtali, carried captive to Nineveh, by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, Tobit i. 1, 2, &c.

II. ANNA, daughter of Phanuel, a prophetess and widow of the tribe of Asher, Luke ii. 36, 37. She was married early, and lived but seven years with her husband, after which she continued, without ceasing, in the temple, serving God, day and night, with fasting and prayers. Dr. Prideaux remarks that this devotion is to be understood not as greater than that Anna constantly attended the morning and evening sacrifice at the temple, and then with great devotion offered up her prayers to God; the time of the morning and evening sacrifice being the most solemn time of prayer among the Jews, and the temple the most solemn place for it. Anna was fourscore and four years of age, when the Virgin came to present Jesus in the temple; and entering there, while Simeon was pronouncing his thanksgiving, likewise, began to praise God, and to speak of the Messiah to all who waited for the redemption of Israel.

ANNAS, a high-priest of the Jews, Luke iii. 2; John xviii. 13, 24; Acts iv. 6. He is mentioned in Luke as being high-priest along with Caiphas his son-in-law. He is called by Josephus, Aanass, the son of Seth; and was first appointed to that office by Quirinius, procurer of Syria, about A. D. 7 or 8, (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2. 1,) but was afterwards deprived of it by Valerius Gatus, procurator of Judea, who gave the office first to Iasael, the son of Phaebus, and a short time after to Eleazar the son of Annas. He held the office one year, and was then succeeded by Simon, who, after another year, was followed by Joseph, also called Caiaphas, the son-in-law of Annas, about A. D. 27 or 28, who continued in office until A. D. 35. In the passages of the New Testament above cited, therefore, it is apparent that Caiphas was the only actual and proper high-priest; but Annas, being his father-in-law, and having been formerly himself high-priest, and being also perhaps his substitute, (as) had great influence and authority, and could with great propriety be still termed high-priest along with Caiphas. ANNUNCIATION, a festival on which Christian churches celebrate the conception, or incarnation of the Son of God in the womb of the Virgin Mary. It falls on the 25th of March. The angel Gabriel first announced the approach of this event to Zacharias, telling him that his son should be the fore-runner and prophet of the Messiah. Six months afterwards Gabriel was sent to Nazareth, to the Virgin Mary, of the tribe of Judah, and family of David, whom he saluted by saying, "Hail, thou highly-favored of the Lord; the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women!" Mary, being greatly perplexed by the salutation, the angel added, "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favor with God. Thou shalt conceive, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest," &c. Then said Mary to the angel, "How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?" The angel answered, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore, also, that Holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God. And behold thy cousin, Elisabeth, she also hath conceived in her old age; and this is the sixth month with her; for with God nothing shall be impossible." And Mary said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word," Luke i. 5, 26. The angel then departed; and by the operation of the Holy Ghost, Mary conceived the only Son of God, the Father, who had been four thousand years expected; and who was to be the happiness, the light, and the salvation of men.

In the Koran, (third Sura,) there is this remarkable passage: "Remember what is written of Mary—We sent to her our Spirit, in the human form; she was affrighted, and said, 'God will preserve me from you, unless you have his fear before your eyes.' But the angel answered, 'O Mary! I am the messenger of thy God, and of thy Lord, who will give thee a wise and active soul!' She replied, 'How shall I have a son, without the knowledge of man? 'He has said it'—answered the angel: 'the event shall be as I have announced to thee.' Then she became pregnant." The history of the announcement, as a part of the miraculous conception, having been impugned, this could not serve to the purpose of the idea that it was extended to other authorities, beside our present gospels. Mahomet certainly found it in some ancient writing, since he says, "Remember what is written," an appeal which he could hardly have adopted, had not the occurrence been the general belief, prior to his time; as its primary aspect is so favorable to Christianity. Mahomet doubtless borrowed this passage from the New Testament itself, like many other parts of the Koran. K.

1. 'This subject has been so often placed before our eyes, by representations (rather misrepresentations) of the pencil, that it becomes necessary to guard against false ideas received through this medium; to dismiss the cloud attending the angel—the flowers—the brilliancy—and all such artful and artificial, but unwarrantable, accessories; and to reduce the story to the simple narrative of Luke. From this it appears, that Mary was in a house—probably in private; (but this is not said, nor in what part of her house;) for the angel entered and advanced towards her. Nor did he appear in splendor, or in any extremely disturbing manner, so as to astonish Mary, but gave her time to consider, to reason with herself, respecting his saying: Or, what kind of revelation (not what kind of person) this could be—and to recover from her first surprise, at such a compliment paid her. He then proceeded to deliver his message; and she inquires of him; if, indeed, her exclamation, "How can that be?" be not rather the language of surprise. It does not appear that she knew him to be an angel; for then she would have acquiesced in his words without hesitation; but after he had, as a sign, given her information that her cousin Elizabeth was pregnant, he departed. He did not vanish; but went away from her. Mary went "in haste"—directly—to visit Elizabeth, (a considerable journey,) from whom she could acquire information to guide her conduct in this matter.—Had Elizabeth not been pregnant, then Mary might have thought the appearance delusive; but finding Elizabeth really pregnant, she could learn from her what kind of vision had appeared to Zacharias in the temple, whereby to identify the person seen by herself. She would thus receive abundant evidence in confirmation of her own experience, of her confidence in the divine interposition.

Thus simply considered, this narrative has much resemblance to that of the announcement of the birth of Samson, wherein the angel was repeatedly addressed as a mere man—a prophet; and was not discovered, till after his message had taken its effect. In like manner, an angel announced to Sarah the birth of Isaac; but was not known, at the time, to be an angel; Sarah hesitated, because of her great age; and the Virgin Mary hesitated, because of her (early) youth. Mary, being a person of a reflective turn of mind, could not but ponder, and consider very attentively the language and expression used in both instances, the similarity of appearances, and other circumstances.

It is worthy of remark, that as Mary was referred to Elizabeth, so Elisabeth was in some sense referred to Mary. How, if this were not the case, should Elizabeth know that Mary was the mother of her Lord—and what things were told Mary from the Lord—and how should she know that Mary had believed?—See Luke i. 42.

2. There is another announcement, which ought not to be overlooked here—that made in a dream to Joseph, (Matt. i. 20,) probably by the same celestial messenger who was sent to Mary, and certainly to the same import as the former announcement to Mary. Now, as Joseph appears to have been a thoughtful, well-informed, and considerate man, not a young man, and, above all, a just man, (i.e. very strict;) we may be assured that a man of his understanding, his experience in life, his reputation, (perhaps his family pride as descended from David,) and his moderate situation in the world, would not degrade and burden himself with a supposititious issue, unless he had been fully convinced that the case was miraculous.—Thus the mediocrity of Joseph's situation, in respect to property, becomes a reason of considerable weight—since he could so easily have relieved himself from the attendant expenses of a rising family, at his time of life, by fulfilling his first design of giving Mary away privily; which, in fact, unless under complete conviction, was his duty.

It should be remarked, that the angel, in speaking to Mary, uses language which may be taken in reference to a temporal Messiah—"He shall reign, &c." but to Joseph, he seems to be more explicit, and to speak of a spiritual Messiah—"...He shall save his people from their sins." He also refers Joseph to the prophecy respecting Emmanuel; and informs him, that this event was the completion of that prophecy: "This also all is come to pass, that it might be fulfilled." Of course both Joseph and Mary well knew the prophetic writings: Mary, as appears from the allusions to them in her song; and Joseph, to whom, otherwise, the appeal to Isaiah's prophecy had been useless. See Joseph, Mary, &c.

3. As the announcement of the birth of John the Baptist appears very much to illustrate and to confirm that respecting Jesus, it demands the consideration of some of its circumstances:

(1.) The age of Zacharias (probably above fifty) rendered it unlikely that he should be imposed upon; and equally unlikely that he should, through warmth of imagination, give belief to a visionary delusion; parcy was near the same age as her husband, which, for a woman in the East, is a much more advanced period of life than among us. Considering the early age at which the Jews married, this couple had probably lived together for thirty or forty years. (2.) The lot determined whose duty it was to burn incense. Zacharias, then, could little have expected this visit—at this time:—nothing could be more contingent, in respect to him. (4.) Being in the sanctuary, he there saw a person standing on the right side of the altar of incense—that being the most convenient situation to permit Zacharias to fulfil his office; and (as we understand it) so that the altar and the smoke of the incense was between them. (5.) The very sanctity of this place—no person was ever admitted here, but the priests who had duty in it; no ordinary Jew ever approached it; not even a priest had duty in it at this moment of solemn worship, except he who was engaged in that worship; and Zacharias not only must have personally known any intrusive priest, but it was his duty to punish his intrusion. The appearance of the angel, though we suppose it to be completely human, yet was certainly different from that of a priest, in dress, manners, &c. (6.) The angel's discourse to Zacha-
The unbelief of Zacharias: he urges not only his own age—in implying the extinction of corporal vigor in himself, but the same impotency with respect to his wife. (8.) The angel’s answer: “I am Gabriel, who stand before God.” (9.) The sign given to Zacharias, “thou shalt be dumb”—The effect of this on the people; and his telling them by action, and dumb show, that he had seen a vision. It should seem that he was deaf also, for he received information by signs, ver. 62. (10.) He remained in this state at the temple some days, till “the days of his ministration were accomplished,” so that all the priests in waiting might be informed of these circumstances: for though he could not speak, he could write the story. (11.) The conception of Elisabeth, which is, indeed, the main incident in this narrative. For suppose all the former to be void of truth—suppose that a man of Zacharias’s character and time of life, to make himself famous, (or rather infamous,) had forg’d all the former parts of the story—that his dumness was obstinate, and wilful, yet what effect could all this have had to recall the departed vigor of his person? That is not all—Will effect could his relation of these things to Elisabeth, by writing, as must be supposed, have had on a woman of her time of life? If imagination had for a while invigorated Zacharias, could it have had the effect of causing even himself, in the person of Elisabeth? A woman of fifty or more, (equal to a woman in England ten years older, at least,) and long barren, was surely past both fears and hopes of child-bear- ing: let this be duly weighed. (12.) Elisabeth hid herself full five months. This deserves notice; because her condition could not be known, much less could it be blazoned abroad. Now, in the sixth month, (i.e. while Elisabeth’s pregnancy was private,) Gabriel visits Mary at Nazareth, and tells her the secret respecting Elisabeth, as a sign that he was no impostor. Mary believed him; but Mary also took rational methods to justify that belief: she went directly to visit Elisabeth. On inquiry and inspection, she found what Gabriel had told her to be true; and from the accounts of Zacharias and Elisabeth, she acquired information which guided her conduct. Now, if it be made a question, whether Zacharias could not be deceived, either by others, or by himself, it is best answered, by asking—When did self-deception produce such effects? He could certainly judge of these. And in violence of passion to speak: by supposing it assumed, or fanc’d;—what influence could this have had in forwarding the birth of John? The general inference is clear:—if the birth of John, the forerunner of Jesus, was miraculous, its whole weight is in favor of the miraculous conception, and the annunciation, of Jesus. See John Har- tiss, &c.

ANOEING was a ceremony in frequent use among the Hebrews. They anointed and perfumed, from principles of health and cleanliness, as well as religion. They anointed the hair, head, and beard, Psalm xxxiii. 2. At their feasts and rejoicings they anointed the whole body; but sometimes only the head or the feet, John xii. 3; Luke vii. 37; Matt. vi. 17. The anointing of dead bodies was also practised, to preserve the same, by marking them, 1 Kings xvi. 31; Luke xxi. 51. They anointed kings and highpriests at their inauguration, (Exod. xxvii. 29; Lev. iv. 3; 1 Kings xiv. 16; 1 Kings xix. 15, 16.) also the sacred vessels of the tabernacle and temple, Exod. xxi. 30. Anointing, in general, was emblematical of a particular sanctification; a designation to the service of God, to a holy and sacred use. God prescribed to Moses the manner of the oil, on his perfumedointment, with which the priests and the vessels of the tabernacle were to be anointed, Ex. xxx. 30, seq. It was composed of the most exquisite perfumes and balsams, and was prohibited for all other uses. Es- kiel upbraids his people with having made a like perfume for their own use, chap. xxiii. 41.

The anointing of sacred persons and sacred ornaments, and utensils of the temple, tabernacle, altar, and basins, removed them from ordinary and common use; separated them to an appropriate dignity, and rendered them holy, sacred, and revered. The anointing received by Aaron and his sons, devoted on his whole race, which thereby became devoted to the service of the Lord, and consecrated to his worship, Lev. viii; Exod. xxi. 7; Psalm xxxix. 2. The rabbins think the holy oil was poured on the head of Aaron in the form of an X; according to others, in the form of a caph—נ. Many are of opinion, that of the ordinary priests the hands only were anointed. The Levites did not receive any unction. The ceremonies of anointing were continued for seven days; and the rabbins inform us, that while the ointment or perfume, that was composed by Moses, lasted, they thus anointed all the high-priests that succeeded, for seven days. But when this perfume was exhausted, they anointed themselves with installing the high-priest for seven days, in his sacred habit. The former, therefore, were called high-priests anointed, (Lev. iv. 3; v. 16.) the latter were said to be initiated in their habit, they say, that there was never made any new oil, after that of Moses was spent, which they think lasted to the captivity of Babylon. But the Christian fathers believe, that the unction of the high-priests continued to the coming of the true anointed, the Messiah, Jesus Christ. Besides, Moses nowhere forbids to renew, or compose again, this ointment. It even appears that he intended it should be repeated as occasion required, by setting down its composition so punctually.

The anointing of kings is not commanded by Moses; but we find it practised in sacred history. Samuel anointed Saul, (1 Sam. x. 1) which was renewed some time after at Gilgal, (1 Sam. xiii.) when Saul had delivered Jabesh-Gilead from the violence of Nahor, king of Gilead. Saul also received orders from the Lord to anoint young David, which he did; (1 Sam. xvi. 13) but as his title to the crown was much disputed by the house of Saul, the anointing was given him three times, reckoning the first. He was afterwards consecrated at Hebron, by the tribe of Judah, after the death of Saul, (2 Sam. ii. 4) and lastly, at Hebron, by all Israel, after death of Amnon, 2 Sam. v. When Absalom rose against his father, he caused himself to be anointed with the holy oil; and Solomon also anointed the high-priest Zadok, and the temple was anointed by Sam. xix. 10; 1 Kings i. 39.

But we do not find the prophesy of Nathan, (2 Sam.) which anointing the king the kings of Israel generally received an ordaining ceremony. The prophet Elijah, at the importing his father into the room, and to anoint Hazael, of Nimrod’s posterity, ruling over Syria: and also Jehu, son 13, 2 Kings, for his reigning over Israel, 1 Kings xiv. 30, did not execute this commission himself; but his disciple Eliah performed it on the person of Jehu, who is the only king of Israel whose anointing is expressly mentioned in Scripture. Among the kings of Judah, however, we find many instances, even down to the fall of the kingdom; especially when any difficulty occurred about the succession to the crown; as under Joash and Jeho-ahaz, sons of Josiah, 2 Kings xi. 12. After the return from the captivity, anointing was no longer professed on the kings; probably, if the Jews may be believed. Lastly, it is said or implied in Scripture, that the prophets were anointed; but we have no particulars of the manner. It is even doubted, whether they did receive any real unction. Elijah is sent to anoint Eliasih, (1 Kings xix. 19;) but as to the execution of this command, Elijah did nothing to Elisha but throw his cloak over his shoulders. It is therefore very probable that the word anointing, in this place, only imports a particular appointment, designation, or call, to the office of prophet.

The unction of Christ the Messiah, THE ANOINTED of the Lord, was represented by all these now mentioned. It was foretold in Psalm xliv. 7. "Thou dost right and judge, and hast not iniquity; therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness, above thy fellows." And in Isaiah lxi. 1. "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me," &c. And Dan. ix. 24. "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy." In the Christian dispensation we acknowledge the spiritual unction of Jesus Christ, the true anointed of the Father, (Luke vi. 17; Acts iv. 27; x. 38;) who hath anointed us by his grace, sealed us with his seal, and given us the pledge of the Holy Spirit, which dwells in our hearts, 2 Cor. i. 21. Our Lord was anointed personally; at least, some parts of his person; (see Martyr;) but especially at his baptism, when the Shekinah settled on him. Some ancient sects thought, that at this time the Christ, i.e. the anointing, was peculiarly communicated to him. Was not the sprinkling in his face by the soldiers a mock unction? as the crown of thorns, and the purple robe, were mock ensigns of royalty?

Mark (vi. 13,) informs us, that when the apostles were sent by Christ, to preach throughout Judea, they worked many miracles, anointed the sick, and healed them in the name of the Lord. James gives directions that the sick among them (vi. 14;) should send for the priests of the church, who should pray for them, and anoint them with oil in the name of the Lord. He says, that prayer, accompanied with faith, shall heal the sick; that the Lord will comfort him, and "shall baptize him in the Holy Ghost." On this it is that the church of Rome founds her extreme unction, acknowledges it as an institution of Jesus Christ, and receives it as one of her seven sacraments, to which the sanctifying grace is promised; forgetting that the apostle directs this anointing for the purpose of restoring the sick to health; i. e. for life; whereas the church of Rome employs it for the purpose of dismissing the expiring soul: i. e. for death.

The custom of anointing is common in the East, where it is used civily, as a part of personal elegance and dress; medically, as being beneficial in certain disorders, and even, as some say, preventing the plague. It is also used officially, as appears in the former parts of this article.

The custom of anointing with oil or perfume was also common among the Greeks and Romans; especially the anointing of guests at feasts and other entertainments. See Potter's Grec. Ant. ii. p. 365.
tion—are not torpid. We may appeal (as Scheuchzer does) to Aristotle, Pliny, Plutarch, Virgil, and Jerome; (Life of Malchus;) but we only quote Horace, who says,

Parvula nam exemplo est magni formice laborios:
Ore trahit quodque postes, aspera addit acrobo,
Quem struit, haud ignaro, sc ne nos incuta futuri.

Sat. 1.

"The ant, small as she is, sets us an example; she is very laborious, she carries in her little mouth whatever she can, and adds to it her constructed store heap, providing against a future period, with great precaution."

"After the example of the ant, some have learned to provide against cold and hunger," says Juvenal, Sat. 6. These testimonies may convince us that the ant in warmer climates provides against a day of want. As this insect is such a favorite with both naturalists and moralists, we shall quote Barbo's account of it, in his work on British insects, p. 277.

"The outward shape of this insect is singular and curious, when seen through the microscope. With good reason it is quoted as a pattern of industry. A nest of ants is a small, well regulated republic; their peace, unity, good understanding, and mutual assistance, deserve the notice of an observer. The males and females, provided with wings, enjoy all the pleasures of a wandering life; while the species of neutrums, without wings or sex, labor unremittingly. Follow with your eye a colony that begins to settle, which is always in a stiff soil, at the foot of a wall or tree, exposed to the sun; you will perceive one, and sometimes several cavities, in the form of an arched vault, which lead into a cave contrived by their removing the mould with their jaws. Their great policy in their little labors prevents disorder and confusion; each has its task; whilst one casts out the particle of mould that it has loosened, another is returning home to work. All of them employed in forming themselves a retreat of the depth of one foot, or more, they think not of eating, till they have nothing further left to do. Within this hollow den, supported by the roots of trees and plants, the ants come together, live in society, shelter themselves from summer and winter, and take care of the eggs which they have in their trust. The wood-ants are larger than the garden-ones, and also more formidable. Armed with a small sting, concealed in the hinder part of their abdomen, they wound whomsoever happens to meet them; a lingering painful itching. They are carnivorous; for they dissect, with the utmost neatness and delicacy, frogs, lizards, and birds, that are delivered over to them. The preservation of the species is in all animals beings the most important care. Behold, with what concern and caution the ants at the beginning of the spring load themselves between their two jaws with the new-hatched larvae, in order to expose them to the early rays of the benificent sun! The milder weather being come, the ants now take the field. Fresh cars, new labors, great bustling, and laying up of provisions. Corn, fruits, dead insects, carrion, all is lawful prize. An ant meeting another, accosts it with a salutary word of notice. The ant overloaded with booty, is helped by her fellow-ant. One chance to make a discovery of a valuable capture, she gives information of it to another, and in a short time a legion of ants come and take possession of the new conquests. No general engagement with the inhabitants of the neighboring nest, only sometimes a few private skirmishes, determined by the determination of the weather. All those stores, collected with so much eagerness during the day, are immediately consumed. The subterraneous receptacle is the hall, where the feast is kept; every one repairs thither to take his repast; all is in common throughout the little republic, and at its expense are the larvae fed. Too weak and helpless to go a foraging, it is chiefly in their behalf the rest go to and fro, bring home, and lay up. They shortly turn to chrysalises, in which state they take no food, but give occasion to new cares and solicitudes. All human precautions have not hitherto been able to supply that degree of warmth and minute attention, which the ants put in practice to forward the instant of their last metamorphoses. The insect issuing forth to a new life, bears its white transparent veil; it is then a real ant, destitute of wings, if it has no sex; winged, if it be male or female, always to be known by a small erect scale placed on the thread, which connects the body and thorax. The males, who are much smaller, seldom frequent the common habitations; but the females, much larger, repair to it to deposit their eggs, which is all the labor they undergo. The winter's cold destroys them. The fate which attends the males is not well ascertained; do they become the victims of the severity of winter? or are they made over to the rage of the neighboring ants? These latter pass the winter in a torpid state, as some other insects do, till spring restores them to their wonted activity: they have, therefore, no stores for winter, no consumption of provisions. What are commonly sold in markets for ants' eggs, are grubs newly hatched, of which pheasants, nightingales, and partridges, are very fond. In Switzerland, they are made subservient to the destruction of caterpillars; which is done by hanging a pouch filled with ants upon a tree; and they, making their escape through an aperture contrived on purpose, run over the tree, without being able to reach down to the ground, because care has been previously taken to besmear the foot of the tree with wet clay or soft pitch; in consequence of which, compelled by hunger, they fall upon the caterpillars and devour them."

Forskal, speaking of the red ant, says, "It is less than the former, it inhabits wood, and is in reputation among the husbandmen for the useful hatred with which it pursues the dharr, which greatly infects the date trees."

ANTARADA, a city of Syria, or Phoenicia, on the continent, opposite to, and east of, the island Arada, and of the city Arada, in that island. Scripture does not speak expressly of the city Antarada; but in several places, it mentions Arada, or Arva, or the Arvdites, who are reckoned among the Canaanites, whose country God gave to the Hebrews, Gen. x. 18; I Chron. i. 16. Antarada is at present called Tortosa, and is still considerable, chiefly on account of its fine harbor. See Ararad.

ANTELOPE. This animal is not mentioned in the English Bible, but there is little doubt among the best interpreters that the "šebh, which our translators have taken for the roe, is really the gazelle or antelope. The roe is extremely rare in Palestine and the adjoining countries, but the antelope is very common in every part of the Levant; and when it is recollected that the šebh was allowed to the Hebrews as an article of food, and it is found that the antelope answers in character to it, we shall have little diffi-

ANTHEDON, a city of Palestine, lying on the Mediterranean, about twenty furlongs south of Gaza. Herod the Great called it Agrippias, in honor of Agrippa. See Agrippias, and the Map of Canaan.

ANTICHRIST, the name of that Man of Sin who is expected to precede the second coming of our Saviour; and who is represented in Scripture, and in the Fathers, as the epitome of every thing impious, cruel, and abominable. To him is referred what the prophets have said of Antiochus Epiphanes, of Gog and Magog, of the son of perdition, and of the man of sin, mentioned by Paul, which many have applied historically to Nero. For it may be said, that Nebuchadnezzar, Cambyses, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Nero, were so many antichrists, or forerunners of antichrist. John informs us, that in his time there were many antichrists; meaning heretics and persecutors, 1 John ii. 18. But antichrist, the true, real antichrist, who is to come before the universal judgment, will in himself include all the marks of wickedness, which have been separately extant in different persons, his types, or forerunners. Paul speaks of these same things, the common antichrist. It is about 24 feet in height, of a reddish brown color, with the belly and feet white, has long naked ears, and a short, erect tail. The horns are black, about 12 inches long, and bent like a lyre. It inhabits the country west of the Mississippi. Antelopes chiefly inhabit hilly countries, though some reside in the plains; and some species form herds of two or three thousand, while others keep in small troops of five or six. These animals are elegantly formed, active, restless, timid, shy, and astonishingly swift, running with vast bounds, and springing or leaping with surprising elasticity; they frequently stop for a moment in the midst of their course to gaze at their pursuers, and then resume their flight.

The chase of these animals is a favorite diversion among the eastern nations; and the accounts that are given of it, supply ample proofs of the swiftness of the antelope tribe. The greyhound, the fleetest of dogs, is usually outrun by them; and the sam-for two and forty months: the beast overcame, and was worshipped for two and forty months." In another place he says, "that the beast should oblige all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hands, or in their foreheads; so that no one might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Here is wisdom; let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred thirty score and six." Some believe this number 666, to be that of the letters in the name of antichrist, according to their numerical valuation,—for the letters of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin alphabets have their numerical values.

It has greatly perplexed the curious, to know whether the name of the beast, which John speaks of, should be written in Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, or Latin; whether this name be that of his person, or of his dignity, or that which his followers should give him; or that which he will deserve by his crimes. There are many conjectures on this matter; and almost all commentators have tried their skill, without being able to say, positively, that any one has succeeded, in ascertaining the true mark of the beast, or the number of his name.

The number 666 has been discovered in the names—Ulpian Trajanus (a), Dioclesian (b), Julian the Apostate (c), Luther (d), Evangelus (e), Latimus (f), Tattu (g), Lampethis (h), Niketas (i), Makos Hodeges (k) that is, bad guide; Arnouma (l) I renounce; Romzi (m) Romans; Abanu Kadescha Papa (n) our holy father the pope; and, Elios Adonis Jehovah Kadoch (o) the Most High, the Lord, the Holy God.

This last name could have been invented and calculated, only to show the vanity of all the pains taken in this inquiry; since the number 666 is found in names that had the mark, the most opposite to antichrist. The wisest and the safest way is, to be silent.

We may say the same of the time when antichrist is expected to appear. We know, certainly, that he will come before the consummation of ages, before the second coming of Jesus Christ. But those who have attempted to determine the time of his appearance, have only discovered their ignorance and rashness. Ever since Paul's days, impostors have terrified believers, by affirming, that the day of the Lord was at hand. He writes to the Thesalonians, (2 Epist. ii. 1, 2) "We beseech you, brethren, be not soon shaken in mind, as if the day of Christ were at hand; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition." John says, (1 Epist. iv. 3) "Every spirit that confesseth not that Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God; this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof you have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world." The heretics of that period were true signs of antichrist; but these cautions show the expectations of the Christians of that time. The same opinions and dispositions are observable in the generality of the early fathers. The churches of Vienne, and Lyons, in Gaul, seeing the violence of the persecution under Marcus Aurelius, believed that they then beheld the persecution of antichrist.

An old ecclesiastical author, called Judas, who lived under Severus, asserted, that antichrist would very soon appear, because of the persecution then raging against the church. Judas Syrus, Tertullian, and Cyprian, who flourished soon after, did not doubt but that the coming of antichrist was very near. Hilary, observing the progress of Ariusism, believed he saw those signs which were the forerunners of antichrist; and Basil, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Gregory the Great, were of opinion, that the end of the world was at hand, and the coming of antichrist not distant. After the tenth century, which concluded the sixth millenary, according to that opinion which reckoned the birth of Jesus Christ to have happened about A. M. 5000, people began to get the better of this apprehension of the end of the world, which, according to a tradition of the ancients, was to take place after a duration of 6000 years. They began to build larger churches and edifices. Jerome's translation of the Scriptures, which stated the world to have existed not above 4000 years before Christ, contributed likewise to the persuasion, that the final period of the world, and the coming of antichrist, were not extremely near; but however, did not hinder some from attempting to fix the time of antichrist's appearance. The council of Florence (A. D. 1105) condemned Flavius, bishop of that city, for maintaining that antichrist was then born. Abbot Joachim, who lived in the twelfth century, prophesied of antichrist was to appear in the sixth year of his time, Arnaud de Villeneuve said, antichrist would come A. D. 1326; Francis Melsc said, in A. D. 1530, or 1540; John of Paris, A. D. 1560; Cardinal de Cussa, A. D. 1730, or 1734; Peter Duill was of opinion, that, according to his calculations, he must appear in A. D. 1789; Jerome Cardan, in A. D. 1800; John Pico, of Mirandola, in A. D. 1994. Events have already confuted the generality of these predictions; and we may affirm, without rashness, that the rest are not superior in certainty. A tradition seems to have been received among the ancients, that antichrist should be born of some Jewish family, and of the tribe of Dan. The most ancient commentators on the Revelation were of opinion, that John's omission of the name of Dan, in his enumeration of the tribes of Israel, (Rev. vii. 5) proceeded from his foreknowledge, that antichrist should arise from this tribe. And how should he arise from this tribe, since the Jews dwell no longer in Judea, or, at least, are no longer masters of that country? Why, he will come, say those fathers, from the other side of the Euphrates, from Babylonia, where some suppose that the remainder of the ten tribes (and in particular of the tribe of Dan) subsists still. This opinion is followed by almost all who have written since Jerome, in whose time it was common. As to the parents of antichrist, interpreters are not agreed. Some think his father will be a devil, and his mother some corrupt woman; others think, that antichrist will be himself, David incarnate. Hilary thought that Satan would appear in the person of antichrist, and endeavor to persuade the world that he is God, by working false miracles. As our Lord was born of a virgin, says Hippolytus, so will antichrist boast of having derived his birth from a virgin also; but, whereas the Son of God took upon him real flesh, antichrist, says that author, will assume only the appearance, the image, or phantom of flesh. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact and others, hold that antichrist will be a real man, though an agent of Satan, in exercising his cruelty and malice against the faithful.

It remains to state some ideas as to the dominion of antichrist. It has been supposed by some writers, that he will be born in Babylonia, that he will there lay the foundation of his empire—that the Jews will be the first to declare for him, to acknowledge his dominion, and to enjoy the principal employments in his government. He will win them by his delusion, his false miracles, and by all the appearances of goodness, piety and clemency; so that this unhappy people will take him for their Messiah; and will flatter themselves with the expectation of seeing the kingdom of Israel restored, and the means of its triumph which once meant to its ruler splendor. After he has subdued Egypt, Ethiopia, and Libya, say the same authors, he will march against Jerusalem, which he will easily conquer,—and there establish the seat of his empire. Gog and Magog will then oppose him; he will give them battle, and defeat them without difficulty, in the midst of Palestine; see Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. After this, he will direct all his endeavors to the destruction of Christ's kingdom, and the persecution of Christians: he will exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, shall sit in the temple of God; (2 Thess. ii. 4) in the temple of Jerusalem; which he will rebuild. Some of the ancients believed, that he will be seated in the churches of Christians, (the temples of God,) and then receive the adoration of great numbers of apostates, who will renounce the faith of Christ. Scripture does not mention the duration of antichrist’s kingdom: but in several places, it seems to allow three years and a half, for the continuance of his persecutions: at least it assigns three years and a half, for the persecutions of those who are considered as figures of antichrist. Mussulmans, as well as Jews and Christians, expect another Christ. They call him Daggel, or Deg- giel, from a name which signifies an impostor, or a liar; and they hold that their prophet Mahomet taught one of his disciples, whose name was Tamini- Al-Dari, every thing relating to antichrist; and, on his authority, they tell us, that antichrist must come at the end of the world; that he will make his entry into Jerusalem, like Jesus Christ, riding on an ass; but that Christ, who is not dead, will come at his second advent to encounter him: and that, after having conquered him, he will then die indeed. That the beast, described by John in the Revelation, will appear with antichrist, and make war against the saints. That Imam Mahadi, who remains concealed among the Mussulmans, will then show himself, join Jesus Christ, and with him engage Daggel; after which they will unite the Christians and the Mussulmans, and of the two religions will make but one. D’Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.

This subject is confessedly obscure: there are some persons in the present day, who, observing late surprising and interesting events, have thought they pointed strongly to the near approach of antichrist: time, however, must ascertain whether their calculations, observations, and determinations are coincident with those appointed by Providence; or whether they are no better founded than those propositions which events have already confuted.

Many Protestant writers have held, that the head of the Romish church, and his power, is the “man of sin” or antichrist of the apostle; an opinion which Calmet, of course, could not entertain. Indeed, why should we attempt a descriptive delineation of a person, whose portrait might, after a little patient waiting, be drawn from the life? especially when so many others have failed in ascertaining him, as appears in this article. The apostle John asserts (1 Epist. ii. 18,) that in his time there were “many antichrists;” and it is probable that, did we accurately know the number of pretenders to a divine mission, in his days, (meaning before the destruction of Jerusalem,) we should see the propriety of his observation in the strongest light. Not only Judas Gonautites, Theudas, and others mentioned in Scripture, as making such pretences, were antichrists, but even the disciples of John the Baptist, who formed a numerous sect, not extirpated entirely this day. As the term occurs only in the writings of John, it is desirable to deduce our explanation of it from his authority. He uses it both collectively and individually: whence it should appear to be a power, or an operative principle, actuating many persons, rather than a single person so characterized and so denominated.

I. ANTIGONUS, son of John Hircanus, and grandson of Simon Maccabaeus. His brother, Aristobulus, made him his associate in the kingdom; but was at a blow put to death by the common enemies to put him to death, B. C. 105. — Jos. Ant. xiii. 18 and 19.

II. ANTIGNONUS, son of Aristobulus, who was brother to Hircanus and Alexander, was sent as a messenger to Rome, with other presents, by Pompey, who had taken Jerusalem. After remaining in Italy for some time, he returned to Judea, and after a variety of fortunes, was established king and high-priest, Herod being compelled to fly to Rome. Having obtained assistance from Antony and Cesar, Herod returned, and, after a firm and protracted resistance on the part of Antigonus, retook Jerusalem, and repossessed himself of the throne. Antigonus was carried to Antioc, and, at the solicitation of Herod, was there put to death by Antony, B. C. 37. — Jos. Ant. xiv. c. 11 and the following.

ANTI-LIBANUS, see LEBANON.

I. ANTIQU, of Syria, on the Orontes, was formerly called Riblah, according to Jerome. (On Ezek. xlvii; Isa. xiii. 1.) It is mentioned only in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament; but Riblah, or Riblith, is named Numbers xivii. 11; 2 Kings xxiii. 33; xxxv. 6, 30, 21; Jer. xxxix. 5; lxi. 9, 10, 26, 27. This, however, could not have been the same as Antioch. (See Riblah.) Theodoret says, that in his time there was a city of Riblah, near Emesa, in Antioch's province. However that might be, it is certain that Antioch was not known under this name, till after the reign of Seleucus Nicanor, who built it, and called it Antioch, in consideration of his father Antiochus, surn. A. D. 301. Being centrally situated, it became the seat of empire of the Syrian kings of the Macedonian race, and afterwards of the Roman governors of the eastern provinces. There also the disciples of Jesus Christ were first called Christians, and making it a principal station, from hence sent missionaries out in various directions, Acts xi. 26. Strabo describes Antioch as being in power and dignity not much inferior to Seleucia or Alexandria. Ammianus Marcellinus says it was celebrated throughout the world; and Josephus characterizes it as the third city of the Roman provinces. It was long, indeed, the most powerful city of the East, and was famous among the Jews for the Jus Civitas, or right of citizenship, which Seleucus had given to them in common with the Greeks and Macedonians, and which Josephus informs us they retained. These privileges, no doubt, contributed to render Antioch so desirable to the Christians, who were everywhere considered as a sect of Jews, since here they could perform their worship in their own ways, without molestation or interruption. This may also contribute to account for the importance attached by the apostles to the introduction of the gospel into Antioch; and for the interest taken by them in its promotion and extension, in a city so distant from Jerusalem.

Antioch was almost square, had many gates, was adorned with fine fountains, and possessed great fertility of soil and commercial opulence. The emperor Vespasian, Titus, and others, granted considerable privileges to Antioch; but it has also been exposed to great calamities and revolutions. In the years A. D. 340, 342, 396, 458, 526, and 532, it was almost demolished by earthquakes. The emperor Justinian repaired it, A. D. 532, and called it Theopolis; that is, "The City of God." Cosroes, king of Persia, took it, A. D. 540, massacred the inhabitants, and burnt it. Justinian ordered it to be rebuilt, A. D. 532; Cosroes took it a second time, A. D. 574, in the reign of Justin, and destroyed its walls. A. D. 602, Cosroes suffered a dreadful earthquake, in which above 60,000 persons perished. It was again rebuilt, and again was exposed to new calamities. The Saracens took it, A. D. 638, in the reign of Heraclius: Nicolephus Phocas retook it, A. D. 650. Codrus reports that, A. D. 970, an army of 100,000 Sarrevans besieged it, without success; but they afterwards subdued it, added new fortifications to it, and made it almost impregnable. Godfrey of Bouillon, when engaged in the conquest of the Holy Land, besieged it, A. D. 1097. The siege was long and bloody; but at length the Christians, by their zeal and by treachery, obtained possession, on Thursday, June 3, A. D. 1098. In 1808, it was taken by the sultan of Egypt, who demolished it, destroyed its renown and magnificence, and placed it under the dominion of the Turk.

Antioch abounded with great men, and its church was long governed by illustrious prelates. It suffered much, however, on several occasions, sometimes being exposed to pillage, and other times being rent by deplorable schisms. The bishop of Antioch has the title of Patriarch; and has constantly had a great share in the affairs of the Eastern church.

Antioch is now called Antakia, and, till the year 1892, it occupied a remote corner of the ancient enclosure of its walls; its splendid buildings being reduced to hovels, and its population living in Turkish hovels. At that period it was revisited by its ancient inhabitants, and converted by an earthquake into a heap of ruins. It contains now about 10,000 inhabitants.

From the medals of this city which are extant, it appears that it was honored as a Roman colony, a metropolis, and an asylum. It was also Autonomus, or governed by its own laws. Among these medals, there are two which require notice. The first reads 'Antiochion tois prós dévphs', which affords proof that Antioch valued itself on its relation to the temple and worship established in that place. Daphne was, indeed, a league from the city, but by the zeal of the devotees, was considered as a suburb, or rather as a part of the city itself. But by far the most interesting medal to us as Christians, is one on which is read, "Of the Antiochians under Saturninus," who was governor of Syria at the time of our Saviour's birth. See Cæcilius.

II. ANTIOCHUS, of Pisidia, a city belonging to the province of Pisidia in Asia Minor, but situated within the limits of Phrygia. It was also built by Seleucus Nicanor. Paul and Barnabas preached here; but the Jews, angry to see that some of the Gentiles received the gospel, raised a tumult, and obliged the apostles to leave the city, Acts xiii. 14. It is at present called Varasteiligl, according to some; but as others say, Taboya, or Sibi, or Antiochich.

ANTIOCHICUS, consoconice of Antiochus Epiphanes, who gave her the cities of Taras and Mallo, that she might receive their revenues for her own use. This was regarded by their inhabitants as an insupportable mark of contempt: they took arms against Antiochus, who marched in person to reduce them, 2 Macc. iv. 30. It was a custom with the kings of Persia, to give their wives particular cities; some for their table, some for their head-dress, for their attire, for their girdles, &c. The idea was analogous to our pin-money. Cicero in Verrem, v.

I. ANTIOCHUS, the first Antiochus, was one of many kings of this name in Syria, after Seleucus Nicanor, (the second king of Syria, Alexander the Great being the first,) who was father of Antiochus Soter, so named for having hindered the invasion of Asia by the Gauls.

II. ANTIOCHUS THEOBS, (the divine,) son and successor of Antiochus Soter, was poisoned by his wife Laodice, and succeeded by his son Seleucus Callinicus.

III. ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, so celebrated on account of his wars against the Egyptians, Romans, and Jews, was the son of Seleucus Callinicus, and brother of Seleucus Ceraunus, whom he succeeded, ante A. D. 223. Having resolved to become master of Egypt, Antiochus seized Cœle-Syria, the province lying between Libanus and Antilibanus; Phœnicia, and Judea. The Jews having submitted, and received him into their cities, he granted them, as a reward, 20,000 pieces of silver, to purchase beasts for sacrifice, 100 measures of meal, 375 measures of salt, to be offered with the sacrifices, and timber to rebuild the porches of the temple. The... senators, priests, scribes, and singers of the temple, he exempted from the capitation tax, and permitted the Jews to live according to their own laws, throughout his dominions. He remitted the third part of their tribute, to indemnify them for their losses in the war, and benefitted the heathen from the temple without being purified, and from bringing into the city the flesh of mules, asses, and horses to sell, under the penalty of 3000 drachmas. Antiochus married his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, (B.C. 195) and gave Calo-Syria, Phoenicia, and Judea, as her dowry, on condition that the tribute of these provinces should be equally divided between himself and the king of Egypt. Three years afterwards he was overcome by the Romans, and obliged to cede all his possessions beyond mount Taurus, and to give twenty hostages, (among whom was his own son, Antiochus, afterwards surnamed Epiphanes,) and to pay a tribute of 12,000 Euboic talents, each fourteen Roman pounds in weight. To defray these charges, he resolved to seize the treasures of the temple of Belus, at Elymas, which were very great; but the people of that country, informed of his design, surprised and destroyed him, with all his army, ante A.D. 157. He left two sons, Seleucus Philopator, and Antiochus Epiphanes, who succeeded him. Josephus Ant. xii. 3.

IV. ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, son of Antiochus the Great, of the former article. Having continued as a hostage at Rome fourteen years, his brother Seleucus resolved to procure his return to Syria, and therefore sent his own son, Demetrius, as a hostage to Rome, instead of Antiochus; but while Antiochus was on his journey to Syria, Seleucus died; (ante A.D. 175;) so that when he landed, the people received him as some propitious deity, come to assume the government, and to oppose the enterprises of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who threatened to invade Syria. It was upon this occasion that he received the surname of Epiphanes, (the illustrious,) that is, of one appearing as it were like a god.

Antiochus soon directed his attention to Egypt, which he invaded, and reduced almost entirely to obedience, 2 Macc. iv. 5. ante A.D. 173. During his siege of Alexandria, an occurrence took place which effectually exemplified itself so fully in the person of Antiochus Epiphanes. While besieging this city, a report was spread of his death, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, among others, who groaned under his yoke, sent messengers of joy, under the receipt of the intelligence. The consequence of this was, that Antiochus, when returning from Egypt, entered the city forcibly, treated the Jews as rebels, and commanded his troops to slay all they met: 80,000 were killed in three days’ time; 40,000 were made captives; and as many sold, 2 Macc. v. 14. He entered into the holy of holies, being conducted by the corrupt high-priest, Menelaus, from whence he took and carried off the most precious vessels, to the value of 1300 talents and for this he was accused, A C. 171. Antiochus again entered Egypt, which he completely subdued, and in the year following he sent Apollonius into Judæa (2 Macc. xxiv. 25,) with an army of 25,000 men, with orders to destroy all who were of full age, and to sell the women and young men. Apollonius executed his commission but too punctually. It was at this time that Judas Maccabeus retired into the wilderness, with his father and his brethren, 2 Macc. v. 38. These calamities, however, were but preludes of what they were to suffer; for Antiochus, apprehending that the Jews would never be constant in obedience to him, unless he obliged them to change their religion, and to embrace that of the Greeks, issued an edict, enjoining them to conform to the laws of other nations, and forbidding their usual sacrifices in the temple, their festival, and their sabbath. The statue of Jupiter Olympus was placed on the altar of the temple, and the abomination of desolation polluted the house of God. Many corrupt Jews complied with these orders, but others opposed them: Mattathias and his sons retired to the mountains; and old Eleazar, and the seven brethren, Maccabees, suffered death, with great courage, at Antioch, 2 Macc. vii. After the death of Mattathias, Judas Maccabeus put himself at the head of those Jews who continued faithful; and opposed with success the generals who were sent against him. Finding his treasures exhausted, Antiochus went into Persia to levy tributes, and to gather large sums, which he had agreed to pay to the Romans. Knowing there were very great riches in the temple of Elymas, he determined to carry them off; but the inhabitants of the country made so vigorous a resistance, that he was compelled to retreat towards Babylonia. When he arrived at Ecabanae, he received news of the defilement of the temple, and of the attacks of Judas Maccabeus, and that Judas Maccabeus had retaken the temple of Jerusalem, and restored the worship of the Lord. On receiving this intelligence, transported with indignation, he commanded the driver of his chariot to urge the horses forward, threatening to make Jerusalem a grave for the Jews. He fell from his chariot, however, and died, overwhelmed with pain and grief, in the mountains of Parateneo, in the little town of Tabes, A.M. 3840, ante A.D. 164.

V. ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was but nine years old when his father died, and left him the kingdom of Syria. Lysias, who governed in the name of the young prince, led against Judea an army of 100,000 foot, 30,000 horse, and thirty elephants, 1 Macc. i. 25. He besieged and took the fortress of Bethura; from thence he marched against Jerusalem, and, notwithstanding the valor and resistance of the Maccabees, the city was ready to fall into his hands, when Lysias received a message that Philip, the king of Epiphanes, a little before his death, intrusted with the regency of the kingdom, during the minority of his son) was arrived at Antioch to take the government, according to the disposition of the late king. Lysias promised him every thing that he might return speedily to Antioch, and oppose Philip; and having thus made peace, he immediately led the young king and his army into Syria. In the mean time Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom, by right, the kingdom belonged, (for Antiochus Epiphanes procured it by usurpation from his nephew,) having escaped from Rome, where he had been a hostage, came into Syria; and finding the people disposed for revolt, he headed an army, and marched immediately to Antioch, against Antiochus and Lysias. The inhabitants did not wait till he besieged it, but opened the gates, and delivered him Lysias, and the young king, Antiochus Epipator, who were put to death by his orders, without being suffered to appear before him. A.M. 3842, ante A.D. 162.

VI. ANTIOCHUS TARES, or the Divine, son of Alexander Balas, was placed on the throne of Syria by Diodotus, or Tryphon, who had deposed Demetrius Nicanor, and compelled him to retire to Seleu-
To strengthen himself in his new dominions, Antiochus secured the friendship and assistance of Jonathan Maccabaeus, whom he confirmed in the high-priesthood, and of Simon Maccabaeus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, and the former's son-in-law, in the castle of Duma, near Jericho, the murderer sent immediately to Antiochus Sidetes to demand troops, that he might recover for him the country and cities of the Jews. Antiochus came in person with an army, and besieged Jerusalem: John Hircanus, however, defended it with vigor, and the siege was long protracted. The king divided his army into seven parts, guarding all the avenues to the city. It was the proper time for celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles, the Jews desired of Antiochus a truce of seven days, which was granted; and sent them bulls with gilded horns, and vessels of gold and silver, filled with incense, to be offered in the temple: he also ordered such provisions to be given to the Jewish soldiers as they wanted. This courtesy of the king won the hearts of the Jews, that they sent ambassadors to treat of peace, and to desire that they might live according to their own laws. The king required of them to surrender their arms, to demolish the city walls, to pay tribute for Joppa, and the other cities they possessed out of Judaea, and to receive a garrison into Jerusalem. They consented to these conditions, the last excepted; for they could not submit to see an army of strangers in their capital; they rather chose to give hostages, and 500 talents of silver. The king therefore entered the city, beat down the breast-work above the walls, and returned to Syria, A. M. 3870, cxxxiv. A.D. 143. Three years afterwards, Antiochus marched against the Parthians, demanding the liberty of his brother, Demetrius Nicanor, who had been made prisoner by Arses; but, being deserted by his own forces, he was killed, A. M. 3874, A. C. 130. Demetrius Nicanor, however, re-ascended the throne, after the death of Sidetes.

VIII. ANTIOCBUS GYPYUS, or PHILOMANTUS, son of Demetrius Nicanor, ascended the throne of Syria, A. M. 3881. He reigned eleven years alone, and fifteen with his brother Cyzicus, and died A. M. 3907.

IX. ANTIOCBUS CYZICUS, having obtained from his brother Gygusus, as his share of the kingdom, Celo-Syria, became extremely luxurious, and abandoned himself to the most immoral vices; he increased his power, and extended his dominions, more, as separation for injuries the king had suffered, and as tribute for his own cities; threatening war against him if he did not comply. Simon showed Athenobius all the lustre of his wealth and power, told him he had no place in his possession which belonged to Antiochus, and, as to Gazara and Joppa, which cities had done infinite damage to his people, he would give the king one hundred talents for the property of them. Athenobius returned with great indignation to Antiochus, who was extremely offended at Simon's answer. In the mean time, Tryphon, having stolen privately from Dora, embarked in a vessel and fled. Antiochus pursued him, and sent Cendebeus with troops into the maritime parts of Palestine, with orders to build Cedron, and to fight the Jews. John Hircanus, son of Simon Maccabaeus, being then at Gazara, gave notice to his father of Cendebeus's coming. Simon furnished troops to his sons, John Hircanus and Judas, and sent them against Cendebeus, whom they routed in the plain, and pursued to Azotus. Antiochus followed Tryphon, till he forced him to kill himself, after five or six years reign. Antiochus now thought of nothing but reducing those cities which, in the beginning of his brother's reign, had thrown off their submission, and districts in Judea. The career of young Antiochus, however, was but short, for Tryphon, to whose person he owed the crown, resolved to take it for himself: he made Jonathan Maccabaeus a prisoner at Ptolemais, and put him to death at Baconarna, after which he returned into Syria, and procured the death of Antiochus. Thus Tryphon was left master of Syria. A. M. 3863, cxxxiv. A.D. 143. 1 Macc. xiii: 2 Macc. xiv.

VII. ANTIOCBUS SIDETES, or SETZAI, (the saviour), or ESUEBAS, (the plouts), was son of Demetrius Soter, and brother of Demetrius Nicanor. Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, they deserted him, and offered their services to Cleopatra, with of Demetrius Nicanor, who lived in the city of Seleucia, shut up with her children, while her husband, Demetrius, was a prisoner in Persia, where he had married Rodegusa, daughter of Arses, king of Persia. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 12.) Cleopatra, Cleopatra, sister of Simon Maccabaeus, was Tryphon's sister-in-law, and offered him the crown of Syria, if he would marry her, to which Antiochus consented. He was then at Cadeza, where his father, Demetrius Soter, had placed him with one of his friends: he came into Syria, and wrote to Simon Maccabaeus, to engage him against Tryphon, 1 Macc. xv. He confirmed the privileges which the kings of Syria had granted to Simon, permitted him to coin money with his own stamp, declared Jerusalem and the temple exempt from royal jurisdiction, and promised other favors, as soon as he should become peaceable possessor of the kingdom which had belonged to his ancestors.

Antiochus Sidetes, being come into Syria, married his sister-in-law, Cleopatra, A. M. 3885. Tryphon's troops resorted to him in crowds, and Tryphon, thus abandoned, retired to Dora, in Phcenicia, whither Antiochus pursued him with an army of 120,000 foot, and 8000 horse, and with a powerful fleet. Simon Maccabaeus sent him, 20,000 chosen men, but Antiochus refused them, and revoked all his promises. He sent Athenobius to Jerusalem, to oblige Simon to restore Gazara and Joppa, with the citadel of Jeruselum, and to demand 500 talents, as tribute for the plebeian exemption from royal jurisdiction, and promised other favors, as soon as he should become peaceable possessor of the kingdom which had belonged to his ancestors. Athenobius returned with great indignation to Antiochus, who was extremely offended at Simon's answer. In the mean time, Tryphon, having stolen privately from Dora, embarked in a vessel and fled. Antiochus pursued him, and sent Cendebeus with troops into the maritime parts of Palestine, with orders to build Cedron, and to fight the Jews. John Hircanus, son of Simon Maccabaeus, being then at Gazara, gave notice to his father of Cendebeus's coming. Simon furnished troops to his sons, John Hircanus and Judas, and sent them against Cendebeus, whom they routed in the plain, and pursued to Azotus.
sor in the kingdom; but he afterwards substituted Archelaus, king of Judea, giving to Antipas only the title of tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. Archelaus going to Rome, to petition Augustus to confirm his father's will, Antipas went also, and the emperor gave Archelaus one moiety of what had been assigned to him by Herod's will, with the title of ethnarch, and promised to grant him the title of king, when he had shown himself deserving of it, by his virtuous conduct. His revenues amounted to 600 talents. To Antipas Augustus gave Galilee and Perea, which produced 200 talents; and to Philip, Herod's other son, the Batanes, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and some other places, whose income was 100 talents. (Jos. Ant. xvii. 13.) Antipas, having returned to Judea, took great pains in adorning and fortifying the principal places of his dominions; he gave the name of Julius to Bethsaida, in honor of Julia, wife of Augustus; and Cinereth he called Tiberias, in honor of Tiberius, afterwards emperor. He married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, whom he divorced, about A. D. 38, to marry his sister-in-law, Herodias, who was his own niece and wife of Philip, his brother, who was still living. (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2.) (See Herod II.) John the Baptist, exclaiming against this incest, was seized by order of Antipas, and imprisoned in the castle of Machærus, Matt. xiv. 3, 4; Mark vi. 14, 17, 18; Luke iii. 19, 20. Even Herod feared and respected the virtue and holiness of John, and did many things out of regard to him; but his passion for Herodias had, no doubt, much sooner prevailed against his life, had he not been restrained by his fears of the people, who universally esteemed John the Baptist as a prophet, Matt. xiv. 5, 6, 8. At a time, however, when the king was celebrating his birth-day, with the principal persons of his court, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and so much pleased him, that he swore to give her whatever she should ask. Her mother, Herodias, who was anxious to get rid of the Baptist, advised him to ask for his head. The king was vexed at the request; but, in consideration of his oath, and of the persons at table with him, he sent one of his guards, who beheaded John in prison. The head was brought in a basin, and given to Herod's favorite, who carried it directly to her mother. The king of Arabia, to revenge the insult which Herod had offered to his daughter, declared war against him; and vanquished him in a very obstinate fight. Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 7) assures us, that the Jews considered the defeat of Antipas as a punishment for the murder of John the Baptist. (A. D. 38.) Herodias, being jealous of her brother Agrippa's prosperity, (who, from a private person, had become king of Judea,) persuaded her husband, Antipas, to visit Rome, and to solicit the same dignity from the emperor Caligula. Agrippa, however, being jealous also, though on another ground, wrote to the emperor and accused Antipas. Agrippa's messenger arrived at the very time when Herod obtained his first audience with the emperor. Caligula's letters with great earnestness, and, finding Herod Antipas accused of having been a party in Sejanus's conspiracy against Tiberius, and of still carrying on a correspondence with Arthabasus, king of Parthia, against the Romans, he demanded to know if it were true. Antipas, not daring to deny that he had a large quantity of arms in his arsenal, was banished instantly to Lyons in Gaul. Herodias followed his wife, and shared his fortune in banishment. The year of Antipas's death is not known, but it is certain he died in exile, as well as Herodias, (Ant. xviii. 9.) It was Herod Antipas who mocked Jesus at Jerusalem before his condemnation, sending him back to Pilate arrayed in a gorgeous robe, Luke xxiii. 7, seq. The manner in which the death of John the Baptist is stated in this narrative to have been procured, is so extraordinary, as compared with what occurs among European nations, that a few remarks upon it may not be without their use.

In the East, it is customary for public dancers at festivals in great houses to solicit, from the company they have been entertaining, such rewards as the spectators may choose to bestow. These are usually small pieces of money, which the donor sticks on the face of the performer; and a favorite dancer will sometimes have her face covered with such presents: nothing further is expected. Herod the Great, however, offered half his kingdom to Salome, the daughter of Herodias, who had danced to please him; and in this, if he were not equal in wisdom, he was certainly superior in extravagance, to a monarch, "Slah Abias, who, being one day drunk, (in his palace,) gave a woman that danced much to his satisfaction the fairest Hikan in all Ispan; which was not yet finished, but wanted little: this Hikan yielded a great revenue to the king, to whom it belonged, in chamber-rents." So far the parallel is tolerably exact; for that Herod was far from being sober, is a pardonable suspicion;—but the sequel is different: "The nazer, having put him in mind of it, said to him, that it was unjustifiable prodigality; so the king ordered to give her a hundred tomanis, (200L,) with which she was forced to be contented." Thewenot, in Persia, p. 100. This may assign a reason for the hurry of Herodias, to see the execution of the king; the Baptist; for, had she waited till the next morning for the fulfillment of the king's oath, he might have been by that time calmer, and some of his servants might have remonstrated with him on the violence and injustice of his order, as the Roman nazer did with his master; and Salome, who now insists, "Give me here the head of John in a charger," might have been otherwise forced to accept, in full payment for her activity, the vacant charger only; without accepting the homage solemnly desired by Herodias; or, perhaps, the pitiful value of a few tomanis, instead of the half of the promised kingdom.

II. ANTIPAS, a faithful witness, or martyr, mentioned Rev. ii. 13. Some years before the death of our Saviour's first disciples, and suffered martyrdom at Pergamus, of which city he was bishop.

I. ANTIPATER, an Idumæan, father of Herod the Great, was son of another Antipas, or Antipater, who had been appointed governor of Idumæa, by Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews. (Josephus, Antiq. xiv. 2. de Bello, i. 5.) He was, both for antiquity of family and for riches, the principal person of Idumæa, and obtained from Julius Caesar the government of Judea for himself, and that of Jerusalem and the country adjacent, for his eldest son Phæstæol; and the government of Galilee for his other son, Herod, who was not at that time above fifteen years of age. He was poisoned by Malchus, who afterwards took possession of his government, ante A. D. 43.

II. ANTIPATER, son of Herod the Great, and of Doris his first wife, was educated as a private person, and did not appear at court, until his father resolved to call him there, in consequence of his suspicion regarding the conduct of his two sons Alexander and Philip. After taking advantage of Herod's jealousy, plotted the destruction of his brothers, which he accomplished, A. M. 3809. (See ALEXANDER.) This being effected, he determined to destroy his father also, that he might the sooner become possessed of the crown; but Herod, having discovered his unnatural proceedings, had him put to death, by permission of Augustus, A. M. 4001.
Herod died a few days afterwards. Jos. Ant. xvii.
c. 3, 6, and 11. B. J. i. 17.

The history of these times, and of the troubles in Herod's family, greatly illustrate the gospel accounts of the tyranny and cruelty of this prince. They show, that his bloody jealousy at Bethlehem was nothing extraordinary for him; and that no safety for the infant Saviour was to be expected from his fury, short of a residence in Egypt. In what times, and under what tyranny, was the Prince of Peace
born!

ANTIPATRIS, a town anciently called Caphar-Sala, Acts xxii. 31. Josephus says (Antiq. xiii. 28.)
it was about 150 furlongs, or 17 miles, from Joppa.
The old Itinerary of Jerusalem places it ten miles from Lydda, and twenty-six from Cesarea. Herod the Great changed its name to Antipatris, in honor of his father, Antipater. Antipatris was situated in a very fruitful and agreeable plain, watered with many fine springs and rivulets, and near the mountains, in the way from Jerusalem to Cesarea. Josephus, de Bel. i. 16.

ANTIOCH, a town or fortress at Jerusalem, on the west and north angle of the temple, built by Herod the Great, (and named Antioch in honor of his friend, Mark Antony,) on an eminence, cut steep on all sides, and enclosed by a wall three hundred cubits high; it contained many apartments, bagnios, and halls, so that it might pass for a palace. It was in form a square tower, with a turret at each of the four corners. It was so high, that persons might look from thence into the temple; and there was a covered way of communication from the one to the other; so that, as the temple was in some sort a citadel to the town, the tower of Antioch was a citadel to the temple. Josephus, Antiq. xv. 14. et de Bello, vi. 12. There is frequent mention, in Josephus, of the tower of Antioch, particularly in his history of the Jewish war. The Romans generally kept a garrison in it; and from hence it was, that the tribune ran with his soldiers, to rescue Paul out of the hands of the Jews, who had seized him in the temple, and designed to kill him, Acts xxii. 31, 32. See JERUSALEM.

I. APAMEA, a city of Syria, on the Orontes, built, as is believed, by Seleucus I. king of Syria;
or by his son, Antiochus Soter, in honor of queen
Apamea, wife of Seleucus, and mother of Antiochus.
It was probably the same with Shepheah, a city of Syria, Num. xxxiv. 10, 11.

II. APAMEA, a city of Phrygia, on the river
Maras, near which, as some have been of opinion, Noah's ark rested; whence the city took the surname of (Kibodos) Ark. The Silylline verses place the mountains of Ararat, where the ark rested, on the confines of Phrygia, at the sources of the Maras.
On a medal, struck in honor of Adrian, is the figure of a man, representing the river Maras, with this inscription—\textit{AMPHITHE KIBRITOS MARAS.} —A medal of the Apameans—the Ark and the river Maras. This was one of the commemorative notices of the ark, and of the deluge, there is little doubt; but only in the sense, that traditional memorials of the ark were here very ancient. In refercence to the medal, we may add that Strabo affirms
the ancient name of Apamea to have been Kibodos;
by which name the ark (probably of Noah) was understood. \textit{Kibodos} is apparently not a Greek term;
it might be the name of a temple, in which commemoration was made of the ark, and of the preservation of man by it. There are several medals of Apamea extant, on which are represented an ark, with a man in it, receiving the dove, which is flying to him; and part of their inscription is the word \textit{nox}: but either this should be read \textit{xos},
an abridgement of Neokoron; or, it is the end of a word \textit{APAMEN}; or (some of the medals are spurious; which has been suspected. Still, as they are from different dies, yet all referring to Apamea, it seems likely that their authors had a knowledge of the tradition of commemoration respecting the ark preserved in this city. (See ARK.) Many more such commemorations of an event so greatly affecting mankind were no doubt maintained for many ages, though we are now at great difficulties in tracing them. In fact, many cities boasted of these memorials; and referred to them as proofs of their antiquity. See ARARAT.

APE. Among the articles of merchandise imported by Solomon's fleet were aces, 1 Kings x. 22.
2 Chron. ix. 21. The Greek writers mention a sort of ape, native of Ethiopia, and around the Red sea, called \textit{Kephios, or Keipos, or Kelos}, which comes near to the Hebrew \textit{Kuph}, or \textit{Koph}. It was about the size of a roe-buck. The Egyptians, in Babylon, in Egypt, adored a kind of ape, which Strabo calls \textit{Keipos}; and they are still worshipped in many places of India.

APHARSACHITES, Ezra v. 6; of Apharsachites, Ezra iv. 9; the name of an Assyrian people who were sent to inhabit the vacant cities of the Israelites. They are elsewhere unknown. Gese-nius compares the name of the \textit{Parethaceni}, who dwelt between Persia and Media. Herodot. i. 101. R.

APHEK. There are several cities of this name mentioned in Scripture. The name signifies a place, hence a city, fortified city.—I. A city in the tribe of Asher, (Josh. xiii. 4; xix. 30.) called also \textit{Aphek} in Judg. i. 31. This can hardly be any other than the \textit{Atphah} of Eusebius and Sozomenus, situated in Libanus, famous for a temple of Venus. A village called \textit{Afka} is still found in mount Lebanon, situated in the bottom of a valley; see Burchhardt,
p. 25, or p. 70. 433. Germ. ed.—II. A city near which Benhadad was routed by the Israelites, (1 Kings xx. 26, seq.) to which the \textit{Apheka} of Eusebius corresponds, situated to the east of the sea of Galilee, and mentioned by Seezen and Burchhardt, under the
p. 279, or p. 438. 539. Germ. ed.—III. A city in the tribe of Issachar; near to Jezreel, where the Philistines twice encamped before battles with the Israelites, 1 Sam. iv. 1; xxix. 1; comp. xxviii. 4.—Either this or the Aphek first above mentioned, is probably the royal city of the Cannanites, spoken of in Josh. xi. 18. It stood about thirty years after these in the Aphek, mentioned Josh. xv. 53; which was situated in the mountains of Judah.

APHEMENA, one of the three toparchies added to Judea, by the kings of Syria, 1 Macc. xi. 34. Ptolemy and Ephrem, or Ephram, mentioned John xi. 54.

APHERES, head of the eighteenth sacerdotal family, of the twenty-four which David chose for temple service, 1 Chron. xxiv. 15.

APHERETI, Israelites, who returned from the captivity, and settled in their own country. The name Aphereti is perhaps derived from Japhath, a city, Josh. xv. 43.

APIS. The Egyptians maintained, at Heliopolis, a bullock consecrated to the sun, which they called Menes; and at Memphis, another, named Apis, dedicated to the moon, and under which Osiris was adored. This animal was not altogether a common bull; but was distinguished by the following marks: the whole body was black, except, as some think, a white square spot on the forehead; others say, a spot like the figure of an eagle on its back; but rather a crescent-like spot. The hairs of the tail were double, and it had the form of a beetle under its tongue. When, after a very diligent search, a calf of this description was found, it was carried with great joy to the temple of Osiris, where it was fed, and worshipped as a representative of that god, so long as it lived; and after its death, it was buried with great solemnity and mourning. This done, they carefully sought another with the same marks. Sometimes they were many years before they found one; but when they had succeeded, there was a great festival over all the country. It has been generally thought that the golden calf which Aaron made for Israel in the wilderness, and the calves set up by Jeroboam, to be worshipped by the ten tribes, were imitations of the Egyptian Apis. See Calf.

The worship of Apis was not improperly derived from India to Egypt; and the resemblances between the two living deities are well stated, from personal observation, by Fra Paolino da San Bartolomeo. (Voyage to the East Indies, chap. 2. Eng. edit. p. 21.) He says, "On the day of my return to Ponto- chia, I had an opportunity of seeing a very singular scene; as on that day the god Apis was led in procession through the city. This deity was a beautiful fat, red-colored ox, of a middle size. The Brahmins generally guard him the whole year through, in the neighborhood of his temple; but this was exactly the period at which he is exhibited to the people with a great many solemnities. He was preceded by a band of Indian musicians; that is to say, two drummers, a fifer, and several persons, who, with pieces of iron, beat upon copper basins. Then came a few Brahmins; and behind these was an immense multitude of people. The pagans had all opened the doors of their houses and shops, and before each stood a small basket with rice, thin cakes, herris, and other articles in which the proprietors of these houses and shops used to deal. Every one beheld Apis with reverence; and those were considered fortunate of whose provisions he was pleased to taste a mouthful as he passed. Philarchus conjectured, as we are told by Plutarch, in his treatise on Isis and Osiris, that Apis was originally a bull, brought from India to Egypt by the inhabitants of the latter. Plutarch himself asserts, that the Egyptians considered Apis as an emblem of the soul of Osiris: and, perhaps, he here meant to say, that under this expression they understood that which was produced and given life to every part of the creation. Pliny, in his Natural History, speaking of Apis, uses the following remarkable words: 'When he eats out of the hand of those who come to consult him, it is considered as an answer. He refused to receive anything from the hand of Germanicus Caesar, and the latter soon after died.' From this it appears, that the Egyptians entertained the same opinions respecting Apis as the Indians do. In Egypt, as well as in India, people were accustomed to consider him as an oracle; to place food before him, and, according as he accepted or refused it, to form conclusions in regard to their good or bad fortune. The ox [bull] which represents Apis must, every three years, give place to another. If he die in the course of these three years of his dedication, he is committed to the earth with all that pomp and ceremony observed at the interment of persons of the first rank. Various pagodas, or pagan temples, have on their front the figure of a cow, or perhaps two, of a colossal size."

Dr. Forster (the translator of Fra Paolino) points out several differences between the practice of the Hindoos and the Egyptians: he says, "The sacred ox of the Indians, for example, remains only three years in life; whereas that of the Egyptians, according to Plutarch, remained twenty-five, after which he was drowned, then embalmed, and deposited in a subterranean burying-place destined for that purpose, near the village of Abusir, the ancient Busiris, not far from Memphis. The coffin of an Apis ox was found there by Paul Lucas and Worsley Montague. Belzoni also found a tomb of Apis in one of the caves in the mountains of Upper Egypt, which enclose the tombs or graves of the kings. In one of these he found a colossal alabaster sarcophagus, transparent and clear toned, sculptured both on the inside and outside with hieroglyphics. In this was the body of an ox [bull] embalmed in asphaltus. This sarcophagus is now in the British museum."

APOCALYPSE signifies revelation, but is particularly referred to the Revelations which John had in the isle of Patmos, whether he was banished by Domitian, between the years of J. C. 95 and 97. The Apocalypse was not at all times, nor in all churches, admitted as canonical. Jerome, Eusebius, Iohannæus, and Sulpicius Severus remark, that in their time many churches in Greece did not receive it; it is not in the catalogues of the council of Laodicea, or of Cyril of Jerusalem; but Justin, Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others, all the fathers of the fourth, fifth, and following ages, quote the Revelation as a book acknowledged to be canonical. Indeed, as Sir Isaac Newton has remarked, there is no book of the New Testament so strongly attested, or commented so early upon, as this.

The book of the Revelation contains twenty-two chapters. The first three are epistolary admonitions and instructions to the angels (or bishops) of the seven churches in Asia Minor.—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. The fifteen following chapters contain representations of the persecutions which the church was to suffer from Jews, heretics, and heathens; principally from the emperors Dioclesian, Maximin, He- merius, Galerius, Maximinus, Maximianus, and Licinius; and, lastly, from Julian the Apostate. After this, we have a display of the divine vengeance against persecutors, the Roman empire, and the city of Rome, described under the name of Babylon, the great whore seated on seven hills with rage so as to describe the victories of the church, and its triumph over its enemies; of the marriage of the Lamb, and the celestial happiness of the church triumphant.

(The book of Revelation belongs, in its character, to the prophetic writings, and stands in intimate relation with the prophecies of the Old Testament, and more especially with the writings of the later prophets, as Ezekiel, Zechariah, and particularly Daniel; inasmuch as it is almost entirely symbolic. This circumstance has surrounded the interpretation of this book with difficulties, which no interpreter has yet been able fully to overcome.

Most of these are connected with the questions as to the author and the time when the book was composed. As to the author, the weight of testimony throughout all the history of the church, is in favor of John, the beloved apostle. As to the time of its composition, we may better judge after a synthetic view of its contents. In all prophecy there is a twofold object, viz. of consolation and of exhortation. So here; the desponding Christian community are admonished to fidelity and perseverance by the assurance of the speedy commencement of the kingdom of God, or at least the overthrow of the most potent enemies. The hortatory part is chiefly contained in the epistles to the seven churches of Asia Minor. The book may be divided into three parts, viz—

I. The Introduction, in epistles to the seven churches, both general and particular. (i. 4.—iii. 22.)
II. The first Revelation. (iv. 1.—xi. 19.) The book of destiny, sealed with seven seals, is given to the Lamb to open. (iv. v.) He opens four of the seals, and at the opening of each there appears the emblem of a war or plague; at the opening of the fifth and sixth is announced the approach of the great day of judgment and wrath for all the enemies of Christianity. (vi.) Before the seventh seal is opened, the Christians receive a seal as a mark of preservation against the impending destruction. (xii.) The seventh seal is now opened, but the catastrophe is still delayed, being made dependent on the sounding of the seven trumpets. At the sounding of the four first trumpets, four plagues appear; and three woes are announced. The实质s to the other three trumpets. (xiii.) At the sounding of the fifth appears the strange and fearful plague of the locusts, the first world.—x. 12.) At the sixth, comes forth a terrible army for war, the second world. (ix. 15.—21.) The announcement is now given, that with the sounding of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God will be finished; (x.) and the prophet is commanded to measure the temple and those who worship therein, in order that they may be excepted from the general calamity of the city, which for a time is to be given to the Gentiles. (xi. 1, 2.) Before the final catastrophe, two prophets are still to admonish and exhort to repentance: they will, however, be put to death as martyrs, and the holy city will suffer punishment on account of them, and those who remain will repent and give glory to God. (xi. 3—13.) Now follows the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and the commencement of the great judgment against all enemies, and the appearance of the kingdom of God is announced. (xi. 14—19.)

III. But all this does not follow at once; but is described at large in the second Revelation, which now begins. (xii.—xxii.) The theocracy, out of which the Messiah springs, is persecuted by Satan, who, being cast out from heaven, is actuated for a time with rage so as to overbear the Christians. (xii. 1—17.) His instruments are the heathen, or antique, under the figure of a beast with seven heads and ten horns, which persecutes the saints; (xii. 18.—xiii. 10.) and also the false priesthood which is subservient to him, and which is, in like manner, represented under the image of a beast. (xiii. 11—18.) Then follows the blissful peace enjoyed by the Christians who were exempted from the plagues, under the dominion of the Lamb. (xiv. 1—5.) Announcement of the fall of Rome, and of the judgment upon the heathen. (xv. 6—20.) The wrath of God is to be poured out from seven vials upon the earth. (xv.) As the four first vials are poured out, follow four plagues; (xvi. 1—9.) the three others bring down destruction upon Rome, (xvi. 10—21.) whose destruction, to be completed through the beast himself, is now more minutely described and celebrated. (xvi. 1—xvii.) At last both beasts are subdued by the Messiah, and Satan is bound. (xvii. 1—xx. 3.) They receive a thousand years and first resurrection. (xx. 4—6.) The last conflict with Gog and Magog, the final overthrow of Satan, (xx. 6—10.) and the last judgment. (xx. 11—15.) The New Jerusalem. (xxi. 1—xxii. 5.) Epilogue. (xxii. 6—21.)

Since Eichhorn published his commentary upon this book in 1791, (in which he made the great mistake of assigning to the whole a dramatic character,) most interpreters agree with him in finding in the first revelation the destruction of Jerusalem and consequent overthrow of Judaism; and in the second revelation, the downfall of heathenism, i.e. the subversion of the influence of pagan Rome and the pagan Roman empire, as such, besides the advance and general diffusion of Christianity. This of course implies that the Apocalypse was written at an earlier date than has often been assigned to it. The notices of time which may be drawn from the book itself, are the following. (1.) In c. xi. 1, 2, Jerusalem is spoken of in a manner which pre-supposes that it was still standing. (2.) From c. xvii. 10, it would seem that it was written under the sixth Roman emperor, Vespasian; unless one of the three mock emperors, Gallus, Obo, or Vitius, is to be reckoned as the sixth; which would make the book to be of a year or two. (3.) The persecution of the Christians under Nero is pre-supposed; (vi. 9; xvii. 6.) as also the death of most of the apostles. (xvii. 22.) These things in themselves would serve to fix the time of the composition of the Apocalypse from about A. D. 68 to 70; and as Jerusalem was destroyed in A. D. 72, this date would accord well with Eichhorn's theory.

The general view of the Apocalypse given by Hug in his introduction to the N. T. is similar to the above, but with some modifications. There are in the book three cities, on account of which all these terrible appearances in heaven and earth take place, viz. Sodom or Egypt, Babylon, and Jerusalem. Sodom is Jerusalem, for in it our Lord was crucified, (xi. 8.) and there also is the temple, xi. 1. Babylon is Rome, for it stands on seven hills, (xvii. 9.) and has the empire of the world, xvii. 18. Jerusalem and Rome are therefore all the more overthrown is foretold; but these are not spoken of literally, but as the emblems or symbols of those religions of which they were the chief seats and supporters, viz. Judaism and heathenism.—The New Jerusalem comes down from heaven in place of those cities which the Lord blessed and enlightened; there the faithful are established each of a religion, so also the former is the symbol of Christianity, which is to endure for ever, and secure the eternal bliss of men.

Along with this view, however, the same author holds steadily to the idea, that the banishment of the apostle John to Patmos, and the consequent composition of this book, did not occur until the reign of Domitian, or about A. D. 95, and more than twenty years after the destruction of Jerusalem. To avoid this anachronism, he applies, of course, all that is said of Jerusalem, symbolically, to the Jewish religion, which still prevailed among that people, although the temple and worship were destroyed. But this seems to be a forced construction, and is not at all necessary, since the historical accounts respecting the time of John's banishment are very uncertain.

But whatever view may be taken of this book in general, the following remarks of Hug are well deserving of the attention of all interpreters. "It is hardly necessary to remark, that all the strokes and figures in this great work are by no means significant. Many are inserted only to give life and animation to the whole; or they are introduced by way of ornament out of the prophets and holy books; and no one who is any judge of such matters, will deny, that the filling up of the whole is in an extraordinary degree rich, and for occidental readers in the highest degree splendid. The description of the chastisements by hail, pestilence, floods which are changed into blood, by insects and vermin, are imitations of the plagues of Egypt; and do not here either require or admit any particular historical explanation or application. The eclipses of the sun and moon, the falling stars, are usual figures employed by the prophets, in order to represent the overthrow of states and empires, or the fall of renowned persons, by means of great and terrible physical phenomena. And in general, the sublimest and most appropriate and striking figures and passages of the prophets are interpolated by the author in his work; and they thus impart to the whole an oriental splendor, which leaves all Arabian writers far behind."

"The numbers also are seldom to be taken arithmetically, but with a view to the grounds for the number. Seven seals, seven angels, seven trumpets, seven vials, seven thunders,—who does not here see that this is the holy prophetic number, and is employed only as ornament and costume? So also the round numbers, and times, and half times; they admit neither of a chronological nor numerical reckoning; but are generally put for indefinite times and numbers.

"There are in the whole only two historical events, which, consequently, admit of a historical interpretation. Aside from the general prevalence of Christianity, with which the vision closes, the destruction of Jerusalem is a known fact,—and by the side of this stands also the downfall of Rome.—Here we are necessarily referred to the historical interpretation, so far as it can be applied without violence, and so far as history voluntarily affords her aid. But every thing minute and frivolous, and every thing far-fetched or forced, must be cautiously avoided."

Upon the foregoing principles, the greater part of the book of Revelation must be regarded as having had its accomplishment in the earlier centuries of the church; while subsequent ages are summarily described in the latter part of the book, of which the fulfilment is gradually developing itself. "

The Apocryphal Books attempted to be imposed on the church, at various times, but their spuriousness is universally maintained. Calmet enumerates the following:—(1.) The Revelations of St. Peter; an apocryphal book contained in Eusebius, and Jerome, and cited by Clements of Alexandria, in his Hypotyposeis. (2.) The Revelation of St. Paul, an apocryphal book, used among the Gnostics and Cainites, and which contained, as they pretended, those ineffable things which the apostle saw during his ecstasy; and which he informs the Corinthians he was not permitted to divulge, 2 Cor. xii. 4. (3.) The Revelation of St. John, different from the true Apocalypse; and of which Lambecius says, there was a MS. in the emperor's library at Vienna. (4.) The Revelation of Cerinthus, in which he spoke of an earthly kingdom, and certain sensual pleasures, which the saints should enjoy for a thousand years at Jerusalem. It is probable that the notion entertained by some of the ancients, that Cerinthus was the author of St. John's Revelation, arose from this imitation by him of that work, and the ill use which he made of the apostle's writings, the better to authorize his own visions. (5.) The Revelation of St. Thomas is known only by his disciple Galasius's Synopsis, which ranks it among apocryphal books. (6.) The Revelation of Adam, forged, probably by the Gnostics, from what is said in Genesis, of the Lord's causing a deep sleep to fall on Adam; or, as the LXX have it, an ecstasy. (7.) The Revelation of Abraham, possessed by the Sethian heretics, and which Epiphanius describes as abounding with impurity. (8.) The Revelation of Moses, which, Cedrenus says, some authors believe to be the same apocryphal work as Genesis the Less, which was extant among the ancients. Syncellus, speaking of this Apocalypse, says, the passage of Paul to the Galatians is taken from it, (ch. vi. 15.) "Neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature." (9.) The Revelation of Elias, from which Jerome thinks that the passage in 1 Cor. i. 9, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what God hath prepared for them that love him," is borrowed. Origen, in his citation of these words, tells us, that they are no where to be found, but in the secret books of Elias.

From this great number of books called by the name of Apocalypses, or Revelations, it should seem that the title and perhaps the work itself, of the Revelation of St. John, was more popular among the early Christians, than is usually thought to be the case; it is, at least, certain that the Mosaic ornaments of the most ancient churches now existing, have more frequent allusions to scenes in the Revelation, than to any other book in the New Testament. Imitations so numerous might render the question of genuineness and authenticity difficult in those days; but this has succeeding ages under the greater obligations to the considerate and sedate decision of the early Christians, and to this we have adjudged to the book now universally received.

APOCRYPHAL properly signifies hidden. Books are called apocryphal on the following accounts: (1.) when the author is not known; whether he has affixed the same name to his work, or has affixed a feigned name; (2.) when they have not been admitted into the canon of Scripture, nor publicly read in the congregation, although they may have been read in private; (3) when they are not authentic, and of divine authority; (4) when they may be thought the works of eminent or of sacred authors; e. g. the Epistle of Barnabas; (4) when they were composed by heretics, to authorize, or to justify, their errors.

There are apocryphal books, therefore, of several degrees. Some are absolutely false, dangerous, and impious, composed to defend error or to promote superstition; such as the Gospels of St. Thomas, of the Valentinians, Gnostics, Marcion, &c. Others are simply apocryphal, and not contrary to faith and good manners; as the books of Esdras, Maccabees, &c. Others, after having been long contested by some, have been by others received as canonical; as the church of Rome admits many, which are by all Protestants regarded as apocryphal, though printed with our English Bibles, and parts of them read in the Episcopal service; all of which Jerome reckons among apocryphal writings, and says, the church reads them, but without receiving them into the canon.

There are a few inconsiderable parts of Scripture, which are at this day received by some as canonical, while others consider them as apocryphal; such as the titles to the Psalms, the preface of Jeremiah, Ecclesiasticus, or Sirach, and the additions to Esther and Daniel.

[Apostrophal books, in the Protestant sense, are of two classes, viz. (1.) Those which were in existence in the time of Christ, but were not admitted by the Jews into the canon of the Old Testament; either because they had no Hebrew original, or because they were regarded as not divinely inspired. The most important of these are collected in the Apocrypha often appended to the English Bible; among which the books of Ecclesiasticus and Maccabees are the most valuable; the former as containing many excellent maxims of wisdom, and the latter as being for the most part true history, but written in a diffuse and legendary manner. Most of the others bear the stamp of legends on the face of them. All of these stand in the Septuagint and Vulgate as canonical. But besides these there existed very many pseudopigraphia, or writings falsely attributed to distinguished individuals; e. g. to Adam, Seth, Noah, Abraham, the twelve patriarchs, &c. And the existence of this latter may be seen in Fabrici Codex Pseudep. V. T. (2.) Those which were written after the time of Christ, but were not admitted by the churches into the canon of the New Testament, as not being divinely inspired. These are mostly of a legendary character. They have all been collected by Fabricius in his Codex Apoc. N. T. Among them are no less than 24 Gospels; of which the most important are those of the Egyptians, of the twelve apostles, of Corinthians, of the Ebionites, of the Gnostics, of Marcion, of Thomas, and the Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus. There are also 10 different Books of Acts; and six Epistles, or rather correspondences, including the letters and to have passed between Paul and Seneca, an Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans, one from the Corinthians to Paul, and his reply, &c. &c.

For the nine Apocalypses, see that article. None of all these are received as canonical at the present day by any portion of the Christian church.

Other pseudopigraphia of this kind, though not intended to be put forth as parts of the New Testament, are the correspondences of Jesus Christ with Abgar, king of Edessa, (see Abgar), and the Epistle of P. Lentulus to the Senate of Rome, describing the person of Christ. See Acts xv. 36; xxii. 25; xxvi. 32.

APOLLO, one of the gods worshipped by the heathen, to whom they attributed oracles and divination. See Gospel, Oracle, and Python.

APOLLOnia, a city of Macedonia, through which Paul passed in his way from Amphipolis to Thessalonica, Acts vii. 11. It was formerly celebrated for its trade.

I. APOLLONiUS, an officer belonging to Antiochus Epiphanes, who is called Mardoch of the Greek (2 Macc. v. 84), and whom Antiochus Epiphanes sent into Judea to execute his design of drawing large sums from Jerusalem. Antiochus came thither at the head of 22,000 men, and, on the Sabbath-day, fell on the people, and put great numbers to the sword. The city was burnt and pillaged; 10,000 persons were taken, carried captive, and sold to the king's profit. Two years afterwards, Judas Maccabaeus, having gathered an army of 6000 Jews, who continued faithful, defeated and killed Apollonius, dispersed his army, and carried off a rich booty, 1 Macc. i. 50, 51. A. M. 3856, ante A. D. 166.

II. APOLLONIUS DAEs, governor of Cæsarea in Syria, and general of Demetrius Nicanor, having abandoned the party of Alexander Balas, and espoused that of Demetrius Nicanor, headed a powerful army, to compel the Jews to declare for Demetrius. A. M. 3856, ante A. D. 148. He was defeated by Jonathan Maccabaeus, however, and 8000 of his men killed, 1 Macc. x. 69—76. For this victory, Alexander Balas bestowed new favors on Jonathan; among which was a golden buckle, such as the king's relations wore, and the property of Accaron, ver. 77—89.

III. APOLLOnius, son of Genneus, was one of those governors whom Lysias had left in Judea, after the treaty formed between the Jews and the young king Antiochus Epipator, and who endeavored, by their ill treatment, to compel the Jews to break it, 2 Macc. xii. 2.

APOLLOs, a Jew of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus, A. D. 54, during the absence of Paul, who had gone to Jerusalem. He was "an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures," (Acts xxviii. 24.) but he knew only the baptism of John; so that he was, as it were, only an enthusiastic, an independent spirit of the higher branches of gospel doctrine. Nevertheless, he knew Jesus to be the Messiah, and declared himself openly as his disciple. At Ephesus, where he began to speak boldly in the synagogue, demonstrating, by the Scriptures, that Jesus was the Christ, Aquila and Priscilla heard him, and took him home with them, to instruct him more fully in the ways of God. Some time after this, he inclined to go into Achaia, and the brethren wrote to the disciples there, desiring them to receive him. At Corinth he was very useful in watering what Paul had planted. It has been supposed, that the great affection his disciples had for him, almost produced a schism, (1 Cor. iii. 4—7.) "some saying, I am of Paul; others, I am of Apollonius." But this division, which Paul mentions and reproves, in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, did not prevent him and Apollos from being closely united in the bonds of Christian charity and affection. Apollos, hearing that the apostle was at Ephesus, went to meet him, and was there when he wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians, wherein he observes that he had earnestly entreated Apollos to return to Corinth, but had not prevailed upon him; that, nevertheless, he gave him room to hope, that he would visit that city at a favorable opportunity, ch. xvi. 12. Some have supposed that the apostle names Apollos and Cephas, not as the real persons in whose names parties had been formed at Corinth, but that, in order to avoid provoking a tamper which he desired might subside, he “transfers, by a figure, to Apollos, and to himself,” what was said really of other parties, whom, out of prudence, he declines naming. It might be so; but the reluctance of Apollos to return to Corinth seems to countenance the other, which is the general opinion. Jerome says, (ad. Tit. iii.) Apollos was so dissatisfied with the division which had happened on his account at Corinth, that he retired into Crete, with Zeno, a doctor of the law; but that this interruption of Christian harmony having been appeased by the letter of Paul to the Corinthians, Apollos returned to that city, and afterwards became bishop there. The Greeks make him bishop of Duraeus; but, in their Menæa, they describe him as second bishop of Colophon, in Asia. Ferrarius says he was bishop of Iconium, in Phrygia; others say he was bishop of Cessarea; but this is all uncertain.

A. H. L. Y. N., the “destroyer,” answering to the Hebrew Abaddon, which see. Rev. xi. 11.

APOSTLE, ἀπόστολος, a messenger, or envoy. The term is applied to Jesus Christ, who was God's envoy to save the world, (Heb. iii. 1.) though, more commonly, the title is given to persons who were envoys, commissioned by him. Those also who were sent on any errand by a church or Christian community, are called in the N. T. apostles. Thus Paul speaks of two apostles, Eng. messengers, 1 Cor. viii. 53. So also 2 Cor. ii. 25, where he calls Epaphroditus, in like manner, the apostle, i.e. messenger of that church.

Herodotus uses the word to denote a public herald, an ambassador, or nuncio. The Hebrews had apostles sent by their patriarch to collect a certain yearly tribute, which was called aurum coronarium. (Cod. Theod. xiv.) Some assert, that, before Jesus Christ, they had another sort of apostle, who collected the half shekel, which was paid by every Israelite to the temple, for the support of the priests; but we cannot perceive that this name was given to them, as it certainly was to other officers, belonging to the high-priests and heads of the people, who were sent to carry their orders to distant cities and provinces, in order to receive the tribute, and to collect the money. The title of apostle was deputed to the synagogues of Damascus, with directions to seize and imprison all who professed the religion of Christ; that is, he was the apostle of the high-priest, and others at Jerusalem, for this purpose; and he alludes to this custom, according to Jerome, in the beginning of his Epistle to the Galatians, saying, that he is “an apostle, not of man, neither by [commissioned from] man, but by [commissioned from] Jesus Christ.” as if he had said, an apostle, not like those among the Jews, who derived their mission from the chief priests, or from the principal men of the nation; but an apostle sent by Jesus Christ himself. Eusebius and Jerome speak likewise of apostles sent by the Jews to defame Jesus Christ, his doctrine, and his disciples. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue against Trypho, says, they sent persons whom they called apostles, to disperse circular letters, filled with calumnies against the Christians: and to this, it is supposed, there is a reference, “we have not received letters concerning thee from Jerusalem;—but this sect is everywhere spoken against,” Acts xxviii. 21, 22. Epiphanius, speaking of these apostles, observes, that theirs was a very honorable and profitable employment among the Jews.

The Apostles of Jesus Christ were his chief disciples, whom he invested with his authority, filled with his Spirit, intrusted particularly with his doctrines and services, and chose to raise the edifice of his church. After his resurrection, he sent his apostles into all the world, commissioned to preach, to baptize, to work miracles, &c. The names of the twelve are,—

2. Andrew 7. Thomas
5. James Major

The last betrayed his Master; and, having hanged himself, Matthias was chosen in his place, Acts i. 15-26.

The order in which the apostles are named is not the same in all the gospels. See Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 16; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13. This, though a very simple fact and observation, has its weight in showing that the early collectors neither wrote in concert, nor copied from one another. Had they done so, nothing could be more probable than their repetition of a list already formed to their hands, of a number of names so well known as those of the apostles; and the order of which was so perfectly indissoluble to any personal object. They all begin with Simon Peter, and end with Judas Iscariot.

From the application of the title apostle, as given above, we may perceive in what sense Paul claims it,—“Am not I an apostle?” a missionary, an envoy, a person authorized by Christ to proclaim his will, 1 Cor. ix. 1. In the same sense he applies the title to Barnabas, whom he includes—“or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to be accompanied by a wife,” &c. ver. 6. So that there are, perhaps, three or four persons called apostles in this sense, besides the twelve mentioned in the gospels, as having been chosen to that office by our Saviour when on earth.

In regard to the apostles of our Lord, there are some particulars deserving of a moment’s attention.

1. They were, for the most part at least, Galileans, and from the lower class of society. The greater part of them were simple, poor persons, who, without training, were employed on the shores of the lake of Tiberias.

Matthew was a publican or tax-gatherer employed by the Romans; an occupation regarded by the Jews in general with the utmost contempt and abhorrence. They were ‘unlearned and ignorant men,’ (Acts iv. 13) and Paul justly regards it as a proof of the wisdom and power of God, that he had chosen, through the preaching of unlearned men, to overthrow the whole edifice of human wisdom, and lead the world to the light of truth, 1 Cor. i. 27, seq.

2. The apostles all received instruction from Jesus in common; and on the day of Pentecost were all furnished with power from on high, for their great enterprise and destination, through the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. In respect to the religious truths which they were to teach, therefore, they were infallible, and so directed and assisted by the Spirit, that their doctrines were not alloyed by human errors. In all other respects, however, they were not at all infallible, nor even inspired, as their history clearly shows. Thus, during the ministry of Jesus, they were not able to divest themselves of the Jewish notion, that the Messiah was to be a temporal prince, and the deliverer and restorer of the Jewish nation; so that, even after our Lord's resurrection, they put the question to him in a body, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Acts i. 6. But even after the extraordinary visit of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the further, we still find Peter needing an express direction from the Spirit, before he could so far overcome his Jewish prejudice, as to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. We find, too, that Peter and Barnabas disputing and separating from one another; (Acts xv. 25, seq.) and Paul rebuking Peter and others for their want of consistency, Gal. ii. 11, seq. In respect, also, to certain parts of doctrine, they received only by degrees a fuller illumination; see Acts xv. So also Paul several times distinguishes between what is merely his own judgment or opinion, and that which he receives directly from the Lord, e. g. 1 Cor. vii. 5. At other times the apostle laid plans and attempted to execute them; which plans either remained unfilled, or were directly frustrated by the influence of the Spirit; e. g. in Rom. xv. 25, Paul expresses the intention of passing through Rome on his way to Spain; in Acts xvi. 7, it is related that Paul and Silas "assayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not." 3. There was among the apostles no external distinction of rank; indeed, the whole teaching of Jesus was directed to do away all such distinction, had it been otherwise possible for it to exist, Matt. xx. 20, seq., xxvii. 11, 19; Mark x. 44. Nevertheless, there appears to have been a difference of character and standing among them in respect to influence and activity, so far as this, that Peter, and James, and John act a more prominent part than any of the others, both during the lifetime of Christ, and after his death; when they became especially pillars in the church at Jerusalem, Gal. ii. 9. Among these three, again, Peter seems to have had a special prominence, arising from his zeal, activity, energy, and decision of character. He also was the first to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, Acts xv. 7. But above all, he was the "rock" on which the Church was to be built. On this Rock it was foretold that all the graces of Christianity were to be bestowed; and it was especially, through whose instrumentality Christianity became what it was intended by its Founder to be, the religion of the whole human race. If it was the zeal, activity, and success of Peter which gave him a pre-eminence in the church, much more would such pre-eminence be due to

Paul.—Of the other apostles we have no particular personal accounts, after the day of Pentecost. *R.

APPII FORUM, a city, or market town, founded by Appius Claudius, on the great road (Via Appia) which he constructed from Rome to Capua. Some authors suppose it to have occupied the site of the present hamlet of Le Case Nuove. But it is more probably to be found in the present Casarillo di Santa Maria, situated 56 miles from Rome, in the borders of the Pontine marches, where are the remains of an ancient city. Being thus situated in the marches, it is no wonder that the water was bad, as mentioned by Horace.

Egressum magnam me exceptit Aricia, Roma, Hospicio medicum.—

—Inde Forum Appti

Differtum nautis, cautionibus atque malignis.

Hic ego, proper aquam, quot erat determina, ventri Indico bellum.—Hor. Sat. i. 5.

The "Three Taverns" were about eight or ten miles nearer to Rome than "Appius Forum," as Cicero intimates, who, going from Rome, writes, "ab Appii Forum, horti quarti; dedeream eam posito aequo a Triubis Taveris." a little before he came to the Forum of Appius he had written from the Three Taverns; (ad. Att. ii. 10.) so that probably the chief number of Christians waited for the apostle Paul at a place of refreshment; while some of their number were forward to meet him, and to acquaint him with their expectation of seeing him among them, for which they respectfully waited his coming. See Acts xxviii. 15.

APPLE and APPLE-TREE, Heb. תֹּפָּטָא, Cant. viii. 5; Joel i. 12. Commentators have been at a loss what tree is strictly meant under this name; the manner in which it is employed seeming to imply a tree of great and distinguished beauty; thus Cant. iii. 3, "As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons;" and vii. 8, "the smell of thy nose is like apples." Hence Homer supposes it to be the orange or citron-tree. Obs. lxxv. The corresponding Arabic word, تفطص, signifies not only apples, but also generally all similar fruits, as oranges, lemons, quinces, peaches, apricots, etc. and it is a common comparator to say of anything, "It is as fragrant as a tefacht." The Hebrew word may, perhaps, have been used in the same general sense. There is, however, no need of such a supposition. Apple-trees were not very common in Palestine, and their conspicuous rarity would naturally give them a poetical value. The same word, תֹּפָּטָא, is also employed as the name of a person, (1 Chron. ii. 43) and of two cities, one in Judah, (Josh. xii. 17; xv. 54) and the other on the border between Ephraim and Manassah, (Josh. xvi. 8.)

In Prov. xxv. 11, it is said, in our English version, "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." This is translated by Gesenius and others thus: "Like golden apples inlaid with silver, among images of silver." On this Rosenmuller remarks, that it is difficult to see for what purpose such apples of gold should be fabricated; and he prefers, therefore, to refer the epithet golden to their color, and translates, "like golden apples, or quinces, in vases or baskets of silver."* e. g. these allures the hearer to a fitly spoken word is pleasant to the understanding. *R.

APPLES or Sodooph. The late adventurous traveller, M. Scetzen, who went round the Red sea, notices the famous Apple of Sodom; which was said to have all the appearance of the most inviting apple, while it was filled with nauseous and bitter dust only. It has furnished many moralists with allusions: and also our poet Milton, in whose Infernal regions—

A grove sprung up—laden with fair fruit—

 greedily they plucked

The fruitage, fair to sight, like that which grew
Near that bituminous lake, where Sodom blazed.
This, more delective, not the touch, but taste
Deceived. They, fondly thinking to aaly
Their appeatts with gust, instead of fruit
Chewed bitter ashes, which the offended tongue
With spattering noise rejected:
APPLES (54)

AQUILA

Seezeen thus explains this peculiarity: "The information which I have been able to collect on the aptles of Sodom (Solanum Sodomum) is very contradictory and insufficient; I believe, however, that I can give a very natural explanation of the phenomenon, and that the following remark will lead to it.
While I was at Karrak, at the house of a Greek curate of the town, I saw a sort of cotton, resembling silk, which he used as tinder for his match-lock, as it could not be employed in making cloth. He told me that it grew in the plains of el-Gör, to the east of the Dead sea, on a tree like a fig-tree, called Aescühaer. The cotton is contained in a fruit resembling the pomegranate; and by making incisions
at the root of the tree, a sort of milk is procured, which is recommended to barren women, and is called Lēbbin Aescühaer. It has struck me that these fruits, being, as they are, without pulp, and which are unknown throughout the rest of Paleestine, might be the famous apples of Sodom. I suppose, likewise, that the tree which produces it, is a sort of fromager, (Bombby. Linn.) which can only flourish under the excessive heat of the Dead sea,
and in no other district of Palestine."

This curious subject is further explained, in a note added by M. Seezeen's editor, who considers the tree to be a species of Asclepias, probably the Asclepias Gigantes. The remark of M. Seezeen is corroborat-ed by a traveller, who passed a long time in situations where this plant is very abundant. The same idea occurred to him when he first saw it in 1792;
though he did not know at that time, that it existed near the lake Asphaltites. The umbella, somewhat like a bladder, containing from half a pint to a pint, is of the same color with the leaves, a bright green, and may be mistaken for an inviting fruit, without much stretch of imagination. Thus, as well as the other parts, when green, being cut or pressed, yields a milky juice, of a very acid taste: but in winter,
when dry, it contains a yellowish dust, in appearance
resembling certain fungi, common in South Britain;
but of pungent quality, and said to be particularly injurious to the eyes. The whole so nearly corresponds with the description given by Solinus, (Poly-histor,) Josephus, and others, of the Poma Sodoma, allowance being made for their extravagant exage-
ratings, as to leave little doubt on the subject.

Seezeen's account is partly confirmed by the lamented Bürckhardt. He says, "The tree Aneyr is very common in the Ghob. It bears a fruit of a reddish yellow color, about three inches in diameter, which contains a white substance, resembling the finest silk. The Arabs collect the silk, and twist it into matches for their fire-locks, preferring it to the common match because it ignites more readily.
More than twenty camel loads might be produced annually." p. 392.

The same plant is also to be seen on the sandy borders of the Nile, above the first cataracts, the only vegetable production of that barren tract. It is about three feet in height, and the fruit exactly answering the above description. It is there called Oreum. The downy substance found within the test is of too short staple probably for any manufacture, for which its silky delicate texture and clear whiteness might otherwise be suitable. It is used to stuff pillows, and similar articles.

[Chateaubriand supposes the apples of Sodom to be the fruit of a shrub which grows two or three leaves from the mouth of the Jordan; it is thorny, with small taper leaves, and its fruit is exactly like the small Egyptian lemon in size and color. Before the fruit is ripe, it is filled with a corrosive and acrid
juice; when dried, it yields a blackish seed, which may be compared to ashes, and which in taste resembles bitter pepper.—Mr. King found the same shrub and fruit near Jericho, and seems also inclined to regard it as the apple of Sodom. Miss.
Herald for 1894, p. 90, Mod. Traveller, i. p. 306.

Most probably, however, the whole story in Tacitus and Josephus is a fable, which sprung up in connection with the singular and marvellous character of this region and its history. The whole account of the Dead sea in Tacitus is of a similar kind. Even to the present day a like fable is current among the Arabs who dwell in the vicinity.
Burckhardt says, "They speak of the spurious pomegranate-tree, producing the fruit precisely like that of the pomegranate, but which, on being opened, is found to contain nothing but a dusty powder.
They, this pretend, is the Sodom apple-tree; other persons, however, deny its existence." p. 392.

APRIES, king of Egypt, called Pharaoh-Hophrah, in the sacred writings, (Jer. xlv. 30.) was son of Psammit, and grandson of Nechos, or Necho, who fought Josiah king of the Jews. He reigned twenty-five years, and was long considered as one of the happiest princes in the world; but having acquired a fletch, with design to reduce the Cyrenians, he lost almost his whole army in the expedition. The Egyptians, exasperated at the occurrence, rebelled,
and proclaimed Amasis, one of his chief officers,
king. Amasis captured him, and kept him prisoner,
and he was afterwards strangled by the people.
Such was the end of Apries, according to Herodotus. (ii. c. 161, 162, 163.)

This prince had made a league with Zedekiah, and promised him assistance; (Ezek. xvii. 15.)
whereupon Zedekiah, relying on his forces, revolted from Nebuchadnezzar, A. M. 3414, ante A. D. 580.
Early in the year following, the Babylonians mar-nched into Judea, but as other nations of Syria had likewise shaken off their obedience, he first reduced them to their duty; and, towards the end of the year, he besieged Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxv. 5; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17; Jer. xxxix. 1; lii. 4. Zedekiah defended himself long and obstinately, in order to give time to Hophrah, or Apries, to come to his assistance. Apries advanced, with a powerful army, and the king of Babylon raised the siege, to meet him; but, not daring to hazard a battle against the Chaldeans, the Egyptian retreated, and abandoned Zedekiah. Jeremiah threatened Apries with being delivered into the hands of his enemies, as he had delivered Zedekiah into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar; and Ezekiel (ch. xxix.) reproaches him severely with his baseness; threatening, since Egypt
had been a "staff of reed to the house of Israel,
and an occasion of falling," itself should be reduced to a solitude; that God would send the sword upon it, which should destroy man and beast. This was afterwards accomplished, first, in the person of Apries as above stated; secondly, in the conquest of Egypt, by the Persians. Comp. Greppi's Essay on the Hieroglyphic System, p. 129.

AQUILA, a native of Pontus, in Asia Minor,
who, with his wife Priscilla, (Acts xvii. 2.) entertained Paul at Corinth, whither they had been driven by the edict of the emperor Claudius, which banished all Jews from Rome. (Sueton. Claud. c. 25.) Paul afterwards quitted Aquila's house, and lodged with Justus, near the Jewish synagogue, at Corinth, per-ARABIA was a convert from Judaism, as Justus was a convert from paganism; and in the account the Gentiles were added, with more liberty. When the Apostle left Corinna and Priscilla accompanied him to Achaia, whereas he left them to edify the church by exhortations and example, while he went to Jerusalem. The latter rendered him very great services to this city, and even exposed their own lives to preserve it, (Rom. xvi. 4)—as some think, on occasion of the tumults raised by Demetrius and his crafts- men in behalf of their goddess Diana. They had consented to Eneas when Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, (A. D. 28) in which he stimulates them with great encouragement; but they did not continue so; for they were of Epicurean again, when Paul was his Second Epistle to Timothy, (A. D. 64) chap. ii. 19. Why because of them afterwards is not known.

All, Apollonius, Aziz of Moab, of Zabath-Maas, named which signify the same city, the capital of the territory of the Moabites, on the south of the river Arnon. Eusebius remarks, that the chief of these people, probably Moabites, was called Aziz. Epiphanius says, that a small tract of land, adjoining to Mesha, Aroer, and the country of the Nabataeans, is called Arabea. Leviticus xvii. 11, calls it "the city of the tribe of Reuben," and Kedeshreaph, or Kadeshreaph. Jerome says, the city was destroyed by an earthquake, when he was young. Barakkaros found a place still called Rabba, about 50 miles south of the Arnon, with ruins about a mile and a half in circuit; doubtless the site of the ancient Rabba. (p. 327, or p. 546 Germ. ed.) was not attacked by Israel, from respect to the memory of Lot; to whose posterity God had assigned it, Deut. ii. 9.

ARAB, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 59.
ARABAH, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 29.
ARABIA, or a considerable country of Western Asia, lying south and south-east of Judea. It extends 1000 miles from north to south, and 1200 from east to west. On the north it is bounded by part of Syria, on the east by the Persian gulf and the Eu- phrates, on the south by the Arabian sea and the straits of Babelmandel, and on the west by the Red sea, c. c. Arabia is distinguished by geographers into three parts, Arabia Deserta—Petra—Petra, and—Felix. Arabia Deserta has the mountains of Jordan west, and the river Euphrates east; it comprehends the country of the Huracans, the Edomites, the Nabathaeans, the people of Kedar, and others, who lead a wandering life, having no cities, houses, or fixed habita- tions; but wholly dwelling in tents; in modern Arabic, such are called Bedouins. This country seems to be generally described in Scripture by the word "Arab," which signifies, properly, in Hebrew, the west. They may have taken the name of Arabim, or Araba, from their situation, being west of the river Euphrates; and if so, their name Arab is prior to the settlement of Israel in Canaan. In Eusebius, and authors of that and the following ages, the country and the greater part of the cities beyond Jordan, and of what they call the Third Palestine, are con- sidered as parts of Arabia.

ARABIA PETRAE LIES south of the Holy Land, and had Petra for its capital. This region contained the southern Edomites, the Amalekites, the Cushites, (improperly called Ethiopian, by our translators, and others, as Scipio the elder, and other writers, the Mo- canites, or Macamites, c. c. people at present known under the general name of Arabian. But it is of consequence to notice the ancient inhabitants of this district, as the names are mentioned in the text of Scripture. In this country was Kadesh-barnah, Gerar, Beer-sheba, Lachish, Libnah, Paran, Arad, Hazez, Oboth, Pharon, Doden, Zogar, &c. also mount Sinai, where the law was given to Moses.

ARABIA FELIX lay still further south; being bounded east by the Persian gulf; south by the oceans, between Africa and India; and west by the Red sea. As this region did not immediately adjoin the Holy Land, it is not so frequently mentioned as the former ones. It is thought, that the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, (I Kings x. 1) was queen of part of Arabia Felix. This country abounded with riches, and particularly with spices; and is now called Hid- jaz. It is much celebrated, by reason of the cities of Mecca and Medina being situated in it.

Arabia is generally stony, rocky, and mountainous; principally in the parts remote from the sea. In the course of ages, a vast plain has been interposed between the mountains, now in the midst of the country, and the sea, which has gradually retired from them. This is now the most fruitful end best cultivat- ed part, but it is also the hottest; for up in the mountains the air is much cooler than below in the plains. The plain is called Yehama; or "the Levels."

The inhabitants of Arabia, who dwelt there before Abraham came into Canaan, are supposed to have descended from Ham. We find there Midianites, of the race of Cush, among whom Moses resided. Abde- silch, king of Geshur, is known by the time of David; and the Amalekites, in the time of Moses. The Hivites, the Amorites, the Kenites, and the Moabites, augmented a good way into Arabia Petraea; the Horites occupied the mountains which lie south of the land of Canaan, and east of the Dead sea. The Esphahans, Edinith, Zuzithan, and Zaurem, (Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 10, 11) inhabited the country called afterwards Arabia Deserta, and which was subsequently peopled by the Ammonites, Moab- ites, and Edomites.

The Arabs derive their remotest origin from the patriarch Heber, whom they called Houd, and who, at the distance of four generations, was the father of Abraham. He settled, they say, in the southern parts of Arabia, and died there about 1817 years before A. D. His son Job, named by the Arabs Kathan, or Kathan, being the father of a numerous family, became, also, the first sovereign of the country; his pos- terity peopled the peninsula, and from him many tribes of Arabs boast their descent. These are called pure or unmixed Arabs. They say, too, of Abraham, that the name Arabia is derived from Jaraab, one of his sons.

See JORDAN.

The Arabs of the second race derive their descent from Ishmael, son of Abraham and Hagar, who came and settled among the former tribes. Of his poster- ity, some applied themselves to traffic and husbandry; but the far greater part kept to the deserts, and travelled from place to place, like the modern Bedouins. It is probable that a third description of Arabs might arise from the tribes of Asia, as Keturah, as they would naturally associate more or less with their brethren the Ishmaelites. Other oc- casional accessions of a like nature might augment the migratory population. The present Rgouins are fond of tracing their descent from Ishmael, and consider themselves, therefore, the faithful followers of Abraham, to Hagar, of a numerous posterity to issue from her.

son. Their character, too, agrees with that of their alleged progenitor; for there is no man against every man; and there is no hand is against them. Their dispositions lead them to the exercise of arms, and warlike habits; to the tending of flocks; and to the keen examination of the tracts and passages of their country, in hopes of meeting with booty. They despise the arts of civilization and social life; nor will they intermarry with settled tribes, nor with the Turks, nor with the Moors, lest they should degrade the dignity of their pedigree. Their families are now dispersed over Syria, Mesopotamia, Palestine, Egypt, and great part of Africa, beside their original country, the Arabs. They have, indeed, but few kingdoms in which they possess absolute power, but they are governed by (princes) emirs, and by (elders) sheikhs; and though now no where composing an empire, yet in the whole they are a prodigious multitude of men—an undeniable fulfillment (in conjunction with the Jews) of the promise made to Abraham, that his posterity should be innumerable, as the stars in heaven, or as the sand of the sea.

To us, who inhabit towns, and have fixed residences, the wandering and migratory lives of the patriarchs have a peculiar, and somewhat strange, appearance; but among the Arabs, that very kind of life is customary and this day. In Egypt, "The Bedouin Arabs are distributed into tribes, companies, each with a chief, whom they call sheik; they dwell always under tents, and each platoon forms a little camp. As they have no land belonging to them, they change their abode as often as they please. When they fix themselves anywhere, for a certain time, they make an agreement with the Beys, the Cachett, or the Caimanek, and purchase, for a whole year, the permission of cultivating a certain portion of land, or of feeding their flocks there, during the time they agree for. They continue there, then, very peaceably, go forwards and backwards into the villages, or neighboring towns, sell and purchase what they please, and enjoy all the liberty they can desire." But they often establish themselves on the land they occupy, separating from the jurisdiction of the government the land they have seized on, and taking possession of it, without paying the tax. This is a loss for the government, which is, by this means, deprived of the revenue of those lands. (Norden's Travels in Egypt, p. 6.) This may remind us of the mode of life of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: and so we find Abimelech jealous of Isaac's greatness. Go from us, thou art much mightier than we; and if we let thee stay a little longer, thou wilt seize the land as thy property, and we shall forfeit the revenue of it."—They go into the villages or neighboring towns; so "Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land: (Gen. xxxv. 6.) "Ye shall not build a house, but dwell in tents all your days." Nevertheless, they fled for shelter, from the army of the Chaldeans, to Jerusalem; though even there, no doubt, they continued to abide in their tents; and this singularity distinguished them, not to the prophet only, but to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Col. Capper, in his "Observations on the Passage to India," (1775) thus describes an Arab encampment.— From this hill, we could plainly perceive, at the distance of about three miles, an immense body of Arabs, which, as they had their families and flocks with them, looked like an encampment of the patriarchs: they first sent out a detachment of about four thousand men in the front, finding we were drawn up to receive them, five men only advanced from the main body, seemingly with an intention to treat: on seeing which, we also sent five of our people on foot to meet them. A short conference ensued; and then both parties were received with great ceremony by our sheik: they proved to be Bedouins, under the command of sheik Fadil, amounting together to nearly twenty thousand, including women and children. After much negotiation, our sheik agreed to pay a tribute of one chequin for every camel carrying merchandise; but he refused to pay for those carrying tents, baggage, or provisions,—they promised to send a refeth [a protecting companion of their own party] with us, till we were past all danger; being molested by any of their detached parties," (p. 63.) This extract may give us some idea of the Israelites' encampment in the wilderness, under Moses. Here we find 30,000 persons, women and children included. How heavy was the burden of Babylon! (Isaiah xiii. 20.) "It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in, from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make a fold there:"—wander where they will, they keep aloof from Babylon. To the Bedouins, the Middle East speaks Nebiullah:—Their way of living is nearly the same as that of the other wandering Arabs, of the Kurds, and of the Turcomans. They lodge in tents made of coarse stuff, either black, or striped black and white; which is manufactured by the women, goats' hair. The tent consists of three apartments, of which one is for the men, another for the women, and the third for the cattle. Those who are too poor to have a tent, contrive, however, to shelter themselves from the inclemencies of the weather, either with a piece of cloth stretched upon poles, or by retiring to the cavities of the rocks. As the shade of trees is exceedingly agreeable in such torrid regions, the Bedouins are at great pains in seeking out shaded situations to encamp in." (Travels, vol. i. p. 208.) "I am black, but comely," says the spouse; (Cant. I. 5.) black, as the tents of Kedar, comely, as the tent-curtaains of Solomon. It should be remembered, however, that those who are able, have distinct tents, not manufactured by the women, of goats' hair. The tent consists of three apartments, of which one is for the men, another for the women, and the third for the cattle. See Tents.

The pure and ancient Arabians were divided into tribes, as well as the sons of Ishmael. Some of these tribes still exist in Arabia, others are lost and extinct. This is determined according to the number of the sons of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 13, 14.) viz. Nebajoth, Kedar, Abidiel, Mibshan, Mishma, Dumah, Maslah, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah; but although these people very carefully preserve their genealogy, yet they cannot trace it up to Ishmael; they are obliged to stop at Adnan, one of his descendants; the genealogy even of Mahomet rises no higher. Besides the descendants of Ishmael, who populated the greater part of Arabia, the sons of Abraham and Haman, the sons of Esau, of Nahor, and others, dwelt in the same country, and mixed with, or drove out, the old inhabitants.

The inhabitants of Arabia are divided into those who dwell in cities, and those who live in the field and desert: the latter abide continually in tents, and are much more honest and simple than the Arabians who live in towns. Of these some are Gentiles, others Mussulmans; the former preceded Mahomet, and are now called among them "Arabians of the Days of Ignorance," the others, who have received the doctrines preached by Mahomet, are called Moslemoun, or Mussulmans, that is, believers; and are the people who conquered, and who still possess, great part of Asia and Africa; and who founded the four great monarchies of the Turks, the Persians, Morocc'a, and Mogul; not to mention lesser kingdoms.

The ancient Arabians were idolaters; worshipping a stone, says Clemens Alexandrinus. Maximus Tyrius and the modern Arabians accuse them of the same. The black stone, which has the reputation of having been "from time immemorial" the object of their worship, is still to be seen in the Caaba at Mecca. They say this stone was originally white, but has lost its whiteness, on account of the sins of mankind. Herodotus says they had only two deities—Bacchus and Venus. Strabo tells us that they adored only Jupiter and Bacchus; which Alexander the Great being informed of, resolved to subdue them, that he might oblige them to worship him as their third deity. The modern Arabians mention other names of ancient deities adored in Arabia; as Lakiah, whom they invoked for rain; Hafedah, for preservation from serious accidents in journeys; Ruzara, for the long life of man; and Zend, which is the diminutive of Allah, the true name of God; Azza or Uza, from Azza, which signifies the Mighty God; Menat, from Menat, distributor of favors. It is very probable that they adored likewise the two golden antelopes, which are frequently mentioned in their histories, and which were consecrated in the temple at Mecca. The ancient Midianites, among whom Moses retired when he was received by Jethro, worshipped Abba and Hinda. (D’Herbejoi, p. 476.) Urokat, mentioned by Herodotus, denotes probably the sun; and Alia, the moon. The first of these words may signify the God of Light; the second, the God, or Goddess, eminently.

The Arabs glory in the fertility of their language, which, certainly, is one of the most ancient in the world; and is remarkable for its copiousness and the multitude of words which express the same thing. We read in Pococke’s Note on Abulpharagius, that Ibn Chalifawei composed a book on the names of the lion, which amounted to 500; and those of the sea to 800. Honey is said to have 80 names; and a sword 1000. The greater part of these names, however, are poetical epithets; just as we say the Almighty for God. So in Arabic, the lion is the strong, the terrible, &c. Some specimens of their poetry are given by the Arab genealogist Soliman. The present Arabic characters are modern. The ancient writing of Arabia was without vowels, like the Hebrew; and so is also the modern Arabic, except in the Koran and other specimens of exact chirography. The Arabs studied astronomy, astrology, divination, &c. They suffer no likeness of animated nature on their coins. See Oriental Languages.

A history of Arabia is that of human nature in its earliest stages of association, and with as little change of manners from generation to generation as may be.

"If any people in the world," says Niebuhr, "afford in their history an instance of high antiquity and of great simplicity of manners, the Arabs surely do. Coming among them, one can hardly help fancying one’s self suddenly turned to bed by a genie which immediately succeeded the flood. We are tempted to imagine ourselves among the old patriarchs, with whose adventures we have been so much amused in our infant days. The language, which has been spoken from time immemorial, and which so nearly resembles that which we have been accustomed to regard as of the most distant antiquity, completes the illusion which the simplicity of manners began." (Travels, vol. ii. p. 2.) "All that is known concerning the earliest period of the history of this country, is, that it was governed in those days by potent monarchs called Tobba. This is thought to have been a title common to all those princes, as the name Pharaoh was to the ancient sovereigns of Egypt." (Ibid. p. 10.) The country which this nation inhabits affords many objects of curiosity, equally singular and interesting. Intersected by sandy deserts, and vast ranges of mountains, it presents on one side nothing but those features in its rugged form, while the other is adorned with all the beauties of the most fertile regions. Such is its position, that it enjoys, at once, all the advantages of salubrity and of temperate climates. The peculiar productions of regions the most distant from one another, are produced here in equal perfection. Having never been conquered, Arabia has scarcely known any changes, but those effected by the hand of nature; it bears none of the impressions of human fury which appear in many other places." "The natural and local circumstances of Arabia are favorable to that spirit of independence which distinguishes its inhabitants from other nations. Their deserts and mountains have always secured them from the encroachments of their neighbors. The country has indeed been subdued, but their servitude has been only temporary; and the only foreign powers to whose arms they have yielded, have been those bordering on the two gulfs between which this country lies." (Ibid. p. 98.) "The most ancient and powerful tribes of these people are those which easily retire into the desert when attacked by a foreign enemy." (Ibid. p. 168.) "The Bedouins, who live in tents in the desert, have never been subdued by any conqueror; but such of them as have been encircled, by the prospect of an easier way of life, to settle near towns, and in fertile provinces, are now, in some measure, dependent on the sovereigns of those provinces. Such are the Arabs in the different parts of the Ottoman empire. Some of them pay a rent or tribute for the towns or pastures which they occupy. Others frequent the banks of the Euphrates, only in one season of the year; and in winter return to the desert. These last acknowledge no dependence on the Porte." (Ibid. p. 164.) "Of all nations the Arab is the most cosmopolitan, the traveler of the world, and in all their wanderings they have, better than any other nation, preserved their language, manners, and peculiar customs. From east to west, from the banks of the Senegal to the Indus, are colonies of the Arabs to be met with; and between north and south, they are scattered from the Euphrates to the island of Madagascar. The Tartar hordes have not occupied so wide an extent of the globe."

The Arabians in general are cunning, witty, generous, and ingenious; lovers of eloquence and poetry; but superstitious, vindictive, sanguinary, and given to robbery, (that is, of those not under the protection of some of their own people,) which they think allowable, because Abraham, the father of Ismael, say they, gave his son nothing. Gen. xiv. 16.

The Arabs have various traditions among them of Scripture personages and events. They relate ad ventures of Abraham their progenitor, of Moses, of Jethro, of Solomon, and others. They have seen originate in their country those modes of religion to which a great portion of mankind adhere: the Jewish, the Christian, and the Mahometan. We have no complete list of their kings, nor history of their country; but some few fixed periods have been discovered by the learned, of which the mention of a part may be acceptable. A complete history would throw great light on Scripture; and notwithstanding the broken and divided nature of its subject, in relation to various governments, yet the general picture of life and manners which it would exhibit, could not fail of being both interesting and instructive.

Ante A. D. 1817. Jocyan, son of Heber. He was succeeded by his son, his grandson, and his great-grandson.

Kabir-Houd—the tomb of Heber—is said to be extant, at the extremity of a district named Seger, situated between Hadramaut and Marah.

1898. Hamyar, son of Abd-al-rahman; whose family possessed the sovereignty 5200 years; but not without intervals of privation.

1453. AFRIKI, contemporary with Joshua. The Arab writers say that he granted a asylum to a tribe of Canaanites expelled by Joshua.

960. Balkis, the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon.

—Malek, brother of Balkis; who lost an army in the moving sands of the desert.

—Ahram, son of the Hamyart family.

—Ali al-Arab, of the Hamyart family.

—Dhou'marschan, his son. In his reign a prodigious inundation, from a collection of waters, overwhelmed the city of Saba, the capital of Yemen, and destroyed the adjacent country.

A. D. 456. Dhou'na'ova, deprived of his dominions by the Ethiopians, threw himself into the sea.

502. The Hamyarties cease to reign in Arabia, which is now governed by Ethiopian viceroys.

569. Mahomet born: he invents and propages a new religion, which he spreads by conquest. In A. D. 622, he flies from Mecca to Medina, July 16th, which constitutes the commencement of the Hijirgra, or Mahometan era.

The successors of Mahomet removed the seat of empire into Syria, and afterwards to Baghdad; where it continued till the taking of that city by the Tartar Houlogan, in the fourteenth century.

The customs of the Arabians are allied in many respects to that which we find in Holy Writ; and are greatly illustrative of them; many being, indeed, the very same, retained to this day. Their personal and domestic maxims, their local and political proceedings, are the same now as heretofore; and the general character anciently attributed to them, of being plunderers, yet hospitable; greedy, deceitful, and vindictive, yet generous, trust-worthy, and honorable; is precisely the description of their nation at present. The Scripture frequently mentions the Arabians (meaning those adjoining Judea) as a powerful people, who valued themselves on their wisdom. Their riches consisted principally in flocks and cattle; they paid king Jehoshaphat an annual tribute of 2700 sheep, and as many goats, 2 Chron. xxvi. 11. The kings of Arabia furnished Solomon with a great quantity of gold and silver, 2 Chron. ix. 14. They loved war, but made it rather like thieves and plunderers, than like soldiers. They lived at liberty in the field, or the desert, concerned themselves little about cultivating the earth, and were not very obedient to established governments. This is the idea which Scripture gives of them; (Isa. xiii. 20.) and the same is their character at this day.

There are many other particulars in which this people appear to resemble their collateral relations, the Jews; and probably the worship of the one God was long preserved among them—to the time of Jethro, at least; but the prevalence of Mahometanism has given a certain character to them, which renders them almost obdurate against the gospel. The true Arabians are not so intolerant as the Turks, and should be carefully distinguished not only from the Turks, the Saracens, and the Moors, but also among the Arabes themselves, because the proportion of vices and virtues which characterize them, differs among the tribes, no less than among individuals.

Since the propagation of the gospel, many Arabians have embraced Christianity; and we know of some bishops and martyrs of Arabia. In Origen's time a council was held here against certain heretics. The Mahometans acknowledge, that before Mahomet there were three tribes in this country which professed Christianity; those of Thonouk, Ba-hora, and Naclab. That of Thonouk, having had some difference with their neighbors on the subject of religion, retired to the province of Baharin, on the Persian gulf.

[There are three etymologies usually given of the name Arabia; one of which is mentioned under ARABIA DESERTA, above; the second is also mentioned above, viz. that it was from Jarab, the son of Joktan or Kathan; the third is sanctioned by Rosenmueller, viz. that the Heb. נucson has the same meaning as the feminine נטנ, i.e. a pinnax, a desert.]

The ancient Hebrews gave to all the countries afterwards comprehended under the name Arabia, the general appellation of the East, and calls the inhabitants children of the East, Gen. xxvii. 6 Judg. vi. 3; Job i. 3, 5c. The name Arak and Arabia was originally applied by the Hebrews only to a small portion of the vast territory now known by that title. In Ezek. xxvii, 21, among several Arabian provinces which traded with Tyre, Arak (Arabia) and the princes of Kedar are mentioned compare also Jer. xxx. 19; Jer. xvi. 16; and all the kings of Arabia, mentioned 1 Kings x. 15, Jer. xxiv. 24, are doubtless to be understood chief or Arab nomadic tribes or Bedouins. The Arabian spoken in Is. xiii. 20, Jer. iii. 2, are in like manner Bedouins, who wander in the desert and dwell in tents. When the apostle Paul says, (Gal. i. 17.) that he went into Arabia and returned again to Damascus, he means, without doubt, the northern part of Arabia Deserta, which lay adjacent to the territory of Damascus. He uses the name in a wider sense, when he remarks, (Gal. iv. 25.) the mount Sinai lies in Arabia.

For full and particular accounts of Arabia and its inhabitants, see Niebuhr's Travels; Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, Lond. 1829; Rosenmueller's Bibl. Geogr. vol. iii.; and also the Modern Travellers in Arabia, which contains a very good account of the history and geography of Arabia, and especially of the peninsula of mount Sinai, compiled from various authors.]

ARACAEANS, or ARKITES, a people descended from Arak, son of Canaan, who dwelt in the city Arce, or Arc, at the foot of mount Libanus. Josephus and Ptolemy both speak of this city. Antoninus's Ethne ARY places it between Tripolis and Antardus; and Josephus places it between the cities of Asnyr, Antardus, and Anteby. Now, if it be true, as the inhabitants of Arce submitted to the Assyrians, together with those of Sidon and the ancient Tyre. He says, also, that the river Sabbbiea empleys itself into the Mediterranean, between Arce and Ebersope. This is probably the Arax, said to be the river of Athar, and otherwise called Antipas. (Ami'k. book v. chap.
1.) In Solomon's time, Beraiah was superintendent of the tribe of Asker, according to the Hebrew; (1 Kings iv. 18.) but Josephus says, he was governor of the country around the city of Arce, which lies on the sea. In the later times of the Jewish commo-wealth, this city was part of Agrippa's kingdom.

See Rosenm. Bibl. Geog. II. l. 10.

ARAD, ARADA, ARAT, ARABA, or ARABA, a city south of the tribes of Judah and the land of Canaan, in Arabia Petrea. The Israelites having advanced towards Canaan, the king of Arad opposed their passage, defeated them, and took a booty from them. But they devoted his country as accursed, and destroyed all its cities, when they became masters of the land of Canaan, Num. xxv. 1. Arad was rebuilt; and Eusebius places it in the neighborhood of Kadesh, four miles from Maleth, and twenty from Heshbon. In the Bible, ARAD, DOW RAZAN, a city and island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Phoenicia, over against Antardus. The island of Ardus is but seven furlongs, or 875 paces about, and is 500 paces distant from the continent. The Ardians, or Arkites, inhabitants of Canaan, dwelt at Aradus, Gen. x. 17. This country was promised to the Israelites; but they did not possess it until, perhaps, the reign of David, or that of Solomon.

I. ARAM, the fifth son of Shem, (Gen. x. 22.) was the father of the people of Syrians, who, from him, are called Arameans. (See Syriva.) Homer and Herodot
call those Arameans, whom the more modern Greeks call Syrivas. The prophet Amos (ix. 7.) seems to say, that the first Arameans dwelt in the country of Kir, in Eberia, where the river Cirus runs; and that God brought them thence, as he did the He-brs out of Egypt: but at what time this happened is not known. Moses always calls the Syrians, and inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Aramites. The Ar-means often warred against the Hebrews; but David subdued them, and obliged them to pay him tribute.
Solomon preserved the same authority; but,
after the separation of the ten tribes, it does not appear that the Syrians were generally subject to the kings of Israel; unless, perhaps, under Jeroboam II, who restored the kingdom of Israel to its ancient boundaries, 2 Kings xiv. 33. For the Aramian language or dialect, see Orien'tal Languages.

II. ARAM. There are several countries of this name mentioned in Scripture;—Aram Naharah, or Syria of the Two Rivers, that is, of Mesopotamia; Aram of Damascus; Aram of Soba; Aram of Beth-roboc; and Aram of Maachach. See SYRIAN.

ARARAT, a country and mountain in Armenia, on which the ark is said to have rested, after the deluge, Gen. vii. 4. It has been affirmed, that there are still remains of Noah's ark on the top of this mountain; but M. de Tournfort, who visited the spot, assures us that there was nothing like it; that the top of the mountain is inaccessible, both by reason of the height of it, which now completely covers it. Ararat is twelve leagues from Erivan, east, and is situated in a vast plain, in the midst of which it rises. The Eastern people call mount Ararat, Ar-day, or Parast-day, the finger mountain, because the ark stopped here. It is, as it were, taken off from the other mountains of Armenia, which form a long chain; from the top to the middle, it is often covered with snow three or four months of the year. He adds, that the city of Nal-givan, or Nakchivan, three leagues from mount Ararat, is the most ancient in the world; that Noah settled here, when he quitted the ark; that the word Nacht-scheem is derived from Nacht, which signifies sleep, and scheem, stopped or settled, in memory of the ark's resting on mount Ararat.

The Armenians maintain, by tradition, that, since Noah, no one has been able to climb this mountain, because it is perpetually covered with snow, which never melts, unless to make room for other snows, newly fallen; that Noah, when he left the ark, setted at Erivan, twelve leagues from Ararat, and that at a league from this city, in a very happy aspect, that patriarch planted the vine in a place which at present yields excellent wine. Mr. Morier describes Ararat as being the most beautiful mountain, and highest awful in height; and Sir Robert Ker Porter has furnished the following graphic picture of this stupen-daous work of nature:—"As the vale opened beneath us, in our descent, my whole attention became absorbed in the view before me. A vast plain people with countless villages; the towers and spires of the churches of Erchel-eseen arising from amidst them; the glittering waters of the Araxes flowing through the fresh green of the vale; and the sub-ordinary range of mountains skirting the base of the awful monument of the antediluvian world, seemed to stand a stupendous link in the history of man, uniting the two races of men before and after the flood. But it was not until we had arrived upon the flat plain that I beheld Ararat in all its amplitude of grandeur. From the spot on which I stood,

it appeared as if the highest mountains of the world
had been piled upon each other, to form this one sublime immensity of earth, and rock, and snow.
The icy peaks of its double heads rose majestically into the clear and cloudless heavens; the sun blazed bright upon them, and the reflection sent forth a dazzling radiance equal to other suns. This point of the view united the utmost grandeur of plain and height, but the feelings I experienced while looking on the mountain are hardly to be described. My eyes, not able to rest for any length of time on the blinding glory of its summits, wandered down the apparently interminable sides, till I could no longer
trace their vast lines in the mist of the horizon;
when an inexorable impulse, immediately carrying my eye upwards again, refixed my gaze on the awful glare of Ararat; and this bewildered sensibility of sight being answered by a similar feeling in the mind, for some moments I was lost in a strange suspension of the powers of thought and sensation.

Of the two separate peaks, called Little and Great Ararat, which are separated by a chasm about seven miles in width, Sir Robert Porter thus speaks:—
"These inaccessible summits have never been trod on by any human foot; and, although I am not even then, for my idea is that the ark rested in the space between these heads, and not on the top of either. Various attempts have been made in different ages to ascend these tremendous mountain pyramids, but in vain; their form, snows, and glaciers are insurmountable obstacles, insuperable. The ascent being so great from the commencement of the icy regions to the highest points, cold alone would be the destruction of any person who should have the hardihood to persevere. On viewing near by Ararat from the northern side of the plain, its two heads are separated by a wide cleft, or rather glen, in the body of the mountain. The rocky side of the greater head runs almost perpendicularly down to the north-east, while the lesser head rises from the sloping bottom of the cleft, in a perfectly conical shape. Both heads are covered with snow. The form of the greater is similar to the less, only broader and rounder at the top, and shows to the north-west a broken and abrupt front, opening about half way down into a steep and narrow basin, deep, rocky, and peculiarly black. At that part of the mountain, the hollow of the chasm receives an interruption from the projection of the minor mountains, which start from the side of Ararat, like branches from the root of a tree, and along in its depression, till lost in the distant vaper of the plain.

The following interesting and graphic account, both of the province and mountain of Ararat, is from the pen of the Rev. E. Smith, American missionary to Persia, whoascertained and obtained copies in Persia and Armenia, in 1830 and 1831. It was written from Tebriz in Persia, under date of Feb. 18th, 1831, and is here extracted from the Biblical Repository, vol. ii, p. 201.

"The name of Ararat occurs but twice in the Old Testament, Gen. vii. 4, and Jerem. li. 27; and both times as the name of a country, which in the last passage is said to have a king. It is well known, that this was the name of one of the fifteen provinces of Armenia. It was situated nearly in the centre of the kingdom; was very extensive, reaching from a point above seven or eight miles east of the modern Erzroom, to within thirty or forty miles of Nakhchewan; yet so near to none in fertility, being watered from one extremity to the other by the Araxes, which divided it into two nearly equal parts; and contained some eight or ten cities, which were successively the residences of the kings, princes, or governors of Armenia, from the commencement of its political existence about 2000 years B.C. According to Armenian tradition, until the extinction of the Papagian dynasty, about the middle of the 11th century; with the exception of about 230 years at the commencement of the Armenian dynasty, when Niassus and Orfa were the capitals. It is therefore not unnatural that this name should be substituted for that of the whole kingdom, and thus become known to foreign nations, and that the king of Armenia should be called the king of Ararat. This province we have seen almost in its whole extent, first entering it at the western and then at its eastern extremity.

On the last occasion we passed very near the base of that noble mountain, which is called by the Armenians, Masht and by Europeans generally Ararat; and for more than twenty days had it constantly in sight, except when obscured by clouds. It consists of two peaks, one considerably higher than the other, and is connected with a chain of mountains running off to the northward and west, which, though high, are not of sufficient elevation to attract all from the lonely dignity of this stupendous mass. From Nakhchewan, at the distance of at least 100 miles to the south-east, it appeared like an immense isolated cone, of extreme regularity, rising out of the valley of the Araxes. Its height is said to be 10,000 feet, but I do not know by whom the measurement was taken. The eternal snows upon its summit occasionally form vast avalanches, which precipitate themselves down its sides with a sound not unlike that of an earthquake. When I saw it, it was white to its very base with snow. And certainly not among the mountains of Ararat or of Armenia generally, nor those of any part of the world where I have been, have I ever seen one whose majesty could plead half so powerfully its claims to the honor of having once been the stepping stone between the old world and the new. I gave myself up to the feeling, that on its summit were once congregated all the inhabitants of the earth, and that, while in the valley of the Araxes, I was paying a visit to the second cradle of the human race. Nor can I allow my opinion to be at all shaken by the Chaldean paraphrases, the Syrian translators and commentators, and the traditions of the whole family of Syrian churches, which translate the passage in question mountains of the Kur'd. The Sepherim and Josephus, who support the Hebrew original, certainly speak the language of a tradition quite as ancient. Not to urge the names of places around mount Masis in favor of its claims, as I think in the case of Nakhchewan more has been done with some of these names, there is one passage of Scripture of some importance, which I do not recollect to have ever seen applied to elucidate this subject. In Gen. ii. 2, where the movement of the descendants of Noah are first alluded to, it is said that they journeyed from the east and came into the land of Shinar. Now, had the ark rested upon the mountains of Kurdistan, they would naturally have issued at once into Mesopotamia, and have made their way down to Babylon from the north; nor would they have been obliged to go so far to find a plain. But in migrating from the valley of the Araxes, they would of course keep on the eastern side of the Median mountains until they almost reached the parallel of Babylon, before they would find a convenient place for crossing them. Such is now the daily route of caravans going from Tebriz to Bagdad. They go south as far as Kermanshah, and then, making almost a right angle, take a western direction to Bagdad; thus making their journey from north to south as little as it would be, were they to take the more mountainous and difficult road by Soleymania. It has been objected to this location of mount Ararat, that there are now no olive trees near enough for Noah's dove to have plucked her leaf from; and perhaps this opinion gave rise to the tradition in favor of the Kurdish mountains, which are so near to the warm regions of Mesopotamia. In fact, there are no olive trees in the valley of the Araxes, nor of the Cyrus, nor in any part of Armenia we have seen, nor yet, as we have been told, on the shores of the Caspian. They are to be found no nearer than some of the warm valleys of the province of Akhalkalikhi and the basin of the ancient Colchis. We mentioned this objection in a circle of learned men, and they said, 'It is a mistake. They shrewdly replied by asking, if it would be very hard work for a pigeon to fly to Akhalkalikhi and back again. Their explanation was in fact satisfactory. The distance, in the direction of the valley of the Araxes, run almost straight line must be less; a distance which, according to some recent experiments made upon the flight of carrier pigeons between London and Antwerp, might be only passed over twice in a day by that bird."—R.
ARAUH, or ORAH, an ancient inhabitant of Jerusalem, whose threshing-floor was on mount Moriah, where the temple was afterwards built, 2 Sam. xxviii. 17; 1 Chron. xxii. 15. See JERUSALEM.
ARBA, otherwise HEBRON, (Josh. xiv. 15.) was first possessed by giants of the race of Anak; afterwards given to the tribe of Judah, and the property of it transferred to Caleb. The rabbinists have a tradition that Hebron was called Arba, that is, four, because the four most illustrious patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were buried there; or, as others say, because four of the most celebrated matrons of antiquity were interred there, viz. Evi, Sarah, Rebecca, and Leah: but there is no accounting for these rabbinistical traditions. See HEBRON.
ARBATTIS, a city of Galilee, taken and destroyed by Simon Maccabbeus, 1 Macc. v. 33.
ARBELA, the name of several places in Palestine. It is said (1 Macc. ix. 2) that Becchides and Alcimus came into Galilee, and encamped at Masaleth, which is in Arbela. The city Masal, or Mishael, was in the tribe of Asher, near to which was a place called Arbela, Josh. xix. 36.—Eusebius and Jerome mention a city of this name, in the great plain of Esdraelon, nine miles to the west of Nazareth, and the former writer mentions another belonging to the region of Pella. See BETH-ABEL.
ARCA, a city of Phoenicia, allotted to Asher, and situated between Arad and Tripolis. See ARACAEAN.

ARCHANGEL. See ANGEL.
I. ARCHELAUS, king of Cappadocia, father of Galphryse, wife of Alexander, son of Herod the Great. See ALEXANDER VII.
II. ARCHELAUS, son of Herod the Great, and Malace, his fifth wife. Herod having put to death his sons Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater, and expelled from his will Herod Antipas, whom he had declared king, substituted Archelaus, giving to Antipas only the title of tetrarch. (See ANTIPAS.) After the death of Herod, Archelaus was proclaimed king by the populace, and afterwards went to Rome to procure from Augustus the confirmation of his father's will. Antipas, his brother, disputed his title before the emperor, and the Jews also sent a solemn embassy to Rome, to desire Augustus to permit them to live according to their own laws, and on the footing of a Roman province; without being subject to kings of Herod's family, but only to the governors of Syria. Augustus, having heard all parties, gave to Archelaus the title, not of king, but of ethnarch, with one moiety of the territories which his father Herod had enjoyed; promising him the crown likewise, if his conduct should deserve it. Archelaus returned to Judea, and under pretense that he had countenanced the seditions against him, he deprived Joazar of the high-priesthood, and gave that dignity to his brother Eleazar. He governed Judea with so much severity, that, after seven years, the chiefs of the Samaritans and Jews accused him before Augustus; who sent for him to Rome, and after hearing his defence, banished him to Vienne in Gaul, where he died. His territory was reduced to the form of a Roman province, with seven legions, under the name of THEODOS, de Bello, ii. 6; Ant. xvii. ult. and xviii.
ARCHI, a city of Manasseh, near Bethel, Josh. xvi. 2.
ARCHIPPUS, either a teacher or deacon in the church at Colosse, of whom Paul speaks, as his fellow-soldier, Col. iv. 17; Phil. i. 24.
ARCHISYNOAGUS, or ruler of the synagogue, see SYNAGOGUE.
ARCTURUS signifies, properly, the Bear's tail, and denotes a star in the tail of the Great Bear, or constellation Ursae Major. Job is supposed to speak of Arcturus, or the Bear, under the name of Ash, (p) chap. ix. 9; xxviii. 32.
Nebiur observes, that the Arabs have no names in their language related to those Hebrew names which occur in Job ix. 9, yet some of them, he adds, call the Great Bear, Nishak, or Benat Nishak; from which the Hebrew Ash, (p) is probably a contraction; and from a conversation he held with a Jewish astrologer, at Bagdad, he is of opinion that (p) Ash, signifies the Great Bear, (Ursa Major,) which is called in Europe, by the common people, a chariot—"Charles's Wain." In the tables of Ulugh Bey, published by Hyde, the stars = γ of the Great Bear, are called el Nishak; and the stars = τ, ε of Benat Nishak. Aben Ezra says, "Ash is the wagon, which is also called the Bear, and is near to the north pole." Aben Ezra also says, "The ancients have assured us, that the seven small stars at the tail of the Ram compose the Kima," and Rabbi Isaac Israel says, in express terms, "Kima is the Arabian Thule—The Pleiades." (Descript. of Arabia, p. 114. Germ. ed.) We may therefore with great certainty conclude, that the Ash, (p) in Job, is Ursa Major, and the Kimah, = the Pleiades or seven stars; although the LXX understand Ash to be the Pleiades, and Kimah, Arcturus.
That the course of the stars influenced the seasons, in the opinion of the ancients, is well known; whence Pliny says, (lib. 2. cap. 36.) "Arcturus seldom rises without bringing hail and tempests;" and (lib. xviii. cap. 28.) "the evils which the heavens send us are of two kinds; that is to say, tempests which produce hail, storms, and other like things, which is called Pis Major, and which are caused, as I have often said, by dreadful stars, such as Arcturus, Orion, and the Kima." The ancients, however, were mistaken in this notion, for the stars only marked that time of the year when such things might naturally be expected.
AREOPAGUS, the place, or court, in which the Areopagites, the celebrated and supreme judges of Athens, assembled. It was on an eminence, formerly almost in the middle of the city; but nothing remains by which we can determine its form or construction. "Going out of the gate, which is the present entrance to the Acropolis," says Mr. Stuart, "we had just before us the Areopagus, a hill which gave name, as every one knows, to the most celebrated tribunal of Athens, built either on it, or contiguous to it. This hill is almost entirely a mass of stone; its upper surface is without any considerable irregularities, but neither so level, nor so spacious, as that of the Acropolis, and though of no great height, not easily accessible, its sides being steep and abrupt. On this hill the Amazons pitched their tents, when they invaded Attica in the time of Theseus; and in after-times, the Persians under Xerxes began from hence their attack on the Acropolis. Here we expected to find some vestiges of the tribunal—but were disappointed, for we did not discover the least remaining trace of it. Building upon this rock, on the part facing the north-east, are some natural caverns, and contiguous to them, rather the rubbing than the ruins of some considerable buildings. That nearest the Acropolis, according to tradition, was the palace of Dionysius the Areopagit.
After Christianity was established in Athens, it became a church, and was dedicated to him. Near it stood the archbishop's palace, but that is at present utterly demolished. It is not improbable, that both the church and the palace were built on the ruins of the ancient tribunal called the Areopagus.
It is said, the Areopagites pronounced sentence in the dark, that they might not be affected by the sight of the persons engaged in the prosecution. It is also said, that before any person could be elected a judge of the Areopagus, he must have discharged the office of archon, or chief magistrate of the city; but this was not attended to in later ages. However, it probably gives a character to Dionysius, who was converted by Paul. The Areopagites took cognition of murders, breakers of the peace, and immor-talities: they punished vices of all kinds—idleness included; they rewarded or assisted the virtuous; they were peculiarly attentive to blasphemies against the gods, and to the performance of the sacred mysteries. It was addressed to the greatest prosperity, that Paul was questioned before this tribunal. Having preached at Athens against the plurality of gods, and declared, that he came to reveal to the Athenians that God
whom they adored without knowing him, the apostle was carried before the Areopagites, and the introdu-cer of new deities, (Acts xvii. 19, 22) where he spoke with so much wisdom, that he converted Dionysius, one of the judges, and was dismissed, without any interference from their part. Our translation, by giving the import of the word Areopagus, "Mars' hill," has lost the correct representation of the passage; since Mars' hill might not be a court of justice; and besides this, the station of Dionysius, as one of the Areopaggites, is not mentioned. Comp. Lestry's Antiquities of Greece, b. i. c. 19. See Athens.
AREOPOLIS, the same as Ar, or Aire, or Rabhath-Moab. See Ar.
ARETAS, the proper name of several kings of Arabia. One was contemporaneous with Antiopater. (Jos. Ant. xiv. c. 2, 3, 4.) Another, the only one mentioned in Scripture, gave his daughter in marriage to Herod Antipas, but she being repudiated by Herod, Aretas made war upon him (A. D. 37) and deserted his kingdom. In consequence of this, the emperor Tiberius, indignant at the audacity of Aretas,
and being entrusted by Herod to give him assistance, directed Vitellius, then proconsul of Syria, to make war upon the Arabian king, and bring him alive or dead to Rome. But while Vitellius was in the midst of preparation for the war, and had already sent forward some of his troops, he received intelligence of the death of Tiberius; on which he immediately recalled his troops, dismissed them into winter quarters, and then the province, A. D. 39. (Jos. Ant.
xvii. c. 5.) Aretas, taking advantage of this supineness, seems to have made an incursion and got possession of Damascus; over which he then appointed a governor or ethnarch, who, at the instigation of the Jews, attempted to put Paul in prison, (2 Cor. xi. 32, 33; comp. Acts iv. 24, 25)—Under Nero, however,
(A. D. 54 to 67;) Damascus appears again on coins as a Roman city. See Kuinoel on Acts i. c. and Proleg. en.
I. ARGOB. (2 sam. with pr. to, for * sam, a heap of stones, etc.) a district east of Jordan, in the half-tribe of Manasseh, and in the country of Bashan, one of the most fruitful territories on the other side Jordan.

In this district were the sixty towns called Havoth-Jair, which had walls and gates; without reckoning villages and hamlets, not enclosed; all belonging to Og, King of Bashan. There are some remains of the word Argob in Ragab, a city east of Jordan, Deut.
iii. 4, 14; 1 Kings iv. 13.

II. ARGOB, the capital of the region of Argob.
Eusebius says, that Argob was fifteen miles west from Gerasa. It is probably the same as Ragab, or Raghabah, mentioned in the Mishna, in Menachoth, viii. 3. and in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. The Sammaritan translation, instead of Argob, generally puts Rigobah.

ARIEL (אֱריֵל, lion of God, i. e. hero, or city of heroes) is understood of the altar of burnt-offerings; or of the city of Jerusalem, in Isaiah xxxix.

ARIMATHEA, OF RAMAH, OR RAMATHA, a city
whence came Joseph the counsellor, mentioned Luke xxiii. 50. and often supposed to be the modern Ramlé, or Ramla, a pleasant town, standing in a fertile plain, about thirty-five miles north-west of Jeruusalem, on the high road to Jaffa, and containing a population of about 5000 souls, who are principally occupied in husbandry. (This, however, is a misapprehension; for the Hebrew for Arimathea is Ramah, not Ramleh; and besides, this latter city could not be mentioned in the Scriptures, since it was first founded about A. D. 716, by Solomon Ben Abdolemelek, the seventh caliph of the race of the Ommandes. See Abulphæus Tab. Syr. p. 79; Rosenm.
Bibl. Geog. ii. i. p. 355.

Arimathea, then, is the Hebrew Ramah; but as there were at least two cities of this name in Palestine, it is still somewhat uncertain which of these is meant. Most probably, however, it was the Ramah of mount Ephraim, (probably identical with that in the tribe of Benjamin, see Rosenm. Bibl. Geog.
ii. ii. p. 186) the birth-place and residence of Samuel. This was called also Ramathaim-Zophim, (عروض רămתאימ, heights of the Zophim, 1 Sam. i. 1; comp.
v. 19) from which name, with the article prefixed, Ma-ramathaim, (1 Sam. i. 1) the term Arimathea is readily derived. In 1 Macc. xi. 24 it is called Ramattathen, and by Josephus, Ramtha, Ant. vi. 11. 4, 5. See Ramath. *R.

ARISTARCHUS, a disciple mentioned by Paul, (Col. iv. 17; Phil. 24.) and also in the Acts, (xix. 25;
xx. 4; xxvii. 2.) a Macedonian, of Thessalonica.
He accompanied Paul to Ephesus, and continued with him the two years of his abode there, partaking of his labors and dangers. He was nearly killed in a tumult raised by the Ephesian goldsmiths, in whose city he left with the apostle, and accompanied him into Greece and Asia, and then as a fellow-prisoner to Rome. The Greeks say, he was bishop of Apaneas, in Syria; and was beheaded with Paul, at Rome,
under Nero.

I. ARISTOBULUS, a Jew, of the race of the priests, a philosopher, and preceptor to Ptolemey, king of Egypt, 2 Mac. 10. Clemens and Eusebius believe him to be the same as is mentioned in the preface to the second book of Maccabees, called "king Ptolemy's master, appointed to instruct the anointed priests," that is, of the priests of the God of Israel, consecrated by holy unction.

II. ARISTOBULUS, of whom Paul speaks, (Rom.
xxiv. 16.) was, according to the modern Greeks, brother of Barnabas, and one of the seventy disciples; was ordained a bishop by Barnabas, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels; was sent into Britain, where he labored much, made many converts, and at CHRISTIANITY; History.
III. ARISTOBULUS, or JESUS, or PHILELLEN, (lover of the Greeks) was the son of Hircanus, whom he succeeded, A. M. 3886, but reigned one year only.
He was cruel and vindictive. He made war upon the Iudeans, a people descended from Jetho, son of Ishmael, who dwelt in Arabia, between Damascus and the half-tribe of Manasseh. He subdued them, and forced them to receive circumcision, by offering them the alternative either of embracing Judaism or of quitting their country. Jos. Ant. xii. c. 18, 19.

IV. ARISTOBULUS, second son of Alexander Jannaeus, and youngest brother of Hircanus the high-priest, (see ALEXANDRA) whom he made war upon,
but was taken by Pompey, and sent prisoner to Rome,
with his children, where he remained eight years.
He at length escaped, and returned to Judea, where he levied troops, and endeavored to establish himself, but was severely wounded by Gabinius, the Roman general, and again sent to Rome, where he was kept in fetters. He was set at liberty by Julius Caesar, after a captivity of seven or eight years, and appointed

those in the interest of Caesar. His body, being en-balmed in honey, remained at Rome, till Mark Antony caused it to be carried to Judea, to be interred in the sepulcher of the kings. He died A. M. 3655,

ARK, of JERUSALEM, king of Sparta, mentioned 1
Macc. xii. 5, and by Josephus, Antiq, book xii. chap.
20. One particular feature in it is, that the Lacedemontians are acknowledged as brethren of the Jews; that is, sprung from the same origin, having Abraham for their father.

I. ARK. (Noah's), in Hebrew סֵפַן, thebah; Greek, ἀρχής, a censer; or, τίθος, a coffee. The term thebah used by Moses is different from the common name by which he describes a censer; and is the same that he employs when speaking of the little wicker basket in which he was exposed on the Nile; whence some have supposed that the Ark was of wicker work.
It was a sort of bark, in shape and appearance much like a chest or trunk. The ancients inform us, that the Egyptians used on the Nile banks made of bul-rushes, which were so light, as to be carried on their shoulders, when they met with falls of water, that prevented their passage. Noah's Ark was, in all probability, made like the Egyptian boats. The greatest difficulty refers, principally, to its size and capacity; and how Noah was able to build a vessel sufficient to contain the men and beasts, with provisions requisite for their support, during a whole years. To resolve these difficulties, it is necessary to inquire very particularly into the measure of the cubit mentioned by Moses, into the number of the creatures admitted into the Ark, and into the diensions of this vast building. After the nicest examination and computation, and taking the dimensions with the greatest geometrical exactness, the most learned and accurate calculators, and those most conversant with the building of ships, conclude, that if the ablest mathematicians had been consulted about proportioning the several apartments in the Ark, they could not have done it with greater correctness than Moses has done; and this narration in the sacred history is so far from furnishing delists with arguments wherewith to weaken the authority of the Holy Scriptures, that, on the contrary, it supplies good arguments to confirm that authority; since it seems, in a manner, impossible for a man, in Noah's time, when navigation was not perfected, by his own wit and invention,
to discover such accuracy and regularity of proportion, as is remarkable in the dimensions of the Ark.
It follows, that the correctness must be attributed to divine inspiration, and a supernatural direction.
(Willkin's Essay towards a Real Character, part ii.
cap. 5. Baurin, Discours Historique, &c. tom. 1.
p. 87, 88.)

If we reckon the Hebrew cubit at twenty-one inches, the Ark was 512 feet long, 87 wide, and 32 feet high; and the internal capacity of it was 357,600 cubic cubits. If we suppose the cubit to be only eighteen inches, its length was 450 feet, its width 75, and its height 45. Its figure was an oblong square,
but the covering might have a declivity to carry off water. Its length exceeded that of most churches in Europe. The height might be divided into four stories, allowing three cubits and a half to the first;
saven to the second; eight to the third; and five and a half to the fourth; and allotting five cubits for the thickness of the top and bottom, and the floors.
The first story might be the bottom, or what is called the hold of ships; the second might be a granary, or magazine; the third might contain the beasts; and the fourth the fowls. But the hold not being reckoned as a story, and serving only as a conservatory of fresh water, Moses says, there were but three stories in the Ark; and when interpreters say four, they include the hold. Some reckon as many cubits as there were kinds of beasts, which is not necessary;
because many kinds of birds and beasts, which use
the same food, might very well live together.
The number of beasts received into the Ark is not so great as some have imagined. We know about a hundred and forty, or a hundred and fifty, species of quadripeds; of birds, more in number, but smaller in size; of reptiles, thirty or forty species. We know not of more than six species of beasts larger than a horse;
very few equal to a horse, and many much smaller,
even under the size of a sheep; so that all the four-footed beasts, including 3650 sheep, if they be supposed necessary for the nourishment of such animals as live on flesh, at the rate of ten sheep daily, scarcely occupy more room than 150 oxen, 3650 sheep, and wolves. Among birds, few are larger than a swan, and most are less. Reptiles, or creeping animals, are generally small: many can live in the water, and these it would not be necessary to receive into the Ark. All the beasts easily have been lodged in 36 stables, and all the birds in as many lofts; allowing to each apartment 53½ feet in length, 29 in width, and 13½ in height. There might be more than 31,174 bushels of fresh water in the hold; which is more than is, sufficiently, for drink to four times as many men and beasts, for one year, as were in the Ark. The granary in the first story might contain more provisions than were necessary for all the animals in the Ark, during one year; whether they all live on fruits, and herbs, which is very possible, at this juncture, there being none which, in cases of necessity, might not subsist well enough without flesh, or whether there were sheep designed for the food of such animals as live on flesh. Beside places for the beasts and birds, and their provisions, Noah might find room on the third story for thirty-six cabins occupied by household utensils, instruments of husbandry, books, grains, and seeds; for a kitchen, a hall, four chambers, and a space of about forty-eight cubits in length, to walk in.

Such is the substance of Calmet's reasoning, and though modern discoveries have augmented the variety of species of beasts and birds, the number of them is not sufficiently great to annul the argument he has adduced. Many animals which feed on flesh can endure long fasting; others are torpid in certain degrees of cold; others fold themselves into a very small compass, and pass their time with little or no motion. We must also recollect, that the innumerable varieties of species now known, are greatly the effect of climate, of food, of habit, whether tamed or domesticated, and these would allow for considerable deductions from the general mass of creatures in the Ark. As to trees, plants, and vegetables, in general, we know, that most of their seeds can endure water for a long while without rotting; that the taller trees were not long wholly covered with the water of the deluge; and that the eggs, &c. of insects, though extremely numerous, might be attacked in various corners of the Ark, and occupy very little space.

Interpreters generally believe that Noah was one hundred and twenty years in building the Ark; an opinion founded on Gen. vi. 3, "My spirit shall not always strive with man; his days shall be a hundred and twenty years." They suppose that God here predicted an interval of only one hundred and twenty years to the deluge; and that this time was necessary for Noah to make preparations, to build the Ark, to preach repentance, to collect provisions, animals, &c. But how shall we reconcile this with what is said Gen. v. 29. of Noah's being five hundred years old at the birth of Shem, Ham, and Japheth? And when God commands him to build the Ark, he says, "And thou shalt come into the Ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee," Gen. vi. 18. At that time, his three sons, who were not born till after the five hundredth year of his age, were all married; though the deluge happened in the six hundredth year of Noah. It is impossible, therefore, that he should have received orders to build the Ark a hundred and twenty years before the deluge, unless he had other sons, though only these three attended to his orders.

The wood used for the Ark is called in the Hebrew, gopher wood, (Gen. vi. 14.) וו וּיָא; in the LXX, ξίλη τετραγώνω, square pieces of wood. Some render it more the boxwood, or wood that do not easily perish. Bochart maintains, that gopher signifies cypress; and in Armenia and Assyria, where it is supposed, with reason, that the Ark was constructed, cypress is the only wood fit to make so long a vessel of. Others are of opinion, that gopher signifies, in general, oily and gummy woods; such as the pine, the fir-tree, and the turpentine-tree. The word gopher, which comes very near gopher, signifies sulphur, and, in a larger sense, may be taken for resin, pitch, and other combustible matters drawn from wood. Jerome translates it here, polished wood, but elsewhere, wood coated over with bitumen. The point remains undecided; but Calmet prefers the cypress.

Some have a respect to the square and oblong figure of the Ark; but they did not consider that this vessel was not designed for sailing or rowing, but chiefly for floating on the water a considerable time. Besides, it may be proved, by instances, that its form was not less commodious for rowing, than capacious for carrying. George Hornius, in his "History of the several Empires," tells us, that in the beginning of the 17th century, one Peter Hans, of Horne, had two ships built after the model and proportions of the Ark; one was 120 feet long, 20 wide, and 12 deep. These vessels had the same fate with Noah's, being at first objects of ridicule and railery; but experience demonstrated, that they carried a third part more than others, though they did not require a larger crew: they were better sailers, and made their way with much more swiftness. The only inconvenience found in them was, that they were fit only for times of peace, because they were not proper to carry arms. (Le Pelletier, Dissert. sur l'Arche de Noe, cap. ii. p. 29, 30.)

The number of men and animals included in the Ark, plentifully supplies matter of dispute. As to the number of men, if we kept to the texts of Moses and Peter, we should have no contest about it; Moses expressly says, that Noah went into the Ark, himself, his wife, his three sons, and their three wives: and Peter tells us, that there were but eight persons saved from the deluge. But the mind of man, fruitful in imaginations, always curious, and perpetually unquiet, has considerably augmented this number. Some have hereby thought to do God service; supposing eight persons were not sufficient to supply the wants of so many animals. Others have imagined, that to affirm eight persons only to have been preserved from the deluge, was to set too narrow bounds to God's mercy. The Mahometan interpreters believe, that besides the eight persons whom we have mentioned, there were seventy-two more who entered; not the sons only of Noah, but their servants likewise. It is, beyond comparison, more difficult to fix the number of animals than that of men. Moses himself helps to perplex us, in these words: "Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee seven seven, the male and his female; and of beasts not clean, two, the male and his female." He places two here but once: but the Samaritan, the LXX, and Vulgate, read two twice; and the Hebrew itself, chap. vii. ver. 9. reads two two, went in—which leaves the difficulty in all its force; the text bearing equally to be construed seven and seven, and two and two; or, of clean beasts, fourteen, or seven pair; and of unclean, two pair, or only one pair. But what are we to understand by clean and unclean beasts? Was this distinction, declared by Moses in the law, known and practised before the deluge; or did Moses mention it as known and understood by the persons for whom he wrote? It is probable, in this distinction was, peculiar to Noah; and that the same animals were esteemed pure (while others were impure) both by Noah and by Moses. It is manifest, that by pure or clean animals, in general, those only were meant which might be offered in sacrifice, as bulls, sheep, goats, and their several species; and the like among birds, as pigeons, doves, hens, and sparrows. For the common uses of life, as food, drink, and apparel, although it seems to include all animals; but it is questionable, whether in this place we are to extend the pure animals beyond those admitted in sacrifice. The pair of unclean could be only one male and one female; but the seven clean beasts might be two males and five females; one male for sacrifice, the other for multiplication of the species.

The preceding remarks are from Calmet. The English editor has expended much time and fruitless labor, in attempting to ascertain the form of the Ark; and has, for this purpose, compared it with an oriental house, and with a variety of objects in heathen mythology. But all oriental houses are not alike. We can only draw the conclusion from the Scripture account, that the Ark was not a ship, but a building in the form of a parallelogram, 300 cubits long, 50 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high. The length of the cubit, in the great variety of measures which bore this name, it is impossible to ascertain, and useless to conjecture. The Ark is called in Hebrew the tabbah, by the Sept. γιβολα, kibodos; and by Josephus, ιβοτα, laresus, a chest. So far these names afford any evidence, they also go to show that the Ark of Noah was not a regularly built vessel; but merely intended to float at large upon the waters. We may, therefore, probably, with justice, regard it as a large, old, long, floating house, with breath flat, or only slightly inclined. It was constructed with three stories, and had a door in the side. There is no mention of windows in the side; but above, i.e. probably in the flat roof, where Noah was commanded to make. The length of a cubit in size, Gen. vi. 32. That this is the meaning of the passage, seems apparent from Gen. viii. 9: where Noah removes the covering of the Ark, in order to behold whether the ground was dry—a labor surely unnecessary, had there been windows in the sides of the Ark.

The form and dimensions of Noah's Ark have given rise to an infinite amount of useless speculation. Besides the practical illustration of building similar ships, mentioned above, many books have also been written on the subject. One of the most important was written by the Jesuit Kircher, under the title "Arca Noae," published at Rome, 1642, in folio, and republished at Amsterdam in 1675, fol. pp. 350. This work is divided into three parts, and contains an illustration of what took place before, during, and after the deluge. All the different stories and compartments of the Ark are here delineated; and the beasts, birds, and reptiles, are all appropriately distributed. The plate given by Calmet to represent the Ark, does not fail much short of the same fanciful particularity.

As Noah was the progenitor of all the nations of the earth, we might naturally expect to find memorials of him also among heathen nations, and especially interwoven into their mythological traditions. This appears to have been undoubtedly the fact. The traces of the deluge in heathen mythology have been laboriously collected by Mr. Bryant, in his Mythology, vol. ii. p. 193, seq.

It appears, from many circumstances, that the great patriarch was highly revered by his posterity. They styled him Prometheus, Deucalion, Thoth, Zeb, Noah, Moses, Meno, and many others. East, his true name was better preserved; he was there called Noas, Naos, and sometimes contracted, Noah. Indeed, it must ever remain a striking fact, that throughout the whole kindred family of languages, there is not the name of the great patriarch which has been preserved, by the most remote exiles, without being one of the fundamental sounds by which water, and a multitude of ideas connected with it, are designated; as wasser, wágo, agua, nara, navigare, naas, Wachen, etc.

Suidas relates an account of this personage, whom he calls Annacus, agreeing in its main points with the story of Noah, and which is further illustrated by Stephen of Byzantium. Diodorus, and other Greeks, call him Deucalion; and describe the deluge as universal. We are assured by Philo, (De premio et pana. vol. ii. p. 412.) that Deucalion was Noah. "The Greeks call the person Deucalion, but the Chaldeans style him Noe, in whose time there happened the great eruption of waters." The Chaldeans likewise mentioned him by the name of Xisouthros. (Cedren. p. 10.)—Eusebius has preserved a passage from Abydenus, (Pref. Evangel. ix. 12.) in which he speaks of Noah as a king under the name of Sei-sthrophes, and says that "in the prevalence of the flood, Sei-sthrophes sent out birds, that he might judge whether the waters had subsided; but that the birds, not finding any resting place, returned to him again. This was repeated three times; when the birds were found to return with their feet stained with soil; by which he knew that the flood was abated. Upon this he quitted the ark." Abydenus concludes with a particular in which all the eastern writers are unanimous, viz. that the place of descent from the Ark was in Armenia,—in which also mentions the dove of Noah, (Deucalion,) and its being sent from the Ark. (de solert. Animal. v. i. p. 90.)

But the most particular account of the deluge, and the nearest of any to that of Moses, is given by Lucian. He also speaks of Noah under the name of Deucalion, (De Dea Syrena, v. i. p. 882.) and says he "put all his family into a vast ark which he had provided; and went into it himself. At the same time animals of every species, boars, horses, lions, serpents, whatever lived upon the face of the earth, followed him by pairs; all of which he received into the ark, and experienced no evil from them. Thus they were wafted with him as long as the flood endured." After the receding of the waters, Lucian says Deucalion went out from the Ark and raised an altar to God; but he transposes the scene to Hierapolis in Syria; where the natives pretended to have particular memorials of the deluge.

Most of the authors who have transmitted these accounts, likewise affirm that the remains of the Ark were visible in their days upon one of the mountains of Armenia. So also some of the fathers. This, however, we may properly assume as fabulous. See Ararat.

Part of the ceremonies, in most of the ancient mysteries, consisted in carrying about a ship or boat; which may, perhaps, relate to nothing else but Noah and the deluge. So the ship of Isis, so celebrated among the Egyptians. (Pitius Lexicon.)

Mr. Bryant is of opinion that the appellation of many cities, as of Thebes in Egypt and in Boeotia, and also of others in Cilicia, Iouis, Attica, Syria, and Italy, is derived from the Hebrew tabbah, the word signifying ark. But this we may justly regard as verging too much upon the fanciful.

The Ark was also called by the Greeks paraka, kibodos, which should not to be a word of Greek origin. It is in this way that the city Apamea in Phrygia seems to have become particularly connected with the memory of the deluge. This city was anciently called Chibotos, whether in commemoration of the deluge, or whether, when the name was afterwards referred to the Ark, it is difficult to say. At any rate, the people of this city seem to have collected or preserved more particular and authentic traditions concerning the flood, and of the preservation of their human race than those elsewhere to be met with out of the Bible. *II.

A specimen of this is given in the annexed medal, which is preserved in the cabinet of the king of France, and is too remarkable to be overlooked; and having been particularly scrutinized by the late Abbé Barthelemy, at the desire of the late Dr. Combe, was, by that able antiquary, pronounced authentic. It bears on one side the head of Sevérus; on the other a history in two parts; representa-

withstanding, first, two figures enclosed in an ark, or chest, sustained by stout posts at the corners, and well timbered throughout. On the side are letters; on the top is a dove; in front, the same two figures which we see in the ark are represented as come out, and departing from their last resting place. Hovering over them is the dove, with a sprig in its bill. (Double histories are common on medals.) The situation of these figures implies the situation of the door; and clearly commemorates an escape from the dangers of water, by means of a floating vessel. Whether these particulars can be, without difficulty, referred to the history of Deucalion and Pyrrha, as usually understood, will be strongly doubted by all who duly contemplate the subject. Moreover, the Abbé Barthelemy informs us, that the letters on the ark are—

"the letter N, followed by two or three others, of which there remain only the slightest traces; or, to speak more accurately, there is nothing but the contour of the second letter to be distinguished, which, according to different lights, appears sometimes $\Omega$, sometimes $\Omega$, sometimes $\Omega$. There are traces of two or three others; say of two others; one of which in some lights appears to be $\Omega$ (2)." [These letters Mr. Bryant reads as $\text{NRE}$. The inscription refers it to Apamea. There seems, indeed, to have been a notion that the ark rested on the hills of Celenos, where the city Citobus was founded; and the Sibyl's lines, wherever they were written, also include these hills under the name of Ararat, and mention this circumstance. See Apamea, and Ararat.]

It is possible, says Mr. Taylor, that the reader may not at first perceive the propriety of attaching so great importance to the history of Noah's deliverance and its commemoration. The outcry of a certain class of reasoners against Revelation has long been, "Bring us facts which all the world agree in; facts admitted, established, by unbiased evidence." &c. If, in answer to this, we adduce proof that the Christian dispensation is from above, we are reminded—"How few of mankind receive it! Christ's own nation denied the subject of it; heathen lands refuse him." If we advert to Moses—"What! a leader of a pitiful horde of leprous slaves! at most, a legislator acknowledged by a single nation! and that a stupid nation too." To establish the assertion, therefore, that Deity has condescended to make known his intentions to man, he invites such persons to investigate the instance of Noah—"Was the deluge, he asks, a real occurrence?—All mankind acknowledge it. Wherever tradition has been maintained, wherever written records are preserved, wherever commemorative rites have been instituted, what has been their subject?—The deluge; deliverance from destruction by a flood? The savage and the sage give the same: North and South, East and West, relate the danger of their great ancestor from overwhelming waters. But he was saved: and how?—By personal exertion? By long supported swimming? By concealment in the highest mountains? No: but by enclosure in a large floating edifice of his own construction—his own construction, for this particular purpose. But this labor was long; this was not the work of a day; he must have foreseen so astonishing an event, a considerable time previous to its actual occurrence. Whence did he receive this foreknowledge? Did the earth inform him, that at twenty, thirty, forty years' distance it would disgorge a flood?—Surely not. Did the stars announce that they would dissolve the terrestrial atmosphere in terrific rains?—Surely not. Whence, then, had Noah his foreknowledge? Did he begin to build when the first showers descended? This was too late. Had he been accustomed to rains formerly—why think them now of importance? Had he never seen rain—what could induce him to provide a floating vessel?—Whe-
ARK were over the cover. It had four rings of gold, two on each side, through which staves were put, by which it was carried, Exod. xxv. 10–22. It stood on a platform of stone, Lev. xxvii. 6. At Shiloh, 1 Sam. i. 3. From hence the Israelites took it to their camp; but when they gave battle to the Philistines, it was taken by the enemy, chap. iv. The Philistines, oppressed by the hand of God, however, returned the Ark, and it was lodged at Kirjath-jearim, chap. vii. 1. It was afterwards, in the reign of Saul, at Nob. David conveyed it from Kirjath-jearim to the house of Obed-Edom; and from thence to his palace at Zion (2 Sam. vi.), and, lastly, Solomon brought it into the temple at Jerusalem, 2 Chron. v. 2. (See ARMIES.) It remained in the temple with all suitable respect, till the times of the later kings of Judah, who, abandoning themselves to idolatry, were so daring as to establish their idols in the holy place itself. The priests, unable to endure this profanation, removed the Ark, and carried it from place to place, to preserve it from the pollution and impiety of these princes. Josiah commanded them to bring it back to the sanctuary, and forbade them to carry it, as they had hitherto done, into the country, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3.

It is doubted, with good reason, whether the Ark was replaced in the temple, after the return of the Jews from Babylon. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion, that as the Jews found it necessary, for the celebration of their worship in the second temple, to have a new altar of incense, a new shew-bread table, and a new candlestick, they had likewise a new Ark; and he asks, Since the holy of holies, and the veil drawn before it, were wholly for the sake of the Ark, what need had there been of these in the second temple, if there had not been the Ark also to which they referred? Some think that Nebuchadnezzar conveyed the Ark to Babylon, among the spoil of rich vessels carried off by him from the temple; others, that Manasseh, having set up idols in the temple, took away the Ark, which was not returned during his reign. The author of Esdras (2 Esd. x. 22) represents the Jews lamenting, that the Ark of the Covenant was one of the things wanting in the second temple. The Jews flatter themselves, that it is at Jerusalem, or Mount Moriah, or Mount Zion, or Mount Gerizim; but Jeremiah, (chap. iii. 16) speaking of the time of the Messiah, says, they shall neither talk nor think of the Ark, nor remember it any more. Esdras, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, and Josephus, never mention the Ark in the second temple; and Josephus says, expressly, that when Jerusalem was taken by Titus, there was nothing in the sanctuary. Lastly, the rabbins agree in saying, that, after the captivity of Babylon, the Ark was not at Jerusalem; and that the foundation-stone, which they believe to be the centre of the holy mountain, was placed in the sanctuary in its room. The fathers, and Christian commentators, agree generally with the Jews on this point.

Beside the tables of the covenant, placed by Moses in the sacred cover, God appointed the blossoming rod of Aaron to be lodged there, (Num. xvii. 10,) and the omer of mannas which was gathered in the wilderness, Exod. xvi. 33, 34.

The heathen, in their religious rites, little chests, or cists, in which they locked up their most sacred things. Apuleius says, that in processions in Egypt there was a chest-bearer, who carried a box, enclosing the richest things for their religious uses. Plutarch, at the consecration of Isis and Osiris, says the same. Pausanias mentions a chest, in which the Trojans locked up their mysteries, which, at the siege of Troy, fell to Euripalus's share. The ancient Etrurians had also cists; so had the Greeks and Romans; but these chests were often enclosed things profane, superstitious, and ridiculous; whereas the Ark of God contained the most sacred and serious things in the world.

ARKITES, (Gen. x. 17) and ARCHITES, (1 Chron. i. 15.) a Canaanish tribe inhabiting the city Jersa ('Ajr) in Syria, some miles north of Tripoli. Arca was the birth-place of Alexander Severus. Burckhardt found here ruins, which serve to show its ancient importance. Travels in Syr. p. 162, or Germ. ed. p. 520, with Gesenius's note.

ARM. This word is frequently used in the Scriptures in a metaphorical sense, to denote power, as 1 Sam. iii. 31; Ps. x. 15; Ezek. xxxii. 21. Hence, any remarkable or striking manifestation of God's power is referred to his arm, Exod. vi. 6; Ps. lxxv. 5; xviii. 1; Luke i. 51; Acts xiii. 17. The prophet represents God as the arm of his people, (Isa. xxxiii. 2.) in affording them strength and protection. In allusion to the ancient custom of warriors making bare the arm when closely engaged in battle, 1 Sam. iii. 19, is said to "make bare his arm," when in any signal manner he interposes his power for the deliverance of his people, and the destruction of his enemies. Isa. lii. 10.

ARMAGEDDON, (mountain of Megiddo,) a place mentioned Rev. xvi. 16. Megiddo is a city in the great plain, at the foot of mount Carmel, which had been the scene of much slaughter. Under this character it is referred to in the above text, as the place in which God will collect together his enemies for destruction. See MEGIDDO.

ARMENIA, a considerable province of Asia; having Media on the east, Cappadocia on the west, Colchis and Iberia on the north, Mesopotamia on the south, and the Euphrates and Syria on the south-west. Care should be taken to distinguish Armenia from Armenia, or Syria, with which it has been sometimes confounded.

The name Armenia is probably derived from Harminni, the mountainous country of the Mni, or Mineans, who are noticed Jer. lii. 27. In Gen. viii. 4, Moses says the ark rested on the mountains of Armenia; in the Hebrew, the mountains of Arrarat; and in 2 Kings xix. 37, it is said the two sons of Sennacherib, after having killed their father, escaped into Armenia; in the Hebrew, the land of Arrarat.

ARMIES. The Lord, in Scripture, assumes the name "Jehovah of Hosts." מַעַר נֹבֶע. The Hebrew nation, in many places, is called the "army of the Lord," because God was considered as its head and general; who named the captains of its armies, who ordained war and peace; whose priests sounded the trumpets, &c. The armies of Israel were not composed of regular troops kept constantly in pay; the whole nation were fighting men, ready to march as occasion required. The army expected no reward beside honor, and the spoils taken, which were divided by the chiefs. Each soldier furnished himself with arms and provisions, and their wars were generally of short duration; they fought on foot, having no horse, till the reign of Solomon. David is the first who had regular troops; his successors, for the most part, had only militia, excepting their bodyguard, and a numerous cavalry. When they expected to give battle, proclamation was made at the head of every battalion, according to Deut. xx. 5. (See W.A.). The ark of God was often borne in the army, (1 Sam. iv. 4, 5; 2 Sam. xi. 11; xx. 34,) and the Israelites of the ten tribes, in imitation of Judah, carried their golden calves with them in their camp, as the Philistines did their idols, 1 Chron. xiv. 12; 2 Chron. xiii. 8.

Few things in history are more surprising than the great numbers which are recorded as forming eastern armies; even the Scripture accounts of the armies that invaded Judea, or were raised in Judea, often excite the wonder of their readers. To parallel these great numbers by those of other armies, is not at all that is acceptable to the inquisitive; it is requisite also to show how so small a province as the Holy Land really was, could furnish such mighty armies of fighting men; with the uncertainty of the proportion of these fighting men to the whole number of the nation; in respect to which many unfounded conjectures have escaped the pens of the learned. With a view to this, Mr. Taylor has attempted, by adducing instances of numerous armies which have been occasionally raised, to show what might be expected from the national power, or the impulse of military glory; and also that the composition of Asiatic armies is such as may render credible those numbers which express their gross amount; while no just inference respecting the entire population of a country can be drawn from the numbers stated as occasionally composing its armies.

The account given by Knolles, in his "History of the Turks," of the contending armies of Bayazet and Tamerlane, is not bad specimen of the "I will" of military power, of the cares and anxieties attending on the station of command, and of the feelings of great minds on great occasions. "So, marching on, Tamerlane at length came to Bakhchisarai, where he said to refresh his army eight days, and there again took a genarous muller thereof, wherein were found (as much write) four hundred thousand horse, and six hundred thousand foot; or, as some others that were there present affirm, three hundred thousand horsemen, and five hundred thousand foot of all nations. Very shortly after, great presents were made, and, as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of such orders as he would have kept, to the end they might the better observe the same: with much other martialie discourse, whereof he was very expert, in such a manner as at that time, also, it was lawful for every common soldier to behold him with more boldness than on other daies, forasmuch as he did for that time, and such like, lay aside imperial majestic, and showed himselfe more familiar unto them." p. 215. "Malczsisso, having made true relation vnto Bayazet, was by him demanded whether of the two armies he thought bigger or stronger? for now Bayazet had assembled a mighty army of three hundred thousand men, or, as some report, of three hundred thousand horsemen and two hundred thousand foot. Wherunto Malczzius, hauing before cruaded pardon, answered, That it could not be, but that Tamerlane might in reason have the greater number, for that he was a commander of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Bayazet offended, in great cholier replied, Out of doubt, the sight of the Tartarian hath made this coward so afraid, that he thinketh every enemie to be two." p. 218. "All which Tamerlane, walking this night a round, & down in his camp, & so much rejoiced to see the hope that his soldiers had already in general conceiv'd of the victorie. Who after the second watch returning vnto his pavilion, & there casting himself upon a carpet, had thought to have slept a while; but his care not to leave him so to do, he then, as his manner was, called for a beaouter, whereas it contained the lives of his fathers & ancestors, & of other valiant worthies, the which he used ordinarly to read, as he then did: not as therewith vainly to decease the time, but to make vse thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, & declining of such dangers as they by their rashness or overtrust fell into." p. 218. [See the same kind of occupation of Ahasuerus, Esther vii. 1.] "My will is, said Tamerlane, that my men come forward vnto me as soon as they may, for I will advance forward with an hundred thousand footmen, fifty thousand upon each of my two wings, and in the midst of them forty thousand of my best horsemen. My pleasure is, that after they have tried the force of these men, that they come vnto my avanctgard, of whom I will dispose, & fifty thousand horse more in three bodies, whom thou shalt command: which I will assist with 50,000 horse, whereon shalt be mine own person: having 100,000 footmen behind, & twenty thousand horses; and for my arrender I appoint 40,000 horse, and fifty thousand footmen, who shall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of 10,000 of my best horse, whom I will send into eury place where I shall thinke needfull within my army, for to impart my commands." p. 218.

It is impossible, on this occasion, not to recollect the immense army led by Napoleon into Russia, exceeding six hundred thousand troops; also, the forces engaged around Leipsic; amounting (including both sides) to half a million of men.

But it may be said, that "such mighty empires may well be supposed to raise forces, to which the small state of Judea was incompetent." This may safely be admitted; but what was, in all probability, the nature and composition of the Jewish, as of other eastern armies, we may learn from the following relations; which contribute to strengthen the credibility of the greater numbers recorded as composition of them. Wherein the reports as follows of the armies raised by the Chams of the Crimea: "It may be presumed that the rustic frugal life which these pastoral people lead favours population, while the wants and excesses of luxury, among polished nations, strike at its caparison; which time, also, it was lawful for every common soldier to behold him with more boldness than on other daies, forasmuch as he did for that time, and such like, lay aside imperial majestic, and showed himselfe more familiar unto them."

"The invasion of New Servia, which had been determined on at Constantinople, was consented to in the assembly of the Grand Vassals of Tartary, and orders were expedited, throughout the provinces, for the necessary military supplies. Three horsemen were to be furnished by eight families; which number was estimated to be sufficient for the three armies, which were all to begin their operations at once. That of the Noordin, consisting of no thousand men, had orders to repair to the Little Don; that of the Calga, of sixty thousand, was to range the left coast of the Borosthenes, till they came beyond the Orel; and that which the Cham commanded in person, of a hundred thousand, was to penetrate into New Servia." (Vol. i. p. 150.) The following descriptive account of Asiatic armies is from Volney:—"Sixty thousand men, with them, are very far from being synonymous with sixty thousand soldiers, as in our armies. That of which we are now speaking affords a proof of this: it might amount, in fact, to forty thousand men, which may be classed as follows:—Five thousand Mamoulk cavalry, which was the whole effective army; about fifteen hundred Barbary Arabs, on foot, and no other infantry, for the Turks are acquainted with none; with them the cavalry is every thing. Besides these, each Mamoulk, having in his suite two footmen, armed with staves, these would form a body of ten thousand valets, besides a number of servants andavengers, or attendants on horseback, for the Bey and Kachefs, which may be estimated at two thousand: all the rest were sutlers, and the usual train of followers. Such was this army, as described to be in Palestine, by persons who had seen and followed it." (Travels, vol. i. p. 124.) "The Asiatic armies are divided into their marches and ravages, their campaigns mere inroads, and their battles bloody frays. The strongest, or the most adventurous party, goes in search of the other, which not unfrequently flies without offering resistance; if they stand their ground, they engage pell-mell, discharge their carbines, break their spears, and hack each other with their sabres; for they rarely have any cannon, and when they have, they are but of little service. A panic frequently diffuses itself without cause; one party flies; the other pursues, and shouts victory; the vanquished submits to the will of the conqueror, and the campaign often terminates without a battle." (p. 125.) It appears, by these extracts, that the numbers which compose the gross of Asiatic armies are very far from denoting the true number of soldiers, fighting men of that army; in fact, we deduct those whose attendance is of little advantage, it may not be very distant from truth, if we say nine out of ten are such, as, in Europe, would be forbidden the army, and roll the village. We have seen that when we read, instead of four hundred, the true fighting corps of soldiers only are reckoned and stated. However that may be, these authorities are sufficient to justify the possibility of such numbers as Scripture has recorded, being assembled for purposes of warfare; of which purposes plunder is not one of the least in the opinion of those who usually attend a camp. It follows, also, that no conclusive estimate of the population of a kingdom can be drawn from such assemblages, under such circumstances; and, therefore, that no calculation ought to be hazarded on such imperfect data.

But there is another circumstance connected with eastern armies that ought not to be lost sight of, especially as it affords an opportunity for illustrating a passage of Scripture. We mean, the apparently singular request made by Barak, the general of the Israelites, to Deborah the prophetess, Judg. iv. 6. Deborah commanded him in the name of the Lord to encamp on mount Tabor; the word has ten thousand men in it:— And I will draw unto thee, to the river Kishon, Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his multitude; and I will deliver him into thine hand. And Barak said unto her, If thou wilt go with me, then I will go: but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go. So she said, I will go with thee. But what would much rather decline the company of a woman, who, under the circumstances stated, was little other than commander-in-chief. But we learn from Xenophon, (Cyrop. lib. iv.) that most of the inhabitants of Asia are attended in their military expeditions by those whom they live with at home:— "The army brought chariots which they had taken;—some of them full of the most considerable women;....for to this day all the inhabitants of Asia, in time of war, attend the service accompanied with what they value most; and they say, that they fight better when the objects most dear to them are present." Herodotus (Polimnia, cap. 38.) narrates the following history: "Pythus, the Lydian, had highly honored king Xerxes by contributions, entertainments, &c.—whom he thus addressed: 'Sir, I have five sons, who are all with you in this Grecian expedition; I would entreat you to pity my age, and dispense with the presence of the eldest. Take with you the four others, but leave this to manage my affairs.' Xerxes in great indignation made this reply: 'Infamous man! you see me embark all in this Grecian war; myself, my children, my brothers, my domestics, and my friends—how dare you, then, presume to mention your son, who is my slave, and whose duty it is to accompany me on this occasion—with all your family, and even your life?" We may now form a better notion of the policy of Barak, in stipulating for the presence of the prophetess who judged Israel with his army. She was a public person, well known to all Israel, and her appearance would no less stimulate the valor of the troops to "fight the better for an object most dear to them," than it would sanction the undertaking determined on, against an oppressor so powerful as Jabin, king of Canaan.

This notion may be extended somewhat further; for Deborah, in her triumphant song, supposes that Sisera's mother attributed the delay in his return to the great number of captives—female captives—taken from the enemy—"to every man a damsel, or two?"—families of the warriors of Israel, taken prisoners in their camp, equally with seizes made in the villages and the enemy's country; and, perhaps, or not, so striking objection seems to oppose it—and we are sure that the presence of women of rank in the camps of the orientals was not uncommon. Every body is acquainted with the generosity of Alexander in the tent of Darius, when the royal family of Persia became his captives; and the story of Panthea is so beautifully told by Xenophon, (Cyrop. lib. v.) that if it be already familiar to the reader, he cannot be displeased with its repetition. The generosity of Alexander might emulate, but it could not excel, the generosity of Cyrus. "When we first entered her tent (that of Panthea) we did not know her; for she was sitting on the ground, with all her women-servants round her, and was dressed in the same manner as her servants were: but when we looked around, being desirous to know which was the mistress, she immediately appeared to excel all the others, though she was sitting with a veil over her, and looking down upon the ground. When we bade her come, she rose, and the servants around her rose. Standing in a dejected posture, her tears fell at her feet," &c. This idea of women attending soldiers contributes an illustration to a verse in that sufficiently obscure effusion, Psalm lxxviii. 12.

Kings of armies did flee, did flee,
And she who tarried at home divided the spoil.

Here the phrase "she that tarry at home," or, more properly, "that abides in the house," is poetically put for female; since in the East it is customary for the women to remain within doors. The distribution of the plunder is here, therefore, attributed to the women; and appropriately; for it was enough for the man to have vanquished the enemies and conquered in battle; the spoil, obtained through their valor, was left to the equitable division of others; and who more proper for this than the females? Comp. Judg. v. 34. R.

ARMS, MILITARY, and ARMOR. The Hebrews used in war offensive arms of the same kinds as were employed by other people of their time, and of the East; swords, darts, lances, javelins, bows, arrows, and slings. For defensive arms, they used helmets, cuirasses, bucklers, armor for the thighs, &c. At particular periods, especially when under servitude, whole armies of Israelites were without good weapons. In the war of Deborah and Barak against Jabin, there were neither shields nor lances among 40,000 men, Judg. v. 8. In the time of Saul (1 Sam. xiii. 22.) none in Israel, beside Saul and Jonathan, was armed with swords and spears; because the Philistines, who were then masters of the country, forbade the Hebrews using the trades of armorers and sword cutters; and often obliged them to employ Philistines to sharpen their tools of husbandry; but these, being their masters, would make no arms for them.

We have in Scripture, not only histories in which armor and some of its parts are described, but also allusions to complete suits of armor, and to the pieces which composed them. Without any formal attempt to expose the errors of critics, whose information on this article might have been improved by greater accuracy, the following remarks may contribute to our better acquaintance with the subject.

The following figure, which is from Calmet, is usually offered, by way of illustrating the armor of the famous champion Goliath. It is drawn from the description given of him, and according to the significature of the words used to describe each separate part, it may be something like the original. It should be observed, however, that swords so long as this are not known in antiquity; and that it had been of the length here represented, David would have found it cumbersome to use afterwards, constantly, as we learn he did; (2.) That this figure is composed on the principle that the armor was worn without any other dress, which we think may be questioned, and is not easily determined; (3.) That the forms of Roman or Greek armor are not decidedly applicable to the Palaetine history; yet the armor of these people has been studied for this figure.

The next is a soldier in armor, from the column usually called that of Antoninus, but perhaps more properly referred to Aurelian. The apostle (Eph. vi. 13. 14.) advises believers to take unto themselves the whole armor of God; and he separates this passage into its parts: your loin, says he, girt about with truth. Now, this figure has a very strong composition of cinctures round his waist (loins); and if we suppose them to be of steel, as they appear to be, the defense they form to his person is very great; such a defense to the mind is truth. Undoubtedly there were, as we shall see, other kinds of girdles; but none that could be more thoroughly defensive than that of this soldier. Moreover, these cinctures surround the person, and go over the back, also. So truth defends on all sides. The remark that Paul names no armor for the back, is also somewhat impaired; because if this part of the dress was what he referred to by παράκλησις, girded round about, then its passing round the back, pretty high up, at least, was implied. The apostle proceeds to advise having on the breast-plate of righteousness, to defend the vital parts; as our figure has on a breast-plate; and as one below has a covering made in one piece for the whole upper part of his body. Having the feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; not iron, not steel; but patient investigation, calm inquiry; assiduous, laborious, lasting; if not, rather, with firm footing in the gospel of peace. Whether the apostle here means stout, well-laced, leather well prepared, by his preparation of the gospel of peace; or shoes which had spikes in them, which, running into the ground, gave a steadfastness to the soldier who wore them, may come under this remark hereafter. If so, it seems, at least according to our rendering, to have some allusion to shoes, either plated, or spiked, on the sole, when he says, (Deut. xxxiii. 25.) Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days shall be thy strength. If the latter is true, thy strength be. After all taking the shield of faith: not above all in point of value; but of situation; over all—all before all; as our soldier holds his shield; for his protection. Faith may be a prime grace, but if raised too high, like a shield over elevated, the parts it should defend may become exposed to the enemy. “Take the helmet of salvation;” security—safety. So far our figure applies; however, it has no sword: it had originally a spear, but that weapon has been destroyed by time.

“Praying,” says the apostle, “and watching:” these are duties of soldiers, especially of Christian soldiers, but they are not of a nature to be explained by this figure; however, we very frequently meet with them in monuments of antiquity: nothing is more common than sacrifices, &c. in camps, and the very first soldiers in the Antonine pillar are sentinels. It may be remarked, that this soldier has no armor for his legs, or thighs, or arms; they are merely sheltered by clothing, but are not defended by armor. We do not find that the apostle alludes to any pieces of defence for the legs, or the thighs, of his Christian warrior.

This engraving shows the parts of a complete suit of armor, separately: from an ancient gem: as (1.) the Leg-pieces, which not only cover the legs pretty low down, but also the thighs, up above the knee; (2.) the Spear stuck in the ground; (3.) the Sword, in this instance in its sheath; (4.) the Cuirass, or defence of the body: this appears to be made of leather, or some plant material, capable of taking the form of the parts; (5.) the Shield; upon which, in our gem, is placed (6.) the Helmet, with its flowing crest.

The next is among the most curious statues of antiquity remaining, being a portrait of Alexander the Great fighting on horseback; and probably, also, a portrait of his famous horse Bucephalus. The figure has a girdle round his waist; in which it is rather singular; and close to this girdle falls the sheath for his sword; his loins are girt about with a single piece of armor, buckled at the sides; which answers the purposes of a breast-plate, by covering high up on the thorax: his feet are not only shod, but ornamented with straps, &c. a considerable way up the leg. He has neither shield nor helmet; and Mr. Taylor remarks, that he has not found a commanding officer—a general—with a helmet on, neither during his actual engagement in fighting, as this figure is represented, nor when addressing his soldiers, though that could hardly be the fact. The form, size, &c. of this sword deserve notice; it is very different from the ideal sword of Goliath, in the first figure above. That girdles were of several kinds we need not doubt; if we did, the entire difference between that of this figure and that of the second above would justify the assertion. In that there is no room for concealing, or for carrying, any thing, but we know that one use of the girdle in the East was, and still is, to carry various articles. So we read, 1 Sam. xxv. 8, that "Joab's garment that he had put on, was girded (close) unto him, and upon it a sword-girdle, (or belt,) that is, a girdle of a military nature, fit for holding a sword: and in this girdle was a sword in its sheath; and as he went ry fell out." Notwithstanding that there was much hypocritical boseness in Joab's behavior, we ought to observe, that a sword might thus fall out of the girdle which contained it; for so we are told by Herodotus, that the sword of Cambyses fell out of the girdle, and wounded him in the thigh, of which wounds he died.

We read of swords having two edges; and of the great execution expected to be done by them. See Psalm cxix. 5, and Prov. v. 4. That a sword so short as that of this figure might have two edges seems probable enough, while that of Goliath would be both the weaker and the worse for such a form. The sharp sword issuing out of the mouth of our Lord (Rev. ii. 12.) will be noticed elsewhere; we only observe here, that to imagine a long sword issuing of the mouth of a person, suggests a very awkward image, or idea, to say the least; an idea which hardly could have its prototype in nature.

The annexed figures represent Standards or Ensagns of the Roman legions; and explain on what principles the Jews might regard them as idolatrous, not only because they had been consecrated to idols, and by heathen priests, but as they have images on them; which, if they might be those of the emperor, might also be those of idol deities.

The passage 2 Sam. i. 9, has divided interpreters: "Slay me," says Saul, "for anguish (vertigo) is come upon me;" so reads our translation, with the Vulgate; but the LXX and Syriac rend, "deep darkness surrounds me;" the Chaldee paraphrase, "I am wholly terrified;" and some rabbins, "I have the cramp." The Hebrew word (że, shareza) signifies to surround—enclose—interwove: it occurs several times as descriptive of a coat, or covering; as Exod. xxviii. 4, 39: "And thou shalt make an embroidered coat;" a close coat, says the Vulgate, Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion; the LXX to the same effect, synagwē: and soewere: but perhaps, a coat wrought with cycl-let (oilet, Fr.) holes; whence the word signifies, the holes in which jewels are set. Since, then, this word, or its derivatives, in more than a dozen places, describes a bodily vesture, and of a particular kind, should it in this passage be understood to signify mental sufferings? Should it not rather, as rabb Levi Ben Gershon and M. Saurin think, be rendered a close coat, made of rings (oilet) in the nature of a coat of mail, worn by Saul, for his personal security and defence in battle? There are still extant among our ancient armory some of these close coats, which appear to be composed of small steel rings, connected into each other; and thereby permitting a free motion of the body on all sides. It is difficult to determine this question; for though it cannot be denied that the ancient Hebrews might use such coats, yet we cannot prove it to have been the case.

The nature of the difficulties arising in this history being understood, the reader is requested to examine the annexed engraving, which represents a combat between a person on horseback and another on foot: it is from Montfaucon, (Supplement, vol. iii. page 387.) who thus remarks on it: "The horseman represented on an Etruscan Vase, of Cardinal Guatleri, is armed in such a singular manner, that I thought it necessary to give the figure here. This horseman is mounted on a naked horse with only a bridle: though the horse seems to have something on his neck, which passes between his two ears, but it is impossible to distinguish what it is." "The armor also of this horseman is as extraordinary as that of the Samaritan horseman on Trajan's Pillar. His military habit is very close, and fitted to his body, and covers him even to his wrists, and below his ankles, so that his feet remain naked; which is very extraordinary. For, I think, both in the ancient and modern cavalry, the feet were a principal part which they guarded; excepting only the Moorish horse, who have for their whole dress only a short tunic, which reaches to the middle of the thigh; and the Numidians, who ride quite naked, upon a naked horse, except a short cloak which they have fastened to their neck, and hanging loose behind them in warm weather, and which they wrap about themselves in cold weather. Our Etruscan horseman here hath his feet naked; but he hath his head well covered with a cap folded about it, and large slips of stuff hanging down from it. He wears a collar of round stones. The close bodied coat he wears, is wrought all over with zigzags, and large points, down to the girdle; which is broad, and tied round the middle of his body; the same flourishing is continued lower down his habit quite to his ankle, and all over his arms to his wrist. He brandishes his spear against his adversary, who is a naked man on foot, who hath only a beltlet on, and holds a large oval shield in his left hand, and a spear in his right, which he darts at his enemy, without being frightened at his being so well equipped. The horseman, beside his spear, hath a sword fastened to his belt, or breast girdle. The hilt of his sword terminates in a bird's head. Behind the man on foot, is a man well dressed, with his hat (which is like the modern ones) falling from his head. He is the esquire of the horseman; and holds a spear ready for him which he may take if he happens to break his own." This may assist our inquiries on the subject of the supposed close coat of Saul's armor.

(1) This being an Etruscan vase, is probably of pretty deep antiquity; as vases of the kind were not manufactured in later ages. (2) These vases have very often, histories depicted on them, referring to eastern nations: they have events, deeds, fables &c. as well as dresses, derived from Asia: whence the Etruscans were a colony. We risk little, there fore, in supposing that our subject is ancient, even advancing towards the time of King Saul; and that it is also Asiatic. Our next inquiry is, What it represents.—Certainly we may consider the person on horseback as no common cavalier; he is an office at least, probably a general; if not rather a king in which case, this is the very common subject of king vanquishing an enemy; a subject which occurs in numerous instances on gems, medals, &c. as well known to antiquaries. But the peculiarities of his dress are what demand our present attention.

(1) His coat is so close as to cover his whole person. (2) It seems to have marks, which, though they may be ornaments, yet are analogous to gildings, and raise that idea strongly. Now superseding that under these quiltings is a connected chain of iron rings, extending throughout the whole, it presents a dress well known in later ages, and, as this example proves, in times of remote antiquity; an to which agree the words used in describing Saul's shaks, as already noticed.

In order further to justify these conjectures on the nature of the defence afforded by Saul's coat of mail Mr. Taylor copied one of the Samaritan horsemen from the Trajan Pillar. This dress, it will be seen, wholly composed of scales, and fits the wearer with consummate accuracy; even his feet and his hand are covered with scales: and though his dress is divided into two parts, one for his body, the other for his legs, yet the whole shows not only his shape but every muscle of his body. This dress was made of horny substances, such as horses' hoof (Pausanias Attic. cap. 21.) or other materials of equal toughness and hardness: but scaly coats of mail were frequently made of iron, and, very commonly, we find parts of armor of defence imbricated in that manner.

The above remarks on the case of Saul have been permitted to remain, partly as an instance of the fastigial, and often groundless, speculations of Taylor: but principally for the sake of the general illustration of ancient armor.

R.

An observation is due on the story of Saul's attempt to dress David in his armor. (1 Sam. xix. 36) and we may dismiss this subject. That youth being introduced into the royal presence, in consequence of his proposal to mend Goliath, our translation says, "Saul clad David with his garments; and he put a helmet of brass on his head; and also he armed him with a coat of mail." [This ought, however, to be translated: "Saul clothed David with his garments; and he put a helmet of brass upon his head; and clothed him also with a coat of mail." There is here no difficulty. David, as a shepherd youth, had been accustomed to rove the hills and deserts in his simple dress, with all his limbs at full liberty; and of course he could not at once feel himself at ease in the garments and close armor of a warrior. He had never tried them, i. e. he was not accustomed to them, and could move in them neither with ease nor agility. Being, too, the armor of Saul, who was taller than the rest of the people, they might also be too large for David. At any rate, he preferred to lay them aside; and to go against the Philistines in that garb to which alone he had been accustomed, and in which alone he felt himself free, and able to act with energy and dexterity. Can we wonder at his preference? R.

ARNO, a river frequently mentioned in Scripture, (Deut. ii. 34, &c.) and which rises in the mountains of Gilead or Moab, and runs by a north-west course into the eastern part of the Dead Sea. It is now called Wady Modjeb, and divides the province of Beita Keri, which is lately divided the kingdom of the Moabites and Amorites, Num. xxxi. 13. [It flows through a deep and wild ravine of the same name, (in the Heb. Num. xxi. 15; Deut. ii. 34; iii. 9.) and in a narrow bed. Burekliardt describes it as follows: "From the spot where we reached the high banks of the Modjeb, we followed the top of the precipice at the foot of which the river flows, in an eastern direction, for a quarter of an hour; when we reached the ruins of Araray, the Jebel of the Scriptures, standing on the edge of the precipice. From hence a footpath leads down to the river. The view which the Modjeb presents is very striking. From the bottom, where the river runs through a narrow stripe of verdant level about forty yards across, the steep and barren banks rise to a great height, covered with immense blocks of stone which have rolled down from the upper strata; so that when viewed from above, the valley looks like a deep chasm, formed by some tremendous convulsion of the earth, into which there seems to be no possibility of descending to the bottom. The distance from the edge of one precipice to that of the opposite one, is about two miles in a straight line.

"We descended the northern bank of the Wady by a footpath which winds among the masses of rock, dismounting on account of the steepness of the road. We were about thirty-five minutes in reaching the bottom.—The river, which flows in a rocky bed, was almost dried up; but its bed bears evident marks of its impetuosity during the rainy season, the shattered fragments of large pieces of rock which had been broken from the banks nearest the river, and carried along by the torrent, having been deposited at a considerable height above the present channel of the stream. A few Deile and willow trees grew on its banks.—The principal source of the Modjeb is at a short distance to the north-east of Katrane, a station of the Syrian Haddaj or caravans to Mecca."—Travel in Syria, p. 372; Gesenius, Comm. on Is. xvi. 2. "R." is a district beyond Jordan, along the river Arnon. See Reland, p. 495.

AROER, the name of various cities. (1.) A city on the north side of the river Arnon, which was the southern border of the Moabish-Ammonitic territory. (2.) A city in the tribe of Reuben, Num. xxii. iii. 26; iv. 12; Josh. xii. 3; xiii. 16. In Jerem. xviii. 19, it is called a Moabish city. Burekliardt found its ruins on the Arnon, under the name Araru; see the extract from Burekliardt in the preceding article. (2.) Another city, farther north, situated over against Rabboth Ammon, (Josh. xiii. 25.) on the brook Gad, i. e. an arm of the Jabbok, (2 Sam. xxiv. 5.) and built by the Gadites, Num. xxxxi. 34.—(3.) A third city, in the tribe of Judah, 1 Sam. xxx. 22. B.

ARPAD or ARPAD, a town in Scripture always associated with Hamath, the Epiphania of the Greeks, 2 Kings xviii. 34, &c. Some make it the same as the Arpas noticed in Josephus, as limiting the provinces of Gamalitis, Gualantis, Batanea, and Trachonitis, north-east; (Joseph. Bel. J. iii. c. 3,) but this is improbable. Michaelis and others compare the Raphan or Raphanae, which Stephen of Byzantium places near Epiphania.

I. ARPHAXAD, son of Shem, and father of Japheth, born one year after the deluge; died A. M. 2096, aged 438 years, Gen. xi. 12, &c.

II. ARPHAXAD, a king of Media, mentioned in Judith i. 1. Calmest supposes him to be the same with Phraortes, the son and successor of Deioces, king of Media. But in this he diverges from the learned Prideaux, who thinks Arphaxad to be Deioces, and not Phraortes, his successor; for, as he observes, Arphaxad is said to be that king of Media who was the founder of Ecbatane, who all other writers agree to have been Deioces; and the beginning of the twelfth year of Sesoischinous exactly agrees with the last year of Deioces, when the battle of Ragaus is said to have been fought. Herodotus says that Phraortes first subdued the Persians, and afterwards almost all Asia; but at last, attacking Nineveh, and the Assyrian empire, he was killed, in the twenty-second year of his reign. The book of Judith informs us, that he built Ecbatane, and was defeated in the great plains of Ragaus, those probably about the city of Rages, or Rej, in Media, Tobit i. 10; ii. 7; iv. 11.

ARROW, a missile offensive weapon, sharp, slender, barbed, and shot from a bow, 1 Sam. xx. 36. Division with arrows was a practice formerly much in use, and is not unknown even in modern times. Ezekiel (chap. xxii. 21.) informs us that Nebuchadnezzar, marching against Zedekiah and the king of the Ammonites, when he came to the head of two ways, mingled his arrows in a quiver, to divine from them in which direction he should pursue his march; that he consulted Teraphim, and inspected the livers of beasts, in order to determine his resolution. Most commentators believe that he took several arrows, and on each of them wrote the name of the king, or city, &c. which he designed to attack; as on one—Jerusalem; on another—Rablah; on another—Egypt, &c.; and that these, being put into a quiver, were shaken together, and one of them drawn out; that coming first being considered as declarative of the will of the gods to attack first that city, province, or kingdom, whose name was upon it. This notion of the manner in which the divination was performed, may be correct; but the following mode of doing it, transcribed from Della Valle, (p. 276.) is worthy of notice:—"I saw at Aleppo a Moabian, who chose two persons to sit upon the ground, one opposite to the other; and gave them four arrows into their hands, which both of them held with their points downward, and, as it were, in two right lines united one to the other. Then a question being put to him, about any business, he fell to murmur his enchantments, and thereby caused the syllables to move together; his hand, to unite their points together in the midst, (though he that held them stirred not his hand,) and, according to the future event of the matter, those of the right side were placed over those of the left, or on the contrary."

Della Valle then proceeds to refer this to diabolical agency. Without affirming that this mode of divination was that practised by the king of Babylon, the passage in the prophet would seem to be entitled to examination, with special reference to it.

There were many other ways of divination by arrows; such as shooting one, or more, into the air, and watching on which side it (or the greater number) fell, &c. Comp. 2 Kings xii. 14—19. (Pococke in his Spec. Hist. Arab. (p. 328),) relates, that when one is about to set out on a journey, or to marry a wife, or to undertake any important business, he usually consults three arrows which are kept in a vase or box. The first has the inscription God orders it; the second, God forbids it; and the third has no inscription. He draws out an arrow with his one hand; and if it be the first, he prosecutes his purpose with alacrity, as by the express command of God; if it be the second, he desists; if the third, he puts it back and draws again until he obtains one of the other two. Comp. Ezek. xxvi. 15, 16. R.

The word arrow is often taken figuratively for lightning, and other meteors, (the same as the heathen would call the thunderbolts of their Jupiter,) but there is a passage, (Psalm xci. 5,) where it has been thought dubious whether it should be taken literally, for war, or figuratively, for some natural evil:

"Thou shalt have no occasion of fear, From the terror by night; From the arrow that flies by day; From the pestilence in darkness walking; From the destruction which wasteth at noon-day."

[But arrow is here used, no doubt, figuratively for danger in general; terror by night and arrows by day include all species of calamity; while the next lines go on to specify more particularly the pestilence. This, indeed, like every other calamity, may be reckoned among the arrows of divine judgment. So the Arabs. R.

The following is from Busbequius: (Eng. edit.) "I desired to remove to a less contagious air. . . . I received from Solyanus, the emperor, this message: that the emperor wondered what I meant, in desiring to remove my habitation. Is not the pestilence God's arrow which will always hit his mark? If God would visit me herewith, how could I avoid it? Is not the plague, said he, in my own palace, and yet I do not think of removing?" We find the same opinion expressed in Smith's Remarks, &c. on the Turks: (p. 109.) "What, say they, is not the plague the dart of Almighty God? and can we escape the blow he levels at us? is not his hand steady to hit the person he aims at? can we run out of his sight, and beyond his power?" So Herbert, (p. 99,) speaking of Corroon, says, "that year his empire was so weakened with God's arrows of plague, pestilence, and famine, as this thousand years before was never so terrible." See Ezek. v. 15. "When I send upon them the evil arrows of famine," &c.

ARSACES, a name given by Ezra (iv. 7, 8; comp. 24,) to the Magus, called by Justin Oropastes; by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Æschylus, Mardus; and by Ctesias, Sphendodates. After the death of Cambyses, he usurped the government of Persia, (2 Kings ii. 22,) pretending to be Smerdis, son of Cyrus, whom Cambyses had put to death. He probably also, assumed the title of Arsaces, though this is not mentioned by the Greek historians.

This is the Arsaces who wrote to his governors beyond the Euphrates, signifying, that having received their advice relating to the Jews, he required them to forbid the Jews from rebuilding Jerusalem. Thus, from about ante A.D. 322, the Jews did not dare to forward the repairs of the city walls, till about ante A.D. 520, when Darius Hystaspes renewed the royal permission to build them, Ezra iv. 24; v. vi.—Smerdis reigned only about six months; when seven noblemen conspired against him, assassinated him, and placed Darius Hystaspes, one of their number, on the throne, ante A.D. 521.

II. ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS, the second son and successor of Xerxes, ascended the Persian throne ante A.D. 464. In the seventh year of his reign he permitted Ezra to return to Judea, with all who inclined to follow him, (Ezra viii.) and in the twentieth year of his reign. Nehemiah also obtained leave to return, and to rebuild the walls and gates of Jerusalem, Neh. ii. From this year some chronologers compute Daniel's seventy weeks of years, (Dan. i. x. 24.) but Dr. Prideaux, who discourses very copiously and with great learning on this prophecy, maintains that the decree mentioned in it for restoring and rebuilding Jerusalem cannot be understood of that granted to Nehemiah, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes; but of that granted to Ezra, by the same prince, in the seventh year of his reign. From thence to the death of Christ, are exactly four hundred and ninety years, to a month; for in the month of Nisan was the decree granted to Ezra; and in the middle of the same month, Nisan, Christ suffered; just four hundred and ninety years afterwards. (Connect.
part 1. b. v.) [Others suppose the Artaxerxes mentioned in Ezra vii. viii. to have been Xerxes, the predecessor of Artaxerxes Longimanus; so Winer
and others following Josephus. But the Scripture name of Xerxes is Aràxewros; see this article.] and the authority of Josephus in this respect is very slender; since he makes Xerxes reign 35 years, when we know from other accounts that he was assassinated in the twenty-first year of his reign.—
This Artaxerxes is said to have received the name of Longimanus from the unusual length of his arms, who knew not that he was not out of proportion, that when standing erect, he could touch his knees. Others say he had one arm or hand longer than the other. He died ante a. D. 425, after a mild reign of 30 years.

ARTEMAS, a disciple who was sent by the apostle Paul into Crete, in the room of Titus, while the latter continued with Paul at Nicopolis, where he passed the winter, Tit. iii. 12. We know nothing particular either of his life or death.

ARUBOTTI, or ARABOTTI, a city or country belonging to Judah, (1 Kings iv. 10.) the situation of which is not known.

ARUMAI, otherwise RUMAH, a city near Shechem, (Judges iv. 11;) where Abimelech encamped.

ARAVAD, properly ARAVAD, the name of a Phœnician city upon the island of the same name, not far from the coast, founded, according to Strabo, (xvi. 2, 8:13,14;) by Sidonian deserters, Ezr. xxiv, 8, 11.
Their grammar name is ARAVADITE, Gen. x. 18;
1 Chron. l. 16. See ARAD and ANTARADA. R.

ARAZA, governor of Tirzah, in whose house Zioni killed Elah, king of Israel, 1 Kings x. 9.

ASA, son and successor of Abijam, king of Judah,
(1 Kings xv. 1.) began to reign A. M. 3040, ante a. D.
535; and reigned forty years over Jerusalem. Asa expelled those who, from sacrilegious superstition,
profaned themselves in honor of their false gods;
purified Jerusalem from the infamous worship of idols;
and deprived his mother of her office and dignity of queen, because she re-ected an idol to Astarte; which idol he burnt in the valley of Hinnom. (See King's Mother.) Scripture, however, reprehends him with not destroying the high places, which he, perhaps, thought it was necessary to tolerate, to avoid the greater evil of idolatry. He carried into the house of the Lord the gold and silver vessels which his father, Abijam, had possessed; and conserved; and fortified and repaired several cities, encouraging his people to this labor while the kingdom was at peace. After this,
he levied 300,000 men in Judah, armed with shields and pikes; and 280,000 men in Benjamin, armed with shields and bows, all men of course and valor.

About this time, Zerah, king of Ethiopia, (or of Cush; that is, part of Arabia; see Gen. hi. 7.) marched against Asa with a million of foot, and 300 chariots of war, and advanced as far as Maresiah; probably in the fifteenth year of Asa's reign. See 2 Chron.
xiv. 9. A. M. 3064. Asa advanced to meet him, and encamped in the plain of Zephathah, (or Zebahiah,) near Maresiah. Asa prayed to the Lord, and God terrified Zerah's army by a panic fear; it began to fly, and Asa pursued it to Gera, slaying a great number. Asa's army then returned to Jerusalem, loaded with booty, (2 Chron. xiv. 15; xv. 1, 2;) and were met by the prophet Azariah who encouraged, warned, and exhorted them. Asa, being thus animated with new courage, destroyed the idols of Judah, Benjamin, and mount Ephraim; repaired the altar of burnt-offerings; assembled Judah, and Benjamin, with many from the tribes of Simeon, Ephraim,
and Manasseh; and on the third month, in the fifteenth year of his reign, celebrated a solemn festival.
Of the cattle taken from Zerah, they sacrificed 700
oxen, and 7000 sheep; they renewed the covenant with the Lord; and declared that whosoever would not seek the Lord should be put to death. God gave them peace; and the kingdom of Judah, according to the Chronicles, was quiet till the thirty-fifth year of Asa. But there are difficulties concerning this year; and it is thought probable, that we should read the twenty-fifth, instead of the thirty-fifth, since Baasha, who made war on Asa, lived no longer than the twenty-sixth year of Asa, 1 Kings xvi. 5. In the thirty-sixth (rather, says Calvin, the thirty-fifth) year of Asa, Baasha, king of Israel, began to fortify Ramah, on the frontiers of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, to hinder the Israelites from resorting to the kingdom of Judah, and the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem. Whereupon Asa sent Ben-Hadad, the king of Damascus, all the gold and silver of his palaf ace, and of the temple, to prevail on him to break his alliance with Baasha, and to invade his territories, that Baasha might be obliged to abandon his design at Ramah. Benhadad accepted Asa's presents, and invaded Baasha's country, where he took several cities belonging to Naphtali; Baasha being forced to retire from Ramah, to defend his dominions nearer home, Asa immediately ordered his people to Ramah, carried off all the materials prepared by Baasha, and entered them in building Gebah and Mizpah. At this time, the prophet Hanani came to Asa, and said, (2 Chron. xvi. 7.) "Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not on the Lord thy God, wherein thou hast not done foolishly; therefore, from henceforth, thou shalt not reign." Asa, offended at these reproaches, put the prophet in chains, at the same time ordering the execution of several persons in Judah. Toward the latter part of his life, he was afflicted with the gout in his feet, and the disorder, rising upward, killed him. Scripture re-proaches him with having recourse rather to physicians than to the Lord. His ashes were buried in the sepulchre which he had provided for himself, in the city of David, after his body had been burned.
A. M. 3000, ante a. D. 914.

ASAHEL, son of Zerah, and brother of Joab; one of David's thirty heroes, and extremely swift of foot; killed by Abner, at the battle of Gibeon, 2
Sam. ii. 18, 19.

ASAHIEL, one of the persons sent by king Josiah to consult Huldah, the prophetess, concerning the book of the law, found in the temple, 2 Kings xxii. 14.
ASHAPH, son of Barchias, of the tribe of Levi, father of Zaccur, Joseph, Nethaniah, and Asarelah, and a celebrated musician, in David's time, 1 Chron.
xxv. 1, 2. In the distribution of the Levites, which was made for the service before the ark of the temple, it was appointed Kohath's family to be placed in the middle, about the altar of burnt sacrifices; Merari's family to the left; and Gerson's family to the right. Asaph, who was of Gerson's family, presided over this band;
and his descendants had the same rank. There are twen-te Psalms with Asaph's name prefixed, viz. the 50th, and from the 73rd to the 83rd; but whether Asaph composed the words and the music, or David the words, and Asaph the music; or whether some of Asaph's descendants wrote them, and prefixed to them the name of that eminent master of the music of the temple,
or of that division of singers of which Asaph's family was the head, is not certain. All these psalms, though generally distinguished for their beauty, do not suit Asaph's time; some were written during the captivity, others in Jehoshaphat's time. "A Psalms of Asaph," might mean a Psalm for Asaph's family.

ASIPHATHAH, daughter of Potiphah, priest of Hel-opolis, and the wife of Joseph (Gen. xlix. 45.) and mother of Ephraim and Manasseh. (See POTIPHAR, ad fin.) [The Seventy, whose authority is worth something in Egyptian names, write "Atis", which is equivalent to the Egyptian or Coptic "Atis", i. e. belonging to Neith, the Egyptian goddess of wisdom, corresponding to the Minerva of the Greeks.
Champlin, Pantheon Egyptian, no. 6.]

ASHISHAN, (asaza), a city of Judah (Josh. xiv. 49),
but afterwards apparently yielded to Simeon, Josh.
xix. 7. Eusebius says that, in his time, Beth-Ashan was sixteen miles from Jerusalem, west. In 1 Sam.
xxii. 39, it is called Chor-asan, i. e. furnace of asana.

ASHDOD, one of the five cities of the Philistines, assigned to the tribe of Judah, but never conquered by them, Josh. xili. 8; xiv. 46, 47; 1 Sam. v.
1; vi. 17, etc. It was called by the Greeks ASCODUS.
Here stood the temple of Dagon; and thither the ar was first brought, after the fatal battle at Eben-eczer, 1 Samuel v. 1, seq. It sustained many sieges,
c. g. by Tartan, the Assyrian general in the time of Hezekiah; (1 Kings xxi.) afterwards by Psmitt-ichshah, the king of Egypt, contemporary with Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah. This siege is said by Herodotus (ii. 157.) to have lasted twenty-nine years! It was thereafter taken by the Maccabees, and destroyed by Jonathan; (1 Macc. x. 10; x. 77, seq.) but was again restored by the Roman general Gabinius.
(1 Macc. xiv. 3: 3.) At the present day, it is a miserable village, still called Asboda. See also the article ASODUS. R.

ASHDOTH, a city in the tribe of Reuben, called Aíasdōth-piqah, (Josh. xi. 3; xiii. 20.) because it was seated in the plains at the foot of mount Pisgah.
The word signifies low places, or ravines, at the foot of a mountain.

ASHER, one of the sons of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's maid. He had four sons and one daughter, Gen. xli. 20; Deut. xxxiii. 29. The inheritance of his tribe lay in a very fruitful country, on the sea-coast, with Libanus north, Carmel and the tribe of Issachar south, and Zebulun and Naphtali east.
Tyrus and Sidon, with the whole of Phoenicia, assigned as the territory of this tribe, (Josh. xix. 25, seq.) but it never possessed the whole range of distRICT assigned to it, Judg. i. 31. See CANAN.

ASHER, a city between Scythopolis and Shechem, and, consequently, remote from the tribe of Asher. JUDG. iii. 31. The name is not recorded in Samuel, it is placed between Scythopolis and Neapolis, which is the same as Shechem. Eusebius says, it was in Manasseh, 15 miles from Neapolis, towards Scythopolis.

ASHES. To repent in sackcloth and ashes, or to lie down among ashes, was an external sign of self-affliction for sin, or of grief under misfortune.
We find it adopted by Job; (chap. ii. 8.) by many Jews when in great fear; (Ezech. iv. 3.) and by the king of Nineveh, Jonah iii. 6. Homer describes old Laertes grieving for the absence of his son,—"sleeping in the apartment where the slaves slept, in the ashes near the fire." Compare Jer. vi. 26. "Daughter of my people,—wallow thyself in ashes." "I am but dust and ashes," said Abraham to the Lord;
(Gen. xviii. 27.) indicating his deep sense of his own meanness in comparison with God. God threatens to shower down dust and ashes on the lands instead of rain; (Deut. xxvii. 24.) thereby to make them barren instead of blessing them. (See RAIM.) The Psalmsist, in great sorrow, says, poetically, that he had "eaten ashes." Ps. ci. 9. He sat on ashes, and threw them on his head; his food was sprinkled
with the ashes wherewith he was himself covered.
So Jeremiah (Lam. iii. 6.) introduces a Hezekian, saying, "The Lord hath covered me with ashes."
There was a sort of ley and lustral water, made with the ashes of the heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation; these ashes were distributed to the people, and used in purifications, by sprinkling, to such as had touched a dead body, or been present at funerals, Numb. xix. 17.

The ancient Persians had a punishment which consisted in executing certain criminals by suffing them in ashes. (Valerius Maximus, lib. ix. cap. 2.) Thus the wicked Menelaus was despatched, who carved the troubles which had disquieted Judea;
(2 Macc. xiii. 5, 6.) being thrown headlong into a tower, fifty cubits deep, which was filled with ashes to a certain height. The action of the criminal to disengage himself, plunged him still deeper in the whirling ashes; and this agitation was increased by a wheel, which kept him in continual movement,
till he was entirely suffed.

ASHRAH, a wood, of very uncertain origin, adorred by the men of Hamath, who were settled in Samaria, 2 Kings xvii. 30. Some of the rabbins say, that Ashima had the shape of an ape; others that of a lamb, a goat, or a satyr. (Sechen, de Deis Syri Synag. ii. cap. 9. de Additiones. And. i. ibidem.) They who think this divinity was an ape seem to have had regard to the sound of the word Sima, which has some relation to the Greek word for an ape, Simia: but the Hebrews have another word for an ape, Levi. xvii. 7. Both the ape and the goat were worshipped in Egypt, and in the East.
(Diodor. Sicul. lib. i. Basmage, Antiq. Jud. tom. i.
p. 190.)—The name Ashima may very well be compared with the Persian ašmān, heaven; in Zend, acandā; so Gesenius, in his Manual Lex. 1822.
This also, according to the magi, is the name of the angel of death, who separates the souls of men from their bodies, and also presides over the 27th day of every solar month in the Persian year; which, therefore, is called by his name. (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.
p. 141.)—It may be further observed, that these peo...

ple came from Hamath, or Emesa, a city of Syria, on the river Orontes; and we read, in Herodian, that the sun was adored in this city, under the name of Elak-Gelessus, where the emperor Heliogabalus took his name. The Trossel was a kind of oracular stone, represented by a large stone, round at the bottom, which, rising insensibly to a point, terminated in a conic or pyramidal figure. His worship became celebrated at Rome, from the time of Heliogabalus, who caused a magnificent temple to be erected to him. Around this temple were several altars, on which hecatombs of bulls, and great numbers of sheep, were sacrificed every morning, and abundance of excellent wine and spices poured out.

ASHCHENAZ, (Jer. ii. 27.) and ASHKENAZ, (Gen. x. 3.) proper name of a son of Gomer, and of a tribe of his descendants. In Jeremiah, this tribe is mentioned as one of those that shall execute the divine judgments upon Babylon, and is placed together with Asher and Manis, provinces of Armenia. Hence the conjecture is not improbable, that Ashkenaz itself was also a tribe and province of Armenia; or, at least, lay not far from it, near the Caucassus, or towards the Black sea. Further than this we can form no data. See Rosenmueller, Bib. Geog. i. 183. R.

ASHNA, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 33.

ASHEPANAZ, intendant, or governor of king Nebuchadnezzar's eunuchs, who changed the name of Daniel and his companions, Dan. iii. 3.

ASHTRATH, see ASHTROTH.

ASHUR, a son of Shem, who gave name to Assyria. It is believed, that he dwelt originally in the land of Niniveh, and about Babylon; but was compelled by Ninurta to remove thence, higher towards the springs of the Tigris, in the province of Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboam, Calah, and Resen. This is the sense sometimes given to Gen. x. 11, 12: "Out of that land (Shinar) went forth Ashur, and built Nineveh;" &c. But others understand it to speak of Nimrod, who left his own country, and attacked Assyria, which he overcame, built Nineveh, and here established the seat of his empire. The prophet Micah (chap. v. 6.) calls Assyria the land of Niniveh.

See ASYRIA.

ASIA. The ancient Hebrews were strangers to the division of the earth into parts or quarters; and hence we never find the word Asia in any Hebrew book. It is only in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament. Asia is separated from Europe by the Taurus or Dor, the Euxine, Egean, and Mediterranean seas; the Red sea and isthmus of Suez divide it from Africa. This part of the globe is regarded as having been the most favored. Here the first man was created; here the patriarchs lived; here the law was given; here the greatest and most celebrated monarchies were formed; and from hence the first founders of cities and nations in other parts of the world conducted their colonies. In Asia, our blessed Redeemer appeared, wrought salvation for mankind, died, and rose again; and from hence the light of the gospel has been diffused over the world. Laws, arts, sciences, and religions, almost all have had their origin in Asia. The soil is fruitful, and abounds with all the luxuries as well as necessaries of life.

Asia was generally divided into Major and Minor. Asia Minor was a large country, (Acts xix. 10.) lying between the Euxine or Black sea northward, and the Mediterranean southward. It is now called Anatolia, or Natoila. Asia Major denotes all the rest of the Asiatic continent. Asia Minor contained the provinces of Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, Ly西亚, Lycia, and Caria, which are sometimes included under Lydia—Lydia, Ionia, and Æolis—which are sometimes included under Lydia—Caria, Doris, and Lycia.

Of these, Lydia and Caria—taken in their larger acceptations, the latter including Doris—Myasia and Phrygia, including Troas or Phrygia Minor, formed the Roman proconsular Asia, which has been thought by some to be the same as the Scripture Asia. But, as Dr. Wells remarks, it is evident that Myasia, Phrygia, and Troas, are reckoned by the sacred writer as distinct provinces from the Asia so called in Scripture. It is therefore more reasonably supposed, that by Asia, in the New Testament, to be understood, (1) the whole of Asia Minor, as Acts xix. 20, 27; xx. 4, 10, 18; xxvii. 2, &c. or (2) only pros- consular Asia, i.e. the region of Ionia, or the whole western coast, of which Ephesus was the capital, and which Strabo also calls Asia; (lib. xiv.) thus in Acts xii. 9; vi. 9; xiii. 10, 22; 2 Tim. i. 15; 1 Pet. i. 1; Rev. i. 4, 11. Cicero speaks of proconsular Asia as containing the provinces of Phrygia, Lyasia, and Lydia. (Pro. Flacc. 27. Ep. Fam. li. 15.) R.

ASIRACHAE, or Asia Princes, as they are called in the Latin version of the Acts, (chap. xix. 31, "Certain of the chief of Asia," Eng. tr.)—were high-priests of Asia. (In the eastern provinces of the Roman empire, persons were selected from among the more opulent citizens, to preside over the things pertaining to religious worship, and to exhibit annual games and theatrical amusements, at their own expense, in honor of the gods, in the manner of the ediles at Rome. These officers received their titles from the province to which they belonged, as Syr, tas, (2 Macc. xii. 2.) Lyciarch, Cartarch, etc. and, of course, in proconsular Asia, they were called Asirachs. Their appointment was made by the Roman consul, and was made in the following manner: At the beginning of each year, i. e. about the autumnal equinox, the several cities of Asia hold each a public assembly, in order to nominate one of their citizens as Asirach. A person was then sent to the general council of the province, at some one of the principal cities, as Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis, etc. who publicly announced the name of the individual who had been selected. From the persons thus nominated by the different cities, the council designated ten; and from these ten, the Roman proconsul appointed one to preside over all that pertained to the honor and worship of the gods. This person was especially called Asirach; while those, also, who had formerly held the office, still retained the name; or perhaps it was also borne by the other nine persons who were designated by the council, and who were the colleagues and advisers of the chief Asirach. Their place of residence was at Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis, Cyzicus, or at any other city where the council was held. Hence on Acts xix. 31, Kunoel, Hamundon, Poli Synopa. Also Winer. Bib. Realw. p. 61. R.

These chieftains, then holding such games at Ephesus, out of friendly consideration for Paul, restrained him from appearing, as he proposed, in the theatre, during the sedition raised by Demetrius, the goldsmith, respecting Diana of Ephesus. The Asiarchs were frequently priests of the religion whose games they celebrated: thus, in the martyrdom of Polycarp, Philip the Asiarch (a little afterwards called the high-priest) is solicited to let out a lion against Polycarp, which he declares he could not do, because that kind of spectacle was over. Those Asiarchs should by no means be confounded with the archon, or chief magistrate of Ephesus; for they were representatives, not of a single city, but of many cities under one dignity, and yet the expense was great; but that only men of wealth could undertake it. Hence we find Aristides exerting himself strenuously to be discharged from this costly office, to which he had been three or four times nominated. This notion of the Asiarchs is confirmed by a modus of Rhodes, struck under Hadrian, on the reverse of which we read, "a coin struck in common by thirteen cities, in honor of the magistrate of Rhodes, Claudius Fronto, Asiarch and highpriest of the thirteen cities."

The consideration of these Asiarchs for the apostle Paul, during the tumult, is not only extremely honorable to his character, and to theirs, but is also a strong confirmation of the remark made by the evangelist, (ver. 10,) that "all they who dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks." It shows also in what light the tumult of Demetrius was beheld, since he took especial care to observe that "all Asia" worshipped their goddess. Yet the very Asiarchs, now engaged in this worship, intend on saving the Demetrias represented as its most formidable enemy. Though there was, properly speaking, only one Asiarch at a time, yet those who had passed through the office retained the title; for which reason they are mentioned in the plural by the evangelist.

ASKELON, a city in the land of the Philistines, between Ashdod and Gaza, on the coast of the Mediterranean. After the death of Jeshua, the tribe of Judah took Askelon; but it subsequently became one of the five governments belonging to the Philistines, Judges i. 11. (The prophets Amos, (i. 8,) Zebulun, (ii. 4,) and Jeremiah, (xlvii. 5, 7,) announce destruction to it, as also to the other cities of the Philistines. In the fourth century, Askelon, like Ashdod, became the seat of a bishop; and remained till the middle of the seventh century, when the Arabs took possession of Palestine. The city underwent various fortunes during the crusades, till at length it was razed, by the labors of Christians and Musulmans, in a common expedition. In the treaty between Richard and Saladin, A. D. 1192. Since that time, this formerly opulent, splendid, and strong city, has remained a desolate heap of ruins. Dr. Richardson thus describes its present state: "Askoleon, the most populous of the provinces of the Philistines; now there is not an inhabitant within its walls; and the prophecy of Zechariah is fulfilled, 'The king shall perish from Gaza, and Askelon shall not be inhabited;' Zech. ix. 6. When the prophecy was uttered, both cities were in an equally flourishing condition, and nothing but the presence of Heaven could pronounce on which of the two, and in what manner, the vicl of his wrath should thus be poured out. Gaza is truly without a king. The lofty towers of Askelon lie scattered on the ground, and the ruins within its walls do not shelter a human being. How is the wrath of man made to praise his Creator?"

The ancients mention the wine of Askelon with applause; as also the onions, which grew here in abundance. (Pliny, H. N. x. 6.) Indeed, the name shalaf, Fr. cicholat, Ital. scologna, seems to be corrupted out of Ascolon, it being properly the altium scoloniae, according to an ancient tradition, Derceto, the mother of the Babylonian queen Semiramis, cast herself headlong into a lake in the vicinity of this city, in order to preserve her honor from a young man who was pursuing her; and was there transformed into a fish. On this account, the Syrians ate the god as a god; and the rich in the form of a fish with the head of a woman. This same divinity, probably the emblem of the prolific powers of nature, the Greeks seem to have adored as the heavenly Venus. At least this latter had a temple at Askelon, which was plundered of its riches by the Scythianas. (Herodot. i. 105.) Compare the article Daoos.

Askelon was the birthplace of Herod the Great, and of several distinguished Mussulmans.

ASMODIUS, or Asmodai, an evil spirit, mentioned in the apocryphal book Tobit, as having beset Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, and killed her seven first husbands, whom she had married before Tobit. (iii. 8; vi. 14; viii. 2, 3.) The rabbis have various legends respecting this spirit. He is properly the same as Ashmaidai, and also Abaddon, and, therefore, the same as the Greek Apollyon, i. e. the angel of death.

ASMONEANS, a name given to the Maccabees, descendants of Matthias, who was, according to Josephus, (Antiqu. lib. xii. cap. 5.) the son of Asmoneas. The family of the Asmoneans became very illustrious in the later times of the Hebrew commonwealth; it was the support of the religion and liberty of the Jews; and possessed the supreme authority, from Matthias to Herod the Great. See MACCABEES. It is no where said whether the Asmoneans were of the race of Jozedek, in whose family the office of high-priest continued in a lineal descent, till Alcimus was promoted to that dignity. This is certain of the Asmoneans, that they were of the course of Josaphat, which was the first class of the sons of Aaron; and, therefore, on failure of the former pontifical family, (which had now happened by the flight of Onias, son of Onias, into Egypt,) they had the best right to succeed to that station. Under this right Jonathan took the office, when nominated to it by the reigning king in Syria; being also elected thereto by the general suffrage of the people. Prid. Connect. &c. Part II. book iv.

ASNAPPER, a king of Assyria, who sent the Cuthemen to erect the great-palace of Nineveh. Extra lib. iv. 10. Many think this was Salmanasar; but others, with more probability, think it was Esar-haddon.

ASP, a kind of serpent, whose poison is of such rapid operation, that it kills almost the instant it penetrates, without the least entrance of syllable. It is a very small. The most remarkable mention of it in Scripture is in Psalm lviii. 4. where the adder or asp (rēb) is said to "stop its ears, that it may not hear the voice of the charmer." This is supposed by Forskal to be the cobra Boaetus, whose bite causes instant death. Some are of opinion that there is a sort of asp really dead, which is the most dangerous of its kind, and that the Psalmist here speaks of this. (Bochart, de Animal. Sac. Part II. lib. iii. cap. 6.) Others think that the asp, when old, becomes deaf; others, that it, as well as other serpents, hears exquisitely well, but that, when any one attempts to charm it, it stops its ears, by applying one very close to the earth, and stopping the other with the end of its tail. The expression is, probably, taken from actual observation of nature. That serpents are overcome, as if charmed, so that, while they would bite some persons with great violence, they are harmless to others, is a known fact: but the mode of producing this effect has not yet been communicated to European travelers. A Hottentot informed Mr. Taylor, that in his country, the naja, or hooded snake, was charged by a peculiarity of habit of crawling several times: but from his description of the attitude and situation of the creature, as hiding itself behind rocks, in holes, &c. and putting out its head from its retreat, as if to listen, he could conceive no idea of a charm, strictly so called. The attention of the creature seemed to be excited by the whistled tune, and that instant opportunity was taken to knock him on the head. But if there be a kind of asp, over which such a whistle, &c. has no power to excite his attention, but he steadily keeps himself safe within his hole of concealment, this may coincide with the Psalmist's idea, and justify the expression used by him. Such a serpent, so hid in the cleft of a rock, may look at his enemy, and may preserve himself motionless and secure, notwithstanding every art to ensnare him from his hiding place.

[The true asp of the ancients seems to be entirely unknown. It is frequently mentioned by ancient writers; but in such a careless and indefinite manner, that it is impossible to assign it to any species with precision, and still undecided with respect to the species by which Cleopatra procured her death; and, indeed, whether she was bitten or stung at all. In the English version, the word is uniformly used for the Heb. נף, the cobber Beason of Peshitta. In Benm. iii. 14, the Greek word θανατος occurs, and it is also used by the Seventy in Ps. cxli. 4. (3.) where it is for the Heb. שׁפע, adder. — R.

ASPHALTUS, OR J EWS' PITCH, bitumen, a gummy, inflammable mineral substance, with a smooth, shining surface, and usually of a dark brown color, not unlike common pitch. It is found in nature, partly as a dry, hard bezoal, mingled with chalk, marle, gypseum, or salt; and partly as a fluid, tar-like substance, issuing from crevices in rocks, and from the earth, or swimming on inland lakes. This last occurs most frequently on the Dead sea; compare Gen. xiv. 10. Tacitus Hist.—The ancients used this production, among other things, instead of mortar, and the walls of Babylon were cemented by it, Gen. xi. 3. In the neighborhood of Babylon there were abundant springs of asphaltus, at the place called In, or Hit; see D'Herbelot, Bib. Oriant. Art. Hit. It was used also to cover boats, etc. (Gen. vi. 14; Ex. ii. 2) and was, moreover, much employed in the preparation of uncertain, and was also used by the Babylonians in dressing dead bodies. Joseph. Ant. lib. vi. de Bello, cap. iv. sec cap. v. in Lat. p. 882. The asphaltus of the Dead sea, which rises, at particular seasons, from the bottom of the lake, is thought to be superior to every other kind. The Arabians fish for it diligently, or gather it on the shore, whither the wind drives it. It is shining, dark, heavy, and of a strong smell when burnt.

The oriental asses are not to be compared with those of northern countries; but are far more stately, active, and lively. Indeed they were anciently, as still, highly prized, and were especially preferred for riding on that account that the Jews were more accustomed to their sure-footedness. Hence we so often find mention of she-asses alone.—The ass was unclean by the law, because it did not chew the cud. To draw with an ox and an ass together was prohibited, Lev. xi. 26.

We read in Matt. xxii. 4, that, in order to accomplish a prophecy of Zacchariah, (ix. 9) our Saviour rode on an ass into Jerusalem, in a triumphant manner. This has been made a subject of ridicule by some; but we ought to consider, not only that the greatest men in Israel rode on asses anciently, as we have seen above, but, also, that God had thought fit absolutely to prohibit the use of horses and of chariots for war; (Deut. xix. 16; compare Josh. xi. 6) that David rode on a mule, and ordered Solomon to use it at his coronation; (1 Kings i. 33, 34) that afterwards, when Solomon and succeeding princes multiplied horses, they were rebuked for it; (Isaiah ii. 7; xxxix. 3) and that the removal of horses is promised in the times of the Messiah, Hosea i. 7; Micah v. 11; Zechar. i. 10. So that on the whole we find, that this action of our Lord is to be viewed not merely as an accomplishment of a prophecy, but also as a revival of an ancient and venerable Hebrew custom. So that on the whole we find, that this action of our Lord is to be viewed not merely as an accomplishment of a prophecy, but also as a revival of an ancient and venerable Hebrew custom. An uncertainty, if not a difficulty, has been started, whether to adhere to the opinion of Dr. Doddridge, or to that of Mr. Hervey, in respect to the kind of ass on which our Lord rode into Jerusalem. Dr. Doddridge observes, that the eastern asses are larger and much better than ours, and that our Lord's triumphant entry was not disgraced by indi-it to Dora. Suidas (in Damocrito, and in Juda) says, that Damocritos, or Democritos, the historian, averred that the Jews adored the head of an ass, made of gold; and added that they did it every seven years, after having cut him in pieces. Plutarch (Symposia, lib. iv. cap. 5.) and Tacitus, (Hist. lib. v.) being imposed on by this calumny, report, that the Hebrews adored an ass, out of gratitude for the discovery of a fountain by one of these creatures in the wilderness, at a time when the army of this nation was parched with thirst, and extremely fatigued. The heathen imitated the same worship to the early Christians; and Tertullian (Apolog. cap. 16.) reports, that certain enemies to the Christians exposed to public view a picture, wherein was represented a person holding a book in his hand, dressed in a long robe, with ass’s ears, and a foot like an ass, which picture was inscribed, "The God of the Christians has an ass’s hoof." Epiphanius, (de Hares.) speaking of the Gnostics, says, they taught that the god Sabaoth had the shape of an ass; but that others described him as shaped like a hog. Learned men who have endeavored to discover the origin of this opinion are very opinioned in this reason which Plutarch and Tacitus give for it, would be the most plausible, were there any truth in the fact on which they ground it. But nothing in the history of the Jews can be interpreted to favor it. Tanaquil Faber has attempted to prove, that this accusation proceeded from the temple in Egypt, called Osios, after Onias, the high-priest; (having been built by him at Heliopolis, B. C. 150.) as if this name came from mosa, an ass; which is, indeed, a plausible conjecture. Others have asserted, that the mistake of the heathen proceeded from an ambiguous mode of reading, as if the Greeks, meaning to say that the Jews adored heaven, Ouranon, might in abbreviation write Osios; whence the enemies of the Jews concluded that they worshipped mosa, an ass. Bochart (de Animal. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 15.) is of opinion that the error arose from an expression of Scripture: (Isaiah i. 20; xl. 5; viii. 14.) "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it;" in the Hebrew, Pi-Jehoosch, or Pi-Jeo. Now, in the Egyptian language, pico signifies an ass, the Alexandrian Egyptians, hearing the Jews often pronounce this word pico, might believe that they called on their god, and thence inferred that they adored an ass. But though these explications are ingenious, they are not conclusive; in face of a good reason cannot be given for the accusation, which might have arisen from a joke, or from accident. M. Le Meoime seems to have succeeded best, who says, that in all probability the golden urn containing the manna, which was preserved in the sanctuary, was taken for the head of an ass; and that the omer of manna might have been confounded with the Hebrew hamor, which signifies an ass. See Assaron.

II. ASS OF BALAAM. In the article Balaam, some account of his ass may be seen. Here we shall only inquire, whether it were a reality, or an idea, as an invention, or a vision of Balaam. Augustin, with the greater number of commentators, supposes it was a certain fact, and takes it literally. (Quast. in Gen. 48, 53.) He discovers nothing in the words; and assigns it a meaning better than the Thauring, or of Balaam, who heard his ass speak to him, and who replied to it, as to a reasonable person; and adds, as his opinion, that God did not give the ass a reasonable soul, but permitted it to pronounce certain words, to reprove the prophet's covetousness.

Gregory of Nyssa (in Vita Moses) seems to think, that the ass did not utter words; but that having bruised as usual, or a little more than usual, the diner, put the gaunt at every turn, and having gorged of beasts, and of birds, easily comprehended the meaning of the ass; and that Moses, designing to ridicule this superstitious art of augury, relates the matter as if the ass really spoke artificiously. (But see 2 Peter ii. 16.) Maimonides asserts the whole dialogue to be but a kind of fiction and allegory; whereby Moses relates what passed only in Balaam's imagination as real history. Philo, in his life of Moses, suppresses it entirely. And the greater part of the Jewish authors consider it, not as a circumstance which actually took place, but as a vision, or some similar occurrence.

Le Clerc solves the difficulty, by saying, Balaam believed in the transmigration of souls, passing from one body into another, from a man into a beast, reciprocally; and, therefore, he was not surprised at the ass's complaint, but conversed with it as if it were rational. Others have imagined different ways of solving the difficulties of this history.

In conclusion, Mr. Taylor assumes as facts, (1.) That Balaam was accustomed to augury and presages. (2.) That on this occasion he would notice every event capable of such interpretation, as presages were supposed to indicate. (3.) That he was deeply intent on the issue of his journey. (4.) That the whole of his conduct seems to Balak was calculated to represent himself as an extraordinary personage. (5.) That the behavior of the ass did actually PREFIGURE the conduct of Balaam in the three particulars of it which are recorded.—First, the ass turned aside, and went into the field; for which she was smitten, punished, re-enabled: so Balaam, on the first of his perverse attempts to curse Israel, was, as it were, smitten, reproved, punished. (1.) by God, (2.) by Balak. The second time the ass was moved, the afflicting Balak's foot against the wall: so Balaam, for his second attempt, was, no doubt, still further mortified. Thirdly, the ass, seeing inevitable danger, fell down and was smitten severely: in like manner Balaam, the third time, was overpowered by God, to speak truth, to his own disgrace; and escaped, not without hazard of his life, from the anger of Balak. Nevertheless, as Balaam had no sword in his hand, though he wished for one, with which to slay his ass, so, in face of this seeming inclination, had no power to destroy Balaam. In short, as the ass was opposed by the angel, but was driven forward by Balaam, so Balaam was opposed by God, but was driven forward by Balak, against his better knowledge. We are sure that Balaam wrote this narrative, and that Moses copied it, as the rabbins affirm, (see Balaam) this view of the subject would remove the difficulties which have been raised about it. It might then be entitled "a specimen of Balaam’s augury."
animals to the troops of India (a province at the head of the Indus, not our Hindooistan) deserves attention; because the troops of the onager are said to "return towards India, where they winter." Aristotle (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 36.) mentions the wild ass, which is said to exceed horses in swiftness; and Xenophon says (Cyrop. lib. 1.) that he has long legs, is very rapid in running, swift as a whirlwind, having strong and stout hoofs. Elian says the same; but that he may be tried, and when taken, is so gentle that he may easily be led about. Martial gives the epithet "handsome" to the wild ass—"Pulcher udest onager," (lib. xiii. Epigr. 100.) and Oppian describes it as "handsome, large, vigorous, of stately gait, and his coat of a silvery color, having a black band along the spine of his back; and on his flanks patches as white as snow." Mr. Morier says, "We gave chase to two wild asses, which had so much the speed of our horses, that when they had got at some distance, they stood still and looked behind at us, snorting with their noses in the air, as if in contempt of our endeavors to catch them." (Second Journey to Persia, p. 300.) The latest traveller who has described the onager is Sir R. K. Porter, in his "Travels in Persia," who also gives a figure of the animal. The mode of hunting it is, as it was in Xenophon's time, by means of several horses relieving each other, till the onager is completely tired. The color of Sir Robert's figure is a bright bay.

These animals inhabit the dry and mountainous parts of the deserts of Great Tartary, but not higher than about lat. 48°. They are migratory, and arrive in vast troops to feed during the summer, in the traces to the east and north of the sea of Araz. About autumn they collect in herds of hundreds, and even thousands, and direct their course southward towards India, to enjoy a warm retreat during winter. But they more usually retire to Persia, where they are found in the mountains of Cashin, and where part of them remain the whole year. They are also said to penetrate even to the southern parts of India, to the mountains of Malabar and Golconda.—These animals were anciently found in Palestine, Syria, Arabia Deserta, Mesopotamia, Persia, and Lycaonia: but they rarely occur in those regions at the present time; and seem to be almost entirely confined to Tartary, some parts of Persia and India, and Africa. Their manners greatly resemble those of the true ass, till one is enabled to conduct of a leader or sentinel; and are extremely shy and vigilant. They will, however, stop in the midst of their course, and even suffer the approach of man for an instant, and then dart off with the utmost rapidity. They have been at all times celebrated for their swiftness. Their voice resembles that of the common ass, but is shriller.

The Persians catch these animals alive for the sake of domestirizing them, or improving the breed of tame asses. The breed of asses in such high esteem in the East, is produced by crossing the tame kind with the ass thus reclaimed from a state of wildness.—These facts rest principally on the authority of the Russian professors Pallas and Gmelin.

It is to professor Gmelin, however, who brought a female and a colt from Tartary to St. Petersburg, that we are principally indebted for our acquaintance with the wild ass. The female, which had been caught when very young, had a great deal of small stature, and probably stunted in growth by its captivity, and by want of suitable food, travelled from Astracan to Moscow (1400 verstes) with the ordinary post, without any other repose than that of a few nights; she also travelled from Moscow to Petersburg (730 verstes), and did not seem to have suffered by the journey; though she died in the autumn following, apparently from the effect of the hardiness of a marshy soil, and the cold and humidity of so northern a climate. She had nothing of the dulness and stupidity of the common ass. "I remarked that she often passed two days without drinking, especially in moist weather, or when very heavy dew lay. She also preferred brackish water to fresh; and never drank of what was troubled. She loved bread sprinkled with salt, and sometimes would eat a handful of salt. I was told, that when at Derbent, she always ran to drink of the Caspian sea, though fresh water was nearer to her. She also selected plants impregnated with saline particles, or those of bitter juice. She loved raw cucumbers; and some herbs, which she refused when green, pleased her when dried. She would not touch odoriferous or marsh plants, nor even thistles. I was informed that the Persians, when taming the young onagers, feed them with rice, barley, straw, and bread. Our animal was extremely familiar, and followed persons who took care of her, freely, and with a kind of attachment. The smell of bread strongly attracted her; but, if any attempt was made to deprive her of it, she would show all the obstinacy of the ass: neither would she suffer herself to be approached behind, and if touched by a stick, or by the hand, on her hinder parts, she would kick; and this action was accompanied by a slight grumbling, as expressive of complaint. The male onager, which was bought at the same time as the female, but which died in the voyage from Derbent to Astracan, was larger and less docile. His length from the nose to the origin of his tail was five feet; his height in front, four feet four inches; his head, four feet seven inches; his head two feet in length; his ears one foot; his tail, including the tuft at the end, two feet three inches. He was more robust than the female; and had a bar or streak crossing at his shoulders, as well as that streak which runs along the back, which is common to both sexes. Some Tartars have assured me that they have seen the cross-bar in some males. Our onager was higher on her legs than the common ass; her legs also were more slender than those of the Persian horse, and the flesh of an onager is firmer than that of the ass, her ears well elevated, and showed a vivacity in all her motions. The color of the hair on the greater part of the body, and the end of the nose, is silvery white; the upper part of the head, the sides of the neck, and the body, are flaxen, or pale umber color. The mane is deep brown; it commences between the ears, and reaches the shoulders; its hair is soft, woolly, three or four inches long, like the mane of a young filly. The coat in general, especially in winter, is more silky and lustrous than that of the Persian horse, and resembles that of a camel. The Arabs, no less than the Tartars, esteem the flesh of the onager; and the Arab writers, who permit the eating of its flesh, make the same difference between this ass and the domestic ass as the Hebrews did, whose law did not permit the coupling of the onager with the ass, as being of different kinds."
ASSIDEANS, a term occurring in the books of the Maccabees, which some think comes from the Hebrew phrase, Assidias, meaning, pious, pious. Ecclesiasticus, (ch. xiv. 10.) praising the greatest men of his nation, calls them "merciful men;" which is equivalent to Assideans, taken in this sense. Others maintain, that the Assideans are the same as the Essenes, whose manner of living is so much commended by Josephus, Philo, Pliny, and others; an opinion which seems confirmed by 1 Macc. vii. 13. which calls the Essenes Astadim. Others have thought the Assideans were afterwards divided, and produced the Sadducees and Pharisees. The name of Sadducees signifies just: that of Pharisees, separated; to indicate their distinction above other Jews, by their justice and sanctity. The members of the Jewish church, after the captivity, were divided into the Essedim, or righteous, who observed only the written law of Moses; and the Chasarim, or pious, who superadded the constitutions and traditions of the elders. These Chasidim Prudeaux supposes to be the Essedim, Chiassideans; the Hebrew chETH, answering to our ch, being expressed sometimes in Greek by an aspirate; in Latin sometimes by an h; and sometimes being entirely omitted, as in Assideans. Scaliger supposed the Assideans to be a confraternity of Jews, whose principal devotion consisted in keeping up the edifices belonging to the temple, and who, not content with paying the common tribute of half a shekel a head, appointed for temple reparations, voluntarily imposed on themselves other taxes. They swore by the temple; every day, except the eleventh of Tiber, they offered a lamb in sacrifice, which was called the sin-offering of the Assedim; and from this sect sprang the Pharisees, who produced the Essedim. 1 Macc. ii. 42. represents the Assedim as a numerous sect, distinguished for valor and zeal. See Essene.

ASSOS, a maritime city, by some geographers described as belonging to Mysia, by others, to Troas. Luke, and others, went by sea from Troas to Assos; but Paul went by land thither, and meeting them at Assos, they went together to Mitylene, Acts xx. 13, 14. A.D. 56. But there were many cities of this name. (1.) A maritime city in Lycia. (2.) Another in the territory of Eolis. (3.) Another in Mysia. (4.) Another in Lydia. (5.) Another in Epirus Minor, the native country of Cleantus the philosopher, who was called the second Plato, chasidus, merciful, pious. The last city Paul sailed, Acts xx. 13. It was between Troas and Mitylene, therefore in the district of Troas; and is marked accordingly in the maps. Strabo says, that the luxurious kings of Persia had the grain of which their bread was made brought from Assos, the wine which they drank from Syria, and the water which they drank from the river Uleus. This need not be taken literally; the import of the phrase being that their power extended over these places; and that they received tribute from them.

ASSYRIA, a celebrated territory and empire, has its name from Ashur, (Ahurim, or Assur, the second son of Shem, (Gen. x. 22.) who settled in that country. But as the Chaldeans and Syrians in their dialect pronounced the name Ashur, instead of Ashur, so it is also called by the Greeks and Romans Assyria and Aturia. The name Ashur has maintained itself in an ancient city on the Tigris, not far from Mosul, which already lay in ruins in the time of Abulfeda. But the boundaries of Assyria have varied according to its success in arms. It was at first bounded by the Lydus and Caprus; but the name of Assyria, being more generally applied to all that territory which lies between Media, Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Babylon. It is now called Kurdistan. The empire of Assyria is generally supposed to have been founded by Ashur, son of Shem, who was driven from Ninurta by Nimrod, Gen. x. 10. 11. Bochart, however, adopts the marginal reading of the passage—"Out of that land, he (Nimrod) went forth into Assyria or Assyria, and built Nineveh,"—in which he has been followed by Faber, Hyde, Marshall, Wells, the authors of the Universal History, Hales, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, and others.

This opinion is supported, too, by the Targums of Onkelos and Jerusalem, by Theophilius of Antioch, and Jerome; and though not free from difficulty, appears to be the more consistent of the two interpretations. (See Nimrod.) Nimrod, then, may be considered as the founder of the new empire at Nineveh, which, being seated in a country almost exclusively peopled by the descendants of Ashur, had been called Ashur, or Assyria. Of Nimrod's successors we are ignorant. We read (Gen. xiv.) that in Abraham's time, about A. M. 2069, Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, in confederacy with certain kings, attacked the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighboring cities, which had rebelled. Under the Judges, (Judg. iii. 8.) about A. M. 2591, the Lord delivered Israel into the hands of Cushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, who oppressed them eight years. Julius Africanus says, that Ezechias reigned in Chaldea 224 years before the Arabsians, (i.e. A. M. 2443.) in the time of Isaiah. The Arabsians conquered the Chaldean empire, A. M. 2465, and kept it about 216 years, to A. M. 2682; and Belus, the Assyrian, succeeded the Arabsians fifty-five years before the foundation of the latter Assyrian empire by Nimus. Dionysius Halicarnasseus (Antiq. Rom. lib. i.) justly observes, that the Assyrian empire was, in the beginning, but of small extent; and what we have said confirms this; since we see kings of Shinar, Elam, Chaldea, and Ellasar, at a time when the Assyrian empire, founded by Nimrod, must have subsisted; and before Nimus, son of Belus, had founded, or rather aggrandized, the only empire of Assyria known to profane authors; for they had no knowledge of that established by Nimrod. During the reigns of David and Solomon the Assyrians were at nothing on this side the Euphrates. David subdued all Syria, without their concerning themselves about it; and when he attacked the Ammonites, they sent for succor to the other side of the Euphrates; (2 Sam. x. 16.) but David defeated those troops, and even obliged certain people on the other side the river to pay him tribute.

The first king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture is the sovereign who reigned at Nineveh, when Jonah went thither, about A. M. 5190. The prophet does not inform us who this monarch was; but he describes the city as being prodigiously large. From 2 Kings xv. 19. and 1 Chron. v. 26. we learn that about 50 years after this, Pul, king of Assyria, invaded the territories of Israel, under him. It is conjectured that Pul was the father of Sardanapalus; who began to reign, according to Ussher, A. M. 3237, and under whom the history of Assyria assumes a more consistent aspect.

The measure of Nineveh's destruction was completed. God raised up enemies against Sardanapalus, in the persons of Arbasces, governor of Media, and the Per.

sians and other of his allies, who besieged and took the capital, and induced the king to put himself to death. Thus terminated the ancient empire of the Assyrians, which had lasted from Nimrod, about 2500 years, and from Ninus, son of Belus, about 530 years, A. M. 3254. (Herodot. lib. i. c. 95.) Upon the death of Sardanapalus the empire was divided into the Assyrian, properly so called, and the Babylonian kingdoms. Araxes, whom Prideaux believes to be the Tiglath-pileser of the Scriptures, (2 Kings xv. 29, &c.) fixed the seat of his government at Nineveh, which continued the capital of the Assyrian empire. He was succeeded by Sennacherib, whose son and successor, Sennacherib, is so famous in sacred and profane history. He was killed by two of his sons, and succeeded by a third, Esarhadon; who, after having re-united the dismembered enemies of Chaldea and Assyria, left the throne to Saosdachinus, who reigned twenty years. This is supposed by some to be the prince who is named Nabuchodonosor, in Judith, but without probability. Saosdachinus was succeeded by Chynladon, the Nebuchodonosor mentioned in the Apocalypse, upon whose death the throne was filled by Sarchus, or Chynsladanus, the true Sardanapalus. Sarchus having rendered himself contemptible to his subjects by his effeminacy, Nabopolassar, to whom he had committed the government of Chaldea, determined upon seizing the crown, and for this purpose formed an alliance with Astyages, or Assasusar, son of the king of Media. With their united forces they besieged Nineveh, the capital city, and terminated the monarchy of the Assyrians; Sarchus having burned himself to death in his palace. Ante A. D. 612.—With this event the prophecies of Jonah, Zephaniah, and Nahum against Nineveh were fulfilled. See NINIVE.

[The history of the Assyrian empire is one of the most obscure portions of ancient biblical literature; and the manner in which it has hitherto been treated, has not contributed, in any measure, to dispel the darkness. In the want of all native historians, the only original sources from which the fragments of the earlier history of this country can be drawn, are the Old Testament, Herodotus, and Ctesias. These sources are all evidently independent of each other; but they agree in forming a connecting harmony, which is the chief point entirely discordant. Indeed the two Greek historians are so much at variance with the biblical writers, and also with themselves, especially in regard to the origin and duration of the Assyrian and Median empires, that most critics have assumed a double Assyrian dynasty; the first closed by Sardanapalus, about 888 B. C. and followed by Araxes and the Median kings; and the second commencing about 800 or 775 B. C. and subsisting along with the Median race. But as Herodotus and Ctesias both profess to have drawn from genuine sources, and yet differ from each other in important particulars, as much as if they were speaking of different states; and as there is no ground whatever for distrust of the accounts contained in the Old Testament respecting the nations with which the Hebrews came in contact, it would seem preferable, on every critical as well as other ground, to make the biblical accounts the foundation of the Assyrian history, illustrating them, nevertheless, so far as possible, by the Greek accounts, whenever these latter harmonize with them. This is done in the following synopsis; which has been compiled chiefly from the collections made by Rosenmueller and Genesis. (Rosenmueller, Bibl. Geogr. i. c. 91, seq. Gen. Commun. zu Is. xxxix. 1, etc. Thesaur. Ling. Hebr. p. 163, seq.)

That Assyria was one of the most ancient empires of Asia, appears from the united testimony both of the Bible and of foreign historians. In the geographical and ethnographical table of Genesis it is said, (Gen. x. 11,) that Nimrod went forth from Babylon to Assyria, i. e. conquered it, and built there Nineveh and other cities. That this is the proper translation of this passage, and not (as in the English version) that Ashur went forth and built Nineveh, is apparent from the connection; which is entirely broken up and destroyed by the latter mode of rendering,—Ashur, a son of Shem, being thus anomalously inserted among the descendants of Ham, and an event in his history narrated before his birth, which is first mentioned in v. 22. In the other mode, the narrative is uninterrupted; and hence the prophet Micah calls Assyria the land of Nimrod, Mic. v. 6. The native accounts preserved by Ctesias (in Diod. Sic. ii. 1, seq.) call the founder of the Assyrian kingdom Ninus; but there is no good reason extant for regarding him as a different person from Nimrod. The stories related by Ctesias of the extraordinary deeds of Ninus and his queen Semiramis, bear the stamp of exaggerated tradition, in which the actions of several kings, or perhaps of a whole dynasty, would seem to be referred to a single pair. The most that can be assumed from these accounts is, that the probable fact is, that the successors of Ninus continued to extend their conquests on every side. Indeed, as early as the time of Moses, the Assyrians appear to have made themselves already formidable as conquerors, who carried away the nations whom they subdued; for Balaam, who came from the Ephraimites, announces to the Kenites, a Canaanish tribe on the east side of the Jordan, that they should be carried into captivity by the Assyrians, (Num. xxiv. 22,) and adds that these conquerors should also in their turn be subdued by ships from Chittim, i. e. coming from the west, xxiv. 22. Pst. xxxiii. 8, the Assyrians are mentioned among David's enemies, in connection with the Moabites, Edomites, Philistines, and Tyrians; a proof that in his time, that is, the last part of the time, the Assyrian domination had extended itself into Syria.

The first king of Assyria mentioned in the Old Testament is Pul, who made his appearance on the border of Israel about 770 B. C. and compelled king Menahem to surrender to him the tribute due to Israel, in order to spare him and confirm him in his usurpation, 2 Kings xv. 19. In the subsequent internal divisions of the kingdom of the ten tribes, one of the parties seems also to have appealed to the Assyrians for aid; compare Hos. v. 13. But when, at a later period, Pekah king of Israel, and Rezin king of Syria, made an alliance against Judah, king Ahaz invited Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, to become his ally, and sent him all the silver and gold of the temple as a present. He accordingly besieged and took Damascus, put Rezin to death, and carried the inhabitants away to Kir, or Kur, a province of Assyria, 2 Kings xvi. 5—10. He did the same also with a part of the Israelites, 2 Kings xv. 26. Under the following king Shalmaneser, (Erumenassar, Tol. i. 2,) the Assyrian empire appears to have reached its most flourishing point. The king of Israel, Hoshea, became his tributary, (2 Kings xvii. 3,) but soon made an alliance with Egypt, and refused to pay the promised tribute. Shalmaneser now invaded Israel, (about 730 to 720 B. C.) besieged Samaria three years, and took it; reduced the country to an Assyrian province; transported the former inhabitants to Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Media; and introduced new populations from other parts of his own kingdom, and also from Babylonia, 2 Kings xiv. 6, 24; xvii. 9—11. He subdued, also, all Phoenicia, except the island of Tyre. (Jos. Ant. ix. 14. 2.) At this time, therefore, about 720 B. C. the Assyrian empire was at the summit of its power, and included all Upper Asia, from Persia to the Mediterranean, and from the Caspian to the Persian gulf. But the monarchs were not yet satisfied with these colossal dominions. Fearing, it would seem, that the south-western provinces might ally themselves with Egypt, and thus help to augment the power of that state, (as was actually the wish of a large party among the Jews; see Isa. xx. 5, 6; xxx. 2, seq. xxxi. 1, seq.) the successor of Shalmaneser, Sargon, undertook the conquest of Egypt. Tantam, his general, opened the way thither by the siege and capture of Ashdod; (Isa. xx. 1) and that about this time an Assyrian host actually penetrated into Egypt and captured No-Ammon, i. e. Thebes, or Diospolis, the capital of Upper Egypt, seems important, as it was the passage in Nahum ii. 10. But Sargon must soon have died, and his host withdrawn itself from Egypt and Palestine; for Hezekiah ventured, in the very first years of his reign, to fall away from Assyria and ally himself with Egypt, 2 Kings xxi. 7. Again, therefore, Sargon's successor, Sennacherib, made his appearance in Judea with an army, on his way to Egypt, took possession of all the Jewish cities, and demanded the surrender of Jerusalem, Isa. xxxvii. 1; 2 Kings xxi. 14—16. But in the mean time, hearing that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, was advancing against him, (Isa. xxxvii. 9; 2 Kings xix. 9) and the Lord also having almost destroyed his army by a pestilence, he raised the siege of Jerusalem, and retired to Nineveh, 2 Kings xviii. 13, seq. xix; Isa. xxxvi. xxxvii.

Encouraged, it would seem, by this successful expedition of Sennacherib against the western countries, the eastern provinces also of the Assyrian empire were now subjected to his yoke. Thus this time Media seems to have become independent under Dejoces; and also in Babylonia Merodach-balad had set himself up as an independent sovereign, but was murdered after a reign of six months. His successor, Cambyses, was murdered by Eugenius, a Median, in a battle, who took him prisoner, and thus brought Babylonia again under his dominion. He appointed his son Esdrachon, viceroy over it, and returned himself to Assyria. He now made an expedition against the Greeks, as far as to the hillock of the yoke, which this time seems to have been subdued. Above all, Nineveh, the capital, and the term Assyria in its most narrow sense seems sometimes to have meant only this province. Pinn. v. 12.

2. More generally Assyria means the kingdom of Assyria, including Babylon and Mesopotamia, and extending to the Euphrates, which is therefore used by Isaiah as an image of this empire, Isa. vii. 20; viii. 7. In one instance the idea of the empire predominates so as to exclude that of Assyria proper, viz. Gen. ii. 14, where the Hiddekel or Tigris is said to flow eastward of Assyria.

3. After the overthrow of the Assyrian state, the name continued to be applied to those countries which had been formerly under its dominion, viz. (a) To Babylonia, 2 Kings xxiii. 20; Jer. ii. 18. So Judith i. 5; ii. 1; v. 1. etc. where Nebuchadnezzar is called king of Assyria. (b) To Persia, Ezra xxii. 18, where Darius is also called king of Assyria. (c) Roman writers applied this name to Syria; but this use of it is unknown to the orientals; see Bochart Phaleg. ii. 3; Relandi Palest. 1012, seq. *R.

1. ASTAROTH, or ASTORETH, or ASARTH, a celebrated Phoenician goddess. In Scrip-Astaroth, this word is often plural, מְרַשָא; some—beans, אֶשֶא, corals, the grove; מְרַשָא, asereth,
or שַׁעַר, aserim,
woods; groves were her temples; in groves consecrated to her,
such obscenities were committed, as rendered ed her worship infamous.
She was goddess of the woods, the celestial goddess, and was also called the "queen of heaven." (Jer. xlv. 17, 18.) and sometimes her worship is described by that of the "host of heaven." (See Mest.) She is almost always joined with Baal, and is called gods; Scripture having no particular word for expressing a goddess.
It is supposed that the moon was adored under this name. Temples of the moon generally accompanied those of the sun; and while bloody sacrifices, or human victims, were offered to Baal, bread, liquor, and perfumes were presented to Astaroth; tables were prepared for her on the flat terrace-roofs of houses, near gates, in porches, and at cross-ways, on the first day of every month, which the Greeks called Hecate's supper. Jerome, in several places, translates the name of Astaroth by Φριαπός, as if to denote the licentiousness of her worship. The eastern people, in many places, worshipped the moon as a god, and represented its figure with a beard, and in armor. The statue in the temple of Heliospolis, in Syria, Plyn says, was that of a woman clothed like a man. Solomon, seduced by his foreign wives, introduced the worship of Astaroth into Israel; but Jezebel, daughter of the king of Tyre, and wife of Ahab, principally established her worship. Augustin assures us, that the Africans (descendants from the Phoenicians) maintained Astaroth to be Juno. But Herodias says, the Carthaginians call the heavenly goddess, the moon, Astaroche. The Phoenicians asserted confidently, says Cicero, that their Astarot was the Syrian Venus, born at Tyre, and wife of Adonis; very different from the Venus of Cyprus. Lucian, who wrote particularly concerning the goddesses of Syria, (Astarot,) says, expressly, that she is the moon; and adds, that Astarot is the same as the goddess of Egypt, who was represented with the head of an ox, or with horns on her head. But the manner of representing Astarot on medals is not almost the
to the same. Sometimes she is in a long habit; at other times, in a short habit; sometimes holding a long stick, with a cross on its top; sometimes she has a crown of rays; sometimes she is crowned with battlements; or by a victory. In a medal of Cæsarea Palestina, she is in a short dress, crowned with battlements, with a man's head in her right hand, and a staff in her left. This is believed to be the man's head mentioned by Lucian, which was every year brought from Egypt to Biblos, a city of Phœnicia. Sanchoniathos says, she was represented with a cow's head, the horns describing royalty, and the lunar rays.

Thus far Calmet, in accordance with the views of most of the earlier commentators; compare also Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. § 409; Münter, Religion der Babylonier, p. 20. But Gesenius, Rosenmüller, and others, who have devoted particular attention to the subject, have been led to adopt views somewhat different, and of the following purport. See Gesenius, Theobald, p. 125, the

grove; מְרַשָא, asereth,
or שַׁעַר, aserim,
woods; groves were her temples; in groves consecrated to her, such obscenities were committed, as rendered her worship infamous.

Astarothe, or Heb. Ashtoeth, plur. Ashtaroth, is the name of a Phœnician goddess, (2 Kings xxiii. 13.) whose worship was also introduced among the Israelites and Philistines, 1 Kings xi. 5, 33; 1 Sam. vii. 9; xxxi. 10. She is not commonly named in connection with Baal, Judg. ii. 13; x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 4; xii. 10. Another Hebrew name of the same goddess is מְרַשָא, Ascherah, i. e. the happy, the fortunate; or more simply fortune. This last name is commonly rendered in the English version "grove;" as also in the Septuagint, Vulgate, Luther, and others. But after reviewing all the passages in which the word occurs, Gesenius comes decidedly to the conclusion, that the meaning grove cannot be supported in any one of them, but is manifestly contrary both to the etymology and to the context. Both these Hebrew names of Astaroth, when used in the plural, often signify images or statues of Astaroth; which are then said to be broken down, destroyed, &c. In connection with the worship of Astaroth there was much of dissolute licentiousness; and the public prostitutes of both sexes were regarded as consecrated to her. See 2 Kings xxiii. 7; comp. Lev. xiv. 29; Deut. xxiii. 18.

As now Baal, or Bel, denotes, in the astrological mythology of the East, the male star of fortune, the planet Jupiter, so Astaroth signifies the female star of fortune, the planet Venus. The word מְרַשָא, Ashtoeth, for which an etymology has long been sought, is equivalent to the Syriac ashterah and es ter, and to the Persian āstār, which all signify star; and it therefore denotes by way of eminence, the star, i. e. Venus. The ancient Orient regarded this planet as the goddess of love and fortune; hence it was called by the Babylonians Ma'tes, (which see,) and by the Hebrews also Asherah, the fortunate; see above. It was also worshipped under the names of Anath, Nana, Mylitta, among the Babylonians and Armenians, with many licentious rites, which are mentioned in the Zabian books. It should be here remarked, that bishop Münter conceives this view of the subject only in respect to a later age; but supposes that originally Baal and Astaroth were the representatives of the sun and moon; Bel, the Babylonian, p. 300. Sanc. Tholos, that this luminary was worshipped under different names in the East. Astaroth was probably the same as the Ιας of Egypt, who was represented with the head of an ox, or with horns on her head. But the manner of representing Astaroth on medals is not always the same. Sometimes she is in a long habit; at other times, in a short habit; sometimes holding a long stick, with a cross on its top; sometimes she has a crown of rays; sometimes she is crowned with battlements; or by a victory. In a medal of Cæsarea Palestina, she is in a short dress, crowned with battlements, with a man's head in her right hand, and a staff in her left. This is believed to be the man's head mentioned by Lucian, which was every year brought from Egypt to Biblos, a city of Phœnicia. Sanchoniathos says, she was represented with a cow's head, the horns describing royalty, and the lunar rays.

A part of the Phœnician mythus respecting Astaroth is given by Sanchoniathon, Euseb. de Prep. Evang. i. 10. "Astaroth the most high, and Jupiter Demar dous, and Adonis king of the gods, reigned over the country, with the ascens of Saturn. And Astaroth placed the head of a bull upon her own head, as an emblem of sovereignty. As she was journeying about the world, she found a star wandering in the air, and having taken possession of it, she consecrated it in the sacred island of Tyre. The Phœnician says that Astaroth is Venus." This serves to account for the horned figure under which she was represented; and affords testimony of a star consecrated as her emblem.

II. ASTAROTH, Astaroth-Carnaim, or Kar
naim, (Gen. xiv. 5.) was a city beyond Jordan, six miles from Adra, or Edri, between that city and Abila, now Mezara. Astaroth-Carnaim is supposed to be derived from the goddess Astaroth, adored there, who was represented with horns, or a crescent; for carnaim signifies horns. In 2 Macr. xii. 26, mention is made of a temple of the goddess Astarte, at Carnion, which is doubtless the same as Astaroth-

ASYAGES, otherwise Cyaxares, king of the Medes, successor of Phraortes, reigned forty years, and died A. M. 3409, ante A. D. 505. He had a son, called Astages, or Darius; and two daughters, Mandane and Amyt. For Astages, or Darius, see the following article. Amyt married Nebuchadnezar, son to Nabopolassar, king of Chaldea, and was mother of Evil-merodach. Mandane married Cambyses the Persian, and was mother of Cyrus.

II. ASTAGES, otherwise Anaxerxes, (Tobit xiv. 15; Dan. ix. 1.) or Astyages, (Dan. vi. 1. Gr.) or Darius the Mede, (Dan. v. 31.) or Cyaxares, (by his father's name,) or Apandra, was, by his father, Cyaxares, appointed governor of Media, and sent with Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, against Sardis, (or Chissaladan,) king of Assyria, whom they besieged in Nineveh, took that city, and dismembered the Assyrian empire. See Assyria.

Astages was with Cyrus at the conquest of Babylon, and succeeded Bela-bazzar, king of Babylon, Dan. xvi. 31.

Cyrus succeeded him, 3439, ante D. M. 13.

ASUPPIM, house of. This word occurs 1 Chron. xxvi. 15, but considerable diversity of opinion exists among learned men as to its import. Dr. Geddes renders it, "the store-rooms," and understands it of the upper galleries of the temple, where the stores were probably kept. Others understand by it the treasury of the temple. This opinion is grounded 1. upon the import of the word; 2. because Obed-Edom (whose sons are said to be placed at Asuppim) is said (2 Chron. xxv. 24.) to have the custody of the treasurers. Dr. Lightfoot, who has a long discussion on the subject, concludes that Asuppim were two gates in the western wall, which stood most south, or nearest to Jerusalem; and that the house of Asuppim was a large building which ran between them, and was a treasury of divers rooms, for laying up things that served for the use of the temple.

[See 2 Chron. xxv. 24.]

The meaning of the word is collections, i. e. stores; and house of Asuppim is, therefore, a store-house connected with the temple, probably on the southern part, 1 Chr. xxvi. 15.

R.

ASYLUM, Gr. άσυλον, from a and sīn, prey. This word signifies a sanctuary, whither unfortunate persons might retire for security from their enemies, and from whence they could not be forced. It has been supposed, that Hercules's grandsons were the instituters of these places of refuge, in Greece, if not in Europe; for, apprehending the resentment of those whom Hercules had ill-treated, they appointed an asylum or temple of mercy at Athens. Cadmus erected another at Thebes, and Romulus another at Rome, on mount Palatine. That of Daphne, near Antioch, was very famous, 2 Mac. iv. 34. Theseus built an asylum at Athens in favor of slaves, and of the poor who should fly thither, from the oppression of the rich. There was one in the isle of Calauria. The temples of Apollo at Delphi, of Juno at Samos, of Esculapius at Delos, of Bacchus at Ephesus, and many others in Greece, had the privilege of being asylia. Romulus gave this right to a wood adjoining the temple of Vejovis. (Virg. Æneid. viii. 542.)

Ovid speaks of a wood near Ostium, that enjoyed the same privilege. (Fast. i. 1.) Augustin observes, (de Civit. lib. i. cap. 34.) that the whole city of Rome was an asylum to all strangers. The number of these privileged places was so much increased in Greece, under the emperor Tiberius, that he was obliged to regulate them. (Sueton. in Tiberio. Tact. Annal. lib. iii. cap. 6.) But his decree was little observed after his death.

The altar of burnt sacrifices, and the temple at Jerusalem, were sanctuaries. Hither Joab retired; (1 Kings ii. 29, 31.) but Solomon, observing that he would not quit the altar, ordered him to be killed there. Moses commands (Exod. xxi. 14.) that any who had committed murder, and fled for protection to the altar, should be dragged from thence. Sanctuaries were not for the advantage of wicked men, but in favor of the innocent, when attacked unjustly. When criminals retired to the sanctuary of a temple, they were either starved, or forced thence by fires kindled around them. See Refug.

ATAD. At Adad's threshing floor (Gen. i. 11.) the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, mourned for Jacob, whence it was afterwards called Abel-Mizraim, "the mourning of the Egyptians." See Abel-Mizraim.

ATARGATIS, a goddess of the Philistines, called by the Greeks Derceto, Plin. v. 23. She was represented with the head and upper parts of a beautiful female, and the tail of a fish. She was worshipped particularly at Askelon, which see. She had also a temple at Carnain, i. e. Astaroth-Carnain, 2 Mac. xiii. 36; comp. 1 Mac. iv. 43. This last circumstance would naturally lead to the conclusion, that Atargatis or Derceto was the same as Astaroth or Astarte; and further, Herodotus expressly calls the goddess worshipped at Askelon, Venus, (l. 105.) i. e. Astarte. See Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. iii. 509. Gesen. *R.

ATAROTH. There are several cities of this name.—(1.) One in the tribe of Gad, beyond Jordan, (Num. xxxiii. 3, 34.) the same, probably, with Atroth-Shophan, given to this tribe, v. 31, on the borders of Ephraim, between Janoah and Jericho, (Josh. xvi. 7.) probably Ataroth-Addar, xvi. 5; xviii. 13.—(2.) Ataroth Beth-Joab, in Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 54.

ATILLAH, daughter of Abah, king of Israel, and wife of Joram, king of Judah. Being informed that Jehu had slain her son Ahaziah, and forty-two princes of his family, she resolved to destroy all the princes of the blood-royal of Judah, that she might ascend the throne without a rival. 2 Kings xi. 10. But Jehosheba, daughter of Joram, and sister of Ahaziah, took Joash, son of Ahaziah, and kept him secretly, for six years, in the temple.

In the seventh year, the high-priest Jehoiada determined to place him on the throne of his ancestors; which he accomplished amid the acclamations of the multitude. Athaliah, hearing the noise, entered the temple; seeing the young king seated on his throne, she tore her clothes, and cried, "Treason! Treason!

Jehoiada commanded the Levites, who were armed, to carry her without the temple, where she was slain, A. M. 3126; ante A. D. 884.

ATHENS, a celebrated city and powerful commonwealth of Greece, distinguished by the military talents, learning, eloquence, and politeness of its inhabitants. When Paul visited it, A. D. 52, he found it plunged in idolatry; occupied in inquiring and reporting news; curious to know every thing; and divided in opinion concerning religion and happiness,
Acts xvii. The apostle, taking opportunities to preach Jesus Christ, was brought before the judges of the Areopagus; where he gave an illustrious testimony of the remarkable instance of powerful reasoning. (See Areopagus.) The schools, professors, and philosophers of Athens were very famous. The Lyceum, where Aristotle taught, was on the banks of the river Ilissus. The academy was part of the Ceramicus, which, being at first marshy and unwholesome, was drained and planted; in these shady walks Plato read his lectures; whence his disciples were called Academica. There were other sects of philosophers at Athens, as the Stoics, the Cynics, and the Epicureans.

As the customs of this city illustrate certain passages of Scripture, we shall add a few particulars relating to them; principally extracted from Stuart's Antiquities of Athens.

On the architrave of a Doric portico, yet standing in Athens, are inscriptions to the following purpose:

"The people [of Athens] out of the donations bestowed [on them] by Calis Julius Caesar, the god; and by the emperor Agrippa, the son of the god; [dedicate this] to Minerva Archegetis [chief conductor] &c.

"The people [in honor] Lucius Caesar, the son of the emperor Augustus Caesar, the son of the god.

The reader will compare these public memorials with the observation of the apostle, that Athens was too much addicted to the adoption of objects for worship and devotion. It was not, indeed, singular in worshipping the reigning emperor; but flattery could be carried no higher than to characterize his descendants as deities, and one of them as no less a deity than Providence itself. (Compare Luke xxii. 25.)

The great festival at Athens in honor of Minerva, called the Pan-Athenian procession, deserves particular notice. One of its greatest ornaments was a ship, which was kept in a repository near the Areopagus, and is mentioned by Suidas, who says, among the Athenians, the peplus is the sail of the Pan-Athenian ship, which every fourth year they prepare for Minerva, conducting it through the Ceramicus to the south of the city. The peplus was also esteemed as the veil of Minerva. This reference of a ship to Minerva, Mr. Taylor thinks, is not without its meaning; and indeed, he adds, we find that almost every ancient divinity is directly, or indirectly, related to the sea. The famous statue of Minerva, of ivory and gold, was the work of Phidias. Pausanias says, it was standing erect, her garment reaching to her feet; she had a helmet on; and a Medusa's head on her breast; in one hand she held a spear, and on the other stood a Victory of about four cubits high. Pliny informs us, that the statue was twenty-six cubits high; in which, perhaps, he included the pedestal, on which, they both say, the birth of Pandora was represented. It is probable this statue was painted. The gold about it weighed forty talents; and might be worth 120,000. sterling. Lachares stript it off about one hundred and thirty years after the statue had been finished. The Areopagus was not far from the ascent and entrance to the Acropolis, and the Propylaeum, this is described in its proper place. See Areopagus.

From the invasion of Xerxes to the irruption of Alaric into Greece, (A. D. 396), Athens changed masters upwards of twenty times. It was twice burnt by the Persians; destroyed by Philip II. of Macedon; again by Sylla; the city was plundered by Tiberius; desolated by the Goths in the reign of Claudius; and the whole territory ravaged and ruined by Alaric. That conqueror, however, spared much of Athens, and perhaps most of the antiquities. From the reign of Justinian to the thirteenth century, the city remained in obscurity, though it continued to be a town, and the head of a small state. It supplied Roger, king of Sicily, with silkworms, in 1130; was besieged by Sger, a petty prince of the Moors, in 1204; but was successfully defended by the archbishop. It was seized by Boniface, marquis of Montauret, who appointed one of his followers duke of Athens. It was a chief of the kingdom of Sicily, during the latter part of the fourteenth century; and then fell into the possession of Reinier Acciajuoli, a Florentine, who bestowed it to the Venetians. Oman, general of Muhomet the Great, seized it in 1455. It was sacked by the Venetians in 1464; was bombarded and taken by them in 1687; and lost to the Turks, again, in 1688. It was always of some consideration; and those writers who describe it as reduced to a village [Boe Ant. Grec. p. 20.] were misconceived. The name Selinthe, which they give it, is a corruption of Stilinthes.

The population of Athens, in 1812, was about 12,000, about a fifth part only of which were Turks; but the sanguinary contest which has been since carried on between the Greeks and the Turks, has left it but a mass of ruins.

ATONEMENT, i. e. RECONCILIATION. We have evidently lost the true import of this word, by our present manner of pronouncing it. When it was customary to pronounce the word one as om as (as in the time of our translators) then the word atonement was resolvable into its parts, at-one-ment, or the means of being at one, i. e. reconciled, united, combined in fellowship. This seems to be precisely its idea, Rom. v. 11. "being (to God) reconciled—or at-one-ed, we shall be saved by his (Christ's) life, by whom we have received the at-one-ment," or means of reconciliation. Here, it appears, the word atonement does not mean a ransom, price, or purchase paid to the receiver, but a restoration of accord, which is, perhaps, the most exact idea we can affix to the word expiation or atonement under the Mosaic law. Sacrifices, &c. were appointed means for restoring fellowship and accord between God and the nation of Israel; in other words, of rendering God, or certain of the divine attributes, as justice, &c. eternally propitious, capable of holding (i. e. satisfied to hold) communion with the people; by their interposition effectually restoring that one-ness which transgression had violated.—In Job xxxiii. 24. where our translators have placed in the text ransom, and in the margin atonement, the marginal word seems preferable—"deliver him from going down to the pit of death, for I have accepted an atonement for his life; therefore his youth shall return—his flesh become fairer than a child's." To justify these ideas, we may refer to Num. xvi. 46: "Go quickly, make reconciliation, for wrath is gone out." Lev. xi. 11. "Aaron shall make reconciliation for himself and his house." Lev. iv. 20. et al. "The priest shall make reconciliation for him, and he shall be forgiven." 2 Sam. xxii. 3. David said to the Gibeonites, "Wherewith shall I make the reconciliation, that ye ATONEMENT, DAY OF, was the tenth of Tisri, which nearly answers to our September. The Hebrews call it 'Kippur, pardon, or expiation, because the faults of the year were then expiated. The principal ceremonies were the following: (Lev. xvi.) The high-priest, after he had washed, not only his hands and his feet, as usual at common sacrifices, but his whole body, dressed himself in plain linen like the other priests, wearing neither his purple robe, nor the ephod, nor the pectoral, because he was to expiate his own sins, together with those of the people. He first offered a bullock and a ram for his own sins, and those of the priests, putting his hands on the heads of the victims, and confessing his own sins, and the sins of his house. Afterwards, he received from the princes of the people two goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, to be offered in the name of the whole nation. The lot determined which of the two goats should be sacrificed, and which set at liberty. After this, the high-priest put some of the sacred fire of the altar of burnt-offerings into a censer, threw incense upon it, and entered with it, thus smoking, into the sanctuary. After having perfumed the sanctuary with this incense, he came out, took some of the blood of the young bullock he had sacrificed, carried that also into the sanctuary, and, dipping his fingers in it, sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the veil, which separated the holy from the sanctuary, or most holy. Then he came out a second time, and beside the altar of burnt-offerings killed the goat which the lot had determined to be the sacrifice. The blood of this goat he carried into the most holy place, and sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the veil, which separated the holy from the sanctuary; from thence he returned into the court of the tabernacle, and sprinkled both sides of it, and the four corners of the tabernacle, with the blood of the goat. None of the priests, or people, were admitted into the tabernacle, or into the court. This being done, the high-priest came to the altar of burnt-offerings, wetted the four horns of it with the blood of the goat, and young bullock, and sprinkled it seven times with the same blood. The sanctuary, the court, and the altar being thus purified, he directed the goat which was set at liberty by the lot, to be brought to him, which being done, he put his hand on the goat's head, confessed his own sins, and the sins of the people, and then delivered it to a person to carry it to some desert place, and let it loose, or throw it down some precipice. (See Scape Goat.) This being done, the high-priest washed himself all over in the tabernacle, and, putting on other clothes, (some think his pontifical dress, his robe of purple, the ephod, and the pectoral,) sacrificed two rams for burnt-offering, one for himself, and the other for the people. The day was a great solemnity of the Hebrews; a day of rest, and of strict fasting. Leo of Modena, Buxtorf, and others, have collected many particulars relative to the solemnities of this day, from the rabbins, as may be seen in the larger edition of this work, art. Expiation, Abs., &c.

AVE, a plain in Syria; the name, probably, as the plain of Baal-beck, or valley of Baal, where there was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. It is situated between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and hence called the valley of Lebanon, Josh. xi. 17; Amos i. 5.
AVENG. See REVENGE.

I. AVIM, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 3.

II. AVIM, a people descended from Hevseus, son of Canaan, who dwelt originally in the country afterward possessed by the Caphtorim, or Philistines, Deut. ii. 23; Josh. xiii. 3. There were also Avim, or Hivites, at Shechem, or Gibeon, Josh. ix. 7; Gen. xxxvi. 2. There were some also beyond Jordan, at the foot of mount Hermon, Josh. xi. 3. Bochart thinks that Cadmus, who conducted a colony of Phoenicians into Greece, was a Hivite; his name, Cadmus, deriving from the Hebrew Kedem, the East, because he came from the eastern parts to Canaan; and the name of his wife, Hermione, from mount Hermion, at the foot of which the Hivites dwelt. In this case, the metamorphosis of Cadmus's companions into serpents, is founded on the significance of the name Hivites; which, in the Phoenician language, signifies serpents. The country of the Avim was also called Hazerim; (Deut. ii. 23) in the eastern interpreters and Pliny, Raphia. Their territory ended at Gaza, beginning at the river of Egypt; and thus extending forty-four miles. Sometimes this country appears to be called Shur; which the Arabic renders Gerarim, Gen. xxxi. 1. See GERAR.

AVITH, the capital city of Hadad, king of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 35.

AXE, a well-known instrument of iron, used for cutting; and often metaphorically employed in Scripture, for a person or power, who, as a cutting instrument in the hand of God, is employed to lop off branches and boughs, and sometimes to cut down the tree itself. Thus, if sinners be compared to trees in a forest, he who smites them is compared to an axe, Isa. x. 15. This is especially apparent in the proverbial phraseology used by John the Baptist: (Matt. iii. 10; Luke iii. 9.) "The axe is laid to the root of the trees"—irresistible punishment, destruction, is near. We risk little in referring this (ultimately) to the Roman power and armies; which, as an axe, most vehemently cut away the very existence of the Jewish polity as state. In this sense it coincides with our Lord's expression, "I am come to send a sword upon the earth"—more properly on the land; that is, of Judaea. See Judges ix. 8; Psalm lxxiv. 5; Is. xiv. 6—9; Ezek. xvii. 22—24; xxxiii. 3. Also, Rev. ii. 20, also sometimes so called. Josephus mentions a mountain of this name, near to which Judas Macabaeus fought against Baccides, in his last encounter. In 1 Macc. ix. 15, it is called mount Azotus.

AZARIAH, high-priest of the Jews, (1 Chron. vi. 9.) and perhaps the same with Amariah, who lived under Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xix. 11. about A. M. 3092.

II. AZARIAH, son of Johanah, high-priest of the Jews, 1 Chron. vi. 10. Perhaps the same with Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, killed A. M. 3164, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 22.

III. AZARIAH, the high-priest who opposed Uzziah, king of Judah, in offering incense to the Lord, 2 Chron. xxvi. 17.

IV. AZARIAH, a high-priest in the reign of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxxii. 10.

V. AZARIAH, the father of Seraiah, the last high-priest before the captivity, 1 Chron. vi. 14.

VI. AZARIAH, son of the high-priest Zadok; but we do not read that he succeeded his father, 1 Kings iv. 2.

VII. AZARIAH, captain of Solomon's guards, 1 Kings iv. 5.
that Ashdod was a place of great strength and consequence. Its New Testament name is Azotus, and here Philip was found, after his conversion of the eunuch at Gaza, distant about thirty miles, Acts viii. 40.

Azotus was a port on the Mediterranean, between Ashkelon and Ashdod, or between Gaza and Jannim, (Josephus, Antiq. xiii. 23.) i.e. it lay between these cities, but not directly, nor in the same sense. The present state of the town is thus described by Dr. Wittman: (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 263.) "Pursuing our route through a delightful country, we came to Azdiq, called by the Greeks Azotus, and under that name mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles; a town of great antiquity, provided with two small entrance gates. In passing through this place, we saw several fragments of columns, capitales, cor- nices, &c. of marble. Towards the centre is a hand- some mosque, with a minaret. By the Arab inhabi- tants Ashdod is called Mezdel. Two miles to the south, on a hill in a ruin, having in its centre a lofty column still standing entire. The delightful verdure of the surrounding plains, together with a great abundance of fine old olive trees, rendered the scene charmingly picturesque. In the villages, tobacco, oranges and vegetables are cultivated abundantly by the inhabitants; and the fertile and extensive plains yield an ample produce of corn. Ashdod may be seen from the 'sleeping hill of easy ascent,' near Jaffa, or Joppa." See Aziz.

BAAL

I. BAAL, or BAAL, (governer, ruler, lord) a god of the Phoenicians and Cananites. Baal and Astaroth are commonly mentioned together; and, as it is believed that Astaroth denotes the moon, Calmet concludes that Baal represents the sun. The name Baal is used, in a generic sense, for the superior god of the Phoenicians, Chaldeans, Moslems, and others; in some cases, it is connected with the name of some place or quality; as Baal-Peor, Baal-Zebub, Baal-Gad, Baal-Zephon, Baal-Berith. Baal is the most ancient god of the Canaanites, and, perhaps, of the East; and the Hebrews too often imitated the idolatry of the Canaanites, in xv. 19. They offered human sacrifices to him, and erected altars to him, in groves, on high places, and on the terraces of houses. Baal had priests and prophets consecrated to his service; and many infamous actions were committed in his festivals. Some learned men have maintained that the Baal of Pho- nicia was the Saturn of Greece and Rome; and cer- tainly there was great conformity between their ser- vices and sacrifices. Others are of opinion that Baal was the Phoenician (or Tyrian) Hercules, (an opinion not inconsistent with the other.) but it is generally concluded that Baal was the sun; and, on this admission, all the characters which he assumes in Scripture, very nearly coincide. The great luminary was adored over all the East, and is the most ancient deity acknowledged among the heathens. See IDOLATRY.

The Hebrews sometimes called the sun Baal-shamin. Shamin means Lord,护肤品. Baal planted groves, and worshipped all the host of heaven; but Josiah, desirous to repair the evil introduced by Manasseh, put to death "the idolatrous priests that burnt incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets, and to all the host of heaven. He commanded all the vessels that were made for Baal, and for the grove, (Ashreb, or Astaroth,) and for all the host of heaven, to be brought forth out of the temple. He took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given unto the sun, and burnt the chariots of the sun with fire." Here the worship of the sun is particularly described; and the sun itself is clearly expressed by the name of Baal, 2 Kings xxiii. 11. The temples and altars of the sun, or Baal, were generally on eminences, Manasses placed in the two courts of the temple at Jerusalem altars to all the host of heaven, and, in particular, to Astarte, or the moon. 2 Kings xxi. 5. Jeremiah threaten those of Judah, who had sacrificed to Baal on the house-top, (ch. xxxii. 39,) and Josiah destroyed the altars which Abaz had erected on the terrace of his palace, 2 Kings xxiii. 19. Human victims were offered to Baal, as they were to the sun. The Persian Mithra (who is the god of the (sun) was honored with like sacrifices, as was also Apollo. Jeremiah reproaches the inhabitants of Ju- dah and Jerusalem with "building the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal," (chap. xix. 5.)—an expression which appears to be used for actual staving by fire of the unhappy victims to Baal.

The Scripture calls temples consecrated to Baal, i. e. to the sun, cheremsees, Lev. xvi. 30; 1 Sam. xvii. 9; xxvii. 2; Esth. vi. 4; and 2 Chron. xxvii. 4. They were places enclosed with walls, in which a per- petual fire was maintained: they were frequent in the East, particularly among the Persians; and the Greeks called them pryaeis, or pyraeis, from the Greek pry, fire, or pyro, a funeral pile. There was in them, says Strabo, (lib. xv.) an altar, abundance of ashes, and a fire never suffered to go out. Maundrel, in his journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, observed some remains of them in Syria. (The word pryains signifies, properly, a temple from the classical passage, 2 Chr. ix. 4.) A species of idol statues, or images, which stood upon the altars of Baal. The word is, therefore, always properly rendered in the English version isgoreh. The expression of Jeremi is not improbably derived from the sun-columns. The god Baal Chammah (cur) is not unfrequently mentioned in Phoenican inscriptions, which is best explained by Baal i. e. Deus ostera. E.

Some critics have thought that the god Bailes of the Chaldeans and Babylonians was Nimrod, their first king; others, that he was Belus the Assyri- an, father of Ninus; and others, a son of Semiramis. Many have supposed Belus to be the same with Jupiter; but Calmet concludes that Baal was worshipped as the sun among the Phoenicians and Canaanites; and that he was often taken in general for the great god of the eastern people.

The preceding observations are mostly from Cal- met himself; but as very much of the idolatry at- tended to in the Old Testament is derived from, or connected with, the rites of Baal, it seems important to give here the views of later commentators, who have been led to investigate the subject with particular care. The principal of these are Gesenius, (in his Thesaurus Ling. Heb. p. 294, and in his Comment. zu Isr. ii. p. 335,) and bishop Münzer, of Copenhagen, in his work entitled "Religion der Babylonier," Copenhagen, 1827, p. 16, seq.

The word Baal, in the Old Testament, when employed with the article, and without further addition, i.e. the Baal, i. e. the Lord, denotes an idol of the Phoenicians, and particularly of the Tyrians, whose worship was also more or less tolerated, with great solemnities, among the Hebrews, and especially at Samaria, along with that of Ashtar, Judg. vi. 25, seq. 2 Kings x. 18, seq. (See ASAROTH I.) In the plural, Baalim, the word signifies images or statues of Baal, Judg. ii. 11; x. 10, &c.—Of the extent to which the worship of this idol was domesticated among the Phoenicians and Carthaginians, we have an evidence in the proper names of persons; as among the former Edhebaal, Jerubaal; and among the latter, Hannibel, Asrubal, &c.—Among the Babylonians the same idol was worshipped under the name of Bel; which is only the Aramaean form of Baal, i. e. B'l for B'l, e. g. Isr. xlv. 1; Jer. l. 2; li. 44, &c. His worship was established in that city in the famous tower of Babel, the uppermost room of which was served at the same time as an observatory, and was the repository of a collection of carefully observed observations. (Herodot. i. 181—183. Dios. ii. 10. Strabo. xvi. 1. 6.) See also the article BABEL.—By Greek and Roman writers the Phcenican Baal is called Hercules and Hercules Tyrius. (Her. ii. 14. Arrian, Exp. Alex. ii. 12, 12 Macc. iv. 18, 30.)

That in the astronomical, or rather astrological mythology of the East, we are to look for the origin of this worship in the adoration of the heavenly bodies, is conceded by all critics. But, in consequence of the varying statements of ancient authors, who lived at different periods, a considerable diversity of opinion has arisen in respect to what heavenly body we are to regard Baal as representing. The more common opinion has been, that Baal, or Bel, is the sun; and that, under this name, this luminary received divine honors. Bishop Münzer supposes that this was the case at least originally; (p. 17.) that the fundamental idea of all oriental idolatry,—which may also be traced from India to the north of Europe,—is the primeval power of nature, which is personified in the sun, and the conception of productive power. Of these two, the male and female powers of nature, he supposes (with others) the sun and moon to have been worshipped as the representatives under the names of Baal and Ashtar, at least by the most ancient Babylonians and other Semitic tribes.—Gesenius, fixing his view more particularly on a later period, finds that the Greek and Roman writers give to the Babylonian Bel the name of Jupiter Belus. (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 10. Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 16. Dios. ii. 8, 9.) By this name, however, they did not mean the "father of the gods," but the planet Jupiter, Stella Jovis, (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 20.) which was regarded, along with the planet Venus, as the principle of all good, the guardian and giver of all good fortune; and forms with Venus the most fortunate of all constellations, under which alone fortunate sovereigns can be born. (Comm. i. 11. ii. p. 355, seq.) Hence it is also called, by the Arabsians, Fortuna maior. (See GEO, and MEN.) This planet, therefore, Gesenius supposes to have been the object of worship under the name of Baal; as also Venus under that of Ashtar.

Not that the sun was not an object of idolatrous worship among those nations; but in that case he is represented under the name of Shatannah, (lord of the heavens,) Baal-hamman, Baal-shemesh, &c. (Theesaur. p. 224, col. 2.)—This view, it will be observed, is directly controverted by Münzer, only in reference to the very earliest ages.

The following passages have been taken from the English edition of this work, not as illustrating, in any way, the Bible or the idolatrous worship of Baal, but as being in themselves interesting, and as, perhaps, casting a faint light on the remark of bishop Münzer above, in reference to the worship of the male and female powers of nature, "from India to the north of Europe."—R.

The worship of Belus, Belenus, or Belinus, was general throughout the British islands; and certain of its rites and observances are still maintained among us, notwithstanding the spread and the establishment of Christianity during so many ages. It might have been thought, that the pompous rituals of popery would have superseded the Druidical superstitions; or that the reformation to Protestantism would have banished them; or that the prevalence of various sects would have reduced them to oblivion: but the fact is otherwise. Surely the roots of Druidism were struck extremely deep! What charm is there in a stag with one antler?—A town in Pershshire, on the borders of the Highlands, is called Thistle- or Tullace- beltane, i.e. the eminence, or rising-ground, of the fire of Baal. In the neighborhood is a Druidical temple of eight upright stones, where it is supposed the fire was kindled. At some distance from this is another temple of the same kind, but smaller, and near it a well still held in great veneration. On Beltane morning, superstitious people go to this well, and drink of it; then they make a procession round it, as we are informed, nine times. After this they in like manner go round the temple. So deep-rooted is this heathenish superstition in the minds of many who reckon themselves good Protestants, that they will not neglect these rites, even when Beltane falls on sabbath. (Statist. Accounts of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 105.) "On the first day of May, which is called Beltan, or Beltain, day, all the boys in a township, or hamlet, meet in the moon. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by casting a trench in the ground of such circumference as to hold the whole company. They kindle a fire, and dress a repast of eggs and milk in the consistence of a custard. They knead a cake of oatmeal, which is toasted at the embers against a stone. After the custard is eaten up, they divide the cake into so many portions, as similar as possible to one another in size and shape, as there are persons in the company. They daub one of these portions all over with charcoal, until it be perfectly black. They put all the bits of cake into a bonnet. Every one, blindfold, draws out a portion. He who holds the bonnet is entitled to the last bit. Whoever draws the black bit, is the devoted person who is to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favor they mean to implore, in rendering the year prosperous to the body of man and beast. There is little doubt of these inhuman sacrifices having been once offered in this country, as well as in the East, although they now pass from the act of sacrificing, and only compel the devoted person to pass one or two times through the flames; with which the ceremonies of this festival are closed." (Id. vol. xi. p. 621.)
This pagan ceremony of lighting fires in honor of the Asiatic god Belus, gave its name to the entire month of May, which is to this day called in Irish Bealtine, in the Irish language. Dr. Keating, speaking of this fire of Bel, says, that the cattle were driven through it, and not sacrificed; and that the chief design of it was to keep off all contagious diseases of cattle, from them for that year; and he also says, that all the inhabitants of Ireland quenched their fires on that day, and kindled them again out of some part of that fire. He adds, from an ancient glossary: "The Druids lighted two solemn fires every year, and drove all four-footed beasts through them in order to preserve them from all contagious distempers during the current year." In Wales this annual fire is kindled in autumn, on the first day of November. In North Wales, especially, this fire is attended by many ceremonies; such as running through the fire and smoke, each participant casting a stone into the fire, &c.

This superstition, says Dr. Macpherson, prevailed throughout the North, as well as throughout the West. "Although the name of Bel-tein is not known in Sweden, yet, on the last day of April, I. e., the evening preceding our Bel-tein, the country people light great fires on the hills, and spend the night in shooting. The custom existed at the eve of Walburgh's Mass, Leopold Von Buch, who travelled through Norway in 1807, noticed this practice at Långden, N. lat. 68°. His words are—"It was Hømedagafsten, the eve of St. John's day. The people flocked together, on an adjoining hill, to keep up St. John's fire till midnight, as is done throughout all Germany and Norway. It burnt very well, but it did not render the night a whit more light. The midnight sun shone bright and clear on the fire, and we scarcely could see it. The St. John's fire has not certainly been invented in these regions, for it loses here all the power and nightly splendor which extend over whole territories in Germany. Notwithstanding this circumstance, we surrounded the fire in great good humor, and danced in continual circles the whole night through." This extract informs us, not only that this custom maintains itself in the extreme north, but also throughout Germany; in short, we see that it involves all Europe. It can, therefore, occasion no surprise that we find it so invariably estabished in the most ancient traditions in Scripture, where the sun had infinitely more power and influence, and which are much nearer to the seat of the original observances. The world was then plunged in idolatry, and we cannot wonder that the heathen clung to their old ceremonies and superstitious rites still exist, notwithstanding the influence of the gospel.

There were many cities in Palestine, into whose name the word Baal entered by composition. I. BAALAH, otherwise Kirjath-Jearim, or Kirjath-Baal, of Baal-Judah. (Josh. xv. 9, 60; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 1 Chron. xiii. 6.) a city of Judah, not far from Gibeon and Gibeah, and where the ark was stationed after the Philistines returned it, 1 Sam. vi. 21. It lay about 9 or 10 miles north-west of Jerusalem.

II. BAALAH, a mountain on the border of the lot of the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 11.

BAALATH, a city of Dan. Josh. xiv. 44; 1 Kings ix. 18. Josephus speaks of Baaleth, not far from Gaza, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. It was fortified by Solomon, 3 Chron. xii. 6.

BAALATH-Beer, a city of Simeon. Josh. xix. 8, probably the same as Baal, 1 Chron. iv. 33.

| BAAL-BERITH, Lord of the covenant, a deity of the Shechemites. (Judg. viii. 33; ix. 4.) which the Israelites made their god after the death of Gideon. There was at Shechem a temple of Baal-Berith, in whose treasury they accumulated that money which they afterwards gave to Abimelech, son of Gideon. The most simple explanation of the name Baal-Berith, is to take it generally for the god who precedes over alliances and oaths. In this sense the true God may be termed the God of covenants; and if Scripture had not added the name Baal to Berith, it might have been so understood. The most barbarous nations, as well as the most superstitious, the most religious, and the most intelligent, have always invoked the Deity to witness oaths and covenants. The Greeks had their Zeus Horkios, Jupiter the witness and arbitrator of oaths; and the Latins had their Deus Fidius, or Jupiter Fidius, whom they regarded as the god of honesty and integrity, and who presided over treaties and alliances. BAAL-GAD, a city at the foot of mount Hermon, which derived its name from the deity Baal, there adored, Josh. xi. 17. Some have erroneously supposed it to be the same as Helopolis, or Baalbeck. It is probably i, q. Baal-Hermon, which see.

BAAL-GUR, or Gur-Baal, i.e. sojourn of Baal. We read, 2 Chron. xxi. 7, of the Levites who were sent against the Philistines, and against the Arabs, that dwelt at Gur-Baal." The Septuagint has, "the Arabians that dwelt above Petra." It seems to have been a town in Arabia Petraea, where was probably a temple to Baal.

BAAL-HAZOR, a city of Ephraim, where Absalom kept his flocks, 2 Sam. xiii. 23.

BAAL-HERMON, Judg. iii. 3; 1 Chron. v. 23. See Hermon, and Baal-Gad.

BAALIS, a king of the Ammonites, who sent Jehu- muel to kill Gedaliah, who governed the remnant of the Jews, not carried captive to Babylon, Jer. xi. 14.

BAAL-MEON, a city of Reuben, (Num. xxxii. 39; 1 Chron. v. 8,) sometimes called Beth-Baal-Meon, (Josh. xiii. 17,) the house, or temple, of Baal-Meon; and also Beth-Meon, Jer. xlviii. 23. The Monibites took it from the Reubenites, and were masters of it in the time of Ezekiel, Ezek. xxv. 9. Eusebius and Jerome place it nine miles from Esbus, or Eshbon, at the foot of mount Baanah, or Abarim.

BAAL-PFOR. The import of this name is uncertain. Simon takes it to denote "the lord of mount Por," where this deity was worshipped; as the heathen "Olympian, Apollo Clarius, Mercurius Cylenius, &c. It has been taken in an obscene sense, and with too much truth; for it is certain that the deities of the heathen were, and still are, often of the grossest kind; not that we know their worshippers to have thought them scandalous, or to have connected them with any offence against decency, or with that sense of shame and indignation which they excite in us. They may have considered them as commemorative memorials of distant persons and times, or as employed to bring to recollection truths, in themselves perfectly innocuous; although such means of recording historical facts, of whatever nature, are in our opinion criminally indecorous, and utterly unfit for public exposure. Of this the compound of the Lingam and Yoni, now the Hindoo, affords open and popular proof; but there are other observances in some of their festivals, usually postponed till after all Europeans are departed, which too obsequiously justify the greatest imputation of the name.

This false god is, by some, supposed to be the Adonis, or Orus, adored by the Egyptians, and other

Eastern people. Scripture informs us (Numb. xxv. 1-3) that the Israelites, being encamped in the wilderness of Sin, were seduced to worship Baal-

Peor, to partake of his sacrifices, and to sin with the daughters of Moab; and the Psalmist, (Psalm cvi. 22,) advertising to the same event, says, "they ate the offerings of the dead." Peor is Or, or Orus, if we cut off the article Fe, which is of no significance. Orus is Adonis, or Osiris. The feast of Adonis was celebrated after the manner of funerals; and the worshippers at that time committed a thousand disturbing actions, particularly after they were told that Adonis, whom they had mourned for as dead, was alive again. (See Adonis.) Origin believed Baal-Peor to be Priapus, or the idol of turpitude, adored principally by women, and that Moses did not think proper to express more clearly what kind of turpitude he meant; and Jerome says, this idol was represented and worshipped in the same obscene manner as Priapus. His opinion is, that effeminate men and women, who prostituted themselves in honor of idols, as frequently mentioned in Scripture, were consecrated to Baal-Peor, or Priapus. Mos. (chap. xi. 31.) makes us to know that Baal-Peor was adored by the most immodest actions; and there is no doubt that he was the god of impurity. We know with what impunity the daughters of Moab engaged the Israelites to sin; (Numb. xxv. 3.) and the prophet Hosea, (chap. ix. 1.) speaking of this crime, says, "They went unto Baal-Peor, and separated themselves unto that shame." Selden suggests that Baal-

Peor is Pluto, the god of the dead, founding his conjecture on Psalm cvi. 21, where "offerings to the dead" are mentioned, and which he takes to be those that were offered to appease the manes of the dead. Apollinarius, in his paraphrase on this Psalm, says, the Hebrews polluted themselves in the sacrifices of Baal-Peor, by eating heathenism offered to the dead. Ov. (Fast. ii. 5.) says, facts, that Pha-

As the opinions seem less probable than that above proposed, that this deity was the (dead) Adonis, or Orus. It may be added, that some believe Adonis was to have been the father of Priapus; and that Baal-Peor was consecrated to his honor, which may well be understood by the name of sacrifices: "The priests roar and cry before their gods, as men do at the feast when one is dead," Baruch vi. 32. The Psalmist expresses himself in the plural number: "they ate the sacrifices," for the sacrifices of Baal-Peor were repasts, such as were used at funerals; with this difference, that the latter were often accompanied with real and sincere sorrow; whereas, in those of Adonis, the tears were feigned, and the lamentation, afterwards indulged, real. See Ov. x. and Apollinaris.

Baal-Peraziath, a place in the valley of Replaim, not very far distant from Jerusalem, 2 Sam. x. 20: 1 Chron. xiv. 11; comp. Is. xxvii. 11. Here David gained victory over the Philistines.

Baal-Shalisha, (2 Kings x. 29.) 1 Sam. ix. 4: a district placed by Jerome and Eusebius fifteen miles from Diospolis north, near mount Ephraim.

Baal-Tamar, lord of the palm-tree, a village near Gibeah, where the children of Israel engaged the tribe of Benjamin, Jud. xx. 32. The palm-tree occurs on many coins as a symbol attending Astarte; a branch of palm is held by the goddess sitting on the rock; and often by Jupiter, who, most probably, answers to the character of the lord of the palm-tree. It may be supposed that this symbol was chiefly adopted where the palm was best known; nevertheless, we find it applied where it cannot be restrained to the idea of a production of the country merely, and therefore, most probably, it was introduced from where this symbol was locally applicable.

Baal-Tartis, the same as Astarte, or the moon; next to Baal, the god most honored by the Phenicians. See Astarte, and Astartoth.

Baal-Zebup, see Baal-Zebub.

Baal-Zephon, a station of the Hebrews, (Exod. xiv. 2, 9; Numb. xxxiii. 7.) near Clymna, or Colsum. Baal-Zephon was, probably, a temple to Baal, at the northern point of the Red sea; and, most likely, in or near an establishment, or town, like the present Suez. [See, on this point, Stuart's Course of Heb. Study, ii. p. 186, seq.] Rosenmueller and Ge-senius suppose the name to mean place or temple of Typhon, the evil genius of Egypt and enemy of fertility, who was worshipped at Heropolis, B.C. —Some describe this deity, viz. Baal-Zephon, as a dog in shape, (see Anubis,) signifying his vigilant eye over this place, and his office by barking, to give notice of an enemy's arrival; and to guard the coast of the Red sea, on that side. It is said, he was placed there, principally, to stop slaves that fled from their masters. The Jerusalem Targum assures us, that all the statues of the Egyptian gods having been destroyed by the exterminating angel, Baal-Zephon alone resisted; whereupon, the Egyptians, conceiving great ideas of his power, redoubled their devotion to him. Moses, observing that the people flocked thither in crowds, petitioned Pharaoh that he, too, might make a journey thither with the Israelites; which Pharaoh permitted; but as they were employed on the shore of the Red sea, in gathering up the precious stones which the river Phison had carried into the Gihon, and from thence were conveyed into the Red sea, (a notable instance of babbinbar geology,) Pha-

Baanah and Rechab, officers of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, who privately slew that prince while repos-}

ing, and were punished for it by David, 2 Sam. iv. 2, seq.

Basha, son of Ahijah, and commander of the armies of Nadab, king of Israel. He killed his master treacherously at the siege of Gibbethon, and usurped the kingdom, which he possessed twenty-four years. He exterminated the whole race of Jerobam, as God had commanded; but by his bad conduct, and his idolatry, incurred God's indignation, 1 Kings xv. 27; xvi. 7. A. M. 329. Rechab, instead of making good use of admission, transported with rage against a prophet, the messenger of it, killed him.

Babel, or Babylon, a city and province, which received this name, because, when the tower of Babel was building, 1 Chron. i. 18, confounded the languages of those who were employed in the undertaking, (Gen. x. 10.) about A. M. 1775, 120 years after the deluge.
BABEL

Others derive the name from the Arabic word بابل, a door or gate, compounded with بيل, e. g. the gate or city of Bel. — For an account of the city of Babylon, see the next article; and for the geographical description, as well as an historical notice of the province or kingdom, see BABYLONIA. Here we confine ourselves to the tower.

Very different conceptions have been formed on the nature and figure of the tower of Babel. Some have delineated it as being round in shape, with a spiral pathway leading up to the top; but it appears more credible that it was square; and that certain buildings, yet remaining in various parts of the world, may be considered as transcripts, or imitations, of it. To enable the reader to judge of this proposition, Mr. Taylor copied several instances, apparently nearly related to it in form and destination, from which we select the following.

This pyramid, rising in several steps or stages, is at Tanjore, in the East Indies; and affords, it is presumed, a just idea of the tower of Babel. It is, indeed, wholly constructed of stone, in which it differs from that more ancient edifice, which, being situated in a country destitute of stone, was, of necessity, constructed of brick. On the top of this pyramid is a chapel or temple; affording a specimen of the general nature of this kind of sacred edifices in India. These analogous structures are commonly erected on, or near, the banks of great rivers, for the advantage of ablation. In the courts that surround them, innumerable multitudes assemble at the rising of the sun, after having bathed in the stream below. The gate of the pagoda uniformly fronts the east. The internal chamber commonly receives light only from the door. An external pathway, for the purpose of visiting the chapel at the top, merits observation.

This is an ancient pyramid, built by the Mexicans in America; it agrees in figure with the former; and has, on the outside, an ascent of stairs leading up one side to the upper story, proceeding to the chapel on its summit. This ascent implies that the chapel was used, from time to time, and no doubt, it marks the shortest track for that purpose, as it occupies one side only.

That the tower of Belus had a chapel on the top, appears from Herodotus, who, after mentioning the spiral ascent, says, “In the last tower is a large chapel, but no statue,” &c. (See in BABEL.) Diodorus implies the same, when he says, there were statues of gold, of which one was must have been a large chapel that could be supposed to contain such a figure. The Ideas collected from the foregoing subjects lead us, (1.) to a pyramid of solid construction, in its principal parts, but of less laborious materials internally: (2.) to a chapel, or temple, on the top of such pyramid: (3.) to one or more passages leading to the summit. There are certain points of comparison between the pyramids of Egypt (see PYRAMIDS) and the tower of Babel to which our attention may be directed. (1.) A river runs before the pyramids, which agrees with the notion of their being sacred structures, since the stream was suitable to purposes of ablution; in like manner, a river ran before the tower of Babel. (2.) The general form of these structures were alike, that is, broad at bottom, rising very high, tapering at top. (3.) The internal construction was of less costly materials than the external; being of sun-baked bricks, at best; while the external was furnace-baked bricks at Babel, but immense stones in Egypt, which insured the durability of the Egyptian edifices. (4.) A city extended on each side of the river in both instances. (5.) The royal palace was separated from the temple by a considerable width of water. (6.) There were apartments, or chapels, in each. (7.) There were sacred cloisters or courts around. (8.) There was (or was intended to be) at the top a great image: there are indications of such an intention on the top of the open pyramid. This thought is not new: the Jerusalem Targum asserts it of Babel, and says that the image was to have held a sword in its hand, as a kind of protector against men and demons—Facemus nobis imaginem adorationis in quis visadam, et ponamus Gladium in manu quam, ut conferamus et consagremus omnes dieipsumur de superficie terra. These obvious agreements sufficiently evince that the structures were alike in form and in destination [?] so that we may judge pretty accurately on what we do not know of the one by what we do know. (9.) What we do know contribute, also, to establish the inference, that the same people (though not the same branch of that people) were the builders of both.

Being now enabled, by means of these points of comparison, to comprehend the intention of the builders of the tower of Babel, we proceed to consider the mode of its construction. We read (Gen. xi. 3) that they proposed to make bricks and to burn them thoroughly; that these bricks were employed by them as stones, of which it should appear the country was destitute;—“instead of (mortar) chomar they had chémar,” where the reader will observe, that the same word is used under two pronunciations, and this, probably, ought to be thus understood—“instead of clay-mortar,” which is the kind used in countries east of Shinar for buildings not expected to exceed ordinary duration, these determined builders employed the bitumen which rises in the lands adjacent to this tower, or was brought from sources higher up the Euphrates:—bitumen-mortar, to resist moisture from morasses formed by the river. The quantity of bitumen that must have been employed in building Babylon is scarcely credible. Most probably it was procured from Hit on the Euphrates, where it still abounds.

"The master-mason told me, says M. Beauchamp, that he found some in a spot where he was digging, about twenty years ago; which is by no means strange, as it is common enough on the banks of the Euphrates. I have myself seen it on the road from Baghdad to Juba, an Arabian village, seated on that river."

"The ruins at Babylon had two objects in view; (1.) to build a city; and (2.) a tower. There could be no impiety in proposing to build a city; yet it is expressly stated, that, in consequence of the divine interposition, the continuation of the city was relinquished. On the other hand, the tower was certainly intended as a place for worship, but not of the true God; yet it is nowhere said in Scripture that it was destroyed, or its works suspended. This is not easily explained; and the circumstance is rendered the more obscure, by the accounts of its overthrow which have been preserved in heathen writers. Eupolemus, quoted by Eusebius, (Prep. lib. ix.) says, "The city Babylon was first founded, and afterwards the celebrated tower; both which were built by some person, who had escaped the deluge."—The tower was eventually ruined by the power of God." Abydenus, in his Assyrian Annals, also mentions the tower; which, he says, was carried up to heaven; but that the gods ruined it by storms and whirlwinds, frustrated the purpose for which it was designed, and overthrew it on the heads of those who were engaged in the work. The ruins of it were called Babylon. (Euseb. Chron. p. 13.) The reader will bear this in mind, as it will assist in determining our judgment on the character of the ruins still extant.

We do not find in Scripture any subsequent allusion to the tower of Babel; but there is in the LXX a remarkable variation from our Hebrew copies in Isaiah x. 9, where we read, Is not Casho or Carcaseshah? Those translators read, Have I not taken the region which is above Babylon and Chalane, where the tower was built?" That they referred to the ancient attempt of the sons of men cannot be doubted; and the passage is so understood by the Christian fathers, as may be seen in Bochart. The latest accounts by our travellers, especially the tract of Mr. Rich, with his plates, has raised a doubt whether the original tower of Babel were the same with that known to us by the description of some ancient writers, as the tower of Bel, at Babylon. The same doubt has occurred to Father Kircher, (Turris Babel, lib. ii. cap. 3.) but he produces no authority in support of his conjecture, that a second tower was built by Nimrod and Semiramis. Certain it is that the author mentions two towers; but if we might be allowed to admit the supposition, it would obviate almost every difficulty that at present appears insurmountable, in attempting to reconcile ancient accounts with actual appearances.—(The supposition of Calmet and others is not improbable, viz. that the tower of Belus was not the tower of Babel itself, but was rather built upon the old foundations of the latter. R.

We submit here an instance of a building very similar in form and proportions to the original tower of Belus, as far as the eye and mind of a British traveller analogous to what it may be presumed was intended by the priests and the builders of Babel. It is Mr. Watthen's account of the great pagoda at Conjeeveram, the Dewali, or temple of Venus, which is situated on the island of Madras. "The tower, or most elevated part of this building, consisted of fifteen stories, or stages; the floor of the lowest of these was covered with boards somewhat decayed, and was about twenty feet square, having much the appearance of the belfry of a country church in England. A ladder of fifteen rounds conducted us to the next stage, and so on, from story to story, until we reached the top, each stage or floor diminishing gradually in size to the summit. Here our labor was most amply repaid; for never had I witnessed so beautiful and so sublime a prospect. It so far surpassed every idea I had or could have formed of its grandeur and effect, that I was almost entranced in its contemplation. I forgot all the world beside, and felt as if I could have occupied this elevated spot for ever."

Modern travellers vary in their descriptions of the remains of the tower of Babel. Fabricius says, it might have been about a mile in circumference. Quin says the same. Benjamin, who is much more ancient, informs us, that the foundations were two thousand paces in length. The Sieur de la Bonlaye le Gour, a gentleman of Anjou, who says he made a long stay at Babylon, or Bagdad, declares, that about three leagues from that city, is a tower, called Megara, situated between the Tigris and Euphrates, in an open field, which is solid within, and more like a mountain than a tower. The compass of it is above five hundred feet round, and as the rain and winds have very much ruined it, it cannot be more than about a hundred and thirty-eight feet high. It is built of bricks four inches thick; and between every seven courses of bricks there is a course of straw, three inches thick, mixed with pitch and bitumen; from the top to the bottom are about fifty courses.

The following particulars of the tower of Belus are from Dr. Prideaux:—"Till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the temple of Belus contained no more than the [central] tower only, and the rooms in it served all the occasions of that idolatrous worship, that he enlarged it by vast buildings erected round it, in a square of two furlongs on every side, and a mile in circumference, which was one thousand eight hundred feet more than the square at the temple of Jerusalem, for that was but three thousand feet round; whereas this was, according to this account, four thousand eight hundred; and on the outside of all these buildings, was a wall enclosing the whole, which may be supposed to have been of equal extent with the temple in it, stood, that is, two miles and a half in compass, in which were several gates leading into the temple, all of solid brass; and the brazen sea, the brazen pillars, and the other brazen vessels, which were carried to Babylon, from the temple of Belus, that had been employed in the making of them; for it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar did put all the sacred vessels, which he carried from Jerusalem, into the house of his god at Babylon, that is, into this house or temple of Bel. This temple stood till the time of Xerxes, but on his return from the Grecian expedition, he demolished the whole of it, and laid it all in rubbish, having first plundered it of its immense riches, among which were several images or statues of massy gold; and one of them is said by Dioscorus to have been forty feet high, which might perchance have been that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura."

[A succinct account of the tower of Belus may be given as follows; and it will also serve as an illustration of the pagoda, or Bel or Bala, i.e. the planet Jupiter. (See Bala.) Herodotos saw this temple, still unimpaired. (Herodot. i. 181, seq.) It stood within the city, in the midst of a square area, surrounded by walls which were furnished with iron gates. It was built of burnt bricks laid in bitumen, and rose to the height of a stadium, i.e., according to Volney, (Recherches, 3. ill. p. 72, 987,) about 100 feet. The entrance was a pair of steps or terraces on which the ascent was by slanting stairs along the external walls. These stories gradually diminished in breadth from the base upward, thus giving to the tower the form of a pyramid. Hence Strabo also calls it a square pyramid. (xvii. 1. 5.) The upper story contained a chamber, with a bed, before which stood a golden table. In this chamber Herodotus says no one slept at night except a female, whom the god Belus, according to the Chaldæans the priest of this temple, had selected from the females of the city. Diodorus Siculus says, this chamber served also for astronomical observations. In the next story below was a chapel, with a gigantic statue of Belus, sitting upon a throne with a table before it. The image, throne, and table, throughout, were of pure gold. — Nebuchadnezzar and R. K. Porter suppose that the remains of this temple are extant in the ruin Borsippa; and to this Rosenmueller also assigns his ascent. Bib. Geog. I. p. 24. See under BABYLON.

It is highly probable, that the remains of towers, shown in Babylonia, are only ruins of old Babylon, built by Nebuchadnezzar. See further in the next article.

"BABEL," says Ibn Haukal, "is a small village, but the most ancient spot in all Iraq. The whole region is denominated Babel, from this place. The kings of Canaan resided there, and ruins of great edifices still remain. I am of opinion, that, in former times, it was a very considerable place. They say that Babel was founded by Zokah Piiraps; and there was Abraham, to whom be peace! thrown into the fire. There are two heaps, one of which is in a place called Koudi Fereit, the other Koudi Derb; in this the ashes still remain; and they say that it was the fire of Nimrod into which Abraham was cast; may peace be on him!" Now, as it is evidently impossible that a monarch of the Perishtanian, or first dynasty of the Persian kings, supposed to have reigned about 4000 B.C., should have seen Abraham, may not this tradition have some reference to the story of Shadrach, and his companions, cast into the fiery furnace, as recorded in Daniel? The circumstances of the miraculous delivery are the same, and the text is the same, and the manner in which the Babylonians should bring upon Palestine; the captivity of the Hebrews at Babylon, and their return; the fall of the great city, and its capture by the Medes and Persians. The prophets who lived after Isaiah, in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, and who saw the desolation of Jerusalem, and the surrounding country, enlarged still further on the grandeur of Babylon, its cruelty, and the destruction with which God would overwhelm it.

Babylon is described as the greatest and most powerful city in the world — Babylon the Great. Of what other city are terms used equally haughty, equally magnificent? — the Golden City! (Isaiah xvi. 4.)—the Glory of Kingdoms! —the Beauty of the Chaldeans' excellence! (xiii. 19.) — the Tender and Delicate! the Lady! a Queen for ever! who says, I am; and none else beside me! (xxvii.) These and other terms, altogether peculiar, express her beauty; and as for her power, she is called, — the Hammer of the whole Earth! (Jer. 1. 16.)
BABYLON

Battle axes! the weapons of war! proper to break in pieces nations, and to destroy kingdoms, ii. 20. Kingdoms and dominions. But, after[her]while, her turn came; and we now contemplate in her ruins a speaking instance of the vicissitude of human affairs; a most impressive evidence of the fulfilment of prophecies wherein were foretold the devastations which those ruins now witness.

Herodotus, who visited Babylon, and is the most ancient author who has written upon it, has left the following description of this celebrated city. It was square; 120 furlongs every way, i.e. fifteen miles, or five leagues square; and the whole circuit of it was 480 furlongs, or twenty leagues. The walls were built with large bricks, cemented with bitumen; and were 87 feet thick, and 385 feet high. The city was encompassed with a vast ditch, which was filled with water; and brick work was carried up on both sides. The earth which was dug out was employed in making the bricks for the walls of the city; so that one may judge of the depth and width of the ditch by the extreme height and thickness of the walls. There were a hundred gates to the city, twenty-five on each of the four sides; these gates were walled with their posts, &c. were of brass. Between every two of them were three towers, raised ten feet above the walls where necessary. A street answered to each gate, so that there were fifty streets in all, cutting one another in right angles; each fifteen miles in length, and 151 feet wide. Four other streets, having houses only on one side, the ramparts being on the other, made the whole compass of the city: each of these streets was 200 feet wide. As the streets of Babylon crossed one another at right angles, they formed 676 squares, each square four furlongs and a half on every side, making two miles and a quarter in circuit. The houses of these squares were three or four stories high, their fronts were adorned with embellishments, and the inner space was courts and gardens. The Euphrates divided the city into two parts, running from north to south. A bridge of admirable structure, about a furlong in length, and 60 feet wide, formed the communication over the river; at the two extremities of this bridge were two palaces, the old palace on the east side of the river, the new palace on the west; and the temple of Belus, which stood near the old palace, occupied one entire square. The city was situated in a valley between mountains and forests, which surround the city. Nebuchadnezzar carried thither an almost infinite number of his captives of all nations. The famous hanging gardens which adorned the palace in Babylon, and which are ranked among the wonders of the world, contained four hundred feet square; and were composed of several large terraces, the platform of the highest terrace equalling the walls of Babylon in height, i.e. 350 feet. From one terrace to that above it, was an ascent by stairs ten feet wide. This whole maze was supported by large vaults, built one upon another, and strengthened by a wall twenty-two feet thick, covered with stones, rushes, and bitumen, and plates of lead to prevent leakage. On the highest terrace was an aquaduct, said to be supplied with water from the river, by a pump, (probably the Persian wheel,) from which the gardens were watered. It is affirmed, that Nebuchadnezzar undertook this wonderful and famous edifice out of complaisance to his wife Amytis, daughter of Antony: who, being a native of Media, remained strong in her native country. Dio. Sicul. ii. Strabo, xvi. 2. Quint. Curt. v. 1.) Scripture no where notices these celebrated gardens: but it speaks of willows planted on the banks of the rivers of Babylon. "We hanged our harps on the willows in the midst thereof," says Ps. cxxxvii. 2. Isaiah, describing, in a prophetic style, the captivity of the Moabites by Nebuchadnezzar, says, "They shall be carried away to the valley of willows," xx. 7. "The same prophet, (ch. xxii. 1.) describing the calamities of Babylon by Cyrus, calls this city the desert of the sea; where the word sea is applied to the river Euphrates, (comp. xvi. 1.) as also to the Nile, Is. xix. 5; Nah. iii. 8. [See also the additions under BABYLON.] Jeremiah, to the same purport, says, (l. 38, 42.) "I will dry up the sea of Babylon, and make her springs dry. The sea is come up upon her: she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof." Megasthenes (ap. Euseb. Prep. ix. 41.) assures us, that Babylon was built in a place which had before abounded so greatly with water, that it was called the sea. But the language of the Psalmist, above quoted, suggests the idea that the city of Babylon was refreshed by a considerable number of streams; "By the rivers [i.e. streams, flowing currents] of Babylon we sat down." "On the willows (plural) in the midst thereof we hanged our harps" (plural). There must then have been gardens visited by these streams, easily accessible to the captives. Is not the temple of Belus, (ch. ii.) but smaller gardens less reserved. We know, also, that there was but one river at Babylon then, as there is but one now, the Euphrates; so that these captives represent themselves as "sitting by the rivers of Babylon," in the plural, they informing us, that this river was divided into several branches, or canals; and these were, doubtless, works of art. See under BABYLONIA.

From the history in Daniel, (chap. iii.) of the consecration of Nebuchadnezzar's "Golden Image," we know that Babylon (i.e. the province) contained a vast plain, capacious enough to accommodate the assembled officers of his empire, with all the pomp and preparations in the power of this mighty monarch, and, beyond all doubt, also a very great proportion of the populous population of Babylon. This is called the plain of Duru, (v.) and, deducing its name from the meaning of the root, it imports the round, or circular, enclosure. As the occasion was the consecration of a statue, it is natural to suppose that the ceremonies took place on this plain. Nebuchadnezzar carried thither an almost infinite number of his captives of all nations. The famous hanging gardens which adorned the palace in Babylon, and which are ranked among the wonders of the world, contained four hundred feet square; and were composed of several large terraces, the platform of the highest terrace equaling the walls of Babylon in height, i.e. 350 feet. From one terrace to that above it, was an ascent by stairs ten feet wide. This whole maze was supported by large vaults, built one upon another, and strengthened by a wall twenty-two feet thick, covered with stones, rushes, and bitumen, and plates of lead to prevent leakage. On the highest terrace was an aqueduct, said to be supplied with water from the river, by a pump, (probably the Persian wheel,) from which the gardens were watered. It is affirmed, that Nebuchadnezzar undertook this wonderful and famous edifice out of complaisance to his wife Amytis, daughter of Antony: who, being a native of Media, remained strong in her native country. BABYLON

But the description of Diodorus is pointed with respect to the fact of the palace being near to the bridge, and, consequently, to the river's bank; and he is borne out by the descriptions of Strabo and Curtius, both of whom represent the hanging gardens to be very near the river; and all agree that they were within, or adjacent to, the square of the fortified palace.

Great buildings have been made of the antiquity of the astronomical observations taken by the Babylonians. Josephus tells us, (c. Apion. i. p. 1044.) that Berossus, the Babylonian historian and astronomer, agreed with Moses concerning the corruption of mankind, and the deluge; and Aristotle, who was curious in examining the truth of what was reported relating to these observations, desired Calisthenes to send him the most certain accounts that he could find of this particular, among the Babylonians. Calisthenes sent him observations of the heavens, which had been made during 1903 years, computing from the origin of the Babylonian monarchy to the time of Alexander. This carries up the account as high as the one hundred and fifteenth year after the flood, which was within fifteen years after the tower of Babel was built. For the confusion of tongues, which followed immediately after the building of that tower, happened in the year in which Peleg was born, 101 years after the flood, and fourteen years before in which the Deluge began.

In ancient authors much confusion is occasioned by a too general application of the name Babel: it has denoted the original tower, the original city, the subsequent tower, the palace, the latter city. And we shall find it expressing the province of Babylonia; in fact, it stands connected in that sense with the plain of Dura, which is said to be in the province of Babylon, and which might be placed at a distance from the city, were it not for considerations already recited. Ancient authors have raised the wonder of their readers, by allowing to the walls of Babylon dimensions and extent which confound the imagination, and rather belong to a province than to a city. But that they really were of extraordinary dimensions, should appear from references made to them by the prophet, who threatens them with destruction. Jeremiah (i. 15) says, "Her foundations are fallen: her walls are thrown down;" and again, (li. 44.) "The very wall of Babylon shall fall:" and (verse 58) "the broad wall of Babylon shall be utterly hewn down;" and (Cil.) "an ensign of the day." Verse 53, we read, "Though Babylon shall mount up to heaven, [that is, her defences,] and though she should fortify the height of her strength," [that is, her wall.] Thus we find allusions to the height, the breadth, and the strength, of the walls of Babylon: but, before we proceed to examine these passages more fully, we shall avail ourselves, in part at least, of what descriptions are afforded by heathen writers.

Public belief has been staggered by the enormous dimensions allowed to Babylon by the different authors of ancient times—Herodotus, Strabo, Diodorus, Pliny, and Quintus Curtius; because, even if the most confined of those measures reported by the followers of Alexander (who viewed it at its fullest leisure) be adopted, and the stadia taken at a moderate standard, they will give an area of 72 square miles. We therefore conceive, that, with respect to the extent of the buildings and population of Babylon, we ought not to regard the above mentioned as a scale; from the great improbability of so vast a contiguous space having ever been built on: but that the wall might have been continued to the extent given, does not appear so improbable, for we cannot suppose that so many men, not in the service of the kings, were not misled concerning this point. But, although we may extend our belief to the vastness of the encircling, it does not follow that we are to believe that 80, or even 72 square miles, contiguous to each other, were covered with buildings. The different reports of the extent of the walls of Babylon are given as follows—By Herodotus, at 120 stadia each side; or 480 stadia in circumference. By Pliny and Solinus, at 60 Roman miles; which, at 8 stadia to a mile, agrees with Herodotus. By Strabo, at 385 stadia. By Diodorus, from Ctesias, 360; but from Citharces, who accompanied Alexander, 365. And, Lastly, by Curtius, at 385. It appears highly probable that 360, or 365, was the true statement of the circumference. That the area enclosed by the walls of Babylon was only partly built on, is proved by the words of Quintus Curtius, who says (lib. v. cap. 4.) that "the buildings (in Babylon) are not contiguous to the walls, but some considerable space was left all round. . . . Nor do the houses join; perhaps from motives of safety. The remainder of the space is cultivated; that, in the event of a siege, the inhabitants might not be compelled to depend on supplies from without." Thus far Curtius. Diodorus describes a vast space taken up by the numerous buildings. The enclosure of one of the palaces (which appears to be what is called by others the citadel) was a square of 15 stadia, or near a mile and a half; the other of five stadia: here are more than two and a half square miles occupied by the palace alone. Besides these, there were the temple and tower of Belus, of vast extent; the hanging gardens, &c. But, after all, it is certain, and we are ready to allow, that the extent of the buildings of Babylon was great, and far beyond the ordinary size of capital cities then known in the world; which may indeed be concluded from the manner in which the ancients in general speak of it. The population of this city, during its most flourishing state, exceeded twelve hundred thousand; or perhaps a million and a quarter.

The hanging gardens, (as they are called,) which had an area of about three and a half acres, had trees of a considerable size growing in them: and it is not improbable that they were of a species different from those of the natural growth of the alluvial plain. The height of some of them was eight cubits in the girth; and Strabo, that there was a contrivance to prevent the large roots from destroying the superstructure, by building vast hollow piers, which were filled with earth to receive them. These trees may have been perpetual in the same spot where they grew, notwithstanding that the terraces may have subsided, by the crumbling of the piers and walls that supported them.

Now, it appears that we ought to make a distinction here. That the province of Babylonia should be surrounded by a wall of immense thickness, for the purpose of a fortification, is little less than ridiculous; but that an enclosure or wall might embrace a large extent of country, is credible. Ibn Hakia speaks of villages "extending an entire day's journey," sung by twelve farsangs; all about this space was a wall, and within it the people dwell winter and summer."—This may be allowed to justify the extent assigned to the walls of Babylonia, as a province, while those more moderate as to the city of Babylon were certainly constructed with wonderful labor, skill, and solidity, according to the duty demanded.
Babylon [130] Babylon

of them in protecting a narrower space. This seems rather to militate against the sentiment of Dr. Blayney, who would keep to the singular, wall, where the term occurs; as Jer. li. 58: “The walls (plural) of Babylon; the broad (wall, singular) shall be utterly broken.” It would be hazardous to insist that the prophet intended a distinction from narrower walls by using the term broad; but those who observe that in chap. i. 15. we have also walls, in the plural—“their walls are thrown down,” as the doctor himself renders, will hesitate on reducing this term in this place to the singular.

We are now prepared to examine somewhat more closely the predictions quoted from the prophet. With regard to the first, (Jer. i. 15.) “Her foundations are fallen,” Dr. Blayney observes, very justly, that foundations cannot fall: they are already deep in the ground; they may be razed, or uprooted, but they can go no lower. He therefore renders, with the LXX, ἐναρεύει, her battlements, or the turrets filled with men who fought in defence of the walls. They might be somewhat analogous to the bastions of modern fortification; but, most likely, they were raised higher than the wall itself. Another passage deserves remark, as being manifestly intended by the writer to display uncommon emphasis. (ii. 58.) “The broad wall of Babylon shall be utterly broken.” These last words are but a feeble resemblance of the original, which is very difficult to be rendered into English, ἀσυνήθω ἐρείπησαν τὴν ἐξουσίαν τῆς Βαβυλονίας, which is found in the edition of Gallus, lib. iii. p. 336, seq. with which compare also Gaius Dianisert. de Sibyllis, p. 450.) Another Assyrian account, handed down by Ctesias, (Diod. Sic. ii. 7.) makes Semiramis, the queen of Ninus, to be the founder of Babylon; and a later Chaldean account, given by Megasthenes and Berosus, describes Nebuchadnezzar as its builder. (In Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 41. Joseph. c. Apion. i. 18.) These accounts may all be reconciled, by supposing that Semiramis rebuilt or greatly extended the ancient city; and that Nebuchadnezzar afterwards enlarged it still farther, and rendered it more strong and splendid. The description of the city itself by Herodotus, who personally visited it, has already been given above.

Under Nebuchadnezzar, at any rate, Babylon reached the summit of her greatness and splendor. She was now the capital of the civilized world, and into her lap flowed, either through conquest or commerce, the wealth of almost all known lands. Justly, therefore, might the prophets call her the great, (Dan. iv. 30.) the praise of the whole earth, (Jer. lii. 4.) the beauty of the Chaldees’ excellency, (Isa. xliii. 18.) the lady of kingdoms, (Isa. lxxvii. 5.) but also the tender and lustrous, and given to pleasures, Isa. lxxvii. 1. 8. Indeed, these last epithets are gentle, in comparison with the real state of the case; for, in consequence of the opulence and luxury of the inhabitants, the corruption and licentiousness of the courtiers and nobles carry the whole city to a frightful extremity. Herodotus assures us, (i. 198.) that the daughters even of the nobles prostituted themselves in the temple of Mylitta, i. e. the planet Venus, or Ashdorah. Quintus Curtius gives us the following picture of the extravagance and beastly indecency of the inhabitants, which is quite too bad to be translated: (lib. v. 1.) "Nilh urbis ejus corruptus moribus, nee ad irritandas efficiens lascivias immodicas voluptates instructus. Liberorum conjugeque cum hospitibus stupro erat, modo pro-

tium illigati detur, parentes maritique patruntur.—Feminarum convivia inuentum in principio modestus est habitus; dein summaque amicula exsit, paulatinusque pudorem profana cruciavit; ad ultimum (hinc moribus sit) iussa corporum velutamina projektum: nec meretricios sed delectus est, sed matronarum virginitas, apud quas committit habitur vulgo corporis villas."

Well, therefore, might the prophets proclaim woes against her! Well might we expect Jehovah to bring down vengeance on her crimes! Indeed, the woes denounced against Babylon by the prophets, constitute some of the most splendid and sublime portions of the whole book, Isa. xiii; xlvii; Jer. 1; li. et al. seq. Hence, too, as the great capital, in which all the corruptions of idolatry were concentrated, Babylon, in the Revelation of St. John, is put symbolically for Rome, at that time the chief seat and capital of heathenism.

The city of Babylon, however, did not long thus remain the capital of the world; for already, under the reign of Nebuchadnezzar’s grandson, Nabonidus, the Belshazzar of the Scriptures, it was besieged and taken by Cyrus. The accounts of Greek historians harmonize here with that of the Bible, that Cyrus made his successful assault on a night when the whole city, relying on the strength of the walls, had given themselves up to the riot and debauchery of a grand public festival, and the king and his nobles were revelling at a splendid entertainment. Cyrus had previously caused the Pauiacous, a canal which ran west of the city, and carried off the superfluous water of the Euphrates into the lake of Nitocris, (see under BABYLONIA) to be cleared out, in order to turn the river into it; which, by this means, was rendered so shallow, that his soldiers were able to penetrate along its bed into the city. From this time its importance declined; for Cyrus made Susa the capital of his kingdom; and Babylon thus ceased to be the chief city of an independent state. He is said also to have torn down the external walls; because the city was too strong, fortified, and might easily rebel against him. It did thus revolt against Darius Hystaspes; who again subdued it, broke down all its gates, and reduced its walls to the height of fifty cubits. (Herod. iii. 158.) According to Strabo, (xvi. 1, 5,) Xerxes destroyed the tower of Belus. The same writer mentions, that under the Persians, and under Alexander’s successors, Babylon continued to decline; especially after Seleucus Nicator had founded Seleucia, and made it his residence. A great portion of the inhabitants of Babylon removed thither; and in Strabo’s time, i.e. under Augustus, Babylon had become so desolate, that it might be called a vast desert. Diodorus Siculus, in the same century, says, (ii. 27,) that only a small portion of Babylon was inhabited; and, in the time of Pausanias, in the first half of the second century, only the walls remained. (Aracd. c. 33.) After this, the sole mention of Babylon, (and only as a village on that site,) until the time of Della Valle, (see below,) is in the middle of the fourth century, and at the beginning of the fourth. “R.”

We shall now direct our attention to the remains of those once magnificent structures which distinguished Babylon as the wonder of the world: of their elegance we cannot, with any justice, form some estimate, though not of their connection, or mutual dependence; we shall, nevertheless, find, on examination, sufficient particulars attached to these monuments of persevering labor, to justify the predictions of the prophets, and to clear them from the charge of inconsistency, or prevarication; which is our principal object.

[For the easier understanding of the subjoined quotations, it should be borne in mind, that all the principal ruins yet discovered, are on the east bank of the Euphrates. They lie within a triangular area, of which the river is the base, and the two sides are formed by the ruins of the ancient wall, which commence at the river above and below, and meet in a right angle at the most eastern point. The latest traveller who has visited these stupendous ruins is Sir R. K. Porter, who has examined them with more attention than any former traveller. R.]

The first traveller who communicated an inte-
ligible account of these antiquities was Della Valle, who, in 1616, examined them more minutely and leisurely than some who went before him. His account of the more northerly of these ruins, which he calls the tower of Belus, is instructive, notwithstanding later information: “In the midst of a vast and level plain, about a quarter of a league from Euphrates, appears a heap of ruined buildings, like a huge mountain, the materials of which are so confounded together, that one knows not what to make of it. Its figure is square, and it rises in form of a tower or pyramid, with four fronts, which answer to the four quarters of the compass, but it seems longer from north to south than from east to west, and is, as far as I could judge, by my pacing of it, a large quarter of a league. Its situation and form correspond with that pyramid, which Strabo speaks of, near the tower of Belus. The height of this mountain of ruins is not in every part equal, but exceeds the highest palace in Nepies; it is a mis-shapen mass, wherein there is no appearance of regularity; in some places it rises in sharp points, craggy and inaccessible; in others it is smoother and of easier ascent; there are also traces of torrents from the summit to the base, caused by violent rains. It is built with large and thick bricks, as I carefully observed, having caused excavation to be made in several places for that purpose; but they do not appear to have been burned, but dried in the sun, which is extremely hot in those parts. These sun-baked bricks, in whose substance were mixed bruised reeds and straw, and which were laid in clay mortar, compose the great mass of the building, but other bricks were also perceived at certain intervals, especially where the strongest buttresses stood, of the same size, but baked in the kiln, and set in good time and bitumen.” (Vol. ii. Let. 17.) He paced the circumference, and found it to be 1134 of his ordinary steps; say about 2552, or 2600, feet: consequently the dimensions of each side should have been about 640 or 650 feet. He observed foundations of buildings around the great mass, at the distance of fifty or sixty paces. This ruin has subsequently been known under the appellation of “Della Valle’s Ruin,” it is the same as the natives call Makloube, Majoile, that is, overthrown; or “the pyramid of Pharaoh Nabost and Marduk.”

M. Benschamp, Vicar General of Babylon, and Corresponding Member of the French Academy of Sciences, visited these celebrated ruins several times within the last twenty years [1799]. He says, “The ruins take to exist, of which the magnitude we can form some estimate, though not of their connection, or mutual dependence; we shall, nevertheless, find, on examination, sufficient particulars attached to these monuments of persevering labor, to justify the predictions of the prophets, and to clear them from the charge of inconsistency, or prevarication; which is our principal object.

is, turned topye-turry. I was informed by the master mason employed to dig for bricks, that the places from which he procured the largest, thick walls, and sometimes chambers. He has frequently found earthen vessels, engraved marbles, and, about eight years ago, a statue as large as life, which he threw among the rubbish. On one wall of a chamber he found the figures of a cow, and of the sun and moon, formed of varnished bricks. Sometimes, idols of clay are found, representing human figures.

I found one brick on which was a lion, and on others a half-moon in relief. The bricks are cemented with bitumen, except in one place, which is well preserved, where they are united by a very thin stratum of white cement, which appears to me to be made of lime and sand. The bricks are every where of the same dimensions, one foot three lines square by three inches thick. Occasionally, layers of colors in bitumen are found, as at Belal. The master mason led me along a valley, which he dug out a long while ago, to get at the bricks of a wall, that, from the marks he showed me, I guess to have been sixty feet thick. It ran perpendicular to the bed of the river, and was probably the wall of the city. I found in it a subterranean canal, which, instead of being arched over, is covered with pieces of sand-stone, six or seven feet long, by three wide. These ruins extend several leagues to the town of Hilleh, and incontestably mark the situation of ancient Babylon.

The increasing curiosity of travellers, with the arrival in Europe of several inscribed bricks, and other instances of the kind of letters used in these inscriptions, induced the visits of others: the following are extracts from Kinneir's Memoir on Persia.

"In the latitude of 32º, deg. 25 min. north, and, according to my reckoning, fifty-four miles from Bagdad, stands the modern town of Hilleh, on the banks of the Euphrates. It covers a very small portion of the space occupied by the ancient capital of Assur, the ruins of which have excited the curiosity and admiration of the few European travellers, whom chance or business has conducted to this remote quarter of the globe, and who have been described by Benjamin of Tudela, Beauchamp, and Pietro della Valle, p. 283. The town of Hilleh is said, by the people of the country, to be built on the site of Belal; and some gigantic ruins, still to be seen, are believed by the inhabitants to be those of the ancient metropolis. I visited these ruins in 1825; and my friend, Captain Frederick, whose name I have had frequent occasion to mention in this Memoir, spent six days in minutely examining every thing about the vicinity, of which he gives an excellent description. I shall, therefore, without noticing the description given by former travellers, state first what was seen by myself; and afterwards the result of Captain Frederick's inquiries. The principal ruin, and that which is thought to represent the temple of Belal, is four miles north of Hilleh, and a quarter of a mile from the east bank of the Euphrates. This stupendous monument of antiquity is a huge pyramid, nine hundred paces in circumference, Captain Frederick measured the east and south faces at the top, and found the former to be one hundred and eighty, and the latter one hundred and ninety, paces, at two feet, and a half each pace; and, as near as I could guess, about two hundred and twenty feet in height at the most elevated part. It is an exact quadrangle. Three of its faces are still perfect; but that towards the south has lost more of its regularity than the others. This pyramid is built entirely of brick dried in the sun, cemented in some places with bitumen and regular layers of reeds, and in others with a mixture of clay and sand, which cemented them as fresh as if they had been used only a few days before. The captain Frederick saw were cemented with bitumen. On entering a small cavern, however, about twenty feet in depth, I found that the bricks in the interior of the mass were invariably cemented with slime and layers of reeds at each course. Quantities of furnace-baked brick were, however, scattered at the foot of the pyramid; and it is more than probable that it was once faced with the latter, which have been removed by the natives for the construction of their houses. The outer edges of the bricks, from being exposed to the weather, have mouldered away: it is, therefore, only on minute examination that the nature of the materials of which it is composed can be ascertained. When viewed from a distance, the ruin has more the appearance of a small hill than a building. The ascent is in most places so gentle that a person may ride all over it. Deep ravines have been sunk by the periodical rains; and there are numerous long, narrow cavities or passages, which are now the unmolested retreat of jackals, hyænas, and other noxious animals. The bricks of this structure are built are larger, and much inferior to any other I have seen; they have no inscriptions on them, and are seldom used by the natives, on account of their softness. The name given by the Arabs to this ruin is Haroot and Maroot; for they believe that, near the foot of the pyramid, there still exists (although inviolable to mankind) a well, in which those two wicked angels were condemned by the Almighty to be suspended by the heels until the end of the world, as a punishment for their vanity and presumption. della Valle mentions several smaller mounds, as being situated in the plain in the immediate vicinity of the pyramid. Captain Frederick and myself looked in vain for these mounds; we could only discern the high banks of a canal, running parallel to the S. W. face of the square, and a mound, about half a mile distant, of which I shall speak hereafter.

"On the opposite [the W.] side of the river, about six miles S. W. of Hilleh, a second eminence, not quite so large as that just mentioned, but of greater elevation, would be known by the Arabs as a portion of modern travellers; with the exception of Nichur, by whom it is slightly mentioned. It is formed of furnace-baked and sun-dried brick, about one foot in diameter, and from three to four inches thick. This pyramid is about a mile and a half south of the Arabs; and on its summit are the remains of a small square tower, the wall of which is eight feet thick, and, as nearly as I could guess, about fifty in height. It is built of furnace-baked bricks, of a yellowish color, cemented with slime, but no reeds or bitumen were perceptible. From this tower there is a most extensive view of the windings of the Euphrates, through the level plain of Shinar. Its banks are lined with villages and orchards, and here and there a few scattered hamlets in the desert appeared as points on the surface of the ocean. On the top and sides of the mound I observed several fragments of different colors, resembling, in appearance, pieces of mis-shapen rock. Captain Frederick examined these curious fragments with much attention, and was at first inclined to think that they were consolidated pieces of fallen masonry; but this idea was soon laid aside, as they were found so hard as to resist iron, in the manner of any other very hard stone, and the junction of the bricks was not to be discovered; but it was seen that these extraordinary fragments, (some of which are six and eight feet in diameter,) as there is no stone of such a quality to be procured any where in the neighboring country, and we could see or hear of no building of which they could form a part. Here those bricks which have inscriptions on them are generally found by the Arabs, who are constantly employed in digging for them, to build the houses at Hillah. About a hundred and twenty pieces from this pyramid is another, not so high, but of greater circumference at the base. Bricks are dug in great quantities from this place; but none, I believe, with inscriptions.

"To return to the E. side. About one mile and a half from Hillah, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, Captain Frederick discovered a longitudinal mound, close on the edge of the river; and two miles further up, in an easterly direction, a second, more extensive than the first. He was given to understand that the Arabs were in the habit of procuring vast quantities of burnt bricks from this mound, none of which, however, had any inscription. He perceived, on examination, a wall of red bricks, in one part even with the surface of the ground, and open to the depth of thirty feet in the mound, the earth having been moved for the purpose of procuring the bricks. At another place, not far distant, were the remains of an extensive building. Some of its walls were in great preservation, ten feet above the surface of the rubbish; and the foundation, at another part, had not been reached at the depth of forty-five feet. It was six feet eight inches thick, built of a superior kind of yellowish brick, furnace-baked, and cemented, not with bitumen or reeds, but lime mixed with sand. A decayed tree, not far from this spot, was shown by the country people, as being coeval with the building itself. Its girth, two feet from the ground, measured four feet seven inches, and it might be about twenty feet in height: it was hollow, and apparently very old. [Former travellers have asserted that they saw a number of very old and uncommon looking trees along the banks of the river: but neither captain Frederick nor myself saw any but this one; and it certainly differed from the other trees which grow in the neighborhood.] The great pyramid, first mentioned, is only about half or three quarters of a mile from this mound. Captain Frederick, having carefully examined every mound or spot, described by the natives, but belonging to Babylon, endeavored to discover if any thing remained of the ancient city wall. He commenced by riding five miles down the bank of the river, and then by following its windings sixteen miles north of Hillah, on the eastern side. The western bank was explored with the same minuteness; but not a trace of any deep excavation, or any rubbish, or mounds, (excepting those already mentioned,) were discovered. Leaving the river, he proceeded from Hillah, to a village named Karnkoeli, a distance of fifteen miles in a N. W. direction, without meeting anything worthy of remark. He next rode in a parallel line, six miles to the west, and as many to the east of the pyramid of Haroot and Maroot, and returned to Hillah, disappointed in all his expectations; for, within a space of twenty-one miles in length and twelve in breadth, he was unable to discover anything that could admit of a conclusion, that either a wall or ditch had ever existed within this area. [Captain Frederick informed us, that he dedicated eight or ten hours each day to his inquiries. His manner of Proceeding was first to consult the situation, and construction of the pyramid of Haroot and Maroot have led major Rennell and D'Anville to suppose it to be the remains of the temple of Belus. The latter, as we have already stated, is described as being a square of a stadium in breadth, and of equal dimensions at the base, and built of brick cemented with bitumen. The mass which we now see, is an exact quadrangle, which, ten feet within the outer edge of the rubbish, measured nine hundred pieces, or two thousand two hundred and fifty feet, exceeding the circuit of the base of the tower of Belus by two hundred and fifty feet—a trifling excess, when we consider how much it must have increased by the fallen ruins. Its elevation, at the S. W. angle, is still upwards of two hundred feet; which is very great, considering its antiquity, and the soft materials of which it is composed. Strabo represents the temple of Belus as having an exterior coat of burnt brick; and, as I have before said, there is every reason to believe, from the accumulation of pieces of furnace-baked bricks at the foot of each face, that this was the case with the great pyramid to the north of Hillah. We are, however, left in some doubt respecting the situation of the temple. It is said, that it stood at the center of the city: but the text is obscure; and it may be inferred, that the palace on the east bank of the Euphrates and [the] temple were the same. If this be the case, we may be permitted to conjecture, that the Euphrates once pursued a course different from that which it now follows, and that it flowed between the pyramid of Haroot and Maroot, and the mound and the ruins, already mentioned as half a mile farther to the west. The present course of the river would appear to justify this conclusion; for it bends suddenly towards these mounds, and bears the appearance of having formerly passed between them. Should this conjecture be admitted, then will the ruins just mentioned be found to answer the description given by the ancients of the materials, size, and situation of the two principal edifices in Babylon. But if not, we shall continue in ignorance concerning the remains of the palace; for the pyramid is far too distant from the river and the other ruins, to incline us to suppose it to have been the royal residence." p. 375.

To Mr. Rich, Resident at Bagdad for the East India Company, we are indebted for a still more particular account of these monuments of antiquity; his tracts have greatly engaged the attention of the public, and have given occasion to much information. The following are extracts from his first work. (Lond. 1815.) "The ruins of Babylon may in fact be said almost to commence from Mohawil, a very indifferent khan, close to which is a large canal, with a bridge over it, the whole country between it and Hillah exhibiting at intervals traces of building, in which are discoverable burnt and unburnt bricks and bitumen. Three mounds in particular attract attention from their magnitude. The district called by the natives Efris extends on both sides of the Euphrates. The ruins of the eastern quarter of Babylon commence about two miles above Hillah, and consist of two large masses or mounds connected with, and lying N. and S. of, each other; the former is lower in breadth, but higher in plain at different intervals. (At) the northern termination of the plain is Pietro della Valle's ruin;
from the S. E. (to which it evidently once joined, being only obliterated there by two canals) proceeds a narrow ridge or mound of earth, wearing the appearance of having been a stream or wall. This ridge forms a kind of circular enclosure, and joins the S. E. point of the most southerly of the two grand masses. The whole area, enclosed by the boundary on the east and south, and the river on the west, is two miles and six hundred yards from E. to W. — as much from Pietro della Valle's ruin to the southern part of the boundary, or two miles and one thousand yards to the most southerly mound of all. The first grand mass of ruins [south] is one thousand one hundred yards in length, and eight hundred in the greatest breadth. The most elevated part may be about fifty or sixty feet above the level of the plain, and it has been dug into for the purpose of procuring bricks. On the north is a valley of five hundred and fifty yards in length, the area of which is covered with tussocks of rank grass, [its longest from E. to W.] and crossed [from S. to N.] by a line of ruins of very little elevation. To this succeeds [going N.] the second grand heap of ruins, the shape of which is that of a square of seven hundred yards length and breadth. This is the place where Beauchamp made his observations; and it certainly is the most interesting part of the ruins of Babylon: every vestige discoverable in it declares it to have been the site of buildings far superior to all the rest which have left traces in the eastern quarter: the bricks are of the finest description, and, notwithstanding this is the grand store-house of them, and that the greatest supplies have been and are now constantly drawn from it, they appear still to be substantial. In all these excavations walls of burnt brick, laid in lime mortar of a very good quality, are seen; and in addition to the substances generally strewn on the surfaces of all these mounds, we here find fragments of alabaster vessels, fine earthen ware, marble, and great quantities of varnished tiles, the glazing and coloring of which is surprisingly fresh. In a hollow, near the southern part, I found a sepulchral urn of earthen ware, which had been broken in digging, and near it lay some human bones, which pulverized with the touch.

"To be more particular in my description of this mound: not more than two hundred yards from its northern extremity is a ravine, hollowed out by those who dig for bricks, in length near a hundred yards. In the sandstone, a yard thick and several yards long, on which the whole [weight rests] is so great as to have given a considerable degree of obliquity to the side walls of the passage. It is full of brackish water: (probably rain water impregnated with nitre, in filtering through the ruins, which are all very productive of it:;) and the workmen say that some way on it is high enough for a horseman to pass upright: as much as I saw of it, it was near seven feet in height, and its course to the south.

The city wall is on the head, who most unusually imagines must have been part of the city wall. The superstructure over the passage is cemented with bitumen; other parts of the ravine were of mortar, and the bricks have all fallen from it, leaving the masonry exposed. The wall appears to have been crossed by an extremely thick wall of yellowish brick, cemented with a brilliant white mortar, which has been broken through in hollowing it out; and a little to the north of it I discovered what Beauchamp saw impaled and understood from the natives to be an idol. I was told the same, and that it was discovered by an old Arab in digging, but, that, not knowing what to do with it, he covered it up again. [It is probable that many fragments of antiquity, especially of the larger kind, are lost in this manner. The inhabitants call all stones with inscriptions or figures on them idols.] On sending for the old man, I set a number of men to work, who, after a day's hard labor, laid open enough of the statue to show that it was a lion of colossal dimensions, standing on a pedestal of a coarse kind of grey granite, and of rude workmanship; in the mouth was a circular aperture into which a man might introduce his fist. A little to the west of the ravine there is another remarkable object, called by the natives the Kasr, or Palace, by which appellation I shall designate the whole mass. It is a very remarkable ruin, which, being uncovered and in part detached from the rubbish, is visible from a considerable distance; but so unhappily fresh in its appearance, that it was only one hour's inspection that I was satisfied of its being in reality a Babylonian remain. It consists of several walls and piers, (which face the cardinal points,) eight feet in thickness, in some places ornamented with niches, and in others strengthened by pilasters and buttresses, built of fine burnt brick, (still perfectly clean and sharp,) laid in lime-cement of such tenacity, that those whose business it is have given up working, on account of the extreme difficulty of extracting them whole. The tops of these walls are not yet seen, but many have been much higher. On the outside they have in some places been cleared nearly to the foundations, but the internal spaces formed by them are yet filled with rubbish; in some parts almost to their summit. One part of the wall has been split into three parts, and overthrown as if by an earthquake; some detached walls of the same kind, standing at different distances, show what remains to have been only a small part of the original fabric; indeed it appears that the whole have been in part fifty feet high, and the wall which crosses its upper end, were connected with it. There are some hollows underneath, in which several persons have lost their lives: so that no one will now venture into them, and their entrances have become choked up with rubbish. Near this ruin is a heap of rubbish, the sides of which are curiously streaked by the alteration of its materials, the chief part of which, it is probable, was unburnt brick, of which I found a small quantity in the neighborhood, but no reeds were discoverable in the interstices. There are two paths near this ruin, made by the workmen who carry down their bricks to the river side, whence they are transported by boats to Hella; and a little to the N. E. of it is the famous tree which the natives call Athel, and which I maintain to have been flourishing in ancient Babylon, from the destruction of which they say God purposely preserved it, that it might afford All a convenient place to tie up his horse after the battle of Hella! It stands on a kind of ridge, and nothing more than one side of its trunk remains; (by which it appears to have been of considerable pith: yet the branches at the top are still perfectly verdant, and, gently waving in the wind, produce a melodiously rustling sound. It is an evergreen, something resembling the Agave virens, and of a kind, I believe, not common in this part of the country, though I am told there is a tree of the same description at Basra.

All the people of the country assert that it is extremely dangerous to approach this mound after night-fall, on account of the multitude of evil spirits by which it is haunted.

A mile to the north of the Kasr ['palace'] and nine hundred and fifty yards from the river bank, is the last ruin of this series, described by Pietro della Valle. The native calls it Mukhtilib, or, according to the vulgar Arabic pronunciation of these parts, Mujelibe, meaning overturned. It is of an oblong shape, irregular in its height and the measurement of its sides, which face the cardinal points; the northern side being two hundred yards in length; the southern two hundred and nineteen; the eastern one hundred and eighty-two; and the western one hundred and thirty-six; the elevation of the S. E. or highest angle, one hundred and forty-one feet. Near the summit, W. appears a low wall, built of unburnt bricks, mixed up with chopped straw or reeds and covered with clay-mortar of great thickness, having between every layer a layer of reeds. . . .

All are worn into furrows by the weather;—in some places of great depth. The summit is covered with heaps of rubbish;—whole bricks with inscriptions on their backs and sides; the whole covered with innumerable fragments of pottery, brick, bitumen, pebbles, vitrified brick, or scoria, and even shells, bits of glass, and mother-of-pearl. There are many dens of wild beasts in various parts, in one of which I found the bones of sheep and other animals, and perceived a strong smell like that of a lion. I also found quantities of porcupine quills, and in most cavities are numbers of bats and owls. It is a curious coincidence, that I here first heard the oriental account of satyrs. I had always imagined the belief of their existence was confined to the West; but a Chodar, who was with me when I examined this ruin, mentioned, by accident, that in this desert an animal is found resembling a man from the head to the waist, but having the thighs and legs of a sheep or goat; he said, also, that the Arabs hunt it with dogs, and eat the lower parts, abstaining from the upper, on account of their resemblance to those of the human species. But the wild beast of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there,' Is. xiii. 91.

It was in this Mujelibe that a quantity of marble was found, some years ago, and afterwards, a coffin of mulberry-wood, containing a human body, enclosed in a tight wrapper, and apparently partially covered with bitumen. The report of this induced Mr. R. to set laborers to work, for the purpose of discovery. 'They dug into a shaft or hollow pier, sixty feet square, lined with fine brick laid in bitumen, and filled up with earth; in this they found a brass spike, some earthen vessels, (one of which was very thin,) and had the remains of fine white varnish on the outside,) and a beam of date-tree wood. On the third day's work they made their way into the opening, and discovered a narrow passage nearly ten feet high, half filled with rubbish, flat on the top, and exhibiting both burnt and unburnt bricks; the former with inscriptions on them, and the latter, as usual, laid with a layer of reeds between every row, except in one or two courses near the bottom, where they were cemented with bitumen; a curious and unaccountable circumstance. This passage appeared as if it originally had a lining of fine burnt brick, cemented with bitumen, to conceal the unburnt brick, of which the body of the building was principally composed. Frosting it is another passage, (or rather a continuation of the same to the eastward, in which direction it probably extends to a considerable distance, perhaps even all along the northern front of the Muejelibe,) choked up with earth, in digging out which I discovered, near the top, a wooden coffin, containing a skeleton in high preservation. Under the head of the coffin was a round pebble; attached to the coffin, on the outside, a brass bird, and inside an ornament of the same material, which had apparently been suspended to some part of the skeleton. These, could any doubt remain, place the antiquity of the skeleton beyond all dispute. This being extracted, a little further in the rubbish the skeleton of a child was found; and it is probable that the whole of the passage, whatever its extent may be, was occupied in a similar manner. No skulls were found, either here or in the sepulchral urns at the bank of the river.

These are a few masses of ruins on the eastern side of the river. The western side affords none immediately adjacent to the river; but about six miles south-west of Helliah is a vast mass, previously known to us only by the cursory report of Niebuhr, who describes it as 'a ruinous town.' It is called by the Arabs Biras Minrod, by the Jews, Nebuchadnezzar's Prison. Of this Mr. Rich says, 'I visited the Biras under circumstances peculiarly favorable to the grandeur of its effect. The morning was at first stormy, and threatened a severe fall of rain; but as we approached the object of our journey, the heavy cloud separating discovered the Biras frowning over the plain, and presenting the appearance of a circular hill, crowned by a tower, with a high ridge extending along the foot of it. Its being entirely concealed from our view during the first part of the ride, prevented our acquiring the gradual idea, in general so prejudicial to effect, and so particularly lamented by those who visit the pyramids. Just as we were within the proper distance, it burst at once upon our sight in the midst of rolling masses of thick black clouds, partially obscured by that kind of haze whose indistinctness is one great cause of sublimity, whilst a few strong catches of stormy light, thrown upon the desert in the back ground, served to give some idea of the immense extent, and dreary solitude, of the wastes in which this venerable ruin stands. It is a mound of an oblong figure, the total circumference of which is seven hundred and sixty-two yards. At the eastern side it is not more than fifty or sixty feet high; at the western it rises in a conical figure to one hundred and ninety-eight feet; and on its summit is a solid pile of brick, thirty-seven feet high, by twenty-eight in breadth, diminishing in thickness to the top, which is irregular. It is built of fine burnt bricks, with inscriptions on them, laid in lime-mortar of admirable cement. The other parts of the summit of this hill are occupied by immense fragments of brickwork of no determinate figure, tumbled together, and converted into solid vitrified masses, as if they had undergone the fiercest fire, or been blown up with gunpowder, the layers of bricks being perfectly discernible—a curious fact, and one for which I am utterly incapable of accounting. The whole of this mound is itself a ruin, bordered by the weather, and strewn with the usual fragments, and with pieces of black stone, sand stone, and marble.

No reeds are discernible in any part. At the foot of the mound a step may be traced, scarcely elevated above the plain, exceeding in extent by several feet the base; and there is a quadrangular enclosure round the whole, as at the Mpuilbue, but much more perfect and of greater dimensions. At a trifling distance from the Birs, and parallel with its eastern face, is a mound not inferior to the Kasr in elevation;
much longer than it is broad. Round the Birs are	ruins to a considerable extent."

[This ruin was afterwards examined by Sir R. K.
Porter, who gives some additional facts and notices.
He found the base of the brick wall, which is still standing, to be entirely free from marks of fire, and apparently still in its original condition. He therefore draws the not improbable conclusion, that the destroying agent, whatever it was, must have acted from above, in a downward direction; and that the immures fragments of a circular ruin, broken which lie strewn around, must have fallen from some point higher than the summit of the remnant of wall at present standing. The fire which produced these remarkable effects, must have had the glow of the hottest fires, and the character of the disruption or fissure of the wall, and of the vitrified masses, he is disposed to believe that the destruction was effected by lightning. (Travels, vol. ii. p. 212.)

Through the researches of Ker Porter and Mr.
Rich, the former suggestion of Nieburh, that this ruin is the remains of the tower of Belus, is sup-poused by Rosenmueller to be placed nearly beyond doubt. (Bib. Georg. i. ii. p. 24.) The traditional name, also, Birs Ninimrod, tower of Ninimrod, favors the supposition, so far as this species of proof is of any value. The mound to the eastward of the Birs may then be the ruins of ancient buildings occupied by the numerous priests and servants of the temple.

—All these heaps of ruins occupy the area of a large parallelgram, around which the remains of a strong wall or mound are still distinctly to be traced.

De-la Valle, major Rennell, and others, as may be seen in the preceding extracts, have supposed that the tower of Belus is to be sought for in Delhi Vale's ruin, situated on the east side of the river at the most northern point of all the ruins. Against this supposition, K. Porter brings very cogent reasons; (ii. p.
346;) but supposes that ruin to have been formerly the ruins of which the wall appeared, with an east and west parapet, and a moat.

Rosenmueller against this latter conjecture is a strong one, viz. that this ruin lies quite out of the city itself, being connected, according to the drawings, with the wall which here sweeps around it; while it is also too remote from the river, which divided the palace or castle into two parts. The latter writer, with great probability, conjectures that we see here the ruins of a fortification or citadel, which commanded and protected the walls of the city on this side. * R.

Descenting from this ruin southward, we arrive at that grand name of ruins, called by tradition the Kasr, or palace. There is no difficulty in deferring to this tradition; or even in believing that perhaps the single remaining tree, the Ateile, may be a descend-ance of the birch trees of the former era of the famous hanging gardens. This building has, evidently,
been constructed with the greatest care;

and its peculiar "freshness," on which major Ren-nell found an argument against its Babylonish origin, appears to be nothing beyond what might be expected from more careful selection of materials, better manipulation and workmanship, and, in one word—from royal liberality and patronage. Uniformity of plan is seldom consulted in the palaces of eastern monarchs, nor is the arrangement of their several offices, such as European judgment would prefer. Unless, therefore, we could suppose that the palace of Semiramis, or of Nebuchadnezzar, or of any other Babylonish monarch, with the additions of later times, was conceived on principles of more than common correctness, we must allow that in its best condition it was little other than a labyrinth;
and, consequently, its ruins can be nothing but confusion.

Mr. Rich says, (Second Memoir, p. 10.) "The strong embankment built by the Babylonian monarchs was intended to prevent the overflow, not to secure its running in one channel; and ever since the embankment was ruined, the river has expended itself in periodical inundations. This is the case in many parts of its progress; for instance at Felus,
the inundation from whence covers the whole face of the country as far as the walls of Bagdad, . . .
with a depth of water sufficient to render it navigable for rafts and flat-bottomed boats. . . . At Cilisilah, notwithstanding the numerous canals drawn from it,
when it rises it overflows many parts of the western desert; and on the east it inundates itself into the hollows and more level parts of the ruins, converting them into lakes and morasses." The reader, who has seen the overflowing Nile called sea, by Nahum,
in the instance of Memphis, will, without reluctance,
allow the same appellation to the overflowing Euphrates; and truly enough may it be said, that the sea has come up over Babylon; since the more level parts of the ruins are converted into lakes and morasses, during the seasons of the river's swelling;
though at intervals these swamps may be toleraably dry.

It is evident from what has been adduced, that no other remains of ancient Babylon than those of its public buildings can now be discovered or distinguished: the houses of individuals, which Hierodotus describes as being three stories in height, have distolved into these ruins, either by being destroyed;
or, what is the same thing, being covered with earth.
Nor do the gardens and pleasure grounds, embellished and refreshed by streams of water, and by plantations affording shade and privacy, those indispensable luxuries in the East, which were once the abode of wealth and elegance, remain; and we cannot wonder that more accessible retreats, in which those who carried them captive demanded of the forlorn Isrables to sing the Lord's song in this foreign land, should have shared in the general fate. We see by what means the willows on which they hung'd their harps might grow among the water-courses; but the water-courses are ruined, and the willows are extinct.

Whether we should seek the exterior walls of the province of Babylon in the direction traced by captain Frederick is of small importance, since we have ventured to conjecture that they were not distinguished by magnitude or solidity: whether those more proximate to the city, and especially whether those which have left long mounds, in ruins, but which evidently lie at the temple and the palace, may be any part of the broad walls, is a question of greater importance, and, at present, of difficult solution. Whether these long enclosures have ever been faced with brick, whether they have ever had a ditch before them, and whether their breadth answers to that assigned to the famous walls of Babylon by ancient writers, we can neither affirm nor deny, till possessed of more accurate information.

Mr. Rich has very properly called the attention of his readers to the accomplishment of that prophecy of Isaiah which predicts the overthrow of Babylon, "as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation: neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there: but wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there: and the wild beasts shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces." The prophet adds in the following chapter: (xvi. 33,) "I will make it a possession for the bittens, (see Bitter,) and pond of water"—rather, stagnant marshes of reeds. Almost every word of these prophecies may be justified from Mr. Rich himself: he mentions his perception of a strong smell like that of a lion—his finding bones of sheep, &c. doubtless of animals carried there and devoured by the wild beasts, many dens of which in various parts; he found quantities of porcupine quills—numbers of bats and owls—and, to close the list of these doleful creatures, here he learned the existence of satyrs—here he was cautioned against the violent or impassioned after-night falls; and, in short, his "tuftsocks of rank grass" are no other than the "reeds of the stagnant marshes" of the prophet.

There would be something extremely melancholy in the fate of Babylon, its desolation, its disappearance, its external annihilation, after so vigorous and so long continued exertion to raise it to pre-eminence, did we not know that its pride was excessive, and its power was cruel. The fierceness of war was the delight of its kings. Nebuchadnezzar himself had been a warrior of no limited ambition; the Chaldeans were bitter, hasty, sanguinary, ferocious; and to read the accounts of their inhumanity prepares us for a reverse, which we await, but do not regret. There is something in the idea of retaliation from which the idea of evil spirits is not foreign,—she hath done, so do to her; 2 is the language not of prophecy or of poetry only, but of "even-handed justice," in the common acceptance of mankind. It is not only because we are better acquainted with the miseries inflicted on Jerusalem and the sanctuary that we admit these feelings in respect to Babylon: there can be no doubt, but what other nations had equally suffered under her oppression: the people who are emphatically called on to execute the vengeance determined against her, had certainly been galled under her yoke. Cyrus and Xerxes, who captured her city and destroyed her temple, were but the avengers of their country. Alexander considered himself in the same light. It is rather from a deficiency of historical accounts than from the facts of the case, that Babylon has been supposed to have perished by a gradual decay only. Already have more symptoms of violence been discovered than were formerly supposed, and it is more than possible, that our intercourse with eastern writers may bring us acquainted with events, which will enable us to account for appearances that now present nothing but uncertainties. Idolatry took its rise at Babylon, was fostered and protected there, and from thence was diffused throughout (at least) the western world: the liberal arts, the more recog-nitio sciences, with every power of the human mind, were rendered subservient to systematic idolatry.—Its doom, therefore, must correspond with its crimes. It is enough for us, that we know its punishment to be just; and that we are happily enabled to trace in its ruins the unequivocal and even the verbal accomplish-ishment of those predictions which denounced its calamities—the monuments of miseries long deserved, but not remitted though postponed.

The following are the comparative dimensions of the principal ruins of ancient Babylon.

Mujelibe, circumference 2111 feet; height remaining on the S. E. 141 feet.
Kasr, or Palace, square, 700 yards.
Sea, or Lake, by the plain, length 800 yards; breadth 550 yards, by measurement.
Bridge, (supposed,) length 600 yards; breadth nearly 100 yards, ruins.
Temple of Belus, (Herodotus,) square, 500 feet.
Temple of Belus, (supposed,) with the buildings near it, ruins, length 1100 yards; breadth 800 yards; height remaining 50 or 60 feet.
Bire Numrood, circumference 2286 feet; height remaining, E. 50 or 60 feet; W. 198 feet; tower, 235 feet.

Extent of the whole enclosure, above two miles and a half, N. and S.—the same E. and W.

II. BABYLON, a city in Egypt, on the borders of Arabia, not far from Heliopolis and Aphrodissiopolis, and not very distant from Cairo. It is mentioned by Plutarch, who calls it Babylon. (Compare Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, book ii. chap. 13.) Diodorus Siculus says it was built by the captives brought by Sesostris from Chaldea; but Josephus says it was built in the time of Cambyses, by some Persians whom he permitted to settle there. Some critics have supposed that Peter wrote his first Epistle from this Babylon; but we have no evidence that he ever was in Egypt; and probability leads to the contrary conclusion.

BABYLONIA, the province of which Babylon was the capital; now the Babylonian or Arabian Irak, which constitutes the pastashik of Bagdad. This celebrated province included the tract of country contained between the Euphrates and the Tigris, bounded north by Mesopotamia and Assyria, and south by the Persian gulf. This gulf was indeed its only definite and natural boundary; for towards the north, towards the east or Persia, and towards the west or desert Arabia, its limits were quite indefinite. It is, however, certain, that both in ancient and modern times, important tracts on the eastern bank of the Tigris, and on the western bank of the Euphrates, and still more on both banks of their united stream, the ancient Pasitigiris and modern Shatt el-Arab, were reckoned to Babylonia, or Irak el-Abur.

The most ancient name of the country is Skinar, Gen. x. 10; Dan. i. 1, 2. Afterwards Babel, Babylon, and Babylonia, became its common appellation; with which, at a later period, Chaldea, or the land of the Chaldeans, was used as synonymous, after this people had got the whole into their possession. Isaiah, in the superscription of one of his prophecies respecting the destruction of Babylon, (xxi. 1,) calls this land "the desert plain of the sea." This we must regard as a poetical, or rather, perhaps, a symbolical, epithet, derived probably from the circumstance, that before the erection of dikes and mounds by Semire Babylonia was an extensive plain, interrupted by no hill or mountain, consisting of a fatty brownish soil, and subject to the annual inundations of the Ti-gris and Euphrates, more especially of the latter, whose banks are lower and flatter than those of the Tigris.
The Euphrates commonly rises about twelve feet above its ordinary level; and continues at this height
from the end of April till June. These frequent inundations of course compelled the earliest tillers of the soil to provide means for drawing off the superabun-dant water, and so distributing it over the whole surface, that those tracts which were in themselves less well-watered, might receive the requisite irrigation.
From this cause, the whole of Babylonia came to be divided up by a multitude of larger and smaller canals; in part passing entirely through one from river to the other; in part, also, losing themselves in the interior, and serving only the purposes of irrigation.
(Herodot. i. 193.) These canals seem to be the rivers
g of Babylon mentioned by the Chal- The country important of these were the Nahar Malca, or the king's river, which flowed from the Euphrates S. E.
to the Tigris; the Pallatocaps, drawn from the Euphrates, above Babylon, and emptying its waters
into the Tigris; and the Malaccas, which flowed through the province towards Arabia; (into which channel Cyrus turned the main stream of the Euphrates in his assault upon the city:) and the Massasarcs, which flowed parallel to the Euphrates, at the distance of some miles from it toward the west.

Besides this multitude of canals, which are now mostly vanished without trace, Babylonia contained several large lakes, formed partly by the inundations of the two great rivers, and partly by the work of art.
The largest of these is described by Herodotus, (i.
185,) and was the work of the celebrated queen Nitoria. It was situated in the northern part of Babyl-onia, far above the city, not very remote from the river, to which it ran parallel for a great distance.
The earth which was excavated from it, served to build the dikes and mounds along the river; and the whole shore of the lake was enclosed by a wall of stone. Besides this, at a distance below the city, there were on the west side of the Euphrates, tracts of low marshy land, which were filled with water from the river and canals, and extended far into the Arabian desert. Babylon, therefore, was a land abounding in water; and Jeremiah might therefore well say of it, that it dwelt upon many waters, Jer.
li. 13.

Notwithstanding the extreme heat which reigns here for the greater portion of the year, and which compels the inhabitants to pass the most of the day in subterraneous apartments, called Serdaps, the air is in general pure and wholesome, excepting around Busra and the low regions in the vicinity. In summer the atmosphere is so clear, that at a very short distance from the river, neither dampness nor dew
is to be perceived; and were it not for the morasses formed by the inundations, which might easily be reclaimed, the country might still be what it was sold, and might with propriety be called. Thus Herodotus describes it, (i. 193,) as rewarding the diligent irrigation and tillage of its ancient cultivators
by a return of two hundred and even three hundred fold. On the other hand, the country was destitute of large trees, and had neither the fig, olive, nor vine; though date and palm trees were common.
But the want of timber for buildings was made up by abundant supplies of the best of clay for bricks, which, whether burned, or dried in the sun, acquired such hardness, that they have endured without injury
the storms and violence of ages, although scattered and exposed to the weather in the utmost degree.
Mortar, also, was of a character, which was prepared by the hand of nature herself. Eight days' journey above Babylon, on the small river Is, near the city
Hi, were copious fountains of naphtha, or bitumen, which was used for cement, by intermingling with it layers of straw or reeds. This process is described by Herodotus; and the present ruins of Babylon exhibit this cement and these layers in perfect preservation.

The cities and places mentioned in the Bible as lying in Babylonia, besides BABYLON the capital, are DURA, the great plain around Babylon, where Nebuchadnezzar set up the gigantic golden image, (Dan.
ni. 1.) BABAL, ACDAD, CALNEH or CALNO, etc. which may be seen under these articles respectively.

The geographical situation of Babylon was uncommonly favorable for commercial pursuits. By means of its great navigable waters, it received from above the productions of Syria and Asia Minor, of Media and Armenia; and from below, through the Persian gulf, those of India, Persia, Arabia, Egypt, and the whole coast to the repository of all the treasures of Asia and Africa;
and is, therefore, justly termed by Ezekiel, a city of merchants, Ezek. xvi. 4. Babylonian garments or mantles, renowned for their fineness and splendor, seem early to have been articles of exportation; see Josh. vii. 31. Indeed, the Babylonians, from all the hints contained in the Bible, and also from the more detailed accounts of Herodotus, (i. 195,) seem to have been a people who loved splendor, and who had become accustomed to a multitude of artificial wants,
which could not be satisfied without a commercial intercourse with many and even distant nations.

The Babylonians were celebrated, even in the earliest ages, for their knowledge of the sciences;
and, more especially, they had cultivated astronomy to a very important extent. The observations of the Chaldeans, (Dan. ii. 4, 5, 10,) from the nation which they probably migrated to Babylon. As Nebuchadnezzar made his entry into Jerusalem, after the capture of the city, there was among his train of nobles the Rab-mag, which, although treated in the English version as a proper name, means, doubtless, the chief of the magi; (Jerem. xxxix. 3, 13,) but whether this term was a general name for the whole caste of the priests, or only of a particular class, cau-

not be determined. To them belonged also, no doubt, the astrologers and star-gazers mentioned in Isa. lxi. 13.

The language of the ancient Babylonians was undoubtedly a branch of the great Semitic stock, to which, also, the Hebrew and Arabic belong; and was probably not very, if at all, different from the East Aramean, or Chaldee. The written character was also the same as that of the Chaldeans. Later Jewish writers indeed inaccurately call this the Assyrian, insomuch as they take the name Assyria in its most extensive sense, as including Babylonia and Chaldees, etc. See Assyria.

According to the Bible, the kingdom of Babylonia was the earliest founded after the flood. Nimrod was its founder; and he afterwards extended his conquests over Assyria, Gen. x. 8, 9, 10. The Greek and Roman writers knew nothing of Nimrod; with them Belus was the founder of Babylonia, and of the kingdom. The Jewish writer, as well as Belus and Nimrod can easily have been one person. Several centuries later, in the time of Abraham, we hear of a king of Shanir, or Babylonia, Amraphel, Gen. xiv. 1. From this time onward, there is no mention of Babylonian kings in the earlier historical books of the Old Testament. Property of Alexandria, in the second century of our era, gives us a catalogue of the kings of Babylonia, which he probably took from the writings of Berosus. This begins with Nabonassar, in 747 B.C. who was the first of the seven great kings of Babylonia; for amongst the colonists sent by Shalmaneser king of Assyria to Samaria, about 730 B.C. there were also Babylonians; a proof that Babylonia at that time was dependent on Assyria, although it might have its own king. Such a vassal or viceroy was also Merodach-baladan, who about 711 B.C. sent messengers to Hezekiah, to congratulate him on his restoration, and form an alliance with him against the Assyrians, 2 Kings xx. 12; Is. xxxix. 1. This Merodach-baladan is also mentioned under the same name by Berosus, (see Gessnerus, Com. 2. Is. 1. p. 599.) who relates of him, that he usurped the throne after having murdered his predecessor Assir; that after six months he himself was slain by Belibus, or Elibus, who undertook to maintain himself as an independent king. But in the third year of his reign, he was conquered by Sennacherib, who made his son, Esar-haddon, viceroy of Babylonia. Nevertheless, before the lapse of a century, the empire of Assyria was destined to be overthrown by a power from Babylonia, viz. the Chaldeans. (See this article.) Under his reign the empire of Babylonia attained to their highest pitch of splendor. He died after a reign of 35 years, in the year 583 B.C.

After his death the Babylonian-Chaldean empire hastened rapidly to its ruin. His son and successor, Evil-merodach, (2 Kings xxv. 7; Jerem. iii. 31.) whose queen was probably the celebrated Nitocris, became so odious by his vices, that he was murdered in the second year of his reign, by his brother-in-law, Nabonidus, who then mounted the throne; and as the Chaldean empire was followed, after a reign of four years, by his son Labsharoarched, a minor, who, after nine months, was murdered by several of his nobles. These placed Nabonidus, or Labynth (the Belshazzar of Daniel) upon the throne, who was a son of Evil-merodach and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar; and during his minority his mother Nitocris seems to have acted as regent. But at this time the Medo-Persian kingdom was every where acquiring strength and extent under Cyrus; and at length Babylonia and with it the Chaldean empire, fell before his arms, and became incorporated with the empire of the Persians, about the year 538 B.C. See Babylon.

Of the internal constitution of the Babylonian empire, we only know, in general, that its provinces were under governors, or viceroys, pachas—a constitution which seems to be common to all the oriental states of ancient and modern times. But the number of provinces is unknown. (S.

verb or of tears, (Psalms xxxvi. 6) perhaps the same as the valley of Tears, or Weeping, or Bochim, Judg. ii. 1; 2 Sam. v. 23. In a moral sense the vale of tears signifies this world, which, to good men, presents only an occasion of grief and tears, because of the continual dangers to which we are exposed, and the absence of those eternal good things which we ought to long for after. The Psalmist says, "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, in whose heart are the ways of them, who, passing through the valley of Baca, or tears, make it a well, the rain also fills the pools;" from which it has been generally inferred that the valley of Baca was a dreary, thirsty, undesirable place—the very reverse of what appears to be the fact. The following is from De la Roque: (Voy. de Syrie, p. 116.) "I was extremely satisfied with our walk; which, besides, gave me an opportunity of admiring the most agreeable territory, and the best cultivated, perhaps, in all Syria, lying the length of the plain from north to south, to the mountains which separate it from that of Damascus. This plain, or, more properly speaking, the whole territory of Baalbec, to the mountains, is named in Arabic, Al-Beka, which we express by Bekaa. It is watered by the river Letanus, and by many other streams; it is a delicious, well-encompassed, country, and is in nothing inferior to the country of Damascus, which is so renowned among the orientals. Bekaa produces, among other things, those beautiful and excellent grapes which are sent to various parts, under the name of grapes of Damascus." This seems to be the very same place meant by the Psalmist, and to have retained (or recovered, as many places have, under the present Arab government) its ancient appellation. It is among the mountains of Lebanon, north of Judea. (It need not, however, be understood that there was really a valley called Baca, or the valley of weeping. The Psalmist in exile, or at least at a distance from Jerusalem, is speaking of the privileges and happiness of those who are permitted to make the usual pilgrimages to that city in order to worship Jehovah in the temple: "They love the ways which lead thither; yes, though they must pass through rough and dreary paths, even a vale of tears, yet such are their hope and joy of heart, that all this is to them as a well watered country, a land crowned with the blessings of the east wind. Something like this would seem to be the sense of the passage. The plain or valley of Bashboc, referred to above, could not of course lie in the way of any Israelites on such a pilgrimage; while its fertility is utterly inappropriate to it.

BACCHIDES, the general of the Syrian king Demetrius, and governor beyond the river, i.e. the Euphrates, 1 Macc. vii. 8. The king sent him with an army against Judæa, to establish the notorious Alcimus (q. v.) by force in the dignity of high-priest, 161 B.C. He left with Alcimus a body of troops, that he might maintain himself against Judas Maccabæus. But, as Judas continued to make progress, Baccides returned the next year with a chosen army, vanquished and slew Judas at Lissa, (1 Macc. ix. 18.) held Jonathan afterwards at bay, and fortified Jerusalem; (ix. 49, 50,) but after the death of Alcimus, in the next year, he again withdrew his forces. In the following year, (158 B.C.) however, he returned to Judæa on the invitation of some of the discontented Jews; but concluded a peace with Jonathan on reasonable terms, and left him to govern the Jewish state, 1 Macc. ix. 70, seq. 8R.

BACKBITE, to speak evil of an absent person. Paul classess this sin with several others of a heinous nature, Rom. i. 30.

BACKSLIDE, to depart gradually and insensibly from the faith, love and practice of God's truth, Jer. iii. 6—14; Hos. iv. 16.

BADGERS' SKINS. Among those inadvertent renderings, which, for want of better information on oriental natural history, have been adopted, in our public translation, that of "badgers' skins" for the covering of the tabernacle, (Exod. xxv. 5, et al.) and for shoes, (Ezek. xvi. 10.) has been liable to great exception. The badger is an inhabitant of cold countries, certainly not of Arabia, and is rare, even where it breeds; as in England. It is a small, inoffensive animal, of the bear genus, and remains torpid all winter.

The ancient versions, for the most part, took the word Tahash to signify a color, a violet color, to which the rams' skins were dyed; and for this opinion Bochart contends: but the rabbins insist on its being an animal; and Aben Ezra thinks it to be of the bull kind; some animal which is thick and fat; and in this sense the word appears to be the same as the Arabic Dehshat, fat, oily. The conjecture, then, of those who refer the Tahash to the seal, is every way credible: as in our own island the seal is famous for its fat or oil, which, in default of whale oil, is used for similar purposes. Moreover, seal-skins, on account of their durability, are used to cover trunks and boxes, to defend them from the weather; and as the skin of the Tahash was used for making shoes, (Ezek. xvi. 10,) so the skin of the seal may be, and is, tanned into good leather as calf-skin itself.

It remains, then, to be proved that an animal, fit for the purpose, was readily procurable by the Israelites in the wilderness; for this we quote Thevenot, p. 162: who, being at Tor, a port on the Red sea, says on the 1st of January he dined with something of a certain fish, which they call a sea-man. However, I put the hand of one since. This fish is taken in the Red sea, about little isles, that are close by Tor. It is a great, strong fish, and hath nothing extraordinary but two hands, which are indeed like the hands of a man, saving that the fingers are joined together with a skin like the foot of a goose; but the skin of the fish is like the skin of a wild goat, or chamois. When they spy that fish, they strike him on the back with harping irons, as they do whales, and so kill him. They use the skin of it for making bucklers, which are musket proof. Whether this be a species of seal must be left undetermined; as nothing is said of its coming out without the sea, or being amphibious; nevertheless, it may be the Tahash of the Hebrews. Niebuhr says, (p. 157, Fr. ed.) "A merchant of Abusahr called Dahash that fish which the captains of English vessels called puppoise, and the Germans sea-hog, or dolphin. In my voyage from Makkat to Abushar, I saw a prodigious quantity together, near Ras Mussenden, who all were going the same way, and seemed to swim with great vehemence."

[Gesenius adopts the same opinion, on account of the similarity of the Arabic name Dahash, which means, properly, the dolphin, but is also applied to the seal genus. On many of the small islands of the Red sea, around the peninsula of Sinai, are found seals; (hence in place-name, Strab. xvi. p. 763.) likewise, a species of sea-cow, called also sea-man or sea-camel, the skin of which is an inch thick, and is used by the Arabs of the present day for shoe-leather. Burckhardt remarks that he "saw parts of the skin of a large fish, killed on the coast, which was an inch in thickness, and is employed by the Arabs instead of leather for sandals." (Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, p. 582. — Rosenmueller (on Ex. xxv. 5.) inclines to the ancient rendering, which makes the word denote some color.]

BAGOAS, Holofernes' chamberlain, who introduced Judith into his master's tent. The word Bagoas is used for eunuchs in general, and often occurs in the history of the East.

BAHURIM, a town of Benjamin, (2 Sam. iii. 16; xvii. 5; xvi. 18;) probably built by the young men who escaped the destruction of their tribe. It is thought to have been also named Almon, (Josh. xxi. 18;) and Almam, 1 Chron. vi. 60.

BAJITH, a tower of Moab, Isaiah xv. 2.

BALA, a city of the tribe of Simeon, Josh. xix. 3; called also BIlshah, 1 Chr. iv. 29. Josephus also speaks of a place Bala, Ant. vi. 6.

BALAAM, a prophet, or diviner, of the city Pe-thor, on the Euphrates, Num. xxii. Balak, king of Moab, having seen the multitude of Israel, and fearing they would attack his country, sent for Balaam, to come and curse them. His messengers having declared their errand, Balaam, during the night, consulted God; who forbade his going. Balak afterwards sent others, of superior quality; Balaam still declined, but kept them in his house that night; during which the Lord said to him, "If the men come to call thee, rise up and go with them; but yet the word that I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do." Balaam, therefore, rose up in the morning, (not staying for the signal appeared to him, of being called by the messengers, as appears,) and went with the envoys of Balak. God, perceiving this froward evil disposition of his heart, was angry; and an angel stood in the way to stop him. This, Balaam's new seeing, while the diviner himself was probably, lost in thought, turned out of the roadway, into the fields. Balaam, however, forced him into the way again, and this occurred a second and a third time. (See Ass of Balaam.) At length, Balaam was made sensible of the divine interposition, and offered to return home; but, receiving ver-mission, he continued his journey to Balak, who complained of his reluctance in coming. "Now I am come (said Balaam) I can say nothing: the word that God puttho into my mouth, that must I speak." Balak counselled him, in the town of Hupatum, (Kiri-thoth) and the next morning carried him to the high places of Baal, and showed him the extremity of the Israelitish camp. Here Balaam desired seven altars to be built, and a bullock and a ram to be offered on each altar, Numb. xxiii. 10. So Balak stood by the burnt offering, while Balaam withdrew to his enchantments. God bade him return, and utter an oracular blessing on Israel, and not a curse. This he did a second and a third time, to the extreme mortification of Balak, who dismissed him in great anger; Balaam declaring, that he could not "go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of his own mind." He subsequently foretold what Israel should, in future times, do to the nations round about; and, after having advised Balak to engage Israel in idolatry and whoredom, that they might offend God and be forsaken by him, quitted his territories for his own land, Numb. xxiv. 14; Mic. vi. 5; 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11; Rev. ii. 14. This bad counsel was pursued; the young women of Moab inveigled the Hebrews to the feasts of Baal-Peor; persuaded them to idolatry and seduced them to impurity. God commanded Moses to avenge this inhuman procedure, and he declared war against the Midianites, of whose heads he slew many, and killed five of their princes, Numb. xxiv. 17, 18. Among those who fell on this occasion was Balaam, xxxi. 2, 7, 8.

The rabbins relate many other particulars of Balaam; as that at first he was one of Pharaoh's counsellors; according to others, he was the father of Jannes and Jambres, two eminent magicians; that he squinted, and was lame; that he was the author of that passage in Numbers, wherein his history is related; and that Moses inserted it, in like manner as he inserted other writings.

It has been much questioned whether Balaam was a true prophet of the Lord, or a more diviner, magician, or fortune-teller. Origen and others say, that all his power consisted in magic and cursing, because the devil, by whose influence he acted, can only curse and injure. Theodoret, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ambrose, think he prophesied without being aware of the import of what he said; but Jerome, and others who have adopted the opinion of the Hebrews—Balaam knew the true God, and was a true prophet, though corrupted by avarice. Moses certainly says, he consulted the Lord; and calls the Lord, his God, (Numb. xxiii. 18.) but this might have been merely because he was of the posterity of Shem, which patriarch maintained the worship of the Lord among his descendants; so that, while the posterity of Ham fell into idolatry, and the posterity of Japheth were settled at a distance, in Europe, the Shemites maintained the worship of Jehovah, and knew his holiness and jealousy. This appears in the prophetic advice which Balaam gives Balak, to seduce the Israelites to transgress against Jehovah, with the holiness of whose nature the perverted prophet seems to have been well acquainted.

It is worthy of notice in the account of Balaam's divinations, (Numb. xxiv. 1.) that "When he saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel, he went not as at other times to seek for enchantments;" i. e. he did not pretend to go away and seek for omens and practise incantations, but began at once to speak in the name of the Lord.

Balaam, the son of Beor, son of Beor, who dwelt in Aroer, near the river Rimmon, in the land of the Amorites, 2 Kings iii. 7; Jer. xxxii. 1. He is by many supposed to have been the same as Nabas, a former king of Babylon; but this does not accord with the account of Berosus. See in Babelonia, and Atriela.

Balaam, the son of Zippor, king of Moab, being terrified at the multitude of Israel who were encamped on the confines of his country, sent deputies to Balaam the diviner, desiring him to come and curse them, or to devote them to destruction, Numb. xxii.—xxv. (See Balaam.) Balaam having advised him to engage the Israelites in sin, Balak, politickly, as he thought, followed his counsel; which proved equally pernicious to him who gave it, to those who followed it, and to those against whom it was intended. The Israelites, who were betrayed by it, were slain by their brethren who continued unpervaded; Balaam, the author of it, was involved in the slaughter of the Midianites; and Balak, who had executed it by means of the Midianitic women, saw his allies at work, the enemy conquered, and himself charged with being the cause of their calamity.

Balance, in Scripture, an instrument much of the same nature, probably, as the Roman steelyard, where the weight is hung at one end of the beam, and the article to be weighed at the other end. Balances, in the plural, generally appear to mean scales,—a pair of scales. See Weighing.

Baldness is a natural effect of old age, in which period of life the hair of the head, wanting nourishment, falls off, and leaves the head naked. Baldness was used, as a token of mourning; and is threatened to the voluptuous daughters of Israel, instead of well-set hair; (Isa. iii. 24; see also Mic. i. 16;) and instances of it occur, Isa. xv. 2; Jer. xlvii. 5; Ezek. xiv. 12; Amos viii. 10.

Balm, see Balsam.

Balsam-tree, or Balsam. The word Balsam may be derived from Bael-shemen, בֶּן-שֵׁם, i. e. lord of oil; or the most precious of perfumed oils. The word is not in the Hebrew of the Song of Solomon, but we find the vineyards of Engedi, (P. 14.) which are believed to have been gardens of the balsam-tree. In Ezek. xxvii. 17. we find the word pannag; which the Vulgate translates Balsamum; and which is so translated by our other interpreters. (The usual Hebrew word is תֵּרָה, the opobalsam, which was found particularly in Gilgal. R.)

The Balsam tree, though not a native of Judea, was cultivated in great perfection in the gardens near Jericho, on the banks of Jordan. Josephus, speaking of the vale of Jericho, says, "Now here is the most fruitful country of Judea, which bears a vast number of palm trees, besides the balsam tree, whose spouts they cut with sharp stones, and at the conclusion they gather the juice, which drops down like tears." De Bell. Jud. lib. i. c. 7. sect. 6. The balsam produced by these trees was of such consequence as to be noticed by all the writers who treated of Judea. Pliny says, "This tree, which was peculiar to Jerus, or the vale of Jericho, was more like a vine than a myrtle. Vesuvian and Titus carried each of them one to Rome as rarities, and Pompey boasted of bearing them in his triumph. When Alexander the Great was in Juris, a spoonful of the balsam was all to be collected on a summer's
BALSAM

The great value set upon this drug in the East is traced to the earliest ages. The Ishmaelites or Arabian caravans or merchants, trafficking with the Arabian commodities into Egypt, brought with them...balm, as a part of their cargo. Gen. xxxvii. 25; xiii. 11.

Strabo alone, of all the ancients, has given us the truest account of the place of its origin. "In that most happy land of the Salamans," says he, "grow the frankincense, myrrh, and cinnamon," and in the coast that is about Saba, the balsam also. Among the myrrh-trees behind Azab, all along the coast, is its native country. We need not doubt that it was transplanted early into Arabia, that is, into the south part of Arabia Felix, immediately fronting Azab, where it is indigenous. The high country of Arabia is too cold to receive it, being all mountainous; water freezes there. The first plantation that succeeded seems to have been at Petra, the ancient metropolis of Arabia, now called Beder, or Bader Humim. Notwithstanding the positive authority of Josephus, and the great probability that attends it, that Juden was inoculated to Sheba for this tree, we cannot put it into competition with what we have been told in Scripture, as we have just now seen, that the place where it grew and was sold to merchants was Gilead in Judea, more than 1730 years before Christ, or 1000 before the queen of Sheba; so that, in reading the verse, nothing can be plainer than that it had been transplanted into Judea, flourished, and had become an article of commerce in Gilead, long before the period he mentions. "A company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead with their camels bearing spices, and balm, and myrrh, going down to Egypt," Gen. xxxvii. 25. Now the spicery or pepper was certainly purchased by the Ishmaelites at the mouth of the Red sea, where was the market for Indian goods; and at the same place they must have bauxite, balsam, or frankincense, or myrrh grows anywhere else, than in Saba, or Azabo, east of cape Gardesian, where were the ports of India, and whence it was dispersed over all the world.

Theophrastus, Dioscorides, Pliny, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Tacitus, Justin, Josephus, all speak of its costliness and medicinal virtues, all say that this balsam came from Judea. The words of Pliny are, "but of all other odors whatever, balsam is preferred, produced in no other part but in the land of Judea, and even there in two gardens only, both of them belonging to the king, one no more than 20 acres, and the other still smaller." Pliny's History, l. xxii. c. 25.

"At this time," concludes Mr. Bruce, "I suppose it got its name of balsamum Judaeorum or of Gilead, and thence became an article of merchandise and fiscal revenue, which probably occasioned the discouragement of bringing any more from Arabia, whence it was very probably prohibited as contraband. We should suppose that 30 acres planted with this tree would yield the produce of more than all the trees of Arabia do at this day. Nor does the plantation of Beder Hulain amount to much more than.
that quantity; for we are still to observe, that even when it had been, as it were, naturalized in Judees, and made a part of the country, yet it bears evident marks of its being a stranger there; and its being confined to two royal gardens alone, shows that it was maintained there by force and culture, and was by no means a native of the country; and this is confirmed by Strabo, who speaks of it as being in the king's palace and garden of Jericho: the place being one of the warmest in Judeas, indicates these apprehensions about it." Bruce's Travels, vol. v. p. 23. ed. 8vo. Carpenter's Scrip. Nat. Hist.

Nothing is more inexplicable to us than the remark of the bride, (Cant. v. 5) who, rising from bed, says, "her hands dropped myrrh, (balsem,) and her fingers sweet-smelling myrrh, on the handles of the lock." But we think this extract may assist our conjectures on the subject. Observe, the word rendered sweet-smelling signifies self-flowing—dropping—what comes over (as a chemist would say) freely. Now as we are not bound, that we know of, to restrain this to a juice, we may take it for this very "red, sweet-smelling powder, shed spontaneously by the tree itself." Moreover, as the women of Zim Atech cannot possibly use a powder, simply, to wash themselves with, but must combine it with water or fluid, or essence of some kind, we shall, we apprehend, need only to admit, that with such an essence as the bride calls balsem, she had recently washed herself; (that is, before going to repose,) to perceive that this incident, so perplexing to us, because unlike our customs, is perfectly agreeable to the customs of eastern countries, and what in Arabia would be thought nothing extraordinary. If the bride had only washed her head with such an essence, yet some of it might remain on her hands; but if she had, which nothing forbids, washed her arms and hands also, (vide Az Henna,) then it might naturally occur to a person, fancying herself in a dream to be acting, that she should suppose her hands and fingers to shed some of this fluid, wherever, and on whatever, they touched. It appears that fragrant essences of several kinds are used by the women in Arabia; of which professor Forskal affords sufficient instances.

As the opoponax grows in Arabia, we see no reason why it may not be the famous balm of Judees, mentioned Gen. xxxvi. 23. and Jer. xlv. 11. et al. the Tser. There being several other balmy trees, perhaps, may have been the reason why this has any difficulty in it, since certainly we must admit the possibility of its being one of them.

BAMAH, an eminence, or high place, where the Jews worshipped their idols, Ezek. xxix. 29.

BAMIAN, says Ibn Haukal, "is a town half as large as Balkh, situated on a hill. Before this hill runs a river, the stream of which flows into Gurgistan. Bamian has not any gardens or orchards, and it is the only town in this district situated on a hill. The cold part of Khorasan is about Bamian." (Sir W. Ouseley's Trans. p. 235.) This town is affirmed to have been the residence of Shen. See CHALDA.

BAMOTH, a station of the Israelites, Numb. xxi. 19, 20. Eusebius says, Bamoth is a city of Moab, on the river Arnon. It was the same place as the following Bamoth-BAAL.

BAMOTH-BAAL, the high places of Baal, or the heights sacred to Baal, was a city east of the river Jordan, given to Reuben, Josh. xiii. 17: Eusebius says it was situated on the plains of the Arnon. See BARMOTH-BAAL.

BAPTISM, from baptizō, to wash, to dip, or immerse.

I. BAPTISM BY WATER. The law and history of the Jews abound with illustrations and baptisms of different sorts. Moses enjoined the people to wash their garments, and to purify themselves, by way of preparation for the reception of the law, Exod. xix. 10. The priests and Levites, before they exercised their ministry, washed themselves, Exod. xxix. 4; Levit. viii. 20. All legal pollutions were cleansed by baptism, or by plunging into water. Certain diseases and infirmities, natural to men and to women, were to be purified by bathing. To touch a dead body, to be present at funerals, &c., required purification. But these purifications were not uniform; generally, people dipped themselves entirely under the water, and this is the most simple notion of the word baptize: but, very commonly, ritual baptism was performed by immersion, or such a immersion as included no more than the reception of some lustral blood and water scattered lightly on the person; as, when Moses consecrated the priests and altar: (Exod. xxix. 21.) when the tabernacle was sprinkled with blood, on the day of solemn expiation: (Levit. xvi. 11.) or when the ark was anointed by him for the sins of the high-priest and the multitude, (Lev. xvi. 14, 15.) and he wetted the horns of the altar with the blood of the victim. When a leper was purified after his cure, or when a man was polluted by touching or by meeting a dead body, they lightly sprinkled such persons with lustral water, Numb. xi. 13, 18, 20. The more strict professors among the Jews washed their arms up to their elbows, when returned home from market, or out of the street, fearing they might have touched some polluted thing, or person. They washed their hands, likewise, with great exactness, before and after meals; also, the furniture and utensils of their table and kitchen, as often as they had the least suspicion, of their having been polluted, Mark vi. 2; John ii. 6. The following description of a sect of Christians will remind the reader of the notice taken by the Evangelist Mark (chap. vii. 4.) of the ceremonial washings of the Pharisees: "For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands, eat not; holding the tradition of the elders. And when they come from market, except they wash, they eat not."—The Kemnon were once the same as the Falasha. . . . They have great abhorrence to fish, which they not only refrain from eating, but cannot bear the sight of; and the reason they give for this is, that Jonah the prophet (from whom they boast they are descended) was swallowed by a whale, or some other such great fish. They are hewers of wood, and carriers of water, to Gondar, and are held in great detestation by the Abyssinians. They hold that, having been once baptized, and having once communicated, no sort of prayer, or other attention to divine worship, is necessary. They wash themselves from head to foot, after coming from market or any public place, unless they may have touched any of a sect different from their own, esteeming all such uncleane." Bruce, vol. iv. p. 275. It may be at least amusing to trace the ideas of interpreters on the force of the original words ἐν καθαρσίᾳ. (Mark vii. 3.) which express, say some, to wash "with the fist," i. e. by rubbing water on the palm of one hand with the doubled fist of the other. Lightfoot explains the phrase by “washing the hand as far as the fist extends,” i.e. up to the wrist; and Theophylact enlarged its meaning still further, “up to the elbow.” We little need to fear that this enlargement of Theophylact with the left hand also, great, these Kemmont might be the commentators; for they, it seems, washed themselves from head to foot, after coming from market. May we not suppose that some of the stricter kind of Pharisees did thus entirely wash themselves, though the Evangelist only notices what was general and notorious, or, rather, what he thought best adapted to the conception of the foreigners for whose use he wrote, and for whom he was under the necessity of explaining the phrases relating to this matter, as “defiled, i.e. unwashed—hands?” ver. 2. So he glances at their “washing of cups and pots, brazen vessels and tables,” which might be washed all over; whatever be taken as the import of the word baptism, in this place. We see, also, in this instance, how consistent is the idea of persons being excessively scrupulous in some things, while excessively negligent in others; as these Kemmont, though super-accurate in washing themselves, think attendance on divine worship unnecessary; in which also, they remind us of the Pharisees, who neglected the weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy, and truth,” Matt. xxiii. 23.

But by what means did the Israelites in the wilderness, where water was so scarce that a miracle was necessary to procure sufficient for their sustenance, perform the numerous ablutions required by their law?—If the priests could obtain sufficient for their sacred services, which no doubt required a considerable quantity, how should the whole camp, men, women, and children, be furnished, beside their supply for drinking, cooking, &c. with that which was requisite for natural and for ceremonial washings? This to each person was no trifling quantity daily, and in the whole was a vast consumption: add to it, the quantity necessary for supplying the herds of cattle, &c. which are represented as numerous; and we know, beneath a burning sky, they must have been thirsty, whether at rest or in motion. The present question, however, only regards a supposed waste of water in personal and ceremonial ablutions which those who keep the frequent ceremonials of them will not esteem trivial, under the circumstances of a prodigious multitude stationary in an arid desert.

The following quotations may assist in regulating our conceptions of this matter. “—If they [the Arab Algerines] cannot come by any water, then they must wipe [themselves] as clean as they can, till water may conveniently be had, or else it suffices to take Abdes upon a stone, which I call an imaginary Abdes: i.e. to smooth their hands over a stone two or three times, and rub them one with the other, as if they were washing with water. (The like Abdes sufficeth, when any are sickly, so that water might endanger their life) and after they have so wiped, it is Giuse, i.e. lawful to esteem themselves clean. (Pits’s Account of the Mahometan Religion, &c. p. 44.) Perfectly agreeable to this description is Aaron Hill’s notice: (Travels, p. 56.) “If the time be cold and rigid, ’tis enough to make an outward motion, i.e. of washing,) and the will is taken for the duty of the action.” So in the Mahometan treatise of Prayer, published by De la Motraye, (vol. i. p. 300,) it is said, “In case water is not to be had, that defect may be supplied with earth, a stone, or any other product of the earth; and this is called Tesamus; and is performed by cleaning the insides of the hands upon the same, rubbing therewith the face once; and then again rubbing the hands upon the earth, stone, or whatever it is; stroking the right arm to the elbow and the left arm to the right.” Now, if such ideas prevailed among the Israelites, we see how the whole camp might obtain a sufficient degree of purity, yet waste no water. So might single travellers in the desert, as David, Elijah, &c. perform their ablutions, at the times when the law more particularly, or when custom more generally, directed them; although they were distant from pool, fountain, or spring. —But the principal object of reference here is one which, being singular, has always been, in consequence, perplexing: We find Naaman (2 Kings v. 17.) requesting of the prophet Elishah, “two mules’ bursen of earth,” evidently for some religious purpose, but what that purpose could be, has embarrassed commentators. The opinion has prevailed, that he meant to form this earth into an altar; or to spread it for a floor, to pray upon, as if he were thereby constantly resident in that holy country whence he had brought it. But it is not impossible, that there is here a reference to the special custom of using earth instead of water for purifications.

There is a description of Elishah the prophet, by a part of his office when servant to Elijah, which appears rather strange to us. “Is there not here a prophet of the Lord?” says king Jehoshaphat; and he is answered, “Here is Elishah ben Shaphat, says (p. 4.) Pits, the prophet on the hands of Elijah,” (2 Kings iii. 11.) i.e. who was his servant and constant attendant. So Pits tells us: (p. 24.) “The table being removed, before they rise, [from the ground whereon they sit.] a slave, or servant, who stands attending on them with a cup of water to give them drink, steps into the middle, with a basin, or copper pot of water something like a coffee-pot, and a little soap, and lets the water run upon their hands one after another, in order as they sit.” Such service, it appears, Elishah performed for Elijah: what shall we say then to the remarkable action of our Lord, who “poured water into a basin, and washed his disciples’ feet,” after supper? Was he indeed among them as one who abdeth? On the contrary, so far from being thus, he “Abdeth, i.e. consists in washing the hands, feet, face, and a part of the head; the law mentions them by the term—the three parts consecrated to abdeth.” ...—“The Mussulman is generally seated on the edge of a vessel, with a piece of loose muslin lined with tan placed before him upon a round piece of red cloth, to prevent the carpet or mat from being wet: a servant, kneeling on the ground, pours out water for his master; another holds a cloth destined for these purifications. The person who purifies himself begins by baring his arms as far as the elbow. As he washes his hands, mouth, nostrils, face, arms, &c. he repeats the proper prayers... It is probable that Mohammed followed on this subject the book of Levitica.” It is well known that there was in England an officer, who, at the coronation, and formerly at all public festivals, held a basin of water for the king to wash his hands in, after dinner: but it is not equally well known, that cardinal Wolsey, one time, when the duke of Buckingham held the basin for Henry VIII. after the king had washed, put his own hand into the basin; the duke, resenting this intrusion, let some of the water fall on the habit of the cardinal, who never forgave the

When the Jews received a proselyte to their religion, they both circumcised and baptized him; affirming that this baptism was a kind of regeneration, the removal of sin. Being a slave, he became free; and his natural relations before this ceremony were, after it, no longer accounted such. See on Matt. iii. 6. Kühnel and Lightfoot Hor. Heb. also Jahn's Bib. Archæol. § 255, and his large German work, vol. iii. p. 218. Rüxtorf, Lex. Chald. Rab. Talm. col. 408.—Jesus is supposed to refer to this species of baptism in his discourse with Nicodemus, John iii. 1—12.

When John Baptist began to preach repentance, he practised a baptism in the waters of Jordan. He did not attribute to this service the virtue of forgiving sins, but used it as a preparation for the baptism of Jesus Christ, and for remission (foraking) of sins, Matt. iii. 2; Mark i. 4. He not only exacted sorrow for sin, but a change of life, manifested by such practices as were worthy of repentance. The baptism of John was more perfect than that of the Jews, but less perfect than that of Christ. "It was," says Chrysostom, "as it were, a bridge, which, from the baptism of the Jews, was a way to that man of our Saviour; it was superior to the first, but inferior to the second." That of John promised what that of Jesus performed. Notwithstanding that John did not enjoin his disciples to continue his baptism after his death—it being superseded by the manifestation of the Messiah, and the gift of the Holy Ghost—many of his followers administered it, several years after the death of Christ, and some did not even know that there was any other baptism. Among this number was Apollos, a learned and zealous man of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus twenty years after the resurrection of our Saviour, Acts xvii. 25. And Paul, coming afterwards to the same city, found many Ephesians, who had received no other baptism than that of John, and knew not that there were any influences of the Holy Ghost communicated by baptism into Christ, Acts xix. 1. Our Saviour, when sending his apostles to preach the gospel, said, "Go, teach all nations; baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Matt. xxviii. 19. Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark xvi. 16; John xiii. 18. Baptism, therefore, is the first mark by which the disciple of Christ are distinguished.

Baptism is taken in Scripture for sufferings: "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of, and be baptized with the baptism which I am baptized with?" Mark x. 38. And, Luke xii. 50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?" We find traces of similar phraseology in the Old Testament (Ps. lxix. 2, 3) where waters often denote tribulations; and where, to be swallowed up by the waters, to pass through great waters, &c. signifies, to be overwhelmed by misfortunes.

II. BAPTISM BY FIRE. The words of John, Matt. iii. 11, have given occasion to inquire what is meant by baptism by fire. Some of the fathers believed, that the faithful, before they entered Paradise, would pass through a certain fire, to purify them from remaining pollutions. Others explain the term fire of an abundance of graces; others by the descent of the Holy Ghost on the apostles, in the form of fiery tongues. Others have said, that the word fire is an addition, and that we should read, "I baptize you with water, but he that cometh after me, will baptize you with the Holy Ghost." It is certain the word fire is not in several MSS. of Matthew, but we read it in Luke iii. 17. In the oriental versions of the Hebrew canons, the passage literally, and mantained, that material fire was necessary in the administration of baptism; but we are not told either how or to what part of the body they applied it; or whether they obliged the baptized to pass over or through the flames. Valentinus re-baptized those who had received baptism out of his sect, and drew them through the fire. Heracleon, cited by Clement, Alexandrinus, says, that some applied a red-hot iron to the ears of the baptized, as if to impress some mark on them. It deserves notice, that in both the evangelists this prediction is expressed in the same manner; that is to say, there is no article, nor any sign of disjunction, between the terms Holy Ghost and fire. According, therefore, to the power of the Greek language, these two terms form but one act, or thing; or, in other words, this one baptism was to be conferred at the same time, not separately, though under two species; the first that of the Holy Ghost, the other the fire. Acts ii. "there was the sound as of a rushing mighty wind," this was the first; and "the cloven tongues like as of fire, which sat on each of them," this was the second;—strictly the baptism by fire. Immediately after the appearance of the fire and tongues, it is said, "they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues:"—The same we read, also, in the history of Cornelius, (Acts x. 45.) "On the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost; for they heard them speak with tongues." And Peter, in narrating the history, (Acts xi. 15,) says, "the Holy Ghost fell on them as [he fell] on us at the beginning," and they were "baptized with the Holy Ghost." Yet, as we read nothing of such in history, it should seem that the symbolic fire only appeared; and that these Gentiles were baptized by fire falling from heaven; and afterwards by water, as directed by Peter.

[After all that is said above, the question, respecting the baptism by fire in Matt. iii. 11, and Luke iii. 16, must still be determined by a simple reference to the succeeding verse in each case. The whole passage is as follows: (and John said,) "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but there cometh one mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear; he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire: Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire." Here the words are evidently those who receive Christ as the Messiah, and embrace his doctrines; these he will baptize with the Holy Ghost, i.e. he will impart to them spiritual gifts, the teachings and consolations of the Holy Spirit; while the chaff are as evidently those who reject Christ and his doctrines, and live in sin; these he will baptize with fire "unquenchable;" they shall go "away to everlasting punishment." Compare also Matt. iii. 10.]

III. BAPTISM IN THE NAME OF JESUS CHRIST. Many difficulties have been raised on the words of Luke: (Acts x. 48.) "Be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins." And again, (chap. viii. 13.) "They were baptized in the NAME OF THE LORD JESUS." It has been questioned, whether baptism was ever administered in the name of Jesus only, without express mention of the Father and the Holy Ghost. Such a view could be valid or lawful. Many fathers, and some councils, believed that the apostles, occasionally, had baptized in the name of Jesus only; and Ambrose asserts that though one person only of the Trinity were expressed, the baptism is perfect. "For," adds he, "whosoever names one person of the Trinity, means the whole." But, as this opinion is founded only on a dubious fact, and an obscure text, it is not impossible that these fathers and councils might be mistaken; first, as to the fact, and explanation of the text; and secondly, in the consequences they drew from it. It may be shown, (1) that the text in the Acts is not clear for this opinion; (2) that it is very dubious whether the apostles ever baptized in the name of Jesus only. By baptizing in the name of Jesus, may be signified, (1), either to baptize by invocation of the name of Jesus alone, without mentioning the Father and the Spirit; or (2), to baptize in his name, by his authority, with his baptism, and in his name, (making express mention of the three persons of the Trinity), as he has clearly and plainly commanded in Matthew. Since, therefore, we have a positive and explicit text for this service,—what should induce us to leave it, and to follow another capable of different senses? Who will believe that the apostles, forsaking the form of baptism prescribed to them by Jesus Christ, had instituted another form, quite new, and without necessity? In fact, the opinion that baptism ought to be administered in the name of the whole Trinity, and with express invocation of three persons, has a clear text of Scripture in its favor, where the rite is instituted, as it were, and expressly treated of; and this against an incidental mention of it in a historical relation, among other things, and capable of several senses. There is a very sudden turn of metaphor used by the apostle Paul, in Rom. vi. 3—5. "Know ye not that so many of as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death. . . . that we should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together with him in likeness of his death, we shall be also planted in likeness of his resurrection." Now, that the metaphorical, or the metonymical sense, should consist their similarity, so as to justify the resonance here implied? In 1 Pet. iii. 21, we find the apostle speaking of baptism, figuratively, as "saving us," and alluding to Noah, who long lay buried in the ark, as corn long lies buried in the earth. Now, as after having died to his former course of life in being baptized, a convert was considered as rising to a renewed life, so after having been separated from his former connections, his seed-bed as it were, after having died in being planted, he was considered as rising to renewed life also. The ideas, therefore, conveyed by the apostle in these verses are precisely the same; though the metaphors are different. Moreover, if it were anciently common to speak of a person, after baptism, as rising to renewed life, and to consider corn also as sprouting to a renewed life, then we see how easily Hymenes and Philemon (1 Tim. i. 18) "concerning the truth might err, saying, that the resurrection was past already," that is, in baptism, and in allusion alike to new life in Christendom, to Christianity, in which error they did little more than annex their old heathen notions to the Christian institution. The transition was extremely easy; but, unless checked in time, the error might have become very dangerous. We think this more likely to have been the fact respecting these erroneous teachers, than an allusion only to death, and to a return to virtue, as life; which Warburton proposes, (Div. Leg. vol. i. p. 433) and the notion seems to have been adopted by Menander, who taught (Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 21) that his disciples obtained resurrection by his baptism, and not as men of a better thought process. The figurative language suffers under the misconstructions of gross conception! IV. BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD. The apostle Paul, (1 Cor. xv. 28) proving the resurrection of the dead, says, "If the dead rise not at all, what shall they do who are baptized for the dead?" The question is, What is meant by "baptism for the dead?" No one pretends, that the apostle approves the practice, or authorizes the opinion. It is sufficient, that there were people who thus thought and acted at the time. Observe, also, he does not say, the Corinthians caused themselves to be baptized for the dead; but,—"what shall they do, who are baptized for the dead?" How will you support this practice, upon what will you justify it, if the dead rise not again, and if souls departed rise not after death? We might easily show, that some at this time, who called themselves Christians, were baptized for the dead,—for the advantage of the dead. When this epistle to the Corinthians was written, twenty-three years after the resurrection of our Saviour, several heretics (as the Simonians, Gnostics, and Nicolaitans) denied the real resurrection of the dead, and acknowledged only a metaphorical resurrection received in baptism. The Marcionites, who appeared some time afterwards, embraced the same principles; they denied the resurrection of the dead, and, which is more particular, they received baptism for the dead. This we learn from Tertullian, who tells the Marcionites, that they ought not to use Paul's authority, in favor of their practice of receiving "baptism for the dead:" and that if the apostle notices this custom, it is only to prove the resurrection of the dead against themselves. In another place, he confesses that in Paul's time, some were baptized a second time for the dead,—on behalf of the dead; hoping it would be of service to others, as to their resurrection. (contra Marcion. v. 10; De Resurrect. Carn. c. 48.) Chrysostom says, that among the Marcionites, when any of their catechumens die, they lay a living person under the bed of the deceased; then, advancing toward the dead body, they ask whether he be willing to receive baptism. The person under the bed answers for him, that he desires earnestly to be baptized; and, accordingly, he is so, instead of the dead person; thus making a mockery of this sacred administration. (In 1 Cor. Homil. 40.) Epiphanius also asserts that the Marcionites received baptism not only once, but frequently, as often as they thought proper; and they procured themselves to be baptized in the name of those among them who died without baptism, as substituted representatives of such persons; and that Paul had these heretics in view. (Hier. 42. et 28.) Bocohart has collected no less than fifteen senses in which this passage has been taken by the learned, such is its obscurity; but it is only obscure to us, by reason of our ignorance of ancient customs. It was clear to the apostle, and clearly understood by whom he wrote. He refers to a rite well known, openly and avowedly practised; not by a few, nor by A pesty sect of Christians, but by a whole people in short, it was familiar to the Corinthians, and needed no further explanation. It is, therefore, plain, that the import of the Jewish practice in cases of pollution by a dead body, should have been so imperfectly applied in explanation of this subject; but we have taken the liberty to apply the idea to the illustration of the text. The first office performed to a dead body was washing; and this was common to the heathen, and to the Jews, as appears from the Talmud; and to the early Christians, Acts ix. 37. Accordingly, the person who laid out, and washed, a dead body, and consequently participated in the pollution occasioned by death, participated also in the customary interment of the dead. Death was, as it were, imputed to him; and he continued in a state of exclusion from society till the third day. On that day he washed himself thoroughly in water, and was baptized by the sprinkling of the ashes of the red heifer, which restored him to his place among the living, and was to him a release from his sepulchral state; in other words, a resurrection. This sprinkling is expressly enumerated among the Jewish baptisms by the apostle, Heb. ix. 10, 13. See also, in Gr. Eccles. xxxiv. 25. Suppose, then, a person to be polluted by a dead body on Friday afternoon, he would be symbolically dead the remainder of the day, the whole of Saturday, and until he was baptized by the ashes on the Sunday morning: such being the Hebrew manner of reckoning three days. It is evident, that he sympathized with the death of the party who occasioned his pollution, by symbolizing his interment, and with his washing; and if the Jews understood the symbol, and attached to the subsequent baptism the idea of an illustration of the national hope of a resurrection, (Acts xxiii. 6.) then the apostle's argument is extremely cogent on that people: "What shall they—the Jews—do, who are baptized for the dead; [literally, instead of the dead, as substitutes for the dead, , plural,] if there is not, if there cannot be, any such thing as a resurrection of the dead, why do they undergo a ceremony the very purport and intention of which is the prefiguration of a resurrection? Why are they baptized as substitutes for the dead? From this argument the Sadducees among the Jews must be excepted; and also the heathen. The apostle's words, therefore, are not general, but an argument a i hominem. The reader will also observe this form of the apostle before the term dead, , not any dead, nor the dead in general, but, those dead well known to the parties—as the custom was well known to the Corinthians. That the Jews really did attach the idea of regeneration to baptism in the case of converts, as observed by Cotel, in the early part of this article, is well known from Maimonides, and other rabbins: and the resemblance between regeneration, importing a renewal of life, and resurrection, importing also a renewal of life, is so close, that they might almost be considered as two words expressing the same thing; and, probably, they were so used among the Jews.

Turguinius corpus bona femina lavit et unxit;

This passage respecting baptism for the dead (1 Cor. xv. 28.) has been a stumbling-block to interpreters in every age. Neither of the explanations above given is satisfactory; and it may not, therefore, be uninteresting to the reader, to have the subject pursued to a greater extent. In doing this, the writer is happy in being able to avail himself of manuscript notes of lectures delivered on this epistle by the learned and pious father, that the judgments passed upon the testimony of the fathers in the following paragraphs, rest upon his authority.

The most ancient interpretation which we have of the passage, follows the simple and literal meaning of the words: - , to be baptized, for, instead of, the dead. In this it is assumed, that at the time when Paul wrote, many Christians had conceived superstitious notions in respect to the efficacy of the external rite of baptism; they supposed that those catechumens and others who died without baptism, were exposed to certain damnation; and therefore they had adopted a vicarious mode by which they might still receive the benefit of the rite, viz. the relatives or friends of such deceased persons were baptized in their stead. Paul (it is admitted) cannot of course assent to such a superstition; but he argues here only ad hominem, or ex consecratio; i.e. this very superstition shows, how deeply the belief in a resurrection is grounded in the very nature of man. Tertullian (as quoted above) remarks, that this superstition would be something entirely heathenish; and he compares it with the illustrations of the heathen for the dead on the first of February. This interpretation is also found in the commentary of Hilarius.—Epiphanius is of opinion, that among the sect of Cerinthus the usage was prevalent, that living persons were baptized in place of the dead; and he appeals to an ancient tradition, which related that Paul had condemned such a superstition. But the accounts which are given by Epiphanius are to be received with great caution and suspicion. Chrysostom also relates of the Marcionites the story which has been already quoted above. But in respect to this alleged custom of the Marcionites, it may be said, that it is not so old as the sect of Marcion. At least, the customs which were prevalent among the Marcionites of Chrysostom's day, and in Syria, cannot justly be charged upon Marcion himself and his immediate disciples. The whole rest of the passage as it concerns the apostolic age, is improbable. Indeed, the probability is, that the Marcionites would never have introduced such a custom, had it not been for their misapprehension of this passage of the apostle. But even if there was actually such a custom extant, we are by no means entitled to assume, that Paul would feel himself warranted to deduce from it an argument in favor of the resurrection. A practice so superstitious and unchristian Paul would never have alluded to, without condemning and contesting it. Besides, it is quite improbable, that at so early a period there was any such a class of persons as catechumens.

Another interpretation, adopted by many, takes the word baptize in its literal sense, but gives the sense of the sake of, and supposes the plural to be put by enallage for the singular . Then the sense is, "What do they, who are baptized for the dead?" i.e. for the sake of Christ, the crucified Saviour. The argument would here be good; but the use of would be unusual, since it must then mean in faith on a deceased Jesus. But the use of the plural for the singular is here inadmissible; both on account of the great harshness, and particularly because of the following plural pronoun αὐτῶν.

It has also been proposed to take "viv in the sense of "life," i.e. either upon the graves of Christian martyrs, or by the dead-beds of expiring Christians. But there is no evidence of the existence of any such custom; nor would there be any force whatever in such an argument. It could, at most, be only as before, an argumentum ad hominem.

There remain, however, two modes of explanation here, both of which are natural, and give an easy and satisfactory sense. It is perhaps more a matter of taste than of argument, which of the two is to be preferred.

The one method sets out from the literal and perhaps original meaning of the word ἁμαρτία to immerge, immerge, i.e. so as to be entirely sunk orimmered in any thing. Thus in Isa. xxii. 4, instead of "fearfulness afflicted me," the Septuagint reads, "iniquity baptized me," i.e. overwhelmed me, so that I was wholly immersed in it. Hence, also, metaphorically, ἁμαρτία to be immerged in calamities; as in Matt. xxv. 22, and Mark x. 33. "Can ye be baptized with me?" and also Luke x. 50. "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?" So also Josephus, (B. J. iv. 3. 3.) in speaking of bands of robbers who had crept into Jerusalem, which was then defenceless, says, ἁμαρτία ἐμφάσεος ἐκ τοῦ πολέμου μεταφέρεσθαι, "afterwards they baptized the city," i.e. filled it with confusion and suffering, immerged it in calamities.

This meaning now furnishes a very appropriate sense in the passage in question. The argument of the apostle then is: "If the dead rise not at all, of what avail is it to expose ourselves to so many dangers and calamities in the hope of a resurrection and future reward? in the hope that we shall rise again and enter into rest? since, if the supposition be true, we are of verum, dead, and are never to rise." Compare verses 30 and 31, where ἀριστερά to be in jeopardy, and ἁμαρτώ to die, are substituted for ἁμαρτία to baptize; compare also the use of the word dead in Luke xx. 28.

The objections which may be suggested to this interpretation, are the following: (1.) The word baptize is thus taken here in a figurative signification, while there is in fact nothing which requires it to be so taken. (2.) It is remarkable, that Paul should here use baptize twice in this sense, instead of using some other word,—especially as he repeats no other word in the same manner. (3.) The baptizing in v. 29 seems to be something common to all Christians; whereas the dangers spoken of in v. 30, etc. are those of Paul himself, or, at most, those of the preachers of Christianity.

The other remaining method retains the literal and usual sense of baptize, as designating the ordinary religious rite; and grounds itself particularly on the circumstance, that in the previous verses, as well as elsewhere, Paul makes the relation between the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of believers an object of great prominence. They are buried with him in baptism unto death; wherein also they are risen with him unto newness of life," etc. Rom. vi. 4: Col. ii. 12. Baptism, therefore, is to them not only the symbol of a present resurrection to a new life, but also the symbol of a participation in the future resurrection. Keeping this idea in view, the question very naturally and cogently arises: "If the dead rise not, what do they who are baptized for the dead?" i.e. who are baptized into a belief in Christ and a resurrection, and into the hope of participating in that resurrection, while yet they are never to rise again, but for ever to remain dead? what are they baptized into a belief, in which, after all, they do not believe? What means such baptism as this? what is the benefit of it either here or hereafter?

The objections to be suggested here are: (1.) That the argument of the apostle is thus reduced ad hominem, though more extensive and stronger than in the cases above considered. (2.) That the transition from verse 29 to verse 30 is thus rendered quite abrupt and unusual.

It should be remarked, that verse 29 is to be taken in immediate connection with verse 19; the intervening nine verses being a digression or parenthesis. Taking into view this connection of verse 29 with both the verses 19 and 30, the writer has ever been inclined to prefer the former of these two interpretations; since in this way verse 29 forms with those two verses a continuous whole, in which the idea of calamity and danger is dwelt upon throughout; while in the other mode, a new and less forcible appeal is interposed between the two parts of the same argument expressed in verses 19 and 30. The excellent Nestle inclines to the latter method; which is also that of Wetstein.*

BARABBAS, a remarkable thief, guilty also of sedition and murder; yet preferred before Jesus Christ, by the Jews, John xviii. 40. Origen says, that in many copies, Barabbas was called Jesus likewise. The Armenian has the same reading: "Whom will ye that I deliver unto you? Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus the Christ." The latter has an additional spirit to the history; and well deserves notice.

BARACHIAS, father of Zechariah, mentioned Matt. xxvii. 35. (There are two persons to whom this name is referred with greater or less probability by commentators; since there are two Zecharias mentioned in history as having been slain by the people in the midst of the temple. The first is Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, mentioned in 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, seq. as having been slain in the court of the temple by the command of king Joash. If this was the Zechariah intended by Jesus, then his father must have borne two names; a thing not uncommon among the Jews. The other is Zechariah the son of Baruch, mentioned by Josephus (B. J. iv. 6. 4) as having been slain by the zealots in the midst of the temple, just before the taking of Jerusalem. In 1 Baruch, and the circumstances, correspond here entirely; but the difficulty lies in the fact, that this Zechariah was not thus murdered until long after the death of Christ, who must then have spoken prophetically, whereas he evidently appears to speak only of the past. To avoid this difficulty, which is the only one, some, Hug. (Einf. ii. p. 10.) have supposed that Jesus did in fact speak prophetically and prospectively; but that when Matthew penned his Gospel, after the event thus predicted had actually taken place, he chose to make the Saviour employ an aorist instead of a futurum in the idea in view; in order to call the attention of his readers to it as an historical fact, rather than as a prophetic allusion.

BARAK, the son of Abinoam, who was chosen by God to deliver the Hebrews from that bondage under which they were held by Jabin, king of the Canaanites, Judg. iv. 4. He refused to obey the Lord's orders, signified to him by Deborah, the prophetess, unless she consented to go with him. Deborah, therefore, accompanied him towards Ke-desh of Naphtali; and having assembled 10,000 men, they advanced to mount Tabor. Sisera, being informed of this movement, marched with 900 chariots of war, and encamped near the river Kishon; but Barak, rapidly descending from mount Tabor, and the Lord having spread terror through Sisera's army, a complete victory was easily obtained. Sisera was killed by Jael, and Barak and Deborah composed a hymn of thanksgiving. See DEBORAH.

BARBARIAN, a word used by the Hebrews to denote a stranger, who knows neither the holy language nor the law. According to the Greeks, all other nations, however learned or polite they might be in themselves and in their manners, were barbarians. Hence Paul comprehends all mankind under the names of Greeks and barbarians, (Rom. i. 14.) and Luke calls the inhabitants of the island of Malta, barbarians, Acts xxviii. 2, 4. In 1 Cor. xiv. 11. the apostle says, that if he who speaks a foreign language in an assembly, be not understood by those to whom he discourses, with respect to them he is a barbarian; and, reciprocally, if he understand not those who speak to him, they are to him barbarians. Barbarian, therefore, is used in Scripture for every stranger, or foreigner, on who does not know the native language, and includes no implication whatever of savage nature or manners in those respecting whom it is used.

BAR-CHECHEBA, or CHOHERAS, or CHOCHEBUS, a famous impostor. It is said, he assumed the name of Bar-Checheba, that is, Son of the Cher, from the words of Balaam, which he applied to himself as the Messiah: "There shall come a star (coccûd) out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel." Bar-Checheba engaged the Jews to revolt, (A. D. 156,) under the reign of Antiochus, that he might assist, with his own army, the Romans in the siege of Jerusalem. The Roman soldiery were afterwards expelled, and the multitude of Jews put to death, to visit Jerusalem; and guards were placed at the gates, to prevent their entering. The rebellion of Bar-Checheba happened A. D. 154, in the 19th year of Adrian.

BAR-JESUS, a Jewish magician in the isle of Cyprus, Acts xiii. 6. Luke calls him Elymas, which in Arabic is, the sorcerer. He was with the prosconsul Sergius Paulus; and being told by the apostle Paul to depart from the city of Tarsus, Barnabas, desired to hear the word of God. Bar-Jesus endeavoring to hinder the prosconsul from embracing Christianity, Paul, filled with the Holy Ghost, said, "The enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the ways of the Lord? Belie, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun, for a season." which took place immediately. The prosconsul was converted, and the magic ceased.

BAR-JONA, a name by which our Saviour sometimes calls Peter; (Matt. xvi. 17.) i. q. son of Jonah.

BARIS, the name of a palace begun by John Hir-cassar at Constantinople; and which afterwards was used for the residence of the Aman-ean princes. Herod the Great made a citadel of it, which he called Antonia, in honor of his friend Mark Antony. See ANTONIA.

BARLEY. In Palestine, barley was sown in autumn, and reaped in spring, that is, at the passover. The rabbins sometimes called barley the food of beasts, because they fed their cattle with it, 1 Kings iv. 26. In Homer, we find barley always given to horses. Herodotus tells us, that the Egyptians ate neither wheat nor barley, using a particular sort of corn instead of them. Nevertheless, the Hebrews frequently used barley bread, which the Egyptian's friends brought him in his flight, wheat, barley, &c. and Solomon sent wheat, barley, wine, and oil, to the servants whom king Hiram had furnished him, for the works at Libanus, 2 Chron. ii. 15. See also John vi. 9; 2 Kings iv. 42.

Moses remarks, that when the hail fell in Egypt, the flax and the barley were bruised and destroyed, because the flax was full grown, and the barley forming its green ears; but the wheat and the rye were not damaged, because they were only in the blade, Gen. ix. 31. This was some days before the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt; or before the passover. In Egypt, barley harvest does not begin till toward the end of April, when the barley is still young, and before it is mixed with the wheat. BARNABAS, JOSEPH, or JOSKES, a disciple of Jesus, and a companion of the apostle Paul. He was a Levite, and a native of the isle of Cyprus, and is believed to have sold all his property, and laid the proceeds at the apostle's feet, Acts iv. 35. It is said that he was brought up with Paul at the feet of Gamaliel. When that apostle came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, Barnabas introduced him to the other apostles, Acts ix. 23, 27, about A. D. 57. Five years afterwards the church at Jerusalem sent Barnabas, 2 Samn. xvii. 38. Informed of the progress of the gospel at Antioch, sent Barnabas thither, who beheld with great joy the wonders of the grace of God, Acts xi. 22, 23. He exhorted the faithful to perseverance, and some time afterwards went to Tarsus, to seek Paul, and bring him to Antioch, where they dwelt together two years, and converted great numbers. They left Antioch, A. D. 44, to convey alms from this church to that at Jerusalem, and at their return they brought John Mark, Barnabas's nephew, or nephew. While they were at Antioch, the Holy Ghost directed that they should be separated for those labors to which he had appointed them: i.e. the planting of new churches among the Gentiles. After three years they returned to Antioch. In their second journey into Asia Minor, Barnabas, at Lystra, was taken for Jupiter, but was afterwards persecuted by the same people. In A. D. 51, he and Paul were appointed delegates from the Syrian church to Jerusalem, and then to carry the apostolic message to the Gentile churches. At Antioch he was led into dissimulation by Peter, and was, in consequence, reproved by Paul. In their return to Asia Minor, Paul and Barnabas having a dispute relative to Mark, Barnabas's nephew, they separated, Paul going to Asia, and Barnabas, with Mark, to Cyprus, Acts xiii—xxvii; Gal. ii. 13. A spurious gospel and epistle are ascribed to Barnabas. See Fabr. Cod. Apoc. N. T.

BARRENNESS, sterility, want of issue or fruit, Gen. xi. 30; 2 Kings ii. 19, 21. Barrenness is accounted a great misfortune among the eastern people; and was especially so among the Jews. Professors of Christianity are, figuratively, said to be barren, when they are destitute of the fruits of the spirit, or do not abound in good works, Luke xiii. 6—9; 2 Pet. i. 8.

In the description of Jericho, 2 Kings ii. 19. we read in the English version as follows: The men of Jericho said to Eliashib, "Behold, I pray thee, the situation of this city is pleasant, as my lord saith; but the water is naught, and the ground barren?—where the margin reads, "causing to miscarry." Our translation seem to have been mistaken, as a proper-ly
BARRENNESS

[ 149 ]

BARRENNESS

in the ground; and, therefore, placed the literal rendering in the margin. Again, (v. 21). "Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters: there shall not be from hence any more death, or barren land"—literally, abortive. The import of the root of the word here translated barren (נֶסֶךְ) is, to bare,
as of children: (Gen. xlii. 36.)—to lose, as by abortion; to miscarry: (Gen. xxx. 36.) "thy she-goats have not cast their young." It is here in Fiel, and has a causative sense, to cause abortion. What is here ascribed to the soil; though in verse 21 it is implied
that the water was the cause; since that being healed, the cause of abortion ceased. It cannot well refer here to any effect upon natural productions; because Job, in verse 21, ascribes it to the effect of the water upon the adjacent tract of country.

Nor is this an isolated case; nor is it peculiar to Jericho alone. Even at the present day there are cities in the same predicament as that in which Jericho was; namely, the pastoral life of certain sorts, pines, and decayed, and dies; cities where that posterity which should replace the current mortality, is either not conceived, or if conceived, is not brought to the birth, or if brought to the birth, is fatal in deivery, both to the mother and her offspring. That this is the case appears from the following relations:

The inclemency of the climate of Porto Bello is sufficiently known all over Europe; not only strangers who have been affected by it, but even the auto-natives themselves suffer in various manners. It destroy the vigor of nature, and often untimely cuts the thread of life. It is a current opinion, that forerly, and even not above twenty years since, parlu-rumps were here so dangerous, that it was seldom any woman did not die in child-bed. As soon, therefore, as they had advanced three or four months in their pregnancy, they were sent to Panama, where they continued till the danger of delivery was past. A few, indeed, had the firmness to wait their destination in their own houses; but much the greater number thought it more advisable to undertake the journey, than to run so great a hazard of their lives. The excessive love which a lady had for her husband, bled with the dread that he would forget her during her absence, his employment not permitting him to accompany her to Panama, determined her to set the first example of acting contrary to their general custom. The reasons for her fear were sufficient to justify her resolution to run the risk of a probable danger, in order to avoid an evil which she knew to be certain, and must have embittered the whole remainder of her life. The event was happy; she was delivered, and recovered her former health; and the example of a lady of her rank, did not fail of im-spiring others with the like courage, though not founded on the same reasons; till, by degrees, the dread which former melancholy cases had impressed on the mind, and which gave occasion to this climate's being [reported] fatal to pregnant women, was entirely dispersed. Another opinion, equally strange, is, that the animals from other climates, on their being brought to Porto Bello, cease to procreate. The inhabitants bring instances of hens, brought from Panama or Cartagena, which, immediately on their arrival, grew barren, and laid no more eggs; and even at this time the hogs brought out from Panama, after they have been here a short time, lose their flesh in such a manner as not to be eatable, though they do not want for plenty of good pasturage. It is certain, that there are no horses or asses bred here;
which tends to confirm the opinion, that this climate checks the generation of creatures produced in a more benign or less noxious air. However, not to rely on the common opinion, we inquired of some intelligent
persons, who differed but very little from the vulgar;
and even consulted the opinion of many facts and experiments, performed by themselves." Don Ulloa, Voy.
S. Amer. vol. i. p. 93.

This seems to be a clear instance of a circumstance
very similar to the genuine import of the Hebrew word, "causing to miscarry," which would seem to be the same as "to Blaspheming the Lord," which checks the generation of creatures produced in a more benign or less noxious air. However, not to rely on the common opinion, we inquired of some intelligent
persons, who differed but very little from the vulgar;
and even consulted the opinion of many facts and experiments, performed by themselves." Don Ulloa, Voy.
S. Amer. vol. i. p. 93.

A second extract is from Mr. Bruce's Travels, (vol. iv. p. 403, 471, 472.)—"No horse, mule, ass, or any beast of burden, will breed, or even live, at Sen-nar, or many miles about. Poultry does not live there; neither dog nor cat, sheep nor bullock, can long remain alive. They must die in about six months' time, or a year, or a year and a half, to the lands, though all possible care be taken of them, they die in every place where the fat earth is about the town, during the first season of the rains. Two greyhounds which I brought from A-tara, and the mules which I brought from Abyssinia, lived only a few weeks after I arrived. They seemed to have an inward complaint, for nothing appeared outwardly; the dogs had abundance of water, but I skilled one of them, and the other grew white;
Several kings have tried to keep lions; but no care
could prolong their lives beyond the first rains.
Shekh Adelan had two, which were in great health, being kept with his horses at grass in the sands, but three miles from Sen-nar. Neither rose, nor any species of jessamine, grows here; no tree, but the lemon, flowers near the city, that I ever saw: the rose has been often tried, but in vain. The soil of Sen-nar, as I have already said, is very unfavorable both to man and beast, and particularly adverse to their propagation. This seems to me to be owing to some noxious quality of the fat earth with which it is every way surrounded, and nothing may be dependent upon more surely than the fact already mentioned, that no more, or other beast of burden, ever foaled in the town, or in any village within several miles round it. This remarkable quality ceases upon removing from the fertile country to the sands. Aira, between three and four miles off Sen-nar, with no water near it but the Niter, surrounded with white barren sand, agrees perfectly with all animals, and here are the quarters where I saw Shekh Adelan the minister's horse, [as I suppose for their numbers] by far the finest in the world; where in safety he watched the motions of his sovereign, who, shut up in his capital of Sen-nar, could not there maintain one horse to oppose him. But, however unfavorable this soil may be for the propagation of animals, it contributes very abundauntly both to the nourishment of man and beast. It is positively said to render three hundred for one, [see Gen. xxvi. 12.] which, however confidently advanced, is, I think, both from reason and appearance, a great exaggeration. It is all sown with dora or millet, the principal food of the natives. It produces also wheat and rice, but these, at Sennar, are sold by the pound, even in years of plenty. The use of Sennar is almost entirely extracted from the earth about it, especially at Halfa, so strongly is the soil impregnated with this useful fossil.

This instance presents a city, a royal city, in some respects very fertile, which, nevertheless, in other respects, reminds us of Jericho: like that city, it was pleasant, but adverse to propagation, and this Mr. Bruce attributes to the nature of the earth, or soil around it. We find also this effect ceasing at a small distance, which deserves notice; because it is very possible, that this property of the soil was the means, in the hand of Providence, to accomplish the prediction of Joshua, respecting the rebuilding of Jericho, Josh. vi. 20. See Abram.

I. BARBASABAS, Joseph, surnamed The Just, was an early disciple of Jesus Christ, and, probably, among the seventy. Acts i. 21, 22, &c. After the ascension of our Saviour, Peter proposed to fill up the place of Judas, the traitor, by one of those disciples who had been constant eye-witnesses of our Saviour's actions. Two persons were selected, Barbasas and Matthias; the lot determined for Matthias.

II. BARBARASAS, (Judas,) one of the principal disciples, (Acts xv. 22, et seq.) who, with others, was sent from Jerusalem to Antioch, carrying a letter with the council's decree.

BARTHOLOMEW, one of the twelve apostles, was of Galilee; (Acts i. 13) but we know little of him. It is generally believed that he preached the gospel in the Indies; (Euseb. lib. v. cap. 10,) and that he carried thither the gospel of Matthew, in Hebrew, where Panentus found a copy of it a hundred years after. We are told, likewise, that he preached in Arabia Felix, and Persia, which he might do, in passing through those countries to India. Many are of opinion, that Nathanael and Bartholomew are the same person; and they support this opinion by these reasons:—(1.) No notice is taken of Bartholomew's calling, unless his and Nathanael's be the same. (2.) The evangelists who speak of Bartholomew mention neither Nathanael; nor John, who speaks of Nathanael, says nothing of Bartholomew. (3) Bartholomew is not a proper name; it signifies son of Tolmai, i.e. Ptolemy, besides which he might be named Nathanael, i.e. Nathaniel, son of Ptolemy. (4.) John seems to rank Nathanael among the apostles, when he says, that Peter, Thomas, the two sons of Zebedee, Nathanael, and two other disciples, were gone a fishing; Jesus showed himself to them, John xxi. 2.

The Syrian writers, who are of this opinion, call him "Nathanael-bar-Tholemy," and "Nathanael-chn-Tholemy." They say he accompanied his brother-apostle, Thomas, into the East; that they preached at Nisibis, Mosul, (or Nineveh,) Hazath, and in Persia; that Thomas went on to India; but we do not perceive that they generally affirm the same of Bartholomew. Yet Amrus, a Syriac author, quoted by As-samanni, writes, that "Nathanael-chn-Tholemy," the disciple of Thomas, (rather fellow-disciple with Thomas,) and Lebbeus, of the twelve, with Addaeus, (or Thadddeus,) Marcus, and Agheus, who had been of the seventy, taught Nisibis, al-Gzeirat, (i.e. Mesopotamia,) Mosifi, Babylonia, and Chalden; also Arabia, the East country, Nebatioth, Husam, and Gilead. Also, according to the greater Armenia, he converted the inhabitants to Christiani, and there built a church. Lastly, he removed to India, as far as China." This last particular may be true of Thomas; but is very questionable as to his associate Bartholomew. All other writers place the scene of this apostle's labors in the regions around Persia and Armenia. The Syrian canonists place the fifth seat of ecclesiastical honor at Babylonia, in consideration of "Thomas, the apostle of the Hindoos and Chinese;" and of Bartholomew, who is also the Nathanael of the Syrians." So that it may be taken, generally, that Bartholomew was the apostle of Mesopotamia and Persia.

A spurious Gospel of Bartholomew is mentioned by pope Gelasius. Bernard, and Abbot Rupert, were of opinion, that he was the bridegroom at the marriage of Cana. Fabric. Cod. Apoc. N. T. i. p. 341, seq.

BAR-TIMEUS, a blind man of Jericho, who sat by the side of the public road, begging; when our Saviour passed that way to Jerusalem. Mark (x. 46—52) says, that "Jesus coming out of Jericho, with his disciples, and a great crowd, Bar-Timeus when he heard it, began to cry out, Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me," and Jesus restored him to sight. But Matthew, (xx. 30,) relating the same story, says, that two blind men, sitting by the way-side, understanding that Jesus was passing, began to cry out, &c. and both received sight. Mark notes Bar-Timaeus only, because he was more known, and not improbably (as his name is preserved) was born in a superior rank of life, therefore was no common beggar; if, besides, his blindness had been the cause of reducing him to poverty, no doubt his neighbors would mention his name, and take great interest in his cure. Probably, Timeus, his father, was of note in that place; as such was generally the case, when the father's name was taken by the son; and, perhaps, some of the neighbors who had known Bar-Timeus in better circumstances, who had been entitled, but could not relieve him, were the persons to encourage the blind man; "Be of good comfort! Rise; he calleth thee." This does not contradict the supposition, that on this occasion he, principally, expressed his warmth and zeal; that he spoke of Jesus Christ, as the distinguishing peculiarity of his sect, in purity, faith, and obedience. However, this too in Matthew may be nothing more than a literal adhesion to the Syriac dual form of expression; there being in this evangelist other instances of the same idiom; as the two thieves (xxvii. 44,) who reviled Jesus; whereas Luke mentions only one; and says, the other rebuked his companion. The curse of another blind man, mentioned Luke xviii. 35, 43, is different from this; that happened, when Jesus was entering into Jericho; this, the next day, as he was coming out. (It should, however, be remarked, that the miracle recorded by Luke is apparently the same as that mentioned by Matthew and Mark, and is so regarded by commentators in general. The apparent discrepancy of Luke's statement vanishes on the supposition of Newcome and others, that Jesus remained perhaps several days at Jericho, and in that time made one or more excursions from the city and returned to it again. BARUCH, son of Neriah, and grandson of Manasseh, was of the tribe of Judah, and the faithful disciple and scribe of Jeremiah the prophet, Jer. xxxii. 12—16; xlii. 3, 6; li. 61. There is an apocryphal book ascribed to him.

Jerusalem by Absalom, 2 Sam. xvi. 27, 28. When David returned to Jerusalem, Barzillai attended him to the Jordan. 11. LARZILLAII, a native of Meholath, father of Adriel, who married Michal, formerly wife of David, 2 Sam. xxii. 8.

BASCA, or BASCALA, a town near Bethsanean, where Jonathan Maccabæus was killed, 1 Macc. xiii. 23; Jos. xiii. 1.

BASHAN signifies a sandy, soft soil, from the Arabic; and this agrees with the character of the country, as fit for pasturing cattle; and is applicable to an extensive province. The land of Bashan, otherwise the Batanea, is east of the Jordan, north of the tribes of Gad and Reuben, and in the half-tribe of Manasseh. It is bounded east by the mountains of Gilead, the land of Ammon, and East Edom; north by mount Hermon; south by the brook Jabbock; west by the Jordan. Og, king of the Amorites, possessed Bashan when Moses conquered it. Bashan was esteemed one of the most fruitful countries in the world; its rich pastures, oak, and fine cattle, are exceedingly commended; Num. xxi. 33; xxiii. 33; Isa. ii. 13; Deut. xxxii. 13; Psal. xxi. 12.

The following description of this region is by Mr. Buckingham: 'We had now quitted the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, and entered into that of Og, the king of Bashan, both of them well known to all the readers of the early Scriptures. We had quitted, too, the districts appropriated to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and entered that which was allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, eastward, leaving the land of the children of Ammon on our right, or to the east of the Jabbock, which divided Ammon, or Philadelphia, from Gerasa. The mountains here are called the land of Gilead in the Scriptures; and in Josephus, and according to the Roman division, this was the country of the Decapolis so often spoken of in the New Testament, or the province of Gaulonitis, from the city of Gaulon, its early capital. We continued our way over this elevated tract, continuing to behold, with surprise and admiration, a beautiful country on all sides of us: its plains covered with a fertile soil, its hills crowned with cypress and olive; and its valleys presenting the most magnificent landscapes that could be imagined. Amongst the trees, the oak was frequent seen; and we know that this territory presented them of old. In enumerating the sources from which the supplies of Tyre were drawn in the time of her great wealth and naval splendor, the prophet says, 'Of the oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars,' Ez. xxxvi. 6. Some learned commentators, indeed, believing that no oaks grew in these supposed desert regions, have translated the word by adlers, to prevent the appearance of inaccuracy in the inspired writer. The expression of 'the fat bullocks of Bashan,' which occurs more than once in the Scriptures, seemed to us equally inconsistent, as applied to the beasts of a country generally thought to be a desert, in common with the whole tract which is laid down in the modern maps as such, between the Jordan and the Euphrates; but we could now fully comprehend, not only that the bulls of this luxuriant country might be provably fat, but that its possessors, too, might be a race renowned for strength and comeliness of person. . . . The general face of this region improved as we advanced further in it; and every new direction of our path opened upon views which succeeded and charmed us by their grandeur and beauty. Lobry mountains gave an outline of the most magnificent character; flowing beds of secondary hills softened the romantic wildness of the picture; gentle slopes, clothed with wood, gave a rich variety of tints, hardly to be imitated by the pencil; deep valleys, filled with murmuring streams, and verdant meadows, offered all the luxuriance of cultivation, and herds and flocks gave life and animation to scenes as grand, as beautiful, and as highly picturesque, as the genius or taste of a Claude could either invent or desire.'

[Similar to this is also the account given by Burckhardt of the Belka, which lies south of the Jabbock, constituting the northern part of the ancient Gilead, and of course adjacent to Bashan. 'We had now entered a climate quite different from that of the Ghor, [or valley of the Jordan.] During the whole of yesterday we had been much oppressed by heat, which was never lessened by the slightest breeze; in the Belkan mountains, on the contrary, we were refreshed by cool winds, and every where found a grateful shade of fine oak and wild pistachio trees, with a scenery more like that of Europe than any I had yet seen in Syria. The superiority of the pasturage of the Belka over that of all southern Syria, is the cause of its possession being much contested. The Bedouins have this saying: 'Thou canst not find a country like the Belka.' Travels in Syria, etc. p. 346, 308. R.]

BASON, or LAYER, of the tabernacle, and of the temple. See TEMPLE.

BASTARDS, children begotten out of the state of matrimony. The law forbade the admission of bastards into the congregation of Israel, to the tenth generation, Deut. xxiii. 2. The rabbins distinguish bastards into three kinds; (1) those born in marriage, of parents contracted in cases prohibited by the law; (2) those born from a criminal conjunction, punishable by the judges, as are the children of adulterers; (3) those born in incest, and condemned by the law. They also distinguish between bastards certain and uncertain. The first are those whose birth is notoriously corrupted, and who without difficulty are excluded from the congregation of the Lord. Doubtful bastards are those whose birth is uncertain. They could not be excluded in strictness, yet the Scribes would not admit them, for fear that any certain bastards should slip in among them. But the Vulgate, the LXX, and the authors of the canon law, take the Hebrew manzer, (Deut. xxiii. 2) for the child of a prostitute; while some interpreters take it for a generic term, which signifies illegitimate children, whose birth is impure in any manner whatever. Others believe the Hebrew manzer rather signifies a stranger or forigner than a bastard. Jephthah, who was the son of a concubine, (Judg. xi. 1) became head and judge in Israel. Pharez and Zara, sons of Tamar, conceived from a kind of incest, are reckoned among the ancestors of David. Among the Hebrews the children followed the condition of the mother. How could a bastard son, born of a mother an Israelite, be excluded the congregation of Israel to the tenth generation, since the Egyptians and Idumæans might be admitted after the third generation? This consideration renders it probable that manzer means more than barely a bastard, perhaps a bastard born of a woman a stranger and an idolater. The LXX render the word in Zech. ix. 6, a stranger, or an alien; and in Deut. xxiii. 2, the son of a prostitute. This was the tenth son of two hundred, and its signification is by no means certain. The words, "They shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation," cannot mean that this sort of children might not be converted, or be admitted into Judaism, till after ten generations; but that they should not enjoy the employments, dignities, or privileges of true Hebrews, till the blemish of their birth was entirely obliterated and forgotten.

BAT, an unclean creature, having the body of a mouse, and wings not covered with feathers, but of a leathery membrane, expandable for the purpose of flying. These wings consist in a very curious formation, which cannot be contemplated without admiration, the bones of the extremities being continued into long and thin processes, connected by a most delicate membrane or skin, capable, from its thinness, of being CONTRACTED at pleasure into innumerable wrinkles, so as to lie in a small space when the animal is at rest, and to be stretched to a very wide extent for occasional flight. It produces its young alive, and suckles them like four-footed animals. The bat is extremely well described in Deut. xlv. 19. "Moreover, the bat, and every creeping thing that creepeth without, is unclean to you; they shall not be eaten." This character, which fixes to the bat the name used in both passages, is omitted in Leviticus; nevertheless, it is very descriptive; and places this creature at the head of a class, of which he is a very clear, and a very well known instance. There are bats in the East much larger than ours; and they are salted and eaten. The bat never becomes tame; it feeds on flies, insects, and fat things, such as candles, oil, and grease. It appears only by night, nor then, unless the weather be fine, and the season warm. Some of the bats of Africa and Ethiopia have long tails, like those of mice, which extend beyond their wings. Some have four ears, others only two; they build no nests, but bring forth their young in a hole or cleft, or cave, in tops or coverings of houses; some are black, some white, sallow and ash-colored. The old one suckles its young, as they are fastened to its teats; and when she is obliged to leave them, in order to go out and seek food, she takes them from her mouth, and puts them again under her, where they adhere by clinging. There are bats in China, some say, as large as pullets, and as delicate eating; those of Brazil, Madagascar, and the Maldives, called Vampire bats, are very large, and suck the blood of men and beasts, fastening upon some uncovered part, while, at the same time, they refresh the sufferer by the fanning of their wings, who is in very great danger, unless he awakes.

BATANIA was the same as the ancient kingdom of Bashan, which see, and was part of the territory given to Herod Antipas, at the death of Herod the Great.

BATH, or EPHRAH, a Hebrew measure, containing seven gallons, four pints, liquid measure; or three pecks, three pints, dry measure. Some have imagined that there was a sacred bath, different from the common, containing a bath and half of the other; which they endeavor to prove by what is said, 1 Kings xii. 36. of Solomon’s molten sea, that it contained 3000 baths; compared with 2 Chron. iv. 5, which says that it held 3000 baths; but this difference is easily reconciled. (See SEA.) The LXX render this word sometimes ϕασα; sometimes μετρατ.
which great quantities are found on the shores of the Persian gulf and in India, and which might not inadvisably be compared with maunus, as in Num. xi. 7. R.

BEAM, see EYE, p. 422.

BEAM, the cylindrical piece of wood belonging to a weaver's loom, on which the web is gradually rolled as it is woven, Judg. xvi. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 7. BEAR, (3m.) Bears were common in Palestine; David says, (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 36,) he had often fought with bears and lions. Elisha having prophetically cursed some lads of Bethel, for insulting him, two she bears issued from a neighboring forest, and wounded forty-two of them, 2 Kings ii. 23, 34. (See ELSHE.) The sacred writers, to express the sensations of a man transported by passion, say, "He is chafed in his mind, as a bear bereaved," 2 Sam. xvii. 8. There are white bears in the north; but they were, probably, unknown in Palestine.

The prophet Isaiah (xi. 7) describing the happiness of the Messiah's reign, says, the ox and the bear shall feed together. Daniel (vii. 5.) in his description of the four great monarchies, represents that of the Persians under the figure of a bear having three rows of teeth; by this, perhaps, principally intending Cyrus.

BEARD. The Hebrews wore their beards, but had, doubtless, in close contact with other Asiatic nations, several fashions in this, as in all other parts of dress. Moses forbids them (Lev. xix. 27.) "to cut off entirely the angle, or extremity, of their beard," that is, to avoid the manner of the Egyptians, who left only a little tuft of beard at the extremity of their chins. The Jews, in some places, at this day suffer a little fillet of hair to grow from below the ears to the chin; where, as well as upon their lower lips, their beards are long. When they mourned they entirely shaven the hair of their heads and beards, and neglected to trim their beards, to regulate them into neat order, or to remove what grew on their upper lips and cheeks, Jer. xli. 5; xlviil. 37. In times of grief and affliction, they plucked away the hair of their heads and beards; a mode of expressing grief common to other nations under great calamities. See SHAVING.

The customs of nations, in respect to this part of the human countenance, have differed so widely, that they are not, among us, who treat the beard as an encumbrance, to conceive properly of the importance which is attached to it in the East. The terms in which most of the Levitical laws that notice the beard are expressed, are obscure to us, by the very reason that the feeling is so strong among these persons to whom they were addressed. Perhaps the following quotations may contribute to throw a light, at least upon some of them: "The first care of an Ottoman prince, when he comes to the throne, is, to let his beard grow, to which sultan Mustapha added, the dyeing of it black, in order that it might be more apparent on the day of his first appearance, when he was to gird on the sable; a ceremony by which he takes possession of the throne, and answering the coronation among us." (Baron du Tott, vol. i. p. 117.) So, De la Mottraye tells us, (p. 247.) "That the new sultan's beard had not been permitted to grow, but only since he had been proclaimed emperor; and was very short, it being customary to shave the Ottoman princes, as a mark of their submission to the reigning emperor." Nevertheless, in the year 1743, the Kiram Khan sent to demand payment of the tribute due for his possessions in Kermesir; but Mir Ma-

henna maltreated the officer who was sent on the errand, and caused his beard to be cut off." (Vol. iv. 5. 148. E. W.) This was one of the insults offered to the ambassadors of David, by Hanun, (2 Sam. x.) which insult, however, seems to have had a peculiarity in it,—of shaving one half of the beard; i.e. the beard on one side of the face. On this subject, we translate from Niebuhr (French edit,) the following remarks: "The oriental people divers manners of letting the beard grow; the Jews, in Turkey, Arabia, and Persia, preserve their beard from their youth; and it differs from that of the Christians and Mahometans, in that they do not shave it either at the ears or the temples. The Arabs keep their whiskers very short; some cut them off entirely; but they never shave off the beard. In the mountains of Yemen, where strangers are seldom seen, it is a disgrace to appear shaven; they supposed our European servant, who had only whiskers, had committed some crime, for which we had punished him, by cutting off his beard. On the contrary, the Turks have commonly long whiskers; the beard among them is a mark of honor. The slaves and certain domesticates of the great lords, are forced to cut it off, and dare not keep any part of it, but whiskers; the Persians have long whiskers, and clip their beard short with scissors, which has an unpleasant appearance to us. The Kurds shave the beard, but leave the whiskers, and a band of hair on the cheeks. The true Arabs have black beards, yet some old men dye their white beards red; but this is thought to be to hide their age; and is rather blamed than praised. The Persians blacken their beards much more; and, probably, do so to extreme old age, in order to pass for younger than they really are. The Turks do the same in some cases. [How differently Solomon thought! Prov. xx. 29. "The glory of young men is their strength, and the beauty of old men is the gray head."] When the younger Turks, after having been shaven, let their beards grow, they recite a fudhe, which is considered as a vow never to cut it off; (compare Numb. vi. 18; Acts xxii. 24.) and when any one cuts off his beard, he may be severely punished, (at Beers, at least, to 300 blows with a stick.) He would also be the laughing stock of those of his faith. A Mahometan, at Basra, having shaved his beard when drunk, fled secretly to India, not daring to return, for fear of public scorn, and judicial punishment."

"Although the Hebrews took great care of their beards, to fashion them when they were not in mourning, and on the contrary, did not care for them when they were in mourning; yet I do not observe that their regard for them amounted to any veneration for their beard. On the contrary, the Erdogan leave so much respect for their beards, that they look on them as sacred ornaments given by God to distinguish them from women. They never shave them; nothing can be more infamous than for a man to be shaved; they make the preservation of their beards a capital point of religion, because Mahomet never cut off his; it is like not a man's authority and liberty among them, as well as among the Turks; the Persians, who clip them, and shave above the jaw, are reputed heretics. The razor is never drawn over the grand signior's face; they who serve in the seraglio, have their beard shaved, and sign of servitude; they do not suffer it to grow till the sultan has set them at liberty, which is bestowed as a reward upon them, and is always accompanied with some employment. Unmarried young men may cut their beards; but when married, especially if parents, they forbear doing so, to show that they become wiser, have renounced the vanities of youth, and think now of superior things. When they comb their beards, they comb from handkerchief to their knees, and gather carefully the hairs that fall; and when they have got together a proper quantity, they fold them up in paper, and carry them to the place where they bury the dead. Among them it is more infamous for any one to have his beard cut off, than among us to be publicly whipped, or branded with a hot iron. Many men in that country would prefer death to such a punishment. The wives kiss their husbands' beards, and children their fathers', when they come to salute them; the men kiss one another's beards reciprocally, when they salute in the streets, or come from a journey. They say, that the beard is the perfection of the human face, which would be more disfigured by having this cut off, than by losing the nose. They admire and envy those who have fine beards: 'Pray do but see, they cry, that beard; the very sight of it would persuade any one that he, to whom it belongs, is an honest man.' If any one with a fine beard is guilty of an unbecoming action, 'What a disadvantage is this, they say, to such a beard! How much such a beard is to be pitied!' If they would correct any one's mistakes, they will tell him, 'For shame of your beard! Does not the confusion that follows such an action light on your beard?' If they entreat any one, or use oaths in affirming, or denying any thing, they say, 'I conjure you by your beard,—by the life of your beard,—to grant me this,—or, by your beard, this is, or is not so.' They say further, in the way of acknowledgment, 'May God preserve your blessed beard, and may God pour out his blessings on your beard! And in comparisons, 'This is more valuable than one's beard.'—Mémoires des Arabes, par M. D'Arvieux, chap. vii.

These accounts may contribute to illustrate several passages of Scripture. The dishonor done by David to his beard, of letting his spittle fall on it, (1 Sam. xxii. 13,) seems at once to have convinced Achish of his being dissembled: q. d. 'No man in good health, of body and mind, would thus defile what we consider sacred, unless he be deranged.' If the beard were so venerated, we perceive the import of Mephibosheth's neglect, in his not trimming it, (2 Sam. xix. 24.) If men kiss one another's beards, when they salute in the streets, or when one of them is lately come from his beard, (Ass. 2 Sam. xx. 9,) than has generally been noticed: 'And Joab held in his right hand the beard of Amasa, that he might give it a kiss.' No wonder that while this act of friendship, of gratulation after long absence, occupied Amasa's attention, he did not perceive the sword that was in Joab's left hand. The action of Joab was, indeed, a high compliment, but neither suspicious nor unusual; and to this compliment Amasa paid attention, and, no doubt, returning it with answerable politeness, he could little expect the fatal event that Joab's perfidy produced. (See further on this perfidy of Joab under ARMS AND ARMOUR.) Was perhaps the behavior of Judas to Jesus something like this behavior of Joab to Amasa?—a worthy example worthily imitated!

The cutting off the beard is mentioned (Isaiah xv. 2,) as a token of mourning; and as such it appears to be very expressive: (Jer. xii. 5.) 'Fourscore men came from Samaria, having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent.'—See, also, chap. xlviii. 37. Is not this custom somewhat illustrated by the idea which the Arabs attached to the shaven servant of Niebuhr, i.e. as a kind of punishment suffered for guilt, expressed or unexpressed?

BEAST, an animal destitute of reason; but the word is usually employed to signify a quadruped living on land. God created the beasts of the earth, and man, on the sixth day; and brought the fowls and the beasts to Adam, to receive their names; that he might begin his exercise of that dominion which was given to him over the inferior creatures. After the deluge the flesh of beasts was given to man as food, but the blood was forbidden to be eaten, or even to be shed with violence. By a law (Exod. xxii. 26, 29,) every beast which shall become abominably polluted, was to be put to death, Lev. xx. 15, 16. In the law of the sabbath, provision is made for the rest of domestic animals; and as a memorial of the saving of the first-born Hebrews, and the first-born among their cattle, in the last of the plagues of Egypt, the first-born of each were to be consecrated to the Lord. The Egyptians, and other idolatrous people, adored beasts, the souls of which they thought to be endowed with reason. The doctrine of transmigration was current in the East, and prevailed among the Hebrews, as is manifest from some passages in the New Testament. Father Pardies, a Jesuit, wrote concerning the knowledge of beasts; to show, that they are not destitute of thought or understanding. Wiltshire likewise wrote on the souls of beasts. Solomon, in Ecclesiastes, whether he proposes his own thoughts, or those of the philosophers and free-thinkers of his time, expresses himself in a manner which might be understood to insinuate that beasts possess understanding, and reasonable souls. 'I have said in my heart concerning the sons of men, that they might see that they themselves are beasts; for, as one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?'' Eccl. iii. 18, 19, 21. But we should widely mistake the import of such passages, if we imagine that the mention of animals should be thought of in a sense of inferiority. Wiltshire himself, speaking of man, in reason, or in a capacity of religion, of knowing God, of attaining celestial felicity, and of acting on spiritual principles. The knowledge, reasoning, desires, designs of beasts, are limited to the discernment of what is useful, or indifferent to them. Man is capable of higher reasoning, and of understanding, and instant enjoyment, their temporal happiness, and the multiplication of their species. They can and do, indeed, determine between hot and cold, between enjoyment and pain, safety and danger; but not between moral good and evil, between just and unjust, lawful and unlawful. But, it is asked, what becomes of the animating principle of beasts, when separated from matter? We have no principles whereby we can discover this. We know that God created all things for his glory; but can beasts be capable of an active knowledge and love of their Creator? If not, he must be glorified by them some other way; as, doubtless, he is glorified passively by simple matter; but surely not in any other sense, than as showing forth his glory, his wisdom, and his power. On this subject, we should recur to the distinctions of life;—body, soul, spirit. Body we grant them; soul, i.e. animal life, we also grant them; his they enjoy up to fixed degrees, each possessing that kind, degree, power, and duration, appropriate to its species; transmitting that to its posterity, but without improvement as without variation. He mean the animal life, or soul, is distinct from reason; which is infinitely various, capable of unlimited improvements, and of strong desires after still further acquisitions. Instinct, then, is a confined, contented, satisfied quality; reason is the contrary; and this strongly characterizes the active nature of spirit, which is a higher principle of life, bestowed on man for higher purposes of existence. (See Animals.) Our translators have rendered גָּמָּה (Rev. iv. 6, &c.) beast, instead of living creature, as the word denotes.

BED. This word frequently occurs in the English version of the Scriptures, and is in many cases calculated to mislead and perplex the reader. The beds used in the East are very different from those in this part of the world; and an attention to this is indispensable to the right apprehension of several passages of Holy Writ. It should be observed that the use of chairs is unknown in the East. The orientals sit or recline on a dana, divan, or sofa, that is, a part of the room raised above the floor, and spread with a carpet in winter, and in summer with fine mats, and having cushions or bolsters placed along the back to lean against. These divans frequently serve the purpose of a bed, with the addition of two thick cotton quilts, one of which, folded double, serves as a mattress, the other as a covering. Such a bed was that of David, 1 Sam. xix. 15. This will help us to understand several passages of Scripture otherwise unintelligible: Amos iii. 12.

"As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear; so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Soreria in the corner of a bed;" that is, in the corner where the dogs are kept, is the place of honor, the most easy, voluptuous, indulging station—of the divan. Will it not also help us to ascertain the true attitude of the dying Jacob, who, when Joseph brought his two sons to him, "strengthened himself and sat upon the bed,"—the divan; and who, after blessing his sons, not "gathered up his feet into the bed," but "drew them up on the divan?" Sometimes the beds are laid on the floor, as we learn from Sir J. Chardin, Mr. Hanway, Dr. Russell, and other travellers. Mr. Hanway describes the beds in Persia as consisting "only of two cotton quilts, one of which was folded double, and served as a mattress, and the other as a covering, with a large flat pillow for the head." Was it not on such a bed that Saul slept, 1 Sam. xxvi. 7, 8? Also, that on which the paralytic was let down, Luke v. 19? The Psalmist says, (Psal. vi. 6.) "I am weary with my groaning, all the night I make my bed to swim;" (the divan on which I am placed;) I water my couch (or the divan furniture) with my tears." Is it not good sense to say, "My tears not only copiously wet the divan, or mattress—the upper part on which I lie, but they run over it, and even extend to the lower part—the broad part—of the divan, and wet that also," i. e., the "foam" of the translators. It is said, Deut. iii. 11. "The bedstead (עָרֶב) of Og was a bedstead of iron." It may be thought, that our translators, in rendering this word bedstead, intended the broad smooth part, or floor, of the divan; unless his bed should rather be understood to the covering of that part, i. e., the carpet, or scarlet cloth, though it possibly might denote both floor and covering, as we say in common speech, "the floor of a room," notwithstanding the room may be covered by a carpet. Either sense of the word takes off much occasion for wonder on account of the dimensions of this bedstead, or divan, of Og, which appears to have been about fifteen feet and a half long, and six feet ten inches broad; and to have been made of iron (its supporters, at least) instead of wood, as was customary. English ideas have measured this huge piece of furniture by English bedsteads; but, had it been recollected that neither the divan, nor its covering, is so closely commensurate to the usual size of a person as our bedsteads in England are, no inconsiderable allowance would have been made in the dimensions of the bed for the repose of this martial prince. We may now also explain that very difficult passage, Ezek. xlii. 13. "Wo to those means that sew pillows to all arm-holes, and make kerchiefs on the head of every stature, to hunt souls!" &c. These words seem to contain these ideas; those who utter false prophecies, to soothe the mind of the wicked, are compared by the prophet to women who study and employ every art to allure by voluptuousness, against such he declares wo: "Wo to those who sew, embroider, luxurious cushions for all elbows, i. e. to suit the dimensions of persons of all ages; those who make pillows, bolsters, or perhaps quilts, coverings, (not kerchiefs,) for heads of every stature, absurdly suiting themselves to all conditions, capacities, ages, making effeminacy more effeminate." &c. The cushions, then, were not to be sewed to all arm-holes, and carried about the person, as our translation seems to imply; but they were to be so soft in their texture, so nicely adapted in their dimensions to suit all leaning arms, as to produce their full voluptuous effect. Thee these propheth compare to toils, snares, &c. in which the persons were caught, into which they were cornered, as the divers, like animals hunted by a surrounding company, which drives them into a narrow space, or trap, where their capture, or destruction, is inevitable, according to the eastern mode of hunting; from these consummate seducers he foretells delivery, &c. ver. 26. Understood thus, the passage becomes easy and plain, and analogous to the usages of the country wherein it was delivered. Comp. Prov. vi. 26.

This also explains how Haman (Esther vii. 8.) not only "stood up to make request for his life," but was "fallen on the bed—the divan—whereon Esther" was sitting. We see, too, the nature of the order of Saul to bring up David to him, that he might "kill him in his bed." (1 Sam. xix. 15.) Was the pillow of goats' hair stuffed with goats' hair instead of cotton; and laid in such a manner as to resemble the disorderly attitude and appearance of a sick man?—Other passages the reader will observe for himself.

Nothing seems more natural to English ears than to hear of a man carrying his bed about with him. To order a man, miraculously healed, to do this, is so strange to us, that although we discover in it a convincing proof of his restoration to bodily strength, yet we are almost tempted to ask, with the Pharisees, "Who bade thee carry thy bed?" But, when properly explained, the apparent incongruity vanishes before our better understanding. Such a kind of mattress, or even the simple quilt, above spoken of, might be the bed (ἐσπρακτόν) of the New Testament; and was often, we may conclude from the circumstances of the occupier, without the accompaniment of a cushion, to complete it. So, Mark iii. 11. "Arise, take up thy bed," i.e. thy mattress—the covering spread under thee. Acts iv. 23. Peter said to Eneas, "Arise, and" hereafter "spread" thy bed "for thyself;" thy pain being cured, thou shalt be able not only to do that service for thyself, but to give assistance rather than to ask it. Krathofel, then, is the meanest kind of bed in use: our truckle-bed, or any other which is supported by feet, &c. cannot justly represent it. Perhaps our sailors' amasacks are the nearest to it. But we are not to suppose that all beds were alike; no doubt, that when David wanted warmth, his attendants would put mattrasses below, and coverlets above, to procure it for him. Neither are we to understand, when a bed is the subject of boasting, that it consisted merely of the krathofel, or plain divan. In Prov. xvi. 18. the harlot vaunts of her bed, as highly ornamented "with tapestry-work—"with brocade I have brocaded, bedecked my bed; the covering of it is of the fine yarn of Egypt, embroidered with embroidery." This description may be much illustrated by the account which Baron du Tott gives of a bed; in which he was expected to sleep, and in which he might have slept, had not European habit incapacitated him from that enjoyment. "The time for taking our repose was now come, and we were conducted into another large room, in the middle of which was a kind of bed; without bedstead, or curtains. Though the coverlet and pillows excelled in magnificence the richness of the sofa which likewise ornamented the apartment, I foresaw that I could expect but little rest on this bed, and had the curiosity to examine its make in a more particular manner. Fifteen mattrasses of quilted cotton, about three inches thick, placed one upon another, formed the groundwork (ἀνάκεισιν) above a sheet of Indian linen, sewed on the last mattrass. A coverlet of green satin, adorned with gold embroidered in embroidered work, was in like manner fastened to the two sheets, the ends of which, turned in, were sewed down. On this last mattrass was a rich crimson satin, covered with the like embroidery, in which there was no word of gold or spangles, rested on two cushions of the sofa, brought near to serve for a back, and intended to support our heads. The taking of the pillow entirely away, would have been a good resource, if we had had any bolster; and the expedient of turning the other side upwards having only served to show they were embroidered in the same manner on the bottom, we at last determined to lay our handkerchiefs over them, which, however, did not prevent our being very sensible of the embossed ornaments underneath." (Vol. i. p. 95.) Here we have many mattrasses of quilted cotton; a sheet of Indian linen, (φυλωτρις, or the fine linen of Egypt?) a coverlet of green satin, embroidered; two large pillows, embroidered also; two cushions from the sofa, to form a back. So that we see, an eastern bed may be an article of furniture sufficiently complicated.

This description, compared with a note of De la Motraye, (p. 172.) leads to the supposition, that something like what he speaks of as called mazes, i.e. a brocaded covering for show, is what the harlot boasted of, as being the upper covering to her divan. "On a rich sofa," he says, "was a false covering of plain green silk, for the same reason as that in the bed; but I lifted it up, while the two eunuchs who were with us had their backs turned, and I found that the mazes of the winders were a very rich brocade, with a gold ground, and flowered with silk of several colors, and the cushions of green velvet also ground with gold, and flowered like them." Note.—The winders, or mazes, have two covers, one of which is called mazess, for ornament; and the other to preserve that, especially when they are rich, as these were. This was in the scraglio at Constantinople. It is perfectly in character, for the harlot, who (Prov. iv. 14.) "sits on a throne of ivory at her door," and who in this passage boasts of all her showy embellishments, to mention whatever is gaudy, even to the tinsel bedeckings of her room, her furniture and her mazes, assuming nothing less than regal dignity in words and description; though her apartment be the way to hell, and the alcove containing her bed be the very lurking chamber of death. A query may be added, whether the ivory beds of Amos (vi. 4.) were not the divan whereas the coverings were laid. These might be ornamented with ivory; and to this sense the use of the Hebrew word sollel agrees. In this acception there is no repetition in the prophet's words, when he mentions voluntaries "lying upon mitreth—divans—"their frame-work ornamented with ivory; and stretching themselves (yawnign?) upon the couches—coverings of those divans; meaning carpets, splendid cushions, &c. All these embellishments, these conserving luxuries, the nature, the enjoyments, and the actions of these voluntaries, agree with the expected delights of an alcove; they agree also with what has been collected from those ancient writers who censured the luxury of which they were witnesses in their time; luxury which, it must not be forgotten, was brought from the East, from Persia, from Syria, from the land of silk, of calico, and of canopies.

We are now, it is evident, at liberty to suppose that as much as was a share of the comest (ἀπόστολος) was displayed on the divans and their furniture, which served for repose by night, as on those used by day. And as perhaps the same furniture did not serve both day and night, all the year round, but was only show of chintzes, &c., we may conclude, that in a great house there must be considerable stores of such furniture; which, being not a little cumbersome, must require proper, and even large, rooms and warehouses, in which to keep it. This leads to the true sense of the passage, (2 Kings xi. 2.) Josiah and his nurse were hidden six years in the house of the Lord, in the bed-chamber, (ταύροι τερατικοί) i.e. the repository—or store-room—for the bed—of the mattrasses and their numerous accomplishments; which, being bulky, afforded the means of forming space among them sufficient to receive the child and his nurse, and to conceal them effectually. This was within the precincts of the house of the Lord, a sacred place, where none but priests could enter; and where, probably, none did enter but the high-priest, Jehoiada, and his wife Jehoehabe. This explanation banishes all ideas of an English bedroom in the house of the Lord; (which, to keep unvisited during six years, would have been very suspious;...it renders the concealment extremely easy and natural, since, certainly, this repository was under the charge of its proper keeper, who, only, managed its concerns; and it agrees to the formation of the Hebrew words. Moreover, if the infant Jesus were wounded, apparently to death, (as Abishai, 2 Sam. xvi. 22; but see 2 Sam. vii. 26; before he left him,) this large room might afford more conveniences while he was under cure from his wounds than any other room could do; and having been safe here for a time, where better could they place him afterwards?

In closing this article, we should notice the various acceptations of the word dîvân, or dâss: (1.) for the raised floor; (2.) for the whole seat on which a person (or several persons) sits; (3.) for the room the council chamber; so called, because the council usually sits on the dais constructed around the room; (5.) for the council itself, who are said when in consultation, to be "like dîsors."

BEBAN. We read in 1 Sam. xii. 11, that the Lord sent several deliverers of Israel; Jerubbaal, Beman, Jabez, and Samuel. Jerubbaal we know to be Gideon; but we know not where Bedan among the judges of Israel, 1 Sam. xiii. 1. Indeed, of Bedan, read Bashan, the father of Bashan, whose name appears in Judges x. 2, as the Jair of whom is spoken, Judges x. 3, who judged Israel twenty-three years, Judges x. 3. There was a Bedan, great-grandson to Machir, and Jair was descended from a daughter of Machir. The Chronicle, the rabbit, his father, the general acceptation, concludes that Bedan was Samsom, of Dan; but the opinion which supposes Bedan and Jair to be the same person seems the most probable. The names of Samsom and Berak were also in use in the 1st and 2nd Hosea, 6:15. The edition of Sixtus V. reads, "Jerobeam, et Bedan, et Samsom, et Berak, et Jeptha."

BEE, an insect producing honey. (See Honey.)

BEEL-ZEBUB. The form and quality of this ridiculous god have been much disputed. Beel-zebub, as he is called, was in the Greek and Latin, Beelzebul, or Beel-zebut, had a famous temple and oracle at Anathoth, king of Israel, having fallen from the terrace of his house and received dangerous bruises, sent to consult him, whether he should recover, 2 Kings xi. 11. In the New Testament, Beelzabul is called " prince of the devils," Matt. xii. 26; Mark iii. 22, Lu. x. 18. Some are of opinion, that the name of Achor, the god invoked at Cyrene against flies, comes from Accaron, the city where Beelzabub was worshipped; others, that the true name which the Philistines gave to their deity, was Beelzebak, god of sacrifice; or Beelzebak, god of hosts, or Beel-zebul, god of the habitation, or of heaven; and that the Jews, who delighted in disfiguring the names of false gods, by a play of words, or punning upon them, and who were scrupulous of calling them by their proper appellations, gave him, in derision, that of fly god, or god of ordure. The name of Beel-zebub is not very different from that of Beelzebooth, god of hosts. Some commentators suppose, that the true name of the deity was Boelzebul, the god of heaven; others, that he was called the "god of flies," because he defended people from these insects; as the Eleans adored Jupiter; and the Romans too, though not under the name of Jupiter, but of Hercules Apomyius. We know where read, however, that killing flies was one of the labors of Hercules. Others think that the fly or beetle accompanied the image of Beelzebub, and gave it the name to it: "Beel with the fly!" and the Egyptians, (who lived near the Philistines,) we know, paid divine honors to the beetle. It is said in the book of Wisdom, (chap. xii. 2,) that God sent flies and wasps to drive the Canaanite out of Canaan; and then adds, that God made those very things, to which they paid divine honors, the instruments of their punishment; which indicates, that they adored flies and wasps. Besides, it really does appear, that Eleusinian and its neighborhood was peopled with a kind of fire-fly, or cicadecha, whose stings occasioned a most violent burning tumor; at some seasons of the year. Why the Jews, in our Saviour's time, called Beelzebub the " prince of the devils," we know not. The Jews, however, accuse him of driving out devils, in the name of Beelzebub, prince of the devils, that is, of Satan, Lucifer, or the chief of the rebel angels, as appears by our Lord's answer: "If Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how then can his kingdom stand?" Matt. xii. 24. [These who write Beelzeboul, in the New Testament, derive the form from θηλθυστ, the name of an idol deity among the Eleusines, signifying lord of flies, fly, fly-beetle, fly, etc. The Jews, however, regard this, as the name of a demon who presides over the torment of the gnats and flies with which that region was infested; like the νεκράντειος of the Greeks, or of the Nilphriss of the Romans: 2 Kings i. 10. Those who write Beelzeboul, derive it from θηλθούμενος, i.e. either lord of the buzzing, region, sc. of the demons, the air; or, with more probability, θησος αυτος, from θησος stercorae, (Buxtorf, Lex. Rab. Tal. 641.) They suppose the Jews to have applied this title to the demon being the author of all the pollutions and abominations of idol worship. See John, § 403. Hil. Kunoel on Matt. x. 25. See the article BAAL. R.

BEER, a well, a town about 13 miles from Jerusalen, in the or of Gilgal. Shechem. In, (i.e. 18.) It is probable, that Jotham, son of Gideon, retired to this place, to avoid falling into the hands of his brother Abimelech, Judges xxi. 21.

BEER-ELIM, (Isaiah xv. 8,) the well of the princes, probably the same with that mentioned in Numb. xiv. 13.

BEER-RAMATH, the well on the heights, Joshua xix. 8. (See Ramah.) Eng. tr. Bealath-beer, Ramoth of the south.

BEER-LAHA-ROI, a well between Kadesh and Shur, where the angel of God appeared to Hagar, Gen. xvi. 14.

I. BEEROTH, a city of the Gibeonites, afterwards belonging to Benjamin. (Josh. xix. 17; xvii. 25; 2 Sam. iv. 2; Ezra ii. 28.) seven miles from Jerusalem, toward Nicopolis.

II. BEEROTH, of the children of Jaakon, (Deut. 7. 6,) a station of the Israelites ten miles from the city of Petra, according to Eusebius. Numb. xxxiii. 31. reads only Bene-Jaakan, instead of Beeroth-bene-Jaakan, Deut. x. 6. Where water is scarce, wells would naturally induce settlements, and give name to them; so Pudeek, the wells, Acts xviii. 13. The property of wells would also be claimed by the residents around them; hence, Beeroth-bene-Jaakan, the wells of the sons of Jaakan.

BEER-SHEBA, the well of an oath. (See Covenant.) The place where Abraham made an alliance with Abimelech, king of Gerar, and gave him seven ewe-lambs, in token of that covenant to which they had sworn, Gen. xxi. 31. The town subsequently built here was given by Joshua to Judah; but was afterwards transferred to Simeon, Josh. xv. 29. It was twenty miles south of Hebron, and at the extremity of the Holy Land.

BEEDESTHRAH, a city, belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, which was given to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 27. Compare 1 Chron. vi. 71, where it is called Astarah. Vulgate, Berrha.

BEETLE, see CANKER-WORM, and LOCUST.

BEEYES, the generic name for a class of clean animals. Collectively, herds. See HIPER.

BEGGING. Moses, exhorting the Israelites to alms-giving, says: (Deut. xv. 4, 7) "To the end that there be no poor among you; for the Lord shall greatly bless thee;" and, a little lower, "If there be among you a poor man, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother." These texts do not speak of begging; but we know that there were at all times beggars, among the Jews, as well as other nations. God himself says, (Deut. xv. 11) "The poor shall never cease out of the land;" and there were beggars in Jerusalem, and other places, Mark. x. 40; Luke xxi. 35. The true sense of the passage in Moses is, that God would so bless the lands of the Hebrews in the sixth year, that though there should be no harvest in the sabbatical year, yet none among them should be destitute, if they observed his precepts; or, it was his design to recommend charity and alms-giving most effectually; q. d. "Be so charitable and liberal, that there may be no indigent person in Israel."

BEHEMOTH, the animal. The author of the book of Job has evidently taken great pains to delineate highly finished poetical pictures of two remarkable animals—BEHEMOTH and LEVIATHAN—with which he closes his description of animated nature, and terminates the climax of that discourse which he puts into the mouth of the Creator. The passage stands thus in our translation:—

Behold, now, BEHEMOTH, which I made with thee;
1. He eateth grass as an ox;
2. He strengtheneth himself in his loins;
3. His force in the navel of his belly;
4. He moveth his tail like a cedar;
5. The sinews of his stones are wrought together.
6. His bones are strong pieces of brass,
7. His teeth like bars of iron,
8. He is the chief of the ways of God;
9. He that made him, can make his sword to approach him.
10. Surely the mountains bring him forth food,
11. Where all the beasts of the field play:
12. He lieth under the shadow of the reeds;
13. In the covert of the reeds and fens;
14. The shady trees cover him with their shadow,
15. The willows of the brook compass him about;
16. He is as strong as a leviathan of the sea;
17. He moveth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth;
18. He taketh it with his eyes;
19. His nose pierceth through smares.

Bochart has taken great pains to prove that this is the hippopotamus, or river-horse; Saintius thinks it was an ox; the Fathers suppose it was the devil; and Calmet, with the generality of the older interpreters, believes that it is the elephant. In adopting the opinion of Bochart, we may offer the following suggestion in support of that interpretation. The levitah is described at still greater length than the behemoth, and is distinctly spoken of as companions; to be reserved as fellows and associates. Under this idea, which is almost undeniable, we may inquire what were the creatures most likely to be companionized in early ages, and in countries bordering on Egypt, where the scene of the book of Job is laid; and from the "Antiquities of Herculaneum," the "Pompeian Pavement," and the famous "statue of the hill," it is apparent that they must have been the crocodile, now generally allowed to be the leviathan, and the hippopotamus, or river-horse.

After these authorities, we may, without hesitation, conclude, that this association was not rare or uncommon, but that it really was the customary manner of thinking, and, consequently, of speaking, in ancient times, and in the countries where these creatures were native; we may add, that being well known in Egypt, and in some degree popular objects of Egyptian pride, distinguishing natives of that country, from their magnitude and character, they could not escape the notice of any curious naturalist, or writer on natural history; so that to suppose they were omitted in this part of the book of Job, would be to suppose a blemish in the book, implying a deficiency in the author. And if they are inserted, no other description can be that of the hippopotamus.

It has been above stated, that many learned men have taken the elephant for behemoth;—but to this it may be replied, that no pictorial authority which has hitherto been published, has represented the elephant as known in Egypt; much less as peculiar to that country, though it has been repeatedly, indeed, we believe, constantly, adopted as a symbol of Africa. Till, therefore, some instance be produced, in which the elephant is not only represented as an inhabitant of Egypt, but also as associated with the crocodile, we presume we may consider the weight of evidence as decisive in favor of the hippopotamus as being behemoth. Omitting, therefore, what might be said against the elephant, such as the difficulty of reconciling certain particulars with the description of behemoth by the sacred writer, &c. let us now examine the description somewhat closely, in the order of the verses in the passage.

1. He eateth grass as an ox. It is evident from all the representations selected, that the hippopotamus feeds on vegetables. In one of the plates in the Antiquities of Herculaneum, (vol. ii. p. 285,) he is in the very act of feeding on such provisions.

2. He is as strong as a leviathan of the sea. None of these delineations represents him as powerfully built; and shows prodigious strength of construction.

4. He moveth (bendeth) his tail like a cedar, &c. shaken by the wind; not, we suppose, rapidly, with a tumultuous motion, but slowly, as it were solemnly, in a stately manner. This appears, in some degree, from representations, where his tail is seen to advance, and is evidently in motion.

5, 6, 7. Are implied in his general form; but are incapable of illustration by these subjects. We shall merely paraphrase the version: "His smaller bones are like compact bars of brass; his larger bones like forged bars of iron."

8. He, (God,) in making him, has made fast (fixed) his weapon.

None of the plates exhibit the tusk of the hippopotamus like what they are in nature; yet this part of the animal had not entirely escaped notice.
10. The dwellings (riases) produce him food; not mountains, strictly speaking, but any elevations, such as those on which he is represented feeding, in some of these plates.

11. Where play all the beasts of the field? It may be sought sufficiently remarked, that in several of these representations, where so formidable a creature as the hippopotamus is depicted as drinking, roaring, &c., there should be a duck in perfect quiet, and without any fright, or fear of injury from him, as is the case. Is it not the chief intention of this verse, to express the security of the lesser creatures from injury by this inoffensive animal, which permits even their frolics and sportiveness without interruption?

12. He lieth under the shady trees; 14. The shady trees compass him with their shadow. Here the prints fail; Egypt being a country not abounding in trees; but, as amends, verses 13, 15 (He lieth in the covert of the reeds and fens) are strongly illustrated by them.

16. He drinketh up a river; he hath not, one of the plates seems to be a direct comment on this verse; and on verses 17, 18, He is confident though Jordan rush against his mouth, he taketh it with his eyes. The name of this animal well expresses the eagerness in this animal. (The plates may be seen in the large edition of this work.)

It should be remembered, that the subjects from Herculaneum were the common ornaments of common houses; their merit, therefore, as instances of art, is by no means considerable; but their commonness (as seems to be a fair inference from the situations in which they were found) deserves notice, in support of principles adopted on this subject and others.

These remarks are independent of the general natural history of the hippopotamus; and are merely meant to show, that the chief particulars of his manner were well understood in ancient times; that they are conformable to the accounts of travellers, will appear to any who peruse Buffon’s account of this animal; and especially the more recent “Travels in Africa” of M. Vaillant—but, as our present design is not to write the natural history of the creature, but merely to narrate and identify the behemoth mentioned in Job, to what extent, if any, this design has been fulfilled must be left to the reflective reader. See Elephas, and Hippopotamus.

[That the beheemoth of the book of Job is the hippopotamus, or river horse, is now fully conceded by all recent commentators of any note; and for the following reasons among others: (1) That it is an aquatic animal follows from the whole plan and order of the two discourses of Jehovah; c. xxxviii., etc., in which the appeal is made, first, to the phenomena of nature, and then to the beasts of the earth and birds of the air; all these are reviewed in the former address, and there remain for the second only the aquatic animals. (2) The description of beheemoth is immediately followed by that of the crocodile. But the crocodile and hippopotamus, as being Egyptian wonders, are constantly and everywhere so joined by the ancient writers; see Herodot. ii. 69—71. Dio. Sic. i. 35. Plin. H. N. xxviii. 8. (3) That it is amphibious follows necessarily from the antithesis and contrast expressed in verses 13, 30—32, and verses 33, 34. The probability is that the name beheemoth is properly an Egyptian word, signifying river-az; just as the same animal is still sometimes called by us sea-cow.

The appearance of the hippopotamus when on the land is altogether uncouth, the body being extremely large, flat, and round, the head enormously large in proportion, and the legs as disproportionately short. Authors vary in describing the size of this animal. Some of them have been known to be six feet high, the height seven feet, and the circumference fifteen; the head three feet and a half; the girt nine feet; the mouth in width about two feet. The general color of the animal is brownish; the ears small and pointed, and lined very thickly with fine, short hairs; the eyes small in proportion to the creature, and black; the lips very thick, broad, and beset with a few scattered tufts of short bristles; the nostrils small. The armament of teeth in its mouth is truly formidable; more particularly the tusks of the lower jaw, which are of a curved form, somewhat cylindrical; these are so strong and hard that they will strike fire with steel, are sometimes more than two feet in length, and weigh upwards of six pounds each. The other teeth are much smaller; those in the lower jaw are conical, pointed, and projecting forwards almost horizontally. The whole surface of the body is covered with short hair; but more sparingly on the under parts than on the upper. The tail is also a little, and covered with short hairs. The feet are large, and each of the four lobes, or toes, furnished with a hoof. The color of the hippopotamus, when just emerging from the water, is palish brown, or mouse color, inclining to a bluish tinge, with the skin appearing through the hair; but this appearance vanishes as the skin becomes dry.

The following account of the capture of a hippopotamus serves greatly to elucidate the description in the book of Job, and to show its correctness, even in those points which have formerly been regarded as poetical exaggerations. It is translated from the travels of M. Rüppell, the German naturalist, who visited Upper Egypt and the countries still farther up the Nile, and is the latest traveller in those regions. (Reisen in Nubien, Kurdistan, etc., Frankf. 1829, p. 52, seq.) "In the province of Dongola, the fishermen and hippopotamus hunters form a distinct class or caste; and are called in the Berber language Hwawul (pronounced Hwewul). They make use of a small canoe, formed from a single tree, about 10 feet long, and capable of receiving, and being rowed by two men; the harpoon which they use in hunting the hippopotamus, has a strong barb just back of the blade or sharp edge; above this a long and strong cord is fastened to the iron, and to the other end of this cord, a block of green wood, to serve as a buoy and aid in tracing out and following the animal when struck. The iron is then slightly fastened upon a wooden handle, or lance, about eight feet long.

"The hunters of the hippopotamus harpoon their prey either by day or by night; but they prefer the former, because they can then better carry the ferocious assaults of the enraged animal. The hunter takes in his right hand the handle of the harpoon, with a part of the cord; in his left, the remainder of the cord, with the buoy; in this manner he cautiously approaches the creature as it sleeps by day upon a small island; or he watches at night on those parts of the shore, where he hopes the animal will come up out of the water, in order to feed in the fields of grain. When he has gained the desired distance, (about seven paces,) he throws the lance with his full strength; and the harpoon, in order to hold, must penetrate the thick hide and into the flesh. The wounded beast commonly makes for the water, and plunges beneath it in order to conceal himself; the handle of the harpoon falls off, but the buoy swings, and indicates the direction which the animal takes.

—The harpooning of the hippopotamus is attended with great danger, when the hunter is perceived by the animal, before he has thrown the harpoon. In such a case, the beast sometimes rushes at his assailant, and crushes him at once between his wide and formidable jaws,—an occurrence that once took place during our residence near Shendi. Sometimes the most harmless objects excite the rage of this animal; thus in the region of Amara, a hippopotamus once crashed, in the same way, several cattle that were fastened to a water-wheel.

"So soon as the animal has been successfully struck, the hunters hasten in their canoe cautiously to approach the buoy, to which they fasten a long rope; with the other end of this they proceed to the large boat or bark, on board of which are their companions. The rope is now drawn in; the pain thus occasioned by the barb of the harpoon, excites the rage of the animal, and he no sooner perceives the bark, than he rushes upon it; seizes upon it, if possible, with his teeth; and sometimes succeeds in shattering it, or oversetting it. The hunters in the mean time are not idle; they fasten five or six other harpoons in his flesh, and exert all their strength, by means of the cords of these, to keep him close alongside of the bark, in order thus to diminish, in some measure, the effects of his violence; they endeavor, with a long sharp iron, to divide the ligamentum jugti, or to beat in the skull,—the usual modes in which the natives kill this animal. Since the carcass of a full-grown hippopotamus is too large to be drawn out of the water without quite a number of men, they commonly cut up the animal, when killed, in the water, and draw the pieces ashore. In the whole Turkish province of Dongola, there are only one or two hippopotami killed annually. In the years 1851—23 inclusive, there were nine killed; four of which were killed by us. The flesh of the young animal is very good eating; when full-grown they are usually very fat, and their carcass is commonly estimated as equal to four or five oxen. The hide is used only for making water-tight barrels; and its tanned skin, cut from 350 to 500 of them. The teeth are not used.

"One of the hippopotami which we killed was a very old male, and seemed to have reached his utmost growth. He measured, from the shunt to the end of the tail, about 15 feet; and his tusks, from the root to the point along the external curve, 28 inches. In order to kill him, we had a battle with him of four hours long, and that too in the night. Indeed, he came very near destroying our large bark; and with it, perhaps, all our lives. The moment he saw the hunters in the small canoe, as they were about to fasten the long rope to the buoy, in order to draw him in, he threw himself with one rush upon it, dragged it with him under water, and shattered it to pieces. The two hunters escaped this extreme danger with great difficulty. Out of 25 musket balls, which were fired into the monster's head, at the distance of five feet, only one penetrated the hide and the bones near the nose; so that every time he breathed, he snorted streams of blood upon the bark. All the other balls remained sticking in the thickness of the hide. We had, at last, to employ a small cannon; the use of which at so short a distance had not before entered our minds; but it was only after five of its balls, fired at the distance of a few feet, had mangled, most shockingly, the head and body of the monster, that he gave up the ghost. The darkness of the night augmented the horrors and dangers of the contest. This gigantic hippopotamus dragged our large bark at his will in every direction of the stream; and, at certain moments for us that he yielded, just as he had drawn the bark among a labyrinth of rocks, which might have been so much the more dangerous, because, from the great confusion on board, no one had observed them.

"Hippopotami of the size of the one above described cannot be killed by the natives, for want of a cannon. These animals are a real plague to the land, in consequence of their voraciousness. The inhabitants have no permanent means of keeping them away from their fields and plantations; all that they do is, to make a noise during the night with a drum, and to keep up fires in different places. In some parts the hippopotami are so bold, that they will yield up their pastures or places of feeding, only when a large number of persons come rushing upon them with sticks and loud cries." *R.

BEKAH, half a shekel; in Dr. Arnhout's Table, 13d. 11-10ths; in Dr. Prideaux's, 1s. 6d. [The true value was about 25 cents. R.] The half shekel was called beka, from the verb basek, which signifies, to divide into two parts. Every Israelite paid one beka yearly, for the support and repairs of the temple, Exod. xxx. 13. See DTRACHMA.

BEL, the Chaldean Real. (See BLAD.) They contributed to Bel the gift of healing diseases; and believed that he ate and drank like a living person. Daniel (Apoc.) relates his detection of the chest of Bel's priests, who came every night through private doors, to eat what was offered to their deity.

BELA, Bala, or Zohar, Gen. xiv. 8. See ZOAR.

BELIAL is plainly Hebrew, from בּיָלָא, not, and בּיָלָא, advantage, utility; hence, strictly, Belial means worthless, and is always so used in a moral sense. A man or son of Belial, therefore, is a worthless man; one resolved to endure no subjection; a rebel; a disobedient, uncontrollable fellow. The inhabitants of Gibeah, who abused the Levite's wife, have the name "men of Belial" given to them, Judg. xix. 22. The same word rendered "congregation of the sons of Belial" in Zech. xii. 1, in the New Testament era, and elsewhere, means "congregation," or "people." Their goddess Eilah's sons, are likewise called "sons of Belial," because of their crimes, and their unbecoming conduct in the temple of the Lord. In later writings, Belial is put for the power or lord of evil, i.e. for Satan. Paul says, (2 Cor. vi. 15.) "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" Whence it is inferred, that in his time the Jews, by Belial, understood Satan, as the patron and epitome of licentiousness.

BELL. Notes ordered that the lower part of the blue robe, which the high-priest wore in religious ceremonies, should be adorned with pomegranates and bells, intermixed, alternately, at equal distances. The pomegranates were of wool, blue, purple, and crimson; the bells were of gold, Exod. xxviii. 33, 34. The legislator adds, "And it shall be upon Aaron to minister; and his sound shall be heard when he goeth into unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out; that he die not." The kings of Persia are said to have had the hem of their robes adorned like that of the Jewish high-priest, with pomegranates and golden bells. The Arabian ladies, who are about the king's person, have little gold bells fastened to their legs, their necks, and elbows, which, when they dance, make a very agreeable harmony. The Arabian princesses also wear on their legs, and suspended from their hair, which is plaited, and hangs long behind, a number of little bells, which, when they walk, give notice that the mistress of the house is passing; that so domestics may believe themselves respected, and strangers retire, to avoid seeing the person who advances. It was therefore, in all probability, with some such design of giving notice that the high-priest went clad, that he also wore these bells at the hem of his robe; it was a kind of public notice that he was about to enter the sanctuary. In the court of the king of Persia no one might enter the apartments without giving warning; not by knocking, or speaking, but by the sound of something, Judith xiv. 8, 9. Thus the high-priest, out of respect, did not knock by way of notice, when he entered the sanctuary; but, by the sound of the little bells at the bottom of his robe, he, as it were, desired permission to enter, that the sound of the bells might be heard, and he be not punished with death.

The prophet Zechariah speaks (chap. xiv. 20.) of "bells of the horses;" probably such as were hung to the bridles, or foreheads, or belts round the neck, of war-horses, that thereby they might be accustomed to noise. (See Burckhardt's Observations on the Prophet's Alt. u. Neues Morgenland, iv. p. 413.) A horse which had not been trained, nor used to wear bells, was by the Greeks called—on that one never heard the noise of bells. The mules employed in the funeral pomp of Alexander the Great had, at each jaw, a gold bell.

BELLY. This word is often used as synonymous with gluttony; "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies;" (Tit. ii. 12;) and, "The end of the flesh is that it shall die;" (Rom. vi. 18.) "They serve not the Lord Jesus, but their own bellies." It is used, likewise, for the heart, the bottom of the soul: "The words of a tale-bearer go down into the innermost parts of the belly," and wound the very bottom of the soul, Prov. xviii. 8; and ch. xx. 27. "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts of the belly;" the spirit of man is like the light of God, which penetrates the very bottom of men, according to the prophet of wisdom; if thou keep it within thy belly, in thy heart, "it will not break out upon thy lips." (Prov. 20.) The "belly of hell" is the grave, or imminent danger of death. The author of Ecclesiasticus says, "are men whose god is their belly." (Phil. ii. 13.) "Out of the belly of hell,"—from the bottom of the sea.

BELSHAZZAR, the son of Evil-merodach, and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, ascended the throne of Chaldea, A. M. 3444. He made the great and fatal entertainment for a thousand of his courtiers in 3449; so that he reigned but four years, Dan. v. The king, when warmed by wine, commanded the gold and silver vessels which Nebuchadnezzar, his grandfather, had brought from the temple of Jerusalem, to be produced before him, that he might drink out of them, with his court; but he was quickly terror-stricken by an appearance, as it were, of a man's fingers, writing on the wall over against the candlesticks. Belshazzar was greatly astonish'd, and commanded all the divinites of Babylon to be fetched, to explain the writing. He promised great honors; but the Magi could comprehend nothing of the writing, which increased the disorder and unassent of the king and his court. The queen-mother [probably Nitocris] informed the king of Daniel and his prophetic spirit, who was quickly sent for. The prophet performed what was required, was clothed with scarlet, received a gold chain, and was proclaimed the third person in the kingdom. But on that very night Belshazzar was killed, and Darius the Mede (Cyran) took possession of his kingdom.

We are considerably perplexed to reconcile prophane history with this account in the sacred writings. It is generally believed that Evil-merodach succeeded by Neriglissar; Neriglissar by Laborsuaro- doch; and that Belshazzar is the same with Nebonidas, or Laburnes. (See the article BERYLION, &c.) All the marks whereby Nebonidas is described in history, agree with Belshazzar. (Reconstr.) i. 11.) That he was the last king of Babylon; that he was not of Neriglissar's or of Laborsuarodoch's family; but was the son of the great queen Nitocris. Belshazzar, in like manner, is in Daniel the last king of Babylon, (who can be no other than Evil-merodach, and of whom the queen dowager, by her influence over him, would seem to have been mother. Daniel (v. 2) calls Belshazzar the son of Nebuchadnezzar; but in the style of the Hebrews, grandsons or descendants are often named sons. Jeremiah (xxviii. 9, 7;) says expressly, "The nations shall be subject to Nebuchadnezzar, to his son, and to his grandson, till the time come for vengeance on himself, and his country." But whatever variations may be observed in his sons, the result of their accounts is uniform—that the prophecies against Babylon were, for the most part, literally fulfilled at the death of Belshazzar; (it was then besieged by an army of Medes, Elamites, and Armada- chites, xiii. 17; xvi. 2, and Jeremiah 1. 11, 27—30;) that the fords of the river should be seized; that confusion and disturbance should prevail throughout the city; that the bravest of the inhabitants should be de- hearted; that Egypt should be made dry; (li. 32; li. 36;) that the city should be taken in a time of rejoicing; that its princes, sages, and captains should be overwhelmed with drunkenness, and should pass from a natural to a mortal sleep; (li. 26, 27;) that the city which was formerly so beautiful, so powerful, and so flourishing, should become a dwelling for bitterns and unclean birds, Isaiah xiv. 23. These particulars not only deserve the reader's notice in themselves, but also in the circumstance of their being delivered in prophecy; not altogether; not all by the same prophet; but at different times; the succeeding adding what a former had omitted, yet all agreeing in the same general issue and description.

It must have appeared to the mind of every careful reader of the description of the miracle at Bel- shazzar's feast, (Dan. v.) that some of the circumstances attending it require explanation. This has been attempted by Mr. Taylor, the substance of whose remarks may be here laid down. (But it must be borne in mind, that this is all mere conjectur-tecture. By inspecting the engraving accompanying the article House, one of the courts will be seen to be a square area, with pillars around it, supporting a gallery. In such an area, Mr. T. supposes the king to have been entertaining a select party of his guests. It was in the evening; it was given great light, were situated in the centre of the area; the tables placed around it, and at the upper end the king to have been seated. Having thus arranged the premises, he proceeds to inquire, (1.) Where, in what part of the court, did the miracle occur? and, (2.) In what did it consist?

In order to approach toward an answer to these questions, he thus minutely analyzes the narration of the sacred writer:—1. In that same hour came forth fingers (מ"ד) according to—of—a human hand, writing (that is, they wrote) over against—that, near to (not in the comparatively obscure angles of the court; but in the part nearest to) the candlestick, where the principal force of the light struck; in a bright situation; upon the plaster (inspect the engraving above, or below, the painted tiles marked O) of the wall, enclosure, partition, which surrounded the court; (that which in our engraving is supported by the pillars; see Marriage Processions i (מ"ד) according to, of, the royal palace; these were like hand, kinds, tent for Daniel. Then (ver. 36.) from before him (God) was sent the part (מ"ד) of a hand, that is, like unto a hand; and this writing appeared to be traced upon the wall.

Thus the first question is answered:—The writing was upon the plaster, over a central pillar in the court; (say, in our plan, on that next to the opening D, on the right hand side;) in the most conspicuous situation the wall could afford.

3. The miracle is supposed to have consisted in tracings, marks, or delineations, on the plaster; now such might be made by various means: as (1.) by lines, drawn with a black substance on a white ground; or (2.) by fissures, cracks, or crevices, wrought, as it were, in the plaster; or (3.) as a finger might write on soft plaster, by tracing its course along it; thereby forming hollows, little furrows, indented marks on its surface; much like those made by the impression of a seal; for so the word (מ"ד) here used means receive of seal. Or it may mean, decrees and stamps (מ"ד) mark by stamping with thy seal, as the custom in the East is, for confirmation, the writing. This may be accepted as answering the second question.

Thus we are justified, no less by our plate, than by the narration itself: there remains another question, which is rather to be answered by conjecture than by facts. The following crude ideas on the subject are offered that the reader may improve them into a better character.

Why could not the Chaldean wise men read the writing? They could not ascertain its meaning, probably, because, if it consisted in indented tracings, as with a finger, on soft plaster, there was no coloration, whereby to distinguish them as letters (i.e. well-drawn, well formed letters) from the rest of the plaster; at most, perhaps, the Chaldeans saw merely a number of (to them confused) lines; or if the marks were delineated by means of cracks or fissures, in the plaster itself, the effect was, to the Chaldeans, much the same. When Daniel inspected the inscription, he perceived that it formed letters and words; he was enabled to combine and arrange them; also, to perceive their hidden meaning and application to persons and things; which he had the fortitude to tell the king; and to apply to him, personally. These ideas go far in explanation of this matter. But if it be thought the letters, as letters, were clear to the eyes of the wise men, as they were to Daniel, there still remains a question, in what character they were written? In the Chaldee character, it is presumed; but, probably, in the sacred language; the ancient Hebrew; which for the present we call the Samaritan.

This was a character not likely to be familiar to the Chaldeans: they would not readily think of combining into letters and words, in this character of the ancient Hebrews, (now their vanished subjects and slaves,) a few irregular scrawling lines: that character was no sacred character to them; nor were they in the habit of investigating it; while to Daniel, this very description of writing had been his daily study from his youth,—his daily perusal, in the holy Scriptures.

We see no objection against tuning these ideas.

As thus: suppose the lines might be formed by hollows or tracings in the plaster; these, though they appeared to the Chaldean wise men to be no better than those random veins which are occasionally observed in marble, &c. yet, when inspected by the learned eye of Daniel, they were letters, in that sacred language to which he had been accustomed; he read them without difficulty, he combined them, and, more than that, he explained them.

The text says expressly, that the Chaldeans could not read them; but even if they had happened to possess the power of reading them, they might have been none the nearer toward ascertaining their prophetic import. We see daily instances of foreign characters, and foreign words, which are unintelligible to most persons, much like what these characters were to the Chaldeans.

There is a species of eastern wit which consists in forming letters and sentences into enigmas, of various kinds; no doubt Belshazzar considered this inscription as something of the same nature, and therefore expected his profound decipherers to explain it. This kind of puzzle is more common in the East than we are aware of; and we find Nadir Shah had coins struck with the same play of words upon them, "If I am cut, after I am cut, what has happened is best: the numerical letters of this motto make up 1148, the year he usurped the crown." Frazer's History, p. 119.

Thus we have endeavored to defect a few scattered rays of the nature of this miracle; always meaning to insist on the distinction between inquiring in what a miracle consisted; and by what power it was accomplished. The first is the proper duty of rational minds: the latter is confessedly above them.

BEN-HAIL, a prince sent by Jehoshaphat to the cities of his dominions to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 7.

BEN-HINNOM, or Geh-hinnom, or Geh-ben-hinnom, that is, "the valley of the children of Hinnom," or, "the son of intense lamentation," south-east of Jerusalem, Jos. xv. 8; 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Some say, it was the common sewer to Jerusalem, and an emblem of hell; which is called Gehenna. (See Gehenna.) This valley was likewise called Tophet.

BEN-HESED, governor of Sochoth, and Hepher, under Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 10, margin.

BEN-HUR, governor of Ephraim, under Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 8, margin.

BENJAMIN, the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel, Gen. xxxv. 16, 17, &c. Rachel died immediately after he was born, and with her last breath named him Ben-oni, the son of my sorrow; but Jacob called him Benjamin, the son of my right hand. He is often called in Scripture Jeremias only, that is, my right hand. Due to a famine which afflicted Canaan, Jacob, sending his sons into Egypt to buy corn, kept Benjamin at home. Joseph, who well knew his brethren, though they did not discover him, not seeing Benjamin among them, inquired whether he were living; and gave them corn, only on condition that they would bring Benjamin to Egypt. Jacob, after great reluctance, permitted Benjamin to undertake the journey into Egypt, Gen. xli. xiii. 1-15. Joseph, now seeing Benjamin among his brethren, carried them to his house, made them eat with him, but not at his own table; and sent Benjamin a portion five times larger than that of any other. After this, he commanded his steward to fill their sacks with corn; and in the sack belonging to the youngest, to put the silver cup which he used, and the money which Benjamin had brought to pay for his corn. When the brethren had left the city, he sent his steward after them, who reproached them with their robbery, searched all their sacks, and in that of Benjamin found the silver cup. They returned to Joseph, who, after much solicitation on their part, and tears on his, discovered himself to them, fell on Benjamin's neck, kissed him, and all his brethren; and invited them into Egypt, with their father. He gave to each of them two suits of raiment; but to Benjamin five suits, with three hundred pieces of silver, xiii. 16.—xlv. 24. After this, Scripture says nothing of Benjamin. Of his tribe Jacob says, "Benjamin shall be raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." (Gen. xlix. 27.) and Moses, in his last song, says, "The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; and the Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders." Deut. xxxiii. 12. The words "Benjamin is a ravenous wolf," are allusively applied to Paul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin; but much more properly to the valor of the tribe. See Judg. xx. and CAYAN.

BEN-ONI, see BENJAMIN.

BEON, otherwise Bean, a city of Reuben, beyond Jordan, Num. xxxiii. 3.
BERA, a town in Judah, about eight miles from Eleutheropolis, north, Judg. ix. 21. See Bera.

II. BERA, a king of Shechem of the time of Abraham, who was tributary to Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and with four other kings rebelled against him, Gen. xiv. 2.

II. BEREA, (i Macc. ix. 4) probably the same town as Bera.

II. BEREA, a city of Macedonia, near mount Cithanes; where Paul preached the gospel with success, Acts xvii. 11-13. There is a medal of Berea extant, which is remarkable for being inscribed, "of the second Macedonia," and also for being the only Macedonian medal of the date (A. U. C. 708.) inscribed with the name of the city where it was struck. Compare Acts xvii. 11, "noble Bereans."

BERED, a city in Judah, near Kadesh, Gen. xvi.
14. The Chaldeans call it Agura; the Syrians, Geder; the Arabic, Jader; it was the same, perhaps, as Arad, or Arada, (Numb. xxxvii. 4.) in the south of Judah.

BERENCIA, or BERNICE, daughter of Agrippa
the Great, king of the Jews, and sister of Agrippa
the younger, also king of the Jews. She was first betrothed to Mark, son of Alexander Lysimachus, alabarch of Alexandria; but afterwards she married Herod, king of Chalcis, her own uncle, by the father's side. After the death of Herod, she proposed to Polemon, king of Pontus and part of Cilicia, that if he would be circumcised she would marry him.
Polemon complied, but Berecia did not continue long with him. She returned to her brother Agrippa, whom she had lived in such a manner as to excite scandal. She was present with him, and heard the discourse of Paul before Festus, at Cesarea of Palestine, Acts xvi. 23.

BERETH, or BAREYES, a city of Phoenicia, on the Mediterranean, between Biblical and Sidon, 400 furlongs north of Sidon. It is doubtful whether Scripture speaks of this place; but there are several cities of the same name in Palestine. David carried off a great quantity of brass from the towns of Beth and Bereith, in Syria, 2 Sam. viii. 8.

BERODACH-BALADAN, son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent ambassadors to Hezekiah, king of Judah, with letters and presents, on receiving information that he had been sick, and was recovered in the Pleasant. King Hezekiah, on receiving the news, showed them the riches of his palace; but God sent Isaiah to forewarn him that every thing in his palace, with the sight whereof he had entertained
the foreigners, would be carried away to Babylon, 3 Kings xi. 12-19. (In Isa. xxxix. 1, he is called Merodach-baladan, q. v.) and under this name he is also mentioned by Berosus. See Assyria, and Babylonia.

BEROSUS, the Babylonian historian, was, by nation, a Chaldean; and by office a priest of Belus.
Tatian says, he lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and dedicated his work to king Antiochus,
the third after Alexander, that is, Antiochus Theos,
or, perhaps, Antiochus Soter; for the many years between Alexander and Antiochus Theos (some reckoning 64 from the death of Alexander to the first year of Antiochus Theos) might induce us to prefer this sense. Berosus, having learned Greek, went first to the isle of Cos, where he taught astronomy and astrology; and afterwards to Athens, where he acquired so much reputation by his astrological predictions, that in the Gymnasium, where the youth performed their exercises, a statue, with a golden tongue, was erected to him. Josephus and Eusebius have preserved some valuable fragments of Berosus's work, which greatly elucidate many places in the Old Testament; and without which it would be difficult to produce an exact series of the kings of Babylon. (A very important fragment of Berosus, which is referred to by Josephus, (Ant. x.
14.) but not inserted by him, has recently been brought to light in the Armenian version of the Chronicon of Eusebius, published at Venice, 1818.
tom. i. p. 42, 43. It is important as illustrating the history of Merodach-Baladan; and has been used for this purpose by Gesenius, in his Com. on Is. xxxix.
1, where it is quoted in full. R.

BEROTHAI, (2 Sam. viii. 8.) a city conquered
by David; supposed by some to be Berytus, or Beyroot, in Phoenicia. But it is probably the same as the following.

BEROTHAI, one of the boundary towns of Israel, between Bethlom and Emesa, Ezek. xlvii. 16. (It is probably the same as the preceding Berothai, and from the mention of it here would seem not to be a maritime place; therefore not Beyroot. See Rosenm. Bibl. Geogr. i. ii. p. 292. R.

BERYL, the eighth stone in the high-priest's pectoral, Exod. xxvii. 20. The Vulgate and LXX call it Bery; the Hebrew, Shobam. The proper significations of the Hebrew names of precious stones are unknown.

BESOR, or Bosor, a brook which falls into the Mediterranean, near Gaza, 1 Sam. xix. 9, 10, 21.
This is "the brook of the wilderness," (Amos vi.
14.) or the river of Egypt, mentioned in Scripture,
Josh. xv. 4-17; 2 Chron. vii. 8.

BETAH, a city of Syria-Zobah; taken by David from Hadadezer, 2 Sam. viii. 8. In the parallel passage, 1 Chr. xviii. 8, it is called Tubaul.

BETEN, a city of the tribe of Asher, Josh. xix. 25.

BETH, in Hebrew, signifies house; and is preffixed to very many proper names and other words, thus forming with them the name of a place; as Beth-el, 'house of God;' Beth-lehem, 'house of bread,' &c. Most of these names follow here in their order.

BETHABARA, beyond Jordan, where John baptized, (John i. 29.) was the common ford of the river, and probably the same as Beth-beth, Judg. vii. 4.

BETH-BECHEM, a city of Benjamin, situated on an eminence, between Jerusalem and Tekoa, Neh. iii.
14; Jer. vi. 1.

BETH-ANATH, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38;
Judg. i. 33.

BETHANY, (John xi. 18.) a village, distant about two miles east from Jerusalem, beyond the mount of Olives, and on the way to Jericho. Here Martha and Mary dwelt, with their brother Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead; and here Mary poured perfume on our Saviour's head. See Mod. Traveler in Palestine, p. 157.

BETHANIM, a village four miles from Hebron,
and two miles from Abraham's turpentine-tree.

BETH-ARABAH, a city on the confines of Judah and Benjamin, Josh. xvi. 6; xvi. 18.

BETH-ARAM, a city in Gad, Josh. xiii. 27.

BETH-ARBEL, a place mentioned Hosea x. 4.
where we read in the Vulgate, "As Shalman was overcome by him who made war against him, after having destroyed the altar of Baal," designing to describe Gideon; (Jud. vi. 25; vii. 8, 10, etc.) but the Hebrew imports, "As Shalman spoiled Betharam, in the day of battle." Some explain this passage as relating to the taking of the city Arbela, by Salamaneser; but this event is not noticed in history. Jerome, and the Alexandrian MS. read Jerobaal; and wrote it with the Vulgate of the victory obtained by Gideon over Zalumnas. Arbela, or Ar-baal-ed, signifies fine countries, countries of God; for which reason, we find many places so named. It is said, 1 Mac. ix. 2. that Bachidie and Alcinus came into Galilee, and encamped at Mesechloth, which is in Arbela. The city Maasar, or Miasgal, was in the tribe of Asher, near to which were very fine fields, and a place called Arbela, Josh. xix. 26.

BETH-AVEN, a city of the tribe of Benjamin, eastward of Bethel, Josh. vii. 2; 1 Sam. xii. 5. There was also a desert of the same name, Josh. xvii. 12. The Talmudists have confounded it with Bethel; because after Jeroboam, son of Nebat, had set up his golden calves at Bethel, the Hebrews, who adhered to the house of David, in derision, called this latter city Beth-aven, that is, the house of nothing, or the house of vanity, instead of Bethel, "the house of God," as Jacob had formerly named it, Hosea iv. 13; x. 5; Amos v. 5. See Bethel.

BETH-azarveth, the same as Azmaveth, which see.

BETH-BAAL-MEON, a city of Reuben, Josh. xiii. 17.

BETH-BARAH, a place beyond Jordan, (Judg. viii. 28,) probably Bethzara, which see.

BETH-BASI, a city of Judah, which the two Maccabees, Simon and Jonathan, fortified, 1 Mac. ix. 62-64.

BETH-BIREI, a city of Judea, 1 Chron. iv. 31.

BETH-CAR, a city of Dan. 1 Sam. vii. 11.

I. BETH-DAGON, temple of Dagon, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 27. Compare 1 Sam. ii. 2-5. II. BETH-DAGON, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 41,) so called, probably, because here was a temple of Dagon, before the Israelites took it.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM, see Diblatha.

BETHKEKED, or Beth-acad, (2 Kings x. 12, 14,) which some construe in a general sense—a shearing-house, or, the house of shepherds binding sheep; but the LXX take it for a place between Jezer and Sandaim. See Beth-acad.

BETHEL, a city west of Hai, on the confines of the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin, (Gen. xii. 8; xxviii. 10,) and occupying the spot where Jacob slept, and had his vision of the ladder. (See Jacob.) Essebius places Bethel twelve miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Sichem, or Napolese. Bethel was also called Beth-aven by the prophets in derision of the worship of the golden calves established there. See Beth-aven.

BETHER, the MOUNTAINS of, Cant. ii. 17; viii. 14. The Vulgate reads "mountains of perfume." Some take this place to be Bethoron; others, Betharab, between Cesarea and Diospolis; or Bethar, mentioned by the LXX, Josh. xvi. 53, among the cities of Judah. (Calm.) It is probably the Upper Bethoron, or Bethar, between Diospolis and Cesarea. Essebius speaks of Betharim, near Diospolis, and when he mentions Bether, taken by Adrian, says, it was in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. (The word Bether means, properly, distinction; the mountains of Bether then may be mountains of distinction, disruption, i.e. mountains cut up, divided by valleys, etc. The word is nowhere else found as a proper name; should it then, be so taken in the Canticles? B. R. D. Bether, in the Vulgate Bethanas, otherwise called Piscina probatica, because the sheep were washed in it which were designed for the sacrifices, in Greek probata. Bethesda signifies "the house of mercy," probably because the sick who lay under the porticoes of the victoria, had their wounds washed. The Gospel informs us, that there were five porches about this pool, and many sick persons constantly waiting, in order to descend into the water when it was stirred; for an angel came down at a certain season and stirred the water; the first who then plunged into it was cured, be his disease what it might, John v. 1-4.

The majority of writers have regarded the cures wrought at the Pool of Bethesda as a standing miracle among the Jews; and yet they have been surprised that Josephus should omit to mention a fact so honorable to his nation. Dr. Doddridge calls this "the greatest of difficulties in the history of the evangelists; and that in which, of all others, the learned answers of Mr. Woolston had given him the least satisfaction." Mr. Fleming, to avoid some difficulties in the narrative, supposed the latter part of the third verse, and the whole of the fourth, to be erroneous: it is wanting in Beza's MS. and is added, in a later hand, to a MS in the French king's library; however, it is in all other MSS. in the Syriac, and the other versions in the Polyglot.

The learned Dr. Hammond supposed that the blood of the great number of sacrifices which were washed in the pool communicated a stirrity efficacy to the water, on its being stirred up by a messenger from the high-priest:—a very unphilosophical suggestion, surely! and yet Dr. Pococke was so far captivated by it, as to seek at Jerusalem for the pool of Bethesda in the wrong side of the city, where it is not; and where it is, he could not see it; for reasons which we shall state presently. We insert one of Dr. Doddridge's notes on this history; partly from respect to his memory, and deference to his difficulties; partly, as it sets the idea of a standing miracle in a very strong light; and partly, as an instance how greatly learning and piety might sometimes profit, by a more intimate acquaintance with things, as well as words.

"I imagine this pool might have been remarkable for some miraculous virtue attending the water; which is the more probable, as Jerome tells us, it was of a very high color; this, together with its being so very near the temple, where a bath was so much needed for religious purposes, may perhaps account for its being such a place of resort, three of which remain to this day. (See Jerusalem.) Some time before this passover, an extraordinary commotion was probably observed in the water: and Providence so ordered it, that the next person who accidentally bathed here, being under some great disorder, found an immediate and unexpected cure. The like phenomenon, in some other desperate case, was probably observed on a second commotion; and these commotions and cures might happen periodically, perhaps every Sabbath, so that it was yearly none can prove.) for some weeks or months. This the Jews would naturally ascribe to some angelic power, as they did afterwards the voice from heaven, (John xii. 28;) though no angel appeared; and they and St. John had reason to do so, as it was the Scripture scheme, that these benevolent spirits had been, and frequently are, the invisible instruments of good to the children of men, Ps. xxxiv. 7; xi. 11; Dan. iii. 22; vi. 22. On their making so ungrateful a return to Christ for this miracle, and working in the former passover, and in the intermediate space, this celestial visitant, probably from this time, returned no more; and therefore, it may be observed, that though the evangelist speaks of the pool as still at hand, he nowhere mentions the descent of the angel as a thing which had been, but not as still continuing. (Comp. ver. 2 and 4.) This may account for the surprising silence of Josephus in a story which made so much for the honor of his nation. He was himself not born when it happened; and though he might have heard the report of it, he would, perhaps, as in the modern way, oppose speculation and hypothesis to fact, and have recourse to some indigested and unmeaning arraignment, on the unknown force of imagination; or, if he secretly suspected it to be true, his dread of the marvellous, and fear of disgust, his pagan readers with it, might as well lead him to suppress this, as to disguise the passage through the Red sea, and the divine voice from mount Sinai, in so cowardly and ridiculous a manner as it is known he does. And the relation in which this fact stood to the history of Jesus, would make him peculiarly cautious in touching upon it, as it would have been so difficult to handle it at once with decency and safety. Having noted these remarks, Mr. Taylor gives the following analysis and illustration of the words of the evangelical history.

Now there is—in Jerusalem, over against the sheep-gate a pool or place for swimming, ἀπεδράντως; r. v., named in Hebrew, Bethesda, having five porches (porticoes, walking places). In these lay a multitude of [ἐκκαταράκτω] debilitated persons, blind, contracted, wasted, waiting for the moving of the water; for an angel, according to the season, [occasionally, ἐκ τοῦ γὰρ] descended into the pool, and troubled the water: whoever then first went down (into the pool) after the moving of the water, was cured of whatever disease (of the nature of those above enumerated) had seized him.

1. Now there is—these words do not determine that the evangelist wrote his gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem, as has been inferred from them;—for there are remains of the pool to this day, and, as it is sunk in the rock, it may still remain for ages. Dr. Doddridge says, "he does not find satisfactory proof (though many have asserted it) that the sheep to be sacrificed were washed here; or that the blood of the sacrificial men ran into it."—And indeed there are no traces, or channels, in the rock which was henceforth prohibited, (in fact there was a facility of the blood from the altar having ever ran toward, or into, the pool. This obliged Papococke, who adopted that idea, to seek for the pool of Bethesdah in low ground, on the other side of the temple. The error has consisted in supposing that the sheep were washed here, after they were slain: whereas, they were washed in it, (if at all,) as soon as bought in the adjoining market; after which, they were driven into the temple. The place now shown for the pool of Bethesda, is square: nevertheless it might have had five porches; one on each hand at entering, the entrance being in the middle of one side; and three on the other sides. (See the conjectural plans on the plate of the Plan of Jerusalem.) This difficulty, therefore, is removed merely by an appropriate construction. It was, probably, very simple, and neither "sately" nor fit for "purification for religious purposes," notwithstanding its vicinity to the temple.

2. The diseases mentioned are of the nervous kind. We pretend not to sufficient acquaintance with the Greek medical writers, to determine whether τραυματία, blind, is used in the sense of dim-sighted, i. e. so weak in the nerves &c. serving the eye, as to be nearly, yet not hopelessly, blind. But we submit the matter to the learned to mention. In the sense of the word, it is not its import in Acts xiii. 11. "Thou shalt be blind (τραυματία) not seeing the sun for a season (ἐν ἑκατοντάρχῃ)." Also, 2 Peter i. 9. "These are—blind, (τραυματία, ἄτοπος) not seeing afar off, myopos, short-sighted, πανορθίων" where it should appear, that the latter word is used by way of explaining the former; as there could be no need to describe a person totally blind as short-sighted. 1 John ii. 11.—He who walketh in darkness, darkness bath blinded (ἐκ τοῦ γὰρ) the offices of his eyes; not that his eyes are deprived of the power of seeing; but that they cannot exert that power to advantage, because of surrounding darkness. The other diseases mentioned by the evangelist, are evidently such as cold bathing, especially in medicinal water, would be esteemed a remedy for. For the angel, see the article Άγγελος, i. e. a providential agent of God.

3. But what if here were, in fact, two distinct waters? first, the constant body of water, of a certain depth; the pool, within which the sheep were washed—the bath: secondly, an occasional and inconstant issue of water, the source of which was on one side of the bath, falling from a crevice of the rock whereon this basin was sunk, from the height of several feet. What if these were the medicinal waters of which "was troubled at the season?" and falling perhaps in no very large quantity, the person who could first get to it, received the full benefit of it, because he had it fresh and pure from the rock, which the water in the pool, if it were supplied from the same source, could not be; because there was no superfluity of it, of which other patients might partake; because such of it as fell into the pool, became instantly diluted, mingled with the body of water constantly there, and was thereby deprived of its efficacy, and its concentrated virtues; and this mixture was sure to be completed by the number of persons who would rush into the pool, desirous of being first, or very early, in it. It should be observed, that if the water fell from above into the pool, the people might easily watch it; and would not fail to force their way towards it, when they perceived signs of it gushing out: whereas, had the pool itself been the water that was moved, would not the sheep have been polluted by various ideas of holiness and virtue connected with it; partly from apprehension that, while they were washing, the water might be troubled, at a moment when nobody could benefit by it; if, indeed, its being troubled could be distinguished from the commotion occasioned by the sheep.

Let us now accept assistance from travellers who have visited the place. "A little, above, we entered the city at the gate of St. Stephen, (where, on each side, a lion retrograde doth stand,) called, in times past, the port [gate] of the valley, and of the flock: for that the cattle came in at this gate which were to be sacrificed in the temple, and were sold in the market adjoining. On the left hand is a strong bridge, which passeth, at the east end of the north wall, into the court of the temple of Solomon; the head [of the bridge] to the pool of Bethesda (underneath which it [the water of the pool] had a conveyance) called also produbium, for that the sacrifices were therein washed; and were delivered to the priests. Now, it is a great square profundity, green and uneven at the bottom: into which a barren
SPHINX doth drill between the stones of the northward wall; and stealthy away almost undiscovered. The place is for a good depth hewn out of the rock; confined above on the north side with a steep wall; on the west side with the high buildings, (perhaps a part of the castle of Antonia; where are two doors to descend by, now all that are, half choked with rubbish,) and on the south with the wall of the court of the temple. Thus is the account of Sanydis, who was there in 1611. He found the spring running, but in small quantities; and “stealing away” unnoticed. But it should seem, that when Mr. Maundrell was there, 1697, this stream did not run—as he does not mention that circumstance—so that, possibly, it is still intermitting; and to this day runs (κατά μέρος) occasionally. We have every reason to suppose, that the spring was formerly more copious and abundant, as well as medicinal; as the rubbish which now chokes up the passage for its waters, may not only diminish their quantity, but injure their quality. “On the 9th [April, 1697] we went to take a view of what is now called the Pool of Bethesda, which is 120 paces long, 40 broad, and 8 deep; at the west end are some old arches, now dammed up, which, though the ruins are but three in number, somehow will leave to be the five porches, in which sat the lame, halt, and blind.” (Maundrell’s Journey.) From the account of Sanydis, it appears, that the basin being deep in the rock, and upon “above” that rock the northern wall standing, and the spring issuing from between the stones of this wall, the place whence the spring issues must be several feet above the level of the water in the basin; which basin, being deeper in some places than in others, “uneven at the bottom,” might be deep enough to swim in, in some parts, while, in others, it might simply serve to wash the sheep. Thus, by means of the accounts of travellers, and their representations, this history appears in what may be thought a new light, (and, apparently a just one, since, so far as we perceive, it accounts strictly for every thing in the text,) and, perhaps, a more accurate idea is annexed to the name of this place, than those who derive it from ἱστοῦ τοῦ θείου, or the “house of issuing of waters,” “ devilish,” or “of evil” were aware of. That it was not in any probability the drain from the temple is proved; but may not “the spring house” be a title very descriptive of the portico surrounding this gushing, medicinal, and intermitting fountain? In this place, the derivation is in fact analogous with that from ἱστοῦ, or the “house of mercy,” or kindness; from στέκεω, chaked, exuberant bounty. See Jahn’s Bib. Arch. 198.

We close, by reflecting that it was John’s design to relate a miracle wrought by his Master; to honor Jesus, and Jesus solely: he had, therefore, no inducement to allude to any miraculous (angelical, spiritual) interferences, previous to, or distinct from, that of Jesus; and it is submitted to the reader, whether his words, properly taken, do really import any such interference; especially if we advert to the various senses of the word θείος; of which several are given under the same head.

BETH-ACEZEL, a place mentioned Mic. i. 11. It was, according to Ephrem Syrus, not far from Samaria.

BETH-GADER, a city of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 51.

BETH-GAMUL, a city of the Moabites, in Reuben, Jer. xviii. 23.

BETH-HACCEREM, see BETH-ACHAR.

BETH-HANAN, one of the cities over which Solomon placed Ben-dekar (1 Kings iv. 9,) but the situation of which is unknown.

BETH-HARIM (Jos. xiii. 36,) or BETH-HARAM (Josh. xiii. 27,) a city of Gad beyond the Jordan, afterwards called Livias, or Julianas.

BETH-HOGLAH, a town of Benjamin, on the confines of Judah, Josh. xv. 16; xviii. 19, 21.

BETH-HORON, the name of two cities or towns lying apparently near each other, and distinguished by the names of Upper and Lower Beth-horon, Josh. vi. 5, 3; 1 Chron. vii. 24. They would seem to be sometimes spoken of as only one place; and were situated on the confines of Benjamin and Ephraim, about 13 Roman miles north-west from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius and Jerome, on the way to Nicopolis. At first they were assigned to Ephraim, but afterwards to the Levites, Josh. xvi. 5; xiii. 22. From the distinction in the names the same conclusion, that the one lay on a hill, and the other in a valley; and this is confirmed by Josephus, (B. J. ii. 19, 8,) who describes here a narrow, steep and rocky hollow way or pass, exceedingly dangerous to an army—the same, doubtless, which is called, in Josh. x. 11, the descent or going down of Beth-horon; and which is also described in the same manner in 1 Macc. iii. 15, 24. It therefore often proved disastrous to flying troops. (See in Josuean, Josephus, and Macrobe.) The same place is strongly fortified by Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 17; 2 Chron. vii. 5.—Dr. Clarke found an Arab village, Bethoar, on the way from Jafa to Jerusalem, on a hill about 12 miles from the latter place; which he reasonably supposes may be the site of Beth-horon the Upper.

BETH-JESHIMOTH, a city of Reuben, between the mountains of Abarim and the Jordan, about ten miles south-east of Jericho, (Josh. xiii. 3; xiii. 20,) afterwards possessed by the Moabites, Ezek. xxxv. 5.

BETH-LEBAOTH, a city of Simeon, (Josh. xix. 6,) called Lbaoth, chap. xv. 32.

1. BETH-LEHEM, the house of bread, a city of Judah: (Judg. xvii. 7.) generally called Bethlehem, the highest interest, is that here the Saviour of the world, our Lord Jesus Christ, was born. Micah, (chap. v. 2,) extolling this pre-eminence of Bethlehem, says, “Thou Bethlehem Ephrathah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, who is to be ruler in Israel;” or, who is the Messiah, as the Chaldee paraphrase has translated it. Several difficulties are started relating to this prophecy of Micah, which foretells the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem. Matthew (ii. 6,) reads, “And thou, Bethlehem of Judah, art not the least of the cities of Judah;” whereas the text of Micah runs, “And thou, Bethlehem, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah.” It is objected that here is a contrariety between Matthew and Micah, one of whom says, that Bethlehem is small among the cities of Judah; the other that it is not the least of the cities.
of Judah. But to this it is answered, that a city may be little, yet not the least. [Or we have only to suppose, (what was evidently the fact,) that the apostle quotes words by memory; and that, therefore, while the sense remains the same, there is a slight variation in the words. R.

The cave in which it is said our Saviour was born, was not strictly in the city. The original church, built by the empress Helena over it, still exists, but blended with the necessary repairs and restorations from the devastations of inimical hordes of Mahometans and others, during the Crusades, and especially at the close of the thirteenth century. Near it is said to be the chapel of the innocents and their sepulchre; also the sepulchre of Jerome, of Eusebius, and of Paula and Eustochius. The tomb of Rachel, near Bethlehem, is of no antiquity.

The inn in which our Saviour was born was probably a caravansary, where guests were received gratis; but where nothing was found them but shelter. It is generally supposed that the caravansarai being full, Joseph and Mary were obliged to repose in a cave, or grotto cut out of the rock, which usually served as a stable; but this idea, as the intelligent author of the Modern Traveller remarks, is an outrage on common sense. The gospel narrative affords no countenance to the notion that the Virgin took refuge in any cave of this description. On the contrary, it was evidently a master belonging to the inn, or khan; in other words, the upper rooms being occupied, the holy family were compelled to take up their abode in the court allotted to the mules and horses, or other animals.

The following is Volney's description of the village: (Trav. vol. ii. p. 332.) "The second place deserving notice, is Bait-el-lahm, or Bethlehem, so celebrated in the history of Christianity. This village, situated two leagues south-east of Jerusalem, is seated on an eminence, in a country full of hills and valleys, and might be rendered very agreeable. The soil is the best in all these districts; fruits, vines, olives, and sesameum succeed here extremely well; but, as is the case everywhere where cultivation is wanting."

Dr. Clarke found Bethlehem a larger place than he expected, and describes the first view of it as imposing. It is built on the ridge of a hill which overlooks the valley reaching to the Dead sea, of which it commands a distinct prospect; so that any phenomenon elevated over Bethlehem, would be seen from afar in the East country, beyond the Dead sea. The convent is not in the town, but adjacent: it has the air of a fortress; and might even stand a siege against the Turks. The inmates manufacture crucifixes and beads for the devout, and mark religious emblems on the persons of pilgrims, by means of gunpowder. The doctor descended into the valley of Bethlehem, where he found a well of "pure and delicious water," which, he thinks, is that so ardently longed for by David; 2 Sam. xviii. 15.

II. BETHEL-LEHM, a city of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 15; Judg. xii. 10,) which is scarcely known, but by its bearing the same name as the above.

BETHEL-MEON, see BAAL-MEON.

BETHEL-MARCABOTH, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 5: 1 Chron. iv. 31.

BETHEL-MILLO, a place near Shechem, 2 Kings xii. 20.

BETHEL-MINRAH, a city of Gad, (Num. xxxii. 36; Josh. xxii. 27,) possibly Nimrah, (Jer. xlvi. 34,) or Bethnahbri, five miles north of Livias. The difficulty lies in extending the tribe of Gad so far as Nimrim south, or Bethnabri north.

BETH-ANNABA, or BETH-ANNAB, a town which Eusebius places a mile and a half from Diospolis; but Jerome says it is placed, by many, eight miles distant. Beth-annaba seems to preserve some remains of the word Nob, where the tabernacle continued, some time, in the reign of Saul; (1 Sam. xxii. 1, and Jerome says Nob was not far from Diospolis.

BETH-CARMEL, see BETH-CARMEL.

BETH-PALAT, or BETH-PHLEKETH, a city in the most southern part of Judah, Josh. xv. 27; Neh. xi. 36.

BETH-PATIZEEZ, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 21.

BETH-PERON, a city of Moab, given to Reuben, and famous for the worship of Baal-Peron; which see, Deut. iii. 20; iv. 46; xxxiv. 6; Josh. xiii. 20.

BETHPHAGE, a little village at the foot of the mount of Olives, between Bethany and Jerusalem, Luke xix. 29. Jesus, being come from Bethany to Bethphage, commanded his disciples to procure an ass for his use, in his triumphant entrance into Jerusalem, John xii. The distance between Bethphage and Jerusalem is about fifteen furlongs. The Talmudists say that Bethphage was within the walls of Jerusalem, but at the very utmost circuit of them; and it is probable that there was a street or district so called, because it led immediately, and indeed adjoined, to the Bethphage which produced figs, and was out of the city. It is probable, too, that the figs of this district were brought into Jerusalem, and sold on the spot. But the district itself was, no doubt, at the descent of the mount of Olives next to Jerusalem; and seems rather to have been so named from a house of figs; a house where figs were sold, or in the garden of which they were cultivated; and this might extend a good way up the mountain. It is, perhaps, uncertain, whether or not there was a village, or number of others, besides those of the gardeners who attended to the cultivation of this fruit; as also of olive-trees, and of palm-trees; most probably, also, of various other excellents for the use of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

I. BETHSAIDA, a city on the north-eastern shore of the sea of Galilee, near the spot where the Jordan enters that sea. It was enlarged and adorned by Philip the Tetrarch, who called it Julia, though it is not known by this name in the New Testament. This place is mentioned Luke 10, where Jesus is said to have withdrawn himself to a desert place belonging to Bethsaida, after the execution of John the Baptist; from whence also, after the miracle of the five loaves, he is said to have returned across the lake to Capernaum, Matt. xiv. 22, 24; John vi. 17. Some also reckon here Mark viii. 22. R.

II. BETHSAIDA OR GALILEE (John xii. 21), lay somewhere in the vicinity of Capernaum, on the west side of the lake of Tiberias; as we conclude from its being often mentioned with Capernaum as one of the chief places of resort for Christ and his disciples, Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13. Eusebius says, merely, it lay on the shore of the lake. The apostles Peter, Andrew and Philip were of this city, (John i. 44,) and are hence called Galileans, Mark iv. 70, v. 41. John i. 43. *R.

BETH-SHEAN, more generally known by the name of Scythopolis, was a town of Mannasseh, but situated in Issachar, Josh. xxi. 11, 16; Judg. i. 27; 1 Kings iv. 12. 1 Esdr. xi. 9, 10, it is reported to be 600 furlongs, or 75 miles, from Jerusalem. Jose-which Eusebius says is the last city of Palestine, in the way to Egypt, fourteen miles from Raphia.

BETHUEL, or Bethuel, a city of Simeon; (Josh. xiv. 4; 1 Chron. iv. 30). The same, probably, as Bethel, which Sozomen speaks of, as a town belonging to the inhabitants of Gaza, well peopled, and having several temples remarkable for their structure and antiquity; particularly a pantheon, (or temple dedicated to all the gods,) situated on an eminence made of earth, brought thither for the purpose, which commanded the whole city. He conjectures that it was named Bethelus, which signifies the House of God, by reason of this temple.

BETHULIA, a city celebrated for its siege by Holophernes, at which he was killed by Judith, Judith vii. 1. Calmet thinks it to be the Bethul, or Bethuel, above noticed, and believes that this idea may be reconciled with Judith iv. 6; vi. 8, which say that Bethulia was near Dothan and Edreelon, cities in the great plain, very remote from Bethulia, by supposing that the author of the book of Judith describes the march of Holophernes' army, and the camp which he left when he broke up to go, and undertake the siege of Bethulia; not the camp of which he took possession, when he sat down before the place.

BETH-ZUR, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 58.) which was fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 7. Lysias, regent of Syria, under young Antiochus, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, besieged Bethzur with an army of 60,000 foot and 5000 horse; but Judas Maccabeus coming to succour the place, Lysias was obliged to give up the siege, 1 Mac. iv. 26; vi. 7. Judas put his army to flight, and afterwards, making the best use of the arms and booty found in the enemy's camp, the Jews became stronger and more formidable than they had heretofore been. Bethzur lay south of Jerusalem, on the way to Hebron, and not far from the latter city. It was a fortress against Idumea, and defended the passages into Judea from thence. We read, 2 Mac. xi. 5, that Bethzur was five furlongs from Jerusalem; but this is evidently a mistake. Eusebius places it twenty miles from that city, towards Hebron, and Dr. Pococke speaks of a village on a hill hercubats, called Bethsaon.

BETONIM, a city of Gad, towards the north of this tribe, bearing on Mannasseh, Josh. xiii. 26.

BETROTHING, see MARRIAGE.

BEULAH, married; a name given to the Jewish church; importing its marriage with God, as their husband and sovereign Lord, Isa. xlii. 4.

BEZALEEL, a famous architect, son of Uri, (Exod. xxx. 2; xxxiv. 30.) of whom it is said, that he was filled with the Spirit of God, to devise excellent works in gold, silver, and all other workmanship—a remarkable testimony to the antiquity of the arts, to the esteem in which they were held, and the wherewith they were understood to spring, and to the wisdom (by inspiration) of this artist.

BEZEK, a city over which Adoni-bezek was king, (Judg. i. 4. seq.) and where Saul reviewed his army, before he marched against Gideon, 1 Sam. xi. 8. Eusebius says there were two cities of this name near one another, seven miles from Sechem, in the way to Scythopolis.

Reubenites; and afterwards to the Levites of Gershom's family, Deut. iv. 43. It was also one of the cities of refuge, Josh. xx. 8. The site of it is not known.

BEZETH, a city on this side Jordan, which Bach-chides surprised, and threw all the inhabitants into a great pit, 1 Mac. vii. 19.

BEZETHA, or BETZETA, a division or district of Jerusalem, situated on a mountain, encompassed
with good walls; being, as it were, a new city added to the old. Bezetha was north of Jerusalem and the temple. See the Map of Jerusalem.

BIBLE, from the Greek Βιβλιον, book, a name given to our collection of sacred writings, which we call the Bible, or the Book, by way of eminence and distinction. The Hebrews call it רכ, mikra, lesson, lecture, or scripture. They acknowledge only twenty-two books as canonical, which they place in the following order:

Order of the Books of the Bible, according to the Hebrew.

The Law.
1. Genesis, in Hebrew, Bereschith (in the beginning). 2. Exodus, in Hebrew, Ve-elle Schermoth (these are the names). 3. Leviticus, in Hebrew, Vay-ikra (and he called). 4. Numbers, in Hebrew, Bam-midbar (in the desert). 5. Deuteronomy, in Hebrew, Elle haddebarim (these are the words).

The former Prophets.
one book. 9. Kings i. and ii. as one book.

The latter Prophets.
The twelve minor Prophets make one book, viz.:
Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Na-
bnum, Habukku, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi.

The Sacred Books; or, Hagiographa.
14. The Psalms. (Divided into five books.) 15.
The Jews place the Lamentations and the book of Ruth after the Song of Solomon.) 18. Ecclesiastes.
22. The two books of Chronicles.

Catalogue of the Sacred Writings, as received by the Jews; from Origen.

Books of the Old Testament.
1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomy. 6. Joshua. 7. Judges and Ruth. 8. The First and Second Book of Samuel.
9. The First and Second Book of Kings. 10. The First and Second Book of Chronicles. 11. The First and Second Book of Esdras. 12. The Psalms.
Solomon's Song. 16. Isaiah. 17. Jeremiah, with the Lamentations, and the Epistle to the Captives.
The Minor Prophets.

The above and the following list, both from Origen, are important, as showing the canons of Scripture in the third century.

The Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John. The Epistles of St. Paul.

To the Romans. To the Corinthians. To the Galatians. To the Ephesians. To the Philippians.
To the Colossians. To the Thessalonians. To Timothy. To Titus. To Philemon. To the Hebrews.

Catholic, or General Epistles.

The Epistle of James. The Epistles of Peter.
The Epistles of John. The Epistle of Jude. The Revelation by St. John.

The books of the Old Testament were written for the most part in Hebrew. Some parts of Ezra and Daniel are written in Chaldee. The books of the New Testament were all written in Greek, except, perhaps, Matthew, whose Gospel is by some supposed to have been first written in Hebrew, or Syriac, the language then spoken in Judea.

Lost Books.—There are some books cited in the Old Testament, which are supposed to be lost.
These are: (1.) the "Book of the Wars of the Lord,"
Numb. xxii. 14. (2.) the "Book of the Righteous, or Jasher," Josh. xiii. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18. (3.) the "Chronicles," or "Annals of the Kings of Judah and Israel," 1 Kings xiv. 19. We have also only a part of Solon's 3000 Proverbs, and of his 1005 Songs, (1 Kings iv. 32, 33,) and none of his writings on Natural History. It is justly doubted whether we have the Lamentations which Jeremiah composed on the death of Josiah, king of Judah, (2 Chron. xxxv.,) because the taking of Jerusalem, and the destruction of that city by Nebuchadnezzar, appear to be the subjects of those extant.

(1.) "The Book of the Wars of the Lord." This is cited by Moses, Numb. xxi. 14, and appears to have related some particulars which happened when the Hebrews passed the brook of Arnon. Some think it was a work of greater antiquity than Moses, containing a recital of wars, to which the Israelis-
tes were parties, before their Exodus under Moses.
Indeed, it is more natural to quote a book, which is more ancient than the author who is writing, particularly in support of any extraordinary and miraculous fact. The Hebrew of this passage is perplexed: "As it is written in the Book of the Wars of the Lord; at Vaheb, in Suphabah; and in the brooks of Arnon," &c. We know not who or what this Vaheb is. M. Boivin, senior, thought it meant some prince who had the government of the country, and was defeated by the Israelites before they came out of Egypt; others think Vaheb was a king of Moab, overcome by Sihon king of the Amorites. Grotius, instead of Vaheb, reads Moab, and translates it,
"Sihon beat Moab at Suphabah." Calmet prefers Zared, instead of Vaheb, after this manner: "As it is written in the Book of the Wars of the Lord, the Hebrews came from Zared, and encamped at Suphabah, and about the stream of the brook of Arnon." Zared we know, (Numb. xxi. 13, 14,) from whence they came to Suphabah, which is mentioned Deut. i. 1, and, perhaps, Numb. xxii. 36. From hence they came to the book of Arnon, which flows down to Ar, the capital of the Moabites. This is cited very seasonably in this place, to confirm what is said in passages elsewhere. Others are of opinion, that the "Book of the Wars of the Lord" is the book of Numbers itself, wherein this passage is cited; or that of Joshua or the Judges; and they translate, "It is said in the recital of the wars of the Lord." Others, that this narration of the wars of the Lord is contained in the 135th and the 136th Psalms; others, that the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," and the "Book of Jasher," (Josh. x. 13.) are the same. Cornelius à Lapide conjectures, that this citation is added to the text of Moses, and that the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," related the wars of the Israelites, under Moses, Joshua, and the judges; and therefore was later than Moses. Lastly, it is said, that Moses either wrote himself, or procured to be written, a book wherein he related all the wars of the Lord; that it was continued under the judges and the kings, and was called Chronicles, or Annals; and that from these annals were composed those sacred books, which contained the histories of the Old Testament. The whole passage, however, is exceedingly obscure; and there is no end to conjecture concerning it. (2.) "The Book of Jasher, or the Upright," is cited, Josh. x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18, and the same difficulties are proposed as before in conciliating the former. Some think it to be the same with that of the Wars of the Lord; others, that it is the book of Genesis, which contains the lives of the patriarchs, and other good men; others, the "Books of Moses." But the opinion which seems most probable, is, that there were from the beginning persons among the Hebrews, who were employed in writing the annals of their nation, and recording the memorable events in it. These annals were lodged in the tabernacle, or temple, where recourse was had to them as occasion required. The "Book of the Wars of the Lord," the "Book of Days, or Chronicles," and the "Book of Jasher, or the Righteous," are therefore, properly speaking, the same, but differently denominated, according to the difference of times. Before there were kings over the Hebrews, these records might be entailed, the "Book of the Wars of the Lord," or the "Book of Jasher, or Right." After the reign of Saul, they might be called the "Books of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, or of Judah." Grotius is of opinion, that this book was a triumphal song, made purposely to celebrate the success of Joshua, and the miracle attending it. M. Dupin prefers this opinion, as most probable, because, (1) the words cited by Joshua are poetical expressions, not very proper for historical memoirs; and, (2) because a book under the same title is referred to in Samuel, where David's song is repeated on the death of Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 19. But may not these opinions coincide, if we suppose this book contained a collection of pieces of poetry, made on occasion of remarkable events? In this view, the appeal to the book of Jasher for a copy of David's ode, called "The Bow," is very pertinent. Might it not contain the Songs of Moses, of Deborah, and others? Dr. Geddes will not allow that Josh. x. 13. is a quotation, but it seems clearly to be such. It is well known to all readers of English history, that not only are our most ancient chronicles in what are called historical songs, which, though unquestionably genuine and authentic, yet are no where else to be met with. The Saxon Chronicle, and several others, prove this; but the most popular instances are in the "border song," or series of poems on the wars and contests between the English and the Scots on the "debatable lands," before the union of the two crowns. (3.) "The Book of Chronicles, or Days," contained the annals and journals written by public recorders, in the kingdom of Israel and Judah. They are not now in being, but are cited very frequently in the books of Kings and Chronicles, which are abstracts chiefly from such ancient memoirs and records, as, in all probability, were subsisting after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. The authors were generally prophets. As it is of the utmost importance to every professor of that religion which is founded on the Bible, that the Bible itself should not only be well understood by him, but that its authority, as a work communicated by inspiration from Heaven, should be well aserted; and, moreover, that the authenticity of such copies of it as are now procurable, and the correctness of these translations from such copies as are usually read and appealed to by us, should be established, we have thought it might be proper to offer an inquiry of some length into these latter particulars, not less for the use of the biblical student, than for the satisfaction of general readers. Of the authority of the Bible, as received by inspiration from God, we shall at present say nothing, presuming it to be fully admitted by the reader; being also aware that the proofs requisite to do this subject tolerable justice would extend these summary hints to an inconvenient length. As to the authenticity of such copies of the Bible as are now procurable, we refer the reader to the article Scripture. Of the original writers of the Bible.—It is very credible that the patriarch Abraham, to go no higher into antiquity, possessed and brought away what information the books or records of his original country, Kedem, could communicate. We are not aware that we should say anything improbable, if we considered Noah himself as practising the art of writing; but as great doubts have been entertained, whether this art were more ancient than the intercourse of Moses with the Deity on mount Horeb, we are unwilling to be thought too sanguine, or as taking too much for granted. The remarks suggested under the article Seals, are determinate for the nature of the seal of Judah, (Gen. xxxviii. 16.) that it contained his name, or appropriate mark, engraved on it. We assume this as fact. But we discern traces of a still more early employment of this noble art, in the days of Abraham. We have in Gen. xxiii. 17, 18, a passage which has all the air of an abridgment of a title-deed, or conveyance of an estate; which, indeed, is its import. "And the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field and the cave which was therein, and all the trees in the field, that were in all the borders thereof round about, were made sure to Abraham, for a possession, in the presence of the children of Heth, before all that went in at the gate of his city." The whole history of this purchase and payment strikes us as being not only according to the local usages of the country, in the present day, but also absolutely described, that we cannot think it would have been so amply, and even punctiliously, inserted into an epitomized history of the times, had not the original blank before the writer; who, finding himself able to communicate this ancient document to his posterity, embraced the opportunity of abridging it. If this be admitted as an instance of the art of writing, and of that art being practised in the days of Abraham, we may justly consider whether that patriarch could be the first possessor of it. We think not: and if, as the rabbins say, Abraham himself learned of Shem,—and they say, decidedly, that "Isaac went to Shem's school,"—then we may hesitate before we deny the possibility, at least, that Shem had preserved histories of former events, which histories he communicated to Abraham, from whom they descended to Isaac, to Jacob, to Levi, to Moses. We are not singular in supposing a difference of style between the early parts of the book of Genesis and the original writings of Moses. No injury is done to the just arguments on behalf of the inspiration of Scripture, if we suppose that Shem wrote the early history of the world; that Abraham wrote family memoirs of what related to himself; that Jacob continued what concerned himself; and that, at length, Moses compiled, arranged, and edited, (to use a modern word,) a copy of the holy works existing in his time. A procedure perfectly analogous to this, was practiced by Ezra, in a later age; on whose edition of Holy Scripture our faith now rests, as it rests, in like manner, on the prior edition of Moses, if he were the editor of some parts; or on his authority, if he were the writer of the whole.

Accepting Moses as the writer of the Pentateuch, though not without the probable concurrence of Aaron, we may nevertheless consider Joshua as adding some minor matters to it, such as the history of the death of Moses; and Ezra, also, in his edition, as adding some other minor matters to it, such as various explanatory observations, changes of names which had happened during the lapse of many ages, and particular directions where such or such objects were situated, for the benefit of his reader, and of remote posterity. When we come to the days of Ezra, we have clear evidence of written documents being composed, purposely, to deliver down to posterity the history of events. Ezra not only was willing to write, but he is specifically directed to write; and to take especial care for the preservation of those records, by placing them in the most sacred national repository; and under the immediate care of those persons who, by birth, education, and office, were most intimately concerned in their preservation.

The custom of composing public records was continued in ages after, in Israel, under the judges and the kings; and when the division took place between Israel and Judah, each of those kingdoms preserved copies of the writings esteemed sacred, whether historical or devotional. We have, indeed, reason to be thankful, that beside the Pentateuch preserved by the Jewish people, the Samaritans have preserved a copy, which, if it be, as many learned men have supposed, written in the ancient Hebrew character, is so much the more valuable, as it has had less danger and less occasion of error, than a copy transcribed into another alphabet, to meet another dialect. But this is not the only use which we should make of this circumstance; we ought to recollect the natural effects of party in matters of religion, especially when heightened by political ran- cor; we may be satisfied that the Samaritans would suffer no alterations to be made in their copies, by any authority from the Jewish governors; and the Jews, we well know, would have hardly received a palpable truth from "that foolish people which dwelt in Samaria." When, therefore, we find the copies preserved by these opposing and insinual people generally correspondent, and differing only in some minor matters, we ought to admire the providence of God, which has thus "made even the wrath of man to praise him," by transmitting more than one copy of this leading portion of Holy Writ, in a manner more certain, and much less liable to doubt, or collision, or equivocation, than if a single copy had come through the hands of one set of friends only, or had been preserved only by those whose undisputed testimony might have been suspected of undue partiality, or of improper bias. We find the kings of Judah attentive to the arrangement of their sacred code in after-ages: David, no doubt, authenticated the books of the prophet Samuel; and we read that Hezekiah employed several persons to collect and arrange the Proverbs of Solomon; and even to add to them others which that prince had left behind him. It is usually understood that the Psalms, the Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, were added under Hezekiah; and probably the books of Job and Isaiah also. The prophecies of Jeremiah were public: a large number of them were read to all the people, and before the king, so that many copies might be in circulation. The same may be said of most of the minor prophets, and, in short, of all that were near to the days of Nehemiah and Ezra. It is very evident that all the sacred books and the places people, after their return from captivity, would do their utmost to collect, preserve, and maintain the dignity and integrity of the writings of their sacred code; and, indeed, excepting the prophet Malachi, we may confidently consider Ezra as not only collecting, but collating the copies of former writings, and composing additions to the historical narrations; not in the books themselves, (except here and there a few words,) withheld perhaps by their prior sanctity, but in that separate history which we call the Chronicles.

Here we ought to pause; because here our faith rests on Ezra's edition; and we doubt not that this "scribe, well instructed in the law," had not only good reasons for what he did, and for his manner of doing it, but also divine guidance to preserve him from erring. We suspect that we have as many instances of Ezra's caution as we have marginal readings in our Hebrew Bibles; which, in the whole, amount to 540. These occur in various places of the works extant before Ezra; but there are notes in the prophet Malachi, who has been supposed to be Ezra himself; if so, the reason for this exception from various readings is evident. From the time of Ezra the Hebrew canon was esteemed as completed; but, between this time and our Lord, the books of the Jews became objects of inquiry among neighboring nations; and translations of them being undertaken by those whose language we also study, these translations become very important to us, who, by their means, have additional emotion to the articles of our inquiry, and additional means of answering the purposes to which our inquiry is directed.

Jewish Labor on Hebrew Copies. The attention of the Jews was by no means confined to writing copies of the Holy Word; they also made most incredible exertions to preserve the genuineness and integrity of the text; which produced what has been termed the Masora, the most stupendous monument in the whole history of literature, of minute and persevering labor. (See Masora.) In the Jewish manuscripts and printed editions, a word is often found with a small circle annexed to it, or with an asterisk over it, and a word written in the margin of the same line. The former is called the Kasbah, the latter the Targum. Of these, much mystery has been discovered by the Masorites. The prevailing opinion is, that they are partly various readings, collected from the time of Ezra, and partly critical observations, or, as they have been called, annotations, of the Masorites, to substitute proper or regular, for improper and irregular words, and sometimes decent for indecent expressions, in the text. As to the vocal points, which Calmet has considered as Masoretical, the reader may see sufficient information under the article Letter, p. 618.

On the Present State of the Hebrew Manuscripts.—No extensive collation of the Hebrew manuscripts of the sacred text was made till the last century; owing, to a great measure, to a notion which had prevailed of the integrity of the sacred text, in consequence of its supposed preservation from error, by the wonder-working Masora. The rabbis boldly asserted, and the Christians implicitly believed, that the Hebrew text was free from error, and that, in all these respects, it was not an instance of a sacred reading of importance could be produced. The first who combated this notion, in the form of regular work, was Ludovicus Capellus. From the differences observed between the Hebrew text and the version of the Seventy, and between the Hebrew and the Samaritan Pentateuchs; from the manifest and palpable corruptions he thought he saw in the text itself; and from the many reasons which made him suppose the vocal points and the Masora were both a modern and a useless invention, he was led to question the general integrity of the text; and even his enemies admitted, that, in his attack upon it, he discovered great learning and ingenuity. Still, however, he admitted the utility of the manuscripts; and when this was urged against him by Buxtorf, he had little to reply. But at length, what should have been done before any thing had been said or written on the subject, the manuscripts themselves were examined, and innumerable various readings were discovered; and from this time, biblical criticism on the sacred text took a new turn. Manuscripts were collated, and examined with attention; their various readings were discussed with freedom, and their respective merits ascertained by the rule of the talmudical and the Seventy. Kennicott was begun in the year 1760. He undertook to collate all the manuscripts of the sacred text in England, and in Ireland; and while he should be employed in this, (which he supposed might be about ten years,) to collate, as far as the expense would admit, all the Hebrew manuscripts of importance, in foreign countries. The first volume of this great work was printed in 1776; the second in 1780. Dr. Kennicott himself collated two hundred and fifty manuscripts; and under his direction and at his expense, Mr. Bruns collated about three hundred and fifty; so that the whole number of manuscripts collated, on this occasion, was nearly six hundred. In his opinion, fifty-one of the manuscripts collated for his edition were from 660 to 680, and one hundred and seventy-four from 460 to 580, years old. Four quarto volumes of various readings have since been published by De Rossi, from more than four hundred manuscripts; some of which are said to be of the seventh or eighth century, as well as from a considerable number of rare and unnoticed editions. The consequence of these extensive collations has been, to raise a general opinion among the learned, that all manuscript copies of the Hebrew Scriptures now extant may, in some sort, be called Masoretic copies, because none of them have, entirely, escaped the labors of the Masorites; 3dly, that the most valuable manuscripts, generally speaking, are those which are oldest, written at first without points or accents, containing the greatest number of vocal letters, exhibiting marks of an accurate transcripture, and conforming most to the ancient versions, and, with regard to the Pentateuch, conforming most to the Samaritan exemplar, and the Greek uninterpolated version; 4thly, that the Masoretic copies often disagree (and that, the further back they go, the greater is their disagreement) from the present printed copy; 5thly, that the synagogal rolls disagree the least from the printed copies, so that they are of little value in ascertaining the text. From this combination of reasons they conclude, that the two chief sources of emendation are a collection of manuscripts and parallel places; a comparison of the text with the ancient versions, and of those with one another; and grammatical analogy; and where all these fail, an conjectural criticism. The ancient opinions, however, have some advocates. They do not go so far as to assert, that a collation of Hebrew manuscripts is perfectly useless; but they think it may be prized higher than it deserves; that, when manuscripts of an earlier date than the Masorites are sought for, it should not be forgotten, that the Masorites had those manuscripts, when they settled the text; and what hopes can there be, they ask, that, at the close of the eighteenth century, the Hebrew has long ceased to be a spoken language, a Christian, so much of whose time is employed in other pursuits, and distracted by other cares, can make a better use of those manuscripts than was actually made of them, by the Masoretic learned, whose whole time, whose every thought, from their earliest years to their latest age, was devoted to that one object; who lived among the people, and almost in the country, where the events recorded by them happened, who saw with their own eyes, and heard with their own ears, and hourly spoke and heard a language kindred to that in which they are written? But if there must be a collection of manuscripts, then, say they, no manuscript written by any other than a Jew, or waiting any one of the Seventy or Kennicott was begun in the year 1760. He undertook to collate all the manuscripts of the sacred text in England, and in Ireland; and while he should be employed in this, (which he supposed might be about ten years,) to collate, as far as the expense would admit, all the Hebrew manuscripts of importance, in foreign countries. The first volume of this great work was printed in 1776; the second in 1780. Dr. Kennicott himself collated two hundred and fifty manuscripts; and under his direction and at his expense, Mr. Bruns collated about three hundred and fifty; so that the whole number of manuscripts collated, on this occasion, was nearly six hundred. In his opinion, fifty-one of the manuscripts collated for his edition were from 660 to 680, and one hundred and seventy-four from 460 to 580, years old. But if there must be a collection of manuscripts, then, say they, no manuscript written by any other than a Jew, or waiting any one of the Seventy or Jews, of a family which came originally from Germany, and established themselves at Soncino, a town in Lombardy. They were the first Hebrew printers. Bomberg's edition was printed five times, and is distinguished by the beauty of the type; but, not being divided into chapters and verses, is unsuited for general use. The first of his editions was printed in 1518, the last in 1545; they were all printed at Venice, and are all in 4to. Robert Stephens's 16mo, edition, in seven volumes, was printed at Paris, 1544—1546. He had before printed a 4to, edition at Paris, in four volumes, 1539—1544. The celebrated edition of Athias was published at Amsterdam, first in 1601, and afterwards in 1607; and is remarkable for being the first edition in Hebrew, in which the verses are numbered. It has been frequently reprinted by Van der Hooght, 4vo., 1705. This edition has the general reputation of great accuracy. His text was adopted by Dr. Kennicott. A stereotype edition of Van der Hooght is now printed in London, edited by Judah D'Alemanz, in three volumes, 1763, and afterwards in 1784. The Plantinian editions have considerable merit for their neatness and accuracy. The edition of Nunes Torres, with the notes of Basch, was begun in 1700, was finished in 1705, and was the last edition of the Jews. Most of the former editions were surpassed, in accuracy, by that of Michaelis in 1720. A critical edition was published by Raphael Chaillot Balsi, a Jew at Mantua, in four parts, 1743—1744.

The most celebrated edition of the Hebrew, with a Latin translation, was that of Sebastian Munster. The first volume of the first edition was printed in 1529; the second in 1534; the second edition was printed in 1546. It was the first Latin translation of any of the separatists from the see of Rome. Sanctus Pagninus was the first of the Catholics who made an entirely new Latin version. It was published at Lyons, in 1560, and has often been reprinted. That the Latinism is barbarous and coarse can be denied; but, as it was the author's design to frame a verbal translation, in the strictest and most literal sense of that word, its supposed barbarism was undeveloped. The celebrated edition of Houbigant, with a Latin version and prolegomena, was published in four volumes folio, in 1735, at Paris. The merit of this edition is celebrated by all who are not advocates for the Masora; by them it is spoken of in the harshest terms. Several manuscripts were occasionally consulted by the author; but it is evident, that he did not collate any one manuscript throughout. Prior to Houbigant's edition, was that of Reinuccius, at Leipsic, in 1725, reprinted there in 1738. A new edition of it was printed in 1756, under the inspection of Dr. Doederlein, and professor Meyer. It contains the most important of the various readings collected by Kennicott and De Rossi; printed under the text. For the purpose of common use, it is an excellent edition, and supplies the want of the splendid but expensive editions and collations of Houbigant, Kennicott, and De Rossi.

[To the above list should be added, the edition of Simonis in 8vo., Halle, 1752, 1767, 1822, and Amst. 1747; the edition of Jahn in 4 vols., 4vo., Vienna, 1806, in which all the passages that are parallel are printed side by side in the manner of a harmony; and the stereotype edition of Taucntz, 8vo. Leipsic, 1831, printed under the supervision of professor Hahn, and one of the most correct and beautiful editions extant. For a complete account of the editions of the Hebrew Bible, see the notice thereof in the Bibliotheca Sacra, Par. 1723, fol. or to Masch's edition of the same work, in quarto, Halle, 1778—85.]

TRANSLATIONS OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES:—The first translation in order of time, and indeed in point of importance to us, is that Greek version usually called the Seventy, or the Septuagint; but we have nothing to add to the account given of it under Septuagint. The Chaldee translations come next in order: they are not so much translations, however, as paraphrases. (See JONATHAN, TARONIS, VERSION, Etc.) The Syriac translation has been by some referred to the time of Solomon; by others to the time of Abaran, king of Edessa; which is certainly more probable, but is not universally admitted. It unquestionably is ancient. Dr. Prideaux thinks it was made within the first century, and that it is the best of all translations. (See SYRIA, AD FINES.) Latin translations do not date before the introduction of Christianity into Rome. Of these the Vulgate is the chief.

We are now to add to our consideration, the several books which compose the New Testament; and which were studied, copied, and translated, together with the Hebrew Scriptures, by the Jews, until the Christians, while the Jews continued to study and copy those only which contained the principles of their ancient system.

OF THE PRESENT STATE OF THE GREEK MANUSCRIPTS:—The Greek manuscripts, according to Westcott's account, are written either on parchment (or vellum) or on paper. The parchment or vellum is sometimes purple-colored. Manuscripts, written in capital letters of the kind commonly found on the ancient monuments of Greece, are generally supposed to be of the sixth century at the latest: those written in an ornamental, semi-barbarous character, are generally supposed to be of the tenth century. Manuscripts written in small letters are of a still later age. But the Greek manuscripts copied by the Latin, after the reign of Charlemagne, are in another kind of alphabet; the , , and , in them, are inflected, in the form of the letters of the Latin alphabet. Even in the earliest manuscripts some words are abbreviated. At the beginning of a new book, the first line is often written in veneration. There are very few manuscripts containing the entire New Testament. The greater part contain the Gospels only; very few have the Apocalypse. The curious and extensive collations, which have been made of manuscripts within the last century, have shown, that certain manuscripts have an affinity to each other, and that their text is distinguished from others by characteristic marks. This has enabled the writers on this subject to arrange them under certain general classes. They have observed, that, as different countries had different versions, according to their respective languages, their manuscripts naturally resemble their respective versions, as the versions, generally speaking, were made from the manuscripts in common use. Pursuing this idea, they have supposed four principal exemplars: 1st, the Western exemplar, or that used in the countries where the Latin language was spoken; with this, the Latin versions coincide: 2d, the Alexandrine exemplar; with this, the quotations of Origins coincide 3d, the Edessene exemplar, from which the Sobri download was made; and 4th, the Byzantine or Constantinopolitan exemplar: the greatest number of manuscripts written by the monks of mount Athos, the Moscow manuscripts, the Slavonic or Russian versions, and the quotations of Chrysostom and Theophylact, bishop of Bulgaria, are referable to this edition. The readings of this exemplar are remarkably different from those of the other exemplars; between which a striking coincidence appears. A reading supported by all three of them is supposed to be of the very highest authority; yet the true reading is sometimes found only in the fourth.

From the coincidence observed between many Greek manuscripts and the Vulgate, or some other Latin translation, a suspicion arose in the minds of several writers of eminence, that the Greek text had been assimilated throughout to the Latin. This seems to have been first suggested by Erasmus; but it does not appear that he supposed the alterations were made before the fifteenth century: so that the charge of Latinizing the manuscripts did not, in his opinion, extend to the original writers of the manuscript, or, as they are called, the writers à primâ manu, but affected only the subsequent interpolators, or, as they are called, the writers à secundâ manu. Father Simon and Mill adopted and extended this accusation; and it was urged by Westelin with his usual vehemence and ability; so that it came to be generally received. Bengel expressed some doubts of it; and Semler formally called it in question. He was followed by Grévski and Wolff; and finally brought over Michælis; who, in the first edition of his Introduction to the New Testament, had taken part with the accusers; but, in the fourth edition of the same work, with a candor of which there are too few examples, he declared himself persuaded that the charge was unfounded; and totally abandoned his former opinion.

Besides the manuscripts which contain whole books of the New Testament, other manuscripts have been consulted: among these are the Lectionaria, or collections of detached parts of the New Testament, appointed to be read in the service of the church. These are distinguished into the Evangeliorum, or lessons from the Gospels; and the Apostoli, or lessons from the Acts and Epistles. The quotations from the New Testament, in the works of the ancients, have also been consulted.

The principal Greek manuscripts now extant, are the Codex Alexandrinus, in the British Museum; the Codex Graecus, in the Vatican; and the Codex Vaticanus. The Codex Alexandrinus consists of four volumes: the first three contain the Old Testament; the fourth, the New Testament, together with the first Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, and a fragment of the Second. The Codex Cantabrigiensis, or the Codex Bezae, is a Greek and Latin manuscript of the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. The Codex Vaticanus contained, originally, the whole Greek Bible. The respective ages of these venerable manuscripts have been a subject of great controversy, and have employed the ingenuity and learning of several biblical writers of great renown. After a profound investigation of the subject, Dr. Woide fixes the age of the Codex Alexandrinus between the middle and the end of the fourth century; after a similar investigation, Dr. Kipling fixes the age of the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or the Codex Bezae, to the second century; but bishop Marsh, in his notes to Michaelis, (vol. ii. p. 708—715,) seems to prove that it was not written earlier than the fifth century. Montfaucon and Blanchini refer the Codex Vaticanus also to the fifth century. In 1786, a fac-simile edition of the New Testament in the Codex Alexandrinus was published in London, by Dr. Woide. In 1793, a fac-simile edition of the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or the Codex Bezae, was published at Cambridge, at the expense of the University, by Dr. Kipling. These editions exhibit their respective prototypes, line for line, and word for word, to a degree of similarity hardly credible. The types were cast for the purpose, in alphabets of various forms, that they might be varied with those of the manuscript, and represent it more exactly: and the ink was composed to suit the color of the faded pigment. Nothing equal to them had appeared in the world of letters. The Alexandrian manuscript is an article of such great curiosity, and the labor and expense bestowed on it is so truly honorable to the country which possesses it, that some further account of it may be looked for here by the intelligent reader. This celebrated manuscript, which had been revered as a treasure by the Greek church for several ages, was presented to king Charles I. by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Alexandria, and was transmitted to England by sir Thomas Roe, ambassador at the Ottoman Porte, in 1625. It was placed in the Royal Library at St. James's, whence it was subsequently removed to the national collection in the British Museum; of which it forms one of the glories. The writer of it is said to have been Thecla, an Egyptian lady, who lived early in the fourth century, and here ends our knowledge of her. She was, no doubt, a person of eminence, probably of consequence, since her copy is complete, as to its contents; though now bearing marks of accidents, to which it has been exposed. Its value is further enhanced, by observing, that whatever opinions in subsequent ages agitated the Christian world, they have had no influence on this copy; it neither omits, nor inserts, nor dismembers a word to accommodate a passage to such sentiments. It was not many removes distant from the originals, of which it is a transcript: the language was still spoken; and whatever ambiguities occurred, (as some will always occur in all writings,) they were then easily explained, and properly understood by the copyist; and the questions and verbal errors did not exist. It had not been long in England, before its value, as an important document in behalf of Christianity, became known. Mr. Patrick Young, the learned keeper of the king's library at that time, the Codex Bezae, and the Clement, the only copy known of the second of them; and was commanded by the king to publish them, which he did in 1633, with a Latin translation. Dr. Grabe, being commanded by queen Anne to publish the manuscript, communicated to the world, in 1707—1710, the Old Testament part of it: being the Septuagint translation. We have noticed Dr. Woide's New Testament in 1786. Some years afterwards, Mr. Baber, of the British Museum, published the book of Psalms, with equal accuracy; and in the year 1814, proposed to publish a fac-simile copy of the remaining parts, so that the whole will be before the world. The number of copies to be printed is two hundred and fifty; and the expense will be nearly eight thousand pounds, which has been voted by the British parliament.

Punctuation of the Bible.—The numerous mistakes of the Fathers, and their uncertainty how particular passages were to be read and understood, cantly prove that there was no regular or accustomed mode of punctuation in use in the fourth century. The punctuation in the text in use unquestionably of modern date, not being generally adopted earlier than the ninth century. It seems to have been a gradual improvement, commenced by Jerome and continued by succeeding critics. At the invention of printing, the editors placed the points arbitrarily, probably (Michaelis thinks) without bestowing the necessary attention; and Stephens in particular, it is well known, varied his points in every edition.

Division of the Bible into Verses.—On the death of Edward, when Mary came to the crown, many of the reformed fled into divers parts of Germany; some of them, who resided at Geneva, setting about a new translation of the Scriptures, in 1539, the New Testament was printed at Geneva, by Conradus Badius, and is said to be the first English Testament divided into verses. Whatever the antiquity of the Hebrew vowel points may be, the division of verses in the Old Testament is antecedent to the discovery of printing, and was first made in manuscripts that are not known to exist; but in the Greek manuscripts of the New Testament there is no distinction of verses, and the time when they were first used by printers is perhaps not very accurately ascertained. Robert Stephens is thought to have been the author or inventor of verses in the New Testament, which he is said to have performed during a journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons. Calmet says, "the first division of the New Testament was made by Robert Stephens in 1531, and of the whole Bible in 1533." Michaelis says, "verses were first used in the New Testament by Robert Stephens in 1531, and in the Old Testament by Hugo de St. Caro, a Dominican monk, in the twelfth century." But a Latin Bible, translated by Sanctus Pagninus, and printed at Lyons in 1537, before Robert Stephens had printed any Bible on his own account, is divided, the verses being numbered in the margin, and distinguished in the text by paragorical marks, both in the Old and New Testament, and in the Apocrypha. The books are, indeed, made into fewer divisions. Matthew's Gospel, for example, in this edition, is divided into 576 verses; whereas the present division amounts to 576. Golén notes this edition, but not the division of verses. There is reason to conclude, to which Robert Stephens had seen this Bible, perceived the utility of verses, and imitated and improved thereon. The great advantage of such a division is allowed by all who know the use of a concordance.

Editions of the Greek New Testament.—The first, in point of time, was that of Erasmus, with a new Latin translation, of which he published five editions—1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, and 1535. The edition of 1519 is the best extant. In fact, the editions of Erasmus, with a slight intermixture of the text in the Complutensian polyglot, are the principal editions from which almost all the subsequent copies have been taken. The next edition of the New Testament of printing that appeared was that of the Complutensian polyglot. The learned agree in wishing that the editors had described, or specified, the manuscripts they made use of. The editors speak highly of them; but this was when the number of known manuscripts is thought to have been increased. It was in its infancy; so that, without impeaching either the candor or their judgment, their assertions, in this respect, must be understood with much limitation. It has been charged on them, that they sometimes altered the Greek text, without the authority of a single manuscript, to make it conform to the Latin. But again, it is in use at the present day, and the editors have been defended by Geose, and Michaelis, and, to a certain extent, by Griesbach. For exquisite beauty and delicacy of type, elegance and proper disposition of contractions, smoothness and softness of paper, liquid clearness of ink, and evenness of lines and letters, the editions of Robert Stephens have never been surpassed, and, in the opinion of many, never equalled. There were four editions published by himself, in 1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551. His son published a fifth edition in 1559. The third of these is in folio, and has the readings of sixteen manuscripts in the margin. The first two are in 16mo; and of those, the first (1546) is the most correct. The first edition of Beza was printed in 1565; he principally followed the third edition of Robert Stephens. He printed other editions in 1588, 1589, 1598; but they do not contain, every where, the same text. In his choice of readings he is accused of being influenced by his Calvinistic sentiments. The celebrated edition of the Elzevirs was first published at Leyden in 1638. It was taken from the third edition of Robert Stephens: where it varies from that edition, it follows, generally, the edition of Beza. By this, the text, which had previously fluctuated, acquired a stability, it being generally followed in all subsequent editions. It has deservedly, therefore, obtained the appellation of editio recepta. The editors of it are unknown.

Editions with Various Readings.—The celebrated edition of Mill was published at Oxford in 1707, after an assiduous labor of thirty years. He inserted in his edition all the collections of various readings which had been made before his time; collected several original editions; procured extracts from Greek manuscripts, which had never been collated; and, in many instances, added readings from the ancient versions, and from the quotations in the works of the ancient Fathers. The whole of the various readings collected by him, is said, without any improbability, to amount to thirty thousand. He has enriched his work with learned prolegomena, and a clear and accurate description of his manuscripts. He took the third edition of Stephens for his text.

The edition of Bengel was published at Leyden in 1730. He prefixed to it his "Introductio in Orisin Novis Testamenti," and subjoined to it his "Apparatus Criticus et Epilogus." He altered the text, where he thought it might be improved; but, excepting the Apocalypse, studiously avoided inserting any reading not in some printed edition. Under the text he placed some select readings, reserving the whole collection of various readings, and his own sentiments upon them, for his Apparatus Criticus. He expressed his opinion of these marginal readings by the Greek letters α, β, γ, and δ.

But all former editions of the Greek Testament were surpassed by that of Weustein, which was published in two volumes folio, in 1731, at Amsterdam. He adopted for his text the Elzevir edition of the Greek Testament. His collection of various readings far surpasses that of Mill or Bengel, and his notes are particularly valuable, for the copious extracts he has made from rabbinical writers. These greatly serve to explain the idiom, and the various expressions used by the apostolic writers and evangelists.

The first edition of Griesbach's New Testament was published in 1775—1777, in two volumes octavo, at Halle, in Germany. In the year 1786, the first volume was reprinted, under the patronage and at the expense of his grace the duke of Grafton, having extracts from two hundred manuscripts, in addition to those contained in the former edition. He collated all the Latin versions published by Sabatier and Blanchini. His object was to give a select and choice collection of the various readings produced by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and of his own extracts; omitting all such as are trifling in themselves, supported by questionable authority, or evidently only errata. Griesbach's edition has been reprinted in England in a smaller form, for the use of schools; also in America. Knapp's Greek Testament is the textbook course, with the help of the German universities; and is gradually acquiring that authority, which, in all probability, will render it the general book of scholars, tutors, and the literati in general.

There are many other respectable editions of the Greek Testament; but those which we have mentioned are confessedly the principal. The study of Greek learning is at this time pursued with great ardor in the British empire; and English travellers take opportunities of obtaining copies of MSS. from abroad, which greatly increase the literary riches at home. England and America repay the obligation, by printing, or by contributing assistance in printing, the sacred books for all the world.

Portrayals of Portions of the Bible,—that is, Bibles published in several languages, or at least in three, of which the texts are ranged in different columns. Some polyglotts contain all the books of the Bible, others contain but a part. The following are the most remarkable:

1517.—The first polyglott is that of Complutum, or Alcala. It is divided into six parts, and comprised in four volumes folio. It has the Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, in three distinct columns; the Chaldee parallel, with the Latin in the bottom of the page, and the margin is filled with the Hebrew and Chaldee radicals. The fourth volume contains the Greek Testament, with no other translation than the Latin. The expense of the work, which, it is said, amounted to fifty thousand dollars, was wholly paid by cardinal Ximenes, of Spain. It is certain, that the cardinal spared no expense in collecting manuscripts; but whether he had any that were truly valuable has been much doubted. In 1714, when professor Birch was engaged in his edition of the Bible, professor Moldenhawer went to Alcala, for the purpose of discovering the manuscripts used in the Ximenes polyglott. After much inquiry, he ascertained, that about thirty-five years before, they had been sold to a money-maker, of the name of Torno. But this is now doubted.

1518.—The Bible of Justinian, bishop of Necho, of the order of St. Dominie, in five languages; Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and Arabic. Only the Psalter was printed.

1546.—John Potken, provost of the collegiate church of St. George, at Cologne, caused the Psalter to be printed in four languages; Hebrew, Greek, Chaldee, or rather Ethiopic, and Latin.

1546.—The Jews of Constantinople printed the Pentateuch, in Hebrew, Chaldee, Persian, and Arabic, with the Commentaries of Solomon Jarchi.

1517.—The same Jews caused also to be printed, the Pentateuch, in four languages; Hebrew, Chaldee, vulgar Greek, and Spanish.

1555.—John Dorentius, of Carlstadt in Franconia, published an edition of the Psalter, the Proverbs of Solomon, and the prophets Micah and Joel, in five languages; Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and German. The death of the author prevented the completion of this work.

1572.—The first edition of Antwerp was printed in that city in 1569—1572, in eight volumes folio, under the direction of Arias Montanus. It contains, beside the whole of the Complutensian edition, a Chaldee paraphrase of part of the Old Testament, which cardinal Ximenes, having particular reasons for not publishing, had deposited in the theological library at Complutum. The New Testament has the Syriac version, and the Latin translation of Pagninus, as revised by Montanus.

1589.—There appeared at Heidelberg an edition of the books of the Old Testament, in Hebrew and Greek, with two Latin versions; one by Jerome, and the other by Sanctes Pagninus, ranged in four columns, at the bottom of which were notes ascribed to Vatablus. It obtained the name of the polyglott Bible of Vatablus. This book is rare, but held in little estimation.

1596.—David Wolder, a Lutheran minister at Hamburg, caused to be printed, by James Lucas, a Bible in three columns; Greek, Latin, and German.

1599.—Elias Hutter, a German, printed several polyglotts. The first is in six languages, printed at Nuremberg.—There were only printed the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth; in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and the German of Luther: the sixth language varied according to what nation the copies were designed for. Some had the Slavonian version, of the edition of Wittemberg; others the French, of Geneva; others the Italian, of Padua; others the Saxo, from the German of Luther. This work is very rare. Hutter also published the Psalter and the New Testament, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German. But his chief work is the New Testament, in twelve languages; Syriac, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, Spanish, French, Latin, German, Bohemian, English, Danish, and Polish. This polyglott was printed at Nuremberg, in two volumes, folio; and in four volumes, quarto. It has a critical value.

1615.—The Bible of M. le Jay, in seven languages, was printed at Paris by Anthony Vitre, in ten volumes, large folio. It contains the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, Greek, Syriac, Latin, and Arabic. He followed the Greek version printed at Antwerp, also the Chaldee and Latin. The Hebrew text is extremely inaccurate, but it is, nevertheless, the most beautiful polyglott extant.

1657.—Less beautiful, but more accurate, and comprehending more than any of the preceding polyglotts, is that of London, edited by Dr. Bryan Walton, and printed in 1653—1657, in six volumes, to which the Lexicon Heptaglottum of Castell, in two volumes folio, is usually added. This edition of the Scriptures contains learned prolegomena, and several other treatises, new oriental versions, and a very large collection of various readings. Twelve copies were printed on large paper: one, of great beauty, is in the library of St. Paul's cathedral; another was in that of the count de Lauragnis; and another is in the library of St. John's college, Cambridge. It is said to have been the first book printed by subscription in England. Dr. Walton had leave from Cromwell to import his paper duty free.

1651.—Most of the polyglotts we have noticed are of great rarity, and, bearing a high price, are to be found only, or chiefly, in public libraries, and in those of the curios. It gives us much pleasure, therefore, to be able to add to this list another work of the same class, which has been published by Mr. Bagster, of London, at a price which places it within the reach of all who desire to possess themselves of a correct and literal understanding of the interpretation of Scripture. It is published in folio, exhibiting, at one view, the Old Testament in Hebrew, Greek, English, Latin, Spanish, Italian, French, and German. The Hebrew text is from Vander Hooght, with the Keri, and the Sam. Pentateuch, from Kennicot's edition; the Greek from Bos, with the readings of Grabe; the Vulgate from the edition of Clement VIII.; the Spanish from Padre Scio; the Italian from Diodati; the French from Oestervald; the German from Luther. The New Testament embraces the same languages, excepting the Hebrew, the place of which is occupied by the Portuguese; the Greek is the text of Mill, with Griesbach's readings. It also contains the Peshito Syriac translation, with the Epistles and Apocalypse from the Philoxenian version. Each language is published in a separate form in small octavo.

The two last-mentioned editions have made a noble addition to the materials for studying Holy Scripture, and the learned are daily augmenting this assistance, by collations of ancient versions, with their various readings; which may be esteemed as so many polyglots.

Every person, to whom the sacred writings are dear, must wish them edited in the most perfect manner. It would reflect disgrace on the learned of the Christian world, that any pagan author should be published in a more perfect manner than the word of God. An Englishman must view with pleasure the useful and magnificent exertions of his countrymen in this respect. Bishop Walton's polyglot ranks first in that noble and costly class of publications; foreign countries can show nothing equal to Dr. KEMPIS and Dr. BRADLOP's, or similis, D. Wolde's edition of the Codex Alexandrinus, D. Kipling's edition of the Codex Bezae, or Dr. Holmes and Mr. Parson's edition of the Septuagint.

Where the word of God is concerned, the greatest moderation should be used; and care should be taken, that the alterations made are expressed accurately, and in such terms as prevent improper conclusions being drawn from them. Where the number of the various readings is mentioned before persons, it is in any work, likely to have a general circulation, it should be added, that their importance is rather of a literary than a religious kind; and that, whether considered collectively or individually, they do not affect the genuineness of the text, or the substance of its history or doctrine. The improvements, which proposed alterations are thought to make, should not be exaggerated; it should be remarked, that alterations of that description are confessedly few; and that none of those affect the gospel as a history, as a rule of faith, or as a body of morality. Conjectural emendations should be restrained, and always be resisted.

English Translations of the Bible.—We proceed now to a subject of particular interest to us, which is, the history of our English translations. It would be very difficult to ascertain every English translator, or when the Scriptures were first translated into the language of this country. That the Saxons rendered the Bible in their own language, is an opinion well authenticated; some parts, at least, having been translated by Adelhelm, bishop of Sherborne, Eadfrid, (or Ecbert,) bishop of Lindisfarne, the venerable Bede, and king Alfred. ÆLfric, abbot of Malmesbury, translated the Pentateuch, Judges, and Job,—which were printed at Oxford in the year 1329,—as he tells us in the translation. Saxen, an ancient Saxon MS. now in the Bodleian library, in 1571, under the care of the martyrlogist John Fox, assisted and encouraged by Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury. It would appear that the Saxons had more than one translation, of parts at least, of the Bible among them; though no version particularly sanctioned by public authority. They had also glosses and comments. Besides these early versions, several parts of the Scriptures had been from time to time translated by different persons; proofs of which, if not the very translations themselves, exist in different libraries of Great Britain. In particular, in 1349, the Psalms were translated by Richard Rolle, a hermit of Hampole in Yorkshire; and in the Harleian and the king's libraries, are specimens of other and different versions. Soon afterwards John Wycliff translated the New Testament, several copies of which are in different libraries, both public and private, though with some degree of variation. In 1496, it was issued in folio, with a glossary, under the care of the Rev. John Lewis, minister of Margate, and chaplain to Lord Maiton, and again, in 1516, in quarto, by the Rev. Mr. Baker.

In 1556, William Tyndal printed the first edition of his New Testament, at Antwerp, in octavo, without a name, with an epistle at the end, wherein he desired them that were learned to amend if such were found amiss. This edition is very scarce; for soon after its appearance, the bishop of London, being at Antwerp, desired an English merchant to buy up all the copies that remained unsold, which, with many other books, were burned at Paul's Cross. This Dr. Jordan thinks was done by the bishop to serve Tyndal, which it certainly did. It was printed in folio, with a glossary, under the care of the Rev. John Lewis, minister of Margate, and chaplain to Lord Maiton, and again, in 1516, in quarto, by the Rev. Mr. Baker.

be so far a new translation, is most probable. Fuller presumes, that he translated the Old Testament from the Latin, as his friends allowed that he had no skill in Hebrew: but in this Fuller might be mistaken. He finished his translation of the Pentatuch in the year 1538; but, going by sea to Ham-burgh, he suffered shipwreck, with the loss of all his books, papers, etc. so that he was obliged to begin the whole again. Tyndal himself, in a letter to John Frith, written January, 1553, says, "I call God to record, against the day we shall appear before our Lord Jesus, to give a reckoning of our doings, that I never altered one syllable of God's word against my conscience; nor would do this day,
if all that is in earth, whether it be honor, pleasure,
or riches, might be given me. Moreover, I take God to witness to my conscience, that I desire of God to myself in this world, no more than that without which I cannot keep his laws." It appears, however, that the king, in pursuance of his own settled judgment, thinking much good might come from people reading the New Testament with reverence and following it, commanded the bishops to call to them the most learned of the two universities, and to cause a new translation to be made; but nothing being done, the people still read and studied Tyndal's. It was therefore determined to get rid of so dangerous a heretic; and the king and council employed one Henry Philips, who insinuated himself into the acquaintance of Tyndal, and of Pointz,
an English merchant, at whose house he lodged:
and at a certain Sermon, at the Court, of the Procutor-general of the emperor's court to seize on Tyndal, by whom he was brought to Vilvorde, about 18 miles from Antwerp. After being imprisoned
a year and a half, notwithstanding letters in his favor from secretary Cromwell, and others to the court at Brussels, he was tried, and none of his reasons in his defence being admitted, he was condemned, by virtue of the emperor's decree, made in the assembly at Augsburgh, in the year 1536. Being brought to the place of execution, he was first strangled, calling out in his last moments, "Lord, open the king of England's eye!"—and then he was burned.
Thus died William Tyndal, with this testimony to his character given him by the emperor's procurator or attorney-general, that for his adversity
he was " homo doctus, pia, et bonus;" and others, who conversed with him in the castle, reported of him, that "if he were not a good Christian man, they could not tell whom to trust."
The first English Bible, or an English translation of the Scriptures, printed, was that by Myles Coverdale, the first edition of which bears date 1535. It was dedicated to Henry VIII. and is printed in folio.
A copy is in the British Museum. In bishop Cover-dale's Bible we meet with the following judicious remark, which shows the very respectable knowledge and temper of that great man. "Now whereas the most famous interpreters of all gave sondry judgements on the texte, (so far as it is done by the spirtue of knowledge in the holy Gooste,) methynke
no man should be offended thereby, for they refere deynys in mekenys to the spirtue of truyth in the congregation of God: and sure I am, that there commeth more knowledge and understondeinges of the Scripture by their sondry translacions, than by all the glasses of our sophishticall doctors. For that one interpreteth somtyme obscurely in one place, the same translacion another (or els he himself) more manifestly by a more playne vocable of the same meaning in another place." More than convention care seems to have been taken by Coverdale in the language of his translation. We have some instances of barbarism, but they are very few, and none which are not authorized by the purest writers of the times in which he wrote. To him, and to other translators of the Scriptures, especially of the present authorized version, our language owes, perhaps, more than to all the authors who have written since: and even though some of the expressions may appear uncouth, their fewness renders them in-offensive; they are never vulgar; they preserve their ancient simplicity pure and undefiled; and, in their circumstance and connection, perhaps but seld om could be exchanged for the better. Nor will this opinion be condemned when it is considered, that that elegant writer and learned prelate, bishop Lowth, has constantly used the words where he has not differed from the translation; and whenever amendments have been intended in the language of the Scriptures, if we have gained any thing in elegance, we have almost assuredly lost in dignity.
At the convocation (1536), probably the clergy agreed on a petition to the king, that he would be graciously pleased to grant unto the laity the reading of the Bible in the English tongue; and that a new translation might be made for that purpose; and soon after injunctions were issued to the clergy by the authority of the king's highness, the seventh article of which commands,—"That every person or proprietary of any parish church within this realm, att this great feast of St. Peter ad Vincula, (Aug. 1)
next coming, provide a book of the whole Bible, both in Latin and also in English, and lay the same in the quire for every man that will look thereon:
and shall discourage no man from the reading any part of the Bible, either in Latin or English; but rather comfort, exhort, and admonish every man to read the same, as the very word of God, and the spiritual food of man's soul; whereby they may better know their duties to God, to the sovereign lord the king, and their neighbor; ever gently and charitably exhorting them, that using a sober and modest behavior in the reading and inquisition of the true sense of the same, they do in no wise stifly or eagerly contend or strive one with another about the same, but refer the declaration of those places that be in controversy to the judgment of them that be learned."

The first edition of Matthew's Bible generally known, was printed in the year 1537. The name of Thomas Matthew has been proposed by the usual editor, John Rogers, from motives of prudence or fear; for although no clamar was raised against Myles Coverdale for his translation, the name of Tyndal was exceedingly odious to the clergy; and much trouble might reasonably have been expected from an acknowledged republication of his translation. "None will deny, says Fuller, but that many faults needing amendment are found in the (Tyndal's)
translation, which is no wonder to those who consider; first, such an undertaking was not the task of a man, but men. Secondly, no great design is invented and perfected at once. Thirdly, Tyndal, being an exile, wanted many necessary accommodations.
Fourthly, his skill in Hebrew was not considerable:
yes, generally, learning in languages were then but in the infancy thereof. Fifthly, our English tongue was not improved to that expressiveness whereat, at this day, it is arrived. However, what he undertook,
was to be admired as glorious; what he performed,
to be commended as profitable; wherein he failed, is to be excused as pardonable, and to be scored on the account rather of that age, than of the author himself. Yes, Tyndal's pains were useful, had his translations done no other good than to help towards the making of a better Bible. There were many better, but one in express charge from king James to consult the translation of Tyndal. Matthew's Bible is composed partly from Tyndal's and partly from Coverdale's translations, with some alterations; taking Tyndal's New Testament, and such parts of the Old as were translated by him, except that the prophecy of Jonah is of Coverdale's translation; neither is Tyndal's prefix prefixed to Jonah, or any other prefixe inserted, except to the Romans, in that which is supposed to be the first edition. Sundry alterations are made from Coverdale, and some have been of opinion, that it was a new work undertaken by Coverdale, Tyndal, and Rogers, and that the latter translated the Apocrypha; but Mr. Lewis thinks that Coverdale had none to assist him in his translation, and that he was not concerned in that called Matthew's, but only John Rogers, who made a few alterations, but not a new translation. Grafton was called to an account for printing Matthew's Bible, 1537, and explained his intention to set to it; to which he replied, "that he added none to the Bible he printed, when he perceived the king and the clergy not willing to have any." Yet he was confined a prisoner in the Fleet six weeks, and then released, on being bound in a bond of £300, neither to imprint nor sell any more English Bibles, till the king and clergy should agree on a translation.

In the year 1538, Grafton and Whitchurch had obtained permission of Henry VIII. to print the Bible at Paris; but when the work was nearly finished, by an order of the Inquisition, dated the 17th of December the same year, the printers were inhibited, under canonical pains, to proceed; and the whole impression of two thousand five hundred copies was seized and confiscated. By the encouragement of the lord Cromwell, however, some Englishmen returned to Paris, recovered the presses, types, etc. and brought them to London, where the work was resumed; and when it was finished, on being bound in a book called Cranmer's Bible, on account of the preface, which was written by the archbishop. In this, the translations of Coverdale and Matthew seem to have been revised and corrected. The Psalms are those now used in the liturgy of the established church. There are several editions of this Bible; in particular, one in 1541, under the care of Tonstal, bishop of Durham, and Heath, bishop of Rochester; and another, printed at Rouen, at the charge of Richard Caramdlen, 1536.

In November, 1539, the king appointed lord Cromwell to take special care and charge that no manner of person or persons should print any Bible in the English tongue during the space of five years, but only such as shall be deputed, assigned, and admitted by the said lord Cromwell: it is not improbable but this might have been done in favor of Taverner's Bible, which appeared at this time: Balo calls it, Sacrorum recognitio, seu potius nova; but Mr. Lewis says, that it is neither a bare revivis a correct edition of the English Bible; nor yet strictly a new version, but between both; it is, what may be called, a correction of Matthew's Bible, wherever the editor thought it needful. He takes in a great part of Matthew's marginal notes, but omits several, and inserts others of his own.

In the convocation held February 6, 1542, the archbishop, in the king's name, required the bishops and clergy to revise the translation of the Scriptures; and for that purpose different parts of the New Testament were put into the hands of several bishops for their inspection. We have a list of the alterations, and the prefaces, and bishop Gardiner read a list of ninety-nine Latin words, which he said would not admit of being translated into English. By this it was found that this motion or translation would come to nothing; and a determination of the king, to wrest the work from the bishops, and place it in the hands of the universities, seems to have had a similar fate; for the next year an act was passed which condemned Tyndal's translation as crafty, false, and untrue; and enacted, that all books of the Old and New Testament of his translation should, by authority of this act, be abolished, extinguished, and forbidden to be kept and used in this realm, or elsewhere in his majesty's dominions. But it was provided, that the Bibles and New Testaments in English, not being of Tyndal's translation, should stand in force, and not be comprised in this abolition or act. Nevertheless, if there should be found in ane such Bibles or New Testamentes anio annotations or preambles, that then the owners of the same should cut out or blot the same in such wise as they cannot be perceived or read, on pain of losing or forfeiting for every Bible, etc. 40s. Provided, that this article should not extend to the blotting any quotations or summaries of chapters in any Bibles. It was likewise enacted, "That no manner of person or persons after the first day of October, the next ensuing, shall take upon him or them to read openly to any in another church or open assembly, within any of the king's dominions, the Bible or any part of the Scriptures in English, unless he was so appointed thereunto by the king, or any ordinary, on pain of suffering a month's imprisonment. Provided, that the chancellor of England, captaines of the warres, the king's justices, the recorders of any city or town, the speaker of the parliament, etc. which heretofore have been accustomed to declare or teach any good, vertuous, or godly exhortations in anie assemblies, may use any part of the Bible or holy Scriptures as the same are translated into English. It was also enacted, that a man and gentleman, being a householder, may read, or cause to be read by any of his familiers servants in his house, orchesdras, or garden, and to his own familie, anie texte of the Bible or New Testament, and also every chapter of the Scriptures by heart, and to any other persons other than women, prentisess, &c. might read to themselves privately the Bible. But no woman, (except noblewomen and gentlewomen, who might read to themselves alone, and not to others, any texts of the Bible,) nor artificers, prentises, journeymen, serving-men of the degrees of women or under, husbandmen, or laborers, were to read the Bible or New Testament in English to himself, or any other, privately or openly, upon pains of one month's imprisonment. When we read enactments like these, and contrast such hindrances to the spread of sacred knowledge with the present state of religious liberty, public and private, what intense sensations of gratitude to the Divine Author of this holy book should fill the mind of every Christian! Another act was passed, July 8, 1546, whereby the having and reading of Tyndal's and Coverdale's translations were prohibited, as well as the use of any other than what was allowed by act of parliament.
In this state matters continued so long as Henry VIII. lived; but on the accession of his son Edward VI. (1547) they took another turn; the reformation being encouraged, and the acts which prohibited the translation of the Scriptures being repealed. Indulgences were issued, and sent into every part of the kingdom, among other things enjoining, that within three months a Bible of the larger volume in English, and within twelve months Erasmus's Paraphrase on the Gospels, be provided, and conveniently placed in the churches for the people to read in.

The reign of queen Mary was too unfavorable for any translation of the Scriptures to be printed in England; and, except the Geneva Testament, we meet with nothing but a quarto primer, Latin and English, according to the use of Sarum, with the epistles and gospels in English, printed by John Kingston and Henry Sutton, 1557. Bishop Coverdale, being compelled to leave England, during the reign of Mary, took up his residence principally at Geneva, where he engaged with some Protestant refugees in a new version of the Scriptures, from the Hebrew and Greek languages, with notes; called from the place, the Geneva Bible. That which was done in this Bible was as follows:—(1.) Because some translations read after one sort and some after another, they noted in the margin the diversities of speech and reading, especially according to the Hebrew. (2.) Where the Hebrew speech seemed hardly to agree with ours, they noted in the margin, using that which was more intelligible. (3.) Though many of the Hebrew names were altered from the old text, and restored to the true writing, and first original, yet in the usual names, little was changed, for fear of troubling the simple readers. (4.) Where the necessity of the sentence required any thing to be added, whether verb or other word, they put it in the text with another kind of letter, that it might easily be discerned from the common letter of the text. (5.) As touching the division of the verses, they followed the Hebrew examples, adding the number to each verse. (6.) The principal matters were noted; and the arguments, both for each book and for each chapter. (7.) They set over the head of every page some notable word, or sentence, for the help of memory. (8.) They set brief annotations upon all the hard places, as well for the understanding of obscure words, as for declaration of the true sense in difficult places; and thus divided and put the commentaries; and had much conference with godly and learned brethren. (9.) They set forth with figures certain places in the books of Moses, of the Kings, and Ezekiel, which seemed so dark, that by no other description they could be made easy to the reader. (10.) They added certain maps of geography, of divers places and countries, partly described, and partly by occasion touched, both in the Old and New Testament. (11.) They adjointed two profitable tables: the one of interpretations of Hebrew names, and the other containing all the chief and principal matters of the whole Bible. The New Testament was published in 1557, and the whole Bible in 1560.

In the first parliament of queen Elizabeth, held January, 1558, an act passed for restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state, ecclesiastical and spiritual; and another for the uniformity of common prayer, and service in the church. The queen also appointed a royal visitation, and gave her sanction to all the former acts of a certain religious authority, by which it was ordered, as in the reign of Edward VI. that they should, at the charge of the parish, within three months, provide one book of the whole Bible, of the largest volume in English; and within twelve months, the Paraphrase of Erasmus. The following year the Liturgy was reviewed, and altered in some passages; and, being presented to parliament, was by that authority received and established. And, soon after, a design was formed to make a new translation of the Scriptures, under the direction of archbishop Parker; which, however, was not printed before the year 1568, when it first appeared in folio. This is called the Bishops' Bible. The work was divided into several parcels, and assigned to men of learning and character, selected for the purpose. Arch bishop Parker had the chief direction of the affair, reviewed the performance, and gave the finishing hand to it. He employed several critics in the Hebrew and Greek languages to review the old translation, and compare it with the original. There is a peculiarity observable in the Psalms of this translation, for which there seems no apparent reason, viz. the word,

In 1569, the second volume of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, printed at Demy, which called the Demy Bible. Both these have been reprinted several times; but an edition in five volumes, 1750, is much improved in point of language, especially from the Demy, which is in many instances very obscure. The translators were William Allen, Henry Holland, George Martin, and Richard Bristol. The notes were by Dr. Worthington. In 1582, the New Testament translated into the English tongue at Rheims, was printed; twenty-seven years after, in 1608, appeared the first volume; in 1610, the second volume of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, printed at Demy, which called the Demy Bible. Both these have been reprinted several times; but an edition in five volumes, 1750, is much improved in point of language, especially from the Demy, which is in many instances very obscure. The translators were William Allen, Henry Holland, George Martin, and Richard Bristol. The notes were by Dr. Worthington. Le Long says, the New Testament was principally translated by William Raynal, or Reynolds. Day. The first volume of the Old Testament was published in 1557, and the whole Bible in 1560. The second volume of the Old Testament was published in 1557, and the whole Bible in 1560.
astical preferment; and, also, to inform themselves of all persons in their respective dioceses, who understood the Hebrew and Greek languages, and had studied the Scriptures in their original tongues, exhorting them to send the results of their private studies to Mr. Lively, Hebrew reader at Cambridge, Dr. Harding, Hebrew reader at Oxford, or Dr. Andrews, dean of Westminster, "that so our said intended translation may have the help and furtherance of all our principal learned men within this our kingdom." Fuller's list of the translators amounts to forty-seven, which number was ranged under six divisions. The names of the persons, the places where they met, together with the portions of Scripture assigned to each company, are as follows:—

Ten at Westminster. The Pentateuch; the history, from Joshua to the first book of the Chronicles, exclusively. Dr. Andrews, afterwards bishop of Winchester; Dr. Overall, afterwards bishop of Norwich; Dr. Saravia, prebendary of Canterbury; Dr. Clarke, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge; Dr. Laidfield, fellow of Trinity, Cambridge—being skilled in architecture, his judgment was much relied on for the description of the tabernacle and temple; Dr. Leigh, archdeacon of Middlesex; Mr. Burgley; Mr. King; Mr. Tompson; Mr. Bedwell, of Cambridge.

Eight at Cambridge. From the first of Chronicles, with the rest of the history, and the Hagiography, viz. Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes. Mr. Lively; Mr. Richardson, fellow of Emmanuel; Mr. Chadderton; Mr. Dillingham, fellow of Christ college; Mr. Andrews, afterwards master of Jesus college; Mr. Harrison, the Rev. vice-master of Trinity college; Mr. Spalding, fellow of St. John's, Cambridge, and Hebrew professor there; Mr. Bing, fellow of Peter-house, Cambridge, and Hebrew professor there.

Seven at Oxford. The four greater prophets, with the Lamentations, and the twelve lesser prophets. Dr. Harding, president of Magdalen college; Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi college; Dr. Holland, rector of Exeter college, Regius professor; Dr. Kilby, rector of Lincoln college, and Regius professor; Mr. Smith, afterwards bishop of Gloucester, who composed the learned and religious preface to the translation; Mr. Brett; Mr. Fairclow.

Cambridge. The prayer of Manasseh, and the rest of the Apocrypha. Dr. Duport, prebendary of Ely, and master of Jesus college; Dr. Brainthwait, afterwards master of Gonville, and Caius college; Dr. Radcliffe, a senior fellow of Trinity college; Mr. Ward, afterwards D. D. and Margaret professor; Mr. Downes, fellow of St. John's, and Greek professor; Mr. Boyse, fellow of St. John's; Mr. Ward, of King's college, afterwards D. D. prebendary of Chichester.

Oxford. The four Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and Apocalypse. Dr. Ravis, afterwards bishop of London; Dr. Abbott, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. Eedes (instead of whom Lewis has James Montague, bishop of Bath and Wells); Mr. Thompson; Mr. Savill; Dr. Pryn; Dr. Ravens; Mr. Harmer.

Westminster. The Epistles of St. Paul, and the other canonical Epistles. Dr. Barlowe, afterwards bishop of Lincoln; Dr. Hutchesson; Dr. Spencer; Mr. Fenton; Mr. Rabett; Mr. Sanderson; Mr. Iukins.

And that they might proceed to the best advantage in their method and management, the king suggested the instructions following:—(1) The Bible read in the church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, was to receive as few alterations as might be, and to pass throughout, unless the original called plainly for an amendment.—(2) The names of the prophets and the inspired writers, with the other names in the text, to be kept so near as may be as they stand recommended at present by customary use.—(3) The old ecclesiastical words to be retained. For instance, the word church not to be translated congregation, &c.—(4) When any word has several significations, that which has been commonly used by the most celebrated Fathers should be preferred; provided it be agreeable to the context, and the analogy of faith.—(5) As to the chapters, they were to continue in their present division, but not be altered without apparent necessity.—(6) The margin not to be charged with any notes, excepting for the explanation of those Hebrew or Greek words, which cannot be turned without some circumlocution; and, therefore, not so proper to be inserted in the text.—(7) The margin to be furnished with such citations as serve for a reference of one place of Scripture to another.—(8) Every member of each division to take the chapters assigned for the whole company; and after having gone through the version or corrections, all the division was to meet, examine their respective performances, and come to a resolution which parts of them should stand.—(9) When any division had finished a book in this manner, they were to transmit it to the rest to be further considered.—(10) If any of the respective divisions should doubt or dissent upon the review of the book transmitted, they were to mark the places, and send back the reasons of their disagreement; if they happened to differ about the amendments, the dispute was to be referred to a general committee, consisting of the best distinguished persons drawn out of each division. However, this decision was not to be made till they had gone through the work.—(11) When any place was remarkably obscure, letters were to be directed by authority to the most learned persons in the universities, or country, for their judgment upon the text.—(12) The directors in each company were to be the deans of Westminster and Chelsea, and the keeper of the Hebrew and Greek in each university.—(13) The translators of Tyndal, Matthew, Coverdale, Whitechurch, and Geneva, to be used when they came closer to the original than the Bishops' Bible.—Leatly, Three and a half years from this beginning, each of the universities, though not of the number of the translators, were to be assigned by the vice-chancellor, to consult with other heads of houses for reviewing the whole translation.

Almost three years were spent in this service, the entering on which was somewhat delayed by Mr. Edward Lively's death. The whole work being finished, and three copies of the whole Bible sent to London, viz. one from Cambridge, a second from Oxford, and a third from Westminster, a new choice was made of two out of each company, six in all, to review the whole work and revise it, and extract one out of all the three copies, to be committed to the press. They went daily to Stationers' Hall, and in three quarters of a year fulfilled their task. Last of all, Bilsen, bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Myles Smith, who, from the beginning, had been very active in the affair, reviewed the whole work, and prefixed arguments to the several books; and Dr.
Smith, who, for his indefatigable pains taken in this work, was soon after the printing of it deservedly made bishop of Gloucester, was ordered to write a preface to it, the same which is now printed in the folio editions of the Bible. This translation was first printed in 1611, in black letter. The title-page in the Old Testament is a copper-plate, with an emblematical border, engraved by Boel. The title of the New Testament is in a border cut in wood, with heads of the twelve apostles, tents of the tribes, &c. In 1612, a quarto edition was printed on Roman type, with an engraved title, copied from the folio, by Jasper Isaac.

Marginal References. —In 1664, John Canne, a leader of the English Brownists at Amsterdam, published a Bible of the present translation in octavo, with many marginal references. Dr. Blayney examined those for his edition of the Oxford Bible, in 1730.

In 1677, a Bible was printed by Hayes, at Cambridge, with many references added to the first edition; and in 1678, one was printed at Cambridge with many more references, the labor of Dr. Scattergood, rector of Wilwick and Elverton, in Northamptonshire. In 1678, too, the C Thes. Sacri. Several editions of this Bible were printed. In 1689, a new edition of the royal Bible, in quarto, was printed at London, with a great addition of parallel texts; and a new chronological index, by Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Lloyd, bishop of Worcester. This has been many times reprinted. It is not to be understood that archbishop Tenison and bishop Lloyd were concerned in the printing or editing of this Bible, further than furnishing the additional parallels and new tables; having no superintendence of the press; and this it is but justice to their memories to declare; for the first edition was so full of typographical errors, that a complaint was exhibited against the printers by the clergy of the lower house of convocation.

The progressive but very considerable increase of parallels from the first edition, by different editors, will appear by the following scale.

Mr. Purver's translation of the Bible was published in 1764, in two volumes folio; he afterwards revised the whole, and made considerable alterations and corrections for a second edition, which, however, has not yet been published; but the MS. remains in the possession of his grandson, John Purver Bell.

Concordances to the Bible — are of two kinds; concordances of words, and concordances of parallel passages. Of the former class, those of Creeden and Butteryworth are by far the best—Creeden's is the standard book; and of the latter, Cruyveil and Baguer take the precedence. These concordances of parallels, however, have been in a great measure superceded by a later published work, entitled, "Scientia Biblica, containing a copious collection of parallel passages for the illustration of the New Testament, printed in words at length." This valuable work will, it is hoped, be extended to the whole of the Scriptures. It is extremely useful to the biblical student. For the Hebrew Bible, Dr. Taylor's concordance is the most extensive, but the price being very high, Buxtorf's may be substituted with great advantage. For the Septuagint, the concordances of Tranchant, of Fleury, and of a number of others must be consulted. For the Greek New Testament, Schmidius and Dr. Williams.

Concluding Remarks. — Thus we have endeavored to set before the reader such a history of the Bible as may answer most of the principal questions usually asked on the subject. The length of the article must be justified by its importance. There are many collateral inquiries which might be entered into; but a hint must suffice. Let us admire the providence of God, which first caused the preservation of two copies, the Samaritan and the Jewish; then translations into several languages, which may be regarded as so many copies, and especially the Greek translation, because we have many helps among our classical studies for acquiring a competent intimacy with this language. Nor let us withhold the acknowledgments of our most weighty obligations to our predecessors in Britain; whose labors have transmitted their names to their religious posterity, and to the religious world at large, with immortal honor. We are not without a creditable tradition of our own; from faults, would be to speak of them as more than men; nevertheless, let no one despise their performance, till he has qualified himself to undertake such another, and then, two pages of translation, attempted by himself, will make him fully sensible of the advantages we receive from those who sustained that labor before us. But after acknowledging that much has been done, we must also admit that much remains to be done; and we take this opportunity of suggesting a few brief hints on the subject, which is confessedly of great importance.

It is not to be denied, that a translation of Holy Scripture, if undertaken in the present day, would have many advantages superior to those which attended King James's translators. The knowledge of knowledge is much improved, by the labors of learned men, in the succeeding interval of time; and, without determining whether religious knowledge be improved or injured, by what variations in opinion have been since the publication of it, it is easy to demonstrate that the present state ofbibl} graphical knowledge is much more correct, as well as extensive; that the knowledge of natural history and of natural philosophy, of the customs, manners, modes of thinking, and turns of expression, among the orientals, and among any other remote or obscure subjects, are much better understood at present than they were formerly, and these are always of consequence, and occasionally of the utmost importance for conveying the true meaning of many passages of Scripture. The principles of general science, also, are more widely diffused than they formerly were among students professedly attached to divinity; and we may observe, with confidence, that knowledge limited to divinity, or the principles which lead to salvation, though drawn from the Bible itself, however indispensable, absolutely indispensable, it may be, is not sufficient to enable any one to understand, so far as correctly to translate the Bible, which furnishes it; because, though the chief, and to use every way the most important, intention of the Bible is, to make men wise to salvation, yet there are in it, and connected with it, so many collateral circumstances, so many incidents, observations, and notices of various kinds, that if these be neglected, or ill-performed, or misunderstood, and consequently misrepresented, not only is Scripture injured by such mistakes, but...

a stumbling-block is put in the way of those more enlightened readers, who, when they observe these errors, may be too apt, on their account, to reject the whole work in which they are found. By detecting blemishes, which need little beyond bare inspection to be detected, they may conceive that contentment for the sacred writings, which, under a favorable and correct version, never would have entered their minds. We ought also to remark, that our language has undergone some changes in the course of two centuries, by which it has varied from being precisely the same as when our translators wrote. Many words which were then polite and elegant, are now vulgar, to say the least; and some, perhaps, which were perfectly correct or innocent at the period when those learned men employed them, we can now not indelicate. Other words also which were, more or less, equivocal or ambiguous in the days of James, are now settled to a decisive and certain meaning; if that meaning be what our translators had in view, no harm ensues; but if it be contrary to their intention, the fault lies not in the original translators, but in the later application of the language. And this is more noticeable still, in words which have changed their import, (as some have,) and are now used in senses contrary to what our forefathers annexed to them. Nor can we refrain from complaining also of the negligent manner in which the press has been conducted in all our public editions; what should be printed in poetry is set as prose; what should be marked as a quotation, or a speech, reads like common narration; and if the nature of the original language allowed of sudden and rapid transitions without falsification or confusion, (which perhaps were not so frequent in the original as it is said,) yet, in a translation, these are very often causes of great apparent perplexity. And this perplexity is occasionally increased by improper divisions of chapters and verses, which too often separate immediate connection. It is much more easy to notice these and other obstacles to perfection, in our public version, than it is to prevent them, or to provide against them in future translations. Whether the difficulty of removing them entirely be sufficient to justify the suspicion of very attentive perusal, we do not determine. Undoubtedly, the present version is sufficient to all purposes of piety; and our observations rather refer to the finishing of the already extant superstructure, than to laying new foundations for an entirely new edifice; or rather, perhaps, to the removal of some Gothic peculiarities, which disfigure the appearance of the edifice, and which at least are unpleasant to beholders, although they be not dangerous to the stability of the building.

We ought not to pass over without applause the labors of those learned men, who, by translating portions of Scripture, have greatly facilitated the undertaking of a version entirely new and complete, whenever that shall be thought proper to be done. In fact, it seems to be one previous condition necessary to the success of so extensive a design, that every part of the sacred volume shall have been critically examined, carefully rendered, and its true meaning given by individual study, before a general revision of the whole should be undertaken and adopted; because, such versions having been submitted to the opinion of capable judges long before the text is definitively settled, and having been subject to the investigation and correction of numerous readers among the learned, their merits are more likely to be fairly appreciated, and to be established or rejected, than by a smaller number of judges, though such may be very competent; or on the spur of an occasion, when the magnitude of the subject; or from wishing to discourage even the humblest endeavors which may have the illustration of Scripture for their object. On the contrary, we rejoice when any exertions are made to accomplish that desirable purpose; and though all may not be eminently successful, yet, as each may contain something valuable, (according to the nature and course of those remarks which arise from the habits of life of the author, and his opportunities of personal information,) and may contribute in a sequent manner of not indecisive, and to the general body of biblical learning, we are tempted to accommodate the words of Moses, "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets!" A very correct and extensive acquaintance with the English language itself, is a quality by no means to be omitted in a translator; we wish this were strictly attended to, as then the choice of words, among many which appear synonymous, or which seem equally to express the import of the original, would be not only more copious, but more significant, more harmonious, and more dignified. It is for want of this qualification, perhaps, rather than from actual incompetence for translation, arising from ignorance of the original languages, that many laborious efforts appear more faulty than they really are.

It gives us pleasure to notice the progress made in biblical learning since these remarks were submitted to the public, and to express the hope, that this work. Several learned men have engaged in new translations of the whole, or parts, of the Sacred Scriptures. Much pains has been taken to obtain a correct copy of the public version; an account of which the press shall not be dispelled in this place; and it will conclude the present article.

Of the various editions of king James's version, that which was published at Oxford in 1709, under the care of Dr. Blayney, has been considered as the standard of the subject; for from wishing the palm of accuracy to the very beautiful and correct edition published by Messrs. Eyre and Strahan, his Majesty's printers, but printed by Mr. Woodfall, in 1806, and again in 1812. In collating the edition of 1806 with Dr. Blayney's, not fewer than one hundred and sixteen errors were discovered, and one of these was an omission of several words; after the expression "no more," in Rev. xviii. 22, the words "at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more," were omitted. Only one erratum, we believe, has been discovered in the edition of 1806. The copy printed from was the current Cambridge edition, with which Mr. Woodfall's edition agrees page for page. It was afterwards read twice by the Oxford impression that is in use; and the proofs were transmitted to the Rev. Lancelot Sharpe, by whom they were read by Dr. Blayney's 4to. edition of 1789. After the proofs returned by Mr. Sharpe for press had been corrected, the forms, or sheets of type, were placed upon the press at which they were to be printed, and another proof was taken. This was read by Mr. Woodfall himself, with Dr. Blayney's edition, and any errors that had previously escaped, were corrected; the forms not having been removed from the press after the last proofs had been taken off. By this precaution, we avoided the danger of errors (a danger of a very frequent occurrence, and of no small magnitude) arising from the removal of the forms from the proof press to the presses on which the sheets are finally worked off. Of this edition, which was ready for publication in 1806, five hundred copies were printed on imperal 4to, two hundred on royal 4to, and three thousand on medium 4to, size. In the course of printing this edition from the Cambridge copy, a number of very gross errors were discovered in the latter; and the errors (since corrected) in the common Oxford edition above noticed, were not so few as 1300. The London edition of 1806 being exhausted, a new impression was put to press in 1810, and was completed, with equal beauty and accuracy, in 1812; but this also is now out of print.

In the year 1804, the British and Foreign Bible Society was formed for the purpose of circulating the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, not only throughout the British dominions, but also, according to its ability, in other countries, whether Christian, Mahometan, or pagan. The success which has attended this glorious object has by far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its founders and supporters. Their voice has gone out through all the earth and their words to the end of the world." During the twenty-one years this society has been established, it has expended upwards of one million two hundred and sixty thousand pounds; has printed, or assisted in printing, the Scriptures in 140 languages, in fifty-five of which they had never before been printed; and has issued upwards of four millions five hundred thousand copies of the Sacred Writings! Other similar associations have followed nobly this glorious example; and of these none has labored with more effect than the American Bible Society.

BIND, TO, AND LOOSE, is a figurative expression derived from carrying burdens; that is, confirming or removing a burden of the mind. It is also taken for condemning or absolving; (Matt. xvi. 19.) "I will give unto you the key of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven."Binding and loosing, in the language of the Jews, expressed permitting, or forbidding, or judicially declaring anything to be permitted, or forbidden. In the promotion of their doctors, they put a key into their hands, with these words: "Receive the power of binding and loosing:" whence the allusion, "Ye have taken away the key of knowledge," Luke xi. 52. "I am not come to unloose thy bowels, but to complete it," says our Saviour, Matt. v. 17. that is, as in our translation, "not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it." The religion of Jesus has perfected the law of Moses, discovered its true meaning and accomplishing all its types and figures. If it have also abrogated some of its ceremonial institutions, it is only for the purpose of accommodating mankind at large, and causing the essential principles of it to better observed. "To bind the law upon one's hand for a sign;" to "wear it like a bracelet on one's arm," (Deut. vi. 8.) was meant figuratively to imply an intimate acquaintance with its precepts; but the Jews took it literally, and bound parts of the law about their wrists. (See PRAETORIES.) In Isaiah viii. 16. "Bind up the testimony, seal the law," is to be understood thus, "Seal what thou hast been writing, bind it about with thread or riband, and set thy seal upon it;—for closure and confirmation of its contents; to witness thy confidence in its veracity, and thy expectation of completion." It is said that Daniel was the most learned of the Magi, interpreters of dreams, &c. "for shewing (explaining) hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts," (Hes. prepl. vers, unving of knots) also chap. v. 16. where "loosing" things which were bound is used to express the explanation of things concealed. See DANIEL.

BIRD, or FOWL, it has been very uselessly disputed, whether birds came originally out of the earth or out of the water; and whether, as to the use of them on fast-days, they may be placed among fishes; or whether they are really flesh-meat as much as quadrupeds. Moses, speaking of the creation of birds, says, (Gen. i. 20.) "Let the waters produce living fishes, and fowls upon the earth, under the firmament of heaven;" but the Hebrew runs thus; "Let the waters produce creeping things that have life, and let the birds fly over the earth;" and chap. ii. 19. intimates that birds are from the earth: "Out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air."

Birds are classed into clean or unclean, see Lev. xi. 13—24. and Deut. xiv. 11, &c.

From the legislator who had issued the strictest injunctions on the subject of clean and unclean beasts, we might naturally expect directions even strict respecting birds, a class no less distinguished among themselves, by their qualities, and their modes of life. But here his characteristics of animals derived from the feet (see ANIMALS) failed; nor was it easy to fix on marks which should, in every instance, guide the learned and the unlearned, the country rustic and the respectable citizen. Hence we meet in the Mosaic institutes with no reference to conformation, as the means of distinguishing birds into clean or unclean, lawful or unlawful; but a list of exceptions forms the sacred directory, and certain kinds are forbidden, without a word concerning those which are allowed.

It will be observed, that the number of species of birds is greater than that of beasts; that the latter are more fixed to places, more resident, more homestead; whereas birds, possessing greater powers of extensive migration, and many of them being, in fact, temporary visitants, in their passage to various distances, according to the seasons, they might give rise to many difficulties on their lawfulness as food, &c. which without fixed regulations would become not a little perplexing. Birds, also, are less confined in their mode of life than beasts are; some are attached to the land, and even to the desert; others take to the water naturally, and spend their lives, mostly, on that element; while not a few are free to the enjoyment of both land and water, and derive their sustenance from either. In this respect its habits are similar to those of man, but in its use of the various resources of nature it is much more like the birds.

The sacred legator was not acquainted with these diversities, and he has, virtually, rendered them subservient to his leading intentions. In effect, it may be taken as certain, that birds which live on grain are not prohibited; and these, as is well known, comprise the species which have been domesticated by mankind; the wilder game are lawful, or not, according to the nature of their food. Birds of prey, whether they subsist on lesser fowls, or on animals, or on reptiles, or on any other creature having life, or having had life, are decidedly rejected; this includes all with crooked beaks and strong talons; it takes in also those which are now known under the appellation of waders; birds of the marshes, or the shores, and many of the open sea, as well as of lakes and rivers. The same principle, of admitting no second digestion of flesh, which had its influence in distinguishing animals, has its influence also here; though we cannot trace it in all cases and, indeed, in some cases, the exception seems to have been occasioned by less obvious causes.

The reader will not be surprised, if, under these circumstances, considerable difficulty should be found in naming the birds enumerated in the Mosaic list of exceptions; they have occasioned no small diversity of opinion among the learned; and no one who is competently acquainted with the subject, will pronounce, without hesitation, on the species under consideration, though his opinion, if he inclined to this or the other, and he may reckon general probabilities in his favor. Feeling the weight of these difficulties, we submit the following remarks in elucidation of the prohibitory list inserted in Leviticus xi. 13, et seq.

The Eagle.—This bird is well known, as taking a kind of pre-eminence among birds of prey. There is no difficulty in determining the genus intended.

The Osprey is most probably the Haliucus, or sea-eagle; or perhaps the black eagle, which, though among the smallest of its tribe, is among the strongest. So Homer speaks, (II. xxi. verse 232.) “Having the rapidity of a black eagle, (πουκαμισ) that bird of prey which is at the same time the strongest and the swiftest of birds.” If this hint be admissible, then the vulture, distinguished by its bald head and neck, is excluded, on one side; while the class of eagles which have a superfluity of feathers on the throat and head, are excluded on the other side. Of these Bruce offers two, the Pisaur, which has a kind of beard of feathers under his chin; and the Maser, which has a long crest, or tuft, on the back of his head.

The Vulture.—This word is written with δακρα, or (by the LXX) Daurak, (or) in the Samaritan version, which reads Daithakh. This tends much to support the opinion, that the second eagle of the list is the vulture; since the vulture could hardly be omitted; and its station among its associates should seem to be earlier than this. As modern naturalists, this is the proper place where we should expect to find the hawk; and the order is so natural, that little seems to be risked in assuming it for the days of Moses; for, though we are well aware that the natural history of that ancient writer must not be judged by the principles of the Linnaean system; yet where nature has appointed an order, as we may safely say, in this instance, what should forbid the earliest naturalists from observing it? In favor of the hawk are Jerome, the Arabic versions, Münster, Castello, Junius, Diiodi, Buxtorf, Schindler, and others.

The Kite follows the hawk with propriety. As there are several kinds of these birds, no doubt but all their classes were intentionally included under one name that was best known. Whoever should have eaten one species of hawk or of hawk, because another species was named in the text, would have found the consequence of his transgression in the punishment of his prevarication.

Every Raven after his kind.—This genus no doubt includes the crow, the magpie, &c. and therefore, coming after the hawk and kite, closes this list of birds of prey with great propriety.

It will be observed that the foregoing are birds of wing, birds, &c., such as roam at great distances, and prey wherever they can. Mr. Bruce describes multitudes of birds as following the armies in Abyssinia; and it is likely that among them would be found most or all of those here enumerated. Perhaps some are not only birds of prey, but feed on human carcasses; which would be a further cause of their pollution and prohibition.

We are now directed to a very different class of birds, which commences with—the Owl,—say our translators; but this is clearly a mistake; the word describes the daughter of God in the text. We cannot supposing that this bird, whatever it be, should have been described as, (1.) the ostrich, by the LXX; (2.) the Sirenea, apparently creatures of fancy; (3.) the owl; and (4.) the nightingale? What have these birds in common? Can this be justified by such variations? The three Chaldee versions, Okelos, Jonathan, and the Jerusalem paraphrase, read Naamoth, which is the Arabic name for the ostrich; Maimonides and the Talmud agree with them.

The Night Hawk.—That a voracious bird is intended seems clear from the import of its name, which signifies violence. Bochart supposes it to be the male ostrich, and then the preceding word must be restricted to the female ostrich. The LXX and Vulgate not improperly make it the Night Owl; (Strix Orientalis) which Hasse seems best to describe: “It is of the size of the common owl, and lodges in the large buildings or ruins of Egypt and Syria, and sometimes even in the dwelling-houses. The Arabs settled in Egypt call it Meshas, and the Syrians, Benzing, which is extrinsically in Syria; to such a degree, that if great care is not taken to shut
The windows at the coming on of night, he enters the houses and kills the children; the women, therefore, are very much afraid of him.

The Great Horned Owl is a bird of prey in the family of the Strigidae. It is found throughout North America, from Alaska to Central America, and is commonly known as the "Hoot Owl." Its distinguishing feature is its large, round head and yellow eyes. The bird prefers to live in wooded areas and is known for its ability to fly silently, making it difficult to spot. It is often seen perched on a branch, easily blending into its environment. The Great Horned Owl is a skilled hunter, preying on small mammals, birds, and even snakes. It is considered a keystone species due to its role in maintaining balanced ecosystems. Its presence is a sign of a healthy environment, indicating the stability of the food web in which it lives. This bird can be found in various parts of the world, including North America, Europe, and Asia, showcasing its adaptability to different climates and habitats. Its unique qualities make it a fascinating and important species in many ecosystems around the globe.
The Heron.—This bird should rather be included among the storks, as it resembles them closely. As commentators are quite at a loss on this subject, inasmuch that Dr. Geddes retains the original word, "Anagupa, of every kind," we shall be excused if we extract from Shaw the description of a bird which answers to what the passage and order require. It is probable some bird very near akin to this was the reference of the sacred writer. "The Zeo-ork, or long-neck, is of the bittern kind, somewhat less than the lapwing. The neck, the breast, and the belly are of a light yellow; but the back and upper part of the wings are of a jet black. The tail is short; the feathers of the neck are long, and streaked with white, or a light yellow. The bill, which is three inches long, is green, in fashion like the stork's; and the legs, which are short and slender, are of the same color. In walking and searching for food, it throweth out its neck seven or eight inches; whence the Arabs call it Zeo-ork, the long-neck, or, the father of the neck." This is reckoned by the doctor among water-birds; it seems to be a smaller bird, but allied in form and manners to the kinds under prohibition.

The Lapwing, Hoopoe, or Urepa, is generally considered as the bird designed by the original word Dukipkath, so called from its crest. It seems, that the Egyptians call the hoopoe, Kukupa, and the Syrians, Kukupa; both are near enough to the Hebrew Dukipkath; which, therefore, we conclude, is the hoopoe.

The Bat.—This rendering has the authority of most versions and commentators.

The number of birds prohibited by Moses is twenty, which he ranges most systematically. Those which we have tolerable authority to believe are correctly rendered, are distinguished by small capitals.

Moses, to inculcate humanity to the Israelites, orders, if they find a bird's nest, not to take the dam while with the furnished nest, where is the old one to fly away, and to take the young only.

Birds were offered in sacrifice on many occasions: in the sacrifices for sin, he who had not a lamb, or a kid, (Lev. v. 7, 8) "might offer two turtles, or two young pigeons, one for a sin-offering, the other for a burnt-offering." Moses relates at length the manner of the sacrifice of fowls in Lev. i. 14, 15, 16. Some interpreters insist, that the head of the bird was pulled off; others, that there was only an opening made with the larger finger-nails, between the head and the throat, without separating entirely the head from the body. The text does not intimate what was done with the head, if it were separated. It is observed, that when Abraham offered birds (Gen. xv. 10.) for a burnt-offering, he did not divide them, but placed them entire on the other victims. In other places, where Moses speaks of the sacrifice of birds, he does not command the head to be plucked off. (See Lev. v. 7, 8.) When a man who had been unclean with a leprosy was healed, he came to the entrance of the camp of Israel, and the priest went out to inspect him, whether he were entirely cured, Lev. xiv. 5, 6. After this inspection, the leprous person came to the door of the tabernacle, and offered two living creatures, or two pure birds, those of which it was lawful to eat. He made a wisp with branches of cedar and hyssop, tied together with a thread, or scarlet ribbon; and after he had filled an earthen pot with running water, that the blood of the bird might be mingled with it, the priest, dipping the bunch of hyssop and cedar into the water, sprinkled with it the leper who was healed; after which, he set the living bird at liberty.

In Palestine, dead bodies were sometimes laid exposed to birds of prey, as appears from Scripture; but, generally, they were buried in the evening. The ancient hunted birds; Baruch (iii. 17.) speaking of the kings of Babylon, says, "They had their pastime with the fowls of the air." Daniel tells Nebuchadnezzar, that "God had made the fowls of the air subject to him:" (Dan. ii. 38.) very much as the art of hawking was formerly in great repute in Britain, as it continues to be in some parts abroad.

The prophets speak often of birds of passage, of the swallow, the martin, the turtledove, and others, as indicating their habitation. In allusion to this circumstance, God says that he will recall his captive people like a bird from a far country. The Lord, speaking of his people, says, "Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird; the birds round about are against her: come ye, assemble all the beasts of the field, come to devour," Jer. xii. 9. A speckled, or striped bird, that is, unnaturally speckled, or striped, as if by having been dyed; it being very conformable to the nature of birds, that such an appearance should draw together the neighboring birds, (as an owl does, by day-light,) and that they should molest and injure the sufferer, often fatally. Joseph Kimchi, who is followed by Calmet, takes the idea in a somewhat different sense, saying, a Chaldee word nearly related, signifies to dip, or sitra:—may the idea import here, a bird stained, or sprinkled with her own blood? The LXX and Bochart translate the Hebrew—"Is not mine heritage become like a hyena against me? Is not all mine heritage surrounded by wild beasts?" But a perfectly original will be the sense of a ravenous wild beast; while the Arabs call the hysna by a name entirely similar, and so may apply either to bird or to wild beast. In confirmation of this rendering, it is remarked, that this agrees well with the figure reversed, where is the old one to fly away, and to take the young only.

The Hebrew word zipper, translated generally sparrow, is likewise taken for any small bird. The Preacher, speaking of old men, says, (Eccl. xii. 4.) "They rise up at the voice of the bird," that is, very early. The Greek, orna, signifies a bird, a hen; and the translatore of Origen has used saltel for bird.

One of the emblems given under the article Altar has shown that the ibis, a kind of stork, was so venerated in Egypt, as to be an allowed inmate in sacred structures: something of the same kind occurs also in Persia, for Thucydnes says, (p. 124.) "Within a mosque, at Oudijous, Iyes intrenched the son of a king, called Schah-Zedeb-Imem-Djejar, whom they reckon a saint; the dome is rough cast over; before the mosque there is a court, well planted over with high plane-trees, on which we saw a great many storks, that housed themselves all the year round." This should be compared with the remaining at the close of the article referred to.

BIRTH is taken for the natural descent of offspring from its parent: figuratively, New Born imports an entire change of principles, manners and conduct. See Regeneration.

There have been great difficulties started, on the nature of the instrument rendered stooal in our translation, Exod. i. 16. "And the king of Egypt said unto the Hebrew midwives, that were the midwives of the Hebrew women, and see upon them the stooal, if it be a son, then ye shall kill him; but if it be a daughter, then she shall live." According to this rendering, the women in labor were to be seated on stools, that their more fit child came first, (1.) this is contrary to the attitude adopted in the East for women in labor, which is standing; (2.) the Hebrew word ṣālām, ḥareg, dual, implies, from its very etymology, instruments of stone; which surely would not be adapted for such occasions. (3.) The difficulty, however, is avoided by a correct translation of the passage, as follows: "When ye deliver the Hebrew women, and ye look upon the bathing-troughs, (i.e. upon the children while bathing them,) if it be a son, ye shall kill him, etc." Not but that the midwives would know the sex of the child before they came to bathe it; but the intention and spirit of the command seem to be, that they should destroy the male infants while they bathing them, by drowning them privately, or by as accicover. A practice entirely similar is described by Thevenot, (ii. p. 96,) as prevailing at the Persian court. R. — "The kings of Persia are so afraid of being deprived of that power which they abuse, and are so apprehensive of being deposed, that they destroy the children of the persons related to them, by putting them into a carten trough, where they suffer them to starve:" that is, we suppose, under pretence of preparing to wash them, they let them pine away, or contrive to destroy them in the water.

This expression of Thévenot carries the matter further than most authors whom we have perused. That Eastern sultans have occasionally deprived, and still do occasionally deprive, children born in their seraglio of life, directly after their birth, even though they be the fathers, is well authenticated: we find, also, that the internal management of a seraglio is greatly influenced, or directed, by the head sultana-mother, who usually sways the black eunuchs, and who often, as soon as the child is born, appoints its destruction, that it may not interfere with others, whom she favors in their prospects of the succession. But that this should extend to children of the sultan's female relations is, no doubt, to be referred to extraordinary circumstances, such as political suspicions, rather than to the regular course of things.

"They pointed us to some handkerchiefs, like crape, round the necks of certain figures, in number 180, being representations of that emperor's children, which were all strangled in one day, by order of his successor." This was done in the seraglio at Constantinople, as we learn from Tournesfort. The fact is confirmed by others; and, indeed, it comes much to the same, if it be not rather less compassionate, to suffer a number of young persons to arrive at a certain degree of maturity, and then to destroy them through political jealousy, than to put them out of their misery directly after they enter upon it, and to close at once that life which is destined to know little good, perhaps to know much evil; and, very probably, to a melancholy dissolution, at a time when it is intimately susceptible both of hopes and of fears. See Judges ix. 5; 2 Kings x. 7.

These remarks are introductory to the inferences, (1.) that the sons born from branches of the blood royal, or in such stations as, by an ungracious forecast, may be regarded as capable of aspiring to the crown, or the government, are the objects of suspicion; not those of the commonalty in general. Childers, or eunuchs, or eunuchesses, are exposed to this danger, not those of peasants and slaves. Apply this to the situation of Israel in Egypt; it was not every child, every son born throughout all Israel, as well those in the country of Goshen as those in the capital of Egypt, that was included in the directions of Pharaoh; but those of the chieftains, the princes; for, had Pharaoh thus treated all Israel, he had undoubtedly raised a rebellion; he had diminished his stock of slaves, which was his property; whereas, the depriving that people of their property occasioned them to resist the yoke which they had so long endured. He acted according to the custom of his own court and seraglio, and did not very greatly extend it, except by including a distinct race, and a sojourning people. (2.) It was impossible that two Hebrew midwives could officially attend all the women of Israel in Goshen, &c., but they might have been kept in the royal city, at least for the wives of the chief, and such, we apprehend, resided here only during their turn to share in the labors assigned to their people. These considerations coincide with the idea previously suggested, that Moses and Aaron were of note and rank, among the Israelites, by birth and by natural condition; and they agree perfectly with the account of Josephus, where he relates that the birth of Jacob's son was, as of a child who should wear the crown of Pharaoh, taking it from him: that is, Pharaoh feared some illustrious youth would rise up to destroy him, and to deliver Israel, which fear became his torment. Pharaoh, being deluded by the midwives, "directed all his people, his officers, his superintendents, his guards, &c. to watch the Israelites, men as well as women, and to scrutinize strictly what rites of circumcision were going forward, as these indicated the birth of boys; and, on discovering such male infants, they should drown them in the Nile; meaning, infants in and around the royal city; for in the open country of Goshen, this watching had been impossible, the execution of the order had been attended with hazard to the officers, opportunities of concealment were infinitely more numerous, and the mention of the river seems to imply nearness to it, which might not be the fact in some parts of Goshen; and could not be the fact in any great part of it, if the situation usually assigned to that river be adopted, that is, between Egypt and the Red Sea.

These extracts serve to illustrate the conduct of Herod; first, toward his own sons; (see Herod,) secondly, toward the infants at Bethlehem; for, if the kings of Persia destroy the infants of their own relations, and if the king of Egypt, fearing the birth of Moses, was peculiarly jealous and vigilant, where is the wonder, that Herod destroyed the infants of Bethlehem, under the idea, that among them was concealed a pretender to his crown? He did no more than was approved and practiced in the East in such cases; say, perhaps he might applaud his own clemency in that he did not destroy the parents also, with their elder offspring, but only infants entering on their second year.

In confirmation of the proposition, that the children, not the mothers, were washed in stone vessels containing water, Mr. Taylor has given in his Fragment an engraving from an ornamental baso-relief on a sepulchral monument in Egypt, in the act of placing a new-born infant in a vessel, apparently of the same nature, and for the same purpose, as the Hebrew liver; her intention is, evidently, to wash the child; while the mother sits in an enfeebled attitude, looking on; but that is, a capacious vessel, to receive the child after washing; and the notice of the time of the child's birth, and perhaps its horoscope, occupies a female, who stands behind, and who inscribes it with a stylus on a globe. This representation, he remarks, proves that children were committed to the midwife for the purpose of being washed; Pharaoh might, therefore, say to the Hebrew midwives, or to these Egyptian women who were midwives to the Hebrew women, as was the opinion of Josephus, "When you are engaged in washing the Israelite infants, if they be boys, contrive to drown them in the water." This order not succeeding to his mind, he directed his officers to seize, and to drown by force, whatever young Israelites (boys) they could lay their hands on. The ancients bestowed considerable attention on the washing of a new-born infant; and, indeed, it was in some degree ceremonial. "The Lacedemonians," says Plutarch, in his Life of Lycurgus, "washed the new-born infant in wine, (principally,
BIRTH

So, in the same chapter, verse 29, "those who I had swaddled, with great care and solicitude, and had reared them hereafter, in Greece, cold, perhaps, in Egypt; or according to the season. We see, then, that the washing of a child newly born was a business of some consideration: how easily, therefore, did the hearers, and readers, of Orist and his associates comprehend the phrases "the washing of regeneration" or "the new birth" the being born "a second time, of water," the initiatory, and, as it were, the regenerative, ordinance of baptism.

The above mentioned engraving suggests another subject of inquiry, respecting the swaddling clothes appropriate to infants; an article but imperfectly known by us. Our translation has, as it may be thought somewhat improperly, used the term swaddling bands; which implies a number of small pieces—narrow rolls—stripes—bands: but the true import of the word is, more probably, that of a large cloth or wrapper; such as the female figure in the engraving holds up, extended, ready to receive the child; an envelope of considerable capacity and amplitude. With this idea agree what accounts have reached us of this part of attention to children among the ancients: "The child being washed, it was wrapped in a cloth, woven for this purpose by the mother, at the time of her virginity; as may be conjectured by the child's age and condition. This, as far as we may conceive, was lined throughout for greater warmth; we may suppose, too, the lining was soft and comfortable, while the outside was richly ornamented. "On this side," that is, the outside of it, "the Apostle had worked the representation of Medusa's head, and the snakes of her hair; besides two dragons, drawn in gold, with other ornaments." This description evidently implies that considerable labor and care had been bestowed on this article; so that a handsome cloth of the kind could be procurable only by a parent in easy circumstances. But, however that might be, the inference is clear, that this cloth was large; that it was not properly bands, but of some extent; otherwise, it could not have contained all these decorations, nor would it, we may suppose, have been esteemed worthy of receiving them.

Let us combine the supposition of size, or amplitude of dimension, with a swaddling cloth; while we examine places where the word occurs in Scripture. Job xxxvii. 8, 9. "Who closed the opening made by the sea, in its bursting forth as from the womb; when I placed my cloud as its vestment, and thick darkness as its swaddling clothe? "—when I enveloped it in thick clouds, for its immediate clothing, and surrounded it by extensive darkness, as a wrapper—involving it wholly. Surely, the idea of a broad, ample covering better suits this passage than that of narrow belts, or bands.

Hanging hinted that not every woman could procure this ample covering, it remains to connect the idea of a mother in easy circumstances with the following passages. Lam. ii. 20. "Behold, O Lord, and consider to whom thou hast done this: shall the women eat their fruit, their little ones whom they have swaddled? in costly robes; and to whom they have paid every attention that delicacy could suggest to persons of consequence; persons fit to be associated with the "priest and the prophet," honorable by condition of life. Surely, this raises the sentiment, and is perfectly consistent with the similar simile in the thirteenth chapter of the New Testament (Deut. xiv. 29; 56, 57; Jer. xix. 9.) and with the well-known melancholy history in Josephus. As, in the same chapter, verse 29, "those whom I had swaddled, with great care and solicitude, and had reared them hereafter, in Greece, cold, perhaps, in Egypt; or according to the season. We see, then, that the washing of a child newly born was a business of some consideration: how easily, therefore, did the hearers, and readers, of Orist and his associates comprehend the phrases "the washing of regeneration" or "the new birth" the being born "a second time, of water," the initiatory, and, as it were, the regenerative, ordinance of baptism.

The above remarks, therefore, are applicable only to the English version. R.

The idea may be applied to an occurrence in the New Testament; of the propriety of which application the reader will judge with candor. Luke i. 7. "The virgin mother brought forth her son, the first-born; with an ample swaddling cloth, such as bafsted, at least in some degree, the heir of David's house; and she took that kind of care of him which persons in competent circumstances take of their new-born infants." If this be a fact, observe, how it became a sign to the shepherds: "You shall find the babe wrapped in a handsome swaddling cloth—though lying in a manger," Luke ii. 12. For snaught we know, they might have found in Bethlehem, then crowded to excess, a dozen or a score of infants lying in mangers; but none with those contradictory marks of dignity and indigence; of noble descent, and of personal inconvenience; of respectable station, and of refuge-taking poverty; in short, the comfortable and lined swaddling cloth, which no doubt the mother brought with her, and the rocky, inconvenient, outcast-looking residence in which for the time being the object of their patriotic hopes, and of their pious researches, was secluded. This carries us a little further: if it were customary for "mothers in their virgin state" to work, and ornament, this article of future expectancy, and if the Virgin Mary had actually worked such a one, then she was not without leisure, means, and skill equal to the performance; consequently, she could not have been excessively poor, nor under the control of others, that is, in subordination—but must have enjoyed advantages not below those of the medium rank of women in her time and nation. All this, however, is only conjecture.

BIRTHRIGHT, the privilege of first-born son. (See First-born.) Among the Hebrews, and, indeed, among most other nations, the first-born enjoyed particular privileges; and wherever polygamy was tolerated, it was highly necessary to fix them. (See Deut. xxi. 15—17.) They consisted, first, in a right to the priesthood, which had been in the eldest of the family; but when brethren separated into families, each became priest and head over his own house. Secondly, the birthright consisted in receiving a double portion of the father's property above his brethren's. In like manner, we may suppose that half the whole inheritance was given to the eldest brother, and the other half shared... in equal parts among the rest. But the rabbins inform us, on the contrary, that the first-born took for his share twice as much as any of his brethren. If the first born died before the division of the father's inheritance, the right of inheritance was devolved to his heirs. First-born daughters were not invested with these privileges. Esau sold his birthright to Jacob, who, in consequence, had a right to demand from his father the privileges annexed to it; Jacob transferred the right of the first-born from Reuben to Joseph; and David from Adonijah to Solomon. See Heir.

BISHOP, in Greek, Βίσχοψ, in Latin, episcopus, an overseer, one who has the inspection and direction of any thing. Nehemiah speaks of the overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem: (Neh. xi. 22.) Uzzi had the inspection of the other Levites. The Hebrew בישף, rendered episcopus, has the same signification. The Atheniens gave this name to the person who prevailed in their courts of justice; and the Digest gives us the meaning of the relation of the bishop of the bread market, and other things of that nature: but the most common acceptance of the word bishop, is that which occurs Acts xx. 29., and in Paul's epistles, (Phil. i. 1.) where it signifies the pastor of a church. The title is also given to "the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls," 1 Pet. ii. 25. Paul describes the qualities requisite in a bishop, 1 Tim. iii. 1-7, &c.

BITHYNIA, 2 Sam. ii. 29. This word means the same as Bithynia, which see. It probably denotes here a region of hills and valleys, and not any definite place.

BITHYNIA, (1 Pet. i. 1.) a province of Asia Minor, in the northern part of the peninsula; on the shore of the Euxine, having Phrygia and Galatia to the south. It is famous as being one of the provinces to which the apostle Peter addressed his first epistle; also, as being under the government of Flavius, who describes the manners and characters of the Christians there, about A.D. 198; also for the holding of the most celebrated council of the Christian church in the city of Nice, its metropolis, about A.D. 325. It should seem to be, with some justice, considered as a province taught by Peter, and we read (Acts xxi. 19.) that when Paul attempted to go into Bithynia, the Spirit suffered him not. It is directly opposite to Constantinople.

BITTER. BITTERNESS. The Lord says to the Jews, "I will send the Chaldeans against you, that bitter nation," Hab. i. 6. "Take care, lest people who are bitter of soul run upon thee," Judg. xviii. 25. David in his flight (2 Sam. xvii. 8.) was accompanied by men bitter of soul, or chafed in their minds as a bear bereaved. The energy of these expressions is sufficiently discernible; denoting vexation, anger, fury. Sometimes bitterness of soul signifies only grief, 1 Sam. i. 10; 2 Kings iv. 27. The waters of jealousy, which women suspected of adultery were obliged to drink, are called bitter waters, Num. xiv. 25. (See Jealousy.) "Bitter envying," (Jam. iii. 14.) denotes mortal and permanent hatred. King Hezekiah in his hymn says (Isa. xxxvi. 5.) that, "in the midst of his peace, he was attacked with bitter diseases," a very dangerous disease.

BITTER HERBS. The Hebrews were commanded to eat the Passover with bitter herbs; (Exod. xii. 8.) but what kind of herbs or salt is intended by the Hebrew word פורים, which literally signifies סכין, is not well known. The Jews think cichory, wild lettuce, horseradish. Whatever it may be at the like the term, whether bitter herbs, or bitter ingredients in general, it was designed to remind them of their severe and bitter bondage in Egypt, from which God was now about to deliver them.

BITTERN, a fowl, about the size of a heron, and of that species. Nineveh and Babylon became a possession for the bittern and other wild birds, (Isa. xiv. 23; xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14.) according to the English Bible, but it is very doubtful whether this be correct.

"Three elements," says Scheuzer, "may dispute the property of the kappōd; earth, air, and water." The weight of interpreters is in favor of the hedge-hog, or the porcupine, which may stand at the head of the hedge-hog species. It must be acknowledged, that the Arabic terms kaimād, kaimād, κοιμάδ, &c. sufficiently resemble the Hebrew kappōd, which, possibly, was pronounced with a sibilant, as kaimād., written kipped, &c. It may be thought equally different from the common hedge-hog, because the specimens of that creature do not agree with those attributed to the kappōd; for the hedge-hog is resident in more verdant and cultivated places than we are led to place the kappōd in. It appears, however, from Dr. Ruysch's Aleppo, (vol. ii. p. 153,) that the porcupine is called καιμάδ: "It is sometimes, though rarely, brought to town by the peasants." "The notion of his darting his quills still prevails in Syria. I never met with any person who had seen it; but it stands recorded in books, and the facts are not doubted."

"The hedge-hog is regarded by the natives as the same species; is found in the fields in abundance, but serves only for medicinal purposes." It is concluded, from these hints, that the porcupine is wilder than the hedge-hog, in Syria. The same inference arises from comparing the accounts of animals given by Buffon; hedge-hogs he placed in his garden; and they are kept in kitchens as devourers of black beetles; they abound most in temperate climates; the north being too cold for them. The porcupine is a native of the hottest climates of Africa and India, perhaps is originally of the East, yet can live and multiply in less sultry situations, such as Persia, Spain, and Italy. Agricola says, the species has been in the higher ages transplanted into Europe. It is now found in Spain, and in the Apennine mountains, near Rome. Pliny and the naturalists say, that the porcupine, like the bear, hides itself in winter. It eats crumps of bread, cheese, fruits, and, when at liberty, roots, and wild grain; in a garden it makes great havoc, and eats pulse with greediness; it becomes fat toward the close of summer, and its flesh is not bad eating.

We should now inquire what associates Scripture has given to the kappōd. It is connected with "pools of water," in Isa. xiv. 23, according to our translation. This we shall consider hereafter. In chap. xxxiv. 11, it is associated with Каа, the pelican; with ḫsphh, which is supposed to be the lesser bittern or ḫrāea ḫlp, and with ḫt̪, or the river. In that kind; together with thorns, nettles, and brambles; with Tsōm̪, and with oriches. If only water-birds had been connected with it here, we might have been led to conclude that it denoted a water-bird also; but as ravens and ostriches, to nothing of the thorns and nettles, are found in dry places, nothing prevents this from being an animal of dry places also. In Zephaniah ii. 14, the kippod is coupled only with the Koal, or pelican; but, though the pelican can be a water-bird, it is certainly not good enough in dry places distant from water; and the prophet had said, in the former verse, "Nineveh shall be dry like a wilderness!" so that creatures inhabiting dry places, may readily be supposed to reside there. This association, therefore, is not conclusive for a water-bird; though it must be admitted that it looks rather like a bird of some kind as a fellow to the pelican, with which it is matched. It appears, then, that both Babylon and Nineveh are threatened with desolation, and with becoming the residence of the kippod. To ascertain this kippod, Mr. Taylor has taken some pains to discover what creatures breed in ruins in these countries. The result has proved not very satisfactory. Storks, owls, bats, and a bird, which is probably the locust bird, are all he finds identified. Bats we might naturally expect in vaults and caverns; but whether porcupines also, may be questioned. The following extracts are submitted to the reader; if they do not determine the question, they may give him matter for further inquiries. At Charsina:

"The ruins of above an hundred [temples] to this day remain of stone, white, and well polished, albeit now inhabited by storks, owls, bats, and like birds." (Hebrew Text, p. 66.)

"Nineveh was built on the left shore of the Tigris, upon Assyria side, being now only a heap of rubbish, extending almost a league along the river. There are abundance of vaults and caverns uninhabited; nor could a man well conjecture, whether they were the ancient habitations of the people, or whether any houses were built upon them in former times; for most of the houses in Turke are like cellars, or else but one storied high." (Tavernier, book ii. p. 72.)

M. Beurjamps, in his account of the ruins of Babylon, (European Magazine, May, 1792,) informs us, that "this place and the mount of Basel are commonly called by the Arabs Mak-Coube, that is, topas-turky." which is almost the same as Thienout mentions respecting Nineveh and its inhabitants; and which, could we trace it to its origin, very probably would be found deserving of notice. "The most reason led me along a valley—I found in it a subterranean canal; these ruins extend several hundred yards, and under-ground constructions, then remain of ancient Babylon, and an army may now afford shelter for bats. We understand that trees grow in parts of the space formerly occupied by Babylon; and, if so, they may afford shelter for porcupines. Against this interpretation of Kippod it must be observed, that in the Chaldee this word denotes a bird—taken for the better, as by our translators: and so in the Talmud. The root of the word signifies, to draw together, contract, shrink; which, as applied to animals, teaches nothing; for we cannot admit with Scirius, that "the heaver is what best agrees to the import of the word." It is probable that the porcupine does not inhabit dusty ruins, or dry or desert places; but rather common lands or forests, where vegetables and grain may be its food; yet, as vegetables may grow where towns have stood, perhaps this is not a decisive objection. Moreover, this objection becomes still less decisive, if the remark of B الثاني be correct, that the (now) pools of water are to be there, a position for the kippod; and by the force of words according to the most probable notion of the word, artificial, or fish-ponds, as in Isa. xix. 10. If so, we may understand them here of garden-canals, forming parts of pleasure grounds; fed, no doubt, originally from the river; and long after the destruction, or rather the abandoneing, of the city, the moisture, enough to support vegetables, on which porcupines might feed. In fact, Babylon became a park, wherein the kings of Persia hunted in after ages, and the same land which supported wild bears, might equally well support other wild animals, including those native of hot climates, such as the porcupine undoubtedly is. In a former chapter, the prophet takes some pains to consort creatures of the dry desert with creatures of the watery marshes; and from the local situation of Babylon, all these classes might dwell there together."

It would have been fortunate, if the etymology of this word had afforded means of determining the creature intended; as applied to the hedge-hog, it can only refer to his covering or dressing himself together, at the approach of an enemy; and perhaps this reference is sufficient. It is necessary only to add, that in Arabic, the class Kansad, or Kansad, includes three kinds:—1. Kansad al bari, the land-hedge-hog;—2. Kansad al bachari, the sea-hedge-hog; what we call the urchin, as indeed we call the former also by this name.—3. Kansad al gebel, the hedge-hog of the mountains; which is, no doubt, the porcupine.

Seeing, then, the determination of this language in favor of this word, can we do better than be guided by it in this instance? Yet, with some reluctance, as this is not precisely that creature which, on principles of arrangement, seem to answer the requisitions of every place in Scripture?

We conclude, therefore, though wishing for further information, with the idea of Bochart:

And I will make it [Babylon] a possession for the porcupine; even the garden-canals of water.

The general reasoning of this article is now reduced to a certainty, by the testimony of the late Mr. Rich, who says expressly, in his memoir on Babylon, (p. 30.) "I found quantities of porcupine- quills; and in most of the cavities are numbers of bats and owls." Quantities of quills imply the existence of many porcupines, in these deserted descriptions.

BITTEN, a fat, combustible, oily matter, found in many places, particularly above Babylon, and in Judea, in the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead sea. Noah cursed over the ark with bitumen; (Gen. vi. 14) the builders of the tower of Babylon used it for a cement; (Gen. xi. 3) and the little vessel in which Moses was exposed, near the banks of the river Nile, was daubed over with it, Exod. ii. 3. BLACKNESS OF THE FACE. We have an expression, Joel i. 6, "Before their approach [the locusts], the people shall be much pained; all faces shall gather blackness," which is also adopted by the prophet Nahum: (ii. 10) "the heart melteth, the knees smite together, much pain is in all joints, and the faces of them all gather blackness." This phrase, which sounds urgent, corresponds to an English ear, is elucidated by the following history, from Ockley's Hist. of the Saracens, (vol. ii. p. 310,) which we must rather introduce, as Mr. Harmer has referred this blackness.
to the effect of hunger and thirst; and Calmet, to a bedaubing of the face with soot, &c. a proceeding now very frequent. 3. The sentence is, that he should be left for seven days, or the terror of distress. "Kummel, the son of Ziyad, was a man of fine wit. One day Hajjaj made him come before him, and reproached him, because in such a garden, and before such and such persons, whom he named to him, he had made a great many imprecations against him, saying, the Lord blacken his face, that is, fill him with shame and confusion; and wished that his neck was cut off, and his blood shed."

The reader will observe how perfectly this explanation agrees with the sense of the passages quoted above: to gather blackness, then, is equivalent to suffering extreme confusion, and being overwhelmed with shame, or with terror and dismay.

BLASPHEMY. A man is guilty of blasphemy, when he speaks of God, or his attributes, injurious-ly; when he ascribes such qualities to him, as do not belong to him, or robs him of those which do. The law sentences blasphemers to death, Lev. xxiv. 12—16. Whosoever heard another blaspheming, and witnessed his offence, laid his hand on the criminal's head, to express that he was to bear the whole blame and punishment of his crime. The guilty person was led out of the city and stoned.

BLASTUS, an officer of king Agrippa, who fa- vorably conceived with Tyro and Sidon, Acts xix. 20.BLEMISHES were of various kinds on men, and also on animals. Blemishes, personal deformi- ties, excluded priests from performing their sacred functions: blemishes on animals excluded them from being offered on the altar, &c.; Lev. xxii. 20, 21, &c.; xxiv. 19, 20; Deut. xv. 21.

BLESS, BLESSING, is referred, (1.) to God, and, (2.) to man. Without doubt the inferior is blessed by the superior. When God blesses, he bestows that virtue, that efficacy, which renders his blessing effectual, and which his blessing expresses. His blessings are either temporal or spiritual, bodily or mental; but in everything they are productive of that which they import: whereas, the blessings of men are only good wishes, personal or official, and, as it were, a peculiar kind of prayer to the Author of all good, for the welfare of the subject of them. God's blessings extend into the future life; but no gift of one man to another, even of a parent to his child, can exceed the limits of the present state. Blessing was an act of thanksgiving to God for his mercies; or, rather, for that special mercy, which, at the time, occasioned the act of blessing; as for food, for which thanks were rendered to God, or for any other good.

These predictions of the ancient patriarchs, which we usually call blessings, are much rather prophetic hints or suggestions as to what should be the character, disposition, or circumstances of those to whom they referred. They were probably grounded, in some degree, on observations made respecting the temper and conduct of the party himself who immediately received them. So, if Benjamin, son of Jacob, were himself personally sharp, wolf-like, bold, predatory, his nature might be expected to descend in his posterity; and so of others. But often, the spirit of prophecy prompted the mind of the speaker, writer, or composer, to utter sentiments which, in the event, were to be fulfilled strictly, literally, or verbally, yet in a manner different from what was most probable on the appearance of the learner, when Jacob says of Simeon and Levi, "I will dis- perse them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel;"

since he intended this dispersion by way of degra- dation and punishment, it is not likely that he fore- saw that one tribe should entirely perish, or the other, or that they should be scattered in different parts of the earth, or that they should come to be a people under the prince of the blood of the royal house, as we shall see in the sequel. The promise, therefore, of a posterity, to the tribe of Levi, the Levites, to give them the fruit of the land as far as the river Jordan, is to be interpreted in the same sense, and signifies that the descendants of these tribes, in the future kingdom of his descendants; that the other should be invested with the priesthood, and thereby both be allotted into various districts, and cities, throughout the land of Israel: yet the fact was so; and Providence accomplished his prophecy, by dispersing and scattering these tribes after a manner which, perhaps, did not occur to the mind of the dying patriarch, at the instant when he delivered the prediction. When Isaac foretold the different natures and properties of the countries which should be possessed by Jacob and by Esau, he did not confer on the persons of his sons any real possession; he merely, as it were, divided them, by prediction, the places of the future habitations of their posterity: and these places he described prophetically, and prophetically referred to the nations, rather than to the persons, of Jacob and Esau.

Blessing is sometimes put for salvation—for consecration—for a promise of future good—for the re- ception of a good—for a gift or present—for praise—for alms—for adoration—for a man's blessing him- self; in short, it implies a felicity, either expected, promised, received, or bestowed. The manner of blessing is appointed in the Mosaic ritual, by the lift- ing up of hands, and by the giving of blessing with the right hand, and blessing his disciples. This action appears to have been constant: as the palm of the hand held up- wards, was precatory, so the palm turned outwards or downwards, was beneficent. Moses says to Aaron, "Thus shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance unto thee, and give thee peace," Numb. vi. 23. He pronounced these words standing, with a loud voice, and his hands elevated and extended. God ordains that, on the arrival of Israel in the promised land, the whole multitude should be convened between the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, and that blessings should be published on mount Gerizim, for those who should observe the laws of God, and curses on mount Ebal against the violators of those laws. This was performed by Joshua, after he had conquered part of the land of Canaan, Josh. viii. 30.

BLESSING, VALLEY OF. This was in the tribe of Judah, near the Dead sea and Engedi, not far from Tekoa, and was called the valley of Bemach, or Blessing, after the miraculous victory of Jehovah at the confederate army of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, 2 Chron. xx. 22—28.

BLIND. Blindness is sometimes taken for a real privation of sight, sometimes for dimness of sight; so the blindness of the man in the gospel, who was born blind, and that of Tobit, were real: they had truly no sight. The men of Sodom, who endeavor- ed to find Lot's door, and could not; (Gen. xix. 11.) and Paul, during the first three days of his being at Damascus, (Acts ix. 9,) lost the use of their sight only for a time; the offices of their eyes were suspended. The LXX well represent the situation of the inhabitants of Sodom, by saying they were struck (ανωρίζει, q. d. ανωτέρων) with an inability of seeing, sightless. Moses says, (Lev. xix. 14.) 'Thou shalt not put a stumbling block before the blind;" which may be understood literally, as if he recommended that charity and instruction should be shown to them who want light and coun-
BLINDNESS

The term "blindness" can refer to a physical condition where a person cannot see due to the absence of vision in at least one eye, or to a metaphorical term used to describe being unable to perceive something. In religious contexts, blindness can symbolize ignorance, or a lack of understanding. This term is often used in various cultures and religions to represent different meanings and concepts.
ness to the eye; and we ourselves call such an appearance a wall-eye. The reader may recollect other instances.

By these considerations we may, perhaps, account for the seeming contrariety, which appears sometimes between the right fat and the text in our translation, and (in other translations also,) which renders the same word blindness and hardness; for it is by no means unusual, for young persons especially, to discover the strong distinction between the terms blindness and hardness; while the cause of their adoption to express the same distemper entirely escapes them. So we read, Mark iii. 5, "Being grieved for the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." So Rom. xi. 25, "Blindness—hardness—in part hath happened to Israel." 2 Esdras iv. 13, "Because of the blindness—hardness—of their hearts." 2 Cor. iii. 14, "Their minds were blinded—hardened:" and elsewhere. Now, if in these and other places, the disorder adverted to were blindness occasioned by desertion of the visual agents, or any of their parts, whether arising from cause already suggested, or from any other, then we readily perceive by what means the two ideas of blindness and hardness might originate from the same word; and that, in fact, both renderings may be correct, since by one we are led to the cause, hardness; and by the other to the effect, blindness.

These observations are intended to parry remarks which have been raised from this commission given by God to the prophet. Some have said, God commands the prophet to do a certain thing to this people, and then punishes the people: nay, this appears stronger still, where the passage is quoted, as, (John xii. 40.) He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts; which seems to be contradictory, to Matt. iii. 15, where the people themselves are said to have closed their own eyes: and so Acts xxviii. 27. These seeming contradictions are very easily reconciled. God, by giving plenty and abundance, affords the means of the people's abusing his goodness, and becoming both over-fat with food, and intoxicated with drink; and thus, his very beneficence may be said to make their heart fat, and their eyes heavy: while at the same time, the people by their own act, their over-feeding, become unwisely—inclined, over-fat at heart; and, moreover, so stupefied by liquor and strong drink, that their eyes and ears may be useless to them: with wide open eyes, "staring, they may stare, but not perceive; and listening, they may hear, but not understand;" and hence, Matt. xxiii. 15, where the people themselves are said to have blinded their own eyes; and so Acts xxviii. 27,是指在任何适中间隔的他们应当看见，与他们的，眼睛，听，和，小心，与，他们的眼睛在，结果，他们应该被打击到，使自己，被改变，从，这种，不道德的行为，和，我应该，他们; 应该，纠正，这些，无益的效应，的，他们的，美德，和，孤独感。Compare Isaiah v. 11; xxviii. 7. Where is now the contradiction between these different representations of the same event? Is it not an occurrence of daily notoriety, that God gives, but the sinner abuses his gifts to his own injury, of body and mind?

This may also hint a reason why our Lord spoke in parables; that is, the people were too much stupefied to see the plain and simple truth; but their attention might possibly be gained by a tale, or be caught by an inference.

Because the customs of our country do neither authorize, nor tolerate, the maiming of a criminal by way of punishment, we are (luckily for us) incapable of entering into the spirit of several passages of Scripture; for instance, those which speak of not merely loss of sight, but loss of the eyes, also, the organs of sight; that is, in the case of the blind, occasioned by the extraction of the eye itself; nevertheless, till we properly understand this deplorable condition, we shall not adequately comprehend the exertion of that power which could restore the faculty of sight, by restoring the organ of that important sense. We wish to impress this on the reader; and to present to his conception the inevitable and remediless misery of the unhappy sufferers under such a calamity; which is a punishment constantly used in the East for rebellion or treason.

"Mahomed Khan . . . not long after I left Persia, his eyes were cut out. (Harway, p. 224.) The close of this hideous scene (of punishment) was an order to cut out the eyes of this unhappy man: the soldiers were dragging him to this execution, while he begged with bitter cries that he might rather suffer death. (p. 203.) Sadoc Aga had his beard cut off, his face rubbed with dirt, and his eyes were cut out. (p. 201.) The Persians regard blindness as a great evil; and indeed they are ever a dead weight on their families, who maintain them, with great trouble, and who ever have them before their eyes. This is the reason why they are not put to death at once.

"As we approached Astrabad, we met several armed horsemen carrying home the peasants whose eyes had been put out, the blood yet running down their faces." (p. 201.) Chardin relates an instance of a king of Imireta, who lived in this condition. (p. 180.) Hearing a complaint of continual wars, "I am sorry for it, replied the king, but I cannot help it: for I am a poor blind man; and they make me do what they themselves please. I dare not discover myself to any one whatever; I mistrust all the world; and yet I surrender myself to all, not daring to offend any body, for fear of being assassinated by every body. This poor prince is young and well shaped: and he always wears a handkerchief over the upper part of his face, to wipe up the rheum that distils from the holes of his eyes; and to hide such a hideous sight from those who come to visit him."

Let us now consider the anatomical force of some expressions in the prophet Isaiah: he speaks of a person who was to bind up the broken heart, also, to open the eyes that were blinded. Here blindness itself, as the word seems to imply, 2 Kings xxvii. 7; and yet Nebuchadnezzar punish Zedekiah with the usual punishment for high treason, or rebellion, (as we have seen above,) by cutting out his eyes, in order to blind him effectually? See also Jer. xxxix. 7; lii. 11.

The evangelist Luke (iv. 18,) seems to allude to such an import of the word, and to such a fact: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me . . . to give to the blind restoration of sight, remission of the eyes." "The power which could bind up the broken heart, could also restore the eye-ball to their deprived sockets, and give them every faculty which they had long lost. Let the reader well consider and admire this power. Let him also applaud the correct and happy phraseology of the evangelist; whom tradition reports to have been the "beloved physician." In perfect coincidence with this, Mr. Cheselden observes, (Philosophical Transactions, No.

that he had crouched several blind persons; and they all had been "mightly perplexed after the operation, how to move their eyes, having had no occasion to move them during their blindness; and they were a long time before they could attain this faculty, and before they could direct them to any object which they wished to inspect: that is, they were long in recovering that ὑπαίθριον which our Lord communicated perfectly in an instant. The same evangelist uses a very descriptive expression of our Lord’s manner of doing such a kindness: (Luke vii. 21). "And to many who were blind he freely made a present of sight; (ἐξωστρέφω to βλέπειν;) the word is not now ὑπαίθριον, but simply βλέπειν; which seems to justify the stronger import we have ascribed to the former word: while the term ἐξωστρέφω expresses the graceful readiness of the donor’s action.

Mr. Pope has two lines which have been much applauded: speaking of the Messiah, he says:

He from thick films shall purge the visual ray, And on the sightless eye-ball pour the day.

Critics might remark the fallacy of the metaphor in the first line, since the visual ray (that is, of light) has no film from which to be purged, whatever the visual say (the passage for light into the eye) might have. But our disposition came to the second line, which, however happily expressed, is inferior in strength to the prophet; who not only includes the restoration of ability for vision to the sightless eye-ball, but also, perhaps, the restoration of the eye-ball itself to its proper place, and to its rolling activity:

He from thick films shall clear the visual course, The rolling ball restore, with all its former force.

Whether the application of the instances above quoted to the case of Zedekiah, and to the word used in reference to him, may be admitted without hesitation, we will not determine. But an instance of what may certainly be considered as a loss of the eye-ball itself, occurs in the case of Samson, Judges xvi. 21, 22. "When their eyes were opened; (ἐπ’ ἐκείνης ἐξέθησαν;) and he burst out—his very eyes:" treating him as a rebel. Well might he, therefore, afterwards speak of being "avenged on them for the loss of his two eyes;" verse 25.

O, dark, dark, dark, beyond the reach of light. This shows also the lardiness of Nahash, (1 Sam. xi. 20) who proposed to "thrust out," scoop out—hollow out—the right eyes of the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead. This shows, too, the severity of the punishment assigned to "the eye: that mucketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother; the ravens of the valley shall pick it out; and the young eagles shall eat it;"—that is, it shall suffer the punishment of rebellion and treason. And, finally, this shows the strong language of the rebels in the conspiracy of Korah, Numbers xvi. 14. "Wilt thou (Moses) bore out the eyes of these men?"—wilt thou subject them to total and irreparable blindness?—οὐδ’ραςις, q. d. "Is it in thy power to punish so extensive a conspiracy, as thou mightest punish a single rebel?"

If therefore the instances mentioned by Hanway and Chardin are not to be considered as altogether coincident with that of Zedekiah, since then the historian might have used the proper word to express such a forced extraction of the eye-ball, yet they will apply to the passages subsequently quoted; and they will justify the different senses of the word blindness, according to the nature and origin of its cause.

The idea of blindness seems evidently to vary in its strength—(John ix. 40). "I am come into this world that they who see not might see; and that they who see might become blind;" not totally blind, as those who have lost their eye-balls, but in a smaller degree. "The Pharisee said, Are we blind also?—If ye were blind—absolutely, inevitably blind—and through any calamitous dispensation of Providence—ye should have no sin; but now ye see. We see; therefore your sin remaineth."

Ignorance is a kind of blindness often no less fatal than privation of sight; and partial or deficient information is little better than ignorance: so we find Moses saying to Hobah. "Leave us not, I pray thee; forasmuch as thou knowest how we ought to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes," Numb. x. 31. The necessity and propriety of such a guide will appear from considerations easily gathered from the following extract; and the description of a person of this character will be interesting, though it cannot be equally interesting to us who travel on hedged-up and turnpike roads, as to an individual about to take his passage across the Great Desert. If it be said, in the case of Moses, the angel who conducted the camp might have appointed its stations, without the assistance of Hobah; we an answer, however, it might be to the second line, which, however happily expressed, is inferior in strength to the prophet; who not only includes the restoration of ability for vision to the sightless eye-ball, but also, perhaps, the restoration of the eye-ball itself to its proper place, and to its rolling activity:

The rolling ball restore, with all its former force. They are men of great consideration, knowing perfectly the Susan and properties of all kinds of water, to be met on the route; the distances of wells; whether occupied by enemies or not; and if so, the way to avoid them with the least inconvenience. It is also necessary to them to know the places occupied by the Susan, and the seasons of their blowing in those parts of the desert; likewise those occupied by moving sands. He generally belongs to some powerful tribe of Arabs inhabiting these deserts, whose protection he makes use of, to assist his caravans, or protect them in time of danger; and handsome rewards are always in his power to distribute on such occasions; but now that the Arabs in these deserts are every where without government, the trade between Abyssinia and Cairo, given over, that between Sudan and the metropolis much diminished, the importance of that office of Hybeor, and its consideration, is fallen in proportion, and with these the safe conduct; and we shall see presently a caravan cut off by the treachery of the very Hybeors that conducted them; the first instance of the kind that ever happened." Bruce, vol. iv. p. 580.

BLOOD was forbidden to the Hebrews, either alone, or mixed with flesh; that is, creatures suffocated, or killed without anathema; partly because the life of the creature is in its blood, Lev.
and from hence proceed several acceptations of the word blood:

1. For life, Gen. ix. 5; Matth. xxvii. 25; Gen. iv. 10; Deut. xix. 6; Numb. xxxv. 24, 27.—(2) Relationship, or consanguinity, Lev. xviii. 6; Esth. xvi. 10.

3. Flesh and blood (signifying the animal frame) are placed in opposition to superior nature, Matt. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 30, &c.—(4) David said he would not drink the blood of his heroes, who had exposed their lives to bring him water from the well of Bethlehem; (1 Chron. xi. 19) the water which had been so near costing them their lives.—

(3) God reserved to himself the blood of all sacrifices; he being absolute master of all life and death. The blood of animals was poured upon his altar, or at the foot of his altar, according to the nature of the sacrifice; and if the temple were too remote, it was poured upon the ground, and covered with dust. The blood of the sacrifice in the Old Testament was figurative of that blood which our Redeemer, as the great sacrifice, poured forth for us, for the forgiveness of sins. “A man of blood,” “a husband of blood,” is a cruel and sanguinary man, a husband purchased with blood, or who is the occasion and cause of the effusion of his son’s blood; thus, Zipporah called her husband, Moses, when she had circumcised her son; because she had to redeem the life of her husband by circumcising his son, by a bloodyrite, Ex. iv. 25; or, as others render it, “Thou art now a husband to me by blood,” that is, by the blood of the covenant, by circumcision. “To build one’s house with blood” (Hab. ii. 12) with oppression, and the blood of the unhappy. “To wash one’s feet in blood,” to obtain a signal and bloody victory, Ps. lxxiv. 10. The Vulgate reads, to wash his hands; the Hebrew, he shall wash his feet. “I will visit the blood of Jezebel.” I will avenge the blood which Jezebel had shed there. “The moon shall be changed into blood,” (Joel ii. 31) shall appear red like blood, as it does in some degree, during a total eclipse. Ezek. xvi. 6, “I said unto thee, even when thou wast in thy blood, Live.” I saw thee polluted with the blood of thy birth, and, notwithstanding this impunity, I gave thee life.

And this is now marked, in the expression of David respecting Joab, (1 Kings ii. 5) any thing beyond a simple idea of shedding blood unlawfully; and that may be a sufficient acceptance of the passage; yet, we think, it may acquire a spirit at least, if not an illustration, by comparison with the following history. The dying king says to Solomon, his successor, “Thou knowest what Joab, the son of Zeruiah, did to me and to the two chiefs of Israel, Abner and Amasa, that he slew them, and shed the blood of war (blood which only might be shed in fair and open warfare) in peace, under friendly professions, and put [sprinkled] the blood of war into his girdle, which was on his loins; (that is, on the very front of his girdle) ; and into the shoes which were on his feet,” that is, into the front of his shoes. It is evident that David means to describe the violence of Joab, the effects of which seem to have been coincident with the sentiment of the valiant Abdiollah, “who went out and defended himself, to the terror and astonishment of his enemies, killing a great many with his own hand, so that they kept at a distance, and threw bricks at him, and made him stagger; and when he felt the blood run down his face and beard, he repeated this verse:

‘The blood of our wounds doth not fall down on our heels, but on our feet’ meaning, that he did not turn his back on his enemies, but that his blood fell in front, not behind.” (Ockley’s Hist. Sarmaceus, vol. ii. p. 291.) In like manner, the blood shed by Joab fell on his feet, “on his shoes,” says David; it was not inadvertently, but purposely shed; shed in a hardened, unfeeling manner; with malice aforethought; with ferocity, rather than valor. This explanation is very different from Mr. Harmer’s, vol. iii. p. 312. and must be regarded as far-fetched.

The blood of Jesus Christ is the price of our salvation; “his blood has purchased his church.” Acts xx. 28. “We are justified by his blood.” Rom. v. 9. “We have redemption through his blood,” Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14. “By his blood he hath pacified all things in heaven and earth,” Col. i. 20. “By his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us,” Heb. ix. 12.

For the phrase AVENGER OF BLOOD, see REVENGE.

No discovery made more noise in the inquisitive world, than the accounts given by Mr. Bruce relating to the eating of blood. Many were the ill-advised comments and additions to which the first reports of this custom gave rise; and it was probably attributable to these comments that the publication of his work was so long delayed. The reader will find below that particular incident, which was related very differently, by reporters, from what Mr. B. himself relates it; it is given partly as an act of justice to that traveller’s memory, as well as because it elucidates a striking passage in Holy Writ.

Not only did the Mosaic law forbid the eating of blood, but the prohibition appears to be one of the earliest injunctions given to renovated mankind; (Gen. ix. 4.) “The life, i.e. the blood thereof, shall you not eat.” This was renewed in most positive terms, in Lev. xxiv. 10, and remarkably in verses 12 and 15, where the stranger also is included in the prohibition under the most rigorous penalty. Now it is reasonably asked, ‘Unless this custom had been known to Moses, or used in his time, wherefore insert the regulation? wherefore forbid what was never practised? That this is now marked, in the expression of David respecting Joab, (1 Kings ii. 5) any thing beyond a simple idea of shedding blood unlawfully; and that may be a sufficient acceptance of the passage; yet, we think, it may acquire a spirit at least, if not an illustration, by comparison with the following history. The dying king says to Solomon, his successor, “Thou knowest what Joab, the son of Zeruiah, did to me and to the two chiefs of Israel, Abner and Amasa, that he slew them, and shed the blood of war (blood which only might be shed in fair and open warfare) in peace, under friendly professions, and put [sprinkled] the blood of war into his girdle, which was on his loins; (that is, on the very front of his girdle) ; and into the shoes which were on his feet,” that is, into the front of his shoes. It is evident that David means to describe the violence of Joab, the effects of which seem to have been coincident with the sentiment of the valiant Abdiollah, “who went out and defended himself, to the terror and astonishment of his enemies, killing a great many with his own hand, so that they
shields in their hands; in other respects they were but thinly clothed; they appeared to be soldiers. They set up the calf to be hunted for killing, and it occurred to us all that it had been stolen. This, however, was not our business, nor was such an occurrence at all remarkable in a country so long engaged in war. We saw that our attendants attached themselves, in a particular manner, to the three soldiers that were driving the cow, and held a short conversation with them. Soon after, we arrived at the hithermost bank of the river, where I thought we were to pitch our tent; the drivers suddenly tripped up the cow, and gave the poor animal a very rude fall upon the ground, which was but the beginning of her sufferings. One of them sat across her neck, holding down her head by the horns, another twisted the halter about her fore feet, while the third, who had a knife in his hand, to my very great surprise, in place of taking her by the throat, got astride upon her belly, before her hind legs, and gave her a very deep wound in the upper part of the buttock. From the time I had seen them throw the beast upon the ground, I had rejoiced, thinking that when three people were killing a cow, they must have agreed to sell part of her to us; and I was much disappointed at hearing the Abyssinians say, that we were to pass the river to the other side, and not encamp where I intended. I thought my presence there should bargain for part of the cow, nor men answered, what they had already learned in conversation—"that they were not then to kill her, that she was not wholly theirs, and they could not sell her." This awakened my curiosity; I let my people go forward, and stood myself, till I saw, with some astonishment, two pieces, thicker and longer than our ordinary beef steaks, cut out of the upper part of the buttock of the beast, how it was done I cannot positively say, because, judging the cow was to be killed from the moment I saw the knife drawn, I was not anxious to view that catastrophe, which was by no means an object of curiosity; whatever way it was done, it surely was adroitly; and the two pieces were spread upon the outside of one of their shields. One of them still continued holding the head while the other two were busied in curing the wound. This, too, was not done in an ordinary manner; the skin, which had covered the flesh that was taken away, was left bare, and flapped over the wound, and was fastened to the curving one by two or more smaller skewers or pins: whether they had put anything under the skin, between that and the wounded flesh, I know not; but, at the river side where they were, they had prepared a cataplasm of clay, with which they covered the wound; they then forced the animal to rise, and drove it on before them, to furnish them with a fuller meal when they should meet their companions in the evening."

"Travels, vol. iii. p. 142."

In various parts of his Travels, Mr. B. asserts the eating of flesh raw, the animal being killed on the outside of the door, for the entertainment of a company within. This raw flesh, he says, is called "briol;" he mentions it as given even to the sick by their friends; and he explains a disorder which it produces. He says, he ate of it himself, and (to notice the force of custom) on this he lived a long time together: in fact, the soldiers scarcely have, or can have, any other food. The following hints are introduced for remarks on the history of Saul: (1 Sam. xiv. 33.)

"We have an instance, in the life of Saul, that shows the propensities of the Israelites to this crime. Saul's army, after a battle, is, that is, fell voraciously, upon the cattle they had taken, and threw them upon the ground to cut off their flesh, and eat them raw; so that the army was defiled by eating blood, or living animals. To prevent this, Saul caused to be rolled to him a great stone, and ordered those that killed their oxen, to cut their throat upon that stone. This was the only lawful way of killing animals for food; the tying of the ox, and throwing it upon the ground, was not permitted as equivalent. The Israelites did, probably, in that case, as the Abyssinians do at this day: they cut a part of its throat, so that the blood might be seen on the ground, but nothing mortal to the animal followed from that wound. But after laying its head upon a large stone, and cutting its throat, the blood fell from on high, or was poured on the ground like water, and sufficient evidence appeared that the creature was dead, before it was attempted to eat it. We have seen that the Abyssinians came from Palestine, a very few years after this; and we are not to doubt, that they then carried with them this, with many other Jewish customs, which they have continued to this day."

(Travels, vol. iii. p. 290.) This fact has since been confirmed by Mr. Salt; it is termed in Abyssinia "eating the shulada."

in this passage, however, is only highly figurative; and cannot with propriety be thus definitely applied to any individual animal. R.

I. BOAZ, or Boas, the husband of Ruth. See Boaz.

II. BOAZ, the name of one of those brazen pillars which Solomon erected in the porch of the temple, 1 Kings vii. 21. The other, called Jachin, was on the right hand of the entrance. Boaz on the left. Boaz (νυκτὶ) signifies strength, firmness. They were together thirty-five cubits high, as in 2 Chron. iii. 15, i.e. each separately was seventeen cubits and a half; 1 Kings vii. 15, and Jer. iii. 21, say eighteen cubits, in round numbers. Jeremiah says the thickness of these columns was four fingers, for they were hollow; the circumference of them was twelve cubits, or four cubits diameter; the chapter of each was in all five cubits high. These chapters, in different parts of Scripture, are said to be of different heights, of three, four, or five cubits; because they were composed of different ornaments or members, which were sometimes considered as omitted, sometimes as included. The body of the chapter was of three cubits; the ornaments with which it was joined to the part of the pillar that was one cubit: these made four cubits; the row which was at the top of the chapter was also of one cubit; in all five cubits.

BOCCHIIII, the place of mourners, or of weepings, a place near Gilgal, where the Hebrews celebrated their solemn feasts. Here the angel of the covenant appeared to them, and denounced the sinfulness of their idolatry, which caused bitter weeping among the people; whence the place had its name, Judg. ii. 10.

BODY, the animal frame of man, as distinguished from his spiritual nature. James says (iii. 8) the tongue pollutes the whole body; the whole of our actions; or it influences the other members of the body. Our Saviour says, (Matt. vi. 22) "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light" —if thy intentions be upright, thy general conduct will be agreeable to that character; or, "if thine eye be single," if thou art liberal and beneficient, all thy actions will be good; at least, thou wilt avoid many sins which attend avarice. Paul speaks of a spiritual body, in opposition to the animal, 1 Cor. xv. 44. The body which we animate, and which returns to the earth, is an animal body; but that which will rise hereafter, will be spiritual, neither gross, heavy, frail, nor subject to the wants which oppress the present body.

Body is opposed to a shadow, or figure, Colos. ii. 17. The ceremonies of the law are figures and shadows realized in Christ and the Christian religion: e.g. the Jewish passover is a figure of the Christian passover; the sacrifice of the paschal lamb is a shadow of the sacrifice of Christ. The fulness of the godhead resides bodily in Jesus Christ; (Colossians ii. 9) really, essentially. God dwells in the saints, as in his temple, by his Spirit, his light, his grace; but in Jesus Christ the fulness of the godhead dwelt not allegorically, figuratively, and curiously, but really and essentially.

The body of any thing, in the style of the Hebrews, is the very reality of the thing. The "body of day," the "body of purity," the "body of death," the "body of sin," signify—broad day, innocence itself, &c. The "body of death" signifies either our mortal body, or the body which violently engages us in sin by concupiscence, and which dominates in our members. An assembly or community is called a body, 1 Cor. x. 17.

"Where the body is, there the eagles assemble," (Matt. xxiv. 26) is a sort of proverb used by our Saviour. In Job xxx. 30, it is said that the eagle—viewing its prey from a distance—as soon as there is a dead body, immediately resorts thither. Our Saviour compares the nation of the Jews to a body, by God, in his wrath, given up to birds and beasts of prey; wherever are Jews, there will be likewise enemies to pilage them. Corpus, in good Latin authors, is sometimes used to signify a carcass, or dead body. But in this passage, it seems to be an allusion to the body of the Jews, preyed on by the Roman eagles; the eagle being the standard of that people.

BOOK, in Hebrew, כַּנֶּסֶף, see in Greek, βιβλίον, in Latin, liber. Several sorts of materials were anciently used in making books. Plates of lead or copper, the bark of trees, brick, stone, and wood, were originally employed in writing or recording documents upon, as men desired to transmit to posterity. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 3) speaks of two columns, one of stone, the other of brick, on which the children of Seth wrote their inventions, and their astrological and other discoveries. Porphyry mentions pillars preserved in Crete, on which were recorded the ceremonies practised by the Corybantes in their sacrifices. Hisiod’s works were at first written on tablets of lead, in the temple of the Muse in Boeotia. God’s laws were written on stone; and Solon’s laws on wooden planks. Tablets of wood, box, and ivory were common among the ancients; when they were of wood only, they were oftentimes covered over with wax, which received the writing inscribed on them with the point of a style, or iron pen; and what was written might be effaced by the broad end of a style. Afterwards, the leaves of the palm-tree were used instead of wooden planks; and also the finest and thinnest bark of trees, such as the lime, the sycamore, the maple, the elm: hence, the word liber, which denotes the thin bark of trees signifies also a book. As these barks were rolled up, to be more readily carried about, the rolls were called volumen, a volume; a name given likewise to rolls of paper, or of parchment. The ancients, however, used the latter term. But the oldest material commonly employed for writing upon, appears to have been the papyrus, a reed very common in Egypt, and other places. A considerable collection of MSS., written on this substance, which were discovered in the overgrown city of Hierotheum, and which, under the insufficiency of George IV, while prince regent, uncommon pains were taken to restore, are thus described by the Hon. Grey Bennet: "The papiri are joined together, and form one roll, on each sheet of which the characters are printed, standing out in a species of bas-relief, and singly to be read with the greatest ease. As there are no stops, a difficulty, however, is found in joining the letters, in making out the words, and in discovering the sense of the phrase. The MSS. were found in a chamber of an excavated house, in the ancient Hierotheum, to the number of about 1800, a considerable part of which are in a state to be unrivalled. Hierotheum was lured for the most part under a shower of hot ashes. (August 24, A. D. 78.) The MSS., were, from the heat, reduced to a state of tinder, or, to speak more properly, resembling paper which had been burnt. Where the baking has not been complete, and where any part of the vegetable juice has remained, it is almost impossible to unroll them, the sheets towards the centre being so closely united. In the others, as you approach the centre, or conclusion, the MS becomes smoother, and the work proceeds with greater rapidity. At present there are about fifteen men at work, each occupied at a MS. . . . The papyrus are very rough on the outside. They are of different sizes, some containing only a few sheets, as a single play, others some hundreds, and a few, perhaps, two thousand." (Archeologia, vol. xv. art 9.)

The papyrus reed is still known in Sicily; and a small manufacture of it is established in the neighborhood of Syracuse, to gratify the curious. It has been also found in great plenty in Chaldæa, in the fens, at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates. Another quarter affording ancient papyri is, as already stated, Egypt; scrolls of it containing inscriptions were found by the French, during their invasion of that country; and Denon has given plates of more than one. He says, "I was assured of the proof of my discovery, by the possession of a manuscript, which I found in the hand of a fine mummy, that had been put to rest; I perceived, in its right hand, and resting on the left arm, a roll of papyrus, on which was a manuscript, the oldest of all the books in the known world. The papyrus on which it is written, is prepared in the same way as that of the Greek and Punic. The text is laid down on the moduilla of this plant glued to each other, with the fibres made to cross, to give more consistence to the leaf. The writing goes from right to left, beginning at the top of the page. Above the figure is an inscription composed of seven vertical and four horizontal lines: the writing is here different from the rest of the manuscript, of which this is part; and the characters appear to be infinitely varied and numerous. Various colors appear in the several parts of the original figures—red, blue, green, and black." The common name for book, sepher, or σηφήν, seems to be taken generally; it is used by Herodotus (lib. v. cap. 58.) to denote the Egyptian papyrus, and it certainly means books made of that plant, though the name is also sometimes given to the skins made of skins, as Mark xii. 36; Luke iii. 4, et al. Papyrus being, however, more common and less costly than dressed skins, it should appear, that those, memorandum, and first drafts of writings, to be afterwards more carefully revised and finished, were made on papyrus sheets, not on skins, which were used for receiving the finished performance; as among our lawyers. This distinction gives a directly contrary import to the directions of the apostle. (2 Tim. iv. 13.) "Bring with thee the books, τυπθέν, but especially the parchments, μυθησόμενα, (another Latin word in Greek characters)—from what has usually been supposed. The learned bishop Bull, and others, have thought that the membranes were Paul's common-place book, in which he had written extracts from various authors, sacred or profane; but according to the above view we may suppose that the membranes contained finished pieces, of what were known, (i.e.) notes from those who were of the opinion about them, while the papyrus books were of less value and importance, being imperfect. It appears that Herodotus uses the term biblion for a letter of no great length, (lib. i. cap. 124, 5.) and it is used to mark a bill or billet of divorce, which, if Lightfoot be right, was always of twelve lines in length; neither more nor less, Matt. xiv. 7; Mark x. 4. It is possible that biblion expresses a catalogue, or list of names, (Matt. 1. 1.) and this gives the true import of the phrase "book of life," meaning, the list of Christian professors, (allusive to those records of names kept in the churches, comp. Acts i. 15; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5, &c.) and these, most likely, were not written on parchment, membranes, but on the paper most common, and least costly. (See below.)

The book is sometimes used for letters, memoirs, an edict, or contract. The letters which Rabaalshak (several times a mentioned by Strabo, xxii. vii. 6, as being sent from the king of Antioch in Syria) addressed to his relations, were called letters. The English, indeed, reads letter, but the LXX reads ἀποστολος, and the Hebrew text γραφή, 2 Kings xix. 14. So is the contract which Jeremiah confirmed for the purchase of a field, Jer. xxxii. 10. Also Abasera's edict in favor of the Jews, Esth. ix. 20; Job xxxii. 35. wishes, that his judge, or his adversary, would himself write his sentence, his book. The writing, likewise, which a man gave to his wife when he divorced her, was called a book of divorce.

We read in Gen. v. 1, "the book of the generation of Adam," that is, the history of his life; and elsewhere, "the book of the generation of Noah," or of Jesus Christ, etc. (John xii. 40, etc., etc.)

BOOK OR LIBRARY, or Book of the Living, or Book of the Lord, Ps. cxix. 38. It is very probable, that these descriptive phrases, which are frequent in Scripture, are taken from the custom observed generally in the country the time was to deliver the moduilla of this plant glued to each other, with the fibres made to cross, to give more consistence to the leaf. The writing goes from right to left, beginning at the top of the page. Above the figure is an inscription composed of seven vertical and four horizontal lines: the writing is here different from the rest of the manuscript, of which this is part; and the characters appear to be infinitely varied and numerous. it was a constant practice every day to write down what had happened, the services done for the king, and the rewards given to those who had performed them; as we see in the history of Ahasuerus and Mordecai, Esth. ii. 20. When, therefore, the king sits in judgment, the books are opened, and he compels all his servants to reckon with him; he punishes those who have been failing in their duty, compels those to pay who are indebted to him, and rewards those who have done him service. There will be, in a manner, a similar proceeding at the day of God’s final judgment.

The Book, or Flying Roll, spoken of in Zechariah, (v. 1, 2), twenty cubits long, and ten wide, was one of those old rolls, composed of many skins, or parchment, glued or sewed together at the end. Though subsequent to the (rolls) volumes were very long, yet probably, was ever made of such a size as this. This contained the curves and calendars which should befall the Jews. The extreme length and breadth of is, show the excessive number and enormous size of their, and the extent of their punishment.

Isaiah, describing the effects of God’s wrath, says, “The heavens shall be folded up like a book, (scroll); Isa. xliii. 4. He alludes to the way among the pages of a book, the rolling up of books, as they are rolled up, to close them. A volume of several feet in length was suddenly rolled up into a very small compass. Thus the heavens shall shrink into themselves, and disappear, as it were, from the eyes of God, when his wrath shall be kindled. These ways of speaking are figurative, and very expressive.

It is related in the books of the Maccabees, that the Jews, when suffering persecution from Antiochus Epiphanes, laid open the law, wherein the Gentiles endeavored to find delineated figures of idols, 1 Macc. iii. 48. Some believe, that the Jews laid open the book before the Lord the sacred books, whereon the Gentiles had in vain sought for something whereon to support their idolatry; others think, they laid open the sacred writings, wherein the Gentiles were desirous to paint figures of their idols:—otherwise, the Hebrews laid open their sacred books, wherein the Gentiles had sought diligently whether they could find figures of some god, or idol, which the Jews would not own. With some small variation in the Greek text, it may be translated thus: “Thus the Jews laid open the book of the law, at the same time that the Gentiles consulted the images of their false gods.”

Books Eaten. “Inasmuch that the Turks said frequently and justly of them, that other nations had their learning in their books, but the Tartars had eaten their books, and had their wisdom in their breasts, from whence they could draw it out as they had occasion, as divine oracles.” (Busbequius, Trav. p. 245. Eng. tr.) This may lead us to the true idea of the prophets, when they mention the eating of books presented to them; i. e. that the knowledge they had received should be communicated to others, from time to time, as wanted; they were treasuries (not for themselves, but for others) of wisdom and knowledge.

It may be added, that as the papyrus plant was (and is) eaten, at least in part, the idea of eating a book made of it, is not so completely foreign from the nature of the article, as it would be, if such a thing were proposed among ourselves; or, as eating a book made of it, is not so entirely removed from the most approved mode of imbibing the contents of the Koran is by tracing the characters with a substance on a smooth, black board, then washing them off, and swallowing the liquid!

Talh, Shird, and Babis, mentioned Isaiah xxix. 11, and the book sealed with seven seals in the Revelation, (chap. v. 1—3) are the prophecies of Isaiah, and of John, which were written in a book, after the manner of the ancients, and were sealed; that is, they were bound with cords, or with thread or flax, and then wax and the seals were applied to them. To read them, it was necessary to cut the thread, or flax, and to break the seals. With regard to this particular book, however, Mr. Taylor thinks he found the picture of the Lamb, among the pictures discovered at Herculaneum. It represents a book of a considerable size, the leaves bound together at the back, and two of them joined together, so that only their external faces are visible, or open for the inspection of writing; their internal faces being either blank, or, if written on, their contents not to be read, till after the leaves are separated.

The book of which he gives an engraving actually laid open the law, wherein the Gentiles consulted the images of their false gods.

had assigned. This painting appears on a portable book-case, apparently made of leather, and of the dimensions known to the Romans by the name of sarcina. It is filled with rolled books, each of which has a ticket or label appended to it, and which is probably the genuine capitalism or argument of the book. The words of the Psalms, then, may be taken to intimate that the head, cephalus, capitulation, label or ticket appended to the volume, or roll, was thus inscribed; and in this view, the capitulation answered the purpose of the lettering on the backs of our books. The passages, then, may be thus understood:—Burnt-offering and sacrifices were not what thou didst require; they were not according to thy will. Then said I, Lo, I come, as in the roll (label) of the book is written concerning me;—I delight to accomplish thy will. The statement given by Mr. Taylor shows that these small labels were capable of being rolled up, till they were close to the greater roll to which they belonged; as seems to be the meaning of the Hebrew word.

[The translation of Mr. Harmer above is ingenious, but seems hardly to be required, or even admitted, by the words of the context. The roll of the book, by way of eminence, would seem to refer to the book of the Jews, nor is any different term given to it in Heb. xxii. 4-6.]

BOOTH, a tent made of poles, and used as a temporary residence. See Tent.

BOOTH, spoil. It was appointed by Moses, that booty taken from the enemy should be divided equally among those who had been in the camp, and the rest of the people; (Num. xxxi. 57.) that is, into two parts, the first for those who had been in the action; the other for those who had continued in the camp. His idea was: Ye shall likewise separate the firstfruits of your harvest, which ye shall take out of the whole booty belonging to the men of war; and of every five hundred men, oxen, asses, or sheep, ye shall take one and give it to the high-priest, because these are the Lord's firstfruits. As to the other moiety, which shall belong to the children of Israel, who did not fight; out of every fifty men, oxen, asses, or sheep, or other animals, whatsoever, ye shall take one and give it to the Levites, who have the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord. So that the share of Eleazar, and of the presidency, was as much as that which is in the law, and one of the 12,000 soldiers who had been in action, and than that of the Levites. And what was practised on this occasion became a law for ever after; an instance of which appears in what happened under David, according to 1 Sam. vi. 19, where Amalekites, who had plundered Ziklag. The captives given to the high-priest, no doubt, became slaves; were they slaves of the high-priest personally, or of the temple? If to the temple, were they not like the Gibeonites, the Non-Levites, and others engaged in menial offices, as bowers of wood, and drawers of water? Did their descendants also occupy the same stations?

The robins allege that under the kings of Israel, another rule was followed in distributing the spoil. First, every thing was given to the king, which had belonged to the conquered king; his tent, his slaves, his cattle, his spoils, his treasure. After this, the remainder of the booty being divided into two equal parts, the king had one moiety, and the soldiers had the other. This last part was distributed equally between the soldiers who had been in the action, and those who continued behind to guard the camp. They assert, that these rules had been established ever since the time of Abraham. It is difficult, in deed, to prove this; but we know that Abraham offered to the Lord the tenth of what he had taken from the five kings, and this tithe he made a present to Melchisedek.

BOOZ, or Boaz, one of our Saviour's ancestors according to the flesh, son of Salmon and Rahab, a Canaanite of Jericho, whom Salmon, of the tribe of Judah, married. Some say, there were three of this name, the son, grandson, and great-grandson of Salmon; the last being husband of Ruth, and father of Obed. This they believe to be the only way in which Scripture can be reconciled with itself, since it reckons 235 years between Salmon's marriage and the birth of David, and yet mentions only three persons between Salmon and David, viz. Booz, Obed, and Jesse. But though it is difficult to fill so great a space with four persons from Abraham to David, succeeding one another, and though it is uncommon to see four persons in the same family successively, living very long, and having children when far advanced in age, yet, as Calmet remarks, there is nothing impossible in it; particularly at that time, when many persons lived above a hundred years. Suppose Salmon, at the age of a hundred and twenty, might beget Booz; Booz, at a hundred, might beget Obed, who, at something more or less, might have Jesse; and Jesse, when a hundred years old, might have David. This, he adds, is only supposition, but it is sufficient to show, that there is no contradiction or impossibility in the Scripture account. Mr. Taylor, however, prefers the solution of Dr. Alphi. The Targum on Ruth says, that Salmon fathered Salmon the Just; his works and the works of his children were very excellent; Boaz was a righteous person, by whose righteousness the people of Israel were delivered from the hands of their enemies, &c. There were but 236 years from the first year of Joshua to the birth of David—for from the Exodus to the building of the temple were 480 years; and from 616 the 40 years wandering in wilderness, the life of David seventy years, and four years of Solomon—the total is 480 years. He therefore supposes that Salmon might beget Boaz when he was 96 years old; Boaz begat Obed when he was 90 years old; Obed at 90 begat Jesse; and Jesse at 85 begat David. We know that long life often descends in a family; old Parr had a son who lived to be very old; and we find that it is common for the men of such families have had children very late in life, as after the age of a hundred years; of which old Parr himself is one example.

Some robins maintain, that Ishan, judge of Israel, (Judg. xii. 8.) the progenitor of Boaz; the foundation of which opinion is, that Ishan was of Bethelheim, and that there is some relation between the names. But Ishan having governed Israel from A. M. 2823 to 2850, he cannot be the same as Booz, who could not be born later than A. M. 2920, his father Salmon having married Ruth in 2553. Now, supposing him to be born in 2630, he must have lived 210 years; which appears incredible.

BORITH, or Beerith, rendered fuller's soap, in Mal. ii. 2, is thought to be the herb bali. But we should not forget, that the East produces a kind of fat earth, used in scouring cloth, like our fuller's earth. See Soap.

BOSCATH, see BOSATH.

BOSOM, the front of the upper part of the body—the breast. The orientals generally wore long, wide, and loose garments; and when about to carry any thing away that their hands would not contain, they used for the purpose a fold in the bosom of their robe.
To this custom our Lord alludes—"Good measure shall men give into your bosom," Luke vi. 36. To have one "in your bosom," implies kinship, secrecy, intimacy. Gen. xvi. 3; 3 Sam. xvi. 15. Christ is in the bosom of the Father; that is, possesses the closest intimacy, and most perfect knowledge, of the Father, John i. 18. Our Saviour is said to carry his lambs in his bosom, which beautifully represents his tender care and watchfulness over them. Isa. xi. 11.

Bosphorus. Two were places of this name; (1) The Cimmerian Bosphorus, which joined the lake Mysos, now sea of Azof, to the Euxine sea. (2) The Thracian Bosphorus, that of Constantinople, or the strait between Chalcedon and Constantinople. Each of these straits is called, in Greek, Bosphorus, or rather Bosporus, because an ox may swim over them. Interpreters are much divided concerning the (supposed) straits of which Obadiah speaks, the Jews and Jerome consulted on such difficulties as occurred to him in the Hebrew, told him, that the Bosphorus mentioned by the prophet was the Cimmerian Bosphorus, whither the emperor Adrian had banished many of those Jews who were taken prisoners in the war of Palestine. So the Vulgate. Others believe, with more reason, that the captives taken notice of by Obadiah, were such as Nebuchadnezzar had sent away as far as the Palus Moeotis, about which the country is generally thought to be the most frightful in the world; and hither the great persecutors of Christianity frequently sent the professors of our religion. Lastly, many others understand the Hebrew word as meaning Spain, and translate thus:—"The captives of Jerusalem which are at Sepharad (that is to say, in Spain) shall possess the cities of the south." Profane historians, as Megenestes and Strabo, assert, that Nebuchadnezzar extended his conquests as far as Sepharad, such as the lands of the Pillars:--which we apprehend to be those called Hercules' pillars. Now, in this expedition against Spain, some say that he transported many of the Jews thither. But we may question whether Sepharad signifies Spain. Some interpreters believe it was only the province of that name, which in term implies, towards Media, or the city of Hippars, in Mesopotamia. But the most judicious commentators do not undertake to determine the country definitely. See Obadiah, Spain, Sepharad.

Bottle. The difference is so great between the properties of glass bottles, such as are in common use among us, and bottles made of skin, which were used, anecdotally by most nations, and still are used in the East, that when we read of bottles, without carefully distinguishing in our minds one kind of bottle from the other, mistake is sure to ensue. For instance, (Josh. ix. 4.) the Gibeonites "did work wisely; they took upon their asses wine-bottles, old, and new, and bound up"—itched. So, ver. 13. "These bottles of wine were new, and beheld they be rent." Surely to common readers this is unintelligible! So, Matt. ix. 17, "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles; else, the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish:"—"but new wine," says Luke, (v. 38.) "must be put in new bottles, and both are preserved." Now, what idea have English readers of old, and new, and patched (glass) bottles? or of the necessity of new glass bottles for holding new wine? Nor should we forget the figure employed by Job: (xxxii. 19.) "My bottle is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst, like new bottles." To render these, and some other passages, clear, we must understand some of the properties of the bottles alluded to. The accompanying engraving, which is copied from the Antiquities of Herculaneum, (vol. vii. p. 197.) shows, very clearly, the form and nature of an ancient bottle; out of which a young woman is pouring wine into a cup, which in the orbicular vessel is held by Silenus. It appears from this figure, that after the skin has been stripped off the animal, and the denuded piece, the places where the legs had been are closed up; and where the neck was, is the opening left for receiving and discharging the contents of the bottle. This idea is very simple and conspicuous in the figure. Such bottles, when full, in which state this is represented, differ of course from the same when empty; being, when full, swollen, round, or firm, when empty, flaccid, weak, and bending. By receiving the liquor into it, a skin bottle must be greatly swelled, and distended; and no doubt, it must be further swelled by the fermentation of the liquor within it, while advancing to ripeness; so that, in this state, if no vent be given to it, the liquor may overpower the strength of the bottle; or, by searching every crevice, and weaker part, if it find any defect, it may ooze out by that. Hence arises the propriety of putting new wine into new bottles, which, being in the prime of their strength, may resist the expansion, the internal pressure of their contents, and preserve the wine to maturity; while old bottles may, without danger, contain old wine, whose fermentation is already past, Matt. i. 11; 13 (2 Cor. ix. 13, job xxxii. 19.)

(2) The Hebrews employed several words signifying bottle; but there seems not to have been any generic difference in the idea expressed by them; unless, perhaps, the bottles or skins may have been of different sizes. (1) In Gen. xvi. 14, the word is as giving a bottle of water, ner, chémeth, which she carried with her, and which, therefore, could not have been of a large size.—(2) The bottle of wine which Samuel's mother brought to Eli (1 Sam. i. 8, is called 2a, naph; which also represented as being transported on horses, (1 Sam. x. 3; 2 Sam. xvi. 1.) and was, therefore, larger. This word seems to have been rather a general term like our vessel, because it is the word used in Isa. xxx. 14. and Lxxm. ix. 2, where the epithet earthy is joined with it.---(3) The word 8277, neb, seems to imply a skin or bottle similar to the preceding one; which was from such an one that Jael gave milk to Sisera, (Judg. iv. 19.) and in this also Jesse sent wine by David to Saul. The same word employed in Ps. cxxix. 83. "I am like a bottle in the smoke," i. e. black and dried up, like a bottle of wine suspended in the smoke, in order to ripen it, as was the common practice of the ancients.—(4) Another name is \( \text{ας} \), &c. mentioned in the 30th and 32d verses of Job xxxii. 27. where Eliphaz says he is "ready to burst like new bottles," i.e. like those filled with new wine in a state of fermentation. These would seem, therefore, to have been used for the preservation of wine, as was common in the East; comp. Matt. ix. 17. It is not impossible that this was a larger species than the others; at least this supposition is favored by the use of the same word (\( \text{ας} \)) to signify a necromancer, sorcerer, (1 Sam. xxvii. 7—19.) or the spirit which was supposed to dwell in such persons. These were chiefly exorcists, or ventriquespi, respecting whom it was supposed they had in them a demon who thus spoke from within them. Hence the person himself was as it were an \( \text{ας} \), vessel, bottle, into which the demon had entered, and which contained him. This is the most common meaning of the word; indeed it occurs in the sense of bottle only once in the whole Old Testament, Job xxxii. 19. R.

Bottles, then, of skins, would naturally be proportioned to the size of the animal which yields them, kid-skins, goat-skins, ox-skins. The larger were, perhaps, not unlike what the Arabs now name the Gerbe, thus described by Mr. Bruce:—"A girba is an ox's skin, squared, and the edges sewed together very artificially, by a double row, which does not let out water, much resembling that which the best English cricket balls. An opening is left at the top of the girba, in the same manner as the bung-hole of a cask. Around this the skin is gathered to the size of a large handbook when the girba is full of water, is tied round with whip-cord. These girbas generally contain about sixty gallons each, and two of them are the load of a camel. They are then all besmeared on the outside with grease, as well to hinder the water from oozing through, as to prevent its being evaporated by the heat of the sun upon the girbas, which, in fact, happened to us twice, so as to put us in imminent danger of perishing with thirst." (Travels, vol. iv. p. 334.) "There was great plenty of shell-fish to be picked up on every shoal. I had loaded the vessel with four skins of fresh water, equal to four hogsheads, with cords of buoys fixed to the end of each of them; so that if we had been shipwrecked near land, as rubbing two sticks together makes a fire, I might without losing success before we were driven to the last extremity provided we did not perish in the sea." (Vol. i. p. 205.)

Such bottles, or vessels of skins, are almost universally employed at the present day in travelling in the East. Nicander gives the following account of his baggage, when setting out from Cairo for Swez: (Trav. vol. i. p. 212. Germ. ed.) "We had each of us a vessel of thick leather to drink out of; and because we should find no water for some days, we took also quite a number of goatskins filled with water with us. Our wine we had in large glass bottles, (Damosjanen, demi-johns?) which seemed to us to be the best for this purpose; but when a camel happens to fall, or strikes with its load against another one, these vessels easily break; and therefore it is better, in oriental journeys, to carry both wine and spirits in goatskins. The skins that are thus used to transport water, have the hair outwards; those that are intended for wine, have the hair inwards, and are so well covered with pitch, that the drink acquires no bad taste whatever. And although for an European it may be at first somewhat disgusting to keep his drink in such vessels, yet he has not to fear that his wine will be spilled and lost by the way, as was the case with a part of ours." Mr. King also mentions, when departing from Cairo for Jerusalem, that they "purchased four goat-skins and four leather bottles to carry water." Three days after, they found that, as "the goat-skins were new, they had given the water a reddish color, and an exceedingly loathsome taste." Missionary Hist. 1854, p. 34, 35. R.

BOUNDS, BOUNDARIES, limits. Moses forbids any one to alter the bounds of his neighbor's inheritance: (Deut. xix. 14.) "Thou shalt not remove thy neighbor's land-mark, which they of old time have set on thine inheritance, which thou dost inherit," &c. All the people curse the man who should remove the bounds planted by their ancestors, Deut. xxvii. 17. Job (xxiv. 2.) recks those who are guilty of this crime among thieves and robbers, and oppressors of the poor. Josephus (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8.) has interpreted the law of Moses in a very particular sense. He says, "that it is not lawful to change the limits, either of the land belonging to the Israelites, or that of their neighbors with whom they are at peace; but that they ought to be left as they are, having been so placed by the order of God himself; for the desire which avaricious men have to extend their limits is the occasion of war and division; and whoever is capable of removing the boundaries of lands is not far from a disposition to violate all other laws."

Among the Romans, if a slave, with an evil design, changed any boundary, he was punished with death. Men of condition were sometimes banished, and private persons punished according to the circumstances of their crime, by pecuniary fines, or corporal punishment. The respect of the ancients for boundaries proceeded almost to adoration. Numa Pomphilus, king of the Romans, ordained, that offerings should be made to boundaries, with thick milk, cakes, and first-fruits. Ovid says, that a lamb was sacrificed to them, and that they were sprinkled with blood; and Juvenal speaks of cake and papp, which were laid every year upon the sacred bounds.

The Scripture recites it among the effects of God's omnipotence, to have fixed bounds to the sea, Ps. civ. 9; Job xxvi. 10; Prov. viii. 29; Jer. v. 22.

BOW, a kind of weapon well known. The Israelites had many very expert archers, and had their bows and arrows ready to use at a moment's notice, Ps. cxxvi. 6. Hosea vii. 16. For the Hebrew word bow (Heb. בּוּשׁ, bow) may be translated bow in the plural, and the verb bow in the plural, and the verb bow means bow. When there is mention in Scripture of bending the bow, the verb bow under foot is generally used; because it was the custom to put the feet upon the bow, to bend it. [The phrase a deceitful bow, to which the people of Israel are compared, (Ps. lxix. 37; Hos. vii. 16.) means a bow which shoots the arrow in a wrong direction, not as it is mired; and the comparison is just, because Israel swerved from the course which God had marked out for them and directed them to pursue.]

In 2 Sam. i. 18, we read in the English version, "Also he (David) bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow." Here the words "the use of" are not in the Hebrew, and convey a sense entirely false to the English reader. It should be, "teach them the bow," i.e. the song of the bow, the lamentation over Saul and Jonathan which follows; and which is called, by way of distinction, the bow, from the mention of this weapon in verse 22. This mode of selecting an inscription to a poem or work is common in the East; so in the Koran the second Sura is entitled the cow, from the incidental mention in it of the red heifer, comp. Numb. xix. 2. In a similar manner, the names of the books of the Penta-touch in the Hebrew Bibles, are merely the first word in each book. *R.

God is represented in Scripture with his bow and arrows, as warriors and conquerors are described, Hab. iii. 9. The Persians, in Scripture called Elamites, or the Caspian archers, in the world. See War, machines and instruments of.

BOWELS, the inward parts of a human body. According to the Jews, these are the seat of mercy, tenderness, and compassion; and hence the Scripture expressions of the bowels being moved, bowels of mercy, strengthened in your bowels, &c. The Hebrews sometimes place wisdom and understanding also in the bowels, Job xxxviii. 30; Psal. li. 10; Isaiah xix. 3, &c. (The reason of this is, that bowels is often put by the Hebrew writers for the internal organs generally, the inner man, and so also for heart as we use it. *R.

BOX-TREE, ונבר, tachur; so called from its flourishing, or perpetual viridity—an evergreen. Isaiah says, "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah-tree, and the myrtle, and the olive-tree; I will set in the desert the fir-tree, and the pine, and the box-tree together," Zech. xii. 19. The nature of the box-tree might lead us to look for evergreens among the foregoing trees, and perhaps by tracing this idea wells distant from the common life of man in the present satisfaction respecting them, which at present we cannot. A plantation of evergreens in the wilderness is not unlikely to be the import of this passage. The contrast between a perpetual verdure, and sometimes universal brownness, not enlivened by variety of tints, must be very great; nevertheless we must be careful not to group unnaturally associated vegetation.—Some suppose a species of cedar to be meant.

BOZEZ, the name of a rock which Jonathan climbed up to attack the Philistines, 1 Sam. xiv. 4. It was situated between Myron and Michmas, and formed, with a similar rock opposite, called Seveh, a defile, or strait.

BOZATH, a city of Judah, Joshua xv. 39; 2 Kings xxii. 1.

BOZRAH, a city of great antiquity, known also to the Greeks and Romans by the name of Bostra. In most of the passages of the Old Testament where it is mentioned, it appears as a chief city of the Edomites, among the Bechites, a Philistine, a Philistine, a man of tin (12), Jer. xlvi. 23, &c.) only in Jer. xiv. 22. It is named among the cities of Moab. It does not hence follow, that we must consider these as different cities; for in consequence of the continual wars, invasions and conquests which were common among the small kingdoms of that region, the possession of particular cities often passed into different hands. Thus Sela, i.e. Petra, the capital of the Edomites, taken from them by Amaziah king of Judah, (2 Kings xiv. 7.) is also mentioned by Isaiah among the Moabish cities, xvi. 1. Since now Bozrah lay not in the original territory of the Edomites, i.e. south of Judea, but north of the territory of the Ammonites, in Auranitis, or Hauran; we must suppose that the Edomites had become masters of it by conquest; and that it was afterwards taken from them by the Moabites, and held for a time by these latter. —Bozrah lay south-easterly from Edrei, one of the capitals of Beshan, and, according to Eusebius, twenty-four Roman miles distant from it; with this agrees also the specification of Potemny. The Romans reckoned Bozrah to desert Arabia; thus Ammianus Marcellinus says, (xiv. 27.) "Arabia has among her towns several large cities, as Bostra, and Gerasa, and Philadelphia."

Alexander Severus made it the seat of a Roman colony. In the acts of the Nicene, Ephesian, and Chalcidinian synods, mention is made of bishops of Bozrah; and at a later period it became an important seat of the Nestorians. (See Anselm's Biblioth. Orient. tom. iii. p. 508, 730.) Abulfeda calls the chief city of Aurantia, or Hauran. And even at the present day, according to Burckhardt, it is one of the most important places in the Haouran. (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 326.) "Bozrah is situated," he says, "in the open plain, and is at present the last inhabited place in the south-east extremity of the Haouran; it was formerly the capital of Arabia Provinciae, and is now, including its ruins, the largest town in the Haouran. It is of an oval shape, its greatest length being from east to west; its circumference is three quarters of an hour. It was anciently enclosed by a thick wall, which gave it the reputation of great strength. Many parts of this wall, especially on the west side, still remain; it was constructed with stones of a moderate size strongly cemented together. The principal buildings in Bozrah were on the east side, and in a direction from thence towards the middle of the town. The south and south-east quarters are covered with ruins of private dwellings, the walls of many of which are still standing, but most of the roofs have fallen in; they are made of mud and bitumen, or water; of which I counted five beyond the precincts of the town, and six within the walls. —The castle of Bozrah is a most important post to protect the harvests of the Haouran against the hungry Bedouins; but it is much neglected by the pachas of Damascus, and this year the crops of the inhabitants of Bozrah have been almost entirely consumed by the horses of the Aeneze, a tribe encamped in the vicinity. —Of the vineyards for which Bozrah was celebrated, and which are commemorated by the Greek medals of the colonia Bostrae, not a vestige remains. There is scarcely a tree in the neighborhood of the town; and the twelve or fifteen families, who now inhabit it, cultivate nothing but wheat, barley, horsebeans, and a little dhourra. A number of fine yew-trees grow wild among the ruins of the town, and were just beginning to open their buds. The ancient importance of the city is still demonstrated by the ruins of temples, theatres, and palaces; of which Burckhardt gives a fine picture."

BRACELET, an ornamental chain, or a clasp, made of various metals, always meant to adorn, the part on which it was worn. (The word bracelet comes properly from the Latin bracteula, meaning an ornament for the arm, and is the Hebrew צמת, tsamid. This is too common to need any description. But there is another kind of ornament called in Hebrew שער, levitated, or שער, stedah, which is also often rendered bracelet in our English version; sometimes improperly. The Hebrew words come from a root which signifies to step, to walk; hence the proper signification seems to be step-chain, or foot-chain, i. e. small chains which the oriental women wear fastened to the ornaments of the ankles, so as to unite the feet, and thus cause them to walk in a measured pace; an affection which is strongly reproved by Isaiah, (iii. 16.) who describes the females of Jerusalem as "walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkle with their feet." So in the enumeration of female ornaments, Isa. iii. 20; and also Num. xxxi. 50, where the Israelites, after having defeated the Midianites, offered to the Lord the "foot-chains, and bracelets, rings, ear-rings," &c. taken from the enemy. The word stedah, however, seems sometimes have been taken in a more general sense, and to have also included the sense of branches: as in 2 Sam. 1. 11, where the Amalekites who had slain Saul, says, that he took off the forehead (shield) that was upon the arm of that prince. So the Septuagint here has αὐτὸν ἔκπληκτον. But this is not the specific or usual meaning. 8. The Chaldee properly translates it χρυσῆς, or χρυσίδων, i.e. shutters or bonds, as do other paraphrasists authors. The women of Syria and Arabia at that time wore great rings round in their legs, to which are fastened many other larger rings, which make a tinkling noise, like little bells, when they walk or sit. These rings are fixed above the ankle, and are of gold, silver, copper, glass, or even of varnish, as in these places, to which are fastened little packets, that tinkler. Others have lesser rings called ζυγάτωρ, which have the same effect. The larger circles, or rings, were open in one place, in form of a crescent, by which they pass the small of the leg through them. (See Dacier.)

The Egyptian ladies wore also very valuable leg-rings, as is read in an inscription found in Sais, that the statue of Ias had ornaments of gold on its legs, set with two emeralds, and with eleven other precious stones. The Roman and Grecian women also used them. Trismachia, (in Ptolemais,) speaking of his spouse, says, See what she wears on her legs; Priscus makelis comedes; by way of complaint at her extravagance.

BRAMBLY. Judg. ix. 14, 15. The word so, αἰβολία, which is here translated bramble, is in Ps. liii. 9, rendered upon, and made on an inscription found in Egypt, that the statue of Ias had ornaments of gold on its legs, set with two emeralds, and with eleven other precious stones. The Roman and Grecian women also used them. Trismachia, (in Ptolemais,) speaking of his spouse, says, See what she wears on her legs; Priscus makelis comedes; by way of complaint at her extravagance.

BRAME. Judges ix. 14, 15. The word so, αἰβολία, which is here translated bramble, is in Ps. lxi. 9, rendered upon, and made on an inscription found in Egypt, that the statue of Ias had ornaments of gold on its legs, set with two emeralds, and with eleven other precious stones. The Roman and Grecian women also used them. Trismachia, (in Ptolemais,) speaking of his spouse, says, See what she wears on her legs; Priscus makelis comedes; by way of complaint at her extravagance.

BRASM. Judges ix. 14, 15. BREAD

The fact, this writer remarks, that "the principal sustenance of the orientals in general is new bread, just baked in this manner; and on this account they occasionally satisfy themselves on their journeys in the desert especially with meat." (Travels, vol. 1. p. 234, Germ. ed.)

The forms given to bread in different countries, however, are varied according to circumstances, whether it be required to sustain keeping for a longer or a shorter time; that bread which is to be eaten the same day it is made, is usually thin, bread, and flat; that which is meant for longer keeping is larger, and more bulky, that its moisture may not too soon evaporate. So far as we recollect, the loaves most generally used among the Jews were round; though the rabbins say the chew-bread was square. We have representations of loaves cut into five parts; we cannot affirm, that the loaf used by our Lord at the eucharist was thus divided; but if it were, it shows how conveniently it might be distributed among the disciples; to each a part. We conceive, too, that such a divided loaf gives no improper comment on the passage, "We having bread are one bread."—many partakers, each having his portion from the same "bread," 1 Cor. x. 17.

Moses enjoined the Israelites, on their arrival in the promised land, "to offer up a cake of the first fruits of their dough, for a heave-offering in their generations," Numb. xv. 20. These first-fruits of bread, or dough, were given to the priest or Levite, who dwelt in the place where the bread was baked; if no priest or Levite dwelt there, that part of the dough destined for the Lord, or his minister, was thrown into the fire, or the oven. The quantity of bread to be given for first-fruits was not settled by the law; but custom and tradition had determined it to be between the fourth part and the sixth of the mass at least. Philo remarks, that something was set apart for the priest, whenever they kneaded, but he does not say how much.

Leo of Modena tells us, that the modern custom of the Jews is, when the bread is kneaded, and a portion of dough made as big as forty eggs, to take a small part from it, and make a cake, which is instead of the first-fruits appointed by the law. It had been a custom to give this cake to the priest; but, at present, it is thrown into the fire, and is thus, O Lord, the King of the world, who hast sanctified us by thy precepts, and hast commanded us to separate a cake of our dough.

It appears, from several places of Scripture, that there stood not always a altar a part of the oblation of bread, to be offered with the ordinary sacrifices, Exod. xxix. 32; Numb. vi. 15. Moses forbids the priests to receive from the hands of strangers bread, or any thing else that they proposed to give; because all these gifts are corrupted, Lev. xxii. 32. There are different opinions concerning the meaning of this law. Some think that under the name of bread, we should understand all sorts of sacrifices and offerings, because the victims that were slain are, in Scripture, sometimes called the bread of God. Others imagine, that God forbids the receiving sacrifices of any kind, or any real offering immediately from the hands of inoffensive people; but that he permits the reception of money wherewith to purchase offerings and victims. Others explain it literally, of offerings of flour, bread, or cakes; that none of these were to be received in the temple from the hands of strangers, or infidels.

God threatens to break the staff of bread, that is, to send famine among the Israelites, Ezek. iv. 16. Our Saviour says, after the Psalmist, "Man doth not live by bread only, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Matt. iv. 4. God can sustain us, not only with bread, or ordinary food, but with any thing else, if he think fit to communicate a nourishing virtue to it. Thus he fed the Israelites in the wilderness with manna; and thus five thousand men were fed with five loaves, distributed by the hands of Christ and his apostles. Bread and water are used for sustenance in general, Deut. ix. 18, &c. "Bread of affliction, and water of affliction," (1 Kings xxii. 27) are the same as a little bread and a little water, or prison bread and prison water, prison allowance; as one partakes of them in a season of affliction.

As the Hebrews generally made their bread very thin, and in the form of little flat cakes, or wafers, they did not cut it into slices, but broke it; which gave rise to that expression so usual in Scripture, of breaking bread, to signify eating, sitting down to table, taking a repeat. In the institution of the eucharist, our Saviour broke the bread which he consecrated; whence, to break bread, and breaking of bread, in the New Testament, are used for celebrating the eucharist.

The Psalmist speaks of the bread of tears, and the bread of sorrows, Psalm xii. 3; xxxvii. 2. Meaning continual sorrow and tears, instead of food; or which makes us lose the desire of eating and drinking. "Bread of wickedness, bread of deceit," is bread acquired by fraudulent and criminal practices. These metaphors are very energetic.

Bread, Daily; to show an entire dependence on our heavenly Father's care, we are instructed to pray day by day for our daily bread, Matt. vi. 11. The Greek word ἐπιτροπή, sufficient, used by the evangelists, may be understood as opposed to περιπατήματα, superfluities. Many commentators include in this petition a prayer for daily supply, as the spiritual wants of the believer by Divine Grace, as well as a daily supply for his temporal need by Divine Providence.

Shew-bread, (Heb. bread of presence,) was bread of every sabbath day to God on the golden table placed in the holy place, Exod. xxv. 30. The Hebrews affirm, that the loaves were square, having four sides, and covered with leaves of gold. They were twelve in number, in memory of the twelve tribes of Israel, in whose names they were offered. They must have been quite large, since every loaf was composed of two assarons or ounces of flour, which make about ten pints 2-10ths. The loaves had no leaven; were presented hot every sabbath day, the old leaves being taken away, which were to be eaten by the priests only. With this offering there was salt and incense; and even wine, according to some commentators. Scripture mentions only salt and incense; but it is presumed wine was added, because it was not wanting in other sacrifices and offerings. It is believed that the loaves were placed one upon the other in two piles, of six each; and that between every loaf there were two thin plates of gold, folded back in a semicircle, the whole length of them, to hold the leaves from growing moldy. These golden plates, thus turned in, were supported at their extremities by two golden forks which rested upon the ground, Lev. xxv. 5 seq.

As there is much difference of opinion among commentators as to the manner in which these loaves were placed upon the table, it may be necessary to offer some remarks on the subject. The following quotation from Lightfoot, (of the Temple,) however, may be previously perused with advantage: —

"On the north side of the house, which was on the right hand, stood the shew-bread table of two cubits long, and a cubit and a half broad, (Exod. xxv. 23,) in the tabernacle of Moses, but wanting that half cubit in breadth in the second temple (the reason of the falling short, not given by them that give the relation.) It stood lengthwise in its place, that is, east and west, and had a crown of gold round about it, toward the upmost edge of it, which [see Real Hist. in Ex. xvi.] the Jews resemble to the crown of the kingdom. Upon this table there stood continually twelve loaves, which, because they stood before the Lord, were called ἐπίπτωμα, Matth. xii. 4, ἐπιτροπή, of the table of show-bread, (the bread of presence,) for which our English translators have found a very fit word, calling it the shew-bread; the manner of making and placing of which loaves was thus, says Maimonides: (in Tamidin, per. 5.) "Out of four and twenty new loaves, (three loaves to an ephah,) that is, out of eight bushels of wheat being ground, they sifted it out (Lev. xxv. 5.) four and twenty tenth-deals, (Exod. xvi. 36,) or omers, of the purest flour; and that they made into twelve cakes, two omers in a cake; or the fifth part of an ephah of corn in every cake; they made the cakes square, namely, ten hand-breaths long, and five broad, and seven fingers thick.

On the sabbath they set them on the table in this manner; four priests went first in to fetch the loaves that had stood all the week; and other four went in after them to bring in new ones in their stead; two of the four last carried the two rows of the cakes, namely, six a-piece, and the other two carried in, either of them, a golden dish, in which the frankincense was, to bring to the table the loaves; and so those four that went to fetch out the old bread, two of them were to carry the cakes, and the other two the dishes; these four that came to fetch the old bread out stood before the table with their faces towards the north, and the other four that brought in the new stood betwixt the table and the wall with their faces towards the south; those drew off the old cakes, and these, as the others went off, slipped on the new, so that the table was never without bread upon it, because it is said, they should stand before the Lord continually. They set the cakes in two rows, six and six, one upon another, and they set them, the length of the cakes crossed over the breadth of the table, (by which it appears, that the crown of gold about the table rose not above the surface of it, but was a border below edgeing even with the plain of it, as is well held by Rabbi Solomon, in Exodus xxv.) and so the cakes lay two hand-breaths over the table on either side; for the table was but six hand-breaths broad, and the cakes were ten hand-breaths long; now for preventing that which so lay over should not break off, if they had no other way to prevent it, (which yet they had, but I confess that the description of it in their authors I do not understand) yet their manner of laying the cakes one upon another was such as that the weight rested upon the table, and not upon the points that hung over. The lowest cake of either row they laid upon the plain table; and upon that cake they laid three golden canes at distance one from another, and upon those they laid the next cake; and then three golden canes again, and upon them another cake; and so of the rest, save only that they laid but two such canes upon the fifth cake, because there was but one cake more to be laid upon.
Now these which I call golden canes (and the Hebrews tell them so also) were not like reeds or canes, perfectly round and hollow through, but they were like canes or reeds slit up the middle; and the reason of laying them thus betwixt cake and cake was, that
by their hollowness air might come to every cake,
and all might thereby keep the better from mould-
iness and corrupting; and thus did the cakes lie hollow, and one not touching another, and all the golden canes being laid so, as that they lay within the compass of the breadth of the table; the ends of the cakes that lay over the table on either side bare no burden but their own weight.

"On the top of either row was set a golden dish with a handful of frankincense, which, when the bread was taken away, was burnt as incense to the Lord, (Lev. xxiv. 7.) and the bread went to Aaron and his sons, or to the priests, as their portions to be eaten."

So far this learned author
This is a representation of this table, as usually accepted in, on rab-ninical authority. The table itself is a parallelogram; in the middle stands a vase with its covering, which vase is understood to contain incense; at each end of the table stands a pile,
formed by the loaves of shew-bread; this pile is uphold by golden prongs, which prevent the loaves from slipping out of their places; and between the loaves are thin pipes laid for the admission of air, to prevent any kind of mouldiness, &c. from attaching to the bread. The reader will observe the great height of these piles.
We cannot but wonder at the conduct of whoever originally made the design for this table; by what authority could he place on these prongs the head of any animal, whether ox or sheep? or was it in allusion to the four heads of the cherub? (as there were four of these prongs, two on each side of the table.) It should seem to be the head of a young bull;—but, if so, if there were really any tradition of such a head, might it not become the origin of that calumny which reported, that the Jews worshipped an ass's head? (see Ass.) for it is remarkable that the calumny does not say a complete ass,
but the head of an ass; and, possibly, some such mistake might give occasion to it;—for, had it said an ox's head, the report had not been far from the truth, if this representation be authentic. However, that must rest on the rabbins, whose accounts are its authorities; or on whatever authority the original designer might have to plead. It should appear by this figure, that the crown of carved work around the rim of the table rose above the superficial level of the table; if so, as Lightfoot justly remarks, the loaves could not exceed it, so as to overhang its edge, but must be confined within its limits. It will be observed, that the legs of this table are distinct and insulated; not being strengthened by a rail, or any similar connection with each other, in any part.

As the foregoing figure has no authority beside description, we have here given a representation of the shew-bread table, as it is delineated on the arch of Titus, but restored to somewhat of its true appearance. This shows no loaves placed upon it; and probably Thus it found it thus vacant, when it became its prey; but it shows a cup, standing at one end of the table, nearly, or altogether,
on the spot where, according to the rabbins, one of the piles of bread should be; and in fact, in such a part that it would be impossible to place one of those piles, without removing the cup. We observe, too, nothing of the supposed golden prongs, or supports to those piles, in this figure. From this situation of the cup we have ventured to surmise the possibility, that there was on the table a second cup, (which we have hinted at by dotted lines,) in a part of the table answerable in point of symmetry to that of the first cup. It is true, however, that a single cup might stand in the middle of the front of the table; but what if there were in the middle a small box of incense and a cup standing on each side of it?

It is probable the reader will be struck with the manner of ranging the
loaves in this engraving,
which appears to differ altogether from the rabbinical pile; that supposing them to be laid one upon another in height;
this supposing them to be laid by the side of one another in length.

We gather this order of the loaves, (1.)
from the use of the Hebrew word itself, (γγ', τρ&k;) which our translators certainly understood in this sense, and have very properly rendered, in Lev. xxiv. 6. “two rows, six in a row”—not two piles, six in a pile; but a row, that is, at length, one loaf by the side of its fellows.
The word denotes an orderly arrangement of the subjects to which it refers; so, Prov. ix. 2, “Wisdom hath furnished, arranged the provisions on the table; but provisions are not arranged on a table in piles, one upon another; but in rows, one by the side of another, or one row before, one behind, another. So, Numb. xxiii. 4, “I have arranged seven altars;” surely not one over the other, but in a line.
It denotes also an army, that is, rows of soldiers, standing side by side; the inference, therefore, is that the word is conclusive against the rabbinical notion of piles of shew-bread, since it denotes distributions or arrangements, and those in ranks or rows.
(2.) As these twelve loaves represented an offering from each of the twelve tribes, it was fit that each of the shew-bread, or what it represented, than almost any other emblem in the Jewish economy. The learned Dr. Cudworth has the following remarks on the subject in his treatise on the Lord's supper: "When God had brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, resolving to manifest himself in a peculiar manner present among them, he thought good to dwell amongst them in a visible and external manner; and, therefore, while they were in the wilderness, and sojourned in tents, he would have a tent or tabernacle built, to sojourn with them also. This mystery of the tabernacle was fully understood by the learned Nachmanides, who, in few words, but pregnant, expresseth himself to this purpose: 'The mystery of the tabernacle was this, that it was to be a place for the Shekinah, or habitation of Divinity, to be fixed in, and this, no doubt, as a special type of God's future dwelling in Christ's human nature, which was the true Shekinah; but when the Jews were come into their land, and had there built them houses, God intended to have a fixed dwelling-house also; and, therefore, his movable tabernacle was to be turned into a standing temple. Now, the tabernacle, or temple, being thus as a house, for God to dwell in visibly, to consecrate the holy of holies, the most holy place, or habitation complete, there must be all things suitable to a house belonging to it. Hence in the holy place, there must be a table and a candlestick, because this was the ordinary furniture of a room, as the fore-commanded Nachmanides observes. The table must have its dishes, and spoons, and bowls, and coverings belonging to it, though they were never used; and always furnished with bread upon it. The candlestick must have its lamps continuing burning. Hence also there must be a continued fire kept in this house of God upon the altar, as the focus of it; to which notion, I conceive, the prophet Isaiah doth allude, (chap. xxxi. 9.) 'Whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem;' and besides all this, to carry the notion still further, there must be some constant meat and provision brought into this house; which was done in the sacrifices which were partly consumed by fire upon God's altar, and partly eaten by the priests, who were God's servants, or servants of his family, and therefore to be principally offered in burnt offerings. That which was consumed upon God's altar, was accounted God's mess, as appeareth from Malachi, (i. 12.) where the altar is called God's table, and the sacrifice upon it, God's meat: 'Ye say, The table of the Lord is polluted, and his meat is contemptible.' And often, in the law, the sacrifice is called God's κοσμίων, lehem, that is, his bread or food. Wherefore it is further observable, that, besides the flesh of the beast offered up in sacrifice, there was a minach, that is, a meat or rather bread-offering, made of flours and oil; and libations, or drink-offering, which was always joined with the daily sacrifice, as the bread and drink which was to go along with God's meat. It was also strictly commanded, that there should be salt in every sacrifice and oblation, because all meat is unsavory without salt, as Nachmanides hath here also well observed: 'Because it was not honorable that God's meat should be unsavory, without salt.' Lastly, all these things were to be consumed on the altar only by the holy fire, which came down from heaven, because they were God's portion, and therefore to be eaten or consumed by himself, in an extraordinary manner.'
BREAD

We have remarked, that the shew-bread was eaten by none but priests; nevertheless, David, having received some of these loaves from the high-priest Abimelech, ate of them, without scruple, in his necessity; (1 Sam. xxi. 6–9) and our Saviour uses his example to justify the apostles, who had bruised ears of corn, and were eating them on the sabbath day, Matt. xii. 3, seq.

BREAST, bosom. The females in the East are more anxiously desirous than those of northern climates of a full and swelling breast; in fact, they study embonpoint of appearance, to a degree uncommon among ourselves; and what in the temperate regions of Europe might be called an elegant slenderness of shape, they consider as a meagre appearance of starvation. They indulge these notions to excess. It is necessary to premise this, before we can enter thoroughly into the spirit of the language in Cant. viii. 8–10, which Mr. Taylor renders somewhat differently from our public translation.

Bride. Our sister is little, and she hath no breasts; being as yet too young; immature;

What shall we do for our sister, in the day when she shall be spoken for?

Bridegroom. If she be a wall, we will build on her [ranges] turrets of silver;

If she be a door, we will frame around her panels of cedar.

Bride. I am a wall and my breasts like Kiosks,

Thereby I appeared in his eyes as one who offered peace [repose; enjoyment].

This instance of self-approbation is peculiarly in character for a female native of Egypt; in which country, Juvenal sneeringly says, it is nothing uncommon to see the breast of the nurse, or mother, larger than the infant she suckles. The same conformation of a long and pendent breast is marked in a group of women musicians, found by Denon painted in the tombs on the mountain to the west of Thebes; on which he observes, that the same is the shape of the bosom of the present race of Egyptian females. The ideas couched in these verses appear to be these, “Our sister is quite young,” says the bride; “But,” says the bridegroom, “she is upright as a wall; and if her breasts do not project beyond her person, as Kiosks project beyond a wall, we will ornament her dress [head-dress?] in the most magnificent manner with turret-shaped diadems of silver.” This gives occasion to the reflection of the bride, understood to be speaking to herself aside—“As my sister is compared to a wall, I also in my person am upright as a wall; but I have this further advantage, that my bosom is ample and full, as a Kiosk projecting beyond a wall; and though Kiosks offer repose and indulgence, yet my bosom offers to my spouse infinitely more effectual enjoyment than they do.” This, it may be conjectured, is the simple idea of the passage; the difference being that turrets are built on the top of a wall; Kiosks project from the front of it. The name Kiosk is not restricted to this construction, but includes most of what are commonly called summer-houses or pavilions. [This exposition forms a part of Mr. Taylor’s translation of the whole book of Canticles, which is inserted under that article. See the remarks there prefixed.]

I. BREASTPLATE, a piece of defensive armor to protect the heart. The breastplate of God is righteousness, which renders his whole conduct unassailable to any accusation. Christians are exhorted to take to themselves “the breastplate of righteousness,” (Eph. vi. 14), and “the breastplate of faith and love,” 1 Thess. v. 8. Being clothed with these graces, they will be able to resist their enemies, and quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one; a beautiful simile.

II. BREASTPLATE, a piece of embroidery about ten inches square, (Exod. xxviii. 15, seq.) of very rich work, which the high-priest wore on his breast. It was made of two pieces of the same rich embroidered stuff of which the ephod was made, having a front and a lining, and forming a kind of purse, or bag, in which, according to the rabbins, the Urim and Thummim were enclosed. The front of it was set with twelve precious stones, on each of which was engraved the name of one of the tribes. They were placed in four rows, and divided from each other by the little golden squares or partitions in which they were set, according to the following order.

![Diagram of the breastplate]

The names given to the stones here are not free from doubt, for we are very imperfectly acquainted with this part of natural science. The breastplate was fastened at the four corners; those on the top to each shoulder, by a golden hook, or ring, at the end of a wreathed chain; those below to the girdle of the ephod by two strings or ribbands, which also had two rings and hooks. This ornament was never to be severed from the priestly garments; and it was called the memorial (Ex. xxviii. 13), being designed to remind the priest how dear those robes should be to him, whose names he bore upon his heart. It was also named the breastplate of judgment, probably because by it was discovered the judgment and the will of God; or because the high priest who wore it was the fountain of justice, and put on this ornament when he exercised his judicial capacity in matters of great consequence, which concerned the whole nation. Compare Urim and Thummim.

BRIDE, a new-married female. In the typical language of Scripture, the love of the Redeemer to the church is energetically alluded to in the expression, the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. xxi. 9. See Marriage, and Canticles.

BRIDEGROOM, see Marriage, and Canticles.

BRIERS, see Thorns.

BRIMSTONE, a well known substance, extremely inflammable, that may be melted and consumed by fire, but not dissolved in water. God destroyed the cities of the plain by raining upon them fire and brimstone, Gen. xix. 24. The wicked are threatened with this punishment, Psal. xi. 6; Rev. xiv. 11.

BROOKS, properly torrent, in Greek, Xecnion; in Hebrew, נֶחֶל nêcal. A brook is distinguished from a river, for a river flows at all times, but a brook at some times only; as after great rains, or the melting of snows. As the Hebrew nêcal signifies a valley, as well as a brook, one is often used for the other; as the brook of Gerar, for the valley of Gerar. But this ambiguity is of little consequence, since generally there are brooks in valleys.

BROTHE is taken in Scripture for any relation, a man of the same country, or of the same nation, for our neighbor, for a man in general. It is probable that James, Joses, and Judas, (Matt. xxvii. 56,) though called brothers of Jesus, were not strictly his natural brothers; but (according to the usage of the Hebrews, in extending names of affection from the proper kin to which they accurately applied, to more distant relatives) cousins. James and Joses were sons of Mary, (certainly not the Virgin,) Matt. xxvii. 56. James and Judas were sons of Alphaeus, (Mark iii. 18,) and of the same name with Alphaeus, husband of Mary, sister of the Virgin, John xix. 25. Brother is one of the same nation (Rom. iv. 3, &c.)—one of the same faith, (first Epistle of St. John,) one of the same nation, Heb. ii. 17. Thus was there a natural generation in the application of the word brother in Scripture, and must, perhaps, in all languages employ some equivalent extension of it. We say in English, a brother of the same trade—a brother of the same color—brother black, &c. Of the same disposition—brother misers. Of the same vice—brother thief, &c. And to express many other ideas of similarity, we often attach meanings no less extensive to this word, than are denoted by it when it occurs in its loosest sense in holy writ.

By the law, the brother of a man who died without children was obliged to marry the widow of the deceased, to raise up children to him, that his name and memory might not be extinct. See Marriage.

BURASTIS, a famous city of Egypt. Ezekiel (xxvii. 17) calls it Pibeseth. It stood on the eastern shore of the eastern arm of the Nile. See Pi-Bêeth.

BUCKET, see Water.

BUCKLER. (See Arms, Armor.) It was a defensive piece of armor, of the nature of a shield; and is spoken figuratively of God, (2 Sam. xxii. 31; Ps. xviii. 2, 30; Prov. ii. 7,) and of the truth of God, Ps. xvi. 4.

To BUILD. In addition to the proper and literal signification of this word, it is used with reference to children and a numerous posterity. Sarah desires Abraham to take Hagar to wife, that by her she may be built up, i.e. have children to support her family, Gen. xvi. 2. The midwives who refused obedience to Pharaoh’s orders, when he commanded them to put to death all the male children of the Hebrews, were rewarded for it; God built them houses—gave them a numerous posterity, says Calmet. But some think the passage signifies that the houses of the Israelites were established by the numbers of children which the midwives saved. The LXX read, they (the midwives) made themselves houses, more extensive than mere families; and Josephus says, they were Egyptian women; if so, the phrase expresses the accumulation of wealth, or great fortunes, Exod. i. 21. [This last is the more probable reading.]

BUL, the eighth month in the Hebrew calendar, afterwards called Marcheswan; answering nearly to our October, O. S. According to some, (which is the more probable supposition,) it corresponded to the lunar month from the new moon of November to that of December. The name signifies rain month. It is the third month of the civil year, and the eighth month of the ecclesiastical year. It has twenty-nine days. (See Jewish Calendar.) We only find the name Bul in 1 Kings vii. 38, under the reign of Solomon.

BULL, Bullock. This animal was reputed clean, and was generally used in sacrifice. The Septuagint and Vulgate often use the word ox; comprehending under the word rather the species, than the sex or quality, of the animal; like our word bullock. The ancient Hebrews, in general, never mutilated any creature; and where in the text we read ox, we are to understand a bull, Lev. xxii. 24.

The beauty of Joseph is compared to that of a bullock. The Egyptians had a particular veneration for this animal; they placed a bull’s head on the moon; and the Jews are supposed to have imitated them in their worship of the golden calves. Jacob reproaches his sons, Simeon and Levi, for having dug down the wall of the Shechemites; but the LXX translate the Hebrew, for hamstraining the bullocks, Gen. xlix. 6. Many of the ancient fathers explained this passage of Christ, and referred it to his being put to death by the Jews. The Hebrew signifies either a wall or a bull. Bull, in a figurative and allegorical sense, is taken for powerful, fierce, insolent enemies. Fat bulls (bulls of Bashan) surrounded me on every side, says the Psalmist, Ps. xxii. 12. and xviii. 30. Rebuff the beast of the reeds, the multitude of the bulls; Lord, smite in thy wrath these animals which feed in large pastures, these herds of bulls. And Isaiah says, (chap. xxxvii. 7,) The Lord shall cause his victims to be slain in the land of Edom, a terrible slaughter will he make, he will kill the unicorns, and the bulls, meaning those proud and cruel princes who oppressed the weak.

BURDEN, a heavy load. The word is commonly used in the prophets for a disastrous prophecy. The burden of Babylon, the burden of Nineveh, of Mohab, of Egypt. The Jews asking Jeremiah cap-tiously. What was the burden of the Lord? He answered them, You are that burden; you are, as it were, inapprachable to the Lord; he will throw you on the ground, and break you to pieces, and you shall become the reproach of the people, Jer. xxiii. 33—40. The burden of the desert of the sea (Isaiah xxxi. 1) is a calamitous prophecy against Babylon, which stood on the Euphrates, and was watered as by a sea; and which, from being great and populous, as it then was, would soon be reduced to a solitude. See Babylon.

The burden of the valley of vision, (Isaiah xxvii. 1.) is a denunciation against Jerusalem, called, by way of irony, "The Valley of Vision," though it stood on an eminence. It is called "of Vision," or "of Moriah," because it is thought that on mount Moriah Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac. The burden of the beasts of the south, (Isa. xxx. 6.) evidently respects Judea, but we cannot perceive on what account it has this inscription. It may be, that copiers supplied it; for it seems to make no sense with the context, but, on the contrary, interrupts and suspends it. Be thus read, (ver. 4, 5.)—The Jews sent their ambassadors as far as Tanis and Hanes; but they were confounded when they saw that these people were not in a condition to assist them in the burden of the beasts of the south. [It seemeth the burden of the beasts of the south.] They went, I say, "into the land of trouble and anguish, from whence come the young and old lion, the viper and fiery flying serpent; they will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young asses, and their treasures upon the bunches of camels; to a people that shall not profit them." It may then be a marginal note or inscription, crept into the text, and drawn from the mention of the beasts of burden that go down to Egypt, i.e. the south.—Zechariah says, (ch. 3.) "In that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people. All that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it." Those that would lift it shall be hurt [strain themselves] by it. All nations around Jerusalem tried their strength against it; the Assyrians, the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Egyptians, &c. but all these had been hurt by the Jews. They have taken the city, it is true, but they paid dearly for their victory by their losses. Jerome observes, that in the city of Philostratus, the people of all nations were accustomed to transport the bodies of the dead from Jerusalem to Hecale, or Acco, or to the temple, in order to make it a common reservoir, in which the priests would immerse them. Many think that "the stone of Zoheleth," (1 Kings i. 9.) was one of these stones of burden; and Ecclesiasticus (vi. 21.) alludes to this custom, when he says, "She will lie upon him as a mighty stone of trial, and he will cast her from him ere it be long." The weight, or burden of the day, (Matt. xx. 12.) expresses the labor and toil of the day, during many hours, especially the meridian heat.

BURIAL. The Hebrews were, at all times, very careful in the burial of their dead; to be deprived of burial, was thought one of the greatest dishonors, or causes of unhappiness, that could befal any man; (Eccl. vi. 3.) being denied to none, not even to executors; but it was withheld from self-murderers till after sunset, and the souls of such persons were believed to be plunged into hell. This concern for burial proceeded from a persuasion of the soul's immortality. Jeremiah (viii. 2.) threatens the kings, priests, and false prophets, who had adored idols, that their bones should be cast out of their graves, and be thrown like dung upon the earth. The same prophet foretold that Jehoiakim, king of Judah, who built his house by unrighteousness, and who abandoned himself to avarice, violence, and all manner of vice, among other severe punishments, should be buried with "the burial of an ass," that he should be cast out of the gates of Jerusalem into the common sewer, ch. xxii. 18, 19. It is observed, (2 Macc. v. 10.) that Jason, who had denied the privilege of burial to many Jews, was himself treated in the same manner; that he died in a foreign land, and was thrown like carrion upon the earth, not being laid even in a stranger's grave. Good men made it part of their devotion to inter the dead, as we see by the instance of Tobit.

A remnant of the expression of the Psalmist (Ps. cxii. 7.) appears to have much poetical heightening in it, which even its author, in all probability, did not mean should be accepted literally; while, nevertheless, it might be susceptible of a literal acceptance, and is sometimes so treated. He says, "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth." This seems to be strong eastern painting, and almost figurative language; but that it may be strictly true, the following extract demonstrates:—At five o'clock we left Gariganos, our journey being still to the eastward of north; and, at a quarter past six in the evening, arrived at the village of that name, whose inhabitants had all perished with hunger the year before, their wretched bones being all unburied and scattered upon the surface of the ground, where the village formerly stood. We encamped among the bones of the dead; no space could be found free from them; and on the 23d, at six in the morning, full of horror at this miserable spectacle, we set out for Teowa; and this was the seventh day from Ras el Feel. After an hour's travelling, we came to a small river, which still had water standing in some considerable pools, although its banks were destitute of any kind of shade. At five o'clock we had an eerie custom, which continued even to his time, to have great and heavy round stones, which the young people lifted up as high as they could, by way of exercise, and to try their strength. He assures us, moreover, that when the Jews died, they were buried in the same manner; and this was the custom of the Persians, he had seen an iron ball of very great weight, and which he could not move but with difficulty, with which they heretofore used to try the strength of the athletes, that their powers might be known, and that they might not be too unequally matched. Many think that "the stone of Zoheleth," (1 Kings i. 9.) was one of these stones of burden; and Ecclesiasticus (vi. 21.) alludes to this custom, when he says, "She will lie upon him as a mighty stone of trial, and he will cast her from him ere it be long." The weight, or burden of the day, (Matt. xx. 12.) expresses the labor and toil of the day, during many hours, especially the meridian heat.

There was nothing determined particularly in the law as to the place of burying the dead. There were sepulchres in town and country, by the highways, in gardens, and on mountains; those belonging to the kings of Judah were in Jerusalem, and the king's gardens. Ezekiel intimates that they were dug under the mountain upon which the temple stood; since God says, that in future this holy mountain should not be polluted with the dead bodies of their kings. The sepulchre which Joseph of Aritheus had provided for himself, and in which he placed our Saviour's body, was in his garden; and that of Rachel was adjacent to the highway from Jeru-

BUT

Salém to Bethlehem. That of the Maccabees was at Modín, upon an eminence, whence it was visible at a great distance both by land and sea. The kings of Israel had their burying-places in Samaria. Samuel was interred in his own house, (1 Sam. xxv. 1.) Moses, Aaron, Eleazar and Joshua were buried in mountains; Saul and Deborah (Rebekah's nurse) were buried in Saul's burying-places in the fields of Hisn. It is affirmed, that the sepulchres of the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in the valley of Kidron. Here likewise was the burying-place for foreigners.

The following extract from Dr. Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, etc. (p. 207?) may cast some light on the Hebrew modes of burial: "While walking out one evening, a few fields distance from Deir el Kanûr, with the son of my host, to see a detached garden belonging to his father, he pointed out to me, near it, a small, solid stone building, apparently a house; very solemnly adding, "Kobbur beit, the sepulchre of my family." It had neither door nor window. He then directed my attention to a considerable number of similar buildings at a distance; which to the eye are exactly like houses, but which are in fact family mausoleums for the dead. They have a most melancholy appearance, which made him shudder while he explained their use. They seem, by their dead walls, which must be opened at each several interment of the members of a family, to say, 'This is an unkindly house, to which visitors do not willingly go; but, one by one, they will be forced to enter; and none who enter ever come out again.' Perhaps this custom, which prevails here and in the lonely neighboring parts of the mountains, may have been of great antiquity, and may serve to explain some Scripture phrases. The prophet Samuel was buried "in his house at Ramah," (1 Sam. xxv. 1.) it could hardly be in his dwelling-house. Josiah was buried in his own house in the wilderness. (1 Kings ii. 34.) This was "the house appointed for all living," Job xxx. 23. Carpzov remarks, (Apparat. p. 643.) 'It is hardly to be supposed that the sepulchres were in the houses themselves, and under the roof; and we are therefore rather to understand by the term every thing which belongs or appertains to the house, as a court or garden, in a corner of which perhaps such a monument was erected.' The view of these sepulchral houses at Deir el Kanûr puts the matter beyond doubt.

The Jews call what we term a church-yard or cemetery, "the house of the living," to show their belief of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body; and when they come to bear a corpse, they address themselves to those who lie there, as if they were still alive, saying, 'Blessed be the Lord who hath created you, fed you, brought you up, and at last, in his justice, taken you out of the world. He knows the number of you all, and will in time revive you.' Blessed be the Lord who causeth death and restoreth life. (Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. xxxv.) Their respect for sepulchres is so great, that they build synagogues and oratories near those of great men and prophets, and go and pray near them. The rabbins teach, that it is a lawful by law and land. 'The king Turbo the repose of the dead, by burying another corpse in the same grave, even after a long time; nor to carry an aqueduct across the common place of burial; nor a highway; nor to go and gather wool there, nor to suffer cattle to feed there. When the Jews come with a funeral to a burying-place, they repeat the blessing directed to the dead, as above mentioned; the body is then put down upon the ground, and if 'Kama' is spoken, the dedicatory kind of funeral oration and encomium is made over him. This being done, they walk round the grave, reciting rather a long prayer, beginning with Deut. xxxii. 41. which they call the righteousness of the dead; because therein they return thanks to God for having pronounced an equitable judgment concerning the life and person of the deceased. A little sack full of earth is then put under the dead person's head, and the coffin is nailed down and closed. If it be a man, ten persons take ten turns about him, and say a prayer for his soul; the nearest relation tears a corner of his clothes, and the dead body is let down into the grave, with his face towards heaven, the mourners crying to him, "Go in peace," or rather, according to the Talmudists, "Go to peace." The nearest relations first throw earth on the body; and afterwards all present. This done, they retire, walking backwards; and before they leave the burying-ground, they pluck bits of grass three times, and cast them behind their backs, saying, 'They shall flourish like grass on the earth,' Ps. lxxxi. 16.

Calmet is of opinion, that there is no instance of an epitaph inscribed on the tomb of an ancient Hebrew; and remarks, that that which is reported of Adoniram's, found in Spain, and some others of like authority, are not deserving of notice. If a monument were erected in memory of a king, a hero, a prophet, or a warrior, the tomb itself, he remarks, spoke sufficiently, and the memory of the person was perpetuated, together with his history, among the people. Nevertheless, they might have inscriptions, distinguishing the party they contained; and if the hieroglyphics mentioned in the article on tombs be so ancient as there hinted, they may be regarded as proofs that monumental inscriptions were not unusual in (perhaps Jewish) antiquity.

BURNING BUSH, wherein the Lord appeared to Moses, at the foot of Mount Horeb. (See Moses.) As to the person who appeared in the bush, Scripture, in several places, calls him by the name of God, Exod. iii. 2, 6, 13, 14, &c. He calls himself the Lord God; the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the God who was to deliver his people from their bondage in Egypt. Moses, blessing Joseph, says, 'Let the memory of the burning bush come on the head of Joseph,' Deut. xxxiii. 16. But in the places of Exodus which we are examining, instead of "the Lord appeared to him," the Hebrew and the Septuagint, instead of "the angel of the Lord appeared to him," Stephen, in the Acts, (56) reads it in the same manner; Jerome, Augustine and Gregory the Great teach the same thing. It was an angel, agent, messenger, who, representing the Lord, spoke in his name. The ancients generally hold the Son of God to be the person who appeared in the bush.

BURNT-OFFERINGS, see Offerings; and for the altar of burnt-offerings, see Altar.

BUSHEL is used in our English version to express the Greek word μηνής. Latin mensa, a measure containing about a peck, Matt. v. 15.

BLATTER is generally taken, in Scripture, for cream, or liquid butter. Children were fed with butter and honey; (Isa. vii. 15, 22) with milk-diet, with cream, and with honey, which was common in Palestine. (D'Arbes.₍p. 205₎) speaks of the Arabs, says, "One of their chief breakfasts is cream —of fresh butter—mixed in a mess of honey. These do not seem to suit very well together, but experience teaches that this is no bad mixture, nor displeasing in its taste, if one is ever so little accustomed to it." The last words seem to indicate a delicacy of taste, of which D'Arvieux was sensible in himself, which did not, at once, relish this mixture; and, very possibly, the prophet alludes to something of the same hesitation in children, who must be some time before they fancy this mixture; but, having been accustomed to it, they find it pleasant, and know how to prefer the good and agreeable, before what is evil; i.e. less suited to their palate. We presume, therefore, that this food was, as near as conveniently might be, an immediate substitute for the mother's milk. Thevenot also tells us, "The Arabs knead their bread-paste fresh; adding thereto butter, and sometimes also honey." (Part i. p. 178.) We read in 2 Sam. xvii. 29 of honey and butter being brought to David, as well as other refreshments, "because the people were hungry, weary, and thirsty." Considering the list of articles, there seems to be nothing adapted to moderate thirst, except this honey and butter; for we may thus arrange the passage: the people were hungry,—to satisfy which were brought wheat, barley, flour, beans, lentils, sheep, cheese; the people were weary,—to relieve this were brought beds; the people were thirsty,—to answer the purpose of drinking were brought a mixture of butter, honey, and milk; food fit for breakfast, light and easy of digestion, pleasant, cooling, and refreshing. That this mixture was a delightful liquid appears from the melodious denunciation of Zophar: (Job xx. 17.) The wicked man "shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks [torrents] of honey and butter;" honey alone could hardly be esteemed so flowing as to afford a comparison to rivers and torrents; but cream, in such abundance, is much more fluid; and mixed with honey, may dilute and thin it into a state more proper for running—poetically speaking, as freshly as water itself. "Honey and milk are under thy tongue," says the spouse, in Cant. iv. 11. Perhaps this mixture was not merely a refreshment, but an elegant refreshment; which heightens the inference from the predictions of Isaiah, and the description of Zophar, who speaks of its abundance; and it increases the respect paid to David, by his faithful and loyal subjects at Mahanaim.

It is to be noted, from Prov. xxx. 33, that churned butter was not unknown in Judea. Josephus saw it made in Curdish in the following manner: "The milk was put into a sort of bottle, made of a goat's skin, every part of which was sewed up except the neck, which was tied with a string to prevent the milk running out. They then fixed three strong sticks in the ground, in a form somewhat like what we often use in raising weights, only on a smaller scale. From these they suspend the goat's skin tied by each end, and continue shaking it backwards and forwards till it becomes butter; and they easily know this by the noise it makes. They then empty the skin into a large vessel, and skim off the butter." (Journey over land from India to England, p. 188.)

Hasselquist mentions the following custom of the Greek ecclesiastics at Magnesia: "The priests, having washed and dried the feet of the guests, anointed them with fresh butter, which, as they told me, was made of the first milk of a young cow;"—perhaps the first milk of a "bottle" bull, which had recently calved; Bruce says the king of Abyssinia anoints his head with butter daily.

(Job, chap. xxix. 6.) speaks of "washing his steps with butter; and the rock poured him out rivers of oil," where to bathe the footsteps in butter, or rather in thick curdled milk, means, to walk in a country overflowing with milk; and this, with the subsequent parallelism, denotes a land abounding with milk and oil.

A singular custom is described by Burckhardt, as being prevalent in Modern Arabia. (Travels in Arabia, Lond. 1829. p. 37.) "There are in Djidda twenty-one butter-sellers, who likewise retail honey, oil, and vinegar. Butter forms the chief article in Arab cookery, which is more greasy than even that of Italy. Fresh butter, called by the Arabs za'abe, is very rarely seen in the Hedjaz. It is a common practice among all classes, to drink every morning a coffee-cup full of melted butter or ghee, after which coffee is taken. They regard it as a powerful tonic, and are so much accustomed to it from their earliest youth, that they would feel great inconvenience in discontinuing the use of it. The higher classes content themselves with rinsing the quantity of butter, but the lower orders add a half-cup more, which they sniff up their nostrils, conceiving that they prevent foul air from entering the body by that channel. The practice is universal, as well with the inhabitants of the town as with the Bedouins. The lower classes are likewise in the habit of rubbing their heads, shoulders, arms, and even their bodies, like the negroes do, to refresh the skin. During the late war, the import of this article from the interior almost ceased; but even in time of peace it is not sufficient for the consumption of Djidda; some is, therefore, brought also from Sowakin; but the best sort, and that which is in greatest plenty, comes from Massovah, and is called here Dahlah; butter; whole ships' cargoes arrive from thence, the greater part of which is again carried to Mekka. Butter is likewise imported from Cosseir; this comes from Upper Egypt, and is made from buffalos milk; the Sowakin and Dahlah ghee is from sheep's milk. —The Hedjaz abounds with honey in every part of the mountains. Among the lower classes, a common breakfast is a mixture of ghee and honey poured over crumbs of bread, as they come quite hot from the oven. The Arabs, who are very fond of paste, never eat it without honey."

The Hebrew word (ם) usually rendered butter, denotes rather cream, or more properly sour or curdled milk. (See Bibl. Repos. i. p. 605.) This last is a favorite beverage in the East to the present day. Burckhardt, when crossing the desert from the country south of the Dead sea to Egypt, says, "Besides flour, I carried some butter and dried lehen, (soup milk,) which, when dissolved in water, forms not only a refreshing beverage, but is much to be recommended as a preservative of health when travelling in summer." (Travels in Syria, p. 439.) In Djidda he says there were "two sellers of lehen, sour milk, which is extremely scarce and dear all over the Hedjaz. It may appear strange, that, among the sheep herds of Arabia, there should be a scarcity of milk, yet this was the case at Djidda and Mekka; but, in fact, the immediate vicinity of these towns is extremely barren, little suited to the pasturage of cattle, and very few people are at the expense of feeding them for their milk only. When I was at Djidda, the pound of milk (for it was sold by weight) cost two and a half piastres and a half, and was obtained only by favor. What the northern Turks call yeghord, and the Syrians and Egyptians lehen-hamed, i.e. very BUZ, son of Nahor and Milcah, and brother of Huz. Gen. xxii. 21. Elish, one of Job's friends, was descended from Buz, son of Nahor. Scripture calls him an Aramean, or Syrian, (Job xxxi. 2) where Ram is put for Aram. The prophet Jeremiah (chap. xxv. 35) threatens the Buzites, who dwelt in Arabia Deserta, with God's wrath.

CAD, a Hebrew measure, according to the rabbins, the sixth part of a mod, or sa'ah; and the eighteenth part of an ephah. A cab contained three pints 1-3d of our wine measure; or two pints 5-6ths of our corn-measure; 2 Kings vi. 25.

CABALA, (παράδοσις, tradition.) The Cabala is a mystical mode of expounding the law, which the Jews say was discovered to Moses on mount Sinai, and has been from him handed down by tradition. It teaches certain abstruse and mysterious significations of a word, or words, in Scripture; from whence are borrowed, or rather forced, explanations, by combining the letters which compose it. This Cabala is of three kinds: the Gematria, the Notarikon, and the Thesaurus, or change.

The first consists in taking the letters of a Hebrew word for arithmetical numbers, and explaining every word by the arithmetical value of the letters which compose it—e. g. the Hebrew letters of יְשַׁלְךָ, Shishak, (Gen. xlix. 10.) Shlish shall come, when reckoned arithmetically, make up the same number as those of the word מֵרָד, Mardak; whence they infer, that Shlish signifies the Messiah. The second consists in taking each letter of a word for an entire dictionary, or word; e. g. Bereishith, the first word of Genesis, composed of B. R. A. Sh. I. Th. of which they make Bara-Rashia-Aret-Shamaia-Iom-Thesomokh. "He created the firmament, the earth, the heavens, and the deep." This is varied by taking, on the contrary, the first letters of a sentence to form one word: as Atlah-Gibbor-Le-odam-Adonai. "Thou art strong for ever, O Lord." They unite the first letters of this sentence, A. G. L. A. and make AGLA, which may signify "I will reveal," or "a drop of dew." The third kind of Cabala consists in transpositions of letters, placing one for another, or one before another, much after the manner of anagrams.

CABON, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 40.

I. CABUL, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 27.

II. CABUL, a district, given to Hiram by Solomon, (1 Kings ix. 13.) in acknowledgment for his great services in building the temple. Some place the cities of Caleb beyond Jordan, in the Decapolis; Grotius is of opinion, that the cities which Pharaoh had conquered from the Philistines, and yielded to Solomon, were among the cities of Caleb. Most commentators are persuaded, that the city of Cabul (Josh. xix. 27.) was one, and probably Hiram gave this name to the other cities which Solomon had ceded to him. Cabul was perhaps the same as Chabalon, or Chabal, which Josephus places near Ptolemais, south of Tyre. [The district of Cabul was then probably in the north-west part of Galilee, adjacent to Tyre.]

C, or CADUS, in Hebrew, signifies a water-pitcher or bucket; but in Luke, a particular measure: "How much owest thou to my lord?—A hundred (Vulg. cadas) measures of oil." The Greek reads "a hundred baths." The bath, or ephah, contained full ten gallons, Luke xvi. 6.

CADUMIM, a brook, (Vulg. Judg. v. 21.) which many think ran east, from the foot of mount Tabor, into the sea of Tiberias: but we have no evidence of any such brook in that place. The English translators call it "the river of Kishon." We know there was a city in these parts called Cadmon, mentioned Judith vii. 3, whence the brook Cadumim, or Kishon, might be named. [The Vulgate alone has retained the epithet cadumim as a proper name. It is properly descriptive of the Kishon, and should be translated either as in our English version, "that ancient river," or, "that stream of battles." (See the Bibl. Repos. vol. i. p. 605.)]

CÆSAR, the name assumed by, or conferred upon, all the Roman emperors after Julius Cæsar. In the New Testament, the reigning emperor is generally called Cæsar, omitting any other name which might belong to him. Christ calls the emperor Tiberius simply Cæsar, (Matt. xxii. 21.) and Paul thus mentions Nero, "I appeal to Cæsar." [The Cæsars mentioned in the New Testament are: Augustus; (Luke i. 1.) Tiberius; (Luke iii. 1; xx. 22.) Claudius; (Acts xi. 29.) Nero; (Acts xxv. 8.) Caligula, who succeeded Tiberius, is not mentioned.

I. CÆSAREA, in Palestine, formerly called Strato's Tower, was situated on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, and had a fine harbor. It is reckoned to be 36 miles south of Acre, 30 north of Jaffa, and 82 north-west of Jerusalem. Cæsarea is often mentioned in the New Testament. Here king Agrippa was smitten, for meekly to give God the glory, when flattered by the people. Cornelius the centurion, who was baptized by Peter, resided here, Acts x. At Cæsarea, the prophet Agabus foretold to the apostle Paul, that he would be bound at Jerusalem, Acts xx. 10, 11. Paul continued two years prisoner at Cæsarea, till he could be conveniently conducted to Rome, because he had appealed to Nero. Whenever Cæsarea is named, as a city of Palestine, without the addition of Philippi, we suppose this Cæsarea to be meant.

Dr. Clarke did not visit Cæsarea; but viewing it from off the coast he says, "By day-break the next morning we were off the coast of Cæsarea; and so near with the land that we could very distinctly perceive the appearance of its numerous and extensive ruins. The remains of this city, although still considerable, have long been resorted to as a quarry, whenever building materials are required at Acre. Djezzar Pasha brought from thence the columns of rare and beautiful marble, as well as the other ornaments of his palace, bath, fountain, and mosque at Acre. The place at present is only inhabited by jackalls and beasts of prey. As we were baled in the night, we heard the cries of these animals until day-break. Pococke mentions the curious fact, of the existence of crocodiles in the river of Cesarea. Perhaps there has not been in the history of the world an example of any city, that in so short a space of time rose to such an extraordinary height of splendor as did this of Cesarea, or that exhibits a more awful contrast to its former magnificence, by the present desolate appearance of its ruins. Not a single inhabitant remains. Its theatres, once resounding with the shouts of multitudes, echo no other sound than the nightly cries of animals roaming for their prey. Of its gorgeous palaces and temples, enriched with the choicest works of art, and decorated with the most precious marbles, scarcely a trace can be discerned. Within the space of ten years after laying the foundation, from an obscure fortress it became the most celebrated and flourishing city of all Syria. It was named Cesarea by Herod, in honor of Augustus, and dedicated by him to that emperor, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign. Upon this occasion, that the ceremony might be rendered illustrious, by a degree of profusion unknown in any former instance, Herod assembled the most skilful musicians and gladiators from all parts of the world. The solemnity was to be renewed every fifth year. But, as we viewed the ruins of this memorable city, every other circumstance respecting its former magnificence was absorbed in the consideration that we were actually beholding the very spot where the scholar of Tarsus, after two years' imprisonment, made that eloquent appeal, in the audience of the king of Judæa, which must ever be remembered with pity and delight. In the history of the acts of the holy apostles, whether we regard the internal evidence of the narrative, or the interest excited by a story so wonderfully appealing to our passions and affections, there is nothing that we call to mind with fuller emotions of sublimity and satisfaction. 'In the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power,' the mighty advocate for the Christian faith had before reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, till the Roman governor, Felix, trembled as he spoke. Not all the oratory of Tertullian, nor the clamor of his numerous adversaries, not even the countenance of the most profligate of tyrants, availed against the firmness and intrepidity of the oracle of God. The judge had trembled before his prisoner; and now a second occasion offered, in which, for the admiration and triumph of the Christian world, one of its bitterest persecutors, and a Jew, appeas, in the public tribunal of a large and populous city, to all its chiefs and its rulers, its government was remembered with piety and delight, founded on the highest evidence, delivered in the most fair, open, and illustrious manner.'

Cesarea Palestina was inhabited by Jews, heathen, and Samaritans; hence parts of it were esteemed unclean by the Jews; some of whom would not pass over certain places; others, however, were less scrupulous. Perpetual contests were maintained between the Jews and the Syrians, or the Greeks; in which many theologies and persons were slain. The Arab interpreter thinks this city was first named Hazor, Joshua xi. 1. Rabbi Ahihu says, "Cesarea was the daughter of Edom; situated among things profane; she was a goad to Israel in the days of the Gentiles; but the Arabian family overcame her." Herod the Great built the city to honor the name of Cesar, and adorned it with most splendid houses. Over against the mouth of the haven, made by Herod, was the temple of Cesar, on a rising ground, a superb structure; and in it a statue of Cesar the emperor. Here was also a theatre, an amphitheatre, a forum, &c. all of white stone, &c. (Joseph. de Bell. lib. i. cap. 13.)

After he had finished rebuilding the town, Herod dedicated it to Augustus; and procured the most capable workmen, from the present building, by the present-meal struck on the occasion, so that these are of considerable elegance. The port was called Sebastus, that is, Augustus. The city itself was made a colony by Vespasian; and is described on its medals, as Colonia Prima Flavia Augusta Cesarea; Cesarea, the first colony of the Flavian (or Vespasian) family.

II. Cæsarea Philippi, (before called Panaes, and now Banias,) was situated at the foot of mount Paneas, or Hermon, near the springs of the Jordan. It has been supposed, that its ancient name was Dan, or Laish; and that it was called Paneas by the Phenicians only. Eusebius, however, distinguishes Dan and Paneas as different places. Cesarea was a day's journey from Sidon, and a day and a half from Damascus. Philip the tetrarch built it, or, at least, embellished and enlarged it, and named it Cesarea, in honor of the emperor Tiberius; but afterwards, in compliment to Nero, it was called Neronias. The woman who had been troubled with an issue of blood, and was healed by our Saviour, (Matt. ix. 20; Lk. vii. 43,) is said to have been of Cesarea Philippi, and to have returned thither after her cure, and erected a statue to her benefactor. The present town contains, according to Burchhardt, about 150 houses, inhabited mostly by Turks. The goddess Antara was worshipped here, as appears from the medals extant. The annexed engraving represents one of Alexander Severus; in which the emperor is crowned goddess with a wreath. The Greek language was more used in this city than the Latin; yet it struck medals in each language. It seems to have been a Roman colony; though not mentioned as such by any writer. It is likely that Cæsarea Philippi was among the most forward cities to compliment Severus, since several authors report that it was his residence. Lampridius even says, that he was named Alexander, because his mother was delivered of him in a temple dedicated to Alexander the Great, on a festival in honor of that hero, at which she had assisted with her husband. The editor of the Modern Traveller has industriously collected and judiciously compared the several notices of this place which are found in modern writers. Palestine, pp. 353—363, Engl. ed.; pp. 327, seq. Am. ed.

Caiaphas, a high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon, son of Camith, and after possessing this dignity nine years (from A. M. 4029 to 4038) he was succeeded by Jonathan, son of Ananas, or Annas. He married a daughter of Annas, who also is called high-priest in the Gospel, because he had long enjoyed that dignity. When the priests deliberated on the seizure and death of our Saviour, Caiaphas told them, there was no room for debate on that matter; 'that it was expedient for one man to die, instead of all the people,—that the whole nation might not perish," John xi. 49, 50. This sentiment was a kind of prophecy, which God suffered to proceed from the mouth of the high-priest on this occasion, importuning, through the lips of another, that the death of Jesus would be the salvation of the world. When Judas had betrayed Christ, he was first taken before Annas, who sent him to his son-in-law, Caiphas, who possibly lived in the same house, (John xviii. 24.) and hence the priests and doctors of the law assembled to judge Jesus and to condemn him. (See JERUSALEM.)

The depositions of certain false witnesses being found insufficient to justify a sentence of death against him, and Jesus continuing silent, Caiphas, as high-priest, adjured him by the living God to say whether he was the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus having answered to this adjuration in the affirmative, Caiphas rent his clothes, and declared him to be worthy of death. Two years afterwards (A. D. 38.) he was deposed by Vitellius; but we know nothing of him afterwards. His house is still professedly shown in Jerusalem. See Annas.

CAIN, possession, or possessed, the eldest son of Adam and Eve, and brother of Abel. Cain applied to agriculture, and Abel to feeding of flocks, Gen. iv. 2, 25. Cain offered the first fruits of his grounds to the Lord, but Abel the fat of his flock; the latter was accepted, but the former rejected, which so enraged Cain that his countenance was entirely changed. The Lord, however, said unto him, "Why is thy countenance so dejected? If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted?" But Cain, unrestrained by this admonition, killed his brother Abel; and for it became an exile and a vagabond. Nevertheless, he received an assurance, that he himself should not be murdered; of which God gave him a token; for so may the words be understood, though commonly they are considered as expressing a token of guilt, strongly marked on his person. Cain quitted the presence of the Lord, and retired to the land of Nod, east of Eden, where he had a son, whom he named Enoch, and in memory of whom he built a city of the same name. Josephus says, that having settled at Nod, he, instead of being reformed by his punishment and exile, became more wicked and violent, and headed a band of robbers, who were taught to enrich themselves at the expense of others; that he quite changed the simplicity and honesty of the world into fraud and deceit; invented weights and measures, and was the first who set bounds to fields, and built and fortified them, perhaps by clearing them.

The learned Shuckford was not only dissatisfied with the usual notion, that God set a mark upon Cain, in consequence of his having killed his brother Abel, but he makes himself merry with the ludicrous nature of some of the fables which fancy had appointed to be borne about by him. Without attempting to defend those conjectures, and without adding to their number, Mr. Taylor endeavors to show, that the customary rendering of the passage (Gen. iv. 15.) may perhaps be supported.

Among the laws attributed to Mene is the following appointment, which is more worthy notice, because it is directly attributed to Mene himself, as if it were a genuine tradition received from him. It describes so powerfully and pathetically the distressed situation he is in, that one is led to think it is drawn from the recollection of some real instance, rather than from foresight, of the sufferings of such a supposed criminal. Crimes, in general, have been thought by mankind susceptible of expiation, more or less, according to the degrees of their guilt; but some are of so fragrant a nature as to be supposed atrocious beyond expiation. Though murder be usually considered as one of those atrocious crimes, and consequently inexcusable, yet there have been instances wherein the criminal was punished by other means than by loss of life. A judicial infliction, of a commutatory kind, seems to have been passed on Cain. Adam was punished by a dying life; Cain by a living death.

"For violating the paternal bed, Let the mark of a female part be impressed on the forehead with a hot iron; For drinking spirits, a vintner's flag; For stealing sacred gold, a dog's foot; For murdering a priest, the figure of a headless corpse.

With none to eat with them, With none to sacrifice with them, With none to be allied by marriage to them; Abject, and excluded from all social duties, Let them wander over the earth; Branded with indelible marks, They shall be deserted by their paternal and maternal relations, Treated by none with affection; Received by none with respect.

Such is the ordinance of Mene."

"Criminals of all classes, having performed an expiation, as ordained by law, shall not be marked on the forehead, but be condemned to pay the highest fine." This also is from Mene.

These principles are thus applied by Mr. Taylor, in illustration of the history of Cain. Cain had slain Abel his brother; this being a very extraordinary and embarrassing instance of guilt, and perhaps the first enormous crime among mankind which required exemplary punishment, the Lord thought proper to interpose, and to act as judge on this singularly affecting occasion. Adam might be ignorant of this guilt, ignorant by what process to detect it, and ignorant by what penalty to punish it; but the Lord (metaphorically) hears of it, by the blood which cried from the ground, and determines it, by citing the murderer to his tribunal; where, after examination and conviction, he passed sentence on him:—"Thou art cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood; a fugitive and a vagabond shall thou be in the earth; (Gen. iv. 13.) And Cain said to the Lord, "Is my iniquity too great for expiation? Is there no fine, no suffering, short of such a vagabond state, that may be accepted? Be hold, thou hast banished me this day from the face of the land (Gen. iv. 16.) where I was born, where my parents dwell, my native country! and from thy presence also, in thy public worship and institutions, I must now hide myself from all my heart holds dear, being prohhibited from approaching my former intimates, and thy venerated altar. I shall be a fugitive, a vagabond on the earth; and any one who findeth me shall may slay me without compunction, as if I were rather a wild beast than a man." The Lord said, "I mentioned an expiation formerly, on account of your crime of ungodly violence and anger, bidding you lay a sin-offering before the sacred entrance but then you disregarded that admonition and command. Nevertheless, as I did not take the life of your father Adam, though forfeited, when I sat in judgment on him, but abased of that rigorous penalty; so I do not design that you should be taken off by sudden death; neither immediately from myself, nor immediately by another. I pronounce, therefore, a much heavier sentence on whoever shall destroy Cain. Moreover, to show that Cain is a person suffering under punishment, since no one else has power to do it; since he resists the justice of his follower-men; since his crime has called me to be his judge, I shall brand his forehead with a mark of his crime; and then, whoever observes this mark will avoid his company; they will not smite him, but they will hold no intercourse with him, fearing his inscri-bable passions may take offence at some unguarded
word, and should again transport him into a fury, which may issue in bloodshed. Beside this, all mankind, wherever he may endeavor to associate, shall fear to pollute themselves by conference with him." The uneasiness continually arising from this state of sequestration led the unhappy Cain to seek repose in a distant settlement.

If this conception of the history be just, and if the quotation from Meno be genuine, we have here one of the oldest traditions in the world, in confirmation, ot only of the history, as related in Genesis, but of our public version of the passage.

I. CAINAN, son of Enos, born A. M. 328, when Enos was ninety years of age, Gen. v. 9. At the age of seventy, Cainan begat Mahaleel; and died, aged 910, A. M. 1325.

II. CAINAN, a son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. He is neither in the Hebrew nor in the Vulgate of Gen. xi. 12—14, but is named between Salah
x. 24; xi. 12, admit him. Some have suggested, that the Jews suppressed the name Cainan out of their copies, designing to render the LXX and Luke suspected. Others, that Moses omitted Cainan, being dreadful to reckon ten generations only from Adam to Noah, and from Noah to Abraham. Others, that Arphaxad was father of both Cainan and Salah; of Sa-lah naturally, of Cainan legally. Others, that Cainan and Salah were the same person, under two names;
this they allege in support of that opinion which maintains Cainan to be really son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. Many learned men believe, that this name was not originally in the text of Luke, but is an addition by inadvertent transcribers, who, rensenting the copies of the LXX, added it. See Kuinoel on Luke iii. 36.

CA IPA, a town at the foot of mount Carmel, north, on the gulf of Po lem ein; the ancient name of which was Sycominos, or Porphyreion. Sycominos was derived from the fish which grew here, as Porphyreion might be from catching here the fish used in dyeing purple. Perhaps Cepha, or Caipa, was derived from its rocks; in Syriac, Kepha: but the Hebrews write Kopha, not Kepha.
This city was separated from Acco, or Polem ein, by a large and beautiful harbor, the distance to which,
by sea direct, is not more than fifteen miles; though
by land the distance is double.

CAIUS CALIUS, A. D. 37; and reigned three years, nine months, and twenty-eight days. It does not appear that he molested the Christians. Caius having commanded Petronius, governor of Syria, to place his statue in the temple at Jerusalem, for the purpose of adornment, the Jews so vigorously opposed it, that, fearing a sedition, he suspended the order. He was killed by Cherevas, one of his guards, while coming out of the theatre, A. D. 41, in the fourth year of his reign; and was succeeded by Claudius. He is not mentioned in the New Testament.

CAKES. The Hebrews had several sorts of cakes, which they offered in the temple, made of meal, of wheat, or of barley: kneaded sometimes with oil, sometimes with honey; sometimes only rubbed over with oil when baked, or fried with oil in a fryingpan. At Aaron's consecration, "they offered unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened, tempered with oil; and wafers unleavened, anointed with oil;
the whole made of fine wheaten flour," Exod. xxix.
1, 2. The Hebrew calls all offerings made of grain, flour, paste, bread, or cakes, ruc, mincha.
These offerings were made either alone, or with other things. Sometimes fine flour was offered, (Lev. ii.
1.) or cakes, or other things baked, (verse 4.) or cakes baked in a fryingpan, (verse 5.) or in a fryingpan with holes, or on a gridiron, verse 7. Ears of corn were sometimes offered, in order to be roasted, and the corn to be got out from them. These offerings were instated principally in favor of the poor. This, however, is understood of voluntary offerings, not appointed by the law; for, as to certain sacrifices, the law, instead of two lambs and a ewe, permits the poor to offer only one lamb, and two young pigeons.

For offering, these cakes were salted, but unleavened. If the cakes which were offered were baked in an oven, and sprinkled or kneaded with oil, the whole was presented to the priest, who waved the offering before the Lord, then took so much of it as was to be burned on the altar, threw that into the fire, and kept the rest himself; Lev. ii. 4. If the offering were a cake kneaded with oil, and dressed in a fryingpan, it was broken, and oil was poured on it;
then it was presented to the priest, who took a hundred of it, which he threw on the altar-fire, and the rest was his own. It should be observed, that oil in the East answers the purpose of butter among us in Europe.

Cakes or loaves, offered with sacrifices of beasts,
as was customary, (for the great sacrifices were always accompanied by offerings of cakes, and librations of wine and oil,) were kneaded with oil. The wine and oil were not poured on the head of the animal about to be sacrificed, (as among the Greeks and Romans,) but on the fire in which the victim was consumed. Lev. xxvii. 1. &c. The law regulated the quantity of meat, wine, and oil, for each kind of victim. See BREAD.

CAI, a city of Asyria, built by Assur, or Nimrod; (see ASSYRIA;) for the phrases in Gen.
x. 11, 12, is understood the ancient city Ecbab, or the city Resen lying between them. Bochart thinks it is the same city as is called Halah in 2 Kings xvii.
6, and Cellarius understands Holwan, a famous town in the ages of the caliphs, in the Syriac dialect called Hulwan, but in the Syriac documents written Hula-lach; but the different initial letter in the Hebrew militates against this mutation; since c is too strong a sound to be easily changed. Ephraim the Syrian understands Hatra, a city in the region of the Zab, which falls into the Tigris; or perhaps he intends
the city called Chatarchata by Polemien, which imports, "Chatra, the city:" but then, as Michaelis observes, this city was east of the springs of the Lycus, or Zab. (Rosenmüller prefers the opinion of Cellarion, that Calah is the same as the Chesbron, or Holwan, of the Arabs, and the Chalach of the Syrians. It was situated in the north-east part of the present Irak, towards Persia, at the foot of the mountains which now separate the Ottoman and Persian empires in CAL

this quarter: it probably gave name to the province Chalcedon of Strabo. [Rosennm. Bib. Geog. L ii. p. 96. R.] Holwan would suit the geographical intention of the text completely, in reference to its connection with the other cities mentioned.

I. CALEB, (son of Jephunneh, of Judah, was sent with Joshua and others to view the land of Canaan. Numb. xiii. 3. They brought with them some of the finest fruits as specimens of its productions; but some of the spies discouraging the people, they openly declared against the expedition. Joshua and Caleb encouraged them to go forward, and the Lord sentenced the whole multitude except these two to die in the desert, xiv. 1—10. When Joshua had invaded and conquered great part of Canaan, Caleb with his tribe came to Gilgal, and asked for a particular possession, which Joshua bestowed upon him with many blessings, chap. xiv. 6—15. Caleb, therefore, with his tribe, marched against Kirjath-arba, (afterwards Hebron,) took it, and killed three giants of the race of Anak; from thence he went to Debir, or Kirjath-sepher, which was taken by Othniel, xv. 13—19. Caleb is thought to have survived Joshua.

II. CALEB, son of Hur, whose sons Shobal, Salmom, and Heresh, peopled the country about Bethlehem, Kirjath-jearim, Beth-gader, &c. 1 Chron. ii. 50—55.

III. CALEB, the name of a district in Judah, in which were the cities of Kirjath-sepher and Hebron, belonging to the family of Caleb, 1 Sam. xxx. 14.

IV. CALEB, son of Henan, who married first Azubah, and afterwards Ephraim, 1 Chron. ii. 9, 18, 24.

I. CALF, the young of a cow, of which there is frequent mention in Scripture, because calves were commonly used for sacrifices. A calf of the herd is probably so distinguished from a sucking calf. The fattened calf (Luke xv. 23.) was a calf fattened particularly for some feast. In Hos. xiv. 2, the expression, "we will render the calves of our lips," signifies sacrifices of praise, prayer, &c. The LXX read the "fruit of our lips," as does the Syriac, and the apostle, Heb. xiii. 15.

II. CALF, the golden, which the Israelites worshipped at the foot of mount Sinai, Exod. xxxiii. 4. (See Aaron.) When the people saw that Moses delayed the coming of the ark, they demanded of Aaron to make them gods which should go before them. Aaron demanded their ear-rings; which were melted, and cast into the figure of a calf. When this was about to be consecrated, Moses, being divinely inspired of the event, avoided the sin of the people, and, having called on all who detested this sin, the sons of Levi armed themselves, and slew of the people about 23,000, according to our version; but the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, LXX, and the greater part of the old Greek and Latin fathers, read 3000.

There are some hints in the account of the golden calf, which are usually overlooked: (1.) Aaron calls the calf in the plural, "gods,"—"These are thy gods—they who brought thee out of Egypt." So the people say, "Make us gods," yet only one image was made. (2.) Although the second commandment forbids the making "to themselves" any graven image, yet, in the instances of the cherubim, graven images were made; though not for any private individual, nor for the purpose of visible worship, but for interior emblems, in the most holy place, never seen by the people. (3.) Aaron did not make this calf with his own hands, most probably; but committed it to some sculptor, who wrought not openly in the midst of the camp, but in his workshop. The Jews report, that the image was made into the form of a calf by some evil spirits who accompanied the Israelites from Egypt; and if they mean evil human spirits, they are right enough. The sacred writers in succeeding ages plainly speak of the golden calf as a very great sin. Ps. cvi. 19, 20; Acts vii. 43; Deut. ix. 16—21. (4.) Aaron, though greatly misled, must have meant by this worship, something more than the mere worship of the Egyptian calf, Apis; for in what sense had Apis "brought Israel out of the land of Egypt?" an expression which Jeroboam subsequently used; (1 Kings xii. 28.) which is strange, if Apis, an Egyptian deity, had been the object of his calves. The LXX say, in Exod. xxxii. 4. that Aaron described the calf with a graving tool, but that the people made and cast it. The Chaldee paraphrast says, "Aaron dressed the ear-rings, tied them up in purses, and made the golden calf of them," and Bochart maintains, that this is the best translation, the Hebrew chames signifying a purse, and not a graving tool. —It should seem, therefore, that Aaron had given the gold of which he had the custody, to a workman appointed by the people; that he followed the people throughout this transaction; and that he endeavored to guide (perhaps, even to control) their opinion, in varying and appointing to the honor of Jehovah, what many, at least "the mixed multitude," would refer to the honor of the gods they had seen in Egypt. In this view, his expression deserves notice—"to-morrow is a solemnity to Jehovah;" not to Apis, or to any other god, but to Jehovah. Such was the sentiment of Aaron, whatever sentiments some of the people might entertain; and his confession to Moses (ver. 24.) may be so taken: "I cast it," i.e. I gave it to be cast. Certainly, the making of the calf was a work of time, it was not cast in a moment, nor in the midst of the camp, but in a proper workshop, or other convenient place; and even perhaps was forwarded more rapidly than Aaron knew, or wished. He might use all means of delay, though he slyly yielded to a prostration, or to a worship of Jehovah by an image; an impure medium of worship, which was explicitly forbidden in the second commandment, Exod. xx. 4. Augustin says, Aaron demanded the personal ornaments of the women and children, in hopes they would not resist; they demanded of Aaron to make them gods which should go before them. Aaron demanded their ear-rings; which were melted, and cast into the figure of a calf. When this was about to be consecrated, Moses, being divinely inspired of the event, avoided the sin of the people, and calling on all who detested this sin, the sons of Levi armed themselves, and slew of the people about 23,000, according to our version; but the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, LXX, and the greater part of the old Greek and Latin fathers, read 3000.

The termination of this melancholy occurrence was as extraordinary as its commencement: "And Moses took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strewn it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it." Exod. xxxii. 20.

CALVES, golden, of Jeroboam. This prince, in order to separate the ten tribes more effectually from the house of David, set up objects of worship in the land of Israel, that the people might not be compelled to go up to Jerusalem. 1 Kings xii. 26—28. He made two calves of gold, and said, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. And he set the one in Bethel, and the other he put in Dan, at the two extremities of his.
kingdom. And this thing became a sin; for the priests went to worship before these golden calves to Dan and to Bethel." Monceau thought that these calves, as well as the calf of Aaron, were imitations of the cherubim, and that they occasioned rather a schismatic than an idolatrous worship. We know, indeed, that all Israel did not renounce the worship of the Lord for that of the calves, but it is highly probable that the majority did so. See 1 Kings xix. 10.

It is certain Jeroboam's golden calves were not images of Baal; (see 1 Kings xvi. 31, 32; 2 Kings x. 26, 31,) neither does Ellthin say, "Choose between these calves (as emblems of Apis) and Jehovah." Nevertheless, most commentators think Jeroboam designed, by his golden calves, to imitate the worship of Apis, which he had seen in Egypt, 1 Kings xi. 40. Scripture reproves him frequently with having made Israel to sin; (2 Kings xiv. 9,) and when describing a bad prince, it says, he imitated the sin of Jeroboam, 2 Kings xvii. 31. The LXX and the Greek fathers generally read (feminine) golden cows, instead of golden calves. Josephus speaks of the temple of the golden calf as still in being in his time, somewhere towards Dan; but he omits the history of the sin. The glory of Israel was their God, their law, and their ark; but the worshipers of the golden calves consider those idols as their glory. "The priests thereof rejoiced on it, for the glory thereof." Hosea v. 5. Hosea foretold the destruction and captivity of the calves of Samaria, (Hosea vii. 5, 6;) and the Asomaritans, having taken Samaria, carried off the golden calves, with their worshipers.

CALIGULA, see CAIUS.

To CALL frequently signifies to be; but, perhaps, includes the idea of admitted to, to be acknowledged, to be, and known to be, the thing called; since men do not usually call a thing otherwise than what they conclude it to be. "He shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, Father," &c. He shall possess all these qualities; he shall be truly the Wonderful, the Mighty God, the Father of the Danish. He shall be called the Son of the Most High," Luke i. 35. He shall be truly so. So of John the Baptist, "Thou shalt be called the prophet of the Highest;"—Thou shalt be acknowledged under that character. To call a thing by its name; to affix a name to it, is an act of acknowledgeable honor. The master names his servant; "God calleth the stars by their names," Psalm cxlvii. 4. To call on God sometimes signifies all the acts of religion, the whole public worship of God. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved," Acts x. 42. To call on God, therefore, is to believe in God, trust, love, pray, and praise as he ought to do,—"shall be saved," Rom. x. 13. "Meu began to call on the name of the Lord," Gen. iv. 26. Others translate, "The name of God was profaned," that is, by giving it to idols. (See EXO.) God is in some sort jealous of our adoration; he requires that we should call on no other god beside himself.

CALLISTHENUS, an officer of the king of Syria, who was fire to the temple gates, and was afterwards burned by the people, 2 Macc. viii. 33.

CALNEH, a city in the land of Shinar, built by Nimrod, and formerly the seat of his empire, Gen. x. 10. Probably the Calno of Isaiah, (x. 9,) and the Cannah of Ezek. xxvii. 23. It must have been situated in Mesopotamia, since these prophets join it with Hiran, Eden, Assyria, and Chilmed, which traded with Tyre. (According to the Targums, Eusebius, Jerome, and others, Calneh, or Calno, was Chirphon, a large city on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite to Seleucia.)

CALVARY, or Golgotha, that is, the place of a skull, a little hill north-west of Jerusalem, and so called, it is thought, from its skull-like form. It formerly stood outside of the walls of Jerusalem, and was the spot upon which our Saviour was crucified. When Barabbas was delivered, according to the custom of the Jews, to be put to death, he was delivered to the People to be crucified. "When David had taken Jerusalem, he dwelt in the hold; but the house of the Lord was in that day at En-gedi." 2 Sam. v. 7. Our Saviour, however, was crucified on the Mount of Olives. It was called the City of David, and, when the city was taken by the Romans, Agrippa, the son of Herod, took up his residence there, and made it part of his kingdom. Here the Roman camp was placed, and here the whole city of Jerusalem was surrounded. Here the whole city was surrounded, and here the whole city was surrounded. Here the whole city was surrounded, and here the whole city was surrounded. Here the whole city was surrounded, and here the whole city was surrounded.

The objections to the location of Calvary, which were urged at an early period of the Christian history, have been lately renewed by some intelligent travellers and writers, whose high character gives to their decisions a degree of authority, and renders an examination of them necessary in a work like the present. Among these writers Dr. E. D. Clarko stands foremost, whose objections to the identity of the present Calvary with the place of our Saviour's crucifixion and sepulture may be thus summed up: (1.) All the evangelists agree in representing the place of crucifixion as "the place of a skull;" that is to say, "a public cemetery," whereas the spot now assumed as Calvary does not exhibit any evidence which might entitle it to this appellation. (2.) The place called "Golgotha," or "Calvary," was a mount or hill, of which the place now exhibited under this name has not the slightest appearance. (3.) The sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea, in which our Saviour was laid, was a tomb cut out of a rock, instead of which, the modern sepulchre is a building of comparatively modern date, and above ground.

To these objections captain Light has given his assent, and adds, "When I saw Mount Calvary within a few feet of the alleged place of sepulture, and the apparent inclination to crowd a variety of events under one roof, I could not help imagining that the zeal of the early Christians might have been the cause of their not seeking among the tombs further from the city the actual burial." Dr. Richardson, who also questions the identity of these sacred places, considers, with captain Light, that the contiguity of the present tomb of Christ to mount Calvary is another objection to its identity with the original one.

To these objections shall belong, if not at great length, and with much ingenuity, Mr. Taylor has devoted considerable attention. The following remarks comprise the substance of his arguments, in reply to them.

1. The name Golgotha—Calvary—the place of a skull—given to the scene of our Saviour's crucifixion by the evangelists, does not necessarily signify, as Dr. Clarke interprets it, after Stockius, "a place of sepulture;" or "a public cemetery. It is always used in the singular—"the place of a skull," which would have been a very improper designation for a place of many skulls. The language of Luke, however, is peculiar, and places it beyond doubt that skull was the proper name of the place. This evangelist, without mentioning Golgotha, writes, καὶ ὁ σταυροῦ ἐπὶ τῶν τύμπων καθημένος σφάγα—"and when they were come to a place called skull," chap. xxiii. 33.—Luke therefore appears to have strictly translated the word
CALVARY

Collymba, which signifies, not σπωλή τής, "place of a skull," but simply σπωλή, skull. Now, this name was probably given from the peculiar form of the place, and not in consequence of any purpose to which was devoted. [It was, however, the place where malefactors were commonly executed, and where their bodies were left unburied.] R.

2. It is not a little curious that Dr. Clarke should not have perceived that his objection to the present site of Calvary—that it has no appearance of a mount—imposes an insuperable difficulty in the way of his own hypothesis, which places Calvary in "a deep trench"—the valley Tyropoeon—between Acra and Silo. Not to dwell, however, upon this glaring inconsistency, we proceed to consider whether the spot now shown as Calvary does not exhibit the appearance of a mount, and also that peculiar form, from which it has been as probable that Calvary derives its name. In this inquiry father Bernardino may be a guide. He says, "The space occupied by mount Calvary is now divided into two parts, forming chapels; the first of these is twenty-one paces in width, and forty-six paces in length. The second division of mount Calvary is eighteen paces in width, and forty-six paces in length." Speaking of the chapel, he says, they are not on the same level; but, "the mount is in height towards the north two palms and a hand; and towards the S.W. two palms and ten inches; and the smaller ascent (8 puggerie) is in height seven metres and a half." This was the place of the bad thief. Towards the north, the place of the good thief—it is in height one palm and a hand above sea level.

3. The stage under the arch towards the north leading to the Little Hill, are in height—the first, two paces; the second, one palm ten inches.

"The letter H is the proper Mount Calvary." This letter H is placed on the rising described as a puggeria, the second ascent; marked by a circle, as the place of the cross of Jesus. This is evidence that this ignorant and superstitious moak, as Dr. Clarke (and others) would probably call him, distinguished two asinas in Mount Calvary; though Dr. Clarke and the distinction over without notice. How greatly his observation confirms the derivation traced in the name, may safely be left to the reader's intelligence. To obtain a clear idea of mount Calvary, we must imagine a rising, now about fifteen feet high. This ascent, rising on the left, seems almost as steep as the ascent of the hill of the crucifixion, and passes through a tunnel, the second flight contains ten stairs, the second flight contains eight. There are also two others, in length more than forty feet; and in width more than thirty feet; and upon this, nearly in the centre, a smaller rising about seven paces in height; which smaller rising, says Bernardino, "il proprio Monte Calvario." After this, how can Dr. Clarke affirm that there exists no evidence in the church of the holy sepulchre; "nothing that can be reconciled with the history of our Saviour's suffering and burial"? It is affirmed that mount Calvary was leveled for the foundations of the church.

3. In reply to Dr. Clarke's last objection, Mr. Taylor adopts a course of reasoning to the following effect:—The first step to be taken in the inquiry is, to determine what kind of sepulchral edifice was constructed by Joseph of Arimathea; and this can only be accomplished by strictly examining the words of the original writers who describe it. Dr. Clarke having inspected a great number of ancient tombs cut in the rock, in various parts of the country through which he had travelled, and not a few at Jerusalem itself, had suffered this idea to take entire possession of his mind: he looked for an excavation in a rock, and nothing more. But before we determine that there really was nothing more, we are bound to examine whether the terms employed by the evangelists to describe the sepulchre, are completely satisfied by this restricted acceptation.

Matthew uses two words to describe Joseph's intended place of burial (chap. xxvii. verse 66), he says, he bought the field of one man named Mruphaim (Gome, Eng. tr.)—and they rolled a great stone to the door τοῦ σκηνήματος (of the sepulchre, Eng. tr.)—and there were Mary Magdalene, &c., sitting over against τοῦ τάφου (the sepulchre, Eng. tr.) This rendering of the same word σκηνήματος, by both Matthew, &c., is, injudicious. Campbell more prudently continues to each term of the original that by which he had first chosen to express it, in English:—"he deposited the body in his own monument,—Mary Magdalene, &c., sitting over against the sepulchre, &c." Command that the sepulchre should be guarded.—"Make the sepulchre σκηνήματος [rather] secure as ye can."—Mary Magdalene, &c., went to visit the sepulchre τοῦ τάφου, &c., &c., to which they came in a place where the Lord said, they went out from the presence of them that watched τοῦ σκηνήματος it is inferred, then, that what is rendered monument implies a kind of frontispiece, or ornamental door-way, (the stone portal of Captain Light,) and the evangelists indicate the chambers in this term, as from these the women came out. Neither of the other evangelists uses more than one term—the monument. The nature of this will justly a closer inspection of it.

The evangelist, Matthew says, this monument was παραχειρείται μεταβαθαι—cut out—hollowed out—scraped out of the rock, which formed the subterraneous soil; while his other term (tapho) intends the external hiloche, or mound-like form of the rock, rising above the general level of the ground. There is no occasion for going beyond the volumes of Dr. Clarke for proof of this acceptance of the term tapho, whether we accompany him among the tumuli of the Stephes, or those in the plain of Troas,—to the tomb of Ajax,—to the tomb of Xystates, (which are conical mounds of earth, like our English barrows,) all are taphoi. Mark repeats nearly the words of Matthew, in reference to the monument: but Luke uses the term τάφος. This sepulchre of the "rich man of Arimathea" is described by the fact that the twelve sepulchres discovered at Talmessus; of which Dr. Clarke says, "In such situations are seen excavated chambers, worked with such marvellous art as to exhibit open façades, porticoes with Ionic columns, gates and doors beautifully sculptured, on complete representation as of embossed iron-work bolts, and hinges." Those ornaments were hewn in the rock; but Luke's words are not restricted to this sense; for, it should seem that the very term rendered monument, leads us to building of some kind, prefaced to the rock, or even standing above it. This evangelist's phrase (chap. xi. 47.) is expressive to the point; ἀλλὰ ήττοι τοῦ σκήνημας—ye build the monuments of the prophets, where the term build is explicit. Perhaps even this term, σκήνημα, includes or implies some kind of construction, not merely excavation; so in the tomb of which Dr. Clarke gives a delineation, p. 344. Helen constructed this monument for herself;—τοῦ σκήνημα, but this monument is "composed of five immense masses of stone," wrought into conjunction, and forming an upper chamber, "which seemed to communicate with an inferior vault." The sepulchre of David (Acts ii. 29) was a monument; not an excavation in the rock of Zion. The rocks were rent, (Matt. xxiii. 38) but the monuments in which the dead were deposited were opened.

It is concluded, then, on the authority of Matthew, that the intended burial-place of Joseph of Arimathæa presented two distinctions, a lophos—sepulchre, and a monument.

Not unlike is the tomb now shown for that of the Saviour. It is affirmed to be a rock encased with building. Heartily do we wish the building were not there; heartily do we agree with honest Sandys—"those natural forns are utterly deformed, which would have better satisfied the beholder; and too much regard hath made them less regardable. For, as the Satyre speaketh of the fountain of Egeria,

How much more venerable had it been, If grass had cloth'd the circling banks in green, Nor marble had the native topsis marn'd."

Yet Sandys speaks expressly of "a compact roof of the solid rocks, but lined for the most part with white marble." This distinction is not noticed by Dr. Clarke; neither has he noticed that the frontispiece to this tomb is confessably modern;—that in this exterior building the arch of the roof is pointed; whereas, in the interior chamber, the arch is circular:—proof enough of reparation, without consulting the monks. But if Mr. Hawkins's History of this Church be correct, in which he says, "Hequen, caliph of Egypt, sent Hyaroc to Jerusalem, who took effectual care that the church should be pulled down to the ground, conformably to the royal command"—if this be true, no doubt the sepulchre, which was the principal object of veneration in the church, was demolished most unrestingly. It would, therefore, be no wonder to find, that the present building is little other than a shell over the spot assigned to the tomb; and this without any reflection on the character of Helena, who could not foresee what the Saracens would do nearly nine hundred years after her death.

So much for the similarities between the evangelists' description of the sacred places and those appearances which they now present: it remains to inquire, what proof we have that their localities were accurately preserved. It is certain that many things in the apocrypha are not true, but were inserted, for purposes of devotion, who would find themselves interested, in a more than ordinary degree, in the transactions which that city had lately witnessed, and with the multitudinous reports concerning them, which were of a nature too suspicious to be concealed. The language of Luke (xxiv. 28) plainly imports wonder that so much as a single pilgrim to the holy city could be ignorant of late events: and Paul appeals to Agrippa's knowledge that "these things were not done in a corner." It is, in short, impossible, that the natural curiosity of the human mind—to adduce no superior principle—should be content to undergo the fatigues of a long journey to visit Jerusalem, and yet, when there, should refrain from visiting the scenes of the late astonishing wonders. So long as access to the temple was free, so long would Jews and proselytes from all nations pay their devotions there; and so long would the inquisitive, whether converts to Christianity or not, direct their attention to mount Calvary, with the garden and sepulchre of Joseph. The apostles were at hand, to direct all inquirers; neither James nor John could be mistaken; and during more than thirty years the localities would be ascertained beyond a doubt, by the participants and the eye-witnesses themselves.

Though the fact is credible, we cannot hear of any attempt of the rulers of the Jews to obstruct access to them, or to destroy them: but is likely that they might be in danger on the breaking out of the Jewish war, (A. D. 66,) and especially on the circumvallation of Jerusalem, A. D. 70. The soldiers of Titus, who destroyed every tree in the country around to employ its timber in the construction of their works, would effectually dismantle the garden of Joseph; and we cannot from this time reckon, with any certainty, on more of its evidence than what was afforded by the chambers cut into the rock; and, possibly, the portal, or monument, annexed to them.

At the time of the commotions in Judea, and the siege of Jerusalem, the Christians of that city retired to Pella, beyond the Jordan. These must have known well the situation of mount Calvary; nor were they so long absent, as might justify the notion that they could forget it when they returned; or that they were a new generation, and therefore had no previous acquaintance with it. They were the same persons; the same church officers, with the same bishop at their head, Simeon son of Cleophas; and whether we allow for the time of their absence two years, or five years, or seven years, it is morally impossible that they could make any mistake in this matter. Simeon lived out the century; and from the time of his death to the rebellion of the Jews under Berichochebas, was but thirty years—too short a period, certainly, for the successors of Simeon at Jerusalem, to lose the knowledge of places adjacent to that city. That Berichochebas and his adherents would willingly have destroyed every evidence of Christianity, with Christianity itself, we know; but whether his power included Jerusalem, in which was a Roman garrison, may be doubted. The war ended some time before A. D. 140; and from the end of the war we are to consider the emperor and his successors as intent on establishing his new city, Æelia, and on mortifying to the utmost both Jews and Christians, who were generally considered as a sect of the Jews. It is worth our while to examine the evidence in proof of the continued veneration of the Christians for the holy places, which should properly be divided into two periods; the first to the time of Adrian's Æelia; the second being that year to A.D. 140. Jerome, writing to Marcella concerning this custom, has this remarkable passage: Longum est nunc ab ascensione Domini usque ad præsentem diem per singulas etias currens, qui Episcoporum, qui Martyrum, qui eloquentia in doctrinam Ecclesiæ Hierosolymam, putantse suinus religionis, minus habere scientiam, nisi in illis Christum adorassent locis, de quibus primum, Evangelium de patibulo conscrutum. (Ep. 17. ad Marcell.) "During the whole time from the ascension of the Lord to the present day, through every age as it rolled on, as well bishops, martyrs, and men eminently eloquent in ecclesiastical learning, came to Jerusalem; thinking themselves deficient in religious knowledge, unless they adored Christ in those places from which the Gospel was descended from the cross." It is a pleasing reflection that the leading men in the early Christian communities were thus diligent in acquiring the most exact information. They spared no pains to obtain the sacred books in their complete and perfect state, and to satisfy themselves by ocular inspection, so far as possible, of the truth of those facts on which they built the doctrine they delivered to their hearers. So Melito, bishop of Sardis. [A. D. 170.] writes to Onesimus. When I went into the East, and was come to the place where those things were preached and done:—so we read that Alexander, bishop of Cappadocia, (A. D. 211,) going to Jerusalem for the iudicium Judaeorum, in loco resurrectionis, in simulacrum justae, in cruces redux status ex marmore Venetis et gentibus postea colebatur, existimavit persecutionis auctoritatem, quod tollerent nobis fidem resurrectionem et cruces, si loco Sancta per idola pollutissent. Bethlehem nunc nastrum est aegregium de orbe locum, de quo Psalmum canit, Venas de Terra orta est, Iecus tunc brabat Thamnus, i. e. Adonida; et in specie, ubi quondam Christus parvulus vagari, Venetis Amanitas plangebatur. (Ecc. 13. ad Paulin.) “From the time of Hadrian to that of the government of Constantine, about the space of one hundred and eighty years, in the place of the resurrection was set up an image of Jupiter; in the rock of the cross a marble statue of Venus was stationed, to be worshipped by the people; the authors of these persecutions supposing that they should deprive us of our faith in the resurrection and the cross, if they could but pollute the holy places by idols. Bethlehem, now our most venerable place, and that of the whole world, of which the Psalmist sings, ‘Truth is sprung out of the earth,’ was overshadowed by the grove of Thamnus, i. e. of Adonis; and in the cave where once the Messiah appeared as an infant, the lover of Venus was loudly lamented.” This is a general account of facts; a few additional hints may be gleaned from other writers, such as Eusebius, and Libani, i. e. Libani. Those who followed the faith of Christ, after his death, held in great reverence the monument of that wonderful work; but those who hated the religion of Christ, filled up the place with a dyke of stones, and built in it a temple. This temple, which was built up with fire by which they intended to dissipate all recollection of the holy place.

Sozomen is more particular. We learn from him that “The Gentiles by whom the church was persecuted, in the very infancy of Christianity, labored by every art, and in every manner, to abolish it: the holy place they blocked up with a vast heap of stones; and they raised that to a great height, which before had been of considerable depth; as it may now be seen. And, moreover, the entire place, as well of the resurrection as of Calvary, they surrounded by a wall, stripping it of all ornament. And first they leveled the ground with stones, then they built a temple of Venus on it, and set up an image of the goddess—

The phrase, “they shut up the image of the goddess,” is a euphemism for the destruction of the holy place. The image was a representation of Venus, the Roman goddess of love and beauty, and its presence in the temple of Jesus was a sacrilege to the Christians. The image was destroyed to prevent the worship of Venus, which was seen as a desecration of the holy place.

If any credit be due to these historians, the heathen levelers had left but little to be done by Helena in the way of deforming these sacred objects. They had, with the most violent zeal, changed the features of every part: what was originally a hollow they raised into a hill; what was high they cut down and leveled—to use a homer phrase, they turned every thing toppy-glory. Helena could only cause these places to be cleared and cleansed: to reinstate them in their first forms was out of her power. And that the evidence of this desecration should not rest on “monkish historians,” Providence has preserved incontestable witnesses in the medals of Adrian, which mark him as the founder of the new city, Ælia, and exhibit a temple of Jupiter, another of Venus, and various other deities, all worshipped in it.

It is evident, that if the rock of Calvary and the holy sepulchre were surrounded by the same wall, as Sozomen asserts, they could not be far distant from each other; * and this wall, with the temples and other sacra it enclosed, would not only mark these places, but, in a certain sense, would preserve them; as the mosque of Omar preserves the site of the temple of Solomon, at this day. While, therefore, we abandon to Dr. Clarke and captain Light the commemorative altars and stations, which we think it not worth while to defend, and while we heartily wish that all these places had been left in their original state to tell their own story, we must be allowed to relieve the memory of the Christian empress from the guilt of deforming by intentional honors these sacred localities; and the monks, however ignarant or credulous, from the imputation of imposing on their pilgrims and visitors, in respect to the site of the places they now show as peculiarly holy.

On the whole, we are called to admire the proofs yet preserved to us by Providence, of transactions in these localities nearly two thousand years ago. Facts which, because they are conferrid upon the supreme government in church and state, of the Jewish hierarchy, and of the Roman emperors, to subvert, to destroy the evidences of; yet the evidences defied their malignity of the barbarians—Saracens and Turks, to bring up together in the same symbol, the heathen philosophy, and sui-disant modern philosophy, to annull, but in vain. The labors of Julian to re-erect the temple continue almost living witnesses of his discomfiture. The sepulchres of the soldiers who fell in assaulting Jerusalem remain speaking evidences of the destruction of the city, according to prediction, by the Romans. The holy sepulchre stands a traditional memorial of occurrences too incredible to obtain credit, unless supported by superhuman testimony. Or if that be thrown out, to mount Calvary certainly exists, with features so distinct, so peculiar to itself, and unlike every thing else

* This meets the remaining objection, urged by Dr. Richardson and captain Light; namely, the contiguity of the holy sepulchre to mount Calvary. The language of John, too, is decisive upon this point: "Now, there was in the place (Is raru) where he was crucified, on a hill (MOUTOKEPO). There they laid Jesus," chap. xix. 41. And he repeats, that the sepulchre was high at hand— Lýane—low by, adjunct.
around it, that in spite of the ill-judged labors of honest enthusiasm, of the ridiculous tales of superstition, and the mummery of ignorance and arrogance, we have not enough to compare the records of our faith with circumstances actually existing; to demonstrate that the works on which our belief relies were actually written in the country, at the times, and by the persons, eye-witnesses, which they purport to be.

It is necessary here only to remark, that the speculations of Dr. Clarke, respecting the sepulchre, are regarded by other travellers as wholly untenable; and that the general position of Calvary rests upon the unbroken tradition of more than eighteen centuries. The more specific designations of the sites of various holy places are well understood to be without any such authority.

CAMEL, an animal common in the East, and placed by Moses among unclean creatures, Deut. xiv. 21. We may distinguish three sorts of camels. Some are large and full of flesh, fit only to carry burdens; (it is said, 1000 pounds weight;) others, which have two hunches on the back like a natural saddle, are fit either to carry burdens or to be ridden; and a third kind, leaner and smaller, are called dromedaries, because of their swiftness; and are generally used by men of quality to ride on. Bruce has the following remarks on this creature: “Nature has furnished the camel with parts and qualities adapted to the office he is employed to discharge. The drier thistle and the barest thorn is all the food this useful quadruped requires; and even these, to save time, he eats while advancing on his journey, without stopping, or occasioning a moment of delay. As it is his lot to cross immense deserts, where no water is found, and countries not even moistened by the dew of heaven, he is endowed with the power, at one watering-place, to lay in a store, with which he supplies himself for thirty days to come. To contain this enormous quantity of fluid, nature has formed large cisterns within him, from which, once filled, he draws, at pleasure, the quantity he wants, and pours it into his stomach with the same effect as if he then drew it from a spring; and with this he travels patiently and vigorously all day long, carrying a prodigious load upon him, through countries infected with poisonous winds, and glowing with parching and never cooling sands. We attempted to raise our camels at Saffieha by every method that we could devise; but all in vain; only one of them could get upon his legs; and that one did not stand two minutes till he knelt down, and could never be raised afterwards. This the Arabs all declared to be the effects of cold; and yet Fahrenheit’s thermometer, an hour before day, stood at 49°. Every way we turned ourselves, death stared us in the face. We had neither time nor strength to waste, nor provisions to support us. We then took the small skins that had contained our water, and filled them, as far as we thought a man could carry them with ease; but, after all these shifts, there was so little water, that a considerable part of our force had to be divided into two; this four gallons of water, which the Bashareen Arab managed with great dexterity. It is known to people conversant with natural history, that the camel has within him reservoirs, in which he can preserve drink for any number of days he is used to. In those caravans of long course, which come from the Niger across the desert of Selima, it is said that each camel, by drinking, lays in a store of water, that will support him for forty days. I will by no means be a vouchers of this account, which carries with it an air of exaggeration; but fourteen or sixteen days, it is well known, an ordinary camel will live, though he hath no fresh supply of water. When he chews his cud, or when he eats, you constantly see him throw from his repository, which he calls “water” to dilute his food; and nature has contrived this vessel with such properties, that the water within it never putrefies, nor turns unwholesome. It was indeed rapid, of a bluish cast, but had neither taste nor smell.” (Vol. iv. p. 561.)

The Arabsians, Persians, and others, eat the flesh of camels, and it is served up at the best tables of the country. When a camel is born, the breeders tie his four feet under his belly, and a carpet over his back. Thus they teach him the habit of bending his knees to rest himself; or when being loaded, or unloaded. The camel has a large solid foot, but not a hard one. In the spring of the year all his hair falls off in less than three days’ time, and his skin remains quite naked. At this time flies are extremely troublesome to him. He is dressed with a switch, instead of a curry-comb; and beaten as one would beat a carpet, to clear it of dust. On a journey his master goes before him piping, singing, and whistling; and the louder he sings, the better the camel follows. (The following is Niebuhr’s account of the dromedary of Egypt: (Trav. vol. i. p. 215, Germ. ed.) “My four companions took horses for this journey, (from Cairo to Sphinx.) I chose a dromedary, and found myself very well off, although I feared at first I should not be able to ride comfortably upon so high a beast. The dromedary lies down, like the camel, in order to let his rider mount. In getting up, he rises upon his hind legs first, so that the rider must take care not to fall down over his head; he has also the same pace as the camels, while horses have to go sometimes faster, sometimes slower, in order to keep along with the caravan. When on the march, he must not be stopped even to mount; and to avoid the need of this, he is taught on a certain signal to lower his head to the ground, so that his rider can set his foot upon his neck; and when he again raises his head, it requires but little practice to be able easily to place one’s self upon the saddle. The saddle of the camels that carry heavy loads, is open on the top, and the load hangs down on each side, in order that the hump of fat upon the back of the animal may not be subjected to pressure. A riding saddle for a camel is not very different from the common saddle, and consequently covers the hump on his back. Upon this saddle I slung my mattress; and could thus set myself on one side or the other, or upright, according as I wished to avoid the sun's rays, which at this season are very oppressive and detrimental. But some of these camels only remain in one position upon their horses, and therefore greatly fatigued; while at evening I was commonly not much more weary from riding, than if I had had to sit still all day upon a chair. If, however, one had to trot upon so high a beast, it would indeed be inconvenient. But the camels take long and slow steps; and the motion which one feels upon them is, therefore, more like that of a cradle. Burchardt says, too: "When mounted on a camel, which can never be stopped while its companions are moving on, I was obliged to jump off when I wished to take a bearing. The Arabs are highly pleased with a traveller who jumps off his beast and remounts without stopping it; as the act of kneeling is troublesome and fatigue-arising to the loaded camel, and before it can rise again, the caravan is considerably ahead." (Trav. in Syr. p. 443.)

The hardiness of the camel, and the slender and coarse fare with which he is contented, during long and arduous journeys, are truly amazing. Burchardt, in his route from the country south of the Dead sea, directly across the desert to Egypt, was with a party of Bedouins, who heard that a troop from a hostile tribe was in the vicinity. "It was, therefore, determined to travel by night, until we should be out of their reach; and we stopped at sunset, after a day's march of eleven hours and a half, merely for the purpose of allowing the camels to rest. Being ourselves afraid to light a fire, lest it should be discovered by the enemy, we were obliged to take a supper of dry flour mixed with a little salt. During the whole of this journey, the camels had no other provender than the withered stubble of the desert, our common fare, excepted, to which I gave a few handfuls of barley every evening. Loaded camels are scarcely able to perform such a journey without a daily allowance of beans and barley."-Aug. 31st.

We set out before midnight, and continued at a quick pace the whole night. In these northern districts of Arabia the Bedouins, in general, are not fond of proceeding by night; they seldom travel at that time, even in the hottest season, if they are not in very large numbers, because, as they say, during the night nobody can distinguish the face of his friend from that of his enemy. Another cause is, that the camels never feed at their ease in the day time, and nature seems to require that they should have their principal meal and a few hours' rest in the evening. The rule of travelling in these parts is, to set out about two hours before sunrise, to stop two hours at noon, when every one endeavors to sleep under his mantle, and to alight for the evening at about one hour before sunset. We always sat round the fire, in conversation for two or three hours after supper." (Trav. in Syr. p. 451.) Similar to this is the account given by Messrs. Fisk and King, during their journey from Cairo to Palestine, under date of April 10, 1832: "When the caravan stops, the camels are turned loose upon the thistles and weeds and grass which the desert produces. At sunset they are assembled, and made to lie down around the encampment. Yesterday afternoon four of them, which carried merchandise for an Armenian, went off, and could not be found. Three men were despatched in search of them. This morning they were not found, and we arranged our baggage so as to give the Armenian one of ours. The rest of the company also gave him assistance in carrying his baggage, and we set off at seven. In the course of the day, the four camels were found at a distance, and brought back. Contrary, or, at least, contrary to custom at evening." (Missionary Herald, 1834, p. 35.)

The value of the camel to the Arabs, and indeed to all the oriental nations, is inestimable; and indeed they regard it as the peculiar gift of Heaven to the people of their race. Their wealth often consists solely in their camels. So Job is said to have had three thousand of them at first, and afterwards six thousand, l. 3; xiii. 12. An anecdote mentioned by Chardin in his Ms. (Harmar’s Obs. iv. p. 318.) illustrates this, and shows that the wealth of Job was truly princely. "The king of Persia being in Mazanderan, in the year 1776, the Tartar set upon the camels of the king in the month of February, and took three thousand of them; which was a great loss to him, for he has but seven thousand in all. If their number should be complete; especially considering it was winter, when it was difficult to procure others in a country that was a stranger to commerce; and considering, too, their importance, these beasts carrying all the baggage for which reason they are called the ships of Persia. Upon these accounts the king presently retired."

The camel is here more graphically compared with a ship, and this epithet is justly applied to him, as being the medium by which the Arabs cross the pathless deserts of the East, which may well be likened to the trackless ocean. This is also further illustrated by the following extracts. R. Sanders writes thus: (p. 158.) "The whole caravan, when now assembled, consists of a thousand horses, mules, and asses; and of five hundred camels. These are the ships of Arabia; their seas are the deserts, a creature created for burthen, &c. It does not clearly appear in this extract, though it might be gathered from it, that the camel has the name of "the ship of Arabia" but Mr. Bruce comes in to our assistance, by saying, (p. 388, vol. I) "What enables the shepherd to perform the long and toilsome journeys across Africa, is the camel, emphatically called, by the Arabs, the ship of the desert. He seems to have been created for this trade," &c.

[From the above extracts it is manifest, that the camel is thus poetically called the ship of the desert, from the circumstance of his being a whole herd, and not within the reach of the enemy. Another circumstance of this kind is, his great speed; their speed, which is not great. The dromedary, on the contrary, is celebrated for its fleetness; or rather on account of its being able to hold out for so long a time in a hard rapid trot. R.] The writer states, that the dromedary in Barbary, called Aâshaare, will, in one night, and through a level country, traverse as much ground, as any single horse can in ten. The Arabs affirm that it makes nothing of holding its rapids pace, which is a most violent hard trot, for four and twenty hours on a stretch, without showing the least sign of weariness, or inclination to bait; and that having then swallowed a ball or two of a sort of paste made up of barley-meal, and may a little crisp bread, after the manner of the Acherontes or the food of the dead, provided its rider could hold out without sleep and other refreshments. During his stay in Algiers, Mr. Morgan was a party in a diversion in which one of these Ashari ran against some of the swiftest Barbars in the whole Neja, which is famed for having good ones, of the true Libyan breed, shaped like greyhounds, and which will sometimes run down an ostrich.

"We all started," he remarks, "like racers, and for the first spurt most of the best mounted amongst us kept pace pretty well, but our grass-fed horses soon flagged: several of the Libyan and Numidian runners held pace, till we, who still followed upon a good round hand gallop, could no longer discern them, and then gave out; as we were told after their return. When the dromedary had been out of sight about half an hour, we again espied it flying towards us with an amazing velocity, and in a very few moments was among us, and seemingly nothing concerned; while the horses and mares were all on a foam, and scarcely able to breathe, as was likewise a fleet, tall greyhound bitch, of the young prince's, who had followed and kept pace the whole time, and was no sooner got back to us, but lay down panting as if ready to expire." p. 101.

[With reference to these facts, Mr. Taylor has attempted to illustrate the passage in Job ix. 26. "They (my days) are passed away like swift ships;" where the proper version is either "ships of desire," i.e. easier to arrive at their place of destination, or, according to Gesenius and others, "ships of papyrus," in allusion to the light and rapid skiffs made of this material, and which are celebrated in ancient history. Mr. Taylor supposes the writer to allude to these ships of the desert, or dromedaries. But, in the first place, neither the camel nor dromedary is ever called directly a ship, i.e. merely the word ship alone never denotes a camel or a dromedary; and then, too, the qualifying word "he that" (xaxb) does not here point to any such use of the word. Moreover, it is not the dromedary, which is so called on account of its speed; but the camel, on account of its usefulness as a beast of burden.

Our Lord's words in Matt. xix. 24. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven," have given rise to much discussion. Theophylact, with many ancient and some modern commentators, read κουδαλός, or at least κοινετόν, a cable, as did the Vulgate. But Eusebius and some ancients, with Grotius, Erasmus, Dursius, Lightfoot, Michaelis, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel, contend that the κοινετός is to be retained. Campbell has well defended the common reading; and the rabbinical and Latin readings, adduced by Lightfoot, and others, prove that there was a similar proverb in use among the Jews: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pumpedilians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle." that is, says the Aruch, who speaks things impossible. But the very proverb itself is found in the Koran: "The imps shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter there till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." The design of our Lord was evidently to hint to the rich their danger, in order that they may exert themselves to surround the peculiar temptations by which they are assailed; and learn not to trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God.

In Matt. xxiii. 24, there is another proverbial expression, which also has been much misunderstood: "Ye strain at the gnat, and swallow a camel." Dr. A. Clarke has shown that there is an error of the press in the English translation, in which κοινετός has been substituted for out. The expression alludes to the Jewish custom of filtering wine, for fear of swallowing any insect forbidden by the law as unclean; and is applied to those who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding smaller faults, yet do not scruple to commit the greater sins. To make the antithesis as strong as may be, two things are selected as opposite as possible: the smallest insect, and the largest animal.

CAMELS' HAIR, in an article of clothing, is that in which John the Baptist was habited in raiment of camels' hair, and Chardin states, that such garments are worn by the modern dervishes. There is a coarse cloth made of camels' hair in the East, which is used for manufacturing the coats of shepherds, and camel-drivers, and also for the covering of tents. It was, doubtless, this coarse kind which was adopted by John. By this he was distinguished from those residents in royal palaces who wore soft raiment. Elijah is said in the Eng. Bible to have been "a hairy man;" (2 Kings i. 8) but it should be "a man dressed in hair;" that is, camel's hair. In Zech. xiii. 4, "a rough garment," that is, a garment of a hairy manufacture, is characteristic of a prophet.

CAMELEON, a kind of lizard, the flesh of which Moses forbids the Hebrews to eat, Lev. xi. 30. There is no reason for supposing that the Hebrew word הָאָרָם means the real cameleon, but some kind of lizard distinguished by Gershom and others as different from the giraffe, which see. The cameleo-pardus has been supposed the giraffe, an animal found in the East Indies, beyond the Ganges, and in Africa, though rarely in the north of that continent. Its neck is very long and slender; its ears are slit; its feet are long; its tail is very short; and its legs, especially its fore legs, are taller than those of any other animal, so that it cannot drink without straddling; and it has two little horns. Bochart is of opinion, however, that Moses did not intend the giraffe, or cameleo-pardus, because the residence of this animal is in countries too remote; and further, that the cameleo being unclean, it was not likely the giraffe should be allowed. He thinks the Hebrew חָנָן signifies a wild goat. Others translate it an elk, and others an ox. I. CAMON, a city west of the Jordan, according to Eusebius, in the great plain, six miles from Legio, inclining north; perhaps Cadmon. II. CAMON, a city of Munassch, east of the Jordan, in the country of the Schorcher, and others, prove that there was a similar proverb in use among the Jews: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pumpedilians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle:" that is, says the Aruch, who speaks things impossible. But the very proverb itself is found in the Koran: "The imps shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter there till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." more than it decorates them. The animated whiteness of the palm of the hand, the tender rose-color of the nails, are effaced by a dingy layer of a reddish orange-colored dust. But not the rose color of the epidermis of which is not hardened by long or frequent walking, and which daily friction makes still thinner, is likewise loaded with the same color. It is with the greenish powder of the dried leaves of the henna that the women procure for themselves a decoration so whimsical. It is prepared chiefly in the Said, from whence it is distributed over all the cities of Egypt. The markets are constantly supplied with it, as a commodity of habitual and indispensable use. They dilute it in water, and rub the soft paste it makes on the parts which they mean to color: they are wrapped up in linen, and at the end of two or three hours the orange hue is strongly impressed on them. Though the women wash both hands and feet several times a day with lukewarm water and soap, this color adheres for a long time, and it is sufficient to renew it about every fifteen days: that of the nails lasts much longer; nay, it passes for ineffaceable. In Turkey, likewise, the women make use of henna, but apply it to the nails only, and leave to their hands and feet the color of nature. It would appear, that the custom of dying the nails was known to the ancient Egyptians, for those of mummiacs are, most commonly, of a reddish hue. But Egyptian henna is refined still further on the general practice; they, too, paint their fingers, space by space only, and, in order that the color may not lay hold of the whole, they wrap them round with thread at the proposed distance, before the application of the color-giving paste; so that, when the operation is finished, they have the fingers marked circularly, from end to end, with small orange-colored bands. Others—and this practice is more common among certain Syrian dames—have a mind, that their hands should present the sufficiently discrepable mixture of black and white. The bands, which the henna had first reddened, become of a shining black, by rubbing them with a composition of sub-ammunimae, lime and honey. This practice of staining the hands and nails explains, perhaps, the phrases of Dem. xxi. 12.

"You sometimes meet with men, likewise, who apply mixture of henna to their beards, and admit the head with entire confidence, that the strength and vigor, that it prevenges the falling off of the hair (the followers of Mahomet, it is well known, preserve, on the crown of the head, a long tuft of hair) and beard, and banishes its vermin."

"The plant was thus described:—"The henna is a tall shrub, endlesly multiplied in Egypt; the leaves are of a lengthened oval form, opposed to each other, and of a faint green color. The flowers grow at the extremity of the branches, in long and tufted clusters; the smaller ramifications which support them are red, and likewise opposite: from their armpit cavity (azizle) springs a small leaf almost round, but terminating in a point: the corolla is formed of four petals curling up, and of a light yellow. Between each petal are two that resemble a yellow summit: there is only one white pistil. The pedicle, reddish at its issuing from the bough, dies away into a faint green. The calyx is cut into four pieces, of a tender green up toward their extremity, which is reddish. The berry is a green capsule previous to its maturity; it assumes a red tint as it ripens, and becomes brown when it is dried: it is divided into four compartments, in which are enclosed the seeds, triangular and brown-colored. The bark of the stem and of the branches is of a deep gray, and the wood has, internally, a light cast of yellow. In truth, this is one of the plants the most grateful to both the sight and the smell. The gently deepish color of its bark, the light green of its foliage, the softened mixture of white and yellow, with which the flowers, collected into long clusters like the lily, are colored, the red tint of the ramifications which support them, form a combination of the most agreeable effect. These flowers, whose shades are so delicate, diffuse around the sweetest odors, and embellish the gardens and the apartments which they embellish; they accordingly form the usual nosegay of beauty; the women, ornament of the prisons of jealousy, whereas they might be that of a whole country, take pleasure to deck themselves with these beautiful clusters of fragrance, to adorn their apartments with them, to carry them to the bath, to hold them in their hand, in a word, to perfume their bosom with them. They attach to this possession, which the mildness of the climate, and the facility of culture, seldom refuses them, a value so high, that they would willingly appropriate it to the private enjoyment of their persons, and imagine that they suffer with impatience Christian women and Jewesses to partake of it with them. The henna grows in great quantities in the vicinity of Rosetta, and constitutes one of the principal ornaments of the beautiful gardens which are more spread. Its extensive cultivation, which penetrates to a great depth with the utmost ease, swells to a large size in a soil, soft, rich, mixed with sand, and such as every husbandman would have to work upon; the shrub, of course, acquires a more vigorous growth there than anywhere else; it is, at the same time, more extensively multiplied; it grows, however, in all the other cultivated districts of Egypt, and principally in the upper part. There is much reason to presume, that the henna of Egypt is the kypres of the ancient Greeks. The descriptions, incomplete: it is admitted, which authors have given of it, and particularly the form and the sweet perfume of its flowers which they have celebrated, leave scarcely any doubt respecting the identity of these two plants. [The name of kypres is no longer in use among the modern Greeks; they give to the henna the corrupted denominations of kem, kou, &c. The scion of Provence, whose vessels were employed in carrying the powder of henna, called it kypres. Besides that, the clusters of cypres, furu cypres, of the Song of Songs, (chap. i. 13, 14.) can be nothing else but the very clusters of the flower of the henna: this is, at last, the opinion of the best commentators. It is not at all ceasing, that all those things which are delicious should have furnished to oriental. poetry agreeable allusions and numerous comparisons. This furnishes an answer to part of the forty-fifth question of Michelin; for the flower of henna is disposed in clusters, and the women of Egypt, who clearly love the smell of it, are fond of carrying it, as I have said, in the spot which the text indicates—in their bosom.]"

CANA, the city in which our Lord performed his first miracle, was in Galilee, and pertaining to the tribe of Zebulun. It stood on a hill, with a yellow name, and supposed to occupy the site of the ancient town, is pleasantly situated on the descent of a hill, about sixteen miles north-west of Tiberias, and six north-east of Nazareth. Dr. Richardson states that, in a small Greek church on this plain city, there was an old stone pot, made of the common compact limestone of the country, which the hierarch informed him was one of the original pots that contained the water which underwent the miraculous change at the wedding, which was here hourest by the presence of Christ. "It is worthy of note," says Dr. Chisholm, "walking through the ruins of a church, we saw large massy stone pots, answering the description given of the ancient vessels of the country; not preserved nor exhibited as relics, but lying about, disregarded by the present inhabitants, as antiquities with whose original use they were unacquainted. From their appearance, and the number of them, it was quite evident, that a practice of keeping water in large stone pots, each holding from sixteen to twenty-seven gallons, was once common in the country." (Travels, p. ii. ch. 14.) Cana, or, as it is now called, Kefer Konna, or Cana Gall, contains about 300 inhabitants, who are chiefly Catholic Christians. There was another place bearing the same name, belonging to the tribe of Asher, which was situated in the neighborhood of Sidon.

I. CANAAN, son of Ham. The Hebrews believe that Canaan, having discovered Noah's nakedness, told his father Ham; and that Noah, when he awoke, having understood what had passed, cursed Canaan, the first reporter of his exposure. Others are of opinion, that Noah, knowing nothing more displeasing to Ham, than cursing of Canaan, resolved to punish him in his son, Gen. iv. 25. The posterity of Canaan was numerous; his eldest son, Sidon, was the father of the Sidonians, or Phoenicians; and his other ten sons the fathers of as many tribes, dwelling in Palestine and Syria; namely, the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergasites, Hivites, Arkites, Sinites, Arvadites, Zemarites, and Hamathites. See CANANITES.

II. CANAAN, the name of the land peopled by Canaan and his posterity, and afterwards given to the Hebrews. It signifies properly level or low country, as lying on the coast, in opposition to rwm, arab, Syria, or a higher country. This country has, at different periods, been called by various names, either from its inhabitants or some circumstances connected with its history.—(1) The Land of Canaan, from Canaan, the son of Ham, who divided it among his eleven sons, each of whom became the head of a numerous tribe, and ultimately of a distinct people, Gen. x. 15. —(2) The Land of Promise, (Heb. xi. 9.) from the promise given to Abraham, that his posterity should possess it, Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 14. These being termed Hebrews, the region in which they dwelt was called —(3) The Land of the Hebrews, Gen. xi. 15.—(4) The Land of Israel, from the Israelites, or posterity of Jacob, having settled themselves there. This name is of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament. In its larger acceptation, it comprehends all that tract of ground on each side of Jordan, which God gave for an inheritance to the children of Israel. —(5) The Land of Judah. Under this appellation was at first comprised only that part of the region which was allotted to the tribe of Judah; but in subsequent times, when their tribe excelled the others in dignity, it was applied to the whole land. After the separation of the ten tribes, that portion of the land which belonged to Judah and Benjamin, which formed a separate kingdom, was distinguished by the appellation of "the land of Judah," or of Judæa; which latter name the whole country retained during the existence of the second temple, and under the dominion of the Romans.—(6) The Holy Land. This name does not appear to have been used by the Hebrews themselves, till after the Babylonian captivity, when it is applied to the land by the prophet Zechariah, ii. 12. The land of Canaan was supposed by the Jews to be peculiarly holy, inasmuch as it furnished holy offerings for the temple; but not all the land thus consecrated belonged to the Shechinah, nor the sacred Spirit, dwelt on any person, even a prophet, out of this land. In Canaan, say the rabbins, (Shevith, cap. ix. hal. 2.) are three countries—Judæa, the region beyond Jordan, and Galilee. This division designally excludes Samaria, which was considered as unclean by reason of its inhabitants. In land, waters, dwellings and paths were clean.—(7) Palestine, by which name the whole land appears to have been called in the time of Moses, (Exod. xv. 14.) is derived from the Philistines, a people who migrated from Egypt, and, having expelled the aboriginal inhabitants, settled on the borders of the Mediterranean, where they became so considerable, as to give their name to the whole country, though they in fact possessed only a small part of it. By heathen writers, the Holy Land has been variously termed, Syrian Palestine, Syria, and Phoenicia. (R. Palest. cap. 1.)

The boundaries of this country are, the Mediterranean sea on the west, Lebanon and Syria on the north; Arabia Deserta, and the lands of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Midianites, on the east; the river of Egypt, the wilderness or desert of Zin, the southern shore of the Dead sea, and the river Arnon, on the south; and Egypt on the south-west. Near mount Lebanon stood the city of Dan, and near the southern extremity of the land, Beersheba; and hence the expression "from Dan to Beersheba," to denote the whole length of the land of Canaan. Its extreme length was about 170 miles, and its width about 80. By the Abrahamic covenant, recorded in Gen. xv. 18, the original grant of land to the Israelites was "from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates." The boundaries of it are most accurately described by Moses in Num. xxxiv. 1—16.

The land of Canaan has been variously divided. Under Joshua it was apportioned out to the twelve tribes; under Solomon it was distributed into twelve provinces; (1 Kings iv. 7—19.) and upon the accession of Rehoboam to the throne, it was divided into the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. After this period, it fell into the hands of the Babylonians, the Greeks, the Syrians, and the Romans. During the time of our Saviour, it was under the dominion of the post-Roman empire. It was divided into five provinces, viz. Galilee, Samaria, Judea, Peræa, and Idumæa. Peræa was again divided into seven cantons, viz. Abilene, Trachonitis, Ituraea, Gaulonitis, Batanaea, Peræa, and Decapolis.

The Israelites do not appear to have restricted themselves to this country; and in the time of the kings, their power extended over distant districts. On their return from Babylon, they did not regain the whole land; not even the whole of what was marked by the boundary line of Moses; the district south of Gaza, and of a line drawn from Gaza to Kadesh-Barnea, was excluded from the national territory. The Idumæans, also, during the Babylonish captivity, had encroached, and settled themselves in many towns on the south of Judah; so that Idumæa was considered as divided into the greater and the lesser; or the upper and the lower: but these being subdued by Hércules (Joseph. Ant. lib. xiii. cap. 17.) the inhabitants embraced Judaism, and were afterwards reckoned as Jews. Peræa was divided into five counties; Idumæa, Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and beyond Jordan.
Moses draws a line from Sidon to Lasha, and from Sidon to Go at the mouth of the Nile to Egypt, whether it is within the line belongs to the land of Israel; but whatever is without that line is without the land;" their meaning is, that the islands in the Mediterranean, as Arvad, Tyre, &c. never were occupied by the Hebrew nation. These appear to have been strongly fortified, and not only inhabited by a hardy race of people, but capable of being supplied, by sea, with reinforcements, and necessaries of all kinds, so that they resisted the power of the Israelites; and the conquest of them is particularly boasted of by a subsequent invader, 2 Kings xviii. 34; xix. 13.

The surface of the land of Canaan is beautifully diversified with mountains and plains, rivers and valleys, and must have presented a delightful appearance when the Jewish nation was in its prime, and under the special providence of God. The principal mountains are Lebanon, Carmel, Tabor, the mountains of Israel, Gilead, and Hermon, the mount of Olives, Calvary, Sion, and Moriah. Of the valleys, those of Hazor, Jehoshaphat, Siddim, Rehob, and Manure, are the most known. The plain of the Mediterranean, of Esdraelon, and the region round about Jordan, are celebrated as the scenes of many important events. The chief brooks and rivers are the Jordan, the Arnon, the Sirhôr, the Jabbok, the Beor, or river of Egypt, the Kishon, the Kidron, the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead sea, and the lake of Tiberias, or the sea of Galilee. For a description of these, we refer to the articles on those subjects.

The land of Canaan was situated in the fifth climate, between the 31st and 34th degrees of north latitude: hence the heat during the summer is intense. The surface of the land, however, being so greatly diversified, with mountains and plains, renders the climate unequal and variable. On the south, it is sheltered by lofty mountains, which separate it from the sandy deserts of Arabia. Breezes from the Mediterranean cool it on the west side. Mount Lebanon keeps off the north wind, while mount Hermon intercepts the north-east. During the summer season, in the interior of the country, particularly in the plains of Esdraelon and Jericho, the heat is intense. Generally speaking, however, the atmosphere is mild; the summers only dry and hot; the days extremely hot, but the nights sometimes intensely cold.

The soil of Canaan was of the richest description; a fine mould, without stones, and almost without a pebble. Dr. Shaw informs us, that it rarely requires more than one pair of yoke to plough it. Moses speaks of Canaan as of the finest country in the world—a land flowing with milk and honey. Profane authors also speak of it much in the same manner. Heineccius (Joseph. contr. Ap. p. 1049) who had been brought up with Alexander the Great, and who wrote in the time of Ptolemy I, mentions this country as very fruitful and well-peopled, an excellent province, that bore all kinds of good fruit. Pliny gives a similar description of it, and says, Jerusalem was not only the most famous city of Judea, but of the whole East. He describes the course of the Jordan, as of a delicious river; he speaks advantageously of the lake of Genesaroth, of the balm of Judæa, its palm-trees, &c. Tacitus, (Hist. lib. xiv. cap. 6i.) Ammianus Marcellinus, and most of the ancients, who have mentioned Canaan, have spoken of it with equal commendations. The Mahometans speak of it extravagantly. "They tell us, that besides the two principal cities of the country, Jerusalem and Jericho, this province had a thousand villages, a hundred of which had many fine gardens. That the grapevines were so large, the men could hardly carry a cluster of them, and that five men might hide themselves in the shell of one pomegranate! That this country was anciently inhabited by giants of the race of Anak, unknown. Notwithstanding these testimonies of the ancients, we find people very incredulous as to the fruitfulness of the Holy Land. Some travellers said little to its advantage. The country, they say, appears to be dry and barren, ill watered, and has but few cultivated plains. Jerome says, he was mistaken; he was very well acquainted with those qualities which Scripture ascribes to it. He says that Canaan is full of mountains, that dryness and drought are very common, that they had only rain water, which they caught and preserved in cisterns, which supplied the absence of fountains. Yet Jerome, speaking of the fertility of Canaan, says no country could dispute it with it in fruitfulness. Having given a general outline of the country, we may now proceed to describe it more particularly. And first, with reference to its divisions among the tribes.

"From the mountains of Quarrantania," says Dr. Shaw, "we have a distinct view of the land of the Amorites, of Gilead, and of Bashan, the inheritance of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and of the half-tribe of Manasseh. This tract, in the neighborhood peculiarly of the river Jordan, is, in many places, low and marshy—covered with reeds and rushes, and willows; but at the distance of two or three leagues from the stream, it appears to be made up of a succession of hills and valleys, somewhat larger, and seemingly more fertile, than those in the tribe of Benjamin. Beyond these plains, over against Jericho, where we are to look for the mountains of Abarim, the northern boundary of the land of Moab, our prospect is interrupted by an exceeding high ridge of distant mountains, no otherwise diversified than by a succession of small rocks and precipices, rendered in several places more frightful, by a multiplicity of torrents which fall on each side of them. This ridge is continued all along the eastern coast of the Dead sea, as far as our eye can conduct us, affording, all the way, a most hilly and melancholy prospect, but a little assisted by the intermediate view of a large, stagnating, unctuous expanse of water, rarely if ever enlivened by any flocks of birds that settle upon it, or by so much as one vessel of passage or commerce that is known to visit it. Such is the general plan of that part of the Holy Land which fell under my observation." But quitting the land of Moab, the scene is greatly improved as we proceed further northward, and advance toward the immense and fertile plains of the Haoran. Bu Henel calls it "the garden name, Masharik, to the country of Haoran, as to the plains near Damascus, which have always been considered by the orientals as a terrestrial paradise. The Arabs report of that city, that Mahomet should say, on a distant sight of it, "he would not enter it; as there was but one paradise for man, and he would not have his in this world." Beyond the mountain, and to the south-west of Damascus," says a Catholic missionary, "the plain of Hœuram begins. Its fertility is so great, that it is called the granary of the Turks. In fact, there arrive, almost daily, caravans from all parts of the empire, which are the abode of the nomad tribes. The meal made of it is excellent, wherever it is found; and if it is sold as good as if new made. Both rich and poor prefer it to all other sorts of bread." (Journey from Aleppo to Damascus. 1736. 8vo. p. 68.) Volney, too, describes it as "the immense plains of Hœuram;" their length, as "five or six days' journey;" and their soil as most fruitful. See Bashan.

With this description agrees the request of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh to Moses: (Num. xxxii. 1-5.) "This country is a land for cattle—if we have found grace in thy sight, give us this land for a possession." The tribe of Reuben lay to the south; east of this tribe was the desert; west of it the Jordan and the Dead sea; north of it was the tribe of Gad; and southward a tract over-run by the Israelites, but afterwards recovered by the Moabites. This tribe again, in its disputes with the Moabites, in the territories of this tribe. The eastern parts of these mountains were habitable; but whether the descendants of these Israelites possessed those parts may be doubted; perhaps, only partially. The half-tribe of Manasseh, or Eastern Manasseh, extended north to the southern ridge of Lebanon, and the springs of Jordan: the same, no doubt, may be affirmed of these parts as of those pertaining to the tribe of Naphtali; which we shall next proceed to describe.

Dundini, speaking of mount Lebanon, says, "This country consists in elevated and stony mountains, extending north and south. Nevertheless, the industry and labor of man have made it one uniform plain; for, gathering into dikes the stones which are scattered about, they form continued walls, and constantly going back upon each other in succession higher; so that, at length, by means of equalizing hills and valleys, they convert a barren mountain into a beautiful level, easily susceptible of culture, and at once fertile and delightful. It abounds in corn, excellent wine, oil, cotton, silk, wax, wood, animals wild and tame, especially goats. There are but few small animals, the winter being severe, and the snow perpetual. There are many sheep, fat and large as those of Cyprus, and others in the Levant. In the forests are wild hares, foxes, tigers, and other animals of the same nature. The rest of the plains abound in partridges, which are as large as common hens. There are no doves-cotes, but quantities of pigeons, turtle doves, thrushes, bees, figs, and other kinds of birds. There are also eagles. They do not dig around the vines, but till the ground with oxen; the plants being set in straight lines, at proper distances. Neither do they prop them, but let them trail on the ground. The wine they produce is delicate and agreeable. There are grapes as large as plums. The size of the bunches of grapes is surprising; and when I saw them, I easily discovered why the Hebrews had so great longing to taste them, and why they so passionately desired to conquer the Promised Land, after having seen them in which the spies brought from the neighboring district. These mountains, therefore, do not only abound in stones, but in all sorts of provisions."

De la Roque describes the western face of Libanus, and the valley between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, in the highest degree lovely, and productive of every species of fruit; and although the surface of the soil is very saline; but the south aspect of Lebanon he did not visit. The following account of the Jordan, which takes its rise in these mountains, is principally extracted from that writer; who has taken much pains on the subject. The source of the river Jordan is uncontestedly in the mountains of Anti-Libanus, in the region now called Wad-et-tein; it is subject to the pacha of Damascus, and comprehends the mount Hermon of the ancients. The Jordan rises near the district anciently called Panium, or Panceas, where the city Pancæas stood, which was afterwards called Cesarea Philippi. Josephus indeed says the true source of the Jordan was at Phiala, in the Trachonitis, from whence it flowed by subterranean passages, till it appeared at Panion. Phiala was a round basin, always full, never running over. Panium, says the same writer, was a grotto, excavated by nature at the foot of a high mountain; it is extremely deep, and filled with a standing water; and from below issue the fountains of Jordan. Pliny says much the same; to which Eusebius adds, that the mountain also was named Panium. But in another place, he says, the river Jordan rose at a small town called Don, four thousand paces distant from Panceas. So that two sources of the Jordan were in A.D. 1636, says John, a small village in the tribe of Nahphali, at the foot of mount Libanus, south, whence the principal source of the Jordan issues, about a league from Dōn. These two villages, he says, are inhabited by Druses, who breed many goats. Notwithstanding these testimonies, however, some modern critics have thought that only one source is entitled to the honor of originating the Jordan. We have hinted that the region of Wad-et-tein, where all the inhabitants of mount Libanus place the sources of the Jordan, included the mount Hermon of the ancients, or a part of this mountain; as the whole was of great extent, and had various appellations. Among others, that part of it where the grotto Panceas was received the name of Panium, being consecrated to the god Pan, the deity of mountains, forests, and chasms. Here his image was worshipped, and a temple probably erected, which became the cause of establishing a small town; which in succeeding ages received various names, as Cesarea Philippi, Claudia Cesarea, and Neronis; but this last, being odious, was not permanent; the town recovered its name of Cesarea Philippi, then of Panæas, or Banius, which it retains, though some of the Mahometans call it Belïn. William of Tyre informs us that near to this city was a vast forest, named, in his time, the forest of Panceas; a very proper place for feeding sheep; and that a prodigious multitude of Arabs and Turcomans, after having made a peace with Godfrey of Bologne, retired thither. The Jordan is but an inconsiderable stream, till, after receiving several rivulets, and by the nature of the country, after running two or three leagues, it forms what is now called the marsh of Jordan, ancient lake Merom; which extends about two leagues in circumference, when the snow melt on mount Libanus, but is dry in the heats of summer. This marsh is almost wholly overgrown with reeds, of that kind which is used for writing with, and for the fletching of arrows. The environs of the lake are full of jaguars, bears, and other wild animals, with the neighboring mountains. Coming out of this lake, the Jordan resumes its course southwards, and, at half a league's distance, is crossed by a stone bridge, which the inhabitants call Jacob's bridge, because they say it was in this place that the patriarch wrestled with the angel. After a course of eight or nine leagues, the river enters the lake of Genesareth, or the sea of Galilee, or of Tiberias. Having passed through this lake, it issues near the ruins of Scythopolis, and, after about thirty leagues, loses itself in the Dead sea. See JORDAN.

Volney says, "As we approach the Jordan, the country becomes more hilly and better watered; the valley through which this river flows abounds, in general, in pastureage, especially in the upper part of it. As for the river itself, it is very far from being of that importance which we are apt to assign to it. The Arabs, who are ignorant of the name of Jordan, call it El-Sham. Its breadth between the two principal lakes, in few places exceeds sixty or eighty feet; but its depth is about ten or twelve. In winter it overflows its narrow channel; and, swollen by the rains, forms a sheet of water sometimes a quarter of a league broad. The time of flow of this river is generally in March, when the snows melt on the mountains of the Shaiak; at which time, more than any other, its waters are troubled, and of a yellow hue, and its course is impeded. Its banks are covered with a thick forest of reeds, willows, and various shrubs, which serve as an asylum for wild beasts, owls, jackals, hares, and different kinds of birds." See Jer. xlix. 19.

The reader will consider the Dead sea as being originally divided into several streams, running among low grounds, by which were they were absorbed; and among which they fertilized the fields, the gardens, and other delights of the inhablants. The present vicinity of the Damascens of Damascus is the nearest approach to this idea of the "cities of the plain." The water which render this city so enchanting terminate in a marsh, as we presume those of the Jordan did; without reaching the ocean, or falling into any other river. The following extract of a letter of Dr. D'Anjou: "Damascus is the capital and residence of the pacha. The Arabs call it El-Sham, accordign to their custom of bestowing the name of the country on its capital. The ancient oriental name of Damascus is known only to geographers. The city is situated in a vast plain, open to the south and east, and shut in toward the west and the north by mountains, which limit the view at no great distance; but, in return, a number of rivulets rise from these mountains, which render the Damascenes the most favored and most delicious province of all Syria; the Arabs speak of it with enthusiasm; and think they can never sufficiently extol the freshness and verdure of its orchards, the abundance and variety of its fruits, its numerous streams, and the cleanness of its streets and fountains. No city contains so many canals and fountains; each house has one; and all these waters are furnished by three rivulets, or branches of the same river, which, after fertilizing the gardens for a course of three leagues, flow into a hollow called the Lake of the Meadow."

Volney, vol. ii. p. 283.) Another writer says, "This lake is three leagues from Damascus, toward the east, ten or twelve leagues long, and five or six broad. It produces excellent fish, and the cope which surrounds it, a great quantity of game. The wonder is, that though it receives not only the above-mentioned river, but many stray waters besides, yet it never overflows. Returning now to the head of the Jordan, we find the tribes of Naphtali and Asher. To Naphtali we have already attended. Now we proceed to Asher, and we can suppose, that Asher, lying on the sea-coast, had some advantages which Naphtali had not. He says, "A very fertile plain extends itself to a vast compass before Tyre." "The plain of Acra extends itself in length from mount Carmel northward, which is at least six good hours; and in breadth, between the sea and the mountains, it is in most places two hours over. It enjoys good streams of water at convenient distances, and every thing else that might render it both pleasant and fruitful. But this delicious plain is now almost desolate, being suffered, for want of culture, to run up to rank weeds, which were, at the time we passed it, as high as our horses' backs. The plain of Esdraelon is of as extensive, and very fertile, but uncultivated; only serving the Arabs for pastureage." "We turned out of the plain of Esdraelon, and entered the precincts of the half-tribe of Manasseh. From hence our road lay, for about four hours, through narrow valleys, pleasantly wooded on both sides. As to Zebulon, the travelers only mentions in one place his being "an hour and a half in crossing the delicious plain of Zebulun,"—to that of Acra. "Our stage this day was somewhat less than seven hours; it lay about W. by N. through a country very delightful, and fertile beyond imagination."

Dr. E. D. Clarke, speaking of this district, says, "After leaving Shef' bamer, the mountainous territory begins, and the road winds among hills with beautiful trees. Passing these hills, we entered that part of Galilee which belonged to the tribe of Zabulon; whence, according to the triumphal song of Deborah and Barak, issued to the battle against Sisera, they that handled the sword. The scenery is, to the full, as delightful as in the rich vales upon the south of the Crimea: it reminded us of the finest parts of Kent and Surrey. The soil, although stony, is exceedingly rich, but now entirely neglected. . . . Had it pleased Lord Byron to visit the elevated mount where it is known that Christ preached to his disciples, that memorable sermon, concentrating the sum and substance of every Christian virtue. Having attained the highest point, we turned back, which view was so grand and magnificent, independently of the interest excited by the different objects contained in it, has no parallel in the Holy Land. From this situation we perceived that the plain, over which we had been so long riding, was itself very elevated. Far beneath appeared other plains, one lower than the other, in that regular gradation concerning which observations were recently made, and extending to the surface of the sea of Tiberias, or sea of Galilee. This immense lake, also, equal, to that of Geneva, spreads its waters over all the lower territory, extending from the north-west towards the south-west, and then bearing east of it. Its eastern shores present a sublime scene of mountains, extending toward the north and south, and seeming to close it in at either extremity; both towards Chorazin, where the Jordan enters; and the Aulon, or Campus Magnus, through which it flows to the Dead sea. The cultivated plains reaching to its borders, which we beheld at an amazing depth below our view, resembled, by the various hues their different produce early, which the snow made a carpet. Toward the north appeared snowy summits, towering beyond a series of intervening mountains, with unapproachable greatness. We considered them as the summits of Libanus; but the Arabs belonging to our caravan called the principal eminence Jebel el Sinh, saying it was near Damascus; probably, therefore, a part of the chain of Libanus. This summit was so lofty, that the snow entirely covered the upper part of it; not lying in patches, as I have seen it, during summer, when the tops of very elevated mountains, for instance, that of Ben Nevis in Scotland,) but investing all the higher part with that perfect white and smooth velvet-like appearance which snow only exhibits when it is very deep; a striking spectacle in such a climate, where the beholder, seeking protection from a burning sun, almost considers the firmament to be on fire. The elevated plains upon the mountainous territory beyond the northern extremity of the lake are called by a name, in Arabic, which signifies 'the Wilderness.' To the south-west, at the distance of only twelve miles, we behold mount Thabor, having a conical form, and standing quite insular, upon the northern side of the plain of Esdraelon. The mountain whence this superb view was presented consists entirely of limestone; the prevailing constituent of all the mountains in Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine. (p. 456.) "As we rode towards the sea of Tiberias, the guides pointed to a sloping spot from the heights upon our right, whence we had descended, as the place where the miracle was accomplished by which our Saviour fed the multitude; it is, therefore, called 'The Multiplication of Bread;' as the mount above, where the sermon was preached to the disciples, is called 'The Mountain of Beatitudes,' from the expressions used in the beginning of that discourse. This part of the Holy Land is very full of wild animals. Antelopes are in great number. We had the pleasure of seeing these beautiful quadrupeds in their natural state, feeding among the thistles and tall herbage of these plains, and bounding before us occasionally, as we disturbed them. The Arabs frequently take them in the chase. The lake now continued in view upon our left. The wind rendered its surface rough, and caused us to move more rudely than usual. When, in one of the small vessels which traverse these waters, they were tossed in a storm, and saw Jesus, in the fourth watch of the night, walking to them upon the waves, Matt. xiv. 24. Often as this subject has been painted, combined with a number of circumstances adapted for the representation of sublimity, no artist has been aware of the uncommon grandeur of the scene, memorable on account of the transaction. The lake of Genesareth is surrounded by objects well calculated to heighten the solemn impression made by such a picture; and, independent of the local feelings likely to be excited in its contemplation, affords one of the most striking prospects in the Holy Land. It is by comparison alone that any due conception of the appearance it presents can be conveyed to the minds of those who have not seen it: and, speaking of it comparatively, it may be described as longer and finer than any of our Cumberland and Westmorland lakes, although, perhaps, it yields in majesty to the stupendous features of Loch Lomond, in Scotland. It does not possess the vastness of the lake of Geneva, although it much resembles it in particular points of view. The lake of Locarno, in Italy, comes nearest to it in point of picturesque beauty, although it is destitute of any thing similar to the islands which are so greatly admired in the latter. These islands are inferior in magnitude, and, perhaps, in the height of its surrounding mountains, to the lake Asphaltites; but its broad and extended surface, covering the bottom of a profound valley, enlivened by lofty and precipitous eminences, added to the impression of a certain reverential awe under which every Christian pilgrim approaches it, give it a character of dignity unparalleled by any similar scenery." (p. 462.) "On the plain of Esdraelon, in the most fertile part of all the land of Canaan, (which, though a solitude, we found like one vast meadow, covered with the richest pasture,) the tribe of Issachar rejoiced in their tents." The road was mountainous, rocky, and full of loose stones; yet the cultivation was everywhere marvellous; it afforded one of the most striking pictures of human industry which it is possible to behold. The limestone rocks and stony valleys of Judea were entirely covered with plantations of figs, vines, and olive trees; but a single spot seemed to be neglected. The hills, from their bases to their utmost summits, were entirely covered with gardens; all of these were free from weeds, and in the highest state of agricultural perfection. Even the sides of the most barren mountains had been rendered fertile, by being divided into terraces, like steps rising one above another, whereon soil had been accumulated with astonishing labor. Among the standing crops, we noticed millet, cotton, linsseed, and tobacco, and occasionally, small fields of barley. A slight of this territory can alone convey any adequate idea of its surprising produce; it is truly the Eden of the East, rejoicing in the abundance of its wealth. Under a wise and a beneficent government, the produce of the Holy Land would exceed all calculation. Its perennial harvest; the salubrity of its air; its limpid springs; its rivers, lakes, and matchless plains; its hills and vales—all these, added to the serenity of the climate, prove this land to be indeed 'a field which the Lord hath blessed: God hath given it of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine.' The reader will recollect that this account refers to the territory passed through in the route from Acre to Tiberias and Jerusalem. A less flattering picture is drawn of the direct road to Jerusalem. The country is divided into countries bordering on the desert to the south. It must, however, be confessed, that these parts maintained numerous flocks and herds, anciently, and that places are not wanting where the same might be maintained, at this day, if the circumstances admit the necessary safety and protection.

Dr. Shaw gives the following account of the tribes of Issachar, Benjamin, Judah, and Dan: "Leaving mount Carmel to the N. W. we pass over the S. W. corner of the plain of Esdraelon, the lot formerly of the tribe of Issachar, and the most fertile portion of the land of Canaan. The most extensive part of it lieth to the eastward, where our prospect is bounded, at about fifteen miles' distance, by the mountains of Herman and Tabor, and by the steep upland in the city of Nazareth is situated. Advancing further into the half-tribe of Manasseh, we have still a fine arable country, though not so level as the former; where the landscape is changed every hour by the intervention of some piece of rising ground, a grove of trees, or the ruins of some ancient village. The country begins to be rugged and uneven at Samaria, the north boundary of the tribe of Ephraim; from whence, through Sichem, all the way to Jerusalem, we have nothing but mountains, as we hear they have in other countries. Of all the mountains, the mountains of Ephraim are the largest, being most of them shaded with large forest trees; whilst the valleys below are long and spacious, not inferior in fertility to the best part of the tribe of Issachar. The mountains of the tribe of Benjamin, which lie still further to the southward, are generally more naked, having their ranges much shorter, and consequently their valleys more frequent. In the same disposition is the district of the tribe of Juda; though the mountains of Quaranatians, those of Engaddi, and others that border on the plains of Jericho and the Dead sea, are as high, and of as great extent, as those in the tribe of Ephraim. Some of the valleys, likewise, which belong to this tribe, such as that of Rephaims, Ezchol, and others, merit an equal regard with that parcel of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph, Gen. xlviii. 22. But the neighborhood of Ramah and Lydda is nearly of the same arable and fertile nature with that of the half-tribe of Manasseh, and equally inclineth to be plain and level. The latter of these circumstances agreeeth also with the tribe of Dan, whose country, notwithstanding, is not so fruitful, having in most parts a less depth of soil; and bordereth upon the sea-coast in a singular manner.

Of the tribe of Benjamin, Maudrell says, "All along this day’s travel from Kan-Leban to Beer, and also as far as we could see round, the country discovered a quite different face from what it had before; presenting nothing to the view, in most places, but naked rocks, mountains, and precipices. At sight of which, pilgrims are apt to be much astonished and balked in their expectations; finding that country in such an inhospitable condition, concerning whose pleasantness and plenty they had before formed in their minds such high ideas, from the description given of it in the Word of God; so much that it almost startles their faith, when they reflect, How could it be possible for a land like this to supply food for so prodigious a number of inhabitants as are said to have been polled in the twelve tribes at one time? the sum given in by Joshua, 2 Sam. xxiv. amounting to no less than thirteen hundred thousand fighting men, besides women and children. But it is certain that any man, who is not a little lukewarm in his principles, will be passing along, arguments enough to support his faith against such scruples. For it is obvious for any one to observe, that these rocks and hills must have been anciently covered with earth, and cultivated, and now to contribute to the maintenance of the inhabitants no less than if the country had been all plain, nay, perhaps, much more; forasmuch as such a mountainous and uneven surface affords a larger space of ground for cultivation than this country would amount to, if it were all reduced to a perfect level. For the husbanding of these mountains, their manner was to gather up the stones, and place them in several lines, along the sides of the hills, in form of a wall. By such borders, they supported the mould from tumbling, or being washed down; and formed many beds of excellent soil, rising gradually one above another from the bottom to the top of the mountains. Of this form of culture you see evident footstpes wherever you go in all the mountains of Palestine. Thus the very rocks are made fruitful. And perhaps there is no spot of ground in this whole land that was not formerly improved, to the production of something or other ministering to the sustenance of human life. For, than the plain parts of this country nothing is known, but the production of corn or cattle, and consequently of milk. The hills, though improper for all cattle, except goats, yet being disposed into such beds as are afore described, served very well to bear corn, melons, gourds, cucumbers, and such like garden stuff, which makes the principal food of these countries for several months in the year. The most rocky parts of all, which could not well be adjusted in that manner for the production of corn, might yet serve for the plantation of vines and olive-trees; which delight to extract the one its fatness, the other its juicy sprightly juice, chiefly out of such dry and flinty places. And the great plain joining to the Dead sea, which, by reason of its saltness, might be thought unserviceable, both for cattle, corn, olives, and vines, had yet its proper usefulness, for the nourishment of bees, and for the fabric of honey; of which Josephus gives us his testimony. (De Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. 4.) And I have reason to believe it, because when I was there, I perceived in many places a smell of honey and wax, as strong as if one had been in an apiary. Why, then, might not this country very well maintain the vast number of its inhabitants, being in every part so productive of either milk, corn, wine, oil, or honey? which are the principal food of the principal nations; the constitution of their bodies, and the nature of their climate, inclining them to a more abstemious diet than we use in England, and other colder regions."

The following description from Volney, includes the tribes of Simeon and Juda: "Palestine, in its present state, comprehends the whole country included between the Mediterranean to the west, the chain of mountains to the east, and two lines, one drawn to the south, by Kan Youme, and the other to the north, between Kaisaria and the rivulet of Yassa. This whole tract is almost entirely a level plain, without either river or rivulet in summer, but watered by several torrents in winter. Notwithstanding this dryness, the soil is good, and may even be termed fertile; for when the winter rains do not fail, every thing springs up in abundance; and the earth, which is black and fat, retains moisture sufficient for the growth of grain and vegetables during the summer. More durra, sesanum, water-melons, and beans, are sown here than in any other part of the country. They also raise cotton, barley, and wheat; but, though the latter be most esteemed, it is less cultivated, for fear of too much inviting the avarice of the Turkish governors, and the rapacity of the Arabs. This country is indeed more frequently plundered than any other in Syria; for, being very proper for cavalry, and adjacent to the desert, it lies open to the Arabs, who are far from satisfied with the mountains; they have long disputed it with every power established in it, and have succeeded so far as to obtain the concession of certain places, on paying a tribute, from whence they infest the roads, so as to render it unsafe to travel from Gaza to Acre."

From these testimonies the reader may collect the general character of this country, and of those parcels of it which fell to the lot of the different tribes respectively. But there is one character of it which has never been properly estimated; that is, its strength in a military point of view, any one that has stood in ancient days. If we examine it as originally described, and promised to the sons of Israel, we find it bounded, and at the same time effectually defended, on the east by the whole length of the river Jordan, and the Dead sea; on the north by the mountain of Lebanon, and its branches, which, of course, afford strong grounds on which to resist an invading enemy; on the west by the Great sea, where its ports were not favorable to an assailant, being but of moderate capacity, and ill calculated to accommodate a fleet; and on the south by the wearisome desert, with hills, at which the Israelites themselves had been repulsed. We conclude, then, that the first departure from the plan of settling this peculiar people was a fatal error, since it deprived the intended country of so great a proportion of population as two tribes and a half; whereas, that density of population which these tribes must have produced, would have been the security of the whole, and would have rendered it impregnable. We may also infer, that had these two tribes and a half settled in Canaan, they would have enabled the Israelites to have driven out the inhabitants of those towns which eventually maintained their situations; so that the entire country would have been completely Israelite, and the consequent uniformity of opinion and of interest would have contributed greatly to the permanency of this compact and confirmed commonwealth. The country was also so situated, that it possessed the power of choosing what intercourse it thought proper with surrounding nations. For instance, caravans for traffic might rendezvous at Damascus, and pass into Arabia, or into Egypt, without entering, or but little, the Israelite dominions; and so from Egypt, to Damascus, to the Euphrates, and even to Bozra; while the intercourse between Egypt, Greece, and the whole of Europe, by sea, was maintained without any interference with the ports of Palestine. We conclude, then, that Balaam was perfectly correct when he said, "This people shall dwell alone—secluded, having little communication with other nations. That the Hebrews were not likely to perform voyages of long continuance, may be inferred from the established peculiarities of their food; and this may contribute to account for the employment of Tyrians by Solomon, in his expeditions to Ophir. In short, every thing leads us to consider this nation as intended for an agricultural, animating, and pleasant people; the most important facts, in respect, and almost insulated, like themselves; but these intended advantages were rendered ineffectual by the departure of a considerable portion of the nation from the original plan of their settlement, by which is meant the desert that lay between the Dead sea and the Mediterranean. In this neighborhood, a number of very large caverns, the construction of which must have cost infinite labor, since they are formed in the hard rock. There is only one door of entrance, which is so regularly fitted into the rock, that it is impossible for a whole house. It appears, then, that this country was formerly inhabited by Troglodytes, without reckoning the villages whose inhabitants may be regarded as such. There are still to be found many families living in caverns, sufficiently spacious to contain them and all their cattle. These immense caverns are moreover to be found, in considerable numbers, in the district of Al-Edur, some leagues to the southward of Mekess, where also we met with several families of the Troglodytes. . . . Besides my guide, I had taken with me an armed peasant, and after a troublesome walk we arrived at night at a vast natural cavern, inhabited by a Mohammedan family. After going through a wide and pretty long passage, we perceived at the other end a part of the family assembled round a fire, and employed in preparing supper, which consisted principally of a kind of boulli, mixed with wild herbs, and gruel made of wheat. I was wet through by the rain and had walled all-day beneficed. This fire, therefore, irresistible to warn me, although the persons and cattle in the great number of the villages and small towns and churches. I should probably have passed a bad night, if the old father of the family had not kindly thought of accommodating us, after supper, to another room at a smaller distance. After having passed a door of ordinaries to find there a string of goats in belonging to this Troglodyte, and at the end a large empty space, where they had lighted for us the immense trunk of a tree, whose cheerful blaze invited us to sleep around it. The fire was kept all night, and the chief of this hospitable family brought us also a good mess of rice. The first appearance of these fierce inhabitants of the rocks had given me some uneasiness, but I afterwards found that they were not more barbarous than other peasants of these districts. The old father of the family appeared, on the contrary, to be a sensible and humane man.

... Several artificial grottoes have been worked in the rocks around Karak, where wheat is preserved for ten years.

The ancient caves mentioned in Scripture, in which a number of armed men were hidden, with castle, &c., need no longer excite surprise. We learnt also that the wonderful caves of the dead, the last houses appointed for all living, were close residences of the ancient inhabitants: one of them, the chambrer, of death, is correct, as a literal description of these dreary mansions. Many transactions might pass in caves, in that country, which would appear common and ordinary there, though we think them wonderfully strange. Compare the residence of Lot in one of these caves, in this very neighborhood, Gen. xix. 30.

After Beetson, the next traveller who has visited these districts is Burckhardt, who extended his course much farther south than Beetson, and, indeed, traced very nearly the whole of the route taken by Mose and the Israelites, anciently, when traversing these countries, in their advance to Canaan. We shall give his relation in his own words, in a letter (dated Cairo, September 19, 1819) addressed to the secretary of the African institution: "My first station from Damascus was Saffid, (Jaeph), a short distance from Djoser Beni Yakoub, a bridge over the Jordan to the south of the lake Samachonitis. From there, they ascended the shore of the lake of Tabyra, (Tiberias), visited Tabarya, and its neighboring districts, ascended Mount Tabor, and tarried a few days at Narazeth. I met here a couple of petty merchants from Szalt, a castle in the mountains of Balka, which I had not been able to see during my late tour, and which lies on the road I had pointed out to myself for passing into the Egyptian deserts. I joined their caravan; after eight hours' march, we descended into the valley of the Jordan, called El Ghur, near Byzan; (Scythopolis) crossed the river, and continued along its verdant banks for about ten hours, until we reached the river Zerta, (Jabbok,) near the place where it empties itself into the Jordan. Turning then to our left, we ascended the eastern chain, formerly part of the district of Balka, and arrived at Szalt, two long days' journey from Nazareth. The inhabitants of Szalt are entirely independent of the Turkish government; they cultivate the ground for a considerable distance round their habitations, and part of them live the whole year in tents, to watch their harvest and to pasture their cattle. Many ruined places and mountains in the district of Balka provide the names of the Old Testament, and elucidate the topography of the provinces that fell to the share of the other four and a half tribes of Israel. They represent the only inhabited place in the Balka, but numerous Arab tribes pasture there their camels and sheep. I visited thence the ruins of Aman, or Philadelphia, five hours and a half distant from Szalt. They are situated in a valley on both sides of a rivulet, which empties itself into the Zerta. A large amphitheatre is the most remarkable of these ruins, which are much decayed, and in every respect inferior to those of Djemneh. At four or five hours south-east of Aman, are the ruins of Om Errass and El Kotif, which I could not see, but which, according to report, are more considerable than those of Philadelphia. The want of communication between Szalt and the southern countries delayed my departure for upwards of a week; I found at last a guide, and we reached Kerek in two days and a half, after having passed the deep beds of the torrents El Wale and El Modjeb, which I suppose to be the Nahaliel and Arnon. The Modjeb divides the district of Balka from that of Kerek, as it formerly divided the Mababites from the Amorites. The ruins of Elelele, Hesebon, Medias, Dibon, Arver, [for these names see Numb. ch. xxxi. xxxiii.] all situated on the north side of the Arnon, still subsist, to illustrate the history of the Beni Israel. To the south of the wild torrent Modjeb, I found the town of Rabbat Moab, and, three hours distant from them, the town of Kerek, situated about twelve hours' distance to the east of the southern extremity of the Dead sea. Kerek is an important position, and its chief is a leading character in the affairs of the desert of southern Syria; he commands about 3000 matchlocks, which are the terror of the neighboring Arab tribes. About 300 families of Greek Cedinians of whom one third have entirely embraced the Christian religion, and the chief, the son of a priest, distinguished only from their Arab brethren by the sign of the cross. The treasurer of the Shikh of Kerek, to whom I had been particularly recommended by a grandee of Damascus, obliged me to stay at Kerek about twenty days. After having annoyed me in different ways, he permitted me to accompany him southward, as he had himself business in the mountains of Djebel, a district which is divided from that of Kerek by the deep gorge of the torrent El Annas, or El Khab, eighteen hours' distance from Kerek. We remained for ten days in the villages to the north and south of El Annas, which are inhabited by Arabs, who have become cultivators, and who sell the produce of their fields to the Bedouins. The Shikh, having finished his business, left me at Bezezere, a village about sixteen hours south of Kerek, to shift for myself; after having insistently recommended me to the care of a Bedouin, with whose character he must have been acquainted, and who nearly stripped me of the remainder of my money. I encountered here many difficulties, was obliged to walk from one encampment to another, until I found at last a Bedouin, who engaged to carry me to Egypt. In his company I continued southward, in the mountains of Shara, which are divided from the north of Djebel by the broad valley called Ghosey, at about five hours' distance from Bezezere. The chief place in Djebel is Tafyle, and in Shara the castle of Shobak. This chain of mountains is a continuation of the eastern Syrian chain, which begins with the Anti-Libanus, and the Djebel el Shikh, forms the valley of Ghur, and borders the Dead sea. The valley of Tafyle is continued to the south of the Dead Sea: at about sixteen hours’ distance from the extremity of the Dead Sea, its name is changed into that of Arabs, and it runs in almost a straight line, declining somewhat to the west, as far as Akaba, at the extremity of the eastern branch of the Red Sea. The existence of this valley appears to have been unknown to ancient as well as modern geographers, although it is a very remarkable feature in the geography of Syria, and Arabia Petraea, and is still more interesting for its productions. In this valley the manna is still found; it drops from the sprigs of several trees, but principally from the Gharrab; it is collected by the Arabs, who make cakes of it, and who eat it with butter; they call it Assal Beyrouk, or the honey of Beyrouk. Indigo, gum arabic, the silk tree called Asheyry, whose fruit encloses a white silky substance, of which the Arabs twist their matches, grow in this valley. It is inhabited near the Dead Sea in summer time by a few Bedouin peasants only, but during the winter months it becomes the meeting place of a number of Arab tribes. It is probable that the trade between Jerusalem and the Red Sea was carried on through this valley. The caravan, loaded at Eziongeber with the treasures of Ophir, might, after a march of six or seven days, deposit its loads in theareth in the southeast of Solomon. This valley deserves to be thoroughly known; its examination will lead to many interesting discoveries, and would be one of the most important objects of a Palestine traveller. At the distance of a two long days’ journey north-east from Akaba, is a rivulet and valley in the Jebel Shera, on the east side of the Arabs, called Wady Mousa. This place is very interesting for its antiquities and the remains of an ancient city, which I conjecture to be Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea, a place which, as far as I know, no European traveller has ever visited. In the red sand-stone of which the valley is composed are upwards of two hundred and fifty sepulchres, entirely cut out of the rock, the greater part of them with Grecian ornaments. There is a mausoleum in the shape of a temple, of colossal dimensions, likewise cut out of the rock, with all its apartments, its vestibule, peristyle, &c. It is a most beautiful specimen of Grecian architecture, and in perfect preservation. There are other mausoleums with obelisks, apparently in the Egyptian style, and also tombs cut out of the rock, with the remains of a palace and of several temples. Upon the summit of the mountain which closes the narrow valley on its western side, is the tomb of Haroun, (Aaron, brother of Moses.) It is here that Moses, it is said, was preserved from being consumed by fire if I were to select right, there is a passage in Eusebius, in which he says that the tomb of Aaron was situated near Petra. The information of Pliny and Strabo on the site of Petra, agree with the position of Wady Mousa. (See Sela.) I regretted most sensibly that I was not in circumstances that admitted of my observing these antiquities in all their details, but it was necessary for my safety not to inspire the Arabs with suspicions that might probably have impeded the progress of my journey, for I was an unprotected stranger, known to be a townsman, and thus an object of constant curiosity to the Bedouins, who watched all my steps in order to know why I had preferred that road to Egypt, to the shorter one along the Mediterranean coast. It was the intention of my guide to conduct me to Akaba, from where we might hope to meet with some caravan for Egypt. On our way to Akaba, we were, however, informed that a few Arabs were preparing to cross the desert direct to Cairo, and I preferred that route, because I had reason to apprehend some disagreeable adventures at Akaba, where the pacha of Egypt keeps a garri- son to watch the Wahabi. His officers I knew to be extremely jealous of Arabian as well as Syrian strangers, and I had nothing with me by which I might have proved the nature of my business in these remote districts, nor even my Frank origin. We therefore joined the caravan of Arabs Allowein, who were carrying a few camels to the Cairo market. We crossed the valley of Arabs, ascended, on the other side of it, the barren mountains of Beyane, and entered the desert called El Ty, which is the most barren and horrid tract of country I had ever seen; black flints cover the chalky or sandy ground, which in most places is without any vegetation. This trend which produces the gum arabic grows in some spots; and the tamarisk is met with here and there: but the scarcity of water forbids much extent of vegetation, and the hungry camels are obliged to go in the evening for whole hours out of the road in order to find some waders shrubs upon which to feed. During ten days’ forced marches, we passed only four springs or wells, of which one only, at about eight hours east of Suez, was of sweet water. The others were brackish and sulphurous. We passed at a short distance to the north of Suez, and arrived at Cairo by the pilgrim road.

The account transmitted by Burckhardt has been subsequently verified by Mr. Legh, a gentleman well known by his travels in Egypt. His narrative forms an interesting portion of Mr. Macmichael’s Journey to Constantinople, in 1818. The perplexities of the learned in their endeavors to ascertain the site of Petra, a city once so famous and so powerful, are now removed; and we have discovered demonstrations of a seat of government, a considerable population, and a respectable state of the arts, in the midst of a vast accumulation of rocks, and (apparently) an unproductive desert. The existence of a rivulet, or stream of water, at this place, cannot escape the reader’s notice; and he has been partly prepared for residences, and even extensive dwellings, among rocks, cut out of them, or annexed to them, by the description Seetzen has given of the modern Trog-loydics by whom he was received. The importance of these discoveries, cut out of the rock, as already known, justifies the inference of a state of things, of national power, and of intercourse, in ancient times, (and, probably, in the most remote antiquity with which we are acquainted,) entirely different from existence if I were to select right, there is a passage in Eusebius, in which he says that the tomb of Aaron was situated near Petra. The information of Pliny and Strabo on the site of Petra, agree with the position of Wady Mousa. (See Sela.) It was the intention of my guide to conduct me to Akaba, from where we might hope to meet with some caravan for Egypt. On our way to Akaba, we were, however, informed that a few governor of Wadi Mousa. The latter proved afterwards our most formidable enemy, and we were indebted to the courage and forbearing spirit of the former for the accomplishment of our journey, and the sight of the wonders of Petra. When we related to the two sheikhs, who had just entered the camp, our eager desire to be permitted to proceed, Abou-Zeitum swore, 'by the beard of the Prophet, and by the Creator, that the Caffree, or infidels, should not come into his country.' Mahomet Ebn-Raschid so warmly supported them, and "Now, there arose a great dispute between the two sheikhs, in the tent, which assumed a serious aspect: the sheikh of Wadi Mousa, at length starting up, vowed that if we should dare to pass through his lands, we should be shot like so many dogs. Our friend Mahomet mounted, and desired us to follow his example, which, when he saw we had done, he grasped his spear and fiercely exclaimed, 'I have set them on their horses; let me see who dare stop Ebn-Raschid.' We rode along a valley, the people of Wadi Mousa, with their sheik at their head, continuing on the high ground to the left in a parallel direction, watching our movements. In half an hour we halted at a spring, and were joined by about twenty horsemen provided with lances, and thirty men on foot, with matchlock guns, and a few double-mounted dromedarics, whose riders were well armed. On the arrival of this reinforcement, the chief, Ebn-Raschid, took an oath in the presence of his Arabs, swearing, 'by the honor of their women, and by the beard of the prophet, that we, pointing to our party, 'should drink of the waters of Wadi Mousa, and go wherever we pleased in their accursed country.' Soon after they left the ravine, the rugged peak of mount Hor was seen towering over the dark mountains on their right, with Petra under it, and Dyebeltour, or mount Sinai, distant three days' journey, like a cone in the horizon. They reached Ebn-Raschid's camp of about seven tents, (usually 25 feet long and 14 feet wide,) in three circles, and next morning attempted, but in vain, to obtain the consent of the hostile sheik to pass through his territory. They did not, however, come to blows, and at length they passed the much contested stream on which stood the mud village of Wadi Mousa; Ebn-Raschid, with an air of triumph, insisted on watering the horses at that rivulet. "While we were halted for that purpose, we examined a sepulchre excavated on the right of the road. It was of considerable dimensions: and at the entrance of the open court that led to the inner chamber were represented two animals resembling lions or sphinxes, but much disfigured, of colossal size. As this was the first object of curiosity that presented itself, we began to measure its dimensions; but our guides grew impatient, and said, that if we intended to be so accurate in our survey of all the extraordinary places we should see, we should not finish in ten thousand years."

They therefore remounted, and rode on through niches sculptured in the rocks, frequent representations of rude stones, mysterious symbols of an indefinable figure detached in relief, water courses or earthen pipes, arches, aqueducts, and all the signs of a wonderful period in the ancient annals of this memorable scene. "We continued (says the narrative) to explore the gloomy winding passage for the distance of about two miles, gradually descending, when the beautiful facade of a temple came into view. The statue of Victory with wings, filled the centre of an aperture like an attic window; and groups of colossal figures, representing a centaur and a young man, were placed on each side of a portico of lofty proportion, comprising the massive columns of the former, and the two single columns of the latter. The temple was entirely excavated from the solid rock, and preserved from the ravages of time and the weather by the massive projections of the natural cliffs above, in a state of exquisite and inconceivable perfection. But the interior chambers were comparatively small, and appeared unworthy of so magnificent a portico. On the summit of the front was placed a vase, hewn also out of the solid rock, conceived by the Arabs to be filled with the most valuable treasure, and showing, in the numerous spot-marks on its exterior, so many proofs of their antiquity; for it is so situated as to be inaccessible to other attacks. This was the basin, or treasure of Pharaoh, as it is called by the natives, which Ebn-Raschid swore we should behold." A colossal vase belonging, probably, to another temple, was found in front of this temple of Victory. About three hundred yards farther on was an amphitheatre. "Thirty-three steps (gradini) were to be counted, but, unfortunately, the prosenium, not having been excavated like the other parts, but built, was in ruins." The remains of a palace, and immense numbers of bricks, tiles, and other singular buildings, were seen in the open space, while "the rocks which enclosed it on all sides, with the exception of the north-east, were hollowed out into innumerable chambers of different dimensions, whose entrances were variously, richly, and often fantastically, decorated with every imaginable order of architecture." Petra was, in the time of Augustus, the residence of a king who governed the Nabathaei, or inhabitants of Arabia Petraea, who were conquered by Trajan, and annexed to Palestine. More recently, it was possessed by Baldwin I, King of Jerusalem, and called by him Mops Ragalis.

Should any European traveller be so fortunate as to be allowed to accompany the caravan from Gaza to meet the Meccan pilgrims; or to examine the district of Beersheba, and of Paran, south of the Dead sea, our account of the Holy Land would be more complete than it is at present; and we might possess the means of clearing up many points connected with the residence of Israel in the wilderness, and other Scripture luxuriances, which continue involved in obscurity, from want of such information. [The castle of Akaba, the site of the ancient Elath, was afterwards visited by M. Rippel. For his account of this region see the article ELATH.] In addition to what has been already said, we may remark, that as storms, in Palestine, come from the Mediterranean sea, the prophet Elijah was perfectly correct in choosing mount Carmel, on the edge of that sea, for the scene of his contest with the priests of Baal before Ahab, 1 Kings xvii. Also, in his going up the mount, and sending Gehazi to look toward the sea for that rain which he had predicted, (ver. 41,) but of which there was then no appearance. It would seem possible, too, that this rain was accompanied by thunder; for Elijah prophesied at the sound of abundance of rain:—this, however, is not determinate. Volney says that rain is to be expected "in the evening:" it was toward evening when Elijah foretold rain to Ahab; and it was quite evening when the rain fell. The same writer says, "Thunder is extremely rare in summer in the plain of Palestine:" yet Samuel, by his prayers, obtained it from the Lord in the time of wheat harvest, 1 Sam. xii. 18.

Perhaps something of the nature of thunder is allowed to the Israelites in 1 Sam. vii. 9. "When thou hearest the voice of proceeding—advancing—in the heads of the Israelites."

What are these Israelites? Certainly not mulberry-trees; but probably a kind of balsam-tree or shrub. The word signifies to ooze, to distil in small quantities, to weep. "The valleys of rills, or rivulets, or moisture."

It rains on the mountains in Syria when it does not rain on the plains. Thus, when Elisha foretold a supply of water to the army of Jehoshaphat, perishing by thirst, (2 Kings ii. 1.) though they saw neither wind nor rain, yet both might have occurred at a distance, "by the way of Edom," which rain, running from the mountains, was providentially directed to fill the drains and ditches made by the Israelites.
Now, as no signs of rain had been observed by the Moabites, they concluded, when the sunbeams were reflected by the water, that it was blood; and their hasty conclusion ruined them. The suddenness of rains among the mountains, with their effects, is what perhaps we, at least in some parts of England, can hardly conceive of. We have seen that they fall evening and morning: Mr. Maundrell also tells us, (p.
8.) "At Sbofaia we were obliged to pass a river—a river we might call it now, it being swollen so high by the late rains that it was impassable; though at other times it might be but a small brook, and in summer perfectly dry. These mountain-rivers are ordinarily very considerable; but they are apt to swell upon sudden rains, to the destruction of many a passenger, who will be so hardy as to venture unadvis-edly over them."

This may also exhibit, perhaps, the true import of the history of the destruction of Sisera's army: (Judg.
iv.)—Barak, by divine assistance, having routed that army, the fugitives endeavored to escape, by passing the torrent Kishon, which they supposed to be forda-bale; but, in the night, a heavy rain had swelled it to a great overflow, so that many were drowned in attempts to pass it. Sisera, perceiving this, would not attempt the passage in his chariot, but fled on foot in another direction, which brought him to Jael.
Thus, it being by night, "the stars in their courses"
might be said to "fight against Sisera." Moreover, if the rain fell on the tops of the mountains adjacent, or drained into the smaller of the mountain lakes, this would deceive Sisera's flying army to attempt passing the supposed brook; and to this rapidity of the Kishon
the poetess adverted, "The river Kishon swept them away"—as such "mountain-brooks are apt to swell on sudden rains, to the destruction of many passengers."

There is no reference here to judicial astrology. But

Mr. Harmer must wished for such an account of the various times, seasons, and events of the year, in Palestine or Syria, as might form a calendar, to regulate our notions of the employments and duties of the inhabitants; of their expectations concerning what seasons they thought likely to occur; and of those numerous occupations which depend on the vicissitudes of summer and winter, of seedtime and harvest. The same wishes animated the directors of the Royal Society of Gottingen, and being persuaded of the advantages to be derived in the study of Scripture from such a work, they proposed it as a prize question; to be selected from travellers of acknowledged authority. The successful competitor was J. G. Buhle; and his work, entitled "Calen-darium Palestine (Ennomicus," communicates much valuable information. Of this Mr. Taylor has made a translation, and inserted it among the Fragments to the larger edition of this work; but as it contains much that is useless to the general reader, and occupies considerable space, we have made the following abridgment. In the larger work the names of the several productions are given in detail, and all the authorities upon which the statements are founded, inserted at full length, with a specification of the particular editions of the works to which reference is made.

JANUARY.

Weather.—This may be called the second winter month. On the elevated parts of Palestine, the cold is intense during the early part of the month. There is generally a considerable fall of snow, which is dissolved in a few hours. In the plain of Jericho the cold is scarcely felt. The western winds, which generally blow during winter, bring heavy rains, es-specially during the night: these swell the rivers, lakes, and pools, which are dried up during the summer. In the morning the mercury is generally between 40° and 45°, and does not rise above 3° or 4° in the afternoon. On rainy or cloudy days, it sol-dom exceeds 1° or 2° of rise, and frequently remains the same during the whole day. Towards the latter end of the month, when the sky is clear, it is so hot that travellers with difficulty prosecute their journey.
The winds blow gently, and chiefly from the north or east.

Productions.—All kinds of corn are sown this month. Beans blossom, and the trees are again in leaf. The almond-tree blossoms earliest, and even before it is in leaf. If the winter be mild, the winter fig, which is generally gathered the beginning of spring, is still found on the trees, though stripped of their branches. Mistletoe, and the cotton-tree, are also in flower. Among the garden herbs and flowers of this month are cress, myrtle, violet, gold-striped daffodil, tulip, wormwood, lentisc-tree, butterclab, and saffron. Colchicum, a genus of lilies.

FEBRUARY.

Weather.—The weather is the same as last month, except that, towards the latter end, at least in the more southern parts, the snows and winter cold are observed to cease. Chieflly remarkable for rains;
these, however, do not continue many days together:
but the weather varies about the 4th or 6th. Sometimes it changes to cold, with snow. The sky is fre-cently covered with clear light; the climate becomes warmer; the wind continuing north or east, but, letter, changing westward. The first 14 days, the mercury usually stands between 45° and 47°. In the afternoon it does not rise above 1° or 2°, but afterwards, except the weather should become cold, it rises gradually to 50°.

Productions.—The latter crops now appear above ground; barley is sown until the middle of the month. Beans acquire a husk, and may be gathered all the spring. Cauliflowers and water-parcels are gathered. The peach and apple-trees blossom, and a great variety of herbs capturing the sight by their delightful appearance in the fields.

MARCH.

Weather.—This month is the forerunner of spring;
but rains, with thunder and hail, are not yet over. The weather is generally warm and temperate; sometimes extremely hot, especially in the plain of Jericho. The western winds often blow with great force, and the sky is cloudy and obscured. In the middle of the month, the mercury stands at 32°; towards the end, between 36° and 38°. In the beginning of the month, it does not rise in the afternoon above 5°; towards the end, 8° or 9°; in rainy weather, there is scarcely any variation during the whole day. Towards the end of the month, the rivers are much swollen by the rain, and by the thawing of the snow on the tops of the mountains. Earthquakes are sometimes felt at this time.

Productions.—Rice, Indian wheat, and corn of Damascus are sown in Lower Egypt. Beans, chick-peas, lentils, kidney-beans, and gourmandises are gathered. Every tree is in full leaf. The fig, palm, apple, and pear-trees blossom; the former, frequently, while the winter fig is on the tree. The Jericho plum-tree presents its fruit. The vine, which has a triple produce, having yielded its first clusters, is pruned of the barren wood. Thyme, sage, rosemary, artichoke, fennel, &c. flourish.

April.

Weather.—The latter rains now fall; but cease about the end of the month. The sun's heat is excessive in the plain of Jericho, the small streams in which are dried up. In other parts of Palestine, the spring is now delightful. Heavy dew sometimes fall in the night. The mercury rises gradually, as the month advances, from 60° to 65°; in the afternoon, it does not rise, when the sky is clear, above 80° or 85°. The sky is always without clouds, except those small bright ones that rise in the afternoon. Never is the sky observed to be cloudy or obscured, except when there is rain, which is accompanied with thunder much seldom than in the last month. A heat-frost is seen, for several days together, the beginning of the month; especially when the winds blow from the north or east. The air grows very hot, but the mornings and evenings are cooler. The snows on the summits of Libanus, and other mountains, begin to thaw.

Productions.—The harvest depends upon the duration of the rainy season. After the rains cease, the corn soon arrives at maturity. Wheat, zea or spelt, and barley ripen. The spring fig is still bard. The almond and the orange-trees produce fruit. The turpentine-tree and the carambula blossom. A new shoot, bearing fruit, springs from the branch of the vine that was left in the preceding month, which must also be lopped. Sugar-cane is planted at Cyprus.

Grass being very high, the Arabs lead out their horses to pasture.

May.

Weather.—The summer season commences: the excessive heat of the sun renders the earth barren. Rain has been observed even in the first part of this month. Egmont found the air of the town of Safet most pure and salubrious, while the heat was insupportable in the parts adjacent. The sky is generally serene and fair, except that small, bright clouds sometimes rise. The winds blow generally from the west. At the beginning of the month, the mercury reaches 70°; then it rises gradually from 70° to 80°. In the afternoon, it does not rise above 90° or 95°. The air becomes hotter in proportion as the western winds abate, especially if they are calm for several days together: but even then the violence of the heat is not so great as when the wind blows from the north or east. When the heat is very great, there is frequently observed a dry mist, which obscures the sun. The snows on Libanus thaw rapidly, but the cold is still sharp on its summits.

Productions.—Libanus continues. Wheat, barley, rice and rye are cut down. The early apples are gathered. Hasselquist and Pococke state that cotton is sown this month; but Marius and Korte affirm, that the cotton-tree bears the winter in Syria, and now puts forth a yellow blossom. Mandrakes yield ripe fruit. Sage, rue, garden purslain, the yellow cucumber and the white now flourish. They continue, after harvest, to sow various garden herbs; many of the vegetables come to maturity in the same year, in spring and in autumn. The grass and herbs reach their greatest height at this time.

June.

Weather.—During this month the sky is generally clear, and the weather extremely hot. As the month advances, the mercury gradually rises in the morning, from 70° to 80°; in the afternoon, it stands between 80° and 90°. The winds, generally blowing from the west, refresh the air in the afternoon; and, by blowing sometimes during the night, they assuage the heats, which are now excessive. The inhabitants pass their nights in summer upon the roofs of their houses, which are not rendered damp by any dew. The snow, however, is still frozen on Libanus, in some parts of which it is so cold, as to compel travellers to put on their winter garments.

Productions.—Rice, early figs and apples, plums, cherries and mulberries ripen. The cedar gum dis-tils spontaneously, and the bacciferous cedar yields berries. The palm-tree produces opobalsamum, or balm of Gilead, during this and the two following months. The melon is gathered, and rosemary flourishes.

The Arabs, as the summer advances, lead their flocks to the hills and mountains situated more to the north.

July.

Weather.—Heat more intense. There is no rain. Libanus is free from snow, except where the sun cannot penetrate. The snows on the tops of the mountains thawing gradually during the summer, Libanus yields a perpetual supply of water to the brooks and fountains in the countries below. The mercury usually stands in the beginning of the month at 80°; towards the end, 85° or 86°. It does not rise in the afternoon above 90° or 95°. The wind is generally blow from the west; but, when they fail, the heat is excessive.

Productions.—Dates, apples, pears, nectarines, peaches, grapes, and the gourd called citril ripen. Cauliflower and water-parsnip are sown. There is no longer a sufficient supply of pasturage for the cattle.

August.

Weather.—The sky is serene and fair, and the heat extreme. The weather is entirely the same during the first twenty days, as in the preceding months: afterwards white clouds, commonly called milaces, larger than those which are generally observed in summer, rise, for the most part, till the end of the month. Mr. Burckhardt, who was at Shohok, a village a few miles north of mount Sei, in Arabah Parees, on the 20th of this month, states, that in the afternoon there was a shower of rain, with so violent a gust of wind, that all the tents were thrown down at the same moment. The mercury, until those days when the clouds rise, continues the same as in the last month; afterwards, it falls 4° or 5°. Dew falls, but not in any great quantities. Snow has been seen on the summits of Liberamus during this month, but it was wet and slippery.

Fruits, olives, and pomegranates are ripe. The winter fig, or the third produce, which does not ripen before winter, appears this month. The shrub al-hames, or al-huma (see Canaries), brought out from Egypt, puts forth leaves, and its fragrant blossoms. The first clusters of the vines, which blossomed in March, come to maturity, and are ready for gathering.

SEPTEMBER.

Weather.—During this month the days are very hot, and the nights extremely cold. The rainy season commences towards the end of the month. The mercury remains the same in the beginning of this month as it was at the latter end of the preceding one; except that it rises higher in the afternoon. In rainy weather it falls 3° or 4°; till it gets down to 62°; but the variation of one day does not exceed 3° or 4°; and when it rains, 1° or 5°. Lightnings are very frequent in the night-time; and if seen in the western hemisphere, they portend rain, often accompanied with thunder. The winds blow chiefly from the west.

Productions.—Towards the end of the month ploughing begins. Ripe dates, pomegranates, pears, plums, citrons, and oranges are now obtained. The sesbania, also, yields fruit, and the charnabi ripe pods. Cotton is now gathered; and also the second clusters of grapes, which blossomed in April.

OCTOBER.

Weather.—The rainy season now commences; the extreme heat is abated, (although still great in the day-time,) the air being much refreshed by cold in the breeze which accompanies the rains; which now fall, called the early or former rains, are sometimes accompanied with thunder. The winds are seldom very strong, but variable. The mercury in the morning stands, for the most part, before the rainy clouds, at 62° or 58°; and when it does not rise, in the afternoon, above 5° or 6°. After the rains, it descends gradually to 60°. The variation of one day, seldom, on rainy days never, exceeds 3° or 4°.

Productions.—About the middle of this month wheat and barley are sown, as also during the following months. White-blossoming chick-pea, lentils, purple flowering garden spurge, small smooth-podded vetches, sesunnum, green-rinded melons, anigiria, (gourds,) cucumbers, fennel, garden fenugreek, and bastard sorrel are likewise sown. The pistachich, a tree peculiar to Palestine, Syria, and Egypt, yields its fruit. The charnubi still presents its pods; and the olive and pomegranate trees produce ripe fruit. The Jericho rose blossoms; the third clusters of grapes, which in May had produced another small branch loaded with the latter grapes, are gathered; as are also cotton, lettuce, endives, cressess, wild chervil, spinach, beet, garden artichoke, and wild artichoke.

CANAANITES, the descendants of Canaan. Their first habitation was in the land of Canaan, where they multiplied extremely, and by trade and war acquired great riches, and settled colonies over almost all the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean. When the measure of their idolatries and abominations was completed, God delivered their country into the hands of the Israelites, who conquered it under Joshua. He destroyed great numbers of them, and obliged the rest to fly; some in Africa, others into Greece. Procopius says, they first retreated into Egypt; but gradually advanced into Africa, where they built many cities, and spread themselves over those vast regions, which reach to the Straits, preserving their old language, with little alteration. He adds, that in the ancient city of Tintis, (Tangiers,) founded by them, were two great pillars of white stone, near a large fountain, inscribed in Phænician characters, "We are people preserved by flight from

NOVEMBER.

Weather.—The rains, if not already fallen, certainly fall this month. The heat, although not so great in the day-time, is still violent; but little nights are very cold. The rivers and lakes, at this period, for the most part, dried up. The winds are chiefly from the north; but seldom blow with force. The mercury, as the month advances, gradually falls from 60° to 50°. The variation of one day is not more than from 2° to 5°.

Productions.—This is the time for the general sowing of corn. The trees retain their leaves till the middle of the month. Dates are gathered. The nappelia, or cocomelia, yields its delicious fruit; in shape, resembling the crab-apples, and containing a nut as large as olives. At Aleppo, the vintage lasts to the 15th of the month.

DEC.EMBER.

Weather.—This is the first winter month: the cold is piercing, and sometimes fatal to those not inured to the climate; but rain is more common than snow, which, when it falls, seldom remains all the day on the ground, even in the midst of winter. The winds blow from the east or the north, but are seldom violent. When the east winds blow, the weather is dry, though they sometimes bring mist and hoar-frost, and are accompanied with storms. When the sun shines, and there is a calm, the atmosphere is hot. The mercury usually stands at 60°; it frequently gets up 6° or 5° in the afternoon, if there be no rain.

Productions.—Pulse and corn are sown. Sugar-canes ripen, and are cut down at Cyprus. The grass and herbs springing up after the rains, the Arabs drive their flocks from the mountains into the plains.

For a description of each of these natural productions the reader is referred to their respective articles.

With regard to the various birds, animals, reptiles, &c. indigenous to the land of Canaan, or such as are mentioned in the sacred writings, there is necessarily some difficulty, in consequence of our not possessing a description of them under their original names.

Some of the present species of animals, but others remain in a state of great uncertainty. For a description of them the reader is referred to the respective articles, and for an account of the biblical arrangement, to the outlines of natural history, at the end of the volume.
that robber Jesus, [Joshua,] the son of Nave, who pursued us." In Athanassius"s time, the Africans continued to say, they were descended from the Canaanites; and when asked their origin, they answered, Canaan. It is generally agreed, that the Punic tongue was nearly the same as the Canaanitic and the Hebrew; and this seems to be confirmed by several ancient inscriptions found at Malta, which are in Phoenician characters, but may be read by means of the Hebrew. The colonies which Cadmus carried to Thbes, in Beotia, and his brother Cilex to Clicis, were from the stock of Canaan. Sicily, Sardinia, Malta, Cyprus, Corfu, Majorca and Minorca, Gades, and Ebusus are thought to have been peopled by Canaanites. Bochart, in his Canaan, has set this matter in a clear light.

This name was given to the Canaanites, not only by the Hebrews, but they themselves adopted it; as appears from inscriptions on Phoenician coins, in Phoenician letters, first read by Dr. Swinton, of Oxford, on one of which (in Gen. Mag. Dec. 1769) we have, "Ludicena, mater in Canaan" where we also remark, that this city claims the dignity of a metropolis, or mother, like certain others which we read. The genealogical chart, which imagined that the Canaanites were abominated of the name of their ancestor, by reason of his unfilial conduct, Gen. ix. 22, 25. We read in the life of Abraham, (Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 7) that the Canaanites were then in the land. It appears, also, that Esau himself married two Canaanitish women, (Gen. xxxvi. 2) which implies that the parents and relations of these women were Canaanites, as Nahah and Zibcon, (ver. 24, 25.) though of Hittite or Hivite families.

The Canaanites, who partly expected the original inhabitants of Palestine, and partly incorporated themselves with them, were descended from Canaan, according to the genealogical table in Gen. x. 6, 15, seq. Hence they must, like the Hebrews, though earlier, have advanced from the eastern parts of Asia towards the western; and that they really were kindred to the Semitic tribes, and had been with them, is shown by their common language, the Hebrew and the Phoenician languages being only dialects of one great stock. Canaan had seven sons, viz. Sidon, Heth, Jebus, Amor, Gimbrish, Hivi, Arki, Sinu, Arvad, Zamor, and Hamath; and these all became the heads of as many tribes, which, according to Gen. x. 19, occupied the whole country from Sidon to Gaza. Five of these tribes settled in Syria, and Phoenicia, viz. Zidonians, Sidonians, Hermathenes, Hamathites, and Zimmites. The other six, viz. the Hittites, or children of Heth, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergashites, Hizes, and Zemarites, fixed themselves in Canaan proper, and were divided up into many small districts or domains, of which thirty-one are enumerated in Josh. xii. 9-24. But in the various passages of the Old Testament where these tribes are spoken of, there is no uniformity in regard to the number of them. Sometimes they are all included under the general name of Canaanites, (Ex. xxii. 11; Deut. xi. 30.) sometimes ten are named, the Canaanites and Perizzites, (Gen. xxii. 7.) of which names the first is a general patronymic, and the other signifies inhabitants of plains; sometimes three, the Hittites, Canaanites and Perizzites, (Ex. xxii. 28.) then again ten; (Ex. xi. 8; 2 Chron. vii. 7.) isir, (Ex. lii. 17.) seven, Deut. vii. 1: Acts xiii. 19. Finally, in Gen. xv. 19, seq. ten tribes are named, the Kenites, Keni- zites, Kadmonites, Hittites, Perizzites, Rephaim, Amorites, Canaanites, Gergashites, and Jebusites—among which, however, several, as the Rephaim, Kenites, and Kenizites, belong to the original inhabitants of the land, who still dwelt among the Canaanites, when Abraham migrated into that country. It is probable that this difference in the number specified is entirely casual, without any definite design.

1. The Hivites dwelt in the north of the country, at the foot of mount Hermon, or Anti-lebanon, according to Josh. xi. 3, where it is related that they, along with the united forces of northern Canaan, were defeated by Joshua. They were not, however, entirely driven out of their possessions; for according to Judg. iii. 3, they still dwelt upon the mountains of Lebanon, from Banai-Hermon to Hazareth. In David's time they still existed, 2 Sam. xxiv. 7; 1 Kings ix. 20. Of the tribes or race of the Hivites were also the Shechemites and Gibeonites, xxxiv. 2; Josh. xix. 19.

2. The Canaanites, in a stricter sense, in so far as they constituted one of the various tribes which were included under this general name, inhabited partly the plains on the west side of the Jordan, and partly the plains on the coast of the Mediterranean sea. Hence they are divided into the Canaanites by the sea and by the coast of Jordan, (Num. xiii. 20,) and into those of the east and west of the land, Josh. xi. 3.

3. The Canaanites dwelt between the Cuthites and the Jebusites; as may be inferred from the order in which they are mentioned in Josh. xxiv. 11.

4. The Jebusites had possession of the hill country around Jerusalem, itself, of which the ancient name was Jebus, Josh. xv. 6; 8: 33; xvii. 11. The Benjamites, to whom this region was allotted, did not drive out the Jebusites, Judg. i. 21. David first captured the citadel of Jebus, 2 Sam. v. 6, seq. Still the Jebusites dwelt among them, as appears from the transaction of David with Aramah, a Jebusite chief, 2 Sam. xxiv. 23, seq.

5. The Amorites inhabited, in Abraham's time, the region of Hazzazon-tamar, afterwards En-gedi, on the south of Edom, Edom, the western side of the Dead sea, Gen. vii. 14. At a later period, they spread themselves out over the mountainous country which forms the southern part of Canaan, between the Dead sea and the Mediterranean; and which was called from them the "mountain of the Amorites," and afterwards the "mountain of Judah," Deut. i. 19, 20; Num. xxxii. 29; Josh. xi. 3. They extended themselves also towards the north; for Jacob speaks (Gen. xliv. 22) of the "piece of ground wherein he took the Amalekites, and Simeons, and Zebulun," and afterwards the "mountain of Judah," Deut. i. 19, 20; Num. xxxii. 29; Josh. xi. 3. They extended themselves also towards the north; for Jacob speaks (Gen. xliv. 22) of the "piece of ground wherein he took the Amalekites, and Simeons, and Zebulun," and afterwards the "mountain of Judah," Deut. i. 19, 20; Num. xxxii. 29; Josh. xi. 3. They extended themselves also towards the north; for Jacob speaks (Gen. xliv. 22) of the "piece of ground wherein he took the Amalekites, and Simeons, and Zebulun," and afterwards the "mountain of Judah," Deut. i. 19, 20; Num. xxxii. 29; Josh. xi. 3. They extended themselves also towards the north; for Jacob speaks (Gen. xliv. 22) of the "piece of ground wherein he took the Amalekites, and Simeons, and Zebulun," and afterwards the "mountain of Judah," Deut. i. 19, 20; Num. xxxii. 29; Josh. xi. 3. They extended themselves also towards the north; for Jacob speaks (Gen. xliv. 22) of the "piece of ground wherein he took the Amalekites, and Simeons, and Zebulun," and afterwards the "mountain of Judah," Deut. i. 19, 20; Num. xxxii. 29; Josh. xi. 3.
bok, on the south. But under Suhon they crossed the Jabok, and took from the Amorites and Moabites all the country between the Jabok and the Arnon; so that they had this stream, now called the southern boundary of the Amorites, Num. xxi. 13, 14, 36; xxii. 33, 39; Deut. iv. 46, 47; xxxvi. 4. This last tract the Israelites took possession of after their victory over Sihon, and defended themselves in it by the right of conquest against the claims of the Ammonites, Judg. xi. 8, seq.

6. The Hittites, or children of Heth, according to the report of the spies, (Num. xiii. 29,) dwelt among the Amorites, on the mountainous district of the south, afterwards called the “mountain of Judah.” In the time of Abraham they possessed Hebron; and the patriarch purchased from them the cave of Machpelah as a sepulchre, Gen. xxiii.; xxxv. 9, 10. We may also infer that they dwelt at or near Beerseba; for it was while Isaac was residing there, that Esau married two wives of the Hittites, Gen. xxvi. 23, 34. After the Israelites entered Canaan, the Hittites seem to have moved farther northward. The country around Bethel (Luz) was called the land of the Hittites, Judg. i. 26. But even at a far later period they continued to maintain themselves in the land; for Uriah the Hittite was one of David’s officers, (2 Sam. xi. 3,) and Solomon was the first to render them tributary, 1 Kings xvi. 29. He also had Hittite females in his harem, 1 Kings xi. 1. Under his reign, too, there is mention of seven Kings of the Hittites, 1 Kings xvi. 29; 2 Kings vii. 6. So late also as the return of the Jews from the Babylonish exile, the Hittites are mentioned as one of the heathen tribes from which the children of Israel unlawfully took wives, Ezra ix. 1.

7. The Perizzites were found in various parts of Canaan. The name signifies inhabitants of the plains. According to Gen. xiii. 7, they dwell with the Canaanites, between Bethel and Ai; and according to Gen. xxxiv. 30, in the vicinity of Shechem. It would seem also from Josh. xvi. 15, that they were spread out towards the north into the territories of Ephraim and Manasseh; since Joshua recommends to these tribes, to burn down the forests in the district of the Perizzites and Reubenites, and establish themselves there. There dwelt Perizzites in the southern part of Judah also; as appears from Judg. i. 4, seq.

The Canaanites, like their neighbors the Phœnicians, with whom, indeed, they constituted one race or people, appear very early to have attained to a not unimportant degree of cultivation. Moses informs the Hebrews, (Deut. vi. 10, 11,) that they will find “great and goodly cities, and houses full of all good things, wells, vineyards, and olive-trees.” Like the Syrians and Phœnicians, the Canaanites also constituted no single and independent state; like the former, these, too, were divided up into many small districts and communities, under kings or chiefs. The form of government seems, in the earliest times, to have been aristocratic, under a chief with very limited powers. This is plain from Gen. xxxiv. where Hamor, the chief of the Hivites, could not contract alliances with Jacob and his family, before he had laid the matter before the elders and the people, and obtained their consent. So also in the case of Abraham and Ephron, Gen. xxi. As being peculiar in his relations, appears Melchisedek, king of Salem, and the same time the priest of the Most High, to whom Abraham gave a tenth of the spoil, Gen. xiv. 18, seq. That there were frequent wars among this multitude of smaller kings and states, (of which thirty-one are enumerated, Josh. xii. 9, seq.) is not only probable in itself, but also evident from Judg. i. 7, where Adami-bezek is said to have cleft the yoke of the Amorites and great terror to be施展 upon him by his hand, and then caused them to gather the crumbs under his table. Several of the Canaanitish kings appear to have had a sort of superior dominion over others around them; as Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, (Josh. x. 1-4,) and also Jabin, king of Hazor, Josh. i. 1.-5. See on this whole subject, Rosenmüller’s Bibl. Geograph. vol. ii. part 1. p. 251, seq. *B.

CANDACE, an Ethiopian queen, whose enmity, having been at Jerusalem to worship, was met, and, being converted, was baptized by Philip the Deacon, near Bethsaïra, as he was returning to his own country, Acts viii. 36. (See PHILIP.) It is thought that Candace, or Cheridaqui, was the general name of the queens of Ethiopia, in the age of Christ. (Flavius gi. 59. Ludolf. Comment. ad Hist. Ethiop. 89. Lightfoot. Hor. Heb. 85.)

CANDLESICK or GOLD, made by Moses for the service of the temple, (Exod. xxv. 31, 32,) consisted wholly of pure gold, and had seven branches: that is, three branches on each side of the centre. These branches were of equal distances, and each one was adorned with flowers, like lilies, gold knobs after the form of an apple, and smaller ones resembling an almond. Upon the extremities of the branches were seven golden rings, which were fixed with pure olive oil, and lighted every evening by the priests on duty, and extinguished every morning. The candlestick was placed in the holy place, and served to illuminate the altar of incense and the table of shew-bread, which stood in the same chamber. The golden candlestick has been, sometimes, erroneously represented as seven golden candlesticks, placed individually in the sanctuary; and the passage in Rev. i. 15, 16, has been thought to connnence this idea of separate candlesticks; but the candlestick of Ezekiel is of an entirely different nature, and has no reference to the golden candlestick of the temple; like the description in Zechariah mentioned below.

The word kavdetha constantly answers in the LXX to the golden candlestick of the tabernacle and temple, i. e. of the golden candlestick.

The following is from rabbis Kimchi and Levi Gerson. The concluding thought of Kimchi is certainly ingenious: These lamps were called the candle of the Lord, or the Lamp of the Lord, 1 Sam. iii. 3, where it is said, “before the candle of the Lord went out, the Lord called to Samuel,” upon which words, David Kimchi gives this gloss: “If he be spoken concerning the lamps in the candlestick, this was somewhat before day; for the lamps burnt from even till morning, yet did they sometimes some of them go out in the night. They put oil into them by such a measure as should keep them burning from even till morning, and many times they did burn till morning; and they always found the western lamp burning. Now it is said, that this prophecy came to Samuel, ‘before the lamp went out,’ while it was yet night, about the time of cock-crow; and for it is said, afterward, that Samuel lay till morning; or, allegorically, it speaks of the candle of prophecy; as they say the sun ariseth, and the sun sets; before the holy blessed God cause the sun of one righteous man to set, he causeth the sun of another righteous man to rise. Before Moses’ sun set, Joshua’s sun arose; before Elia’s sun set, Samuel’s sun arose; and this which is said, before the candle of the Lord went out.”
CANDLESTICK

In Zechariah, chap. iv. there is an account of the splendid and significant emblem presented in vision to the prophet, which will abundantly reward an attentive examination. The principal object that met the eyes of Zechariah, was a candelabrum, a candlestick or lamp-bearer, entirely of gold, pure, solid, costly, precious, consisting of a tall, upright shaft, surmounted by a bowl, and of a number of branches, each of which supported a lamp, springing out of it, as boughs from the trunk of a tree, but only on two sides. The image is evidently taken from the candlesticks in the tabernacle and temple, but differed widely from them. The difference is very closely examined by Dr. Stuward, in his commentary on the prophet: and very remarkable it is. In the first place, there was a bowl or basin on the top of the shaft, intended to contain oil for the nourishment of the lights of the lamps; and its seven lamps upon it, seven and seven. From the bowl proceeded pipes conveying oil to the lamps; and beside the candlestick stood two olive-trees, one on each side of it, whose branches shed their produce into spots or gutters, from which the bowl was supplied. This is thus explained by Dr. Stuward, that in Zechariah, the seventh lamp has followed the oil at great length, with a minuteness, and often a felicity of expression, that show the taste and admiration with which he contemplates the magnificent picture. Light, in general, is the emblem of excellence, discerned, acknowledged, and admired by the world. A material lamp is an instrument formed to yield an artificial light, which, being sustained by oil, is really nothing but oil kindled into a flame. When a lamp is taken for the emblem of spiritual and intellectual excellence, truth must be its oil, the peabulum of its light, which, in reality, is nothing else than truth displayed showing itself to the world. Accordingly, the oil, which is food of the symbolical lamp set before us in the part of the vision, is truth; divine, moral, religious, or saving truth. When the truth is received by any man, he has then the mystic oil in himself; and when that oil is kindled into a flame, not only is he internally enlightened, but he conducts himself accordingly, and becomes truly good and holy. It is the property of light to diffuse itself upon all objects within its reach. He that hath in himself that spiritual light, who acts and lives according to the truth, makes it shine before men; he gives light to the world.

A material candlestick is an instrument constructed to bear a lamp, or many lamps, for the purpose of giving light. A symbolical or spiritual candlestick, with many branches and lamps, represents a body, or assemblage of persons enlightened and shining, as before mentioned, collected into a regular society, for the purpose of dissipating the spiritual dulness of a world lying in sin, and enveloped in ignorance. Such a society is the church, which alone containing in itself the principles of saving truth, of holiness, of solid comfort, and everlasting happiness, is the instrument contrived and appointed by God, to hold forth the light, which may guide the steps of men into the way of peace. Every true member of it is luminous, at once enlightened and enlightening; so speaking and so living, as to show forth to others the light that is in himself. And not only is the symbol of a candlestick well adapted to represent the church of God, but the church is actually represented by it, as we have seen, in other parts of Scripture. Since, then, a candlestick, in general, is the symbol of a church, a candlestick with seven branches and lamps must be the symbol of the universal church, (see Seven,) spread abroad through all its numerous congregations, having and giving light; at the same time that, being fixed upon branches proceeding from the same shaft, they plainly imply that all these congregations are united in one body of the universal church.

The church of Israel was represented by this figure of a candlestick, in the tabernacle and temple; and since the Gentile church was, on every account, entitled to be represented by a like symbol as the Jewish, the two great divisions of the church would be properly represented by two candlesticks of seven branches each. But since these churches have been made one, what symbol could be so apt and so consistent with Scripture doctrines and imagery, as that of a candlestick bearing fourteen lamps on as many branches, issuing in two separtenaries from its opposite sides? Such, exactly, was the candlestick exhibited to Zechariah.

The candlestick must have had some base or foot, which would represent the foundation on which the church stands. This is no other than Jesus Christ, and the base, therefore, must have been the stone upon which the candlestick stood and the foregoing vision of the prophet. The shaft of a candlestick springs up immediately from the base, and is, in reality, nothing more than the elongation or elevation of it. In the one, Christ is represented as the foundation of the church; in the other, he appears as the principle of spiritual vitality to all its congregations and members.

The branches of the candlestick growing out of the shaft intimate the closest union and absolute dependence of all of them upon him; in exact correspondence with that other figure, under which our Lord is pleased to represent himself, as the trunk of the spiritual vine, and his disciples as the branches.

On the right and left sides of the candlestick were two olive-trees, which attracted the particular attention of the prophet; and he inquired, "What are those two olive-trees?" and again, "What are the two branches of the olive-trees, which, through two oil gutters, drain off the oil from them?" The answer of the interpreting angel seems to imply an almost culpable ignorance in the prophet. "Knowest thou not what these be? These are the sons of oil, which stand before the Lord of the whole earth." An olive-tree is used as an emblem of the Jewish church. (See Olive.) But the church of Jewish and Gentile believers is already set before us in the significant emblem of the golden candlestick. We must, therefore, find for the two olive-trees a different interpretation, which shall join the subjects represented by them in the most intimate relation to the church. Dr. Blayney presumes them to be "no other than the two dispensations of the law and the gospel, under which were communicated the precious oracles of divine truth, which illuminate the soul, and make men wise to salvation." The dispensations of God in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, are the sole fountains of the spiritual oil, the only sources whence divine or moral, religious or saving truth is derived to men in perfect purity. The olive-trees give out the oil by two peculiar and conspicuous branches, and of course are intended to represent some eminent and especial instruments for the propagation of the true religion. These are the ministers of the law and the gospel, considered as two peculiar branches of the vine in analogy to the candlestick, the grand division of the universal church into its two primitive and principal branches, the Jewish and the Gentile. The two branches shed forth the juice of the trees to the support of the lights on the candlesticks; so do the ministers of religion convey to their congregations the sacred truths in the dispensations of the law and the gospel. "These," said the angel, "are the two sons of oil, which stand before the Lord of the whole earth." These two sons of oil possess abundantly, and are capable of supplying adequately to the wants of the church, those divine and moral truths which enlighten men's minds with the knowledge, and touch their hearts with the love, of God, and of the things which are conducive to salvation. They are said to stand before the Lord of the whole earth—the whole territory of Christendom—as ministers of his presence, strengthened by his might; as stewards of his mysteries, to act the part of the wise householder, who bringeth forth out of his treasures things new and old. The flow of juice from these symbolical trees is not limited to any particular seasons, but is perennial and perpetual. This is quite suitable to the nature of the subjects represented by them, which continually send forth their sacred streams of truth without intermission or failure, in all places at all seasons and periods, through the hands and instruments appointed to convey the same. Again, the two branches send out the oil through two oil gutters or spouts. These must represent the channels, as it were, through which the ministers of the divine dispensations convey the blessings of religious, saving truth; those institutions which afford to the ministry the most convenient and edifying means of making known the truth.

The bowl, which is the reservoir of all the oil poured forth from the two olive-trees, must necessarily signify something which is the recipient of the whole body of truth, made known by the two dispensations. Now, such a recipient is nowhere to be found, but in the body of the church universal. The bowl, indeed, cannot typify the church, as it is known to the world in the outward and visible persons and actions of its members; but as it is discernible in contemplation only to the eye of the understanding. It represents the church at unity, having all its parts nourished by the same food as the body is by the same circulating blood, animated by the same living spirit, according to the image repeatedly employed by Paul to represent the unity of the church. The pipes, which are the media between the lamps and the bowl, answer secondarily to the doctrines and cups of the former, as the oil gutters do to the latter. They consequently represent the same things with respect to the several congregations, as the others do with respect to the whole body of the catholic church; that is, the ministry of the two dispensations conveying the doctrines of truth and salvation to their respective flocks.

But it may be asked, since the lamps are supposed to be slight, and they could not light themselves, who is it that kindled their flames? The work, being not represented by any symbol, is plainly intended to be conceived, as Dr. Stobart remarks, as that of an invisible hand of one who operates by natural secret influence. This answers precisely to the effect of the Holy Spirit upon Christians. In vain will the truth be heard with their ears and received by their understandings by the two dispensations, if the Holy Ghost, by his influences, did not give effect to the word, and to the labor of those who publish it. All that is well pleasing in the sight of God and truly useful to man, all proceed from the operation of the Holy Spirit, bringing the principle of truth into action, kindling the sacred oil into a bright and steady flame.

CANE, or CALAMUS, SWEET, an aromatic reed, mentioned among the drugs of which the sacred perfumes were compounded, Exod. xxx. 23. Acorus calamus of Linnaeus. It is a knotty root, of a reddish color, and containing a soft, white pith. The true odoriferous cane comes from India; and the prophets speak of it as a foreign commodity, of great value, Isa. xiii. 24. Theophrastus and Pliny mention a sweet cane, which grows in Syria, beyond Libanus, in a lake; probably the lake Semenich; but this being too near Judea, to enhance its value as a foreign commodity, it has been more reasonably supposed that it came from Saba, where it grew, as is reported by Strabo and Diodorus Siculus. Pliny also speaks of it as being a native of Arabia; and it is enumerated among the fragrant productions of that country by Diosynus. Harlequin says it is common in the deserts of the two Arabyas. It is gathered near Jamb, a port town of Arabia Petraea, from whence it is brought into Egypt. The Venetians purchase it, and use it in the composition of their turpentine. This plant was also proverbially proverbial through the hands of the Sibyl and the queen of Sheba presented to Solomon; it is still very much esteemed by the Arabs, on account of its fragrance. They call it helmi meccari, and elher meccari.

This, in all probability, is the sweet cane of Jeremiah, (vi. 20.) where it is called prime, or excellent, and is associated with incense from Sheba; the same in Exod. xxx. 23, where our translation renders "sweet calamus"; see also Isaiah xiii. 24, where the best is supposed to come from India, which agrees with the "far country" of the prophet.

CANKER-WORM. Our translators have rendered the Hebrew ₱rouch, "cankerworm," in Joel i. 4; ii. 25; Nahum iii. 15, and "caterpillar," in Ps. cv. 34; Jer. ii. 27. Being frequently mentioned with the locust, it is thought by some to be the locusts of that insect. In Nahum it is said to have wings, and to fly; to encamp in the hedges by day, and commit its depredations in the night. The LXX interpret it, the bruchus, or hedge-canker.

In the language of the superstitions, (vol. xix.) Dr. Moyleneaux has described a prodigious flight of insects, which appeared on the south-west coast of the county of Galway, in the year 1688, and from his account of their depredations they appear greatly to have resembled the Hebrew ḳrouch. It belonged to the tribe called by naturalists carephorus, or sigirus, a species of beetle, which has strong thick cases to defend and cover its tender and thin wings, which lie out of sight and next to the body. It is thought to be the same species of beetle which is called by Aristotle melonbolbe, from its devouring the blossoms of apple-trees; and is the scaraebus arboreus of Monst and Charleton, called by us dores or hedge-caneers. We give the close of Dr. Moyleneaux's interesting paper:—

"This vicious insect, I am fully convinced, from good reasons, is that selfsame (so often mentioned in Holy Scripture, and commonly joined in company with the locust, as being both great destroyers of the fruits of the earth) to which the Septuagint and the Vulgar Latin translation, retaining the Greek word, give the name of bruchus, or bruchus, derived from brucho, frecno, vel stridges, intimating the remarkable noise it makes both in its eating and flying; from whence, likewise, it has got its French name, hanneuron, by corruption from ailuron, quen, ais tonans, brows admit twenty-two books into their canon, or, at most, twenty-four, supposing Ruth to be separated from the Judges, and the Lamentations from Jeremiah. They believe, generally, that the canon of Scripture was not closed, nor the number of inspired books fixed, till Ezra, with the consent of the general council of the nation, collected all those which were acknowledged as sacred and inspired, composed one body of them, and regulated what we call the sacred canon of Scripture; since which time, Josephus states, that the Jews have not admitted any book as canonical. Dr. Prideaux, however, with great appearance of reason, says it is more likely that the two books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, as well as Malachi, were afterwards added, in the time of Simon the Just, and that it was not till then that the Jewish canon of the Holy Scriptures was fully completed. See Connect. part i. book 5.—

For the number and arrangement of the books of the Hebrew canon, see the article Bible.

Genebraud and Serranus are of opinion, that, after Ezra, the Jews of the great synagogue admitted into their canon books which were composed after this time, such as Wisdom, Ecclesiastes, Tobit, Judith, and Maccabees; nevertheless, they did not obtain authority equal to that of the old ones. But this is not without difficulty; for, first, the books of Tobit and Judith might be written before the captivity; and, secondly, if the Jews, when they came to perfect their canon, did not receive them into the canon as of equal authority with the rest?

It may be, perhaps, suspected that the Jews, who retained the Hebrew tongue, might exclude these books from the canon, because they were not written [extant] in Hebrew, the sacred language: but they received Daniel and Ezra, wherein are large passages written in Chaldee: now Ecclesiastes, Tobit, Judith, and at least the first book of Maccabees, were originally written in this language; yet they do not appear to have been received into the canon.

If particular churches have sometimes deliberated whether they should admit certain writings among the sacred books; if some doctors and councils have not included them in their canon, and others have rejected them; such conduct is proof of the great circumspection which was used in receiving into its canon only what really was deemed to be authentic and inspired. This very hesitation should convince us, that if at last these books were received, that determination was founded on good reasons. Time was necessary to examine, to be well assured, and to fix the dopts of particular churches.

CANTHAR, (Simon,) succeeded Theophilus, son of Jonathan, in the high-priesthood; and enjoyed this dignity about two years, at two several times. After the death of Agrippa, Iherod, king of Chalices, deprived him of his office, to confer it on Joseph, son of Cunathus (Jos. Ant. xix. 5. xx. 1.)

CANTICLES, or SONGS, were frequently composed by the Hebrews on important occasions. Moses composed one of rejoicing after the passage of the Red sea, in honor of that miracle; Exod. xv. David composed a mournful song on the death of Saul and Jonathan; (2 Sam. i. 17.) and another on the death of Abner, iii. 33. Jeremiah wrote his Lamentations, a song, or series of elegies, in which he deplores the ruin of Jerusalem; he wrote also others on the death of Josiah, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15. Eleazor and Barak made a triumphant song after the defeat of Sisera, (Judg. v.) and Judith after the defeat of Holohernes, Judith xvi. Hannah, the mother of Simeon, and Samuel 1005 songs or verses; but we have only remaining his Song of Songs.

CANTICLES, the Book of, (the Song of Songs,) is thought by many to have been composed by Solomon, and it is believed on occasion of his marriage with the king of Egypt's daughter. According to most commentators, it is a continued allegory,
in which a divine and spiritual marriage between the Redeemer and his church is expressed.

Seven nights and seven days are distinctly marked in the transactions of each day. The Hebrews, approbending it might be understood grossly, forbade the reading of it by any person before the age of thirty.

According to the legend, that the bridegroom received this book as a canonical. To the objection, that neither Christ nor his apostles have cited it, and that the name of God is not found in it, it is answ-ered, that there are several other sacred books which our Saviour引用ed, as Luke xvi. 25; Acts xiv. 15, in which the Son of God is concealed under the figure of a husband, it is not necessary that he should be expressed by his proper name; it would then, in fact cease to be an allegory.

There is, perhaps, no book in the whole Bible which gives rise to such a variety of interpretation
as the Canticles. All these different modes, however, may be arranged under three classes:—(1)
One class of interpreters regard the book as founded on the relation of Jehovah to the Jewish people;
and they find in every figure a reference to some particutlar event in Jewish history. According to these, the whole book is an allegorical, figurative history of the divine husband and the bride of the nation of Israel.
This mode of interpretation we find among the Jews
as early as there are any traces of the book itself.
Indeed, Jesus the son of Sirach seems to have followed it, 200 years before Christ, when he praises Solomon in Ecclesiasticus, chapter 11, 17, as the principal subject of the Canticles. This mode assumes two forms; in both, Christ is assumed as the Lover or Bridegroom; but the Beloved, or the Bride, is one in the whole Christian church, and in the other, each individual Christian. Many have sought to combine these two modifications.—(2) A third class of interpreters suppose the book to contain throughout a description of earthly love. This view has sprung up and gained admittance chiefly since the middle of the eighteenth century; and it has been pointed out that as very general currency, and was supported in a great variety of modifications. One sought to defend the honor of the book, by maintaining it to be a description of a happy wedded life, or a defence of monogamy; another supposed it to be a picture of admission into the canon, although it might only describe a chaste, unwedded love. One invented this history,—another that,—in order by this means to be able to explain the poem; and where all this fell short, they had recourse to dreams. One declared the whole to be a collection of unconnected poetical fragments; another supposed them to be written by different hands, and the book running through the whole. The reproach, therefore, of arbitrary interpretation, which the followers of the literal and physical interpretation have so often brought against those of the other classes, because of their want of unity, falls, with equal weight, upon themselves; for there are no two of them who accord with one another in their views. Both of the two first classes of interpreters harmonize with each other in this respect, that they regard the Canticles as the description of a spiritual relation by means of figures drawn from sensible objects.

In order to show the possibility of such a spiritual interpretation of the book in question, we may remark, that it is neither unworthy of God, nor at all at variance with the usual manner of the Holy Scriptures, to express a spiritual relation through such sensible figures. God himself, when he addresses mankind through his prophets and through his Son, employs such figures and expressions as are drawn from human life, and that which is to the eye.
Thus, in numerous passages of the Old Testament,
the relation of Jehovah to the Jewish people is exhibited in figurative language, borrowed from the relation of a lover to his beloved, i.e. of a bridegroom to his bride, of a husband to his wife, etc. In the departure from Egypt, Israel was a bride; when the nation at Sinai entered into a solemn covenant with Jehovah, it was married to him; every subsequent falling away to idolatry is represented as adultery
and fornication; and every return to God, as the taking back of one divorced. See Isa. lvi. 5; lix. 5;
Jer. iii. 1: Ezek. xvi. xxiii: John iii. 29: Rom. vii.
Eph. v.: 1 Cor. xii.

In respect to the propriety of such an interpretation of this book as shall give a spiritual character of this kind to the representations contained in it, there are several considerations which go to show that such an allegorical interpretation is here the only correct one. The first reason is drawn from external circumstances. In the Old Testament, the object of those writings, are uniformly of one accord in giving to the Canticles an allegorical interpretation. In doing this, they everywhere appeal to tradition; of which the principal witness is the Chaldee translator. We cannot here pursue the testimony any further; but there cannot be no question, that those who made the collection of the writings of the Old Testament, followed, in respect to this book, the allegorical method of interpretation. Even a hasty glance at these writings shows that it could not have been the object of those who collected them, to include all the remains of the Hebrew national literature. They had constantly in view the Hebrew theocracy, and admitted into their collection only that which had reference to the relation in which God was worthy of the love of his people, —that which, either as history, prediction, the outgushings of devotion, or as doctrinal instruction, was adapted to quicken the theocratic feeling and promote a godly life. In receiving, therefore, the book of Canticles into the canon, they must have had the firm conviction, that its strains described not a common but the heart of Jehovah towards his people. What the moderns have here to say in commendation of human affection, and that a poem which treats of this was worthy of admission among the sacred writings, is nothing to the purpose; for the only question here is, On what principles was the book actually received into the canon? And this question is purely historical, and must be answered from the evidence afforded by the character of the writings of the Old Testament. But if it be once shown, that those who formed this collection of these writings, understood the book of Canticles allegorically, it would surely be a most violent assumption to affirm, that in their time the true interpretation of the book was already lost; especially since the time of its composition could not have been far remote from that age; and since the fact of their thus adopting it, shows that the allegorical interpretation must in their day have been the common one.

To this external argument we may add another and a stronger one, derived from passages of the poem itself, which compel us to believe that, under the images of nuptial love, the highest spiritual love is described. We do not here press the consideration, that the supporters of the physical mode of interpretation are obliged to supply, arbitrarily, a multitude of historical circumstances, in order to give to their explanations even an appearance of probability; since it might be replied, that this obscurity arises only from our ignorance of the situation in which the nuptial figures were placed. We refer only to some passages, which, literally taken, are either destitute of sense, or must be subjected to violence in order to obtain one; while, in the allegorical method, they present a sense at once easy and elegant. From c. i. 4, it appears that the name of the beloved must be a collective name. The passages in c. i. 5, iii. 4, viii. 2, and v. 3—7, are entirely at variance with oriental usages and customs, when taken in the literal sense; figuratively taken, they are beautiful and appropriate. So also the following passages, if literally taken, are without meaning; c. vi. 4, 10—12. iv. 8. et al. sep.

To these grounds in favor of the allegorical interpretation, we may also subjoin, as a subsidiary one, the names of the two principal persons. The Bridegroom is the Lord, almighty; the Bride, Jehovah, the peace; (Is. ix. 6) the Bride, Sulamith, (fem.) the peaceful, or the happy, vii. 1. A coincidence like this can hardly be accidental.

We may therefore assume the allegorical interpretation of the book of Canticles as the correct one, and as supported by sufficient arguments. The objection, and the only one, commonly urged against it, viz. the great want of coincidence among those who have followed this method, must be laid, not to the account of the book itself, but of its interpreters. It has arisen from the fact, that, mistaken the figurative character of the Old Testament, and having themselves no poetic feelings, they have, without any fixed principles, attempted to explain every single figure, and have found in every one an allusion to some real circumstance, either of history or of the internal spiritual life. This method stands in direct opposition to the whole character of the Canticles; in which there is so much of ornament and mere costume. One must not expect to find something corresponding to each single figure in this book; but he must first unite all the single figures into one general image, and then the corresponding reality will be easily found. Thus, e. g. in the descriptions of the beauty and gracefulness of the Bride, we should search for nothing but the love and complacency of Jehovah towards the people of Israel. The comparison of other oriental poets, who, in like manner, describe a higher love under the images of a lower, especially among the Persians and Arabians, is full of instruction on this point. So soon as this principle becomes established, we shall avoid that arbitrariness with which all the earlier and later interpreters may, in some degree, be charged; and also that variety of explanation, which has so often been adduced as an argument against the allegorical method of interpretation.

If, now, the spiritual interpretation of this book is the correct one, this poem must, of course, maintain its place in the canon of the Old Testament; from which, of late, many attempts have been made to exclude it. But, on the other hand, many, in former times, have gone too far in their estimation of the Song of Songs, when they have placed it above all the other books of the Old Testament. Had it really this pre-eminence of value, how must also answer it Christ nor the apostles have ever cited it? Although the writer of this book acted under the same divine influence as the other inspired penmen, yet, so far as the Christian world is concerned, we cannot but regard the prophetic writings as of more direct importance. Indeed, we cannot avoid the impression, that, for our modern and occidental modes of thinking, and for our manners and customs, the figurative, the human, the physical, is in this poem too prominent. The prophets, indeed, often employ the same figures; but with them the fact, the substratum, the moral relation of Jehovah to his people, is always apparent; while, in the Canticles, some of those figures are, for our times and circumstances, carried out too far.

To recur, for a moment, to the difference of opinion which exists among the supporters of the allegorical interpretation, viz. whether the relation of Jehovah to his people, as described in this poem, is his relation to the Jewish or to the Christian church, or to the souls of individuals; we may observe that, in general, the very grounds which lead us to adopt the allegorical interpretation of the book, compel us also to assume the relation of Jehovah to the Jewish people, as the subject of the representation. The question, which we have to ask, is, whether the representation, according to theole of his church is the subject of description, must, therefore, receive a negative answer, if it be meant thereby to imply, that the book of Canticles has no special reference to the times of the Old Testament, or that it must be torn away from all historical connections, and regarded solely as describing prophetically the love of Christ to his church under the new dispensation. But, on the other hand, we must answer this question affirmatively, i.e. so far as Jehovah, whose love to his people of the old covenant is described, is also no other than Christ, who, in all times, has revealed to mankind the glory of God, and offered up himself a sacrifice for them, in order to establish the new covenant. We must therefore answer, in so far as the church of the Old Testament, and the church of the New, stand in the same general relation to Christ; and so far as sin and grace, defection and reunion, which constitute the subject of description, are repeated in the history of both these churches. To the relations of an individual soul with Christ, the descriptions of this book can only be applied by way of accommodation; and here the greatest caution is necessary. A false interpretation may here easily mislead to a mysticism, which has far more connection with the Book of the Apocalypse than with the Gospel; to a degradation of that which is most holy, inasmuch as the moral relation of the soul to Christ is perverted into a matter of taste; to a spiritual intoxication, which cannot but be fatal to Christian humility and self-denial. It is assuredly not an accidental circumstance, that in the whole of the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, the relation of God or of Christ to the souls of individuals is never described under the figure of marriage. Although, indeed, the relation of Christ to his church and to individual souls is essentially the same, still in the former case there is less room for the excitement of physical or carnal feelings than in the latter.

The preceding remarks are chiefly drawn from an able essay upon the Song of Songs, by professor Henningen, of Berlin, contained in the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung for 1827. They cannot fail to meet the approbation of every candid and intelligent inquirer. Many attempts have been made, of late years, to invest this poem with a merely literary and worldly character, as an idyl, a pastoral, a description of nuptial love, &c. Among these last must be ranked the following translation by the former editor of Calmet, Mr. Taylor. It exhibits a good deal of research and ingenuity; but also very much that is fanciful and unformed, especially in all that relates to philology. He does indeed suggest that the poem may be allegorical, and may be applied to the union of the Jewish and Gentile churches,—a suggestion which the preceding remarks have shown to be without ground, and which he no where attempts to carry out in practice. His whole endeavor is directed to the illustration of the poem as a description of nuptial affection. It forms indeed a separate treatise, distinct from Calmet's Dictionary; which, therefore, the writer of these lines does not feel himself at liberty to meddle with. The general impression left by both the version and the illustrations of Mr. Taylor, is that he has given to the poem a dress too stiffly dramatic, and imparted to it a character of modern orientalism and of lusciousness, not to say sensuality, which is unknown to the Hebrew original. *R.

The Book of Canticles, By Mr. C. Taylor.

Introduction.—The first principle to be considered in analyzing this poem is, the arrangement of its parts; for it evidently appears to be not one continued or uniform ode, but a composition of several odes into one connected section. In addition to the termination of the poem, there are three places where the author has decidedly marked the close of a subject. These are, the lively adulations addressed by the Bride to the daughters of Jerusalem. These three periods close by the same words, uttered by the same person, (the Bride,) who, when she is the last speaker, concludes in the same manner with very slight variations. They occur at the end of the first day, the end of the second day, and the end of the fifth day; but at the end of the poem, this conclusion is not maintained. If, then, these passages be admitted as divisions of the poem originally intended to be marked as close, we have only to ascertain two other divisions, in order to render the parts of the poem pretty nearly commensurate to each other in length, and complete in the subject which each includes. By attending to the sentiments and expressions, we shall find little difficulty in perceiving such a change of person and occurrence, that the ending of the third day must be where we have been told that the bridegroom was about to come. A dream of the over-night, imply that they are spoken in a morning; and they are so totally distinct from the foregoing sentiments, as to demonstrate a total change of scene and of subject. The same may be said of the close of the fourth day. There is such a determinate change of style, subject, and person speaking, in the succeeding verses, that every feeling of propriety forbids our uniting them. These principles, then, divide the poem into six divisions, each of which we have considered as one day. It has been usual with commentators to regard these six days as succeeding the day of marriage; a mistake, as we suppose, which has misled them into many maxes of error. On the contrary, they are here considered as preceding the day of marriage; and, we think, the poet has distinctly marked the sixth day, as being itself the day of that union; which accounts for its termination with the morning eclogue, and the omission of the evening visit of the Bridegroom to the Bride; as then the Sabbath, to which no allusion appears in any preceding day, would be beginning, in whose solemnities the Jewish bridegroom would be attentively engaged. Other interpreters have supposed these eclogues to be so absolutely distinct as to have no connection with each other, and not to form a regular series—a supposition that considerably impairs their beauty, as a whole, and the effect of each of them singly; while it leaves undecided the reason for their association, or for their appearance and preservation in one book.

Of the time of the year.—That the time of the year is spring, has always been supposed; and, indeed, it is so clearly marked as to need no support from reasonings. The mention of several particulars in the poem demonstrates it. Mr. Harmer has identified the month to be April; and, in Judea, we may say of April, as in England has been said of May, that "April is the mother of love."
The divisions of each day. We have supposed it right to divide each day into two parts, morning and evening; because there appears to be such appropriateations of persons and sentiments, as detach each eclogue from its companion. It should be remembered that the noon of the day is too hot in Judea to permit exercise of body or mind; and that no person of the least degree of respectability is abroad at that time of the day. The Turks have a proverb importing, that "only Franks and dogs walk about at noon." And in Europe itself, as in Spain and Portugal, while the inhabitants are in the streets, they, "are guarded by Englishmen and dogs." Since, then, noon is the time for repose in the East, (see 2 Sam. iv. 5,) we are not to expect that an eastern poet should depart from the manners of his country by representing this part of the day as a fit time for visiting, or conversation, or enjoyment. Neither can we suppose that night is a fit time for visiting, or conversation, among recent acquaintances especially. Whatever our own unhappy manners may ordain, in respect of conversation in the proper repose of night, the East knows nothing of such revels; nor of those assignations, which, under favor of night, furnish too much occasion for repentance on the morrow. Such considerations restrict these eclogues to two parts of the day, morning and evening. The morning, among the oriental nations, is very early; the cool of the day, day-break, before the heat comes on; and the evening is also the cool of the day, after the heat is over. The mornings of this poem are mostly occupied by conventions; at night, he had many visits of friends, or with her attendants, in her own apartments. But on the morning of the second day, the Bride, observing her beloved engaging in a hunting party, is agreeably surprised by a visit from him, and sees him from the upper story of her apartments, and through the cross-bars of her windows. He solicits a view of her countenance: but the poem seems to intimated his further waiting for that till the next morning; when she, being intent on considering his pelasquin, suffers herself to be surprised; and the Bridegroom compliments her beauty, which, for the first time, he has an opportunity—not properly of considering—but merely of glancing at. The evening is the regular time when the Bride expects to be visited by her Spouse; accordingly, he visits her on the first evening; but on the second evening she describes her anxiety, occasioned by his failure in this expected attention, for which she had waited even into night, when it was too late to suppose he would come, and she must needs relinquish all thoughts of seeing him. On the other evenings he punctually pays his attendance; and though the import of the conversation between them is usually to the same effect, yet the variety of phraseology and metaphor employed by both parties gives a characteristic richness, elegance, and interest to this poem; in which, if it be equalled, it is by very few; but certainly it is not surpassed by any.

Of the persons who speak. It is natural to inquire, in the next place, who are the interlocutors in this poem. That it consists of conversation is an opinion derived from the earliest times; from the Jewish synagogue, no less than from the Christian church; but opinions have varied as to the persons engaged in this conversation. There evidently are two principals: first, the lady herself, whom we distinguish as the Bride; meaning a person betrothed to her spouse, but not yet married to him. She evidently comes from a distant country, and that country south of Judea, and more exposed to the heat of the sun. She is accompanied by her mother, or by a representative of her mother, and by proper female attendants, whom we shall denominate Bridesmaids. The second principal in the poem is the Bridegroom, who is described as can agree only with a prince; and this prince is accompanied, on his part, by a number of companions, with whom he can be free, and who in return can be hearty. In addition to these, as the Bride is but recently arrived from a distant land, she may be natural to the country of the ladies of her present residence (the Royal Harem) should visit her; no less to congratulate and to compliment her, than to engage a share in her good graces, and to commence that friendship which may hereafter prove valuable and pleasant to both parties. The Queen Mother of the Bridegroom perhaps heads this group.

Received opinion, founded on a pretty general tradition, has called the prince, Solomon, king of Israel; a tradition almost, or altogether equally general, has called the princess, his Egyptian spouse, the daughter of Pharaoh. As we acquiesce in this opinion, we pass it with this slight mention only.

Of the place where the action passes. The place is the city of David. This will follow, in some degree, from the mention already made of the parties, but further proof may be found in the history of this connection, 1 Kings iii. Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter, and brought her into the city of David, until he had made her an house of居所; 1 Kings vi. 24. From these passages it is clear, that Solomon lodged his bride in the city of David, directly as he received her; consequently at the time described in this poem. Tracing the ancient boundaries of the city of David, we find it connects on one side with the city of Jerusalem; on the other side it is surrounded by the open country, the hills, &c. in the neighborhood. Its internal distribution, we are not to imagine, was wholly like that of a city; that is, a series of streets through-out, leading from end to end; but comprising the palace of David, its courts and apartments, the gardens and pleasure-grounds belonging to that place, in various and irregular forms. If there were a few continued lines of houses in it, they might be adjacent to the city of Jerusalem, say, to where the iron gate is marked in our plan; and, for the sake of perplexity, we shall admit (but without believing it) that I, K, L, M, were streets, or other buildings; and further, where the wall of the present city passes, we shall suppose a pile of buildings, the palace of David; having one from toward Jerusalem, and another toward the gardens, into which the rest of the ground was formed. These gardens, thus occupying full half the area of the city of David, or the whole of what is marked mule, were on our plan, must be supposed to be amply furnished with the most admired plants, shrubs, trees, evergreens, &c.; with water, in basins, streams, and fountains; with a smooth-moved award of the most vivid green, that is, grass; and with a variety of flowers in pots, vases, &c.; in short, with whatever of decoration art and expense could procure; and the whole so disposed as to be seen to the greatest advantage from the windows, balconies, galleries, pavilions, and internal walks of the palace. Nor is this all; for unless we observe how finely the risings and hills of mount Zion were adapted to communicate pleasure, by views of them, (that is, being looked towards,) and by the situations they afforded for prospects; (that is, being looked from;) also, what is implied in these risings, the hollows, dells, &c. their counterparts, which would at once both coolness and shadow, we shall lose the satisfaction arising from several of the allusions in the poem: these hillocks, then, the reader will bear in mind. We must add the supposition of various gates around this enclosure, some of them opening with the town, others with the country; all of them more or less guarded by proper officers and attendants. We must also include in our ideas of the palace, that king Solomon himself resided in a part of it; say, for distinction sake, the part below e; and his Bride, her mother, and attendants, lodged in another part of it; say the part above e. These parts of the same palace may easily be understood as possessing a ready communication with each other: some of them were surrounded by corridors; others were open pavilions, or colonnades, according to the nature and composition of a royal residence in the East, and adapted to the various purposes of the apartments. Add guards—former residents—proper officers—servants, &c.

Thus we have stated our notions of the time, the place, the persons, of this conversation poem. We desire the reader to transport himself and his

EXCEPTIONS INTO THE PALACE OF THE HIGHLY-Favored KING OF ISRAEL; TO MAKE ONE AMONG THOSE HONORED WITH A STATION IN THE TRAIN OF SOLOMON, WHEN HIS BETROTHED SPOUSE, NEWLY ARRIVED FROM EGYPT, WITH HER MOTHER, SURROUNDED BY ALL THE POMP WHICH THE SUPERB PHARAOH HIMSELF COULD DEPUTE TO AGGRAVIZE HIS DAUGHTER IN THE EYES OF BEHOLDERS. EGYPT WAS AT THIS TIME IN ITS GLORY, AS TO RICHES AND POWER; AND SOLOMON WAS RISING INTO THE GREATEST REPUTE FOR MAGNIFICENCE, AND INTO A PROVERBIAL NAME FOR WISDOM. THUS INTRODUCED, LET US ATTEND THE CONVERSATIONS OF THESE ILLUSTROUS LOVERS; BUT LET US REMEMBER THAT THEY ARE EXPRESSED AND TRANSMITTED IN THE ENERGETIC, THE IMPASSIONED, THE FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE OF POETRY, OF EASTERN POETRY; COMPRISED IN METAPHORS, EASY, FAMILIAR, AND EVEN CONSTANT, IN THE PLACE AND COUNTRY WHERE WE HEAR THEM; THAT A GREAT PART OF THE GALLANTRY ATTENDING A COURTSHIP-CONVERSATION IS (BY USAGE) INCLUDED IN THEM; AND THAT THE PROMPTITUDE OF THE REPARTEE TO SUCH ALLUSIONS, METAPHORS, SIMILES, COMPARISONS, &C., IS ACCEPTED AS NO SMALL TEST OF THE SPIRITUALLY WIT, FELICITY OF FANCY, READINESS OF REPLY, AND MENTAL DEXTERTY, OF THE PERSONS BETWEEN WHOM THEY PASS.

ALLOROGICAL MEANING OF THE POEM.—UPON THIS TOPIC MR. TAYLOR MERELY SUGGESTS, THAT THE SONG MAY ALLEGORIZE THE UNION OF THE JEWISH AND GENTILE CHURCHES. THE JEWISH CHURCH, IN THAT VIEW, WOULD BE THE BRIDEGROOM, WHICH (1) RESIDES AT JERUSALEM, (2) WHOSE CHIEF, AND WHOSE PROLOCUTOR, IS THE MESSIAH, (3) WHOSE DIGNITY IS SUPERIOR. THE GENTILE CHURCH WOULD BE (1) FROM A DISTANCE, (2) NEW IN THIS INTIMATE RELATION, (3) SWARthy IN SOME RESPECTS, YEAT FAIR IN OTHERS, (4) MODEST, YET AFFECTIONATE; ELEGANT, YET RUSTIC; (5) WILLING TO YIELD OBEDIENCE, PROPERTY, &C., TO HER LORD. (6) THIS UNION WOULD NATURALLY BE REFERRED TO THE DAYS OF THE MESSIAH; BUT, (7), THERE WOULD BE MANY COUNTRIES NOT DIRECTLY INFORMED OF HIS COMING; MAY THESE BE THE LITTLE SISTER NOT YET MATURE IN PERSON?—AND TO CLOSE THE WHOLE, (8) MAY THE ABSENCE OF THE CHIEF OF THE JEWISH CHURCH, AND THE EARNEST DESIRE OF THE GENTILE CHURCH FOR HIS RETURN, WITH WHICH THE POEM CLOSES, BE IN ANY WAY RELATED TO THE ACTUAL STATE OF THINGS, OR ALLUDE TO THE STILL EXPECTING HEBREWS, AND THE STILL IMMATURE HEATHENS?

THE READER WILL REMEMBER, THAT MR. TAYLOR'S ATTEMPT PROFESS TO ILLUSTRATE BY PLACES; NO OTHER MEANING, THEREFORE, IS TO BE EXPECTED IN IT, THAN WHAT PLACES CAN ILLUSTRATE; AND INDEED IT IS ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY, AS A DICTATE OF COMMON SENSE, THAT NOT TILL AFTER THE VERBAL RENDERING IS CLEARLY ESTABLISHED, ANY MORE ELEVATED IMPORT SHOULD BE CONSTRUCTED UPON IT. NEITHER IS THE READER TO EXPECT CRITICAL REMARKS, VARIATIONS OF VERSIONS, MSC., &C. THE OBJECT IS ONLY ARRANGEMENT.

LADIES of the Haram.

BRIDEGROOM. To a chief (rider) in the cavalry of Pharaoh,
I have compared thee, my consort.
Thy cheeks are so elegantly decorated with bands of pearls;
Thy neck is so resplendent with clusters of gems.

LADIES or BRIDEGROOM'S COMPANIONS.
We will make for thee golden bands,
With spotted edges of silver.

BRIDE. While the king is surrounded by his circle
My spikenard diffuses delightful fragrance.
A scent-bag of balsam is my love to me,
In my bosom he constantly rests:
A cluster of Al-Henna (12) is my beloved to me,

BRIDEGROOM. Behold, thou art elegant, in thy taste,
My consort!
Behold, thou art elegant! Thine eyes are doves!

BRIDE. Behold, thou art (13) magnificent,
My associate friend;
How delightful, how exquisitely ground![or flowery] is our carpet covering!
The beams of thy palaces are cedars!
Their ornamental inlayings are fires!

BRIDE. The (2) music [sounds] of my beloved!
Behold, he himself approaches!
Lightly traversing the hills,
Fleetly bounding over the rising grounds,
My beloved is swift like an antelope, or a fawn!
Behold him stepping [(3 seated, placed,) in his (4) carriage;
Looking through the apertures;
(5) [windows,]
Gleaming between the blinds! (6) [lattices.]
My beloved addresses me, and says,
"Rise, my consort, my charmer,
and come away;
For lo! the winter is over, the rains are past,
The flowers appear in the meads,
The singing-time [of the nightingale] is come,
And the voice of the turtle re-echoes in our grounds;
The fig-tree forwards into sweetness its swelling fruit,
And the vines advance into fragrance their just setting grapes.
Ariseth, my consort, my charmer,
and come away!
My dove (7) hid in the cliffs of the rocks,
Concealed in the fissures of the cliffs,
Show me thy (8) swelling neck [turgid crop,]
Let me hear thy [cooing] call; (9)

I seek him—but I find him not.
What if I rise now, and take a turn
[a round] in the city, (13)
In the streets, in the squares:
Seeking him—the beloved of my heart?
I may seek him, but not find him.
What if the watchmen, going their rounds through all the city, find me?

"Have ye seen him— the beloved of my heart?"
I should ask of them;— I might ask in vain.

But, what if, passing ever so little a way beyond them,
I find him—the beloved of my heart?

I would clasp him, I would not let him go;
Until I had brought him to the house of my mother,
To the apartment of my parent herself.

Then would I adjure you, O daughters of Jerusalem,
By the refreshing antelopes, by the timid deer of the field,
If ye disturb, if ye dispose this complete affection,
Till [affection] herself desire it!

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PROPOSED VERSION.

We are now prepared to review the characters of the principal speakers in this interesting poem. The Bride has been a ranger of parks, plantations, &c. is fond of gardens and rural enjoyment, and has a property of her own, of the same nature; yet is a person of complete elegance of taste and of manners; magnificent in her personal ornaments, and liberal with princely liberality in her disposition. She has been educated by her mother with the tenderest affection, and is her only daughter; though her mother has several sons. The Bridegroom is noble in his person, magnificent in his equipage, palace, and pleasures; active, military, of pleasing address and compliment, and one on whom his exalted rank and station sit remarkably easy. The Bride's Mother does not speak in any part of the poem; it is only by what is said of her that we find she accompanied her daughter: whether this personage be her natural mother, or any confidential friend, deputed to that office, might engage conjecture. The Bride's Companions speak but little; we think only once, at the close of the fourth day, if then. The Bridegroom's Companions speak, also, only on the same occasion. The Ladies of the Haram, or visitors to the Bride, are the first persons to compliment and to cheer her; and we think they seem to accompany in her train throughout the poem. It is likely that these visitors praise her in the first day, describe the palanquin in the third day, converse with the Bride in the fourth day, and admire her dress in the fifth day. These parts have hitherto been attributed to the Bride's Egyptian attendants; but we rather suppose the information they give, and the sentiments they communicate, imply persons well acquainted with the Bridegroom and his court—that is, Jewish attendants, maids of honor to the Bride—or, May these passages be spoken by the Queen Mother of the Bridegroom? (See Queen Mother.) Some other persons also speak once at the opening of the sixth day; their remark indicates that they stand near, or at the palace: for want of more precise knowledge of them, they are called "Attendants at the house." Say, the chief officers of the palace. But is this spoken by the ladies of the Haram? or by the queen mother?

The first day.—1. May he salute me with affectionate salutations! Though the import of the word zahez undoubtedly is to kiss, yet, in several passages of Scripture, it implies no more than more salutations or addressing—a compliment paid on view of a person or object. So those who are said, in our translation, to have "kissed the image of Baal," did not kiss that image, strictly speaking, but kissed toward it; that is to say, they kissed their hands, and referred that action to the image; or kissed at a distance from it—addressed it respectfully by the solamn of the East. (See Andore, and Kiss.) This expression of the Bride, then, implies, simply, an apprehension or fear, (united with a wish to the contrary, that when the Bridegroom sees her, he may think slightly of her person, her qualities, or attractions, and may refrain from paying his addresses to her. In reply, the ladies commend her beauty, and cheer her modest solicitation by praising her attractions and her graces. They do not indeed praise her person, because, according to the customs and decencies of the country, the Bridegroom cannot yet see that; they only praise her general appearance; and what must first strike to say, they kissed their hands, and referred that action to the image; or kissed at a distance from it—addressed it respectfully by the solamn of the East is very great; the lovers of the Arabian poets never omit to notice this attraction of their mistresses.

CANTICLES

She diffused perfume like the ambergris, and looked beautiful like the lily of the fountain.

Agreeably to this, we find in Scripture the remark, that, "Ointment and perfumes rejoice the heart;" (Prov. xxvii. 9.) and Isaiah, describing a female desiring of pleasing her paramour, represents her as "scattering her perfumes;" (Isa. iv. 16.) and also Esther ii. 15; (Esther xiv. 6; Jer. viii. 17.) The reader will observe the distance to which these perfumes are understood to extend their fragrance; and, relatively, to that which the Bride's beauty was famous.

2. Love-favors. It is usual to render this word (םְדֹּף) love— but, by considering, (1.) That the ladies say, they shall commend her the (םְדֹּף) loves of the bride; (2) that (םְדֹּף) loves are said to be poured out as from a bottle, or to be sent as presents to persons of integrity (םְדֹּף); (3) that the spouse invites the bride into the country, where he would give her his (םְדֹּף) loves; it appears that love (םְדֹּף), of some kind are the articles meant by the word.

Suppose, for instance, the bride presented the ladies with curiously-worked handkerchiefs, [as is customary in the East] the ladies might look on them, at a distance of time afterwards, with a pleasing recollection of the person by whom they were given; as is customary among ourselves. Such tokens are not valued for their intrinsic worth, but for the sake of the giver; and, were it not trivial, we might quote a common inscription on this subject as coincident with the spirit of this passage, "When this you see, remember me." What other than a present of love can be poured out as from a bottle? Delicacious wine, and might raise the drouzy to discourse? or why does the Spouse invite his Bride into the country, but in order to present her with its best productions; some of which, he tells her, were stored up, and expressly reserved for her reception? Such is the meaning of this word, in this place: favors bestowed as the effect of love—to remunerate love; or designed to conciliate love, to excite regard toward the presenter of the gift. We have used the word favors, since that word implies, occasionally, personal decorations, as at marriages, ribands, &c. given by the bride to the attendants, or others, are termed bride-favors, or simply favors.

3. The bride proceeds to invite her visitors (as we suppose) to the interior of her apartments; and, from good manners, desires them to precede her; which they, with equal good manners, decline. The word mešhek signifies to advance toward a place; as Judg. iv. 6, "Go and draw toward mount Tabor, and take with thee thousand men;" that is, go from mount Tabor, and be followed by thine army—head thine army—precede it. Job xxx. 33, "He goeth to the grave, where he (mešhek) precedes a great many men; and so draws them toward him; as he himself has been preceded by many who have died before him." Job xxviii. 18, "The price, (mešhek), the precedence of wisdom—its attraction—is preferable to rubies." Jer. xxxii. 3, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving-kindness have I preceded thee;" as we say, been beforehand with thee, "drew thee toward me." Such appears to be the import of the word, which, therefore, is in this place rendered—lead the way, that is, proceed.

4. The king's chamber. This word, though usually rendered chamber, can only mean, in general, his apartments, his residence; the word is used to this purport, Deut. xxxii. 25; Prov. xxiv. 4; Jer. xxxvi. 2; and we have among ourselves an instance of a similar application of the word chamber. In Richard III. Shakespeare makes Buckingham say to the young king, "Welcome, sweet prince, to London, to your chamber: the reason is, London, from being the usual residence of the king, was called chambers regis, 'the king's chamber.' It might justly be rendered rooms, so we have the rooms at Bath, at Margate, &c. or chambers, in a palace—as the five-masters-cord Star chamber, the Jerusalem chamber, the painted chamber, &c. that is, apartments. But here it evidently means the Harrow, or women's apartment, the seconded chamber, into which the bride invites the ladies; and, as it is customary of this elogious passage, being transferred, as we suppose, from the prior below to the Harrow above; or from the parlor external, to the Harrow interior.

5. Treated me contemptuously, literally, "treated as dirt," which presents itself not properly by our English phrase, "turned up their noses at me?"—but how would that read in a poem? To spew does not correctly express the idea, as that action rather refers to a motion of the foot; whereas this term expresses a movement of a figure, or of the entire countenance.

6. Inspeetress of the fruiteries. This, we imagine, is somewhat analogous to our office of ranger of a royal park; an officer of some dignity, lead of more encumbrance: it is bestowed on individuals of noble families among ourselves; and is sometimes held by females of the most exalted rank; as the princess Sophia of Gloucester, who is ranger of a part of Bushy park; the princess of Wales of the Prince of Wales' park, &c. and the office is consistent even with royal dignity. This lady, then, was appointed ranger—governress, directress of these plantations; which appears to have been perfectly agreeable to her nature; and, although she was strongly pressed with great modesty, to her exposure to the sun's rays, in a more southern climate, by means of this office, as an apology for a complexion which might be thought by Jerusalem females to be somewhat tanned.

7. Fruiteries. The word signifies not restrictively vineyards, but places producing various kinds of plants; for we find the al-henna came from "the fruiteries of En-gedi," the plantations, not merely vineyards, of "the fountain of Gadi," or the "springs of Gadi," chap. i. 14, and the like. The Old Testament, though the usage of their time, as appears from the best writers, pleads strongly in their excuse. "That soul shall die"—that soul shall be cut off, read person; for in many places the actions and functions, or qualities, of the body, are attributed to it; sometimes those of a living body, sometimes those of a dead body; where we cannot suppose it means a dead soul. It may be considered as a general word, expressing a person's self; and sir William Jones was obliged to use this term self, on more than one occasion, in translating a cognate word from the Arabic; as for instance—"he threw his self into the water," where it would be extremely erroneous to say, "his soul," in our common acquaintance of that term.

8. Beloved of my heart, strictly, beloved of my person; but as this is rather an uncouln phrase in English, the reader will excuse the substitution of one more familiar. The word is very improperly rendered soul, by our translators, through the Old Testament, though the usage of their time, as appears from the best writers, pleads strongly in their excuse. "That soul shall die"—that soul shall be cut off, read person; for in many places the actions and functions, or qualities, of the body, are attributed to it; sometimes those of a living body, sometimes those of a dead body; where we cannot suppose it means a dead soul. It may be considered as a general word, expressing a person's self; and sir William Jones was obliged to use this term self, on more than one occasion, in translating a cognate word from the Arabic; as for instance—"he threw his self into the water," where it would be extremely erroneous to say, "his soul," in our common acquaintance of that term.

9. Elegant. We observed, in considering the Ship of Tyre, that the word 1tv might refer less to beauty of person than has been thought. We sup-
CANTICLES [ 360 ]

pose our word handsome may answer to it, in a pesse; we say, as we may, not a handsome person, but a handsome dress, handsome behavior, speech, &c. We have preferred the term elegant as implying all these ideas, but as being more usually connected with person and manners; for we rather say, "a lady of elegant manners," than of handsome manners.

10. This passage is examined in the article on Marriage Processions. The principles of that explanation seem to be just. Otherwise, the comparison might be, "To my own mare, which is the prime among the high-bred horses I have received from Pharaoh."

11. Circle. This is precisely according to the usage of the East; the royal personage sits on his seats, and his friends stand round him, on each side, forming a segment of a circle. The friends of the Bridegroom are, we suppose, his companions; but on this first visit he might, perhaps, be accompanied by other attendants, for the greater dignity and brilliancy of the interview. Nevertheless, thirty companions might form a sufficient circle: and one can hardly suppose the king of Israel had fewer than Samson, (at that time a private person,) Judg. xiv.
10. and Ps. cxxxviii. 3.

12. al-Henna; see Campire, "The plantations, or fruiteries, of Er-ge'di." These were not far from Jericho; they did not so much contain vines as artificial shrubs, including, perhaps, the famous balsam of Judea. It may be thought from Ezek. xlvi.
10. that Er-ge'di was a wady centre; perhaps not far from the river, beside being itself a fountain.
This agrees with Dr. Shaw's account of al-henna: he says, it requires much water; as well as the palm,
for which tree Jericho was famous, and from which it derived an appellation.

13. Elegant; magnificent. We think the Bridegroom here compliments his Bride on the general beauty and grace of her appearance (19); for, as she is veiled all over, he cannot see the features of her countenance: he catches, however, a glimpse of her eyes through her veil, and those he praises, as being dovet; for which we refer to a following remark.
(See Veil.) She returns the compliment, by praising her elegance (19); but as this elegance refers to his palace, it seems here to be properly rendered magnificence; which, indeed, as we have observed, is its mirthly application here. She notices this magnificence, as displayed in the cedar, and other costly woods,
which adorned those apartments of the palace into which she had been conducted; not forgetting that ever-acceptable ornament in the East, the green greenery, which, beside being green in itself,
was also in this palace adorned with the most stately and brilliant flowers, compared to which, says the Bride, I am not worthy of mention; I am not a palace-flower, not a fragrant rose, carefully cultivated in a costly vase; or a noble lily, planted in a rich and favorable soil; I am a rose of the field, a lily
from the side of the humble water-course, the simplicity—the shadow of the valley. To this her self-degradation, the Bridegroom returns an affectionate dissent;
and here concludes their first interview; whose chief characteristics may be gathered from observing, that it is, (1.) short, (2.) distant, (3.) general, (4.) that not the slightest approach to any freedom between the party is discoverable in it; which perfectly agrees with our ideas on the import of the opening line of this eulogy.

14. Green; flowery. It has been remarked, that the word here used has both these significations; and if, as we suppose, it refers to the ground before the pavilion, and to the flowers and flowering shrubs, in pots and vases, standing close by the pavilion, it is applicable to both ideas. On this subject there is an appropriate passage in Tavernier: "I never left the court of Persia, but some of the lords, es-specially four of the white eunuchs, begged of me to bring some flowers out of France; for they have every one a garden before their chamber door; and happy is he that can present the king with a posy of flowers in a crystal flower-pot." We know, also, that banquets, &c. are held in gardens adjoining the residences of persons of opulence, in the East; and when Absauan, rising from table, went into the palace-garden, (Ezra vii. 7.) he had not far to go; but might quit

the banquet chamber, and return to it in an instant;
for, evidently, the garden was adjacent. The idea of flowery verdure also applies to the rendering of oreekh —carpet, or covering; not bed. (See Bed.) That a bed for sleeping on should be green, is no great proof of magnificence; but an extensive bed of flowers, as it were, in full view of a parlor opening into it, would at once delight the senses of sight and smell,
and would deserve mention, when elegances were
the subjects of discourse.

16. After the Bridegroom is withdrawn, the Bride expresses herself with less reserve. Her conversation
no longer refers to the palace, but to her beloved;
she resumes the recently suggested simile of the citron-tree, which, being a garden plant,
naturally leads her thoughts to a kiosk in a garden,
where, when they should be in private together,
they might partake of refreshments; and while they should be sitting on the Duan, (See Bed.)
he might rest his arm on the cushion, which supported her head, while his right arm was free to offer her refreshments, citrons, &c. or to embrace her. She concludes by saying, that in such a pleasing seclusion she would not choose their mutual affection should be interrupted; and alludes to the very startling antelopes and deer, as the most timid creatures she could select, and those most likely to be frightened at intrusion on their retreats.

17. Deep shade. As the orange-tree does not grow to any height, or extent, in Britain, answerable to this idea of a deep shadow, we must take the opinion of those who have visited it in its native state. But the idea of a shadow of Judea may be established by those of Spain. No doubt but the Bride's comparison implies a noble tree, a grand tree of its kind. The following are quoted from Mr. Shaw; "the shade of the garden, when it was sultry, and I could with pleasure have looted it out in the garden, under the shade of a noble lemon-tree, refreshed by the soft perfumes ascending on every side, from the neighboring orchards." . . . "Being very hot and hungry, we made the best of our way home, through large plantations of orange-trees, which here grow to the size of moderate timber trees; the fruit is much more pleasing to the eye, if less so to the palate, than the oranges of Portugal, as the rich blood color is admirably contrasted with the bright tint of the leaves."

Pages 250, 290.

18. That the fruit here meant is not "apples," but citrons, is now so generally admitted, that we need not stay to prove it: nevertheless, it is proper to mention it, that this rendering may not seem to be adopted without authority. Almost every writer has proofs on this subject. See Apple-tree.
The second day.—1. Bride at her window hears the hunting-horn. This we think probable, from what follows. The expressions of the ezoraqim to catch the jackals, partly prove it; perhaps, however, the poet hints, that, though, when he set out, the prince designed to be of their party, yet, after conversation with his Beloved, he is tempted to send them alone on that expedition. It is very natural that this passing by the Bride’s windows should occur, if Solomon dwelt below, and was going out at a gate above, in the palace; or even if his chase were restricted to the area within the walls, it might easily lead him to pass the upper wing of the palace, and the windows of the harem.

2. Music. This is considered in the article on Marriage Processions. Are not these hills, these rising grounds, within the park of the palace? If so, then perhaps the Bridgroom, in a following day, invites his Bride to no very distant or very dangerous “lions’ haunts,” or “panther mountains”—but to hillocks, &c., in his park, known by these appellations. We may perhaps, because, though such names are given to parts of a royal palace in the East, yet the mention of Lebanon seems to infer a more distant excursion.

3. Seated in his (4) carriage. See the Plate of Vehicles, p. 289. Also for (5) the windows; and for (6) he makes his circuit, or does not hurry, &c.

4. My Dove hid in the clefts of the rocks. To understand this simile, consider the Bridgroom as being in the garden, below the windows of the chamber, within which openings the Bride is seen by him; now, windows in the East are not only narrow, but they have cross-bars, like those of our sashes, in them: the interposition of these prevents a full view of the lady’s person; so that she resembles a dove peeping, as it were, over, or from within, the clefts in a rock; and only partly visible; that is, retiring, her head and neck, or crop, “which,” says the Bridgroom, “though I can but just discern, I perceive is lovely.” Observe, too, that she is closely veiled; the retiring, timid dove, therefore, is the comparison.—The Bridgroom continues the simile of the dove, praises (8) her turgid crop, and her pleasant voice; this, in a dove, can only be the (9) cooing, or call, of that bird, which, under this simile, he desires to hear directed toward himself.

10. My Beloved is mine, and I am his. Does this mean as an epithet of office, the same as the one above?—His answers to his requests? Our enjoyments now are mutual, and it shall be my happiness to accomplish his desires.” What is the import of the phrase “feeding among lilies”?—Who feeds?—who is fed?—why among lilies?—The term (hereafter the “stirrup,” or “shequar,” as it were, No. 10. of the Syriac LXX.) has been understood “creaky mountains;” and if it were certain that the (5e) or “rock-goat,” or the “chamois,” was that particular species of gazelle which we have rendered “antelope,” it might be very proper to preserve that translation; but as Egypt is not a mountainous country, but a valley, could the Bride know any thing of the rock-goat? On the other hand, were the mountains of Herot famous for swift goats?—and how should the Bride know that particular one?

12. Till night I seek him; meaning, I have waited for my Beloved all the evening; and now, though it be too late to expect his company, still I seek him: my disappointment is great;—but how to remedy it?—Shall I go into the city? for I am sure he is not at home; I am sure, if he were in his palace, he would visit me. The whole of this speech is understood to be in the optative mood; we have rather used the subjunctive English mood, as more likely to convey its true import.

13. Citt. See the article on Jerusalem, where we have suggested the probability of the term City, in Acts xii, denoting the City of David. We would suggest the same here; and submit, that the Bride does not mean the City of Jerusalem, but the streets, the broad place, the handsome courts, squares, &c., of the City of David, her present royal residence. Under this idea, she should venture on an evening promenade, she would be near her apartments, and never beyond the walls of her palace; but even this she declines; not choosing to expose herself to incidental meetings with the guards or watchmen. To suppose that she has any inclination to roam in Jerusalem at large, is to forget that she is a foreigner, and very recently arrived: how could she know her way about that city?

The third day.—1. What is that?—In the original, “Who is that?”—But this has been regarded as an error of transcribers. If the original word were what, then the palanquin is the subject of this inquiry; and to this the answer is given; if the original word were who, then the answer implies that the reader was seated in this vehicle. But there appears no subsequent reference to him. We have rather thought that the general turn of the question leads to the word what: the reader will take his choice, as either word implies the same import, and will justify the same answer.

2. Vast column of smoke. This strong expression (plural) is by no means too strong for the poet’s design: the word is used in Joel ii. 30. to denote the smoke of a volcano, or other abundant discharge of smoke, rising high in the air like a cloud. The immense quantity of perfumes burning around the approaching visitor is alluded to with very great address, under this prodigious comparison. The burning of perfumes in the East, in the pectumb part of processions, is both very ancient, and very general. Deities (images) were probably the first honored with this ceremony, and afterwards their supposed viceregent, human divinities. We have a relic of the same custom still existing among ourselves, in the flowers strewn or borne in public processions, at coronations, &c. and before our great officers of state; as the lord chancellor, the speaker of the House of Commons; and in some corporations the mast, as an emblem of office, with a silver mask, upon which a gilded ornament only.

3. Palanquin. See the Plate of Vehicles, below.

4. Fearless. We rather think this epithet describes the commander of these guards, “the man, the horse, the head man, or chief. See No. 10. of the Syriac LXX,” as a brave fellow; of tried courage, void of fear, in the very darkest night, or rather, at all times: the composition of the Hebrew word (with:) favors this thought; and we think, had not the bed, the sleeping bed, unluckily preceded it, this word would not have been deviated by translators from its proper import; to which we have endeavored to restore it.

5. This passage would startle the reader if he had not been prepared for it by what we have just said. This arrangement of the words is unusual in Hebrew, yet in poetry is very natural; it merely refers the subject described to the following words describing it, instead of the foregoing words, to which it has hitherto been usual to refer it. We shall see by the Plates the proprieties which accompany, as natural inferences, this manner of regulating the passage. See the Plate of Vehicles.
6. Head-Circlet. This might be rendered bandeaux; but then we could not have preserved the play of words; for to have said, "the bandeaux, with which his head was clothed, or veiled, or hooded, or hooded his head," would have been intolerable: the expression in our language becomes ludicrous; we have therefore preferred circlet, with which his mother encircled him. What this circlet was, we may see on another occasion more fully; but the Plate of the Barasanean's Dress will assist us in part. (See p. 271.)

7. Bridegroom having seen his Bride for the first time. This we infer, because this is his first description of her, or the first compliment he pays to her person; he praised, in the first day, her general deportment; in the second day, he only compared her neck to that of a dove, that being all he had yet seen; but now, the poet seems to say that he takes advantage of her contemplation of the royal palanquin to inspect her countenance; which also she has suffered to be seen, partially at least. (See Nos. 7, 8. of the Second Day.) Observe, he only praises so much of her person as we may suppose he could discern, while she was standing behind the window; that is, her face, her hair, seen in front, her neck, and her bosom; having caught a glimpse of these, he praises them; but his Bride has modestly stolen away, and returns no answer. She hears him, no doubt, with internal pleasure; but the complete sight of her being a favor not yet to be granted, she withdraws her approbation from the incident which had been too much his friend. Observe the art of the poet, who introduces an incident, whereby he favors the Lover with a gratification to which he was not, strictly speaking, entitled; yet contrives to save the delicacy of his Bride entirely harmless and irreprouachable: he gives to the Bride the choice of what time—how long—she would continue at the window; yet from the accident of her going to the window without her veil, if the introduction of his palanquin were a plot in the Bridegroom, we perceive, by his subsequent discourse, that his plot had succeeded;—and this without the smallest imputation on the delicacy of the person who was the object of his contrivance.

8. Between thy locks. The word rendered locks seems to imply that portion of—those curls of—the hair which plays around the forehead; whereas, the word rendered tresses seems to denote those braids which fall down the back of the wearer. (See the Plate of the Bridegroom’s Dress, below.) Assuming this supposition, we do not recollect that the king has praised her tresses, because he had not seen them; having only seen his Lady in front; but he praises her locks, two or three times; they being such parts of her hair as, in beholding her person in front, naturally met his inspection.

9. There is an opposition in this passage which requires elucidation. Thy hair, or braids of hair, falling on thy shoulders, are like the long hairs of the Angora species of goat, whose staple is of great length, and very silky, some of them have been made into muff's for our ladies, which hang down, but bend and wave in hanging. Opposed to this is a flock of sheep, closely shorn, trimmed of their wool; no superfluity, but uniform and perfect neatness. The goats are descending at mount Gilead; where, we suppose, the way was winding and tortuous, making the flock appear the longer, and more numerous, to a person standing at the foot of the mount: the sheep are descending at mount Cassius; so plain or really compresses them into one company; especially if seen by a person standing on the top of the mount: or which only admits two at a time to pass along it. Mount Gilead was at the extremity of Jordan, now; Mount Cassius was at the extremity of Judaea, south. The contrast is, that of long hair lengthened by convolutions of descent; opposed to the utmost smoothness contracted into the narrowest space.

11. As for the rendering of "mount Cassius," instead of "the washing."—(1) It rises from reading the original as two words, instead of one; which, in fact, does not deserve the name of an alteration: (2) as mount Gilead is a place, the parallelism requires a place for this verse; which, (3) the oppositions we have above remarked fully justify. This correction restores the poetry of the passage; and is perfectly agreeable to the usages of Hebrew poetry in general, and of this Song in particular.

12, 13. Blushing; while. These verses, we apprehend, maintain an opposition of a nature similar to that illustrated in the foregoing remarks: blushing like a pomegranate;—while as a marble tower. We presume, that the inference of blushing is not to the flower of the pomegranate, but to the inner part of the fruit when the rind is cut open; which certainly is sufficiently blushing. The comparison of the female complexion to the rind, or skin, of ruddy fruits is common in all nations. It is among ourselves a compliment rather popular than elegant, to say of a young woman, "She blushes as a ripe pomegranate." The blushing of the peach are used not only in good company but by good writers.

14. The tower of David, built on a commanding eminence. Probably this tower was part of the palace of David; or it might be a guard-house, which stood alone, on some hilltop of his royal residence. The allusion, we presume, is to the lady's neck rising from her shoulders and bosom, majestically slender, graceful, and delicate as the clearest marble; of which matter, probably, this tower of David was constructed. On the neck of this lady was hung, by way of ornament, a row or collar of gems, some of which were polished, prominent, and oval in shape; these the speaker assimilates to the shields which were hung round the tower of David, as military embellishments. We would ask, however, whether these shields, thus hung on the outside of this tower, were not trophies taken from the vanquished;—if so, antiquity explains this custom at once, and the royal lover may be understood to call on his beloved to accept the same. Agreeably to this supposition, we do not recollect that the king has praised her tresses, because he had not seen them; having only seen his Lady in front; but he praises her locks, two or three times; they being such parts of her hair as, in beholding her person in front, naturally met his inspection.

15. Thy two nipples. Here we cannot, we apprehend, adopt any other rendering; for the simile seems to allude to two young red antelopes, who, feeding among lilies, and being much shorter than the flowers, are wholly obscured by them, except the tips of their ears, which they put up to reach the flowers, growing on their majestic stems. As these red tips are seen among the white lilies, so are the nipples just discernible through the transparent gauze, or muslin, which covers the lady's bosom. Otherwise, the breast itself is such a rod, so plain or really compresses them into one company; especially if seen by a person standing on the top of the mount; or which only allows two at a time to pass along it. Mount Gilead was at the extremity of Jordan, now; Mount Cassius was at the extremity of Judaea, south. The contrast is, that of long hair lengthened by convolutions of descent; opposed to the utmost smoothness contracted into the narrowest space.
16. Lebanon. This may be understood as if he had said, "Your Egypt is a low, a level country; but we have here most delightful and extensive prospects. What a vast country we see from mount Lebanon!" &c. And this may very possibly be the true sense of the invitation; but we submit, whether these appellations were not names of places within the precincts of the royal park. Such occur in the East; and to such, we suspect, is the allusion of this passage.

17. Carried captive my heart; robbed me of my heart, and carried it off, as a prisoner of war, into slavery: so we say among ourselves, such a one has "lost his heart,"—his heart is captivated; which is the idea here.

18. By one sally of thine eyes; that is, of which I just get a glimpse, behind or between thy veil; or, of which the sparkles, shooting through thy veil, reach me; and that with irresistible effect; even to my heart's captivity, as above. The comparison of glances of the eyes to darts, or other weapons, is common in the poets.

19. Spouse. The first time we meet with this word, caizth, it implies bride: but, we think, it is capable of being referred to either sex, like our word spouse. The Bridegroom, like (the sea, and the air all around was perfumed with the effluvia of the aloe, as its rays sucked up the dew from the leaves." (Swinburne's Travels through Spain. Letter xii.)

20. Around thee shoot plants; literally, "thy shoots are plants," &c. By means of this supplement, we presume, the ideas of the poet are, for the first time, rendered clear, correct, and connected. The importance of water, fountains, springs, &c. in the East, is well known; but the peculiar importance of this article to a garden, and that garden appropriated to aromatic plants, must be very striking to an oriental reader. By way of meeting some ideas that have been suggested, we shall add, that the Bride is a fountain, &c. securely locked up from the Bridegroom, at present; that is, he is not yet privileged to have complete access to her. What the advantages of water to a garden of aromatics might be, we may guess from the nature of the plants; the following extract from Swinburne may contribute to assist our conjectures: "A large party of sprightly damsels and young men that arrived here were much indebted to us for making the water-works play, by means of a small brière to the keeper. Nothing can be more delicious than these sprinklings in a hot day; all the flowers seemed to acquire new vigor; the odors exhaled from the orange, citron, and lemon trees, grew more poignant, more balzamic, and the company ten times more alive than they were; it was a true April shower. We sauntered near two hours in the groves, till we were quite in ecstasy with sweets. It is a most heavenly residence in spring, and I should think the summer might be more similar to some salutations to several allusions in the poem before us:—

Her mouth was like the Solomon's seal, And her cheeks like amanectics, And her lips like two carnations, And her teeth like pearls set in coral, And her forehead like the new moon, And her lips were sweeter than honey, And colder than the pure water.

How very different from our own is that climate, wherein the coldness of pure water is a subject of admiration!—a comparison to the lips of the fair?

21. (c) The nard. As this plant occurs in the close of the former verse, should it again occur here? Can the words be differently connected? or is a word unfortunately dropped? or what fragrant shrub should be substituted for the nard? but observe, that in one passage the word nard is singular, in the other it is plural.

22. We are so accustomed to consider the aloe as a bitter, because of the medical drug of that name, (an insipissated juice,) that we are hardly prepared to receive this allusion to the delicious scent of the flowers of this plant; but that it justly possesses and maintains a place among the most fragrant aromatics, we are well assured:—"This morning, like many of the foregoing ones, was delicious; the sun rose gloriously out of the sea, and the air all around was perfumed with the effluvia of the aloe, as its rays sucked up the dew from the leaves." (Swinburne's Travels through Spain. Letter xii.)

23. Sind, thou southern gale. On this evocative sense of the word ba, see the article Sumon. Had this sentiment been uttered in England, we should have reversed the injunction; but, in Judea, the heat of the south wind would have suffocated the fragrance of the garden, to which the north wind would have been every way favorable. To desire the north wind to blow at the same time when the south wind blows, is surely perverted philosophy, inconsistent poetry, and miserable divinity.

24. I am come into my garden; that is, "I already enjoy the pleasure of your company and conversation; these are as grateful to my mind as delicious food could be to my palate: I could not drink wine and milk with greater satisfaction; I am enjoying it. And you, my friends, partake the relish of those pleasures which you hear from the lips of my beloved, and of those elegances which you behold in her deportment and address."

The fourth day.—1. The Bride says explicitly, that these occurrences happened in a dream, "I slept;"—which at once removes all ideas of indecency, as to the Bridgroom's attempt to visit her, her going to the door, standing there, calling him, being found by the watchmen, beaten, wounded, &c. Moreover, she seems to have supposed herself to be previously married; by mentioning her lapid, or deep veil, which in reality, we presume, she had not yet worn, as the marriage had not actually taken place; and, though betrothed, she probably did not wear it till the wedding. That the word heart in this passage means imagination, dreaming imagination, fancy, appears from Eccles. ii. 23: "The days of laborious man are sorrows; his doing vexations, yea, even in the night-time his heart does not rest." he is still dreaming of still engaged about, the subject of his daily labors.—This sense of the word heart is not uncommon in the Proverbs.

2. The voice, that is, sound, of my beloved, knocking. For the same reasons for which we have rendered voice, music, in the Second Day, (2) we have rendered voice, sound, in this place; since the sound of a rattling against a door is not properly a voice; and since the

The pools of Heshbon afford a different comparison to the eyes of the Bride; dark, deep, and serene, are her eyes; so are those pools, dark, deep, and serene:—but when they are surrounded by a border of dark-colored marble, analogous to the border of sibiun drawn along the eye-rids of the spouse, and rendering them apparently larger, fuller, deeper? As this comparison is used where ornaments of dress are the particular subjects of consideration, we think it not impossible to be correct; and certainly it is by no means contradictory to the ideas contained in the simile recently illustrated. (See No. 9. in the Fifth Distr.) For the particulars of the Dress, see the Plates of dresses and their explanations, infra.

7. Decorated as Tzizah, &c. The whole of this eclogue, we apprehend, is composed of military allusions and phrases; consequently the cities, with the mention of which it opens, were those most famous for handsome fortifications. "Thou art [ver] decorated as Tzizah:—[naweq] adorned as Jerusalem—[amin] ornamented in a splendid, sparkling, radiant manner, as banded ranks, or corps of soldiers, are ornamented; which is not far from the compliment formerly paid here as resembling an officer of cavalry, riding with dignity among the horse of Pharaoh: nor is it unlike the reference of the prince himself to a [fiery] standard, in the preceding eclogue. See what is said on the banner of the heavens in a following verse: these banners, we must recollect, were flaming fire-pots, usually carried on the top of a staff.

8. Wheel about thine eyes: literally, do that return, or, at least, turn round: but this phrase is not in our language either military or poetical; we have, therefore, adopted a word of command, whose import is of the same nature, and whose application has been sufficiently familiar to us of late.

9. My station, literally, my region, the ground I occupy with my troops, my post, in a military sense; which station you attack, and by your attack force me to give ground, to retire; you drive me off, overpower me, advance into my territories, and, in spite of my resistance, add them by victory and conquest to your own. These are clearly military ideas, and therefore, we suppose, are expressed in military terms.

10. Here follow four lines, or verses, repeated from the second eclogue of the second day. They have every appearance of being mere duple of the former passage. It should seem rather unlikely that, in so short a poem, such a duplication should be inserted intentionally. Whether these lines replace others which should be here, or merely are a repetition, the reader will judge for himself by the connection, or want of connection, of the passage.

* Dazzling as the streamers? a comet. The reader will probably be startled at this idea, as we also should have been, had we not accidentally met with the following Arabic verses in Richardson:

When I describe your beauty, my thoughts are perplexed.
Whether to compare it
To the sun, to the moon, or to the wandering star
A comet.

Now this idea completes the climax of the passage, which was greatly wanted; so that the comparisons stand, (1.) day-break, a small glimmering light; (2) the moon; (full moon?) (3) the sun clearly shining; (4) the comet; which, seen by night, is dazzling; as it were, the fiery banner, or streamer of the host. Here the poet has ever been among the most terrific objects to the eyes of the simple Arab, on whose deep blue sky it glows in tremendous perfection. Is this word plural by emphasis—meaning, the chief of streamers; the streamer, par excellence.

The comparison of a lady to the full moon is frequently adopted in Arabia:

She appeared like the full moon in a night of joy, delicate in limbs, and elegant of stature.

We cannot refrain from observing how happily this comet illustrates the simile, in Jude 13: "Wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." As the apostle uses the word planetes, it has been usual to suppose he alludes to neighboring orbs, the planetes, whose motions appear very irregular; sometimes direct, sometimes stationary, sometimes retrograde; but, if we refer his expression to cometas, then we see at once how they may be said to remain in perpetual darkness, after their brilliancy is extinct; which idea is not applicable to the planets. We may add, that the Chaldeans held cometas to be a species of planets, (Senec. Quest. Nat.) that the Pythagoreans included cometas among planets which appear after very long intervals, (Arist. Meteor. lib. I.) and that the Egyptians calculated their periods and predicted their return.

11. Affection, heart. The Bride had told us before, in No. 1. that, while she slept, her affection, heart, imagination, was awake; the heart, among the Hebrews, was the seat of the affections; but, here, the Bridegroom says, while he was really awake, and therefore fully master of his senses, and of his actions, his affection overcame his intentions, and brought him back, unsurpassed to himself, unconsciously, or velens velens, as we say will he not he, toward the object of his regard. This, then, is a stronger idea than the former; and is heightened by his notice of the swiftness with which he was brought back; equal to that of the rapid chariots of his people; flying to engage the enemy; literally, chariots of my people pouring out (12); now, this pouring out bodily means a review; but if it do, it must point, especially, to the most rapid movement of that exercise; that is, the charge; if it mean poured out in battle, it amounts to the same; a charge on the enemy, executed with great velocity; but some say, "charge," but if it means a review, the phrase is used by Pharoel, in Gen. xlii. 40, and by Solomon here.

12. Face about: literally, turns round; but as this is no military phrase, as already observed, the expression adopted seems to be more coincident with the general tenor of this eclogue.

14. This phrase, which literally is, that we may fasten our eyes on thee, we have ventured to render reconnoitre thee; for it appears, that they would fasten their eyes on her, as they did on encampments around camps; which can be nothing but what modern military language would term reconnoitring.

15. What, or how, would you fasten your eyes on Selomer?—Like as we do on the ditches, fosses, or encampments of the camps. In this sense the root is used, in 2 Sam. xx. 15; 1 Kings xxii. 33; Ism. xxvi. 1; Lam. ii. 1. On the whole, then, it appears, that these are military terms; and it must be owned that they prodigiously augment the variety of the poem, and give a highly spirited air to this eclogue in particular; they account, too, for the lively interference of the Bridegroom's companions, and, by the rapid repartee they occasion, they close it very differently from all the others, and with the greatest animation and vivacity.

The fifth day.—1. Feet in sandals. See the Plate of the Bride's Dress.

2. Daughter of liberality, or of princes. Here the same word occurs as we observed signified (Fourth Day, No. 12.) pouring out; it is usually rendered princes, from the opportunity enjoyed by persons of high rank, of pouring out their liberality on proper occasions; and perhaps such is its import in this place. Daughter, in the looser sense of the word, not descendant, but patrones of pouring out, of liberality, who hast spared no expense, on this occasion, to adorn thyself with the most costly apparel; q. d. "Daughter of liberality, how magnificent! bow elegant! bow attractive is thy dress; the whole together is beautiful; the parts separately are rich and ornamental! We shall consider and commend them in their order."

As the Bride stands up, the ladies begin with describing her sandals; and they not only praise her sandals, but her feet in them. The reader will perceive, by inspecting the prints, that this is extremely accurate; as sandals do not hide the feet, but permit their every beauty to be seen; and although our ladies, being accustomed to wear shoes, may think more of a handsome shoe than of a handsome foot, the taste in the East is different. We know that the Roman emperor Claudius decorated his toes with gems, no less than his fingers; and was so proud of his handsome foot, that whereas other sovereigns used to give their hands to be kissed by their subjects, on certain occasions, he gave his foot for that purpose; which some historians have attributed to pride of station; others to pride of person, as if his handsome foot would otherwise have been overlooked, and deprived of its due admiration. Observe, these ladies begin at the Bride's sandals, her feet, and their descriptions ascend; the Bridegroom always begins with her locks, her hair, &c. and his descriptions descend, but not so low as the feet.

3. The seldawees of thy drawers. This word [chemux] is derived from the same root as that in the Second Day rendered "my beloved was turned away," it signifies, therefore, to turn, to turn back; now, what can more correctly describe the seldawee of a piece of cloth, &c. which is made by the return of the threads back again, to where they came from, that is, across the cloth? The threads, by perpetually turning and returning, compose the edge of the cloth; which we conceive to be the very article described by the use of the word in this place; but if it be the edge of the garment, the thought is the same; since that is the natural situation for an ornamental pattern of open work.

4. Drawers. This word can never mean thighs as thighs have no seldawees, it must mean drawers or the dress of the thighs. See the Plate of Egytian DRESSES, infra.

5. Open-work; pointless. Which of these words should be adopted depends on what materials these drawers were made of; if they were of muslin, then the open-work is wrought with a needle, as muslin with needle pinking; but if they were of silk, then they might be adorned with flowers, &c. cut into them by means of a sharp iron, struck upon the silk, and cutting out those parts which formed the pattern. And this, we apprehend, is the correct meaning of the word; it signifies to prick full of holes—to wound—to pierce—to make an opening—to run through, as with a sword: all which ideas agree perfectly with our rendering, pinking; which consists in piercing silk full of holes, with a steel instrument, forcibly struck through its subject. This determines for silk drawers; however, open-work pinking do not disagree in phraseology.

6. Girdle-clasp. See the Plate of Egyptian DRESSES, Nos. 6, 9.

7. Rich in mingled wine: the original is, not poor; an expression doubtless adopted by the poet for the sake of his verse; the difference between rendering "rich," and "not poor," needs no apology. The idea is, that this clasp was set with rubies; and sir William Jones tells us, it is very common among the Arabian poets to compare rubies to wine; hence he begins one of his translations from the Arabic, "Boy, bid you liquid ruby flow!"—meaning that he should pour out wine from the vessel which contained it.

8. Nipples. See No. 15. Third Day, where this allusion has already occurred.

9. Eyes like the pools of Hebron; (see No. 6, in Fourth Day) that is, darkened by a streak of stibium drawn all round them; as those pools are encompassed by a border of black marble. Probably, too, the form of these pools was oval rather than circular.

10. Thy nose like the tower of Lebanon. If the former line had not alluded to a place, whereby this line should require allusion to a place also, we should have inclined to risk a version derived from the roots of these words; which would stand thus:

Thy nose like a tower of whiteness itself; Which overlooks the levels [thv cheekos, &c.]

We are persuaded that this gives the true conception of the passage, even if referred to a structure called the tower of Lebanon; for Damascus is situated on a level plain; or this tower might stand so as to overlook some of those level plains which are interspersed in the mountains of Lebanon. Such, however, is the general idea; an erect tower, but of whatever other qualities is not determined. It might be desirable to render the foregoing verse also according to its roots; but the mention of the gate of Batrabbim forbids; and if Hebron be of necessity retained, then, for the sake of the parallelism, we think we must retain also Lebanon and Damascus; of course, the comparisons are entirely local. See No. 11. Third Day.

11. Carmel. (12.) *Areopagam. We confess our embarrassment on the subject of these words.

13. Entangled. This word (assur) is used to signify the entangling power of love. Mr. Harmer interprets Eccles. vii. 36: "I find more bitter than death the woman whose bands are (assurias) bands;" the general sense of the word is confinement, restraint, bondage; so that our word entangled seems to express the idea sufficiently.

The idea that the king's heart was entangled in the numerous and beautiful braids of hair which adorned the head of his spouse, seems plausible enough, from the customs of oriental females, and the general scope of the passage; but a particular and applicable authority is furnished in an ode of the Pend-Namih, (p. 287, 288.) translated from the Persian by baron Silvestre de Sacy. One or Jami on the Tresses of his Mistress.—"O thou, who hast entangled my heart in the net of thy ringlets! the name alone of thy curling hair is become a snare for hearts. Yes, all hearts are ensnared (as in the links of a chain) in the (links) ringlets of thy hair; each of thy curls is a snare and chains. O thou, whose curls hold me in captivity, it is an honor for thy slave to be fettered by the chains of thy ringlets. What other veil could so well become the fresh roses of thy complexion, as that of thy black curls [fragrant] like musk? Birds fly by the net; but, most wonderful! my never quiet soul delights in the chains of thy tresses! Thy curls inhabit a region higher than that of the moon. Ah! how high is the region of thy tresses! It is from the deep night of thy curls that the day-break of felicity rises at every instant for Jami, thy slave!"

The reader will probably think this rhapsody sufficiently exalted; it is, however, a not inconsiderable specimen of the poetical exuberance of fancy and figurative language in which the orientals envelope their ideas, when inspired by the power of verse, and frenzied by the fascinations of beauty.

14. Measurers. This word (rethim) signifies to run down, with a tumultuous motion, or winding way, as of a stream, or rill of water; so Jacob's rods were placed in the rills, rivulets, gutters; in the watering-troughs; (Gen. xxx. 38, 40.) so the daughters of Renah filled the troughs, watering-places, for the sheep to drink from; (Exod. ii. 16.) not raised wooden troughs, such as our horses drink out of, but rills running among the stones, &c. This we have expressed by the word measurers; derived from the numerous bendings of the river Meander, and now naturalized in our language, in reference to streams and winding rivulets, &c. The trough into which Rebekah emptied the contents of her pitcher (Gen. xxiv. 20.) is described by a different word, and might be properly a trough.

15. Thy stature equals the palm. See the Plate of the Bride's Dress, infra.

16. Thy address; literally, thy palate; but this must refer to speech of some kind; the Bride had formerly told the youth, "be swift in thy speech, and rich in thy honey" and now he says, "her palate dropped wine—prime wine!" we have the lips and the palate noticed together, to the same purpose, in Prov. v. 3:—

The lips of a strange woman drop liquid honey.

And her palate drops what is smoother than oil.

It is evident the writer means her flattering words, her seductive discourses. The rendering "thy address" seems to coincide with the cheering and pervading effects of wine.

17. Going to be presented, as a special token of affectionate regard, to persons whose consummate integrity has been experienced; literally, going for love-favors to uprights (persons). Now, in such a case, a person would naturally select the very best wine in his power; he would not send the unripe, or the vapid, but the most cordial, the most valuable he could procure. We suspect that the Bridegroom compliments himself, under the character of a friend, whose integrity could not be doubted. (For the sense of consummate or complete, as that of the word Jasur, or Jasurum, see the article Jashur.)

18. Should this chasm be filled up with

...... and he is mine?

19. Dudaim. See the article Mandrake.

20. Our loaves—that is, the upper part of our gates or openings. As it is evident they were places to contain stores of fruit from the last year's gathering, the word loaves is as proper as any to convey that idea. It might be added, that presents of fruit, especially apples, by yonder to their beloveds, are well known among the Greek poets; indeed, the practice almost became a custom, and originated a proverb, "He loves her with apples;"—as we say "with cakes and comfits."

21. Thou shouldst conduct me. The reader's attention has already been drawn to this passage; without departing from the usual translation of the words, we have merely referred them to the proper speaker.

22. Should this chasm be filled up with

By the starting antelope, by the timid deer of the field?

It is inserted by the LXX, and the passage is imperfect without the usual termination.

The sixth day.—1. Sociability. This seems to be pretty nearly the import of the original term, which occurs only in this place. Since, as we conceive, the parties sat in the pelasquin opposite to each other, the Bride could hardly be said to be leaning on her beloved; nor joining herself to her beloved, as some have proposed to render it; nevertheless, that a kind of free intercourse after marriage is meant here, which would not have been so proper before marriage, admits of no doubt; and we think the chagchat of sociability may answer the meaning of the word. The following conversation is probably a continuation of, or at least of the nature of, that intended by the term sociability.

2. I urged thee; that is to say. I would not let thee indulge thy bashfulness, but brought thee forward to the marriage ceremony, and overcame thy maiden dilatoriness. "That would be woeful, and not unsought be won."

3. Thy mother delivered thee. The word signifies to deliver over, as a pledge is delivered over, to the person who receives it, or to be brought forward, or brought out for that purpose. The reader may discover, under the uncoutn idiom of our translators, this very idea: "There thy mother brought thee forth? that is, as a pledge is brought forth to be delivered to a person who stands out of the house to receive it. (See Deut. xxiv. 10, 11.) That this is sufficiently unhappily expressed, we suppose no judicious reader will hesitate to admit. But what shall we say to the Romish rendering of this passage: "There thy mother was corrupted; there she was deflowered that bare thee!"—and then—such mysteries! In reference to Eve, the general mother, &c.

4. As a signet on thy arm. See the article Seals.

5. Our sister, or cousin, or friend, &c. The word sister is not always used—strictly—in the Hebrew, in reference to consanguinity.—The youth of this party is denoted by the phrase—her breast is not grown to its proper size; the size of the person was extremely remarkable; Juvenal describes the breasts of an Egyptian woman as being larger than the child she suckled.

6. Kiosks are pavilions, or little closets projecting from a wall for the purpose of overlooking the surrounding country; like our summer-houses, &c. In the East they are, also, the indispensable places of repose, and of that voluptuous, tranquil gratification to which the inhabitants are urged by the heats of the climate.

7. As one who offered peace; literally, as one finding peace; but, perhaps, the sentiment is—"I appeared to him as inviting as the most delightful kiosk; a kiosk, in which he might be so delighted, that he would go no further in search of enjoyment." That peace often means prosperity is well known; indeed all good is, in the Hebrew language, as it were, combined and concentrated in the term peace.

8. Baal Ham Aun. We take this to be altogether an Egyptian term; Ham Aun is "progenitor Ham;"—Baal is "lord."—"The lord Ham our progenitor." This agrees perfectly with Egyptian principles. (See Ammon-No.) In fact, no other nation so long maintained, or had so just authority to maintain, its relation to Ham, who was commemorated in this country during many ages. This name of a place, decidedly Egyptian, confirms the general notion that the Bride was daughter to Pharaoh.

9. Inspector. This is the office which had been held by the Bride, when in her own country; but here it is expressed in the plural; implying, probably, an inferiority from that of the princess, though to the same purposes, &c.

10. The tenant; literally, the man; that is, as we understand it, the chief man, the first tenant, the occupier; the same here as we have taken "the man" for the commander, in No. 4. Third Day, that is, the chief, or head man, as we speak; not each man distributively, but the man emphatically; for, if there were many tenants, did each bring a thousand silverlings? so as to make, say ten thousand; then, not state the larger number? or did all which the tenants brought make up one thousand? then, why not use the plural, form men? Moreover, since two hundred, which is one fifth of a thousand, was due to the inspectors, it reminds us, that this is the very proportion established in Egypt by Joseph, Gen. xlviii. 24. This is convincing evidence that this princess was from Egypt; and proves that, for purposes of protection, &c. this due was constantly gathered by the reigning prince. We suppose she hints at her father's government, under this allusion to these inspectors; and is still Egyptian enough to insist on the propriety of paying the regular tribute to his sovereignty, as governor in chief. An extract from Mr. Swinburne's account of a similar estate among the Spanish Arabs may explain the nature of these fruiteries, and their profits: "I cannot give you a more distinct idea of this people than by translating a passage in an Arabic manuscript, in the library of the Escurial, entitled, 'The History of Granada, by Abi Abdallah ben Alkalibi Aboaneni,' written in the year of the Hegira 776, A. D. 1378; Mahomet Lago, being then, for the second time King of Granada. It begins by a description of the city and its environs, nearly in the following terms: 'The city of Granada is surrounded with the most spacious gardens, where the trees are set so thick as to resemble a hedge; and so as to hide the beautiful towers of the Alhambra, which glitter like so many bright stars over the green forests. The plain, stretching far and wide, produces such quantities of grain and vegetables that no revenues but those of the first families in the kingdom are equal to their annual produce. Each garden is calculated to bring in a net income of five hundred pieces of gold, (auri,) out of which it pays thirty four to the king. Beyond these gardens lie fields of various culture, at all seasons of the year clad in the richest verdure, and loaded with some valuable vegetable production or other; by this method a perpetual succession of crops is secured, and a great annual rent is produced, which is said to amount to twenty thousand aurei. Adjoining you may see the sumptuous farms belonging to the royal domains, wonderfully agreeable to the beholder, from the large quantity of plantations of trees and the variety of plants. The vineyards in the neighborhood bring fourteen thousand aurei. Immense are the boards of all species of dried fruits, such as figs, raisins, plums, &c. They have also the secret of preserving grapes sound and juicy from one season to another.

[Comp. Fifth Day, no. 26.] "N. B. I was not able to obtain any satisfactory account of these gardens aurei, gold coins."—(Swinburne's Travels in Spain, Letter xiii. p. 164.)

We have supposed that this Sixth Day is the day of marriage; as this has not usually been understood, we shall connect some ideas which induce us to consider it in that light. Leo of Modena says, that (1.) "The Jews marry on a Friday, if the spouse be a maid;" (Thursday, if a widow)—Now Friday morning is the time of this ecolage, supposing the poem began with the first day of the week. (2.) "The Bride is adored, and led out into the open air; so, in this ecolage, the Bride's mother "brings her out," for that purpose;—(3.) "into a court or garden? so, in this ecolage, the ceremony passes "under a citron-tree," consequently in a garden. This ecolage, then, opens with observation of the nuptial procession after marriage; and we learn that the ceremony had taken place by the following conversation, in which the Bridegroom alludes to the marriage, not of his Bride having required some address to overcome. Moreover, the Bride solicits the maintenance of perpetual constancy to herself, as implied in the connection now completed; with attention to the interests of a particular friend, she transfers all her private property to her husband, yet reserves a government due to her royal parent in Egypt; and the ecolage closes, both itself and the poem, by mutual wishes for more of each other's conversation and company. See the article Marriage.

It is now time to conclude our investigation of this poem; but we must previously observe, how perfectly free it is from the least soil of indecency; that allusions to matrimonial privacies which, have been fancied in it, are absolutely groundless fancies; and that, not till the Fifth Day, is there any allusion to so much as a kiss, and then it is covered by the accommodation of the party to a sucking infant brother. The First Day is distance itself; in point of conversation; the Second has no conversation but what passes from the garden below up to the first-floor window; the Third Day is the same in the morning; and the evening is an invitation to take an excursion, and survey prospects; as to the comparison to a well, delicacy itself must admire, not censure, the reader perceives the inclination of the dreamer, and the progress of her affection; but the Bridegroom himself does not hear it, nor is he more favored by it, or for it; on the contrary, the lady permits him in the evening to sport his military terms as much as he thinks proper; but she does not, by a single word, acquaint him of any breach he had made in her heart. We rather suspect, that she rises to retire somewhat sooner than usual, thereby counterbalancing, in her own mind, those effusions of kindness to which she had given vent in the morning. The Fifth morning is wholly occupied by the ladies' praises of the Bride's dress; she herself does not utter a word; but, in the evening of that day, as the marriage was to take place on the morrow, she merely hints at what she could find in her heart to do, were he her infant brother; and for the first time he hears the adjuration, "if his left arm was under her head," on the daim cushion, &c. and the discourse, though evidently meant for her lover, yet is equivocally allusive to her supposed fondling. It must be admitted, that after the marriage they make a procession, according to the custom of the place and station of the parties, in the same palanquin together, and here they are a little sociable; but modesty itself will not find the least fault with this sociability, nor with one single sentence, or sentiment, uttered on this occasion.

We appeal now to the reader, understanding, and sensibility of the reader, whether it be possible to conduct a six-day conversation between persons solemnly betrothed to each other, with greater delicacy, greater attention to the most rigid virtues, with greater propriety of sentiment, discourse, action, demeanor, and deportment. The dignity of the persons is well sustained in the dignity of their language, in the correctness of their ideas and expressions; they are guilty of no repetitions; what they occasionally repeat they vary, and improve by the variation; they speak in poetry, and poetry furnishes the images they use; but these images are pleasing, magnificent, varied, and appropriate; they are, no doubt, as they should be, local, and we do not feel half their propriety because of their locality; but we feel enough to admit, that few are the authors who could thus happily conduct such a poem; few are the personages who could sustain the characters in it; and few are the readers in any nation, or in any time, who have not unable cause to admire it, and to be thankful for its preservation as the Song of Songs!

Being well persuaded that the reader has never truly seen this poem before, and that (though it has always been in our Bibles in prose) under the present arrangement it becomes a new poem, we have directed more attention to be given to the Plates than perhaps otherwise might have been done; these must speak for themselves; we only say, further, that in regard to the arrangement of the poem, our opinion advances toward a pretty strong persuasion of its correctness; but as to the version, our endeavor has been to make that speak English.
CANTICLES

EXPLANATION OF THE PLATE.

VEHICLES.—Mr. Taylor has collected representations of several descriptions of those carriages which are used in the East, and which are supposed to be alluded to in the opening of the Second Day of this poem. We select the most important.

"Behold how seated, placed in his carriage, thus; looking out through the aperture, or front window. Gleaming, shewing himself, or rather, being just visible, just glimmering through, or between the lattices, perhaps appended to the apertures in front of the carriage. This engraving represents a travelling carriage; not a carriage for state orsplendor. But in the Third Day we have the description of a superb and stately equipage, different, no doubt, from the former, because built expressly by the royal lover, to suit the dignity of his intended nuptials. Such a palanquin we have in the accompanying engraving, and this may be more particularly examined by the description given in the poem. "King Solomon hath built for himself a nuptial palanquin; its pillars" (or what we should call its poles) "are made of cedar wood?—Lebanon wood: perhaps, indeed, the whole of its wood-work might be cedar; but the poles, as being most conspicuous, are mentioned in the first place. Now, it is every way unlikely that Solomon would make these pillars of silver, as we read in our common versions; the use of silver poles does not appear; but the top, covering, seats, or cushions—literally the eggplant and surmounting part, that which might be rolled up—was of silver tissue. This canopy, or roof, is clearly seen in the engraving; and it is ornamented with tassels, and a deep kind of hanging fringe, perhaps of silver also. But the lower carriage, or bottom, was of golden tissue, meaning that part which hangs by cords from the pillars or poles; that part in which the person sat—literally, the "ridden-on part, which we have rendered the carriage—was of gold. The internal part of this carriage was covered with purple or with cloth; this a finely-wrought carpet, adorned with flowers, mottes, &c. in colors, as some have supposed? How, then, was it purple? as the word is always held to denote. We see at each end of the carriage a kind of platform, over which the person was to be rolled on his back. Is this covered with chintz? or very fine calico? Was such the carriage-line of Solomon's palanquin, but worked with an ornamental pattern of needle-work, and presented to the king by the daughters of Jerusalem? We presume we have now approached nearly to a just understanding of this poetical description: no doubt, the royal vehicle was both elegant and splendid. We have attempted to distinguish its parts, with their particular applications. The propriety of our departing from the customary mode of understanding these verses must now be left to the reader's decision; but if the words of the original be so truly descriptive of the parts of this carriage, as we have supposed, we may anticipate that decision with some satisfaction.

EGYPTIAN DRESSES.—There are two ideas which ought to be examined before we can justly ascertain the particulars of the Bride's appearance: first, Was her dress correspondent to those of the East in general? or, secondly, as she was an Egyptian, was her dress peculiarly in the Egyptian taste? To meet these inquiries, we propose to offer a few remarks on the peculiarities of Egyptian dress, presuming that some such might belong to the dress worn by this lady; and indeed, that these are what give occasion to the admiration of the ladies of the Jerusalem harem; who, observing her magnificent attire, compliment every part of that attire, as they proceed to inspect it, in the following order. See the notes in illustration of the Fourth Day.

1. Sandals. See Bride's Dress, infra.
2. Sewedges of thy thigh apparel.—We have already examined the import of this word. If we look at the accompanying figure, we shall find, that, in front of the drapery which descends down the thigh, from the waist to the ankle, that is to say, where the edges of the drapery meet in front, is a handsome border of open-work; this is very distinct, and it answers exactly to the description and words used to denote it in the poem; it is, (1), at the return—the sewedge—of the drapery; (2) it appertains to the thigh, and accompanies it like a petticoat; (3) it is pined, or open-worked, and brought into a pattern, which has evidently cost great labor, the performance of excellent hands! This figure is truly Egyptian; for it is from the Islaen Table. We find the same kind of ornament worn by Grecian ladies, but on the outside of the thigh, as appears in the Hamilton vase. Whether we read returning edge, sewedge, or front borders, &c. of this drapery, is indifferent to the idea here stated.

Bodice, body vest. See Bride's Dress, infra.

8. Nipples. (1) See the engraving under the article Bra, where the nipples are just discernible through the very fine gauze, which covers the bosom. (2) Observe that the Egyptian figures above have the breast and nipple entirely naked: each has a kind of neckring, which crosses the bosom, and is brought between the breasts, so that the wearer might have covered the breast had she pleased; but the breast itself is left—as if carefully left—uncovered, in all these figures: we presume, therefore, that this was, anciently, a customary mode of dress, rendered necessary by the heat of the country. It appears on various mummies, and on many other Egyptian representations. Sonnini says, (vol. iii. p. 204), "The Egyptian women have no other clothing than a long shift, or jacket, of blue cloth, with sleeves of an extraordinary size. This manner of dressing themselves by halves, so that the air may circulate over the body itself, and refresh every part of it, is very comfortable in a country where close or thick habits would make the heat intolerable. We must not judge of the propriety of Egyptian costume by the necessary defences against the variations and changes of northern climates. The reader will observe the head-dress in this figure; the hair, which we pre-
CANTICLES

Bride's Dress.

This figure represents an oriental lady in full dress, from Le Bruyn. The reader will observe the head-dress, which consists of a cap set with pearls in various forms, the centre hanging over the forehead. On the top of this cap rise a number of spires of jewelled work, which imitate, in precious stones, the natural colors, &c. of the flowers they are meant to represent. The stems are made of gold or silver wires; and the leaves, we suppose, are made of colored foil. We saw, in the former plate, that Egyptian ladies wore a high-rising composition of ornaments; and we see in this figure, a composition little, if at all, less aspiring. In fact, then, this head-dress renders very credible the idea of our translators, "thy head-dress upon thee is like Carmel!"—whether, by Carmel, we understand mount Carmel, in which case the allusion may be to the trees growing on it; or, as the word signifies, a fruitful field, whose luxuriant vegetation displays the most captivating abundance. From the cap of this head-dress hangs a string of pearls, which, passing under the chin, surrounds the countenance. We observe, also, on the neck, a collet of gems, and three rows of pearls. These are common in the East; and something of this nature, we presume, is what the Bridegroom alludes to, when he says, Eloquence II. in the First Day, "Thy cheeks are bright, or splendid, with bands, thy neck with collets of gems, or of splendid or shining substances, disposed as embellishments. Observe, also, the ornaments suspended by a gold chain, which hangs from the neck. These, though not, strictly speaking, girdle-clasps, yet have much the same effect in point of decoration; and are composed of precious stones, including, no doubt, rubies, "rich in mingled colors." Observe the rings worn on the fingers; the wrist-bands of the vest, the flowers bordered on it, on the veil, &c. The figure also shows distinctly the difference between locks and treusses of hair. The locks are those which hang loosely down the temples and cheek: the treusses are those brands which naturally hang down the back; but which, in order to show their length, are in this instance brought forward over the shoulder. The reader will observe how these are plaited. Now, this mode of dressing the hair seems to have little allusion to the color of put, le, or to require purple-colored ribands, or ribands of any color. It may rather be fancied to resemble a mode of weaving, such as might be practiced at Arach, or Erecch, whence it might be denominated Arachmen, that is, "from the city of Arach"? and, could we be admitted, we should perhaps find something like the following ideas in this passage: "Thy head-dress is a diffuse, spreading appearance, like vegetation and flowers [q. chenille]?" "Thy treusses are close, compact, stuck together like an intimately woven or worked texture"—say a carpet, diaper, calicis. It is true, this figure shows only a few treusses; but we ought to extend our conception to a much greater number; for lady Montaguer says, "I never saw, in my life, so many fine heads of hair. In one lady's I have counted a hundred and ten treusses, all natural." Now, what numerous intricacies, meanderings, convolutions, &c., would a hundred and ten treusses furnish by dexterous plaiting! And as long hair, capable of such ornamental disposition, was esteemed a capital part of personal beauty, how deeply, how inextricably, was the king—his affection—entangled in such a labyrinth of charms, adorned in the most becoming manner, and displayed to the greatest advantage! The sex has always been proud of this natural ornament; and, when art and taste have well arranged it, all know that its effects are not inconsiderable. The reader will recollect, that we have already stated embarrasmants on the subject of the word Arachmen. We have taken some pains to examine passages where it occurs; but we cannot in the opinion that it means purple; that is, the color of purple only. Nevertheless, as all the dictionaries, and lexicons, and concordances, are against us, we suspend our determination.

There is a figure in Sodis, which shows the sandals, not only adorned with flowers, wrought on them, but which, being sandals only, permit the whole foot to be seen; and being heighteners, they make the wearer seem so much taller than otherwise she would be, that the Bridegroom may well compare his bride to a palm-tree, up to whose top he designs to climb, that he may procure its fruit. This figure also shows an ornament around the ankle, and a girdle, perhaps of silver embroidery.

This engraving is from Estampes du Levant, and will assist to illustrate the comparison which our public translation (chap. ii. 2) renders, "thy belly is a heap of white fat not, strictly speaking, lilies." In the first place, instead of heap, read sheaf of wheat. Secondly, for belly, read bosom, or scarlet, that is, the covering of the belly. Thirdly, for set about, read bound about, or tied up with a band of lilies. In short, the comparison is—a vest of gold tissue, tied up with a broad girdle of white satin, or of silver tissue, like that of this figure, to a sheaf of wheat standing on its end, and tied round its middle by a broach of lilies, twisted into itself, whose heads would naturally hang down loosely, like the end of the girdle of this figure. Having given the above as our idea of this comparison, it may be proper to say, that if the words set about be absolutely retained, then the silver flowers on this ground of gold tissue may answer that idea; but this does not appear to be so correct a translation. We may be allowed also to observe, how entirely this explanation removes every impecuniosity to which our public translation is exposed; and how greatly it is recommended by its simplicity.

The investigation of the Bride's dress may be closed with propriety by the following description of a dress worn by lady Montague as given by herself; also, that of the fair Fatima, of whom she says, "She was dressed in a copse of gold brocade, flowered with silver, very well fitted to her shape, and she hung a chintz upon the beauty of her bosom, only shaded by the thin gauze of her shift. Her drawers were pale pink, her waistcoat green and silver; her slippers white satin, finely embroidered; her lovely arms encased with harness of diamonds; and her broad girdle set around with diamonds; upon her head a rich Turkish handkerchief of pink and silver, her own fine black hair, hanging a great length, in various tresses; and on one side of her head some bracelets of jewels. When I took my leave, two maid's brought in a fine silver basket of embroidered handkerchiefs; she begged I would wear the richest for her sake, and gave the others to my woman and interpreter." (The noun, love-favors, of our poem, passages.) The first part of my dress is a pair of drawers; very full, that reach to my shoes, and conceal the legs more modestly than your petticoats. They are of a thin rose-colored damask, brocaded with silver flowers. My shoes are of white kid leather, embroidered with gold. Over this hangs my smock, of a fine white silk gauze, edged with embroidery. This smock has wide sleeves, hanging half way down the arm, and is closed at the neck with a diamond button; but the shape and color of the bosom was so very conspicuous, as to be distinguished through it. The cadiery is a waistcoat, made close to the shape, of white and gold damask, with very long sleeves falling back, and fringed with deep gold fringe, and should have diamond or pearl buttons. My capote, of the same stuff with my drawers, is a robe exactly fitted to my shape, and reaching to my feet, with very long, straight, falling sleeves. Over this is my girdle, of about four fingers broad, which all that can afford it have entirely of diamonds and other precious stones. Those who will not be at that expense have it of exquisite embroidery on satin; but it must be fastened before with a clasp of diamonds. The curd is a loose robe they throw off, or put on, according to the weather, being of a rich worsted stuff; that was formerly lined with ermine or sables; the sleeves reach very little below the shoulders. The head-dress is composed of a cap, called talpeck, which is, in winter, of fine violet embroidered with pearls or diamonds, and in summer of white linen, with three ribbons; the same as is fastened on one side of the head, hanging a little way down, with a gold tassel, and bound on, either with a circle of diamonds (as I have seen several) or a rich embroidered handkerchief. On the other side of the head, the hair is laid flat; and here the ladies are at liberty to show their favours; some putting flowers, others a plume of heron's feathers, and in short what they please; but the most general fashion is a large bouquet of jewels, made like natural flowers; that is, the buds of pearl; the roses of different colored rubies; the jessamines of diamonds; the jonquilles of topazes, &c. so well set and enamelled, it is hard to imagine any thing of that kind so beautiful. The hair hangs at its full length behind, divided into tresses braided with pearls or ribbons, which is always in great quantity. I never saw in my life so many fine heads of hair. In one lady's I have counted a hundred and ten of these tresses, all natural; but it must be owned, that every kind of beauty is more common here than with us. They generally shape their eyebrows; and both Greeks and Turks have the custom of putting round their eyes a black tincture, that, at a distance, or by candle light, adds very much to the blackness of them. They dye their nails a rose color; but, I own, I cannot enough accustom myself to the fashion to find any beauty in it." Letters xxix. xxxii.

BRIDEGROOM'S DRESS.

We have elsewhere (see Crown) bestowed some thoughts on the nature and shape of the royal crown of the kings of the Jews, and we wish now to recall those thoughts to the mind of the reader. We observed, that the crown of king Saul was called nazir, or separated; but a very different word, other, is used to express the circle, with which the mother of Solomon encircled his head on the day of his marriage. Our translation renders both these words by one English appellation, crown; and the word other is thus rendered, where, as it seems, it gives incorrect notions of the subject intended. In distinguishing the different forms of this part of dress, we consider the cap or crown, (or both ideas in one, the crowned cap,) in the annexed figure, as being the nazir, or "separated" cap of Scripture. This is a portrait of Tigranes, king of Armenia; and it contributes, with others, to authorize our distinction. In addition, however, to these, we have also representations of a cap, the separations of which are very evident behind; and one of these separated parts falls on each shoulder down the back of the wearer. This goes not only in corroboration of the proposed distinction in the form and nature of the crowns of Jewish monarchs, but also strongly tends to establish the nature of the shobets, or royal coat of close armor.

It was not, then, a royal cap of state, with which the mother of Solomon decorated his head at his nuptials; that was probably made by a more prosessed artist: neither was it proper to be worn at such a personal ceremony, but only on state occasions:—but, if the queen mother had taken pains to embroider a muslin fillet; if she had worked it with her own hands, and had cunningly woven it with a handsome pattern, then it was paying her a compliment, to wish the daughters of Jerusalem should go forth to admire the happy effects of this instance of maternal attention and decorative skill.

The accompanying portrait of Nadir Shah of Persia, from Fawer, shows his dress to abound in pearls, precious stones and golden embroidery. The manner of the king's sitting and the kind of throne on which he sits, may perhaps give some hint of the manner of the Bridegroom's sitting in the First Day. This is not the royal throne of state, the musnad of India; that is usually stationed in one place, where it is fitted up with all imaginable magnificence, and to which it is fixed; whereas this seat is movable, and is carried from place to place, as wanted. Some such seat was perhaps occupied by Solomon, when he visited his Bride; so that the king sat, while his companions stood on each hand of him, form-
It is necessary to distinguish the kind of throne; because there are (1.) the mumud itself, or throne of state—(2.) this kind of seat or settle—(3.) a kind of palanquin called takht revan, that is, moving throne—and others, all of which are thrones; but their names and application are not the same in the original text of Scripture.

This figure is copied from De la Valle, and is a portrait of Aurengzebe, the Mogul of India. Observe the pearls, &c., in his turban; the collets of pearls and gems hanging from his neck; the same at his wrists: so the Bride says of her Prince, “his wrists, that is, his wrists, and his ornaments at his wrists, are circlets of gold full set with topazes.” These topazes occupy the place of the pearls in our figure. Observe, also, his shoes, which, being gold embroidery, are the bases of purest gold, from which rise his legs, like pillars of marble. Observe, too, that the stockings, fitting pretty closely to the legs, give them an appearance much more analogous to pillars or columns, that when the drawers are full, and occupy a considerable space, as they are commonly worn in the East. The reader will remark the nature and enrichments of this girdle, which is, no doubt, of gold embroidery. The tent may give some idea of that of Solomon, to which the ladies compare the Bride; they say she is “attractive as the tent of Solomon; certainly so sentient so ornamented and enriched, so magnificently embellished, is attractive; attractive in the same manner as a magnificent dress, when worn by a person. If this tent be of black velvet, the golden enrichments embossed upon it must have a grand effect. It should be recollected, that the passage demands the strongest contrast possible to the “tents of Kedar,” or the black tents of wandering Arabs; and, were it not for a following verse, the reference should be to the Bride’s dress—discomposed—all in a flutter—after a long journey, from which she is, but alighted at the moment—rather than her person, or complexion, which subsequently is described as fair, &c., by terms absolutely incompatible with blackness or swarthiness. The coverings annually sent by the grand seignior for the holy house at Mecca, are always black. Mr. Morier has delineated a tent, intended to represent that of the prophet, the front of which is all but covered with jewels; the whole sides and the top with ornaments, shawl-patterns, &c. (Travels in Persia, vol. ii. p. 191.)

This is a portrait of the grand seignior, sultan Acheman. But it shows a girdle, or rather the clasp which fastens it, of a different nature from the former. This appears to be made of some solid material, (ivory, perhaps,) thickly studded over with precious stones, whereby it corresponds perfectly with that described by the Bride, as bright ivory over which the sapphire plays: for these gems may as well be sapphires as any other. The general appearance of the sultan’s figure is noble and majestic, and may answer, not inadequately, to the description given of her beloved by the Bride.

It would be a considerable acquisition to sacred literature if those incidents which are furnished by the Greek poets, and which resemble certain incidents in this poem, were collected for the purpose of comparison: they would be found more frequent and more identical than is usually imagined. But this purpose would be still more completely accomplished, by a comparison with those productions of the Persian and Hindoo poets, which have been brought to our knowledge by the diligence and taste of our countrymen in India. It may safely be said, that every line of the Hebrew poem may be illustrated from Indian sources. Even that incident, so revolting to our manners, of the lady’s going out to seek her beloved by night, is perfectly correct, according to Indian poetical costume, as appears by Calidass’s Meghas Divāta, (line 256, of Mr. Wilson’s translation,) also the Gilaguventa, translated by Sir William Jones, (Asiatic Researches, vol. iii.) and others, which have been subsequently added to the stores of English literature. Admitting, as the reader has seen supposed in this work, that the Egyptians were from India, and that Abraham, the father of the Hebrew nation, was also from the East; this conformity to the manners of the original country by an Egyptian princess, consort of a Hebrew king, could include no difficulty arising from any imputation of indecency: equally as the poet explicitly assigns the entire occurrence to a dream.

CAPERNAUM, a city on the western shore of the sea of Galilee, on the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali, and in which our Saviour principally dwelt during the three years of his public ministry, Matt. iv. 13; Mark ii. 1; John vi. 17. Buckingham, Burckhardt, and some other writers, believe it to have been the place now called Tabgha, or Tzib Huum, which is upon the edge of the sea, from 9 to 12 miles N. N. E. of Tiberias, and where there are ruins indicative of a considerable place at some former period. Dr. Richardson, however, in passing through the plain of Gennesareth, inquired of the natives whether they knew such a place as Capernaum; to which they replied, “Cavernamum wa Choasa, they are quite near, but in ruins.” This should, perhaps, induce us to fix the site of Capernaum farther south; but our Saviour’s denunciation against it seems to have been literally accomplished; and it has been cast down into the grave, for no satisfactory evidence has been found of the place on which it stood, Matt. xi. 23.
CAPPHAR, in Hebrew, signifies a field, or village; and hence we often find it in composition with other words, as Capheus, a field in the midst of the name of a city: because what had been a village, when augmented, becomes a city.

CAPHAR-SALAMA, or CAPHAR-SARAMA; the same, perhaps, as Caphar-Semolia; not far from Jerusalem, 1 Mac. vii. 31. Afterwards called Antipatris.

CAPHAR-SOREK. In Jerome's time there was a town of this name, north of Eleutheropolis, near Saran. It is thought to have been named from the brook or valley of Sorek, where Deilah lived, Judg. xvi. 4.

CAPITOR, CAPHTORIM. There is great difficulty in properly analyzing this appellation; some think it imports, "islands, every way surrounded by water." Homer refers it to one of the islands in the Nile: Abel thinks it is the same as Ribh, or Rihib, the Delta of Egypt. Bochart, following the Septuagint and the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan, takes Caphtor to be Cappadocia, on the Euxine; Calmet and others suppose the island of Crete to be the Caphtor of the Scriptures, chiefly on account of the resemblances between the laws and manners of the Cretans and Caphtorim, or Philistines. So also Gesenius and Rosenmüller. In Gen. x. 13, 14, it is said that the Philistines and Caphtorim went out from Egypt (probably to Crete,) and from thence the Philistines migrated to Canaan; see Amos ix. 7. Hence Jeremiah calls them (xlvi. 4) "the remnant of the island Caphtor." This opinion is also confirmed by the circumstances, that the Philistines are also called Cherethim, or Cherethites, equivalent to Cretans. That the Caphtorim, or Cherethim, and the Philistines, are the same people, is said beyond doubt. Ezekiel says, (ch. xxv. 15,) "I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the Cherethim." Zephaniah also says, (i. 5,) "Wo unto the inhabitants of the sea-coast, the Cherethites!" and 1 Sam. xxx. 14, 15. "The Amalekites made an irruption into the country of the Cherethites;" that is, of the Philistines, as the sequel proves. Afterwards, the kings of Judah had foreign guards called Cherethites and Pelethites, who were Philistines. See PHILISTINES.

CAPITATION OF THE JEWS. Moses ordained, (Exod. xxviii. 29,) "That every Israelite should pay half a shekel for his soul, or person, as a redemption, 'that there might be no plague among the people, when they were numbered.' Many interpreters are of opinion, that this payment was designed to take place every year. Moses says, (v. 31,) "And this payment of the half shekel per head being evaded when David numbered his subject: God punished the neglect with a pestilence," 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. But it is more generally thought that Moses laid this tax on all the people, payable yearly, for the maintenance of the tabernacle, for the sacrifices, wood, oil, wine, flour, habits, and subsistence of the priests and Levites. In our Saviour's time, the tribute was punctually paid. (See Didachema.) The Israelites, when returned from Babylon, paid one third part of a shekel to the temple; being disabled probably at that time, by poverty, from doing more, Nehem. x. 32. The rabbins observe, that the Jews in general, and even the priests, except women, children under thirteen years of age, and slaves, were liable to pay the half shekel. The collectors demanded it in the beginning of Nisan, but used no compulsion till the passover, when they either constrained its payment, or took security for it. After the destruction of the temple, the Jews were compelled to pay the half shekel, to the temple, as a tax, in the name of a city: because what had been a village, when augmented, becomes a city.

CAPPADOCIA, a region of Asia, adjoining Pontus, Armenia, Phrygia, and Galatia, (Acts ii. 9; 1 Petr. i. 1,) between the Halys, the Euphrates, and the Euxine. Ptolemy mentions the Cappadocians, and derives their name from a river, Cappadoc. They were formerly called Leuce-Syri, or "White Syrians," in opposition to those who lived south of the mountains, and more exposed to the sun. Such was their character for dulness and vice, that the following virulent epigram was written upon them:—

"Viperas Cappadocem nocturna mordit; at illa Gustato perit sanguine Cappadociae.

Cappadocia was also placed first in the proverb which cautioned against the three K's—Kappadocia, Kilicia, and Krato.

CAPTIVITY. God generally punished the sins of the Jews by captivitys or servitudes. The first captivity, however, from which Moses delivered them, should be considered rather as a permission of Providence, than as a punishment for sin. There were six captivities during the government by judges: (1) under Chushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, which continued about eight years; (2) under Egion, king of Moab, from which they were delivered by Elud; (3) under the Philistines, out of which they were rescued by Shungru; (4) under Jabin, king of Hazor, from which they were delivered by Deborah and Barak; (5) under the Midianites, from which Gideon freed them; (6) under the Ammonites and Philistines, during the judicatures of Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Eli, Samson and Samuel. But the most remarkable captivities of the Hebrews were those of Israel and Judah, under their regal government.

CAPTIVITIES OF ISRAEL.—(1) Tiglath-Pilezer took several cities, and carried away captives, principally from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, A. M. 3364. (2) Salmanasar destroyed Samaria, after a siege of three years, (A. M. 3283,) and transplanted the tribes which had been spared by Tiglath-Pilezer, to provinces beyond the Euphrates. (See further, infra.) It was usually believed, that there was no general return of the ten tribes from this captivity; but the prophets seem to speak of the return of the ten tribes under the Assyrian monarchs; Hos. xi. 11; Amos iv. 14; Obad. 20; Isa. xi. 12; Ezek. xxxvii. 16; Jer. xlv. 27; xlix. 2, &c.; Micah li. 12; Zech. ix. 3; x. 6, 10.) From the historical books we see that Israelites of the ten tribes, as well as of Judah and Benjamim, were carried into captivity. Among those who returned with Zerubbabel, are reckoned some of Ephraim and Manasseh, who settled at Jerusalem, among the tribe of Judah. When Ezra numbered those who had returned, he only inquired whether they were of the race of Israel; and at the first passenger celebrated in the temple after the return, was a sacrifice of twelve he-goats for the whole house of Israel, according to the number of the tribes, Ezra vi. 16, 17; viii. 35. Under the Maccabees, and during the time of our Saviour, we see that Palestine was peopled by Israelites of all the tribes, indifferently. The Samaritan chronicles asserts, that in the 35th year of the pontificate of Abelus, 3000 Israelites, by permission of king Sauleus, returned from captivity, under the conduct of Adus, son of Simeon.

CAPTIVITIES OF JUDAH.—These are generally reckoned four: (1) A. M. 3398, under king Jehoihakim, when Daniel and others were carried to Babylon; (2.) A. M. 3401, in the seventh year of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar carried 3023 Jews to Babylon; (3.) A. M. 3406, under Jehoiachin, whom this prince, with part of his people, was sent to Babylon; (4.) A. M. 3416, under Zedekiah. From this period begins the seventy years of captivity foretold by the prophet Jeremiah. In Babylon they had judges and elders who governed them, and decided matters in dispute juridically according to their laws.
Cyrus, in the first year of his reign at Babylon, (A. M.
3437,) permitted the Jews to return to their own country (Ezra i. 1.); but they did not obtain leave to rebuild the temple; and the completion of those prophecies, which foretold the termination of their captivity after seventy years, was not till A. M.
3486, when Darius Hystaspes, by an edict, allowed them to rebuild the temple.

It is worthy of inquiry, as involving the illustration of several passages of Scripture, whether the deportations of the Israelites and Judeans were total, or only partial. The following is the result of Mr. Taylor's investigations.

Under the article Canaan it has been suggested that the river Jordan, as it divided the country possessed by the Israelites, so divided the interests and the politics of that people. Hence it happened, occasionally, to divide the people, and it may be supposed that, while the north was in peace, and often the districts eastward of Jordan were oppressed or even subdued, before the shock was felt on the coasts of the Mediterranean sea. This at length proved the ruin of the whole nation. The two tribes and a half settled east of the Jordan,—as most exposed to invasions, yet least readily assisted, dwelling, too, in a country so very desirable as to attract the eye of activity, yet calculated rather to foster the spirit of independence; the wild inhabitants, being also, we may conjecture, best known by most of the passengers,—were the first to be carried into captivity by invaders from the north. From these districts, if once occupied by enemies, the transit was easy over the 'upland Jordan.' At that time the northern tribes of Israel were of course exposed to invasions of the conquerors; by whom, in the issue, they were displaced.
Judah retained its independence longer; but Judah
at length was invaded from the north, was subjugated by the prophet Jeremiah. At Babylon they treated like those of other conquered countries, being led away by the conqueror at his pleasure. But though we say the inhabitants were removed from their native country, yet it appears from incidental observations in Scripture, that for a long time, and by major Remmeln has offered several reasons for believing that only certain classes of this people were carried to Assyria, or to Babylon; and as this is an inquiry of some consequence, and leads to the consideration of that proportion of the people which returned to the land of Judaea in after-ages, we give the major's remarks pretty fully:—

"The eastern tribes were taken away by Tigrath-Pileser, about 740 B. C.; and this done, it appears, that the conqueror was driven by the king of Judah, against those of Israel and Syria, who threatened him. It is said (2 Kings xvi. 9) that 'the king of Assyria took Damascus, slew their king Resin, and carried the people captive to Kir;' by which the country of Assyria is unequivocally meant. But Josephus says (ANTIQUITIES, lib. x. cap. 12. 3) that they were sent to Upper Media; that Tigrath-Pileser sent a colony of Assyrians in their room; and that, at the same time, he afflicted the land of Israel, and took away many captives out of it. In 2 Kings xv. 29, it is said that Tigrath-Pileser, king of Assyria, took Ijon, and Abel-beth-Macah, Janoah, Kadesh and Hazor, and Gilead and Galilee; all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Syria.

But, in the same transaction, in 1 Chronicles xxv. 26, it is said, that Tigrath-Pileser 'carried away the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, and brought them to Halah, and to Abbor, and to Hara, and to the river of Gozan, unto this day.' Josephus, relating the same transaction, (ANTIQUITIES, lib. i. cap. 11.) says, that Tigrath-Pileser 'carried away the inhabitants of Gilead, Galilee, Kadesh and Hazor, and transplanted them into his own kingdom' by which,
in strictness, Assyria should be understood; but it appears from the book of Tobit, that Media was also subject to him; so that there is no contradiction.

We come, next in order, to the proper subject of the ten tribes. In 2 Kings xvii. 5, Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, is said to have carried away Israel into Assyria, and to have placed them in Halah, and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes.' Josephus, speaking of the same event, says, (ANTIQUITIES, lib. xi. cap. 14. 1.) that Shalmaneser took Samaria, (that is, the capital of the Israelites,) destroyed
the government, and transplanted all the people into Media and Persia; and that they were re-put into other people out of Cuthah; which he, says, (in section 3 of the same chapter,) is the name of a country in Assyria, and which has a river of the same name in it. Of the Cutheans, he continues, there were five tribes, or nations; each of which had its own gods; and these they brought with them into Samaria. These, he observes, were the people afterwards called Samaritans; and who, although they had no pretensions, affected to be kinsfolk of the Jews.

"The Cutheans (he says) had formerly belonged to the inner parts of Persia and Media. In 2 Kings xxvii. 24, it is said that Nebuchadnezzar, the last ruler of Babylon, havingovere the place of the Israelites, were from five places; i. e. Babylon, Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, and Sepharvaim; and also that they worshipped as many different de-ties. Thus, we have the history of the removal of the ten tribes of Israel, at different periods; as also of the people of Damascus, to the same countries;
all of which was effected by the kings of Assyria, whose capital was at Nineveh. But previous to the second capitualy (or that of Judah) by the Babylonians,
these last had been masters of all Assyria; Nineveh had been destroyed, and Babylon had become the capital of the empire of Assyria, thus enlarged by conquest.
There are no particular days given, respecting the carrying away of Israel to Nineveh, as of Judah to Babylon; but we may, perhaps, be allowed to consider both as parallel cases; and thence infer that the conduct of the king of Nineveh was much the same with that of the king of Babylon. Josephus says, that all the nation of Israel was taken away, and their places supplied by the Cuthæans. 2 Kings xvii. leaves us to understand the same, if taken literally; that is, that the inhabitants of Amaseia, under or some Asyrians, and that people were brought from divers countries, and placed in the cities of Samaria, instead of the children of Israel; and that they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof. Certainly, if these accounts are to be taken literally, we must suppose no other, than that the whole nation was carried away; which supposition, however, occasions some difficulty, not only from the numbers to be carried away, but from the obvious difficulty of feeding by the way, and of finally placing in a situation where they could be fed, so vast, and in a great degree so useless, a multitude, when removed to a strange country. Wheresoever they came, they must either have been starved themselves, or they must virtually have discharged nearly an equal number of the king's subjects, who were already settled, and in habits of maintaining themselves, and probably of aiding the state. They were said to be carried to Nineveh. This residue of the ten tribes (that is, seven and a half) cannot be estimated lower than two thirds of the population of Nineveh itself. And it may be asked, Who fed them, in their way across Syria and Mesopotamia to Nineveh? And admitting an exchange of the Cuthèans for the Israelites, on so extensive a scale as to include all the agricultural and working people of all classes, a sovereign who should make such an exchange, where an interval of space of nearly a thousand miles intervened, would at least discover a different kind of policy from that which, in our conception, was followed by the king of Assyria. Were we to avail ourselves of the Bible statement, and take between 34 and four millions, for the people of Israel; and of these, three fourths for the seven and a half tribes carried away by Shalmaneser, that is, more than 24 millions, we might well rest the argument there. But even reduced to the more probable number of 700,000, and upwards,—how was such a multitude to be provided for? Nor is this stated to be an act of necessity, but of choice!

"We shall now state the particulars that are given, respecting the Babylonish captivity. It appears, then, that Nebuchadnezzar carried away the principal inhabitants, the warriors, and artisans of every kind, and these classes only; leaving behind the husbandmen, the laborers, and the poorer classes in general; that is, the great body of the people. May it not be concluded, that such the same mode of conduct was pursued by the king of Nineveh, as by him of Babylon; although it is not particularized? It cannot be supposed that either Media or Assyria wanted husbandmen. The history of Tobit shows, not only that the Jews were distributed over Media, but that they filled situations of trust and confidence. And, on the whole, it may be conceived that the persons brought away from the land of Israel were those from whom the conqueror expected useful services, in his country, or feared disturbances from, in their own; in effect, that the classes were much the same with those brought away from Judæa, by the king of Babylon; and that the great body of the people remained in the land, as being of use there, but would have been hitherto if removed. Consequently, those who look for a nation of Jews, transplanted into Media, or Persia, certainly look for what was never to be found; since no more than a select part of the nation was so transplanted. In the distribution of such captives, it might be expected that a wise monarch would be governed by two considerations: first, to profit the most by their knowledge and industry; and, secondly, to separate them, as far as possible, from the nation, as it is extremely difficult for them to return to their own country. The geographical position of Media appears favorable to the latter circumstance, there being a great extent of country, and deep rivers between."

"One circumstance appears very remarkable. Although it is positively said, that only certain classes of the Jews were carried to Babylon, at the latter captivity; and also that, on the decree of Cyrus, which permitted their return, the principal part did return, (perhaps 50,000 in all,) yet so great a number was found in Babylonia, in after-times, as is really astonishing. They are spoken of by Josephus, as possessing towns and districts, in that country, so late as the reign of Phæax; about forty years before Christ. They were in great numbers at Babylon itself; also in Seleucia and Susa. Their increase must have been wonderful; and in order to maintain such numbers, their industry and gains also must have been great. But it must also have been, that a very great number were disinclined to leave the country in which they were settled, at the date of the decree. Ammianus Marcellinus, so late as the expedition of Julian, speaks of a Jew's town at the head of one of the canals between the Euphrates and Tigris."

Such are the principal arguments of major Renell: there are others to which he has not adverted. From 2 Chron. xxx. we find that the pious Hereshiah wrote to "all Israel, Ephraim, and Manasseh,—and that divers of Asher, Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun" obeyed his injunctions, and came to Jerusalem to keep his passover; so that, "since the time of Solomon, son of David, there had not been the like in Jerusalem." Moreover, we read in 2 Chron. xxiv. 3, 4, 5, that king Josiah not only "conquered Judah and Jerusalem," in the first place, from idolatry, but that he went in person, and did the same "in the cities of Manasseh, (the half-tribe west of Jordan,) Ephraim, Simeon, and even unto Napthali, throughout all the land of Israel." This he could not have done, had he not possessed some authority over the country he visited; and had not the people of this country acquiesced in the propriety of what he was doing, knowing it to be agreeable to their ancient laws and institutions. But this implies a population of Hebrews by descent. Now, as Josiah extended his reformation throughout Israel, as he was killed at Megiddo, a town in the centre of Israel, and defending Israel against an invader, there is no room to doubt, but that the main body of the population of Israel at that time was descended from those who had been left in the country, when the principals of the nation, as to station and quality, were led into captivity. It can hardly be supposed that Israel was treated at that time more severely than Judah was afterwards; on the contrary, one would imagine, that repeated revolts would be the most signal punished. Yet we find that Nebuchadnezzar left some Judeans behind, although he carried off those who would be of any service to him, in adorning his new capital; that city which he so greatly improved, as to render it the subject of his pride:—"this great Babylon, which I have built."

If these suggestions be founded on truth, they may assist our endeavours to discern the real character of the Samaritans. It will be recollected, that what history we have of these people is not from Israelito writers or from themselves, but from their rivals, the Jews, whose description of them contains no equivocal tokens of national animosity and dislike. Where- as, if the bulk of the Israelites were left in their native land, if the population, though decimated, were not wholly deported, then the descent claimed by the Samaritans from the tribe of Ephraim, may well be allowed them; and then it is neither more nor less than iniquity, to deny their general relation to the Hebrew community. This does not exclude the fact, that a number of Cuthaean was intermingled among them, who, probably, occupied advantageous situations; whether as to office or property; but these must always have been an half bred always have been distinguished, as the Turks are, at this day, in their various lines of descent, among the Greeks. Nor is it by any means unlikely, that these different people should enjoy different arguments, as was the affair of the Jews. Were the Samaritans prosperous, the Israelite-Samaritan might claim affinity with them, and truly; when the Jewish people were in difficulties, the Cuthaean Jews would naturally endeavor to ingratiate themselves with the Chosen government and to secure themselves to the despots of the Greeks. So far as they appear in the gospel history, we do not see that the Samaritans were worse than the Jews; indeed, they seem, on the whole, to have been more open to conviction than the zealots of the southern tribes. This is clear from their history, that while the temple of Jerusalem was destroyed, and the national rites abolished, the Samaritans are preserved as a people, though inglorious; they maintain their ancient observances, though imperfectly; they derive their descent from their proper patriarchs, in their own country, though, probably, not without considerable breaches and intervals in their means of proof; they possess authentic copies of their law, as they do in Africa and Bilvish, less important, and under which they act; and Providence has continued them to the present time, as evidence of various points of history, and incidents connected with holy writ. So little cause had the Jewish zealots to desire "those who reside in the mount of Samaria, and that foolish people which dwell in Sichem," Ex. 1. 28.

Another question for determination, and one of some difficulty, relates to the country to which the ten tribes were transplanted. Scripture informs us, as we have seen above, that Tiglath-Pileser carried away Naphtali, Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manassesh, to Halah, to Habor, and to Irra; (1 Chron. v. 23) and that Salmaanarreer carried off the rest of Israel into Assyria, to Halah, to Habor, on the river of Gozan, and into the cities of the Medes, 2 Kings xvi. 6. Labela and Halah are certainly the same, and probably denote the land of Havelah, or Colchis. Habor, or Charab, is the western Chaboras, and the country watered by it, as Gozan, or Gabrion, is the name of the province through which the river Chaboras flows. [But see GOZAN.] There is also a district in Media called Gauzen, between the rivers Cyrus and Cambyses, and is placed by Benjamin of Tudela four days' journey from Hemedam. Ham, or Arsa, is in Media, and is probably the province of the Arevas, known to the ancient geographers. Benjamin of Tudela assures us that there were in Media fifty cities peopled by Israelites. We see by Tobit i. 11, 16; iii. 7; v. 8, that there were Israelites at Nineveh, at Rages in Media, at Shushan, or Susa, and at Ecbatana. In our Saviour's time there were Israelites scattered through the provinces of the East, Acts ii. 9—11; James i. 1. Philo describes the Jews as being very numerous throughout the East, under the empire of the Persians, and Josephus, (Ant. lib. xi. 6) speaking of the ten tribes, says, in his time they were in great multitudes beyond the Euphrates. The second book of Esdras (xiii. 41, &c.) advances a notion, that the Israelites carried captive by Shalmaneser, resolved on withdrawing from the nations, that they might serve God with greater purity; and that for this purpose they passed over the Euphrates, God having opened the channel of the river, by a miracle in their favor, like that when he gave them passage over the Jordan. They marched a year and a half, before they got to the place they intended, and at last settled at Arzeret, where they are to remain to the latter ages, when the Almighty will recall them, and again open a passage for them through the Euphrates. But where is this city? Joseph Ben-Gorion says, that when Alexander the Great would have passed over the dark mountains which separate the country of the Israelites from the other nations, he was prevented by a voice which cried to him, "Take care not to enter into the house of God." Benjamin of Tudela reports that after a journey of one and twenty days, as he travelled towards the north, he arrived at the kingdom of the Rechibites, the extent of which was sixteen days' journey. Of the cities of this kingdom he relates many particulars, but does not say that this was the kingdom of Arzeret. Massek-Ben-Israel and other writers affirm that the ten tribes retired into Tartary, whence many of them passed into America, Russia, Muscovy and China. Olaus Rudbeck, son of the famous M. Rudbeck, author of the "Atlantica," in his "Laponia Illustrata," maintains, that we must not expect to find the remains of the ten tribes of Israel either in Asia, Africa, or America, but rather in the utmost northern climes, even in his own country, Lapland. These surmises he supports by some general probabilities, and by the conformity between the manners and ceremonies of the Laplanders and those of the Jews. But upon this foundation the Jews of the ten tribes may not be found.

Sir William Jones inclines to the opinion that the ten tribes migrated to India, about Thibet, and Cashmir, and such as derived sprung from several circumstances. In the year 1828 the following statement appeared in the German papers:— "LEIPZIG, JUNE 30.—After having seen, for some yours past, merchants from Tibet, Persia, and Armenia, among the visitors at our fair, we have, for the first time, two traders from Bucharin, with shawls, which are manufactured of the finest wool of the goats of Tibet and Cashmir, by the Jewish families, who form a third part of the population. In Bucharia (formerly the capital of Sogdiana) the Jews have been very numerous ever since the Babylonian captivity, and are there as remarkable for their industry and manufactures, as they are in England for their money transactions. It was not till last year that the Russian government succeeded in establishing its diplomatic missions far into Bucharia. The above traders exchanged their shawls for coarse and fine woollen cloths of such colors as are most esteemed in the East." The number of these Jews must be very great; if this account be at all correct, as to the proportion which they bear to the whole population, this being stated by the most accurately informed writers to be from 15,000,000 to 18,000,000. But this information is confirmed, in a very satisfactory manner, from other sources.

In the year 1822, a Mr. Sargon, one of the agents, we believe, to the London Society for converting the Jews, undertook the kind office of counting a number of persons resident at Bombay, Cannanore, and the vicinity, who were evidently the descendants of Jews, calling themselves Beni-Israel, and bearing, almost uniformly, Jewish names, but with a Persian termination. Feeling very desirous to obtain all possible knowledge of their condition, Mr. Sargon undertook a mission to Cannanore for this purpose, and the result of his inquiries was a conviction, that they were not Jews of the one tribe and a half, being of a different race from the white and black Jews at Cochin, and consequently that they were a remnant of the long-lost ten tribes. He also concluded, from the information obtained respecting the Beni-Israel, that they existed in great numbers in countries between Cochin and Bombay, the north of Persia, among the borders of Tartary, and in Cashmir; the very countries in which the German accounts state the recent discovery to have been made. So far, then, these accounts confirm each other, and the inquiries of Mr. Sargon. It is evident that the Beni-Israel, resident on the west of the Indian peninsula, had originally proceeded from Bucharah. It will therefore be interesting to know something of their moral and religious character; and we have collected the following particulars from Mr. Sargon's accounts: (1) In dress and manners they resemble the natives so as not to be distinguished from them, but by attentive observation and inquiry. (2) They have Hebrew names of the same kind, and with the same local termination, as the sepoys in the 9th regiment Bombay native infantry. (3) Some of them read Hebrew, and they have a faint tradition of the cause of their original exodus from Egypt. (4) Their common language is the Hindoo. (5) They keep idols and worship them, and use idolatrous ceremonies intermixed with Hebrew. (6) They circumcise their own children. (7) They observe the Kippore, or great expiation day of the Hebrews, but not the sabbath, nor any feast or fastdays. (8) They call themselves Corah Jehudi, or white Jews; and they term the black Jews Coelot Jehudi. (9) They speak of the Arabian Jews as their brethren, but do not acknowledge the European Jews as such, because they are of a fairer complexion than themselves. (10) They use, at all occasions, and at the most trifling circumstances, the usual Jewish prayer, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord." (11) They have no cohen (priest), levite, or kash, among them, under those terms, but they have a kash (reader), who performs prayers and conducts their religious ceremonies, and they appear to have elders and a chief in each community, who determine in their religious concerns. (12) They expect the Messiah soon to arrive, and rejoice in the belief that at Jerusalem they will see their God, worship him only, and be desirous no more. This is all the information that can be collected from Mr. Sargon's accounts, but the very region in which these people have been discovered, has been described by the celebrated oriental geographer, Ibn Haukal, with great minuteness, under the appellation of Minou-at-nahr. He speaks of it as one of the most flourishing and productive provinces within the regions of Islam, and describes its inhabitants as a people of probity and virtue, averse from evil, and fond of peace. — Such is their liberality, that no one turns aside from the rites of hospitality; so that a person contempla-

The Hebrews affirm, that since the destruction of the temple by the Romans, they have always had their heads, or princes, both in the East and West, under the name of Princes of the Captivity; that of the East, governing the Jews of Babylon, Chaldea, Assyria, and Persia; that of the West, those of Judas, Egypt, Italy, and the Roman empire.

CARAVAN RELATING TO A COMPANY OF travellers or merchants, who, for their greater security, march in a body through the deserts, and other places, infested with Arabs or robbers. (See Gen. xxxvii. 25.) As the collection of such a number of persons to form a caravan requires time, and the imbodying of them is a serious concern, it is concerted with great care and preparation, and is never attempted without permission of the prince in whose dominions it is formed, and of those also through whose dominions it is to pass, expressed in writing. The exact number of men and carriages, mules, horses, and other beasts of burden, are specified in the license; and the merchants to whom the caravan belongs regulate and direct every thing appertaining to its government and police, during the journey, and appoint the various officers necessary for conducting it. Each caravan has four principal officers: (1) the Caravan Bachi, or head of the caravan; (2) the Captain of the March; (3) the Captain of the Stop, or Rest; — and (4) the Captain of the Distribution. The first has the uncontrollable authority and command over all the others, and gives them his orders: the second is absolute during the march; but his authority immediately ceases on the stopping, or encamping, of the caravan, when the third assumes his share of the authority, and exerts it during the time of its remaining at rest: and the fourth orders the disposition of every part of the caravan, in case of an attack or battle. This last officer has also, during the march, the inspection and direction of the distribution of provisions, which is conducted, under his management, by several inferior officers, who are obliged to give security to the master of the caravan; each of them having the care of a certain number of men, elephants, mules, camels, &c., which they undertake to conduct, and to furnish with provisions, at their own risk, according to an agreement stipulated between them. A fifth officer of the caravan is the pay-master, or treasurer, who has under him a great many clerks and interpreters, appointed to keep accurate journals of all the material incidents that may occur on the journey; and it is by these journals, signed by the superior officers, that the owners of the caravan judge whether they have been well or ill served or conducted. This description is from colonel Campbell, who proceeds to say,
CARAVAN

Another kind of officers are mathematicians, without whom no caravan will presume to set out. There are commonly three of them attached to a caravan of five hundred camels; and they perform the offices both of quarter-master and aide-de-camp, leading the troops when the caravan is attacked, and assigning the quarters where the caravan is appointed to encamp. There are no less than five distinct kinds of camels: first, the heavy caravans, which are composed of elephants, dromedaries, camels, and horses; secondly, the light caravans, which have but few elephants; thirdly, the common caravans, where are none of those animals; fourthly, the horse caravans, where are neither dromedaries nor camels; and lastly, sea caravans, consisting of vessels; from whence you will observe, that the word caravans is not confined to the land, but extends to the water also.

The proportion observed in the heavy caravan is as follows:—When there are five hundred elephants, they add a thousand dromedaries, and two thousand horses at the least: and the escort is composed of four thousand men on horseback. Two men are required for leading one elephant, five for three dromedaries, and seven for eleven camels. This multitude of servants, together with the officers and passengers, whose number is uncertain, serve to support the escort in case of a fight; and render the caravan more formidable and secure. The passengers are not absolutely obliged to fight but, according to the laws and usages of the caravans, if they refuse to do so, they are not entitled to any provisions whatever from the caravan, even though they should agree to pay an extravagant price for them. The day of the caravan setting out, being once fixed, is never altered or postponed; so that no disappointment can possibly ensue to any one. Even these powerful and well-armed bodies are way-laid and robbed by the Arabian princes, who keep spies in all parts to give notice when a caravan sets out: sometimes they plunder them; sometimes they make slaves of the whole convoy.

This account may be made very materially to assist in illustrating the history of the exodus. In order to apply it to that event, we premise, that the manners of the East, because resulting from the nature and the peculiarities of the countries, have ever been so permanent, that what was ancienly adopted into a custom is still conform to, with scarcely any (if any) variation.

1. A caravan is too serious a concern to be attempted without the permission of the king, in whose dominions it is formed; and of those powers, also, through whose dominions it is to pass. This explains the urgency of Moses to obtain permission from Pharaoh; and the power of Pharaoh to prevent the assembly necessary for the purpose of Israel's deliverance: it accounts, also, for the attack made by Amalek (Exod. xlvii. 1.) which tribe, not having been solicited for a free passage, intended revenge and plunder for this omission, in a "formidable body, as large as an army"; but Moses could not have previously negotiated for their consent, without alarming Pharaoh too highly, as to the extent of his proposed excursion with the people.

2. The nature of the "mixed multitude," which accompanied the caravan of Israel clearly appears in this extract.

3. "The exact number of men, carriages, mules, &c." This was the custom also in the time of Moses; as the returns of their numbers were recorded, in the book of Numbers sufficiently demonstrate.

4. The time necessary for the formation of a caravan justifies the inference, that the Israelites did not leave Egypt in that extreme haste which has been sometimes supposed; and that it was not necessary for them to assemble; many, no doubt, from distant parts, which would require several days: they might be expelled in haste from the royal city; but to collect them all together at the place of rendezvous, would have been a work of time: we see it is so at this day. For further information on this subject, see the article EXODUS.

5. Another consideration, not unimportant, arises from the nature, the departments, and the powers of these officers. It appears from various passages of Scripture, that the Lord, or Jehovah, was considered as the chief guide, conductor, or commander of the Israelites, at the time of their exodus from Egypt: he, therefore, was understood to be, as it were, "Carmen Beatch" to this people; in his name Moses acted as the chief of the caravan. (As to the other officers, if they existed at all, we have no account of them; except that Joshua was ordered to go and fight Amalek, (Ex. xvii.) who attacked Israel when encamped. R.) It is also not improbable that Aaron, who assisted Moses in all things, and was his substitute when absent, had, as a part of his duty, to keep "accurate journals of all material incidents," &c. This accounts why, in his penitence and fidelity, he has given an ample relation of his share in the transaction of the golden calf, and of the anger it excited against him; while he has, perhaps, declined to transmit to posterity the name or the character of the principal in it. As a parallel instance, the reader may recall, how much more circumstantially Peter's fall is related in Peter's Gospel (e. g. Mark's) than in any other. It accounts, also, for the commendation of Moses, as the meekest of men, in the very instance of Aaron's rebellion against him; and it accounts, too, for the use of the third person in the narration, instead of the first person, which Moses himself uses in Deuteronomy, composed, or at least published, after Aaron's death. It results from the whole, that the history of the exodus, &c., was compiled from the public, official, authentic register, kept in the camp daily; that the original was not private memoria, but, to use a modern phrase, the Gazette of the time.

Mathematicians, mentioned by Colonel Campbell, were completely superfluous in the caravan of Israel.

The reader will observe other instances of himself: those here suggested are offered only as hints to lead inquiry; this is not the place to enlarge on them. The remark, however, is obvious, that the most intricate transactions appear plain, when set in their proper light; and that what we most find obscure, is so, evidently, not from any real obscurity in the original narration, but from our imperfect knowledge of the subjects to which it refers.

CARAVANSEARI, a building in the East, which is expressed in our version of the Scriptures by the term Inn. There appear to be three descriptions of these buildings. Some are simply places of rest, (by the side of a fountain, if possible,) which, being at proper distances on the road, are thus named, though they are mere naked walls; others have an attendant, who subsists either by some charitable donation, or the benevolence of passengers; and others are more considerable establishments, where families reside and take care of them, and furnish many necessary provisions. Conformity to these ideas is that which is requisite to express a caravanseari, though our translators have rendered both by the same term inn. Thus, Luke ii. 7, There was no room for them in the INNs (κατασκευαστης) "the place of untiring," of beasts, &c. for rest. Luke x. 34, The good Samaritan brought him to the (παρακτησις) INN, (whose keeper is called in the next verse panodekeus, a receptacle open to all comers.) It may reasonably be supposed, that a caravanserai in a town should be better furnished than one in the country, in a retired place, and where few travellers pass; and Mr. Taylor therefore inclines, against Harmer, (Obs. vol. iii. p. 348.) to think that the inn, to which the good Samaritan is represented as conducting the wounded traveller, was intentionally described of an inferior kind. If so, we may reasonably take the other word, the untying place, as denoting a larger edifice; and this accounts for the evangelist Luke's mention of there being no room (παρακτησις) in it: q. d. "though it was large enough for such occasions as usually occurred in the town of Bethlehem, yet now every apartment in this receptacle was occupied; so that no privacy fit for a woman in the situation of Mary could be found"—especially as, colonel Campbell has informed us, "they are continually attended by numbers of the very lowest of the people"—very unfit associates for Mary at any time, and certainly in her present condition. Caravanserais were originally intended for, and are now pretty generally applied to, the accommodation of strangers and travellers; though, like every other good institution, sometimes perverted to the purposes of private emolument, or public job. They are built at proper distances through the roads of the country, for donations, and to afford to the indigent and weary traveller an asylum from the inclemency of the weather. They have commonly one story above the ground-floor; the lower story is arched, and serves for warehouses to store corn, for lodging, and for stables, while the upper is used merely for lodgings; besides which they are always accommodated with a fountain, and have cookshops and other conveniences to supply the wants of lodgers. (Campbell's Travels, p. ii. p. 8.) This description applies, of course, to the better sort of caravanserais.

The nearest construction amongst us to a caravanserai, appears in some of our old inns, where galleries, with lodging rooms in them, run round a court, or yard; but then, as travellers in the East always carry with them their own bedding, &c., it is evident that our inns are better provided than the best eastern caravanserais. It is necessary to keep this in mind; because we must not suppose that Joseph and Mary travelled without taking the necessary utensils with them; or that they could have procured, in this inn, anything beyond provisions and lodging. Perhaps even they could not have procured provisions. But of the poverty of their eastern inns, we shall obtain a pretty distinct idea from the following extract:

"There are no inns any where; but the cities, and commonly the villages, have a large building called a khan, or keravansarai, which serves as an asylum for all travellers. These houses of reception are always built without the precincts of towns, and consist of four wings round a square court, which serves, by way of enclosure, for the beasts of burden. The lodgings are cells, where you find nothing but bare walls, dust, and sometimes scorpions. The keeper of this khan gives the traveller the key and a nut; and he provides himself the rest. He must, therefore, carry with him his bed, his kitchen utensils, and even his provisions; for frequently not even bread is to be found in the villages. On this account the orientals contrive their equipage in the most simple and portable form. The baggage of a man who wishes to be completely provided, consists in a carpet, a mattress, a blanket, two saucepans with lids, contained within each other, two dishes, two plates, and a coffee-pot, all of copper well tinned; a small wooden box, for salt and pepper; a round leathern table, which he suspends from the saddle of his horse; small leathern bottles or bags for oil, melted butter, water, and brandy (if the traveller be a Christian); a pipe, a tinder-box, a cup of cocoa, some rice, dried raisins, dates, Cyprus cheese, and, above all, coffee-berries, with a roaster, and wooden mortar to pound them. I am thus particular, to prove that the orientals are more advanced than we, in the art of dispensing with many things, an art which is not without its use. Our European merchants are not contented with such simple accommodations." (Volney's Travels, vol. ii. p. 419. Eng. edit.) The reader will bear this account in mind: for we shall find that he is not a poor man in the East, who possesses this quantity of utensils. One would hope that at Bethlehem, the "house of bread," it was not difficult to procure that necessary of life.

"Looking out of our window upon the large, open, quadrangular court of the khan, we beheld very much such a scene as that represented in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. In the centre is a spacious fountain, or reservoir, the first care of every builder of great houses or cities in the East. On one side is a row of camels, each tied by the slenderest cord, for lodging, and for the stable, while the bell is appended, so that, by the slightest motion, they keep up one another's attention, and the attention also of all the inmates of the khan, that of weary travellers especially, by a constant jingle. On another side, horses and males are waiting for orders; while ass, breaking loose, biting one another, and throwing up their heels, give variety to the scene. Goats, geese, poultry, &c. are on free quarters. In the midst of all these sights and sounds, the groom, the muleteer, the merchant, the pedlar, the passers-by, and the by-standers, most of them wretchedly dressed, though in coats of many colors, all looking like idlers, whatever they may have to do, contrive to make themselves audible; generally lifting up their voices to the pitch of high debate, and very often much higher. Noise, indeed, at all times, seems to be the proper element of the people of these countries; their throats are formed for it, their ears are used to CARMEL, a city of Judah, on a mountain of the same name, in the south of Palestine, 10 miles east of Hebron. Here Nabal the Carmelite, Abigail's husband, dwelt. Jerome says, that in his time the Romans had a garrison at Carmel. On this mountain Saul, returning from his expedition against Amael, erected a trophy, 1 Sam. xv. 13. (This mountain still retains its ancient name; Siezen found, on the west side of the Dead sea, a limestone mountain, called el-Carmel, which is without doubt the same.)

II. CARMEL, a celebrated range of hills running north-west from the plain of Esdraelon, and ending in the promontory, or cape, which forms the bay of Acco. Its height is about 1500 feet, and at its foot, north, runs the brook Kishon, and a little farther north, the river Belus. Josephus makes Carmel a part of Galilee; but it rather belonged to Manasseh, and to the south of Asher. Carmel signifies the vineyard; and Jerome informs us, that this mountain had good pastures. Toward the sea is a cave, where it has been supposed that the prophet Elijah desired Adad to bring Baal's false prophets, and where fire from heaven descended on his burnt sacrifice, 1 Kings xviii. 21—40. Pliny mentions "the promontory Carmel," and on this mountain a town of the same name, formerly called Ecbatana.

Mount Carmel is an object of so much celebrity and importance, that some more particular notice of it seems desirable. It is the only great promontory upon the coast of Palestine. The foot of the northern part approaches the water, so that, seen from the hills north-east of Acre, mount Carmel appears as if "dipping his feet in the western sea," farther south it retires more inland, so that between the mountain and the sea there is an extensive plain covered with fields and olive-trees. Carmel consists rather of several connected hills, than of one ridge; the northern and eastern part being somewhat higher than the southern and western. The western side of the mountain, towards the sea, is five or six miles long, not running in a straight line; but (according to Poroeck and Volney) the two extremities jut out and stand over against each other, forming, in the middle, a bowl, in which, according to Braun, the great majority of travellers, well deserves its Hebrew name; (Carmel, country of vineyards and gardens; Mariti describes it (Trav. p. 274, seq.) as a delightful region, and says the good quality of its soil is apparent; it is dedicated to the cultivation of olive and corn. Braun. (De Vest, sacrod. Heb. p. 517, seq.) In Is. liv. 12, or our translators have put carbuncle for the Heb. נוף; of which it can only be said, that its root indicates something bright, shining; but the specific kind of stone is not known. CARMEN, a city of great strength on the Euphrates, belonging to Assyria, which was taken by Necho, king of Egypt, and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; 2 Kings xxvii. 20. Isaiah speaks of Carmeshim, and seems to say that Tiglath-Pilezer conquered it; perhaps from the Egyptians. Probably Carmeshim is Cercusium, Circeum, or Kirkisin, which is situated in the angle formed by the junction of the Chaboras, or Chebar, and the Euphrates.

CARY, a country of Asia Minor, to which the Romans wrote in favor of the Jews, 1 Mac. xv. 23. It has been called Phoenicia, because a Phoenician colony first settled there. Its chief town was Hali-carnassus.

A CAR

it; neither the men nor the females, grown-up persons nor children, the rich nor the poor, seem to have any exclusive privilege in making it; and, what is very annoying to a Frank traveller, the party with whom he is treating, and who wishes most probably to impose on him, will turn round to make an appeal to all the by-standers, who are no less ready with one voice to strike in with their opinion on all matters that come before them.

"The immense khan, of which the consul's rooms form a small part, is inhabited by a great variety of families. It is three stories high; and in so dilapidated a state; that it seems to me to wait only for a gentle shock of an earthquake—no improbable event—to bring it all down." The same traveller, in passing from Saïd (Sidon) to Acre, came, near evening, to the foot of the line of mountains which forms a midway barrier between Tyre and Acre. After ascending it a little way, we reached, just after sunset, a poor village, called Khan Nahoura; the owner of which, having several guests already arrived, made many difficulties about receiving us. A little money, however, changed his heart towards us. Happily, just before our arrival, we were hailed by some fishermen on the water-side—men who, probably, at this day, are unconsciously fulfilling the prophecy of Ezekiel, xxxvi. 5, 14.—From whom we bought some excellent fish. With no other preparation than that of putting them whole into the burning embers, they furnished us with a very seasonable and refreshing supper." (Ibid., p. 112.)

Khan appears to be the Turkish name for caravanserai. On the great roads, where there are long intervals between the cities or settled parts of the country, these establishments are maintained by the government; particularly in Persia. Indeed, this is a custom of very high antiquity; for Xenophon informs us that Cyrus, "observing how far a horse could well travel in a day, built stables at those distances, and supplied them with provisions to keep them in charge." (See sir R. K. Porter's Trav. in Persia, vol. i. p. 492.)

CARBUNCLE, a precious stone, like a large ruby, or garnet, of a dark, deep red color, something like buckler's blood; said to glitter even in the dark, and to shew more than the ruby itself. But Braun observes, after Boitius, that the carbuncle of the ancients is the ruby. (The Hebrew word רַבכּ, bīrēkēth, translated carbuncle in the English version, Ex. xxvii. 17. Ezek. xxviii. 13, is rendered amaranthus by Josephus, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate; but Braun observes, after Boitius, that the carbuncle of the ancients is the ruby. (De Vest, sacred. Heb. p. 517, seq.) In Is. liv. 12, or our translators have put carbuncle for the Heb. נוף; of which it can only be said, that its root indicates something bright, shining; but the specific kind of stone is not known. CARMESHEM, a city of great strength on the Euphrates, belonging to Assyria, which was taken by Necho, king of Egypt, and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; 2 Kings xxvii. 20. Isaiah speaks of Carmesheem, and seems to say that Tiglath-Pilezer conquered it; perhaps from the Egyptians. Probably Carmesheem is Cercusium, Circeum, or Kirkisin, which is situated in the angle formed by the junction of the Chaboras, or Chebar, and the Euphrates.

CARY, a country of Asia Minor, to which the Romans wrote in favor of the Jews, 1 Mac. xv. 23. It has been called Phoenicia, because a Phoenician in Palestine, of great length, and in many parts covered with trees and flowers. On reaching, at last, the opposite summit, and coming out of a wood, we saw the celebrated plain of Esdraelon beneath, with the river Kishon flowing through it; mounts Tabor and Hermon were in front; and on the left [8. E.] the prospect was bounded by the hills of Samaria. This scene certainly did not fulfil the descriptions given of the desolation and barrenness of Palestine, although it was mournful to behold scarcely a village or cottage in the whole extent; yet the soil appeared so rich and verdant, that, if diligently cultivated, there is little doubt it would become, as it once was, "like the garden of the Lord." In another place he says: (ibid, vol. ii. p. 113.) "No mountain in or around Palestine retains its ancient beauty so much as Carmel." Two species of the cucurbita, conceived to be the cucurbita, are found on it; its groves are few, but luxuriant; it is no place for crags and precipices, or "rocks of the wild goats;" but its surface is covered with a rich and constant verdure.

The descriptions admirably illustrate the vivid representations of the inspired Hebrew poets and prophets in respect to Carmel. Thus Isaiah, in describing the gospel times, (xxxv. 2.) affirms that "to the desert shall be given the excellency (splendid ornament) of Carmel." So, one of the greatest and most favorable and verdant beauty of its summit, the head of the bride, in Cant. vii. 5, is compared to Carmel. It was also celebrated for its pastures, and is therefore ranked with Bashan, Jer. i. 19; Isa. xxxiii. 9; Amos i. 2.

There are in mount Carmel very many caves; it is said more than a thousand; chiefly on the west side. They are said to have formerly been inhabited by monks, who, for the sake of the monks' caverns, there are four hundred adjacent to each other, and furnished with windows and places for sleeping hewn in the rock. A peculiarity of many of these caverns is mentioned by Schulz, (Leitungen, &c. v. p. 141;) viz., they are only narrow, that only a single person can creep in at a time; and that the caves are so crooked that a person is immediately out of sight to one who follows, and can conceal himself. This may serve to give us a clearer idea of what is intended in Amos ix. 3, where Jehovah says of those who endeavor to escape from punishment, "Though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence." That the groottes and caves of Carmel were in very ancient times the resort and dwelling of prophets and other religious persons, is well known. The prophets Elijah and Elisha often resorted thither. (See 1 Kings xviii. 19, seq.; 2 Kings ii. 23, iv. 25; and compare, perhaps, 1 Kings xvii. 4, 13.) At the present day, is shown a cavern, called the cave of Elijah, a little below the Monks' cavern mentioned above. It is now a Mahometan sanctuary. Comp. Rosenm. Bibl. CARNAIM, see ASTRABOTH II.

CARNAL, fleshly, sensual. Wicked or unconverted men are represented as under the domination of a "carnal mind, which is enmity against God," and which must issue in death, Rom. viii. 6, 7. Worldly enjoyments are carnal, because they only minister to the wants and desires of the animal part of man, Rom. xv. 27; 1 Cor. ix. 11. The ceremonial parts of the Mosaic dispensation were carnal; they related immediately to the bodies of men and beasts, Heb. vii. 10; ix. 10. The weapons of a Christian's warfare are not carnal; they are not of human origin, nor are they directed by human wisdom, 2 Cor. iv. 4.

CARPUS, a disciple of Paul, who dwelt at Troas, 2 Tim. iv. 13.

CART, for threshing, a machine still used in the East, Amos ii. 12. See HARVESTING.

CARTAGE, a celebrated city on the coast of Africa; a colony from Tyre. According to the Vulgate, Ezekiel says, (xxvii. 12.) the Carthaginians traded to Tyre; but the Hebrew reads Tarshish, which rather signifies Tarus in Cilicia, or Tarragona in Spain, formerly famous for trade. See TARSHISH.

CASIPHIA. Ezra says, that when returning to Judea, he sent to Idoo, who dwelt at Casiphia; perhaps mount Casipic, near the Caspian sea, between Media and Hyrcania, where were many captives, Ezra vii. 17.

CASLUHIM, a son of Mizraim, from whom came the Casalim or Casalim, Philistines. See CARMEL.

CASPIA, a spice mentioned by Moses as an ingredient in the composition of the holy oil, used in the consecration of the sacred vessels of the tabernacle, Exod. xxx. 24. (The word casia comes, undoubtedly, from the Hebrew רַכְבֶּן, ῭ήκᾶς, which occurs once in this sense in the Hebrew Scriptures, in the plural; Ps. xlv. 8: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia." The plural was very probably used by the Hebrews on account of the small detached pieces into which the bark is usually divided in commerce; but the Seventy, coming directly to the general usage of Greek writers, gives it in the singular number, and write it with one sigma, κασία.) The meaning of the word in Hebrew is, something stripped off, i. e. bark separated from the trunk; and it was not unnatural that a precious article or kind from this kind from the remotest East should thus be called by the general name bark, just as in modern times a different species of bark is thus distinguished. The word casia occurs also in two other passages of the English version, viz. Ex. xxx. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 19; where it corresponds to the Heb. רַכְבֶּן, kiddah. In the former passage, the Seventy have ἑπιφύλακα, a species of lily; in the latter, they appear not to have read the same Hebrew word. That the Hebrew רַכְבֶּן really means bark, is somewhat doubtful; but from its connection, in Exodus, with myrrh, cinnamon, and sweet calamus, it would seem at any rate to have come from the same countries, and to have possessed the same properties.

This oriental aromatic is the cassia of modern cookery, but not of modern botany. It is the Laurus casia of Linnaeus, a native of Malabar, Sumatra, Java, &c. *R.

CATERPILLAR. (Heb. מַעַרְפָה) is improperly put, by the English translators, for a species of locust now unknown. In several passages of Scripture this insect is distinguished from the locust, properly so called; and in Joel i. 4. is mentioned as "eating up" what the other species had left, and may, therefore, be called "the consumer" by way of eminence. But the ancient interpreters are far from being agreed as to what particular species it signifies. The LXX. Aquila, the Vulgate, and Jerome understand it of the "chaffer," which is a great devourer of leaves, Michaelis, from the Syriac, supposes it to be the CAUSUS

"mole cricketer," which in its grub state is very detrimental to corn, and other vegetables, by feeding on the grain.

I. CATHOLIC. This term is Greek; signifying universal, or general. The church of Christ is called catholic, because it extends throughout the world, and during all time. We call some truths catholic,
because they are generally received, and are of general influence; so the catholic, that is, the general, church.

II. CATHOLIC, i.e., general, Epistles, are seven in number, viz. one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. They are called catholic, because directed to Christian converts generally, and not to any particular church. The principal design of these epistles is to warn the reader against the heresies of the times, and to establish Christian converts against the efforts made to reduce them to Judaism, or to a mixture of legal notions with Christianity, or of idolatrous principles and practices with the gospel.

CAVES were often used as dwellings in Pale-tine. See Rock, and Camel.

CAUCASUS, the name of a range of mountains
in Asia. [The modern Caucasus is that immense chain of mountains which runs from about the middle of the western shore of the Caspian sea, north-

est, to the northern side of the Euxine, or Black sea. In ancient times, the name appears to have been applied to the whole of that vast tract of elevated and mountainous country, commencing in India; thence it passed into Media; then and Euxine seas, forming the highest elevation or region of Asia, the Hindu Kosh, and comprehending, among many other ranges, those of Arrarat and Tur-

rus. These two last names were applied very indefinitely to denote ranges of mountains beyond the limits to which these names properly belonged;
and thus they were sometimes probably interchanged, or employed by different writers to express the same mountains. This whole subject has strictly no connection with the illustration of the Bible, because none of these names (except Arrarat) are found in Scripture; but as the Greek word Caucacus was probably derived from India, and the tracing of it to its source is connected with some important geods and currents in the Asiatic world, it is unwise not to see here subjoined the following extract from captain Wilford, in the Asiatic Res. vol. vi. p. 455. R.

"The true Sanscrit name of this mountain is Chhya-giri, or the mountain of the Chhaya, a most ancient and celebrated tribe in inhabited this immense range, from the eastern limits of India to the confines of Persia; and most probably as far as the Euxine and Mediterranean seas. They are often mentioned in the sacred books of the Hindus. Their descendants still inhabit the same regions, and are called to this day Chhaya, and in some places Chsaya and Casaya. They belonged to the class of warriors, or Caste-tries; but now they are consid-ed as the lowest of the four classes, and were thus degraded, according to the Institutes of Menu, by their omission of the holy rites, and by seeing no Brah-minas. However, the vakeel of the rajah of Comanh, or Amorot, who is a learned Pandit, informs me, that the greatest part of the zemindars of that country are Chhaya; and that they are not considered, or treated, as outcastes. They are certainly a very ancient tribe; for they are mentioned as such in the institutes of Menu; and their great ancestor Chhaya, or Chhaya, is mentioned by Sanchoniathon under the name of Casius. He is supposed to have lived before the flood, and to have given the name of mountains to be set up. The two countries of Casgier, those of Casgair, Cassia, and the famous peak of Oke-gea, are acknowledged in India to derive their names from the Casius. The country called Casias by Ptolemy, is still inhabited by the called Cossaei, Cassaei, and Cassiae; and Pliny tells us, (lib. vi. cap. 30.) that the inhabitants of the mountainous region between the Indus and the Jumna, were called Casi, a word obviously derived from Chass, or Chassaei, as they are denominated in the vulgar dialects. The appellation of Casassaei, or Col-Casaei, extended from India to the shores of the Mediterranean and Euxine seas;

most probably, because this extensive range was inhabited by Cossaei. Certain it is, that the mountains of Persia were inhabited by a race of people called Cassaei, Cassseus, and Cassiae; there was a mount Cassi on the borders of Egypt, and another in Syria; the Cassian sea, and the adjacent mountains, were most probably denominated from them. Jupiter Cassius, like Jupiter Peninus in the Alps, was worshipped in the mountains of Syria, and on the borders of Egypt;
moreover, we find that the names of Cassius and Cas-sias, given to Jupiter, were synonymous, or nearly so. In Sanscrit the words Chassap, Chassse, and Chassassaei, signify the lord and sovereign ruler of the Chassaei; Chassapaye, or Chassapagyae, in a derivative form, implies the country of Chasassaei.

"The original country of the Casius seems to have been the present country of Casgair, in the north-west of Caffr; the name of the mountain is,
and extends towards the Indus; hence Ptolemy with great propriety asserts, that the mountains to the north-east of Caffr are the real Casiasses. The country of Casius is situated in a beautiful valley, watered by a large river, which, after passing close to Chhaga, Benay, Commen and Noorgul, (Comen and Noorgul are called Guz-noorgul in the Ayesh Abery,) joins the Landi-Sindh, or little Sindh, below Jalalabad, in the small district of Caffr; (for there is no town of that name,) and from this circumstance
the little State of Casias, in the Veterinary Menu, the capital city of Casias is called Chattala, or Chtraur, and is the place of residence of a petty Ma-

hemead prince, who is in great measure tributary to the emperor of China, for the Chinese are now in possession of the same as far as Beglan to the northwest of Andrah."

"Pliny (lib. vi. cap. 30.) informs us, that mount Caucasus was also called Graucassus; an appellation obviously Sanscrit; for Graus, which, in conversation, as well as in the spoken dialect, is invariably pronounced Graus, signifies a mountain, and being a monosyllable (the final being surd) according to the rules of grammar, it is to be prefixed thus, Graes-Chass, or Grau-Chass. Idaeus says that Cáucassus, in the eastern languages, signifies white; and that a mountain, close to it, is called Caria by the Scythians,
in whose language it signifies snow and whiteness.
The Casius of Idaeus is obviously the Casian ridge of Ptolemy; where the genuine appellation appears stripped of its adjunct. In the language of the Cal-muck Tartars, Iaia and Caria signify snow; and in some dialects of the same tongue, towards Bélagaşan, they say Juškâ and Cusúk, Túshkâ, and Túškâ, or Tuvr. These words, in the opinion of my CAUSEWAY

learned friends here, are obviously derived from the Sanscrit Tushara, by dropping the final a. . . . The words Chanu, or Ch'uan, pronounced Chua, or Cas; Chuan, or Chua, by the inhabitants of the countries between Babylonia and the Indus; for they invariably substitute ch or c in the room of sh . . . . This immense range is constantly called in Sanscrit Him- daka, or the Snowy Mountain; and Himalaya, or the 'Abode of Snow.' From Himas the Greeks made Imas: Enochos seems to be derived from Himoda, or 'snowy;' Himados, Himadma, and Himadinma, which are appellatives of the same import, are also found in the Puranas; from these is probably derived Imamas, which is the name of a famous mountain in Lesser Asia, and is certainly part of the Hindustan mountains; which, according to the Puranas, extend from sea to sea. The western part of this range was called Taurus; and Strabo says (lib. xi. p. 519.) that Mount Imas was called also Taurus. The etymology of this last appellation is rather obscure; but since the Brahmins insist that Tsch'hrashtan is corrupted from Tushara-shthin, by which appellative the country is distinguished in the Puranas; and that Tim is derived from Tushara, its Sanscrit name, the sh being quiescent; may we not equally suppose, that Taurus is derived from Tushara, or Tushahra? for this last form is used also; but only in declensions, for the sake of derivation. Tushara signifies 'snow;' Tushara-shthin, or Tushara-reshthin, the place or abode of snow; and Tusharah, in a derivative form, the country of snow.' CAUSEWAY. A raised way, or path. 1 Chron. xxvi. 16; 2 Chron. ix. 4. One of these prepared ways is no doubt referred to in Isai. lii. 10, which Mr. Taylor thus renders—

Pass, pass, the gates;
Level (even) the way for the people;
Throw up (even) the causeway—lit. raise, raise,
the raised way, (Eng. ver. highway.)
Clear it from every stone;
Display a standard to the people.

Mr. Harmer would refer the fourth member of this sentence, to the heapsing up stones by the way of land-marks, to direct travellers in their way. While giving his interpretation, he properly hints that where a causeway had already levelled and fixed the road, that further labor of raising mounds was unnecessary. As to the nature of these causeways, (called in this place Tushara, mazid.) George Berkeley has given the meaning of this way of the Lord, (p. 170.) "A word of our last night's journey, [in Hyrcania, i.e. Persia; the country to which Isaiah alludes.] The part most of the night we rode upon a paved causeway, broad enough for ten horses to go abreast; built by extraordinary labor and expense, over a part of a great desert; which is so even that it affords a large horizon; howbeit, being of a boggy, loose ground upon the surface, it is covered with white salt, in some places a yard deep, a miserable passage! for, if either the wind drive the loose salt abroad, which is like dust; or that by accident the horse or camel forsake the causeway, the bog is not strong enough to uphold them, but suffers them to sink past all recovery."—he then compares this to the Roman via militaris, whose foundations were laid with huge piles, or stakes, pitched into a bog, and fastened together with branches or withes of wood; upon which rubbish was spread, and gravel or stones afterwards laid, to make the ground more firm and solid. Now, if the prophet Isaiah meant such a causeway as Herbert describes, passing over a bog, the manner of its preparation afforded no stones to be gathered into a heap for the purpose of forming land-marks; but, if it passed where stones or gravel, dust, &c. might take the place of the loose salt in Herbert's narration, then we see the import of the prophet's expressions: 'Sweep away every impediment; whatever may render travelling incommodious; to the very stones and dust which may occasionally accumulate, even on a solidly constructed causeway.'—Thenenot and Hanway also, occasionally, mention causeways in Persia. The reader cannot but have observed the reduplication of the commanding words, "Pass, pass; throw up, throw up;" i.e. continue passing till all be passed; continue throwing up, for a considerable distance, a long way. So Sir J. northward the translation of the whole renders thus, "To whom I wish that all the world may pay homage;" but he says, "In the Persian it is, That all souls may serve his name, his name." He adds, "Repetition is a figure very frequent in the oriental languages, and with this interpolation, i.e. the word of the sacred language, of which there are a thousand examples in the original Bible; as in Ps. cxviii. 12. 'They are fled, they are fled;' that is, they are absolutely fled. The whole of the preceding illustration is founded upon the false supposition, that the Hebrew אָשַׁר, mesilith, means every where causeway, or elevated road. This is, no doubt, its original meaning; but there can be also no doubt that, like our word highway, it had departed from its primitive sense, and signified, in general, any public way or high-road. This is its meaning in Judg. xx. 31, 32; 1 Sam. vi. 12. In like manner it is used Prov. xvi. 17, in a metaphorical sense, for way, i.e. easter. A passage which is probably not less inexplicable to the English reader, than if it had remained in the original Hebrew. This Psalm was apparently composed while the inspired writer was at a distance from Jerusalem, either in exile or detained by other causes, and thus deprived of the privilege of worshipping Jehovah in his sanctuary. He is thus led to pour out his heart before God, and express his longing desires again to be present at the public national worship of the temple at Jerusalem. Even the birds," he says, "may dwell around thine altars; (see Altar.) and how happy are they who inhabit thy house, who may worship thee continually! Happy they whose glory is in thee, and in whose heart the ways!" i.e. the highways which lead to Jerusalem, where the temple is, and the pleasure of thy worship is to be enjoyed. The sense here is, 'Happy are those who glory in thee, and who delight to tread the ways which lead to thy presence;" in allusion, no doubt, to the journeys made to Jerusalem, when "the tribes went up to worship." Such are their joy and confidence in God, that the most desolate tracts become to them as a fruitful country. (See under Baca.) They go on from strength to strength, i.e. increasing in strength—not like other travellers, wasting away with fatigue, but gaining strength daily as they advance towards Zion, through the rejoicing of their hearts in view of the delights of the temple worship. Thus the Psalmist describes the emotions of those who thus dwell in Zion, or who may visit it when they will; and he expresses his longing desire, that this privilege may again be his. In accordance with this view, the Psalm may be translated as follows:—

How lovely are thy tabernacles, Jehovah of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea, fainteth, for the courts of Jehovah; My heart and my flesh cry out for the living God! Even the sparrow hath found a dwelling, And the swallow a nest for herself, where she may place her young,
Even thine altars, Jehovah of Hosts, my King, and my God;
Happy are the dwellers in thine house, who continually praise thee!
Happy those who glory in thee; in whose hearts are the ways to Zion.
Passing through a vale of weeping (or desolate valley) they convert it into a fountain, Yea, with blessings the early rain doth cover it! They go from strength to strength; they appear each before God in Zion. "R."

It is usually understood that the prophet Isaiah (chap. xl. 3) alludes to the custom of sending persons, as we might say, laborers, pioneers, before a great prince, to clear the way for his passage.

The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, "Prepare (even) ye the way of the Lord; Make straight in the desert a highway for our God; Even the valley shall be raised; And every mountain and hill shall be lowered; And the winding paths shall be made straight; And the broken (rough) places level."

It was the common practice, when monarchs travelled, that the ways were made or repaired before them. (See Arrian. Exped. Alex. M. iv. 30. Diod. Sic. ii. 13.) The following is from sir Thomas Roe's chaplain, (p. 408.) and affords a happy comment on the passage: "I, waiting upon my lord ambassador two years, and part of a third, and travelling with him in progress with that king, [the Mogul], in the most temperate months there, twixt September and April, were in one of our progresses twixt Mands and Amsundar, nineteen days, making but short journeys in a wilderness, where (by a very great company) sent before us, to make those passages and places fit to receive us) a way was cut out, and made even, broad enough for our convenient passage; and in the place where we pitched our tents a great compass of ground was rid, and made plain for them, by grubbing a number of trees and bushes; yet there we went as readily to our tents as we did when they were set up in the plains."

CEDAR, a tree greatly celebrated in the Scriptures. A few are still standing on mount Lebanon, above Byblos and Tripoli east; but none elsewhere in these mountains. In former times there must have been a great abundance of them, since they were used in so many extensive buildings. These cedar trees are not like other trees, wasting away with fog and fatigue, but gaining strength daily as they advance towards Zion, through the rejoicing of their hearts in view of the delights of the temple worship. Thus the Psalmist describes the emotions of those who thus dwell in Zion, or who may visit it when they will; and he expresses his longing desire, that this privilege may again be his. CEDAR, a tree greatly celebrated in the Scrip-

This celebrated tree, the Pinus cedrus of botanists, is not peculiar to mount Lebanon, but grows also upon Mount Ararat and Taurus Minor, and in other parts of the Levant; but does not elsewhere reach the size and height of those on Lebanon. It has also been cultivated in the gardens of Europe; two venerable individuals of this species exist at Chiswick in England; and there is a very beautiful one in the Jardin des plantes in Paris. The beauty of this tree consists in the proportion and symmetry of its wide-spreading branches. The gum, which exudes both from the trunk and the branches, is, according to Schultz, (Leitungen, &c. v. p. 453.) "soft like balsam; its fragrance is like that of the balsam of Mekka. Everything about this tree has a strong balsamic odor; and hence the whole grove is so pleasant and fragrant, that it is delightful to walk in." This is probably the smell of Lebanon spoken of in Cant. iv. 11; Hos. xiv. 6. The wood is peculiarly adapted to building, because it is not subject to decay, nor to be eaten by worms; hence it was much used for rafters, and for boards with which to cover houses and form the floors and ceiling of rooms. The palace of Persepolis, the temple at Jericho, and Solomon’s palace, were all in this way built with the cedars, and the cedar appears to have had in it such a quantity of this wood, that it was called “the house of the forest of Lebanon.” 1 Kings viii. 9; x. 17. The ships of the Tyrians had also mass of cedars; Ezek. xxvii. 5.

Of the size of these trees the cedars, at the present day, are the largest: the branches always extending to the heavens. The average size of the old cedars of Lebanon is several hundred feet in height, and the branches are spread in all directions. The branches and foliage of the others were lower; but I saw none whose leaves touched the ground, like those in Kew gardens. The trunks of the old trees are covered with the same moss and lichens that have covered the persons who have visited them. I saw a date of the seventeenth century. The trunks of the oldest trees seem to be quite dead; the wood is of a gray tint. I took off a piece of one of them, but it was afterwards sold. The cedar grows in rocks in Lebanon, and in forests.

Dr. Richardson visited the cedars in his way from Bealbee to Tripoli, in 1818. From the summit of the mountain, the descent towards the west, he says, “is rather precipitous, and winds, by a long, serpentine direction, down to the summit of the ridge of Lebanon. This cedar consists of a few very old trees, intermingled with a large number of younger ones. The former are the picture of the vegetable world; it is certain that the latter two hundred years at least, but their number is increasing, as the oldest decay or are destroyed. In 1550, the number of these ancient trees was stated by Belus to be in 28; from that time down to 1818, they are stated at 28, 28, 16, 15, and 7. Mr. Fisk, in 1856, states that there are 6 of the largest; but does not see the propriety of the statements last enumerated. See the extract from his journal below. As the subject is interesting, the following extracts from various travellers who have visited the spot, are subjoined. It will be seen that the account given by Mr. Fisk is the most full and satisfactory.

Masoudi writes, in 1858, as follows: “These noble trees grow among the snow, near the highest part of Lebanon, and are remarkable, as well for their own age and largeness, as for those frequent allusions made to them in the word of God. Here are some of them very old, and of a prodigious boughs and branches, from which, the former I could reckon up only sixteen, and the latter are very numerous. I measured one of the largest, and found it twelve yards six inches in girth, and yet sound, and thirty-seven yards in the spread of its boughs. At about five or six yards from the ground, it was divided into five limbs, each of which was equal to a great tree.”

Pococke, in 1738, describes them with greater minuteness: “The cedars form a grove about a mile in breadth, from which we have seen a few of the great cedars, that are near to one another, a great number of young cedars, and some pines. The great cedars, at some distance, look like very large spreading oaks; the bodies of the trees are short, dividing at the top into branches, which, growing together for about ten feet, appear something like those Gothic columns which seem to be composed of several pillars. Higher up, they begin to spread horizontally. The young cedars are not easily known from pines; I observed, they bear a greater quantity of fruit than the large ones. The wood does not differ from white deal in appearance, nor does it seem to be harder. It has a fine smell, but not so fragrant as the juniper of America, which is commonly called cedar; and it also falls short of it in beauty. I took a piece of the wood from a great tree that was blown down by the wind, and left there to rot. There are fifteen large ones standing.

Burckhardt speaks of the cedars in 1810, as follows: “They stand on uneven ground, and form a small wood. Of the oldest and best looking trees, I counted eleven or twelve; twenty-five were very large ones, about fifty of middling size, and more than three hundred smaller and young ones. The oldest trees are distinguished by having the foliage and small branches of the tree, or even seven trunks springing from one base. The branches and foliage of the others were lower; but I saw none whose leaves touched the ground, like those in Kew gardens. The trunks of the old trees are covered with the same moss and lichens that have covered the persons who have visited them. I saw a date of the seventeenth century. The trunks of the oldest trees seem to be quite dead; the wood is of a gray tint. I took off a piece of one of them, but it was afterwards sold. The cedar grows in rocks in Lebanon, and in forests.

Under date of October 4, 1853, the American missionaries, Messrs. Fisk and King, record in their journal the following description of Lebanon: “Taking a guide, we set out for the cedars, going a little south of east. In about two hours we came in sight of them, and in another hour reached them. Instead of being on the highest summit of Lebanon, and fifteen miles from the sea, they are situated at the foot of a high mountain, in what may be considered as the arena of a vast amphitheatre, opening to the west, with high mountains on the north, south, and east. The cedars stand on five or six gentle elevations, and occupy a spot of ground about three fourths of a mile in circumference. I walked around it in fifteen minutes. We measured a number of the trees. The largest is upwards of 40 feet in circumference. Six or eight others are also very large, several of them nearly the size of the largest. But each of these was manifestly two trees or more, which have grown together, and now form one. They generally separate a few feet from the ground into the original trees. The handbook and tallest are those of two or three feet in diameter, the body straight, the branches almost horizontal, forming a beautiful cone, and casting a goodly shade. We measured the length of two by the shade, and found each about
CEN

The largest are not so high, but some of the others, I think, are a little higher. They produce a conical fruit, in shape and size like that of the pine. I counted them, and made the whole number 339.

Mr. King counted them, omitting the small saplings, and made the number 321. I know not why travellers and authors have so long and so generally given 29, 30, 15, 5, or 12, as the number of the cedars. It is true, that "of those of superior size and antiquity," there are not a great number; but then there is a regular gradation in size, from the largest down to the narrow sapling. One man, of whom I inquired, said that the cedars of Lebanon were so scarce that they were placed on the mount Lebanon, but he could not tell where. Several others, to whom I have put the question, have unanimously assured me that these are the only cedars which exist on the mountain. They are called "the Cedars of Lebanon," and have an annual feast, which they call the Feast of the Cedars. Before seeing the cedars, I had met with a European traveller who had just visited them. He gave a short account of them, and concluded with saying, "It is as with miracles; the wonder all vanishes when you reach the spot." What is there at which an infidel cannot sneer? Yet let even an infidel put himself in the place of an Asiatic passing from barren desert to barren desert, traversing oceans of sand and mountains of naked rock, accustomed to countries like Egypt, Arabia, Judea, and Asia Minor, abounding, in the best places, only with shrubbery and fruit trees; let him, with the feelings of such a man, climb the rugged rocks, and pass the open ravines of Lebanon, and suddenly descend, among the hills, a grove of 300 trees such as the cedars actually are, even at the present day, and he will confess that a fine comparison in Amos ii. 8, "Whose height was as tall as the cedars," is not strong enough. Let him, after a long ride in the heat of the sun, sit down under the shade of a cedar, and contemplate the exact conical form of its top, and the beautiful symmetry of its branches, and he will no longer wonder that David compared the people of Israel, in the days of their prosperity, to the "goodly cedars." Psalm lxx. 10. A traveller, who had just left the forests of America, might think this little grove of cedars not worthy of so much notice, but the infidel who knows how rare laurel is, and how difficult it is to find timber for building, will feel at once that what is said in Scripture of these trees is perfectly natural. It is probable that in the days of Solomon and Hiram, there were extensive forests of cedars on Lebanon; a variety of causes may have contributed to their diminution and almost total extinction. Yet, in comparison with all the other trees that I have seen on the mountain, the few that remain may still be called "the glory of Lebanon." (Mayssony, Ely, 1824, p. 467.)

CENCREA, a port of Corinth, whence Paul sailed for Ephesus, Acts xviii. 18. [It was situated on the eastern side of the isthmus, about 70 stadia from the city. The other port, on the western side of the isthmus, was Leuctra.]

CENSEN, a vessel in which fire and incense were carried in certain parts of the Hebrew worship. It appears, from numerous instances, that the services of a Jewish worship, under the Mosaic dispensation, resembled those usually addressed to monarchs and sovereigns among the orientals; and there can be little doubt, that the Hebrews directed them to a person understood to be resident in the sanctuary, before which, and in which, they were performed.

This notion of Jewish services was so strong among the heathen, that we find they reported the object of worship in the temple at Jerusalem to be an old man with a long beard. That report might possibly originate in the description of the Ancient of Days, by the prophet Daniel. However that might be, it is generally concluded that the attendants on the temple were nearly similar to the attendants on royalty, and dignity in general; and many external acts of worship were of the same appearance and import. We have no custom of burning perfumes, as a mode of doing honor; and though the church of Rome has abandoned one of the censers in the altar, it is a part of sacred worship, not of civil gratulation. On the contrary, in the East, fumigation forms a part of civil entertainment; and is never omitted when it is intended to compliment a guest. Being thus general, and in the most solemn acts of his public ministration, used incense—a cloud of incense, in approaching to the more immediate presence of the Deity, is a part of sacred worship, not of civil gratulation, and the priests in their ordinary service, as well as the high-priest in the most solemn acts of his public ministration, used incense—a cloud of incense, in approaching to the more immediate presence of the Deity, is a part of sacred worship, not of civil gratulation, is employed among the Jews.

Censer, which have been received from heathen antiquity, and those used in the Romish worship also, being suspended by chains, give, not unfrequently, erroneous ideas of this sacred utensil, as employed among the Jews.

Little is known on the form and nature of the ancient Hebrew censer. The censers which have been received from heathen antiquity, and those used in the Romish worship also, being suspended by chains, give, not unfrequently, erroneous ideas of this sacred utensil, as employed among the Jews. The Hebrew has two words, both rendered censer in our translation. The first (miktéreth, machath) describes the censers of Aaron, and of Korah and his company, Lev. x. 1; Numb. xvi. 6. It appears, that these were of brass, or copper; also, that after the death of those who had presumptuously used them, they were beaten into broad plates for a covering to the altar. From this application of the term, we infer, that they were probably cast, nor of great thickness, nor made of small pieces; but that they were thin, and their plates of considerable surface. This term continued to denote a censer under the monarchy; for we read, 1 Kings v. 50, and 2 Chron. iv. 29, of censers (miktéreth) of gold, made by Solomon. [This Hebrew word, according to its etymology, would signify a fire-pan, or coal-pan, and was probably not much different, as to form, from a fire-shovel; which agrees well with the above description of these trees are in Asia Minor, and how difficult it is to find timber for building,]

From 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, we learn that king Uzziah attempted to "burn incense in the house of the Lord, having a censer in his hand." The word is different from the former, (miktéreth, miktéreth) and seems to import an instrument of incense. It is probable that the censer, if not a profane, (possibly, of an idolatrous, or Jewish, nature) for Ezekiel says, (viii. 11,) that the seventy apostate Jews engaged in idolatrous worship had every man his censer (miktéreth) in his hand. The same may be inferable from 2 Chron. xxxii. 14, where it is recorded, that Hezekiah and his people took away the idolatrous altars that were in Jerusalem; with all the censers for incense. However, it must not hastily be concluded that this article was wholly idolatrous; for we read, in Exod. xxx. 1, "Thou shalt make an altar (miktéreth, miktéreth) to burn with fire, of which kind also was legally adopted in divine worship. It deserves notice, that the censers are described as holding them in their hands; but this position is not, that we recollect, assigned to the machath, or censer of Aaron. This leads to the conclusion, that the miktéreth may be considered as a kind of censer, carried in the hand; not alone, as the heat arising from the burning embers it contained would be disgracefully great, but in a kind of dish, which dish, with the censer in it, was placed on the altar of incense, and, diffusing a smoke, morning and evening, during the trimming of the lamps, &c. Exod. xxx. 7, 8. Apparently, this was regarded as an inferior kind of censer, appropriate to the priests, and common to them all; but whether the other kind (the mizbeqā) was peculiar to the high-priest, is not clear: we find it used by the sons of Aaron, (Lev. x. i.) but that was an irregularity, and was punished as such. It is mentioned, also, as being employed by 250 of the associates of Korah; but that was in rebellion, and proved fatal to the transgressor.

The Hebrew word for this species of censer (תַּנִּשׁ) signifies, properly, incense-pan, i.e. a vessel for burning incense. It differs from the former kind, therefore, in the stigmata of design, but that it differs from it in any other way, we have no means of ascertaining. The difference which it is here attempted to establish, rests, therefore, merely on conjecture. The two names may have not improbably signified the same identical instrument; being called in one case, fire-pan, because it contained fire; and in the other, smoke-pan, or incense-pan, because incense was put upon the fire within it. So of the remarks which follow; except that the Greek φυλαξ means not real, but kept, hid, kept.

A similar distinction of censers is observed in the New Testament; for the twenty-four elders (Rev. v. 8.) had golden vials full of odors; (φυλάκια) but (chap. viii. 3.) the angel had a golden censer, (λιθοτυρός). These vials were not small bottles, such as we call vials; which idea arises instantly by association in our minds; but they were of the nature of the censers and dishes, above spoken of; (compared to, and saucer.) This gives a very different idea to chap. xv. 8; xvi. 1. &c. of the same book, where the vials having the wrath of God, are poured out; for if they contained fire, that is a fit emblem of wrath; and burning embers may be described as poured out from a censer, with great propriety. Nothing can be more apparent, if we suppose, for instance, the censed to be wholly removed; in which state the bowl of it, perhaps, may be that described by the Apocalypse as a vessel of fire, and it might conveniently contain the fire to be poured out from it. This is perfectly agreeable to its form and services as a censer, and to the nature and use of the ancient censers.

We ought also to remark, that bearing censers is an office of servants, in attendance on their superiors—the same office anciently, in the temple, no doubt, denoted waiting on the Deity—being occupied in his service—in attendance on him. This action, therefore, demonstrates the devotedness to false gods, of those who worshipped them, by bearing censers to honor their images; especially when it is recollected, that offering incense was connected with addresses and prayers.

CERASTES, a serpent so called, because it has horns on its forehead. It hides in the sand, is of a sandy color, crawls slanting on its side, and seems to hiss when in motion. The word occurs only in Gen. xxxii. 17: “And shall be a serpent by the way, a cerastes, in the English text adder, in the margin dard-snake, that is, the dart-snake, or jactus,” in the path.” The Hebrew נחש, shephishon, is by some interpreted asp, by others basilisk; but Bochart prefers the cerastes.

CEREMONIES, the external rites of religion. Essential worship was prayer, worship in spirit and in truth; but still, ceremonies and external worship make a part, and a necessary part, of religion. Without them, religious services would be confusion, and worship would degenerate into superstition. It is not delivered the great precepts of his law. No ceremonies were prescribed till afterwards; and they were then intended to check that inclination which the Hebrews had discovered to idolatry, and to bind them with the yoke of ceremonies. (Acts xv. 10.) that they might be induced to desire, with more ardor, the coming of their great Deliverer. In the new covenant, few ceremonies are enjoined; and they are employed as means only, not as the end; and in consequence to the weakness of the worships, who are men, and not angels.

It has been questioned whether the ceremonies of the Jews were imitated from the Egyptians, or vice versa. Sir John Meadler and Dr. Spencer have attempted to prove the former; and they have had many followers. Indeed there is great resemblance between certain ceremonies, which were common to both people; while in other particulars there are differences which appear to be even studied and aimed at in the descent to the customs, prejudices, honors, inclinations, and even hardness of the Hebrews’ hearts, may have permitted or prohibited certain practices, which were permitted or prohibited among the Egyptians; and he might, for the same reasons, borrow something from the forms of their temples and their altars.

But there is another consideration, which has been suggested, and that ought not to be overlooked in the determination of the question: the origin of the covenant ceremonies be wholly removed; in which state the bowl of it, perhaps, may be that described by the Apocalypse as a vessel of fire, and it might conveniently contain the fire to be poured out from it. This is perfectly agreeable to its form and services as a censer, and to the nature and use of the ancient censers.

We ought also to remark, that bearing censers is an office of servants, in attendance on their superiors—the same office anciently, in the temple, no doubt, denoted waiting on the Deity—being occupied in his service—in attendance on him. them as the Egyptians had retained, though intermingled among others not so authorized, Moses adopted—see Deut. viii. 24. He was the instrument of reforming the religious worship of his time—and to these institutions, thus sifted from the chaff of human additions, he added others congenial in their nature, particularly adapted to the temper, circumstances, and future situation of the Jewish people. These additions are truly the Mosaic, and were intended to preserve that people distinct and separate from all others. How well they have answered this purpose, appears not only from the evidences of it in their history, but from what, in their present dispersed state, they daily offer to our eyes. Are they not now a distinct people, still preserved as memorials confirming historic truth, while nations much more powerful, and which long triumphed over them, are extinct—mingled among those who have conquered them—and no longer nations?—This leads us to reflect, that the design of these rites was not merely to keep the Jews from idolatry, but that, after they were no longer exposed to that temptation, they should be thereby preserved as a standing evidence of the truth of prophecy, of the providence of God displayed toward them, and especially of the verity of Jesus Christ, of his apostles, and of the Christian religion in general. Such they will continue, so long as their testimony continues to be needful.

CESAR, CESARIA, see Cæsar, Cæsarea.

CESTIUS GALLUS, a Roman governor of Syria, under whose government the Jews began their return from Babylon.

CHAFF, the refuse of winnowed corn. The ungodly are represented as the chaff; a simile most forcible and appropriate. Whatever defence they may afford to the saints, who are the wheat, they are in which, as in its widest exposition, to be driven away by the wrath of God's wrath, Psalm i. 4; Matt. iii. 12, &c. False doctrines are called chaff; they are unproductive, and cannot abide the trial of the word and of the Spirit of God, Jer. xxxiii. 28. See BARSTIM BY FIRE.

CHALCEDONY, a precious stone, in color like a carbuncle, Rev. xxi. 19. It is said to have derived its name from Chaledon, a city of Bithynia, opposite to Byzantium, and from which it derives its color. It comprises several varieties, one of which is the modern carnelian. Some have supposed this to be the stone also called naphth, Exod. xxviii. 18. translated "emerald."

CHALDEA, a country in Asia, the capital of which was Babylon. See BABYLON. It was originally of small extent, but the empire being afterwards very much enlarged, the name is generally taken in a more extensive sense, and includes Babylonia. See CHALDEANS.

CHALDEANS. This name is taken, (1) for the people of Chaldea, and the subjects of that empire generally.

(2) For philosophers, naturalists, or soothsayers, whose principal employment was the study of mathematics and astrology; by which they pretended to foreknow the destiny of men born under certain constellations.

The difficulty of determining the name and derivation of the Chaldeans being great, it may be proper to introduce a few considerations on the subject; some of them, for their matter, are principally taken from Mr. Bryant; though the conclusion they are intended to support, will differ considerably from the hypothesis of that very learned writer. Scripture does not afford any name from which the appellation Chaldæa can be regularly derived; but, Mr. Taylor thinks, we may safely consider the Babylonians and the Chaldeans as being in whole, or in part, the same people; for we read that—"Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, was a Chaldean, (Chaldæa,) Ezek. v. 12. that—when Darius the Mede obtained the throne of the Chaldees, (Chaldæa), Dan. i. 1. That—when the Babylonian army besieged Jerusalem, it was the army of the Chaldees, (Cassidim,) 2 Kings xxv. 4, 10; Jer. lii. 8. and—Babylon being called "the beauty of the Chaldees excellence," (Is. xiii. 19.) is evidence sufficient to this point. By inquiring who were the Babylonians, we may approach, he remarks, toward determining who were the Chaldeans; and if we look to Gen. xi. 2. we shall find that the inhabitants of this country journeyed from the East, Kedem, which Kedem denotes the neighborhood of Caucasus. We are next to remember that these Chaldeans worshipped fire, and light, under the name of Aur, Ur, Or, or Our, all words of the same sound, and varied only in spelling or in writing, by different nations; so that, whether we find Aurie, or Ourie, the meaning is the same. The following are testimonies to our purpose:—

Upon the banks of the great river Ind.
The southern Scuthæa dwell: which river pays
Its watery tribute to that mighty sea,
Styried Erythrean. Far removed its source,
Amid the stormy cliffs of Caucasus:
Descending once through many winding vale,
It separates vast nations. To the west
The Orizt live.

Meaning, that the Aurie live west of the source of the Indus, in mount Caucasus; which the reader will find agrees with our position of Kedem. This is Mr. Bryant's version of a passage in the poet Dionysius. (Anc. Myth. vol. i. p. 226.) He says, (Obs. 253.) "The Chaldeans were the most ancient inhabitants of the country called by their name; there are no other principals, to whom we may refer their original. They seem to have been the most early constituted and settled of any people on earth. They seem to be the only people which did not migrate at the general exodus out of Egypt west; and eastward to the Ganges." Mr. Taylor is of opinion, however, that by means of captain Wilford's account of Caucasus, under that article, we may conceive, without much danger of error, of the Semitic Chaldees. Scripture says, that Cassidim, as being closely related, if not the same people, originally; for we learn, as he adds, that "they are a very ancient tribe," are mentioned in the Institutes of Menu; and that their ancestor, Zeus Cassandra, is supposed to have lived before the flood; and to have given name to the mountains he seized. Their station, then, is Caucasus. But when a considerable division of mankind withdrew to Shinar, they were accompanied by a certain proportion of Chassas, or Cassidim, who, being a superior caste, or inheriting stations of trust and dignity, (i. e. priests, if not governors also; or a body out of which the kings were elected,) gave name to the Babylonian kingdom; which is called the kingdom of the Cassidim, or Chassas. Something of this distinction is connected with the patriarch Abraham. We know he was of Kedem; not of Babylonia; yet Eusebius says, Abraham was a Chaldean by descent (το ναγκρ Χαλδηος). Admitting, then, the Cassidim to be de-ascent in the direct line of Shem, (see Beros,) a priest himself; this branch of his posterity might retain their right to the priestly office, transmitted from father to son, and not fall into decay. Diodorus Siculus (lib. ii. cap. xi.) gives the character of the Chaldeans at large; we select the following passage:

"The Chaldeans are descended from the most ancient families of Babylon, and they maintain a manner of life resembling that of the priests of Egypt. For in order to become more learned, and more equal to the service of the gods, they continually apply themselves to philosophy, and have procured, above all, a great reputation in astronomy. They study with great care the art of divination. They forecast the future, and believe themselves able to ward off evils, and to procure benefits, by their expiations, by their sacrifices, and by their enchantments. They have also experience in presages by the flight of birds; and are versed in the interpretation of dreams and prodigies. Beside this, they consult the astral influences of victors, and infer predictions, which are considered as certain. Among the Chaldeans this philosophy remains constantly in the possession of the same family; passing from father to sons, and this, only, they study. . . . They consider matter as eternal, neither needing generation, nor subject to corruption. But they believe that the arrangement and order of the world is the result of divine intelligence, and that all which appears in the heavens, or on earth, is the effect, not of a casual or of a fatal necessity, but of the wisdom and power of the gods. The Chaldeans also having made numerous observations on the stars, and knowing more perfectly than other astrologers their motions and their influences, they forecast to men the most part of those events which will hereafter befall them. They consider, above all, as a point of difficulty and of consequence, the theory of the five stars, which they call Satyrians, and we call planets, especially Saturna. Nevertheless, they say that the sun is not only the most splendid of the heavenly bodies, but also that from which may be drawn most indications of great events. . . . They conceive that the five planets command thirty sublunar stars, which they call counsellor-gods, of which one half rules over what is above the earth, or what passes in heaven, the other half observes the actions of men. Every ten days a messenger-star is dispatched, to know what is in the mind of the gods, and what is the condition of the earth below. They reckon twelve superior gods, who preside each over a month, and a sign in the zodiac. The sun, the moon, and the five planets, go through these twelve signs; the sun takes one year to perform this course; the moon performs it in one month. Each planet has his proper period, but the revolutions of these bodies differ greatly in time and rapidity. The stars, they affirm, influence particularly over men at their birth; and the knowledge of their aspects at that moment, contributes much to reveal the blessings or the evils which they may expect. . . . They form, beyond the limits of the zodiac, twenty-four constellations, twelve northern and twelve southern; the twelve visible together rule over the living; the twelve invisible rule over the dead; and they consider them as judges over all men. The moon, say they, is below all the stars and all the planets; and her revolution is complete in a shorter time. . . . The Chaldeans, in short, are the most eminent astrologers in the world, and this art more carefully than any other nation. But we cannot easily believe what they advance on the great antiquity of their early observations: for, according to them, they began 572,600 years before the passage of Alexander into Asia."

These extant evidences of the Chaldeans to hold very similar notions with the ancient Persian Magi. The interpreter-stars of one are, evidently, the mediator-stars of the other: the messenger-stars are the watchers of Daniel; or analogous to the Satan of Job; and on the reports of such messengers, no doubt, the counsellor-gods formed their decrees; as in the instance of Nebuchadnezzar. From this account, the reader will also understand by what right the Babylonian monarch called on his Chaldeans, his wise men, and astrologers, to explain that revelation which he conceived had been made to him by the celestial guardians of his person and kingdom. Philostorus (Vit. Apollon. lib. ii.) says, the Indi are the wisest of all mankind. The Ethiopians (the oriental Ethiopians) are a colony from them; and they inherit the wisdom of their forefathers. The hieroglyphic signs, says Cassiodorus, (lib. iii. epist. 2. 51.) are Chaldaic signs of words, which were used, as letters are, for the purpose of information. Zonaras (v. i. p. 22.) says, the most approved copy of Homer, is that which came from Chaldea to Egypt; and from thence was passed into Greece. The philosophy of this people was greatly celebrated. Alexander visited the chief person of the country, who were esteemed professors of science. Consider the pre-eminence given to Solomon, (1 Kings iv. 30.) and fuller—more extensive—was the wisdom of Solomon, beyond the wisdom of all the sons of Kedem, and beyond all the wisdom of Miriam; and with this character compare that of the Chaldeans, as above, and that of the original Indi, who are Chaldeans, and sons of Kedem too. We find they worshipped fire, so that they were Aarites; and, in short, that Or of the Chaldeans might be the residence of such professors, and such devotees; for which reason Abraham went direct to it. On the whole, we may consider the Chalda, or Chaldeans, as the philosophers or the priestly order, among the Babylonians; and rather a cast among a nation, than a nation of themselves; such as the Brahmins of India, a race by their own acknowledgment not truly Indian) are at this day; who preserve knowledge, if any be preserved; who perform religious functions, and are supposed to maintain the truth of religion officially, and whose orders sometimes are general below. . . . We must so much that if we should say of Abraham—he came from Ur, a city of the Brahmins; or if we should say—the Brahmins were the wisest of all mankind, yet Solomon was wiser than they were; though we should certainly offend against terms and titles, yet we should possibly be tolerably near to a fair notion of the Chasidim of Scripture, and of their character. [The view above taken of the Chaldeans, can hardly be termed satisfactory; and the character assigned to them as a people is certainly not accordant throughout with the representations of Scripture. They are, indeed, described as wise and learned, so that the name Chaldeon is also taken directly for a learned man, an astrologer, &c. but they are also described as being warlike, fierce, and accused of a hard heart, Hab. i. 11. It will therefore not be inappropriate to exhibit here the views entertained respecting the origin of this people by Vitringa; (Comm. in Jea. tom. i. p. 412, ad Jea. xiii. 18.) and after them by Gesenius, Rosenmuller, and Gesenius, Comm. in Jea. xxiii. 13. Rosenmuller, Bibl. Geogr. l. ii. p. 36, seq.)

The Chaldeans, called every where in the Hebrew
CHALDEANS

Scriptures Caedias, were a warlike people, who originally inhabited the Carduchian mountains, north of Assyria, and near the eastern part of Mesopotamia. According to Xenophon, (Cyrop. ii. 2. 7.) the Chaldeans dwelt in the mountains adjacent to Armenia; and they are found in this same region in the campaign of the younger Cyrus, and the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks. (Xen. Anab. iv. 3. 4; v. 5. 9; vii. 8. 14.) That they were genetically allied to the Hebrews appears from Gen. xxii. 22; where Chasid, ( massa, whence Caedias,) the ancestor of this people, is mentioned as a son of Nahor, and was, consequently, the nephew of Abraham. And further, Abraham himself emigrated to the land of Canaan from Ur of the Chaldeans, Ur-Caedia; (Gen. xi. 28; Neh. ix. 7.) and in Judg. v. 6, the Hebrews are said to be descendents of the Chaldeans. The region around the river Chaboras, in the north of Mesopotamia, is called by Ezekiel (1. 3.) the Land of the Chaldeans; although this may be perhaps taken in a wider sense for the Chaldean or Babylonian empire. Jeremiah calls them (v. 15.) "an ancient nation." As the Assyrian monarchs extended their conquests towards the north and west, the Chaldeans came also under their dominion; and this rough and energetic people appear to have assumed, under the sway of their conquerors, a new character, by means of the removal of a portion of them to Babylon; where they were probably placed to ward off the irritations of the neighboring Arabian. We may suppose, too, that some special form of government was assigned to them, in order to convert them from a rude horde into a civilized people. Still an important part of the Chaldeans must have remained in their ancient country, and continued true to their ancient modes of life; for in the time of Xenophon they appear under the same princeval character and manners, (see above,) and enjoyed, also, under the Persians, a certain degree of liberty. (Are not the Kurds, who have inhabited these regions, at least, since the middle ages, and whose character and mode of life agree with Xenophon's description of the Chaldeans, probably the descendants of that people? See Gesenius Comm. x. Jos. Th. i. p. 274.) That this establishment of the Chaldeans in Babylon did not take place long before the time of Shalmaneser, (about 730 B.C.) may be inferred from the fact, that Isaiah (xxviii. 13.) calls the Chaldeans a very ancient people, by the own-account. A very vivid and graphic description of the Chaldean warrior is given by the prophet Habakkuk, who probably lived about the time when they first made incursions into Palestine or the adjacent regions, c. i. 6-11.

6. For lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, A bitter and hasty nation, Which marches far and wide in the earth, To possess the dwellings that are not theirs.
7. They are terrible and dreadful, Their decrees and their judgments proceed only from themselves.
8. Swifter than leopards are their horses, And fiercer than the evening wolves. Their horsemen prance proudly around; And their horsemen shall come from afar and fly, Like the eagle when he pouncs on his prey.
9. They all shall come for violence, In troops,—their glance is ever forward! They gather captives like the sand!
10. And they scoff at kings,

And princes are a scorn unto them. They deride every strong hold. They are a northward people; every one that makest a mouth against it shall perish. 11. Then reneweth his spirit, and transgresses and is guilty; For this his power is his God.

This warlike people must, in a short time, and in an important degree, have obtained the upper hand in the Assyrian empire. For about 120 years after Esarhaddon, (see BABYLONIA, and ESARHADDON,) i.e. about 667 B.C. Nabopolassar, a viceroy of Babylon, made himself independent of Assyria, contracted an alliance with Cyaxares, king of Media, and with his aid subdued Nineveh and the whole of Assyria. That Nabopolassar was a Chaldean, may be inferred from the fact, that there is afterwards no more mention of Assyrian kings, but only of Chaldean monarchs. Nabopolassar had a powerful enemy in Necho, the king of Egypt, who penetrated, victorious, even to the banks of the Euphrates; while in Syria, Phoenicia, and Judea, all espoused his party. Under these circumstances, Nabopolassar, being already advanced in age, assumed his son Nebuchadnezzar as the partner of his throne. From this period onward, the history of the Chaldeans is given under the article BABYLONIA.

CHAMELEON, see CAMELEON.

CHAMOIS. Our translators have evidently erred in inserting the chamois in Deut. xiv. 5. The Hebrew word is sazer, which the LXX render "Camelepardalis," the Vulgate and the Arabic do the same, the latter rendering "Ziraffo." The ziraffe, or giraffe, however, being a native of the torrid zone, and of Southern Africa, it is equally unlikely that it should be abundant in Judea, and used as an article of food, as that the chamois, which inhabits the chilly regions of mountains only, and seeks their most retired heights, to shelter it from the warmth of summer, preferring those cool retreats where snow and ice Chambers, should be known, among the population of Israel. We must yet wait for authorities to justify a conclusive opinion on this animal. The class of antelopes bids fairest to contain it.

CHAMOS, see CHEMOSH.

CHAVOS, a term expressive of that confusion which overspread matter when first produced; and before God, by his almighty word, had reduced it to order.

CHARACA, a city of Gad, whence Judas Maccabees drove Timotheus, 2 Mac. xii. 17. Probably the same as Charac-Mosab. See SELAH.

CHARIOT. The history of conveyance by means of vehicles, carried or drawn, is a subject too extensive to be treated of fully here.—There can be no doubt, after men had accomplished cattle to submit to the control of a rider, and to support the incumbent weight of a person, or persons, whether the animal were ox, camel, or horse, that the next step was to load such a creature, properly trained, with a litter, or portable conveyance; balanced, perhaps, on each side. This might be long before the mechanism of the wheel was employed; as it is still practised among pastoral people. Nevertheless, we find that wheel carriages are of great antiquity; for we read of wagons so early as Gen. xiv. 19, and military carriages, perhaps for chiefs and officers, first of all, in Exodus xiv. 35, "The Lord took off the chariot of Egypt from the children of Israel, and he fought against Pharaoh's horsemen and his chariots, in the fighting strength of Egypt, this agrees with those ancient writers, who report that Egypt was not, in its early state, intersected by canals, as in latter ages; after the formation of which, wheel carriages were laid aside, and little, if at all, used.

The first mention of chariots occurs Gen. xi. 43, "Pharaoh caused Joseph to ride (rōshah) in the second chariot (merkedeth) that belonged to him." This, most likely, was a chariot of state, not an ordinary, or travelling, but a handborne, equipage; becoming the representative of the monarch's person and power. We find, as already suggested, that Egypt had another kind of wheel-carriage, better adapted to the conveyance of burdens; "take out of the land of Egypt (ēōyegēdēlēth) wagons, wheel-carriages, for conveyance of your little ones, and your women." These were family vehicles, for the use of the free; including, if need be, Jacob himself: accordingly, we read, ver. 27, of the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, and his father, and his brethren. (And Joseph knew by their construction to be Egypt-built; for as soon as he saw them, he believed the report from that country, though he had doubted of them before, when delivered to him by his sons. This kind of chariot deserves attention, as we find it afterwards employed on various occasions of Scripture, among which are the following: first, it was intended by the princes of Israel for carrying parts of the sacred vessels: (Num. vii. 3) "They brought their offering—six covered wagons (ēōyegēdēlēth) and twelve oxen."—(two oxen to each wagon)—here these wagons are expressly said to be covered: and it should appear, that they were so, generally; beyond question, those sent by Joseph for the women of Jacob's family were so; among other purposes, for that of seclusion. Perhaps these wagons might be covered with circular headings, spread on hoops, like those of our own wagons;—what we call a till. Considerable importance attaches to this heading, or till, in the history of the curiosity of the men of Bethshemesh, (1 Sam. vi. 7) where we read that the Philistines advised them to make a new (covered) wagon, or cart (ēōyegēdēlēth); and the ark of the Lord was put into it, —and, no doubt, was carefully covered over—concealed—brought to Bethshemesh, and the men of that town, who were reaping in the fields, perceiving the cart coming, went and examined what it contained;—"and they saw the ark, and were joyful in seeing it." Those, perhaps, who first examined it, instead of carefully covering it up again, as a sacred utensil, suffered it to lie open to common inspection, which they encouraged, in order to triumph in the votive offerings it had acquired, and to gratify profane curiosity;—the Lord therefore punished the people, (ver. 10), "because they had inspected, looked upon, the ark." This affords a clear view of the transgression of these Israelites, who had treated the ark with less reverence than the Philistines themselves; for those heathen conquerors had at least behaved to Jehovah with no less respect than they did to their own deities; and being accustomed to carry them in covered wagons, for privacy, they maintained the same privacy as a mark of honor to the God of Israel. The Levites seem to have been equally culpable with the common people, for, to have submitted to the law, and not to have suffered their triumph on this victorious occasion to beguile them into a transgression so contrary to the very first principles of the theocracy.

That this word ēōyegēdēlēth describes a covered wagon, we learn from a title given to those wagons which Pharaoh put forth (his hand, or some catching instrument) to the ark of God, and laid hold of it, "for the oxen shook it; and the Lord smote him there, and he died on the spot, with the ark of God upon him." And David called the place "the breach of Uzzah."—i. e. where the anger of the Lord broke out against Uzzah.

We may now notice the proportionate severity of the punishments attending profanation of the ark—(1) the Philistines suffered by diseases, from which they were relieved after their oblations.—(2) the Bethshemeshites also suffered, but not fatally, by diseases of a different nature, which, after a time, passed off. These were insensitivities; but, (3) Uzzah— who ought to have been long ago living among his aged patriarch knew by their construction to be Egypt-built; for as soon as he saw them, he believed the report from that country, though he had doubted of them before, when delivered to him by his sons. This kind of chariot deserves attention, as we find it afterwards employed on various occasions of Scripture, among which are the following: first, it was intended by the princes of Israel for carrying parts of the sacred vessels: (Num. vii. 3) "They brought their offering—six covered wagons (ēōyegēdēlēth) and twelve oxen."—(two oxen to each wagon)—here these wagons are expressly said to be covered: and it should appear, that they were so, generally; beyond question, those sent by Joseph for the women of Jacob's family were so; among other purposes, for that of seclusion. Perhaps these wagons might be covered with circular headings, spread on hoops, like those of our own wagons;—what we call a till. Considerable importance attaches to this heading, or till, in the history of the curiosity of the men of Bethshemesh, (1 Sam. vi. 7) where we read that the Philistines advised them to make a new (covered) wagon, or cart (ēōyegēdēlēth); and the ark of the Lord was put into it, —and, no doubt, was carefully covered over—concealed—brought to Bethshemesh, and the men of that town, who were reaping in the fields, perceiving the cart coming, went and examined what it contained; —"and they saw the ark, and were joyful in seeing it." Those, perhaps, who first examined it, instead of carefully covering it up again, as a sacred utensil, suffered it to lie open to common inspection, which they encouraged, in order to triumph in the votive offerings it had acquired, and to gratify profane curiosity;—the Lord therefore punished the people, (ver. 10), "because they had inspected, looked upon, the ark." This affords a clear view of the transgression of these Israelites, who had treated the ark with less reverence than the Philistines themselves; for those heathen conquerors had at least behaved to Jehovah with no less respect than they did to their own deities; and being accustomed to carry them in covered wagons, for privacy, they maintained the same privacy as a mark of honor to the God of Israel. The Levites seem to have been equally culpable with the common people, for, to have submitted to the law, and not to have suffered their triumph on this victorious occasion to beguile them into a transgression so contrary to the very first principles of the theocracy. —The ark was not to be borne on the shoulders; but this surely does not follow from any thing that is said in Scripture. That the καρδάκων may sometimes have been covered, is also done by the word chariot, or καρδάκων, signifying to roll, and means simply a vehicle on wheels, whether chariot or wagon, for the transportation of goods or persons; and may, for such we know, have included as many forms and kinds, as chariot and car, or wagons, or carriages.

Having thus shown the antiquity and use of covered wagons, which, in most instances, perhaps indeed in all, were drawn by oxen, we proceed to notice chariots of equal antiquity, but for a different purpose; and among these we may perceive a distinction, as we find two names employed to denote them: (1) the ἱρές, (2) the καρδάκων, the latter evidently a derivative from the former. The first may be thought the inferior, and drawn by two horses only; the second was the more splendid, and drawn by four horses. Joseph, as we have seen, rode in the second state—chariot (καρδάκων) of Pharaoh’s kingdom—that this was a handsome equipage, need not be doubted; that it was a public vehicle, appears from the proclamation and honor attending the statesman who rode in it. Joseph, also, when going to meet his father, rode as vizier in his καρδάκων. We find, moreover, that Sisera, when expected to make his triumphant entry, was equally expected to ride in such a chariot; for his brother says, “Why tarry the wheels of his καρδάκων?” Judg. v. 28. This vehicle he had also used in battle, chap. iv. 15. Perhaps this conception adds a spirit to the history of Naaman, 2 Kings v. 9. That hero of Syria came to the prophet Elisha, with his horse and attendants, a great retinue; but being in a state of disease, he occupied a humble ἱρές; being a leper, he was secluded; not so, when he went away healed; then, in a state of exultation, he rode in his καρδάκων; for so says verse 21; be alighted from his καρδάκων to meet Gehazi. (See also verse 26.) This kind of chariot was not omitted by the ambitious Abaelom, among his preparations for assuming the state of royalty; (2 Sam. xv. 1.) and that this was a chariot of triumph, or of magnificence, is decided by a passage of the prophet Isaiah, (chap. xxii. 18. “the chariots—καρδάκων—of thy glory shall be the shame of thy Lord’s house.” (See also 1 Kings xii. 18; xx. 33; 2 Kings ix. 27.) It may further be observed, that for his καρδάκων he had his own horse, and by general officers; so we read in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 24, that king Josiah was mortally wounded in battle; his servants therefore took him out of that καρδάκων which he had used, as commander against Pharaoh Neco, and put him in a second καρδάκων, which belonged to him, to convey him to Jerusalem. The same is related of Ahab, 1 Kings xxii. 35. And the king, who was disguised as an officer, was stayed up in his καρδάκων against Syria; but he died in the evening. And the blood from his wound ran into the bosom of his ἱρές. That is to say, Ahab had been removed, like Josiah, from a chariot of dignity to a common litter, (for such might be the ἱρές here,) for the more easy and private carriage of his body, now dead; and the blood from his wound ran into this vehicle,—which, therefore, was washed in the pool of Samaria; (verse 38.) and thus the mingling of his blood with the water of the pool, of which the dogs drank, fulfilled the prophet’s prediction. That the word chariot sometimes means the horses which drew the vehicle, appears from 2 Sam. viii. 4, “And David houghed all the chariot horses;” but reserved to himself a hundred chariot horses.” Here the horses must be the subject of this operation, not the chariot; and so the passage is always understood, though the vehicle be derived from a word signifying to roll, and means simply a vehicle on wheels, whether chariot or wagon, for the transportation of goods or persons; and may, for such we know, have included as many forms and kinds, as chariot and car, or wagons, or carriages.

Of the distinction here attempted to be made between the Hebrew מְשֶׁכֶת, ἱρές, and καρδάκων, the καρδάκων, the same must be said as above; it is not only without evidence, but contrary to all the evidence which exists. In the case of Naaman the Syran, (2 Kings v.) no one, who had not a theory to support, would ever suspect that the chariot mentioned in verse 21 was not the very vehicle just before mentioned in verse 9; and which in one case is called ἱρές, and in the other καρδάκων. So, also, in the case of Ahab, (1 Kings xxii. 35.) where there is no hint of his removal from one vehicle to another, and yet both terms are used of the same vehicle. The word מְשֶׁכֶת, ἱρές, is the abstract noun from the verb signifying to ride, to be horse, and means, in general, any vehicle in which one is transported; just as our word carriage designates, in general, that in which one is carried. It is also more generally a noun of multitudes, signifying a plurality of such vehicles; while, on the contrary, the word καρδάκων is a noun of unity, designating only one vehicle, under the idea of the instrument of one’s being carried. It is also not improbable, that this word may have been limited to a more definite signification, and applied to some particular forms or kinds of chariots. The word ἱρές, ἱρὴ, is general in its application, standing sometimes for chariots of war; (Exod. xiv. 9.) sometimes, possibly, for a litter borne by horses, as in the case of Josiah; (2 Chron. xxxiv. 26.) sometimes for the horses themselves, as 2 Sam. vii. 14; and again for the riders on horses and other animals, Isa. xxii. 7, 9. That it, however, designates any where a litter, is certainly very difficult to be made out, and is contradicted by Gesenius and all the other best interpreters.

At any rate it is not easy to determine when it means a wheeled chariot, drawn by two horses, or when it means a litter, carried by two horses; but this is of small consequence, as we may reasonably conclude, that vehicles with two horses were prior to those with four; the second pair being added for greater pomp and dignity. The following may perhaps afford some limits on the subject of chariots drawn by two horses.

2 Kings ii. 11, “There appeared to the prophet Elisha a ἱρές, chariot, of fire, and horses of fire.” It is better in 2 Enoch i. 19, “And the ἱρές, chariot, and horse.” If this be a single horse, it must needs be a wheeled chariot, which he draws; not a litter. Is. xiii. 17, “Who bringeth forth ἱρές—chariot, and horse.” (singular.) 2 Kings vii. 16, “Take a second ἱρές of the horses which remain;” they took, therefore, two ἱρές, chariot horses.” i. e. the proper number for a ἱρές: and, that the rendering five is here improper, is evident, because only five were sent; yet this was clearly according to the proposal, and fully as much to the purpose as five; the mention of five is evidently intended as a sort of round number, a

A passage in the second part of Dr. E. D. Clarke’s Travels throws additional light on the construction of the chariot. That traveller says, (p. 112.) — “The women of the place (the hot springs, at Bourneabeshi) bring all their garments to be washed in these springs, not according to the casual visits of ordinary industry, but as an ancient and established custom, in the exercise of which they proceed with all the pomp and songs of a public ceremony. The remains of customs belonging to the most remote ages are discernible in the shape and construction of the wicker cars, in which the linen is brought on these occasions, and which are used all over this country. In the first of them, I recognized the form of the chariot which, in the Greek temple at Dodona, the oak collection at Rome; and which, although of Parians, marble, had been carved to resemble wicker work; while its wheels were an imitation of those solid, circular planes of timber used at this day, in Rome, and in many parts of Macedonia, and Greece, for the cars of the country. They are expressly described by Homer, in the mention of Priam’s litter, when the king commands his son to bind on the chest or coffer, which was of wicker work, upon the body of the carriage. (Iliad xxiv.) This wicker chest, being movable, is used or not, as circumstances may require." This particular formation did not escape the notice of Dr. Stithopon, when at Troy. He says, "The wains were of a singular structure, and probably of very ancient origin, and had received none of the improvements of modern discoveries. A large wicker basket, eight feet long, mounted on a four-wheel machine, was supported by four lateral props, which were inserted into holes or sockets. The top of the basket was made of three pieces, round and convex on each side." (Walpole. Trav. Asia, vol. ii. p. 114.)

If we might suppose that the Hebrew rebeb ever designated a litter, the following description of a scene in the life of His was perhaps, an apt illustration: "The bale was increased this morning, by the departure of the wives of the governor of Jaffa. They set off in two couches, of a curious construction, common in this country. The body of the couch was raised on two parallel poles, somewhat similar to those used for sedan-chairs, only that in these the poles were attached to the lower part of the coach, throwing, consequently, the centre of gravity much higher, and apparently exposing the vehicle, with its veiled tenant, to an easy overthrow, or at least to a very active jolt. Between the poles, strong mules were harnessed, one before and one behind; who, if they should prove capricious, or have very uneven and mountainous ground to pass over, or the occasions of the ladies under more critical. But there is nothing to which use may not reconcile us, and they who can be brought to endure the toil of the camel, may consider themselves, as franked for every other kind of conveyance." (Jowett’s Chr. Res. in Syria, p. 115, 116. Am. ed.)—R.

CHARIOTS OF WAR. Scripture speaks of two sorts of these, one for princes and generals to ride in, the other to break the enemy’s battalions, by rushing in among them, being armed with iron, (i.e. iron hooks or scythes, curvus faleti,) which made terrible havoc. The Canaanites, whom Joshua engaged at the waters of Merom, had horsemen, and a multitude of chariots, Josh. i. 4. Sisera, general of Jabin, king of Hazor, had 900 chariots of brass. Judah could not get possession of the lands belonging to their lot, because the ancient inhabitants of the country were strong in chariots of iron, Judg. i. 19. The Philistines, in their war against Saul, had 30,000 chariots, and 6000 horsemen, 1 Sam. xiii. 5. David, having taken 1000 chariots of war from Hadadezer, king of Assyr., harnessed the horses, and burned 900 chariots, reserving only 100, 2 Sam. viii. 4. It does not appear that the kings of the Hebrews used chariots in war. Solomon had a considerable number, but we know not of any military expedition in which they were employed, 1 Kings x. 26. As Judea was a mountainous country, chariots were of no use. In 2 Mac. xii. 2, there is mention of chariots armed with scythes, which the king of Syria led against Judea. CHEEBAR, one of the places of the Exile, was in the Vale of Euphrates, in the upper part of Mesopotamia, Ezek. i. 1. The same as the Ohabar.

CHEDORLAOMER, king of the Elamites, or Elamites, (i.e. either the Persians, or a people bordering on them,) was one of four kings who confederated against the five kings of the Pentapolis of Sodom, who had revolted from his power, A. M. 3092. See ELAM.

CHELMON, a city opposite to Earselon; near to which part of Holofernes’ army encamped before he besieged Bethulia. It is, perhaps, the Salmon of Ps. lviii. 14; Judg. ix. 48; or Cammon, noticed by Eusebius, seven miles north from Legio.

CHENANIAH, a master of the temple music, who conducted the music at the removal of the ark from Obed-edom, 1 Chron. xv. 22.

CHEPHIRAH, a city of the Gibeonites, given to Benjamin, Josh. xvi. 21; xii. 26. It appears to have been a village of the Hivites, and to have retained its name, to whatever size it might afterwards have attained.

CHEREM, see ANATHEMA.

CHERETHIM, or CxAwim, the Philistines. (See Caphtor.) David, and some of his successors, had guards which were called Cherethites and Pelethites, (2 Sam. xvi. 18,) whose office was of the same nature as that of Cepigs among the Turks and other orientals, who are bearers of the sultan’s orders for punishing any one, by decapitation, or otherwise; an office which is very honorable in the East, though considered as degrading among us. It appears that Herod made use of an officer of this description in beholding for the Indies mission of the Church of Christ, probably, were the “footmen” of Saul, 1 Sam. xiii. 17.

CHERITH, a brook beyond Jordan, which falls into that river, below Bethan, 1 Kings xvii. 3. See ELIAH.

CHERUB, plural CHEKUBIM, a particular order of angels; (Ps. xviii. 10, &c.) but, more particularly, those symbolical representations which are so often referred to in the Old Testament, and in the book of Revelation. On no subject, perhaps, have there been so many unavailing conjectures as the form and design of these figures. Grosius says, the cherubim were figures like a calf. Bochart and Spencer think they were nearly the figure of an ox. Josephus says, they were extraordinary creatures, of a figure unknown to mankind. Clemens of Alexandria believes that the Egyptians imitated the cherubim of the Hebrews in their sphinxes and hieroglyphical animals. The descriptions which Scripture gives of cherubim differ; but all agree in representing a figure composed of various creatures—a man, an ox, an eagle, and a lion. Such were the cherubim described by Ezekiel, chap. i. 5, to the end, and x. 2. Those which Solomon placed in the temple must have been nearly the same, 1 Kings vi. 23. Those which Moses placed on the ark of the covenant (Exod. xxv. 18, 19, 20,) are not clearly described; nor are those which God posted at the entrance of the temple. Gen. iii. 14. Ezekiel (xxviii. 14, 15) says to the king of Tyre, "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God;" like that cherub, resplendent with glory. Moses says, the two cherubim covered the mercy-seat, with their wings extended on both sides, and overshadowed one another, having their faces turned towards the mercy-seat, which covered the ark.

Amidst these conflicting opinions Mr. Taylor has stored his course, and from a number of independent and historical data he has elicited much that is plausible, if it cannot be said to be altogether conclusive, as to their general form. But as the dissertation will not admit of abridgment, we must refer the reader to the Fragments of which it is composed. The following remarks, however, may not be without their use.

Each cherub had four faces: (1) that of a man; (2) that of a lion; (3) that of an ox; (4) that of an eagle. Those four faces were probably attached to one head, and seen by the beholder in union, being joined, each by its back part to the others. Their body, from the neck downwards, was human; "the likeness of a man." This human part first meeting the spectator's eye, had he seen nothing else, he might from them have supposed the whole form to be human. Ezekiel describes the cherub as having four wings; —Isaiah describes the seraph as having six wings; say, two on his head, two on his shoulders, two on his flanks. Their arms, rendered in our translation hands, were four, one on each side of the creature. The remainder, or lower part, of their figure, was, from the rim of the belly downwards, either, (1) human thighs, legs, and feet, to which were appended, at the posteriors, the body and hind legs of an ox; or, rather, (2) the body and the fore legs of an ox, out of which the human part seemed to rise, so that all below the rim of the belly was ox-like, and all above that division was human. From which formation a spectator paying most attention to their lower parts, might have been inclined to think they oxen; or at least beheld, with regard to their services, or what they appeared to do, we may ask, was the vision seen by the prophet Ezekiel, as well as that by the prophet Isaiah, the resemblance of a movable throne or charriot, of prodigious dimensions, on which the sovereign was understood to sit; and to which the wheels were annexed, in much the same manner as to the royal travelling (or military) thrones of the Persian kings; while the four cherubim occupied the places of four horses to draw this magnificent machine? This he thinks probable, and illustrates the idea at some length.

The wheels described in Ezek. i. 15—21, in connection with the cherubim, he conceives to have been representative of the throne of the Deity: the construction —wheel within wheel—being for the purpose of their rolling every way with perfect readiness, and without any occasion of turning the whole machine. The cherubim having the conducting of this throne, it is obvious to remark how well adapted their figure was to their service—their faces looking every way, so that there was no occasion for turning (as a horse must) in obedience to directions, to proceed to the right, or to the left, instead of going straight forward.

Much misapprehension respecting these appearances, has arisen from the idea of the wheels and the cherubim being full of eyes, Ezek. i. 18; x. 12. So in Rev. iv. 6, 8, the four beasts are said to have eyes before and behind," and "within. This is doubtless intended as a symbol of the alacrity with which the ministers of Jehovah perform his will,—of that keen-sighted sense of duty which lets nothing escape unseen, unnoticed, unfulfilled. R.

The accompanying engraving represents a creature which ornamented the portal of the palace of Persepolis: the legs and the body resemble those of an ox; and it has the tail of an ox: on the body are graffed a large pair of wings,—no doubt those of an eagle; and its whole front and shoulders are studded, either with feathers, or with rising knobs.—What its head was, it is now impossible to determine; but by its form, by the cap upon it, and by what seems to be drapery, attached to it, it is probable that the countenance was human. The statues are greatly damaged; partly by age, and more by fire; still more, perhaps, by the barbarity of their possessors. But if this subject represented only a human head on eagle's wings, and a human countenance, then it closely approaches the ancient composition of the cherub; and it is the more satisfactory, because, being extant in Persia, it proves that such emblems were not confined to Egypt; but might be of Chaldean, or, at least, of Asiatic, origin. In fact, it is evident that they were adopted throughout a very extensive portion of the East; and Ezekiel being resident in Persia, his reference to them might be easily understood by his readers, to whom such symbols were familiar.

In conclusion, was the offence given to Judah, by Israel, by the erection of the golden calves, (which certainly were allied to the cherubim, in figure and import, if they were not absolutely the same,) because there was a profession of having the worship of God among that division of the sons of Jacob? Was it also because, in Judah, those emblems were kept private, in the temple; whereas, in Israel, they were exposed to public view, as objects of worship? Were the figures erected by Jeroboam truly cherubim, but called calves, i.e., their name being taken from the inferior part of their composition by way of indignity: or were they an imperfect association of emblems, some being omitted, and what remained being chiefly those parts which referred to the ox, or calf? or, as these are sometimes called hikers, was the sex feminine instead of masculine? or had they compound parts of both sexes? as many Egyptian sphinxes had, as what remain fully demonstrate. (These are all questions which no man can ever answer affirmatively; and, therefore, it is better at once to say, No. R.

In 2 Kings xix. 15: Ps. lxxx. 1: Isaiah xxxviii. 16, God is spoken of as dwelling residing—beholding the cherubim; but the word hikers is supplied by our translators: should they not rather have supplied the word above or over the cherubim, or some similar expression?—since such is the relative situation of the Divine Majesty in these visions.

CHESTNUT-TREE, [1 Cor. Gen. xxx. 37; Ezek. xxx. 16]. In these places the LXX and Jerome translate, "plane-tree," and most of the modern interpreters follow their authority. The Hebrew is derived from a root which signifies "nakedness"; and it is often observed of the plane-tree, that the bark peels off from the trunk, leaving it naked; Platanus orientalis.

CHIDON, the threshing-floor where Uzzah was suddenly struck dead, 1 Chron. xiii. 9. In 2 Sam. vi. 7, it is called "the threshing-floor of Nachon." But we know not whether the names of Nachon and Chidon are those of men or of places.

CHILD, CHILDREN. The descendants of a man, generally, are called his sons, or children, in the Hebrew idiom; as the children of Edom, of Moab, of Israel. Disciples, also, are often called children or sons.

The children of the devil, the sons of Belial, are those who follow the maxims of the world and of the devil. The expressions, "children of the wedding," "children of light," "children of darkness," signify those invited to the wedding, those who follow light, those who remain in darkness; as the children of the kingdom describes those who belong to the kingdom. The holy angels are sometimes described as sons of God, Job i. 6; ii. 1; Psalm lxxviii. 6. Good men, in opposition to wicked men, are likewise thus called; as the family of Seth in opposition to the descendants of Cain, Gen. vi. 6. Judges, magistrates, and priests are likewise termed children of God, Psalm liii. 6; xxvi. 1. Israelites are called sons of God, in opposition to the Gentiles, Hosea i. 10; John xi. 52. In the New Testament, believers are called children of God, in virtue of their adoption, John i. 12; Rom. viii. 14; Gal. iii. 26.

I. CHIMHAM, a son of Barzillai, the Gileadite, and one who followed David to Jerusalem, after the war with Abissol; and who was enriched by David, in consideration of his father Barzillai, whose generous assistance he had experienced, 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38.—II. A place near Bethlehem, Jer. xii. 17.

CHISSOLOTH, or CHSOLOTH-TABOR, a city on the side of mount Tabor, (Josh. xix. 12, 18,) which Eusebius and Jerome call Casalus, or Eusalus, and place ten miles from Dioscorea, east.

It is called Tabor, only, in verse 22, and there is at this day a village so called by the Arabs, at the foot of the mountain. It is, however, probable that this was a fortification higher up the mountain, perhaps on the top of it; whence it might be called the citadel of Tabor.

CHISLEI, the ninth month of the Hebrews, beginning with the new moon of December, Neh. i. 1; Zech. vii. 1. Others make it equivalent to our November. See Cisileu.

CHITTIM. Words on Scripture antiquities are not preserved as to the country or countries implied under this name. Josephus is for Cyprus, Bochart and Vitringa for Italy and Corsica, Grotius, Le Clerc, and Calmet understand Macedonia, Jerome the island of the Ionian and Aegian sea, while Lowth and Hales understand all the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean. It is proper to examine critically the various passages of Scripture in which the word occurs, for the purpose of ascertaining whether more than one region or country may not be intended. We have then the following references (1) Chittim, mentioned by Moses, Numb. xxiv. 24. (2) Chittim, mentioned by Daniel, xi. 30. Bochart is of opinion that the ships of Chittim, here, refer to the Roman fleet, presuming that Chittim signifies Italy, but, as Mr. Taylor remarks, he calls the Roman fleet that of the Chittim, because it lay in the harbors of the Macedonians; thus the fleet of Chittim, and of Macedonia, was, in fact, the Roman fleet also. (3) Chethim in the isle of Cyprus; from whence, as Josephus says, the Hebrews called all islands Chethim, though he restrains that title, principally, to a city called (Citius) Kitios; now Larnica. (4) In Ezek. xxvii. 6, some of the Arabs translate the word chetim the "isles of India," the Chaldæe, "the province of Apulia," meaning the region of elephants, and probably intending Pute in Egypt. The Syriac version reads Chethothes, which has some resemblance to Cataya; and by which we are directed towards India. (5) Isaiah, speaking of the destruction of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezzar, says, "ye shall not come thither, for it is laid waste—and from the land of Chittim it is revealed to them," ch. xxiii. 1. This Calmest understands of Macedonia; but then, he is said, that the destruction of Tyre, occasioned by Nebuchadnezzar, should come from Chittim? Might not the passage be more properly interpreted, as relating to the destruction of this city by Alexander the Great? Bassage, by Chittim, understands the Cuthæans, inhabitants of the Szuans, near Babylon, who marched under Nebuchadnezzar, and assisted at the siege of Tyre. But where are the Cuthæans named Chittim? Upon the whole, there is reason to think that the word Chittim implies, as Lowth and Hales suppose, all the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean sea. (The following is the note of Gesenius upon the word Chittim, in his commentary upon Is. xxiii. 1: Among the three different opinions of ancient and modern interpreters, according to which they sought for the land of the Chittim in Italy, Macedonia, and Cyprus, I decidedly prefer the latter, which is also that of Josephus. (Ant. i. 6. 1.) According to this, Chittim is the island Cyprus, so called from the Phoenician colony Kitros. Chittim, in the southern part of this island; but still in such a sense, that this name Chittim was sometimes used for the whole of Cyprus, and also in a wider sense, to designate other islands and countries adjacent to the coasts of the Mediterranean; e. g. Macedonia, Dan. xii. 30; 1 Mac. i. 1; viii. 5. This is also mentioned by Josephus. That Kitros was sometimes used for the whole of Cyprus, and also in a wider sense for other islands, as Rhodes, is expressly asserted by Epiphanius, who himself lived in Cyprus, as a well known fact. (Adv. Hieros. xxx. 25.) It could also, he adds, be used of the Macedonians, because they were descended from the Cyprians and Rhodians. That most of the cities of Cyprus were Phoenician colonies, is expressly affirmed by Diodorus, (ii. p. 114. comp. Herodot. vii. 90.) and the proximity of the island to Phoenicia, together with its abundant supply of the utmost variety of minerals, especially of such as were essential to ship-building, would lead us to expect nothing else. In respect to Cittium, at least, it is clear, that it was settled by the Phoenicians, and not by the Greeks. (Here follows a variety of citations in proof of this point, e. g. Cie. de Fin. iv. 50. DIOG. Laert. vita Zenonis, etc.) One of the few passages in the Bible which gives a more definite hint in respect to the Chittim, is Ezek. xxvii. 6, which agrees very well with Cyprus: 'Of the oaks of Bashan they make them the cedars; or thy ships' benches do they make of ivory, encased with cedar from the isles of Chittim; where the word "Bashan" means probably the same as "Tarsus," a species of cedar or pine, which is found abundantly in the noble forests of Cyprus. The opinion that Italy was the land of the Chittim, which is adopted by Bochart and Vitringa, seems to me to be wholly untenable; because, in Is. xxxii. 12, (comp. verse 6,) the Chittim appear evidently to be a Phœnician possession, while in Italy especially, no colonies of this people ever existed. In the present passage, (Is. xxxii. 1,) we must understand the sense to be, that the fleets coming from Tarshish (Tartessus) to Tyre, would on their way learn from the inhabitants of Cyprus the news of the downfall of Tyre." (S. W. pp. 714, 715.)

CHIUN, [the name of a god worshipped by the Phœnicians in the desert. The name occurs only in Amos v. 26. "But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chium your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves." This is quizzed somewhat differently in Acts viii. 43, "Ye set up for God the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them." According to Strabo and Hebrew interpreters, it is the same as the Arabic Chesdah, the planet Saturn; respecting the worship of which by the Semitic star is called Kozmion. Where in the old Testament. (Is. iii. p. 343. They regarded and worshipped the planets Saturn and Mars, as evil principles, sources of ill; as they held Jupiter and Venus for sources of good. The use of the word "star," especially as applied to the stars of god, Michaels not inaply proposes to change the reading of the Hebrew points to Chesdah instead of Chium. The Seventy, and Stephen quoting from them, have here simply substituted "Psipher," or "Psipher," Remphan, or Remphan, the Coptic name of Saturn. R.) Some think that three deities are named here—Moloch, Chium, and Remphan: others, that the three names mean only one god; that is, Saturn, and his planet. Salmusius and Kircher assert, that Aton is Saturn, and Remphan is the planet Venus; and the Persians and Arabians, and that Remphan, or Replan, signified the same among the Egyptians. They add, that the Seventy, writing in Egypt, changed the word Chium into Remphan, because it had the same signification. Jahnedy and Buxbaum conclude, that Moloch was the sun, and Chium, or Chion, and Replan, the moon.

The illustration of this subject is attempted by Mr. Taylor, by the following references to Hindu mythology, and to the Sanscrit language. They may stand here for what they are worth. It is no doubt true, that the very striking analogies which are found to exist between the ancient Sanscrit, and the Persian, the Greek, and other western tongues, go very far to prove an original relation between the races which spoke these languages; but it should also be borne in mind, that between the Sanscrit and the various Semitic languages no such analogy exists; the resemblances between them being in fact very slight, and not sufficient to warrant any inference of primeval kindred. R.

It is suggested by Mr. Taylor, that this Chium may be the Chius of the ancient Sanscrit and the modern Brahmin. We know, indeed, that Kium is the name of a Persian deity; and also that Kozmion denotes the planet Saturn; but the reasons for identifying Chium with Saturn are not so obvious. What, then, is Chium?—Mr. Taylor answers, The power of destruction and reproduction. Brahma, Vishnou, and Chieu are the triple power of the Supreme Being, in manifestation; in other words, creation, conservation, destruction, and reproduction. Nor was it otherwise understood by the Seventy, who, in translating the passage in Amos, offer a remarkable variation; τον θεον του θεον του θεον, which is adopted by Stephen. (Acts vii. 43.) "The star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them." Now, what can Remphan be? This question has been found difficult of solution; but the following passage from the Essay of Sir W. Jones on the gods of India, (Asiaische Forscher, p. 261. Calcutta edit.) may be more determinative. "When Remphan is the character, he is the husband of Bhanani, whose relation to the waters is evidently marked by her image being restored to them at the conclusion of her great festival called Durgasvata; she is known also to be attributed exactly similar to those of Venus Mara, whose birth from the sea-foam and splendid rise from the couch, in which she had been cradled, have afforded so many charming subjects to ancient and modern artists; and it is very remarkable that the Rembha of India's court, who seems to correspond with the popular Venus, or goddess of beauty, was produced, according to the Indian fabulists, from the frown of the churning ocean." . . . . . "Bhanani now demands our attention; and in this character, we suppose her to be Venus herself; not the Ialadian queen of laughter and jollity, who, with her nymphs and graces, was the beautiful child of poetical imagination, and answers to the Indian Rembha, with her celestial train of Apollo and Cupid. The Venus Uraea, so luxuriously painted by Leccretis, and so properly invoked by him at the opening of a poem on nature; Venus presaging over generation, and, on that account, exhibited sometimes of both sexes; (an union very common in the Indian sculptures;) as in her bearded statue at Rome, in the images, perhaps, called Hermathena, and in those figures of her, which had the form of a conical marble, 'for the reason of which figure we are left," says Tacitus, 'in the poems and inscriptions, a third Venus is spoken of, and a Venus Remphan, in the temples and paintings of Hindostan; where it never seems to have entered the heads of the legislators or people that anything natural could be offended obscenely; a singularity which pervades all the writings and publicParcel's, with no proof of depravity in their morals." (p. 254.)

The decorous sensibility of this elegant writer has imagined a distinction without an essential difference; it is enough for our purpose, however, that Rembha and Venus are evidently the same; that Rembha is the popular Venus, or goddess of reproduction; and that Chien is the reproductive power: the Seventy, and Stephen following them, therefore, in preferring one name to the other, have merely substituted an appelation better known to express the same concept;—but both these terms are Sanscrit; and the inference that these deities, worshipped in the West, were adopted from the East, follows, unquestionably, from the use of these terms to express them.

It will, no doubt, be observed, that Chien is a term used many ages after the events to which the prophet refers, which are those connected with the history of Balaam, (Numb. xxii. &c.) and that the

"The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth, and he shall give strength unto his King, and exalt the horn of his Anointed;" that is, Jesus. He was strength, the power of his Christ, or Messiah. And the Psalmist, (ii. 2.) "The kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord, and against his Messiah," or Anointed. And Ps. xlv. 7, "Therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the ointment of gladness above thy fellows." Also Jeremiah, (Lam. iv. 20.) Lastly, Habakkuk says, (iij. 13.) "Thou wert exalted for the salvation of thy people, even for salvation with righteousness." It would be needless to bring testimonies from the New Testament to prove Jesus to be the Messiah, since they occur in almost every line.

The ancient Hebrews, being thus instructed by the prophets, had clear notions of the Messiah, and built on these; became gradually depraved, so that when Jesus appeared in Judea, the Jews entertained a false conception of the Messiah, expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror, who should remove the Roman yoke, and subject the whole world. The Messiah was scandalized at the outward appearance, the humility, and seeming weakness of our Saviour. The modern Jews, indulging still greater mistakes, form to themselves chimerical ideas of the Messiah, utterly unknown to their fathers. (Comp. Bibl. Repos. vol. ii. p. 330, seq.)

The ancient prophets had foretold, that the Messiah should be God and man, exalted and abased, master and servant, priest and victim, prince and subject; involved in death, yet living; rich and poor; a king, a conqueror, glorious; a man of griefs, exposed to infirmities, unknown, in a state of abjection and humiliation. The modern Jews, indulging still greater mistakes, form to themselves chimerical ideas of the Messiah, utterly unknown to their fathers. (Comp. Bibl. Repos. vol. ii. p. 330, seq.)

The ancient prophets had foretold, that the Messiah should be God and man, exalted and abased, master and servant, priest and victim, prince and subject; involved in death, yet living; rich and poor; a king, a conqueror, glorious; a man of griefs, exposed to infirmities, unknown, in a state of abjection and humiliation. All these contrarieties were to be reconciled in the person of the Messiah; as they really were in the person of our Saviour. It was known that the Messiah was to be born, (1.) of a virgin, (2.) of the tribe of Judah, (3.) of the race of David, (4.) in the village of Bethlehem. That he was to continue for ever, that his coming was to be concealed, that he was the great prophet promised in the law, that he was both the Son and Lord of David, that he was to perform great miracles, that he should restore all things, that he should die and rise again, that Elias should be the forerunner of his appearance, that a proof of his verity should be the cure of lepers, life restored to the dead, and the gospel preached to the poor. That he should not destroy the law, but should perfect and fulfil it; that he should be a stone of offence, and a stumbling-block, against which many should bruise themselves; that he should suffer infinite oppositions and contradictions; that from his time idolatry and impoly should be put down, and, last of all, that the distant people should submit to his authority.

When Jesus appeared in Judæa, these notions were common among the Jews. Our Saviour appeals even to themselves, and says, if these are not the characters of the Messiah, and if they do not see their completion in himself. The evangelists take care to put the Jews in mind of them, proving hereby, that Jesus is the Christ whom they expected. They quote the prophecies to them, which then were acknowledged to belong to the Messiah, though they have been controverted by the Jews since. It may be seen in the early fathers of the church, and in the most ancient Jewish authors, that in the beginning of Christianity, they did not call in doubt several prophecies, which their forfathers understood of the Messiah. But in after-ages they began to deny that the passages we quote against them should be understood of the Messiah, endeavoring to defend them-selfs from arguments out of their own Scriptures.

After this they fall into schisms, and new notions concerning the Messiah. Some of them, as the famous Hillel, who lived, according to the Jews, before Christ, maintain that the Messiah was already come in the person of king Hesekiah; others, that the belief of the coming of the Messiah is no article of faith. Buxtorf says that the greater part of the modern rabbins believe, that the Messiah has been come a good while, but keeps himself concealed in some part of the world or other, and will not manifest himself, because of the sins of the Jews. Jarchi affirms, that the Hebrews believed the Messiah was born on the day of the last destruction of Jerusalem
by the Romans. Some assign him the terrestrial paradise for his habitation; others the city of Rome,
where, according to the Talmudists, he keeps himself concealed among the lepers and infirm, at the gate of the city, expecting Elias to come to manifest
him. A great number believe he is not yet come;
but they are strangely divided about the time and circumstances of his coming. Some expect him at the end of six thousand years. They suppose Jesus Christ to be born A. M. 3761. Add to this number 1800, it will make 5561; consequently they have 499 years to expect still. Klinchi, who lived in the twelfth century, believed that the coming of the Messiah was very near. Maimonides pretended to have received certain prophecies from his ancestors, importing that the gift of prophecy should be restored to Israel, after the same number of years from the time of Balaam, as had passed from the bening of the world to Balaam's time. According to him, Balaam prophesied A. M. 3488. If we double this number, we find the restoration of the gift of prophecy should be A. M. 4976, that is, A. D. 1316.

But this conclusion has been found false. Some have fixed the end of their misfortunes to A. D. 1493, others to A. D. 1308, others to A. D. 1804, others yet later. Last of all, tired out with the disputes, they have pronounced an anathema against any who shall pretend to calculate the time of the coming of the Messiah. (Gemara T. Sanhedr. cap. xi.) See MESSIAH.

As the holy unction was given to kings, priests, and prophets, by describing the promised Saviour of the world under the name of Christ, anointed, or Messiah, it was sufficiently evidenced, that the qualities of king, prophet, and high-priest, would eminently centre in him; and that he would exercise
them, not only over the Jews, but over all mankind;
and particularly over those who should receive him
as their Saviour. Peter and the other believers, being assembled together, (Acts iv. 27.) apply psalm ii. to Jesus; and Luke says, (iv. 18.) that our Saviour, entering a synagogue at Nazareth, opened the book of the prophet Isaiah, where he read, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor," and proceeded to show that this prophecy was accomplished in his own person.

It is not recorded, however, that Jesus ever received any external, official unction. The unction that the prophets and the apostles speak of is the spiritual and internal unction of grace, and of the Holy Ghost, of which the outward unction, with which kings, priests, and prophets were anciently anointed, was but the figure and symbol. Nevertheles, many have supposed,—and we see no objection to it,—that when the Spirit visibly descended on Jesus at his baptism, he received a peculiar, solemn, and appropriate unction.

The Jewish nation entertained a very general expectation of the appearance of the Messiah, about the time of our Lord's birth; and it is very credible they had more ways than one of computing the period of the Messiah's advent, so that their expectation was justly founded. One of these modes of calculation
may be seen under the article GENERATION, and it may not be unpleasant to the reader to inspect some of those indications of this national feeling, which Providence has happily preserved. On this subject we shall accept assistance from an able "defender of Christianity," Dr. Chandler. "The expectation of this great event was natural to the minds of the (Jewish) people to Vaspeans's days, whose sudden rise to the empire, and conquest of the Jews, so turned the heads of many, as to make them
imagine he must be the king that had been spoken of. This account we have in two Gentile and two Jewish writers. For the reader comparing their accounts, we have placed them in three columns, to be seen at one view:—

that time some one within their persuasion, that it was contained in the ancient writings of the priests, that at that very time the East should prevail; and that some who should come out of Judea should obtain universal dominion. It appeared, by the event, that this prediction referred to the Roman emperor; but the Jews, in referring it to themselves, rebelled."

"From the collation of these passages, thus compared together, it will be observed, (1.) That all three historians agree, that there was a general expectation of a new kingdom to appear about that time, which, from Judea, should extend itself over the whole earth. It was a rooted persuasion in many; saith one: It was commonly known throughout the whole East, saith another: It was the principle that chiefly stirred up the Jewish nation to war with the Romans; and many of their wise men, rabbins, or learned in their Scriptures and traditions, trusting to it, were deceived, saith the third. (2.) This persuasion was ancient and constant, or uninterrupted, saith Suetonius: Derived down by tradition, as the sense of the sacred prophecies of the Jews, and so understood by their wise men, saith Josephus. (3.) This persuasion was contained in the sacred books of the priests, saith Tacitus: In the holy books of the prophets, saith Josephus: In the Fates, saith Suetonius: meaning the libræ sanctorum, or prophetical books. (4.) The opinion that went abroad, according to Suetonius, of the Jews possessing this empire, is explained by Tacitus, that the East should prevail; and by Josephus, that a certain man of their nation should rule the world. (5.) From the agreement of the three historians, that at that time this king should appear, it may be collected, that there were times marked in the sacred books for his coming, which (times) were the signs by which the Jews expected this man. Josephus adds, that the Jews have erred so grossly, in applying the prophecy to Vespasian, but for this, the period fixed was over. He could find no new reckoning to protract the expectation. Despairing, then, of a Messiah in his own nation, the people looked to some other than the Romans in the siege, without and against all hopes of success, beside that which this expectation inspired them with. (Joseph. de Bello, iii. 27. Gr.) All the time of the siege they were assured of help in some extraordinary way (ib. vi. cap. 35). False prophets in Jerusalem promised the people that the day of salvation was come, even to the last hour of their ruin. (Ib. lib. vii. cap. 4.) Even when the Romans were masters of the temple, one of them led up 6,000 men to certain destruction, in confidence of some surprising interposition at their last extremity. From this persuasion they rebelled; from this persuasion the hearts of the common people were kept up under all the miseries of the siege; and even their disappoinments did not cause them to forsake it. (Ib. lib. vi. cap. 30.) (6.) Though Josephus calls this prophecy an ambiguous (or dark) oracle, because the event did not answer to his sense of it, yet he owns it was understood in the sense I am speaking of, by their wise men; and by those before them, who had delivered down this sense of it. Very dark indeed it must be, if, describing one of the royal house of David to be their king, it intended a Roman of an obscure family: if, describing him as the converter of the Gentiles to the knowledge of the true God, it was to be understood of one that lived and died an idolater; if, describing him as the person that should put an end to the Roman empire, in belief whereof the Jews took up arms against them, it meant a Roman should destroy the Jewish nation and religion. Josephus, therefore, whatever motives he had for so applying the prophecy, on writing his Antiquities, returned to his first belief; and fairly hints them, as do the rest of his nation, that Daniel's Messiah was yet to come and subdue the Romans."

The conception of our Saviour occurred at Nazareth, a small city in Galilee, where his virgin mother was visited, and informed of the exalted design of the angel Gabriel. (See Annunciation.) About nine months afterwards an edict was issued by Augustus, enjoining all persons throughout his dominions to be registered in the place of their nativity. This led Joseph and Mary to prepare to return to Nazareth, where they supposed the infant Jesus was born, in the year of the world 4000. On the eighth day he was circumcised, in conformity with the law, and called Jesus, in compliance with the divine injunction laid upon his father before his birth. (Ib. lib. vii. cap. 31.) The same day the infant Jesus, being prepared to return to Nazareth, they were warned by a divine messenger to fly with their infant son into Egypt, to avoid the cruelty of Herod, whose jealousy was roused by the news of the birth of the King of the Jews, and who had ordered all the male children about Bethlehem, under two years old, to be slain. This cruel tyrant, however, soon afterwards died, and Joseph was admonished to return into Judea. The holy family retired to Nazareth, and there Jesus abode, subject to his earthly parents, till A. D. 30, when he was baptized by John in the river Jordan, and publicly declared, by a voice from heaven, to be the Son of God, and the teacher of the world. After having been subjected to the assaults of Satan, in the wilderness, Jesus entered upon his public ministry of teaching the people, making disciples, and working miracles, during which he traversed the land nearly from one extremity to the other, visiting also the Samaritans, and the Gentiles in the

down to us. We have seen that the Old Testament may be understood as affording references to the extremes of sacrifice and entertainment, as well as worship; and if we might rely on occasional hints of ecclesiastical writers, the spread of the gospel was commensurate with the indications of the ancient prophets. In attempting this subject, we cannot avoid remarking how effectually Divine Providence had prepared the way for circulating the "glad tidings of great joy," by the achievements of that victorious mediate, Alexander the Great, in the East, and by the extended dominion of the Roman empire in the West. By the first of these circumstances, the Greek language was carried almost to the centre of India; and the Greek power was established, and long maintained itself, in those provinces which depended on Babylon, or Seleucia, as the seat of their government. This is the more worthy of notice, as in those very provinces the captive Jews were stationed by their conquerors, Nebuchadnezzar and others; and their posterity maintained the expectation of a Messiah from their own nation, descended from a king of their own blood, of whom they had ascertained the characteristics and qualities they had information from the sacred books, which they carefully preserved as their companions wherever they went, and from the religious institutions on which they attended, though under many disadvantages to these Jews, whether by discourse or by writing, would be intelligible to them, either in the Syriac, in the Chaldean, or in the Greek tongue; while the latter would be the medium of communication to the descendants of Alexander's companions in arms, who were very numerous in these parts. Beside the peregrination of the sacred books, and the maintenance of their national rites, by these Jews, we know that their pilgrims visited Judea; and the natural curiosity of the human mind would keep alive a spirit of inquiry after the holy places, and the sacred customs of their nation as practised in the Holy Land. We must add, that every pious Jew would willingly pay the half-shaekel contribution to the sanctuary, which was forward by every opportunity; and if any inclined to withhold it, they would be, by shame or by force, compelled to that duty. Moreover, pilgrims who had visited Jerusalem would be distinguished among their brethren; and, much like the Hadige among the Mahometans, by the form, the dress, and the tokens of that distinction. This fact of pilgrimage is sufficiently proved in the narration, (Acts ii. 9.) where we find visitors—"Parthians, Medes, Elamites, Mesopotamians,"—but the next description of persons, "dwelling in Judea," is capable of being restricted. Judea, properly speaking, was not intended, because the whole enumeration consists of foreign countries, among which Judea could not possibly be ranked. On the question whether instead of the word we should read India, or Lydia, opinions are divided. It may be strongly objected, that Lydia is greatly misplaced in being separated from Phrygia and Pamphylia, to which it was neighbor; while it was remote from Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, and Pontus, with which it is ranged. It is acknowledged that the same objection applies in some degree, though not so strongly, to the reading of India, between Mesopotamia and Cappadocia: we know of no India between those provinces, unless we regard India; indeed, we might take Mesopotamia for the original country of that name, as the proto-martyr Stephen appears to have done, then we may, without hesitation, read India in this text; and this enumeration by coasts of Tyre and Sidon. At length, however, one of his own disciples, Judas Iscariot, giving place to the devil, undertook to deliver him up to his implacable enemies, the Jews. This he effected, our Jesus, after having been subjected to every species of indignity, was crucified on Calvary as a common malefactor. He remained in the tomb for three days, when he rose from the dead, and, after continuing with his disciples for the space of forty days, he led them out to Bethany, where he blessed them, and visibly ascended up into heaven.

For some account of the genealogy of Christ, see the articles Adoption, and Genealogy.

As to the personal appearance of Christ, some have asserted that he was the most beautiful of men, while others have maintained that he was without handsome form and comeliness. Is there any enigmatical allusion to his human form?—Nicephorus has given a description of his features; but Nicephorus is too late to be much depended on; and so are all representations of the person of Jesus. So also the epitome of Lentinus, which is evidently spurious. (See a useful and critical work, vol. ii. p. 367, seq.) Tradition is an ill guide in matters of personal description; and if it may convey a general idea, that idea is too general, and too loose, to attach to the description of any individual whatever. There are, on some accounts of the latter emperors, heads of Christ, with the motto Rex Regnans, King of kings. Whether it would be possible, in the examination of a complete series, to fix on any which might approach to a credible degree of verisimilitude, we know not. We remember a picture that so late as Constantine, and less still, so late as the successors of his name and family, there should be any accurate portrait extant of this venerable and illustrious Person, that is, three hundred years, or later, after his decease.

We expect a time, when He shall appear to all nations under that illustrious character—the Prince of Peace—and the humble form of the man, who had no personal beauty to attract applause, shall be the symbol of his divinity and glory of his exalted station.

CHRISTIANITY, a name given at Antioch to those who believed Jesus to be the Messiah, Acti xi. 26. They generally called themselves brethren, faithful, saints, believers, and were named by the Gentiles, Christians and Galileans. It has been the opinion of several, that Christianity was supposed sometimes through mistake give us, (for you are not particularly acquainted with our name,) signifies that gentleness and benignity whereof we make profession.

CHRISTIANITY, the religion taught by Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, is comprised in the writings of the New Testament. The evidences of the truth of Christianity are usually divided into two classes, external and internal, and they furnish, in their details, the highest degree of proof of which the Biblical evidence is capable.

To be able to communicate a clear and distinct idea of that extent to which the gospel of Christ was promulgated in the early ages of the church would afford great pleasure; and it is of some consequence, in justifying the latter predictions which seem to announce its general propagation; but our authorities are so incompetent, or the facts they report are so uncertain, that not much which may be depended upon, can be considered as having come
CHRISTIANITY

Luke, thus understood, would be a correct list of countries to which the gospel was early sent; of which we have credible, though not abundant, evidence. It would be rash to affirm that as actually the case, yet the reader will not reject the suggestion, till he has well considered what may be stated in support of it. It is only necessary here to remark, that the reading Jude is uniformly supported by the unanimous authority of all the manuscripts and versions.

R.

We should also observe the different phrase employed by the several writers in this passage; he mentions Parthian, Mesopotamia, and Edomites, as if the apostles of those countries, by their direct appellation; but he describes those of Mesopotamia, Judea, &c. as dwellers, using the same word as in verse 5. "Now there were at Jerusalem dwellers, Jews, devout men, who waited the times of the Spirit of promise, etc." We therefore see these were only temporary residents at Jerusalem; and it may be supposed that the same word in verse 9. intended only temporary residents in Mesopotamia.

This distinction contributes to support what has been proposed, since it cannot for a moment be admitted that in the Greek Mesopotamia (between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris) the Jews were in any degree unsettled; on the contrary, here they were firmly fixed and established; whereas in India, they might be considered as residents only, as they certainly were in Rome, in Cyrene, Libya, and elsewhere.

As the sacred Spirit has directed Luke to place the eastern parts of the world first in his list, we shall first offer a few words in reference to the promulgation of the gospel among them.

It is certain that the apostle Peter had visited the provinces addressed in his First Epistle, - Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia: - these lay not in conjunction, whether the times of their labors were concurrent, is not easy ascertained, nor is it of moment here. Yet we attach some importance to the proposition, that the apostle Jude labored far eastward, because it contributes to explain the similarity of his Epistle with some parts of the Second of Peter; which seems strongly to confirm the idea that both were addressing much the same people. In fact, the style of imagery, elevation, and metaphor which they adopt, is altogether oriental; a phraseology to which the western world reconciles itself with difficulty, and rarely sanctions in regular and correct composition. Jude certainly had preached, previously, in various parts of Syria; at Antiochus, Laodicea, Pamphylia, Callinicum, now Racca, and Cirencester, now Kerkishe; then, as we have said, he visited Thomas in Mesopotamia, whence they made an excursion into Mesopotamia and Syria, after which Jude returned to Mesopotamia and Syria, but Thomas, who appears to have devoted his life to the service of the gospel in the East, remained in Parthia; or continued pressing on still farther eastward, till he reached India, where he first propagated the doctrine of the cross. But here it is proper to inquire, What, and where, was this country denominated India? - and this we shall attempt to determine, by considering the application of the name in the Bible, rather than among heathen writers.

The first, and, indeed, the only mention (as usually understood) of India, in Scripture, is in Esther 1. 1, and viii. 9, where we read that Assuerus ruled from the Indus, to the Euphrates, and to Cush, the head of the Cushites, usually, the most eastern province of the Persian empire; but that, under some fortunate sovereigns, the Persian dominion included the bank of the Indus, may readily be granted; beyond this, its possessions rarely, if ever, extended. Semiramis, indeed, crossed the Indus at Attock, (the prohibited river,) but was defeated. Alexander also crossed the Indus, and advanced some distance beyond it, but a perpetual succession of obstacles, mountain after mountain, and river after river, disheartened his troops and enforced his return. We conclude, therefore, that Assuerus did not rule over India, meaning Hindustan, but his empire might include a province beyond Bactria, on the bank of the Indus, and deriving its name from that river. Nor should we forget that the original India of the Hindus, or the primary settlement of the Brahmains, was not the modern India: into this country they came, as they acknowledged, through the pass of Hurdvar; nevertheless, the name India, if derived from them, might distinguish the regions where they had been established, north and west of their present situation; and such a province might at times form part of the Persian territories. This would render the apostle Peter's reference to India to a province in the vicinity of the Indus, while it favors the supposition that the spread of the gospel was co-extensive with the power of the Persian empire. This hypothesis is consistent with those opinions which ascribe to the Persians much of the spread of the gospel.- page 301.

some deference to institutions indifferent in regard to the gospel, they might least excite opposition than the apostle of the Gentiles, who magnified his office, not without incessant hazard to his person, principally from his own countrymen. We may reasonably conclude that a few of the free inhabitants, who could not in every instance discern that the Gospel was so essential to the gospel, might feel difficulties when their religion was concerned; yet, that the main body of the dispensation would feel a diminished regard to places which they never could behold, and to services of which they never could partake. That by combining the view of this abased zeal with apostolic moderation, the propagators of the Gospel eastward might experience fewer perplexities, less severe sufferings, perhaps less animosities and contentions, on the whole, that their fellow-laborers in the West; notwithstanding standing that some of them ended their lives by martyrdom.

If it be asked, whether the course of the Gospel absolutely terminated at the Indus, the question is difficult to answer. There is an observer of the ancient site of China itself received the Gospel very early, (see Thomas,) but the authority on which it rests is slender, and the true country understood by that appellation is unknown. Though perfectly willing to admit the possibility of the truth, yet it must be allowed that the same passage of Isaiah which has been quoted as mentioning the land of Sinim, or Tinh, i.e., China, might be the chiefstay of such reports. More might be said in favor of that opinion which supposes the Gospel to have reached the peninsula of India, the coast of Malabar particularly, where we trace an ancient establishment of Christianity under the title of "Christians of St. Thomas." But this Thomas appears to have been later than the Apostle of that name; we are disposed therefore to terminate the personal labors of the apostles with the boundary of the Persian empire. To this boundary they had the company of their nation, the protection of the same government as protected St. Paul, in the civil, with the innumerable facilities derived from that "more sure word of prophecy," which furnished a proper introduction on all occasions, private or public. If further progress were to be expected, then we must attribute it to the exhortation of that purpose, rather than to the personal exertions of the apostles.

We return now to Jerusalem, as to the centre whence the diffusion of the gospel went off in all directions. In the journeys of Peter we have seen it reach northward to Antioch, Pontus, Cappadocia, and Bithynia; these provinces formed the shore of the Euxine or Black sea. The travels of Paul were partly parallel to these, but south and west of them. A mere enumeration of the places he passed through in his several journeys, as recorded, may suffice to show what parts were visited by his means with evangelical blessings. His first expedition for the purpose of communicating the gospel to those who remained in darkness, was that with Barnabas, (Acts xii.) usually placed A.D. 44, the fourth year of the Roman emperor Claudius; and supposed to extend into A.D. 47. The places enumerated have been already noticed. After the council at Jerusalem, (Acts xv.) about A.D. 49, or 50, Peter went to Antioch, where he met with Paul and Barnabas; not long after which Paul's second journey commences, and extends to A.D. 54 (in company with Silas.) Paul's third journey, from Antioch in Syria, A.D. 54, to A.D. 57, or 58, the fourth year of Nero, Acts duced into Britain, is a question on which our ecclesiastical historians have been divided. Most of them, however, seem to agree in fixating that event before the time of Trinovantes, and the testimony of several of the ancients has been produced in support of this opinion. Both Tertullian and Origine speak of Christianity as having made its way into Britain; nor do they represent it as a recent event, so that it may be presumed to have taken place long before their time.

The former says, "There are places among the Britons which were inaccessible to the Romans, but yet are subdued by Christ." (Adv. Judaeos, cap. 7.)—The latter says,
"The power of God our Saviour is even with them in Britain, who are divided from our world." (In Lec. cap. i. Hom. 6.)—It was usual with the ancients, long before Origen's time, to speak of Britain as divided from the world. Even king Agrrippa, in his speech to the Jews at Jerusalem, (as related by Josephus,) about the beginning of the revolt, uses a similar language. Eusebius is more explicit: speaking of the pious labors of the apostles, he declares, that some of them "had passed over the ocean, and preached to those which are called the Britons and islands." From his connection with the imperial court, and his intimacy with the emperor himself, who was a native of Britain, he may well be suppossed to have possessed the best information; and,
as much of his reasoning depends on the truth of the above allegation, it is natural to presume that he was well assured of the fact. Theodoret, also, another ancient and respectable ecclesiastical historian, expressly names the Britons among the nations whom the apostles (the fishermen, publicans, and tentmakers, as he calls them) "had persuaded to embrace the religion of him who was crucified." (Tom. iv.
Serm. 9.) To these testimonies may be added that of Gildas, the earliest of the British historians. According to him, (Epist. c. i.) the gospel began to be published in Britain about the time of the memorable revolt and overthrow of the Britons under Boadicea, (A. D. 60, or 61,) and was followed by a long interval of peace. Speaking of this revolt, with its disastrous termination and consequences, Gildas adds,
"In the mean time, Christ, the true Sun, afforded his rays, that is, the knowledge of his precepts, to this island, benumbed with extreme cold, having been at a great distance from the Sun, not the sun in the heavens, but the true Sun, that influence, that counsel which we have the greatest need of." Can what authority Gildas places this event at that time, he does not say. From domestic or British records
he appears to have derived no assistance; and he was of opinion that no documents of that kind remained then in the country. And if there ever had been any such, he thought they had either been burnt by the enemy, or were carried into foreign parts by his exiled or emigrated countrymen; so that, to his great regret, he had not been able to discover any.
He must, therefore, have relied on the authority of some foreign records; or he might follow the tradition of the country. However that might be, his statement appears on the whole correct, and is remarkably supported by the Triades of the Isle of Britain, some of the most curious and valuable fragments preserved in the Welsh language, and relating to persons and events from the earliest times to the beginning of the seventh century. These ancient British documents, which are of undoubted credit, though but little is presently known of the lives of the famous Caractacus, who, after a warfare of nine years in defence of the liberties of his country, was basely betrayed and delivered up to the Romans by Areg-wedd Foeddig, (the Cartimandua of Roman authors,) was, together with his father Brân, and the whole Carlisle family, cut off in the thirty-first year at 52, or 53, where they were detained seven years, or more. At this time the gospel was preached at Rome; and Brân, with others of the family, became converts to Christianity. After about seven years, they had permission to return, and were the means of introducing the knowledge of Christ among their countrymen; on which account Brân was long distinguished as one of the three blessed sovereigns, and his family as one of the holy lineages of Britain.
At the return of these earliest British converts, it might be expected that some of the Christians, with whom they had associated at Rome, would be previously engaged in accompanying them to their native country. Several of the disciples of Christ, whose names are recorded in the New Testament, were probably at Rome when the Britons quitted that city; but it does not appear that any of them did at this time visit Britain. We find, however, that certain Christians from Rome did actually accompany the liberated captives;
and the names of these were preserved. One was called Ild, and is said to have been an Israelite;
the other two were Cyndaw, and Arwyddén Hén, both of them probably Gentiles. What their Roman names were, it is now impossible to say. They are supposed to have been all preachers, and are said to have been instrumental (the former especially) in turning great numbers of the Britons from the error of their ways, and persuading them to believe in Christ. Their names are the more remarkable, as they were, if not the first, yet, doubtless, among the very first, Christian preachers that ever set foot on the British island.

As Brân and Caradog (otherwise Brennus and Caractacus) were Silurian or Welsh princes, we may safely conclude that Christianity made its way into Wales as early as into any part of the kingdom.
When Brân returned to his native land, some of his family, it is thought, sailed behind and settled at Rome. Of these Claudia, mentioned with Pudens and Linus, in 2 Tim. iv. 21, is decried to have been one, and supposed to be the same with Claudia,
the wife of Pudens, mentioned by Martial the poet,
who speaks of her as a British lady of extraordinary virtue, wit, and beauty. (Epig. lib. iv. 13; lib. xi.
54.) Besides these royal captives, Pomponia Greccia, the wife of Aulus Plautius, Claudia's lieutenant, and the first Roman governor here, has also been thought a Briton and a Christian, consequently one of the earliest British Christians. Of her Tacitus says, "An illustrious lady, married to Plautius, who was honored with an ovation, (or lesser triumph,) for his victories in Britain, was accused of having embraced a strange foreign superstition; and her trial for that crime was committed to her husband. He, according to ancient law and custom, convened her whole family and relations; and having in their presence tried her for her life and fame, pronounced her innocence of any thing immoral. Pomponia lived [to a great age] many years after this trial, but always led a gloomy, melancholy kind of life." (Annal. lib. xiii.
c. 32.) On this it has been remarked that Tacitus, no doubt, deceived the lives of the primitive Christians gloomy and melancholy; and had he been called on to describe them, he would, in all probability, have represented their religion as a vile foreign superstition; and the sobriety and severity of their lives (abstaining from pagan rites and excesses) as a continual solitude, and intolerable austerity. "It was the way," says bishop Sillingfleet, "of the men of that age and nation, as well as of Tacitus, to speak of Christianity as a barbarous and wicked superstition, (as appears by their writings,) being forbidden by their laws, which they made the only rule of their religion." (Orig. Britannics, p. 44.) After the apostle Paul's coming to Rome the first time; and therefore she may, not unreasonably, be supposed to have been one of his converts. It appears that there was another person of distinction among the apostle's friends then at Rome; for instance, those of Caesar's household, among whom might be some of the British captives.

It does not appear by the Triads, that the whole of Britain was embraced by Christianity at Rome, or even that he himself did so; but a son and a daughter of his are mentioned, as well as his father, as very eminent Christians. The name of the son was Cyllus, (see Life,) and that of the daughter was Bassa, both of the British race.

That son is said to be the grandfather of Lleuwrig, commonly called king Lucius, who greatly exerted himself, at a later period, to promote Christianity in Britain, or at least in Wales, the country of his origin. Indeed, when his grandson was no such Worksheet of the west, the name, "Cunobelin" by the favor or permission of the Romans. Even the famous king Arthur appears to be a descendant of this illustrious family.

After St. Padric's death, we may collect from the testimony of Clemens Romanus, Theodoret, and Jerome, that he relates, that after his imprisonment he preached the gospel in the western parts; that he brought salvation to the islands that lie in the sea, and in the mountains of the west; he went to the utmost bounds of the west. What was meant by the west, and the islands that lie in the ocean, we may judge from plutarch, Eusebius, and Nicephorus, who call the British ocean the westerns; and again from Nicephorus, who says, that one of the apostles went to the extreme countries of the ocean, and to the British islands, but especially from the words of Catullus, who calls Britain the utmost island of the west; and from Lycor, who describes the Britasses going into the mountains of the west. When Clement, therefore, says, that Paul went to the utmost bounds of the west, we do not conjecture, but are sure, that he meant Britain, not only because Britain was so designated, but because Paul could not have gone to the utmost bounds of the west without going to Britain. It is almost unnecessary, therefore, to appeal to the express testimony of Venantius Fortunatus and Sophronius, for the apostle's journey to Britain. Venantius Fort. quoted by Godwin, says, Sophronius, Patriarch of Hierapolis, disserit serbis averter Britanniæ nostram cum invesit. (Burgess's Seven Ecomes of the Ancient British Church, p. 7.)

There is a force in the expressions of Clemens Romanus (1 Epist. Cor. cap. 5.) that is seldom wholly appreciated, inasmuch as he repeats his assertion. His words are, "Paul received the reward of his patience—He preached both in the east and in the west; and having taught the whole world righteousness, and for that end travelled to the utmost bounds of the west, he suffered martyrdom." Had not the writer been well assured of his facts, he would have been contented with his first assertion, —"he preached in the west;" whereas, he greatly strengthens this assertion by repetition and addition, —"He travelled to the utmost bounds of the west;" a mode of expression rising strongly in energy above the former; and evidently intended to mark out to the reader a determinate, specific, and well-known proposition as the object of the phrase. The later writers may be dispensably with, after this unequivocal testimony; the more powerful because incidental.

In the judgment of Mr. Taylor, the resemblance between the British name Arwedd and the Greek Aristobulus (Rom. xvi. 10.) deserves more consideration than it has hitherto received; the name, he remarks, that the formation of this name (from the Greek) is according to the analogy of the ancient British language; it is certain, also, that the apostle does not salute Aristobulus himself, personally and directly, but is addressed to his family.

CHRISTIANITY

To verify the words of Tertullian, which some have considered a mere flourish of rhetoric, Britannorum inaccess Romanis loca, Christo vero subdita.

Places in Britain, which were inaccessible to the Romans, were not lost to Christ, in Wales, where, amid the recesses and retreats furnished by the mountains, there were, no doubt, many who had fled, after the capture of Caractacus, and who there continued to resist the Romans. In fact, Ostorius, who had taken Caractacus captive, sunk under the fatigue of the succeeding war; Manlius Valens, with a legion of Romans, was attacked and defeated by the Britons, and the war continued with various success. Nero even entertained thoughts of withdrawing his army from Britain, says Suetonius. In A. D. 62, Petronius Turrilianus succeeded to the government of Britain;

who, says Tacitus, "gave the name of peace to his own inactivity, and, having composed former disturbances, attempted nothing further." Is it impossible that this inactivity, during three years, should be the result of the return of the principal British to their homes? Britain fell to the lot of Vesuvius in A. D. 71, and to Agricola in A. D. 78. By this time, we may well believe that Cato the Censor (who, according to the Mosaic law, was not to enter the sanctuary) was ordained by Bernabaeus, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels: so that the Britons, converted by Aristobulus, might with propriety be called the disciples of Paul, even if that apostle never set foot in Britain. But it is to be acknowledged, at the same time, that if Paul did not follow Aristobulus, and confirm his converts in Britain, the comfort of his visit was greatly increased, and the necessity of his prolonged residence greatly diminished, by the previous success of his disciple. Might he come during the peaceful government of Petronius Turrilianus?

But we may adopt a chronology still more conceived for its purpose that Ostorius arrived as governor in Britain, A. D. 50, and immediately opened a winter campaign against the Britons. Allowing a proportionate time for the events of war, as urged by this active general, Caractacus might be sent prisoner to Rome in A. D. 51, instead of A. D. 92, which would give the following dates:

Aulus Plautius governor in Britain 138
Brân and Caradoc at Rome 51
Brân liberated after 7 years' captivity 58
Paul writes to the Romans, at the end of 58, or early in 59; Aristobulus gone from Rome to Britain with Brân, at the date of Paul's letter. 63
Paul visits Britain 63
Paul the apostle mentions sundry British Christians, residing at Rome, when writing to Timothy. Had Timothy a personal acquaintance with them? It should appear so, from the tenor and mode of the salutation. 65 or 66

Thus we have seen that to the extent of the prophecies of the Old Testament, either the records of the New Testament expressly affirm, or very credible testimony leads to believe, that the gospel quickly communicated its salutary influence; and so far the investigation of biblical geography demonstrates the authority of the Bible itself, by the fulfilment of its prophecies, and the general establishment of its truth. If it be asked whether the parts thus favored by nature not long after attached to Christ, in Wales, where, amid the recesses and retreats furnished by the mountains, there were, no doubt, many who had fled, after the capture of Caractacus, and who there continued to resist the Romans. In fact, Ostorius, who had taken Caractacus captive, sunk under the fatigue of the succeeding war; Manlius Valens, with a legion of Romans, was attacked and defeated by the Britons, and the war continued with various success. Thus we have seen that to the extent of the prophecies of the Old Testament, either the records of the New Testament expressly affirm, or very credible testimony leads to believe, that the gospel quickly communicated its salutary influence;
imagine we have any knowledge of the holy books, if we are ignorant of these. Also, that in the Chronicles we may find the solution of a great number of questions that concern the gospel.

There are many years recorded as well as facts as in dates, between the books of Kings and the Chronicles, which are to be explained and reconciled, chiefly on the principle, that the letter are supplementary to the former; not forgetting that the language was slightly varied from what it had been; that various places had received new names, or had undergone sundry vicissitudes; that certain things were now better known to the returned Jews, under other apppellations than what they formerly had been distinguished by; and that, from the materials before him, which often were not the same as those used by the abridgers of the histories of the kings, the author takes those passages which seemed to him best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the times in which he wrote. It must be considered, too, that he often elucidates obsoleat and ambiguous words, in former books, by a different mode of spelling them, or by a different order of the words used; even when he does not use a distinct phrasisology in the narration, which he sometimes does. The first book contains a recapitulation of sacred history, by genealogies, from the beginning of the world to the death of David, A. M. 3268. The second book contains the history of the kings of Judah, without those of Israel, from the beginning of the reign of Solomon only, A. M. 3260, to the return from the captivity of Babylon, A. M. 3468.

CHRONOLOGY is the science of computing and determining the time, and the ages when either religious or political events occurred, of considerable importance in relation to Scripture history. See Time.

The chronology adopted by the English translators, and placed in the margin of the larger Bibles, is that of the Masoretic, or common Hebrew text; but of the authenticity of this, strong doubts are entertained by the best biblical critics. Compared with the more extended chronology of the Septuagint, it is of modern adoption; the venerable Bede, who flourished in the eighth century, having been the first Christian writer who manifested a predilection for it. It has been observed, however, that prior to the reformation, the views of the celebrated monk of Durham had made but little progress among the learned, and that when either religious or political events occurred, of considerable importance in relation to Scripture history, the authority of the Greek, version and the unanimous consent of the primitive writers were still found to regulate all the calculations concerning the ages of the world. In the warmth of the controversy which ensued, the more rigid Protostants were induced to rank among the corruptions of the western church, the chronology of the Samaritan Pentateuch, of the Seventy, and of Josephus; and without taking time or pains to examine the grounds of their opinion, they positively pronounced that the numbers of the original text were to be preferred to those of any version; and with a weight of their authority upon the Jewish side of the question, and opposed that which the Christians had maintained from the days of the apostles.

The chief difference between these two schemes of chronology, is found in those periods which extend from the creation to the minister and from the minister to the birth of Abraham. According to the Hebrew computation, the number of years comprised in the first period, amounts only to 1656; and the second to 262. But in the Septuagint, the numbers respectively are 2329 and 1072; thus extending the interval between the creation and the birth of Christ, from 4000 to nearly 6000 years. The former has not yet been satisfactorily accounted for, but much light has been thrown upon the subject by the laborious investigations of Hayes, Jackson, and Hales; and the result has been to give a somewhat increased degree of confidence in the larger computations of the Septuagint.

AGE OF THE WORLD.—The time preceding the birth of Jesus Christ has generally been divided into six ages: (1.) from the beginning of the world to the deluge, comprehending 1656 years; (2.) from the deluge to Abraham's entering the land of promise, in A. M. 2069, comprehending 429 years; (3.) from Abraham's entrance of the promised land, to the exodus, A. M. 2515, comprehending 431 years; (4.) from the exodus to the foundation of the temple by Solomon, A. M. 2992, comprehending 479 years; (5.) from the foundation of the temple to the Babylonish captivity, in A. M. 3415, comprehending 424 years; (6.) from the captivity to the birth of Christ, A. M. 4000, the fourth year before the vulgar era, or A. D. comprehending 564 years.

We need not enlarge on the different systems of ancient and modern chronologers, concerning the ages of the world. Those who would study these matters, must consult those authors who have expressly treated the subject. We have followed Usher in the chronology of the Old Testament, with some trifling differences only; and among the appendices is a Chronological Table, with the dates inserted according to Dr. Hales.

CHRYSOBOLITE, a precious stone, probably the tenth on the high-priest's ephod; bearing the name of Zebulun, Exod. xxvii. 20; xxxiii. 18. It is transparent, the color of gold, with a mixture of green, which displays a fine lustre. The Hebrew seva (σηραχία) is translated by the LXX. and by Jerome, sometimes, carbuncle; by the rabbinics, berys; it was the seventh foundation of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 20. Some suppose it to be the topaz of the moderns.

CHRYSPORASUS, the tenth of those precious stones which adorned the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem; its color was green, inclining to gold, as its name imports, Rev. xxii. 19. See Rees's Cyclop.

CHUB, a word which occurs only in Ezek. xxx. 5, and probably signifies the Cubians, placed by Ptolemy in the Mareotis. Bochart takes it to be Palaeurus, a city in Marmotica, because the Syrian word denotes palaeus, a sort of thorn. It would seem to be a southern country, from the circumstance of its being mentioned with Egypt and Cush.

CHUN, a city of Syria, conquered by David, Chron. xvii. 8. In the parallel passage, 2 Sam. viii. 8, it is called Berothah (which see), i.e., probably Berytus, now Beirut.

CHURCH. The Greek word εκκλησία signifies an assembly, whether common or religious; it is taken, (1.) for the place where an assembly is held; (2.) for the persons assembled. In the New Testament it generally denotes a congregation of believers. By the church is sometimes meant the faithful who have preserved the true religion from the beginning, and will preserve it. The history of this church is narrated by Moses, from the beginning to his time; from Moses to Christ, we have the sacred writings of the Hebrews. Moses is our guide from Shem to Abraham, but he does not inform us whether the tradition was preserved by the descendants of Ham and Japheth; nor how long it subsisted among them. We see, that Abraham's ancestors worshipped idols in Chaldea, Josh. xxiv. 2. On the other hand, we know, that the fear of the Lord was not entirely banished out of Palestine and Egypt when Abraham came thither; for the king of Egypt feared God, (Gen. xii. 17; xx. 3.) and had great abhorrence of it. Abraham imagined, that there were at least ten or twenty righteous persons in Sodom, (Gen. xviii. 23, 24, 25.) and it is probable, that the sons of Abraham, by Hagar and Keturah, for some time preserved the faith which they had received from their father. Job, who was of Esau's posterity, and his friends, knew the Lord, and the Ammonites and Moabites, who descended from Lot, did not, probably, fall immediately into idolatry. The Ishmaelites, sons of Hagar and Abraham, value themselves on having always adhered to the worship of the true God, and having extended the knowledge of him in Arabia, and in Palestine; for we are certain, that in the time of Mahomet, and long before, they had forsaken the true faith. See CHASTITY.

CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, king of Mesopotamia, oppressed the Israelites eight years; from A. M. 3591, to 3599, Judges iii. 8, 9, 10.

CHUZA, steward to Herod Agrippa, and husband of Joanna, Luke viii. 3.

CILICIA, a country of Asia Minor, on the seacoast, at the north of Cyprus, south of mount Taurus, and west of the Euphrates. Its capital was Tarsus. A synagogue of this province is mentioned, Acts vi. 9, and as Paul was of this country, and of a city so considerable as Tarsus, it may be thought that he was also of this synagogue; so that it is probable he was one of those who had been disputing with Stephen, and were overthrown by the arguments of that proto-martyr. See TARUS.

CINNAMON, one of the ingredients in the perfumed oil with which the tabernacle and its vessels were anointed, Exod. xxx. 23. The cinnamonum is a shrub, the bark of which has a fine scent; several of the moderns confound it with the cinnamon-tree, and cassia aromaticas; but others distinguish three species, Cassia cinnamomea, which is generally agreed, that the cinnamonum spoken of so confusedly by the ancients, is our cinnamon; it is a long, thin bark of a tree, rolled up, of a dark red color, of a poignant taste, aromatic, and very agreeable. The finest description comes from Ceylon; but there might formerly have been cinnamonum in Arabia, or Ethiopia; or it might be imported then into Egypt, Arabia, &c. as it is now into Europe; so that it might come originally from Ceylon.

CINNEROTH, or CENEROTH, or CINNEROTH, a city of Naphthali, south of which lay a great valley or plain, which reached to the Dead sea, all along the river Jordan, Josh. xix. 35. Many believe, and with probability, out of Palestine; and universally agreed, that the cinnamum spoken of so confusedly by the ancients, is our cinnamon; it is a long, thin bark of a tree, rolled up, of a dark red color, of a poignant taste, aromatic, and very agreeable. The finest description comes from Ceylon; but there might formerly have been cinnamonum in Arabia, or Ethiopia; or it might be imported there into Egypt, Arabia, &c. as it is now into Europe; so that it might come originally from Ceylon.

CINNEROTH, or CENEROTH, or CINNEROTH, a city of Naphthali, south of which lay a great valley or plain, which reached to the Dead sea, all along the river Jordan, Josh. xix. 55. Many believe, and with probability, out of Palestine; and universally agreed, that the cinnamum spoken of so confusedly by the ancients, is the same city, Deut. iii. 17. See TIBERIAS, and GENESERET. It is, without doubt, that of Tiberias, it seems reasonable that Cinneroth and Tiberias should be the same city, Deut. iii. 17. See TIBERIAS, and GENESERET.

CIRCUMCISION, a Latin term, signifying 'to cut around,' because the Jews, in circumcision, their children, cut off, after this manner, the little skin which forms the prepuce. God enjoined Abra­ham to use circumcision, as a sign of his covenant; and, in obedience to this order, the patriarch, at nine­ty-nine years of age, was circumcised, as also his son Ishmael, and all the males of his property, Gen. xvii. 10. God repeated the precept to Moses; and ordered that all who intended to partake of the paschal sacrifice should receive circumcision; and that this rite should be performed on children on the eighth day after their birth. The Jews have always been very exact in observing this ceremony, and it appears that they did not neglect it when in Egypt. But Moses, while in Midian, with Jethro, his father­in-law, did not circumcise his two sons born in that country; and during the journey of the Israelites in the wilderness their children were not circumcised; probably by reason of the danger to which they might have been exposed; in sudden remonstrances, &c. because of their unsettled state, and manner of life.

The law mentions nothing of the minister, or the instrument, of circumcision; which were left to the discretion of the people. They generally used a knife or razor, or sharp stone, Exod. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2. The ceremonies observed in circumcision are particularly described by Leo of Modena, (cap. viii.) and may also be seen in Allen's Modern Judaism.

The Arabians, Saracens, and Ishmaelites, who, as well as the Hebrews, sprung from Abraham, practiced circumcision, but not as an essential rite to which they were bound, on pain of being cut off from their people. Circumcision was introduced with the law of Moses among the Samaritans, Catholics, and Idumeans. Those who assert that the Phcenicians were circumcised, mean probably the Samaritans; for we know, from other authority, that the Phcenicians did not observe this ceremony. As to the Egyptians, circumcision never was of general and indispensable obligation on the whole nation; certain priests only, and particular professions, were obliged to submit to it.

Circumcision is never repeated. When the Jews admitted a proselyte of another nation, if he had received circumcision, (concision,) they were satisfied with drawing some drops of blood from the part usually circumcised; which blood was called 'the blood of the covenant.'

The Jews consider the foreskin or uncircumcision as a very great impurity; and the greatest offence they could receive was to be called 'uncircumcised.' Paul (Rom. ii. 26.) frequently mentions the Gentiles under this term in opposition to the name "circumcision." He also alludes to an imperfect mode of circumcision, or a partial removal of the foreskin, which apparently was practised by the Edomites, Egyptians, &c. This he calls concision; and associates those who practised it with dogs, Phil. iii. 2. He probably here turns the application of Jewish terms of contempt and ridicule against the Jews themselves.

As a consequence of the opinion entertained by the Jews, that uncircumcision was unclean and dishonorable, but circumcision the contrary; they sometimes use the word uncircumcision in a figurative sense, to signify something impure, superfluous, useless, and dangerous: e. g. Moses says of himself he is "of uncircumcised lips" (Exod. vi. 12, 30.) that is, he had an impediment in his speech. Jere­miah (vi. 10.) says of the Jews, they had "uncircumcised ears," that is, they would not hear instruction. He exhorts them (chap. iv. 4; ix. 23.) to "circumcise.
their hearts; literally, to take away the foreskins of their hearts; to be tractable and attentive. Moses inveighs against the uncircumcised hearts of the Jews, who would not obey the Lord; and we have already spoken of some in the New Testament. Stephen reproaches the Jews with the hardness of their heart, and their indolence, Acts vii. 51.

Jews who renounced Judaism, sometimes endeavoured to erase the mark of circumcision: “They made themselves uncircumcised, and forsook the holy covenant,” 1 Mac. i. 15. Some are of opinion, that the Iserites in the wilderness had done so, which obliged Joshua to circumcise them a second time, Josh. v. 2. Under the persecutions of the Christians, many Jews died in the midst of the people, Jews were guilty of this; and it seems as if Paul alluded to the same thing, 1 Cor. vii. 18.

CIRCUMSPECT, cautious, seriously attentive to every part of the revealed will of God, and very particular in the way of others, Exod. xxiii. 13; Eph. v. 15.

CISLAEU, the ninth month in the ecclesiastical year, and the third in the civil, or political, year of the Hebrews. It is supposed to answer nearly to our November. O. B. See CHILE, and JEWISH CALENDAR.

CISTERN. There were cisterns throughout Palestine, in cities and in private houses. As the cities were mostly built on mountains, and the rains fall in Judea, at two seasons only, (spring and autumn,) people were obliged to keep water in vessels. There are cisterns of very large dimensions, at this day, in Palestine. Two hours distant from Bethleem, the cisterns supplied the city with water. They are three in number, situated in the sloping hollow of a mountain, one above another; so that the waters of the uppermost descend into the second, and those of the second descend into the third. The breadth is nearly the same in all, being between eighty and ninety yards, but the length varies. The first is about 160 paces long; the second 200; the third 220. These pools formerly supplied the town of Bethleem and the city of Jerusalem with water. Wells and cisterns, fountains and springs, are seldom distinguished accurately in Scripture. Worldly enjoyments are called “broken cisterns that can hold no water,” (Jer. ii. 13.) from their unsatisfying and unstable nature. (See MOD. TRAVELLER, Palestine, p. 165.)

CHRIST, Res. in Syria, p. 225.)

“With regard to water, some parts of the Holy Land appeared, in the month of October and November, to labor under great privation. Yet even in this respect, it might furnish a remedy, in the tanks and cisterns, which a little industry would form and preserve. The cities and villages have such supplies; and in every stage of seven or eight hours, there are usually found, once or twice, at least, cisterns or muddy wells. In some places, a person at the well obtained payment for the water, which he drew for us and our animals; but this was probably an imposition, although by us willingly paid.” R.

CLAUDIA, a Roman lady converted by Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 21. Some think she was the wife of Pudens, who is named immediately before her; others consider that she was a British lady, sister of Linus. See CHRISTIANITY.

I. CLAUDIUS, the emperor of Rome, mentioned in the New Testament, succeeded Caius Caligula, A. D. 41, and reigned upwards of thirteen years. He gave to Agrippa all Judea; and to his brother Herod, the kingdom of Cladice. He terminated the dispute between the Jews and the other inhabitants of Alexandria, confirming the former in the freedom of that city, and in the free exercise of their religion and laws; but not permitting them to hold assemblies at Rome. Agrippa dying in the fourth year of Claudius, A. D. 44, the emperor again reduced Judea into a province, and sent Cumius Fabius as governor. About this time happened the famine, as foretold by the prophet Agabus, (Acts xi. 28, 29, 30.) and at the same period, Herod, king of Cladice, obtained from the emperor the dominion over the temple; he money consecrated to God, with a power of depositing and establishing the high-priests. In the ninth year of Claudius, (A. D. 49.) he published an order, expelling all Jews from Rome, (Acts xviii. 2.) and it is probable that the Jews being confounded with the Jews, were banished likewise. Suetonius plainly intimates this, when he says that Claudius expelled the Jews, by reason of the continual disturbances excited by them, at the instigation of Christians. In an agent sent from Cladice to the emperor, Paul was confounded, with the Jews; who, being confounded with the Jews, were banished likewise.

II. CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, tribune of the Roman troops, which kept guard at the temple of Jerusalem. Observation, was raised on account of Paul, whom the Jews had seized, and designed to murder, he rescued him, and (Acts xx. 27; xxiii. 31.) carried him to fort Antonia, and afterwards sent him guarded to Cladice.

III. CLAUDIUS FELIX, successor of Cumanus in the government of Judea, and husband of Drusilla, sister of Agrippa the younger. Felix sent to Rome Eleazer, son of Dineus, captain of a band of robbers, the sand and contrary to the wishes of Felix; he procured the death of Jonathan, the high-priest, who occasionally represented his duty to him, with great freedom, and defeated a body of 3000 men, which an Egyptian, a false prophet, had assembled on the mount of Olives. Paul being confined to Cesarea, Felix treated him well, permitted his friends to see him, and to render him services, hoping he would procure his redemption by a sum of money, Acts xxiii. Felix, with his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, having deviated from the religion of Jesus Christ, the apostle spoke with his usual boldness, and discoursed to them concerning justice, chastity, and the last judgment. Felix, being terrified, remanded the apostle to his confinement, and detained him two years at Cesarea, in order to oblige the Jews. He was recalled to Rome, A. D. 60, and was succeeded by Portius Festus. (Joseph. Ant. l. xx. c. 7.)

CLAY, a substance frequently mentioned in Scripture, and universally known. It was formerly used in the East, as it is to this day, for sealing. Norden and Pococke both observe that the inspectors of the granaries in Egypt, after having closed the door, put their seal upon a handful of clay, with which they covered the lock. This may tend to explain Job xxxvii. 14, where the earth is represented as assuming form and imagery from the brightness of the rising sun, as rude clay receives a figure from the impression of a signet.

CLEANSE, see PURIFICATIONS, and also ANIMALS.

CLEMENT, whose name is in the Book of Life,
Phiel. iv. 3. Most interpreters conclude that this is the same Clement who succeeded in the government of the church at Rome, commonly called Clemens Romanus.

The church at Corinth having been disturbed by divisions, Clement wrote a letter to the Corinthians, which was so much esteemed by the ancients, that they read it publicly in many churches. It is still extant, and some have inclined to rank it among the canonical writings. We have no authentic accounts of what occurred to Clement during the persecution of Domitian; we are assured, that he lived to the third year of Trajan, A. D. 100.

CLEOPAS, according to Eusebius and Epiphanius, was brother of Joseph, both being sons of Jacob. He is probably the same person with Alpheus, which see. He was the father of Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, of James the Less, of Jude, and of Joseph, or Joasus. Cleopas married Mary, sister of the Virgin; so that he was uncle to Jesus Christ. He, his wife, and sons, were disciples of Christ; but Cleopas did not sufficiently understand what Jesus had so often told his disciples, that it was expedient he should die, and return to the Father. Having beheld our Lord upon his exaltation on the cross, he lost all hope of seeing the kingdom of God established by him on earth; but going to Emmaus with another disciple, they were joined by our Lord, who accompanied them, and on his breaking bread they recognized him, Luke xxi. 31. v. 14-20.

I. CLEOPATRA, daughter of Antiochus the Great, and wife of Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt. Some are of opinion, that this princess is described in Dan. xi. 17, under the title "Daughter of Women."

II. CLEOPATRA, daughter of the above Cleopatra and Ptolemy Epiphanes. She married Ptolemy Philometor, her own brother; and is mentioned Esther xi. 1. Jpsoc.

III. CLEOPATRA, daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, and the latter Cleopatra, married first to Alexander Balas, king of Syria, then to Antiochus Sidetes; and afterwards to Demetrius Nicanor. She is named in Mac. x. She designed to poison her son Grypus, but he prevented her, and obliged her to drink the draught she had provided for him. A. M. 3882.

IV. CLEOPATRA, sister and wife of Ptolemy Physcon. See Alexander III.

V. CLEOPATRA, the last queen of Egypt, and daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. When Cleopatra passed through Judea, in her return from a journey she had made with Antony to the Ephorpes, Herod received her with all imaginable magnificence. Cleopatra killed herself by the sting of an asp. A. M. 3674.

CLOTHES, see DRESSES.

CLOUD, (1) a collection of vapors:—(2) the morning mists, Hos. vi. 4; xiii. 3. When the Israelites had left Egypt, "The Lord went before them in a pillar of cloud," to direct their march, Exod. xiii. 21, 22. This pillar was commonly in front of the tribes; but at Pihaishroth, when the Egyptian army approached behind them, it placed itself between Israel and the Egyptians, so that the Egyptians could not come near the Israelites all night. "The angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them," Exod. xiv. 19. In the morning, the cloud moving on over the sea, and following the Israelites who had passed through it, the Egyptians followed the cloud, and were drowned. This cloud from that time attended the Israelites: it was clear and bright during the day, but dense and gloomy, and at night. It was, therefore, a pillar of light, but in the day it was thick and gloomy, to defend them from the excessive heats of the desert. The cloud by its motions gave the signal to Israel, either to encamp, or to decamp; so that where that stayed, the people stayed, till it rose again; then they broke up their camp, and followed it till it stopped. It was called a pillar, from its form, rising high and elevated, as if it were a pile, or heap of mists; as we say, a pillar of smoke. Rabbi Solomon and Aben Ezra suppose that there were two clouds, one to enlighten, the other to shade the camp.

The Lord appeared at Sinai in the midst of a cloud; (Exod. xix. 9; xxxiv. 5,) and after Moses had built and consecrated the tabernacle, a cloud filled the court around it, so that neither Moses nor the priests could enter. Exi. 34, 35. The same occurred at the dedication of the temple by Solomon, 2 Chron. v. 13; 1 Kings viii. 10.

When, then, the cloud appeared on the tent, in front of the congregation, and the assembled people, in the desert, it was believed that God was then present, for the motion of the cloud which rested on the tent was a sign of the divine presence, Exod. xvi. 10; xxxiii. 9; Num. xi. 25. The angel descended in the cloud, and from thence spoke to Moses, without being seen by the people, Exod. xvi. 10; Num. xi. 25; xxi. 5. It is usual in Scripture, when mentioning the presence of God, to represent him as encompassed with clouds, serving as a chariot, and veiling his dreadful majesty, Job xxii. 14; Isaiah xix. 1; Matt. xvii. 5; xxxiv. 30, &c. Ps. xviii. 11, 12; xviii. 2; civ. 3. The Son of God is described as ascending to heaven in a cloud; (Acts i. 9,) and at his second advent, as descending upon clouds, Matt. xxxiv. 30; Rev. xiv. 14, 16.

CLYSMA, or CLISMA, of COLUM, the place where the Israelites passed the Red sea. According to Epiphanius, it was one of the three ports which lay on the Red sea: Suez is now its representative. See EXOINES.

CNIDES, a city standing on a promontory of the same name, in that part of the province of Caria which was called Doris, a little north-west from Rhodos. It was remarkable for the worship of Venus, and for possessing the celebrated statue of the goddess, made by the famous artist Praxiteles. The Romans wrote to this city in favor of the Jews, (1 Mac. xv. 23,) and Paul passed it in his way to Rome, Acts xxvii. 7.

COA. In 1 Kings x. 28. and 2 Chron. i. 16, it is said that horses were brought to Solomon from Coa, at a certain price. The Septuagint reads, ìν àξîματιν. Some, by Coas, understand the city of Coa, in Arabia Felix; others Coas, a city of Egypt, and capital of the province called Cytopolitana. The Hebrew may be translated, "They brought horses from Egypt and from Michoè;" and Pliny (lib. vi. cap. 29,) assures us, that the country of the Trogodytes, near Egypt, was formerly called Michoè. Others translate, "They brought horses, and spun thread;" (linen-yarn, Eng. trans.) supposing that the Hebrew masóces signifies thread. Jarchi supposed it to mean a string of horses, fastened from the tail of one to another;—they brought horses in strings—at a settled duty or price; and this interpretation is followed by several expositors. Bochart, by masos, understands tribute; and translates, "They brought horses—and as to the tribute, this prince's farmers received them at certain rates." The usual manner of tying camels together, by four or five, in the way that we tie horses, is a narrow rope, and we may read—"And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, even (literally, drawings-out—prolongations), strings, that is, of horses, and the king's broker received the strings, that is, of horses—in consignment—exchange—barrer. And a chariot came up from Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and a single horse for one hundred and fifty," and these be sold again at a great profit to the neighboring kings.—As the whole context seems rather applicable to horses than to linen-yarn, this idea preserves the unity of the passage, while it strictly maintains the import of the words used in it.

The word γόον is found only in the Vulgate. The Hebrew is נטגן, n'tegh, the same word which, in Gen. i. 10, is rendered the gathering together, collection, of the waters. How the Septuagint and Vulgate could here make a proper name of it, is difficult to see; it may best be applied here in the same sense as in Genesis, viz. —And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and a chariot of linen-yarn, (τριψιθ, triphē), the king's merchants brought a collection, caravan, (μύρακ, mūrakh, of horses, for money.) In verse 17, the writer proceeds in the same manner to state the cost of them,—a chariot for six hundred shekels of silver, and a horse for one hundred and fifty. In this way the word is used both of the merchants and of the horses,—just as our word carven may be used in the same manner; and there is thus a sort of paronomasia.—R.

Cock, a well-known and tame bird. He generally crows three times in the night—at midnight, two hours before day, and at break of day.

Cock-crowing, a division of time. See Hours.

Cockatrice, a fabulous species of serpent, supposed to be hatched from the egg of a cock. The translators of the English Bible have variously rendered the Hebrew yd, or yd, by adder and cockatrice; and we are by no means certain of the particular kind of serpent to which the original term is applied. In Is. xi. 7, or triphē, says Dr. Ho- rius, we have an advance in its malignity than the pelēn whose it precedes; and in ch. xiv. 25, it must mean a worse kind of serpent than the nachaz; but this still leaves us ignorant of its specific character. Mr. Taylor is of opinion that it is the naja, or cobra di capello, or hooded snake, of the Portuguese, which we find thus described by Goldsmith—

"Of all others the cobra di capello, or hooded serpent, inflicts the most deadly and incurable wounds. Of this formidable creature there are five or six different kinds; but they are all equally dangerous, and their bite is followed by speedy and certain death. It is from three to eight feet long, with two long fangs hanging out of the upper jaw. It has a broad neck, and a mark of dark brown on the forehead; which, when viewed frontwise, looks like a pair of spectacles; but behind like the head of a cat. The eyes are fierce and full of fire; the head is small, and the nose flat, though covered with very large scales, of a yellowish ash-color; the skin is white, and the large tumor on the neck is flat, and covered with oblong, smooth scales. The bite of this animal is said to be incurable, the patient dying in about an hour after the wound; the whole frame being dissolved into one putrid mass of corruption." The effects here attributed to the bite of this creature answer very well to what is intimated of the θρίπγη in Scripture. Thus, in Is. xi. 7, "They (the θρίπγη) shall not hurt nor destroy (corrupt) in all my holy mountain." And Prov. xxiii. 32, "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and sweareth like a adder;"—so the LXX and Vulgate like an adder.—See Serpent and Inchantments.

The greatest difficulty, at first sight, against accepting the naja as the triphē, is, that it is said, that serpent shall not be tamed, but shall resist enchantments, whereas the naja is in some sort domesticated. But Mr. Taylor remarks, (1.) that though the naja is managed by human contrivance and art, yet it is not tamed, but would as readily bite its master as any other; (2.) that we may take the prophet to mean, "though this kind of serpent be occasionally subdued, yet those I send shall be proof against such management; more venomous, more ferocious, of the same species, but of greater powers and malignity."—But a still more formidable objection to this supposition is, that the naja, or cobra di capello, is found only in India, and never in Palestine or the adjacent countries (see Rose's Cyclop. art. Coluber.) The Hebrew terms θρίπγη and θρίπγη do not designate the adder race in general; not, in fact, the cobra. The unyielding cruelty of the Chaldean armies, under Nebuchadnezzar, who were appointed ministers of Jehovah's vengeance on the Jewish nation, whose iniquities had made him their enemy, is expressly alluded to in the following passage: For behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, puffing you, which shall not be charmed, and they shall bite you, saith the Lord;" Jer. viii. 17.

COCKLE. This herb is only mentioned Job xxxi. 40. By the Chaldeans it is rendered "noxious herbs"; and our translators have placed in the margin "noisome weeds." Michaelis, after Celsius, understands it of the asculus, a poisonous plant, growing spontaneously and luxuriantly on sunny hills, such as are used for vineyards. This interpretation suits the passage, where it is mentioned as growing in the head of barley. (The Hebrew word signifies simply weeds in general, "noisome weeds."—R.

CELE-SYRIA, Helle-Syria, is properly the valley between Libanus and AntiLibanus, extending from north to south. From the malignity from the presence of the naja; and beyond Helipolis, or Baal-beck. But, in the larger sense, the country south of Seleucia, to Egypt and Arabia, is called Cele-Syria. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i, cap. 11.) places the country of Ammon in Cele-Syria; and Steph.-Perrinus, the great city of Gadara in it, which was east of the sea of Tiberias. The following is a list of the cities in Cele-Syria, according to Ptolemy: Abila, Lyssanum, Samsa, Ions, Damascus, Samalit, Abida, Hippos, Capitoïlios, Gadara, Adra, Scythopolis, Gerasa, Pella, Diurna, Philadelphica, and Canatha. Hence we see that it included several cities of the Perea.

Cele-Syria has no particular name in Scripture, but is comprised under the general one of Aram; and, perhaps, Syria of Zobah, or Zobah-Zoba, extended to Cele-Syria; of which, however, we know not any good proofs; for we cannot tell where the city of Zoba was, from which Aram of Zoba is supposed to take its name; unless it be the same with Hazor, (Gen. xiv. 15.) or Calba, as the LXX read it. See SPIR.

COHORT, a military term used by the Romans, to denote a company generally composed of 600 foot soldiers: a legion consisted of ten cohorts, every cohort being composed of three maniples, and every maniple of 300 men; a legion, consequently, contained in all 6,000 men. Others allow but 300 men to a cohort, which would make 3,000 in a legion. It is probable, therefore, that the expression is correct among the moderns, often varied as to their number.

COLONY. This word does not always imply that any considerable body of citizens from Rome had left their native city, and had founded a new town where there had been none, as the first colonies in America were founded. No doubt, a settlement of Romans might give rise to Roman colonies; and many bodies of their troops, after they were dismissed from military service, received allotments in distant towns. But especially many cities were favored with the privilege of Roman citizens, and were considered as being in a manner Roman, in reward for services which they had rendered to the government of Rome, or to the emperors. See AGRICOLA.

COLOSSE, a city of Phrygia, which stood not far from the junction of the river Lycus with the Meander; being situated at an equal distance between Laodicea and Hierapolis. These three cities were destroyed by an earthquake, according to Eusebius, in the tenth year of Nero, that is, about two years after the date of Paul's epistle. Some believe, that the apostle never visited this place, though he preached in Phrygia; but that the Colossians received the gospel from Epaphras. For he having been informed, either by Epaphras himself, or by the apostle himself, or by letters from the Laodiceans, that false prophets at Colosse had preached the necessity of legal observances, wrote that epistle to Colossians which we now have, in which he insists on Jesus Christ being the only mediator with God, and true head of the church. His letter was carried to the Colossians by Tychicus, his faithful minister, and Onesimus.

COMFORTER, (Paradosais), an escortor, defender, intercessor. This title is given to the Holy Spirit by our Saviour, John xiv. 16, and John gives it to our Saviour himself: "We have an advocate (paradosais) with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, 1 Ep. ii. 6. But the title is chiefly given to the Holy Spirit. COMMON, profane, ceremonially unclean, Mark vii. 2, 5; Acts x. 14, 15; Rom. xiv. 14.

COMMUNION, fellowship, concord, agreement, 1 Cor. x. 16; 2 Cor. vii. 14; 1 John i. 3. The communion of a number of persons in the same religious society. Moreover, however, it builds up and perfects that faith which is spiritually interpreted, and is usually understood, that the twelve tribes of Israel were virtually represented, at the time of offering up the daily sacrifice in the temple at Jerusalem, by twelve persons called stationary men, who constantly attended the temple and accompanied the priests. Besides this, we read of the apostle Paul's partaking in the service to be performed on account of certain Nazarites: (Acts xxii. 24) so that joining in their expenses was considered as partaking in some degree in the sanctity and merit of their offerings. As we have no sacrifices among ourselves, we are little able to appreciate the usages attending such consociations.

CONCUBINE, a term which, in western authors, commonly signifies a woman who, without being married to a man, lives with him as his wife: but, in the sacred writers, the word concubine is understood in another sense; meaning a lawful wife, but one of the second rank; inferior to the first wife, or mistress of the house. She differed from a proper wife in that she was not married by solemn stipulation, but only betrothed; she brought no dowry with her; and had no share in the government of the family. Children of concubines did not inherit their father's property; but he might provide for them, and make presents to them. Thus Abraham, by Sarah his wife, had Isaac, his heir; but by his two concubines, Hagar and Keturah, he had other children, whose he did not make equal to Isaac, Gen. xxxvi. 6. As polygamy was tolerated in the East, it was common to see in every family, beside lawful wives, several concubines; but since the abrogation of polygamy by Christ, and the restoration of marriage to its primitive institution, the admission and maintenance of concubines has been condemned among Christians.

CONCUPISCENCE, a term used by the apostle John, to signify an irregular love of pleasure, wealth, or honor, 1 John ii. 16. Concupiscence is both the effect and cause of sin: bad desires, as well as bad actions, are forbidden; and the first care of those who would please God, is to restrain concupiscence. When the Hebrews demanded change of diet, in mutinous terms, with excessive and irregular desire, God punished many of them with death, and the place of their burial was called the graves of lust, Num. xi. 34. God prohibits the desiring with concupiscence any thing which belongs to our neighbor. Concupiscence is generally taken in a bad sense; particularly for carnal inclinations.

CONDEMN, to declare guilty; an expression which is used not only in judicial acts, but in whatever relates to them. The priests condemned lepers of impurity; that is, they declared them unclean. So Dan. l. 10. "Ye shall condemn my head to the king (Eng. trans. make me endangers);" and Job ix. 36. "My mouth shall condemn me." God speaks to me by my own words. "The righteous that is dead, shall condemn the ungodly which are living." Wicl. iv. 16.

CONELY, (shaphdas), an unclean animal, Lev. xi. 5.

There is little doubt that the shaphdas is the gamzeim Israel, or, as it is called by Bruce, the heb. shaphdas, a harmless animal, of nearly the same size and quality as the rabbit, but of a browner color, smaller ears, and a more pointed head. Its feet are round, and very fleshy and pulpy; notwithstanding which, it runs so fast that it is said to overtake a horse. It is fed with corn, and lives in the same manner as the rabbit. Its size is small; its feet and ears are very coarse and hard; and its hair is short and coarse, and no longer than a cat's. It is said to be the same with the mus v. dipus jaculus of Linneus. It is about the size of a large rat; the hind feet are very long, and enable them to make prodigious bounds; and with their fore feet they carry food to their mouths like the squirrel. They burrow in hard, clayey ground, not only in high and dry spots, but also in low and salt places. They dig holes with their fore feet, forming oblique and winding burrows of some yards in length, ending in a large hole or nest, in which a store of provision, consisting of herbs, is preserved. These burrows are concealed and defended with great sagacity; indeed, the Hebrew name implies cunning. At the approach of danger, they spring forward so swiftly, that a man well mounted can hardly overtake them. The figure of this animal is given under the article Mouz. R.

CONFESSION, a public or private declaration which any one makes of his sins. Matthew says, (chap. iii. 6.) that the Jews came to receive baptism, conscience, that he could not have them. Jesus then appealed to us to confess our faults one to another; and John says, that if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive them, 1 John i. 9. We see, in the Acts of the Apostles, that many Gentiles who were converted, came and confessed their sins, ch. xix. 18.

In the ceremony of the solemn expiation, under the Mosaic law, the high-priest confessed in general his own sins, the sins of other ministers of the temple, and those of all the people; and when an Israelite offered a sacrifice for sin, he put his hand on the head of the victim, and confessed his faults, Lev. iv. 4.

CONFESSOR, a name given to those who confessed the doctrine of Christ before heathen, or persecuting, judges; or to those who firmly endured punishment for defending the faith; if they died under their torments they were called martyrs. Our Lord says, he will confess before his heavenly Father, those who shall have confessed him before men; (Matt. x. 32.) and Paul commends Timothy (1 Tim. vi. 12.) for having confessed a good confession (Extr. trans. profession;) for having, at the hazard of his life, given a glorious and steady testimony to the truth. The same apostle says, that Jesus Christ witnessed a good confession before Pontius Pilate, 1 Tim. vi. 13.

CONFESSION, the testimony, or judgment of the soul, approving its actions which it judges to be good, or reproaching itself with the commission of those which it judges to be evil. Conscience is a moral principle, which determines on the good or evil tendency of our actions. In Rom. xii. 1, Christians are required to be submissive to secular powers, "not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake." Paul promises that also, to eat at the house of Gentiles, if invited thereto, and to partake of what is served at their tables, without making particular inquiries from any scrupulosity of conscience; making no questions for conscience sake. But if any one, meaning to inform them, says, "This has been sacrificed to idols," eat not of that meat, says the apostle, for his sake who gave you this information; and, likewise, lest you should wound another's conscience, 1 Cor. x. 25 — 29. If he who gives you this notice be a Christian, and, notwithstanding the information he gives you, he will eat it, it will be well. If he refrains, he will eat it of your example, and thereby will wound his own conscience: if he be a heathen, and he sees you eat of it, contrary to Christian custom, he will conceive a contempt for you and your religion, which will not power to induce you to refrain from so small a gratification.

CONSECRATE, Consecration, the offering or devoting any thing to God's worship and service. In the law, God ordained that the first-born of man and beast should be consecrated: he consecrated also, the race of Abraham, particularly the tribe of Levi, and more especially the family of Aaron. The whole Hebrew commonwealth, however, was consecrated, on their arrival in the land of Canaan. (See Ebal.)

Consecrations depended on the good will of men, who consecrated themselves, or things, or persons depending on them, to the service of God, whether for a time only, or in perpetuity. Joshua devoted, or set apart, the Gibeonites to the service of the tabernacle, Josh. ix. 27. David and Solomon devoted the Nethinim, or remains of the ancient Canaanites. Hannah consecrated her son Samuel to the Lord, to serve all his life in the tabernacle. The angel who promised Zechariah a son, (Luke i. 15.) commanded him to consecrate him to the Lord, and to take care that he should keep the charge of the Lord, which the Nazarites (who were consecrated to God, though but for a time) observed during their consecration.

The Hebrews sometimes devoted fields or cattle to the Lord; after which they were no longer in their own power. Did not Jacob do the same? Gen. xxviii. 22. If they desired to possess them again, they were obliged to redeem them. David, and other kings, often consecrated to the Lord the arms and spoils of their enemies, or their enemies' cities, and country. (See ANATHEMA, and Devoting.) In the New Testament we also see consecrations. Believers are consecrated to the Lord, as a holy race, a chosen people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. Bishops and other sacred ministers are devoted more peculiarly, &c.

CONTRITION, sorrow for sin, attended with a sincere resolution of reformation. Scripture never uses this term in this sense, but has many equivalent expressions; without contrition there is no repentance, and without repentance no remission of sins. Ps. li. 17.

CONVERSION, a turning from one state, manner of life, course of conduct, or principles, to another; as from the worship of idols to that of the true God. The gospel it means a change of heart, spirit, disposition, or behavior. So the apostles are advised to forsake the haughty, ambitious, and worldly views of men, to become like children, to entertain child-like sentiments, Matt. xviii. 3. Sinners are converted when they turn from sin to God, (Psalm li. 13.) when they forsake their old courses, and practice holiness in heart and life. When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren, (Luke xxii. 33.) when thou art changed and recovered from thy foolishness of mind, to sentiments of greater firmness, to feelings of stronger faith, and more devout assurance, then strengthen those who may be ready to sink into despondency, error, or apostasy, and endeavor to prevent the prevalence of these evils over their minds, by recollecting those hazards to which thou hast felt thine own exposure.

COOS, a small island of the Grecian Archipelago, at a short distance from the south-west point of Lesser Asia, 1 Mac. xv. 25. Paul passed it in his voyage to Colossae, and first mentioned it in his epistle to the Corinthians. The Cossans, who probably were not unlike our gauzes, or transparent muslins, are alluded to by Horace and Tibullus. It was celebrated for its fertility, for the wine and silk-worms which it produced, and for the manufacture of silk and cotton of a beautiful texture.

COPONIUS, the first governor of Judea, established by Augustus, after the banishment of Archelaus to Vienne, in France. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1. 1.)

COPPER, one of the primitive metals, and the most ductile and malleable after gold and silver. Of this metal and lapis calaminaris is made brass, which is a modern invention. There is little doubt but that copper is intended in those passages of our translation of the Bible which speak of brass. Copper was known prior to the flood, and was wrought by Tubal-Cain, the seventh from Adam, Gen. iv. 22. It appears to have been used for all the purposes for which we now use iron. Job speaks of a vase of copper; (xx. 24.) and the Philistines bound Samson with feters of copper, Judg. xvi. 21. In Ezra viii. 27, there is mention of "two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold." The LXX, Vulg. Castalio, and Arabic.
render "vases of shining brass"; the Syriac, "vases of Corinthian brass." It is more probable, however, that the word corban comes from Persia, or Persians, which Aramaic totole describes as being so shining, so pure, and so free from tarnish, that its color differs nothing from that of gold. Bochart takes this to be the charmad of Ezek. i. 27. and the fine brass of the Revelation, (i. 18; ii. 18,) the electrum of the ancients, (See Anwes.) Ezekiel (xxvii. 13,) speaks of the merchants of Javan, Jubal, and Mechech, as bringing vessels of brass (copper) to the markets of Tyre. According to Bochart and Michaelis, these were people situated towards mount Canaanus, where copper mines are worked this day.

CORAL, a hard, cretaceous, marine production, produced by the labors of millions of insects, and resembling in figure the stem of a plant, divided into branches. It is of various colors, black, white, and red. The latter is the most valuable. It is recorded by the author of the book of Job, (xxviii. 18,) and by the prophet Ezekiel, (xxvii. 16,) among precious stones.

CORBAN, a gift, a present made to God, or to his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or by gifts offered to God, Matt. xxiii. 18. Theophrastus says, that the Tyrians forbade the use of such oaths as were peculiar to foreigners, and particularly of corban; which, Josephus informs us, was used only by the Jews. Our Saviour reproaches the Jews with cruelty towards their parents, in making a corban of what should have been appropriated to their use. Matthew expresses this reply from children to their parents: "It is a gift—whichever thou mightest be profited by me," i.e. I have already devoted to God which you request of me. Is not the idea to this effect: "That succor which you request of me is already devoted to God; therefore I cannot profane it by giving it to you, although you are my parent, and such might be my duty?"—Now, this might take place in particular articles, without the child's whole property being so devoted; or it might be a pretence to put off the soliciting parent for the time.

The form of the vow is in express terms mentioned in the Talmud; and though such a vow is against both nature and reason, yet the Pharisees, and the Talmudists, their successors, approve it. To fasten upon the mind of the unthinking a sense of the natural duty, to charity and religion, to confirm and increase the superstition of their people, the Jewish doctors did not require them to be pronounced in a formal manner; it was of little consequence whether the words were pronounced: the appearance was sufficient; and, in most use, provided something was said which came near it. They permitted even debtors to defraud their creditors, by consecrating their debt to God; as if the property were their own, and not rather the right of their creditor. Josephus remarks, that, among the Jews, men and women sometimes made themselves corban; that is, consecrated themselves to God, or to certain offices in his service. If they were afterwards desirous to cancel their obligation, they gave to the priest, for a man fifty, for a woman thirty, shekels. (Antiq. iv. 4.)

Moses speaks of different sorts of corban, or dedications by the Hebrews, of part of their estates, which might be afterwards redeemed, or if it were cattle, sacrificed, Lev. xxvii. 28.

They who made a vow neither to eat nor drink till they had killed Paul, (Acts xxiii. 12,) in some sort made every thing corban that belonged to them; or every thing that might supply them with meat and drink.

CORBONA, the treasury of the temple, so called because the offerings, made in money, were there deposited. The Jews scrupled to deposit the money, returned by Judas, in the temple treasury, because it had been the price of blood; and as such was esteemed impure, Matt. xxvii. 59.

CORD. To put cords about one's reins, to gird one's self with a cord, was a token of sorrow and humiliation, Job xvi. 18; 1 Kings xx. 31, 39. Cord is often used for inheritance: I will give thee the land of Canaan, the cord of thine inheritance, Psalm cv. 11, margin. "Joseph hath a double cord" (Ezek. xivii. 13. Eng. tr. two portions;) which expression originated from the custom of measuring land with a cord. So Joshua distributed to every tribe a certain number of cords, or acres. "My cords (Eng. tr. lines, that is, my lot) are fallen unto me in pleasant places," Psalm xvi. 6. "The waves of death compassed me about," (2 Sam. xxii. 5.) Heb. the cords of hell (of the grave); alluding to the fillets bound about dead bodies: he also calleth them cords of life. The LXX, instead of cords of death, translates it, pains of death, Psalm xviii. 5. "The bands (cords) of the wicked," (Psalm cxxii. 6.) the snares with which they catch weak people. The cords of sin (Prov. xiv. 14.) are the consequences of sin; the evil of sins: bad habits are, as it were, indissoluble bands, from which it is almost impossible to extricate ourselves. To stretch a cord or line about a city signifies, to ruin it, to destroy it entirely, to level it with the ground, Lam. ii. 6. The cords extended in setting up tents furnish several metaphors, Isa. xxxiii. 20; Jer. x. 20.

CORIANDER, a small, round seed of an aromatic plant. Moses says, that the manna which fell in the wilderness was like coriander-seed; its color was white, Exod. xxxi. 31; Num. xi. 7. See MANNA.

CORINTH, the capital of Achaia, called anciently Ephrya, and seated on the isthmus which separates the Peloponnesus from Attica, and hence called the marble, on two seas. The city itself stood a little inland, but it had two ports, Lecheum on the west, and Cenchrea on the east. It was one of the most populous and wealthy cities of Greece; but its riches produced pride, ostentation, effeminacy, and all the vices generally to which the so-called refinement, particularly, was not only tolerated, but consecrated here, by the worship of Venus, and the notorious prostitution of numerous attendants devoted to her. Such was here the experiment at which these pleasures were pointed, as to give occasion to the proverb: "Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum." Corinth was destroyed by the Romans, B. C. 146; and during the conflagration, several metals in a fused state accidentally running together, gave the composition named frangaria, or Corinthian brass. It was afterwards restored by Julius Caesar, who planted in it a Roman colony; but while it soon regained its ancient splendor, it also relapsed into all its former dissipation. Paul arrived at Corinth, A. D. 52. (Acts xviii. 1.) and lodged with Aquila and his wife Priscilla, who, as well as himself, were tent-makers. He preached in the Jewish synagogue, and converted some to the faith of Christ; and from hence spread the gospel to the Thessalonians. Finding that the Jews of Corinth, instead of being benefited, opposed him with blasphemy, he shook his reins, and turned to the Gentiles, lodging with Justus, surnamed Titus, a Cyrilla, who feared God. Many of them embraced the faith. Paul suffered much here; but remained in the neighborhood eighteen months.

From Corinth he went to Jerusalem; and about A.D. 58, wrote his First Epistle to the Corinthians, from Ephesus, in which he reproves some parties who despised the name of their church; contains a reproof of disorders in their assemblies; of lawsuits among them; and of a Christian who, by taking his father's wife, had committed incest with his mother-in-law. This letter producing in the Corinthians deep sorrow, great vigilance against the vices reproved, and a very beneficial dread of God's anger, they removed the scandal, and expressed determination zeal against the crime committed, 2 Cor. vii. 9, 10, 11. The apostle, having ascended the good effect which his first letter had produced among the Corinthians, wrote a second to them, from Macedonia, probably from Philippi, (A. D. 57.) in which he expresses his satisfaction at their conduct, justifies himself, and comforts them; he glorifies in his sufferings, and exhorts them to liberality. There is great probability that Paul visited Corinth a second time, towards the end of this year, (Acts xx. 2; and 2 Cor. xii. 14; xiii. 1.) and a third time, on his second return to Rome, 2 Tim. iv. 30. See further on the date of these events in the Notes on Acts.

CORMORANT, an unclean water-bird, Lev. xi. 17, &c. The Chaldee and Syriac versions render the Hebrew ish yeo, fish-catcher, and the LXX. cattaros, which bird, according to Aristotle, agreed well enough with the description of the cormorant; but the name has the cormorant in our translation, instead of the pelican. See BRUNS.

CORNE. The generic name for grain, in the Old Testament writings, is iρα, daga, corn, so named for its abundant inca ces. In (Isa. xxvii. 12, and Matt. xiii. 8), grain is spoken of as yielding a hundred-fold; and to the ancient fertility of Palestine all authorities bear testimony. Of the difference in quantity of produce in different parts, Watanabe has collected many accounts.
